Life within the profession surely is not all $20 bills and successful surgery... "hemostat... sponge...". Now imagine yourself in the hundreds of unglorified jobs some doctors have: listening to a chubby, persistent hypochondriac about her problems; out of bed at four am; telling a young father his child was still-born; protoscoping... and don't forget you'll have to be warm, understanding, and legally responsible. Let me not, however, understate the satisfactions and joys, I'm sure, known only to a physician.

For your sake, open up your horizons, some of you with the Medical School Hang-up. There is a field of interest within this world that is really for you, and is really yours; find it!

Institute visit reveals reality

Russ Rothney's article (Mentally Handicapped Children Need Freedom) in your November 10th issue is perceptive and completely right in its concern at the pitying, charity mentality which has so long governed the approach to mentally retarded persons. The Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded and its 350 local associations across Canada is the largest citizen/parent action group committed to fighting this outmoded concept. We will be the first to admit that even within our own ranks, old attitudes die hard. But to state that the "paternalistic, charity approach engulfs the Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded" is a generalization too far removed from the truth to let pass without comment. Fortunately, he refutes his own sweeping criticism by citing that CAMR is supporting the Winnipeg activists involved in the "Sisters and Brothers Collective".

While we welcome objective criticism, we would encourage a deeper look at our philosophy of normalization and integration, and at the programs of Citizen Advocacy and Comprehensive Community Service Systems by and through which we hope to emancipate the mentally retarded.

We would encourage Mr. Rothney to visit our National Institute on Mental Retardation to see how the philosophy he propounds is being translated into reality, and to share his ideas on how these efforts can be improved. We would also encourage him to visit the growing number of facilities run by the Metropolitan Toronto Association for the Mentally Retarded and its scores of volunteers, all of whom are ready to welcome new ideas from those who are prepared to carry their inspiration into action.

Toike committee wants feedback

One of the prime objectives of the special committee on the Toike has been to attempt to establish some policies and priorities for the Toike. While the comments and ideas received in response to the Engineering Faculty Council cover a wide spectrum, it must be recognized that the writers "constitute a small percentage of the Toike's readers. It is naive to think that the committee can recommend anything without receiving some feedback from the university community.

As chairman of the committee, I would like to invite any criticism, ideas or comments to be sent to me, c/o the Engineering Society Offices, 2nd floor, Engineering Annex.

To be conscious of the criticism is one large step along the road of change.

Feels SAC has deserted him

I have never been particularly impressed with the calibre of student politicians at U of T, but this year's SAC has hit a new low.

I have followed with great interest your stories showing the gutless, pussyfooting of Eric Miglin and his council in their refusal to support the fees demonstration at Queen's Park last week.

Although I am no heavy radical, I am disturbed by the government's new policies on student aid, since I have been dependent throughout university on government support. Under the new regulations my loan is bigger and my grant smaller, so I am forced to heap up an even larger debt than the one I had planned for.

Believing that SAC really was interested in protesting this, I, like hundreds of other students, paid my fees in two instalments, even though it meant a $15 penalty, in the hopes of a fees strike in the second term. Now I find that, not only is SAC wishy-washy in its failure to organize any effective protest, but it effectively killed the one that the Ontario Federation of Students organized by refusing to support it.

Then, in Friday's Varsity, I was amused to discover that SAC has watered down its original position of advocating a fees strike to prevent this year's hikes from going into effect, to asking only that the government come out with a public statement that things will not be worse next year (as if such a statement would be any assurance any way).

And, Miglin points out, the withholding is a "protest, not a strike."

I am disgusted with the weak, cowardly, do-nothing SAC that I am paying student fees to support. Could the Young Socialists really have been that much worse?

Concerned about Arabs, Israelis

Allow me to comment briefly upon the address given at the University of Toronto by Michel Chartrand.

I share with any sincere person concern for the welfare of the refugees from the area of contemporary Israel and also believe that both the Palestinian Arabs and the Israeli Jews should have the right to political self-determination. I do not think, however, that the interest of the currently dispossessed Palestinians is served by turning their problem into a worldwide issue centering upon the role of the United States or the Soviet Union in the world. A more effective and fairer course would be, first, to influence public opinion in the United States so that more regard be shown for the Palestinian Arabs than is usual at the present; and further to pressure the governments of both the United States and the Soviet Union to neutralize the Middle East, provide unconditional technological assistance, and implement freer trade. It is not right for any political groups in economically advanced societies to use the plight of people in the Third World for their political advantage.

Besides, despite the tragic occurrences in Jordan, it is a mistake to set the interests of the Palestinians apart from those of existing Arab governments. All need to be realistic. The goal of all must be to redress the effects of expansionist Israeli policies. But at the same time, the existence of a modern society in Israel is of potential value to everyone in the region. Whether or not the Israeli government is socialist is a matter of opinion; the viability of the state is a fact of life: it could become one of the pillars of a future Middle Eastern international entity.

Reader offers public warning

I feel that the letter from the Christian World Liberation Front published by The Varsity in mid-October is to be strongly deplored, as manifesting most of the evils of lunatic-fringe Christianity. I wish to have made public the following opinions about the group, that people may be warned of the nature of the group. The group seems specifically to be:

(a) anti-rational or irrational, particularly in that the letter involves a deplorable confusion of 'the claims of Christ' with the claims that the Bible makes for Christ.

(b) riddled with an extreme form of Bible worship. The Bible is somehow represented as not the word of God, but the Word of god. Most Catholics do not confuse a crucifix with Christ (perhaps partly because of the Reformation), but some extreme forms of Protestantism put the Bible up as a worship object. Bible worship is, I am sure, a very serious sin. The only fit punishment that I can think of for it is eternity in a pseudo-Heaven with a Bible but no God.

(c) full of a silly, naive psychology which they practise on others and which can with at least as much gain be practised on them. They argue that it seems that others have "... had disappointing experiences with some form of Christianity and are reacting from their own emotional hang-ups...", but have the authors of the letter had disappointing experiences and are they only finding some kind of 'joy in the Lord' to cope with their own hang-ups?

Well, reading the letter was a disappointing experience (to say the least) with something that someone was calling Christianity. But, I am enjoined to hate the sin and not the sinner; a faith that attacks and perverts Intelligence is destroying much of God's greatest gift, that which separates man from other animals and allows him to understand God and his works.

Toike should be editor's elective

As you already know, a committee has been set up to investigate the Toike, one reason being the discontent of some professors with regards to a) "raw" content in the paper b) "... some copies finding their way to high schools" — the latter giving our faculty a bad image.

We discussed this topic during one of our lectures with a committee member and some of the following points were raised:

1. The editor's position is filled by default. Most engineers can't/won't afford the time to do this job, which does require a modest amount of work.
2. As a result, only those "apply" for the job who are attracted by the Toike's present format.
3. An engineering paper is better than no paper.
4. The Toike does not represent the views held by the majority of the engineers.

I feel that each point mentioned above may also be applied to the Varsity — there is certainly wide discontent about the content of your paper.

In conclusion, my suggestion for improving the Toike is thus — make the position of editor a free elective, whereby the person could drop his choice of a non-technical subject, take over the Toike, and receive his mark in his "course" (according to his performance) from a committee of engineering profs.

Congratulations on a well written article on the Toike.

Ed's Note: Unlike the Toike, The Varsity editorship does not usually fall to anyone by default. Last year, three persons with differing views about how they would like to see the paper run contested the position. The staff nominated one of the applicants to The Varsity Board of Directors, the person they nominate having to secure an absolute majority of all votes cast by the staff. The Varsity editorship is a full time job and the editor is paid for his job.

Ward 6 trustee candidates offer voters...

The following is adapted from articles by Fred Wechs in the Toronto Citizen and Joan Doiron in Community Schools.

Community organizations in Ward 6 are only beginning to get on their feet. As yet, there is very little community involvement in the schools — and certainly no strong community groups helping the schools reflect community needs and interests.

The schools which are closest to their communities are on the fringes of the Ward — the Island school and Duke of York (which actually relates more to Ward 7 than Ward 6). There is a small group of parents working at Church St., but the hard core of schools — Lord Lansdowne, Ryerson, King Edward, Orde, Ogden, Jarvis, and Central Tech — are virtually isolated from their communities (though at Ogden and Ryerson some attempts in this direction are being made). So our political aspirants can easily see Ward 6 as a means of climbing up the political ladder by becoming trustees, undisturbed by any community groups demanding that they be accountable.

In the 1969 race in Ward 6, Ben Rose ran first with 3,484 votes, and K. Dock Yip placed second with 3,329. Four other candidates polled more than 7,000 votes for a total of 13,002 ballots cast.

Rose and Yip

Yip and Rose have joined with three other incumbent trustees in the formation of a caucus at the Board of Education.

According to Rose, the group represents various points on the political spectrum, but will "try to agree on specific matters so we can be more effective in battling the bureaucracy." Points in the group's platform include ensuring maximum economy and efficiency in the school system and not increasing the class-size in elementary and secondary schools. The caucus says it intends to generally vote as a block.

Rose and Yip also advocate the provision of day care facilities and the involvement of parents in school curriculum and community use.

But from this point on Yip and Rose differ markedly. On many votes Yip places himself on the side of administration, against community rights and access. He voted against allowing trustees (and thus, the public) access to board information; he was also against immediate improvements in the downtown "tinderbox" schools, despite the fact that the "reform" trustees felt so strongly about this that they took it to the Ontario Municipal Board.

Yip sees the role of a trustee as that of "liaison officer between the parent, the student, the teacher and the board," and as someone who sets policy at the board by interpreting what the people of the entire ward desire.

Generally, he is satisfied with Toronto schools, since he finds students much more articulate and aware than those of his own day. He feels that the present balance of permissive and disciplined education should be maintained until experiments like SEED have been evaluated.

Community control of schools is not, Yip believes, an important issue in the election, since people in the ward are largely not in favour of it. Another false issue, he feels, is the charge that downtown children are streamed by the school system into vocational courses, which, in his opinion, has no basis. He feels very strongly that the board should set up pre-school programs run by teachers, with parent aides, so that disadvantaged children could develop necessary skills under the guidance of a trained teacher.

Rose's views are not identical with those of his running-mate. Streaming of inner-city children does go on in the schools, he maintains. Moreover, children of immigrant parents often have problems adapting to learning in English.

He sees these as the greatest priorities now facing the board, and he suggests they may find a solution in increased community involvement in the schools. Two other problems Rose would attempt to deal with are the lack of an effective voice for teachers in formulating school policy, and the need to break up larger schools into smaller units to create "a more human environment."

Both Rose and Yip suggest that the position of trustee should probably be made full-time, a change which would require greater compensation for people who hold the job. The salary is now $3,600.

Yip has been a lawyer in Ward 6 for 25 years and is fluent in Chinese. He has been conscientious in attending meetings and says he spends four hours per day at meetings and reading educational materials. He voted against increasing administrative salaries along with the majority of trustees and might very well be influenced to take other "reform" stands.

Rose worked for 21 years as a journalist for the Toronto Star and now teaches journalism at Sheridan Community College. From 1965 to 1968 he was information officer for the Toronto board; he left this position because of the board's refusal to allow SEED use of facilities and support staff. He was also critical of the Board's operation as a closed corporation and ran originally to open it up to the public.

Rose has made well-articulated pleas at the board level for "effective resistance to the (budget) ceilings when they discriminate against the Toronto board's program in the schools." He supports teachers' rights to negotiate working conditions and says he can give 20 to 30 hours a week to the job.

Leckie and Spencer

Last year's U of T SAC president Bob Spencer and his then-education commissioner Dan Leckie are running a joint campaign based on the concept of community schools.

Their main criticisms of the caucus to which Yip and Rose belong is that the group's platform is not one of real community participation and control. Since the trustees themselves have defined the issues for the community, Spencer and Leckie contend that, although the content of their platform may be fairly progressive, the process used to arrive at it is conservative, a typical example of "top-down decision-making."

"Our major complaint with the traditional trustee," they say, "is his relationship to his community. He sees himself as a representative, and in Ward 6 representative democracy is not satisfactory." The basis of the Spencer-Leckie campaign is that, if elected, they will work as full-time community organizers, attempting to give communities "meaningful participation in the working of the school."

The necessity of having this kind of trustee in Ward 6, they say, is that the present school system has its own culture — white, Anglo-Saxon and middle-class. When ethnic, working class children enter school, they suffer a kind of "culture-shock," since the school culture is radically different from that of their home. The result is either little or no success at school, or adaptation to the new culture, which alienates them from their home environment and creates tensions within the family. Those who do not adapt are often unnecessarily streamed into opportunity classes and vocational courses. The formation of decision-making bodies of ward residents, teachers, trustees and students would help schools respond to the different racial, cultural and social needs of the community.

Dan Leckie

On students' rights, they argue, "that a clear code of students' rights should be established and every effort be made to decrease the gap between the two lives of a student. Students, parents and teachers should discuss effective learning situations and generate course and study ideas. Throughout this process, the trustee should act as a formation, access and focus for people concerned about schools."

Dan Martyniuk

Besides serving as president of the Kensington Area Residents Association, Dan Martyniuk has participated in a number of other community groups, including the Kensington Urban Renewal Committee and the Beautify Our Neighbourhood Campaign, of which he was chairman. He is a self-employed master electrician.

Martyniuk believes that part of the function of a trustee is to be like a "sponge that absorbs information from the community, remaining in constant touch with the grassroots."

He has five children and it is from their experiences that he draws conclusions about the schools. He sees the high schools as prisons with the principals playing the role of wardens.

Because of the complacency and apathy that exist among people in a community, Martyniuk believes that it would be fairly difficult to get a group from the community to consistently participate in the running of its school. What he sees as essential, however, is the formation of an arbitration committee composed of students, staff and administrators to deal with grievances.

There are a number of changes he would like to see in the school system. There must be a change, he says, in the master-servant relationship between teachers and students which is based on punitive measures. Another change would be to make grades nine to 11 a time for students to search around, when school would be a resource pool of information with no grading, allowing students the freedom to drop in and out. This is necessary, he says, since these years are a very confusing period in any person's life.

In 1966 Martyniuk ran for the Board of Education position, placing third out of six.

Peter Maloney

Peter Maloney has said that he is running for trustee because he would like to hold public office and thinks he would be good at the job. He worked for the Toronto Stock Exchange until recently. Early this year he declared bankruptcy, as a result of a costly campaign he ran in the 1971 provincial election. Running on the Liberal ticket, he finished well back of Conservative Allan

Lawrence.

Maloney wants to experiment with community control in the secondary schools, handing administration over to a board of students, teachers, parents and other citizens. He thinks the ethnic and class discrimination found in the school system should be attacked by a compensatory educational program, and he advocates pumping more money into downtown schools for this purpose.

Maloney is presently a director of the community Homophile Association (CHAT). He says that, as a homosexual, he feels a special concern for sexual liberation — powerful."

Low has a full-time job, but he promises to devote "as much time as is necessary" to the job of trustee. He is suspicious of trustees who say they will be full-time and said "You shouldn't make yourself a martyr for the public."

Cliff Mack

Cliff Mack is a University of Toronto student running on the Young Socialist slate.

YS literature states that the schools "are run in the interests of our future bosses — the tiny handful of corporation managers and owners who control Canada."

Schools should be run democratically by their students and teachers, the YS believes. Student rights they advocate include the right to form political clubs and to publish uncensored student newspapers.

All cutbacks in education spending should be stopped, and students should receive a living wage, the YS says. The truth about women's and labour struggles should be brought into the schools and the war in Vietnam should no longer be ignored.

Mack is active in the Committee to End the War in Vietnam, and has worked as a logger in British Columbia, as a member of the International Woodworkers of America.

Cliff Mack

Murray Starr has just come out of hospital after a one-month stay, and thus ran little or no campaign.

He says he believes in community schools, in which students, teachers, parents and principals have a voice. However, he does not advocate complete control by these constituencies.

He helped start the Kensington community school.

A self-described drama director, Starr feels a main issue in the election is "the lack of communication between the people and the Board of Education". He thinks education costs should be reduced.

women's liberation and gay liberation — in the schools. He wants changes in the sexual education and guidance counselling programs.

David Low, a marketing representative with a life insurance company, is president of the Ontario Young Progressive Conservative Association.

He believes that school facilities should be more accessible to the public, that more lay assistants should be hired, and that the present pupil-teacher ratio should not be increased. Closing milk co-op assists agri-business

By DON HUMPHRIES
Canadian University Press

FRANKVILLE — A farmer-owned cheese co-op near here will shut down on December 1 and the farmers will probably be forced to deliver their milk to a plant owned by Kraft Foods Limited.

The Plum Hollow Co-op in Leeds County about 60 miles northeast of Kingston, Ontario will cease production because the Ontario Milk Marketing Board (OMMB) has cut the quota of milk the plant can receive this year.

The OMMB has instituted "regional averages" and assigns milk quotas by region. Milk from all farms is divided among all processing plants in the region. But, milk used to produce the so-called specialty cheeses such as skim milk cheese or colby cheese is exempt from quota.

This means the multi-purpose plants owned by Kraft, Ault's, and Cow and Gate can use all the milk they want to make their specialty products without cutting into their quota allocations. The arrangement lowers the regional average, providing less milk for plants such as Plum Hollow that produce only cheddar cheese.

Because of this regulation, although Plum Hollow is supposed to receive seven million pounds of milk this year, the regional average is only five million pounds.

The additional two million pounds of milk it should receive will be sent to other plants — most likely to one owned by Ault's or Kraft. The extra pounds would have allowed Plum Hollow to keep operating all year.

(Ault's is owned by beer producer John Labatt Limited, which is also involved in the chicken-raising business. Cow and Gate is a wholly-owned subsidiary of a British-owned corporation.

Kraft (Canada) Limited is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Kraftco, an American owned multi-national corporation. Kraft controls 80 per cent of cheese production in Canada. The National Farmers Union is currently urging consumers to boycott Kraft, until it allows the NFU to bargain for fair prices for farmers.)

Last year, Plum Hollow used a bit more milk than the OMMB said it could. The OMMB deducted the amount from this year's regional average.

Plum Hollow is owned by about 60 local dairy farmers. They formed a co-operative association, registered under the laws of Ontario, and bought the plant from a private owner in 1967. Since then the farmers have spent more than $60,000 in improvements to modernize the plant and meet provincial pollution standards.

The Ontario government, through the Ontario Milk Commission and the OMMB, refuses to apply all laws governing co-operatives in the case of Plum Hollow. The farmers are not allowed to deliver their own milk to their plant but must sell their milk to the OMMB and buy it back to run their plant.

The government is thus deliberately forcing the farmers to close a local industry, owned and operated by local producers.

Losing the two million pounds of milk will force the plant to close for four months. All employees and the head cheesemaker will be thrown out of work.

The farmers give the cheesemaker a house, but he is not eligible for unemployment insurance because he is classified as self-employed. He doesn't know how he will support himself until April. The farmers may be forced to subsidize his living expenses because they can't afford to lose him.

"Financially, we are not able to pay a man for four months for doing nothing. What business can pay a man for four months?" Plum Hollow Co-op president Barry Hagget said in a recent interview.

Hagget said he didn't know how he could appeal the OMMB decision.

"We've written letters of protest to the Ontario Milk Commission. They say to us that it's the milk board that sets the plant supply quotas. You go to the milk board and they'll say you have to go to the Ontario Milk Commission. This is about as far as you get with that method."

"Every year since they (the OMMB) gave the quota, they've cut it," the co-op president said. "They've cut it more this year than they did last year."

"Every year, the regional average's dropped and this is just whipping us. They tell us to buy quota. Well, who are you going to buy quota from? You have to buy it from someone in your own region. Who are going to buy it from Ault's or Kraft? There is nobody else to buy quota from."

Another integral part of this problem is milk handling methods. The OMMB is encouraging farmers to modernize their handling systems by switching to bulk hauling instead of milk cans.

The OMMB offers an extra 10 cents per hundredweight for producers who deliver in bulk.

Last year, the marketing board promised the Plum Hollow owner-farmers that if one of their members went bulk, that milk would go to Plum Hollow. Several farmers switched to bulk but none of the milk has gone to Plum Hollow. The farmers thus made transportation cheaper and easier, but the milk went elsewhere.

Hagget says that, given current trends, he doubts Plum Hollow will ever see a drop of milk from the farmers who turn to bulk handling. Hagget is now installing bulk facilities for his own farm.

"They tell us to get modern and every policy they have is to keep us as antique as possible," he said.

The Ontario government has a program offering owners of small plants a "closing out grant". The program will end on August 31, 1973.

OMMB Kingston official Moore has already visited the Plum Hollow farmers. He came to "remind" them they can get $23,000 to close down their plant and to remind them of the August deadline.

The farmers rejected this suggestion and are determined to keep their plant operating.

"Our building would just stand as a ghost building. It's a nice little plant that means something to the community but nothing to the Ontario government," Hagget said.

"We want to operate as one of the good little industries that's making a good product and is not a liability to this country in any way."

"We've had reams of names put on petitions. It doesn't mean anything to this government," he said.

Effective November 15, the OMMB stopped buying cheese from the nearby Belleville cheese exchange, the central exchange for Ontario cheese. The OMMB formerly paid 63 cents per pound for cheese, but now the price may drop to the minimum federal supported price of 54 cents. Such a development would be disastrous for farmers because 54 cents wouldn't even cover the cost of milk needed to produce the cheese.

Another new policy involves the diversion of milk from the production of cheese to the manufacture of skim milk or butter.

If a plant doesn't make butter or skim milk, the farmers operating it could truck their milk to one of the plants that does and get 25 cents per hundredweight for handling the milk. If the milk was shipped in bulk, they could obtain an additional 10 cents per hundredweight. The milk buyer would also pay a rental on the farmers' quota of 15 cents per hundredweight. So they could make 50 cents per hundredweight above the ordinary selling price of milk by transporting their milk to a plant making butter or skim milk.

But, if the farmers don't have quota left, the milk is just taken away and given to the plants that will make the butter or skim milk. The plants will probably be Ault's, Cow and Gate, or Kraft.

The two million pounds of quota that Plum Hollow cannot use because of the regional average will be given to the big companies for almost nothing.

"I said to the man at Cow and Gate 'if we have quota you'll pay us and if we haven't got quota, the milk marketing board will take it away and give it to you anyway'. He said yes, that's right," Hagget remarked.

Plum Hollow will continue selling cheese from its stockpile. The farmers hope they won't run out before spring. If they do, they will have to decide to use more of their precious quota and hope it isn't cut again.

There used to be more than 80 cheese factories in Leeds County. Now there are only two.

The evidence reveals the Ontario government is working hand-in-hand with agri-business to destroy the remains of a once thriving local industry.

The large plants owned by Ault's, Kraft, or Cow and Gate use more than one million pounds of milk in one day.

So, why would they want Plum Hollow's relatively insignificant seven million pounds, only one week's supply for them. Plum Hollow could hardly be called a threat to their profitability.

Barry Hagget believes the answer is they want to control all cheese production.

The evidence indicates he is right and the corporations are receiving the cooperation of the government to establish themselves in a virtually monopolistic position.

Monopolies fix prices not through competition, but based on their own profit expectations.

In the last 10 years, about half of Canada's farmers have been forced off their land. That development is no accident.

Unless this trend is opposed, the production, processing, and distribution of food along with quality control and pricing decisions will be totally concentrated in the hands of a few industrial oligarchs.

Original Mayonnaise

- 1 Teaspoon Sugar
- 1 Teaspoon Dry Mustard
- 3/4 Teaspoon Salt
- Few grains of Popriko
- 1 Egg
- 2 Cups Vegetable or Solad Oil
- 3 Tablespoons Vinegor

- Combine first four ingredients in o bowl (small mixer bowl).
- Add egg; beat well.
- Add salad oil, a little at a time; storting with a teaspoon and gradually increasing the omount; beating constantly.
- Add 1 tablespoon vinegor after 1 cup salad oil has been oded.
- Beat in remaining salad oil; 1/4 cup ot a time.
- Add remainder of vinegor; blend well.
- Store in refrigerator.
- Yield: 2 1/4 cups.

Note: Core must be taken to odd the oil in small omounts at the stort so that it can be emulsified. This is the secret to making a good smooth mayonnaise.

Don't Pay!

The Ontario Government has met with representatives of Ontario students several times since the October fees withholding referendum. The Government simply refuses to tell us anything about their plans for student aid programmes. In particular, Premier Davis refuses to say that OSAP loan ceilings won't go up again.

It's your future. If you object to the Government's refusal to talk, if you object to the form of their education cutbacks of the last year then let the Government know.

Your fees are not due until January 15. By that time the situation may have changed.

But at least until you're back in January, DON'T PAY YOUR SECOND INSTALLMENT. The situation may have changed by then, and the January 10th Varsity will contain all the details.

Archer relies on good guy image

By STEWART GOODYEAR
Many political observers suggest William Archer is a capable and hard working alderman whose decisions are independent and pragmatic, yet an old-style politician whose vote can usually be relied on to support development interests.

With much experience and knowledge of the dynamics of city government, Archer is skilled at accomplishing what he sets out to do. This is evident in the success of last summer's Yonge Street mall, of which he was the chief architect.

Archer, a friendly man, has good relations with most of both the Old Guard and reformist elements of council, and maintains he is a member of neither.

While he frequently opposes the stands taken by community groups, his personal relations with them are good. However, leaders of these groups differ about his openness — some saying he gives no true indication where he stands, others saying that he is very forthright.

They also question whether Archer will help open the processes of city government to enable communities to become more involved in decision making, and whether he has fully analyzed and developed a framework of priorities concerning the needs and planning of the city.

But the great drawback against Archer is his voting record. Although he doesn't habitually vote in favour of any and all development, Archer has been fairly consistent in his support of it.

Despite working for compromises and offering amendments, he has cast his weight behind developments which have received reformist opposition in almost 80 per cent of crucial votes, according to City Hall magazine. Such contentious issues as the Spadina Expressway, the West St. James Town and Windlass developments have received his endorsement.

An incumbent in Ward 5, Archer has become a candidate in Ward 6. Critics have offered many reasons for this: his fear of running against such tough opposition as Ying Hope and Colin Vaughan; his running feud with Hope; his unpopularity north of Bloor due to his support of the expressway; his ambition to become the senior alderman of a ward and thus eligible to become a member of the City Council executive.

But Archer argues that he now identifies with the ward to the south because of his concern for the challenges of the central city and his "tremendous" communication with Chinese and community organizations. When the city was divided into different ward boundaries, Archer represented much of what is now Ward 6 for five years as an alderman and three as a controller. He also stresses that he works and pays taxes in Ward 6.

When questioned on his priorities for the city in an interview, Archer spoke in vague terms of efficient administration and good, controlled development.

He then stressed the control and direction of the urban renewal program and the need to improve Toronto's "public and private" transit systems.

Although Archer stated that the constitutional issue "is not at the fore at the moment", he did offer some suggestions to improve city government. There should be smaller wards with single aldermen, he said. He criticized the city's numerous boards and commissions for causing the "fragmentation" of government and said that "responsibility should be given back to elected representatives". Archer feels the city executive is an effective body and is opposed to restoring the Board of Control.

Archer's policies for Ward 6 are far more detailed, if questionable in the context of his past voting record.

He feels that a leading priority is the need to maintain low density housing for families and low income groups in the centre of the city, particularly in the South of Carleton and South-east Spadina areas. He also stresses that Metro Centre and the waterfront must be effectively developed, "with emphasis on people".

Ward 6 campaigner Archer

The need for "more effective control of private motor vehicles in the city core" and for better public transit are included in Archer's priorities.

Archer also maintained that he will oppose any widening of Dundas Street and will attempt to keep the attractiveness of Kensington Market, suggesting that it might become a mall.

Archer's discussion of development centred upon distinguishing when there is the need for it and when it will disrupt a community. The amount of land presently zoned for high density is now sufficient, he stated, though more apartment blocks could be built on appropriately zoned land near the centre of the city. This would lead to a good variety of higher income, high rise dwellings and the cheaper, low rise housing which is preferable for families, he claimed.

Archer is a firm supporter of the city's official plan, which he helped to draft in the mid-sixties. One common criticism of him is that he is reluctant to accept changes to the plan.

Archer asserted that in the past he worked to create Toronto's site development controls and housing standards. He then defended his voting record by arguing that for a few major issues, the amendments he has proposed have enabled better public guidance of developments.

He also stressed his independence, adding that he has made his votes for development "in the best interests of the community". In most cases only a vociferous minority in affected neighbourhoods have opposed development, Archer claimed.

Archer has criticisms of both the Old Guard and reformers. He feels that some members of each group "vote like trained seals", without giving full consideration to their positions and weighing both sides of an issue. His most outspoken criticism was of the reformers, particularly John Sewell. Archer also stated that city council has been effective, if often "fragmented and incoherent", and that "stupidity on both sides" has been the major problem.

Archer believes the duty of an alderman is "to get as much information as possible", making decisions on knowledge derived from the input of his constituents and discussions with planners and administrators. Full information should be passed on to the community, he stated. The alderman "doesn't impose his will, but involves the people", said Archer.

Expert can't answer activist

By GREG McMASTER

Military technology expert G.R. Lindsey spoke for two hours on "the state of the art" of weaponry Monday night, but could only answer "I don't know" when peace activist Kay Macpherson demanded to know when scientists like himself will begin to examine serious world problems like starvation and pollution.

Lindsey, chief of the Defense Analysis Establishment of the Canadian Defense Research Board in Ottawa, was delivering a seminar in the Medical Sciences Building on military technology as the second of the Leonard Beaton Memorial Lectures.

He contended that Canada's world military role should be "defense of the deterrent", which consists of three missile systems which "happen to be based in the United States. We have a responsibility to provide warning" in case of attack, he stated.

This prompted Macpherson, a former head of the anti-war Voice of Women, to ask "How much longer are we going on playing these games, assuming the Soviet Union has any intention of blowing us up, knowing we'll do the same to them? When are we going to turn ourselves to more serious problems?" Lindsey, who has been involved in military research for 22 years, replied that he did not know the answer.

Lindsey had described the world situation in terms of "mutual strategic deterrence", claiming that in the event of even a limited, tactical nuclear war there would be "complete and almost instant destruction" of both sides. "What happens depends on who gets there after the holocaust is over", he said.

The important question for the future, he suggested, is the "horizontal proliferation", or acquisition by new states, of nuclear weapons. This could bring about "a basic difference in the world strategic situation", he said, especially if "smaller irresponsible countries", "unauthorized people" or "huge gangster outfits" were involved.

Even now, he noted, in wars between large developed countries and smaller undeveloped countries, the smaller forces "can succeed with very clever tactics", especially if the larger power "is not willing to lose many lives".

Lindsey warned that "A lot of the things we're defending ourselves against now won't be the biggest danger in a few years", but he did not elaborate.

Satellite reconnaissance, he said, will be an important factor in the success or failure of the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) between the United States and the Soviet Union, which he described as "an attempt to retain the balance in its present state without spending lots of money."

The most easily defended weapons, he said, are missiles mounted on submarines. In the future, missiles may even be hidden "on the bottom of lakes or on the seabed."

However, he assured the audience that "It looks as though outer space is going to be a fairly peaceful place."

Parity wanted at Mac

HAMILTON (CUP) — The student council at McMaster University has launched a concerted move to achieve equal representation for students with faculty on all departmental committees.

The council established a committee to help "spur" students to seek parity, and to urge that faculty student councils organize students to press for representation.

"It is only through a situation like this that the true voice of the students is heard," council vice-president Doug Lord said. "The university is here for the students and they must have a voice in the decisions which affect them."

The council has urged local student councils to make the parity campaign a major priority when they draw up their budgets for next year. Members pledged all possible assistance in the fight for equal representation.

Lord said the committee would coordinate the various student groups in a united attack on the present departmental committee system. He said students would likely get much further by approaching the university as a united group than they would be individually approaching their respective departments.

"That would be much easier than 30 different societies going against 30 different faculties," he said.

But the university may respond that only individual departments can make changes in their internal structures. That was the story at the University of Saskatchewan Regina Campus where students this month occupied the dean of Arts and Science's office when he vetoed a social science division motion guaranteeing parity in all departments. The occupation was suspended pending negotiations.

Students criticize objectives of course unions at conference

By ULLI DIEMER

Most course unions seem to exist just to turn out course evaluations, a number of participants commented at a SAC-sponsored conference on course unions held last week.

There was a consensus that course unions should be trying to engage in other activities as well. Discussion at the conference was directed at considering what the overall objectives of course unions ought to be, and how they can be achieved, as well as approaches to common problems, including the production of course evaluations.

The conference was attended by only 15 to 20 people, considerably less than had been hoped for, according to SAC Education Commissioner George Strathy. Blame for the low attendance was attached to the timing of the conference, which occurred during peak essay-writing time, as well as to a general disinterest in course unions on much of the campus. Invitations were sent to all professional faculties, but almost all those attending were from arts and science departments, or college unions. Although the conference had been slated to go on all day, it was adjourned by 2 pm.

According to participants, the low attendance was a reflection of the problems that course unions were facing: an inability to involve most students in bringing about participation and change in the educational process. Much of the day was devoted to far-ranging but always inconclusive discussion of what role unions could play in changing or improving education.

According to former SAC education commissioner and president, Bob Spencer who was invited to give a history of course unions, too much emphasis had been placed in the past on attempting to reach or influence higher levels of decision-making, where power was presumed to lie. He advocated working for changes "on the classroom level", and using classes where this technique was successful "as an example to change others".

Spencer also suggested collecting specific complaints about individual courses, and compiling them to present to the presidential advisory committee now evaluating the New Program. The result would be to "build up a generalized critique through looking at specific problems".

Other speakers stressed the need to work for more student power on departmental committees, as well as on the classroom level, and the need to improve course content and teaching methods.

Some reservations were expressed about the danger of "alienating people by pushing political ideas at them". Others, however, charged that this would be an abdication of responsibility, that course unions should not simply provide services, but present ideas for change.

Most people, according to Bob Bettson (Trinity), "have given up hoping for change in the university", and need to be convinced that it is possible.

Course union bureaucracies, said Phil Murton, editor of this year's maths and physics course evaluation, should try to be more creative and expand their scope.

Too often, he said, course unions fall into a "consumerist" trap, "trying to sell the value of their product to students". This, he charged, was simply accepting the present educational values, directed at getting a degree efficiently, with the added dimension that professors were also being graded.

Evaluations, he said, could be "guerilla theatre" directed at the grading system, but ultimately the goal should be to do away with grading of both students and professors.

Others added that evaluations were often more useful as a means of "involvement" of class representatives, and of entire classes if they discussed them, than as "shopping lists". A problem in achieving this objective, it was pointed out, was that the power of the professor often made students afraid to discuss criticisms openly.

Students present felt that evaluations had "some influence" in improving courses and teaching, but were aware of very few cases where they were of major importance.

A number of the background documents distributed at the conference offered other criticisms of course evaluations. These included their failure to consider course content itself, their use of "pseudoscientific objectivity" and short-answer questionnaires that are incapable of raising alternatives, and the fact that they accept the overall structure of university education, seeking only to improve the way in which it is presented.

These criticisms, however, were not dealt with during the discussions. The participants decided to hold another conference sometime in January.

Food Sci not permitted to enter new professional program

By ELAINE KAHN

The Faculty of Food Sciences may not be allowed to participate in a new pre-professional program proposed for Health Sciences and Arts and Science.

According to a letter from food science dean Iva Armstrong to the Presidential Advisory Committee to Review the New Program in arts and science, the Faculty of Arts and Science has been discussing establishment of pre-professional program with the division of Health Sciences. Food sciences has been left out of these discussions.

Armstrong said in an interview her faculty has been excluded because it has not received full acceptance from the "very nebulous" Health Sciences group.

She thinks the pre-professional program is planned to include basic courses in subjects such as chemistry which could be helpful to foods science students.

The basic science courses offered by arts and science are often too specialist-oriented for these students, the letter says. However, because Foods Science has not been invited to the discussions, Armstrong is not sure that the courses being planned would be helpful to the faculty's students.

The letter also argued against any suggestion that food science courses do not have as much merit as arts and science courses, because food science students have to take six rather than five courses to complete a full year's work.

As Armstrong pointed out, it is not uncommon for a professional faculty to require one or even two courses more than five a year. She suggested arts and science would be reluctant to consider medical or legal courses of less than full value simply because a student must take more of them.

Presently, arts and science will not give its students credit for taking food science courses.

Timetabling is another problem faced by Food Sciences.

Their students are allocated to arts and science courses the same as arts students, and therefore are dispersed through all sections of any given course. This makes it difficult to timetable professional courses.

The letter concludes that the arts departments concerned seem willing to arrange grouping all food science students in a course in the same section, "but in our experience this plan breaks down in the arts and science computer".

SAC Services Commissioner Bill Steadman is running for a seat on the Sarnia Board of Education.

Steadman, who comes from Sarnia, may win, because only nine candidates are running for seven positions.

But if elected, he does not intend to quit school and return to live in Sarnia, at least for now. He hopes to continue his U of T studies and attend school board meetings every two weeks. There are no indications he will resign his SAC seat.

Steadman frankly admits he is running for the school board post as a stepping stone to higher political office.

Info system to be set up soon

By LIAM LACEY

U of T Info, a computer information system for the academic community, should be operational in early January according to SAC vice-president John Helliwell.

This system will enable anyone in the university even without previous knowledge of computer programming to obtain information about news events, movies, and pubs.

SAC plans to install four or five terminals in public areas such as foyers, lounges and lobbies. About four account numbers will be made available for public use.

SAC is hopeful of support from Industrial Business Machines in covering the cost of the terminals. IBM already supports the university in computer research and may decide to donate or rent the terminals at a low rate. Negotiations, which began in late summer, are going favourably.

The system was to be in operation earlier in the year, but financial difficulties had to be ironed out and a method had to be designed to assure that the account numbers cannot be used for other than information purposes.

Initially the Info system will be run on an experimental basis. After 300 hours of computer time worth $1,000 donated by the University of Toronto Computer Centre has been used, SAC will evaluate its popularity and practicality.

If the experiment proves successful, SAC is prepared to fund it to a "significant extent".

Ward 6 Incumbent June Marks has adopted a 'pro-people' stance.

Robarts' rules are rigid

Rigid application of rules continued at the Robarts Library on Monday, as a librarian informed two students that they could not eat their lunches in the ninth-floor student lounge.

The same librarian was later spotted eating her own repast in the ninth-floor staff lounge, where eating is permitted.

Last year, about 1000 students occupied Simcoe Hall over a threatened application of other restrictive rules concerning access of students and members of the public to the library.

Two years ago, the university decided that students' and faculty's elimination habits were similar and integrated washrooms.

Marks sheds old image

By BOB BETTSON

"June Marks is for People", proclaim a forest of signs all over Ward 6 appealing for voters to remember she is trying to retain her aldermanic seat.

Marks, who lists her occupation as businesswoman, is running for re-election as alderman after a stormy eight year political career as first alderman, then senior controller (from 1966-69) and in the last term, alderman again.

She is perhaps best remembered for her crusades against slum landlords in the mid sixties in what is now Ward 7. "I first became interested in politics when the people on my block approached me about getting a school crossing guard for a dangerous intersection," she said in an interview.

"I had to fight City Hall but from there on I became more involved, first becoming president of the Ward 2 South Ratepayers. Then when the ratepayers felt they were not adequately represented at City Hall, I decided to run."

After one unsuccessful try, Marks got elected in 1964 in what is now the eastern part of Ward 6. "My first achievement was an updating of housing standards and getting a judicial inquiry to hear my charges against slum landlords and speculators."

Marks maintained "I haven't changed, I am against any form of speculation. I was responsible for the leveling of 700 houses which were far gone, but I personally saw that the people were housed through the OHC (Ontario Housing Corporation)."

After serving as alderman, Marks ran for the Board of Control, the precursor of the City Executive Committee. (Unlike members of the executive, controllers were elected on a city-wide vote.)

After the abolition of the old Board of Control Marks decided to remain in the new downtown Ward 6 despite the fact "I could have easily chosen a North Toronto ward that would have been glad to elect a senior controller."

Marks feels alderman should make decisions on a city wide basis.

"We have many poor areas desperately needing redevelopment... many people knock proposed developments but they don't provide any alternatives."

Although, according to City Hall, a reform magazine on city politics, Marks consistently votes with the Old Guard on council, she contends "I am not part of either faction. I have voted with the reformers when their motions were acceptable."

She called herself "a strong proponent of community groups," adding, "I have had more speaking engagements than the mayor and am constantly trying to encourage people to form citizens' groups."

"Ratepayers have always had an effect at City Hall. However, when two or three get together to represent the whole community, I believe they are often small minorities, just looking for issues...and causing problems."

Despite her $6,500 campaign which includes a leaflet, calendars, pens, stickers, buttons and many large wooden signs, Marks believes that all election advertising should be banned. "We should go back to the old style public meetings. The issues haven't really been discussed in this campaign."

Marks has been attacked by other candidates for her "pro development" record.

She defends herself, saying she refuses to support or oppose development as a principle. "Citizens favour development, if it's low density. I vote on the merit of each project."

I have voted for the retaining of historical buildings with the reformers, she added. "However I am proud of the Eaton Centre. There will be less density than if they hadn't come to us. Council is demanding a high calibre of development and getting it."

"I don't object to going to developers. Where would we have got the money to build Metro Centre, which provides an integrated transport system and does away with that mess?"

In approving Metro Centre, City Council rejected recommendations from its planning staff that it require a lower density, more parks and low income housing.

However, Marks maintained the agreements reached were good "We can't demand that developers provide public housing."

The priorities she set for her next term, if re-elected, include a new transportation policy, with a department for pedestrian traffic. Her first priority would be to stop the threatened Dundas Street widening.

Internal Affairs Committee

No agreement reached on Caput's successor

By TOM McLAUGHLIN

The Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council last week discussed without reaching any agreement on several proposals for choosing members of disciplinary tribunals. It was generally agreed that the Caput, the existing chief disciplinary body was inadequate because its membership includes almost exclusively principals and presidents of colleges.

Three major proposals for selecting tribunal members were contained in a discussion paper prepared by committee chairman Paul Cadario. They were: random selection by computer; selection by nomination from student and staff organizations; and selection by nomination from faculty councils.

Everyone agreed, with the exception of professor Michael Grapko, that compulsion to sit on the tribunals should not be applied. This seemed to rule out the first possibility, or at least to imply that it would be very unwieldy, as many people would refuse to serve, they felt.

However, any selection process seemed to be open to the criticism that it would "politicize the process of selection", as Cadario put it.

Instead, he suggested that the faculty council involved collect names of staff and students and that names be randomly selected until people were found who would agree to serve.

However, this would mean that the tribunal would "likely to get a very biased selection", according to Klirnee Henschel. She felt that it would be impossible to make such a system fair.

Gus Abols, a former SAC president on the committee, said that the rights of the accused were not sufficiently protected by Cadario's proposal and suggested that a peremptory challenge system be instituted. A permanent member with sufficient expertise to be able to advise members of the tribunal how to analyse evidence should be appointed, he suggested.

When asked for his opinion, professor Stanley Schiff, attending as an observer, suggested that the committee first define principles of discipline and then agree on standards of discipline applicable throughout the university.

Then and only then could the committee decide on the proper mechanism for choosing members of disciplinary tribunals, he said.

At present the problem was that the tribunals could, for example, be faced with a sit-in and yet be composed partly of students.

"The problem has been in the past that when sit-ins and occupations have occurred, vast bodies of students and professors did not think they were wrong."

Sydney Hermant suggested the guiding principles established in 1955 for the Caput were adequate, but the committee decided that these principles should be updated before any further discussion took place.

In addition the committee decided on the composition of the Housing Committee. Everyone except Henschel agreed that no representative from local ratepayers should be appointed.

The committee is to be composed of four students, two faculty members, an administrator, two university residence representatives, two residence students and a presidential appointee.

Researcher runs for civic office

By DOUG HAMILTON

Scarborough College researcher and lecturer Gary Heighington is running for alderman in Scarborough's Ward 2 on an anti-development platform.

Ward 2 is a predominantly working class area in south-west Scarborough. Although the ward is zoned for low density family housing, the Meridian and Heathcliffe development corporations have bought up much of the property in the community and have erected several high-rise apartment buildings.

Meridian has been singled out in the City of Toronto by reform aldermen for decimating the South of St. James Town district.

Heighington claims that the developers are "blockbusting" several streets near the Victoria Park subway station and are beginning to penetrate other areas of the borough. He told The-Varsity that incumbent alderman Carol Ruddell, running on an NDP ticket, has "written the area off as irreparable".

Ruddell is heretofore of "new ideas" and is a member "of the old group at the municipal offices", claims Heighington.

Heighington has lived in the ward for 23 years and says he "knows the area well". He presently lives in an OHC high-rise apartment building close to the streets where Heathcliffe is demolishing houses to build several new apartment towers.

He contended that "developers have had all their own way too long" in the ward. Heighington said he is fighting for "a logical alternative" to high-rise development and believes "five or six storey low-rise and town house projects represent better accommodation for the people in the community."

Eschewing radicalism, Heighington emphasized that it is necessary to "be reasonable to stop these guys (the developers) from what they're doing".

"People should have a chance to live the way they want to live" and not be forced to vacate their homes and move into apartments, he declared.

Rather than wreck many of the homes which have deteriorated in the ward, Heighington is telling voters that the borough council should encourage renovating them.

He asserted that he is receiving campaign contributions from no one and "hasn't asked for any".

Blues come back in third to defeat York 8-5

University of Toronto Blues rallied last night to score six third period goals in a come from behind victory to defeat York Yeomen 8-5.

Last night's game was a battle of offensive lines. York's defence wasn't able to do much better than Blues' when pressed, but the York forwards held the balance of play up to the final 20 minutes.

Top scorers for Toronto were Bill Buba with two, and Blues' captain Gord Davies with his first two of the season. Other markers came from Don Pagnutti, Ivan McFarlane, Kent Ruhnke and Bob Munro. Yeomen goals came from Gerri Greenham, Al Avery, Dave Right, Doug Dunsmuir, and Barry Jenkins.

Toronto was down 3-2 going into the third period but came back 13 seconds into the third on Pagnutti's goal. Less than two minutes later McFarlane scored Blues' go ahead goal. Although York's Dunsmuir again brought York into a tie with Blues less than one minute later, Davies scored at 5:06 of the period to put Blues ahead to stay.

Blues came out quickly in the third period playing their final 20 minutes in a manner similar to York's first 40. Up to then Toronto had used too much body action and too little leg work, but they revised their "system" and scored five consecutive goals.

Blues' goalie Gary Inness made several good saves in a game which saw Toronto outshot by York 34-33 but looked puzzled on York's fourth goal. Dunsmuir's blast from the point was stopped by Inness but the puck bounced between his legs and trickled over the goal-line before he caught on.

Yeomen's goalie Greg Harrison was caught on a much similar situation on Blues' first goal (the game's first). Buba's opening goal came after Inness had stopped York's Jenkins on a breakaway; Buba picked up the rebound from his own end, skated most of the way down the ice and drove a shot from the blue line; Harrison caught the puck in his glove only to see it roll out and into the net.

Blues' defence played sloppily in the first period. York's Holmes took a high-sticking call while serving duty penalty-killing, and, with York having a two man advantage Avery scored in a goal mouth scramble after Blues had failed to clear the puck. York outshot Blues 20-11 in the opening 20 minutes.

Blues played strongly in the first half of the second period, but collapsed towards the end. York successfully bottled Toronto in its own end, with Blues' defence giving the puck away in its own end as the team concentrated on hitting instead of skating.

Blues Notes: Coach Watt has said the team trainers will allow reporters into the dressing-room after Blues' games... next Varsity game is Friday evening against Laurentian Voyageurs at Varsity Stadium.

Women's centre set up

MONTREAL (CUPI) — A women's information referral centre has been established in Montreal to coordinate the city's many small, isolated women's organizations.

More than fifty women representing the various groups met in a community centre last weekend to discuss how to relay information among themselves and in the community at large.

Among the plans discussed was the possibility of printing a women's directory with the addresses and telephone numbers of groups and of people providing services and emergency aid to women. Other groups are trying to establish a library, emergency babysitting services, abortion and birth control counselling and pressure groups, and a drop-in centre.

But because most of the groups are dependent on federal grants from the Local Initiatives Program which have not yet been approved, they did not discuss concrete measures.

Campaign successful, say socialists

By ELAINE FARRAGHER
Although it acknowledges that victory is not imminent in Monday's municipal election, the League for Socialist Action is planning a "Victory celebration" this Saturday. "Our campaign has been a success", said mayoralty candidate Jacquie Henderson, "in that we have been able to speak to many people about our socialist program".

But the LSA does not consider their campaign to be purely educational in purpose. "We are running a serious campaign", said Henderson. "A labour City Hall in Toronto would be a powerful force in fighting for a Socialist Canada". She pointed out that the facilities of City Hall could be put at the disposal of the struggles of students, women and workers.

The socialist slate, if elected, she added, could also use their position in City Hall to speak out against the Vietnam War and Canada's complicity in it and to help liberate women by pressing for repeal of abortion laws.

Henderson said that her party is working to represent the 98 per cent of the people of Toronto who she claims are presently not heard at City Hall. These people are still voting for the "big business candidates" because they have been "tricked" and lied to by the party machines that are run by big business, claimed Henderson.

"If we won the election", said Henderson, "we would have a mandate to kick out the corporations".

She said however, that it is possible for workers to break out of the framework of bourgeois politics by establishing their own party and putting it in power. Such a party, she noted, exists already in the form of the New Democratic Party. But since the NDP is not running in the election, the LSA decided that it should "pose the working class alternative" by running itself.

The LSA, said Henderson, must "break through" the illusions that have been built up, that misled the working class.

They are attempting to do this by posing demands "that hit at the real problems that people face". Through struggle, for reforms, working people and women gain consciousness of the people, the LSA forms demands that try to involve them in mass action.

"The form of the struggle determines whether it is reformist or not," she said. "A reformist demand accepts the framework of society". The LSA believes that ultimately, there must be a great upheaval and mass struggle to change society since capitalism is so deeply entrenched.

The LSA slate is running on a platform of free and democratic schools run by students and teachers, women's liberation, and greater availability of public services such as housing, transit and medicare.

"We want the Board (of Education) to turn the schools into instruments for social change" stresses their campaign literature.

Three members of the Young Socialists are running on the LSA slate for Board of Education.

The LSA advocates the expropriation of all private developers and the building of "top quality public housing" under tenant control with rents of no more than 20 percent of occupant's net income.

The league's campaign literature stresses the hold that big business has on Toronto. "The present big business council continues to dish out millions of dollars and thousands of acres of land to big private 'developers' without regard to the social needs of the majority of citizens." It notes that only three per cent of Metro housing is publicly owned.

Henderson, who has 11 year's experience in the labor and socialist movements, is a leading member of the LSA. She has been active in the Canadian Women's Coalition to Repeal the Abortion Laws and the anti-war movement.

greater insight into their oppression. "The struggle is more important than the gain itself" stressed Henderson.

Henderson claims that the LSA is mobilizing the people in the same way that Toronto's first mayor, William Lyon MacKenzie did when he led the revolt against the Family Compact.

Henderson denied that their demands are reformist. "Reformist demands shy away from mass ac-

Law defeats Trin 4-1 in Division I hockey

By BOB BETTSON

Led by John Wright (not the John Wright) with two goals, Law last night defeated a short-staffed Trinity A team 4-1. However, the game was only won in the last 10 minutes when Law scored two unanswered, break-away goals.

Play was close up until that point with Trinity, which only dressed nine players, effectively checking the Division I Law team. Law was hampered by atrocious shooting with many shots missing the net altogether.

In the first ten minutes Law had the edge, building up a 2-1 lead with goals by Ross Morrison and Wright. Both goals were set up by former Blues' Bob Bauer. Ian Brown scored for Trinity when he drilled the puck past Law goalie Mike Penman off a faceoff.

Trinity was shorthanded twice during the first 20 minutes but penalty killers Brian Sykes and Paul Fenje held them off the score sheet. Trinity goalie Mike Whitehead was outstanding stopping the Bauer line several times with key saves.

Laws' poor shooting prevented them from taking a larger lead by the end of the first period. Both teams were plagued by an inability to end plays.

Despite taking two penalties in the first 10 minutes of the second half Law remained in control and finally broke through for two goals to clinch the win.

Whitehead made several outstanding saves on three goal mouth drives by Bauer but finally was beaten by John Little on a point blank shot.

Wright followed that with another breakaway goal and the Trinity goalie had no chance. He caught the upper corner with a hot blast.

Trinity's last hope for a rally died when Brown got a penalty for tripping at 38:02 of the 40 minute game.

Stand-outs for Trinity included forwards John White, Ian Brown and Andy Wilkes and defencemen Sykes and Bob Burgess.

As well as Bauer and Wright, Rob Hutchinson, Ross Morrison and John Little played solid games for Law.

Both teams suffered from poor passing and shooting but put up a good show.

Trinity coach (an intercollegiate Blues' member) Kent Ruhnke said that he was pleased with the show his "scrappers" put on, and added that the score was not indicative of the play.

Knox finishes on top in first swim meet of season

Knox won the first interfaculty swimming meet of the season last Thursday scraping by Engineering 68 to 66. In third place was Law with 48, while Dents finished fourth (9 points), PHE fifth (7), and UC sixth (3).

The swimming meet had five new events in the eight event meet and consequently five new records. Records were set in the 100 breast-stroke, the 100 free style, 100 back stroke, 100 fly, and 200 free relay.

Several participants held a distinct advantage in the meet — Chris McNaught, (Law), Bob Healey, (Law), and Gesing (Eng) are members of the intercollegiate waterpolo team, while Jim Adams (UC), John Twohig (Knox), and Bob Peeling (Dent) are on the intercollegiate swimming team.

The top standings in each event are as follows:

400 free relay: 1. Knox A, 3:56.7; 2. Engineering, 4:56.00; 3. Law, 5:22.2.

100 breaststroke 1. Wayne Phillips, PHE, 1:07.9; 2. Bannerman Eng. 1:11.1; 3. Chris McNaught, Law, 1:16.1.

200 medley relay: 1. Engineering,

1:58.5; 2. Law, 2:02.6; 3. Knox, disqualified.

100 freestyle: 1. Jim Adams, UC, 50.4; 2. Jim Twohig, Knox, 55.0; 3. Bob Peeling, Dent, 57.0.

300 individual medley relay: 1. Knox, 3:26.3; 2. Law, 3:54.8.

100 backstroke: 1. John Twohig, Knox, 1:10.2; 2. Gesing, Eng. 1:34.4; 3. Brownridge, Eng. 1:14.6.

100 fly: 1. Bob Healey, Law, 56.1; 2. Bob Peeling, Dent, 58.5; 3. Zvi Eldar, Eng. 1:00.4.

200 free relay: 1. Knox, 143.6; 2. Engineering, 155.1; 3. Law, 2:13.5.

Interdisciplinary on way out

Administrative inaction has apparently effectively killed the university's innovative Interdisciplinary Studies program.

In a memorandum circulated to his Interdisciplinary colleagues, retiring chairman Geoffrey Payzant charges that failure to appoint a successor by the time the department would have to parry with others in competing for available teaching funds, in three weeks, rules out the possibility that the department can exist next year.

Besides delaying selection of a new chairman, the Faculty of Arts and Science's curriculum committee and two senior administrative officers have disputed for the first time Interdisciplinary's departmental status. "Certainly it has been the understanding of all of us that we were a department since July 1, 1971, in all respects except that we do not make permanent appointments," Payzant writes.

"We have, therefore, been working under a set of assumptions which have been snatched from under us, and there is small hope of our getting this straightened out in time for us to redesign our 1973-74 programme accordingly," he continues.

Rather than abjectly licking their wounds, Payzant asked his teaching colleagues to begin searching for new homes for their courses within the university's various colleges.

"We've some control of what happens to our stuff if we act now; none if we leave it (even) a matter of days," he told The Varsity yesterday.

Interdisciplinary Studies, the ambitious but unconventional stepchild of the Faculty of Arts and Science, has long suffered from inattention and hostility from the faculty's more traditional departments.

Students, however, have been more enthusiastic about its offerings. Just less than 1000 students are presently enrolled in department courses.

Alarmed by the prospect of only getting enough money to fund half its current offerings and now new courses next year, Interdisciplinary faculty last spring sent top university administrators a brief outlining the department's "struggle for survival". The brief was virtually ignored, producing "not a ripple of

A broader role for colleges?

The decision to effectively shift responsibility for interdisciplinary courses to the arts and science colleges apparently emerged from discussions between college principals and university president John Evans.

Interdisciplinary Studies chairman Geoffrey Payzant confirmed yesterday that he had heard rumours about the meetings, but had not been invited to attend. When he wrote the then arts and science dean Albert Allen wondering whether the principals and Evans might want him to attend their gatherings, Allen instead suggested that Payzant and his colleagues continue working on their brief examining the department's problems. Payzant said he did not disagree with Allen's suggestion.

Victoria College principal Jack Robson said yesterday, "We've talked... in the past about this (switching interdisciplinary courses to colleges). In the whole, I think we agree with the proposal."

However, when the question of whether this year's tight budget could provide additional funds to allow colleges to hire Interdisciplinary's teaching staff, he observed, "There's not a hope of getting additional funds."

Arts and science dean Bob Greene, however, said last night that he would like to see any money saved by eliminating the department go to colleges willing to sponsor similar courses. Some of the courses, he noted, are inter-literary and are already taught by college staff. "We're attempting to work out some way" to handle the non-literary courses, he said.

Innis College principal Peter Russell interpreted Evans' message to the colleges as a call to develop distinctive programs. The president's goal, according to Russell, was a pluralist college system in which students would pick colleges because the courses they offer correspond to the students' particular interests.

Like Greene, Vice-president and provost Don Forster recognized that the language courses' future are not "in great jeopardy". "What we're worried about are those (courses) not connected with departments," he said. "They're the things that might be squeezed out of existence."

Innis College's lean strongly to the innovative. Russell described their courses as non-disciplinary. Monday, the college's academic affairs committee voted to invite the resource people teaching three Interdisciplinary courses — Alternatives in Education, Community Involvement, and Women's Studies — to bring their courses to Innis.

comment", according to Payzant.

"It meant something that we were ignored," Payzant commented yesterday.

"We had thought it was just busy administrators." Now, he could see that there was more than apathy involved.

Some reactionary opinion within the more traditional departments, Payzant reasoned, may have weakened the administrators' ability to help Interdisciplinary Studies in its fight for life. These more traditional departments view Interdisciplinary's experimental courses as something to be tolerated as extra courses to complement students' educations, he suggested.

Some students, however, have not followed this path, making Interdisciplinary courses central to their program of study. "And, that really did terrify some of the traditional academics," Payzant noted.

Still more bad news for Interdisciplinary came with the provincial government's decision to freeze capital construction grants for post-secondary institutions, Payzant speculates. "I don't doubt... that in the events of the last few days, Interdisciplinary looks like a luxury."

President John Evans had replied "thoughtfully and extensively" to Interdisciplinary's June 14 draft, promising he would consult with his senior advisors about the department's plight, Payzant recounts.

The Students' Administrative Council, he pointed out, made no move until they got wind of the department's imminent closing yesterday morning. It has not taken any action yet. Others have still to respond to the brief.

Only Arts and science dean Bob Greene "has taken a great deal of trouble" to listen to Interdisciplinary's problems and has promptly acted on "all requests but one", that of finding Payzant's successor, according to the retiring chairman.

Greene told The Varsity Wednesday, "The role of Interdisciplinary Studies must be put in the context of the colleges' contribution to education."

Greene, responsible for presenting the various requests of departments within his faculty to the university's budget committee, said he had "no information yet" concerning the possible budgetary cuts.

The Faculty of Arts and Science's curriculum committee has been debating Interdisciplinary's status with Payzant and has flatly stated that it is not a department. The committee does, however, acknowledge that Payzant has the role of a department head.

Greene said, "There would be too many difficulties" in making Interdisciplinary Studies into a department. Instead, he favoured having colleges sponsor Interdisciplinary courses.

Innis College's academic affairs committee Monday passed a motion to sponsor the "more subversive" courses, Workshop in Community Involvement, Alternatives in Education, and the women's course.

"It doesn't matter who gives them, as long as the kind of study is maintained", Payzant said yesterday. "The department as an institution is not important."

Payzant's memorandum also suggested that University College might take over the Quebec courses and Victoria College could combine its Communications courses with INX 210.

"New course proposals are probably doomed", he concluded.

Course teachers and interested staff and students are meeting at two pm this afternoon at 97 St. George to "save what they can, of their operation", Payzant said.

Interdisciplinary Studies evolved when the Faculty of Arts and Science's New Program was instituted in 1969 so that it could offer more than the "same old thing". The department had three different chairmen in its first years. It had been favoured by then arts and science dean Albert Allen who channelled funds into the program.

Elections arbitrarily voided

By ULLI DIEMER

Charging "fundamental violations of constitutional and democratic procedures", sociology chairman Irving Zeitlin has declared the selection of all undergraduate representatives to the department's governing assembly "null and void" and called off an assembly meeting scheduled for Monday.

However, graduate and undergraduate spokesmen, including the four student members of the eight member executive committee, which is the department's supreme decision-making body between assembly meetings, have strongly objected to Zeitlin's action.

They have decided to go ahead with the meeting as scheduled, in defiance of Zeitlin's cancellation of it, calling on all faculty and student members to attend the Monday meeting on Monday at 7 pm as originally planned.

And, the chairman of the department's elections committee, professor Ralph Beals, rejects Zeitlin's accusations, and has subsequently resigned from the committee in protest. He told The Varsity last night that he considered the original elections valid. He had "formally stated", he said, that he "disagreed with" Zeitlin's decision to disallow the undergraduate representatives.

In a letter to assembly members, the department chairman states that "election irregularities", "forced" him to set aside the selection of undergraduate representatives and to cancel the assembly meeting. As a result, if the decision holds, the assembly, which last met in February, will not meet until sometime in 1973.

Zeitlin refers to a number of "flagrant contraventions" of proper procedure in his letter.

He claims that "two students made basic decisions in the elections committee regarding the distribution of seats; these students were not elected to this committee by the assembly nor appointed by the executive committee; the same two students acted as electoral officers in the election for the assembly; the same two students were successful candidates in the election which they conducted."

The students referred to (but not by name), deny the substance of Zeitlin's allegations.

Both of them, Lorne Richmond and Bob Storey, are members of the 1971-72 departmental executive committee, which remains in office until a new one is selected from the 1972-73 assembly. (Ironically, as a result of Zeitlin's action, they now remain on the executive. Neither of them had sought seats on the new executive, saying they wanted to become "less involved" with the department.)

Richmond and Storey say that they were co-opted onto instead of elected to the elections committee simply to do "shitwork" and with the full consent of the other members of the committee. This became necessary, they said, when a turn-over of students left the committee without any undergraduate members in the fall.

As members of the executive, they were available, and were asked to help out by administering the elections among undergraduates. They point out that neither could have acted as "electoral officers" in their own elections since they were both acclaimed.

Other students, both graduates and undergraduates, whose elections have now been called into question by Zeitlin's actions, were equally emphatic in dismissing the charges.

A spokesman for the Graduate Sociology Association (GSA), who asked that his name not be published for fear of reprisal, said that there

Aborigine says Australia a land of genocide

By FERNANDO TRAFICANTE

"Australia pursues a policy of cultural and racial genocide, a policy of assimilation," said Paul Coe, a leader of the Australian Aborigine Black Power Movement yesterday.

He also charged, "The Australian government has been trying to divide aborigine peoples by claiming that the northern people are the only true aborigines."

Coe was speaking at a news conference on the eve of a symposium of the American Anthropological Association meeting this week at the Royal York Hotel.

The symposium, on "Political Struggles of Native Peoples," is designed to politicize anthropologists into supporting the struggles of the peoples they study. In addition to Coe, it includes representatives from such native groups as the Mozambique Liberation Front and North American Indian associations.

There have been attempts to wipe out our native Australian peoples as recently as 1939 when "40 police punished a tribe who had been stealing cattle to survive," Coe declared.

The Australian government is more repressive than that of South Africa, he claimed.

The aborigine people have the highest infant mortality rate of all white dominated countries with native peoples, he said. Also, aborigines account for 20 per cent of Australia's prisoners while they comprise only one per cent of the population.

Rarihokwats, editor of the largest Indian newspaper in North America, Akwesasne Notes, was refused permission to enter Canada to participate at the symposium.

Rarihokwats is currently out on $2500 bail while awaiting the results of a U.S. Immigration Department hearing held on October 31.

John Mohawk, who spoke at the press conference in Rarihokwats' place, said that, in effect, "Rarihokwats was arrested and charged with being editor of a newspaper."

He was charged with "entering the U.S. for purposes of employment without obtaining an employment certificate," although like all staff of the paper, he is not paid for his work, Mohawk said.

The paper was originally edited in Canada, but the offices were recently moved to the American side of the Akwesasne reserve in New York.

Aborigine representative Coe said that the goal of the Australian aborigines is to regain some of the land which was originally theirs. There has never been any treaty between whites and the natives in Australia, he said.

In a recent attempt to regain control of some land, aborigines set up an "Aborigine Embassy" on parliament grounds which they closed after repeated arrests and hospitalization of some of the leaders.

The present objective of his people, Coe said, "is to obtain government control of the Northern Territories and to make the area an independent aborigine state within Australia."

Coe's objective in coming to the symposium is to establish contacts with groups of other native peoples.

Election 'a battle between minorities'

Aldermanic candidate Colin Vaughan at Hart House.

By VALERIE ROSS

Monday's municipal election was described Wednesday night by Colin Vaughan as "a battle between two minorities one of which would wrest power to keep it to themselves, and the other minority, who would give power to the majority."

Vaughan, aldermanic candidate for Ward 5, was speaking at a Hart House debate on the motion: "Citizen groups should be seen and not heard." Admitting that only a small percentage of Torontonians are members of active community groups, Vaughan defended these groups' commitment to represent the interests of the community as a whole.

People participate in activist groups when they realize their interests are not being considered by their elected representatives, he said.

"I'm running in this election because five years ago I joined a ratepayers' group to consider a development threatening our community. My first experience with City Council was to learn that my alderman was representing the interests of the developer. . .

"City Council ignored our letters of protest and passed the development. . . we got angry; we fought; and we stopped it at the Ontario Municipal Board."

The developer was Phil Roth of Meridian, best known as the company which developed the St. James Town complex.

As a result of his first tangle with City Council and the development industry, Vaughan went on to help found the Confederation of Residents' and Ratepayers' Associations (CORRA), incorporating over 30 citizen groups across Metro.

Vaughan went on to join the Stop Spadina committee, and play a leading role in its eventual success in stopping the expressway.

"The present city government is not relying on an educated, intelligent, and committed population who wish to take an active role in city government, said Vaughan. Such groups should be encouraged, for the benefit of all."

Students oppose geography chairman, survey indicates

A poll taken by geography students shows strong opposition to the appointment of Professor Jacob Spelt as chairman of the department, and to the method of his appointment.

Among undergraduate students, 162 opposed the method of Spelt's appointment, made by a committee which included no students, 15 agreed with it, and 37 said they had no opinion.

Of the approximately 2,000 undergraduate students who take geography courses, 214 voted in the student union's poll. Toronto University Geography Society (TUGS) president Hans Mikolay said yesterday that six core courses were polled and students could vote in the TUGS office.

Graduate students were more emphatic, with 32 opposed to the method of Spelt's appointment, one in favour and two with no opinion. There were about 55 eligible to vote in this poll, said Mikolay.

The poll follows the resignations of the 10 student members of the Geography Department Council because of the appointment.

A letter of resignation signed by nine of the students said their resignations were based on "the lack of a student voice in this department and to some extent on our reservations concerning Dr. Spelt as the chairman of our council."

They also objected to Spelt, who they said was "opposed by almost every student we have spoken to, and has given every indication by his actions over the years that he is not only unwilling but unable to deal with the issue of student participation in any way remotely acceptable to the students."

The former council members also based their resignations on the lack of student voice in Spelt's selection and the fact that the council had little power, being only advisory to the chairman.

The poll also revealed considerable opposition to Spelt.

Undergraduates voted 105 to 26 in disapproval of the appointment of Spelt, while 83 said they had no opinion.

Graduates were more decisive, with 24 opposing Spelt, five in favour and six saying they had no opinion.

Students decisively backed the actions of their representatives on the council, and called for further protests of the appointment and its method. Undergraduates voted 166 to 8, and graduates 29 to 2, in favour of continued protest.

Mikolay says the students intend to raise the issue of Spelt's appointment, to take effect in June, at the Governing Council level.

The appointment announced several weeks ago, was approved by the Academic Affairs Committee Tuesday with no opposition. It still must be approved by the Governing Council's executive and the council itself before it is final.

Planning further action on Spelt is complicated by the fact that TUGS' executive will change in elections next week.

However, the graduate geography student association has voted in a general meeting to "make representations" to U of T president John Evans on the issue. And, faculty support is growing. TUGS executive member Dean Miller said yesterday.

The real issue is the powerlessness of the departmental council, rather than Spelt, he added.

'Reform' City Council not enough

Toronto City Council, once the hallowed preserve of cigar-smoking, suspender-snapping Babbitts, has undergone profound changes over the last three years.

Reform aldermen have upstaged the small businessmen, insurance salesmen, and developers' lackies who have traditionally been returned from wards across the city.

Since the 1969 election, council has been polarized into two hostile camps: the Old Guard who worship unrestricted urban growth in the form of mammoth developments and "continued progress"; and the environmentally conscious Opposition who advocate development planned in consultation with the citizens whom it affects.

The reformers are generally middle class activists elected by citizens who recognize the need for change at City Hall. These citizens, often members of ratepayers' groups, have become cognizant of the fact that their interests are not being served by old moss-backs left over from another generation.

Since the last election, power has slowly been slipping away from the Old Guard and is being consolidated by the reformers. After Monday's election, in which reformers are running in all 11 wards, the Opposition will end up with more seats on council. They will no doubt lack a majority, but they will be in a stronger position to snipe at the remaining fossils who managed to be re-elected.

Over the past months, while the civic campaign has been conducted, many progressive people have enthusiastically lauded the merits of the reformers, especially David Crombie who is waging an uphill battle for the mayoralty against two pro-development adversaries, Tony O'Donohue and David Rotenberg.

Crombie and the other reformers appear to be dedicated and sincere men who have accomplished much at City Council despite the inherently undemocratic framework of that body. The Varsity has consistently supported the reformers' strong stand against the decimation of neighbourhoods by avaricious developers. This paper supports the concept of community control and policies which are based on the collective needs of all citizens.

However, The Varsity cannot issue a blanket endorsement of Crombie or the entire reform group. Many progressives have overzealously thrown their support behind the Oppositionists without adequately scrutinizing their platforms and the credibility of their policies.

The Varsity believes there is one paramount issue on the upcoming election: development.

Electing a reform mayor and several reform aldermen will not halt the operations of developers. The reformers are not capable of stopping blockbusting by passing innocuous resolutions in council.

A council comprised predominantly of reformers may slightly alter the ground rules to the detriment of developers (for example, they may restrict the use of demolition permits). But, developers being astute men, they will find ways to circumvent burdensome regulations.

It is abundantly clear that if developers are to be stopped, the capitalist system must be replaced. One of the ways this can be done is by organizing at the municipal level.

Virtually all of the reformers have ignored one critical fact: developers build for profit. The type of development which is blighting Toronto is a result of the structure of corporate capitalism. The multi-million dollar development corporations are controlled by a small group of individuals who are responsible only to their cronies in banks, trust companies, and construction firms, and not to the citizens of this city.

Because they operate within the profit system, they are not interested in constructing inexpensive family housing. Rather, they want a quick return on their investment and high-rise towers containing thousands of middle-class tenants are the only type of structures which can ensure this.

Toronto needs more than a group of reformers with different ideologies and different tactics for social change. The coalition may not remain intact for much longer. For instance, how long will John Sewell be able to work with a liberal like Colin Vaughan?

Toronto has had reformers on council in the past. William Dennison and June Marks both gained notoriety for taking principled stands against injustice. Dennison was once reviled by a Toronto newspaper as a communist. Who would dare call him that today?

Marks earned a reputation for exposing slum landlords in the early 1960's. After several years on council, she sold out to the Old Guard and is now one of the staunchest supporters of development.

Despite the pious platitudes of the reformers who are running in Monday's election, the public has not been given a guarantee that they can be bought.

Instead of an amorphous reform coalition, Toronto needs a mass-based civic socialist party with a long term strategy for constructive social change.

This does not imply endorsement of the League for Socialist Action which is fielding a mayoralty candidate and a number of bourgeois students for aldermen who have no roots in the wards where they are running.

A party similar to the Front d'action politique (FRAP) in Montréal, would better serve the interests of Toronto's working class.

Although FRAP runs candidates for electoral contests, its main function is organizing proletarian communities.

Its policies are shaped by working class citizens who form Comités d'action politiques (CAPs) or political action committees.

Such a party could take root in several Toronto wards where the working class is politically conscious.

A socialist civic party in Toronto would be primarily concerned with extra-parliamentary action programs such as organizing tenants, creating neighbourhood clinics, and disseminating information in the form of radical newspapers to counter the drivel which appears in the Toronto press.

It has to create local governments — in essence, a decentralization of the power structure at City Hall. Community control must be more than a cheap cliché. If community control is to become a genuine alternative to the present system, power must lie with the working class and not in the hands of the bourgeois leaders of Toronto's present citizen groups.

A party incorporating trade unionists, immigrants, welfare recipients, marginal, and unemployed workers is the only political vehicle capable of amplifying the voice of those who so desperately need to be heard.

Anarchist revival is here, says U.S. prof

By KRIS SOSNOWSKI

"Anarchism is very much with us, it is very much alive," says Paul Avrich, history professor at Queen's College of the City University of New York.

Avrich, who is now working on a history of anarchism in the United States, lectured on anarchists in the Russian revolution Wednesday afternoon at Sid Smith.

"The Russian anarchists were crushed, stamped out, and brutally murdered, but their ideals are stronger now than they ever were," he said. "Anarchy is very much with us and is very much alive." He attacked the Bolsheviks for crushing the anarchists.

Reading their literature of 1917, "one is struck by how perceptive and prophetic the anarchists were. Their critique of Bolshevism and totalitarianism is the best I've ever read."

Avrich said that the political anarchy which developed in the years 1917-1919 was basically a reaction against the French and industrial revolutions. He called it a protest against political centralization, which was a consequence of the two revolutions.

The main role of the anarchists in 1917 was to drive out and abolish the government. This was the destructive side of the revolution, but there was also a constructive side, to build.

Avrich referred to Prudon's quote: the urge to destroy is a creative one. After eliminating the old, it is necessary to create a new.

The Russian revolution was not only a political revolution, but it was especially a socialist revolution, Avrich said. "It was a social, economic, cultural, and military reaction against the centralized system."

According to Avrich, this social aspect of the revolution reached into every aspect of society. The aim of the anarchists, economically, was to rid the system of the land owners and bureaucrats. The anarchists wanted to change the military system which was composed of a "chain of ranks". Avrich said they wanted to eliminate the epaulettes, a symbol of hierarchy in the military.

Avrich made three fundamental points about the anarchists' theory: "They were pro-decentralization, anti-authoritarian, and anti-hierarchy."

He added that the anarchists were not satisfied with a political revolution which would just replace the old government with a new one, but they wanted to "change the nature of society".

Avrich described the attempts of the anarchists to implement their ideas in the creation of a new society a "positive social experiment".

The anarchists wanted to create a new form of education because they felt the old traditional methods were authoritarian. They would have put the students on an equal plane with the teacher. They were interested in "integral" education, which Avrich compared to modern polytechnical educational institutions.

New York professor Paul Avrich spoke at U of T yesterday.

The Varsity — Kris Sosnowski

Avrich broke up the Russian anarchists into four major groups, the first being the "anarchist-communists" who wanted a decentralized form of communism, as opposed to central or state communism. Many of this group formed communes, which, he said, "are very similar to our present-day communes".

Avrich said that they expropriated a house, and opened up a garden and a school. Avrich referred to them as being the "heirs" of the revolutionary philosopher Kropotkin.

The second group of anarchists was the labour movement which wanted to break up the large strongholds of economic power. Accordingly, "the factory committee was the instrument of workers' control".

The "individualists" were the third group. Avrich called them the most intriguing, and said that very little is known about them.

"They rejected all organizations which were permanent. They were suspicious of all organization." The individualists were influenced by the thought of the philosophers Nietzsche, Stern, and Tucker, he added.

The "Tolstoyans" was the last major group of anarchists, the Christians of the movement. Being extreme pacifists, many of them were killed or committed suicide when captured.

Another group discussed by Avrich was called the anarcho-futurists. Its members made a small attempt to introduce a new culture. In the process, a manifesto and even a new language for the "new society" were written. The anarcho-futurists believed that existing culture was based on aristocracy and centralized class, and therefore, "all the old culture had to go".

Few attend ward trustee meeting

Only 18 people turned out for a Ward 6 Board of Education all-candidates meeting Tuesday evening at Victoria College. Four of these were candidates, two were the meeting's co-ordinators and one was a reporter.

Most of the others were only there because they had been assigned to attend, as part of a course. "None of us can vote in this ward," one confessed.

Nevertheless, one candidate noted, this was the third best turnout of all the meetings to date.

Cliff Mack, a first-year U of T student, attributed the lack of student turnout to students' "isolation from decision-making".

A member of the Young Socialists, Mack said he is running "to raise the class issue" in schools. One example of this is educational spending cutbacks, he implied insisting that they have only begun, and must be fought.

The community should be represented by courses on labour history and women's studies, Mack said, because a large percentage of the community is either working class or women.

Dan Martyniuk described himself as a man who had "participated in many community ventures" as student, teacher, and parent. He has five children, at four different schools.

Martyniuk countered Mack's cynicism, saying that "life isn't that bad".

"But some things need improvement," he added. He suggested that the school year should be cut in half, to provide facilities for twice as many students. "You're learning a lot you don't necessarily need or want," he told students in the audience.

Asked if he approved of giving financial control of schools to the community, Martyniuk said that the various ethnic groups in a mixed area would have trouble dividing up the money, or working together.

The most vocal community supporters at the meeting were the team of former SAC educational commissioner Dan Leckie and last year's SAC president Bob Spencer. They are running together because, as Spencer said, "You can get lost on the board if you're by yourself."

Leckie is in favour of local financial control. He wants black, Chinese and Portuguese study programs within the school; if community residents want such courses,

He sees a trustee as a full-time resource person and organizer who works with parents, teachers and students. He plans to "expose" fellow trustees to well-researched "perspectives" as an alternative to administrators' reports, which would influence them to allocate their annual $120,000,000 budget more responsibly than they have done in the past.

Spencer said that he and Leckie have Chinese canvassers who "let us know the Chinese community's feelings" about schools.

Chinese children who have been raised in the traditional patriarchal society experience "culture shock" when they go to school, Spencer felt. But parents encourage school success, because they see it as the means to get "upward mobility". Children who do well at school, in the process become alienated from parents and community.

Spencer suggested classes in Cantonese and the use of parent aides in school as solutions to this problem.

SAC grants to two papers

Two college newspapers, the Innis Herald and Vic's Strand, got SAC money Wednesday night to subsidize initial campus-wide distribution of their papers.

The communications commission gave the Herald $100 and the Strand $400, subject to subsequent approval by the full council.

A Toike Oike request for funds was tabled, pending commission examination of Toike policies and financial resources. The Toike already has cross-campus distribution.

An Innis College literary publication, the Writ, received $250 from the commission's contingency allocation to subsidize its publication. Most Writ revenue comes from public sources and sale of the journal.

Responding to a suggestion by Scarborough College Student Council president David Onley, the commission established a committee to investigate the feasibility, if any, of establishing a second campus-wide newspaper.

Brown is running for "benefit of mankind"

According to the wife of Ward 6 Alderman Horace Brown, "There is a force beyond which tells him there is still some work for him to perform for the benefit of mankind."

Brown himself is convinced that he has a mission to serve on City Council. His campaign literature says that "to me, it is the greatest thing in life to be of service to others."

Although generally considered to be a member of the 'Old Guard' at City Hall, Brown's record on council indicates that, unlike some of his fellow aldermen, he does not conceive of "service to others" as being simply service to developers. On key issues, his voting record is among the best of those who are not in the 'reform' camp, although it varies, sometimes unpredictably, from issue to issue.

He voted for the acceptance of the Eaton Centre plan (although he had supported earlier amendments that failed), for the Quebec-Gothic development, and against a proposal to study the "architectural, social, and economic feasibility" of further high-rise development in the downtown areas. All these issues can be considered as litmus tests of attitudes toward developers — and Brown voted with the side that favours indiscriminate development.

On the other hand, Brown voted in favour of putting the proposed police tower on top of the Imperial Oil building instead of in Winston Churchill park. He also voted against building the Spadina expressway. On both these issues, as well as on a number of others, he took a stand at odds with that of other Old Guard aldermen.

His record on citizen participation and community groups is similarly spotty, and is reflected in the attitude of groups in the community to him. Although he is a member of the NDP and the Metropolitan Toronto Labor Council, the council refused to endorse Brown at a vote earlier this year, largely because he was considered to be too pro-developer. Recently, however, it reversed its decision and he now has the endorsement, although it came on a 53-45 vote.

His administrative qualifications are fairly impressive. He has been the chairman, at one time or another during his 12 years on City Council, of all four standing committees, and of the Toronto Board of Health. In addition, he is on hospital boards, the Board of Governors of George Brown College, and on the City of Toronto — U of T Liaison Committee, as well as a long list of other posts.

His other commitments, as well as his job as a writer for Ontario Hydro, may have contributed to his poor attendance record, one of the worst on council, although repeated illnesses and a serious accident earlier this year were also important factors. A few of those who oppose his re-election recognize that he cannot be faulted for being ill, but also point out that repeated bouts of ill health, plus his tendency to often leave council meetings well before they end for health reasons impair his ability to represent his constituents.

Brown has supported consultation of citizen groups on a number of issues, and opposed them on others. He calls citizen involvement "a natural thing in city politics, and I've tried to help it along. But the same citizens seem to get involved in everything."

He points out that it is often a small clique of activists that dominate residents' groups, making the groups unrepresentative of their communities.

Brown has strengthened his reputation as an Old Guard candidate by some publicity-getting actions in his term on council. One of them was hitting Ward 7 alderman John Sewell during a council meeting indicating, if nothing else, that he is not likely to fit in well with a council including a higher number of 'reform' aldermen. He also made the news by using reports that young unmarried women and men, and American draft-dodgers lived in Gothic Avenue houses to argue in favour of the Quebec-Gothic development that would replace the houses.

It is certain that he faces a hard fight in the December 4 election. In 1969, he squeaked into office by less than 100 votes over third- and fourth-place candidates, some 2,000 votes behind June Marks. This time, he faces two incumbent aldermen, Marks and William Archer, who has switched from Ward 5, as well as Dan Heap, a strong challenge.

Downes wants to be middle of road

By PAT REDICAN

C. Arthur Downes insists that he is a credible candidate for alderman in Ward 6 and should not be considered "peripheral". Although he has only $3,000 and 50 workers, he feels he can win.

"The people who will vote for me are the people who are totally dissatisfied with the incumbents."

The incumbents, Horace Brown and June Marks, plus William Archer, who has moved over from Ward 5, are not considered to be in a weak position. As well, there is Dan Heap, a well-known, NDP-backed challenger.

Downes, an assistant manager of

for Ward 6."

Although he is vice-president of the St. Andrew - St. Patrick Progressive Conservative Association, Downes claims he has no party connections in this election. His money, he says, comes entirely from private donations.

"I do not think that party politics have any place in City Hall. We should be representing a community, not a party."

Downes' community connections, are, however, limited; although he was raised in the ward and now works and has many commitments there, he has no official connections with community groups. Nor does he really see himself as a community candidate.

"Right now there are two forces at city hall — the developers and the community groups. I think they have to be reconciled."

All the same, Downes' written platform is more community than developer oriented. He stands for "preserving and improving neighbourhoods, increasing parkland, increasing day care centres and making more use of public facilities — buildings, school libraries, gyms".

Development, Downes thinks, "must be controlled". But, he says, Toronto must have development to grow.

Downes opposes the Spadina Expressway and is in support of the new Davis proposals for public transit. But, he says, "For transit to become really feasible, we will have to make public transportation more attractive to people. People need room on transit vehicles".

Downes believes that the system of electing controllers across the city should be reinstated, instead of choosing executives from elected aldermen.

"City Hall has been mayhem for the past three years. I came out against the abolition of this office in 1968 and I still believe it."

Downes, who has emphasized the fact that he is a Negro in this campaign, thinks he will do well among the substantial black population in the west end of the ward, where he grew up. He also expects to do well in the Italian and Chinese communities west of University Avenue and south of College Street, and in the student quarter near the university.

Downes' small campaign force has forced to concentrate in these areas. But he thinks that this will be enough to carry him to victory.

C. Arthur Downes: better luck?

a clothing store, an Anglican church warden, and a member of a hospital board, is going for his second shot at a Ward 6 seat. In 1969 he finished eighth out of 10, with less than 800 votes.

"This time I have more money, more people, and I'm taking the campaign more seriously. I believe I can win."

Downes' major complaint is against the press, which has treated him as a secondary candidate; he feels he provides an alternative to the present aldermen.

Downes is running on a platform that closely resembles mayoralty candidate David Crombie's, but he refuses to characterize himself as a reformer.

Unite for control of Toronto, says Clarke

By GREG McMASTER

Nelson Clarke is running for mayor of Toronto to attack the power of developers and to convince Torontonians there is a basis for "united action between ratepayers' groups, the organized labour movement, and the student body at U of T."

Students, he says, are "concerned with city life more than ever before". In the past week, the issue Clarke has been "most concerned about" has been the "brutal attack on educational and health services" coming from the provincial government. He also fears a review of the provincial medicare scheme. Accordingly, Toronto citizens need a mayor who will defend their interests against the Davis Government, which, Clarke claims, is "acting on behalf of Ontario corporations".

