Unionists endorse call to occupy factories

By GREG McMASTER

A meeting of about 350 people yesterday endorsed almost unanimously a call for factory occupations by workers to oppose plant shutdowns. If owners refused to operate companies, workers would demand public ownership and management by workers' councils and the surrounding community, according to the position adopted.

The meeting was called by the Waffle Movement for an Independent Socialist Canada to discuss mass layoffs and plant shutdowns being faced by Canadian workers.

Most speakers blamed the high level of American ownership of Canadian industry for Canada's rampant unemployment, but United Electrical Workers Local 531 president Dave Monie implied that the problem is more general.

He described the squeeze being put on his fellow workers at Northern Electric co. which is owned primarily by Bell Canada, in turn Canadian-owned.

In the past two years, nearly half the employees of Northern Electric at Brampton have lost their jobs, he said, resulting in less militancy, and therefore, less union strength and confidence at bargaining time.

He blamed this on the conscious policy of the new company president, John C. Lobbe, formerly of International Telephone and Telegraph (ITT), whom Monie described as a "professional gunslinger" and "hatchetman".

He charged that Northern has laid off over 5,000 people since the new president took over, while profits have risen from $9.3 million in 1970 to $16.5 million in 1971. He added, "We must demand the nationalization of Bell Canada" before more Northern Electric and Bell Canada workers lose their jobs.

Archie Wilson, the UAW plant chairman at Douglas Aircraft, charged that Canadian workers are made to suffer the consequences of crises in American capitalism.

Wilson led militant strikers at Douglas last year in defying a back-to-work order from Leonard Woodcock of the UAW's International (Detroit) headquarters and from Dennis McDermott, the Canadian UAW director.

Canada's aerospace industry, said Wilson, formerly employed 40 - 50,000 workers, but now can only handle 10 - 15,000. He blamed this decline as well as the coming layoff of 1800 at Douglas, on the lull in the American aerospace industry.

Following the speech by Cecil Taylor, an executive officer of Hamilton's Steelworker Local 1005, the meeting voted to support his call for a resistance campaign against the present offensive of shutdowns, layoffs and possibly wage controls, being directed at Canadian workers.

His speech urged building the Waffle movement, and advising workers to occupy plants that are faced with shutdowns or mass layoffs.

U of T professor Melville Watkins gave a detailed analysis of the harmful effects of American ownership of Canadian industry, and criticized the major political parties for refusing to deal with the problem as an election issue.

"No political party" is willing to do the necessary job of "restructuring the economy" to prevent both unemployment and the loss of Canadian energy resources to the U.S., he said. Only a "militant and independent" labour movement can provide the necessary socialist alternative, he added.

Developer threatens Charles St. playground

By RANDY ROBERTSON

An outdoor playground at the Charles Street Married Student Residence will be replaced by a row of stores if the plans of a developer are carried out.

Revenue Properties Corporation Limited intends to build a one-storey commercial development on the playground site, and is presently seeking Ontario Housing Corporation approval of its plans.

John Keith, a tenant who is organizing against the development charged that the OHC "will clearly be siding with business against tenants" if it accepts the Revenue Properties application.

OHC can only refuse the application on "reasonable grounds," he noted. But the grounds for refusal do exist, he contended.

The present site is the only playground which married students have for their children. According to tenant Steve Scadding there are close to 400 children in the two by buildings which comprise the residence quarters. He charged that the proposed stores will increase the already high traffic volume and thus increase the danger to children.

Tenant June Thibault declared that there is no consumer need for any more stores, as the apartment buildings are one block from Bloor Street and very close to Yonge Street.

"We will not patronize these stores if they are built," she said.

Revenue Properties has proposed building a playground on top of the stores but Scadding asserted this would not compensate for the removal of the present facilities. Effective use of the remaining ground-level area around the building would be limited since it would also be used by the public.

Scadding noted that the ground-floor Tower Nursery School, at 35 St. Charles Street would be directly behind the stores, facing onto an alleyway.

If the nursery moved from this undesirable location to the second storey area adjacent to the planned rooftop playground, extensive renovations would be required. Renovation costs of this building, presently containing four apartments and a recreation room, would have to be borne by the tenants in the form of increased rents.

The rents are already unrealistically high, Scadding says, pointing out that 10 per cent of the apartments in the two buildings are vacant.

Revenue Properties has promised to bear the cost of the construction of the new playground, Scadding says, but has not promised to pay for interior renovations for the nursery.

Revenue Properties already operates the stores on the ground floor of 30 Charles Street. According to the original contract with U of T and OSHC in 1970, it "rented" these stores for one dollar a year for 50 years.

The developer proposes to pay

$10,000 a year to OSHC for 35 Charles Street stores. But this, Scadding said, would only replace the revenue lost if the four apartments were destroyed for the nursery school area.

The tenants have no decision-making powers in OSHC or in OHC. Nevertheless they hope to pressure OHC into rejecting the developer's bid.

The tenants are seeking a meeting with the University of Toronto, which jointly owns the residences along with OSHC, to ask it to apply pressure on OHC.

U of T assistant vice-president Frank Stone said in an interview last week that the developer's proposal was "not attractive". He declared his support for the students and said the university is "exploring all possibilities".

Scadding hopes to bring up the issue in the upcoming municipal election and a meeting with all the Ward 6 candidates has been called for November 15.

Relies on traditional Liberal votes

Trudeau is leader Canada needs: Stollery

With this profile of Liberal Peter Stollery, The Varsity begins a series on the federal election in the riding of Spadina.

The boundaries of the riding, Sherbourne Street on the east, Palmerston Avenue on the west and Bloor Street on the north, encompass most of U of T's St. George campus.

The Varsity—David Lloyd

By LORNE SLOTNICK

Peter Stollery is relying on a combination of traditional Liberal votes and a "mod" image in his bid to win spadina riding in the October 30 federal election.

The former world traveller is trying to cultivate the image of a free-thinking maverick, but it appears that he has few disagreements with the policies of Pierre Trudeau's government.

Stollery says Trudeau is the "leader that the country needs," and a man who doesn't make decisions for political reasons alone.

"He's a politician that's different", he claims.

Spadina has been represented since 1962 by Perry Ryan, who was elected as a Liberal, but then switched to the Conservatives in 1969 because he thought the government's foreign policy was too radical.

This time Ryan faces Stollery, the NDP's Bob Beardsley, Communist Maggie Bizzell and Mitchell Bornstein of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist).

Stollery is confident of winning by about 2000 votes, and says he has had a "considerable" amount of money on the results. He believes a great majority of Ryan's votes in 1968 were pro-Liberal rather than pro-Ryan.

In 1968, Ryan got 58 per cent of the 17,000 votes, with the NDP's Dan Heap and Conservative Vic Bagnato splitting the rest fairly evenly.

The riding runs south from Bloor, between Yonge and Dovercourt south of College, and to Grace Street north of College. For many years it has been populated heavily by various immigrant groups, and this year about half of the 30,000 eligible voters are new Canadians, mainly Portuguese, Chinese and Italians.

Stollery speaks Italian and French, and his campaign literature is written in six languages.

In addition to counting on the "ethnic" vote, Stollery is also "pretty sure" that he will win the U of T vote, estimated at 4,000.

He says Ryan was an "absentee MP" who neglected the riding and its Liberal association, so when he left the Liberals, he took very few workers with him. Stollery says he has rebuilt the Liberal organization over the past two years.

Stollery joined the Liberal Party less than four years ago shortly after Trudeau came to power. In the 1969 municipal election, he ran as a Liberal and narrowly missed becoming Ward 6 alderman.

Although Stollery is confident of winning this time, he is not sure who the main opposition is. He says, "we're strong right across the riding", but admits it's a three-way race.

His campaign is costing about $12,000 of which $5,000 is his own money. He says he started planning to run just after Ryan switched sides. One of his slogans is "Stollery won't switch... he'll stay Liberal."

Stollery believes that the most important task to be accomplished in the election is the defeat of the "forces of reaction". The reactionaries include critics of unemployment insurance, social welfare schemes, and immigration.

The "forces of reaction" mainly reside in the Conservative Party. But "even in the Liberal Party", he admitted there are less than progressive elements.

He boasts that the present government is "the most radical since MacKenzie King" in social policies, and denies that Trudeau is pandering to the "welfare backlash".

He says he realizes that Trudeau sometimes contradicts himself on social issues, but forgives him, saying, "he has to say something".

The NDP is just another conservative party, in his view. This is because the NDP's policy on any matter is "predictable", just like any Conservative position. Only in the Liberal Party can a person be independent, he says.

Asked about the government's response to U.S. domination of the economy, Stollery first replied that the Liberals had taken "practical steps" to mitigate this. For example, a screening agency to review foreign takeovers of large Canadian companies was established. Then he thought for a moment and added that he "would have liked to have seen stronger measures." He didn't specify what measures could be instituted, but said he felt greater action would come in the future.

On the subject of Quebec, Stollery called Parti quebecois leader Rene Levesque a "creep", and termed discussion about self-determination for Quebec a "non-issue".

A two-thirds majority in a referendum would be needed for separation, he said. He said the invocation of the War Measures Act was unfortunate but justified because it "brought home the drama" of the events of October 1970.

Stollery lists his occupation as a free-lance journalist, although he hasn't done any writing for some years. He is a member of one of Toronto's oldest families and is a former managing director of the Frank Stollery clothing store at Yonge and Bloor.

Canada helps punish American dissidents

A distressing trend to use the Canadian government and its agencies as an arm of the American government in its world-wide hunt for political opponents has developed of late.

It all surfaced with the revelation a few years ago that Canadian immigration officials were turning American draft dodgers seeking refuge in Canada over to their American colleagues. At the same time, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were discovered to be harrasing draft dodgers resident in Canada and on occasion shipping them back across the border.

The last year has seen the Canadian government's complicity centre within our court system. Within recent months, three activists sought by the American government have been brought before Canadian courts.

Puerto Rican independentista Humberto Pagan, wanted by the Americans for the alleged killing of the American colony's riot chief and his role in anti-government students activities, was hunted down in his Canadian exile and brought before the courts to face an extradition case. Although the county court refused to turn him over to American authorities, the Supreme Court later gave the US permission to appeal the case. As the case drag's out, Pagan will have to live from day to day uncertain whether he will suddenly find that he has been ordered extradited to an almost certain death at the hands of the corrupt Puerto Rican government.

About the same time as the Pagan case, the American government sought the extradition of Karleton Armstrong for allegedly blowing up the US Army Mathematics

Research Centre in a blast which killed one technician when the bomb went off four minutes early. Armstrong was ordered deported even though fellow dissidents testified to the political nature of the bombing. A reasoned student campaign against the on-campus military activity, which failed to influence the university administration to close the centre, preceded the bombing. Armstrong was ordered deported.

And now Black Panther Ed Hogan is before the courts. This time, the Americans didn't have to act. Canadian immigration authorities acted to extradite Hogan because he entered Canada illegally. The government wants to send him back to the Ohio jail to which he didn't return after being given an unguarded leave last summer. Should he be returned, Hogan will have to finish out his sentence for 1969 robbery in which he was alleged to have been an accomplice.

The cruel and unjust persecution of the militant Black Panthers is legend. Many have been killed by police bullets, often in sneak attacks upon unsuspecting members. Similarly, Black Panthers have little reason to expect fair treatment from American courts, courts against whose oppression of their people they have fought.

The Pagan, Armstrong, and Hogan defences have been found not on grounds of the alleged "crimes", but on the basis of the political nature of their the activities for which the three have been charged.

Canadians should demand that our government stop allowing its agencies, including the courts, to be used, to quote Hogan's lawyer (Charles Roach), as ((the cat's

Canada should offer sanctuary to the politically oppressed rather than aiding the corrupt states they are resisting.

Every individual has the right, nay the duty, to oppose unjust government. By allowing our courts to be used to return political dissidents to imprisonment and possibly worse fates more for their views than their alleged crimes, we become complicit in the oppression and repression perpetuated by these regimes.

Canada must not be the policeman of the States or any other government.

Evans should have consulted undergrads about AUCC rep

President John Evans' failure to consult any undergraduate student representatives about his choice of the undergrad member of the U of T delegation to the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada annual meeting is deplorable.

In the past, the Students' Administrative Council has been consulted, albeit indirectly, in the selection of the undergrad member of the U of T delegation, with the president being automatically selected. This year, Evans and his fellow administrators chose Cederio as the undergrad—without consulting any undergrads.

Replying to a SAC letter protesting the unprecedented lack of consultation, vice-president Jack Sword, writing on behalf of Evans, said the Governing Council student representatives (who have taken office for the first time in the interim between last year's meeting and now) were the logical choice to represent the students. "With a unicameral method of government, we have to rethink the process of consultation," he told SAC.

Yet, Evans didn't even bother to poll the Governing Council undergrad caucus to determine their choice for the delegation seat. This despite the fact that a precedent for such consultation exists. The new U of T Act, which created the Governing Council the administrators is trying to use to justify its failure to consult SAC, requires the council's undergrad student members to elect their representative on the Executive Committee.

Nor did Evans consult any committee or the Governing Council in making his appointment, shattering any illusions that the student was being chosen as a GC rep.

And, interestingly, Evans opted to consult the Graduate Students' Union for their choice to join the U of T delegation. The excuse for this discriminatory action—the graduate students also having Governing Council reps—was that the conference's theme, research, was more directly related to grads than undergrads.

However, a university's research policy significantly effects its undergraduate teaching program end reflects much of how it regards its social responsibility.

What Evans seems to be saying by this whole consultation-no consultation game is that some students are worth consulting; others are not. And, not surprisingly, those denied the right are those who may not end up rubberstamping Evans' choice in the required manner.

The AUCC in itself is of relatively little importance. That is not what is at point here. The principle is that Evans has denied undergraduate students their right to have their elected representatives decide who should represent them, rather than having to settle for the administrators' choice.

U of T shouldn't go to closed meeting; openness essential

On a national level, the AUCC's decision to close its general sessions to the public cannot be overlooked. After years of struggle to gain openness on university bodies, students can be forgiven if they're a little surprised by the AUCC's sudden move to keep unofficial observers out of their deliberations.

The AUCC public relations office in Ottawa insists that the sessions have always been restricted to delegates, official observers, invited guests, and the press. The U of T Students' Administrative Council says they've been open.

And, comments by U of T conference attendees suggest that they thought they were open. In fact, vice-president Jack Sword wrote SAC that the AUCC board had unanimously agreed to restrict this year's attendance at the conference, thereby appearing to imply this represented a change in AUCC policy.

At the very least, there is sufficient confusion to make one believe that if the ruling existed before it was not enforced. This year, it apparently will be.

Although he said he favoured an open conference, Sword said he could understand the board's decision in light of "the confused and ineffective nature" of last year's conference.

AUCC Offawa says the meetings are closed because of limited space, although the conferences are held at large hotels.

More likely sounding is Sword's comment about the disruptions which occurred at last year's conference. Undoubtedly, dissident student and non-student groups which oppose current university research policy—research often serving Canadian and American military interests—might be expected to make their views known at the AUCC meeting if the sessions were open, whether or not they had the right to speak.

SAC has demanded that U of T withdraw its delegation unless the general sessions are thrown open. We agree. To do any less is to condone a policy of secrecy which supposedly has died on most Canadian campuses.

Performances inspire optimism

Misanthrope plagued by schizophrenic design

Schizophrenic is perhaps the only single adjective that could describe The Misanthrope as we see it this week at Hart House. The production is so divided from within that one wonders if any effort was made to present Moliere's text from an original angle. From the strangeness of the production's design, one would guess that this was the intention.

Directors' intentions do not always produce coherent results whether the productions be student-run or "professional" (a term rapidly losing its magic appeal). What the Hart House production has turned out to be is a more than tolerable, simple rendition of Moliere's comedy, a comedy unfortunately set in a confused, visual hodge-podge that carefully avoids simplicity. It is a pity that this clutter has to be endowed by a cast that obviously worked hard and long to do justice to the text.

A change in the decor and costuming intended or implied by the author must have some guiding thought behind it. The incongruity in the design one sees here might best be expressed by the image of Cellmene, dressed in black bell bottoms and a tailored shirt, pouring tea from a silver tea service. The use of modern elements is too inconsistent to be fathomed.

What can we assume from Cellmene's outfit or from Alceste's business suit? That her behaviour belongs to the woman of the seventies or that he can be identified with the grey flannel suit mentality? Both ideas are far-fetched.

In the costuming of supporting characters, the caricatures intended by the contemporary outfits are easy, painfully easy, to see.

Acaste and Clitandre are ever the twin fools in their bright checks, and Oronte's outrageous vanity is properly reflected in his slick ensemble. However, this kind of costuming does not justify changing the time period, especially when the properties and constructions have no consistency of style whatever.

A few pillars and backdrops vaguely remind us of the age of Moliere, whereas a modern sofa and shiny leather chairs put the setting in a sort of contemporary limbo.

The playing space has been informally divided into Cellmene's salon upstage and a narrow strip downstage which is outside the house. The performers are confident enough in their entrances and exits to make this arrangement as acceptable for the audience as it was in Moliere's time. Space, in fact, has been used imaginatively, both in the levels created on the set and the blocking of the play's action.

Harry Lane, obvious choice for the role of Alceste, gave us a passionate and lovable main character. He used facial expression, exaggerated gesturing, and vocal inflection to create an Alceste who was often clownish in expressing his misguided idealism. He did not have as versatile a match in Rita Oavies' Cellmene. The coquette could have sparkled much more, above all in the series of portraits she gives of her "friends". Here is a virtuoso piece for an actress to exploit with all her capabilities. The lacklustre result in this instance can be blamed as much on the director as on the actress. On the other hand, Robert Joy managed to give some verve to the bland role of the confidante, a character to which Moliere gave a very limited range of reactions.

The supporting performances give us reason for optimism as far as student-run productions are concerned. When we consider interpretation as it is realized through design, however, let us hope that future productions will be more "together". Ibsen and Shakespeare should provide enough of a challenge.

Pillars and backdrops remind Hart House audience of Moliere's time; modern furniture doesn't.

Hydro won't let potential tenants renovate boarded houses before sale to OHC is completed.

that 12 of the houses are in good structural condition and 26 require major repairs. Only three were considered irreparable. Most of the houses are two- and three-storey brick structures, roughly between 75 and 100 years old. Their faults bear witness to the neglect of the past few years.

According to Jack Diamond of Diamond and Myers, the architects OHC hired as planning consultants for the block, all the houses along Beverley and most along Baldwin will be saved, though it is debatable whether the frame houses along Henry will remain standing. The architects have already drawn up a preliminary plan for the block.

It is chiefly through Diamond and Myers that the working committee will influence OHC's eventual actions. The consultants hope to receive a "comprehensive summary" of the residents' desires, which they will consider in relation to physical possibilities, potential costs, and OHC policy, and then draw up a detailed plan for the block, said Diamond.

Hired three months ago, Diamond and Myers were previously known in the Grence end and have good communication with the working committee, having participated in some of its meetings and having similar desires for the block. Diamond predicted that final plans will "mirror the local community". Any redevelopment will be in terms of low-rise, low-cost, row housing while there will be some infilling and slight increase in the block's density, all meant to blend in with present housing, said Diamond.

Once the negotiations are completed and the plan developed by Diamond and Myers, OHC, under Grossman's direction, will establish a Technical Steering Committee to review the plans and determine the actual nature of the block's redevelopment. Priorities, funding, and rental prices in addition to the physical affects will have to be considered. But, any movement toward rehabilitation, clearing, or construction must await the outcome of the negotiations with Hydro.

According to Kay Parsons, the GPRA representative on the working committee, the community has been "told all along" since the government's decision how quickly the transfer was made. OHC's position has been that it can take no responsibility for opening or markedly rehabilitating the houses at the moment because Hydro still owns the block, said Parsons. Hydro has indicated that it can make no changes to the houses while negotiations are in progress.

When Hydro negotiator L. McMurtry was questioned about the present situation, he denied that there is any stalemate and insisted that the transfer should be completed shortly. According to McMurtry, OHC spent the winter and spring deciding on their options and making an appraisal of the property before presenting their first offer in mid-summer.

The Hydro and OHC valuations of the land approximately agree, stated McMurtry. The original owners of the houses sold "readily" to Hydro, he said, often getting inflated prices for their homes; prices rose and Hydro ended by paying over $2 million for the block, an average of $60,000 per house. But, Hydro doesn't want only to recover the money it spent assembling the land. It also desires to recoup the losses in revenue that mounted during the time it has maintained the houses. Thus, what McMurtry called, "overheads and incidental expenses (for some rehabilitation, guards, land taxes, et cetera)," are being added to Hydro's asking price.

McMurtry said the stumbling block in the negotiations is "should OHC pay for these", while maintaining that such considerations are a matter of normal transfer operations. "An exercise of internal accounting" between government departments, he labelled it.

So, although OHC is willing to pay "about two million" for the block, there is still a 20 per cent variation between this offer and the price Hydro is requesting, said McMurtry. Then, he restated that both sides are "rapidly homing in on a final figure".

OHC negotiator R. Beasley was less willing to talk, saying the negotiations are "privileged information". OHC has made an offer, he said, and is now waiting for Hydro's reply. The offer covers more than the appraised value of the block, Beasley stated. He added that he is "very optimistic" the transfer will soon be completed.

Both McMurtry and Beasley asserted that all the facts of the negotiations will be available to the public once the transaction has been completed.

Grossman stated emphatically that the negotiations "shouldn't have taken this long". He said he has been putting pressure on Hydro to complete the deal. The transfer should be completed "any day now" and it not "here'll be hell to pay", according to Grossman. Negotiations should be completed at the latest within two weeks, he concluded.

Perhaps Hydro's belief that it should be reimbursed by the government through OHC for the revenue and trouble taken by the Hydro block problems is based upon a feeling that the government made these expenses futile.

Hydro assembled the houses quietly to avoid public pressure, beginning in the summer of 1969 and completing the task within a year. It had chosen the block for its major inner city transformer for four reasons: it would be close to the centre of downtown expansion and could thus enable secure delivery of power and lower costs for cable; the land was cheap relative to other possible sites; the street pattern was suitable for cable routes and contained none of the underground interferences that would be met closer to

Talks delay occupancy of saved houses

By STEWART GOODYEAR

A short walk south of the U of T, a eerlee of Beverley Street houses extend empty, becoming weather-beaten in disuse, their windows boarded.

Although there's a shortage of low-cost housing close to the city's centre, these residences will remain unoccupied until Ontario Hydro complete their sale to the Ontario Housing Corporation. Only then will rehabilitation and eventual full occupation of the block be possible.

A year has passed since the provincial government ordered Hydro to sell the houses to OHC rather than tearing them down.

Bounded by Beverley on the west, Cecil Street on the north, Henry Street on the east and Baldwin Street on the south, this land is known by both negotiators and local residents as the Hydro block. The area has been a contentious issue for over three years.

By the summer of 1970, Hydro had assembled the land, intending to tear down the houses and replace them with a massive transformer and switching station to serve the power needs of the city's rapidly expanding central core. But, the surrounding community is a low rise residential area and the community's residents and city planners both realized how incompatible with the existing district and detrimental to it the transformer would be. At first the city Planning Board attempted to stall Hydro's plans, but by the spring of 1971 they decided to allow construction. There was little residents could do.

Then in August of last year, the Ontario government, led by Revenue Minister Alan Grossman, MPP for the riding containing the Hydro block, told Hydro it would have to find another site for its transformer. Grossman ordered that the land be sold to OHC which would rehabilitate the block in a form compatible with its surrounding low-rise, residential context. A committee of local citizens' groups would be given the opportunity to guide OHC's policy for the block.

Represented by these avants are the issues of expansion, development, and arbitrary planning versus the retention of viable neighborhoods, community organization, and control. The present situation of the Hydro block may be seen as a victory for the latter, although the negotiations drag on.

During the past year, a Working Committee of the various citizens' groups of the Granga Park area in which the Hydro block is located have come together to help plan the future use of this sector of their community. The purpose of this committee is to analyze and reach a consensus on their desires for the block. The Grange Park Residents' Association (GPRA), a number of groups asserting the interests of the local Chinese community, the University Settlement House (which provides social services for the Granga), and the present residents of the Hydro block sit on the committee.

There are 41 houses on the block, 24 presently occupied, 17 boarded up. Half of those occupied have been taken by Metro Social Services as emergency housing. Some are rented by their original owners. All of the houses Hydro has rented out have been rehabilitated to minimum city standards.

A City Housing Inspection Report last winter stated the city centre; and the Grange area was zoned for institutional use under the city's official plan.

But, Hydro neglected to consider the effect its transformer could have upon the surrounding residential community. Not only would the huge, 16-storey windowless, concrete-sided structure be an unpleasing and stark spectacle totally alien to its context, but it would also devour a block which residents of the Grange had considered a buffer between their homes and the high-rise, institutional buildings on University Avenue. Fears were that it would lead to further intrusions of massive development into the neighbourhood.

Before Hydro could demolish the houses to make way for construction, it had to apply to the city Planning Board to have a lane running through the centre of the block closed. But, the planning staff realized the transformer was incompatible with the community interests and in April, 1970 said the lane would not be closed until Hydro proved the necessity of using this block. It was suggested that Hydro search for a site in the industrial area south of Queen where redevelopment could incorporate structures such as the proposed transformer.

Since Hydro would not begin construction until 1972 and couldn't clear the block, it became committed to renting the houses, taking with this the expense of maintaining them. Many had already been boarded and allowed to fall into disrepair, so there was also the problem of renovations.

At this time, a co-operative of local residents formed and approached Hydro offering to rent the Hydro block houses, doing their own renovations and maintenance.

But, in June, 1970, Hydro turned the co-op offer down flat, saying their proportion was unworkable and that it would require $100,000 to put the plan into effect. Co-op members then attempted to confront Hydro administrators over the decision, to no avail.

Hydro subsequently decided to refurbish 24 houses at a cost of $80,000 and make them available to Metro Social Services and to general tenancy. This had two drawbacks: the cost was almost as great as that projected by Hydro experts for the co-op venture, and it raised neighbourhood fears of a "welfare ghetto".

Negotiations between Hydro and the Planning Board continued and resulted in a meeting between the two in October, 1970. Here Hydro continued its protests that the transformer was compatible with the area's zoning and would not necessarily be detrimental to the neighbourhood. But, the planners held their position, stating a view that the Grange might perhaps best be given a residential zoning.

During the following winter, Hydro half-heartedly investigated two other sites nearby, one in Huron-Cassex, a second on Simcoe Street in the south-east corner of the Grange. A feasibility study was done on only the latter. In spring, 1971, Hydro approached the planning board once again, arguing that the expenses of moving to any other site would be too great. Over the winter, Hydro had continued to lay underground cables at the Beverley site, showing little inclination to stall its plans and perhaps hoping to force Planning Board acceptance.

In early May of 1971, the Planning Board gave in to Hydro's desires. A letter to City Council by chief planner Dennis Barker summarized the negotiations and the dilemma of the need for both power supply and the retention of low-cost, inner city housing. The Planning Board had already begun a Part 2 study of the Grange, considering the possible rezoning to halt the spectre of drastic development in the community. Although other major projects couldn't be passed until Part 2 was finished and approved, Barker proposed that the transformer station be accepted.

Therefore, the obstacles before Hydro appeared to have been removed. The land could now be closed and preparations for the construction that was to begin this year could be made. A meeting between the community, Hydro, and city officials to discuss the issue was set for August 30.

People continued to protest that when the disruption of a residential area was at stake a government instrument such as Hydro should weigh its desire for economy of expense. But, they realized the actual decisions had already been made, that the forum would merely be a formality.

Then, in late August, Grossman, with the support of Premier Bill Davis, stepped in to order Hydro to relocate in a non-residential area.

According to Grossman, he took action to stop Hydro as soon as the situation was brought to his attention by residents' groups. The development was halted because it would have destroyed a downtown neighbourhood which must be preserved, he said. He described his reaction to Hydro's plans as one of "outrage".

Grossman met with representatives of GPRA, informing them that the Hydro block was to be sold to OHC and maintained as a residential area. He was receptive to their proposals and agreed that if local groups could form a viable and representative working committee they could advise OHC.

Once the election was past, Grossman's tone changed from one which praised the potentials of citizen involvement to one which stressed that the government must make the decisions and that economics must guide policy.

This led citizens to feel that Grossman had followed a policy of supporting the electors before an election rather than one based on values.

Grossman denied it. "People always say that," he said.

But, the development of the working committee continued with OHC meeting local organizations in October to establish communication.

According to working committee and GPRA member Parsons, the residents' association was the leader in uniting the community groups. Finding that more conservative Chinese organizations wanted a formally recognized council, Parsons approached the Social Planning Council to gain its support and legitimize the committee. June Rowlands of the SPC became its chairman being non-partial and thus acceptable to both Chinese and non-Chinese groups.

By late April this year, the committee was in operation, meeting every two weeks. The OHC has sent a representative to a few of the meetings, but has played no active role. The Planning Board has been represented by Alan Dean, who has drawn up the Part 2 report for the Grange.

The committee is presently studying the results of a questionnaire distributed to residents of the Hydro block during the summer, hoping its conclusions will help them to reach the detailed consensus Diamond and Myers require. According to Parsons, the committee has been hindered in this because it has received no cost guidelines from either the government or OHC.

But, some concrete advances have already been made. When the leases on the Hydro block ended in July, Hydro offered month to month extensions. Dissatisfied with this, the working committee approached Grossman who assured residents they will be given a six month's notice before being required to vacate. The committee has also received a promise from OHC that those forced to vacate their homes when redevelopment occurs will be given first priority in obtaining residence on the block once construction is completed.

The consensus so far developed by the working committee indicates the following desires: to retain as many houses as possible; to have various types of tenancy (co-operatives, family housing, rooming houses, housing for the elderly) and perhaps some ownership if residents may buy homes back from OHC; to have a few commercial properties on the block; to construct a local meeting place and community centre; perhaps to include a day care centre; to assure that any redevelopment will be low rise and low cost; and to leave part of the block as a small park.

Diamond and Myers hope to receive a full report within four weeks so that the actual planning of the block may be completed before winter. Committee members are optimistic about satisfying this requirement. According to Rowlands, the committee are now working as a unit, discussing their wants freely and making progress, though it took a long while to establish this ease and co-operation. Rowlands also praised Dean, whose activity as a member of the city planning staff has given a firm base of knowledge to the committee's deliberations.

Dean's presence on the working committee reveals wider possibilities for community action in the Grange, for all developments there must be seen in the context of the Part 2 plan. Finally, the community will be zoned a low-rise, residential area to be maintained against the encroachments of massive development.

Developers have already bought up large portions of land there. But only in the south-eastern section of the Grange, along Queen and McCaul Streets, labelled the "transitional zone" on the plan, will any great change be allowed.

The Part 2 plan will be presented to the residents by the Planning Board on November 9. Dean hopes community reaction to the presentation will lead toward future meetings, refining of the plan to suit community needs and the organizing of the people along similar lines to the Hydro block working committee to take part in and guide the planning of the entire Grange.

Grossman described the incident as a victory for the philosophy that the life style of people is important and that progress "is not to be measured in terms of concrete". He called it "another evidence of government taking people into consideration in planning" while stressing that a "practical" method must be found for converting the block.

Noting that communications between him and OHC, Diamond and Myers, and the working committee, have been good, he said the final plans should "meet general acceptance" from the Grange residents.

So, what was to have been a large development, the first of a probable series of developments moving from the line of massive buildings along Queen and between University and McCaul to the centre of the Grange, devouring entire blocks of homes, may have led to the saving of the community. The city Planning Board and the province have thrown their support to the residents, voicing their belief that the city must keep neighbourhoods such as the Grange. Grossman's precedent and the new zoning restrictions will make any new development in the heart of the Grange unlikely.

The Hydro block issue has also catalyzed the organization of the community as a co-operative unit, bringing different groups together in the working committee. The success of this venture should lead to good communication and rapport between the segments of the community, allowing the residents to take a unified stand against future threats to their neighbourhood.

There are many reasons for saving the Grange. The low cost housing close to the city's centre offers an alternative to life in a high rise, provides homes for people unable to pay high rents and gives the city greater variety. The Grange is becoming the centre of Toronto's Chinese community, containing a culture which adds greater character to the city. It offers a gathering place for immigrants where they may find cultural support and may adjust to Toronto gradually. It has been argued that such residential neighbourhoods in the centre of a city reduce its crime and humanize its nature.

Therefore, the saving of the Hydro block represents not only the retention of some needed housing and the defeat of one developer, but may lead to the stabilizing of an entire inner city community. It may lead to the residents taking an active part in the planning of their neighbourhood.

But, whatever the eventual future of the Hydro block, there will be no concrete results from the community's efforts until Hydro and OHC have finally completed their transaction.

Hydro block houses were slated for demolition for transformer and switching station until residents acted.

Amin expelled Asians to hit back at British: refugee

A Ugandan Asian charged Thursday night that General Idi Amin expelled thousand of Asians from his country to retaliate against Britain for terminating economic aid programs.

One of the first Asians to arrive in Canada, he was speaking to an SDS-sponsored meeting at the International Students Centre.

He asked that his name not be made public because of reports of retaliation against families of those who have criticised Amin after leaving the country.

The speaker suggested that Amin overthrew the government of Milton Obote because he was about to be caught misappropriating military funds. After the coup, Amin promised to step down within six months and call democratic elections, the Asian said, but this has not happened.

Great Britain, an Ugandan ally during the coup, later became an enemy in Amin's eyes, after it cut off aid.

According to the Asian Amin allied himself with Libya, which helped persuade him to expel Asians with British citizenship. Later he extended this policy to all but about 7,000 Asians who had "verified" Ugandan citizenship papers.

At present 15,000 Ugandans do not have citizenship papers. These people have been threatened with detention in camps if they do not depart for another country.

The Ugandan Asian said that the Asians with citizenship papers may not want to remain in Uganda under the present austere conditions.

He accused Amin of being both a racist and a profiteer. He questioned Amin's sanity, stating that Amin based his political decisions on dreams.

The Asian believed that Amin fabricated the earlier Tanzanian evasion as a pretext to force Ugandan Asians to leave the country. Under the alleged threat of invasion, Amin set up road blocks at which fleeing Ugandan Asians were "robbed" of their possessions.

The speaker suggested that Ugandan Asians faced more danger leaving the country than staying in it.

He also stated that countries such as Britain, France, Japan and Canada have voiced concern about Amin's actions, because they represent a threat to the countries' economic holdings within Uganda. He pointed out that Falconbridge Nickel Mines of Canada has significant investments in Ugandan mines.

A Ugandan African in the audience said Asians in Uganda were in an dominant economic position.

The Asian countered that he knew of many jobs available to Africans that were not filled. Some high-level jobs were in fact already held by Africans, he asserted.

The speaker suggested that Uganda will be hurt economically in the future because of Amin's actions. However an African said he believed that native Ugandans could take up the challenge.

Asked how long animosity has existed between Asians and Africans in Uganda, the Asian replied that tense relations always existed between the two groups.

A West Indian black told the speaker that the Asian Indians in the Indies enjoyed much economic power, which they misused by discriminating against blacks.

The Asian Ugandan retorted that this was not the case in his country.

A member of the Canadian Party of Labour blamed the present condition on three main factors:

Asian control of business which lead to exploitation; Ugandan economic problems, and imperialism, mainly British, Israeli, Libyan and Soviet.

'Sick to death of King Pierre'

NDP lashes out at Liberal abortion laws

By JOHN CAMPBELL

Eleanor Pelrine, NDP federal candidate in Eglinton riding, lashed out at the Trudeau government's abortion policies at a meeting Saturday held by the Women's Coalition to Repeal Abortion Laws.

Stating that she was "sick to death of King Pierre and his henchmen", she called the "immediate repeal of abortion laws long overdue".

The meeting was called in order to elicit direct responses from Metro area federal candidates on the abortion question as part of a larger program to "inject" this issue into the present election campaign.

Of the seventy-one candidates invited, only seven showed up. All of these were strongly in favour of removing the clauses on abortion from the Criminal Code and implementing other proposals — derived from the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

The four NDP candidates who arrived, Pelrine, Mary Boyce (St. Paul's), Mike Copeland (York Centre) and Bob Beardsley (Spadina), restated the party position on women's issues, which includes the establishment of industrial day care centres.

Aline Gregory of the Women for Political Action Party, running in Rosedale, spoke against workplace day care because it would make female workers too dependent on their employers.

Besides the candidates, a panel of experts addressed the audience, which was largely sympathetic to repeal of the abortion laws. A few members of the Students for Life Movement, who oppose abortion, participated briefly in the discussion, but then departed to demonstrate outside the building.

Panelist Stan Gershim, director of the Abortion Counselling Association, criticized those who opposed abortion law repeal for not being equally concerned with other issues such as the war in Vietnam, or what he termed the possible impending "environmental catastrophe".

Dr. Esther Greenglass of York University, who is studying women who have had abortions, declared "any law which discriminates against women should be changed". She pointed out that present laws permit abortions only under certain circumstances and only if a committee of three professionals agrees.

This, Greenglass asserted, was a form of "treating women as children", implying that women are incapable of making moral and practical judgments on abortion.

Dispute resolved by SAC, speeding readers to get course

By ANNE SCHULTZ

A dispute which threatened to prevent the offering of a campus speed reading course seems to have been resolved satisfactorily.

The original difficulty arose when a London company, Communications Services, unilaterally decided to hold three of the scheduled five classes at seven o'clock on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, SAC, which was handling arrangements for the courses, discovered the university had no projection facilities available.

The company also instructed course applicants to make cheques payable to SAC without first getting SAC's permission. The council had merely agreed to collect cheques, not handle the bookkeeping and banking for Communications Services.

According to SAC services commissioner Bill Steadman, SAC is no longer doing the bookkeeping for the profit-making course. Two of the classes have been dropped because of insufficient enrolment, he said, while screens and projectors have been obtained for the remaining classes.

Approximately 95 students are enrolled in the course, while another 25 were turned away after Steadman tried for a week to get in touch with promoter Elwood Lemon to iron out the difficulties.

It is possible that the course may be offered again in the new year if enough interest is shown, Steadman says.

LEGAL AID

On the second floor of 44 St. George St. is located the Campus Legal Aid Centre. The centre, run by funds obtained from the S.A.C., provides a wide range of legal counsel and advice. One of the main areas of concern is the landlord-tenant act, since many legal difficulties emanate from the abuse of this piece of legislation. The centre is run by student volunteers from the Faculty of Law, whose time and dedication allow the programme to continue to operate. Never feel that any difficulty is too minor to handle. In fact, much of their work is processing legal forms for various purposes. In an effort to provide added service this year, a lawyer is being commissioned to aid the centre for a few hours per week. Such an effort will provide added expertise to the facilities already available.

If ever you need legal help, the Campus Legal Aid Centre is here to help you. Any student with a legal problem is encouraged to make full use of this SAC sponsored service. It is on the second floor of 44 St. George St. The Phone number is 928-6447.

Soccer Blues stop McMaster 1-0

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues returned to Varsity Stadium Saturday after a four game road trip and proved once more to be unhostable hosts by defeating the league-leading McMaster Marauders 1-0.

The contest was the most exciting of the season, pitting the irresistible force (the Marauders - 40 goals scored) against the immovable object (the Blues - only 3 goals conceded). The old conundrum was resolved in favour of the immovable object.

The Blues, smarting from their poor midweek performance at Brock, pressed immediately, well aware of the need not to allow the potent Marauder offence an opportunity to organize.

Bruno Bruni hit a free kick to Mario DaRosa, who shot narrowly wide, tangible indication of the vitality in the Blues' own forward line. Giuseppe D'Aantoni was flying down the left wing and Hillier executed strategic crossfield runs, opening up gaps in the McMaster defence.

Early in the game, Oldfield found himself in one such gap, but elected to pass when a shot may have been more useful. For all the pressure and enterprising play, a quick goal was not forthcoming against the quick-tackling McMaster side.

The Marauders inevitably broke free of their early chains to attack. But these initial trials on the Blues' defence gave indication that the league's leading scorer, Brian Pirie, was to have a frustrating day against the close marking of Blues' captain Tim Burns.

Indeed, all members of the Toronto rearguard gave their opposite numbers little time or space in which to operate effectively. Only on one occasion, when the ball skimmed (harmlessly, it turned out) off the head of Ed Carter, was there any menace to the home team in the opening passages. Bob Cazzola was on hand to clear.

At the twenty minute mark a canny through ball from Ian Harris put DaRosa in the clear, but Marauders' goalkeeper intelligently left his goal to narrow the angle and severely limit the forward's chances. Nonetheless he was happy to concede a corner from the solid shot. Toronto was now beginning to carry the play.

After 37 minutes a Marauder defender fouled Cobby 25 yards from goal. Bruni struck a low free kick towards the right goal post which proved to be too much for the keeper to handle, and Harris was on hand to slip home the rebound. For the third time in as many games Bruni and Harris had converted a free kick into a goal in identical fashion.

The McMaster squad, known for its "never-say-die" attitude and ability, reacted to the setback by launching a series of offensive raids.

But, with Herb Dubsky playing a very effective spoiling role, the Toronto team survived the period of assault with their lead intact.

The second half started similar to the first, with Blues attacking. A right wing cross from DaRosa skidded near the Marauder goal, but neither Hillier nor Harris could get a foot to the ball. Under pressure, Mac's Salsiccioli gave up the ball to D'Aantoni, but his shot was slightly high.

The Marauders, desperate for a goal, pushed forward but found the home defence in an uncompromising mood. If they tried attacking down the wings, the forwards found Cazzola and Carter ready to deal with them in a merciless, but clean manner. If they ventured down the middle neither centre striker could escape the attentions of Dubsky and Burns. With Bruni working very hard to harass and disrupt the McMaster midfield, the only shots Toronto keeper Jack Brand had to deal with were speculative and lacked conviction. Despite the pressure, the visitors were unable to create any real chances.

However all the play was not in one direction by any means. Harris, skillfully playing a deep-lying role on the right wing was the spingboard from which Blues set up several sharp counter-attacks. On one break a pass to Hillier was relayed to Vito Polera who ran 20 yards before hitting a powerful drive past the near post. With DaRosa able to hold the ball against one or two defenders, the Blues were potentially dangerous at all times.

The last part of the game settled into this general patterns with the Blues' defence absorbing every threat, despite frantic changes of position and personnel by the opposition. At the final whistle a very frustrated McMaster team left Toronto with no goals to add to their fine record.

The win puts the Blues in a powerful position to retain their Western Division championship. Even though it has defeated its closest rival, the team must still be careful not to take opponents lightly in the remaining four games.

Polo Blues win 2 games

Waterpolo Blues downed York 14-9 and Ottawa 18-9 at Queen's Saturday. Blues' Chris McNaught was the outstanding Toronto player.

Rugby Blues beat Trent; even league record

The Rugby Blues team evened its league record at 3-3 with a 28-4 win over Trent in Peterborough Saturday.

In a demonstration of strength and balance, the Blues scored six tries, three each by the backs and the forwards.

While the team's play was at times brilliant, the consistently well-disciplined good play which earned last week's win over Queen's was not in evidence.

However, potentially costly mistakes and unnecessary penalties were too much in evidence.

Toronto quickly opened the scoring. Strong rucking by the Blues' forwards won the ball near the Trent goal. The ball then moved quickly out the back line to the wing, and Richard Brooks powered his way in for the first try.

Shortly after, James MacDonald tattered up a loose ball after a tackle near the Trent goal-line and dove in for the second score. A period of relatively scrappy play followed.

Toronto was the first to recover its poise. Blues' Davis Amborski emerged from a maul inside the Trent 25 yard line with the ball in his arms and green-shirted followers trailing behind. He lunged across the line to give the Blues a 12-0 halftime lead.

As the second half began, Amborski scored again — this time from a short penalty in the shadow of the Trent goal posts. Rick Hodder converted.

The Blues forwards has solidly established themselves in the first half, taking vigorous command of scrums, rucks and mauls.

In the second half the backs came into their own as they returned to the aggressive straight-ahead running which has been the hallmark of their past successes.

Rick Hodder scored a diving try on a strong run on the blind side, and Rodger Wright concluded the Toronto scoring after outrunning Trent defenders for a loose ball in the in-goal area. Hodder again converted. Trent then managed a late try to make a final score of 28-4.

The Blues second team brought their league record to 4-2 by defeating their Trent counterparts 17-6. In the first half, standoff Scott McClure shed several tacklers to open the scoring. Duncan Taylor converted.

Trent coach Paul Wilson a former U of T athlete of the year, kicked a penalty goal to make the halftime score 6-3.

The play moved quickly from end to end for the majority of the second half, and the game's outcome was uncertain until nearly full time. However, a try by Michael Eldred and a penalty goal by Taylor put the game out of Trent's reach. Wilson kicked a second penalty goal for Toronto, and a final Toronto try by Boh Gourlay frosted the cake.

Five U of T players were selected to play with the two Combined Universities all-star teams for games played in Varsity Stadium last Wednesday night against Ontario all-star teams.

U of T centres Rick Hodder and Rodger Wright played with the Universities' A Team against Ontario Select. The match produced some superb rugby as the defending inter-provincial champion Ontario team managed a 26-0 win over the universities.

The margin was wide, but the collegians acquitted themselves well against a larger and more experienced side. Former U of T captain Geoff Ellwand was the obvious outstanding player among the Ontario Select forwards.

The Universities' B Team defeated the Ontario Under 23 Select Team 9-3. Toronto players were John Barclay at second row, John Drummond at scrum-half and Ian Lindsay at stand-off.

The game was marked by flashes of brilliant individual effort, but also by considerable scrappy play and imprecise kicking. Blues' wing forward Neil Sorbie, playing with the Under 23's was a standout with the Ontario team.

The Blues next game is Wednesday night at 7.30 in Varsity Stadium against a team of seasoned U of T Old Boys.

Blues win; face Ottawa next

By PAUL CARSON

KINGSTON — The football Blues gained a berth in the OUAA Eastern Section playoffs with a 27-13 victory Saturday over Queen's Golden Gaels.

Varsity will meet University of Ottawa Gee-Gees this Saturday since Ottawa clinched first place by outlasting Carleton 31-14. Ottawa gains home field advantage by virtue of its two victories over Varsity during the regular schedule.

Blues ended four years of frustration at Richardson Memorial Stadium with a solid display of basic football and innovative coaching that ruined homecoming for about 9,000 shivering Queen's fans, many of whom departed before the final gun.

Varsity coach Ron Murphy elected to take the wind in the first quarter and Blues' revised game plan immediately produced results. The coaching staff had decided to discard the explosive shotgun formation that produced the 46-18 result three weeks ago in favor of a more conventional T-alignment, but with the added wrinkle of two men in motion on almost every play.

"The new formations gave us almost the same passing options as the shotgun plus the ability to have two running backs when we wanted to stay on the ground," Murphy explained in the Varsity dressing room after the game.

"We assumed that Queen's would have carefully prepared a defence for the shotgun so we gambled on using a formation they haven't seen. As it happened, they tried to pick up the motion and left themselves vulnerable to our running attack."

In fact, Gaels did stick with five deep backs to counter Blues passing, so Varsity went to the ground game, rushing 40 times for 182 yards and 18 first downs. Libert Castillo provided 118 yards on 20 carries and Cor Doret added 53 more from 12 rushes.

Blues also developed a new defence, essentially five linemen and two linebackers to stop Queens powerful running attack plus another linebacker teaming with a halfback to stop Gaels' flanker Stu Lang.

Both units played to almost textbook perfection as the offence scored the first two times it had the ball and the defence held Queens to but two field goals for just over 57 minutes. When Gaels finally got a touchdown late in the fourth quarter, the game was effectively already over.

Queen's refused to pass against the brisk wind in the opening quarter and Blues tenacious defence forced a series of 25 yards punts that gave the offence excellent field position.

Varsity's offensive line was quick to capitalize on the opportunities as center Rein Enno, guards Charlie Wright and Bruce Parrack, and tackles Jake Lipsett and Mike Sokovnin opened wide holes for Castillo and Doret.

Doret capped the 49 yard drive by breaking a tackle on the one and driving into the end zone with a courageous second effort.

Four minutes later Blues were back and quarterback Wayne Dunkley used a play action fake to spring tight end Esteban Andryjowicz for an easy 14 yard touchdown catch. A fumbled snap ruined the convert but after eight minutes Blues led 13-0 and seemed to be turning the game into a rout.

However, on the next Varsity series rookie flanker Mark Ackley dropped an apparent touchdown pass and Queen's cornerback Joey Pal intercepted Dunkley on the next play. Suddenly Queen's had momentum and excellent field position and it seemed like an agonizing replay of last year's game when Blues squandered a 16-point lead.

Gaels rattled off three consecutive first downs but Blues defensive line of ends Jim Nicoletti and Walt Dudar plus veteran tackles Jim Blainey and Jon Dellandrea stopped the drive at the Varsity 14. Queen's had to settle for a Doug Cozac field goal but immediately threatened again when Castillo fumbled on the next play as the quarter ended.

With the wind now at his back, Gaels quarterback Tom Taylor went to the air but linebackers Hartley Stern, Bob Bloxham, Alex Markobrada and Guido Iantorno stopped a key screen pass and Queen's had to again settle for a Cozac field goal.

Alex Morris intercepted Dunkley on the next series to set up Gaels at the Varsity 22 but halfback Doug Ball immediately cancelled that turnover, picking off Taylor's errant pass. Peter McNabb stopped Queen's next drive with an interception and runback to the Varsity 35: an exchange of punts left Blues on their own 10 yard line but the defence had limited Queen's to only three points during the first twelve minutes of the quarter.

Dunkley reversed the pattern of the entire quarter on the next play, sending Castillo out of the backfield and straight up the middle of the field on a pattern Varsity had not used previously in any game situation. Queen's defenders were still looking for the run as Dunkley hit Castillo with a perfect pass and the fullback rambled 84 yards to the Gaels 16 — the longest pass and run play in the OUAA this year.

Castillo, appropriately, finished the drive with a short touchdown run over left tackle at 13:54 and Varsity led 19-6.

Taylor went to the air in a desperate attempt to score before halftime but an illegal motion penalty stalled the drive. Cozac's field goal attempt hit the left goal post and bounced away.

At halftime Blues had that 19-6 lead and a 259-173 advantage in total offence. However,

The Varsity — Andrew Siklus

Blues' Billinghamurst (18) and Bloxham (50) bring down Gaels' Hadden (27).

Iantorno was lost for the season with torn knee ligaments suffered late in the second quarter.

Gaels decided to give Blues the wind to open the third quarter, gambling that their defence could hold Varsity in check until the final period when Queen's would have the advantage. Blues unfortunately co-operated as Dunkley served up interceptions to Darryl Penner, Morris and Cozac on Blues first three series. However, with rookie Chris Sammut replacing Iantorno, the defence stopped Queen's attack cold as Bob Billinghamurst recovered a fumble and McNabb made his second interception.

Offensively, all Varsity could produce was Mike Sokovnin's 56-yard single and Gaels entered the fourth quarter with the wind and trailing only 20-6. At that time, two touchdowns did not seem like a very comfortable lead.

However, unlike his Queen's counterpart, Dunkley was willing to pass against the stiff wind and immediately connected with Andryjowicz for 60 yards down to the Gaels' five-yard line. Dunkley snuck over two plays later Taylor and Gaels backup quarterback Raold Serebrin tried to pass Queen's back into contention, but McNabb's third interception and an unsuccessful third down gamble maintained Varsity's margin. Halfback Geoff Hamlin finally ploughed over Blues' goal line at 12:08 but it was far too little and much too late.

Castillo and Doret provided key yardage after the short kickoff and Blues successfully ran out the clock amid ecstatic cheering from a group of about 150 U of T students and former Varsity players.

Ironically, Queen's enjoyed a slight edge in the final statistics, rushing for 195 yards to Blues 182; Taylor and Serebrin completed 15 of 29 passes for 193 yards while Dunkley was 10 of 23 for 212. Andryjowicz led all receivers with 97 yards from five catches, while Lang evaded his double coverage for five receptions and 64 yards.

Each team gained 24 first downs and both punters averaged a respectable 32 yards despite the wind.

Toronto captures OUAA track championship

The University of Toronto won the OUAA track and field championship Saturday in Windsor. It is the first time since 1967 that a U of T team has won the Tait McKenzie Trophy.

Toronto's Bruce Simpson won the Hee Phillips Trophy as the meet's most outstanding individual. Simpson set a new OUAA pole vault record of 17'2.25". The last person to win the trophy for Toronto was Bruce Kidd in 1962.

Members of the Toronto team won six first, four second, and seven third place finishes in scoring 160.5 points. Western was second with 126, and Queen's third with 88.

Toronto coach Andy Higgins said yesterday that "the enthusiasm of the team was tremendous". He said that the all-day rain in Windsor affected the meet, "especially the throwing events". "People were sweeping water off the throwing area", he added.

Higgins said that "with all the conditions considered it was unbelievable that we did so well". He credited mainly the team's spirit in overcoming the adverse conditions to capture Toronto's first championship in six years. Waterloo has won the championship for the past four years. (Windsor did not win the championship last year, as reported here on October 16.)

finished fourth with 70 points, York fifth (57), McMaster sixth (39.5), Windsor seventh (20), Laurentian eighth (13) and Brock ninth (10).

The following are the results of the first, second, and third place finishers in each event.

Fired worker says union work cause

By DOROTHY WIGMORE

Sigmund Samuel Library worker Dave Owen has charged his recent dismissal as a probationary worker was for union activities, and has filed a grievance to that effect.

The Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) local 1230 is holding a special meeting today at 5:15 in the Hart House south sitting room to discuss his dismissal.

Owen was given a letter of discharge signed by Deputy Librarian (Personnel) Michael McCahill about 5 pm last Wednesday. Effective that day. He received five days pay in lieu of notice, local 1230 president Audrie Nichols says. Ordinarily, probationary workers receive two weeks notice.

"I was fired unjustly," Owen told The Varsity, adding he thinks his union involvement was the real reason for his dismissal.

The CUPE local executive met Monday to discuss the dismissal and decided to hold a meeting on the issue. They also filed a grievance with the U of T manager of management-labour relations, John Parker, on Owen's behalf yesterday. In the grievance, Owen contends the firing was in violation of article 6.01 of the present collective agreement.

That article says the employer "shall not discriminate against an employee because of membership or activity in the union or the exercise of his lawful rights."

Owen was chosen unofficial steward for the catalogue maintenance library workers at the union elections the night before his dismissal.

Owen began working in the library August 31 as a filer, grossing $388 a month. Like all probationary workers, he had to complete a 90-working-day trial period before he could be hired.

Filers catalogue cards at a rate of 95 an hour until 1 pm each day, a level set by management. Revisors check filers' work and judgments are made from the checks.

There have been "lots of intimidation, lots of tests," Owen said. During the first week of October, filers were checked every day for the whole day. Revisors said this was the largest amount of testing ever done at one time, Owen added.

On October 6, the end of the testing week, Owen said his supervisor, Carol Rappeport, told him his work was satisfactory and his probationary period would continue.

Rappeport had told Owen September 28 his work would have to improve or his job was "in jeopardy".

"I contested that," Owen added, "I just argued the point with her."

The evening before he attended a union meeting. He thought Rappeport's reprimand the morning following was more than coincidence.

Owen has talked to supervisors several times about problems facing filers but never thought his job was in jeopardy.

Tom Bribiesco, newly-elected chief steward of local 1230, told The Varsity he has not encountered anyone in Owen's department who thinks he was not unjustly fired.

"All his colleagues feel the firing was unjust. And they feel that although it is hard to prove, Dave was fired because he didn't buckle under," he said.

Owen approached the head of technical services, Donald Smith, Thursday. Smith told him the case was out of his hands, Owen said, but "he reassured me that I wasn't fired because of union activities." He was told to see the deputy librarian in charge of personnel, McCahill.

Owen says McCahill virtually said "as a probationary employee, you are a non-person in the context of the union. You have no rights." He added that the deputy librarian said he would inform Owen of the reasons for his dismissal by the following Monday.

Last Friday, McCahill told Owen the decision would remain the same and "to tell the story would require a book," Owen said.

McCahill had a "big file on me," he added. This was pulled out and referred to, Owen said, as the librarian told him that "during the second week of October, I was argumentative with a revisor and questioned her on the filing." He denied that, and was not told the revisor's name.

"The administration feels they can get away with this kind of stuff because the union up to now has followed all the legal and necessary procedures for these situations," Bribiesco said, referring to recent layoffs in the library and Owen's case.

Neither he or Owen were optimistic about reaching a satisfactory agreement.

Owen's first-line supervisor Rappeport was reluctant to comment.

"He was a probationary worker and they are required to prove themselves on the job during that time," was all she would say. "It's an internal matter," she added.

Sigmund Samuel Library worker Dave Owen was fired the day after he became a union steward.

Hogan 'kidnapped' before appeal

By DEE KNIGHT

A former member of the Black Panther Party who was fighting deportation was "kidnapped" Monday by immigration officials and turned over to the FBI, according to his lawyer, Charles Roach. Ed Hogan, whose militant organizing activities in Cleveland ended when he was convicted by an all-white jury, was "spirited away" before his lawyer was officially notified of the deportation decision, Roach said.

Hogan was removed from the Toronto (formerly Don) Jail less than two hours after being informed of the deportation order, in what Roach described as an illegal move. There is by law a 15 day appeal period, and immigration department policy has been stated as allowing at least 24 hours before a deportation order is executed.

Leaders of Toronto's 70,000-strong black community immediately protested. Civil liberties lawyers called for an investigation, and the resignation of the responsible government officials, including Manpower and Immigration Minister Bryce Mackasey.

Hogan's deportation hearing ended Thursday with a "reserved judgment" by the Immigration Appeal Board panel. The decision to deport was made later the same day, and according to Immigration Department officials, communicated by mail at the same time to all parties.

But both Hogan and his lawyer Roach were contacted by an enforcement officer of the immigration department before they were officially notified by the board of its decision. The enforcement officer came to Roach's office at 10:10 am Monday with an order saying that "arrangements will be made as soon as practicable" for Hogan's deportation.

Hogan was visited by immigration officials with the same message at 9:30 Monday. By the time his lawyer's office received mailed notification two hours later, "he was already on his way" to Buffalo, Roach said.

A spokesman for the immigration Appeal Board said that all parties to an appeal are supposed to receive notification of a board decision "at about the same time". It would be contrary to this procedure to inform the immigration department about its decision before notifying defense counsel, the official indicated. No one is supposed to know the outcome of a hearing until the parties involved have been notified by mail, he said.

The only explanation for the speed of the immigration department's "enforcement" of the decision, was that the government office must have received its mail earlier than Roach did, according to the official.

As soon as he heard that the appeal was dismissed, Roach instructed his clerk to file a new appeal to the federal court. Soon after this, he received a phone call from Hogan who was by then in custody at the FBI offices in Buffalo.

Hogan appeared in a Buffalo court Monday on a charge of taking flight to avoid confinement, with bail set at $100,000.

The case was adjourned to October 30.

Hogan intends to fight his return to the Ohio prison, according to his U.S. lawyer, Samuel Green.

Paul Copeland, Toronto lawyer regarded as an expert in immigration law, has released an official letter signed by former immigration minister Allen MacEachen, stating that department policy is to allow at least 24 hours before the execution of any deportation order, after a decision has been communicated officially to a detainee and his counsel.

In Ottawa yesterday, Mackasey refused to comment on MacEachen's letter. However, he said in future he would endeavour to see that deportees' lawyers were informed before deportation took place.

"I approve of what was done," he said. The board said to move as fast as possible, he observed.

With the case of a "convicted murderer", he added, "that means as expeditiously as possible."

In future, he said he would endeavour to see that deportees' lawyers would be informed before deportation took place.

Civil liberties lawyers and representatives of Toronto's 70,000-member black community condemned the move by the Immigration Department and the RCMP as shocking, improper and scandalous. They called for an inquiry to determine who was responsible for removing Hogan from Canada before his lawyer could file an appeal.

Alan Borovoy, general counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, said that if Roach's allegations are borne out, minister of manpower and immigration Bryce Mackasey should resign. Borovoy said "In Canada we simply cannot tolerate this kind of action taking place and rendering the proceedings and remedies of our laws a nullity through high-handed departmental actions. The only way to restore the integrity of our legal processes is to get at the responsible parties and insist on their immediate resignation."

This incident occurs at the same time as other summary deportations are being carried out against black people suspected by the Immigration Department of entering the country illegally.

Roach said that there were numerous strong grounds for appeal.

The deportation hearing was improper in the first place, he said, since the aim of the proceeding was to return Hogan to the custody of U.S. authorities — not simply to get him out of Canada. This should be done by extradition, not deportation, the lawyer argued, since in an extradition hearing the defense can challenge the original decision.

Roach accused the Immigration Department of using deportation instead of extradition as a matter of policy against "political undesirables".

Miglin to contest AUCC board

By BRIAN NASIMOK

SAC president Eric Miglin has accepted a nomination to the Board of Directors of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, although SAC has protested the fact that the annual AUCC meeting will not be open to the public.

Several SAC executives are opposed to Miglin's accepting the nomination.

Miglin, along with U of T vice-president Robin Ross, was a member of the committee that chose nominees. Ross seconded Miglin's nomination moved by student representative, Peter Elcombe.

"I have not withdrawn," Miglin said, even though members of his executive have expressed disapproval, due to the amount of time the job may take.

Although Miglin is against the AUCC position on closed meetings, he said he would rather be on the board, instead of a student representative who would support closed sessions.

(The present student members of the board supported the motion for closed meetings when the AUCC decided on the move.)

Miglin said that the SAC executive discussed the matter, "quietly", with most members feeling that Miglin did not have the time to spend on the board of directors.

Communications commissioner Debra Lewis said the executive was concerned only with the amount of time Miglin would spend on the board. "Eric is already heavily committed," she said.

SAC vice-president John Helliwell, agreed with Lewis, concluding that it was a "petty issue". Neither seemed upset that Miglin was a member of his own-nominating committee.

In late September, the SAC executive protested the administration's selection of the undergraduate representative, Paul Cadario, to the AUCC conference without consulting SAC.

If the question of the nomination is brought up at tonight's SAC meeting, Miglin said that if anyone were likely to bring it up, Cadario would be the one.

"He's been stirring up most of the shit," said Miglin, who added he did not understand Cadario's motivations.

Cadario could not be reached last night for comment. Asked if he agreed that the board meetings would take up too much time, Miglin replied that there would only be three or four meetings before his term of office expired.

The vote on the board of directors will be taken at the AUCC conference a week today.

Bell curve may be applied

Geography students may face final exams

By NADIM WAKEAM

Geography department faculty have recommended instituting compulsory exams and evaluating marks according to a Bell curve in all first and second year courses. The recommendations were adopted at a staff meeting and are now being dealt with by the Undergraduate Curriculum Committee, composed of three students and two staff.

The plan will then be sent to the Geography Departmental Council for ratification. The council, composed of 13 staff, five graduate students and five undergraduates, is an advisory body to chairman P.D. Kerr.

The memorandum sent out to the curriculum committee members contains recommendations, based on statistical studies carried out last summer.

Bell curve grading and compulsory first and second year exams were recommended because "three year's records show that (for arts and science students) course-to-course variation in average, grade, and proportions in each grade category have increased over the period."

"Thus," it continues, "it is desirable to have consistency in standards between courses."

Specifically, the recommendations call for a final grade distribution based on the Bell curve. A "general model of reasonable grading practice" would have the majority of marks in the B and C range and a smaller percentage on either side.

Five to 15 per cent of students enrolled in a course will fail if the report is implemented unamended.

The memorandum maintains this would result in "a positive step towards achieving consistency" in standards between courses.

It also recommends that final examinations worth between 40 and 60 per cent be instituted in each 100 and 200 series course.

This will ensure that some assessment can be made "of each student after he has reviewed the material of the whole course" and "in a manner whereby the work of the whole class will be marked systematically, rather than in terms of small groups".

Amendments to the recommendations have been proposed by the students on the Undergraduate Curriculum Committee.

One amendment would allow professors to petition for exam exemptions. Another would make the exams worth a maximum of 50 per cent.

These amendments and the original recommendations will be voted on at the next Geography Departmental Council meeting on Monday.

However, Hans Mikolay, a student member of the curriculum committee, charged that in effect, "the decision has already been made. Several courses have complied to these proposals".

"This happened last month," he said. "It's called a memorandum, but it's already been put into effect."

Trinity and St. Michael's reject proposed constitution of arts union

By JONISEAGER

SMC decision surprised Phil Dack of the Arts and Science union.

Trinity and St. Michael's college student councils last night rejected the constitution of the proposed Arts and Science union.

SMC student union vice-president Tom Hamer said that though the union rejected the constitution, by a large margin, "we support the principle of co-operation across campus". He added that the constitution was too formal, and "they(SMC union members) could see no point in establishing a bureaucracy to coordinate other bureaucracies".

Hamer maintains that a less formal proposal would probably have been better received.

Phil Dack, a former field worker with the Arts and Science union, said, "It certainly wasn't unexpected that St. Mike's would reject it. They have been against the idea for over a month now".

Dack said that St. Mike's fails to see the need for structural reforms within the university, and the need of structures through which students can have a voice in university functions.

He said that one of the possible reasons for rejection was because "they see such criticism as from the left, not the right."

Trinity's student council, the Board of Stewards, also rejected the draft constitution, by a 14 to 4 margin.

Trinity Head of College Geoff Seaborn said that the consensus on the board was that the union was going to be another body that wasn't needed and would get in the way of "streamlining". He explained that there are too many bodies in the faculty.

He also emphasized that this did not indicate a lack of support for course unions, but that "the general feeling" was that the proposed arts and science union wouldn't be effective.

All course and college unions have now voted, excepting the anthropology union. The other four course unions and the student caucus of the General Committee have accepted the proposals, as have the other college student unions. SAC will be asked to formally approve the union tonight.

Hamer admitted that there was a need for coordination of information, but there was no need for a huge bureaucracy to handle it.

"We've managed this far without one; our council has, anyway", we don't feel that the arts and science students are a homogenous enough body to fully benefit from such an organization.

"There is such a lot of interplay between faculties that there is not as much sense of unity among arts and science students as in professional faculties."

Rejects opposition from U of T, UWO, and Queen's

OFS calls for province-wide fees demonstrations

WATERLOO (CUP) — Rejecting the advice of its largest university members, the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) last weekend voted to organize province-wide demonstrations against the Ontario government when the provincial legislature opens next month.

The demonstration will protest tuition fee increases and an increase in the loan portion of Ontario student awards.

But student council representatives from the University of Toronto, University of Western Ontario, and Queen's University strongly opposed the idea. However some U of T reps say they will organize a demonstration. OFS officials are attempting to get Western and Queen's to cooperate.

The three schools produced the largest voter turnout in the Oct 10-12 referendum, in which Ontario students voted overwhelmingly to withhold second term fees if the government refuses to reverse its policy.

Delegates to the general OFS meeting scheduled another gathering for Nov. 25 when they will consider action if negotiations with the government have not succeeded.

But in private conversations, most delegates indicated they felt a fees strike was not feasible because of what they consider generally poor turnouts in the referendum. (Turnouts set records on many campuses, but other university and college student councils were disappointed).

Delegates opposing the November demonstration pointed out that the schools most adamant for the idea displayed the poorest voter turnouts.

The action had been endorsed by students at Trent University where the student council opposed the second term fee boycott and instead posed the demonstration as an alternative. Student voters followed the advice, but only about 25 per cent actually voted.

The main demonstration will take place at the Queen's Park legislative buildings in Toronto, with supporting actions in other cities.

Peter Warrian, a former president of the Canadian Union of Students, now a University of Waterloo graduate student, addressed an OFS plenary last Saturday and pointed out that the universities with the least to lose through the tighter provincial regulations (Queen's, U of T, Western) attracted the most opposition to the government.

Meanwhile, the schools with financially poorer students generated less anti-government reaction.

"Oh, what has happened to student militancy," he mourned.

OFS delegates also ordered their executive to investigate the feasibility of establishing a trust fund into which students could pay their second term fees in the event of a strike.

The OFS executive met with Colleges and Universities Minister Jack MacNie Monday night, but the meeting broke up after one hour when MacNie refused to say if the government will support OFS demands. He said any changes in government policy would not occur until the next provincial budget was brought down next spring.

Government officials said they doubted whether the surplus in the student awards budget would be utilized to increase the amount of money dispensed. They asserted that it would probably used to defray the large provincial deficit.

OFS coordinator Craig Heron stated in an interview that steps have been taken to set up a meeting with Ontario premier William Davis.

National Farmers' Union may be certified by PEI government

SASKATOON (CUP) — National Farmers' Union president Roy Atkinson has called on the Prince Edward Island government to pass legislation certifying the NFU as the bargaining agent for PEI potato farmers, following a plebiscite last weekend.

The plebiscite, supervised by the PEI government, asked potato farmers whether they favoured certification of the NFU as their collective bargaining agent. They voted for the NFU 415 to 233.

"PEI potato producers have given the government a clear directive. It now requires passing, at the next session of the legislature, legislation certifying the NFU as bargaining agent for PEI potato producers," Atkinson said.

"The vote has given the NFU a clear mandate to prepare on behalf of producers the necessary administrative arrangements for effective bargaining and marketing of the 1973 potato crop," he added.

The NFU has been attempting to obtain collective bargaining rights for Canadian farmers for several years. No provincial government has yet seen fit to pass legislation that provides the legal structure under which farmers could bargain collectively for a fair price for their produce.

PEI Premier Alex Campbell has indicated that the government will have to study the results of the plebiscite before deciding on any action. Campbell said that less than half of the eligible voters cast their ballots in the plebiscite so the government is in no hurry to act.

PEI farmers, protesting a government "development plan" for the province's agriculture, launched massive tractor demonstrations in August 1971. The government's reply came when NFU president Atkinson was arrested and charged with conspiracy to intimidate.

The charges were dropped several months later.

Hogan kidnap can't be justified

The complete disregard for law and justice revealed by the Immigration Department's virtual kidnapping of Black Panther Ed Hogan Monday shocked many Canadians.

Recent events make it evident that the Canadian government and its agencies have become increasingly complicit in American attempts to reclaim and punish political dissidents.

But, few suspected the government would be so obvious in its service of the American government that it would ignore federal law and secret Hogan away before he could launch an appeal against the appeal board's deportation order or even contact his lawyer.

That decision — that public flaunting of Canadian law — has drawn bitter criticism from an enraged public, not just from radicals, but also from liberals who believe in the "rule of law and order".

We shouldn't have been surprised, though. The law and courts exist to support the status quo — that's the people in power. They're not about to bend over backwards about legal niceties when it comes to doing something politically expedient.

Immigration Minister Bryce Mackasey confirmed the government's position by supporting the Hogan kidnapping. "I approve of what was done," he said yesterday.

Continuing, he referred to Hogan as a "convicted murderer" and said Hogan could get his chance for justice from an American court.

That's exactly what was in dispute. Hogan contended, with good cause, that as a member of the militant Black Panthers he had been convicted not for his supposed crime but for his political activity. And, the very court system which Mackasey cited as the potential source of Hogan's justice was the instrument of punishment in his political trial.

Similarly, a person does not sacrifice his right to justice because he's been convicted of another "crime". Mackasey certainly knows better than to expect to excuse himself and his department with that feeble justification.

Nothing less than a full-scale public enquiry into the Hogan kidnapping is acceptable. Not that government enquiries — usually whitewashes — will prove anything we didn't already know or alter the supportive role the legal system plays.

What it might do is force Canadians to recognize the arrogant indifference immigration officials display toward Canadian law. The petty bureaucrats in this department regularly enforce their own biases, not the spirit of the law. Unnecessary difficulties for immigrants to whom they're unsympathetic and sneaky attempts to get around fair resolution of immigration appeals characterize this department.

As the minister responsible, especially in view of his failure to repudiate Hogan's illegal extradition, Mackasey must be forced to resign. (Let's not forget that Mackasey was the chief culprit in the attempt to get Hungarian professor Istvan Meszaros to give up his fight for landed immigrant status in return for a special one year permit to stay and teach.)

And then, maybe immigration officials will be a little less quick to due course of law in future instances.

Shuns party label, Ryan relies on personality

By PAT REDICAN

MP Perry Ryan sees elections in terms of personalities. To him the election is a battle among the candidates on the riding level and among the leaders on a federal level; policies and parties play a very small role.

Personalities are a very significant factor in the campaign in Spadina riding; this year Ryan's personality politics will be put to the test. Ryan, who has represented the riding as a Liberal since 1962, is running under the Tory banner.

Ryan's reason for changing parties cover a wide range of subjects, but they can all be boiled down to one word: Trudeau.

"I did not like the way he ran the party caucus. Before, under Pearson, you could get up and complain about what you didn't like — that was what the caucus was for. Under Trudeau you weren't allowed to say anything. I felt I was being frozen out."

"I don't like Trudeau's isolationist policies; our relations with Britain and the United States have never been worse than under Trudeau."

"I think Trudeau betrayed us on the recognition of Red China. When he was elected it was on a two China policy (recognition of both Taiwan and the People's Republic of China). When he found out that this wasn't possible, that Mao wouldn't have it, he simply switched over. That would never have happened under Pearson."

It is evident that in Spadina, with its heavy concentration of Chinese voters, recognition of the Republic of China is a major consideration in Ryan's switch. Ryan claims that "a lot of people around here weren't too pleased with that. It seems to me that as the Chinese vote goes, so goes the country" he adds.

While this may not be true, it is certainly an important factor in the riding. Not only is the Chinese vote large, (about 8,000 in 30,000 voters) it has in past been solid; it largely has gone to one candidate. Since 1962 that candidate has been Ryan.

Ryan is on record as saying that Trudeau will "turn this country over to the communists" and that "we are in danger of replacing democracy with maocracy".

One question in the campaign, then, is how much will the China policy affect the Chinese vote? Which ever way the Chinese vote goes, it is unlikely to effect any change in policy, under the Liberals or the Conservatives.

But the real factor in the campaign has to be the man versus the party: which do people vote for?

Ryan has won the seat in four consecutive elections (his first victory was at the expense of Conservative candidate John Bassett, then owner of the Telegram). In 1968, he amassed 58 per cent of the vote. This time, Ryan is confident.

He points out that the riding was held for ten years by a Conservative before he was elected, and, before that, for ten years by a Liberal. "This riding has a history of loyalty to a particular candidate, not a particular party," he says.

Ryan's whole approach to the election can be seen in this light. He discounts all-candidates meetings as being "unproductive; you meet too few people". As the Toronto Citizen put it "He prefers an unchallenged platform for electioneering purposes."

It's also true that Ryan comes across poorly in large gatherings. He tends to be long and disjointed, sometimes confused or confusing on issues and at all-candidates meetings he consistently comes off worse than NDPer Bob Beardsley and Communist Maggie Bizzell.

Ryan campaigns in the old style: he meets people, shakes hands with them, says a few solicitous words, and hands them some literature, or perhaps a "Perry Ryan" pen.

To say this method is effective is an understatement, considering the results in past but it may not be enough to win the election this time.

For one thing there is a large section of Italian and Portuguese immigrants, traditionally Liberal voters, who are unlikely to switch with him to the Tories.

Peter Stollery, the Liberal, has been courting these constituencies, as well as the Chinese, with the same tactics that Ryan himself has used: banquets, parades, and community meetings. And both have spent a large amount of money in signs to keep their names before the public.

Thus, if Stollery and Ryan are deadlocked, the threat becomes Beardsley, who is considered to have a solid core of about 30 per cent of the vote. Beardsley, an effective campaigner, could possibly slip through for a victory.

On policy matters, Ryan is vague. On one hand, for instance, he admits that the "corporate welfare bums" theme of the NDP campaign has "something in it", on the other hand, he speaks vaguely of incentives to bring more U.S. capital into Canada.

The Veracity—David Lloyd

PC nominee Perry Ryan.

No decision reached on fate of libraries

By BOB BETTSON

Controversial recommendations that would amalgamate two college and two departmental libraries in an enlarged Sigmund Samuel undergraduate collection did not come to a vote Monday as the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science bogged down on a relatively undisputed report from its Committee on Standing.

Discussion of the amalgamation of the libraries was limited to 30 minutes as the meeting degenerated into a series of squabbles with a small group of conservative faculty once again crying for the maintenance of the "academic standards" of the faculty.

A presidential advisory committee advocated the amalgamation of the New and University College, and political economy and history libraries. The committee was established at a March 20 Senate meeting which voted to limit stack access to the new Robarts Library to those who can prove "academic need."

This necessitated setting up an enlarged Sigmund Samuel collection as a predominantly undergraduate library. The Robarts Library was planned as a research library, primarily for graduate students and faculty.

Classics Professor R.M.H. Shepherd, Chairman of the Academic Affairs Committee of Governing Council, said the amalgamation would ultimately have to be approved by his committee and subsequently the full Governing Council. However, he added that "we do want to find out what the faculty thinks since the recommendations are of most concern to arts and science."

U.C. principal Archie Hallett immediately moved that the U.C. Laidlaw Library be deleted from the libraries to be amalgamated, claiming that "college libraries are an important part of college life." He said that the Laidlaw Library "is one of the few items that the U.C. college council can get its teeth into."

New College principal Donald Ivey said that it would be more reasonable if only parts of the four collections were moved because it was important that a circulating collection remain, especially in New College.

History chairman Jim Conacher, however said he "regretfully accepted" the recommendations because with the future division of books between the Robarts and Sigmund Samuel libraries "we need a large open stack collection for undergrads."

Shepherd, while stressing that he wanted to remain neutral, said that "it is easy to get emotionally worked up about the issue." He regretted that no consideration had been given to reorganizing the college libraries because he said the declining use is due to their limited collections.

The debate on the report of the all faculty Committee on Standing was marked by the confusion and procedural wrangling that were reminiscent of "the good old days" according to former SAC cultural Affairs Commissioner Seymour Kanowitch.

The General Committee has led a chaotic existence for the past few years, being the main focus for defeated student demands for parity with faculty on decision-making bodies.

After a rambling hourlong debate, a recommendation was passed which deleted the proviso that a student could not enter courses not offered to first year students unless he or she has completed a first year program or has standing in four courses of a first year program with an overall average of 60 per cent.

Conacher charged the change "would lower the standards of the New Program when we should be making standards more stringent."

Student rep Phil Murton however challenged Conacher and the other faculty members to define what they meant by academic standards. No faculty replied.

Canada is complicit with imperialism: Red head

By ZOYA STEVENSON

William Kashtan, national leader of the Communist Party of Canada contended Sunday night that after elections in the United States and Canada, their two newly elected governments would "get down to business without the mandate of the Canadian people."

He added "a good neighbour policy for American imperialism is in essence, the way by which the U.S. gets itself out of the hole of the internal and external crises created by capitalism, and brings the Canadian working class into the hole."

Kashtan was speaking to an audience of 150 at Harbord Collegiate in a meeting attended by Ontario's 15 Communist Party candidates. The goal of running Communists in the election is apparently to "turn politics to the left, at a time when the threat of a turn to the right is formidable," he said.

Kashtan's speech referred to three areas which he said were being ignored in the election: Canadian independence, the right of self-determination for Quebec, and social and economic welfare.

Kashtan said that examples of disadvantages accruing to Canadians as a result of Canada's dependent relation to the U.S. are plant shutdowns and layoffs of workers. He estimated that the protectionist American Hartley-Burke bill may cost Canada 360,000 jobs.

Development of Canadian natural resources is geared to meet the demands of the U.S., he said, as in the case of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline.

Kashtan charged that high and unjustifiable "defence spending, and continued participation in organisations like NATO and NORAD indicates support for American global policy in its "exploitation of the third world and genocide in the Vietnam War."

He said that "unemployment and inflation have become a permanent feature of state monopoly capitalism," stating that "the Liberal's policies have not been able to solve unemployment and inflation, and indeed never were intended to."

"Trudeau," he said, "is attempting to mask the enormity of unemployment in Canada by saying that 5 per cent unemployment equals full employment." He said that if the government really wanted to end unemployment, it could take two simple measures.

One would be the reduction of weekly work hours to 32, maintaining the same rate of pay for 40 hours. The other would be the reduction of the retirement age and increment in pensions.

The Communist leader accused the Conservative Party in using a slogan originally put forward by the C.P., "Put Canada Back to Work." In the hands of the Conservatives, he claimed, "the slogan is calculated to put Canada on its back."

He commended the NDP leader David Lewis for his campaign against "corporate welfare bums," but said that Lewis put the workers and monopoly in the same boat erroneously by saying his party wanted "fairer taxation laws."

Kashtan said that before workers can even withdraw their services they must wait until their contract runs out to do so legally, while big business can raise its prices as it wishes.

He also contended that "the right to strike should be fundamental," and that "any limitations on that right are to the detriment of the working class."

Teacher assails social workers' association as elitist body

By MARK BOHNEN

A Ryerson social work teacher charges that the Ontario Association of professional social workers is an "elitist" organization attempting to establish an elitist college.

Russell Jolliffe and a number of other social work teachers interviewed oppose the Association's attempt to set up a college to regulate the profession. The association wants jobs classified as "semi-autonomous" and better to be restricted to university graduates in social work, "professional social workers".

"There are too many streams in social work to reserve a professional clause to Masters of Bachelors of Social Work, says Jolliffe.

He added that at least three quarters of Ontario Social work is being done by "non-professionals."

Jolliffe dismissed as "bullshit" the contention of the OAPSW that it is important to set up a college of social work to govern the profession.

The constitution of OAPSW said Jolliffe, refuses "to define what social work is. How can you protect a profession that you can't even define?"

Jolliffe admitted that there was some need to apply a standard of competence within the social services, but, he said, "there are charlatans in any field."

He said that if standards are set up, they cannot be established merely on the basis of academic criteria.

The setting of such a standard, he said, should involve "employers and educators, as well as professionals."

Andy Cutcher, also a teacher of social work at Ryerson, felt that social work is "too nebulous and poorly defined a practice" to establish the definite superiority of any one approach to the field.

He added that too many professional organizations have "a hang-up about academic requirements."

It is not a well established fact, he said, that BA's in the social services, without any previous training in social work, have a lower level of competence in the field than social work university graduates.

He felt that the establishment of the proposed college of social work by the OAPSW would probably be a regressive step for the profession.

It could become a kind of "fraternity" of graduate students, he felt, which exerted its influence through agreements with various social agencies.

Cutcher felt that organization of social workers should represent more than one group in the field.

"It is time," he said, "for a reconciliation of old wounds".

Emerrett Nemeth, a teacher of Social Services at Seneca College, and former member of the OAPSW, said that there could be "no uniform educational standard in social work".

"Social work," he said, "is not based on science. It is not like medicine".

He said that while he was sympathetic with the attempt to find some standard of competence in the social agencies, he did not feel that Masters of Social Work are necessarily more competent than workers without degrees.

"I have seen excellent workers without an MSW and very poor workers with one," he said.

He criticized the OAPSW for excluding graduates of the community colleges from their professional association.

"I don't agree that this profession should be a closed shop, like medicine."

Undercutting the basic premise of democracy

By GORD MOORE
reprinted from The Chevron

While it is difficult to generalize about the problems of poverty in Canada, two things remain clear. For one thing, poverty is the leading contradiction of our affluent society. In tolerating widespread poverty and inequality of opportunity, the capitalistic system has shown no effort to live up to the set of democratic ideals placed before society. For another, considering the total volume of resources, we have the means to solve the problem of the poor minority through redistribution of money and readjustment of the process of production.

A valid argument explaining why the problem remains unsolved has been succinctly stated in The Real Poverty Report:

"... the whole structure of elitist control in our country undercuts the basic premise of democracy. All energies are directed toward the maintenance of a political power structure that closes its eyes to the brutalities and irrationalities of an economic system in which the increasingly powerful tools of science and technology are utilized chiefly for private interest. The result is that the needs of society as a whole are ignored. And the needs and demands of the poor are treated with contempt"

Because of the "facts of poverty", we have come to realize that the poor cannot be expected to improve themselves through their own efforts alone. The poor could be assisted in such ways that they, or their children, will gradually find themselves off the relief rolls and on the payrolls being gainfully employed.

But because they have been poor for a long time, many of the poor see no way out of their poverty, no way of fulfilling their needs and longings during the course of their lifetime, especially when they see themselves enveloped in a culture of poverty which seems to have its own reasons for being. Most children of poor families can expect to remain poor; a large percentage of the poor presently receiving aid come from families which also received aid. Considerable sociological and psychological literature indicates that a childhood in poverty may produce a "poverty syndrome", an acceptance of defeat and worthlessness that can lock a child, and eventually his children, into poverty forever.

Moreover, by now, we should understand that to have a large number of poor is not only unnecessary, but endangers our society as well. Poverty breeds a mental and physical disease which endangers the health of the entire community. Poverty breeds slums which not only infect their inhabitants but become in turn breeding places for crime and delinquency. Poverty affects even the ability of children to learn well at school and to develop those skills essential for future progress and a sense of dignity.

Myths about the poor

The myths and stereotypes people have employed in the past indicate that the poor have been largely misunderstood. In general, it was felt that the poor deserved their fate and were only paying a fair price for their sins: laziness, lack of ambition, indifference, wasteful habits of living, idleness, and extravagance.

During most of the nineteenth century and early in the twentieth, men and government insisted poverty was good for the soul, that it had a "purifying and toughening effect on the moral fibre of man". Probably most important of all, poverty of the working classes was viewed as a necessary condition for economic growth. As a result, today's inequality of earnings, and even to a great extent inequality in education and skills, are the result of inequality of power in industry, business, and the economy as a whole. Corporations are sovereign while unions are fragmented. Minorities are systematically excluded from the labour market, or kept at the bottom levels of the work ladder.

Many believed (and some still do) that the poor should be left to "make it the hard way like I did". This primarily assumes that those who don't "make it" are lazy. Yet many of the poor are moonlighters trying to make ends meet; and as a result they rarely have enough time or money or energy to take advantage of education programs which would improve their skills, wages, and understanding of society. Almost two-thirds of poor persons in 1967 were in family units whose major source of income was either wages and salaries or income from self-employment; and approximately one third of low-income family heads worked full-time during the year. Out of all the family heads who are working full-time year round, one in 10 are amidst poverty. These are the working poor.

A myth was born in North America, especially molded in the United States, the myth of the "self-made" man. Although the "rags to riches" myth may have been true to a minor extent, the idea prevailed that those who were poor had simply been unable to survive in the "natural struggle" among men for wealth, power, and position. But, there is no basis for this idea today where there are not enough jobs to go around.

'affluent have the resources to protect themselves'

'Any poverty line is only arbitrary'

Those who receive welfare are, in the main, not people who do not want to work. In the 1960's more than 75 per cent of low-income families had one or more wage earners in the family. Also, the majority of those who receive welfare are outside the work force — the aged, handicapped, widows, and mothers who are single heads of families.

These myths are usually combined with the "working and saving" ethic that tends to persist today. Such an ethic is increasingly irrelevant since much of our saving is forcibly generated through government and corporative policies such as unemployment insurance, Canada Pension Plan and company pensions, and old-age security. Furthermore, machinery and technology have practically eliminated the dollar value of physical labour. In the end, the poor are not likely to have anything to save, nor any real desire to save it.

The free enterprise-capitalistic system that has been accepted does not provide for equal opportunity among the poor. Instead, Canadian power politics and western society, create, sustain, and aggravate the causes of poverty through inequalities built into the system over the years. Particularly in the area of income and taxation, the poor experience an inequality of the tax burden. The poor in Canada (those with incomes, before government transfer payments or taxes, of $2000 or less) pay, on the average, an overwhelming 57 per cent of their income in taxation.

People with incomes over $10,000 per year pay only about 38 per cent of their incomes in taxes. The total tax system is regressive in that it taxes lower incomes more than higher ones up to the level of the average living standard. Above that level, the total tax system becomes slightly progressive, at least for the lower brackets of the affluent. The poor are taxed considerably beyond their ability to pay. There are no adjustments, and only token exemptions, for family size, although the number of people dependent on an individual income greatly determines just how far that income will go.

Today, it is generally believed that a percentage of the nation is poor because of a combination of social and economic circumstances. Yet, discriminatory government and corporative policies have effectively limited jobs and educational opportunities that should be open to them. Behind the social concessions made to the poor, one will find a delicate balance between giving enough to take the steam out of social unrest and leaving the distribution of power undisturbed. It is little wonder, therefore, that the poor cannot break out of their predicament.

Invisibility of the poor

The main reason the poor are out of mind is that they are not seen. They inhabit the housing of the central core or the rural backwaters and are increasingly isolated from contact with anybody else. The affluent majority live in the suburbs and send their children to suburban schools. Living out in the suburbs, it is easy to assume that ours is indeed an affluent society. Nor do they want to think about the poor, whom, they say, do not have the will to succeed.

A good number of the poor, being 65 years of age or better, are immobile. The aged members are often sick and cannot move, staying close to a house in a neighbourhood that has completely changed from the old days.

The poor are also ignored by the political process since they lack resources and economic power. Furthermore, they are fragmented across the country, most not belonging to unions, political parties, or fraternal organizations, and therefore lack a legislative program and a common voice. Politicians feel they can safely ignore the poor for the immediate future; and when the poor begin to complain, urban renewal and slum clearance can be restored to for relief, although this effort tends to squeeze more people into existing slums.

may not necessarily look poor. They may not be wearing rags, and may even have a radio or television. Still, the poor are subject to constant thievery, major or minor, that is inevitable in a society controlled by corporations: misleading advertising, ravenous finance practices, exploitative prices, and shoddy manufacture. The affluent have the resources to protect themselves against this kind of swindling and tend to see consumerism as a game between customer and producer.

Entire business entities are set up specifically to exploit the difference in purchasing power between the poor and the affluent. Corporations are essentially free to charge the prices they care in the market, severely victimizing the poor. Consumption, unfortunately, is considered an index of respectability and personal worth in North America, and, for the poor, the only route to consumption is through credit. The poor are exploited by finance companies and revolving retail loan plans. The prices they finally pay for goods, credit included, are astronomical. The reason the poor mortgage their future for a piece of satisfaction is because their future promises nothing worse.

But the core of their problem, and the core of the nation's problem, is the illusion that consumption is good in itself. Advertising, in its creation of spurious need, is the source of that illusion. Since the power of advertising is the power of the corporation, the solution lies in catching the robbers.

Counting the poor and measuring poverty

The poor do not have an adequate enough income to allow them to participate fully and equally in society. Equally important reasons for the existence of poverty lie in lack of access to opportunities (employment and social), lack of education, and most importantly lack of control over the process of production. As a consequence of these inadequacies the poor are not allowed the stature to develop as well-informed, interested, creative and independent citizens.

Although the idea of poverty does not yield itself to any commonsense definition, it is highly important in affecting the design of programs used to eliminate it. The most widely used and publicized procedure for measuring the extent of poverty is to establish poverty income levels known as "poverty lines". So far, poverty lines have made a passing bow to the idea of relativity, leaving out an escalator that would keep the poverty line in step with the standard of living.

If a poverty line is to be of relevance, it must be drawn relative to the general standard of living. Yet the Economic Council of Canada (ECC), in an attempt to establish a cut-off point at which poverty ends and affluence begins, has produced a poverty line based on a notion of subsistence. Their estimate was based on the assumption that any family which has to spend 70 per cent of its income on the basics of food, shelter, and clothing is trapped in an almost permanent state of poverty. Application of this criterion suggested that government minimum average expenditures for non-farm families would be as follows:

Single person	$1,500
Family of two	$2,500
Family of three	$3,000
Family of four	$3,500
Family of five or more	$4,000

Incomes below these levels, it has been thought, would enable classifying families as being poor. On this basis, using 1961 Dominion Bureau of Statistics census returns, the number of poor was set at 4.7 million people in 1968, roughly 20 per cent of the total population. Alternatively, if a level of 60 per cent expenditure on basics is used, we find 6.6 million living in impoverished circumstances. An increase of little less than $10 weekly cannot possibly free an individual or a family from poverty.

Furthermore, John Porter proved in 1961 that middle-class life style didn't really begin for the individual until he received $8000 per year. From income data, he calculated that at that time only four per cent of all Canadians received that amount in annual income. In 1970, Porter's middle-class income line would amount to almost 18,000 dollars per year.

Also, the Canadian Labour Congress showed in November 1969 that because of inflation, an urban family of four required a minimum of $11,000 per year to make ends meet; the average yearly income in manufacturing during the first half of 1969 was $5,723.

Any poverty line drawn across society, therefore, should be recognized as arbitrary. Families living just above the poverty line face the same realities as those at the line. There may be special circumstances, such as large families, unusual illness, or the need to care for aged parents, which may contribute to their poverty. Much also depends on what a given amount of money will buy at any given time. The 4.7 million estimate by the ECC, therefore, must be considered a highly conservative one.

Nevertheless, the ECC concept of poverty lines is used by established media and semi-officially by the government. This is a dangerous consequence because it creates the illusion that as incomes alone rise, poverty will disappear on its own. But the same proportion of the population remains in the same state of relative deprivation as long as the distribution of money does not change. And, as the total population grows, so will the number of poor.

A relative poverty line, drawn at one-half the average standard of living of Canadians, is somewhat more realistic than the ECC concept. Under this notion, which emphasizes relative deprivation, people are living in poverty if their income provides them with a standard of living that is 50 per cent lower than the average standard of living of society. This poverty line, likewise delineating a stop-gap measure in fighting poverty, indicates that a family of four receiving an income of $4,800 would be below the accepted standard of poverty.

Despite the fact that we really cannot form a definite estimate of the extent of poverty, there can be no doubt that substantial poverty exists in Canada. Whether poverty affects 15 or 20 per cent of the population is less relevant than the fact that radical policies have not been undertaken to effectively combat the causes and inequalities.

The elderly poor

The nature of work in an urban-industrial system is radically different from autonomous and irregular work in such occupations as agriculture. Capitalistic enterprises, employing the majority of urban workers, require functionally independent, increasingly skilled, and technologically regulated labour. Corporative thinking has it that to reap profits from rapid technological progress, the worker must be highly mobile — geographically as well as occupationally. In addition, a young age means that investments in job training can be fully repaid.

The implications are clear. The elderly necessarily come to bear the brunt of technological change in an urban setting. In our society, the position of the aged tends to worsen. The long-run decline in death rates, signifying greater longevity, coupled with the inability of older persons to compete for jobs, and the steady lowering of the age of retirement, expands the unproductive period of their lives. The need for mobility by the young makes living with their children a highly unlikely alternative to the elderly. The divided family is a universally observed urban-industrial phenomenon.

Thus, the elderly are alone. An older person has a chance for a fruitful existence if he is married and living with his spouse, but many of those 65 years of age have no spouse, and widowhood increases with age at the rate of 20 per cent with each decade after 65. An older person has a chance if he is still working, but most of the aged do not work. Today, only a third of persons 65 years of age or older are in the work force, as compared with two-thirds at the turn of the century. Escape from poverty is possible if there is no loss of income, but data show a drop of as much as 50 per cent in income after retirement. Most of the aged also are prone to a high incidence of illness, thus facing the high expenses of drugs and medical care. The chance of a man having a favourable rating on all four of the above counts is seven in 100; for a woman over 65, one in 100.

In the absence of adequate savings and public transfer payments then, this group becomes a major component of the urban poor. Also, the market places of an urban economy cater to those with resources. Housing units are built for the young who can generate effective demands. The elderly poor must adjust to the sub-marginal opportunities of slums or use their scarce resources to secure accommodation more spacious and more expensive than they require.

It is sometimes urged that older persons do not need as much as younger ones because the aged spend less for clothing, housing, and food. But, the aged spend less only because they have less. The fact is that those aged who do not sustain a loss in income do consume as much as anyone else in their income level. No doubt the aged would be worse off were there no social security payments. Yet a large percentage of social security beneficiaries still require public assistance, mainly because the benefits are too small to maintain them at low levels of subsistence.

The same urbanization process that has affected the elderly also affects other groups. Female heads of families are immobile in the absence of an adequate system of day-care services, and large families render the head occupationally less mobile. Furthermore, the unemployables, particularly the handicapped and chronically ill, are being forced out of the changing urban economy.

Promoting middle-class style of life

Poverty is closely connected to the urbanization process. The problem of the poor, and especially the urban poor in Canada, has been that neither they nor the public institutions capable of acting on their behalf have been able to adapt to and benefit from the rapid, widespread, and irreversible changes. Equally important is the conditioning of children by promoting the middle-class style of life. Such a style of life is a commitment to self-promotion, exclusion, and evasion of human problems, placing too high a value on our own comfort. This, in turn, is nourished by a search for status. In middle-class life, people of similar background and circumstances are drawn together in neighbourhoods which have systematically eliminated the "less worthy". In promoting this life-style and cutting off those people whose needs are most acute, the poor pay a totally unnecessary price.

At the same time, the media and the politicians supported and protected by the media daily determine the shape and limits of public outcry. In documenting the symptoms of poverty and the inadequacies of existing social programs, as well as hailing each new band-aid program, the general population remains apathetic towards the exploitation and inequalities of our economic system.

The media-corporation-government manipulation of the idea of democracy is allied with Sartre's description of the affluent who "have it in their power to produce alterations for the better, but instead work assiduously to perpetrate swindles while professing humane goals".

More representation sought for PHE council

By KIM RICKETTS

The recent restructuring of the council of the School of Physical and Health Education was initiated in the hope "of making the council a little more representative" says the new director of the school, Juri Daniel.

Final approval of the changes, which increased the number of students and junior teaching staff on the council, came at last Thursday's Governing Council meeting.

The original proposal to restructure was made by Daniel at the final meeting of the old council where it received the strong support by the faculty members. The proposals were submitted solely on his initiative rather than student pressure, Daniel said.

Daniel is concerned that PHE instructors ranked below assistant professor at Hart House and the Benson Building, who have previously been represented only through their two directors, be given a greater voice.

He is also concerned about students whom he considers generally to be "non-participants." "I've impressed upon them how important I feel it is for student representation," he said. "I think this will give them the opportunity to have a voice and participate."

PHE student council president Wayne Young said he was impressed with the general concern expressed for the student voice by the present administration.

Eight student members, two from each year, one male and one female, plus the president have been allowed full voting rights in the council. Previously there was only one student on the council.

"It is an attempt to instigate better rapport between student and faculty," Young declared. "I think it has great possibilities. The staff have taken the first step; the responsibility now lies with the students."

PHE SAC representative Dave Barrett feels it is important that the students be involved. He feels the physical education students "are mostly apolitical and weren't that concerned before (the change) about the school and how it functions."

Linda Page, the female council representative for fourth year, defined the move as "a step in the right direction."

Brief to Works Committee wants Toronto streetcars preserved

A brief prepared for presentation to the Toronto Public Works Committee endorses the preservation of streetcars as an economical and efficient means of mass transport.

The Streetcars for Toronto Committee brief argues against a transportation network based solely on subway and buses.

An issue is the fate of the streetcar in Toronto, and in particular, the Toronto Transit Commission's proposal to remove the car lines on St. Clair Avenue, Mount Pleasant Boulevard and Rogers Road.

At a meeting of the committee last week, U of T child studies professor J. R. Biemiller explained the financial and operational implications of changing from streetcars to diesel buses and trolleys.

The Toronto Transit Commission argues that the switch to buses would mean greater operating efficiency and a short term capital saving in costs of new buses over the more expensive street car.

Biemiller pointed out at the meeting, however, that streetcars have 1.6 times the carrying capacity of buses. The TTC's St. Clair plan would result in a decline in passenger holding capacity of 17 per cent, while the number of transit vehicles on the already crowded street would increase 24 per cent.

Over the long term, the initial capital saving in buses would be lost because of their shorter life span and extra labour costs required to operate more vehicles, the brief states. "After 10 years, the initial cost difference would be made up by operating cost differences".

Mike Filey, a local historian, stressed to the gathering that streetcars are an integral part of Toronto. They are a good form of intermediate transit, he said, between high capacity, flexible subways and low capacity, inflexible buses.

Except for Cleveland, Boston, San Francisco and Toronto, streetcars are almost non-existent in North America. In another city, New Orleans, he pointed out, streetcars are tourist attractions.

One speaker from the audience, referring to the TTC's emphasis on short-term profit rather than long-term planning, questioned provincial spending priorities on transportation.

If the province can spend $ 10 million on a "Disneyland-like" ride for the Canadian National Exhibition, he reasoned, then surely they could support the transit commission's short-term financial loss of two million dollars.

TTC commissioner Karl Mallette, who has been a vigorous proponent of the Spadina Expressway, congratulated the streetcar committee on its research and initiative. He assured the group that its brief would receive serious attention.

U of T, York faculty call for ban on atom weapons, testing

Eighty-three faculty members of the University of Toronto and York University have appealed for total prohibition of nuclear tests and for an international ban on the use of nuclear weapons.

Their appeal came in a letter sent to the "Lucky Dragon Preservation Committee", a group of peace movement activists and religious leaders in Tokyo. The letter coincided with the annual mass antiwar demonstrations held throughout Japan last Saturday.

The entire crew of 23 of the Lucky Dragon, a 100-ton Japanese fishing trawler, was seriously injured by radioactive fallout from the H-bomb test conducted by the U.S. at the Bikini Atoll in 1954.

The vessel was discovered at berth recently in Tokyo Bay, and the Preservation Committee is now seeking world-wide support of its effort to restore it as a lasting monument to all nuclear disasters and as a symbol of international opposition to nuclear testing and the nuclear arms race.

The Toronto faculty letter, according to U of T assistant mathematics Professor Stephen Salaff, who initiated the appeal, "unmistakably condemns" the "reckless" American and French nuclear testing.

The incidence of the Lucky Dragon was the third, after Hiroshima and Nagasaki, of Japanese victimization by U.S. nuclear weapons. Also injured by the radioactivity were several hundred inhabitants of islands near Bikini.

The disaster initially sparked a mass campaign accumulating 36 million Japanese signatures on a petition against nuclear weapons.

The supportive letter sent to Japan was originally drawn up by U of T sociology professors Alan Powell and Janet Salaff, and Stephen Salaff.

Riverdale activities to hold mass meeting

By GRETCHEN ROEDDE

While traditional party politicians wage campaigns for upcoming municipal and federal elections, east end activists are preparing the Riverdale People's Convention, which promises to be, according to co-chairman Rev. Harold Jackman, "an historic event for Canada."

It may be the most impressive demonstration of citizen-based power and solidarity yet seen in Toronto, and will be held November 12 at Monarch Park Collegiate.

Riverdale extends from the Don River to Coxwell Avenue, and from Danforth Avenue to the waterfront. It is a working class area exploited by many groups: slum landlords, industries, and developers. Community groups have complained that attempts to solve their problems at the legislative level have generally proved to be ineffective, due either to indifference or the inability of bureaucrats to understand them.

For the past three years, an increasingly strong community organization has developed, aimed at creating a better environment in Riverdale, and deriving its power from direct citizen participation and issue-oriented action.

In 1969 the East Don Coalition was formed — a co-operative of three churches and a ratepayer association. This group hired a Saul Alinsky-trained Canadian community organizer, Don Keating, to mobilize the people. In 1970 the original Coalition became the Riverdale Community Organization, expanding to include several neighbourhood and school associations.

RCO has now become the Greater Riverdale Community Convention, and includes, every organization in Riverdale according to the convention planners.

Because power has been solidly established at the community level, citizens can be mobilized quickly to combat city hall and other organizations.

For example, last summer residents of Jones Avenue demanded and later secured TTC bus service on their street after a prolonged struggle. Recently, RCO stalled Bramalea Consolidated developments' plans to erect a highrise complex in the area.

RCO successfully aided Operation Family Rights' fight to procure free or reduced-cost drugs for family benefit recipients.

"People getting involved; that's what this organization is all about," says Donna Wotten, a student who is working with RCO as a volunteer.

"We are not out to block every plan proposed by the city, but to demonstrate that as residents in the city, we have the right to influence decisions affecting our lives."

In fact, improved relationships between different groups in the community, and greater accountability of industries and agencies to the citizens have resulted from the growth of community organizations.

"Involvement with the organization has increased the credibility of the agencies as staff become instruments of public will", explained Dale Perkins, a United Church minister working in the area.

The 'professional' community organizers are taking a background role in the convention, stressing that the strength and power of the movement is derived from popular participation.

Two years ago, when government agencies suddenly cut off grants to

The Varsity - Chris Newall

The Riverdale People's Convention will take place in this old store. RCO news lines the windows.

RCO, organizers drove taxis and worked night shifts to support their families while working with RCO during the day.

A recent grant from the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation for research into Riverdale's problems has temporarily relieved financial pressures.

The strength of the organization has even won the respect of the powers against which actions were taken.

For example, RCO charged Sunnybrook Packers with illegal use of a backlane for parking its trucks, and for improper disposal of water, bloody from carcasses, which would occasionally flood back streets. The owner refused to meet with residents, but when they successfully blockaded Sunnybrook from truck access, he met their demands.

Successful anti-pollution action was taken against Canada Metal, an industry which now co-operates fully with residents.

Recognition of the community has also recently come from the Toronto Department of Parks and Recreation. After long negotiations, the department agreed to loan the old Dunlop factory site, at Blake and Strathcona Streets, earlier slated for redevelopment, as a park for neighbourhood children.

"Direct action of this kind gives the people the dignity of using power to make changes, not handing over power to unaccountable governments", one organizer said. Perkins stressed that "it is the focus on action which pulls people together: we are not out to create power structures but to solve issues."

The present focus of activity is the convention, organized by seven committees established at a September mass rally. The conference leaders who have been elected reflect the diversity of the different groups in the community. They are from the Panhellenic Organization of Canada, an Italian working class organization, the black community, the Chinese community, two neighbourhood groups, a church and a rehabilitation centre.

The convention will be self-financed with each delegation of fifteen members paying twenty dollars. Some local industries have co-operated by buying ads in a Convention Book.

Commitments:

We suffer no lack of challenges in Canada today. We do suffer, in my opinion, a serious lack of commitment on the part of government to meet these challenges. I would like to talk with you now about four I feel to be most urgent.

JOBS: Right now, more than half a million Canadians are without jobs, one of the highest unemployment rates in the industrialized world. In Quebec, one in eleven is jobless; in Newfoundland, one in nine; among young Canadians, one in five; among our native people, three in five. Well over two million people are directly affected.

Canada can do better. My government would make the creation of jobs its first priority.

My government would immediately reduce personal income taxes, to stimulate consumer demand, to create jobs. We would eliminate the 11% Federal sales tax on building materials to encourage construction, because construction means jobs. We would encourage the further processing of our raw materials here, because that means jobs.

My government would expand the retraining opportunities available through the Department of Manpower, and make that agency much more aggressive in searching out job vacancies.

My government would insist on greater long range planning of special job-creating activities—such as summer youth employment—so that the communities to be served could be involved from the outset, and so that jobs could be found for those whose need is most pressing.

Further, my government would act to strengthen our job-creating potential for the future. We would increase direct government investment in research and technology, and expedite the process by which Canadian innovations can be marketed around the world.

PRICES: What cost you five dollars four years ago right now costs you six. The poor people of Canada, the elderly and those on fixed incomes, have suffered most from this kind of inflation, but clearly it affects the earnings and savings of all Canadians. And, because it makes Canada's exports less competitive, inflation affects a good many jobs as well. The government I lead would tackle this problem directly.

First of all, my government would calculate its tax revenues in terms of constant rather than inflated dollars, so as to eliminate the Treasury Board's vested interest in inflation.

We would strengthen the role of the Auditor General, so that unproductive government spending, which contributes not a little to the inflationary cycle, might be revealed and reduced.

We would support the cost-of-living escalator formula for those receiving old age and guaranteed income security benefits.

And, should the need ever arise, my government would be prepared to use temporary wage and price controls to combat inflation.

ECONOMIC INDEPENDENCE: Fifty-eight percent of Canada's manufacturing industry is foreign controlled, and there have been almost as many foreign takeovers since Mr. Trudeau took over as in the previous ten years.

Mr. Trudeau's recent legislation does not begin to meet the problem: it fails to correct a situation in which it is easier for foreign than for domestic corporations to effect takeovers; further, it fails to increase a Canadian presence in existing subsidiaries, and fails to provide for full financial disclosure by those subsidiaries.

My government would enact the changes necessary to make this legislation truly effective. Beyond that, we would revise the Bank Act to make certain that venture capital was available for the expansion of existing Canadian firms, or the creation of new ones.

My government, in concert with the provinces, would develop new programs to ensure the rapid growth of our entrepreneurial and managerial talent pools.

And we would, again together with the provinces, establish and define key sectors of the economy which are to be considered reserved for Canadian ownership.

THE ENVIRONMENT: Half of Canada's urban centres with populations of a thousand or more lack any sewage treatment, and a further third have only the most rudimentary equipment. The Trudeau government's Ministry of the Environment is not really a ministry at all, since many of its regulations are enforced by a variety of other government agencies.

We can, and absolutely must do much more to protect Canada.

My government would first of all create an Environmental Council to monitor, and disseminate information upon the quality of our environment, and recommend measures to parliament.

My government would encourage the development of large-scale anti-pollution industries in Canada.

It would, together with the provinces, act to stiffen the penalties for all forms of environmental neglect, whether to our air, soil, or water, international waters included.

It would use a variety of financial incentives to assist industry to invest in pollution control equipment.

It would create a co-ordinated Department of the Environment.

I would say again that we face no lack of tasks, no want of challenges anywhere in this land...in our cities and towns, on our small farms, and across the open reaches of our north.

We can meet none of them if we cannot create jobs, if we cannot protect the savings of those who work, cannot assume greater control over our own economy, cannot live in harmony with nature.

I am confident that we can do these things, and a great many more, if we are wisely and honestly led.

My government will strive to provide that kind of leadership. You have my word.

R.L. Stanfield

UC French chairman attacks Carleton report

By DIANA WEST

The chairman of the UC French department, Pierre Robert, defended his department in reply to a recent report criticizing the lack of French-Canadian content in English language French courses in an interview Monday.

The report is a study of 24 universities made by Carleton University professors Sinclair Robinson, Donald Smith and Robin Mathews. The study found that the average French-Canadian content in English-speaking undergraduate French courses is 25 per cent.

"The critique," Robert said, "is completely unrealistic." Its main purpose is to "stir up reactions."

The report says that only four French-Canadian content courses are offered out of a total of 45 French courses available on U of T's St. George campus. This does not include three open topic courses, the report notes.

However, French department offers more French-Canadian content than the critique, indicates.

Beside the four French-Canadian studies the report refers to the department offers two courses in which about half of the literary works studied are French-Canadian, as well as three independent study courses in which students study French-Canadian works.

Two interdisciplinary studies dealing with Quebec and one course dealing with English and French-Canadian literature are also offered.

"In fact," said Robert, "Toronto is the only English speaking university that has a study program in the French-Canadian language."

U of T is a pioneer in the study of French-Canadian culture in English Canada according to Robert. For the past several years, the university has sponsored visiting professors from French-Canadian universities.

The French department has promoted French-Canadian culture by its efforts in such programs as the Festival québécois held last November at U of T. The festival attracted about 7,000 people to its French-Canadian exhibits, lectures and concerts.

Robert added that the U of T probably has one of the best library collections in French-Canadian literature in Canada.

"We would add courses," he said, "if we had more students." In the past two years he explained, the enrolment figures in French courses have dropped off considerably.

Enrolment plunges

Student enrolment at Ontario universities fell about 9,100 short of projections submitted by the schools last December.

A preliminary enrolment report, released Friday by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, showed an enrolment of 133,853 full time undergraduates. This represents an increase of about one per cent over last year's figures as against the projected eight per cent increase. Graduate enrolment across the province actually dropped by 559 students this year.

This is the second year in a row in which the growth rate of Ontario's universities has been seriously overestimated. An increase of 10 per cent was estimated for the 1972-73 academic year, but actual enrolment rose only five per cent.

This year only the University of Guelph and Toronto's Regis College, a church related school, exceeded their projections.

The University of Toronto showed a fall enrolment of 19,413 undergraduates on the St. George Campus. This constitutes an increase of 529 over last year and about 100 under last December's projections.

An increase of about 200 students was reported at the university's Scarborough campus, about 130 less than expected. The Erindale campus, however, fell only three students short of meeting its projected growth of 391.

Meds moves into second place

By narrowly defeating New College 10-6 yesterday afternoon, Med dropped the team into last place in Division II.

The game turned into a defensive battle although that wasn't the intent. Both teams passed throughout the game on the wet muddy field, as the rain started to come down both teams predictably headed for the sidelines on most plays in order to make a first down.

All major scoring came within the second half of the game — in fact, within the final twenty minutes.

Med scored first on a touchdown by Ed Russel. The six points came off an interception and return, but the convert was missed. The TD was especially costly to New. While Med attempted to score, the second New player to be injured in the game was helped off the field.

In the "do or die" final quarter New effectively contained Med on the latter's half of the field. But the New offensive came too late.

Carlson scored midway through the quarter to put New into the game again. But when the convert was missed, little hope remained for the NC team to play catch-up football.

In the first half, New was attempting to punt the ball and inadvertently passed it ten feet over the kicker's head. Med picked up its first point. New did come back however, containing Med in its half for almost all of the second quarter.

Bob Gaubier—The Varsity

Carlson's touchdown late in the fourth quarter of yesterday's game was not enough for New, which lost to Meds 10-0.

New kept kicking but was unable to earn any points. Med players Howeroft and Watchorn added singles and J. Russel rounded off the scoring with a safety.

New's defeat yesterday drops the team into last place, well out of contention for the fourth playoff position. Med has one game left — against Trin — and will likely end up in second place behind UC. In other play during the past week St. Mike's shut out Eng 37-0 last Friday, and New scraped by Scar 7-6 on Wednesday.

Scar leads Div I rugby, 3-0-0

By NEILSORBIE

PHE A defeated Eng I 12-0 in interfaculty rugby yesterday.

Although both teams looked strong in the first few minutes of play, the pace of the game was hampered by the terrible conditions of the field.

As the first half ended Phys Ed's Melnyk squeezed out the first "try" of the game on a great second effort. In the second half Brian Prettie showed strong open field running for the second PHE try. Filinski converted both tries with considerable ease.

Monday's rugby game, also marred by the wet, muddy conditions of the back campus field, brought together two evenly-matched teams. Law B defeated PHE B 4-0 to establish itself in first place in the second rugby division.

In the first half Peter Ballem blocked a kick and followed a rolling ball into the PHE goal area for the only scoring play of the game. (The conversion was unsuccessful.)

Law was under pressure in its end in the second half due to accurate kicking and good pursuit of the PHE forwards. However, PHE was unable to get the ball across the line and the game ended with the score 4-0.

Thus far in the season Scar leads Division I with a 3-0-0 record, while PHE A is second (3-1-1) and Trin A third (2-1-1). In Division II Law leads (4-0-0), followed by PHE B (3-2-0) and Trin B (1-1-0).

Phar ends SMC win streak

Pharmacy put an end to St. Mike's 10 game winning streak in overtime of the third game Monday evening. Pharmacy defeated SMC 12-15, 15-10, and 15-(2)-15.

St. Mike's looked strong in the first game with a solid team effort. However the Pharmacy squad was able to come within three points of winning the initial game and also displayed considerable skill.

Pharmacy quickly took the second game. St. Mike's Perchal said "We fucked around too much and lost the game."

Another reason might lie with SMC's Rumak who repeatedly slammed the ball too hard, causing SMC several losses of serve. When Rumak did not follow his grand slam style (especially when he was close in to the net) he played well. He appears to be SMC's strongest player.

Pharmacy was the come-from-behind team. Through the second game the team appeared weaker, yet the St. Mike's ineptitude enabled them to win through defensive action.

In the rubber match the SMC team made a valiant catch-up effort, but their momentum had already been lost and they never really returned to peak form.

With the score 14-14 the teams continually lost serve. At one point when the SMC team was behind, one of the team members said "Isn't this game supposed to be played until eight (points) and then we switch sides?" Finally, with both teams playing cautiously, SMC lost the ball and it dropped down in front of the net on the St. Mike's side.

After the game SMC's Perchal said that Rumak was the team's best player but that "he needs more practice — the whole team needs to practice".

SMC and Pharmacy now both have a 1-1 record this season.

Bob Gaubier—The Varsity

SMC suffered a setback Monday night, losing to Pharmacy in Division II play. St. Mike's had won 10 straight before the loss.

Swim Blues begin season tomorrow

By PAUL CARSON

Ask most followers of intercollegiate athletics which Varsity teams have won the most championships in recent years and you usually get the standard reply: "Hockey".

That's not a bad guess since the icemen have won eight consecutive league titles and five straight national championships, but in terms of winning streaks they're not even close.

On the women's side, by far the most spectacular record is held by the field hockey team, which went into the current season with the amazing statistic of not having lost a single game in the past ten years.

In men's intercollegiate athletics, the most consistent winners are the swimmers, who have amassed no less than twelve consecutive league championships and five out of six national crowns.

Coached by 27-year old Robin Campbell, the Swim Blues are again prohibitive favorites to retain their OUAA title. But to Campbell, winning is certainly not the paramount objective of Varsity's extensive aquatic program.

"Participation, team spirit, and the development of the individual athlete as an accomplished swimmer are the key goals," he said recently.

Thanks to federal government scholarship programs and the construction of more first-class facilities college swimming in Canada has developed rapidly from the days, when Cambell and five teammates could win a national title in the mid-sixties.

"A sign of the tremendous growth of college swimming would be the simple fact that we won seven years ago with just six top swimmers; today with that number you'd be lucky to finish fifth at the CIAU meet," Campbell said.

Following the extensive graduations from last year's team, 1972 was expected to be a transitional year in Varsity swimming, but Campbell and diving coach Jim LaCasse have benefitted from the arrival of several talented newcomers to complement a good crop of veterans. Perhaps the most important addition is Shane Larri who's already bested most of the record times posted by last year's freestyle workhorse Mike Guinness, now doing graduate work at Indiana.

Versatile Alex Fedko, freestyler Chris Rockingham, and breast-stroker Barry Bowerman are the main losses through graduation, but Campbell expects to have several proven rookies trying out in all four strokes—freestyle, butterfly, breast, back—plus the individual medley and the relays.

"In 1971-72 we won several key dual meets because Mike Guinness could double up on the 100 and 200-yard freestyles," Campbell explained, "but this year I think we will be able to win with our tremendous depth—you might call it bench strength."

While swimming is often a difficult sport to predict, since many athletes train so as not to reach their peak until the finals in February, Varsity would appear to have at least two and in some cases three highly rated competitors in every event. The first real test of Campbell's "bench strength" prognosis won't come until the annual OUAA Relays next month at York: this is by agreement a "fun" meet with no scores kept but every coach uses the races as a gauge of where his team stands compared to the other OUAA powers, especially Toronto.

"The Relay meet is always interesting for both swimmers and spectators," Campbell said. "The swimmers get their first real test of actual competition against their possible rivals in the league finals, and spectators will be able to see all the top swimmers in the province in races that are run only at this particular meet."

He might have added that the coaches also get into the act, testing their ability to plot and scheme strategy against one another as they attempt to pack particular races with their best athletes.

"Often two or three coaches end up packing the same races, in which case the spectators get a great afternoon of swimming," Campbell said.

When the dual meet season starts in earnest, after Christmas, Varsity will have a varied home schedule hosting Waterloo, Western, Kent State, Ryerson, Ottawa and Guelph.

Western, coached by Bob Eynon, is usually runner-up in the league final, and boasts the distinction of being the only school except Toronto to win a championship since 1957. Eynon relies on Olympian Bob Kennedy and a host of good freestylers.

Kent State is one of the better U.S. college swim teams, and Ottawa has embarked on an extensive swimming program in its new 50-metre pool under the coaching of Fouad Kamal, who ended Blues string of five CIAU titles last year with McGill.

The other meets will be frankly lopsided as Campbell uses all of his athletes in preparation for the OUAA final when he must cut the present 26 to a team of 18, including divers.

Blues' hopes in the freestyle rest on captain Jim Adams, winner of both the 50 and 100-yard free at the CIAU. Adams, a native of Brazil, also holds the OUAA record in the 100 at 48.8 and shares the mark in the 50 of 22.2 with former Varsity standout Theo Van Ryn.

Bob Peeling is back for his second season at Varsity after some good years at McMaster. Peeling doubles in the freestyle and butterfly, and holds the OUAA record of 2:02.5 in the 200 fly.

Veteran breaststroker Ross Ballantyne is back for another year along with Nick Rottman from the 1970-71 team. Ballantyne still holds the league mark of 1:03.4 over 100 yards, one of the few Ontario records to have survived since 1970.

Campbell is uncertain whether former Olympic finalist Jim Shaw will swim another year of backstroke but he has two-year veteran Russ Farquhar in any case, plus some excellent rookies.

Blues also benefit from the versatility of John Twohig, a freestyler and butterfly-specialist who's looking good after a sub-par year in 71-72, and sophomore Wayne Phillips who combines freestyle and breaststroke.

Swimming is perhaps the most physically demanding of any intercollegiate sport, since fractions of a second spell the difference between champion and also-ran. Presently, almost thirty hopefuls are working out in the Hart House pool, and many participate in both the morning and afternoon sessions.

It's a punishing, often lonely grind but the talent and dedication are there, and come February 25 in Waterloo, it should add up to Title Thirteen.

Extra fee for golf facilities

Beginning Monday the Athletics Department (through the intramural office) will be offering golf lessons for the second consecutive year for the lost cost of $2.

However, there appears to be some confusion on the part of the Department of Athletics as to who is to be allowed to use the facilities.

The $2 fee is quite reasonable for the six week course, but in order to use the golf facilities available at Hart House a member of the university community must join the golf club and pay the $2.

The men's athletic fee for Hart House is $20 per student per year. The Department of Athletics paid for the $400 net, yet to use it one must also pay an additional $2, whether or not one wishes to take the lessons.

When asked why the additional fee was required Dave Copp, coordinator of intramural athletics, said that the problem lies with the lack of funds available in athletics for this type of mass participation activity. In order to form a golf club the facilities available are not allowed to draw on the already limited athletic budget.

The Varsity—Bob Gauthier

Copp practises off-season golf.

According to the intramural office the golf net, located in the small fencing room in Hart House must be constantly supervised. The net was broken last year and was unavailable for use during the summer. Someone even "wanted to throw a javelin in the fencing room", according to Copp.

The problem is one of space. The fencing room is used for, among other purposes, lectures, golf, and fencing. The net is on a sliding track which must be continually run back and forth because of the room's small size.

Nevertheless, classes begin October 30 and January 15. They will consist of six lessons in each term; participants will be able to view their swing on videotape. Clinics will include guest instructors and films. The net remains up every afternoon and club members may borrow clubs and balls by inquiring at the key office.

Anyone wishing to pay the $2 for the lessons or the additional athletic fee in order to use the department-owned facilities should contact the intramural office (928-3087).

Budget squeeze may cut experimental courses

Interdisciplinary Studies chairman Geoffrey Payzant charges that unless the department's 1973-74 budget is substantially increased, it will have to cut in half the number of experimental courses offered and will be unable to fund new courses next year.

However, U of T vice-president and budget chairman Don Forster indicated yesterday that Payzant's fears were not well-founded and that with the present budget, Interdisciplinary Studies could continue to operate all its existing courses.

"I don't think that's what Professor Payzant meant," Forster said, in response to the charges.

The whole future of Interdisciplinary Studies is unclear.

Teachers in the department sent a proposal to expand Interdisciplinary Studies to U of T president John Evans last July, when Evans took office. Copies of the report were also sent to other university officials, yet no one knows who is responsible for a decision on the report.

Forster said that the report could be considered by the Governing Council, or by the Faculty of Arts and Science as part of its budget.

Arts and Science dean Bob Greene said that he had not included the chief recommendation of the report, establishment of an Innovative Fund to expand and co-ordinate interdisciplinary courses, in his budget report delivered to the university's budget committee yesterday. He added that the arts faculty cannot afford to set up the fund this year.

Although he said he had sent the report to the Presidential Advisory Committee on the New Program, Greene admitted, "I do not really know whose decision Innovative Fund is."

Payzant had hoped for action on the brief's recommendations by the end of last month.

The Innovative Fund "should have been set up by the end of September to be effective for 1973-74," he says.

He explained that present alternate financial sources are virtually "drying up".

Colleges which have up to this year donated teachers for interdisciplinary courses have said that this cannot continue.

In addition, the university has not given permission for Interdisciplinary Studies to hire "moonlighting" professors next year.

Payzant explained that the department pays some teachers to teach more than their contracted load. They are paid, he said, approximately one-half the salary of cross-appointed professors, which allows Interdisciplinary Studies to mount more courses than it normally could with its budget.

The university feels, according to Payzant, that all such "moonlighting" stipends should be used to hire more professors.

Other sources of money, which Payzant said he was not at liberty to reveal, have also withdrawn support.

Interdisciplinary Studies presently sponsors 23 courses, with a total of about 1100 students enrolled.

Payzant said earlier this week that Interdisciplinary Studies does not yet know "within plus or minus 50 per cent what we can afford to spend on courses" since its budget has not been established.

Arts won't weigh courses for professional faculties

The Faculty of Arts and Science has turned down a request from Medicine to rank its courses according to their difficulty.

Bob Greene said yesterday that "it is neither possible nor desirable" for the faculty to rank courses.

Earlier this fall, Innis registrar David King visited several college classes to warn students that Innis and some sociology courses might not be given full credit for admission to medicine and law.

Medicine's dean of admissions J. W. Steiner said yesterday that the request to weight arts and science courses to help the faculty evaluate candidates for admission to medicine is the result of "too many first class applicants for too few places".

"Ideally we could rely on the transcripts if courses were weighted", he added. "however we recognize that there is a difficulty involved in weighting non-science courses."

Steiner said that as a result the faculty is setting up a "working party" to examine methods of fairly assessing students. He added that other probable methods could include interviewing students and collating references as well as taking into consideration summer work experience.

He stressed, however, that the faculty was still primarily interested in the "distinction of students on academic grounds."

When asked how the admissions committee has regarded unstructured courses such as those offered by Innis College, Steiner claimed that there had been no problem in the past but one has developed this year.

"I don't want the admissions committee to jump to conclusions or pass judgment on any courses," he said. So far it hasn't done so, he added.

He claimed that "we are just practising preventative medicine," by reviewing the admission procedures. Another procedure being dropped is the controversial psychological tests which questioned applicants' political views as well as probing personal attitudes and views on the medical profession.

One major change effective next year will be that students who have graduated will have an equal opportunity to gain admission to medicine. In the past, second year students had a much greater chance for acceptance.

A proposal that members of the faculty of arts and science be co-opted to serve on the med's admission committee was opposed by Greene who felt that no single person in the faculty could have sufficient information about the more than 1500 courses it offers.

Dean of Medicine A. L. Chute stressed that students hoping to enter medicine should not take science subjects exclusively if that is not their interest.

He said that it is not necessary to take any science courses other than the four prerequisite subjects to qualify for admission. He added that the faculty is interested in training doctors who are interested in humanities and other fields.

SAC votes yes and no to fees demonstration

By BRIANE NASIMOK

The Students' Administrative Council Wednesday night voted to help build momentum in support of a day of protest against fee increases that it has refused to endorse.

As a consequence of SAC's opting out of the proposed province-wide protest against the Conservative government's student financing cuts, Ontario Federation of Students general coordinator Craig Heron said the decision may cause cancellation of the proposal.

SAC voted by about a 3 to 2 ratio against the organization of a "mass central demonstration at Queen's Park" to coincide with the opening of the legislature next month. The motion would have encouraged simultaneous local demonstrations for campuses not able to participate in the Toronto action.

However, the council narrowly passed the third clause of the first OFS motion, which committed it to attempt "to obtain endorsement and active support from a broad range of community groups, labour associations, high schools and all post-secondary institutions."

This clause was later defeated after finance commissioner Vince DeAngelo realized the inconsistency of passing only the third part of the motion and pleaded that someone who voted in favour of the motion ask to reconsider it.

However, SAC went on to endorse the second OFS motion, "that the OFS initiate the following momentum building actions in the community and in educational institutions prior to the day of protest: province-wide newspaper distribution, and campus educational efforts, with the goal of maximum participation and decentralized decision making."

When this carried UC SAC representative Marty Stoller said that was similar to passing the third clause again. But meeting chairman Craig Perkins announced that he was "not going to try to fix up any more stupid errors", and went on to the next item of business.

De Angelo asked the secretary to record his opposition to the motion, after which UC rep Seymour Kanowitch reminded DeAngelo that he voted in favour of it.

Debate on the mass demonstration planned for the day of protest focused on public reaction, and the amount of time organization of it would take.

Heron reported OFS has "asked the government to make a statement on our demands, but they refuse to commit themselves until the budget comes down in the spring." He was referring to OFS meetings with colleges and universities minister Jack McNie.

Heron went on to say that if the U of T voted against the protest, it likely would not be staged. "If U of T drops out it will cause a hell of a lot of damage", he said.

He concluded by stressing the need for a physical protest, to demonstrate the extent of support to the government.

University commissioner John Creelman stated that of the three universities that most strongly supported the referendum, Queen's decided not to get involved in the protest and Western was awaiting SAC's decision before deciding themselves.

SAC president Eric Miglin commented that "If well run it could be effective, but it could also get out of hand." He concluded that SAC should either support the protest or "wash its hands of the whole thing completely."

Miglin abstained on the motion, while most of the rest of the executive voted against it.

Engineering representative Cliff Taylor said he wondered about students' public image if there was a mass demonstration. He asked if it would be better to sit back and negotiate, for more "credibility".

Stoller attempted unsuccessfully to have the question reconsidered after it was defeated.

U of T may ask fee hikes to be shelved

By JULIA ELCOCK

The Academic Affairs Committee of U of T's top governing body has unanimously called for the provincial government to cancel this year's university fee increases.

In a stand almost exactly similar to one taken by the Ontario Federation of Students, the committee deplored the actions of the Conservative government in imposing simultaneous tuition fee increases and decreases in grant assistance.

The motion, which must go to the Governing Council for final approval, said that the government's actions "may likely deter many academically qualified individuals from entering or continuing with higher education".

It demanded that:

- this year's formula fee increase be withdrawn,
- any future formula fee increases not be imposed without full public discussion of the Wright Report, especially with those groups affected,
- the Ontario Student Award loan ceiling be reduced from $800 to $600, and
- the age of independence be reduced from its present 24.

Student committee member Brian Morgan called for the committee to make a public statement on the issue, saying that "such a statement carries more power than any other opinion". He added that lower income groups were deterred from continuing in university not just because of the "cost of university fees, but because of living expenses and loss of income".

Committee chairman R.M.N. Shepherd said that he had been informed by the University College registrar that "an exceptionally large number of students" had withdrawn since the beginning of the academic year, but that in only one or two cases was the fee increase a contributing factor.

He said that if many students, withhold fees, it will be the university and not the government that will suffer.

U of T student awards officer Patrick Phillips stated that the government believed that no serious student would be deterred from pursuing higher education as a result of the fee increases. He added that any such incidences would be hard to document.

He reported that the government last year allocated $42 million for student grants, of which only $29 million was spent. This year $32 million is budgeted for the awards program.

He said that he saw the cutback as an attempt by the government to "balance their books".

He attributed the underuse of the allocated grant money to the stringent regulations governing the awards.

Renegade students defy SAC; will attend closed meeting

Governing Council member Paul Cadario and SAC communications commissioner Debra Lewis have decided to attend the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada annual meeting next week, opposing SAC policy.

A motion moved by UC SAC rep Seymour Kanowitch, passed by a narrow majority Wednesday, stated that no member of SAC should attend the AUCC conference, or sit on any of its bodies. Kanowitch said he moved the motion because of the AUCC's policy of closing meetings to observers.

SAC president Eric Miglin said that he would comply with the SAC decision and would not attend. Miglin, who has been nominated for the AUCC board of directors, said yesterday he will also withdraw his name from that body.

Cadario, last year's finance commissioner, said that he would attend regardless of the SAC decision. Cadario was chosen by the administration as U of T's undergraduate representative without consultation of SAC.

SAC executive later protested the unilateral decision in a letter to president John Evans.

Communications commissioner Debra Lewis said that she was a member of the Victoria University delegation, and not representing universities' undergraduates.

Miglin questioned who Cadario was representing, and called on Cadario and Lewis not to attend the meeting.

SAC decided to withhold any financial support from bringing noted Black Panther Bobby Seale on campus in November. The last SAC meeting decided to support Seale's visit but a services commission meeting Tuesday decided against spending any money on the visit.

UC SAC rep Bob Anderson said that SAC was committed to bringing Seale to Toronto and supported spending $1000 on the project.

Finance Commissioner Vince DeAngelo said that he hoped that the council would not "waste money" on the visit. He did, however, match Eric Miglin's offer of a 25 cent contribution to help pay the costs.

David Crombie was mistaken in entering the Toronto mayoralty contest, and his campaign thus far has not justified his candidacy, according to Alderman John Sewell.

The Ward 7 alderman told a Wednesday night Innis course on city politics that Crombie had made a "bad decision" in running because he is forfeiting a sure "reform" seat at City Hall. He also complained that Crombie's campaign is absorbing financial resources and workers that could be used in helping to elect more reform aldermen.

Crombie's voting record has been close to Sewell's during the past three years, but he is known as more of a compromiser and "conciliator".

Since Crombie announced his decision to seek the mayoralty, there has been a great deal of pressure on him to withdraw, but Sewell admitted that now there is "nothing we can do" about the decision.

Sewell was disturbed that Crombie in his campaign has "refused to make any distinctions between himself and the other people" (David Rotenberg and Tony O'Donohue) who are running for mayor. The task of the reform group now, Sewell said, is to pressure Crombie into "defining the issues."

Sewell has previously forecast O'Donohue will win the mayoralty, and has also said that Crombie doesn't have a chance.

Union backs fired worker

The Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 1230 is fighting to get fired library worker Dave Owen back his job.

The local met Wednesday at Hart House to discuss the abrupt dismissal of the Sigmund Samuel Library card filer. A grievance has been filed with the university.

Owen was fired the day after he attended a union meeting as a representative for the workers in his department, said local president Audrey Nichols. Owen, who had completed half of his three month probationary period was told his "unsatisfactory" work was the reason for his dismissal.

The local contends that Owen's work was satisfactory and that he was dismissed for his union activities.

Grievance procedure requires the university to reply to the union by Wednesday.

Nichols said if the union is not satisfied with his reply, it will take the case to an arbitration board.

In that event what the union will need, said Moynes, is supervisors who will say under oath at an arbitration hearing that Owen's work was satisfactory.

The all new Varsity distribution box got its first public airing Thursday when a wooden mock-up was installed between Sir Daniel Wilson residence and the Bookroom. Supplied by the university, 50 metallic boxes, worth $1500 in piece, will find e St. George home this year. Eventually, the campus will be blanketed by 150 of them.

What's this all about?

Done any slumming lately?

No?

If you're a Varsity staffer you can drop around to do yours at the weekly staff meeting today at 1 pm in the second floor of 91 St. George. Prospective staff are welcome too.

As well as admiring pictures of Alex Boxnik's new newspaper box, staffers can talk about whether they want to send anyone to the national Canadian University Press conference.

Money will also be discussed.

Voting won't produce social change

Monday, a listless, unexcited electorate will tramp to the polls to elect Canada's 29th Parliament.

Shorn of the 1968 Trudeaumania phenomenon, this year's election suffers all the more from the major parties' traditional refusal to discuss the key issues facing the country. Instead, they hide behind personalities and meaningless slogans.

"The land is strong," the Liberals proclaim. Apparently unaware, unemployment has soared to 7.1 per cent. And, an increasingly large number of Canadians have concluded that foreign domination is threatening to erase Canada from the world's map.

"We can do better," the Tories insist. Better, better for whom, one might ask. They offer little in the way of policy initiatives and that which they do propose reeks of pandering to a glib electorate. On foreign ownership, for example, they've won Toronto Star editorial support by adopting the Walter Gordon (Star director and CIBC celebrity) — Committee for an Independent Canada formula (inadequate even for their limited goals) of creating an independent, capitalist Canada.

The PC's talk about putting everybody back to work and eliminating the attraction welfare offers potential employables. But, they know little about, and consequently offer no adequate solution for, the real causes of poverty.

The self-styled socialists' election target is more modest. "More New Democrats," their signs plead. But, even the New Democrats have waged what appears to be a one-issue campaign, fighting the "corporate welfare bums". Too bad, they aren't really serious about radically changing society instead of being content to tinker with the taxation system. (Let's not forget what the Ontario NDP did when the Waffle tried to rock their moderation boat.)

And, when the public dares to question the parties' policies, it gets the run-around or a glib put-down. Asked about his government's unwillingness to do much about employment, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau told his questioner to "fuck off".

Other politicians may have handled the question more tactfully, but they would have done little more to alleviate the unemployment crisis.

None of the major parties advocate programs that would make substantial advancement toward solving the major problems facing Canada, although the NDP might make more of a dent in this direction (without touching the root causes) than either the Liberals or Conservatives.

Even if there was a party championing the necessary measures, they would soon discover that assuming office is not the same thing as taking power. Much of the real power is elsewhere.

Many of the most pressing problems are economic, and economic power rests primarily with people who don't sit in Parliament but instead on corporations' boards of directors.

(And, coincidentally, most of this economic power accrues to foreign interests, interests who use their power to influence Canadian political decisions. The Tories and NDP offer myopic solutions for the problem, the Liberals ignore it.)

Structurally, unemployment and inflation, for example, are part of the capitalist economic system. Only by changing that form of ownership can these problems be eradicated. And nobody, not even the supposedly socialist NDP, is suggesting such a change.

Even were a government to try to abandon the band-aid approach and implement the necessary, major social changes, the class that possesses the real economic power wouldn't let them get away with it that easily. (Capitalists control both the Liberal and Conservative parties, and people with relatively like mentality populate much of the NDP's top echelons. So, there's no reason to, accuse them of having such an inclination.

Elections perpetuate a perverted notion of democracy, that all democracy entails is people flocking, to the polls once every four years or so and doing nothing in between. During his first premiership, Trudeau relished telling opponents that if they didn't like his policies they could throw him out when his term was up.

Being personality-centred, electoral politics rule out policy considerations. Voters choose people to make decisions for them rather than making the decisions themselves. And, brokerage politics — whereby parties compete for support of the same, unrelated interest groups (to secure the necessary seats to form the government) by offering them appropriate favours — has not been successfully evolved in the electoral jungle of the western world.

That kind of non-ideological approach leaves the voter ill informed about how the parties will respond to various issues which may confront them during their term in office.

Even on the occasions when parties have cherted a definite course of action should they be elected, there have been no Canadian instances of anywhere near an entire platform being implemented. The prospect that one or two of the more innocuous items may find their way through the parliamentary maze is more likely.

And, as Trudeau says, there's nothing much you can do about that until the next election, according to the rules of the electoral game. (He doesn't hesitate to add that most voters have short memories and accept their powerlessness, becoming alienated from a process that has such a crucial effect upon their lives.)

Consequently, electoral politics in itself cannot achieve meaningful social change. Such change can only come about by people directly taking control of their own lives.

AN ELECTION MESSAGE from the National Integrity Foundation (Can.) Ltd. N.Y.

Ryan sends stand-in; Stollery late

All-candidates meeting lacks candidates

No-shows and part-shows predominated at a Spadina riding all-candidates meeting held in New College Wednesday night. Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) candidate Mitchell Bornstein failed to show at all, while Conservative Perry Ryan sent businessman John Brennan to substitute for him. Liberal Peter Stollery arrived 45 minutes late and left half an hour early.

Only Communist Maggie Bizzell and NDP candidate Bob Beardsley stayed to face the 120 students present for the entire meeting. Beardsley began by quoting a 1958 Trudeau statement asserting that a country dominated by foreign-owned business could not hope to control its own economy. He contrasted this with a 1971 Trudeau quote, in which the prime minister beamed at Richard Nixon's assurances the U.S. wanted a fully independent Canada. The audience applauded loudly. Said Brennan, "Beardsley's a good mathematics teacher, but he knows nothing about economics". Brennan devoted his opening speech to a denunciation of NDP leader David Lewis' book on corporate welfare bums, asserting it to be nonsensical and dishonest. "Lewis says tax deferral schemes in Canada provide no jobs," said Brennan, "yet he also says the U.S. DISC scheme, also a tax deferral program, is stealing jobs from Canadians."

Beardsley denounced the Liberal party's refusal to reveal its sources of campaign funds. "They will not do this," he said, "because they get much of their funds from the same people who receive large grants and loans under the DREE (regional incentives) program." He noted representatives of corporate recipients of such grants had predominated at $50-and-$100-a-plate Liberal campaign dinners. The NDP gets seven cents a month per person from unions affiliated with the party, while union members have the choice of opting out.

Asked about Bizzell's assertion that both NDP and Communist MPs were needed, Beardsley said, "Usually Bornstein is here and calls me a fascist; then there's no problem." He noted that many immigrants from Eastern Europe seemed to feel that the NDP and the Communists were the same; this was a problem for the party, which the Communist Party was not alleviating by supporting the NDP. (In ridings where the Communist Party is not running candidates, it supports the NDP.) "Ryan substitute" Brennan stressed the PC program of incentives for small business.

"What good will this do to repatriate the Canadian economy?" asked a student. "What can a bunch of corner-groceries or dry-cleaning stores do in the face of huge multinational corporations?"

In an interview after the meeting, Brennan was scornful of proposals to buy back the economy. The real problem, he suggested, is lack of entrepreneurial initiative and willingness to invest risk-capital on the part of Canadians.

"Canadians buy more life insurance than anybody else on earth", he said. "They buy savings bonds, and decline to risk their money in new businesses."

Canadian banks are the worst of all, he added. They want security above all else, and refuse to aid new enterprises. "Why has there been no talk about the environment in this campaign?" a student asked.

Beardsley pleaded guilty to ignoring this issue, but said Spadina riding contains people mostly interested in "bread-and-butter" issues. They are, he said, "frightened and insecure".

He later asserted the NDP is interested more in gross national happiness than in the gross national product.

Stollery said he was fully in favour of an Arctic pipeline up the Mackenzie Valley. In response to questioning, he said he had seen nothing to convince him that the $10 billion influx of foreign capital necessary to build it would raise the price of the Canadian dollar and result in fewer exports and greater unemployment.

Stollery asserted Ontario can get along without foreign investment, but other provinces still want it. And Ottawa had to take their views into account.

Ryan is spending around $25,000 on his campaign, said Brennan. Of the $14,000 Stollery is spending, half comes from his own pocket, he said. Beardsley's campaign will cost about $6,000.

Government ignored his report but it doesn't bother MP Wahn

By VALERIE ROSS
St. Paul's Liberal candidate Ian Wahn admitted yesterday that the Trudeau government has been dragging its heels in protecting the Canadian economy from multinational corporations.

But, he staunchly refused to publicly criticize the government for shelving his report recommending 51 per cent Canadian ownership of Canadian industries.

Wahn was speaking at Holy Trinity's Thursday Noon on the Square meeting in place of Energy, Mines and Resources Minister Donald MacDonald.

The House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs and Defence brought down the Wahn report in 1970, only to find it speedily ignored by the government.

Wahn said the federal government's proposals to institute screening procedures that would determine which industries should be Canadian-controlled, was a move in the right direction.

The screening bill, a modified version of another report, the Gray Report of 1972, died with the end of the last session of Parliament.

The Liberal incumbent said the Trudeau regime has conclusively decided against wage and price controls as methods of controlling the spiralling cost of living.

He also said that the long term solution to immigration problems was to set up better application screening agencies overseas "using the same non-discriminatory objective questionnaire we have now."

Struggling for a place in the sun...

Most students at U of T who vote downtown in Monday's federal election will be casting their ballots in the Spadina riding.

With only three days to go before the big day, The Varsity presents profiles of four candidates in this riding. Two others, Progressive Conservative candidate Perry Ryan, and Liberal runner Peter Stollery, have been covered in previous issues of The Varsity.

Beardsley appeals to powerless

The Varsity—David Lloyd

BEARDSLEY...
...the big push

By LINDA McQUAIG

Spadina riding has long been recognized as fertile ground for the NDP.

With its heavily immigrant, working class and student population, it is an area where a sense of individual powerlessness can easily lead to sympathy for a platform of greater local autonomy.

And it is to this sentiment that NDP candidate Bob Beardsley is appealing.

As a founding member and former chairman of the Sussex Area Residents' Association, and as co-ordinator this year of SEED, a democratically-run free school, Beardsley has long been an advocate of greater local autonomy and more active citizen participation in all levels of government.

It is the stress the NDP lays on this as much as its actual policies, that attracts him to the party, Beardsley says.

This has left him open to the criticism that he is more interested in the mechanics of power than in ideology. He says this is a fair judgment.

He would support, for example, parents running schools even in cases where they opt for a more authoritarian approach to education than he personally favors.

As co-ordinator of SEED, Beardsley has left almost total control in the hands of the students, calling them together with staff for formulating policy, even in the traditionally taboo area of budgetting.

His belief in individual participation and dissent led him to tolerate, if not sympathize with the left-wing nationalist Waffle faction within the party, and to oppose its expulsion from the provincial NDP in June.

Although he claims to support some of their aims, he criticized the Waffle for being too narrow in scope. He also says that although he would like to see nationalization of resource industries, he could not support wholesale nationalization as the Waffle suggests.

He claims he does feel strongly, however, about foreign ownership, and feels this has been understood in the NDP campaign, although he blames much of this on the press.

At the NDP leadership convention in 1971, Beardsley supported middle-of-the-road candidate John Harney. After Harney's elimination, Beardsley backed Waffle leader James Laxer rather than David Lewis, although he says he supports Lewis as national leader now.

Beardsley sees the sense of powerlessness of the people in his riding as one of his major problems in getting elected. They vote Liberal because they associate it with government, and government with authority, he says.

"But a lot of people are turning to us because they say they've tried Liberal and they've tried Conservative and don't find there's much difference," he said in an interview this week.

The immigration of Ugandan Asians is a major worry to many of his constituents who fear they will face tougher competition on the job market, he says.

Beardsley, who supports the immigration, tries to convince residents in Spadina that their jobs would not be in jeopardy since most of the Ugandans are shopkeepers by trade.

He maintains, however, that too large an immigration would not benefit the immigrants themselves, since "they would be forced into doing low-level jobs."

He attacked Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau for his "arrogance" in suggesting Ugandans could take jobs too unpleasant for Canadians.

Although Beardsley has tried unsuccessfully to capture the Spadina seat as the NDP candidate four times before, he is considered to have fairly good chances this time round in the tight three-way competition.

The riding is difficult to predict since former Liberal Perry Ryan who has held the seat since 1962 this year is now running as a Conservative.

Beardsley, however, has been building support at the grassroots level for years. Whereas he saw his earlier attempts as throw-aways to establish the NDP in the riding, he is campaigning seriously and thinks his chances are good.

In his belief that a community should control its own fate and not be at the mercy of developers, Beardsley says he would ideally like to see all land publicly owned so that there could be no land speculation. Residents would own their homes, but control of the land would rest with the neighbourhood.

"There is just not enough land for people to own it privately," Beardsley said.

He also favors plans to rehabilitate established neighbourhoods with government grants and low-interest loans. He says he was impressed with a Liberal bill advocating this policy earlier this year. The bill died with the end of the session of Parliament.

Beardsley says that he does not have an answer to every problem. In fact, he says he would like to look to the academic community for some answers.

"I'm not one to formulate policy," he says, seeing his strength instead in pressing for greater dialogue, and encouraging a sense of power in the individual.

Whereas Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau recently compared himself to a coach of a hockey team, and U.S. president Richard Nixon describes himself as a quarterback, Beardsley sees himself as a "referee".

Communist forces the issues

By GREG McMASTER

The Communist Party of Canada is forcing the other parties to deal with the issues in Spadina riding, says CPC candidate Maggie Bizzell.

The major thrust of her party's program is aimed against what she calls the stranglehold held on this country by both Canadian and American monopolies. Liberal and Conservative candidates "have absolutely no idea what the hell's going on" about the issue of Canadian independence, she charges.

The Communist Party supports the election of a large "progressive bloc" of Communists and New Democrats which would be a step towards a coalition government of anti-monopoly forces, says Bizzell.

While the NDP position demonstrates lack of understanding of Canadian independence, failing to call for government control to get at the structure of monopolies, she says her presence in the Spadina race has forced NDP candidate Bob Beardsley towards a more militant position than that of the NDP leadership.

Conservative Perry Ryan changes his position "depending where he's speaking", and Liberal Peter Stollery is absolutely nowhere on the issue, Bizzell charges.

Bizzell, who has worked with the underground Communist Party of South Africa, is not running on a personality basis, but rather on the strongly issue-oriented, CP platform.

She defends it from leftist critics who call it too social democratic, saying that Lenin warned communists to properly analyze the stage of struggle at any one time. She says the majority of the people of Canada believe in the electoral process, although communists must engage in extra-parliamentary work at the same time.

The Varsity—David Lloyd

...a progressive bloc

Rather than ideological opposition to all capitalism, and repudiation of the traditionally anti-communist, social-democratic NDP, she predicts that "there will be socialism in Canada" with the help of a coalition anti-monopoly government which will "eat away at the power of the bourgeoisie, both U.S. and Canadian".

She attacked the rival Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) for an "unbelievably idealistic platform", for having no contact with any broader people's movements and for being unclear about why they are running.

Addressing herself to the university, she said that "students are going to have to fight like hell against the cutbacks", and she supported the upcoming demonstration against this year's fee increases.

She added that as many students must be involved as possible in the stop-the-cutbacks campaign, and criticized the Trotskyist student council at Trent University for successfully campaigning against a fee strike and for a mass demonstration. The Trent students felt a fee strike could be against students' own interests, a position which Bizzell calls divisive in view of other campuses' support of the proposed fees strike.

Bizzell comes out strongly for extra-parliamentary action to advance the liberation of women, saying "we totally support independent women's movements". However, she added, working class women have been absent from such movements.

She said that Kay Macpherson, running as an independent in St. Paul's on a women's rights platform, would have been wiser to run for the NDP.

She criticizes other independent women's candidates for denying the need for women to relate to working class issues and to the questions of Quebec and Vietnam.