This fight he sees as analogous to the local struggle by citizens against developers. Toronto's problems cannot be solved, he feels, "until we get back out of developers' hands 92 per cent of the city land which is available for housing". He proposes establishing land banks to acquire land "with no financial gain" to speculators. He adds that expropriation would be included in this process, but does not rule out compensation to speculators.

Clarke feels that a handful of big corporations, such as Eaton's, CPR, Meridian, Greenwin and Windlass, control city politics. These companies have all proposed massive developments in the last three years and their interests, he says, conflict with those of the rest of the city populace, which consists of working people.

Working people include both manual and mental workers such as university graduates, he said.

Lighting a cigarette with a David Rotenberg matchbook, Clarke attacked Western Guard candidate Don Andrews, saying, "There's quite a dangerous promotion of racism from him and others running with him."

Clarke is a former Saskatoon alderman and a founder of that city's Labour Council. He is a member of the Communist Party of Canada, but is not stressing this in his campaign. In contrast to federal and provincial elections, he doesn't "think it's helpful" to bring wide-ranging party politics into municipal campaigns.

People are more prepared to come together on local issues, he feels, and "people uniting and winning battles on community issues learn in the course of that fight the success of united action, that they can win bigger issues on the federal level".

Although Lenin denied that struggles for reforms can by themselves create revolutionary consciousness, Clarke, in denying the usefulness of running as a communist candidate, claimed, "We learn from our own experience not just to curb profiteering corporations, but to abolish the capitalist system and establish a working-class state."

Although Lenin denied that struggles for reforms can by themselves create revolutionary consciousness, Clarke, in denying the usefulness of running as a communist candidate, claimed, "We learn from our own experience not just to curb profiteering corporations, but to abolish the capitalist system and establish a working-class state."

Clarke suggests that the Trotskyist League for Socialist Action is "playing into the hands of right-wing social democrats" by openly running as socialists. He accuses their candidate, Jacques Henderson, of "creating an illusion of what socialism is and how you get to it" by suggesting that a socialist municipal government can really be established before the working class has state power in Canada. (Henderson's campaign posters call for "a labour city hall", but do not suggest the possibility of socialism in one city.)

Clarke feels that "the processes I'm advocating here, of bringing people together on issues they can be brought together on, leads to a great rising struggle against corporations. This actually represents the road to socialism in this country."

Clarke defended the right of municipal politicians to speak out on outside issues. For example, he calls for the federal government to nationalize Bell Telephone, and for the United States to sign the proposed cease-fire agreement with the Vietnamese.

He claimed that the conditions for the victory of the Vietnamese struggle "for the right to self-determination" were now more favourable on the political level than on the military level.

Clarke added that he didn't think much of the recently unveiled Davis government transportation plan. He called for the construction of a new subway line, "probably down the Bathurst Street route".

Rimstead complains newspapers ignore him

By CLARK PARSONS

Is the Paul Rimstead mayoralty campaign a joke as most people seem to think?

Rimstead, a columnist for the Toronto Sun, says "no", and, talking to him, it is hard to doubt his sincerity.

His three principal opponents take him seriously enough that they complained to the Sun that he was using his column to campaign. The Sun responded by allowing each of them to write several columns on their own behalf.

And when Rimstead was interviewed by Pierre Berton for his television program, his opponents again objected that they should be allowed equal time. As a result, the program was blacked out in the Toronto area.

Rimstead is bitter about the refusal of the Toronto newspapers to take him seriously. His campaign, he says, has opened his eyes to the reality of Canadian politics: you have to have money, you have to have contacts.

The Sun editorially endorsed alderman David Rotenberg for mayor.

"Rotenberg would not get one vote from the Sun's editorial staff," says Rimstead. "That editorial came down from above—from the people financing the Sun. We were bitter about it."

"I started out dumbly, idealistically running for mayor," he says. "When O'Donohue and the others complained about my column, I voluntarily did not write my column for a week, thinking that would show my sincerity. But still the major papers ignored me. So I decided I would use my column as a platform."

When Rimstead gets down to issues, he has many ideas and very few details.

"I am a master of generalization," he says. "I haven't talked about specifics because I don't know enough about them."

The city's civil service has the experts, he suggests; they are there to provide the politicians with the detailed information.

"How can anyone be an expert on everything?" asks Rimstead rhetorically.

"Look, it's not going to be these technical matters the others are talking about that will determine the future of the city: it's the social issues. And I'm the only one talking about them."

The Varsity—Phil Stamba

Sun columnist Paul Rimstead insists he has little publicity.

Rimstead sees "a black and white situation", a possible confrontation developing in Toronto. Five years ago there were only a few thousand blacks in Toronto, he says. Now there are tens of thousands. If Rimstead has serious suggestions to make to alleviate the "problem", however, they are not readily apparent.

The Sun's board of directors includes former national Conservative Party chairman Eddie Goodman and directors of Greenwin and Cadillac developers.

Most immigrants, he suggests, are people who could not make it at home, and so decided to emigrate. "Most of our immigrants now are coming from the West Indies or Africa," says Rimstead. "But it's a federal matter; Toronto can't do anything about it."

Rimstead's position appears ambiguous.

"We're the fat-cats, let's face it. Inside, you're warm and well-fed; outside, others are cold and hungry. Speaking morally, how can you refuse to let them in?"

Although Rimstead states that he is "not at all radical — conservative actually", his attitudes regarding development appear closer to those of John Sewell than Rotenberg.

"Why does everyone have to work at the corner of King and Bay?" he asks. "Why did it take just two weeks to approve the 75-storey Royal Bank tower at the old Star site when it's taken years of bickering to come to any conclusions on the Spadina expressway? Why did the Eaton-Fairview development 'just happen' to come up at the time of the election and have to be approved right away?"

Rimstead, like O'Donohue and Western Guarder Don Andrews, says Rochdale should be closed down.

"I'm not against draft-dodgers or homosexuals," he says. "I see people as people."

"But most of those in Rochdale are on welfare and don't want anything else. Put an end to the free ride and half will go home. Rochdale is an experiment which has failed."

His suggestion for Rochdale's future seems to involve some sort of social meeting place.

"Many people in Toronto — men and women — are lonely; they don't socialize easily. Set up bars, something, where they can meet..." Rimstead is not one for details.

Cleaning up Yonge Street, "the cheapest street in North America", and putting the brakes on immorality is another of Rimstead's desires. Rimstead would like to get rid of the Yonge St. "midway".

He favours an amalgamation of Metro government, or at least a return to the Board of Control. There's too much red tape now, he says. "Our problems are essentially the same; we're all one city."

Defender of morality

Stop "coloured immigration" - Western Guard

By ERIC MILLS

Using the traditional rationale of leftists of running in elections to propagandize, Western Guard member Don Andrews is campaigning for the City of Toronto mayoralty.

The theme of the Andrews campaign, as it has been throughout the stormy history of the Western Guard (formerly the Edmund Burke Society), is "Western Christian culture". This is strongly reflected in their anti-drug, anti-welfare, anti-"immorality" and pro-white views, all vigorously and forthrightly expressed.

In an interview, Andrews said that the racial problem in Toronto was his chief concern in Monday's election. He pointed out that although Rimstead has been talking about "the problem", only he has offered concrete solutions.

Mass immigration from non-European countries — "coloured immigration" — should be stopped, he declared, worried that race riots are "a definite possibility". Only the Chinese community seems to be able to co-exist with whites, he said, but "the black people are essentially more violent-prone". He added that blacks are not inferior to whites, but have "a different nature".

The violent crime rate "will rise rapidly within the next year or two", Andrews predicted, unless massive immigration of non-Europeans is ended. He admitted that immigration was a federal responsibility, but asserted that the pressure of two million voters voting for him would put considerable pressure on the federal government.

Closing down Rochdale College has long been a concern of the Western Guard, Erna Koffman (running for alderman in Ward 5), and Tony O'Donohue. Andrews sees Rochdale as "the symbol of the drug culture"; its demise would be a "psychological boost to all anti-drug forces."

The closure of the residence, although it would merely move the present population out of the building, is one example of Andrews' views of proper tactics to be used against "pro-drug forces". "Drug pushers and all who take drugs should be harassed by the community," he says.

The 18-storey building could be usefully turned into a senior citizens' home, Andrews said, but only after "a lot of Lysol and insecticides" have been thoroughly applied.

Another key Guard plank in the election is its belief that all abled-bodied welfare recipients should be forced to work in order to receive any support. Andrews suggested that those who could work should be required to spend one or two days a week doing work such as cleaning parks, or even "make-work projects", just so they would be discouraged from being a drain on society.

And, if they qualify for welfare under his system, people would get ration cards for room and board, presumably so their money could not be spent wisely.

The fourth major plank of the Western Guard is their desire, like Rimstead's, to clean up the Yonge Street strip, with its bars, "degeneracy", lewd movie houses, and above all, its pornographic bookstores.

These latter should have their windows painted over, Andrews said, he forced to put up "phony" signs, such as "art book store", and charge an admission price. If these measures did not drive the sex merchants out of business, at least they would protect "the women-folk and the young, impressionable people", he stated.

Andrews seemed little interested in other, more typical issues in the municipal campaign. Developers have emerged as the major issue with most candidates, according to Andrews. They are a small, admittedly rich minority, but not significant enough to be worried about, he claims.

His major opponents in the mayoralty race, O'Donohue, David Rotenberg and David Crombie, had little difference among them, according to Andrews. All are waging expensive campaigns of over $50,000 each, he pointed out, indicating that there may be some kind of payoff involved in winning the top job.

Even the leaders of the NDP had much in common with their Liberal and Conservative counterparts, he said (Rotenberg and Crombie are Conservatives, O'Donohue is a Liberal). Only in parts of the rank and file of the NDP can be found an ideological split with the major national parties, he said.

Andrews said he is not a fascist, in the sense that of belonging to "the Fascist Party". However, he said he is in favour of the populism of Alabama governor George Wallace, and the "economic populism" of the early Italian Fascist Party. On moral issues, he considers himself a conservative.

The Guard is running four candidates for alderman and three for the Board of Education as well as the mayoralty candidate in the election. The campaign will cost about $850, Andrews said, with another $400 donated in services.

He said the election provides a "wonderful opportunity" to publicize the Guards' platform, adding that $2,000 pieces of literature had been distributed.

The trustee campaign is based on advocating an end to permissiveness, Andrews said. Although the Guard would permit sex education to be taught, it would insist that it be taught with "Western Christian morality".

In addition, Andrews said the Guard would like a return to teaching basics, particularly reading and "practical things like money and bank accounts". Greater parent participation in the schools, although without control, is another Guard education plank.

Irishmen will picket airline

"A top member of Tony O'Donohue's team" approached the Toronto Irish Republican Club urging them to cancel a picket of an Irish Airlines office planned for tomorrow, according to Republican Club member Sean Keane.

Keane quoted the man, whom he did not name, saying that the picket might hurt O'Donohue's election chances, and that "We all want an Irishman to be mayor, don't we?"

Keane said the Republicans replied, "We don't give a shit who's elected mayor because whoever he is he'll be representing business interests. We don't think the mayor should be elected on an issue such as race."

Keane, who is also a member of the Marxist official wing of the Irish Republican Army, said he "got the idea" that some of O'Donohue's people may show up to disrupt the demonstration.

The picket was called to protest the internment of Republicans in Ireland, "north and south", and the collaboration of the Irish government with the British government. The Official IRA does not support the Provisionals' bombing campaign, but intends to demand the release from internment of Provisional chief of staff Sean MacStiofain, at tomorrow's 2 pm demonstration at the Aerlingus Airlines office at Adelaide and Church Streets.

Vision of the urban future:
Dream or nightmare?

L'hebdo city politics issue illustrates disagreements

This week's L'Hebdo carries a number of articles and reviews on urban topics. Their appearance is one reflection of the tremendous interest in city politics that has marked the scene in recent years. Conflict in the cities has been one of the major ways that the social and economic contradictions of capitalism have expressed themselves in the sixties and seventies.

The responses to the problems of the cities have been varied and confused. So it should be understandable (if perhaps not entirely forgivable) that the articles in L'Hebdo, commissioned for this issue, are, on some fundamental points at odds with each other. The views expressed in this issue may not be consistent with one another, but they do at least partially reflect some of the debates going on among those who seek to bring about change. At the same time, of course, they can be no substitute for more thorough and searching analysis.

Much of the disagreement among those who consider themselves 'progressive' in the context of urban politics has centered around questions of 'community control' and 'participatory democracy'.

Critics of these concepts have pointed out that they do not effectively confront the sources of urban problems in a fundamental way. As long as corporate enterprise and private property, either of land or of industry and financial institutions, continue, they argue, attempts at community control will fail, because the loci of power are elsewhere: in the economy. Even progressive taxation (a very elusive goal thus far), they point out, would merely centralize control of funds in the hand of bureaucracies integrated in the corporate state.

A further result of 'community control', critics point out, is the creation of divisions among working-class (blue or white collar) people. An example is the support of labourers' unions for developers because development provides jobs, even while it destroys cities. As long as private enterprise is the source of most jobs, a political strategy must take that into consideration, and find ways of dealing with such contradictions. They cannot be ignored. Another example, as Marjaaleena Repo has pointed out, is the 'organizing of the poor against the working class'. Organizing workers and "the poor" separately, she says, perpetuates divisions and deflects struggle.

A further effect of 'community control' has been the domination of 'community groups' by an elite of middle-class do-gooders and reformers who love to go to meetings, and who have more time and experience in these situations than the working class.

At the same time, despite these negative results, the only alternative to the reform movement at present seems to be the pro-developer old guard. So a political dilemma exists.

The articles in L'Hebdo should be regarded as material for further thought, rather than as definitive statements. Comment on them is invited.

Stale pedantry and eclecticism: The state of urban history

"To tell the story of a city one must love and understand it. This is not science but a mystery and an art. Like loving and understanding a woman, it requires sensual and emotional receptivity the historian cannot permit himself, and at best only a partial success can be attained."

"It is this personality of the city which prevents either the historian or the social scientist from understanding it. The one looks at the past, the other plans for the future. Accurate records of the past are invaluable, wise plans for the future essential, but the city lives in the present — this instant of the here and now. In this, too, it is feminine-logical, unpredictable, contradictory — but with a fine pragmatic realism. Immortal, as Wax Weber said of nations, it has neither regret for the past, nor fear of the future. It is as it is — now."

Alan Morley, Vancouver, From Milltown to Metropolis The Uses of Urban History

In studies of urbanization and urban policy problems, cheaply coined insights on the city as the institutional framework of the Pepsi generation are commonplace. In this version, the city is a process characterized by the rapidity and effervescence of its constantly changing present.

But before succumbing to this characterization of the city as a corporate merger of present and future and before we dismiss tradition as an important component of the future, it is worthwhile remembering that the human body also undergoes a complete change in its cells every seven years yet continues to rest clearly on the structure and skeleton of its past.

The city's skeleton is too often kept in a closet and most of its monuments are destroyed lightly. But the weight of its past cannot be so lightly effaced. Its past is worth looking at for a sense of time and place and for a perspective on the problems we face.

Being present minded, government-hired academics use the past only to evade the future. In a typical example, the author of a recent CMHC study on housing neatly sidesteps the problems of defining need: "Any attempt to define need takes us into a contentious, value filled area. Rather than attempt such a definition, it is more useful to survey the historical developments in the Canadian housing market to see it a problem does indeed exist and it so what its broad contours are."

Activists, who want to make and act on value judgements, have a different appreciation of the historical contours of a problem. In my own experience as a tenant activist, I constantly find myself looking for precedents and models for if history is, as they say, the index of men born too soon, it is also an index of lessons. It is also useful to have a perspective on the dimensions of a problem so as to more easily focus in on appropriate target systems or allies.

But activists will look in vain to urban history as it is now practised for answers to their problems. Although the city is at the centre of Canadian historical development, the focus of historical attention so far has polarized around an irrelevant dialectic. On the one hand we have a strong bias toward antiquarianism, in the tradition of W. D. Lighthall's 1892 Montreal After 250 Years, "dedicated to the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society of Montreal: My Friends and Fellow Strollers in Pleasant Fields". On the other hand we have urban history as national history writ small, which focusses on urban history only as it relates to stale national themes. Rarely have we been offered studies of the city which treats the city in terms of its own peculiarities, problems and dynamics. And rarer still are those who see urban history as a gateway to constructing an entirely different version of our past, a people's history seen from the bottom up.

The two books under review here serve as illustration of how work in this field has progressed. Glazebrook's is the more difficult to classify since it is written in the Midnight Cowboy tradition of Canadian historiography — skipping over the ocean like a stone. But, although there is no unifying thread running through the diversity of comments he makes, there are a definite set of principles of analysis beneath his dotting eclecticism.

His methodology is elitist and orthodox in the finest tradition of Canadian history. He feels for instance that "no mirror reflects as much of the complicated life of a city as does the press." "Would it not be more accurate to take housing and working conditions as the true mirror? To be sure, he does include descriptions of the poor interspersed with photos of the Mendelssohn Choir or the Prince of Wales visit, but this is an illustration of his ability to include a wide variety of material rather than the reflection of an attempt at a People's History of Toronto.

His moralism illustrates the same eclecticism of the two handed liberal (on the one hand... but on the other... or give from the right, take from the left.) This is his assessment of the depression: "The generations growing up after the thirties living in an affluent society and protected on every hand by social security, cannot with the best of will, understand what disciplines the depression imposed, how people were driven to the old-fashioned virtues — or what had once seemed to be virtues of frugality and competitive work. Perhaps its results were not all bad, for in it grew up the men who wrote the name 'Canada' on many battlefields. "If however, the depression dominated and circumscribed life in Toronto it was not the sole subject of conversation, nor was it a barrier against a wide range of intellectual and artistic advances..."

And so it goes — from consoling comments on poverty to the battlefields where men who had been treated like scum died in glory and back to the warm salon. This book exudes the moralism of the person who felt sorry for poor people with no shoes until he met a man with no feet and then continued with his martini, armed those who are planning their future.

Peter Goheen's Victorian Toronto, a study of the changing ways people lived as Toronto industrialized into its essentially modern form in 1900, differs sharply from Glazebrook in method, technique, orientation and scope. The sheer sophistication and overpowering pedantry of the book work against a critical, not to say a Sunday-afternoon reading. Here is a partial explanation of his methodological bombast:

"The analysis included three principal investigations. First, the relationships among the series of variables were studied using the multivariate statistical techniques known as factor analysis whereby the matrix of correlations may be reduced to a conceptually more manageable form and a series of index measures derived which summarize the correlations among the variables. Following this inquiry, the distributional properties of these derived "factors" were investigated employing a method of mapping based on the calculation of polynomial trend expressions. Trend surface mapping is designed to eliminate subjective bias from cartographic presentation through the use of exact mathematical procedures by which the recognition, isolation and measurement of trends is computed. In the third place, multiple regression expressions were formulated in order to decide whether some variables possessed predictive value in describing the distribution within the city of various economic and ethnic groups."

Some of this high-powered technique can be excused since a tight study of the forces unleashed by industrialization on residential and work patterns is warranted. What he is tracing essentially is the transformation from a city characterized by considerable social and land-use mix to one whose class segregation is an important component of the modern city. By 1900 both occupation and landscape were stratified by industrialization.

These are certainly important findings for the urban critic, the conjuncture of industrialization and class oppression on a variety of levels — residence, life — opportunities et cetera — sustains a certain type of analysis of the problems we are facing. It strongly suggests that the praxis of community organizing is weak if it attempts to organize independently of the major social and class outlines of the city.

Unfortunately an awareness of this is weakened by Goheen's abstract formulation of the categories at work which ignore the dimensions of social and political power. "Industrial development, population growth and the changing system of internal transportation were three of the most conspicuous agents of change," he writes. This abstract analysis does not distinguish Goheen from the work of Nixon's ultra-conservative advisor on urban affairs, Edward Banfield. Nor does it elevate his insights above the level of cliché. What he ignores is the dimension of inequality. It is precisely in the concrete inequality created by industrialism that its meaning for the modern city is forged.

Further work on the city should take up this point of view. Then a fruitful dialectic between the study and the transformation of the city can be joined. Until then we are saddled with studies that bolster hierarchy with pedantry, suffering with footnote condolences and polarization with smothering eclecticism.

with his compleat cocktail party animator The Story of Toronto, while "in the room women come and go, Talking of Michelangelo."

The same can be said of his treatment of the violation of rights of free speech which paraded under the banner of anti-communism. He heart-rendingly ponders the issues: "The argument was not wholly without validity but it did have two serious flaws. One was that the persons who were prevented from speaking publicly were not all communists. The other was to argue, that even if sedition were woven into communist doctrine, any remarks on communism were in themselves seditious."

"...In their usual pattern the communists described their opponents as fascists, with no referee to point out that, from the point of view of human liberty, no difference existed between communism and fascism."

His final comments on city planning stand on their own: "The hopes and skills of planners are of no avail except to the extent that they lead governments to take wise and avoid unwise action. A plan is not an end in itself; and if it lulls the consciences of government or public it becomes a liability. By circulating draft plans to householders and businessmen for comment and by encouraging public meetings on them the planners have gone some way to engage public interest but it is probable that only a small minority of citizens have ever seen or read plans, or perhaps know that such things exist. The triangle of planners, executive government and public is not easily drawn. Between the first two understanding and co-operation are needed. The electors for their part must fulfill their traditional roles of encouragement and criticism."

Despite the breadth and scholarly pretence of this book, it lulls the conscience. To that extent, it is of little value to those who wish to do more than encourage, criticize or sip cocktails with

The limitations of the reform

"Big Mao and Little Mao", that's how Richard Kirkup, the white hope of the developers in Ward 7 sees his opponents John Sewell and Karl Jaffary. In the idiom of the Archie Bunker wing of the property industry, that's how the opponents of high-rise development are seen. "Maoists, Communists, pinkos, left wingers and hamburgers" are the labels Vancouver's Mayor Tom Campbell flings about.

In Toronto these people are spearheading a reform movement; that is, defining the central issues of the forthcoming municipal election. Since last December 1st when supporters of Community Organizing (CO) 72 packed St. Lawrence Hall sporting rabbit buttons after Mayor Dennison charged that citizens' groups are like rabbits in a swamp — a lot of tracks but few rabbits — they have been multiplying rapidly. They are now prepared to field at least one serious contender for every ward of the city in opposition to the old-guard, pro-developer wing of City Council.

Family housing, neighborhood stability and local control form the core of the reformers' Holy Trinity. And the developers at least seem to agree with them on the centrality of the issues. "Toronto faces one fundamental development issue — whether important planning decisions should be made centrally by elected representatives of the whole municipality or, as some ratepayers groups are saying, on a strictly local basis by them", writes Allan J. Scott, president of the big developers public relation's front, the Urban Development Institute of Ontario.

On the reform side of the line-up, a common stance on certain key issues does seem to promise some measure of sustained collaboration. However, there is no necessary reason for feeling that they will hold together any more than the Civic, Liberal or NDP slates of the last election. From Conservative Hope to NDP Runge, from Sewell the polarizer to Crombie the compromiser, from ex-Waffler Dan Heap who sees the campaign as "a small part of the mobilization...to fight the tycoons, Canadian and foreign, who control us", to Colin Vaughn who seems to express the preference of the urbane middle class to shop in funky areas like Kensington, they share a common dedication to a contradiction — radical conservatism. Quality of life rather than quantity of concrete might be the salon battlecry but the rubber cement that binds this coalition together is based on a philosophy of urban life essentially geared to amalgamating a classical conservative commitment to conservation and preservation with the radical rhetoric of local control. Their points of disagreement, which theorist Karl Jaffary sees as irrelevant to the urban scene, may come to haunt them. Some day they may have to face the great divide on the classical questions of the demarcation of political alignments — international issues, economic development issues and social development issues. The issues which Toronto will face will not be permanently contained by the ties of their tenuous alliance.

The viability of the alliance to this point however, is testimony to the vitality of a new reform both in Europe and America. Reformers of the 19th and early 20th centuries fought eagerly for centralized authority as against local autonomy. According to Mack Walker's study of German Home Towns for instance, the slogan of the "common weal" was used to destroy the narrow corporate rights of integrated communities in favor of incorporating them into the larger rational capitalist society. Liberalism was the cloak for a class of bourgeois "movers and doers" and their civil servant custodians. "For local self government," writes Walker, "in the individualized country of the communities, was a contradiction of the goal of progress through the unimpeded rational movement of individual and impersonal commodities that was the concrete basis of German bureaucratic liberalism. Free movement of persons and of impersonal commodities was a denial" of their concept of community.

In North America the same forces were responsible for the Kafkaesque imprint of urban reform. Hostility to the wards and local control was their battle cry. A study of Toronto blamed our "office-seeking aldermen and other gratuities for public money" which the Commission investigating concluded with the following division and representation concerning this system of abuses and recommending another system creating representing the entire city and prosperity. 7. The council and coteries struggling of that they necessarily lose community."

Reformers were part of the school of democracy that are bound to do much to fields of political life. It is J.S. Woodsworth, the himself a centralizer. The influx of new industrial technology destroying the bases of divisions of a Golden Age overseas morality across from the ward heeler.

This wave of reform unchanged. In fact its center to the WASP homeowners

Centralism was designed to enforce their morals and vision of the city. "The pride of Toronto" wrote Middleton in the 1920's "is in the infinity of moderate-sized houses, nearly all of brick and for the most part faced by wellkept lawns and flower gardens...Undoubtedly there is no other city of comparable size where the population is as homogeneous as in Toronto."

This dominance of homeowners continued into the 1950's and early sixties. It formed one of the bases for what political scientist Harold Kaplan, writing in 1967, defined as the highly consensual, deferential nature of Toronto politics. But then came the high rise on a big scale, rising like Pinocchio's nose to give the lie to the homeowner's concept of the city.

This development cannot be explained by the traditional clichés. Pollution Probe's Rules of the Game demolishes the myth that the popularity of the high rise derives from their provision of tax revenue to the city. On the contrary, they probably eat up more in taxes than they provide. David Lewis Stein in Toronto for Sale demonstrates that population growth cannot account for the rash of high-rise development in the last decade. The main population growth areas are in the suburbs rather than the downtown areas most subject to urban removal. From 1966 to 1971 when the number of apartment suites increased by 22,832, the population increased by only 1,212!

One can understand this phenomenon only in terms of class — classes moving in and classes moving out. The large, low income families are being forced out by huge development corporations catering to the high-rise singles swingers and cliff dwellers who can afford the rent.

It is in this context that the proponents of conservative, stable neighborhoods are forced to adopt the mentality of besieged garrisons. "The new apartment towers stabbing into the sky and expressways threatening to cascade over settled neighborhoods are creating a mood of confrontation" the Star wrung its hands in 1969. That was the year that Dennison was still seen as a hayseed down-home New Democrat rather than an agent of the developers.

Since then the hayseed is gone and analysis is now colored in the tones of a class war morality play. "Before we get down to details," writes James Lorimer in his new Citizens Guide to City Politics, we need to be clear about one basic issue: there is a fundamental, overriding conflict between the interests of the property industry and the interests of the ordinary citizens. The industry's basic desire is to have land values, building prices and rents as high as possible at all times, and to see property values going up as quickly as possible, rents going up just as fast, and only as much new construction and development as is consistent with their desire to maximize their profits and wealth. The basic interest of ordinary people is exactly the opposite."

But before we marvel at the recent conversion of the genteel to class war politics, it is worthwhile examining their strategy for attacking the new feudalism of the developers. Can the ward system of organization, geared to electoral slates and residential neighborhoods deal with the magnitude of the issue? Or does it rather reinforce the interests of homeowners who more naturally define themselves in terms of neighborhoods against those of tenants, workers and the poor who more naturally organize on city, province and even nationwide levels? Is it more than a coincidence that the founding meeting of CO72 was held the same evening as the founding meeting of the Ontario Anti-Poverty Association? Ratepayers groups frequently complain that apathetic tenants and roomers are not active in their associations. Perhaps it is not apathy but insight that accounts for their boycott.

Can a Manichean analysis focusing on the property industry alone provide sufficient insight into the processes at work? In fact developers are representative of the entire capitalist class. As last year's Guerilla series on the developers pointed out: "The most important bank directors hold directorships in the life insurance companies, in the important investment trusts, and until recently in the big trust companies. They also sit on the boards of the big conglomerates: Acres, Power, Weston Industries, and so on. They control mining and industrial enterprises, transportation companies, utilities, department store chains...and of course, development corporations."

The reformers' insistence on seeing the developers alone as the enemy leads not to the common charge of urban populism but the more precise charge of urban popular frontism based on the union sacrée of homeowners, small businessmen and good capitalists. Not the least repercussion of their refusal to take on the broader issues involved is the opposition of construction labourers to the reform slate. Do labourers not have a place in a new coalition of reformers? Should not a reform coalition address itself to their need for jobs? Could not the demand for mass public housing under tenant control serve the needs of both labourers and those who need new homes? Or would that kind of demand jeopardize their holy alliance?

The lawyers and professionals who take their seats on council in the new term will have a number of problems to confront. But if they are truly to represent the interests of the majority of Toronto's citizens which includes a near majority of tenants, an overwhelming majority of workers and substantial numbers of the poor, they may well have to question whether they have the tools for the task. Otherwise they will be in need of a Cervantes to applaud and lament their quixotic tilting at highrises.

Clarkson's Liberal panacea: Reforms and party politics

Item: Toronto's city council is a "madhouse" where personally clash and petty argument predominate, where policies end priorities "are seldom debated". Among the old guard who hold the power there is "no semblance of a program" other than upholding the status quo and serving monied interest. There is little expertise among aldermen, and little authority is held by the mayor.

Item: Transport, housing, police and planning are ruled by independent boards and commissions which are not accountable to citizens, leaving a "policy vacuum" at city hall.

Item: Metro council is a disordered body whose members represent local interests rather than working for the city as a whole. The Metro Chairman is chosen as a "palatable diplomat" by his colleagues, instead of the electorate.

Item: The OMB is "paternalistic", and the provincial government purposely keeps Metro weak and divided.

Item: When elections are carried out in Toronto they are "anti-democratic", since there is no true representation by population end because a men's property holdings can determine his voting power.

Item: The actual policy making and administration of the city is carried out by a web of "technocrats" who have no responsibility to the people end who work in support of real estate developers and leaders of the construction industry.

These are the accusations of Steven Clarkson in City Lib, the account of his campaign for mayor as leader of the municipal Liberal party in 1969.

Relating his campaign to the emergence of the reform movement in Toronto politics, Clarkson asserts his primary theme: that only when governed by a unified party with a clearly formulated policy will the city receive adequate government.

According to Clarkson, the 1969 election "put the spotlight on a political system experiencing its first shock wave of fundamental change". For the new movement quality of life issues took precedence over the desires for material development which rule city hall, reformers becoming deeply critical of a system which has failed to respond to the growing "urban crisis" and of the "inertia" and "deadening grasp of the old guard".

Parties are the answer to the constitutional faults of the city, says Clarkson. The electorate could then link individual candidates to concrete stands. Party unity would guarantee effectiveness, the majority party putting into effect a policy for which citizens had knowingly voted. Better communication could be developed between the city and the boroughs, since parties would have co-operating members representing all parts of Metro. Parliamentary debate of issues would take place in city council. A cabinet could be created, ministers being set in charge of various city departments, achieving expertise and taking control of the city back from technocrats.

Constitutional changes were the central themes of Clarkson's policy, all being based upon party politics. The solutions seem clear, fine and workable.

But Clarkson pays too little attention to a set of facts which nullify his argument for a Liberal government of Toronto.

Each of the three parties which fielded a slate of candidates (CIVAC, the NOP, the Liberals) was beset by a basic contradiction: while being pushed into the campaign by a movement of reform, each was split between reformers and those who upheld the status quo.

The Liberal party decided to contest the election in the face of opposition from many of its Toronto based members, and this internal conflict greatly hindered its campaign.

Candidates chosen represented both the reformist and conservative wings. Nowhere is this more apparent than in the stands of the two Liberal aldermen elected in the city, Hugh Bruce and Bill Kilbourn. Rarely do they vote the same way on an issue, Bruce being a member of the "old guard" and Kilbourn being a leader of the movement for change. At times they have refused to speak to each other. Here there is little indication of a party unified behind its policy.

The split was also evident in the events leading to Clarkson becoming Liberal mayorelect candidate. Not even considered for the job by Senator Keith Davey who handled the task of finding a leader, Clarkson decided to run only when no other viable men were left. There was poor communication between Clarkson end Oavey, and the latter made an abortive attempt to replace Clarkson with Leon Weinstein.

Previously, Davey had pressed Sam Keiser — a lawyer linked with developers — to accept the nomination. But the contradiction of a reform party led by a representative of development was too great, end Keiser was forced to step down. Others preferred by Oavey had refused, having little faith in the municipal effort and fearing that it could only be detrimental to their political careers.

Clarkson summarizes the events as a clash between a "top-down, elitist" approach to leadership recruiting and a "decentralized, bottom-up" approach to party organization. He admits to being chosen as a reformer and grass roots worker against the wishes of the party machine, whose desires were for election rather than reform.

Similar problems emerged for CIVAC and the NOP, conservative elements weakening the thrust for change. The former, being made up of such differing men as Oavid Crombie and Oavid Rotenberg, was merely a set of loose ties labelled as a party. The NOP chose not to run a mayoralty candidate because the conservative labour councils put their support behind Mayor Bill Oennison. Reformist members of the NOP later supported the candidacy of Margaret Campbell for mayor.

Viewing this year's election, Clarkson states that the reform coalition which has emerged in city council and among community organizations in the past three years forms a more viable unit now than a Liberal municipal party could. Although he states his support for this coalition — made up of such men as Karl Jaffray (NOP), John Sewell (Independent), Oavid Crombie (PC) and Kilbourn — Clarkson maintains that a Liberal party could govern Toronto on a reform platform in the vague future.

But the Liberal party would still contain the conflicting interests. If party government is to come to this city in the form of unified groups representative of the true conflicts in Toronto politics it will most likely emerge from the two opposing factions which have developed within city council.

Oespite the fact that Clarkson and his reformist Liberals analyzed the problems of the city, foreseeing and foreshadowing much of the present struggle, they had no chance of gaining a majority on council. Being a weak link of a national party which still appears to have no coherent urban policy and being split, they had little chance for effectiveness. Even if Clarkson had won the mayorelect, he would have been unable to push through his reforms against a predominantly old guard council or by influencing a Conservative provincial government.

Yet a good organization and a comprehensive platform did emerge from the efforts of the reformists who gained dominance of the municipal Liberal party. Their leadership convention was held only 10 weeks prior to the election, after a detailed policy had already been formulated, so that policy rather than personalities could dominate their campaign.

Both organization and policy were developed in a decentralized manner. Focus was first put upon building support within wards, meetings and policy discussions being held with citizens' groups. The attempt was made to co-ordinate city and borough organizations, a constitution being drafted for the entire municipal party. The final decisions of policy were made at a policy convention, where consensus was reached on most issues.

The policy centered upon reforming the structures of city government. The electoral system would be changed to one vote per citizen regardless of land holdings, and to one alderman per ward (wards becoming smaller and more numerous). Controls would be put upon the financing of elections to stop candidates becoming obligated to special interests. There would be more unification of the city under Metro council. The departments presently guided by independent boards would come under the executive power of Metro.

There would be the attempt to listen to community delegations on a "regular and meaningful basis", and neighbourhoods would be given more self-control. Direct support would be given to citizens' groups in the form of budgets, staff and experts. Local development corporations would initiate neighbourhood housing and recreation projects. Private developers would be forced to relate more responsibly to communities. Spadina would be stopped.

The city's relationship with the province would be re-defined in a way that gave the city more power and made the policies of the two mutually coherent.

Clarkson asserts that his campaign did centre upon policies. He describes the difficulty in putting these policies across through a media which concerned itself with personalities (picturing him as the swinging young academic) and issues (searching for the splits in the Liberal party) and feared giving any candidate more coverage than the others. Searching for issues, the Liberals developed drug and pollution policies. A press secretary bombarded the media daily with policy statements. Gradually Clarkson came to feel that his intentions were coming across to the public.

The effectiveness of his campaign with the press was confirmed when the Star and the Globe and Mail carried editorials endorsing his candidacy for mayor.

Clarkson also describes his alienation he came to feel when constantly campaigning, becoming isolated as leader, worrying about his financing and attempting to catch one of his opponents long enough to debate an issue with them (Dennison being particularly slick at avoiding debates).

Then although he felt on election day that he had a chance of victory, Clarkson ran third, with only 20 per cent of the vote. He is undecided in his analysis of this. Did he do well, having been an unknown U of T professor three months before? What had caused the upsurge for Campbell? Had the Liberals failed in this election, or had they set off on the first step toward governing the city?

The reader is also left with indecision, at least partly because of Clarkson's failure to fully analyze the personalities, policies and campaigns of Dennison and Campbell. It is suggested that the other mayoralty candidates ran without full policies, but with the appearance of stability to the electorate. There is little explanation why Campbell represented a viable reform alternative to many voters. Perhaps Clarkson felt the scope of his book should only cover the Liberal campaign. But when describing this campaign, Clarkson fails to put it into perspective.

One major theme which receives insufficient attention is that of development versus the community. This issue has created more dissonance than any other in Toronto during the past three years, whether the development is accused of devouring housing or whether the old guard are accused of losing citizens' money by giving developers concessions. The polarization of city council and the efforts of reformers have come to centre upon this issue, with its overtones of class conflict and injustice. Here the decisions about the quality of life which Clarkson describes must be made.

But while the Liberals developed a policy supporting communities and setting controls upon developers, Clarkson makes only a cursory analysis of the implications of development, the factors determining when it is beneficial and when not, the groups who constantly support it and why.

Yet in his criticism and suggestions of change for the city's constitutional structure he analyzes an equally important issue which may be overshadowed by the controversy over development. It is obvious that many of his suggested reforms must be implemented before Toronto can have effective and responsible government.

City Lib reads clearly and maintains interest, describing from the inside the development of a convincing policy of change and the dynamics of campaigning in Toronto. It is an honest and straight-forward book which can give many insights for the understanding of our municipal politics.

Sewell and developers: Trying to beat City Hall

It is difficult to describe John Sewell without sounding like you're putting him down: honest, committed to his principles, religious — virtue isn't in these days, especially among our politicians.

In Up Against City Hell, Sewell gives us a very revealing look at city politics, some personal history, and the background of his political involvement as a community organizer.

He is in a difficult position. Sewell considers himself accountable to the people — an unpopular view at a City Hall dominated by politicians who are primarily out to defend their personal power, and to promote development, and consequently make important decisions without consulting the people. As an alderman Sewell must also use his political power to defend the rights of his constituents from the plans of developers, and therefore requires support from his fellow politicians.

Historically, the radical politician often compromises his principles, and finally defeats himself by voting with the majority. Sewell describes several: June Marks, originally a committed working class representative, Fred Beavis, Mayor William Dennison, who tends to diminish or deny his former role as a radical on City Council, and Thomas Clifford who told Sewell, "You know, I used to be a radical when I was younger, but found I just didn't get anywhere. I found it much easier just to keep quiet and go along with the crowd."

Sewell has chosen instead to polarize the two groups in City Hall, the development-backed majority and the smaller group of community-supported politicians, and to publicize this division in the media.

Power tends to protect power, for many reasons. Voters re-elect familiar names, without a clear idea of the political priorities of the candidates. And, powerful politicians are often experienced in the mechanics of legal dishonesty: Alderman Wardle who as Chairman of an Executive Committee, deliberately miscounted votes in favour of a motion he supported, (at which point the losing politicians who had won as a result of Wardle's deception, left so there would be no quorum left to dispute the count).

Alderman Ben Gry, an equally corrupt politician, used his influence to push through a development which resulted in considerable financial gain to his family because of properties held in his wife's name.

Many politicians, of whom David Rotenberg is a notable example, derive considerable financial support from development corporations, Meridian, Greenwin, Cadillac etc., who are reimbursed for their support in the wide okay given to development plans in the city.

We are in a period of transition as the bases of power shift from this kind of alliance to broad-based community movements supporting committed and accountable politicians, currently represented by Sewell, Jaffary, Kilbourn, Chisolm, Scott, Crombia and Eggleton.

This book is a very important one, and should be read by every citizen voting in the municipal election. It is a well-written book, although it tends to assume a greater familiarity with municipal politics than many citizens will have. That is why it should be read, for it is only greater citizen participation and politicization and the election of accountable politicians that is going to defeat the power of developers at City Hall.

The Ontario Government has met with representatives of Ontario students several times since the October fees withholding referendum. The Government simply refuses to tell us anything about their plans for student aid programmes. In particular, Premier Davis refuses to say that OSAP loan ceilings won't go up again.

It's your future. If you object to the Government's refusal to talk, if you object to the form of their education cutbacks of the last year then let the Government know.

Your fees are not due until January 15. By that time the situation may have changed.

But at least until you're back in January, DON'T PAY YOUR SECOND INSTALLMENT. The situation may have changed by then, and the January 10th Varsity will contain all the details.

The experts look at urbanization

Jacobs destroys dogma but analysis is uneven

Few things are harder to see than the obvious. Jane Jacobs, simply because she has retained her ability to see at least a fraction of what is obvious, and because she is able to strip away, for her readers, the veils of mystification from many of the economic processes that are often made to appear needlessly mysterious by orthodox treatments, has written a book that is — at least in places — brilliant.

What makes the book seem so new and daring is merely that, unlike the vast majority of the practitioners of the "dismal science" of economics, the author is still aware of the real world, bases her theories on what she observes in that real world, and consequently, need not be relegated to that twilight zone of irrelevance that most of her academic brothers occupy. In addition, she stands out because she deals with her subject matter on a large scale, so that fundamental processes and dynamics become visible, while the commonly accepted practice — among the macro people as much as anywhere — is to work only on the level of technique and quantitative analysis, taking the larger range as given: a practice not even defensible in theory, since economic processes are intimately linked to social and political processes, and likely to be disastrous in practice when, as Jacobs suggests, the foundations are incorrectly understood or even in danger of actual collapse.

But unfortunately, closely related to her ability to point out that which is invisible to most people because it is too obvious, or because it has been made invisible by the myths of our culture, is a tendency to sometimes take that which is obvious, and present it as an astounding new revelation. It is this facet of her talent that the reader encounters first, in the form of a rather large red herring labelled "cities first". Her thesis, briefly, is that it is cities that are "basic", that are the origins of all economic growth and change, that are the dynamic element of any economy; and specifically, she makes the claim that cities existed before agriculture. To prove her case, she constructs an interesting historical hypothesis involving a city which she calls New Obsidian, supposedly having existed on the site of the ancient city Catal Huyuk, in which she sketches how agriculture might have developed, through trade, from a city originating in a hunting-and-gathering economy.

What she does not seem to realize is that she does not need to prove her case with elaborate and rather dubious hypotheses based on scanty anthropological evidence, for the case she really wants to prove, (i.e. that cities are the source of all economic growth), not only does not depend on the correctness of her historical hypothesis, but is actually a tautology.

For Jacobs, cities are not defined by their size, but by their ability to generate economic growth. Now, it is accepted by all except a minute handful of diehard Lockean evangelists that men have always existed in groups; that the notion of society as consisting of individuals who have come together is incorrect. From this, it follows by definition that all economic growth has originated from groups of people living together. And since any group of people, any settlement, no matter how small, qualifies as a city by her definition it is originating economic growth. Then, if one accepts her definition of cities, and it seems to be a good one, then one must concede that her case is automatically true. Since there were settlements before agriculture, then it is a tautology that cities existed before agriculture, and that cities are the origins of economic growth.

However, it does not follow, as she seems to think, that rural work, agriculture, cannot result in the development of cities. Merely because one has proved that there were cities before agriculture, one cannot therefore assume that other cities were not produced by agriculture. One need cite as counter-examples only two of the cities she discusses at great length, Manchester and Birmingham. Both of these cities have their origins in rural villages that continued to grow (see M. Bateson, Medieval England) and eventually diversified to become industrial.

This red herring aside, however, Jacobs gets down to her admirable work of dispelling many of the myths surrounding city economies, and makes a number of very valuable points. She exposes, for example, the sort of nonsense that people like Walt Rostow and John Kenneth Galbraith have turned into orthodoxies in the area of economic development of underdeveloped regions. She points out that further expansion of agricultural staples will not lead to development for these countries, that it is the development of city industries that is needed, and that until this takes place, it is unlikely that agricultural productivity and efficiency can be raised by any appreciable amount.

She makes it clear that economic development must not depend on outside capital, for this can only result in colonial dependencies, not dynamic economies, that concentration on a few large industries serves only to produce company-town economies that inevitably stagnate and fail to generate growth, and that it is a serious mistake to believe that large enterprises are efficient producers of growth, pointing out that many underdeveloped countries do have a number of very large, rich enterprises which, however, fail to create growth.

She goes on to demolish the fairy tales that apologists like Galbraith have woven around the large corporation, pointing out that large corporations are notoriously incapable of doing creative work, i.e. development work. She makes it clear that division of labour is not a sign of efficiency, that many backward economies have minute divisions of labour, and showing by analysis of the relevant processes how divisions of labour can serve to prevent economic growth.

She makes a number of very telling points in discussing what future trends further development might bring; especially intriguing are her discussions of pollution control (she points out that what is needed is not less production, but rather more development that will improve or make obsolete present harmful processes) and of the trend to differentiated production, which will supersede many of the present mass-production techniques. In sum, she makes a strong case against the orthodox views on the dynamics of economic development.

But while her analysis of the economy of cities carries with it implicit, (and sometimes explicit) criticism of the economic processes of the present, Jacobs nevertheless tends to overlook some of the central implications of what she is saying. Like muckracking journalists of the Vance Packard sort, she tends sometimes to write in a political end historical vacuum. (Historical vacuum in the sense that she does not develop the implications of the history she is writing.)

iversal, and those which are peculiar only to certain historical epochs. This is of great importance because the particular aspects of production of each period do change the fundamental nature of production and growth, thus helping to determine the nature of the economy of the next period. In other words, economic history is a progression which is irreversible, and the nature of which changes from one stage to another. Specifically, what this may mean is that if centuries of economic development have brought us to the stage of monopoly capitalism, and if, as Jacobs says, this form of economy, with its overspecialization, overly large enterprises, etc., tends to produce stagnation then it may be meaningless to say how further economic growth could, or ought to, take place. It may be the case, (and I would suggest that the implication can be derived from Jacobs' arguments) that we have, so to speak, reached the end of economic history, because the growth processes which Jacobs considers central no longer can occur under present conditions, and because the inertia of the present structure makes it impossible for it to evolve into patterns that could be productive.

It may be useful here to briefly examine her analysis of the transformation from feudalism to capitalism. Her analysis, which takes a good deal from Henri Pirenne, is incorrect in the fundamental respect that it is not true that the development of cities, growing outside the feudal economy, end bringing with them the enlargement of trade, was the central factor in the collapse of feudalism. In many instances, for example in eastern Europe, the growth of cities and trade actually strengthened the feudal system. It is true that the growth of cities was a necessary, but not a sufficient condition for the development of capitalism. But the central cause is to be found in the development, or ripening, of contradictory tendencies within the feudal economy itself.

What this implies is the crucial point that cities, while they are the locale in which growth always takes place, are not able always to produce this growth independently, (regardless of what is happening elsewhere). In other words, the processes of development which she isolates work, but they do not always work on their own, they sometimes need external stimuli, and pre-conditions or they will not function in certain historical situations. It may therefore be a reasonable extrapolation of her analysis to suggest that we have reached the point where city economies are no longer able to generate growth because the favourable conditions for the operation of the growth processes do not exist. The meaning of this is that the dynamic which she correctly identifies is not a self-perpetuating dynamic, but one that tends to run down, and that in fact has run down.

Connected to this is the fact that Jacobs, because she is so concerned with assigning the central role to cities, fails to consider the complementary but more passive role played by rural and third-world areas in economic development. What she overlooks is that while cities in the advanced countries of western Europe and the U.S. certainly were the initiators of development, they nevertheless depended absolutely on rural and third-world areas. Without the immense exploitation of these regions, the growth in the cities could never have happened. This may mean that in the present, her analysis, while correct, is irrelevant in many ways because the preconditions needed before the city dynamic can operate no longer exist.

What all this implies is that an informed reading of The Economy of Cities can lead one to conclude that the dynamic which she analyses so brilliantly and thoroughly, and which was historically valid, is no longer valid because it has an innate tendency to run down and collapse, has in fact run down, cannot be revived, and makes it necessary to seek a new dynamic.

Who runs our cities? Two books, many replies

"We shall start with a hypothesis: the total urbanization of society, a hypothesis which has to be supported by arguments, reinforced by facts. This hypothesis implies a definition. We shall call an "urban society" that society which results from total urbanization, virtual today, real tomorrow," argues Henri Lefebvre in his Le revolution urbaine.

Alan Powell also argues that the contributors to his collection, The City, believe there is an urban revolution occurring. To Powell, The City is an attack upon objective consciousness as it camouflages the reality of urban life. Instead of an emphasis upon objectivity, efficiency, and value-neutrality, Powell argues for an approach to the city which is more effective and morally committed. The attack of the citizens' groups, reflected upon by many of the authors, is creating counter-myths to 'the myth' of the three 'druids': the developers, the technocrats, and the politicians.

Richard Lay's paper, "The Zoning Law as Icon" carefully explodes the claim of objectivity of the zoning methods used by Toronto's planners. (The various areas of Toronto are designated for various uses and various densities. Density refers to the gross floor area over lot area. An area that is designated '3' can have a building 3 times the lot area. If the owner wishes, he may only build on half the lot, but at double the height. Zoning feeds right in to high-rise.) Lay examined different reports on the zoning scheme, but nowhere did he find a better explanation for how the numbers were arrived at than from a planner: "They're completely arbitrary."

Two papers by U of T sociologists, Jack Wayne and Barry Wellman, argue against the picture of the city as cold and harsh. In "The Case of the Friendless Urbanite", Jack Wayne argues that "participation patterns found in the neighbourhoods are more than the sum of the individual tendencies". The only exception is the family-less apartment building where neighbourhood contact is low. From his view in "Who needs neighbourhoods?", Barry Wellman would argue that with communication and technology these friendless apartment dwellers may still have personal ties but scattered around the city.

While most of the authors praise personal and community ties, a critical reading of Anesta-sla Shkilyuk's, "Challenging an Urban Myth: Chile's Unique Strategy for low-income Housing", reminds one of the limits of community. Community can be used by the powers that be as well as by the powers that hope to be. Poor people's participation in Chile's housing strategy was a good thing, she argues. It generated new community leaders who when the time came would help in the management. After accepting this responsibility, the community leaders would not opt for political radicalism but for legitimate reformism.

This criticism of Shkilyuk's article reveals the limits of The City in general. The papers do not consider the roots of their bete noir, objective consciousness. Lefebvre argues that the urban technocratic myths are a direct outcome of the dominance of industrialization over the City. The City does not serve the needs of the majority of the people, but the needs of the industrial process underneath it.

Apologetically, Professor Powell alludes to this limitation in the introduction: "Modern capitalism is only obliquely referred to by most of the authors as the primary source of urban problems." "Notable exceptions to this generalization are Susan Fish's article upon the market bias of low-income housing in Ontario and Graham Fraser's discussion of how the developers' conceptions are favoured by the very administrative structure of City Hall.

In The Future of Canadian Cities, Boyce Richardson documents how private interests dominate over public interests in urban affairs. His chapter, "Who is Downtown for?", examines how the development process across Canada is forcing working class people out of the central City. The South of St. James Town struggle to preserve cheap housing in Montreal re-appears as the fight to preserve low-income housing from Concordia Investments.

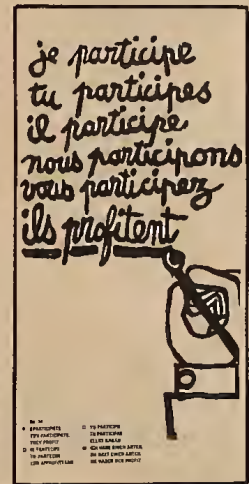

And so on.

Since Richardson goes to the root of the urban crisis, his proposal to insert a public interest dimension into urban planning offers solutions: Municipal landbanking and lease-holding are counterposed to land speculation and inflation. Guaranteed housing subsidies are proposed for people, not builders. Free public transit is urged to replace the dominance of the car over the urban landscape. If you think these solutions are utopian, read Richardson's description of how they are applied in Sweden.

These highly complimentary comments about The Future of Canadian Cities must be qualified. Richardson does the qualifying for us by wondering about the bureaucratic inertia of the Swedish approach. However, Richardson does not integrate a critique of bureaucracy and its rationality with his radical social analysis. On the other hand, Powell's The City, does not integrate a radical social critique with his proposals for community participation. The practical and theoretical problem is how to inter-relate the liberating potential of citizen participation with an awareness of the power of industrialization.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL
NOTICE REGARDING ELECTIONS

The University of Toronto Act, 1971, stipulates that no person shall serve as a member of the Governing Council unless he is a Canadian citizen. The Governing Council at its regular meeting held on November 16th, 1972, resolved THAT POSSESSION OF CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP BE A REQUIREMENT FOR A CANDIDATE TO BE NOMINATED (FOR ELECTION TO THE GOVERNING COUNCIL). This requirement applies to the election of staff and student members of the Governing Council.

Prospective candidates are advised that nominations for election to the Governing Council closed on February 7th, 1972, during last year's elections, and that a varying length of time is required for application for Canadian citizenship to be processed.

Annual oratorios garnish Christmas season

The Mendelssohn Choir may actually be considered one of the last bastions of choral baroque and Handelian pomp. In a matter of weeks the singing "Halleluia Chorus" will burst from the choir's collective vocal cord in their annual presentation of The Messiah. Last Sunday Elmer Isler conducted his group — 172 strong — plus the National Arts Centre Orchestra through a performance of Messiah's grandest rival, Solomon. In each work there are big, sprawling choruses and an ample number of consistently fine arias with miraculous, Bach-inspired orchestral accompaniments.

The highlight of this performance (which, unlike Sir Thomas Beecham's version, contained Act II), was Lois Marshall's contribution as the Queen of Sheeba. I thought she gave a flawless performance, her voice perfectly effortless, and gracefully nuanced from the beginning of one phrase to the end of another, both connected by superb legato. The first aria, at the beginning of Act Three, asks for string and flute accompaniment, and the three parts blended beautifully in this subtly balanced counterpoint. It is too bad there were not more arias for Miss Marshall to sing, although perhaps a valuable aspect of the baroque oratorio is that it does not always cater to the virtuosity of the resident divas for the sake of that virtuosity.

Stephanie Bogle as the first woman begging Solomon to return her baby, and Roxolane Roslak, as the second, sung very effectively, and the amount of emotion they produced squared well with the modest capabilities of their soprano voices. Ricki Turofsky as the Pharaoh's daughter and Solomon's wife (one of them, anyways) initially tried to be very expressive and lyrical, especially in the ornamentation of Handel's simple line of melody. The result was tremolo instead of vibrato, and the low notes stiffened into inaudibility. And yet the one duet between the queen and Solomon was sung forcefully, and with full tone. Perhaps the competition with Don Gerrard as Solomon and with the flurries from the strings prompted her to make herself heard and heard well in this duet. She was still the disappointment of the performance, though.

Don Gerrard has a warm, broad bass voice and although there was not much for him to do with it in the way of theatrical arias, he sang confidently and clearly. Charles Bressler was heard intermittently as Zadok, the High Priest. I was reminded by a Bressler fan his voice is closer to that of a countertenor than of a tenor, so I want to withhold any criticism of the power of his voice itself. In fact, he sang very elegantly, with a sensitive awareness of just what shade of emotion and emphasis fits what note.

The orchestra played energetically and with an ample tone, although on some slippery quick-paced allegros, where notes jump up and down the scale in legato leaps, I thought the strings lost their balance at times, falling behind the snappy and regular pace of their tempo. Isler had excellent control over dynamics, as he did over his chorus, so the orchestra did very well in this difficult department.

The chorus was trim and vigorous. Double choruses seemed to be tossed off effortlessly, as if each part were recorded separately and played on top of each other. The effect was not mechanical — just supremely professional and competent. The weight of their bulk sound was carefully used by Isler in the huge, boisterous choruses — in other words he did not pointlessly throw the weight of his choir around, which is an easy temptation with so much of it at his disposal.

Here, in short, was a well-polished performance, and with such uncomplicated sylvan music, I am not ashamed to say it was a fun concert.

Unobtrusive horror flick (minor) classic

Night of the Living Dead will have closed by the time you read this, but it rolls around now and then, to the revival houses, and you might want to keep an eye out for it next time it comes.

It's an odd case. Released in 1968, it made the rounds of those dubious little cinemas which traffic in sex-and-sadism shockers. You can find it in the handbooks of movies for TV, stigmatized by a single star.

Something happened, though, and the movie developed a cult-following, which phenomenon prompted Time magazine to review it three years later. It's easy to see why people dismissed it, so to speak, unseen. Night of the Living Dead is nothing if not an amateur movie (made, of all places, on the outskirts of Pittsburgh) and it lacks the professional gloss even those stinkers starring Vincent Price and Patrick Magee manage to attain.

What is unusual in Night of the Living Dead is that something clicks in an astounding way. Everything seems to work together: the not-bad but not-good performances, the jerky camera work and uncertain lighting, the too-flat script. It's a gaudy word, and too often used to explain away imagination-starved trash, but "verisimilitude" seems to be the result of all that amateurishness. There are, to be sure, some blatantly misaccented moments, and the ending is a cruel, calculated zinger, totally gratuitous, quite indefensible.

But this dumb, dillefantish movie survives faults that would have ruined a bigger, glossier production. One salvation is an artist's sense of pacing, making the film fluid and unpredictable, disconcertingly unlike the studio-thriller with its engineered crescendos and evenly distributed jolts.

The horror in this movie is not the splashy terror of the special-effects department. There is a grainy, utterly banal, somnambulist quality to the film, the prosaic but terrifying look of nightmares. Don't get me wrong, there is also a grimness of detail which is quite appalling — but somehow it's not that excruciating infliction of pain that panders to the sado-masochists in the audience. It's a pretty ripe picture, all right, but we don't leave it with the gritty, furtive feeling that recent pictures in this black-sheep genre rub off on its viewers.

A few last words: Night of the Living Dead is about some people who take refuge in a deserted farmhouse on a night when corpses rise to devour the living. All right? So don't make the movie into something more than it tries to be. It's a shocker, with no moral, no stunning performances. Nonetheless, despite everything, it happens to be one of the best horror movies ever made. Don't go if you don't like that sort of thing. It's as simple as that.

Revisionist movie bio of great blues singer

There was a mid-fifties bang-and-zap version of H.G. Wells' War of the Worlds. I saw it the other night. Near the beginning, the American army had a saucer landing-site surrounded. "They'll probably attack at dawn", an officer warned. It was true. At dawn the Martian ships' periscope-tenacities began to move. "Hit 'em with all ya got" ordered the officer. Nothing. Bounced right off. Then, slowly, the periscope turned until it spotted an American tank. Zap. Gone. No tank. In the audience, a few people clapped. The periscope turned on a machine-gun nest. Zap. No machine-gun nest. Now we all cheered, the whole audience rooting for the Martians.

Seeing old movies really hips you to what a separate reality movies are. When, as a kid, you noticed that the actors never went to the toilet, you had the key to the industry: we imitate them more than they imitate us.

Conventions are the gravity of the movies. Since The War of the Worlds, the pull has changed, leaving those people from those days walking on air. We cheer for the Indians (and the Martians) now, and the only good merline is one filled with remorse. I don't know how those sentiments will read in twenty years. In real life I am sure they will command respect, if not attention. In the movies, who knows?

Lady Sings the Blues, at the Uptown is a show-biz biography, and it stands on that old convention four-square, with its arms folded, like the last heir to an old line, which it probably is. In its heart it was made in 1955. But it has an errant eye that keeps winking at you and an undisciplined hand that periodically goes you just to remind that time is a two-way street.

The title "Lady Sings the Blues" comes from Billie Holiday's autobiography. Little else does. I only heard Holiday sing peripherally, and knew nothing about her, but you don't have to know anything about her to know that she was not like that. The movie Billie Holiday is a wide-eyed pickaninny in a cat-house who lands a singing job on the basis of innocence, chutzpah and the singing style of a mature artist. (Such is life in the movies.) On the basis of the singing job she lands a man, a very white black sweetie played by Billy Dee Williams. When he is away she turns to drugs. Presumably, if she could have only recorded right in her kitchen, she would have been alright, but it wasn't to be. Never is. When he is away again, she turns to drugs again. She is one of those tragically monogamous stars who, like spawning salmon, die if separated from their mates.

The real Billie's lovers, other husbands and one-night stands have been jettisoned. This is the revisionist Billie Holiday: more sinned against than sinning.

All this would be nothing to remark on if the movies hadn't changed but they have, and even this movie has, in all its non-essentials. Characters talk about sex like they enjoy it. Whores abound. People, including Billie, swear like Panthers. Racism is acknowledged and railed at. There is a lynching and Ku Klux Klan violence. Some of the dialogue is quite sharp: "Shh", says Richard Prior when a band-leader is proposing a toast to Billie, "Whiteman talking". And there is an absolutely euphoric shot of Billie, sitting on the can in a bra and a tourniquet at total ease on a heroin rush.

Lady Sings the Blues touches home, but that is only one of the bases. For the most part it reeks of Broadway semitism, even to the casting of Sid Melton, the mensh club-owner from the Danny Thomas Show, as the mensh club-owner who discovers Billie Holiday. Was this an in-joke? a reference to film history? Billie is given a pop-talking Jiminy Cricket slide-kick, which is like perching a parrot on a pirate's shoulder. Richard Prior has a great time in the part and I felt like clapping whenever he came back on screen, but the laughter Prior evoked could never completely drown out the creaking and clanking of that old vehicle.

Where did they find the writers for this period piece? Were they retired studio hacks brought back in from the cold as a favour? Were they young Peter Bogdanovitchs, revering the great days of Hollywood and determined to keep them alive? And what of those real (or at least current) touches? Was this a bad script spruced up, or a good one watered down?

Of course, no matter when this movie is spiritually dared, it is great fun, fun when it's good and fun when it's bad. Credit for the good goes in large part to Diana Ross, the one-time Supreme who makes her acting debut as Billie. Ross does not sing the blues, but she does sing with more versatility than I ever imagined. She is also a fetching actress and a joy to watch, a nubile, gawky, wiggly, teasing green stick of a woman. Her scenes with Prior shine with far more light than the picture deserves. Mind you, one doesn't want to be too hard on the makers of a film one enjoyed. The director, Sydney Furie has calmed himself substantially since The Iceberg, and shoots the cliches from their best angles. What has been accomplished has been accomplished with verve.

Firehall's performance doesn't live up to Hébert's poetry

Anna Ferguson as Agnes and John Turnbull as Sebastien in Le Temps Sauvage at Firehall Theatre.

Anna Hébert is one of French Canada's most renowned poets and novelists and the chance to experience her work in translation is a rare treat. Under the direction of John Van Burek, the Firehall Theatre is presenting her play, "Le Temps Sauvage", until December 9th. It is an especially interesting production when seen in conjunction with Michel Tremblay's play, Forever Yours, Marie-Lou, at the Tarragon Theatre. Both plays deal with the ravages of time upon family life and a particular kind of love/hate bitterness centralized in the mother figure. Forever Yours isolates its family in the home territory of an urban milieu for the confrontation with past and present, but the family of Le Temps Sauvage has the even more explicit isolation of a mountain somewhere in northern Quebec.

Here in the wilderness, Agnes, the embattled matriarch, has attempted to keep out the rest of the world so that her children may grow up innocent and free. Her decision, though, is really an escape from truth and a strange kind of justice for an offense committed long ago by her sister, whose funeral she must now attend. She brings back Isabelle, the daughter of her dead sister, and once again the past manifests itself upon the present. Isabelle brings sensually and passion back into a house where there has been "no fruit and no flowers for a long time". The ingrown tightness, the consuming protectiveness of house and mother, are exposed and challenged. Avenues of escape present themselves to the two oldest children, Sebastien and Lucie, who respond to the pull of the outside world.

The play is a poetic drama, an embellishment which sometimes works against the realistic backwoods depiction of a family unexposed to books or even the high language of religion. Anna Ferguson plays Agnes as a strange one-dimensional character, so steeped in histrionic bitterness and martyrdom that it is hard to understand how she came to create a home and five children. The cutting edge of this character is dissatisfying and unresolved. The rest of the family are more credible and humanly felt. Ian Orr is effective as the drone-like, emasculated husband Francois, who responds only to Isabelle's lighter touch, and Susen Morgan builds Lucie into a character of fascination and charm, interacting uniquely with each of the other characters in the play. Judy Darraugh, as Isabelle, cannot really be faulted for her acting but seems miscast as the young and mysterious interloper. Since she commandeers the second part of the play, this presents a serious problem to its overall integrity.

Technically it deserves high praise. Doru Iliu's lighting created several remarkable freeze tableaux and the abstract canvas mural surrounding the set gave a simple illusion of wilderness and enclosure. The physical isolation of the family became very real and at times so did the emotional isolation of Agnes, Francois, Sebastien and Lucie. Unfortunately the play in performance could not sustain the build-up of conflicts necessary to give a dramatic intensity to the resolution. Perhaps Anne Hébert should be read and not seen.

Canadian culture seen through eyes of natives

Who is the Chairman of this Meeting?

Neewin Publishing Co., $2.50

Is this a country or an island, and to whom does it belong? According to Indian belief, "God made this whole island called North America and in the middle of it, he put the Indian. This was supposed to be the Indians' country and he was supposed to live off the deer and live on this land. The land wasn't really his to own; God just kind of loaned it to him. He was supposed to cherish this land like you would cherish your mother. That was the way you were supposed to treat her."

Who is the Chairman of this Meeting?, is a collection of essays written by three Canadian Indians and one white man. Through the essays, the Indians express what it is like to be Indian in a white man's country, a country where once they were sovereign, independent peoples. Sometimes funny, sometimes very sad, the book touches upon various aspects of North American culture and reflects these aspects back to us through the eyes of Indians. Ideas most basic to our civilization become entirely different concepts when considered from the Indian's point of view.

Think of how many times during a day someone asks what time it is, and then imagine a society without clocks. To the Indians, there were good times and bad times. They had "appointments with the earth, with the sun, and with each other, but they kept them as a river flows rather than as a clock ticks." In his essay 'Time', Mr. Pelletier describes the difference between Indian and non-Indian time. "Non-Indians relate to appointments — which, of course, are always in the future. And this creates anxiety. Indians relate to reality — which is only in the present. And this creates conviviality and contentment. I have observed that most non-Indians feel subject to time. Indians tend to feel quite the opposite. Time is at their disposal. Time is subject to them.

This book is an appeal to speak to the white man, not as white man to Indian, but as one person to another. Here the Indian states that only by retaining his very different heritage is he of value to the white culture. They are a separate, a distinct race of people, a race that wants to keep its separateness and individuality. The Indians want to be themselves — a desire which is a basic right of all human beings. White men have taken this right away from the Indian, out have taken it away from themselves as well, and it is upon this issue that the Indian has something to say to the white man.

The Lessons

A tree enters and says with a bow:
I am a tree.
A black tear falls from the sky and says:
I am a bird.

Down a spider's web something like love comes near and says:
I am silence.

But by the blackboard sprawls a national democratic horse in his waistcoat and repeats, pricking his ears on every side, repeats and repeats
I am the engine of history and we all love progress and courage

and the fighter's wrath.

Under the classroom door trickles
a thin stream of blood.

For here begins
the massacre of the innocents.

CHECK IT OUT FOR YOURSELF Experience • Leadership • Record IT ALL ADDS UP TO DAVID CROMBIE FOR MAYOR

CORRA - Confederation of Resident and Ratepayer Associations

The three year voting record shows that Rotenberg voted in support of citizens on 3 of 21 selected issues. Against, 18 times. O'Donohue voted with citizen groups on 5 issues, against on 11, took an intermediate stand twice, was absent 3 times. Crombie supported citizen groups on 18 of the 21 issues, was absent three times.

Toronto Star, Editorial, November 23, 1972

"Certainly, no Torontonians could help be pleased at the image of the Toronto Crombie would create for distinguished visitors and for ordinary people concerned about housing for the poor and environmental protection."

Globe & Mail, Editorial November 18, 1972

"The man who could best serve the needs and desires of Toronto as mayor is David Crombie."

Toronto Life, Ron Haggart

Voting on 26 selected issues of social and political concern, David Crombie's record was 90%, Tony O'Donohue's was 46% (noting "his abysmal attendance record") and David Rotenberg's record was 21%. "Significantly, the three candidates for mayor show up in three categories: David Crombie at the top, Tony O'Donohue in the middle ground, and David Rotenberg among the Old Guard."

THIS IS YOUR CITY-VOTE FOR IT!

NOTE: If you are not on voter's list - you CAN vote simply by attending polling station to vote and affirm that you should be on voter's list.

So much is being said about the need to "get students involved" in the entertainment media that we might be ignoring some intriguing developments that concern Canada's retired population. This important group is undergoing a radical change in image. Fewer active and fulfilled people are giving in to the stereotype created by children and grandchildren.

One indication of the growing interest in their particular needs and tastes: CBC is planning to produce a television series for pensioners. In a detailed questionnaire presently being distributed, CBC asks which personalities they would like to see interviewed, whether they themselves would enjoy participating in such a show, and the like.

You've heard of Opportunities for Youth. Perhaps, though, you haven't heard of New Horizons, the Canadian government's opportunity program for senior citizens. It is run along the same lines as the youth program. Accordingly, applications for funds are piling up as groups are formulating their projects.

One ambitious project calls itself the Jubilee Theatre. Here is a description of its aim as presented in its application to the government:

JTA is to be a professional repertory group providing opportunities for retired actors, writers and production staff to utilize their knowledge and experience for the benefit of both others and themselves... It will develop and produce a series of plays which will be available to groups and organizations without charge. At a later date some public performances may be available to the general public at a nominal charge.

This group is looking for original scripts. The project's co-ordinator, Ann Pollock, says that already Mavor Moore's playwriting class at York University is planning to submit work. Both radio and television networks have expressed interest in the Jubilee Theatre project. (Parties interested in submitting work should call Ann Pollock at 221-5262.)

So, if your parents or grandparents have been asking you where the action is, you might mention that things are looking up.

The East Side Players open their new season with Brandon Behan's bawdy three-act play, The Hostage. It will be presented the weekends of December 1, 2, and 8, 9, at the East York Library Theatre, 170 Memorial Park Ave. Admission is $2.50, $1.50 for students.

Factory Theatre Lab presents a gala festival of short Canadian plays — thirteen plays, thirteen directors, thirteen casts. They will be presented in two different programs opening December 5 and 6. Program one will play Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays, and program two will play Wednesdays, Fridays and Sundays. On December 1, 2, 3, 4 there will be "pay-what-you-can previews" in addition to the regular pay-what-you-can performances every Tuesday and Wednesday. Otherwise, tickets are $3.00. Reservations necessary.

If you're a Hedda Gabbler fan, or if David Gardner's production of Rosmarholm has turned you on to Ibsen (Rosmarholm plays until December 2, by the way), not only has the Colonnade held over the Classical stage production of Hedda, but Toronto Free Theatre opens its production of Hedda Gabbler on Tuesday December 5. Performances are Tuesday through Saturday, Sunday 2:30.

No admission charge.

Godspal still has The Playhouse under its powers. Thara era student rush seats just before curtain time. 1605 Bayview Avenue, south of Eglinton.

Theatre Passe Muraille has just started its run of Pilk's Madhouse, featuring an eloquent lunatic named Henry Pilk: "Who is real in this hall of mirrors?"

Toronto's most prosperous theatres are presently housing past triumphs. O'Keefe Centre offers us The Sound of Music in a "glittering new production". Hall prices for students, children and senior citizens on Wednesday and Saturday matinees. The Royal Alexandra presents Debbie Reynolds in a musical comedy, Ira.

Let us not forget — the UC Playhouse is featuring some off-off Broadway fare. The theatre of Tom O'Horgan and Cate la Mama, New York, introduced a period of experimental theatre which has upset, violated, and sometimes desecrated theatrical traditions with such productions as Tom Palma, Futz, and Hair.

At the UC Playhouse, audiences have suffered much abuse in the name of experimental theatre but Amarica Hurrah is one of the more refreshing pieces we are likely to see this year. If one may term this series of often exciting theatrical constructions a play, Amarica Hurrah is a director's play, and strong directing is what it needs. Director David Dowling uses the eight actors to explore the internal and external realities of human experience. He reminds us how the theatrical medium can effectively portray the many dimensions of life. Dan Lyua. Through Saturday evening. Free admission as usual.

Only God and the Committee for an Independent Canada will understand why this hand-me-down (1949) collection of magazine "think-pieces" deserved republication. Every second essay consists of a string of familiar nationalist homilies — "small thinking" is our national curse; we wear the "stilt white collar" too well, etc. ad nauseam — the kind of well worn platitudes most politicians can dress up and deliver at the drop of an honorary degree or banquet. MacLennan's pieces can only help build a salt-righteous dogooder's nationalism that is in the end politically innocuous.

The rest of the essays in this volume are the kinds of things that a successful novelist writes in his spare time and sands off to magazines so they won't clutter up his novels. There are a few perceptive warnings here about the dehumanizing menace of mass consumerism and some nostalgic notes are struck in two pieces about the author's hometown, Halifax, but on the whole the essays are appallingly disinteresting. For instance, in what might have been a sensitive study of Yousuf Karsh' portrait work, MacLennan can summon up only a frighteningly banal gaze of admiration for the "tense, lonely man" who controlled the destiny of his post-war world. Does he admire Stalin too in the same way? Mussolini? Trudeau?

MacLennan has a properly earned reputation as one of our leading novelists, but this book — well-designed, handsomely bound and reasonably priced as it is — will only diminish his reputation. His respectably faded introduction to the volume is no adequate excuse for the naïveté and mediocrity of what, one assumes, is supposed to pass for a useful contribution to Canadian intellectual life.

When you've listened to any album five times and still can't remember what songs are on it, you know that something's amiss. Carole King's Rhymes & Reasons (A&M), is just that kind of an entirely forgettable record.

Choosing to avoid the instrumental clichés consolidated in her last album, Muscle, Carole has wisely made sparing use of her much over-reted guitarist Danny (Kootch) Kortchmar and strived for subtlety with the addition of strings and brass. But the soft touch, simple melodic structure of the songs and their semeness reduces the mixture to muzak. The songs are once again centered on the sadness theme, that was so successfully and completely explored in Tapstry. But the feeling and sensibility of that album is missing.

Rhymes & Reasons will sell well because it's soft (parents like that), none of the songs are "bad" (just "easy listening"), Ms King is a "star" and mainly because it's the Christmas season. Tapstry is still popular today almost two years after its release but Rhymes & Reasons like the last LP, will probably never be heard a year from now.

Claude Lavalitea, French-Canadian author, composer and singer will be in concert at Massey Hall on Sunday, December 3 at 8:30 pm. Leveillee gained world recognition through his associations with the famed French singer Edith Piaf for whom he also wrote songs. His credits also include film scores, stage and screen roles and even a complete ballet. Tickets are $3 to $5 and are available at La Chasse-Galerie.

A 19 program series on woman begins Monday at 10 pm on CBC-FM. The daily series will deal with woman's roles in society, historical perspectives as well as the treatment of women by men.

Also beginning on Tuesday is a 5 part series of appearances by singer-songwriter-guitar picker, John Hartford at the Riverboat (922-6216).

The Society for Ethnomusicology is hosting a concert by the University of Toronto Symphony Orchestra conducted by Victor Fiedbrill in connection with their annual meeting and relevant papers to be read this week. Some of the works are Lian Ming-yuah's Floating Cloud, Carlos Chaves Sintonia India, John Weinzweig's To the Lands Over Yonder (an Eskimo hunting song for mixed chorus) and pieces by Murray Schatter and Harry Somars. The concert is subtitled, Contemporary Music Based on Non-Western Idioms. It is on December 2 at 8 pm and it is free, no tickets required. A discussion on the theme Contemporary Music and Ethnomusicology is to follow. Several of the composers represented on the program will participate. Fredric Liabarian, Department of Music, University of Maryland, will chair the discussion.

Toronto-born soprano, Joanna Lindstrom will make her professional debut at the St. Lawrence Centre for the Performing Arts December 1, 8:30 pm. The 24-year-old singer will perform works by Haydn, Purcell, Brahms, Wolf and Obradors. Flutist Robert Aitken will accompany her.

The second concert in the Faculty of Music's Sunday Afternoon Series takes place on December 3 at 3 pm. Featured soloists are Lorand Fanyvas, violin, and John Hawkins, piano as well as Vladimir Orloff, cello, and Robert Aitken, fluta. The Faculty of Music Student String Orchestra will also participate. The program is: Georgia Crumb's "Vox Balaanae for Three Masked Players", Prokofiev's sonata for violin and piano, op. 80, and Mozart's fourth violin concerto, K. 218. Student tickets are $2.

On December 3, the Scarborough Sunday Concerts Series hosts the Talamann Quartet in works from the baroque and modern eras. Sandra Watts plays oboe, Emily Rizner, fluta, Nancy Antonacci, piano and Margaret Waail, cello. Concert is at 3:30 pm and admission is free.

On December 3 at 2:03 pm on CBC-FM Radio Symphony Hall, Lukas Foss will conduct the Montreal Symphony in Mozart's piano concert no. 27, with Nicolai Petrov (who was at the St. Lawrence Centre last night); Wagner's "Prelude to Tristan and Isolde", Ives' "Unanswered Question", and Foss' own composition, "Baroque Variations on Themes by Handel, Scarlatti, and Bach".

In December, the Deer Park Church on St. Clair will present Bach's Christmas Oratorio. The chorus will be provided by the church choir; the orchestra is Victor Martin's chamber players, and soloists are Linda Culham, Shirley Dillon, Wolfgang Oestle, John Doglington. Student price for Saturday evening at 8:30 is $2.

Garlic soup: yes, garlic soup. Very simple, inordinately cheap, and people will never know. Take two heads of garlic (yes, heads of garlic, not cloves of garlic). Separate into cloves, and whack them with a mallet or the side of a cleaver to break skin. Drop all those cloves into about four cups of boiling water. You could use chicken stock, but thrifty Provencal housewives would make rude comments about you if they saw. Drop into the pot as well as a bay leaf, some parsley sprigs, some thyme, a strip of orange peel and maybe even a clove (a raat clove).

Simmer that away for half an hour to forty-five minutes. Meantime, put some egg yolks in a bowl (three egg yolks are a good number), beat them vigorously with a whisk, then, still whisking like hell, dribble in a quarter cup of olive oil.

Strain all the solid bits out of the soup, taste it, and perk it up with salt, paprika, and maybe a dash of cayenne or tabasco. If you like truly Mediterranean verva in your suppers. Whisking again, dribble about a cup of soup into the mayonnaise mixture (that's the egg yolks and oil) then reverse the process and whisk all that back into the soup. Pour over slices of toasted french bread in bowls and sprinkle everything with parsley. Good stuff.

had been no violation of democratic procedures. He charged that Zeitlin was using "petty constitutionalism" to disallow the election because of minor points which in no way affected the outcome of the elections.

He viewed it as an attempt by faculty conservatives and Zeitlin to prevent the assembly from implementing decisions opposed by a group of faculty members who dislike the effects of democratization on the department.

The assembly consists of all sociology faculty and an equal number of students. It chooses the members of all departmental committees on a staff-student parity basis, and is responsible for setting policy.

Under university rules, however, final responsibility for all decisions made by a department still rests with the chairman. It was under this provision that Zeitlin was able to call off the meeting. Although the assembly is constitutionally required to meet at least three times yearly, it met only twice in 1971-72. Students have been pressing for the assembly to meet as soon as possible to implement the last meeting's decision to accept staff-student parity on the department's staffing committee and to elect the student members. Students charge that the fact that it has not met for nine months represents an attempt to prevent the decision from being implemented.

They point out that the action was taken unilaterally by Zeitlin, without even consulting the executive committee, who, according to the departmental constitution are supposed to make all major decisions between assembly meetings. According to the students on the executive, the executive meeting called to discuss the agenda for the assembly meeting was presented instead with Zeitlin's letter unilaterally calling it off. The action, according to a member of the committee, was presented as "fait accompli"; the committee was not given an opportunity to endorse or reject Zeitlin's decision.

Zeitlin told The Varsity last night that as far as he was concerned there was "absolutely no truth" to claims that his action was politically motivated. He seemed surprised and annoyed that word of the affair had leaked out, and said that as far as he was concerned it was "an internal matter" for the department: "no one else's business".

He refused to discuss the facts of the situation.

Zeitlin said that the executive had "endorsed" his decision. When contacted, however, other members of the executive all said that no vote on the matter had taken place. They also pointed out that the executive had as yet received no report from the elections committee on which to base its consideration of the question.

The GSA spokesman suggested that conservative faculty were pushing the department "to the right". What they wanted, he charged, was "the complete dismissal of students from decision-making in the department". Effectively postponing the assembly for another two months, he said, would help them tighten their hold.

Zeitlin has been with the department only since July 1. His appointment as chairman was favoured by students, who considered him relatively progressive. They now fear that they may have made a mistake, but still hope that he can be brought to reverse his stand.

Blues bunt Rams 99-73 in first win

By BOB PRITCHARD

Basketball Blues picked up their first two points of the season Wednesday evening, romping over Ryerson Rams 99-73 in a game spoiled by 52 fouls.

Not until the final 10 minutes of the first half did Blues begin to amass their 26 point game lead.

Blues started the game in a man to man defence against the Ryerson 2-1-2 zone. For the first time this season the Toronto players had a considerable height advantage over their opponents and although Ryerson fought well under the boards, the taller Blues quickly put an 8-2 lead on the scoreboard.

However, some lapses in the Toronto defence allowed Rams to penetrate, and two minutes later Ryerson had taken the lead, 12-11. Rams might have gone even further ahead had the team members taken some shots when they had the chance; but they passed or dribbled the ball too often.

Soon after McManus brought in his regulars but Ryerson still managed to contain Blues for awhile with the help of its full court press.

Varsity began to gain and picked up most of its points by getting the ball up the floor before Ryerson could move into its regular defence from the press. At the 14 minute mark of the half Blues were ahead 36-25 and by the time the teams went into the changerooms at the half Toronto had increased the score to 53-31.

Even though Blues were on the better side of a 22 point lead going into the second half Toronto was not playing its best game. McManus himself admitted that players were "off and on" throughout the game.

Varsity did hit an improved 41 per cent from the floor, but Ryerson hit 55 per cent by comparison. Toronto outrebounded Rams 23-12 in the initial 20 minutes but that is understandable with the height advantage team players enjoyed. A noticeable improvement was Blues' performance from the foul line, where they hit 61 per cent.

But Toronto would have been much further ahead of Rams had team members kept their heads up more often. On several occasions Blues guards got tied up when pressed, simply because they didn't see the open men on the floor. Varsity managed to overcome this situation against Ryerson, but it wouldn't have been so easy against a better team.

The second half was somewhat disorganized. Both teams moved the ball quickly down the floor — sometimes too quickly, resulting in turnovers. Blues put on a half court press, which led to several (10 second line) over and back violations by the Ryerson team. When Rams eventually managed to get the ball into Toronto's zone, they usually found themselves closely covered by two or three Blues.

Twenty-four fouls were called and, combined with the enthusiastic but noisy Ryerson fans, the game sometimes got out of hand.

Ryerson coach Ed DeAmeron was often annoyed by the refereeing and finally became frustrated enough to tell the ref to "quit picking his nose and watch the game for a change."

But Rams never really threatened Blues and the Ryerson club had to be content with preventing Varsity from scoring a century as Blues went on to win 99-73.

One fact that can't be taken away from Blues was their hustle. Toronto played a tough game under the boards and frequently it wasn't until the third or fourth effort on a rebound that Blues scored.

Toronto's Brian Skyvington was a good example, as he put in 24 points with some aggressive play. Dave Watt was good for 16 points, while Glen Scott contributed 14. In fact, all but one Varsity player got on the scoreboard.

Tip Offs: Blues meet Carleton (fourth place finishers in the Eastern Section last year) tomorrow at 2 pm in the Benson Building. Ravens finished four points ahead of Blues in the standings last year.... Ravens will have Lorne Bowles — third leading scorer in the east last year, and member of the all-star team — with them again this season... The season is young and already Blues are running into injuries. Bob Annis is no longer with the team due to back trouble and Rich Kurczyk broke his ankle in last Saturday's game against Mac. Rick Hollowell has only played one game due to illness, while Randy Filinski, playing with a heavily-banded leg (but still averaging 10 points per game) re-injured his leg in Wednesday's game, and he might be lost after Christmas if an operation is required... Evidently Toronto coach McManus was not overly worried by the Ryerson ball club, since four of the five team members in the opening lineup were not his usual starters.

Gymnasts at York for opener

The Varsity gymnastics team begins its competitive season tomorrow evening at the York University invitational.

This weekend Blues are matched against McMaster and York, last year's national champion team. Toronto is in the Western Section of the OUAA for gymnastics competition along with Western, McMaster, and Guelph, while the Eastern Section includes Ottawa, Queen's, York, and Carleton.

Julio Roncon will be coaching a full lineup of gymnasts this year in all six events for the first time in several years. Only Al Forest is missing from the lineup this year, but his continuous presence as coach adds to the unity and determination of the squad.

No less than four new gymnasts have gained positions and the four senior members have all improved during the summer. Rookies Rick Jeysman, Brian Euler, and Arnold Bishop will compete in six events — floor, pommel horse, rings, vaulting, parallel bars, and high bar.

Brian Alcock (floor, vaulting), and John Kelly

(rings, parallel bars) should add points in their specialized events. Both Al Swett and team captain Gary Wicks have re-designed and improved their routines for the upcoming competition.

On an individual basis, McMaster's Olympic competitor Steve Mitruik, Yeomen's Dave Hunter, and Toronto's Hans Frick will probably do battle for top honours. A strong contender for membership on Canada's team to the Student World Games this spring, Frick is regaining his championship form after a year of injuries.

The women's Varsity gymnastics team will also compete tomorrow against York and Southern Illinois Universities. The York team has four Olympic gymnasts as members, while the Southern Illinois team is the top squad in the United States.

The meet starts at 6:30 tomorrow in the Tait McKenzie building on York's main campus. Admission price is $1 with a student card, $2 to the general public. York coach Tom Zivic hopes to take his team to Europe later on in the academic year.

Marchers commemorate 1837 rebellion

Members of the Anti-Imperialist Day Committee met at City Hall Square on Saturday to commemorate the 135th anniversary of the 1837 rebellion.

In December, 1837, the rebels, under the leadership of William Lyon Mackenzie, marched down Yonge Street to liberate the city. Blacksmith Samuel Lount and farmer Peter Matthews, both represented in costume here, were subsequently executed for their part in the uprisings.

The Anti-Imperialist Committee marched to the graves of these two to lay wreaths.

UBC forms committee to hear student demands

VANCOUVER (CUP) — In a general meeting dealing with arts students' demands for representation, University of British Columbia (UBC) students elected six representatives last Thursday to meet with the arts faculty in a special meeting to discuss their demands.

The students, three men and three women, will speak at a special faculty meeting December 13 called to deal with the resolution on student representation passed at the recent student-faculty ad hoc meeting.

The upcoming meeting was one of two called by arts dean Doug Kenny to deal with business held over from the faculty meeting cancelled November 23.

The meeting was cancelled following the entrance of 150 arts students who came to press for representation of faculty committees.

A December 6 meeting will hear notice of the students' motion by Anthropology Professor Bill Wilcott. His motion calls for student representation at all faculty levels and formation of a student-faculty committee to look into the question.

If the December 13 faculty meeting passes the resolution, the six student representatives present will form the student portion of the committee. The six students were elected by 250 of the original 300 students who attended the November 30 meeting.

Much of the meeting time was spent discussing student parity.

Students were justified in invading the faculty meeting after receiving the run-around for two years, one student said. However, he cautioned students not to spoil it by being unreasonable.

Alma mater society treasurer David Dick, speaking against parity, urged students to disassociate power and parity.

"The faculty won't accept parity. Let's not cut our throats," he said.

A large majority of students, however, demanded the elected representatives press for parity, and a vote on the question passed overwhelmingly.

Student senator Don Roberts cautioned students to be aware of "moderates" since students are in for a bargaining session.

One unidentified student asked the audience members to consider themselves a legislature. "Let the faculty of arts do the paper work and then bring their proposals to the student body to have it approved," he said.

A motion amending the ad hoc committee's resolution to include staff members was also passed by a large majority.

Another motion from the floor called for approval in principle of equal representation of men and women at all levels of decision-making bodies. This motion provoked brief controversy but was later passed.

Work groups are being established to prepare practical solutions to the problems which students experience and to submit ideas to the faculties, AUS (Arts Union of Students) president Brian Loomes said.

The areas of study are: evaluation of students, hiring, firing and tenure, the nature of students at UBC, the classroom as being oppressive, new programs, work load and erotic oppression.

One of the students working on the sub-committees said he thought the meeting had accomplished some good and urged students to keep struggling against the ideological conditions at the university.

Interdisciplinary Studies students and staff Friday afternoon decided to fight for their department's survival despite administrative inaction which may sound the department's death knell.

By so doing, they rejected retiring department chairman Geoffrey Payzant's proposal that they accept their fate and look for new homes for their innovative courses in the university's colleges. Payzant had called the meeting, but when the crucial vote came no one opposed the motion and only three people, including non-voting meeting chairman Payzant, abstained.

The 80 people present proceeded to appoint a four-person committee to work towards their goal by ensuring that administration of the department continues and sufficient operating funds are obtained. Innis College principal Peter Russell, sociology and Interdisciplinary Studies professor Tony Smith, arts and science curriculum committee member Seymour Kanowitch, Interdisciplinary Studies Women's course teacher Kay Armata were named to the committee.

The students and staff debated the merits of various proposals for over three hours before finalizing their course of action, but there never was any doubt that they would resist the move to shut down the department.

The meeting agreed that before attempting to mobilize students and staff to picket in support of the need for the department to exist, the more acceptable lobbying path should be followed.

Payzant remained skeptical about prospects for success throughout the meeting. We've tried before without positive results, he told the meeting, reminiscent of his memorandum detailing unsuccessful efforts to ensure the department's continued survival.

Payzant had concluded the department was doomed when Faculty of Arts and Science dean Bob Greene told him that he had not yet established a search committee to pick Payzant's successor because the department's future form was uncertain.

Payzant was doubly convinced that it would be impossible for Interdisciplinary Studies to carry on because the new chairman, should one be appointed, would be unnamed when various departments within the faculty compete for the limited budget funds within the new few weeks.

But, that was not the only evidence on which Payzant and his colleagues determined what was in store for their department. Just the week before, the Faculty of Arts and Science's curriculum committee and two senior administrative officers had disputed for the time Interdisciplinary's departmental status.

And, an Interdisciplinary Studies brief detailing the department's "struggle for survival", sent to top administrators last spring, evoked virtually no response.

Nonetheless, president John Evans Thursday night maintained that he didn't "attach any symbolism" to the inaction which led Payzant to conclude the program was to be scrapped.

Vice-president and provost Don Forster said that in his opinion "this area (Interdisciplinary Studies) will expand." He wouldn't guess whether it would do so as a separate department or within the college system.

"Interdisciplinary Studies," according to a press release prepared by its survival committee, "is important as it evaluates and co-ordinates course offerings, and allocates money among competing courses." Functions the committee maintains would not be adequately executed if the courses were to be taken over by the colleges.

Political economy professor Abe Rotstein, a staff member for the Interdisciplinary's Modernization and Community course, called Payzant's proposals to merely seek college sponsors for the department's courses too hasty. "No reasonable plan could be arranged for changing the present arrangement for next fall," he told The Varsity yesterday.

Rotstein suggested that the program go ahead as is for the next academic year while discussions about arrangements with appropriate safeguards to ensure continuation of innovative courses under any new system went on.

Like many of his Interdisciplinary colleagues, he feared inadequate safeguards could mean that experimental courses would not continue if the more traditional colleges and departments were given unfettered control of the courses' future.

We're not ready for a "fire sale" of Interdisciplinary Studies yet, he told the meeting.

Russell was less concerned with the specific form the department would take in the future than with guaranteeing the continued existence of its innovative courses. But, he maintains that "something has to carry on the activity" Payzant's department was handling.

"I had the sense," he said, "that unless someone spoke up soon Interdisciplinary Studies would get much more of the (budget squeeze than other departments."

However, Russell suggests that Interdisciplinary Studies may well need a base broader than that provided by the arts and science faculty. "One faculty is too narrow," he noted, and innovative courses should be connected more directly to the colleges.

Victoria College philosophy professor Bill Harvey advocated fighting to at least "hold the line" with Interdisciplinary Studies, arguing "on grounds of sanity". He conceded administrators are often not moved by such arguments.

It would be "pretty damn difficult" to insist upon formal department status while the arts and science faculty equally maintained the department never had it, he noted. However, Interdisciplinary certainly could point to its "squatters' rights", he observed.

Harvey feared that Interdisciplinary's innovative courses might find themselves homeless should the department's courses be let loose for bidding by the colleges. Quite possibly, he pointed out, these colleges steeped in their vested interests in straight courses would just salvage the more traditional Interdisciplinary offerings.

He saw some hope that the Inter-Colleges Committee, composed of the principals of the university's colleges and the university president, might assume responsibility for co-ordinating Interdisciplinary Studies.

But, he was quick to observe, there's no way that the federated colleges could take over the Interdisciplinary courses without increased provincial funding. (Federated colleges receive substantially less financing from the provincial government than the university and affiliated colleges.)

Arts and science associate dean James Cruise, chairman of the Interdisciplinary Studies curriculum committee, told The Varsity last night that no decision to scrap the department or cut off funding had been taken.

As for the budget, he said, the faculty has yet to find out what money it'll get for the next fiscal year. (Although the university's top level, administrator-Governing Council budget committee has finished drafting its recommendations, the budget still has to wind its way through the Governing Council's Planning and Resources Committee, Business Affairs Committee and Committee of the Whole before it's finalized.)

Beals assails Zeitlin's Soc. election veto

The resigning chairman of the sociology elections committee has fully repudiated the charges of department chairman Irving Zeitlin, who last week voided all student assembly members' elections on grounds of "elections irregularities".

In an open letter to sociology staff and students, Ralph Beals states that as chairman of the committee responsible for organizing elections to the department's governing assembly, "I deny the truth of all the charges which were levelled" by Zeitlin.

Zeitlin had claimed that two students who were neither elected by the assembly nor chosen by the executive "made basic decisions in the elections committee regarding the distribution of (assembly) seats" and acted as electoral officers in an election in which they ran and won.

Beals' letter counters that "the two students charged did not determine election committee policy, nor did they serve as electoral representatives (those responsible for the actual conduct of the elections in the classrooms). They were, therefore, eligible for nomination and election to the departmental assembly."

The two students, Bob Storey and Lorne Richmond, had pointed out that since both had been acclaimed, neither could have acted as "electoral officers" in their own elections.

On the basis of his charges, Zeitlin had used his ultimate power as chairman to declare the elections void without receiving formal approval from the assembly's executives.

He also unilaterally cancelled the tonight's scheduled meeting of the assembly, which has parity representation from faculty and students. (The assembly met only twice in 1972-73 and has not yet met this year, although it constitutionally must meet three times each year.)

Outraged students, who originally announced they would proceed with the assembly meeting as scheduled in spite of Zeitlin calling it off, later said the meeting would be an open meeting of the assembly's student caucus to discuss possible courses of action. It will take place in room 229 in the Borden Building at 7:30 pm tonight.

Beals went further in the letter, explaining that he had resigned as elections committee chairman "to underline my disagreement with the charges." However he asserted that he is convinced that students should continue to work within the assembly even though Zeitlin had overruled its process.

He added that "I can only thank (Richmond and Storey) for the substantial time and energy which they... contributed in good faith."

SAC finance commissioner resigns

By BOB BETTSON

Vince De Angelo resigned Thursday as SAC finance commissioner over a disagreement with the SAC executive on the necessity of hiring an executive assistant.

De Angelo (II SMC), said the resignation would be effective January 15 so SAC would have time to find a successor.

He called the executive decision to hire an executive assistant "a ridiculous and ludicrous attempt to rationalize a blatantly personal decision" in a letter sent to his fellow executive members.

At the centre of the controversy is longtime U of T student politician Paul Carson, who was hired by the executive after working as communications and services field worker since September. Carson had earlier been the executive assistant in the summer, before the job was left temporarily vacant.

Carson had no comment on the decision. However he said that the job was not superfluous, because of research assignments handed to him on Thursday by SAC president Eric Miglin. De Angelo resigned the same day, after arguing against the move in the executive meeting.

Carson also maintains that the necessity of finding someone to run the SAC pub, along with the extra work needed, provides ample justification for hiring additional staff. The executive has hired Rycerson Student Peter Milic to replace Carson in his old post of field worker.

Although De Angelo said that the resignation had "nothing personal to do with Carson," he called the decision "dishonest, unethical and blatant act of pork-barrel politics."

He said he was also upset about several other office hassles and procedural disagreements. De Angelo charged that SAC was being "irresponsible" in its allocation of student funds.

"For a ticket which ran on a 'reasonable and common sense' platform, I consider this type of action even more indefensible," he added in the letter.

De Angelo charged that the decision amounted to "hiring a person, then finding work for him to do".

Miglin said last night that while he could "appreciate his being upset about something being passed which he did not agree with", De Angelo's resignation "appears to be an over-reaction."

The reasons De Angelo advanced seemed to be contradictory, Miglin thought. "It's hard to understand why he resigned."

Communications commissioner Debora Lewis, in a letter to De Angelo, takes exception to his charges that the hiring was dishonest and unethical. He might legitimately have contended the decision was unwise, she said last night, "but saying it was dishonest is going too far."

Our Mistake

A page one Friday Varsity story inadvertently attributed remarks by Innis College principal Peter Russell to U of T vice-president and provost Don Fortser.

Russell, not Fortser, had commented that the future of Interdisciplinary Studies language courses is not "in great jeopardy." "What we're worried about are those (courses) not connected with departments," he continued. "They're the things that might be squeezed out of existence."

Fortser, in comments deleted from the article for space reasons, has said that in his opinion "this area (Interdisciplinary Studies) will expand". He wouldn't hazard a guess as to whether it would do so as a separate department or within the college system, suggesting arts and science dean Bob Greene would be the more appropriate person to question about that.

Development is key issue

Bitter election fight ends in Ward 7

By DOUG HAMILTON

The titanic struggle between pro and anti-development forces in Ward 7 concludes with today's election. Nowhere in the city has the fight between the two camps been more hostile.

For more than a month,

Jaffary topped the polls slightly ahead of Sewell. Rotenberg trailed 2,000 votes behind Sewell in third spot.

Ward 7 is a predominantly working class constituency bordered by Sherbourne and Bloor Streets, Logan Avenue, and the lakefront.

In the late 1960's, citizens in the Donmount area at Dundas and Broadview fought an attempt by the City to promote urban renewal. After a prolonged struggle, the city won and built some low-rise apartments on the site after wholesale expropriation of the area.

Citizens also fought the city over urban renewal in the Trefann Court district of the Queen, Shuter, Parliament and River Streets block. The battle lasted for several years, but the city was eventually forced to formulate an area plan for redevelopment including provisions for citizen participation in the planning process, but only after much of the community had been destroyed.

The harsh treatment meted out by the city to Trefann residents propelled Sewell into politics. Working as a lawyer and community organizer in Trefann Court, Sewell became concerned over the methods used by the city to expropriate homes, and its tolerance of slum landlords who permitted working class communities to deteriorate.

When interviewed by The Varsity, Sewell was reluctant to discuss in depth his early organizing experiences in Trefann. "I've been through that... so many times," he sighed. "It's all in my book."

In his book, Up against City Hall, Sewell states that he "saw little hope of any sort of further organizing being worthwhile unless a direct attack was made on existing politicians".

He believes that an alderman should help organizers in the community because an elected official can bestow a mantle of legitimacy upon them.

"Being an alderman, I felt, would overcome problems of legitimacy. I as an alderman or some other organizer who could say he was working for me could go into a community with an almost built-in legitimacy."

Sewell's dishevelled appearance, his sarcastic wit, and his theatrical antics in the council chamber have made his name a household word across the city.

His candour at council meetings has disturbed and enraged most of his pro-development colleagues who constitute the Old Guard.

Ward 10 alderman Paul Pickett once implied that Sewell was an anarchist and former Ward 2 alder-

The Varsity that he "couldn't have done much more" over the last three years and asserted that he is "generally happy with the way things are going."

Asked if his strategy would change, if a majority reform council was returned, Sewell replied, "I aldermanic incumbents John Sewell and Karl Jaffary have conducted a running battle with pro-development challengers Richard Kirkup and Sam Rotenberg. Several confrontations between Sewell, Jaffary, and Kirkup have occurred at all-candidates meetings throughout the ward and many bitter words have been exchanged between the three men who hold radically different philosophies on urban politics.

Besides the race between the incumbents and the two paramount challengers, Sewell and Jaffary have been vying for the top aldermanic post which brings with it a seat on Metro Council. In the 1969 contest,

For several years, middle class professionals have been renovating homes in the area, thus displacing many blue-collar workers in the Don Vale district in the Parliament-Wellesley area.

In the Ward's north-west corner, the Meridian building group erected the mammoth St. James Town apartment complex which accommodates over 12,000 young, middle class tenants.

The inroads made by the middle class and the developers has provoked many battles between angry tenants and homeowners in City Hall and on the streets of the ward.

John Sewell has led the fight against high-rise development for the last three years. He may top the Ward 7 poll.

man Allan Lampert hurled such epithets at him as "kook," "communist", and "cry-baby."

But, despite his indulgence in guerrilla theatre, Sewell has been the de facto leader of the city hall reformers and has taken most of the verbal abuse from developers and their political collaborators.

His vociferous attacks on the Old Guard have earned him several expulsions from council, and Ward 6 alderman Horace Brown physically assaulted him when angered by a Sewell remark.

Sewell believes his provocative tactics have been successful. He told won't have to use the tactics I've been using". He said the work-load could be more evenly distributed among the reformers if they obtained a majority, whereas at present much of the work is borne by two or three specific personalities.

Although he claims to represent working-class constituents at City Hall, Sewell has been assailed by a prominent Toronto unionist who accused him of neglecting labour's interests.

Don't can Interdisc

Nobody's admitting they know much about what's happening to Interdisciplinary Studies these days, but you can be sure that things aren't just falling into place neatly themselves.

Hidden behind all those platitudes about caring about innovative and experimental courses are the minds that drew up the blueprints for dismantling the Faculty of Arts and Science's awkward stepchild. Tight budgets should hit all departments evenly, but the word's out that Interdisciplinary is about to get chopped to make way for the more traditional courses.

True enough, top administrators have encouraged the university's colleges to take over the courses. Encouraged might be too gentle a word; It's been suggested in the university's academic haunts that the colleges were warned by the top man that they'd better prove their worth if they didn't want a fate similar to that of Interdisciplinary Studies. And, so the talk goes, interdisciplinary courses might be just what the president ordered.

The colleges, cautioned or not, are in no position to take over many of the department's offerings. The federated colleges have been plagued by inadequate financing for years, and, if anything, things will be tougher this coming fiscal year. So, only a dreamer would imagine that they're about to rush at the chance to shelve some of their own courses taught by their own faculty to give a home to new courses. Especially not the conservative colleges which have most often frowned at the Interdisciplinary course offerings, only willing to tolerate them because they had little choice.

Even were they to have the necessary money, the unsympathetic colleges would almost certainly adopt the more traditional courses, leaving the more exciting, innovating, unorthodox ones homeless. And, these the courses which have made the greatest contribution to expanding the university's horizons.

Divided among the colleges, the Interdisciplinary courses would not complement each other, nor, without appropriate safeguards — safeguards which cannot be devised overnight to meet the university's sudden desire to scrap the department —, would there be any guarantee that the new and untried would get a chance. Available financial resources would not necessarily go to the most deserving, but to the courses which happened to find favour with a college with the money to finance it.

And, given that president John Evans apparently wants the various colleges to develop distinctive personalities which would attract students interested in their offerings, what provision would be made for the students who, wishing to utilize the freedom granted them by the New Program, wanted to sample a variety of relatively unrelated courses offered by different colleges?

Interdisciplinary Studies staff and students have organized to resist the administration's death lunge at their department. Their action, hopefully, will make the administration stop for a second and reconsider their ill-prepared, unjustified plans to scrap the program. There can be no justification for callously jeopardizing one of the most valuable assets of the arts and science faculty.

If, indeed, the administrators think they have a case for dividing the department up among the colleges, then let them have the courage to impose a moratorium on their plans until they have tried to convince the staff and students of the merit of their case, rather than trying to sneak it by. If they can't win the students and staff to their position, we'd argue they ought not tamper with the program.

As associate arts and science dean James Cruise said, "What we have to be sensitive to is student need". Let's start asking students what they want.

Just under 1,000 of them chose Interdisciplinary Studies courses this year.

Zeitline should repeal decision

Ironically, the man undergraduate and graduate students unanimously endorsed as their choice for sociology department head has become the person to suspend the rights of the department's governing assembly.

That's what Irving Zeitlin's unilateral action in overturning the election of all undergraduate assembly representatives and calling off today's scheduled assembly meeting amounts to.

Zeitlin claimed "fundamental violations of constitutional and democratic procedures" during undergraduate elections made the undergrad reps' election "null and void".

The man who should know, elections committee chairman Ralph Beals, has repudiated Zeitlin's charges in a public letter to staff and students in the department, resigning from the committee in protest.

He refutes each of Zeitlin's allegations charge by charge as today's page three story shows.

Zeitlin owes his department and the students concerned a profound apology, a guarantee that lapses into similar arbitrary decisions will not re-occur, and repeal of his unwarranted actions.

If he doesn't act, arts and science dean Bob Greene or university president John Evans should step in to remedy the situation.

Zeitlin is wrong. Justice must be restored. No more need be said.

The New Program: where it's at Part I: Critics 'suspect' standards fell

Acting upon a recommendation of the Faculty of Arts and Science's General Committee, president John Evans last summer appointed a committee to review the New Program. Introduced in the fall of 1969, the New Program replaced arts and science's general and honours courses programs with a more flexible course of study leading to either a three or four year degree. Reducing class size and shifting emphasis to tutorials and essays were among the principal objectives of the change.

The Varsity today begins its own study of the New Program: its strengths, weaknesses, and how it's affecting the people studying and teaching under it. The series will continue in the new year.

By ELAINE KAHN

Despite conservative faculty fears that introduction of the Faculty of Arts end be resolved by bringing back the old programs. Rather, she believes each department has to become comfortable with the New Program and arrive at an understanding of the dynamics of releasing the previous restraints on evaluation and course selection.

She noted that some people are worried about a decline in standards because there is no point now where a department sits down and looks at the entire pattern of the student's work to give him or her an overall assessment.

History department chairman J. B. Conacher, last year's president of the U of T Faculty Association and formerly a key figure in mobilizing conservative teaching staff against student demands he saw as undermining the university's standards, maintained he's primarily worried about this same anonymity in New Program specialization, with some form of non-numerical grading being used for his other courses. The associate dean says that a 100-point scale does not really convey useful information, but that a grading between, for example, an A and a B, is a reliable distinction.

Instituting the New Program brought a change from marks based heavily on exams to marks with little emphasis on exams, but much more on essays and seminars. In many courses, exams have been abolished.

Conway said the question of exams has resurfaced, especially in large survey courses, due to increasing plagiarism of essays. These courses are taught largely by graduate students who are unable, because of the sheer size of the class, to get to know each student personally and thereby determine whether or not the Russell stated that not all university education, however, is professionally-oriented because not all students are using it for vocational aims. He defended the right of the university to be innovative and said that "a good calendar should be an exciting recipe book."

Conway maintained that she would be much happier if she had the sense of great student innovation in planning individual programs. She blamed students' failure to innovate partially on conservative academic tastes they bring with them from high school.

She feels five courses a year is too heavy a load. Students have no time to do the essays and the extra reading they may wish to do. Therefore, they tend to take courses which reinforce each other, rather than branching out into new areas.

Foley stated that interdisciplinary courses are one of the better things to have emerged from the New Program because topics of study that could never have fitted into the previous defined streams of study can now be offered.

Conway is favour of the interdisciplinary approach to social science, but feels there is great difficulty in setting up a good course. People giving the course should work with each other for a few years to ensure the melding of the information from their fields into a cohesive informative unit. Often, the students are presented with unrelated chunks of information if the course is set up too quickly. And, this is not truly interdisciplinary, Russell agreed.

Conway said that it is unfortunate that many of the interdisciplinary courses which have tried to be innovative and have not succeeded very well have also tried to be innovative in their method of evaluation. This has led to scepticism and a loss of respect for these courses on the part of both faculty and students concerning the stringency of their evaluation. Conway does not see any necessary relationship between innovative courses and the stringency of evaluation.

Foley stated that many people involved in interdisciplinary courses pay special attention to standards because they realize the courses do not fit into some people's ideas of what is academic.

She feels that departmental inertia, not hostility, is the factor preventing these courses from being integrated into regular program structures. Departments under the old program had a clear idea of the structure of their disciplines. Their past histories made it difficult for them to respond quickly to the potentials of the New Program, but Foley feels this will change with time.

Conacher agreed interdisciplinary courses make sense, but maintained they should be based departmentally. He did say, however, "Some of the courses seem very doubtful as university courses." He reports he has been told that many students, at the end of four years, find they don't have enough direction and he suggested that a more structured device than the New Program is needed. He also mentioned the "unhealthy" danger of overspecialization that is also contained in the freedom of New Program course choice.

Conacher stated that he was not suggesting that the university revert to the old program, but merely that the Macpherson report be carefully reconsidered. The New Program follows proposals laid down in the Allen Report; the Macpherson report was its somewhat more rigid predecessor.

Political theorist C. B. Macpherson, chairman the committee that produced the Macpherson report, was asked whether he thought standards have been affected by the institution of the New Program. He said that it is difficult to judge because opinion seems to be based on random impression. Every effort was made in the proposals outlined by the report to prevent a decline in standards.

"My own impression after two years of teaching undergraduate courses under the New Program is that standards have not gone down," he concluded.

Computerized New Program introduced myriad of course combinations. Arts and science timetables plastered walls of Sid Smith foyer. A tide of student complaints about timetable errors and the impersonal computer accompanied the change from honours-general to New Program.

Science's less orthodox New Program has sent U of T's academic standards on a downward spiral, there seems to be no widespread support for a return to the rigidity of the old honours-general course distinctions. Instead, New Program critics are apparently pushing for modifications in the program that will overcome their objections.

And, arts and science associate dean Joan Foley pointed out, the facilitator of the faculty's programs stemmed from the report of a committee committed to raising academic standards and enriching the quality of university experience for students enrolled in general courses.

The program broke down the discriminating lines between honours and general students and creates a greater mix of professors. Consequently, it has become difficult for students specializing in a particular area to concentrate as heavily as their honours course predecessors could.

Under the honours program, all students in a subject area arrived at fourth year with a uniformity of background knowledge. This supposedly led to more erudite seminars in fourth year because there was not the mix of backgrounds found in New Program classes.

U of T Internal relations vice-president designate Jill Conway, however, credits this mix with creating stimulating classes in her Topics in the History of Women course. The conflict of scholarship versus stimulation is probably central to the issues surrounding the New Program.

Foley doesn't think the situation could evaluation. He suspects there has been some falling off of standards, but admits that this feeling only comes from impressions that are difficult to prove.

Conacher says he doesn't know whether this decline in standards is due to the New Program or to something that caused the program itself. He does feel that the tendency to let each student "do his own thing" results in an inevitable loosening of standards.

Innis College principal Peter Russell described a "world-wide merk inflation", though one would assume that the distribution of intelligence in the populace has remained stable. Conway agreed.

She stated that, when she came to the university in 1964, it was "assumed that only a very special person would get first class standing". Very few firsts were given out. However, there was a large group of students with very high seconds. These students are now being given firsts and, Conway says, the difference in academic excellence between these two groups of students is negligible, so that no drop in standards can be attributed to this change.

Because of society's demands that the university provide "certified" people, however, she said that more than a pass-fail system is necessary for evaluation.

Foley contended that a pass-fail system is difficult to institute in North American universities because graduate schools find it difficult to judge admissions on this basis. They are not accustomed to it.

She suggests pass-fail could be used for courses outside a student's area of essays are genuine. Exams in these courses would subject everyone to the same test.

Russell felt that bringing exams back to cope with the plagiarism problem is too simple a solution. Exams produced students who crammed, regurgitated facts and a short time later knew nothing about the topic. Essays require a student to think a problem through over an extended period of time. He will learn and remember more. If he does the work himself.

Russell suggested a partial solution would involve having smaller classes and a larger number of small, personal assignments to enable the professor to become familiar with the work of each student and determine the authenticity of essays.

He said that students today are less passive about their education. They no longer have the "two-bucket notion of education" when they enter university, that they are empty buckets waiting to be filled by the great knowledge of the professors. However, the outside world has old-fashioned ideas about the areas of study that must be included in a university education. Russell feels the university is usually at least 10 years ahead of the public in its thinking.

Meanwhile, he noted, students trying to get into conservative areas of employment, such as medicine and law; play it safe by avoiding any courses that won't be recognized as immediately valid by their prospective employer or graduate school. They do not experiment with the innovative courses offered at the university.

Sewell-Jaffary combination is unbeatable

denounced Sewell and Jaffary for their consistent anti-development stance. (Gallagher has endorsed Kirkup because he promises not to oppose such projects as St. James Town West.)

Sewell acknowledges that he knows little about the operations of unions, but he claims that he will rectify the matter.

He denied Gallagher's allegations and asserted that he was "heavily involved" with the Canadian Union of Public Employees (local 43) during the garbage men's strike.

"Unions haven't really been involved in city politics," lamented the junior alderman. He contended that he would like to work with labour in the civic arena. "Undoubtedly, I'll start with unions that he based in Ward 7," he added.

Sewell's objective is to "change the whole process of decision-making" in order to decentralize power at City Hall. He feels the people in his ward must be given more say in how they are governed. He believes the present city council is undemocratic and is "totally irrelevant in terms of debate on policy."

He still holds the opinion he articulated in 1971 that "nothing close to debate takes place there (in council). It's a talking freak show full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

If Sewell detests city council as a worthless institution, he abhors his opponent Kirkup even more.

He has written Kirkup off as a fraud, a political charlatan foisted on Ward 7 by the Meridian Building Group, Sewell's avowed enemy.

"Kirkup is not running to get elected," alleged Sewell. "He's just making a name for himself."

Over the last three years, Sewell has worked well with his colleague Jaffary. Together they are a formidable team which Kirkup will find difficult to beat.

Although Sewell and Jaffary are both lawyers, the former has lost much interest in it. Jaffary continues to practice law and has an office in the ward. He has a keen legal mind and is one of the best debaters on council, where he has been one of the fiercest opponents of development.

He believes in conserving the city as a place for people.

"Toronto must be preserved as a civilized place where people can live," he said. "This can be done by giving strength to the groups who are trying to preserve valuable things such as historical buildings, neighbourhoods, and even our street cars."

He was instrumental in the Trefann Court struggle and fully endorses the concept of citizen participation in the planning of communities.

"Citizens should be directly involved in the early stages of neighbourhood planning and no one from the outside will ever resolve the problems of different interest groups in the ward," he claimed.

Contrary to reports in the press, Jaffary maintains that he favours "good development." "My problem concerning high-rise is not where it should be built but whether it is suitable for people. In Ward 7, it seems we need family housing more than we need high-rise."

"I would also like to point out that in the past three years Trefann got approval to build 100 houses, but at the same time Meridian has destroyed 150 houses. At this rate, Ward 7 is being destroyed faster than we can build," proclaimed Jaffary.

Sewell and Jaffary's main opponents, Kirkup and Rotenberg, both favour continued extension of the St. James Town apartment complex.

Rotenberg, a Parliament Street businessman and a long-time Liberal party supporter wants more apartments because he claims many of the houses in the area are run-down and beyond repair.

He is, however, cautious about proceeding with more projects like St. James Town without more planning. "I feel that no more wholesale demolition should take place until there is a joint approved plan by the concerned owner, the people in the area, and the Planning Board as to what will be built in its place after demolition."

Rotenberg places little faith in local democracy, but he maintains that if he's elected he would hold occasional public meetings to hear grievances of the people in the ward.

Some political observers insist that Rotenberg's strength has increased since the election began and he may be in a position to overtake Kirkup for the third spot.

Few experts, however give him much of a chance to beat Sewell and Jaffary.

Kirkup refused to discuss his campaign with The Varsity, a campaign believed to be sagging badly.

While he has the support of the South of St. James Town Homeowners' Association, he has encountered much opposition in the ward.

At one, all candidates meeting, he was hooted, jeered and denounced for being a tool of developers. "Meridian's mascot," yelled the residents.

He became embroiled in a bitter dispute with a local newspaper, Ward 7 News, when he used the paper's logotype on campaign literature.

The paper took their case to the Ontario Supreme Court, charging that usage of the 7 News logo falsely indicated that it supported Kirkup. (The 7 News does not support him.)

An injunction to halt distribution of Kirkup's material was granted by the court.

He has denied publicly that he is accepting the $20,000 campaign fund which Meridian vice-president Phil Roth offered to anyone "except a Maoist" who would run against Sewell and Jaffary.

Kirkup has avoided most all candidates meetings and is instead concentrating on a bill-board and literature campaign.

Two nominal candidates, Charlie Rolfe and Karl Von Harten, are also running. Both are spending little and neither have campaign headquarters.

Rolfe claimed that unemployment and a serious lack of housing are the key issues in today's election.

"I would support the completion of Harbour City and the Eaton Centre developments because they provide jobs for people," asserted Rolfe.

Charlie favours a decentralized civic power structure and insists that power must reside with people who will work together to achieve goals.

Democracy fight ends at U of S

REGINA (CUP) — All is quiet on the University of Saskatchewan Regina campus now as students have returned to their books and the struggle for a democratic university has gone back to committees, following a week of occupations of administrative offices.

A negotiating committee, selected by students at a general meeting November 22 to negotiate with principal John Archer on the implementation of parity in two departments, reported back to a general student meeting last Wednesday. Less than 300 of the approximate 1,000 students who had attended previous general meetings were present.

Archer's co-operation would be useful in stifling opposition to student parity from conservative faculty members, the committee's report said.

When the committee recommended ending the occupation November 22, it had done so believing Archer was negotiating in good faith.

"Principal Archer is sincere in his feelings about student parity," a student steering committee release said. "He is under pressure from conservative factions in the faculty who are trying to preserve their own power."

Archer has always supported some student voting power, and autonomy for the Regina campus, and said nothing basically different from this during the occupations and negotiations.

A motion demanding Archer sign a statement saying he believed in student parity was defeated at the November 29 meeting, but another motion calling for the creation of a three party committee to consist of students, faculty and the public to present demands to the government was passed.

The public representatives accepted by the students were: one member of the small businessmen's association, one laborer and one farmer from the Wheat Pool. The administration suggestion that the worker be picked by the Saskatchewan Government Employees Association was vetoed by the negotiating committee. Fears that the Wheat Pool representative would be an administrative hack were quietened with the promise the farmer would be a rank and file member.

Although the somewhat more radical National Farmers' Union backed the students during their struggle, they were not chosen to be on the committee because of their unacceptability to the administration. The NFU had called for a democratic university to serve the needs of the Saskatchewan people when they supported the students.

Between a circus and an insane asylum

What's up with student aid

In the 1971-72 academic year, 74,765 Ontario students received $35,291,089 in loans and $29,368,504 in grants from the Ontario Student Awards Program. This year, the government slashed funds for the program, hiking the OSAP loan ceiling from $600 to $800, thereby decreasing the maximum potential grant.

Although official figures for 1972-73 are not yet available, the government has admitted that it's saved from one to three million dollars by the loan ceiling hike, money which it refuses to pour back into the program but instead plans to use to help reduce the province's $600 million budget deficit.

And, the government, remaining indifferent to demands for repeal of the detrimental post-secondary financing changes strongly endorsed by a province-wide student referendum last October, has been unwilling to assure students that a further increase in the loan ceiling is not lurking in the shadows for the next academic year. Some student leaders fear the loan ceiling may be pushed to $1,000 this spring.

In 1967, then Minister of University Affairs William Davis established a committee to advise the government on OSAP and other student award policies. That committee, the Ontario Committee on Student Awards (OCSA), was "to attempt to ensure a clear articulation by the academic community of the financial arrangements that will be required in the long-run to ensure that all students have the necessary resources to undertake post-secondary education".

The 27-person committee includes four student members recommended by the Ontario Federation of Students. Two of the four, Cete Ramkhalewensingh and Wynton Semple, both U of T students who have been actively involved in the student financing field, recently presented a report to OCSA analyzing the committee, and matters closely related to its workings. Their report follows:

In choosing a metaphor to describe the OCSA, it comes to a neck-and-neck race between a circus and an insane asylum. As with a circus, the committee exists largely as a show for the public got up with clever artifices and fanfare. However, like any circus worth its salt it has a number of solid acts which may well, by themselves, be worth the price of admission.

It is understandable that the committee is a show in the sense of not having any real power over the student award policies of the Ontario government. With respect to student awards, "policy making" is a fancy way of referring to the decisions of how much money to spend and how to spend it. The former decisions are made by the cabinet and can be influenced by OCSA in the same way that starting your car affects pollution. The allocation of monies within the budget is something that OCSA has and could have some effect on. It is not unreasonable, for instance, to suggest that repeated urgings from OCSA helped to effect the lowering of the age of independence from 25 to 24.

There may also be some general political value in having an official government advisory committee pass motions such as the one passed at its last meeting on September 29, 1972:

"That, in light of the now apparent financial feasibility of lowering the age of independence, and the manifest decline of enrolment which would appear to be at least partially occasioned by reduction in student aid and the increased tuition fees, the Ontario Committee on Student Awards wishes:

1. to reaffirm its recommendation that the age of independence be lowered to 23 immediately;
2. that a pilot program of both loan and grant aid be inaugurated for part-time students enrolling in courses beginning in January, 1973.

The motion's reference to the "now apparent financial feasibility" accepts the fact that it appears there will be a surplus in the student awards budget this year sufficient to lower the age of independence at least one and perhaps two years. There is no good reason to believe that this motion will not join the long list of progressive motions which have not only failed to be implemented, but either ignored or responded to with only the barest of vague acknowledgements.

Current and future areas in which the committee may have some influence are the initiation of aid for part-time students, a voucher system of student aid, policy with respect to foreign and out-of-province students, and reviews of appeals launched by students dissatisfied with their awards. It would be best to discuss these areas more fully with a better understanding of the incurable insanity of much of the committee's deliberations.

Any consideration of the committee's weaknesses must begin with its chairman. Here, we have a man who is inept, mendacious, and ambitious. He is innocent of even the rudiments of ordering discussion and continues to brazenly flout the express wishes of the committee in a number of areas.

High school students of the future may be assured they can attend university if government introduces voucher system.

Student members may have been too zealous, single-minded in their pursuit of preventing cheating

However, while the chairman constitutes the committee's most dramatic shortcoming, there are two others which are much more important. The first of these is the tendency for members of the committee to see each other as adversaries. Students are there to see that as many needy students as possible get adequate assistance. One would hope that faculty and administrators are there for the same purpose, but they cannot be expected to clear their minds of the fact that money for student aid ultimately comes from the same pot that money for salaries and capital expansion comes from.

The student awards officers are in the awkward position of being expected to critically examine a program administered by their peers, other student awards officers, and their managers, the bureaucrats in the Ministry of Colleges and Universities' Student Awards Branch.

Lest it be doubted that being a student award officer is a truly professional occupation, it should be noted that they are no less reluctant than doctors or stockbrokers to publicly criticize each others performance. Their pretension to be a law unto themselves is well illustrated by the practice of rigidly excluding any student representatives from their annual meetings.

It may be objected that non-students are needed to offer advice on preventing cheating, but experience shows that students themselves are not tax in this regard. Indeed, in reading over past minutes of OCSA, the thought occurs that student members may have been too zealous and single-minded in their pursuit of this objective. Furthermore, this need is met by those whose final responsibility it is to devise and administer the program. What is really needed is a committee of students to advise on ways in which the program can best help students and would-be students. It would, nonetheless, be helpful if this committee had a sprinkling of student award officers and bureaucrats to provide information and to respond to suggestions.

The problems of personnel and structure which beset the committee have been exacerbated over the last few months by the imminence of its restructuring or, perhaps, disappearance. The last meeting of the committee was cancelled at the chairman's behest. In typical fashion, no reason was given and no date set for the next meeting. It is plausible to suppose that this is a formalization of the state of limbo in which the committee has existed since it was announced that it would be restructured after the minister had received two reports for which he is waiting.

One, from the Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario, to be released soon, will closely resemble its draft version which spoke of three co-ordinating boards but did not recommend a representative advisory body to deal specifically with student awards.

It is difficult to know what the second study, being conducted by Kate, Peate, Marwick (the same folks who brought you the parental contribution table in the Canada Student Loans Plan) will recommend. If they tapse into the cost-benefitize dialect, as they are wont to do, OCSA will probably become a non-thing.

Although the minister has very recently indicated that no action will be taken in the immediate future and that the committee should continue to meet, the fact that it has met may reflect not only the obtusity of the chairman but also the possibility that since the minister is new, policy is actually being made by his officials, not him.

Voucher System

The voucher system is a proposal for delivering student aid at a different time and in a different way. It has no necessary implications for the amount of student aid. There is some evidence to support the notion, plausible in its own right, that OSAP money, available after high school graduation, does not allay the financial fears of many poor students since these fears have had their effect in grades nine and 10 when the decision was taken to pursue a course with an immediate vocational pay-off.

The voucher system would supply assurances of funding for post-secondary education to students at the secondary level as they jump through the academic hoops, thereby, hopefully, making the possibility of post-secondary schooling more credible. A sub-committee chaired by R. Janssen, a College of Applied Arts and Technology faculty fellow, has given the idea constructive consideration and is now designing a program of research to give it further definition and evaluation.

Out-of-Province and Foreign Students

Those given to reflecting on the various motivations of nationalists will find the Ontario government's forthcoming policy on foreign students instructive. OCSA was asked to recommend policy in this area with respect to student awards and has, therefore, had a goodly amount of research material made available to it. One might think that the placa to begin for those concerned with cultural autonomy would be the high proportion of American professors occupying our schools.

To begin with, foreign students, most of whom are from underdeveloped countries, may be thought to bespeak the outlook of

It is difficult to know what information of government policy in opinion amongst the students on distinction should be made between underdeveloped countries, and the enrolment should come from the coming from the States where sch residents substantially higher tuition.

Furthermore, the problem of the problem of foreign professional incentive for Canadian students thought there might be academic and that these jobs would no graduate schools simply because themselves from those schools.

and thus is able to convey the impression of widespread dissatisfaction among the faculty and students. Professor Clairmont enjoys the confidence and unqualified support of all but a very small number of staff.

6. Since I had not been offered the chairmanship of the department, I found no reason to indicate that I would not accept it. However, because of the stories appearing simultaneously in The Varsity and the Dalhousie Gazette, I have now felt compelled to let it be known that if offered the chairmanship I would not accept it. I have so communicated to the chairman of the search committee, the dean of the faculty, and the staff in sociology and anthropology.

S. D. Clark
McCullough Professor,
Dalhousie University

Clark won't be chairman

Having been sent a copy of The Varsity of November 10 containing what purports to be an account of developments at Dalhousie University, I feel compelled to set out the facts as follows:

1. Professor Clairmont did not "decide to quit" as you suggest. His term of office comes to an end June 30, 1973, and because of that the university set up a search committee to find a new chairman. The chairman of that committee is Professor Puccetti of the Department of Philosophy.

2. The search committee interviewed individually every member of the Sociology/Antropology department. With the possible exception of one or, at the very most, two or three members of the department, the search committee was urged to try to persuade me to take on the chairmanship.

3. Had the committee succeeded, its intention was to write to all the members of the staff eliciting their reaction.

4. When this expression of interest in persuading me to accept the chairmanship was "leaked" to a graduate student, he alone (and no one else as far as can be determined) among the body of undergraduate and graduate students expressed what might be described as concern.

5. There is no "troubled situation" in the department. One member of the staff who has been notorious in stirring up trouble at Washington University, McMaster University, the University of Guelph, and now here unfortunately has the ear of the student newspaper

Math "common front" enforced

The arrogance of the Department of Mathematics and the ineptitude of its administration is being directly challenged in a petition being circulated among first year math classes.

Or rather, a petition being circulated in some first year classes. Professor Mhida, it seems, feels that because he personally can agree with only some of the petition, none of his students should see it in his class forum. After all, they might make up their own minds!

Presumptuous? Of course. But, this is precisely the attitude causing much of the malaise in the department. Something which the petition hopes to redress.

Another professor feels that "the classroom is no place for politics." It is a sorry day when discussion about legitimate student concerns is outlawed and the people voicing their concerns are arbitrarily labelled "politicians".

Just what are the issues and why has the opposition to the mathematics department solidified so quickly?

1. Professor Stephen Salaff is likely to be dismissed at the end of this year. The department admits he is an excellent teacher. Past student ratings find him enthusiastic, energetic and very talented. But, he has broken the "common front" policy of the mathematics department. This incredible policy requires all members of the mathematics faculty to take a united stand against students in any disagreement between the math department and its students. Because Professor Salaff has the courage to agree with his students and challenge the inflexible marking scheme, he has been accused of breaking the "common front" policy. He has received strong indications that he will not be re-appointed next year.

Professor David Spring, another excellent and interested teacher, was not granted tenure last spring. The secret tenure committee gave the fact that he had published few papers as its reason.

It is well known that a professor's teaching ability is never considered when the issue of re-appointment or tenure arises in the math department. An area of primary concern to students is of no concern to this department. Year after year, professors given D and F ratings in the student evaluations are allowed to continue "teaching".

2. The math department places a full 50 per cent on the final examinations in its first year courses. The other 50 per cent comes from eight long, hard, one-hour term tests. There is no consultation with students regarding this scheme and while some students prefer it, others find it a nightmare. The large number of first year math students is the excuse used to defend the math department's inflexibility. I find it interesting that the physics department has been able to cope very successfully with an equally large number of students by keeping channels of communication with the students wide open.

3. The first year student is a good judge of his text-book after he has completed the course. There in lies the tragedy. One professor admitted to me that the book used in the 130 course was not good. He apparently felt no responsibility to challenge its use. What would a responsible teacher do? Professor Salaff, for one, has taken it upon himself to write and distribute comprehensive lecture notes a week before teaching the material covered by them. He is responsible enough to write his own book.

The "common front" policy legislates against rationality, forces polarization and can only lead to confrontation.

The math department may be offering the best political science course on campus!

For those students whose professors have not allowed circulation of the petition in their class, it is available for signing at New College, study room 154.

MPSCU exec backs petition

It is our opinion that teaching ability should be the principal criteria in decisions regarding the hiring, firing, and promotion of professors. In addition, we are convinced that students should be involved in the decisions affecting their education; namely, those concerning the hiring of professors, course material, and methods of evaluation.

With these principles in mind, we fully support the petition currently circulating in the mathematics department which calls for:

- 1) student participation in determining equitable marking schemes.
- 2) greater consideration of teaching ability in departmental hiring policies (especially with regard to the cases of Professors Salaff and Spring).
- 3) the improvement of textbooks. We urge students to sign this petition.

Question who controls courts

Why is Karl Armstrong still in jail?

Karl's application for bail in which he is acting as his own counsel has been pending for several weeks. After several postponements, it did in fact begin last Thursday, but with a somewhat strange procedure.

Due to a "slight" oversight, Karl was not present. In submitting his brief for bail, he had made it quite clear to the court and Austin Cooper, the lawyer hired to represent the interests of the U.S. state in the Canadian court, that Armstrong intended to act on his own behalf. Despite this fact, the court order necessary to have him transferred from the Don Jail was never issued.

Usually in such proceedings, the applicant opens the hearing with his submission as to why he should be given bail. The court noted that Karl was absent (as if he could control his own movements to and from the jail). No explanation was sought and none given as to why he was not present and Mr. Cooper proceeded with his reasons why Karl should not be granted bail. The charade once begun, would have continued, the players being quite content to go through the entire proceedings, Karl en absentia. Unfortunately for Mr. Cooper and his friends, one of the spectators brought this obvious sham to a halt by pointing out the irregularities, an act which prompted the judge to enquire why Karl wasn't present. At that point, the matter of the court order was brought to light and consequently the proceedings were adjourned until Friday, December 8 when hopefully Karl will be able to submit his application in person.

This case like the recent one of Ed Hogan, a Black Panther who was whisked away to Buffalo and handed over to the FBI in spite of his legal right to appeal the deportation order made against him, raises the whole question of Canadian independence from American political policy.

Karl's case will be before the courts again on December 5, when his lawyers appeal Judge Waisberg's decision that Karl be extradited to the U.S. for his alleged participation in the bombing of the Army Mathematics Research Centre in Madison, Wisconsin. In spite of the fact that the Canadian extradition law states that crimes of a political nature are not extraditable, the court found that this act of opposition to the war in Indochina was not "a political act".

It is possible for the courts and ideologues of the ruling class to perpetrate the myth of the neutrality of buildings such as the AMRC, but science and technology have become the backbone of the U.S. military. The U.S. is substituting an automated battlefield for an army which is collapsing, partially because of internal opposition to the war. Scientists and technocrats have become the new and more inhuman soldiers of the U.S. military machine. If it wasn't clear after Hiroshima, the myth of the neutrality of science has clearly been exploded by the efforts of the American scientific community in Indochina.

The Army Mathematics Research Centre on the University of Wisconsin campus is the prime example of the devotion of scientific work to military purposes. The Armstrong case and others like it should make it clear — if it isn't already — that the Canadian state has assumed a role of total subservience to U.S. interests.

Makes charges at meeting

Election is devious and rotten says Marks

By RANDY ROBERTSON
Ward 6 aldermanic candidate June Marks charged last Thursday night that the municipal election has been "a devious, a rotten election."

Marks was speaking to over 100 people at an all candidates meeting sponsored by the Sussex-Ulster Residents' Association at Lord Lansdowne public school.

She charged that criticisms of her performance on City Council were based on "misinformation." She questioned the validity of the voting records on development compiled by various residents' groups.

"Every development situation is different from another," she said. She was not pro-development just because she had voted for various projects, she said.

Marks explained that she had voted for an apartment high-rise, instead of a park, for west St. James Town because senior citizens living in the apartment building already built had asked for another.

"They didn't want the park; they were afraid of being mugged," she said.

The Gothic-Quebec development, she said, had been encouraged by a past alderman for the ward — Mary Temple — since development was permitted in her ward in the Official Plan for Toronto.

"Aldermen cannot be responsible for the activities of other aldermen in other wards," she contended. Horace Brown, supporting Marks' charges claimed "every election campaign has a phoney issue: development is the phoney issue in this one."

Brown questioned the validity of dividing City Council into Old Guard and reform members. When it came to the final vote, the "crunch vote", Metro Centre was passed by 19 votes to one; Eaton Centre by 17 to three. "Where were the reform members?" Brown asked.

Marks asserted she was "for the people."

She said accusations that she was filling her pockets with developers' money were "lies, nothing but lies." She said she had gone into debt because of her involvement in city affairs.

She drew attention to her anti-development record.

"No one did more than I did for St. James Town North, she said. "I walked in on a situation that already existed. I resettled hundreds of people personally. I went across Toronto urging people not to sign options. We threw the by-laws at the developers."

Marks angrily denounced a number of people in the audience. She claimed that these people, turning up at the candidates meetings regularly, "are making statements and not asking questions."

Mayorality candidate David Crombie, making an unscheduled appearance, said he was "committed to the protection of stable residential areas in the heart of the city."

Neighbourhoods "must share in any planning that is done for their areas," he said. "No major changes can be considered by City Hall until the neighbourhood groups are heard from first." He suggested that developers should be made to go to the neighbourhoods before going to City Hall.

The solution to the threat of high-rise development in the Sussex-Ulster neighbourhood can be countered by down-zoning it for single family homes, Crombie said. He urged the residents to mount sufficient opposition for this to happen.

Crombie stressed the value of community organization. "In the vote economy politicians live in, it is necessary for local groups to organize and speak from a position of strength so that the community interest will be listened to."

A member of the audience stated that 90 per cent of the people in the Sussex-Ulster region are living in two- or three-family houses.

"If the district is down-zoned to single-family residences these extra families will be kicked out," he said. "Single family housing is all right only for rich swingers from Don Mills who want beautiful downtown houses."

The organizers of the meeting claimed that a dangerous situation exists in the neighbourhood. Houses in the area are being bought up by developers, they said, including two properties on the corner of Major and Harbord Streets owned by the secretary of the Cadillac Development Corporation.

Crombie said that City Hall could fight the "strategic specific demolition of houses to downgrade neighbourhoods", blockbusting, by refusing to issue demolition permits in areas where the official plan allows possible development until a detailed plan is established for the neighbourhood itself.

Ward 5 alderman William Archer said that the imposition in Sussex-Ulster of a 38-foot height limit — already in operation in some parts of the city — would force anyone who wanted to build over that height to make his plans known. Dan-Heap said that he had been concerned in his campaign to show the over-all pattern in the city wards. There has been a massive change from houses to high-rises in the north Jarvis area and the St. James Town area, he pointed out.

Heap foresees a Toronto of "wall-to-wall high-rise apartment buildings" unless speculative development is replaced by development controlled by people in the area which is to be developed.

Conservative voice returns

Committee re-appoints Duff match chairman

George Duff has been recommended for re-appointment to the chairmanship of the Mathematics department for another five year term.

Duff, whose conservative views have caused student opposition, was confirmed by an all-faculty striking committee under the chairmanship of arts and science dean Bob Greene. No students can sit on committees concerned with the hiring of chairman of departments under the Haist rules.

Duff's appointment must be confirmed by both the Academic Affairs Committee and the Governing Council before it becomes official.

Duff said yesterday he had "expected" the reappointment. Greene confirmed that the recommendation had already been made by the striking committee and accepted by him to pass on to Academic Affairs.

Phil Murton, last year's vice president of the Math-Physics student Course Union, said Duff is "unacceptable even from a liberal point of view. The department is run like a monarchy."

Morton charged that Duff had consistently opposed student input at any level in the department. He added that the appointment would promote more conservatism in an already conservative department.

Duff has come under fire recently from students in the department upset over the lack of student participation in decision-making.

In a petition to be presented to Duff this afternoon, more than 100 present and former students of professor Stephen Salaff object to his feared dismissal, which Duff has admitted is likely.

Another petition, to be presented to Duff and U of T president John Evans, protests not only Salaff's position but also the denial of tenure last spring by a committee with no students on it to professor David Spring, and the department's heavy emphasis on exams in first year calculus courses.

These are examples of the department not listening to students or considering teaching a prime criterion for hiring and tenure, and should be remedied, the petition says. It has been signed by more than 400 students already.

Three-campus carnival set for January

The first winter carnival with events on all three U of T campuses has been scheduled for next January.

Co-operation between SAC and several local councils plus the participation of many fraternities and the men's athletic department has produced a lengthy list on indoor and outdoor activities.

The carnival is set to begin Wednesday January 24 with the Varsity-Waterloo hockey game and conclude with an evening concert at Scarborough College on Sunday January 28.

A meeting of SAC people plus representatives of the other participating groups Thursday night decided that the first three days of the carnival would feature events on the St. George Campus, while Saturday's activities would be located at Erindale and the final day would concentrate on the Scarborough campus.

SAC will provide overall coordination, prepare the publicity and contribute about $1,000 to the concerts at Erindale and Scarborough. Local councils, athletics and the interested fraternities will sponsor the other activities.

The men's intramural athletics department will run the second annual Snow Bowl football game and a rink will be made on the back campus for broomball and pleasure skating.

Several fraternities have indicated interest in running parties after the hockey games and operating a casino night on Friday January 24. Other activities on the downtown campus include a chariot race, numerous pubs and a film night.

Weekend events include skiing and a car rally while Erindale's student council will be organizing several events at the college to precede the evening concert.

"We're trying to get away from the over-centralized type of Winter Carnival that ran in the past," SAC executive assistant Paul Carson said yesterday.

"This time local councils and other groups will be sponsoring many of the activities. We hope they will incorporate into the carnival things like pubs, dances and movies that they will be operating that week in any case."

Carson and SAC communications and services worker Peter Milic will handle the overall planning. They hope to have a final schedule of events at all three campuses prepared within the next week.

Professor challenges monkey sex myths

By AGILUKACS
U of T anthropologist Frances Burton exploded some myths regarding sexuality in monkeys last Wednesday in a public lecture arranged by the Interdisciplinary Studies department's women's course.

She studied 21 primatographies—descriptions of the behaviour of monkey groupings — for the evening's lecture.

Burton disagreed with Lionel Tiger, an anthropologist who believes that females are naturally less active politically and that the origin of this tendency is in monkeys.

She described an incident she had witnessed in Gibraltar which had led her to disagree with this. One monkey succeeded in isolating another monkey from a group over a long period of time, in order to form a relationship with that monkey's frequent companion by the use of a complicated alliance system involving four monkeys in total.

The four monkeys involved were all female. "Females are often more aggressive than males, especially toward each other", Burton said.

Females can take leadership roles and are sometimes troupe leaders, Burton explained, although the American concept that a leader must be a bully doesn't apply to monkeys. Instead, the identity of the leader is determined by such factors as age and ability find a waterhole or ripe fruit.

Although the leader is often male, his role as defender of the tribe is supplemented by the females, who give warning in times of danger, and will do battle, especially if the young are threatened. Sometimes there is more than one leader, or roles are so broken down that there are no leaders.

The female role is often that of "social adhesive", Burton said. The female often grooms troupe members more than the male, and it is through her that family ties are formed, because no biological father is recognized.

But the female's role in child rearing is often limited to being the "milk machine", and to cuddling the infant at night. The males in the Gibraltar tribe train the young from birth on.

In the Gibraltar group, the oldest male in the troupe begins to socialize the child, and then the "sub-adult males" take over. The mother is only deferred to when these other monkeys permit it.

This tendency in child rearing is continually more pronounced as one moves up the primatological ladder — from lemur to New World monkey, then to Old World monkey, then to ape. Man is the next step on the ladder.

"It's the choice of a society what the roles are", Burton emphasized. "There are no biological imperatives".

Self-conscious primates can counteract some biological limitations as well, she said. For example, a student cramming for an exam can go without sleep, and a poverty-stricken person can go without food. Similarly, a woman who knows she will be nervous during her period can take steps to calm down.

And there is some evidence, besides the well defined social roles, that monkeys are self-conscious animals.

Burton said she had conducted experiments which proved that monkeys did indeed have orgasms.

too, although Desmond Morris argues that only human beings do.

But she was less positive that monkeys can be naturally homosexual. "I've seen fellatio practiced by two male monkeys", she said, "but this seemed to be more a symbolic act of submission than a sexual act. And "mounting" often proves dominance, rather than sexuality, she stated.

Monkeys use sexual positions for such things as reassurance, too. Such positions often don't lead to reproduction.

Most of the behaviour of primates, Burton feels, is a matter of cultural truth, rather than genetic truth.

Policy role proposed for union

By BOB BETTSON

A move will be made tomorrow night to allow the new Arts and Science Student Union to make internal and external policy decisions.

The motion, a constitutional amendment already passed by the interim executive, would allow the union to make internal policy decisions as well as decisions on other matters affecting students in the faculty.

Although an earlier constitutional conference rejected a policy-making role for the union, the first meeting of the full council spent most of its time discussing whether the union could take policy positions.

Several council members who wanted the union to take positions on issues such as the proposed amalgamation of college and departmental libraries and the fees strike have proposed the amendment. There will also be a move to oppose the cutbacks in the interdisciplinary studies programme.

Rick Gregory, VUSAC education commissioner and a member of the interim executive, said that he expects the internal policy making amendment to pass but there will be more debate on the external policy-making motion.

"We (the executive) don't want to force people to adopt these amendments. The council should decide," he added.

He said that there would be a move to make a two-thirds majority on council necessary for policy decisions.

The executive will report on the financial state of the union and its activities of the past month at tomorrow's meeting.

A permanent executive will also be elected. Most members of the present executive are expected to run for permanent seats, including Gregory, Seymour Kanowitch, Gus Richardson, Mike Scott and Rick MacFarlane.

Toronto gymnasts finish third at York

Toronto's Hans Frick performed well on the pommel horse and finished second in the individual standings.

The University of Toronto men's gymnastic team finished third with 188.8 points in the York Invitational Saturday evening.

Queen's was second with 191.9, while York came first with 213 (approximate).

The Toronto women's intermediate team finished second to a strong York team.

The men's team placed a close third behind Queen's and York with Varsity and Queen's only separated by three points. Hans Frick was a key member on the U of T squad executing near-perfect performances on high bar, vault and pommel horse and gained a second place finish in the individual all-round standings.

Team captain Gary Wicks followed Frick in his team standings with a 40.8 all round point total while Al Swett, Brian Euler, and Rick Jeysman gave commendable performances in all events. Although rooky Arnold Bishop and floor and vaulting specialist Bryan Alcock both suffered heel injuries they displayed the control and agility expected in top competition.

Toronto's main weaknesses were demonstrated in the area of high bar and parallel bars. Dismounts, a most important part of any routine, were not up to the difficulty and performance level expected from the Toronto team.

As predicted, Steve Mitruik from McMaster, Frick, and Yeomen's Dave Hunter finished first, second, and third respectively in the individual competition. However, York University's talented six man squad finished 20 points ahead of any other team.

The win by the York intermediate women's team was partly aided by the lack of all round competitors on the Toronto women's team. Individually, Varsity's Cathie Pointing gained first place on uneven bars, with Helene Eisenberg placing second on balance beam and third on bars.

Toronto's strongest performances came from Kathy Morton with first place finishes in floor exercises and beam and third in vaulting. Tirina Reynolds gained a fourth place team standing on the four women's events. In the senior division, the University of Southern Illinois women's team defeated York, their only rivals.

With over 50 competitors and a gymnasium cluttered with nine pieces of apparatus the competition was at times overcrowded and hectic. But the first major meet of the season demonstrated the need for harder work and concentration on the part of both Varsity gymnastic squads.

FACT OR FICTION?

You should avoid exercise during your period.

Fiction! The simple rules of good health are always important, especially during your period. Exercise, a proper diet and a good night's sleep go a long way toward relieving menstrual cramps or preventing them altogether. And remember, you're not "sick." So there's no reason not to follow your normal routine.

Fact. With Tampax tampons, odor can't form. Odor is noticeable only when the fluid is exposed to air. With Tampax tampons, fluid is absorbed before it comes in contact with air; therefore, odor cannot form.

You should not bathe during your period.

Fiction! Contrary to superstition, water can't hurt you. Daily baths or showers are a must throughout your period. Shampoo your hair, too. And don't deny yourself the chance to go swimming. Tampax tampons are worn internally, so you can swim anytime.

Single girls can use Tampax tampons.

Fact. Any girl of menstrual age who can insert them easily and without discomfort, can use Tampax tampons with complete confidence. Follow the easy directions in every package.

Our only interest is protecting you.

Few show up to election meeting

Only 16 people showed up for a SAC-sponsored Ward 6 all-candidates meeting last week including four candidates, the meeting's chairman and a Varsity reporter.

Incumbent Horace Brown, whose record, according to the newsletter City Hall, almost consistently favours development, told the small gathering that development is "the phoniest issue in the city of Toronto."

Almost everything City Council deals with, including street repairs and sidewalk construction, is a development, he contended. The University of Toronto, he pointed out, is "the biggest development in the city".

Ward 5 alderman William Archer defended his record, similar to Brown's on development, explaining that "we're providing a facility" for housing choice by permitting high-rise construction. The views of the people may not be the same as those of citizens' groups fighting controversial developments, he added.

Dan Heap criticized the other candidates for playing down the development issue, insisting that it was the key issue.

"It's not a question of whether, but what kind of development" is needed, he stressed. A mix of housing types is necessary, he said, but not high-rise at the expense of the destruction of local communities.

Arthur Downes said that voters "must avoid traditional politicians" and instead support candidates who are "socially attuned".

"Arthur Downes will be there," he declared; "I won't back down."

Brown also denied the existence of a reform caucus at City Council, saying he was neither in nor out of it. He pointed out that the "so-called reformers" split on votes for development such as Metro Centre and what he called Fairview Centre, a reference to Eaton Centre.

SAC services commissioner Bill Steadman, who chaired the meeting, blamed inadequate publicity for the poor attendance.

SAC services and communications worker Paul Carson, who organized the forum, later agreed, adding that the fact that alderman June Marks refused an invitation to come also likely deterred some people. The attendance also was "a sign of disinterest" in the election, he said.

Protestors denounce repressive Irish laws

Chanting "No internment, North or South" and "Victory to the IRA", 50 demonstrators picketed the Toronto office of Irish Airlines on Saturday, before marching to the British Trade Office building on University Avenue.

The demonstrators were demanding the release of political prisoners in both Northern Ireland and the Irish republic, where new measures passed over the weekend permit the government to jail anyone on "suspicion" of membership in an illegal organization, such as the Irish Republican Army.

The demonstrators, who included members of the Toronto Irish Republican Club (representing the Marxist Official wing of the IRA), the Old Mole, and the League for Socialist Action, were demanding in particular the release of Provisional Republican leader Sean MacStiofain, presently in prison in Dublin. The Official IRA opposes terrorist activities by the Provisionals, but supports them in opposing repressive actions by the British army or the Irish state.

Followed by a police car and photographer, the demonstrators marched through crowds of Christmas shoppers along Queen Street, carrying signs calling for a united socialist Ireland and for freedom for political prisoners. Some passing motorists beeped horns in support, while many bystanders muttered obscenities as the marchers passed.

At the British Trade office, Official IRA spokesman Sean Keane accused the British government of encouraging and using religious divisions in the Irish working class.

The real struggle is for socialism and independence, he said, and the Irish people welcome support from anywhere. The IRA considers business interests as "part of the enemy", be they English or Irish, Catholic or Protestant, he added.

Phil Hebert, speaking for the Old Mole, expressed solidarity with the Irish Republican Army.

The IRA, he said, despite its failings, is a workers' organization, both North and South, and is "the only organization capable of serving the Irish people's interests by fighting Irish capitalism and British imperialism. The only possible solution providing full democratic rights is the establishment of a workers' republic, a united socialist Ireland."

Hebert pointed out that the Irish government and bourgeoisie have now openly extended the struggle to the south, where they "serve the interests of British imperialism", and that a united IRA "must extend their struggle to the south as well."

Blues peck off Ravens 73-69 in overtime

By BOB PRITCHARD

It took an extra five minute period of overtime to do it, but basketball Blues won their second league game of the season Saturday in the Benson-gym, nipping Carleton Ravens 73-69.

A certain similarity existed between Saturday's game and the game in which Blues defeated Guelph by a mere two points. In both games, Blues held the lead throughout the first half, then began to slump, only to come back to win.

Toronto was leading by three points going into the second half against Ravens, but by the 11 minute mark Ravens had surged ahead 52-41. Not until then did Blues decide to come back. In the next seven minutes, Blues outscored the Ravens 18-5 to pull ahead 59-57.

Varsity almost gave the game away, allowing Carleton to score two baskets to regain the lead 61-59. Blues' Brian Skyvington then outjumped a Carleton player for a rebound, and scored to tie the game at 61. Next Ravens' Lorne Bowles connected on a shot to give the Ottawa club a two point advantage with only 20 seconds remaining on the clock.

But Toronto remained cool, and quickly worked the ball up the floor where Peter Oolup dropped in a bank shot to once again tie the score. Carleton managed to get one more shot on the Toronto basket, but it was short of the target and a tie score of 63-63 forced the overtime period.

Ravens managed to score the first four points of the five minute period, but Blues again tied the score, this time at 67. Blues' Oolup then beat his man via the "back door" of the basketball court, and gave Toronto a two point lead.

In the next couple of minutes, Varsity's Brian Skyvington, after pulling the ball in on good rebounding, twice threw it away to Carleton. It was fortunate for Blues that Ravens declined to take advantage of these opportunities, missing their shots.

With one minute remaining in the overtime period, Blues Dave Ferguson sunk a basket to make it a 71-67 ball game, but Ravens countered with a basket of their own to once again reduce Blues' lead to two points.

With 30 seconds showing on the clock, Ferguson was fouled. He missed his shot, but Skyvington made up for his earlier errors by grabbing the rebound, allowing Toronto to retain possession of the ball. In desperation, Ravens once again fouled Blues', only this time they chose Dave Watt. Watt came through with two big points, as he put Toronto up, 73-69. That's how the score stayed until the buzzer sounded.

Varsity started the game moving the ball quickly up the floor with some fast breaks, and finished the first half leading 32-29. In the second half, Toronto coach McManus decided to change from the man to man defence Blues had used in the first half to a zone defence. Carleton found this easier to penetrate, and Varsity was soon forced to revert to their original pattern. This contrasted with Blues' usual play, since the team more often ends up playing in a zone defence when it can't handle a man to man situation.

The Ottawa team opted to use a full court press on Blues, resulting in several costly Toronto turnovers. Carleton's Dave Montagnano developed a "hot hand" for his team in the second half, sinking the ball for 22 points. It was largely on the scoring of Montagnano and team-mate Jon Love (who added 14) that Ravens earned an 11 point lead before Toronto decided to get back in the game.

Half of Toronto's win must be credited to their defensive play. Blues tightened up their man to man defence, especially in the second half, to make it difficult for Ravens to get good scoring opportunities.

Varsity's Bill Francis, who only saw action in the latter part of the contest, and Peter Oolup both played solid games. With Randy Flinski out of the game after his injured leg gave out, McManus could afford to give his other starting guard Tony Rudnik, a rest. Francis and Oolup put pressure on the Carleton guards, and still managed to keep them low on scoring.

There were two areas where the Ottawa team's playing was faulty. Ravens missed several easy shots on the Toronto hoop, often from directly under the basket. But the real lapse was in the area where Blues have, by comparison, shown considerable improvement: foul shooting. In the second half, Ravens were 6 for 17 (35% from the foul line, while Blues were good for 15 out of 20 (a 75% average).

Varsity's top scorer was co-captain Dave Watt with 18 points. Although not a particularly "dazzling" or "colorful" player, Watt is consistently a guiding force on the Toronto line with steady performances. To date, Watt is Blues' leading scorer with a 16 point per game average. Brian Skyvington had 17 points for Blues Saturday. TIP OFFS: Blues last game before Christmas is next Saturday in Sudbury against Laurentian. Toronto lost their first match with Voyageurs 81-73. . . . Varsity's first game in 1973 will pit them against Waterloo Warriors, first place finishers in the OUAA Western section last year. Waterloo defeated Carleton 111-63 in the Naismith Classic last week and the Warriors have an impressive line-up. That happens January 6 in the Benson Building at 2 pm.

Hockey Blues dump nemesis Laurentian 5-2

By PETER DUX

Hockey Blues established themselves in sole possession of first place Friday night, defeating Laurentian Voyageurs 5-2.

Scoring for Blues were Bill Buba with two, while Nick Holmes, Bruce Herridge and Gord Davies all added singles. Laurentian's pair came from Frank Hamill and Brian Penrose.

Blues won the game in the second period on a four goal rally after Voyageurs had gone ahead 1-0. Frank Hamill scored on a power-play at 21 seconds of the second period, but Blues' captain Gord Davies connected on a slap shot shortly after, with goalie Bruce Durno off the ice on a delayed penalty in favour of an extra attacker.

Laurentian goalie Dave Tataryn later stopped shots in the crease by Warren Anderson and Harry Sems but Bill Buba lifted the puck over the sprawling goalie before the defence had a chance to clear.

Davies set up Blues' third goal of the period, picking up Anderson's pass, and then centring to Holmes who slapped the puck into the lower short side of the net.

Herridge put the game away late in the period on a hard shot while Voyageurs' Brian Penrose and Blues' Ivan McFarlane were wrestling next to the crease. Unbelievably, the referee watched Blues set up the goal but failed to bother with the blatant altercation taking place around the goalmouth.

Buba scored Blues' final goal and his second of the evening on a breakaway slapshot which slipped through Tataryn's pads. Laurentian finished the scoring at 9:40 with their second power play goal. Durno stopped the initial shot by John Globensky and the puck deflected off Penrose on a shot by Bob Sidey.

Voyageurs missed another chance on a two-man break; Durno was able to stop the initial shot by Globensky and the rebound by Dave Morris before his teammates could get back to cover up.

The second period saw a better conditioned Blues team outskate what looked like a flagging Laurentian squad. Voyageurs' defence appeared porous and lacked unity.

Officiating was also notably lenient with referee Hotten ignoring obvious infractions. The result was an outbreak of fighting with two minutes left to play in the period. Voyageur's Mike Fox was assessed a penalty for slashing while Bruce Herridge looked on and waved goodbye. At the same time Mike Keenan said something to Brian Penrose, and Penrose took a run at him precipitating Korzack and Fox into the melee.

Blues' coach Watt had to stop his bench from clearing, while Voyageurs made no move to jump over the boards. The eventual outcome saw Penrose, Fox and Korzack warming seats in the penalty box, for two minutes. Later on in the game, with Blues' short-handed on a penalty, Hotten ignored two obvious trips on Laurentian players by Toronto penalty killers.

Another noticeable incident saw spectators give Blues' Don Pagnutti a round of applause for ragging the puck in Voyageurs' end of the rink to help effectively kill a Toronto penalty.

The first period turned out to be a goalkeeper's dual with, for example, Tataryn robbing Anderson, and Durno stopping John Vandenberg off a hard, quick shot from the point.

Blues Notes: Watt had his lines switched around Friday. One example was Buba playing on a line with Boh Munro and Harry Sems. Watt felt Munro could set up Buba on his forehead passes easier than his usual centre, Pagnutti. . . . So far this season Blues have outscored their opponents 46-14. . . . Blues season record is now 5-0, with Laurentian and York in second place with 4-1 records. . . . York defeated McMaster 10-1 Friday night. . . . Blues' final home game before Christmas is Wednesday against Western Mustangs. . . . The team then travels to Windsor for a game Friday, and then on to Montreal for December 15 and 16 exhibition games against Sir George Williams and Loyola. . . . only the Toronto - Western game on Wednesday will be carried on Radio Varsity, starting at 8 pm. RV returns with live play-by-play coverage for a home game with Ryerson on January 12.

Voyageur's Dave Tataryn stops Neil Korzack (7).

Day care may finally get a new home

By PAT REDICAN

The Campus Co-operative Daycare Centre may be closer to getting a permanent residence. The most recent plans for the new Innis College development allow the possibility of Day Care using a 14 Sussex Avenue house and thus ending a nine month illegal occupation.

The solution, according to newly appointed Vice-president (internal affairs) Jill Conway, depends on discussions between Innis Residence Co-op, and the day care group.

InRes Co-op is a co-operative housing group which is legally autonomous but administered largely through Innis College.

Although the initiative to reopen discussions between the daycare and InRes came from Conway, she claims that university has no role in the discussions. "Since both are community groups, they have common interests," she suggested.

Innis Principal Peter Russell, an ex-officio member of InRes Co-op, said yesterday that the college was interested in "cutting daycare in" on the new development. According to Russell, the present Innis plans call for "a small building for academic and student union purposes" as well as co-op housing for the existing 14 houses now on the north side of Sussex. This project would come under the InRes Co-op and would involve not only students but community people, according to Russell.

Day Care spokesperson Meg Luxton said that 14 Sussex would be acceptable if the renovations necessary to meet the requirement of the Day Nurseries Act were made.

Similar renovations to 12 Sussex St., which presently houses the infant daycare, cost about $12,000 two years ago. The main problem would be the financing of these renovations.

According to Conway the University will re-enter the picture if a decision is reached. At that point the university would probably be called upon to lease 14 Sussex, along with its other Sussex properties to InRes Co-op.

The co-op, if agreeable, would subsequently lease the house to Campus Co-op.

But, according to Russell "there are still legal, architectural, financial and organizational problems to be worked out. A lot of work, a lot of talk."

Luxton also emphasized that any developments are "only in the talking stage".

The university has indicated it wishes to use the Devonshire site for its own, recently legislated day care centre. It is presently petitioning the City of Toronto to rezone the site to allow for such a move.

Campus Co-op and the university have been negotiating intermittently since the former group illegally occupied the empty building on Devonshire Place in April of last year. 14 Sussex Street had been offered as a solution earlier but had not been agreed upon because the university was not able to offer it on a long term lease. There was also doubt as to the fate of the building in the new Innis plans, which seems to have been overcome.

Fees strike progresses: OFS

By ERIC MILLS

Eleven Ontario university and community college student councils, including U of T SAC, are actively encouraging their constituents not to withhold their second instalment fees payment as part of the Ontario Federation of Students fees strike, according to OFS general co-ordinator Craig Heron.

Ten of the institutions belong to the OFS; the non-member is the University of Ottawa.

Six other members of the federation cannot participate in the strike because their students are either part-time or operate on a semester system. Only two OFS members, Brock and Trent Universities' student councils, have refused to participate in the strike.

The strike was called after negotiations with the Ontario government asking them to roll back the $100 tuition fee rise imposed this year and to return the loan portion of OSAP awards back to last year's $600 level from $800 broke down. OFS also wanted a pledge that no further changes in student financing be implemented until all parties involved are consulted.

An October province-wide referendum indicated that 76 per cent of the students who paid their fees in two instalments were willing to withhold the second instalment if the provincial government did not accede to the OFS demands.

At U of T, approximately the 7000 students who voted on the question supported the fees strike.

SAC president Eric Miglin said yesterday he was encouraged by response so far to the campaign to urge students to wait until at least the end of January to pay their fees, although the administration has so far been unable to provide figures on how many people have paid their second instalments.

He said SAC has received a "fair number" of inquiries about its letter mailed to all undergraduates during the holidays, most of them favourable. As well, a large number of students receiving OSAP grants have received their cheques without paying their fees, he has been told.

The administration has already tacitly supported the student action by reducing the fee for paying in two instalments and cooperating with SAC throughout the fall.

And, vice-president (business affairs) Alex Rankin confirmed last night that he intended to interpret "rather liberally" until February the regulation that students late in paying their fees not be required to pay the normal $15 penalty.

Miglin also reiterated SAC's concern that students might give their fees into the "Stop the Student Surcharge" Strike Fund without realizing that they cannot withdraw their fees autonomously.

In addition, he questioned one of the committee leaflet's statement that paying fees into the fund constitutes "legal proof that the 'first use'" of Ontario Student Award Plan (OSAP) grants is to pay tuition fees. Legally, students receiving OSAP grants must pledge to use them first to pay their tuition fees.

Rankin said last night that "obviously, payment to a third party is in no way payment to the university," as required by OSAP regulations.

The university is consulting its lawyers on the question, he said, but he has not been advised of their opinion.

He added that the committee's calculation of the balance of fees owing is misleading.

Stop the Student Surcharge Committee organizer Gail Dexter countered last night that the committee's legal advice was that payment of fees into the fund, designated as it is as payable only to the university, does constitute "first use" of the OSAP grants.

At Ottawa's Carleton University, students forced the administration fees office to stop requiring students to sign over their fees before they could receive their OSAP cheques.

By tearing up forms obliging them to pay the fees on the advice of a Stop the Student Surcharge Committee, students frustrated university attempts to force second instalments to be paid.

Student councils at Carleton and Lakehead Universities and the Universities of Ottawa and Western Ontario have set up trust funds on their own which lock students into paying the money to their universities. However, this is done at the individual student's request, and does not require a majority vote, as the committees' funds do.

OSAP cheques are being withheld at several universities. At one of these, York University, there is strong speculation that the cheques will not be released unless students use them to pay their fees.

Students occupy Glendon office

By DOUG HAMILTON

More than 30 students occupied the office of Glendon College registrar C.A. Pilky last night to protest withholding of OSAP grant cheques to students who have not paid the second instalment of their fees.

Shortly after three pm yesterday afternoon students moved into the registrar's office and decided to remain there throughout the night.

"A group of people got things together and decided to take the place over," exclaimed one undergraduate.

Only one security guard was on duty during the occupation, and students inside the registrar's office reported "no hassles".

At one point 70 to 80 students were present, according to Glendon College Student Union president Dave Moulton. A student union meeting was held at the office and the students decided to continue to occupation "indefinitely". Sleeping bags were brought in and food committees established.

Students have issued two demands that will have to be met before they will terminate the occupation. First, they want York to establish a policy similar to that of the University of Toronto with respect to OSAP grants.

(The University of Toronto has decided to turn OSAP cheques over to students even if they are participating in a fees boycott. U of T students will not be required to pay their second term fees instalment in order to receive their OSAP money.)

The Glendon students have also demanded that York University waive all penalties for late payment of fees.

York president David Slater said last night that OSAP cheques will continue to be withheld from students who do not live up "to their contractual agreements."

He added that no penalties will be imposed on students who are late in paying their second term instalments. Slater asserted, "We (administrators) are innocent and sympathetic agents in this affair."

According to Moulton, the decision to withhold the cheques was made by Slater. He "followed the policy of previous years," contended Moulton.

"We only found out about it (Slater's decision) at three o'clock this afternoon (Tuesday)," added Moulton.

"The university's action is jeopardizing our fees strike against the government's policy," said the student union president. "The action undermines the whole fees strike."

Moulton remarked bitterly that Slater's action "shows our enemies aren't just in the government, but also at the university."

York vice-president of student affairs John Becker spoke to the occupiers last night, saying that he had not made the decision to hold the cheques. Students complained "that he's just bullshitting us around."

After Becker left, students vowed to continue the occupation.

A mass meeting will be held at one pm today at Glendon and a poster campaign has already been launched. Flyers outlining the position of the student union and the reasons for the occupation will be distributed throughout the college.

The student union has placed $2000 into "a special account" for students "who are caught short" by the administration's move, asserted a union spokesman.

Support for the occupation has come from the Council of York Student Federation. Council president John Theobald has discussed the possibility of using similar tactics at York's main campus. A special CYSF executive meeting will be held tomorrow to decide on future tactics.

Farmers boycott A & P

SACRAMENTO (CUPI) — The United Farm Workers has announced a nationwide boycott of the Safeway and A & P chain food stores.

The announcement is the latest action in the nationwide lettuce boycott that began in August 1970. Asking consumers not to shop at Safeway and A & P is intended to convince the two stores to cooperate with the lettuce boycott by ordering United Farm Worker lettuce or no lettuce at all.

The boycott of the giant retailers follows a series of meetings between representatives of the United Farm Workers and the heads of the two chains.

A & P and Safeway each have annual sales of $5.5 billion and control 20 per cent of the nation's grocery market. A spokesman for the Farm Workers said that the two chains have the economic power to bring about a change for the better.

"We feel that Safeway and A & P are not innocent bystanders but have a moral responsibility to the farm workers who make it possible for them to sell their fresh fruit and vegetables," he said.

In Los Angeles, a consumer group has formed to follow up reports of violations of wage and price controls, false advertising, and excessive fat content in meal in Safeway stores.

The boycott of the chains comes less than a week after a decision by the International Brotherhood of Teamsters to renegotiate lettuce contracts signed with growers in 1970.

Service union to oppose worker's dismissal

By ZOYA STEVENSON

At a special hearing on Friday, the Service Employees International Union will oppose the dismissal, effective that day, of Damjion Andreev Grucev, an animal laboratory technician at U of T's Banting Institute.

The hearing is taking place despite the fact that contract negotiations for the newly certified and unionized animal laboratory technicians have not yet concluded. In fact, the union has applied to the government for conciliation which is due to begin Tuesday.

"But everything in the collective agreement has been settled except for wages," says Don Barclay, the chief negotiator for the SEIU Local 504; "the university has agreed to honour those parts of the agreement which pertain to Grucev's discharge, and the grievance can proceed as others."

The letter terminating Grucev's employment stated that the immediate reason for his dismissal was his "refusal on December 29 to follow the instructions of Mr. U.B. Korompai (Grucev's supervisor) in regards to mopping the corridor on the sixth floor of the Banting Institute."

Grucev says that he refused to mop the floor because he had mopped it a half hour earlier, and saw no reason to do it again.

U of T director of Laboratory Animal Science Dr. L.R. Christensen contends that "Grucev has persistently refused to carry out duties that the other men do, sometimes leaving his supervisor to do the job for him." Further, on another occasion when Grucev apparently refused to mop the corridor, Christensen believes that Grucev said, "This is a janitor's work, not mine."

Grucev feels that the sixth floor corridor of the Banting institute should not be mopped by animal lab technicians because he says that no animals are kept in that corridor. He believes that his job was cleaning cages and caring for the animals.

Although Grucev agrees that his supervisor did wash the corridor a number of times, he says that Korompai did it only after Grucev himself had washed it.

Nonetheless, Dr. Christensen believes that Grucev's refusal to do jobs that he disagrees with constitutes a valid reason for firing him. He says that "Grucev was told on two occasions that if an immediate supervisor gives a man an order to do something, he must do it."

Grucev's letter of termination also stated that he had recourse to complain to Christensen and another department head if he disagreed with the orders given.

Grucev says that he did this, but to no avail. In fact, he says that he received an assurance from Christensen that he would not lose his job.

Grucev believes that his supervisor acted like a "sergeant who followed each of my steps and was never satisfied with the work that I did even when I did it well."

Another worker in the same department thinks that Grucev "wasn't fully clear about what his work was supposed to be, and possibly because of a language barrier thought the supervisor was angry when he wasn't because he didn't say please in giving work to the men under him."

The same man feels that Korompai "would not intentionally judge a person by his personality; he would tend to judge them by their work. Mr. Korompai is less authoritarian than most people around here."

Grucev says "no one can convince me that refusing to mop an already clean floor is enough reason to be fired."

Grucev graduated from U of T last year with a four year degree in Slavonic languages and has had five years' experience working with deaf children. He trained for four years in Bulgaria and Poland to be a teacher of the deaf, but could not find comparable work in Canada, because of lack of Canadian experience and training.

Surcharge committee assails SAC fees stand

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Stop the Student Surcharge Committee chairman Peter Havers charged Monday that the Students' Administrative Council is not opposing the fees increases strongly enough.

"SAC has decided," Havers said, "its opposition to the surcharge is going to be a symbolic game, and screw the students."

Havers claimed SAC vice-president John Helliwell admitted at an Ontario Federation of Students meeting that "what SAC is doing is purely symbolic and that the campaign run by the Stop the Students' Surcharge Committee is a real students' fees strike."

Yet SAC, Havers claimed, has been unwilling to work with the committee or with the socialist Canadian Liberation Movement which set the committee up.

The Stop the Student Surcharge Committee asked SAC to include a pamphlet describing the trust fund the committee has set up for a fees strike in the letter SAC mailed to all U of T students over the holidays. Havers said that this would have given students freedom of choice and that it could have been done at no extra cost to SAC.

SAC refused, claiming, Havers said, that inclusion of the pamphlet might lead some students to think that it supported the committee's actions.

SAC not only refused. "What does it do," Havers said, "but put a note on the back of its letter about our trust fund locking students in!" Havers angrily asserted that the trust fund "simply supports majority rule, and we all believe in majority rule, right?"