Bizzell said that self-determination for Quebec and Vietnam should be important election issues, and claimed she was the only person to raise them in all-candidates meetings in Spadina.

The Communist Party platform includes calls for a freely negotiated new confederal pact between Quebec and English Canada, for recognition of the Provisional Revolutionary Government of South Vietnam, for free post-secondary education and for women's economic equality. The party also proposes laws against strikebreaking, nationalization of monopolies, banks and the CPR, and equal rights for native people.

Bizzell's campaign literature calls for land owned by developers in Spadina riding to be expropriated and used for low-low-cost housing.

Bizzell claims her campaign in Spadina is costing $1000, in contrast to her estimate of $40,000 being spent by Ryan, the Progressive Conservative candidate.

A spokesman for Ryan said his campaign is costing between $20,000 and $25,000.

Votegetting unimportant to maoists

By ELAINE FARRAGHER

A party which considers elections a "sham perpetrated by the ruling class" is running a candidate in Spadina in the federal election Monday.

The Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist), which in past has told voters "Don't vote, they're all the same," is this time running Mitchell Bornstein for the seat now held by Conservative Perry Ryan.

Bornstein, a U of T graduate student, explains his candidacy is a result of his party's increased maturity gained from past experience.

But CPC (M-L) is not running a typical win-the-election campaign.

"At this stage we can use the electoral system against the capitalist class" says Bornstein. He argues that the other parties have set themselves up as leaders who know the solution to Canada's problems, "but how can the parties who helped cause the problem possibly provide a solution?"

Bornstein says that these parties are "attacking the people" through the elections so his party must use the electoral system as a forum from which to expose the true nature of these parties to the people.

Bornstein says that his party does not wish to give the people "more electoral illusions". He claims his party is not out to get votes since electing a CPC (M-L) government would do nothing towards liberating the people of Canada.

"The people must take their destiny into their own hands and overthrow the capitalist system," says Bornstein. "The party cannot do it for them."

Thus the thrust of Bornstein's campaign is towards educating the people about the source of their oppression; the monopoly capitalists.

CPC (M-L) campaign literature stresses this: "The monopoly capitalist class forms the ruling class of Canada and Quebec. The majority of the ruling class are the lackeys of the foreign imperialists especially the U.S. imperialists. Without the overthrow of this moribund and backward class there can be no genuine peace, harmony and order amongst the working people of Canada and Quebec..."

Bornstein says that not only does he not expect to get many votes, he does not consider that important.

...a final four for Spadina election

The Varsity—Bob Bornstein

BORNSTEIN...
...education about oppression

"The consciousness of the workers is the consciousness of the ruling class after years of propagandizing," he says. Thus he predicts the workers will not vote for a communist party.

"But at the same time the sentiment of the workers is for change," he says. "For 105 years these parties have not provided change and they are not going to in the future."

CPC (M-L) campaign literature includes "The Communist Manifesto for the Federal Elections", which contains 13 "revolutionary struggles". They say that a vote for CPC (M-L) is not a vote to elect them to a parliament which they consider to be anti-democratic, but a vote "to develop the 13 basic revolutionary struggles."

The CPC (M-L) is running 52 candidates across Canada, including two from the Partisan Party in Vancouver and 18 in the Toronto area. The campaign, and the $200 deposit each candidate must forfeit if he or she wins less than half the winning candidates' vote, is being financed by the CPC (M-L) candidates themselves and by friends and supporters, Bornstein says.

The party's campaign has not been well received by the established press. Bornstein asserts that the CPC (M-L)'s platform is either ignored or distorted by the media.

Law enforcement agencies, however, are paying some attention to the party's campaign. Bornstein says that the party has been harassed by police, with three CPC (M-L) members and 30 supporters being arrested since the campaign began.

Rochdale PhD runs on freedom

"freedom". This may be a reference to his recent arrest on a charge of possession of marijuana. The case comes up in court next week.

Syd Stern, the independent candidate for the KNOW Party in Spadina, says in a press release that he is not running for Parliament. He is walking.

The holder of a PhD from Rochdale College, Stern claims that he, unlike most other Rochdale degree-holders, earned his degree through study.

Rochdale PhD's are available normally for $100.

At a press conference last Friday, Stern stood around chatting with friends and members of the press, in a haze of marijuana smoke. When a photographer from The Star arrived, Stern requested that his picture be taken along with two good-looking females. When asked if they were his harem, he replied "No, I'm theirs."

Mackasey denies calling Meszaros red spy

OTTAWA (CUP) — Manpower and Immigration Minister Bryce Mackasey today denied he called marxist scholar Istvan Meszaros a Russian spy.

He again refused to elaborate on the charge that Meszaros is a security risk.

Mackasey was speaking during an interview on CBC radio.

He had earlier been reported as having told two reporters that Meszaros was a Russian spy, but the two newsmen later denied the story.

Mackasey spent as much time as he could on the interview repeating the denial. He claimed it was the "central issue" in the Meszaros dispute.

The Hungarian-born Meszaros was rejected by Canadian authorities when he applied for landed immigrant status last June, after accepting a teaching post at York University.

He is now in Canada where he applied a second time, but the Trudeau government is trying to have him deported.

Mackasey said he had been willing to go to England where Meszaros has been teaching, to check the security report.

"But this unexpected complication arose," Mackasey said, referring to Meszaros' arrival in Canada. He implied he refused to review the case while the professor was in Canada.

"I was prepared to let him stay here for a year because of the excellent representations made on his behalf by members of the academic community for whom I have the greatest respect," he said.

"I don't particularly care if he's a marxist scholar. That's a question of philosophy."

Student power good (sort of): professor

By LINDA HALL

University hierarchies should be broken down, although academic tenure retained as a right, says the former chairman of the American Political Science Association.

Speaking on academic freedom at a meeting sponsored by the Political Economy Course Union Wednesday, U of T professor Christian Bay said tenure provides "enclaves in which progressive people are protected".

"My own position is in support of tenure, not as a privilege, but as a right", he said. As a corollary, he supported "tenure for everyone in the sense of a guaranteed annual income."

Academic freedom for the student requires that education be seen as human relations, Bay said. Education should "make the student more fully individual" in the sense of being "responsible to human values that the individual comes to choose freely," he said.

The academic freedom of the student depends on the academic freedom of the faculty to adopt this "subversive approach to education" Bay suggested.

Stating that "hierarchy is incompatible with education", Bay called for a "beginning of mutuality" so that decisions could be made jointly by students and teachers.

However, he made the evaluation of students' academic performance an exception to joint decision-making. "I want to be able to pass judgment without being accountable to anyone else" he said.

Bay rejected the validity of faculty-student parity and one man, one vote decision-making as causing students and faculty to vote each other down in blocks.

Bay said that faculty members "should not be so concerned with protecting their status".

'Corporate bums': populist muckraking

Louder Voices: The Corporate Welfare Bums, by David Lewis. James Lewis & Samuel, $1.95.

Most people go from the credle to the grave thinking that the welfare state is about the money they pay in taxes and reap from Mothers Allowance, Ontario Health Insurance Plan and Unemployment Insurance. They think of the welfare state as something approaching the golden rule, applied by advanced social workers and sophisticated Keynesian economists. But somehow, it seems, the golden rule concept of the welfare state has been distorted to mean: "he who has the gold, makes the rules". Somehow, while millions applaud or jeer at the obvious manifestations of the welfare state like Local Initiatives Program or unemployment insurance, others have been silently manipulating the real levers of the welfare state.

Like the proverbial silent hog of western folklore — the silent hog that eats the swill — certain people with strategic locations in the Canadian economy have been quietly gorging on the advanced social work notions of the people who run the federal government's economic development programs.

These are the people that Trudeau refers to as the "vested interests", noting that: "I suppose in participatory democracy there will always be some whose voice is louder than others." These are the people that David Lewis has been slingshotting with the rather unpleasant turn of phrase-Corporate Welfare Bums.

In one of the best contributions to Canadian muckraking since Gustavus Myers' expose, The History of Canadian Wealth, Lewis wades his way through an alphabet soup of government agencies and peers through the loopholes of the Canadian tax structure to reveal a ripoff of unprecedented artistry.

Acting as the James Bond of the NDP set, he has been travelling across the country uncovering a Who's Who of Canadian corporate villains who are ripping off the Canadian taxpayer through enormous grants and tax concessions. The extractive industries are extracting grants, the land developers are enveloped in them and the industrial capitalists are capitalizing on them. This book brings together the information he has been making headlines with over the past months.

In terms of the major polemics his attacks have set off, the book seems to stand quite firmly. Lewis particularly takes issue with what he calls the blackmail approach of Liberal cabinet ministers who argue that the government is making offers it can't refuse. Both Turner and Shep have been adamant in insisting that whole industries and towns would be put on the welfare rolls if it were not for government subsidies to free enterprise.

Lewis is convincing on the point that these grants are responsible for exporting unemployment to other areas rather than eliminating it. Given the chaotic pattern of the handouts, grants are often extended to industries whose markets are already saturated. As a result of this market saturation, the infusion of grants for new plants is, as often is not, responsible for a decline in employment on an industry wide level.

In other cases, government grants are going to industries which are capital rather than labour intensive. Thus it came to pass that three million dollars in grants to the textile industry was responsible for the creation of 451 new jobs and the loss, through technological unemployment, of 450 old ones! In short, the job argument is hardly an adequate defense of current government policy.

In the broadest sense, the basic philosophy of David Lewis also stands up to its opponents. The Star, in its search for a rationale to oppose the NDP, has argued that Lewis' attacks violate a basic principle of social democracy-government intervention in the economy. In response, government assisted industries had actually been influenced on their location decisions by government largesse. The Financial Post's Philip Mathies, in his book Forced Growth, also provides case studies of how ineffective tunding led to forced growth, orchestrated by the sour notes of poor decisions, enormous distortions of economic logic and human waste and despair. Finally one of the government's own, Boris Celovsky, deserted his job with DREE (Dept. Regional Economic Expansion), taking ample evidence of government decisions with him to his new job as NDP research director.

This is the hard side of the Lewis pedigree: a side which reflects disenchantment with the technical-economic viability of the government's strategy for economic growth. It is a side of his argument which attempts to encompass dissident but farsighted sections of the capitalist class.

Lewis clarifies his own definition, one that is basic to social democracy as opposed to state capitalism: "Welfare is for the needy, not big and wealthy multinational corporations."

But for David Lewis, who until recently has been sharpening his lance against the Waffle dragons in his own party, there are certain limits to the analysis and solutions he proposes. Although the issue is somewhat of an echo of the old Waffle voices, Lewis draws his major inspiration from Eric Kierens, whose recent conversion to the NDP is essentially a pet on the back for plagiarism well done.

Kierens presented many of the essentials for the book in his June, 1971 speech to the Canadian Economic Association's meeting at St. John. He attacked the distortions of the economy, the stimulants to American investment, the inflationary direction and increase in personal income tax; all of which were related to the government's carefree grant policies.

The pedigrees for the book also include David Springate whose Harvard PhD thesis concluded that only one-third of 31

There is also the "soft" side of the book (to borrow a term from Richard Hofstadter), a dimension which draws more from traditions of which the NDP is the inheritor. Government economic policy has been traditionally judged not only in terms of hard economic critiques of investment patterns and growth mechanisms. It has also been judged as part of a larger morality play whereby "the interests" fatten off the people.

Yes, these "interests" have always been with us, even in Canada. They were with us in the days William Lyon Mackenzie denounced the Family Compact. They were with us in the days the Canadian people paid for the fortunes of the railroads. They were with us in the days when tariff walls were raised to protect the inefficiencies and profits of Canadian manufacturers and to draw in American branch plants. "Protection whereby industry leans on the people", was how Edward Poriff put it in one hardhitting book at the turn of the century. It was with us when militant farmers lashed out at the CPR monopoly. It was with us in the 1930's when the CCF brain trust was striking out at Canada's "50 Big Shots", doing research that left David Lewis free to elaborate a hard strategy for building a socialist movement on the basis of the trade unions.

It is this tradition which gives the book its hard-hitting character. It is this tradition which is best revealed in the chapter on Sudbury: "One City — Two Worlds", the city of the working people and the city of the fat cats.

But to transcend the level of a morality play, it will be necessary for Lewis to integrate analysis with a plea for justice. He admits, for instance, that he has "barely explored the edges of the complex interrelationship between government and the corporate sector. There is so much more to discover."

In his policy recommendations, he is sometimes reduced, as he puts it in his one concession to bilingualism, to a position of "reculer pour mieux sauter".

It is possible to see poor planning as the source of many of the government's policies. But is it more than an error of judgement that grants end tax allowances favor capital rather than labor intensive industries? Or is it possible that this is inherent in advanced capitalist countries, where individual capitalists are forced to pass the costs of renewing rapidly obsolescent plants onto the public? This is the opinion of internationally respected Marxist economist Ernest Mandel. Mandel distinguishes between state aid to industry in developing capitalist countries and state aid under mature capitalism: "the former is the forceps which facilitates birth; the second is the scalpel which removes a tumour that reappears with disturbing regularity."

It would also be worthwhile for Lewis to consider other dimensions of the corporate rip-off. Aside from taxes, corporations also have a built-in rip-off of their work force — the extraction of surplus value — which comes to them in the form of profit. This is a far more fundamental characteristic of capitalism than the tax dodge. Secondly, capitalism has a tendency to arrange social and economic priorities in a way that benefits profits rather than human needs.

Both of these aspects of the corporate rip-off are neglected in Lewis' analysis. "The government must dare to go it alone," he writes, "where private capital is unwilling to move in without large-scale handouts from the public treasury. Crown corporations are not only the most suitable instrument of achieving social goals in many areas; they are just as capable of competing in domestic and foreign markets as any private corporation."

This concession to the socialist logic of his attack derives from the major dynamism of the book. It is a book which whets the appetite for more information and invites the search for alternatives to current government policy. Of the various instant books being put out for the election, this is one of the few that does that.

Arch-bigot turns unloveable

Bunkers keep ramming the old message home

The Bunkers have become a North American institution. The thing about institutions is that they are rather remote, quite respectable — and they take themselves very seriously. There was a furor over All in the Family when it first crept into prime time in the dead of winter two years ago, a replacement for some vapid show that failed. It was a move of desperation; nobody at CBS thought that the series would catch on. The best they hoped for was that it would quietly finish out the season without "alienating" too many viewers.

That barren season when it arrived on our screens, it was a breeding, geriatric breath of life amidst all those impeccably sanitary, genteel families with a missing parent and microscopic moral dilemmas (a perennial one is that some sugary eight-year-old is inconsolably broken-hearted because daddy told a fib or broke a promise). Edith and Archie were so startling because they actually looked and talked like a real family. They were a little broad, yes, but they started from something genuine and familiar. They even lived in a dump, a duplex where things didn't get fixed and you could hear the toilet flushing all through the house. Everybody loved them.

But the furies descended. Professional anti-bigots like Laura Z. Hobson (who wrote Gentleman's Agreement twenty years ago) came out of seclusion to denounce the show in the New York Times. They were incensed; up comes television, which nobody takes seriously, and steals their thunder. The gell. Bigotry should not be made attractive, they maintain, people will follow Archie's example. If he's a bigot, he must also be a scoundrel, and a miserable one to boot.

The fact is that there are nice people and kind people who are bigots. Their bigotry is deplorable, of course, but it is not usually symptomatic of a cancerous soul. What Hobson and the rest want is the sort of tidy morality-play where wrongdoing is unfailingly punished — like the operas where courtesans died of consumption as if this were particularly efficient venereal disease. In other words, TV could deal with bigotry if they were artistically dishonest about it.

But now All in the Family is the biggest thing to hit TV since Bonanza, and if anything is true in the American way of life, it is that success equals respectability. It's a show tops the Nielsen ratings and gets Time cover stories, well then, it can't be controversial, can it? Not in any potentially dangerous way, at any rate. The "dingbats" and "meatheads" fly about, now as wholesomely patriotic as "America the Beautiful". Even President Nixon watches Archie, presumably to get ideas he can pass onto Spiro's speechwriters.

The paradox is that All in the Family has gotten steadily worse. Norman Lear, the producer, couldn't leave well-enough alone. They attributed the show's popularity (which they probably called notoriety) to the "satira" while it succeeded almost wholly as a tongue-in-cheek comedy-drama about blue-collar life. The political, racial and sexual howlers were howlers not because of their cutting-edge, but because they were so novel to TV screens (though so utterly familiar to the people who watched TV).

So Lear and company kept ramming their lessons home and to hell with the domesticity. Instead of the hit-and-run attacks on social clichés, Archie and crew were marshaled week after week to battle for enlightenment: liberal style. The Bunker household now grapples with society's problems more frequently than does the House of Representatives or Nixon's cabinet.

What is wrong is that in the eagerness to cover every damn issue, the upstairs gang has forgotten all about consistency. Archie used to call the president "tricky Dicky" — a renk-and-illa democrat's catchphrase. But as the series advanced, and the scriptwriters nudged Archie further to the right (it makes everything so much tidier that way) he became a fervent Nixon man. Not just the shallow opportunist who supports whoever's in office, either. In one episode, Archie is revealed not to have voted in '68, despite his protests that he did too vote for Nixon. Edith reminds him that he voted for "the Kennedy Nixon, not the Humphrey Nixon". Now Archie, a dyed-in-the-wool union man, is as unlikely a Republican as he is a civil libertarian. And when was he calling the guy tricky Dicky? Back in 1952? If Archie ever switched allegiance it would have been to vote for the General. Only affluent Hollywood liberals could make this sort of blunder.

Or there's gun control, which Archie defends in reply to a TV editorial. The Bunkers are city folk to their bones, and gun control proponents are usually country boys, or a generation or so away. And if the availability of firearms is anywhere acknowledged to be related to crime in the streets, it's in New York City.

But even if we grant Archie an aberration on this one issue, it's hardly likely that he would hit himself out to a television studio to broadcast his views. Archie, after all, is painted with a craven stripe; he has that astute sense of camouflage and self-preservation common to his kind. Real-life Archies don't fall into dangerous tiffs by bawoing before they've scouted out the enemy. This Mr. Bunker, for the sake of an easy laugh, is reduced to a blithering dolt, numb to hostile vibrations. He wouldn't have lasted long in New York City, that way.

Archie, we all know, is a WASP — But how seldom is Protestantism mentioned. Whenever the script needs religious humour and/or relevance, there is some pretext to drag in a Catholic. (Last week Edith went off to consult a priest rather than talk to her own minister.) Perhaps the writers consider Protestant clergy too bland to give snappy lines to; or more likely, Catholicism has shaped up as the blue-collar, pro-Nixon religion recently, and it was too late to change Archie.

Edith is distorted, too. This poor, factless woman is not allowed to have one tiny little vice. Now and then she parrots one of her husband's inanities, only to reverse her stand as soon as the wrongness of it is pointed out to her by Gloria or Mike (who hand out a straight, if simple-minded, liberal line). She's wonderful to watch, but we don't for a minute believe she exists. (Penelope Gilliat wrote that she seems to belong more to a TV studio than a street; how true). Extraordinarily incurious about what goes on beyond her doorstep (and I don't mean Vietnam or bussing, I mean the street's scandal and scuttlebutt), masochistically subservient to her husband (who exploits her like a coolie) Edith is a caricature of a middle-class Queen's housewife so appallingly misaccented as to make her battling hollow.

Ask almost anyone to name their favorite episode and "Edith's problem" will be your answer. This episode won an Emmy last Spring, and the producers (no doubt) pruned themselves that their "daring" paid off and ran home to think up more taboos to shatter. What they wouldn't realize is that Edith's problem — menopause — was hardly as shocking as the fact that in this one episode Edith screams back at Archie; for those thirty minutes she had stepped gloriously down from her doty saintliness.

It doesn't seem that the producers much care about anything but the message and the jolts anymore. As long as they have a hot issue to put in the mouths of the cast, and a few bawdy zingers to spice things up, no matter about honesty, or plausibility, or even a sense of fairness to the characters they have created.

And in the process they have sold out (unwittingly or no?) to the sour moralizers. In their lust to move up from comedy to "satire" they lost sight of entertainment. So that nobody will miss the point of their little parables, they have turned Archie into a crabbed, miserly curmudgeon; they've even deprived him of the comfort of his family, which even men worse than bigots enjoy. Laura Hobson should be happy; the message is finally coming through.

The all-American culture

Elvis Presley in 'G.I. Blues': The halcyon days of the fifties: 'Doin' the beat I can'.

In a few days, most of you reading this will vote for Pierre Trudeau. I do not mention that with any thought of swaying you: I don't care who you vote for as long as it is not for me. I vote crank myself, and will probably go Communist this time, just to keep the RCMP a bit paranoid and on their toes. I introduce Trudeau's re-election—your support for him—because that is the pivotal thing for a real, gut understanding of the blacklist, of McCarthyism, and of fifties culture. And, that is a sizeable chunk out of understanding ourselves.

Jim Harding at one time pointed out that there were two (English) Canadian cultures, a Canadian one, northern, rural and agricultural; and, superimposed on it, an American one, urban, seasonless, and monopoly-capitalistic. His point at the time was to remind us that the pure Canadian culture really did exist. Now, the pendulum has swung a bit, and my point is to remind you that the American one exists too, as a bona fide Canadian way of life. It is the culture I grew up in. I preferred the American Howdy-Doody with Buffalo Bob to the Canadian one with Timber Tom. I craved Snickers and Three Musketeers (cultural domination), but they were not available (isolationism). (As an aside, Snickers and Three Musketeers are now available (Imperialism), but I no longer want them (anti-imperialism).)

My afternoon cartoons were pre-empted by the army-McCarthy hearings, no fun to watch, just as, a generation later, the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) was pre-empted by the cartoons of Abbie Hoffman and Gerry Rubin.

In between Tom and Jerry and Abbie and Jerry was the quarter-century of HUAC's heyday, a stolid, unjoyful, powerfully effective institution that created and was created by a stolid, unjoyful, and powerfully effective culture. It is now standard, since it is now safe, to look at HUAC as a side-show, but as Eric Bentley points out, the purpose of the side-show is to lure people into the main tent. We have been pulled in: you and I, our sexuality, our ideology, our music, our dancing, our patterns of thought, even our plans for escape.

MR. ICHORD: Mr. Counsel, the chair has just received a message from Mr. Gutman relaying a request of Mr. Rubin to be permitted into the hearing room. The chair has been informed that Mr. Rubin is attired in a Santa Claus costume. It is not the purpose of the chair to direct that Mr. Rubin attire himself in a certain manner or take other actions in regards to his body, but it is the responsibility of the chair to maintain order in these hearings. The chair has exercised its prerogative of excluding, and I have so instructed the police to exclude Mr. Rubin from the hearing room, because it is the determination of the chair that such a dress could only add to the possibilities of disorder.

— HUAC Hearing, Dec. 4, 1968.

The sixties' culture, the counter-culture, contrasts mightily with the dominant culture. The counter-culture is Dionysian, colourful and reckless. The parent culture is thrifty. On the one hand there is the orgy, and on the other, the cadet corps, on the one, the head shop and on the other the shopping plaza. The one, Like a Rolling Stone, the other, Tea for Two. It is easy to trace the roots of the counter-culture, from Baba Ram Dass back to Leary, back to Mr. Wizard — salvation through technology: from the Stones through the Beatles back to Elvis — rhythm and release; from the new Old Left to the old New Left and back to Holden Caulfield, James Dean, and Marlon Brando as The Wild One: "What are you rebelling against?"

"Whadaya got?"

The counter-culture is at base effusive ("when you got nothin' you got nothin' to lose"). The parent culture is retentive: of family, prestige, authority and property. And, retentive in culture, retentive in politics, anal in politics, anal in culture. I do not compose this as idle theory. Test it. Turn your body-awareness to your anus. Is it tighter than it needs to be? Can you relax it a bit? It is the purpose of this writing to trace that tension back to the ass-holes on HUAC.

MR. JACKSON: Mr. Chairman, may I say that I can think of no greater way to parade one's political beliefs than to appear under the auspices of Malnstream, a Communist publication...

MR. MOSTEL: I appreciate your opinion very much, but I do want to say that — I don't know, you know — I still stand on my grounds, and maybe it is unwise and unpolitic of me to say this. It appeared there what if I did an imitation of a butterfly at rest? There is no crime in making anybody laugh. I don't care if you laugh at me.

MR. JACKSON: If you interpretation of a butterfly at rest brought any money into the coffers of the Communist Party, you contributed directly to the propaganda effort of the Communist Party.

MR. MOSTEL: Suppose I had the urge to do the butterfly at rest somewhere.

MR. DOYLE: Yea, but please, when you have the urge, don't have such an urge to put the butterfly at rest by putting money in the Communist Party coffers as a result of that urge to put the butterfly at rest.

— HUAC Hearing, Oct. 14, 1955.

America, including urban Canada is a nation of merchandizers. Long Island was "bought" from the Indians, a transaction of equal validity to signing over the rights to the sun. The intolerable Acts that brought on the American Revolution were largely intolerable to the colonial merchants. And so on. In Toronto, the stain-glass mural requisitioned by the city elders is of The Marriage of Commerce and Industry (in which Industry got Fucked). Only in the last few years have non-property owners been enfranchised for Toronto elections. Property ownership is the cornerstone of the temple; "Private Property, No Trespassing" the inscription.

The temple has been periodically threatened ever since it replaced feudalism. But the French Revolution was more for property than against it. The (relatively) universal franchise turned out to be more of a technicality, as did women's suffrage. The cooperative movement never really caught on. And even the union challenge, after a long bloody struggle, relaxed into the A.F. of L., and the status quo. But Russia, China and various little places actually fell to Communism, and the holdings of the elders were actually taken away.

U.S. may have avoided a Japanese or Russian, might someone say anything about assumptions different from the spell, one often gets paranoid. Laing's alternative to paranoia when it is Laing writes, "have persecuted."

This, not totalitarianism, purges and occupations is the source of American anti-Communism. Russia fell in 1917 and the Palmer raids began in America in 1920. The depression raised the spectre and fear of American Communism well before the knowledge of Stalinist cruelties. That it is credited the other way round is anachronism, just as it is hind-sight that pretends that the Second World War was fought to stop the German extermination camps. I do not deny either set of atrocities, I merely point out that they were not causal in the way it is now claimed.

The New Deal — limited interference with private ownership of industry — was the American alternative to Communism, and even it was loudly decried as "Communist". HUAC was formed by New Deal critics, and the Committee began its public hearings in 1938 with a successful attack on one of the New Deal programs, the Federal Theatre Project. It was an appropriate beginning, since the Committee's prime target was always to be the means of moulding public culture. The Committee was terribly successful. The means of retention squeezed tighter.

that is what we grew up to. The movies

—HUAC Hearing, Dec. 3, 1988.

The halcyon days of 1968. The nice thing about Bentley's thousand pages of HUAC excerpts and memorabilia is that it ends on such an up-beat. One passes through the years of fear until there is Mark Rhoedes answering, "Were you ever, or are you now, a Communist" with "I certainly am!" (This is not meant as a criticism of the more timidly responding Hollywood Ten, of Seeger, Miller, Mostel; it would be foolish to try and interpret courage across time and cultures.) But unfortunately, the up-beat is a function of publication date and not of history. The war goes on. According to a
bombing, 35% oppose and the rest are undecided. McGovern loses supporters daily. (Incidentally, McGovern has written the introduction to another recent book on HUAC, Robert Vaughn's Only Victims. After several readings, I still cannot understand how McGovern managed to say nothing at all.)

That is why I began with my assumption that you will vote Trudeau. It has been only two years since The War Measures Act.
The parallels to McCarthyism are unavoidable: the government announced, and the press accepted, the existence of a conspiracy against the government.

Because of this, measures had to be taken.
Like McCarthy's 57 Communists in the State Department, no conspiracy was ever unearthed. In the meantime people were jailed without evidence or trial; it became illegal to have been something that used to be legal; it became a crime to shelter kin.
The leading oppositional spokesman in Quebec were jailed for months, though later acquitted of all charges. Montreal's FRAP urban reform party was smeared, some of its candidates jailed, and Mayor Drapeau's party swept to re-election. The remaining opposition was called by the old McCarthyist term "bleeding-heart liberals".
The press was hysterical, and internal and external censorship was imposed. A producer friend at CBC was not allowed to air an interview with jailed singer Paulene Julien. The Varsity was censored by its printer, fearing that the government would confiscate its presses. Etc.

I remember thinking at the time that they had gone too far and it would be obvious.
Then the polls were announced: 88% in favour. (To be fair, Quebec has shown itself to be much more aware of what was going on than English Canada.) Two years and all the evidence later, it appears that Trudeau is in for a cake-walk on Monday.

So I do not share Tom Hayden's 1968 optimism, although I find some hope and a good deal of joy in the alternate culture. I do not believe that a knowledge of history makes reliving it any less likely. I believe a

Engineering: learning how but not why

Prologue:

Andrea: The fear of death is human.

Galileo: Even the Church will teach you that to be weak is not human. It is just evil.

Andrea: The Church, yes! But science is not concerned with our weaknesses.

Galileo: No? My dear Serti, in spite of my present convictions I may be able to give you a few pointers as to the concerns of your chosen profession. In my spare time, I happen to have gone over this case. I have spare time. Even a man who sells wool, however good he is at buying wool cheap and selling it dear, must be concerned with the standing of the wool trade. The practice of science would seem to call for valour. She trades in knowledge, which is the product of doubt. And this new art has enchanted the public. The plight of the multitude is as old as the rocks, and is believed to be as basic as the rocks. But now they have learned to doubt. They snatched the telescopes out of our hands and had them trained on their tormentors: prince, official, public moralist. The mechanism of the heavens was clearer, the mechanism of their courts was still murky. The battle to measure the heavens is won by doubt; by credulity the Roman housewife's battle for milk will always be lost. Word is passed down that this is of no concern to the scientist, who is told he will only release such of his findings as do not disturb the peace, that is, the peace of mind of the well-to-do. Threats and bribes fill the air. Can the scientist hold out on the numbers? For what reason do you labour? I take it that the intent of science is to ease human existence. If you give away to coercion, science can be crippled, and your new machines may simply suggest new drudgeries. Should you, then, in time discover all there is to be discovered, your progress must become a progress away from the bulk of humanity. The gulf might even grow so wide that the sound of your cheering at some new achievement would be echoed by a universal howl of horror. As a scientist, I had an almost unique opportunity. In my day, astronomy emerged into the market place. At that particular time, had one man put up a fight, it could have had wide repercussions. I have come to believe that I was never in any real danger; for some years I was as strong as the authorities, and I surrendered my knowledge to the powers that be, to use it, no, not use it, abuse it, as suits their ends. I have not betrayed my profession. Any man who does what I have done must not be tolerated in the ranks of science.

"Out of fear of creating men... who would refuse to submit to the discipline of a too narrow task and to the industrial hierarchy the effort has been made to stunt them from the beginning. They were designed to be competent but limited, active but docile, intelligent but ignorant of anything outside their function, incapable of having a horizon beyond that of their task."

Andre Gorz, 1967

Engineers feel threatened by radical ideas, radical politics and radical people. Towards such people an engineer is truculently silent or defensive and, if pushed, actively reactionary attitudes of engineers, must be understood. To become angry and accuse them of criminal immorality in designing and manufacturing napalm is like attacking blacks for living in a ghetto.

The student who enters a university engineering school has already behind him roughly half a dozen years of "engineering-type" training. He has shown an ability for mathematics and sciences earlier, and has gone through the mathematics-sciences-engineering stream in high school. Here, he first encountered the attitude that problems can essentially be solved with a slide rule and the proper handbook, that history, languages and the like are simply exercises for the brain and not really very useful. This disdain for the arts is reinforced into a fine contempt during the first year at university through "bending together to fight the artsmen" organizations and revelling in the fraternal spirit of being an engineer.

Knowing little about what working engineers actually do, engineering students generally accept the dry courses, solve the never-ending problems, and perform the drudgery of non-creative labs. They place faith in the myth that they are preparing themselves to take up their rightful positions in the "technostructure", which is to be the kingpin of our technical society. Although they cannot quite see what the use of a certain course might be, somebody "up there" says it's required and he obviously knows more about it, so...

This mis-education is a means to an end, however. The report of the Goals Committee of the American Society-for Engineering Education states, "The primary goal of engineering education is to prepare the student, ideologically, for constructive participation in a competitive, profit-motivated economy..."

Thus, when a radical demands of an engineer a human use of technology, he demands something alien to the engineer's experience. Further, when the capitalist system is threatened the engineer perceives a threat to technology and his supposed freedom to function within that technology. An engineer feels that a request that he make some judgements about how to use technology is not a viable question to ask. He has been taught that what can be done should be done because that's how we progress, so... on to Mars!

He has been presented with nothing but the use of technology inside a capitalistic profit-seeking frame of reference, and an attack on that frame of reference becomes an attack on his whole conception of how technology and he as a technologist function. Remove that system, remove his profits, his authoritarian work situation and his concomitant ability to shrug off decisions as to how to employ his skills; remove his profits, his authoritarian work situation and his concomitant ability to shrug off decisions as to how to employ his skills; remove his neat little barriers between science and humanism; and you negate the only career and identity of which he can perceive. So, of course, he is hostile.

But, how can such a horrid situation exist in engineering education within a university? The 1968 report of the Cox Commission on Columbia University says, "A university is essentially a free community of scholars dedicated to the pursuit of truth and knowledge solely through reason and civility."

While this is not quite the way things really are within the university, engineering training is the field furthest removed from this traditional "pursuit of truth and knowledge." (It might be noted that some engineers do seek and find the truth, which turns out to be $E=mc^2$ and $F=ma$.) The application of science is what engineering deals with, and engineering schools take the vast bulk of scientific knowledge as given from on high like the Ten Commandments. From this, one derives the formulae, tables, charts, et cetera which become the engineer's tools.

The search for truth, the enquiring mind, is not vitally important here. As described by John and Margaret Rowntree, the student is "expected to produce himself both as a robot and as a thinking danger corporate economic control and profits.

There is an outward appearance of an attempt to overcome this lack of humanities and social studies in engineering training. Many engineering schools now require students to take several "arts options" on their way to a degree. This is mainly a sham. "Liberal Learning for the Engineer", the report of the American Society for Engineering Education's Humanistic-Social Research Project, exposes the scheme when it says, "In the university, the engineering school usually has very little to say about the kinds of courses which are offered by the liberal arts college, and even less about the kinds of faculty members the liberal arts college employs... (In universities) where structures are controlled by the engineering school, if it is possible, in most cases, for the school to exercise some control over the content of programs as well, not obtaining special courses for their students but by pre-selecting those courses which will contribute most to the liberal objectives they envision."

(Recommendation 27)

In the university, the engineering school should seek to establish overall frameworks and to exercise a pre-selective control over courses.

It is assumed that the engineering faculty will not itself bias selection...

The "arts options", already preselected by the engineering school, are seldom related to technical courses, and vice-versa. Thus, while some dabbling in other yards takes place, the fences remain. That this system works, that courses exist but integration of course content does not, is apparent from discussions with and among engineering students. "Golden Words", the newspaper of the Engineering Society at Queen's University, commented on an analysis of engineering students similar to the one contained in this paper: "The entire argument against engineering students and engineering education is based on this single premise (that engineering students are unsure of what an engineer actually does, believes in the "technocracy" myth, abhors artsy things because he doesn't understand them, lacks confidence and abstract conceptual ability). Golden Words repudiates (this). We don't believe (this premise)."

To sum up, the engineering schools produce a narrow, seriously competent, docile technician having little understanding of technology's role in society. He is unable to deal with that society's problems largely because he is unaware of them. For they, along with the effects of his own work, have been kept from his consciousness.

It is a rare engineer who has broken through the massive indoctrination effort and become aware of the contradictions in our society, in his chosen profession, and in his education. To condemn the unwere engineer as an immoral reactionary simply bewilders and angers him. Organization through revealing the perversion of Galileo's ideals is what is required.

Chuck Edwards

man." The educational system attempts to explosions in secondary schools and universities. This happens very seldom in the engineering schools because of the deliberate de-emphasis there on education, self-direction and self-determination for engineering students. That is, this robot-man contradiction is not apparent to most engineering students because the man half is missing!

But, this is necessary, of course. Capitalism could not function with aware, humanist, class-conscious technologists for they would not "submit to the discipline of a too narrow task and to the industrial hierarchy."

The harnessing of the educational system to the service of private profit and the corporate state, including the ideological preparation of students to serve these masters, is as much achieved by omission as commission. There is no need for a university course like "The Engineer and Capitalism" since the ethics and attitudes necessary have been already inculcated in grade and secondary school.

Many engineers would defend the omission of such a topic. It is not felt to be "engineering", but "politics" or "sociology" and, therefore, not of immediate concern to engineers. While such a defence is easily shown to be based on a perverted view of engineering, it can be shown that topics of undeniably vital concern to engineers are also ignored. Take, for example, the problem of pollution.

If it is generally admitted that this is one area in which our technology has lagged behind and had better catch up pretty quickly. Yet, in our undergraduate engineering schools this topic, if not completely over looked, is given short shift. To illustrate: In the engineering faculty at Queen's University there is not one single course dealing with industrial and municipal pollution. There is usually some minor pollution research at the graduate level (about 22 projects spread among the 18 departments of Chemical Engineering in Canada).

Again, there is a reason for this lack: a thorough discussion of pollution would man." The educational system attempts to build a self-directing man and then cause him to direct himself freely to the system's requirements. This contradiction within make plain to all concerned the rape-for-profit attitude of industrial managers, the pay-off-the-local-populace method of covering up pollution sources, the corporate lobbying to make up-coming pollution control legislation as painless as possible for them, the attempts to have pollution treatment facilities built at public expense for industrial use, the callous disregard for public health on the part of auto manufacturers, and so on. In short, expose the greedy respectivity of corporate capitalism. Such an expose seldom fails to produce a fine rage, and such an attitude in an engineer towards his bosses is obviously not to be desired by those bosses and their cohorts at the university.

Apart from simple anger, such a process would also bring to the engineer an awareness of his position vis-a-vis the corporate managers, an awareness that he is essentially part of the working class.

The unwillingness to discuss pollution causes and control is indicative of another facet of engineering schools, (and of other parts of the education industry as well): the compartmentalization of knowledge. "L.A. Woods, Director of the U.S. Air Force Office of Space Research smugly asserts, "Now why is water pollution regarded as an engineer's problem? Isn't it a social problem... more a matter of social-political activity?"

Indeed, the pollution problem absolutely requires social, political, and economic as well as technical action. But God forbid that engineering students be encouraged to study in these fields and integrate their knowledge, for the docility of the engineering department would be gone forever!

Thus, the attitude "this is engineering, that is not, it's politics" builds up barriers to integration of knowledge and the insight thereby available. They are also barriers to awareness and actions that can en-

Canadian literary celebrity bares his ugly side

Shovelling Trouble, by Mordecai Richler. McClelland and Stewart, $5.95

The Time is Never Ripe, by H.G. Classen. Centaur Press.

Bookstores are flooded with volumes of things that look like essays, sometimes read like essays. They are no such thing. The circumlocution "occasional pieces" is often used to describe such rag-tag collections. These are usually a few reviews, one or two pieces very like essays, and a lot of things, of varying length, in the nameless territory in between.

There is nothing really wrong with this, other than that there are so many of them. Some, of course, are quite welcome. The brevity of the short form extracts from some writers their best work: Mary McCarthy, Gore Vidal, Brigid Brophy. The shrewdest film criticism, too, is still to be found in individual reviews, not yet in book length studies or histories. In recent months two such books of pieces have been published by Canadian writers. The Time is Never Ripe by H.G. Classen is, strictly speaking, a crack at doing essays. His diligence is praiseworthy, but I don't think you'll be setting him in the same bookcase with Montaigne, or even Joan Didion.

Classen's scope is partly his undoing. Glance down the table of contents and you'll catch the following smorgasbord: On the Nature of God, On Sex, On Latin Americans, On the Origin of the Atomic Bomb, On Art, On History.

Well, all right. Let's see what he has to offer on that old perennial, sex. First, he raises several promising questions about just what activities properly constitute sex: nocturnal emission? sado-masochistic acts not involving the genitals? But these are just teases; Classen drags out that old dead horse — the Catholic Church's sex-for-procreation stand — and flogs it once again. (Note this absurdity, sea that inconsistency; hardly new stuff.) Then he whisks us off on a whirlwind tour of sexual customs through the ages (look at this harvest-festival, pay particular attention to that folk-custom). Now and then he drops off an opinion: the birth-control pill is misnamed, and should be called a conception-control pill. Not much more enlightening than the rest of the piece.

It's really too bad. Classen is an obviously well-read man and a thoughtful one. He has a huge storehouse of anthropological and historical curios (though often from third-hand and unreliable sources) and you can imagine him as an endlessly absorbing conversationalist.

But Classen has neither the solid authority of the expert, nor the daredevil caprice of an undisciplined, but first-rate, mind. When he is instructing us, we are aware that there are better sources for our information. Moreover, wit and elegance are inconspicuous in his prose, and often a preachy whine creeps in. "There is much in his book that is good, and much that is new" begins an old put-down. In Classen's case what is good is not new, and what little is new could be much more engagingly put.

Mordecai Richler's Shovelling Trouble is a skimpy round-up of some odds and ends from the last several years. Somebody must have been pretty desperate for a book, since most of these pieces have already been over-published, and some should have been put through the paper-shredder long ago.

Not that everything is so bad. "Bond" takes Ian Fleming to task for the anti-semitism which Richler finds in his stories; the whole of British adventure fiction has this nasty underside, argues Richler. True enough, but the genre is generally xenophobic, and not narrowly anti-semitic. Fleming, in this regard, is small beer compared to Sapper and his smug, griggish hero Bulldog Drummond. Still, Richler makes his case with skill and passion, though he fails to convince us that Bond should be consigned to the locked cupboard along with Mein Kampf.

There are reminiscences of being down and out in Paris in the fifties; thoughts on writing; some gentle epilogues for "having made it". Every successful writer comes out with something of this sort sooner or later. Others have done it better, yes, but it makes pleasant enough reading.

The rest of the volume needs some quick talking to justify it. In two or three pieces Richler doles out succulent little tidbits about the New York literary factions. Oh, he is affectionately patronizing about the whole business of jealousies and feuds, but passes on the gossip just the same. Elsewhere, Richler amuses himself by having some fun with rather indifferent books. "The mind boggles" he exclaims on reading that female sexuality differs from male sexuality, in a study of homosexuality.

Very clever. But if Richler were to be arch, why doesn't he attack something of some stature? Isn't it just a little too easy to annihilate these lightweight books? One wonders why Richler bothered to review this one at all — why, at any rate, he wanted to see his review preserved. If you're turning into a literary bully, it seems you'd want to hide the corpses of your puniest victims. (By the way, Shovelling Trouble is studded with little barbs about homosexuality. Does Richler really find it so offensive? If so, his revulsion did not keep him from accepting room and board from an affluent Paris homosexual whenever his own cash ran low; he relates this in his memoir "A Sense of the Ridiculous". More likely, Richler just considers homosexuals an easy excuse for some low-grade jibes.)

There are even more objectionable sides to the writer, and Richler is not the slightest bit bashful about them. "The Germans are still an abomination to me", he begins in the collection's heavyweight piece. "I rejoice in the crash of each German starfighter."

This is the solemn, sombre copestone of the volume, "The Holocaust and After". Richler is a Jew, and to Jews their six million dead must be the central datum of the century. He articulates his hate with candour, and many would praise this; but candour is a moral neutral. Like courage, its worth is dependant on the ends to which it is put. Here it is pressed into the service of intolerance.

We can understand how deeply this hatred is rooted, how it can still flourish. But there is nothing admirable or loyal, there is nothing worthy in propagating that hatred. The Nazi holocaust must be remembered, yes, remembered vividly. But not in order to nourish this savage bigotry.

It's hard not to think that this sort of truculence (Mallor does it too), this loud-mouthed Philistinism, is meant to pass as some sort of sensitivity. Writers are finely-tuned, precocious oracles (the argument goes), we must allow them opinions we won't tolerate in other people.

But why not? Being an artist doesn't exempt one from the obligation to think and be reasonable. Richler's anti-semitism is no less despicable than Pound's anti-semitism. The holocaust, in the long run, is not a mitigating circumstance.

Richler must know this. Can he be such a pecksniff about anti-semitism in secret-service novels and yet take comfort from the deaths of Germans not even born in 1945? I don't think so; it's puzzling how naively Richler has left himself open to attack on this point. But no more puzzling than why he bothered to paste together this selection of writings the sole effect of which is to present its author as a man we would probably pass up a chance to meet.

Greek tragedy

Andreas Papandreu is the leader of the Panhellenic Liberation Movement (PAK), now living in exile in Canada, where he teaches at York University. He was interviewed about the Greek situation by members of the New Democratic Youth (NDY). The following is a transcript, corrected by Papandreu, of part of that interview:

First of all could you give a brief history of the situation in Greece.

The point of origin was the German occupation in October, 1940. The occupation lasted in Greece, after a very bitter war, for about 4 years, until the late summer of '44.

During the 4 years, there developed in Greece a very powerful resistance movement which was called the National Liberation Front, EAM, which was the first liberation front anywhere.

The movement had two very interesting characteristics; it was very powerful, it included 2 1/2 million Greeks, roughly, in a population which was at that time less than 8 million. It included practically the totality of the youth, that's my generation. It was a popular movement looking to the overthrow or the repulsion and expulsion of the occupation forces. And then the building of a Greek society along lines that correspond very closely to radical thought today. That is to say socialist, democratic, in the sense of decentralized, not necessarily parliamentary, but highly decentralized regionally and otherwise.

Another of the features of this movement even during the occupation, was that in the villages there was substantial autonomy because while the Germans were in Greece, the movement actually controlled all of the Greek countryside during those years and the big cities were in German hands. So there was some experience, in fact, in running the country.

The one feature that turned out to be the undoing of the whole movement was that the leadership was in the hands of the Greek Communist Party which was tied up absolutely to Moscow, to the orthodox Moscow line. Now this had some tragic consequences.

Stalin turned over Greece to Churchill in October of 1944, after liberation. They made a deal and they split the Balkans. This is on paper signed, sealed and delivered. Churchill took Greece and in return for that gave Bulgaria and Rumania to Stalin. They agreed that Hungary and Yugoslavia would be 50-50. So Bulgaria, Rumania to Moscow, Greece to England. That was a pretty cynical deal and Stalin lived by it. That is to say he made no move to help the Greek Liberation Front. Not only that, but he actually discouraged others from doing that.

The one major supporter of that movement was Tito of Yugoslavia and this is really what kept the movement going after the return of the government, the Greek government from exile.

In '44, Greece was liberated. There was a temporary peace. But civil war broke out in Greece in the late '40s. Civil war broke out in Greece after '44 and lasted to '49, between a British sponsored government and the National Liberation Front led by the Communists and supported by Tito of Yugoslavia but not by the Soviet Union.

The British could not quite make it so in 1947 they turned over the whole operation to America. This is how the Truman Doctrine was born. America stepped in to take over from the British. They sent General Von Fleet to guide the anti-guerrilla operations in Greece. They used in Greece for the first time napalm bombs. The first Vietnam was Greece. In fact it looked very much as is the case today in Vietnam; it looked as if the Greek guerrillas would win or at least would not be defeated. The Americans were orientated towards political solutions, very much what is happening today in Vietnam.

When Tito broke with Moscow, that's one little event I want to mention, Tito broke with Moscow in '48 to '49. When that happened, the Greek Communist Party, which was in the lead of the Guerilla movement, instead of siding with Tito who was supporting them, sided with Moscow which was hostile to them. Tito immediately closed the border, the civil war came to an end and after that, Greece became basically an American satellite with America playing a decisive role in the political and economic affairs in Greece.

So the 50's were years of conservative rule in Greece under the United States for which Greece was the first experiment, in fact, in overseas intervention. I'm not talking about Latin America which has a longer history of course.

After the civil war, the forces of the left end generally the democratic forces, broadly speaking, were badly wounded and could not really effectively challenge. They weren't doing bad electorally but they couldn't effectively challenge the rule of the right that had the backing of the great super power.

But as we moved into the 60's, there developed a new optimism that the democratic forces could make it.

Greece was a semi-police state right through that period with police files on every 'subversive' citizen. If you were 'subversive' you had difficulty getting employment. You had difficulty getting a passport, you had difficulty getting into university. It was an overt semi-police state. On the surface, there was freedom and in fact there was freedom for every citizen except those who had a file. Who had a file? All the members who had been in the resistance movement. There were, I would estimate, half a million youth who had been marked because they were in the resistance movement, who could really make no go of life. It was a very, very subtle oppression, but at least there was the possibility of political debate, elections, challenge. The newspapers were quite free to write and in fact they were writing all kinds of powerful things.

"We too have troublamakers who don't appreciate authority"

Finally the democratic forces managed to gather together to form a coalition which became a party under my father, George Papandreu which won in 63 in a major electoral confrontation, and once again, immediately thereafter in 64 and the majority that we had in 64, that's when I was myself active in the party, with 53% absolute vote, an absolute majority. Very unusual in any context to get that kind of clear mandate. We started on a reformist path which I can compare very much to your Manitoba NDP.

The agricultural sector were really the dis-established, excluded people in Greek life. Greece is an agricultural country. Greek agriculture is the Greek hinterland. And, therefore, quite poor in comparison to Athens. I would say that the average income per capita, per head was probably, in the days I'm talking about, in the early 60's, about maybe 400 dollars. The income per capita in the countryside was less than one half of that. In mountain villages you had not much more than 70 dollars per head per year. You have to go to India to get comparable figures. But Athens itself which was very close to one quarter of the country was a cosmopolitan centre with substantial wealth and it looked very much a European city. The contrast was very sharp.

We found a country in which education was restricted to the really better off part of the population, expensive, given the pocket books of the Greeks, and basically unavailable. So we took off then for very basic reforms on the education front and made education free across the board to all levels. But beyond that we also gave fellowships to the better university graduates for studies abroad. Almost as many as could win on some competitive examinations would be guaranteed up to five years abroad on full support for studies.

We introduced really a major measure which was a free lunch for all school children. In a country where poverty was basically rampant, at least in the countryside, a solid meal everyday was a major achievement. And this had other positive dimensions: the meal was not prepared by the school authorities but in fact the citizens of the community had to take turns to cook for the children.

So that there developed in fact, more than that, a community involvement, a new spirit of doing something clearly for the collectivity. For the farmers, the best thing we could do was guarantee them higher prices and eliminate interest on their past due loans. We didn't forgive the loans but we consolidated them and deducted all interest charges which was quite a significant move at the time.

And then we moved towards another front which I think you'll understand quite a bit here. There were major investment arrangements and contract from the United States and other foreign powers in Greece that we had considered exploitive and colonial in character. We proceeded to renegotiate those.

Then we confronted the United States which was subtly always in power in a number of ways, and this is where I personally come in very sharp conflict with the American establishment. There were four levels at which we came in sharp conflict. One was the business level where the U.S. embassy became quite upset over our renegotiation with Standard Oil.

Two, they were actually using our own government-controlled radio to propagandize through the Voice of America against the policies of our government. They had been given this right of half an hour a day. So what I did was to deny the Voice of America the right to use our own station. They had their own very powerful radio transmitter so there was no reason to use our own transmitter to communicate the American criticism of our policies. This they didn't like a bit.

The third front on which we confronted them was the intelligence front. It turned out that during my first phase in government, I was in charge of the Greek intelligence services as minister, supervisor. I discovered to my amazement that the Greek intelligence services were administered not by us, but by the CIA and were financed by the CIA, that is, left over from the civil war period. So, while I raised the question, I was not successful in bringing about a change and I went on to a different ministry, Economic Planning and Economic coordination.

The fourth one was Cyprus. Johnson, following the Acheson Plan, had determined in 64 that Cyprus should cease being an independent nation in the United Nations but be split between Turkey and Greece and thus be forced into NATO because if Greece took a part and Turkey took a part, then the country would be in NATO. So Johnson invited both the Turks and us to Washington and I spent three days in the White House along with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Foreign Affairs in which we were subjected to fantastic brainwashing. And when we said no, we would not use Greek arms to kill Greek Cypriotes so that we could occupy part of Cyprus, along with the Turks, we were threatened. We were told that the Turkish airplanes along with the Turkish forces would invade, would burn our villages, would burn our towns. I mean the cynical language of Johnson and McNamara and Rusk is really unbelievable, you have to hear it to believe it. I have it on record of course and I have written about it. I had never been dañad because it was official and we have minutes of it. So, we said no, and I still remambar my tather saying to Averall Harriman and to Gaorga Ball and to Adlai Stevenson that in 1940 we said no to Facism. In 1964 we say no to the 'great democracy' across the Atlantic.

Affar that wa wara through with the United Statas, this kind of behavior from a satallita they had not sean betora and they were not preparad to accept it. So the process of our undoing began. It involvad the charge that I was the head of a laffist military group that was about to taka over Greeca, to oust the king and declara Greece a socialist republic, the Nasserita tyta. Now this blaw up and blew up and was called the Aspida conspiracy.

And in 65 the king, Constantine, had the tinal clash with my tather, and dasphte the fact that wa had 53% wa were forced to resign, actually ousted from government. The king struggled than to davalop a parilamantary support for puppat governments without going back to elections. In order to do this he had to buy M.P.'s. The CIA came in vary handy, and big business man Papas (tronting for Standard Oil and the CIA) visited our MPs and offered them monay. So they managed after months of effort and millions of dollars to gat a majority by ona vote in Parliamtant for their puppet government.

Than we took to the roads, we took to to the farms, wa took to the countryside, we took to the cities campalgning for new tree elections. We called this the second unyielding campaign. Finally wa won in principle because finally the king yeldad and said, "All right, there'll ba elections on the 28th of May, 1967".

In February, 1967, Mr. Rostow called a meeting, Mr. W.W. Rostow who is the Kissinger of that period, President Johnson's advisor, called together the security council, (CIA, Pentagon, Stata) and ha said, "Well, look, Papandrou's going to win, Cantre Union's going to win the election and this is against the intarests of the United Statas and than chartad a coursa, for the military take-ovar.

The man who made the coup in 67, on April 21 wera a bunch of basicaly unknown, junior officers. Of the five man in the charge, Papadopoulos was the key man, the presant dictator. Most of them were in the Graek Intaligancra servica which means they ware members of the CIA and Papadopoulos was the official liasion between the CIA and the Greek intelligence service, that was his job for many years. So, no doubt, the coup cama from within the CIA, it did had clearance from the top in the United Statas.

The big question is; How do a couple of junior officers taka over a country? Wall this puzzle will be resolvad when I giva you the next bit of information. All NATO countrias have what is callad a Contingency Plan. Contingancy Plan is a plan completly operational and completly ready to go for a military takeover to combat fifth colum-activitas within the country in casa of involvment in war. Suppose Greeca came into a war with the Soviet Union. Than this plan would hava gona into effect. The plan in Greeca was called Plan Promathaus. It was a plan put on tape, completly operational and the tapa had been revised a tew months before the coup, in Washington. This plan provided for a military takeover, for the immediate suppression of all telephone communications, for all travel out of the country or into the country, for the arrest of 8,000 Greeks, ona whom was mysait, all the pollitcal leadership, the Union leadership, the youth leadership, everything was picked up the first night. All of this completely computerized, that is to say, as you push the button, out comes the man to be arrested, his address and the officer to arrest him. Everything was very nicaly worked out. Since the Greek armed forces ware trained to respond to this, they knew of course, what the signal was and of course when the signal came, played their role out to the hilt.

One thing about this Plan Prometheus which is worth mentioning to you from a political point of view is that the Greek government was never aware of its existence, that is to say it was in the military club, that is, the Greek military and the American military knew about it. But the Greek government did not know about it nor was the signatura of the Prima Ministar or the Secretary of Detanca, or the head of State necessary for the implementation of the plan. It was just sufficient that the Chiat of the Armed Forcas, the Chiet of the Army, not of the Armed Forces, push the button, that was all.

So it came about than that a coup was not only undertaken but succeeded and the wave of oppresion that followad was quite spectacular. I don't think you have any idea from the press of the extant of it. Thara has been an investigation by the Council of Europe that lasted for two years, and the Human Rights Commission of Europa, And on the basis of the evidence collected, Greece was ousted in '69 from the Council of Europe. They have documented a sample of 250 torture cases. The extant of oppresion in Greece is quite spectacular.

We guess that over a 100,000 Greeks hava gone through the process of intimidation by being dragged into police stattons, imprisoned, exiled or tortured. We don't know how many people have been tortured but they run into the thousands. The 250 cases reported are hair ralsing, the report is quite detailed and they're not by us but by the European Investigating commission. They have managed to get themselves about 100,000 Greek In-formers and in a country of povarty it is not so difficult to recruit informers. They use modern gadgats to follow people, to pick up conversatons, even in the streets.

It has absolutely no popular base and i don't need to prove that, the proof is there for us to see. After five years martial law in Greece has not been lifad despite international pressures. Of course there is no talk of elactions. Even under their own taclst constitution they don't dare to hold elections. So, this regime has remained Immensely oppresive. Has it been, during this period at least, sensitive to the needs of the people? You know, some dictatorships may be, they be undemocratic but at least they may be populist or they may be nationalialst. This regime has neither of those attributes.

It is not nationalialst because it has turned Graece over lock stock and barrel to the Americans to use as a military camp. There are seven major military facilities now. Greece is studded with nucliar weapons. Even the beautiful island of Cozfu, a peaceful, beautiful island where the people are one of the most gentle people of Greece, is now being turned into a naval NATO basa. Everything is militarizad. In addition to that, American business is not only welcome but is rampant. That is to say, there is no longer, effectively speaking, what you might call a Greek capitalist class. There are Greek intermediaries and front men, but foreign capital which is primarily American. And i think the most cynlcal statement I have heard, and this is in the New York Times so you can look it up, was May 1971 when the United States Secretary of Commerce went to Greece and was treated by the Junta to dinner and there were many ministers of the regime present. At the end of the dinner he said to them, "I want to express my gratitude, our gratitude for two things; 1) nowhere is our American investment safer than in Greece, and 2) no where have we gotten as decent terms for our investment as we have gotten in Greece". This was in print, just incredible. In order however, to confirm the identification between the U.S. and Greece, Vice-President Agnew of Greek origin has just now been in Greece to congratulate the Greek regime for its good work, for its role in protecting the free world and b) to assure the people of the United States that this sincere man Papadopoulos is doing his best to return Greece to parliamentary institutions.

So, this is the story. For us, its an American occupation, its not an internal problem. Its an occupation supported indirectly, unfortunately, through inaction and through fear by NATO. That is to say, the NATO countries, especially some of them such as Denmark and Norway and non-NATO countries such as Sweden in the West, have been quite vocal against the regime. But they cannot go so far as to confront the United States within NATO and block aid to Greece and oppose the regime because they are fearful for themselves, because they are being blackmailed by the United States. And this I know, and I speak from knowledge and not from guess work. And NATO by silence, by inaction, by lack of courage, by lack of power, NATO countries, are more or less being dragged along by accepting the occupation of Greece by the United States as a fact of life. So, for us the task is one of liberation. Of course we wish to get democratic institutions but in the order of things, the first part is to liberate our country because democratic institutions are quite meaningless if you are not boss in your own home. I mean they're important for protections of the individual from abuse by the police. But we want more than that, we want effective popular sovereignty and effective popular sovereignty can not take place if we are an occupied country. For us, there is no compromise, our commitment is to get the Americans out of Greece.

But there has not developed yet in Greece what you would call a mature, well structured resistance movement. It is not that the Greeks accept. But you know, for those who have carefully looked at resistance movements and liberation movements, there are two ingredients that are needed for the development of a liberation movement one is desperation, two is hope. You must be both desperate and hopeful.

Now desperate we are, we must become a bit more hopeful. To become a bit more hopeful we've got to have ties with some allies. Then we've got to meet some material needs. Because liberation does not just come out of thin air, you have to have allies, you have to have support, you have to have the material needs for a confrontation. The trouble with us is that in general during this period there has been a recession of the liberation effort in the world. With the development of these centres of power, these super-powers, with the games they play. For instance the Soviet block has turned Greece over to the American block, its not their business. They now have settled in Europe and they don't want to disturb the apple cart. I could go on on this. The other super power, China is now moving in itself in the arena and quite conceivably, in order to reduce the threat from the Soviet Union in the Eastern Mediterranean, China may welcome the presence of American forces in the Eastern Mediterranean as a counter balance to the Soviet Union. Big Power politics is very much against the small guy. Its a major task for us to develop a base of support outside, to develop this base like to identify exactly, our people, unfortunately the jails are quite full with our members and this has not broken our spirit we have a fantastic popular base potentially in Greece provided that we have the means to really effectively organize for the tasks of the liberation war, and nothing short of a liberation war in Greece is going to free Greece.

Is this movement in Greece a socialist liberation movement?

Our movement is socialist, yes. Our position is very clear, we want a socialist Greece. We want a Greece out of NATO.

Would the socialism of Greece be along the lines of Sweden or would it have a more radical, Marxist bent?

I myself would not use the word marxist. Not because it scares me but because it has unknown connotations. I would say that we believe very strongly ourselves that socialism has to fit the cultural patterns and the traditions of the country in which it is attempted. That is to say, you cannot have a universal mode. Our vision of socialism is not Swedish. It is closer to the Yugoslav model but not quite and this we haven't worked out entirely. We do not wish to have, to identify social property with government property. We are quite "decentralist" in our orientation. While we believe in planning that has to be on a national level, our first task will be to regionalize Greece. These regions will be responsible for their own socio-economic development within a national plan which will consist of a bargaining process and that will work within a set of constitutional rules by the eleven regions. This is a complex notion. The central state will not have a police force and we even look for a decentralized army of the guerrilla type as the Yugoslavs now know. The most effective type of defence is a citizens army and we are thinking of a highly decentralized army structure. Men and women to be included on equal terms.

In the countryside we do not intend to take the ownership of land from the farmer. The land will be divided fairly but each man will own his piece of land, but he won't work it. He will have his ownership claim but we will do everything conceivable to really develop a collective exploitation of the land through production and marketing co-operatives. Only a foolish man would choose to operate his own land. But we want to work with incentives on the farm because everywhere, where it has not happened this way, with one exception, Mao's China, it has failed. The only collectivist socialist experiment in the country side that has not failed is the Maoist one. Everywhere else it has failed. So, this is a warning signal.

All industry, as we understand it will be socially owned which means, however not quite the same thing as government owned. And it does not mean also, for us, workers management as in Yugoslavia which has tended to develop many of the weaknesses that we observe in the Western world, including unemployment. What we are thinking of here is something which is unexplored and very interesting. The regional unit, the proper level of the regional unit being the municipality or the region, or the nation as a whole, would own something depending on its scope. Only those that must be at the national level will be owned by the state. The others will not be owned by the state, they will be owned collectively. The main objective is to avoid the development of establishments that are beyond their reach of the citizen and beyond his knowledge.

— Defendant, have you anything to say for yourself?

among political parties, youth groups, hopefully governments, but that is very hard and it hasn't happened to this point.

The task of our movement, the Pan-Hellenic Liberation Movement, is two things. Abroad we are basically a political instrumentality for mobilization of Greeks and all the allies we can get. But inside Greece we are an active resistance movement. While we don't

William Wood retrospective at Hart House

Beautiful but empty film

The new film by Jean Paul Almond, Journey, now showing at CineCity is another in the wave of weak films coming from established filmmakers.

A promising beginning examination of a rural communal society is rapidly followed by clichéd symbolism. The commune, at its natural level, is depicted with almost documentary realism. Almond's progression to a story line to justify the film becomes a rehashing of every old line about an outsider's intrusion into a closed society.

Genevieve Bujold and John Veron are the only professional actors in the film, but even they never raise the quality of the acting above that of the non-professionals. They cannot receive all the blame, however, as the dialogue in no way inspires good performances from any of those involved.

Bad dialogue combined with the weak acting provides an effective contrast to the beautiful photography and the fine voice of Luke Gibson. Whatever else that can be said about Almond it is impossible to deny his sense of visual brilliance. The surprising (?) ending even creates doubts as to the validity of his photographic style in regard to this film.

Fernando Traficante

Visual, historical, and educational are the aspects which best describe the William J. Wood Retrospective presently showing in the Hart House Art Gallery. Just who William Wood was and what his accomplishments were are in part answered in this exhibition. However his recognition on the Canadian art scene has been just recently brought to light. William Wood was born in Ottawa in 1877 and grew up at Port Colborne. In the years 1904-1905 he studied at the Central School of Art in Toronto under G.A. Reid and William Cruikshank. He also studied in Boston for a short time.

During the opening years of the 1900's he lived in Northern Ontario and in 1910 he moved to Orillia with Frank Carmichael to work as a carriage painter. It was through his relationship with Carmichael in these early years of development that Wood gained most of his encouragement and inspiration. In the autumn of 1912 he was proposed by the late A.E. Haring and Arthur Lismer as a non-resident member of the Arts and Letters Club. And it was also during this period that he was urged to submit some of his paintings to the Canadian National Exhibition.

In 1913 Wood moved to his permanent residence in Midland, Ontario. In 1920 he became a non-resident member of the Society of Canadian Printers and Etchers and finally in 1933 he became a founding member of the Canadian Group of Painters. Wood, who sought neither fame nor fortune, continued to work as a rather insular entity until his death in 1954.

Over 70 pieces of work, spanning a period of almost fifty years, have been amassed through private collections, the National Gallery of Canada, and the Art Gallery of Ontario. Comprised of oil paintings, etchings, gouaches, watercolors, and pen-and-ink and charcoal drawings this retrospective reflects the versatility and scope of William Wood's artistic career. In conjunction with the works on the wall are two display cases containing various elements of historical and aesthetic interest such as letters from the Group of Seven, etching plates, drawings and small paintings, a photograph of William Wood, and a display of the artists' etching tools and carrying case.

Upon entering the gallery one is drawn to the larger and more colorful oil paintings which, although by no means the highlight of this exhibition, possess a certain charisma through their iridescent treatment of surface and form. This quality is evident in such works as the Axa Grinders and the Ironing Lady, but perhaps most notably in a painting of 1919 entitled Memories of Malodias. For in this work the orchestration of hues transforms into a luminous softness which hypnotizes the viewer with the musical qualities portrayed. Other paintings, however, such as the Baach Scene of 1938 and Cicada Sings of 1945 display the component influences of Impressionism and Post-Impressionism, and lack the sensitivity of feeling projected in earlier works. In a still later painting of 1950 entitled Landscape the treatment is fauvistic and rendered in heavy impasto.

This ambivalence in approach in regard to oil painting indicates Wood's struggle for identification through this particular medium. Whereas in a painting like Memories of Malodias his sensibilities are projected, in a work like Cicada Sings they are almost totally lost. It was through the medium of etching that Wood found himself and developed his own personal style; one which endured constant redefinition and refinement throughout his lifetime.

Canadian art critic Paul Duval said of Wood in the forward to his book Canadian Drawings and Prints that he was one of the most original of the pioneer group of etchers. "Early under the influence of Anders Zorn, Wood has continued throughout his long career to realign his technique into its present abrupt and economical style. Wood's handling of the etching needle is almost violent in its brusqueness but the resulting proofs, despite haphazard printing, remain among the most arresting produced in Canada." This retrospective provides visual testimony of this.

Altogether the William Wood Retrospective displays the genius which Wood possessed in the areas of composition and design, and historically it represents one of the many talented graphic artists who have for so long been swept under the dominant mainstream of the Group of Seven. Over forty years ago Duval made a plea that Canadians were ignoring the work of these individuals and this exhibition is a response to that plea.

Highest calibre Czeck Quartet to return

The Czech Quartet, which has visited Hart House before, will be muscatizing the development of the string quartet from Haydn to Janacek beginning January 7, 1973 in a series of six quartets.

Last Sunday evening, it was a pleasure to attend a concert given at Hart House by the Czech Quartet, quartet-in-residence at MacMester University. Since their last engagement here, they have acquired Milan Vitek as first violinist and the ensemble reflects a new-found vitality, perhaps as a result of this association.

The programme included quartets in G major by Mozart, in F minor by Beethoven and in F major by Ravel. The encore, also in F, was the last movement of Dvorak's "American" quartet.

Their approach to the Mozart Quartet was interesting — dynamic yet respectful. The Andante in particular showed masterful handling of thematic content with fine balance among the voices. The Beethoven Quartet, subtitled "Serioso" was begun vigorously and dramatically. This quartet, the last of Beethoven's middle period, poses a problem of contrast between movements: each movement is marked Allegro or Allegretto and players should therefore make the most of quieter and slower subjects. The opening cello scale of the second movement was somewhat hurried rather than the unpretentious introduction it should be. Again, the fugato theme begun by the viola was a little hurried and strident. One cannot feel the chromatic exploratory nature of this theme unless it is taken a bit more timidly. It is important that the listener's mind is "imprinted" with this theme so he can appreciate its return, in "stretto" fashion, later on. The Scherzo (Allegro assai vivace) erupts, in a flash, out of its diminished seventh cocoon, and the Czechs attained a thrilling effect here. Within this movement the players must beware of quick dotted notes tumbling over each other. There is no fault in this as long as the longer notes are "sat upon", weighted by contrast. In this performance, one got the frustrating sensation of shooting at a constantly moving target. The second theme of the Scherzo must also offer contrast, a little slower and more pastoral in nature than it was played. The finale is Beethoven in one of his laconic minor moods. Although marked "agitato", this is more in phrasing than in tempo. The Czech Quartet's overpowering approach here seemed to stifle the quiet, almost breathless agitation of this movement.

The Ravel Quartet, beautifully choral and expansive, demanded an abrupt change of pace from the Beethoven. The Czech Quartet was at its finest here, seeming to play less but listening more and by their example drawing us into the gently sketched Impressionistic landscape of this work. A small break in mood occurred in the opening of the second movement, marked Asses viv, Tres rhythm. By overly accenting the last two notes of the opening phrase (which are already emphasized by Ravel, since he changes harmonies on both these notes), the more subtle syncopated parts were thrown into shadow, and the continuity of this circular theme was broken. However, to dwell exhaustively on small details is tantamount to admitting that the whole programme was of highest professional calibre, perhaps climaxing with their encore selection from Dvorak's Quartet in F. We look forward to the return of this fine ensemble in January when they will give a series of six concerts illustrating the history of the string quartet.

Unpolished performers weaken impact of O'Casey's topical play

The Firehall Theatre opened its first season last Thursday with the staging of Sean O'Casey's The Plough and the Stars. The christening of this new theatre was of social as well as of cultural significance. Flocks of brightly dressed socialites seemed to enjoy exploring the spiffily renovated firehall and sampling the various exotic beverages before and afterwards, as much as the production itself. The theatre has more quaint and cosy lounge facilities than any other Toronto theatre, and this, as well as the successful adaptation of a stage, gives grounds for optimism to the organizers of the season, the University Alumnae Dramatic Club. The whole event was topped off with champagne, a formality quite superfluous with the alarming number of thoroughly bottled patrons about. But since free champagne will not be a feature of subsequent shows, perhaps only the production itself is of interest here.

Patricia Carroll Brown, the director, designed and engineered a colourful and vibrant production, well-suited to O'Casey's diction and dramatic style. A creditable approach to the Irish dialect releases the full flavour of O'Casey's poetry. Quick pacing and strict attention to detail were two other features of Brown's directing which allow the play to live.

She has an ambitious, if somewhat unpolished company of actors to work with. George Truss, as Fluther Good, comes across very strongly, although he isn't really the central character. As a carpenter, a common Irishman, he approaches life in an offhand manner, and takes things as they come. He is, on account of Truss's exuberant acting, a stock character who deftly avoids the tragic crunch of the play and still manages to upstage everyone. Nora Clitheroe (Doris Cowan) is caught dead centre in most of the conflicts of the play, and hence is the central dramatic figure. Ms Cowan carries this load successfully to a point, but is upstaged in her climactic mad scene, of all places, by another stock character Bessie Burgess (Morna Wales), the cynical, earthy woman upstairs. As a result, the dramatic line of the production is weakened considerably.

However, the political line of the play is its saving grace, especially because of its topicality, and it glosses over the weaknesses. A forerunner to today's Irish Republican Army schemes, against steep odds, to overthrow the British oppressors, and ultimately to rise out of their poverty. The characters must decide whether to pursue this idealistic course, or to grasp at the reality of the situation, and draw off whatever advantage they can from it. It is this choice, between ideals and reality, between the stars and the plough, that supplies motivation to the characters, and meaning to the play.

Godspell resurrected: Two weeks ago the hand of God was visited upon the Playhouse Theatre and it knocked the front part of that Godless Institution into Bayview Avenue. Unrepentant, the followers of Mammon have restored their temple and are once again presenting, for profit, their blasphemous bastardization of the Gospel according to Matthew. Idolaters are invited to attend at the risk of excommunication and eternal condemnation to the fires of Hell. Plainsia Reconclled To Virtue: Don't let the pansy title fool you. This little sex farce comes direct from London's West End and the court of Liz I, or was it Jim I? Memory fails.... This opus from the pen of the notorious Ben Johnson, master of bedroom bedlem and degenerate doggerel, will be laid out too gently to rest tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 in the University College Playhouse. Admission to this group grope is free.

The School of Graduate Studies and the Graduate Department of Music are presenting a lecture in room 116 of the Edward Johnson Building at 4 pm entitled "Sounds of Instrumental Music at the Court of Louis XIV". Marjorie Yates, associate first flutist with the Toronto Symphony is giving a concert in the Concert Hall at 8:30 pm, no admission charge, no tickets required. Her program includes Image, a flute solo, by Eugene Bozza, sonata for flute and piano by Verne Reynolds, and Discussion, by David Amram. An Improvisation is promised and Miss Yates will be assisted by John Wyre, Robin Engelman, percussionists, and Monica Gaylord piano and William Findlay cello.

The first of the Toronto Symphony's series B/B1 concerts is this Tuesday, October 31, to be conducted by Selji Ozawa and requiring the services of Rosalind Elles, mezzo-soprano; George Shirley, tenor and Victor Braun, baritone as well as the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir. The only work is Berlioz's Romeo and Juliet, a very interesting selection, especially for Berlioz revivalists. The first student concert is this Thursday, November 2, and a series ticket for three concerts is five dollars. Victor Faldbrill conducts Weber, Beethoven's fourth piano concerto and Kodaly's light-hearted, sometimes frivolous, Hary Janos Suite.

The November 2 Thursday Afternoon free lecture series presents the "Plainsia's Paradox" in the concert hall at 2:10 pm. A reminder that October 30 is the date on which tickets for the November 18 (Saturday) U of T Orchestra concert go on sale.

The Oxford Quartet's 1970 taped recital will be shown November 5 on Music to See on channel 5, cable 6 at 5 pm. CBC-FM presents a Ralph Vaughan Williams profile prepared by Boyd Neel on October 31 at 8 pm.

John Mattar, the Guelph artist is still at Scarborough along with William Kort. The Pollock Gallery, until November 16, has three shows going: Norvel Morriveau, an Ojibway artist, has ten years worth of paintings on display. Eleven of his pieces have been purchased by the Royal Ontario Museum. The east gallery has International pieces: Calder, Ripella, Paul Fournier and Thelma van Alstyne — two Toronto artists. Third, an Albers exhibit of graphic is on the second floor; half of the exhibit is comprised of the framed plates from the artist's "Formulation-Articulation". At the Aggregallon's gallery one, are gallery artists using various media. In gallery two is Chris Hayward's recent paintings: "Folded canvases. On to the Isaacs gallery which presents John Ivor Smith's "New Sculpture" beginning Sunday to November 14. David Rabinowitch's steel sculptures will be on view at Carmen Lamanna this Saturday to November 16.

The Toronto Gallery of Photography is seeking to make its non-profit exhibition function and bookstore more widely known to its prospective public. It is situated at 11 Charles Street. A photographic loan service is offered in conjunction with the Picture Loan Society and they hope to provide well-equipped darkrooms for the public by late December. Emmet Gowin is presently exhibiting at the gallery.

The Merton Gallery will have four Canadian artists exhibit their paintings from this Monday to November 10.

Now on exhibit in the Library showcases at the Ontario College of Art are pieces done in the 1920's and 30's from the OCA Permanent Collection. The OCA Permanent Collection came into being with the discovery last year of several brown paper bundles which had been in storage in the college for over 40 years. The OCA is obviously more than playing its part in faithfully generating authentic Canediana for an eager public.

Ian Carr-Harris, the college librarian, has a one-man show on now at A Space Gallery south west of the Charles Promenade.

Almost all of Canada's better folk-singers have been concentrated in the Toronto-Ottawa-Montreal area. The surest sign that the deficit in the west is being made up, is found in the music of a Vancouver Island farmer named Valdy.

Country Man (A & M) is Veldy's first recording attempt and he has every reason to be proud of it. Nine of the twelve songs are Veldy compositions, which offer a careful insight into the man's rustic lifestyle and his understanding nature. The album has a gentle air of peaceful contentment about it. The simple arrangements are perfect settings for Veldy's natural flowing poetic lyrics and Jim Gordon's excellent percussive work and Brett Wede's guitar moza the melodies along forcefully without being overbearing.

Veldy's lyrics reveal a concern for preservation of the planet. A song called Mm-Mm-Mm-Mm (inspired by the L.A. smog) is a look into the future when cities are dome-covered and the people are frightened by the sight of the sun which has become extraneous to their environment. But Country Man is really what Veldy is about. Images of the simple life, close to the earth and the "real" things make you long to flee the city.

Valdy is at Grumbles, 71 Jarvis Street, tonight and tomorrow. On stage he's a personable messianic figure who exudes a sense of honesty and serenity. The audience were completely relaxed and receptive to his captivating natural quality. Occasionally stomping along in time with his big work boots, he went through most of the original songs from his album. He's a fine talent and you shouldn't miss him.

Next week, Grumbles is featuring a Mariposa favorite, Michael Cooney. Admission is $2.50.

Free Music. You can hear the Downchild Blues Band at the taping of CITY-TV's Music City show from 3 to 4 pm on Sunday. The studio is located at 99 Queen Street East and an audience of 50 persons is admitted at 2:30 pm.

Yes he's developed into the most musically inventive group in rock to date. Their music encompasses an element of drama and surprise. It's a delicate filigree of harmonias and complex orchestrations that probe the senses with fingers of multilevelled awareness. They're a group that take time and care with their sound on stage as well as on record. The desire to recreate their studio quality in concert should make their appearance in Toronto on Tuesday night a special treat. Also with Yes, at Meple Leaf Gardens, is the J. Galls Band, a very together, funky blues and R&B band. They work with B.B. King on his LA Midnight album and that should indicate the quality of music you can expect on Tuesday.

The Great Dictator (by and starring Charlie Chaplin) is worthwhile, even if for just a very few minutes of genius. This satiric slap at Hitler, anti-semitism (and, incidentally, Mussolini) was made long before Auschwitz and Buchenwald entered our vocabulary; you might squirm a little with hindsight, but not too much. Ignore the mawkish parts where Chaplin plays a gentile Jewish barber and watch his creation of Hynkle, dictator of Tomanie. There are some glorious moments: a hysterical address to the "sons and daughters of the Double Cross" (Chaplin's variation on the swastika) and a few moments of breathtaking poetry when Hynkel bubble-dances with a balloon globe of the world to the love duet from Trisan and Isolda. Muggeridge speaks today

"Education is the great mumbo-jumbo and fraud of the age... which for the most part only serves to enlarge stupidity, inflata conceit, (and) enhance credulity."

Provocative comments such as this will no doubt fill Convocation Hall today and Monday at 1 pm as Malcolm Muggeridge speaks on "To Whom Shall We Go", and "What is Life All About".

Muggeridge is as intrasting and unusual as his name suggests. Schooled at Cambridge (an experience he describes as "consisting of boredom, dissatisfaction, and misty afternoon walks"), Muggeridge has had a career in a variety of jobs, including edito of Punch and rector of the University of Aberdeen. Though a success in life, he has never been satisfied with it. Right from childhood, Muggeridge has had the sense that he is a "stranger in a strange land — a displaced parson". Having tried various solutions to his alienation (including suicide) Muggeridge has, recently opted for the Christian alternative.

Muggeridge is not, however, your stereotyped Church-goer. He sees Christianity as a very dynamic and personal relationship with God, and criticizes the institutional church as much as any devout atheist. Visiting the "non-event" of the World Council of Churches in 1968, Mr. Muggeridge's judgment was that the delegates "could agree on about anything, because they ballaved in almost nothing". The crux of the matter to Muggeridge is simply that the institutional church has abandoned its doctrinal foundation, that Jesus Christ is "alive and very truth", and has "compromised with the promoters of a heaven here on earth". And because of this betrayal, the church is now in "total disarray, and visibly decomposing, to the point that, short of a miracle, it can never be put together again with any semblance of order or credibility".

A socialist in his younger days, Muggeridge looked forward to the coming of the new heaven here on earth. Today, he no longer has faith in socialism (or any other ism) because he believes that "all purely human hopes are fraudulent, as their realization in purely human terms must always prove deceptive." G Adams

Blues "do or die" tomorrow in Ottawa

The football Blues go into Ottawa tomorrow afternoon marked by many observers as definite underdogs in their sudden-death OUAA Eastern Section final with University of Ottawa Gee-Gees.

Based on the season's performance, there should be no comparison between the two teams, as Ottawa won handily by 17-point margins, 24-7 in Toronto and 30-13 in Ottawa.

However, scores can be deceiving. Granted, Blues were totally flat and inept in the season's opener but Varsity had enough chances to win in the first half during the second game and simply failed to capitalize.

Coach Ron Murphy does have one offensive problem as Blues prepare for their biggest game in three years — the element of surprise he exploited so successfully against Queen's won't be available against Ottawa.

Ottawa coach Don Gilbert will undoubtedly use the four players whose eligibility was belatedly approved by league officials after a controversial investigation that still hasn't satisfied officials at Queen's or Toronto. Apparently, the four are all registered in Ottawa's "preliminary year" program for students lacking Grade 13, and the Murphy takes Blues to Ottawa tomorrow for eastern finals.

OUAA brass decided that this satisfies the rule that all players must be registered in a programme "leading to a recognized degree."

One of the four players involved is triple threat halfback Neil Lumsden who lead the division in scoring with 48 points and in rushing with 530 yards from 85 carries. The Toronto-schooled rookie also took top honours in punting with a 39-yard average, collected eight field goals, and handled Ottawa's kick-offs.

Gee-Gees' quarterback Dan Smith completed only 26 passes all season but picked his spots well to produce five aerial touchdowns and 20 first downs. He is a veteran of college play and an excellent option runner who played on McGill's championship team in 1969.

Blues' offence should center around quarterback Wayne Dunkley and his twin halfbacks, Cor Doret and Libert Castillo. Dunkley was the top passer with 83 completions and 1218 yards good for eight touchdowns, but he also suffered 15 interceptions. Castillo finished fourth in rushing with 293 yards and Doret was eighth with 242. However, their important versatility is reflected in the passing statistics as Doret placed second with 21 catches for 363 yards and Castillo sixth for 15 receptions and 201 yards. In fact, Doret produced more total yards than Lumsden, 605 to 555.

Esteban Andryjowicz and Brent Elsey also placed among the top eight pass receivers, but the key improvement in Blues offence has been the line play. The interior linemen have something to prove Saturday after their horrendous display in the opening game.

On defence, Blues picked off 15 opposition passes to Ottawa's nine, Blues took fewer yards in penalties (381 to 455) and coughed up fewer fumbles (three to Gee-Gees' six). However, games are won by people, not statistics.

Varsity's defensive unit has been outstanding in the past two games, and was definitely the decisive factor in the key victory over Queen's. Veteran linebackers Hartley Stern and Rob Bloxham have deservedly received most of the attention, but excellent performances were turned in last week by two rookies, corner Chris Sammut and safety Rick Jeysman.

Kick-off has been moved back to one o'clock and the game will be carried on Radio Varsity — 830 AM in residences.

Tickets are available at Hart House all day today and at Lansdowne Park Saturday morning. (If you're not near an RV outlet, call the station at 964-1484 for the latest score.)

Field hockey wins 2

By MATHILDE VERHULST

The U of T women's Intermediate Field Hockey team won two of three games in Kingston last weekend.

Friday afternoon the women played Laurentian and won 2-0. Saturday morning Toronto held the play against Queen's but the Gals managed to slip in a goal in the last five minutes, to win 1-0.

In the afternoon game against McMaster, Toronto proved to be the stronger team, defeating the Mac squad 3-1. Coach Daniel said the girls definitely played as a team rather than as individuals.

Next weekend, both Senior and Intermediate teams will play here at U of T in the final tournament. Participating universities include: McGill, Queen's, Laurentian, Western, Waterloo, McMaster, and Guelph.

Queen's is presently ahead in the Intermediate Division with two wins and a tie. Toronto has also won two, but lost one.

Part I of the OWIAA Field Hockey tournament will be held at York tomorrow.

The Death of Hockey

by Bruce Kidd

and John Macfarlane

New Press, Toronto

$5.95

"The decision to limit Team Canada to only those players who had signed NHL contracts was made by Hockey Canada's Board of Directors on August 2. The vote was 9 to 2. Voting in favour were the federal government's two representatives, Lou Lefaive and Sam Weston; the NHL's two representatives, Clarence Campbell and Harold Ballard; the CAHA's three representatives, Earl Dawson, Joseph Kryzeka and Gordon Jukes; the NHL players' representative, Alan Eagleson; and the provincial government's representative, William Clark. Voting against were Father Bauer and John Wintermeyer."

"...Despite Prime Minister Trudeau's well-publicized plea to Clarence Campbell to allow Bobby Hull to play in the Canadian-Russian series (notice, he petitioned Campbell, not Hockey Canada), the federal government did nothing to intervene." —The Death of Hockey, page 91.

The collaboration of Bruce Kidd and John Macfarlane has produced "The Death of Hockey". The book is not only an exposition of where hockey is at in Canada — all of hockey from the level of the five-year-old player to the pro —, but also a subtle attempt to convince the reader that what is needed is a national hockey league in the true sense of the word — a "nationalized" hockey league, that is.

Kidd and Macfarlane have developed the theme that "hockey is a national religion". They then embark upon an extended essay to show how the "average" Canadian has been excommunicated from the religion.

Indeed, in years past, hockey was a "community" religion — sustaining Canadians in the small outposts of the country through the winter when nothing else was available.

As the authors point out, "There have been two hockey traditions in Canada, of which the commercial tradition is just one. The other is the community tradition. At one time or another, in hundreds of Canadian towns and cities, people chipped in to build a rink and ice a hockey team, and many of these teams were as good as any in the commercial leagues."

"... Community hockey was built on love of the game particularly, love of sport generally, and community loyalty. Commercial hockey capitalized on these sentiments for private profit."

Kidd and Macfarlane successfully trace the beginnings of professional hockey in the 1880's and show how price wars and league wars eventually starved out competition to make the NHL the monopoly which it is today.

Since the end of World War II, the NHL has owned hockey in Canada. Kidd and Macfarlane reveal how this happened. "1947 was the NHL's thirtieth anniversary, and it had cause to celebrate. For all intents and purposes, it now owned hockey in Canada. It had eliminated its major source of competition, the senior community leagues, and it now managed most of the junior clubs that produced the country's young players."

However, consistent with the mood of the book, the authors are not content merely to expose the sordid history of the rise of the NHL American empire. They also take a position: "The issue is whether hockey, which is a part of our culture, should be operated as if it were just a business, like the manufacture of razor blades. The answer is no."

When Kidd and Macfarlane get around to specific recommendations in their final chapter, they have already quite successfully interwoven fact with the reader's emotion to make the alternatives so obvious that any Canadian must reply: "Damn it, they're right!"

"A game nurtured by generations of Canadians has been sold to Americans...."

"To stay in business," Clarence Campbell likes to say, "you place your operations in places that will keep you in business."

To save hockey, Kidd and Macfarlane make two recommendations: that the government separates the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association from the National Hockey League, and that a Canadian professional hockey league is created.

Furthermore, "the success of such a league is dependent on two assumptions. The first is community ownership... Professional hockey should be operated as a public utility... The single biggest cost in operating a professional hockey team is salaries, which brings us to our second assumption: that it is not necessary to pay hockey players $100,000 a year. Community-owned teams could afford to pay salaries between $25,000 and $30,000 a year, which would put the players in the top 5 per cent of Canadian wage earners."

The second recommendation should not be scoffed at. Kidd and Macfarlane have demonstrated how teams were once financially supported by communities.

Other recommendations include the building of more rinks so that everyone of all ages may participate, the establishment of a national hockey institute to develop skills, strategy, and training methods suitable to Canadian conditions and experience, and a national coaching program.

The emotional tenor of the book is set in chapter 1. "The game is a national puberty rite, performed by wobbly-legged kids for congregations of rink-side parents"; and "hockey as a unique expression of our culture, is also a vessel for its values, passing them from father-to-son from one generation to the next". Through hockey, "a boy learns our attitudes towards team play, fair play, and dirty play, towards winning and losing, tolerance and prejudice, success and failure."

"If hockey is a metaphor for what is right with Canada, it is also a metaphor for what is wrong. Hockey has come to symbolize our capitulation to the economic realities as severely as it does our triumph over the physical ones. We live in a country we no longer own."

While the theme of the book is what must be done to rediscover hockey is Canada, there is considerable attention paid to the how and why of the hockey disaster.

Television is a key factor in the downfall of hockey in Canada. Hockey has become the vassal of the television networks (and multi-national companies who do the advertising for games.) Because of advertising, "Hockey Night in Canada is less a report of an event than an advertisement for one."

As Kidd and Macfarlane reveal, "The fans are being used". And, "unfortunately, the NHL sets the style for all hockey in Canada. The undesirable characteristics of the professional game are emulated in neighbourhood rinks and arenas, where hockey is not a business". The medium has become the message on the junior level for legalized violence. "None of this is lost on the kids. They see dirty play rewarded so they assume it is one of the skills of the game, like skating and stickhandling."

Kidd and Macfarlane's chapter on the "child buyers" is must reading for every parent of an aspiring NHLer. Whereas with TV the fans are being used, with the "child buying" philosophy prevalent in the NHL and permeated down through its lower tentacle, the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association, the parents and players are being used.

As the authors say, "Hockey should be fun, a game played for the excitement and satisfaction it brings players while they are playing it and the delight it brings spectators while they are watching it. The joy of hockey is of the moment."

The NHL's lack of talent development is directly criticized — talent is only discovered. There is no school of hockey talent, and other than innovations such as the goaltender's mask, there has been no attempt to refine equipment, much less establish a school for hockey equipment safety.

Here too is an account of the systematic killing of the "National Team idea" in Canada by the NHL, with the CAHA complicit and the federal government playing the role of the ostrich with its head in the sand.

Kidd and Macfarlane also detail how the player's life is affected by the "business of hockey". "The players accept their (fans') admiration and then turn it to selling red convertibles. It is like going to church and having the minister try to sell you a refrigerator". However, the "tragedy is that the player-businessman is an anti-sportsman."

The hook has something for everyone — and in particular the "gentlemen" of the press — the "cheerleaders".

Owning an NHL hockey team means never having to spend a buck on promotion. The press flogs the game for nothing". (The press also refuses to flog some aspects of the game if, for example, the NHL clubs are able to persuade the "house-man" reporter not to give WHA coverage.) Indeed, poor reporting has been an accomplice to hockey's demise" for "sport is also technique, strategy" and, no less than any other aspect of our lives, ethics. These the sports reporters by and large ignore... In the absence of criticism, sports reporting becomes little more than free advertising."

The book is well-researched and thorough. If the idea behind writing the book is to shock, the content will do that, but it may fail to carry that shock wave through to the appropriate government level because of the tone. The ripple effect of discontent may dissipate before anything positive is done.

The book also leaves a vacuum with regard to the hockey equipment lobby one might find in Ottawa. There is no analysis as to how the manufacturers have created a need for protective gear and have been complicit in going along with the "consumer is king" philosophy.

Recently, one well-known equipment manufacturer made it known that the "cage-type" goaltender mask was safer than the "flush-on-face" mask. Yet, when asked why the company was manufacturing the other mask (the cage-type has been on the market longer), the response was a glib "kids see NHL goaltenders with the flush face mask and want it instead of the cage mask." Also, what about curved hockey sticks and ski skates with ski-boot type buckles? A child playing hockey is apt to tear his face open. Questions such as these leave the book wanting.

Kidd and Macfarlane also can be criticized for their off-the-cuff statement that kids quit hockey because of the "spirit of the age". It "is peace, hedonism, and individualism, and the example of hockey, the cheap unsportsmanlike play in the NHL, the frenzied compulsion to win in the little leagues, is alien to these values. The kids play the game for a few years as a ritual, and then happily quit." For every Canadian boy possessed by the "spirit of the age", there are a dozen whom parents or coach or television are encouraging to "get ahead" and "get on" with the business of hockey.

No other hockey expose has come along in recent years to compare with this work. Even if some of the authors' arguments have loopholes or can be proved wrong, their philosophy is correct. The detail is all here.

As Kidd and Macfarlane say "We play hockey to win, we play hockey to make money, but we have forgotten what it is to play hockey for fun. That, more than anything else, signals the death of the game."

There is hope. "We can clean up the game at the neighbourhood rink. It is our game. If we want it back we will have to take it back."

Is this scientist conducting research for the American armed forces? More than half the U.S. military grants to foreign institutions go to Canadian universities and organizations, says a McGill survey.

Canada receives $34 million from Pentagon, survey finds

MONTREAL (CUPI) — The Pentagon gave Canada $34 million for research during 1967-71, more than half the amount granted to all foreign educational and non-profit organizations, a report on Canadian involvement with the American military says. And some 348 companies in Canada received direct military contracts from the U.S. Department of Defence (DOD) during that time.

Entitled "How to Make a Killing", the 250-page study was conducted by seven students at McGill University under the direction of political science professor S. J. Noumouff. The group calls itself Project Anti-war.

The report quotes a U.S. Air Force publication as saying "Granted funds are always used to achieve maximum contribution to the new knowledge essential to the continued superiority of the air force operational capability, and it is assumed that grantees and principal investigators will always direct their efforts to this end".

McGill University received $831,415 from the Pentagon from 1967 to 1971 and more than $663,000 was for prime military contracts. The rest went toward basic scientific investigation.

In developing the study, Project Anti-war referred to American and Canadian government records, and wrote to private corporations, inquiring whether they had received Pentagon contracts.

Four companies who replied that they had nothing to do with the defence department were found in fact to have contracts. These include Canadian, General Electric, North American Rockwell and Canadian Westinghouse whose parent companies do extensive work for the DOD, and Okanagan helicopters, which received contracts valued at $23,000.

The Canadian government itself is also very extensively involved in the war industry, subsidizing production of material destined for use by U.S. forces in Indochina. The study shows that the Department of Trade and Commerce awarded a total of $458,643,906 to 154 companies in Canada "to develop and sustain its (the defense industry's) technological capability for the purpose of defense export sales arising from that capability".

Of the 154 companies receiving grants, 45 are American owned and they obtained $224,492,428 or 47 per cent of the total.

Thus, not only does the Canadian government fund American companies for war research to be used in the U.S., but it also pays one half the costs of equipment used for plant modernization.

The Canadian government also prints two catalogues listing military supplies available from Canadian industry. Canadian Defense Commodities is published by the Department of Trade, Industry and Commerce, and Canadian Defense Products is printed by the Department of Defense Production.

The Production Sharing Handbook, also published by the Department of Defense Production, provides explicit information on how to obtain American DOD contracts. Most contracts are placed with Canadian Commercial Corporation, a Crown corporation which acts as an intermediary between the American government and the Canadian producer.

Project Anti-war, pointing out that its study is preliminary and only indicates minimum amounts awarded, says the other 30 million dollars awarded by the Pentagon to foreign educational and non-profit organizations for research by the defense department between 1967 and 1971 went to 56 other countries.

The list includes such so-called neutral countries as Austria, Finland, Sweden and Switzerland, along with Bolivia, Brazil, France, Greece, Israel, Japan, South Korea, South Africa, Spain, Taiwan and the United Kingdom.

After Canada's $34 million, Norway tops the list with nine million dollars in grants.

During their research, project workers discovered that classified Canadian data is available publicly in the U.S.

Twelve days after that press conference, and 33 days after the group mailed their original request for information to the Canadian Department of Trade Industry and Commerce, the department sent the research group a list of 211 companies which it had previously withheld on the grounds that such action would harm the "competitive positions of the companies involved".

The letter accompanying the list explained "this listing contains the names of all Canadian companies who over the past six years (1966 - 1971 inclusive) received unclassified contracts for defence equipment through the Canadian Commercial Corporation which came under the umbrella of Canada/U.S. Department of Defense or any of its branches." The new listing included 111 companies which the group had not even found in its own research.

Report varies little from draft

A detailed outline of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education's final report reveals that there will be few changes made from the original draft in the area of financing.

Apart from a recommendation that church-affiliated colleges be eligible for the same financial support as secular colleges, the report to be presented to the provincial government varies little from its original draft.

Minor changes only were made in the recommendation for a new student loan and grant scheme. The commission still advocates "awards large enough to pay the student's tuition fees and to provide his maintenance while at school."

The final report, however, is more specific on whom is eligible for such grants, restricting them to those whose parents earn up to a maximum of $15,000 (by 1972 standards).

The loan system originally proposed still recommends a program open to all students with a repayment plan based on the individual's "ability to pay".

In the final draft, however, the commission recommends that the loan be forgiven only after 30 years, instead of after the original 15 proposed in the draft report.

Church colleges should get more: leaked report

By LINDA McQUAIG

St. Mike's, Victoria and Trinity Colleges will get a boost in their long struggle with the provincial government for badly-needed funds when the Commission on Post Secondary Education makes its final report later this year, The Varsity has learned.

A detailed outline of the unpublished report, given to The Varsity last night, reveals the government-appointed commission will recommend that, subject to a few minor qualifications, "church-affiliated colleges should be eligible for the same financial support as secular colleges" now receive.

The original draft of the commission's report on the future of advanced education in Ontario, released last January amid heavy criticism, made no recommendations on the problem of financing of church-affiliated colleges.

St. Mike's, Victoria and Trinity have been in serious financial trouble for many years due to a system of financing which provides church-affiliated colleges with only half the grant per student that other colleges receive.

The financing of the three colleges has long been a controversial issue, with the colleges making continual, but unsuccessful submissions to the provincial government for a more equitable grant scheme.

What weight the commission's recommendations for such a scheme will have is not clear, however, since the body is only empowered to advise the government, not formulate policy.

The commission is not entirely removed from government policy-making, however, since its chairman, D. O. Davis is also chairman of the Committee of University Affairs, a branch of the Department of Colleges and Universities.

Vic and Trinity have survived the financial squeeze only by digging into their endowments, which were built up in the days when religious training was considered an important part of education, and affluent members of the United and Anglican Churches provided the colleges with generous financial support.

St. Mike's, although lacking in endowments, has managed to scrape through by relying on priests and nuns to teach for little or no money, SMC president John Kelly said in an interview last night.

The three colleges may have gained some ground in the struggle this summer. After years of approaching the government with their requests, this August the province finally approached them, to discuss financing of the colleges.

Kelly says he has not yet heard of any positive results of the meeting but adds that the government at least "showed a willingness to rethink this thing."

The financial situation of the three colleges has become increasingly worse since 1966, when the federal government abandoned its former program of supporting all colleges with direct grants. Instead it channelled its education funds into a provincial government scheme that discriminated against colleges with church affiliation by giving them grants half the size of those given to secular colleges.

The colleges have argued that their religious affiliations do not affect or influence their teaching of non-religious subjects, and therefore should not be counted against them.

"The government hasn't a leg to stand on", Kelly says.

The commission's recommendation for equal financing stipulates that public funds are not to be used for the purposes of religious indoctrination.

Kelly admits that some of his staff who teach courses in religious studies do have a bias in topics like the existence of God and other traditional Catholic beliefs. Religious courses are not compulsory, however.

He also pointed out that the three colleges do not discriminate on the grounds of religion in their admissions policies, which was another stipulation made by the commission in their recommendation for equal financing.

St. Mike's was in debt about $650,000 this summer, but Kelly estimates the present debt, after receiving tuition payments, at $350,000.

He has faith, however, that the college will be financially rescued.

"I believe in the providence of God," he said.

Meetings of Food Science committee closed

By JONI SEAGER

A committee examining Senate recommendations on the future of the Faculty of Food Sciences is holding closed meetings to expedite reaching agreement on a report.

The Implementation Committee on the Faculty of Food Sciences, set up by the Governing Council on the recommendation of the Academic Affairs Committee, held its first meeting two weeks ago.

Associate dean of Arts and Science James Cruise, chairman of the committee, explained that the meetings were to be closed because "the committee decided that they would feel more free in their discussions, and therefore more effective as a committee if they were closed."

However, he added that the committee had decided that the "sense of the discussions" did not need to be treated as confidential.

Any documents received by, or generated by, this committee will be confidential as much of their work "has all kinds of political ramifications, since there may well be forthcoming changes recommended which would mean changing utilization of resources, including personnel," Cruise said.

Their report is due to be completed not later than January 31 next year to be given vice-president Don Forster, and through him to the Academic Affairs Committee.

Brian Morgan, student governor on the Academic Affairs Committee, said yesterday that unless it was specified otherwise, he presumed that the meetings would be open.

However, Forster, contacted last night, said it was up to the committee to decide. He added that it was not a precedent for such a committee to decide itself whether its meetings would be open or closed.

Asked if he approved of the committee having closed meetings, Forster replied, "I wouldn't know; it's up to them."

Morgan stated that he felt the meetings should be open, and that approval from Academic Affairs should have been sought before the meetings were closed.

"If they are not open" he declared, "I feel that it should be brought up for discussion at the Academic Affairs Committee."

There are two students on this committee; Irene Miller, an undergraduate, and graduate student Susan Stoddart, both in the Faculty of Food Sciences.

Miller, who is also a SAC rep for food science students, said last night that she did not object to the meetings being closed.

"Because of the deadline ... there's so much dirty laundry, it's best that they be closed," she said. She described the three-month deadline as "ridiculous", saying she feared the report would be pushed through unless carefully examined.

The other committee members are: Professors F. A. Sherk (Assistant Dean of the School of Graduate Studies), George Connell (Medicine), W. Harrington (Social Work), Maurice Wayman (Engineering), George Beaton Hygiene, M. Leitch (Food Sciences) and J.P. Siegel (Management Studies).

The recommendations that they are reviewing are those made by a Senate committee last May. The Senate committee was set up after faculty, students and alumni protested a recommendation by vice-provost (Health Sciences) John Hamilton that the faculty be phased out.

The Senate report recommends, among other things, the development of two strong undergraduate programs, one in household sciences and the second in food chemistry and nutrition. These programs, Cruise said, would utilize "special talents that would be found, let's say, in hygiene, through cross-appointments."

The second main recommendation of the Senate committee is for the development of a strong graduate program offering MA and PhD programs in food chemistry and nutrition.

The aim of the Senate report is to encourage high calibre students to enter these faculties, and to produce high quality, type A certificated high school teachers.

Students to enumerate residences

A "mini-enumeration is planned for all campus residences this week to make up for a poor municipal enumeration carried out by the province.

Pete Raybould (Trin III) and SAC have organized teams of students to distribute applications to get on voters lists for the December 4 election to all students in residence. The period when names will be accepted by the City Clerk expires Friday.

Voters lists, according to the municipal clerks, were posted last week in each poll. Eligible voters can be checked to see if their names are on the lists either by finding the posted list or by calling the City Clerk's office at 367-7800 between 9 am and 9 pm each day this week until Friday.

Raybould decided to try to have more students enumerated after it was discovered that Trinity, New and University Colleges had not been enumerated. At Victoria College, only four persons of over 500 in residence managed to get on the preliminary voters list.

An official in the provincial assessment office, which was responsible for the enumeration, said that the poor enumeration was "probably due to a somewhat less than administrative decision."

Clerk Pat Carberry said that the enumerators responsible for the college residences probably decided the residences weren't worth enumerating.

However, it is more likely that the enumerators were simply following instructions printed in the enumeration manual prepared by the assessment office.

This manual, which was seemingly later repudiated, stated that students living in a college or university residence, or in an apartment without a signed lease, were to be considered as having voting rights only in their 'home' district, presumably where their families live.

However, according to the Municipal Elections Act passed by the Ontario Legislature earlier this year, persons may vote in a municipality if they are "resident in such municipality."

A persons' residence is defined by the act as "his true, fixed, permanent home or lodging place to which whenever he is absent he has the intention of returning."

A further qualification states that "the place where a person's family resides shall be his residence unless he takes up or continues his residence at some other place with the intention of remaining there."

Thus a student would be eligible if she or he were willing to declare that the residence was the permanent residence.

Advertisements placed with Toronto papers by Metro Toronto clerks, responsible for revision to the voters lists, last week suggest even more lenient grounds for eligibility to vote municipally.

These ads indicate that "if you are 18 years old, a Canadian citizen or other British subject and resided in your municipality at any time between September

"5th and October 10th", you are eligible to vote on December 4.

As a last resort, prospective voters can go the appropriate polling place on election day, declare the required information to the deputy returning officer and vote, according to section 54 of the act. However, the declaration, particularly the place of residence, must be established "to the satisfaction of the deputy returning officer."

Raybould, with help from SAC, has distributed leaflets advising students in residence of their rights. This week, he and a team of volunteers intend to visit all residence to sign up students who wish to vote.

This can be done on an "Application for Preliminary List of Electors," which either the prospective voter or an agent acting on her or his behalf can submit to the City Clerk at City Hall before 9 pm this Friday.

Volunteers to distribute and collect statements are asked to contact Raybould at 928-3282 or Paul Carson at SAC (928-4911).

SAC will collect statements and take them to City Hall for those who are missed by the teams. Blank applications will also be available at the SAC office.

According to Raybould, the supervisor of elections for Metro Toronto, F.H. Matthews at first insisted in an interview that students in residence had to appear in person at City Hall to have their names added to voters lists. However, Matthews later relented and allowed agents to bring the forms to City Hall.

Rents are too high, charge married students

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Married Students' Residence tenants Steve Scadding and Rick Merrill yesterday claimed that the Ontario Housing Corporation is charging students unrealistic rents for apartments.

Rents went up about seven per cent this fall. For example a two bedroom 11th floor apartment which rented for $167 in 1968 and $176 in 1971 now costs $188.

Two bedroom apartments rent for $179 - $194, one bedroom apartments for $157 - $170 (550 square feet) or $149 - $164 (500 square feet), and bachelor apartments for $125 - $138.

Scadding said that the rents are comparable to other apartments "with the same lack of facilities". Nevertheless they were "out of line for students", he asserted.

"No married student couple can afford to live here," he said; "usually one spouse is working. Either that or the couple is being parentally subsidized."

Scadding questioned OHC's claims that it is not taking any profit from the two buildings on Charles Street. He asserted that its policy of "full recovery" is, in the long run, a profit-making policy.

OHC is not taking an operating profit from the rent revenues. However it will receive the increased equity of the building and the land when the mortgage is paid off. Scadding said that when the rents have paid off the mortgage, the students will, in effect, have bought the building for OHC.

Tenants who staged a rent strike in the spring of 1970 demanded that OHC gear rents so that the value of the building and that the land would be considered as assets in determining costs. The strike failed.

The building is amortized for 50 years. Merrill suggested that if OHC would be willing to pay for the building and the land over a longer period of time the rents could be lower.

Scadding said that these buildings are the only student residences in Ontario other than those at Queen's University not on university land. Hence they do not fall under the provincial tax exemption for university property.

About 25 per cent of the incoming revenue goes to municipal taxes.

Scadding claimed that U of T made a bad deal with OHC for the apartment buildings and is only now beginning to realize it.

"They wanted a married students' apartment building for nothing," Scadding said, "and so they made this deal."

Under the terms of "this deal" signed in 1968 - the university is committed to absorb any deficits OHC incurs. Yet the university has no control of the operation of the buildings. It controls only the type of student admitted.

There is nothing the students can do about the rents - except move out, which many of them have done.

Ten per cent of the 713 apartments in the two buildings are vacant, Scadding said, costing OHC over $10,000 a month.

"You can see why the university has been advertising all over the place" he said.

The university has also relaxed its admission requirements.

Law entrance students and medical students who are registered in U of T, though they actually work and study in various hospitals around the city, are being admitted. Tenants no longer have to be full-time students, Scadding said, explaining that school students are now allowed to rent apartments.

Few married students can afford to live in this residence, claim some of the tenants. Ten per cent of the apartments are vacant.

"I don't think I've ever said I represent the undergraduates."
— student governor Paul Cederio overheard at the SAC office

Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Contradictory SAC ignores students

The Students' Administrative Council out did itself Wednesday evening as it managed to hit a new record for inconsistency.

Just weeks before, U of T students had voted overwhelmingly in favour of Ontario Federation of Students' demands for increased accessibility to student aid schemes, full consultation of all concerned before any further detrimental changes to post-secondary financing programs occur, and repeal of last spring's $100 tuition fee hike and raise in the student loan ceiling.

But last week, SAC virtually scuttled plans for a mass demonstration of Ontario secondary students scheduled to greet MPP's attending next month's opening of the Ontario Legislature. They managed that feat of provincial co-operation by refusing to participate in the protest. As the largest member institution and headquartered around the Legislature buildings, U of T would have been relied upon to play a key role in the organization and implementation of the demonstration.

SAC backed down from the protest because it feared negative public reaction, and was reluctant to invest the amount of time and organization required.

As for public opinion, the OFS blueprint for action called for an educational campaign which would continue to show the community that the government's moves have not benefited them and will have a detrimental, non-egalitarian effect in the long-run.

The students wouldn't have been the first to demonstrate peacefully and attract positive public opinion in the process. It's only in the minds of the indifferent that demonstrations automatically court negative reactions.

And, what other project more justly merits the time and effort of student councils than righting post-secondary education policy in the best interests of the council's student body and the community in general?

The decision proves SAC isn't seriously interested in students and student aid.

The opposition campaign and referendum were fine while they lasted, but council members don't want to get themselves inadvertently caught in any situation which might have some political punch to it. Instead, they're content to have OFS continue chatting with government officials until it's too late to affect anything else the government might have up their sleeves.

Many members of this year's council were elected on a platform of stopping telling their constituents what to do and instead starting to find out what they want their reps to do. SAC's rejection of the referendum results certainly doesn't represent such an attitude.

Nor did U of T's opposition to all actions proposed at last weekend's OFS general meeting reflect the will of U of T students.

Moreover, SAC seems relatively disinterested in the fact that its decision practically kills the possibility of other universities and community colleges being able to mount the demonstration.

The inconsistent SAC voting pattern on two other OFS resolutions tied into the rejected demonstration clearly illustrates the ludicrousness of the SAC position. A motion calling for the seeking of endorsement and support from various community groups for the demonstration initially passed council and was subsequently wiped out to the relief of the embarrassed councillors. Another, however, instructing OFS to initiate momentum building actions in the community and educational institutions prior to the day of protest never got erased from the minutes.

Council also widened its credibility by refusing to help finance the visit to campus of Black Panther Bobby Seale after giving the visit its support in principle only the week before.

SAC's flippant attitude to the request for financial support further indicates if for its active policy of non-involvement. Unfortunately non-involvement won't get SAC or the people it's supposed to be representing anywhere.

Losing money, Bassett gains; city suffers

A year ago today, The Toronto Telegram folded up shop and published its last issue.

Money was the reason for closing down Toronto's other afternoon paper, publisher John Bassett told his readers, but he didn't lose a cent by the move. In fact, Bassett stood to net at least $7 million by locking up shop.

The Star, Bassett's competition for the afternoon market, paid the Tely $10 million for a subscribers' list it didn't really need (after all, there was no other afternoon paper to which readers could turn) and couldn't use in practical terms. And, in a move that later turned out to be a lifesaver for the gremlin-struck new Star presses, the Star kicked in another $2 million or so for a two-year lease on the Tely building. Those transactions wiped out the Tely debts, losses incurred not because of rising labour costs or insufficient readership, according to a Tely-commissioned study, but because of poor management at the top.

After the bills were paid, Bassett cleared the approximate $7 million The Globe and Mail paid to buy the Tely building. Not too bad for somebody who was supposed to be irretrievably in debt.

Eliminating its major competition was worth the money to The Star. But, has the creation of a monopoly in the Toronto afternoon newspaper market done anything more than bolster the (Star publisher Beland) Honderich empire?

Besides throwing 1,200 Tely employees out of work, the closing gave birth to Toronto's tabloid sensation sheet, The Sun, and forced Star advertising revenue sky high. In fact, the Star has successfully weathered two steep advertising rate hikes since the Tely folded.

But, increased advertising also means increased editorial space in the newspaper game. And, the Star, whose journalistic standards were already plummeting before the Tely death, has gone nowhere but down, aware that no matter how bad it gets a readership weaned on an afternoon paper won't give up on buying its wares.

Religion has come to the Star by way of five or more truncated, Monday morning articles reporting sermons by gospel unknowns. And, so Honderich knows what's doing below his harbour-front windows, each Star records what wonderful goods are stored aboard the ships which have come into port.

With no one but the relatively minor league Globe and Sun to compete, the Star's editorial policy, increasingly conservative, has become more and more arrogant. When the Star talks, everybody had better listen, it reasons.

When the Liberals wouldn't endorse the Star's Canadian nationalism policy, Honderich and gang got revenge. They switched political allegiance after 50 years of Liberal support and reluctantly endorsed the Conservatives. Interestingly, the Tories the next day released a foreign ownership policy which incorporated some of Star director Walter Gordon's long-time proposals although falling considerably short of the Star position.

Not content with merely shifting to the PC's, the Star turned its conversion into major news, playing it up all over the paper. Had the Tory Tely not folded, it's less likely the Star would have changed bases. And, other media would have paid less attention to the performance.

As for the Sun, it's taken the worst of the Tely and added a bit more of its own to do little if anything to improve the morning market.

Meanwhile, John Bassett - the man whose paper boasted, "The Telegram cares" - basks in the glow of his Tely profits, undoubtedly with few regrets about transforming Toronto into a one afternoon paper town.

Not satisfied with settlement

The Service Employees' International Union here at the University of Toronto is little more than an extension of the university's personnel department. This was proven once again at the union meeting on Saturday.

At our last meeting, last June, we voted that the union would settle for nothing less than a "No Contracting Out" clause. This was the key issue. The university intends to get rid of most of the unionized workers on campus and hire non-union, minimum wage contracting firms to do the work.

In The Varsity last spring, the new president, Evans, said this was to be his policy. The university has hired the son of Cordon MacEachern, owner of the big contract cleaning company to head their cleaning staff.

Last year, York University began by giving a large wage increase in the last contract instead of a no contracting out clause. Then they contracted out cleaning in their new buildings. Slowly they are easing out the unionized workers. Once this process begins it's very hard to stop. U of T intends to do the same thing.

"Our" union's business agent, Barclay, began the meeting October 21 with an outright lie. He began by saying that the union had won the big demand, "No Contracting Out", but that they had to fight tooth and nail for it.

Here is what the union actually got by their own summary: "1. Job security -- It is agreed that any employee who was employed by the employer with two years of service or more shall not be laid off by reason of the employer contracting out the work being performed by such employee. However, in such event, the employer agrees that the employee will be placed in another job with a similar rate and be retrained. Further, it is agreed that all employees with one year of service at the date of signing this agreement will be afforded the above mentioned job security."

All this amounts to is a plan to keep some of the staff as they begin laying off the rest. When some of us brought this up in the meeting -- there were no floor mikes in a big hall -- Barclay said that that was our opinion, but that he didn't believe that the university would do such a thing.

And, anyway, that was the best that they could get. Why do you suppose the university fought this issue so hard? Now, Mr. Barclay is no fool; he simply sold us out.

'Contracting out' was the first thing on the agenda. We then spent two hours discussing 27 other small items from the contract that won't mean a thing if there are no jobs.

By now many had forgotten the details of the first item, contracting out, and only 35 voted against accepting the contract. In The Varsity last Monday, Barclay said that these were people who didn't understand what they were voting for -- probably didn't apeak English.

The union heils this as a victory. Now they can raise the union dues and send more money to Washington, the union headquarters, that is until we're all gone in about two years. The time to stop this process is before it starts.

Why wasn't quote polished?

Regarding the verb used in the initial comment attributed to me (in last week's sports story "Pharm ends SMC win streak") I believe fuddled would more suitably express the sentiment expressed. Regarding the second comment, it was quoted out of context. Rather than being a comment on the player's ability, it was a defence of the player in view of the criticism extended by the reporter.

According to IRA leader; Struggle must unite Ulster working class

By ELAINE FARRAGHER

The conflict in Ireland is not a religious struggle, said Sean O'Toole, head of the official wing of the Irish Republican Army, on Friday.

"The terms 'Catholic' and 'Protestant' have a different meaning in Ireland than elsewhere in the world", he explained. "The term 'Protestant' is used loosely to describe a person who is in favour of the connection with Britain".

He said that the split in the north was originally caused by the Protestant bourgeoisie who used religious sectarianism to put Protestant workers against Catholic workers.

O'Toole described the present civil rights struggle as a necessity in order to unite the northern Irish working class, presently split by religious sectarianism.

He told his Innis College audience that civil rights were the real issue in Ireland, not bombings, which he described as a disastrous tactic.

The civil rights struggle is extremely important in Northern Ireland says O'Toole. The polarized working class must be brought together again and this can only be done by winning a section of them their equal rights with the other.

He maintained that if religious sectarianism could be ended in the north, and a bill of rights established, the Unionist party would be defeated because the basis of its cohesiveness would be gone.

"Civil rights", said O'Toole, "cuts across class lines."

O'Toole traced the development of the Irish independence movement beginning with the formation of the Home Rule Party in 1911, a bourgeois party which demanding that stringent tariffs be set up between England and Ireland in order to aid the growth of Irish industry.

He said that the bourgeoisie of north-eastern Ireland, what is now "Northern Ireland", opposed the demand of the Home Rule Party, since they alone already had a developed industry which was highly integrated with the British.

"Thus", said O'Toole, "they would have suffered severely had they been separated from Britain by a wall of tariff barriers.

O'Toole went on to describe the struggle of the Home Rule Party.

The popularity of the movement was such that Britain was forced to placate the people by promising that the tariffs would be implemented but only after the first World War had been won, because it needed troops from Ireland.

Meanwhile, said O'Toole, north and south forces for and against home rule were being organized and armed. In the north, the Ulster Volunteer Force was formed to oppose it and in retaliation, the National Volunteer Force was formed in the south.

In addition to these armies in the south was the Irish Republican Brotherhood (IRB) which was pledged to gain independence from Britain by armed force and proceeded to infiltrate the Home Rule nationalists. There was also the Irish Citizen Army ICA, a worker's militia formed in 1913 to fight against lockouts by industry, and led by James Connolly, who was determined to fight for Irish socialism and independence.

O'Toole said the IRB and the ICA decided to take advantage of England's preoccupation with the war to start the "Easter uprising" of 1916 which, lacking popular support, was put down by the British Army in Dublin. But, said O'Toole, the otherwise apathetic Irish turned militant when 16 leaders of the uprising were executed. The public outrage which followed the executions marked a turning point in the struggle for home rule.

In 1918, the last general election held by England in Ireland demonstrated "once and for all" the desire of the Irish for independence. The Sinn Fein Party promised that, if elected, it would take its seats in an Irish parliament, not in Westminster in England. O'Toole said that this election was actually a plebiscite for independence. Nearly 80 per cent voted in favour of a republic for Ireland.

But England would not accept this verdict, said O'Toole. Between 1918 and 1921 the Irish fought a guerilla war of independence. In 1921, the battle-weary Sinn Fein government accepted a British settlement that severed Northern Ireland from the rest of the country.

But, said O'Toole, many Irish republicans considered the signing of this treaty a sell-out and refused to recognize it. Thus began the civil war of Ireland. Under threat of the British to declare the treaty void and indulge in full-scale war, if the violence continued, the Sinn Fein-controlled "free states" bombarded Ireland's "Four Courts" occupied by the rebellious republicans. By 1923, the republicans were defeated and there was peace in the south, but, not said O'Toole, without much bitterness.

Meanwhile in the north, a unionist parliament subject to Britain was set up and began to function. In 1926, it passed the "Special Powers Act" which, said O'Toole, gave the government absolute power over any citizen in Northern Ireland. It was effectively used against the nationalist community in the form of internment without trial.

For 50 years little changed in Northern Ireland. O'Toole said "It has taken the Irish republicans a long time to discover and react to the discrimination against them."

A guerrilla war campaign waged along the border of Northern Ireland from 1957 to 1962 had little public support.

Committee to study Toike Oike

By ELAINE KAHN

The Engineering Society last week voted to set up a committee to study the society's paper, the Toike Oike, in response to mounting criticism of its content.

The decision to set up the committee came after a long "discussion" between Engineering Society president Scott Joliffe and Toike editor Ron Jamieson. Joliffe later said he was reacting to complaints that had been made to him about the Toike.

Engineering dean James Ham also spoke to Joliffe and Jamieson, again relaying complaints he said he had received. Ham suggested that the philosophy behind publishing the Toike should be examined.

As an example of controversial content, Jamieson cited religious jokes in a recent issue. He stated that they were printed because of their satiric value, not in order to offend people.

The philosophy behind what is printed in the Toike is the central issue, said dean of engineering James Ham. Though he feels the paper has printed "some pretty pornographic stuff", his concern is not with what is printed but with the "ethos" of the paper.

Joliffe agrees that it is a question of the Toike's standard. He posed the question: Is the standard one of "mere grossness" or is it standard of quality?

He stated he feels that there appears to be no standard at all. He said the purpose of the Toike is to provide a light-hearted newspaper for students, to publicize engineering society activities and to keep engineers informed on subjects of interest.

Jamieson said that the Toike has changed in recent years and that many people like to remember it as it was - "dull". But "we're attacking this in the spirit of cooperation", Jamieson said. "There's no major confrontation".

Ham and Joliffe both agreed that the purpose of the committee is not to censor the Toike or restrict editorial policy.

Ham rejected any image of himself as being the "puritanical dean" and stated that "Clipping type censorship is anathema to me. Every editor should live by his convictions."

Joliffe said the public is not aware of how editorial policy is arrived at, but it knows that the Engineering Society publishes the Toike so most complaints come to it or the dean, rather than to the editor.

Accordingly, the committee is also studying the relationship of the society to the Toike. Joliffe thinks there is little chance that the paper will become financially independent of the society.

Mesmerized by promise of social legislation

Wednesday, The Varsity looked at the real nature of poverty and some of the reasons it exists in capitalist society. Today, we conclude our study with an examination of why existing anti-poverty programs are ineffective, and consider some alternative suggestions.

By GORD MOORE
reprinted from The Chevron

The Real Poverty Report went somewhat beyond the personal attributes and description of the individual poor, but with its limited conceptual framework barely analyzed the structural relations producing exploitation and impoverishment. Of the reams of information contained in the report, its study of the federal government's band-aid social welfare programs was particularly illuminating as to the futility of dealing with the symptoms of poverty. Included in the report's over-view of public services and "the poor", were the following:

Concerning housing needs for the poor, the authors of The Real Poverty Report said these needs are not being met because the current government housing policy is primarily directed at producing housing for the middle-class. In March, 1969, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) produced a report which showed that during 1968 the families in the lower third of the income strata — those earning less than $5,751 per year — made up only 6.5 per cent of all borrowers under the National Housing Act, legislation which was created specifically for low-income groups.

Out of the existence of the tight market on low-rent housing in Canada has come the development of "urban renewal" and "public housing", with the purpose of urban renewal being primarily to "upgrade the urban environment". The CMHC has stressed the elimination of conditions generating slums, and the provision of "decent, safe, and sanitary housing accommodations that ... are fair and reasonable having regard to the incomes of the persons to be dispossessed".

The report quite rightly saw that the prime motive of this program is not an attack on poverty, although it was firmly believed by those who instituted it that the poor were made better off by this discomfiting process.

In addition, the authors put their collective finger on a government policy that prophesies if enough houses are built, the affluent will move into newer units, leaving supply to "trickle down" to "the poor". This plan has proved to be ineffective, and in fact has worked in reverse. The rich merely use more space and a negligible amount of housing trickles down.

What the report failed to stress is that "adequate public housing" alone will not solve the problems of poor families. All too often such units are located where land is cheap and where the neighbours will not complain, and far from places of employment and shopping.

The search for low-cost units has led to extremely dense development in large centres, aggravating social tension in the neighbourhood and creating class ghetto situations for residents. Also, they have often been managed as if the property were more important than the persons using it.

Outside of sentimental and symptomatic descriptions of what it is like to be out of a job, especially with a family to support, The Real Poverty Report concluded that unemployment can be "directly traced to the federal government which has failed to overcome the lack of demand in the economy through the misuse of the stabilization policy". They mildly argued that the government should "abandon its practice of fighting inflation by creating unemployment", a point that certainly could have used some dwelling on.

Professor David Sewell, an assistant professor of economics at Queen's University, recently shed more light on the nature and fundamental causes of unemployment in Canada. He contends that quite often educational attainment is used as an artificial barrier to entry into particular occupations.

Sewell further maintains that use of education as a screening device results in a re-distribution of income from the less highly educated to the more highly educated. Also, individuals are encouraged to "over-invest" in education and the less educated are, for artificial reasons, kept out of occupations in which their productivity would be highest.

Hypnotized liberals

As for direct government programs, The Real Poverty Report indicated that "the most successful demands for financial support and subsidies in Canada have come from the business community, while other groups, notably the workers, have been less lucky in stimulating the charitable impulses of the government. Aid to the needy is administered through a messy, ungenerous and contradictory network of welfare systems ... with direct payments coming in the forms of: old-age security pensions, the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans, youth and family allowances, workmen's compensation, and unemployment insurance."

From this point, the report engages in a lengthy discussion of the inadequacies, victimization, and mistaken principles of these programs, all the while relating the benefits in a relative sense and concluding in almost every case that each form of direct payment should be expanded to provide more social welfare for "the poor".

From the report's conclusions, it appears that increasing numbers of middle-class liberals are being mesmerized by the promise of social legislation found in the language of the Welfare State. Meanwhile, the possible success of such legislation is continually nullified by the re-organization of private property into larger concentrations of corporate wealth and power without ownership, by privileged consumption for the family as well as the individual from achieved and inherited status, and by the growth of legislation in favour of certain groups and classes.

Relative power and privileges

In a paper entitled "Incomes, Disparity, and Impoverishment in Canada since World War II", completed earlier this year by University of Waterloo history professor Lao Johnson, the proliferation of studies which carefully catalogue the dimensions and consequences of poverty was duly noted. To Johnson, this deluge of studies has "itemized the nationality, age, sex, education and location of the poor, but few, except in general terms, come to grips with the underlying processes of capitalism and the consequences of its development in Canada".

Dwelling on this point, Johnson goes on to state, "The rapid rise in average income and per capita and family purchasing power have caused attention to be directed away from the more fundamental tendencies such as the impoverishment of low-income workers which are at work. As a result, even such a perceptive study as The Real Poverty Report concentrated on 'relative poverty' or income disparities."

Johnson's conceptualization of poverty is concerned with the idea of social classes, long derived as an attempt to explain history and the present capitalistic order. The concept is firmly based on economic and social realities — the ownership of the means of production combined with the relative power and privileges in one's social position.

Middle-class liberals, being physically removed from the average working man and woman in society, tend to deny the existence of the working class in studying "the poor". Yet, an accurate description of the conditions of the oppressed groups in society always involves the analysis of the power structure and its modes of operating.

Returning to Johnson's paper with this thought in mind, we learn of the danger of concentrating on the relative poverty of individuals rather than examining the fundamental causes of disparity:

"First, attention is diverted from the processes by which people are impoverished or within which disparities arise. Since these processes are still at work, solutions aimed at current or short term conditions of individuals rather than the underlying causes are unlikely to prove effective in the long run.

"Second, concentration on poverty rather than the political economy of capitalism allows the analyst to focus exclusively on the problems of the individual who is currently poor rather than to observe the continuum between those who are poor and those who are not yet poor but are being impoverished. The end result of such an approach is to divide the interests of the poor from those who are taxed for welfare and to set up polarizations between those who are taxed for welfare programs and those who receive benefits; between the employed and unemployed; the 'hard hats' and 'welfare bums'.

"The most serious consequence of the relative poverty approach lies in its concentration on the psychological aspects of poverty rather than the dynamics of social re-creation and economic exploitation. When The Real Poverty Report argues that ... poverty is relative working class, when it struggles to improve its conditions, has everywhere strived for conditions which would make social workers unnecessary, not to increase them."

Welfare systems encourage dependency, reinforcing the cycle of poverty, and social workers use the long-term chronic welfare recipients and other victims of the system to rationalize calling for more of these programs. These recipients are the ones who are being "caseworked" and "rehabilitated" in what has been aptly termed "all those useless efforts that keep the social workers as a profession alive".

The chronic long-term recipients themselves are removed from any working class context in that they do not work; they prefer to fight the system as individuals. The welfare recipients who have not worked for a long time forget the "normal" working conditions: tremendous pressure to produce, rigid supervision and humiliating regulations, poor wages, and constant fear of being laid off or actually fired.

Repo has descriptively portrayed these chronic welfare recipients:

"From the assumption — supported by their establishment and middle-class friends that they are the worst off in society, welfare recipients in their organizations start making demands that do not show the slightest consideration for the rest of the working class. They want more money per child, more benefits, special allowances, et cetera — all demands which create real resentment among the working poor.

"The working poor have a valid reason for this resentment, since they live next door to the long-term recipients, and see things that the middle-class activists fail to see; that some of the people who are supposed to be worst off in society are the same ones who take taxicabs to beer stores ... who dress better than most working people.

"They also wretch with disbelief how these same people get up in public meetings (I have seen this happen frequently) and talk about how horrible it is to be on welfare. And, the disbelief turns into cynicism after reading yet another sob story about the people on welfare."

In concluding her study on organizing working class people, Repo put forth a sensible and workable program of action with its basis of organization being in the neighbourhood. She feels this is the essential footing since no more than 30 per cent of the working population are unionized and unions (with extremely rare exceptions) have long since ceased to be political organizations functioning in the interest of the whole class ("they sometimes benefit their own members").

Such an organization, she believes, should include "working and non-working people of all shades of colour, colour, and language. People who are on welfare and who by necessity have to struggle with various bureaucracies, can easily form a separate committee within the overall organization, but should in every other respect, when dealing with issues like health, education, housing, family life, youth problems, and neighbourhood issues work with other members of the class."

An obvious ideal in organizing is to remove the dependency on welfare. As long as welfare is used as a pretense to smooth out the wide fluctuations in income, the longer the growing disparity and accelerating impoverishment among income earners will go unrecognized by the public.

to the living the rest of society enjoys ... it falls into exactly the same difficulty of relativism which traps the liberal class analysts.

"To follow this line of reasoning, it would be necessary to assume that in a society where average incomes were very low, so long as no one was sufficiently below average income that he was deprived of what was deemed necessary for a stable and productive life, he would not be poor The logical conclusion, therefore, is that where the perception of poverty does not exist, then poverty does not exist."

And most importantly, Johnson concluded by sketching out and reiterating the profound consequences derived from using the relative poverty approach:

"It has diverted attention from the effects of the capitalist labour market on the incomes of workers, and has retarded study and understanding of the structure of their exploitation and impoverishment. Until the proper attention and analysis of these phenomena is undertaken, we are unlikely to progress far in bringing about their permanent cure."

Reinforcing the cycle of poverty

And, the longer such an analysis goes unaccomplished in attempts by "concerned" groups like that behind The Real Poverty Report, the larger the numbers grow who are hypnotized by the "reforms" brought about by social welfare legislation. Of prime observation in this report is that the working class views the provision of social welfare for "the poor" from a considerably divergent stance.

Marjaleena Repo, editor of Transformation magazine and a Toronto social worker, described working class welfare concerns in an article early last year:

"It can be stated quite clearly that nowhere, at no time, has it been in the interest of the working class to have its daily life 'administered' and 'organized' by a multitude of social agencies, all of whom act (despite the subjective wishes of individual social workers and agency employers) on behalf of the ruling class of that society. On the contrary, the

Major parties all capitalist charges Maoist

By STEVE SHARRATT

Hardial Bains, leader of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) Saturday night attacked Canada's major political parties for failing to present a radical alternative to the electorate in today's election.

Bains, himself a federal candidate in Eglinton riding, addressed a pre-election forum sponsored by the CPC(M-L) attended by about 75 people.

He charged that the only question before the people is exactly which group of capitalists should hold power in Ottawa.

All of the major parties, he said, including the NDP, are committed to a capitalist Canada. Even the rival "treacherous and revisionist" Communist Party of Canada has reinforced the capitalist character of the elections by urging support of NDP candidates in ridings where the CP is not running.

He claimed that the major problems facing the Canadian working class today, unemployment, inflation, and the foreign domination of industry, are inevitable outgrowths of a capitalist economy. Since the Communist Party of Canada (M-L) is the only party which actively seeks the overthrow of capitalism, Bains said, it alone represents the real interests of the Canadian worker.

Later he complained that his party's 52 federal candidates have been ignored by the Canadian media. As a result he felt, the party itself must work to publicize itself as a radical alternative in Canadian politics.

To accomplish this Bains urged members to begin immediately to "organize and propagandize" for the 1976 elections.

"At least," he said, "we can make communism a trend that everybody discusses."

Court rules Szoboszloi can't run

The federal court of Canada ruled Friday that Zoltan Szoboszloi cannot be a candidate in today's federal election in Spadina riding.

Szoboszloi refused to swear allegiance to the queen when he filed his nomination papers. When Terrence Mott, returning officer for Spadina, refused to accept the papers, Szoboszloi sought a court order requiring Mott to accept his nomination.

Szoboszloi argues that the British North America Act is illegal because it has never been recognized by the Canadian Government. Rather, he says, it recognizes the queen as the final authority.

He argues that the elections act is therefore illegal.

Associate Chief Justice Camil

Noel said Szoboszloi's argument that the BNA act is illegal was "muddled" in throwing out the request for a court order.

Szoboszloi says that the Canadian "democracy is like a one party system. If one swears allegiance to the queen one may, as Perry Ryan, cross from one party to another perfectly legally and without the people having any recourse."

Ryan, the Conservative candidate in Spadina, was elected as a Liberal in 1968. During the past session he left the Liberals to sit as an independent, and then joined the Tory caucus in 1970.

SAC approves discipline draft

Last week's SAC meeting approved the final draft of the discipline paper prepared by its university commission.

The paper had been amended since it came up the week before so that if implemented, the U of T administration would be required to undertake negotiations with demonstrators "concerning the specific grievances which led to the demonstration" before police are called on campus to evict them.

Calling police on campus has been a contentious issue recently, especially since last year's acting president Jack Sword twice called police to evict persons from campus property.

After the first occupation of Simcoe Hall last March in support of open stacks in the John Roberts Library, Sword agreed to "get in touch with" future demonstrators, or at least student leaders, before having them forcibly evicted.

New president John Evans has stated he does not feel bound by this precedent, although Sword's statement was also signed by then acting vice-presidents Don Forster and Robin Ross then Board of Governors chairman Bill Harris and several other top administrators.

SAC's recommendations now go to the Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council, which is expected to recommend a discipline policy by Christmas.

Internal Affairs chairman Paul Cadario, also a SAC member because he is a student governor, abstained on the motion approving the brief.

In other business, SAC passed in principle the draft of the Arts and Science Student Union constitution in order that the first meeting of the union could be held this week.

SAC also decided it would be unwilling to join the proposed National Student Union "at this time", because it was too involved with the Ontario Federation of Students.

However it did vote to send two representatives to the union's conference, to be held in Ottawa this week. Vice-presidents John Helliwell and Ross Flowers were chosen by a substantial majority, defeating Mike Edwards (Innis), Vice DeAngelo, Mike Steinberg and Alice Anjo, all from SMC.

SAC gave first reading to constitutional amendments allowing council to make grants and loans to groups inside the university.

The amendments would allow grants to the university groups if two thirds of the council members present are in favour, and if notice of motion is given. No grant would be made unless the group is sponsoring a university-wide function.

Media builds fantasy world says Muggeridge

The world is facing "a new dark age" says Malcolm Muggeridge.

By BOB BETTSON

"The media have constructed a world of fantasy in which people live, cutting themselves off from reality," charged noted broadcaster and author Malcolm Muggeridge Friday.

Speaking to an audience of 1,000 people at Convocation Hall, Muggeridge asserted that "only through Christ is it possible to grasp reality and live in terms of reality and not fantasy."

He lamented that there is no escape from the present society although he wished and believed that there was. Muggeridge compared contemporary society to the Roman Empire which confronted the early Christians. The Romans pursued material ends, exploited violence and eroticism, he claimed.

Muggeridge warned that "if our society continues to move away from the Christian way of life there will be no order, social, political or economic." He described the human condition as "manacled in a dark cell. Only Christ tells us how to escape."

He said that if everyone gave their lives to Christ they could find "an enlightenment and serenity not otherwise attainable. The truths Christ spoke answer all human dilemmas, give love to the loveless and hope to the hopeless."

Asked why he suddenly converted to Christianity, Muggeridge replied it was in fact not a quick change in attitude but a long process. (He was formerly an atheist.) "The weakness of the 20th century mind is the scientific view that everything has an explanation," he proclaimed.

In reply to a question on how pacifism relates to Christianity Muggeridge claimed that the "position of a pacifist is a position of humbug. In that we are dependent on society for worldly security and daily bread, we must be involved in the affairs of society and not shelter behind other men."

Although he fought against Hitler to suppress fascism, he was now not sure that it had been exterminated.

"We live in an age of the breakdown of civilization," he said. "The last 50 years have been the most murderous, brutal and destructive years in all human history. What lies around the corner could be another dark age."

When asked about the state of Christianity in "communist" countries, Muggeridge said, "though the church should have died as a result of brutal suppression, I would say that there are more true, utterly dedicated Christians in communist countries than anywhere else in the world."

Neufeld gets new Ottawa post

By JOHN CAMPBELL

University of Toronto economics professor E. P. Neufeld will be appointed next January director of international finance, a newly created post within the finance department.

Neufeld has taught courses in macroeconomics at U of T for about 10 years, and is considered one of Canada's leading experts on monetary policies. He will work in Ottawa only part-time for the first six months, until his students complete their courses in the spring.

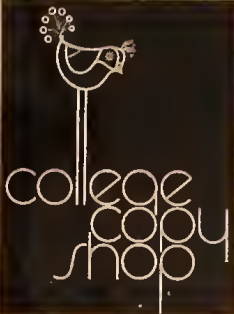

As assistant to deputy minister

Simon S. Reisman, Neufeld will be working, he said, in the area of "Canada's relations with the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, and the question of the floating exchange rate."

A longtime critic of the government's economics policies, Neufeld charged Trudeau with overreacting to the new economic measures introduced by President Nixon in August 1971. His appointment, then, has been interpreted as signalling a change in Ottawa's economic thinking.

However, when asked for comment on Thursday, he stated the sensitive nature of his post did not permit him to express his own views on matters of public policy.

Neufeld has previously been a consultant for the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and a frequent media commentator on economic policy.

Idea not viable, say parents

Ward 6 trustees call for parent-run schools

By ALEXANDRA MERCER

Five prospective Ward 6 trustees and an incumbent agreed last week that schools should be run by neighbourhood councils including parents, children, administrators, provincial and board of education officials.

The five, Bob Spencer, Don Leckie, Don Martyniuk, Peter Maloney and Harry Pasternak, and incumbent Ben Rose, were speaking to about 25 people at Orde Street Public School.

K. Dock Yip, the other incumbent, thought that the principal should be in charge of the school but that "principals should learn to listen to parents".

Three parents in the audience doubted that this was a viable plan. But Yip asserted that he had "never seen a more harmonious relationship than that between the parents and teachers and administrators of Ward 6.

Martyniuk complained that "schools are inaccessible to parents". He felt that there should be "complete parent control". Pasternak, a former public school teacher and university administrator thought Martyniuk's suggestion of complete parent control was "unrealistic". He would prefer neighbourhood councils to make decisions as to what items they wanted to control.

"Nor is the idea of a trained community worker who would identify issues and volunteer solutions far fetched," he said. He stated that education was now being introduced to hire community education workers.

Peter Maloney, a former professor and provincial Liberal candidate, saw the trustee as an animator and resource person. At the same time, he felt that "community involvement can't be spontaneously generated".

Bob Spencer, last year's SAC president and Dan Leckie, his former education commissioner, offered to work full time for the $3600 salary if elected, seeing the trustee as "a full time community organizer, providing information, access and focus for people concerned about schools".

Noting from his past experience that "government imposes change from above", Spencer felt strongly that "trustees can only facilitate the desires of the community".

Leckie, concerned that the school was an "alien institution" creating a "cultural gap" between parent and child, suggested parents be brought into the classroom more often to bridge such gaps.

Yip told of his wife's beneficial experiences as a volunteer at a school but parents in the audience and on the panel claimed that they had not been welcomed as volunteers in their children's schools.

Responding to an audience question concerning education taxes paid by single people in the ward, Yip declared, "I am the keeper of my brother's children".

All candidates suggested that the tax base could be stabilized by cutting back maintenance expenses and sending administrators back into the class room. All were against cutting the student-teacher ratio, opportunity class and New Canadian programs.

Single taxpayers would benefit more, said Martyniuk, if education were not packed into one stage of life. The first time around, those people who only wanted to learn the rudiments of reading, writing, arithmetic could leave school after learning them and return when they wished to expand their education.

Yip added that cost-sharing with the federal government would further cut costs. Incumbent Rose complained that Ward 6 was fighting a rearward action against the federal government just to protect the programs they have from being cut.

Leckie felt that local school organizations should have "access to budgets". All candidates concurred.

Nuclear family may be alien to man

By AGI LUKACS

The modern nuclear family is not necessarily natural to man, anthropologist Kathleen Aberley Gough said last Wednesday at a meeting of the interdisciplinary women's course.

Gough, who was ousted from Simon Fraser University in a 1968 purge of radicals from the Political Science and Anthropology department, is teaching on a temporary basis at U of T. She discussed the family from a historical viewpoint. "There have been so many kinds of families," she noted, mentioning units with one woman and several men, or the reverse, as examples. Other variations of families, she suggested, include convents and monasteries.

Whenever loose bands of people became organized in a more complex state, Gough asserted, there was a sharp decline in the status of women. This was due to the primary organizing principle of the state, the class system.

Although the class system can be camouflaged, it always divides complex society into one class of those few who own substantial amounts of property and another of those who don't. This system usually worked against women, she stated, because they did not normally own property.

In fact, historically, women were often considered property themselves, Gough observed.

Muslim women were required to wear veils and stay in their homes. European women had more freedom of movement, but still were forced to wear chastity belts when their husbands went to war.

European fathers had the right to kill their daughters, Gough claimed, adding that marriage was often arranged for a girl while she was still a child.

Upper class women in India were married often young, and when their husbands died, they were expected to burn on the funeral pyre beside them, Gough said. But burning women is not a practice foreign to North America, she stressed, pointing out that North Americans burned witches.

But the state which has oppressed women has only existed for 6000 of several million years of human history, Gough feels the state is becoming obsolete.

"The future is pretty much what we make it," she feels.

Even in the age of modern states, division of labour along sex lines is not always prevalent, she said. She pointed to the women fighting in the

Waterpolo Blues defeat Queen's 5-3

U of T Waterpolo Blues defeated York (8-3), Ottawa (13-1), and Queen's (5-3) Saturday at York to stay on top in the Eastern Section.

Although Blues' Chris McNaught and Ed Hanna blocked well in the early minutes of the opening quarter of the Toronto-Queen's game, the Kingston team scored first on a goal by Rich Zajchowski.

Later in the quarter Henning Wiebach tied it up for Toronto.

Due to a foul on the Blues, one Queen's player was given a free shot on the Toronto net. Goaltender Vitold Gessing easily stopped the shot.

During the second quarter Wiebach got Blues' go-ahead goal, only to see the score evened by Queen's Jack Muir early in the third quarter. U of T's Adam Gessing soon furthered the seesaw battle by making the score 3-2.

Queen's players were continually harrasing Blues chief threat (so the Gaels believed), McNaught (who was playing with a strained shoulder). The Gaels continually forced him to shoot from far out, with most of his shots going either wide or over the top of the Queen's net.

Queen's final marker was added in the fourth quarter by Archie Nesbitt to once again tie the score (at 3-3).

McNaught finally shook free of the Queen's defenders and flicked a classic unexpected backhand shot over his shoulder into the corner of the Gaels' net. The Queen's goaltender didn't even move on McNaught's shot from about fifteen feet out.

McNaught added another goal later in the quarter to make the final score 5-3 for Toronto.

The Queen's coach, who two weekend's ago jumped into the Hart House pool to "defend" one of his players from McNaught, demonstrated the Queen's polo team spirit of "win at any cost". (During the York-Toronto game earlier in the afternoon, the Queen's players constantly cheered on the York squad, and booed the Blues.) Several times he stormed around the pool deck shaking his fist at the referee.

When asked why he had jumped into the pool, the Queen's coach said that a U of T forward (McNaught) had kicked his goaltender and also punched him in the face. At that point he had decided to jump in and get between the two players, he said. As he came out onto the pool deck in shorts he said "I'm ready here again."

In the York-Toronto game, the Blues came from behind a 3-2 deficit to eventually defeat the York squad 8-3. Wiebach scored six times for U of T, with John Bigson and Dave Martin adding the other two.

Toronto defender Ed Hanna helped to produce the first York goal when he was ordered out of the pool for his overly-aggressive play. Hanna's defensive lapse also figured predominantly on the final York goal, but he later settled down to make some effective checks against the Yeomen. (McNaught did not play until the second half of the game, eliminating some of Toronto's effectiveness.)

In the Toronto-Ottawa game, Wiebach again figured predominantly, scoring six of the Blues' 13 goals. Duvall and Bob Heatley were the other high scorers, each with two goals.

Other scores from Saturday include Queen's 15, York 3; Queen's 14, Ottawa 0.

With Blues' McNaught in the slot Queen's goalla blocks a shot.

Queen's loses again to Rugby Blues, 18-11

Rugby Blues defeated Queen's for the second consecutive time this season 18-11 in Kingston Saturday.

Blues led by a 10-4 score at the half. Rick Hodder added to his impressive total in the season thus far by making the first try, good for four points. The convert was incomplete.

Blues next try came from stand-off Ian Lindsay, with Hodder converting. Before the half Blues' Peter Ballam was able to add another four; again the convert was uncompleted.

Queen's ended the half with four points on Dave Walter's unconverted try.

In the second half good team play led to Greg Sprick's try. The try also went unconverted.

Queen's Warren Smith added another four points on a try, and Dave Murley added a penalty goal for an additional 3.

Blues' seconds lost 24-0.

Last Wednesday night the Blues Rugby team produced a convincing 18-4 win over a group of Old Blues in Varsity Stadium.

Through well-disciplined and cohesive rugby the contemporary Blues overcame the clear edge in size and experience held by their predecessors. The awesome array of U of T's "giants of the past" included such notables as John McKenna and Marris Apps in the pack, and Paul Wilson and Geoff Ellwand in the three-quarter line.

The game's first half belonged entirely to the Blues. Though considerably outweighed, the U of T forwards were able to command more than a fair share of the ball, through coordinated play. Early in the half they won the ball from a ruck near the Old Blue's goal-line. The ball was then moved quickly to the weak side.

Two surprised defenders were left to contend with three advancing Blues who took immediate advantage of the overlap. Neil Sorbie received the ball on the flank and sliced into the corner for the first try.

Rick Hodder's conversion attempt from near the side line was unsuccessful. However, he added six points on two successive penalty goals shortly after, the second from some forty yards out.

The final try of the half came after a long tactical kick from the centres. The ball landed narrowly in play and made a downfield bounce which fooled Old Blue's fullback Cbris Leppmann.

Blues' backs Rodger Wright and Rick Phillips gave Leppmann no chance to recover. They dribbled the ball down the side line and Phillips dove on the ball in the in-goal area to make the half time score 14-0.

In the second half, the Old Blues moved Geoff Ellwand from his spot in the centre to second row. The complexion of the game now changed considerably. The Old Blues' forwards, led by Ellwand, hurtled low and hard into the rucks and secured a considerable edge in loose play.

The Old Blues' backs had repeated opportunities to run with the ball, but vigorous tackling by the Blues three quarters and good cross-coverage by the forwards stemmed the aged tide.

The Blues were no longer in control of the game, but the ever-accurate kicks of fullback Graeme Wynn repeatedly won them good field position. From the line out, after one such Wynn kick to touch, the Blues won the ball and sent it quickly out the back line to winger Phillips. Phillips turned the ball back in towards mid-field. The Blues moved the ball rapidly to the opposite and now open side where John Drummond slid into the end zone virtually unopposed for the final try.

Late in the half, after holding the ball in the Blues end for a considerable time, the Old Boys managed their first and only score. Marris Apps powered his way across the goal line on a short penalty to make the final score 18-4.

Queen's coach gives raf tha finger.

Soccer Blues capture East playoff position

The Soccer Blues clinched the Western Section OUAA championship with a pair of wins over Guelph (3-0), and Laurentian (3-1) on the weekend.

The victories put Blues into the OUAA playoffs at the home of the Eastern Section winner on November 8.

Glutinous ground conditions at Varsity Stadium, owing to torrential rain, proved no handicap to the play of the Toronto team.

The course of Sunday's game against the '71 Canadian Champions, the Laurentian Voyageurs, was a reversal of the previous day's game, although the Blues again won handily.

Toronto, showing their best offensive form of the season, swept down on the torpid visiting defence from the initial kickoff. The sloppy covering of the Laurentian rearguard was brutally exposed when a huge swerving kick from Brand, in the Blues goal, squirted past two embarrassed defenders allowing DaRosa a clear run through to goal. He compounded their misery by sickly rounding the advancing goalkeeper and slipping the ball into an open net.

This early lead provided all the inspiration the Blues needed to tear the languid Voyageurs to shreds.

Directing wave upon wave of attacks down the relatively well-dressed wings, Toronto supplied D'Antoni and Ron Misurka with abundant opportunity to show their skills. Crosses from both flanks caused consternation in the mire at the heart of the visitor's defence.

A succession of corners conceded by the harried Laurentian backs, led to near panic in a crowded penalty area with Peter Hillier and John Cobby going close on several occasions.

Indeed, it was from a corner that the Blues scored their second goal (after twenty minutes). Hillier's hard low drive, relayed into the middle by Misurka at the near post, was deftly turned into the net by DaRosa, who had been left completely unmarked. It was his fifth goal in succession during the space of ninety playing minutes.

The odd Laurentian sortie that managed to cross the half-way line was summarily dismissed in the typical intransigent manner of the Blues' defence. There was no effectual respite from the Blues' aggressive offence, which demonstrated both verve and dexterity, on and off the ball, in revealing the fundamental inertia in the visiting rearguard.

The inevitable third goal came, not surprisingly, from yet another Hillier corner. His accurate lofted cross was met by the head of Ian Harris who adroitly flicked the ball into the far corner of the net.

Laurentian showed little more spark in the second half. However, the three goal lead and their complete superiority led the Blues to indulge in over-complicated interpassing when more direct methods might have doubled the score.

Bob Cazzola (overlapping at fullback) and Polera often showed good understanding in creating dangerous situations down the left wing. When the ball did reach the middle from such raids, many chances were missed through over-elaboration and the treacherous surface.

To everyone's surprise, the Voyageurs gleaned some consolation by being the only visiting team to score on the Blues at Varsity Stadium this season. The unexpected generosity by the Blues' defence occurred when Herh Dubsky was caught square at the edge of the penalty area, allowing Laurentian's Zorhas to nip in and score with a quick low shot past Brand's right hand. Coming as it did two minutes from the end the goal was insignificant, except from a statistical viewpoint.

The Varsity—Bob Gauthier

Blues show Laurentian the defensive skill that has enabled the team to win 10 straight.

On Saturday, against Guelph, the Blues, confronted by an ultra-defensive formation, attacked continually throughout the first half with no tangible reward. Mario DaRosa's conversion of a through ball from Giuseppe D'Antoni was disallowed by the referee because of a pushing offence. The solitary threat to the Blues' goal resulted from a speculative cross which slid from Jack Brand's grasp. Ed Carter was on hand to clear the danger.

Only after 21 minutes of the second half were Blues able to pry open a packed Guelph defence. A slack clearance, intercepted by D'Antoni, was immediately slotted past several defenders to DaRosa in the centre. The centre forward, moving to his right, struck a low drive back into the left hand corner of the net.

Ten minutes later DaRosa, put in the clear by Vito Polera, coolly lifted the ball over the onrushing goalkeeper to give Blues a comfortable 2-0 lead.

DaRosa, exploiting a tired opposition defence, picked up another loose clearance three minutes from the end of the game and, from 25 yards, hit an explosive shot past the despairing Guelph goalkeeper. Once again this season the margin of the Blues' victory was an inadequate reflection of their actual overall footballing supremacy.

Dubsky's contribution, along with the rest of the defence - Cazzola, Jim Burns and Carter - has been a major cause of the Blues' undefeated league record. Only four goals have been conceded in ten games.

In these two crucial games the Blues have played better soccer than at any time throughout the season. This augurs well for the Ontario Championship final where the pressures will be even greater.

Blues second best in 28-13 loss to Ottawa

By PAUL CARSON

The Varsity football season ended in frustration amid the rain and mud of Lansdowne Park Saturday afternoon as the Ottawa Gee-Gees outlasted the Blues 28-13 in the OUAA Eastern Section final.

However, in spite of the Gee-Gees, the weather, and some inconsistent officiating, Blues held a slim 13-12 lead in the fourth quarter until, in the final ten minutes of play, Ottawa exploded for a short field goal and two touchdowns.

Taking over on the Varsity 51, Gee-Gees amassed three quick first downs and their all-purpose halfback, Neil Lumsden, eventually kicked a 14-yard field goal at 5:18 to give Ottawa a 15-13 lead. (A Toronto march from its own one-yard line to the Blues' 51 was stalled by a most debatable roughing call, while another questionable penalty helped the Ottawa team gain the three successive first downs.)

Gee-Gees took a 22-13 lead three minutes later when tailback Conrad Kozak returned a Varsity punt for 65 yards and touchdown, thanks to several openfield blocks and two apparent clips near midfield that sprung him loose.

Ottawa's rookie quarterback Jim Colton, playing in place of veteran Dan Smith, polished off a good afternoon for the Gee-Gees by scampering 42 yards on a rollout with less than three minutes remaining in the game.

It was a sad ending for Blues' defensive unit which again played an outstanding game, holding Ottawa to 63 yards passing and one offensive touchdown.

Lumsden's feet produced 79 yards rushing and 10 valuable points from two field goals, two singles and two converts. Gee-Gees other major score came early in the first quarter when linebacker Wayne Terrv ran 63 yards down the sidelines with an intercepted pass.

Blues couldn't get untracked early in the game and fell behind 10-0 after less than five minutes of the opening quarter. Lumsden's single at 12:24 made it 11-0 but two plays later Dunkley connected with Cor Doret for a spectacular 85-yard pass and run touchdown. (The play, on which Doret swings out of the backfield and runs straight up the middle, covered one yard more than the former season record - Dunkley to Libert Castillo - set last weekend against Queen's.)

Blues' specialty team then exploited a weakness in Ottawa's right tackle to hlock two consecutive Lumsden kicks. Rookie Ken Hussey led the first charge that stopped an Ottawa drive on the Toronto 51.

Veteran linebacker Rob Bloxham, playing his final game of college football, hlocked the second punt, pursued the ball into the Ottawa end zone, and fell on it for Blues' second touchdown at 11:32 of the second quarter.

Blues gained about 160 yards in the second half but failed to add to their score and Ottawa finally took control of another game Varsity could have won.

Blues were unable to gain three first downs on any series in the entire game, while Gee-Gees managed it only once. Ottawa did put two consecutive first downs together on four occasions compared to only two minor Varsity drives, but in the end each team managed only one offensive touchdown. Most of the scoring came - one way or another - from the kicking game.

Gee-Gees main advantage was field position, taking possession in Varsity territory no less than 11 times. The entire fourth quarter was played inside the Blues' 54-yard line.

Varsity offensive players touched the ground in Ottawa's half of the field on only three occasions during the entire game - Cor Doret on his 85-yard pass and run touchdown, and two short-lived drives that started about midfield and went nowhere.

Ottawa had a total offense of 315 yards compared to Varsity's 290 but neither team was able to mount any consistent scoring drives.

The weather favoured Gee-Gees powerful ground attack and Ottawa coach Don Gilbert made the most of it ordering 50 running plays that netted 252 total yards. As expected, Blues relied on the passing game, and Wayne Dunkley completed 15 of 28 for 208 yards despite the poor playing conditions.

Ottawa now advances to the league semi-finals, and will play Waterloo Lutheran, which captured third place in the Western Section by demolishing across-the-road rivals Waterloo, 44-8.

Blues Notes - It was the final university game for Rein Enno, Alex Markohrada, Jim Blainey, Jon Dellandrea, and Stew MacSween in addition to Bloxham and Russ Mitchell (who wasn't dressed). Dunkley, Doret, and guard Bruce Parrack all graduate but may return next year. . . . Doret again outgained Lumsden in total yardage 102-96, but Lumsden's real value was in punting - averaging 34.7 yards despite the two blocks. . . . Mike Sokovnin suffered a painful ankle injury in the first quarter but managed to hobble out for 10 punts and a 31 yard average. . . . rookie Rick Nakatsu, the lightest player in the league at 130 pounds, exemplified Blues' dedication by wiping out two huge Ottawa linemen on the final kickoff. . . . Varsity again suffered from inconsistent officiating and took 86 yards in penalties to Ottawa's 45. . . . in other games, Windsor defeated Western 18-17. Both teams now have 5-1 records at season's end, but Windsor takes first place by virtue of its defeat of Western in the only game between the two teams this season. . . . Guelph finished in last place, defeated by York 30-17.

UWO may act against strike

LONDON (CUP) — Western has become the first Ontario university to publicly acknowledge that students will be penalized for participating in the second term fees strike.

University president Carleton Williams announced Friday to the university's Senate that students withholding fees in January, as proposed by the Ontario Federation of Students and approved by in a province-wide referendum in October, would suffer 'academic sanctions'.

Although vice-president (finance) A. K. Adlington has stated the sanctions would go only as far as withholding transcripts, student leaders fear the psychological effect on hesitant students may seriously affect support for a possible strike.

Academic sanctions could go as far as expelling a student from the university.

Williams last night denied rumours that the COU planned to advocate withholding the second instalment of OSAP cheques until students paid their fees in full.

He complained that the universities "have no defences" against either the government's unilateral fees boost or the students' strike threat. They're like the "ham in the sandwich", he said.

Williams, who is also chairman of the Council of Ontario Universities prefaced his remarks by describing how the university would cut in a squeeze play.

"This is not a problem of the university's choosing, but it is the body that stands to lose," he said.

He estimated that more than $2 million will be affected if those students who have yet to pay their full fees withhold those payments in January.

Williams also referred to a letter drafted by the Council of Ontario Universities April 10 that protested the fee increase by the Ontario government.

The letter 'strongly protested' the increase, which was seen as a deterrent to enrolment. It advised that an accompanying increase in funds available to students should have been made.

Williams added that the fee increase had been carefully discussed and although the loan portion of OSAP is up. "It's still a bargain".

Williams was referring to other provinces that do not contribute any funds to the federal awards program. Instead of a combination of loans and grants, their students receive their funds in straight loans up to $1,000 a year.

Addington said that a fee strike would have an impact out of proportion to normal years due to the university's deficit budget. He explained the university would not only lose the interest on the funds, but because of the tight money problems, may have to borrow money to cover operating expenses.

"Are students going to fight the government until the last university (goes under)?" Williams asked. "I think it's about time" students started thinking about that aspect, he concluded.

The University of Toronto administration has said it will not penalize students to who participate in the fees withholding campaign.

Student reaction to the "academic penalty" move by Williams is now forming. The university students council was to debate the issue at last night's meeting.

Student leaders conceded that the university was in a poor position, but the issue of the students was with the Ontario government and the only weapon they had was the withholding of tuition fees.

At a meeting Sunday night, OFS executive member Ross McGregor and OFS delegate Steve Fuerth and Larry Bradley discussed upcoming plans.

students write in thousands of complaint letters to McNic to be brought to council last night.

The three also stressed that although their complaint was with the government, and the university was in the uncomfortable position between the students and the government, the students would like to have the university fighting with them.

However, they did not rule out the fees strike if negotiations with the provincial government fail. Preparations for a trust fund to hold students' fees, pending negotiations with the government, are continuing.

Grad union to distribute fees information

By NADIM WAKEAM

Ontario graduate student unions yesterday created an organization whose only purpose is to distribute information to one another across the province.

This left no active grouping of graduate unions in Ontario, as the Canadian Union of Graduate Students decided on Monday that it would act merely as a coordinating body for the provincial groups.

The Ontario Graduate Students Association, according to chairman Colin Isaacs, of Western will circulate information such as comparative graduate tuition fees across Canada and the activities of specific graduate student unions.

The association will not act on a proposed fees strike until the Ontario Federation of Students has decided what it will do.

Nor will it concern itself with the formation of labour unions for graduate teaching assistants.

York and U of T have already taken steps to form their own unions. Other universities can form their own unions without association support, said Isaacs.

The Ontario members will not be leaving the Canadian Union of Graduate Students as was expected at one point in the summer, but merely associating together in the association.

"I don't know where the idea we were going to break away from the national union came from," Isaacs said. "There were some universities that did break away because they felt the national union wasn't doing anything," he said.

Waterloo, Toronto and several other graduate students councils dropped out of CUGS in order to divert their money and efforts available for interaction with other councils to a smaller, but more active group of Ontario graduate councils.

However, after several meetings last spring and summer of councils interested in an active group, it became apparent to GSU executive assistant Larry Hoffman, he says, that few of the councils were serious about forming an active Ontario union.

He commented yesterday that the association is evading the issues of a fee strike and the formation of a teaching assistants labour union.

"It doesn't answer any of the questions," he said. "It doesn't even address itself to the questions."

Asked if he knew what the Ontario group was trying to accomplish, Hoffman replied, "I have no idea."

The Ontario group will not split from the national union, Hoffman charged, because "they're trying to make their organization palatable to the deans" of their schools.

The only way things get done is when a university student union acts by itself, he added.

The GSU is in the process of forming a teaching assistants labour union. It is also proposing action on the fees hike to its members, suggesting that they pay $100 of their second term fees, the amount of the hike this year, into a trust fund.

Vic council to organize fees demonstration

The Victoria College Students' Administrative Council (VUSAC) executive has decided to take over from SAC the task of trying to organize a demonstration against tuition fees hikes.

The demonstration against the provincial government to be timed to coincide with the opening of the legislature this month, was approved by the Ontario Federation of Students October nearly two weeks ago by a vote of 12 to 3.

However, SAC voted against the demonstration at the OFS meeting, and last week at the council agreed that even though OFS as a whole wanted it, SAC would not participate.

VUSAC president Gord Barnes said yesterday, "We are really angry" with SAC's decision. Accordingly, VUSAC decided to take on itself the job of coordinating and organizing U of T students so that the demonstration will occur.

OFS general coordinator Craig Heron said last night that the demonstration is definitely on, with or without U of T participation. He told SAC last week that the withdrawal of the largest student body in the province, in addition to Western and Queen's student councils, might have scuttled the plans.

Barnes is sending a letter to all student councils on campus, asking them to "commit yourselves to this action to the greatest possible extent that you can."

The letter states Barnes feels "U of T's participation in such a demonstration is a necessary and integral and necessary component of the province-wide fees action." He declares that the fees issue is "simply the most critical to confront the university and students... today."

Barnes indicated that initial reaction to VUSAC's proposal has been favourable.

In an interview last night, George Strathy, Law SAC representative stated that there were "indications" the matter would be discussed again by SAC and a new vote taken on the question of participation.

He described his own support for the demonstration as "fairly strong".

"It's not just fees," said Strathy. "It's the whole question of government attitude to students... loans... the whole bit."

Talks with government, he said, were getting nowhere.

"I think the demonstration is necessary to keep student interest in the matter alive," he continued. "Something more dramatic is needed," he continued.

Scarborough College Student Society president David Onley said, "We will not be a part of any demonstration at Queen's Park at the present time. Not at all."

Mike Walker of Innis College said he had not yet been contacted by Barnes and could not speak for the college at present.

"But personally I tend to support the demonstration. I can't say more till I find out more about it."

Support is also expected from other campus political groups. A spokesperson for the Stop-the-Cutbacks Committee said that the group has already gone on record as supporting the demonstration and predicted that it will aid VUSAC's efforts.

Barnes charged the SAC decision was a "copout". In view of this, he said, VUSAC will "coordinate and help organize a U of T".

"We will give students a chance to vote with their feet," Barnes said he was "fairly optimistic we can get a turnout that will give government some indications of how students feel".

No contest in Spadina, Stollery crushes opposition

By BOB BETTSON

Bucking the Conservative tide in Ontario, Liberal Peter Stollery defeated incumbent Conservative Perry Ryan by 3,000 votes in Spadina in Monday's Federal election.

He called his win "a victory for the Liberals and a vote of confidence in Trudeau." He added that it represented three years of hard work on his part.

According to Stollery, the major issue was whether an MP can get elected as a member of one party and switch to another as Ryan did. Ryan joined the PCs because he disagreed profoundly with Liberal foreign policies.

When the Stollery victory became apparent New Democrat Bob Beardsley went over to the jubilant Liberal headquarters on Dundas Street to concede defeat. He told the crowd that though he came to congratulate Stollery he really felt more like crying.

Beardsley, who finished third by winning 5,558 votes to Stollery's 8,509 and Ryan's 5,599, told The Varsity he was "bitterly disappointed. I can't adequately express it without it sounding like sour grapes."

He had earlier told his campaign workers that he felt very badly because they worked so hard. It was his fourth election attempt in Spadina.

Beardsley said he thought that the narrow loss of the university polls to Stollery "hurt us more than anything else. I could understand the immigrants voting for Stollery."

Beardsley appeared to rule out another try saying "probably next time the party should get another man".

Ryan was unavailable for comment but a campaign worker said that Ryan "had defeated himself by changing from Liberal to Conservative. He's been such a good Liberal for ten years and this area is a mainly Liberal area."

Mitchell Bornstein, candidate for the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist), said that despite his low vote total of 114, "the election has been very successful, we accomplished what we wanted by making communism and the party a topic of discussion."

He said that the CPC (M-L) will run in future elections to provide a revolutionary alternative to the established parties.

Communist Maggie Bizzell said that she "obviously would have liked to get more votes" but that she wasn't surprised by her low vote total of 263. She felt that jobs and inflation were the main issues in Spadina.

Independent Syd Stern, who at last triumphed over Bornstein with his 184 votes, was unavailable for comment.

The Varsity—David Lloyd

Stollery would rather fight than switch. Ryan of the PCs lost by over 3,000 votes.

Decision on discipline structure postponed

By LINDA HALL

The Internal Affairs Committee yesterday postponed making a decision on setting up a university discipline structure until they have considered what issues are at stake and what alternatives are available.

The committee is reviewing the university's discipline policy, and hopes to submit a final recommendation to the Governing Council by Christmas.

Members of the committee disagreed as to whether principles of disciplinary action ought to be established before a structure should be set up. Professor Stanley Schiff, a member of the Program and Implementation Committee for the Campbell Report on discipline, suggested to the committee that "the principles should come first and only then the tribunals".

Tribunals were recommended by the Campbell Report, which was never implemented, to deal with cases involving individuals.

Internal Affairs member, Professor Michael Grapko, supported Schiff's view. "The structure must be related to the rules of the university" he said.

"We should decide what are the basic rules for the university. Then, if there is a breakdown, we can decide what kind of structure will meet the need".

Committee member, Gus Abols, disagreed. "First set up the court system and then decide what jurisdiction these courts have," he asserted.

Professor Trevor Lloyd, chairman of the Campbell Program and Implementation Committee, suggested that before the Internal Affairs Committee could set up a discipline structure they would have to decide "to what extent you want to use the Campbell Report as what you want to work on".

He said a major problem with the Campbell report was its assumption it is possible without much difficulty to treat the university community as members of the general public.

"If the university were regarded as part of the city of Toronto, the university could not decide whether or not to invite the police on campus", he said.

Lloyd objected personally to the university's giving up its special status, suggesting RCMP officers might attend lectures. "I don't think the special relationship with the police, the special relationship with the outside world, should be surrendered, he said.

Schiff endorsed the structure of the Caput, the top disciplinary body, as it has existed in the past. It has no students on it.

"The reason the Caput has not been functioning is not that they can't deal with the questions," he said, "but that no one will bring the charges before the Caput".

Sydney Hermant, vice chairman of the Internal Affairs Committee, recommended that the Caput be reconstituted and modified by the committee to handle difficulties in the Campbell report.

"We don't want anarchy," he said. "We have to take some action and take it now". However, the committee refused to set up a structure prior to agreeing on principles.

The committee also approved, by a vote of 4 to 3, an increase of two dollars to $12 for the health service fee for next year, instead of the alternative of a cutback in health services.

The university administration is not prepared to subsidize the increase in cost necessary to maintain the service as its present level, committee chairman Paul Cadario indicated.

Grads discuss foreign students

By CLARK PARSONS

The Canadian Union of Graduate Students declared Wednesday that when enrolment of Canadian and/or foreign students must be limited, selection should be on the basis of academic and not financial considerations.

Virtually no solid consensus was reached on any other issue at the Hyatt Regency Hotel meeting, attended by graduate student representatives from 12 universities.

The issue of foreign graduate students in Canada aroused considerable controversy.

About half of graduate students in Canada are non-Canadians but in engineering departments, the figure is around 60 per cent. Ontario spends $100 million per year educating foreign graduate students, according to Doug Pritchard of Queen's.

No agreement was reached, however, on what, if anything, should be done about this. University of Victoria representative Terry Peace stated that it was "high bloody time" fees were raised for foreign students, while University of Alberta rep Pete Flinn stated things were fine as they are now.

Mohammed Adam, also of U of A, suggested that most of the foreign students were Americans and because the Vietnam war is ending, they would now be going home.

There appeared to be a lack of solid information upon which to base a serious discussion of most matters raised during the three-hour meeting.

The bread-and-butter issue of money for graduate students seemed to be the key consideration underlying most of the points discussed during the meeting. Now that funds are drying up across the country for graduate programs, the question of "foreigners" was raised as an issue among the Canadian graduate student representatives.

U of Waterloo rep Fred Hetzel asserted: "There are only two ways of limiting the number of foreign students. Either raise their fees and let those with money come, or set a quota which in turn will admit only those with the highest academic qualifications. There's no other way."

No firm agreement was reached on this question, however. Some representatives voiced a fear that such action would limit opportunities for Canadians in foreign universities.

One delegate stated, "There are only 97 Canadians in Oxford and Cambridge, and far fewer Canadians in U.S. universities than there are Americans in Canada. So what's the problem?"

It was noted that graduate student fees are not uniform across the country, which was considered an undesirable situation. Again, no agreement was reached on what should be done about it.

"If we urge uniform fees," said one rep, "governments will simply raise all fees to the level of the highest present fees."

Another urged that fees be abolished. "Grade 13 is free," he said. "Why should there be fees for Grade 14? The reasons are historical; there's no rational basis for it."

"It's political suicide to pass a resolution like that," said Hetzel. "People everywhere are screaming about education costs as they are now."

Adam urged the formation of graduate student labour unions, to be associated with the Canadian Union of Public Employees.

It was suggested some faculties "lure students in" with sweet salaries for the first year, then cut these the second year. "Once you're there, you're helpless," said one representative.

Berd Rima of McMaster said that graduate students at McMaster already had bargaining rights.

Grad union forms new structure

The Canadian Union of Graduate Students decided Wednesday to dispense with its formal organization and set up instead an informal structure designed merely to disseminate information among the member graduate student councils.

The new organization says it will be available to take action, should the members decide it is required.

Toronto's Graduate Students Union is not a member of CUGS and accordingly did not attend the conference. The GSU pulled out of CUGS last summer in hopes, later not realized, of joining other Ontario graduate student councils in a strong provincial organization.

GSU executive assistant Larry Hoffman explained that CUGS is "a nonsensical organization. All they do is talk about academic standards."

"They ignore issues involving threats to education," he asserted.

Said Jean-Paul Daem of Simon Fraser University, self-styled "super-secretary of CUGS, "Although U of T is a very big university, it tends to be pretty parochial."

Last year all they were doing was talking about day-care centres. There were 17 reps here from universities all across Canada. We were meeting right on U of T's doorstep, and they sent nobody.

Under the new format, CUGS will have six regional coordinators who will gather information from member universities in their area and exchange it with other coordinators, and thus member universities.

Coordinators are Daem, Colin Isaacs of Western, Anne Woakes of the University of Calgary, John Reid of the University of New Brunswick, Melvin Croucher of McGill, and Elaine Thompson of the University of Manitoba.

Each coordinator receives $10 to cover photocopying and mailing costs.

Said Hoffman "It's a waste of $10." The GSU used to pay $300 dollars per year to CUGS before withdrawing.

The new CUGS has no formal budget. National meetings are to be held once a year, with local individual graduate schools or student councils paying for travel costs.

Seale to speak here Sunday

Black Panther Bobby Seale will be speaking this Sunday at Convocation Hall at 1 p.m.

He is the feature speaking of the second day of a cross-Canada conference being sponsored by the U of T Student Mobilization Committee on the latest situation in the liberation war in Vietnam.

Seale will arrive armed with a special letter of permission to visit Canada, issued by Immigration Minister Mackasey, according to the SMC.

There was some doubt earlier about whether Seale could appear. SAC agreed to support the meeting in principle but later refused to give any financial assistance. In addition, SMC organizers feared that the Immigration Department would not let Seale in the country, even as a visitor.

Several other speakers will attend, the conference including York University political economist Gabriel Kolko.

Security will be heavy at the meeting, according to SMC organizer Kathy Dalton.

"Student councils are the invisible occupation of the campus by the university authorities."

—gems of wisdom from the walls of The Varsity

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Dalsons Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Local councils may supplant SAC

Too often, students, denied leadership by their elected representatives, sit back and passively accept their fate. So, it's encouraging that some local college councils have refused to have their constituents' wishes and interests ignored by the Students' Administrative Council. SAC last week decided not to participate in the Ontario Federation of Students' demonstration planned for this month's opening of the Ontario legislature.

Victoria University Students' Administrative Council has taken the lead in canvassing fellow colleges to determine if there's sufficient interest to support sending a U of T contingent to the demonstration. And, according to initial response from the councils, it appears that they may be somewhat more sympathetic to the plight of the student community than this university's senior student government.

The demonstration, based on the strong mandate students gave OFS in last month's province-wide referendum, has been called to impress upon this province's legislators the students' dissatisfaction with last spring's $100 tuition fee hike and increase in the Ontario Student Award Program loan ceiling. These arbitrary moves have reduced accessibility to post-secondary education and drastically depleted university enrolment.

SAC decided not to take part in the demonstration because of possible negative public opinion (what about the negative student opinion of their council which last week's decision earned?) and the time and energy required to organize U of T's participation. The local councils apparently disagree. They think it's worth the effort. And, if SAC won't get off its ass and reverse its position, they'll organize the U of T's contingent themselves.

The councils' attitude represents a refreshing change from past years when college councils devoted themselves to organizing social activities and sitting on useless committees doing nothing and going nowhere. Perhaps the opposing opinions about the merits of the students' cause represent a shift, leaving SAC in the irrelevant position and the local councils in the fore.

The Students' Administrative Council voted against participating in the fees protest, but local councils may organize U of T contingent.

We don't think the councils should revert to their former role. But, more importantly, SAC should not be content to let them take over its rightful role — advancing the student position on the provincial and national scene and organizing action on campus-wide issues.

Aware that its decision has met with such disfavor, and that other student councils have felt SAC's refusal to participate in the demonstration represents such an affront to their constituents that they must step into the gap, SAC should reconsider and reverse its position at next week's council meeting.

Birth control helps further imperialism, but limits necessary

Today's centre-spread discusses the United States' attempt to impose birth control on Latin America in return for foreign aid.

The way the story goes, according to the Americans, is that uncontrolled copulation in the Third World makes it impossible for the underdeveloped nations to supply enough food for their citizens and if only the inhabitants took proper precautions the situation would be much improved.

Well, that may be the way they'd like us to see it, but it's not true. It's American exploitation and corrupt local governments which keep Latin Americans in misery and poverty.

However, the reprinted article perhaps passes over the need for educational programs about birth control too lightly. While much of the need for a limited population may be the product of American imperialism and estimates based on wasteful Western eating habits, there still is a point beyond which this planet cannot support life. And, even if the entire world goes socialist, it'll be necessary for people to understand the necessity to not overpopulate the planet.

that pushed Eric Miglin and the rest of the executive to throw out the funding of Bobby Seale's visit to this campus, even though it is the recognized policy of SAC to support such a visit.

It is evident that with SAC's assistance the students on campus don't need the Western Guard to "protect" them from radicals and blacks. The Western Guard, a small, right-wing sect, recently claimed that they would disrupt any such meetings.

It is equally true that the current provincial government can also breathe more easily knowing that Eric Miglin, Ross Flowers, and John Helliwell are all on their side in keeping the students isolated and powerless while they carry on the sham of "negotiations".

Is this to imply that the SAC executive is an unconscious agent of foreign power? I think not. The SAC executive has embarked on an isolationist and defeatist path. They call on last spring's election as a mandate. The foolishness of this path is now evident. I call for their resignation so that the students can re-affirm or deny the rationale for SAC's current dead-end policy.

Mike Edwards
Innis SAC rep

SAC behaviour proves need

The absurd positions taken by the SAC during their last meeting are aggravated by the critical need of effective student leadership at this time. SAC's position is not simply incorrect and foolish, it is criminal.

The government has decided that it wants to limit the availability of higher education, and thereby save money. It reduces the number of unemployed graduates by reducing the number of graduates. The OFS, in coming to grips with the overwhelming sentiment against the fee hikes, has recommended that there be a provincial demonstration at Queen's Park. SAC defeated this concept and in so doing ruined the chances of other students being able to organize effectively.

It was this upside down decision

It is beyond our comprehension how any person who attended that Under Attack program could come to the conclusion that the student critics got "slammed" unless of course they are biased and prejudiced in favour of International "American" branch plant unions.

I also attended that session and if anybody got slammed it was Dennis McDermott not the students.

In using that tired, old, worn out argument that as long as you have international companies in Canada, you must have international unions to fight them. McDermott proved once again that both he and his union are scraping the bottom of the barrel for reasons to justify their being in Canada. What he didn't say was that every country in the world have American companies, but they don't have American unions.

Another myth he tried to shove down the throats of the students was that his union puts more money back into Canada than they take out just does not hold water either. If Steve Sharrott had checked the latest issue of the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, he would find that this is a deliberate untruth to say the least. Needless to say the students didn't swallow this.

And then as if to add insult to injury and insult the intelligence of the audience by saying that his union is not an American union but is an international union upon being questioned as to where else in the world other than Canada his union is situated, he was stuck for an answer.

This article clearly is the most biased, the most prejudiced and most one-sided piece of journalism I have read in a long time and we hope you will give our views as expressed here equal coverage.

Ed's Note: The Varsity story merely reported what happened at the encounter. The news article was not nor should it have been intended to get into a public debate with the speaker. That is the role the television program in question assigns its student panelists and audience.

Want technology to free "man"

I am a third year mechanical engineering student writing in response to Chuck Edwards article in last Friday's Varsity on "Engineering: learning how to not why".

According to Edwards, we as engineers lack souls and minds of our own. We are robots whose only interest is preserving the "technostructure" and in proving the validity of mathematical formulae.

The writer and many other students on this campus are dreamers if they think we are programmed non-individuals.

We enjoy loud, fraternal gatherings, not for any deep psychological reasons, but simply because they are fun. Many of us do not postulate that the study of "history, languages and the like are simply exercises for the brain and not very useful". Our belief is not that unbridled technology should be our nation's primary goal, but rather that it should serve man by freeing him from mindless tasks, improving his environment and enabling him to pursue his real interests.

The strangest thing is that Mr. Edwards has an engineering degree. Having found the "truth", he wants to show us poor, "docile technicians" that we, like him, may become truly enlightened individuals.

Ms. Lewis is attending as a member of this council and in no way represents the SAC or the University of Toronto as a whole in this endeavour. It is a serious breach of protocol and an insult to the integrity of this council that the SAC should suggest that we do not have the right to choose our own student delegate.

We would hope that SAC would realize its serious error in passing the above mentioned motion. In this, the year of the "decentralized" SAC, that council should more than ever recognize the rights and responsibilities of the federated universities.

We would strongly assert that no such incidents should occur in the future. We have the right, the duty, and the ability to make our own decisions. We will not allow the SAC to impose upon us its wishes on matters which directly pertain to Victoria University.

French chairman corrects details

I should be very grateful if you could make the following corrections in your article entitled "UC French chairman attacks Carleton report" in The Varsity of October 25.

I am quoted as saying Toronto has the only study program in the French-Canadian language. It should read research programme instead of study.

I am quoted as saying enrolment in French courses dropped off. It should read in French-Canadian courses.

You omit to mention graduate courses given by the University of Toronto. (Miss West has a list of them).

Today, "explosive populations" are portrayed in the United States as one of the world's most critical problems.

From the level of propaganda aimed at lower class women to the highest government discussions of population, the alleged connection between poverty and population is continually stressed. Demographic explanations of poverty have provided the glib capitalists with a smokescreen to mask their own role in creating misery.

While the U.S. Government is now manipulating the essential right of every woman to birth control so as to carry out preventive genocide against the women of the Third World, revolutionary Cuba regards birth control as a matter of individual choice.

Fidel Castro explains that with socialist economic development, Cuba could support a considerably larger population:

"The Cuban revolution is not blindly against birth control. The size of the family is the individual decision of the husband and wife as part of their human rights. It is the duty of the state to furnish them with the adequate means for having as many or as few children as they want. The revolution is not scared by population increases and is not worried by a temporary drop in the birth rate.

"There are some countries that pretend that birth control is the solution, but the only ones who are saying this are the capitalists, the exploiters, because no one who understands what humanity can achieve through science and technology sets out to impose limits upon the number that can exist on the earth. This would be especially out of place in a country like ours where there is enough land to take care of a much greater number of people."

Within the U.S. State Department, the Nixon Administration has established a population "office" which is now responsible for coordinating efforts of embassy officers, the Agency for International Development, the Peace Corps, and the U.S. Information Agency to "encourage less developed countries to focus on population matters".

The State Department itself, attributes all manifestations of misery in the world to numbers — "For the vast majority of families in the 'less developed countries' the possibilities of improvement of the welfare of parents and children are submerged by sheer numbers."

During the past four fiscal years, the State Department's fund-giving arm, the Agency for International Development, has increased the budget for population control from $10.5 million to $250 million.

In addition to dispensing population control dollars to dozens of governments, AID pumps money into a number of "philanthropic" organizations that operate throughout the world. One of the biggest recipients is the International Planned Parenthood Federation, whose trustees include Lamont duPont Copeland of the DuPont Chemical Corporation (Copeland recently gave $2 million to Harvard University for its Population Center), Eugenia Black, former chairman of Chase Manhattan Bank; and George Kannan, cold war theoretician.

During the 1960's, the present IPPF president, Dr. Alan F. Guttmacher, bluntly described his fears of Third World revolts:

"Reckless population growth without parallel economic growth ... makes for a constant lowering of the standard of living. Such a decline, with its concomitant mounting poverty and hunger inevitably delivers a population to some kind of -ism, whether it be communism, fascism, or Pan-Arabism, and weens them away from democracy."

Similar ideas have been expressed by American president Dwight Eisenhower who explained his own support for population control as follows:

"Once as president, I thought and said that birth control was not the business of our federal government. The facts changed my mind. Today, with former president Truman, I am honorary chairman of Planned Parenthood (IPPF) because I have come to believe that the population explosion is the world's most critical problem."

Hugh Moore, a wealthy manufacturer, successfully brought the population issue into NATO and later founded the Population Crisis Committee, the Campaign to Check the Population Explosion, and the World Population Emergency Fund. Today, he is chairman of the Association for Voluntary Sterilization. Moore's colleagues on the boards of these and other agencies include figures such as Eugene Black, General Willem H. Dreper (former Secretary of the Army), and Will Cleyton (a former under-secretary of state).

In recent years, both the American government and the "philanthropic" agencies such as IPPF, have exerted continual pressure upon Latin American nations to reduce birth rates. A celebrated case in 1969 was Bolivia, which has recently nationalized Gulf Oil's holdings. When Bolivia, with a population density of less than 4 persons per kilometer, refused to institute "family planning" programs, the World Bank, under American pressure, threatened to withhold all development loans.

Another type of pressure has been conducted by the "Food for Peace" programs. Since 1968, five per cent of all "Food assistance" must be consecrated to programs for reducing population. The Foreign Assistance Act now authorizes American presidents to "consider the extent to which the recipient country is ... carrying out voluntary programs of population control."

The efforts of the State Department are reinforced by such pillars of imperialist "cherry" as the Ford and Rockefeller Foundations, which operate their own population control programs throughout the Third World.

Between 1952 and 1969, the Ford Foundation had distributed $115 million, more than any other public or private agency. In 1968 alone, the Rockefeller Foundation distributed $18 million or almost twice as much as the State Department's population control outlays.

The interconnections between agencies indicate the pitfalls of attempts to examine "family planning" within a vacuum. Just as the most powerful businessmen in the U.S. and the leadership of such agencies as AID and the CIA have developed complex strategies for maintaining economic and political control of "less developed countries", they have sought to develop strategies for keeping the world's future population within "acceptable limits" in order to forestall the crisis that a multi-national system of exploitation will surely produce.

Robert S. McNamara, current World Bank president, and former Secretary of Defense, has been a trustee of the Ford Foundation and president of Ford Motors. He explained:

"All activity (concerning population matters) arises out of the concern of the bank for the way in which the rapid growth of population has become a major obstacle to social and economic development in many of our member states. Family planning programs are less costly than conventional development projects and the pattern of expenditures involved is normally very different. At the same time, we are conscious of the fact that successful programs of this kind will yield very high economic returns."

Today, McNamara's statement is paralleled by American policy. "Costly development projects" have been drastically reduced in the last seven years as population allocations have multiplied. Between 1966 and 1969, AID's population control appropriations rose from $11 million to $18 million. But, in education and manpower training, funds were reduced by almost $6 million. Health programs were cut by $49 million.

Neo-colonialist strategists such as McNamara, when they expound the neo-Malthusian theory of numbers as an obstacle to economic development, conveniently omit the repa of the Third World by foreign capital. Large portions of each year's profits on foreign investments are funneled into foreign loans.

In this way, "developing" countries are continually deprived of funds for domestic capital expansion where foreign exploitation has been consistently maintained since 1945. During the 1950-60 period, the U.S. invested $3.8 billion, but received only $1.5 billion.

Since 1960 and through the 1970's, the U.S. has called "Alliance for Progress" in Latin America has failed. For example, in 1970, U.S. exports have continued to rise, but people's consumption of goods has fallen 10 per cent in the past 10 years. Animal protein increased 10 per cent in the world as a whole, it fell 10 per cent in Latin America.

Despite the Latin American picture provoked by American world-wide picture she has painted, Malthusian cries of alarm are heard. "The food problem in Latin America is likely to be surpluses that will be used to feed the Boerm, former Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), warned that "excess production and dry skimmed milk powder will be sold on the world's total land area for the first time according to the UN report."

"More dramatic techniques, food strains, and the use of one ton of nitrogen equivalent for 14 arable acres, have been growing one end to the other as fast as population since 1960."

Mass starvation of the Third World is insufficient quantities of food. In point is the case of Puerto Rico where investors obtain a return on invested capital (twice that of the U.S.) while the average wage of the industrial worker is only one-third of the U.S. level.

At the same time, Puerto Rico is 25 per cent more agriculturally very rich, with pineapples, tomatoes, lemons, and these same food-stuffs for less cost. Fourteen per cent of the population at different periods has been unemployed in the U.S. to reach 40,000.

As early as 1936, the U.S. upon a strategy of reduction of the rebellious population. The Family Planning Association, an affiliate of IPPF, has operated in Puerto Rico since 1954, one of the child-bearing age had to be Today, Puerto Rico is used by the U.S. as an artificial showcase of capitalist development. While it is pretended that "Operation Bootstrap" (1945-55) industrialized the island, it is also pretended that "family planning" since 1936 brought prosperity.

In 1964, the Fourth Western Hemisphere Conference was held in San Juan, Puerto Rico. One of its many themes was how to win support or "tolerance" from the Catholic hierarchies. It was widely advertised that priests in El Salvador and Uruguay had publicly endorsed "family planning". Heavy emphasis was placed upon individual governments' co-operation with the family planning programs of the Organization of American States.

In order to convince Latin Americans that "family planning" agencies have the interests of the people at heart, the confidence of the masses must be won. North American Protestant organizations had long been a willing instrument in promoting the necessary trust for wide-spread acceptance of U.S. programs.

The Church World Service, with support from AID and other agencies, has initiated "family planning" programs on a world-wide scale. Its activities particularly emphasize selection of "leaders" through training conferences and seminars for public officials. Another specialty of the CWS is creation of "experimental" programs in villages and urban slums often through Latin American universities. Guatemala has had its own national CWS program.

Another major international agency created to mobilize private wealth and power for sharing public policies is the exclusively ruling class Population Council, which was initially established by the Rockefeller family. Today its leaders include such industrial magnates as Henry Ford II, Richard Mellon, Stewart Mott.

The Population Council serves mainly to finance research into such topics as attitudes of poor women in El Salvador toward contraception or the study of male attitudes towards fertility control by the School of Politics at University Sao Paulo in Brazil. In Trinidad, the Population Council has supported programs for clinically testing the IUD. In 1953, Ford Foundation appropriated $14 million for expansion of the Council's bio-medical laboratories used in fertility research.

The Pan-American Health Organization (PAHO) organ of the World Health Organization of the UN helps furnish existing programs with medical knowledge and necessary materials. PAHO has assisted government programs in Trinidad and clinics in the small towns and rural villages of Costa Rica, as well as other Latin American countries. Although under UN auspices, PAHO is also supported by Ford, Rockefeller, Population Council and others.

One of the largest centers for training "family planning" personnel and processing data has been CELADE (the Latin American Demographic Center) in Chile. CELADE had instituted the famous KAP surveys (Knowledge, Attitude, and Practice) which "demonstrate the demand for goods and services, in this case, birth control". The project was initiated at the International Population Program Center at Cornell University in New York. Interviews are conducted with questions concerning health, fear of infidelity, affects of contraception on pleasure, and the affects on male authority.

CELADE has also engaged in projects in the Central Valley of Chile, demonstrating the IUD. There are smaller sub-centers of CELADE such as CESPO in Costa Rica. In Nicaragua with a population density of less than 10 per square mile, CELADE has supported fertility control efforts of the social welfare offices.

Hundreds of family planning clinics throughout Latin America carry the title Association Pro Bienestar de la Familia — IPPF affiliates. AID not only funds these clinics, but maintains many of its own. In Jamaica there are 122, and in Honduras, with one of the lowest population densities in the Western Hemisphere, there are 60 clinics.

Another front for AID's enormous expenditures is the Pathfinder Fund which supports IUD experimentation and helps supply almost every country in Latin America with free or low cost contraceptives. Pathfinder is known for "pilot" projects such as the series of "simplified medicine" experiments carried out in a rural area near Caracas.

As shown previously, private foundations were the early backbone of "field-testing" and general propaganda in the "family planning" field. Ford Foundation has contributed generously to such projects as the study of side-effects of contraceptives in Puerto Rico (one million dollars), and to Maxico for international training in Culdocoscopy a quick and inexpensive method of sterilization.

In Colombia, the Rockefeller Foundation has put large sums into the ACFM program (Association of Colombian Faculties of Medicine) for its population center, concentrating work at the University Del Valle. The Catholic newspaper, El Siglo wrote in a 1965 article that 40 thousand Colombian women had been sterilized under the ACFM program. Small money payments, promises of free medical services, free lipstick, and artificial pearls were offered.

In Bogota, the headquarters of the Population Reference Bureau is also supported by the Rockefeller and other business magnates. For 40 years, it has been concerned with distribution of educational information, focusing on elementary text-book, high school publications, and regular bulletins. Trustees include Frank Abrams (Jarney Stender) and Lawrence Wilkinson (Continental Can). The Bureau has organized "population dialogues" for high level officials, newspaper editors, wealthy industrialists, and labor leaders.

In Brazil, American Protestants were actively peddling "family planning" to the peasants and Indians as early as 1962. Medical students from the University of Gales discovered that Presbyterian missionaries had undertaken mass insertions of the IUD in the underpopulated area along the Belem-Bresille highway. Northeast Brazil has had a population density of about one per square mile and an extraordinary high infant mortality rate of 485 per thousand. Yearly per capita income in the state of Piaul has been $77.

The area is one of the largest well-watered regions in the world that has not yet been heavily settled. In 1961, American investors and ranchers had been buying up enormous tracts of land, and discovery of the missionaries' sterilization programs created a scandal which led to an official government investigation, confirming the genocidal activities of the Americans.

Ten years later, in October 1971, a similar scandal erupted. The daily O Estado da Sao Paulo ran a condemnation by the Medical Association Guanabara (AMEG) of BENFAM, an affiliate of International Planned Parenthood with 41 clinics throughout Brazil, 28 of them "pilot" clinics in Universities. Speaking of BENFAM, the doctors wrote:

"The great propelling motor of the programs of this anti-life is the funds coming from the IPPF whose offices are in New York and London."

AMEG cited agreements signed by the state governments of Rio Grenda da Norte and Espirito Santo with BENFAM.

"BENFAM is using deceitful terms."

"You only have to use the pill or the IUD to resolve your family's financial difficulties."

Dr. Mario Pacheco argued, "As far as we know there is no country in the world where poverty has been erased by birth control."

On December 2 of the same year, the same newspaper ran a headline entitled "One million sterilized in Brazil". According to AMEG, between 1965 and 1972, BENFAM had sterilized a million women. The secretary-general of the National Conferance of Bishops, Don Ivo Lorscheider, signed the protest, endorsing the "criminal philosophy of BENFAM". "Its practice of abortion methods is carried out against the poorest classes and is against the interests of the country." The Bishop of Belem, Alberto Gaudencio Ramos claimed that in the Amazon Region, foreign missionaries had also been working with BENFAM. A statement the following day called upon all Brazilians to expel the "depopulators".

Irving accused of forming news monopolies

FREDRICKTON (CUP) — New Brunswick is saturated with newspapers owned by the K. C. Irving Company, a combines trial was told last week.

Howard Coutts, vice-president of the Chicago-based Audit Bureau of Circulation (ABC) said about 145,000 New Brunswick households are served by six daily papers. All except the French language Moncton L'Evangeline are owned by companies belonging to New Brunswick industrialist K. C. Irving.

Irving-owned papers reach some 108,000 of those households, according to Ralph Costello, president of the New Brunswick Publishing Company which produces the Telegraph-Journal and Evening Times in Saint John.

Coutts later told defense lawyer Donald Gillis circulation rates of New Brunswick dailies are "lower than most" major daily newspapers in other parts of Canada. He also agreed, after looking at a list he prepared of all papers with circulation in New Brunswick, there is "certainly a variety of points of view expressed."

The New Brunswick Publishing Company, the Moncton Publishing Company Limited, and University Press of New Brunswick in Fredericton are charged along with K. C. Irving Ltd. on four counts of forming mergers and monopolies.

Decision reached

The University of Toronto has reached a decision on the grievance filed by fired library employee Dave Owen.

However, John Parker, U of T's Manager of Management-Labour Relations would not release the decision until union steward Tom Bribrisco had been informed.

A letter containing the decision went out to Bribrisco, yesterday afternoon, Parker said.

Owen was fired October 18, the day after he attended a union meeting, as a representative for workers in his department. Although he was told he was fired for "unsatisfactory work", Local 1230 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees contends he was dismissed for his union activities.

The case is said to be the first in Canada involving daily newspapers in combines charges.

The trial, being heard before the New Brunswick Supreme Court, was ordered last July, following preliminary hearings and more than two years of work by federal combines investigators into the production, supply and distribution of New Brunswick newspapers.

Gillis has tried to prove the Irving newspaper empire is not as harmful a monopoly as other newspapers in Canada. He introduced ABC circulation reports, and Coutts testified the circulation of Nova Scotia's principal dailies — the Halifax Chronicle-Herald and Mail Star — was 115,810, compared to the Irving papers' 108,000 combined circulation.

The implication was that the Nova Scotia dailies published by the Halifax Herald have a larger monopoly than Irving papers. No mention was made of the fact K. C. Irving Ltd. has been tied rather loosely with the Halifax Herald Ltd., which publishes the city's two dailies. Lawrence Daley, Irving's lawyer in Nova Scotia, is vice-president and director of Halifax Herald Limited and is on the boards of several Irving-controlled companies. He also has a controlling interest in a Halifax radio station. No conclusive evidence has yet been produced to show Irving has a controlling interest in the Halifax company.

Gillis also referred to papers in Windsor, London, and Edmonton which he said were the only substantial ones published in their respective cities. The number of copies circulated, and the number of households in their retail trading zones are larger than those of the Irving dailies, he said.

Costello has been the principal witness so far. The industrialist announced earlier this year he was no longer a New Brunswick resident, and gave evidence for the trial from his present residence in Bermuda.

The publisher identified and read notes, seized March 31 by federal combines officers, which said that Irving bought the Fredericton Daily Gleaner in 1968 "in the public interest".

On Wednesday October 25 Costello testified the two Irving-owned morning papers in St. John and Moncton lose money but are kept operating as a public service. Under cross-examination, however, he admitted the New Brunswick Publishing Company, which produces one of the financially-troubled papers, showed a profit of $260,000 last year.

Costello said he thought Irving should have sold the Gleaner. Reading from copies of notes he made in 1968, he said "this (sale) will take the sting out of the charge you (Irving) want to control public opinion."

"If New Brunswick can support five daily newspapers, it is difficult, if not impossible, to argue that all five should be owned by one man, who also has radio and TV interests and is interested in so many other facets of New Brunswick life."

On Thursday October 26, Costello told Gillis that Irving once suggested a foundation should operate the five Irving-owned daily papers in the province. The newspapers would be "given to the people of New Brunswick or the students of New Brunswick, or the universities of New Brunswick".

No mention was made of the fate of that suggestion. Irving transferred the ownership of his publishing companies to his three sons when he left the country. (He cited recently-passed succession duties as the reason for his departure).

Costello also gave unclear testimony on criticism that Irving-owned papers make about Irving enterprises. On October 23 he said he could not recall an editorial in the Saint John papers "directly critical of Mr. Irving."

"When Irving interests have been involved in news events, they've been reported on extensively," the publisher claimed.

In evidence taken last June in Bermuda, and introduced October 23, Irving said his business empire received no special treatment from his papers. They were treated worse than others, if anything, he declared.

"I don't think that he's been treated any blacker than others, but it would be the position of the papers to lean in that direction if there was any suggestion we were giving him favorable treatment," Costello said of Irving October 24.

Defense Lawyer Gillis introduced copies of news stories and features from the Saint John papers to refute charges they slant or distort news or ignore events critical of Irving's enterprises. Articles on pollution — one mentioning the Irving Pulp and Paper mill in Saint John as one of the biggest offenders, and another on an Irving barge which caused an oil spill — were produced. Other exhibits dealt with strikes, accidents, fires and labor problems at Irving plants.

Maritimers have been upset for some time about Irving's numerous holdings and virtual monopoly in much of the New Brunswick media.

The trial has been adjourned until November 6, when it will reconvene in Moncton. Some New Brunswick sources have speculated the case will eventually end up in the Supreme Court of Canada, because the decision could affect the three major newspaper chains in Canada.

Ottawa to set up science research centres

Alberta U boycotts Kraft

LETHBRIDGE (CUP) - Continued student pressure has persuaded the administration to remove most Kraft products from the University of Lethbridge cafeteria.

Food services director Bob Powesland announced that all lines but one are being replaced by non-Kraft products.

He has been unable to find a replacement for Kraft salad dressings, he said.

Powesland said the decision came only when it became apparent the issues wouldn't "blow over".

Successive articles in the student newspaper, the Meliorist, contributed to the move. The first was a lengthy feature on the national Kraft boycott by Canadian University Press. A later Meliorist article dealt specifically with the Lethbridge cafeteria.

A Kraft sales representative told Powesland that agitation at the University of Calgary and the University of Alberta had died down, and the administration did not move against Kraft products at either campus.

The National Farmers Union is in the second year of its nation-wide boycott against Kraft Foods Limited. The NFU is seeking the right to bargain collectively with Kraft and other large food corporations to secure higher prices for Canadian farmers.

Kraft refuses to negotiate.

OTTAWA (CUP) - The federal government is seeking a new research policy that will increase research and development done in Canada.

The government's growing concern results from the almost complete lack of research work being carried out in Canada by foreign multi-national corporations.

Officials from the Ministry of State for Science and Technology have scheduled meetings with various university representatives.

The government officials have already met with university presidents and deans of engineering. A meeting with the representatives of graduate schools is scheduled to coincide with the annual meeting of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC) in Toronto Nov. 1.

The sessions so far have been described as consultative meetings to solicit the scientific community's views on Canadian research policy.

The most concrete suggestion from the meetings is that "centres of excellence" should be established to carry out scientific research. The centres actually would be research establishments which would deal exclusively with one subject area. They could investigate such broad topics as northern development, mass transit, improvement of agricultural productivity, or such specific areas as the development of a non-polluting automobile.

Officials are still discussing the form any of these centres would take. Dr. Aurele Beaulnes, secretary of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology (equivalent to deputy minister) wants the centres to be distributed across Canada to help fight regional disparity.

But opposition to such plans would likely come from the established universities from which most of the expertise for the... centres of excellence are likely to come. The realities of faculty empire building make it highly unlikely that the large influential universities like McGill or University of Toronto would allow moves to diminish their influence without a fight.

The government's target date for completing its research re-evaluation is the end of 1973. Legislation is already being planned.

Liberal had edge in U of T polls

University of Toronto students divided their support among the three major parties in Monday's federal election, with Liberal victor Peter Stollery having a slight edge.

The poll which included the Victoria College residences provided Stollery's largest plurality as he polled 115 votes to New Democrat Bob Beardsley's 46 and Conservative Perry Ryan's 62. Stollery also narrowly won the poll which included Trinity and Devonshire Place residences as well part of UC's, polling 69 votes to Ryan's 68 and Beardsley's 35.

Beardsley, however, won at one of the New College Polls, gaining 85 votes to Stollery's 56 and Ryan's 54. He also narrowly won at St. Mike's with 68 votes to Ryan's 66 and Stollery's 56.

Beardsley also carried polls at the Married Students Residence on Charles Street and the Graduate Students residence on St. George, but only by small margins.

Calls for bi-national state

Restructure Canada, says Quebec Marxist

By ZOYA STEVENSON
Marxist scholar Stanley B. Ryerson, said last week that he believed that "only as a restructured bi-national state is there a possibility of Canada working."

He was speaking at a graduate sociology seminar on social change in contemporary Quebec.

Ryerson is the author of a number of economic history books, including The Founding of Canada and Unequal Union.

Ryerson argued against prominent Canadian historian Donald Creighton's position on biculturalism. "Quebec nationalism viewed as a hoax, the product of political salesman, as Creighton contends," he said, "denies the quality of the Canadian state."

"Even Lester B. Pearson," he noted, "made the subversive observation that Quebec was in a way, the homeland of a people, and thus recognized the need for a new way of looking at French-English relations in Canada."

The author said he favoured the positions put forward in the Bilingualism and Biculturalism Report initiated by Pearson, saying it was "an encyclopedic expedition of note."

He said the B and B Report looked "not only at the dimension of linguistic inequality of Quebec, as Mr. Trudeau would have us believe, but also at the dimension of the social, economic, and most significantly, the political dimension of the inequality of Quebec."

"Trudeau has chosen to ignore those dimensions," he continued.

Ryerson contended that the 1867 confederation "pretended there was an arrangement between two national communities, and was structured so that the province of Quebec became a state for the Quebecois, yet Quebec existed in an overall federal system which accepted bi-nationality in terms, but denied it in substance."

He said one result of the constitutional ambiguity is that today people see Quebec in the framework of dominion-provincial relations, instead of as an equal partner and constituent of Canada.

He stated that "it is precisely the relationship of dependence to English capitalists which has aggravated and will continue to aggravate national resentment in Quebec."

At the nexus of the "phenomene Quebecoise" was the late 18th century "intersecting of industrialization in an expanding industrial corporate society, with competition including the owners of New France, New England, New Holland and New Sweden, in a competition signalled by the English victory in the Seven Years War."

"The other component of the phenomenon," he said, "becomes evident when the evolving national community and interaction among social classes have intersected in a particular way historically speaking, to create the dilemma of the French-Canadian nation."

This occurred, he said, "initially in a setting of colonialism, which today is a setting of corporate monopoly."

He described the two stages in the Quiet Revolution and the "explosion scolaire" by saying that the "1960's began with the impertinence of the Catholic priest who challenged in a book, the authority of the Church and ended with the popularization and radicalization of Quebec history in Leandre Bergeron's Le petit Manuel d'Histoire de Quebec.

The author continued that the "explosion scolaire and the rapid growth of radical ideas are part of those things that have coerced the powers that be along with the need for a modern industrialized society."

Ryerson said the growth of students enrolled in school from 665,000 in 1945 to 2 million in 1967 could be attributed to the changing and complex needs of industry. He cited a report which co-related the rate of profit in industry to the growth of quality in education.

He said that the explosion scolaire resulted in the restructuring of the school system through the creation of the CEGEP (community colleges). He noted that instead of 70 per cent entering the labour market through the technical schools, only 30 per cent did, thus making an implicit criticism of a society which encourages only one English Canadian out of three French Canadians to go to technical school.

Ryerson claimed that the industrialization of Quebec had created both a "sea of poverty" and a "concentration of immense wealth." He showed figures demonstrating a wide discrepancy between the average family incomes of French and English Canadians in Quebec. The range of Quebecois families average earnings is from $4,500 to $6,000 per year compared to $7,000 and $17,000 for English-speaking residents of Quebec.

He said he agreed with a questioner that there is a discernible shift accompanying expansion of production which enables a society to maintain greater proportions of tertiary (service) type work. He noted that from 1951 to 1961 the primary industry dropped from 22 per cent to 14 per cent, of the Quebec economy, and secondary industry fell from 37.1 per cent to 36.9 while the tertiary sector rose from 38.5 per cent to 45.9 per cent.

But he said this was irrelevant to the situation faced by workers today in Quebec. The amount of automated production in Canadian industry as a whole is small, Ryerson claimed. Thus the question of the structure of social relationships is whether or not development takes place to the advantage of all.

"For the first time in its history, the question of socialism and independence are on the agenda of the trade unions in Quebec."

Trost runs for mayor

The Young Socialists and the League for Socialist Action Friday announced that Jacquie Henderson will run for mayor of Toronto on a socialist platform.

Although Henderson stated in a campaign speech announcing her decision to enter the race "City Hall is now dominated by the friends of the developers and the corporations", most of her speech dealt with women's rights.

Day care, abortion facilities and women's rights highlight her platform.

"I'm the kind of feminist who's a fighting feminist," she said. She added she particularly likes feminist demonstrations.

The YS-LSA also announced that U of T political economy graduate student Ellie Kirzner will run for alderman in Ward 8. Kirzner ran unsuccessfully for the SAC vice-presidency in 1969.

U of T student Cliff Mack will run for education trustee in Ward 6 on the slate.

Bishop's football player sues

LENNOXVILLE (CUP) — A spokesman for Bishop University said today suit for $2,280,191.46 in damages has been filed against the university on the half of a former student who sustained a serious injury a year ago as a member of the university's football team, the Bishop's Gaiters. Harold (Butch) Voce has been paralyzed from the neck down since he broke his neck lacking a member of the Georgians of Sir George Williams University during a regular season game at Bishop's in October 1971. Alex K. Paterson, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Board of Governors of Bishop's, added filing of the suit in Sherbrooke, Quebec, superior court meant the matter was

"sub judice" and this precluded any further comment. Voce, who is recovering in Queen Mary Hospital in Montreal, has just acquired a special electric wheelchair which he can operate using his neck and shoulder muscles. He is taking a sociology course at Champlain Regional College, on the Bishop University campus in Lennoxville, by means of tape recorder lessons.

Women candidates flop in St. Paul's

Ron Atkey's victory Monday for the Conservative Party in St. Paul's riding, unseating Ian Wahn, coincided with a national trend against the Liberal government, and also dealt a blow to the Women for Political Action movement.

Atkey defeated Wahn with 14,571 votes to 13,646 in an upset. Independent Kay Macpherson finished with 1,905 votes, well behind NDP candidate Mary Boyle's 3,965.

Communist Elizabeth Hill garnered 136 votes, compared to Social Credit candidate John Bilan's 101 and Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) candidate Crawford McNair's 49.

Macpherson, former president of the Voice of Women, had not expected to win, but had hoped to do as well as NDPer Boyle. Campaign workers at the Macpherson committee room attributed her failure to splintering of the left, and the fact that three women contested the seat.

Kay Macpherson

The combined votes of the women candidates amounted to only one fifth of the total vote.

"People wanted a change, but felt a switch to the Conservatives to be the safest way to achieve this," explained Dorothy Martin at the Macpherson committee room.

Atkey yesterday attributed his success to the high number of undecided voters (44 per cent. on the Thanksgiving weekend) who seemed to make last minute decisions in his favour.

He also mentioned his last heavy canvass of the riding in the week prior to the election. "It was a calculated risk, but it paid off," he announced cheerfully.

Atkey added he was glad Macpherson had run in this election. "She kept the level of debate at a high level."

Boyle commented yesterday that she was "very pleased" with her showing, since the NDP share of the vote had increased about 50 per cent compared to 1968.

She added that people who wanted to vote against the government normally chose the second place candidate, which was the Conservative last election.

Boyle was not surprised by either Wahn's victory or Macpherson's showing.

Macpherson "got what I would expect from an independent who campaigned for a year," she said.

Wahn, Hill, McNair and Bilan were not available for comment.

PHE's closest game of the season was won by Dava Mallach's field goal in the closing minutes of the game. MacConnell scored SMC's only touchdown in the second half.

Game marred by penalties

Scar defeats PHE C in Division II

Scarborough defeated PHE C 5-1 Monday night in a lacrosse game marked by rough play on the part of PHE.

Scar's superior passing skills and constant offensive enabled the team to dominate the first half, just as their defensive play gave them the balance in the final 20 minutes.

Well-executed passing helped Scar's Bowyer to put the east end team ahead 1-0 early in the first period. Bowyer's goal came shortly after Nakamura's breakaway shot was stopped by PHE goalie Matchett.

Five minutes into the game Smith made it 2-0 for Scar.

However, late in the first period PHE got back into the game on an angled shot by McGoeys from the left side of the crease. Scar goalie Brian Nash was beaten cleanly even though he moved to cut down the angle. The goal was assisted by D. Taylor.

Scar widened the score again on a "triangle play" early in the second period. Nakamura scored, with Colter and McBride assisting. The goal came with PHE a man short. D. Taylor serving a penalty for highsticking. With Taylor still out, Nakamura almost scored again after taking a pass from Colter; but this time Nash stopped him.

Scar's Bowyer got his second goal of the game late in the second period, while D. Taylor was serving his second penalty, this time for tripping. Bowyer snapped the ball from centre court and Nash didn't even see it go by. One minute later Smith made it 5-1 for Scar, again with a shot from centre court.

Scar played defensively in the second half, trying to protect their four-goal lead. PHE sprayed shots around the PHE goal crease, but few found the goal area.

The Scar team checked consistently forcing the PHE players to get the ball away quickly and preventing any goals from being set-up. Scar's Bowyer blocked at least three hard shots on goal from a PHE player during the third period.

PHE played "over-aggressively" trying to knock out Scar players rather than play a passing game. What passing they did do was disorganized and sloppy. On the other side, Scar used court-long passes to advantage to put them ahead.

PHE's rough play and penalties also cost the team goals. The PHE team had eight penalties to Scar's four (one of the Scar penalties was a bench penalty for having too many men on the floor).

The other Scar penalties went to McBride for roughing and highsticking, and to Smith for highsticking.

For PHE Tessaro was high man with four penalties — two for highsticking, one for roughing, and one for charging. D. Taylor was sent off for highsticking and tripping and

R. Taylor also received a highsticking penalty.

PHE's McGoeys spent a good portion of his time on the floor trying to knock down Scar players, rather than play lacrosse. In one instance, with Scar ahead 2-0 in the first period he systematically knocked down Scar's McBride and Bowyer, and attempted to "check" Serio to the floor, but instead fell himself. PHE's D. Taylor was the second best brawler on the team; he knocked Scar's March to the floor on one occasion but received a penalty for it.

At halftime PHE's McGoeys was told the score and replied "We'll kill them this half." They didn't. At one point PHE's R. Taylor attempted to fight with Scar's Bowyer, dropping his gloves and stick to the floor and waiting for Bowyer to do the same.

Scar's McBride was given a penalty in the third period for taking a swing at a PHE player, and he casually threw his stick against the wall as he walked over to serve his time.

VOL. NO. 23
FRIDAY, NOV. 3, 1972 TORONTO

Paul Rimstead (right) and Jacquie Henderson are considered underdogs in mayoralty race against David Rotenberg (left). David Crombie and Tony O'Donohue (unseen) are also contenders.

Rotenberg likes City Hall record

Mayorality candidate David Rotenberg Wednesday defended the record of the City Council in the last three years, while others attacked it for being blindly pro-growth.

Rotenberg, a Ward 11 alderman and budget chief for the city, told over 600 people at St. Lawrence Centre that "our present city council has made Toronto an exciting place to live."

His co-alderman for Ward 11 and the "reform" candidate, David Crombie, agreed with Rotenberg that "Toronto must be kept special and liveable", but interpreted it differently.

"The preservation of neighbourhoods is the key," he declared. Rotenberg has consistently voted against neighbourhood groups opposing high-rise developments, which threaten to break up their communities.

Alderman Tony O'Donohue, who has supported development almost to the same extent as Rotenberg, also had a vision of Toronto as a "beautiful city of parks, malls and flowers."

A vocal critic of Rochdale, O'Donohue emphasized that a strong family life is the foundation of any community, and must be strengthened. He also stated that police should be supported "whatever they do."

Questioners from the audience heavily criticized the present council for its record of poor attendance, conflicts of interest and compliance with the destruction of neighbourhoods.

League for Socialist Action candidate Jacquie Henderson, a feminist who insisted on being called "Ms. Henderson", declared it is time to kick corporate bums out of city hall.

She attacked council members for being consistently pro-development, suggesting as an example that 18,000 of the 19,000 acres of land near Toronto needed for construction of houses is owned by three developers.

Toronto Sun columnist Paul Rimstead also joined in the chorus of criticism of present councillors, asking why council takes so much time to approve subways and expressways when it requires little time to decide on 70-storey buildings which are a major cause of heavy transportation expenditures.

Rimstead, who was introduced by moderator Larry Solway as a "tongue-in-cheek candidate" for mayor, surprised the audience by suggesting the possibility of a black-white (racial) situation.

He hastened to add that he believed Toronto had good black communities and "bad" white ones as well. He did not elaborate further, but may have been referring to fears among some of Toronto's black community leaders that a significant conflict may come about.

Crombie emphasized citizen involvement in decision-making. "I want to keep this city growing in a way that supports neighbourhoods", he said. "City hall must be kept open and the people must be involved continuously."

Rotenberg also backed some degree of citizen participation, advocating "mini planning boards" to be composed of "responsible citizens". He emphasized that these people were to be "not interested in confrontation but in constructive involvement."

O'Donohue, an engineer, said the way to control cars in the city is to require clean fuels to be used in them. He reaffirmed his support for the Spadina Expressway.

Dropouts question degrees

OTTAWA (CUP) — Poor employment prospects were cited as the major reason full-time undergraduate enrolment has skidded to a halt, according to information released by Statistics Canada.

A government telephone survey of most university registrars indicated that the actual increase in enrolment is .5 per cent for the fall term. It is expected that by the end of the fall term, drop-outs will reduce the growth rate to zero.

The survey discovered marked regional differences. Universities in Western Canada had marked decreases, while Ontario universities experienced a slight increase, Quebec universities enjoyed a fairly large increase of five per cent.

Preliminary figures of another Statistics Canada study indicate the major reason students dropped out of university was the lack of employment opportunities after graduation.

Dr. Miles Wisenthal told CUP the survey contacted students who had not returned to complete their degree courses. The students overwhelmingly said that the major reason for not returning was that they could not see going deeply into debt to obtain something (a degree) that was of questionable value.

The survey also indicated that a higher proportion of young people coming from low income families dropped out of university.

This clearly shows that, despite government claims of promoting universal accessibility, the poor simply do not have the same chance to obtain post-secondary education as do the children of the better off.

The study also showed that Quebec students were more militant and "anti-establishment" than students from other provinces, Wisenthal said.

Some 25 per cent of those polled were back in the educational sphere either as part-time students or in community colleges.

Statistics Canada has reached agreement with universities to conduct a survey to determine if there is any regional pattern to drop-outs and the reasons for their decision.

Universities warned to reappraise research

By PAUL McGRATH

Canadian universities, if they wish to avoid government interference, must make a group effort to clarify and consolidate research policy in the near future, according to a report released by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada Wednesday.

The authors of the report, retiring AUCC president, Louis-Phillipe Bonneau, former vice-director of Laval University, and J. A. Corry, former principal of Queen's University, think a clash between universities and government on the subject of research is possible.

Corry said in the keynote address to the association's annual meeting being held this week in Toronto at the Hyatt Regency Hotel: "For the last two or three years, there has been looming on the horizon a likely collision between the two legitimate and even indispensable principles of action.

"First, the health, vigour and effectiveness of university research requires freedom for the researcher, which means resources to do what he wants to do in the way that seems right to him. Second, it is the legitimate and indispensable principle of constitutional government that governments must account for the expenditure of public money and give satisfactory assurance that significant public benefit will flow for the appropriations to particular purposes."

"We have said elsewhere that the universities, generally speaking, lack an explicit policy on research. Actually, they have had for many years an implicit policy, to push research in the general areas which these three councils support."

The report recommends that each university set up its own objectives in research in co-operation with other universities and governments.

It hopes that co-operation will avoid situations the commission often found: research attempts scattered and lacking in imagination, and duplication of effort.

"Resources are widely scattered over many institutions and persons, much of them put into small projects too many of which are open to serious question," the report states.

It recommends establishing a library of information about on-going research all across Canada to avoid the duplication and non-centralized research.

Also recommended for an experimental period of time is closer scrutiny by the funding agencies of applications for research grants to see that they fit into the desired pattern.

Since an increasing amount of time and money goes into research, the commission felt that research could do a disservice to the university and the community, if it is unfavourable to the report."

J. A. Corry, co-author of report.

Provincial governments, through educational grants and the federal government, through federal funding agencies, provide most funds for research.

The report referred to the three agencies most responsible for funding research within the universities: the National Research Council, the Medical Research Council and the Canada Council.

"They therefore have had a large influence on the policy of the universities.

Research on the post-graduate level takes up an increasing part of the educational grant dollar. Government in addition to feeling that much of this money might be wasted, is becoming increasingly aware of its own research needs, such as urban studies and investigations of pipeline possibilities in the northland, according to Corry.

He said the late 60's were a time when "governments took alarm at the escalation of university costs generally and when their confidence in the universities was severely shaken by the turmoil within the universities."

Bonneau stressed at a press conference that most universities thought that "more (research) meant better", adding that they couldn't be blamed. "It's the way our civilization works."

Corry added that the reasons for what he described as "defects" in research are connected to the massive growth of the universities in the last decade.

Thus, the report suggests that before the government takes strong action, universities and colleges should clean their own houses.

Corry said after delivering his speech on the report that he "sensed the temper of the meeting was not done at the expense of other functions within the university."

"We add that frontier research (to be distinguished from reflective inquiry, which is the research of facts already known) competes in the minds of considerable numbers of university staff members, and leads that to concentrate on it at the expense of teaching," the report says.

It recommends that universities revise their policies on promotion and salary increases to give equal weight to undergraduate teaching.

The commission feels that the governments — both federal and provincial — should give special attention on a national basis to building up centers of specialization in limited fields. For the middle-sized universities, this will nourish both quality research and regional aspirations.

The report also recommends that funding agencies put aside a portion of their money as research risk capital, to insure emergency surplus.

The authors suggest that AUCC encourage discussion within universities and governments in an attempt to define the critical research needs of both.

The flow of funds to the universities should be more strictly regulated, the report advocates, to ensure that each one makes the best use of scarce resources.

HERE AND NOW

Effective Monday, Here and Now will include listings up to and including events scheduled for the morning of the next paper. Activities held before noon of the next issue (for example, Wednesday noon for a Monday paper) will be published in the previous paper and not repeated in the subsequent paper. This change has been made in response to reader requests.

TODAY 9 am

Blood donor clinic school of dentistry. Primarily for dentistry. However, all are welcome. Till 3:30 pm.

10 am

"New Perspectives" on the Chinese Revolution of 1911. Professor Chun-Tu Hsueh, University of Maryland. Recent visitor to China. 202 Galbraith Building. Sponsor: International Studies Programme.

noon

Last day to reserve for suppers for Monday and Tuesday November 6th and 7th.

12:30 pm

Come and pray with Vic VCF. Vic Chapel. (Old Vic 2nd floor).

1 pm

Representatives from the School of Social Work will discuss Professional Social Work Careers. Non-Professional Social Work will also be discussed. McLennan Physics Bldg., Room 203.

4 pm

Wine and Cheese Party as usual at 16 Bancroft Ave. The Graduate Students' Union is pleased to announce that due to its fantastic success last week, we will once again be serving imported wines. See you at the GSU.

5 pm

Arab Student Association holds its weekly informal meeting. Everybody is welcome.

7 pm

SMC Film Club presents "Two Lane Blacktop" starring James Taylor, Dennis Wilson and Warren Oates. Carr Hall, admission $1. Again at 10 pm.

8 pm

Listen to Varsity Blues hockey on Radio Varsity. Follow the Blues at home end away with live play-by-play coverage. Tonight, the Blues play the Greys. Radio Varsity, 8:20 am, 96.3 FM on Rogers Cable.

Third in a series of lectures on Hungarian History sponsored by the Hungarian Students' Association. Steven Borbely — "The era of enlightenment and the post-Napoleonic era". Sid Smith, rm. 1069.

8:30 pm

UC Players present a new Canadian play "Old Friends", UC Playhouse, 79a St. George.

SATURDAY 8:30 pm

A Roller Skating Party sponsored by Varsity Christian Fellowship! Meet at 6:30 pm in front of Hart House with cars. Skating from 7:00 to 9:00 pm at Mimico Arena, then to Hilltop Chapel for cocoa and fellowship. All are welcome.

7:30 pm

SMC Film Club presents "Two Lane Blacktop" starring James Taylor, Dennis Wilson and Warren Oates. Carr Hall, admission $1. Again at 10 pm.

8 pm

Annual Hillelween Party will be held at Hillel House 186 St. George St. Bring costumes and if not come as you are.

8:30 pm

UC Players present "Old Friends". UC Playhouse, 79a St. George.

midnight

SMC Film Club presents "Don't Knock the Rock" with Bill Haley and Little Richard. Carr Hall. Admission only 49c.

SUNDAY 11 am

"God is pro-life" will be discussed and celebrated at the Hart House service for the university community.

7 pm

SMC Film Club presents Jean Renier's "The Lower Depths" with Jean Rabin, Carr Hall. Admission by series ticket. Again at 9:30 pm.

7:30 pm

Intermediate Conversational Hebrew of Hillel House 186 St. George St.

Again, the choir of Bloor Street United Church under the direction of Ray, Donald Gillies is presenting a musical treat — Schubert's Mass in G and other works by Bach, Finzi and Vaughan Williams. Students will be welcome at this event.

8 pm

Knox College presents: "A New Celebration For All To Sing", a service in the contemporary mode. Knox Chapel 59 St. George Street.

8:30 pm

Hillel Film Series presents "Where's Papa?" Admission 75 cents. McLennan, room 202.

Opponents hopeful election kills airport

Opponents of the proposed Pickering Airport are optimistic that Monday's federal election means the end of the plan, or at least, an adequate study before it goes ahead.

Both Conservative leader Robert Stanfield, who may well turn out to be Prime minister, and NDP leader David Lewis, who holds the balance of power between the Liberals and Conservatives, have gone on record as saying that there is no proven need for a second large airport in the Toronto area.

In addition, a survey of Metro area candidates carried out by People or Planes, the chief anti-airport group, shows that most of the MP's present are opposed to the plan.

Of 24 ridings surveyed, 14 returned MP's who stated there is no proven need for a second airport. Only five said there is a need, while the other five were either undecided or unavailable for comment.

If a need for a second airport is shown, nine of the elected candidates said they were not satisfied with the Pickering site, with only three replying that they were. Nine others were undecided.

Tim Lash of the Metropolitan Toronto Airport Review committee and closely connected to "People or Planes," says he is "very hopeful" that present expropriation proceedings to acquire land for the site will be stopped because of the election.

"We're really pleased that so many people want a sensible approach."

'Conflicts have hampered progress'

Chinese power struggles held not ideological

Chun-tu Hseuh spoke yesterday on China after the Cultural Revolution

By GREG McMASTER

The power struggles in the Chinese bureaucracy do not represent any important policy differences, according to University of Maryland professor Chun-tu Hsueh.

Chun-tu, who spent a month in China last year said he was "very impressed by the stability of the society in the area of business" during his visit.

He described the details of the power struggles and ousters from power since the cultural revolution in terms of personal bids for control of the Chinese state.

He claimed the "good job" in improving foreign relations and increasing production is unrelated to the positions of the different factions, whose struggles have been hampering the rebuilding of the state superstructure and the Communist Party apparatus.

Policy differences are "rather secondary in my opinion", he said.

He suggested that Chen Po-ta, of the Central Committee, who was officially held responsible for the "Red Guard excesses" in the cultural revolution was really removed from power by Chairman Mao-Mao-tse Tung to placate the army. The army opposed the left wing of the bureaucracy, led by Chen.

Meanwhile, said Chun-tu, Mao was planning to curb the military's power and to remove party vice-chairman and army leader Lin Piao, who had personal ambitions of becoming chief of state. Mao is the party leader, but the head of state position has been vacant since the cultural revolution.

Chun-tu said it is "quite conceivable that Lin Piao tried a coup d'etat", but premier Chou En-lai has not mentioned this to any western visitors.

Chun said that Lin tried to flee to the Soviet Union either because a coup attempt failed or because he was about to be ousted.

Chun said that "as long as either Mao or Chou is alive the political situation is under control", but that leadership succession would be decided by struggle between three political factions: the Maoists in the Communist Party, the government administrators and bureaucrats, and the army generals.

Dean advocates more undergraduate teaching

By BOB BETTSON

"Canadian universities must revise their research policies and devote the same attention to undergraduate teaching and reflective inquiry as they do to frontier research and graduate teaching," according to Queens' Dean of Engineering R. J. Uffen.

Uffen was speaking yesterday at seminar on "Research and Social Responsibility" at the annual meeting of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada.

A former chairman of the Defense Research Board and chief science advisor to the federal cabinet, Uffen said he was "stunned (on his return to the university) by the pre-occupation of people with graduate and frontier research".

He said that any research where secrecy is involved "has no place on campus". He attributed the growing drive to "integrate social needs and scientific responsibilities" with "the arousal of social consciences in the late sixties". Now, professors want to "explore practical problems through mission-oriented research".

Uffen stated that each university should decide on its own research policy based on community and regional needs.

He was challenged from the floor by Peter Gunther from Mount Allison University who charged that "universities should not get too involved in local research because it makes them parochial, especially small universities".

Uffen said that the new trend in research is that the federal and provincial governments are demanding "rewards" in return for the high cost of funding. He added that these "rewards" were through the use of science and technology for national objectives.

He said that though basic scientific research is an important input to government decision-making, "decisions are made by debate and confrontation which is not well suited to the laws of nature".

Uffen predicted that budget austerity will continue in university research for the next few years because "clear benefits" are not obvious to the public.

He also predicted growth of research in the social sciences and humanities at the expense of natural sciences and engineering.

As an example of this expansion into the field of human behaviour, he cited studying the behaviour of airline hijackers to develop preventive measures.

He said that when prevention would involve restrictions on freedom, at that point it became a matter of political judgment which he saw as completely separate from the technology developed by scientists.

Asked if research sponsored by the Defence Research Board contributed to the United States' war effort, Uffen said that the board doesn't finance any research except for defensive purposes.

He added that the Suffield chemical and biological research station in Alberta is "only concerned with developing protection against nerve agents ... and things like that".

Uffen claimed that decisions on utilization of research "are not up to the scientist. These are made by the government.

"We are trying hard to convince people that charges that we do war research are not true."

Former SAC vice-president Phil Dack, a delegate from the Ontario Institute of Studies in Education, charged that social sciences were indeed playing a more important role in research "when the chairman of political economy at U of T gives his staff a memo concerning applying for grants to study the use of armed forces for internal security."

AUCC wants further research on research

By BRIANE NASIMOK

The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada decided yesterday that a report on research it had commissioned needed more study by both governments and the universities.

The final session heard reports of workshops which discussed various topics included in "Quest for the Optimum", the AUCC's report on rationalization of university research, but left all substantive issues to its board of directors.

University of Manitoba president Ernest Sirluck said a majority of his workshop on planning research accepted the necessity for more planning of research in universities, as suggested by the report.

"A less substantial majority found the report was not workable in large established universities," said Sirluck.

Another discussion group, on research and teaching in graduate studies and the humanities, recommended research funding be examined by the federal government.

A workshop on social responsibility in research agreed that the peer system is still the best way to evaluate research. But, as former Trent University president T. H. B. Symons reported, the group thought more study was needed on alternative methods evaluation, and on research structure, guidelines, and procedure.

Erindale political economy professor Donald Smiley, in a speech to another workshop, agreed with former U of T president Claude Bissell's view that "the government overcontrols the university".

The consensus of that workshop, according to its chairman, McGill president R. E. Bell, was that the report's conclusions could not be adopted by all the universities because "each has its own specific needs".

J. Alexander Cory, a co-author of the research report, said, "There is a high quality of research going on presently," but the report was not commissioned to assess the present quality, but the quantity.

He suggested that the report may have "leaned a little against the universities", but he would rather be hard on them than he "accused by the public of white-washing".

In summary, University of Quebec vice-president (research) Louis Berliquet said the AUCC must co-ordinate discussion on research between the universities, governments, and funding boards.

U of T undergraduate Paul Cadario said after the meeting that the conference was "valuable", but that it should have considered priorities in research.

He added that he was upset with the low number of student participants at the conference, only 31 of 290 delegates.

Debra Lewis, representing Victoria University, agreed with Cadario that the conference was worthwhile. She said she did not find the frivolity at the conference people had talked of in the past.

Varsity discipline straightened out

The Varsity's article on Wednesday's Internal Affairs Committee meeting inaccurately said that the committee "postponed" making a decision on establishing a university disciplinary structure until the principles involved had been considered.

Actually, this week's meeting was not slated to make a structure decision, and, in fact, the committee Wednesday set the structure decision as its first priority.

Douglas workers get election gift

Just two days after the federal election, Douglas Aircraft laid off 100 workers.

A series of lay-offs totalling 1800 was announced last summer, but very few were carried out until now.

In the past, Douglas has received substantial job-creating grants from the federal government.

One of the workers affected, when asked what his union could do about the layoffs, replied, "Not a fucking thing."

Staff meets to body talk paper

In response to repeated requests, the editor turned The Varsity building over Wednesday to a survey company sampling consumer response to different varieties of beer. He drunkenly explained the policy as one designed to give "more body" to The Varsity.

The l'Hebdo editor, on the other hand, says that the move will result in a "watered-down" paper. Other members of the staff had varying reactions, from those who said it would make for "smoother" reading, to those who said the paper was becoming "wishy-washy".

A staff meeting has been called for 1 pm Friday to discuss this, as well as other matters.

Voters addicted to post gazing

Today is the last day persons left off the preliminary voters list for the December 4 municipal election can be enumerated.

If you want to determine whether or not you have been enumerated, check the posted list of electors near your residence or call the city clerk at 367-7800.

Forms to get on the list are available until two pm today at the SAC office. SAC has guaranteed that signed forms will be taken to city hall on time.

U of T hides Panther in COE

Black Panther Bobby Seale one of the famed Chicago Eight, will not be permitted to speak at Convocation Hall Sunday for security reasons.

U of T campus co-ordinator Lois Reimer said last night that Seale must speak in the College of Education auditorium, about one quarter the size of Convocation Hall, because the hall was "too vulnerable a building."

The talk, a part of a two day anti-war conference, will take place Sunday at 11:30 am.

Educational equality myth dies

Government should reverse post-secondary policy

A recent Statistics Canada survey has given the lie to the provincial government's claim that increased tuition costs didn't adversely affect university enrolment.

More students from low income families than from the middle income range dropped out of university, the survey discovered.

Saddled with uncertainty about whether they'll be able to find a job — any job — after graduation, less affluent students have been unwilling to go further into debt to pay for a potentially useless degree.

And, they've not been alone. Students from all backgrounds told Statistics Canada that poor post-graduation job prospects and rising tuition costs persuaded them to drop out.

"A significant number" of those who dropped out said they failed to return because of lack of money, according to the survey.

The report's revelations shatter the liberal myth about "equality of educational opportunity" in Canada. Obviously, the people being shunted most by the government's penny-pinching are low income students.

Statistics Canada education division director Miles Wisenthal admitted to the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada that the survey proved educational equality is not a fact in Canada.

The provincial government should take note of the Statistics Canada findings when they consider the Ontario post-secondary students' demands for repeal of the $100 tuition hike and a return of the Ontario Student Award Program loan ceiling to its former, lower level.

That's what students from across the province will be demonstrating about when the legislature reconvenes November 21.

As University of Western Ontario president Carleton Williams said, the government should look for more equitable criteria for reducing enrolment if that's the purpose of the adverse changes in the financing of post-secondary education. They should stop hiding behind the excuse that the changes were made solely to have students pay a bit more of the cost of their education.

Government policies have decreased university enrolment.

By imposing a limit on the number of students populating the province's universities via the financing changes, the government has struck out most strongly at low income students and further reduced accessibility to post-secondary education. It limits on the number of post-secondary students are in fact necessary — and we are not yet ready to concede that point —, then eligibility to attend should not be determined by economic rank.

Social relevance should be key to research policy

The universities are getting scared that the governments are about to move in to regulate research more closely. And, they're out to do something to soothe troubled federal and provincial nerves to moderate this possibility.

That's the message behind the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada report on university research policy released earlier this week.

Governments have been sending out warning waves about dissatisfaction with university research policy for the past few years. These signals, inspired AUCC's year-long study

The appointment of Alistair Gillespie as the federal government's Minister of Science and Technology made things more politically acute. Gillespie had long advocated improving Canadian research and development, but in a way that would harness it to Canada's industrial development as the parent to Canadian multinational companies.

The universities don't particularly relish that prospect, not because they're doing socially relevant work that might be jeopardized by a change in government research funding policy, but because they're afraid the people from outside the ivory towers might not groove on some of their more academic explorations.

Researchers need freedom (spelled money) to do what they want in the way they choose, the report says. And, it acknowledges that governments have to be able to assure their constituents that tax money has been used for public benefit.

The governments' attitude is not to be sneezed at, as most research funds come from government agencies.

The universities' concern is, therefore, understandable. However, there is legitimate doubt about whether research priorities should be left as much as suggested up to the universities. After all, there's little more justification for useless, academic research than there is for subordinating intellectual endeavours to the demands of the industrial market.

Then, too there's the whole question of the role research does and should play in universities. The study concedes that teaching has suffered at the hands of research priorities. It suggests that universities should revise their promotion and salary policies to afford equal weighting to undergraduate teaching.

We'd go further. University research should be secondary to learning. Research's role comes into play when it complements the researcher's ability to contribute toward improving society and increases his or her value as a resource person.

Those criteria would rule out a lot of the research being done in our universities, including the high level of war work being done on Canadian campuses. For example, a recent study showed that of $831,415 McGill University received from the U.S. Pentagon from 1967 to 1971, more than $663,000 went for prime military research.

Closer government regulation wouldn't eliminate that type of grant. In fact, it would probably increase them. And, that's the type of research the public should insist universities get out of. Let's stop helping destroy lives and get into the business of making this world better for those of use who are still around to improve it.

Clarification and consolidation of university research is needed, as the report says, but it must be taken further than that. It's not enough to say universities are going to be more carefully scrutinizing their research policies.

If these projects are to really serve the people paying for the funding, the Canadian people, then all members of the university community — not just the researchers and administration — and the public must play a key role in setting the guidelines for the future.

Goodbye

Monumental film unsparingly examines Nazi occupation of French city in WW II

Je fais à la France le don de ma personne.

M. Pétain

Marshall Pétain, as head of the collaborationist Vichy regime, presents himself to France.

The Sorrow and the Pity is a documentary examining the German occupation of France from 1940 to 1944. Made by Marcel Ophüls for French television, the film was never shown; it was decreed that the people of France were not mature enough to see their war-myths shattered. On Wednesday, November 8, The Sorrow and the Pity will be shown on CBLT, Channel 5, from 7:30 pm until 12:06 am. If you don't have a television, start calling up friends who do, and invite yourself over.

Documentary is a misleading term: The Sorrow and the Pity is no narrative rehash of the period spliced together from wartime newsreels. Its preoccupation is with people, not with events. About twenty men and women are interviewed, adroitly yet searchingly, and the film keeps returning from newsclips, from the historical data, to these participants: Anthony Eden and Pierre Mandas-Frenca among the prominent, a socialist farmer, a wealthy ex-fascist, a women hair-dresser who had her head shaved by the resistance among the more obscure. They bring different, sometimes contradictory points of view to the events they recall and comment on. It is a revelation (and a caution) that the same events could fether such a diversity of recollections and interpretations.

This is an essay on history and what constitutes it, and it demands engagement; you can't just sit back and let it entertain you, the way you could enjoy "audio-visual" presentations of the war in high school, where there were spectacular but remote bombing raids for excitement and those ridiculous dictators duck-strutting around like veuveville toffs. Ophüls, though he has edited and arranged his material artfully, doesn't presume to gloss it for us. We judge the characters of the interviewed witnesses, noting their evasiveness, or eagerness, or spite, and we evaluate their avoidance in the light. It is an exhilarating intellectual task — perhaps a unique one. The film makes no concessions, no attempt to entertain (though there are delicious bits of unconscious and deliberate humour through it), no effort to tidy things up with easy, or easy-to-take, answers.

Four-and-one-half hours is a long time, even at home in an easy chair. So it might be in place to prepare you. How you're going to respond to this movie, of course, is going to depend on all sorts of things: Your interest in history, your capacity for mental exercise, your willingness to have preconceptions or ideologies challenged, even your ability to sit relatively still for so long. Nonetheless, you might have a better chance with the film if you have some guidelines.

The interviews are dubbed (particularly well) and the English is heard over the speakers' original language. At first this is disconcerting, and it takes a while for your ear to separate the sounds. (Once you become used to it, hearing the original inflections becomes a wonderful tool in judging the speaker). The cutting between interview and newsreel seems jumpy and bewildering at first; you haven't yet isolated the various characters or picked up the film's particular rhythm.

The best thing to do is not to approach this movie with a coward, wide-eyed attention, not to try to file each fact and opinion in its proper place. Just watch and listen for the first half-hour or so, and don't think too much about it. The film will begin to absorb you, and by the end of the first hour you should have everything sorted out, and your mind will be anticipating speakers, seizing each new datum. There are a few dull stretches, but once you're into it, the four-and-one-half hours go by faster than you would have imagined. Perhaps because it doesn't play down the difficulties, doesn't talk down to us, we don't find it tedious. It isn't all on the same intellectual we've-length, either. We hear the views of Nazi and Englishmen, of collaborationist and member of the underground, of poor, powerful and bourgeois; we hear nerve, fumble self-justifications and perspicuous, candid confessions. There are moments too of respite, fascinating ones, like a film of Hitler riding in a jeep through an early deserted Paris: past the opera, around the Arc de Triomphe, through the Place de la Concorde.

Clermont-Ferrand is a small industrial city in the middle of France. It is in the Auvergne, home of one of the largest and most intransigent resistance movements, and it is only 50 kilometers from Vichy, where on June 10, 1940, Marshal Petain ended the Third Republic by proclaiming his authoritarian regime. "I make France the gift of my person," he intones in the unctuously self-righteous speech of surrender; he had formed the only government in Europe which was to collaborate with Nazism.

"Times like this you get to know what people are really like" recalls an old schoolmaster in a beret, "how fear takes over, with very few exceptions." At this early stage, there was intimidation without the words or actions of intimidation; people imagined what might happen to them, and did nothing.

And how was the German presence felt? The owner of a hotel where the troops were billeted recalls that the Germans "went out of their way to be nice, giving their seats to old people and so forth. Helmut Teusend, a Wehrmacht officer stationed in Clermont-Ferrand, (and who still wears his Nazi war decorations on occasions like his daughter's wedding) says his troops arrived in the Auvergne to find the people bred as if for a barbarian invasion but, finding out they were nothing of the sort, came to accept them. Teusend is a gentle man, expensive with the wedding's wine and good-will; he seems unaware of how selectively his memory appears to work and the camera catches his told wife shooting apprehensive glances from the interviewer to her gerulous husband, and his son-in-law suppressing a smile at the inadequacy of his explanations.

Another German soldier, wearing lederhosen in a Bavarian beer-hall and looking scarcely older than he must have been in 1944, recalls being abused by the townspeople late in the war and how he couldn't understand this; he thinks the French should have treated him as they would treat their prisoners treated in Germany. But his face brightens as he recalls his French girlfriend to whom he considered escaping. Then, returning to his beer, he muses that Germany's defeat was probably for the best: "Who knows that even today we might be still doing occupation duty in America or Africa?" The vision of a world-wide Reich might have moved him as a young man, but he is happy in his beer-hall now.

Men who fought in the Resistance, of course, have different stories, stories in which the occupiers, to a man, are uncivilized and sadistic (though some are cheerfully blunt about their reasons; one man couldn't see why he had to do without meat and tobacco and chocolate when the Germans got all they wanted). Tales of atrocity, often second-or-third-hand, underscore their memories. "They told me..." begins a usual Gestepp yern, and we have our doubts about the reliability of such horrible stories, but the possibility that it might be true is too much for us. The most terrible moments in the movie are these bold statements, in carefully dispassionate voices, of tortures and executions. So specific and personal are they that they're immeasurably more powerful than the mountings of emaciated corpses we see in newsreels of Buchenwald, pictures so surreal that we find it hard to put them in a context of human behavior or responsibility.

If the resistance bore any semblance to a cohesive, dedicated movement, it is not apparent from the interviews in this film. Everyone speaks of his own reasons for opposing the Germans, and you can't link them together. Dennis Rake, an elderly, soft-spoken man, sits stroking a cat in his London apartment. During the war he was a spy, and was cited as one of the bravest men to have served. His questioner asks why he chose such a hazardous mission. "I really don't know" Rake answers, obviously startled by the question. "I suppose it was to prove that as a homosexual I could be as brave as other men."

"My wife is red and so am I" asserts a peasant farmer sitting around his dining-room table with brothers and nephews. (His wife, her chair placed resolutely in the door of the kitchen to show where she belongs, doesn't hesitate to correct her husband or shout out a comment.) In this one man we get a glimpse of a romantic, revolutionary rebellion against fascism. He talks with peppery good humour about the war, and you can tell his commitment was the most forthright and simple one imaginable: what right did the Germans have to tell me what to do on my own farm?

The film deals just as unsparingly with the powerful as with the obscure. The son-in-law of Pierre Laval (who was Petain's chief of state) struggles desperately to clear the man's name, looking stubborn but ashamed that the facts are ready: Laval's deportation of Jews to German concentration camps. Pierre Mendes-France, later president of the Fourth Republic, was tried for desertion and sentenced to six years hard labor; his crime, of course, was his Jewish blood, and his attorney recalls him stating to the court, "I am a Jew, I am a freemason, but I am not a deserter."

Mendes-France talks about anti-semitism, refusing to believe that it was an aberration, something that could not happen again. France, after all, is the country of Dreyfus, only the most notorious victim of a chain of anti-semitic acts that runs through French history. Cuts are shown from a Franco-German propaganda film "Le Juif Suss", a simple minded but somehow terrifyingly sentimental melodrama about a lecherous Jew who violates a Christian girl and is hanged. What is interesting about anti-semitism is that it is truly adaptable; what is anti-semitism is that it is truly adaptable; what is traded upon is not primarily social or economic offense, but a general assumption that Jews are swinish, sub-human. Perhaps this particular manifestation of racism is so durable because it is common (and valuable) currency to demagogues of left, right and centre.

Some of the most inspiring moments in the film come from the unlikely figure of Anthony Eden. When he first appears (speaking impeccably French) you think he is going to dish out the Allied propaganda line. But he speaks with intelligence and compassion of the events which he helped to set in motion, and it is a glorious moment of humility when, asked his opinion of the collaborationist premier, answer with sterling firmness that "it is not for an Englishman to judge Petain." It is only one of the dozens of flashes of insight we get into the speakers and, through them, into the occupation and the war. Only cinema could have caught the quick looks of surprise, the hesitations of nerves, the cadences of shame or erogenous or apology. Norman Meller once wrote that there is no history without nuance, and The Sorrow and The Pity corroborates this. It is in these nuances, unyieldable to the most rigorous and inclusive written histories, that make this film a great essay in history and a great work of art.

A film as unflinchingly honest and exhaustive as The Sorrow and the Pity is an ordeal. One's politics, whatever they are, are left in disarray. Ophuls does what is so seldom done (presumably because it is considered uncritical to do so): he ignores the causes of war, the philosophical debate about obligations to fight or resist, the rights and wrongs of European geopolitics. People who really don't much care, one way or the other, are caught up in the battles of sovereign states. They profit or suffer, or just endure, for reasons which have very little to do with the issues putatively at stake.

Most viewers of this movie, I suppose, will begin with the presumption that the collaborationists are either craven or fascist; that the resistance fighters are the heroes, (American and British wartime movies, from the explicitly propagandistic ones down to sheer romances like Casablanca have created our own myth of what happened in France; even if we realize that Hollywood trafficked in simplifications, we may not be aware with how tenuous and wavering a line the division was drawn between petainists and free French).

The case, or at least the excuses, for collaboration are scrutinized first. Quite decent folk, people with families, for instance, had perfectly sane reasons to cooperate with the Germans or at least to maintain a Swiss neutrality. A pharmacist, surrounded by his sons and daughters who must have been infants at the time, tells of riding along a country road late in the war and meeting a German whose motorbike had broken down.

The pharmacist, nominally pro-French but actually a scrupulously neutral, recalls thinking how easy it would be to kill this pathetic, fat old man. He could never be found out, so there was no risk, but it could be his claim to glory if France was liberated. He couldn't bring himself to do it, realizing that to kill this solitary, ridiculous figure could only demean himself. This is neutrality which rises above partisan passions, an apolitical act, if not of heroism, at least of virtue.

There were other, stubborn reasons for not fighting. Chlaf among them was the fierce loyalty to "La Mèrechal." So many people saw Petain as the saviour of France; whatever this man deemed best was best, his followers stoutly maintained to this day. (After all, as one leftist acerbically comments, he had made the country the gift of his person). We tend to marvel at the devotion this pompous, platitudinous man commanded, and forget that in Canada and Britain and the U.S. equally uninspiring statesmen find bedrock support among masses of citizens who see the very virtues of a nation incarnate in such men.

When we come to understand what led men to become collaborationists (though we remain uneasy about it: the reasons are just a little too good), the film's focus shifts to the "Free French."

The resistance, again, was a curious phenomenon. The people with the least stake in French society — students, radical leftist farmers, misfits — these were the bulwark of the movement. Such convenient lies as patriotism or valour certainly do not fit, and to lump the resistance together on under the routine banner of anti-fascism is too easy. Perhaps Peuline Keel is right in suggesting that there is something special about the nature of intrensigen, which puts it beyond the grasp of documentary; The Sorrow and the Pity, despite a valiant attempt, fails to explain the movement.

Even the value of the resistance movement comes to seem dubious. Would there have been less suffering and death had everyone quietly endured the occupation? Or would there have been other manifestations of French frustration, such as a redoubled frenzy of anti-semitism? We have the benefit of historical hindsight that allows us to approach these questions; Ophuls makes the point that our easily-acquired hindsight can blind us to the realities and dilemmas of those times.

When survivors of those years recount, in those quiet, steady voices, committed barbarities committed on both sides, we feel that nothing, no regime, no ideology could ever justify them. Just hearing these deeds makes us believe, if only for a few moments, that pacifism is the only sane way to live; we will excuse the most pusillanimous and vacillating of neutrals.

There is just too much in The Sorrow and the Pity to absorb — for one thing, it's just too massive and important to grasp, for another there is so much implicit in even the most peripheral detail. Certain turns of phrase, a shrug of indifference betray a cynicism, a knowledge of the realities of human motives so immense and undeluded that it threatens to undermine everything we have come to believe. We may not, ultimately, change our way of thinking, but we must certainly reckon with the witness this film brings to the history of those years.

Finally, there are two moments which I would like to record for those who might miss the movie. Pierre Mendes-France, in escaping from prison, scaled one of the high walls. He meant to jump down, but couldn't, because under the tree beneath him a boy and girl were arguing; he wanted her to come home with him, she was reluctant. After an eternity, she consented, and Mendes-France was able to jump to freedom. "I would like to meet that man now, if he is still alive," he muses, "and tell him how much I went through with him."

A middle aged man, who in 1940 was a member of a fascist group, sits in his opulent drawing-room and talks unsparingly of his views and how he came to change them. "There were many reasons why we young men turned to Fascism; as a rebellion against the conservatism of our parents."

Political concert entertains

OTTAWA — Monday evening's traditional all-Canadian rock concert on Parliament Hill, which attracted an unusually small crowd, generally reflected recent trends in Canadian music, as a number of styles were heard - hard rock, country rock and blues.

A small Quebec blues band, the Socreds, warmed up the crowd for the first half-hour. Their music was poor, but their lead singer, Real Caouette, proved an entertaining showman. He danced across the stage, waving to a small contingent of loyal fans who seem to follow him on all his tours.

Caouette's renditions of One Man Band and Don't Pass Me By prompted some sympathetic applause from the crowd, but his only real success was his "theme song, The Impossible Dream. The Socreds closed their part of the show with a recent composition that has some potential, Alone Again, and left the audience confused and relatively indifferent.

NDP, whose members hail from Ontario and the West, was the other supporting act of the evening. They played several well-known songs, including Promises, Promises and Easy To Be Hard.

David Lewis, on vocals, lacked the spark of Socreds' Caouette, but his selection of songs was more appealing to the crowd, and his musical backing, particularly Stanley Knowles' organ wizardry, more solid.

Performing mainly recent hits, Lewis draw a good response from the passive audience with the forceful lyrics of The Backstabbers and Money Back Guarantee. But the warmest applause was reserved for his closing piece, an excellent rendition of The Times They Are A-Changin', which struck just the right note.

Stompin' Bob: new rock idol?

By this time the crowd was finally coming alive, and their applauded and cheered loudly as Stompin' Bob Stanfield stepped onto the stage with his group, the Tories.

Right from the start, folk singer Stanfield please the crowd as he ran through the gamut of his hits — It Don't Come Easy, One More Chance and It Better End Soon.

This group was a far cry from the Tories of four years ago. The new members, Allan Lawrence on piano, Paul Heliyer on guitar and Claude Wagner on backup vocals have improved the Tories' dull style considerably. As a special gimmick, the band's veteran drummer, John Diefenbaker, who made Prairie blues famous fifteen years ago, sang a couple of old hits, I Am A Rock and Those Were The Days. These provoked a loyal cheer from the crowd.

But Stanfield remained on top of things, performing sentimental favourites such as Let It Be Me and All Things Must Pass, and introducing a new release with very appealing lyrics, Heaven On Their Minds: My mind is clearer now - at last all too well I can see where we all soon will be. If you atrip away the myth from the man You will see where we all soon will be.

The Tories' final piece, A Brand New Me, produced a standing ovation, and the rock fans remained on their feet to greet the star of the evening, P.E. Trudeau, accompanied by his large band, Red Grit.

Dressed in glittering silver, Trudeau bounced onto the stage to bellow his big-city rock - Superstar, Jumpin' Jack Flash, Everybody Loves Me, Baby.

Backed by the best musicians in the country, including drummer John Turner, pianist Don MacDonald and guitarist Gerry Pelletier, Trudeau was not to be denied the spotlight. But somehow his lyrics seemed superficial:

Try not to get worried, try not to turn on to Problems that upset you or don't you know Everything's alright yes everything's fine And we want you to sleep well tonight.

He never really regained the old magic of a few years ago in his familiar tunes - That's The Way God Plenned It and With A Little Help From My Friends.

Toward the end of the evening, the audience rose again at the sound of a spirited medley featuring Come Together and Go All The Way, and Trudeau closed the show with his 1968 chart-buster, Mon Pays. Marty O'Connell and others had some trouble on back-up lyrics, and the new version of Mon Pays lacked something, but Trudeau and his group still received an enthusiastic standing ovation as they left the stage.

One thing that this concert proved is that the new direction in the Canadian music scene is definitely away from Trudeau's hard rock, and leaning more toward Stompin' Bob's soft or country rock.

Although the musicians were not all at their best, the technical crew did their job very well, and Lucien Lamoureux once again proved to be a very capable MC. A particularly interesting innovation was playing recorded music at the end of the show, to cool down the excited crowd. The recording featured American rock star Dick Nixon's new album, This Land Is My Land.

What rough beast slouches to Ottawa?

Things fall apart, the centre cannot hold Mere Stanfield is loosed upon the world

Kicking his way through the broken sprockets and fly-wheels of the Liberal machine, Energy Minister Donald Macdonald, a man likely to be assigned to try to put it all together again, proclaimed the dreaded "backlash." It was "... a Tory redneck attack on Quebec," said Mr. Macdonald. "It was an attack on the Government's bilingualism policy, even though it didn't concern most of Ontario."

Macdonald, the dispenser of favours and collector of dues for the federal Liberals in Ontario, had just spent a humiliating evening in his Toronto Rosedale constituency fighting off somebody named Beamish. He warned to his subject: "Immigration was also an issue. They [the voters] were against immigration, French Canada and better social justice ... that seems to be the mood in Ontario and it's a pretty ugly mood."

Similar thoughts sprang from the lips of other Liberals. Gérard Pelletier, for example, put the Liberal defeat down to greed — the rich provinces got tired of sending money to the poor ones. Thus we are to believe that the election was a classic confrontation between niceness and charity, and nastiness and greed. The bad guys won.

It is a neat theory, and it partly explains what happened. Robert Stanfield, cast in the mould of earnest incompetence, did provide shade for the weirdest assortment of people — from the Nazi-minded KUPIAK running in Toronto's Lakeshore (he proclaimed that his victory would embarrass Brezhnev more than both Bobby Fischer and Team Canada — fortunately we were all spared) — to the blimpish Lt.-Col. (Ret.) Strome Galloway (big on discipline up there in Ottawa-Carleton).

It was not only the strange cast the Conservative party chose, but the lines it gave them to speak, including the platitudes of the leader himself, that lend credence to Macdonald's charges.

The election in English Canada was fought by the Tories in a manner calculated to pander to latent racism. Peter Reilly, the successful Conservative candidate in Ottawa West, sensed it early in the campaign. "There is a good deal of racism being given new life in this area," he said. "It masquerades as being concern for public servants." Reilly went on to say that racism "will not be tolerated in my campaign." He then campaigned against the federal government's policy of bilingualism; the following passage appears in an article by Clair Balfour in the Toronto Globe and Mail:

"But he [Reilly] repeated that merit should be the sole criterion for success in a public service career, regardless of language.

"He added the problem is so serious that the only solution may be to slow the program to be fair to public servants.

"That form of fairness to the English-speaking means being unfair to French-speaking Canadians, he was reminded. He shot back: 'I've never believed you rectify one injustice by perpetrating a second one.'"

Bertino, Le Devoir

Bilingualism and biculturalism and the federalism represented by Trudeau were inventions of English Canada to stifle separatism in Quebec without dealing with the issue. What happens now, when even the empty gesture is withdrawn?

Trudeau's broken dream

Prime Minister Trudeau didn't fare too well at a Chicoutimi rally only three days before the election. A bunch of hostile students greeted him with the slogan "Le Québec aux Québécois" to which he replied "Le Canada aux Québécois," thus confirming the fears of those who were concerned that the prime minister was engaging in "outright French Canadianism," to borrow a phrase from Douglas Alkenbrack, Tory MP for the eastern-Ontario riding of Frontenac-Lennox and Addington — heavy Loyalist sentiment there.

Whether Trudeau knew it or not, part of his 1968 mandate came from English Canadians who were fed up with the antics of disgruntled Québécois and felt that at last here was a man to put them in their place. After all, he was pretty tough on separatism, and he could be tough with the separatists in their own language, no mean feat. Besides, what harm could a few Frenchmen do in Ottawa?

Trudeau has been tough on separatism — he delivered a double whammy to some 497 law-abiding opponents of the regime in October 1970. He has also engaged in the tactic of sweet reason. (His reason may not have been sound, but it was sweet.) By allowing French-speaking Canadians to communicate with and work in the federal civil service in his father-tongue (his mother is English-speaking), what Trudeau regarded as the frustration which gave rise to Quebec nationalism could largely be siphoned off, or so he reasoned.

Trudeau seems to have lost on two counts in his efforts to bilingualize the civil service. On the one hand, he misinterpreted the recommendations of the B&B Commission to read that all civil servants should be bilingual: by jeopardizing the advancement of those who could not speak French and by thrusting language courses upon thousands of unwilling subjects, he alienated a substantial number of Ottawa's deeply-ingrained English-speaking civil servants (the Liberals lost two Ottawa-area seats to the Tories).

On the other hand, his policy has failed to produce substantial positive results. A report leaked to the nationalist Montreal daily Le Devoir (and picked up by the Toronto Star — strange ally — and other English-language papers across the country) shows that the proportion of French-speaking people holding high posts in the federal civil service has not increased appreciably since Trudeau came into power.

The report says that 71 per cent of those hired to fill such posts are unilingual English Canadians, that only 5.2 per cent of civil servants in Ottawa are in French-language units (1.1 per cent if you exclude language services such as the overburdened translation bureau), that only 8.1 per cent of those who take language courses follow them far enough to obtain proficiency in French (it costs $29,000 to make an English-speaking civil servant bilingual), and that there are no French-language units in the prime minister's own department.

The federal civil service recruitment office in Quebec City, which has by far the largest number of qualified and experienced French-speaking civil servants of any Canadian city, was closed as part of Trudeau's 1969 austerity drive. The 1975 target date for full bilingualism in the civil service cannot possibly be met.

Yet there prevails among English Canadians the sentiment that somehow Trudeau is turning Canada into a French country in which English-speaking citizens are gradually losing their rights, and that the Quebec ministers in the federal government are sub-Canadians.

Late in the campaign Robert Stanfield admonished two of his candidates for using advertisements that had racist overtones. An ad for a Tory candidate in Thunder Bay read, "John Erickson knows that we need a Canadian

Cartoons by Aislinn. The Gazette

A gift for René Lévesque

The cartoon in La Presse summed up what the French newspapers and radio hot lines were saying the day after the deluge. Pierre Trudeau and three Quebec ministers — Jean Marchand, Gérard Pelletier and Jean-Luc Pepin — are depicted in a lifeboat, looking melancholy and wearing life jackets. The name of the boat is "French Power." And the tiller man is saying Tout l'monde débarque.

The 32-year-old executive assistant to another Quebec minister had trouble disguising his tears as the final results from the west rolled in. "The bastards," he spat out, "the bastards gave it to Lévesque on a silver platter. We sell Quebecers on the idea that French Canadians can participate in federalism and play an equal role in running the country. And just when it's starting to work, English Canada kicks us in the teeth."

"It's a victory for wealth and bigotry," added a Liberal backbencher from a Montreal working-class riding. "And never mind the Tories or the NDP. A lot of the Liberals who went down in Ontario and the West will blame their defeat on nothing but the backlash to French power. It's obviously a victory for Lévesque and what he's been saying. I almost hope Trudeau lets Stanfield form a government. I think we would be very interesting in opposition, especially since the only French cabinet minister the Tories would have would be that pig Wagner."

Quebec independentists were gleeful with the results, calling the Conservative showing a "triomphe orangiste," and a crushing blow for Trudeau's brand of bicultural federalism. "This shows us that Canada will never accept a strong French presence in government and the Ottawa bureaucracy," said Camille Laurin, Parti Québécois leader in the National Assembly. "The only conclusion Québécois can draw from this is simple. The only government we can ever call our own has to be located in Quebec City and not Ottawa."

Laurin's view was reinforced as he stepped into a taxi the morning after the election. "Hey" said the driver, "they told us they don't want us in Ottawa, eh, M. Laurin. I guess we'll have to go with you guys." This attitude was shared overwhelmingly by independentists of all stripes in Quebec.

Péquistes noted that not only was over half the Liberal representation in Quebec, but that many elected outside the province were from French areas, like the five Acadian constituencies in New Brunswick, parts of Ontario and St. Boniface in Manitoba. Only one candidate in Quebec was endorsed by René Lévesque and that was Roch LaSalle, an independent who defected from the Conservatives. Lévesque even did some campaigning for LaSalle in Joliette. In 1968 the nationalist MP was elected by a margin of 172 votes as a Conservative. This time he won by 5,000.

The feeling is that the results underscore Quebec's isolation from the rest of Canada and will provide an enormous amount of fodder for the PQ propaganda machine. "We're going to say, 'you tried Trudeau's road to Ottawa and it's a dead end'" explains one PQ strategist. "The only road left is the road to independence."

The Péquiste explained that the party is gearing for an influx of disappointed and disenchanted federalists. "This federal election has turned out to be the greatest recruitment program we could have imagined."

Left-wing unionists are somewhat fearful that an influx of disillusioned federal Liberals will further prevent the PQ from becoming a party of the left.

As for the Conservatives, they were all but demolished in Quebec, losing almost 10 percentage points of their popular vote, mostly to the Crédiistes. Claude Wagner, whose popular appeal was supposed to have built a solid Conservative base in the province, barely scraped in in St. Hyacinthe, winning by some 700 votes. The rest of the Tories' Quebec caucus is composed of Heward Grafftey, who is not on speaking terms with Wagner; in fact, they loathe each other. Grafftey managed to get elected by the simple expedient of never mentioning either Stanfield or Wagner in his speeches or his campaign literature.

The Conservatives had trouble making third place in most Montreal ridings, usually losing out to Crédiistes and NDPers. The Liberal vote was so all-encompassing in the 30 Montreal area seats that a grand total of only two opposition candidates managed to save their deposits.

However, voter turnout, especially in the Péquiste strongholds in the east-end working-class areas was very poor. In some areas it was not even 40 per cent.

Cabinet and a Prime Minister that will represent all Canadians." Jack Horner, re-elected with a huge majority in the Alberta riding of Crowfoot, advertised against overexpenditure of federal money in Quebec.

In most parts of the country though, anti-Quebec feeling was not expressed quite so explicitly. British Columbians regard French as a foreign language, making the Ottawa government seem all the more distant and alleviating the need for any explicit reference to the "French issue." The same is true, to a large extent, for other parts of the country.

Trudeau's most spectacular move during his time in office was undoubtedly his invocation of the War Measures Act in the absence of war or insurrection. He told a Regina audience sarcastically that the opposition would also have taken a stand against the FLQ, but "somehow the War Measures Act would have been different. It would have been gentler." Liberal minister Otto Lang told a Saskatoon rally that Trudeau had shown himself to be "strong in that he would not be bullied or blackmailed."

But one of the big surprises of the campaign was that Trudeau did not play this up any more than he did. Had he done so, he would likely have lost far less of the anti-Quebec vote.

Trudeau's Quebec policy has been two-pronged, bilingualism on the one hand and the War Measures Act on the other. He could have run on the WMA part, but he didn't; he didn't run the anti-Quebec campaign many had expected. Defending bilingualism became a bit difficult after that report was leaked, but he stuck to it.

Trudeau was supported in 1968 as a good Frenchman, a credit to his race, so to speak. Now people aren't so satisfied he's such a credit.

Of course, the racism implicit in the campaign against the "privileged position of the French" was not all. There was the cooked-up scandal over immigration: was Canada's purity being undermined by uncontrolled immigration policies? And the Canadian people were also told that they were victimized by the unemployed.

In the Toronto riding of Scarborough East, the elected Conservative was doused with champagne while he sliced into his victory cake. People are fed up with the welfare state, he told his cheering supporters. One of his chief campaigners, an Ontario cabinet minister, gushed that "mothers were concerned about the direction youth was taking with government handouts."

Meanwhile, the defeated candidate, Labour Minister Martin O'Connell, blamed his defeat on an "irritable, grouchy" electorate. "The underlying issue," he said "may well have been that middle income people were not prepared to accept any more of the burden of the just ... or more equal society."

The mean, miserable and reactionary campaign that the Tories waged seemed to merge with the bitchy mood abroad in the land. But then who created the national grouch? Things really haven't been working out right in Canada for a number of years.

An honoured place in the body of Canadian political mythology is occupied by something called "traditional voting patterns." These patterns are supposed to recur, comet-like, at regular intervals, coinciding with general elections. Their one function in life is to "reassert themselves."

The problem with the concept is that there are almost no voting patterns in this country that have remained "Everybody off!"

BELAND HONDERICH'S ADVICE

On foreign ownership, the Conservatives say in a policy statement they would require that Canadians be allowed to participate in the ownership and management of foreign controlled firms.

But Stanfield has said little about this program or how it would be accomplished and, in fact, has made statements recently which suggest he would do little or nothing about foreign ownership. He apparently is not prepared to establish a screening board and without a review board his policy on foreign ownership is not credible.

The easy way for a newspaper, as for a citizen, would be not to support any party in this election. But this is not a responsible course for a citizen in a democratic society — or for a newspaper that believes it has a responsibility to provide comment and opinion on the issues of the day.

We have concluded, therefore, that on the basis of the two issues that concern us most — unemployment and Canadian independence — we must withdraw our support from the Liberals . . . Of the alternatives, both of which are unattractive, we prefer the Conservatives.

— Beland H. Honderich, Toronto Star

stable for long enough that they could be called "traditional." British Columbia, for instance, will return pluralities of Liberals, Conservatives or New Democrats, depending on its mood.

Ontario oscillates back and forth between the Liberals and the Tories. Newfoundland, once solidly Liberal, then became solidly Conservative, and now isn't solid at all.

The only pattern that seems to be stable is a continuing instability. Five of the last seven elections have produced minority governments, and three of them have been totally inconclusive. Only twice in the last 15 years has there been a countrywide trend of any kind, and only once has there been a genuine sweep. John Diefenbaker, in 1958, took a majority of the seats in every province except Newfoundland. He won two thirds of the seats in previously Liberal Quebec. He shut the Liberals out in all except four provinces.

Pierre Elliott Trudeau's election in 1968 was a majority of a different order. The Liberals took fifty seats fewer than the Conservatives had ten years earlier. Large parts of the country resisted Trudeau's appeal.

Newfoundland, bucking the tide again, voted Conservative out of dissatisfaction with the provincial Liberal regime. In the Maritimes it was Robert Stanfield's coattails, not Trudeau's, that were the decisive factor. The prairies were still Diefenbaker country, and a large proportion of the people who drifted away from the Conservatives went NDP rather than Liberal. To the extent that there was a sweep, it was concentrated in the three large provinces of Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia.

And yet, in the context of 1968, the Trudeau victory was a landslide. The country had had minority governments for the previous six years, and the happy political certainty of the Louis St-Laurent era was evidently a thing of the past. With Quebec crawling with separatists, the west mad at the east, and campus-based radicalism at its height across the country, a majority of any sort was not to be sneezed at.

The man who achieved it had unquestionably struck a popular chord. He would put us on the map, keep the country together, give us some élan. It was 1968, the year after Expo and the centennial, and in the Canada that elected Pierre Elliott Trudeau, all things were possible.

There were two overriding promises in Trudeau's 1968 campaign, one of them explicit, and the other implicit. The implicit promise was to do something about Quebec; the explicit one was to do something about regional economic disparities. "If the underdevelopment of the Atlantic provinces," Trudeau said during the campaign, "is not corrected — not by charity or subsidies but by helping them become areas of economic growth — then the unity of the country is almost as surely destroyed as it would be by the French-English confrontation."

The Quebec policy was not the only one to have problems; the regional development policy ran into snags too. The first snag was the Liberals' sorry weakness in the Atlantic provinces, and the improbability of winning any more seats in that region so long as Robert Stanfield was leader of the Conservatives; it made the electoral motivation to show results in the area somewhat

CLAUDE RYAN'S ADVICE

In the last four years, the image that we had of the Conservative party has given way to a different one. Mr. Stanfield remains the worthy man we thought we had discovered in 1968. However, as one goes west, the team that surrounds him includes a high proportion of people who have a conception of Canadian unity even more rigid than that of Mr. Trudeau. Mr. Stanfield has shown that he is open on the question of bilingualism; nevertheless, the fiercest opposition to this measure, which is only the beginning of a real solution, has come from his group. On the more difficult question of relations between Quebec and the rest of Canada, Mr. Stanfield has unceasingly reproached Mr. Trudeau for his rigidity. Each time he has been pressed to say what he would do himself, he has generally repeated in different terms the position defined by Mr. Trudeau . . .

Where the quality of its candidates warrants it, electors wishing to cast an independent vote Monday should support the NDP.

— Claude Ryan, Montreal Le Devoir

less urgent than it might have been.

Quebec, on the other hand, was not only a centre of Liberal strength; it was an area of the country that tended to act up, and there were distinct political advantages to keeping it quiet. More than had been expected of the industrial incentive grants handed out by Trudeau's new department of regional economic expansion went to Quebec, with correspondingly less for the Atlantic provinces. More important, the grants program showed little sign of being of much value anywhere, if we ignore for the moment its value to plant-owners.

By 1971, the government's regional development policy was coming under heavy criticism, notably from the areas it was supposed to be developing. It was criticism of the way the government was proceeding, and not of

The bored leading the bored

It is one of the more distasteful aspects of our parliamentary democracy that general elections afford the national press the occasion to display by far its shoddiest wares.

Usually, it does little harm to be intermittently reminded of the moribund state of political writing in this country, which can be laid at the doorstep of incompetence, the generally inferior character of the public education system, and the fact that newspapers are, after all, owned by the same class that operate used car lots, erect tenements, and appear at weekly Chamber of Commerce gatherings.

A country that has made Charles Lynch the highest-paid reporter, and Peter Newman the most respected political analyst, has much to answer for.

It is people like these, it must be remembered, that brought us Trudeaumania, the Gerda Munsinger affair and intermittent reports of Soviet infiltration, and skilfully guided a troubled nation through the dark nights of the War Measures Act with restraint, fortitude and keen perspicacity.

Rarely, however, has such spontaneous consensus emerged from the Ottawa Press Gallery's Tower of Babel, as during the months of September and October immediately past. A deeply thought-out set of alternatives were outlined for a people who after all, needed to have the problems defined for them:

Check one.

Pierre Elliott Trudeau is:

- arrogant
- cloistered in an ivory tower
- unconcerned
- a man who never had to work for a living
- a crypto-socialist.

Robert Stanfield is uncharismatic but:

- honest
- diligent
- solid

— a man who deserves a chance.

The government is full of:

- technocrats
- bureaucrats
- autocrats
- hippies
- Frenchmen.

The country is:

- disillusioned
- weary
- searching
- angry.

Mr. Trudeau has many faults, but one of them is not his contempt for the press.

The press believes — and perhaps it has a point — that it made Pierre Elliott Trudeau. And the press has been scorned. Hence it has the right to unmake Pierre Elliott Trudeau. This is, if not acceptable, at least inevitable. The national press, however, went beyond.

"I know that one way to get a story onto the front page this time is to make my lead somebody saying there are no issues in this election," a Toronto reporter lamented last month.

And the word spread. From the first week of the election, the editorialists — all failed grammar school teachers — proclaimed this is a dull election, an election with no issues save what Mr. Lewis was raising, an election with no meat in it.

In 1968, Pierre Elliott Trudeau was bragging that he conducted an election campaign making "no promises." That is code for "no issues."

But 1972 had more issues than the last three federal elections combined. Housing policy, pipelines, regional disparity policy, the tax system, welfare, immigration policy, Quebec, dying farms, wheat prices, fisheries policy, industrial development policy, local initiatives policy, youth policy, northern development, language policy, civil service, unemployment, food prices, wage-price controls, strikes, pensions . . .

The press, however, was bored.

More than that, the press did two things: it consciously and systematically avoided serious coverage reflecting the debate over these issues, so as to give the public the impression that nothing of any substance was being debated; and it decided on its own what the real issues were.

Of course, traditional lip-service was paid to unemployment and inflation as the key issues. That being despatched, the Toronto papers decided that the awkward influx of Caribbeans, and the excessive spending on unemployment insurance cheques, were the issues that the government was ignoring. The Toronto Star boldly declared on its front page that the unemployment insurance situation was such a scandal that it was the main issue in the election.

Few Canadians are really aware of the domination of the Toronto press over what they will read in Saskatchewan papers or see on Newfoundland television stations. Because much of the Ottawa "commentator corps" is employed or syndicated by the Toronto media, and because Canadian Press carries lightly rewritten stories from the Toronto papers on its service a great deal of the time, the power of the Toronto clique is amplified through CP, and Broadcast News, the CP service which forms the basis of most private radio and TV newscasts.

Tied to the Toronto clique of the Toronto Star, the Globe and Maclean's, is the Ottawa clique of Southam, FP and CBC, which boast such hearties as Charles Lynch, and Ron "No-Problem" Collister.

It is the task of these men, knit even more tightly by being on the campaign trail together during election time, to tell us when to be bored, and when to be angry.

Sensing their true calling, they achieved the former magnificently.

the concept of a regional development policy, but it was criticism nevertheless and Jean Marchand, the minister responsible for the program, didn't like it.

By mid-1972 one of Marchand's most effective critics, the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, had toned down, fearing its attacks might help kill the scheme entirely. But there was another phenomenon to reckon with: several corporations shut down their Ontario plants and moved to the Maritimes, to escape high wages and troublesome unions — and collect a government regional development grant. That didn't help the government much with the difficult task of selling its plan in Ontario. It was the two rich provinces of Ontario and British Columbia that were to cost Trudeau his majority.

The regional development program, and the Trudeau government in general, also had the misfortune to be around at a time when the economic boom of the sixties was coming to an end. Liberal governments, prepared to use only a limited range of measures, can have only a partial effect on the state of the economy in the best of circumstances. In Canada, tied to the United States so that its economy is at least as sensitive to changes in American policy as it is to anything Ottawa does, the government is almost totally at the whim of circumstances beyond its control.

Still, what the Trudeau government actually did only aggravated the situation. It perceived inflation as the principal problem, and in order to fight it took measures to slow down the economy, with the inevitable consequence of increased unemployment.

The result, after three years of the policy, was high inflation and unemployment. The United States, without the benefit of Trudeconomics, had roughly the same thing, but voters have always held their governments responsible for the state of the economy and Trudeau's burden was a heavy one.

As it became clear that the presence of Pierre Elliott Trudeau in the Prime Minister's Office would not lead to miracles, the perception of him as a man changed too.

The streak of arrogance and aloofness in his personality that had been overlooked in 1968 was noticed with increasing frequency. He was the man who asked western farmers why he should sell their wheat, who said opposition MPs were nobodies a hundred yards from the House of Commons, who told the Lapalme Guys to eat shit and Newfoundland Conservative MPs Jim McGrath and John Ludrigan to fuck off.

The piddling questions

His four years were running out. He wanted to wait until the economic situation improved before calling an election, but the economic situation didn't improve. He tried to patch things up with business, usually Liberal but now reported looking longingly toward the Conservatives.

Finance Minister Benson had displeased business with his talk of tax reform (which didn't amount to much when it finally assumed the form of legislation): he was replaced. Labour Minister Mackasey had displeased business with his reform of the labour code: he was replaced. Corporate Affairs Minister Basford had displeased business with his competition act: he, too, was replaced. A May budget included substantial tax concessions for business; the long-awaited foreign-ownership policy turned out to have all the power of a popgun.

First the election was going to be in April, then in June; Trudeau played on the developing anticipation, but always chickened out before it was too late. There was still little sign that defections from the Liberals would be massive (perhaps only because of the weakness of the opposition), but the 1972 election would clearly not be another 1968. When Trudeau finally bit the bullet as August turned into September he did not walk, in the immortal words of Peter C. Newman, "into the future, burdened with hope." He was scared to death.

He put on a brave front, told Peter Desbarats of the Toronto Star that he hoped people would listen to him this time, presumably not just adore him. He also mentioned that he saw the election as "a catharsis, as a bath of fire in which you're purified, and you settle all the piddling questions of whether this little thing was right or wrong."

And so he went among the masses. "The Land Is Strong," he sloganized. He said that "the onslaught of dissatisfaction and disbelief that Canada could even stay together four years ago has been dissipated." He said that "Canada now weighs in the world with the full weight of its potentialities." In Summerside, PEI, he asked for a mandate to continue the "social journey." In Vancouver, B.C., he told a man pestering him about Vietnam to "fuck off." Trudeau went from coast to coast speaking to Canadians, but always the "piddling questions" came up.

Throughout the campaign, Statistics Canada kept issuing reports citing the jobless increase and the increase in the cost of living. The so-called battle against inflation had been lost although more than seven per cent of the work force were thrown into the breach. As prices rose, Trudeau expressed his joy that the farmer was getting a better price — he wasn't, but that was just another piddling question.

There was a continuing shortage of jobs, but that was because there were too many kids born after the war. Regional disparity grew, but then that was yet another piddling question. And so the Trudeau procession rolled along.

With the exception of David Lewis, who took a leaf from George McGovern's campaign book and launched out at "corporate welfare bums" and other things that go bump in the night during the later stages of People's Capitalism, the campaign seemed to be programmed well enough.

Yet things began to go wrong. Trudeau seemed (at least to the Toronto Globe and Mail) to swagger, and if the Canadian people didn't want a prime minister who swaggered then Trudeau had had it. Simple.

And Trudeau was vulnerable. He was locked into a set of policies which were centred on his brand of federalism, and the centre was not holding. Time was growing short.

A bitter Bryce Mackasey, with an obvious allusion to his Ontario cabinet colleagues, blamed the Liberal loss on a lack of courage to defend government policies. But what was there to defend? The essential attack on the government came from the right, while it was itself moving toward the right.

Thus the problem is not so much that Trudeau deserved to be defeated and in fact was, the problem is how, why and by whom. True enough, the Liberals deserved everything they got. But in the debacle we seem to have gotten Stanfield. And what did we do to deserve that?

RAY GUY'S ADVICE

The best vote in this election is no vote at all. No matter how you look at it.

They might, if they see there's no votes coming in from Newfoundland, get excited and send us down bigger parcels of money.

Better still, they might go about their business and leave us alone.

For what little entertainment we get out of this election none of these birds deserves a vote. That's the only thing you get out of elections in the long run — a few laughs while these nut cases are dashing about cutting each other's throats.

You may feel it's worth the effort just to get at least seven of these jokers out of Newfoundland and settled away in a nice house in Ottawa.

But they won't guarantee us they'll stay away. Chances are that in a few years' time they'll be back here inflicting themselves on us again.

Don't vote — it only encourages them.

Canadian sexual mores pilloried in Fruet's film

It seems fashionable now, and has been for the past few years, to accept that sexual morality has changed, that we are much more "liberated" about dealing with our bodies — the new morality. But somehow it doesn't ring true.

For all our so-called sexual liberation we still hold many of the repressive "old" mores. Like our parents, who made sex sacrilegious and dirty, we too are often too afraid to discuss sexuality openly. "Liberation", for some women, has come to mean chalking up a drunken rape to seduction — "it was my own fault"; for some men it means taking for granted the woman is using birth control, so sexual exploitation has no obligation.

So where is the change?

Wedding in White, at the International Cinema, is a film about the so-called "old morality". Set in the forties in Canada, it has many things to say about North American sexuality today.

The Dougell family is a poor white working class family struggling to make ends meet during the Second World War. The film deals primarily with this family trying to handle that oh-so-contradictory morality: sex is dirty, but it's great for the man.

The women suffer silently.

And Janny (Carol Kane) the daughter, suffers the most from this contradiction and confusion. A self-consciously plain and naive girl of sixteen, she is caught up in the romance and glamour of movie stars — a sharp contrast to her own existence.

She constantly compares herself with her "worldly" and well-lipsticked girlfriend, Dolly, (Doris Patricia) always coming out the inferior. Insecure and lonely, she is a prima target for any men with the right words.

When her brother brings home an army buddy, Bill (Doug McGreth), on leave, she is all too eager to believe his advances are sincere. "I think he likes me," she tells Dolly in her constant competition to out-do her girlfriend.

She learns, soon enough, his real intentions, when he rapes her on her own parlor couch. And the ensuing pregnancy leads into the pitiful plan to bury "the shame and disgrace she has brought upon this house and family" in a marriage to her father's old World War I drinking buddy, Sandy Clay Phillips.

The story is set in wartime, a time when men are actively trying to prove their masculinity at every turn — and there are plenty of opportunities.

Of course there is the war. Dad Dougall reminisces constantly with his old war buddies at the legion hall about first world war experiences — reliving every precious moment when they were glorious and honorable and, perhaps, had some work, if only as cannon fodder, defending "the Empire". And since it is wartime again, the greatest pride to the Dougells is their son in the army — even though he hasn't been sent overseas, yet.

But, as in any war, and any time when people aren't allowed to live and work and relate normally sex becomes a compulsion rather than an expression.

It is ironic that the story of Janny's pregnancy is an exact rerun of her own mother's position during the former war. "But at least I married you," Mr. Dougell protests to his wife.

This perceptiveness in the film implies that these two women are not exceptions, that this story happens often to other women — even today, with the so-called "new morality" which pressures women in subtler forms of rape and man into more complex masculinity tests.

The film illustrates how the family (the Dougalls) only serves to reinforce this repressed sexuality on all its members, not only the children.

The mother recalls how she "was taken before the wedding" — and not exactly willingly. Her husband can only reply, "I don't remember it that way."

The daughter-victim is accused of being the perpetrator of her own downfall, called a slut and tramp by a furious father who attempts to beat her for her victimization — he can't believe that a "soldier — a man of honour" could be the one to blame.

But this dual morality that seems to serve men, is not gratifying for them either. Dougell's long time WWI buddy, Sandy, drowns his regrets about never marrying and having a family in innumerable beers and drunken stupors. And Dougell is more than eager to be his drinking mate. Drunk, they can forget the alienation of the present and live in the WWI romance of "Mademoiselle from Armentiers."

Strongly enough, in some of the most poignant and pitifully sad scenes of the film, the audience broke into (nervous) laughter. The concepts of potency, masculinity and repressed sexuality exist today for many people much as they did in the '40's and perhaps it touched a few people too close for comfort.

After all, the whole portrayal is very real. The acting is superb. The roles are very demanding, but the players seem like nature's. Like many recent films (The Last Picture Show, Mon Oncle, Antoine), the actors are not glamorous or even particularly attractive — they are real people.

Special praise must be given to Donald Pleasence, who to me, has always been a "what's-his-name-I've-seen-him-somewhere" actor. He exemplifies the sadness and alienation of a man whose only identity is in the past.

The other outstanding quality in the film is Richard Laiter's photography. An NFB veteran, and photographer of Gain' Down the Road, he captures visually the dramatic mood set by the screenplay and actors. Just prior to the rape scene, as Billy approaches Janny lying on the couch in the half-light of the parlor, his shadow creeps over her body, eventually covering her. These techniques, plus Laiter's skillful angle shots contribute to the general intensity of this sed and passionate film.

The politics of female orgasm

Tiresias, who had been both man and woman, was asked, as Ovid's legend goes, to mediate a dispute between Jove and Juno as to which sex got more pleasure from love-making. Tiresias unhesitatingly answered that women did. Yet in the intervening 2,000 years between Ovid's time and our own, a mythology has been built up which not only holds the opposite to be true, but has made this belief an unswerving ideology dictating the quality of relations between the sexes.

Women's sexuality, defined by men to benefit men, has been downgraded and perverted, repressed and channeled, denied and abused until women themselves, thoroughly convinced of their sexual inferiority to men, would probably be dumfounded to learn that there is scientific proof that Tiresias was indeed right.

The myth was codified by Freud, as much as by anyone else. In Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality, Freud formulated his basic ideas concerning feminine sexuality: for little girls, the leading erogenous zone in their bodies is the clitoris; in order for the transition to womanhood to be successful, the clitoris must abandon its sexual primacy to the vagina; women in whom this transition has not been complete remain clitorially-oriented, or "sexually anesthetic," and "psychosexually immature."

"The fact that women change their leading erotogenic zone in this way (Freud wrote) together with the wave of repression at puberty, which, as it were, puts aside their childish masculinity, are the chief determinants of the greater proneness of women to neurosis and especially to hysteria. These determinants, therefore, are intimately related to the essence of femininity."

In the context of Freud's total psychoanalytic view of women — that they are not whole human beings, but mutilated meles who long all their lives for a penis and must struggle to reconcile themselves to its lack — the requirement of a transfer of erotic sensation from clitoris to vagina became a prime fecle case for their inevitable sexual (and moral) inferiority. In Freud's logic, those who struggle to become what they are not must be inferior to that to which they aspire.

Freud wrote that he could not "escape the notion (though I hesitate to give it expression) that for women the level of what is ethically normal is different from what it is in men..." "We must not allow ourselves to be deflected from such conclusions by the denials of the feminists, who are anxious to force us to regard the two sexes as completely equal in position and worth."

Freud himself admitted near the end of his life that his knowledge of women was inadequate. "If you want to know more about femininity, you must interrogate your own experience, or turn to the poets, or wait until science can give you more information," he said; he also expressed the hope that the female psychoanalysts who followed him would be able to find out more. But, the post-Freudians adhered rigidly to the doctrine of the master, and, as in most of his work, what Freud hoped would be taken as a thesis for future study became instead a kind of canon law.

While the neo-Freudians heggled over the correct reading of the Freudian bible, watered-down Freudianism was wending its way into the cultural mythology via Broadway plays, novelists, popular magazines, social scientists, marriage counselors, and experts of various kinds who found it useful in projecting desired images of women.

The superiority of the vaginal orgasm was particularly useful as a theory, since it provided a convenient basis for categorization: clitoral women were deemed immature, neurotic, bitchy, and masculine; women who had vaginal orgasms were maternal, feminine, mature, and normal. Though frigidity should technically be defined as total inability to achieve orgasm, the orthodox Freudians (and pseudo-Freudians) preferred to define it as inability to achieve vaginal orgasm, by which definition, in 1944, Edmond Bergler adjudged between 70 and 80 per cent of all women frigid. The clitoral versus vaginal debate reged hot and heavy among the sexologists — although Kinsey's writings stressed the importance of the clitoris to female orgasm and contradicted Bergler's statistics — but it became clear that there was something indispensable to the society in the Freudian view which allowed it to remain unchallenged in the public consciousness.

In 1966, Dr. Willem H. Masters and Virginia E. Johnson published Human Sexual Response, a massive clinical study of the physiology of sex. Briefly and simply, the Masters and Johnson conclusions about the female orgasm, based on observation of and interviews with 487 women, were these:

"1) That the dichotomy of vaginal and clitoral orgasms is entirely false. Anatomically, all orgasms are centered in the clitoris, whether they result from direct manual pressure applied to the clitoris, indirect pressure resulting from the thrusting of penis during intercourse, or generalized sexual stimulation of other erogenous zones like the breasts.

"2) That women are naturally multi-orgasmic; that is, if a woman is immediately stimulated following orgasm, she is likely to experience several orgasms in rapid succession. This is not an exceptional occurrence, but one of which most women are capable.

"3) That while women's orgasms do not vary in kind, they vary in intensity. The most intense orgasms experienced by the research subjects were by masturbatory manual stimulation, followed in intensity by manual stimulation by the partner; the least intense orgasms were experienced by women during intercourse.

"4) That the female orgasm is as real and identifiable a physiological entity as the male's; it follows the same pattern of erection and detumescence of the clitoris, which may be seen as the female equivalent of the penis.

"5) That there is an " infinite variety of female sexual response" as regards intensity and duration of orgasms.

To anyone acquainted with the body of existing knowledge of feminine sexuality, the Masters and Johnson findings were truly revolutionary and liberating in the extent to which they demolished the established myths. Yet six years after the study was published, it seems hardly to have made much of an impact at all. Certainly it is not for lack of information that the myths persist. Human Sexual Response, despite its weighty scientific language, was an immediate best-seller, and popular paperback explicated it to millions of people in simple language and at a cheaper price. The mythology remains intact because a male-dominated culture has a vested interest in its continuance.

William Masters had searched for a woman co-worker for his research because, as he said, "No male really understands female sexuality." Before Masters and Johnson, female sexuality had been objectively defined and described by men; the subjective experience of women had had no part in defining their own sexuality.

And, man defined feminine sexuality in a way as favourable to themselves as possible. If woman's pleasure was obtained through the vagina, then she was totally dependent on the man's erect penis to achieve orgasm; she would receive her satisfaction only as a concomitant of man's seeking his. With the clitoral orgasm, woman's sexual pleasure was independent of the male's, and she could seek her satisfaction as aggressively as the man sought his, a prospect which didn't appeal to too many men. The definition of normal feminine sexuality as vaginal, in other words, was a part of keeping woman down, of making them sexually, as well as economically, socially, and politically subservient.

In retrospect, particularly with the additional perspective of our own time, Freud's theory of feminine sexuality appears an historical rationalization for the realities of Victorian society. Culture-bound in the Victorian ethos, Freud had to play the role of paterfamilias. Serving the ethos, he developed a psychology that robbed Victorian woman of possible politics. In Freud's theory of penis envy, the penis functioned as the unalterable determinant of maleness which woman could symbolically envy instead of the power and prestige given men by the society. It was a refusal to grant woman acknowledgment that they had been wronged by their culture and their times, according to Freud, woman's lower status had not been conferred upon her by man, but by God, who had created her without a penis.

Freud's insistence on the superiority of the vaginal orgasm seems almost a demonic determination on his part to finalize the Victorian's repression of feminine eroticism, to stigmatize the remaining vestiges of pleasure felt by women, and thus make them unacceptable to the woman themselves. For there were still women whose asexuality hadn't been completely destroyed, as evidenced by one Dr. Isaac Brown Baker, a surgeon who performed numerous clitoridectomies on women to prevent the sexual excitement which, he was convinced, caused "insanities," "cataplexy," "hysteria," "epilepsy," and other diseases. The Victorians had needed to repress sexuality for the success of Western industrialized society; in particular, the total repression of women's sexuality was crucial to ensure her subjugation. So the Victorians honoured only the male ejaculation, that aspect of sexuality which was necessary to the survival of the species; the male ejaculation made woman submissive to sex by creating a mystique of the sanctity of motherhood; and, supported by Freud, passed on to us the heritage of the double standard.

When Kinsey laid to rest the part of the double standard that maintained women got no pleasure at all from sex, everyone cried out that there was a sexual revolution afoot. But, such talk, as usual, was deceptive. Morality, outside the marriage bed, remained the same, and children were socialized as though Kinsey had never described what they would be like when they grew up. Boys were taught that they should get their sex where they could find it, "go as far" as they could. On the old assumption that women were sexual creatures, girls were taught that since they needed sex less than boys did, it was up to them to impose sexual restraints. In whatever sex education adolescents did manage to receive, they were told that man had penises and women vaginas; the existence of the clitoris was not mentioned, and pleasure in sex was never discussed at all.

Adolescent boys growing up being for sexual crumbs from girls frightened for their "reputations" — a situation that remains unchanged to this day — hardly constitutes the vanguard of a sexual revolution. However, the marriage-manual craze that followed Kinsey assumed that a lifeline of psychological destruction could, with the aid of a little booklet, be abandoned after marriage, and that husband and wife should be able to make sure that the wife was not robbed of her sexual brightness to orgasm; just so long as it was vaginal.

The effect of the marriage manuals of course ran counter to their ostensible purpose. Under the guise of frankness and sexual liberation, they dictated prudery and restraint. Sex was made so mechanized, detached, and intellectual that it was robbed of its annuality. Man became a spectator of his own sexual experience. And, the marriage manuals put new pressure on women. The swing was from repression to pre-occupation with the orgasm. Man took the marriage manuals to mean that their sexuality would be enhanced by bringing woman to orgasm and, again, co-opting feminine sexuality for their own and they put pressure on woman to partom. The endorsement by the marriage manuals of vaginal orgasm insured that woman would be asked not only, "Did you come?" but also, "Did you conform to Freud's conception of a psychosexually mature woman, and thereby validate my masculinity?"

Rather than being revolutionary, the present sexual situation is tragic. Appearances notwithstanding, the age-old taboos against conversation about personal sexual experiences still haven't broken down. This reticence has allowed the mind-manipulators of the media to create myths of sexual supermen and superwomen. So, the bed becomes a competitive arena, where men and women measure themselves against these mythical rivals, while simultaneously trying to live up to the ecstasies promised them by the marriage manuals and the fantasies of the media. ("If the earth doesn't move for me, I must be missing something," the reasoning goes.) Our society treats sex as a sport, with its recordbreakers, its judges, its rules, and its spectators.

As anthropologists have shown, women's sexual response is culturally conditioned; historically, woman defer to whatever model of their sexuality is offered them by men. So the sad thing for women is that they have helped make the vaginal orgasm into a status symbol in a male-dictated system of values. A woman would now perceive her preference for a clitoral orgasm as a "secret shame," ignominious in the eyes of other women as well as those of men. This internalization can be seen in the literature: Mary McCarthy's and Doris Lessing's writing on orgasms do not differ substantially from D. H. Lawrence's and Ernest Hemingway's, and even Simone de Beauvoir, in the Second Sex, refers to vaginal orgasm as the only "normal satisfaction."

Rather than working to alleviate the pressure on them, women have increased it. Feeling themselves insecure in a competitive situation, they are afraid to admit their own imagined inadequacies, and lie to their own women about their sexual experiences. With their man, they often fake orgasm to appear "good in bed" and thus place an intolerable physical burden on themselves and a psychological burden on the man unlucky enough to see through the ruse.

One factor that has made this unfortunate situation possible is ignorance: the more subtle and delicate aspects of human sexuality are still not fully understood. For example, a woman's ability to attain orgasm seems to be conditioned as much by her emotions as by physiology and sociology. Masters and Johnson proved that the orgasm experienced, the misnamed vaginal orgasm, did not differ anatomically from the clitoral orgasm. But this should not be seen as their most significant contribution to the sexual emancipation of woman. A difference remains in the subjective experience of orgasm during intercourse and orgasm apart from intercourse. In the complex of emotional factors affecting feminine sexuality, there is a whole panoply of pleasures: the pleasure of being penetrated and filled by a man, the pleasure of sexual communication, the pleasure of affording a man his orgasm, the erotic pleasure that exists even when the sex is not terminated by orgasmic release. Masters and Johnson's real contribution was to stress and "infinite variety of female sexual response." One should be able to appreciate the differences, rather than impose value judgements on them.

There is no doubt that Masters and Johnson were fully aware of the implications of their study to the sexual liberation of woman. As they wrote, "With orgasmic physiology established, the human female now has an undeniable opportunity to develop realistically her own sexual response levels." Four years later this statement seems naive and antirally too optimistic. Certainly, the sexual problems of our society will never be solved until there is real and unforgotten equality between men and women. This idea is usually misconstrued: sexual liberation for women is wrongly understood to mean that women will adopt all the forms of masculine sexuality. As in the whole issue of woman's liberation, that's really not the point. Woman doesn't aspire to imitate the mistakes of man in sexual matters, to view sexual experiences as conquest and ego-enhancement, to use other people to serve their own ends. But if the Masters and Johnson material is allowed to filter into the public consciousness, then woman at long last will be allowed to take the first step toward her emancipation.

THE GRADUATE ASSISTANTS ASSOCIATION

Last spring the GSU published the GA REPORT. This report was comprehensive survey of the wages and working conditions of every teaching assistant, demonstrator, grader and marker employed by the University.

The major findings of the report were:

a) Although there was a provincial wage ceiling of $1800, ONLY 30% OF ALL GRADUATE ASSISTANTS WERE EARNING THAT AMOUNT. Despite the fact that the ceiling has now been increased to $2400, THERE HAS BEEN NO INCREASE IN PAY!

b) The average wage paid to GAs was less than $1000.

c) 28% of all graduate students are women, but they only comprise 16% of the total of gas.

d) Although close to 40% OF ALL TEACHING IS DONE BY GAs, they have virtually NO REPRESENTATION OR VOICE IN ANY POLICY-MAKING PROCESSES WHICH AFFECT THEIR WORK. They have little voice concerning classroom size, content of the course or student-teacher ratios. Furthermore, there is no formal representation of GAs on any governing body of the University.

WHAT CAN BE DONE

The findings of the GA Report convinced a large number of graduate students that a union for graduate assistants was necessary. The GSU supported this move and has supplied some funds and office assistance to get the GAA started. The union is open to all demonstrators, teaching assistants, graders, markers, post-doctoral fellows, and fourth-year students who are employed by the University of Toronto. In July we asked the University for voluntary recognition; this was refused. This left us with no option but to form a legally certifiable union. Once we are certified, the University is required, by law, to enter into bargaining with us. Furthermore, according to law, they are required to bargain in good faith.

As a union, if successful in our bargaining, among the gains we can win are:

- a) Medical and fringe benefits. GAs are the only University employees who receive no medical or fringe benefits.
- b) Job security and seniority rights. Most GAs do not know from one year to the next whether they will be working. We can change that.
- c) Higher pay.
- d) A voice in the classroom regarding content, structure, and student-teacher ratios.
- e) Office space and office supplies.

WHAT YOU CAN DO

Already a sizeable number of GAs, from a variety of departments, have joined the GAA. You too can join the GAA. At present, the GAA has no formal existence. By your joining, you can create a well-functioning GAA, direct its future course, and formulate its policies.

There will be a series of meetings at the GSU, 16 Bancroft Ave, on November 7, 8 and 9. The meetings are scheduled from 4-6 on those days. The meetings will be both informational and organizational.

All GAs are urged to attend

For more information, contact your department's GSU representative or call the GSU at 928-7057, 6233 or 2391, and watch VARSITY for future announcements.

Yes concert is marred by unendurable sound

This past Tuesday night was a time for ghosts and goblins, the annual drag parade up Yonge Street and coincidentally this year, a Yes concert at Maple Leaf Gardens.

The concert left me in an ambivalent mood. There was disappointment at the Yes' lack of absolute perfection but there was still an immense respect for the level of true musicianship and seriousness that was conveyed by the knitted brows of the intent group and conveyed in sound by the kinetic vibrations that throbbed through the audience.

For some unknown reason, Yes chose the Gardens to tape their next album. The acoustice of the home of the Maple Leafs hockey team is designed for anything but the subtleties of Yes' brand of music. So the audience had to wait for about an hour while the stage was carefully set up. As it turned out much of the session was made unusable because of some very annoying buzzing caused by interference between the recording lines and the PA system. Like almost all Gardens' rock concerts the volume was far above an endurable level probably because the sound engineers have some grave hearing deficiencies by now.