The fund does not permit individual withdrawals of second term fees paid into it because "students must stay together to win." The strike will end when the majority of the depositors vote to pay the money in the fund to the university. Until then the university is forced to deal with all the students in the fund collectively.

The committee intends to stop "the student surcharge", the $100 increase in undergraduate fees, by paying into the trust fund last year's fees less this year's first installment.

"The university," Havers said, "can take it or leave it."

Once the money is in the account it can only be used to pay tuition fees.

Guaranty Trust administers the Fund for the committee. The interest from the deposits will be used first to pay its charges. Any money remaining will be used to pay the expenses of the campaign.

About a half dozen committee members were picketing the fees office at 215 Huron Street yesterday and Monday in an attempt to urge students not to pay their second instalments.

"No one can stop the students from paying their fees," Havers said. "We're just trying to convince them that it's better to wait. They have a while yet."

One committee member, stationed in the fees office itself, claimed he had stopped "seven or eight" students "who had their pens out, ready to pay their fees".

The committee set up an information trailer outside the fees office building Monday morning.

"Some people came out from the fees office and told us we shouldn't set the trailer up," Havers said. "We did, anyway. Five minutes later, Miglin, Flowers and Helliwell were over here, telling us we shouldn't have set it up."

"I'm not saying that the administration sent them over but they were here just five minutes after the fees people spoke to us."

As well, at one point on Monday, there were four U of T policemen, including the deputy chief, watching over the pickets.

The committee holds the universities of the province responsible for the fees increase and not the government.

Havers charged that the universities, to build their own empires, are demanding more money from the people of the province and using it less wisely and more wastefully.

Havers said that the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations has shown no support for student fees strikes. "They are hoping for wage increases," Havers claimed, with the funds for such increases to come from, or to be freed by, increases in student fees.

The committee proposes a maximum for faculty and administration salaries at a level that would immediately make up the monies needed to remove the "student surcharge". "The bulk of the faculty," the committee says, "would not be affected by this maximum. Any professor who cannot make ends meet on $25,000 should go back to the U.S."

The committee wants the taxes owed by foreign professors who illegally took a two-year tax holiday while remaining in Canada for more than two years collected. In Ontario this would amount, the committee believes, to about $10 million "which covers the student surcharge for all university undergraduates."

The committee wants the university to cut wasteful spending. Havers noted that at Lakehead University last year the cost of long distance telephone calls per professor came to $600. "This represents six student surcharges per prof."

Havers said that the University of Toronto has hired an efficiency worker ("to get the workers to work harder"), an American, at $40,000 a year. "This represents 40 (sic) student surcharges."

Student Surcharge Committee picketed 215 Huron Street, site of U of T's fees office.

Vice-president admits SAC has done little on library issue

By BOB BETTSON

"Not much has been done about the library question except talking informally to several members of the library subcommittee," admitted SAC vice president Ross Flowers.

Flowers, interviewed yesterday, blamed the lack of any action on St. Michael's College SAC representative Michael Steinberg who volunteered to chair a committee to produce a SAC position on the library.

The library was set as one of SAC's priorities earlier this year and Steinberg's sub-committee, which never met, was supposed to produce a position by the end of October.

However, Flowers claimed, Steinberg left to work on former SAC president Bob Spencer's campaign for trustee.

Steinberg was unavailable for comment but arts and science summer fieldworker Phil Dack said "Steinberg had taken the position in the summer. It was obvious quite early that the sub-committee was not going to produce any results."

Rick Gregory, member of the Arts and Science Student Union executive and Victoria College council education commissioner, charged that "the SAC executives' lack of concern on this issue is indicative of their general concern on the abominable state of things in this university."

SAC president Eric Miglin, vice-president John Helliwell and Flowers campaigned last spring against the Spencer-Dack-Lubek slate charging that their support of the two occupations of Simcoe Hall was too extreme.

They said that open stacks at the Roberts Library, the aim of the occupations, could have been gained by writing briefs and making representations to the administration.

Flowers added that he and New College SAC rep John Ros; had taken over responsibility for proposing a library position. He said that they were going to meet with the Governing Council sub-committee deciding on stack access this month.

According to Flowers SAC has not taken any position on the library, but he said that there will be a position adopted in two weeks. He admitted that it was unlikely SAC would be submitting a brief to the Library Sub-committee.

"We have not played that much of a role," he conceded. "But I'm not in favour of just leaving it to the student members of the Governing Council".

Varsity wants more hacks

Second term is here, and now that you've mastered the art of being a university student, indulge in your desire to work for The Varsity.

Time to support principle

Withhold fees; begin the struggle

An occupation at York University's Glendon College is protesting that university's refusal to turn over students' Ontario Student Award Program cheques until they pay their second term tuition. There is talk of similar action on York's main campus.

It appears students are finally starting to step up their opposition to the government's cutbacks in the financing of post-secondary education. It's about time.

Last October, Ontario post-secondary students voted overwhelmingly to protest the government's backward-looking action. But, a month later, they and their student governments let a province-wide protest at the opening of the provincial legislature fizzle. And, an Ontario Federation of Students' proposal for a campaign to withhold second term tuition fees nearly died in the planning stages because member institutions were reluctant to endorse it.

Active support for the students' demands — repeal of the fees hike, amendment of the Ontario Student Award Program to facilitate greater accessibility to the program, and assurances of no further unilateral government action — has been little more than lukewarm on the U of T campus until now. And, now is the time for students to prove where they really stand: pay their fees and support the skeptics' contention that this struggle represents nothing more than a youthful rebellion, or withhold fees payment and develop further action to indelibly impress upon the government's mind students' unswayable commitment to universal accessibility to post-secondary education.

Withholding your fees won't work any miracles. It's not going to force the government to back down from its anti-university and anti-community college policy overnight. But, it will convey a message, a very unmistakable message, a message vitally required at a time when the provincial government still stubbornly insists that students do not oppose its policy.

And, considering that the U of T administration is at least passively going along with the withholding campaign by deferring assessment of late payment penalties, there's nothing to frighten away even the most timid, compliant students.

Even were the university to resist the move — as has been the case at York — there could be no grounds for failing to act. Withholding fees may only affect the government in a very indirect way, but the tactic will make itself felt at Queen's Park.

As for student governments, their place is leading the struggle, not hanging back, ever fearful of damaging relations with university and government administrators.

The Students' Administrative Council, initially a somewhat reluctant participant in the fees withholding campaign, has made its present position clear in a letter mailed to students during the recent vacation, urging them not to pay their fees. But, their activity in pursuit of this goal has been less than vigorous. Having made the decision to support the struggle, they must actively work with students — especially those students still inclined to head towards the fees payment office — to ensure the greatest possible success for the campaign.

Withholding second term tuition is just the starting point. Support for the Glendon students and others confronted with similarly obstructionist administrations is yet another element in the common struggle. Increasing pressure must be placed upon the government as its mandarins put the finishing touches on this year's provincial budget, a budget including key decisions about the financing of post-secondary education. And, should that budget fail to take the students' position into account, action should be stepped up for the fall.

The struggle is not for this or next year alone, but for the future of post-secondary education in Ontario for years to come. The die has been cast; it must be reversed.

Don't let Bell hike bill

Yesterday, Bell Canada began its annual pitch to the Canadian Transportation Commission for increased phone rates. Operating in a market where there's no competition, the Bell has consistently hiked its rates while trying to cut down on service.

Today's centrespread feature proves Bell doesn't need the raise. It documents how Bell profits continue to climb, pointing out that the telephone monopoly has other avenues open to it to encourage any needed funding.

That won't come as news to Bell. The telephone company is a giant, inefficient, insatiable monopoly which sees no reason why its profits should fail to climb perpetually without regard for re-investment. And, to a great extent, the government hasn't interferred drastically with that ambition.

There can be no real justification for giving Bell the go-ahead to raise its rates and cut service. Accordingly, no "compromise" hikes should be tolerated either.

Bell won't like that. Tough. Spiralling profits and plummeting service may make business sense, but they certainly don't make common sense.

Nationalization of Bell is long overdue. And, that's the solution the Canadian Transportation Commission should be recommending when Bell's crying the blues in Ottawa this week.

Nobody should be given a virtually free ticket to milk the Canadian public. And, it's hard to believe that the government could bungle the job of running the nation's telephone system much worse than the Bell.

Admittedly, nationalization won't mean much if all that happens is that control is transferred from one group of bureaucrats to another. But, there is the opportunity — one of which the government should be pressed to take advantage — of giving control to the Bell workers. Such a move would go a long way towards humanizing the telephone system and guard against government tendencies towards cost-cutting at the expense of its employees.

An unlikely scenario? Perhaps. An unwarranted one? Definitely not.

Assistant didn't speak for GSU

The Varsity article "GSU Slams SGS Report" contains a number of false and erroneous statements. As president of the GSU, I feel compelled to set the record straight.

1. The GSU memorandum to SGS regarding graduate student support was released by Mr. Hoffman without either the knowledge or consent of the GSU Executive Committee. The GSU did not slam any SGS report. If any slamming was done, it was done by an employee (not even a graduate student) of the GSU. The GSU, quite rightly, has not taken any position yet, as there is no position to be taken. Discussions that are presently underway in SGS are of a preliminary nature; no statement of policy has come from SGS, and hence, none from the GSU.

2. The report was neither confidential nor secret. It was a working paper presented to a committee for discussion, and to myself for comment. The working papers of any committee are not normally publicized. The memorandum of the GSU Executive Committee was merely a series of comments on points raised by SGS regarding support of graduate students.

3. U of T Open Fellowships total approximately six to seven per cent of graduate student support, not the three per cent reported by The Varsity. It seems that a cardinal rule of a newspaper, i.e., corroboration of details, was totally ignored by The Varsity. Throughout the article, simple errors of fact could have easily been checked.

4. Most of the article is devoted to Mr. Hoffman's rather simplistic notions of student support and, therefore, reflects a subjective opinion rather than fact.

Wendy LeBlanc, president Graduate Students' Union
Ed's Note: The erroneous three per cent figure was taken from a November 29, 1972 brief submitted to School of Graduate Studies dean A.E. Safarian in the name of the Executive Committee, Graduate Students' Union. The Varsity did not feel it had reason to doubt the GSU's accuracy in a matter so closely related to the interests of its constituents.

Furthermore, The Varsity assumed GSU executive assistant Hoffman could be trusted to accurately represent his employer's position.

Sleuths stumble on wrong floor

The students in the "Robarts Rules are Rigid" article, (Varsity, November 29), were apparently suffering rather severe disorientation. They thought they were in the lounge of the as-yet unfinished and unopened Robarts Library. It seems more likely that they stumbled into the Faculty of Library Science, which adjoins the Robarts construction. If so, it seems difficult to imagine how they could have been in the ninth-floor lounge of a seven-floor building.

Since these students were insufficiently perceptive to notice the prominent identifying sign at the entrance to the FLS building, I am not really surprised that they overlooked a notice on the door of the seventh-floor lounge, (posted by the Rules Committee of the building), requesting that students eat their lunches in the lunchroom rather than in the lounge. Since our other students respect this request, it seems unreasonable that non-library science students should not.

At the Faculty of Library Science, we too are concerned about the future policies and regulations of the Robarts Library; we will, however, obtain correct information before we make any accusations.

Charismatic are really Christians

To the politician, charisma is a priceless commodity. Either you've got it or you haven't. You can't buy it like a newspaper ad. You can't grow it like a beard. The heavens get elected. And the have nots decry the "personality cult" mentality of the public which resulted in their defeat. It's part of the political game.

But, for all the talk about "charisma", the politicians don't have the real thing. There is a pseudo-charisma. At least this is the conviction of a rapidly growing number of "charismatic" students at the University of Toronto and on other campuses. These students will be giving the campus an opportunity to investigate this extraordinary dimension of Christian religious experience during a series of lectures and study sessions in late January. These meetings, under the theme of Charisma '73, are being sponsored by charismatic students on this campus.

The phenomenon called the Charismatic Movement or Renewal has received considerable attention recently from both the secular and religious press. This religious awakening, characterized by speaking in tongues and other strange manifestations purported to be inspired by the Spirit of God, has its foundations, according to the believers, in the experiences of the early church in the first century.

These experiences reappeared in scattered, small Christian groups early in the 1900's. This marked the beginning of what has been called the modern "Pentecostal" church. The recent wave of interest in this phenomenon appears to have complete disregard for denominational distinctions. They come from all denominations and backgrounds, both Protestant and Catholic.

Whatever name they give themselves — Pentecostal, Full Gospel, Charismatic, neo-Pentecostal — the emphasis is always on a personal experience with Jesus and on the direct leading of the Holy Spirit. This teaching aligns the charismatics very definitely with the broader Jesus Movement, but not all of the Jesus People would subscribe to charismatic beliefs concerning spiritual gifts.

The charismatics are having an increasing impact upon university and college campuses. For example, the fastest-growing religious club at the University of Nebraska (Lincoln) is simply called Prayer and Praise. This charismatic group meets twice a week (often for as long as three hours) and attendance ranges between 100 and 300 students.

According to a recent report in the Daily Nebraskan by a reporter who attended one of these meetings, "20 minutes were given to individual prayer. Some whispered their prayers, some spoke them out loud, a few raised their arms, most simply bowed their heads.

"One girl started singing a song of praise to God — her own tune, her own words. Another did the same, and eventually many voices were raised in a strangely beautiful blend of many songs and words. Several present, both men and women, cried softly.

"Then, after embracing friends or clasping hands, they went home."

Members of Prayer and Praise, and similar groups springing up on campuses across the U.S. and Canada, all carry Bibles. They quote extensively from passages in the New Testament which speak of the Holy Spirit and the "gifts" (Greek is charismata) of the Spirit which include the ability to speak in tongues, prophesy, work miracles and heal the sick. Most present-day churches believe these gifts were withdrawn after the Bible was completed. Members of these charismatic groups do not agree.

These gifts, they feel, will remain until "that which is perfect is come" the second coming of Christ. And that coming will be soon.

Does this charismatic thing have anything to say to the U. of T.? We'll know in January after Charisma '73.

Charisma '73

Appointed despite opposition

Students are cool to new geography head

By ALEXANDRA MERCER

The appointment of professor Jacob Spelt as geography department chairman has taken place in spite of heavy student opposition. Although students were active in opposing Spelt's selection, they made no protest to the Governing Council and the Academic Affairs Committee when the issue arose.

When student Governing Councillor Ian Morrison, former Geography Council member asked professor R.M.H. Shepherd of the Academic Affairs Committee if student opposition had been taken into account, Shepherd stated that "no official representation had been made."

According to Shepherd, "although anyone who read The Varsity was aware of the opposition"; "I don't think anyone could take action on the basis of Varsity reports".

Morrison and other students later explained that students had not gone to the trouble to find out when the meetings which would deal with the geography chairman were scheduled.

In November, the 10 student representatives had resigned from the Geography Council.

The most important factor in their resignation, according to John Carline, president of the Association of Geography Graduate Students at the University of Toronto, was "the way in which the new geography department chairman, professor Spelt, was appointed." The students were also opposed to Spelt because he is opposed to student participation in decision-making.

The official search committee refused to meet a shadow student committee, or to go to a general student meeting to hear the students' reasons for opposing Spelt and their alternate proposals. Letters of complaint from presidents of the graduate and undergraduate student bodies to arts and science dean Bob Greene were ignored.

According to former Toronto University Geography Students (TUGS) president Hans Mikolay, the students have been told by various administrators that their views would not be taken seriously because they are "just passing through" and are not permanent members of the university community.

The student representatives of the departmental council responded to administrative indifference by "bringing the issue into the open"; polling geography students, sending a letter of protest to U of T president John Evans, and resigning from the Geography Council.

Dean Miller, a former student member of the Undergraduate Curriculum Committee doesn't think that this year's group of student representatives, elected in November, will return to the Geography Council until they have arrived at an agreement with the faculty guaranteeing students that their views will not be overridden by administrative forces.

The faculty members would only be in a position to make such a guarantee if they could present a unanimous front to the administration, says Miller. Although he was not sure of such faculty unity, he thought that "for the most part, faculty is receptive to student demands, is on good terms with students and wishes to remain on good terms with them".

According to Miller, some members of the faculty are also opposed to the manner in which the geography chairman was appointed. The selection committee only had a minority of geography faculty on it. The 20-member Geography Council cannot meet until enough of the 10 student representatives attend to make up a quorum. Miller feels that "the faculty members will be just as happy not to go to meetings, but eventually they will have to go back to the negotiating table and they want to maintain the good will of the students".

Miller thinks that student negotiations with the faculty and administration will be a slow process and the student members of the student representatives do not expect any spectacular and immediate successes.

The newly elected student representatives will meet tomorrow to map out their strategy. However, Miller felt that "the student representatives cannot find the time to put the student participation issue first and see it through".

Library amalgamation fails to win General Committee support

The recommendation of the Mueller Committee to amalgamate two college and two department libraries in an enlarged "undergraduate library" failed to win the support of the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science Monday.

Dean Bob Greene moved immediately when the meeting started to adjourn debate permanently on the motion because he said it was obvious the General Committee would not reach a consensus.

The General Committee has been discussing the question since September and debate has been adjourned several times.

History professor Kenneth McKnaught angrily walked out offering his resignation when Greene's motion carried, after lashing out at the committee for failing to make decisions.

McKnaught said later that he felt that this decision showed that the "General Committee is not capable of making a decision on the library". He added that libraries are "at the heart" of the faculty.

He claimed that because of the crucial nature of the problem, if the committee could not cope with it, it had no "raison d'être".

A subsequent motion by Greene that the minutes of previous debate on the library be referred to the Governing Councils Library sub-committee as an indication of the debate passed by only one vote, 45-44. Students were split with the majority voting against referring the minutes.

Debate on two other Mueller committee recommendations on part-time students and periodicals also was adjourned.

The committee upheld a recommendation by the admissions committee to reduce the eligibility age for entry for students who haven't completed high school from 23 to 21. Students argued this would allow bright students who quit high school or economically deprived students a better chance for an education.

The designation for these students was changed from "mature" to "non-matriculant", to clarify its meaning. Conservative faculty leader J.B. Conacher opposed the motion on the grounds that it would lower the "academic standards of the faculty".

A student motion to allow exams to be remarked for a five dollar fee did not come to a vote as time ran out. The motion was amended, to have a fee charged only if the mark was not raised.

An attempt by conservative faculty to bring the motion to a vote before it could be further amended was defeated.

Gov Council 'expresses concern' over cuts

U of T's Governing Council has unanimously decided to "express its concern" about the raises in both tuition fees and the loan portion of student award grants imposed last year by the Ontario government.

The council's executive rejected in November a motion from its Academic Affairs Committee which would have deplored the Conservative government's actions. And, at its December 14 meeting, the council likewise rejected two attempts by part-time student councillor Joyce Denyer to mildly strengthen the new resolution drawn up by president John Evans.

The successful motion urged that "methods of reviewing the hardships and reduction in accessibility" from the government's action be instituted, and that no further changes in student financing be introduced until:

- a "contingency repayment factor" is instituted as part of the loan system;
 - a transitional program is developed;
 - prior notice of change is given;
 - students already receiving aid are guaranteed continued support under the current plan until they either graduate or cease to be registered.
- Former Conservative MPP

Edward Dunlop, a government appointee to the council, noted in the short debate that perhaps it was too late for the resolution to have any effect on the provincial government.

The original motion, being delayed in the council's committee structure, was intended by student mover Brian Morgan to be passed while the Ontario Federation of Students was still negotiating with the government. Unanimously supported by the Academic Affairs Committee, Morgan's motion would have in effect endorsed the OFS demands, including a rollback of both tuition fees and the loan portion of student awards to last year's levels.

There was little debate on the resolution other than on Denyer's amendments, which would not have affected the council's urgings on the province, but would only have recognized in the preamble that the Conservatives' actions were more harmful to students than Evans' motion did.

Professor Barry Coutts admitted that "I am not opposing these amendments because I disagree with them."

The Governing Council should not make minor changes to resolutions, he thought.

Professor R.M.H. Shepherd, chairman of Academic Affairs which had earlier unanimously passed a stronger resolution, opposed both of Denyer's amendments.

A large portion of the council meeting was held in camera, to discuss the university's 1973-74 budget. Copies of both the budget and the audited financial statement of the university were made available to councillors, but not to the press or public.

Debate on proposed bylaws and rules of procedure for the council was adjourned until next Thursday. Copies of the proposals, drawn up by University College principal Archie Hallett and associate law dean R.E. Scane, were also not made public.

Corporations buying up farms, says NFU

By BOB BETTSON

The Canadian family farm is under attack from the federal government and large multi-national corporations, says Don Kossick of the National Farmers Union. "The NFU has just begun to develop as a movement for change in rural Canada."

Kossick, national co-ordinator of the NFU Kraft Boycott, was speaking in Winnipeg to the 35th national conference of the Canadian University Press, held the week after Christmas. About 150 delegates attended from 40 member universities and alternate papers across Canada.

Kossick traced the development of the NFU from its beginnings as a group of farmers staging tractor protests to a national union fighting for collective bargaining rights in the face of stiff opposition from the food processing corporations and the government.

The NFU has organized on the questions of food quality and marketing as they relate to the consumer. It now has 25,000 members across Canada.

Norma Taylor, Saskatchewan farmer and organizer of the Kraft Boycott painted a vivid picture of the realities of running a family farm: "Farmers are moving into urban areas and taking other jobs. We don't want to go but we have to eat," she said.

The dilemma farmers are placed in, Taylor said, is that despite the high value of their land, their net income is decreasing, and even if people want to farm they aren't able to continue.

Taylor said the NFU was moving towards an overall analysis of the situation of the farmer, who is threatened by agri-business, ignored by governments and charged high prices for farm machinery.

The solution she proposed was setting up a network of farm communities retaining the individual producer as the base. Collective bargaining rights must come together with the limiting of the size of farms.

The problem of corporate farm ownership is increasingly important despite statistics showing corporations own less than one per cent of Saskatchewan farm land.

She stated that large corporations such as the Canadian Pacific conglomerate are charging prohibitive rents on lands purchased from the government, to drive farmers out of business.

She said that one major American land company had opened headquarters in Saskatchewan to escape the non-resident ownership laws.

The rather gloomy picture of the growing dominance of agri-business and the destruction of the family farm was tempered by an attitude of militancy and determination on the parts of both Taylor and Kossick.

The fight for collective bargaining in Prince Edward Island, Kossick said, was proof that even the federal government and its task force's recommendations could be stalled if farmers united to demand collective bargaining.

Under questioning Kossick said that the NFU was by no means propagating a socialist analysis. "Its taken us three years to get a collective bargaining formula passed", he said.

NDP governments in Manitoba and Saskatchewan have been unresponsive to NFU demands, Kossick said. Saskatchewan Premier Allan Blakeney had

"waffled" on the issue of collective bargaining and ended up demanding a 51 per cent majority of all farmers before collective bargaining rights could be granted.

Zeitlin lifts Sociology election veto

By ULLI DIEMER

Sociology chairman Irving Zeitlin has reversed his decision to nullify undergraduate elections to the department's assembly.

In a letter to assembly members, Zeitlin states that an investigation showed that while a "technical irregularity" had occurred, there had been "no violations of the constitution in the actual procedures of the elections committee."

Earlier, Zeitlin had charged that "fundamental violations of constitutional and democratic procedures" had occurred during the elections. He declared the elections void because two students running for office had assisted the elections committee of which they were not members, in holding the elections.

However, the students involved, Bob Storey and Lorne Richmond, stated that they had given their services as a favour to the committee, and that no conflict was involved in their own election, since they were both acclaimed. Their statement was borne out by the chairman of the committee, professor Ralph Beals.

Zeitlin now accepts this version. He acknowledges that the actions had been "in good faith and with the approval of the elections committee chairman", and that the elections "were in fact legitimate and in accordance with the constitution."

In what may be construed as a reply to charges that his decision was politically motivated, directed at preventing an effective student say in the department, Zeitlin pledges in the letter that "no important business will fail to receive attention as a result of this delay. If necessary, more than the requisite number of assembly meetings will be scheduled to compensate for the loss of time."

The assembly has not met since last February.

Bob Storey, one of the students implicated in Zeitlin's original charges, welcomed the reversal as a "good decision." He added, however, that the decision "should have been made in the first place." If Zeitlin had checked the facts before acting, he said, the controversy need never have occurred.

With the question of the elections settled, the first meeting of the assembly has been scheduled for Monday.

Students especially look forward to the meeting with great interest, for one of the topics on the agenda is the question of the implementation of a motion, passed last February, calling for staff—student parity on the staffing committee. If the motion is put in effect, the sociology department would become the first to implement this longtime ambition of student activists.

Bell Canada wants to hike phone bills, reduce service

By DAVID CUBBERLEY
reprinted from the Chavron

The people who control the nation's telephones, Bell Canada, are appearing before the Canadian Transport Commission (CTC) this week to argue for rate increases which will substantially hike phone bills.

It wasn't long ago — last year, to be exact — that Bell Canada steered a five per cent general rate increase past the CTC, a feat which netted the company an additional $47.2 million in revenue. Bell was milfed, however, at the CTC's refusal to fully go along with its request for increases amounting to $78 million annually.

Now, they've turned up on the CTC's doorstep, again wanting new rate increases. If they get their way, it would mean: • raising the base rate from $5.40 to $5.80 per month;

- doubling installation charges from $11 to $22;
- doubling of pay phone charges from 10 cents to 20 cents per call;
- creation of a "directory assistance charge" of 25 cents per item except in the case of an unlisted number, blind caller, or calls tendered from a hospital or hotel room; and
- increased service charges on long distance calls and on the per minute overtime rate.

As a rationale for the application finance necessary expansion "profit investment money," while the company return on investment remains too low.

Bell is certainly more hunched than when it presented its complaints. Due to its position in the face of the hazards of competition, in return for fixing of telephone rates to the benefit of making a profit, it isn't allowed to raise the price the traffic will bear. Bell's argument hinges on the premise that this concession is an unwarranted disadvantage.

Bell Canada controls some six per cent of the country. It is argued that modernization requires a good deal of capital each year, but can only partially be squeezed from the capital (an estimated $500 million in 1974) better than $600 million in 1974. Maintenance of the profit margin is suggested that "its rate of return is so reasonable a rate of return under existing conditions that the company's financial strength is not a concern."

Bell generalizes directly from the smaller pool of funds for direct employment. Moreover, and more importantly, to reduce the company's stature on the regulated profits make Bell shares unattractive to investors, thus making them unattractive to the method of raising capital through share issues.

From this, Bell sees rate increases as a telephone shares a more attractive investment will merely "prevent deterioration of the company" while those for 1974 will be the ability of the company to raise capital.

However Bell's "poor" financial performance is not as certain as the company places Bell enjoys the unique status of a public utility. This position guarantees the company a loss through competition nor service—subject to loss through economic solidification this situation brings Bell's prices being subject to public control.

Secondly Bell's financial performance allows. A brief submitted to the Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers Union following information:

"Bell Canada's net earnings before income, after interest, discounts and declared to be $133,262,000. This figure provision for depreciation of $183,000,000, the corporate treasury is $317,112,000."

UE concludes "that the amount of investment in our view it should be more than enough to improve the technological competence of service, especially domestic service. The fact that Bell's net earnings "has declined" in 1943 and in the eight years 1963-1970 doubled."

Bell notes that the newly proposed rate of 8.6 per cent return on investment is secure on the stock market. Without that there are other ways of raising capital since these funds will ultimately make the company, Bell should be expected to be profitable.

The most prominent of these measures is a depreciation reserve fund with a rate of 8.6 per cent (as of 1970). Bell may well invoke this is in reserve for depreciation on equipment. It is not illiberal to suggest that this is a rate from which Bell can readily borrow directly achievable from profits.

Mary this with the knowledge that an American, a monolithic corporate giant with billions and a yearly profit of $2.5 billion.

Bell's arguments prove that the modern telephone technology—communication systems especially—means less service. Technological improvement increased productivity heralds better service. This regard UE has noted:

"In 1957, Bell's peak employment handled a daily average of 18.6 million 336,000 long distance calls. In 1970, a reduction of some 2,000, were reduced service that was practically double that were 35.4 million local and 790,000 long distance calls. UE suggests that "Bell's expanded capability through technological decrease rather than an increase in service. No reductions appear to be in the offing. With nauseating frequency, 5

The inside view: working for Bell

I'm that snooty person in the business office who duns you for bills, hears your complaints and takes the order when you want to change your telephone around. The company calls us Service Representatives (SR's). You think we all sound like recordings. I'd like to give you my side for a change.

My day begins with the joyous task called "doing my 10:1's". That is company language for calling the customers to inform them that we are disconnecting their telephone that day for non-payment of the bill. Most calls go something like this:

—Hello, Mr. Johnson? This is Mrs. Carter from Bell Canada calling. We are calling about your telephone account. Has it been paid?

—Mr. Johnson, we sent you a letter last week to advise you that we must have payment in full yesterday...

—I understand how you feel Mr. Johnson, we don't want to take food out of your children's mouths. After all the telephone is a privilege. No, we cannot extend credit. There is an amount of $20 outstanding, and you have not been a particularly good customer of ours...

—Well, I'm sorry but we will have to disconnect the service this morning. When the account is paid in full we will be pleased to reconnect the service...

—I'm sorry you feel that way. Good-bye.

Sometimes it's worse. Sometimes you tell us your husband is laid off and you just got out of hospital and baby's sick and the nearest neighbour is 20 miles away. I know how you feel, because I've been there too. But, I still have to disconnect the service. If it isn't me, it's somebody else, and right now my baby's sick and my husband's laid off, and we have to live somehow.

Most days there are five to 15 calls like this to make before nine a.m. The company extends credit to customers on the basis of their "ability and willingness" to pay, that is, their class and rebelliousness. Class A customers are large companies and the government; Class B is allowed to run a two month bill under $25 or a one month bill up to 10 times their local service; Class C is allowed $15; Class D is allowed $10; and Class M is asked for a "maintain credit", a deposit of $50 or more. The classification is arbitrary. It is the sole determinant of a customer's relationship with Bell.

The Bell never collects accounts, it "treats" them. This treatment is about one-third of the SR job. In most cases it is done by mail, with small blue and white notices. B customers get sent a reminder notice; all others get sent a denial notice (saying we will cut off their service if the bill isn't paid within 10 days).

On the final review of "risk" accounts, customers who still have not paid are telephoned (the personal touch), and arrangements are made for payment of the account. All customers except A and B customers are "quoted D (denial)". The treatment calls are another of the small horrors of the job.

Every SR has about 150 to 250 risk accounts on her position at any one time. Collection is a never ending process, and the schedule must be kept at all times. We are never given time to be sympathetic or conciliatory. It and when an account is disconnected, the collection of the "final accounts" begins. "You'll enjoy these, Mary," my supervisor told me, "they are so much more interesting." This kind of collection involves calling nearby telephone numbers to try and get hold of the customer, calling Long Distance parties he has on his bill to get more information on his whereabouts, and sending more notices. It all these measures fail to bring results, the account is sent to the Bell Collection Division for tougher tactics.

If you could catch an information operator long enough when she is leaving the office, and ask her to tell you a little about what her day was like, she might say, "Well, there was nothing special about today, except that I came in a minute and a half late because some of the clocks around the building were slow and I followed the wrong one. I put on my headset and my easy voice with a smile, and rushed to take my place at the information board. Before I could pick up my first call, a superintendent plugged in to my position and informed me I'd been marked late — and that it I'd only been a minute and a half late I could have been on time, and "How could we run an office if everyone were so irresponsible?"

Mentioning that her time would be better spent checking the clocks rather than chewing me out would have constituted insubordination and I'd have been reported as having an attitude problem. So I let it pass.

—Operator, can you give me the number for Radio Station CKEY?

—Have you checked your directory?

—Look, operator, if I wanted to do that, I wouldn't be calling you, would I?

—Yes—well, the number is listed at the beginning...

—Operator, the number, that's all, just the number...

...of the C's in your directory...

—Oh, come on—I know where it is—just give me the number...

—Yes, of course, the number is...

Sound familiar? You bet! And I'll bet you always thought the Operator was just giving you a hard time because it was a slow morning and she had nothing better to do? Actually that whole spiel about looking in your book is really part of the Bell's Directory Assistance Volume Control. Eventually (because it isn't going too well) you'll be charged for calls to information if the number is listed in the book. You think you've got headaches? Information operators know that every time they ask you to look something up in the directory, they're phasing themselves out of a job.

At the same time, each girl is required to handle about 120 information calls per hour. That works out to a call every 30 seconds or so. Objectives like that were set by someone who'd either forgotten or never known what it was like working at information. It takes a long time to find some listing and once you've lost a few minutes — it's hard to make up that time so you can still meet the objective. At all times, even towards the end of an hour, when an operator knows they're doing a "spot count" on her and she begins to get frantic, she still must be pleasant and she can't be friendly, at least sound sexy. This goes on, not just for one hour a week, but for an operator's entire working day.

Ma Bell doesn't like to see her girls get bored, so now and then she raises standards. She insists that if some girl in the office can meet them — certainly all of us should — end then elle back and watche all her little people scrambling to out-do each other.

And so, Mr. Customer, this is what it's like to be the bitch on the other end. Some days I wish I could protect myself like some of the other employees do, and see the Company as always right and the customers as either stupid or malicious. But I can't. All I know is that I hate Ma Bell too, and I just always wanted to tell you how much.

merely intended to put it on a sound financial footing. Each year, the requested increase is touted as the one that will straighten things out. Some will argue that Bell is never granted its full request and must reapply each subsequent year. Other commentators feel that Bell is wise to the ways of the CTC and that it "has successfully applied for a given increase in permissible earnings level in the expectation that a compromise will be reached allowing for half the amount."

There will be no solution to the telephone malaise for so long as the idea of a private corporation controlling a public service remains acceptable. Despite the fact that we have nominal control through the CTC, its power—even if the political appointees on it worked for the public's interest—could do little to curb the activities of Bell. Refusal to allow fee increases, not to say the provision of reductions, would produce a proportionate lowering of the quality of existing services and improvements such that Bell would continue to procure the same returns.

So long as Bell remains privately controlled it will continue to call the shots in a game in which only the Canadian public can be the loser.

Goldblatt, Reynolds free, despite conviction

Although both were found guilty of assaulting police in the breakup of last spring's Simcoe Hall occupation, both Mark Goldblatt and Randi Reynolds are free with no criminal record.

The two were found guilty by Judge Charles Drukarsh at the conclusion of the long trial December 12, but nine days later were granted "absolute discharges" by Drukarsh, who commented that the two showed "zeal... in pursuit of an ideal".

The March occupation, in support of open stacks in the new Roberts Library for all students and the public, was broken up on its third day when then acting president Jack Sword called police on campus. Charges against 19 people arrested for trespassing were later dropped when a second occupation forced the administration to give in to some of the student demands.

However, charges of assaulting police were laid by police against Goldblatt and Reynolds and Bill Getty. Goldblatt and Tom McLaughlin were charged with obstructing police.

Goldblatt was found not guilty of obstruction by Drukarsh, who stated that the accused did not understand what he was doing at the time of his arrest.

In finding Reynolds and Goldblatt guilty of assaulting police, Drukarsh rejected defence lawyer Austin Cooper's contention that the two were not trespassing, which would have denied police legal grounds for laying the charges.

Although Cooper attempted to prove that each had "a fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to be there" (in Simcoe Hall) which under the Petty Trespass Act would have meant they were not trespassing, Drukarsh found that the defendants "knew they had no right to be there".

Cooper had also tried to prove that Sword did not intend to have the occupiers arrested for trespassing, and had indicated so to campus safety and security officer J.F. Westhead. Sword told the court in September that his explicit instructions were that those in the Senate Chamber were not to be "considered or charged as trespassers."

Conflicting evidence emerged in the testimonies of Westhead and two persons recording Sword's conversation with Westhead ordering him to call in police. One of the witnesses thought Sword did not want any trespass arrests, while the other and Westhead inferred that he did.

Drukarsh rejected Sword's testimony, saying "I am not impressed with his manner of giving it, or the evidence he gave."

No matter what Sword "thinks he said, I find as a matter of fact he did say they were trespassing," Drukarsh concluded.

The judge also concluded that each had assaulted police, as campus and Metro police had stated.

Goldblatt "knocked" a policeman off a table, and Reynolds struck and kicked at another policeman, he said.

Much of the crown attorney's final summation was directed to the issue of whether or not the occupiers thought they had a right to be in the chamber.

He thought there was a "danger" in extending the Petty Trespass Act to allow anyone feeling they had a moral right to be somewhere. He suggested as one example that if enough people felt strongly about Bell Canada's monopoly and their power to raise telephone rates, they might feel they had a right to occupy Bell's head office.

"On the Spadina Expressway or any number of good moral issues," anyone might feel they had a moral right to trespass, he said. For instance, "I'm keen to see the railways run for the consumer at low cost..."

Or, "if the University of Toronto was upset with the outcome of this case," if they occupy the court building, with the law being extended to them, the occupiers "would have undeniably felt the judge would have held them outside the law."

Instead, he felt that since the police were called to clear a building of unwanted people, the occupiers were necessarily trespassing.

McLaughlin's trial is slated to start on Monday at 10 am in courtroom 31 of the Old City Hall and continue on Tuesday, while Getty's will begin on Thursday and Friday in the same courtroom. Both have stated they intend to conduct their own defense and emphasize the political issues involved in the occupation.

Robarts gets undergrads' books

While the fate of departmental and college libraries is still up in the air, the main undergraduate collection of books next year will probably be housed in the Sigmund Samuel Library.

The Library Subcommittee of the Governing Council's Academic Affairs Committee unanimously decided at its December 6 meeting to make the present main library the undergraduate library, when the new John Robarts Library opens this summer.

The subcommittee rejected suggestions that because the present library is no longer near the centre of the campus, the main undergraduate collection ought to be closer to further west, in, for example, Sidney Smith Hall or the Robarts Library itself.

Chief librarian R.H. Blackburn told the subcommittee that the only possible place in the Robarts Library for the undergraduate books would be a combination of the basement and first floor. However the basement would have to undergo extensive renovation if it were to be used, he stated, while using the first floor would violate "political and financial commitments to the province."

The use intended for the basement, "compact storage", would have to be foregone, he added.

If the Robarts library "is allowed to be used as it was intended to be used, it will be fully used," he said.

Arts and science dean Bob Greene suggested that the purposes of the Robarts Library could be changed to allow more flexibility, but the committee eventually agreed to house the books in the Sigmund Samuel Library.

The subcommittee is also expected to recommend whether or not the political economy and history department libraries, and the New and University College Libraries should be amalgamated into the undergraduate collection.

New College principal Donald Ivey and the Political Economy Course Union, among others, have publicly opposed the proposal.

The subcommittee will also consider the question of who should be granted access to the stacks of the Robarts Library. Last March, over 600 students occupied Simcoe Hall in an attempt to win open access for all undergraduates and the public, in addition to the proposed graduate students and faculty members.

Government lifts ban

Marxist prof finally gains entry to Canada

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — Istvan Meszaros, the Marxist professor Canadian immigration authorities tried to exclude from a teaching post at York University on the grounds he was a "security risk", has apparently won his eight-month fight.

Meszaros received word January 5 that he had been granted an entry visa to Canada. He had returned to England December 29 after being in Canada fighting his case since September, he returned only after Manpower and Immigration Minister Robert Andras had assured him he would personally review the case.

Meszaros will return to Toronto January 20 to begin teaching political philosophy at York.

Meszaros' lawyer, Paul Copeland of Toronto, said the eight-month court and legal costs would be about $8000, which he hoped to collect from York University. In a similar case two years ago, York picked up the tab for the entry fight of Gabriel Kolko, noted critic of American foreign policy and now a history professor at York.

Meszaros came to Canada in September to force the government to open its files on the case. Immigration authorities declared him illegally in the country and he was ordered deported by the Immigration Review Board while Bryce Mackasey was still Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

The case received international attention and academics around the world rallied to support Meszaros. Under pressure, Mackasey to personally review the case if Meszaros returned to England. Meszaros refused because once out of the country he would have lost his right of appeal.

Mackasey then withdrew a conditional offer to allow Meszaros to stay and teach at York for one year only.

The case is notable for the question it raises about the review process in the immigration department. If Meszaros had not come to Canada, Copeland speculated it was highly unlikely his case would have been favorably reviewed.

And by using the "security risk" label, the government was able to blanket the flimsiest of evidence in secrecy, and use it as a club to which Meszaros had no defense. He had no idea what evidence the charge had been based on. Rumors floated that he was a Russian spy and at one point, Mackasey's executive assistant Zaria Levine told a newspaper reporter that Meszaros was "no golden-haired boy". Meszaros has filed suit against Levine.

With the help of New Democratic Party MP Ed Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby), himself a member of York's political science department, Meszaros got in touch with the new minister, Andras. In a telephone call December 24, Andras told Meszaros he would honor the promise of his predecessor to review the case.

Andras reportedly told Meszaros no grounds existed for his exclusion from Canada. The government wouldn't intervene in the appeal, Andras said, and Meszaros had the benefit of all possible routes of appeal. The statement in effect guaranteed the government wouldn't issue a security certificate.

The certificate would have prohibited the appeal board from opening the security risk issue. In that event, the board would have been forced to settle the Meszaros case on a strict question of law without any humanitarian considerations. In appeal cases a board ruling can be reversed on humanitarian grounds.

But more important, Andras' statement is seen by observers as proof the government had no grounds for the original charge that Meszaros was a security risk.

In September Meszaros said he thought the label came from some Canadian immigration official in London who seemed to think all Marxists were security risks and bomb throwers.

Meszaros fled Hungary in 1956 when the Stalinists regained control after the abortive uprising that year. He was a noted civil rights advocate in his homeland and served as an assistant to the cultural affairs minister in the short-lived revolutionary government.

He went to Italy and then to Britain where he later became a British citizen without any problems. While teaching at the University of Sussex he was offered a position at York and resigned. But when he applied for landed immigrant status in Canada while still in London Canadian authorities there refused and the battle began.

York University officials played a very low-keyed role in the dispute. York president David Slater sent telegrams to Mackasey but left the bulk of affairs to arts dean John Saywell.

When the original refusal of Meszaros's landed immigrant status application arrived in late June, Saywell sent Meszaros a telegram offering one year's salary as settlement, plus an offer to help Meszaros get his old job back at Sussex.

York originally agreed to pay Meszaros his salary although he wasn't teaching, but stopped payment in October and froze the bank account. At that time Meszaros couldn't touch the money and the immigration department could charge he was illegally employed if he did.

Meszaros spent the four months in Canada living with York professors Ellen and Neil Wood, studying and writing. But he said during that time the waiting game destroyed his concentration and he was doing no constructive work.

Doctors not abusing system, says physician

By GRETCHEN ROEDDE

Dr. Bette Stephenson, chairman of the Board of Directors of the Canadian Medical Association and past president of the Ontario Medical Association, defended her profession with a warm combination of skill and humour, at a television show taping Monday.

Fred Davis, host of the Screen Gems program Crossfire, questioned Stephenson on the changing image of the doctor from the kindly dedicated family physician to the doctor who is more mercenary than ethical, makes few or no house calls, and is motivated by the elitism of the profession.

Challenging this, Stephenson explained that over eight million house calls were made last year, but because of changing needs and demands, only medically expedient calls were made, excluding those of a social, supportive nature. Countering the claim that doctors are greedy, she stated, "to my experience, dear heart, money is the wrong motivation, because there isn't much in your many years of training, and the demands of the profession on your time and energy necessitate a strong ethical motive."

"Newspapers aren't entirely objective either; they have to sell newspapers. So, doctors are portrayed as cheating medicare programs. Statistically this is a small percentage."

Pat O'Neill, an executive member of the Edgley Tenants' Association, charged that doctors effectively limit the number of students in medical schools and therefore the number of doctors. Disagreeing, Stephenson retorted that attempts by overworked doctors to increase their numbers are ignored by universities and governments, the real policy makers in this area.

The problem of understaffed rural areas, particularly in the north, was mentioned by Anne Ladouceur, a Glendon sociology student. "Basically this must be solved by regional centres which supply medical services, and good transportation links," Stephenson commented.

The use of paramedics in community centres could relieve some of the strain from doctors, and could limit their class elitism, suggested Janine Smith, a crafts therapist at the Cecilia Smith Remedial Nursery School.

"Not without reducing the level of medical treatment," countered Stephenson.

"If someone comes in with a headache, you have to be able to determine if this is a simple headache, a migraine, a tension headache or a brain tumour. This takes the medical skill of the doctor."

"It is also important for doctors to have a hospital appointment to maintain professional competence through daily experience and professional contact with peers. Accountability, the aim of the community clinic, is achieved daily in the doctor-patient relationship. It is necessary competence which is important."

The experimental approach of McMaster University's medical school, which offers a three-year training program for family practice physicians, using innovative teaching methods, was considered by Stephenson as a necessary and important experiment. She hoped it wouldn't be adopted by too many schools too quickly, so that a good basis for comparison of its strengths and weaknesses could be made.

The McMaster program was set up by Dr. John Evans, now president of the University of Toronto.

Dorothy McClure, assistant professor at McMaster's School of Nursing, argued that the nurse practitioner, acting in association with the doctor, and the interdisciplinary approach in medicine will improve medical treatment and relieve some of the pressure from the doctor. Stephenson agreed, adding that preventive medicine, such as baby clinics, would also be helpful.

Asked for her opinion on the non-medical use of drugs, such as marijuana and hashish, Stephenson criticized them, primarily because of their negative effects on motivation and personality, and felt they indicated the substitution of passive external entertainment for internal resourcefulness and creativity.

Manitoba U faculty may unionize

WINNEPEG (CUP) — The University of Manitoba Faculty Association wants to make U of M Canada's first English-speaking university with unionized teaching staff.

The association has asked the university board of governors to recognize it as the collective bargaining agent for U of M's 1,080 full-time faculty members. It wants to be able to bargain not only about salaries and working conditions, but over university spending priorities.

Faculty association president professor Jonas Lehrman charged that the rapid growth in the university's student population over the past 15 years has resulted in "the development of a centralized administration which has grown remote from the faculty."

The teaching staff has lost control of university priorities because of the trend, Lehrman said.

The administration's growth is "out of all proportion to growth at other universities, not only in just size, but in power... they're stronger here than at any other university in Canada," he said.

As examples of misplaced priorities Lehrman cited the 26 percent cut in research grants last year and the low budgetary allocation to the library, while administrative costs were one of the highest in Canada.

University president Ernest Sirluck has denied the charges, claiming administrative costs declined last year on a percentage basis.

The faculty association has asked the board of governors to decide whether to grant voluntary recognition by February 1. If the board refuses recognition, the association will take its case to the Manitoba Labor Relations Board.

Lehrman said about 75 percent of the faculty members belong to the association and that the organization has collected signatures from "a good majority" of the faculty to support its request for recognition.

No teaching staffs in English-speaking Canadian universities are unionized. But the faculty at the University of Quebec and at many American universities are represented by union organizations.

The Graduate Students' Union at the University of Toronto is currently trying to unionize teaching assistants there with little apparent success. The Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) is studying a proposal to affiliate to the Canadian Labor Congress, but many observers foresee a rocky road for the plan. Most local faculty associations belong to CAUT.

Elsewhere in Manitoba, the faculty associations at Brandon University and at the University of Winnipeg say they are watching their University of Manitoba counterparts' efforts with interest. But both are merely filing the agreements they have negotiated with their respective faculty associations with the Manitoba department of labor for enforcement, rather than seeking collective bargaining certification for themselves.

Brandon University Faculty Association president Bob Florida explained the group will simply send the labor board agreements signed in the last two years, and the labor board will enforce them. He said university negotiators have not objected to the plan.

The Brandon board of governors "has voluntarily recognized our group as the body which bargains for the faculty. Manitoba never did so they have to go through the certification route," Florida said.

Swimmers splash Waterloo in exhibition meet

By PAUL CARSDN

The men's swimming team began a defense of its OUAA championship with a 84-29 exhibition victory over the University of Waterloo Saturday in the Benson Building pool. The competition was first in a series of exhibition dual meets leading to the league championship in late February.

Blues were expected to win handily Saturday, and a series of outstanding performances from some freshman swimmers indicate Varsity must be regarded as an almost prohibitive favorite to win its 13th consecutive OUAA title.

After the meet was opened by a relatively slow 400 medley relay, newcomer John Sebben provided a sample of things to come by registering his best ever career time, winning the 1000-yard freestyle in 10:39.2. Waterloo's reputed depth in freestyle events failed to materialize.

Sebben later produced the match of the day, erasing the former pool and Varsity team record in the 200-yard breaststroke by almost five seconds. Expected to provide only a feeble challenge to former record-holder Nick Rottmann and veteran Wayne Phillips, Sebben recorded 2:20.6 in an event that rarely sees records broken this early in the season.

Another Blues' rookie, Shawn Laari, also came away with two victories — first in the 200-yard freestyle, spotting the other entries almost a full body length after 100-yards, and then a personal best of 2:11 in the 200-yard breaststroke.

Varsity captain Jim Adams, holder of national intercollegiate records in the freestyle sprints, led the veterans with two easy victories. Adams clocked 22.1 in the 50-yard freestyle, one-fifth of a second short of his CIAU record. Several events later he swam the 500-yard freestyle in 5:08 despite a lack of any serious competition from Waterloo.

Two other familiar names also registered victories, as Rob Peeling swam his fastest career time of 2:10 in the 200-yard butterfly and John Twohig won a somewhat leisurely 100-yard freestyle in 53.5.

Nick Rottmann, returning after a year of ineligibility, joined the parade of best ever times by winning the 200-yard individual medley in 2:13.9, and Blues closed the meet with an almost perfunctory display

The moral and practical question that confronts us is, "Are intercollegiate athletics to be measured in terms of what they do for the morale or budget of an institution? Or are they to be measured in terms of what they do for the participants — the standard test we have used historically in evaluating amateur athletics? Are they, in short, to be participant printed or spectator oriented?"

—Jack Scott,
The Athletic Revolution

in the 400 freestyle relay, still several yards better than the dejected Waterloo entry.

Lester Newby gave Waterloo its only victory by taking the one metre diving but Varsity's Alex Lau came back with a solid first place showing off the three metre board.

Varsity coach Robin Campbell said after the meet that the numerous excellent times probably indicated the success of Blues' extensive training program in Fort Lauderdale during the Christmas

The Verity—Phil Stramba

Most swimmers pace themselves at this stage of the season so as not to burn themselves out prior to the final championship meet. Consequently, Blues' Saturday times are considerably faster than what was expected and indicate Varsity might even have a stronger team than was thought when Blues won the annual DUAA relay meet last November.

"With Sebben and Laari plus Dave Wilken and Dave Chutter joining our proven veterans, we seem to be in good shape," Campbell said with a trace of understatement.

Blues will be headed for their sixth national college title in seven years with the aid of Olympian Byron McDonald. McDonald placed sixth in the 200-metre butterfly at Munich and with the retirement of Mark Spitz, he must be rated among the top five in the world for the butterfly. He has been accepted into the M8A program and should be eligible for intercollegiate competition by this weekend.

Blues next dual meet action is Saturday at 2 pm against the University of Western Ontario in the Benson pool. The meet should see McDonald matched against another ex-Olympian, Bill Kennedy, now swimming for Western.

The following is a summary of Saturday's meet:

Warriors hand Blues another loss, 78-52

By BOB PRITCHARD

Basketball Blues started the new year on the wrong foot losing to Waterloo Warriors 78-52 Saturday in the Bensom Gym. Fortunately, it was only an exhibition game.

It wasn't until the second half that Warriors began to dominate the game. Waterloo, which not uncommonly scores 100 points in a game, only managed to put in 29 in the first half, seven points more than Blues with 22. Toronto's zone defence didn't allow Waterloo to gain the momentum Warriors' coach Don McCrae says his team plays best with.

But Waterloo succeeded in speeding up the pace of the game, and with some quick baskets, stretched the lead to 52-24 after only four minutes of play in the second half. Warriors took complete control of the first eight minutes of the half, outscoring Blues 25-10. After that, Varsity never got close enough to threaten Warriors, who by the end of the game had increased their lead even further to make the final score 78-52.

Varsity did manage to put together a good defensive game in the first half. Using its standard but effective 1-2-2 zone defence, Blues kept the Waterloo team from penetrating for any solid shots. Blues also managed to control their own boards, out-rebounding Waterloo in the first twenty minutes; and depriving Warriors of second chances on their missed shots. Toronto also had a better shooting percentage in the half—33 per cent compared to Waterloo's 31 per cent.

It was largely the efforts of Waterloo's Tom Kieswetter that sparked Warriors play in the second half. On defence, Kieswetter stole the ball right out of Blues' hands on several occasions. On offence, the Waterloo guard was accurate on the basket from almost anywhere on the court, leading his team's scoring with 18 points.

Fortunately for Varsity, Warriors were without the services of starters Mike Moser, who scored 39 points in a game against Carleton, and Steve Ignatavicius, former all star at Toronto's St. Michael's High School. Both were sidelined with injuries. Toronto's Randy Filinski, still bothered by a leg injury, sat out the second half and Tony Rudnik, having just returned from a vacation, also did not play.

Tip Offs: Blues lost to Laurentian Voyageurs 74-65 in Sudbury on December 9 in league play. That gives Blues a league record of two wins, three losses. Tomorrow night Varsity travels to Waterloo for an exhibition match against Lutheran.

Blues earn 3-0-1 record in Poland

Hockey Blues ended their Polish tour last night on a winning note, defeating Balidon of Katowice, Poland, 9-2. Blues led 3-0 after the first period and 7-0 after the second. Defenceman Mike Keenan led Blues' against Balidon with two goals, while singles went to Neil Kozzack, Albie Shames, Rick Leroy, Bob Munro, Kent Ruhnke, Don Pagnutti, and Bill Fifield.

Varsity completed its four-game tour against first-division Polish teams with a 3-0-1 record, tying the first game overseas and winning the final three. Last night's win, however, was Blues' most decisive. In other games the team defeated GKS of Katowice 4-2, a second Polish team 7-6, and tied GKS 2-2.

In Blues' 2-2 tie, GKS Katowice scored both its goals with Toronto a man short; Blues also took all three penalties in the game. Gord Davies and Neil Kozzack scored for Varsity, as the Toronto team outshot its host 30-29. In Blues' narrow 7-6 win Bruce Herridge popped in three goals.

Toronto's only other game in Poland saw a seesaw fight for the lead. GKS scored first early in the opening period but Neil Kozzack tied the score. Although Don Pagnutti gave Blues a 2-1 lead in the second period, the Polish team quickly added the equalizer. However, Doug Tate and Mike Keenan finally put Varsity ahead to stay in the third period, and Blues' defence held to give the team a 4-2 victory.

Meanwhile, on the Canadian circuit, Blues broke the Christmas and Chanukah season jinx that has plagued the team for the past two years, winning two exhibition and two league games. Varsity suffered its only setback with a 5-3 loss to St. Mary's in Halifax. (Toronto also tied St. Mary's 5-5 in its other exhibition game in Halifax.)

Blues defeated Sir George Williams Georgians 5-3 December 16 in Montreal to avenge their only defeat up to that point in the season (a 4-3 loss by Toronto in Varsity Arena on November 24). Georgians' exhibition loss was their fourth straight defeat.

Varsity was determined not to play Georgians' slow-skating, hard-hitting game, but instead attempted to skate the Sir George players out of the rink. Referee Lorne Wayne successfully slowed the game's tempo, awarding numerous penalties to both teams in the first forty minutes. The situation became so confused that referee Wayne and the timekeeper had to hold a meeting during the first intermission; players who were supposed to be on the ice were in the penalty box and vice versa.

Toronto scored first at 5:32 of the first period off a bouncing shot by Rick Leroy from centre which evaded goalie Bernie Wolfe. Neil Kozzack and Gord Davies added two more goals for Toronto in the second period, but Georgians' Mark Shewchuk and John Logan kept the game close. Bill Fifield and Bob Munro finished off Blues' scoring in the third period and Georgians were only able to add a third goal by Dave Logan, to make the final score 5-3.

The night before Blues had defeated Loyola Warriors to win the Heidelberg Challenge Cup, presented annually to the winner of the match. Varsity won the game on goals by Don Pagnutti (unassisted), Nick Holmes, Ivan McFarlane and two from Bob Munro; for Loyola it was Doug Lynch with two, while Ron Hansis added Warriors' other. One high point of the game was Ivan McFarlane's penalty shot, successfully stopped by Loyola goalie Dan Fournier.

Toronto's only league games — the only ones to count for points — resulted in a 5-0 defeat of the University of Windsor on December 9 in Windsor and an 8-1 rout of Western Mustangs at home on December 6. Blues go into the second half of their schedule leading up to the OCAA championship with a 7-0 record.

Varsity returns to the arena Friday evening for a game against Ryerson Rams. In the initial encounter between the two teams this season Blues won 15-2. Radio Varsity will carry the game live beginning at 8 pm.

Marketing athletics: how U of T pays for its sports program

Intercollegiate sport has become a business at U of T, according to several men involved with football in the athletic department.

This is one conclusion that can be drawn from a study prepared last spring by two fourth year undergraduate students, Stewart MacSween and Tom Loumankis. The paper analyzes trends in attendance at U of T football games, and its conclusions could similarly be applied to intercollegiate hockey and basketball attendance — the so-called "big three".

Coaches interviewed

One section of the paper, containing the results of interviews with several people involved with football at U of T, shows a definite bias within the men's athletic department favouring the opening up and further development of the intercollegiate football "market" for entertainment.

Football attendance has vacillated in the years since the Second World War. The high point of 25,589 spectators per game in 1950 has since dropped to a low of 11,000 in 1971. (Until recent years, Blues hockey game attracted full houses. Lately, the arena has been left with empty seats.)

Several coaches blame the drop on poor marketing of the "product". Head football coach Ron Murphy said, "Nowadays, you have to sell your product". Assistant coach Tom Watt added that football is not promoted enough. Another assistant coach, John McManus wants a greater ticket distribution effort: "There are not enough outlets to sell tickets; there should be an outlet at every college and faculty."

A premise that both the authors of the study and the people interviewed appear to accept is that the "product" belongs to the athletic department to sell. Granted, the coaches have helped to package the product — that is, the skilled player —, but what gives them the right to sell it — in this case another man's labour — for gate returns?

In the 1971 to 1972 season football income from fees, broadcasting rights, programs and gate receipts totalled $23,461; for hockey it was $15,848, according to the University of Toronto Athletic Association Financial Statements.

Do the players who earn the money for the athletic department have any more than a token say in where the product of their labour goes, and what part of the athletic program it affects? According to athletic director Dalt White, the athletic department has spent more for football and hockey (in at least the past two seasons) than it has brought in in revenue. However, what will happen in the future if the "market" picks up again? The UTAAs has no statement of policy or priorities.

Lack of publicity is also cited as a factor causing decreasing attendance. Murphy claims that lack of publicity and coverage by The Varsity and local newspapers has affected attendance. A third assistant football coach, Dave Copp, says, "Physical education people do not go out and advertise their product" and the university "should have a full-time public relations man to promote football and sports in general". (U of T's men's athletic department already employs Paul Carson as part-time publicity director.) Copp even goes so far as to advocate that the "athletic department should bring out their own newspaper to promote their products". Watt believes, "Public papers should be persuaded to cover more college football. At present, intercollegiate teams have to compete with professional teams."

Do intercollegiate teams want to compete with pro teams for the public's entertainment dollar? Is that what university "physical education" is training them to do? Athletic director Dalt White said Monday, "I don't think they want to compete at all. I don't think university teams want to do any such thing. I think we're forced to compete in order to earn revenue to support our programs." (White added, "We don't want to be part of a feeder system to the pros. There's very little co-operation between the pros and colleges. As a result, the scouts haven't been too happy with us.")

However, all those interviewed are more than convinced that publicity is a major factor in opening up U of T's potential "market". Copp wants to "approach the business school to try and find the marketability of Varsity football tickets". Watt, White, and McManus all feel there's a need for a full-time publicity man. Phys ed professor and former intramural football player K.A.W. Wipper believes a "public relations man is needed to sell college football to the public that is worth their attention." White adds, "We should sell the public the excellent product that we have at U of T."

Have these men asked the players? The Athletic Directorate is "responsible for all athletic policy" according to a booklet put out by the UTAAs. "All athletic schedules and the appointment of coaches and managers are made on the recommendation of the Director of Athletics to the Athletic Directorate." The booklet notes. At present, the Athletic Directorate is composed of 20 members, only seven of which are students. In 1971-72, students' fees made up $201,901 of the total UTAAs budget of $254,089; yet, students have only one-third representation on the UTAAs.

Coaches' solutions

The coaches interviewed offered various solutions to alleviate the shortage of needed revenue from intercollegiate football. For example, all people interviewed believed television exposure can help attendance at football games; no mention was made of the negative aspects of television. Murphy said, "Exposure of the game on television can only help (attendance)." Copp commented, "Television exposure of college games might help to increase attendance if used properly." Wipper said, "Television exposure is good; the more people that see the games the more will identify with them, therefore they may attend more games." Watt concurred, "More exposure of Canadian college football might increase public interest."

However, profits from televised college games go to the Ontario Union of Athletic Associations. For example, CHCH-TV in Hamilton pays the OUAA $22,000 per year for a three year contract, while the CBC pays $100,000 to the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletics Union for a 10-year contract. The money is used to subsidize participation in play-offs and the OUAA publicity office at Waterloo. (The University of Waterloo budget for 1973-74 has a figure of $13,500 under the income column for "OUAA Offset".) The players apparently have no say in where the profits from their labour go and, much less, they are not even consulted.

Professional sport has already been considerably altered and college sport in the United States has become professionalized with the help of big business, including the media. Canadian university sport is already suffering the initial effects of television "interference". For example, Kilchener-Waterloo's CKCO-TV recently entered into an agree-only help." Blues hockey attendance has decreased in the past two or three years. Coincidentally, Blues have been Ontario university champions for the past seven years; people now expect a winning team, so why go see a game?

In the MacSween-Loumankis study, White observes that the "break-up of the Big Four (Queen's, Western, McGill, Toronto) has had an adverse effect (since 1971) on grads; they came because they were familiar with the opposition." Both McManus and Wipper said breaking up old rivalries has hurt attendance and "we must set up new ones." New opposition? New "enemies" for the team and fans to collectively "kill" for their school?

Alternative solutions

Ironically, MacSween and Loumankis have stated a major factor in the decrease of attendance at intercollegiate games.

ment with the University of Waterloo to televise some of the home athletic events during the current season. University of Waterloo men's athletic director Carl Tolzke said, "It's our opinion that we have a product that the viewing public will find quite interesting."

Another solution offered by the football people interviewed to the problem of decreasing attendance involved a campaign to get alumni out to buy tickets and help fund the athletic program. Murphy says, "We should push our grads to buy more tickets. We must get out and sell college football and other intercollegiate sports to the public." Copp believes the athletic department "should hold receptions for the alumni to get them more involved." McManus agreed, "There should be a place for the alumni to meet before and after a game — this would increase those interested and the frequency of attendance."

Most of the people interviewed saw the loss of old rivalries and tradition as an important factor in sagging attendance and getting out the "market". Murphy noted, "Breaking up old rivalries hurts us most with grads. With new rivalries and the inequalities that occur, we are bound to be hurt in attendance." Varsity hockey coach Tom Watt said that "tradition is very important to many people; therefore rivalries can

However, they by-pass the real point without further analysis. They say, "In this age where students are making strong demands for recognition of their individuality, their right of self-expression, and personal involvement in the school, sports today cannot afford to drag its feet by holding to old traditions and crewcut stereotypes. Continued alienation of the student body may eventually find students withdrawing their support and financial assistance from the athletic program leaving the undesirable situation where programs will have to fend for themselves."

A number of "minor" intercollegiate sports already have to "fend for themselves" at this university. Why must intercollegiate sports at the University of Toronto have to sell itself in order to pay for its other athletic programs? The administration at this university has not seen fit over the years to support the "body education" of its students. The government of this province has left the university up in the air about athletic facilities for the past few years while it has supported the $42 million expenditure for a controversial and elitist "graduate" library. Even as late as Monday — over one month after the announcement of the provincial government's freeze on further capital expenditures — Dalt White had no idea of whether or not a new men's athletic building would be constructed.

The bureaucracy at the athletic department and the students and coaches involved in physical education appear to have accepted the boundaries of the system and to have chosen to work within it. They have not organized to fight and persuade. As a result, the athletic community at this university is apparently seen by Simcoe Hall to be separate and distinct from the rest of the educational affairs of the university community.

The dollar-conscious mentality of the athletic department has been imposed on it by necessity — to pay in part for other athletic programs and the maintenance of facilities — and it is maintained through "tradition". At other universities in this province, the university community as a whole has decided that athletics is a "good" if organized properly, and the provincial government has decided to foot the bill for adequate athletic facilities. Ron Murphy said at the time of the football study that the University of Toronto Athletic Association has paid the University of Toronto back money borrowed to build the stadium and arena, so it hasn't cost the university one cent to run these facilities.

At other universities the administration has made athletics enough of a priority to pay staff rather than have salaries paid from student athletic fees (as at U of T). At other universities students have control over the operating costs of their athletic departments (operating costs are equal to the number of students times the per capita athletic fee of each student). Elsewhere in Ontario and Canada, co-ed physical recreation is the rule and not the exception and facilities are combined for mutual use with few complaints from students of either sex.

Should athletics at this university be left alone to die from natural causes? Should students have control of the money they put into athletics (through a university-wide structure), or should the athletic bureaucracy dictate its terms to students? Should separate athletic facilities continue to exist at U of T? Apparently, these are some of the many questions which must be resolved.

York yields on OSAP cheques

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — At York university, one occupation related to the fees strike is over and another continues.

The struggles began at Glendon College Tuesday and spread the next day to the main campus over the university's refusal to release student award cheques without first deducting tuition fees.

This action prevented a potential 3,000 students out of 13,000 from taking part in the provincially organized fee strike against the government.

But yesterday, in a complete reversal of its original stand, York administrators announced that all student award cheques will be released without first deducting tuition fees. York president David Slater also announced that fines for late payment have been waived for the term. At Glendon, students who were forced to pay their fees in order to get their grants will have the full sum of their cheques returned to them.

Delegates from Glendon said this satisfied their demands and Glendon students voted to end the occupation. But students at the main campus also asked the administration to endorse the program of the Ontario Federation of Students in its cut-backs campaign.

Slater refused: "I strongly support improving the lot of students. But I will not commit myself and the administration to your package," he told 40 students occupying the awards office.

The students later decided to stay as the demand had been ratified at a meeting of 250 students earlier in the afternoon.

A mass meeting is scheduled for tomorrow to discuss further action. At present, the occupiers are asking other campuses to participate in solidarity with their action and in support of the OFS campaign.

Glendon students said tonight in a press release that the administration's changed policy was "a small victory in attempts to bring about major change in government policy. The occupation would never have been necessary if York had been a democratic institution. We shall now continue with the tuition fee strike and our fight in university financing and structures."

Slater claimed the reversal in policy on OSAP cheques came from new direction from the provincial government. Slater said colleges and

Students at Glendon, where the occupations began over OSAP cheques, vote to stay overnight.

THE Varsity

VOL. 93, No. 39
FRI., JAN. 12, 1973
TORONTO

universities minister Jack McNie told him in a telephone call yesterday morning that the universities could release cheques "as if the students receiving cheques have, or will, make arrangements for payment of their fees."

"This position differs greatly from directives we had as late as yesterday afternoon," Slater said. On Tuesday, Slater called the university "the innocent and sympathetic intermediaries in the OSAP relationship." He said York was following a 1969 government directive that said the "first call on the funds issued to students... is the payment of outstanding fees owed to the institution."

Slater also asked McNie for assurances that after releasing the cheques, the university would not be forced to give out information on students who didn't pay their fees.

Slater said McNie recommended withholding marks or de-registering students as penalties for unpaid fees. But a 1970 York resolution passed by senate forbids academic penalties for non-academic offences in the university. Slater said this would not be changed.

At its final meeting before the first term ended, the senate endorsed the demands of the OFS which is pressing for a more equitable loan program, a lower age of independence, and full and public discussion of government policy in post-secondary education.

Glendon students began their occupation 3 pm Tuesday when they learned that students were being forced to pay their fees in order to get their OSAP cheques.

The occupation continued through the night with about 20 students sleeping in the liberated office and up to 100 students congregating there and in the halls outside.

The liberal-minded Glendon administration co-operated with the students. In fact principal Albert Tucker bought all the students pizza.

Glendon, the only college in Ontario with staff-student parity on hiring, firing and tenure committees, gave no threat of any action to remove the students.

Tucker told a meeting of about 300 students Wednesday that the York University administration was caught in the middle between students and the government.

"This problem has resulted from an arbitrary decision without consultation by the provincial government. I don't agree with the decision but Glendon is bound by the policy," he added.

Tucker claimed the University of Toronto is an "exception." "Only Laurentian and Carleton are giving students OSAP cheques and Carleton is already $80,000 behind," he added.

"Why should the university suffer when the burden lies with the government?"

U of T SAC president Eric Miglin called the York administration "chicken".

"The universities must stand up to the government," he said.

Faculty of Food Science may be on line

By MARK BOHNEN

The continued existence of the Faculty of Food Sciences at U of T will be questioned in a Monday meeting of the Food Sciences Implementation Committee.

At that time, the committee will be voting on a series of motions concerning proposals for the future of the Faculty of Food Sciences and its various subdivisions. Associate arts dean James Cruise, chairman of the committee, would not reveal the content of the motions.

Meetings of the committee are closed, but Cruise told The Varsity in October that "the sense of the discussions" did not have to be treated as confidential.

Cruise would not predict whether or not the final recommendations of the committee would call for the abolition of the faculty, but admitted "I would rather consider this as one of a number of possibilities."

In an interview, Cruise said that the "strong possibility" that the faculty would be abolished has existed ever since vice-provost of health sciences Dr. John Hamilton recommended its phasing out over a three-year period.

"The reasons haven't changed much," he said.

"There are not many students taking the home economics courses." He cited Guelph as an alternative centre for this area of study.

In January 1971, Hamilton proposed that the faculty be phased out. He claimed that there was an insufficient demand for graduates, that there was a high cost for the university to maintain the faculty, and that the faculty was superfluous in view of the availability of similar courses elsewhere in the province.

However, an investigating Senate committee later found that, contrary to Hamilton's opinion, there is a demand for dietitians, nutritionists, food chemists and high quality secondary school teachers of home economics. It also found that the university could combat the high cost.

The implementation committee was charged with examining the feasibility of the report's recommendations and the mechanisms required to carry them out.

Food Sciences dean Ira Armstrong and other members of the staff were critical of the role they saw the committee playing in possibly abolishing the faculty.

"One wonders whether they are really implementing these motions or their own ideas," Armstrong said.

Replying to this criticism, Cruise stated, "Our committee examined the feasibility of implementation, and if anything (in the Senate report) is not feasible, we make another report".

Irene Miller, Food Science student on the committee, made it clear however, that the faculty would not disappear at the campus level. She saw the role of the committee as one of "strengthening and generating enthusiasm for the courses".

Cruise indicated that the form of abolition of the faculty may be a recommendation that "streams of specialization" in the faculty would be organized under the Faculty of Arts and Sciences and other faculties as well.

Even if it decides on retention of the faculty, the committee may recommend that parts of it be moved to other faculties.

"Parts of the Food Sciences are seriously isolated academically as well as physically," Cruise said. "They would have the advantage of being more viable if realigned with other courses".

Miller, who is also a SAC representative, agreed. "The courses will be good and strong and recognized at the university level."

She upheld a "maximum utilization of present university resources" and increased operation, as forces in different programs are brought together. She also praised the increasing stress of the committee on a "cross fertilization of resources."

However, a number of Food Science faculty members view the reorganization of the faculty's courses under other faculties as its death knell.

"We wouldn't like it," said professor C. Dunkley. "The base from which to work is lost, and the program disintegrates."

She felt that not only if the courses remain under the present faculty will the budget, staff and resources remain strong.

One committee member who preferred to remain anonymous said, "The Senate report gave our faculty a clean bill of health. Now the committee is trying to break it up. Why break up something that is a recognized and viable entity?"

The member pointed out that the "Faculty of Food Sciences is closely integrated. If we separate food and nutrition from the faculty, it's like cutting off a thumb."

"This faculty is the only one where the three basic needs, food, shelter and clothing, are integrated under a general philosophy."

Regarding the use of facilities, Cruise spoke about the possibility of a polling of resources of Food Chemistry, Medical Sciences and the School of Hygiene.

He could not say whether the university might someday use the food sciences building for other purposes. The property it occupies, at Bloor Street and Avenue Road, is extremely valuable land.

U of T prof elected N. York board head

By SANDY BOGART

U of T physics professor Lynn Trainor was elected chairman of the North York Board of Education, January 3, while stressing decentralization as a major concern.

In his inaugural address, Trainor added that he intends to maintain the "free spirit" of the individual board members, while constructing a coherent programme of education goals.

Trainor intends to set up task forces of board members to investigate six major areas which he personally feels need attention.

The first deals with long-term education perspectives. Trainor cited investigating the viability of the 15 year kindergarten to grade 13 system, to see if and how it could be "telescoped" into a shorter time period.

He added that the role of secondary schools should be examined both in terms of post-secondary education and the employment market.

Trainor said a second task force would examine long-term administrative organization designed to achieve "greater grass-roots participation" in organizing educational programmes and priorities.

He mentioned the new "family of schools" concept, instituted in September, which grouped area senior high schools with junior and elementary schools. This, he said, provided more local autonomy, a greater education continuum, increased contact between teachers and sharing of facilities and personnel.

A third task force would form a liaison between the North York and separate school boards in order to increase co-operation between the boards and the sharing of facilities.

Another area to be examined, Trainor said, was "the relationship of public education to the needs and aspirations of various language, religious, and cultural groups in North York."

Citing the Italian and Jewish communities in North York as examples, Trainor voiced the desire that schools apart from the public education system would be able to have a closer relationship with it if the system were "sufficiently flexible." He suggested a more flexible curriculum as central to this concept.

With emphasis on decentralization, Trainor proposed a fifth task force to examine the relationship between the North York and the Metro Toronto boards, plus the provincial minister of education.

He expressed concern over the ceiling imposed by the provincial government, which limits the amount of money which may be spent per student in Toronto. He said these "brakes on spending" may have detrimental effects on the system, such as increased class sizes.

SAC meeting occupied to force fees debate

By JULIA ÉLCOCK
For the first time in Students Administrative Council history a council meeting has been occupied by students.

The confrontation took place at Wednesday night's SAC meeting in the Debates Room at Hart House when members of the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee attempted to force the council to discuss the fee strike earlier than the agenda proposed.

About 15 members of SSSC, which was founded by the Canadian Liberation Movement, barred the doors when the meeting was adjourned in an attempt to force the council to discuss the strike. Scuffles broke out after SAC members attempted to leave the room and UC

SAC rep Marty Stollar is considering laying assault charges against one SSSC member.

The meeting had proceeded normally with the election of Erin-dale representative Paul Bannon over Innis rep Mike Edwards 20-14 to the post of finance commissioner, replacing Vince De Angelo who resigned. Engineering rep Charles Vickery was acclaimed as services commissioner replacing Bill Steadman, who also resigned.

Council then moved to discuss in camera the appointment of two SAC employees, Paul Carson as executive assistant and Peter Milic as communications and services assistant. SSSC charged that this was an attempt to continue the fees discussion without their presence and they refused to leave the room until council discussed the fees strike. SAC refused to accede to their demand and SSSC continued to refuse to leave.

In an interview during the meeting SSSC chairman Peter Havers said that it was obvious that the student fee strike was not the most important matter at present for SAC. He charged that SAC is "making a deal with administration" and that they are trying to prevent any united action on the fee strike by dividing students and not taking a firmer stand on it.

Both SAC and the university hope to prevent the sit-ins which have taken place at Glendon College and at York university over the fee strike. Havers claimed. He also accused SAC president Eric Miglin of having personal interest in the development of the fee strike.

The proof of SAC's lack of concern for the fee strike, according to Havers, is that the OSAP cheques were being released by the university despite the threat of a fee strike and that both the university and the council were attacking the trust fund set up by the SSSC to combat the fees increase.

A motion was introduced by Stollar that the fees issue should be struck from the agenda. At this point, new members of the SSSC arrived and the meeting dissolved into chaos. SSSC charged that SAC was using procedural methods to keep the fees issue from discussion and SAC accused them with disrupting the flow of business.

Stollar charged that the SSSC had no interest in discussing the fees issue and was trying to embarrass council.

General confusion ensued and again the meeting dissolved into shouting and recriminations. A few minutes later a motion was carried to adjourn the meeting, as it was obvious that it could not proceed.

At this point the SSSC blocked the doors and refused to let anyone out of the room until the fee strike was discussed. Several SAC members made an attempt to break through the human barricades, which resulted in a short scuffle. The meeting then disintegrated.

According to SAC vice-president John Helliwell, most members of the executive met in an emergency meeting after the adjournment and agreed to "make a statement to condemn the (SSSC) trust fund."

Miglin said in an interview yesterday that he was "very surprised" with Wednesday's meeting and "it is the first time anything like that has happened".

He also denied Havers' charges that the fee strike is not the most important issue at present, citing the fact that it had been the major item on the agenda for half of this year's SAC meetings. The reason that it was not on the top of the agenda, he said was because there were a number of groups applying for grants who had already been kept waiting for a long time.

Miglin said that SAC had taken a firm stand on the fees issue but that it did not endorse the trust fund set up by SSSC. It is the informal "consensus of council to condemn the trust fund" he said, saying that "students get locked into that fund" and they have "no option as an individual to get out of it".

Miglin also said that he has it on "good information" that there are not more than 30 or 40 people in the trust fund.

A leaflet issued yesterday by the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee attempted to link Miglin and newly appointed vice-president Jill Conway to prove that he "has a deal with the administration."

"Miglin has a scholarship to Harvard to protect and Conway is herself a Harvard graduate," the leaflet states. "The fact that SAC refused to discuss the fees strike... proves a deal has been made."

Miglin yesterday denied these charges. He added that he may consider legal action and labelled such statements "libelous".

Conway, however, confirmed last night that she and campus coordinator Lois Reimer had met outside 215 Huron Street Monday with Miglin and three SAC reps and they had agreed it would be a good idea that for SAC to warn students that it was not behind the SSSC trust fund.

As for SSSC claims that Conway had ordered campus police to take the unprecedented action of guarding the SAC warning signs, the vice-president replied, "In fact, I had no idea anybody was guarding them."

The leaflet also says, "We have reason to believe that SAC will try to prevent The Varsity from telling the students the truth."

Jocks open joint

By BOB GAUTHIER

The U of T men's athletic directorate will decide at its next meeting whether it will open its traditionally closed meetings to the university community.

Men's athletic director Dalt White brought up the question of open meetings at Tuesday evening's meeting the first in 1973.

Directorate chairman Dr. G. E. Wodehouse said yesterday that the subject of open meetings was "discussed at the last meeting — Dalt White raised the matter. This was discussed by Paul Cadario (SAC rep to the directorate) and the rest."

Wodehouse said that the opening of meetings was on the agenda for the next meeting, and added, "As far as I know the next meeting won't be open: the one after it probably will be."

The athletic directorate is responsible for all athletic policy. All athletic schedules and the appointment of coaches and managers are made on the recommendation of the director of athletics to the athletic directorate, which is composed of 20 members, only seven of whom are students.

Cadario concurred that "openness is on the agenda for the next athletic directorate meeting." He added that one professor appointed to the directorate had spoken against openness at Tuesday's meeting, saying that "open meetings lead to polarization and confrontation". Cadario, however, was not able to remember the professor's name.

Cadario said that he and another student member of the directorate, Michael Penman, made the point at Tuesday's meeting that "the athletic directorate has nothing to hide and the meetings should therefore be open."

Although mention was made that the minutes of the meetings are available to the university community, the minutes only reveal what decisions are made, not why they are made. When The Varsity asked for copies of the minutes last September, its request was refused.

The athletic directorate comes under campus services portfolio of the Internal Affairs committee of the new Governing Council.

Regarding the UTAA's relation to the Internal Affairs Committee, Ross said "I don't think it's been clearly defined yet."

When asked whether he knew if and when the matter of the UTAA's accountability to the university would come up for discussion in Internal Affairs, Ross replied, "I don't know. At present, it's not, to my knowledge, on the agenda. I would personally expect that it would come up by the end of the year, but that's only my opinion."

Cadario, who is also chairman of Internal Affairs, said yesterday, "If the athletic directorate decides at its next meeting, it doesn't want to have open meetings, then this is something I'd be prepared to have the Governing Council discuss."

"The Governing Council decided earlier in the academic year that most of its meetings would be open.

Interdisc head chosen

By BRIANE NASIMOK

Arts and science dean Boh Greene announced Monday that he has chosen someone as the new chairman of Interdisciplinary Studies.

However, he told the General Committee of arts and science that he could not make the name public, since the person has not yet accepted the position.

Greene said last night that his nominee has not yet accepted or rejected the offer. The decision will not be made until Monday or Tuesday, he thought.

Students were not consulted in the choice. Greene explained to the committee that arts and science considers Interdisciplinary Studies to be a program, not a department as its chairman Geoffrey Payzant contends. Thus, not even a committee to select the chairman was required, leaving the power lying fully with Greene.

Several student committee members seemed upset at the lack of student input into the decision.

The executive of the Arts and Science Student Union wrote Greene in December "regretting the fact that there will be no students directly involved in the choosing of a new chairman.

They recommended six people who they felt would be "capable of competently occupying the post; Professors P. Fitting (French, St. Michael's), Chris Plowright (Zoology), Ben Shek (French, University College), Tony Smith (Sociology), J.L. Turk (sociology) and Ken Walker (Sociology).

In late November, Payzant called an emergency meeting of Interdisciplinary Studies staff and students, fearing that the department might be on its deathbed because Greene had failed to find a replacement for Payzant, who is retiring.

Payzant was also afraid that the budget for Interdisciplinary Studies would be inadequate to maintain it at its present level. Subsequently, he has been assured that funding from arts and science would continue at approximately the same level as this year, but outside funding will be cut off.

Decision on end of departmental libraries postponed by committee

No decision was reached Wednesday by an advisory committee on a recommendation that the political economy and history branch libraries be amalgamated into a new enlarged undergraduate collection.

The library subcommittee of the Governing Council's Academic Affairs Committee appeared to be moving to a polarization on the question. Student members Kathy Feldman and Brian Morgan questioned the need for amalgamation, while arts and science dean Bob Greene and UC principal Archie Hallett called themselves "advocates" of the Mueller report, which recommended the amalgamation.

A brief submitted by the Political Economy Course Union came out strongly against any amalgamation. It stressed the convenience and excellent service of political economy's library which it said was "essential" to students.

The brief, co-authored by PECU chairman John DeMarco and executive members Howard Stein and Bob Bettson also stressed the fact that circulation this year is up, reversing the downward trend of the last five years.

The Mueller committee had used the declining use of the branch libraries to justify ending what they termed "the arbitrary nature of service" they provide.

Chief Librarian Bob Blackburn circulated the latest statistics that showed increase in circulation for the last two months in 1972 of 20-30 percent for both history and political economy Branch libraries.

He claimed that part of the increase was due to professors telling the students to use the libraries more in order to save them.

The committee as a whole seemed to want to hear representations from the faculty and students of both departments. But Greene said it was safe to say that both departments were "reconciled" to the Mueller recommendation.

He claimed the course union was not representative of all students taking Political Economy courses.

Bettson replied "what about the petition PECU circulated last year to save the political economy library?" Over 600 signatures were collected, according to Stein.

The PECU brief charged Blackburn with already having moved to close the library before the decision was made, by cutting off new book purchases.

This has been confirmed by Political Economy librarian Francis Eastman, who was unable to comment further because of her position as an employee of the library.

SGS dean Ed Safarian, an economics professor, said that while he was sorry to see the library go, he believed the Mueller recommendation was in "the right direction".

Hallett and Greene, who served on the Mueller Committee, stressed that the proposed move was purely for academic reasons. They admitted that it was not based on financial or convenience considerations.

Feldman and Morgan argued that if finance and convenience were not factors, then the case hadn't been made.

Subcommittee chairman and history professor Milton Israel said the history situation was different. He stated the history branch was only good for material written before 1950, unlike political economy which has mainly current material.

Much of the debate centred on the necessity to keep Xerox copies of current articles available at Sidney Smith Hall where most of history and political economy courses meet.

The subcommittee will likely decide the question on January 24 at 5:45 p.m. in the council chambers of the Galbraith building. Meetings are open to everyone.

Trio of firsts set for gathering

Today's Varsity staff meeting is going to be chock full of firsts, as the saying goes. The first—staff meeting to be held in The Varsity office at 91 St. George St. in 1973. The first—meeting of the staff after the Winnipeg CUP Conference. The first—meeting of 1973 in which staff democracy will be revived.

The only thing that hasn't changed, really, is the time. It's still at 1 p.m.

Varsity doesn't endorse its advertisers

All forms of capitalism are oppressive

The above satire comes disgustingly close to a real ad published on page 12 of today's paper.

The ad in question invites readers to send away for their very own playstamps of nubile, unclad women sex objects. It appeals to readers' basest instincts, callously objectifying women in its quest for the almighty dollar.

That ad, while perhaps the most exploitative The Varsity has run this year, is not unique. This paper has published numerous such ads in the past, ads which exploit womens' bodies to market a particular commodity.

The Varsity doesn't print those ads because it finds them harmless or inoffensive. But, in order to publish, the paper must earn revenue by accepting paid advertising.

It would be hypocritical and economically impractical for The Varsity to attempt to assess relative political or moral acceptability of ads submitted for publication in its pages. Most advertising is designed to sell commodities in the capitalist economic system, a system which this paper rejects. Capitalism, in all its forms, is equally as oppressive and exploitative as any particular category of objectionable ads.