The concert opened in the blackness of the arena pun-tuated by a firefly array of lighted matches. An orchestrated tape began to swell and meld into a crossover with the mellotron and drums as the lights unfolded the group on stage.

The concert (and likely the next album) was largely composed of previously recorded material including all the selections from the new Yes album Close to the Edge and some parts of Fragile beginning with Siberian Khatru, the concert flowed into a lilting drum phased, All Good People, followed by And You and I. Then Steve Howe took the spotlight with some solo acoustic guitar work that featured an impressive (but flawed) version of the classically flavoured Mood For a Day. The band came back to Fragile for Heart of Sunrise and then went into their epic, Close to the Edge. Rick Wakeman's keyboard solo was then followed by Roundabout. For the finale, Yes responded to the standing ovation with a new song Yours is No Disgrace.

Yes were remarkably true to their recordings, especially on the material from Close to the Edge. That was, in fact, a remarkable feat considering the complete, cinematic nature of their music. All the dramatic changes were right on cue, in tune and confident. The music is interdependent on each members' talent and deftness, and it was a treat to see such difficult sounds mesh together with complete precision. Rick Wakeman was especially brilliant and obviously an essential part of the Yes sound. Playing 5 keyboard instruments, including grand piano, electric piano, organ, mellotron and synthesizer. The wizard-like Wakeman was always in motion and never erred in his lightning transitions.

The essence of the night's disappointment came with the quintet's best song-assemblage, Roundabout. It was lacking the driving force of former drummer Bill Bruford but it also suffered from bass lines that were not as chunky and crisp as they could have been. But the band's achievements were nonetheless amazing considering the demanding, artful editing of the music. Most rock bands would have enough trouble trying to put Yes' music together in a studio.

Early November finds us shoulder deep in premieres. A two week multi-cultural theatre festival is being held at the St. Lawrence Centre Town Hall, November 5 through 19. Toronto's various ethnic groups will have the opportunity of sampling plays in German, Ukrainian, Yiddish, Czechoslovakian, French and even English. Incidentally, if you missed the Theatre du Petit Bonheur's fine production of Jean Berbeau's two one-acters, Sotange and Goglu, you can catch it there on the fourteenth. The same company will offer its second production this year starting November 9: Les Bonnes, by Jean Genet, whose plays are a rare experience in the poetry of theatre. More St. Lawrence Centre fare: its repertory company opens November 7 with a dramatic adaptation of Franz Kafka's The Trial. Creation Two presents Midway Priest, a new Canadian play, at Actor's Studio, starting November 9. The Poor Alex Theatre features Goat Island by Ugo Betti from November 9 until December 2. Its designer is Hart House Theatre veteran Stephan Katz.

Speaking of artists in our midst, Nancy Reason, a third year English major from University College, has written Old Friends, finishing Saturday at the UC playhouse. The setting: an old lake-side hotel in Switzerland. The characters, Laura, Muriel and David. Sounds like our old friend, psychological drama.

The O'Keefe Centre will finish off its National Ballet stint minus Nureyev. Tickets are available, needless to say. You can see Michael Redgrave in John Mortimer's play A Voyage Round My Father. However, if you aren't in the mood to empty your pockets, you could try Noogenesis, a new musical playing the 3, 4, 10, 11, 17, 18, 14 and 25 at the St. Giles-Kingsway Presbyterian Church in Islington. It claims to treat the themes of "love, death, the youth cult, unemployment, loneliness and men's search for meaning." Furthermore, "following the performance coffee will be served." How's that for entertainment value?

There should be enough folk music around the city this week to keep most fanatics fairly busy and broke.

Toronto based folksinger Murray McLaughlin is back at the Riverboat, 134 Yorkville (922-6216), till Sunday. Murray has a new album out and should be doing a lot of material from it. Next week, from Monday through Saturday, Tom Rush will be appearing. This is one of his few appearances this year so tickets are available in advance from the 'boet. Admission is $3.50.

Michael Cooney is a Grumbles, 71 Jarvis above King (388-0798), tonight end tomorrow. Next Week is "Ceneade Week" with a different performer appearing each night. From Monday to Saturday the lineup is, Alan J. Ryan, Ken Tobies, Dancing Bear, David Essig (a London area blues guitarist), Heartaches Razz Band and Alexander Zelkin respectively. "One of the more promising weekend events should be the Guy Fawkes celebration to be presented by Thog on Sunday. Eleven hours of theatre, music end other fantastic happenings will take place at the Bethurst Street. United church, 738 Bethurst Street, just south of the Bloor-Bathurst subway station, beginning at 1 pm. Advance tickets are only 50¢ at Etherea (in Rochdale), while admission is $1 at the door.

Adam Mitchell, the former lead singer of the long defunct, psychedelic, "Toronto's answer to the Beatles" group, The Victor Feldbrill conducts the U of T Orchestra (not shown), as conductor-in-residence.

Peupers is appearing tonight at Fiddlers Green, near Yonge and Eglinton (489-3001). Mitchell has been more involved with production than performing lately and this, his first surfacing since Mariposa, might be interesting. On Tuesday the guest artists are Debbie Dunlevy and Ted Richards. Admission is $1.

music

The St. Lawrence Centre's Town Hall is where the Centre's five young contest winners will be proffering musical evidence to prove they deserve their laurels, tonight at 8:30, tickets $3.50. Soline Dusseult-Senart, soprano, will sing Hendel, Brahms, Feure end Berlioz; Caroline Tamlin, soprano will sing Mozert's invigorating end neglected (because it is too much fun, no doubt) Exultate Jubilata; Angele Skie will play violin pieces by Morawetz, Webern and Revel. Arthur Rowe plays Bach, Chopin end Revel end Andrew Gallierd plays Schumann, Griff end Rechmeninoff (preludes).

On November 5 the Berouque Orchestra of Cologne performs at the MacMillan Theatre at 8:30 pm. The program is Hendel's Concerto grosso in D major, Carl Stamitz' Concerto No 2 for cello and orchestra. Telemenn's concerto in E major end Haydn's unfamous (because the 88th so overshadows it end the 87th, not to mention the 89th did he even write one?) 86th symphony. A limited number of tickets are still available at least count, at $2 for students and $4 for others.

The Ontario Institute for Studies in Education is sponsoring an evening of Chinese choral end instrumental music and has decided not to rent Meple Leaf Gardens for the event. In fact, the admission is free and it's at the OISE auditorium at 8:30. Cantonese music and Chinese folk songs plus instrumental ensembles are featured.

On November 9 The Performing Arts of Korea, a dance end musicians group from Korea, will stage a concert illustrating all phases of Korean court end chamber music, confucian, military end Buddhist end folk music. Charge is $2 for students, end it's at 8:30 pm.

An interesting program on the CBS AM Sunday Supplement at 10:30 am features Ohio State Broadcasting Award winner David Humphreys in an evocation of the times and particular circumstances surrounding the writing of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis. The program promises to be a broadcasting tour de force, with a theatre-like portrayal of a sad, sad Beethoven—end or course he was sad in 1814, and very often after that.

Two corrections of last week Whet'sup are in order: The Orford Quartet (end it is Orford, not Oxford as we have erroneously printed it the last few issues) will not be on CBC television this Sunday. They told us to kill the announcement but there's no word on whether it will be rescheduled. Secondly, the tickets for the next concert of the U of T Symphony Orchestra don't go on sale as announced because they're free. You can pick them up at the box office now.

Art Gallery of Ontario presents an exhibition of more than 80 prints, largely from the gallery's own collection, on view until December 3 in a show entitled French Printmakers of the Nineteenth Century. There are works by Delacroix, Mucha, Toulouse-Lautrec end Daumier. A few pieces, by Ingres end Rodin for example, are from the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York where the exhibition first appeared.

Eric Freifeld, painter end instructor of the Ontario College of Art, will have a showing of 25 of his paintings from November 11 to 25. It is his first commercial show, although he has had many one-man shows across the country. His style is said to be divided between direct watercolouring, carried out with expressionist brevity and what he calls 'sustained drawings' heightened with watercolour and worked on in most cases for several years.

A Malcolm Batty Retrospect continues at Hart House until November 24th.

It will be our policy henceforth to note openings (and closings) in one L'Hebdo issue only.

soup

Tonight: Little Big Man, (Penn) 7:30 end 10 Roxy, 99c. I'm not a cook, but soups have turned out to be easy end impressive. Chop up your old vegetables (limp celery, browning lettuce, pepper seeds leftover salad, root vegetable tops) add salt end slow boil about fifteen minutes, (so as not to kill vitamins). Let stand awhile, strain end throw away vegetables.

Sunday: The Lower Depths (Renolr), St. Mikes, 8 pm. If you are a meat-eater you can simmer bones end meat scraps in a covered pot. Vinegar end salt help release minerals. Let this go on for hours, as there are no vitamins to burn up. Uncovered rapid boiling at the end will get rid of any tail-tale vinegar.

Wednesday: Don't miss The Sorrow and the Pity, on CBC TV, from 7:30 on. My split pea soup goes over best, end I don't use any meat. Buy cheap dried split peas at Ocala, on Herbord, just West of Spedina: Steve needs the business. Cook in leftovers water until peas are soft. It takes about three-quarters of an hour. After awhile add carrot end potato chunks, later onion chunks. Tebesco or ketchup livens it up. Try various spices, but not too many in any one soup, or the taste gets confused. Don't be afraid of chilli or other hot things. Do it to taste.

U of T finished in first place in the initial round of the Ontario Senior Intercollegiate Women's Field Hockey championships at York University last weekend. The closest game of the three played by the U of T team was the Saturday afternoon game with York — Toronto won, 2-0. In other games on the weekend, Toronto defeated McGill 3-0, and Queen's 6-0. While the four teams competed at York, another four participated at Waterloo. Waterloo finished first, defeating Guelph and McMaster by 1-0 scores, and tying Western, 1-1. The second half of the championship will be held today and tomorrow at Scarborough College. The Intermediate Championship will be decided on the downtown campus..... Women's Senior Volleyball will participate in the Queen's Invitational Tournament tomorrow.... Also last weekend, the Women

Fencers participated in the Queen's Invitational Fencing Tournament — their first competition of the season. The A and B teams, coached by Ken Wood, placed third and fourth in a field of seven.... In football play this weekend, the two teams for the OUAA championship will be decided. Western Mustangs play in Windsor, while the Gee-Gees host Waterloo Lutheran Golden Hawks.... the football All Star teams were announced this week. Toronto placed 11 members — the highest number of any team in the OUAA — on the Eastern All Star team. Toronto was represented on the offensive team by Rein Enno, centre. Bruce Parrack, guard, John Lipssett, tackle, Brent Eley, end, Cor Doret, halfback, and Wayne Dunkley, quarterback. On the defensive team it was Jim Nicoletti, end. Jim Blainey, tackle, Guido

Iantorno and Hartley Stern, linebackers, and Peter McNabb, defensive halfback. (In spite of the large number of all stars on the team, the Blues lost to Ottawa Gee-Gees last weekend, to eliminate any playoff chances.) The team was selected by OUAA coaches who nominated players from their own teams; lists were then circulated to all coaches in the league. Coaches voted on players from their own section but were unable to vote for players on their own teams.... the Ontario Pinball Championship was won by Seymour Kanowitch of UC. Second place went to Danny Davis, Toronto, and third place went to Russ Rayner, George Brown. Teams came from as far away as Chicago to participate.... Soccer Blues meet Western tomorrow in their last league game of the season. Game time is 1 p.m. Next Wednesday the Blues play York at York for the OUAA championship. The Yeomen defeated Queen's 4-1 last Saturday and remain undefeated champions of the Eastern Section. The winner of that game will advance to the first national CIAU championship game. Next Thursday, Alberta plays the winner of the Manitoba-Lakehead game, which will determine the western representative. Memorial University, St. John's, Newfoundland, will represent eastern Canada's universities, while either Loyola or Laval will come from Quebec. The CIAU championship will be held at York from November 10-12. Waterpolo Blues play Queen's and Ottawa tomorrow at Hart House. The U of T-Queen's game will decide who represents first place in the Eastern Section. The top two teams (likely U of T and Queen's)

Smiley invokes autonomous social research

By PAT REDICAN

U of T political economy professor Donald Smiley yesterday called for autonomous social research in Canadian universities in order to ensure independent and effective research.

Smiley, speaking at the annual meeting of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada at Toronto's Hyatt House, said that governments' desire to guarantee the relevance of social research often led to a "crude utilitarian approach to higher education".

Smiley stated that he thought the governments' only concern was to see that the money funneled to research in universities was used for public purposes.

"Government needs for research are larger, more specific, and more urgent than ever before."

While acknowledging that it was important that governments commission research for their own use in order to function reasonably, Smiley said that it was also important to allow for a continuing, independent, critical analysis of the political economy. This could only occur, he added, if the government adopted a laissez-faire attitude to university research.

Smiley said the lack of good critical analysis in other sectors of society accentuated the need for university involvement in this area.

He cited journalism as being "depressing in its superficiality and its triviality" concerning these matters.

Smiley also stated that many of the government's projects could be better served by "in-house" research, the investigation of public policy by distinctly government agencies.

He referred to "rapid and abrupt change in government priorities" as one reason for this development.

Douglas Murray of the Canadian Social Research Council which funds social research, said in reply to Smiley that the government may be forced to consider alternatives to university research.

He criticized the laissez-faire approach, insofar as it left many areas which needed investigation uncovered.

He pointed out that no books are presently being planned on the 1972 federal election and that, in fact, only one book has ever been written on any Canadian election.

Murray said he felt that agencies like the Research Council, which is independent of government, supported by universities and individual university teachers, may be forced to recommend a government-controlled agency to finance social research.

Science and defence research is already extensively funded by government controlled bodies, the National Research Council and the Defence Research Board.

Smiley agreed with Murray that there were general trends in research that had to be corrected. Among these, he cited the "indisensibly small proportion of projects which are specifically Canadian".

Smiley also emphasized the need for co-operation in projects of an international nature (for example physics or philology) in order to avoid duplication.

Blues end season with 18-3 win

The Rugby Blues finished off a successful season Wednesday by defeating York Yeomen 18-3. It was the first defeat for the Yeomen this season. However, York, in first place is assured of representing the Eastern Section in the OUAA finals November 11 at York.

The seconds did not fare as well on Wednesday, losing 18-9 in a closely-fought contest. The last time the seconds played York they narrowly won 6-3.

Blues first team went ahead early in Wednesday's game on a try by Rick Phillips. The play resulted from strong up field movement and good ball passing to the backs from serum. Rick Hodder made the convert good to bring the score to 6-0 halfway through the initial half.

Yeomen received another setback before the end of the half when Rick Hodder went over the York line to touch the ball down for Blues' second try. Hodder also converted the try.

York finally scored early in the second half on a penalty goal. The York score came after the Yeomen had harassed the Blues throughout the latter part of the first half.

Blues successfully prevented a try by the league-leading Yeomen through constant effort and strong scrumming. On very few occasions did York receive the ball out of the scrum line; this gave the Blues much of the edge in play.

The team also successfully picked off its share of the ball in lineouts, getting it to the backs, who then quickly carried it up the far side of the field.

During the beginning of the second half York came back strong, taking the offensive for the first time in the game. However, Blues persistent checking was able to hold the team to three points. York's stand-off (who scored the penalty goal) played a strong game until he was helped off the field in the second half.

York continued to press. But when Graeme Wynn touched down the ball for the team's third try, during the final minutes of the game, the Yeomen were forced to accept their first defeat of the season.

Barclay attributed Blues poor start this season to "inexperience" (three losses in the first four games). He said the team would be well developed by next season, even with the loss of such important individuals as Steve Ferris, Graeme Wynn, and Rick Hodder. Hodder finished the season with 65 points — the best individual scorer in the OUAA. (Barclay will also not return in 1973).

Blues finish the season with a 5-3 record, while the seconds finish even at 4-4.

Blues skill in the lineout helped them defeat York Wednesday.

Hockey Blues open season against Grads

By PETER DUX

The hockey Blues begin their 1972-73 season tonight against the Varsity Grads — a collection of ex-Blues all stars selected by coach Tom Watt. Following this game, the team will participate in a Hockey Canada tournament in Kitchener tomorrow and Sunday.

This year's team, may miss some of their offensive prowess of last year with the loss of John Wright. Watt has appointed Gord Davies as captain, and Bill Buba and Warren Anderson as alternates. Eleven veterans are returning for the season.

Returning at centre from last year are Bob Munro, who along with Buba led the team in scoring with 19 goals last year. Ivan McFarlane and Dan Pagnutti who did their share of penalty killing last year are also back.

Gord Davies Bill Buba, Kent Runke, are on wing and, after a layoff of one season — Nick Holmes.

Returning defencemen include 205 pound Rick Leroy, Warren Anderson, and Al Milnes. The experience of these three should insure a stable defence.

Tending the net for this second season will be Bruce Durno who last year had a 1.66 goals against average in league and playoff games.

Rookies have been practising and are anxious to prove themselves in a game. At centre will be Bill Fifield who played at Michigan State after a Junior B stint with Markham.

The left wing position will be filled by Neil Korzack, coming directly from the OHA Peterborough Petes with 43 points last year, and Doug Tate, captain of Waterloo Lutheran last year, who led the team with 31 points.

Right wingers include 6'2" Harry Sems, formerly with the OHA Toronto Marlies, and Bruce Herridge who also played for the Marlies and the Guelph Royals. The Blues have secured Mike Keenan, ex-captain of St. Lawrence College (Canton, N.Y.) who also played for the Oshawa Generals.

Two new defencemen have been added to the roster — Rick Cornacchia, who played with the Dixie Bechives last year, and Albie Shammes from the Wawa Travellers. The Blues have also picked up Gary Innes, who will share the nets with Durno. He played the past four years for McMaster and his defection could make the U of T goaltending combination a strong one.

Detroit Red Wing will be on the ice as will Brian Jones, now coaching the Ryerson Rams.

Coaching the Grads' will be Dr. Dave Steven who last played with the Blues in 1959 but who is presently the assistant coach of the Kitchener in one of several regular tournaments under the auspices of Hockey Canada. Their opponents will be the University of Waterloo, and the winner will play Sunday at 8 pm against the winners of the Waterloo Lutheran-McMaster game. The first place finishers in each region across Canada will meet at Christmas to decide the national champions.

Waterloo Warriors head coach Bob McKillop said last Friday "We look for our usual tough game against Toronto. They have their usual strong team. In talking to Tom (Watt) he says that he had only two positions to fill. For those two players he has eleven players with Junior A experience, plus a couple of players from Europe."

McKillop said that he had three solid, well-balanced lines, "each capable of a carrying its share of the offensive and defensive load. Our goaltending, especially with the addition of Jake Dupuis (last year with the Guelph CMC's) seems to be stronger than last season. "Defense would still appear to be our problem," he continued. "We are still carrying eight defencemen. However, with some added work in that area we should be able to improve. Peter Paleczny, who had been seeing action at right forward in workouts to date, may have to take the odd shift on defense."

The regular season will begin next week with 17 games to be played, along with additional exhibition home and home series with Sir George Williams and Loyola and a January game at Cornell.

Watt hopes to finalize the arrangements for an exhibition series in Poland this Christmas.

The league is divided into 2 divisions. Toronto, York, Queen's, Laurentian, Ottawa, Carleton, and Ryerson will make up the east. The Blues play each team in their division at home and away for 12 games. They also play five games, home or away against the west division including Windsor, Waterloo Lutheran, Waterloo, Western, Guelph, McMaster and Brock. The season runs until Feb. 27 followed by the playoffs with the CIAU championship game at Toronto this year.

Blues scrimmage last night for game against Waterloo in Hockey Canada tournament tomorrow.

Tonight's game with the Grads will see Bobby Bauer and Brent Swanick returning from last year's team to play for the grads. Also returning from the 1971 team will be Tom Little who will man the nets along with John Wrigley and Terry Parsons. Bill L'Heureux, and Terry Peterson. Steve Monteith, who has played on the Canadian National Team and brother Hank, an ex-team. A number of other players will be returning for tonight's game but the final lineup will not be known until later today. John Wright, now with the NHL Vancouver Canucks will not play.

Season's tickets will be sold between periods during tonight's game at Varsity Arena.

Tomorrow at 2 pm, the Blues will play in Panther Seale stresses role of mass action

By STEWART GOODYEAR

Black Panther leader Bobby Seale asserted yesterday that extensive community organizing leading to mass action and the raising of peoples' consciousness is necessary to bring down the U.S. power structure.

Speaking at the Faculty of Education as part of the two day Student Mobilization Committee anti-war conference, Seale labelled the American capitalist system as a force of oppression throughout the world.

Over 500 people packed the auditorium to hear Seale, a member of the Peace Action Committee as well as the Panthers, deliver an impassioned and well-received address.

Pointing to recent intensification of the war in Vietnam and to disagreement over the terms of the proposed ceasefire, he declared that U.S. president Richard Nixon has no intention of ending the war.

Seale stated that many promises to end the war have been made and broken in the past. He compared present peace negotiations to President Lyndon Johnson's pre-election promises in 1964 to not bomb Vietnam and to wage a war on poverty.

No matter who is elected president tomorrow, there must be continuing massive action to demand the war's end, Seale said. He announced that massive demonstrations will be held in major U.S. and Canadian cities on November 18th to support these demands.

Considering Senator George McGovern's candidacy, Seale again referred to broken promises made by liberals and stated that he will not offer McGovern his support. But during a press conference prior to his speech, Seale said that four more years of Nixon would be four more years of "fascist oppression" and that the Black Panthers, by repeated denunciations, have attempted to force Nixon out of office.

According to Seale, the fact that the anti-war movement works in the heart of the American capitalist system, "in the belly of the whale", as he called it, is very significant.

But the anti-war movement must remember that its accompanying themes are to oppose the present system in matters of poverty, pollution and capitalist expansion. The entire system must be "transformed out of existence", said Seale, and replaced by one with humane ends. This would include the redistribution of wealth and integration in the seats of power, he added.

"Broader insight" into the purposes and means of this system must be developed, he said. Using a personal parable of influencing and liberalizing a red-neck guard during his time in prison, Seale asserted his belief that people's consciousness can successfully be raised.

He also cited a marked change in perceptions of police and government among blacks and young people during the last decade.

Seale then deplored the reactions of apathy, escapism and dropping out of the system, saying they are futile.

Black Panther Bobby Seale yesterday called for continued mass action against the Vietnam war.

Earlier, Seale mentioned some of the methods his organization of the community will follow — some use of electoral politics, efforts to bring awareness, and repeated mass action.

The most important consideration in politics today, he stated, is community control on a city-wide level.

Seale is presently running for mayor in Oakland on a Black-Chicano slate, hoping "those in the liberation struggle can occupy the city's seats of power". Asked what chance he had of winning, he said the majority of Oakland's population are poor Blacks and Chicanos and that he has a firm base among them.

During his speech Seale attacked the media's attitude that his campaign for Oakland's mayoralty is a joke, which he said is indicative of the establishment press. While sensationalizing the militancy of the Black Panthers, the press has ignored their creation of health clinics and their efforts to provide food for the urban poor, Seale accused.

He called the present philosophy of the Panthers, "revolutionary intercommunalism", a view which conceives of the world as a matrix of communities and accepts all races. The Panthers have never been opposed to all of the white community, he said, tracing the history of their philosophy from "black nationalism to black socialism to proletarian internationalism" to their present viewpoint.

While the Panthers will support nationalistic socialist movements they are ultimately against nationalism Seale added.

He stated that when he and Huey Newton organized the Black Panthers both realized that "the system of government and police supporting the U.S. capitalist system" would attempt to destroy them. He accused this "machine" of killing both Malcolm X and Martin Luther King.

Quebec, Atlantic delegates walk out

Uncertain future greets national student body

OTTAWA (CUP) — Delegates from about 40 Canadian universities and community colleges yesterday established a new national student union, but not before representatives from Quebec and the Atlantic provinces had walked out.

Creation of the National Union of Students/Association Nationale des Etudiants (NUS) followed three days of protracted, and sometimes tedious debate on a constitution proposed by a four-member steering committee, set up at a previous conference at Windsor, Ontario, last May.

But the fledgling organization's future is uncertain because potential members must conduct referendums on their campuses before being allowed to join. Although a few student councils had already authorized their delegates to join the new union, only Simon Fraser University has conducted the necessary referendum.

Delegates authorized the "central committee" or executive of NUS to solicit grants from potential members to finance its formative stages. The only commitment made at the conference was a grant of $1000 from the University of British Columbia student council.

The conference was perhaps the largest gathering of Canadian student council representatives since the dissolution of the old Canadian Union of Students (CUS) in 1969.

The Quebec-Atlantic provinces walkout occurred after delegates reached a bitter impasse over methods of membership in the new union.

Quebec representatives, who came from the English-speaking universities and some English and French CEGEP'S (community colleges) demanded representation based on region.

Loyola, which introduced the proposal, wanted all NUS delegates to be appointed by regional student unions, with all five regions of Canada having equal voting power. They were especially adamant that their representation come from the growing Front des Etudiants du Quebec (FEQ), rather than from individual institutions.

The Loyola proposal drew on the example of FEQ in which Quebec is divided into six regional government bodies. The regions elect a maximum of 100 delegates to a general assembly, but representation is not based on population.

Montreal has about 60 per cent of the students, but only 30 assembly delegates, and other regions have at least 11

The Quebec delegates contended that the method prevents one power bloc from controlling the organization. Each region must meet before an assembly meeting to develop positions scheduled for discussion at the assembly.

The proposed constitution called for representation from individual institutions based on two votes per school, but it was amended to a modified representation by population formula after the Quebec-Atlantic provinces walk-out.

The Atlantic province participants wanted representation from provincial organizations, with each province having equal voting power. They feared the organization would become controlled by Ontario and Quebec under "representation by population", resulting in insufficient attention to Atlantic problems.

They also claimed representation by institution would result in too unwieldy a body.

The delegates changed the proposed name of the organization from National Association of Students to National Union of Students. The word "association" was retained in French for translation purposes.

They also adopted the Declaration of the Canadian Student, which formerly served as part of the Canadian Union of Students constitution.

The declaration includes the clause "the Canadian student has the right to be free to continue his education without any material, economic, social or psychological barriers, created by the absence of real equality of essential conditions."

Delegates beat back an attempt to cut the number of general NUS meetings from two to one per year by a vote of 16-28, with 18 abstentions.

In a controversial move, they added a by-law which requires one-half of all NUS standing and special committees be composed of women. The vote was 24-16, with such traditionally conservative student councils as University of Saskatchewan (Saskatoon campus) and York University voting for it.

Schools on record as approving the constitution and indicating interest in joining NUS were UBC, Simon Fraser, University of Victoria, Columbia, Caribou, Vancouver City, Camosin, Douglas and Capilano Colleges, New Caledonia College of British Columbia, the University of Saskatchewan (Saskatoon and Regina campuses), University of Manitoba and Winnipeg, the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, Glendon and Atkinson Colleges, Lakehead, Carleton, Trent and York Universities and the Universities of Ottawa, Windsor and Guelph, along with the U of T APUS and Champlain CEGEP from St. Lambert, Quebec.

Canada complicit in Vietnam: prof

By GREG McMASTER

The Canadian government is guilty of "crimes against the peace" in Vietnam by "facilitating the escalation of the war", according to Carlton University Professor James Steele.

Speaking at a Saturday conference of the Student Mobilization Committee to End the War in South-East Asia, Steele accused Canada of violating the Geneva Convention.

He claimed that when the alleged "Gulf of Tonkin incident" was reported in the world press in 1965, then prime minister Lester Pearson immediately accused North Vietnam of blatant aggression.

Thus, said Steele, the former Nobel Peace Prize winner lent his prestige to a world-wide propaganda effort, which helped Lyndon Johnson convince the U.S. Congress to give him the power to escalate the war at will.

Steele said that Canada has been complicit in the continuation of the war through its role in the International Control Commission. The ICC's activities he characterized as Canadian diplomats such as Blair Seaborn acting as messenger boys in the American government's efforts to convince the Vietnamese to surrender.

He also suggested that the U.S. informed Canada in 1969 of its intentions two months before it resumed bombing North Vietnam. Steele accused Canada of remaining silent when revealing the information could have stimulated a world-wide campaign to prevent the bombing resumption.

The Geneva War Crimes agreements defined a category of "crimes against the peace". Steele accused the Canadian government of this crime for political subservience to the U.S., as well as for the massive supply of military goods provided by Canada to the American war effort.

McGill professor Sam Noumoff reported on research uncovering hundreds of Canadian, American and British-owned companies in Canada providing war materials to the U.S..

Clare Culhane, who has been an advisor to a Canadian hospital in Vietnam, and who recently wrote a book on Canada's complicity in the war, warned of the danger to the Vietnamese of Canadian "peacekeeping" troops going to Vietnam in the event of a ceasefire.

She described as "inconceivable" the suggestion that troops could really operate for "peacekeeping" purposes and said that any Canadian force would be used to prevent the right of self-determination of the Vietnamese people.

She referred to a 1969 Canadian government White Paper on the question of "peacekeeping" troops, which, she said, advocated an essentially anti-communist force.

"There is no neutrality involved", she said.

At yesterday's session of the conference, Tran Thieu of the Association of Vietnamese Students accused the Nixon administration with full responsibility for the prolongation of the war, and described the Saigon government as "the instrument of aggression whose power rests on U.S. dollars and bombs".

His pledge that "We will fight on until victory" was greeted with a standing ovation from the crowd of 200.

A representative of the Marxist official wing of the Irish Republican Army, Sean Keane, accused Britain, Canada and the U.S. of cooperating to provide military supplies and soldiers to attack Vietnam as well as to invade the "no-go" areas of Northern Ireland.

Keane said that "the real terrorists in Ireland are wearing British Army uniforms", and using Canadian tanks. He expressed support for both an independent socialist Ireland and for "our revolutionary comrades in North and South Vietnam."

No books for Xmas

By RANDY ROBERTSON

U of T vice-president Don Forster said yesterday that the university library system may be closed from December 22 until January 2.

The proposal to close the library for 10 days will be discussed at a meeting tomorrow of the Governing Council's Academic Affairs Committee.

Forster said the proposal came from the personnel department. The shut-down is to give library employees the benefit of the fact that Christmas and Boxing Day fall on weekdays (Monday and Tuesday, respectively).

The closing would give the employees "a bit of a break", he added. Last year the library was open, although with restricted hours and services, during most of the holidays.

Chief Librarian Robin Blackburn said last week that the closing would not hinder the administrative operation of the library.

GSU vice-president Stephan Kogitz said yesterday he was opposed to the proposal.

"The break is just too long; graduate students need these facilities," he said.

The GSU has not yet issued an official response to the proposal, but Kogitz said that he had encountered no graduate students with opinions contrary to his own. The executive will draft a reply to Forster early this week, he indicated.

SAC communications commissioner Debra Lewis said that SAC had discussed the proposal at an executive meeting last Thursday.

"We concluded it was unwise," she said, "and we sent a letter to Forster expressing our hope that the library would remain open during the holidays."

APUS president Kurt Loeb said he was not opposed to the closing and that he did not think other part-time students would be.

"We can turn this into a positive thing," he said; "it means that books may be taken out longer. So long as people are notified in time, I don't think it's that much of an imposition."

A committee set up by the Academic Affairs Committee to examine library regulations last week almost unanimously "expressed concern" at the possibility of a library shut-down.

Forster said that he had sought the views of the Graduate Students Union, the Students Administrative Council and the Association of Part-Time Undergraduate Students to the proposal. He said he had not yet heard from these organizations.

Worker's grievance quashed

By HEATHER-JANE SANGUINS

The grievance lodged by fired library worker Dave Owens was dismissed last week by the University of Toronto. In a short letter, reports Owen, the university dismissed his claim that he was fired because of his union activities, and refused to give back his job.

Owen said yesterday that he would like the union, Local 1230 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, to pursue the grievance through all possible channels.

At a local meeting November 28, Owen's fellow workers will vote on whether or not to take the case to arbitration.

Asked about the support he thought he'd receive, Owen replied that it was "difficult to gauge" as he didn't know all of the workers. His job lasted only two and a half months, before he was dismissed October 18. However, he felt that the men in the filing section where he worked were "100 per cent" behind him.

Union chief steward Tom Bribiesco stated that there is a lot of discontent among the workers over the decision.

As a probationary worker, Owen was not entitled to receive a warning from the university before it terminated his employment "on reasonable grounds", says U of T manager of management-labour relations John Parker.

Owen's grievance alleged that he was fired because of union activities. Although only a probationary worker, the night before he was fired, Owen was unofficially asked to become a union steward.

The ostensible reason of "unsatisfactory work" was rejected by Owen, since he reported that shortly before his dismissal he was told his work was satisfactory.

Parker, who made the decision not to uphold the grievance, claims he is "neutral as far as the library administration goes. He said he is convinced there was no discrimination against Owen because of his union activities.

Quebec unions are political voice of workers

By ZOYA STEVENSON

Université de Montréal sociology professor Jacques Dofny contended Thursday that "the recent federal elections prove that there is no working class expression at the political level in Quebec."

He explained that in the absence of any organized and effective political party to represent the working class, "trade unions play a greater political role in Quebec than anywhere else in North America because most people in the society belong to the working class."

Speaking to a graduate sociology seminar on the political and social role of the labour movement in Quebec, Dofny argued that there were two systems of stratification in Canada, one for the country as a whole, and one for Quebec. "Quebec is a class system without an upper class, or the upper class is an upper middle class made up of the old pre-industrial bourgeoisie," he said. "There is no indigenous industrial bourgeoisie although French Canadian society is an industrial society."

He noted that the last census showed only 6.2 per cent of the labour force is engaged in agriculture.

"Therefore, what defines French Canadians is that they are salaried people who don't own the means of production.

The position of French-Canada as a whole is not very far from being the position of an oppressed class in society," he said.

Dofny did a study for the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism comparing the roles of French and English Canadian engineers in Quebec society. He said he considered the French Canadian engineer to be part of a "new working class" which has the potential to become a "national rallying point."

The evidence was that "for the first time French Canadians played an important economic and industrial role, as did the engineers in nationalized Hydro-Quebec."

He said the study found a sharp statistical difference in attitudes towards social and economic involvement in Quebecois society between French Canadian and English Canadian engineers.

Sixty five per cent of the Quebecois favoured unionization compared to eight per cent of the English. Also, the large majority of French Canadians questioned would support workers on strike in other industries whereas a minority of their English-speaking colleagues would.

He attributed the differences largely to the fact that many more French Canadian engineers are employed in the public service sector than English Canadian ones. He pointed out the rapid expansion and modernization of the public services which made them the natural target of union organizing campaigns.

Dofny claimed that "there are very different types of workers' organizations for French and English Canadian workers even when they work in the same industry."

He said one organizational model could be found in the continental, centralized unions where the "structure of power is such that power exists in greater degrees at the top than at the bottom, as in the Catholic and Anglo Saxon unions."

In this model "the money collected goes into the central treasury, where in the other model, the money stays in the hands of the federation, where regional councils have more authority and power."

The Montreal professor agreed with the thesis put forward by Pierre Vallières in his book, White Niggers of America, saying that "the two most oppressed minorities in North America, the blacks & the Quebecois have begun to fight for their complete liberation."

"The trade unions of Quebec are not only fighting for the economic welfare of workers, they are considering the problems of control of the media, education, and industry itself."

Nixon landslide won't stop war

Tomorrow, millions of people around the world will sit glued to their television sets and radios as they witness yet another chapter in the great American tragedy: the re-election of U.S. president Richard Nixon.

In their quadrennial fling with electoral madness, Americans seem, lemming-like, determined to disregard the perils that lie awaiting them and leave the fate of one of the most important countries in the world in the hands of "Tricky Dick". Blinded by Nixon's alluring suggestion of an "honourable" settlement in Vietnam and frightened off by the initially radical-sounding type of Democratic candidate of George McGovern, they are prepared to disregard Nixon's performance in his first term in office.

The Nixon regime has been marred by almost unparalleled corruption and deceit in the highest American offices. Under Dick and vice-president Spiro (Agnew), the indiscriminate bombing and killing in Indochina has been ruthlessly stepped up. At home plans were made to harrass political opponents to ensure that there'd be no chance of them replacing the Republicans in the White House. And — only in America — they managed to get caught in the act attempting to tap the Democratic Party's national offices and talk their way out of it, sidetracking the trials of former White House associates implicated in the escapade until after the presidential elections.

Four years ago, Nixon was elected on a platform pledging to bring peace — admittedly the evasive, contradictory, "honourable" peace — to Viet Nam. Since that time, he has lied to and misled the American people and the world about why the United States has prolonged this cruel, inhuman, and unjust war against the peoples of Viet Nam.

The peace prospect Nixon today offers Americans was as possible four years ago as it is now — had he really believed in ending the war. Instead, America's commander-in-chief propped up the corrupt Saigon government through four more years of bloodshed and non-democracy. Thousands more Vietnamese have lost their lives and their homes, thousands of Americans have been added to the role of the dead and imprisoned, and the Vietnamese countryside has been destroyed. That has been the toll of this madness.

Despite the current overtures to Hanoi, there is no guarantee that Nixon will pull American troops and support out of Viet Nam in the near future, or indeed in his second term in office. In fact, as the election draws nearer and Nixon becomes surer of winning a resounding re-election, the American negotiators seem to have dug in their heels, less anxious to conclude any rapid peace settlement.

In the last presidential elections, Nixon said Americans should turf the Democrats out because they got America into the Vietnamese war, a war he recognized most Americans wanted no part of. However, he has and still is jeopardizing peace in Indochina and the Vietnamese's chance to decide their own fate by presuming to impose his American face-saving peace settlement. Amidst all his talk of honour, there is no consideration given to the injustice of an American imperialism which has plunged America gun-first into the country of others.

It's unfortunate that the campaign of liberal McGovern has been so clumsy and hypocritical that he himself has virtually eliminated the possibility of ousting the war monger from the White House. Nothing dramatic — other than a rather rapid Viet Nam pull-out — probably would have accompanied a McGovern victory, but that alone would be worth the change and certainly much more than one could reasonably expect from other electoral gladiator fights.

"And, for my next trick, I'll win the election."

No severance pay for 510 on production line

Acme screws workers with new labour laws

Ontario Labour Minister Fern Guindon says that Acme Screw and Gear Limited "has no intention" of giving severance pay to 510 production workers it fired when the company closed its Weston plant during a strike. And, he continued, there's nothing the government can do about it because provincial legislation requiring notice or equivalent pay before closing large plants doesn't apply during a strike.

Acme locked up its Weston plant's doors for good when United Auto Workers local 284 wouldn't agree to a second 18-month wage freeze.

Guindon's lame suggestion is that the union get help from Canada Manpower to find new jobs for the unemployed workers. That seems to end the situation for him. Well, it shouldn't.

When the most recent labour legislation, including the escape clause exploited by Acme, was introduced in the Ontario legislature, critics correctly pointed out that it discriminated against labour in favour of employers. The government nonchalantly rejected the complaints, insisting the legislation was fair to all concerned.

There wasn't much public outcry against the legislation, either. The government knew it had an easy mark. Few people get upset when labour's getting the short end of the deal.

The Acme incident presents concrete evidence of one major loophole in the law. It needs eliminating, and now. The next session of the legislature should act quickly and decisively to do so.

It's time companies that are only too willing to harvest profits in good times be forced to compensate the public for the negative effects of their policies, including plant closings. Despite what Acme and others like them think, it ought not be a one-way street.

The pure nerve of Acme in suggesting that its employees should suffer continually for its financial troubles is astounding. Other workers who might get sucked into a similar wage-freeze posture should think twice about the implications of the Acme experience. Look at what they got for co-operating once: tossed out on the street jobless when they wouldn't follow suit a second time.

Ah, the beauties of capitalism.

Development threatens central city housing

By DAVID KENNEDY

Low income and family housing will be completely displaced from central Toronto if present trends continue, according to a recent report from the City Planning Board.

The disruption of inner city low income communities as well as a further decrease in low income housing may be evident in the future.

Older houses in central Toronto "have been demolished to permit the expansion of central commercial and institutional uses, others have been replaced by public housing projects and by, private high-rise apartments, and others have been converted into townhouses", the report, a study on a downtown neighbourhood, says.

The effect of these changes has been a drop of 15 per cent in central Toronto's population in the last 20 years. In this area, the downtown core and surrounding area, the population has declined 21,000 to 116,300 in 1971. Most of the population has been displaced from the central core below College Street. Between 1951 and 1971, 13,000 people left this area.

A far more important change has been the transformation of the class composition of the neighbourhoods. In 1951 working class people inhabited most of the central area. Since then, redevelopment and rehabilitation in the northern sectors has brought in the middle class. The report says that townhousing which first appeared in Yorkville and the Annex, is now common from the Sussex area in the west to Don Vale in the east.

Commenting upon this trend, Dan Heap, a candidate for alderman in Ward 6, argues that the simple reason is that the price of land has been going up so high that only upper income groups can pay for housing downtown. A broader analysis must grapple with the fact that low cost housing is in a state of artificial short supply. Developers are not building low cost housing, Heap points out.

"Federal government loans are going for middle cost housing," says Heap. Contrary to public statements from the Ontario Housing Corporation and the Canadian Housing and Mortgage Corporation, which were supposedly created to help low income people, Heap charged "they only help the builders and speculators get easy financing".

In the area immediately south of the University of Toronto, there is a clear example of how this redevelopment process works and, hopefully, how it can be stopped. South-east Spadina, the area bounded by McCaul and Queen Streets, Spadina and College Avenues, was threatened by U of T expansion plans seven years ago. Only after the residents opposed and protested against the university were the plans dropped.

In anticipation of the university's expansion, City Council approved the Planning Board's recommendation that most of south-east Spadina be designated institutional in the Official Plan. An institutional designation includes governmental, medical, educational, and cultural uses as well as high density commercial and residential uses. City Council had, in effect, designated this area for redevelopment. Taking this cue from City Hall, developers and speculators began purchasing land.

Various members of the strong Chinese community became fearful for the stability of their community. Under pressure, sitting aldermen Horace Brown and June Marks responded by pressing for a Part II study, a detailed Official Plan of south-east Spadina.

leaders fear this may lead to further pressure on the rest of the area.

However, the current zoning allows a density, of floor space relative to land area, twice as high as the existing structures. The Part II study suggests two ways of surmounting this problem are possible; down-zoning or height limitations.

The study realistically states these approaches may be unacceptable to the property owners because they "take away development rights which (the owners) already enjoy." The owners may want to reap the possible benefits of owning a piece of valuable land close to the downtown core.

Both private and public institutions have sunk a great deal of money into south-east Spadina. Near Sullivan and Beverley Streets, election, Conservative MPP Allan Grossman admitted the station was not a suitable structure for a residential area. And during the election, the provincial government directed Ontario Hydro to sell the land to Ontario Housing Corporation, which is under Grossman's direction. But a year later, the houses have still not changed hands and there is uncertainty about what will happen to them.

Within the community, there is no unanimity over future use of the site. Some would like an old age home, some would like a community centre, and some would simply like to have the homes rehabilitated. A working committee has been formed of the interested parties to resolve these differences.

Hidden near the end of study on south-east Spadina, the planners suggest reconsidering the proposed widening of Dundas Street between the Don Valley and Spadina Avenue. Metro Roads and Traffic Department wants to widen Dundas to six lanes.

"To make Dundas a six lane road would change the character of the community," said Heap. The south-east Spadina area would be split in two by "another University Avenue", the centre of Toronto's Chinese community would be destroyed by the necessary demolition of old homes and shops, likely to be replaced by significantly higher-cost commercial development, and extra traffic would also accumulate around Spadina and Dundas. Heap suggested the widening of Dundas makes "a mockery of the planning process".

Archer, Brown and Marks oppose the widening of Dundas St. Brown said that it was on his motion over three years ago that City Council first objected to this Metro proposal. Archer also insists he was instrumental in getting the council recently to register a formal objection to the widening.

Both Brown and Marks state that if they get re-elected, their first task will be to get this matter re-opened at Metro. Brown said, "Metro can do nothing to force the city to agree to give the land up for the widening." This is the first real confrontation between Metro and the city, he added. It will have to go to the OMB to be settled if Metro insists on the widening.

Archer did not comment so much on his opposition to the widening as on insisting that Metro would have to pay dearly for the land. "The city must insist that there are financial and physical efforts made to maintain communities. Metro will have to pay the price," he said.

A public meeting with the Planning Board focusing on the study this Thursday, at 8 pm in the University Settlement House at 23 Grange Avenue.

The Chinese community's unique character may be destroyed by Dundas widening.

In February, 1971, City Council voted not to pass bylaws allowing major physical change to the area, such as redevelopment, until the completion of the study.

"Towards a Part II Plan for South-East Spadina", the report of the study examines land use in the area. Land on the south-east corner and on the south side of south-east Spadina has been purchased and, in some cases, cleared for redevelopment. The interior of the area, although barely affected physically, has been subject to some land assembly.

The simplest way of describing the report's proposals is to say that it advocates a stabilization of the situation. The quiet streets and homes in the interior would be included in a stable residential area, while the transitional area, between McCaul Street and University Avenue, would be left to high-rise buildings serving various purposes. Some community the Canada Trust Company owns more than a complete block, possibly a land parcel for a high-rise complex. All the Planning Board can do is urge Canada Trust to participate in the planning process.

In addition to corporate holdings, different governmental and quasi-governmental institutions are rooted in the area. The Art Gallery of Ontario is expanding its facilities into Grange Park, which is not protected from further redevelopment. At Beverley and Dundas Streets, the Metro Police Commission wants to build a new police station. So far the local residents opposing the required destruction of houses have not been able to sway the commission.

On Beverley between Baldwin and Cecil Streets, Ontario Hydro owns a whole block originally purchased for a 12-storey transformer station. During the 1971 provincial United Appeal: treating individuals, not root causes

Researched by WAYNE ROBERTS

Toronto's annual fund-giving spree, the United Appeal, has entered the last days of its 17th campaign, fighting to meet this year's $14,120,000 goal. That target nearly evaded the collectors as, according to campaign chairman Norman Paton, a federal election and a province-wide telethon competed with the appeal for the public's attention and pocketbooks.

As they have for the previous 16 years of the campaign, everybody is pitching in to do their bit and encourage others to give their "share". Of late, the smaller, individual contributions have assumed a more important role in the appeal's fund-raising. So, our community leaders have felt the heavy burden of their position and risen to the cause, espousing considerable self-righteousness in its pursuit.

U of T president John Evans has seen the light. "The welfare of the unfortunate members of our society who are physically handicapped or, for reasons beyond their control, are unable to support themselves, is the responsibility of all those who are able to help, whether their contribution can be large or small," he told the U of T Bulletin.

But Louis, I hear they have no dollars to spend!!!

Pshaw Dear! Then let them spend pennies!!

"We who work in the university group that should carry its full responsibility," Evans noted.

Warming to his subject, principals, deans, directors, and departments, criticizing the low number of pledges from organizations. Last year, he pointed out the university's payroll did not authorize

The president failed to recognize the university pays its non-university employees (unionized), leaving them in a position off than the poor souls he describes as agencies. "There are members of staff at poverty level," administrative staff reported to the Governing Council meeting. Some university's labour management relations charity at U of T, Evans seems to have home.

Echoes of Evans' plea resounded in Toronto's "First Newspaper", has shown sell newspapers, you know — and dredge up stories of misery alleviated by the crew's a bit out of shape from the Fresh Air Fund end not yet ready to welcome the Santa Claus Fund.

"If poverty is an economic problem, learn how not to be poor, what are we wealth? Are we to pretend," Fisher's relationship between unlimited wealth

Sixteenth century aristocracy found it easy to dismiss poverty, but even most wouldn't caricature poor the way their predecessors did.

st affluent today

This inability to see beyond the surface when dealing with social welfare policy is less confusing when one studies the composition of the United Community Fund Board of Directors. (The UCF is the organizational arm of the United Appeal.) Almost 70 per cent of the Board is made up of senior business executives. The president of Anaconda (Canada) Limited; the president of Maple Leaf Mills Limited; the vice-president of Transportation and Supply, Shell (Canada) Limited; the president of Confederation Life Insurance Company; the executive vice-president (administration) of the Robert Simpson Company Limited; the president of General Foods Limited; the chairman of the board of the T.Eaton Company Limited; the president of Consumers Gas Limited; the chairman of the board and chief executive officer of the Simpson-Sears Limited; and the vice-president of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company of Canada Limited are among the members.

Corporations are in fact donating very little to the appeal, although they're quick to gloat about sponsoring the weekly campaign meetings held in plush surroundings of fancy hotels. Out of every $100 a large corporation donates to "charity", $68 of it would otherwise have gone to pay taxes because of the tax rate paid by the companies at the top of the profit scale, according to figures cited by Fisher. That leaves a net "gift" of $32 per $100 for corporations, while the more moderately taxed average wage earner pays about 20-35 per cent in taxes, making the individual's contribution proportionately so much greater than that of business.

UA campaign material lauds the lead some of the largest corporations give by donating to the campaign who committed themselves "to increase their corporate gifts by 20 per cent" this year. The UA doesn't note, Fisher observes, that corporations won a 100 per cent increase in tax deductions under new regulations.

Major companies proudly boast of their employees' contribution records. They fail to publicize quite so blatantly the coercion, like that practised rather mildly at U of T, used to collect the money. The UA's "Here's How You Can Help" pamphlet suggests companies arrange payroll deductions and "encourage 'Fair Measure' giving". Recognizing an easy touch in new employees unsure of their job security, the UA advises, "Approach new employees at the time of their employment to sign-up through payroll deduction." Nowhere does the brochure discuss the poor wages and relative inability to give of the workers, or the proportionately poor showing the corporations make in their donations.

Fisher's attack represented the culmination of three years of increasing disenchantment with the UA by activist, professional social workers. The malaise began with the formation of Just Society Associates (remember Trudeau's 1968 promise of a "just society"), a number of radically-inclined social workers who wanted to participate in the struggles of the poor, to be on their side without dominating their organizations. The social workers formed their own affiliate, the Just Society, and picked their own project — the Social Planning Council, a body which they considered the most vulnerable of the various agency networks. The council was established to research social welfare needs and recommend how agencies should be set up to meet these needs.

The Just Society people shared the view that problems currently being treated by welfare were social rather than individual. They attacked statements by leading members of the Social Planning Council which sought to ignore rising sentiment in favour of funding for self-help groups aspiring to effect social change. The SPC Board, for example, in late 1970 adopted a report which disavowed "any action which is illegal or politically partisan, or which may seriously or permanently alienate large segments of the community as a whole or those bodies which are responsible for and empowered to bring about effective and necessary change".

To remedy the situation, the reformers proposed a policy of social action leading to change, running a slate of candidates in the 1970 SPC elections to challenge the pro-establishment forces dominating the council in an attempt to force a change in attitudes. "The kind of program we envisage is the administration of SPC resources to enable groups and organizations consisting of the disadvantaged to have greater control over the conditions of their lives such that they have been relegated to being disadvantaged", the reform candidates told the SPC members. "Staff familiar with citizen organization, and funds for stimulation directed to this end would place the Social Planning Council in the forefront of social development," they maintained.

After some initial, minor successes — their first foray into the election arena netted 10 reform candidate seats —, they came up against a brick wall. In February, 1971, the United Community Fund threatened to withdraw its funding of the Social Planning Council unless the council stopped supporting the militant poor and other activist groups.

U of T political economist Stephen Clarkson unsuccessful Liberal majority candidate in the last Toronto elections and one of the SPC reformers, wrote in a July, 1971 Star article, "Money talks in the agency as loudly as it does in the corporate board room. It is the (United Community Fund) that establishes the limits within which agencies receive 'its' money are to be run."

"What the private sector fails to do under the bureaucratized weight of fund regulations is encourage innovative on the grass roots level and support community groups creatively interpreting the needs of their neighbourhood," he observed.

And, Clarkson concluded, "If politics is too important to be left to the politicians, welfare is too much a part of our social fabric to be left to the voluntary agencies."

Eventually, the reform movement died out, largely due to a split in the reform between those who believed the SPC was reformable and those who, according to Fisher, understood from their experience that big business control of the SPC was omnipotent.

Now, the Social Planning Council rests in peace, unbothered by constituents or its staff. For others, the war has escalated to an assault on the very concept of the United Appeal. The issues to which they draw attention indeed offer a severe indictment of the UA. It is a condemnation which goes to the roots of our society's treatment of social problems and catastrophes.

The rich use charity to avoid widespread consideration of social analysis and encourage, instead, non-rational sentimentalism. They assuage their own guilt and relax in the self-righteous glow of their good deeds, although they have created the very problems — by paying poor wages, laying off workers, etcetera — the charity bandaid is supposed to be treating.

By integrating their activities with government services UA-sponsored agencies grab control of government agencies and put themselves in the powerful position of determining overall social policy. J. C. Thackray, 1971 United Appeal campaign chairman, described government support for voluntary organizations as an evolving situation such that all the sponsored agencies operate on a "mix" of assistance from governments, United Appeal, and other fund sources.

In its 16th annual report, the United Community Fund cited its move toward establishing "formal relationships with both the provincial and municipal governments" as a 1971 highlight.

The affluent have resisted suggestions that the state assume full responsibility for these services, claiming the hand of government is cold and impersonal while assuming (or pretending) an often similar social service approach doesn't exist. More to their point is their realization that government - provided welfare services funded out of general taxation would significantly increase their tax bills beyond the relative pittance most of them donate to charity.

Their real complaint may very well be that these changes threaten their definition of charity, a definition which buttresses their social power.

Some business crows
Once formed a club,
And they met at noon
In a high-class pub.
They called each other
By their Christian names:
Charlie and Willie
And George and James.
And they said: "Friend crows
Our business creed
Is to help the weak
And all in need."
And they spoke grand words
At every dinner
Of their love for man
Whether saint or sinner.
But it's funny to note
Since the club was born
That the farmers around
Lost a lot more corn.

THE GRADUATE ASSISTANTS ASSOCIATION

Last spring the GSU published the GA REPORT. This report was comprehensive survey of the wages and working conditions of every teaching assistant, demonstrator, grader and marker employed by the University.

The major findings of the report were:

a) Although there was a provincial wage ceiling of $1800, ONLY 30% OF ALL GRADUATE ASSISTANTS WERE EARNING THAT AMOUNT. Despite the fact that the ceiling has now been increased to $2400, THERE HAS BEEN NO INCREASE IN PAY!

b) The average wage paid to GAs was less than $1000.

c) 28% of all graduate students are women, but they only comprise 16%

of the total of gas.

d) Although close to 40% OF ALL TEACHING IS DONE BY GAs, they have virtually NO REPRESENTATION OR VOICE IN ANY POLICY-MAKING PROCESSES WHICH AFFECT THEIR WORK. They have little voice concerning classroom size, content of the course or student-teacher ratios. Furthermore, there is no formal representation of GAs on any governing body of the University.

WHAT CAN BE DONE

The findings of the GA Report convinced a large number of graduate students that a union for graduate assistants was necessary. The GSU supported this move and has supplied some funds and office assistance to get the GAA started. The union is open to all demonstrators, teaching assistants, graders, markers, post-doctoral fellows, and fourth-year students who are employed by the University of Toronto. In July we asked the University for voluntary recognition; this was refused. This left us with no option but to form a legally certifiable union. Once we are certified, the University is required, by law, to enter into bargaining with us. Furthermore, according to law, they are required to bargain in good faith.

As a union, if successful in our bargaining, among the gains we can win are:

- a) Medical and fringe benefits. GAs are the only University employees who receive no medical or fringe benefits.
- b) Job security and seniority rights. Most GAs do not know from one year to the next whether they will be working. We can change that.
- c) Higher pay.
- d) A voice in the classroom regarding content, structure, and student-teacher ratios.
- e) Office space and office supplies.

WHAT YOU CAN DO

Already a sizeable number of GAs, from a variety of departments, have joined the GAA. You too can join the GAA. At present, the GAA has no formal existence. By your joining, you can create a well-functioning GAA, direct its future course, and formulate its policies.

There will be a series of meetings at the GSU, 16 Bancroft Ave, on November 7, 8 and 9. The meetings are scheduled from 4-6 on those days. The meetings will be both informational and organizational.

All GAs are urged to attend

For more information, contact your department's GSU representative or call the GSU at 928-7057, 6233 or 2391, and watch VARSITY for future announcements.

Aspiring mayors vow to make city liveable

By LORNE SLOTNICK

Making Toronto a "liveable" city is the most important issue in the December 4 municipal election, according to Alderman David Crombie, a candidate for mayor.

Attainment of this goal is dependent on peoples' "willingness to put some time and effort into their neighbourhoods," he told about 300 people in the congregation of the First Unitarian Church yesterday at a panel discussion with three Toronto mayoralty candidates.

Crombie said City Council alone cannot make Toronto more liveable, but quickly added that he could help save Toronto from degenerating into a city like Buffalo better than could his opponents, Aldermen David Rotenberg and Tony O'Donohue.

O'Donohue contended that the main issue in the election is "what we hand to our kids". He stressed clean water and clean air, but did not explain how the city could accomplish much in the fight against pollution, which is mainly a provincial responsibility.

Rotenberg voiced concern over the maintenance of the "integrity of City Council" so that council can "continue to implement policies" to improve the city.

Two candidates, Toronto Sun columnist Paul Rimstead and League for Socialist Action candidate Jacquie Henderson were not invited to the meeting. A spokesman claimed these two announced their intentions to run too late to be invited.

All three candidates came out in favour of ongoing dialogue with citizens' groups and each suggested proposals for more accessibility to the mayor by the public. O'Donohue said he would like to "get on television or radio every week".

Rotenberg praised the Official Plan as an "umbrella of protection over all stable neighbourhoods", but Crombie disagreed.

"The Official Plan is becoming part of the problem, not part of the solution," Crombie said. He cited the Quebec-Gothic and South of St. James town areas, both of which were designated for high-rise development by the Plan but where residents fought to preserve the neighbourhoods.

Both Crombie and Rotenberg defended the recent 100 per cent pay raise for aldermen, arguing that they have a full-time job. O'Donohue called the pay raise a "rotten decision" and denied that he was playing politics in opposing it.

All three said they would refuse campaign contributions from developers, but there was disagreement on whether or not the names of contributors should be released.

O'Donohue said he would release the names of his contributors, but not until after the election. Crombie called this proposal "a bit of a fraud", and promised the release of the names of his financial supporters before the election. Rotenberg announced he would not publish a "sucker list".

O'Donohue continued his campaign to "bring back respect for the family". He is suited for this role, he said, because he is an "average, ordinary-type fellow".

He also emphasized pollution, claiming that "I've got the answers". He did not say what the answers were, but later reaffirmed his support for the Spadina Expressway.

Crombie called for a new hallmark for the city: "a sense of time and a sense of place". He explained that buildings should not be torn down without considering why they were built.

Rotenberg says he wants to continue being part of the process that "has seen Toronto become great". This greatness includes ensuring the protection of neighbourhoods and old buildings, he said.

Socialist presents program for New York

A New York City mayoralty candidate says socialists must turn the coming mass ferment among workers into "a collective fist" of disenchanted trade unionists, unorganized workers and welfare rights organizers.

Tony Chaitkin, New York Labour Committee candidate in the 1973 mayoralty race told 10 people at the International Student Centre last week that the campaign is more significant than next week's presidential election.

The New York Labour Committee is part of the International Caucus of Labour Committees, described by Chaitkin as a "revolutionary socialist cadre organization" dedicated to building a mass working class party.

Chaitkin said that next week's election result is a foregone conclusion, but the special circumstances of New York City made the upcoming mayoralty race a key place for socialists to intervene and "crystallize the interests of the working class", beginning a general assault of mass strikes against world capitalism.

The international monetary crisis will soon force bourgeois politicians to introduce austerity programs, anti-strike laws and slave labour for people forced to live on welfare, said Chaitkin. There is no further room for promises of reforms and other liberal measures, because the electorate will not believe such promises any more.

This is especially true in a city as run-down as New York, which Chaitkin described as a cesspool, with rotting garbage, decaying housing and "hundreds of thousands of people unemployed". In such a situation, there is "no historic role for liberals in the U.S." asserted Chaitkin. He added that the old-line Communist Party is "running a sideshow".

He proposes using bond payments, corporate property and bank reserves to finance the reconstruction of the city, thus providing work by pulling together blacks, whites, welfare recipients, organized and unorganized workers.

These socialist ideas are explosive now, he said, and because New York is the financial capital of the world, the implementation of his program would shake the foundations of the world capitalist class.

The Labour Committee strategy is to reach out for the few hundred genuine "fighters, militants" in working class and welfare rights organizations in the United States. Chaitkin called these people "the most valuable people of the human race".

LEGAL AID

On the second floor of 44 St. George St. is located the Campus Legal Aid Centre. The centre, run by funds obtained from the S.A.C., provides a wide range of legal counsel and advice. One of the main areas of concern is the landlord-tenant act, since many legal difficulties emanate from the abuse of this piece of legislation. The centre is run by student volunteers from the Faculty of Law, whose time and dedication allow the programme to continue to operate. Never feel that any difficulty is too minor to handle. In fact, much of their work is processing legal forms for various purposes. In an effort to provide added service this year, a lawyer is being commissioned to aid the centre for a few hours per week. Such an effort will provide added expertise to the facilities already available.

If ever you need legal help, the Campus Legal Aid Centre is here to help you. Any student with a legal problem is encouraged to make full use of this SAC sponsored service. It is on the second floor of 44 St. George St. The Phone number is 928-6447.

Blues defeat Hawks 9-2, win tournament

U of T Blues won the Hockey Canada regional tournament last night, defeating Waterloo Lutheran Golden Hawks 9-2. Toronto now advances to the December finals in Hamilton.

However Blues played their most impressive game of the weekend Saturday afternoon, defeating Waterloo Warriors 4-3 in double overtime (the game lasted for three and three-quarters hours). Friday night's Qrd game, won by this year's team, was dull by comparison.

In the Saturday afternoon game Blues goals were scored by Doug Tate, Bruce Herridge, and Harry Sems, while Mike Keenan scored the winner for Toronto at two minutes into the second period of overtime.

Goalenders Bruce Durno and Jake Dupuis (Waterloo), were awarded two stars of the game — the other went to Keenan for his winning goal. On the winning goal Keenan carried the puck into the Waterloo end, slipped around the defence, cut in front of the crease, and dumped the puck into the net.

The game was marred by poor refereeing on the part of Jim Sandluck, chief referee in the Kitchener area. Blues were given 25 minutes in penalties plus a ten-minute misconduct to Tate, while the Warriors were only awarded eight minutes during the entire game.

Warriors' captain Roger Kropf ran at Toronto players throughout the game. Sandluck did not call any penalties on these occasions, but penalized Blues players for reciprocating. (There were several other instances of poor officiating.)

However, Durno and Blues' penalty killers successfully wore away minutes when the team was shorthanded.

Prior to the game, Blues' coach Tom Watt was "rather worried" because of the reports he had heard about the Waterloo team. He was not surprised by the Warriors' strong showing but was satisfied that the Toronto team successfully killed off the penalties without overreacting to the other team. Watt added that the team played "very well considering it was shorthanded for 17 minutes more than its opponents — almost a full period".

In Blues' undisputed win last night Don Pagnutti, Ivan McFarlane and Harry Sems were high scorers for Blues, each with two goals. Blues other markers came from Mike Keenan, Bill Bubba, and Neil Korzack, Kent Ruhnke assisted on four goals, while Bob Tate assisted on two others.

Ivan McFarlane's second goal — the final goal of the game — was scored unassisted on a quick shot from a faceoff.

Pagnutti, Ruhnke and Bauer were chosen the three stars of the game.

The game was a well-played hockey performance. Forwards hackchecked well, the defence remained solid, and although Durno went relatively untested in goal compared to Lutheran's George Blinkhorn (Blues outshot the Golden Hawks 52-26), he was capable when called upon.

Bruce Herridge and Nick Holmes were especially effective in a penalty-killing capacity, particularly when Blues were two men short. (Lutheran had no shots on the Toronto net when Blues were shorthanded.)

This game was also marked by minor skirmishing with Blues captain Gord Davies being sent off for a ten-minute misconduct when he asked the referee why he was making "insane calls". (John Alaska refereed last night's game.)

Pagnutti led Blues' scoring attack against the Grads Friday night with four goals and an assist as this year's team defeated the former all stars 10-6. Other goals were scored by Harry Sems, Neil Korzack; Kent Ruhnke (2), Ivan McFarlane, and Doug Tate. Scoring for the Grads were Bob Bauer, Bob McLelland, Terry Peterman, Doug Jones, Steve Monteith, and Don Fuller.

The Grads were able to stay in the game without showing signs of tiring, although the team only had a week to condition itself.

Blues took a fast lead in the first period on Kent Ruhnke's goal at 0:55. Before the end of the period the lead had been extended to 5-2.

The second period was highlighted by poor defensive work on the part of the Blues, allowing the Grads to score three goals. Tom Little played well in goal for the Grads, despite the team's somewhat porous defence. Blues outshot the Grads 49-32.

Blues regular schedule opens with a game Friday evening against McMaster in Hamilton.

Blues runners win OUAA

The U of T cross-country team won the OUAA cross country championship at Guelph Saturday.

Toronto captured the Little Cup with a low point total of 27. Western was second with 79, and Waterloo third with 84. York placed fourth, (88), Guelph, fifth (90), Laurentian, sixth (148), and Queen's, last (154). Other teams participating (including Brock and McMaster) were incomplete and their scores were not tabulated.

Dave Northey (University of Waterloo) finished in first place, in a time of 31 minutes, 51 seconds, over a course approximately six miles in length.

The U of T team placed five members in the top ten. Joe Saxe finished second (32:02), John Sharpe, third (32:07), Paul Glynn, fifth (32:33), Brad Morley, seventh (32:47), and Bob Knuckey, tenth (33:09).

In a field of 55 finishers, Peter Pimm, came in twenty-first in 34:04, while Chris Beardsley was 45th in 37:09.

Toronto advances to the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union finals at RMC this weekend.

John Sharpe placed fourth, Joe Saxe, 11th, Paul Glynn, 14th, John Cartwright, 64th, Bob Knuckey, 67th, and Luther Holton, 120th, in a field of about 160 participants.

The University of Guelph was the only other Canadian university to attend. The meet was won by Lehigh University of Bethlehem, Pennsylvania.

Blues undefeated; meet York next

Soccer Blues concluded a nearly faultless league record by proving once more to be inhospitable hosts, defeating Western Mustangs 7-3 Saturday at Varsity Stadium.

However, Blues were taken aback by the hard pressing Western offensive in the first half of the game. Only after Western had come within one goal of tying the game did Blues begin to gain the upper hand.

From the start the game was a wide-open attacking contest on both sides. Both teams applied pressure constantly, but Western was unable to capitalize on several scoring opportunities from close in. Blues defense was not as tight in the initial stages of the game as it has been in other games throughout the season.

Mustangs' defense blocked shots by Peter Hillier and Vito Polera, although the team's defensive coverage was similar to the Blues — shaky. The Western team was slow to cover and clumsy in clearing, offering the Blues several chances.

Blues scored first only twelve minutes into the game. A late tackle on striker Ron Misurka resulted in a free kick just outside the Western penalty area. Tim Burns' shot, although not strongly hit, glanced off the side of the defensive wall and eluded the goal keeper.

Guisepe D'Antoni and Polera used speed on the wings to create many scoring chances as the team broke apart the Western defence, vainly struggling to cover the width of the field.

Blues then paid the penalty for squandering their chances when team captain Victor Jonz converted a rebound in front of Blues' net. (Home keeper Joe Dattolico had just stopped a Western drive on a fast break down Mustangs right wing.)

The Toronto advantage was restored 35 minutes into the game when (as on numerous occasions this year) the team used a free kick to good effect. From the left side of the goal Burns floated the ball towards the far post, while Misurka headed the ball into the opposite corner from the right side, bypassing a static Mustang defence. Before half time Misurka was put in the clear by D'Antoni to score again, and end the half at 3-1, Blues.

Blues played more conservatively in the early stages of the second half, preserving their lead. But as a result Western was allowed to press forward more often.

Mustangs were able to score their second goal of the game only fifteen minutes into the half. Two Blues' errors — a delayed clearance, followed by a badly misdirected one — left a Mustang forward clear on the right. The hard cross from a Western player was directed home by Dave Burroughs.

Faced with the clear possibility of an equalizing goal at this point, Toronto decided that attack would be the best form of defense. In the muddy playing conditions, moves were slickly directed down the wings by fullbacks Ed Carter and Bob Cazzola.

Within a couple of minutes of the Western goal Polera sent a cunning lob into the visitors' goalmouth which the goalkeeper — under pressure from John Cobby — was merely able to palm away. As the ball bounced out to the edge of the six-yard box, D'Antoni lunged forward and sent a diving header into the corner of the net to make the score 4-2.

Soon after, an interpassing play down the right ended with Polera releasing a through ball for Vince Iurello, streaking down the middle. Speeding clear, he sent the ball beyond the keeper's outstretched hands.

By now the Blues had command of the game, and D'Antoni scored his second goal on an individual effort, riding two bone-crunching tackles and slipping the ball into the net.

With four minutes left in the game Blues notched their seventh goal as Polera scored on a through ball from Hillier.

In the last minute of play Mustangs' Bill Hook headed Western's third goal into Blues' net after a corner kick.

Blues, unbeaten in regular season play, now travel to York on Wednesday to play for the OUAA championship (kickoff at 2 pm). Wednesday's opponents will be Eastern Division winners, York Yeomen. (Yeomen also finished their regular season schedule unheaten.)

Blues finish second; lose 13-9 to Queen's Strong checking, good scoring opportunities, and Blues' defensive lapses enabled Queen's water polo team to defeat Toronto 13-9 Saturday in Hart House.

The win breaks a two-way tie for first place in the Eastern Section. Queen's finishes first, having won two out of three games against Toronto, while the Blues end up second. Both teams play in the OUAA championships next weekend at York.

The opening minutes of the game set the tone for the first half. Queen's got off to an aggressive start; the team was more than ever determined to win after the previous weekend's 5-3 loss to Toronto. During the opening period the Blues seemed disorganized, while the Gaels played as a coordinated unit.

Gaels' Jaychowski scored the opening goal, and before the period ended, the Kingston team had added three more on goals by Nesbitt, Patterson, and a penalty shot by Kasprzyk. Wiebach scored for Toronto and while McNaught added a goal on a penalty shot. In the words of Blues' forward McNaught "we lost our cool in the first half."

The second period saw the Blues still disorganized and playing a reckless game. Queen's added three goals in the period to Toronto's single. Both McNaught and Wiebach were forced to fire from some distance out because of Gaels' close checking. Both shot high or wide when they might have elected to use up time to pass. Neither scored in the period. Blues' lone goal came from Adam Gesing early in the period.

The Toronto team members were not checking their opponents closely, and goaltender Vitold Gesing, playing with an injured finger, was not demonstrating the skill of the previous weekend.

The Queen's defense, by comparison, was all over the Toronto team as soon as it got into the Gaels' end. McNaught seemed to be singled out for the most cover. Even though this left Blues' other top scorer, Wiebach, relatively unguarded, he also failed to score. Queen's Whately (high man for the Gaels in the game with four goals) scored one goal and added other off a penalty shot, while Howard made it 7-3.

Playing more cohesively in the third period Blues were able to outscore Queen's for the first time in the game and came out of the period with only a three goal deficit (10-7).

McNaught was able to elude his checker for one goal and fired in another on a penalty shot. Poulter added Blues other two goals, both on penalty shots.

Blues also missed what could have been a good chance on a McNaught to Heatley pass. Heatley didn't see the ball drop behind him and a Queen's forward picked it up.

The Gaels carried the ball down to the Toronto end of the pool and after Gesing had stopped one shot Gaels' Jaychowski scored on the rebound.

Jaychowski also scored his second goal of the period (third goal of the game) with goaltender Gesing und serving a foul. Although a forward tended goal, Blues had no chance.

It was one of those games for Blues' goalie Vitold Gesing as Queen's poured in 13 goals.

Queen's was fortunate on the team's third goal of the period. The team may have realized that Gesing was not playing well, since Nesbitt scored toward the end of the period from two-thirds of the way down the pool into the left corner. Gesing didn't even move on the shot.

In the fourth period, Blues' defensive lapses made it easier for Gaels' to guarantee a win. Forwards were not getting back fast enough and there was too little checking by the Toronto players in front of their own net. Blues weren't covering their opposing man. On the few times when McNaught had the ball he was able to score Blues' only other two goals of the game.

Blues lost a good chance to make the score 10-8 early in the fourth period when Queen's goaltender, Earle, stopped a penalty shot by Wiebach. Whately scored soon after to put the game even further out of reach.

The best goal of the game came from McNaught in the slot on a backhand shot after a pass from Hanna. Shortly after, McNaught received his first of two personal fouls in the period and Queen's Nesbitt scored his third goal of the game. (McNaught later scored again to add Blues' final marker.)

Queen's Muir scored the Gaels' last goal while McNaught was serving his second personal foul.

Blues coach said after the game that "the team hasn't been checking. They are losing the ball too soon... and don't take advantage of the front zone (in front of the opposing team's net) to move around when the referee blows the whistle to stop play."

He admitted that "Queen's checking was too tight... and the goals were very well-aimed from the corners. It's the first time I've seen them do it that way", he added. He also said luck entered into Queen's high score, adding that the key goal was Wiebach's missed penalty shot in the fourth period. Queen's was dominant from then on.

McNaught said the Blues is a young team and that although the forwards were strong and experienced, the defense was relatively inexperienced. "The Queen's team has been playing together as a team for three straight years," he added.

In the Toronto-Ottawa game, and a substitute goaltender in for Gesing, Blues won 15-7. Ottawa led 4-2 after the first period, but it was Toronto, 6-5 at the half.

In the second half Blues scored heavily in the fourth quarter, with Wiebach and McNaught each scoring three times. (Wiebach scored seven of Toronto's goals in the game.) Other scorers were Adam Gesing, Martin, Heatley, and Butler. For Ottawa it was Duncan with three, Johnson, two, and Brassat and Zajchowski both with singles.

In other games Saturday, Queen's defeated York 9-8 by scoring six goals in the final period, while York won over Ottawa, 10-6.

Support lukewarm for fees demo

The fees demonstration scheduled for Queen's Park November 21 has so far received mixed support from student councils at U of T.

In attempting to organize the demonstration, Victoria University Students' Administrative Council has received positive support from the Graduate Students' Union and Innis and University College.

St. Michael's College, Scarborough, Nursing and Medicine student councils have voted not to support the demonstration, while most others have not committed themselves.

VUSAC took the initiative after SAC decided not to support the demonstration. It attempted to persuade other councils to help organize the protest.

VUSAC president Gord Barnes says "We are quite excited. There certainly is a lot more optimism now than after SAC's decision against a demonstration."

Meanwhile, SAC president Eric Miglin and vice-presidents John Hellwell and Ross Flowers announced yesterday that SAC's decision would be reconsidered tonight. Support for the demonstration can be expected at least from SAC representatives of the councils which are aiding Vic's effort, as well as Erindale College.

Miglin said earlier yesterday that he strongly doubted that SAC would reverse its position.

Innis College Council has contributed $50, and the Graduate Students Union $25 to the campaign. GSU is behind the demonstration wholeheartedly; according to executive assistant Larry Hoffman.

Also supporting the demonstration and encouraging participation is the UC Lit. Last week, the Lit requested its SAC representatives to ask SAC at its meeting tonight to reconsider its decision.

But, president Vicki Grabb says, "I don't personally think a demonstration will work. There are other ways to deal with the problem."

Grabb believes the proposed fee strike would be more effective.

She stated that the government knows students oppose fee hikes, and fears the demonstration may be detrimental to students' public image.

In an unusual move, Innis College principal Peter Russell has announced he will attend the demonstration.

He is not going as a "banner-waving shouting participant", he says, but to see that the student demonstrators are not misrepresented by the media.

Erindale's SAGE, other than asking its SAC reps to try to ask SAC to reconsider its position, will not support the demonstration. The council feels there are too many councils against it for it to be effective.

The Medical Society, according to communications director Barry Tepperman, voted against the proposed protest because it was "not a particularly effective means of demonstrating opposition to the government."

He added that the society still supports the OFS demands.

The Scarborough College Student Society voted unanimously against supporting the demonstration, according to president David Onley, because "nothing will come of it except that it will harden the government's position."

The Faculty of Nursing Student Council also opposed the protest unanimously. President Diane Johnson expressed the council's feeling that it would not be an effective means of protesting the cutback in student aid, and the fees increase.

A tactic suggested by SAC president Eric Miglin, that of writing letters to the government, was "far better" in her opinion.

St. Michael's College Senate president Al Nigro said his council opposed the VUSAC proposal because it was not a proper way to handle the fees increase opposition.

New College council president Fares Boulos doubts that many people will attend the demonstration, but he believes New College will support it in principle.

"I won't go out myself, but I will support it," says Boulos. "I am very anxious to see something happening."

He is afraid that if nothing is done now there will be further fee hikes next year.

The Stop-the-Cut-Backs Committee, headed by last year's SAC vice-president Phil Dack, is preparing a leaflet to explain the purpose of the demonstration to students.

The committee is composed of various left groups, unaffiliated individuals and some college council activists.

Dack believes there is "no way we (students) will ever turn public opinion in our favour. The demonstration will either have no effect or it will have a positive effect. I don't think it will be negative."

Miglin thinks that the demonstration must either be supported by all U of T students' councils or not be held at all. He is getting in touch with college councils to see where support lies; he strongly doubts SAC will reverse its position.

Miglin contends that there are alternatives to a demonstration, such as the proposed letter-writing campaign.

Although SAC does not support the proposed demonstration, it is still planning the fee strike and other projects which may put pressure on the government to reverse the fee hikes.

Two weeks ago SAC's decision not to participate in the OFS province-wide demonstration led to doubts that the demonstration could be mounted successfully.

However, after VUSAC picked up the torch, OFS general co-ordinator Craig Heron said the protest would take place no matter what. It is timed to coincide with the opening of the provincial legislature, to make the maximum publicity impact on a government that has so far hedged little on its position.

Opposition to the increase in tuition fees and aid cutbacks have been considered a factor in the government's decision to lower the age of independence for eligibility for OSAP awards one year. Universities and Colleges Minister Jack McNic has also announced that tuition fees will not be raised again next year.

Library system to stay open over holidays, says Forster

A proposal to close the library system over the Christmas holidays has been dropped, U of T vice-president Don Forster said yesterday.

The library system will be closed on Christmas Day, Boxing Day, and New Year's Day only. The Sigmund Samuel Library will be open from nine to five all other days, while the extension library will be open for its normal hours.

"Reaction (to the proposal) would not suggest that it be accepted," Forster said at a meeting of the Academic Affairs Committee in Simcoe Hall.

There was a "misunderstanding of the impact of the closing," he said. Forster had contacted the Graduate Students Union, the Students' Administrative Council and the Association of Part-time Undergraduates Students for their reactions to the proposal. GSU and SAC were strongly opposed, while APUS president Kurt Loeb did not object.

Forster, asked why he had not contacted any faculty associations for their reactions to the proposal, replied, "I was too busy answering calls from faculty members to call any faculty organization."

The plan to close down the library for 10 days system came from the U of T personnel department. It would have affected all U of T administrative employees — except those involved in essential services.

"The motivation was a good one," Forster said. "It is common practice in non-profit institutions and even in industry to do this," he said.

Committee member and School of Graduate Studies dean Ed Safarian objected strongly to unnecessary closing of university facilities on holidays and weekends. He stated there were students working in unheated university rooms on weekends.

"The university has obligations to the people who work here," he said, "but it also has its obligations to the students."

Madison Ave. residents fight to save homes

By BRIANE NASIMOK

The Varsity—Frank Rooney

These Madison Avenue homes may be wrecked by a developer. Residents will protest at city hall today.

Residents of 10 houses on Madison Avenue and Huron Street are trying to stop Amex Development Corporation from evicting nearly 100 people, and halt plans for demolition until City Council has reviewed the situation.

The fight, led by the Annex Ratepayers Association, is attempting to stop any demolition by getting the area downzoned, so it can not be used for commercial use, such as for high-rises. Although there have been no applications for demolition permits, they can be obtained with little difficulty.

The notice of eviction was given on November 1 with no warning. The houses are north of Tartu College on Bloor Street and south of Lowther.

City Council's Building and Development Committee Monday voted to set up a committee of five private citizens and Development Commissioner Graham Emslie to look into this situation, and the whole problem of downzoning and control of streets. The committee must be ratified by City Council which meets this afternoon.

U of T political economy professor David Nowlan, an Annex Ratepayers director and a nominee to the committee, said that Ar property manager, D. A. Sewell would not agree to delay the evictions. Nowlan speculated that if City Council ratifies the committee, Sewell would co-operate.

Some tenants have to be out by Saturday, Nowlan said, but most have until December 30. He stressed the importance of an early decision on the eviction by Amex.

Nowlan elaborated on the significance of the committee, saying that in the past municipal government was unable to "come to grips, directly", with such problems. He views the Madison-Huron situation as a "test case".

"The houses are in excellent condition and house a lot of people, cheaply," he said.

Although the present zoning encourages Amex to develop the area, Nowlan felt if condominiums and high-rises were erected in the area, present tenants could not afford to live in the area and would be forced to move into the suburbs. The houses are also of historical significance, architecturally.

The Building and Development Committee also passed a motion asking the city solicitor to look into the provincial government's policies on delaying demolition for 60 days.

Meanwhile, another house at 37 Madison will be turned into offices by lawyer Paul Copeland, says Innis professor Joe Medjuek, one of the tenants. Three families will have to move.

Copeland converted a Prince Arthur Avenue house into an office earlier, according to Medjuek.

If the fight for downzoning had been won, he could not commercialize the house.

A & S union vetoes fees demo

By BOB BETTSON

The council of the new Arts and Science Student Union last night decided it could not support the November 21 fees demonstration or oppose the planned amalgamation of local university libraries into an enlarged Sigmund Samuel collection.

The council's inaugural meeting, attended by 30 of its approximately 45 members, sustained chairman Boh Anderson's rulings that these motions were unconstitutional because they involved the union taking a policy-making role.

A compromise resolution by former SAC vice president Phil

Duck to "disseminate information to all member bodies concerning the demonstration" passed unanimously, however.

A similar motion calling for dissemination of information on the library question was also passed.

A five person temporary steering committee was elected to carry on the functions of the executive until it is elected at the next meeting. Its members included Gregory Kanowitch, UC student Rick MacFarlane, History Students Union executive Gus Richardson and Erindale student Mike Scott.

The steering committee was given the right to fund course unions with up to $200 each before their budgets are submitted at the next meeting. A $200 contingency fund was also set up.

The council will meet again before December 8 to discuss the budget, as well as constitutional amendments.

On Monday the Trinity Board of Stewards reversed its previous stand and ratified the ASSU constitution. It decided that since union was going to be formed no matter what Trinity did then the college should participate.

The St. Michael's College Student Senate is the only college or course union which had not yet ratified the union.

Enrolment increase forecast

By NADIM WAKEAM

Long term enrolment projections for all U of T campuses show an increase each year from 1971-71 to 1977-78. However, full-time enrolment on the St. George campus, including only graduate and undergraduate figures is expected to decrease from this year to next year.

A report on projected enrolment compiled by the university's Office of Statistics and Records, was presented Monday to the Planning and Resources Committee of the Governing Council.

Full-time enrolment on the St. George campus this year is 21,909 and the 1973-74 projection is 21,840 the report states. Total enrolment including part-time, graduate and undergraduate students is expected to increase by the equivalent of 306 full-time students next year to 26,053. After that St. George enrolment is expected to increase steadily until 1977-78, when it is expected to reach the equivalent of 28,180 full-time students.

(Total enrolments are given in terms of equivalents of full-time students, as the university uses a formula to evaluate part-time students as full-time.)

The number of first year full-time students in degree programs is projected to decrease from 4136 students this year to 3860 next year. First year enrolment after that is also expected to increase until 1978.

Erindale and Scarborough Colleges are expected to expand at a greater rate than the main campus, mainly due to a projected increase in full-time enrolment.

Scarborough is expected to have 3,719 full-time students by 1977, compared to its present 1960. Erindale's 2166 will grow to 4522, the report says.

The increase in enrolment, particularly on the St. George campus, is due to the large number of new part time students. Next year's part-time enrolment for the main campus is projected to increase by the equivalent of 475 full-time students.

According to vice-president Jack Sword, who presented the statistics to the committee, there is an error or margin of flexibility as high as plus or minus 10 per cent.

He added, however, that "this university's projections have been very accurate lately, only having an error of two per cent at most."

This accuracy, said chairman James D. Lewis, was due to the large number of students who wish to go to U of T, allowing the university to almost set its own enrolment. He added that the size of urban Toronto and the favourable economic location of U of T permits the error to be small.

Budget projections from 1971-72 to 1977-78 were also presented at the meeting.

Projected operating grants based on student enrolment will be increased by approximately five million dollars next year. Grants from 1974 to 1977 will also increase but at a much lower rate, until the total university operating grants (excluding the three federated colleges) reach approximately $104.5 million.

The projected grants are based on the present "basic income unit", a measure used to formulate grants on a per student, basis remaining at next year's level of $1825.

However, the total capital budget projections, said Alex Rankin, chairman of the U of T Budget Committee, predict a deficit of $2.9 million.

The deficit will occur because renovations, such those taking place at University College and the Wallberg building, will exceed the funds available for renewal of buildings explained Rankin.

"We will come to a point where we just can't do any more renovations", he predicted.

Both the enrolment and budget projections are background for reports that will be presented to the Committee on University Affairs. Every university in Ontario annually informs the Committee of its financial situation.

"Because of the debt," said U of T president John Evans, "it is important that the provincial committee know the problem."

The Planning and Resources Committee discussed in camera the membership of the subcommittee that will present the U of T brief to the CUA.

The priorities outlined by the committee to be stressed by the U of T to the CUA include an enrolment analysis with reference to high school enrolment and curricula.

Part-time and continuing education will be examined with respect to integrating the two with full-time studies.

The plight of graduate students, faced with a fees increase of $100 this year and nearly $300 next year, while pay for teaching assistance is expected to remain static, will be brought to the attention of the provincial body.

The nature and role of the federated college system will be stressed, as well as the problem of its future relation to the university. Federated colleges are in the midst of a financial crisis because they do not receive full provincial grants.

Quebec students may strike

MONTREAL (CUPI) — Quebec community college (CEGEP) students may strike this month to protest provincial education laws.

The issue is expected to be raised at a meeting of the general assembly of the Front Etudiant du Quebec (FEQ) scheduled for Quebec City this weekend.

The laws would result in limiting CEGEP enrolments to students who could afford it without performing outside employment during the school term.

The Quebec government also wants compulsory weekly class time increased to 45 hours. It plans to reduce the credit given to humanities and philosophy classes from two to one and increase the science credit to two.

The time increase would force students working to finance their education to quit their jobs. The move would limit enrolment to primarily middle class students.

The result would contradict the original concept of the CEGEP's which was to move toward universal accessibility to higher education. The government now charges no tuition fees to CEGEP students which results in a solid working class student population.

Another government proposal would give CEGEP administrators the right to exclude students they dislike. The proposal comes from students strikes last spring after the general strike by the common front of labor unions in Quebec.

The government wanted students to make up the days missed because of the common front strike which included CEGEP teachers. Students at the Rosemont CEGEP in Montreal walked out in protest and the FEQ organized walk-outs across the province. The government backed down in the face of organized student opposition.

Davis to meet OFS reps

Premier Bill Davis has agreed to a 45 minute meeting with executives of the Ontario Federation of Students on November 16, five days before a mass demonstration scheduled for Queen's Park.

OFS general co-ordinator Craig Heron was "surprised" to hear from Davis, two weeks after OFS asked for a meeting.

"I was beginning to think we'd never hear from him", said Heron.

Davis will speak to six OFS representatives, one of whom will "almost certainly" be U of T SAC President Eric Miglin, according to Heron. He said OFS will discuss "things that students are unhappy about", in particular student loan ceiling reductions and tuition fee increases.

Part-time workers easy prey for poor wages and conditions

High school and university students, anxious for any part-time work in these jobless days, are easy prey for businessmen who recognize the potential cheap labour market.

Today's page live documents one case in which students, mainly from high schools, labour under less than favourable conditions. It isn't an exception. Talking to students with part-time jobs, one quickly learns of the poor pay and equally unattractive working conditions which characterize the positions open to them.

Exploited by people operating businesses (after all, a capitalist economy is based on the employer getting the most he can out of his workers), the student workers are becoming increasingly discontent. But, what can they do about it? As unemployment soars, confident employers can tell their employees to follow orders or quit, aware that replacements won't be hard to find.

The students could organize to fight management, but part-time employees aren't protected by the Ontario Labour Relations Act and would be easy picking for disgruntled bosses.

A necessary first step seems to be bringing part-time workers under the protection of the act. And, some kind of grouping of high school and university labourers would probably be the appropriate body to agitate for the necessary legislation and simultaneously upgrade their working conditions.

Don't punish victims

Ever since Edmund Burkers disrupted a spring, 1971 Convocation Hall meeting featuring leftist speakers, Simcoe Hall has been nervously secreting away gatherings which may be the scene for a replay of that afternoon's events.

(The Burkers threw a mace bomb into the audience after they failed to end the meeting by heckling the speakers. In the ensuing scuffle, windows in the front doors to the hall were broken. As late as last year, the university — in its strange sense of justice — was trying to get the meeting's sponsors to pay for the damage their opponents did.)

Simcoe Hall's favourite hiding place for suspect meetings has been the remote Faculty of Education auditorium, seating less than one third the capacity of the central Convocation Hall. Black Panther leader Bobby Seale was the latest speaker to get shunted to the Bloor Street exit. Perhaps, the administrators were doubly worried because the Western Guard, successors to the Burkers, had threatened earlier this fall to disrupt all black and Marxist meetings held on campus.

Nonetheless, there can be no justification for living in constant fear of right-wing extremists' disruptions. By giving in to them, the administration is letting them know that they can decide who can speak where.

This abdication of the university's duty to ensure freedom of speech for political dissidents cannot continue. The university has a campus security force; it can be summoned to keep right-wing rowdies out of campus meetings or eject them if they get in and violently disrupt them.

And, those who would not let others speak should be warned that renewed disturbances will keep them, not their opponents, silent on this campus.

The aggressors, not the victims, should be penalized for their actions.

What's he doing?

Contrary to Engineering rumour, The Varsity will not publish an "extra" this week. The Varsity will not be responsible for any clandestine publication almost bearing its name which may appear on campus Thursday or Friday. Such a publication bears no resemblance to newspapers living or dead, save the Tolke Oike.

Gains from high unemployment

Sports store exploits students

By BOB GAUTHIER

Collegiate Sports is one of a large number of companies to benefit from the high level of unemployment by hiring high school students and then subtly forcing them to accept the company's conditions.

Collegiate Sports — "the nobody that undersells everybody" — underpays and overworks its high school staff.

To train the newcomers to the system and its demands owner John Lennox decided recently to run a smiling contest for his employees with $65 in prizes as the pot. To win, all one had to do was have the best "customer smile". It reminds one of the Miss America contest — only it's your mouth that counts this time.

Lennox and his managerial underlings at the two stores, Ralph Emmerson and Martin Bunting, recruit their employees by word of mouth, chiefly from the local high schools near the stores. They then proceed to teach them the basic lessons of the capitalist system, namely that business is run much like an army — that is, along strictly authoritarian lines.

The management does not explicitly coerce its employees, but it does leave them little choice — quit or knuckle under.

Collegiate Sports in some cases narrowly brushes against the boundaries of Ontario labour law, and in one area may have already broken the law.

Provincial laws require that an employee receive a half hour break every five hours (whether paid or unpaid — at Collegiate it's unpaid). There have been occasions on busy Saturdays when employees have worked beyond the five-hour limit without such a break.

The high school students have expressed among themselves grievances about their hours. Some said that the company was so persistent in requiring them to come in to work at its call, they often had to decline in order to keep up with their schoolwork.

As for actual working hours, students have no choice. No one is allowed to work two Saturdays in a row and hours are assigned, although some effort is made to compromise with employees preferences.

Working conditions are also poor. In the west end store there was no soap in the washrooms for the month of September, and the dust and grime from summer construction (the inside of the store was largely constructed by high school students during early summer) make frequent wash-ups necessary.

On one occasion when I asked assistant manager Bob Moeller for a five-minute break during a par-

Collegiate does not like employees to turn down their "offer" of more work.

On a more recent occasion 15 minutes before closing time, assistant manager Tim Quinn informed three employees, including myself, that one of us would have to leave early, instead of, as usual, earning more money by staying to help clean up. The other two were in a car pool, so there wasn't much choice. The

The pay also varied from person to person — that is, the starting pay, for doing the same job. Pay begins for most employees at $1.50 and "progresses" to $1.65.

During the fall Collegiate held a series of five or six compulsory meetings to train employees about the product. Employees were paid for attending but, astonishingly, would not receive payment unless they stayed until the "end of arc capped off by an all-inclusive test, with the winners receiving portions of about $150 of Collegiate merchandise. The company felt it was doing students a favour by training them when in fact the company and not the students will benefit from the training.

The employees have been told that anyone doing poorly on the test would not be "staying on". No one mentioned whether or not those "laid off" would be paid for sitting through the product training meetings (lasting up to three hours per night).

However, to smooth over any discontent among the staff, it was announced two weeks ago that Lennox was throwing a party for the staff before the heavy selling season at Christmas began. Emmerson told the employees: "It is strongly suggested that you attend."

Students were also forced to buy a Collegiate "uniform" — two blue shirts with a Collegiate Sports "address" on the front — all for the low price of $4 each. Hair was not allowed to go below the shirt collar, regardless of how neat it was.

The final injustice came when students were compelled to sell Esso home oil burners on the side. They were told to wear a badge with the "eye-catching" phrase $15 reward".

When the customer asked an employee what the slogan meant, the employee was supposed to sell an Esso home oil burner. The student would receive $5 and the customer $15 worth of Collegiate merchandise if he signed in the store for the Esso package. Management did not disclose what it received in the deal.

But, as Lennox said recently to a captive audience of his employees, "Don't get me wrong, the place isn't a sweatshop."

The Varsity—Bob Gauthier

ticularly slack period, he replied no, but that I could take a cup of coffee onto the floor while I worked.

The terms of an employee's agreement tend to fluctuate also, according to management's discretion.

For example, I had agreed to work for the store during set times. On one occasion I was phoned before a big mid-week sale and told that "it would be appreciated" if I could come in and work extra time.

point is that for the second time within three weeks, Collegiate had broken a verbal agreement with an employee.

During the summer, high school students were working all day and into the evenings at "management's request" to complete the interior construction of the warehouse which they were converting. Students were allowed only a half hour break for supper, according to several of the student employees.

January" according to Bunting.

Earlier I had been told by Emmerson that employees "would receive the 'product knowledge meeting pay' after Christmas". There appears to be some confusion among management.

On one occasion when boss John Lennox saw some students sitting at a meeting without writing, he ordered them to get a piece of paper and a pen.

Reader disputes feature's facts

I am concerned that the article "Preventive genocide in Latin America" (Varsity, November 1) could be taken by many readers as a complete substantiation of the author's claim that the imperialistic U.S. government and its citizenry are bent on destruction of the Third World by means of genocidal birth control. There are certain criteria which have not been mentioned and some apparent misconceptions in this article which should be considered in such an issue, the most important of which I list here:

Many large industrialists are involved in such organizations as Planned Parenthood and the Hugh Moore Fund for tax reasons. Their large donations are duly recognized by these organizations who put these big names on their official stationery to encourage further contributions.

Population density, mentioned consistently in the article, is not the best means of determining whether or not there is a need for birth control as it does not take into consideration uninhabited, uninhabitable and non-arable land, or any ability of the country for supporting its population. Population growth rates are a more valid factor in discerning demographic problems, (Latin America's is the highest in the world) as is indigenous opinion.

Some of the organizations named, particularly the Population Reference Bureau, are devoted to a broader spectrum of demographic and population studies including mortality and migration as well as fertility, and deal mainly in research and information, not birth control.

In a rapidly changing demographic situation, data from the '50's and early '60's is of dubious value and outdated data is nearly always worthless.

Such sources as Catholic bishops and Fidel Castro, as used in the article, could well be held suspect of a biased opinion toward contraceptive practices and the United States.

It is unfortunate that the double standard of the author makes Fidel

Castro's advocacy of voluntary birth control a noble sentiment and such policies on the part of the U.S. government and various institutions in New York and London unmitigated genocide.

The article failed to consider that if the U.S. is to supply the means for rapidly cutting a country's death rate (ie technology, food, improved health) it must also offer the means of cutting the country's birth rate to keep a balance of population.

New agricultural methods mentioned in the article as the means by which larger populations can be supported are constantly being battled about by experts as to their plausibility and efficacy and their possible implementation and success in the near future is doubtful on both pragmatic and ecological grounds.

Finally, I think it is unfair to assert that all U.S. demographers, medical professionals, government officials, industrialists, and missionaries are plotting the annihilation of Latin American cheap labour. I will not defend all of them whole-heartedly, but there is the possibility that some are altruistic in their intentions.

Keep cars off main campus

Now is the time when most campus radicals and other university sweet-meats are putting away their placards, closing down their portable-radical-information-booths and in general collecting political chestnuts for what most Canadians can assuredly predict will be a long, cold, winter. Undoubtedly, most of these campus "tradrads" will be asking the pertinent question, "What causes will there be for the spring — aside from the usual habit of political fornication?"

The cause I am about to suggest is not exactly what I would call everyone's "cup of tea". It is one that does not concern "them", but rather concerns "us". The "us" to which I am referring is the collective body of individuals who spend more than five minutes a day in the university "environment".

"It's high time", to use a well worn cliché, that we started taking a look at the undesirable variables that are contaminating these surroundings. Anyone, having any sensitivity, should by now be objecting to the rather large number of "motor-vehicles" ("cars" for any visiting American) that pass through the streets of the university, trying to evade the rush-hour traffic along Bloor and Avenue Road. Not only should one object to the mechanical cacophony, but also the presence of the automobile, which does little to enshrine one's architectural sensitivity towards an already ugly campus.

Most people, no doubt, find this objection trivial. After all, the automobile is one of the more banal facts of existence in the twentieth century, is it not? "How?" they argue, can one "rip the guts out of the economy, when its staple diet is the automobile?" This is, of course, what such a movement would imply. "After all, the university is located in the heart of Canada's booming metropolis, Toronto. Besides, how would the City Council react to such an outrageous proposal?"

Frankly — and here I am playing the role of the radical stereotype — such arguments are irrelevant. They ignore the basic meaning of such a proposal. I think, it's time that people actually spent some time walking on the streets; it's time that they made an effort to examine the architectural environment, rather than wasting time hopping out of one building into their Buick and popping into another. They should — and here my verbal imagination fails me — become more aware of their environment. The university should, in a very real way, be contributing to — and here my language fails me again — the development of an environmental consciousness.

To link such a notion to something as trivial as making professors and students alike walk to their classes, even in the heart of Toronto's winter, simply because cars have been abolished from the campus, might sound far-fetched. And, I admit, that in the light of North American suburban values it is. But, in the light of the recent evidence re pollution, the proposal takes on a somewhat more realistic appearance.

We have all the information about noise pollution, and air pollution that we need. Now what's really needed is a bit of action. To put the point very bluntly, and in phraseology that the avid tv watcher can understand, "It would be a small step for the university and a giant step for the City of Toronto."

Practically speaking, the office at Sinecoe Hall could still take out its garbage, as I am thinking of malls only on Hoskin, St. George, and Devonshire. And, there would be enough room on all streets, in the event of a political crisis, for a police paddy-wagon to make its way to Sid Smith. But, the days of the "thruway" would be over, and for the first time it would be possible for one to really see that new library The Varsity has for so long been talking about...from a distance!

If this university has any hopes of Students tried to get busy Queen's Park Crescent closed to traffic last year. Letter writer suggests cars should be banned from all of St. George campus.

turning out an Einstein in the near future, it should take this proposal seriously. Any genius having the notion that he could think his ideas out while treading the green paths of the U of T would have the odds — 10-1 — against him (or her) of being struck down by the TTC.

Besides, it would give me great pleasure on the day in January, when Bill Davis has to pay a visit to John Evans, to see him treading across the barren landscape of the University Circle billowing clouds of steam, and to hear him say, once safely inside, sincerely, "It is a cold day...Isn't it?"

Silent majority accepts no demo

In response to your editorial regarding SAC's position on a proposed Demonstration at Queen's Park, I would like to correct one factual error on the part of The Varsity editorial board. The "negative student opinion" of the last week is non-existent. The whole thrust of the editorial is based on the assumption that the students did not approve of SAC's decision and that there has been great and unfavorable response. This is just not the case. Aside from the YS and some others who argued unsuccessfully at the SAC meeting, there has been no response, and I would be forced to assume that silence implies consent, or at least lack of flagrant and strong disapproval.

VUSAC, of course, has the right to take its own decision on the OFS motion as they are a member in their own right. But, that is the decision of their own council and should not be construed as morally or otherwise binding on SAC. As for a possible usurpation of SAC's rightful place on this campus, I do not see that as a justifiable or probable situation. Just as SAC has no right to overstep the prerogatives of VUSAC, so also VUSAC and other local councils do not have the right to overstep SAC's prerogatives. An attempt to organize Vic students is VUSAC's right, but in so far as they are Victoria University Students' Administrative Council, they should not organize a campus-wide student position after the legitimate campus-wide student council has made a decision.

Back to my original complaint, however, there was, is, and I anticipate there will be no wide-spread student opposition to SAC's position, only the lonely cries of frustrated and disappointed political hacks who couldn't get their way in the SAC meeting.

SAC hasn't forgotten fees

Recent news stories and editorials in the Varsity have apparently conveyed the mistaken impression that the SAC has lost interest in fighting the government's education cutbacks.

It is true that SAC voted against the OFS call for a province-wide demonstration at Queen's Park. SAC members questioned the effectiveness of a demonstration as an influence on the government; the council was concerned that the demonstration would negatively affect public support for our aims. It was felt that there would not be a great deal of interest on the part of U of T students, and the returns, in terms of interest and influence produced, were not felt to be worth the immense amount of effort involved in organizing a demonstration.

VUSAC, some other college councils, and The Varsity strongly questioned the SAC decision. The weights attached to various factors, especially the expected student involvement, were criticized by these groups. In response to this reaction, which was not large but was quite active, S.A.C. tonight will reconsider its decision on the demonstration.

But, the OFS demonstration aside, SAC certainly has not dropped the fight. Negotiations with the provincial government continue, and the OFS stand continues to have vigorous SAC support.

The organizational efforts necessary to carry out a fees boycott are being planned, should the boycott be called in late November.

In addition to these obvious efforts, SAC is working to develop contacts in the public media — newspapers, radio, and television — to present the student case and to defend the student position. We are pushing the Governing Council to take a stand on the issue. We will distribute the province-wide newspaper being produced by OFS later this month. We are planning letter writing campaigns — highly effective last spring in changing the government stand on Ontario Scholarships — among students, university personnel, alumni, university parents, and allied educational groups like high school teachers and students.

So, certainly SAC is not ceasing its efforts to fight the government's actions. The demonstration, we personally feel, has yet to be shown as a productive effort in terms of our end goals, but we are open to enlightenment on this matter. But whatever the decision on the demonstration, our resolve to continue campaigning against the OSAP cuts and the fees bikes remains.

Not enough food to feed people

I am writing in response to your important centre-page essay "Preventive genocide in Latin America", which discussed the question of U.S. aid and birth control measures in South America. As the absence in the article of source references for selected quotes makes it difficult to offer any refutation of specific points, I will confine myself to a general comment.

Latin America, in the 1930's, was a major grain-producing area, but by the mid-1960's they were importing grain in far greater quantities than they had ever exported it (Mar. Land and Food, by Lester R. Brown). The population growth rate of Latin America is 2.9 per cent, the highest rate for any major world region. Infant mortality in Latin America, much of it due to malnutrition, is amongst the highest in the world (U.N. Demographic Yearbook, 1967).

Now, maybe I'm simple-minded, but all this suggests to me that there are rather more people in these countries than there is food to feed them. To use a dirty word, they are overpopulated. Faced with these facts, I find it gross that this serious issue should be used so cheaply as a football in the arena of political ideology as was blatantly done in the article. Such abuse of reason benefits no-one, least of all those living in "Third World" nations; and I was left wondering (cynic that I am) whether those holding such left-wing views really have the welfare of the peasant as their top priority.

A casual jaunt through the U of T forest, or what makes the place run

The University of Toronto, like all the best governments in the world, is fundamentally a constitutional monarchy; the grand duchies (the colleges), the great earldoms (modern occupational interests), the marcher lordships (the Department of Extension), and finally, the royal household (Simcoe Hall), all of which comprise the academic kingdom of Toronto.

Albert Allen admitted all classes must average a certain size. The number of people who sign up to take courses in a discipline determines how much money it gets. Consequently, the number of staff in a particular division must not become fixed; it must float.

In turn, this floating puts tremendous pressure on each academic division in that it must seek both to attract people and keep its costs down. In brief, it must do two things which compliment job security. First, it must attract people which means it must offer courses which at least look interesting and socially relevant (READ courses which proprot to offer a marketable skill). Second, it must keep costs down although the first goal presupposes expensive equipment.

Capital has developed fairly sophisticated tools, such as television and computers, which are not cheap. The university must be able to train people to use these tools if it wants people to be interested in it. Furthermore, to develop the research which will attract others, it must have even more expensive equipment, like microscopes. Finally, even for those divisions which don't require specific expensive equipment, general things like classrooms, offices, libraries, lighting, heating, must be provided. All this requires a constantly increasing amount of money, regardless of the socio-economic situation. The costs cannot be cut. They are relatively fixed.

These costs cannot all be met by the administration because it is, in fact, appropriating money on the basis of each division's ability to contribute to payments. Therefore, the particular divisions struggle among themselves for external money sources (read grants). Success in landing grants becomes an indicator of social relevance and a big attraction. And, grants can serve to buy certain equipment which will attract more students and lower the university's capital outlay. The question becomes: how do you obtain grants?

You appeal to industry. Industry, of course, does not want to throw its capital away. It must have some assurance that it will get something back for its money. Although not in all cases, industry is generally forced to depend on standards in making grants. One of these standards is the importance of previous work done by the applicant. Another is the type of training that the applicant has received; yet another is the "modernity" of the applicant's equipment — extant or projected. All of these standards tend to prejudice granting in favour of American or American-trained academics, because all of these standards are more readily met in the U.S. than elsewhere.

One of the ways, then, of reacting to the floating of financing results in the hiring of highly mobile, young Americans. More important, however, is the fact that grants work to undermine the patriarchal structure of U of T by seeking to modify the harshness of financial flexibility made necessary by the economic integration of the university with capital.

II

Secondly, the University of Toronto is the teaching and research staff of the university, the "academics". Academics are primarily concerned with two things, economic security and intellectual advancement. The two are far from exclusive. In fact, economic security, in the archaic guise of tenure, is very often a function of the degree of intellectual advancement of the individual academic: "publish or perish".

In the President's Report for the Year Ended June 1969, Part II, we find, from pages 179 to 275, a listing of publications written by U of T academics.

The range of these articles is staggering. Any attempt to master all the material published by Toronto alone would be totally overwhelming for there is an unbelievable quantity of information being generated. Even if new articles only repeat old content, they do so in new form and this must be counted as significant in keeping up with the development of the particular academic department. The intellectual has become an information storage and catalogue machine, as well as a generator of new information.

There exists an information flood here. This flood is objectively large enough to raise the question as to whether it can be contained. Universities have traditionally reacted to the flood by breaking up departments and increasing specialization. For example, in 1926, the U of T Department of Political Economy contained what are now the Departments of Psychology and Sociology. But, today, these departments have their own "method" which renders their further association non-functional.

The flood of information also raises the question of how to bring the results of the various methods into some kind of conceptual harmony within the university structure.

This flood also raises the question of where the splitting up of methods stops. For example, Political Economy is now divided into political science, commerce and economics.

These in turn are divided into their various specialized compartments. All of which means that the flood is not just about information but also involves method, so much so that method becomes an object of information and we get an infinite regress.

The academics, then, have a problem. They have to keep up with the times. But, there is not only an information explosion but also an implosion. The application of technology to this flood has not lessened but rather increased the torrent. We now have a Department of Computer Science and an Institute for Culture and Technology. There are various courses training people just how to handle machines. All this in order to learn something from the information. But, what? Each intervention on the road to learning makes the information more dubious, not more certain. One has to put in more and more time checking mechanisms to account for errors — errors of all kinds, including obsolescence. Information technology qua information technology cannot solve the problem.

Can specialization solve the problem? No. Specialization implies regress. Why not have a "science of the dynamics of the frisbie" or a special methodology for the study of "ant colonies on the sidewalks of Timmins"? You can specialize in the handling of any problem. This does not help cope with the flood, it only adds to it by removing the problem one step more.

But, what this flood does mean is that academics are besieged. They are surrounded by their own products. The ivory tower keeps getting higher and the babble inside gets more and more esoteric. The alleged movement toward unity of the sciences has only produced cross-disciplines which deal with special problems. The marriage of departments is producing a population explosion whose children speak different languages.

What does this mean for economic security? Well, it means that those people who have been newly trained, who do not have to forget obsolete information, and are specially trained in a cross-discipline are most in demand because they can produce the freshest, clearest, and least-confused information, which can then be put to good social use.

The younger academic is, therefore, more economically valuable and, in a flexible structure, would be more secure.

A recent (American) Kodak ad advised, "At Kodak, it's not unusual for a 25-year-old like Jim Carroll to win the title of senior research physicist. Like any company involved in a lot of basic research, Kodak has felt the pressure of modern technology and the need for young, fresh thinking. So we hire the best talent we possibly can, and then give them as much responsibility as they can handle. Whatever their age."

"We have departments and divisions, like any company. What we don't have are preconceived ideas about how an expert scientist's time should be spent."

III

Third, the University of Toronto is the students of the university. The position of the students is, in many ways, the easiest to understand. They want a better life than they could get if they didn't come. The U of T is either a way up or a way to stay where one is at. This in turn, however, means that the students view the university in a social context. They certainly do not want to be punished for attending the university.

To get a good job, they have to get a good education. Which means that they must master vast quantities of the newest information, including information on how to handle the latest technological devices that will be part of their jobs. They must be exposed to the absolutely latest ideas because by the time they get out, these latest ideas will be part of the daily life they will be directing. This, in fact, is what is meant by training for the technocracy.

Seeking maximum marketable potential, students gravitate toward those academics who evidence the most mastery of the most information. These people promise instruction in what will be most useful in daily life. These people also tend to be younger, for reasons already cited. But, there is another reason. Younger people look more appealing. They speak more appealingly. They teach more appealingly. Being more attractive, this appeal, added to newer information, is a rather strong punch at older academics.

U of T's New Program certainly helps students to choose what courses they think will be most advantageous to themselves. However, that program does not go nearly far enough, and not only for institutional reasons. The New Program encourages specialization on the American rather than the English model. It permits the intensive study of a single idea over several disciplines, something not permitted before. The hasty, reactionary action of certain older academics acknowledged this trend. Indeed, the reaction takes the involuted form of support for extravagant interdisciplinary programs and experimentation, in order to attack specialization and "preserve standards". For, intensive, early specialization is an attack on academic privilege since it accelerates the information flood. The New Program, raising the student's hope of a freer educational system, instead intensifies pressure to specialize as the way to get ahead. This, in turn, puts the student into direct conflict with those who are attacked by increased specialization — the academics who hold their position by reason of authority and respect and deference and not by reason of their continued productivity.

The student's position becomes one of great uncertainty and confusion, over and above that to be expected. The student is told to try out and test different areas of information. The student is also told not to waste time. He or she is told to respect enlightenment and ignore obsolete information. The student is not counselled because there is no way to counsel. And, all the time, the student is reminded that very soon he or she shall have to "earn a living". This type of confusion has already manifested itself at U of T.

These manifestations have been erratic, and they have also been persistent. In 1969, the unrest was political, with the "discipline crisis"; students demanded a place in the administration of the university. In 1970, the unrest was sexual, a direct attack on patriarchy, with the day care sit-in; students demanded an end to at least one form of sex-economic repression. In 1971, the unrest was academic-political; students demanded that the dead wood be chopped away within the particular academic departments of the Faculty of Arts and Science. In 1972, the unrest was academic-economic; students demanded access to the tools they required for getting the most information the quickest way — directly. They demanded access to a massive research library.

It is interesting to note the position of the U of T administration in all of these situations. It capitulated in 1969, very quickly. In 1970, it was emotionally upset, but it gave in. In 1971 and 1972, it, in fact, sided with the students. This is because, in all instances, the interest of the administration in flexibility overrode its interest in authority. Economic considerations overrode political ones. Those same economic considerations have the senior academics and all the younger academics that they can intimidate into a detence of what has become an "irrational" position, irrational to the extent of keeping students out of the library. Students, therefore, have been the allies of the administration in working towards closer integration of the university with capitalist society.

Vince Dolan attended St. Michael's College of the University of Toronto, and was Students' Administrative Council External Affairs Commissioner in 1970-71. He has returned to the United States to continue his education.

Quebec minister silent on repeal

Civil rights union awaits word on Bill 51

MONTREAL (CUP) — The Québec Civil Liberties Union (QCLU) is awaiting an answer from Québec justice minister Jérôme Choquette on its demand for the repeal of Bill 51, popularly known as "la loi Choquette" and the "permanent War Measures Act."

The bill, quickly passed by the National Assembly at the end of the spring session, gave a mixed police-judicial commission sweeping powers of search and seizure against "organized crime, terrorism and sedition."

QCLU president Jean-Louis Roy, who is also director of the French-Canada studies program at McGill University, said the QCLU objects to the haste with which the bill was passed and to the lack of real discussion in the National Assembly.

Roy hopes to organize opposition to the bill in Québec. He and other QCLU members will meet with leaders of Québec's political parties next week to obtain explanations of their positions. "We are firmly determined not to come back from the meetings with the parties with vague answers," Roy declared.

The QCLU disagrees with the way organized crime, terrorism and "sedition" are mixed together in the new law.

"The motivations behind these three activities and their social impact are very different," Roy said. "You'll never have a social consensus agreeing with organized crime, but you may find a consensus agreeing with some terrorist activities."

He gave the example of the "October Crisis" when the federal government was saying terrorist acts had some support in Québec. "That is why it sent in the troops."

Therefore the QCLU's position is that "if the government wants to organize a commission on organized crime, it should be completely separate from permanent measures against terrorism and sedition."

The QCLU also objects to the composition of the commission, which it believes creates "Even more confusion than there already is between judicial and police activities in Québec."

"We believe that the police and judicial powers should be separated" Roy said.

The QCLU strongly opposes the "anonymity" of the commission, which is allowed to carry out search and seizure raids without a warrant, but which is "not obliged to answer any questions about its activities for 90 days."

"They are not even obliged to say it was their action," Roy pointed out. "If they decided to raid the McGill Daily and seize documents for example, they could do it, and nobody could ask them why."

The first such raids have likely already occurred.

The offices of Agence de presse libre du Québec, the Mouvement pour la défense des prisonniers politiques au Québec, and the Cooperative de Déménagement were all hurglarized a few weeks ago by persons unknown. Only files and political literature were taken; valuable equipment was left untouched. If the police did it, they're not saying, at least for 90 days.

College library links with Sig Sam stalled at committee

By BRIANE NASIMOK

The General Committee of arts and science decided Monday to establish a library sub-committee, but adjourned debate on the question of amalgamation of some college and departmental libraries with the Sigmund Samuel library.

A motion to amalgamate the UC Laidlaw Library (including the Innis collection) and the New College Library, plus the history, political economy and extension collections, with the Sigmund Samuel Wallace Room collection was put off to the next meeting. Innis principal Peter Russel's motion to adjourn debate succeeded in ending discussion on amalgamation.

The committee was debating two amendments, to omit the Laidlaw Library and the New College library from the amalgamation when discussion was stopped.

Russel said yesterday that the amalgamation was "an all or nothing proposition". He added the college libraries can not do what they were designed to do, that is supply all books needed for their undergraduates, and therefore would have to seek a new purpose.

The establishment of the library sub-committee, "to advise and inform the library of the arts and science needs", was almost unanimously passed, but the structure of the committee caused lengthy debate.

The original motion, in the Report of the Presidential Advisory Committee on the Sigmund Samuel Library, suggested the committee include the dean of Arts and Science, the librarian of Sigmund Samuel Library, two faculty members and three students (including at least one part-time student).

History chairman J. B. Conacher amended the motion to include seven faculty, "representing the departments in the faculty on the basis of use", instead of two. Conacher said he was ready to accept an increase in the number of students, but did not want to choose how many at that time.

Student representative Bob Anderson said that he was pleased

York profs fight to save jobs

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — York University's faculty are battling to save some 200 members who may lose their jobs in the current York budget crisis.

In a surprise move, the senate (composed of academics) has refused to accept an administrative report on York's financial set-backs and has launched an intensive investigation of its own.

The faculty reaction was sparked by a board of governors report suggesting a $ 2.7 million cut in academic operations at the university. York president David Slater called the board's figures "not outlandish".

In a special budget report in early October, Slater stated the budget deficit was $ 4.1 million. This was later revised to $ 3.4 million and finally reduced to $ 2.7 million after a fictional freeze in faculty and library budgets.

Faculty members tangled with administrators in three senate sessions during the last week of October. Charges of "lack of financial imagination", "confused state of information" and concern about "the nature and reliability of the information available" were lodged against the board.

Atkinson College dean Harry Crowe told the senate the "data made available (by the board) on the current and 1973-74 budgets had been most confusing".

Other senators complained about the "confusion and lack of credibility of almost any of the data circulating on the university's financial position".

The senate refusal to accept the board's recommendations displeased Slater. He told the members that "it invited confrontation with the board".

However, faculty members argued the board had been blunt and they had to be blunt in return.

Firing staff seems to imply that people are reduced to the order of things instead of people being placed ahead of things," mathematics professor P. Rajagopal told the administration in a budget report he presented to senate.

He later commented that "the logic of having to cut staff eludes me."

The university deficit is only $400,000 according to Rajagopal. In 1972-73, faculty monies were cut, but few financial cuts were made in the administration.

"In times of crisis and panic, one would have expected the cuts to be more uniformly distributed," the math professor said. "The budget data available is notional - an educated guess. Any figures with deficits at present are meaningless."

Tenured professors can be fired with notice, according to a recent statement by the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) in response to national budget trends. The association is set up to protect the rights of university academics.

Aldermen condemn widening

By BILL HUMBER

Ward 6 aldermanic candidate Dan Heap Monday night denounced Metro Council's decision to widen Dundas Street to a size of "expressway" proportions.

Heap was one of several candidates in the December 4 municipal election at a public meeting held to inform citizens of the effect of the widening on local communities.

He warned the audience of over 50 people of the danger to the Chinese community and said that the decision would have repercussions in Kensington. The widening of Dundas to six lanes between Bay Street and Spadina Avenue would split the ward, which runs from Bloor to the lakefront, in two.

It would also create greater traffic congestion at Spadina, Heap said. He added that the long term effect would be to intensify the demand for the Spadina Expressway.

Karl Jaffary, running for re-election in Ward 7, stated that the most important issue was the long term implication of the scheme. It casts doubt on the stability of the area, he said, encouraging further downtown high-rise redevelopment.

Jaffary doubted that Metro would attempt to expropriate land along Dundas for the widening, but instead would wait for redevelopment.

Several speakers from the audience feared that this redevelopment would only further the encroachment of big buildings and more cars into residential areas. The effect would be to diminish the attraction of the downtown area as a place to live and work, they said.

There is a need, said Heap, to begin organizing now and to challenge candidates on issues like the widening during the current election. Otherwise, he warned, Dundas Street would effectively be turned into a "crosstown expressway".

Ward 7's junior alderman, John Sewell, stated that the long term goal of organizing against the widening had to be the removal of all cars from the downtown area.

Another candidate for alderman in Ward 6, William Archer, stated that the widening would undermine a Planning Board plan to maintain the south east Spadina area as a stable residential district. He said that there is a need to widen public walkways at the expense of the roadways in the area.

The Varsity—Phil Stramba

The widening of Dundas Street will promote further downtown development, said Alderman Karl Jaffary.

No mini computers for engineers

The Faculty Council of Applied Science and Engineering voted Monday not to allow students to use their own electronic desk calculators in examinations.

Some faculty, as well as the Committee on Examinations, supported use of the machines, in spite of their $100 to $400 cost.

"You can't stop progress," said Professor Rimrott of Mechanical Engineering.

However, student representatives on the council were mostly opposed to allowing use of the machines, which were touted to be highly efficient and compact, because of the cost.

Several students said that those who could afford the machines would have a tremendous advantage over other students during exams. They contended that poorer students would be under great pressure to buy the machines.

Council supported the students.

Geology professor E. W. Nuffield was overheard after the meeting expressing shock that although "faculty supported the motion, students voted it down."

U. S. student body campaigns against discriminatory tests

WASHINGTON (CUPI) — The United States National Student Association (NSA) is making a grass-roots assault on the discriminatory nature of standardized educational admissions and testing programs through nation-wide public hearings, in an effort to facilitate reform in American higher education.

Ed Rosenthal, Director of the NSA Educational Innovations Desk, says standardized testing, as it is now practiced, discriminates against a significant cross-section of potential students.

"Blacks, Chicanos, Puerto Ricans, native Americans and immigrants all contend such tests are culturally biased and linguistically discriminatory," he says.

Many women think the competitive nature of such tests, added to an often mechanically oriented content, cause them to fare worse than men because of patterns they have been traditionally taught to follow.

Other groups, such as veterans, point to the difficulties of being out of school for some time, and therefore removed from the schooling attitudes that condition students to testing situations. Others think they suffer from an inability to function within a rigid timed test situation.

"Bureaucratic incompetence" within the testing programs, resulting in lost transcripts and incorrect test scores, has also been a problem raised.

To chronicle and combat such cases of discrimination, the NSA, in conjunction with student governments in eight cities, will sponsor open hearings on testing and admissions. NSA organizers hope to "raise the issues nation-wide of testing abuse in order to prompt a national debate on the topic, to collect data on consumer attitudes and experiences in order to prompt further research". This will serve as material for a class action suit, to be used as a catalyst for change in institutional admissions policies, and to awaken the broader educational community to the issues in order to arrive at comprehensive solution.

In conjunction with the public hearings, NSA plans to send questionnaires to student governments of member schools and select non-member schools, as well as instructions for holding individual hearings.

Public pressures TTC to retain routes

Reprieve granted for St. Clair streetcars

By BILL HUMBER

Yesterday morning the Toronto Transit Commission reversed an earlier decision to begin phasing out streetcar service in the City of Toronto.

A motion was adopted with little opposition to "retain the present streetcar service on St. Clair East and West including Mt. Pleasant Avenue on the understanding that there is at present no definite plan for the removal of streetcars with the exception of the Rogers route."

Commission member David Lacey stated that "public opinion" had played a role in his decision to support retention of the streetcar.

Earlier in the meeting, Ward 10 Alderman Paul Pickett had summarized the views of a citizen group asking for the retention of streetcars. He said that there is a need to continue the present routes he suggested that the TTC staff examine available streetcars to replace those worn out.

Ward 6 aldermanic candidate Dan Heap expressed his concern to the commission and an audience of about 40 citizens that the streetcar service along Dundas and Carlton might be terminated. Commission member Gordon Hurlburt assured him that the whole policy of curtailing streetcar service was under question.

Lacey's motions to survey the market for new or available streetcars was passed, as was a motion to study the use of trolley buses in place of diesel buses.

Commission chairman Frank Young said that the reversal of the decision did not indicate displeasure with management's proposal to begin the phasing out of streetcar service.

"We are not in disagreement," he said, "We have different views."

He explained that the management had to operate on the basis of short-term costs, while the commission could take a longer view.

Another member of the five man commission, Karl Mallette, stated that the province favoured public transit and that Metro Council was prepared to absorb the extra costs of "common carriers".

A representative of management agreed with decision, saying that this new source of funding was unavailable at the time of original economic survey of the streetcars' future.

Ward 10 Alderman William Kilbourn expressed the hope that TTC's reliance on the tall box would be supplemented by further government grants. The TTC is required to attempt to break even on operating costs through fares.

According to Peter Russell

Imperialists responsible for Asians' plight

By PETER MATILAINEN

"The point that is missed by many people in Canada, and in the rest of the world, is that the situation in Uganda is part of the class struggle that is evident in the developing nations of the third world. Racism is being used to turn attention away from the real struggle at hand."

This statement was made by an observer at a teach-in held at York last week, on Uganda. The meeting, sponsored by the York Black people's movement, was called to present views and information generally not represented by the western press.

U of T professor Peter Russell criticized the "imbalance" in North American news coverage of the Ugandan crisis.

"Half a million Sudanese refugees were chased out by the Khartoum government; one million blacks were expelled from Ghana. None of this ever makes front page coverage," he said.

Russell stressed as did all other panelists, that he did not support the method by which President Idi Amin has attempted to gain control of his country's economy by expelling the Asians. What is ignored, he said, is that the problem developed because of the way in which Britain colonized Uganda.

The ancestors of the expelled Asians, Russell said, were brought to Uganda as indentured labourers to build the railways and act as servants for British imperialists. This led to the development of a stratified society with Europeans on top, Africans on the bottom, and Asians in between.

York political science professor S. Ryan described Ugandan Society as one with three tiers: Europeans control finance and agriculture, Asians fill positions in the civil service, retail trades and professional occupations and Africans are left as the labour force, or as Ryan described it, "they have become the hewers of wood and the drawers of water."

The problem of foreign ownership is continental, not limited to Uganda, Ryan said. The government of Tanzania has taken steps to change this by nationalizing a number of foreign owned industries.

In this case, Ryan said they are attempting to develop "a socialist society, not just one with another exploiting class."

Amin's impulsive action could have serious consequences for the Ugandan economy, Ryan warned.

Already store shelves are empty as Asians leaving the country convert their capital into commodities they can take with them. As this "mini-hoom" created by higher demand ends, Ryan predicted unemployment will hit many in the labour force (mostly Africans) who work for Asians.

Foreign capital is wary of dealing with African nations which have no traditional capitalist class. Ryan believed that Uganda will face 25 to 30 years of serious economic problems.

Amin's future also looks precarious, he said, because his erratic attacks on the Asians, although popular at first with Ugandans, will soon turn to widespread disenchantment with his regime. He believed that only a massive plan for manpower co-ordination could prevent the collapse of the economy, and that expulsions would not correct the underlying problems of capitalist economy.

Asian students present at the meeting claimed that the panelists were "whitewashing" the facts. Russell reassured those present that Amin's racism was not being vindicated.

Later, Asian students said they understood the dilemma Uganda's people face, but thought the expulsion policy was being aimed solely at their race.

Ryan replied to such questions by saying that "Amin can't expel everyone all at once." He expects expulsions of Europeans to begin in January.

Province to make students pay admissions test fee

Exams for students wishing to enter Ontario colleges and universities will now cost $11 instead of being free.

The number of applicants for these college tests, the Service to Admission to Colleges and Universities (SACU) exams, are down 40 per cent compared to last year.

The Ontario government, which instituted the fee, said it was costing over $400,000 to administer the tests to any Grade 13 student who wanted to take them, whether or not the student had any intention of going on in post-secondary education.

According to U of T assistant dean of Admissions Kelvin Andrews, it may be "the principle of payment for tests which the government refuses to fund that turns students off".

He stated that the SACU tests are not absolutely necessary for gaining admission but that they greatly "improve the chances of being accepted".

Andrews said that it was "incorrect to call SACU exams entrance tests".

"They are considered relevant," he said, "in that they add an extra dimension in judging applicants by serving as a predictive instrument, but the actual emphasis at U of T upon SACU exams varies from faculty to faculty and from year to year."

Andrews does not expect any noticeable drop in the number of applications at U of T this year. He believes that the new test fee is not the only cause for the decreased number of applicants to take the tests, but that "a number of factors" are involved.

There seems to be "a trend or change in attitude to university education evident throughout the province," said Andrews.

Dominated by capitalists

Crispo forms council for management studies

By CETA

RAMKHALAWANSINGH

Faculty of Management Studies dean John Crispo has established a Faculty Advisory Council heavily dominated by top corporate officers.

Earlier this year the then-School of Business and its director Crispo emerged from the U of T Budget Committee as the only "academic" group in the university to get substantial financial increases. The school was then elevated to a faculty and Crispo became dean.

The 40-member advisory council is chaired by W.O. Twaits, chairman and chief executive of Imperial Oil, Canada's largest corporation.

To celebrate the establishment of this link with the business community, a link which many maintain has dominated the direction of most university programs, the Royal Bank of Canada hosted an alumni-student-advisory council dinner at Hart House. The pre-dinner cocktail party was a star-studded production which reflected the composition of the advisory council. The council has 29 members, most of whom are at the presidential level of Canada's largest corporations, such as General Motors, Shell Oil, Stelco, Inco, Ahitibi Paper, Noranda Mines, Imperial Optical, Imperial Oil, IBM, Algoma Steel, Eaton's Simpsons, etc.

The four University of Toronto representatives on the Council are Crispo, U of T vice-president-Business affairs, vice-president Don Forster and Ed Safarian, Dean of Graduate Studies.

Representation of the "people of Canada" to this council occurs through the appointment of Government officials: Douglas Hartle, deputy secretary of the Federal Treasury Board; H. MacDonald, deputy minister of the Ontario Treasury, Sylvia Ostry (the only woman on the council), chief statistician of Canada, and pro-developer Toronto alderman David Rotenberg, who is running for mayor.

Crispo attempted to balance these corporation-oriented VIP's with two labour men. Stanley Little from the Canadian Union of Public Employees and Henry Lorrain from the Pulp, Sulphite and Paper Mill workers form the "progressive" block on the council.

At the pre-dinner cocktail hour, Crispo said that he had a wide range of people represented on the council. He added that the only drawback was the lack of representation from small businesses.

The advisory council had already made several suggestions for improving the curriculum, he said.

Some of the business students who were present gave similar reasons for wanting the advisory council. They felt that their courses would become more helpful in terms of getting future jobs with such a council advising them.

Crispo felt that the student body had changed quite a bit in the last five years. They are more concerned, he said, with the social responsibility of the business world. He pointed to the book "Preserving the Northland," which the students gave to Twaits after dinner. (Twait's company is currently exploring a northern pipeline.)

With the establishment of the advisory council, Crispo expects to receive much more money from the private sector than the school previously did. At present, one corporation is financing one studies chair for the next five years, with more help anticipated later this year.

Most of the research money is tied to individual professors and comes through the main university office. Asked about a report that Crispo and Twaits were trying to raise seven million dollars to hire away all the best business brains in North America, the dean denied that there was any truth in it.

A graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Crispo cites MIT as one of the best business schools. He wishes that Toronto's school was larger so that they could look at alternatives.

"If the university were in a growth stage, we could have an excellent and realistic case for a larger program," he says. "Right now we have one of the highest student-faculty ratios."

His present goal is 50 faculty members, about 17 more than there are now. He also thinks there is a need for Ph.D's in management studies.

"For many years, the School of Business was a dead place. The university neglected it, but there existed a nucleus of competent people who have helped to turn things around."

Students at the Faculty of Management Studies do not seem to play as large a role in the planning of curriculum as business does, since there are two students on the curriculum committee.

Crispo thinks that they do not play as large a role as they should, and was not sure what the students there wanted. If anything, he said, "they would get concerned at courses not being relevant to their futures. They want more practical work. That is a mistake."

He felt that it was more important to stress fundamentals and basic concepts that do not change. "We do not want to concentrate on market techniques that are obsolete by the time they get out."

He added that the people on the advisory council are not that interested in students merely able to fill out balance sheets properly. "They want people who can plan, think and who will be in managerial positions for a long time."

Crispo did not know exactly how much money was being given to his faculty by business or by the government. As far as he was concerned the federal government contribution was "peanuts", $25,000 for a research project on small businesses.

However, Treasury Board, deputy secretary Hartle claims that the reason he was invited to sit on their advisory council was because he had to approve valuable research contracts for professors at the Faculty.

If management studies can get more money, Crispo plans to introduce courses which will explore industrial strategy, resource industries, tax programs, and social responsibility.

He wants to have a school which has a good balance between the practical and the academic. "We do not want to be like the law schools who are turning out all these lawyers

The Varsity—Matthew Slickman

Imperial Oil boss W. O. Twaits will sit on Crispo's council.

without studying the state of the law."

It was not any surprise to see very few women at the dinner who were business school students. There are about 10 in full time attendance in the two year program. Crispo said that he did not understand why they do not apply and stated he did not intend to actively recruit female students.

But he added, "There should be more women students. I like having women around, but for all the wrong reasons."

Crispo's schemes to expand his faculty reflects his view of the world. Basically he believes in the capitalist system, but he admits "There are all kinds of things wrong".

Regina profs try to block student reps

REGINA (CUP) — A major fight is brewing in the Social Sciences division of the University of Saskatchewan's Regina Campus, where conservative faculty members are trying to subvert democratic decision-making in their division.

The latest attempt came last Friday at the regular division meeting when more than 16 faculty members walked out, refusing to discuss two important motions.

One motion would prevent departments from refusing students the right to participate in decision-making. The other would give visiting professors and others who have been at the university two years or more the right to sit on committees formerly restricted to tenured faculty members.

Before the motions could be considered, and even before the chairman could finish his opening remarks, Psychology professor Bill Muir stood up and informed the meeting he thought the motion dealing with student representation was not "put forward in a serious manner". He was not going to "waste the taxpayers money" by discussing it, and he was leaving, he said.

In an apparently pre-arranged move, more than 16 faculty members then left the meeting. The meeting continued without them.

The remaining speakers agreed that during the last two years the students' desire to participate in the decision-making process had been thwarted by the conservative tendencies of certain faculty members.

Because of the serious impact of the motion for student representation in all divisional departments, representatives at the meeting decided to delay implementation until the Faculty of Arts and Science had reported on student participation. The delaying motion was passed with only three abstentions, and no opposition.

Debate on the second motion was cut off because many professors who would have been affected by it had left. But some representatives pointed out that visiting professors and non-tenured faculty have been denied the right to participate equally in the division because of inequitably applied by-laws.

The conservative faculty walkout appears to be a deliberate attempt to deny the validity of democratic decision-making in the division.

The denial of student participation contravenes a two-year-old by-law making student membership optional for departments.

The walkout is part of a continuing struggle between the right and left-wing members of the division.

Political science department chairman Joe Roberts said that the right-wing's action demonstrates that when a elite loses control of the democratic process, they will totally reject the institutions which formerly gave them their power.

Football finals begin today at stadium

Division I playoffs for the Mulock Cup begin this afternoon at 2 pm in Varsity Stadium with a sudden-death elimination match between Vic and St. Mike's. The winner will meet PHE November 15 (2 pm).

In Division II play, UC meets New Friday at noon while Meds plays Trin at 2 pm. The winners will playoff November 15 at noon. (All games take place in the stadium.)

In final games last week, UC enabled New to make the playoffs by defeating Scar 20-6. For UC it was Young with 6, Pandi with 12, while McGillivray added 2. Henderson counted six for Scar. UC finished first in its division with a 4-1 record.

In the only other game at week's end, New squeezed by For 1-0 to put the team into the playoffs. The win enabled New to tie Scar's record of 2-3. New gained the fourth playoff position by virtue of its 7-6 win over Scar earlier in the season.

Senior Volleyball wins at Queen's

By JOAN SCHWARTZ

The women's Senior Volleyball team opened its season last Saturday with an invitational tournament at Queen's.

Toronto emerged victorious with 11 wins and one loss. York and McMaster tied for second, each with a 7-5 record. Waterloo came fourth.

The tournament was held as a preseason warm-up with teams trying out new players and strategies. Each team played two games against each of the others in round robin competition. The team with the best win-loss record became the undeclared winner.

Toronto teams won the championship in both divisions. The win marks the 12th consecutive year that the senior team has won the OWIAA championship.

Six teams participated: Carleton, Ottawa, Queen's, Toronto, and York from the Eastern Section of the OWIAA, McMaster and Waterloo from the Western Section.

Toronto got off to a good start with a display of accurate serving, downing Waterloo 15-2, 15-6.

The team next went on to defeat York 15-2 in the first game and build up a solid 11-3 lead in the second. Toronto began to lose ground but still managed to keep its lead at 13-6 and 14-9.

Blues' defence slowed down, while the offence became disorganized. Toronto tried in vain to get the last point, but York rallied to a 16-14 win. Blues' setter Vera Kosinkova explained the loss very succinctly, "If you don't put your serves over and can't pick theirs up, it's game over."

Toronto returned to the courts in the afternoon for another three-and-one-half hours of volleyball, meeting Queen's, Carleton, Ottawa, and McMaster.

Queen's grabbed the first point from Toronto but was convincingly defeated 15-1, 15-2. Blues then went on to defeat Carleton 15-1, 15-3 and Ottawa 15-5, 15-1.

The main competition of the tournament was expected from McMaster, whose surprising wins over Toronto in last year's OWIAA tournament pushed the Blues' out of the finals against Western.

The first game against Mac went to Toronto, 15-6, but only after a long match. Both sides rallied hard to regain the service, but often failed to gain a point.

McMaster managed to keep up with the Toronto attack for the first few points of the second game, but the Blues opened a 9-5 lead and increased it to 13-7. McMaster then started to gain ground.

Blues' spiker Halya Stefaniuk was tied to the net attempting to block spikes and tips from Mac's Gale Lyons. Key serves were lost and poor receptions repeatedly sent the ball to Blues' setter Agra Alherts, whose spiking wasn't able to elude the McMaster defense. Not until Mac came to within 2 points of Toronto were Blues able to pull off the 15-12 win.

The tournament was successful in pointing up the strengths and weaknesses of both Blues and their opposition and emphasized the importance of steady, accurate serving. In each of the games in which Toronto was challenged, the failure to capitalize on key serving opportunities was Toronto's greatest liability.

The day's play was a capsule preview of this season's OWIAA competition. All Eastern Section teams except Laurentian (which finished last in 1971-72) attended.

While York may prove to be Blues' stiffest competition, Toronto has a good chance of reaching the OWIAA finals at Waterloo in February.

Unfortunately, Western, the strongest team in the Western Section did not participate. Western took both the Waterloo Invitational title and the OWIAA championship from the Blues last season. Toronto had held the Ontario honours for six consecutive years.

Despite the untimely death of Joy Taylor, U of T graduate and Western volleyball coach for seven years, Western took the national title from the University of Manitoba last March in Sudbury. Although veteran members JoAnn Garrod and Ann Beattie have graduated, Marion Munro, a member of the national team, and Mary Chisholm, a member of the Ontario team at the last Canada Winter Games, are back for another season.

Western has replaced Waterloo as Toronto's major rival. The loss of several key spikers has left Janie Fraser and Di Searffe as the nucleus of a largely rookie squad.

Toronto seems to be the only team which hasn't suffered from a loss of members through graduation. Veteran spikers Julie (Kucharehuk) Andrichiw, Halya Stefaniuk and Rossolana Wankewycz, and setter Agra Alherts are back as well as Marg (Oakley) Grieve, Lynne Shearon, and Marion Thompson. New faces include Mary Drakieh and Vera Kosinkova from the Ontario Volleyball Association League as well as Fran Walmsley from Manitoba.

The team is again coached by volleyball veteran, Marj Shedd. Also returning is manager Pat Dartford.

The squad plays half their games before Christmas, the other half, as well as the Waterloo Invitational and the OWIAA finals, in the first six weeks of next term. Wankewycz injured an ankle two weeks ago in practice and will not play until January.

The winner of the OWIAA tournament will go on to the CWIAU finals at Dalhousie in March. Last year teams representing the Atlantic, Quebec, Ontario, and Western conferences came from Dalhousie, Sherbrooke, Western, and Manitoba, respectively.

Six members of the winning CWIAU team plus six others chosen from the teams of the four conferences will travel to Moscow in August for the World Student Games.

All home games are played in the upper gym of the Benson Building.

Fran Walmsley spikes past two York blockers in Senior Volleyball's only loss of the tournament, Saturday.

Field hockey teams retain championship

By JANICE MCKELLAR

The University of Toronto hosted the OWIAA Senior and Intermediate field hockey finals Friday and Saturday. The Intermediate Finals were held on the front campus field Friday. While all other games were played at Scarborough College.

Participating teams at the intermediate level included McMaster, Queen's, Laurentian and Toronto. At the senior level teams represented Western, McGill, Waterloo, McMaster, Queen's, York and Toronto.

In the intermediate division Toronto defeated Laurentian 2-1, McMaster 2-0 and Queen's 3-1.

The crucial contest was the Toronto-Queen's game. Since Queen's had beaten U of T at the Queen's tournament the previous weekend, if the team had won the game on the weekend it would have been the only undefeated team. However, Queen's and McMaster tied 0-0. This meant that if Toronto beat Queen's, Toronto would win by virtue of her 2-0 win over McMaster.

The game was wide-open with considerable spirit and drive. The teams constantly drove the ball, rushed it and made a push pass. Toronto's three goals were scored by Betty Shostack on penalty bullies. The final result was Toronto 3, Queen's 1.

In other U of T games in the intermediate division, Toronto beat McMaster 2-0 on goals by Anne Seymour, and Laurentian 2-1 on goals by Betty Shostack.

Last year, the intermediate team placed second behind

Laurentian. This year, the challenge was posed again, but it was fought back by an entirely new team, and a different style of field hockey play.

The intermediate squad was made up of 13 new team members — all beginners — with no experienced veterans. However, the coach and women worked hard for two months — three one-hour practices a week — to produce a determined and skilled team.

The team also developed offensively. A weakness of last year's team was their inability to score; last year they played more of a defensive type of game. Team captain Daina Zukauskas said the intermediate team was very aggressive, and rushed well on offense, while the forward line was referred to as "goal hungry". The backs helped the team along great deal, carrying the ball out of danger rather than knocking it out. In addition, the halfbacks sustained the forwards well.

The most important game for Toronto's senior team was its 2-0 win over an established team from the University of Waterloo.

Toronto captain Pat Dartford said the game was the most exciting and climatic of those played because of the action involved. The girls provided the spectators with a wide-open, fast-paced game, despite the hazardous condition of the field due to the cold, wet rain. Girls on both teams were aggressive.

In the all-or-nothing game for Waterloo, Toronto rushes enabled the team to gain a two goal edge over Waterloo on shots by Jennifer Dakin. After Dakin's first goal, Toronto relaxed and played consistent hockey. The forward line executed their play in a more controlled manner, while Pat Williams and Pat Dartford played a close checking game, continually tying up their opponents. Dakin and Sue Scott were particularly aggressive on the field.

After the game, coach Nancy Gossling said she was pleased with her team's play and added that everyone had pulled together to make the win a team effort. She also stated the standard of hockey in the association had risen, therefore making it more difficult to take the championship.

In other U of T games, Toronto defeated Guelph 7-0 on goals by Lorna Tanner (3) and Jennifer Dakin (4), and McMaster 3-0 on goals by Tanner, Dakin and Dianna Prentice. Toronto also defeated Western 3-0.

The senior competition also saw a new Toronto team. The team had lost all of its national team players, with the exception of Tanner, and therefore was in a rebuilding process. Victory depended not so much on individuals but on team effort. The team was unable to rely upon last year's national members, to ensure the championship, although it did possess a great deal of flexibility and potential. Individual members were versatile and could be moved around to fill in positions.

At the end of the tournament, eight women were invited by the Ontario Women's Hockey Association to attend the trials for the squad chosen to participate in the 1973 Canada Summer Games to be held in Burnaby, B.C. They include Chris Crawford, Judy Bell, Pat Williams, Pat Dartford, Eleanor Howie, Sue Scott, Roslyn Shemilt and Jennifer Dakin.

Campus Day Care issues ultimatum to the university

By PAT REDICAN

Campus Co-operative Community Day Care has issued an ultimatum to the U of T: either find the co-op "reasonable alternative space" within two weeks or they will "settle into" the building they now occupy, behind 351 Bloor Street West.

The demand came in a letter, dated Wednesday, to president John Evans. Copies were sent to campus co-ordinator Lois Reimer and vice-provost (student services) Robin Ross.

No official answer had been received from the administration as of last night. Commented co-op parent Julie Mathien, "I don't think they're rushing to the phone". Evans refused to comment on the letter last night, saying he had not seen it because of meetings all day.

The letter said that a settlement must be reached "as quickly as possible."

"We will accept offers of reasonable alternate space any time within the next two weeks."

It continued, "Any initiative to negotiate must then come from you (Evans) and there is no guarantee that we will move after November 22."

The occupation of the clubhouse behind the Meteorological Building, which began after months of negotiating for the unused building or an equivalent, is now in its eighth month.

After the Governing Council rejected its request for a separate centre, the group vowed to continue its occupation until a reasonable alternative was provided. The ultimatum is the latest move in a series of subsequent negotiations which began when the administration offered to rent a separate house to bypass the day care policy.

Mathien said that the ultimatum move came from a need to establish the program on "a more permanent basis".

If the co-op centre remains at the present site, "there are certain major renovations that have to be made, both to comply with the Day Nurseries Act, and to provide us with the facilities we need to run the centre properly." These renovations would include putting in new floors, and meeting special fire regulations as well as providing some special facilities.

Reimer said that it was doubtful, even if the university could find a building for the Campus Co-op group that it would be able to give it to them at nominal rent. "This would amount to the university subsidizing the day care centre. Under the new policy from the Internal Affairs Committee (of the Governing Council) I don't think we can."

The Governing Council agreed to set up a campus day care centre that would include children whose parents are not connected to the university. Campus Community Co-op Day Care Centre has about 40 per cent non-university-related children.

The co-op refused to participate in the university's centre because it does not allow for control of the centre by the parents, community children would be excluded, and it would be more expensive.

Ross agrees with Reimer's estimation. "The idea of subsidized rent would seem to be excluded by the Governing Council's policy. Since the co-op people refuse to meet the Governing Council's standards of no non-university children, the university can't subsidize it."

However, as Mathien pointed out, the university has for more than two years subsidized the rent of the 12 Sussex Street centre. The university's day care policy has been in effect since September, with no suggestion that the Sussex centre violates it.

According to Mathien the "reasonable alternate space" mentioned in the letter means a building which meets three conditions: it must be renovatable; it must be provided at a nominal rent by the university and it must be given to them on a long-term lease.

"There is a lot of liberal sentiment on the Governing Council that says that we shouldn't be allowed to stay at 315 Bloor, simply because we took it without asking says Mathien. "On the other hand they think that it's the University's responsibility to provide us with a building."

SAC refuses fees demo support, advises a letter to your MPP

By BOB BETTSON

SAC has again rejected support of the Ontario Federation of Students fees demonstration November 21, despite VUSAC's efforts to draw support for the demonstration.

The council Wednesday defeated, by 26-17, a motion by communications commissioner Debra Lewis to reverse a previous decision not to support the demonstration. The demonstration has been called by OFS to coincide with the opening of the provincial legislature.

Instead SAC voted to support a letter-writing and lobbying campaign to gain the support of individual Members of Provincial Parliament.

The SAC rep for SMC, Michael Steinberg, warned that "if we don't support the demonstration, it will be a disaster.

"Given the circumstances we have no choice but to support the demonstration, he said. "Otherwise a lot of people are afraid all we're going to have is a bunch of crazy Trots (Young Socialists) running around."

"It has not been clinically proven I'm crazy," countered Young Socialist Mike Edwards, an Innis SAC rep. He added, "there will certainly be more than 15 Young Socialists at the demonstration."

Finance Commissioner Vince De Angelo stated that "no reason has been given for the demonstration. We must vote on whether we agree or disagree, not on whether some people are raising shit."

Engineering rep John Najbert questioned the degree of support for the demonstration among college councils.

Vice-president John Helliwell said only four councils have positively supported the demonstration: VUSAC, Innis, UC and Erindale. Lewis added that the GSU and the faculty reform caucus had also supported the demonstration.

"Our greatest problem is that the demonstration appears to have been taken over by outside groups", president Eric Miglin said. He referred to "problems" with the YS over speaking arrangements.

After the 15 minute debate, council passed 29-13 a motion by Engineering rep Cliff Taylor to cut off debate.

After the defeat of the Lewis motion, chaos ensued as the meeting turned to 45 minutes of procedural battles with pro-demonstration forces moving reconsideration of supporting the demonstration.

This move was defeated, as was another motion by VUSAC education commissioner Rick Gregory to fund the demonstration.

UC rep Marty Stollar added to the uproar when he moved that SAC hold its own demonstration on November 21 to coincide with the OFS demonstration.

Speaker Bill Collier ruled the Stollar motion was "dilatatory" and thus out of order, but was challenged. Steinberg moved a roll call vote on the challenge.

Amid much confusion, charges and counter charges, council voted 22-15 to suspend Robert's rules by not allowing the roll call vote.

The speaker's ruling was then upheld 30-12. The rest of the Ross Flowers-Helliwell motion for a lobbying and letter writing campaign was passed 21-4 after little debate.

Following the debate, Victoria College SAC rep Joyce Witton resigned. In a letter read to council, she charged "it would appear that council has shoved aside the primary role of representing their constituencies and would rather listen to themselves make asses of themselves at the expense of those who are trying to get something accomplished."

Whitton, who last spring resigned from the Miglin ticket in the SAC presidential elections, said she could not "serve on a council where people are out for their own amusement and play... and turning council into a personality clash."

OFL resolution backs student fees fight

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Ontario Federation of Labor voted overwhelmingly to support the Ontario Federation of Students campaign against increased tuition fees and decreased student awards, at the OFL annual convention which ended here Wednesday.

Support for the OFS position by the 1200 labor union delegates followed an earlier endorsement from the OFL executive and the Labor Council of Metropolitan Toronto.

OFL policy calls for the abolition of tuition fees. In its annual presentation to the Ontario government last July, the OFL pointed-out that the increase in tuition costs would create hardship for many students.