Practically, too, any attempt to rate the acceptability of advertising is unfeasible. The Varsity would need a permanent censor sitting in its advertising office to watch out for all the ads with which the paper would disagree politically.

The only ads which the paper rejects are those which are known to be patently misleading or likely to result in students forking out money for goods or services they will not receive.

The Varsity, however, does reserve and indeed exercise the right to editorially criticize any advertisers it deems deserving of such attention.

Varsity advertisers in no way influence the paper's editorial policy.

Campus discipline is likely to be centralized

By DAVID WISE

The Internal Affairs Committee, which is in the process of reforming the disciplinary procedures of the university, Monday tentatively chose to work with a centralized model plan.

The plan, submitted by vice-president (internal affairs) Jill Conway, provides for standing committees at the divisional or college level to try to mediate problems that cannot be handled at the departmental level. If mutual consent by both parties cannot be reached here, the matter automatically shifts to the jurisdiction of a university-wide court, composed equally of student, staff and faculty representatives.

Conway acknowledged that her "centralized plan" represents a departure from the overall trend towards university decentralization.

Vice-provost Robin Ross submitted an alternate plan which placed more jurisdiction in the hands of the local committees. According to his plan, before a case could be presented to the university court, an appeal would have to be granted by that body, or the lower one.

A consensus was reached that Conway's plan had the advantage of speed and efficiency over Ross.

Concern for the rights of non-unionized staff employees under either system was expressed by John Parker. He suggested that in order to prevent arbitrary policies by "management", these employees be granted an ombudsman to whom they could air their complaints.

Vice-provost (research administration) Sidney Dymond, a staff employee, spoke against a system which would provide "different courts for different people rather than different crimes" exclaiming that she "literally saw red" at the prospect of the implementation of such a plan.

Conway, conceding that there was some validity in Dymond's complaint, defended the policy of having accused people judged by bodies dominated by their colleagues (students by students, faculty by faculty). She stated that a university needs a different legal system than society because it "sees itself as discharging a different duty than society at large."

Concerning the number of cases that would be affected by the new system, Ross stated that in the last year "around 40 cases reached the divisional level". In the 10 years prior to 1969, the supreme disciplinary body of the university, Caput, composed of deans and college principals, "dealt with perhaps 20 cases," he said, "and has been idle since."

Committee chairman Paul Cadario, an engineering student, said, "The mediation process can be compared to out-of-court settlements. Mediation decisions will not be binding nor will they prejudice the final decision by the university court."

He added, however, that emphasis must be placed on this procedure so that the "university court will not be overwhelmed by cases."

He said he hoped that the committee would be able to present its final recommendations to the February meeting of the Governing Council.

Internal Affairs Committee members and friends peer off at distant centralized discipline.

Nation-wide union in works

VANCOUVER (CUP) — A meeting of the National Union of Students executive here broke up Friday without making final decisions on the membership and fees problems facing the organization since its inception in November.

The meeting of the five person executive, postponed from the Christmas holidays due to administrative problems, failed to set a membership fee because the eventual size of NUS membership is unknown at this time.

Teri Ball of UBC, member at large of the executive, said until a rough idea of the number of NUS members is known there is no way of deciding how big the fee should be or upon what basis it should be divided.

Ball said the eventual NUS membership will not be known until later this spring.

Eighteen institutions have scheduled referendums on NUS membership as required in the organization by-laws. All these referendums will have to be voted on without students knowing what the eventual membership fees will be.

"They'll have to take that chance", Ball said.

So far, only Simon Fraser University and Prince George's New Caledonia College have granted referendum approval of NUS membership.

The UBC student council has used a legal loophole to become a founding member of the NUS without having to use a referendum.

"The referendum provision of the NUS constitution is contained in the by-laws which NUS lawyers have declared invalid until the NUS has been incorporated.

With UBC, Simon Fraser and New Caledonia having founding member status, the NUS needs only two more to incorporate.

UBC will remain an NUS member until a fee is levied. Then a provision in the UBC Student Society constitution will require a referendum whether or not the NUS does.

Appeals have gone out to prospective members for additional financing. At the moment, the NUS is operating on a thousand dollar grant from UBC, but says Ball, a lot more money will be needed in the near future to carry on effectively.

The makeup of the executive indicates another problem facing the NUS — a national base. Of the five members of the executive three are from BC universities and one is from the University of Manitoba and one from Lakehead University in Thunder Bay. Ball said it is hoped as the organization becomes more stable this will change.

The next national general meeting will be held in May. Ball said the next meeting of the executive will be held next month, though date and place have yet to be established.

Last week, the UBC student council postponed its NUS referendum scheduled for January 17 at least until March and maybe later.

At Carleton University, a student council meeting Tuesday dissolved for lack of quorum before a NUS referendum could be reconsidered. The Carleton council already rejected the idea of a referendum in December, feeling the new organization lacked the membership to be viable.

New gov't immigration policy gets protested

Last week, about 150 people, including a number of U of T students, demonstrated against Canada's immigration policy on Parliament Hill during the Opening of Parliament.

The protesters were members of the newly formed Committee against the Racist Immigration Policy, a coalition of student and community groups from Toronto, London, Montreal, Hamilton and Kitchener.

They were in Ottawa to demand that the government rescind its November 3 ban on internal immigration applications.

At a meeting with the Assistant Deputy Minister of Immigration, a four-person delegation presented evidence that several thousand would-be immigrants who arrived before November 3 are experiencing severe hardship as a result of the new law.

One of the delegates, J. S. Bajwa of Toronto's Shromani Sikh Society, told the official that his group knew of over 500 people from India in difficulty, many of whom had spent their life savings to fly to Canada in the expectation that they would be able to apply for landed status. They were now stranded here, unable to work.

"They are unable to go back to India now. Many of them have people at home depending on them," he said. Mark Hallman, a member of the U of T's Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), and one of the organizers of the committee, presented petitions containing several thousand names collected since November 3.

The delegation also included a member of the Haitian Committee of Montreal, many of whom face political repression and jail if they are forced to return to their homeland. The committee says that "anywhere from two to 10 thousand" people were trapped in Canada without warning by what amounts to "retroactive legislation". Even people who were lined up in the immigration offices at noon on November 3 were told that their applications would not be accepted, he said.

Later, while the throne speech ceremonies went on, the demonstrators heard Toronto civil rights lawyer Charles Roach characterize the whole of the government immigration policy as racist. He said that uneven distribution of visa offices around the world (there are none in Africa or Latin America, four in Asia but 66 in Europe and Great Britain) amounts to a whites-only policy.

"The only way people from Asia, Latin America, Africa, and the Caribbean could really come here was to enter as visitors and then apply for immigrant status," he said.

"Now, not even this procedure is possible, and when they come as visitors they are harassed and forced to post bonds. This is completely illegal, and we must build a huge movement against this kind of racism."

The committee has drawn support from a number of campus and community groups including the Iranian Students Association, the Arab Students Association, SDS, Black Education Project, the Canadian Party of Labour, the Sikh Society, the Kensington Legal Advisory Committee, the Universal Negro Improvement Association and the Italian-Canadian Democratic Association.

Foreign students are affected since they cannot apply for student loans unless they are in the country. As a result a number have joined the committee.

Further broadening of the committee and more militant actions will be undertaken before the forthcoming parliamentary debate on the changes in the immigration policy.

Will masked pre-med come back?

By ELAINE KAHN

High school students planning on entering dentistry or medicine should be registered in one of two pre-Health Science programmes in the Faculty of Arts and Science, states a subcommittee report submitted to the Presidential Advisory Committee reviewing the New Program.

The new courses, one each for medicine and dentistry, would be two-year courses. Students enrolled in them would "be considered to have been... provisionally admitted to the corresponding Health Science faculty."

Though the report says this would not be a return to the old program of pre-medicine and pre-dentistry, it recommends that "...Medicine and Dentistry continue to admit students from outside these pre-Health Science programs" but "that, except in unusual circumstances, other undergraduate students in the Faculty of Arts and Science not be admitted."

Because many of the new courses offered since the inception of the New Program "have reflected the research interests of individual staff members rather than a rational approach to planning an undergraduate curriculum," the report recommends that these courses be reduced in number. Departments are also urged to reduce their course offerings and weed out duplication of material.

Many briefs submitted to the committee have suggested that because departments are allotted money per student in a course, there is keen competition for students and standards in some courses have gone down.

The report recommends that "where there is evidence that a department has lowered the level of difficulty of some of its courses, the dean exclude any resulting increase in enrollment from consideration in determining the department's total budget."

Statistics showing the average grades, and percentages of A's, B's and F's in each department over the last three years were given to the committee yesterday.

The grades are fairly constant from one year to the next, though some increase is indicated.

Preliminary data from questionnaires given to faculty and students regarding the New Program was given to the committee.

One of the questions asked for preference in grading systems. Over half the students favoured the present system, though many students suggested their own systems, usually combining several methods of evaluation.

Three-quarters of the students wanted retention of marks in some form, either letter or numeric grades. Faculty opinion was evenly divided, with a total of 28 per cent desiring some form of pass-fail system. Only five per cent of students wanted pass-fail.

The subcommittee report also recommended the establishment of courses and departments which cut across departmental boundaries, independent studies courses, which would count for a maximum of three credits in a 20 course degree. It also wanted 400-series courses to be taught as seminars whenever possible.

The report says that reintroduction of the Old Program would do more harm than good. Among the downfalls of the New Program, however, was listed loss of comradeship among students, such as that found when all students in a subject area take the same courses at the same time. Another hazard was overspecialization by some students, under New Program freedom of choice.

The report finds "regrettable" the fact that many students, when many employers prefer students with knowledge of many subjects instead of specialists, do not design programs that are much different than those available under the old program.

Canada is 'nice', American author declares

Canada is a nice country. American author Arnold Beichman told students watching the taping of the TV program Under Attack at Vic Wednesday.

The remark, one of the few definite statements Buchman could be moved to make during the course of the evening, brought him a round of applause from the audience.

Canada was nice, Beichman said, because it was democratic and his wife came from British Columbia. Beichman, who looks a lot like Lorne Greene, confided that he and his wife still had links with B.C.

Beichman is the author of Nine Lies About America, in which he argues that the biggest threat to American democracy comes from the lies the left spreads about America. The book is an elaboration of an earlier article Beichman wrote, entitled Six Lies About America. (Three more lies were uncovered after the article went to press.)

Beichman, who stayed at the luxurious Holiday Inn and received an attractive fee for his performance, was reluctant to actually answer questions while on the show.

He prefers to respond to questions by retorting, "What about Russia?" and "what's your alternative?" He may have been nervous about the show, for he changed his shirt both before and after the taping.

Beichman recently returned from England, about which he wrote a book. It is not known whether he will write a book about Canada on the plane back to Boston.

Beichman did not reveal how much money he was making from his books, but he did assure questioners that they could have as much access to media as he did, if they wanted. In this he was backed up by moderator Bill Walker, who told students that they could start their own mass-circulation newspapers if only they showed more initiative in going out and trying to earn money.

Student health fees rise is recommended

In a closed meeting Monday, the Internal Affairs Committee reaffirmed an earlier recommendation to the Governing Council that the student health fees be raised from $10 to $12.

Its earlier recommendation had been referred back to the committee. According to committee chairman Paul Cadario, the increase is necessitated by budget deficits in the current expenditure for University Health services.

The Committee along with its recommendation added a statement that "stronger attempts must be made by the university to collect from OHIP in the future in order to maintain the quality and low cost of the university health services."

Cadario explained yesterday that the discussion was held in camera because some budget committee material was used in the debate.

All budget deliberations and documents have been kept secret. The budget was decided on at the Governing Council's December meeting, but has not been made public because not all faculties and divisions have received proper notification of their budgets, said Cadario.

Honours for U of T profs

Trent University of Peterborough will confer degrees on two University of Toronto professors, author Kathleen Coburn and mathematician H.M.S. Coxeter, at its spring convocation June 1.

Coburn, a professor of English Literature at Trinity College, is best known for her work on Coleridge. She has been awarded many fellowships including an FRSL (Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature) and a FRSC (Fellow of the Royal Society of Canada). Born in Ontario, Coburn was educated at U of T and Oxford University.

Coxeter served as editor of the Canadian Journal of Mathematics for nine years and was president of the Canadian Mathematical Congress from 1965-67. He has taught throughout Europe and North America as a visiting professor and was a professor at Cambridge until 1936 and at U of T since that time. Coxeter was born in England and educated at Cambridge.

Canadian customs speeds U.S. war material

By AGI LUKACS

If an air force base in California needs brooms, and a Canadian businessman can provide them quickly, American customs officials can forget about applying the usual tariff, according to Voice of Women vice-president Ursula Franklin.

Franklin, a U of T engineering professor, told 300 people at a St. Lawrence Centre forum on Vietnam Tuesday night that Canadian government officials expedite the process. They inform Canadian businessmen of the need for their goods, help arrange financing to fill the order, and even help fill in the necessary forms.

All this occurs under the umbrella of the Defense Production Sharing Agreement, which was instituted under former prime minister John Diefenbaker, who claimed it was a solution to Canadian unemployment problems. It illustrates how Canada is involved in supporting the United States' war effort, she pointed out.

"The agreement covers everything from brooms to anti-personnel bombs," Franklin said.

"There is a ton of Canadian nickel in every B-52" bomber, she added. "And there are no restrictions on the sale of such rare raw materials to the U.S., although export of copper and nickel to other countries is restricted."

"The excuse is that the U.S. hasn't officially declared war."

The audience responded to this information by voting unanimously to urge the Canadian government to end the defense agreement.

Franklin suggested that a better way of creating Canadian jobs would be to improve cross-Canadian transportation systems, so that Canadians can get to know each other.

Dave Monie, president of Local 531 of the United Electrical Workers, agreed.

"Canada makes the U.S. war machine run," he insisted, "and Canada can make it stop."

He praised the recent refusal of British Columbia dockers to unload some American ships, and the B.C. NDP government's support of the action.

Trade union action can eventually cut off supplies of nickel and copper, he suggested.

"Trade union members should organize peace movements", he urged, "even though this may not be popular at first".

Monie himself represented his union at a recent 82-country assembly held in Paris to work on ending the Vietnam war.

"Canadian Union leaders who were anti-American lost votes in the past," he explained, "but now the Canadian Labour Congress have hard-hitting peace resolutions." The UEW was recently permitted to rejoin the CLC after being expelled over 20 years ago.

Unions should work together with middle-class people, intellectuals and students to end the war, Monie feels.

Another union official, a woman from the audience, urged a boycott of American goods, and an end to Canadian tourism in the U.S.

"Not all of us go to Florida", said Franklin with a smile, "but if someone decides to stop, he could put a small ad in a Florida paper saying why he stopped."

Another panelist, Donald Wilcott, chairman of Glendon College's Sociology Department, warned that Canada, a possible member of the peacekeeping force which the U.S. wants to oversee a ceasefire agreement, should remember that international forces didn't fulfill their neutral role in the past.

After the 1946 Japanese surrender, "under the umbrella of a British-Chinese international peace-keeping force", the French were allowed to re-take the southern part of Vietnam their former colony.

The French ignored a 1946 Vietnam-wide election which elected Ho Chi Minh with a 90 per cent turn-out, and set up a puppet regime in South Vietnam. "They waged a full-scale war against North Vietnam, while 80 per cent of their costs were paid by the U.S. President Eisenhower said that the area's raw materials must be protected."

Again, after the 1954 Geneva accords, the new international peacekeeping force — Canada, Poland and India — failed to hold the Vietnam-wide elections called for in the accords. "Eisenhower was informed in 1956 — when the elections were supposed to occur — that 80 per cent of the populace favored Ho Chi Minh's government," explained Wilcott in a quietly cynical tone.

"Instead, South Vietnam has had a succession of corrupt governments, which reversed early land reform attempts, and suppressed dissenting Buddhists and

"And now (South Vietnamese president) Thieu has convinced the U.S. of a 'two nations' idea, which repudiates the Geneva accords and an October 1972 agreement which promised one Vietnam."

"Nixon will repudiate his pre-election promises about a Vietnam treaty", he predicted, "until there is enough pressure from within and without."

"There is a lot of work to do."

The ad hoc committee which called the forum approached federal party leaders in December, calling for an end to the Defense Production Sharing Agreement, and non-renewal of NORAD.

Although External Affairs minister Mitchell Sharp prefers what one panelist called "a friendly, quiet, diplomatic approach", the committee feels that their stand influenced the government to officially protest American bombing in Vietnam. The committee, which features public names such as former finance minister Walter Gordon, broadcaster Pierre Berton and numerous officials of both the United Church and Trade Unions, suggests a strong letter-writing campaign.

"We have to work on as many levels as possible," they feel.

"The war isn't all black and white", says Wilcott, "but genocidal firepower doesn't solve any problems".

"More bombs have now been dropped on Vietnam than were used during all of World War II."

The Edward Heath Conservative government in Britain has pioneered a new era in British history. On one level, it is important to understand that the Tories are trying to solve the problems of British capitalism at the expense of the working class. But, while this is correct, it is equally true of every capitalist government and tells us nothing about what differentiates the present Conservative regime from its predecessors both Labour and Conservative.

With Heath the Conservative Party has produced a leader who promises to defend effectively and coherently the interests of British capitalism and to develop a new political formula in the process. Far from abandoning the framework of British liberal democracy, Heath intends to use its resources in carving out a new course for British capitalism. Heath intends to jettison the backwardness of British politics — its sentimentalism about old friends and customs — and to exploit the backwardness of the British working class — its parliamentarism and political caution.

From the early 1940's to the General Election of 1970, the political basis of British capitalism was, externally, an alliance with U.S. imperialism as a junior partner, and internally the integration of the working class via the Labour Party and the trade unions. Indeed the Labour Party played as important a role as the Conservatives in devising the whole arrangement and was rewarded by periodic spells in office for its efforts.

The Anglo-American alliance and the introduction of more ambitious social policies were, of course, already introduced by the Churchill coalition government. The extension of these policies into the post-war world, was, however, wholly the responsibility of the Atlee Labour government and represented a political option of great importance even though it was predictable in its general outline.

Essentially it meant that the waning force of British imperialism could be partly preserved, at least in the short run, by a comprehensive deal with U.S. imperialism. The Labour government took the initiative in founding NATO which gave expression to the ascendancy of the U.S. within the imperialist camp. Within this framework the first experiments in turning a colonial empire into a neo-colonial empire could be successfully undertaken.

At home Britain's relative industrial superiority vis-a-vis war-devastated Europe could temporarily be used to finance the renewed export of capital abroad and to provide at home more comprehensive social services. Between 1945 and 1964 British capitalists devoted no less than 2,000 million to direct overseas investments — more than the capital export of all the continental European capitalist countries combined.

Moreover, political decolonization did not mean that the real economic sinews of Empire were in any way abandoned: gold in South Africa, rubber and tin in Malaya, oil in the Middle East, were all preserved intact. But for British imperialism to bring off this strategy, the support of the dominant imperialist power was absolutely essential.

Thus the Anglo-American "special relationship" became the cornerstone of British foreign policy.

Despite its apparent success in the short term, the Atlantic policy was to exact a heavy toll on the resources of British capital. The attempt to maintain a global role in economic and military terms weakened the home base of British capitalism. Both Britain and the United States assumed the overhead costs of the world-wide imperialist system from which their capitalist rivals also benefited. Britain bore some of the cost of maintaining international law and order without the danger of developing into a genuine rival of the U.S.

And by the 1960's the commitment to maintain the pound sterling acted as a valuable first line of defence for the dollar. The price was paid when successive British governments were forced to deflate the economy and cut social services to protect the pound and to maintain overseas expenditure.

Appropriately enough, it was left to a Labour government to pursue this miserable logic to its conclusion. When the Wilson regime assumed office, the rationality in the Atlantic/imperialist formula for British capitalism had certainly seeped away. But instead of attempting to come up with a new political formula, Wilson sought to solve the problem at the purely technical level. New ministries were created to foster technology and to plan the economy, complex new tax schemes were announced — there was no political complement to the technical nostrums, only endless public relations, moral exhortation and rhetoric.

The entire Labour leadership, despite its desperation to assume a technocratic image, was at bottom deeply and sentimentally attached not just to British bourgeois society with all its eccentricities, but also to the obsolete Atlantic formula which they had helped to devise. Hence the fixation on "the Commonwealth" and the United Nations, Labour code words for respectively British and American imperialism. Hence the long and costly attempt to forestall devaluation and to maintain a global military role. Hence the craven support for U.S. genocide in Vietnam.

Not a single major economic reform could be offered up to Labour's social base — the best it could do was come up with a few half-hearted liberal reforms for the middle class on questions such as divorce — all of which had the enormous advantage of not costing anything. So far as the organised working class was concerned, the trade unions had become an infinitely more effective instrument for economic leverage than the Labour Party. So far as the ruling class was concerned, the Labour Party was ceasing to be an effective instrument for integrating the working class and tying it to the bourgeois state; hence the need to link the unions themselves to the state more directly by legislation.

In 1969 the defeat of Wilson by the unions revealed that the Labour government was unable to carry through the necessary changes. Labour's "surprising" electoral defeat in 1970 merely registered the bankruptcy of the political toriality it represented — a bankruptcy of which the masses were continually reminded by rising unemployment and rampant inflation as well as by the blankness of Labourist ideology. Everyone had known for a long time that Labour had no strategy for socialism — in 1970 it had become almost as clear that they had no strategy for capitalism either.

It was probably more less inevitable that the Conservative government would seek to discover a new course for British capitalism, but Heath certainly set about the task with considerable efficiency and a complete absence of that sentimentality which had displaced national bourgeois politics under the Wilson administration.

Heath can draw on the greater self-confidence of Britain's major bourgeois party that retains some dim memory of the time when Britain did have a foreign policy of its own. While the rise of the Labour Party was the epoch of the decline of British imperialism, the emergence of the modern Conservative Party was in the epoch of ascendancy of that imperialism. It is thus not so surprising to find Heath quoting Palmerston: "We have no eternal allies and no perpetual enemies. Our interests are eternal and perpetual and those interests it is our duty to follow."

The policy of the Heath government during the international financial crisis rounds out the picture of a basic shift in British foreign policy options. The government placed the narrow national interests of British capitalism above loyalty to the United States. Instead of revaluing the pound, steps were taken to keep it around the old parity; the lowering of bank rate discouraged it from floating upwards. Insofar as policy was coordinated with other capitalist powers it was with the Europeans, not the Americans.

As a recent report in The Times Business News put it: "There is a strong suspicion in American minds that, as the price of British entry into the Common Market, Mr. Heath promised Mr. Pompidou British support for French anti-American monetary policies and that pressure from Downing Street and the Foreign Office is preventing the British Treasury from playing its usual constructive role in the Group of Ten."

It is not necessary to argue that in forging its new orientation the Heath government was possessed of any very ambitious vision or Grand Design. Heath simply applied ordinary capitalist criteria to British foreign policy, a sort of cost-benefit analysis of the Atlantic orientation, and discovered that it was hopelessly irrational and untenable in these terms.

Equally Heath's European orientation was obvious enough as an alternative to the Atlantic orientation. His achievement, which was to see that it could only be carried through by means of a proper political deal, was only novel in the dimly mediocre context of British bourgeois politics.

Whereas De Gaulle sought to outflank U.S. imperialism on the "left" we should expect Heath to do so on the "right". The French were reacting against the inflexibility of U.S. imperialist leadership in the 1950's — the British against the faltering and bungling of U.S. imperialism during the 1960's. The British ruling class is evidently thinking that the U.S. administration is over-anxious to make deals with the Communist powers in all areas (Asia, Europe, the Middle East,) and has toolishly relaxed cold-war ideology through lack of nerve. Needless to say, Britain's large armaments industry is unlikely to complain at this aspect of the new course in foreign policy. Heath's major speech at the United Nations were he warned that domestic civil conflict was the main danger of our epoch is the most eloquent general statement of British foreign policy and was an explicit attempt to turn up the U.S. ruling class.

So far I have concentrated on the main areas of foreign policy in assessing the nature of the Heath regime. Certainly it has been able to transform the orientation of policy in this area more simply and immediately than has yet been possible on the home front. The most intractable problem of all being of course, Northern Ireland where the institutional structure of the Conservative Party tied as it is to the Northern Irish ruling class, reduces its room for manoeuvre drastically. But although the Provisional IRA clearly has the ability to embarrass the British government and place it under strong pressure, this is not the same as having a strategy for winning. Heath is not easily going to be persuaded to abandon his kith and kin at Stormont. So long as the British government can count on the majority of the population in the North, including the Protestant working class, and so long as they can work with the Church and the miserably reactionary regime in Dublin, there is no chance of British imperialism being dislodged from Ireland. However, the fact that Heath has been forced to endorse the vicious internment round-up shows that it faces a political as well as a military threat.

In the major fields of domestic policy the government faces the same syndrome of backwardness which has defeated its predecessors. The main feature of the government's economic policy is unsparing resort to the most savage weapons in the arsenal of capitalist rationality: unemployment, bankruptcies, the elimination of "lame ducks", etc.

But just as important as the use of capitalist market forces to prune away deadwood in British industry is the complementary encouragement of the giant commercial banks to expand the scope of their operations. As The Economist puts it: "What Britain is now doing is to set up a competitive mammon-will-reward-the-foremost banking system without any of America's anti-trust controls. The admirable new rule of jungle law opens at a time when there are a lot of hungry beasts stalking around... There could conceivably be much blood and many astounded squeals, much redness on tooth and claw, as the hunt now starts from all sides for both new depositors and new methods of lending."

The changes which the government has introduced in the code covering the conduct of commercial banks will free much of their enormous resources (more than 12 billion pounds in current and deposit accounts) for more exciting employment than the purchase of government bonds and bills. The effect will be to create fierce competition for the traditional merchant banks and to start bank financing of British industry climbing towards German and Japanese levels. The essence of government policy is thus to simultaneously expose British capitalism to strong competitive forces (especially via the entry into the EEC) and to foster the potentially strongest sectors of British monopoly capital. This could well turn to advantage one of the strong points of British capital as it tries to find its way in an era of intense inter-imperialist rivalry — namely the relatively large size of the major British companies.

Though the Heath government's economic policies will certainly not produce some magical reversal of the decline of British imperialism, they are more likely to eliminate the grosser irrationalities than were the incoherent compound of subsidies, bureaucratic mergers and exhortation employed by all previous Labour and Conservative governments.

The fate of Heath's economic package is very much dependent on its general success in waging the domestic scale struggle. There has been a perilous collapse in the rate of profit in British industry over the last decade. An assault on the workers must be part of any ruling class strategy for breaking out of the present impasse. It seems that the core of Heath's policy in this area, is to use the political strength of the British bourgeoisie to help liquidate its economic weakness.

The domestic policy of the Heath regime certainly promises a drastic sharpening of the class struggle and the abandonment of attempts to go very far in conciliating the organised working class. If any half-way adequate political force existed within the British Labour movement, then this might be a dangerous policy. But the Conservative government knows that the only two political organisations that have any real implantation in organised labour are quite incapable of furnishing an aggressive leadership for the working class: namely, the Labour Party and the Communist Party. In the past the German and Japanese bourgeoisies have been able to use the relative economic weakness of their workers to wage successful

In the coming period we may expect the British and American bourgeoisies to attempt to use the relative political backwardness of organised Labour in their countries to recoup their positions. They know that they have no political challenge to fear from George Meany and Vic Feather, or for that matter from Jack Jones and Leonard Woodcock.

The present government clearly understands that the underlying political loyalty of the working class gives it considerable scope for attacking the economic leverage exercised by the trade unions. This loyalty may have waned somewhat in recent years but there is still more than enough popular reverence for parliamentary legislation and the majesty of the law to make an aggressive strategy the most tempting option.

It should be added that a British government can wage a vicious campaign of repression without in any way abandoning liberal democracy. Indeed to begin with the government will exploit for all it is worth traditional reverence for the trappings of parliamentary democracy, the sanctity of legislation, the majesty of the law, the supposedly impartial institutions of state power. The capitalist media will give a unanimous chorus of approval and the Labour Party will play out the familiar role of Her Majesty's most loyal Opposition. Given its enormous ideological and material resources the government has every chance of winning its first engagements with organised labour.

The new course for British bourgeois politics opened up by Heath will create a situation in which — at last — revolutionary politics can establish a bridgehead among the mass of the working class. This is both because of the reaction that the government will provoke amongst the most militant and advanced workers and because the bold steps that it has taken are bound to shake many of the pillars of bourgeois Britain: among them precisely those we have mentioned above.

Thus entry into the European Community will undoubtedly throw somewhat out of gear the traditional ideological and political defences of bourgeois rule. It will tend to undermine traditional national fetishes and ideologies: above all it will further weaken the already waning power of Parliament. From a bourgeois point of view those who argue against entry on the grounds that it will sap the integrity of Britain's "constitution", or lack of one, are perfectly correct. Like many of the rest of our more backward and depressed national industries, the Labour Party might also be very adversely affected by the post-entry political climate. We have shown above the way in which the Labour Party helped to pioneer the whole Atlantic orientation of British capitalism and was thus in a good position to claim the dividends of audacious class collaboration. Things may be rather different in the approaching European dispensation. Labour has chosen for itself the comparatively modest role of being the chauvinist reaction to the new course — even this function it has performed without much credibility.

The brazen capitalist rationality of the new course and the weakening grip of traditional mystifications will not lead in the first instance to any mass working class revolt but they certainly furnish ideal conditions for decisively radicalising the most advanced and militant workers. These workers are emerging from a period in which they won significant gains in economic class struggle. Even now, with unemployment rising to the million mark, the trade unions are still growing numerically, an unprecedented combination which reverses the situation of the late '20's and '30s. More important still, British workers are discovering new methods of struggle which will enable them to greatly extend the arc of class struggle.

Indeed it is partly because of the relatively strong economic organisation of British workers that the ruling class is shifting the terrain of struggle onto its home ground: legislation, legality, "public opinion". Although there is no likelihood of the trade union bureaucracies themselves responding aggressively and creatively to this shift in the locus of combat, this is certainly not the case with the younger and more determined militants who have no nostalgia for the "gentleman's agreements" and "procedure" of the old dispensation. They do not want to put their foot inside the door of the mansion of privilege; they want to put the boot in the owner's flabby midriff.

However, such a reaction will initially be confined not just to a minority but to a very small minority of the most active and class conscious. That is the real flaw in the otherwise intelligent and coherent strategy of the new course. The great advantage which the British capitalist class at present enjoys is one that will tend to disappear precisely to the extent to which it is fully exploited. British imperialism can no longer provide an ideological and material emollient to the domestic class struggle. In these conditions the political loyalty of the workers will be not just used but also used up. The rulers will be forced to expend political capital to defend economic capital.

It is most unlikely that the British Bourgeoisie really understands this. They naturally see the moderation and reformism of the British working man as an eternal fact of nature. They will allow that the British worker has many defects but he is after all British and thus shares the national reverence for compromise, common sense, negotiation and respect for all duly established authority. These national traits are not seen as transient and historically determined entities which history, especially the experience of imperial decline and of the new course itself, is in the process of eroding. The British bourgeoisie has successfully forgotten those regrettable occasions when British workers failed to conform to type: that is why it will be prepared to risk provoking them. Moreover the fact that the first few times its expectations will probably be confirmed can only fortify it in what will ultimately prove to be its fatal error.

December deluge hits Toronto

Some old kitsch, some nice surprises

Last year, roughly defined, was a vintage year for movies: McCabe and Mrs. Miller, The Go-Between, Sunday Bloody Sunday, Murmur of the Heart, Mon Oncle Antoine, Ann and Muriel (now retitled Two English Girls on the Continent), Kluge, plus Fiddler on the Roof, Death in Venice and, for some, Clockwork Orange and Cabaret. This year it's famine. Only The Sorrow and the Pity ranks as a masterpiece and of the rest, Sounder seems to be the only film likely to be revived. (This leaves out The Godfather and The Emigrants, neither of which I have seen.) The Candidate would have to be one of the best films of the year, such is the year. It is a time for extracting the good from the mediocre.

The massive influx of holiday season releases confirms the trend. To be fair, I hear that Chloe in the Afternoon at Cinecity is quite good. I haven't gone because I fell asleep at Claire's Knee. Rohmer's previous film which was also quite good. I also don't intend to see Robert Redford kill a lot of indians as Jeremiah Johnson. The scenery is supposed to be pretty in that one.

My favourite of the new bunch, hands down is King of Marvin Gardens at the Odeon York, although I can see why it is getting panned almost universally. It is very much like Drive, He Said (produced by the same company) another personal favourite and critical flop. Both are more film sketches than films: you have to infer a lot to make them make sense, even to the point of inventing whole scenes left out of the movie. But, that done, the characters become rich and the observations and nuances quite deft.

for an FM radio station. He is called by his estranged brother, Bruce Dern, a small-time, vaguely illegal entrepreneur who lives a menage a trois with Ellen Burstyn, a fading procuress, and her developing replacement, Jullia Robinson. They keep a pistol in the same drawer with their water-pistols. Dern hopes to be reunited with Nicholson through a South Sea gambling resort scheme he has concocted. The whole thing takes place in Atlantic City, off-season.

Like Five Easy Pieces, director

Bob Rafelson's previous film, Marvin Gardens sees things as pretty bleak. It is crammed full of details of emptiness, absurdity and decay, always in the foreground or background of a shot, like Polanski only subtler. Marvin Gardens is not as funny as Five Easy Pieces which is likely why its reception has been so unenthusiastic.

Still I found it exciting, playful (though not merry) and demanding. All of the leads play at top form — Nicholson definitely up from his loud male chauvinist in Carnal Knowledge. Bruce Dern, who played the basketball coach in Drive, He Said is a grossly underrated actor, and Ellen Burstyn is as impressive as Karen Black in Five Easy Pieces.

Some year I would like to see a festival of great film failures. Brewster McCLOUD would be there and Drive, He Said and — it appears — so would King of Marvin Gardens.

Pete 'n' Tillie on the other hand has been selling out nearly every performance at the Odeon Hyland. It is pretty good, all things considered, like those plays that win annual prizes in off years. Though directed by Martin Ritt of Sounder, Pete 'n' Tillie reads like the "serious picture" that directors of comedies and action films are always promising to make when they have realized enough money from their hack work. Few of them ever do it, and even when they do, it is embarrassing. All the hours in pursuit of the easy have rubbed off, and their very vision has become so saccharine that "serious" means a few "serious" characters stuck in the sugar, like figures on a wedding cake. Pete 'n' Tillie fares better solely on the strength of Tillie's part.

Tillie is well into her thrills when she meets and sleeps with Pete, a defensively wise-cracking market researcher. (Whether Pete is actually supposed to be funny a la Neil Simon or not is hard to say. The fact is, we are conditioned to laugh at the mere sight of Walter Matthau, and we do.) Pete and Tillie marry and have a child, with their sit-com problems gradually being replaced by the serious ordinary kind that we in the audience have.

It is an interesting plan, to take our comic icons and turn them quasi-tragic. Carol Burnett, as Tillie, pulls it off magnificently, with grace and depth I never guessed she had. She was given a touching, full, well-conceived part and she enriches it. Matthau as Pete does his best.

But that's as far as it goes, as Ritt and writer, Julius J. Epstein keep blowing it on the incidentals. For example, Tillie is called to have lunch "like civilized women" with one of Pete's mistresses. She goes, and over a drink tries to make the best of the time by asking the girlfriend what she finds so attractive in Pete. "You should know," the mistress replies a trifle petulantly, "he's kind, has a great sense of humour and... he's a pistol." "What?" asks Burnett. "You know," says the mistress, "a pistol".

At the end of a very short lunch Burnett gets up to leave and the mistress asks, "If you know about Pete and me, why do you stay with him?"

"He's a pistol" Burnett replies. In between those exchanges — and I think they are terrific — Ritt has the mistress drop her contact lens into her marlini. Very funny. Pete 'n' Tillie does that too often for comfort. Burnett keeps it moving, but she has to work overtime to do it.

I'm hoping someone else will see and review Travels with My Aunt at the Uptown, the film of Graham Greene's comic novel. It is in the grand style of high-ceilinged hotels that serve tea in the lobby, a style for which I am singularly unsuited. I kept thinking how much things cost. Alex McCowen is quite human and ungrotesque as the stuffy bank-manager nephew who becomes international escort for his crooked old Aunt Augusta. Maggie Smith is either fabulous or excessive as the aunt and I suspect the film was quite funny, but you would do well to await the verdict of one who knows more about such things. It is certainly a pleasant-spirited movie.

Lastly, there is the Poseidon Adventure at the Carlton, the product of fifteen Oscar winners with the sensibilities you would expect of fifteen Oscar winners. A couple thousand people are trapped when a tidal wave turns their ocean liner upside down. Ten or so set out under the leadership of Gene Hackman to find their way up to the bottom of the ship. Six, we know from the ads, survive. What I liked best was the ending: Not more than five minutes after number seven gets it, the six get rescued and the movie ends, just like that, this is an adventure and that's it, no pretense about it. (Actually, an aficionado said Poseidon was a little on the preachy side, and he preferred Airport.)

There is some fun along the way, Shelley Winters plays a better Jewish grandmother than anyone else I can think of, as she steadily strips herself of jewellery to be given to her grandchildren if she doesn't make it. There are some classic lines suitable for framing ("If you don't go on, her death will have been meaningless.") and the plot has some lovely links to the necessity of the genre: since the ship turns over at midnight New Year's Eve, the women are all caught wearing long dresses they must shed in order to climb the ladders leading down (up) to safety, necessitating a great number of leggy shots from the bottom of the ladders. It's also great fun to turn the upside down sets right side up, either deductively, or by turning your head sharply to the side. The movie is dumb macho and adventurous, and it isn't true, despite the note tacked on to the titles saying that it is the way, does anyone know if the ship's captain is the same actor who gives salty talks on how to grow potatoes in rocky soil with the help of the Bank of Montreal?

A mad whirl through the Eternal City

Is there any hope for Fellini? Here is a man, one of the brilliant post-war Italian filmmakers whose early works — I Vitelloni and Nights of Cabiria especially — were masterpieces of a sort; here is a writer-director with compassion, humour, and a prodigious imagination. His decline began with La Dolce Vita; 8½ managed simultaneously to be brilliant and boring. Then the precipitous drop, ending in the gloomy depths of Fellini Satyricon.

Not that these movies were utter trash, any of them. Perhaps I was able to tolerate Satyricon — most of my friends walked out — because I knew Petronius' picaresque sketches of Imperial Roman decadence. This familiarity in no way altered my judgement of the movie — portentous, self-indulgent nonsense — but at least I had some idea why Fellini was getting up those grandiose, nightmarish scenes. And I think I see why he chose a work as remote and unusual as the Satyricon: because realistic, or even 'abstract' movies could no longer hold the visions he wanted to put on film.

But while his imagination has ballooned to the size of a dirigible, his discipline has dwindled. Fellini stuns you, in the Satyricon, with his images of gargantuan, haunting obscenity until he undercuts them with ones of petty smuttiness, making you wonder if he can tell the difference.

In Fellini's Roma, he finally discards altogether the pretenses of plot or characters, leaving us with a director's bag of tricks. The movie is supposed to be a very personal view of Rome, and I guess it is though much of it could have been filmed in Montreal. Fellini is obsessed with boors, with gluttons, with obese, prancing ecclesiastics and overripe whores. Intermably we see people wolfing down pasta, kids sticking out tongues or sitting on potties, an amateur show of no-talents being heckled by the wags in the audience. Terrible. There is a fashion show of cardinals and nuns and bishops wearing such get-ups as copes, gaudily piped with flashing neon tubes — an ingenious tableau, but the joke falls long before Fellini lets it drop.

Despite all this, no one can touch Fellini when it comes to stunning us, not even Kubrick (whose career is beginning to parallel Fellini's). So, embedded in this movie is a traffic jam during a gothic-novel thunderstorm, more like the apocalypse than Godard's in Weekend. There is a stealthy trip through the city, dark and silent but for the eerie blue flicker of a buzzing tram. And, at the movie's close, a hoarde of night-riding motorcyclists tears ominously through Rome — across the Ponte Sisto, through the Piazza di Spagna, up to the Piazza Barberini, and off into the desolate countryside.

At I could endure Satyricon because I was anxious to see what Fellini was going to do with that odd old story. I was able to muster up some affection for Roma. I once lived there and wanted to see how he would recreate that fascinating city. But I don't recommend the movie, unless you have a particular interest in the follies, as well as the successes, of good directors. Fellini, I think, should stop making movies altogether, move to Hollywood, and hire himself out as a consultant. Then he could devote himself solely to turning out his weird, stupendous effects. And for once they might function organically in a work of art, instead of floating loose through theatres like unanchored dreams.

Sad about the words... Jim Taylor's Dog

Almost two years ago Esquire predicted and dismissed Mudslide Slim, James Taylor's first post-fame record, as "the wane of inspiration". Esquire is a rather nasty magazine that way, but it has an impeccable eye for trend. So with Taylor: from Sweet Baby James to One Man Dog, the slope has been down, steeply.

Taylor blames having to write to record company demands. Only one song on One Man Dog, Nobody But You (Everybody knows that I'm just a Joe who likes to hang around...) was written prior to deadline. It is the only one anybody I know likes. The rest of the record's eighteen cuts are pre-fabs, snatches of Taylor style grafted together under company pressure.

The music has suffered less than the words. The settings are bigger than Taylor's old folkish style, with plenty of horns, background voices and scratchy South American rhythm instruments. It is not to my taste, but it is carefully done, funky and jazzy. Since the tunes are not as discernable as they once were, it amounts to a whole album of excellent vamping.

It's sad about the words. One Man Dog is the first Taylor album without a libretto. I expect Taylor was embarrassed. Many of the songs read like self-parodies, full of "Woh I don't know babe"s but without any of the quietly schizophrenic imagery that powered Sunshine, Knockin' Round the Zoo, Carolina in May, Mind, Fire and Rain, Sweet Baby James, etc. From jungle to desert.

It seems to have been open season on James Taylor since he made the cover of Time Magazine. Of course the sudden fame and over-exposure were hardly his fault. Still, it made it harder to get excited about him and, evidently, it sapped his vitality as a writer.

On the other hand, fame has been grist for Joni Mitchell's mill. There was something ingenious about Mitchell's pre-Woodstock records, but with Blue and now For the Roses her pain and success have become absolutely compelling. Mitchell has never been the complete song-writer James Taylor was. Her melodies are often obscure, her words often too many and too current, her style harsh and keening. She's always complaining. But, at the same time, she is daring and exceptionally underivative. Every verse or two, every song or two, there is something crazy, stunningly electric (followed by something else I wish wasn't there. Mitchell is a musical Brecht...)

You can read Joni Mitchell's biography from album to album. For the Roses is similar to Blue but a shade more resigned, the woman a shade stronger but with less tight. I prefer her memories of her lovers to her thoughts on her career. She wears her successes arrogantly; her failures are open and touching.

I like about half the album to the point of addiction, particularly You Turn Me On, I'm a Radio, an A.M. radio evocation of A.M. radio, and Woman of Heart and Mind, a regal, moving, even important song that begins, "I am a woman of heart and mind, with time on my hands and no child to raise, and you come to me like a little boy, and I give you my scorn and my praise." After a half dozen years it is apparent that Mitchell will be a life-long artist (Taylor may not be) which allows plenty of time to work out the bugs.

Among other releases for the Christmas market: Loggins and Messina's second album of happy articulate rock, called Loggins and Messina. Theirs is a very studio, big band sound, with country somewhere back in its history. It's as refreshing as Crosby Stills and Nash when they first performed together. Evidently, Loggins and Messina are not as well known as I assumed they were, or as they deserve to be.

Pentangle came out with their newest, Solomon's Seal, in their usual acoustic, English folk style. I find it their nicest and most tuneful since Sweet Child, though that is still the one to get if you have not got it already. A number of us think it was the best album ever produced by anybody.

Ry Cooder's third, Boomer's Story is out. No-one I know has been able to put their finger on why it doesn't work like Into the Purple Valley. The formula is the same, old mid-American funk, but some elan is lacking. Better to replay Billy the Kid, The Taxes on the Farmer Feeds Us All, etc.

Steeleye Span have finally been released in America with Below the Salt. They are one of the English folk-rock groups on the Fairport Convention — Mathew's Southern Comfort — Fotheringay tree. The stress is on traditional songs with strong choral harmony, backed by simple spare, very rhythmic rock. I prefer Please to See the King, as yet unreleased here, but Below the Salt is a good introduction. Tim Hart's liner notes deserve a prize: "So there we was sitting in the dressing room when in comes this guy with glasses and he says, 'Oim afraid youse got de wrong foilles for de toons,' and then he goes and rattles off a whole load of Garlic what we couldn't make out, so we gets the roadies to see him off. Handy things roadies."

And the Incredible String Band released Earthspan which is as you would expect.

Shakespeare highlights drab holiday theatre season

Toronto theatre continued to flourish during the Christmas season without the remarks of the Varsity reviewer to prod it on. In fact, this reviewer managed to attend a mere smattering of what was, for Toronto, a remarkably varied program.

Twelfth Night promised to be a Christmas treat, and certainly it was more Shakespeare's than Leon Major's, though. Entering the theatre, I was surprised to see the basic design for The Trial. It seemed, soon after that, that a trace of Kafka had been left in the air as well. Feste the clown had become a sophisticated prophet of doom, specializing in un-hummable songs (courtesy of Harry Freeman).

A mournful group of hippies, including musicians, stood around looking uncomfortable for most of the play, signifying... one wonders what.

The modern dress neither spoiled nor enhanced the comedy. Suede suits for Viola and her twin brother were predictably appropriate. The rest of the costumes were not particularly flattering to the characters.

Even so, the night I was there, Shakespeare's comedy survived admirably. Domini Blythe's Viola was sweet and effervescent, improving markedly as the play progressed. Robert Benson created a detailed, sympathetic Malvolvo, the tight lipped servant, and earned applause for his first smile. The cruelest aspects of Malvolvo's experience are stressed in this production, and the pity one feels for him at this final humiliation casts a shadow over the play's comic resolution.

I came expecting the trio of Sir Toby Belch, Sir Andrew Aguecheek and Maria to steal the show as they so often do in Twelfth Night. I found myself laughing, yes, but with feeling that the characters' vitality was only adequately being realized. Sir Andrew, the empty-headed fop, seemed particularly devoid of interest. Orsino resembled a lethargic swinger from the fifties and Olivia a hysterical spinster, both — for me, at least — unsympathetic types.

It all points to an unnecessarily sober Twelfth Night, though there are laughs in spite of it all.

Then there was the gala festival of short Canadian plays at the Factory Lab Theatre. Two nights. The nights were long and the seats were hard. The impressions were mixed — no surprise since the content ranged from the charming spoof of an amateur production of an obnoxious 1927 play called A Day with Peggy to a brief, thoroughly empty nude piece, Made by Man/Woman.

The most intriguing aspect of the festival was the manipulation of the acting space. In What Was Really Said, the different stage levels, and the L-shaped playing area gave one the sense of the streetcorner where Father Claudius solicits passerby countless times. In the Great Canadian War in the Pacific, a wide playing area backed by a blank movie screen provided a setting for the play's symbolic characters. In Forthcoming Wedding, the bourgeois living room is sparingly represented in the centre of the Factory Lab's low-ceilinged room, to be viewed on two sides.

In some cases, I felt that an intriguing text was passing me by because the short space of time was packed with action and a non-realistic, obscure text. In the case of Cowboy Island, I felt that or missed the plays altogether.

Tarragon Theatre still features The Stag King, one of many plays aimed at Toronto's child population. It purports to appeal to all ages, actually, and succeeds, if one is seeking light, diverting Christmas entertainment. Providing the lush array of cond Evening" and can guarantee it as a perfect way to usher out the holiday season. The overall theme: there is no hope. The first work, Permutations and Combinations proves this to us in minute detail; the second, Eating the Ocean, seems to dare us to laugh anyway. Permutations and Combinations is "an apocalyptic cantata for four actors." It is conducted like a piece of music and, judging from the way rhythm, pitch, quality, speed and variety are utilized, it seems as much a musical work as a literary one.

It is an organic work, the form reflecting the content as in the opening sequence entitled Technique. There, the quartet embodies the spirit of technique in its regular rhythms and the symmetrical distribution of parts. Much later, in the sequence called Future, the voice becomes operatic, parodying some musical conventions of the cantata, such as the drawing out of a final syllable in the word "tomorrow". It is didactic and repetitive in its text, which can be irritating, but then it is a work obviously designed to disturb the spectator.

Eating the Ocean is a depressing, laboured black comedy which tries to hit the Canadian Way of Life where it hurts. It is too disorganised to make its point well. The ending is a spinechiller all the same.

Soon to come — the Hart House production of Hamlet. Out with the old and on to the new! (?)

one viewing could not afford a comprehension of the play's themes, but I was not prepared to dismiss it (as I did some others) as self-indulgent garbage. It is a dilemma that has occurred in modern orchestral music: some listeners screamed "garbage" at the sound of Schoenberg's later works, whereas other recognized a thematic design too intricate to be reaped from a single listening. Some of the thirteen works will likely be repeated in the next few months, providing another glimpse for those who could not face an extra sitting in December colours, textures and shapes that one has learnt to expect from designer Mary Kerr, it is a tasteful spectacle. The acting style used by the stereotyped characters draws upon the exaggerated gesturing of the eighteenth century Italian theatre, the epoch of the original play. Unfortunately the pace is slow, and needless repetition of lines and gestures dilutes what could be another genuine Tarragon triumph.

Tonight is your last chance to experience Creation Two's Four Plays by Louis Capson, their artistic director. I attended the "Se-

The above poem was composed by the students of the Poetry of Physics and Physics of Poetry Class last year as Clare Fuller was presenting a seminar entitled Entropy and Art in which he was discussing randomly created art. The class decided to write a poem by choosing the words more or less randomly. An ordering of the parts of speech was adhered to, however. The reader is invited to create other poems from it by altering the punctuation, the phrasing, or even the word order. Art is a two-fold process involving the creativity of both the artist and the viewer. By minimizing the role of the artist we provide the reader the opportunity of exploring more fully the role of the viewer.

The Poetry of Physics and Physics of Poetry class offered for credit last year will be presented again, as a half course in the spring term by the Department of Physics and University College with professors Bob Logan (Physics) and Art Wood (English). Any students interested in the course are invited to attend an organizational meeting which will set the times for the course on Wednesday, January 10 in room 313 University College at 4 pm, or contact Bob Logan at 928-8632 or 964-2114.

The opening of the Irish Arts Theatre season on January 16 promises to be a rare treat. Siobhan McKenna will present Hara ara Ladlas, an array of dramatic heroines from Irish literature. The place is West Park School, at the south-east corner of Bloor and Dundas Streets. For more information and reservations, call 483-7623.

Also beginning the sixteenth, A Dallcate Balance by Edward Albee will be showing at the Central Library Theatre. It will be interpreted by the Menagerie Players, and runs until the twenty-seventh.

Remember 1837? If that date doesn't ring a bell, you can start wondering about your Canadian identity. Theatre Passe Muraille has created a new play, 1837, based on the subversive activities of William Lyon Mackenzie, and the first light for national independence. It opens Wednesday, January 17.

Toronto's French-language theatre, le Theatre du P'tit Bonheur, greets the new year with Le Fou et Le Nonne, (The Madman and the Nun) by Stanislaw Witkiewicz, a forerunner of the avant-garde theatre. The subject: "Fantasy, theatre magic are the terms that come to mind, but this would be too simplistic. One has to let oneself fall under the play's spell, and live through the claustrophobia, the schizophrenia of the character." It will be performed between January 18 and February 3.

The York Masquers, up at York University where a fine arts faculty is thriving, present The Killing of Sister George, January 18th through 20th at Stong Theatre, 4700 Keele Street. Having seen an excellent production at the Royal Alexandra a few years ago, I recommend the play. It was far more subtle and human than the film.

Recently opened: The Mandrake, by Machiavelli, playing at the Colonnade Theatre until the 27th. (see review); Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, at the Firehall Theatre Stage Two, finishing January 12th, 13th, 14th. Anne Tait has based the drama on the writings of the Gawain poet, a contemporary of Chaucer, as well as directing the University Alumnae Dramatic Club in the venture. It will include dancing by the York Court Dancers and period music performed by the Toronto Consort.

Regular admission is $2.00. Lest of the recent openings to be mentioned is Factory Lab's Strawberry Fields, by Mike Hollingsworth. This is their first offering since the festival of short Canadian plays, which ran into difficulty over a dispute with Actor's Equity Association. No details on the play's content, but the pay-what-you-can performances are Wednesdays and Thursdays this time.

You can still see Hey Rube at Toronto Workshop Productions, 12 Alexander St.; Toronto Free Theatre's Hedda Gabler until January 21st, The Lawrence Centre's Twelfth Night ending this Saturday as is the O'Keefe Centre's Don Juan in Hell (worth seeing half-price for the Saturday matinee), Tarragon Theatre's The Stag King (try the apple cider during intermission!) and, closer to home Creation Two's Four Plays by Louis Capson tonight and tomorrow at U.C. Playhouse.

Andres Segovia is in town again this Sunday, January 14. His concert is made up of works by S. Weiss, F. Torroba, Handel, M. Ponce, Turrina and Albeniz. Prices range from 3 to 8 dollars and if you want to sit on the stage it'll also cost you 8. On Sunday at the Edward Johnson Concert Hall Pierre Souviren, David Zeter, Victor Martin, Kathy Wunder, and Vladimir Oroff will perform two quintets by Dvorak and Franck. Students are $2. There are four student recitals at 8:15 pm, no tickets, no charge January 15, 16, 19 and 23. The second recital in the St. Lawrence's piano series takes place in the Town Hall this Monday too at 8:30 pm.

Garrick Ohlsson plays works by Thomas Tomkins, Ludwig, Schumann, Granadosa, Loula Welngarden, Scriebin, and Franz Liszt (the ridiculous, overplayed, under-inspired, finger-flicking-good Mephisto Waltz — and God knows why the cheap thing is on such an otherwise distinguished program.) At the Edward Johnson Building, Room 116, January 15, at 4 pm Professor Iatven Anhalt, head of the Music Department, Queen's University, will give a lecture, "Words and Music" for free. Tonight at the Town Hall, the third YCP St. Lawrence Centre concert features Andrew Dawes and Jean-Paul Sevilla in a program of works by Ludwig, Schumann, Murray Adaskin (his sonatina Baroque for solo violin) and Ravel. Oaves is first violinist of the Orford Quartet. Christopher Parkanis is at the Eaton Auditorium this Monday at 8:30 pm. and tickets range from $2.50 to $5.50. His program is made up of works by Dowland, Bach, Scarlatti, White, Sor, Ravel, Debussy, Poulenc, Villa Lobos and Castelnuovo-Tedesco.

Coffeehouse closed its doors for the last time. Owner Neil Dixon made the decision to end the three year operation after efforts to obtain a liquor licence failed. Dixon is currently negotiating the sale of the Jarvis Street premises and reports that there is a strong likelihood of a new folk club opening in the Grumbles location under new management.

With Grumbles closed, the Riverboat becomes the only "name" folk club in the city. This week's fare is Jonathan Edwards, who song, "Sunshine", might be familiar. Edwards has just released his second album, Honky-Tonk Stardust Cowboy (WEA). Like most of the new wave of folk singers that have surfaced in the last four years, the second LP doesn't match up to the quality of the first. The songs are too melodically simple and lyrically unrefined: more bits of contrived fluff than well-written tunes. So maybe while he's in town we can hope Edwards will do more of his older things.

There should still be tickets available for Neil Young's concert appearance at Maple Leaf Gardens on Monday. Young will perform with his studio band, the Stray Gators, heard on his last album, Harvest. This will be the first non-solo concert Young has done in Toronto.

Just prior to Christmas, Young's new "album" became available in the Toronto area. You're lucky if you weren't impulsive and didn't run out and buy it. Journey Through the Past (WEA) is a soundtrack (in the strictest sense) of a film made by Neil Young that should be released in Toronto in the next month or so. It is not a new Neil Young album. Most Young fans will be highly disappointed by this set of two albums. All the music is available on other records. Journey begins with some snatches of Buffalo Springfield tunes which were taken from live performances and TV appearances. Then there are a few tunes by Crosby Stills Nash and Young, followed by songs from Young's Harvest LP with the Stray Gators. The fourth side is a conglomeration of a brief religious discussion and what sounds like a high school band and choir.

Most of the tracks on Journey Through the Past are poorly produced, sounding like flawed recording sessions and much of the music is briefly interrupted by talking. The album is a ripoff.

Gery U.S. Bonds is at the El Mocambo (961-2558) until Saturday. Bonds is being backed by a four-man New York rock group (Newspaper Taxi) and mixes some current tunes in with nostalgia rock. Although the sound system needed reworking in his first set, it was plain that Bond's voice has mellowed drastically over the years so that his memorable raunchy songs of over a decade ago, "Quarter to Three" and "New Orleans", were more exciting on record than Bond's present lifeless treatments. The music this week doesn't merit the two-dollar cover charge and the high beer prices.

Petar Mathlesson, a contemporary ragtime songwriter, will be playing at the Stanley Steamer tonight and tomorrow (Neil Wyclick College basement, on Gerrard Street, one block west of Jarvis).

And lastly, Sunday is THOG's monthly all-day music, food and vibrations festival at Bathurst United Church, one block South of Bloor. It's a benefit this time, with the voluntary donation of $1.50 going to T.A.N.C.

I had a suspicion that King of Marvin Gardens might have been deposited at the York by the time we could run its praises. So it turns out. Sic transit gloria mundi. Meanwhile, Friday, Saturday and Sunday at 8:30 at the Revue, it's Truffaut's Two English Girls, see Ann and Muriel, a very, very beautiful film (visually) about the trials of international romances. $2. Saturday night at the Roxy it's Woody Allen's pleasant, male chauvinist Play It Again, Sam for 99c. This week's showing in the St. Mike's Sunday series is Godard's frustrating, funny, brutal Weekend. Admission by season ticket, but they are cheap. Tuesday and Wednesday at the ole 99c F Roxy it's The Conformist and It... At the Science Centre Wednesday Arthur Hiller will be present to show and discuss his The Americanization of Emily, which I liked in 1964. For connoisseurs, Thursday night the TPL Learning Resources Centre at 566 Eglinton Ave. W., is showing Douglas Fairbanks' Thief of Bagdad with Charles Hoffman at the piano. It's free. And the same night, at 5:30 and 8, the Art Gallery of Ontario is showing underground movies of the forties. Don't go unless you know what you are in for. Seating limited to 100, first come basis.

CONTEST: This is your last chance to enter Contest No. 2, define art. Entries must be at the Varsity office, 91 St. George St. by noon Wednesday. The prize is two more or less free tickets to more or less any movies in town.

Sees no role for ward councils

Mayor Crombie wants amalgamated Toronto

By BILL HUMBER

"Local government is not coherent to people in terms of what the City and Metro do," argued David Crombie yesterday at Trinity Square.

Amalgamation of the city and Metro boroughs offers a means of attaching responsibility to one's elected representatives. Toronto's newly elected mayor stated that under the present system the city's delegates do not always represent the best interests of the city.

He cited as an example the Dundas Street widening. Despite the city's opposition to the proposal, the city aldermen did not vote against it unanimously when it came to Metro Council.

Crombie pointed out that the suburbs still desire development whereas the city is now more interested in redevelopment.

Secondly, the Dundas Street widening dispute indicated that the boroughs view transportation in a different light from the city. While the boroughs want improved access to the downtown, the city is interested in preserving its neighbourhoods.

Crombie felt that in view of these conflicts there were two things one could do, "either assume Metro will go away, or meet them head on. The city is clear as to what it wants to do and so is Metro. The city must get into Metro on an amalgamated basis so that we can work with suburban politicians and allow them to understand us".

A citizen from East York wondered if amalgamation might not mean the end of the citizen participation residents of his borough now enjoy.

Crombie said that, on the contrary, amalgamation and citizen participation would go hand in hand. There would be no adverse affect on the presently growing neighbourhood participation, he said.

On vote blocking by the city in the present Metro Council, Crombie felt that only where the city's position was clear should this occur. City aldermen have a responsibility to the city at such times, he stated, but drew back from endorsing any sort of delegate democracy.

Crombie does not favour aldermen voting in terms of what their constituents demand, whether at City or Metro Council, but feels they should listen to their constituents.

Crombie does not see ward councils playing a role as yet. "The time is not here; even John Sewell had trouble getting the residents of St. Jamestown and those South of Carlton together."

"In Ward 11 there are varying kinds of neighbourhoods and problems." It is doubtful, he concluded, that a ward council would solve these issues.

Crombie said developments passed by the past City Council would each have to be approached in a unique way. Metro Centre, for instance, has already been passed by the Ontario Municipal Board and legally exists as a development.

But, the Quebec-Gothic development is still awaiting OMB approval and Crombie felt that the developers were willing to sit down with local citizens, their ward aldermen, and planners to work out an acceptable solution. The Eaton Centre was another project which he said requires some discussion, particularly concerning the west side on Bay Street, which he thought, has not been well protected in the public's interest.

A speaker from the audience asked if a recent statement by Minister of Urban Affairs Ron Busford calling for the removal of all rail operations from city centres would not jeopardize the Metro Centre deal. Crombie said he would take up the matter with the city solicitor.

The Scarborough Expressway, Crombie felt, was a different type of expressway than the Spadina. "The Spadina just dumped cars into the inner city. The Scarborough Expressway on the other hand links up with Highway 401."

The mayor stated that despite his support from the Scarborough, he favoured a review of the proposal.

On the proposed Yonge Street cleanup, Crombie exhibited some of the wit which won him a measure of support in the recent election. Paraphrasing Pierre Trudeau's statement that the state has no right in the bedrooms of the nation, Crombie felt "the bedrooms of the nation should not be involved in the public."

Crombie agreed that any attempt to clean up Yonge St. involved delicate matters of civil liberties. Sex shops appeal to only one segment of Yonge Street's passerby, and though one should be aware of the old axiom "different strokes for different folks", Crombie felt it was important to achieve a compromise.

Two library trials starting

After a long series of delays during the fall, the trials of two people arrested in the police break-up of last spring's Simcoe Hall occupation will begin next week.

Tom McLaughlin, charged with obstructing police, will be tried on Monday and Tuesday, starting at 10 am in courtroom 31, Old City Hall. Bill Getty, charged with assaulting police, will be tried at the same place and time Wednesday and Thursday.

Each was arrested in March after occupying Simcoe Hall in support of open stacks to all students and the public of the new Robarts Library, due to open at the end of this academic year.

Randi Reynolds and Mark Goldblatt were found guilty of similar charges in December, but went free with "absolute discharges". If Getty and McLaughlin are convicted, they could face jail or fines.

The two are among all interested people to attend their trial in support of them. They promise it will be interesting.

Canadian Scientology head defends program

Bryan Levman, head of the Scientology Church of Canada was confronted Wednesday by a panel of views that he was "a Colonel Sanders" of Scientology, that people involved in Scientology were moulded by the "applied religious philosophy", and that Scientology was run by misfits.

Levman was being questioned at Victoria University Wednesday night at a taping of the television program Under Attack.

Last year, Levman was asked to appear on the same program but refused. At that time, he felt he would be on the program only to defend his Church's founder, L. Ron Hubbard, and said it was not for him to defend other people.

But, Wednesday night Levman said, "To defend Scientology, I had to appear" because unqualified people may be asked to appear on Under Attack.

A condition for Levman's appearance on the program was the reservation of a special section for Scientologists, who made their support of him well-known. Two people were asked to remove themselves from the reserved section when it was revealed that they were not part of the Scientology contingent.

Government subcommittees in Great Britain, Australia, United States and Canada have investigated the methods of Scientology, but Levman said that the church had been cleared from all charges.

Levman said Scientology was being attacked because its work "was encroaching on" the psychiatric business. He added that since people were used to living in a suppressed civilization "anybody who tries to give freedom will be attacked".

A panelist asked Levman why pamphlet promotion for Scientology had a "get 'em while they're hot" atmosphere to it. Later, an audience member added that pamphleteers were "a nuisance on the street".

Levman played down this charge and said that people who were truly interested in Scientology had no problem joining the church and that all donations were of a voluntary nature. Jokingly, Levman said, "We have not assimilated everybody".

Levman said, "Scientology is for people who are able but want to improve themselves". People learn to handle their problems through Scientology training, he claimed.

This training uses the process of dianetics, employing an "E meter", an electrode device. The information gathered from the E meter helps counsellors treat the individual by "locating areas of spiritual stress", he stated.

Levman also said, "the causes of cancer could be spiritual, as Christ said death could be spiritual".

SAC Nunnery open for business

After a series of delays, SAC has succeeded in obtaining permission for an experimental pub on the St. George campus.

The pub, called the Nunnery, opens tonight at 6 pm in the basement common room in University College's Sir Daniel Wilson Residence.

Entry to the pub is via the door to Howard Ferguson Dining Hall, on the north side of the UC Quadrangle.

The pub will continue on an experimental basis from 6-midnight Fridays, and from 8 till midnight on Saturdays.

"We're trying to find out if an all-university Pub will be successful on the downtown campus," said SAC communications and services assistant Peter Milic. "SAC isn't out to compete with the various college pubs". The Nunnery is intended for students who want to meet people from different parts of the university.

Beer, wine and food will be available.

Opening night entertainment is matown group Full Steam Ahead and noted Canadian rock group Edward Bear is set for Saturday.

The I.LBO refused to issue a licence in September for an outdoor pub at Sid Smith but government and university officials are fully satisfied with the Nunnery facilities, Milic said.

Women's ice hockey last played December 5 at Varsity Arena, losing 5-4 to Western... In two other matches the same day evening the women's senior volleyball team defeated York 3-1 and the women's senior basketball team defeated York 51-23. Scoring for the women were Chris Crawford with 21 points, while Terry Knight and Leslie McIntosh added nine apiece. Senior basketball is in first place with a 4-1 record in the Eastern Section of the OWIAA going into the second half of its schedule. Queen's is in second place, followed by Laurentian in third. Western is in first place in the Western Section, while Waterloo follows in second. The senior team hosts Waterloo for an exhibition match in the Benson Building this evening at 8pm... U of T's Joe Feeney won the junior boys 600 meters event with a time of 1:22.5 at the Ontario trials indoor track meet at the CNE last Saturday. Varsity's Mike Hart won the juvenile boys 50 meter hurdles (7.1)... U of T's Bruce Simpson erased his own Canadian open pole-vaulting record earlier in the month by clearing 17'4" at the Saskatoon Indoor Games. His former mark was 17'2.25"... John Shales, member of U of T's intercollegiate squash team won the U.S. Intercollegiate Freshman Singles Squash Championship in New York City, December 26-28. Shales played the number two man from Princeton University in the finals. Participating in the tournament were representatives from Princeton, Harvard, two naval academies, two Detroit universities and Penn State University. Shales also made the semi-finals in the U.S. Junior Open Tournament on December 18 in Exeter, N.H. The eventual winner was Ian Shaw who plays out of the Toronto Cricket Club. Shales is the number two man on the Granite Club team... more on the Loyola College basketball team: The University of Quebec at Montreal athletics department advised the Quebec University Athletic Association last month that it will not compete against Loyola in basketball this season. UQAM was scheduled to play Loyola January 23 and February 13. The university is the third QUAA member to refuse to play the Warriors because of Loyola's extensive recruiting of American players. Earlier in December, University of Sherbrooke and Laval University in Quebec City announced that they would not play Loyola. The Warriors, who have relied on American talent in recent years, have only one Canadian on their 12-man roster. The only Canadian on the team is a second-stringer after starting during the 1971-72 season... Blues hockey plays tonight at the arena against Ryerson and then travels to Waterloo for an exhibition game against the Warriors tomorrow... Western's swimming and wrestling teams come to Toronto tomorrow to compete with their U of T counterparts, while the U of T volleyball team travels to York for a meet.

By BOB PRITCHARD

Waterloo Lutheran Golden Hawks made Varsity basketball Blues look like doves, handing them an 88-65 loss in Waterloo Wednesday night. Again Blues were saved by the fact that it was only exhibition play.

As in Saturday's match against the Warriors of the same city, it was the second half that decided the game.

After staying fairly close to the Hawks — evidenced by a 40-34 score in Lutheran's at favour half time — Blues decided to roll over and play dead in the second 20 minutes. After four minutes of play, Waterloo had jumped to a 52-38 lead.

But that was only the beginning. Hawks, having proved themselves to be accurate shooters in the early moments of the game, excelled in the second half. Toronto can hardly be blamed for the fact that Lutheran has a fine shooting team, but Blues do deserve "credit" for letting Hawks run in and retrieve their own rebounds, tipping the ball in for easy points.

Unfortunately, there was no one keeping statistics at the game, but the results as far as rebounding is concerned would have proved embarrassing to the Blues.

Lutheran continued to pour in points, scoring almost every time up the floor, while Varsity had to be content with scoring once every three or four times they entered the Waterloo zone.

Again, Toronto played a stronger game in the first 20 minutes than in the second half. Toronto coach McManus opted to use a man to man defense to begin with, although Blues did change to a zone later in the game. Lutheran used a 2-1-2 zone defense throughout the exhibition.

Although Blues were down by 10 points at one stage in the half, they did manage to come within one point of Lutheran. They might have even taken the lead, if not for some careless turnovers. At one point in the game, Varsity took control of the ball four consecutive times, only to lose it before coming up the floor.

In the words of Coach McManus, Blues were "just outlasted". Although Toronto played respectably in the early part of the game, in the latter half the team slowed down to a walk. Lutheran, on the other hand, increased its momentum, despite a somewhat broken game which saw 53 fouls.

A member of last year's all-star team Lutheran's Rod Dean, put in an impressive performance, accounting for 30 points. Dean, a fine ball handler and deadly shooter, was Hawks' driving force.

Despite Toronto's poor team showing, some good individual performances came from Dave Ferguson who scored 17 points while Dave Watt counted 14.

Tip Offs: Blues next game is Wednesday January 17, when they travel to St. Catherine's to meet the Brock Badgers... in other OUA games Wednesday Guelph defeated Brock 88-56, Windsor won over Western 106-74, and Ryerson lost to York 59-41

Omnibus gripe at Loyola

MONTREAL (CUI) — Attempting to increase student involvement in university government, student leaders at Loyola College have initiated protests against a new registration scheme, faculty opposition to course evaluations, poor food service and inadequate library resources.

As he initiated the "Too far to turn back" campaign, student association president Peter Fedele said, "Students have always been getting the worst end of any deal on this campus." He said a food boycott will take place today and a moratorium on the library next Wednesday. The students' association will initiate discussions on course evaluation and will hold a referendum on a proposed four-day school week.

The campaign, aimed primarily at increasing public awareness of the issues that have been troubling student leaders for the past two years, is also intended to embarrass Loyola officials and pressure them to change their policies.

Protesting the lack of library facilities, the students plan to hold a mock auction of a copy of Michaelangelo's "David" to demonstrate, according to students' association vice-president Don Boisvert, that "aesthetic value is no good if you have no resources." Boisvert said the Loyola library is operated on only $350,000 while the school athletic complex receives much more. The library apparently receives the lowest per student grant of any Quebec library.

Students will protest the lack of library resources by boycotting the library for a day, attempting to promote discussion of the apparent lack of facilities, and by circulating a petition to be presented to university officials and the Quebec ministry of education.

Attempting to initiate negotiations for lower prices and better quality with Cara-Bever foods, the holders of the Loyola food vending franchise, students plan a one-day boycott of university cafeterias.

"Athletic Revolution" involves Canada too

The Athletic Revolution
by Jack Scott
Collier-Macmillan Canada Ltd., Toronto
hard cover $6.50
soft cover $3.65

Jack Scott's The Athletic Revolution represents a breakthrough in sports writing. However, the book suffers because it is more appropriately directed toward the student movement in the U.S. in the late 1960's, and since it is now dated by two years.

Scott's work is valuable for two reasons. First, it spurs one to think about intercollegiate athletics and its part in our capitalist social system; second, it provides many starting points for further research and investigation into university athletics.

Although the mood of the book is set by its total involvement with U.S. college sport activity, it is possible to extract the basic social commentary that Scott provides and apply it to our similar Canadian society.

There is the danger, however, that in reading the book, one will fail to adequately distinguish between the two university-college athletic systems of two still somewhat different societies (that is, Canada and the United States). Scott's book is more a warning of what can happen here given time, lack of major change, and the involvement of free enterprise in athletics.

However, there are major sections in Scott's collection of essays that do offer reflections of athletic programs in some Canadian universities. Scott believes, nevertheless, that athletics cannot be divorced from the rest of the educational system. In the preface of his book, he writes, "Athletic programs would not be allowed to exist if they did not reflect a value orientation that met with the approval of administrators, alumni, and boards of trustees. Consequently, those individuals struggling to humanize athletic programs should realize that it's unlikely that there will be any real changes in athletics without fundamental change throughout our educational structure on all levels. Simply put, there cannot be athletics for athletes without a concomitant emphasis on education for students."

Scott sees our present attitude towards athletics as being derived from one of two traditions which he traced back "prior to the sixth century BC." "There were two main athletic traditions in Greece; the Spartan tradition which emphasized the militaristic value of sport and the Athenian tradition which emphasized the artistic virtue of athletes." Scott sees the Spartan tradition as the one prevalent in our society today.

"The Greek (Athenian) tradition of athletics for athletes has had no sufficient impact on the growth of physical education and athletics in American (Canadian) education.... A few humanistic physical educators are still espousing the Greek ideal today, but so far their efforts have usually been to no avail, and there is little indication that their ideas will be given serious consideration in the foreseeable future" he says.

In analysing 'Sport, Education, and Society', Scott points out that many colleges still use the profits from football and basketball to finance the so-called 'minor' sports — non-paying intercollegiate athletic activities. He adds, "In a classical non sequitur, athletic directors use this example of benevolence as a rationale for justifying their professionalized football and basketball programs." He also points out that most universities today have to rely upon student subsidization through athletic fees to keep their programs afloat.

While Scott does not delve as deeply enough into the sociological aspects of intercollegiate sport as one would like to see, he is perceptive enough to reveal in some detail throughout the book the "drugging" effect spectator sport provides in a capitalist society. He says, "A dull, insignificant job can be more easily endured if one is able to spend evenings and weekends watching exciting sports events. As professor Harry Edwards says, 'If there is a religion in this country today it is sports.' (Edwards, a former basketball and track and field athlete teaches sociology at UCLA, Berkeley.)

One of Canada's most controversial topics at this time — the hosting of the 1976 Olympic games — is indirectly linked to intercollegiate sports and its purpose. Scott says, "Today, with a nation's vitality often measured by the accomplishment of its youth in the international athletic arena, college athletic programs are being used as training grounds for the development of what would be called athletic gladiators.... One may justifiably question, however, why our colleges are concerned with preparing for international sports competitions, especially when this preparation usually conflicts with espoused educational goals."

Scott directly attacks the present coaching system and the men embedded within its cocoon.

He says, "The primary responsibility of university coaches is to be educators, not developers of Olympic medal winners. If they want to put sole emphasis on developing national champions, they should leave the university and the security of a regular salary."

Intercollegiate sport is described as a conservative force in society in Scott's book: "The efforts of protesting college students are directed toward changing society, while the efforts of those individuals who presently run our intercollegiate athletic programs are directed toward preserving society without any significant changes. Consequently the authorities take a hard-line... stance with regard to student protestors while at the same time they adopt an 'anything goes as long as you don't get caught' position with respect to coaches, athletic directors and their supporters."

Scott believes coaches should accommodate every student who wants to try out for the university team, and "he has no right to require him to train by any particular method, just as a professor cannot force a student to study in any particular manner.... If coaches believe they have the only correct method, they are wrong scientifically. And, if they know they do not have the only correct method, but still force students to train under their direction, they are being sadistic and are morally wrong."

Scott also discusses the important and related status of the amateur. He believes the present concept of an amateur is unrealistic — "a luxury only the wealthy can afford". In its place, he proposes that "amateur athletes would not be paid for competing, but they would have the right to earn their livelihood in any manner they choose."

Scott remarks in a footnote that Canadian "Bruce Kidd... makes a distinction between professionalism and commercialism in athletics. Kidd views professionalism as entailing nothing more than allowing athletes to be paid for competing, thus enabling them to devote full-time to developing their athletic skills. Commercialism, on the other hand, involves the ownership and control of a sport, and this is where abuses arise... 'Kidd — and I would agree with him — is in favour of professionalizing sport, but is opposed to commercializing it. This is quite obviously a radical proposal..."

In the concluding section of the book, Scott remarks, "As we enter the 1970's, what is needed if the athletic movement is to continue to grow and eventually help to bring about significant changes is for all athletes to begin working together in solidarity. Throughout history, one of the main tactics oppressors have used to maintain their power is to keep the oppressed fighting among themselves. Athletes must be aware of this tactic and not allow the sports establishment to manipulate them so that they futilely waste their energy and time fighting among themselves."

"A program of athletics for athletes cannot be outlined in specific detail, for the one thing it would not be is a preconceived system established in advance by a single individual. Such a program would be run in a democratic manner and all those individuals involved in it would have a say — from freshman athletes to the athletic director."

"High school and intercollegiate athletic programs are the ideal areas in which to experiment with genuine student involvement in education. What do we have to lose by giving young people a meaningful say over athletic policy? From an educational perspective, the most dire consequences would be a few rather unorganized athletic contests. Student-athletes should have a significant say in all policy decisions such as the scheduling of games, the hiring of coaches, and the allocation of resources. The athletes themselves would suffer the consequences of any irresponsibility...."

Students win at Western

LONDON (CUP) — Militant student action in the Ontario fees strike scored another victory last Friday, when the University of Western Ontario agreed to release student aid money to students who haven't paid their second tuition instalment.

The administration concession followed an all-night sit-in at the UWO fees office by about 40 students.

The action followed similar successful moves at York University and York's Glendon College, where students earlier last week occupied administrative offices and convinced officials to release student award cheques.

Both the York and UWO actions were the first displays of student militancy on those usually staid campuses in recent memory.

The UWO administration had taken the hardest line against releasing student award money until second term fees had been paid, although five other universities had agreed last month to release the cheques.

The UWO students occupied their fees trailer last Thursday evening after an ad hoc student council meeting voted for the move. First on their minds were the actions on the two York campuses, and they decided to emulate the tactic.

When the students entered the building, officials suspended the collection of fees, which had been proceeding until early in the evening, and UWO vice-president (administration and finance) A.K. Adlington came and spoke to the students, advising them they could stay the night.

UWO president Carleton Williams spoke to student leaders, to York president David Slater who had given in to identical student demands the previous day, and to Jack McNie, Minister of Colleges and Universities. McNie advised Williams to release the student aid money but give students a note saying the money was granted on the condition tuition would be paid with it.

The occupying students voted to continue the sit-in through the weekend until Ontario Premier William Davis appeared on campus yesterday to address a convention of the Ontario Young Progressive Conservative Association.

On Sunday the students demanded Davis speak to them at the occupied office, but he refused, suggesting another building. The students refused and they marched over to the business administration building where Davis was addressing the P.C.'s. There the students engaged him in some discussion but he dodged most questions about education policy.

Some 2,500 students have reportedly not yet paid their full fees at UWO. Observers say if the administration had agreed to release the cheques at the beginning of the week rather than the end, the number would have been closer to 6,000. About 12,000 students attend UWO full-time.

The struggle suffered a setback at the university of Windsor only minutes after the UWO occupation had succeeded Friday. About 20 Windsor students occupied their fees office and chained the door also demanding the release of student aid money but about 15 minutes later the chains were cut by campus security officers.

The occupiers remained seated across the doorway but students wanting to pay their fees were able to pick their way through them.

"Business was normal," fees official Joseph Schiller said. "In fact better than normal."

After a few minutes the occupiers decided to leave.

The University of Ottawa Students Federation has called off the strike on its campus because only 14 students paid their fees into the federation-sponsored trust fund, rather than pay to the university. U of O administrators sent stern letters to students warning them of late fees and deregistration procedures should they fail to pay tuition.

"The letter really psyched out a lot of people," federation president Peter Beach admitted. Beach's council tried to organize the fee strike at U of O without belonging to the Ontario Federation of Students which organized the province-wide strike. U of O withdrew from OFS in the summer when other schools refused Beach's demand for a September full fees strike.

Meanwhile students at York and UWO are planning a moratorium of classes Thursday to discuss the fee boycott.

Evans will set up committee to examine academic appointments

U of T president John Evans said last night he is in the process of setting up a task force to examine academic appointments in the university.

According to Evans, the terms of reference of the committee have not yet been finalized, but it will deal with "appointments, procedures and policy."

It will not have "major student representation", he stated.

The proposal will likely be reported to the Governing Council as "information" on Thursday.

Student Governing Council executive member Brian Morgan, when contacted last night, said that he objected to both the structure of the committee and the fact that it is to have no strong student voice.

If the Governing Council is just a deliberative body, it will be sapped of its major strength... initiation", he declared.

Paul Cadario, chairman of the council's Internal Affairs Committee, said in an interview that he expects the task force to study the "nature, effect and possible changes" of academic appointments, with a "heavy emphasis on the maintenance of the quality of academic courses."

Tenure, and the status of full professorship in relation to tenure would also be considered, he thought.

The Planning and Resources Committee approved the formation of the committee at its January 4 meeting, as a presidential advisory committee rather than a subcommittee of a Governing Council Committee. Both PAC's and task forces would be set up by and directly report to the president, while the subcommittee structure would instead fall under the council, an elected body.

Planning and Resources chairman James Lewis explained that his committee approved Evans' proposal as a PAC because it was "a very urgent thing" to "examine very quickly the contractual arrangements of the faculty."

A PAC could get under way and report faster, he felt. The "facts without debate" are needed, he said, although he emphasized there was no attempt to stifle debate.

Although Lewis indicated that the task force would primarily be gathering facts, he added that it would "bring all the alternatives to the Governing Council."

Morgan charged last night that the task force is one aspect of a "power struggle" between the administration and the elected governing body of the university.

Power lies in detailed policy formation, he said. The terms of reference of a committee examining academic appointments, its composition, and the specific people on it should all be empowered to elected bodies, he felt.

"The work of the Governing Council and its committees is to develop policy, implement it, not just approve proposals submitted to it," Morgan asserted.

He added that the issue of academic appointments did not seem to be one that was "pressing" in terms of time. A Governing Council subcommittee could set up quickly in any case, he said.

SAC president Eric Miglin said last night he did not object to the task force structure.

However, "I feel very strongly that there should be at least two students" on the task force, he declared.

From discussions SAC has had with Evans on the matter, Miglin said he thought the president was contemplating a body of about eight or nine people with one student on it. SAC argued that another student was necessary.

Because of the importance of teaching to students, Morgan stressed that it is "absolutely vital to have major student representation."

He intends to raise the matter at the Governing Council's Thursday meeting, he added.

While Miglin thought the task force would be asked to produce recommendations by June, Lewis said he thought it would have eight months to report.

Its report will likely be considered by the Business Affairs, Academic Affairs and Planning and Resources Committees, Lewis added.

York students may stage moratorium

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — Students at York University ended their two-day occupation Friday over the unconditional release of student award cheques, and are now moving to a broader base of action of the province-wide fees strike.

The occupation began when the York administration refused to release student award cheques without first deducting tuition fees. It ended Friday when the administration agreed to the unconditional release of both undergraduate and graduate cheques.

The awards cheques, originally held on the grounds of a 1969 government directive, will be released today. In agreeing to student demands, York president David Slater first checked with the provincial government and said he was told he could give "the most liberal interpretation possible" to the directive. He then said the contract was between the students and the government and that the university would take the view that the students had or would honour that contract.

Slater also lifted all fines for late payment for this term. The maximum fine is $10. York has no academic penalties for late payment according to a 1970 senate resolution.

The administration refused a third demand—to endorse the aims of the fees strike through a public statement. Students at York first said they would continue to occupy until that demand was met, but later agreed they should direct their energies in getting mass-based support for the fees strike.

A steering committee was formed after a mass meeting Friday, but so far it's mainly the 40 to 50 occupiers who have taken part in organizing. They have called for a moratorium on classes Thursday. Faculty and students have been invited to speak out against the provincial government in its policy of cutbacks in post-secondary education.

Varsity house open

Varsity readers get their chance to see if the paper's offices really look like this when The Varsity holds its Open House Wednesday afternoon beginning at 1 pm. If you think you might have some interest in working on the paper, the afternoon will introduce you to all the things we do to publish The Varsity. People will be here to explain all about news, sports, feature, and review writing; photography; editing; and layout. So, circle that date end time: Wednesday, January 17, 1 pm. Who knows, the people in the picture might even be there.

Position threatened, SAC assistant resigns

Long-time student politician Paul Carson has resigned from his position as SAC executive assistant, just in time to avoid a possible rejection of his appointment at Wednesday's council meeting.

In a letter to the executive meeting which met yesterday, Carson said he wished to avoid divisiveness on council.

There was strong opposition to his appointment at last Wednesday's meeting. Carson was not available for comment yesterday.

Carson, a part-time theology student who has been on campus more than 10 years, has in recent years worked for SAC, the U of T Athletic Association, Radio Varsity and The Varsity. He has co-edited a student handbook and run various other services for campus organizations, even down to keeping statistics on hockey games.

Carson was executive assistant last summer, but was shifted to services and communications worker early in the fall until reappointed assistant in November by the executive.

Both he and his replacement Peter Milic had to be approved by a general council meeting.

However, two meetings in December failed to do so for lack of a quorum. And, last Wednesday's meeting could not discuss the appointments as the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee disrupted the meeting.

The disruption, in fact, was prompted by a motion to move in camera to discuss the appointments, which SSSC members construed as an attempt to prevent discussion of the fees strike.

The mover of the motion to go in camera, former education commissioner Marty Stollar, explained last night that there was "little but enthusiasm" for Milic, but strong opposition to Carson's appointment.

Carson, he said, was a "very strong divisive element" in the office. One of Carson's goals was to entrench himself in office, according to Stollar, which meant that he formed "divisive" allegiances within the executive.

Some of Carson's actions, which Stollar declined to detail, were "several times brought up at the executive."

Stollar said that the level of opposition to Carson's appointment was difficult to predict, but he was hopeful that it would not have been approved. Most of the SAC representatives around the office seemed to disapprove of Carson, he said.

Communications commissioner Debra Lewis seconded Stollar's motion to move in camera to discuss the appointments and former finance commissioner Vince DeAngelo is recorded in the minutes of the executive meeting which appointed Carson as "strongly opposed" to the move because he felt the office didn't need an extra employee.

Internal Affairs Committee chairman Paul Cadario, automatically a SAC member by being a student governor, was suggested by both Stollar and president Eric Miglin as opposed to Carson's hiring. However, Cadario refused to comment in an interview.

There was speculation that one executive member might have resigned if the executive assistant was not ratified, Stollar stated.

Vice-president Ross Flowers said last night he was sorry to see Carson go. "I have a lot of admiration for Paul."

Miglin, who although unable to attend yesterday's executive meeting had been informed of Carson's Thursday decision to resign, commented, "I think Paul did a good job."

However, he admitted that Carson had given rise to "some differences of opinion".

Erindale executive member Arnold Brody said that the executive accepted the resignation without debate, as requested by Carson's letter. The letter was "without bitterness", he added, commenting that some new members of SAC this year "just didn't get along" with the executive assistant.

He said he had "no idea" if any move to reject Carson would have succeeded.

The executive does not intend to immediately replace Carson. Instead, it will see if earlier contentions that there was not enough work for the job are true.

Flowers indicated SAC would wait at least one week, and more likely two, before deciding.

U of T hears worker's grievance

The grievance of a U of T worker fired for refusing to wash a floor was heard by university labour relations officer John Parker Friday.

Parker's decision on the case of Damjon Andreev Grucev, an animal laboratory technician, is not expected until early this week. He has until Friday to rule on the dispute.

Grucev filed the grievance, claiming he was fired for refusing to mop a corridor he had washed just a half hour before. He also maintained his supervisor, V.B. Korompai, acted arbitrarily and harshly towards him.

"No one can convince me that refusing to mop an already clean floor is enough reason to be fired," he told The Varsity last week.

Grucev was not permitted to bring his lawyer into Friday's hearing, as Parker said it was a matter between Grucev's union, the Service Employees' International Union local 504 and the employer, the university.

Parker and two members of his staff, director of Laboratory Animal Science Dr. L.R. Christensen, who fired Grucev, and one of his staff and Korompai attended the hearing. Grucev was accompanied by two members of his union, including business agent Don Barclay.

"We feel he's got a good chance of being reinstated," Barclay says.

Both sides have agreed to abide by the provisions of the union's master agreement with the SEIU on university employees, although no contract for the animal lab technicians has yet been signed.

The unit of 45 technicians was recently organized by the SEIU, and is still negotiating with the university on the issue of wages. Both sides had already agreed on the other provisions of the contract, to be the same as the SEIU's other 750 university employees.

Parker said Friday that the union's wage demands "are beyond what our capabilities are under our budget."

However, he added "I don't know how serious" the union is about them. The issue of determining job classifications is making the negotiating more complex.

SEIU business agent Barclay said yesterday that the union's wage demands are the same as they were in November, when it asked for $3.61 to $4.01 per hour for the majority of affected workers. At present the workers earn $2.53 to $2.84 an hour.

The two sides are 50 cents apart, says Barclay.

Union and management are far enough apart that they will meet with a provincially appointed conciliator tomorrow in an attempt to settle their differences.

Parker says he is anticipating a settlement soon, but Barclay is not optimistic.

The university's offer, although it has improved "some-what", is still "not acceptable", according to Barclay.

"I don't see any quick settlement."

City Council may repeal development bylaws

By DOUG HAMILTON

The surprise election of a "reform" majority on City Council in December has recreated for many people hope of preventing massive unwanted developments from intruding on their communities.

For council can, although perhaps with some cost, repeal their approval of some of these large apartments if they have not been approved by the Ontario Municipal Board, which must agree with all zoning changes.

Three of these contentious developments, passed by last year's council include the Cadillac project at Quebec and Gothic Avenues near High Park, the Windlass development on McCaul Street, and the Meridian Building Group's bid to erect a new extension to their present St. James Town complex.

At a January 5 meeting, council asked City Solicitor William Callow to prepare a report outlining the legal ramifications and the financial penalties the city might risk if it repeals a bylaw dealing with a development.

At present, the city has the power to repeal a bylaw, but it may face the possibility of being sued by the developer if his project is prevented from going ahead.

According to Ward I Alderman Elizabeth Earys, Callow's report may be ready for presentation as early as Wednesday. She believes the solicitor's findings will indicate that the city can legally repeal the bylaws without incurring financial penalties.

If council can successfully prevent the construction of the three projects, the efforts of many citizens who fought relentlessly against them will have born fruit.

QUEBEC-GOTHIC

The first test of the council's sincerity to preserve local neighbourhoods will come today. The city's application to re-zone Quebec and Gothic Avenues to permit the construction of a town-house and apartment complex will come before the OMB.

The city may ask the OMB for an adjournment of any board hearings on the bylaw until the solicitor's report is made available.

The Quebec-Gothic district is a quiet, residential area adjacent to High Park. It is presently zoned only for low-level, low-density family housing, but its designation in the Official Plan (which itself has not been accepted by the OMB) would permit high-rise. Its proximity to the park and a nearby subway line make it an ideal location for apartments.

In 1971, the Cadillac and Greenwin development corporations began to assemble land on the two streets. They slowly bought out homeowners until they had amassed sufficient property to build on the site.

Greenwin-Cadillac then approached City Council and asked it to rezone the area for high-rise development. A project consisting of a recreation centre, four townhouses, and 28-storey apartment towers was proposed for the council's approval. However, in order to erect the towers and the townhouses, 100 existing homes were slated for destruction by the developer.

The community solidified when Cadillac-Greenwin's proposal was put before council. A citizens' group was formed and residents made seemingly endless deputations to both the Building and Development Committee and City Council.

Citizens battled politicians and the developer for over a year, but to no avail. After several tumultuous meetings (at one meeting, several hundred people poured down from the gallery to interrupt proceedings), council approved the controversial project in March 1971, even though 1,500 residents in the area signed a petition denouncing the development.

The conflict at Quebec-Gothic created a great deal of unfavourable publicity for Cadillac; not only did citizens resent the tactics utilized by the development consortium, but they were angered by the land deal negotiated between the companies and Alderman Ben Grys.

Grys' wife purchased 50 Gothic Avenue in 1962 for the sum of $14,250 and in March 1971 sold to Blithe Investments, a firm which assembled land for Cadillac-Greenwin. Blithe paid her $105,000, a figure which residents in the area claimed was grossly inflated.

Gladys Grys sold 92 Gothic Avenue in the same year for $90,000, a figure vastly exceeding the price she paid for the house in September 1954.

On May 10, 1971, Ben Grys at the Committee on Buildings and Development moved that the bylaw draft approving the development and the zone change be approved.

Ward 7 aldermen John Sewell and Karl Jaffary denounced Grys for not declaring a conflict of interest and took the matter before the courts.

The Supreme Court ruled that Grys did violate the Municipal Act but it did not affix any penalty.

In the December 1972 civic election Grys was soundly defeated by Swansea ratepayers' leader Elizabeth Earys. Since her election, Earys has called for the repeal of the bylaw.

WINDLASS

The Grange district of south-east Spadina, has been the first home for newly-arrived immigrants for several generations, and it now provides Toronto's Chinese population with a sense of identity, and functions as a focal point of social and cultural interests.

It is also ripe territory for the land development industry.

Windlass Holdings Limited moved into the Chinese community, and succeeded in gradually buying up and demolishing 42 old Victorian houses on the east side of McCaul by the fall of 1970.

Windlass then applied to build three high-rise towers called "Grange Village" on the site, which required not only a rezoning, but also a redesignation of the block as part of the city's core.

In early 1971, the city planning staff recommended Windlass' desired changes, and although large numbers of the community's inhabitants objected at public meetings, City Council complied with the developer's wishes.

Subsequently, although the OMB had not approved it, the city considered the area rezoned and excluded the block from the planning area known as south-east Spadina.

However, as a concession to area residents, council approved a freeze on further development in the area until a part II study of the area was completed. This study was intended to solicit a response from the community on developments in South East Spadina.

In late 1971, the Special Committee on the Chinese Community was established to study the planning staff's report. The city's representatives on the community were Ward 6 aldermen June Marks and Horace Brown, and Ward II alderman David Rotenberg, all avowed supporters of development.

Although area residents protested the incursions of developers into their district, council paid them no heed.

City planner Alan Dean has completed a tentative part II plan which acknowledges the presence of the Windlass project, but calls a halt to further high-rise construction.

If this plan were adopted, the northern and western sections of the neighbourhood would be preserved as a low-rise residential area. However this would necessitate City Council downzoning the district or the imposition of height restrictions. Dean's plan is being discussed at public meetings before a decision is made on it.

Heard told The Varsity that he favours "a second look" at Windlass, meaning that he may endorse repealing it.

However, he maintains the legal situation is not clear at present.

The OMB hearings dealing with Windlass will commence on February 6.

ST. JAMES TOWN WEST

For many years the area bordered by Sherbourne, Wellesley, Bloor and Bloor Streets was considered to be one of Toronto's most shabbiest backwaters, a rooming house district and a haven for single transient men.

The district was plagued with slum landlords, drunks and petty criminals. City Council sighed with relief when the multi-million dollar Meridian Building Group put forth plans to erect several apartment towers in the late 1950's.

A few years later, Meridian completed the massive complex which is now known as St. James Town, a concrete and glass monolith which houses 12,000 people, situated on the Parliament, Wellesley, and Bloor and Bloor streets.

By 1969, Meridian had bought out most of the properties on Sherbourne and later razed them. An application to the city to permit the construction of two apartment towers of 31 storeys and one of 30 storeys was filed in late 1971.

"More than anything else, it is understanding and knowledge that defeats fear."

— Norman Bethune

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Daisons Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

A committee should not a library make

A year ago, students began mobilizing their support for a campaign to open the stacks of the John Robarts Library to the community rather than going along with administration plans to close the fortress' stacks to all but faculty and graduate students.

In unprecedented numbers, students rallied to the cause, sending more than 4,000 petitions flooding into The Varsity offices demanding open stacks. Another 3,000-plus signed other petitions for the same cause. And, an Open the Stacks Committee co-ordinated student efforts to present their case to the administration.

But, all this — and the support of various community groups including labour unions and Toronto City Council — failed to convince the administration heavies, including an intransigent chief librarian. Logic fell by the wayside as first the Library Council and then the academic Senate refused to open the stacks to undergrads and the public.

The conservatives claimed to fear large-scale undergrad looting of the stacks despite an extraordinary electronic theft prevention system. They insisted the library was never designed to house large numbers of people rummaging through the stacks, although the architects told a national radio audience that it had been designed for community access. So the excuses ran.

Convinced that rational debate and argument could mean little to an administration which rejected student demands with such unsubstantiated allegations, students finally resorted to occupation of the Simcoe Hall Senate Chambers in an attempt to force the university to deal justly with the issue.

Overreacting, the administration called in police to evict the unsuspecting students two mornings later.

In the ensuing melee, 54 Metro and campus police brutally ended the occupation, arresting 19 people. Following a re-occupation, of the Senate Chambers the next afternoon by more than 600 students who refused to give up to the use of force, the administration agreed to drop trespassing charges and to let the Crown to drop the assault and obstruction charges. The Crown refused, insisting it would proceed with assault and obstruction charges against four of the occupiers and reluctantly dropping the trespassing charges only because the university would not press them.

The second occupation sobered the administration.

"Well! We built the damn thing. Now I suppose they'll want us to find some books to put in it."

Then acting president Jack Sword and his top advisors agreed to most student demands, including all but unlimited stack access for undergrads and the general public. But, conservative faculty who dominated the Senate reacted bitterly to what they regarded as a sell-out.

In the meeting called to ratify the administration's concessions, they indignantly assailed administrators who would give in to force, never really listening to the arguments in its favour. The tactics reluctantly employed had blinded them to any rational discussion. "I don't think I'm qualified to vote on what's right or wrong tonight," intoned John Crispo, then School of Business acting director and a harsh critic of the students. He later voted on the motions, anyway. In the end, the Senate rejected the concessions, referring the matter back to the Library Council which had earlier proved it had no interest in listening to the merits of opening the stacks.

Then, while students were studying for exams or away on summer vacation, the Senate reconvened to approve the Library Council's recommendations, recommendations which favoured granting stack access permits to undergrads and grads on the basis of "academic need". It left definition of academic need for others to play with, although few doubted this euphemism would become the instrument for the administration and the librarians charged with its execution to favour graduate and faculty use of the stacks.

The Senate effectively killed a key issue in the struggle — community access to the stacks — by instructing the Library Council to leave resolution of that matter to the incoming Governing Council at some time "after there has been sufficient experience with the operation of the Robarts Library.

Faculty conservatives had managed to avoid dealing with the issues by constantly pushing their consideration off into committees dominated by their partisans, committees which did little more than waste time. Just as they've proven themselves to be exclusively devoted to their unenlightened self-interest on the Governing Council, the conservatives never once stopped to consider seriously the students or the public. Their main concern — one shared equally by top librarians — was to keep the mammoth new research library sacred for graduates and faculty.

Again this year, they've managed to keep the library issue in low profile, delaying action by pointing to the Governing Council's intended review of library policy. But, as the initial meetings of the council's library subcommittee show, this review is unlikely to provide any substantial changes to the existing policy. Unlikely, that is, unless students and the public refuse to allow the issue to continue to be buried.

Until now, the trials of the four occupiers charged with assault and obstructions following the first occupation have been the only reminders that there is a library issue. Two of the accused have already been tried and convicted, although granted absolute discharges stripping them of any criminal records. Another two, Tom McLaughlin and Bill Getty, come to trial this week.

Students cannot risk letting the public incorrectly assume that their commitment to the issue was only a passing fancy. They must — as many did during the initial trials — show up in court to demonstrate their support by their presence and strengthen the link between last year's struggle and the one that lies ahead for this year. When McLaughlin comes to trial Monday morning at 10, Getty Wednesday at the same time, they should be assured that the issue which brought them to trial has not been abandoned.

After months of inaction, the Students' Administrative Council last week finally owed up to some modicum of responsibility, establishing a committee to prepare a brief on the library issue.

But, that's not enough. Vigorous advocacy of the issue which more than 7,000 students championed last year is the least that can be expected from the council. They claim to represent their constituents; their constituents spoke clearly and unmistakably last year.

And, if the Governing Council's library subcommittee is anything more than another subterfuge, it will seriously reconsider the existing policy and opt for unrestricted undergraduate and community access to the Robarts Library when it reopens, not six months or a year later. The administration and conservative faculty have proved themselves unable to marshal any convincing arguments in defence of restricted access.

Attempts to close the stacks to all but a select academic few betray the advocates' class bias: they wish to reserve access to information for themselves and deny it to mere undergraduates and the public whose millions paid for construction of the controversial library. Knowledge, they appear to realize, is indeed a powerful weapon.

If unlimited access begins to prove troublesome — and we doubt it ever will — access should be limited on a first-come, first-serve basis — with the only criterion being to avoid overcrowding.

Librarians and the question of access to them, conservatives will be sorry to learn, will not disappear just because one academic year has concluded and another begun.

SSSC defends fees trust fund

At the U of T 75 per cent of the students who had paid only their first installment voted to have a fees strike in the second term. The Ontario Federation of Students did nothing to organize the fees strike except print up a bunch of posters. U of T SAC, led by president Eric Miglin plotted to sabotage the strike.

Miglin will tell all students who are merely withholding their fees to pay them to the university at the end of January. That is why he calls it the "January Fees Boycott". The university wants to avoid student eruptions like those at York and Glendon, so it gave out OSAP cheques and deferred the late penalty, knowing full well that Miglin would do as he was told and get the students to pay their fees by February.

Why would Miglin do this? Because he has a scholarship to Harvard to protect and he doesn't want a reputation as a troublemaker. Jill Conway, the vice-president of Internal Affairs, graduated from Harvard and could make trouble for Miglin.

One of Miglin's main tasks is to discredit the only group on campus that is really fighting to Stop the Student Surcharge. The Varsity reported on Friday, January 12 that Conway had admitted meeting with Miglin and three SAC reps outside 215 Huron Street, the Comptroller's Office, where the SSSC had their strike trailer and picket line. She said that they agreed that Miglin should put up signs dissociating SAC from the trust fund. Why does Miglin have to be told by the administration to put up signs? No students told him to do so. The SSSC has been taking these signs down, and have been told by the U of T police that they have orders to protect them. The administration is protecting SAC signs from the students.

The trust fund that Miglin is attacking is the only way that students can win the fight to Stop the Student Surcharge. It was set up to give maximum strength and maximum protection. The trust fund organizes students into one large powerful body and forces the university to deal with all the students at once. This is the strength of the whole thing. We have nothing to fear from our fellow students — the main enemy is the university and we must unite to fight it.

Students who join the fund pay a portion of their second term fees into it. The money stays in the fund until the majority of the depositors decide in a referendum to pay the university. The money will either stay in the fund or be paid to university — it is for the students to decide. If the money is not paid to the university by January 1, 1974, it will be returned to each student. Cheques are made out directly to Guaranty Trust Company Trust Account T8678, so only the Trust Company can cash your cheque. Before joining the trust fund, all students are required to read the contract. This is to protect you.

The taxpayers of Ontario refuse to pay any more money to grasping university administrations, and students cannot afford to pay endless surcharges. Our demands eliminate both of these alternatives. First, administration and faculty salaries should be set at the level which will pay for the surcharge. This would still leave a very healthy salary. Second, all back taxes should be collected from foreign professors who took the two-year tax holiday and stayed in Canada longer than two years. Third, the tax holiday should be eliminated. Fourth, we should eliminate wasteful university spending. At Lakehead University last year, each professor spent an average of $600 on long distance phone calls alone!

The Stop the Student Surcharge Committee calls on all students to deposit their fees in the trust account. We intend to pay only last year's amount, so you deposit only that amount which, when added to this year's first deposit, equals last year's fees. The fees strike trailer headquarters has been set up at 215 Huron Street and there will be someone there to answer your questions. The SSSC also wants you to come and join the picket line outside 215 — there will be hot coffee in the trailer for all those who get cold.

Stop the Student Surcharge Committee

Exec didn't try to stifle strike

At a meeting of the executive of the SAC held on Sunday, it was decided that a clarification of our position on last Wednesday's council meeting was in order. Because the issue of the fees boycott is a high priority of the council this year, we are particularly concerned that our stance may be misunderstood by some students.

The SAC has endorsed and supported the fees withholding and was anxious to discuss the matter further last Wednesday evening. The meeting's agenda consisted of ratification of minutes, grants policy, grants, fees boycott, war in Vietnam, other business. The agenda was passed by the council at the beginning of the meeting after considerable discussion. After council had voted to move into closed session to discuss a motion from minutes of an executive meeting, the members of the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee refused to leave and disrupted any further discussion. When assured that the fees boycott could not be discussed while council was in closed session and that it would receive the complete attention of council after the minutes had been dealt with, they still refused to allow the council meeting to continue. The disruption made it impossible to proceed and after more than a half an hour, council adjourned. The members of the SSSC then blocked the exits of the meeting room to prevent the council from dispersing. Several members of council, upon attempting to leave, were physically prevented from doing so by members of the SSSC.

The SAC executive wishes to state unequivocally that it cannot tolerate obstruction of its meetings and physical threat to its members. Surely groups within the university can meet to rationally discuss important issues without resorting to potentially dangerous disruptions.

The next meeting of the SAC will be held on Wednesday, January 17th. We propose to propose to continue with the agenda as planned, that is, minutes, grants and grants policy, fees boycott, other business. We invite all members of the university community to attend and discuss the fees boycott. We hope that it will be possible to do so.

Varsity prefers to keep ad junk

The Varsity's squirming over the question of exploitative advertising ("All Forms of Capitalism are Oppressive", January 12th, 1973) has a familiar ring. Our editors are clearly uncomfortable with some advertising junk they publish. But like some others afflicted in our society, they prefer to keep the junk and pass the buck. To be just a bit more discriminating, they plead, would mean less money for The Varsity. To make some careful distinctions would involve practical difficulties and some impossibly hard decisions. Poor Varsity! Trapped in the barnyard of capitalism, who can blame our editors if they push their way to the trough? We are even promised some snorts of . . . criticism.

The Varsity's editors cannot make distinctions between the qualities of oppression under capitalism; it's all the same to them. Maybe that's because they're not very oppressed. But this doesn't mean there are no distinctions to be made. Rape is worse than a sexist snub, and an ad for Termpapers Unlimited is worse than an ad for contact lenses.

Editors, your readers are watching you!

Bethune gets glimmer of recognition

By DAVID FRANK

Last summer, three of the top guns in the federal cabinet — one in Ottawa, one in Gravenhurst, and the third in Peking — summoned up their political gumption and spoke words of high praise for a Canadian Communist: Dr. Norman Bethune.

In Gravenhurst, then Trade and Commerce Minister Jean Luc Pepin toured a rambling, green house and promised "fitting recognition" of the building where his newly discovered hero was born.

In Peking, External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp, on an important trade-boosting mission, pledged that Bethune would be made a Canadian of national historic significance.

And, back in Ottawa, politicians congratulated themselves on their fine diplomatic efforts and rubbed their hands in gleeful anticipation of the vast markets which were opening up for Canadian grain and Canadian goods in the world's most populous country.

At this university, however, Bethune remains an all but forgotten graduate. The university does not brag about its world famous alumnus, except when visiting Chinese delegations tour the campus. Even that's an improvement over past performance. Questioned in 1970, U of T's Dean of Medicine A.L. Chute confessed, "I know absolutely nothing about him. . . . All I know is that he went to China." Chute wasn't even aware that Bethune had graduated from U of T's medical school during World War I, thinking instead that he had been a McGill graduate. And, the university's library has only four copies of Bethune's biography, The Scalpel, The Sword written by Ted Allan and Sydney Gordon, two of which are tucked away in the stacks of the Biological and Medicine library and the other two in the Victoria and Trinity libraries.

Canadian Communists are not normally honoured by the Canadian government. What makes Norman Bethune such an unusual exception? The answer lies in the political embarrassments Canadian officials and businessmen have met in the two years since Canada recognized the People's Republic of China and embarked on a strenuous campaign to build up trade between the two countries. Whenever a group of Chinese have visited Canada — be they journalists, students, ping pong players or trade representatives — they always ask to be taken to the birth place of Norman Bethune. Whenever Canadians have travelled to China they have always been struck by the love and respect accorded Bethune by the Chinese people. Of course, the Chinese hosts ask, this' great man is suitably recognized in Canada too?

The answer — that a conspiracy of silence has attempted to wipe out the memory of a great Canadian revolutionary — has been politically embarrassing. A national hero in China, Bethune has been practically unknown in his native land.

But if today Bethune's name is useful diplomatic currency, he remains a much different kind of hero to both Canadian and Chinese working people. In making the once scorned Canadian revolutionary into a national hero, the Canadian government has not made much effort to draw a full and accurate picture of Bethune's life. For their purposes the man's name is enough. The substance of Bethune's life — that he was a staunch anti-capitalist who gave his life in the international struggle for socialism — will continue to be concealed.

When, for example, Bethune's birthplace finally got around to recognizing him, speaker after speaker sidestepped any reference to his politics. Bethune biographer Allan finally embarrassed the assembled hometown throngs by pointing out what they'd all chosen to ignore — that Bethune had been a Communist. Afterwards, local MP Gordon Alkan hastened to assure a CBC interviewer that he was sure Bethune hadn't really been a Communist, that he joined the party "as his way of expressing opposition to the way things were at the time".

Capitalism and the Doctor

Long before Bethune went to China in 1938, he had become an unusual kind of doctor. As a general practitioner in working class neighbourhoods, Bethune refused to place a patient's ability to pay for help ahead of his need for medical care. Not having cash, many patients would pay the doctor with goods and services — meat from the corner butcher, repairs to his second hand

...finally ...summer ...definition

...ture from other neighbours. Bethune came to recognize the social roots of many diseases under capitalism — tuberculosis which could not be cured but complete rest and quiet, babies who grew up because of malnutrition, children suffering from inadequate diets, workers who acquired crippling diseases in industry which cut their lives short. Passionate and skilled, Bethune came to think of himself as nothing more than a highly trained workman. Like so many of his profession he considered himself a member of the working class.

On the basis of his experience Bethune lashed out angrily at the hypocrisy of most of his profession, calling doctors to take private profit out of health care. He appealed to colleagues again and again. In speeches, lectures, writings: "Let us make it disgraceful to enrich ourselves at the expense of our fellow men."

"Medicine," Bethune argued, "is a typical, loosely organized, basically individualistic industry in this 'catch catch can' capitalistic system, operating as a monopoly on a private profit basis... Inability to share is combined with poor distribution."

On the basis of this analysis Bethune condemned capitalist medicine as a "luxury trade" and worked to bring about socialized medicine in Canada. His strategy was to turn the system of health care completely upside down:

"Medicine must be entirely reorganized and unified, and tied into a great army of doctors, dentists, nurses, technicians and social service workers, to make a centralized attack on disease and utilizing all the best scientific knowledge of its members to that end. We say to the people not — how much have you — but how best can we serve you?"

In Montreal in the 1930s, Bethune became recognized as a brilliant surgeon, a specialist in pioneering thoracic medicine and the inventor of dozens of medical instruments, many of them still used in modified form to this day. Politically, he continued to mature and develop. Outspoken in his defence of socialized medicine, Bethune continued to agitate among fellow doctors, insisting that they play their part in the struggle against the effects of capitalism.

Bethune became a familiar figure on the breadlines of Depression Montreal. Treating the poor for free, he worked with unions and groups of unemployed workers. In this period of mass unemployment and intense class struggle in Canada, Bethune came to definite political conclusions about the capitalist system he had always trusted for the way it promoted sickness and ill health among the working classes. He saw an alternative. In 1935, he became a member of the Communist Party.

A demonstration of unemployed workers in Montreal which Bethune witnessed deeply affected the doctor. The episode was recalled in verse by Joe Wallace in The Saga of Dr. Bethune:

*Lawrence Straat towards the river runs and there and watch the well fed men with guns as they charge and watch the street turn red.
Blood of gangsters? No, of the unfed in who had helped to make our country great and soon, would save it from a fascist fate.
Wetched Bethune, and with an angry eye, were lay his neighbour and he passed not by.
Lead the famous surgeon joined their ranks and gave his all to all. . .*

Go to the wounded'

In February, 1936, the Spanish people elected a government made up of an alliance of Socialists, Communists, and other left-wing groups. At once, the democratically elected government found itself faced with the threat of a right-wing military coup. Supported by both Hitler and Mussolini, General Franco's armies declared war on the republican government. The Spanish Civil War erupted. The fascists saw Spain as an excellent testing ground for the war they would launch within three years. German and Italian troops, arms, tanks and planes poured into the divided country, while Britain and France stood idly by, proclaiming their neutrality in this "internal" conflict.

An international working class movement sprang to the defence of the Spanish Republic, sending money, food and medical supplies, war materials to the Loyalist forces. Thousands of class conscious workers from around the world fought as the International Brigade of the Loyalist Army. Among these were some 1200 Canadians who formed the Mackenzie-Papineau Battalion of the Internationals; almost half of these men gave their lives in this heroic prelude to World War II.

Canada's Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy, which co-ordinated Canadian support for Spain, invited Bethune to head up a medical unit which was to be sent to Spain. Bethune took up the challenge, even though it meant interrupting the important progress he was making in finding new ways to treat tuberculosis. The situation was urgent. The fascist troops were only 10 miles from Madrid, the Spanish capital, when Bethune arrived in December, 1936.

In Spain, Bethune earned an international reputation for the unique mobile blood transfusion service he pioneered. With a couple of battered trucks, some portable butane refrigerators and a handful of dedicated co-workers, Bethune organized the first battlefield blood transfusion service in history. In doing this, he was simply putting into practice one of the basic tenets of his medical philosophy — get to the sick and injured as quickly as possible. "Doctors," he wrote, "go to the wounded. Don't wait for the wounded to go to you."

Bethune in Nova Scotia

After six months in Spain, Bethune returned to Canada to spend another half year tirelessly touring the country, speaking about the Loyalists' struggle, mustering support for the cause. He came to Nova Scotia in September, 1937.

In Sydney, Bethune stayed at a cheap "fleabag" hotel on George Street, organizers of his meeting recall. In spite of his reputation as a medical man, not a single doctor in Sydney came to visit him during his stay. Attempts to have Bethune appear on the local radio station were foiled by the owners who told him he was "too controversial". But, while respectable society shunned him, a huge, enthusiastic audience packed the Strand Theatre in Sydney to hear Bethune.

His speech was preceded by the showing of a film, The Heart of Spain, which showed Madrid under siege, German planes bombing the city, the poorly-equipped Loyalist forces at the front, various medical units, including the Blood Transfusion Unit, at work. Then Bethune spoke.

"The immediate cause of the war in Spain," Bethune told his audiences, "was that the bosses wanted to get control of the government which had been set up by the people. On the one side there were the Loyalists and Democrats, opposed by the Rebels and Fascists on the other."

Bethune went on to attack the Canadian government for its "neutral" role in the war. While the government placed obstacles in the way of volunteers for the International Brigade and refused to help ship medical supplies and equipment to Spain, Canadian businesses had sold $1.7 million worth of war materials to Franco's armies.

"Where the need is greatest"

In spite of heroic efforts and wide support, the democratic forces in Spain were crushed by Hitler, Mussolini, and Franco. The Spanish Republic was a tragic victim of poor equipment, inexperience in war and of international diplomacy. In 1938 Bethune's internationalism led him to China, where a people's army directed by Mao Tse Tung was fighting back the invasion launched by Japanese imperialism. "Spain and China are part of the same battle," Bethune decided, "I am going to China because I feel that is where the need is greatest; that is where I can be most useful."

There, he convinced Mao to let him establish a mobile operating unit which could treat wounded soldiers at the front lines of the guerrilla armies. He worked almost without rest — marching with the army, setting up his field hospital, operating for hours on end, and then moving on to the next location. He taught skeptical Chinese peasants the value of blood transfusions; trained doctors, nurses, and other medical personnel; helped establish the first modern hospitals in China; worked on a training manual for field hospitals; and when he found time wrote lengthy letters to North America describing the situation, appealing for equipment and supplies. Under the most primitive of medical conditions, Bethune performed wonders.

In November, 1939, Bethune planned a trip home to raise money and buy supplies. The Canadian government, eager to establish Bethune as a super-patriotic Canadian, has given out the story that Bethune planned to leave China for good and join the Canadian army. However, Bethune biographer Allan says the story is a complete fabrication and an attempt to make Bethune seem more respectable.

Shortly before he was to leave, Bethune was operating in the Buddhist temple of a small village when Japanese forces began to advance on the location. In the hectic rush to complete the operation and retreat,

"... if I say that the people need bread, does it mean that they don't, simply because the man who says it considers socialism the most equitable, the highest political and moral form of human society?"

"I am sure that if Christ walked the earth again, preaching the brotherhood of man, He too would have thrown at Him the label of 'Moscow hireling'."

— Norman Bethune

Bethune, operating without surgical gloves because of the lack of equipment, cut his finger. In his exhausted, weakened condition he contracted blood poisoning. On November 13, 1939, he died.

Shortly before, he had written, "Here I have found comrades who belong to the very hierarchy of humanity. They have seen cruelty, yet know gentleness; they have tasted bitterness, yet know how to smile; they have endured vast suffering, yet know patience, optimism, quiet wisdom. I have come to love them; I know they love me too."

During his brief eight months in China, Bethune made a permanent imprint on the Chinese revolutionary movement. No Chinese citizen is unfamiliar with Bethune's life; he is a symbol of selfless dedication, and of revolutionary internationalism. When Bethune died, Mao wrote of him:

"What kind of spirit is this that makes a foreigner selflessly adopt the cause of the Chinese people's liberation as his own? It is the spirit of internationalism, the spirit of communism, from which every Chinese communist must learn. Leninism teaches that the world revolution can only succeed if the proletariat of the capitalist countries supports the struggle for liberation of the colonial and semi-colonial peoples and if the proletariat of the colonies and semi-colonies supports that of the proletariat of the capitalist countries. Comrade Bethune put this Leninist line into practice."

In deeds, too, Bethune's life is commemorated in China today. Under capitalism, one invariably finds a severe shortage of doctors because capitalist doctors work together to limit the entry of competitors into their "guild". The length and expense of medical training, and the mystification of doctors' skills are used to do this. Under socialism, however, where this vested interest does not exist, it is possible to work out a solution to this traditional problem. In 1970 China, there were more than one million so-called "bare foot" doctors — people who have received intensive medical training on how to deal with common illnesses and injuries. Far from being medical experts, these para-medical workers ensure that proper health service is immediately available throughout the country. In this way, socialist medicine, whose motive is not personal profit but the maximum possible care for people's health, is able to work to fulfill Bethune's objective of reaching the sick and injured as soon as possible.

Of course the surest way to combat sickness is to prevent it, to reach the patient before he or she is ill. While para-medical personnel are able to spread knowledge of healthy conditions and practices, it is when the social roots of disease are attacked that the best guarantees are established. Thus, Bethune worked for socialism and Bethune fought against capitalism and fascism.

He was on the the wrong side

The story is told that when then U of T president Claude Bissell visited China, the Chinese head of state, Chou En Lai, questioned the academic about his university's most famous graduate. "I imagine you have many buildings and monuments named after Dr. Bethune," the Chinese leader asked. Shamefacedly, Bissell had to reply that there were none. There are still none at U of T. York University, on the other hand, has a Bethune College.

Bethune was not the kind of man that buildings are usually named after in Canada today. He was on the wrong side. His life was one that offers rich examples for the Canadian working people of how a man who loves and respects life can participate in the struggle to build a world where life is genuinely valued.

PECU rebuilds, will have evaluation next year

By BOB BETTSON

The Political Economy Course Union, after failing to produce a course evaluation this year, intends to try again next year.

Last year PECU fought with the department over the form of the evaluation and each vowed to put out their own booklet.

However the department's effort, a booklet of statistics of student responses to a questionnaire, was poorly received and course union and departmental representatives met this fall to work out an agreement.

The result is a questionnaire with 25 questions agreed to by both departmental and student representatives with printing partially financed by the department.

According to PECU chairman John DeMarco students will have control over the course critiques and the department is partially financing the booklet in return for printing the statistics in the back.

Last year both the department and the course union planned booklets but the union was unable to complete theirs. Chairman Tom McLaughlin and other executive members were participants in the open stacks movement in the Roberts Library conflict.

Most of the course union executive had resigned and SAC press was unable to publish the booklet soon enough to be used by student pre-registering in the spring.

The department later printed statistics and published thousands of copies. Students' comments were only published in 60 xeroxed copies.

These, according to faculty member Jay Siegel, were intended for senior faculty and for libraries. He said the department was unable to finance a larger printing.

However, PECU obtained a copy of the open ended comments and decided to print them out of their surplus budget.

PECU, once one of the strongest course unions in the university, is now rebuilding. A structure of departmental decision-making with limited student participation was scrapped by the union in fall 1971 as tokenist.

The department thus continued with the previous system which included some student participation in curriculum decisions.

However this has not worked out.

DeMarco said that they had not been invited to sit on decision-making committees.

He disagreed with a brief that undergraduate secretary Peter Silcox had sent to the Social Sciences Curriculum Committee of the arts and science General Committee.

Silcox had alleged that students didn't feel they were ready for representation.

SAC will meet on Wednesday

Because of the disruption of last week's Students' Administrative Council meeting, the SAC executive decided yesterday to schedule another general meeting for Wednesday.

Council was not expected to meet again until next week, but its inability to conclude important business at last week's meeting has meant that the whole schedule of meetings had to be changed. Meetings are now scheduled for every two weeks starting Wednesday.

Last week's meeting was physically prevented from going in camera to discuss office staff hiring by the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee, SSSC, founded by the Canadian Liberation Movement, refused to leave the room, claiming that SAC intended either not to discuss the fees strike or to discuss it in camera.

After a confused and sometimes tense hour of arguing between SAC and SSSC, the meeting was adjourned.

Wednesday's meeting, tentatively scheduled for Brennan Hall at St. Michael's College, will, barring disruption, discuss the fees strike, office hiring, grants policy and specific grants, and ratification of commission meetings.

Lawyer says Chinese "getting freer"

By JOHN CAMPBELL

The question of freedom in China was a hot issue during the taping of a tv show on Saturday in which Norman Endicott defended the revolutionary state against a ring of largely anti-Communist opponents.

Clutching a copy of Mao's Little Red Book, the controversial Toronto lawyer who is secretary of the Canada-China Society, claimed that "the Chinese people are amongst the happiest in the world", and that they enjoy "freedom from hunger, freedom from unemployment and free access to medical treatment. They are getting freer every day."

The show, which has an unstructured question and answer format, touched on nearly every aspect of Chinese and foreign policy, from the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution to China's relations with Canada.

According to Endicott, the Chinese achieved only 20 percent of their objectives in the Cultural Revolution, which he characterized as an attempt by the Chinese to deal with their 2,000 year old bureaucracy.

In response to questions on China's attitude toward Canada, he stated that Canada "is not important in the Chinese scheme of things." Overwhelmingly, the Chinese "prefer foreigners from the Third World."

Endicott, who was born in China and spent his childhood there, describes himself as "a third generation Chinese." His grandfather had originally gone to China to do missionary work, and his father, Dr. James Endicott, had worked briefly with the Chinese as an American intelligence officer during World War II.

The lawyer linked his sympathy with the Chinese directly to his early family experiences on the mainland. Since leaving there, he has made several return visits as a representative of an importing firm.

On some points the guest and panelists could not agree on the "facts". Panelist Paul Fromm, formerly of the Western Guard, suggested that China has a deliberate policy of trading opium to the west in order to "demoralize America".

Endicott refuted this idea, and the broader charge that China actively promotes world revolution abroad. China, he stated, wants to lay to rest the domino theory in an effort to get the United States out of Vietnam.

The vigorous arguments stimulated by the great ideological differences between Endicott and his attackers continued in the halls of the studio after the taping had been completed.

have permission to build, Meridian directors ordered all homes in the area destroyed.

For two years, several acres of land have been rendered useless, gathering litter and garbage.

Meridian's proposed extension to their present St. James Town complex was given a rough ride at both the Building and Development Committee and City Council.

Ward 7 aldermen John Sewell and Karl Jaffary bitterly attacked the project because the elimination of old family dwellings to make way for high-rise units "is destroying Toronto".

Jaffary claimed the extra 1130 suites that Meridian was planning to build would be destined for middle class tenants, not working class families.

Tenants from Bleecker and Ontario Streets, to the south of the proposed development vociferously opposed it. Several residents shouting and heckling, were expelled during council and committee meetings when their overzealousness displeased former mayor Bill Dennison.

Despite opposition from the so-called reform caucus at City Council and antipathy from residents, council, with the Old Guard in the majority, voted on September 18, 1971, to approve the project.

Sewell accused the Old Guard of being in the pay of Meridian, and assailed the Labourers International Union which consistently supported the development, of signing a "sweet-heart" contract with Meridian.

However, since the recent election, and the assumption of power by a reform majority, the future of St. James Town West appears to be dim. According to Sewell, a move will be undertaken today at the Building and Development Committee to rescind the project.

If the members of the committee agree, and the City Solicitor's report on the feasibility of repealing the bylaws is favourable (which Sewell believes it will be), St. James Town West, like Windlass and Quebec-Gothic, may never be built.

Hockey Blues win exhibition at Waterloo

By PETER DUX

Blues Hockey team won two more games this weekend, routing Ryerson 16-1, and edging Waterloo 5-3 Saturday night in exhibition play.

Saturday's game, in what is commonly called the "Waterloo barn", was undecided until the last five seconds when Gord Davies scored into an empty net with Warrior goalie Jake Dupuis lifted for an extra attacker.

Waterloo, realizing that the only way to slow the Blues is through hard checking, came out with elbows flying. Their style, along with the small ice surface and rabid fan support helped keep the game close.

Toronto scored first in the opening period on a goal by Nick Holmes but Waterloo quickly retaliated with Elliott's goal. Blues McFarlane scored the winner at 2:45. Warriors came close to tying the game near the end of the period when Inness was called upon to stop a breakaway by Ron Hawkshaw. (The second period was sloppy with both defences showing lapses. Much of the action was between the bluelines with many stoppages in play.)

By comparison, the final period provided a fine exhibition of hockey with end-to-end rushes and superb goaltending on both ends of the rink. Both sides exerted pressure on each other with play see-sawing back and forth.

Blues overpowered Ryerson 16-1 on Friday night before a sparse crowd. Rams did, however, attempt to stay in the game in the first period, scoring one goal to Toronto's three. Ron Watson led the Rams in dealing out crunching checks, but Blues' Rick Cornacchia, Rick Leroy, and Nick Holmes retaliated.

The last two periods saw Blues take control with the defence tightening up and the forwards controlling the puck almost continuously in the Ryerson end. Varsity managed 56 shots on net in the final 40 minutes of play.

Goalie John Granton's quick glove kept Ryerson in the game in the first period, but after Blue's 14th goal he was lifted in favour of Rams' second goaltender, Trent Armstrong.

out for a few goals and then relaxing for a while. Twice they scored three goals in approximately three minutes, and at one point fired in three within 16 seconds.

Blues Notes. . . . the win over Ryerson counted in league play making Toronto 8-0-0 for the year. . . injuries took their toll in Waterloo with a number of players requiring facial repairs from flying sticks. . . Cam Crosby, Warriors' policeman, sat out Saturday's game with a hand broken in a fight last week against Lutheran. . . a number of Toronto players padded their scoring records Friday — Kent Ruhnke managed to fire in four goals. . . the Varsity record is shared by him and captain Gord Davies. . . defenceman Al Milnes missed Friday's game with the flu and was replaced by Rick Cornacchia. Ivan McFarlane sat out Friday as well but attempted to play Saturday. He was too weak and left the game after one period. . . Blues play Queen's next Friday night at the arena and then travel to Ithaca, N.Y. for an exhibition against Cornell Saturday.

Scarborough opens athletic complex

Scarborough College will offer several special events throughout this week to introduce its new recreation complex to the college community. The athletic week will enable students to participate in several tournaments and clinics, as well as some spectator sports.

Construction on the building was begun in June 1971 and completed last month. The construction costs amounted to $4.3 million, although the final cost, including equipment, totals over $5 million. The building also contains 18,000 square feet of unfinished undergraduate lab space. The remaining 70,000 square feet houses food services, cultural, and academic facilities.

The new building consists of 167,000 square feet of floor space, with athletic facilities totalling 40,000 square feet.

Included in the athletic section is a gymnasium with 17,280 square feet of floor space, a teaching studio (600 square feet), four regulation size squash courts, one men's and one women's sauna, a physical fitness training room, and two exercise rooms. The recreation complex itself was designed for a capacity of approximately 5,000 students. There are about 2,300 students presently enrolled at Scarborough.

The athletic area was planned with flexibility and multi-purpose use in mind. Folding partitions can be used to divide the main large gym into either two equal areas of 120' x 72', or into three areas, one of 120' x 72', and two of 60' x 72'. The teaching studio can also be partitioned into two areas of 30' x 50'.

Collapsible bleachers fold into one area of the walls, and the gym floor contains four volleyball courts, or three indoor tennis courts, or eight badminton courts, or two basketball courts (94' x 50'). The gym floor is covered with synthetic "tartan."

The student body actively helping to run athletics is the Scarborough College Athletic Association, formed with a constitution in March 1968. (However, this constitution is presently under revision.) The SCAA controls approximately 10 per cent of a $40,000 budget (approximate).

Men and women at Scarborough pay a total of $22 in athletic fees. Sixteen dollars go to the athletic office, run by the college but largely financed by students. However, the college administration pays the salaries of Director of Physical Education Taimo Pallandi, Assistant Director Mary Anne Prettie and a full-time secretary.

The college also maintains the building, paying janitorial staff and most normal maintenance costs. Of the remaining six dollars in the athletic fee, two dollars is paid to Hart House, two to the UTAA, and two to the SCAA.

The budget of the athletic department itself pays for coaches and coordinators' salaries, transportation, and equipment. The shuttle bus service to and from the St. George campus is apparently inadequate for transporting interfaculty teams and the college must pay to rent buses for travelling purposes on unscheduled hours.

The Scarborough College Athletic Association handles special events, tournaments, and banquets. Every undergraduate student enrolled at Scarborough is automatically a member, and the official body is composed of seven executive members, all students.

SCAA president Bob Sasaki said that there are no conflicts between the student body and the athletic department. According to Sasaki the college is still small enough that problems can be solved with a minimum of trouble. He said the "athletic department books are always open, there's no problem."

However, Sasaki did admit that the SCAA is still only the "students' mouthpiece." The SCAA reports to and is one branch of Scarborough's new Cultural Affairs Committee composed of members of the university community.

The building was apparently designed to be used by some community people, although up to now community use is restricted to groups and not individuals. Director of Physical Education Pallandi said that revenues are not as high as they might be because of the low student enrollment. (The complex was designed to be used by 5,000 students.) Consequently the building is operating on reduced hours. The athletic wing was scheduled to be closed Sundays, but Pallandi was successful in renting out the gym to groups to gain revenue to keep the other rooms and facilities open and available for students on that day.

Swimmers meet Mustangs, set new records

By PAUL CARSON

The men's swimming team added a second victory in the dual meet season Saturday afternoon with a 78-35 rout of the University of Western Ontario. Blues won nine of 13 meets.

Freshmen accounted for four of Varsity's nine victories as John Sebben led Toronto to two first place finishes in both the 200-yard freestyle and the 200-yard breaststroke. Shawn Laari won both the 500 and 1000-yard freestyle events.

Schhen's best ever time of 1:53.1 in the 200 freestyle plus a strong second place finish from Dave Wilkin settled Western's fate after only three events. Mustangs had expected to win the 200 free with former high school swimmer Wes McConnell but he finished third to put Blues well into the lead.

Western, perennial runner-up to Toronto at the league championships, did manage a slight comeback when Blair Shepperd took the 50-yard freestyle and Larry Sebulski topped the one-metre diving.

Varsity captain Jim Adams broke the pool record, clocking 2:05.2 in the 200-yard individual medley, and missed a second record by one-tenth of a second in the 100-yard freestyle.

Western's two other wins came from McConnell in the 200-yard breaststroke and Sebulski's second diving win, this time off the three-metre board.

Unfortunately for the spectators at the Benson Building, the meet between former Olympic competitors, Toronto's Byron MacDonald and Mustangs' Bill Kennedy, failed to materialize. Kennedy was scratched from the meet after suffering pulled ligaments in a basketball class.

However, new recruit MacDonald shattered both pool and Blues' team records in the 200-yard fly with a time of 2:02.2. The former mark of 2:04.4 was registered by former Varsity coach Bill Zoryk in 1958.

MacDonald also clocked well in his leg of the 400-yard medley relay but his 52.5 seconds in the 100-yard butterfly will not count as a record because of the six-tenths of a second that must be added to compensate for the advantage of a relay start.

Blues had simply too much depth in the freestyle events for Western, which was also hampered by the sudden retirement of breastroker Ken Fowler.

"Fowler and Kennedy might have given Western another 13 to 15 points", said Blues' coach Robin Campbell, "but the way we were swimming the eventual outcome really wasn't in too much doubt."

Blues wrapped up the meet with a victory in the concluding 400-yard freestyle relay highlighted by Dave Wilkin's 50.1 second leadoff split that gave the team a comfortable margin for the remainder of the race.

The swim team next meets Kent State this Friday at 7:30 again at the Benson Building.

Wrestlers lose to Western

By JOHN GILBERT

The University of Toronto wrestling team opened its schedule at home this season losing to Western 28.5 to 16.5, Saturday in Hart House. However, Toronto forfeited three matches giving Western 15 points.

Doug Lake, representing Toronto in the 177 lb. class, lost by three points in the first match of the afternoon, while veteran Ken White dominated his match in the 126 lb. class for the first Toronto pin of the meet. Bob Moore continued Toronto's brief winning streak, defeating Al Walter in the 134 lb. class, 14 to 1.

Toronto's Victor Brunette succeeded in pinning his Western opponent in the 150 lb. class, although not until the final seconds. Brunette had fallen behind 22 to 4 and only a strong last minute effort enabled him to reverse the trend of the match.

Western's Jim Basset broke Varsity's win streak pinning Walter Crignan. Crignan lost the match after a yell from Basset brought a foul call against the Toronto player. Immediately after, Blues' Dave Tanner lost his match on a foul called against him.

One of the last matches of the afternoon saw Toronto's Len Gang go against an obviously heavier opponent, and although he was outscored 20-0, succeeded in putting up a strong show.

Although Toronto forfeited three matches, Roman Probrazenski substituted for his brother Chris to wrestle in an exhibition heavyweight match. Probrazenski did exceptionally well, pinning Western's leading heavyweight in the third and final round.

Blues' Harold Smith also wrestled in another exhibition match, eventually winning it 11-9. Smith was leading in points but found himself in danger of being pinned and had to struggle exceptionally long to effect an escape.

Elsewhere on the weekend Johnathon Davis and Chris Probrazenski finished first in the 177 lb. and heavyweight classes, respectively, at the Queen's University Invitational.

The wrestling team is scheduled to meet Guelph next for an invitational match (at Guelph) on January 27.

Parity won on Soc staff committee

By ULLI DIEMER

Sociology students scored a major breakthrough Monday night when they won parity representation on the department's staffing committee.

The victory came when the assembly, the department's supreme decision-making body, voted by the narrowest possible margin to give students an equal say on the committee that hires, fires, and promotes staff. Fifty of the 74 assembly members present voted in favour in a secret ballot — the minimum number necessary for the two-thirds majority required for a constitutional amendment.

Students already have parity with faculty on all other committees, including the executive and those that set curriculum, as well as on the policy-making assembly.

The role in staffing, long seen by students as crucial for long-range planning, had been approved in principle by the Sociology Assembly in February. Implementation, however, was held up by opposition from then department chairman Jim Giffen and by retiring dean of arts and science, Albert Allen. Since then, however, both Giffen and Allen have been replaced, and their successors, Irving Zeitlin and Bob Greene, seem willing to accept students in this area of decision-making.

The matter was originally scheduled to come up at a meeting in December, but a month's delay was caused when Zeitlin voided student elections to the assembly, charging irregularities.

In the face of protest from students and from faculty involved in running the elections, however, Zeitlin held an investigation which established that his contention that the elections had violated the constitution were unfounded.

At the time, some students suggested that Zeitlin's action in calling off the Assembly meeting, (which had not met since last February, in violation of the departmental constitution,) was politically motivated, designed to prevent implementation of the staffing decision.

Sociology becomes the only U of T department in which students are allowed a formal say in staffing, although a number of others have unofficial student committees that state their preferences to all-faculty staffing committees. Students remain without any real power, however.

Now that former dean Allen's claim that university rules prohibit student involvement in staffing decisions has apparently been discarded, previously rejected demands for a similar role in other departments will likely resurface.

Although approval in principle had been given in February, the implementation at Monday's meeting came as a surprise to both students and faculty.

A constitutional amendment requires one meeting's notice of motion, and notice had not been given. However, a previous motion, calling for four students to be given an unofficial advisory role on the committee, was on the agenda.

Student representatives, wanting full parity on the seven-member staffing committee, and full power rather than an advisory position, requested permission to withdraw the motion. This would have cleared the road for consideration of a new motion at the next meeting of the Assembly.

However, a number of conservative faculty, in what turned out to be a major faux pas, denied the unanimous permission required to withdraw a motion.

At this point, graduate student Chris Huxley introduced a major amendment to the original motion that in effect turned it into the full parity, full power motion that students favoured. Although the motion would have been disallowed had it been introduced on its own, it was permitted by the speaker as an amendment.

Debate on the principle of the motion was relatively brief, perhaps because it caught assembly members by surprise. Speakers on both sides noted that the major arguments had already been made many times before. Sociology students have been pushing for a role in staffing for a number of years.

The major roadblock to the decision, the contention that university rules forbade it, was removed when department chairman Zeitlin told the assembly that he understood from Greene that no legal obstacles existed.

A precedent was set in sociology last year when three students were elected as "advisors" to the three faculty members who provided the names of potential candidates to the Dean's Search Committee for a new chairman. Although students were critical of the position they had on the committee, it was believed that their unanimous support for Zeitlin was a factor in his selection.

Students occupy Brock

ST. CATHERINES (CUP) — About 200 Brock University students yesterday occupied the Board of Governors chambers and lozenges surrounding the president's office to protest the firing of faculty members.

The occupation began after a general meeting of the students' union attended by about 600 Brock students decided to "condemn the actions of the administration in the firing of faculty" and demand

- that the 16 faculty be rehired, and

- that the administration "assure the university that there will be no further attempts to cut back any areas of staff or courses at Brock."

The students at the meeting decided that the way to inform the administration of their decision was to occupy the 13th floor of the Brock Tower which houses the president's and other administrative offices.

Citing budget cuts, the administration had sent termination notices to five full-time and 11 part-time lecturers.

The occupiers decided against occupying the tower's lobby and preventing the use of the elevators.

Buildings may be ready for next fall

Scar, Erindale to get residences

Scarborough and Erindale Colleges recently approved extraordinarily similar residences, both of which may be in operation next fall.

Each residence is in the form of townhouses, containing about 250 beds built on college property. Each townhouse will be fully equipped and contain four or six beds, accommodating in all slightly more than 10 per cent of the colleges' enrolments.

The residences will cost between $1 and $1.5 million dollars each, mostly financed from a large Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation loan repayable over 50 years. Because the money will come from the federal government, it's not affected by the capital budget freeze imposed by the Ontario government in November.

Both residences are expected to be controlled by a committee, a majority of which will be residents.

Erindale student council president Paul Moran attributed the extensive similarities between the two projects to "coincidence". "Both colleges got tired of the idea of high-rises," he said.

There is one other similarity in the two projects — both of the chief organizers are executives of SAC, vice-president Ross Flowers and Erindale executive member Arnold Brodie.

According to Brodie, who helped draw up the proposal during the summer of 1971, a government report on student residences recommended against building conventional student accommodation.

A users' committee, on which Brodie served, continued to work on the planned residence during 1971-72. The entire year he said was spent arguing with the Ontario Student Housing Corporation, which handles student residences for Ontario Housing Corporation, which in turn dealt with CMHC.

Finally, a long-term OHSC loan was promised, and last fall the users' committee presented its ideas on the residence to a meeting of interested contractors.

Universal Construction Company won the contract in a contest of over 10 proposals and is expected to produce working drawings soon. Municipal servicing should begin next month, Brodie says, and the project may be ready for occupancy in August.

Dean Peter Robinson says the proposal has cleared the college council and believes it also has Governing Council approval.

According to Erindale director of student affairs Mike Lavelle, the 50-year loan from OHSC is for $900,000, expected to cover 90 per cent of the construction costs. The other 10 per cent is the value of the land, near the north entrance to the college.

Brodie says the college will also pay for municipal servicing, architects' fees, furniture and other equipping costs in addition to the roughly estimated one million dollar cost.

The cost of carrying the mortgage, says Robinson, is about $300 per bed per year. Brodie hopes the cost to students will be under $70 a month.

Like Brodie, Flowers began working on the Scarborough College residence in the summer of 1971. He later chaired a planning committee, which, like Erindale's, produced a bare outline of ideas for the residence.

After 11 contractors responded to a call for proposals, the committee chose one submitted by John Vroom Company, which had placed second in the Erindale contest.

The cost, says Flowers, will be approximately $1.25 million, of which 90 per cent will be an OHSC grant. The remaining 10 per cent will again be the college's land, in a "heavily wooded area" south east of the main parking lot in the same area as the main college.

Flowers hopes the monthly cost to student will be under $80 although occupancy in the first few years may be subsidized, he said.

The Vroom proposals received college council approval December 13 and construction should have already begun early this month. However, Flowers is still hopeful that the residence will be ready for occupancy by October 1, if not by the first day of classes next fall.

Like Erindale's, the Scarborough residence is expected to be run primarily by its residents.

Scarborough principal Ralph Campbell has appointed an advisory committee, chaired by Flowers, to help set it up. Although Campbell will have the final decision on administration of the residence, "I'll be influenced to the largest possible extent by the recommendations of the committee," he said yesterday.

Scar may set up credit system: students to proceed at own speed toward degree

Scarborough College has moved one step closer to implementing a credit system next fall.

At a meeting preceding the Christmas break, the college council unanimously agreed that a student of Scarborough be permitted to proceed towards a degree at a rate of his or her own choosing.

The motion passed by the college council said that a maximum of six full courses during the winter session and two full courses in the summer session can be taken for credit. A student may take as many years to complete a degree as he or she wishes.

The proposal will be presented to the Academic Affairs' Committee's sub-committee on curriculum and standards today before it proceeds to Academic Affairs. The proposal must get its final approval from the Governing Council.

Scarborough College registrar J.D. King said yesterday that the feeling of the college is almost unanimously in favour of the idea. The college would like to implement the system for the 1973-74 year, he said.

The idea of a credit system for Scarborough College first gained approval in 1967 but it wasn't until last July 1 when the college became separate from the Faculty of Arts and Science at U of T that measures could be taken to implement the proposal, King explained.

"It's my impression that the students would welcome the change," he said.

Scarborough student council president David Onley said that the implementation of a credit system would be a "major step forward for this university."

"There's nothing sacred about five courses a year. That isn't necessarily the essence of education," he said.

Israel's legality can't be based on past: Marxist

By ELAINE KAHN

Moral and legal justification for continuation of the State of Israel should not be based on the past. Professor Shlomo Avineri of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem told a packed auditorium in a lecture at the Medical Sciences Building yesterday.

Avineri, an internationally known Marxist, lectured on Arab and Israeli nationalism.

Avineri stated that there is no point in going back to the 15th century to justify claims to Middle East lands. The present battle arises from modern secular nationalism that has its roots in the 19th and 20th centuries.

The central issue is that both Israelis and Palestinians accept the fact that nationalism now exists. Avineri said that Israel's prime minister Golda Meir has recently accepted this fact.

He said that the Arabs have not directed internal criticism towards the question of social reconstruction within the Arab nations. They have preferred instead to concern themselves with a political and highly military nationalism that has not succeeded as well as Israel's Labour Zionism, which is socio-political.

He pointed out that military government in the Arab world does not imply military dictatorship, as it does in the Western world. The Arab nations, except when under foreign domination, have always had military governments. In fact, the Islamic religion upholds the soldier and ultimately the ruler as an ideal.

Avineri said the Zionist movement is the only one in history that has attempted to create downward social mobility in a nation.

This was necessary for the construction of the state of Israel, he said, because immigrants from Europe to Palestine were primarily middle class. There were no peasants or working class people and these in fact had to be created by a total overhaul of the social system.

Avineri feels chances for peace and reconciliation in the Middle East will increase once the Arabs undertake some parallel type of re-evaluation.

He said that the two nationalist movements are the answers that were found to one common problem, the problem of increased secular nationalism prompted by Westernization of the Middle East.

Christian Arabs under Turkish rule, liberal as it was under the 19th century Ottoman Empire, Avineri stated, were second-class citizens. To ameliorate the situation, American missionaries in Beirut began to stress secular Arab nationalism, raising an Arab consciousness that rose above religious differences.

Only Egypt remained slightly more interested in its own affairs than pan-Arabic matters.

However, by the 1920's, Islamic Arabs regained prominence and there is still an Islamic bias in general Arabic thinking, Avineri said. But the more extreme radical movements, such as the Popular Liberation Front in the Arabic world continue to be led by Christian urban intelligentsia. The El Fatah, another Arab guerilla movement, consists mainly of Moslem peasants.

Israeli nationalism arose out of the highly nationalistic consciousness of the European nations in the 19th century. The question was one of allegiance, Avineri said, as it ultimately was for Christian Arabs.

Even with the persecution suffered by the Jews in Europe before 1800's, there was still a place for them in European society. European nationalism forced the Jews for the first time, Avineri said, to define in terms of nationality who they were.

For example, could a Jew be a true Frenchman if he felt yearnings for a re-establishment of Israel? Again, a group of rabbis in France were asked if they felt a closer bond to fellow Frenchmen or to Jews living in England.

This kind of question about allegiance is still commonly asked.

The questioning led to an increase of national consciousness among Jews. Hebrew language, literature and history were revived and eventually an Israeli state was established.

Avineri said that the present fighting in the Middle East, resulting from awakened Arab nationalism and the renewed efforts for Israel to rebuild, were foreseen in a book published in Paris in 1905. This writer predicted that the fate of the whole world might hinge on the resolution of the struggle.

Shlomo Avineri called for Palestinian state on West Bank.

Staff question legality of Food Science committee's powers

By MARK BOHNEN

In response to a challenge on the extent of the Food Science Implementation Committee's powers, the committee Monday decided to delay making a decision which could mean the end of the faculty.

A letter signed by the whole staff of the Faculty of Food Science questioned the legitimacy of a series of motions the committee had drawn up concerning the future of the faculty.

The motion was expected to be voted on at Monday's meeting, included the possibility that the faculty may disappear as an entity.

However proceedings were delayed in response to a request made by the letter that the committee postpone the vote, and clarify its position on the 10 specific recommendations in an earlier Senate report.

The letter asserted that the content of the motions drawn up by the committee went beyond the terms of reference as defined in an earlier Senate report, according to food science professor C. Dunkley, also a committee member.

The committee had earlier been charged with the feasibility of implementing recommendations made in the Senate report concerning the future of the faculty of Food Sciences.

Although the content of these motions have not been made public, according to Dunkley, two of them have advocated the reorganization of the faculty. Courses and streams would be integrated into other faculties.

The Senate report had not recommended the abolition or weakening of the Faculty of Food Sciences.

Food science dean Ira Armstrong yesterday was reluctant to talk about the letter sent by faculty members, saying "I don't feel the time is ripe" to discuss it.

However, she confirmed that the faculty's "whole staff" signed it.

"For one to be... a revolutionary... there must first be a revolution. Isolated individual endeavour, for all its purity and ideals, is of no use, and the desire to sacrifice on entire lifetime to the noblest of ideals serves no purpose if one works alone in some corner of America, fighting against adverse governments and social conditions which prevent progress."

Book game doesn't solve problem

In the aftermath of the decision to exclude undergrads from unlimited access to the stacks of the Robarts Library, the administration has hit upon the idea of converting the existing main library into a central undergraduate library.

There's a hitch, though. The books to fill the stacks of the new research library have to come from somewhere. And, that somewhere — at least for over 900,000 of them — is the stacks of the Sigmund Samuel Library.

So, anxious to placate students irritated at their exclusion from the new edifice and just plain fill all that empty space, the librarians have devised a master plan: move the collections of the University and New Colleges and the branch lending libraries (political economy and history are the largest) into Slg Sam, closing down the branch libraries and converting the college libraries into reading rooms.

The Faculty of Arts and Science's General Committee gave up trying to reach agreement on the plan after months of inconclusive debate about it. And, the Governing Council's library subcommittee has yet to resolve the issue finally. But, as elsewhere, there seems to be little opposition to the plan except from students. Everybody else won't be directly affected, anyway.

Chief Librarian Robert Blackburn has championed amalgamation, insisting the branch and college libraries were underused. Now, faced with a return to greater use of the branch libraries, he dismisses the figures, maintaining that profs with an interest in preserving the department libraries are encouraging students to use them to produce a trend which would forestall their scrapping.

Be that as it may, students are rediscovering the convenience and utility of the smaller collections. Having most of their classes in the Sid Smith area, political economy students, for example, have little incentive (nor should they) to take a trek across campus to the main library for books which can be easily and economically housed in Sid Smith. Both the dean of arts and science and the principal of University College have admitted that the push for amalgamation had nothing to do with saving money or convenience.

That, in itself, should be a damning enough admission to kill plans to move the collections to Slg. Sam.

As for the UC and New Libraries, their duplicate collections complement the study areas housed under their roofs and offer a more intimate atmosphere for research and study.

Locking undergrads and the public out of the Robarts Library stacks is no solution to the university's library problems, and neither is robbing other libraries to fill the makeshift undergrad library.

Students should have a bigger say in staffing study

It's disappointingly ironic that at about the same time that the Sociology Assembly was formalizing structures giving students equal weight in department staffing decisions the president of the university was putting the finishing touches on a task force to study the same matter without "major student representation".

As the persons most familiar with and most directly affected by teaching, students have more to offer in assessing professors' relative merits than someone whose principal distinction is that he or she has also obtained faculty status.

Conservatives always claim that students are transients with little commitment to the university when faced with arguments in favour of giving students a role in staffing decisions. But experience tells a different story. Many students have proven their commitment to the betterment of university education.

In response to this performance (and, admittedly, often militant student demands), students have been seated on senior governing bodies of this university and others across the country. Consequently, Evans' decision to downplay the student role in a committee whose recommendations will seriously alter the future character of this university flies in the face of this trend and the evidence which motivated it.

His specific proposal, rumoured to include only one student on a body of about nine, would be a step backward at a time when the quality of university education requires many steps forward.

We believe the weight of logic should encourage the president to reconsider his unwise decision and significantly upgrade the level of student participation on the task force.

Post office sends strange gifts in mail

Strange thing arrived in The Varsity mail yesterday morning. A multi-colour, promotional calendar from our very own post office.

Strange because this unsolicited gift came from the very people who've been trying to cut back on staff and salaries because they say they're losing money.

The calendar's not-so-hidden message seems to be "Use your post office". It's good business to want to encourage business, but why the post office would resort to so costly a promotional campaign when they have no competition eludes us.

Unless, of course, the campaign is designed to bolster the post office's sagging public image. And, we'd suggest, they could better deal with that problem by humanizing their approach to the postal service. It might work wonders with getting the mail out on time.

As for calendars, we're sure no one will go without, even if the post office gives up its gift giving.

CBC adds commercials to American escapism

By PAUL HOCH

It was Super-Sunday at the Super Bowl, and our super CBC broadcasters were on hand to televise the big show. "On hand" in spirit only since the only thing they were actually televising was the American network broadcast of the game. And, what a telecast it was. Canadian CBC viewers were treated to a pre-game show with America's leading lover-boy football hero Joe Namath, followed by the Pledge of Allegiance to the American Flag (as rendered by three clean cut and fortyish US astronauts), followed by a squad of well-trained black school kids leading everyone in the American National Anthem, followed by assorted plugs for "Dick Nixon's favorite team", speculations that Nixon might be sending in a special play — all interspersed with the usual militarized half-time show, the supersentimentalism of Andy Williams, and the now familiar drunken locker room celebrations after the game. It was all there, from American super-patriotism to militarized drum majorettes to Dick Nixon. Quite a show.

Less clear, however, was what it was doing on Canadian television. No doubt, the CBC would say that it was "just giving our fans what they want" (or have been trained to want, by promoters who pass themselves off as "sports-writers"). But, even conceding that the ability of the US media to train Canadians to demand American products produced a big demand up here for the Super Bowl, could the CBC not have at least supplied a little commentary and interviews of its own?

It did, of course, manage to supply some Canadian advertising (some of it by Canadian subsidiaries of US corporations). And, with advertising rates for the Super Bowl running at a couple of hundred thousand dollars a minute, the CBC made itself a tidy bundle. Which is perhaps what's it's all about, anyway. The huge advertising costs are then passed on to all of us in higher consumer goods prices; so, we all end up paying the bill.

But, what are we paying for? "The world-wide enthusiasm for sports events," writes British sociologist Alex Natan, "brings to mind the decadence of the Roman Empire when similar physical exercises formed a circus spectacle which whipped up the tired nerves of paying spectators." US Congressman Emanuel Celler has said that "pro football provides the circus for the hordes". A sort of blown-up version of the gladiator shows that kept everyone entertained in the Roman coliseum.

New York University professor Roscoe Brown has called it "the new opium of the people." Perhaps, "opium" seems too strong a word for all this. But what else can you call it when 50 million North Americans profess more concern over who will win the Super Bowl than over the bombing of Vietnam? What else can you call it when a hundred thousand fans pack into the Los Angeles coliseum for the big game while only a week earlier only a few hundred turned up to hear Chilean president Salvador Allende at the United Nations? What else can you call it when industrial workers are often so rabidly involved with the fates of their sports heroes that they're perfectly oblivious to the exploitive conditions in their own factories?

In this connection it's perhaps useful to recall to what extent North American pro sports have traditionally been aimed at potentially restless or disadvantaged minority groups and factory workers. Hockey, for example, grew up in the mining and factory towns of northern Ontario and Quebec, and still gets many of its best players there. American football players have disproportionately come from the coal and steel towns of Pennsylvania (Joe Namath's original territory). And, English soccer too grew up in the shadows of the factories. These sports were generally considered by factory owners as a fitting outlet for their workers' job-produced tensions. An outlet far more suitable — at least from their point of view — than militant trade unionism.

American basketball, too, has long been the sport of the big city ghettos, with a sizable portion of the top professional players coming from New York's Harlem ghetto. The same holds true for boxing and professional wrestling.

Indeed, with stereotyped heroes and villains for every ethnic group, the pro wrestling burlesque is experiencing quite a renaissance among Toronto's exploited immigrant population. And, it helps take their minds off their work. Which is perhaps no small thing when you're being paid less than two dollars an hour for turning a screw on an assembly line all day.

The trouble with the entertainment and escapism of professional sports, though, is that it provides no escape at all. The problems of one's workday life go on just as before. The only difference is that so much time and energy is absorbed in watching sports and boning up on the fine points of every game that it almost ensures that little or no time is available for solving the real problems.

For a few hours on Super-Sunday, Canadian workers can consume the tinsel heroism of American super-football heroes and astronauts, can bet almost $400,000 on which set of gladiators will win the big spectacle, in short can escape to a fairly dreamland in which men are Men, and God is always on our team's side. And, the next day, all of us fans can return to our boring, repetitive, uncreative, often bureaucratized jobs. It seems to be as good a drug as any other. The new opium of the people.

A former post-doctoral candidate at the University of Toronto, Paul Hoch lectures on the political sociology of sports at Ohio's Oberlin College. He is the author of a recently released Doubleday book Rip Off the Big Game: The Exploitation of Sports by the Power Elite.

CBC offered viewers tinsel heroism of American super-football heroes and astronauts Sunday.

Wear wires out by calls: Bell?

Sooner or later, if given enough rope, big capitalist enterprises like Bell Telephone will hang themselves and bite the dust.

It was good for the soul, and for the mind, to see The Varsity (January 10) take up the cudgels on behalf of that vast number of customers (just take a look at that huge Metro Toronto telephone directory) being squeezed for another round of increased rates by the billion dollar corporation, Bell Telephone.

Most users of this public service are lifetime customers, yet they never get a discount, never get a reduced rate, nor anything.

It appears to this long-time Bell customer that this avaricious, monopolistic company must get a huge cut in income taxes for its equipment depreciation. It is quite evident that Bell assumes that the wires get worn out by the talking that goes through them. Is this really possible? I can't and never will believe such an assumption.

In the editorial "Don't let Bell hike bill", "nationalization of Bell" is suggested as a remedy and this is a good idea; but to suggest "giving control to the Bell workers" as a better alternative is absolutely wrong. Giving control to workers never created an utopia (look at Russia, Cuba, et cetera); they have a nasty habit of creating hell on earth. Sure, a few high-salaried administrators would be thrown out, but the workers would keep on demanding higher wages till all received the wages of the former administrators. Isn't it the workers who are forcing Bell to keep on increasing the rates?

Actually, the workers don't want the ownership and the administration jobs with all those worries, bills to pay, and a bad case of ulcers. Oh, no. They just want the gravy, and to rush home in Cadillacs on the stroke of four or five o'clock to their loving wives and their colour tv sets.

Regarding the two-page spread, same issue, why was no mention made to urge the public to make less use of long distance calls? Although trained at (terribly high educational costs to read and write, the majority of the public is too damn lazy to write and mail a letter for eight cents and prefers to dial a long distance call. In an affluent society, what's two or three dollars for a three minute call?

Nor was the public urged to be satisfied with plain, black telephones; to do without all those extensions in private homes and other frills. Oh, no, nothing was said about the public denying itself many of the extra services that Ma Bell has to offer.

In the past, the Canadian Transport Commission has always sided with this business monster, and against the people of Canada. Either way, Bell cannot lose. If by the grace of God, the CTC should this time side with the public, Ma Bell has other tricks to pull out of the hat... tricks which will bring her more millions than increased telephone rates. This has been going on for years and so far nobody has come to the defence of the telephone users.

Non-academic

Solution: break Bell's monopoly

The attack against Bell Canada in The Varsity, January 10 is another example of cock-eyed, leftist analysis that is matched in its stupidity only by its belligerent tone of moral self-righteousness.

The Varsity editorial states it has proof (!) that Bell needs no rate increase, that profits are spiralling, and service plummeting. It concludes that nationalization is long overdue, that the workers should control it, that the government can't run the system any worse than the Bell. The Varsity and the writers of the reprinted articles fail to realize (due to ideological blindness) the complete idiocy of this analysis and the utter assinnity of their proposals.

However, they are right that Bell is a state-protected, coercive monopoly, and therein lies the problem. I myself have written letters to the editor of newspapers with complaints about the Bell and have even received an unsolicited letter of apology from them for one nasty letter of mine printed in the Scarborough Mirror a couple of years ago. So, I have no reason to defend the Bell.

In theory, there is one difference between socialism and fascism. Under fascism, the means of production are privately-owned; under socialism, they are state-owned. However, in fact, the state in both cases possesses control which is the essential factor. Fascism is more convenient for the government because it allows the government to enjoy the advantages of property ownership without the responsibility of worrying about production and profit. If for example, Krupp had decided not to produce munitions for Hitler, he would have anyway. Hitler's Reich had control. There is no need to nationalize if you can force co-operation. Hitler would nationalize only if necessary. Remember, he was the leader of the National Socialist Workers' Party.

Bell Canada (or A T & T) are similar examples in our semi-fascist-socialist West. Bell is a privately-owned company; but it is not privately controlled. Other Canadian examples are Canadian Pacific (air and rail transportation) or all television and radio stations who must please Big Brother in the CRTC (Canadian Radio and Television Commission) if they want to be given permission to operate. Bell Canada must cow-tow to the CTC (Transport Commission) to operate.

Now, The Varsity proposes nationalizing it. What will this accomplish?

1. It will violate the rights of all stock-holders of Bell by confiscating their property. Such actions by the way, make it morally easier for governments to expropriate other people's property (such as for Pickering Airport, et cetera). When the rights of some are violated, the rights of all are threatened.

2. It will result in the Bell running at a loss rather than a profit. The Post Office is a shining case in point. This public monopoly's service has steadily degenerated severalfold over the years while prices have skyrocketed. And, it still loses millions a year! Does the Canadian taxpayer want Bell to become the same? I have to laugh at your naive of Canadian socialist-fascism (they are synonymous in practice). How do we make it more responsive to public needs?

Take away its monopoly status. Permit free and open competition. Aholish Bell's special government contracts and subsidies wherever they might be. Of course, most competitors will start fairly small, although I can see some larger companies getting into the market fairly quickly (such as Canadian Pacific). But, size alone is not the governing factor over efficiency and service. Big corporations often get lazy. When put on a free and equal basis with competitors, monopolies will crumble.

With competition, Bell will not only have to improve service and keep costs down, but it will also have to treat its employees better, or they will leave for competing companies that offer more attractive benefits. This transformation would not take place overnight, but within a couple demagogues at The Varsity just for once take off your red-coloured glasses and try to propose realistic and objective evaluations?

Premier didn't dodge questions

In The Varsity's usual manner of inaccuracy, it reported that Premier William Davis "dodged most questions about education policy" at the Progressive Conservative Campus Association's meeting at the University of Western Ontario. This blatant fabrication could not be farther from the truth. He spent a number of hours replying to questions asked of him. While not agreeing to abolish the $100 fee increase, the premier reassured the students that the levels of payment would not be increased next year. Other questions were also answered directly and at great length to avoid any confusion. Before replying to any question, Mr. Davis made certain that what was asked of him was understood. While he may not have satisfied the students demands, he certainly did not attempt to dodge any queries or leave his questioners hanging.

Perhaps in the future The Varsity might check the accuracy of its statements before publishing what purports to be truthful.

Keep quiet out of good manners

It is poor editorial practice, not to say hypocrisy, to accept any advertisement (and the fee that goes with it) and then parody it in a main feature article.

When The Varsity accepts an advertisement through financial necessity it should keep quiet out of good manners. However, if it is difficult for The Varsity to reconcile the dollars brought in by an advertisement a few inches square with its resulting feeling of guilt (or fear of Women's Lib?), the ad should not be accepted.

The advertisement you say, "appeals to the reader's basest instincts". Not as much, one would think as advertising professor-tested term-papers for sale (such as cheating) which makes swapping nude stamps a relatively edifying pastime.

assertion that government can run the Bell as well as the private owners can. Government ownership is synonymous with economic disaster.

3. The problem will not be solved. Bell will still be a monopoly. Only it will be even more unresponsive to the requirements of the public.

In short, the assertion that nationalization will cure our telephone system is worse than naive. It is the insane conclusion of a political bias that is completely bankrupt and bears no relation to reality: socialism (or Marxism).

So, what is my panacea, you have every right to ask. Quite simply: capitalism. Bell Canada is a symbol of years. It would increase service, keep costs down, increase employment and revenue. Nationalization would decrease service, sky-rocket costs, make no significant change in employment, and result in a loss of revenue. Instead of getting tax money from Bell, the taxpayers would have to pay to support it.

Dying student movement seen

When the wind is blowing correctly, you can often hear the faint notes of the death knell of what such men as Reich, Roczak, and Goodman described as our century's last hope to prevent a spiritual and intellectual confine. Perhaps, rather than waiting for historians, the present is ripe for a study of the student movement, now in the throes of dire trouble, if not rigor mortis. This study can be justified, much as that of a Renaissance church, not only for its intrinsic merit, but for what it says about its creators (or the forces which produced its rise, forces which unlike those of that church are still compelling). This movement acts on one level for greater rights and for a greater say, by people, in the running of their own lives. It acts, as well, on another level, for the creation of an environment conducive to the development of thinking, creative individuals rather than the present one which objectifies man and stultifies his potentialities (abilities to respond, feel, and think). As such, the student movement has attracted many of the most intelligent of North American youth who have been able to feel and perceive their own inner depth and that of those around them, and to trace the specific societal causes of this and how they may remedy them. The reason why this phenomenon is now dying out can also be elaborated.

One cause is the decline of the university's role as a critical institution isolated from society where free thought and discussion should and did reign. The ludicrousness of this proposition what with the close ties between the university and other institutions (devising means of social control) and performing technological (war) research and with the university's domination by a conservative Governing Council keeping tight pincers on the political persuasions of those whom they hire, is self-evident.

Another constraint on student discontent is the current flare-up of a careerist mentality amongst students because of the declining job market. In this forum of bitter competitiveness for the few jobs remaining, there remains little time or initiative to question the value and values of that which is causing so much time and worry.

Perhaps, the quietude of the progressive student elements is just part of the rational — anti-rational cycle. In the early 1960's, the student leaders patiently and intelligently pointed out to students exactly what society was doing to their minds and lifestyle, in terms quite comprehensible to them. But, as the student movement became larger and more politically sophisticated, they began to divide on issues of tactics which not only weakened them politically, but removed them ideologically from the majority of students.

In the 10 years since the student movement became strong, society has learned to change the forms of their institutions to make them appear less contradictory to what people feel to be right and to co-opt many of the people who at one time would have attacked them. Society has also developed flexibility in its institutions, the flexibility required to contain these attacks without changing the essential functions of these institutions.

The more overt signs of society's contradictions seem to be making less of an impact than in the past. At one time, someone would join the Peace Corps, for example, with an initial heady idealism, but would quickly find that their function was to pacify the natives so that American interests and its comparatively spiritually bankrupt culture could gain ascendancy. At this point, the person would begin to look around and see what else (and find much else) wasn't what it was supposed to be. Now, there appears to be an almost built-in parameter of frustration, almost intrinsic in North American youth, fortified by the realization that the attempts by the student movement to gain control for people over their own lives has been met by the almost insurmountable opposition of vested interests with the power and desire to retain things as they are and maintain their ascendancy. An example of this can be seen here at the U of T with a new student passivity after their spirited protests of last year for open access to the new library. Now, nary a whimper is heard, just many "I told you so's" while the Senate met over the spring to legislate closed access and our "representative" (SAC) forms a committee or two to handle the library situation, a committee with a member of last year's presidential ticket which opposed the library strike and another, a relatively unknown SAC rep with a record of ingratiating himself with the administration, colluding with them to help stifle what a majority of students have let it be known what they want.

Perhaps, a renewed examination of the artifacts of the progressive student movement will uncover some findings and arouse some thoughts which may well be worth considering, if not adopting.

May get staff ombudsman

On December 14th, I introduced a motion calling for the appointment of an ombudsman to deal with complaints and grievances of staff members of the University of Toronto. I was pleasantly surprised when I received a number of telephone calls and inquiries on that motion. I might add that there seemed to be a strong feeling of support from those staff members to whom I spoke of the need for an ombudsman.

Since I have had a number of questions asked about this particular motion and especially the definition of staff member, I would like to point out that my view of the definition of a staff member for the purposes of this motion would be restricted to "all non-faculty personnel of the University of Toronto".

The motion itself was a simple one, the text of which follows:

Whereas: There does not appear to be a proper mechanism for dealing with complaints and grievances of the staff members of the University of Toronto,

Be It Resolved: That the Governing Council of the University of Toronto consider the appointment of an Ombudsman whose function and duty it shall be to resolve complaints and grievances made to him by the staff of the university concerning administrative procedures, practices, and decisions.

Writer doesn't think old have been forgotten despite useless, wasteful "New Horizon" program.

Some people are never satisfied

This is to say that I don't think the elderly have been forgotten financially, although the "New Horizon" program is useless, redundant, ridiculous, and wasteful. Some people are never satisfied with what they get — wages, pensions, relief — but are always asking for more. Government handouts should never provide luxuries — only needs.

The difference between the "haves" and the "have-nots" usually is that the "haves" have exercised brain and brawn, energy and diligence, to accomplish and achieve, while the "have-nots" have dozed, played, and squandered. Both should be treated equally in the matter of old age pensions, instead of penalizing the thrifty by a means test.

Those engaged in governing — usually doing more harm than good — are comparable to those who are always seeking to get rather than give, jockeying by the exorbitant salaries they allot themselves.

It is the people who labour and those who provide the wherewithal to labour that are the life-blood of the nation, and who should be encouraged and induced to do so — for the benefit of all — instead of being hindered by unions being allowed to enforce their demands.

"These men make the wound Bethune's last testament

Shortly before his death from blood poisoning in November, 1939, revolutionary doctor Norman Bethune wrote this manuscript. Together with a short list of instructions for his replacement, it was the only document Bethune asked to be passed on.

"Everything I have to say," he assured those close to him, "is in them."

The kerosene lamp overhead makes a steady buzzing sound like an incandescent hive of bees.

Mud walls. Mud floor. Mud bed. White paper windows. Smell of blood and chloroform. Cold. Three o'clock in the morning, 1 December, North China, near Lin Chu, with the Eighth Route Army.

Men with wounds.

Wounds like little dried pools, caked with black-brown earth; wounds with torn edges frilled with black gangrene; neat wounds, concealing beneath the abscess in their depths, burrowing into and around the great firm muscles like a dammed-back river, running around and between the muscles like a hot stream; wounds, expanding outward, decaying orchids or crushed carnations, terrible flowers of flesh; wounds from which the dark blood is spewed out in clots, mixed with the ominous gas bubbles, floating on the fresh flood of the still-continuing secondary haemorrhage.

Old filthy bandages stuck to the skin with blood-glue. Careful. Better moisten first. Through the thigh. Pick the leg up. Why, it's like a big, loose, red stocking. What kind of stocking? A Christmas stocking. Where's that fine, strong rod of bone ds":

Race', it was for the 'Glory of the Emperor', it was for the 'Honour of the State', it was for their 'King and Country'.

False. False as hell!

The agents of a criminal war of aggression, such as this, must be looked for like the agents of other crimes, such as murder, among those who are likely to benefit from those crimes. Will the eighty million workers of Japan, the poor farmers, the unemployed industrial workers — will they gain? In the entire history of Wars of Aggression, from the Conquest of Mexico by Spain, the capture of India by England, the rape of Ethiopia by Italy, have the workers of those 'victorious' countries ever been known to benefit? No, these never benefit by such wars.

Does the Japanese workman benefit by the natural resources of even his own country, by the gold, the silver, the iron, the coal, the oil? Long ago he ceased to possess that natural wealth. It belongs to the rich, the ruling class. The millions who work those mines live in poverty. So, how is he likely to benefit by the armed robbery of the gold, silver, iron, coal and oil of China? Will not the rich owners of the one retain for their own profit the wealth of the other? Have they not always done so?

It would seem inescapable that the militarists and the capitalists of Japan are the only class likely to gain by this mass murder, this authorized madness. That sanctified butcher; that ruling class, the true state stands accused.

Are wars of aggression, wars for the conquest of colonies, then just Big Business? Yes, it would seem so, however much the perpetrators of such national crimes seek to hide their true purpose under the banners of high-sounding abstractions and ideals. They make war to capture markets by murder; raw materials by rape. They find it cheaper to steal than to exchange; easier to butcher than to buy. This is the secret of all wars. Profit. Business. Profit. Blood money.

Behind all stands that terrible, implacable God of Business and Blood, whose name is Profit. Money, like an insatiable Moloch, demands its interest, its return, and will stop at nothing, not even the murder of millions, to satisfy its greed. Behind the army stand the militarists. Behind the militarists stand finance capital and the capitalist. Brothers in blood; companions in crime.