OFL secretary-treasurer Terry Meagher termed it grossly unfair to expect all citizens to support the cost of institutions of higher learning through the present methods of taxation, yet bar the door of these institutions to the children of taxpayers with limited incomes through higher tuition fees.

The OFL will ask all its affiliates through Ontario's 50 labor councils, to support the student unions in their campaign against the higher fee structure.

The federation also welcomed the OFS efforts to give part-time students access to the Ontario Student Award Program. The change would particularly help union members who are upgrading their skills and education through adult education programs, an OFL statement said.

The convention also called for an annual meeting of all labor appointees to the governing bodies of Ontario universities and community colleges.

The move is designed to develop liaison between trade unionists appointed to such governing bodies by the provincial government, develop a program for them to follow, and create a system of accountability.

The government has recently been naming token labor appointees to lend the appearance of representivity to the governing bodies, and blunt charges that they are dominated by business interests. Labor bodies have no power to appoint representatives but they can suggest names to the government.

(At the University of Toronto, the provincial government appointed United Steelworkers of America representative Lynn Williams to the Governing Council. Williams took a leading role in the labor movement's push to expel the Waffle group from the Ontario New Democratic Party.)

"I'm concerned whether these people are specified by the federations of labor or the labor councils, or whether they are Liberal or Conservative hacks in the labor movement who get their appointments through political patronage," John Macmillan, Director of Organization for the Canadian Union of Public Employees, said in an interview with CUP.

"A lot of investigation needs to be done," he said. "If these people got on there through political patronage they have no responsibility to report back to labor bodies. Many labor representatives on city councils actually work against labor behind the scenes," he said.

The OFL convention also called on the Ontario Department of Education to include "in their approved list of textbooks only those that offer an objective treatment of the contribution trade unions make to the development of society". Delegates urged local labor councils to continue their efforts to get school boards to change "social study courses to include a more balanced treatment of the subject."

The move followed a report on school texts by the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education called "Teaching Prejudice", which showed the prevalence of unfavourable stereotypes in discussions of the labor movement.

In dealing with the OFL's possibly most pressing concern, delegates established a task force to press for legislation outlawing strikebreaking in Ontario.

The emphasis was on a campaign to win municipal support for the demand for legislation from the province.

Delegates singled out Richard Grange and his Canadian Driver Pools strikebreaking firm for particular condemnation. A report presented to the OFL revealed that strikes, in which a company employed Grange's goon squad services, lasted three times as long as strikes which did not involve strikebreakers.

Lab workers fight low wages

By ZOYA STEVENSON

Forty-five newly organized animal laboratory technicians have agreed to fight for the same basic collective agreement recently negotiated for 770 maintenance workers.

"Of course our proposals must be ratified by the technicians," says Service Employees International Union local 204 business agent Don Barclay, "but we are hoping to win wage rates in the area of $3.61 per hour to $4.01 for the majority."

He added that the local wants $3.81 per hour to $4.21 for the surgical animal lab technicians who help at the operating table. It is also asking for improvements in working and safety conditions, including the establishment of a safety committee with worker representatives.

The workers make $2.53 to $2.84 per hour at present without time and a half for overtime.

The technicians employed in a number of U of T's science departments voted 32 to 9 in favour of joining the union about two weeks ago.

The workers clean cages, and feed and care for animals being used for research. Most work in the Medical Sciences, Zoology, Banting, and Dental Buildings.

Barclay said he thought the workers joined the union "because they are sick and tired of having a minimal pay raise jammed down their throats without being able to do anything about it."

One of the men on the negotiating committee said, "We joined the union because we are practically getting no wage and can't live off it, getting paid once a month and with a family and accumulated bills."

The workers in his department had, on their own, asked to be paid twice monthly, but the university refused.

Previously, this man had signed a petition expressing "unanimous strong opposition" to joining the union with another 11 workers. The petition had been initiated by a supervisor who tried to prevent a vote in favour of unionization.

The worker said he signed the petition because "all of us wanted a union, but I guess we were scared of the boss and wanted to please him. When we went down to the labour board hearing, and talked to the union representative, we changed our minds."

Another worker, Stanley Gregory, said he was "all for the union when I first heard about it."

"being as poorly paid as what we are, I figure we can't lose by joining the union," he said. "I'm single, live at home, and wouldn't think about marriage or trying to raise a family until I get a higher wage."

He also expressed worry about safety conditions, especially in the primate quarters where monkeys can carry diseases fatal to man. He said he feels the present safety precautions might be inadequate.

Dr. L. R. Christensen, Medical Director of the animal laboratory division, said one potentially fatal virus, the Herpes Simiae virus, does occur in monkeys. When contracted by a human bitten by a monkey, the probability of death is 85 per cent. Christensen is preparing a set of directives for the university on monkey care with Canada's leading in monkey expert, Dr. Michael Wolcroft of Connaught.

More exams?

By DAVID WISE

The Geography Departmental Council Tuesday delayed deciding whether or not to set up a strict evaluation system for undergraduate courses.

A proposal which would have instituted compulsory exams and hell curve grading for 100 and 200 series courses was put off after some discussion.

The council's decision will not automatically become binding department policy, as it is only an advisory body to Donald P. Kerr, chairman of the department. Kerr indicated at the meeting that if the policy is implemented, the department would not rigidly scrutinize each course and professor.

The council considered a brief written by undergraduate secretary John Britton in response to "an increasing disparity in grades between various courses at the same level". To illustrate the problem, Britton cited two courses at the same level, one in which there was a 90 per cent possibility of an A or B grade, while in the other, only a 20 per cent possibility.

Britton's memo advises a standardized policy of student assessment in all 100 and 200 level courses. It recommends a bell curve distribution of grades with 70 per cent established as the mean and average grade. Between five and 15 per cent would necessarily get "F" or failing marks.

The memo recommended compulsory final exams worth between 40 and 60 per cent of the final grade in first and second year courses. An amendment, however, was accepted at the meeting stating that in special cases, with approval of the department chairman, professors could use alternative methods of evaluation.

Kerr said, in any case that he would not try to enforce guidelines.

"I operate from a position of complete trust in my colleagues... If one departs significantly from the standard, that is his responsibility."

The student members on the council are expected to propose further amendments to soften the impact of the policy.

Chorus gets $1000 on sour note

By BOB BETTSON

SAC Wednesday passed a $244,500 budget including an allotment of $18,000 to SHOUT (Student Health Organization at the U of T), $1,000 to the Hart House Chorus and $5,000 to Campus Legal Aid.

The Hart House Chorus grant was the first approved under the new constitutional amendments on funding external groups, which were given second and final approval at the meeting.

The new policy allows SAC to grant money only to groups of a university-wide nature after an involved certification process. Outside grants are prohibited.

The Hart House Chorus (formerly the U of T Chorus) had received a grant of $3,500 as a SAC group at the spring budget meeting. Since then they merged with the Hart House Glee Club and with the additional Hart House funding reapplied for a reduced grant of $2,285 under the new regulations.

Council agreed to leave the $18,000 grant to SHOUT in the budget, but deferred approval to the next meeting. This was done on the grounds that the group had yet to go through the required constitutional procedures.

The $5,000 allotment to Campus Legal Aid did not have to go through the same procedure because it was accepted as a SAC project.

The largest item in the budget was $60,591 for the office administration which along with executive salaries of $10,305, OES fees, and other expenses made up the executive commission budget of $96,603.

The next largest item, the budget for The Varsity of $41,729 went through with no changes after some objections from Engineering SAC reps Don Buchan and Cliff Taylor over several small items.

Finance commissioner Vice De Angelo said that "We (SAC) have no control over individual amounts in the budget. Perhaps there should be some renegotiation with The Varsity Board. The present situation is not desirable."

UC rep Bob Anderson said that "The Varsity is one of the few things SAC does that all students are aware of. It would be suicidal to think of a reduction of its budget."

The part of the $2 education levy that hasn't been spent on summer work in Arts and Science will be given to the new Arts and Science Student Union.

It and the one dollar campus centre levy, for which there are no spending plans, were the object of some discussion at the beginning of debate because they were not mentioned in the budget.

De Angelo explained that SAC had little control over these two items, and thus did not seem necessary to put in the budget.

A move to reinstate the Erindale student council rebate, which was chopped from last year's spring budget, by Erindale SACE president Paul Moran, was defeated with only the Erindale reps voting in favour. Moran charged that SAC has gone against the spirit of last year's constitutional conference. "SAC did not reduce its fees as it promised to. It must stop pretending it can fulfill a university-wide, role all the time."

De Angelo replied that the constitutional amendments clearly required all groups wanting to show that benefits from their activities extend to all three campuses. "The budget won't take an Erindale rebate," he said.

Vice-president John Helliwell then moved an amendment that only rebate to Erindale be a direct rebate to the students, and any change in this be made by a referendum of Erindale students. Both this and the main motion were defeated.

The Hart House Chorus was granted $1,000 only after two earlier motions giving them $2,285 and $1500 were defeated because they failed to get the required two thirds majority.

Music SAC rep Marilyn Anthony said that SAC had told the chorus in the spring to go out and get other funding. Now when this had been done they were threatening withdrawal of the grant, she said.

De Angelo charged that the chorus was now a different group. With a tight budget he said, he couldn't see funding a Hart House group.

Engineering rep Don Buchan, however, supported the grant, saying "the chorus should be commended by SAC for going out to find money. It is one of the few groups that has." He added that SAC had already agreed to fund the group and "as far as I'm concerned it's the same group."

The first motion for $2185 was defeated 13-13 and the second for $1500, also failed by one vote to get the required two thirds vote. Finally, a motion for $1,000 won the support of Bob Anderson, whose vote was enough to get it passed.

The contingency fund was left at $11,330 after a transfer of $2500 from the service commission because there were no specific projects proposed.

Communications commissioner Debra Lewis successfully moved an additional $500 to the original $500 for funding college and faculty student papers to be distributed campus-wide.

The remainder of the budget, including the education, university, and communications commission budgets, remained intact.

Bonus! Bonus!

As special bonus to those Varsity staffers and transient youths who attend today's meeting, rare political films concerning the upcoming editorial policy may be shown (negotiations pending).

"Today I am a Man", featuring Varsity editor Alex Podnick may be shown today at 1 pm, if it is flown in from Owen Sound on time. Chicken soup will not be provided.

Staff is welcome to attend, newcomers are encouraged.

"Final stamp of approval"City passes land exchange with Metro Centre

By DOUG HAMILTON

A motion to defer decision on crucial land exchange agreement between the City of Toronto and the developers of Metro Centre was defeated Wednesday by a vote of 14-5 at City Council.

Last May, a land exchange deal was approved in principle by the city and the developers, Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways.

According to Alderman John Sewell, who introduced the motion to delay approval of the deal until next January, when a newly elected council meets the city will be trading land parcels worth $88 million for railway land valued at $15 million.

By approving the bill, Sewell said the council had done "a very, very historic thing" because "the final stamp of approval" had been applied to the deal.

Endorsement of the bill, asserted the Ward 7 alderman, "wraps up the land deal" and "wraps development procedures."

Sewell claimed that the city is now "moving into the morass of implementing Metro Centre." He insisted that the agreement with the developers should not have been approved because major problems with the design of the centre have not been resolved.

He criticized council for approving the project too hastily and warned that "the consequences of this agreement" would be disastrous for Toronto.

There is "inherent badness" in the Metro Centre concept, said Sewell angrily. "The planning was not done in a satisfactory manner."

He insisted the public was not adequately consulted when the centre was planned, and claimed that if the bill was delayed, "the public would then have all the facts before it."

Incensed by Sewell's attack on the land deal, Alderman David Rotenberg, who is running for mayor, declared that "the nonsense of Alderman Sewell hardly deserves a reply."

He denied council's endorsement of the bill could be construed as "a stamp of approval" and claimed that Sewell had "misinterpreted" the agreement.

Rotenberg insisted that Sewell was deliberately misleading the public by claiming the planning of the centre was inadequate.

Sewell, claimed Rotenberg, "does not want to help plan Metro Centre, he wants to help wreck it." Rotenberg told Sewell, "just vote against it and don't mislead the public."

"If no development agreement takes place, no land exchange will take place" and Metro Centre will not be built, concluded Rotenberg.

Voting on another controversial question of selling city land to developers, council approved the sale of Piper Street to the Royal Bank. (Piper Street is a thoroughfare between York and Bay Streets, south of Wellington.) The bank intends to erect a 35 storey edifice in the area.

Sewell again led the attack against the project and the city's decision to sell Piper Street. He described the proposed building as an architectural monstrosity and claimed there was no reason why it should be constructed.

The Varsity—Doug Hamilton

Alderman John Sewell, standing by model of proposed Hydro building, charged excessive development is a "total waste".

"What we have downtown is too much development," said Sewell.

He asserted that there was a surplus of office space in the central core of the city, and cited a case in New York City where a newly erected 35-storey Manhattan office tower had to be demolished because it was continually vacant.

Toronto "is close to the New York situation", declared Sewell. He claimed excessive development constituted "a total waste."

"We are leading ourselves into the very same death trap as New York", he exclaimed.

Downtown development "is totally and utterly out of control," continued Sewell. He said that the city authorities must take steps to ensure that large-scale development is conducted in a rational manner.

"We can do this by holding on to the land we (the city) own in this case, Piper Street."

Radical fighter S. D. Clark makes good at Dalhousie

HALIFAX (CUP) — The man who bitterly resigned the chairmanship of U of T's Department of Sociology two years ago rather than agree to democratization of department decision-making has apparently been called in to quash similar trends at Dalhousie University's sociology and anthropology department.

Distinguished Canadian sociologist Samuel Clark was head of U of T's Sociology Department from the time it was split from the Department of Political Economy until his 1969 resignation. He quit his U of T post upset over student and faculty demands for committee vote counts and the push for increased student participation in department decision-making.

Clark went to Dalhousie with a two-year visiting professor appointment in July, 1972. And, when the then current sociology head decided to quit, Clark was seized upon as the ideal solution, supposedly able to calm the troubled situation in the department and restore good order and peace.

During the past two years, Dalhousie sociology and anthropology chairman Don Clairmont has had to weather two major assaults on the chairman's power. Disgruntled faculty attacked Clairmont for unilaterally concluding "secret deals" with the university administration about hiring new faculty.

And, in a struggle that dragged on through all of last year, Clairmont succeeded in re-defining student representatives out of effective participation in department committees and meetings.

Clairmont managed to persuade a majority of faculty to rally to his position on these two occasions, offering them suitable inducements. However, more trouble seemed to be brewing for this year. Faculty have been increasingly complaining about erosion of the "rule of discussion before decision", while graduate students are highly displeased about new course requirements set after they had accepted admission to the department.

Initial response to news of Clark's impending appointment — without even the formality of the traditional search for applicants within or without the particular university — by faculty and students has been cool. Dalhousie Gazette, the university's student newspaper, exposed Clark's background in a feature printed in this morning's issue.

In 1969, Clark told U of T students and faculty that he "preferred trying to work out situations without voting". "The final responsibility (for decisions) is the chairman's," he said.

"I hoped to avoid the issue of voting because it can lead to irresponsible actions like we saw last Wednesday (when the sociology undergraduate curriculum committee overrode Clark's objections in January, 1969 and ordered that a vote be taken to determine the committee's wishes about a decision he had unilaterally made without consulting the affected parties).

"Decisions and recommendations, and departmental responsibility for them must rest with an identifiable authority, one that be found — namely the chairman," Clark wrote in an April, 1969 memo.

Dare Foods threatens prosecution of student reporter at Glendon

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — Dare Foods has threatened a Glendon College student with prosecution for contempt of court for a story about the Dare boycott published in the college newspaper.

Dare demanded fourth year political science student Bob Edwards make his retraction by November 15.

The company alleges Edwards violated a court injunction prohibiting persons advised of it from "attempting to induce breaches of contract" between Dare and "any other persons or corporations".

Edwards, however, says he has been advised by legal counsel that he is not in breach of the injunction. He is not contemplating making a retraction at this point.

The registered form letter accompanying the copy of the injunction sent Edwards and some members of striking local 173 of the United Brewery Workers charges Dare has evidence indicating recipients of the letter have been involved in efforts leading to the cancellation of contracts with food store chains.

The letter from Dare's lawyer, John Lang, continues, "In my opinion it is unlawful and a breach of the injunction to do anything or say anything to any person in an effort to stop persons or corporations from handling products sold by Dare Foods Limited."

Edwards points out that his implicit suggestion that consumers not purchase Dare cookies until the company grants a fair settlement to its workers and allows a union shop does not fall under the constraints of the injunction. A shopper reading Pro Tem, has no contract to buy Dare products, he explained.

One union member who received the same letter as Edwards, Andrew Diamond, has instructed his lawyer to write Dare's lawyer, John Lang, asking that the statements in the letter be retracted.

Diamond's lawyer has raised the point that Lang's letter posed a threat and as such constitutes an infraction of the Criminal Code.

Preset care blocks development

Mentally handicapped children need freedom

Often, the presence of a mentally handicapped person in a family is a source of embarrassment and shame, a matter to be mentioned as little as possible. The affected person may often be shunted into an institution by his family.

In an effort to meet the needs and acute problems of mentally handicapped persons in a fundamentally different way, a group of activists in Winnipeg set up, a year ago, a "Sisters and Brothers Collective" which attempts to link change in this sphere with an overall societal struggle for liberation. The name of the collective signifies participation by blood sisters and brothers of the handicapped people. It also indicates participation by socialist sisters and brothers who actively identify with the nascent liberation struggle of mentally and physically handicapped persons, their families and associates.

So far the collective's main accomplishment has been involvement in the establishment and running of a bi-weekly Saturday afternoon program for people with severe mental and physical handicaps. The idea is to provide enjoyable recreation and wholesome refreshments while promoting greater social awareness among those enrolled and providing relief for their families.

There are now 28 people enrolled, mostly ranging from 9 to eighteen years and coming from all over Winnipeg. The program is unique in Winnipeg in that it is geared primarily to serving families with the most difficult problems. It is also unique in providing one (volunteer) staff member for each person enrolled as well as free transportation for participants. The program is supported by the Winnipeg branch of the Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded (CAMR). It is run in a school made available by the Winnipeg Parks and Recreation Board. Six of the program's staff are collective members. Most of the others are Faculty of related to the mentally handicapped.

An in-thing these days is "operant conditioning" or "behavioural modification". It is applied at institutions and taught in university psychology departments, as well as being promoted at various conferences for educators.

which it is becoming a fetish.

The way it is applied to mentally handicapped (including autistic) people is the same as it has long been applied in training animals. Favoured behaviour is rewarded with treats, pats on the head, hugs, smiles and compliments. Undesired activity results in withdrawal of attention, dergoing training.

"Operant conditioning" is used to make recipients fit in or conform to obviously inadequate surroundings. Its appeal is high in typical, crowded impersonal institutions and in common, strained family situations caused by the pathetic lack of community facilities useful to the mentally and physically handicapped. "Operant conditioning" does not come anywhere close to the source of the problem. It is simply more sophisticated, liberal, humane, and successful than the brutal traditional forms of dealing with mentally handicapped persons. It lends itself, for example, not only to the teaching of good hygiene, but equally easily (and commonly) to the training of handicapped persons as a cheap and docile supply of labour.

"Operant conditioning" appears to be ideal for training people to more comfortably adjusting to basically degrading or exploitative situations. A massive assault on isolated, overcrowded, understaffed institutions centered around demands for decentralized, community-integrated facilities would be the alternative. The reply to such suggestions, however, when made to those in the field, tends to be "But that's not our job as psychologists; we are simply offering a professional service."

The lack of community facilities geared to handicapped people discriminates particularly heavily against working class families with limited time and resources.

A sharp alternative to emphasis on "operant conditioning" would be emphasis on the development of social appreciation through imaginative Education students preparing to teach "Special Education" courses.

The collective intends to investigate the history of institutions, agencies and programs dealing with mentally handicapped persons in Manitoba. Some contemporary themes are becoming apparent as a result of analysis of various conferences and programs

The basic theory underlying this approach is the idea that people respond to rewards and punishment. When someone receives an unpleasant response to an action, she or he will tend to be discouraged from repeating it, while if a favourable response is gained the action will be encouraged. What is questionable is the exaggerated way the theory is being applied and the way in scoldings, slaps, solitary confinement, or withholding of treats. Desired behaviour is broken down into many successive steps with "operant conditioning", "reinforcing" each progressive step, in order, until it is habit. As in the regular school system and places of work of capitalist society, "desired behaviour" is externally imposed rather than being determined by those un-games and environments where enjoyment is dependent on co-operation. Creating situations where people can build affection and trust for others adds to their all-round level of social responsibility and self-confidence. This is turn should lead to greater initiative and self-reliance. In contrast, exaggerated behavioural modification may generally reinforce inhibitions and dampen experimentation and the overall learning process.

In keeping with its philosophy, the Winnipeg Sisters and Brothers Collective has broadened its interests to include groups with over-lapping or similar concerns as those of families with mentally handicapped members. This has brought it into contact with a group of parents with children on "Doman-Delacato" programs (despite a complete lack of support from local doctors). These programs have been developed at the Institute for the Achievement of Human Potential in Philadelphia. The supporting theory rests on the idea that brain cells pattern themselves in response to external stimuli and the development of muscular functions. Practitioners are thus concerned with treating the brain just as one attempts to cure a disease or non-neurological injury, rather than helping the handicapped to adjust to their handicap.

The programs generally involve many hours a day, so that when positive results appear it is often asked if the key to success was the method or simply the heavy amount of special attention; there does not appear to be a conclusive answer at this point. In any event, families are offered hope by the program and considerable numbers have benefitted while in it. Many families using the Doman-Delacato are doing so after being told by the medical profession that nothing can be done to reduce the handicap which the affected member of the family faces.

In addition to facing different theoretical and applied approaches to working with handicapped persons, the Sisters and Brothers Collective has develop mentally just as well as can "ordinary" persons.

Even worse, the term "mentally retarded" now connotes acceptance of a fixed, low stage of mental development and carries the stigma of being "dumb". As a result of this outlook the "mentally retarded" regularly are not taken seriously and are consequently discouraged from developing their mental capacities. This is in many ways are not very far removed from the ideas associated with the totally dehumanizing reference, so common among children, but by no means only among children (where did they learn the attitude?) to handicapped people as "mental" or "retarded".

Such a patronizing, and dehumanizing attitude, makes it easy for 'liberals' to identify the "mentally retarded" as misfortunates needing help, just as missionaries thought (and still think) of "saving" the "poor people of India" or the inhabitants of reservations in Canada. In practice, such an attitude leads easily to complicity in the oppression of "the less fortunate".

The pitying, charity mentality is nauseatingly displayed in the "Flowers of Hope" campaign in which packets of flower seeds are sold to raise money for the CAMR.

The annual meeting of the CAMR in 1972 was opened with an "Official Retarded Children's Prayer". Printed in blue on a white card, it was distributed with the annual report:

"Almighty and most merciful Father, we who share a common concern for the mentally retarded, bring our desires and hopes for them in confidence to Thee.

"Help us to grow in understanding of Thy plan for all Thy children, so we may fully serve Thee in leading them along paths to happiness.

"Make us sensitive to their inner struggles. Give us eagerness to serve, and consistency in our hopes for every child of Thy love. Grant wisdom and patience to all engaged in teaching, research, family care, and auxiliary services. Fill us with Thy grace that we may have fresh hope and undaunted faith as we aid others in the fulfillment of their lives.

AMEN."

At a recent discussion of "recreational Opportunities for the Mentally Retarded", a panelist exclaimed "the most important gift you can give a retarded child is acceptance. All too plain is the analogy to similar comments that it is time to acknowledge Indians, black people, or women as human beings. The total inadequacy of such an outlook should be apparent, yet it seems to be the root of the CAMR campaigns.

This is what their widely shown film, "Hi, Look Me Over", is all about. The central feature of the film is the parading of mentally handicapped people in front of the general public to be looked over as candidates for compassion and "acceptance as persons". The handicapped children shown are in what is considered by the producers of the film to be attractive form. The film centres on the "Special Olympics" held in Toronto for the top mentally handicapped athletes from across Canada. And those portrayed as most successful are those who have been most completely moulded into conformity with values glorifying individualistic competition.

Of course, liberals sincerely believe that they are doing the most wonderful thing in the world when trying to get "the retarded" accepted as people rather than as monsters and demons. What they are really doing, however, is helping to replace an outlook based on rank bigotry and fear with one based on pity. The liberation of the mentally handicapped however, requires much more.

Russ Rothney

become increasingly familiar with the paternalistic, charity approach which engulfs organizations such as the Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded.

The very expression "mentally retarded" is unscientific and prejudicial in that it implies that mental development is being delayed or can no longer proceed. In fact, however, persons relatively handicapped because of brain injury or genetic characteristics can analogous to what happens to other sectors of the population that are oppressed with the label of inferiority: women, children, racial minorities, workers, the unemployed, welfare recipients, rural people, and the physically handicapped. In the case of mentally handicapped people this is even more serious because of their more critical need to maximize their rate of mental development. Arendt's keen analysis of political crises ignores class interests

Crises of the Republic
by Hannah Arendt
Longmans
$3.75

"I'm going to Saigon next week," said the driver, a geologist for Imperial Oil.

There's oil in Vietnam then?
"Oh sure. The country's floating on it."

Right. Thanks for the ride. Another casual bit of information picked up in the course of hitch-hiking down Yonge St.

But the amazing thing about this tid-bit, was not the fact of oil exploration in South-east Asia — that's been documented before. Rather it was that this fact, although still diligently ignored by the Time-Life-Star axis, is on its way to becoming common knowledge on Yonge Street.

Enter Hannah Arendt (stage centre).

To Arendt, the Vietnam war is a moral abomination. And this book, a collection of four essays, zeroes in again and again on the war as an illustration of fundamental weaknesses in the American policy.

The Pentagon Papers don't provide any new information, Arendt suggests in "Lying in Politics". Rather, they show the extent to which the U.S. administration ignored actual information prepared by its own intelligence services. Even as the Central Intelligence Agency reports that bombing the north will have little effect on Vietnamese morale, the bombs begin to fall.

In trying to figure out why this could happen, Arendt uses the image-reality analysis. The technocrats have a problem (pacifying Vietnam); they create a model to provide the solution (brush-fire wars, limited bombing, limited incursions, etc.). As their models become more complicated, the technocrats' interest in them become more vested. The image of what should be happening in Vietnam splits from the reality of what is happening; to reconcile this split, the technocrats suppress or twist information, causing the credibility gap (or in Arendt's blunter language — the lie).

So the technocrats become the real villains in Arendt's conception of the war, continuing the conflict for the sake of an image.

"The ultimate aim (of the war) was neither power nor profit...the goal was now the image itself."

It's an attractive theory to suppose a major war is the doing of a mystified and mystifying bureaucracy, because it lets everyone else off the hook. But blaming the problem-solvers begs the question — who decided which problems should be solved.

And it denies what is common knowledge on Yonge Street — the existence of powerful economic forces that have an interest in the U.S. presence in Vietnam. These include not only those companies interested in actual resource extraction, like oil, but the corporations who have boomed since the second world war on the manufacture of war and war-related materials. And in the Politics of Heroin in South-east Asia, Alfred W. McCoy suggests another high-profit commodity that may account for an economic interest in Vietnam.

Notice that the latest peace plans contain a provision for heavy American aid to both northern and southern Vietnam. A cynic might conclude from this that the same companies subsidized by the American taxpayer to destroy Vietnam will now be subsidized to rebuild the country. Or in an economist's terms, Nixon's willingness to make peace may simply prove we are at the point where the marginal rate of profit on destruction has diminished to equal the marginal rate of profit on construction.

In short, there is enough evidence to strongly suggest that the U.S. interest in Vietnam has been tied to economic interests of a specific class.

American economist Paul Sweezy is one writer who has integrated this data with analytic theory. "The defence of the U.S. empire, alias the "free world" is literally a life and death matter for a large number of the biggest corporations," he writes in Modern Capitalism and Other Essays. "And for the entire ruling class, massive (and growing) government spending on the war machine is the only acceptable form of surplus utilization on the scale required to keep the U.S. economy from sinking back into the kind of stagnation and mass unemployment which characterized the years of the Great Depression."

Yet Arendt chooses neither to refute or support the theory of a war dominated by class interests and ignores the evidence, insisting instead that "the goals pursued by the United States government were almost exclusively psychologic".

Why she does this is not clear. Arendt is certainly not ignorant of materialist theory. Perhaps it is her reaction against Marxism which causes her to neglect economic factors.

The problem with the Marxist analysis, she says in "Thoughts on Politics and Revolution", (an interview with German writer Adelbert Reif), is that it fails to provide for political and legal institutions that are independent of the economic base.

"What protects freedom is the division between governmental and economic power, or to put it in Marxian language, the fact that the state and its constitution are not superstructures."

And Marxian ideologies, she says in "Civil Disobedience", are actually counter-productive, especially in their tendency to dissolve and split the student movement. She can downplay ideology because she does not perceive the movement to be working for radical political change. Instead she sees the anti-war activists simply as inheritors of the pluralist tradition of voluntary associations.

And as part of the pluralist tradition, would it not be possible, she asks, to find a "niche" for civil disobedience in the institutions of government?

In one of the more blatant suggestions for co-option, Arendt seriously talks of giving civil disobedience groups (draft dodgers, draft card burners, Black Panthers, Weathermen??) the legal status of Congressional lobbyists.

Excuse me Senator — Mr. Rubin and 3000 associates are waiting outside to discuss American imperialism.)

Yet Arendt's practised eye does pinpoint weaknesses in the North American student movement (or what is left of it), particularly what she describes as its "theoretical and analytical dullness".

Arendt is at her best, in this collection, in her interview with writer Reif. As the pair range over topics from socialism to student power in Germany and America, the theorist spells out her position more concretely than in her specific topic essays.

Civil liberty is her major passion, and Arendt justifiably chides the left for tending to dismiss freedom of speech and assembly as "bourgeois freedoms".

Her answer to an immoral administration is the creation of a federated system of councils to govern a nation, a constitution based on voluntary associations. Councils would consist of small groups of interested citizens, chosen through a "self-selective process". Those wishing to participate would do so, the rest wouldn't bother.

It's all very nice, except that Arendt's council system is premised on true equality of opportunity, which historically has never been able to evolve in an economic system dominated by an inequality of wealth.

In her effort to escape historical determinism, Arendt neglects the empirical connections between economic and political power, presenting us instead with a concept of salvation through constitutionalism.

Two post-scripts: One of the four essays is a reprint of "On Violence", the others have appeared in the New York Review of Books and the New Yorker.

But for those unfortunate enough not to be steeped in those periodicals of culture, and who are considering buying the book, here is a point about mystification. The price listed on the book reads "$2.95 — slightly higher in Canada". Actually, the price listed by the Canadian distributor is $3.75, a whopping 27 per cent higher. Which is sort of like saying the new Roberts Library is "slightly higher" than Sidney Smith Hall.

Lasalle plays great fugue of late Beethoven

If all art aspires to the condition of music, as Pater said, then all late Beethoven aspires to the condition of the fugue. I really don't know if I want to defend this stately aphorism. I don't think Pater ever intended to defend his pronouncement (although he did explain it) when he plunked it squarely in the middle of his essay "School of Giorgione". It was an otherworldly feeling he and the other Oscar Wildes of the era had about art — all art — that it constantly strives to alchemize its matter into form, its narrative thrust into pure dramatic thrust.

Well, Beethoven was trying to do something similar with his matter too. It was somehow too volatile and querulous merely to be poured into an eighteenth century mold. It was not at home there and always tugged or pushed at the walls. We needn't sound the clarion call of the revolution, either, in saying that it "aspired" to something freer, but not slicker or easier. On the contrary — tougher and more exacting, as when a chess fiend's game-appetite is whetted finding himself in an impossible situation fabricated by an incomparable opponent.

And, for deaf Beethoven, his health dribbling away, that "situation" was the fugue. I say this flatly and disdain argument. In fact I invoke Sir Donald Tovey and what I'm sure he would have said had he lived to write his analysis of Beethoven's fugal style beyond the first paragraph. The Great Tovey was always (and perhaps the first to do so) finding unbelievably apt items from Beethoven's canon with which to sell his lively theories. So I take as the perfect illustration of my point, Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, opus 130. And not by chance: The well-known Lasalle quartet obliged with a recital of this and two other works November 2 at the Town Hall, as the first part in the International Quartet Series. And what they had to say about Ludwig's fugal style, by means of their playing, was eloquent and telling — Beethovenian, in short.

The first movement is an adagio ma non troppo characterized by a fast, downward fragment which unzips the slow, inward-turning surrounding melody. Beethoven, with this type of contrast, is nudging the fugue. This is followed by a snappy n'er-look-back presto, and then an andante. Here there are two groups: While one tosses up and athletically twirls the melody, the other plays with a version of the same, or runs off briefly in its own little melodic games. The Lasalle brought off this back and forth intimacy very clearly — I found my eyes and ears going from ensemble to ensemble, depending on who had the musical "ball". Again Beethoven is toying with the fugue.

The ensuing alla danza tedesco has but one texture and we won't push a fugue into it. The adagio which precedes the Grosse Fuge (and it is a full-fledged fugue) is a melancholy, almost despairing song. As someone said of Bruckner's sixth symphony, it is fatal to listen to when already depressed because then it could only drive one to drink.

Beethoven seems to sense he has said something very true but also very sad because he follows it with the drunken exorbitance of the most famous fugue ever written, in name at least — the Grosse Fuge. Excepting the choral Kyrie of Bach's B minor Mass, it is also probably the best one ever written. And the Lasalle Quartet made the most of it, attacking its angular rhythms with furious bows — and I mean furious. I don't think I've ever heard horsehair spit and growl more menacingly than in the Lasalle's playing of this movement. And that is alright, because for this work the furioso fugue is Beethoven's answer to what has gone before: The first five movements, each in their own way, are feeling for an "increasingly spiritualized, dematerialized" ground. They are trying to say the most abstract but meaningful thing possible in musical notes. I suppose you can say it takes the tугue to finally set the musical idea free, so that it bobs and sways unpredictably like a kite.

But you never lose sight of where the music is going, which is the fun of listening to a tугue — to see whether the free rein of the theme and the strictures the form imposes can get along, like father and son. The Lasalle, even in the heat of the imbrogio, managed to keep the voices individual, making entrances with vigour and staccato precision. They rightly capitalized on the near insanity of the movement's frenetic self-absorption.

I feel I really owe my more-favourable-than-ever appreciation of the opus 130 to the Lasalle Quartet for having so daringly combined a very refined, ingenuous reading of the earlier narcotic and serene passages with a spit and fire attack of the fugue. They certainly presented it in all its delirious glory, and I was happy about their approach, if others might fear it was too ragged and perhaps even tonally ragged.

It is so easy to get caught up in the enthusiasm which Beethoven applied to his tremendous work, that we forget two other works were part of the same concert. Mozart's D minor quartet opened the evening. I really don't know what the Lasalle was thinking of when they planned their interpretation of this fragile, tractable piece of Mozartian Revelation. I suppose it is alright to do what they did to it, that is draw out Mozart's rather lyrical phrases into expansive Brahmsian sighs. (But, gee pop, it sure sounded different.) And the funny thing is, just as you sometimes think Brahms is going to fall off his horse when the broad rhythm of his canter runs up against tonal and harmonic fences, so too I squirmed in my seat as the Lasalle's lazy leaning into the piece very nearly led to total collapse of forces at the beginning. I think things picked up in the allegretto, and I really wanted to ask them to play it again.

The second work was Gyorgy Ligeti's second quartet written in 1968. It is a tour de force of sound effects, as was his eerie contribution to the movie 2001: A Space Odyssey; (no, not the blue Danube). The third movement exploits plucking of the strings, especially near the bridge of the stringed instruments, and even between the bridge and string holder (as on a guitar) where the notes are crystal-clear high frequency "pings". The ensemble work here was first-rate. The bizarre and in their own way touching effects of this movement seemed to be exacted effortlessly by the players from their instruments. This is not always so in the piece. For example, some sustained high-pitched notes are impossible to intone smoothly and correctly, so amateurish squeaks will be unavoidable, and were in this performance. A small quibble, perhaps.

Legati places rests before and after movements and the players studiously followed directions, their bows suspended in mid-air over their instruments for some seconds. I think these (reminiscent of Cage) silences were very effective.

But again tough, hard playing characterized the Lasalle's overall approach to the piece, which I think demands aggressiveness. They know only too well what they are doing when they play modern music, and it's too bad other ensembles can't at least be as adventurous — if not as expert. Various and ingenious approaches to modern music could very easily sell it, as they have the classics. After all, the Budapest Quartet was famous, not for its dedication to classicism, but for the singularity of its style in playing the old warhorses. Until we have other approaches for comparison, those of the Lasalle and a few other quartets will become definitive and wear the pieces thin.

There are five more to go in the series. The St. Lawrence Centre is again being very good to music lovers this year. Ian Scott

America at the Apocalypse, or, Yes, Virginia, there is a ruling ideology

Writing on the 1961 trial of Adolph Eichmann in Jerusalem, Hannah Arendt reflected on what she called the "banality of evil". The phrase was a reference to the matter-of-fact, mildly puzzled way in which the meek former bureaucrat explained his role in organizing the murder of six million of his fellow human beings. The man in the prisoner's dock during that trial was no monster, grotesquely deformed morally, but a terrifyingly normal product of the middle classes of one of the most civilized nations on earth. His regret was not for his acts, but for the fact that the failure of the Nazis had exposed him to the vengeance of others.

It was the "banality of evil" that came vividly to mind when Richard Nixon, the uprooted used-car salesman from middle America came onto the television screens on Tuesday night. There was an obvious, almost touching desire on his part that Americans listen to and believe the vacuous platitudes about freedom and democracy and peace that he was speaking, a sincerity that not even the ill-concealed, self-satisfied smirk on his face could quite erase. And, of course, Americans did believe him. That day, they had swarmed to the polls to overwhelmingly elect him over McGovern, the anti-war liberal, who, never radical to begin with, and only too willing to compromise his policy platforms for the sake of power, had nevertheless been stigmatized as something of an extremist. On Tuesday night, when America rejected the only-too-moderate Democrat in favour of the clearly right-wing Richard Nixon, in spite of the endless string of broken promises, in spite of the Pentagon papers and the Watergate affair, in spite of abundant evidence of corruption in Washington, in spite of the murder of countless Vietnamese, it was only too clear why the German people were able to elect the government they did in 1933.

Perhaps the most galling thing for American liberals in these post-election days has been the comparison of Nixon's landslide victory to that of Roosevelt in 1936. That Nixon, the unsavouriness of whose record is perhaps unmatched among holders of the Presidency (or is it just that it has been more publicized?), should be compared to FDR, almost a saint to many who see themselves as being in the tradition of progressive American liberalism — well, it is infuriating.

I sat at my desk and got on with my job. — Adolph Eichmann

The grounds for their anger, however, are largely illusory. For while American voters have been casting their ballots, and while the vast majority of American intellectuals have been acting as apologists for the American power structure, and for the ideological tradition that nourishes them, a new breed of American historians has emerged. And they have systematically, and thoroughly, cut the ground away from under all the accepted interpretations of American history. The old cliches are no longer valid.

A new generation of American revisionist and New Left historians (although they remain a minority, of course, even among their peers) has dedicated itself to demolishing the dominant myths of the United States. Historians and critics such as Gabriel and Joyce Kolko (The Triumph of Conservatism, The Roots of American Foreign Policy, The Politics of War, and The Limits of Power), David Horowitz (From Yalta to Vietnam, Empire and Revolution, Containment and Revolution, Corporations and the Cold War), Walter LaFeber (America, Russia, and the Cold War), Gar Alperovitz (Atomic Diplomacy), Barton Bernstein (Towards a New Past), Marvin Gettleman and David Mermelstein (The Failure of American Liberalism), Noam Chomsky (American Power and the New Mandarins, At War With Asia), Harry Magdoff (The Age of Imperialism), William Leuchtenfeld (American Diplomacy, The Contours of Domhoff (The Higher Circles), Lloyd Garrison (New Deal Diplomacy), James Weinstein (Liberal State and For a New America)) calibre, painstakingly researched and nature of the American state. Their impact has been devastating.

Among the latest of these works published under the title of A New History interestingly enough, by a New Left radical, Radosh, and by a right-wing libertarian, in the preface, the co-editors explain their collection both reject the dominant liberal ideology and are thus able to "transcend the ideological limitations of both liberal and conservative corporations to mask their hegemony of power."

And the statement turns out to be no less true in the case of the post-war corporate state, the era from Wilson to the present. American liberal capitalism made a mockery of itself in changing conditions, — while keeping its structure intact — yet another nail into the intellectual coffin.

As well, the book maintains a high level of interest shared by most of the revisionist historians and in marked contrast to an earlier tradition of radical historiography, — a correlation of economic determinism — which produced generalizations and faulty documentation to discredit the left both intellectually and morally.

The main focus is U.S. domestic politics. The authors show that "corporate welfare capitalism, Keynesian economics, on state intervention, regulation of corporations, its acceptance of the involvement of the government in welfare for the rest, is not something that emerged from the old "laissez-faire" business liberalism, but was imposed by reformers against the united opposition of the community. Rather, the new corporate state, that, while clearly a major adjustment of the old order, got established without difficulties and opposition, and logically from the old order, supported by the dominant political and corporate forces. In short, differences, it becomes clear, were for the sake of detail, or between the far-sighted and the ruling classes. Decisively refuted is the liberalist, that, in Arthur Schlesinger's words, has been ordinarily the movement on the part of the society to restrain the power of the state. In the conflicts, it is made clear, were within liberalism, the ideology of the dominant business class, which have consistently favored state intervention to regulate and cartelize business activity." The authors, Democrats and "pro-business" Republicans, have accepted and supported all the basic tenets of capitalism.

Thus, Woodrow Wilson, so often portrayed as the spokesman for the individual, whom high ideals and practical shrewdness combined in a consistent pattern of thought. As Wilson, Secretary of State, said in explaining Wilsonian universal brotherhood is not sentimentalism, but philosophy." For Wilson, it meant a world of peace.

Will you never learn the fact that governments by theories? You account for the circumstances.

In such a world, peace would contradict the interests of the people, and, as well, would provide an opportunity for the America must engage in.

And Wilson accepted the American business system as a large corporation was dominant. What he meant was that the U.S. had not adjusted to the change in the world, and return to the old order of individual competition. The laws are still meant for business done by individuals. The world is not satisfactorily adjusted to business done by large corporations. We have got to adjust them." Wilson, the "man", it was in the context of wanting to restore the corporate order.

The Wilsonian era, then, saw a continuation of the early years of the century, which, as Gabriel Kolko said, was the development of the control of major economic power "rather than political regulation of the economy."

The administrations of Harding and Coolidge saw no significant changes in the nature and structure of the political economy. The basic structures as established by Theodore Roosevelt and Wilson remained intact.

Then came the election of Hoover in 1929. Hoover, the Depression. The accepted interpretation of Hoover, unwilling to abandon laissez-faire, hoped that the Depression would naturally correct itself.

The truth, however, as Rothbard shows, is that Hoover, far from being an advocate of laissez-faire, was a precursor of Roosevelt and the New Deal. Hoover, the leaders of the twentieth-century shift from individual capitalism to the modern corporate state. When the stock market crashed, Hoover moved to government-business planning, fixing prices, and public-works programs, incurring a deficit in the budget. It amounted to massive, unprecedented intervention in the economy, and none of the rhetoric heard in the election of 1932 could cloak that fact.

Roosevelt and the New Deal, then, continued the already established trends of the early years of the century. With the New Deal, the responsibility for prosperity and the political economy, "laissez-faire" and the "free market" were not wholly abandoning the belief that it was the responsibility of the government to be on relief, the administration's responsibility to ensure that all citizens re-

And the effect was to save American capitalism in the time of its greatest crisis. As Barton Bernstein states, "The liberal reforms of the New Deal did not transform the American system; they conserved and protected American corporate capitalism, occasionally by absorbing parts of threatening programs. There was no significant redistribution of power in American society, only limited recognition of other organized groups. . ."

What the New Deal represented was an important stage in the evolution of American liberalism to fit the changed situation of the American political and economic order. Laissez-faire had been the liberalism which corresponded to the ideological needs of the governing classes during the era of competitive capitalism. Coming into existence as a progressive reaction to the stifling hand of government which survived from feudal and mercantile times, laissez-faire made possible the accumulation of wealth that could best occur when the government interfered least in the internal workings of the economy. In this period, the government acted primarily as an umpire between business interests, making sure that the rules of 'fair competition' were not transgressed openly.

Competitive laissez-faire capitalism, however, had inevitably led by the end of the nineteenth century to big business, oligopoly, and monopoly. The ideology of free competition now corresponded less and less to the facts, although for a time the principles of the free market, free enterprise, and individual initiative, while increasingly more myths than reality, were both useful shields for the monopolists' power, and firmly believed in by them. It was the New Deal, more than anything else, that marked acceptance by the corporate leaders and the politicians. The process, however, had been under way for decades.

The executive of the modern state is but a committee for managing the affairs of the whole bourgeoisie. — Karl Marx

Perhaps one of the most enlightening essays in the Radosh and Rothbard book is the one discussing James Burnham, an intellectual who was a Communist in the 1930's, but who later moved to the far right, and who argued in his Managerial Revolution, written in his later period, that the repugnant features of the old capitalism had been made obsolete by the separation of ownership and control in modern corporations. Now, Burnham and others like him argued, — John Kenneth Galbraith is the premier example of the 1960's — corporations were controlled by men whose interests were the public welfare, not profit.

On one level, the thesis has been refuted by writers who have shown that ownership and management are in fact still very closely tied in corporations, and that at any rate economic survival makes it imperative that corporations try to maximize profits. On another level, it is clear why radicals such as Burnham accepted and applauded the society consolidated by the New Deal. What they rejected was the anarchy of competition and the market, and the inhumanity it produced. What they advocated was planning, doing away with the unregulated market, stronger labour unions, welfare measures, and state regulation of, and participation in, the economy, things they associated with left-wing ideology. But precisely these things were now being demanded by the leading representatives of the capitalism system. Capitalism, it seemed was slowly evolving into socialism. It seemed, and all without the excesses being reported from the Soviet Union! A new social order, neither capitalism or socialism, it seemed, was coming into existence. Thus the new corporate state capitalism won the adherence of many of those who had been formerly among its harshest critics. Liberalism claimed its own once again.

In the field of foreign policy, as well, revisionist historians have fundamentally re-interpreted American history. They have shown that the U.S. has a history of expansion, physical, economic, and military, since its earliest days. It is only the form of the expansion that has differed.

Thus, in the 1890's, the Open Door Policy, portrayed as opposition to European imperialism, was actually an attempt by the U.S. to break into markets controlled by the European powers who held concessions there. The rhetoric of justice and freedom that accompanied it was deeply and sincerely meant, but freedom for an American quite obviously included freedom of trade, wherever American business wanted to go.

My department is your department; the ambassadors, the ministers and consuls are all yours. It is their business to look after your interests and to guard your rights.

— William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State, addressing American businessmen

Similarly, the "isolationism" of the 1920's and 1930's was opposition to military involvement outside the borders of the U.S. But in no way was it opposition to economic expansion; on the contrary, it was assumed that only in a world where nations did not have foreign entanglements would the optimum atmosphere for American business abroad exist. Again, the liberal belief in an ordered, law-abiding community of nations, free of military alliances, in no way contradicted the desire for trade and investment in all parts of the globe.

And when the Second World War propelled the U.S. into the role of the world's leading military power, the nation did not hesitate to accept its new position. U.S. military involvement extended everywhere, protecting American investments and maintaining the status quo against popular uprisings. The process was accompanied by the rhetoric of anti-communism, but anti-communism came to have a special meaning in Cold War America: anything the U.S. did not approve of, anything that went counter to its interests, was communist-inspired, and could legitimately be intervened in. It was the U.S., not the Soviet Union, that was the instigator of the Cold War, the revisionists have shown, and the impact of their impeccably documented evidence and conclusions is still being felt in intellectual circles.

What can one say about a country where a museum of science in a great city can feature an exhibit in which people fire machine guns from a helicopter at Vietnamese huts, with a light flashing when a hit is scored? What can one say about a country where such an idea can even be considered?

— Noam Chomsky

In the light of this history, it is a little easier to see why the comparison of Nixon and Roosevelt is not quite so outrageous as it might seem at first glance.

Both lie squarely within the tradition of American corporate liberalism: both accepted foreign involvements and intervention, seeing them both as good for the world's people, and good for American business; both accepted the basic tenets of state capitalism: government regulation of the economy, planning, intimate interlocking of government and corporate sectors. No fundamental antagonism between them was perceived by either.

It was Roosevelt who presided over the working out of one phase of the adjustment of American capitalism to changed conditions and needs. It was during his term that the changing relation of the state and business sector received a new definition, and that the U.S. moved onto the world stage as the premier power, but one threatened by the power of the Soviet Union.

Surely the second coming is at hand.

— W. B. Yeats

And it is Richard Nixon who has presided over the working out of a new stage in international relations. It is he who finalized the detente, developing over the last decade, with the Soviet Union, and with China. What it amounts to is a massive consolidation of imperialism: a stabilization of the world order that can have untold benefits for an American capitalist class worried that its grip on empire was threatened. The problems of international balance of trade and currency have been confronted. And domestically, the lid has been clamped on unrest, and the allegiance of a large part of the American population to the new order solidified. What may perhaps be the final phase in this new stage, the imposition of wage and price controls to bring inflation and unemployment within manageable proportions, seems to be under way.

If Richard Nixon can successfully complete all that he has set out to do, he could well equal Franklin Roosevelt in importance. For the rest of the world, for those outside the new consensus within the U.S. or without, it will likely mean what the period of American hegemony has meant thus far: rivers of blood, and years of darkness. But the previous adjustments of American liberalism, despite an immense capacity to adapt, have not been able to prevent the contradictions of capitalism from emerging anew, and with even greater force. Therein lies hope.

A New History of Leviathan, Ronald Radosh and Murray Rothbard, Dutton Paperback, $3.45

The politics of housework: oppression and liberation through struggle at home.

Women find that they are trapped in their homes by housework, unable to get out and lead lives of their own.

Housework. What? You say this is all trivial? Wonderful! That's what I thought. It seems perfectly reasonable. We both had careers, both had to work a couple of days a week to earn enough to live on, so why shouldn't we share the housework? So I suggested it to my mate and he agreed — most men are too hip to turn you down flat. You're right, he said. It's only fair.

Then an interesting thing happened. I can only explain it by stating that we women have been brainwashed more than even we imagine. Probably too many years of seeing media-women coming over their shiny waxed floors or breaking down over their dirty shirt collars. Men have no such conditioning. They recognize the essential fact of housework right from the very beginning. Which is that it stinks.

Here's my list of dirty chores: buying groceries, carting them home and putting them away; cooking meals and washing dishes and pots; doing the laundry; digging out the place when things get out of control; washing floors. The list could go on but the sheer necessities are bad enough. All of us have to do these jobs, or get someone else to do them for us. The longer my husband contemplated these chores, the more repulsed he became, and so proceeded the change from the normally sweet considerate Dr. Jekyll into the crafty Mr. Hyde who would stop at nothing to avoid the horrors of — housework. As he felt himself backed into a corner laden with dirty dishes, brooms, mops and reeking garbage, his front teeth grew longer and pointier, his fingernails haggled and his eyes grew wild. Housework trivial? Not on your life! Just try to share the burden.

So ensued a dialogue that's been going on for several years. Here are some of the high points.

'I don't mind sharing the housework, but I don't do it very well. We should each do the things we're best at.'

Meaning: Unfortunately I'm no good at things like washing dishes or cooking. What I do best is a little light carpentry, changing light bulbs, moving furniture. (How often do you move furniture?)

Also meaning: Historically the lower classes (Blacks and women) have had hundreds of years doing menial jobs. It would be a waste of manpower to train someone else to do them now.

Also meaning: I don't like the dull stupid boring jobs, so you should do them.

'I don't mind sharing the work, but you'll have to show me how to do it.'

Meaning: I ask a lot of questions and you'll have to show me everything, everytime I do it because I don't remember so good. Also, don't try to sit down and read while I'm doing my jobs because I'm going to annoy hell out of you until it's easier to do them yourself.

'We used to be happy!' (Said whenever it was his turn to do something.)

Meaning: I used to be so happy.

Also meaning: Life without housework is bliss. No quarrel here. Perfect agreement.

'We have different standards, and why should I have to work to your standards. That's unfair.'

Meaning: If I begin to get bugged by the dirt and crap, I will say 'This place sure is a sty' or 'How can anyone live like this?' and wait for your reaction. I know that all women have a sore called guilt over a messy house or housework is ultimately my responsibility. If I rub this sore long and hard enough it'll bleed and you'll do the work. I can outwait you.

Also meaning: I can provoke innumerable scenes over the housework issue. Eventually, doing all the housework yourself will be less painful to you than trying to get me to do half.

'I've got nothing against sharing the housework, but you can't make me do it on your schedule.'

Meaning: passive resistance. I'll do it when I damn well please, if at all. If my job is doing dishes it's easier to do them once a week. If taking out laundry, once a month. If washing the floors, once a year. If you don't like it, do it yourself often, and then I won't do it at all.

'I hate it more than you. You don't mind it so much.'

Meaning: Housework is shitwork. It's the worst crap I've ever done. It's degrading and humiliating for someone of my intelligence to do it. But for someone of your intelligence...

'Housework is too trivial to even talk about.'

Meaning: It's even more trivial to do. Housework is beneath my status. My purpose in life is to deal with matters of significance. Yours is to deal with matters of insignificance. You should do the housework.

'In animal societies, wolves, for example, the top animal is usually a male even where he is not chosen for brute strength but on the basis of cunning and intelligence. Isn't that interesting?'

Meaning: I have historical, psychological, anthropological and biological justification for keeping you down. How can you ask the top wolf to be equal?'

'Women's Liberation isn't really a political movement.'

Meaning: The Revolution is coming too close to home.

Also meaning: I am only interested in how I am oppressed, not how I oppress others. Therefore, the war and the university are political. Women's Liberation is not.

'Man's accomplishments have always depended on getting help from other people, mostly women. What great man would have accomplished what he did if he had to do his own housework?'

Meaning: Oppression is built into the system and as the male receive the benefits of this system. I don't want to give them up.

POSTSCRIPTS

Participatory democracy begins at home. If you are planning to implement your politics there are certain things to remember.

1. He is feeling it more than you. He's losing some leisure and you're gaining it. The measure of your oppression is his resistance.

2. It is a traumatizing experience for someone who has always thought of himself as being against any oppression or exploitation of one human being by another to realize that in his daily life he has been accepting and implementing (and benefiting from) this exploitation; that his rationalization is little different from that of the racist who says 'Niggers don't feel pain' (women don't mind doing the shitwork), and that the oldest form of oppression in history has been the oppression of 50 per cent of the population by the other 50 per cent.

3. Arm yourself with some knowledge of the psychology of oppressed peoples everywhere and a few facts about the animal kingdom. I admit playing top wolf or who runs the gorillas is silly but as a last resort men bring it up all the time. Talk about bees. If you feel really hostile, bring up the sex life of spiders. After sex, she beats off his head.

The psychology of oppressed peoples is not silly. Blacks, women, and immigrants have all employed the same psychological mechanisms to survive. Admiring the oppressor, glorifying the oppressor, wanting to be like the oppressor, wanting the oppressor to like them.

4. Keep checking up. Periodically consider who's actually doing the jobs. These things have a way of backsliding so that a year later once again the woman is doing everything. Use timesheets if necessary. Also bear in mind what the worst jobs are, namely the ones that have to be done every day or several times a day. Also the ones that are dirty — it's more pleasant to pick up books, newspapers, etc., than to wash dishes. Alternate the bad jobs. It's the daily rigid grind that gets you down. Also make sure that you don't have the responsibility for the housework with occasional help from him. 'I'll cook dinner for you tonight' implies that it's really your job and isn't he a nice guy to do some of it for you.

5. Most men had a bachelor life during which they did not starve or become encrusted with crud or buried under the litter. There is a taboo that says that women mustn't strain themselves in the presence of men — we haul around fifty pounds of groceries if we have to but aren't allowed to open a jar if there is someone around to do it for us. The reverse side of the coin is that men aren't supposed to be able to take care of themselves without a woman. Both are excuses for making women do the housework.

6. Beware of the double whammy. He won't do the little things he always did because you're now a 'Liberated Woman', right? Of course, he won't do anything else either.

I was just finishing this when my husband came in and asked what I was doing. Writing a paper on housework. Housework? he said. Housework? Oh my god how trivial can you get. A paper on housework. Pat Malfardi

Men and women both have trouble staying afloat in the sea of troubles that capitalism engulfs them in. At the same time, however, women are doubly oppressed, by men.

A vibrant view of Kafka's universe stuns senses in Kurt Reis' Trial

"Sure, I read The Trial," a friend remarked to me, after I told her I would be seeing the adaptation of the novel by Franz Kafka now playing at the St. Lawrence Centre. "I never finished it, actually. . . ." she added sheepishly. We then compared notes, for I, too, had to admit that I had abandoned the protagonist Joseph K. in some corridor before his final demise.

There was no temptation to abandon Joseph K. as he was presented Tuesday night at the St. Lawrence Centre. The production of Kurt Reis assaulted the senses, titillated the imagination, and was thus, in every sense of the word, a work exploiting the potentials of the theatrical medium.

Its text, a translation of the dramatization by Andre Gide and Jean-Louis Barrault, gives quite a direct, unadorned impression of Joseph K.'s "arrest" and journey into the nightmare of bureaucracy, corruption, cruelty, suffering and, above all, illogic, from which he is destined never to escape. It would be interesting to learn how precise the directions for actors and designers were, in fact, for only then could we attempt to measure the ingenuity found in this production apart from the dialogue. Faced with a new production of a translation of an adaptation of a novel which had an incredible impact on the literary world (whew!), it is probably best to close the door to this Kafka-like maze of preconceptions and concentrate on the stage during the two-and-one-half hour play.

The first half of the play communicates in a variety of ways the world of average, successful businessman Joseph K. as it is gradually being invaded by irrational forces beyond his control. We see him wake up to the music of a clock radio and perform an incredibly "normal" toilette before an imaginary mirror that happens to be the audience. The inane "mood music" that emerges at different times contrasts the jarring bells and electronic sounds that suggest the trial that alters the normal course of his life.

Brian Petchey stresses the petty vanity of the young executive in a burlesque style of acting which is echoed in his relations with others. This exaggerated comic interpretation is found above all in the sexual encounters. We meet the lecherous landlady, Mrs. Grubach (Jennifer Phipps) whose eager arms are abandone for the frustrated arms of Miss Burstner (Vivian Reis). In both cases, the protagonist is the object of passion rather than the aggressor, with comic results.

He is the passive victim, as well, in the initial arrest and questioning, which seem a game for which he has not been prepared. In his busy office, admirably represented by a stream of mechanized, gray-clad bureaucrats scurrying through the different levels of the stage, he knows the rules of the game. The unexplained arrest, at this point only a psychological and not a physical fact, leaves him in helpless agitation.

Joseph K.'s trial becomes an increasingly large part of his existence, until he loses his bravado in the second act, and admits that perhaps he didn't take it seriously enough at first. The atmosphere changes from one of bizarre comedy to grotesque horror. Leni, webbed-fingered nymphomaniac (where "accused men" are concerned), scurries back and forth like a little rodent at the residence of the decrepit lawyer, Huld, (Claude Bede). Huld is also tended upon by an ancient, blind chief clerk and a repulsive, accused man called Block (Ronald Bishop) whose chief occupation is kissing Huld's feet. The sense of strangulation and repugnance felt by the protagonist crescendo during his encounter with the homosexual portraitist, Titorelli, and his hoard of clinging, taunting brats. The artist is owned by the law, as is the chaplain who finally convinces K. that he has no hope of escape.

The performances are first-rate. From the haunting chorus of the accused to the non-speaking roles there is an amazing unity of style in this production. Brian Petchey above all, carries his role sensitively, evolving from a buffoonish victim of the system he incarnates to a pathetic wreck left to die "like a dog".

Multilevel platforms, multipurpose metal crate-like constructions with wooden tops serving as furnishings, a few long staircases, and a rising underground level all contributed to the impression of a labyrinth of the mind. Lighting effectively defines the areas of the stage being used, and makes transitions and rappings among the various levels an eloquent aspect of the play.

Kurt Reis has given a vibrant view of Kafka's universe, and it makes for powerful theatre. Orson Welles treated the same theme in film, and with the obvious advantage of film techniques to distort reality, created a much less human and engaging interpretation. He gave far less emphasis to the sexual themes, and his Joseph K. seemed obviously repressed and guilt-ridden.

The Trial will probably inspire more interpretations to come, but for sheer appreciation of effective theatre, I recommend this one.

French groups on campus explore possibilities of more Quebec works

There we were, Danielle, Michel et moi, (and myself, I mean), sitting in a crowded Honey-Dew restaurant, incongruous setting for a discussion of French cultural activities on campus. Danielle Zanna, instructor at Victoria College, and Michael Macina, a fourth year French major from St. Michael's are each directing productions that together form the Soirée Poétique now seen at the UC Playhouse.

The two first described to me the content of Soirée. It is delightful, cabaret-style entertainment. Macina's production of Christoph Colomb by the late Belgian playwright Michel de Ghelderode is a light, humorous work, and Mademoiselle Zanna's Troupe Café-Theatre presents a series of sketches, songs, poems, and a one-act play by Jean Tardieu. The atmosphere during the performance of these modern works is warm and informal; the result is fun for audience and performers alike.

Danielle, shaking her lioness coiffure, and giving me the impression of a Barbra Streisand "à la française" explained the philosophy behind the choice of material.

Danielle — Why should French theatre in a university setting always be restricted to the classics? Moliere is so overdone and complicated to produce, whereas the new works... (She looks down suddenly at her order of chicken-in-a-basket)... My God! How do they expect me to eat this? I've got to get a plate! (Rapid sortie) moi — Where do you find your actors? Aren't there language problems — intonation and pronunciation, for example?

Michel — We get people from all the colleges. Mostly those specializing in French, of course. (He looks thoughtful for a moment). Sure, there's a fair amount of difficulty with the text sometimes. You need to coach them...

Danielle — (in between mouthfuls of chicken) Yes, but you know... in the past year of the Troupe (the tone of voice and rolled "r" seem to capitalise it), the members improved their French fantastically. Its the way to learn the language. We work alot on phonetics... Listen, I have to have an express. Otherwise I will sleep. Let's go, O.K.? (Michel helps Danielle slink into her enormous sheep-skin coat. I don my leather jacket, declining his offer of assistance. Ten minutes later we are "a table" in the Jack and Jill cafe).

moi — Have you considered working with French-Canadian materials, Danielle?

Danielle — Oh yes, of course. I want to look into the literature of Quebec, but to find the kind of thing the Cafe-Theatre needs requires some time... The Glendon campus has a large body of Quebecois, both students and professors. They are very unrecpeptive to French culture there. Everything has to be pure Quebecois, you know. But I am very open to material from French Canada...

moi — (delicately) There really could be more happening on campus in the way of French and Québecois culture, you probably agree... Do you see any possibility of the various French clubs getting together?

Michel — That's what should happen. The clubs are incredibly isolated... Cathy Sumer (president of the University College Cercle Français) thinks that uniting the clubs would be a good idea. Nothing has been done on it for this year, though.

Danielle — The Café Théâtre performed at the first meeting of the Cercle Français you know. Oh, yes! And I nearly forgot to tell you. We will have a special place in Victoria College from now on. Its a room next to the language laboratory, and we will decorate with posters... Moulin Rouge, you know... and flowers and pink lights. It will be called Le Cafe Théâtre. We'll perform there in early December, I think. Oh, God! What time is it? (Michael and I are immediately on our feet).

Later on I was walking along Yonge Street, trying to remember what John Evans (president of U of T) had mentioned on the subject of cooperation rather than competition among the colleges. I couldn't think straight, though. I kept hearing the melody Heure Exquise

THIS MAN IS GUILTY BY BIRTH

Yuriy Shukhevych and his 2 year old son, 1972

Yuriy Shukhevych, Age 39. Ukrainian political prisoner. Since the age of 15, he has spent 20 years in Soviet concentration camps. Yuriy's guilt: being the son of a man who led the Ukrainian Resistance against Hitler and Stalin during World War II.

"... They continue to persecute my mother. Many people continue to suffer imprisonment. All this happens under the resounding declarations about justice and legality... I turn to you because it may happen that in a few months time a new crime will be committed against me: they will again fabricate a new case to get me sentenced for the third time..."

Yuriy Shukhevych, 28th July, 1967
Camp 17, Ozerny, Mordovian ASSR.

On September 12, 1972, Shukhevych was again sentenced at a secret trial to 10 years in hard labour camps and 5 years exile.

WHAT CAN HIS SON EXPECT?

Arlo, son of Woodie, returns to T-town

The first time Arlo Guthrie appeared in Toronto was in 1967 at the age of 20. Having just begun his professional career, the booking at the now defunct (and then out-of-the-way) coffeehouse, The Seven of Clubs, was hoped to attract audiences who wanted to see the son of the legendary folk hero, Woody Guthrie. Something must have clicked, 'cause Arlo was soon back in Toronto at the Riverboat, and there were rumblings about his performance of a hilarious half-hour-long song.

Arlo cut his first album in the summer of that same year and it featured his 18 minute version Alice's Restaurant on side one. There were few rock FM radio stations around at the time (CHUM-FM didn't change to a rock format until a year later) and AM stations wouldn't touch a song of that length. There was, however, a progressive station in Boston that did play the entire song and it soon developed a large underground following. Alice's Restaurant hit the Toronto airwaves through the Ryerson station CJRT-FM on the Joe Lewis Saturday folk show. But by then most radio stations were beginning to accept the reality of longer album cuts, and criticism of the US draft system and the Vietnam war was no longer taboo. So Arlo's song even made the CKFH playlist, although usually in two parts.

It took quite a while, but Alice's Restaurant became a runaway hit. The humorous story line attracted the attention of director Arthur Penn (Bonnie and Clyde and Little Big Man) who put the ironical tale of Arlo's rejection from army service on film. All the principals in Arlo's real life drama were in the movie, including officer Obee, Alice and of course Arlo himself. The success of the 1969 film, again boosted sales of the album so one would think Arlo could retire by now.

But Woody's kid was really interested in music, not the green stuff, and continued writing and singing. His second album, Arlo, featured self-penned material and a couple of humouristic-musical pieces in the Alice's Restaurant vein. The third album was a break from the past though. Running Down The Road contained straight songs — comedy was out. And besides Arlo's own songs, which were clearly several cuts above those on the premier album, he showed his hand at musical interpretation of several other artists' material. It's a likeable album even now, but there were a couple of thin spots. Unfortunately few record buyers knew or cared that it existed.

Interest in Arlo Guthrie was renewed to some extent by his appearance in the Woodstock movie and LP, which gave exposure to his dope smuggling song, Coming Into Los Angeles. Washington County, released about a year and a half ago, was a melodically mature collection of Guthrie compositions augmented by a few other tunes. It really proved that Arlo was a serious, very capable songwriter.

The latest album, Hobo's Lullaby, is aimed in a new direction not musically but structurally. Arlo has concentrated on performing and interpreting and has significantly dimmed the spotlight on his composing talents by trimming the number of his own songs to two. Musicianship is most certainly maintained at a high level with the backup talents of numerous well knowns including, Ry Cooder, Hoyt Axton, Jim Keltner (Harrison's percussion man on Bangla Desh), Fritz Richmond, and Linda Ronstadt. The sound is contemporary folk with some soft country undercurrents and sets the background for hobo journeys through train yards, union halls, bars, and prisons.

As he's done on the last three albums, Arlo sings one of Woody's songs. The 1973 Massacre is one of the elder Guthrie's more melodic pieces. Arlo phrases with conviction and reverence recounting the harassment of copper miners and their families at a Christmas celebration, by "scabs" and "copper boss thug men" that leads to the death of 73 children. The simple arrangement and fresh vocal quality in Dylan's When the Ship Comes In makes that song too, billow and come alive with a relevant vigor.

Arlo's own tunes are good as any he's written. Days are Short is a quiet lyrical reflection that gets driven along by Ry Cooder's subtle slide guitar complements. But it's strangely a Steve Goodman composition, The City of New Orleans, that attracts a lot of attention on the album. The song has become familiar to AM listeners and brought Arlo into the Top 40.

Hobo's Lullaby grows on you and a few careful listenings are most rewarding. If you can get into it, you might note that Arlo is slated to appear at O'Keete Centre next week.

A LETTER FROM AVRAAM SHIFRIN

(Russian-born Avraam Shifrin settled in Israel in 1970. From 1952 to 1962 he was an inmate of Soviet concentration camps.)

People! You who live in cozy apartments, who eat three meals a day. You who don't know the terrors of arrest and the distress for those who are left behind - family and children. You who express your indignation about the persecution of Manolis Glesos and Angela Davis.

I want to shout to your faces: where is your conscience?

Once again arrests are being conducted in the USSR, once again people are being thrown into jails, and yet you remain silent. Your governments want "friendly relations" with criminals who tyrannize over their own people. "We do not get involved in internal affairs." How convenient! Let them oppress and murder the Czechs, Hungarians, Ukrainians, Jews and dozens of other nations - your conscience sleeps. Yet, all the Glesoses and Davises can shout and you hear them - the press and TV are at their beck and call.

Whereas, in the USSR, my friend, Yuriy Shukhevych has just been arrested and he can't shout - they've sealed his lips.

I sat with Yuriy in the same concentration camp, and he had been there for 20 years. And now he has been arrested again. Again the persecution of his family, again his children without bread.

The sole "crime" of the Ukrainian, Yuriy Shukhevych, consists in the fact that he is the son of General Shukhevych, who courageously fought against the enslavement of the Ukrainians. The sole "crime" of Yuriy consists in the fact that he loves his country - and in Ukraine one cannot be a Ukrainian. And so, after 20 years of prison, Yura is once again in jail.

He is silent. You won't hear him. But I, a Jew, (who is) proud of being a nationalist, appeal to you, citizens of the free world: Help Yuriy Shukhevych. Demand that the Soviet authorities let him go.

movies

Last week Glenn was on TV and I watched as much as I could stand of that fat, boring, stupid movie. The one thing that kept me going was James Dean: his part was just as dumb as the rest but he had a presence so real that it hasn't dated a bit. His myth may have been preserved by his death, but it wasn't created by it: he was great. If you get channel 29, Rebel Without a Cause is on tonight. If you are of my vintage it should provide not only nostalgia, but proof that we were right about James Dean. Incidentally, had Dean lived, he would now be in his forties.

It's an interesting week at the Roxby: tonight there's Peter Brook's King Lear. Brook is perhaps the most brilliant theatre person alive, but many found his Lear austere to the point of boredom. I don't like Shakespeare, so I didn't go. Saturday there's Secco and Venzetti, not so good a movie, but good political history, of the kind that has been almost universally suppressed by the movies. Monday is One (long) Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich. Despite lovely little Solzhenitsyn absurdities (Ivan's sentence to Siberia is for 3653 days, the extra three days being for leap years) the film is too excruciatingly close to the real thing. Tom Courtney is too convincing for pleasure. Tuesday there is Pasolini's much considered Teorema. I liked thinking back on it better than sitting through it. And Wednesday it's the greatest movie ever, Truffaut's Jules and Jim. All showings at 7:30 and 10, $99. Sunday night at St. Mike's it's Hitchcock's classic Strangers on a Train, and that afternoon at the Revue it's Max Ophuls' Lola Montez. Max Ophuls is Marcel Ophuls' (The Sorrow and the Pity) father.

The Kensington Cinema (65 565 College at Manning) is having a Rolling Stones Festival this weekend. On Sunday you can catch, from 3:30 pm on, Ned Kelly, T.A.M.I., Performance, and Gimme Shelter, 99¢ a throw.

A few weeks ago we asked plaintively, is there anybody out there? A. Brody is, and wrote to confirm our criticism of OISE as no place to go to a movie.

music

This Sunday's Music to See on CBC at 5 pm features a concert of renaissance music, songs and dances presented by the noted Huggett Family. Selections will be by Jacob Obrecht, Ockegem, Herman Schein and Byrd. Over thirty performers are to be involved in the production.

At Scarborough College on November 12, the Canadian Wind Consort will perform serenades and marches for oboes, horns and bassoon with Christopher Weait, Eugene Rittich and Melvin Berman. The works are by Handel, J. C. Bach and his brother, C. P. E. Bach. A work by Keith Bissell receives its premiere at the concert.

The first concert in the Faculty of Music's Sunday Afternoon Series features duo-pianists Elyakim Taustig and Kathryn Root. The concert is at 3 pm and is $2 for students. The thing is supposed to be something of a free-for-all, with snatches from Merodach, Elizabethan virginal duets, Reger, Brahms, Brant, Paganini.

Narciso Yepes will perform with the Chamber Players on November 13 at the Town Hall. The chamber group will first play Joaquin Turina's La Oracion Da Torero, followed by the famous guitarist playing works by Milan, de Mudarra, Le Roy and J. S. Bach. The second half of the concert will be made up of Vivaldi's concerto in D major and Rodrigo's Fantasia Per Un Gentilhombre. Tickets are $3.50 and $4.50, and the performance begins, as for all Town Hall concerts, at 8:30 pm. The same day at 5:05 pm Janet MacFarlane will perform organ works accompanied by Alison Melville on recorder, at Convocation Hall. It's free.

On November 15, the Collegium Musicum along with Sharon Tuttle, harpsichord, and Robert Blick, flute, will play works by Bach, Blavet, Couperin, Handel, Domenico Scarlatti and others at Trinity Square at 8:30 pm. Single tickets are $2.50, although you can get this and two other concerts left in the season for $6.

There will be a Hart House Noon Hour Concert in the East Common Room on November 16, 1 pm, with Angela McWilliams and her flute.

On CBC-FM, watch for Symphony Hell this Sunday at 2:03 pm. Victor Feldbrill conducts the Toronto Symphony in Beethoven's fourth piano concerto, and Sibelius' most popular symphony, the second. Opera Theatre at 7 pm the same day features Herbert von Karajan's version of Mozart's Le Nozze di Figaro, with Teresa Berganza and the Vienna Philharmonic. Brace yourself, and tune into Afternoon Concert on Monday at 1 pm. Pretend you don't hear the ever-affable hosts and just listen to Bruckner's greatest symphony, his sixth (hopefully the Klemperer performance with the Philharmonia), and music by Heinrich Schutz, the pre-Bachian baroque master. Guitar fans should tune into the Classical Guitarr program on Tuesday at 6:30. I'm afraid you will have to suffer the hosts of Afternoon Concert again on Wednesday to hear Charles Ives sonic tour de force, his second symphony. That evening at seven, Choral Concert features part I of Handel's Samson, with Karl Richter and the Munich Bach-Choir and Orchestra. This is a must for baroque choral music fans, unless you already have the recording.

Professor Richard Halsey of this university has just completed a computerized study to find out what the most popular and highly regarded works of "classical" music are. He discusses the implications of Professor Halsey's new book for the average music lover. Should prove interesting. Musicscope on Friday at 8 features Lols Marshall and Maureen Forrester in a CBC Celebrity Recital.

pop

The friend with whom I saw Tom Rush says Rush has American legs. The nice thing about the Riverboat is that you can come to conclusions like that. Even if you are in the 60 per cent of the house that can't see his legs, you can touch him as he goes by or at least conceive of it. Massey Hall is so reverential.

Tom Rush, back at the Riverboat, is as relaxed and aware as he used to be before that stuff got swallowed in the concert halls. Monday night he played mostly his old songs: Galveston Flood, Who Do You Love, Panama Ltd., which is like the Beatles playing Twist and Shout. It was nice to hear them again, and he played them well, particularly Panama Ltd., his old show-stopper. (People used to request it all the time.) Panama is a train blues with all sorts of flashy guitar effects, but Rush, this time more than any I can remember, caught the sadness. After ten years he was right into the meat of the song like a good actor, not coasting a bit. The trouble with the Riverboat demi-concert policy is 'that what you gain in intimacy you lose in length: 35 to 50 minutes for $3 to $3.50. It is as if the performers didn't realize that the house turned over after each session. Rush and his band of loyal Canadians seemed to hit stride and disappear at the same time. That they were cooking made the abrupt exit more unsatisfying. I felt teased. (bob bossin)

Tomorrow night at 8 pm Tom Rush will be appearing (at length!) at The Meeting Place in Scarborough College. Tickets, reasonably priced at $3, are available at SAC and Scarborough College Student Society offices, and Sherman's Music Centre.

There is a special event of sorts at Fiddler's Green Coffeehouse (489-3001) on Tuesday. Hemlsh Imlach — a sort of Scottish Ledbelly — will be making one of his very rare North American appearances. Imlach is a brilliant humourist and a fine guitar player whose style ranges from blues to Scottish folk songs. The Toronto Area Bluegrass people are bringing in Cliff Waldren and The New Shades of Grass for a special concert tomorrow. Joe Grant will be in singing French Canadian songs tonight. Admission is $1 as always.

Grumbles continues its parade of Canadian talent this week with the Hear-taches Razz Band tonight and Alex Zelkin tomorrow. David Acktes, a singer-songwriter of note, who composed Road to Cairo (recorded by Julie Driscoll), will be in next week.

File under "I told you so": Both the Cat

Stevens concerts at Massey Hall scheduled for Saturday and Sunday were sold out early on the first morning that tickets went on sale.

The distance between Stockbridge, Massachusetts and The City of New Orleans is more than a few hundred miles for Arto Guthrie. Arlo will be in Toronto on Thursday, November 16 to perform a solo concert at O'Keefe Centre. Tickets are priced from $3.50 to $5.50.

Gabriele Abel's recent paintings and drawings will be in gallery two. The Marton Gallery is showing paintings by Joe Rosenthal from November 14 to December 2. SMC defeats Vic 19-6 in semi-final football

By JOHN GILBERT
Vic's football dynasty ended Wednesday as the team lost 19-6 to St. Mike's in the semi-finals. Despite the weather, both teams unsuccessfully tried to establish a passing game in the first half. This was one of the reasons why the score was only 6-0 for Victoria at half-time. Once SMC returned to a running game, Vic was unable to contain the team. However, SMC received a relatively high proportion of the large number of penalties handed out throughout the game.

In a kicker's duel during the first half, Vic's Alec Zimmerman proved superior to SMC's kicking duo — MacConnel and Engel. He was also effective at running the ball back for Vic.

St. Mike's did the only scoring in the first half at the 5:50 mark on a touchdown by Richard Zimmerman. The play was set up by a poor third down snap and the SMC kicker elected to run instead of punt. Finding itself deep in its own territory SMC was able to hold Vic. On the next exchange of punts, Vic was able to run the ball back from the 35 to the 3 yard line, allowing Zimmerman to go over.

St. Mike's came right back with a sustained drive highlighted by one of the few completed passes in the game from MacConnel to George Hoo, resulting in a 25 yard gain. Aided by effective blocking, Romas Kirilavicius brought SMC to the Vic 3 yard line. However, Vic's defence was able to hold the team, assisted by a five yard penalty against SMC. St. Mike's tried desperately on third down to score, with MacConnel going to the air. However, he overshot his receiver and Vic took over.

Although Vic was unable to sustain a drive, they earned a first down on a roughing-the-kicker penalty against SMC in the second quarter. The second quarter also saw SMC intercept a Vic pass and recover a Vic fumble.

MacConnel was scrambling effectively on third down situations, but persistently returned to a passing game, continuously overthrowing his receivers. This persistence and the large number of penalties given to SMC kept the team off the score board in the first half.

Early in the second half, MacConnel kicked a single and from that point on SMC went on to completely dominate the game.

MacConnel got the first SMC touchdown at the 19 second mark of the fourth quarter. On a fake up the middle, he kept the ball and ran to the outside, adding six points. Larry Klein scored next with a run from Vic's 33 yard line, assisted by effective blocking. SMC's Ron Chaffery drove the Vic punter back to the 5 yard line to set up St. Mike's third touchdown.

St. Mike's now goes on to meet PHE, Wednesday November 15 at 2 pm.

Interfac b-ball begins

By JAY BERNHOLTZ

While on the intercollegiate level the Basketball Blues have a long way to go to earn the sectional championship, the interfaculty basketball league looks bright.

Division I includes two sections, A and B. Section A contains teams from Law, Med, New, PHE A, SMC, and UC, while included in B is Eng, Erin, PHE B SGS and Vic.

In the play-off situation, the top four teams in each section play, with a cross-over between them (for example, A 1 versus B 4) to reach the finals for the Sifton Cup.

The following is a summary of the teams in Division I. Section A, and how they will finish. Section B will be reviewed Wednesday.

- Law — The defending Sifton Cup holders hope to repeat last year's standing, accentuating team play. — Second.
- Med — Returnees from last year's contending team should make the doctors play-off calibre again. Height will once again highlight the forecourt, but mobility is still a question. — Third.
- New — Last year's finalists are hurt badly by the loss of Katz and Beteherman through graduation. Only three veterans, and a dearth of board strength will make it a long season for the Gnus. — Sixth.
- PHE A — The squad seems to have improved overall, but so does the rest of the league. So any change for the better still leaves the team out of the play-offs. — Fifth.
- SMC — Hard work and many imports are the keys once again to SMC's hopes. Ex-Blue Larry Trafford heads a veteran squad. Overdiscipline has sometimes hampered individual talents, but not this time. — First.
- UC — Eight repeaters head this experienced squad. The problem will once again be in allocating resources to needs (that is, good coaching and teamwork). — Fourth.

Blues water Polo season ends tomorrow at York with the OUA final. Women's hockey team hosts Queen's tomorrow at 9 am and travels to Guelph Tuesday evening. Hockey Blues plays McMaster Marauders tonight at 8 pm in Hamilton. Radio Varsity will carry the game live. In football last weekend Waterloo Lutheran Golden Hawks defeated Ottawa Gee-Gees in a sudden-death OUA final last Saturday 23-10; while Windsor Lancers lost to Western Mustangs 23-8 in Windsor. Western goes on to play Lutheran in Waterloo for the OUA championship tomorrow. Cor Doret was nominated as the winner of the Johnny Copp Trophy by fellow team members recently. Doret was the Blues' leading receiver as well as the leading rusher this year. The trophy is awarded for sportsmanship both on and off the field, character, and playing ability. U of T cross country team travels to RMC for the CIAU finals tomorrow. Jarvis Collegiate Institute hosts a basketball clinic tomorrow. Attending will be Jack Donohue, recently appointed men's national basketball coach, and Windsor Lancers head coach Paul Thomas. Bob Croft, formerly of the Dallas Chaparrals and the Kentucky Colonels of the American Basketball Association will also attend. Admission for the Metro High School All Star Game, played at eight pm, is $1. The clinic runs from 9:30 am to six pm. Admission for it is $6 for coaches and adults, and $2 for students. U of T Rifle Club shooters were defeated by team members from RMC last Saturday at Hart House, 1,000 to 920. U of T's J. Peeles was the highest individual scorer with 266 out of 300. Broomball has finally been able to find some ice time — 11:30 to midnight, Monday to Thursday. The league begins Monday on a co-ed, club basis. For further information contact Ken Beaty through the intramural office, Hart House. Intramural water polo presents movies in the fencing room, Hart House, Wednesday, November 15 and 22. Films will be shown at six pm, followed by a round robin tournament in the pool.

Our mistake

It was reported Wednesday that For defeated Arch in interfac soccer. For in fact, defeated Wyc 5-0.

In last Sunday's Blues - Lutheran game, Harry Scins only scored one goal, not two as reported. Doug Tate got the other goal in Blues' 9-2 win.

Blues splash York, win OUAA

Soccer Blues stretched their unbeaten streak into the playoffs yesterday, shutting out Eastern Section leaders York Yeomen 4-0. Toronto wins the OUAA championship and regains the Blackwood Cup for the first time since the 1968-69 season.

The Blues go on to play University of Alberta Golden Bears tomorrow at 12:30 pm at York.

However, the Blues' win was difficult the mud and rain on the worst-developed York's four adjacent playing fields put a damper on the game. Toronto was also able to overcome the bad calls made by substitute referee Enrico Toscano.

Blues led 2-0 at the half, on goals by forwards Mario DaRosa and Herb Dubsky. DaRosa's goal came from Pipo D'Antoni's individual effort within the first five minutes of play. The York team was relatively confused at the time and D'Antoni's burst up the left side at wing led to a goal mouth scramble for the ball. DaRosa stepped in to end the confusion, hooting the ball from close range to put the Blues ahead.

Toronto's second goal came from a corner kick to the left of York goaltender David Paris. DaRosa then headed the ball to Dubsky, who immediately sent the ball into the far right corner of the net. Dubsky's goal was scored 38 minutes into the game.

At the 10 minute mark of the second half, DaRosa added his second goal of the game off his own rebound in front of the York net. Assisting on the goal was forward Vito Polera, who sent a quick pass across the field to DaRosa.

Blues' Cobby had a good opportunity to make the score 4-0 soon after at 35 minutes into the second half on an Ian Harris pass. However, the goal post came to the goalkeeper's aid and the ball bounced out of bounds.

Finally, with eight minutes left in the game, DaRosa snapped the ball into the York net from 40 yards out. A shaky Paris made an initial stop on the ball, but it slipped through his hands and dropped back into the net.

However, Yeomen came back determined to ruin Brand's shut-out. Although the Blues were relatively slack in front of their own crease during the game's closing minutes, Brand capably preserved the team's 4-0 lead.

The final score was in some ways an inaccurate representation of the game's actual play. The Blues played largely defensive ball against an aggressive York squad for much of the initial half. The difference in score resulted from a combination of cohesion (teamwork) on the Blues' part, and disorganization by the Yeomen.

York players were disorganized, relying on individual members to carry the half through for the team. As has been the case all season, Blues were able to form an effective defensive concentration when pressed in their own end.

York's second major downfall was in its inability to capitalize on several good chances in the first half. For example, the Yeomen had a good opportunity in the first minute of play on a fast break, yet Tim Burns was back to stop the York offence.

Blues showed their strongest offensive determination of the game toward the end of the first half, enabling Dubsky to score, as well as, hemming Yeomen in their own end.

Even York's twelfth man on the field — a huge defensive puddle halfway between the York goal crease and centre line — offered little aid.

But Blues also had their bad moments. Although the forwards got back to defend more often than not, gaps in the backfield were sometimes conspicuous. On one such play, Blues' Ed Carter was the lone man back for the Blues off a York throw-in from the sideline. But he was able to prevent the Yeomen from causing goalkeeper Jack Brand any serious threat until other Blues got back.

However Brand himself was outstanding in net. Impervious to the mud, he smothered the ball whenever a York player buzzed close enough to his crease. On kick-outs, he often sent the ball over halfway down the field into Yeomen territory. On many occasions, Brand sent the ball to the teammate he chose to, calling out his name at the same time as he booted the ball.

Also noticeable was the atrocious refereeing. Blues almost lost their poise on some of the calls. But, completing the game was uppermost in most minds, so the team continued. Even one of the linesmen disagreed — in vain — from the sideline with some of the ref's calls.

The game was originally scheduled for two pm Wednesday, but the referee and officials failed to show up for the OUAA final championship game.

In the Alberta-Lakehead game late yesterday afternoon, Bears Steve Odumah scored against Lakehead within the last five minutes of play to put his team ahead 1-0.

If the Blues win this afternoon's game, they go on to play the winner of the Quebec-Atlantic divisions championship game for the CIAU title. Although the game was originally scheduled for York, it is possible that last minute changes will see it played at CNE Stadium Saturday.

Basketball Blues begin against Mac tomorrow

Basketball Blues tip off another season tomorrow evening with an exhibition game against McMaster Marauders in Hamilton.

The Blues' win record has not been over 50 per cent in a single one of the past eight years, while the team only finished league champions once since the Second World War (1957-58).

Unfortunately, U of T has certain factors working against the building of a really strong ball club. As coach John McManus said, "It's hard to get a player to come here with the present facilities." McManus' statement is backed up by the fact that only one of the members of this year's team lives outside the Toronto area.

Since the Hart House "gym" has barely enough room for two teams, let alone any spectators, Blues have to play their games in the Benson Building. For unknown reasons, the Benson gym is never available to the team for practices. In other words, Blues practice on one floor and play on another.

The difference between this year's team and the 1971-72 version can best be expressed in one word: experience. If it really turns out to be "the best teacher", it will mean more wins for the Blues.

Last year, the Blues went into the season with only two veteran players. For the 71-72 season, the team has triple that number in the roster: Dave Watt, Dave Ferguson, Randy Filinski, Tony Rudmik, Brian Skyvington, Glen Scott, and Bob Annis.

Filinski (6'2") was Blues' second highest scorer last year, racking up 141 points. Filinski shares backcourt duties with outside shooter Rudmik (6'1"), who totalled 134 points last year and 44 rebounds. Skyvington, fifth leading rebounder in the OUAA in his rookie year last season, will pace the forward line. Centre Ferguson, back after a season of injuries, will enable Watt (6'5"), now in his third season, to fill the other forward position. Scott (6'4") and Annis (6'3") are the other veteran forwards.

Rookies give the team the bench strength it will need against top teams such as York and Ottawa which finished first and second respectively last year in the Eastern Section.

Bill Francis and Peter Oolup work guard positions. Both stem from high school teams synonymous with basketball supremacy — Oakwood and Cederbrae Collegiate respectively. Tim McGhie, Doug Baker, and Riek Hollowell complete the well-stocked guard contingent. With rookie forwards Frank Cress (6'6") and Rich Kurczyk (6'4"), Blues won't have to look up to their opposition very often. (Gerry Barker, our teaching, is a noteworthy loss to the team.)

John McManus will hold the coaching reins for the 18th consecutive year. He'll try to bring Varsity to its first championship since 1957. McManus feels the Blues will need a hustling and aggressive game. Windsor proved this true last year when the team came from fourth spot in the Western Section to upset a larger and more experienced Waterloo squad. Windsor then went on to defeat favoured York for the OUAA championship.

But McManus is optimistic: "I'll say this about this year's team — they do hustle."

Blues meet York, Ottawa, Laurentina, Carleton, Queen's, and Ryerson in their own section (Eastern). If the team manages to come out of those contests with at least a fourth place spot, it'll eventually have to face the "best from the Western Section" — be it Windsor, Waterloo, Western, McMaster, Guelph, Lutheran, or Brock.

The implementation of a new rule will help quicken the game's pace throughout the league this year. Following the lead of the U.S. National Basketball Association, the first six non-shooting fouls in each half will not result in a foul shot. Instead, the ball will be awarded to the team fouled out of bounds. After the sixth foul, in the bonus situation, all fouls will result in shots.

In practice, this means fewer delays in the game. It's hoped more spectators will be attracted to the game through the rule's implementation. (The rule also applies to interfaculty games beginning this year.)

McManus indicated that he will try to capitalize on the new rule by utilizing more and better out-of-bounds plays.

Everything is, of course, academic until the first game. But, the Blues will bounce into McMaster tomorrow hungry for a win. Game time: eight pm.

Degree value questioned

The value of a university degree, which was questioned recently by a Statistics Canada official in Toronto, seems to be a less than positive asset for at least some jobs in Manitoba's public service.

A bulletin issued by the Manitoba Civil Service Commission October 16 advertises three positions. A comparison of two of these reveals that a better salary is earned by not having a university degree than having one.

A technical engineering officer, to earn $9,216 — $11,760 per year, requires only grade 12 education, with three to five years of experience related to the duties of the job.

In contrast, to earn $6,876 — $8,784, an applicant for the job of a lab technician must have a diploma from a recognized college in chemical technology, or a university degree in chemistry, plus "at least two years experience in a chemical laboratory preferably in water and sewage chemistry".

The third position offered was to a doctor, paying over $20,000.

"Help us beat the anti-union management"

Union steward tells women to boycott Dare

by ZOYA STEVENSON

Pauline Green, a shop steward representing workers on strike against Kitchener-based Dare Foods Limited, urged over 100 people at a conference on women in the work place to boycott Dare products.

"Help us beat the anti-union management, which employed Canadian Driver Pool in an attempt to break us," she pleaded. Canadian Driver Pool was a firm specializing in providing strikebreaking services.

She was speaking in a wide ranging panel discussion on Saturday with six other women, mostly trade unionists, on organizing women in the work-place in one section of the Toronto Waffle conference held in the Board of Education Building on College Street.

Beverly Norris, another of the striking members of Local 173 of the Union of Brewery, Flour, Cereal, Soft Drink and Distillery Workers, said the issues at stake at Dare were a 40 hour work week, wage parity for women with the men in the plant, better working conditions, and the removal of union shop and check off clauses from the agreement with the company.

She said there was only one job category for the women workers, though they often did a number of the men's jobs without being paid for it.

Working conditions, though bad for all the workers were worse for the women who had to stand for 8.5 hours without sitting, she said. As well, the men were allowed more mobility within the plant, she said.

Norris informed the audience that in their latest meeting with the company, union members had been offered "no retroactive pay and no discrimination between striking workers on the outside and scabbing ones on the inside".

She exclaimed that it was "some offer" because contrary to the contention of no discrimination, "the company refuses to re-hire 10 of our union members for one year and is asking $38,000 from the union in so-called damages".

Angela Arkell, acting education officer for the Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 1000, described the obstacles in organizing women.

"In the white collar areas, there's a fantastic amount of hostility towards organizing women," she said, "because they're prestige jobs and women are made to feel they have a special relationship with their bosses."

Hilary Armstrong, a secretary with 10 years' experience, agreed. She said the "special relationship" constitutes being a nursemaid, waitress, and errand girl to the boss.

"I don't think anybody is too important to do their own shit work," she stated. "At one point you have to stand up for yourself and do the job you were hired to do."

"If all the secretaries in Toronto went on strike, they say the entire business community would grind to a halt, or at least an awful lot of men would not get their morning coffee."

Mathild Blanchard, organizer for the Canadian Seafood and Allied Workers in New Brunswick said, "for the woman in the work-place, there is no happy medium; either you fall in love with your boss, or get pushed around."

Arkell added that "women tend to be concentrated in labour intensive jobs where their security is not likely to be threatened. They view their jobs as temporary and yet fear replacement, because the unskilled nature of the jobs makes them easily replaced.

"Women consider their lack of skill a personal failure and thus accept lower wages than men."

"Women are fighting in the class struggle," she said, "but business unionism also prevents them from seeing this."

Shirley Carr, president of CUPE local 1287 in Niagara Falls, said that she was totally opposed to any wage restraints as long as government and private companies were making the profits they did at the expense of the workers.

She said that women were consistently paid less than men, but that unions on the whole had failed to fight for male-female equality.

"If the present legislation is intended to protect women the same as men," she said, "there should be one piece of legislation for all of us as workers."

Blanchard said that the slogan which should be taken up by the movement is "equal pay for all work" because all workers from the janitor to the office clerk are equally necessary to the functioning of industry.

Florence Seychuk, president of the Office and Professional Employees International Union Local 343, emphasized that it was important to educate office workers, most of whom are women, to their rights such as maternity leave.

"In joining a union, at least you have a contract which offers you some security and some say in your work," she said.

Blackburn refuses to rehire fired worker

By HEATHER-JANE SANGUINS

While 15 people waited outside his office Friday, Chief Librarian R. H. Blackburn refused to rehire fired library worker Dave Owen.

According to Students for a Democratic Society spokesman David Depoe, who along with Owen and another SDS "delegate" spoke to Blackburn, the chief-librarian "could intervene but doesn't wish to at this time, although he has the power to do so".

However, Blackburn himself, when interviewed later, stated that he doesn't think he has the power to rehire Owen. The matter was taken out of his hands, Blackburn asserted, when Owen went to the union because the matter then became the responsibility of U of T Personnel Director R. F. Brown.

The ex-library worker's grievance asking for reinstatement was turned down last week by the university's labour relations head, John Parker.

Owen had claimed he was fired for union activities, citing the fact that he was dismissed the day after being unofficially elected a steward in Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 1230. The library contended that Owen's work was unsatisfactory, although after testing two weeks earlier Owen had been found satisfactory.

Parker upheld its decision, agreeing that as a probationary worker, Owen could be fired without notice as long as it was not for union activity. He found there was no evidence that union activity played a part in the decision to dismiss Owen. The meeting with Blackburn was preceded by an SDS-sponsored rally in the lobby of the Sigmund Samuel Library attended by 30 people and four U of T policemen.

Depoe told the rally the firing was one "in a long series of examples" of the "arrogant attitude" of the library administration.

In early 1971 library worker Pat Garcia contended she was fired for refusing to take on extra work without extra pay. She eventually dropped her grievance because of the time delay and cost of pursuing it.

Later that spring, part-time library worker Tony Leah was threatened with possible dismissal by then U of T registrar (and now vice-provost) Robin Ross for taking part in a disruption of a meeting in the struggle for student parity with faculty in the Faculty of Arts and Science's governing body.

Owen told the rally that "speed-up, lay-off, poor pay and intimidation" were common aspects of a library worker's job at the U of T, especially since the library's budget was eut.

During the meeting with Blackburn, his office was defended by J. B. West, plainclothes U of T policeman, and a uniformed policeman with a walkie-talkie.

The press was barred entry to this meeting by West. Subsequently library worker Walter Brooker was also prevented from entering because he wasn't a union steward, the policeman said.

During the demonstration, police guarded main library.

Lawyer charges racism practised in immigration dept.

Canadian immigration laws, according to lawyer Charles Roach, have become the tools with which the Canadian government practices racism.

Roach and lawyer Paul Copeland, an expert on immigration, spoke at a forum Thursday on Canadian immigration policy and racism at the International Student Centre.

Copeland asserted the problem of racism lies not so much with the whole immigration department, but more with the application of the laws as determined, in many instances, by individual immigration officers.

Officers gain this power through a points system in which personal evaluations of applicants by officers counts for up to 15 of the 50 points needed to gain entry. Thus the officers who have this power, he stated, have the power to turn back people at the border.

Copeland said he had witnessed numerous cases in which persons wishing to enter the country were given false information by the immigration officers, forcing them to turn back. They got nothing for their difficulties except "a $1600 round trip to Canada with a three hour stopover in the airport," he said.

Copeland said competent immigration lawyers at the airport are one way to relieve some of the injustices that may be occurring daily.

Copeland made it clear that racism does not always determine whether the immigration laws will be used to prevent persons otherwise eligible to enter from coming to Canada. He cited the case of professor Istvan Meszaros, a marxist professor who is unable to take up a permanent teaching position at York University because he is a "security risk".

New laws on Immigration procedures now make it difficult for Americans wishing to avoid fighting in the Vietnam war to come to Canada before applying for landed immigrant status, he said. They must now file applications in Washington and wait for their papers to go through what Copeland described as the "incredible bureaucracy".

He also brought up the fact of the increase in the number of cases of deportation of political activists. He mentioned 25 members of the Com-unist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) whom the government is trying to remove from the country under various sections of the Immigration Act and the Criminal Code.

The immigration laws, Copeland warned, will be increasingly used in place of normal deportation and extradition procedures to get rid of undesirable.

Roach, lawyer for former Black Panther Edwin Hogan who was deported without being able to consult with his counsel or appeal his deportation, denounced government interference in judicial proceedings carried out by the Immigration Appeal Board.

He said interference by the immigration minister is a result of close ties between his department and the appeal board.

Much of the criticism of immigration policies has come as a result of the high level of unemployment in Canada, stated Roach. The government hopes that through its "high-handed actions" against immigrants, it will gain support of the people at home, he added.

Shop selectively

After five years of hard work, the United Farm Workers of America won the right to represent America's exploited grape pickers. It was a battle that succeeded not only because of the dedication and sacrifice of the workers, but also because they managed to communicate to American and Canadian shoppers the justice of their struggle and the need to boycott non-union grapes.

UFW activity did not stop there, however. Within days, the farmers' union had turned its attention to an equally exploited group of farm workers: America's non-unionized lettuce workers.

Like the grape workers before their settlement, the lettuce workers have to work long hours at low wages to eke out an existence.

And following in the footsteps of the successful grape campaign, the lettuce workers are — justly — turning to North American consumers for help in their struggle against oppressive working conditions and for the right to be represented by the UFW.

When enough shoppers start boycotting non-union lettuce, the profit-oriented agri-business interests which dominate most American farming will be forced to grant their employees fair working conditions and union representation. No longer will they be able to survive by firing, trouble-makers and hiring students or chronic unemployed as substitutes for them.

Agri-business control of agricultural and the accompanying adverse side-effects is not isolated in the States. Western Canada farmers have been tightening to improve the inadequate prices they get from the Kraftco interests that control most of the Canadian dairy industry, seeking to get the National Farmers Union certified as their bargaining agents. The NFU has organized a national boycott of Kraft and Sealtest (a subsidiary of Kraftco) products and will be stepping up its eastern Canada campaign shortly. Canadians should support their efforts.

Today, tomorrow, when next you shop for lettuce, replace the non-union produce you may first grab with union lettuce. If your regular store doesn't stock union lettuce, tell the merchant that you'll boycott the premises until union lettuce is in supply. And, then, stick by your word.

Government provides further proof of motives for action

Believing its real objective in raising post-secondary tuition fees and decreasing the grant portion of the Ontario Student Award Program, the Ontario government has now taken further steps to reduce university enrolment.

The latest government move was its imposition of an $11 fee for the previously free Service to Admission to Colleges and Universities exams.

Although not absolutely necessary for university admission, the SACU tests improve a student's odds of being accepted to the university of his or her choice. Another piece of evidence on which to administer a student's potential, university administrators would probably say.

The government has tried to explain away its latest swipe at post-secondary enrolment by pointing the guilty finger at the more than $400,000 annually it was costing to administer the tests to anyone who decided to write them. And, the official explanation continued, many of those trying their hand at the exams had no real intention of continuing on to university and were just wasting the government's money.

There is much reason to suspect that the admission tests are relatively worthless, not really telling the student or university anything useful. Indeed, the Ontario government is reported to be considering scrapping their use in the province. Nonetheless U of T assistant dean of admissions Kelvin Andrews last week told The Varsity that the SACU exams "improve the chances of being accepted".

It seems quite understandable in these days when a university degree far from assures one of a job that students with serious doubts about the merits of attending university may cover all bases by taking the tests in case they eventually decide on attending university.

In its folly, the government may pretend to believe that those who don't fork out the necessary $11 were the frivolous test-takers. (How many high school students do you know that like to sit through gruelling exams just for the heck of it?) But, facts and figures are proving them wrong.

The number of SACU applicants is down 40 per cent since the charge was imposed. And, one would be safe in hazarding the guess that those losing out this year are not the undecided but the less affluent. As with its other disincentives to university attendance, this tactic hits hardest at those not who lack interest but lack sufficient funds.

Something better be done soon to halt the government's full-scale assault on university attendance and low-income students. And, that something — it's to have any effect — won't be letter writing.

Shouldn't muzzle labour, media from public

Dare Foods has tried to intimidate Pro Tem reporter Bob Edwards into retracting an article about the current Dare boycott campaign.

The Glendon College student newspaper staffer is not planning on fulfilling the request, having been advised by legal counsel that his article did not violate the injunction prohibiting the striking union local and others officially aware of the injunction from "attempting to induce breaches of contract" between Dare and "any other persons or corporations".

That Dare would attempt to threaten critical journalists — and without apparent legal or apparent tactical cause — is deplorable. But, what is much more serious is that a company engaged in large-scale commerce claimed to believe that it could get an injunction to silence its critics and to prevent the striking workers from disseminating information about their grievances.

Even most conservatives are willing to concede freedom of the press. It would indeed be a sorry day when — rekindling memories of the October, 1970 suspension of civil liberties in Canada — opposing views could be legally gagged.

Over the past few years, there has grown an increasing hostility, nurtured by the professional media, toward organized labour. In part, this anti-union backlash has produced provincial legislation eroding many of the rights organized labour won after years of hard struggle. Consequently, the possibility of legislation being enacted to satisfy business' desire to eliminate media coverage and effective worker organization is not as remote as might have been assumed.

There can be no justification for muting the media to serve corporate interests. A free press leaves the modicum of possibility — albeit seldom utilized by the business-oriented professional media — that injustices will be exposed and the public moved to demand corrective action.

According to the Dare form letter, the company blames public pressure and media coverage of the strike for cancellation of Ontario contracts with several supermarket chains. This example of the abuses corporate interests would like to see eliminated reinforces the argument that such a move would betray the public interest.

Furthermore, increasing usage of court injunctions to impede striking workers cannot be justified, especially by governments that lamely claim they are not trying to destroy collective bargaining by their imposing new restrictions on strike-related activities, but merely seeking to modernize the collective bargaining process to best accommodate the public interest.

Legislators should seriously consider overhauling any existing laws which could allow abuse of labour's right to use its major bargaining weapons in negotiations with management: withdrawal of services and encouragement of public boycott of strike-hit plants.

National student meet not joke

On the weekend of November 3, 4, and 5 students from all across Canada got together in Ottawa to try to form a National Union of Students. That is except for the University of Toronto. The representatives from the U of T, SAC vice-presidents Ross Flowers and John Helliwell, spent no more than an afternoon at the three day meeting.

When I asked them what the reason was for their apparent lack of concern about the national union, they said they didn't think the idea was appropriate or practical at this time. They thought the whole conference was a sham. Well, the way they went about it, the conference probably was a waste. I, personally, don't think that the whole thing was such a joke.

The reason that this conference was called was that there is a crisis in education financing in the whole of Canada. The surcharge on student fees and the shifting away from the grant system to the loan system is intended to increase the cost of education to students and to cut back enrolment. The situation in Ontario is intended to apply to the rest of Canada eventually. The future looks dim for those students who are short of money now, and dimmer still as unemployment climbs higher as more and more U.S. branch plants close down.

SAC's attitude to this crisis is one of callousness. This is wrong. At a time when there is an attack going on against students in Canada, we are going to have to join forces to maintain what we have let alone make any progress in improving the Canadian educational system.

I also find it very interesting to note that SAC will make a decision not to make any positive contributions to the organization of a National Union of Students without even letting students at U of T know that the conference was going on. Do they think that once they are elected that they can ignore those who elected them? Did they bother to make a statement on why they didn't want a National Union? Did they ask the students at U of T what they thought? They did not.

This same attitude prevailed when over half of the undergrads at the U of T voted in a referendum on whether or not to have a fee strike in January. When 75 per cent of these said that they would strike, it looked like a pretty clear mandate to me. But, SAC is completely ignoring this demand of the students. They are taking no steps to even prepare for a fee strike, something that should be done even if we don't need to have the strike later on.

I think that it is about time that SAC became a little more vocal in its lack of action and explain to the students why it is not doing anything. As a student at this university, I demand it.

Shouldn't exclude foreign grads

Please permit me to comment on the Canadian Union of Graduate Students' stand on the issue of foreign students in Canadian universities (The Varsity, November 1).

To isolate the central topics from the report on the above discussion, the CUGS (1) would like monetary sanctions to be used while admitting foreign students, and (2) would want "academic" rather than "financial" considerations to be the bases of their enrolment. Now, I would not want to enter into a discussion of these two points as I neither have any means of verifying whether, as alleged by Doug Pritchard of Queen's, Ontario spends $100 million per year on foreign students nor do I know if Canadian universities admit foreigners without having regard to their academic eligibility. But, I do know that when in doubt the graduate departments do require foreign students to do additional courses (which the latter frequently do within the same period of time in which a Canadian earns his graduation) to get their degrees. And, I have come across no evidence that graduate schools admit foreigners on a come-one-come-all principle. Indeed, I wonder whether foreigners are not admitted only to the extent that Canadian nationals are not available to fill the available capacity. In that case, the arguments of the kind advanced by people like Pritchard could perhaps be extended to the conclusion: all foreigners should be barred and the money they consume cut off from the universities' appropriations! However, these are not the matters I set out to talk about — nor am competent to do so.

My intention was to remark upon the attitude working behind the controversy — as I saw it. I believe that the controversy is part of the total debate on Canadian nationalism. No country can allow itself to be taken over by others. When that threat develops, the affected parties do assert themselves, as Canadians are doing.

However, I really seriously wonder if the foreign students pose any threat to this country's identity. Though they come here for the sake of profit, it is not any illegitimate sort of profit that they seek. As far as I know, most of these students are the brightest people from developing countries where adequate facilities are not available for advanced work. Most of these countries have been the victims of European colonialism, and have only now begun to work for their development. Without having the resources to train their personnel — which of the colonialists, after all, did anything to develop education in its colonies? They have either to depend on the "generosity" of Big Powers or have their nationals go abroad and get the necessary training. By enabling these students to come here, then, Canada lends a helping hand to these countries in their own struggle to develop and safeguard their hard-won identity.

By choosing to ignore this aspect of the case, indeed, by not inviting the foreign students to present their viewpoint, the CUGS conference has done a great wrong to them. If the delegates were driven by nationalistic motives, I am afraid, theirs was a very narrow motivation. For, in today's world, there is only a point up to which nationalism works. No country can survive fruitfully by simply shutting itself up from everything external to it. And there can be no area in which internationalism can be more desirable than that of education. This is one of the few areas where genuine co-operation can be possible.

These are rather obvious factors, but the CUGS guys seem to have chosen to ignore them. Such people need to think more deeply and see more widely before they cheerfully recommend the bulldozer as a cure for every problem. The world is not as simple as they made it out by airily saying "So what's the problem?" to the issues they confronted. It would have been more appropriate had they recommended that while foreigners should come here for higher studies, they should not seek to alter their status after coming here.

Future dentists say denturists don't know enough to be licensed.

Students oppose dentist policy

On October 16, the Dental Students Society held an information forum in the auditorium of the Faculty of Dentistry centered around prospective moves by the provincial government in delivery of dental care to this province, especially as it pertains to legislation regarding the so called "denturists". Speaking for the Ontario Dental Association was Dr. John Durran, a dentist from Hamilton and chairman of the Social Development Committee of the ODA.

It is now painfully aware to all our fellow students that the present provincial government is not interested in listening to any discussion re: student concerns as evidenced by their recent fee increases. This is also readily noticed from their lack of discussion with the dental profession concerning the current conflict over the legalization of "denturists"?

Despite the three major government commissions (Wells report and Committee on the Healing Arts, 1970 and the Task Force on Dental Technicians, 1972) and their recommendations that "denturists" be under a dentist's supervision, the premier and health minister have chosen to introduce provincial bill 203. This bill would allow these self-styled "denturists" or technicians to work directly with the public without supervision or proper diagnostic training. This is indeed a tragic situation, when an apparent political whim overrides the concern for the public's health. I keep asking myself, "How can the people of Ontario have any confidence in the present government?"

It is a known fact that the "denturists" do not have any qualified training in the diagnosis of diseases or other conditions of the soft and hard tissues of the mouth. They know little or nothing about the physiology of the most complicated joint in the human body, that of our jaws. They have no training knowledge of anaesthesia, pharmacology, surgery, or medicine to know anything of a medical nature about the area they claim as home territory. It is also a known fact that these so called denturists learn how to fit dentures, or have up to now, by a guess and by-gosh principle. If the government wants to give these untrained individuals free reign over one of the most dynamically changing and challenging areas of the human body, then who will take responsibility. If past performance is any criterion, the government will not, nor will these denturists.

The students who spend from five to seven years studying to be Doctors of Dental Surgery are being short changed. If the health department feels that what we must know as dentists and how these things apply to a human mouth especially a mouth with no teeth, then why are they:

- a) Spending thousands of dollars on Dental Education each year?
- b) Planning to expand dental services?
- c) Demanding higher productivity from our dental schools?

It is really a problem for us as students to comprehend what appears to be a contradiction. If we are so essential in our roles as members of a health profession, why is it that neither dentistry as a profession nor any of its representatives were consulted before such legislation was introduced? Dentistry is more than willing to introduce new plans and programs to increase the amount and quality of dental care while lowering the cost. However, the government has not taken really definitive action on any of these proposals as far as we are concerned. These proposals from dentistry include such things as low cost denture clinics, (some of which are in operation without government help) run by qualified clinics. Also proposed: the usage of properly trained and supervised prosthetic therapists or technicians. The ODA has proposed and requested assistance in setting up a Dental Health Care Plan especially for children. The ODA also is trying to decrease the incidence of dental decay by usage of fluoride in municipal water supplies and proper in-school dental care training for children.

What can we do as dental students?. Really very little, except to point out to the government both our personal and professional views and hope the government will wake up and realize that unsupervised denturists are not in the public's health interests.

If the present trend of our provincial government continues with unilateral decisions being made in education, health, et cetera, which are so one-sided and demonstrate the legislature's lack of information, we question what type of leadership can they offer and what future use they will make of our services when we graduate.

Chicano lettuce workers fight for rights whites have

By DON HUMPHRIES
Canadian University Press

In the coming months, Canadians will again be approached to help the United Farm Workers of America (UFW) fight for fair wages and living conditions.

The UFW has called a lettuce boycott against the big growers in the south-western United States to back demands for recognition of the United Farm Workers Union as the bargaining agent for lettuce workers.

The same farm workers, led by Cesar Chavez, brought the grape plantation owners to their knees after five years of continuous boycott action. The issues involved in the lettuce boycott are essentially the same as those in the grape boycott — obtaining the same basic human rights for the Mexican-American (Chicano) workers as white workers have.

The lettuce boycott started more than two years ago in Salinas County, California, which produces 74.5 per cent of all summer lettuce shipped from California and Arizona.

The owners had signed "sweetheart back-door agreements" with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters in late July. But, on August 11, 1970, the Teamsters and UFW reaffirmed a 1967 jurisdictional agreement giving the UFW jurisdiction over all agricultural workers.

The UFW called massive strikes against the lettuce plantation owners on August 24, 1970. Some 7,000 workers walked out in Salinas and Santa Maria Valleys to back demands that the UFW be their collective bargaining representatives.

Because of the strike, one company, Inter Harvest, allowed a card check election supervised by the Catholic Bishops' Committee. The workers overwhelmingly supported the UFW and the union negotiated a contract with the company.

A company representative said, "The Teamsters had our contract but UFW has our workers."

The plantation owners — mostly corporate interests — sought and obtained an injunction prohibiting all UFW strike activity in the Salinas area on September 17, 1970.

The workers refused to surrender to the owners and held a vote to determine further action. They opted for the boycott.

The existence of the UFW means much to Chicanos because it's a union with a difference. It is their union and they control it.

Before Cesar Chavez and the UFW appeared on the scene, farm workers were the worst off of any workers in the United States.

A typical example would be Jessica Govea's family. Special assistant to Chavez and co-ordinator of the lettuce boycott, she led Toronto during the grape boycott organizing efforts.

Every member of her family had to work in the cotton fields in order to survive on the low piece-rate they were paid. (Piece-rate involved payment by the pound instead of by the hour.)

The family would get up at four am, pack a lunch, and drive one hour to get to the fields. They worked without a break until six pm.

Babies were put in boxes and left either in the car or at the end of the row of crops their parents were picking.

There were no toilets or drinking water in the fields although California law requires them.

If the foremen didn't like a worker or if the worker complained about the conditions, he was fired. The worker's name would go on a blacklist and he or she couldn't get a job with any of the surrounding plantations.

To be a farmworker meant to be continually on the move from one job to another. The children could not receive proper schooling, if indeed they got any. It took Govea four years to learn English, and she was lucky. The children attend school for six out of nine months. They either fail or pass on to another grade without really learning anything.

No minimum wage for men exists in California. The minimum wage for women and children is $1.65 per hour, but it is not enforced.

Housing provided to farmworkers usually consists of shacks without sanitary plumbing. The Sunset Labor Camp featured in "The Grapes of Wrath" movie is still in use. It was originally built in the 1930's by the federal government and was later sold to the county. People are still living in those original corrugated steel shacks and paying rent for them.

Cesar Chavez came to the grape fields in 1962 with his family. He had finished grade eight after attending 38 different schools. With his family beside him, Chavez worked in the fields alongside other workers who were organizing a union.

Farm workers have been attempting to organize for more than 70 years. Every time they have tried, they have been thwarted by land owners and government.

American Indians were the first to toil as farmworkers in the fields of California. They were followed by Chinese (who comprised 90 per cent of the farmworkers in the 1870's), Japanese, Philipinos, and today Chicanos.

Farmworkers are the least protected of all American workers covered by federal and state laws. They lack protected organizing rights and cannot legally insist on union representation elections or collective bargaining.

Chavez organized in the fields for three years. Workers paid dues of $3.50 into their organization and slowly the union began to grow and to serve its members.

Agri-business interests first got courts to quash boycott

People in the Chicano communities were being exploited by educated Chicanos who operated outlets called "service centres". The centres essentially provided a liaison service with white authorities because most Chicanos spoke only Spanish and were unacquainted with the laws.

This service was provided — for a fee. Typical charges were $5 to make a phone call, $10 to write a letter, or $25 to get a motor licence.

To end this exploitation, the union set up its own liaison centres. The union centre does not charge fees, and it teaches people to solve their problems without the assistance of others.

To counter the lack of medical care, the union set up free trailer clinics. None of the local doctors would help, so doctors from Los Angeles and San Francisco came to treat the farmworkers and other poor people.

The union also set up credit unions to help eliminate loan shark companies from sticking people with outrageous interest rates.

Even after these programs were implemented, people realized they weren't changing the social and economic conditions under which they lived. The workers were still being treated by the farm owners as possessions to be held in utmost contempt. It smacked of 18th century wage slavery.

In September, 1965, grape pickers at a large rally in Delano, California decided to withdraw their labour to support demands for better pay and working conditions. At the time, the union had only $65 in the bank to serve as a strike fund.

Perhaps the most important aspect of the strike was the workers' determination to hold out until they had won the same basic rights that white people enjoyed.

The owners imported workers from Mexico to break the strike. Union supporters constantly had to persuade these people to quit in support of the strike. Many did leave, but for those who did there were always more poor, desperate Mexicans looking for work.

A Congressional committee came from Washington in 1966 to investigate the situation. It hasn't been heard from since.

The grape boycott was called in response to the imported workers. Because the union did not have any money, people hitchhiked to cities all across the U.S. to set up boycott committees.

After five years, the majority of grape growers signed contracts with the union. Only days later, the UFW called the lettuce boycott.

The lettuce boycott has run into much more organized resistance than the grape boycott did.

On October 6, 1970, Judge Gordon Campbell ordered the UFW to stop all boycott action. Again, the owners were using the courts to their advantage. The move followed a September injunction prohibiting UFW strike activity in Salinas County. The UFW appealed the decision, maintaining it violated the American constitutional right of free speech.

Campbell ordered Chavez to jail for refusing to call off the boycott. The incident attracted American attention. Public figures, including Ethel Kennedy and Coretta King, joined a 24-hour, workers' protest vigil outside the jail.

The California Supreme Court ordered Chavez released on December 23, 1970, pending a final decision on the case.

On March 26, 1971, the Teamsters and UFW extended their jurisdictional agreement for three years and reaffirmed the UFW's right to represent all agricultural work on the lettuce boycott began.

The California Supreme Court granted a substantial portion of Campbell's basic guarantees of free speech.

On May 7, 1971, the first in a series of meetings and a growers' committee was held to discuss the boycott. The meetings dragged on through several growers' committee rejecting every offer by the union.

The purpose of the meetings was to give growers the time they needed to have a say without union interference. In November, the union offer and made it clear they intended to continue with the union.

It was also in November that the convention was held in Las Vegas, 1971. The Valley lettuce grower and California campaign manager, was elected president.

It was these patriotic gentlemen who designed the lettuce boycott with stars and stripes, and labelled "Free Money from sales of this scab lettuce".

The Free Marketing Council (FMC) in the lettuce industry, began filing charges with the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) in 1971. They were filed in 13 cities across the U.S. in support of the boycott.

In response to the FMC, NLRB was appointed by Nixon in August, 1971. The California Federal District Court again ruled against Judge Crocker set the hearing for August.

As the UFW mounted a campaign of public officials, Nash sought negotiation and postponement of the April 6th hearing.

On May 3, 1972, Chavez announced an agreement with the NLRB reaffirming the union's right to picket more than 1,000,000 letters had been written to chairman Senator Robert Dole protesting the actions. At the same time, Chavez announced a boycott.

While this little battle was taking place, the AFL-CIO granted the UFW the right to organize a national union of farm workers. Chavez signed a contract with Coca-Cola company to employ black citrus workers. It represented Florida farm workers.

The threat the UFW now faces is the threat of government anti-farmworker legislation.

The Arizona legislature passed a law to remove the workers' right to boycott, picket and boycotts.

Chavez began a 24-day fast to support the organized farm workers and for the "right to work".

The UFW began circulating a petition for Jack Williams, who supported the boycott, to have been collected.

During his fast, Chavez was visited by McGovern announced his support of the boycott. Supporters not to eat scab lettuce.

On June 4, 1972, 6,000 people, including Chavez to end his fast at Phoenix, Arizona, launching a campaign to obtain 1,000,000 signatures for a boycott. Some 200,000 signatures have been collected.

In California, lettuce growers are being organized by Arizona's passed by way of a referendum on agricultural strikes and boycotts.

The growers employed a public relations campaign necessary signatures to get an initiative. The initiative is similar to a referendum and becomes a law.

The firm, Blanchard and Associates, gathered more than 100,000 signatures, called Proposition 22, on the initiative.

Since Proposition 22 was included in the initiative, protest has revealed that signatures are being collected.

California Secretary of State Edminister announced more than 5,000 affidavits in which growers had deluded into signing the initiative.

Many people were told the initiative would lower food prices, would set a precedent or would be an action against high prices.

People signing the petition were misled by attorney-general's statement describing the initiative covered by different coloured cards. Statements about the initiative were false.

Contrary to the law against using public relations were subcontracted by public relations firms. Many signatures, addresses and dates were collected.

The UFW has been getting support for Proposition 22.

Among those opposing Proposition 22 are the bishops, Democratic Party organization and Einer Mohn, director of the Western Growers Association.

To some people the reasons for the boycott are the south-western U.S. are obscure. The ownership of the kind of farms that are being boycotted.

The lettuce boycott is not being organized by a family farmer. It is a direct challenge to the farm and agri-business.

An outstanding example of UFW is the Corporation. Tenneco owns or controls the largest western U.S. Its farming and land development in 1970. It also received $1.1 million from governments that year.

Tenneco is the 34th largest corporation involved in manufacturing, oil and gas.

Tenneco became involved in farming in 1967 when it gobbled up an old-style corporate farm, the Kern County Land Company. Kern County is California's third largest land owner and has reportedly been buying land in Saskatchewan.

Tenneco can plow its own land, which is fertilized and sprayed with chemicals from its own chemical division, using its own tractors which are fueled with gas and oil from its own wells and refineries.

This is what agri-business is all about: the complete control of every aspect of agriculture. The production of food, its processing, and the marketing of the final products is largely controlled by agribusiness. It means that large corporate farms hire people to produce the food just like GM hires people to make automobiles.

(It is this type of agricultural society that the Task Force on Agriculture, commissioned by the federal government, advocates.
 Although the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, Otto Lang, has officially claimed that the Trudeau government rejected the report as government policy, no attempt has been made to limit the growth of multi-national agri-business.)

No one in the United Farm Workers Union is paid. Each member receives room and board plus $5 a week strike pay. There are 150 full-time boycott organizers working without pay across the United States.

But, what benefits would accrue to the workers if they could bargain through the union of their choice?

Living and working conditions would improve drastically. There is no excuse for 15 per cent of the farm workers showing symptoms of pesticide poisoning. There is no justification for California farm workers having an occupational disease rate twice the rate for all other industries combined. There is no reason for the lack of proper sanitation in the fields.

The life expectancy of farm workers is 49 years. They have shown their determination to extend their lives and the life of their union.

But, a union is not an accurate description. It is more a movement or La Causa.

York students force caterer to drop Kraft

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — Campus action against Kraft food products continued to score successes last week, with the decision of caterers at York University to respect the National Farmers Union boycott against the American corporation.

Lyn Brooks, York manager for Versafoods limited, said student pressure caused him to eliminate most Kraft products from York cafeterias.

Kraft could supply some 50 to 60 percent of campus food needs, Brooks said, but this will now be cut back to 10 percent.

He claimed that individually wrapped cheese slices, pre-packaged jams and jellies, and barbecue sauces are not available from other food manufacturers, so Versafoods must use some Kraft products. He said if the company can find effective replacements the boycott will be made complete.

(A spokesman for the Kraft Boycott Committee said alternative suppliers for all these products are readily available.)

Brooks said he was persuaded to boycott Kraft when he read a letter from York student council president John Theohald in Excalibur, the student newspaper.

Meanwhile, a member of the Laurentian University student council in Sudbury will ask council at its next meeting to remove all Kraft products from its store. The store continues to sell a large number of Kraft products despite the NFU boycott.

A council spokesman said this was no indication that the management supports Kraft or that they were unaware of the boycott.

"Students buy a lot of Kraft dinners regularly, so La Boutede (the store) stocks it," he said.

But newly-elected council member Richard Woodley, who is also new editor of Lambda, the student paper, said "continuing to stock Kraft products is tantamount to supporting Kraft in their battle with the Canadian farmer."

Woodley hopes the council will pass the motion overwhelmingly.

The nation-wide boycott is now well into its second year. The NFU is seeking the right to bargain collectively with Kraft to obtain higher prices for farm products. Kraft refuses to negotiate and refuses to discuss the issue publicly. All requests for speakers to present the company's point of view are referred to provincial marketing boards and the Canadian Dairy Council.

Forster cool to teaching assistants' union

By JULIA ELCOCK

U of T vice-president Don Forster, while admitting there are "many inequalities in terms of working conditions and pay" for teaching assistants, says that forming a union is not the way to accomplish their objectives.

The Graduate Students Union is spearheading a drive to organize U of T's teaching assistants into a union, the Graduate Assistants Association, with full bargaining rights.

Last spring, the GSU asked for voluntary recognition of a TA union, after a report it commissioned showed that the average wage of the assistants was less than $1000, that women were underrepresented among the teaching ranks and that they were virtually powerless in departmental and course decision-making. It recommended improvement in all these areas.

Forster, speaking for the university turned the request down.

He refused, in a recent interview, to elaborate further on his views of the formation of the union.

School of Graduate Studies assistant dean Arthur Sherk said he hadn't "studied the (GSU) report carefully", but from what he had read, he believed the union had done "a good job on it."

He said that he didn't "necessarily agree with the conclusions," but he did admit that in some cases the pay is uneven for equivalent work.

Asked if he thought that assistants should have some say in tutorial content and size, Sherk refused to comment. He also said that he didn't intend to comment on the possible formation of the union.

The "whole picture of Graduate Students should get a good support package", he did say.

Sherk said that he was not sure that a union would achieve student objectives.

U of T manager of labour relations John Parker refused to comment on the report or the possible founding of a union, saying that he could not intelligently give a position until the university decided what its policy is to be on this matter.

The GSU's organizing campaign is underway with a series of meetings and other promotion in an attempt to convince teaching assistants of the need for a union.

If 65 per cent of the TA's sign up, and the Ontario Labour Relations Board accepts the union as a proper bargaining unit, it will be granted automatic certification, with full bargaining rights.

Hoechst thinks ahead

Helping Build Canada

Products and ideas from Hoechst have touched and improved the quality of people's lives in every area around the world, in a hundred countries on six continents. As an affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organization, Canadian Hoechst Limited has a full century of research and achievement to draw upon. In Canada, Hoechst is an autonomous company employing Canadians to serve Canadian needs.

Hoechst in Canada concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, plastics, printing plates, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst products and services, Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. Hoechst thinks ahead.

Hoechst Research Increases Highway Safety

Early perception of danger points and easy identification of traffic signs so that their messages can be instantly recognized, are two of the greatest problems of road safety.

The fluorescent colours now used to mark highways often fade after a short time. But Hoechst research has developed persistent fluorescent dyestuffs which have the valuable attributes of maximum lightfastness and striking visual impact. The qualities of these dyestuffs improve identification of highway danger spots, men working, traffic signs, railway crossing and unlit roads. In fact there is an almost inexhaustible number of identification uses. This is a major contribution by Hoechst to future road safety.

Ahead through systems thinking

The new fluorescent dyestuffs are the result of Hoechst know-how and experience in many fields. They are the product of collaboration between physicists and technicians engaged in research into dyestuffs and plastics.

Systems thinking is the Hoechst strategy. Research, development and product experience in many areas are concentrated on the solution of specific problems.

To keep ahead — to solve the problems of today and tomorrow — Hoechst employs 10,300 people in research and development with a research investment of more than 150 million dollars.

Shepherd wants more power for committee

By RANDY ROBERTSON
Academic Affairs Committee chairman R. M. H. Shepherd suggested last week that the committee should assume power relative to the Governing Council.

At a meeting discussing the chairman's proposals on the role of Academic Affairs, Shepherd urged the committee, in order to save time, to consider sending "more as information and less for approval" to the Governing Council.

All committees of the Governing Council are now required to submit all substantive proposals to the full council for approval, and merely to inform council of what is considered "implementation" of previously laid-down policy.

The "information" method was used by the Internal Affairs Committee to set up the university's proposed day care centre under the jurisdiction of previously defined policy. However there were enough objections to this method of procedure at the council meeting that Chairman Malim Harding ordered a vote be taken on the proposal.

Shepherd also thought the committee should have the power to set up subcommittees without council approval.

"The Governing Council," he said, "has the power but the Academic Affairs Committee has the onus of responsibility to help the Governing Council."

He attacked the way subcommittees are presently set up — only with the permission of the Governing Council.

"If we are not competent to set up subcommittees ourselves, what are we competent to do — we, the largest standing committee of the Governing Council?" The committee needs this authority, he said, because more subcommittees are needed and the Academic Affairs Committee can set them up more quickly than the Governing Council.

Committee member professor M. Israel described the committee as "sitting here trying to decide how much power we can wrest away from the Governing Council."

"This may cause a trauma in the Governing Council," another member said. "They will begin to wonder what we're up to."

Shepherd complained that making decisions in the new unicameral system of university government is much harder than it was in the old system, which had two substantive bodies, the Board of Governors and the academic Senate.

"It hothers me," he said, "that it takes too long to get things done. The idea of the unicameral system was to speed things up, I thought."

"How much more cumbersome and slower our procedure is already," he added, "than the Senate procedure was in academic affairs."

Shepherd said last year a proposal coming before the Senate was referred to the appropriate one of the 17 boards of studies of the Senate for discussion, before it returned to the Senate to be voted on.

This year a proposal is presented to a subcommittee and goes from it to the Academic Affairs Committee for discussion. If it is approved, it goes to the Executive Council and finally to the Governing Council to be voted on.

Shepherd said that the Academic Affairs Committee has a backlog of business already. He warned that the committee's workload will be "about two or three times as heavy as it is now" in the second term.

"If we cannot function expeditiously, what practical importance do we have?" he asked.

He said that the relationship of the Academic Affairs Committee to the Governing Council ought to be more clearly defined — if not by the Governing Council, then by the Academic Affairs Committee itself.

The meeting decided to set up a striking committee to establish subcommittees on admissions and awards, and on curriculum and standards.

Academic Affairs also added a full-time student to an ad hoc subcommittee on extension education.

On the advice of U of T vice-president Don Forster, the committee recommended to the administration that admissions applications from Ugandan refugees not be refused consideration if they are submitted after the deadline. It also decided the administration should ask the provincial government to extend OSAP benefits to the refugees waiting for one year residency and other requirements.

Rotenberg changes policy on development

By LORNE SLOTNICK

In an apparent change from his previous policy, mayoralty candidate David Rotenberg moved closer to his more liberal opponent David Crombie on the issue of development at a policy speech Thursday.

Ward 8 alderman Fred Beavis, an Old Guard stalwart, was one of about 250 well-dressed people who crowded into the Regency Hyatt Hotel ballroom to hear the Ward 11 alderman deliver a policy paper on urban planning and housing. The proposals sounded quite different from the consistently pro-development Rotenberg that city hall observers are familiar with.

In his first of a series of policy speeches, Rotenberg proposed that the city tax commercial property at the maximum of its zoning potential, set up a "land stabilization bank", and set up neighbourhood "mini-planning-boards".

Taxing land at its full potential would force the owners of land developed less than the maximum its zoning permits to apply to have the land down-zoned, unless they wanted to pay more taxes, Rotenberg said. An owner wanting to develop the land would have to apply for an upzoning, at which time the city could place specific conditions on the size and amenities of the new development.

Rotenberg claimed that this would ensure that the people of Toronto benefit from new projects downtown, and denied that it would encourage more mammoth office towers. The developer would rather downzone than build in order to avoid the extra taxes he explained, adding that demand for office space will not support many more massive developments.

The land stabilization bank would buy up downtown land as it came on the market, which the city would have control over the use of under a lease-back arrangement. The city would use its own money and federal mortgage loans for the scheme, said Rotenberg.

The land bank would eliminate speculative profit from the price of the land, and make housing available at lower costs, he claimed.

The "mini-planning-boards", which Rotenberg had proposed earlier during the campaign, would ensure that a neighbourhood would have a say in any changes taking place in the area before the final stages of a new development.

The proposals depart significantly from Rotenberg's usual image as a pro-developer candidate. Asked what developers would feel about his plans, he said that "they will build under whatever rules we set".

They are "very adaptable", he added.

Even though Rotenberg will have enough money to conduct his campaign on the basis of personality, he said he will not run that type of campaign.

"Smiles and handshakes" are not the qualifications needed for the mayor of Toronto, he said, in an apparent dig at Alderman Tony O'Donohue, who is running mainly a personality campaign for mayor.

The platform guests at the policy reading were Bud Sugarman, a Yorkville businessman; Edward Dunlop, president of the Toronto Sun and former Conservative MPP; and Liberal Senator David Croll, a former mayor of Windsor.

Dunlop said Rotenberg was a man of "great intelligence, great integrity, great humanity, and great sensitivity".

Woman activist claims

Reforms are no substitute for mass action

By ELAINE FARRAGHER

Even though it is important for women to fight for reforms in laws which discriminate against them, they should never believe that it can be a substitute for collective action, says an activist who is assisting other women to understand the law. "Working on reformist issues should only be done to create the preconditions for future liberation," Susan Perly, who works with the Women's Bureau in Halifax, was speaking yesterday to about 50 people at a Waffle-sponsored conference on "Women and their work". Perly co-authored a book entitled "Women and the Law in Nova Scotia".

She declared that the law in Canada discriminates against women by defining what their role is to be in society and using structures through which it enforces this definition. Perly stressed that there was no active conspiracy on the part of the government to discriminate against women. "The law" she said, "is tied to the ideology of the system and supports it, as well as being part of it". Thus she said that although it is important to be concerned with changing the small ways in which the law discriminates, women should not become caught up in them and lose sight of the larger and more important struggle which is in changing the whole nature of the state. Perly said that the law has defined marriage as an arrangement in which the husband supports the wife financially, and she in turn provides him with sex and domestic services. Thus if a woman refuses to move where her husband moves, she is considered legally as deserting him. If a woman on welfare lives with a man, she can be cut off because it is assumed that he is supporting her. Likewise, if another man injures a man's wife in some way which makes her incapable of providing sexual and domestic services, the man can be sued for damages, Perly said. Also, if a woman commits adultery her lover can be sued by her husband for "criminal conversation" but a woman can not do the same if her husband is similarly unfaithful to her. "In this society," said Perly, a "man and wife" are "one under the law, but the 'one' is the man." "Legally a woman cannot be raped by her husband since a man has sexual rights over his wife. A wife cannot be charged with being an "assessory after the fact" if she hides her husband after he has committed a crime. If a man owes money to his wife as well as to other people, and pays her back first, the money can legally be taken away from her to be paid to his other creditors, she asserted. Perly said that although the law may not specifically force women to live the way the system has defined for them, society has set up great barriers through various other laws which make it very difficult for a woman to do otherwise. As an example, she noted that although a woman does not legally have to change her name upon marrying she must state her married name on her passport or prove that she is known by her maiden name. Social insurance, she said, also goes by a woman's married name. Also, although it is not illegal for a couple to live common-law, a woman in such a situation has few legal rights. Children resulting from a common-law union are regarded as "illegitimate"; and unless the father submits a statement recognizing the children as his own, he has no responsibility towards them. Perly said that although the laws are changing, many loopholes remain that make the changes ineffective. "Since the equal pay act came into Ontario, no actions against an employer have been successful in court". Also, although the minimum wage in Nova Scotia is now the same for men and women, it does not apply if the person is underage, or an apprentice. Thus, she said, many women are hired as "trainees" for very low wages, and then fired a few months later when the category may no longer apply. "Also," she observed "Ontario is thinking of not applying the minimum wage to waitresses who get tips."

Maoist says Communist Party of Canada is opportunist, reformist

By GREG McMASTER

The Communist Party of Canada has been transformed by political opportunism from a movement with a clear understanding of the need to establish a state of workers' soviets into a reformist party whose program "sounds like a group of Buddhists praying for peace." This accusation was made by Mitchell Bornstein, who presented a critical history of the Communist Party at a Friday meeting of the Norman Bethune Club. Bornstein in Spadina in the recent federal election as a Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) candidate. Describing the Communist Party in the 1920's as "a party which had no reverence for bourgeois legality" Bornstein noted that the founding meeting of the party took place illegally, in secret, while the War Measures Act was in effect. He said that the party openly called for a workers' republic in Canada, embracing Lenin's theories of armed revolution, while at the same time trying to "lead the economic struggles of working people". Many members were arrested for speaking as Communists at public meetings.

derestimating the significance of the British North America Act as an instrument of neocolonialism, for claiming that Canada was an imperialist power in its own right, and for "utterly failing to see that the people of Quebec form a nation with an undeniable right to self-determination." He traced the party's history through the 30's and 40's, saying that the party partially abdicated political leadership of the working class, overemphasizing economic struggles by making "demands" on capitalists to solve problems created by capitalism. On the other hand, he gave the party credit for being the leading force of the working class, for denouncing "ruling class justice" at a time when striking workers and Communists were subject to arrest and shooting attacks by the police.

reformism, leading to its increasing tendency to see itself as a "benefit society" calling for band-aid solutions.

part of the party program," said Bornstein.

Radical editor here

A well-known Canadian radical, Dimitri Roussopoulos, will be speaking today on "Revolutionary organization: an anarchist alternative". Roussopoulos helped found the radical quarterly "Our Generation" in 1961 with which he has remained as an editor, and was active in the formation of the Canadian new left. He also founded Black Rose Books, a Montreal publishing house of radical books. He is the author of "Quebec Labour" and edited "The New Left in Canada". A frequent speaker and contributor to theoretical journals, Roussopoulos has also been active in community organizing in Montreal. He is speaking at 1 pm in Sidney Smith 2106.

Bornstein said "You can tell how far this party has fallen in the last 51 years" by its present program, which rejects the idea of smashing the ruling class' state. The program is also "a source of undying shame" for talking of a peaceful era at a time when the United States has attacked country after country and is "waging a genocidal war against the people of Vietnam," he added. Bornstein criticized the early Communist Party for un-

On the other hand, he gave the party credit for being the leading force of the working class, for denouncing "ruling class justice" at a time when striking workers and Communists were subject to arrest and shooting attacks by the police. These included the murder of many workers in the thirties, and the jail cell attack on CP leader Tim Buck in 1934. Bornstein also referred to the fighting efforts of Dr. Norman Bethune and 1200 other Canadians in the defense of the Spanish Republic as examples of CP leadership. It was during the 30's, claimed Bornstein, that opportunism led to the party's failure to break with

In 1937, at the eighth party convention, "at a time when revolution was the order of the day, the party leadership was talking about building membership," according to Bornstein. The party subordinated the class struggle to the point of forgetting it during the world war against fascism, he claimed. During the late 40's and 50's the CP changed from a party in which reform of the present system was "no longer an opportunist deviation but an integral part of the party program," said Bornstein. Bornstein said that the culmination of this process was in 1954, when the party program was revised to include "anti-marxist" ideas of the parliamentary, constitutional road to socialism. During the 1950's, he charged, the CP "refused to stand up and fight against McCarthyism and Cold War propaganda, and therefore "ceased to be a force" in Canadian politics. Bornstein concluded by saying that real change in Canada "depends on the class struggle, not on comparisons of Canada with the Soviet Union and mystification of the question of the state."

Call for renovation of Toronto landmark

Citizens oppose destruction of Massey Hall

The majority of 100 people at a meeting about the future of Massey Hall last Thursday opposed its planned demolition. The audience at St. Paul's Church on Avenue Road supported preserving and renovating the old building, as well as constructing a new hall.

Massey Hall's board of governors plan to build a new hall in Metro Centre, on land donated by the City of Toronto. The $19 million cost of the new music auditorium is expected to be financed by the federal and provincial governments and from public donations.

The present Massey Hall, home of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and host to many rock and folk concerts, needs costly renovations to make it a viable and safe hall.

The meeting, sponsored by Time and Place, a group dedicated to preserving historical and architectural landmarks, was called after the acquisition of the Metro Centre site for the new Massey Hall was announced.

A Toronto landmark for 78 years, the hall has outlived its usefulness according to Edward Pickering, chairman of the board of governors and past-president of the TSO, who explained why the board decided on a new hall, instead of extensive refurbishing to the old.

He began by assuring the gathering that "the governors have made no decision about the potential use of the hall", although they have decided to erect a new building. He replied to Alderman John Sewell's question that he did not include proceeds from the sale of the land, close to Queen and Yonge Streets, as part of the funds for the new hall.

Pickering said he hoped for seven million dollars from the provincial government to match a federal pledge, and five million dollars to be raised privately.

Although Pickering was "sentimentally attached to Massey Hall", he and the rest of the governors found the basic systems and services "obsolete" and that large capital expenditures for renovation and installation of good heating and cooling systems would be futile.

"Massey Hall has fine acoustical properties in the auditorium, but if you change the structure, you run the risk of losing the good acoustics," Pickering said. "The acoustics, though, are not good on stage, and one section of the symphony can not hear another."

The sound quality of the hall was the subject of most debate, because the major rationale for keeping it, other than for historical and sentimental value, was because a majority of the audience felt a new hall could not duplicate the fine acoustics of the old.

Some of the younger members of the audience asserted that the building was "enjoyable" for hearing pop groups in.

In contrast to other sentiments expressed about the quality of the hall, TSO bass player Sam Levine pleaded for a new hall. Levine, who has been with the TSO 22 years, echoed the opinions of a majority of the orchestra, "from the horses mouth", he said.

"One would think that orchestra members would become quite attached to the place, but that is not the case," Levine said. He verified Pickering's statement that one part of the orchestra can not hear another, and said that the TSO had been promised "something better".

"We live in a dungeon; the washrooms are a disgrace," Levine said. "We need a new hall."

Mayorality candidate David Crombie said that he was at the meeting to see "why we should save the hall".

"Everyone has a personal

Massey Hall, a Toronto landmark for 78 years may fall victim to the wrecker's hammer.

reason", but Crombie was looking for the "public" rationale. He hoped that Massey Hall would not be listed as a building that "We used to have."

A letter from another mayorality candidate, Alderman David Rotenberg, said that he was "informed the decision to demolish would not be made until the new hall was completed". Rotenberg promised to do all in his power to retain it for the public, or sell it to a private citizen or group who would retain the structure.

Art historian Douglas Richardson presented slides showing the structure when it was constructed in 1894, and other structures based on the Massey Hall design. He concluded that to give up the acoustical qualities of Massey Hall would be to lose "a pearl of great price".

Architect Mandel Sprackman suggested the building could be saved, and showed slides of similar structures which he had renovated.

"Considering her age, she's in good condition," Sprackman said. He said the board of governors may not have looked at all the possibilities. He suggested that they consider using the space under street level for expansion of facilities.

U of T architecture professor James Acland, stating he was playing the "devil's advocate", asked the audience to be absolutely clear that they were not trying to save an "inefficient structure".

He said the building was "badly placed" and that the required renovation would cost a great deal. A new function might be found for Massey Hall, he suggested.

Sewell said that he thought the whole Metro Centre proposal "stinks" and the decision for the Massey Hall site does not happen in a vacuum. Sewell said he would be reluctant to accept "that type of a gift" (the land) from the City of Toronto. The municipal government only gives gifts like that to developers, he declared.

Sewell said that it was odd that the governors had been looking at alternatives for seven or eight years, while the public had just found out about the situation recently. He charged the board "is representative of big downtown business", and strongly suggested that subscribers be involved in decision-making on the future of the hall.

Some members of the audience then compared the board of governors to the aristocracy, and demanded representation on it.

According to Quebec MP

Shoddy medical service dispensed to public

Three to four million Canadians are receiving no medical service at all said Heward Graffley at a taping of the television show, Crossfire.

"People are dying and suffering unnecessarily," said Graffley because "the (medical) system has totally collapsed already."

Graffley, a lawyer, is the author of "A Senseless Sacrifice: A Black Paper on Medicine". He is one of Quebec's two Progressive Conservative MPs and a governor of a Quebec hospital.

Graffley concentrated his attack on the lack of service in rural areas.

He said that as general practitioners disappear they are not being replaced by paramedics in the rural areas. This leaves low income people and the aged without any service because of their lack of mobility.

He called this "a cruel hoax on these people".

He cited his own area in Quebec's eastern townships as an example saying that seven years ago there were seven full time doctors, while now there is only one. He said that there have been no compensating local services, transportation to local hospitals, paramedics or clinics.

Graffley said that one solution would be the establishment of community clinics in rural areas staffed by paramedics and visited regularly by doctors. There is a need for paramedics to supplement doctors, he said.

The time of the general practitioner is over, claimed Graffley. It is "inevitable that we are going into specialization", but as a result, there is all the more need for paramedics.

He castigated legislators for pouring billions of dollars into medical expenses and income supplements for doctors and not devoting more money to the training of more doctors and paramedics.

Graffley said that he was more "critical of medical services in general than doctors in particular", but that he blamed the medical profession for lack of leadership.

He also advocated the redistribution of doctors throughout an area according to population.

Medical services run from excellent to terrible, said Graffley.

The "general thrust of consumerism" has allowed the medical profession to police themselves. He said that medical boards should be set up with some kind of public representation to define standards of practice.

Graffley's only criticism of medical schools was that they draw a "majority of students from upper income groups and it is hard to get them to go into lower income areas". He said that this tends to make medicine an elitist profession.

There is "wonderful work being done in Ontario in emergencies," he asserted, but "the medical profession has downgraded the importance of emergency services". He charged that red tape kills accident victims.

SAC pub proposal awaits word from UC residence council

By KIM RICKETTS

A proposal for a SAC pub presented to the residents' council of University College earlier this week awaits a vote of confidence from the full council and the approval of Dean E. M. Howarth.

The proposal is for a central university pub to be located in the junior UC common room under the Ferguson dining room. A meeting of the executive of the residents' council has decided to present the proposal to the full council on Monday.

SAC is willing to pay the costs of furnishing the room, estimated at $500. In addition, half of the profits up to $50 has been offered to the residents' council as "rent". Above $50, one quarter of the profits would go to the council.

SAC is not concerned with making a profit, says SAC services commissioner Bill Steadman. "The idea is to make enough money not to be spending money on it."

He would like SAC to make enough money from its share of the profits to repay its initial $500 investment.

The pub is to be established on an experimental basis about three weeks after acceptance. Steadman hopes. It may be terminated at a week's notice if it is not successful, he indicated.

The proposed hours of operation are Friday and Saturday from 6 p.m. to midnight.

Ivan Cohen, president of the residents' council, is concerned that minor clarifications be made in the proposition and that SAC assume responsibilities for all damages. Negotiations on these terms will begin in earnest after the full council meeting.

Cohen is optimistic that if the proposal is accepted the pub will get "the patronage of the people in the residences".

SAC service and communications worker Paul Carson said he was satisfied with the technical aspects of the common room. He is optimistic that the new pub will compensate for the outdoor pub proposed in September but refused a licence.

He is pleased that "SAC is going further into student service".

Bottled beer has been suggested as the most economic beverage to sell, but the final decision has not been made.

"We hope for the lowest prices on campus," stated Carson.

Only radical action can cure family woes, says prof

By AGI LUKACS

"The problems of the family cannot be solved without radical, perhaps revolutionary social change," said anthropologist Kathleen Aberly Gough, last week at the woman's course lecture at the Faculty of Education.

Gough was fired from Simon Fraser University in 1968 along with several other radical social scientists. She is now teaching temporarily at U of T.

"Family relations have declined in scope and activity since the state was first created — about 5000 B.C.," she noted.

As production of goods was transferred from the home to the factory in the industrial revolution, co-operation within the family decreased. The man went to work in the factory, while his wife and children became dependents.

The family has declined even further in Communist-bloc countries, as well as in Sweden and Israel, Gough said. In these countries, there are more women in the labour force than in North America, and more children in day care, freeing the women for a vocation of their own.

The North American family is facing a crisis, Gough declared.

The divorce rate is rising, there are an increasing number of one-parent families, and the changes in sexual mores bewilder both young and old.

Many unemployed men leave their families, in order not to be a burden, while the welfare mothers left behind cannot usually have a man around the house, for fear of being cut off welfare.

Gough quoted statistics which state that more women are in the Canadian public work force now than 10 years ago, while there are relatively fewer men. This alters relations within the family, she said.

But on the job front itself, women are still performing jobs similar to the ones they did at home. They are teachers, nurses, waitresses, or saleswomen of clothes and household goods.

Because of this, and because Canadian women earn an average of 60 per cent of what their male counterparts earn, the dependency of women on men is not greatly decreased, Gough asserted.

Further, women allow this to continue by often regarding their salaries as supplemental income to their husbands'.

Housewives are regarded as "pre-capitalist workers in a capitalist society", Gough underlined, because the 30 to 90 hours a week they spend working in the home is only "paid in kind" — by the provision of food, shelter, and other forms of maintenance.

Dependency both at work and home could be changed, Gough stated, if the state took serious measures to ensure equal pay for equal work, paid housework with state-paid pensions, unemployment insurance and maternal leave, as well as day care.

Gough emphasized that having children should be "one cultural choice out of several, not the inevitable choice".

"For the first time, we have the technical possibility to successfully separate sex from reproduction," Gough noted. This was considered standard in primitive societies, and "was always true for a large proportion of men, and for the small proportion of women who were prostitutes".

Gough felt that single parenthood, "which is now only a tendency, should become a possibility with public support" — for example, through the provision of day care.

"Public day care has proven successful in Sweden, Israel and China," she mentioned. "A child is not stunted if it is raised by a small number of loving adults."

Gough suggested several means of combatting some of the problems she had raised.

She suggested that women try to cast off the "slave mentality" that involves both "obedience and rebellion" toward their situation, and fight for equality instead.

"We have to change ourselves, psychologically and sociologically," she insisted. Within a marriage, for instance, which cannot be isolated from the society at large, "let's do away with the hostile competition of a private enterprise society, and try to become co-operating people".

She predicted today's family will disappear within 200 years, but the sexes must try to maintain good long-term interpersonal relationships in any case.

In the meantime, she suggested that women organize for their rights working alone, temporarily, like the blacks in the U.S. did, but recognizing that "we can't succeed alone".

"We need badly the men who already understand us."

Mac bombs pathetic Blues 98-49 in exhibition play

By BOB PRITCHARD
The most appropriate summary of the Basketball Blues 98-49 loss to McMaster Marauders in exhibition play Saturday night was aptly stated by Toronto coach John McManus:

"We couldn't do anything."
It would be difficult to attribute one specific area of play to Blues' loss — there were too many of them. Toronto had trouble with the basics of basketball: shooting, rebounding, offence, defence — the team was cold everywhere.

Actually, Blues started the game playing respectable basketball. They got the first jump and even scored the first basket. But that was the last the team ever saw of the lead.

McMaster quickly changed the score to 12-4 in their favour and never looked back. Marauders used an efficient man-to-man press, making it difficult for Blues to bring the ball up the floor while Toronto guards, dribbling with their heads down, were frequently tied up by the Hamilton defence. Blues tried to do the same to Mac, but their guards had little difficulty finding their way through. Some good shooting by Mac's Mark Waugh, who scored twelve points in the half, helped increase Marauders' lead.

Throughout the first half, the Blues were in control of the boards at both ends of the floor, as they out-rebounded Hamilton 25-18. If Toronto had capitalized on the offensive rebounds, it might have come out at halftime either ahead of Mac or at least close behind. But no one could find the basket.

At one time, Blues retrieved four consecutive rebounds off the Mac boards and missed on all of them.

But the team wasn't able to score from close in — or anywhere else for that matter. Blues only connected on 37% of their shots, compared with Marauders 51%. These factors combined with an effective fast break which caught the Blues with their pants down several times enabled McMaster to go into the changeroom at halftime with a 45-25 lead.

Going into the second half, McManus said, "We'll do better." They didn't. Unfortunately, McMaster did.

Whereas earlier Blues' problem was scoring after snatching the rebounds, this time they couldn't even get the rebounds. The McMaster defence didn't even let them get close enough for a shot. When it did, Toronto was lucky to hit the rim, evidenced by their 17% shooting average in the second half.

Any of the hustle that McManus had talked about earlier was certainly lacking. Blues were constantly beaten down both ends of the floor. They even slipped up on simple give and go plays, which Mac was quick to take advantage of. Some skillful ball handling and dribbling by Hamilton's Herwig Baldauf, who scored 23 points for his team, increased the lead even more.

In one play, while standing under the Toronto basket, Baldauf made a fake that sent three Blues flying into the air. While they hung there suspended, he just stepped in between them for the two points, much to the delight and cheers of the Hamilton fans.

The only time Blues slowed down the Mac offense was when they went into a 2-1-2 zone defence. But by that time, Marauders were content to pass the ball around and wait for a shot, which they invariably made. To make matters worse, Skyvington, Watt and Kreyzk fouled out of the game.

By the time the final buzzer sounded, the Blues had turned over the ball 38 times, and shot an overall 27% from the floor (McMaster hit 53%). The fact that the Blues hit 100% from the foul line wasn't much use, seeing as they only got there twice in the half. Final score: 98-49.

Throughout the whole game the Blues bench remained stonily silent. The only sounds came from coach McManus, who eventually also became quiet in frustration during the second half. The Blues might have had little to cheer about, but in a gym full of McMaster fans, a little encouragement from the bench wouldn't have done any harm.

McMaster coach Bill Fowler was merciful in his criticism of the Blues. "They hurried their shots and took them off balance." He attributed his win to "tough, hard-nosed defence." Fowler was right on both counts.

Consideration should be given to the fact that this was Blues first game (Mac had played on Friday), and there were eight rookies rotating on and off the floor. The loss of Gerry Barker has turned out to be costly, and will put more pressure on guards Rudnik and Felinski.

It would be unfair to judge the Blues completely on the basis of one game. However, if in future games the Blues lapse into periods of play exemplified in Saturday's game, it will be a rough season for the team.

Tip offs: Mac also defeated York in exhibition play Friday at York, 80-70. . . . Blues next game is Saturday at 2 pm in the Benson Building against Laurentian. It's the first league game and counts for points.

Mac eliminates Blues 13-4; wins OUA A water polo

McMaster Marlins captured the Hershorn Trophy Saturday at York University by virtue of their 10-4 rout of Western Mustangs in a sudden-death water polo final. The win marked the fourth consecutive OUA A water polo championship for the Mac team.

Toronto was eliminated in the semi-finals, losing 13-4 to the Marlins, while Western's 5-1 win over Queen's also ended the year for the Kingston squad.

Scoring for Blues were Chris McNaught with one goal in the first period and Henning Wiebach — one goal in the second period and two in the third. The Toronto team went scoreless in the final period.

For McMaster it was Tomlinson with five in the first half, Joudrie with two, and Hart with three. Singles came from Steplock, Park and Pugliese.

Toronto's performance Saturday was basically a repetition of Queen's-Blues games this season. Blues also came out on the losing end in that series by a 2-1 margin.

What sets other teams — Queen's, Western, McMaster — apart from their Toronto counterparts, is their ability to play as a team. Blues had only individual "stars" this season — McNaught and Wiebach — and these individuals did most of the scoring and non-scoring. Goalie Vitold Gesing was remarkable in his rookie year with Blues; he made up the third member of the Toronto "team".

The extremely capable Marlins outlasted, outchecked, outswam, and outscored the Blues. Toronto was lucky to score the four goals it did, although Mac goalie McLintock was outstanding.

Blues might take an example from Western Mustangs team. Cliff Berry was essentially the only strong swimmer on the team, yet he acted as a player-coach in the water, directing the team to its 5-1 win. Had McNaught and/or Wiebach directed the team rather than gone for scoring records, Toronto might have gone farther. The Toronto team members also appeared to lack confidence in each other. There were too many individual players.

Perhaps next season rookie coach Steve Toholka will put together a "team" in the true sense of the word.

UC, Meds meet in Div II final

By BRIANE NASIMOK

In a hard fought game played in Varsity Stadium's artificial mud Friday, the UC Redmen rolled and crawled to an 18-9 victory over the New College Gnus, in quarter final football play for the Mulock Cup — symbolic of interfac football supremacy and body odour.

The first half was highlighted by a 65-yard pass-and-run from the UC quarterback to fleet-footed Bruce McGillivray to put the Redmen, who by this time looked like brownmen, ahead 7 to 3 at halftime.

The major score came at 13:45 of the first quarter, a mere 59 seconds after Gord Saikaleg lofted a 31 yard field goal to give the Gnus, the sentimental underdogs, a 3-0 lead.

Nothing of scoring interest occurred in the second quarter.

After exchanging punts, along with ends in the third quarter, the Gnus were seemingly stalled at the UC 52 when the Redmen got called for roughing the kicker. From the UC 38 yard line Ron Marijosiks was given the ball, and he didn't let go until he crossed the goal line. A bad snap on the convert resulted in the quarter ending New 9, UC 7.

UC quarterback, and Genessee's player of the game, Dave Rose, scored 9 — count 'em, 9 — big points in the fourth quarter to give the Redmen the win.

With 6:35 to go in the game, UC got to the New 15-yard line, but on the ensuing play fumbled, and recovered the ball on the 22. Rose bit for a 29-yard field goal to give the Redmen a narrow, if not slim, one point lead.

When New returned the kickoff the UC defense held, and the Gnus were forced to kick. The punt went to the UC 47, where the Redmen took control and eventually scored on a 3-yard sweep by — who else — Dave Rose with 1:40 to go.

After a two point conversion,

New returned the kickoff to their 37. In order to make the game close (the "hoys" gave a 6½ point spread for UC, and the wise money was on the Redmen) the Gnus marched to the UC 10-yard line with the help of two rough play and one pass interference penalties against UC.

The gun went off, and the game ended with the Gnus bidding goodbye to their football dreams for yet another year, with the Redmen awaiting the next step to football supremacy.

In the second half of Friday's football double-header, Meds defeated Trinity 28-18 in a well-played match in front of an unpaid attendance of nearly 50 fans.

The score at the half was 12-12. Meds were led by the fine running, and running over, of Doug Watchorn who scored two touchdowns (one in each half) and set up the third.

Once again the fourth quarter proved disastrous as the doctors scored eight unanswered points, to snatch victory from the Trins, who had come back to make the score 20-18.

Also once again the Blue and White marching band did not provide a thoroughly entertaining show that was not enjoyed by all.

Meds and UC play again Wednesday, 12 noon, barring house calls.

Mac loses opener 6-2 to Blues

By PETER DUX

Hockey Blues won their first game of the regular season 6-2 against McMaster Marlins at the Hamilton Forum Friday.

Blues broke a 2-2 tie with four unanswered third period goals.

Toronto dominated the play, even though the team put on a poor offensive showing in the first half of the game. Shots failed to find the net and Blues' frustration was evident when they retired to the dressing room after the second period with the game tied up 2-2.

Blues outshot their opponents 53-15 overall. Most of Marlin goalie Pat Lange's 47 saves were routine, although he enjoyed hamming them up in an attempt to excite the few fans present.

Blues opened the scoring at 2:26 of the first period when Bruce Herridge tipped in a shot by Warren Anderson from the point. Toronto missed several other opportunities with sloppy passes and unfinished plays. Overconfidence probably accounted in part for the poor showing.

The Marlins tied the score at 11:22 when Dave Ridley, from the slot, tapped in a dumped puck which had bounced off the boards and landed in front of the Toronto net. Blues' goalie Gary Innes had no chance to prepare himself for the quick shot.

The McFarlane-Herridge-Davies line fore-checked well in this close checking 20 minutes. There were very few good plays on either side, while sloppy positional skating accounted for disorganised play.

This "style" continued until midway through the second period, although Blues connected on another goal by Anderson at the six minute mark. The play was started by Bill Buba, who carried the puck in, fed it to Anderson and then set up a good screen. (Unfortunately Buba was not credited with an assist.)

McMaster's Ken Tyler scored on a breakaway at 10:44 immediately after stepping out of the penalty box.

The Marlins skated well this period to try to stay on top of the Blues, who were finally becoming goal hungry and began playing basic hockey.

The second period still ended in a draw, and it wasn't until 2:17 of the third that the Blues hard work paid off as Herridge hacked in a puck being juggled by goalie Lange doing one of his stunts. The play was begun on a rush by Gordy Davies from his own end to set up McFarlane for the initial shot.

Pagnutti, centring Bill Buba and Kent Runke, was continuing his fore-checking, which proved successful in pre-season play. It paid off on Blues' fourth goal when, tied up by two defenders, he got the puck past Lange.

Blues' fifth goal was scored by Lange himself, who caught the puck in his glove, and in trying to get rid of it threw it into his own goal. The goal was credited to Harry Sems.

The Buba-Runke-Pagnutti line added Toronto's final goal at 11:05 with Blues scoring on a centring pass by Runke. So far this season this line is Toronto's strongest offensive threat.

Doug Tate was throwing his weight around Friday, especially in the third period. He had brief skirmishes with Bill Hope and Marlin captain Ken Tyler. Tate, who used to play with Tyler said "He's a good player but doesn't like to get hit."

Toronto goalie Gary Innes, who played for McMaster last year had a good game and couldn't be blamed for either goal. "It feels good to be on the winning side for a change," Innes said.

With Blues' Pagnutti (14) and Keenan (5) parked in front of his crease, Marlins' goaltender Pat Lange covers up quickly. Although the rest of the Mac team came to his aid, they look ineffective.

Watt hasn't used a constant power play unit this year. He likes Leroy, Anderson, Korzack and Hobnes on penalty killing, but also uses Munro, Tate and Davies often in various combinations.

Blues play their first home game against Ottawa Gee Gees at Varsity Arena Friday at 8 pm.

Alberta defeats Blues 2-0; goes on to win CIAU

Soccer Blues' quest for the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union championship ended Friday when the University of Alberta Golden Bears won their semi-final contest 2-0.

While Blues were always in contention, they were definitely the poorer side on the day. The western side played full out for its victory.

The Bears went on to defeat Loyola University 3-1 Saturday to capture the first CIAU championship. John Devlin scored two goals while Steve Odumah added the third. Richard Knopp replied for Loyola.

Loyola had defeated Mount Allison of New Brunswick 4-0 on Friday to reach the final, with Jim Corsi scoring twice and Chris Politis and Mike Evangelista adding singles.

In Friday's Blues-Bears game Toronto was almost immediately forced onto the defensive since the team lost the toss and was forced to play into a strong wind for the first half.

The Alberta midfield duo of Ike Mackay and Frank Tassone were able to snuff out any Blues' offensive moves as well as move the ball forward to their mobile strikers.

To add to the Blues' problems their own midfield player, Ian Harris, was helped off the field when he turned quickly and sprained an ankle 20 minutes into the game.

Much of the Bears' play was directed down their right wing where Joss Binns used his speed and tenacity to take on both Bob Cazzola and John Cobby. However, few dangerous situations resulted since Binns was slow to cross the ball. When he did Tim Burns had the measure of Bears' centre forward Steve Odumah and Toronto goalkeeper Jack Brand showed good ball handling and positional sense.

But instead of stifling the Alberta play in midfield, Blues were still having to tackle their opponents near their own penalty area, which further hindered their constructive difficulties. Many passes went astray under pressure.

Nevertheless, the Blues were not entirely unthreatening. Giuseppe D'Antoni was prominent on two occasions but his dribbles toward shooting range were halted with vigorous efficiency by Alberta's Derek Wynne. A measured pass from Mario DaRosa to Cobby gave the latter a sharp chance, but his shot was charged down.

The Bears also had difficulty in achieving clear shots on goal as the defences dominated. All players found it hard to find team-mates in the open. Blues' Peter Hillier made many cross-field runs in order to draw Alberta defenders from their defensive zones, but they remained firm and well organized. So despite the run of the play in the Bears' direction, the game was scoreless at half time. The Blues' palpable lethargy was attributable to their strenuous efforts of the previous day when they won the OUAA championship against York.

With the wind now in their favour Toronto looked to reverse the pattern of play in the second half. But before they could settle the team conceded a vital first goal.

Though just reward for their first half efforts, Alberta's lead was the result of a "soft" goal. A cross from the Bears' right, which seemed destined for Brand's hands, landed at the feet of left winger Peter Chiu, owing to a confusing call in Blues' defence. The lack of communication when any of three players might have cleared the danger left Chiu with a simple chance from five yards out. His unexpectedly weak goalwards tap, which also would have been saved, caught Brand off guard and the ball gently rolled off his leg into the corner of the net.

With forty minutes still to play Toronto was far from beaten and pressed forward vigorously, most of the attack coming down the right where Ron Misurka and Vito Polera tested the defensive abilities of Hans Strakan. He responded resolutely, allowing the forwards little time for controlled play.

And in the centre, Bears' Jeff Salmon permitted DaRosa only rare opportunities. D'Antoni's effectiveness on the left was reduced by the close attentions of Wynne, who was able to deflect the winger's concentration. When Blues' pressure did build up, MacKay showed control by slowing the game down to allow the Bears a chance to regroup.

Many scoring opportunities turned into buried snap shots as a result of shortcomings in Blues' distribution from midfield, as well as the tightness of the opposition defence.

With 10 minutes left in the game, Blues threw caution to the winds and suffered the effects of their resultant vulnerability — quick counter-attack. A sharp tackle on Polera broke up a Toronto move and Odumah was quickly set free as several Blues' defenders were stranded upfield. Although Odumah was met by Brand at the edge of the penalty area, he was fortunate in finding the hall run free; this left him with a relatively simple shot into an open net.

With time running short Blues attacked desperately. A rising shot from Burns struck the post — typical of the day's frustrations for Toronto. And neither the insertion to the field of Vince Iurello, or the return of the injured, Harris was able to swing the match at this late stage.

Alberta deserved its victory. As hard as the Blues tried, they were unable to reproduce their customary form. It was unfortunate that Blues' first "flat" day should come in such an important game. Nonetheless, the season's record of only one defeat is the best by a Toronto squad for many years.

A student building, now in the planning stage, may be located near the SAC office. The Board of Governors allotted $350,000 for a student area last June.

Memorial U students invade admin building

ST. JOHN'S (CUP) — Nearly 1500 students occupied the arts and administration building of Memorial University at 1 pm today, and they appear determined to continue the occupation as long as necessary in order to win their demands.

Their demands pertain to the unilateral decision of the university administration to discontinue collecting compulsory student fees for the union. The decision, announced last Thursday in a press release, would effectively put an end to compulsory collection of fees, as the union would have no means of enforcing their payment.

The students feel that university president Lord Stephen Taylor and the administration had no right to make this decision unilaterally and without any negotiation whatsoever. They feel that the decision as to whether union membership be compulsory or voluntary should be made by the students, not the administration.

Since the administration timed its announcement so that it was made on the first day of the five-day mid-term break, students had to wait until Tuesday before they could take fully constructive action.

The first thing they did was to organize a general union meeting Tuesday at noon. About 3000 students showed up at that meeting — a remarkably large number for this usually apathetic campus of 7500. At that meeting, a strong majority of the 3000-plus were opposed to the administration, and though a very small minority of students expressed their opposition to the union and the decision to occupy the administration building, more than 1000 students marched to the building to begin the occupation.

The students occupied Taylor's office as well as the comptroller's and vice-president's offices, among others, and they waited for Taylor to return from a lecture he was giving for engineering students. When he returned, he was flanked protectively by 15 or 20 engineers, who said that they were opposed to the council of the students' union (CSU) in its present form, and hence supported Taylor.

Taylor, said he would permit the engineers to be stationed in his office, and would talk with demonstrating students two at a time. They refused such an arrangement, and Taylor left the building.

From there on, there was a series of proposals and counter-proposals, as administrators and student representatives tried to reach an agreement of a means of negotiating the whole affair. Taylor, who first would allow only two students in his office, agreed to meet with a four-man negotiating committee of students, provided the students would vacate the buildings. The students vociferously refused, and the stalemate continued past 6 pm, with students saying that they were prepared to stay all night if necessary.

The bursar's office, registrar's offices, and numerous other branches of the administration had to close their doors in the afternoon, though only the vice-president's office continued to be occupied for more than an hour or so. Outside, the university's flags were lowered to half-mast.

There was no immediate action from the local police on the occupation, though a couple of plain clothes men were keeping an eye on things. Campus security locked as many rooms as possible, but otherwise did little to oppose except observe the proceedings.

Student building may go up near SAC office

By BOB BETTSON

Part of the Campus as Campus Centre Project may be revived as a new complex of low rise buildings next to the SAC office, according to SAC vice president John Helliwell.

Helliwell made this proposal last night at a meeting of U of T student council presidents.

He said that the project "can in no way be construed as a campus centre project," referring to original plans for a massive student union building. "It fully agrees with the principles of the Campus as Campus Centre report," a set of principles to replace the old proposal.

Helliwell said that there would be space for services and activities including commercial outlets such as a bank, or boutiques. He maintained that space for these would be limited to make this a "go through" rather than "go to" project.

Financing for the project, he said, could come partially from $350,000 which was approved by the Board of Governors last June for a "student area", with another $150,000 to come from "outside sources".

U of T President John Evans stated last night that while he was aware of the project, no specific plan has been approved.

"We haven't seen any proposal yet", he said. "Any proposal would certainly be looked at."

Other administrators were unavailable for comment on the project.

Helliwell said the project was in the earliest planning stages and nothing in the way of design had been formulated. He conceives of the project as an "indoor street" designed for a heavy flow of pedestrian traffic.

The proposal will be presented to SAC next week and calls for the setting up of a user's committee, including representatives of all members of the university community, but with students in a majority. The temporary building next to the SAC building would be demolished to make way for the new structure.

Helliwell also revealed that though the SAC building will be preserved it might be turned into a pub. The SAC offices would then be moved into the new structures.

The one dollar campus centre levy could be used to finance the early planning stages of the project, he said.

Helliwell said that the project is an immediate response to the Campus as Campus Centre Report. Development west of St. George, which the report recommends is a long term project, he added.

Reaction from the few presidents present was favourable. Trinity Head of College Geoff Seaborn approved of the project.

Engineering Society president Scott Jolliffe said the project was "just great", but added that it wouldn't warrant direct student funding.

"The project is an example of integrating the functions of the university in an experimental way", maintained Helliwell. "It should be an effort to make people's movement through the area enjoyable, interesting and stimulating".

Geog council students resign

By DIANA WEST

Nine graduate and undergraduate student members of the geography council have resigned en masse in opposition to the appointment of Professor Jacob Spelt as the new chairman.

The present department chairman, P.D. Kerr, received a letter of resignation just prior to Monday's meeting, signed by graduate students John Carline (president of the Graduate Geography Students Association), Stewart Hills, Jim Plewes, Ed Jackson, as well as president of the Toronto University Geography Society (TUGS) Hans Mikolay, and other undergraduates Dean Miller, Caroline Kriesel, Lorraine Clarkson and Ian Morrison.

The 10th student member of the council Orman Granger, did not attend Monday's meeting but said last night that he intends to resign as well.

The meeting, which was to examine the department's exam policy, could not be called to order because the quorum of 16 members could not be reached. There are 20 members on the council, which is advisory to the chairman.

The letter explained that the students had "repeatedly asserted their opposition to this appointment" but that "the committee has chosen to ignore these requests, and in so doing reneged on a verbal agreement we had with the original chairman of that committee."

Their resignations were based on "the lack of a student voice in this department and to some extent on our reservations concerning Dr. Spelt as the chairman of our department," the letter continued.

The letter states the student members of the council "will not support the appointment of a chairman who was opposed by almost every student we have spoken to, and has given every indication by his actions over the past few years that he is not only unwilling but unable to deal with the issue of student participation in any way remotely acceptable to the students."

According to Miller, the students' objection to Spelt arises over his conservative attitude and the students' general feeling that he would consider issues from a "biased point of view".

Miller recalled that Spelt opposed opening the departmental library to undergraduates and the extension of library hours. Although Spelt did compromise to some extent in the end, he was a strong opponent throughout the debate.

Spelt said last night he considered the action of the students "immature". Students in the council had as much say as the staff over departmental affairs, he said.

"It is unfortunate that the council has to be blamed for something it had no control over," said Spelt.

Kerr, who will resign as chairman in June, explained that arts and Science dean Bob Greene has the responsibility of naming a new chairman.

A committee convened last spring to decide upon the chairman by then arts dean Albert Allen but it failed to reach a decision.

Carline, stated that Allen overruled a proposal to have a student member on the committee, because the Haist rules, on which the committee is still proceeding, forbids it.

Allen did suggest, however, according to Carline, that a "shadow student committee" be organized by students for "full consultation".

However, Greene "just ignored it" said Carline, by saying it would be hypocritical to listen to the students after the decision had been made.

As far as Carline is concerned, "the department council as of now is more or less defunct, because a quorum cannot be called."

U of T says it has no house for co-op

By PAT REDICAN

U of T president John Evans has indicated that he will not change his position to meet the ultimatum issued by the Campus Co-operative Day Care Centre to find them a "suitable alternative" to their present accommodations before November 22.

In a letter to the co-op group dated November 10, last Friday, Evans said that excepting 14 Sussex Street there is no "building owned by the university which is presently vacant and can be made immediately available."

"In the meantime... if any suitable accommodation becomes vacant your request will certainly be remembered."

Fourteen Sussex is owned by Innis College and, according to Evans, may be demolished within six months to make way for their new building. The co-op has stated that such an indefinite location would be unacceptable, since they want a stable centre.

Daycare parent-spokesperson Julie Mathien said last night "It's obvious that we're at a stalemate. Dr. Evans won't move. And we won't alter our position either."

Daycare's letter of last Wednesday indicated that, if a suitable alternative was not offered before November 22, they would settle into their presently occupied location behind 315 Bloor West. The decision came from a need to "establish their program on a more permanent basis."

"According to Julie Mathien, this would involve such major renovations as putting in sterilization sinks and new floors, in order to comply with the Day Nurseries Act.

The co-op has refused to say, in light of Evan's reply, whether they will follow their stated plan of action. Another daycare spokesperson, Kathy Peterson, said that no decision will be made until a general meeting of the co-operative next Tuesday.

Mayorality candidate David Crombie (left) lashed out at public housing, at a SAC sponsored meeting held yesterday.

Crombie slams public housing

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Reform mayorality candidate David Crombie yesterday declared his opposition to what he called the "affliction" of public housing.

Crombie, speaking to about 150 people at a SAC sponsored mayorality candidates meeting in the Hart House Debates Room, claimed that public housing "ghettoizes" the poor.

"It extracts a social price" he said, noting the stigma attached to public housing tenants.

"The poor don't want it," he said. "Only the do-gooders cry for public housing. They don't know what it is; the poor do know."

The Ward II alderman favoured co-op housing and a system of rent supplements to needy people instead.

League for Socialist Action candidate Jacquie Henderson claimed that the present attitude of the Ontario Housing Corporation is "if you're poor, you should really suffer for it every day of your life" — in bad and expensive housing.

She called for public housing which would set the standard for housing across the city, in which rents should be no more than 20 per cent of the incomes of the tenants.

David Rotenberg said that since rents are tied to the economy and "can't be pegged", the city should go into the housing business. He proposed that the city buy cheap land in downtown Toronto — land presently zoned for industrial use — and create new neighbourhoods there. "The rents will be lower" he claimed, "because the land will not have been so expensive in the first place".

He suggested that these developments contain mixed housing, with OHC renting, some of the houses from the city and then renting the houses out again with rent subsidies.

Nelson Clarke called for immediate rent controls, treating housing as a public utility, and a massive increase in the construction of public housing "with rents working people can pay".

Clarke, a Communist Party member, is running as an independent.

"The Communist Party of Canada," he said, "does not believe that it is necessary to inject partisan politics into municipal affairs."

"It's already there!" Henderson exclaimed.

"The only difference," she said, "between the provincial and federal governments and the municipal government is that there's more lying, more deception, in municipal government."

"A small minority, the rich, the convention centre people, controls and runs the city against the interests of the majority — the working classes, the tenants, the students, the women."

All candidates called for an increase in the development of public transportation.

Crombie called for the immediate development of the Bathurst subway line and the use of rapid mass transit in all its forms. He suggested that the city inaugurate a dial-a-bus line such as those in Pickering, Stratford and Regina.

Rotenberg said that a basic expressway system is necessary, in addition to the development of a rapid transit system.

He denied, however that he favoured the planned widening of Dundas Street to six lanes. He admitted he supported building the Scarborough Expressway, but said there might be a better route than the one planned.

Henderson called for a free public transit system saying that it would pay for itself because it would eliminate the cost of building and maintaining expressways.

Rotenberg said as mayor he would do his best to discourage car-driving in the city through higher parking fees, taxing parking lots at a rate relative their building potential and creating major underground parking lots at suburban subway stations.

But, he said, "it is just not democratic to ban the car."

Crombie and Rotenberg both declared their support for an all-citizen police commission, free of judiciary members, politicians and ex-police.

Henderson demanded an elected police commissioner, while Clarke called for a police force directly under the control of a sub-council of City Council.

Tony O'Donohue, who appeared near the end of the meeting, said there were not enough engineers running in the election. He explained that engineers, like himself, have experience in environmental affairs.

A "political type of pollution" is pervasive at City Hall, he claimed, making it difficult to accomplish much. City Hall should be run like a business, he said.

Independent Paul Rinstead and Western Guard member Don Andrews, also candidates for mayor, did not attend the meeting.

Student name vanishes in prof's office

Controversy has developed over the question of whether philosophy professor Charles Hanly, as chairman of a nominating committee, lost a nomination submitted by three students.

As a consequence, the committee, set up to add student representatives to the Planning and Resources Board of Governing Council, has been asked to review its procedures by the Executive Committee.

The minutes of the Executive Committee meeting of November 9, which became public yesterday, recommended the nominating committee's report be adopted, subject to the "review of procedures regarding the co-opted member from Scarborough."

If the committee decides its procedures were not correct, nominations could re-open.

The search committee consists of Hanly and graduate student John Morton.

The controversy concerned the number of names submitted to Hanly from the satellite colleges.

The selection from Erindale created no problem, as several names were submitted to the committee, as requested.

Scarborough College principal Ralph Campbell, however, submitted only one name for the seat.

Since nominations were solicited from the entire constituency of Scarborough, three college students, SAC vice-president Ross Flowers, university commissioner John Creelman and Glen Conduit, a representative on the Governing Council Academic Affairs Committee, also submitted a nominee.

Creelman said that the nomination was handed to Hanly's secretary. However, when questioned by the Executive Committee, Hanly could not remember whether or not it was submitted to the committee, according to executive member Brain Morgan.

John Morton, the other member of the committee could not be reached, but The Varsity has been assured that Morton maintains the nomination never received by the committee.

"A gross and terrible mistake was made," Morgan said.

Hanly said last night the problem was a "technical" one.

"We don't have a guideline for getting nominations from academic units such as colleges," he said.

Hanly recommended the by-law committee should set-up appropriate by-laws, and felt that the matter was a "nothing issue" in comparison to other campus issues.

Judge dismisses motion to drop occupation charges

Judge Charles Drukarsh yesterday threw out a motion to drop charges resulting from the break-up last spring of the occupation of Simeoe Hall.

The occupation was in support of undergraduate and community access to the John Robarts Library. Defense lawyer Austin Cooper moved that on the basis that there was no evidence for the charges of obstructing and assaulting police against Mark Goldblatt, the charges ought to be quashed.

However, Drukarsh quickly rejected the motion, and the trial went on with the defense. The trial, which began September 26, will continue on November 23.

Cooper contended that since then U of T acting vice-president Jack Sword had testified that he did not intend to have the occupants either considered or arrested for trespassing and since Sword said he could see that the occupants thought they had a reasonable right to be in the Senate Chamber, that they were not in fact trespassing.

Accordingly, he suggested, the police were not arresting the defendant while carrying out a lawful duty, which the laws of both assaulting and obstructing police require.

At Monday's session of the trial, Metro detective Kearns, the first policeman to enter the Senate Chamber, testified that the students turned down the invitation by the police to leave voluntarily and without arrest.

He said he then entered the Senate Chamber through a hole in the door, landed on a table and was "either pushed or jumped" onto the floor, where he was punched "several times in the back" and held down by Goldblatt.

Cooper suggested to Kearns that Kearns had landed on top of Goldblatt and that the latter was actually trying to help him up. Kearns denied this.

The policeman also testified that, while he was on the floor he was kicked by someone in bare feet. He stated that Randi Reynolds, who has been charged with assaulting police, was the only one around with bare feet, but under questioning accepted the possibility that there may have been others.

Kearns said he had been told that the students were to be advised that they were trespassing, and that they were to be arrested if they refused or resisted. He was not sure whether the orders were from the university or from his superiors.

Metro police constable Selemedis, who was the second officer through the panel, said Kearns was kneeling on the ground, surrounded by 10 shouting people.

He then testified that he saw Goldblatt "hold and punch" the kneeling Kearns. Selemedis stated that after he restrained Goldblatt, the accused offered no resistance.

Metro officer Watson stated that he apprehended the other defendant, Reynolds, "kicking and punching", from behind, another officer, who was occupied in subduing another man.

Quebec united student front to strike

QUEBEC CITY (CUPI) — Community college (CEGEP) students in Québec will go out on strike later this month against tough new government school regulations.

The decision to strike came at a general meeting of more than 200 delegates to the Front des Etudiants du Québec (FEQ) held here last weekend.

The FEQ is the provincial student union affiliated with the Confederation of National Trade Unions. Most universities and colleges in Québec belong to it.

The strike is a response to the new regulations, termed the "nouveau regime pedagogique", as the latest move by the Québec government toward complete control over the CEGEPs.

The regulations require arts students to take several science and physical education courses along with their arts options. Many CEGEP professors interpret this rule as a government attempt to phase out humanities departments within a few years.

The regulations also compel students to attend 45 hours of classes weekly, automatically eliminating students who must work part-time to finance their education. The move contradicts the original aim of the CEGEP program which was to provide some post-secondary education to people who formerly could not afford it.

Students from both French and English CEGEPs united in opposition to the regulations and called for mass support to demonstrate their displeasure.

Members of the Anglophone delegation from Vanier, Dawson, John Abbott and McGill CEGEPs stood in the forefront of the demand for a general strike as soon as possible. The FEQ convention established continuing liaison between the French and English junior colleges to maintain communication during the coming struggle.

The Comité executif national (CEN) or executive committee was empowered to co-ordinate action among the various FEQ regions to ensure a solid front.

A delegate from Sir George Williams University pointed out private educational institutions were subject to the same repression as the CEGEPs, and called for solidarity among students in colleges and universities. McGill University delegates called for close collaboration among all students and between students and faculty in the upcoming strike.

The FEQ plans a mass demonstration in front of the offices of the Direction de l'Instruction generale et collegiale (DIGEC), the authority which issued the new regulations. No date for the demonstration has yet been set.

Delegates determined the strike would start before December 1.

100,000 jobs

The Montreal Star

Quebec Premier Robert Bourassa promised Quebecois 100,000 new jobs in his 1971 election campaign. They never came. But, he tried hard to keep those who were working on the job with poor conditions at the time of this year's Common Front strike.

Quebec judges' dismissal of unionists' appeal reveals motives

Five Québec Appeal Court judges Monday dismissed an appeal by three Québec union leaders, Marcel Pepin, Louis Laberge, and Yvon Charbonneau, sentenced to a year in jail last spring for counselling hospital workers to ignore court injunctions ordering them to return to work.

The labourers had joined 200,000 of their colleagues in walking off the job to protest poor pay and working conditions. The strike, which hit so close to home for so many Québecois, brought Québec's economic life to a virtual standstill. Strikers liberated 14 radio stations, suspended publication of establishment newspapers, and took control of the town of Sept-Îles.

The action represented the most impressive manifestation of workers refusing to passively accept the anti-labour attitude of government. They would not be stopped by empty, moralistic speeches or discriminatory laws preventing them from striking.

Before the strike was called off, Québec premier Robert Bourassa had contemplated calling in the army, he later confessed.

In upholding the maximum contempt of court sentences for the Québec three, the judges insisted that "no lesser penalty" would have been acceptable.

"Never in Canada, or precisely, in Québec had we seen such a flagrant, concerted, and deliberate challenge to the authority of law; never had we seen citizens in positions of authority provoke civil disobedience on such a vast scale; never had we seen the law turned to derision and the judicial power abused with so much aplomb," their judgment declared.

Laberge denounced the vengeful sentences, saying they were directed against union representatives "who only wanted to obtain justice for workers.... earning starvation wages".

They were more than vengeful. The sentences were a desperate attempt to discourage those who would challenge "law and order". The civil authorities had been shocked by the worker's willingness to risk imprisonment and financial penalty to struggle for a just cause. The old, liberal trick of defusing an issue by making its advocacy costly had failed.

The public servants had threatened — by their disregard of laws designed to favour government management — to regain some control over their work conditions, possibly ultimately forcing the government to concede to their demands as the only way to restore economic stability.

The judges' comments confirm that the civil authorities could not tolerate actions which challenged discriminatory laws allowing the government to treat its public employees poorly, confident that they had no recourse to strike. As such, the government's panic reaction and the court's harsh sentences — when viewed realistically — destroy the popular myth that courts and law systems exist to ensure impartial justice.

The judicial system's raison d'être is to guarantee the health and prosperity of the dominant political-economic system. Where that end conflicts with justice, the law prevails; where citizens are so rash as to violate unjust laws, the judiciary acts swiftly to punish them for their sins.

There can be little if any hope for a subsequent reversal of the sentences. And, there is still considerable uncertainty about the likelihood of further labour action to protest the imprisonment (last May, 100,000 people left their jobs to protest the original sentences). At the least, the people of Québec and those Canadians who refuse to close their eyes to injustice revealed will recognize the role the judiciary plays in our political-economic system. And, that in itself, is a significant accomplishment.

Critic's movie view supported

Bravo to Bob Bossin in his column of Friday, October 20, 1972. I first noted his mention of Cinema Lumiere ending their repertory policy. A great pity. (Did you know that Bob Huher has left? Let's follow where he goes and see what he decides to do: whatever it is, it will have "standards".)

Then, I was absolutely astonished to note that finally someone had said something about the filming at OISE! Last year, we had gone there to view "The King of Hearts". We had seen it before and wanted to view it again. Not only was the film "murky", but you never saw anyone above the eychrows! When we protested we were told "if we did not like it, we could go elsewhere". This, of course, is not the correct attitude, but what particularly discouraged us was that OISE should have such standards. And, everyone else in the audience, mostly university students and faculty, accepted this without a murmur. Even the distributor, when told of the situation, was not disturbed and has allowed this to continue! That this gutless attitude should be almost general was astonishing.

Now, someone else has protested... at last. We saw Go-Between and Accident, deciding that by now this appalling situation had cleared up. It had not and again no one protested! These films could never be shown under such circumstances in the Latin Quarter. (Remember when they rioted when foreign films were dubbed? It only happened for one showing and the cinema house had to revert to subtitles.)

I was further delighted when you praised the charming Avenue Cinema. I appreciate what they are trying to do and feel this cinema house should be given every encouragement.

SAC budget shafts Erindale

This letter is intended as a reminder to the present SAC that the budget policies the council adopts this year will be used as precedents by following councils having to work with the "new" constitution. This letter will also serve as a warning to the students of Erindale College, especially those either paying SAC fees or involved in a group activity at the college.

Fact: the new SAC constitution introduced strict reform in grant-giving areas to protect the budget — supposedly in the interests of the students who pay SAC fees. The council now gives grants to U of T groups which have a university-wide function.

Inconsistency: Radio Varsity, which is not transmitted to Erindale campus or Scarborough campus, is still funded by SAC. Miglin-Helliwell-Flowers campaign literature vowed to amalgamate the radio stations on all three campuses to avoid this difficulty and to share the expensive facilities of all three. No attempt has been made to amalgamate the systems. Radio Erindale received a loan from SAC, while Radio Varsity still receives a grant.

Fact: No other recognized student group from Erindale received a loan from SAC.

Inconsistency: A large portion of the SAC fee paid by Erindale students is subsidizing groups which operate downtown, which are downtown-oriented, for which Erindale students must travel downtown to gain any use from them: Radio Varsity, SHOUT, Hart House Chorus, Legal Aid, the SAC bureaucracy. Why?

Previous to this year, SAC rebated to the Students' Administrative Government of Erindale (SAGE) half of the fee paid by Erindale students, so that the "downtown-oriented" money could be applied to Erindale-oriented needs. U of T students' money went to U of T student groups. (We may be out of sight, but we're still U of T.) The rebate, therefore, was in no way contrary to the spirit of the new SAC constitution. For some reason, last year's SAC finance commission decided to drop the rebate. I suspect the "reason" was the convenient source of income — Erindale's rebate being $14,300 (2200 students times $6.50 or half the SAC fee last year).

The rebate was traditionally viewed by St. George SAC reps as a bribe for keeping (the other half of the) Erindale (fees steady income) in SAC. This year's finance commissioner feels that Erindale student group needs cannot be met because SAC's budget "won't take an Erindale rebate" (Friday's Varsity, page 3). Would his budget stand losing the entire Erindale student fee — the fee which our students pay with very paltry returns from SAC?

Previous to this year, SAC had a commission which dealt specifically with Erindale and Scarborough grievances. Now, we have merely the option to elect a vice-president or an executive member — who must spend the majority of her or his time working downtown for the SAC bureaucracy.

Summarily, Erindale students have no person or group with time to work on Erindale problems relating to SAC and the St. George campus. (Our SAC reps must spend their time in meetings or reading minutes.) To grind salt into the wound of decreased sympathy representation, SAC has purloined the only concrete service the organization ever gave to the students on the Erindale campus — money paid by Erindale students to serve those students as SAC never can.

To the students of Erindale: SAC has been singularly hostile in its financial concessions to our campus. Are you getting your money's worth? These policies are not likely to change in following years. Perhaps, you should consider withholding your SAC fees....

U of T pay scale revealing

On November 6, you published an article on the poor results of the United Appeal drive on campus. In it, I read with interest that the representative of the administrative staff on the Governing Council, Mr. John Parker, had occasion to comment in a council meeting on the sad fact that some of our colleagues make only $4,600.

It is good to see that we elected a representative with the courage to speak out and put this on record, even if it may not make him popular with some parts of the administration. One can only wonder if we are really a progressive university with a fair and efficient compensation program.

Metro voters go to the polls December 4 to elect the men and women who will live here. Letter writer tells how to get vote.

Still time to get Metro vote

My attention has been directed to a short note on page 3 of The Varsity of Friday, November 3, concerning getting on the voters' list of the December 4 municipal elections. It states that "today is the last day for persons left off" to get on the list.

Because it is important that every person, regardless of how they may vote, should be given an opportunity to record their vote, I would like to point out that a special procedure is available in the forthcoming elections.

An elector who is qualified may attend the polling station. The voter then completes a declaration that he is qualified and otherwise satisfies the Deputy Returning Officer that he is qualified. A ballot can then be issued to him. Any elector who wants to know his polling subdivision can call the City Clerk's sub-367-7800.

Fears media's anti-youth slant

Your November 8 front page article reports that "in an unusual move, Innis College principal Peter Russell has announced that he will attend the (fees) demonstration."

For your readers' information, I should report that the unusual move was to answer your reporter's call asking me if I planned to attend the fees strike demonstration on November 21. I said I would attend if only to have an eye witness viewpoint and not have to rely on the press description of the event. Your reporter's misrepresentation of my answer to her telephone call indicates that press distortion is not confined to our city dailies.

As for the demonstration, my fear is that it will be misrepresented by the press in a way that will strengthen the anti-youth, anti-university political sentiments to which the Tory Government's fee hike is designed to appeal.

Ottawa has failed to deal with housing crisis: report

By WAYNE ROBERTS

With last June's introduction of the federal government's proposed amendments to the National Housing Act, the Canadian people are being treated once again to a barrage of government self praise. "The immediate and future influence of these proposals will be profound and far-reaching", the act's introduction states.

"New housing opportunities will be opened up for many thousands of Canadians. New tools will be available to shape the process of urban improvement and community development. And, new avenues will be provided whereby the people most directly affected will have a voice and a role to play in that process. The 1972 National Housing Act paves the way for a massive and concerted effort to maximize the opportunities we have in Canada to produce decent and enjoyable accommodation, in a quality living environment for all our people."

Housing, along with education and other social expenditures, is one of those items that capitalist governments never get around to solving. The roots of the crisis are deep in the nature of the economy and government priorities. At the same time, Government attempts to deal with the housing crisis have always been instinctively toward moral rituals, to passify and deceive the people, and meager legislation sculpted to mask more enduring realities of economics Urban Affairs Minister Ron Basford's proposed amendments are no exception to this pattern. In fact, they can only be appreciated in that context.

The first major government study, Paul Hellyer's Task Force on Housing and Urban Development, was shot through with the rhetoric of passionate concern, urging that housing as a right become a national priority for Canada. The stage it set for subsequent government housing policy, however, has meant little more than an opportunity for some idealists to engage their fantasies.

The Hellyer report invited a sinister policy of housing by headlines and detraction from an awareness of the real axes around which government policy has revolved.

Since the task force completed its study, housing has been treated as anything but a national priority. On a per capita basis, Canada spends about $8.63 on defence, $2 on butter subsidies, and 17 cents on housing.

Even Toronto development giant Cadillac Corporation president A. E. Diamond has stated that "if food production were treated like housing, we'd all be starving."

In 1971, according to the unpublished Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) report on low income housing, 50 per cent of Canadians — encompassing people on welfare to those making $6,500 per year — couldn't afford decent housing. CMHC president H. Hignett stated that more than half a million Canadians are living in overcrowded, dilapidated conditions and paying more of their income than they can afford for decent accommodation.

In cities like Toronto, the problem is even more acute. Ninety-five per cent of Torontonians, according to The Globe and Mail, can't afford to buy a house. This shouldn't be surprising since the average Toronto house costs more than $31,500. For all the rhetoric, then, the housing crisis remains with us in full force.

Although task force analysis usually relates housing and poverty, it is clear that the basis for the so-called housing crisis with which the government is dealing is the inability of the market to deal with the housing needs of the middle class. As with urban renewal — or, more aptly, urban removal — policy, it is the wealthy who are defining the terms of the debate. And, so it has come to pass that the plight of the slumdweller from Toronto's so-called Cabbagetown to the Yukon, treated so touchingly by federal task forces, has been securing better mortgage rates for nice, young middle class suburbanites and developers.

In the fine tradition of philanthropy which casts aside that for which it no longer has use to the poor, housing will supposedly drip down once suburbanites have cheaper mortgages and land. And, so the (il)logical debate goes, the crisis will vanish. Under this inverted system of government activity, the government is practising socialism for the rich while preaching and enforcing private enterprise for the poor.

The best illustrations of this can be seen in well-touted government sponsored projects like Malvern and Main Square in Toronto. A March 24, 1972 Globe summary of the task force on low income housing assessed Main Square thus:

"The report says there are no housing units which are available to low-income levels that fall within CMHC's stated objective of the $200 million innovative program. The report says that Victoria Wood did not put any of its own money into the project, but merely lifted the plan off the shelf and persuaded CMHC that it was worthy of the special innovation program financing.

"The special innovation program offered this large developer an opportunity to finance a project which had experienced difficulties under normal lending arrangements.

"The report says Victoria Wood failed to produce any significant low-income housing in the project. The number of housing units for low-income families produced by a proponent with the second largest single loan ($13.774 million) of the special program and on public (CNR-owned) land, cannot be judged to have successfully met the stated objectives of the special program."

Similar statements have been made about the Ontario Housing Corporation's Home Ownership Made Easy program in Malvern, "the Malvern Mirage". Although originally designed in part "to encourage and make possible home ownership among tenants of Ontario Housing", the most recent OHC press release comments, "As there will be a certain amount of 'pioneering' in the early stages of Malvern, which is common in all large land assemblies, it is not expected that senior citizens or public housing will be included at the outset."

Costs and carrying charges on units exclude those making less than $8,700 annually and account for OHC's portrayal of its typical HOME family in 1967 Ontario Housing: the husband's income is $8,500 plus "as much overtime as he could get". The project warrants the dry comparison of one newspaperman to the Toronto Transit Commission trying to solve the rush hour traffic situation by purchasing a Volkswagen.

It is only after 1968 that the heart of Canadian housing policy pumped out anything significant in the way of low-income public housing. Until then, (while the home ownership myth was still the bulwark of housing policy), the stretching of amortization periods from 15 to 30 years had been one of the most significant reforms. In 1967, public housing contributed 1 per cent of housing starts since 1949. After 1968, the number of starts in public housing began to climb above six per cent to the 1971 figure of 160,000 units.

But, as OHC's waiting list of 20,000 plus attests, the figures have not even begun to keep pace in Canada's wealthiest province. Public housing remained the Cinderella of Canadian housing policy.

With the task force, Hellyer was already sounding the alarm on the small moves made in the direction of public housing.

The basic underlying reason for the inadequacy of government housing policy as related to both total volume produced and availability to all sectors of the population is its subservience to private enterprise. The 1970 CMHC Annual Report notes that "as an institution, CMHC has spoken the language of private enterprise and also the language of social action in housing." OHC's former managing director Paul Goyette believes that public housing must not interfere with the free play of market forces, according to The Star.

The Hellyer report is notable for its reliance on voluntary constraints in the housing industry within the context of a few government-imposed rationalizing measures essentially geared to increasing the viability and legitimacy of large development corporations. In principle, Hellyer rejected a program of massive government intervention. Partly, this attitude is based on a spurious analysis of many of the healthy sentiments directed against the paternalism of public housing management. For Hellyer, this results in the recommendation that "the federal government initiate a thorough research program into the economic, social, and psychological issues of public housing. Until such a study is completed and assessed, no new large projects should be undertaken."

More fundamentally, however, his hostility to public housing or some variant of subsidized mortgage on housing rates is based on devilish faith in the capacity of large corporations to lower housing costs through increased efficiency and a consequent distaste for removing large numbers of citizens from potential consumer status in the private market. To this end, Hellyer is even willing to go as far as a subsidized income policy!

The major government agency concerned with housing, CMHC, has thus taken the lines of least resistance and confined its role to that of a lending institution. It is through the crude tool of mortgage rates that government actually intervenes in general housing policy. Even that role has limitations varying from its own imitation of private enterprise ("The federal government," CMHC's Toronto manager John McCulloch said of land purchasing policy in Malvern, "is not adverse to making a buck") to its early victimization by government anti-inflationary measures.

The end result has been noted in a report: "It seems at present that CMHC in its dual role as banker and technical supervisor is in a hybrid position which it has simply abdicated in clarifying the orientation of objectives: that is, there is no policy geared to the needs of those people it is supposed to serve."

Basford's amendments intensify all these problems by completing the retreat from public housing. "They vindicate the work of the task force," Hellyer said. He is right in seeing Basford's amendments as an amplification of his approach.

Builders also appear to be happy, although as John Hurlburt, president of the Toronto Home Builders Association, pointed out before the announcement of the recent federal election: "Suddenly I find... we don't have an election. If we get caught with a fall election, these amendments won't take force until well into 1973... That's a long wait."

Other groups have already begun to protest. Professor Joseph Baker told the Canadian Council on Social Welfare that government money will more likely reach the developers than the poor.

"Progressive legislation without adequate funding to implement housing programs becomes a deception," the Canadian Council on Social Development charged. "It is obvious that the presently planned scale of funding is insufficient to come to grips with pressing accommodation problems being experienced by a great many low and moderate income Canadians."

These charges were made on the assumption of $457 million being available. In fact, because many of the programs are cost-share or optional, the amount available may only be $100 million.

A Toronto workshop of tenant and agency groups went to the heart of the matter. Their summary report, prepared by the Social Planning Council, attacked Basford's attempts to substitute assisted home ownership, building rehabilitation, and now profit co-ops, for public housing. They correctly point out that none of these services would benefit anyone with less than a $7,000 annual income.

There is no excuse for Canada's enduring housing crisis. As the task force report noted, "The low investment in housing reflects the socio-political priorities of the nation, rather than an inability to build good housing."

The founding principle of the Ontario Tenants Association remains true today: "Two classes of people are interested in housing: those who live in it and those who live off it. The latter comprise developers, realtors, landlords, land speculators, lending institutions, and those governments which are all too ready to meet their wishes. It is these institutions which are responsible for the housing crisis and they alone benefit by it."

May prevent developmentGrange residents like planning board study

By STEWART GOODYEAR

Over 200 local residents and businessmen from the Grange Park area reacted favourably last Thursday to a plan to stabilize housing and prevent massive development.

The meeting at the University Settlement House was called to introduce the City of Toronto Planning Board's tentative plan for a Part II Study of the area bounded by Spadina Avenue and McCaul, Queen and College Streets, known as south-east Spadina.

There was general approval of the planning study by residents, who wanted improvements for their community and assurances that no unwanted developments will invade the Grange.

A few local businessmen who voiced their disapproval both of the new plan and of the old housing in the Grange and of their desire to see the area developed were soon shouted down.

Several people expressed resentment of the police commission, which has assembled a block of land on Beverley Street intending to relocate the 52nd division station there. Protests of residents that better sites could be found, ones which would not require the demolition of valuable housing, have been virtually ignored by the commission, though it may soon meet with local aldermen to discuss the issue.

Residents who live on a block of land near Beverley and Sullivan Streets assembled by Canada Trust said they are afraid of having to suddenly leave their homes. Renting on one month leases, they desire information about Canada Trust's intentions and assurances that they will receive adequate notice before being required to leave.

There was also strong opposition to the proposed Dundas widening, and belief that it will greatly harm the Chinese community.

But the general feeling of pleasure with the plan's proposals was summarized by Albert Grossman, owner of Grossman's Tavern and long time resident of the Grange, who spoke of the area's importance as an inner city community, as a Chinese community and as a source of variety and character for central Toronto.

Grossman concluded that he intends to work with planning staff committees, who will examine the plan, to determine the future of his community and urged others at the meeting to do the same.

Kay Parsons, leader of the Grange Park Residents' Association, also supported the committees and asked for the establishment of an on-site planning office in the Grange to work in co-operation with citizens.

City planning staff member Alan Dean, who authored the study, said the creation of such an office is likely.

A similar office has already been set up in the area south of Carleton near Parliament Street, following a similar Part II study presentation to the Donvale community. There also the intention is to save inner city housing from the inroads of massive high-rise development.

Following the meeting, over 50 residents signed agreements to work on the future planning committees.

The policy behind the new proposals stems from a growing concern for the quality of life, retention of the variation and character of inner city communities and for the stabilization and support of low income neighbourhoods among the planning staff, said Dean.

The plan proposes that the low-rise, low density residential neighbourhoods forming the north-western two-thirds of the Grange be zoned against high rise development. The land along Queen and McCaul Streets, where large tracts have already been assembled by developers, is left open in the plan to construction which Dean hopes will not prove detrimental to the residential community.

Re-zoning will be the major tool to enable conservation of the Grange. Presently zoned for institutional development and situated near the city's core just west of the line of huge buildings along University Avenue, it could rapidly disappear.

Specific proposals concerning the community were that all viable housing should be retained and that "height limitations, design controls and maximum lot frontages" should be introduced to set limits to new construction in the north-western section. Buildings of historical value would be rehabilitated.

Dean suggested that federal and municipal neighbourhood improvement programs be used as means of conserving and improving the area as "a place where people of low and moderate income can afford to live".

Through traffic on all local streets, particularly Beverley Street, will be discouraged, said Dean.

According to his plan, more parkland could be created in the area by the expansion of Grange Park through street closings and the development of "parkettes" in lanes north of Dundas.

Proposals concerning major streets centred on strengthening and maintaining College and Spadina as commercial strips.

Controls over the amount of land left as parking space should be developed, the plan advocates.

Editor calls left parties "authoritarian"

By ELAINE FARRAGHER
Dimitrios Roussopoulos, editor of Our Generation magazine and a prominent Canadian anarchist, Monday condemned all left political party formations as "authoritarian" and claimed that they could only lead to dictatorship.

He was speaking to about 60 people at a lunch-hour meeting in Sidney Smith Hall.

Roussopoulos said that tightly organized, hierarchial vanguard parties, run according to the "democratic centralism" of the Leninist Russian Bolshevik party were not capable of carrying on a socialist revolution. Their only aim, he said, is to take over the existing power structures and use them for their own purposes.

"A vanguard party, a small elite which places itself at the head of a movement, wants to take over the top positions and introduce change from above."

"Such a party", he said, "will necessarily become a mirror image of the former (governing) bourgeois party after it has taken power." However, Lenin stated in "State and Revolution" that the bourgeois state would not be "taken over", but smashed by a revolutionary party, with a new proletarian state being put in its place.

Roussopoulos instead put forward an alternative method of revolutionary change — anarchism. Change, he said, must not come from above but from below.

He claimed that his theories took into account the present stage of capitalism in North America and did not necessarily apply to the third world countries such as Viet Nam, which are "underdeveloped technologically".

Since Canada is highly advanced technologically, the population is concentrated in the cities.

"The highest achievement of our civilization is the city" said Roussopoulos. "It is where the ugly aspects converge and where revolt is seen the first. It is the foundation of the political economy of the country."

He said that the whole question of private property comes to a head in the cities. "The people who are fighting urban renewal understand this the most," he said.

He argued that since the natural tendency of technology in capitalism is to centralize in the city, the big power blocks in the city must be diffused by setting up "urban communes".

These communes would be composed of between six and eight people who live and work together, who lead a socialist life and who encourage others to do so by their example.

By the growth in numbers of these urban communes, the big cities would be broken up into smaller and more manageable units, he claimed. These urban revolutionary movements would eventually dissolve power in the cities. The communes would later federate to enable planning.

In this way, Roussopoulos asserted, the working class would naturally take over the running of their own lives.

A member of the audience strongly objected to Roussopoulos' theories, saying that Canada "unfortunately" possesses a strong, centrally organized and armed ruling class.

"Although it would be nice", he said, "I can't see how you can fight a centralized power at the local level."

Another member of the audience asked how different cities at different stages of development could co-ordinate themselves sufficiently to carry through a revolution in Canada in the same time period.

Roussopoulos, who appeared nervous, replied that this was "nit-picking" and that he was "not a prophet".

Roussopoulos said that urban communes must have specific characteristics. He said that counter-culture tendencies in the form of cooperatives and communes, that have arisen in the last five years, possess some favourable characteristics but lack others.

He said that they reject authoritarianism, middle class life styles and the vanguard method of change, but they are caught up in materialism and egoism, and have not yet learned to reject capitalist social relationships.

"Even though they are part of the new social forms, they are hopeless in their present state," he said.

Urban communes must merge life styles at work and at the place of residence, he said.

The members must know each other before joining a commune and be aware of the dynamics of group psychology, he stated. They must also become involved in the politics of the community and take responsibility for providing services to the revolutionary movement as a whole.

He added that the commune has an obligation to support and protect its members. Alternative social structures such as group marriage must be explored, and men and women must have equal responsibility for child care.

By doing these things, Roussopoulos asserted, people can "de-mystify the political priorities of the authoritarian left."

The urban commune would "encourage a new social form and would be looked on as the basic unit in the whole cloth of the revolutionary context."

The Bolshevik parties still place their strength on cells that are hierarchically linked to the central committee."

Radical editor Dimitrios Roussopoulos denounced the left as dictatorial at a Monday meeting.

Meeting spawns new Riverdale organization

By BILL HUMBER

Last Sunday the Greater Riverdale Organization was officially constituted "to build, by just and democratic means, a grassroots organization representing all the people who live, work, are educated in, or worship in Riverdale, and to implement the decisions of its member groups."

Over 1,000 delegates and observers attended the first annual convention of the organization held at Monarch Park Secondary School. Delegations of 10 people each represented ratepayer groups, churches, schools, neighbourhood associations and all groups within the boundaries of the Don River on the west, the lakefront on the south, Coxwell and Danforth Avenues.

The convention took several months to plan. The community-wide body represents the culmination of over two years' work by the Riverdale Community Organization and other groups to create a truly representative, broad based organization with grassroots support.

Procedural and electoral business occupied much of the day, leaving little time for discussion of proposals for action.

The convention, passed its constitution with only minor revisions, after spending much of the afternoon debating it.

Debate on the next order of business, the Action Program, was interrupted by a vote to elect officers. At this point nearly half the delegates had left. Nevertheless the convention moved to select its president, and area, interest, and cultural vice-presidents.

However, a procedural dispute over who should be president threatened to disrupt the otherwise smooth-running convention.

The problem erupted when the convention voted to reverse its constitutional decision to elect the president by polling the delegations.

Each leader was to have announced the votes of his delegation to the convention. The candidate with a plurality would be declared winner.

To speed up the process delegates decided to revert to a standing vote count. The ensuing presidential vote saw Yoke Chan of the Chinese community defeat Linda Torney of a residents' group 179 to 178. Mel Brown and Roger Saunders finished third and fourth respectively.

However, some delegates claimed that observers in the audience had illegally joined in the vote. Others claimed that the original rules demanded a majority vote, which Chan did not have.

Chairman Roy DeMarsh announced that a second vote would be held. This time Torney defeated Chan 246 to 199.

A number of Chan's supporters walked out and it appeared that the organization would be split into two opposing camps.

Chan spoke to the convention saying that he did not think the verdict was fair because he had won the first ballot. Then Torney announced that she would be willing to share the presidency with Chan.

De Marsh said that such a suggestion was out of order. It would contradict the constitution ratified earlier in the day, he said.

Chan replied that "in the interests of the organization," he would be willing to settle for the vice-presidency. In the ensuing election, Chan won the first vice-presidency.

When the action program was again considered, motions supporting groups struggling for day care, better lighting on streets, improved bus services and an inquiry into the municipal tax structure had been passed.

Resolutions asking for vehicular underpasses instead of street-level rail crossings, increased family benefits and recreational facilities and more community input into a proposed high-rise development at Pape and Gerard Streets, and several others were left to the incoming executive.

A motion to have the next convention last a full weekend so that resolutions would not have to be referred to committees was accepted.

DeMarsh, in his opening remarks, told the delegates, "You are shifting power from existing organizations to the community level in an impressive and important manner."

"I do not know of all community organizations in Canada. I do know that the best one I know of is in Riverdale."

"Governments can not deal with the problems of communities if the communities are powerless."

Controversy over Food Sci courses

By JONI SEAGER

A controversy has arisen over the lack of "reciprocity" between the Faculties of Food Science's and Arts and Science's different practices in crediting each other's courses.

While Food Science credits, and even requires some arts courses in its program. Arts will not credit any food science courses.

The matter came up at Monday's meeting of the Food Science Implementation committee, which is making proposals on the revamping of the faculty.

Irene Miller, undergraduate student on the committee, said that the committee is still in the process of gathering information for resource material, and that there was "not much debate" on the issue Monday. However she indicated it is an important matter to the committee.

Arts and Science associate dean James Cruise said that "part of the interest in this problem comes from the fact that soon (by 1973) all public school teachers will need degrees."

Most of these teachers are getting their degrees in the extension program, he said, which offers degrees in only arts and science programs.

However, many of these teachers want a degree in home economics, and as Cruise said, "the U of T doesn't make it possible, at present time, for these part-time students to take food science courses and have them counted towards their degree".

Miller put it this way: "Food Science only offers a four year degree and most of these teachers want only a three year course. But then, if they want to specialize in home economics, they have to take another year, on top of these three years, and yet are still only credited with a type B teaching certificate. "They're really getting screwed."

As well full-time students not in Food Sciences who take Food Science courses will not be credited with them for their degree.

Miller added that many professional organizations such as teachers associations have protested "loudly" to the U of T about this, but with little response from the university so far.

Arts and Science dean Bob Greene refused to comment on the merits of Food Science's problem.

However, he did say he had had correspondence with the faculty and had suggested that Food Science "make application the through the curriculum committee, the traditional channel, to make their courses more available."

Soccer, rugby, touch football reach semi-final playoffs

The Varsity—Bob Gaudin

Interfaculty soccer playoffs continue this week and next in Divisions II and III.

Division I was decided last week with no playoffs. Sr Eng finished first, with Erindale second, and ST M A third. PHE and Scar tied for fourth place, and Vic ended the season last.

In Division II playoff games so far this week, Dent defaulted to New yesterday and goes on to meet UC tomorrow at 12:15. In the other quarter - final Med downed St M B 4-0 in overtime yesterday. Frankel and Saffery each scored two goals on overtime kicks. Med meets Law tomorrow at 2 pm.

In Division III semi-finals, although Trin B defeated For 2-0 Monday, the game will be replayed today at 12:15. The other semi-final game saw Eng III eliminate Knox 2-1. Eng III goes on to play the winner of today's semi-final Friday at 12:15 on the front campus field.

Bell with a try and two converts, while John Robinson and Ed Lovell each scored a try. PHE B managed two tries, by Dudley Lansdowne and Dave Stuart, while Louis Sialtis added a penalty goal and a convert.

There was some confusion in Division II regarding playoffs last week. Trin B, presumably out of contention, defaulted its final game Friday to second place. PHE B, Trin B went winless on the year while our records show Eng II with one win - 18-0 over Trin B. However, Trin B made the playoffs only to default in the quarter final to PHE A.

Tomorrow, PHE A plays Law at 1:15 pm in the stadium while Trin A meets Scar Friday at 3 pm at Scarborough. All playoff games are 10 minute halves. Overtime will be played if necessary. — one period of five minutes. If more than two overtime periods are required the game will be replayed.

Sixteen teams qualified (six or more points) for the touch football playoffs, and one and one-half weeks later four teams remain.

In quarter-final games yesterday Gofers defeated Cooper's Ligmaments, 14-12, while Arrythmia finished off Athletic Supporters 12-0.

Last Thursday Tachyards advanced to the quarter-finals by defeating Yankees 19-13, and Jocks won over the Dodgers 13-6.

Both semi-final games will be held tomorrow at 1:15 on the back campus field. Gofers play Arrythmia, while Tachyards meet Jocks.

Finals between the two remaining teams will be played next Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday with the winner of the best of two games deciding the championship.

We continue today with a summary of interfaculty basketball. Division I, Section A, was looked at last Friday; today, Section B.

• Eng — promises to be tough. Five men return from last year's disappointing season. Engineers preferred the old set up to retain traditional rivalries, but the team hopes to end up on top due to the acquisition of several new faces and a hard training schedule. — First.

• Erindale — First place finishers in Division II last year; the team hopes to be in the playoff chase in the new division. However, Erin is troubled by a lack of team work in pre-season sessions. — Fifth.

• SGS — School of Graduate Studies hopes to challenge for first place and have good front-line personnel, but lack of depth could cut into the wins over the arduous season. Weaknesses will occur at guard position, and age and conditioning — or lack of it — will also play a part. — Fourth.

• PHE B — Eventual champions of Division II last year. The team hopes to improve with "height" players. PHE looks to a core of six returnees to join Division I, and hopes to finish in the top three. — Third.

• Vic — Argo Mike Eben highlights a squad of several returnees. They hope to hide out as a sleeper in Section B. — Second.

Division II also has two sections this year. Section A includes, Dent A, St M B, Trin A, Management Studies, Vic II, UC II, Jr Eng, PHE C; while Section B sees Innis I, For A, Pharm A, Scar II, Law II, Med B, and PHE D in competition.

Educate bodies as well as minds

In the following article an Ontario high school physical education teacher reveals the area of education that most high schools develop the least — the education of the body. This concept of "body education" is also relevant to the student at the university level. Few Ontario university athletic departments have a philosophy or set of premises on which they base their "physical education". The University of Toronto falls within this category.

By O. VONESOR

Reprinted from Community Schools

Two things to start with:

First, I am a male physical education teacher, and much of what I say is either irrelevant or misrepresentative of female phys ed. I would rather let a female phys ed teacher define the problems of female phys ed.

Aggression, for example, is a problem which might be defined differently by a female teacher. It is too prominent a quality in male sports. But a female teacher has pointed out to me that many girls may need a greater dose of aggression in their school sports, to overcome the weakness and timidity imposed on them by sex-role conditioning.

Second, there are many good phys ed departments and teachers. This article focuses on general and common problems these departments may have solved. It is because I am convinced of the value of phys ed that I have written it, to bring an awareness of what educating the body can involve for more teachers and students.

Incident 1 — I am sitting around the locker room with a group of men phys ed teachers (football coaches) and students (football players). The head coach remarks, "So their hotshot is playing for them after all, eh? Well, one good shot to his bad knee should finish him for the afternoon. We'll go after him right from the start."

Incident 2 — I am sitting in the staffroom having a coffee with the vice-principal. While we are talking, a staff member who also works as a professional athlete joins us and begins to tell about a drunken time laced with call girls his team has recently enjoyed. The vice-principal squirms a bit; he knows I will not approve of this conversation.

But the code of maleness is not to be contravened for fear of what some oddball teacher might think or say, so the vice-principal somewhat reluctantly joins in. Before the conversation is over, the vice-principal's whoring times as a ball player have been added to the string of tales.

Incident 3 — I ask a student in my phys ed class why he always skips gym period. "I can't stand it there," he replies. "I'm not a good athlete and my team-mates either laugh at me or hate me because I ruin their chances of winning."

I suggest that he come to gym class and work on an individual program — running, body-building, whatever. He's not interested. "I would like to play with the others, but it's just too competitive," he says.

He hardly ever attends gym class.

Incident 4 — I am coaching a basketball team. The opposition's star player comes on to the court to warm up. Unprovoked, he makes an obscene gesture at our team. I boil inside. But no one else has seen the gesture, and I tell no one. After all, it's just a game, isn't it?

I have not selected these incidents at random. They illustrate important, but often unrecognized, aspects of physical education in our schools. That they touch sensitive areas is evident from the usually animated, sometimes bitter, reaction people have when phys ed talk turns in these directions.

Last year the Toronto Board of Education set up a committee to discuss the place of football in our schools. Was football threatened? The papers were full of letters opposed to and (mainly) in favour of high school football. This reaction, some of it pretty violent, supports the idea that phys ed — sports — schools combine to produce effects that are too seldom considered by teachers and by the community as a whole.

The phys ed teacher is usually an envied member of the school staff. To teach phys ed is to do with young people what is most "natural": run, play, grow strong, have fun together, be outside, learn as young children do — all this with the body and the fence around the school yard as the only limits.

Of course, the phys ed teacher, learns at teachers' college that physical education is "much more" than this. We can teach skills. We have the responsibility of informing the young about some of the basics of life: sex, drugs, health, social habits. And we deepen the relationship between mind and body — the health of the nation is in our hands.

The reality can be very different. The envy is understandable: it is easy to send the boys out with a soccer ball. But bells, attendance records, and curriculum requirements make physical education other than "natural". Numbers of students stand around listless, uninterested much of the phys ed year. These are the "lazy", the "dogs" every phys ed department must deal with if the rest are to keep coming and lining up with their squads.

And the health class — the excitement of growing up, sex, the body? Hardly. Go to any health class. See the texts and notebooks with their "in the bottom of the locker" look, hear the drone of approved films preaching curricular moralities. The phys ed scene: repetitive boredom of gym periods, waste of classroom time — apathy of students — these point to the destruction of mind and body.

There are very basic problems here. There are very wrong assumptions.

The above incidents are meant to illustrate some of these assumptions. Each contains a significant value upheld by current phys ed practise. Each points to how deeply these values are entrenched in ossified bureaucratic structures whose members have forgotten about other lives in their mad dash to further their own careers.

Incident 1 — Competitive sports in the schools contain too much competition, too little sport. Where is the fun in maiming an opponent's knee? The stress on victory at any cost was important to 19th century school teams in England where students were being taught to conquer the world.

The Greeks stopped wars to compete competitively. Our psychologists tell us young phys ed teachers that sport is a good substitute for the real thing. This is too close a connection for my taste, especially with Richard Nixon leading the continental cheering section.

Incident 2 — Sports and male chauvinism go hand in hand in our culture. The myths of universal male aggressiveness, male dominance, male superiority, are daily confirmed in the practise of sport in the schools.

In others, principals (who are disproportionately often ex-phys ed teachers) urge listless students to worship school spirit — school victory. Of course, it is the men's teams, especially the football team, for whom the whole school is to turn out.

Most important of all, male phys ed teachers laugh their way through sex education, teaching a double standard so blatant it would anger the editor of a provincial newspaper's most conservative women's page.

I should add that I have heard a female phys ed teacher consider teaching girls football to fill a two-week blank. This so they can be better companions for their boy friends.

How many male sexual identities are threatened and destroyed because young people do not have the athletic ability to live up to the model of strong-man-athlete-hero-victor held up by the schools and by society as a sexual ideal?

Incident 3 — Sports in schools and in society are for the few. The many with their different abilities, sizes, interests must subordinate their bodily expression and development to athletic programs designed to further the skills of the highly coordinated minority. And this minority, ironically enough, is skilled at pursuits which have almost no relation to everyday productive life.

Why should anyone be proud to whiz around on the top of frozen water with steel thimbles on his feet and a crutch in his hand? And football injuries are so common precisely because the game makes unusual demands on — a new awareness of the professional athlete's role which has been expressed by men as different as Derek Sanderson and George Sauer, the NFL all-star who quit pro-football in disgust.

Who questions the segregation of the sexes in phys ed? Who speaks for the bodies of the "dogs", "runts", and "freaks" who turn off to the joys of "educating their bodies" throughout their future lives? Who speaks for the bodies of the "stars" — for Joe Namath's crippled knees or Gump Worsley's toothless gums?

Parents appear only to complain of a child's failing phys ed mark. (He wore yellow shorts instead of blue.) Or else they bang on the stands as their boy brings them vicarious glory on the playing field. Where is the community of parents who want to find out about the education of their children's bodies?

Within schools, the non-democratic use of the players' bodies.

Yet school teams dominate budgets, gym time, teachers, prestige in a completely undemocratic manner. The mass of students are conditioned to their in-front-of-the-TV spectator futures dangerously early. And within phys ed departments, a teacher who can produce good teams earns more recognition, scrutiny, and ad mance than one who produces good classes.

Incident 4 — the whole of phys ed seems filled with a spirit of bloated self-importance. Friendly competition, cooperation, fun are all too-often just words. The defendants of the established sports system will point out the character-building qualities of their contests and drills. Exactly! What sorts of character are we choosing to build?

Where does the community — or even the idea of community — come in? Virtually nowhere. Phys ed teachers rarely raise such issues. Nor do they or their students discuss "the revolt of the athlete" in North America facilities by MEN and TEAMS sparks no opposition. The competitive community of ATHLETES dominates a community of people who need and want to play — but not in ways acceptable to those who control the facilities.

If physical education is to be for all people and if it is to become the treasured and natural part of life it should be, communities of people (students, parents, teachers) will have to define its meaning. The old definitions rule out too much. They permit control by too few people. A new definition might start from here:

Spend a Sunday afternoon at a public playground. Watch young children playing together. See their joy as they discover their bodies and their new capabilities. In ten years, will they still run and jump and roll or will they sit, intimidated, in front of a TV watching others?

Parity and layoffs are the issues

REGINA (CUP) — About 200 students today occupied the offices of the dean of Arts and Science at the University of Saskatchewan Regina Campus, protesting upcoming faculty cutbacks and action against staff-student parity on departmental committees.

The student action resulted from a general meeting this afternoon.

The students have presented their demands and given the dean, Sir Edgar Vaughn, a 24-hour ultimatum to rescind a ruling which disallowed a Division of Social Sciences motion which would have guaranteed staff-student parity in all divisional departments.

If the dean does not rescind his ruling by noon today, the student union will organize a student strike for Monday.

The Social Sciences Division Council consists of representatives from the member departments. Several departments have already granted staff-student parity, so there is a strong student presence on the divisional council.

Dean Vaughn responded to the division motion by circulating a memorandum notifying all concerned that he, in consultation with Regina campus principal John Archer and vice-principal Tinker, was overruling the motion.

Yesterday the Faculty of Arts and Science council under prompting from Vaughn, ratified the dean's decision. The faculty council consists of all faculty members and only token student representation.

The social sciences motion results from a controversy over staff-student parity which has existed for years. Students now have no guaranteed rights and may receive representation in a department only by consent of the faculty. Although some departments have already granted students parity representation, others such as history, economics and anthropology have bitterly opposed such moves.

The opposition to parity comes from individuals who opposed students getting real power to make changes in the university. Staff-student parity would effectively destroy the present power structure and give students the long-awaited opportunity to press for changes from a position of strength.

Memorial University also saw an occupation this week.

Last year students in several departments conducted reviews of course content and demanded sweeping changes. Their demands were largely ignored because they did not have parity in most departments and university committees.

The other issue involved in today's student action is a proposed faculty cutback for the upcoming year. Last week students held a successful teach-in on the cut-back issue and effectively laid the groundwork for today's action.

Students now occupy the entire first floor of the classroom building which houses the dean's office and their numbers are mounting steadily.

A U of T policeman hauls away a woman protesting Michel Chartrand's speech supporting the right of Arabs to occupy Israel.

Chartrand speech leads to fighting

By DOUG HAMILTON

Several scuffles between irate Jews and campus police officers broke out last night at a meeting with Quebec labour leader Michel Chartrand.

Chartrand, general president of the Montreal Central Council of the Confederation of National Trade Unions, was speaking on the Palestinian liberation struggle.

He visited the Middle East several weeks ago at the invitation of Arabian trade unionists.

About 100 Jews in a crowd of 500 at the Medical Science auditorium denounced the Montreal labour leader as a "murderer" and shouted him down so effectively that he had to stop his speech several times to wait for order to be restored.

At one point friction was so intense between the Jews and a group of Arab supporters that campus police had to be summoned to expel several spectators.

"Is that the democracy of the Zionists you are experiencing?" asked Chartrand.

"This is why Oriental Jews are discriminated against in Israel," he added.

Chartrand was referring to the fact that Oriental Jews from the Middle East claim European Jews discriminate against them and reserve the top positions in the Israeli hierarchy for themselves.

Spectators punctuated Chartrand's dissertation with insults and sarcastic comments. They mocked his accent and called him a communist on numerous occasions.

When the police arrived to remove some screaming Jews, cries of "Where is the freedom of speech?" poured down from the gallery. Some spectators flailed out against the police.

Spectators wrestled with police and a number of pro-Israel sympathizers were forcibly removed.

After the melee subsided, Chartrand continued with his speech.

He asserted that after the second

Labour leader expounds on pro-Arab views; denounced as 'murderer' by 100 Jews

Michel Chartrand makes a point at a press briefing yesterday.

World War, the Occidental world "had a guilty conscience" because they refused to admit Jews who later fell victim to Nazi ravages.

"They (Western politicians) tried to wash their hands . . . by giving the land of nation (belonging to the Arabs) to another nation (that of the Jews)."

Chartrand stated there was sympathy for the Jews around the world due to the injustices they had suffered, but no one had any right "to give land to the Jews."

"We (Arab sympathizers) this decision is immoral," he added.

"How come 13 million people are out of their home? This we do not accept."

Chartrand accused Canadians of being accomplices to American attempts "to steal the lands of the Arabs."

A heckler said that Chartrand was no better than Israelis because the French had confiscated the land of Indians.

Incensed by this remark, the Montreal union leader retorted, "I would rather be an Indian with a white face than a degenerate European imperialist like you."

Constant jeering interrupted Chartrand while some Arab members of the audience appealed for order.

Shouts of "What about Damascus?" and "They (Arabs) killed my cousin!" rang out.

Ignoring the disturbance, Chartrand said that the only solution to the Middle East conflict is "to get the Palestinians back to Palestine."

"The right to self-determination is a fundamental right," he continued.

"Vendu!", some spectators yelled.

When a Jew accused him of being a tool of communist terrorist movements, the fiery labour leader replied: "I would rather be a communist than a Nazi like you."

A well-dressed woman who vociferously assailed Chartrand was hauled away by police when she refused to cease interrupting the meeting. A man who intervened in the struggle between her and the police was also removed.

The dissident members of the audience were told by Chartrand that "you came to upset a meeting like uncivilized, undemocratic people." He confessed that he had never been to such a tumultuous assembly.

Asked why Arab governments do not aid the Palestinian refugees within their borders to a greater extent, Chartrand replied, "Most Arab governments are not pleased with the Palestinian resistance to say the least."

He denounced many of the present Arab governments as reactionary and insisted they exploit and oppress the working classes in their respective states.

"Our sympathy . . . our solidarity is with the Palestinians — " he exclaimed.

A spectator, angered by this remark, purple in the face with rage, declared "I hate reds, hate filthy reds."

During the question period, a man identifying himself as a former British army officer who had served in Palestine blamed British imperialism in the Middle East for the current Arab-Israeli conflict.

"I am bitterly ashamed of the part my country played in this terrible conflict. British imperialism played Jewish nationalism against Arab nationalism."

An Arab who said that he had lived in Israel told the Jewish spectators, "If you clear your mind of all this prejudice, we can all live together."

However, a Jewish spectator who claimed he had served in the Red Army during the Second World War asserted, "As long as Zionism exists as a theory, there will be no peace."

Memorial U. occupiers seek support in vote

ST. JOHN'S (CUP) — Students at Memorial University continued their occupation of the Administration and Arts Building, and planned a referendum for today to back up their bargaining position for a free student union.

Meanwhile, President Lord Stephen Taylor, who announced the university would no longer collect student union fees, refused to negotiate directly with the students and rejected compromises agreed to by administration representatives.

The occupation began Wednesday after a general meeting of 3,000 students which strongly opposed administrative interference with the student union. About 1,500 students occupied Taylor's office along with those of other key administrators. About 600 remained in the building Wednesday night and about 400 last night. They were prepared to stay as long as necessary.

A general meeting yesterday afternoon in the occupied area drew about 1,500 supporting students.

Student negotiators yesterday agreed to evacuate the building if the administration would agree to allow a student referendum to decide whether student union fees would be compulsory or voluntary. The two administrator negotiators agreed, but when they referred the proposal to Taylor, the president rejected it.

Today's referendum asks all students to back the occupiers' position. It asks students to agree that "the president and Board of Regents had no right to unilaterally alter or interfere with the structure of the students' body, that the board should rescind its decision of Thursday November 9, and that the decision should be made by the student body itself."

The referendum is designed to gain a mandate from the students for their negotiators, and to prove that the position is supported "by more than just a small group of trouble-makers", one student spokesman said.

Some support was forthcoming from faculty members. Many cancelled classes so students could attend yesterday's general meeting. Others allowed students to address classes and explain the issues behind the occupation.

About 25 faculty members, drinking in the faculty club yesterday afternoon, left when they saw Taylor enter, as a gesture of opposition.

Students printed and distributed about 10,000 flyers yesterday morning explaining the issues and appealing for support.

The executives of the education and engineering students' councils both opposed the occupation, but the full councils have yet to meet. Both executives appeared to support the demand for a free student union, but rejected the occupation as a tactic.

Taylor and the Board of Regents apparently acted to suspend fee collection next year, because they claimed too large a proportion of the union budget was going towards administrative costs and salaries.

The largest cost of any university operating budget consists of salaries and administrative expenditures.

Davis grants no letup on hard OSAP rules

Talks between the Ontario Federation of Students and the provincial government aimed at loosening the money squeeze on students, collapsed yesterday amid hints that student aid regulations may be tightened further next year.

Members of the OFS negotiating team told a press conference last night that Premier William Davis has refused to promise not to raise the loan ceiling on awards under the Ontario Student Aid Program next year.

Davis chatted with negotiators yesterday afternoon in a cozy Queen's Park tete-a-tete.

"He repeatedly said he wouldn't give assurances about student aid," said OFS negotiator and University of Western Ontario student council president Ross McGregor. "It was the most negative part of the meeting."

McGregor said Davis was smooth but firm.

"We've encountered reactions from anger to annoyance before when talking to government ministers and bureaucrats. The premier was the most sophisticated and clever, but the substance of his decision no different."

A full OFS meeting this weekend will decide whether or not to recommend a provincial fee strike next term to its membership.

A province-wide referendum last month gave overwhelming student support for a strike to withhold second-term fees.

U of T's Students' Administrative Council meets next Wednesday to vote on support of a fee strike. Results on the U of T referendum brought the largest voter turnout in recent student history with a nine to one margin of support for a fee strike.

Meanwhile, plans for an OFS-sponsored day of protest in Queen's Park are gathering steam.

According to demonstration co-ordinator Dave Moulton, 20 busloads of students will flood into Toronto for the march on the legislative buildings.

"It will be a well-organized and enjoyable demonstration," said Moulton.

McGregor hastened to disassociate OFS from what he called "splinter groups" who might be at the demonstration.

"It's fair to say the splinter groups will be there, but we'll keep control."

The OFS has called for a temporary embargo on present and future fee hikes. They also want the government to ease its stringent student aid regulations, which they say acts to keep low-income and part-time students from university.

Two killed on U.S. campus

Two young men trailing fellow students evacuating an administration building they had occupied earlier yesterday on the main campus of the predominantly black Southern University at Baton Rouge, Louisiana were shot down in a hail of police buckshot.

The students had taken over the building to press their demands for a greater say in college affairs.

City police, called to clear the building, gave students five minutes to get out. As the minutes ticked away, they lobbed tear gas canisters at the occupied building and people started running from it.

The occupying students issued a statement last night denouncing "the wanton murder".

The Students for a Democratic Society have scheduled a memorial rally for 1 pm today in Sid Smith.

Conservatives and reformers seek seats in Ward Six

By DAVID KENNEDY

A clear conservative versus reformers division developed between incumbents and challengers for the Ward 6 aldermanic seats in front of 70 residents Monday night at Orde Street Public School.

The incumbent candidates are Horace Brown and June Marks from Ward 6 and Bill Archer from Ward 5, while the new candidates are Arthur Downes and Dan Heap.

The division was clearest over what benefits Metro Centre would bring to the residents of Ward 6. Metro Centre is a complex of buildings on the waterfront where only vacant lands and railroad yards exist now.

"We should fix up Toronto's unsightly front yard," Brown said. "Did you know the communication tower would be the highest in the world? The highest now is in Moscow".

Metro Centre is being built with federal money through the CNR and the CPR, Marks said. "It is not going to be a burden upon the Toronto taxpayer, she insisted. "It will help him".

However, Dan Heap noted $80 million worth of public land was being traded off for a small return in a land swap. Ward 7 Alderman John Sewell contends the city is receiving land worth at the most $46 million and more likely, land worth only $15.5 million.

Downes likened the Metro Centre deal to "the biggest rip-off" in Canadian history—the CPR's original land deals with the Macdonald Conservatives in the 19th century.

None of the candidates opposed redevelopment of downtown Toronto. Heap stated, however, that Metro Centre is being built primarily for the benefit of high-income people.

Closely connected to the question of redevelopment is the issue of whether or not more cars should be allowed downtown.

Marks said she supported the Spadina Expressway because more than people must move. There are trucks, fire engines and ambulances, she reminded the audience. The mixing of transportation modes in the Spadina corridor was a good thing, she said.

"It's up to the province to resolve the problems now," she argued.

"If not, it is up to the municipality to get things going".

"A lot of our residential streets downtown are crowded," Archer stated, adding that "an alternative" must be found. Though he did not mention his position on the Spadina Expressway, he is on record as being for it.

In contrast, Brown said he has been a long-time opponent of the expressway. Only for a short time in 1960 did he temporarily support it, he said. The then Metro chairman, Fred Gardiner, said that there would be a socio-economic study before the expressway was constructed.

However, the study was not done and Brown opposed the expressway.

Heap said he opposed the expressway before the last provincial election, in which he ran for the NDP, and he opposed it after the election.

Downes said he was strongly opposed to the Spadina Expressway.

Later in the evening, the candidates were asked whether or not they supported free public transit and the abolition of the property tax. All of the candidates except Archer were in favour of the above reforms.

Archer said he had consulted Hans Blumenfeld, a planner in the Faculty of Architecture at U of T, on the benefits of free public transit. Blumenfeld, who supported the expressway, said free public transit would lead to an increase of only 15 per cent in ridership, but it would also mean a 10-12 mill increase in the tax rate. Therefore, Archer said it was "unreasonable."

Archer also argued against the province assuming the full cost of municipal services. Along with provincial assistance comes provincial control, he insisted.

Woman history professor is appointed U of T vice-pres

Associate history professor Jill Conway was appointed the first woman vice-president in the history of the University of Toronto yesterday.

Long a critic of the position of women at U of T, Conway, along with three female colleagues last year presented the provincial government with a detailed report outlining salary and promotion discrimination at the university.

She is also a member of the faculty reform caucus, a group of professors pressing for a larger role for students in university decision-making.

Conway, 38, was born in Australia and has been a professor of American history at U of T since 1964. She has long been popular among students, receiving favourable comments in course evaluation questionnaires, chiefly for her responsiveness to students.

She will become vice-president - Internal Relations January 1.

Conway has done extensive research into the position of women in North American society, and plans to publish a book on the subject this April. She is also chairman of a standing committee of the Canadian Association of University Teachers on the status of academic women in Canada.

The unvarying reaction of capitalist newspapers to outbreaks of violence in labor disputes is to express pious abhorrence of the use of violent methods and then to call upon the state to use the militia in suppressing the exasperated workers.

Viet peace will come with victory

Vietnam has become a cliché. For over a decade, the brutal war in Indochina has been one of the dominating facts of international politics. During that time, it burned itself into the consciousness of an entire planet. In the process, it served as a focus for the emergence of a wide spectrum of radical and critical ideas, not only in the United States, but in all of what was once called, by some, the "Free World". The war contributed massively to the destruction of ideological myths, end, through incessant coverage in the media, to the exposure of what can only be called the utter barbarism of imperialism.

But, the ferocity with which the war has been, and is being, waged seems to have lost much of its ability to shock, through the endless multiplication of examples. And, in North America, at least, the current negotiations for a ceasefire are being generally greeted with uncritical relief that the war may soon be over, without much serious consideration of the political implications of a settlement.

This is unfortunate. Vietnam is not a reality that can be taken for granted or merely invoked as a particularly ugly example of imperialism. The Vietnamese developments must be fully understood, for they are one of the central features of an entire historical period.

As an aid to such an understanding, The Varsity carries a summary of the historical development of the struggles in Vietnam on pages 8 and 9 today. That history should not be considered in isolation. It stands as an example that can illuminate the bases of American foreign policy.

It should be realized, first of all, that the conflict is not between the "Free World" and "communist aggression". A "Free World" that includes such blatant dictatorships as Portugal, Greece, Brazil, and South Korea must have a basis of unity other than pure "freedom".

The explanation sometimes offered is that these regimes, "unfortunate" though they are, must be supported since the only alternative is that of communist rule. And, communism it is taken for granted, is even worse. Authoritarian regimes and oppression in communist countries, it is assumed, is the natural state of affairs. If they occur in "free world" countries, of course, they are a temporary aberration.

Similarly with war crimes, terrorism, or the killing of civilians in Vietnam. When they are committed by the U.S. forces, they become "accidents", "isolated incidents", "unfortunate excesses". If they are attributed to communists, they become more proof of their essential wickedness.

Such a view of the world, and it is still offered by many, assumes as well that communism is a monolithic conspiracy imposed on hoodwinked populations by skilful foreign agents and agitators. This is a comforting assumption for those who are incapable of believing that large numbers of people could embrace communism of their own free will, but it bears no relation to the facts provided by the actual history of communist movements around the world, with their wide diversities and internal disagreements.

Almost invariably, communist revolutions are not "foreign aggression", but uprisings by local groups that believe in the ideology and principles of communism in one form or another. They are based on the belief, whether right or wrong, that communism is good for the country concerned, that this form of economic and social organization is better than colonialism or capitalism. The Vietnamese, for example, have not been fighting for 30 years against the French, Japanese, and Americans in order to gain the privilege of turning their country over to Moscow or Peking.

And, perhaps, it should be too surprising that especially a Third World nation, suffering under incredibly low living standards under capitalism should be willing, without attack or "subversion", to come to the conclusion that some form of communism would be preferable.

Nor, is it valid to claim, as the U.S. sometimes does, that it opposes revolutions because they threaten "international order" by resorting to violent means. Where a country is a dictatorship, such as "South" Vietnam, there are no "legal" means for getting into power. Revolution becomes the only alternative. American independence, for example, was only won as the result of a long war against the imperialist power, Great Britain.

It is the inability of the U.S. to realize that revolutions and guerilla wars have their origins in wide-spread discontent that has led it to view them as "subversion" of freedom. The Vietnamese revolution, as I. F. Stone put it, was seen "simply as a communist plot, and communism as an occult conspiracy with magical powers whereby a handful of infiltrating agitators can 'infect' a whole population with Marxism-Leninism though these same natives can barely read the directions on a can of soup."

The truth is that the freedom which the United States professes to be protecting is freedom of enterprise: the freedom for U.S. capitalism to invest in, trade with, and exploit the rest of the "free (enterprise) world". It is for this reason that the U.S. aids any government, no matter how reactionary or brutal, that will ally itself with the U.S. and its interests.

And, the U.S. has good reason to pursue imperialist policies. Its total investments abroad exceed ninety million dollars. Profit rates abroad for U.S. subsidiaries are about twice those domestically; foreign sources of earnings account for about one-quarter of all U.S. domestic, non-financial corporate profits. And, the raw materials which the U.S. obtains overseas are absolutely vital to the functioning of its economy. Thus, paradoxically, the U.S. economy although the largest in the world, is also very fragile, because of its dependence on an overseas empire.

For this reason, the U.S. opposes reform movements as well as revolutions, although it may sometimes support minimal reforms to head off worse trouble. Even reforms which, for example, raise tariffs or pass restrictions on foreign ownership or effect land reforms can harm the U.S. profit position.

Anti-communism becomes a rationalization for the protection of the empire. But, then, communism or socialism really are threats to the free enterprise empire, for there is much evidence that Third World countries especially can achieve economic development only by withdrawing from the capitalist system.

For this reason, the U.S. was willing to expend enormous amounts of money and manpower in Vietnam, and to risk nuclear war over Cuba. For if Cuba and Vietnam succeed, despite the opposition of the U.S., in making economic and social progress by withdrawing from the world capitalist system, they will set an example that other Third World nations will be tempted to follow. The "loss" of Vietnam to communism could be survived. But, the seiffing of the example is what the U.S. feels it cannot allow.

What "communist subversion" amounts to, then, is that leftist movements of national liberation are by word and deed subverting the American empire by teaching that it is possible for a nation to make progress and set up its own form of government without confusing freedom with free enterprise, by showing that national self-interest differs from the interests of the U.S., and by demonstrating that the United States, for all its power and might, is not invincible.

This has been the meaning of the struggle in Vietnam. One need not support all the policies of Hanoi and the National Liberation Front to recognize that they represent the burning determination of the Vietnamese people to control their own future. They have asserted this resolve in the face of aggression of unprecedented scale and berberly by the world's most powerful nation. They continue to pursue their ultimate objectives although even their supporters — the Soviet Union and China — are now willing to at least partially sell out the Vietnamese for the sake of a détente with the U.S.

This Saturday, demonstrations are being held to support the right of the Vietnamese to self-determination. In Toronto, they leave Holy Trinity Church at 1:15 pm, and proceed to City Hall. They deserve full support, with the understanding that peace in Vietnam can only come, ultimately, through the self-establishment of the NLF Provisional Government in Vietnam, the reunification of the country, and the complete victory of the Indo-Chinese revolution.

Candidates descend on Ward Six

When nominations closed Monday, five people were running for the two aldermanic seats in Ward 6, while nine set to joust for two trusteeships on the Board of Education.

The ward runs between Palmerston Avenue on the west (two blocks west of Bathurst Street) to Sherbourne Street, and from Bloor Street down to the lakefront. The entire downtown U of T campus south of Bloor is included in the ward.

Incumbent aldermen June Marks and Horace Brown, both running for re-election, are considered pro-development on City Council. Brown was refused endorsement by the Metropolitan Labour Council Monday on the basis of his voting record.

Both face a strong challenge from Dan Heap, a cardboard box press operator who, as an NDP candidate, finished less than 1200 votes behind Conservative Allan Grossman in the 1971 provincial election in St. Andrew-St. Patrick, which occupies the western half of the ward.

Heap, who is running as an independent, received the labour council's endorsement. He supports strong community participation in decision-making and has been active in several residents' struggles, notably the fight against the Spadina Expressway and opposition to massive developments in the stable downtown residential areas.

The trusteeship race is a contest between two teams and five individuals.

Incumbents K. Dock Yip and Ben Rose are running together, although their views have diverged significantly in past. Yip, the more conservative of the two, is the senior trustee.

Ward 5 alderman Bill Archer, who is switching to Ward 6, is also expected to be a strong contender for one of the two seats. Facing a well-respected opponent, Colin Vaughan, Archer decided to try Ward 6.

He is well-known in the ward, having, as some residents groups noted, acted as its alderman in the last few months. He was also heavily involved in the promotion of pedestrian malls in the ward.

Archer ran for mayor in 1966, but finished behind now-retiring mayor Bill Dennison and now-Liberal MPP Phil Givens.

Arthur Downes, a former instructor at George Brown College, and an executive in the St. Andrew-St. Patrick Conservatiave Association, is not considered a major threat. He finished eighth out of 10 in 1969, receiving less than 1000 votes.

The trusteeship race is a contest between two teams and five individuals.

Incumbents K. Dock Yip and Ben Rose are running together, although their views have diverged significantly in past. Yip, the more conservative of the two, is the senior trustee.

A team challenging them consists of last year's U of T Students Administrative Council president and education commissioner, Bob Spencer and Dan Leckie respectively.

Leckie, now a teacher, and Spencer, an assistant producer of the television show Crossfire, are running primarily on a platform of advocating community-controlled schools.

Peter Maloney, who ran a strong campaign against Conservative Allan Lawrence in last year's provincial election, is also trying to become a school trustee.

Maloney is an economist working for the Toronto Stock Exchange.

Drama director Murray Starr, teacher David Low and electrician Dan Martyniuk are also contesting the two positions.

U of T student Cliff Mack is running on the Young Socialist slate.

ation deteriorated, resistance to led the "Churchill of Asia", came ue. And, in 1963, he was ousted ed by a rapid succession of xt 20 months alone. The present government has been the most long-lasting. It is headed by General Thieu, who has distinguished himself by zealous persecution of all opposition (for example, the man who ran second to him in the last "election" — in which only government-approved candidates were allowed to run — was jailed after the vote for advocating a cease-fire), the filling of jails with political prisoners, and the closing down of most of the country's newspapers.

The vice-president in the present regime, General Ky, was asked in an interview who his heroes were. "I have only one," he replied. "Hitler."

The summer of 1964 witnessed the Gulf of Tonkin incident, in which, it was alleged that Hanoi gunboats had attacked American vessels. Only several years later, with the release of secret Pentagon papers, was the entire affair shown to be a deliberate fabrication by the U.S. As a result of the alleged incident, president Johnson received wider powers to prosecute the war from Congress and took the fateful step of bombing the north.

It was only in response to this bombing and deliberate — and, under international law, completely illegal — aggression that Hanoi for the first time moved troops south of the 17th parallel, into "South" Vietnam.

The severity of the fighting intensified, but the U.S. and Saigon regimes proved unable — and still remain unable — to hold the allegiance of the population except by actual military occupation. As the Tet offensive of 1968 and the campaign of early this year showed again and again, the Saigon-U.S. forces have secure control only of the cities, and even some of these are held only very tenuously. The NIF — now constituted as a provisional Revolutionary Government (PRG) — controls much of the countryside, which contains most of the population.

The ceasefire now being discussed would be a difficult one to enforce since the control of villages is the main issue of contention. Saigon controls them when its troops enter, but as soon as they leave, control reverts to the PRG.

Nevertheless, the ceasefire represents a recognition by the Vietnamese liberation forces that a military victory cannot be immediately achieved in the present stalemate, when Saigon has a U.S.-equipped mercenary army, when U.S. bombing missions are continuing, and when the Soviet Union and China are slackening their aid and support in the interests of a defente with the U.S.

But, the strategic and political goals remain. The PRG realizes that the military route is not the only one to government power in Saigon and eventual reunification of the country. It is willing to struggle politically as well as militarily to achieve its objectives.

Ultimately he can still count on the support of the population of Vietnam. For the war has been for the support of the Vietnamese people and the revolutionaries have always relied on it, whereas Saigon has relied on the military resources provided by the U.S.

By 1963, for example, eight million villages had been burned, transformed into "strategic hamlets" — a euphemism for what were in effect concentration camps behind barbed wire, under police control, with no elections even on the local level, and with intensive indoctrination. The use of these "strategic hamlets" was justified on the grounds that the Vietnamese had to be protected from communism, and the use of force to get them to go into the hamlets was, of course, justified on the grounds that the villagers wouldn't go voluntarily.

"It is certainly an ironic way to protect the peasant masses from communism — to herd them behind barbed wire walls under police control, to subject them to intensive indoctrination, to burn their villages," exiled leader of the anti-communist Vietnamese Democratic Party Tran Van Tung commented. Even the U.S. admitted publicly that the "strategic hamlets" were "concentration camps" built by "forced labour", but defended their necessity nonetheless.

Similar policies have been carried on by the Thieu government, Thieu has answered charges that his jailing of all opposition and the closing of critical newspapers are undemocratic by saying that "the spirit of oriental democracy is not the same as the spirit of occidental democracy".

The results have been predictable. As Nguyen Thai Binh, another Vietnamese anti-communist put it, "The people cannot follow the strange logic which decrees that they should be shot or imprisoned in the name of freedom. Offered the very finest facilities for forced labour, they rebel; installed in the newest concentration camps, they protest. Showered with napalm bombs, they are so ungrateful as to think in terms of a new government." The indiscriminate bombing of villages in the south (on the grounds that some communists may live there) has hardened resistance to the U.S. As Bertrand Russell put it, "In spite of the slaughter of their children, the peasants, incredible as it may seem, still dislike the Americans."

This bombing, as well as the more recent bombing of dikes in North Vietnam, are completely illegal under international law. German military men convicted for similar acts in the Second World War were sentenced to death at Nuremberg.

The use of terror has played a similar role in hardening resistance. The reason that the Saigon government and the U.S. engage in indiscriminate terror is that it is only through fear that it can maintain any semblance of control over the countryside. The NIF, however, must be careful not to alienate the peasants, for they can survive only as long as they have their support. Therefore, they engage in very selective terror. It assassinates only those persons who are identified as enemies of the people: government officials, landlords, military personnel, tax collectors. This tends to win them support among the population, not alienate it.

The U.S. seems to have recognized that the war is unwinnable and is now moving to withdraw, to seek what gains it can at the conference table. In the short run, it may be successful in preventing the establishment of a communist government in the south part of Vietnam. But in the long run, rule based merely on military force, by a fascist government opposed by the bulk of the population, cannot survive. And the Vietnamese liberation forces are aware that this is the case and are planning their strategy accordingly.

Robertson Davies conjures up another dazzling Canadian novel

The Manticore
by Robertson Davies
Macmillan — $6.95

"Among the Ethiopians" writes Borges, quoting the ancients, "there is an animal found . . . the Manicore; it has a triple row of teeth, which fit into each other like those of a comb, the face and ears of a man, and azure eyes, is of the colour of blood, has the body of a lion, and a tail ending in a sting, like that of the scorpion. Its voice resembles the union of the sound of the flute and the trumpet; it is of excessive swiftness, and is particularly fond of human flesh."

David Staunton dreams of himself in the unlikely guise of this mythical beast. Son of the illustrious Boy Staunton (friend of Edward, Prince of Wales, philanthropist, Lieutenant-Governor designate of Ontario) David is coming apart. Small wonder. From his childhood he had been occluded by his father's gigantic shadow; even the solitary night of sex which he enjoyed (Boxing Day, 1945) was discreetly arranged by his father, and that with one of the old gentleman's discarded mistresses. Now, a barrister specializing in criminal law, impressively rich and entering middle age, he holds his life together with alcohol. But one November night Boy Staunton's Cadillac is found at the bottom of Toronto Harbour, and its drowned occupant was found holding a small pink stone in his mouth. This notorious death — suicide? misadventure? murder? — throws David's delicate structure of accommodations into chaos. One night, on a Brobdingagian bender, he shouts from the balcony of the Royal Alex "Who killed Boy Staunton?" while Magnus Eisengrim is presenting his modishly malicious Soiree of Illusions. There is an uproar (during which an old family friend, Dunstan Ramsay, suffers a heart attack) and, belatedly, David hires himself off to Switzerland for a bout of Jungian analysis.

Transcripts and a diary of that analysis constitute the text of The Manticore. Readers of Robertson Davies will recognize this as a sequel to his last, unmeekly praised novel Fifth Business. (Indeed, much of it is a retelling of the prior book from the last page of its precursor, and the characters are by and large the same, though with a different pecking order. David was barely more than a name in Fifth Business, and Magnus Eisengrim, so vital to the earlier story, here hovers somewhat bafflingly backstage.

The two novels are similarly structured — as autobiographies of a sort. Fifth Business was the memoir, from boyhood to retirement, of Dunstable Ramsay, the war-wounded schoolmaster with an eccentric (and decidedly un-Protestant) bent for saints and mystics. David Staunton's soul-searching is just as perceptive and undeluded, just as fully the record of a man's life. And it is utterly fascinating, as was Fifth Business.

It is usually only high-grade trash — sagas of glamorous enterprises, thrillers, comic potboilers — that absorbs me to the extent that The Manticore did. It is, most decidedly, not trash, and I am perplexed (but delighted) at the book's irresistibility.

Davies' calm, perspicuous prose (a paragon of Dunstan Ramsay's plain style) doesn't lure us the way Nabokov's or Mailer's does, with flashy metaphors and outrageous comparisons. Clarity is its watermark, in the most basic sense: through his writing we see the events themselves as if through a glass so scrupulously polished we are unaware of it. Nor does Davies regale us with peppery sex or extravagant hijinx (though there is a disastrous attempt by his wife to take a death-mesk of Boy Staunton described as wickedly as the seduction in Fifth Business of Ramsay by Liesl Vitziplutzi — which curious couple, by the way, seem quite domesticated in The Manticore).

What is usually described as "dry" humour is usually nothing of the kind, just the same old blunt and contrived ripostes delivered with a careless slouch. The wit that crackles through Davies' novels is truly astringent — unobtrusive, rarely apt comments on the manners and morals of the people of the Dominion. Though of Maritime stock, I am a new Canadian, and I'm sure that I blithely passed over much spiky observation; Davies has a jeweller's eye for a species of North American which, though endangered, can still be tracked down. (He seems not to have heard of the pine-tree and fishing-village utopia which has been, rather patronizingly, created in recent Canadian letters.) Davies has it all down: the hero-worshipping Anglophilia, David Staunton's arriviste stepmother, the stifling smalltown Protestantism, that peculiar Canadian diffidence wedged between American brashness and British vainglory.

The Manticore, like its predecessor, is up to a lot more than a summary of its plot suggests. Robertson Davies, like his conjurer Magnus Eisengrim, has the knack of crafting the most tempting enigmas. I make no pretense of having puzzled them out, or even of having determined whether the big questions — Boy Staunton's death, David's bizarre descent into a hallowed cave, the dream of the manicore — are really anything more substantial than the illusions of a literary prestidigitator.

U of T's own literary superstar, Robertson Davies.

And a couple of things bother me. I wonder how this novel would read to someone unfamiliar with the strange tale unfolded in Fifth Business; more importantly, I wonder how that novel has been compromised by the new (and somewhat startling) developments in its sequel.

But all I can say is that several friends, in Canada and outside, have picked up Fifth Business not expecting much and have put it down astounded. They will be expecting a lot more from The Manticore and, as far as I'm concerned, Robertson Davies has demonstrated that Fifth Business is not a solitary masterpiece.

Yepes masterfully strums classical guitar

Victor Martin and Spanish guitarist-friend Narciso Yepes dreamed up a terrific idea for a concert.

The Chamber Players are probably the most enticing group of musicians in the city. The reason is that their small size lends itself to the performance of all sorts of tantalizing tidbits from the baroque and rococo smorgasbord, as well as to that of classical entrées of Mozart and Haydn. The first work of the concert was perhaps an example of the type of twentieth century music which suits the little orchestra: Joaquin Turina's "La Oracion Del Torero". It is a strange little piece for strings alone, and it draws on many early-twentieth century styles. Most important of all, its easy rhythms and mellow legatos are right down the chamber musicians' line. They have not yet got the finesse and sharp edge of say, I Musici, or Britten's BBC Chamber Orchestra, but their tulle, warm tone is at home in this piece.

Signor Yepes followed with four solo pieces. The first was "Two Pavanas" by Luis Milan, a Spanish Renaissance composer. It is a quiet piece, blending Spanish idiomatic touches with Bull and Byrd. One realized from the playing of this piece that Yepes is no more interested in digital gymnastics for their own sake than Walter Gieseking was or than Julian Bream is. Both this and the next piece, Alonso de Mudarra's "Fantasia" are epigrammatic, almost directionless pieces, but they allow Yepes to play as Debussy would want — that is, to read between the notes. Each note is given a carefully defined, scintillating life of its own, and this the guitar in the hands of a master can give generously and elegantly. As Yepes played the slow parts, including Adrien's Le Roy's "Passamezzo and Branle", he seemed to be deliberating over, contemplating each note, as if each were itself a work of art.

Bach's "Suite in E minor" to my mind is not suited to the guitar. The dramatic bass runs lose their power on the guitar which has neither the depth nor the resonance of the piano or harpsichord. Even Yepes' augmented ten-string guitar did not prevent the fantasy-like runs at the beginning from sounding hollow and purposeless. Yet Yepes has so mastered contrapuntal technique on the guitar that I have rarely heard such scupulous and clearly-defined counterpoint.

The Chamber Players returned with Yepes to play Antonio Vivaldi's concerto in D major. In the middle movement, Yepes lingered over each reverberating note, as if he were dipping pebbles in a pond to create barely perceptible concentric circles of waves. This piece was followed by Rodrigo's well-known "Fantasio Per Un Gentilhomme". The brass joined in, and were a grateful tonal variation. But the imperious shrieking of Robert Atkins flute was out of place and I found it embarrassing along side of Yepes' muted tone. And even here Yepes did not bother with technical fireworks. The orchestra had carefully thought out the balance and ensemble work beforehand I'm sure, so that they were able to juggle entrées and counterpointed asides with the dexterity of a first-rate string quartet.

Yepes' encore was a carefully modulated and delicately inflected folk song improvisation. In some ways the whole concert was too subtle to appreciate in one hearing; something great and complex has zoomed past us and we have only caught it out of the corner of our eye.

Industrial Q-decking metamorphosed into art

Robert Murray is unquestionably one of Canada's finest sculptors. His current exhibition at the David Mirvish Gallery provides us with the opportunity to see not only his more recent works, but some of the masterful sculptures from 1969.

Murray works on a grand scale, and this reflects the influence of the Industrial sites where he fabricates the sculptures. The implications of factory as studio are fully manifested in his choice of materials, his ease of handling the heavy sheets of painted steel, and the incorporation of ready-made industrially produced Q-decking in his composition, which allows him to play with a unique element of corrugated rigidity.

For example, "Chilcotin 1969" is a huge yellow table with one sawhorse leg, an L-shaped bridge, and post supports. When seen from a distance, the Q-decking which forms the table top presents an impenetrable barrier to the viewer, and the whole sculpture seems ponderous and awkward. But as one moves towards the piece, the play of light on the huge field of uniform ribs produces discrete modulations of color, from lemon yellow to a deep ochre. This horizontal plane also begins to undulate in a soft curve, due to the large scale which creates a visual phenomena similar to the parallax of a camera. As we view the sculpture from differing perspectives, there is a constant interplay between the solid planes and the more fluid curves into which they dissolve.

In "Capilano 1969", the Q-decking is cut into a narrow strip, which seems to leap up from its semi-circular base over the H shape which is its main support, to remain delicately poised in a plane, parallel to the floor. This diagonal thrust is contained by both a horizontal extension of the decking at the top of the H-bar, and the slight downward displacement to the left where it is attached to the base. One has the feeling of tremendous opposing forces which are only brought to rest by Murray's superb sense of balance.

I find "Massassauga 1971" the most exciting of the more recent sculptures. This work relates to one of his earlier pieces, "Breaker" in which two interlocking, reflecting shapes seemed to evolve out of one another. In this sculpture, two interlocking open V shapes pull against each other in a horizontal direction, and a beautiful harmony is maintained between the single jutting solid column of one V and the more lateral shape in the Q-decking of the other.

The show will be on until November 25. It is well worth seeing.

Murky sexuality broods through Genet's play

Les Bonnes (The Maids), by Jean Genet is an intimate sort of horror tele. The action takes place in the boudoir of "Madame", where two sisters, the maids in the title, act out the consuming hatred they have for their mistress. Fantasy, above all in the form of role-playing, mingles with themes of murder and self-destruction to create a psychological torture chamber for the two principal characters.

The intimacy of the tiny Theatre du P'tit Bonheur is a definite advantage in this production. As a spectator, I found myself present in the boudoir, a sort of voyeur to the strange ceremony performed by Claire and Solange. The properties suggest rather than depict the sumptuous life-style of Madame by means of a large bed covered with a silky material and surrounded by a translucent curtain and a few other pieces of furniture, among these a dressing table, the mirror which is transparent and faces the audience (giving the two-way mirror effect used to observe criminals and psychiatric cases). It is an austere set, perhaps less in keeping with the luxury and femininity suggested in Genet's notes on how to play Les Bonnes than one would wish.

The plot is largely a framework for the sado-masochistic relationship of Claire and Solange. That the two are involved sexually is specified by Genet in his notes, and this emerges quite clearly in the mise en scene of Michel Gelinas. This sexual aspect is one expression of their battle for dominance over one another.

Solange (Carmelle Le Gal-Brodeur), is the physically imposing, bullying type. She depends a good deal on her seniority to establish authority over Claire, and feigns a maternal attitude towards her sister. When frustrated, she bellows out her aggression in a long tirade. Claire (Michelle La Barre) is interpreted as more subtle, more profoundly sadistic, and, above all, more lucid. It is perhaps this pitilessly lucid vision she has of their situation that makes her appear more haggard than Solange, and which makes her take on the death of Madame through the final sado-masochistic act of the play.

The performances held the audience interest, and there were some particularly fine moments. One occurred when Solange returns breathless from having "searched for a taxi for Madame", actually a ploy to give Claire time to commit the murder. Their victim having escaped, she describes with exasperation how she avoided the droves of taxis that she encountered on the street. It was one of the few humorous moments, and the audience relieved its tension through laughter.

There were times, however, when I felt the situation was potentially electric, and the potential was not fully realized. The final moments, where Solange and Claire find themselves caught in their own web, seem rather drab. I didn't have enough of an impression of the destruction of two monsters, which is what Genet calls the maids in his notes.

Madame is not only an abstraction of the world of Solange and Claire. She is a physical presence, represented here in the masculine form of Hugues Sabri. It is not a directorial whim that a male is being used to portray a female role; Genet specified three males for playing Les Bonnes. What is intriguing is the fact that Madame, the most feminine of the three characters, is the only one played by an actor. I had concluded by the end of the performance that this difference of sex emphasized the class differences between mistress and servant, and also that the two maids reacted not to Madame as she was, but to everything that Madame symbolized, so that actual appearances were unimportant.

Speaking to Michel Gelinas after the performance, I learned that his object was to ignore sexual differences, and stress that the characters were not men or women particularly, but human beings. Gelinas assured me, though, that one could find one's own interpretation of the play on the basis of the production. He admitted that his mise en scene was much more of a personal experience based on a text, then an interpretation of Genet. In which case, I maintain that his use of a single actor with two actresses emphasized sexually rather than ignoring it.

Another element supplied by the director was the framing of Genet's play with a brief mime, whereby the actors, disguised as clowns, dressed the set in the beginning, and redonned their clown apparel at the end. The effect, in one sense, is to nullify the tragedy particular to Solange and Claire. However, the idea it communicates of a never-ending theatre of which the two maids are only a small part, has its basis in other works of Genet. In The Blacks, a more colourful, poetic work, Genet presents a complex ritual whereby blacks impersonate white symbols of colonial power, and explore their situation through a series of violent enactments. In the world of Genet, reality has many levels, its primary expression being through fantasy. What I see in the mime sequence is a reminder of this "fantastic" universe, which has obviously captivated the director.

Hugues Sabri plays "Madame".

Ugo Betti's mixed bag spirals dully downward

More than anything else, Goat Island, the newest drama at the Poor Alex, is a study in mixed genres. It touches briefly upon the sultry melodrama of Tennessee Williams, the understated implication of modern existentialist drama and the atmospheric tension of classical drama. But alighting nowhere it becomes the victim of its own over-reach.

Ugo Betti, the playwright, is considered one of the motivating forces in the post-Pirandello generation of Italian drama. One can only conclude that his work has suffered drastically in translation. The play is constructed as a vehicle for classic tragedy, heavily weighted with mythic symbolism. Three women, one strange and darkly widowed, one brazen, the third young and virginal (but knowing), are set against the character of Angelo, an archetypal intruder/seducer come to claim his place in their household.

Victoria Mitchell as the widow

Agata has a certain interesting stoicism and Irene Hogan as Pia is convincing as the frustrated, somewhat scattered sister. Marcella Lustig as the corrupted virgin is just too chunky and ungraceful to play a role which suggests a delicate flower-like purity. It is not the interpretation of the roles as such which makes each of these characters so forced and cliché-ridden but rather their lack of interaction.

The main fault lies with the character of Angelo who supposedly acts upon each of these women and yet plays to none of them. Laurence Rau, as this central motivating character, is too loose and youthfully exuberant to add dimension to the concept of moral guilt with which Betti is concerned. Fluctuating between different poses, but bringing strength to none of them, he alternates as a kind of weak Christ, light-hearted devil and wandering satyr. His implausible seductions of the women hardly merit the trauma which the play demand; nor does his death deserve Agata's lifelong penance. It is probably only the naturalistic environment of Stephen Katz's nicely-planned set which gives this character any reality at all. But none of the people in this play have any deeply felt actuality.

The play flounders in its own lack of conviction, and the dramatic poverty of lines like, "You'll get yours" and "I've had it", reduce some moments to the purely ridiculous. It verges on becoming a spoof of itself. Had the acting been just a little worse, it might have turned into a rather witty mock tragedy.

As it is, the actors have sufficient intervals of honest and sustained effort to convince us of their seriousness. Had director Jace Van Der Veen not allowed it to dissipate through the isolating overplay of all of the roles, the play could have sustained interest. Instead it spirals downward in a plummet of lost energy.

Polanski gives us graphic Macbeth

The first thing that occurred to me when I heard that Roman Polanski was directing the movie Macbeth, now showing at Cinecity, and especially after I saw it, was "Why Macbeth?" Many serious artists, both actors and directors, want at some time to try their own interpretation of Shakespeare the great. But Macbeth has to be one of Shakespeare's plays that is most littered with blood and bodies and witchcraft — consistently Polanski themes (Rosemary's Baby, Repulsion, Knife in the Water).

But after the horrific butchery of his wife (Sharon Tate) and friends, one would think Polanski would want to leave blood and guts and the occult alone for awhile. After all, according to Ed Saunders, Tate had been marginally involved in witchcraft during the filming of Fearless Vampire Killers, directed by and co-starring Polanski. And Tate was killed by people heavily involved in satanism and mysticism.

It seems like more than strange coincidence. Yet Polanski still dabbles in what has been called the macabre, particularly in Macbeth, a movie about witches and spells and lots of killing. In true Polanski style, there is lots of gore, but, admittedly, the artistry is superb, if you can stand the blood.

Strangely enough, in a Playboy interview (which, in retrospect, smacks slightly of commercial promotion, since Playboy put up the money for Macbeth's production) Polanski flatly denied that he subscribed to superstition or the occult in any form.

"I'm not preoccupied with the macabre — I'm rather more interested in the behavior of people under stress, when they are no longer in comfortable, everyday situations where they can afford to respect the conventional rules and morals of society," Polanski told Playboy interviewer Larry Dubois, last December.

But why then do his "people under stress" always become involved in mysticism and the occult? Why Rosemary's Baby and Fearless Vampire Killers?

"You don't have to be superstitious to enjoy a fantasy. If you are around me for long you will see that I have no belief in the supernatural of any kind. It's just a fashionable distraction for people seeking easy explanations to certain phenomena they are otherwise incapable of understanding," says Polanski.

"Myself, I am down to earth in my philosophy of life," he continues, "very rationally and materialistically oriented, with no interest in the occult. The only obsession that compelled me to make that film (Rosemary's Baby) was my liking for good cinema.

"If you make a film about a murder, you have to show the murder, or do a film about something else. If you use the screen as a medium, then what you tell has to be told by visual means.... When you're telling a story about a man who kills a head of state to take his place, you are absolutely obligated to show the act that is the culmination of the whole play."

Macbeth certainly does not scrimp on the horrible death scenes, scenes not included in Shakespeare's original. But then Shakespeare didn't have the techniques of modern film. Polanski uses his medium to the utmost. The direction is most obviously skillful in the filming techniques — while Macbeth and Lady Macbeth plot the murder of King Duncan, the king himself approaches, the shadow of his crown falling on Lady M's face.

The hallucination scenes, where Macbeth sees the ghost of Banquo at the dinner party, or the "Is this a dagger I see before me" scene, are excellently done. Macbeth is somewhat of a witchy horror story and Polanski capitalizes on that fact. But he adds some of his own interpretation to the Shakespearean original as well.

Macbeth has usually been portrayed as an elder statesman; however, Polanski interprets the vitality and strong ambition as characteristics of a much younger man — and Jon Finch as Macbeth conveys the image of a man not only young in years, perhaps mid-twenties, but also young in experience.

Francesca Annis, as Lady Macbeth, also plays a different role from the classic dominant and ambitious Lady. True to the play, she must coax her husband into the first murder — the king — so that he fulfil his own ambitions as well as the witches' prophecy. But thereafter, Macbeth takes the initiative. He really gets into killing without feeling — except for extreme paranoia. Polanski's Lady M. seems weaker than Shakespeare's and his Macbeth is madder. Even though the actual script has not been changed, the portrayal is certainly different from what I learned in high school.

If you don't recognize the names Jon Finch and Francesca Annis, it's no wonder. Polanski didn't want big names to upstage the play itself. Most of the actors have had other experience, (Annis has been with an English Shakespearean company); their talents are obvious in this movie. Finch has already played in Hitchcock's Frenzy.

Without a doubt, though, the true "star" of this film is Polanski, whose perfectionism and artistry have created a superb version of the Bard's play.

His blood and guts only embellish on the Shakespearean allusions to them.

In response to critics who say that all this gore and violence on the screen results in more in the streets, Polanski says, "They are full of shit."

"They should ask little children on the street what causes violence and they would become more enlightened," Polanski states. "For me, when I see something violent happening on the screen, I react against it; I think this is most people's reaction," Polanski states.

I have to agree; I had to turn away in some of the butchered body scenes in Macbeth. The rolling heads and bloody bodies were enough to turn any but the maniacal away from bloody violence.

It's all part of the Polanski touch. Whether or not he is involved in witchcraft and the occult; whether Saunders' allegations or Polanski's denials are true or real — who knows?

Macbeth is a markedly Polanski movie. The little Polanski (definitely not Shakespeare) twist at the end proves it. After Macbeth has been slain and Malcom, King Duncan's son, is crowned the new king, the scene switches to the rainy hills where Macbeth first met the witches. Donalbain, Malcom's brother, is returning from England and unwittingly takes shelter by the witches' den. When he hears their moaning-singing, much the same as Macbeth and Banquo did, he goes to see who and what they are. There the movie ends. It gives the feeling of the constant presence of evil forces — quite a change from Shakespeare's tidy morality play.

The Great Railway
by Pierre Berton
McClelland & Stewart $17.95

The incredible fact of the Canadian Pacific Railway was that it was completed at all. In the face of angry doubts over the necessity of having a united Canada, the international financial finaglings which left all the backers mortgaged to their rooftops and the unbelievably frightful conditions under which the line was built, the attempt was made and succeeded.

After confederation, Canada outside of Ontario and Quebec was merely a series of isolated communities. The threat of American dominance prompted Sir John A. Macdonald to foster the idea of a united Canada — Pacific wedded to Atlantic and sealed by a band of steel. In spite of monumental difficulties it was also proposed that the line be entirely within Canada.

Sir Hugh Allan was the first choice of Macdonald's to build the railway, but that choice was made untenable owing to overly-zealous political patronage; Allan was disgraced and Macdonald's government dismissed. It was unfortunate for Alexander Mackenzie's administration that it bracketed a time of depression where no progress could be made on the railway — Sir John was returned to office.

At about this time several men came to the fore with both capital and experience from building railways in the states. Construction began. Cries of "Monopoly!" sounded in the Commons. The CPR was granted millions of acres of land and millions of dollars in subsidies. The estimates of the cost, however, fell far short of the actual expense, and subsequent grants had to be forced through a reluctant, sometimes hostile Commons.

The Riel rebellion happened to be a powerful motivation for the completion of the railway. VanHorne Troops were rushed from the East in a matter of days, and there was a sudden interest in creating a true nation out of this vast territory. Berton's work is a significant account of an event which changed the idea of Canada from a parochial province to a Dominion, from a wilderness to a civilized state, from the nineteenth to the twentieth century.

The text of this volume, of course, is a rehash and abridgement of Berton's two-volume opus The National Dream. For readers who are not passionate railroad buffs, this might be the more readable volume. Its main recommendation, however, and a substantial one, lies in the collection of sepia prints which appear on virtually every page of the volume — the prairie capitals when they were little more than muddy roads with shacks along both sides, for instance. It is a sumptuous, well-presented volume, well worth the price to people who like to browse through Canadian history.

pop

It is a real down to play to a house of six people, two of whom are friends. But even so, David Wiffen took it badly. He played well enough, and his songs, at least some of them (The Blues is the Name of the Song, Driving Wharf, As Often as Not) are among the best being written. I had never heard his voice before. It is strong and throaty like a sober Jerry Jeff Walker.

But we still left at the end of the first set because we don't like being talked to like that. It wasn't our fault that it snowed, or that people don't want to pay $3 for folksingers who aren't famous. It's not our fault people didn't come. We came. We didn't deserve to be thanked mechanically at the end of each song, as if we were a dead microphone.

I remember playing one night, as a matter of fact, several nights, where we out-numbered the audience. We took a couple deep breaths, introduced everybody to one another, dropped the PA and the clapping convention played and talked and made the best of it. David Wiffen, remember what Thumper's mother said, if you ain't got nothin' nice to say, don't say nothin' at all.

Tonight is David Wiffen's last night. Even if he is not personalbe in the face of adversity, he is one of the better singer-song-writers around. At the Riverboat.

Bob Bossin

There isn't much going on musically in Toronto these days and it'll probably stay this way until January. Quite a few interesting people were slated to appear but have since cancelled out. The Riverboat has some good singer songwriters, Steve Goodman and John Hartford coming up in a few weeks. Beyond there are a few possibilities, one being the El Mocambo where Mitch Ryder and the Detroit Wheels are appearing tonight and tomorrow. There's a cover charge and beer is comparatively high priced.

The next few weeks should see the release of a lot of new records just in time for the Christmas rush. Jon Mitchell's first one in a year and a half will be most welcome.

theatre

Count Dracula rises each evening at the UC Playhouse until Saturday night. David Rotenberg's adaptation gives an old theme a new sense of life — and death. Doctor Van Helsing (Bernard Tellez) is well balanced against the powerful Dracula interpreted by Jack Wetherall, an import from Stratford. The Sirens are captivating, but somewhat anemic. Patient Rentfield (Stan Lesk) holds the key to both worlds. You can catch a midnight show on Friday and Saturday if 8:30 seems too early. (Dan Lyus)

The Victoria College Drama Club is presenting Falfer's People at the New Vic Theatre also until Saturday night. This show, according to its director Bruce King, is a series of sketches and observations by Jules Feiffer, who is best known for his brilliant cartoons, although he has also written another play Little Murders and the screenplay for Carnal Knowledge. Decor seems to be an intriguing aspect of this production.

Rosmerahofm will open next Thursday evening at Hart House. Tickets will be $1.25. More details on David Gardiner's production next week.

Also beginning November 23 at the Firehall Theatre, Le Tempa Sauvage, by Anne Hebert. John (or is it Jean?) Van Burek has already given an indication of his considerable sensitivity to the work of Quebec playwrights. The experience of this production will most likely be well worth the $2 for students (Tuesdays until Thursdays, otherwise $3). The Firehall Theatre is located at 70 Berkeley Street at Adelaide. Reservations 364-4170.

Another English-language premiere of a French-Canadian play, Forever Yours Mary-Lou by Michel Tremblay is playing at the Tarragon Theatre, Tuesdays through Sunday at 8:30, with a Sunday matinee at 2:30.

The Poor Alex continues its run of Ugo Betti's Goat Island. See this week's review for details.

an underlying, shared sense of decency at the same time as they rely on a cup or two of fun violence to entertain. (In the Bogie films the morality came with the character's "code"; in the new films the characters don't hold with codes, so the decency comes in with scenes of the grotesque suffering of being killed. Like sex not long ago, bloodshed can be grooved on and abhorred at the same time.) These films somehow are all things to all people. They are artistically respectable, morally defensible and can be fully enjoyed by the officials who order police to open fire on hi-jacked airplanes.

Don't construe this too heavily: you'll like Bad Company, I liked it and M.A.S.H., The Candidate, and Butch Cassidy too.

Marjorie Pigott's watercolours will be on view at the Roberts Gallery beginning November 22. The Albert White Gallery opens an exhibit of Northwest coast Indian carvings, featuring the work of Amos Wallace and Frank Mercer, on November 18. The Art Gallery of Ontario continues with its Toronto Painting: 1953-1965 exhibit. The second lecture complementing the exhibit is to be next Thursday, November 27 at 8:30 pm, tickets 75¢; Luke Rombout of the Canada Council Art Bank in Ottawa gives it, entitled A Report from the Bank Manager. Gallery Seventy-Six hosts Hank Lem's paintings until November 25. Dennis Burton will be at the Isaacs Gallery until December 4. Robert Mackenzie's paintings are on view at Carmen Lamanna Gallery from this Saturday to December 7.

music

The National Youth Orchestra is looking for musicians for its 1973 season. Audition application forms are available from the NYO office at 76 Charles Street West, Toronto 181. Submission deadline is November 30. Last year 419 students were heard and 110 chosen to make the group larger than the New York Philharmonic (but only larger).

On November 19 the Concord Singers directed by Peter McCoppin will perform at Scarborough works by Purcell, Morley, Byrd, Palestrina, Stravinsky, Nysted and also J.S. Bach's "Lobet den Herrn". Free admission, time 3:30. This Saturday Victor Faldrill leads the U of T Symphony Orchestra in a concert of works by Weber and Beethoven (his sixth). Two other works will be Dy Lang's Floating Clouds and Carlos Chavez' Sinfonia India.

The famous Spanish soprano Victoria De Lo Angeles performs this Wednesday, November 22, at 8 pm at Massey Hall as part of the International Artists Series. Minimum price for a ticket is $3. She will sing songs by Wolf, Strauss, Hahn, Roderigo, among others, and arias from Lully and Gluck.

On CBC-FM this week, listen for the CBC Vancouver Chamber Orchestra conducted by John Avison in works by Mehul, Pleyel and Dvorak. On Tuesday the New Israel Quartet plays Schumann's quartet in A minor, opus 41, at 11 pm. On Wednesday at 6:30 pm Mireille Lagace plays Franck's chorale no. 2, Schumann's fugue on B.A.C.H., Schumann's and Bach's and Marcel Dupre's prelude and fugue in B major, on the 1858 three-manual tracker organ in St. Patrick's Cathedral in Montreal. Tune in at 7 the same evening for Part II of Handel's Samson (at the end of the last episode, we left our hero...).

The Ontario Universities Athletic Association won the Canadian Universities Athletic Union cross country meet in Kingston last Saturday. The OUAA finished with 36 points, while the second place Western conference had 40. Thirty-three of the 35 starters finished, while five U of T members on the Ontario team ended the meet within the first 18 places. Joe Saxe was Toronto's low man, finishing fourth, while John Sharpe came 11th, Brad Morley 13th, Bob Knukey, 15th, and Paul Glynn, 18th. York's Ken Hamilton took third place at the meet. Toronto coach Andy Higgins said Monday that no OUAA team members ran exceptionally well. This was the first meet where regional teams rather than conference champion teams represented the conference. Higgins said that he hoped the team would represent the conference in the future. "The CIAU meet has been run for many years but this is the first time for all stars," he added. The possibility seems good, since "There is a unanimous motion from all conferences that it be returned to a team-oriented meet," Higgins said.... U of T women's fencing team captured first place in the Western Invitational Tournament. McMaster and Western placed second and third respectively in the round robin tournament. Individually, U of T women gained first (Lilit Zekulin), third (Maureen Selway), and fourth (Anne Gutierrez). The sectionals will be held in the Benson Building November 25.... meanwhile the men's fencing team won their first tournament of the season last Saturday — a four-way meet held in Buffalo. The team downed teams from Rochester Institute of Technology 17-10, York University 20-7, and University of Buffalo 17-16. Follists Oscar Wong, Wing Nip and ex-York University convert William Henry defeated RIT 5-4 and York 6-3, but were fenced out by U of B 4-5. Epee trio Martin Humpheries, Paul Neheno, and Lorenzo Licio, won against York 6-3, but were outstuffed by RIT 4-5, and U of B 4-8. The Toronto sabre team — Eli Sukunda, Dave Brown, and Andrew Benyei — won by the greatest margin: RIT didn't draw any blood with a 9-0 decision in Toronto's favour, while York and U of B walked off dazed, losing 8-1 and 9-3 respectively.... Waterloo Lutheran Golden Hawks upset defending champion University of Western Ontario Mustangs Saturday 36-27 to capture the OUAA football championship. Hawks play St. Mary's University in the Atlantic Bowl tomorrow, while Loyola meets University of Alberta Golden Bears in Edmonton. Loyola won the Quebec title last weekend, defeating Macdonald College 50-6. The winners of tomorrow's games meet in the College Bowl November 25 at Varsity Stadium.... University of Ottawa plays the hockey Blues this evening at 8 pm in Varsity Arena.... Basketball Blues will be looking for a win tomorrow in their first regular season game against visiting Laurentian. Game time is 2 pm at the Benson Building.... Volleyball also gets underway this weekend with a Gr. I and II tournament at Queen's.... two women's teams travel to Laurentian tomorrow. Senior Basketball plays at 3 pm, while Senior Volleyball goes against the Laurentian team at 1:30 pm.

SMC beats PHE 7-6 for Mulock

St. Michael's College earned the Mulock Cup Wednesday by edging first-place Division I football finishers PHE 7-6.

The last time SMC won the interfaculty championship was in 1948. PHE suffered its only loss of the season.

In a "warm-up" for the mid-winter snow bowl game, SMC's Doug Zettel scored the lone St. Mike's touchdown off one of the game's longest passes and one of PHE's most damaging defensive errors. SMC quarterback Brian MacConnel set Zettel up for the long down field pass with only 7:26 left to play in the game. SMC missed the convert.

Odds-on favourites, PHE fumbled the ball too often late in the game, and failed to preserve its 6-0 lead at the end of the third quarter, earned by a constant offensive push which whittled down St. Mike's defence to its own goal-line. PHE missed the convert on the play, passing instead of kicking. (Perhaps the team was wary of the number of converts already missed in regular season play.) Anyway, the score remained 6-0 going into the final fifteen minutes of play.

St. Mike's defence told the story of the game, holding the PHE squad on crucial third downs and forcing costly fumbles. On several occasions the PHE team was almost within field goal range but the SMC defensive unit pulled it out. MacConnel was one of the mainstays of the SMC offensive unit, coming back into the game after an injury late in the third quarter to set Zettel up.

In fact the whole SMC team refused to roll over and play dead for the PHE offence. On MacConnel's touchdown set-up, Zettel got through a hole in the PHE defence to elude his pursuers. PHE had been on the SMC 35-yard line in a one and 10 situation when SMC's defence recovered the ball off a PHE fumble on the 33-yard line.

On the next play MacConnel made the longest pass of the game to Zettel who deked around one sliding PHE player to pick up the ball and dash for the touchdown. The convert was missed and again it was anyone's game.

When SMC again picked up the ball the team eventually forced its way to the PHE 28-yard line with second down and six yards to go. Just short of a first down, SMC elected to try for a field goal with 3:34 left to play. Although the ball went wide on the play an alert St. Mike's defence was able to force phys ed to concede the game's all-important single (awarded to MacConnel).

PHE scored its only points late in the third quarter off solid rushing by Ron Williamson. The team had previously picked up the ball on SMC's 20-yard line and carried to the 18-yard line. Williamson brought the ball up the middle to the five-yard line, and with second and four to go, he made it over the line.

It would be an understatement to say that the loss was disappointing for PHE; however, the underdog SMC squad appeared more determined on the field, especially in the second half with neither team on the scoreboard. PHE must have wondered after the game whatever happened to its offence.

In the final game for the Division II championship, UC narrowly got by Meds 3-1 Wednesday. Meds Ray Zaremba put the doctors ahead 1-0 on a touchback and the score remained that going into the second half. Dave Rose spoiled a Meds shut-out in the latter half of the game with a field goal and UC narrowly won its divisional title.

PHE's Ron Williamson heads over the line to score late in the third quarter.

Erin over Vic 13-9 in semi-final

Erindale made a second half comeback last night to win its semi-final playoff game against Vic 13-9.

Vic outchecked Erin in the first and third periods but was unable to prevent a strong rally by Erindale. The west end team's goaltender was also outstanding, sustaining the team, especially in the second half with Vic pressing and Erindale suffering penalties.

Coghill scored Erindale's winning goal toward the end of the third period to make the score 9-8. (Coghill had previously scored the tying goal, capping off an Erindale scoring streak of three goals within two minutes.) Early in the fourth quarter Coghill scored two more to put Erindale well into the lead by 10-8, and then 11-8 counts. With one Vic player off Rick Johnson made the score 12-8 for Erin.

Vic later came back for its only goal in the fourth period from Young, but Erindale's Ward finished off the scoring to leave the game with a 13-9 finish.

The first half of the game had belonged largely to Vic. Woods opened the scoring for Vic early in the first period, but Erin came back to tie the score within one minute off a shot by Michie. Johnson made it 2-0 shortly after, but Vic's Young tied the score after drawing the Erindale goalie out of his net; he got back to make one stop, but not in time for a second. The period ended after another quick Vic shot, this time by Hart, to put Vic into the lead 3-2.

Erindale had to come back twice to finally take the lead and stay ahead. Vic's Phillips and Young had scored early in the second period to give Vic a 5-2 margin when Erin's Johnson, Coghill, and Sorichetti tied the game up at 5-5 going into half-time.

Orlando scored in the third quarter while a man short to put Vic into the lead again; and Woods came off his penalty only to intercept a pass for a breakaway which made the score 7-5. Woods scores once again before Erindale applies pressure to score four consecutive goals and take the lead.

Erindale was fortunate to come out of the game with a win. Vic applied more pressure in the first half (as the score indicates), while Erindale appeared to have the better goalies on the night.

Vic could have easily put the game away in the third period were it not for the Erindale goalie's consistent saves. When Erindale got the breaks it merely used its offensive power to overwhelm a tiring Vic squad.

Erindale played poor defensive lacrosse in the first half and only when the score became even did the team fight to ckeek defensively and preserve its lead — a lead which the team, relinquished once and tied once, only to lose it again.

In Division II play-offs Wednesday, Innis defeated Dent 8-3, while PHE B lost to Knox 5-3. Innis now meets Knox Monday at 9 pm in a sudden-death final game for the divisional championship.

Women's hockey loses 5-2 to Guelph

By LINDA SCULLY

The women's ice hockey Blues lost 5-2 to defending champions Guelph Gryphons Tuesday in the second of a twelve-game schedule.

In a game marred by slack officiating and rough play, Toronto out-shot the Gryphons 30-23, but was not able to put the puck past Guelph's goalie more than twice. Margi Goldsmith and Anna Radecki scored for the Blues.

Saturday morning Toronto hosted Queen's at Varsity Arena in the first league game. Both teams were up for the game as Toronto captain Dianne Gilmour played opposite her twin sister, Debbie (Gael's captain). Toronto lost 3-1 in a fast, open game which saw a number of offensive rushes and a few unsuccessful breakaways.

Queen's opened the scoring at the five minute mark of the first period but Margi Goldsmith, Toronto's leading scorer so far this season, tied it up a few minutes later. Queen's went ahead 2-1 in the middle of the second period while Toronto was shorthanded, but Gaels scored again in the third to defeat Toronto 3-1.

The Queen's team includes many veterans and has been fortunate in adding two former McMaster players.

Toronto, on the other hand, has a basically new team with only six returning members and 12 recruits, mainly from last year's interfaculty league. Team veterans include Brioney Caley, Nancy Missouri, Allison McGeer and Judy Bell, Anna Radecki and Dianne Gilmour are in their final year of eligibility with the team.

Coach Bill Whitcombe (new to the team this year) along with assistant-coaches Mike Nicholson, Rod Brown and George Nupola have put together a Toronto team which hopes to improve on its sixth place finish last year. (The league consists of seven teams.)

The Blues' next home game is at Varsity Arena, November 30 at 7 pm against McMaster. In exhibition play earlier this season Toronto and Mac tied 1-1.

Next Tuesday Toronto plays at York (7 pm).

Erin goalie makes one of many second half saves in 13-9 win.

Fees protest tomorrow

22 busloads to march on Davis

By GREG McMASTER

As students are getting ready to pour in from across Ontario for tomorrow's Queen's Park protest against education cutbacks, new support for the demonstration continues to appear.

Last week the Erindale students' council voted $50 to the U of T Stop-the-Cutbacks Committee, and the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students executive unanimously supported the demonstration.

In addition, York University president David Slater has said he will attend the demonstration, and the York local of the Canadian Union of Public Employees donated $120 to pay for bus transportation for students.

Organizers already expect up to 22 busloads of students from the following schools: Guelph (2 buses), Waterloo and Conestoga College (4 buses), York University (5 buses and cars), Glendon College (2 buses and 15 cars), Seneca College (2 buses), Trent (3 buses), Carlton (2 buses), Brock (2 buses) and Laurentian (2 buses).

Token representation is expected from Toronto high schools and from some other Ontario universities. Windsor and Lakehead are having their own local protests and teach-ins.

The contingents will join U of T students in Convocation Hall at 1 pm until all have arrived, and will then march to Queen's Park. There they will demand that the Davis government cancel the education cutbacks, including this year's fee increases, and respond to the call for free and universal access to higher education.

The government has been invited to send a representative to speak to the demonstrators but organizers are unsure if anyone will show up. Last week, at a meeting with Ontario Federation of Students executives, Premier Bill Davis would not grant any concessions on fees or student loan ceilings, refusing to promise no further restrictions next year.

More than 300 people marched to City Hall Saturday protesting the Vietnam war. For story on this event, see page 3.

Expected speakers at Queen's Park include a representative of the Ontario Federation of Labour, which supports free tuition, NDP education critic Floyd Laughren, a member of the U of T Faculty Reform Caucus, and Larry Hoffman of the Graduate Students Union at U of T.

The OFS demonstration committee is considering York President Slater's offer to speak as well, but has reservations about whether real student allies can be found in university administrators who now oppose the cutbacks.

Such people may support students now, said committee member Barry Weisleder, but they will "renounce and undercut the struggle if it becomes more militant later on".

The demonstration is essentially sponsored by the OFS, but since many student council constituent members of OFS refused to organize at their own campuses, the job has been done at these schools by ad hoc committees made up of individual student politicians and representatives of various student socialist groups.

At U of T, the Stop-the-Cutbacks Committee is made up of the Victoria, Innis, Erindale and University College councils, the GSU, the Old Mole, the Young Socialists, and the Communist Club. SAC has not been involved in the demonstration planning, but has advocated writing letters to MPPs.

The Students' Administrative Government of Erindale's decision to support the demonstration was in response to SAC's inaction. Tim Conway of SAGE said that SAC members "weren't meeting their responsibility to OFS. We feel an identity with OFS as Erindale."

He said that Erindale's support for the Stop-the-Cutbacks campaign was much stronger than support at the St. George campus, as evidenced by the "fantastic support" given by Erindalians to last month's referendum on the fees strike tactic.

Innis College principal Peter Russell will also attend the demonstration.

OFS organizers are now expecting over 2000 demonstrators to turn up tomorrow.

Two stories surface on loss of nomination

By ERIC MILLS

A discrepancy has emerged between two versions of whether a nomination was lost by a nominating committee of which professor Charles Hanly was the chairman.

According to Governing Council executive member Clarice Henschel, at the executive meeting November 9 Hanley couldn't remember.

"In effect, he (Hanly) said he couldn't remember" whether he had received a nomination for a Scarborough College position on the Planning and Resources Committee.

Internal Affairs chairman Paul Cadario Thursday recalled he thought that Hanly told the executive "he did not recall having received the nomination".

However, planning and resources member John Morton, who along with Hanly as chairman comprised the nominating committee to co-opt a member for Planning and Resources from each of the suburban colleges said Hanly told him upon questioning, "I thought I told you there had been another nomination".

And, Hanly said in an interview last night, "it didn't disappear. It was treated in the usual manner."

He later added, that "to the best of my knowledge", Morton knew of the nomination.

However, Morton stated last night that during the whole of three meetings with Hanly, in which they considered both Scarborough and Erindale nominations, there was never any mention of a second nominee except Morton's suggestion that Scarborough principal Ralph Campbell sit on the committee. (Campbell declined the suggestion.)

The controversy arose after the nominating committee had chosen Scarborough assistant professor Paul Gooch, who had been nominated by Scarborough principal Ralph Campbell and whom Morton thought was the only nominee.

(According to Morton, Campbell nominated Gooch after consulting only administrators and the leaders of the Scarborough student and faculty councils. And, says Morton, Hanly officially solicited nominations only from Campbell.)

However, Morton later discovered that three Scarborough students, Ross Flowers, John Creelman and Glen Conduit, had tried to nominate Peter Silverman on September 20.

Creelman said that he had turned the nomination in to Hanly's secretary well before the deadline for the nomination, after having been told by the Governing Council secretariat that this was the proper way to make a nomination.

Morton says that this was incorrect procedure: that the secretariat should have accepted the nomination.

After the deadline elapsed, the nominating committee chose Gooch, a decision which was approved by the Planning and Resources Committee on November 6.

The minutes of the meeting state that Hanly "noted the need for some guidelines" on nominating procedures.

After the meeting, Morton was informed by Creelman that another nomination had been made. He asked executive member Brian Morgan to question Hanly on the matter at the executive meeting November 14.

After Hanly's reply that he did not recall a second nomination, the executive recommended that the nomination be accepted, "subject to the provision that the Search Committee review the procedures which took place regarding the co-opted member from Scarborough College."

The "review" was, according to Morton, simply a reconsideration of the nominees, not a review of procedures. Hanly said last night that the two names were reconsidered.

During the review, Morton, after extensive telephone conversations with administrators and faculty, particularly Campbell, was persuaded to let Gooch have the appointment. He said that the fact that his choice for the Erindale committee member was accepted by Hanly played a part in his decision.

The Governing Council Thursday accepted Gooch's nomination, satisfied by Planning and Resources chairman W.J.D. Lewis that a review of the nominating procedures had been carried out.

According to Hanly, last night "the matter has been dealt with to the satisfaction of everybody."

However, Morton, while satisfied with the actual appointment made, is still upset with the "non-nomination" of Silverman.

"I still dislike the fact that the other nomination was never brought forward," he said.

"It's certainly very messy.... It's hard for me to think that it wasn't intentional."

Henschel said Thursday that "there certainly seems to be a discrepancy" between the two versions of what happened.

And one of Silverman's nominators, Creelman said last night that the nominators will write a letter to the executive of the Governing Council "expressing unhappiness" over what happened.

The letter will go before the SAC executive this week, and may be sent as an executive letter.

Drinking hole plan revised, but SAC will set up pub

By KIM RICKETTS

SAC has decided to accept revisions made by the residents' council of University College to their proposal for a central university pub and to begin preparations to establish it.

SAC services commissioner Bill Steadman said yesterday that he hopes the pub will open about January 12.

Although the residents' council meeting Monday voted in favour of the proposal, it was concerned that minor clarifications and a better financial offer be made.

The "people at the meeting thought we'd be safer with a set sum" as rent than SAC had proposed, said Ivan Cohen, president of the residents' council.

The residents' council proposed a rental fee of $25 a night plus 10 per cent of all profits, to replace SAC's original offer. SAC had proposed paying the council half of the profits up to $50 and a quarter of the profits above that.

Steadman said that the services commission had accepted the council's conditions at its meeting Wednesday night. The minutes of the meeting must be ratified by next week's SAC meeting for the pub to get formal approval.

UC residence dean E.M. Howarth, who must also approve the proposal, so that the basement of Ferguson Hall can be used for the pub, said yesterday, "As long as the pub does not have an effect on the residence life in terms of noise or disturbance, then I am quite content."

He pointed out that daily permits from the Liquor Control Board would also be required for the pub to operate on Friday and Saturday nights, as proposed.

Mixed bag march attacks Vietnam conflict

By ELAINE FARRAGHER
About 300 people marched through the streets of downtown Toronto Saturday to protest the continuing Vietnam war.

Joining in an international day of protest, the demonstrators chanted slogans such as "U.S. out now" and "Victory to the NLF" (National Liberation Front).

The march set out from Trinity Square, north on Yonge Street to College Street, over to Bay Street and south to City Hall. There, speakers from the main sponsoring groups, a pro-Irish Republican Army group, the Committee in Defense of Soviet Political Prisoners and others addressed the crowd.

There were two main groups of demonstrators, one led by the Vietnam Mobilization Committee (VMC) calling for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Vietnam. The other marched behind the Old Mole banner of "Victory to the Indo-Chinese Revolution".

The VMC, who at past anti-war protests led demonstrators with the shouting of their demands "Withdraw U.S. troops" and "Peace Now" did not have their usual political dominance of the demonstration. Their contingent of about 150 people were often overshadowed by an equally large, but more militant contingent, who shouted "Right on, take Saigon" and "Ho, Ho, Ho Chi Minh, the NLF is going to win".

Marco Makhno, from the Committee in Defense of Soviet Political Prisoners, said that just as the Vietnamese were struggling for democracy and socialism, so was a struggle for "real socialism" occurring in the USSR and Soviet-dominated countries:

York University professor Gabriel Kolko, who spoke to the VMC before the start of the demonstration, stressed that a ceasefire agreement doesn't mean that there will be peace. Vietnam, he said, is entering a new era of sophisticated warfare.

With a Saigon police force of 125,000 "paid for by the U.S.", he declared there can be no fair election since this force will be used to destroy any political opposition.

On arrival at City Hall, several speakers, including candidates in the upcoming municipal election and representatives from various groups who participated in the march, denounced the continuing war.

Liz Barkley for the VMC, Jackie Henderson, a candidate for mayor for the League for Socialist Action

(LSA) and Heather Thomson of the Young Socialists emphasized that the Vietnamese can only achieve self determination if the American troops are withdrawn from Vietnam.

They attempted to link the war in Vietnam to the daily lives of the people of Canada by citing it as a major cause of inflation. They also called for Canadians to demand an end to Canadian business supplying the U.S. war effort.

Barkley said that "we must get the war in Vietnam out to the Canadian people". She stressed what she saw as a pressing need to build a mass movement in Canada against the war in Vietnam.

Heather Thomson stated the war was a conflict of the forces of revolution with the forces of imperialism. Peace could only be achieved by the withdrawal of U.S. imperialist armies, she said.