What do these enemies of the human race look like? Do they wear on their foreheads a sign so that they may be told, shunned and condemned as criminals. No. On the contrary, they are the respectable ones. They are honoured. They call themselves, and are called, gentlemen. What a travesty of the name! Gentlemen! They are the pillars of the state, of the church, of society. They support private and public charity out of the excess of their wealth. They endow institutions. In their private lives they are kind and considerate. They obey the law, their law, the law of property. But there is one sign by which these gentle gunmen can be told. Threaten a reduction in the profit of their money and the beast in them awakes with a snarl. They become as ruthless as savages, brutal as madmen, remorseless as executioners. Such men as these must perish if the human race is to continue. There can be no permanent peace in the world while they live. Such an organization of human society as permits them to exist must be abolished.

These men make the wounds.

now? In a dozen pieces. Pick them out with your fingers; white as dog's teeth, sharp and jagged. Now, feel. Any more left: Yes, here. All? Yes. No. Here's another piece. Is this muscle dead? Pinch it. Yes, it's dead. Cut it out. How can that heal? How can those muscles, once so strong, now so torn, so devastated, so ruined, resume their proud tension? Pull, relax. Pull, relax. What fun it was! Now, that is finished. Now that's done. Now we are destroyed. Now what will we do with ourselves?

Next. What an infant! Seventeen. Shot through the belly. Chloroform. Ready? Gas rushes out of the opened peritoneal cavity. Odour of faeces. Pink coils of distended intestine. Four perforations. Close them. Purse string suture. Sponge out the pelvis. Tube. Three tubes. Hard to close. Keep him warm. How? Dip those bricks into hot water.

Gangrene is a cunning, creeping fellow. Is this one alive? Yes, he lives. Technically speaking, he is alive. Give him saline intravenously. Perhaps the innumerable, tiny cells of his body will remember. They may remember the hot, salty sea, their ancestral home, their first food. With the memory of a million years, they may remember other tides, other oceans and life being born of the sea and sun. It may make them raise their tired little heads, drink deep and struggle back into life again. It may do that.

And this one. Will he run along the road beside his mule at another harvest, with cries of pleasure and happiness? No, that one will never run again. How can you run with one leg? What will he do? Why, he'll sit and watch other boys run. What will he think? He'll think what you and I would think. What's the good of pity? Don't pity him! Pity would diminish his sacrifice. He did this for the defence of China. Help him in your arms. Why, he's as light as a child! Yes, your child, my child.

How beautiful the body is; how perfect its parts; with what precision it moves; how obedient; proud and strong. How terrible when torn. The little flame of life sinks lower and lower, and, with a flicker, goes out. It goes out like a candle goes out. Quietly and gently. It makes its protest at extinction, then submits. It has its say, then is silent.

Any more? Four Japanese prisoners. Bring them in. In this community of pain, there are no enemies. Cut away that blood-stained uniform. Stop that haemorrhage. Lay them beside the others. Why they're alike as brothers! Are these soldiers professional man-killers? No, these are amateurs-in-arms. Workman's hands. These are workers-in-uniform.

No more. Six o'clock in the morning. God, it's cold in this room. Open the door. Over the distant, dark-blue mountains, a pale, faint line of light appears in the East. In an hour, the sun will be up. To bed and sleep.

But, sleep will not come. What is the cause of this cruelty, this stupidity? A million workmen come from Japan to kill or mutilate a million Chinese workmen. Why should the Japanese worker attack his brother worker, who is forced merely to defend himself. Will the Japanese worker benefit by the death of the Chinese? No, how can he gain? Then, in God's name, who will gain? Who is responsible for sending these Japanese workmen on this murderous mission? Who will profit from it? How was it possible to persuade the Japanese workman to attack the Chinese workman — his brother in poverty; his companion in misery?

Is it possible that a few rich men, a small class of men, have persuaded a million poor men to attack, and attempt to destroy, another million men as poor as they? So that the rich may be richer still? Terrible thought! How did they persuade these poor men to come to China? By telling them the truth? No, they would never have come if they had known the truth. Did they dare to tell these workmen that the rich only wanted cheaper raw materials, more markets, and more profit? No, they told them that this brutal war was 'the Destiny of the

Ban on whaling may do little good

By ANNE MARTELL
the 4th Estate

A cemetery of whales:
in a snowy graveyard instead of crosses their own bones stand.
They couldn't be gnawed by teeth;
teeth are too soft.
They couldn't be used for soup:
pots are too shallow.
The straining wind bends them, but they keep their position,
rooted in ice,
arching like rainbows . . .
Who playfully clicked a camera?
Restrain your photophilia.
Let's leave the whales in peace,
it only alters death.

—Yevtushenko

In the 1600's, more than 4½ million whales peacefully roamed the ocean's vastness. In 1930, the number had been reduced to 1½ million. By the end of 1972, it had been reduced to less than 350,000.

What has been responsible for this declination? What else but man — and his insatiable urge to exploit the world of her riches.

Oil, obtained from the whales' blubber and from spermaceti in their foreheads, lit the lamps of eighteenth century Europe, while the baleen plates — whale bones on either side of the whales' upper jaws — made possible the pinched waist of the nineteenth century.

Whale meat found an additional use in the twentieth century, as its high protein content provided mink and fox furs with the deep gloss the fur industry demands. Whale oil came to be used as a basic ingredient in women's cosmetics — as well as lubricating the machines created by twentieth century technology.

But, the whales, the great lords of the ocean and possibly man's superior in intelligence had no use for technology in their evolution and were, therefore, helpless in the face of man's terrible onslaught.

That she blows!

Come on, lads, let's get 'em!
Where can we hide?

But you're broader than space!
The world doesn't hold enough water for you to dive under.
You think you're God?

A risky bit of impudence.
One harpoon, smack in the flank, rewards enormity.

—Yevtushenko

And, so they died — by the millions. They were confronted with a cannon which fires a harpoon attached to a line into their body. Once inside, a bomb explodes which spreads the harpoon's barbs apart to ensure the whale will not escape. And, they were confronted with a second harpoon which fills them with compressed air to prevent them from sinking. Finally, they were confronted with the modern factory ship which permits the whaler to process his catch on board, so as to cut down dependency on shore stations, and thereby allows a greater time at the hunt.

Canada's decision to ban whaling on her East Coast because of declining whale stocks comes as a much needed respite to the seriously threatened mammals and as a relief to the scientists, concerned citizens, and Farley Mowats of this world.

On December 21, 1972, Canada's environment minister, Jack Davis, announced the termination of East Coast whaling — an action which spells closure for three Canadian whaling plants. One is at Blandford, Nova Scotia and the remaining two are at Oldo and Williamsport, Newfoundland. The former employs about 100 men while the latter each employ 50 for the season, which runs from mid-May to the end of November.

In a telephone interview, John Mullally, assistant to the minister, said compensation would be forthcoming to both employers and employees, and alternate employment would be provided if possible. But, no plans are available at the present time.

Mullally was non-committal about the length of the ban.

"Of course, it will be longer than five years . . . probably more in the vicinity of 10 or 15 or 20."

He spoke in terms of the whales reaching sustainable yields, at which time the ban might be lifted and whaling resumed.

But, the chances that the whale population will reach healthy levels in one or two decades are slight indeed — considering the average gestation period of a whale is one year, and that once born, the baby-whale nurses for an additional six months, and in some species up to two years. Add to this the fact Norway, Japan, and Russia are continuing to take 39,000 whales from the oceans annually and the chances turn into an impossibility.

Canadian waters have been the scene of whaling for many years. The Basques used Cape Breton and Newfoundland as bases for their operations throughout the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, as did the British and French. The waters then fell to the flourishing Nantucket industry of the eighteenth century.

WHALE'S SCOURGE THE COASTS

In the late 1700's, as a result of the American revolution, a whaling community made a brief appearance at Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, composed of American whalers attempting to export their catch into Britain under her colonial preferential rates. But, because Britain's policy discouraged colonial whaling (for it detracted from her own), the venture was short-lived and eventually was transferred to the shores of Wales.

During the 1800's, the waters off Canada's eastern coast were scoured by hundreds of whalers from all over the world. The result was the near extinction of the Blues, Rights, Fins, Sperm, and Humpbacks. But, the whalers were not easily discouraged and they turned to the waters of the Antarctic in search of a fresh supply.

Whaling was revived temporarily in Canadian waters during the 1920's, but because of a slow replenishment of stock, it collapsed once more in 1930. The advent of the Second World War gave the whales a brief respite, as man halted his oceanic hunt to wage war on his own kind. But, as Mowat points out in his "Whale for the Killing", the war also took its share of whales — for many thousands undoubtedly perished by anti-submarine torpedoes through cases of mistaken identity.

The Norwegians re-established commercial whaling off the East Coast in 1945 and operated from bases in Williamsport and Hawkes Harbour, Newfoundland until the collapse of the whale stock six years later.

Nor were the remaining whales to be left in peace. For once the Norwegians departed, the whales around the U.S. Navy base at Argentina became targets for the Navy's anti-submarine training program. The number of whales which lost their lives "in the name of democracy" is beyond conjecture.

"TREMENDOUS POSSIBILITIES"

The whales' return to Nova Scotian waters in 1960 was noted eagerly by the Karl Karlsen Company, a sealing, scalloping, and fishing operation established at Blandford by Karlsen, a Norwegian immigrant, in the late 1940's.

"We didn't make any special studies to find out about the quantity of whales in N. S. waters," Karlsen stated in 1962. "Our ships knew there were some from sighting them on trips around the eastern seacoast."

And the Nova Scotia government, in constant readiness to welcome new industries — regardless of their outcome — welcomed the possibilities of whaling with open arms.

"Other nations are getting out of whaling," said one Nova Scotia fisheries official, "but we think it has tremendous possibilities in Nova Scotia." Besides being a lucrative source for oil for industrial purposes, the provincial government saw in whales a potential market for pet, poultry, and mink feed, as well as in human consumption.

Thus, in April 1962, the Karl Karlsen Company, in co-operation with the provincial government, began whaling operations on an experimental basis. By 1964, the experiment had proven itself profitable and the Blandford plant expanded to include whaling on a permanent basis.

At the same time, that greatest of Canadian opportunists, Joey Smallwood, was fostering the re-emergence of whaling in Newfoundland waters. Envisioning an island-wide mink ranch industry, Smallwood encouraged the killing of potheads, small-toothed whales, for feed. By 1965, more than 50,000 of the species had been slaughtered.

The second stage of the Newfoundland operations opened with Smallwood offering generous subsidies to foreign whalers stationed in his province. Eager acceptance of the offer resulted in the re-opening of the Williamsport factory by the Japanese and the enlargement of the Oldo Plant by a combination of Japanese and Norwegian interests.

The number of whales taken by these three plants over the 1964-71 span is colossal. The Blandford plant can boast 1,458 Fins, 654 Seis, 64 Sperm, and a number of Minkes and Humpbacks — while the two Newfoundland plants racked up a total of 2,114 Fins along with several hundred Seis, Sperm, and Minkes.

The significance of these figures becomes apparent when they are compared with the numbers of Fins remaining in the world's oceans. Scientists say only 3,000 Fins are left in the North Atlantic, and of this number the 1972 quota of 360 must be subtracted. In terms of an ocean-wide population, the Fins are estimated to number less than 60,000.

When the whaling ban was announced, Karlsen was quoted in the Halifax daily newspapers as saying the government's announcement came as a shock.

He said he had agreed with a catch limit of 53 Fin whales and 70 Sei whales and also that there should be no quota on sperm whales.

"I advised the minister that these quotas would permit the company to continue an economic operation and that we were very anxious to have scientists carry out the necessary research in order to enable them to set annual quotas commensurate with the sustainable yield."

Although South Shore PC member of parliament Lloyd Crouse also criticized the total whaling ban on the grounds it was caused by "uninformed social pressure," scientists have in fact been studying the whale population in this area for several years.

Will Canada's ban be effective in its attempt to regulate the declining whale stocks? Unlike that of the US Food and Drug Administration which banned whaling and the importation of whale products in 1970, the Canadian ban is not inclusive.

Mullally said the subject of whale imports does not fall under the department of fisheries' jurisdiction, but under that of the Department of Trade and Commerce. He did not know whether that department was considering such a ban for Canada.

Until Canada does ban the importation of whale products, it will continue to support the slaughter, albeit indirectly.

Nor does the ban extend to whaling on Canada's West Coast. Although no whaling operations have been carried on in Canada's Pacific area since 1968 (because of a scarcity of whales), Mullally admitted if the whales were to make a comeback, operations would be resumed.

Hopefully, the ban will be more effective than the International Whaling Commission, established in 1946, has been. This body, composed of 17 whaling countries, was set up ostensibly to protect the threatened species and to regulate the hunt — but, in fact, it has been little more than a front for whalers.

The quotas set by the commission on whale species have been higher than the stocks could stand; the regulations forbidding the killing of Blue Whales, Humpbacks, and all species of the Right Whales came too late — at a time when they were threatened with biological extinction. In other words, the whaling companies were guaranteed profits as long as there were sufficient whales to prove economically feasible.

Nor can the commission always enforce its regulations. Many so-called pirate ships, flying under flags of convenience, scour the oceans for whales, ignoring both the regulations which set quotas and those which protect certain species. It is estimated that more than 2,000 whales are taken annually in this manner.

Then, there is the case heard by Nova Scotia's courts last month. The Karlsen Company was charged on six counts of taking undersized whales during the first five weeks of the 1972 season. By the Whaling Convention Act, the company was liable to a fine of up to $10,000.

But, the courts, in passing judgement on the first two cases, ruled in favour of the company, finding that there was "no intent" involved in the undersized catches. (This is comparable to a court ruling that the driver who passed through a red light at 60 miles per hour is not guilty because the action was not intended.)

Moreover, the act stipulates that to measure the catch, a tape, attached to a pole stuck into the wharf at the whale's head, be stretched the length of the whale's body. The wharf at Blandford, however, is made of concrete, precluding the possibility of driving a pole into it. It did not matter that the whales were at least five feet under the legal size. What mattered in the courts was the missing pole.

Unless man's nature undergoes a drastic change during the next four years, the remaining eight species of the great whales will be virtually extinct. But, business is business and profit is profit — and as long as whaling continues to prove economically viable, the hunt will continue.

They lived, these whales, without offense to people,
in infantile simplicity,
reveling in their own lounstains, while the crimson ball of the sun danced in a torrent of reys . . .

Citizens cite "criminal element"

City orders Annex housing crackdown

By DOUG HAMILTON

The City of Toronto Buildings and Developments Committee forwarded a motion to City Council Monday night ordering a crackdown on absentee landlords in the Annex area.

Prompted by citizens' requests for stricter enforcement of zoning bylaws governing rooming houses, the committee approved a motion by Ward 5 alderman Ying Hope which would require the Commissioner of Buildings to enforce the zoning bylaw which stipulates that the owner or lessee must be a resident of any rooming houses which he owns, and that he be responsible for all "illegalities and irregularities" committed on the premises.

The Annex is the area north of the St. George campus, between Avenue Road and Bathurst, extending from Bloor Street to Dupont.

Hope's motion ordered the Housing Inspection Branch of the Department of Buildings to enforce housing standards particularly on Madison Avenue, Huron Street, and Spadina Road.

The commissioner was ordered to report on his investigations by March 30. The committee also requested a review and a report on how building and zoning standards could be updated "to give more rigid and immediate effect toward enforcement of regulations."

The review will be conducted in conjunction with the zoning and planning committee of the Annex Ratepayers Association and is also to be completed for March 30.

The committee's swift action was provoked by citizen outrage over the double suicide of two Madison Avenue suspects wanted in connection with the murder of a Metro policeman who was gunned down on Amelia Street last Thursday.

"Evidently there is a criminal element living in the Annex", Huron Street resident Samuel Levine told the committee.

He asserted that the invasion of "drug addicts and speed freaks" into the area was causing deep concern for the homeowners of the district.

He asked for tougher enforcement of drug laws by the police and stricter enforcement of housing standards by the city in order to "clean up known drug houses."

Betty Gibson, a Madison Avenue homeowner, said Annex residents had received "no cooperation" from the Housing Inspection Branch when they filed complaints on buildings operated by absentee landlords.

"There has been "nothing but failure," she claimed.

Gibson complained to the committee that "dreadful things" were happening in Madison Avenue houses and cited as evidence a murder, and a major drug raid carried out by the police, both of which occurred last year.

She said some houses on Madison are "a shameful disgrace to the city."

"There is no one running them, no one in charge of these places... These kids just pay the money and they don't know who they pay it to."

Nadine Nowlan, who co-authored The Bad Trip, charged that developers are using drug users to hockbust Annex houses.

She claimed developers buy houses and then rent them to "speed freaks" who run them down and thus provide the developers with good excuse to wreck them.

Nowlan stated that a developer involved in seven holding companies had moved onto her street, Admiral Road.

She urged "City Hall to take a close look at the way he operates."

Rochdale resident Bob Allan told the committee that Rochdale had a problem with speed addicts and the college was forced to evict them.

"The community should get together and try to find a solution to this problem," he emphasized. "I don't think eviction is the solution."

A city official intervened and said stricter enforcement of housing regulations would not necessarily rid the area of drug users.

He said the lifestyles of people who rent Annex houses "are their own business."

A move by Ward 7 alderman John Sewell to have housing inspectors responsible to citizens was shot down by city budget chief and Ward 4-alderman Art Eggleton.

He asserted that city inspectors should not have "more than one master" (other than City Hall officials).

However, Ward 5 alderman Colin Vaughan called for task force comprised of citizens, aldermen, City Hall officials, and the police to study the problem.

"I would like to see a much more comprehensive motion (than Hope's) brought before council in this regard."

A second motion put forth by Hope to set up a "Special Joint Citizens Committee" to examine the conditions of rooming houses throughout the city was referred to the Urban Renewal Committee.

Police confirm McLaughlin was at occupation

By ELAINE FARRAGHER

"Have you ever tried to remove your own appendix on a kitchen table?"

With this remark, Judge Cloney welcomed to his courtroom Tom McLaughlin who is being tried for obstructing police during the breakup of the Simcoe Hall occupation last March. The occupation was in support of open stacks in the new Roberts Library.

Two others, Randi Reynolds and Mark Goldblatt were found guilty of similar charges in December, but went free with "absolute discharges"

If McLaughlin is convicted, he could face a jail sentence or a fine.

In greeting McLaughlin this way, Cloney was commenting on McLaughlin's insistence on defending himself and not hiring a lawyer.

The judge volunteered to "aid him" in following court rules and the proper procedure for questioning witnesses.

Cloney at first objected to McLaughlin having his advisor Peter Rosenthal sit beside him and discuss the proceedings with him, but finally agreed with repeated "regrets" that Rosenthal who is a U of T math professor, "was not a professor of law".

The first witness for the prosecution, university chief security officer Gordon Huff described at length the events around the occupation leading up to the arrests, and the activity during the police invasion of Simcoe Hall. He could not remember seeing McLaughlin at any time on March 12 the day the occupation was broken up.

However when McLaughlin attempted to describe the arrests and convictions of other people, Cloney ruled that all events and charges other than those concerning himself were irrelevant and should not be brought up.

Detective Brown of the Metro Police Identification Bureau confirmed that McLaughlin had been arrested by displaying a photograph of him standing beside the arresting officer outside the building.

However, when McLaughlin also tried to submit photographs of other arrests to illustrate that undue force had been used by the police, Cloney ruled that they were irrelevant since the pictures were taken outside Simcoe Hall.

U of T safety and security officer J.F. Westhead, Huff's superior, testified that he had been given instructions by then acting U of T president Jack Sward that the people in the building were to be "notified to leave and to be given not more than five minutes to do so".

However U of T police deputy chief J.C. Irwin testified that not more than one minute went by after Huff gave his warning before the police charged the Senate doors.

Irwin also stated that although the people in the Senate Chambers refused to leave and blockaded the doors, others in the reception room down the hall "left quietly of their own accord".

Constable Lorne Ainis of the Toronto Police force explained the smashed Senate Chamber door by saying that while the police tried to push the door open, the panel "simply popped out".

Occupation trial continues McLaughlin to call Sword as witness

By EDWARD PODGORSKI

A policeman who noted Bill Getty's presence in the occupation of Simone Hall last spring yesterday could not identify Getty in the courtroom.

On the second day of the trial of Tom McLaughlin, charged with obstructing police during the break-up of the occupation, police constable Salamedis quoted from his notes taken shortly after which listed Bill Getty, later charged with assaulting police, as among those present.

However, when asked to identify Getty in the courtroom by Judge Conroy, Salamedis could not.

Other crown witnesses described the police entry into the Senate Chamber and Mark Goldblatt's assault on police constable Ainitis.

Detective William Kearns testified that it was U of T police deputy chief J. C. Irwin who had "told the police to break down the doors."

U of T chief security officer Gordon Huff "stated that the students were trespassing and should be removed from the Senate Chamber," Kearns said. According to Kearns, Detective Lymer has warned the students that they "would be given the opportunity to leave on their own accord and no charges would be laid."

Kearns testified that on entering the Senate Chamber he was pushed to the ground and that students began shouting, "Kick him. Kill him. Hold him hostage." Other students were shouting "Don't hurt him," Kearns said.

The prosecution called its last witness yesterday. Today, McLaughlin, who is acting as his own defence in his provincial court trial, plans to call last year's acting president Jack Sword as one of the defence witnesses.

Sword gave the order to Huff to call police in.

In the trial last month of Mark Goldblatt and Randi Reynolds, both charged with assaulting police, Sword's testimony was rejected by Judge Charles Drukarsh. Drukarsh manner of giving it, or the evidence said. "I am not impressed with his he gave."

City has two weeks to make decision on Quebec-Gothic

Toronto City Council has two weeks to decide whether or not it wants to permit a massive development just north of High Park.

The Ontario Municipal Board Monday acceded to a city request to delay hearings to approve the required rezoning on the Cadillac-Greenwin development, but instructed city solicitor William Callow to report back by February 1 on a council's decision on the bylaw.

Two weeks ago the city voted to request a delay in the hearings while its solicitors were to discover whether or not the city could be financially liable if it repealed its permission.

The OMB set February 5 as the new date for hearings should the city decide to proceed.

The development, on Quebec and Gothic Avenues, near the High Park subway station, was opposed by 1,500 residents of the neighbourhood. They objected to old houses being destroyed for more huge apartments in area where there is already extensive apartment development.

Fellowship won't be cut

The Ontario Graduate Fellowship Program will be continued next year at its present funding level of three million dollars, Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNie has announced. This at least temporarily slows a trend in recent years in which the funds have been cut back by $2,000,000.

The fellowships are intended for Canadian citizens who are residents of Ontario and will be awarded to both prospective and continuing graduate students. Up to 10 per cent of new applications at each university may be awarded to landed immigrants.

Two years ago, the province funded the fellowships with five million dollars. However, in a series of financial austerity moves, it decreased the total sum to $3.5 million last year and three million dollars this year.

McNie also stated that the new graduate scholarship program recommended by the provincial Committee on University Affairs has not yet been considered by the government.

Prof cites "disgusting scenes"

Porno complaint brings cops to Erindale

Police were called onto Erindale campus Monday after a classics professor complained that an art exhibition at the college was obscene.

However, the police could find nothing obscene in the exhibition of work by Tom Lapierre.

Professor Tom Elliott explained yesterday that he objected to pictures portraying "carved up animals and dummies, (and) nudes in peculiar positions with peculiar things growing out of peculiar plites".

"It's not the nudity that I think is obscene," he stated. It is "disgusting scenes".

Mississauga police detective Lawson yesterday confirmed that police officers investigating the complaint found the art was not obscene, in fact, "no worse than Playboy or Penthouse."

Elliott says the police told him "they thought it was garbage, but not obscene' legally.

Lapierre's works are hung in the common room and corridors of the college.

The professor called police after Erindale principal Tuzo Wilson and the college's deans would not act on his complaint.

Detective Lawson said that the principal's permission for police to come on campus was not needed "We'll act on any type of complaint that we have jurisdiction over," he said.

Erindale dean Peter Robinson called the whole thing incident "unfortunate" yesterday.

He said he told Elliott before he made the complaint that "I thought he was being rather silly."

Lapierre's "workmanship was superb, although the subject was somewhat bizarre," Robinson thought.

He found it "unfortunate that any member of the college community would unilaterally call police before seeing if there was some other way of solving the problem. The college council, which could have taken action, was meeting that afternoon.

Elliott says he does not intend to pursue the matter further, only if his "colleagues" or the students voice objections will the exhibition be ended, he thought.

"We'll just have to suffer for the next few weeks."

The exhibition ends February 10.

Montreal U brings campus workers to court

MONTREAL (CUPI) — L'Université de Montréal gets its day in court beginning January 17, in its continuing campaign against student militance.

Some 35 students and campus workers are charged with "mischief to private property", arising from alleged incidents during the bitter strike by U de M maintenance workers in October 1971.

The trouble began when the university hired professional strikebreakers at $96 a day. The action hardened attitudes in what to that point had been a peaceful strike. Students formed a strike-support committee to urge people not to cross the picket lines and to assist the strikers.

While performing night patrol duty, the strikers who are on trial were attacked by 50 helmeted, club-wielding thugs.

The U de M faculty association opposed the university's use of these thugs.

About 900 maintenance workers, members of le Syndicat canadien de la fonction publique THE CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES) stayed on strike for about six weeks before reaching a settlement with the university. Classes were shut down for most of that time.

The revelation about the hiring of goons was provided by Les Metallos (United Steelworkers of America) district director Jean Gerin-Lajoie, who is also a member of the U de M administration.

On February 19, another group of U de M students go to trial charged with the same "mischief" offence levelled by the university.

About 20 students are accused of occupying the International Centre of Comparative Criminology last May.

The centre is notorious for giving aid and advice to police and military forces in fascist and quasi-fascist regimes in the third world, such as Brazil, Iran and the Ivory Coast. Its main source of funds are the Ford Foundation and the Canadian International development agency.

The occupation took place on the eve of a criminology symposium at Mont Ste-Adele.

Quebec university curbs boycott, sets late registration date

MONTREAL (CUPI) — About 4000 students who boycotted the December registration at l'Université de Québec a Montréal (UQAM) must show up for a late registration before January 19.

The boycott had been organized to protest what was considered the administration's use of economic blackmail. The university had declared November 7 that students must pay all debts to the university by February 15 or face cancellation of registration, removal of records from university files, and possible cancellation of government bursaries.

The students wanted the university to consider them legally registered after paying only the $7.50 registration fee, and they demanded all loans or bursaries without the condition of immediate fee payment. (In Ontario where students are being urged to boycott second term fees, the refusal by The University of Western Ontario and York University to release student aid money before fee payment led to brief occupations of university offices last week before the administrations gave in.)

The UQAM students also wanted students to be able to discharge their debts according to acceptable schedules, which could extend up to three years after their entry onto the job market.

On January 8, The Students' Provisional Organization Committee (COPE) formed picket lines and distributed information at registration asking students to pay only the $7.50 registration fee, and to refuse to pay a $10 fine.

Urge Nixon to make peace

Evans, CP chief, sign Vietnam petition

U of T President John Evans' name on the same petition as Communist Party leader William Kashtan?

Yes, it appeared publicly in a New Year's Day ad placed in the Globe and Mail urging Prime Minister Trudeau to protest the renewed U.S. bombing of Vietnam.

The names of several other prominent U of T administrators were there too, along with many not-so-natural allies like Kashtan.

The petition called on Trudeau to convey Canada's opposition to the bombing "in the strongest possible terms" and to urge the Nixon administration to sign the October peace agreement.

Former U of T President Claude Bissell was also among the signators, along with vice-president Jack Sword, arts and science dean Bud Greene, social work dean Albert Rose, sociology chairman Irving Zeitlin, and several professors from that department.

Several SAC notables, present and past, were also on the list: last year's president Bob Spencer and vice-president Phil Dack, this year's vice-president Ross Flowers and former SAC commissioner and now Ward 6 school trustee Dan Leckie. President Eric Miglin's name was not on the list.

However, the SAC executive yesterday endorsed the anti-Vietnam war demonstration planned for this Saturday.

U of T economics prof and Waffler Mel Watkins also appeared on the list with two political enemies, NDP leader Stephen Lewis and United Auto Workers director Dennis McDermott, who helped expel the waffle from the Ontario NDP.

Seven Toronto aldermen, all part of the "reform" group, also signed the message. Elizabeth Eayrs, Dan Heap, Ying Hope, Anne Johnston, Bill Kilbourn, Michael Darcy Goldrick and Colin Vaughan all agreed with defeated mayoralty candidate Nelson Clarke that the October proposals to end the war should be implemented.

Other U of T notables hohnobbing among the "greats" were Trinity povost George Ignatieff, political economy professors James Eayrs, Donald Smiley and C.B. MacPherson, and history professor Kenneth McNaught.

Argentina is a police state, says activist

By BOB BETTSON
 "Argentina is governed under a state of seige," said Argentinian political activist Daniel Zadunaisky in an interview with the Varsity last week.
 He arrived in Canada after being detained four days in the United States where he was threatened with deportation by immigration officials.

 Zadunaisky was brought to Canada by the Canadian Committee for Justice to Latin American Political Prisoners, a non-partisan group.

 He came to this country to expose the oppression perpetrated by the military junta which has ruled Argentina since president Juan Peron's exile in the early 1950's.
 "We are conducting an international campaign to free these political prisoners. There is no legal defense in Argentina. We must bring outside influence," he added.
 Zadunaisky charged that there are over 1200 political prisoners in Argentina. "These people are being held in special prisons under inhuman conditions. Brutal torture is being used including electric needles."

 "Many have been murdered by the government." In one instance Zadunaisky said that escapees were murdered by guards after being captured. The official story was that they had tried another escape.
 "The official explanation doesn't explain that the second killing was at an isolated naval base. Why would they try to escape if there was no one nearby to help them?"

 Zadunaisky also stated that the press was heavily censored. He cited the case of an editor who was jailed for criticizing the government and only released after continual pressure of public opinion.
 When asked about the terrorism used by guerrillas, he charged that it was insignificant compared to the number of kidnappings carried out by the government.

"In one case a worker was murdered by police and when they (the police) admitted it no action was taken. They are still free. The worker was tortured to death."

On the subject of upcoming Argentinian elections, Zadunaisky said he had no illusions. "The elections will not change anything. The military will remain in power by its three commanders retaining their cabinet posts."

He denied he was sponsored by any partisan political group. "I am active politically in Argentina but I can't talk about my activities or I might get deported."

"I came here to try and get solidarity from Canadians, not to take part in any factional struggles," he maintained.

Zadunaisky said that since 1969 the situation has become more critical in Argentina. "There have been mass worker-student uprisings. The country has been paralyzed by strikes. The cost of living is up 75 per cent with wages only increasing 30 per cent."

He claimed that the economy is in deep trouble and the situation rapidly deteriorating.

Senior volleyball places second at Waterloo

By JOAN SCHWARTZ

The women's senior volleyball team came close to regaining the Waterloo Invitational title last weekend, but lost to Western in a hard-fought, three game final.

The invitational allowed Toronto to meet some of the stronger teams from the Western Section, giving them some extra practice and a preview of their OWIAA competition.

The tournament was organized as a partial round-robin. Each team played two games against each of five other universities, and the four teams with the best win-loss record then proceeded to the semi-finals.

Toronto had a relaxed round-robin schedule, opening Friday games with 15-0, 15-2 wins over Guelph. An hour later, Blues downed McMaster 15-7, 15-0. The Toronto-Laurentian game scheduled immediately afterward was forfeited because Laurentian had not yet arrived.

In its first game after dinner, Blues met a highly-competitive Waterloo team, defeating it 16-14. Blues then went on to take the second game 15-6.

Despite deceptive scores of 15-8, 15-2, in its next series Toronto had some difficulty overcoming a determined Ottawa defense. Blues took three complete service rotations — 19 tries in all — to come out victorious in each of the Ottawa games.

On Saturday, Toronto defeated Carleton 15-5, 15-3, and Queen's 15-7, 15-5 in morning play, and sailed past Waterloo Lutheran 15-1, 15-3 after lunch.

Finishing with a 16-0 win-loss record, Blues had a bye before the semi-final round. At the end of round-robin competition Toronto and Western were tied for first, York was third and McMaster and Dalhousie tied for fourth.

However, the first place finisher could not be decided by the points-against record because Toronto had won two games by default and Blues and Western had not played against all of the same teams. The flip of a coin put Toronto first, Western second, while fourth place spot was decided by a single sudden-death game with Dal

Mac 15-4.

Blues overpowered Dal 15-1 in the first semi-final game with accurate serving and good court coverage. Co-captain Julie Andruchiw served nine points before Dal hit the scoreboard, while Mary Grieve added six more for Blues. A tight defense and a well-organized attack clinched the win for the Toronto squad.

However, the easy win was not to be repeated. In the second game Dal jumped ahead and Toronto was hard-pressed to gain the lead. The play continued to see-saw back and forth with Blues taking 24 turns at service to win the game 15-10. Poor serving as well as poor service reception were chiefly responsible for Varsity's difficulties.

Western's 2-0 win over York set them against the Blues in the final. Western had just played three consecutive matches against York and Laurentian at the end of the round-robin and then against York in the semi-finals. Tired or not, Western had the psychological advantage of being last year's invitational winner, and national intercollegiate champion. Unfortunately, Blues' relaxed Saturday schedule was negated by the closely-contested second game against Dal.

Toronto seemed to have the championship in hand, taking Western 15-8 in the first game of the best two out of three final. Western, capitalizing on Blues' pitiful display of serving, took the second game 15-6. Western then went ahead in the third game and though Toronto played well, Blues couldn't gain more than four points before Western had piled up 14. At one point Western had seemingly won the match 15-4, but a Halya Stefanuk spike that landed outside the back court was disputed, and the game point called back because the ball had been tipped at the net by a Western player.

The jubilant Western squad was quieted down and ordered back into position. Toronto's Fran Walmsley replaced Grieve, while Marion Thomson was sent in for a tired Roxsolanna Wankewycz, who had just returned after a two and a half month lay-off with torn ankle ligaments.

With Thomson serving, Mary Drakich and Andruchiw at net, Toronto performed capably, and in an exceptional display of good all-round volleyball, Blues grabbed seven points from a frustrated Western contingent. Both teams had fought through long hard rallies but Toronto had to make only one mistake to be defeated. A strong spike by Western ended the game, and Toronto's hopes for this year's Waterloo title, with the final score Western 15, Toronto 11.

Despite the loss, Toronto had played inspired volleyball and shown potential, even without the services of captain Agra Alberts and setter Vera Kosinkova, who could not make the trip. With half their league games yet to play, Toronto will have another chance to meet Western at the Ontario Championships at Waterloo in five weeks, with a trip to the CWIAU national finals at Dillhonsie at stake.

Next weekend Toronto travels to Ottawa for league games against Ottawa and Carleton. Next Blues' home games are not until early February.

Vic postpones illegal decision

By ELAINE KAHN

The Board of Regents of Victoria University were forced to table a report on academic tenure until February 15, after Victoria University SAC reps claimed that passage of the report at yesterday's Regents meeting would be virtually illegal.

The Ontario Statutory Powers and Procedures Act passed last spring requires all documents concerning tenure to be submitted to its Rules Committee before the document can be passed by the institution submitting it. However, the report recommending the establishment of tenure has not yet been presented to that committee.

Emmanuel College principal W.O. Fennell complained that this act undermines the autonomy of the university. However, the committee has the power neither to approve or disapprove of the report, Vic president Goldwin French wanted the regents to pass the report and then amend it, should that be necessary after the Rules Committee examined it.

However, the report was tabled under the guise that it contained redundancies, after further student pressure from VUSAC president Gord Barnes.

VUSAC vice-president Debra Lewis stated that the entire tenure report should be tabled until results of a task force established by U of T president John Evans to investigate academic appointments are known. Evans announced formation of this committee, to make a preliminary report by June, at yesterday's Governing Council meeting.

Lewis stated that the question of tenure is being considered in universities across the country and felt the regents should not pass "a system which locks the university into a system which is obviously antiquated."

Vic principal J.M.R. Robson retorted that it was highly unlikely that the new task force would decide to throw out the Haist rules on tenure, which are present U of T policy. Vic's tenure report is based on those rules.

However, Lewis was merely using a system of logic instituted by French at the beginning of the meeting. In his maiden speech to the Board of Regents, French said he did not feel it necessary to discuss a report on Victoria's government because the state of university government throughout the university is still in a state of development and flux.

In a move VUSAC reps found unexpected, the board agreed to put discussion of Vic's report on university government on next month's agenda. This report, known as the mini-CUG report, calls for student-staff parity on Vic's governing body.

Last February, former Vic president J.E. Hodgetts promised VUSAC that the report would be the first item of major business discussed at a Board of Regents meeting. The report was then tabled and has not subsequently been discussed.

VUSAC education commissioner Rick Gregory says French has indicated to him that he does not support parity. In his speech yesterday he said that he was hesitant to discuss mini-CUG at this point because it is not as urgent an issue as economic matters.

He said he found "it difficult to understand what we are likely to accomplish in practice at this time" by changes in Vic's governing structures when the entire U of T government is still developing. He suggested Vic wait to see what does develop.

French also said that there is now an "unfavourable climate in the legislature towards universities" and suggested that a private bill to change Vic's constitution might jeopardize Vic's economic immunity. He claimed a bill could be drafted by no earlier than February 1974 and the time spent drafting it could be better spent on more important considerations.

On the other hand, he supported deciding immediately on a tenure policy because in times of uncertainty, "faculty, our most valuable resource, our most valuable possession" should be allowed to stabilize their futures. He called the university a humane place, not a business institution, and said it was not in the business of making profit.

The Board later passed a motion by Robson urging the province to review its student grant-loan policy and provide more help to academically gifted students. The minister of education is to be made aware of this suggestion, which is in the form of an amendment to a Governing Council motion deploring the government's tuition fee increase.

Gregory objected to the amendment claiming that if implemented, it would draw grant support away from students with B and C-plus averages who already have enough trouble getting loans and grants.

Students with higher averages are eligible for a large number of scholarships, besides being eligible for OSAP under the existing system.

ST. CATHARINES (CUP) — More than 800 Brock University students attended a day of seminars to discuss cuts in faculty and course offerings yesterday, while an occupation of administrative areas continued.

The moratorium climaxed with another well-attended general student union meeting where students voted overwhelmingly to continue the occupation and moratorium.

The administration cancelled classes for the moratorium, but today the students will attend an unofficial moratorium despite the renewal of classes.

Yesterday's moratorium followed a general student meeting Wednesday attended by more than 1,300 students — a number unprecedented on the usually quiet Brock campus.

On Tuesday, about 200 students took over the Board of Governors Chambers and the accessway to the president's office on the 13th floor of the Brock tower.

Peter Havers and SSSC friends disrupt their second SAC meeting in two weeks.

Fees strike issue provokes yet another SAC meeting disruption

By JULIA ELCOCK

For the second successive week, a SAC meeting was occupied Wednesday by members of the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee and was unable to conclude the business on the agenda.

The meeting was adjourned after a long period of shouting by SSSC members because SAC failed to accept their demand that the fees strike be endorsed indefinitely until the $100 tuition increase is repealed by the provincial government.

Much of the verbiage was SSSC demands that SAC president Eric Miglin and vice-president John Helliwell resign from council because they had "sold out" students by failing to support the fee strike strongly enough.

Last week's SAC meeting ended in a general melee of confused shouting and pushing after SSSC prevented council from moving in camera to discuss office appointments. They refused to leave the room until after SAC discussed the fee strike claiming SAC would refuse to discuss it otherwise.

At this week's meeting in St. Mike's Brennan Hall, the fees boycott again was on the agenda and SSSC attempted to force "action" on the issue, Havers said.

When it came up for discussion, SSSC Chairman Peter Havers presented a motion that SAC encourage students to withhold their second term instalments until the $100 "surcharge" is removed.

SAC had previously endorsed the boycott with the reservation that it would review the situation at the end of January. Council members expressed fears that if they supported Havers' motion, they might be committed to supporting the fee strike indefinitely.

The SSSC motion was defeated almost unanimously.

The meeting rapidly became as stormy as the previous meeting, although it was not marred by any fights.

Havers accused Miglin and Helliwell of "deceiving the students about the fees withholding". He said that Helliwell had admitted that a fees boycott was only a symbolic gesture and he said that at a recent OFS conference Miglin had moved in secret a motion to accept the fees surcharge.

Miglin was then on the OFS executive and the proposal signed was by the executive as a whole. The motion included the statement: "This assumes that we may have to accept the fee increases already imposed for 1972—1973, but that we demand student input into the decision-making process about future government actions". The proposal was labelled "Confidential, not for public consumption" and was withdrawn after a strong hostile reaction ensued from OFS delegates.

Havers also accused SAC of not performing its duty and telling the students about the deferment of the late penalty for fees payment, saying that this showed that they did not care about the students. He said that the SSSC is the "only group of students to seriously fight the surcharge" and accordingly demanded Miglin's and Helliwell's resignations.

Although it rejected Havers' motion, Council did reaffirm its stand "calling for and actively supporting OFS demands". They were interrupted several times by shouting and heated exchanges between members of SSSC and of SAC.

Erindale Students' Administrative Government president Paul Moran read an open letter of censure to SAC "for its lack of faith in the students".

Part of the letter was submitted as motion calling for SAC commitment to the "struggle against cutbacks" and demanded that it call "a meeting of all students concerned to work out future strategy". The motion was carried with little opposition.

During a period of quiet SSSC member George Huczek moved that SAC negotiate with the U of T administration to have the $15 penalty for late payment of fees removed. Many members of council expressed their feeling that removing the late penalty would make the fee strike pointless, but the motion was carried.

Attempts to carry on with business were thwarted by SSSC, who continued to demand Miglin's resignation. Miglin refused to resign and cited the SAC constitution requirement that a president can be forced to resign from office only if a petition with 2000 signatures and accompanying student numbers is presented.

If this occurred Miglin said that he would resign and run against any candidate from SSSC. SAC members called for Havers to set up a petition but Havers said that Miglin must resign of his own volition.

St. Mike's rep Alice Anjo resigned as a result of a heated exchange. SSSC members charged her with not having performed her duty to the student body by informing them that their OSAP cheques could be collected.

In an interview, she said that she had been trying to resign since September and that this was the best opportunity she had had yet. She also said that she would run again and "probably win because I know more about the students than they do".

Acceptance of her resignation was tabled by the council, as it felt she may reconsider later.

The meeting dissolved into such confusion that a ten minute recess was called.

"It's a big joke," Miglin commented. "I just can't believe that any group on campus can be so infantile".

Havers reiterated earlier charges and claimed SAC has a deal with the university. The deal, he said, is that SAC will prevent any united action on the fees issue and in return the university will give out the OSAP cheques and defer the late penalty until January 31.

"It's a phony fee strike," Havers contended.

Brock students rally behind occupation resulting in the firing of some 15 faculty members and the removal of many courses from the calendar.

Provost Alan Earr said the administration sympathizes with the student position and therefore cancelled classes. Today, students will meet with administration officials before holding another general meeting. The students appear determined to remain in the offices until their demands for the revocation of the firings and course cuts are met.

The Brock Board of Governors will meet in emergency session Saturday. The Board reportedly sympathizes with the student demands.

Students have formed committees to distribute petitions in the St. Catharines community supporting their position to present to the provincial government. Already, several community groups have offered their support, although the students have met with strong, but predictable opposition from the ultra-conservative St. Catharines Standard, the daily newspaper.

The rich get richer...

'Monopolies impoverish Brazilian workers'

By GREG McMASTER

International monopolies controlling Brazil's economy simultaneously produce economic growth and "more acute impoverishment for more and more people", according to professor Milton Santos, a Brazilian economist.

Santos was speaking Wednesday to 200 people in Sidney Smith Hall. Backing up his arguments with statistics showing the changing proportions of shares of national income going to different classes, Santos outlined the dramatic growth of Brazil's gross national product, and charged that "a series of conditions of economic underdevelopment are aggravated by economic growth."

He suggested that economic growth in Latin America has been for the benefit of the propertied classes, who have organized the continent into "national economic units", whereby companies can fix prices through monopolistic control of markets. This retards the full development of Latin America, and creates dependencies on the international economy, entwining countries such as Brazil in what Santos called "dependent imperialism".

Those countries which have achieved some industrialization, such as Brazil and Argentina, will soon reach the limit of their home market, he said, and will either have to stop growing or to look to other countries for markets.

Thus, Brazil "looms as a privileged country", with interests throughout South America. This is true in spite of the 67 per cent foreign ownership level of Brazil's economy and such disparities as 50 per cent of the population receiving less of the national income than the top one per cent receive.

Santos claimed that the "penetration of monopolies is permitted as much by international historical conditions" as by local considerations.

Brazil has a highly specialized, technological economy, owned primarily by the United States, Britain, France, Germany and Japan, he said. Such specialization, he added, represents "a new stage in the international division of labour."

Foreign capital (and local capital controlled by multi-national corporations) is centred in dynamic, high-profit sectors of the economy, explained Santos, and it controls both the direction of national growth and political factors such as "public opinion on important issues."

Santos challenged the view held by many economists that the major problem of underdeveloped countries was difficulty in achieving the primitive accumulation of capital. He claimed instead that the central problem lies in the fact that the interests of those who control the corporations are at odds with the interests of balanced economic growth.

Santos accused the state of coming to the aid of monopolies, saying "the state is the principal provider of services to the companies." He added that various tariff and tax arrangements result in "poor countries financing the rich countries", and noted that many goods produced by Brazilians cost less in New York than in Brazil.

Economic expansion by Brazil is necessarily impeding, said Santos,

The Varsity—Bob Bettison

Economist Milton Santos

due to the restrictions placed on the market by the poverty of the Brazilian masses. This is a result of the dynamic of the Brazilian economy, he said, and will lead to the state being "forced to adopt a great power policy without regard for the impoverished masses."

The solution to Brazil's problems, said Santos, will require "modification of the present industrial production structure." Since the Brazilian state represents "forces opposing popular interests", this will require a "rupture" of the present system, leading to a change in "the nature of the state."

Santos claimed that "the masses are becoming more restless and anxious every day." He would not be more specific, and claimed ignorance when questioned about the present state of revolutionary forces in Brazil.

He did comment that Brazilian trade unions do not have the right to strike, and "do not have freedom of movement."

Police attacked Goldblatt, McLaughlin says

By PAUL McGRATH

A person found guilty last month of assaulting police in last spring's Simcoe Hall occupation break-up was himself kneed and kicked by three policemen, according to Tom McLaughlin.

McLaughlin was testifying at the third day of his own trial Wednesday about what happened after police entered the Senate chambers March 12 to end the occupation in support of open stacks in the Roberts Library. The trial, hearing a charge of obstructing police, will resume Monday, January 29.

Under questioning from Crown Attorney William Donaldson, McLaughlin testified that he saw one officer, identified as P.C. Annis, holding Mark Goldblatt, by the hair and kneeling him in the head. He also testified that he saw two officers beside Annis "kneeing and kicking" Goldblatt about the chest.

Goldblatt was found guilty of assaulting police at a December trial, but was given an "absolute discharge", leaving him with no criminal record.

McLaughlin's testimony was constantly interrupted by often repetitive questions from the Crown. McLaughlin is conducting his own defence, and has no legal background. Judge Cloney was quick to rule on any objections the Crown had about the possible irrelevance of evidence, especially early in the session when McLaughlin attempted to give some of the political background surrounding the occupation of the chambers.

Other evidence concerned proceedings before the police arrived, in an attempt by the Crown to clarify how many people had been left in Simcoe Hall when the majority of the occupants left to go to a meeting at the Medical Sciences Building. It was after this meeting that the students returned to occupy the Senate Chambers.

It took the Crown Attorney 10 minutes to ascertain that McLaughlin had no idea how many people had remained.

McLaughlin at least twice had to ask the Crown to repeat questions which he found were often confusing and irrelevant.

The Crown attempted to discover how many of the people in the chambers had known McLaughlin before the occupation, and for how long. McLaughlin testified that about six people were known to him before the occupation.

The trial will continue on Monday, January 29, possibly with the testimony of U of T vice-presidents Jack Sword and Don Forster, who waited outside the courtroom Wednesday, but were not called as witnesses.

Bill Getty, charged with assaulting police the same morning, found that due to administrative slip-ups, his trial did not proceed Wednesday as expected. After being delayed several months, it is now slated for February 5 and 6.

Getty said yesterday he finds the delays "very frustrating".

Staff CUPs run

Our CUP (report) runneth over... from last week's staff meeting, that is.

Due to the tremendous, intense interest shown in other subjects at last week's staff meeting, the long-awaited report on the recent Canadian University Press conference did not materialize. Such an oversight will not occur at this week's meeting, we have vowed. A discussion of editorial suggestions for the upcoming week will also happen. It'll be sort of a happening, you might say.

So come. Test your endurance. Match wits with the best. The semi-fortnightly staff meeting: today at 1 pm in The Varsity office, 91 St. George St.

York forms demands

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — York University, scene of an occupation last week that forced its administration to release OSAP cheques, held a one-day moratorium on government cutbacks in education yesterday.

Students participating in the moratorium advocated free and universal access to university education. They formulated three demands:

- Stop the cutbacks, repeal the fee hikes that were implemented this year;
- Lower the loan ceilings to last year's level of $600;
- Lower the age when students are considered independent of their parents.

Organizers of the moratorium, the York Cutbacks Committee, called it a success, describing the 300 students who attended the morning mass-meeting as a sign that students were seriously interested in decisions that affect their education.

Members of the committee are planning to send representations to the Ontario Federation of Students, whose executive meets this weekend to call on OFS to organize a province-wide demonstration at Queen's Park, and to endorse their list of demands on the government.

The students rejected cutbacks in services staff and faculty as responses to enrolment drops, and called on students at other universities to unite with other groups on campus that are being affected by the cutbacks.

"... the most important and valuable resource of this university... is the faculty!"

Major issue not fees hike

I have no wish to overly belabour the issue of what took place at Wednesday's SAC meeting. The carnival antics of Peter Havers and his fellow members of the Canadian Liberation Movement Stop the Student Surcharge Committee are better forgotten. However, since the CLM SSSC felt that their messianic mission of liberating Canada gave them the authority to deny SAC members their constitutional rights of freedom of speech and freedom of intelligence, I feel obliged to attempt to respond to a number of the less mindless points raised by Canada's version of the "Hitler Youth". In the first place, I quite agree that the SAC has taken too passive a role in the entire fees boycott venture. In fact, a large number of council members have insisted for some time that SAC should have taken a far more active role in organizing the boycott. Wednesday night's meeting, however, convinced me that SAC has failed in another important respect — it has failed to properly inform the students of what is really involved in the entire "fees issue". It became painfully obvious that if so astute a political observer and so incisive an economic analyst as Peter Havers could so totally fail to comprehend what this whole issue is about, then it is quite likely that many students on this campus have also missed the point.

Contrary to the contention of the CLM SSSC, the major issue is not the $100 fees hike. Granted, this issue is significant, but it is undoubtedly the least significant feature of the entire student financing problem. Mr. Havers seems to have forgotten that when the government announced the $100 cutbacks (thereby effectively forcing universities to raise their fees — yes, Mr. Havers, forcing!) it simultaneously raised the OSAP loan ceiling from $600 to $800. And, Mr. Havers also seems to have forgotten that in a referendum conducted this fall students voted overwhelmingly to condemn both of these measures.

Mr. Havers seems to be blessed not only with a poor memory, but also with limited powers of analysis. For, to see the $100 tuition hike as the primary concern is to totally mystify the real issue involved. The real issue is that, through the changes previously cited, the provincial government has moved to further restrict university access, to make it even more difficult for students from low-income families to attend university. This is the real issue!

Consider: Whom does the $100 fee hike really affect? Surely not students from upper and upper-middle class families, for whom the $100 increase goes virtually unnoticed! And, surely not students from middle class families for whom the increase may mean only the cancellation of a European holiday or prevent the acquisition of a new stereo! If an effect is felt, then it is felt by that group for whom every adverse change in the financing system causes new hardships — self-supporting students and students from low-income families. These are the students for whom the fees strike is a major issue.

Or are they? How can one attempt to persuade a student who doesn't have sufficient funds to even pay $544 for tuition much less $644 — how can one believe that for such a student the $100 fees hike is the primary issue!!! Mr. Havers claims to have talked to great numbers of students about the fees boycott. I wonder if he's talked to anyone who carries a part-time job so that he/she can have a weekly food allowance of $5. If Mr. Havers has, then how can he possibly be so naive as to claim that the $100 dollar fees hike is the major concern? And, if he hasn't, then let me assure him that many such students exist. Perhaps, Mr. Havers should do a little more listening and a little less shouting.

If he did, he might realize that for most students, and most potential students, the changes in OSAP — and the traditional inadequacy of that program — are the major issue. He might realize that the present student aid program is designed primarily for students from middle class and lower-middle class homes. It is utterly inadequate in terms of enabling students from low-income families to finance their university education. Has Mr. Havers given any thought to the disincentive provided to such a student by the prospect of having to accumulate $3,200 debt upon graduation — graduation, I might add, into a jobless job market?

The real issue, I say again, is that the government's actions have further restricted access to higher education for students from low-income families (as well as self-supporting students). The $100 fees hike is merely a "red herring". It has importance only in the context of an utterly inadequate system of student aid — like OSAP.

Getting the $100 fee hike cut back accomplishes next to nothing. Granted it may provide some students with a few more luxuries, but it does nothing for the student who can't even afford to pay $544. And, it does nothing to get at the roots of the problem behind students living on a $5 a week food allowance.

The heart of the problem lies with the OSAP — not with the fees hike. Personally, I would be pleased to see tuition fees raised to $1,500 a year — so long as such a move were accompanied by an intelligently-managed, well-funded student aid program which provided the necessary grants to students receiving no family assistance or whose family cannot afford to finance their studies, such that no student would be forced to accumulate a huge debt in order to pursue a university education. Such a system would allow for greater university access to students from low income families; it would save "the taxpayer" money by forcing those who can afford it to bear a greater burden in the financing of higher education; it would free funds for the improvement of library facilities, for the operation of day-care centres, for the improvement of public transportation, for the cleaning-up of pollution — areas in which those funds are badly needed.

Mr. Havers seems to have been doing a great deal of research into Harvard lately. I wonder if he has been able to tear himself away from perusing its list of alumnae long enough to notice some other feature of that university. I wonder if he has noticed that Harvard — that stronghold of the blue-blooded idle rich — has a far higher percentage of students from low-income families than does our own beloved U of T. And yet, Harvard's tuition is in the neighbourhood of $3,000 per year — and climbing! How can this be? Quite simply, Harvard offers a very comprehensive, intelligent, well-funded system of student aid such that no student is prevented from attending the university simply on the grounds that he cannot afford it.

Once again, tuition fees, in themselves, are not the issue. The issue is one of the financing of higher education in general. Only one affected with Mr. Havers' political myopia could claim that the $100 fees hike is the major issue. And, only one so affected could claim that it is the university which is the foe in this matter. To direct our efforts against the university, which, in this instance, is a relatively powerless intermediary in the broader problem of educational financing, is to misdirect our efforts and, by doing so, to guarantee failure. The university is the culprit — the power in this matter lies at Queen's Park!

On with the fees boycott, by all means! But, let us not forget who we're really fighting — and why we're fighting them!!

Marty Stollar
UC SAC Rep

It is interesting the CLM should disrupt two SAC meetings rather than take any militant action themselves.

Last year, the Open Stacks Committee, of which I was a member, took direct action and occupied Simcoe Hall. We had already mobilized student support by petitioning and talking to real students as well as earlier occupying the Sigmund Samuel Library.

The CLM obviously has no conception of who wields power in this university. It is not the Students' Administrative Council.

As so-called socialists, they seem to forget the university is an integral part of the capitalist economic system. It is still controlled by an alliance of conservative faculty and corporate executives from the multinational corporations that control Canada.

If Canada is to become independent and if the university is to become an agent for social change, it won't be accomplished with limited, SSSC chairman Peter Havers harangues last night's SAC meeting.

Phony concern disrupts SAC

I wish to publicly repudiate the phony concern that the Canadian Liberation Movement is showing for the students of the University of Toronto in its so-called Stop the Student Surcharge Committee.

These juvenile national-socialists have no right to say they have any support from the ordinary U of T student population. Their narrow chauvinism has been reflected in the mindless 85 per cent quota campaign. Now, it has been extended to the hysterical tirade against SAC. Though I am not among the supporters of the present SAC, I do have to admit they have done a creditable if unexciting job on the fees boycott.

They could have done more, but that is at least partially due to council and not the executive.

one-issue campaigns such as the fees boycott and the 85 per cent quota campaign.

The only time that will come is if the working people of Canada and Ontario reject the capitalist economic system as oppressed people are doing all over Latin America, Asia, and Africa, and replace it with a socialist economic system. Such a system is the only one in which people have control over their own lives.

The CLM should work out its frustrations some other way than by disrupting SAC meetings.

Their so-called trust fund is useless. I don't know of any student who has paid into it.

The Miglin administration can be criticized for a multitude of faults, but their actions on the fees strike have been among their positive attributes. More organizing could have been done.

But, on the other hand, the reformism of the CLM is enough to make any legitimate socialist sick.

Discontent and social unrestWorld must change or perish: Nobel winner

Dennis Gabor, winner of the 1971 Nobel Prize in Physics warned packed Convocation Hall Wednesday that "there may not be any industrial civilization left within the next 100 years."

"Discontent is seething not only in the poor minorities, like the American Negroes, but also among the well-paid industrial workers, and among the young people, most conspicuously among university students," he said. "This manifests itself in social unrest, which if it spreads further, will wear out the foundations of our free economy and of our free society."

Gabor is best known as the inventor of "holography", an optical technique that led the way to three dimensional imagery and data storage. He is equally interested in social problems and is a devoted student of the future. He was speaking at the first in a series of Centennial lectures sponsored by the engineering faculty.

He pointed out that the extreme materialism of industrial civilisation is "ruthlessly exploiting the earth's resources. The economy of rich countries is based on downright waste," he said.

"If the whole world consumes at the rate of the United States, the world's resources will be exhausted in about one generation," he warned.

He attacked present-day technology, saying that it continually impoverishes the earth, and is cutting its own foundations. "Can we create a new technology which exploits only practically inexhaustible resources or self-renewing ones?"

Gabor is optimistic. "An inventor never approaches a problem with the belief that it is insoluble." But, he added that technology alone cannot solve the problems of industrial society without thorough institutional reforms.

"We must change our childish ways," he recommended. "We must go back to previous generations!" It is only social pressure that makes people discard cars as soon as they can, Gabor said. Cars should not be changed unless there is a significant technical improvement.

Gabor rejected the argument that unemployment will follow. More people could be employed in the service industries such as transportation, education, and personal services. This would increase our standard of living, he maintained.

Labour can follow the example of Sweden. He explained that if anyone is in danger of losing a job, the government supplies a retraining program. "In Sweden, labour is effective and strikes are extremely rare," he said.

Gabor also recommended that Americans rebuild their cities. "If you compare an Austrian or Swiss Village to an American one, Americans ought to be ashamed", he declared.

St. Mike's union unveils campus centre plan

By FRAN JOHNSON

A campus centre plan unveiled by the St. Michael's College Student Union yesterday involves no major construction, but instead is a large number of minor changes.

Accessibility of various parts of the SMC campus and appearance are stressed in the three-stage proposal, which also includes creating an informal meeting place immediately south of Brennan Hall.

According to union president Al Nigro, the plan is not formal yet, but later "may amount to a formal proposal."

Reaction from SMC president John Kelly "seemed enthusiastic", says Nigro. Kelly has asked the union to prepare a cost analysis.

Architecture professor George

Baird, who sat on a union committee working on the campus centre plan, estimates that it will cost less than $250,000.

The cost will be shared by the administration of the college and the students, Nigro hopes.

The union may ask for 50 per cent rebate of the one dollar SAC campus centre levy to help finance the project, raising about $1000. It may also hold a referendum next year to raise money through a special St. Mike's levy earmarked for the campus centre.

The first stage of the plan begins with "elaborate maintenance", which may be completed within 18 months, Nigro suggested. This stage includes moving walkways to provide more direct access within the campus and to the rest of the university.

The major change involves moving the present gate at Queen's Park from the centre of the Pontifical Institute and Teffy Hall to either end. This would then make it plausible to move the present stop light down so it would be halfway between Victoria College and SMC.

The college's students would then have one safe crossing at Queen's Park, rectifying a problem SMC students have complained about for years.

During Stage 2 the new gates would receive roofs to provide shelter during the often unpleasant

Canadian climate. Ramps would also be made to provide easier access to all buildings for the handicapped.

The major changes in this stage include alterations to Brennan Hall, the only building to receive such attention. This would include a new door for easier access to the Coop from St. Mary's Street. Both the cafeteria and the lounge would be divided into three parts for different uses.

The upstairs ballroom would be altered to have better lighting and acoustics so that it could be used as a theatre.

Outside in front of Brennan Hall, a new staircase and a 12 foot sundeck would be built in front of the proposed Elmsley Square, at the top of Elmsley Place. The square would become an informal meeting place with a small astroturf square. This would be done in the third stage, as well as roof sundecks being made for the boiler room and Elmsley lounge, both flat-topped buildings.

The student union is now waiting to see how the students react to the idea of these alterations. There is no definite time when all the proposals would be completed; it is an on-going process, Nigro suggested.

No Vietnamese peace even with ceasefire, says American war vetMP calls for probe into natives' rights

OTTAWA (CUP)—The New Democratic Party's first MP from the North West Territories has called for a special inquiry into the aboriginal rights of Indian and Eskimo people.

Wally Firth has given notice of a motion to establish a special House of Commons committee on the subject.

"The question of aboriginal rights has been ignored by both the Liberals and the Conservatives for years, and I hope my motion will receive quick passage so that years of neglect can be turned into a future marked by respect for aboriginal rights," he said.

"The motion reads: 'That a special committee of the House of Commons be established to investigate all aspects of the question of aboriginal rights of the native Indian and Eskimo people of Canada with powers to report from time to time its observations, opinions and recommendations thereon.'

"That the committee be empowered to send for persons, papers, and records, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House, to adjourn from place to place, to print from day to day such papers and evidence as may be ordered by the committee, to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as it may deem advisable or necessary, and to delegate thereto all or any of its powers, except the power to report directly to the House, to employ such staff as it may deem advisable or necessary."

Firth is the first Metis to be elected to Parliament. He was elected in the previously Liberal seat because of his popularity as a worker with native peoples' organizations. Canada's first native MP, Liberal Len Marchand from Kamloops, B.C. has refused to be identified as a fighter for specifically native causes, despite his Indian background.

Even if a ceasefire agreement is reached in Indochina, "there's no doubt the fighting will continue", according to Tom Heffernan, a veteran who fought on the United States' side in the mid-1960's.

Heffernan, who now describes himself as a revolutionary socialist, said that "the nature of dual power will determine how the struggle will continue."

Even if control of different areas is divided between the National Liberation Front and the Thieu government, he claimed, the NLF is well implanted in every province, including ones such as Quang Ngai, which could be given to Thieu's forces. In spite of years of trying, these areas have not been "pacified", he said. "Except for Saigon there are no areas that could settle down under the Thieu government."

Heffernan was speaking yesterday at a Hart House meeting held to discuss why Canadians should support the Indochinese Revolution, sponsored by the Old Mole.

Joe Flexer, a prominent figure in the Left Caucus in the NDP, urged people to join tomorrow's demonstration to make clear to Canadians "what the nature of the termination of this war is" and "what the real role of Canadian troops will be."

"We shouldn't be under the impression that Mitchell Sharp will send 350 unarmed Canadians to Vietnam", said Flexer. The U.S. is pressing for thousands of armed troops, "to make sure that any elections turn out right", he said.

Flexer added that Canadians should oppose any role Canadian troops might play in "strangling the forces of the Vietnamese peasants and workers", and that the antiwar movement must do all it can both to directly aid the Vietnamese and to inject political content into the movement, so as to raise the level of the class struggle in this country.

He suggested that, instead of simply raising the slogan "End Canada's Complicity" to labour leaders, the movement should have been organizing "political strikes" by workers to actually end Canada's role in supplying the U.S. war effort.

Flexer stressed that the present negotiations have been forced on the National Liberation Front by American bombing and by lack of full support from the Soviet Union and China.

Heffernan noted that American bombing of the south was never halted during the recent delays in negotiations, which, he claimed, were intended to give Thieu and the U.S. the chance "to kill as many communists as possible" before a treaty is signed.

He suggested that Thieu has been concentrating on bargaining more over the powers of his secret police and over the extent of releases of political prisoners than over his future relationship with the Provisional Revolutionary Government (PRG).

Any arrangements to partition the country between the two governments will fail for Thieu, said Heffernan, "unless the NLF can be uprooted" throughout the country. Canadians should do whatever they can to support the NLF and prevent an American victory, he urged.

Tomorrow's march begins at 12:30 at Metropolitan United Church, at Church and Queen, and ends at 2 at the U.S. Consulate on University Avenue.

University Affairs chairman agrees

Post-secondary schools do not experiment

By DON MOWAT

The chairman of the provincial Committee on University Affairs agreed Wednesday that post-secondary educational institutions fail to experiment.

J. Gordon Parr, recently made Deputy Minister of Colleges and Universities, admitted a criticism made by former SAC vice-president Phil Dack in a question period held at OISE, was "perfectly valid".

The deputy minister did, however, emphasize the fact that experimentation was largely up to individual universities. CUA had not acted in this area as it "would not wish to interfere with university autonomy."

Parr parried Dack's charges that the CUA had failed to improve teaching quality by terming the entire question "a debatable issue".

In a prepared speech which preceded the question period, Parr called for public disclosure of differences between the government and the advisory CUA. He explained that since the government did not necessarily take the CUA's advice, the committee could not be blamed for shortcomings in the government's education policy.

Parr also advocated substantial disclosure on the part of the Ministry of Colleges and Universities to the CUA concerning the former's plans and intentions for post-secondary education. "Then the public could assess the committee's effectiveness," he stated.

Parr asserted that in the last two years, "the influence of the CUA on the government has lessened." This was largely due to changes in committee membership and frequent recent turnovers in the position of Minister of Colleges and Universities.

He cited as an example of this lessened influence the 1972-73 tuition fees hike, which was instituted contrary to the recommendation of the committee.

Canadian artistic world is greatly sexist, says Atwood

By AGL LUKACS

"When I told people that I wanted to be a writer," said poet Margaret Atwood, sarcastically "they used to say: 'How nice, dear; you can do it in your kitchen.'"

Atwood, a well-known Canadian poet and writer, was speaking to about 500 people in the Medical Sciences auditorium Monday as part of the Interdisciplinary Department's course on women. She stated that much of Canada's artistic world is sexist.

"Women started to write before they started to paint or play an instrument, because writing really is a private and anonymous thing," she said. Thus, while women were denied entry into all but a few public professions - domestic service, prostitution and acting - they were allowed to write.

Until recently, explained Atwood, female writers' work was always reviewed in the women's pages, by female reviewers, with a "she can cook for five and write too" perspective. Now the bias is less obvious.

But when a man's book is bad, it is often described with female epithets and when a woman's book is good, it is described with male terms, she claimed providing examples. Female epithets include: vague, subjective, confessional, tremulous and weak, while "male" adjectives include: clear, objective, bold, forceful, and strong.

"Ascribing sex to minds is wrong," feels Atwood. "Female writers want their work evaluated without bias."

But most female writers in Canada, including herself, also refuse to be formally associated with the women's liberation movement. Some of their books, such as Margaret Laurence's The Fire Dwellers, could be seen as women's liberation texts, but "they just weren't produced by the movement."

Most female writers who are published now made it on their own, against opposition because "writing was time away from ironing shirts," claimed Atwood. "Their personal lives were often wrecked. So their satisfaction is a little grim when women's liberation comes along and tells them that they were right."

"This is partly because a successful person refuses to recognize her group's oppression because she doesn't need to identify."

Atwood's position seems to be closer to open espousal of women's liberation than other female writers.

Her poetry and her fiction are emphatic about women's oppression.

Avineri traces development of 19th century Jewish socialists

By LORNE SLOITNICK

Israel is a society with a "strong socialistic ingredient," Professor Shlomo Avineri told a Medical Sciences Auditorium audience yesterday, and is different from "social democratic welfare states" like Sweden.

The internationally famous Hebrew University of Jerusalem professor lectured on "Jewish Emancipation and Socialism: Hess, Marx, and Lassalle."

Although he said he would "hesitate" to call Israel socialist, Avineri added that Israel was "closer to Hess than to Herzl", referring to two of the ideological founders of Zionism. Moses Hess was also a prominent socialist.

Most of the lecture was concerned with three 19th century German Jewish socialists — Karl Marx, Moses Hess, and Ferdinand Lassalle, and how they came to terms with their Jewishness.

Hess called Marx "my communist rabbi", and Avineri labelled him the father of German social democracy. He is honoured in Israel, even though in his early writings he identified Judaism with the cult of money and his message was the disappearance of Judaism.

Hess had rejected his orthodox Jewish upbringing, but later underwent a total transformation. Avineri said this was primarily because he realized that Jewish emancipation in Europe had not worked — there was still a "Jewish problem" in bourgeois society.

He also saw the increasing racialism of European nationalism and concluded that there was no chance of incorporating the Jews into the new Germany.

Hess thought of Judaism as inherently socialist after his conversion to this "secular national conception of Judaism", said Avineri. Judaism had no social classes and bourgeois morality was alien to it, Hess believed.

He concluded that a Jewish homeland was needed, and predicted that the new society would be organized on socialist principles. He called on the left to take up the "last nationality problem", as he referred to it.

Avineri said that Marx was aware of his Jewish background although, unlike Hess, he had no Jewish education. Marx's two grandfathers were both rabbis, but his father had to convert to Christianity in order to practise law.

Marx's 1843 essay "On the Jewish Question" has been widely interpreted as anti-semitic. It identified Judaism with capitalism, and Avineri, a Marxist, called it a "pretty nasty piece of writing". But, Marx's message was really "a plague on both your houses", said Avineri.

He noted that the essay was not translated into Hebrew until 1965, but on the other hand, it is the only early Marxist writing translated into Arabic. One of Marx's daughters later spoke of her father as a "great Jewish Socialist", said Avineri.

"What Marx would have said, I do not know," he said.

But, both Lassalle (who organized the first mass working-class movement in Europe) and Marx failed to come to terms with their Jewish tradition and identity like Hess did, said Avineri.

He said that the creation of Israel in 1948 gave a sense of security and belonging to Jews living in other countries.

Avineri admitted that the gap between the rich and the poor in Israel is "tremendous, but narrowing," saying, "We have to deal with a Jewish bourgeoisie." Nevertheless, 95 per cent of land in Israel is publicly owned, and a majority of industry is publicly or co-operatively owned, making it different from Swedish-style social democracies.

He said Israel's treatment of its Arab minority was not ideal, but argued that few countries have treated a minority as well when there was an external threat from that minority's people. Arabs hold high political positions in Israel, he said. But, he added, there will not soon be an Arab Minister of Defense in Israel.

Gay lib not same as homophile groups

By MICHAEL O'KEEFE

Homophile organizations are more limited than gay liberation organizations, Paul Pearce told the U of T Homophile Association Wednesday night.

Speaking to about two dozen people at the Graduate Students' Union, Pearce, a former staff member of the Community Homophile Association of Toronto, noted the historically significant role that homophile associations have played and stressed the importance of their educational and lobbying activities.

He disapproved, however, of what he sees as a tendency for homophiles to define themselves solely in terms of their sexuality. Pearce described gay liberation as better equipped to assist in the development of the total personality of the gay individual.

Pearce explained that gay lib grew out of the women's liberation movement and that it was not an offshoot of the homophile movement.

As he described it, gay lib attempts to break down the structured roles of homosexual relationships that are all too often reinforced by such social groupings as the homophiles. He cited experiments in gay communal families and group marriages as examples of the dynamism of gay liberation.

The speaker warned against the dangers of an institutionalized homophile movement. He cited the emergence of the gay ghetto as evidence of stagnation in the movement and called for the destruction of the degrading isolationism of the homophile community.

Pearce told the audience of his own transition from homophile to gay lib and credited the latter for its emphasis on the humanity of the homosexual. "Like women's lib," Pearce explained, "gay lib wants more than a mere sexual identity."

In the discussion period which followed it was obvious that the members of the UTHA were in general agreement with Pearce's remarks. While emphasizing the educational and social functions of their organization, the members of the UTHA seemed intent upon avoiding the pitfalls of homophile association that Pearce outlined.

Snowflake keeps kids warm

A 24 hour day care centre available to students is operating just south of the university.

The Snowflake Day Care Centre at 228 McCaul Street is able to provide regular, part-time or irregular care for infants up to two years old.

The cost is 75 cents per hour, although as it is a licensed centre, Snowflake's parents are eligible for provincial subsidies. All time volunteered by parents to help run the centre is subtracted from the time their child uses.

Snowflake, which can be contacted at 925-7256, is an incorporated non-profit cooperative. Authority rests in regular meetings of parents, staff and volunteers.

The centre was originally funded by a LIP grant, but is now self-sustaining. It is trying to set up a centre for children over two years old.

Concerning the infanticide,
Marie Farrar

Marie Farrar, born in April,
No marks, a minor, rachitic, both parents dead,
Allegedly, up to now without police record,
Committed infanticide, it is said,
As follows: In her second month, she says,
With the aid of a barmaid she did her best
To get rid of her child with two douches,
Allegedly painful but without success,
*But you, I beg you, check your wrath and scorn,
For man needs help from every creature born.*

She then paid out, she says, what was agreed
And continued to lace herself up tight,
She also drank liquor with pepper mixed in it
Which purged her but did not cure her plight.
Her body distressed her as she washed the dishes
It was swollen now quite visibly,
She herself says, for she was still a child,
She prayed to Mary most earnestly,
*But you, I beg you, check your wrath and scorn
For man needs help from every creature born.*

Her prayers, it seemed, helped her not at all,
She longed for help. Her trouble made her falter
And faint at early mass. Often drops of sweat Broke out in anguish as she knelt at the altar.
Yet until her time had come upon her
She still kept secret her condition,
For no one believed such a thing had happened,
That she, so unenticing, had yielded to temptation,
*But you, I beg you, check your wrath and scorn
For man needs help from every creature born.*

And on that day, she says, when it was dawn,
As she washed the stairs it seemed a nail
Was driven into her belly. She was wrung with pain,
But still she secretly endured her travail,
All day long while hanging out the laundry
She racked her brains till she got it through her head
She had to bear the child and her heart was heavy,
It was very late when she went up to bed,
*But you, I beg you, check your wrath and scorn
For man needs help from every creature born.*

She was sent for again as soon as she lay down:
Snow had fallen and she had to go downstairs,
It went on till eleven. It was a long day,
Only at night did she have time to bear.

And so, she says, she gave birth to a son,
The son she bore was just like all the others.
She was unlike the others but for this
There is no reason to despise this mother.
*You, too, I beg you, check your wrath and scorn
For man needs help from every creature born.*

Accordingly I will go on with the story
Of what happened to the son that came to be.
(She says she will hide nothing that befell)
So let it be a judgment upon both you and me,
She says she had scarcely gone to bed when she
Was overcome with sickness and she was alone,
Not knowing what would happen, yet she still Contrived to stifle all her moans.
*And you, I beg you, check your wrath and scorn
For man needs help from every creature born.*

With her last strength, she says, because Her room had now grown icy cold, she then Dragged herself to the latrine and there
Gave birth as best she could (not knowing when)
But toward morning. She says she was already Quite distracted and could barely hold
The child for snow came into the latrine
And her fingers were half numb with cold.
*You too, I beg you, check your wrath and scorn
For man needs help from every creature born.*

Between the latrine and her room, she says,
Not earlier, the child began to cry until
It drove her mad so that she says
She did not cease to beat it with her fists
Blindly for some time till it was still.
And then she took the body to her bed
And kept it with her there all through the night:
When morning came she hid it in the shed.
*But you, I beg you, check your wrath and scorn
For man needs help from every creature born.*

Marie Farrar, born in April,
An unmarried mother, convicted, died in
The Meissen penitentiary,
She brings home to you all men's sins,
You who bear pleasantly between clean sheets
And give the name "blessed" to your womb's weight
Must not damn the weakness of the outcast,
For her sin was black but her pain was great.
*Therefore, I beg you, check your wrath and scorn
For man needs help from every creature born.*

Technology needs a new revolution says French critic

"It hardly need be recalled that the concept and practice of self-management constitute an original answer to the problem of the socialization of the means of production posed by Marx, and that this concept and practice are unaffected by the difficulties which, since the time of Marx, have arisen with respect to authoritarian and centralized planning."

It seems that no matter how much governments, political groups, and various other groups that define goals for people mystify our social reality, the basic problem of who controls our lives remains. We are subjected to calls for an end to technology, a vulgar sort of nationalism, religious faith in the latest nut group that turns out breed, and even faith in faithlessness.

Henri Lefebvre uses the general social and political upheaval which swept over France in 1968, to put forward an analysis of revolutionary social change in the highly bureaucratized, technologized capitalist countries.

If Marx said that the urban proletariat was the class whose inherent relationships with the capitalist mode of production implied that they would be the instrument of its destruction, he did so by analyzing his concrete reality, by examining the social forces active in his time and place. There have been vast changes in the form of capitalism since his time, and later theorists and political leaders have successfully developed a new analysis and strategy corresponding to them.

Lefebvre looks at the state in France and examines its role in preserving the social order.

The spirit which brought about the rapid and unexpected events in France in May 1968 was one of a complete transformation of society, not of nationalizations, of central planning, not that which is in effect more efficient alienation of the masses. Both the revolutionary groups in 1968, as well as Lefebvre, attack the Communist Party for its essential conservatism, for its refusal to lead the huge masses of workers they have in the seizure of power. But he points out that they could not be expected to take part in a universal transformation of society: they accept as legitimate assumptions those of the absolute state power.

Lefebvre develops the notion of contestation, which seems very much like a phenomenon which we here on this continent have labelled as apolitical. For him it is a "refusal" to be "integrated", an "all-inclusive total rejection of experienced and anticipated forms of alienation". It is anti-specialist and anti-reductive. It examines reality qualitatively rather than quantitatively. Youth find that they are all related to the world in a similar way — does this mean that they are a "class"? In terms of a strategy for revolution, this is not Lefebvre's view.

Although it would be silly to think that young people entering positions of ownership and control will be part of a movement of revolutionary contestation, we can no longer think of revolution, of meaningful social change, as occurring only in the factories. In Canada the post-war boom has left us with a mass of young people who have high expectations and few possibilities for action. While this has developed, the ideology of American might and John Wayne-style democracy and freedom have lost all semblance of validity.

In the end, power means material control. To achieve this, those who work must wrest it from those who own and control. This must be done on all fronts.

"Recent history is marked by old contradictions that have been poorly resolved or even become sharpened. There is a crucial contradiction between private ownership of the means of production, their management in the interests of a class, and the social (collective) character of production. Far from disappearing, this contradiction has assumed new forms. The state has been consolidated in appearance only. It has taken on economic and social functions, but has not ceased to establish its power over the entire society..."

Halberstam, Vietnam foe, pens political potboiler

"It all began in the cold" sighs Arthur Schlesinger on the first page of A Thousand Days, his book on the Kennedy Administration which Gore Vidal called the best political novel since Coningsby. The novelization of history is nothing new — Tacitus was a master of the art — but examples of the genre taken from recent history have been particularly crass and cloying.

Now there is the much-touted The Best and the Brightest by super-journalist David Halberstam, one of the best Vietnam correspondents. This one kicks off with "After the assassination, and all the pain..." and you can almost hear the muffled drum.

But that elegiac opening is a dissonant note. Halberstam has written an historical melodrama, like Robert Graves' I Claudius. This is one hefty book — it took me a week of fairly diligent reading to get through it — and though I don't think it's worth the time, it does keep you going. Gossipy trash novels are so much more alluring than reverential biographies, like Schlesinger's.

This may be a flippant way to talk about a book that's gotten the red-carpet treatment from the New York Times and the big newsmagazines. But The Best and the Brightest is just another book on the Vietnam thing, in the sense that it has nothing new to say. Except for some Airport-like glimpses into the workings of government councils and some startling eavesdropping, there isn't much that the alert reader wouldn't have already picked up from ten year's reading about the war.

What Halberstam has done is run together a boxful of spiky little biographies — Johnson, Harriman, the Bundys, MacNamara, Rusk, assorted military and state department functionaries. They are frank sketches. At a Cabinet meeting after the Tonkin Gulf Resolution, Lyndon Johnson leaned to his neighbor and said "Not only did I screw Ho Chi Minh, I cut his pecker off". Such anecdotes demonstrate not only the president's notoriously gamy language — a trait Americans find endearing in their chief executives — but the brutalizing instrument that his mind was. More often, though, the eavesdropping is little more significant than the tid-bits in a show-biz column.

After you've burrowed into this book, you begin to grow a little wary; the biographies are rolling along a little too smoothly. Each character is reduced to a single characteristic — intellectual arrogance, a poor boy's need to excel, un-human efficiency — until, in the mid-sixties, it is seen, in some minute way, to contribute to the making of the Vietnam morass. It's pure Aristotle — a man's particular excellence which becomes his tragic flaw. Ingenious, but a little too neat.

This book is thick with cynicism — in fact the author takes an almost ghoulish satisfaction in recalling how super-impeccable, supercilious McGeorge Bundy was so disastrously wrong about the most important task of his career. There is a perverse pleasure in the humiliation of all those "hard-nosed" liberals Kennedy brought to Washington, smug in their certainty that brainwork and ruthlessness would sew up Vietnam for the West in no time. But Halberstam's book, with its biographical method, entertains no other notion than that the shortcomings and arrogance of a few dozen men were the sole causes of this war. As fiction, this works. But when you file these pages under history, they do seem inadequate. Isn't it time that people opposed to the war stopped praising every damn book that does nothing more than let them gloat over their own rectitude?

Insider exposes sizzling novel of grad-school passion

Hello, reader, I am Aziz, the virile Pakistani! Mr. MacVicar, your editor, has allowed me this opportunity to tell a little of my exciting story (Loving Wrongs) to you in these pages. It is my collaborator, Mr. Moore, in truth, whose words you should read, when you want to know more fully what kind of man can satisfy four or five normal women in a single night!

Thrust! Bite! I have told to him my story, and goodness me, reader, it is instructive to see what comes of me in my affair with Judy, the flat-chested graduate student. Oh, the bitch. We could have furgled, as I had thought, endlessly, but then she left me for her ridiculous husband, who could not satisfy her.

These women, dear reader; who needs them! Mr. Moore may have stretched the truth in telling of her reconciliation with the impotent fool, but then I forgive him! Because he saw that I am a beast, and know what it is to please a lady.

Let me quote you some of his passages; they would never do in a Walt Disney movie! (I think, reader, that Mr. Moore idolizes me a little; he could not find a publisher for my tale, so he paid to put it out. Isn't that flattering?) Here are the passages: "Aggressiveness on the part of Aziz provoked aggressiveness in her. And then the moment of final ecstasy came, the moment of orgasm for Judy. 'Ahhhhhhhh...' — while Aziz was still thrusting, biting, squeezing."

"They were both facing the screen, watching the movie, along with heaving intercourse. Judy soon found that she had to close her eyes to find maximum pleasure out of coitus, but Aziz kept watching the movie as well. Judy spent the whole evening in his lap, though he had two consummations of two long acts of copulation. When the film was about to end, she silently wriggled out of his lap and, having nothing else to clean herself with, she used her panties for this purpose. Aziz laughed when she gave him the panties to wipe his genitals clean."

Great stuff, reader! And even more fun to experience, as I assure you I have, many times! I should add one more little bit of information. Mr. Moore has told me that he really enjoys to listen to stories like mine, and that if someone I knew had something to show and tell, he or she should get in touch with this estimable author. Where? Oh, around this university; like me, he is a graduate student, and will be only too glad to tell your story to an eager public, for a small consideration.

Okay, reader; see you in the halls! Remember; always wipe yourself clean!

Faculty dig in, Students yawn: Course unions Fight impotence

Student demands for increased power in decision-making often met with stiff faculty resistance.

A campus-wide conference on course unions held in November was able to attract less than twenty people to its deliberations. The turnout was perhaps as good a comment as any on the current state of course unions at U of T. Small, disorganized, with unclear goals and directions, they are flounderingly struggling to avoid total irrelevance.

Today, if a student is interested in becoming involved in course union activity, well-nigh the only concrete thing he or she can do is distributing and tabulating course evaluations. This has become the main function of most unions; for many, it is the only function.

Students who put them out hope to influence the faculty by showing them how students feel about course content and presentation. As well, evaluations give students — it is hoped — guidance about which courses might be worth taking.

Such a modest set of objectives is a sad comedown from the high hopes with which course unions were launched on this campus about five years ago. Once seen as a vehicle for mobilizing students against irrelevant and mystifying educational experiences and against undemocratic and alienating structures, they have become a means for marginally influencing course content, for having at least some input, however indirect, into staffing decisions.

But even this does not correspond to the actual situation. If quality of teaching were a significant factor in the hiring and firing of professors, evaluations might have some value. Unfortunately, however, this hasn't been an important consideration in the past, and doesn't seem likely to become one in the future. Staffing decisions seem to be made totally independently of any teaching ability, or lack thereof, that the professor concerned may have.

As a result, course evaluations function only as a shopping list for students. Increasingly, they are a consumer's tool, the catalogue for the buying and selling of educational products that goes on at the university.

Nor do evaluations seem to fulfil the other purpose for which they are sometimes touted — that of encouraging students to think about their course, to stimulate critical discussion, and to thereby contribute to consciousness or action.