Daphne Derry, who spoke for the Old Mole, said that peace was not a simple matter of the withdrawal of U.S. troops.

"The people of Indochina have only one guarantee of peace and that guarantee is the victory of their revolution". She said that Canadians who support the revolution must oppose Canadian peacekeeping forces who would intervene in the Vietnamese struggle.

Sean Keane of the Toronto Irish Republican Club spoke in favour of the revolution in Vietnam and linked its significance to what was happening in Northern Ireland.

"Today it's Saigon, tomorrow it's Derry and Belfast" he said. The IRC contingent carried signs saying "NLF — IRA, workers armies all the way".

Pickets hit Dominion Stores - push for returnable bottles

Nearly 20 people protested Friday evening Dominion Stores Ltd.'s policy of selling only non-returnable soft drink bottles at the company's head office on Rogers Road.

The demonstration, organized by Pollution Probe, is one of a series designed to publicize Probe's campaign to force Dominion to sell returnable bottles again. At present, the only returnable pop bottles Dominion sells are those containing its own brand of soft drinks.

A Probe statement given to employees and customers criticizes the waste of energy and resources in using non-returnable bottles, the difficulties caused by the production of a large quantity of waste glass and the costs involved to the consumer.

Probe asserts that a return to returnables would create jobs for Canadians, because their recycling would require labour-intensive work. It estimates that $50,000 yearly could be saved by consumers if all soft drinks were sold in returnable bottles.

Post-card attack aimed at Rotenberg, O'Donohue

The South of St. James Town Defence Fund is urging citizens to conduct a post card writing campaign against mayoralty candidates Tony O'Donohue and David Rotenberg.

The defence fund is a citizens' organization fighting attempts by the multimillion dollar Meridian Building Group to demolish family housing in the South of St. James Town area to make way for high-rise development.

South of St. James Town is a working class district bounded by Wellesley, Sherbourne, Parliament and Carlton Streets. Meridian owns most of the homes in the area and has evicted several tenants on Blecker and Ontario Streets.

The defence fund is selling a series of four post cards which bear photographs of houses blockbusted by Meridian for 10 cents each. The proceeds from the sale will help pay legal costs incurred in the campaign against the developer.

"We are asking Torontonians to send a post card to the (mayoralty) candidates demanding that they save Toronto's neighbourhoods," said defence fund spokesperson Marilyn Cox.

The post cards, she asserted, "are alternatives to the colour glossies you can buy in the basement of City Hall", which are largely devoted to prominent Toronto developments.

The defence fund, said Cox, wants "to remind Torontonians that blockbusting is something that goes on every day".

The cards are now on sale at the U of T bookroom, Donvale Community Centre on Winchester Street, and various stores. Members of the fund hope to have 4000 cards sold before the election campaign is over.

Varsity has incorrect line
The Varsity incorrectly reported Friday that Ward 6 alderman Horace Brown, who is seeking re-election, was refused endorsement last Monday by the Metropolitan Labour Council.
In fact, it was the council's executive that recommended non-endorsement of Brown. This decision was reversed by the full council meeting Thursday night.

Geographers to be polled on new big-wig

Geography students will be polled this week to see if they support the departmental choice of Jacob Spelt, as chairman.

Ten student representatives resigned from the departmental council last Monday after protesting that the students had no say in the appointment of the new chairman.

The student representatives also objected to what they consider Spelt's hard line on student inputs into decision-making.

A joint meeting of nearly 50 people of the Toronto University Geographical Society (TUGS) and the Association of Geography Graduate Students (AGGSUT) in the U of T, the two student geography bodies, decided to hold the poll after hearing from their ten representatives.

One alternative, according to AGGS president John Carline, is to ask for an interim chairman to be appointed until an improved procedure to choose the chairman with significant student input is implemented. He would also like the relationship of the chairman to the department council, which is at present advisory, redefined.

Carline suggested two tactics to pursue the matter are to raise it with either president John Evans and the Governing Council, or with the Arts and Science Faculty Council.

The poll will ask students if they are opposed to the choice of Spelt, and if they agree with the action of their representatives of resigning from the council.

It also will ask what steps, if any, should now be taken.

Follow referendum with action

Tomorrow afternoon, students from across Ontario will march to Queen's Park to take their protest against the government's detrimental changes in post-secondary education financing directly to the body responsible, this province's legislature.

By taking the time and effort to mount the protest, they'll be showing that unlike some — U of T SAC among them — these students refuse to sit back and passively accept moves designed to decrease university and community college accessibility. They know that letter writing will have no effect; little effort is involved in penning a short note to your MPP, a brief which will probably never find its way through the bureaucratic maze to the MPP's desk.

And, they realize that sympathetic gestures by some university administrators — "We're only the tall guys, we're caught in the middle," they say — don't mean much.

They're aware that thousands of demonstrators massed in front of the legislature will make an impact.

No longer will government hacks be able to pretend that the negative effects of their actions have not seriously affected post-secondary students.

In the debate to date, the government has claimed that the changes — the $100 tuition fee hike and the increase in the loan portion of the Ontario Student Award Program funds — were not implemented to adversely affect post-secondary enrolment.

But, the effects of the changes — effects which the government has not acted to counteract — have proven the opposite. Enrolment at nearly all Ontario universities except the University of Toronto has plummeted. A Statistics Canada telephone survey last month revealed that rising tuition costs and lack of money were key factors inducing students not to return to school this year.

Meanwhile, Ontario premier William Davis last week refused to assure an Ontario Federation of Students delegation that the OSAP loan ceiling wouldn't go up again this spring.

The changes have hit students from lowest low-income families hardest, making equal accessibility more of a myth than it was before.

The government's callous disregard for post-secondary education let it sacrifice increased accessibility to a public over-concerned with educational cost-saving. In doing so, it ignored the legitimate demands upon this province's educational system which students may justly make.

It is up to everyone of us to show the government that we do care, that student councillors whose only response is writing letters do not represent the students of this university or this province. And, the only way to convey that message is to attend tomorrow's demonstration. The time: 1 pm rally at Convocation Hall, 2 pm demonstration at Queen's Park. Be there; it's your education!

Southern University killings symptomatic

The two murders at Southern University's main campus in Baton Rouge, Louisiana underscore the bankruptcy of an American society which finds it possible to accept police killings — at Kent State, Jackson State, and Attica prison before Southern — relatively passively.

A country which re-elected law-and-order Richard Nixon and Spiro Agnew to its highest offices hardly blinks when a university president tells protestors to stay put and then calls police to evacuate them, with two students being killed in the clearing manoeuvre.

Middle America fails to seriously question why so few precautions are supposedly taken when the loss of human life may be the price of an "error" in a country where the state governor first denies — without anything but faith to go on — that the police could have shot the dead students and then lamely claims that the fatal buckshot may have been inadvertently loaded in the officers' guns instead of the intended tear gas.

Hardened by daily reports of deaths from a senseless, unjust war and by all too frequent police killings of dissidents and innocent bystanders, many Americans have deprecated the value of human life. Their indifference blisters their society like a cancerous sore.

There can be no excuse for this disregard for justice and humanity; this mad passion to restore acceptable social order at any cost. Murders will not stop popular movements; they will only strengthen them.

Sitting across the 49th parallel,

Canadians may too easily comfort themselves with the thought that nothing similar could happen here. It can.

As long ago as the 1968 federal election campaign, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau warned Canadians that violence to the south could spill over the border. Events prior to and since that election have proven that violence and counter-violence are no strangers to Canada, as the 1970 October Crisis so ably demonstrated.

In the last few years, Canadian universities, for example, have been robbed of their claim that demonstrations and occupations don't happen on their campuses. And, during the last academic year, U of T's then acting president Jack Sword set a precedent by twice using off-campus police to help evict student and non-student occupiers. In the ensuing violence, demonstrators were injured, though thankfully none seriously.

As you read this paper, students on two Canadian campuses are occupying university offices to press their demands for justice. There has yet to be any violence at either of them.

The use of police to assist university administrators in imposing unjust and undemocratic decisions should not surprise anyone. The state and its institutions — like universities — uses its powers, including violence, to enforce its rules.

If you don't like the values they're upholding, talking won't do anything to change it. And, when you begin to act, you'd best be prepared for firm counter-action. That's how it works.

English-Canadian racism demands Riel's death

On November 22, 1885, 50,000 Québécois took to the streets of Montréal to protest the execution of a man, Métis leader Louis Riel, whose major sin had been to dare to struggle for equal rights for his people and other oppressed peoples.

Riel's execution and the events surrounding it chronicle one of the most shameful manifestations of anti-French racism this country's history holds.

Resisting English-Canadian ambitions to annex the lightly settled, western extremes of British North America to Ontario, Riel and his Métis comrades enraged the Ontario expansionists. When Canadian emissaries arrived to urge the people of what would soon become the province of Manitoba to submit to annexation, Riel demanded they negotiate with the Provisional Government the Métis had established to represent their interests. Months later, talks concluded, Manitoba entered Confederation.

But, all was not solved with creation of Manitoba, the province in which Métis rights were supposedly guaranteed by law. Ontario immigrants flooded the new province, harassing the Métis. Manitoba lieutenant-governor Archibald wrote his superior, "Many of the French half-breeds have been so beaten and outraged by a small but noisy section of the people that they feel as if they were living in a state of slavery." The Ontario newcomers, he observed, "seem to feel as if the French half-breeds should be wiped off the face of the globe."

Persecuted, the Métis headed further west, seeking a place where they can spend their lives unmolested. Riel, returned from his Montana exile in 1884, to accept his people's call to organize the struggle. Immediately upon his return, he had the support of the Métis, the Red men, and some of the whites.

Riel demanded recognition of the Métis and property rights on all Métis lands, and proposed creation of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Repeating its Manitoba ploy, the federal government tried to buy off the Métis by offering their leaders jobs. In February, 1885 with the matter still unresolved, Riel organized secret meetings to prepare his supporters for guerrilla warfare.

March 17, 1885, Riel established the Provisional Government of Saskatchewan at Saint Laurent, with himself as president, Gabriel Dumont as adjutant. A day later, the rebel troops seized the church at Batoche and the conflict escalated.

Two months later, Batoche fell to the Canadian troops and Riel surrendered. Within a further 10 days, the rebellion was crushed. And, the Métis leader was charged with high treason.

Preparations for Riel's trial made no attempt to camouflage what his eventual fate would be. He was tried by an English magistrate assisted by a French justice of the peace before a jury of six men, all English colonists and merchants.

Defending himself, Riel described how he wanted to make the West a free country for all oppressed nations, not only for Métis and red men, but also for the oppressed peoples of Europe.

He recalled how the federal government schemed to buy him off, the provocations of the North-West Mounted Police, the promises to the Métis that the government never kept. Riel attacked the clergy for its complicity with the government and concluded with a call for a trial before a complete jury Métis leader Louis Riel stands in Regina courtroom's prisoner docket, charged with high treason.

and an examination before a medical commission (despite his opposition, his lawyers had claimed Riel was insane).

But, all is in vain. Seven days after he finished his testimony, the jury returned a guilty verdict with a recommendation for clemency. Unmoved, the judge later condemned Riel to be hanged. Futile appeals to the Manitoba Court of the Queen's Bench and the Privy Council only delayed the execution.

Ontarians lobbied viciously for blood: Riel must be hung, they insisted. Prime Minister John Macdonald declared, "Riel must swing!"

In Quebec, a campaign was organized to win Riel a pardon.

As the months passed, nothing changes. Then, on November 12, 1885, the government sealed Riel's fate: it refused to commute the sentence. Four days later, he was hung.

His death could but please the Toronto press. Even before his trial, one Toronto paper advocated, "Riel should be strangled with a French flag." And, at the University of Toronto, The Varsity was outraged at the racism evident in the dailies' gloating over the Riel's death.

On November 21, 87 years ago, tomorrow — the paper commented:

In the name of humanity we protest against the coarseness and brutality of the tone of several of the Toronto daily papers with reference to the tragedy at Regina last Monday.

The allusions of the News, anticipatory of the event, were inexpressibly revolting. Race prejudice and hatred were never displayed with more malignity. It could not have been thought possible that in a civilized city the editor of a public journal would have dared to outrage all decency by gloating over the doom of a condemned man within two or three hours of his execution.

The attitude of the party journals was but little better. Ever since the trial began the Globe showed an almost fiendish delight in the anticipation of political capital to be made out of the final event, whatever it might be. Scarcely a word as to the personal innocence or guilt of the unhappy prisoner, not a single plea for mercy or a single argument for justice, but column after column of what looked very like horrid jubilation at the perplexity of the Government over the question.

On the other side, the Mail spared no effort to fix the whole blame of the outbreak upon the Métis chieftain, ignoring entirely the serious responsibility of the Government in the matter. The baseness of partisan journalism was never before displayed in a more shocking manner than it has been during the last few weeks by these three newspapers.

But it is said that a certain Methodist minister of this city equalled the public journals in grossness and inhumanity. Is it possible, that this man so prostituted his sacred calling as virtually to offer public thanksgiving to Almighty God for the certainty of the approaching execution? This from a professedly Christian minister, in this nineteenth century of civilization and enlightenment, might well make Humanity weep her eyes out in bitter tears over the degradation of our city.

Regina monument to Riel's memory.

The History of Québec: a Partisote's Handbook by Léandre Bergeron and published by New Canada Press provided valuable source material for this feature.

Can't take library seriously

Perhaps those who were born and bred here don't realize it but the U of T library is terrible. The reading rooms are crowded and uncomfortable and the hours are unforgivable.

Supposing one can't study at home, where can he go to work on a Saturday night or Sunday morning? Not all of us are addicted to booze and the Bible, but evidently the ones who run the library are.

Couldn't even a reading room such as that of University College be left open at these times?

I'm beginning to wonder what we're paying $600 a year each for if the university isn't even willing to provide the facilities for study. How can anybody take this system seriously anymore?

David Stanley

U of T library reading rooms are crowded and uncomfortable, and have unforgivable operating hours, according to student.

SAC's inaction elicits protest

At one time it was a standing joke among U of T students that it was necessary to be a socialist to get into SAC. This myth was unfounded. There were, of course, socialists in the SAC at various times, but generally the progressive student leaders have dealt only with reforms in the university attempting to help students gain a greater measure of control over their lives.

To that end, the SAC became involved in numerous attempts to secure greater student power in university decision-making and to ensure that the rights of students were respected. During those years, and including last year, the SAC often failed on even such basic issues as parity and library access. But, they did raise the issues and created the forums in which students could voice their dissent.

For one reason or another, the students of U of T elected leaders for 72-73 who were marked almost uniformly for their lack of intelligence, ineptness, corruption, and automatic squelching of any bill which marks even the taint of being progressive or liberal.

When Miglin and his group gained power, I expected a year of nothing being done. Worse things could happen. Cadario or Ross Flowers could be president. I squirmed when Miglin and friends recommended Cadario for chairmanship of the Internal Affairs Committee of Governing Council on official SAC letterhead as if it was policy without consulting SAC. When Miglin recommended his old friend Cadario and campaign manager Perkins for student seats on the Ontario government's Committee on University Affairs again without council approval. But, when over 90 per cent of the U of T student body opposed the fee increase and when most of the Ontario universities supported a fees demonstration the SAC refused to support the demonstration. When the SAC made the decision not to help, it was time to write a letter of protest. Here's hoping for a recovery of student sanity in 73-74.

Prof praises Varsity review

It is a rare pleasure to be able to congratulate your paper on printing an article which is both thoughtfully conceived and literately written. The long review, by Mr. Bill MacVicar, of the French documentary film "The Sorrow and the Pity," (November 3) has encouraged me to hope that The Varsity's general standards might improve.

I know that others have shared my unhappiness about your newspaper's quality for several years. The saddening poverty of most of the writing, which has become almost endemic, the banality of thought and the virtual absence of any sense of style which pervades so many of its reports, editorial comments and articles, has made the thrice weekly reading of The Varsity a horrid chore. Would it be unreasonably optimistic to hope that in future the contents will be examined from a literary point of view, by a staff writer with some literary flair, and that inferior stuff will be either rewritten to meet higher standards, or, alternatively, filed in the wastebasket? Far too much of what is presently printed shows a disregard of two essential techniques: logical thought and good composition. I hope that the printing of Mr. MacVicar's well written article inaugurates a new era of better writing in The Varsity.

Professor Eleazar Birnbaum

Rigged game not liked: students

I would like to comment on your article "Geography Council students resign" (Wednesday, November 15, page 1) which, despite the fact that it was in the main factually correct, may have misled your readers as to the circumstances and motives underlying the student resignations.

First, while in general students are opposed to the appointment of Professor Spelt as chairman of the geography department this is not the paramount reason for our resignation from the departmental council. A more important factor in our resignation was the way in which the decision to recommend Professor Spelt was reached. The search committee refused to meet with the student shadow committee (formed at the suggestion of Dean Allen, the original search committee chairman). The search committee refused to come to a general student meeting to hear our reasons for opposing Professor Spelt and our alternative proposals. Having been informed of student opposition in letters from the presidents of both the undergraduate and graduate student bodies, the search committee considered student opinion of so little worth as to not only make a decision contrary to that opinion, but also to make it without bothering to investigate the reasons for it or the alternative student proposals. And, finally, after the announcement of the recommendation had been made, personal pleas to Dean Greene to recall the committee and listen to student opinion were rejected. The students made it explicitly clear that the search committee was leaving them little option but to bring the matter into the arena of public debate which might embarrass Professor Spelt, a result the students did not want. This was simply shrugged off by the dean and by the departmental (faculty) representatives on the committee.

We are not, therefore, simply picking up our marbles and going home because we did not win. We are withdrawing because the game is rigged and we want a new set of rules.

The second misconception, fostered this time by Professor Spelt, is that the resignations signified that the council was being "blamed for something it had no control over". The council was not being blamed for anything — it was simply being recognized as a forum for ineffectual debate whose persistence would only maintain an illusion of student participation in decision-making.

Finally, we would like to prevent anyone from getting the notion that this is in any way, a personal vendetta against Professor Spelt. He is regarded as an extremely capable teacher (see pages 3 and 11 in "Geography Course Evaluation 1972") and a valuable member of staff. Any opposition to Professor Spelt is based on his view of faculty-student relations in the context of his candidacy for the position of departmental chairman and on nothing else.

Guards leave dying prisoner in blazing cell

The Canadian prison system has been under attack for some time due to the lack of discipline in institutions under its administration, poor conditions for prisoners, and shoddy security measures.

The progressive Montreal weekly Quebec-Press has uncovered a case where a prisoner felt forced to start a fire in his cell as a protest against a transfer to another prison where poor living conditions prevail.

By MICHEL SABOURIN of QUEBEC-PRESSE

MONTREAL—George Erickson, a prisoner who was serving a five year sentence and who died following a fire in his cell at the Saint-Vincent-de-Paul Penitentiary, apparently did not commit suicide as penitentiary authorities had implied.

Four affidavits signed by fellow prisoners, which were submitted to Quebec-Press last week, state that Erickson did not kill himself intentionally.

The four prisoners under oath affirm that contrary to the allegation that he committed suicide, Erickson started the fire as a protest against a move to transfer him to another

Began fire to protest unexplained move to maximum security prison institution. They accuse the penitentiary guards of not taking Erickson's threats that he would start such a blaze seriously, and claim that the authorities are guilty of irresponsibility and negligence.

They assert that none of the guards wanted to enter the burning cell to save Erickson, and that he was left to burn in his cell for a period of 10 to 20 minutes before his door was opened. The prisoners also allege that four fire extinguishers on the floor were all empty.

An inquiry opened by la Sureté du Québec (Quebec Provincial Police) the day after Erickson's death considered two hypotheses: that the prisoner committed suicide, and that the fire he started in his cell simply raged out of control.

The inquest found that as soon as the guards were alerted by the cries from Erickson and the other prisoners they hurried into the maximum security section to activate the automatic controls on the cell doors.

However it was too late. The flames had already seriously scorched Erickson. According to some prisoners, Erickson was transported by ambulance to Sacré-Coeur de Cartierville hospital "in horrible agony".

Erickson was to be transferred from Saint-Vincent-de-Paul to a maximum security penitentiary at Sainte-Anne-de-Plaines. He did not want to be transferred and made it known to his friends and to several guards: "I will not go to Sainte-Anne, I will not go to that hole."

The strongly-willed Erickson refused to comply with the formalities which a prisoner must undertake when he is to be sent to another institution. Because of his stubbornness, the guards placed him in solitary confinement.

Around 3 pm on the day Erickson died, reports prisoner Michel Latulippe, "I heard (prison) officer Belanger conversing with Erickson. The latter said that he was absolutely not going to be transferred.

"Officer Belanger said to him that he would be transferred by force if necessary.

"At that time Erickson responded that he was going to start a fire in his cell in order not to be transferred.

"At 3:45 a guard named Martin came to tell Erickson that he would be transferred on the following day."

After hearing the news, Erickson reiterated that he was not going to Sainte-Anne-des-Plaines prison that "he would start a fire in his cell" if it was necessary to prevent his departure.

No one apparently paid any attention to his threats. Evidently Erickson started a minor fire in his cell which quickly got out of control. The guards were too slow in coming to his rescue and Erickson died later in the night in hospital.

Sexism in McGill engineering paper fought

MONTREAL (CUPI) — An issue of the McGill University engineering undergraduate newspaper has raised widespread opposition on this Montreal campus.

A petition is circulating the campus condemning the November 15 edition of the Plumbers' Pot as blatantly racist and sexist. The petition demands the appearance of those responsible before a forum of McGill students.

The issue attacked women, workers, homosexuals and minority groups. It included:

- A cartoon associating union building manager Frank Costi with the Mafia and labelling student councillors Will Hoffman and Whitney Hardy as "super pimp and his faithful companion super whore".

- An unsigned article which described members of the Gay Society of McGill as "perverts", and expressed surprise that buildings and grounds workers — "incompetents" — could "even tie their shoelaces".

- A statement to the effect that the Students' Society is run by "fucking disgusting shitheads".

- A picture of a naked woman with the caption: "Ride with us, fuck the metro, grab a bust". A metro direction sign pointed to the woman's crotch.

In a statement released November 15, the Pot's editorial board recognized that, "specific portions" of their paper were in "poor taste".

Meanwhile, the petition circulated by the committee states that attacks such as those in yesterday's Pot "against specific individuals, women, gays, Jews, Italians, political groups, and university workers, must be opposed so that they will never occur again."

The issue is similar to events at the University of British Columbia last spring, when the engineering undergraduate society newspaper there produced two issues containing racist and anti-semitic articles.

Ten mathematics professors at UBC refused to teach engineering students. Their action was supported by their colleagues in the math department, who then voted to end the four-day strike and hold all classes away from the engineering building.

The dean of engineering demanded the removal of the student society office from the engineering building, and withdrew financial support from the society.

Occupational backed 91 per cent

ST. JOHN'S (CUP) — Students at Memorial University are continuing their occupation of the arts and administration building, buoyed by a student referendum Friday which supported their position by 91 per cent.

The students are protesting the administration's refusal to continue collection of students union fees next year. President Lord Stephen Taylor announced the unilateral decision November 9 and the occupation began five days later.

Some 4,121 students turned out to vote on Friday out of about 6,100 eligible students, despite the short notice given the referendum, called only the day before. The number represented a turnout of 58.2 per cent.

The students agreed almost unanimously that the president and Board of Regents had no right to alter or interfere in the structure of the student union themselves.

Observers considered the turnout remarkable considering the circumstances. The vote was held Friday when many students normally leave the campus. It was the largest single-day voting turnout in the student union's history.

Students involved in the occupation are using the results as ammunition in their running battle with Taylor who refuses to negotiate as long as students occupy the building.

The occupation started three days before the vote, when about 3,000 students attended a general meeting. About 1,500 of them marched into the arts and administration building.

Regina occupation still on

REGINA (CUP) — University of Saskatchewan students at the Regina campus will decide today whether or not to carry on their four-and-a-half day occupation of the office of the dean of arts and science.

The students have given Regina campus principal John Archer until this afternoon to reply to student demands to overturn Dean Edgar Vaughan's veto of staff-student parity in social sciences departments.

Vaughan vetoed a decision of the social science council last week. Archer has said he will not be able to respond to student demands until he gets a legal opinion on Dean Vaughan's veto.

About 1,000 students voted in a general meeting Friday to disrupt all administration business until the principal replies to their demands.

There about 3,800 students at the Regina campus.

In other political developments, the University of Toronto Debating Union placed sixth out of 32 in the Princeton Debating Tournament this weekend.

Part-timers support fees demo

U of T's Association of Part-Time Undergraduate Students has unanimously endorsed tomorrow's OFS fees demonstration.

Meeting last week the 12 member executive agreed the demonstration was one of the few effective ways for part-time students to indicate their opposition to the provincial government's cutting back student financial support. It also sent letters to all its class representatives, asking them to inform their classes of the demonstration.

However, APUS president Kurt Loeb said last night he did not expect a large turnout of APUS members at the demonstration because most work during the day.

"Since we can't be there, moral support is all we can give," he stated. He described the provincial government's actions in raising fees and cutting back student aid as "madness."

"We've supported the OFS actions all along," he added. APUS executive member Susan Geason, also an OFS executive member voted in favour of the demonstration at last month's OFS meeting in Waterloo on behalf of APUS. The association felt bound to abstain from any support of the proposed fees strike, since its members would simply not be able to register in courses if they failed to pay their fees. (Loeb says that APUS is lobbying for part-time students to be able to pay their fees in instalments.)

Part-time students were hit about as hard proportionately as full-time students by the fees increases. Their fees of $95 per course went up more than 20 per cent to $115.

Because they are not eligible for student loans and grants many part-time students may find the fee increase harder to meet than their full-time counterparts. Extension of the Ontario Student Awards Program (OSAP) to part-time students is one of the demands OFS is making to the Conservative government.

York part-time students convinced their administration to absorb eight dollars of the $20 increase. A similar request made by APUS to the U of T administration did not meet a favourable response.

In spite of the fact that they could not participate in the main action planned by OFS at the time, a January fees strike, nearly 400 APUS members voted in last month's strike referendum.

About 88 per cent of those voting supported the OFS demands for rollbacks in the fees increases and improvements in the student aid program.

Everyone knows the real Santa is Eaton's bou adapted from Last Post and The Varsity

Elevated to the status of a native aristocracy, possessed of one of the greatest fortunes in the country, close to the seats of power, the Eaton family and company are the object of a virtual conspiracy of silence by the press.

To this day, a story on Eaton's that deals with anything more than some trivia about Santa Claus parades must be passed through the highest editors of any of the English papers in Montreal, Toronto or Winnipeg. Assignments to cover Eaton events are generally assigned by the publisher or managing editor, with the addendum "Must Go".

In the Montreal Gazette, a reporter who wrote a humorous article on the 1967 Santa Claus parade was banned by the then managing editor, John Meyer, from writing any articles not directly assigned by the editors, and from writing any features. He was informed that the article had angered Eaton's very much, that publisher Charles Peters had received complaints from two Eaton's executives the day of the innocuous article's appearance, and that "this causes the Gazette great concern". Eaton's is one of the Gazette's major advertisers. The reporter was fired three weeks later.

All Eaton's events, even the most trivial and the most blatant publicity gimmicks, are mandatory coverage, particularly in the Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg press.

The ban on mentioning Eaton's in any unfavorable light extends to the point that in court stories in the Toronto papers if a shoplifter is tried for stealing from Eaton's, the store must not be named, but referred to as "a downtown department store."

Eaton's main Toronto store is right across Queen Street from Simpson's main store. Only a few years ago when a holdup man murdered a finance company manager downtown and fled through Eaton's lobby and then into Simpson's in an attempt to get lost in the crowd, the dramatic and sensational flight was described in one Toronto paper as being "through a downtown department store and south across Queen Street into another downtown department store."

During startling testimony before the 1935 Stevens committee, all the Toronto papers produced the most incredible record of omissions in their coverage, coverage which bore little relation to the actual testimony — not, at least, the damaging testimony.

The files of the Toronto and Montreal papers on Eaton's are replete with notices of their "generous donations to charity", "sparkling party" and "the family beloved by Canadians". To honour Eaton's 100th anniversary, both the Toronto Telegram and Toronto Star ran multi-part series on the history of Eaton's with sidelights about the family — a sycophancy rarely achieved even in the Canadian press.

That was not surprising, since it is commonly known that a vast part of the money that permitted John Bassett, publisher of the Telegram, to keep the paper alive came from the Eaton family, and that the terms of succession for the Telegram specified that after Bassett's death or retirement the paper shall be turned over to the sons of John Bassett and John David Eaton.

Although the Star once allowed its ex-columnist Ron Haggart (later with the Telegram) to run columns critical of Eaton's, its series on Eaton's centenary was substantially less critical in its outlook than the series the Star ran on itself in 1968.

An idea of Eaton's continuing labour policy and the sycophancy of the Toronto press comes from the following item which appeared at the end of January, 1970 in New Lead, house organ of the Toronto Newspaper Guild, the reporters' union:
*Does anybody care?
Eaton's fires 200.*

Is it news that the T. Eaton Company Limited is firing 200 maintenance employees?

The mighty retail chain is one of the biggest advertisers in the country.

What clout the ad dollar holds over local news media is debatable. But, the Eaton story shows a tangible Toronto sensitivity to the department store's power.

The first story written — and squelched — apparently was at the Telegram, not surprisingly.

The Eaton family — mainly the founder's great grandson — controlled a large chunk of the Tely and of Eaton Broadcasting Limited, which owns television station CFTO (the Telegram's tv outlet).

Briefly, the developments are that 196 maintenance workers at Eaton's downtown and College Street stores were to be taken off the payroll January 12, 1970.

The maintenance work was contracted out to a private housekeeping concern, Consolidated Building Maintenance Limited.

According to Eaton personnel chief Gordon Elliott "10 to 20 per cent" of the laid-off employees would go to Consolidated — at lower pay than they were making at Eaton's... Tely reporter Marc Zwelling wrote the story on December 15, based on local labour union sources.

He describes his story as "an interpretive piece" that revealed a drive had started by the Building Service Employees' International Union to organize the "new" Consolidated-Eaton workers.

It also pointed out the reduction in wages and the loss of the 10 per cent Eaton employee discount suffered by the transferred workers.

It touched on the last big union drive at Eaton's in 1953 and speculated that attempts might begin to carve out small bargaining units of catalogue employees, warehouse workers, truck drivers or restaurant workers.

"Oddly enough," says Zwelling, "the first tip I got on the story was from Tely management. Simultaneously, I picked up the story from other sources."

Two days after he handed in his story, Zwelling was told the paper's "Eaton's censor" had vetoed it.

The Eaton dismissals did not die, however.

One of the fired caretakers, Irene Goncher, went to see controller Margaret Campbell at her City Hall office on December 22 to try to enlist Mrs. Campbell's help.

Goncher told the City Hall press corps that "500 employees" had been laid off...

Again a Tely reporter snapped at the story. Jake Calder of the paper's City Hall bureau filed a piece as a hard news story, and it was quickly smothered.

By way of addendum, two days after New Lead was distributed within the newspapers, the Star, obviously goaded, ran a brief item, with no point of view of the workers quoted, on an inside page.

Telegram columnist Ron Haggart, the only journalist in Canada who has ever successfully put Eaton's under a microscope and who had a great deal of editorial liberty at the Tely, also wrote a column on this incident. The column was killed by superiors.

But, the silence that has reigned in the press around Eaton's is far from being a new phenomenon.

After referring to R. Y. Eaton's attempt to get a retraction from the Telegram for noting Labour Day marchers dipped their flags in passing Eaton's William Stephenson, author of The Store that Timothy Bull, writes:

"Thereafter, Eaton's dealings with the fourth estate became virtually non-existent. Even journalists know to love and admire the firm found that they could not even interview the janitor. Anything Eaton's had to say to the Canadian public, RY made it clear, would be said in its own advertisements."

Eaton's stands as an untouchable, not required to reveal its assets, its business dealings; requiring a brown-nosing press to send its reporters as low-paid public relations men to glorify any event Eaton's chooses to "suggest" to newspaper publishers they should cover. Even on the background of a Canadian press that has never shone for its daring or public responsibility, this stands as a monument of silence.

John David

The power Eaton's wields through its vast wealth, and the abandon with which the company exercises it, is illustrated by its massive land deals over the past decades.

In several cities, Eaton's has amassed large segments of vital downtown land, kept it unused and frozen by not developing it until it suited its purposes, and when it finally did, forced the local city councils into rezoning surrounding areas to accommodate the company's needs.

The most glaring example of this corporate citizen's behaviour, which casts further doubt on its "greatest good to the greatest number" myth, is to be found in Vancouver.

In March, 1948, Eaton's bought the old Hotel Vancouver on the city's main corner, and unleashed its publicity machine with promises of building a huge department store that would transform the city center. It demolished the ancient structure.

For the next 22 years, the site remained a vacant lot, used for parking, a gaping hole like a missing tooth in the centre of the city. For 22 years, the downtown development of Vancouver was stunted by the presence of this huge parking lot on Granville and Georgia. Eaton's was powerful and wealthy enough to do what almost no other corporation in the country can — hold onto critical development land against all pressures — public and otherwise — until it suited their own purposes to develop.

Finally, in 1968, Eaton's and its developer put it to the city of Vancouver: it would develop the square block if the city expropriated the block to the north and joined it to the Eaton complex. That block comprised ancient, family-owned businesses, small but not without charm. The city authorities were forced to go along with this economic blackmail, because Eaton's held that prime land which it threatened not to develop unless it got what it wanted.

Furthermore, Eaton's played its old game of announcing its splendid plans in the press to whip up public enthusiasm, and then use that as leverage against any city authorities who had silly ideas about planned downtown development. In 1965, three years before the city capitulated, the Vancouver Sun ran a story seen frequently in other cities where Eaton's has done the same thing:

DOWNS a light

"We always knew that Eaton's Santa was the real one," recalls Toronto-born Rick Rabin, now living in Gander. "You can't fool kids about anything as important as that."

$20 Million Tower Planned by Eaton's

In 1964, Eatons unveiled plans for a $20 million dollar shopping complex before a Toronto City Council meeting.

The development was to be built on a block of land owned by Eaton's, bordered by Bay, Queen, and Yonge Streets. The plans called for the demolition of the old City Hall and the closing of several streets.

The proposed razing of City Hall incurred the wrath of many citizens who wanted the historic gothic building preserved, but city council passed the project when Eaton's applied pressure to civic politicians.

However, Eaton's backed out of the deal when an economic survey revealed the venture to be unprofitable.

Several years later, Eaton's again approached city council with plans for another project on the same block.

A $250 million dollar proposal was put forward by the Fairview Corporation, a developer which Eaton's had hired to construct the project. The old City Hall would be retained under this scheme.

Almost immediately, the proposal ran into heavy fire by Toronto's reform aldermen and citizens who assailed the shopping complex for being too high and too dense. They also opposed plans to close and sell several city streets to Fairview.

They complained that the Fairview building would dwarf the 150-year-old Holy Trinity Church which lay in the middle of the developer's path. Officials of Trinity Church fought the proposal for many months on the grounds that the buildings would prevent adequate sunlight from reaching Trinity Square.

The project was later revised by the developer, and a compromise was reached with the Holy Trinity congregation.

However, the developer's plans have not yet been approved by city council. Alderman Paul Pickett has complained that Fairview was pressing the city to agree to a much-relaxed "development agreement".

Fairview does not want to guarantee to build to any rigid specifications the second phase of the centre which will be erected on the Queen and Albert Streets section of their property.

The second phase of the project will include a pedestrian mall, a high-rise office tower and possibly a hotel.

If Fairview succeeds in forcing the city to accept the agreement, the developer would appear to be in a stronger position than the city agreed to last August when the matter was before council.

The debate on the issue has not ended. City council will decide the fate of Eaton Centre this Thursday.

In Montreal, Eaton's has a parking lot in the heart of the downtown area that blocks several arterial downtown routes and leaves that area useless for development. Its development plans have also gone askew, and a minor item in the Montreal Star in 1969 informs us that Cemp Development is suing Eaton's for several million dollars.

Another example of Eaton's hit-and-run project tactics is to be found in Hamilton, Ontario. There, in 1955, the company arranged to buy Hamilton's city hall and some city land, on a promise to extend its store in two stages — one by 1957, another by 1962. A special law had to be passed by the Ontario legislature permitting Eaton's to go ahead with his deal. But, unfortunately, Eaton's only completed the first part of the bargain. So, the city passed another special law making it all legal and giving Eaton's a six-month extension.

Even that extension didn't prove sufficient. In 1963, the city council passed another three-year grace period, putting the deadline back to 1966.

Work on the old city hall site just got underway in 1970.

Not even Canadian Pacific Railway, the second-largest employer in the country, has been able to get away with keeping the grubby hands of public need and civic planning off its lands to the extent that the Eatons have with their leverage of wealth, influence, and power.

Kingdom

How does it fit? A company that has, admittedly, in the past led the way in such things as shorter hours and pension schemes, yet possesses a terror and hatred of unionism and collective bargaining almost unmatched by any corporation in Canada.

A family that has distributed millions through official charities, that builds churches and monuments, and finances entire machine-gun batteries for the war, yet used its financial leverage to work against the public good, control newspapers, and erect its splendid cathedral of opulence on a mountain of poor wages and arbitrary, dictatorial, and paternalistic management.

A vast empire whose moguls steadfastly refuse to allow any encroachment of American capital, whose laird, John David Eaton, asked about rumors that the firm might sell to an American concern, declares expansively, "There isn't enough money to buy the Eaton name."

It fits well. For here is an empire — feudal in its myriad fiefdoms, in its stratified authority, its vassals and satrapies, crowned with an all-powerful gilded royalty. It is an empire with an ideology. Labour is not enough to earn the worker his wages — loyalty is required. Wealth is divine right. It is not a company, but a "family". (Employees were once called "associates".)

Its charities, apart from being convenient for tax purposes, are gifts from the king and queen, and the buildings and statues and church are monuments erected by them to the propagation of their own memory.

The Eatons were not interested only in making money. The Eatons wanted, and got, power, influence, and — like all merchants who made their money in not the most glamorous field of capitalist endeavor — prestige and status. Lady Eaton is not an aberration, but the logical development of what this empire was founded on. Timothy Eaton built his empire on his life's savings. He didn't inherit it or even exploit it out of anyone — his first $6,500 of capital were, to use a Calvinist phrase, "reward for virtue". And, to use another Calvinist phrase, the Eatons are the "elect".

Profit is the prime goal, but not the only one. And, once wealth is attained, as with the Carnegie and Rockefeller fortunes, come the philanthropy and sponsorship of the arts, and the titles. Above all, rich and powerful, the Eatons wanted to be respected, even loved by the little people of Canada.

But, Eaton's never lost sight of the dollar all the while the family was pursuing prestige. In a manner that is truly mercantile genius, they devised the career girls' clubs, the junior councils of clean-cut high school boys and girls, the Santa Claus parades. One wonders they never got into pee-wee hockey.

In places, Eaton's has successfully resisted history — it built an empire entirely on Indigenous capital, enshrouded in a native Canadian nationalism that betrays some contempt for the crass profit-making-only corporations that wiped out all the other Eatons of Canadian commercial and industrial history. It also resisted the labour union movement with a tenacity that spared no expense, and created its own internal welfare state. Collective bargaining would have destroyed the intricate "family" structure within.

Like an ancient institution that history long ago decreed should have died, or at least transformed, it maintains its stresses within in order to resist change.

The oft-expressed proposition that "Eaton's is Canada" is a facile caricature. But Eaton's is something that grew in a manner peculiar to Canada, and it stands as a Canadian institution, the highest development of Canadian capital. It is a museum piece in a day of pleasant young men from New York and branch-plant managers.

Those who today seek truly Canadian institutions should not tarry before coming upon this monument to what our native wealth and power had erected. And, may it be a sobering discovery.

Candidate charges school board likes men

By PHILIP STRAMBA

Ward 7 trustee candidate Joan Barrie yesterday charged that an official of the Toronto Board of Education attempted to set down policy contrary to provincial law on human rights, by circulating a memo asking school principals to hire men teachers over women.

She said an assistant superintendent of the school system sent a memo to all principals which said, in effect, "let's get more men into the schools."

She was speaking to a meeting at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) of women candidates in the December 4 municipal election, sponsored by Women for Political Action.

The women's committee of the board, set up last May, is investigating the matter, Barrie added. The assistant superintendent has now retired, she indicated.

Ward 4 trustee candidate Mora Gregg advocated free day and after school care for children. Along with these measures to make education more accessible, she said allowances should be paid to working-class students over 16 to allow them to continue their education.

Gregg accused the educational system of streaming girls into courses and programs that led them into being merely mothers and housewives.

She stated that educational decision-making should be decentralized to permit greater community participation. Schools should be utilized more freely after hours, she said.

Freedom of the press and free rights to assembly should also be granted to high school students, Young Socialist Board of Education candidate in Ward 8 Heather Thomson urged. Assemblies which deal with current events, such as the war in southeast Asia, should be encouraged.

Thomson condemned the streaming of women into home-making fields of study and advocated setting up women's studies courses.

Expanded works study programs involving industries and schools should also be implemented, she said.

Paula Reddy, running for the separate school board in Ward 2, said that educational facilities available to the separate schools should be equal to the public systems. At the same time, she advocated the integration of Catholic religious teaching into the whole curriculum of the separate system, "not just a five minute period for prayer."

Ward 5 aldermanic candidate Erna Koffman, a vigorous critic of what she sees as degeneracy in youth, told the audience of over 50 that she wants to represent the whole community, not just active and vocal groups that move in.

She stated she thought the Spadina Expressway should be completed. Juane Hensol running for an aldermanic seat in Ward 10, said City Council should consult more than it has in past with area residents on changes affecting them. The Planning Board needs to be reformed so that it reflects more the interest of citizens and less that of politicians, she said.

Margaret Bryce, also running in Ward 10 said the issues in the December election were development, women and pollution. The heavy bias on City Council leads to greater demands for transportation facilities, she pointed out, including both expressways and rapid transit.

"Too many professional politicians are running the city," charged Ward 1 candidate Lucile Griff. She added that she was not running as a "woman candidate" and hoped she would not lose due to being a woman.

Young Socialist Ellie Kirzner, running for a seat on City Council in Ward 8, declared there exist "a layer of rip-off artists which is the same layer that runs the city. Their money comes from development, she said "the development of their pocketbooks."

The only woman mayoralty candidate, Jacquie Henderson of the Young Socialists, declared that women, students and workers have little say in City Council. Two per cent of Toronto, businessmen, run the council, she claimed; an important issue is the end of discrimination against women by City Hall.

Some faces of women civic candidates include U of T's own Ellie Kirzner (not shown) and quite a few other people. For explanation of why they are here read the story with this picture.

'Powerful interests' want city to be like New York says Heap

By MARK BOHNER

"A few very powerful interests intend to change the downtown of Toronto so that it will resemble New York," warned Dan Heap at the Hart House Debates Room Friday.

Heap, running for alderman in Ward 6, was speaking at a promotional "sound and light variety show" featuring poetry and prose readings by Marg Atwood, Marion Engel, Graham Gibson and Dennis Lee.

Heap, running as an independent, has supported strong community participation in decision-making and has been active in residents struggles, notably the fight against the Spadina Expressway and opposition to massive developments in stable downtown residential areas.

Heap said that if City Hall continues its present policies, downtown Toronto will become a "wilderness" of self-contained apartments with expressways like "moats around castles."

If present trends continue, he said the day could come when no one will be able to walk downtown after

8:30 pm.

He explained later that without a strong community life at street level, the crime rate would drastically increase.

City Hall's consistent acquiescence to developers' demands such as changing zoning by-laws may eventually result in the destruction of communities in Ward 6 such as Grange Park, Sussex Ulster, and the Annex said Heap. Communities such as Chinatown, Kensington, and Baldwin Street are currently being threatened by the proposed widening of Dundas Street.

Heap also questioned the future of the University of Toronto when developments like Metro Centre and Eaton Centre increasingly overload the transportation corridors of University Avenue, St. George, Bloor, and Wellesley Streets.

Decision-making at City Hall must no longer be dominated by a few businessmen, and those who have connections he said. He called for more residents' control over decisions affecting their neighbourhoods.

ElecTor MUNICIPAL ELECTION CENTRE

In conjunction with S.A.C. and Innla Collage, INI 206/306 has planned a municipal elections centre to gather and disseminate information concerning the upcoming municipal elections on December 4. The purpose of this service is to both supply basic information and to act as liaison between candidates for office and interested individuals.

If you have any questions concerning the upcoming municipal elections, feel free to contact us at 928-5456. We exist to serve you.

Lawyer faults state with slayings

Rally paints background to student deaths

By JULIA ELCOCK

Lawyer Charles Roach charged Friday that the blame for the shooting of three Louisiana students Thursday "clearly lies" with the Southern University administration and the state governor although he conceded that the police may not have shot the students.

"Dissent is caused by frustration," he told a Students for a Democratic Society memorial rally attended by about 70 people. "It is one of the symptoms that something is wrong."

Roach, the lawyer for former Black Panther Edwin Hogan who was deported last month before all avenues of appeal had been closed, said the details have not yet been fully revealed.

There are known facts, he continued, a situation of protest had existed since October 24 no action had been taken by the administration to solve the problem, and on Thursday three students were shot, two killed and one wounded.

The student movement in Louisiana had been in motion since a strike was called October 24, according to a S.D.S. pamphlet. The students were demanding better medical care, housing, transportation, food and better pay for cafeteria workers, as well as more student say in campus affairs.

On the New Orleans campus of Southern University, the students had already forced the resignation of the president.

According to the pamphlet the students were occupying the campus and were demanding the president's resignation. Police were called on campus and the students were given five minutes in which to disperse.

Immediately the police started to throw tear gas bombs into the crowd, which the students threw back. The crowd was running away from the police, an SDS spokesman said, when the police opened fire, killing the last two people in the crowd.

None of the students were armed.

Friday night the two sheriffs involved admitted that there might be a possibility that one of the policemen had loaded his gun with live ammunition by mistake. The FBI is conducting an investigation into the affair.

A statement issued by some

The Varsity—Andrew Slikkus

Lawyer Charles Roach tells a Sid Smith meeting the slaying of two Baton Rouge students was an example of U.S. racism.

Southern University students stated that the death of the two students was caused by a "racist political structure that is designed to keep the oppressed from attaining that power needed to attain their own destiny".

Roach called attempts to fight injustices through the ballot box a "farce". The only way to change is "to make our voices heard," he continued.

He agreed with the methods employed by the students: "technically they were the right ones... the only ones". This drew applause from the audience.

"What goes on in the States is reflected and controls our lives here", Roach said, "we are to weak to resist the influences of the States".

The solution to racism, Roach believed, lay in the formation of international connections. He urged people to "get involved in the problem of racism". "It can happen here", Roach said. "The establishment must deal with its own problems" he concluded to the applause of the audience.

The SDS took up a collection to send a telegram of support to the Southern University students.

Trustees clash over whether their jobs should be full-time

By BILL HUMBER

Ward 5 candidate for Board of Education Judith Major claimed Thursday that the job of trustee must be full time.

Speaking to an audience of about 75 people at a Ward 5 all candidates meeting at the First Unitarian Church, she stated that only one of the ward's present trustees, Fiona Nelson, fulfilled this obligation.

However the other incumbent trustee, Bill Charlton, who is also chairman of the Toronto board, claimed that the purpose of the Board of Education is to allow citizens to participate in the education process. If it were to become a full time job (current salaries are less than $4,000), the advisory role of elected citizens who occupy other jobs would be lost, he stated.

Nelson, the senior trustee, sided with Major, stating that it had been a full time job for her during the last three years at the Board.

"I sometimes received 20 requests daily from teachers, students and parents asking for assistance," she stated.

A fourth candidate, John Maxwell, applauded the efforts of parents at Brown School who had shared in the process of deciding what type of community school would replace the old building torn down in the summer. He only regretted that his work at a community college had prevented him from sharing in this process.

Major, who was chairman of the Brown School Home and School Association in 1971-72, joined with Nelson in promising to work for more parent involvement in all aspects of the education system. Nelson claimed that her work on the "Alternatives Committee" of the board had made her aware of the need for diversity and greater community participation.

A candidate for the Separate School Board, Don Mulroney, agreed that greater community participation in education must be sought.

While admitting there were some differences in the problems encountered, he felt that both boards faced the same tasks. Prime among these is the job of confronting and raising current provincial budget ceilings.

Ward 5 candidate says

Toronto transport policy needs major revision

By MARK BOHNEN
Ward 5 aldermanic candidate
Colin Vaughan charged last week that the city's transportation policy

"places garbage before people".
Speaking at an all-candidates meeting in St. Paul's Avenue Road Church sponsored by the Avenue

Road-Bay-Cottingham Residents

Association, Vaughan said that four CNR and CPR railway tracks, now used to transport garbage, should be used for commuter transportation.

greater voice be given citizens' groups and ad hoc task forces. "The roles must be reversed," he said.

Kids may be bounced in winter as U of T daycare plans plow on Ignoring threats by parents of the Devonshire Day Care Centre to stay put until U of T finds them alternate space, the university administration is plowing ahead with plans to take over the building in January.

A timetable outlining the time necessary to renovate the building, an old clubhouse, was presented to the Governing Council's Advisory Committee on Programs Thursday.

The timetable, drawn up by committee chairman Paul Corey, with help from the U of T's department of Physical Plant, calls for the building to be open for use by the university March 23. Renovations, say Corey, will take approximately ten weeks.

However, in January the children currently using the day care centre who are not members of the university community will probably be kicked out of the building if the timetable is applied, said Kathy Peterson, a representative from the Campus Co-operative Day Care Centre.

The Co-op has since last spring occupied the previously unused clubhouse off Devonshire where the university intends to set up its own day care centre. It intends to stay there until an alternate site is found, and has warned U of T president John Evans that unless a suitable accommodation is found by Wednesday, it may settle in permanently.

Peterson said the Campus Co-op representatives were acting as advisors to the committee for the formation of the university day care centre. But they do not consider themselves bound by university policy.

The Campus Co-op representatives refuse to participate in the planned centre because under the Governing Council's policy, children whose parents are not members of the university community will be excluded, parent control will be lost and the users' costs considerably raised.

As a first step in setting up the centre, the advisory committee, composed half of day care representatives from four day care centres and half of representatives from university constituencies, decided to advertise to obtain names of potential users.

A survey will also be distributed to all parts of the university to get information on potential enrolment and desired policies.

Vaughan, a former chairman of the Confederation of Residents and Ratepayers Associations
(CORRA), said that Metro Council must face the fact that the Spadina Expressway is "a dead issue" and stop trying to revive it. Vaughan played a leading role in the later stages of the fight to stop the expressway from being built, as a co-chairman of the Stop Spadina committee.

The city needs more emphasis on north-south rapid transit, he said.

Asked what could be done to alleviate the crowded conditions of the Yonge Street subway, Vaughan advocated expansion of the public transit system's services. He called for the immediate construction of the Balhurst Street subway.

The ward's senior alderman, Ying Hope, defended his past record as one favourable to ratepayers' associations. He cited his successful efforts together with local residents
"to contain and drive out greedy developers" from Aura Lee and Ramsden Parks.

Hope said that commissioners
"who are constantly working with developers" are a major source of regressive policies at City Hall.

"They are the policy makers," Vaughan agreed. "Senior aldermen listen to them." He advocated that a

'Can't sit on bayonet': provost

By DON MOWAT

"The essence of diplomacy is the restraint of power," said Trinity Provost George Ignatieff last week in an address to a college debate at St. Hilda's College.

Ignatieff, a former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations, spoke following a lively debate on the resolution: "The United Nations is no longer an effective peacekeeping body."

The superpowers have learned that "unrestricted power is no solution to modern problems," he asserted. Ignatieff suggested that this realization may well provide the basis for a revitalization of the United Nations.

The guest speaker summed up the dilemma of the superpowers by saying that in former times, "you could do anything with a bayonet except sit on it". But with the nuclear stockpile, "all you can do is sit on it".

Ignatieff warned, however, that the dangers of nuclear arms proliferation have not been eliminated. He stated that Japan was one country which had not yet signed the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, yet had territorial disputes with the USSR and a long history of conflict with China.

In addition to the nations of the Middle East, Brazil, South Africa and India are also in a position to join the ranks of the nuclear powers.
All of these countries have either territorial claims or disturbed relations with neighbouring lands.

With regard to Soviet-American relations, the U.S. and the USSR have learned that "channels are open in the United Nations" for discussion of international problems.

Ignatieff maintained that "the Charter of the United Nations has become the basic rulebook for the conduct of international affairs". So it will remain until something else replaces it.

Canadian Phd grad claims

Canadians convinced U.S. scholars are best

Jean Cottam, research director for the Toronto chapter of the Committee for an Independent Canada, said yesterday that the worst problem in attempting to "Canadianize" Canadian universities is the "colonial mentality" of many Canadians which see anything American as necessarily superior.

"Many Canadian professors received their graduate degrees from American universities," she said, "and have been brain-washed into believing that the graduate of any American university is better than the graduate of any Canadian university."

"It is this obsequious attitude of so many Canadians," she continued, "more than anything else that we have to fight."

Cottam is a graduate of Sir George Williams University in Montreal, with a PhD in Russian and East European history from U of T. She has been unable to gain a position in any Canadian university, and is presently working as an insurance adjustor.

"Not a single Canadian has been hired in my field in Canada since 1969," she said.

"Canadians should receive preferential treatment in their own country," she said. She indicated that by this she meant that where a Canadian and an American applicant had roughly similar qualifications, the Canadian should get the job.

"Instead, Americans actually receive preferential treatment here. Many of the department heads are American and Americans are numerous on hiring committees. Through the 'old boy' network, Americans have an advantage."

"Only immigrants who are committed to Canada should be accepted as Canadians," she said.

"How do you tell if someone is 'committed to Canada'?" asked a student in the audience.

"If he wants to become a citizen, then he's committed," she replied.

"The humanities have an ideological element which is lacking in fields like mathematics," said Cottam. "No country can dev velop its own personality if its universities are controlled by foreigners."

Three-quarters of new appointments in Canadian universities in 1970-71 went to non-Canadians, according to CIC research.

"A Canadian cannot get a job at an American university with anything like the same ease that an American can get a job here," said Cottam. "Canada is wide open to Americans, but the U.S. is almost closed to Canadian academics."

"With the drying up of job opportunities for American academics in their own country, they are flooding here. If no action is taken, Canadians in Canadian universities will soon be a rarity."

Only half of the professors in Canada are Canadians, she said.

"Internationalism is good, but this is ridiculous," said Cottam.

She protested strongly the rejection of Istvan Meszaros by the immigration department as a "security risk". Meszaros had been offered a position at York University, but was refused landed immigrant status.

"Meszaros is a scholar with an international reputation in Marxist philosophy, but him we reject as a security risk."

Canadians have a double standard, she suggested, "whereby Asians and Europeans are considered inferior to American immigrants, whom we see as some sort of master race."

Writer says marriage nothing more than "purchase of vagina"

By AGI LUKACS

"The law has always contributed to the oppression of women," lawyer Marilyn Ginsberg, who teaches a course on women's rights at Osgoode Hall, said last Wednesday night.

She and journalist June Callwood were the speakers at the Interdisciplinary Department's weekly open lecture on women at the Faculty of Education.

Callwood, who co-authored "Canadian Women and the Law", told the largely female audience that marriage is equivalent to "the purchase of a vagina".

"As long as a woman provides this, she's got it made for life," Callwood said. But if she doesn't take "this little apparatus" to Sudbury, for example, when her husband's job transfers him there he doesn't have to support her ever again. She is considered to have "deserted".

Similarly, if she is transferred, by her employer and goes despite her husband's disapproval, she has also "deserted", unless she's the only wage-earner.

Further, the buyer of a vagina is entitled to life-long rights.

A husband often has to support the wife from whom he has become separated or divorced, but only if she remains "chaste". If she doesn't, most judges will cut off alimony and automatic inheritance rights.

"Once he's bought it", Callwood emphasized, speaking of the vagina, "he's really bought it, and he doesn't want it in someone else's clutches."

A woman should always have inheritance rights, feels Ginsberg, because she has contributed to her husband's financial status through child-care, and housekeeping.

She approves of the new Québec law that allows a spouse to inherit 50 per cent of his or her mate's property, on the death of the latter. She also approves of the Québec law which states expenses must be borne by each proportionate to each spouse's income.

Changes in law can improve the status of women, Ginsberg feels, but only with coincidental changes in social attitudes. She cited the Ontario Employment Standards Act — which provides for equal wages for the same job, regardless of sex — and the Ontario Women's Equal Opportunity Act which ended sex specifications in want ads as two examples of legislation which has had little effect.

Aside from the fact that many women don't know about such laws, the reason they don't work is that employers don't take them seriously, she stated.

Employers can find different names for the same job to get around the first law, and inform females that a job has already been filled, to get around the second.

Ginsberg suggested raising "public consciousness", by the government, the media, and private groups. Callwood suggested letter-writing campaigns, which are tedious, she feels, but do work.

Blues freeze Gee-Gees in 12-3 win

By PETER DUX

Blues continued to win Friday night, this time wiping out Ottawa Gee-Gees 12-3. Blues took a 5-1 lead in the first period and never looked back in their home opener.

Toronto completely outskated Ottawa in the first and third periods, outshooting Gee-Gees by better than a 3-1 margin. However in the second period Blues eased up and Ottawa outshot them 12-11.

Blues' forward line of Munro-Korzack-Sems proved to be the most productive on the night, scoring five goals — two each by Sems and Korzack, and one by centre Bob Munro. The line also was top heavy with assists — a total of ten for the game.

Other Blues' goals came from Kent Ruhnke, with two, Ivan MacFarlane, Bill Bubba, Al Milnes, Bruce Herridge and Doug Tate. For Gee-Gees it was Dan Hurtubise, Dan Farant, and Paul Gauthier.

Varsity scored early in the game at 18 seconds on the team's first shot on net. Warren Anderson blasted the puck from the blueline and McFarlane neatly deflected it in. But Ottawa came right back, also scoring on their first shot on Gauthier's goal from centre ice which Durno misjudged. (Durno looked shaky in the warm up and didn't settle down until just after this first Ottawa goal.)

Blues' second goal was similar to the team's first, with Korzack tipping in Keenan's shot, while their third goal was carried through by Munro who went around the defence at the line and tucked the puck behind Doyle with a well-placed shot.

Blues went ahead 5-1 by the end of the first period, with the Munro-Korzack-Sems combination tallying twice more. Sems scored on a two-one break with Korzack, while Sems' aggressive play in the crease bothered the Ottawa goalie and defence, allowing Korzack to fire a goal from the wing with 15 seconds left in the period.

Ottawa goalie Gary Doyle played well in net, despite allowing the five first period goals. He stymied Davies on a breakaway and was not totally worthy of blame on most of the goals which the Gee-Gee defence watched from the face off circle.

One of the few plays that marred an otherwise competently-handled game was an altercation between Nick Holmes and Dan Hurtubise in front of the Ottawa bench. Doug Tate went into to separate the two, so Holmes went after Paul Gauthier.

After a couple of blows both were sent off for two minutes. (Majors are usually reserved for serious fights in college hockey because of the automatic game misconduct accompanying them.)

In the second period Blues played poorly. Coach Tom Watt said: "It's hard to expect the boys to keep up after a 5-1 lead."

Blues missed some fine opportunities — Korzack firing wide of an open net after being set up by Munro, while Ruhnke lost a goal the same way with Doyle out of position.

However, Gee-Gees were unable to provide enough protection during the period and Toronto still managed to pop in two more goals. On one play Al Milnes stole the puck from Doyle's glove and tipped the net. Ruhnke scored his first of two in the game with a hard, ice level shot from right wing.

Munro and Ottawa's Dan Hurtubise had sticks up at each other when the Gee-Gee forward didn't appreciate Sems slashing at goalie Doyle's pads after a save.

Blues captain Gord Davies checked Gauthier off his feet, with Gauthier suffering a separated shoulder on the play. Up to that point in the game he had been Ottawa's most effective forward.

Friday's third period was much a repetition of the first, with Blues outscoring Gee-Gees 5-2.

Ottawa made the score 7-2 with Hurtubise firing the puck in on his own rebound with Blues defence elsewhere. Then, with Holmes tying up the Gee-Gee defence Bruce Herridge scored Blues' first goal of the period, skating from behind the goal to poke the puck home.

Blues ninth goal came on a set-up play by Munro who passed to Sems, left unguarded in the slot. Bill Bubba's goal came off a fancy passing play originating with Milnes' carrying play from the Toronto end of the rink. Bubba also assisted on Blues 11th goal, putting a shift on Doyle and passing to Ruhnke who easily put the puck away from close in.

Ottawa's third and final goal of the game came on a Blues' defensive lapse allowing Dan Farant to slap the puck in from the slot at 14:03. Anderson almost blocked the shot but it careened off his shin pads past Durno.

Blues finished the scoring at 15:55 when Tate, again left alone in front of the net, unhesitatingly shot in Keenan's accurate pass.

Blues Notes: Blues next game is Thursday against Ryerson Rams, last place finishers in the OUAA Eastern Section last year. The game begins at 8:25 at Forest Hill Arena (on Eglinton near Spadina).... it was announced Friday that Hockey Canada cancelled the finals of its college hockey tournament when four of nine regional winners withdrew. Blues couldn't make it because of prior commitments to play Loyola College and Sir George Williams University in Montreal the weekend of December 16-18. (Sir George won its regional tournament.) Laurentian University withdrew after its offer to play the Moscow Selects in Sudbury was accepted by the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association (the two teams will play December 17), while University of Western Ontario and St. Mary's University of Halifax withdrew because of a conflict with examinations.... Sir George Williams made it clear earlier in the month that its team wouldn't show at the tournament finals, citing their agreement with Toronto. One Montreal sportswriter drew this analogy "In college hockey, playing the Canadian champion Varsity Blues is like playing Carnegie Hall. If you get the chance to do it, you don't stay home to serenade your sister."

Swim Blues win 8 of 10 freestyle relays

By PAUL CARSON

The Varsity swimming Blues and their perennial challengers, University of Western Ontario, made a shambles of the annual OUAA Relay Meet Saturday in the York pool.

Blues displayed depth in the freestyle events, winning eight of ten races, while Western took the other two speed events plus two diving relays. The other competing schools scored a few good times, but were generally left far behind the two traditional leaders.

As expected, Western coach Bob Eynon entered his three top swimmers, Wes McConnell, Ken Fowler, and former Olympian Bill Kennedy, as a unit in four key events and managed to outlast Blues in the 400-yard medley and 300-yard backstroke relays.

However, Blues went on to produce narrow victories on the most exciting races of the day — the 400-yard individual medley relay and the butterfly.

Veterans John Twohig, Russ

Farquhar, and Jim Adams plus freshman Dave Wilkin took the individual medley by less than a yard. Farquhar and Twohig then joined Zvi Eldar and Bob Peeling to win the butterfly by only one-tenth of a second.

After these two close calls, Blues were never in trouble, least of all in the freestyle races.

Rookies Shawn Laari and John Sebben appear to be the best in the province at 500 yards as they anchored Blues to a one-two sweep of the 800-yard Crescendo.

Sebben demonstrated his versatility by joining with Wayne Phillips and Nick Rottman for an easy victory in the 300-yard breaststroke, and Laari combined with Adams, Peeling and Blair Christie for a relatively handy win in the 400-yard Crescendo.

Adams, this season's captain and defending CIAU gold medalist in the freestyle sprints, turned in outstanding performances in the 200 and 400-yard free relays as Blues won both with almost ridiculous ease. Peeling, Laari and John Peters were the other entries in the 400, while Twohig and rookie Tom Schonberg joined Adams and Peeling in the 200.

Western's outstanding divers Doug Darling and Dave Rock interrupted Varsity's victory string by taking first and third off both the one and three metre boards. Waterloo's Lester Newby gained two seconds, and Blues duo of veteran Alex Lau and freshman Tim Bean were a creditable fourth. Blues rounded out a successful meet by lapping the field with four freshmen in the 800-yard freestyle relay, using Laari, Wilkin, Sebben and Dave Chudler.

Coach Robin Campbell saw this pleasing and definitely unexpected result as perhaps the key to several upsets during the dual meet season after Christmas.

"Last year our only consistent freestylers were Adams and Mike Guinness (lost through graduation). However, thanks to the good showings by the freshmen, we have at least five solid entries in the freestyle events, which just happen to account for seven out of 16 races in dual meets and the national championships," he said.

Saturday's results confirmed Blues pre-season rating as once again the team to beat for the OUAA championship, but Campbell feared the somewhat lopsided results might give his swimmers a false sense of security.

"We would seem to be in good shape for the team title again, but there are about fourteen excellent swimmers from the other schools whom we have to somehow knock off the OUAA contingent qualifying for the national championships next March," Campbell said after the meet.

"The winning times were nothing to rave about, so there's lots of hard work yet to be done," he added.

Laurentian downs Blues 81-73

By BOB PRITCHARD

Basketball Blues lost their opening game of the regular season Saturday afternoon 81-73 to the Laurentian Voyageurs although the match was closer-fought than the score might indicate.

Toronto wasn't the same team which fumbled its way to a 98-49 loss to McMaster last week. However this time, it was "the little things", as coach McManus put it, which stole victory from the Blues.

Varsity opened the game playing as an effective team unit. Using fast breaks, and taking advantage of good offensive rebounding, Blues mustered a 12-6 lead by the four minute mark of the game.

The team used a 2-1-2 zone defence throughout the half, and in the early stages of the game it seemed to work against the Laurentian squad. Voyageurs, however, soon acquired the right touch on the ball and proved to be a team of very accurate shooters.

After eight minutes of play Laurentian had tied the score at 16.

The Blues began to show the hustle McManus had credited them with earlier, as they kept Laurentian constantly running. Unfortunately, the Voyageurs countered again with some deadly shooting. Sudbury's Guy Vetric found a defensive weakness, repeatedly popping in shots from the slot between the two Toronto guards at the top of the key — both of whom left him alone to shoot. Vetric went on to pump in 16 points for his team in the first half.

Both Voyageurs and Blues stayed within two points of each other alternating the lead for the better part of the half.

Some careless defensive rebounding by the Varsity team, combined with questionable foul calls by the referees, put Laurentian ahead 41-36 with just over a minute left in the half. A good drive to the hoop by Blues' Frank Cress, who was fouled and made a three point play out of it, cut down the lead, and the teams went into the change rooms at half-time with Voyageurs sporting a 45-41 advantage.

The second half began much the same as the first, with Laurentian in a man-to-man defence, while Blues used the zone. Toronto also added a half court press, which gave the Sudbury team a little more difficulty setting up their offence. But once again Laurentian's pinpoint shooting kept them in the lead. McI Bishop, finding an opening in the Blues' press about fifteen feet to the side of the basket, dropped in 24 points to add to his team's total.

Although Varsity had tied the game at 47, another lapse in the Blues' defensive rebounding, along with Bishop's shooting, put the Voyageurs on top 61-56 at the three-quarter mark of the game.

Therefore it was these "little things" that McManus had mentioned which took the game from the Blues.

Toronto made some unnecessary but costly fouls which gave Laurentian an eight point lead with five minutes remaining. Not until this late in the game did McManus change to a man-to-man defence.

Even though the Blues kept hustling, their shooting — both from the floor and foul line — let them down. Whereas the team had stayed almost even with Laurentian's 50% average in the first half with their 49%, in the second half Toronto dropped to 27%, while the Sudbury squad stayed at 50%. At the foul line, Blues threw some important points away only hitting 30%.

Although Varsity threatened a comeback as they came within four points of the Voyageurs, Laurentian was determined to hold the lead. When the final buzzer sounded, the scoreboard read Laurentian 81, Toronto 73.

Undoubtedly one of the most exasperating factors for the Blues was that they had to "run" for most of their points, working plays and driving in, while for the most part Laurentian swished in their points from the outside.

A questionable decision by McManus was the use of a zone defence throughout most of the game against a team of such accurate shooters. Perhaps Laurentian's 64-50 defeat of York, which used a man-to-man defence, convinced McManus that a zone would be more effective. However it's impossible to say for sure, since Toronto only played man-to-man for the last few minutes of the game.

The important point about this game was the vast improvement in the team's performance since the Hamilton fiasco. Blues' front line combined for 65 points, compared with 39 in the first game. Filinski and Rudmik showed much more confidence and accuracy, hitting 16 and 14 points respectively. Ferguson and Skyvington used their height well, pulling in rebounds and tipping in shots, and Oave Watt, exhibiting aggressive play and precise shooting, enjoyed one of his best games with a 22 point total.

TIP OFFS: Varsity plays Guelph this Wednesday at 8:15 pm in Hart House in exhibition play. The team then travels to Kingston Friday for a league game against Queen's, and returns Saturday for another exhibition game against McMaster in the Benson Building. ... Laurentian finished last season in third place in the Eastern Section of the OUAA with an 8-4 record. Last year Blues lost 96-73 when Laurentian visited, and dropped the return match in Sudbury, 79-70. ... Guelph finished the 1972 season with an 8-4 record, second best in the Western Section, but lost to third place finisher Western, 90-81, in the quarter final playoffs.

Women's volleyball defeats Laurentian 3-0

The women's Senior Volleyball team opened their league schedule with a 3-0 win over Laurentian in Sudbury Saturday.

Laurentian has finished last in the Eastern Section for the past three years and Toronto expected to have no trouble winning.

However, after arriving in Sudbury Blues found out that York, Toronto's strongest opponent in the east, had trouble defeating a much-improved Laurentian squad 16-14, 15-12, 15-10. The uncertain outcome of the Blues-Voyageurs match was believed to be in jeopardy, since five of the stronger Toronto players were unable to make the trip.

(The reduced Toronto contingent consisted of regulars Agri Alberts, Joan Schwartz, Marg Grieve, Lynn Shearon, Marion Thomson, rookie Fran Walmsley, and latecomer Peggy Ouff.)

Laurentian had first service but Toronto took the first two points and never looked back. Blues built up a 9-5 lead and then had Laurentian pointless as Schwartz served up the win, 15-5. The second game followed exactly the same pattern, with Toronto winning 15-4.

Laurentian hit the scoreboard first in the third game but Blues promptly came back 6-2. The play saw-sawed back and forth until the score reached 10-5. A serving streak by Thomson then finished the game at 15-5.

Toronto's easy wins were the result of good all-round play. The team moved well offensively and defensively, serving accurately and covering up carefully.

Alberts and Thomson kept the play organized and gave the spikers well-placed sets, while Grieve and Shearon supported the Blues' attack with tips and spikes from the front corners, dependable serving and key saves.

Laurentian coach Pat Pickard admitted that Walmsley's spikes from centre-front devastated the team's defence which put up two and three-player blocks leaving large parts of the court uncovered.

Blues' coach Marj Shedd was impressed with the calibre and consistency of play and the way the team worked as a unit, especially since the six regulars had never been part of the same line-up before.

The weekend match took place as part of the official opening-day activities in Laurentian's new multi-million dollar Benjamin F. Avery Physical Education Centre. The complex, attached to the old gymnasium, includes classrooms, laboratories, saunas, a library and lounge as well as an eight lane Olympic-size swimming pool with facilities for one and three metre springboard diving and three, five, seven and one half and ten metre tower diving.

The centre has a gross area of over 80,000 square feet and has been in the planning stages for four and one half years. Blues' next matches are against Carleton this Friday at 7 pm and Ottawa at 11 am the following morning. Both games will be played in the upper gym of the Benson Building.

Ontario students confront minister at Queen's Park

By ART MOSES

About 400 students from across Ontario marched on Queen's Park yesterday to protest Premier Bill Davis government's hike in tuition fees and decrease in student aid.

The size of the demonstration disappointed organizers, but it succeeded in drawing Colleges and Universities Minister John McNie into open confrontation with ordinary students.

"We must ask how much higher education costs", McNie said amid a chorus of catcalls. "This is a question posed by taxpayers and students alike. It's not only a question of the number of dollars we spend on education but also the amount of time students spend not earning money."

"But there are no jobs," several students shouted.

Undaunted, McNie told the students that lowering tuition fees is not the answer to stem the high drop-out rate.

"The people who dropped out tended to be the best students and they got jobs."

As snow flakes swirled around his head, McNie smirked when the student heckling continued.

"Our loan program is better than in any province across the country. But we are trying to get the program amended and we hope to do so in the spring....Any new scheme will involve repayment on the basis of salary, which is only reasonable", he said.

McNie added he was impressed by proposals offered by an Ontario Federation of Students delegation, which met him and premier William Davis last week. He urged students to look to the future and not the past.

"We are committed to the fee increase for this year, but it's the first one in eight years....But I realize students are concerned the government make a commitment to accessibility and excellence and I make that commitment." McNie then stepped to the rear of the Queen's Park steps to another chorus of boos.

He was followed by New Democratic Party colleges and universities critic Floyd Laughren, who said he doubted students would win their demands.

"You don't have the public support you need because the government has come across as being fiscally responsible," he said. He warned students to be prepared to act after publication of the final Commission on Post-Secondary Education report, which may recommend a "Contingency Repayment Plan" for future student aid. "CORSAP" would require students to pay the entire cost of their education (about $2500 a year) and borrow the money from a special bank, repaying a percentage of future salary.

Ontario Federation of Labour Secretary-Treasurer Terry Meagher told the demonstrators that the OFL goes further beyond the OFS demands, and calls for outright abolition of tuition fees.

The march to Queen's Park followed a brief rally in Convocation Hall, which at times degenerated into recriminations over responsibility for the small turnout.

A favorite target was U of T Students Administrative Council President Eric Miglin, whose council refused to help organize the action. Miglin rather sheepishly entered the hall amid a cluster of people, and was challenged by Glendon College Student Union president David Moulton to address the crowd. Miglin, who is also OFS treasurer, ignored the invitation.

In an interview later Miglin said he was disappointed by the size of the demonstration.

"I'm not surprised, but to go around saying 'I told you so, I told you so' would be counter-productive," he said.

Only a small contingent of U of T students attended the demonstration. They were organized by four college councils and various political groups after SAC failed to support the protest.

Bus loads of students from outside Toronto did not materialize in the numbers expected. Two buses from York, one from Glendon, one from Brock, one from Waterloo, and one from Carleton arrived.

Ontario Provincial Police barred the doors of the Legislature Building to students during and shortly after the demonstration. A student who requested permission to enter and speak to his MPP was told the member was probably in the House and the public gallery was full.

Miglin entered the building just before the main part of the march gathered in front, because he and SAC services and communications worker Paul Carson had gallery tickets. He had asked Liberal leader Robert Nixon to ask some questions concerning the fees issue during the question period, but Nixon did not. The Liberal leader promised to ask them tomorrow.

Students at the University of Saskatchewan (Regina campus) sent a telegram to the demonstrators, expressing their solidarity in the fight. The Regina students are currently occupying the office of the dean of arts and science, demanding he reverse his veto of a motion which would have guaranteed staff-student parity in all departments of Regina's social sciences division.

Students at other universities, including Lakehead, Carleton and Windsor Universities, held simultaneous demonstrations on their campuses.

OFS general coordinator Craig Heron said he would withhold comment on the demonstration until the OFS general meeting this weekend in Toronto.

The meeting will decide whether or not to proceed with the proposed second term fees strike, already widely approved by Ontario students in a referendum last month.

Union wins vital referendum

SACRAMENTO (UPI) — The United Farm Workers union (UFW) has won a referendum in California which could have stripped it of almost all rights to organize farm labor.

With the support of Democratic Party congressmen and the California Council of Churches, the initiative was defeated 4,554,000 to 3,317,000 in the November 7 elections.

The initiative, which if passed would have immediately become law, was promulgated by the Farm Bureau, a national organization of farm owners, the big local growers and food conglomerates.

An extensive media campaign pushed the issue, labelled proposition 22, as a bill to protect farmworkers' rights, although it would have made illegal any union election in which more than half the voters were migrants.

Under the proposition farm workers would have been liable to criminal charges but the owners, to only civil proceedings in disputes. It would have outlawed all agricultural strikes and secondary boycotts, the only weapons available to farmworkers in their struggles against California's high agribusiness complex.

The UFW is the group that conducted the international boycott against California grapes, in a successful attempt to obtain collective bargaining rights for underpaid, overworked grape pickers, many of them Spanish-speaking immigrants from Mexico. The union is currently sponsoring a similar boycott of lettuce in a push for decent working conditions and fair wages for lettuce workers.

Memorial students receive support of fish workers' union

ST. JOHN'S (CUP) — Richard Cashin, president of the province-wide Fish, Food and Allied Workers Union (NFFAWU), threw solid support Tuesday behind the students occupying the Arts and Administration building at Memorial University.

After holding a press conference in the NFFAWU hall in the morning, Cashin drew a standing ovation from about 600 students in a speech at the Little Theatre in the occupied building Tuesday afternoon. The students are occupying the building to protest a board of regents decision to discontinue collection of compulsory student union fees — a decision reached without any consultation or negotiation with the students.

Cashin accused university president Lord Stephen Taylor of using "outlandish rhetoric and McCarthyite tactics" in defence of his stand to refuse to negotiate with the students. Cashin pointed out similarities between the situation at Memorial now and the one at Burgeo — a small Newfoundland community — last year. In the latter instance, the NFFAWU fought a bitter battle with fish baron Spencer Lake, and a strike immobilized Lake's fish plant for months. Cashin compared Lake's patronizing attitude, arrogance and domination over the people in Burgeo with Taylor's "paternalistic and colonial attitude" toward students.

Cashin called upon the elected members of the Newfoundland House of Assembly to take action in this situation, saying that "now is the time for a reaffirmation of the principles upon which they were elected."

Meanwhile, students from one of the university residences organized a general meeting of residence students, at which over 90 per cent of the 600 people in attendance voted in support of the idea of a two-day strike by students. Before calling such a strike, the students will hold a general meeting of students Wednesday at one pm to discuss the strike proposal.

If support warrants such action, students will picket the academic buildings and stay away from classes Thursday and Friday, in sympathy with the principle of self determination espoused by the occupying students, and in an attempt to "bring the issue to a head" and force the university to take action to end the stalemate. So far, only the students have shown any willingness to negotiate, the administration has refused to get involved in any negotiations unless the students vacate the building first — a demand the students are not willing to go along with.

Fees hike protest

Trent University students march from Convocation Hall to Queen's Park to hear speakers denounce fees increase.

Monday night, faculty members refused to take a stand on the situation surrounding the occupation, though they did offer to serve as mediators. Students are to vote on this matter tomorrow, while there was no word on whether the administration would be receptive to such an idea. Members of MUNFA (Memorial University of Newfoundland Faculty Association) voted 70-50 against a strongly worded resolution that would have wholeheartedly supported the occupation while sharply criticising the board of regents. MUNFA represents only about 65 per cent of Memorial faculty members.

Regina principal says no to student parity

REGINA (CUP) — John Archer, principal of the University of Saskatchewan's Regina Campus has announced that the university administration will not support students in their struggle to obtain parity on departmental committees.

At a press conference held November 20, Archer said the university's Board of Governors has decided that only department chairmen have the right to change the composition of committees.

Archer would not comment on what steps the university would take to end the occupation of the dean of Arts and Science and the dean of Graduate Studies offices. He did say however, that in his opinion the occupation did not seriously interfere with the functions of the university.

"I believe that students have the right to be involved in decisions made relating to their academic careers and welfare. But I do not think that students pay their fees and come to Regina Campus in order to be given the task of running the university. They come to acquire knowledge and to learn the methods and techniques whereby they may continue to learn," said Archer.

Students occupied the offices after arts and science dean Sir Edgar Vaughan vetoed a motion passed by the social science division making parity compulsory in the division. Six out of eight departments in the division already have parity.

Archer denied any knowledge as to why the university bookstore, registrar's office, bursar's office, a cafeteria and his own office were closed November 20.

A memo circulated amongst the registrar's staff claimed the university could no longer guarantee their safety due to the student occupation.

Students will hold a general meeting today to decide what their next step will be. There is fear amongst the students that the administration will stall until December 6, when Christmas exams begin.

Regina Students' Union president Don Anderson said at Archer's press conference that he will support a move to close down the entire university. Students thus far have refrained from interfering with the academic functions of the university.

The annual convention of the Saskatchewan New Democratic Party held in Saskatoon November 16-19 passed a motion calling for the autonomy of each campus (Regina and Saskatoon) and equal representation of students, faculty and the community on all levels of the university's governing committees.

The occupying students have received messages of support from the Saskatchewan Waffle, the Regina New Democratic Youth Saskatoon Campus Student Union the Regina Allied Printing Trade Council.

The Allied Printing Trade declared in their press release that "the university must be made to serve the needs of the people of Saskatchewan, and until real control of the university lies in the hands of students, the community, and faculty, this shall not be possible."

CEGEP students strike over repressive regulations

MONTREAL (CUP) — Students at Dawson and John Abbot CEGEPs (Community Colleges) have voted to stage a one-day strike between now and December 1 to protest repressive government regulations.

Another CEGEP, Vanier College will make the results of their vote known next Thursday at noon, and French CEGEPs will announce their results Friday.

These developments result from numerous study sessions held by students yesterday and Monday with the full approval and participation, in most cases, of faculty members as well as students.

The strikes have been called by the Front des étudiants du Quebec to protest the Nouveau Regime Pedagogique, which was announced by the ministry of education several weeks ago. The document outlining the regime aims at establishing, among other things, longer hours for humanities students, as well as required science and physical education credits. Two CEGEPs, St Hyacinthe and Alma, in Lac St Jean, have already been on strike for some time over the issues. In both cases, students are in control of their administration offices, bringing the operation of the CEGEPs to a halt.

The Minister of Education, Francois Cloutier, has sent a telegram to the directors general of all CEGEPs, asking them to attend a meeting to be held today. The minister intends to "clarify" what he termed "misunderstandings and abusive interpretations" on the part of both students and faculties.

The FEQ, meanwhile, will hold a regional conference in Montreal this weekend to determine a date for the strike, and to discuss a petition on the Nouveau Regime which is to be circulated shortly.

Meds auditorium use restricted

Because of disruptions last Thursday during a speech by Quebec labour leader Michel Chartrand in the Medical Sciences Building auditorium, U of T will attempt in future to avoid scheduling meetings there.

Campus Co-ordinator Lois Reimer said yesterday that if there is any possibility that extra security for a meeting will be needed, "our first thought will be to get them out."

This would be done "if it looks like there may be trouble," she explained, "only because the Medical Sciences Auditorium is newer and more vulnerable to attack" than other halls.

At the Chartrand speech, in which he explained his endorsement of the Palestinian liberation struggle, several Jewish people scuffled with campus police after continually disrupting the meeting.

Reimer admitted that the auditorium had only two entrances, but still maintained it was a vulnerable building.

The auditorium is the second building on campus to be protected by the administration by avoiding letting it be used for meetings. Convocation Hall, after two meetings in 1970-71 were violently disrupted by the Edmund Burke Society (now the Western Guard), was prohibited from use by groups if there was any danger of violence.

The most recent instance of protection of Convocation Hall was two weeks ago, when Black Panther Bobby Seale was forced to speak in the Faculty of Education auditorium, which has a capacity of less than 600, instead of the 1763-seat Convocation Hall.

Reimer maintained that Convocation Hall is also particularly vulnerable to attack, although she conceded that the Faculty of Education Building at Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue has at least as many entrances and was renovated only three or four years ago.

She also said that the Chartrand meeting would have been moved elsewhere had the university known in time both that Chartrand was speaking and that disruption threats existed.

"There seems to have been some breakdown in communication" between the university's room allocation department and the Arab Students Federation which sponsored the meeting, she said.

The federation did not say what the auditorium would be used for in applying for it, although the reason for use is required, she stated. The university later got the impression that it was to be used for a film showing, and only last Monday discovered Chartrand would be speaking.

When rumours of disruption threats were discovered Wednesday afternoon, Reimer said it was too late to move the meeting's location.

But under a clause in the room allocation contract requiring meeting sponsors to pay for any security the university deem necessary, the federation was charged for approximately half the eight U of T policeman assigned to watch over the meeting.

Don't speed mail by lower pay, cutting jobs

Only two days after it got a temporary injunction forcing striking Toronto mail drivers back to work, the post office published full page ads in the local dailies proudly heralding the arrival of its newest wonder toy: postal codes.

Use of the code, they tell us, is going to speed our mail along efficiently and quickly. (They offer no explanation, however, about why all the various miracle drugs the Trudeau government has prescribed for Canada's postal problems have only worsened the situation. Remember the good old days — pre-penny pinching days — when the mail used to be relatively reliable? As for the code itself, the post office glibly passes over all the problems the new system (the third different attempt at coding mail in recent years) will cause, including probable confusion between letters and numbers that look approximately the same.)

The post office ads don't point out, moreover, why they're really introducing use of the codes: implementing the new system with its rapid, automatic sorting equipment will mean the government can eliminate jobs and save money.

Although the post office is denying imminent worker lay-offs following introduction of the code, it's been reluctant to put that in writing. And, they admit to planning to relocate some mail sorters to a new, lower-paying job category because their new sorting equipment will simplify the workers' jobs.

Only a government indifferent to the plight of its citizens would reduce employment at a time when unemployment is steadily climbing, having already reached intolerable heights. Similarly, there can be no excuse for cutting wages while the cost-of-living continues its upward climb.

Automation, the government seems to forget, was touted not as a way to cut costs but as the means by which workers could be freed from their alienating jobs and provided with greater leisure time. Efficiency does not mean depriving people of their livelihood or increasing the hardships under which they exist.

The postal union is, naturally, resisting the cuts. As of yet, the government has refused to concede the point, which may well be the key issue in this year's negotiations between the post office and its employees. Until the matter is resolved, the workers are asking the public not to use the codes, which themselves will not become mandatory until early 1974.

Complying with their request may slightly inconvenience you (actually, all it'll do is not speed up your mail). More importantly, by aligning yourself with the postal workers, you'll be showing the government that — apparently having not already learned this lesson from last month's federal election — the people of Canada aren't ready to tolerate unemployment and cost-cutting at any price.

If that isn't enough to convince the post office to abandon its money-saving manoeuvre, postal workers may once again have to strike to make it clear that their jobs shouldn't be the price of increased efficiency. Already, Toronto postal drivers have struck — only to be quickly forced back to their jobs by a temporary injunction — to indicate their dissatisfaction with the slow pace of talks between the government and the postal union, talks which have been dragging on for months and months.

In the past, the government and its media buddies have ganged up on the post office workers when they have to resort to strike action, stirring up public hostility about any interruption in mail service and dishonestly placing the full blame for any strikes on the union.

It's an argument that sells easily. People rely on getting their daily quota of mail goodies and they don't stop to rationalize their resentful feelings when they miss getting their mail.

(Anyway, the government is not really upset about the interruption in household mail — they were the people who eliminated Saturday mail, you'll recall —, it's the inconvenience to government, business, and industry that bothers them.)

Even granted the minor bother not getting mail may cause the public, there is no legitimate reason to deny the post office workers the same rights most other workers have. Should they suffer so that a hardened government can get away with unfair work practices?

A new way to really get your mail moving: Postal Codes.

If you haven't already received it, in the next few days you'll be getting your new Postal Code in the mail. It's not very exciting to look at. But it is very necessary. And it's really not as complicated as it looks.

After two years of studying the systems of most of the countries of the world, here's how we developed Postal Codes for Canada.

The map sequence on the right shows just how accurate Postal Codes are.

Posties ask Ontario labour to boycott codes

OTTAWA (CUP) — Canada's postal workers are asking support from local labour affiliates of the Ontario Federation of Labour in a campaign to boycott use of postal codes until the government settles a dispute with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW).

The dispute revolves around the Post Office Department's use of sorting equipment that replaces workers, and its unilateral decision to introduce a new classification for workers running the machines at a lower wage scale. The workers now get $2.69 per hour, a rate 75 cents lower than the one they were accustomed to.

The union wants people to stop using the new 6-digit mailing code on their letters until management settles the dispute.

Cause of the fight is the Post Office's drive for mechanization of the mail service, supposedly to increase efficiency. The use of two machines is central to the dispute.

The Bell-ITT Sorter was the first machine introduced into the sorting process. It is a two-stage machine.

The sorted first class mail is fed into the first stage of the machine and passes an operator. As the letter passes, the operator reads the code on the envelope, activates the keys of the coding machine which imprints the code with fluorescent dye on the envelope.

The mail is then sorted by the machine's second stage which reads the dye code by electric eye.

Once the dye is on, mail can be run through any machine in the country. About $75 million worth of these sorters are in use in Canada.

The Post Office has now introduced a new machine that will eliminate the operator. It is an Optic Scanner (OCR) which can electronically read a code typed on an envelope, automatically dye code the letter, and so the final sorting.

The Post Office has $25 million worth of this equipment.

It claims there will be no lay-offs, but no such written agreement has been signed.

The union has protested the Post Office's unilateral decision to create a new position at a lower wage to run the sorting machine. The union was not consulted and wants the position abolished with the workers receiving the same wage as before.

William Kidd, national director of education for the CUPW says the union wants written agreements with the Post Office guaranteeing no lay-offs because of technological change.

"An old Nova Scotia unionist once said verbal agreements aren't worth the paper they are written on," Kidd quipped during an interview.

The postal code system is already in operation in eastern Ontario, southern Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan. The Post Office plans to have it operational in the rest of Canada by 1974.

A CUPW spokesman has charged that a senior International Telephone and Telegraph (ITT) official was recently appointed to a senior position in the Post Office department. The department is now buying ITT equipment.

York U budget crisis eases

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — Projections made earlier this fall of a $4.1 million deficit for York University have proved unfounded, a committee studying the situation discovered.

A "crisis committee" reported to the university's Senate that instead, the university will be only $750,000 (net) in the red.

A "crisis committee" reported to the university's senate that enrollment miscalculations, financial confusion and panic in the administration have been blamed for the massive error.

York president David Slater said last week he knew throughout the confusion that the deficit was only about one million dollars.

"There was confusion over net and gross input and output," he explained.

Vice-president T. W. Olson admitted that outdated figures and incomplete data were used in making the first projection of the deficit last spring.

"It was basically a poor presentation of the case," he said.

The crisis committee was set up after mathematics professor P. Rajagopal three weeks ago disputed the administration's estimate of the deficit.

It found that the real deficit will be $1,057,000 on York's $41 million budget. However, about $350,000 of this can be covered for by last year's surplus.

Over the 300 Basic Income Units, grants from the provincial government on a per student basis, worth almost $600,000 were discovered by the committee that had been "lost" in a computer.

The university has already chopped over five million dollars from its budget, by carrying out administration, maintenance and academic budget cuts. Faculty fear further decreases in their numbers when the last $750,000 is made up.

Ottawa concludes Meszaros case, orders Marxist professor deported

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — The Immigration Appeal Board last week ordered Marxist professor Istvan Meszaros deported, concluding several weeks of closed inquiries and deliberations into his alleged illegal entry to Canada.

Meszaros will appeal his case. His lawyer, Paul Copeland, said yesterday that this may take several years. "At present, there is a backlog of 8,000 such appeals and the department processes about 1,000 applications a year," Copeland added.

Meszaros, hired by York University to teach undergraduate and graduate political philosophy courses, applied from England for entry to Canada last July. He was refused for "security reasons".

The Immigration Board has charged that Meszaros entered the country illegally in September in order to re-apply as an immigrant from within the country. He wasn't a true visitor as he had claimed, officials said.

Copeland said this argument illustrated one of the basic points of the case. "We argued that an employee of the Minister of Immigration shouldn't be deciding the case."

In spite of the decision, Meszaros can still be granted immigrant status on humanitarian grounds. Copeland said the government, however, could prevent this if they issue a security certificate against Meszaros.

"And, if they do that, there's going to be a whole can of worms opened at the appeal."

If they don't issue the certificate, Copeland said this would prove that the government didn't consider Meszaros the security risk they claimed he is.

Ward 6 hopefuls oppose end to playground

By JONI SEAGER

Four aldermanic candidates at a Ward 6 all-candidates meeting last week opposed the planned construction of a row of stores where a children's play-ground now exists at the Married Students' Residence at 35 Charles St. W.

Revenue Properties Corporation is seeking Ontario Housing Corporation approval of its plans to build the row of stores and put the playground on its roof. The plan would block off daylight from a day nursery on the first floor.

Ward 5 alderman Bill Archer said, "It is important that facilities provided here for students should include facilities for children."

"It is important what they will do with the green space here," he added. It is important not just for children, but for everyone."

"I don't mind saying that I'm all for what you want as it relates to the nursery," said Ward 6 alderman June Marks. "You really have two choices," she told the tenants. "You could try to buy back the option from OHC, but then you are talking about at least $250,000 plus."

"The other choice is to encourage the U of T to take this over as a university building." (The building is owned by Ontario Student Housing Corporation, although the university does control admissions policy.)

The other Ward 6 alderman, Horace Brown, stated, "I believe that putting stores in there would be a shame." He went on to say that "I don't think that OSHC has a very good case at all."

He emphasized that City Hall,

"can be beaten."

Dan Heap, who has fought in many citizens' group battles against City Hall, advised the tenants to "insist publicly that you have a right to full family accommodation here."

He added that "I'm glad that you are pushing for family dwellings here. I will give you any support I can in protecting the playground facilities here."

One member of the audience asked why Toronto developments are consistently ugly.

Archer explained, "Our problem is the very minimal control we (City Council) have over what happens with buildings in Toronto."

Brown commented, "There are many buildings which I call cereal boxes. We did ask the province for architectural control, but nothing came of it."

All four candidates maintained was found satisfactory.

The university's labour relations manager, John Parker, two weeks ago rejected a grievance filed by the union asking that Owen be reinstated. He said he found no evidence of union activity being a factor in the firing.

Owen then asked his local to take the matter to arbitration, the next step in processing a grievance.

A special meeting of the local last Wednesday on two day's notice, voted 13-2 against taking it any further.

Some disagreement at the meeting arose because a few members, while conceding they would lose, wanted the case taken as far as it could.

throughout the meeting that the city is for people. However, a summary of voting records distributed at the meeting, taken from the magazine City Hall, showed that the three incumbents often vote against citizens' groups.

Marks, Archer and Brown voted in favour of the developers in issues such as the Quebec-Gothic development, Metro Center and West St. James Town.

The summary revealed that Marks voted consistently for development, for traffic downtown and against supporting citizen groups. Archer voted the same way 78 per cent of the time, and Brown 70 per cent.

Heap emphasized the development problem. "Toronto has become polarized between perhaps half a dozen super large developers and most of the rest of the people who need a place to live.

"We have become captives of these developers" who are demanding "monopoly prices," he said. "It is the large developers who call the tune in our council."

Baton Rouge massacre

David Dugan - The Vidette/LSU

By Canadian University Press
BATON ROUGE — The flurry of pro- and anti-segregationist killing of two black students at Southern University on Thursday studiously glossed over the events leading up to the murders.

Any analytical account would have to begin with the uprising which was the result of deep-seated grievances which commanded the support of students and faculty.

The actions were aimed against a system of administration ruled with little student input, a president with little powers, and campus facilities which were grossly inadequate.

On November 1, Southern University closed the Baton Rouge campus after a week of protests against the State Board of Education's refusal to meet the students' most important demands.

The demands included, among others, the resignation of Netterville and vice-president, Emmett "Bo" Nettles, and asked that their successors be selected by a "student executive council" composed of two representatives from each member or administrator. Under the new system, the president chooses his own successor.

Student grievances over the two-year tenure of the State Board of Education's policy of giving the president complete control over the operation of the universities. Netterville reportedly ran the system as a "complete monarchy" and refused to retire before the retirement age, Netterville's authority over hiring and firing of staff.

Students on the predominantly white campus of Netterville and Bashful "Uncle Tom" Nettles in the New Orleans and Baton Rouge areas have been active over the past few years. Three years ago, a Black Panther shoot-out resulted in the death of a student on the part of local militants.

Local feelings against the Panther Party and the convictions of blacks frequent — even the out-of-state Panthers have appeared in the area to assist the Southern students.

While rejecting the key demands of the State Board of Education did approve the maintenance of the campus and in the meantime. The Board had originally refused to meet the students' large march on the capital persuaded the Board to meet.

Immediately after Netterville's resignation, the campus that day, students on the Netterville campus a sympathy strike and occupied the building. Militant students ejected all newsmen from the building and hoisted the black flag of liberation to the top of the flagpole.

Other colleges around the state have also taken similar actions.

Students at the virtually all-black Grambling University in Ruston staged a strike and class boycott. The boycott was 30 per cent effective, according to administration sources.

Student organizers of the Grambling strike presented the administration with a list of grievances which included a lack of student voice in the decision-making, the administration-imposed dress code, the lack of adequate medical facilities, and the lack of an effective telephone system. Administrators met with a committee of students and agreed to work together to solve some of the complaints.

Students, meanwhile, continuing their strike, marched to the dining hall where they tossed tables through windows, went to the student union building where they broke more windows, took over the women's dormitory, blockaded campus streets, burned the state and federal flags, and destroyed the press boxes on the football field. A hundred and fifty state troopers used mace to disperse the students. The administration tried to keep classes open, imposing a 10:30 pm curfew on the campus.

With the National Guard standing by throughout the state, a member of the all-white, all-male Board of Education said November 6 that the Board "cannot allow revolutionaries to dictate policies to our schools....immediate action is a must."

On November 9, the action came, but not the way this gentlemen anticipated.

Louisiana governor Edwin Edwards gave the students in New Orleans until 1 pm to vacate the administration building or be evicted "by whatever means necessary". State police and National Guardsmen stood by, out of sight.

Some 90 minutes after the deadline had passed, administrators met with the governor and emerged from the meeting with the resignation of vice-president Bashful.

Vice-president for 14 years, Bashful said he hoped his resignation would avoid any confrontations between students and the police "that might result in loss of lives".

The governor said university officials had been reluctant to ask for Bashful's resignation, but Bashful was determined the action "would be best for the university."

The 150 students inside the building then left with fists clenched high in the black power salute, to the applause of their fellow students. But, they vowed to continue a classroom boycott until all further demands are met.

"If Dr. Bashful had not resigned, we were prepared to move them out this afternoon," the governor said. "We are very grateful to resolve this without any damage to property and injury to persons."

The students also secured "academic amnesty" for themselves and the 9,000 students at the Baton Rouge campus which was still shut down.

Other concessions won included city bus service direct to the New Orleans campus, authority for student audits of the university's financial records and improved campus medical services.

The strike continued up to November 16 when students entered the administration building at Baton Rouge. Police ordered them to leave and advanced on the building. Police claim a bomb was thrown at them, resulting in a 10 minute, confused melee in which police hurled tear gas at the crowd of students outside.

When it was all over, two students lay dead of gunshot wounds in the head and shoulder. Police claimed no officer discharged a weapon during the confusion, but Edwards later said some officers may have mistakenly put buckshot-filled shells in their shot-guns instead of the tear gas cartridges they were supposed to carry.

Police officials, however, had admitted earlier their men carried live ammunition, although they denied it had been used. No weapons were found in the building or outside.

Leaders of the student protest movement charged at a news conference November 17 they had been "set up" to be killed in the confrontation.

They said they were told by Netterville to wait in his office until he returned from a meeting and could talk to them. Authorities said they moved because the students were occupying the building.

To avenge the killings, students set fire to three university buildings that day.

In the aftermath, Edwards warned that the state would restore order to the two Southern University campuses when they re-open Monday following the American Thanksgiving weekend, even if he has to station the National Guard on the campuses.

And, Netterville has fired two professors accused of counselling the students. In letters sent to physics department chairman Joseph Johnson and assistant engineering professor George Baker Junior, the university president said that by advising the students the faculty had helped disrupt the university's normal activities.

The American Association of University Professors criticized the firings. It also opposed any settlement that would give students a role in academic decisions.

Governor Edwards has denied a Los Angeles Times report that he plans to dismiss Netterville for being out of touch with students and accede to all student demands short of allowing a student take-over of the university. The paper, which stands by its report despite Edwards' denial, says the governor added that he welcomes student participation in running of the university.

Louisiana attorney-general William Guste Monday announced establishment of a commission to probe the Southern University killings. Six blacks, six whites, and two students will sit on it.

Cites reformist economic trends

No revolution in Tanzania, charges prof

By BOB BETTSON

"Tanzania needs a more comprehensive socialist policy", contended John Saul, a Canadian professor who just returned from Tanzania.

"There has been too little attempt to restructure the economy."

Saul, speaking last Thursday at a seminar on socialism in Tanzania, stated that "many important economic choices have been pre-empted. Incalculable damage has been done by Scandinavian advisors."

"The redistribution of income has been more randomly than systematically achieved," he added. "There have been too few radical risks taken. Economic revolution has been pre-empted by reformism.

This started when there was compensation for the nationalization program in 1967."

Saul stated that Tanzania was caught between the capitalist and socialist worlds and ran the risk of stagnation.

"There are ambiguities in the role of the petit bourgeoisie as leaders of the economy," he said. "People have got to keep an eye on the elite."

"At present there is a struggle between the elements of the petit bourgeoisie in Tanzania", he said. "There is a paradox, in that the elite needs the push of the masses and the masses need leadership."

Saul emphasized that workers participation in the economy is important and charged that the present government has "put down a lot of workers' actions." Workers in Tanzania "have gone on from wage demands to (demands of) workers' control," he added.

"The younger generation in Tanzania is the most articulate in developing a radical ideological perspective. "There have been ambiguous results", he stated. "Che Che, a radical student newspaper, has been banned."

Saul conceded that Tanzania was making a real attempt to control the privileged elements of society. "They have handled the Asians differently by collectivizing the small business sector."

"(Tanzanian president Julius Nyerere has attempted to root out tribalism and racialist tendencies," he said. "He has tried to strengthen the party (Tanzanian African National Union) by encouraging them to think through ideology."

Tanzania is in a marginal position in international capitalism, he stated. "It has experienced less of the development of underdevelopment. The lack of certain skills has necessitated more creati-

ty. TANU's political development is linked to popular aspirations."

Saul stated that Nyerere's role in the development of socialism in Tanzania can't be underestimated. "Without him there would be less opportunity for progressive changes."

Civic governments face crisis: alderman

By VAL ROSS

Metro Toronto and other civic governments face an uncertain future, according to Ward 9 alderman Reid Scott at last week's "Noon on the Square" forum at Holy Trinity Church.

"The Spadina decision shattered the Metro transportation plan, and significantly affected our whole concept of Metro," said Scott. "It will be some time before Metro recovers."

Although opposed to the Spadina Expressway, Scott is concerned that the provincial government has too much influence in municipal government. Premier Bill Davis' decision to stop the Spadina in June, 1971, outraged many Metro politicians.

Scott agreed with Arthur Kennedy, retired chairman of the Ontario Municipal Board, that the OMB should have its powers reduced. The OMB is a provincially established body with powers to review city governments' decisions involving rezoning or expenditures which require borrowing. Although the board did not turn down the Spadina, it has upset many with its decisions in favour of citizens' groups over developers.

Scott feels that municipal decision-making power should be redistributed to give more voice to the federal and local levels. He mentioned Alderman David Rotenberg's idea of neighbourhood planning boards as an example of how citizens could be more involved in municipal decision-making.

Asked how he would facilitate communication between the three levels of government, Scott proposed a permanent tri-level conference among federal, provincial and local governments on urban issues.

"We must face the problem of the realignment of power to the cities," he said. "The cities are in bad shape financially. We need a tax redistribution, for example... but in Canada, these changes won't come overnight."

Scott was a federal NDP MP from 1962 to 1968 for Danforth riding, prior to which he had been an MPP at Queens' Park. He has been alderman for Ward 9 since 1969.

Man barred from running in Spadina may appeal case to Supreme Court

A man who was barred from running in Spadina riding in the federal election will appeal the case to the Supreme Court if necessary, even though he could never become a Member of Parliament because he refuses to swear allegiance to the Queen.

Zoltan Szoboszlai, a self-styled traffic summons consultant

(retired), was planning to run in Spadina until he was told to swear allegiance to Queen Elizabeth when he filed his nomination papers. Spadina returning officer Terrance Mott refused to accept the nomination.

He has said that when he left Hungary to come to Canada he went from "the Iron Curtain to the Limey Curtain."

Szoboszlai lost a court battle to force Mott to accept his nomination a few days before the election.

This week, he will appeal the ruling at the Federal Court of Appeal, arguing that the queen is a "paranoid illusion".

"The only queens in Canada are the bikini queens and dairy queens", he said.

His earlier argument was that the British North America Act setting up Canada was never ratified by Canadians. Thus he thought the Canada Elections Act was illegal.

Szoboszlai claims that he would have swept the riding had he been allowed to run. He said the English voters would have given him his greatest support because they must also hate England, or else they would not have emigrated.

He was barred from running for the mayor of Toronto in 1969 because he was neither a Canadian citizen nor British subject. One must swear allegiance to the Queen to become a Canadian citizen.

Election info centre set up

A municipal election information and reference centre has been set up until the December 4 election by an Innis course in conjunction with SAC and Innis College.

The centre is on the main floor of Innis College at 63 St. George Street. SAC has provided $500 to cover advertising and two phones (928-5456), open from 9 am to 9 pm.

Instructions on advance polls and voting procedure and a complete list of all candidates in each riding is available at the centre. Students may also obtain information and sign up to work for any candidate.

Most of the information is from various city newspapers and pamphlets of the candidates.

About 35 students are involved in organizing, contacting candidates and working in the centre.

Crombie fights anonymity to become mayor

By PAUL McGRATH

David Crombie is number two and trying harder, but everyone's wondering if he can get to the number one spot held by Tony O'Donohue in time for December 4: the day that may make or break his career in city politics.

Crombie has been criticized for running for mayor of Toronto after only one term as alderman, and junior alderman (for North Toronto's Ward 11) at that, and his relative lack of public visibility may have resulted in his being well behind leader O'Donohue, according to some polls. Others show his Ward 11 aldermanic mate David Rotenberg as ahead of him.

The Globe and Mail has endorsed him, but his campaign machine still has a difficult task with less than two weeks left to hard-sell the straightforward "concerned" Crombie approach over O'Donohue's "gee whiz" Irish family politics and Rotenberg's normally hard, but quickly liberalizing views.

Three weeks ago today, out from under the shadow of the federal election, the Crombie campaign began officially at a liquid press conference upstairs in the headquarters in the oldest standing building on Yonge Street, near Rosedale Subway Station.

The office is a constant confused flow of people of every description, from students to old-age pensioners, but with many from North Toronto.

"Mayor Crombie" signs shout from more corners of the city every day. The signs are instrumental in winning the battle of getting Crombie's name known around Toronto in an aggressive manner, as his campaigner felt that lack of knowledge of Crombie was the biggest obstacle to overcome.

He's the youngest of the candidates at 36, and only a three-year veteran of City Council. And he has certainly been overshadowed by limelighters like O'Donohue and Rotenberg, both senior alderman, (and thus Metro Councillors) and City Executive Committee members.

The sign campaign of Crombie's is the most media-conscious and visually attractive of the three, with Crombie looking extremely aggressive in his black pin-stripe suit.

He has many supporters from people in artistic, musical and theatrical fields, in an effort to both gain political support from a certain portion of the community, and fund-raising. Harold Town prints drawn especially for the campaign are selling for only $50. A benefit for the campaign at Town Hall last night had various musical and theatrical people in attendance, including the rock group Lighthouse.

Two questions in this campaign come to mind, as in all political campaigns that use public entertainment figures for political support. Why are these people so influential, and what makes them any more politically knowledgeable than a worker in Cabbagetown?

Crombie has been labelled the only "reform" candidate running for mayor, and if reform means redirection of priorities, it appears this is true in the case of the three strongest candidates.

He is opposed to the "higher, faster and larger" approach to politics regarded highly by the Old Guard at City Hall. Mayor Bill Denison is on his way out, and what appears for the first time in many years is a clear choice between two distinct roads (Crombie and Rotenberg), and one not so distinct (O'Donohue).

"The voting record of the Old Guard gives a good indication of their intentions, and I am diametrically opposed to their view of Toronto's future," says Crombie.

His platform is one that definitely challenges the mainstream of City Hall politics. He feels the big problems to grapple with are development, traffic congestion, political alienation in the city, cooperation between different levels of government and the salvation of the downtown core as a place to live.

"Developers have to be told the facts of life," he says. "I haven't taken a nickel from developers for my campaign. That's because we've got to change the rules they work by and stop giving them hunting licenses. The only development we need is the development the people want," he says.

His voting record and actions on this issue have been consistently on the side of neighbourhood groups. He voted against development in the Quebec-Gothic area and the widening of Wellesley Street. He has mediated disputes between citizens and developers in Trefann Court and the area surrounding the Eaton Centre project.

"Right now the mayor has to stop the shutting-up of Chinatown, the boarding up of Cabbagetown, the chainsawing of the maple trees and the demolition of the great old neighbourhoods," he says.

He sees massive public transportation as a solution to the increasing congestion and pollution, and he's pushing for the Bathurst subway line as a first measure.

"I want a comprehensive transportation system with a shift in focus away from the automobile to attractive and expedient public transport in the inner city, and I will lead that charge," he says.

A further aid in the solution of this problem, he feels, would be staggering working hours, a plan that is gaining wide support in clogged larger cities such as New York.

One of the bigger problems facing any politician is the degree of alienation separating the governing from the governed, because, as Crombie sees it, "once politicians get elected in Toronto, they want people to stay out of the way."

"I won't have it that way," he says. I want to see the Old City Hall as a place for citizen groups, cultural groups and neighbourhood groups." He plans to see that the city government answers to any citizen complaints once a week at a televised open forum from St. Lawrence Centre's Town Hall.

"If I'm going to be in charge, I want to hear the complaints."

The breakdown of communication between different levels of government is another of Crombie's major concerns.

The province and its quasi-judicial body, the Ontario Municipal Board, want the city to have a say in at least how the goodies are wrapped," he says.

Crombie is running on the informal people-over-buildings reform ticket that has gained prominence in the last few years with John Sewell and Karl Jaffary. Ward 7 knights in armour. The situation in City Hall is seen by many, including Crombie, as a good-guy, bad-guy fight with the good guys slowly gaining power and the bad guys slowly dying off.

But considering Denison was at one time considered an angry young radical, who's to say where Crombie will be in a few years? One thing he does hope to prevent is the polarization of personalities in the council.

He has been criticized by Sewell and Jaffary for throwing his hat in the mayoral ring and deserting the lower echelons, where they feel he would have more effect and a better chance of winning a seat on City Council. They see the job of mayor as basically ceremonial and of little importance, because as mayor, Crombie would have still only one vote on council. However, the candidate sees the job differently.

"We don't need an office manager. The mayor sets the tone, establishes priorities, and defines the direction of policy. It's a question of attitude and leadership. A smile and a handshake is not enough."

The biggest problem facing Crombie's campaign is the feeling among the public that the candidate doesn't have enough experience. He's only been in politics on an active level about three years, having been elected in Ward 11 in 1969 on the Civic Action Party (CIVAC) ticket (the same one that got Rotenberg elected in the same ward.) However his political involvement goes back farther than that, as he has been a lecturer for seven years at Ryerson in political science and urban affairs. During his City Hall career he has been chairman of the Public Works Committee and a member of the City Planning Board.

In an interview about two months ago, he said: "It's unusual in the sense that normally when you're there for one term and also at the age of 36, you don't run for mayor, but I don't think either of these points should bespeak a lack of experience for the job."

"We have to take hold right now — two years from now is too late. This is the right time and I feel I am the right man."

The Varsity—Wes Sosnowski

Reform campaigner David Crombie

can at present interfere in some municipal decisions. The cancellation of the Spadina Expressway by Premier Bill Davis raised the ire of many municipal politicians, although Crombie opposed completion of the expressway.

Crombie, like Rotenberg, would be in a good position to help remedy the city's poor relations with Bill Davis' government. He is an active Conservative Party member with excellent connections, although unlike Rotenberg, he is one of the "new wave" Tories.

Crombie feels there is not enough guidance from the city to show the other governments what is required in the city.

"I love the so-called goodies Ottawa and Queen's Park want to give us every so often—like CARE packages at election time — but I

No science policy in Canada, says Solandt

By LINDA HALL

The realization that "there is no such thing as a national science policy" in Canada emerged as the real consensus of the Science Council of Canada, said O. M. Solandt, former chairman of the council on Monday.

Speaking to an audience of about 70 in a Sidney Smith Hall classroom, Solandt, former chancellor of U of T, said "I am doubtful if there is such a thing as science policy". The use of science policy cannot be designated independently, he said.

Canada needs "an attitude that will pervade the policies of the government," Solandt suggested.

Science and technology, he said, is "man's most powerful single tool. He always uses it, often un-knowingly." If science is used "consciously, intelligently and carefully, we will progress faster towards our goals."

Solandt listed six areas designated in the 1960's by the science council as requiring government action. These included space, water, transportation, urban problems, computer and data management, and aid to developing countries.

Those priorities should remain unchanged today, Solandt suggested, but with greater emphasis on environmental concerns.

Health care, development of the north, energy supplies for the future, integrated resource management and oceans were given second priority rating by the science council.

Solandt rejected protective tariffs for high technology industry in Canada because they make it profitable for foreign companies to establish Canadian subsidiaries using foreign expertise. He advocated an alternative system used in Japan, which prohibits importation of a product until an industry becomes strong and then opens the market completely.

"The trouble with Canada's high technology industry is a poor technological base in the country," Solandt said. He criticized Canadians for depending on U.S. experts to deal with technological problems.

The work of the science council has given Canadians "a growing realization of the importance of science and technology in their lives and a growing understanding of how it works" Solandt said. He said an "anti-science feeling" can arise if people do not understand how science works, but "we are remarkably free of that in Canada".

Solandt also credited the Science Council with establishing the concept of "major programs." A problem area is defined and people in the field from government, industry and universities are called together to work out a program to deal with it.

'Justify course choice': faculty reformers

By ELAINE KAHN

Students should perhaps be responsible for justifying the coherence of their degree programs sometime during their university careers, according to a brief presented by the Faculty Reform Caucus to the committee evaluating the New Program. The committee is expected to release its report at the end of February.

The Faculty Reform Caucus is a group of liberally-minded faculty who originally banded together in 1970 to oppose the anti-parity (students with faculty) stand of conservative faculty.

Coherence of a student's program is one of the caucus' major concerns with the New Program.

Though the brief supports the idea of free course choice, it gives detailed suggestions for ensuring coherence, such as using Old Program structures for a degree, thematic approaches and interdisciplinary courses at the college level. It suggests that students take four to seven innovative courses in four-year programs.

Increased and more competent counselling in making a program choice should be made available to the students.

However, the brief suggests that the "shopping period" at the beginning of the year, in which students can "shop around" before making final course decisions until mid-October, should be reduced to two weeks.

The calendar should be made into "an expertly designed information system", to increase its usefulness to students.

To improve teaching methods, the brief suggests that the Faculty of Arts and Science set up "a small commission, office, secretariat or resource centre" to pool ideas on teaching techniques, exchange views among department and "establish seminars, conferences and mini-courses on teaching."

The brief's discussion of evaluation notes that "There is no subject in the terms of reference of the PAC on the New Program on which debate will generate more heat and less light than the question of evaluation and standards.

In a letter appended to the brief, the caucus said it hoped that "... great caution will be exercised in attributing a causal role to the New Program with respect to any statistical trends which may be detected..." of higher marks. Changes in enrolment was cited as a factor which could influence those statistics.

The brief also contended that "standards can and should be safeguarded by the instructor, the department, the Academic Standards Committee and the students. Students will 'vote with their feet' against those who would debase the coinage of their certificates," it claims.

The brief also contended that the free choice of courses in a New Program, which it says is nearly a credit system, should go to its logical conclusion and become a credit instead of year system.

Knox defeats Innis 5-4 in Div II lacrosse

Knox stayed ahead of Innis long enough to defeat the team 5-4 Monday evening and win the Division II lacrosse championship.

Scoring for Knox were Benn with three and Pandy with two, while Boyd counted three and Waller one for Innis.

The game was cleanly played with only two penalties going to each team. Shooting was often sporadic but Knox led 2-0 going into the third period. Innis gradually picked up on the second half of the game and Knox was twice threatened in the second half with only a one goal lead. Innis scored two of its goals on breakway plays, both times with a team member out serving a penalty.

In Division I PHE A defeated Erindale 10-9 last night in a game marred by fighting. The game was the first in a best of three series for the championship.

Fighting between the two teams has been a recurrent problem during the season and both PHE and Erin have been warned. Last night PHE A's Bullock and Erin's Sorichetti were barred from further play for the remainder of the year. Sorichetti's conduct will come up before the Intramural Sports Committee. He received two penalties in addition to the game misconduct.

When both teams weren't knocking each other around, they put on a good display of playoff lacrosse. Scoring for PHE were J.

Brown with 6 goals while M. MacNeil added three, and L. Broderick popped in the other. For Erindale it was D. Michie with four, R. Johnson and J. Geraghty with two each, and D. Ward with a single. The referees handed out five penalties to PHE and six to Erindale.

The second game will be played in Hart House at 6:30 pm Thursday.

Innis' Boyd fires in one of three goals Monday but Knox stayed ahead to win.

Soccer, rugby, touch football playoffs

The Division II soccer final playoff game between New and Med will be played this afternoon at 2 pm in the stadium. In games last Thursday New eliminated UC 3-1 while Med defeated Law 4-3 on overtime played two scoreless ten minute overtime periods and then went into sudden death scoring chances, with Med scraping by on a one goal margin.

The Division III soccer title was won by Forestry last Friday when the team defeated Eng III 6-1. Scoring for Forestry were W. Sarafyn and J. Duncanson with two each, while M. Crewal and J. Mason added singles; J. Trist scored Eng III's lone goal.

Scar defeated PHE A 6-0 Monday to gain the interfaculty rugby championship. Last Thursday

PHE A defeated Law 9-0. Scoring for PHE was Brian Pettie with a try and Randy Filinski with a penalty goal and a convert. Last Friday Trin A lost to Scar at Seaborough.

In semi-final touch football last Thursday, Arrythmia and Jocks defeated their opponents and advanced to the finals. In the first of three final games for the championship Arrythmia defeated Jocks 13-6 yesterday in overtime; for Arrythmia it was G. Tennebaum with a touchdown and single and B. Seherman with six more points. Seitz scored six for Jocks.

In games last week Jocks defeated Tachyurs 18-0, while Gofers lost to Arrythmia 20-6.

The second game in the best of three series between Arrythmia and Jocks will be played tomorrow afternoon on the back campus field, while the third game (if necessary) is scheduled for Friday.

Jock and Jill in Toronto

by David Whitson
reprinted from Community Schools

A female athlete who represented Canada at the Munich Olympics has been unable to represent her school in Ontario university track competitions, because the women's athletic department has yet to respond to repeated requests by herself and other interested girls that the university enter a team in the QUAA events.

At an east Toronto high school with a population of 300 boys and 1400 girls, the boys athletic program is allotted about $300 more than the girls' activities.

At a west Toronto junior public school two girls who wished to participate in a staff-student baseball game were discouraged. Although female staff were taking part, the girls were told that "Baseball isn't really a game for girls," that "Girls can't catch well enough and it would spoil the game," and, finally, that, although they played ball at recess and even during gym classes, "Girls shouldn't be playing in a REAL game like this." They were advised to come and watch and cheer for their friends.

The above anecdotes reflect some traditional attitudes about the place of vigorous physical activity in the life of a young "lady" which have inhibited many girls from enjoying athletics in the caretaker fashion that is deemed natural for boys.

The attitude that all-out physical play is "unladylike", especially when it might lead to body contact, still prevails in many quarters. Even when robust play is acknowledged as healthy, the association of COMPETITIVE drive with masculinity creates problems for the girl who wants to take part in the "real" games of organized sport, or who expresses any commitment to long-term athletic goals.

Not only is the serious female athlete likely to be considered unfeminine among her peers and associates but she often encounters severe limitations on her access to facilities and competitive opportunities.

Athletic programs for boys and girls have been normally conducted on a separate basis, and this has rarely been claimed to be separate but equal. Mary Keyes of McMaster University recently told a Women's Athletic Workshop at York University that,

The general pattern of separate facilities, separate programs, separate organizations for sports is symptomatic of the distinction between sexual poses and social roles within the society.

If we really begin to treat sport as something that's beneficial to human beings, then this whole parallel separate structure is somewhat ridiculous in terms of servicing the needs of human beings.

Community Schools attempted to find out whether the Toronto Board is acknowledging that to enjoy athletic participation and competition, to simply enjoy the sensation of one's body performing with rhythm and power, is equally natural for both boys and girls, and is encouraging them to enjoy these experiences together.

We talked with teachers and students in public and secondary schools, as well as with some of the physical education consultants whose job it is to suggest philosophical guidelines and help the schools implement them.

We talked about co-educational phys. ed. at all levels, co-educational health, the different kind of socialization inherent in such an approach and the readiness for this among students, teachers, and the community.

It was asserted that in most elementary schools, mixed phys. ed. is a long-established fact, because the classroom teacher takes his or her class to the gym or yard all together. Too often, though, this has meant that the teacher, whose own acquaintance with physical education is limited to the more popular team sports, has the whole class playing one such game.

Without alternatives and often without preparatory sessions of skill building, such games become dominated by the more skilled boys who ridicule and embarrass the girls and the less co-ordinated boys. In this atmosphere neither boys nor girls learn to enjoy games together.

A much more promising type of program was instituted at Dewson School this year by Wally Nahimiak, who is handling all that school's phys. ed. At the same time that he integrated the program, he moved away from traditional competitive team games with their potential for rough play and embarrassment of the weaker players.

The activities concentrate on building individual skills and co-ordination, and challenge the individual to improve his or her own skill level. Boys and girls appear equally enthusiastic about this new (to them) kind of class.

At Forest Hill Collegiate health education and every other aspect of the program appear to be traditionally male sports, and take part without self-consciousness. Nor do the boys appear to feel the activity is spoiled in any way; the game is played in a normal fashion without the special rules and concessions which evoked complaint from a boy at another school.

Girls and boys who do not enjoy this kind of competitive activity can choose options like archery or yoga, and the atmosphere in the department appears to be such that the students would feel no sexual stigma attached to the choices they made.

"Every activity has its place and its value," says Mr. Satsbury, the male department head, and male and female students are encouraged to develop their own skills in whatever sports interest them, and to enjoy doing this together. This is reinforced by men coaching women and vice-versa. The success of the program is evidenced by the fact that in Grade 12, when their own prestige or that of the school was threatened by the fact that Forest Hill did not field a football team this year.

It is because I cannot imagine this sort of equanimity in many other physical education departments, that I doubt whether the quality of experience for the individual student that I sensed at Forest Hill is or will be achieved elsewhere in the near future.

A truly successful co-educational program involves a profound re-socialization. It hinges on everyone involved coming to think of and treat athletic competition as first and most importantly a struggle with oneself, a struggle to develop to the limit of one's own physical potential, a struggle which is equally enjoyable and natural to both men and women, and which is in fact completely irrelevant to sexual identity.

To achieve this one must be consistent throughout the entire program. The contradictions are evident to students in a program which tries to encourage these kinds of attitudes during physical education classes, and at the same time at least tacitly encourages the same boys to go to any lengths of aggression to win a football game after school.

When the most widely publicized and heavily funded aspect of the program equates masculinity with competitive success as the Vince Lombardi tough-guy, "jock" image explicitly does, the message comes through clearly and neither boys nor girls can feel completely free to approach sport in a healthy manner, as a personal quest.

Consultants say they want to increase co-educational programs at all levels and they point to schools that are involved in these kinds of programs as models to be copied elsewhere in the system. They are proud of the steps made in these schools, and I think that they and the teachers involved have a right to be.

It might be remembered, however, that alongside Forest Hill there are many high schools where the men feel quite comfortable with the jock image and the women must accept a small share of the budget while they encourage their girls to sit on the sidelines of the playing field and cheer their men on, as they are encouraged to do in so many other areas of their lives.

It must also be remembered that between Oster and Earl Grey, which are making strides towards co-educational health, there is one senior school where an all-girl health class was warned this fall that men still prefer virgins and another (Kent) which has yet to desegregate its entrances, much less its phys. ed. classes.

In discussing these differences and the obstacles to more rapid or widespread change, the consultants referred to entrenched tradition and the social climate of which the schools are only a part.

Traditions, however, can last only as long as those concerned acquiesce in accepting them, and physical educators can be an important force for change in this area, if they so choose. Unfortunately, many physical educators who have been raised as jocks enjoy the separate empires created by segregated programs, and accept as natural the sexual stereotypes which their programs then continue to reinforce.

Newer ideas are becoming more acceptable in some circles, but if a different kind of socialization, which treats sport as a human rather than male or female experience, is to gain any momentum, they will have to be disrespectful of tradition.

If not, traditional programs and traditional social attitudes have a way of mutually reinforcing each other which will continue to deny young men and women the opportunity of sharing the joys inherent in athletic activity in a natural way, free of sexist overtones and inhibition.

co-educational in the best sense of that word. Family planning is one of a number of options students may elect if they choose. Considerable time is spent in trying to develop an atmosphere in which male and female members become comfortable in exploring others' viewpoints.

Birth control information is distributed and this and other issues are discussed in a way that encourages students to formulate and define their own values.

The athletic side of the Forest Hill program is also completely co-educational in Grades 11 and 12, with a wide range of options offered in successive units throughout the year. Girls can and do elect touch football and other boisterous, physical education is optional, 180 out of 200 students take part.

When this remarkable evidence of enthusiasm is contrasted with the absenteeism from phys. ed. classes and apathy towards athletics one finds among students at many other schools, one might expect this approach to spread.

My feeling was that success of the program at Forest Hill owed a great deal to a relaxed attitude in the department about competition in general and inter-school competition in particular. While maintaining that it was necessary and desirable to facilitate inter-school competition as part of a total program for those who desired this kind of opportunity, the staff did not appear to feel that University building is frozen

THE Varsity

VOL. 93, NO. 32
FRI. NOV. 24, 1972

TORONTO

A provincial government indefinite moratorium of post-secondary capital construction may prevent future building at the University of Toronto's two satellite colleges for years to come.

Announcing the cut-off of construction funds yesterday in the Ontario legislature, Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNic said it would last for "years", and refused even to hint at its exact duration.

"Essentially, building projects will be limited to those already under construction," Mc Nic stated.

Government officials commented shortly after the freeze announcement that it would most seriously affect the province's relatively new and undeveloped community colleges.

U of T officials could offer little response to the government move last night as they awaited further details.

President John Evans, partying at the presidential mansion, refused even to come to the phone to discuss the development.

The moratorium will apparently not stop any currently planned St. George construction. Vice-president - business affairs Alex Rankin and Vice-president - institutional relations and planning Jack Sword noted that U of T has no substantial space entitlement in the near future.

Universities receive a capital entitlement based on the number of students enrolled in the institution. U of T has used up its space for this year and next, Rankin observed.

New U of T building projects like Innis College and the Men's Athletic Complex, both of which have yet to begin construction, were never intended to come out of the frozen government funds. However, the university had planned to "qualify them as we go" by consulting with the Ministry of Colleges and Universities during planning and construction so that it could claim their cost against future entitlements.

Consequently, Rankin does not anticipate there being any halt in the already approved building programs. He was, however, concerned about the effect the moratorium would have on future building programs at Erindale and Scarborough Colleges.

"It's hard to tell for Scarborough and Erindale," he said. "They're at a standstill."

He expressed relief that Scarborough's Phase II got in under the gun. Sword was more anxious about the new policy's possible implications for the university's major renovation programs for existing buildings, citing University College and the Sanford Fleming Building as two needing extensive work. (Work on UC began last spring and will last several years.)

The government's announcement was unclear about whether its limitations would apply to such repairs.

Erindale principal J. Tuzo Wilson observed his college could have been "in worse shape". The college's main building is almost completed. "We haven't any (immediate) plans except for residences," he noted. Construction of the residences was approved nearly a year ago and tenders for them have already been called.

However, he said a squeeze could come should the college's enrolment continue to climb. It went up more than 23 per cent this year.

Rankin suggested that the government called a halt to university and community college capital construction because of the sharp decline relative to projected increases these institutions experienced this year. Whereas the province as a whole fell 5½ per cent short of its estimated post-secondary enrolment, U of T only missed its figure by 0.96 per cent, he noted.

At Scarborough, principal Ralph Campbell was concerned about his college's library facilities should the freeze last long, and enrolment there also increase.

Eighteen thousand square feet of (inside) work still remains to be done on the college's Phase II building. "I would hope that since the building itself has been constructed, it will be finished."

Campbell admitted that the college had "been anticipating that there would be some problems", expecting, however, a delay as opposed to the potential years-long moratorium.

He noted that Scarborough has "a lot of space", in fact "enough facilities to handle double" its current enrolment. But, the stumbling block is the college's non-existent library; it's slated for Phase III.

"I guess we'll see what happens," he mused.

Finance commissioner Vince DeAngelo consults his notes while speaking at Wednesday's SAC meeting. Members voted to urge students to withhold the second instalment of their fees.

Withhold your second term fees, SAC urges students

By BOB GAUTHIER

The Students' Administrative Council Wednesday decided to urge U of T students to withhold their second term fees instalments in January.

However, vice-president John Helliwell indicated that if the Ontario Federation of Students meeting this weekend does not back the boycott province-wide and agree that the immediate aims of the withholding are to press the Ontario government to publicly commit itself on future plans for tuition and student aid, the executive may call an emergency meeting next week which could rescind approval of the withholding campaign.

Similarly, SAC president Eric Miglin, also an OFS executive, said he would not support the withholding at the OFS meeting unless it agreed with Helliwell's condition and that the action should be reassessed at the beginning of February.

The meeting at Erindale approved the executives proposal by about two to one under the following conditions:

- That the immediate aim of the fees withholding action be to press the Ontario government to publicly commit itself on its future plans with respect to tuition fees, the OSAP loan ceiling, the age of independence under OSAP and aid for part-time students.
- That at the beginning of February, SAC evaluate the fees withholding action and determine whether or not should continue.
- That SAC demand notification by the government of any future changes in the financing of post-secondary education, and demand participation of interested participants in decision making, specifically students and university administrators.

Miglin said, "The government has come out with a strong statement that there will be no fees hike next year. I am personally satisfied they won't."

He added that the government was "wishy-washy" on the subject of grants and loans.

Miglin later added that "I think we should recognize very strongly that what we're doing is a fees withholding as a protest, not a

Regina students quit occupation for week

REGINA (CUP) — Students at the University of Saskatchewan Regina campus have suspended their occupation of two administration offices for at least one week while a negotiating committee takes up an offer to work for parity "within the system".

The decision was made at a general meeting Wednesday attended by more than 800 students.

Regina campus principal John Archer addressed the meeting and asked students to call off the occupation. In return, he would support a review of the nature and level of student participation on the university's decision-making bodies "with a view to ensuring that students have opportunity to make their full contribution", he said.

"I would welcome and urge a review of the University Act and I am prepared to discuss proposed changes with faculty and students, and take steps to arrange a meeting with the minister of education and his deputy minister to pursue this end," Archer said.

But Archer would not give even verbal support to the students' demands and did not explain what he meant by "full contribution".

The deputy minister of continuing education in Saskatchewan happens to be the former vice-principal of the Regina campus.

The students responded by passing a five-point motion establishing the conditions under which the occupation would end.

The points are:
• to accept the report of the student negotiating committee on discussions with the administration and faculty about parity.

• to suspend the occupation of two administration offices that began Nov. 16.

• to make clear to Archer that the students are not prepared to negotiate the right to parity but only the implementation of it.

• that failure to recognize that demand will result in further drastic actions.

• that the negotiating committee report to a general meeting of students within one week.

The negotiating committee is composed of six students — three from social science, two from education, and one from administration.

Another committee will be established to examine changing the University Act to provide more student, faculty and community control. The committee will be composed of one-third students, one third faculty, and one-third members of the outside community. The community members must be acceptable to the student and faculty representatives.

Students plan to march on the Saskatchewan Legislature today and present their demands for changes in the University Act to Premier Allan Blakeny. The demands are almost identical to a resolution passed by this year's Saskatchewan New Democratic Party convention held last weekend.

The resolution calls for autonomy for each campus at U of S and a new governing structure with one-third representation on all university governing bodies for students, faculty and community members.

The Regina campus occupation began one week after the dean of the faculty of arts and science vetoed a motion passed by the division of social sciences, which would have guaranteed staff-students parity in all eight social science departments. The dean claimed only a department chairman could change the composition of a department governing body. (Six of the departments already have granted parity but it is not considered the students' right.)

On Nov. 16, about 200 students occupied the dean's office and Nov. 20 the occupation spread to the office of the dean of graduate studies. Principal Archer claimed throughout that the University Act blocked any blanket guarantee of parity, but he also opposed the concept itself.

It's not a strike but a protest, says Miglin strike.

"Strike connotes a lever... and we have no lever over the government." He said, "I don't think the government gives a damn. All we can do with the fees withholding is show our displeasure with the government's implementations."

In supporting the fees withholding, Helliwell noted that last month's strike referendum "called for a strike if negotiations with the government were unsuccessful.

"I don't believe there's any way we can claim that the negotiations have been successful. I think we are committed to holding a fees strike."

Helliwell said that over 5,300 voted in the strike referendum to support a fees strike.

"Twelve thousand are eligible to withhold their fees," he added. "Therefore, the 5,300 figure represents roughly one-third of who would participate."

Helliwell maintained that SAC should run a strong campaign for people to withhold their fees.

One part of the executive resolution was defeated — that the SAC's support for the fees withholding action be contingent on at least 4000 U of T students participating initially.

Erindale rep Arnold Brody wondered how SAC would be able to tell whether 4,000 students had supported the fees strike.

Helliwell replied that "I don't think there'll be any difficulty in getting the figures from the comptroller's office as to how many haven't paid," he said.

Brody said, "I wouldn't want SAC to be bound by a motion that the strike be called off if there's only 3,998 participants... Let's wait until the end of February to evaluate if the fees strike or less than 4000 participants is effective enough."

Finance commissioner Vice DeAngelo disagreed with Helliwell and proposed that SAC hold a fees strike with a deadline of February 15.

much more at ease with withholding fees for a definite period of time," he said. Furthermore, it "might be easier to negotiate with Simcoe Hall on the penalty for withholding the fees", he said.

UC rep Bob Anderson said that he didn't like the idea of a limited duration to the strike. "If we are using it for a bargaining tool, then we haven't got a tool of any sort whatsoever."

Miglin reported he had approached U of T vice-provost Robin Ross informally and that "the administration's feeling was that it would waive the penalties." "The administration is flexible to a limited extent", Miglin added, "but the limited flexibility of from two to three weeks was implied."

Education commissioner George Strathy proposed that if the demands that the government commit itself on tuition fees were not met by the first Monday in February, that there be a boycott of classes. If these demands were still not met, he advocated that the boycott continue on each successive Monday.

The motion failed by 22 to 12. Strathy said that the "fee strike motion is a fairly bankrupt idea. It won't affect the government or the university very much, it will affect the students"

He compared the fees strike to a boycott of classes during reading week.

De Angelo said Strathy's idea of a boycott was "good", but asked SAC to "be a little bit realistic about what we're proposing to do."

Engineering rep Donald Buchan failed to see how a boycott of classes would do anything. Strathy asked if SAC should put pressure on the university, or "are we supposed to sit back and do nothing?"

"At this point, yes," Buchan replied.

Helliwell told the meeting that boycotting classes was "no skin off their (the government's) derrieres."

The idea of a trust fund administered by SAC for withheld fees was also rejected.

SAC vice-president Ross Flowers said the OFS executive advised by letter that a trust fund would be unworkable. An OFS suggestion that SAC establish a similar trust fund was dismissed by him as "potentially good" but practically unworkable.

Architecture rep Elliot Rowan's appeal for an open-ended strike with no deadline went unheeded. Rowan said that if the strike is supported by SAC that it is up to the SAC administration, "namely the president", to be extremely strong in support and keep students united.

The Varsity—Bob Gauthier

Talk of a class boycott floated around the SAC meeting room in the event that the Ontario government does not respond to the withholding of fees.

"Cadario is no student rep"

Governing Council student member Paul Cadario is once again at the centre of a storm of controversy — this time when he was chosen as the only student from U of T to speak to the provincial Committee on University Affairs.

All seven of Cadario's student colleagues on the council sent a letter last Thursday to chairman Malim Harding asking that in future student members of government delegations be chosen by the student caucus of the council.

Although it is not referred to in the letter, the root of the students' grievance lies in the choice of Cadario twice to represent the university without consulting the students on the council, according to student Ian Morrison.

Cadario was chosen by the administration earlier this month to go to the annual conference of the Association of Colleges and Universities as part of the U of T delegation, in a move that angered SAC president Eric Miglin as well as the student caucus. SAC passed a motion asking that Cadario not attend.

The move that sparked the letter was Governing Council chairman Malim Harding's choice of Cadario to speak to the CUA at its hearings for U of T next Tuesday.

The letter, of which a copy went to president John Evans, is signed by student members Aron Goldberg, Norma Grindal, Joyce Denyer, Clarice Henschel, John Morton, Brian Morgan and Morrison.

Morgan said last night that if the students do not receive a reply from Harding, they intend to raise the matter with the council. He said he hopes for some guidelines to be reached on appointing representatives for the university.

Cadario stated last night that he was not chosen to represent U of T as a student, but as one of the Governing Council's committee chairmen. Each chairman is from a different constituency of the university.

"Members of the Governing Council chosen to represent the Governing Council should be chosen by the chairman (Harding)," he insisted.

The letter recognizes that Cadario was chosen as a committee chairman by stating that "Any student governor speaking in an official capacity as a governor is inevitably seen by the public and by official bodies as speaking on behalf of the students of the university."

Asked to comment on this statement, Cadario simply said he disagreed.

Morton complained last night that in the administration's "de facto" policy of choosing Cadario as a student representative (to any important body requiring one), our (the student caucus) opinion has never been consulted.

Morgan described the practice as "an undercut by the administration to weaken the student voice on the council".

"The great danger," he warned, "is that the administration will pick students who represent the views they want heard."

Morrison declared last night that "I don't think that Paul and the rest of the students I know have much in common."

Cadario has more in common with U of T vice-president Don Forster and Evans, he stated.

As for Cadario, he quipped, "I'm looking forward to going to the CUA."

Daycare settles in

An ultimatum from Campus Community Day Care to U of T's administration went past its Wednesday deadline for an offer of acceptable accommodation for its over-two day care centre.

However, neither side seemed excited by the co-op's threat that it may settle permanently in the building it is presently occupying on Devonshire Place.

"Things are looking up as far as the administration is concerned," says co-op spokesperson Julie Mathien. She says the group has been getting some "unofficial response" from the administration.

"We're getting optimistic noises from them," she said yesterday. "They've made no move to toss us out, and it doesn't seem as though they're going to at this point."

Co-op parent Cathy Petersen says that the appointment of professor Jill Conway as vice-president (internal affairs) at least means there is someone in the administration responsible for dealing with the situation.

Conway has already had some discussions with the co-op, Petersen indicated.

Renovations to the occupied centre by the co-op are in progress, and Mathien says they will continue. She sees any further moves as being up to the administration: "The onus is on them to come to us, and they're doing more of that."

Administration campus co-ordinator Lois Reimer indicated last night that the university is still looking for permanent accommodation for the centre.

The university's proposed renovations to the occupied clubhouse are not on a specific timetable, she said.

Meds dean says pre-med course should be re-examined

By HEATHER-JANE SANGUINS

Medicine Dean A.L. Chute said Tuesday that the "lack of a pre-medical course is causing a distortion of arts and science courses."

Speaking at a special meeting of the Governing Council's Planning and Resources Committee, he explained that prospective med students are inflating enrolment in some courses as "an estimated 1,000 students enter arts and science courses annually and the enrolment for first year medicine is 250."

As a result, a brief he presented to committee members stated that the 750 students left out "then have two or more years of university experience which may not be relevant to alternate career goals. It is therefore urgent that the university examine this problem."

St. Michael's College president

John Kelly, a committee member, stated that if steps were not taken, there would be "the same problem next year", that of many students enrolling knowing they want to leave after two years.

One solution, the brief suggests, is to set up an institute or college for health sciences to develop programs in pre-professional instruction.

The faculty also says in reply to the problem. "We do, however, subscribe to the idea that there should be multiple avenues for admission to medicine."

One idea medicine is considering is a test plan this summer in which 20 first year arts and science students will be accepted into first year medicine, after only one year, Chute said. Omitting the normally obligatory second year, they would take a course over the summer in Organic Chemistry.

Medicine Admissions Dean J.W. Steiner told the committee that the faculty is considering using interest and motivations tests to replace the usual admission requirement of an A average.

Chute also said that continuing medical education was "a large burden" on most of the medical faculty. 1,700 doctors attended courses on campus last year and 30 visits by faculty groups were made to outlying centres to give brief courses.

An Ontario Council of Health report has suggested that U of T increase its first year enrolment from 250 to 350 students. It bases this on a need for more doctors, evidenced by the fact that 60 per cent of Ontario's doctors were trained outside the province.

"The government is loathe to increase numbers of new schools by building instead of expansion," continued Chute. His faculty could probably accommodate the suggested increase in the field of pure sciences, he said, but it "would create major problems in the area of clinical teaching."

Victoria College Principal J.M. Rohson told the committee that only about one-third of the teaching done by a federated college is to its own students, except for St. Michael's College, which teaches a greater number of its own.

Rohson suggested that new colleges could be set up to accommodate students who aren't interested in college life. These new colleges would occupy existing buildings such as Sid Smith Hall, the Lash Miller Building and the McLennan Physics Laboratory.

Rohson also stated that library use is up in all eight colleges, ranging from 25 per cent at Victoria to 70 per cent at New.

Staff democracy in action today

If you are a member of the Varsity staff and would like to spend your Christmas vacation in Winnipeg, you should come to the staff meeting in the Varsity office, 91 St. George St. The meeting will decide who will go to the annual Canadian University Press Conference in the sister city of Vladivostok.

Also to be chosen: a person to represent the staff on the Varsity Board. The action starts today at 1 pm so be there.

Toike should re-examine purpose

In response to mounting criticism of its content, the Engineering Society has established a committee to study its paper, the Toike Oike.

Dissatisfaction with Toike material is not restricted to engineering students. Increasingly, one-time Toike fans have been expressing consternation with the puerile, racist, sexist image transmitted by the paper.

Far be it for The Varsity to condemn earthy humour or jokes of a sexual nature. What we object to — and apparently what at least enough others to motivate the study committee's establishment object to — is the Toike's self-appointed mission to seek the most chauvinist, racist humour it can find. Grossness rather than humour seems to dictate the paper's policy.

Today's l'Hebdo feature article, beginning on page 10, focusses on an analysis of what makes the Toike tick and offers a reasoned critique of the paper's attitudes and coverage. The article and this editorial were commissioned by The Varsity staff not as an attack upon a potential rival, but as an attempt to contribute to the improvement of student journalism on this campus.

Futile attempts to dismiss serious criticism of the Toike's material with claims that critics are over-reacting, and taking the racist and sexist comments too seriously betray more than a lack of understanding of others' feelings. It represents a refusal to attempt to consider others and the implications of Toike policy.

Keeping one's eyes closed to reality will not make it go away. And, saying that because they weren't written maliciously, Toike jibes don't hurt, offend, and insult many of its readers is dishonest.

The paper's policy does a great disservice to engineers. It tries, by the stereotypes it perpetuates, to reinforce a mythical, degrading, sexist image of unthinking clods wandering around with slide-rules looking for the first "broad" to lay. As engineering students continue to attempt to make their contribution to society socially relevant (at least in their context), the Toike persists in pretending they are indifferent morons who regard women as sex objects, and sneer contemptuously at ethnic minorities. In this way, the society's own paper is more anti-engineer than any supposedly anti-professional artsies.

The Toike's non-journalism not only disappoints engineering students. It lets the entire campus down, by ignoring its potential role as a second, cross-campus publication. Toike resources, both financial and personnel, would allow it more than any other campus paper to provide a real alternative to The Varsity, an alternative that many students believe should exist.

Suggestions that the Toike could offer this university an alternative view do not preclude continued publication of a satiric, creative newspaper. The Toike's recent take-off on The Varsity, "The Varsity", was disappointing only in that it got caught in the typical Toike trap of unfunny sexist, racist jokes rather than the clever humour and spoof for which The Varsity is such an easy target. Perhaps, The Varsity takes itself too seriously and deserves to have itself brought down to earth.

Hopefully, the Toike's staff will seriously re-examine its policy in light of the apparent general dissatisfaction with the role it is playing on this campus rather than reacting hostilely and defensively — or worse still, indifferently — to the concern of its readership. Responding positively and creatively, the Toike can assume its legitimate place as a forum of creative, alternate viewpoints, making a genuine contribution to this campus.

Reading, writing are clearest indicators

School trains working class for factory jobs

By JIM DAW
reprinted from Excalibur

Literacy for working class children is the key to making changes in the schools, changes which can't be co-opted, but can finally be linked to a larger revolutionary political movement, according to George Martell, editor of This Magazine is about Schools.

Martell told a York University course Monday, "The oppression of the working class in the schools is shown in its clearest form... (in the) reading and writing question. "Reading and writing ability is the objective standard of the streaming process. It's the final factor administrators point to in determining your place in the school hierarchy. There is a direct relationship between your class (your place in the socio-economic scale), your stream in school, and your reading ability. The lower down you are in society and in the school, the worse you read."

It is the socialization process in schools, he said, which is the prime cause of working class illiteracy, a process which prevents working class students from developing a "means to describe the world". The kids are made "dumb", a two-edged word in English meaning not only that a person is stupid, but also that he can't speak.

"The words to be learned in school are alien to the working class," Martell continued. The words of the middle class are the words of mobility. "words that blur the actual mechanisms of society, that are opaque, abstract, not very much connected to human emotions or to individual persons."

He used the example of an intelligence quotient test in which children are shown pictures of four people — a policeman, a butcher, a grocer, and a druggist — and then asked what all four have in common.

More often than not, he said, a middle class child will realize the "correct" answer, and group all four under the abstract heading "men". A working class child, meanwhile, relating to his own experience, may devise a more active relationship: "the last three are in cabinets and the policeman is after them."

"Working class kids use words of anger, the words of their class," he said. "The words of their class are about the truth of human oppression, and you don't want those kind of words to get out because when you do you aren't creating people who easily fit into a society such as our own, into work roles in which they're asked in fact to work in alienation, to work for grades, or to work for money or status."

"You can't fit people into that sort of arrangement if in their education they learn how to tell the truth about that oppression, to tell the truth about their particular human feelings. In fact, the reverse happens, and they start to get together and oppose you."

"The business of radical teachers and schools for comparison with those in middle class districts. When you do get the scores, they show working class kids are two and three years behind their middle class peers.

Secondly, he said working class parents should then be made aware of the implications of literacy. "If their kids don't know how to read they are doomed to the bottom streams."

And, finally, they must begin the long struggle to create the conditions necessary for literacy. Every one of them involves a fight.

However, he stressed, the fights that take working class parents is to create the conditions that will enable working class kids to read and write, to find their own words. It's an absolutely revolutionary demand, though it seems like motherhood," he said.

Martell said that the first of a three-step program would be to inform working class parents about the literacy of their children. That itself involves political action; the information has to be pressured out. It's almost impossible, he said, to get available information on reading abilities in downtown place in the school system can't be isolated ones, as they often have been in the past. "Teachers are not going to change society or schools unless they link themselves with a larger working class political movement which will develop the power necessary to push back the present state system."

He suggested that teachers could start to develop links with the working class by becoming involved in these struggles and neighbourhood preservation battles. He mentioned specifically Winchester School in South of St. James Town, which has offered no support to the embattled tenants there, although it could easily do so.

But, he said, the most important thing would be for teachers to build a strong militant union interested not only in wages, but also in the quality of education, a union that would link with blue and white collar unions on all fronts.

Martell said that the development of a serious strategy would not be possible unless schools were looked at in the context of a much larger framework.

He disagreed with Ivan Illich, "now the darling of liberal education theory", who says the objective primary function of the school is through consumption and the encouragement of consumption to directly assist corporate profit-making.

Martell thought that was a secondary function. He conceded that schools do fit into the framework of monopoly capitalism by absorbing such excess capital as electronic equipment and construction materials; by helping to create demand by enforcing the tendency among students to become passive consumers; and by failing to question planned obsolescence in construction materials. However, the primary function of schools and universities, Martell said, is to produce a properly trained work force.

But, he explained he did not mean training in the sense of providing skills, because as education critics in the 60's realized, students are "taught a superficial hodge-podge of predigested materials that finally cut no ice for anyone. The schools did nothing serious. No one actually functioned as a scientist, or historian or a writer. What Martell stressed was the socialization process in schools that fitted students psychologically for jobs.

Martell said also that schools serve the function of reinforcing and preserving the present class structure by not providing working class children with adequate skills.

Working class kids are socialized, Martell concluded, so that they can move without too much anguish into a factory job or a service station job or onto welfare. "Socialization comes down heaviest on the working class."

Martell also touched on the educational system's myth of pluralism. "I don't know of a single left wing social science or history text in the public school system," he said.

No. Eaton's wants to go on forever acting as a big distributor all over Canada of foreign-made goods. The one or two per cent of Canadian-made goods that it sells at premium prices, it buys from the factories at rock-bottom prices. Nothing was mentioned about Eaton's being unashamed to give five cents or one cent change to a customer who buys an article costing $499.99.

Second, the editorial "Don't speed mail by lower pay, cutting jobs" (November 22). Some good points were raised, but much was left unsaid: that the Canadian Post Office is a copycat branch of the PO Department at Washington, D.C.; that our PO was supposed to be "losing millions" every year (hence rise of rates to the American inflation levels), yet it has over $70,000,000 to squander on the introduction of costly, American-built machinery to speed the mails; that to speed up the mails for a nation of only 22 millions of people scattered across an area over four million square miles is the same type of insanity as dieselizing the railways and throwing thousands of A-1 steam locomotives, et cetera on the scrap heap; that maybe the PO Department has to introduce speed-up machinery because the greedy Canadian Union of Postal Workers keeps demanding higher and higher wages, plus ridiculous benefits (for a job any boy over grade 7 could do — dropping pieces of addressed paper and magazines into the mail slots).

Just the same, it is wonderful to see editorials and articles in The Varsity which the other "free press" refuses to print lest it lose one or two juicy advertising contracts. The dollar sign reigns supreme.

Non-Academic

Engin rep for improved Toike

The following letter was sent to the Special Committee set up by the Engineering Society to examine the objectives of the Toike Oike. Opinions were solicited from members of the Faculty Council of the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering.

I am writing in response to your request for opinions on the Toike Oike.

There is a real need for an alternate campus newspaper, and the Toike Oike has done a commendable job over the years of arousing widespread student interest and of maintaining a strong circulation outside the bounds of this faculty. The imaginative humour and irreverent style of the paper have been a good representation of the engineering spirit.

I feel it is imperative that my newspaper enjoy as much freedom as possible to produce outrageous or critical material, but, at the same time, that it assume the responsibility for not making wholesale, indiscriminate attacks on any section of the population. Criticism should elevate, not degrade, and ridicule should be aimed at particular enemies, not at general readership. I trust the Toike staff, as well as the engineering student body, do not consider the female population of the university to be their enemies. I, therefore, see no need for sexist humour, for objectification of women (and men), for glorification of the Playboy images of both women and men, or for heaping ridicule both on who upset preconceived ideas and (implicitly) on male engineers who do not want to play the arrogant, aggressive, con- cey, chauvinistic role demanded of them by engineering tradition.

This engineering tradition has in the past included the most blatant racism against blacks, Asians and, as recently as my own first year initiations, Jews. I doubt if such white chauvinism would be tolerated today, and I am sure that male chauvinism will not be tolerated in a future when more and more women are demanding a place in the professions.

The Toike Oike should anticipate the future.

There is a legitimate place for serious reporting and sarcastic political criticism of left-wing student politics, of the women's liberation movement, and of important events with the APSC Faculty. The Toike Oike should pursue these activities responsibly and persistently.

Straight facts are championed

This letter is intended as a reminder to Ms Sue Crowe in regard to her letter in the November 15 issue of The Varsity. I would like to request of Ms Crowe that she attempt to get her facts straight. I would like to answer her point by point, but there are just too many statements of factual fantasy to answer. The only "inconsistency" is in her arguments. If the letter were not muckraking, counter-productive, and untrue, I would publicly invite Ms Crowe in to discuss the points she thinks she raised. The only thing I would like to remind Ms Crowe about is as follows.

Fact: It is better to keep your mouth shut and let people assume you are stupid than to open your mouth and prove it (as you have so ably and completely done, Ms Crowe).

Indirect quote upsets reader

In your article on (Michel Chartrand's speech (The Varsity November 17, 1972), you refer to his speech as "supporting the right of Arabs to occupy Israel".

Mr. Chartrand very clearly said the only solution to the Middle East crisis is "to get the Palestinians back to Palestine". This cannot be termed an Arab occupation of Israel, except by those who deliberately want to misstate the plain facts.

The person who wrote the culine in question is free to have any political opinions he likes, but he should be honest enough when quoting others.

H. Abo-Amer

Ed's note: The disputed comment was not represented as a direct quote. It merely sought to differentiate, as Chartrand did, between Arab states and Palestinians, and Israel and Palestine.

LEGAL AID

On the second floor of 44 St. George St. is located the Campus Legal Aid Centre. The centre, run by funds obtained from the S.A.C., provides a wide range of legal counsel and advice. One of the main areas of concern is the landlord-tenant act, since many legal difficulties emanate from the abuse of this piece of legislation. The centre is run by student volunteers from the Faculty of Law, whose time and dedication allow the programme to continue to operate. Never feel that any difficulty is too minor to handle. In fact, much of their work is processing legal forms for various purposes. In an effort to provide added service this year, a lawyer is being commissioned to aid the centre for a few hours per week. Such an effort will provide added expertise to the facilities already available.

If ever you need legal help, the Campus Legal Aid Centre is here to help you. Any student with a legal problem is encouraged to make full use of this SAC sponsored service. It is on the second floor of 44 St. George St. The Phone number is 928-6447.

Course Unions

The Education Commission is sponsoring a conference of Course Unions, to be held on Saturday, November 25th in the JCR at University College. It is our hope that anyone who is either involved in, or interested in forming a course union will attend. The main purpose of the Conference will be to discuss the concept of Course Unions, and what the purposes of such groups should be and whether they are fulfilling that function. There will also be a discussion of the Objects and Success of Course Evaluations, including how to prepare and process a Course Evaluation. For further information and pre-conference material, please contact the Education Office, either George or Kryz.

PREVIEW DAY

Another "Preview Day" for High School students is being organized by the Education Commission this year. Volunteers will be required to go to High Schools to speak to students, and also to act as "guides" for students who would like to spend a day at the University. Ads will be placed in the "Varsity" concerning these matters in the near future - for information call the Education Office.

Manson family horror show more than insane orgy of magic, sex, and murder

"There is no pretense that this book is the final work on the Manson family. A scientific, scholarly study, for instance, is needed on techniques of psychedelic brainwashing and criminal behaviour under complex hypnotic suggestion-patterns. Young people need to know the techniques a guru or so-called leader might use to entrap them in a web of submission so that they can keep a constant vigil against it."

— Sanders, introduction to The Family.

For the past few years I have paid little attention to all the media exposure of the Manson murder cases, dismissing the Manson cult as just one more of the many aberrations evident in our society. Insanity and murder, physical or psychological, is commonplace in Canadian and American society, and I find things such as the strike-breaking tactics of Canadian Driver Pool or work conditions at Eaton's more shocking and horrifying than the sensational murder of a pretty blonde movie star. After all, we all know California is a haven for crazies.

But more and more people were seriously concerned with my astrological sign; Jesus freaks began to interrupt my strolls on Yonge Street and even to convert my friends; the media increased its coverage of witch cults. Most convincingly, I found my own mind open to supernatural suggestion, especially black magic.

When a friend sat up all night, horror-struck, reading The Family, I decided to take a look. When I realized the book had been written by Ed Sanders, it gained credibility, despite its sensationalist appearance.

Ed Sanders? Now in his early thirties, Sanders turned on at age thirteen, was involved in the pacifist movement, joining a continental march to Ban-The-Bomb, moved to New York's East Village in 1964 and started a magazine called Fuck You: A Magazine of the Arts. He played and wrote for The Fugs, who were involved in the "Exorcism of the Pentagon" in 1967, who recorded their Grope-In for Peace, using public fucking as a magical weapon. Convicted on a couple of obscenity counts, he then worked (played?) with Abbie Hoffman and Jerry Rubin as they organised the Chicago demonstrations. So Sanders at that point was using mystical formulae in the political struggle against capitalism.

If Ed Sanders was concerned about Charles Manson's brand of occult, perhaps there was reason. The man had been around. Furthermore, his research for the book was extensive, with over 10,000 pages of data building a daily history of the growth of the Manson family. Sanders hired a private investigator and himself posed as a New York pornography dealer and a Satanist to get information. A few lines of investigation became too dangerous when his sources were found dead in car trunks, for Sanders says, "No book is worth permanent meditation next to a tire."

The book is clearly not written to be read by people wanting scholarly, academic analysis. It is meant for youth and counter-culture people, written in slang with Sander's emotional reactions included. Read it as if Ed was talking to you.

The Family tells the detailed story of the growth of the Manson family, Manson's growing delusions as a Christ-figure, his additions to his harem of women, culminating in the Tate murders in 1969. The story is one of interaction with counter-culture and acid, Jesus freaks (particularly the Process Church), degenerating with the demise of Haight-Ashbury into an almost hypnotic whirlwind of Satanism, pornography films involving animal and possibly human sacrifice.

Manson himself comes from the typical background of broken home and prison training grounds for 'disturbed personalities'. While in jail, he seems to have consciously developed his still unexplained powers of charisma and hypnotic suggestion.

Sanders goes to great pains to point out the many inexplicable facets of the Manson murders, from unsolved murders in the California desert to other unearthed Satanist plots to discrepancies in the position of bodies in the 'solved' Tate murders. Of course, great secrecy always surrounds the area of the occult and drug-dealing, especially when, as mentioned earlier, murder continues.

It might be easy to dismiss the entire Manson cult as simple insanity, except for several disturbing and frightening factors.

Charles Manson established a strong control over the people in his 'family', for the most part ordinary kids, moving around California in search of lost answers. The Manson family, in and out of jail, has for the most part, still not repudiated Charlie. Despite his Christ delusions, Manson was an authoritarian and sadistic leader, with almost complete control over the people he ruled and manipulated in his mad fantasy. The women in Charlie's harem were treated, literally, worse than dogs; the dogs were fed before the women at Manson family feasts. The women were not allowed to speak English, but only gibberish, to the children, for fear of contaminating their minds, and were, of course, distributed at Charlie's word to any male, including visiting bikers. How did Charles Manson maintain this kind of control over people who seem to have been only normally messed-up?

Sanders traces the family's descent into a whirlwind of blood, sacrifice, sadism, satanism, preparing for the Armageddon of Helter Skelter (picked up from the Beatles' White Album), all expressed in a mumbo-jumbo of assorted magics, including Hopi Indian mythology. Charlie predicted a Black racial revolution which would come to the family for leadership, Blacks being obviously incapable of self-government. He also believed that the Beatles were waiting for word from him, and attempted to call them.

Cloaked in revolutionary rhetoric, this mish-mash of magic soon became a cult involved in what seems an almost addictive blood bath. The assorted forms of youth's rebellion against society had become a horror-show, a rebellion against some of man's deepest mores. It seems frighteningly easy to get caught in the dynamics of Satanic gore.

Furthermore, the connections with society on many levels which Manson and his friends had developed make one wonder just how pervasive the cult of "black magic" has become in North America. The family was involved with such people as Dennis Wilson of the Beach Boys, Terry Melcher, Doris Day's son, undefined underworld characters and bikers. And, Manson and/or his friends were closely connected with drug dealers from Toronto, where MDA was first marketed in 1968 or 1969. Getting a bit too close to home to dismiss as Callitornian madness?

There's more to come. If you walk down Yonge Street, the chances are high that you will be stopped by black-cloaked emissaries, wearing a cross and Satan badge, and asked, "Do you know about The Process?". Ed Sanders wrote that Charlie Manson knew about The Process Church of the Final Judgement. He characterized The Process as one of three "sleazo-inputs" on mystic death trips and found their influence on Manson important enough to devote a chapter to their history.

Sanders claims that The Process Church is an English occult group professing belief in Lucifer, Jehovah and Satan, and the unity of Christ and Satan, with The Process advocating violence to hasten the end of the world. The Process, naturally, are chosen people. He says that The Process involves a membership hierarchy of six levels, with the upper levels required to turn over all income to the founders, Robert and Mary Anne DeGrimston. Sanders continually makes connections of influence between Charles Manson and The Process.

However, you will not be able to read Sanders' view of The Process Church in the paperback edition. After the initial release of the hardcover book (Clerke Irwin & Co. in Canada, E.P. Dutton, U.S.A.) The Process Church of the Final Judgement sued Ed Sanders for libel. The soft cover edition omitted almost all references to The Process, and the case was settled out of court. Since 1969, The Process seems to have kept a low profile, as they say in the PR business, but Sanders left me wondering how much and what kind of influence they have in Toronto.

The Manson cult no longer seems the isolated freak out of sensationalist murder it first appeared to be. That orgy of blood and insanity generated by Nazi "black" mysticism and imperialism is only thirty years in the past. There appears to be a rise in assorted mystic beliefs, many of them pertaining to black magic. Are Americans and Canadians retreating into the mystic due to the pressures and contradictions of their societies? Man is not a rational animal, and needs some kind of faith to sustain him. But only rationality, not black magic, can save us from man-made problems such as an acute ecological crisis and the tensions which are structured into our social system, such as racism and wage slavery.

Sex as plumbing; engineers as boors: stereotypes of the Toike Oike

At nursing school the sex education teacher told her class, "The average male penis is about five inches long when erect." One student nurse stood up and said, "My engineering boyfriend's is seven inches before he starts." The teacher snapped, "Miss Adamson, please keep quiet I'm speaking of the necessities of life, and not the luxuries!"
— Toike Joke

Lunchtime, Thursday October 6, the Med Sci cafeteria a friend and I, between forkfuls of steak and kidney pie, were pouring over the Toike Oike which had appeared on campus that morning. Even by that journal's well-hung standards, this issue was gamey indeed. After a few pages we laid it aside (lunchtime, even on one's best days, not really being a good time to savour the Toike) and munched a while in silence. Finally my companion remarked "Don't judge all the engineers by the Toike."

As it happens, I never did. My freshman roommate in college, an engineer, used, when I was out, to browse industriously through my books; one evening I came back to find that he had read through the Oresteian Trilogy. He was eager to discuss it, which was difficult for me, as I hadn't yet got around to Aeschylus; I talked about him a lot, to be sure, but actually reading him was something of a chore.

There are similar anecdotes. A professor of engineering had an apartment in my residence, to which he invited us all every week for drinks. The talk was literate and genuine, free of the pomposities that inflated conversations with students and junior pros in disciplines closer to my own. This was an internationally famous man, a Spaniard, a genial host and a collector of artifacts.

Dr there's that roommate again, whose interest in Greek drama outlasted mine. As graduating seniors, we were finishing off projects. I was dashing off an honors thesis on the Prometheus Bound, while he was taking a humanities seminar and had chosen to write a long essay on ancient tragedy, which grandiose project I smiled at as he described it to me. An engineer, can you beat that, who didn't know a word of Greek. Soon he began to drop over to my place for advice, which was, it soon became apparent, stupid of him; his paper was infuriatingly more knowledgeable than mine, and immeasurably less pretentious.

Whatever prejudices I held about engineers, then, I soon disabused myself of; they were as unsatisfactory as all the other neat generalizations (I was pretty naive) that I had set off to college with. It was with some shock, therefore, when I arrived four years later in Toronto, to find the old stereotypes in full blossom. As I soon learned, I was an artist. There was unceasing effort to brick the walls between faculties higher and higher. An artist, imagine.

All this goes a long way towards explaining why my lunch partner found it necessary explicitly to disassociate himself from the works of the Toike. Engineers, it seems, have not merely chosen a vocation, they have chosen an ideology, a lifestyle, a mystical and boisterous solidarity. Or so the editors of the Toike would have us believe... It's all somewhat reminiscent of the giddiest days of the late fifties. I remember an older cousin, a girl who had just acquired a new boyfriend, being interrogated: "What's he like?" she was asked. "Oh, he's a Phi Delt," she replied. Period. All was answered.

There is, let's face it, an archetype of an engineer. You all know it, I won't belabor the point: the hard-hatted, beer-swilling randy hulk, to be found at every home football and hockey game, (if not collapsed somewhere under the stands) somewhere on the fringes of the Lady Godiva Memorial Band, spoiling for some nasty fun.

It's not a very good archetype, and it never was. More engineers than not are probably home painting the house or doing thermodynamics problems. And the crassness at Varsity Stadium/Arena is catholic: artist and engineer and dentistry student writhe together in a veritable orgy of Philistine hijinx.

Yet the mud sticks to the engineers; the stereotype persists. There are of course, the homecoming floats with the Labatt's Fifty flag and the Red Cap banner; with such swashbuckling standards, no wonder when we see somebody's limp frame being carted out of the stands, we're as likely as not to mutter "Hmph. Another rookie engineer who doesn't know when he's had enough." Still, it's unfair for them to bear the brunt of such comments. But there's an insidiously effective propaganda weapon that fuels such prejudices. I mean of course the Toike Oike, which serves the image of engineers about as well as Martha Mitchell serves the cause of enlightened conservatism.

Pa's out and Ma's out, let's talk dirt!
Pee-poh-belly-bottom-drawers.
— London Street refrain, quoted by G. Legman in The Rationale of the Dirty Joke

Everytime I read the Toike (and I pick it up compulsively, like pick at hangnails) I think of Delvyn Boldt. (That isn't, of course, quite his name, but we'll leave it there.) He was the most universally disliked guy in the eighth grade, a fact he remained happily unaware of, seating himself staunchly at our lunchtable day after day. Now we didn't dislike Delvyn because he was fat, or a shameless suck-up, but because he was one of those misfits who sought to ingratiate himself with the boys by talking dirty. Sex talk and bathroom talk (Delvyn could never distinguish between the two) gushed from his mouth as from a gutter-pipe during a thunderstorm. The effluvia of the human body were his obsession; his red-letter days were those on which he was served the slumgullion that is a staple of institutional kitchens. He would speculate on its provenance until he had succeeded in turning the hardest stomachs. His pudgy cheeks would glisten with joy; Delvyn belonged!

The years have mellowed me a bit, and now I can understand poor Dell a little better. He was sex-obsessed but neuter, and the only fun he could see there being in sex was to use his imaginatively foul mouth to out-gross the rest of us, then guffaw at our discomfiture. It's a peculiarly warped conception of virility, this, the equation of squeamishness with femininity, of sex with plumbing.

Two items from the Toike come to mind as I write this. First, The Ballad of Eskimo Nell, a piece of doggerel so scabrous that, if you read it, it's undoubtedly ripe in your memory. Let's leave it there. The second is a cartoon printed late last year. A scrawny man stands naked, his just-spent penis coiling (yes, coiling — such are the fantasies of the Toike staff) on the ground. Nearby sits an obese, scrofulous woman, rubbing her great bushy twat with ecstasy, as Henry Miller would say: That's my boy! she coos.

Well, Someone might point out that the faisandé, the tained and the downright raunchy are explored on the other end of the sexual continuum, too, by the jaded, the masochistic, the epicene. I know, I know, but the Toike's verse is hardly spawned by Rimbaud, nor its graphic art by George Grosz. The true inspiration for the Toike is the high school frat, the beer-blast, the dare-you-to-do-it sprees: Dropping trou for passersby, slipping some pressed ham against the car window at traffic lights. (In fact, on one occasion — December 18, 1970 — the paper ran a photo of the Skule swim team throwing a collective moon at the camera.) All this is forgivable when the hormones are new and heady, at about age 14, but most of us get over it by early manhood. The Toike seems to have jammed somewhere just after the voice-breaking stage, bang in the full bloom of acne. What's hard to take is that they seem so damn proud of it.

Brigid Brophy once wrote that to her "the two most fascinating things on earth are sex and the eighteenth century". I disagree with her choice of century, but otherwise the sentiment is forthright and agreeable. I record that just to clear the decks of any suspicion that there's some kind of pecksniffery afoot, that I'm dropping these sour little scruples because I find the Toike objectionable on grounds of old-fashioned moral turpitude — what they used to fire high school teachers for — or because it outrages some fey, genteel sensibilities of mine.

Decidedly not. The best thing about the Toike is the robust bawdiness it brings. (a welcome bracer) to this often drab campus. Everybody looks for the jokes, or used to, before it became apparent that most of them were filched from Playboy and an odd, salty compendium called The Rationale of the Dirty Joke. But bawdiness, however extravagant, is one thing, rancidity is something else.

Do the Toike editors, I wonder, realize just how offensive they can be? And not just to the squeamish. Jibes at pious, horny spinsters have been around for centuries, and may be amusing or not, but when you single out a specific institution, Loretto College, and ascribe to it the house-rule "Lights out by ten, candles out by eleven" you are being patronizing and vicious in a way the basic joke itself isn't. Or when you ring obscene changes on the name Ceta Ramkhalawansingh because you disagree with her politics and think she has a funny name anyway, you're verging into personal invective of an unforgivable sort. And when you compare something disagreeable to "the inside of a Hindu's jockstrap" — which, believe it or not, was the "in" epithet for a while — you've said something brutally racist.

Things like this are not funny, not at all. We can accept the fact that the Toike seems to be printed on presses loaded with estrogen rather than ink; we can skip over the thousand-and-one dreary permutations along the theme sliderule penis. If we can stomach it, even when that paper gleefully plumbs the lower sexual depths, it doesn't bother us the way their thoughtless vituperation does. (Much of this, of course, is on the Delvyn Boldt level. Their reference to my co-editor and me in The Varsity was that we were to "imitate an elephant after a breakfast of beans". Out of the mouths of eighth-grade boys trenchant quips cascade.)

It seems never to dawn on the editors that, if you transgress certain boundaries of taste and distance too often, you are open to consequent charges. Sexism for one, which probably doesn't worry the Toike too much, despite the fact that it's sexism of an almost feudal primitiveness. Racism for another, which, I hope does bother them. (A note here about their targets. What they write about the peoples of the Middle East and Asia (still stamped with the stereotype of docility as blacks once were) they would hardly dare to write about blacks.)

Hell, we're not supposed to take this seriously (I can hear them saying) we're supposed to go along with the joke. "Don't take it personally" is the last refuge of the wise-ass. It's a pretty transparent defense mechanism, whipped out when something unforgivable has been said or done. It should be emblazoned on the Toike's masthead.

Pavlov's dogs? No, just the annual engineer's slave auction with some light entertainment. (All engineers, however, do not drool.)

WHY DOES A WOMAN PREFER AN ENGINEER

Because,
 He plans his course of action
 To give her total satisfaction
 The circumference of the hole
 To the thickness of his pole
 With plenty of time
 Using tangents and cosine
 He calculates the angle
 To prevent a mis-tangle
 Using the sliding friction
 For insertion without restriction
 He calculates the maximum strain
 To prevent unnecessary pain
 And considering the minimum stress
 He gives enough — no more, no less
 All work is in fact energy
 So using discretion lightly
 He gives and gets total enjoyment
 For a minimum loss of strength
 Energy dissipates into heat
 Due to the work between the meat
 Such heat women treasure
 Because it is converted to pleasure
 Remembering an ENGINEER is always in prime
 At the end he's ready for the next time.
COMPARE TO AN artsie:
 An artsie man is really a slissy
 And starts things in a great hurry
 Knowing nothing about stress and strain
 He will cause a mess and considerable pain
 And if the tender hole is not at stake
 The artsie pole will surely break
 Why it is indeed no wonder
 An artsie only causes a blunder
 And a woman always prefers an ENGINEER!

 — wisdom from The Toike

So what? So a clique of randy pranksters, with a Boeotian sense of humour, see fit to commit their scribblings to newsprint? Big deal. But why should The Varsity waste its newsprint in reply, unless spurred on by wounded pride. The answer must be that they were so gravelled by the barbs aimed at them in that low burlesque, The Varshity, they were moved to counterattack, right? Certainly, by the dim lights of the Toike's editors, there could be no other reason — anything else is rationalization.

But what in the Toike is there for The Varsity to feel threatened by? At peak efficiency, they put out one issue to every nine of The Varsity. Right there, any claim to serious rivalry is laid to rest. (So they chide The Varsity for making so many mistakes, on the grounds that we get so much more practice than we do; with all the time the Toike has to put together an issue, it should be as impeccably edited as the air-brushed glossies in their beloved Playboy.) But still, the editors can't spend all their time with blue pencils, what with fluid mechanics labs and all. What counts is what they do with their scant opportunities.

Not much, alas. There's the cover, usually some coy ithyphallic logo, the plagiarized jokes, a couple of (porno) graphic cartoons, and some long, pointless sex-yarn told, wittily, in technological jargon. One never knows what else might drift in; once there was a straight article about crystals; no one was more startled than the engineers I know.

In all fairness, the Toike has made efforts to make itself respectable. There have been good columns by somebody named Spearchucker, and a plea even went out this year for serious material. Of course we haven't seen much of it — respectable prose sits as uneasily on the pages of the Toike as a Mormon in a whorehouse.

It's really too bad. The Toike Oike, let's face it, is virtually the only rival to the campus newspaper; every copy disappears soon after publication. Far from denigrating its aspirations to compete, The Varsity deplores the way it squanders what influence it has. Competition, in important areas, could only raise the quality of both papers. Surely the editors of the Toike (and those close to its philosophical heart) find things to disagree with in The Varsity (I do, god knows), have differing opinions on campus, community or national issues. You'd never know it, though, by reading their paper, but you'd soon discover, in the brusque terms, what they thought of The Varsity.

Maybe the Toike has no opposition to its "rival" on any substantial ground; maybe it never dawned on the staff that there is a true rivalry waiting to be utilized. Instead, they carry on a dumb, football-league sort of rivalry, jeering, making faces, shrieking dirty names. They could, of course, shake things up by scooping The Varsity, or proving it wrong on the facts of a news story, or publishing a cohesive refutation of a feature or editorial. (The closest they came was to send somebody toddling across the street to question a police chief about the guides to law and to drugs in L'Hebdo's community guide issue, only to discover that all the information was quite correct and legitimate.) Did it ever occur to them that they might do reviews of books, movies, or pop music? Engineer emeritus Norman Mailer's book Of A Fire on the Moon (never reviewed in The Varsity) was a natural for somebody on the Toike; but not a thing was done about it.

All that takes work, of course, and thought and research and rewriting and follow-through. Instead, you can turn out a burlesque as insipid and wrong-headed as The Varshity (they parodied Watsup by calling it Catsup — missing the point altogether that Catsup was the original joke, never a very good one. Calling it Mustard would have at least been true parody).

Why bother? Why do anything more ambitious when everybody picks up the Toike anyhow? They've got their readers, for a few minutes a month anyway, so why rock the boat? Just keep shoveling out the rancid sex and sexism; the appallingly witless attempts at satire; the Billingsgate aimed at The Varsity, at Catholic girls, at virgins, at homosexuals, at artsies, at Orientals, at whatever else strikes their warped fancy. Everybody loves it, don't they? And why be scrupulous when you can save yourself a lot of trouble by being scurrilous?

Feldbrill conducts students

Orchestra slurs way through Beethoven

I will not comment upon the University of Toronto's playing of Weber's overture to Der Freischütz, which along with three other works took place last Saturday, November 18, in the Macmillan Theatre. I heard the overture, but only through the doors to the lobby.

The second work is called Floating Clouds and it is by David M.Y. Liang. Supposedly an attempt to combine Chinese and Western idioms, it is a fine if derivative piece. The orchestra gave it a handsome reading, the strings especially applying just the right amount of varnish to the long sustained notes. But either the piece is very easy, or they gave their all in playing it, because the next piece, Carlos Chavez' Sinfonie India, was chased to death by the relentless hounding of loud strings and raucous brass. Part of the fault is with the music. It is one of those flashy Hispanic pieces, lurid and volcanic like Mexican food. Like Yonge Street, it advertises itself quite blatantly: "I am lively and delightful entertainment" it seems to flash. All the same, its final 6/8 tempo is hard to keep pace with, and the orchestra did not often fall behind or allow its separate forces to trip over each other. They certainly did a lot of noise-making though. After all, this is music, and those are violins. Mr. Feldbrill, the conductor, would have done well if he had more forcefully reminded his musician-students of these facts.

After intermission, came Beethoven's Sixth Symphony, the Pastoral. We are generally faced with two approaches to this work: the Mozartian trip-lightly approach and the more massive and teutonic approach.

Both can work depending upon the conductor. Diseased versions of these ways of tackling the work are deadly — we end up with one of two extremes: weak-tea Beethoven, or viscous, treakly Beethoven.

I'm afraid the orchestra served us the latter. One could tell right from the beginning. The opening notes should be barely audible, ushering us into the woods with hushed whispers as it were. Instead we were led in peremptorily. The climaxes and pianos were not well-modulated. The episodic nature of the movement demands that attention be paid to small changes, especially in dynamics. I found climaxes and rhetorical arpeggios or quick tripping phrases smashing into smoother, quieter passages, which should have been limpid and free-flowing but were limping and constricted. The movement simply waddled along.

I don't think this is merely a function of the musicians being amateurs and orchestral novices. You can allow for the wrong note, the missed cue, because these things happen by chance within a group not used to acting like a group. But if sound is turgid and loudly monotone, then remedying that sick sound should be first priority of the conductor. In the playing of the first movement, I heard no evidence that this orchestra was becoming more articulate the way a public speaker becomes more articulate the more he practices what he has already committed to memory.

The second movement was a happier affair, I thought. Again it lacked subtle inflection but it moved quite evenly and surely through the miniature dance of the ardante molto mofo. The bird calls were well-played by both strings and brass, notably the flute, in fact as well as on some professional recordings I have heard.

The third movement allegro can be the most fiery, ominous part of the symphony if tautly and powerfully played. Perhaps the orchestra realized they could not do it justice because they mercifully omitted repeats in their rushed, unconsidered reading of it. The fourth movement allegro, a storm, was no storm at all, because again climaxes weren't well-focused — they were mushy and sprawling — and pianos and crescendoes were all of one middle-range voice. There were no icy storm-swept peaks, no hushed quavering whispers. Just the sound of mediocrity between the two.

The fifth movement allegretto is the tullest part of the symphony. It also has the longest, most deeply-breathing phrases. The orchestra simply swamped it with damp, turgid playing. There did not seem to be alacrity in any bow, and here as much as anywhere I began to wonder if there wasn't the misapprehension float that this was a concerto for double-basses. The movement simply drowned itself out, like feedback from an over-loud loudspeaker.

Altogether, the playing was like a tedious essay which uses the right words in all the wrong ways. The orchestra could play the notes well enough, for the most part and together at that, but never snappily or hauntingly — just ploddingly. I feel they can do better and, if lack of rehearsal is a problem, it still should not be assumed that Beethoven can endure any amount of misplaying just because he is Beethoven. Ian Scott

Love triangle sets Rosmersholm's dark moods

Ibsen wrote Rosmersholm in 1886 — a play which paved the way for Chekov and, later, Shaw. It is being presented at Hart House in a new production of David Gardner's. I first met Gardner in 1961 when he was adjudicating the BC Regional of the DDF. Since then he has successfully worked as the artistic director of the Vancouver Playhouse and Theatre Officer for the Canada Council. He is now an MA student at U of T. A few days before opening, I talked with him about the production.

"This play is rarely done, and what may seem like repetition is rather the interaction of traditional devices. The only difference between a student and an adult cast is experience, and my main interest as a director is not to create a few star performances but to bring everyone up to an adequate standard — which is quite difficult as we have had no solid rehearsal times. We've had to work around commitments. We've rehearsed about four weeks, for three-and-a-half hours a night, which, considering the complexity of the play, is more realistically only two weeks of rehearsal.

"This is the third play I have directed at Hart House, the others being Look Back in Anger and The Father. I have never done Ibsen before, although I have done Strindberg and Chekov.

"Someone once described Rosmersholm as a magnetic field; the fortunes shift constantly to an existential ending, an aquarian ending. It has great subtlety, like a detective story. It moves forward and backward at the same time — an effect of mirrors.

"It is a difficult and diabolical play, with realistic and expressionistic overtones. I have no desire to imprint my own image on the play. It has a sculptural quality, like the set, which is the complimentary setting for the jewel of the play. All the parts are eminently actable: Rebecca has been done by Duse, Ashcroft and Dame Edith, Rosmer by Scotfield and Porter, and Brendel (a symbolic cross of Don Quixote and Cyrano) by George Arliss.

"The play is set in a country manse overlooking a small town on a Norwegian fjord. Beside the house there is a stream and an abandoned mill race. For Ibsen the sound of running water is very evocative and it is a leit motif in the play. The house has just finished being in mourning for John Rosmer's wife, Beata — a name very connotive here. Also living in the house is a young emancipated lady, Rebecca West, who nursed Beata in her last illness. Beata committed suicide, and the reasons for this and the motives become clear as we go through. Also, the relationship between Rosmer and Rebecca is subject to town gossip. In fact it is essentially a love triangle of Rosmer and the two women in his life — the one with him now and the other now dead.

"All this is set against a very real Norwegian political situation in the 1880's — personified by an ultra-right-wing character, Dr. Kroll (trolls) who is the principal of the local high school and a young radical left-wing newspaper editor, Peter Mortensgaard, leader of the party in power. The key to understanding this play is that Norway was not then independent of Sweden, with problems like many emerging nations have today. The theme of liberation echoes through the play, which combines the elements of a conversational detective story and a Victorian ghost hunt."

Does this production succeed? A qualified yes. The performances vary from heavy-handed and rather pedestrian efforts to some delightful pieces of acting, such as Rod Beattie's Ulrik. Basically this production has broad sketches which lack finer detail, but the ending is a real tipoff. Gardner is a master of moods.

TWO ROOMS — TWO DANCE FLOORS

Tremblay intertwines present and past

Forever Yours, Marie-Lou is a jewel of a play, there is no doubt. Yet Michel Tremblay's penetrating vision of a Québec family finds such sensitive treatment in its first English production now at the Tarragon Theatre, that one wonders just where to direct one's enthusiasm first.

Entering the already darkened theatre, one sees the play's four characters in their habitual activities. Marie-Louise, the mother, is sitting in her living-room chair, knitting. Her husband, Leopold, is seated on the opposite side of the stage, contemplating the several beers on the table before him. This couple, dead now for ten years, has been placed, in Tremblay's words, "where they had been happiest in life". They are still a living presence for their daughter Manon who sits in a rocking chair centre stage, mechanically fingering her rosary. She is obsessed by the past. Only Carmen, her sister, is mobile during the play, having returned to visit Manon and convince her to at last put all the "shit" of their childhood behind her.

Tremblay presents two parallel conversations — one between the sisters whose lifestyles contrast so sharply, and the other between the parents, who never seem to have exchanged a tender word during Carmen and Manon's devastating childhood. This latter conversation uncovers the tortured married life of Leopold and Marie-Louise from the naive optimism of their courtship ("forever yours, Marie-Lou", she had signed on her photograph) through the reality of her disgust for sex and his resulting "brutality", the struggle to support the family God imposed on them, and the morbid delights of taunting one another as they await deliverance from death or insanity.

Carmen and Manon tune in on their exchanges from time to time, becoming suddenly the two little girls who overhear their parents arguing. Immediately afterwards, Carmen returns to her present surprisingly mature perspective, whereas Manon remains psychologically the child stimulated by the violent scenes.

The two dialogues reach a sublime level that often borders on the poetic. When Marie-Louise mentions having read that a family is a living cell, and then protests that it is more of a prison cell, one is moved not only by the richness of the image but by the sight of Manon in her rocking chair ten years later, a true prisoner of her family's past. At one point, both conversations are concerning "peace", and it becomes evident that these estranged individuals share universally human agonies. Four individuals unable to communicate present points of view that, again in the words of Tremblay, "merge, blend, and intermingle to the point of becoming just one".

How does one stage a play that is based on psychological states expressed through words and not action? Won't it need some living up? After all, Tremblay has not written a radio play. Incredibly (and I don't think the word is too strong), I found no problem of visual boredom, even though Carmen (June M. Keevil) is the only person who stands and walks during the uninterrupted two hours (with a single exception I won't reveal). Her physical ease in filling the space of the tiny kitchen is in dramatic contrast to the other members of her family who sit glued to their chairs as they are to their attitudes. The distance between Leopold (George Sperdakos) and Marie-Louise (Patricia Hamilton) and the fact that they face the audience as they address each other are two stimulating visual factors. One becomes highly sensitive to changes in the positions of gestures of the seated characters. Manon (Toby Tainow) marks time in her rocking-chair with such relentlessness that when she leans forward and stops suddenly, an immediate tension is created. Lighting helps define the transitions from past to present as well as emphasizing the isolation of the parents and children.

In brief, Bill Glassco's production has drawn on the wealth of psychological interest found in Tremblay's play without having to go beyond it. He has four gifted actors with whom to create a stunning dramatic counterpoint. He seems to have favoured certain humorous moments, like a debate over the economic advantages of "smooth peanut butter" over "crunchy". Once or twice I sensed in Leopold the bellowing style of Ralph Cramden (remember "The Honeymooners"?), which may indicate that in some instances Glassco has gone too far. Both Tremblay and Glassco understand the relation between the comic and pathetic, at any rate.

Criticisms? Well, sometimes Carmen sounded more like she had taken an introductory course in psychology than she did a singer at rodeos. I can't think of anything else. When all sorts of new productions are making sensational and often futile efforts to "involve" the spectator, and one comes across a production which is engaging by virtue of being a genuinely human experience, does one have to complain?

Rich, intimate tone of Smetana Quartet a welcome change from cold perfection

After 27 years of ensemble playing, the Smetana Quartet has acquired a reputation for a kind of intimate excellence that is quite in contrast with the cold perfection of many American quartets. On Thursday last week they played an afternoon concert at Eaton's Auditorium, which by my conservative estimate will have been about the three thousandth time they have publicly performed. The program consisted of quartets by Beethoven, Janacek and Smetana.

One of the glorious mysteries of music is the way that musicians will continue to discover new beauty and pleasure in a composition which has been their close companion for a life time. Just as their instruments have become their voices, so the quartets have become their thoughts to be expressed on the stage. It was an awesome experience to see the four musicians appear on stage, carrying no music except that within them, solemn like four priests about to celebrate mass. And because the music came from within and not off the printed page, one had the feeling that with the "input" half of the pathway eliminated, all thought and energy was directed outward, towards the listener.

I found it interesting that the Beethoven Quartet Op.95 showed an almost Slavic persuasion, especially in the lilting phrasing of the last movement. Yet the work was no less Beethoven for this, rather a new side to the music, previously hidden but now coaxed forth by kindred spirits. The Janacek Quartet No. 1 is a short work which opens with a sequence of rugged recitatives across all four instruments. The dynamics of the instruments ran the full range but never for the sake of contrast only. After all, coherence in music is not due to the abrupt juxtaposition of extremes of the dynamic range (as some quartets would have us believe) but rather to the invisible threads that link these and that enmesh the whole performance.

The last work, Bedrick Smetana's Quartet No. 1, subtitled "From My Life" begins with the viola in dramatic declamation against a shimmering tapestry of sustained minor chords in the three other instruments. The quartet's unique approach to this work became apparent in their flexible tempos, especially in the Polka and the Largo. At times the instruments would softly merge, as if the strings were of one source, only arbitrarily drawn up on four separate instruments. The music would precipitate the listener into the dizzying whirlwind of the dance, then caress him with a gently turned phrase. I felt not that the performers were following the music, but rather that both performers and music were pursuing the golden thread of Smetana's creative thread woven through the notes.

Poet-performers strive for meaning in songs

The thing that links John Prine, Jackson Browne, Tom Rush, John Hartford, Jennifer, Dory Previn, Jim Messina and Kenny Loggins is the importance they give their words. Not that they always make it into poetry, but they are at least looking that way, while most pop/rock/folk settles for sixties variants on moon and June.

It's raining out tonight
What a way to end a day
By turning out the light
John Prine

Introducing John Prine at Mariposa, Shelley Posen recalled first hearing Prine's record. "At last", Posen said, "Someone has done it, recorded thirteen perfect songs." Prine draws a lot of that kind of praise. One hopes it doesn't kill him.

I don't hear either of Prine's albums John Prine (WEA) and Diamonds in the Rough (WEA) as perfect, but they each have more poetry than one could reasonably expect. Prine writes in the plain hard-times style of Woody Guthrie or early Bob Dylan, and sings just as naturally (or badly). The voice, melodies and arrangements could drift out of any Toronto country and western bar. But not the lyrics: If dreams were lightning, and thunder was desire, this old house would have burnt down a long time ago. Not the images: make me an angel that flies from Montgomery. Prine sings ordinary songs about ordinary people but without the ordinary clichés. He ought to be played on CFGM, although he probably isn't.

It's heartening to find that Diamonds in the Rough is not all that different from the first album. It takes a strong writer not to be bled and confused by his own success. Prine so far has managed it.

Say, I'll sing you a song about Vegas town and Poor Old Howard Hughes, Locked up in his hotel suite, trying to find his shoes,
Got so much to lose,
Poor Old Howard Hughes,
And all of his blues.

— John Hartford

John Hartford's new album Morning Bugle (WEA) is a let down after his last Aereo-plain, but then that is like Magical Mystery Tour not measuring up to Sergeant Pepper. Aereo-plain was incomparable: four virtuoso musicians — Hartford on banjo, Norman Blake on guitar, Vassar Clements on fiddle and old Tut Taylor on dobro —; impeccable production (by David Bromberg); and Hartford's simple but unpredictable composition and hip, suburban poetry. (Hartford is one of the only three full-time poets in American pop music, Paul Simon and James Taylor being the others.)

Clemens and Tut Taylor are gone from Morning Bugle and missed, as if the songs, though good, were still in rehearsal waiting for the rest of the parts to be figured out. The record is relaxed and Blake and Hartford's musicianship is impeccable, but like the post-Beatles solo albums, the ghosts of the others are loud in their absence. We have been spoiled.

The wind on the water can't go very far
Just 'round this world forever
The way that I love you can't last long Just 'til this life is over
 — Tom Rush

Tom Rush is now writing most of his own material, which is a bit of a disappointment since his taste in others' was always so reliable. Not that his own songs are bad: Wind on the Water (on his first album after switching labels, Tom Rush) is a fine simple love song. One just wishes that he would limit himself to one or two of his best as he did with Joni Mitchell, James Taylor, Jackson Browne or Murray McLauglan.

Rush has always been equally comfortable in folk or rock, and likes to shunt tempo and style from one song to the next. This is hard on more biased people like myself, so I wind up playing Rush albums less often than their parts call for. Tom Rush (Columbia) is no exception. Still it's tasty and includes Jackson Browne's Jamaica, Say You Will and a haunting folksong called Gypsy Boy by Bob Carpenter.

Don't confront me with my follures,
I've not forgotten them.
 — Jackson Browne

Jackson Browne is another song-writer's song-writer. Shadow, Dream Song, Jamaica, Say You Will and These Days are all Browne songs, not hits but appreciated over the last four or five years. Word had it that Browne himself didn't record for so long because he couldn't sing. There is still a husky, flat quality in his voice that gives credence to the rumour, although Browne is polished by comparison to John Prine.

Browne's album (on WEA), put out by star-manager Dave Geffin (Joni Mitchell, David Crosby, Graham Nash) is a disappointment. Jamaica is on it, and another sad-beautiful piece called Something Fine, but there is nothing in the rest that reveals a poet's control or daring. Browne is never short of ideas, always sensitive, but here his stuff comes out too bare of image, unarresting, too explanatory, as if he hasn't quite survived the move from folk to rock.

Going home is such a ride,
Going home is such a ride,
Going home is such a low and lonely ride.
 — Dory Previn

Between bar stools is Dory Previn. Her singing is in the supper-club, Streisand mould, all control and theatre, but her words are anything but "Easy Listening". I can't imagine where she is played. Dory Previn sings angst: family betrayal, making love and getting fucked (literally), being used and used up. Therapy songs. The music, the ideas and the lyrics are all tricky and clever, a little too clever for my taste, but it is nice to know that Streisand music is being sabotaged just as Prine is doing it to C and W. Mythical Kings and Iguanas is a little more disciplined than her more recent album, Reflections in a Mud Puddle.

And now you're slow and now you're sweet, and still I'll turn you down.
 — Jennifer

Jennifer (Warren) is known more on the West coast than here. She was part of the Los Angeles Hair company, and then look off on her own, on the strength of a flower-child manner and husky, Lauren Bacallish voice. Jennifer, the album, is like many other first records, over-arranged. And Jennifer mumbles. But like Tom Rush, she has a good ear for a new song (Donovan's Sand and Foam, Jim Webb's P. F. Sloan). The record has grown on me.

Tell her she's the kind of a woman,
Who sends you home,
Knowin' that you really been loved.
 — Loggins-Messina

Loggins and Messina produce unadulterated, big, studio rock, a genre that usually strikes these ears as dehumanized. Not on Sittin' In (Columbia). The lyrics are sensitive and smart (a hard thing to be in that medium), and Messina, as producer, has put them well out front, safe from the intricacies of horn section entries and rhythm changes. The music is so tight and charged that it works even on someone who finds Delaney and Bonney a loud bore. While it is a bit like a cyclist's choice of gasolines, Loggins and Messina are the nicest rock I've heard since Crosby, Stills and Nash's first record.
Bob Bossin

Right-on records rate recognition, raves rock reviewer

Many of the groups which rode the crest of British popularity in 1964 are no longer with us some eight years later. As with the Beatles, many musical combos perished for a variety of reasons. Had the Hollies not been the stable, yet refreshingly dynamic collection of talents that persisted to evolve their inimitable style, the departure of Graham Nash might have spelled finis to one of the princeling groups in British rock's hierarchy.

While the departure of one of the Brothers Fogerty from Creedance ultimately doomed that band Nash's defection to sunny California was merely a stage in the Hollies' development as rock innovators supreme.

It was a Creedance-style tune, Long Cool Woman in a Black Dress, which spiralled the Hollies into the focal highlight of the all-important play-lists of the Top-40-market radio stations. While departing from the high harmonics and lyrically-crisp five and six-part vocals that identified the Hollies as originators of such classics as Bus Stop, Carrie Ann and Look Through Any Window, it managed to epitomize the experimentation which went into the last three or four Hollies collections. Since the success of He Ain't Heavy, He's My Brother, as a single and as an album, the Hollies became more and more oriented toward what could almost be called a symphonic flair in their arrangements of their own material.

On Distant Light, (Columbia) as on Moving Finger, their last album, Ron Richards, the Hollies producer shapes many of the songs around some exquisite piano and organ work by Bernie Calvert, and fits the harmony in with lead vocalist Allan Clarke's more than adequate voice. Such a song as Look What We've Got, which begins with a gentle piano introduction, works in a late-fiftish sax solo and some powerful syncopation through Bobby Elliott's drums.

Hold On is an out-and-out rocker in the manner of Long Cool Woman, which changes tempo at the mid-way point to bring in a typical Hollies touch evoked by a driving acoustic guitar bridge. Plunging into a Beach Boys opening on Promised Land, the vocal strength of the Hollies is made manifest, while again the lead guitar filters in over that solid acoustic guitar framework that is almost as much a trademark for this groups as their tight vocalizing. Having taken their early vocal style right out of the Everly Brothers Songbook and then tripled it, the Hollies continue to evoke memories of the halcyon days of rock (before the psychedelic perversions of the late sixties), when vocal agility counted for more than a Marshall amplifier deafening the first thirty rows of a Grand Funk concert.

If, as with modern poetry, pop music lyrics should reflect the kind of society we live in today, then the songs of Harry Chapin on Sniper and Other Love Songs (WEA), are, as they say, "right on"! For example, how much more contemporaneous can you get than a song about the weirdo who mounted the tower down in Texas and played sniper until he had gunned down a collection of victims that wandered into his psychopathic sights? Harry's testament to that madman is an imaginatively contrived ten-minute song which probes the usual reasons for such schizoid erratic behaviour—girlfriend problems, paranoia, and parental rejection—not with the convoluted prose of a psychiatrist's report, but with changing melodies, tempos, and intensities of modern rock music of the city.

There are other "love songs" included—Sunday Morning Sunshine has all of the happy bounce of a show-tune such as "Mame" or "Hello Dolly" — And The Baby Never Cries tells of a guitar-player's solace in the arms of a young mother deserted by her "old man" who "just took off for the coast", and as the title implies, the child is never much of an impediment. Burning Herself sounds like something right out of Harry's Haight-Ashbury Handbook — all about a woman who gets off by putting lit cigarettes against her skin.

The trio of musicians who worked so well with Harry at his recent Riverboat appearance are good enough to withstand being replaced by studio cats in this session.

There's Tim Scott who plays the best rock cello since McCartney's "Yesterday"; Ron Palmer is on lead guitar and harmony vocals; long-time friend and boy soprano with a falsetto that just won't quit is John Wallace, who thumps the electric bass. In addition to these three who join with Chapin's guitar to produce their unique stage-sound, the album gains not a little from the keyboard and string arrangements of Steve Chapin and the percussion of Russ Kunkel (whose work with James Taylor and Carole King placed him in high esteem).

Listening to the "love song" Woman Child — a moving tale about "a two-hundred dollar mishap", one gets the feeling that Chapin could make a beautiful song about the carnage of a Hanoi fire-bomb raid. Imagine how beautifully Chapin can make a conventional song of autumn and approaching winter chills unfold against an acoustic guitar and Tim Scott's subtle cello scales and you have the poignant Winter Song.

Shredder (WEA), one of those albums that has flashes of greatness comes via the Montreal-based Wackers—five guys who compose and sing their own imaginative, yet hauntingly familiar songs. At times through the harsh, grinding guitar solos of J. P. Lauzon, the Kinks seem to be lurking in the musical shadows, as on Puttin' Myself to Sleep; on the acoustic-dominated unorthodox harmonies and chord patters of I'll Believe In You, the Beatlemania-album era of the Liverpool sound is called up; perhaps the closest one comes to pinpointing the Wacker's sound would be to point out that Eventually has all of the earmarks of a Badfinger number with all of the inventiveness that Pete Ham and company utilize on their best efforts.

Not that the Wackers are merely imitative—the vocal of Robert Segarín, backed by Randy Bishop's vocals on Coming Apart is proof of the quintet's claim to recognition. The Wackers give every indication that they have the stuff of success—you may be hearing a lot more from them.

movies

I drove straight from The Go-Between to my farm where I raved to everybody about this rare and beautiful film. They all went to see it and hated it to a man.

I concede that The Go-Between is flawed, but it is still a masterpiece, the product of two mature artists, writer Harold Pinter and director, Joseph Losey. Pinter can turn a round of formal introductions into a mechanical minuet by human figurines screwed to some great social Swiss clock. At the same time he creates a boy who faces the mysteries of sex with the sweaty fear of a real flesh-and-blood person (in contrast to the Summer of '42 kids who were strictly the whimsical anecdotes of defensive old men). Leo, the boy, may not know, but he knows he doesn't know, and Pinter never belittles his incomplete wisdom.

Hurrahing Joseph Losey is more dangerous. His is a grand, formalistic, mannered style that makes an awful splash when it flops. But, when it succeeds, it is spectacular. His cricket match is a master's cadenza. So is the moment when Margaret Leighton answers her daughter's request to go shopping with a "yes" inflected like a head-of-state's declaration of war. In this one second close-up, the plot advances half an hour. With Alan Bates (once more the worthy peasant) and Julie Christie (as ever, the girl above his station). Roxy, 99c.

Science fiction lacks character, I say. Even its superior practitioners seem to blow their load on fantastic new technologies, leaving the people dwarfed — rudimentary bourgeoisie in turtle-neck suits. A friend, however, says I have seen the wrong sci-fi, and that some of the best, most socially conscious writers hid there through the cold war, producing brilliant political allegory. He cites Invasion of the Body Snatchers.

I like the theory, even if it isn't true. Body Snatchers, Seconds, Alphaville, War of the Worlds, The Incredible Shrinking Man, and Je t'aime, Ja t'aime are among the sci-fi classics being shown at the Revue in an all weekend binge, starting tonight. $5 for a weekend pass. Call 535-4100 for times.

Also this week: Tonight and Saturday at St. Mike's, Mon Oncle Antoine, Claude Jutra's little classic about our neighbours to the north-east. Canada's only all-time great movie.

Thursday at the Roxy, another of Truffaut's greatest hits, The 400 Blows.

Contest: Send your name and phone number and a list of your favourite movies to CONTEST, the Varsity, 91 St. George St. (Campus mail is free.) The prize is a pair of tickets to more-or-less any movie in town. The winner will be chosen on the basis of correctness (your list checked against one made up by the heads of English departments of four Metro high schools). Dr on the basis of whimsey. music

The second East York Symphony concert will take place at Leaside High School Auditorium on November 24 at 8:30 pm, and at the Church of the Holy Trinity, November 26, at 8:30 pm. The program is Morawetz, Ravell, Britten and Brahms, his symphony no. 4. Minimum price is $2.

Tomorrow, November 25, is the final day of the Contemporary Music Showcase, which is a week-long "festival" of contests to promote new music for teaching and performance, capped by a workshop, which is tomorrow. The works which the student contestants played have been scrupulously selected from all over the Western world, and are distinguished by their high value as listening entertainment as well as by their didactic usefulness. The booklet of works played is to be used as a handbook for music teachers. For outsiders, the highlight of the showcase will probably be the workshop which is subtitled New Techniques for Performing New Music. Lukas Foss, that exuberant, knowledgeable and imaginative pianist-conductor-composer, will deliver the key-note address at 9:30 am. Music Publishers' exhibits will be on view from 10:30 to 11, and from 11 to 12 shows his stainless steel and monochrome fibreglass sculptures. Hart House hosts James B. Spencer in an exhibit entitled "Waves".

noon there will be discussion and/or performance arising from the keynote address—which implies, we all hope, Lukas Foss will talk about and play some of his own compositions. At 2 pm, slides and tapes will be shown and played respectively, followed by, or intermixed with, commentary by Samuel Dolin, Harry Freedman, Lothar Klein and Harry Somers. At 3:30 quite young students will play a commissioned work by Gerhard Wuensch, "Six Disguises", illustrating a variety of contemporary techniques possible for student performers. At 8 pm there will be a concert by the contest scholarship winners. I advise you take in this workshop selectively, giving preference to the Lukas Foss address and the panel presentation.

The University of Toronto Concert Band gives a concert this Sunday afternoon at 3 pm in the MacMillan Theatre. Works played are by Alfred Reed, Gordon Jacob, Vaughan Williams, Paul Creston, Percy Grainger, Brahms and Smetana. It is free and no tickets are required.

The same day, November 26, at, believe it or not, the same time the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir and the National Arts Centre Orchestra, fresh from Britain, will present Handel's Solomon. Elmer Iseler conducts, with Don Garrard (bass) as Solomon, Charles Bressler (tenor) as Zadok, Lois Marshall (soprano) as the Queen of Sheba, Ricki Turofsky (soprano) as Solomon's Queen, Stephanie Bogle and Roxolano Roslak, (both sopranos). Contact at Massey Hall 363-7301 for price info, discounts for students. Tickets also available at Eaton's Attractions ticket offices. All who can, go to this concert.

Yet again, the same day, November 26, sees another concert presented, at Scarborough at 3:30. Norma Lewicki Tetreau (soprano) and Frank Tetreau (piano) perform in a recital of arias by Handel, songs by Brahmas and Britten, and of works by Haydn and Liszt. It is free as usual.

We are here as on a darkling plain where ignorant concert programmers clash by night. Or so it seems, as there is another concert programmed for this Sunday. It is at 8 pm, but who wants to rush from three hours at Massey Hall to have dinner and sit through two hours of Schumann works, however felicitously played. Anyways, for those who want to, or for those who intend to go to this concert (heaven forbid), Kathryn Root, performs a heavily researched Schumann-eramma — which involves playing the man's works and reading from his love letters among other things.

The Faculty of Music in conjunction with the Goethe Institute is hosting Professor Christoph Wolff of Columbia University on Monday, November 17 at 8 pm in the Concert Hall. He will give a lecture titled "Seculi Sui Musicus Excellentissimus — Critical Reflections On An Epitaph for Heinrich Schutz". This will be followed by a program of works by Schutz performed by the Faculty of Music Collegium Musicum, directed by Prof. Greta Kraus. No tickets, no charge.

The University of Toronto Concert Choir, conductor Lloyd Bradshaw, presents a concert of works by Holman, Britten, Schafer, Somers, Ravel and others, on November 29 at 8:30 pm. No tickets, no charge.

Brunswick Avenue.

The little known Firehall Theatre is featuring Anne Hebert's work, La Tamps Sauvage, in its first English translation. The theatre is located one block west of Parliament at Adelaide, 70 Berkely St. Students $2, Tuesday to Thursday.

Rats, (that's the name of the production), "an unaccompanied musical by the author and composer of Justine" is participatory in the full sense of the word. The audience will be requested to help the actors build the set. Global Village, 17 St. Nicholas St. Tuesdays through Saturdays until December 9.

The Theatre Passe Muraille open Pilk's Madhouse on November 29. For the benefit of those students unable to attend theatre regularly during this burdened time of the year, this is the only production which has an indefinite run.

pop

The Band is a well rehearsed, tight-knit group that has until now tried to reproduce album arrangements to the finest detail in concert. Exacting use of LP arrangement is fine for concert goers whose enjoyment is reinforced by the visual performance but on record the same songs would seem to lack spontaneity and excitement while the studio versions offer inevitably better sound quality. So the Band has tried to save something for the album audience by deviating from their usual concert format on their latest LP, Rock of Ages (Capitol), recorded live in New York City.

The vehicle for generating listener attention is the novel addition of brass.

A five-man horn section was brought in under the direction of Allen Toussaint (who arranged the brass on Cahoots) to freshen up some of the songs and the Band occasionally shifted around a few arrangements to accommodate the extras. The new sound works well on some of the songs, especially Holland-Dozier-Holland's "Don't Do It" and the old favorites, "Caledonia Mission" and "W. S. Walcott". On "Chest Fever" Robbie Robertson has even gone so far as to change the vocal phrasings and rhythms to make full use of the brass. But there are too many times when the Band ignores the other five men on stage. "King Harvest" is an example of the horns sounding as though they were thrown in as an afterthought to the already coherent arrangement. The brass embellishments in "The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down" in fact, serves to burden it with flippant horn passages rather than rejuvenate it.

The musicianship is generally of excellent quality and The Band's own production is as succinct as their studio efforts. But a few annoying mistakes managed to pop up in the course of the hour-and-a-half session. Those that stood out most were: Garth Hudson's wrong note in the organ introduction to "Chest Fever" and the flat horn in the intro to "Life Is A Carnival". The trumpet was also blurring when it should have had brilliance.

If you're a Band fanatic you'll probably want the album, if not, listen to the first three LP's again because Rock of Ages is basically a sampler with no important new songs.

Siring Band, fronted by the down-home voice and magic fingers of I'Hebdo's own Bob Bossin can be heard on Tuesday night at Fiddler's Green Coffeehouse, which is located behind the YMCA on Eglinton east of Yonga (across from the York Theatres). Bob and the band have been rehearsing diligently since their last well-received appearance in the city at the Guy Fawkes celebration, so try and get out and see them. Admission is a paltry $1.

Cedric Smith, formerly of Perth County Conspiracy and his Canadian poet mentor Milton Acorn, are bringing "The Spirit of 1837 Festival" to the OCE auditorium tomorrow at 8 pm. Advance tickets at $2 are available at SAC and Round Records while admission at the door is $2.50.

Ibsen's Roamingholm marks the second Hart House production of the season. (See article.) Prices are $2.50 and $1.25 for students.

Erindale is presenting something lively, it seems—The Hamlet Show, "starring Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, Ophelia, Claudius, Rosencrantz & Guildenstern, the gravediggers, the Ghost, Polonius, Laertes, Poor Yorrick and others." Performances until Saturday night at 8:30, and there is a Saturday matinee at 3 pm. Buses are available between St. George and Erindale campus. Free.

St. Michael's College is presently inhabiting the U.C. Playhouse with You Know I Can't Hear You When The Water's Running. Go and find out what it is about. (Then tell us.)

La Troupe Cala-Theatre, which was seen at the UC Playhouse November 8-11, has found its permanent niche in the sub-basement of the E.J. Pratt Library. The grand opening will take place on Thursday, November 30, at 8:30 pm. You can see the best of the UC show plus a one act play, Edouard et Agrippine. Refreshments on hand.

Still playing to a full house is Forever Yours, Marie-Lou, at the Tarragon Theatre, 30 Bridgman. Tuesdays through Sunday at 8:30. Sunday matinee at 2:30. Also, Les Bonnes has its last two performances this weekend at the Theatre du P'tit Bonheur, 95 Danforth. Goat Island is into its final week at the Poor Alex, 296

Boards should fight education bureaucracy

By RANDY ROBERTSON
 Globe and Mail educational writer Loren Lind called Wednesday night for more confrontation between boards of education and the provincial ministry of education to "clarify the issues".

Lind was speaking to an audience of about 60 people at a panel discussion sponsored by the Toronto Arts Foundation with the Toronto Citizen on the role of the trustee at St. Lawrence Town Hall.

Lind claimed there is a strong link between bureaucracy and the Ministry of Education — "a very secure link which needs to be scrutinized. If school trustees want autonomy, they may have to fight their way through their own bureaucracy," he said.

Toronto Board of Education assistant director Duncan Green angrily asserted that "no official with a conscience lives with security". He also said he did not feel secure about his own job.

Lind said the ideal trustee will organize the board on which he serves. "Trustees should get together. Too often they are splintered," he said.

"Trustees too often see board meetings as classroom situations with the director of education as the teacher."

Lind said that teachers in their struggles with the ministry, "have to grasp the power they have available. Maybe they should walk out in January. Maybe we should find out if we can do without schools for a while."

Ward 5 trustee Fiona Nelson claimed that the ministry of education is deliberately centralizing decision-making in its hands.

She said it began the process with its imposition of ceilings on school board budgets. And the proposals of the Reville report on labour relations within the school system, she said, are putting teachers into an inferior position.

The report suggests teachers lose the right to negotiate their own salaries and fringe benefits. Nelson said "the proposals are only a short step away from a provincial contract."

Nelson claimed that the ministry is encouraging trustees to regard their trusteeships as unimportant and part-time so that they will not use the powers they have or seek any others.

Trustees are currently paid $3,500 a year. The ministry, Nelson noted, sets the salaries.

Green supported Nelson in these charges. "The ministry itself is acting against these elected officials," he said, "so we can't attack the trustees for their failings."

Nelson said she did not see the job of trustee strictly in restricted educational terms. She said the trustee has to have some conception of social priorities so that he can decide educational priorities.

Government decisions which might affect the urban environment are the concern of the trustee, she said, citing her opposition to the Spadina Expressway.

She said the trustee should not be an arbitrator or an ombudsman. "He has a more general role," she said. "He should help set policies that will prevent problems from arising."

Trustees, she said, have to ensure that laws are applicable to the present day. The provincial government, she noted, has now made changes in the school administration laws allowing municipalities to provide funds for schools which are designed as community resource centres. This was only logical in view of the declining birth rate, she said.

Nelson stressed the importance of a diversity of options for students in the educational system. "The tendency over the years," she said, "has been to blame the victim — the student — for course failure."

"We are realizing or we should be — that though our criteria may be standardized, they are not objective. We've hidden behind mumbo-jumbo in previous years but now we are admitting we can't judge students objectively."

"We have to provide students with course choices — matching up the school environment of the student with his home environment."

Green said that many practical problems need to be solved before community schools can successfully be set up. He said "these experiments always end up affecting someone's job," a principal's or teacher's.

Green said that schools are only "floundering around" in attempts to involve outside resource people in class teaching.

Nelson said "society has changed. In the 1960's, students were sold a bill of goods on the advantage of staying in school."

"Students of the 70's have realized that staying screwed into their desks is not going to pay off. The students of the 60's who delayed their gratification never got it."

Today's students will not wait for gratification and cannot be controlled by the work ethic, she said.

Will politicians get to like mothers as much as roadways?

By EDWARD PODGORSKI
 Erna Koffman, aldermanic candidate in Ward 5, claimed Monday night at an all-candidates that "community control emanates out of Holy Trinity Church."

"They go ahead and try to control the people. A few people move in, call themselves ratepayers, and put the pressure on elected personnel."

Dan Heap, candidate for alderman in Ward 6 (and a member of Holy Trinity's congregation), countered, "Developers are the small group. Communities are trying to take City Hall back from speculators who have controlled City Hall for a long time."

Except for this brief exchange, discussion by the candidates for the alderman's seats in Wards 5 and 6 was low-key. Arthur Downes, running in Ward 6, said it well: "I'm for motherhood, provided mothers will go along with it."

150 people had gathered at the Friendship Meeting House to hear the candidates for alderman in Wards 5 and 6. Nine of the 13 candidates were there.

Completion of the Spadina Expressway was supported by Wilson Greig, candidate in Ward 5. Downes stated he flatly opposed the expressway.

Instead, Downes spoke for a better system of public transportation. David Astle, Ying Hope, and Colin Vaughan, all candidates in Ward 5, agreed in short answers to a question.

Asked who they would support for mayor, Downes, Heap, Hope, and Vaughan said they would choose David Crombie.

Greig preferred Tony O'Donohue. "I'm for the Irishman," he quipped.

Hope thought all three major candidates were fine men, but preferred Crombie.

A firm "no" to the widening of Dundas Street came from Ward 5 alderman William Archer, running in Ward 6, Downes, and Hope.

All candidates promised to reveal the source of campaign funds. Ward 5 candidate Melania Gural, did state, however, that she saw no point in continuing to canvass for funds. She thought the opposing candidates were too good, and predicted she would lose.

CONGRATULATIONS TO EPI...

For some time, there has been a problem in loud-speaker design.

Either the loudspeaker sounded like a transistor radio with a blanket over it...

Or it needed inordinate amounts of power, which meant an expensive amplifier.

EPI (who are better known for some excellent power-hungry speakers) have done something about it.

The EPI Microtower. 5 watts rms is enough power. $130 the pair is enough money. And that's enough to earn our congratulations.

Pollution fighters need support: mandarin

By JULIA ELCOCK

The federal government's deputy environmental minister told about 200 people Wednesday to "keep on hating us", so that the government is pressured into acting against pollution.

R.F. Shaw, speaking to a symposium sponsored by the forestry faculty on the government's role in the environment at the Medical Sciences Auditorium, said "the heat is off", speaking of public pressure, but he called the public to continue pressuring the government for changes.

"There is no local environmental problem," he said. The problem of the environment must be attacked for "the welfare of all mankind".

Shaw spoke of the International Conference of the Environment held in Stockholm last June, at which he was a delegate, as "history-making".

He said that he felt that in treating environmental problems, emphasis should be placed on the environment first and jurisdiction, i.e. constitutional division of powers, second.

However, the province has the major jurisdiction in pollution control, asserted Ontario Deputy Minister of the Environment Everett Biggs.

There must be controls enforced on infringements of jurisdiction, Biggs felt, adding that the two governments must work together on the problems of the environment within their constitutional rights.

There is "no conflict with Ottawa", Biggs said, as for any progress to be made, "all agencies concerned must co-operate."

Biggs reiterated Shaw's call for individual participation, saying that "the spirit of Stockholm must live on". It is impossible, he felt, to hire enough people to do the job and so he applauded the efforts of Pollution Probe and other environmentally concerned public groups.

The federal government's Assistant Deputy Minister of the Environmental Protection Service, K.C. Lucas, defined the government's position towards the environment as lying between two extremes, that of taking immediate radical action, and believing that there are no technologically unsolvable environmental problems. This policy, Lucas felt, reflects "the values and aspirations of the people".

He stressed the need for more research studies by the government towards the understanding of long-term trends and said that it is the government's duty to help provinces work together to achieve aims. By the 1980's the results of the government's work will be apparent, Lucas said.

U of T associate law professor C.H. McNairn charged that the response to pollution at both the federal and provincial level was "not adequate". He called many of the government's responses "exercises in public relations" in an attempt to "convince the public of the government's concern".

McNairn stated governments prosecute selectively and that the problems of jurisdiction are overlaid to avoid taking action.

Lucas responded that prevention is the answer and prosecution is only used as a last resort.

Co-operation between the federal and Ontario governments, McNairn said, exists only as an exchange of information and not as a co-operation of legislation.

One area in which "we ought to go further," McNairn said, is in the "impact evaluation of provincial and federal major projects", such as highways, dams and pipelines, on the environment.

"It is wrong to blame industry for pollution," said International Nickel Co. vice-president L. Renzoni; industry is a "minor polluter".

Renzoni, speaking from the audience, said, "Industry has accepted its responsibilities... as a matter of necessity."

When industry does meet the standards, he said, "perhaps the quality of the environment will not improve that much".

Renzoni concluded that "it may be decided that we will accept some environmental embarrassments for the good of the public".

Learn about your own bodies, women told

By AGI LUKACS

When some women in a rap group on sexuality found that they didn't know much about their bodies, they took their clothes off, and looked. This was the beginning of an American woman's clinic called "Self-Help".

Donna Cherniak, a McMaster medical student, told this story to an audience of several hundred people — mostly women — who attended Wednesday's weekly public lecture sponsored by the Interdisciplinary Department's course on women. Cherniak, who worked with Montreal's first abortion clinic and helped produce the respected McGill handbooks on birth control and VD, was emphatic that women should control their bodies.

She showed slides to illustrate how a woman can examine her cervix, or someone else's, to check for infections, VD sores, or the changes which occur with pregnancy.

"A doctor who doesn't see you very often can't find these things while they are in their early stages as well as you can, if you know what your cervical area looks like most of the time," Cherniak indicated. "This varies from woman to woman."

She asked the women in the audience about the kind of treatment they had had from gynecologists. The female audience indicated, by a show of hands each time, that most of them hadn't known what to expect on their first visit, and weren't shown what the examining instrument (a speculum) looked like before it was inside them.

"That's not unrepresentative," commented Cherniak. "Do we have to put up with this?" she asked angrily.

"Happiness is seeing your own cervix," she later quipped, "or happiness is examining your sister's."

The women with "Self-Help" were shy about this at first, she said, but soon found that having some control over what was happening was preferable to the usual procedure in a doctor's office. "You don't need special doctor-eyes to see," Cherniak insisted.

She also showed slides of women seeing what menstruation or sperm look like in each other's bodies.

But she warned that you can run a danger doing these things in a clinic. A woman with "Self-Help" has been indicted for practicing medicine without a licence, she stated. Police seized instruments, and seized even the yogurt which is applied to a particular vaginal infection.

"Things haven't changed much," Cherniak feels. In 1322, she said, a woman who practiced medicine more successfully than some doctors at the University of Paris, was stopped by them, and condemned as a witch.

And "midwives really got it too". Their profession began to be phased out when forceps were invented, because only doctors were allowed to handle such surgical instruments.

Doctors have always been mostly male, including in Canada, noted Cherniak. But, 98 per cent of nurses, 94 per cent of dietitians, and 80 per cent of physiotherapists are women.

Doctors often don't care about patients, Cherniak feels.

"I see women tied down to a delivery table, sometimes without anyone around who speaks their language," Cherniak said.

Doctors may also induce labour so the delivery doesn't interfere with their evening or weekend plans. "Women take this in silence," Cherniak argued, "because they have been sold the myth of the joy of giving birth."

Another aspect of medicine she criticized was abortion. "Why have we never set up decent, competent services for abortion? They might still be illegal, but they'd be safer than illegal abortions are now."

"We have to take care of ourselves," she insisted, "and of each other."

PHE wins Div I lacrosse, defeats Erin 8-3

PHE finished the rout it started Tuesday night in Hart House gym and overwhelmed Erindale 8-3 last night to capture the Division I lacrosse championship and the Dufoe Cup.

PHE led 4-2 at the half on goals by MacNeil, Sorbie, and two by Brown. For Erindale it was Johnson and Coghill.

Erindale played a good first quarter, holding the ball and working in a defensive formation to enable Johnson to score the go-ahead goal.

PHE caught on to Erindale's strategy before the period was over and opened the game up, forcing the west campus team to play PHE's kind of lacrosse.

Erindale, feeling intimidated, began to play a much more defensive game and lost ball control. Sorbie's goal for PHE late in the first period was fired from just inside Erindale's side of centre line off a fuffoff.

Erindale's Coghill evened the score at two-all early in the second period but was injured on the play. Brown soon got the go-ahead goal for PHE and put PHE out ahead to stay.

PHE appeared more confident in this period and more aggressive;

Sorbie was predominant in checking his man, forcing him to the sidelines on most occasions when Erindale threatened.

Erindale appeared extremely defensive throughout the whole period and was very slow to check PHE.

Brown got three more consecutive goals in the third period to more than put the game away for PHE. One goal was a result of good PHE passing and bad Erindale checking, while another came off a bad Erindale pass and was intercepted. Erindale continued to disintegrate in the third period and passing was very erratic before a hard-checking PHE team.

PHE merely attempted to preserve its four goal lead in the final period keeping the ball and killing time. An angered Erindale team became annoyed on more than one occasion with the delaying tactics and a scuffle occurred which the referees handily cooled down.

At one point Erindale goalie P. Geraghty took a swipe at PHE's Fred Yonekura when he came "too" close to the goalie's crease. Yonekura kept his cool and popped in PHE's final goal with 30 seconds left to play.

The game was not as "rough", to say the least, as Tuesday's opener of the best of three series, with both teams conscious of game misconducts. Erindale's frustration in the latter half of the game seemed to add an element of tension but tempers were not overly flared. The game was won the hard way — checking and defensive play — while Tuesday's was a better display of solid passing. (This is not to deny that last night's match did have its exceptional moments.) Better "control" on the part of both teams would be the best answer.

PHE's goalie stops another shot in last night's game, won by a hard-checking PHE.

Blues stuff Gryphons, win 84-82

By BOB PRITCHARD

It was, as one spectator put it, "one hell of a game!"

But the Basketball Blues, winless in their last two games, came out the best of it, as they toppled a tough team of Guelph Gryphons 84-82 Wednesday night in what will probably be one of the best games of the season. (Regrettably, it was only an exhibition game.)

It was an impressive looking Guelph team which came onto the floor in Hart House in their warm-up. Led by 6'8" Wayne Morgan — leading scorer and rebounder in the Western Section last season — Guelph looked cool, confident and capable of defeating the Toronto opposition.

But once the game started, Gryphons soon lost their air of confidence, as the team carelessly began to throw the ball away. Gryphons seemed to have difficulty adjusting to the size of the Hart House gym, turning over the ball sixteen times in the first half.

Showing considerable ball-handling skill, Blues Tony Rudmik set the Toronto offence in motion, and using a number of plays against Guelph's man-to-man defence, Blues jumped to an 11-4 lead after five minutes of play.

Shortly after, Toronto coach McManus substituted three rookies for his regulars, and it looked as though Blues might lose sight of the lead. Soon after Guelph changed the score to 14-13 in its favour, and by the 13 minute mark were leading 25-20.

This, however, brought Blues back to life. Toronto's Glen Scott picked up the knack of invariably positioning himself in the holes in the Guelph defence, and with some alert and aggressive playing scored 14 points in the first half. But Toronto was by no means a one man team — quite the contrary. Blues rookies Doug Baker and Avo Albo, who have seen very limited action in the first two games, showed they were capable of more than just sitting on the bench.

Even though McManus kept his starting guards off for the majority of the half, Peter Oolup and Bill Francis, two other Varsity rookies, filled in adequately. With five minutes left in the half, Toronto regained the lead, 28-26.

Good heads-up ball and accurate shooting kept Varsity ahead of the Gryphons. Guelph was essentially a one man team with Wayne Morgan using his height effectively to score over half his team's points in the first twenty minutes. But even his performance wasn't enough, as the half ended with Blues leading 40-37.

The question was now, "Can they keep it up?"

With the start of the second half, Guelph settled down and began to work the ball around, taking only the best shots. Their two guards, Paul Allen and Chester Graham combined for 26 points against Blues, and with the score 68-58 in Gryphons' favour three-quarters of the way through the game, it looked as if Blues had seen the last of the lead.

Varsity had no such plans in mind. In the following sixty seconds, Blues scored six unanswered points, and by the 13 minute mark were leading 73-72.

Toronto then switched from the zone defence they had used all game to a man to man defence. Some pinpoint shooting by Rudmik, along with a couple of tip-ins by rookie centre Frank Cress, put Blues ahead 81-78 with a minute and a half to go in the game.

Those last ninety seconds were as exciting as Hart House spectators could have asked for. With 32 seconds remaining, Cress was fouled by Guelph and put in one of his two shots to make it 82-78. Guelph then scored to narrow the lead to two points. With 15 seconds left, Blues called a time out just in time to prevent a jump ball (which would have been between 6'1.5" Rudmik and Guelph's 6'8" Morgan).

After Toronto almost lost the ball, the team got it to Dave Watt who picked it off and was then fouled. Watt went on to hit both of his shots with three seconds left in the game. These two points turned out to be the winners, as in the last second Guelph's Graham took a shot from his own side of centre and, much to everyone's amazement, put the ball through the hoop. Yet it isn't enough and Varsity held on to take the game 84-82.

If there was one flaw in Blues' performance, it was once again shots from the foul line, where they only hit 47 per cent. In games this close, one point is a big factor. From the floor, Blues had their best showing in three games with a 50 per cent average. Guelph was close Blues' Glenn Scott (42) gapes in amazement as Toronto gets a basket and, yes, even wins the game. Gryphons were also astonished as Blues first lost the lead and then pulled it out to go on and win.

behind averaging 47 per cent.

Nine Blues shared the scoring honours. Scott led with 24 points, Watt had 19 and Rudmik 16. Ferguson and Cress, while not hitting the high numbers on the scoreboard, made a valuable contribution to the game by keeping Gryphons' Morgan in check holding him to 11 points in the second half.

After the victory, coach McManus was quick to point out that this was Guelph's first game, and that for the first time this year, the Blues were playing in the gym they practise in. (Toronto is committed to playing their league games in the Benson Building.)

Varsity has now shown it is indeed capable of playing on a level equal to the top teams. This might work against them, for if they fare poorly against weaker teams, it will be considered second effort.

Toronto will have a chance to show they can maintain the same standard of play when they meet Queen's tonight in Kingston for their second league game.

TIP OFFS: Blues return to Toronto for an exhibition game Saturday against McMaster in the Benson Building at 2 pm. Toronto lost their first contest with Mac, 98-49.

Hockey Blues over Rye High 15-2

University of Toronto Hockey Blues skated to a lacklustre 15-2 win over Ryerson Rams last night in a game faintly resembling a shooting gallery. Blues outshot Ryerson 64-18.

As in last Friday's Ottawa-Toronto game, almost every Toronto player came away with at least one point. High scorer for the Blues was Bob Munro with two goals and three assists.

Kent Ruhnke totalled three goals and an assist, while Don Pagnutti and Harry Sems each notched two goals and two assists. Bill Buba counted a goal and three assists. Other Blues scorers were Ivan McFarlane, Neil Korzack, with two, Doug Tate, and Bruce Herridge.

Scoring for Ryerson in his first game was Walt Coburn. Rams' other goal came from Mike Downey, with assists going to Joe Pfaff and Dave Kelley.

The first two periods were Blues' most active with 12 of their 15 goals coming in the first 40 minutes.

A first period goal by Toronto's Al Milnes hit Ruhnke in the crease and deflected past Rams goalie Mike Quart, who, considering the state of his defence, played admirably. Quart also played well in penalty killing, as did the whole team, preventing Blues from scoring even when the U of T squad had a two-man advantage in the second period.

Toronto goalie Gary Inness was awarded an assist on Pagnutti's second goal after he passed to the Toronto centreman who then carried the puck up the ice, dumped it toward the Ryerson net and saw it deflect off a Rams defenceman.

Rams gradually improved throughout their first game against the Blues this season, achieving a more respectable shots on goal balance in the third period — 18-7 in Blues' favour.

Blues' game consisted largely of a scoring spree, each team member — including defencemen — seeing how many points they could rack up against the hapless Quart. Blues simply overpowered a weak Ryerson team much to no one's surprise.

Last night's game was relatively clean, but Blues were awarded six penalties to Rams' four. Rams picked up three tripping penalties and a game misconduct which went to Dave Kelley, while Blues suffered on high-sticking, charging, holding, and interference calls.

Blues' next game is against Sir George tonight at 8 pm.

OFS endorses fees strike

By CLARK PARSONS

The Ontario Federation of Students is tentatively going ahead with the proposed fees strike in January.

The OFS general meeting Saturday at Ryerson broke up in disarray without reaching a decision on the contentious struggle against the Ontario government's cutbacks in education spending, but an emergency executive meeting immediately after decided to go ahead with it. Another executive meeting yesterday began planning for the strike, which must be ratified by a majority of OFS members to become an official OFS policy.

During Saturday's chaotic meeting, four executives, including SAC president Eric Miglin, had resigned because they thought the strike would fail, and were replaced.

As well, there were indications that SAC may withdraw its support of the action, even though the OFS position adopted is close to the one SAC supported last Wednesday. An emergency SAC executive meeting, which may decide to call a SAC council meeting Wednesday night to reconsider its support, has been called for today.

Saturday's general meeting terminated in a chaos of indecision, disagreement, and executive resignations without establishing any official position on the proposed strike over tuition fee increases and raised loan ceilings on student awards under the Ontario Student Awards Programme.

Earlier a motion was passed 8 to 5 with 4 abstentions urging all Ontario post-secondary students to withhold payment of the second installment of their fees in January, and that in February "each member council evaluate the fees withholding action to determine whether or not the action should continue, and report its assessment to an OFS general meeting".

The motion reaffirmed OFS demands endorsed by an October student referendum that tuition increases be deferred until after consultation with affected groups, that OSAP regulations be changed to facilitate greater access to the program, that the loan ceiling be lowered to the previous $600 level, that part-time students have access to the program, and that the age of independence under OSAP be lowered.

An amendment to this motion urging that the government clarify its position on OSAP for 1973-74 was passed 7 to 5. This was one of the changes recommended by SAC last week.

After much procedural wrangling, the Ontario Federation of Students approved a January fees strike to protest education cutbacks.

The motion endorsing the fees strike was later nullified when a motion to reconsider the strike vote was passed 8 to 3 with 3 abstentions. Immediately the meeting was prevented from reaching a position on the strike when a quorum count called showed there were too few members left to allow the meeting to continue.

Lakehead delegate James Marsh, in calling for a quorum count, mistakenly thought that if there were not a quorum, the motion to reconsider would be nullified, unaware that any motion passed before the quorum count would stand.

One less than the quorum of 15 members were present at this time as several members had already left. Laurentian and Brock were committed to return, home, and Toronto's Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students delegate Susan Geason also left.

The motion to reconsider had been passed in order to reopen discussion on the strike and, hopefully, persuade some of the anti-strike delegates to change their vote, thus strengthening the pro-strike vote the second time the strike motion was passed.

Following the original strike vote, those voting "no" had indicated they would do as much as possible in order to make the fee strike a success.

However, four members of the OFS executive had already resigned due to "frustrations flowing from today's meeting". They were Miglin, Geason, Ross McGregor (Queen's) and Yvon Lachapelle (Laurentian).

Asked to give their reasons, McGregor and Miglin stated the whole idea of a fees strike was "political suicide" considering what they felt to be the lack of student support around the province, evidenced by the split vote in favour of the strike.

After the first resolution had been accepted, McGregor and Miglin presented a proposal for a "symbolic province-wide withholding of tuition fees until January 31"; the demands to be that there be "no further" fee increases without consultation and that there be "no further increase in the loan ceiling".

This proposal was greeted by a number of delegates with such phrases as "Complete reversal", "It's just students fucking around",

"Compromise for it's own sake", "A one-month symbolic strike is bullshit".

The adverse reaction to this proposal, together with the fee strike vote (without a deadline for ending it), apparently convinced the four executive members to resign.

Jack Kushnier (Lakehead AMS), Shane Roberts (Waterloo), John Theobald (York), and Marolyn Burnett (Glendon) were elected as interim members of the executive to fill the vacated positions.

The strike motion, later nullified, was supported by Queen's, U of T, Lakehead AMS, Windsor, Western, Lakehead SSS, Carleton, and Glendon. It was opposed by Ryerson, Laurentian, Waterloo, Trent, and York. Abstaining were APUS, Brock, Guelph, and Fanshawe.

APUS abstained because its members are required to pay full fees before registering. Ryerson, Waterloo, Guelph and Fanshawe voted against the motion at least partly because, as institutions on a semester system, their students would be denied registration if they failed to pay their fees.

Informally, Laurentian, Trent, York and Brock indicated they would go along with the action since it had been decided on.

After passage of the strike motion a Trent-Waterloo motion was carried by a large majority, resolving: "that OFS call a province-wide moratorium on post-secondary education in the next term following release of the COPSEO (Wright) Report", with teach-ins, rallies, and conferences to be organized on that day to protest cut-backs; that administrations and faculties be asked to cut classes on that day; and that OFS encourage public discussion of university budgets.

Much of the discussion at the meeting centred around the legal and practical position of students and university administrations concerning OSAP grant cheques.

Only Queen's and Toronto appear to have been given assurances by their administrations that the cheques would be released. Elsewhere administration responses vary from "maybe" to "no".

According to Lachapelle of Laurentian, who received the information from his university president, U of T lawyers have prepared a letter for the U of T administration stating that the university is in no position to withhold the cheques on its own, and that if there is any question the cheques are to be returned to the government and the student is thereafter to deal directly with the government.

The lawyers accordingly urge U of T to change its line — co-operation — and return the cheques to the government if the student is not paying his fees.

Asked to confirm this yesterday, U of T vice-provost Robin Ross said it was "not fully correct". However he would not state what U of T solicitors had said, saying that he did not have all the salient information in front of him.

Essentially, he said, it is up to the government to tell the university what to do. OSAP cheques are between the student and the government and the university acts as an intermediary only at the request of the government.

"It's all speculative at this point," said Ross.

The possibility of OSAP cheques being withheld is seen as a primary impediment to a successful fees strike. At some universities a large majority of the students are on OSAP and are in no position to continue their studies without the cheques.

Memorial students win, occupation ends

ST. JOHN'S (CUP) — Students at Memorial University have virtually won their fight over the checkoff of student union fees, following a 10-day non-violent occupation of their administration building.

A tentative agreement was reached early last Friday following negotiations between student representatives and representatives from the university Board of Regents. But the agreement must still be ratified by the board of regents on December 14 and by the students in a referendum.

The student referendum will be supervised by the university Faculty Association, but no date has yet been set.

The agreement stipulates the university must collect the eight dollar student union fee each semester, but student union membership will not be compulsory. However, the student union will be given all the money collected and individual student must decide if they consider themselves student union members.

Until the referendum, the administration will collect the fee.

The occupation, which began November 14 with about 1500 students, followed an announcement November 9 by university president and vice-chancellor Lord Stephen Taylor that the administration would not collect the student union fees as of December 31. He claimed the Board of Regents was concerned that half the $140,000 collected for the union was spent on administration, $42,000 of it on salaries.

Most student union budgets reveal a similar breakdown and about 80 per cent of most university operating budgets cover salaries and administrative costs.

Until last Thursday, Taylor had refused to negotiate unless students ended their occupation of the building. But the threat of a student strike (scheduled for November 23-24 but never held) and possible intervention by Premier Frank Moore, apparently forced Taylor to the negotiating table.

Students from the negotiating committee called Moore because the government had taken no official stand on the issue.

The students did receive support from most of Newfoundland's large unions, including the province's largest one — the loggers union — and the St. John's trade union.

The memorial faculty association voted November 20 not to support the students by 70-50 with 100 abstentions. Students thought more pressure would have changed the vote in their favor.

Many faculty members are upset with Taylor's behavior. In fact, last Wednesday, a conservative faculty member began circulating a petition calling for Taylor's resignation.

Following the negotiations, students decided to end their occupation on and clean the building before they left.

Representatives of the Board of Regents agreed no reprisals of any kind will be taken against any student and the senate will be asked to consider the situation for students who may have academic difficulties in the up-coming Christmas exams because of their participation in the occupation.

The students were happy with their apparent victory. Bob Buckingham, one of the four student negotiators, said, "They decided to stick to one issue in the negotiations, although they had many grievances about the attitudes and decisions of Taylor and the administration.

"It started with checkoff as the issue, but it became very much more than that," one student said. "It became a matter of whether we would continue to be treated like high school kids, whether we would be good little boys and not annoy our teachers."

Students are angry with accommodation currently available to the student union in a university-owned building. They have put forward several proposals for a new student union building, a stadium and a student housing complex.

For years students have collected money for a new student union building.

Taylor has always opposed this proposal and others, the students say.

UBC students demand parity on committees

VANCOUVER (CUP) — The University of British Columbia arts faculty cancelled its meeting last week after about 150 arts students marched into the meeting to press demands for student representation on faculty committees.

A slim majority of the faculty (49-43) approved a motion to adjourn the meeting as soon as it was convened.

Students and about 40 faculty members remained to hold their own public meeting, in which they passed a resolution calling on the faculty to elect members to a committee consisting equally of staff and students to examine student representation.

The question of overall student parity on arts faculty committees was not at issue in the meeting. That question is expected to surface when the student-faculty committee makes its study public.

Students have yet to decide strategy for the next faculty meeting. Last week's meeting included on its agenda a proposed new women's studies program and many faculty members and students are anxious to see it approved before the university calendar deadline of December 31.

At their ad hoc public meeting, students called for an emergency faculty meeting to discuss the resolution, so the women's studies program could go through a regular meeting unimpeded.

If the emergency session is not held, students may be forced to invade the regular meeting, thus disrupting discussion of the women's program, or wait for the following meeting which would be too close to the end of the academic year for any student-faculty committee to make recommendations for the following year.

A general meeting of arts students is planned for next week to discuss tactics for the next faculty meeting. Students also have the option of delegating representatives to the faculty meeting to push student demands, rather than invading en masse.

May scrap Athletic, Innis College buildings

Contrary to earlier reports, construction of the new Men's Athletic Building and a permanent home for Innis College may be delayed or modified as a result of last week's provincial government decision to impose an extended moratorium on post-secondary institutions' capital building expenditures.

The buildings, both approved earlier this year, were to be financed out of general revenue rather than from government space entitlement allowances. However, the budget freeze will mean that expected funds for renovation of existing campus buildings will not be forthcoming and, U of T president John Evans told The Varsity last night, money allocated for the two planned St. George campus buildings may have to be partially rechanneled to help pay for these renovations.

The decisions to proceed with the Men's Athletic and Innis College buildings "will have to be reviewed," Evans said. "I hope they will be able to go ahead."

The university's men's athletics facilities, now housed in Hart House, have been overtaxed for years. Innis College has been without a building of its own for its 10 years of existence. It was first located in a temporary Hart House circle building now used by the graduate aid office, and later moved to its current home at 63 St. George Street. Knox College, owners of the St. George building, need it for their own purposes by August, 1974 and have given Innis, long promised a home of its own, notice to leave by then.

The university's budget allows for approximately equal expenditures on new construction and renovation of existing buildings. The moratorium means renovation money won't be available unless the new projects' funds are cut into.

Evans listed the Sigmund Samuel Library (scheduled for major renovations prior to its becoming the university's undergraduate library next summer) and the Wallberg Building as two examples of renovations which cannot be delayed.

"These buildings will have to have renovations," he said. The university "just can't let them go downhill."

Evans complained that the government never seems to decide more than temporarily on a building grant scheme. He noted that the suspended capital space formula, recently accepted by both the universities and government, was just getting underway. Renovations had been covered by cyclical renewal grants.

"We will have to persuade the government to come out with some policy, at least about renovations," he concluded.

Built in the 1920's, men may have to put up with Hart House athletic facilities indefinitely.

Scarborough may establish credit system

In an unheralded move, Scarborough College is moving towards establishing an academic credit system next fall instead of its present year to year system for full time students.

A motion incorporating the new system, which until now has gone almost unnoticed by the college's students, has passed the committee stage and is going to the college council at its next meeting, expected in December.

If approved, the proposal will have to go through the Governing Council's Academic Affairs Committee and the full council before it can be implemented. The system if approved by the college council will be embodied in the college's suggested calendar changes.

Scarborough's curriculum committee Friday passed unanimously the recommendation of registrar J.D. King, who did a study of the system for the committee, that students "be permitted to proceed towards a degree at a rate of their own choosing."

A second motion limited the maximum number of courses a student could take without petitioning for more to six in the normal academic year, and two in the summer.

Scarborough principal Ralph Campbell in an interview last night first avoided calling the proposal a credit system, preferring the term "progressive accreditation". Later, however, he admitted that "it is really a credit system."

Campbell stated he fully supports the move to the new system. He noted it would allow students who need part-time jobs more flexibility in working towards a degree.

Essentially, he said, it would blur the distinction between full-time and part-time students.

There are "no serious obstacles" legally to the proposal he said, while stressing the approvals still needed there are only "questions to be answered."

Students would likely pay fees according to the number of courses taken. The province's system of paying grants to universities is already adapted to the new system, since it converts part-time students into full-time equivalents.

College council chairman Ron Blair and another Scarborough faculty member contacted last night said they had not heard of the proposal.

Blair appeared sceptical commenting that "the world is overrun with committees".

He said the college council would likely meet in the week of December 11 to 15.

Scarborough College Student Society president David Onley Friday hailed the move as a "progressive move".

It allows a student "a real option in how his education is directed," he said.

Students launch petition to support profs

By PETER MATILAINEN

Undergraduate mathematics students have launched a petition campaign to seek a review of the denial of tenure to professor David Spring, and to protest the feared dismissal of professor Stephen Salaff.

Salaff says his contract will likely not be renewed by the department, since he has not received what would be considered normal indications that it will be.

Spring was denied tenure, which prevents firing except in extreme cases, last May. He interpreted this as a sign he was "not wanted" and quit, rather than fulfill his contract, which would have ended this year.

The students are circulating two petitions one, to be signed by Salaff's present and former students, describes him as "a highly competent professor" and requests his retention.

The second is an open letter to be sent by any math student who agrees with it to university president John Evans and math chairman George Duff, calling for:

- consultations on alternatives to the present "exclusive emphasis on examinations" in marking, to begin at once,
- the retention of both Salaff and Spring on the faculty, and the consideration of teaching ability as the prime factor in hiring and promotions of professors with undergraduate and graduate students represented on all hiring and tenure bodies,
- the improvement of policy concerning text books for the math courses, even if this means production of these books by the department.

Duff, when contacted about the terminations, refused to comment, saying he was "not prepared to discuss the matter without the necessary information available to him."

Spring's tenure was refused, it appears, because he did not publish the required number of papers during the year. Salaff is not a full time staff member so that his appointment carried no job security.

Kevin McQuillan (UC IV) stated that there is an underlying dissatisfaction with the department amongst students. He predicted that the department would be "flexible" on the students' issue of examinations and their worth saying "This is mainly an administrative problem." However, he felt the other demands would meet a less favourable response.

He criticized the tenure committee because of its secrecy. It also has no students on it.

"No one knows who is on the committee," he said, and accordingly, the students do not know where the opposition to Spring and Salaff comes from.

"The chairman becomes a very powerful figure in the department" in this situation, he said.

A member of the math department faculty considered the rule to retain the anonymity of the committee members as similar to "a hangman's identity being kept secret." In truth, he said, the body was more a representative of the "ruling clique" in the department.

The petitioning students feel that Salaff's feared termination has resulted from a reprimand Salaff received from department officials "for violating what they state is the policy of the 'common front' of faculty versus students." This violation consisted of Salaff siding with his students against the final marking system devised by the department for MAT 239 last year.

Salaff is receiving, he says, "100 per cent support" from his present and former students who have been reached about 100 of an estimated 150 so far.

McQuillan is optimistic about chances of receiving support from all undergraduates in the department, and plans to circulate the general petition at lectures this week.

Student councils asked by OFS letter to support fees strike

By GREG McMASTER

After voting in favour of staging a second term fees strike, the executive of the Ontario Federation of Students decided at a meeting yesterday at Ryerson to send a letter to all Ontario student councils calling for them to ratify the decision.

The letter will also suggest other means actions such as student picketing of university administration fee offices, and one-day class moratoria in January to organize teach-ins and further opposition to the education cutbacks.

There was some examination of the role of the OFS executive in the campaign against the cutbacks, in the wake of Saturday's resignation of four executive members, including U of T SAC president Eric Miglin.

Dave Moulton, representing Glendon College, claimed there was a "real crisis of leadership" on the part of most of the previous OFS executive. "They kept bucktracking consistently on their positions," he said, describing them as being "always to the right" of most of the student councils OFS representatives.

There was some argument over the merits of a fees strike with a preannounced time limit, instead of the agreed-on unspecified time. Moulton said "We may as well hold 2 minutes' silence," but SAC vice-president Helliwell answered that any fees strike is "nothing more than a demonstration," adding that "It can't work either." Moulton felt that a long-term fees strike was "far better tactically."

It was agreed to produce a poster simply urging students "Don't Pay" in January.

Helliwell objected to publicly advocating a "fees strike". Strike, he said, "is a nasty word."

The suggestion to picket fee payment offices came from Jack Kushnier of Lakehead University, who claimed that students at his school are required to pay their tuition fees immediately at the office where they receive their student loans. He recalled one student being chased around the campus by a security officer after escaping with his loan cheque.

Other suggestions included recruiting more on-campus support from the Ontario Federation of Labour, which supports free access to higher education, and the establishment by student councils of loan funds for students whose OSAP loans are delayed by university administrations retaliating against the fee withholding.

Helliwell said that SAC should set up a loan fund if necessary, but felt that the OSAP situation "should be all clear" at U of T, with the administration not likely to hold back loans to students who join the fees strike.

OFS executive member Judy Lee of Guelph cautioned that OFS could collapse if it did not explore "new areas of interest if the fees strike is a failure." Some suggestions included work on the problems of lack of jobs for graduates, and the re-imposition of exams and other authoritarian teaching methods, which OFS coordinator Craig Heron claimed is occurring all over the province this year.

The next OFS executive meeting was scheduled for December 21-22 at Glendon College.

Gov't freeze steps up anti-university policy

The provincial government has taken yet another stab at post-secondary education with its Thursday announcement that it was putting a freeze on capital building expenditures for Ontario's institutions of higher learning.

The government has tried to explain away the real meaning of its moratorium decision by pointing the accusing finger at declining enrolment at the province's post-secondary institutions. It carefully avoids accepting responsibility for the decline, preferring to overlook the documented, negative effects of last spring's detrimental changes covering the financing of post-secondary education.

Introducing the freeze, the government implied that buildings to accommodate the unrealized student enrolment increase would be the primary victims of the policy. The University of Toronto experience seems to prove otherwise. The Scarborough College library, long needed and apparently now years in the future, has nothing to do with projected increased enrolment. At present, about 50 per cent of the college's library collection collects dust in cartons for lack of shelf space. U of T had planned to provide Scarborough with its long awaited library in Phase III of the college's building plans, but these plans will probably be put on ice indefinitely as a result of the moratorium.

Ambiguity in the government's moratorium announcement leaves some doubt concerning the future of student residences at the university's Erindale campus. Tenders have already been let out for the complex, but Minister of Universities and Colleges Jack McNie said Thursday that "building projects will be limited to those already under construction".

And, it now appears that the long overdue Men's Athletic and Innis College buildings, both already given the university's go-ahead (although without government funds at this time), may have to be modified or scrapped for the time being.

U of T president John Evans told The Varsity last night that cutting off capital building funds would force the university to review the buildings' approved expenditures. The amount budgeted for them will have to pay for these two buildings and needed renovations to existing buildings.

Despite U of T's stature as Canada's largest university, men's athletic facilities here have been woefully inadequate for years. Overtaxed resources led the university to eliminate its men's phys ed requirement, and Hart House's inability to accommodate all those interested in participating in the university's athletic program has been an open secret for years. Some knowledgeable estimates place U of T's men's athletic facilities an unacceptable 20 years out of date. Tight money meant that even the currently proposed structure had to be scaled down from original plans and will likely be inadequate by the time — if — it's finished.

Innis College, the university's poor child and parent to some of the most innovative courses this university offers, has been waiting for a permanent home for 10 years. It's been shifted from a frame building to rented space owned by Knox College and now — whether U of T finds the money to go ahead with construction of its approved new home or not — the college is to get booted out of its rented home by August, 1974 because Knox needs more room.

These building projects must be completed even without increased enrolment. The government's blanket swipe at post-secondary capital expenditures doesn't acknowledge this reality.

It seems probable that the building freeze will be similar to unwarranted on other campuses. It will hit newer universities and — the government officials concede — community colleges the hardest. Established within the last decade, these institutions vitally need facilities they now lack simply to offer their students an educational environment equal to that provided by their longer established counterparts.

But, arguments about whether particular projects are necessary or not are really beside the point. Exposed for its real intent, the government freeze is really designed to complement the government's rapidly unfolding strategy to discourage students from attending post secondary institutions and, in its turn, further reduce accessibility to higher education.

McNie admitted last week that new provincial priorities, including the government's ambitious mass transit plans, are placing increasing pressure on funds formerly available for the former favourite child, education.

The Davis government has apparently decided that education is no longer important in this, the supposed "Province of Opportunity". Students and taxpayers must unite to show the government that, attractive budget cuts or not, dismantling of the province's education program rather than improving it is not acceptable (period).

Rotenberg tries to discard old guard image

By BILL HUMBER

Toronto mayoralty candidate David Rotenberg is attempting to project a progressive reform image despite his identification with the Old Guard pro-development faction at City Hall.

Rotenberg, a chartered life insurance underwriter, has been a city alderman for 12 years. During the last three, in which he represented Ward 11 as senior alderman and was city budget chief, Rotenberg has generally been conceded to be the chief driving force behind the majority of council supporters of high-rise development. He was an original advocate of and is a continuing supporter of the city's Official Plan, which extended the zone of permissible commercial and apartment development considerably.

Rotenberg says he wants to "make Toronto a place for people" and backs this up with a promise to initiate neighbourhood mini-planning boards. They would be modelled on the St. Clair-Yonge Task Force, notwithstanding the problems citizens faced here in dealing with the Planning Board. (The planners had walked out on the Task Force in November, 1971 and it was not until last June that the area residents, concerned about traffic and development, managed to get the planners to re-constitute official terms of reference.)

However Rotenberg, a member of the city's executive and Metro Council, is confident that these mini-planning boards would prevent the conflict which has characterized the last three years at City Hall. His goal is summed up in the statement:

"I would aim for the smooth and efficient functioning of the Corporation of the City of Toronto."

The alleviation of conflict which Rotenberg maintains is his goal will not necessarily mean an end to the type of issues which have drawn attention recently. On the issue of development he says, "Where land is being assembled it should be kept up to standards".

One example of conflict in recent years is the Quebec-Gothic high-rise development. At one point over 700 local residents appeared at City Hall to indicate their opposition to the proposal, but Rotenberg supported the project when it came to a vote.

The Confederation of Residents and Ratepayers Associations and City Hall magazine voting records show that Rotenberg has been a supporter of all major developments in the last three years including Metro Centre, Eaton Centre, West St. James Town and, the Windlass development on McCaul Street.

He voted against a motion to support the Riverdale Community Organization's request for federal funds. He has voted for the Scarborough Expressway, and supports the Spadina Expressway, unless some other "viable alternative" is found.

As the city's chief bargainer with CUPE workers, his rigid stance against workers' demands lost him a great deal of labour support.

Rotenberg has also proposed a land stabilization program, in which industrial lots would be purchased and held in perpetuity by the city. They would be leased to small businesses to encourage diversity and variety.

He has also stated that it would be possible to prevent noxious gases from polluting the area around the Ashbridges Bay Sewage Treatment Plant. Rotenberg has been told by engineers that for a cost of four to five million dollars pollution from the plant could be eliminated, freeing 200 acres of prime residential land, currently unused because of the pollution, for development.

He proposes an international contest to design this possible new neighbourhood in downtown Toronto.

However in the past Rotenberg has been accused, particularly by Ward 7 alderman John Sewell, of not caring about neighbourhoods and low income groups.

Rotenberg engineered the selling of city land to the Metro Centre Development, which many saw as a cheap sellout. As well, Sewell claimed that a strong enough agreement was not reached to meet the housing needs of low income people; Rotenberg was instrumental in steering a proposal through council which rejected planning board recommendations for more parkland and low income housing and a lower density.

Rotenberg also proposes a permanent tax commission of all three levels of government. He wants to remove the present property tax burden from the homeowner.

Nevertheless, he draws back from endorsing any sort of free public transportation. "Nothing in life is free", he states.

While Tony O'Donohue draws support from ethnic groups and David Crombie enlists the resources of reformers in their mayoralty campaigns, Rotenberg has relied to a large degree on the financial support of large business interests to finance his campaign, admitted to cost over $70,000.

Consumer's Gas chairman Okah Jones has introduced Rotenberg to a number of influential corporate representatives over the last year with this purpose in mind. He also has the support of a number of powerful Conservative Party members, earned by his work within the party.

Rotenberg does not plan to make public disclosure of his financial supporters, but does state that he will not accept contributions from developers or others who may expect favours in return.

Both Rotenberg and O'Donohue claim to favour the interests of citizens. Last Wednesday at Eaton Centre, Crombie, whose voting record places him in the camp of the reformers, observed, "as the campaign progresses I hear three Crombie speeches, one by myself, one by O'Donohue, and one by Rotenberg".

Armed with the endorsement of the Daily Star and the Toronto Sun, Rotenberg faces the dual task of overcoming O'Donohue's lead while emphasizing that he is a credible alternative. If not, he may only succeed in splitting the vote between himself and O'Donohue allowing Crombie to sneak in as mayor.

Arabs dispute admin's claims

In response to a recent article in The Varsity, the Arab Student Association would like to clarify its connection with the new restrictions imposed on the use of the Med Sci auditorium. The article says that "because the Medical Science Auditorium is 'newer and more vulnerable to attack' than other halls, U of T will attempt in future to avoid scheduling meetings there." Such restrictions, however, as the article seems to imply, seems to have been caused by "some breakdown in communication between the university's room allocations and the Arab Student Federation which sponsored the meeting." The article further, explains the breakdown in communication in two ways: (a) "the federation did not say what the auditorium would be used for in applying for it, although the reason for use is required" and (b) "the university later got the impression that it was to be used for a film showing, and only last Monday (November 13) discovered Chartrand would be speaking." So, the article says "had the university known in time both that Chartrand was speaking and that disruption threats existed, the Chartrand meeting would have been moved elsewhere."

The Arab Student Association would like to clarify some of the points mentioned above.

(1) The article implies that the association specified the Meds auditorium, but it did not specify the purpose for the use of the auditorium. That the association did not specify its purpose is quite obvious from its letter sent on October 23 to the Office of Records and Statistics. But, the association also did not specify any room to be reserved in particular. It only indicated its desire "to reserve a room on St. George's campus which will accommodate about 300 persons."

The article explicitly says that the association should have stated its purpose, but since the president of the association is a new student, he is not acquainted with the details of reserving a room on campus. Certainly this is no excuse, but the letter was especially sent on October 23, three weeks ahead of time so that if there is vagueness in the letter, there was plenty of time for the university to write to the association and tell it to state its purpose or anything else before reserving the room. However, had the university used any standard forms to be filled by any organization wishing to use rooms on campus, there would not have been any occasion for communication to breakdown.

(2) The article says that the university did not know in time that Chartrand was speaking. That it is difficult to define time in general is very clear, what is not clear in particular is what are the limits of "in time"? That the campus co-ordinator was told on November 10 that Chartrand was giving a talk on November 16 in the Meds auditorium is known both to the GSU, one of the sponsors, as well as the campus co-ordinator herself. Also on November 13, when some members of the GSU drew the attention of the association that it is possible that the university may change the room when it knows that Chartrand will be the speaker. The association called the Office of Statistics and Records to see whether that is possible, and if possible let it be done 'in time' three days before the meeting. The answer was very negative. The university will not cancel the meeting, but it will send two constables as the regulations say. From this, one expects that six days and three days ahead could possibly be 'in time'. However, another difficulty is to determine what "the university knowing in time" means. The term university is also vague and some people may know before others and the association cannot be held responsible if some people of the university did not hear about the meeting at all.

The association feels that the university implicitly blames the association for not stating its purpose at the beginning, but at the same time the university explicitly thinks that the responsibility cannot be determined since there was a breakdown in communication. Now, if there was a breakdown in communication, no one is responsible or everyone is responsible and the association alone cannot be reproached even implicitly.

However, the association wishes to say that there was no breakdown of communication, but at the same time does not wish to locate the moral responsibility on any particular person. Moreover, the association keeps its letters and it can support its claims with factual evidence. The point basically is utilitarian. Rather than trying to blame each other, we would like to suggest that the Office of Statistics and Records should have standard forms similar to those of the International Students' Centre which ought to be filled out by any organization wishing to rent a room on campus. Also, the university should have a clear policy concerning the allocation of certain rooms for certain purposes. Once these steps are clearly delineated, first any possibility of misunderstanding is ruled out or at least minimized and second all organizations recognized by the un-

Speaker would rewrite headline

I am grateful to your reporter, Bob Bettson, for taking what I said at a recent seminar on socialism in Tanzania seriously enough to report it at length in The Varsity (November 22). Nevertheless, he (and your headline writer) have combined to subtly distort in important respects what I was attempting to say and to make my argument appear much more one-dimensional than in fact it was. Here I am not referring to specific formulations or quotations (though some of these too are a bit oversimplified), but rather to the general impression conveyed.

Bettson has me first, and most saliently, "charging" failure and only then "conceding" some successes to Tanzania's leadership in its pursuit of a socialist path to development. My seven years experience in Tanzania suggest a more nuanced approach, however. I, therefore sought, first, to state the very real achievements of Tanzania (which make her's, arguably, the most progressive regime in Africa) and only then to explore certain (also very real) contradictions which remain. The final balance is a difficult one to strike and indeed there are some grounds for concern and pessimism. But, as I stressed, something of importance to international socialists is still in train in Tanzania, and, quite literally, the struggle continues. Your headline reads, "No revolution in Tanzania, charges prof". Perhaps, a fairer headline would have been: "Tanzania's socialist achievement also reveals flaws, states prof".

iversity will be ensured an equal treatment and an equal protection from the university. That the associations pay the price for extra protection seems quite discouraging for the associations.

If some people decide to break down a lecture, the association cannot be held responsible for that, unless such a fee is meant as a deterrent to the associations from having further activities and lectures. If this is what it amounts to, then one hardly can aspire to have any cross-cultural activities.

Cadario Rhode

Engineering student Paul Cadario, in hot water twice previously with his fellow student governors for trips to committees and elsewhere, has pulled off yet another coup.

The former SAC finance commissioner and current chairman of the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee has snatched one of two Ontario Rhodes Scholarships, perhaps without the help of his GC cronies or vice-president Don Forster.

Observers said Cadario's successful effort to snare the scholarship stemmed from his resentment at a November 20 Varsity letter questioning his intelligence. "I don't mind being called corrupt, but I object to being called stupid and inept," he commented at the time.

The scholarship serves as a two-way ticket to England's Oxford University. Cadario hopes to attend next year's GC meetings by long distance telephone, collect, of course.

Dare strike enters six

By GORD MOORE
reprinted from The Chevron

To choose to go on strike has never been an easy decision for most working men and women. The economic decision for management is a matter of a fraction of their profit margin; for the worker it is a decision involving his very economic existence.

Yet, there is no replacing the right to strike. The strike has been the means of achieving the 8-hour work day, a minimum wage for a decent life, and tolerable working conditions. The right to combine and, if necessary, withhold their labour is the only positive freedom open to those who work for others.

May 27, 97 per cent of the members of United Brewery Workers local 173 resoundingly rejected the 25-cent hourly wage increase offered to both men and women by the management of Dare Foods in Kitchener. The company offer left female employees 10 cents an hour less in wage rate than male workers; the benevolence and generosity of Dare was clearly apparent. In an ad in the June 10th K-W Record, Dare went so far as to say the settlement offered was "a generous one providing wages, fringe benefits, and working conditions of which everyone could be proud." Dare also originally offered to make all payments for the company's health plan, unless there is an increase over the next two years, in which case the workers would make up the difference.

The issues which formed the core of the union's demands during the summer were equal pay raises of 40 cents an hour for each year of the new contract, an 8-hour day — an item which many unions secured during the early 1950's — and improved working conditions. The latter demand was part of the union's list because of the incessant assembly line speed-ups, insensitive working supervisors, and the oppressive heat in the plant.

Over 80 per cent of the 377 members of local 173 are women. At the time of the strike, all women were categorized as "packers" and received $2.26 per hour.

At the heart of the strike is not the current union demands, but the existence of the union itself. The Dare management has made no effort to conceal this fact: "It is not a legal requirement and we are determined that it will never be necessary that you have to be a member of a union to work for Dare Biscuits."

The Dare workers remain determined to win their strike and to prevent anti-union management from killing their union. Picketing workers expressed the feeling that "everyone is still willing to stay out for as long as it will take. We plan to continue going from local to local and to consumer groups to press the boycott more."

Applying financial pressure

After the third week of the strike, the union instituted its campaign of boycotting Dare products and picketing businesses which did any service for Dare's. At various times, pickets have appeared at Newtex Cleaners, Hertz Rent-a-Car, Sanderson's Tire Service, Kresge's, City Cab, Day and Ross, and Riordan Rentals. Leaflets and buttons urging people not to buy Dare goods have been distributed at local stores. In addition, strikers have solicited support from other trade union locals throughout Ontario in order to strengthen the boycott.

On September 8, the Ontario Federation of Labour further supported the strikers by asking the 50 labour councils and

In return for which, the company offered to withdraw its $38,000 damages claim and to increase the original wage offer for female employees by 10 cents in the second year. Dare also wanted a relations committee set up which would have a scab represent the union. Dare strikers naturally found the "offer" insulting and completely rejected it.

Meanwhile, the various injunctions and law suits continue. Early in October, the company filed a $1.6 million suit against the OFL, local 173 of the UBW, and four labour officials — David Archer, president of the OFL; Terry Meagher, secretary-treasurer of the OFL; Lou Dautner, international representative of the union; and Andy Diamond, plant chairman of local 173. Dare launched the suit because they said the damages that occurred during the strike were willfully caused by striking union workers. No mention was given of eruptions due to workers' low wages, an unjust legal system, an arrogant management, an unsupportive city government, and a group of strikebreakers.

The strikebreakers were involved in the strike during June as they crossed legal picket lines in several attempts to transport Dare goods out of the plant. Dare strikers did not resort to violent means until Dare brought in Canadian driver Pool, an avowed "strikebreaking" firm which over the last two years has had numerous successes at breaking legal pickets, intimidating union workers, and forcing them to accept unsatisfactory settlements.

Prior confrontations with scabs have left a number of Dare workers and their supporters arrested and/or charged with various offences ranging from breaking a court injunction to more serious ones of obstructing and assaulting a police officer.

Thom's movie

Last week saw the first of Dare's suits against the union come to court. Dare vice-president William Thom introduced a two-minute, 8 mm, colour movie, taken by himself, showing picket line violence at the Kitchener plant. Thom stopped the film several times to identify people in the crowded scenes. Without knowing the persons involved beforehand, identification would be very difficult since the film was taken from some distance and did not pan in on individuals. This was part of the evidence in Dare's effort to have five strikers declared in contempt of court.

Company lawyer A. M. Austin, using affidavits filed by Dare representatives, maintained that three of the strikers — Andy Diamond, John Horne and Paul Pugh — had disobeyed court injunctions prohibiting strikers from engaging in mass picketing or interfering with scabs entering or leaving the plant. While he asserted they should be jailed, he asked for "perhaps something less" for Pauline Breen and Tom Scott.

Union lawyer Brian Dunn said applications against four of the strikers should be dismissed because the company failed to notify them of the court order. Dunn stated that the first injunction was not advertised enough and that Diamond, as chief picket captain and plant chairman, would be the only one who knew the significance of the injunction. Dare's case is specifically harsh and undeserved in Diamond's case, though, because it appears Dare assumes any picket disruptions took place under his orders.

Justice Thomas Zuber, considering the seriousness of Dare's charges and made wary of the credibility of the makers of the Dare affidavits, said he preferred to hear evidence from witnesses and remanded the case until December 18. Still to come is the union's law suit against Dare Foods, set for a January 26 hearing.

The present situation finds production tapering off at the Dare plant. Scabs who have quit say that the warehouse is "cramped with cookies in nearly every available space". The impact of dwindling contracts has caused Dare to lay off 50 scabs in the past two weeks, so that 156 people are now employed for both shifts.

The boycott continues to gain strength throughout Ontario. Messages of support for local 173 come from as far away as New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, and Quebec. Additional fortification was given recently when the international of United Brewery Workers gave "further unconditional support for another six months".

Following clash between police and striking Dare workers, striker is detained by police.

Dare Foods Ltd. — producer of Dare Cookies has refused to negotiate with its striking employees for six months. Intimidation, threats and arrogance have characterized the company's approach to the predominantly female work force.

Citizens assail Marks as "developers' tool"

Ward 6 aldermanic incumbents June Marks and Horace Brown bore the brunt of the hostility of about 100 local residents, mostly university students and public housing tenants, at an all-candidates meeting Thursday night at Ryerson School.

Marks, on the defensive against charges of being a "developers' tool", pointed to her past crusades against slum landlords and her political selflessness. As a result of her sticking her neck out for the poor, she said, she has had to sell all her possessions and was now $18,000 in debt.

Marks' durable masonite signs, which blanket the U of T area ward, were, the alderman claimed, "made by her two sons in their spare time in an unlit, garage on Spadina".

Her son Douglas set the stage for his mother's appearance by dramatically ambling from the back of the hall while interrogating reform candidate Dan Heap about Marks signs which, he charged, were being torn down by Heap workers.

As he supplanted Heap behind the lectern, continuing his tirade, which Heap attempted to refute, the meeting broke into bedlam and loud calls on the chairwoman of the Association of Women Electors, which sponsored the meeting, to throw Douglas out.

After the young Marks was shouted down, his mother apologized for his behaviour, but repeated the charges of vandalism in her own speech.

Marks also attempted to soften her pro-development record by claiming that she opposed any tampering with the stability of the Grange neighbourhood, where the former RCMP building on Sullivan Street is now boarded up and appears to be ready for demolition.

Ward 6's other incumbent, Horace Brown, also came out fighting against voting records compiled by citizens groups which suggested that he was not a reformer.

He pointed out that he had just come from City Council, where the Eaton Centre project had been ratified 17 to 3, the majority including several of the so-called reform group.

"Only Sewell, Jaffary, and Kilbourn voted against Eaton Centre," said Brown. The anti-Old Guard audience applauded.

"Well, I see the Wafflers are here in full force," countered Brown, who repeatedly charged Waffler Dan Heap with "misrepresentation" of his voting record.

Heap, who was much more favourably received than were Marks and Brown, enumerated some of the ward's more pressing problems and called for greater responsiveness from City Council in dealing with them. Heap, who is running on an explicit anti-development and residents' power program, offered to "represent the people of this ward as exactly as possible... residents ought to control their aldermen."

The fourth major contender,

William Archer, a Ward 5 incumbent who, fearing defeat by more progressive candidates, has moved to Ward 6, was in Montreal attending his father-in-law's funeral.

The biggest hand of the night went not to a candidate but to a public housing tenant frustrated by not having time to question the Old Guard incumbents in the short period allowed.

"If you are going to come into our neighbourhood, why don't you ask us how we would like the meeting organized?" he asked the chairwoman.

Heap stresses community control for Ward 6

With this profile, The Varsity begins a series on the five candidates for alderman in Ward 6, in which all of the university's downtown campus below Bloor Street is located. The ward's boundaries are Bloor, Sherbourne Street, Palmerston Avenue (two blocks west of Bathurst Street) and the lakefront.

By MARK BOHNEN

Ward 6 aldermanic candidate Dan Heap believes there is only one major issue in the upcoming civic election: Will Toronto be controlled by citizens or multi-million dollar development corporations?

Heap, an Anglican minister who works full-time in a Continental Can factory, says that the working people of Toronto who have built the downtown area are being pushed out of their homes by developers and land speculators. They are unable to find any other worthwhile living accommodation he says.

In a campaign speech given at a workers' meeting, Heap characterized the overall trend which he sees occurring: "A new city is being built in our ward, a city of apartments and office towers, with glittering institutions to serve the glittering people who live there, affluent executives and highly-placed professionals, a city we all are forced to build and support, but in which most of us are losing the right to live, work, shop and play."

Heap feels that people will have to engage in a power struggle with the developers if they are to retain control of their neighbourhoods. "They (developers) have been running the city and intend to go on running it. They are not about to share their power with us and I don't think we can bother sharing power with them."

Heap has been critical of the "limited view" of bourgeois resident associations such as the Annex Ratepayers Association, that focus predominantly on saving their own neighbourhoods by pressuring City Council. Eventually the Annex, which is above Bloor Street west of Avenue Road, will be destroyed, he has said, if it does not work with other neighbourhoods to identify and struggle against their real enemy.

However, he also supports David Crombie for mayor and his approach of acting on behalf of residents' associations.

Public developments, according to Heap, can be as destructive to neighbourhoods as private ones. "Some of the worst block-busters in this area are the city police department, the RCMP, the school board, Ontario Hydro, U of T... One might suppose some of these institutions to be deliberately attacking residential neighbourhoods to soften them up for the developers." He cited recent provincial legislation allowing publicly expropriated land to be sold to private interests.

"What is required," Heap said in a recent interview, "is that people control developers, whether they are band together under strong leadership they can have an influence on City Council."

Heap's canvassers are distributing one of nine different leaflets on their second canvass (the first, delivered across the ward, is concerned with the issue of "people or developers"). Each area has a leaflet dealing with local residential problems and several attack the consistently anti-citizen group voting records of its incumbent opponents, June Marks, Bill Archer and Horace Brown.

The Heap campaign will cost about $3,600 which has been raised from individual donations. All donors and donations will be made public.

Heap, who claims that Ward 6 residents are "poorly organized for the defense of their homes", intends to spend most of his time working closely with them, helping them to build a network of local democratic organizations if elected.

In the past few years, Heap has been active in a number of residents' struggles, notably the fight against the Spadina Expressway. He lives in the Kensington area and has been acting chairman of the Kensington Residents' Association. Heap is presently assisting to organize the Grange Park Residents' fight against an Ontario Hydro transformer station.

Heap believes that an alderman should vote the way the people of his ward want him to — even if he disagrees with them. "The working people of this ward, he has said, "are capable of joining together in decisions that are essentially good for all of mankind."

private or public." Exactly how this would come about, Heap could not say. He indicated that ideas would emerge as he worked with local resident associations.

Heap views his election campaign as being part of a continuous movement of working people to take control of the city from monopoly capitalism.

his campaign.

His campaign literature encourages people to get involved in politics. People should support him not because of what he alone would do, it says, but because "We know that we need more help at City Hall."

Typical is the leaflet delivered to the Kensington area: "When citizens

No decision made on library amalgamation

By BOB BETTSON

No recommendation was reached Wednesday on the proposed amalgamation of two college and two departmental libraries by a subcommittee examining library policy.

The subcommittee has been asked to advise on a recommendation of a report last spring urging that the New and University College, and the Political Economy and History departmental libraries be amalgamated with the Sigmund Samuel Library. The combination would form an undergraduate collection after the main library's stack books are moved at the end of the academic year to the new Roberts Library.

The subcommittee, which reports to the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council, is also expected to recommend by next February what the Roberts Library's policy on stack access should be.

New College Principal Donald Ivey made strong objections to the potential loss of his college's library: "I am loathe to give up the present college library. It is an integral part of the college if the colleges are to remain academically based and not just social units."

Ivey charged that "the existence of the New College library is more important to New College than the Laidlaw library is to University College."

"We can produce effective changes...to provide for the students in a better way," he said. "I personally believe some compromises can be made."

Ivey suggested that a "new rationale" can be found for the establishment of a college non-circulating reference collection. This contradicts the finding of last spring's Mueller report that there is no alternative between total amalgamation and the present system. He added.

However, Erindale librarian H.L. Smith claimed that "the choice is between the existing situation and the Mueller report. We have to decide how to best serve the university."

"Possibly a provocative non course-oriented, non-research collection could be established," added Dean of Arts and Science Bob Greene. "The needs of the students extend beyond their courses."

Librarian David Esplin maintained that a much larger collection is "absolutely essential. The existing college collections are inadequate as course-oriented collections." He charged that "any compromise is bound to fail."

"Why should the library suggested by the Mueller committee necessarily be in the present Sigmund Samuel Building?" asked graduate school dean Ed Safarian. "Sigmund Samuel is not where the students are. The library should be located on the west campus near the Roberts Library."

He wondered whether the cost of renovating the Sigmund Samuel library would be justified if it became possible to build a large undergraduate library on the west campus.

Ivey agreed. "It is more than just a library problem." The Mueller committee noted the decrease in use of the college libraries, he said. "But in the last two months New College library has increased circulation by 50 per cent."

Safarian said that a decision now might look "very silly" in three years if the university could build an undergraduate library or find existing space for it.

Chief librarian Robert Blackburn admitted that while the stacks would only be half full when the new Roberts Library opens next year, "we need space for expansion." He said the floor space needed was not available anywhere else in the building without taking over study space.

The subcommittee also decided to establish its own subcommittee to decide on a formula for access.

ElectOr MUNICIPAL ELECTION CENTRE

In conjunction with S.A.C. and Innis College, INI 206/306 has planned a municipal elections centre to gather and disseminate information concerning the upcoming municipal elections on December 4. The purpose of this service is to both supply basic information and to act as liaison between candidates for office and interested individuals.

Senior basketball beats Ottawa 45-31

Women's Basketball Senior Blues extended their regular season record to two wins and one loss this weekend, defeating Carleton and Ottawa.

Blues upset last year's division winner Ottawa 45-31 for the first time in five years. Although the Ottawa fast break and press threatened, Gwen Powell's coaching enabled the guards to handle the defence with confidence.

Toronto also played well off the boards. Novice Terry Knight netted 14 while Chris Crawford added 15 points.

Overall, the team's performance on defence and rebounds was superior to last week's effort against Laurentian when the team lost in a close game.

The Carleton game was much less of a challenge as the Blues defeated the Ottawa team 64-19. However, the game gave Toronto a chance to try out their half court press and run a rotation offence. Scoring was evenly distributed as Terry Knight was tops with 14 and Chris Crawford and Leslie McIntosh added 11 and 10, respectively.

The upcoming season looks bright for the Intermediate and Senior women's Varsity basketball teams. Most veterans are back including rebounders Cathy Cullis, Chris Crawford, and Trish Beck, while the outside threat will be provided by Sue Scott, Daina Zukauskas and Leslie McIntosh.

Newcomers include Terry Knight and Karen Edgar, while coach Powell anticipates extra speed and spring from the team.

Intermediate team rookies include Maureen Benner, Janis Goad, Anne Gordon, Liz Novachis, Penny Redman, and Liz Wilson. Coach Sharon Wilson has recruited former manager Kim Bull as well as Sue Harrison, Rosemary McCarney, Arlene Poirier, Brenda Uchimaru and Pat Williams, who led the "baby Blue Bloomers" to the finals last year.

Both teams will be cared for by two new managers — Janice McKellar (Senior) and Pam Dunbar (Intermediate).

Even though the Senior Blues won their weekend games the team will need more work on passing before it faces Queen's next Saturday in Kingston.

Martha Williams (3) adds two points for Blues as Toronto defeats Ottawa 45-31.

Sloppy play costs Blues two more games

By BOB PRITCHARD

Basketball Blues had a black weekend, losing to both Queen's Friday in a league game and to McMaster the next evening in exhibition play.

After losing their second league game of the season 72-56 to Queen's Golden Gaels Friday night in Kingston, Blues returned to the Benson Building on Saturday only to drop a 76-64 decision to McMaster Marauders in exhibition play.

The second half of the Kingston game told the story of the Blues' loss. Although Varsity managed to stay right up with Queen's in the first 20 minutes, Gaels began to put their game together in the second half. In the first five minutes of the latter half they outscored Toronto 10-1. That changed the halftime score of 34-29 (in Queen's favour) to 44-30.

This was enough to rattle Blues for the rest of the game. From then on, Varsity was always looking or moving the wrong way, bunching up on fast breaks and dropping rebounds. A couple of good checks in one-on-one situations by Blues' Dave Watt were wasted, as Queen's always had an extra man following up to make the basket.

Even when the ball went out of bounds, it was invariably off a Toronto hand, leg or back, as the ball evaded the Blues' grasp like a greased watermelon. Blues' shooting was of absolutely no use to them, as they only hit a shameful 18 per cent from the floor.

When the buzzer finally sounded to end the contest, Queen's had scored 72 points to Toronto's 56. Although Blues managed to slightly improve their usual poor foul shooting average with 57 per cent, the 15 points that they missed would have resulted in a considerably closer game.

Queen's showed a hesitancy to shoot the ball, which kept the team even with Toronto, who only connected on 23 per cent of their shots. Only a sudden burst by the Gaels in the last two minutes put them ahead to stay (34-29 at the half).

Top scorers for Toronto were Watt with 15, and Filinski and Skyvington with 12 each. Queen's best were Swinnard with 18, and Paul Howard (for whom the fans constantly cheered even for such minor feats as grabbing a rebound) with 17.

Blues obviously learned something from the game, as they returned to play respectably in the second half of Saturday's game against McMaster. Unfortunately, their play in the first half — which saw them down 47-25 at the half — cancelled out the effect of any later improvement.

Blues tightened up the 1-2-2 zone defence they use frequently in their games. Mac worked the ball around well, but Blues restricted the Marauders' floor shooting. The real lapse in Varsity's play was in their defensive rebounding. McMaster pulled in half a dozen more rebounds than the Blues off the Toronto boards, and out-rebounded them 25-18 overall.

The tall Marauders were usually quick to score a basket after grabbing the rebound, and a quarter of the way into the game, Mac was ahead 22-13. Although Blues managed to close the gap to four points, some careless Toronto turnovers, combined with three consecutive fast breaks by Hamilton's Bob Nelson made the difference between the teams' scores — 22 points at the end of the first 20 minutes.

In the second half, both teams treated the spectators in the Benson gym to a quicker, even if not much closer ball game. Toronto generally improved its style of playing.

The team raised a first half floor shooting average from 26 per cent to 31 per cent, while McMaster dropped from 42 to 30. Blues managed to out-rebound Mac, and even hit 68 per cent of their foul shots. They actually outscored the Marauders 39-29 in the half. But it was to little avail, as the visitors returned to Hamilton with a 76-64 victory.

Rudnik and Skyvington led the Blues with 14 points each, while Watt added 13. Sam Kakneciuf put in 20 points for McMaster.

Toronto coach McManus posed the key question: "How can a team be so hot one night and so cold the next?"

Blues cannot seem to play with any consistency. One night they will be hustling and rebounding well, and the next night shooting well, but the two are rarely found together. If they are, it is only for half a game. The only exception to date has been the game against Guclph. If Blues had played as well against Queen's or McMaster, their record would be much better than its present 1-3. As put by one spectator, Toronto should "bottle up their good style of playing, and pour it out evenly throughout the season."

The time has come for Blues to make a change somewhere. They'll be looking for their first two points when they play Ryerson in Hart House Wednesday at 8:15.

Blues' Dave Ferguson (54) typified Blues Saturday night as McMaster grabbed the lead and took it to win 76-64.

Sir George wins 4-3 on Blues' mistakes

By PETER DUX

Hockey Blues lost their first game this season against Sir George Williams University from Montreal in exhibition play. Blues were on the short end of a 4-3 score.

Scoring for Blues were Kent Ruhnke with two, while Mike Keenan added the other. Sir George marksmen were Mario Cuttini, Francois Ouimet, Mark Shewchuck and Maurice Desfosses.

Blues held the offensive edge for the majority of the game, but were constantly stymied by the Georgian's goalie, Bernie Wolfe, who stopped 44 shots.

The third period was the deciding one with Sir George scoring the winning goal, even though Toronto had applied considerable pressure in order to salvage at least a tie. Down 3-2 going into the period Blues came out skating with Ruhnke scoring off a goal crease scramble at 4:46 on a power-play.

Blues kept up offensive pressure after the tying goal but simply couldn't find the mark. At 14:35 Don Atkinson stole the puck in Toronto's zone and passed to Mark Shewchuck who flipped the puck past Bruce Durno for Georgian's winning goal.

Sir George wasn't able to maintain a sustained offence, saving much of their third period effort for the closing minutes, thus preventing Durno from leaving the net for an extra attacker until the final 30 seconds.

The final 20 minutes were spoiled by chippy play on both sides, with high sticks, slashing, and tripping abundant. Officiating was incompetently handled by referee Zip Thompson.

In contrast, the first period was a dull affair with little body contact and most of the action in the neutral zone.

Francois Ouimet connected for the Georgians on their first shot on net at 4:14 with a hard blast from the point. Up to then Georgians had failed to get a shot on net, even with a man advantage.

Toronto didn't get its first shot away until the five minute mark. From then until their first goal at 11:10 Blues played well, with numerous attacks on the Sir George goal. Munro was allowed to walk into the Georgian end, circle the net and take a hard shot; only Wolfe's nimble glove prevented the puck from going in.

Bill Fifield, playing centre in his first game of the season, set up defenceman Mike Keenan in the slot for Blues' first goal.

The second period continued in the style of the first. Blues', for example, couldn't get a shot during a penalty to Cuttini for tripping.

On their next powerplay, Watt sent out the Pagnutti - Bubba - Ruhnke line, with Ruhnke connecting on a Bubba rebound to put Blues ahead 2-1.

Varsity continued to apply pressure but on two occasions defenceman Mike Keenan was caught up ice on a rush and the forwards didn't cover his point. Georgians scored on both occasions.

Mario Cuttini scored at 13:25 with assists going to Alan King and Rory McKay to notch Georgians' second.

At 18:05 Maurice Desfosses capitalised on a 3 on 1 rush when he blasted the puck at Durno who trapped it partially under his arm but had it roll into the net, giving Sir George the lead going into the third period.

Blues were naturally dejected after the game and coach Watt wouldn't allow any reporters into the dressing room.

Blues Notes... Francois Ouimet and Kevin Devereux looked impressive on defence for Sir George... Ouimet was offered a pro contract by a Philadelphia scout during a regular game last week. He turned it down, counting on more money at the end of the season... tomorrow Blues travel to York where they hope to get back on the winning track.

Georgians' goalie Bernie Wolfe once again toils Blues, this time stealing the puck from Pagnutti.

Old guard vs. reformers for council

The battle for the mayor's chair and aldermanic seats on Toronto City Council is shaping up to a battle between political traditionalists and community-oriented reformers.

Math chairman spurns student petitions

Mathematics chairman George Duff suggested yesterday that students protesting feared dismissals should not be concerned with a professor's employment problems, but should do their schoolwork instead.

However, he added that he encourages students to voice their dissatisfactions to him on policy and course matters.

He also warned that because of the students' protest, whose demands include professor Stephen Salaff's retention on the faculty, Salaff may have reason to be concerned about his future. Duff said he thought Salaff may be behind the organizing of the protest.

A petition circulated by mathematics students, which now has 408 signatures on it according to student organizer Kevin McQuillan, requests that Salaff and David Spring, who was denied tenure last May, be retained on the faculty.

Duff refused, other than the brief reference to Salaff's future, to talk about the two professors, saying, "It is not proper for me to comment on the status of an individual."

Some lecturers have not been sent notices of renewal of their contracts because of budgetary problems. Duff admitted this, stating "some individuals are finding it difficult to secure employment."

However, Salaff seemed to be a special case, both because of the recent protest and his actions last spring in supporting students who objected to the marking system in a course.

The students also objected to Spring being denied tenure by a committee which meets in secret, whose composition is also not public, and whose reasons for denying tenure were never revealed to Spring.

Duff was not sure why the tenure committee's composition was secret, but asserted that it "operates in a certain framework and that the people on the committee take things very seriously."

In response to the petition's expressed dissatisfaction with "the present marking system in first year calculus courses, with its exclusive emphasis on examinations, including a 50 per cent final", Duff said that if the students do their work, they would have little to worry about. He pointed out that the course's monthly test and Christmas exam encourage the students to keep up.

Duff also sympathized with another student complaint in the petition, that textbooks were inadequate and "outrageously over-priced", but said it was very difficult to resolve.

He added that he was working to resolve the textbook problem.

Concerned students in the math department are circulating two petitions.

The first, which describes Salaff as an "excellent mathematics professor" and protests his feared dismissal, has been signed by almost 150 of Salaff's present and former students, McQuillan says. It is to be presented to Duff at a meeting which the students hope to arrange today.

The second, with 408 signatures already is a letter from as many math students who support it to university president John Evans and Duff, expressing deep dissatisfaction with the department's teaching policies. It also requests that teaching ability be made a "prime factor" in hiring and firing professors, and that students be represented on all hiring and tenure bodies.

CUA hears U of T assail cuts

By PAUL McGRATH

A 22 person University of Toronto delegation yesterday sharply criticized the provincial government's cutbacks in student financing and last week's announcement of a capital budget freeze for universities.

President John Evans, head of the U of T delegation to the annual hearings of the provincial Committee on University Affairs, called for "urgent reconsideration" of the capital budget freeze on renovations because U of T has many old buildings which need repair.

He also opposed the prohibition of new construction, saying that the proposed men's athletic facilities and Innis College building would be affected.

"We need longer notice of policy changes so that we don't react in shock", he stated, referring to the sudden freeze announcement last week.

CUA is a government-established liaison body which makes recommendations on universities to the government.

Both Evans and vice-president business affairs Alex Rankin stressed that the university was doing its best to keep costs and a minimum and increasing the efficiency of budgeting, but they took exception to government's sudden moves.

"Our planning efforts are certainly eroded when the government makes last minute unilateral decisions which destroy the basis of our projection; for instance the reduction in Ontario Fellowships, the increase in student fees, or the change in limitation on graduate student earnings" Rankin said. "We should urge a longer lead time and more dialogue with the universities before action is taken."

Evans criticized this year's fee hikes, saying that access to higher education was slowly being removed from those who can't pay for it. He added that students enrolled in the university should be assured that their fees will not rise for the time they remain in the university.

Rankin pointed to the renovation of University College already in progress, and the Wallberg and Sir Sandford Fleming Building renovations as examples of projects interrupted, by the decision. These renovations involve about $15 million.

"It is one thing to halt construction of new capacity so that the government and universities can re-assess their needs in the light of changing enrolment pattern," Rankin said. "This makes good sense but there is no logic to coupling this with the cessation of renovation or demolition of buildings."

"The cyclical money is essential to the problems facing us. They should be continued and they should be increased (sic)"

Vice-provost Don Forster also criticized the government's education spending cuts.

"At a time when academic restraints are declining, financial restraints are increasing", he said. "It's hard to build up enthusiasm with the New Program with the erratic government policy."

Rankin also called for an increase in value of the Basic Income Unit, the per student formula that government uses to give grants to universities. He said that the increase in the value of the BIU should match the cost of inflation to the university, and cited salary increases as a major contribution to university inflation.

"There is every indication that under pressure of a much higher Consumer Price Index rise, the 1973 settlements will exceed the 1972. We urge the CUA to press for a realistic increase in the BIU value for 1974-75," Rankin said.

In his opening remarks, Evans likened the efforts of the university to "innovations in a cold climate," referring to the growing dissatisfaction in public and political circles over the increasing appropriations of public money for post-secondary education.

He cited uncertain situations that made it difficult for a university to totally plan its direction in budgeting, including "the changing preference (for courses) of students in a seemingly capricious manner".

"It's no longer sufficient to just prepare to hire new staff," he said, "but we have to be constantly shifting to new objectives as we become subject to new pressures," he said.

Forster told the committee that students this year were more interested in experimenting with the New Program than dealing with university governments.

The New Program, a liberalization of course structures and marking procedures implemented three years ago, is being reviewed by a presidential advisory committee.

Arts and science dean Bob Greene cited the new multi-media biology program and the efforts of Pollution Probe as indications of the university's new academic progress.

Representatives of Health Sciences, Law and Dentistry all complained of an acute lack of funds for special projects and clinics.

Graduate school dean Ed Safarian accused the government of an "insincere" attitude to graduate studies and pointed out that 45 per cent of all graduate (masters) students in humanities last year received no funding at all from the government.

Graduate Student's Union president Wendy LeBlanc stated that the union could see "no consistent government policy on graduate studies", and complained that some assistant teachers were receiving as little as $500 because of government limitations.

She added that unless government policy was improved, there would be an exodus of students to either lower-cost universities in Canada, or foreign universities with higher fees, but more government support.

CUA's afternoon session dealt with the problems of Scarborough and Erindale Colleges, which are significantly affected by the freeze.

Withhold fees, says SAC executive

By BRIANE NASIMOK

The SAC executive Monday recommended U of T students withhold the second instalment of their fees, in support of the DFS executive decision last weekend. A meeting of council has been scheduled for next Monday for full council ratification.

The decision comes after DFS general meeting last Saturday came to no decision about the fees strike. After four executive members resigned, including SAC president Eric Miglin, the new executive decided to go ahead with the fees strike, which must be ratified by member councils.

Although the OFS demands were not exactly those the SAC passed last Wednesday, the executive found them "compatible" and decided to support the strike.

Education Commissioner George Strathy said OFS was "close enough" to the council's position and felt that the campaign should start immediately.

President Eric Miglin suggested holding the meeting as early as possible (Monday) and encouraging students to wait until January 10 before considering paying the second instalment. (That is the date of the first Varsity of the new year, which the executive agreed to advertise in to inform the students of the progress of the campaign.)

Monday's meeting will also consider an OFS motion supporting a one day moratorium on classes following the release of the provincial report on post-secondary education, expected in the next two months.

Academic Affairs passes weak fees resolution

By RANDY ROBERTSON

The Academic Affairs Committee yesterday unanimously passed a watered-down resolution on tuition fees and student aid prepared by president John Evans for presentation to the provincial government.

Evans' resolution "expressed concern" about the Ontario government's cutbacks in education spending, while a motion earlier passed unanimously by the committee "deplored" the Conservatives' action. Evans' statement replaced the earlier one proposed by student Brian Morgan, as the executive committee, in a motion approved by the Governing Council, sent it back to Academic Affairs.

Morgan's motion in effect endorsed the same demands as the Ontario Federation of Students is now pressing on the government. It called for a rollback in both this year's increases in tuition fees and the loan portion of provincial student grants, a reduction in the age of independence under the DSAP plans and consultation with affected groups before raising fees further.

The resolution passed says the university committee is concerned about four issues:

- the hardship the simultaneous increase in tuition fees and decrease in grant aid are causing low income students,

- the hardship graduate students are facing because of the increases
- the difficulties poorer part-time students may have if they are not provided with financial aid, and
- the present age of independence which is "arbitrary" and which "imposes strains" on some individuals and families.

The resolution also demands that no further changes in tuition fees grants or loans be introduced unless four conditions are met:

- Unless a contingency repayment factor is instituted as part of the loan system.
- "Unless a well designed transitional program is developed which will offset hardship consequent upon change.
- "Unless prior notice of change is given to enable students and families to adjust their expectations and plans.
- "Unless students already registered in programs are assured of continuation of support provided by current aid plans until they graduate or cease to be registered."

Another member claimed that "teeth have been put in and only the body odour removed."

Quebec government withdraws rules, CEGEP strike off

QUEBEC CITY (CUPI) — The threatened strike by CEGEP (community college) students in Quebec has apparently forced the provincial government to withdraw tough new regulations, at least until this spring.

The Comité national exécutif of the Front étudiant du Québec (FEQ) voted last Sunday to call off the strike. The decision followed receipt of a telegram from Quebec education minister François Cloutier by the Directeurs-général of the various CEGEPs, advising them the new rules would be tabled pending further study.

Cloutier also said the government would try to consult students and faculty before releasing new regulations.

The controversial rules, entitled Le nouveau régime pédagogique, would have increased compulsory weekly class time, eliminated several humanities requirements, and allowed school principals to expel students and then force them to re-register, if they were considered "troublesome".

Students at the Ste. Hyacinthe and Alma CEGEPs in the Lac St. Jean region were already on strike and had taken over the administration offices, halting all CEGEP operations there. Students at the English speaking Dawson and John Abbot colleges in Montreal had voted to strike for one day before December 1.

Although FEQ executive members at the Sunday meeting said strike plans are out of the question, they indicated the government not acting in good faith.

The government will release its amended regulations in April next year, when most students will be out of school and unable to organize.

The students have no guarantee the government will not bring back the same document or even one more odious. Some students at the meeting termed the whole affair "a manoeuvre".

The executive decided to send committees to each of the six regions in FEQ to determine student opinion.

It had already sent questionnaires to all CEGEPs asking if students would support the planned strike action. Some 13 CEGEPs answered yes, and seven answered no.

The executive will compile information received into a comprehensive survey.

The government's announcement marks the second time in one week that militant action by students has forced authorities to retreat. On November 23, students at Memorial University in St. John's Newfoundland ended a ten-day occupation of their administration building after the president agreed to allow students to determine the future of their students union. He had earlier refused to continue to collect student union fees in an apparent attempt to destroy the union financial base.

Mayorality front-runner

O'Donohue appeals to immigrants, workers

By LDRNE SLDTNICK

Anyone who has heard at least one speech by mayorality candidate Tony O'Donohue knows at least three things: he is an engineer, an Irish immigrant, and a strong "family man." It takes some hard listening, however, to find out where O'Donohue stands on the issues.

Tony D'Onohue is the only candidate for mayor who would entitle a part of his literature "Tony's Life, Loves, and Humble Beginnings." His campaign is based almost entirely on his personality, and the "issue" he presses is the strengthening of family life.

The image he presents is that of an ordinary, good-natured guy, a rustic who came over from Ireland to find the good life, someone who is either above or below politics, but certainly no politician.

The 39 year old D'Onohue came to Toronto in 1956, and by 1964 had lost in his first try at a City Council seat. But in 1966, he topped the polls in the old Ward 5, and in 1969, repeated the performance in the present Ward 4 as a Civic Action Party candidate. He was then elected to the Executive Committee.

Ward 4 is the type of area where he will get the bulk of his support in the next Monday's election, because it is made up of the kind of people to whom he directs his appeal: Catholics, non-Anglo-Saxons, and working people. Because Toronto has a majority of such people, especially south of Bloor Street, D'Onohue is the front-runner, and has been since he started campaigning for the mayorality, seemingly about three years ago.

To D'Onohue, politics means publicity. Since being elected to City Council, he has made a career out of promoting various "motherhood" issues and proposals which rarely seem to have much effect, except to get his name in the news. Pollution is his specialty. For example, he conducted the well-publicized inquiry into the cause of death of a duck at Toronto Island.

Pollution, he says, is the reason he entered politics in the first place, because he "wanted to protect my wife and son Danny."

Another O'Donohue trademark is his attendance at almost every ethnic social function, building up his contacts. His name seems to appear more often in the social columns of the newspapers than in reports about city politics. But none of the daily papers, which have made his name so well-known, is supporting him in his bid for the mayorality.

In his literature, personality and family items always get first billing, and take up about as much space as other issues. Details include the lunch menu served by his wife Aldona, and how she takes care of Tony, right down to "his unruly lock of hair that just won't stay in place."

When he talks about issues, it is usually from an engineer's point of view. And while the main battles of City Council in the past three years have been fought over the development issue, D'Onohue's main platform is the strengthening of family life, which, he says,

"will reduce the number of people on alcohol and drugs, and reduce the number on welfare."

Strengthening family life means more parks and hockey rinks, but also includes closing down Rochdale and getting tough with "welfare parasites". One of the many proposals O'Donohue has borrowed from his rivals is the cleaning up of the Yonge Street "strip", originally proposed by the Western Guard's candidate for mayor, Don Andrews.

The big strength in O'Donohue's platform is pollution, but he comes out in favour of completion of the Spadina and Scarborough expressways, although he opposed the Spadina until 1971. He says pollution is no reason for stopping expressways because cleaner fuels will soon be available.

Since pollution control is mainly a provincial responsibility, there is a limit to what D'Onohue can do to reach his goal of a clean environment through the municipal government.

In fact, it seems doubtful whether D'Onohue could accomplish any of his policy goals as mayor. He admits that the mayor of Toronto has little power, but says that the mayor can create an image for the city through his personality.

But D'Onohue is neither a good debater nor a good arm-twister, so it is unlikely that he could swing enough votes in City Council for proposals that most aldermen did not agree with already. Part of his problem is his disdain for details. He sometimes finishes a speech in Council with the phrase "... or something like that."

But if his proposals are vague, his past voting record is somewhat less so. The myth persists that D'Onohue falls somewhere between the pro- and anti-development groups at City Hall.

But voting records compiled by the Confederation of Residents and Ratepayers Associations, City Hall newsletter, and columnist Ron Haggart, all show that D'Onohue is just as much a part of the Did guard as fellow mayorality candidate David Rotenberg or aldermen Allan Lampont and Fred Beavis. The only important difference

MedSchoolitis infects students

This year's crop of freshman (and freshettes) at Toronto, as elsewhere, has seen the continued propagation of an insidious, degenerate disease. No, I'm not writing on the world's VD epidemic, nor the dangers of "terminal" acne. I refer to A&Sc. Infectious MedSchoolitis.

The Wannabash Medical Diagnosis Sourcebook continues the symptoms list: Patient usually in late teens or early 20's; unseen at 30 (magic number that). Earliest sign is enrolment in Bio 120, Chem 120, Calculus, and Physics I. Carriers of MedSchoolitis at this time usually infect the other small per cent of healthy, yet defenceless individuals.

Some, more imaginative types, experience verbalizations. Those afflicted often clear their throat and hurl, "ah-haa, uh-uhm". Rare, yet still as indicative, are, "Take this and see me in two weeks", or "Call me Marcus", or even better "Call me Steve".

In advanced stages of the disease, patients scurry during their second year of university into a large exam-hall. Although this four hour congregation may remind one of the lemming's mass suicide run, usually nothing noteworthy takes place here. Most individuals never congregate again.

Most frequent however, noticed during the months of December and April, is high anxiety toward, academic work, nail-biting, tremor in hand, lack of sleep, and constipation.

Treatment of the infection varies. Some should be given a simple kick in the pants and all to be given sympathy. Others not showing a complete set of symptoms should enter the hallowed halls of that castle on centre campus for proper therapy. Upon release, known as graduation, the new person has a brief stay in the isolated colony of University Avenue, before settling down for life in far-distant lands (Etobicoke, Mississauga, Scarborough).

On the more serious side of my comment, I believe that many first year kiddies should get away from the television, mother, and the sandbox. The world does need more competent physicians, especially in low populated areas, and better health services all round. I do not deny this. But, when literally thousands of middle-class offspring, going through college COD (call on dad), compete like beasts to climb the status ladder (thanks, Jack) for the sake of an imagined, yet lucrative, heaven... that's sad! This, their only driving force; the 'profession' overlooked.

Medicine, as I see it, can be only hard work throughout the five to 15 year learning stage and usually more so while in the practice. This vocation requires more than a "That's for me" conviction, with a primary desire to simply help people. Let me recommend something.

For all members of the Doctors of Tomorrow Club, feverish with the sickness, and eager to make your fortune too: go on a field trip. March down to Toronto General Hospital's emergency entrance or Sick Kids' across the street, and stay for 24 hours. Watch for that day ambulances scream in with those suffering, bleeding, asphyxiating... dying. Tell us how much fun it was. Go right down to the failure-pit (the morgue) and explain your case to the pathologist. Watch an autopsy. Then, tell us it's always been for you.