For this, the evaluations are entirely too individualistic and personalized. The process guarantees anonymity. Evaluation sheets are handed out with a few words of introductions; students obediently and hurriedly fill out the forms and return them. The questions fit into the short-answer format of pseudo-scientific "objectivity" that is a hallmark of modern questionnaire-worship.

The results are simply published and never discussed. The professor is never actually confronted with the combined student opinions. And the evaluations are never the occasion for collective action or even discussion. They become simply a guide for choosing between existing alternatives.

Attempts at changing this state of affairs have begun at Saint Michael's College and course unions such as the Political Economy Course Union (PECU), which are considering in-class discussions.

But can course evaluations ever be improved enough to become effective while the numbers of students actively involved and interested in improving their educational experience is so insignificant? Course unions have certainly never had massive student support. In fact, one of the major flurries of activity occur with the beginning of each school year when there begins another scramble to involve a few interested students who will do enough shit-work that will make possible another year's activity in writing up course evaluations and sitting in endless committees.

There seems to be little continuity from one year to the next. The student leaders who led the fight a few years ago and who were the political inspiration to radicalize or at least liberalize the university are gone now and the ones who have taken their places are a different kettle of fish.

The purposes and directions of course unions are in a constant state of flux from year to year, with no clearly defined program or strategy, no unity of action.

Thus, some student leaders see the only purpose in their activities in course unions as trying to "increase communication with the faculty." Others who actually want to change the structure of the university, must content themselves with sitting on committees and drawing up course evaluations, having been thwarted in every attempt at actual and effective participation.

The present situation reflects both confusion over basic objectives and failures in finding strategies that would realize objectives.

One major current in the formation of course unions was a desire to win co-management for students in the running of the university and the educational process. This was tied to a desire to bring about educational reform. Fundamentally, however, it implied an acceptance of the basic nature of the university.

Another current was represented by the revolutionary left, which saw course unions as an instrument for organizing students around common concerns against the capitalist university and bourgeois education. Student power was seen as something that could lead to "red bases" in universities, along the model of Simon Fraser University, where students in the Political Science/Sociology/Anthropology Department had, for a brief period, equal power in all aspects of the department, power which they used to turn it into a centre of radical education. In this view, course unions were an organizing tool that could lead to mass action; co-management was seen as a dead end that resulted in the co-optation and deflection of student demands, something that could not lead to fundamental change. The objectives of students were seen as basically opposed to those of the capitalist university and the academic status quo.

When course evaluations originally appeared, they were seen either as guerilla theatre, turning the grade-oriented system back on the professors themselves, or as an attack on the sanctity and exclusive power of the professor over the educational process. The shopping-list function was seen as at most a minor one, directed at enabling students to choose among bad alternatives until the educational experience itself would be transformed.

But the original conceptions were blurred in practice. In some cases, course unions were created from what had been course clubs, associations of students in various disciplines which were social in nature, and directed mainly at bettering relations with faculty through tea-and-cookie socials and the like. In other cases, there was tension between the desire to challenge the power of the faculty and administration, and the desire to share in the running of the academic establishment. Especially in a situation where a revolutionary minority were trying to involve a reformist majority, there tended to be a blurring between different conceptions of course unions.

A major problem was the fact that the co-management conception was workable with small numbers students willing to sit on committees. The revolutionary conception required, to be effective, the involvement of large numbers of students committed to confronting established power. But in a university where the allegiance or identification of students was not primarily to a single discipline — most students take courses in a number of different disciplines — course unions were not a natural focus for student organization.

An emphasis on committees allowing for the involvement of student activists, on the other hand, drew in a number of students to the activities of the course unions, giving them at least the semblance of activity. As a result, the committee-oriented, co-management bent of the unions was reinforced.

This, in turn, lessened their usefulness as agents of large-scale student involvement. Committee-sitting was not a major interest of most students, goals of party and structural reform were too abstract.

This, combined with the division of students between course unions and other levels of student involvement — SAC and the like — made it almost inevitable that course unions remain, except for times of crisis when larger numbers were temporarily drawn in over specific issues, the preserves of small cliques of activists or student bureaucrats, with little contact with their supposed constituencies.

As a result, many course union activists are relatively cynical about student desire for change. Some have more faith in the ability of professors to change than they do in that of students. But, then, they have plenty of reason for their cynicism.

For example, parity committees in Anthropology and Linguistics are often left without full student representation because few students are interested in sitting on them. These departments tend to be fairly liberal, open to student opinion, and structurally democratic. Parity on the curriculum committees was achieved with practically no effort at all on the part of the students. Other changes too have been accomplished with relative ease.

Although hiring and firing is still without student representation except in Sociology which only this week implemented parity on this committee, student leaders in the other departments show little desire to fight for it. They say they wouldn't know what to do with the power if they had it so why exert the effort?

Students in Sociology received representation with relative ease. The former chairman of the department, S.D. Clark, one ruled the department with an iron hand, not even faculty having a say in decision-making. In a strong reaction to his power, the faculty in effect voted non-confidence in him, and Clark resigned. Subsequently, a parity student-faculty committee was set up which recommended parity on every committee except hiring and firing. Thus, changes still being fought for in other departments were basically handed to students. The activities of the Sociology Students' Union were directed mainly to organizing students within these structures, seeking the establishment of better courses and the hiring of more radical faculty.

The three departments of Anthropology, Sociology, and Linguistics are unique in the university in that they have had relatively less traditionalism and authority to fight against. This however, meant that students in them had no rocks to sharpen their teeth on and consequently seem to have gone soft. Since they were given virtually everything they wanted in the way of power, they had no challenge to rise to. They have not had to develop a comprehensive analysis of their situation as students since they had no need for a long-range strategy. They seem content, for the most part (Sociology is perhaps an exception to this) with their departments the way they are and see no need for a damaging student-faculty confrontation. Some professors in these departments, in fact, would be delighted if their students took more of an interest.

In contrast to these "easy conquests" there have been the rather difficult battles of the students in the History, Political Economy and Geography departments. Their history is far more complicated and involved.

The History Course union grew out of a SAC committee in 1967 to set up course unions. The staff was strongly opposed to student participation and managed to co-opt the more determined students onto a student-staff committee which served primarily to sap energies and waste time. A student request for a single representative on the library and curriculum committees was turned down.

A course evaluation put out by the union shocked the department a bit but did little concrete to influence it.

In the fall of 1969, two ad hoc committees with equal student-faculty representation were set up to study parity. But all proposals put forward by the committees were voted down by the department.

Finally parity was achieved on all committees except the policy committee and the Department Meeting, the highest governing body which had on it only 14 students, a token representation when put against the entire faculty.

The term 1969—1970 saw the peak of the History Students Union. In order to get more students involved, the union became service-oriented, offering films and seminars. For the first and possibly the last time, elections were not for the most part a series of acclamations. Determined to press forward, the graduate students attempted to get parity on the Department Meeting as a whole. In response, the department, somewhat aghast, set up a structures committee, which, meeting through the summer became a miniature version of the Commission on University Government (CUG), in which all the issues of student power were debated.

The summer of 1969 marked the beginning of a faculty backlash and the decline on the History Students Union.

This year (1972—73) the union has only about 10 active members, some of whom are carryovers from last year. Gus Richardson says that he and his fellow members are spending their time going to department meetings and sitting on committees. He says the union is suffering from a lack of a cause. The goal of student parity on the department meeting has been given up as a lost cause, at least for the time being. Changes have been so scarce, in fact, that Richardson is pleased that the faculty have agreed to keep track of student ratings of professors in the chance that they will be taken into account when decisions such as those granting tenure are brought up.

PECU struggled in much the same way for representation but didn't get as far. Tom McLaughlin, PECU's former president, notes that the union ended up with only minor concessions such as allowing students to hand in essays a day late. Today, PECU is plagued by low membership and lack of enthusiasm among the students. In an attempt to get more students involved, it is planning a February referendum on priorities of the course union. Negotiations for student representation have come to a halt, having made not even the slightest progress since they were started in 1969. The union still does not officially recognize Stefan Dupre as department chairman because he was appointed without consultation with students. But nothing is done about this. Although PECU this year has an issue on which to fight, that is, the threat of extinction now facing the Political Economy branch library, this has not been enough to attract more students to activity. News letters and public lectures have been tried to make more students aware of PECU's existence but these have not had a great impact.

Today, the course unions that struggled against formidable odds to get power in departments and the unions that simply accepted what was given to them by a benevolent and concerned faculty, differ little in terms of the number of empty student seats on the various departmental committees. It may be expected that struggle might have given student leaders in the tougher departments a greater amount of political sophistication, but if that is true, it makes little difference since these students are no longer around. At any rate, the mess of the student body has remained largely unaffected.

The central student bureaucracies have made few attempts to remedy the situation. The Arts and Science union which has taken over the financing of course unions from SAC through an educational and political rebate has substantially no relevance to developments of course unions or student power. It functions merely to co-ordinate the activities of existing course unions, college councils, and student representatives on the Faculty council. It's making no attempt to try to formulate plans for future action or to study the causes of present ills in student organization. In short, it is largely irrelevant. Unless it makes an attempt at formulating policy or strategy, the purpose of its existence is questionable. Yet its unrepresentative nature and its distance from students makes it a dubious choice for formulating policy.

Saint Michael's College has given up course unions as a lost cause and has also rejected the present student council and its strategy (or lack of it) as completely inadequate. The student council of SMC has refused to join the Arts and Science union saying that Arts and Science, as a faculty, has no relevance to students in the way that, say, the Faculty of Engineering or Medicine has to its students. They say that students in Arts and Science identify far more with their college than they do with their faculty, and even if some of them do not, it is far easier to build that sort of identity on a college level than it is in the spread-out buildings of Arts and Science.

SMC student council president Pat Redican stresses that the main purpose of his student council in running operations normally run by course unions is to work on the grass roots level to get students involved and subsequently raise their consciousness.

Redican regrets that SMC's differences with the rest of the university have forced his college into isolation. He does not think that his student council can do anything substantial if cut off from the rest of the university. But he claims that the new strategy has been well worth it. Active membership in the student council has leapt to 50 from the mere dozen or so it once was. Redican says that it the university had a more credible SAC, with a centralized and ongoing strategy, the results might even be better.

All these unions have repeatedly come up against a common, unresolved question. Why is the student body so massively uninterested in what they are doing? This question is especially galling when it comes from hostile faculty whose arbitrary power makes even student unions look responsible and representative by comparison.

Perhaps blame could be attached to choice of issues, which are often far too abstract and structure-oriented. Parity too often means something only to aspiring student bureaucrats; it does not raise gut issues for students.

Course unions are so set up and structured that they can completely ignore or be oblivious to the students they set themselves up to serve. Unions don't have to rely on their student constituencies for existence since their money comes from the Arts and Science Union (and formerly SAC).

And again and again, struggles and energies were deflected into committee after committee which sapped commitment and enthusiasm.

It may at this time be both too late and premature to fight for power in departments as unions have spent their time in the past. What has not been won up to now probably will not be won in the foreseeable future, unless faculty or administrators choose to grant reforms for reasons of their own. Most unions seem to recognize this since it appears that the struggle has largely been given up.

The record of the past seems to make it clear that tinkering reforms in the form of demands for participation for students in the status quo, can accomplish little except legitimize the status quo. Token and minority representation on decision-making bodies is often welcomed by the department establishments precisely because it does nothing except defuse student demands.

Demands course unions have made in the past have not fundamentally challenged the educational system in its entirety. But then, such a confrontation can accomplish little if it is merely verbal, unaccompanied by power expressed through the mobilization of large numbers of students — the very thing unions seem poorly equipped to produce.

Activists in the past have failed to solve this dilemma. Unless they can do so in the future, it seems unlikely that course unions can remain a significant vehicle for bringing about change in the university.

Elaina Ferragher

Peckinpah, Huston scored

Blood and machismo infect films

Movie-makers used to get rich on violence. Lately they've gotten rich on abhorring violence. The latter strikes me as slightly more despicable, but then those are the movies that I see. Last week however, I went to one of the other kind, John Huston's The Life and Times of Judge Roy Bean. I found it the least fun, least useful, least interesting time I've had in a theatre since Deliverance.

Roy Bean is not pretentious like Deliverance, not so gory, so macho, or so racist, it is just dumb and immoral. It embarrasses me to be a moral critic. I'm not a prude. But it offends me to see killings and maimings still played for laughs and, even worse, glorified into mythology. There is a historical note following the credits in Roy Bean about the mean life West of the Pecos. It ends on the rider, "Maybe that ain't the way it was... but it's the way it should've been".

Balls. John Huston's career dates well back into the days when it was OK to kill bad guys and indians, on screen and off. Huston has made a healthy living off it. I don't deny his talent or vision, but I don't want to white-wash him either: America has learned to take its killing pretty casually, and the men who made the Westerns have been key propagandists. Nixon is a murderer, to call a spade a spade, so was Johnson, so was Kennedy. Nixon's millions of supporters are accomplices, with rationales (alibis) forged by the grand old whores of movie-making.

Was I the only one in the Uptown Theatre the other night who watched all those merry executions and shootings and thought about Vietnam? I am not one who brings up Vietnam at the drop of a hat — not any longer — but watching the screen and listening to the laughter — less than was sought, by the way — I couldn't help recalling the total futility of almost a decade of my own efforts to make a dent in the masses of killings in South-east Asia. Huston, on the other hand, is so bloody successful. It pisses me off.

Of course, underneath the moral criticism is an aesthetic one. If the movie had been better, what it did would have slipped right by. Elliot used to say that the meaning in his lines was a sop to the mind to keep it busy while the poem did its work. When there is no meaning the mind gets restless, seeking out, and finding, cracks. Had Deliverance been faster or cleverer, I would have never caught it propping drowned Drew's arm back behind his head for no reason other than the salacious. I am not particularly talented at this, and friends regularly embarrass me by noticing what I miss entirely; that, in Clockwork Orange the aborted gang-rape in the theatre was totally gratuitous; that the heroes of M.A.S.H. were racist bullies; that the shoot-out at the end of McCabe and Mrs. Miller was cheap and unnecessary. Within days of writing my review of Pete 'n' Tillye, I read Pauline Kael's, in which she pointed out how phony Carol Burnett's marriage and lifestyle really were. ("If there is such a thing as a consciousness-lowering movie, this is it"). It had gone right by me.

So Huston's failure in The Life and Times of Judge Roy Bean is essentially a failure to distract. Judge Bean is obviously fashioned after Butch Cassidy but he lacks Butch's charm. He can't wash a bear the way Butch could ride a bike. Butch Cassidy and Sundance were sheer anachronism, our men in the old West. They yelled "shit" when they jumped off the cliff. We liked them like we like us. Roy Bean is just vicious, not modern, not funny: he just doesn't have the lines. The best Paul Newman is able to do for him is make him stiff-necked and wrong-headed; the best Huston is able to do for him is people the rest of the movie with even punier characters. (Huston's treatment of women, by the way, is not much different than Sam Peckinpah's.) Only the photography gives any reminder that the same man, last time round, made Fat City.

Perhaps it is unfair to go after a mindless piece of fluff like this, even if it is a piece of fluff with a shard of glass in the middle. In part my vehemence stems from shock; I went to Bean to be entertained, to see Butch Cassidy again. Instead I had my nose rubbed in blood, and by an expert.

On the weekend I came across an early 1969 issue of The New Yorker in which Pauline Kael took on a violent, forgettable pot-boiler of the day. I think her conclusion is worth reprinting:

This kind of movie can be "effective" even when it is poorly done, because it hits below the belt. And to be violently teased simply isn't enough reason to go to a movie. It is not enough for the aim of a movie to be to "grab" you and hold your attention. It that is the only aim it attends even if it succeeds, because you resent the manipulation. I resent the assumption that we are so bored and corrupt that we will be pleased whenever we are not bored. Since I am not bored outside the theatre, why should I go in to see a movie whose only purpose is to keep me from being bored? ... I have been very harsh on this movie and perhaps this is overkill, but movies, along with the other arts, can open us up to complexities, and I don't think we should applaud this kind of infantile, primitive regression.

Faculty of Education
Queen's University
Kingston, Ontario

BACHELOR OF EDUCATION DEGREE

University graduates are invited to apply for admission to the eight-month program leading to the Bachelor of Education degree and Ontario teacher certification for elementary or secondary schools. Applicants must have an undergraduate degree or be eligible for graduation by September, 1973.

FEATURES

The Faculty of Education occupies a new academic-residential complex, Duncan McArthur Hall.

The Faculty of Education's forward-looking program, in line with current and emergent educational needs, emphasizes the human dimension in education. The students have many options in course selections where, consistent with the importance of personal and professional development, evaluations are based on continuous assessment, not term examinations alone.

The students participate fully in the administration and planning of the Faculty of Education.

Why wait for tomorrow?

If you think the Seminary is a place of study and meditation, you're right. But there is so much more.

As a Paulist you become involved from the start.

We were founded with the belief that each man has a place. Each man has a job. Sometimes, many jobs. And each contributes his own unique talents and is given the freedom and the support he needs to achieve his goals.

The Paulist is a man on the move. His mission is to people, particularly the people of North America. The issues and problems we face today—justice, poverty, peace, war—must be the concern of the Church.

Wherever the Paulist student serves the Christian Community—in a parish or an inner city school, a youth center or a campus, or in communications, he is concerned. Involved. Right now.

Artist fails with Getaway

It almost seems as if Sam Peckinpah has a built in self-destruct mechanism. He achieved a modest success with Ride the High Country in 1962, then followed with Major Dundee in 1965. In 1966 the New Yorker super-critic, Pauline Kael, called him "one of the most talented young directors in Hollywood," but the Hollywood establishment would have none of him and vice versa. His forceful character, foul language and abrasive behaviour (it is reported he threw one producer into a river) led him to be effectively barred from further work. In 1969 the producers of The Wild Bunch took a chance on Peckinpah and hired him on as director. The film achieved wide critical success (I personally think it is the best western since John Ford's Stagecoach), if only a moderate financial one. So once again he was established as one of Hollywood's bright stars. He was acknowledged as a true auteur and he followed with The Ballad of Cable Hogue, again a critical rather than financial success. In 1971 he completed Straw Dogs, which is, to date, his most financially successful film. It drew a lot of publicity for its scenes of violence and an ending that some people interpreted as fascist.

Seemingly Peckinpah had struck it big. His name drew top billing above Dustin Hoffman (remember those ads: a man with a deep, resonating voice saying, "Sam Peckinpah's Straw Dogs.... etc., etc.). He was interviewed, photographed, hated and hailed as America's very own film genius ad nauseum. Yet, surprisingly, his next film, Junior Bonner, passed through Toronto practically unnoticed. Now his latest, The Getaway, which opened amidst the Christmas rush, is bound for the same fate of instant obscurity. Steve McQueen's name is used as the drawing card, not Peckinpah's, and when talking to people about the film, it seems that Ali McGraw's atrocious bit of non-acting is what is remembered most, not that it is a Peckinpah film.

The turning point in Peckinpah's resurrection was Straw Dogs. He claimed that he was told to do the film but hated the script and considered only the ending to be decent material. This has always been an easy way out for directors who want nothing more to do with a finished film, but the Hollywood system being what it is, I tend to accept this explanation. The film in many ways was no more than a well-worn western theme transplanted to the Devon countryside. Had the story been set in the mythical west during some timeless period it wouldn't have caused half the furor it did. But set, as it was, in contemporary England with a theme that was imperfectly realized, it was immediately dubbed "controversial".

Such a billing is of course the ticket to a commercial success. Witness the rise of such directors as Ken Russell and Stanley Kubrick, both of whom have made "controversial" films, but never great ones. (Works of true genius, on the other hand, seem to be passed over just because they are brilliant. Everyone knows, even if they're only marginally interested in film, that Orson Welles is a film maker of true genius, yet I wonder how many people have seen or even know of A Touch of Evil as opposed to the number who praised Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange. Welles is now broke and can't get backing for his films while Kubrick makes his multi-million dollar "statements on contemporary society".)

After Straw Dogs, Peckinpah directed Junior Bonner, a beautiful, well-tempered film about a down-and-out rodeo cowboy who wants to make the one final big win. A typical Peckinpah film, — opposed to the atypical Straw Dogs — Bonner revolved around the theme of encroaching modernization on the old ways of the west. If sense is to be made of Peckinpah's whoring himself on such films as Straw Dogs, then it must be seen in the light of enabling him to make films like Bonner.

The Getaway also can be seen as a result of the huge popular and financial success of Straw Dogs. Fed up with all the questions about the "meaning" of Dogs and its scenes of violence, Peckinpah vowed to make a film with no message or "social significance". With The Getaway he has done what he said he would — a film with a gun, a guy and a girl, nothing more or less.

Steve McQueen plays an ex-con who, with the help of his girlfriend, Ali McGraw, and a couple of other hoods plan a bank robbery. The heist goes badly and McQueen is double crossed. With money in hand and McGraw in tow he is chased across southern Texas by the "mob" and the law. The chase culminates in a shabby border hotel with a bloody shoot out, McQueen blasting everyone in sight with a powerful shotgun. The film starts slowly, catches up during the heist and just after, falls off again during the endless chase, then moves will into the final shoot out.

The Getaway neither has the continuity of Bonner, nor the gripping power of The Wild Bunch, but it does have fine moments. In an attempt to elude the law, McQueen and McGraw hide in one of those huge garbage containers only to be lifted into a truck and subsequently spend the night buried under a couple of tons of garbage. In the morning the truck unloads its contents, and them, in a dump miles from anywhere. Miraculously they survive and spend the next few minutes contemplating their fate, sitting atop the pile of garbage. Images of Beckett and Godard come immediately to mind, but, understandably, what this scene comes closest to is another like it in The Wild Bunch.

The outlaws, having chosen sanctuary of a dead end Mexican village as their only refuge in a world that wants no more of them, decide to face the army of Mexican rebels and certain death rather than continue to live in the shit and garbage that are the only remains of their shattered dreams. Similarly, McQueen and McGraw, decide to stick it out together as the only means of survival. In Peckinpah's romantic world, the loner and outsider, shut upon by the rest of the world, would rather take his fate in his own hands and stick it out to the end rather than give up. In The Wild Bunch this works better because it's out as slightly corny because there is no unified whole.

The Getaway is a good film by any standards, its got lots of action and Steve McQueen, but Peckinpah, in his self-defeating manner, has substituted commercialism for art. There seems to be a pattern emerging in Peckinpah's work. He is alternating between quality and commercialism. Cable Hogue was excellent, then came Straw Dogs. Junior Bonner equalled Hogue, now it's The Getaway. His next film, if the pattern holds, should be worth the wait.

Poco, Raspberries, America: good stuff

The long-awaited album from Poco substantiates the notion that this country-rock, good-timing collection of pickers easily retain their position of authority atop the fast-growing ranks of country-flavoured rock groups. Latest result of Richie Furay's five man assault on the market first activated by the long extinct Buffalo Springfield is a gathering of nine balanced tunes, one of which is the title tune of the Poco release A Good Feelin' To Know.

It's been two albums now since Jimmy Messina departed for the companionship of Ken Loggins, but his replacement, Paul Cotton, has displayed that he fits in fine — three of the tunes are Paul's, and he's now tailored his style away from the harder rock of his alma mater group, the Illinois Speed Press, into for nostalgia's sake some of the songs included on Ridge Top capture the Youngblood magic of yesteryear. "Dreamboat" features J.C.'s voice as it should be, and a notable addition here is a closely orchestrated horn section working with the always solid Banana and the bunch. "Speedo" is an experimental number which goes for several minutes on voice mixes before the instruments are phased in. It rocks, as does the treatment of McCartney's "She Came In Through The Bathroom Window" by Banana.

Revivals are the large part of this collection, including Richie Valen's old mexi-rocker, "La Bamba" and the flip that classic single, "Donna". Also given the Youngblood's treatment are Dylan's "I Shall Be Released", the happier, easy-picking style of Poco. From Paul there's the toe-tapper "Keeper of the Fire", and "Ride the Country", one of the best cuts on the set. "Early Times" is a slower tune about a band whose right hand man "look to trippin'", with the expected result.

Raspberries.

Richie Furay puts out a trio of songs as well, with Tim Schmit checking in with two, plus there's a revival of the Stills-Springfield classic done up Poco fashion — "Go And Say Goodbye". A balance is achieved between the two more plaintive compositions from Tim Schmit, and the up-tempo pair from Richie — the title tune, and "And Settin' Down" (which Poco performed on the recent late-night TV pilot for ABC).

The news of the split-up of Jesse Colin Young from his namesake Youngbloods marks the end of one of those groups which never skyrocketed into the big time, but which commanded a cult-like following — particularly on the American West Coast, and in Boston where Jesse played the old Unicorn Club in the early years of the past decade. Youngblood fans have, by all indications, just two final albums awaiting their throbbing ears — the second last collection, High On A Ridge Top, has recently been released, with one more taping being held for what will likely be the last of the Youngbloods.

Internal problems associated with choice of material prompted Jesse C. to seek out a new set of musicians, abandoning Banana, Joe Bauer and Mike Kane; but as well as Johnny Preston's novelty vehicle "Running Bear" — all of which are treated straight, without any clowning, except for the narration by Jess in "Donna" which is reminiscent of the type of word play kibitzing of the Youngblood's stage act. Banana and the bunch will in all probability continue to record, and word has it that Jesse's already picked up three musicians (some of whom played on his Together album), so the prospects of a new Young-centred corporation of sound are favourable.

The album is titled Fables and it's by England Dan and John Ford Coley. Not exactly two names which set the music business afire, to be sure, but England Dan and John Ford Coley have one of the most tuneful, impeccable albums to be heard. Aided by some heavyweight studio talents such as pianist Larry Knechtel (of Bread), Jim Gordon on drums (who works with them all, from Presley to Cocker), as well as everybody's drummer Hal Blaine, Dan and John fill in with their own rhythm guitar backs, all the while slinging some very close harmony on nine of their own songs. "What I'm Doing", features a vocal mix faintly reminiscent of early Seals and Crofts, while "Simone" and "Casey" present first Dan and then John on lead vocal, displaying the individual voices which are blended throughout this extremely impressive, yet sadly obscure collection.

It's a bit paradoxical that album sales on the two America albums have perhaps been hempered by the selections chosen for introductions to the sound of the group on AM radio markets. Listeners to either America or their latest, Homecoming, realize that "Horse With No Name" and "Venture Highway" are certainly not the premier cuts on either collection. Homecoming is perhaps typified by the circular repetition of the melody line of "To Each His Own", with its slight connections with "I Need You" from album one. Some of America's compositions manage to call up memories of portions of Neil Young's work — on such tunes as "Moon Song", or even "Only In Your Heart" there is a faint touch of the Neil Young mood on his Harvest album.

The soft opening on "Till The Sun Comes Up Again" builds into a soft-rocker which intros an entire side of the sound that America has developed, incorporating that rich acoustic guitar flow laid on electric guitar, and occasionally some electric piano. One significant change on this second LP from the first America release is that whereas on it all songs except "A Horse With No Name" were recorded at Trident Studios in London, England, Homecoming is a Californian product with perennial studio edjuncts Hal Blaine and Joe Osborne sitting in on drums and bass respectively. As usual, all guitars are handled by the three members of America — Dan Peek, Gerry Beckley, and Dewey Bunnell.

It's hard to imagine a group like Bread becoming any better than they are. But to look back one album to their Baby I'm A Want You release, they added as full-time member one of the most truly versatile of all studio musicians in the business. The advent of Larry Knechtel taking on the Bread-wrappers, so to speak, meant that this group had surely arrived. Now, the latest album Guitar Man, incorporates the Knechtel sound into that of the former dynamic trio of David Gates, James Griffin and Mike Botts. The new gathering of twelve Bread offerings, including two hits — "Guitar Man" and "Sweet Surrender" — is a perfect blend of tempo-pacing and hard and soft rock sounds as were prevalent on the previous four Bread albums. If anything, however, Bread is at its best in the softer rock disciplines of the title tune, or the beautiful "Aubrey" or "Didn't Even Know Her Name", with that high baritone that David Gates utilized on "If" and "It Don't Matter To Me". This is a well-paced, creative, and meticulously produced album, and it may just be the right combination that vaults Bread out of the soft-rock underground status into tulle, and deserved recognition at long last.

Cleveland Ohio, that mid-American urban bastion, has never actually been identified as the rock music centre of North America — but, it the recent emanations of a musical nature from that hub continue to evolve. Cleveland may just be the North American Liverpool, disguised and reclining in its halcyon days before the big shock. From Cleveland has come the group named Raspberries, and in case the name doesn't jolt you, think back about three or four months to that AM Radio goodie that had that haunting presence commonly called the Early Beatle Sound — Raspberries hit it big with "Go All The Way", (complete with oo-oo's, and a bridge styled on the "Please Please Me" classic from 1964), which was tucked away on their first Capitol LP called, strangely enough, Raspberries.

Now, with a new set of ten songs, one of which has been culled for constant air-play (I Wanna Be With You), Raspberries latest release is titled Fresh. Despite derogatory claimants that their sound is reminiscent of the Fab Four, there are certainly many other groups to whom it would be far more injurious to be compared. Fresh is just that — a fresh, inventive selection of sixties style Beatle-oriented rock and roll which is more than redeemed by the infectious arrangements which are predicated on some excellent vocal harmonies and blends.

Maggie hams up as "Aunt"

Travels with My Aunt is one of those life-is-a-banquet-and-most-poor-sons-of-bitches-are-startling stories. Such movies are justly popular bits of escapism as well as marvellous showpieces for veteran actresses to sashay through. When I heard that Maggie Smith would play the lead in this film of Graham Greene's book, I expected a superior, offbeat comedy, an Auntie Mame with reel style. Ever since Hot Millions, I've thought Smith was terrific; the last thing I expected was that she would ruin Travels with my Aunt.

Travels satisfies the requirements of the genre. Alex McCowan plays the poor, life-starved schnook — a bachelor whose passion is cultivating dahlies — who meets up with his black-sheep-aunt Augusta at his mother's funeral. Within hours, needless to say, his life is turned topsy-turvy, what with loose sex, grass-puffing, foreign intrigue, and the discovery that he is a besterd (literally). George Cukor, whose last film was My Fair Lady, directed, so the extravagant plot is propped up with terribly chic sets and what the writers take to be terribly arch dialogue. All in all, I suppose, this is a reasonably entertaining movie, though everything about it is second-rate.

Aunt Augusta's old age, for instance, consists of a henne rinse through her hair and a set of permanent-press wrinkles. She speaks constantly as though her lips were starched. The make-up artists and set designers seem to have been assigned to tell us such facts as "this is a vain old woman" end "this is a posh hotel".

Maggie Smith is allowed to overact outrageously. Granted, the part is not one for subtleties — a 70 year old former courtesan and Modigliani model who keeps a black man around to "supply her wants". Now, this is a frivolous eccentric created for maximum splash, and so lacks any ballast, any groundings in reality, that might give Smith some clues as to how to play her. Miss Jean Brodie, another madcap, was a psychologically detailed character whose eccentricities covered very specific weaknesses.

There are, in fact, whole stretches of this movie when I wondered if I had strolled into "Mother of Miss Brodie" or some other attempt at a sequel. The speech cadences, the worldly put-downs, even the tearful reveries — all are lifted wholesale from Smith's Oscar-winning role. It's understandable that Smith, at first, would want to stick to a winning combination. But it's a mystery why an old hand like Cukor let Maggie Smith get away with this hamming.

Neil Young reaches bottom

A hengu with customs that resulted in Neil Young's Monday evening concert starting an hour and a half late was the beginning of an oft-night for the return of Scott Young's son to Toronto.

The concert opened with Young alone on stage accompanying himself first on eccoustic guitar and then on piano. The tunes delivered were a mixture of old and new, including On The Wey Home, "Tell Me Why", "Journey Through The Past" and a 1968 song called "L.A."

The most consistent feature of the performance was Young's inconsistency. At regular intervals he would cloud a seemingly fine effort with sloppy guitar work or vocals, being particularly careless on his instrumental introductions. The first half of the program was reasonably balanced at a tolerable volume with Neil's voice booming clearly across the Grdens. But the later rock portion was sustained at a dealening level that encouraged Young to overcome his accompaniment by screaming out of tune. It was one of the worst shows of any major star in Toronto in the las few months.

There was a continual feeling of laziness exhibited by Young in reaching for the higher notes (which resulted in their being broken or flat) or articulating the ends or words to save breath. "Southern Man" proved to be a painful conclusion to the show. Young's guitar playing was empty and mechanical and the singing (lead end background) was blatantly out of tune and uncontrolled.

Neil Young just isn't a visual showman. He needs the intimacy and acoustics of Massey Hall, not the vastness of the Grdens. So if you missed Neil Young this time because you couldn't get the tickets, time or money, don't feel bad, because you didn't miss anything.

Alan Mandell

Violin outdoes piano at Town Hall

Irreproachably programmed concert disappoints

I have to retrace my critical steps here a bit, because I have elsewhere sneezed at the relatively spiceless programming of some recent concerts. For the Faculty of Music's Sunday Scholarship concert, as I confess is always the case, was irreproachably programmed: Franck's quintet in F minor and Dvorak's opus 81 A major quintet. The first is a demonic thing, condensing lifetimes of Byronic energy into forty minutes, and leaving you and your senses emotionally spent. The latter is a catchy fluid piece, with not quite enough of anything, coming after the Franck.

Pierre Souvairan on piano played with honesty and lots of involvement. Unfortunately, I did not hear him all the time because the quartet rather played on their own — after all, they're sitting in front of the piano. I say this tongue in cheek, of course. Generally I was pleased with the dynamic level of the quartet — David Zafer and Victor Martin, violins, Kathy Wunder, viola and Vladimir Orloff, cello. I think the tumultuous emotional level of the Franck demanded plenty of bitter attack. At the same time, Souvairan was very well-paced and runs came off as impeccable ripples. I still wonder how the problem of dynamic balance between the two "Instrumental colours" might have been solved without sacrificing either the passion of the strings or Souvairan's gentle and precise phrasing.

Victor Martin allowed his violin a strong singing tone, while David Zafer was generally unimpressive, especially when he took over the lead from Martin for the Dvorak. He looked bored, his tone was boring and I suppose he wished he wasn't missing the Superbowl.

Kathy Wund, a first-rate scholarship student, was splendid on her viola. The Franck calls for much chordal lashing of the viola, and she proved her strength here. She played with confidence and got what anyone would want from her instrument — a rich, swelling tone.

Dvorak, perhaps because he was partial to the cello, gave the lion's share of the string portion to this instrument, and both it and the piano begin lyrically the first movement. Vladimir Orloff guided his instrument with sternness and mature tone through the whole piece.

Both quintets set the instruments on their own individual ways, and so balance can be a difficulty. But everyone seemed to know where the other was going, so their paths crossed at just the right moments, and they saw each other off accurately and with professional ease. This was especially noticeable and delightful in the Franck, first movement, when the piano lyrically re-works the matter the strings have passionately torn limb from limb.

This is the kind of concert I like most of all: one that tells an exciting and meaningful story in a keen voice and eloquent style.

It has been voiced before, but the St. Lawrence Centre's "Young Canadian Performer's" Second concert last Friday is reason enough to reiterate the dissatisfaction with much programming of current local concerts. Beethoven's sonata for violin and piano in C minor, the first work, was a fine choice because it is Beethoven, not often played and suitable for a duo, such as that of Andrew Dawes, violinist, and Jean-Paul Sevilla, pianist, and performers for the evening. Robert Schumann's piano sonata, as Chopin's preludes or Schubert's sonatas, has a relatively select and content following, but because I am not part of it, I was indifferent to the programming of the early G. minor. Murray Adaskin's sonatine baroque for solo violin is eloquent and brief — which means so, unfortunately, was our enjoyment of the only unaccompanied piece Andrew Dawes performed. Maurice Ravel's sonatine for solo piano is spiritless, trashy and brief. On the other hand, his sonate pour violin et piano is a wealth of interesting violinistic effects and rhythmic tricks. It is important Ravel, but on the larger historical canvas, a tableau of technical but marginal significance.

That's not an awful program, but it left me with a hankering after something more central and imposing. Andrew Dawes played so beautifully, I wish (as with Adele Armin last season) he had chosen a Bach unaccompanied sonata or partita. These six monoliths, as grandiosely sculpted as anything Bach wrote, are at once the test of, and stunt arena for, a great violinist.

But to take them as they were played, the Beethoven came off spectacularly. Andrew Dawes has his bow so well-trained that its tone melts from the harshest, fiercest growl to a lambent intimacy with the ease of a volume control. And Ludwig is generous to talent of this level in his ripping finale.

Jean-Paul Sevilla is a modest virtuoso as he showed in the Beethoven, and except for an ounce or two of over-peddaling, offered fine accompaniment. He was obviously diligent and even stylish with the Schumann, but the piece escapes me, as does the Ravel sonatine, also finely played, so I don't feel encouraged to do anything but apologize to enthusiasts for my curtness towards these works and the renditions they received.

In the final Ravel sonata, for violin and piano, Andrew Dawes again played the sun after a dismal and dull drizzle, (i.e. the Ravel sonatine). Nippy pizzicati and nervous latching of the strings were impeccably bowed. The truncated and clambering rhythms, especially the "Blues" second movement, saw maintained the accuracy of their written-in drunkenness, thanks to great ensemble work. These two musicians obviously complement one another very well.

So, all in all, mediocre fare served in Ritz-Carlton fashion.

Machiavelli's play "Mandrake" dies in Colonnade production

The mandrake is a very strange hermaphroditic plant credited with the powers of an aphrodisiac or of death-dealing. It is said to utter a human shriek when pulled out of the earth. The Mandrake is also the title of a Machiavelli play currently in production at the Colonnade Theatre.

With such an aura surrounding it, the play, considered one of the greatest works of the Italian Renaissance, has the potential for equal measures of eroticism and degeneracy. But weighted down by the playwright's opportunistic expectation of man, it is a joyless comedy dealing with a far-fetched plot to seduce the virtuous young wife of an aging lawyer, Messer Nicia. Demonstrating Machiavelli's preoccupation with corruption, both secular and religious, mother, priest, false doctor, lover and husband all conspire to bring about the seduction. Against such odds virtue naturally wilts and joins the unregenerate.

The conclusion is long foreseen, the characterizations are studied and confined (as is the staging) and the comedy bolstered by false spirit. It is however what could be called an adequate production and gives us a glimpse of yet another seldom seen "classic". Although this presentation does not develop either a sinister or decadent, a ribald or mirthful atmosphere to any extent, it has a few cagey moments and tells the story with brevity and occasional bravado.

Lowell Jones exhibits his paintings at Hart House

Lowell Jones is a young American artist who last year set up a lithography workshop with some Eskimos in Cape Dorsett, Baffin Island, in the North West Territories. He is now exhibiting some of his paintings, lithographs and drawings at Hart House. It is hard to see how his subjects might interest even the most technologized Eskimos, except for the more abstract and lyrical drawings and prints. The most fanciful paintings are lightly toned with spray paint in a somewhat Cubist fashion, but they are by no means abstracts. The predominating figure, re-positioned and blown up in a different shape from picture to picture, is a fleshly female from the forties, presiding over, diving into, playing around with or doing something in, amidst, or over, of all things, a cow herd. It is really quite cleverly done, and in one style of today's op — perverse but homely. Its style is its amusing content, so if you like line and amorphous abstraction, you'll want to turn to the fewer-tone prints and drawings, which are not exactly establishing any new frontiers, but are very good nonetheless. I did not get a chance to ask Jones about his technique in these drawings or prints but it looks as if his methods are varied and meticulous.

theatre

The third and final production of the season of the Graduate Centre for the Study of Drama opens at Hart House Theatre this Thursday. Hamlet, directed by Martin Hunter, will run for eight evenings until February 3, with no performance January 28 and 29.

If you haven't managed to see Hey Rube at Toronto Workshop Productions, tonight and tomorrow night will be your last chance for a long time. It was first produced in 1961, and played again in 1967 with even more success. It is a brilliantly entertaining show. Humour and pathos are partners in the well-paced sequences portraying the on-stage and off-stage tribulations of a dying circus troupe. In the beginning I was wary of clichés about those grand people in show business; in fact, I was quite prepared to be irritated. Hey Rube swept me along all the same with its colour and confusion. As for the performances, sometimes I felt there was too much theatrical yelling. In general, though, the whole production is so well balanced that certain less inspiring moments are absorbed and easily forgiven.

Come and find out about Survival Theatre at the UC Playhouse. It is based on the premise that the performer has the freedom to act as he pleases in the theatre. The audience may come and go as it wishes. The group which has been working on this concept of theatre invites you to come to their rehearsals (for lack of a better word; they are not shows) around 8 pm January 19, 21, 23, 25, 26, 27 or the afternoon of the 21st or 27th.

Two Gentlemen of Verona opens at the O'keefe Centre Saturday night. The award-winning Shakespearean musical has its musical score composed by Galt McDermott (Heir). Student matinees are half-price.

Prices are not so reasonable for Henry IV by Luigi Pirandello. Rex Harrison is the Royal Alexandra Theatre's crowd-drawer this time. Pirandello is a modern Italian playwright who was tortured by life's intermingling of fantasy and reality. He is rarely performed in Toronto, a pity considering the relevance of his works.

"The Soul can be watered so that it will grow divinely — free from the thorns of lust."

This is the message of a book which, according to its own introduction, was dictated by Almighty God to Eugene Changey. Changey, who identifies himself as God's son, explains the process, which produced the book, From Thy Creator: with Love, as follows: "I try to keep my mind a total blank. My Father's Voice is heard above a void. My Father speaks very rapidly. I write His Holy Words as fast as I can. Thus we have a new concept in the publication of this Holy Book."

A dedication seems to provide a clue as to why the book appeared mysteriously and possibly miraculously on L'Hebdo's review table: "As Almighty GOD, I dedicate this Holy Book to the Editors and Publishers in the newspaper industry."

In a biographical sketch on the back cover, Mr. Changey is identified as "a bachelor all his life" who "with a mere Junior High School education... has a Master's Degree in learning from Letters and Books dictated to him by his Father, Almighty GOD." No further information is provided about the other Author, nor is it made clear why Mr. Changey and Mr. God have different surnames.

However, the book itself contains more information from Mr. God about his son Eugene, who evidently functions as His secretary as well: "Man... must have the companionship of a Savior (sic). That Savior (sic) is My Son, Eugene, in whom I Am well pleased. My blessed Son, Eugene, is really Jesus. Though he says does not want the responsibility, he will believe Me when he has left his earthly domain." (p.14)

While the book, despite Mr. Changey's Master's Degree, suffers from numerous grammatical errors, it does contain interesting passages. Beginning with a statement that "As Almighty GOD, I welcome you to Our latest Book", it continues with philosophical observations and advice, some evidently for the general public, but some seemingly only for Mr. Changey. Thus, statements such as "The Grace of Love is not denied fruitlessness, if it is endangered by the Hope of selfishness" and "Holiness is next to cleanliness and a sinner shall not go unpunished" are clearly of wider interest. But, they are interspersed with advice to Mr. Changey such as "Honesty is the best policy, Son" (cf. Lord Chesterfield, Letters to his Son). (This evident reprimand, incidentally, is more than made up by the fact that Mr. Changey's degree is awarded in the course of this book: "A Master's Degree in learning is yours, My Son." (p. 18).)

Nevertheless, the overall quality of the book is somewhat uneven. (This may be attributable to Mr. Changey's work; a previous book by Mr. God, The Bible, dictated to a committee of prophets, was much better-written. Mr. God himself writes only in Hebrew, although he speaks other languages.) Is it possible that the shortcomings Mr. Changey displays could be attributable to problems which seem to be hinted at in a rather cryptic piece of advice from his father: "The Soul is want for gain but the ardor of romance dulls a keen-witted brain"?

music

Festival of Hita - Mahler (DGG 2538 188.) Mahler's loneliness, his isolation and his spaciousness are admirably captured in this sampler. In his Symphony Number 1 there is a heritage of folk melodies as in Beethoven's Sixth. In his Fifth and Eighth there is a breakdown of the normal partitions of a symphony as well as passionate contrasts in the best Romantic tradition. To initiate a listener to Mahler, this is a very satisfactory disc.

Festival of Hita - Brahma (DGG 2538 189.) Although he is considered to be a very serious composer, Brahms did have a lighter side — witness the Academic Festival Overture composed of German beer-hall drinking songs. Here also are the Intermezzo in A Major, The Ballade in G minor, String Quartet no. 2 and the Serenade for Orchestra no. 2; unfortunately, this disc was marred by several annoying blips on the second side — an occurrence rare with DGG records. A worthwhile investment nevertheless.

Everything seemed to happen last week and caught me rather unprepared — two important quartets went unannounced. Verdi's important opera Falstaff is to be presented by the Opera Department here on January 24, 26, 27 and 29. It looks as if the last three dates are your best bet, and Monday the 29th, your bestest. Student tickets are $1.50. On January 25 there is a 2:10 lecture by Rudolph Bing, past General Manager of the Metropolitan Opera, New York. The title is "Opera in the United States". No tickets, no charge, in the concert hall. There are two student recitals on Tuesday, at 5:15 and 8:15 — no tickets, no charge, but confirm on the day. Deborah Taylor, soprano and Maurice Pelletier, violin, are the two performers. Another student recital is on Friday, Mary Halpenny, cello and Hilary Everett, piano.

The recent Jacqueline du Pré Toronto Symphony Concert is on CBL-FM this Sunday at 2:03 pm. Furtwangler's Dia Walkure (Act III) and Siegfried (Act I) of the Radio Italiana is on Opera Theatre at 7 pm Sunday. Judy Loman performs in a CBC Radio Celebrity Recital on February 1 at 8:03. On Wednesday January 31 Maurice Bejart, founder of the Ballet of the Twentieth Century, presents his Messa pour la Tamps Present, at 9:30 pm on channel 5 (cable 6) CBC.

Pauline Kael (this is her fourth mention in today's hebdo) called Straw Dogs the first fascist work of art. I can't quarrel about its fascism, but I haven't an inkling why so many people respect it like they do. It's the story of a mathematician who finds his manhood by killing a gang of working-class nasties, and of his wife who gets what she deserves, and wanted all along. Life according to Sam Peckinpah. Somewhat sanguine. At St. Mike's tonight and tomorrow, $1.

Also tonight, La Vraie Nature de Bernadette, the highly regarded Quebec film, opens at Cinematuliere. Monday at the Roxy, it's Eisenstein and Prokofiev's classic Alexandre Nevsky, 99c.

For lovers of MGM musicals of the early fifties, Seven Brides for Seven Brothers shows at the Science Centre, Wednesday at 8. Saul Chaplin, music director at MGM during that period will be there to discuss it.

There may be other good things showing at the Revue or the Kensington, but they haven't sent us their lists, so to Hell with them.

Next week, by the way, Max Ophul's great documentary about life in occupied France, The Sorrow and the Pity will be screened twice at the Science Centre, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings at 7:30. Definitely worth the 4½ hours.

CONTEST: Our first two contests averaged four entries each. Then the complimentary tickets donated by Famous Players turned out to have a 50¢ per person "service" charge, which sounds to me like an outright rip-off. To Hell with them.

None of the three entries guessed the true nature of art, although Marie-Lynn Hammond deserves honorable mention for "Art is when you hear things in Chinese restaurants and such like and put 'em in reviews and such like, like they were your very own." However, she was disqualified for beginning a definition with when. Of the remaining two entries, one was too serious and the other was lost. A settlement concerning the latter will be made privately when it is found.

This is a relatively sparse weekend for good live music. One of the better possibilities is the Perth County Conspiracy concert at convocation Hall tonight at 8:30 pm. Tickets for this benefit to raise money for their lighting man in jail in Morocco, are $2 or $2.50 available at SAC or at the door. Perth County last gave a concert in Convocation Hall almost exactly one year ago. If you don't want to jeopardize the use of the hall in the future, it is strongly recommended that you don't light matches during the performance.

Bluesman Buddy Guy and his band are in town at the Le Coq d'Or on Yonge Street. Cover charge is $1.50 and beer is $3.10 a mug. Guy is one of the best blues guitarists around and shouldn't be missed if you have the cash to sustain yourself on "the strip".

Fingerwood will be playing at the Meet Market, downstairs from the Colonial, this and the following two weeks.

art

At Erindale College is an exhibit of illuminated Manuscripts from the fifteenth century. The big attraction is the famed Book of Hours of Jaan, Duke of Berry, a beautiful paradigm of the late Gothic style. This is until January 26. Also at Erindale until February 10 is Tom Lapierre's surrealist paintings. At the Art Gallery of Ontario the planned exhibit of Toys by Artista is cancelled.

"And now, Jack... is back," shrilled Peggy Cass. And, so was launched the most heralded comeback in television history. You'd think Shakespeare's ghost had returned to dramaturgy, the way the entertainment writers were trumpeting the news: After an eight year absence, Jack Paar had returned to kick off ABC's latest nighttime venture.

Trouble is, the press has a shrewd eye for how things will go, but they tend to confuse prognosis with criticism. The prognosis on this one is that, discounting Paar's severe one-week-a-month handicap, Paar will out-draw Carson. The king is dead, long live the king.

They're probably right. Dick Cavett once called Paar the most fascinating man on television. When the original Tonight show was on, back in the early 60's my father wouldn't miss Paar, while my mother couldn't stand the man. The mark of a hot property is that the engenders extreme reactions.

I looked forward to Paar's second debut. Last time around, I wasn't big on chatter in the wee small hours, but I remembered a couple of Paar's shows as just about the only interesting thing on television back then.

Things have changed. Watching Paar last week was like being at a party where one person has had much too much to drink and is making a fool of himself. You squirm with embarrassment.

A large part of that first show centred around Paar's constant remarks about how small Goldie Hawn's breasts were. Then, there were home movies. Granted, his home movies are better than mine or maybe even yours, but still.

Wednesday, Paar wheeled out a Broadway starlet who stood at his side giggling while he conducted a five-minute monologue on the enormity of her breasts. "You don't need a brassiere, you need a cargo net."

It's as if the last decade never happened. I couldn't believe that this poor woman was standing there, pathetically grateful to be ogled like something in a sideshow.

But this, it seems, is Paar's secret. He is going to pretend that the 60's never happened. All week, those old faces with old names from the old show flashed on our screen: Jonathan Winters, Genieve, Mimi Hines (a cabaret singer who does Bugs Bunny imitations). Films of young Jack Kennedy. Jokes about long-haired men and big bosoms ("or is it bazooms?").

They were cozy times, then, when Paar used to get moody and raunchy and often brilliant in our living rooms. If that's Paar's tack, taking us back to the golden age, put my money on him. His desultory, heart-on-his-sleeve shows have that odd, cozy kind of appeal. If the talk shows were in prime-time, I think the ratings would be significantly different. But, Paar fits into those sleepy, quiet hours in a way that the gelid, intellectual Cavett, or Carson, with his high-voltage hijinx, just don't. Paar can be an appalling man, yes, but he has an uncanny feel for his hour and his audience.

Section I interfac basketball upsets

In interfaculty basketball action this week, three underdog teams staged two upsets and one "near" upset. Employing zone presses of varying descriptions (usually a 3-1-1), the usual toll of favoured teams was taken.

Early Tuesday evening New College seemed to be whistling in the dark about its impending game with the taller, more talented Sr Eng team. However, aided by its own hustle and some questionable substituting by the engineers, New broke to a 21-9 lead and was content to play Sr Eng even from there on in.

For New, Marc Sheerkin, possessing a green light to shoot any time he had the ball, scored 20 points. The other two members of New's "iron horse" triumvirate — Wolski and Mendelsohn — scored 13 and 12, respectively. Ron Gratz led the plodding Engineering attack with 12 points.

Winless before Christmas, New has come on to sweep UC off the floor (81-46), and lose a close game to SGS (70-69) since the beginning of winter term. With the playoffs a mirage for New (only four teams from each of Division IA and IB make the playoffs), look for New to surprise several teams over the remainder of the schedule.

The biggest upset of the three games almost occurred Wednesday when St. Mike's, first in Division IA, played PHE B, tied for fourth spot with SCS in Division IB.

Down by seven points at halftime, PHE B's press and hustle suddenly changed the game around so that with one minute left to play the score was tied 69-69. SMC's Larry Trafford, a refugee from Varsity Blues, then went on to score a basket, steal a pass, and set up another two points to ensure a St. Mike's victory.

Trafford led all St. Mike's scorers with 16 points, while Tom O'Conner and Mark Dziemianczuk added 12 each. For the PHE B squad, it was Cor Doret with 21, Rick Ward with 12, and Gary Boguski with 11. (Boguski shed his referee's sweater to don the PHE colours and lead the charge.)

A second game Wednesday saw Law overturned by Erindale.

Although the hallmark of Law's success in their championship last season was its coolness under pressure, Erindale succeeded in scrambling the team up in overtime.

Law, at the moment out of the playoff picture (the team is currently fifth), ran up a 37-20 halftime lead only to succumb to Erindale in overtime. Erin's pressure defense turned the usually efficient lawyers inside out as they completely took charge of the game.

The Erindale tandem of Alex Naskrosius with 29 points and Wally Feasby (17) spearheaded Erindale's attack. Replaying for Law, Allan Sternberg, playing on one good leg, scored 33 points, while Rick Pirie contributed 11.

Volleyball Blues will likely finish out of a playoff spot unless the team comes through with a surprising day tomorrow at the Ryerson tournament. Blues were defeated by York University last weekend in a tournament at York, 15-6 and 15-11.

Blues won 5-4 in the epee match and 6-3 in the sabre meet. Varsity fencers will compete tomorrow and Sunday in an invitational meet at York... women's senior basketball team defeated Waterloo 51-36 in an exhibition match last Friday night. Chris Crawford scored 13 points, while Terry Knight added 19, and rookie Karen Edgar, 9... basketball Blues (finally) won one of their exhibition games — against Brock Wednesday in St. Catharines, 75-65. Scoring for Blues were Dave Watt (21), Brian Skyvington (11), Randy Filinski (8), Tony Rudmick (8), Avo Albo (8), and Doug Baker (2)... Changes are likely for Spadina Boundary changes proposed for Spadina federal riding will probably reinforce Liberal strength in the riding and move the NDP into a strong second spot.

Under the proposed redistribution of electoral boundaries, Spadina's northern boundary will be extended to include the Annex area north of Bloor Street.

St. Paul's riding, which used to include the Annex, would be moved north to include parts of the present Eglinton riding, which is disappearing.

Conservative Ron Atkey, who upset Liberal Ian Wahn in St. Paul's last year, believes the changes will convert the riding into a Conservative stronghold rather than a marginal riding.

Public hearings will take place on the recommendations of the independent commission which drew up the proposals but no changes to them are expected especially since none of the three major parties is dissatisfied with the suggested riding boundaries. The redistributed boundaries would not take effect until late this year.

The new map may look like this.

Spadina presently runs north to Bloor, and west from Yonge Street to Grace north of College and Dovercourt south of College. The new boundaries would take it north to the CPR tracks above Dupont, and west to Dufferin below Queen, and to Grace and Gore Vale above Queen.

The Annex area is heavy Liberal territory, with Ian Wahn getting 43 per cent of the vote there in last October's federal election, even though he lost to Atkey. The NDP also received a substantial vote in the Annex, even though they put on a minimal campaign. Bob Beardsley, last year's Spadina NDP candidate, says a good campaign in the new Spadina riding could make it a winnable riding for his party.

Conservative Paul Hellyer's Trinity riding is another one to disappear in the redistribution, and it is uncertain which riding he will move to. The absorption of the Annex area into Spadina seems to all but eliminate the possibility of a Conservative win there.

The Toronto public hearing on the redistribution proposals will take place on February 5 at Court No. 2, Federal Court of Canada, 330 University Avenue.

Prize set up for excellent teaching

The establishment of awards for excellence in university teaching has been greeted with enthusiasm by the chairman of the U of T Faculty Association.

Professor S.M. Uzumeri says that until now teaching skill has been passed over in favour of research skill, and that the awards, set up by the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations, will be "a positive influence" in encouraging excellence in teaching. The awards, about 20 per year, will have no monetary value, but it is hoped that they will have a prestige value which will be an influence in hiring and promotions.

Both students and professors will participate in the choice of the recipients of the citations, who will include, as well as individual teachers, groups of professors who have developed effective new curricula.

Negative effects of Olympics revealed

All that Glitters is not Gold: The Olympic Game

by William O. Johnson, Jr.,
G.P. Putnam's Sons,
Encyclopedia of the Olympic Games,
by Erich Kamper,
McGraw-Hill,
$25.00

In the year of the Munich Olympic Games, it was inevitable that this quadriennial orgy of sport would inspire a number of books dealing with these, the XXth Olympiad of the modern era, and with the Olympics in general. After all, an obscure obsession of a rather romantically eccentric French baron has exploded in the space of 75 years into a gigantic sporting extravaganza involving thousands of participants from almost every country in the world, and watched by hundreds of millions of television spectators in a world-wide hook-up.

Baron Pierre de Coubertin, the founder of the modern Olympics, had the quaint idea that a regular festival of sport of the type held by the ancient Greeks was an ideal means of promoting international friendship and understanding, as well as allowing the best sportsmen in the world to achieve their greatest heights through spirited competition. It does not require a great deal of insight to discover that by 1972 what was originally conceived as a noble contest of skill and endurance in quest of international harmony has become an enormously expensive business enterprise that frequently acts as the vehicle for personal and national aggrandisement.

The Baron's idea of participation for its own sake has been perverted to win at any cost for oneself or one's country. Each country defies its winners and ignores its losers. Journalists and television commentators lionize the narrow-minded concern of the champion who has dedicated himself from childhood to win, win, win.

Parents are praised for "creating" Olympic champions by inspiring and supporting this approach and shielding the prospective champions from "outside distractions" such as living, learning, relating to people. Instead of "The main spirit of the olympics is to participate" the prevailing motto is more likely to be that of U.S. pole vaulter Bob Seagren, who pointed out in an interview in Munich, after coming second to an East German, that the silver medal was the same as nothing at all.

Johnson critically evaluates the games, carefully pointing to the numerous examples of self-seeking, corruption, bad-sportsmanship, and nationalistic ballyhoo they tend to predominate. He notes that despite the "official" line which holds that the athletes are participating as individuals, there are always "unofficial" points-tables published ranking each country's performances and interpreted by each nation's journalists in a way that will best promote national glorification of that country's results. Since the U.S.S.R. entered the Olympics after World War II, its competition with the U.S. to win the Olympics by amassing the largest number of medals and placings has been closely observed, commented on, and evaluated by the press and sporting bodies in both countries.

Johnson also justifiably mocks the idea that the Olympics are for amateur participants only. Except in a few of the more obscure sports, in order to win a gold medal an individual must dedicate himself obsessively to training for many years, spending many hours every day in a rigid, premeditated program devoted solely to eventually producing a winning performance at the games. These people are professional in the sense that the sport plays the major role in their lives, and their job or "study" is merely incidental, allowing them to qualify as true-blue "amateurs." Also, because of the national pride and honour involved, most governments are eager to promote and subsidize athletes through scholarships, training programs and trips abroad.

Many Olympic champions are aware that their leats and the subsequent idolization and publicity can be skillfully translated into financial or even political gains. The latter two-thirds of Johnson's book consists of a series of short portraits of outstanding Olympic champions of the modern era, tracing their lives subsequent to their Olympic victories. Many are faced with psychological problems as a result of traits as obsessive ruthlessness, aggression, chauvinism, and success as the only measure of one's worth.

Another chapter examines the membership of the International Olympic Committee, which is probably correctly characterized as the "Bluest-Blooded Club" in the world. Almost all the members are independently wealthy, socially prominent (frequently of royal blood), citizens whose perceptions of life are inevitably effected by their own distinctively luxurious backgrounds so that their understanding of the motivations of the average athlete from a working-class background or the political use of sport in both internal and international affairs of some governments are generally totally naive and unrealistic. There has been a history of the IOC tacitly using the principle of sport being above politics to support abhorrent political regimes. The case of the two American Jewish sprinters being left off the U.S. relay team in Berlin is a case in point.

would be proud. Kamper presents a faithful record of every Olympic event held at the modern Olympic Games between 1896 and 1968, listing the first six place-getters, the time or distance, country, and in addition, the number of competitors in the event, number of countries and the date on which the competition was held. In team events every team members' name is listed.

This gargantuan feat of dedicated scholarship took Mr. Kamper nearly forty years and so emerges as almost a life's work. The extent of his labours is demonstrated in the bibliography which lists hundreds of official reports and publications from twenty-six countries. The text is studded with 678 footnotes which comment on any kind of irregularity, to the length of informing the reader when some contestant's name has been spelt wrongly in the official programme.

The entire book is printed side-by-side in three languages — German, French and English. This can be a little confusing to achieving their greatest moments so early in life, and thus their subsequent existence appears to them to be all downhill. Others use their victories cynically to make business contacts, obtain preferred jobs, meet important people, or receive support for public office.

One of the best chapters of the book is devoted to the career of the great American sprinter Jesse Owens, who discovered that despite his being the toast of the world after the 1936 Berlin Olympics, he was unable to eat his three gold medals. He found, however, that people were prepared to pay him for speaking to sporting clubs, youth organizations, fraternal orders, and the like, casting him in the role of a "professional good example".

Thus he has made a career of mouthing, to all who pay to listen, the idealistic phrases of the Olympic movement, praising the Ideals of sportsmanship, brotherhood, dedication, and hard work, while his own experience and observations on the direction of competitive sport in the U.S. would inevitably lead him to conclude that sport is being used to socialize young people with such Johnson's biting critique is a refreshing alternative to the usually trite, mealy-mouthed glorifications of everything sporting that are perpetuated by the sycophantic sporting journalists of the media. Certainly the Olympic Games are still a dazzling spectacle with fine performances by excellent athletes who are frequently also excellent sportsmen in the best sense of the word.

However, a great amount of demythologizing of sport and sporting heroes is necessary, particularly since sports commentators, politicians, and many others are able to profit personally from the "sports industry" who seek to use the mythology of sport to encourage individual and national aggrandisement, and also to somehow use sporting success as an analogy for success in life. This latter use has a tendency to perpetuate other more dangerous and often socially regressive myths.

On the contrary, the book by Kamper does not concern itself with either a glorification or criticism of the Olympic ideal. It is a book of facts of the purest kind, written with the type of academic objectivity of which a dedicated physicist the English reader since the alphabetical order is taken from the German, as are many of the abbreviations. In addition to lists of the results, event by event (including sports and events no longer in the Olympics), there are tabulations of such variables as which nations participated in each event at each Games, a list of the greatest medal winners — individually and by country — and many other incredible statistics painstakingly compiled by Kamper.

Why anyone would want to write such a book may be a legitimate question but appears rather impudent in the face of the enormity of the task, the duration of the research and the dogged determination of the author to leave no stone unturned. One must remain humble before the deed and point out that it is undeniably the most complete work written on the outcome of events at the modern Olympics. For anyone to whom having such facts at their fingertips is vital, this book is the definitive work. However, one must feel sorry for Mr. Kamper because by the end of the Munich Olympics his work will already be out of date.

1200 march to denounce war

THE varsity TORONTO

VOL. 93, No. 43
MON., JAN. 22, 1973

By GREG McMASTER
About 1200 chanting demonstrators blocked traffic on Yonge Street Saturday, as they marched to the U.S. consulate in solidarity with the Indochinese revolutionaries.

Demonstrators were pushed back on the sidewalks by dozens of police but about half the marchers poured onto the street near Dundas, until police reinforcements regained control.

The march began at Metropolitan United Church, proceeding up Yonge Street and along College, where it overran the north half of the street.

Demonstrators were organized into many different contingents, most of them carrying red banners expressing solidarity and support for the Indochinese Revolution or the National Liberation Front. NLF flags mingled with the cars on Yonge Street, as marchers chanted "PRG, on to Saigon" (referring to the NLF's Provisional Revolutionary Government).

Every group carried signs opposing the U.S. bombing attacks on Indochina and demanding the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Southeast Asia, and one contingent, led by the Vietnam Mobilization Committee, restricted itself to these demands. Their followers were content to remain on the sidewalks, and urged other demonstrators to obey the police orders.

However, the demonstration filled up half of University Avenue by the time it reached the consulate, herded along by police motorcycles. Chants of "Victory to Vietnam" and "Stop the Bombing, Stop the War" greeted a small contingent from the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) who were already at the consulate, urging the United States to sign the proposed ceasefire agreement.

Speakers from the League for

The Varsity—Frank Rooney

Over 1200 people marched on Saturday from a Toronto church to the U.S. Consulate to show their solidarity with Vietnamese revolutionaries.

Socialist Action stressed the need to oppose the latest bombing raids which may force the Vietnamese into submission, and urged Canadians to defend the right of self-determination of Vietnam by opposing the use of Canadian troops to do "the dirty work" for the U.S.

Joe Flexer, speaking for the Red Circle and the Old Mole, said that "we have every right to be skeptical" of any peace treaty being discussed by "the imperialist rulers of this continent". He said that "the unity of Vietnam under a workers' and peasants' government" is the only way to prevent those workers and peasants being "cheated of the full victory for which they have fought so heroically."

"By its very nature the struggle in Vietnam will continue" in spite of any deals, for which, said Flexer, "the usurpers of Moscow and Peking will one day have to answer". He charged them with "again placing their supposed national interests above the duties of revolutionary internationalism", by not giving every possible aid to the Vietnamese.

He challenged federal NDP leader David Lewis, who sent a telegram supporting the demonstration, to implement the decisions of the Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia provincial New Democratic parties by speaking out against the use of Canadian troops in Indochina.

"The very term 'peacekeeping' is a lie", said Flexer.

As the demonstrators dispersed, police forced those remaining up onto the crowded sidewalk. Demonstrators argued in vain with police who were showing a blind man who had marched the entire route of the demonstration.

OFS wants moratoria to protest cutbacks

By BOB BETTSON

The Ontario Federation of Students executive has unanimously called for all of its members to organize moratoria and mass meetings to protest the cutbacks in education financing in a three day period starting one week today.

The meeting, held Saturday at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute in Toronto, was attended by all members of executive as well as representatives from many other member student councils.

The moratoria will probably involve the cancellation of classes at some campuses.

At U of T, the SAC executive will meet tomorrow to decide whether or not to ask the administration to cancel classes one day next week.

University commissioner John Creelman said yesterday he would favour the idea if the moratorium discussed the long-awaited Wright Report on post-secondary education as well as the OFS strike. However, vice-president John Hellivell thought it would be better to wait until the Wright Report was released.

Each said SAC has received indications from the administration that it would receive favourably a SAC request to cancel classes for a day. However, vice-president Don Forster last night refused to comment on the matter.

Several delegations were skeptical of their ability to get classes cancelled for moratoria. Queen's student council representative Lyn Whitham said that the council was too busy organizing the fees boycott, because second term fees at Queen's are due January 31, later than at most universities.

Western student council president Bob Stikeman said that he has tried unsuccessfully for three weeks to get classes cancelled.

York student federation president and OFS executive member John Theobald agreed: "We are in no position to run another moratorium. I was not too impressed with the last one at York", Thursday.

However, a four person delegation from Brock University, which is being occupied to protest the firing of 15 faculty, called on OFS to take action on a province-wide level.

Delegates from the council which is not participating in the fees strike, urged the executive to go beyond the tuition fee increase and decrease in loans to stress the effect of the general cutbacks in education.

Brock and Trent were supported by the executive, who agreed that universities unable to hold moratoria could call mass meetings. Other executive members, including Theobald, supported the motion made by Glendon's Peter Bennet to hold moratoria.

Trent student council executive member Jim Upton told the meeting that Trent students were going to boycott classes starting today to oppose the cutbacks.

The Trent student council was one of the few in Ontario to oppose the fees boycott. The left wing body decided that the tactic was not sufficiently militant.

Trent urged OFS to call another province-wide demonstration at Queen's Park. This was rejected by other members, and OFS general co-ordinator Craig Heron who cited the failure of the November demonstration.

Trent is producing a province-wide newspaper to discuss the general question of cutbacks in education and organizing speaking tours of students involved in the occupations at York, Glendon, Brock and Western.

A general assessment of the fees boycott revealed that the boycott has been most successful at Laurentian where 52 per cent of all students are still withholding their second term fees.

Moderate success was reported at U of T, where over 6,000 students are withholding and at Queen's and Glendon. Not reporting final figures and having little success were Carleton, Western, Waterloo, York Windsor, and Lakehead.

Heron said that this showed that OFS could not take an effective leadership. "It is hard to make decisions. We need the complete cooperation of all members. The structure of OFS militates against the implementation of any action program."

However other executive members disagreed, stating that OFS can still act as a co-ordinator of student action against the cutbacks in Ontario if the right approach is taken.

Upton stressed that it is in university administrations' interests to support students in their fight to make the government back down on cutbacks.

Regina dept faces abolition

REGINA (CUP) — The social sciences department, one of the most progressive and innovative interdisciplinary programs at the University of Saskatchewan's Regina Campus, may be abolished arbitrarily by senior administrators due to budget shortages.

Elimination of the department would spell the end for the MA program in communications, and cut all methodology classes at the Regina Campus.

The department has served as a "safety valve" for students unwilling to follow rigid course requirements in other departments. Under social studies they have been able to pursue more independent study. Abolition would eliminate the safety valve.

The executive committee of the social sciences division discussed a proposal to phase out the department January 15. The meeting was closed to observers, but a reliable source told the Carillon, the student newspaper, that associate dean of Arts and Science Fred Anderson initiated the discussion.

In a telephone interview, Anderson said he didn't know if a full meeting of the division would be called. Students have almost equal voting power with faculty in general meetings but have no representatives on the executive committee. Executive motions never come before general meetings.

About 15 minutes after the phone call, a source told the Carillon that Anderson refused to call a general meeting to discuss budgetary and financial matters. A petition campaign gathered enough names to call a division meeting for January 19, but Anderson replied by circulating a memorandum outlining his reasons for refusing the meeting.

Anderson said the administration told the social sciences division it

Charles Lee said that the union had been "dead" at Brock until the occupation. But after the occupation, 1300 of the 2200 students attended a general meeting and unanimously voted to continue the occupation.

Lee said the occupation is proof that students are still interested in opposing the government's action.

He urged OFS to go into the community and gain public support to counteract what he called the "yellow journalism of the established press."

There will be an OFS general meeting February 10 and 11 at Guelph to discuss further action.

would fall $95,000 short of money required to meet budgeted expenditures, because available funds can't cover salary increases.

Administrators at the January 15 executive committee meeting suggested that $72,000 be saved by cutting teaching positions and still more money be saved by eliminating a visiting professorship, the position of a retiring professor and some sessional assistants. The administrators also suggested that most of the eliminated positions would come from the social sciences department, thereby abolishing the program. The department has only six faculty members now.

Anderson's reluctance to call a divisional budget meeting is motivated by his apparent support for abolition, and by the need to have the budget finalized within days. His action ensured little concrete discussion will occur openly.

Nixon "bloodthirsty", says unionist

Anti-war demonstrator weaves between cars in Saturday's demonstration.

Dennis McDermott, the Canadian director of the United Auto Workers, told close to 1000 people in Metropolitan United Church that Richard Nixon compares with "the bloodthirsty monarchs of the past" for escalating the Indochina war into "nothing less than mass murder."

The crowd gathered in the church before marching to the U.S. consulate. The march, in solidarity with the people of Indochina, was planned to coincide with Nixon's inauguration ceremony.

McDermott accused the continuing bombing of Indochina, calling it an "aerial My Lai" which has "raised My Lai to national policy" for the U.S.

Clare Culhane, a Canadian doctor who has worked at a hospital in Vietnam, told the gathering "I'm glad to see people calling for solidarity with those who are doing the fighting" in Indochina.

She praised "a people that have demonstrated a courage that will go down in the annals of history" in their fight against "the rotten system that can only survive by creating wars and profiting from wars."

Any Canadian troops sent to Indochina, she claimed, would be "participating in a continued sellout as we have always done there." She called on Canadians to demand an end to military tests for the Pentagon in Suffield Alberta, and to demand recognition of Hanoi by the Canadian government.

Praising U.S. sailors' who destroy equipment on boats sending war material to Indochina, Culhane noted that the U.S. military "uses fancy words like 'protective reaction' to describe mass murder". She suggested "a citizens' commission to interdict war material, which is a fancy word for sabotage."

McDermott, referring to the possibility of Canadian involvement in Indochina, said "There's no guarantee that the first contingent would not be the first step to armed Canadian intervention. Canada's military idiots are no better than anyone else's," he added.

Later, at the consulate, McDermott was challenged by Joe Flexer, one of the demonstration's organizers, to use the power of his union's workers to directly help put an end to Canada's involvement in the war. Flexer cited the example of Australian dockworkers, who this month went on strike, refusing to work with ships carrying war materials for Indochina.

McDermott was not present to respond by this time.

Shepherd denounces Evan's task force

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Academic Affairs Committee chairman R.M.H. Shepherd last week attacked the way president John Evans has set up a task force to examine academic appointments.

Shepherd deplored the fact that Academic Affairs was not consulted and that another standing committee—the Planning and Resources Committee—was.

Shepherd recognized, he said, that Evans "obviously" has the right to set up advisory committees. "Yet he would be well advised to consult with any standing committee affected," he declared. "Though there is no obligation for him to do this, if he takes any proposal to one concerned committee he ought to take it to any other concerned committee."

Many of the matters the task force will be concerned with fall as much within the Academic Affairs Committee's terms of reference as they do Planning and Resources', Shepherd said.

He noted that there is a motion before the Academic Affairs Committee for its next meeting, deploring the lack of information and consultation provided the committee.

Evans said the study group arose out of recommendations of the budget committee, recommendations which came to him through the Planning and Resources Committee, with the addition of that committee's comments. The proposal, formulated by the president after discussion with the chairman of Planning and Resources, was presented to that committee itself as a matter of information, he said.

Evans said he had asked vice-president Don Forster to mention the proposal—as information—to the Academic Affairs Committee at the next meeting.

Shepherd said that Forster had indeed made a brief oral report at the committee's meeting last Tuesday. He agreed that he had been "informed" but said he had not been "consulted"—not to the degree that the Planning and Resources Committee, had been consulted.

Evans sought to defend his procedure by clarifying the nature of the study group. It is, he said, to be a non-decision-making, but a data-finding advisory committee.

It is not in opposition to the Academic Affairs Committee or any other committee, he claimed. When decisions are to be made all committees and all estates will have their rights respected, he said.

The president announced that the task force is "slanted heavily in favour of the faculty". But this is only appropriate, Evans said, at this initial period, since the faculty has a vital interest in the issue. He thought that any proposed changes would be more acceptable if they were shaped by those to be affected.

The urgency and importance of the issue were stressed. Evans wants the study group to report in June, though it may not have completed its research. The proposals may be implemented in the fiscal year 1974-1975.

"The president is the one to get the wheels rolling," said one council member speaking in support of Evans.

Governing Council member Brian Morgan attacked the lack of consultation, saying that the setting up of the committee "is the most important piece of policy to come before council this year."

"What we do now is an outline of how the Governing Council will operate in the future," he said.

St. Michael's College president John Kelly, however, said, "If the president has to refer everything he wants to do to a committee, we are going to get the chief executive we deserve."

Morgan also attacked the making of the body and called for a strong student role on it. "It is not 'yes and no power' that is important to students. Real power lies in involvement in the nitty-gritty in the evolving of policies."

The council approved a Morgan motion asking the executive committee to bring proposals to the next Governing Council meeting for a more expeditious setting up of sub-committees and working groups.

The Governing Council also approved an increase in the student health service fee—from $10 to $12 per student. The increase is in response to a projected income deficit of approximately $25,000 and a decrease of $33,593 in the university subsidy to the health service.

Union to appeal firing

Animal lab technician Damjon Andrew Gruev has lost the first round in his battle to regain his job with the U of T, but his union says it intends to appeal the ruling to an arbitration board.

Gruev, fired by animal lab division head L.R. Christensen 10 days ago for refusing to mop a floor, failed to win at the first stage of the grievance procedure when U of T labour relations manager John Parker turned down Gruev's request to be reinstated.

Gruev contended that he was asked to mop a floor that did not need it because it had been washed a half hour earlier. He also said that his supervisor, V.B. Korompai, had acted arbitrarily and harshly towards him.

However, Parker said he found no evidence that the floor had been washed 30 minutes earlier than at the point when Gruev was ordered to do it. He also said Gruev had refused at other times to do required work.

Korompai, Parker added, is "a pleasant sort of a guy". The Service Employees International Union Local 504 intends to take the case to arbitration, even though it may take six months to process and cost the union over $1,500.

"I still think we've got a good case," declared the local's business agent, Don Barclay.

Gruev was unavailable for comment. Barclay indicated the main point of contention is not so much whether or not the floor had been previously washed, but if there was intimidation or provocation by Korompai.

The lengthy delay in processing the case to arbitration usually helps management, he charged. Arbitrators are reluctant to award the decision to the worker grievor, he explained, because of the large amount in lost wages that must be made up.

New Interdisc head delights all

Amidst a shower of praise, psychology professor Marty Wall has been appointed chairman of Interdisciplinary Studies.

After hesitating initially, Arts and Science dean Boh Greene admitted last night that he had chosen Wall to head the controversial department.

Active within Innis College, the psychology department, the Faculty of Arts and Science as well as Interdisciplinary Studies, Wall has made many friends and few enemies.

Interdisciplinary Studies chairman Geoffrey Payzant, retiring at the end of June, said last night that Wall's appointment is "the best thing that could have happened to Interdisciplinary Studies."

Wall has been closely involved with the department since it began, assisting in a course on understanding the sciences, and participating in an interdisciplinary planning group.

He's "a natural interdisciplinarian", said Payzant, a sentiment echoed by several others, including Greene.

"Delighted" Innis College principal Peter Russell said last night that Wall has been "very helpful" to the college. Wall has been college council chairman for three years, and a member of numerous other committees, particularly Academic Affairs.

Students interviewed last night were mostly enthusiastic over the choice of Wall to head the department, which was feared to be near extinction because of rumoured budget cuts and delay in choosing a new chairman.

Wall said last night that although happy with the appointment, he would have preferred it if Greene had established a search committee to find a chairman, and strongly recommended that procedure for the future.

In the process of discussing the appointment with the dean, Wall said that Greene showed a strong commitment to the future of Interdisciplinary Studies.

Etkin becomes new APSC head

Bernard Etkin, an expert in aerospace engineering, has been appointed dean of the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering.

Etkin, on sabbatical leave this year, will take over from James Ham, who has been dean since 1966, at the end of June. Ham will return to teaching.

Etkin opposed the use of Metro police by then acting president Jac Sword to end last March's first Simcoe Hall occupation in support of open stacks in the Roberts Library. "If there is hope for this campus, it is in dialogue," he said at the time.

However, he later declared that the real issue of the students was not stack access or the public good, "but how to stir up trouble for the administration."

Etkin was an elected member of the Commission on University Government (CUG), which three years ago unanimously recommended parity between students and faculty on a single top governing structure of U of T. (However, strong conservative faculty backlash led to the 12-8 ratio of faculty to students presently on the Governing Council.)

Engineering Society president Scott Jolliffe said yesterday he was pleased with the choice of Etkin.

"He has the support of faculty and all the students I know," Jolliffe said.

A professor in U of T's Institute for Aerospace studies since 1957, Etkin has been consulted by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration when separation problems occurred in an Apollo flight.

Etkin has also been chairman of engineering science within the faculty of engineering since 1967. In addition, he has been a member of the President's Advisory Council, the Senate (academic forerunner to the Governing Council), and numerous committees within the faculty.

Etkin is a native of Toronto with bachelor's and master's degrees taken at U of T, and an honorary degree from Carleton. He has taught at U of T since 1942.

Would leave many destitute

Benefit cuts no cure

Shortly after the new Parliament concluded its opening festivities, the Trudeau government announced plans to shift unemployment insurance claimants by reducing the number of people who would be eligible to claim benefits.

Manpower and Immigration Minister Robert Andras says he's "very nervous about over-reacting" to election campaign criticism of the Unemployment Insurance Act. That's hard to tell from the sweeping changes to the act he introduced in the House of Commons last Wednesday, changes firmly clamping down on the number of people eligible to collect unemployment insurance benefits.

The amendments would cut benefits paid to people who quit their jobs without "just cause" or who get fired for "misconduct". They don't, however, bother to define what either of these crimes would be, apparently leaving their interpretation up to Unemployment Insurance Commission bureaucrats.

Two other offences would also disqualify unemployment insurance claimants: "without good cause" refusing or failing to apply for a suitable job known to be vacant before applying for benefits, and "without good cause" refusing or failing to accept an offer of suitable employment before applying for unemployment benefits. Here, too, how the government would apply the new regulations is unclear. One proposal would, however, transfer responsibility for defining what constitutes "capable of" and "available for" work, and "suitability of employment" to the commission rather than leaving some latitude with the applicant.

These changes are obviously designed to placate the government-nurtured public backlash against supposed widespread abuses of the current act. Andras estimates that 10 per cent of the 1972 claimants would have been disqualified from receiving benefits had the amendment been in effect.

And, to counter fears that people are quitting their jobs or getting themselves tired because they can get as much money not working as they could employed, the government has built in a new clause which would calculate a claimant's benefits according to his or her average salary over the entire previous year rather than, as at present, over the preceding 20 weeks.

These changes open dangerous new areas of interpretation to bureaucratic abuse. More than just cutting benefits, the amendments will encourage the commission mandarins to jeopardize the well-being of claimants: people who sincerely want to work but cannot find jobs in an economy so mismanaged that unemployment levels have soared to new heights.

How, we would ask Andras, is some administrator isolated in his or her commission office going to know whether a claimant had or did not have "just cause" for quitting a job; or whether an employer fired an employee for legitimate "misconduct"? Arbitrarily and unilaterally, that's how. There'll be no other way despite whatever guidelines with which the commission provides its employees.

Similarly dangerous abuses await application of the clauses about accepting suitable employment. To some, any job is more suitable — no matter how alienating and unrelated to the applicant's job training — than temporary unemployment. But, the choice about whether to accept such a job should remain with the claimant, not with some official who in the security of his or her government job feels the job is suitable.

As for the new benefits formula, it successfully negates the very thing it's supposed to be protecting: hard work. What it means is that a diligent, industrious employee who earns advancement and pay increments and would have expected to continue earning at nothing less than this level would lose out if circumstances left him unemployed.

But, all these arguments are beside the point. The crucial issue is the government's attempt to solve the country's unemployment problems not by more efficient management but by arbitrarily reducing the number of those eligible for benefits. The changes won't reduce unemployment significantly; they'll just make more people destitute.

The tactic adopted by the government is a typical ploy: deflect criticism of its inefficiency and poor planning onto the victims, the unemployed. It may even succeed in temporarily cooling down the electorate's disenchantment with the Trudeau government. But, that doesn't make it right or acceptable.

And, we'd suggest, the deception won't work for long. The, maybe the government will find itself unemployed for failing to deal responsibly with so crucial an issue.

Call for open meeting on fees

In order to discuss and comment on the recent debacle at the SAC meetings, we have to put the issue of fee hikes in the proper perspective.

The current federal and provincial reports on education reflect an overall policy of government abstention from secondary school financing. A government budget deficit is a probable key to their recent moves. Cutbacks in health, welfare, and public employment is further confirmation of such a thesis.

This year, SAC has been unable to come to grips with this problem and has been unable to lead the students in struggle, even when the OFS referendum indicated an overwhelming disdain for government policies. The inactivity of SAC has led to CLM's substituting itself for student leadership and lent credence to CLM's basic contention that Eric Miglin is "selling out" the students.

However, "goon" tactics and unreasonable disruption of SAC meetings does not replace democratic discussion by SAC and "non-SAC" students. The surcharge committee, sponsored by CLM, outshouted even those who were basically on their side. The Erindale reps read an open letter condemning the past mis-leadership of SAC and calling for an open meeting. They were attacked by and shouted down by the (Stop the Student) Surcharge Committee.

In place of name-calling we call for active endorsement of the Erindale proposal for a democratic, well-advertised, open meeting of all concerned individuals.

Havers rejects Stollar criticism

There are only a few things worth saying about the letter that UC SAC rep Marty Stollar wrote to The Varsity on January 19, about the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee closing down another SAC meeting.

His main point is that the $100 student surcharge is a red herring. He says the real issue is that "the provincial government has moved to further restrict university access to make it even more difficult for students from low income families to attend university". This is the same diversionary line that SAC has been feeding us all year. We know that the same people run the university as run the government. Tactically, the question is, which do we hit first? The SSSC says we hit the university, and has set out to do it in a way that will win. Stollar says we should hit the government, but has never once said how it should be done. We know that the government is launching an attack on students. But, at present, there is no way we can hit that government directly. We are starting to fight on our home ground, the university, and after students have won their fight in their own universities, they will be ready to join the rest of the people of Ontario in the battle against the government.

Stollar himself states that the university is the intermediary, a relatively powerless one, he says, but still the intermediary. The U of T Act gives the university Governing Council the power to set fees. Therefore, when the government cut grants to the university, the university turned around and levied a surcharge on students. The fact that the university may be "relatively powerless" will make it that much easier for students to force the university to eliminate the surcharge.

Stollar also mentions that a student who has a part time job so that he can have a $5 per week food allowance does not care about a mere $100. This is pure stupidity.

He sinks even lower when he says that he personally "would be pleased to see tuition fees raised to $1,500 a year" as long as students who could not afford this amount could get the Ontario taxpayer to give larger grants. This would mean that Ontario taxpayers would be putting even more money into the universities than they are now. When Stollar cited Harvard as an example of a university where "no student is prevented from attending the university simply on the grounds that he cannot afford it", he reached his lowest point. Harvard is the bastion of U.S. "academic excellence" which produces apologists for U.S. aggression all over the world. The U.S. Educational Opportunity Bank gets students deeply in debt. Our universities are Americanized enough without modelling them after Harvard.

Stollar must think the students at this university are awfully stupid to accept his arguments, and we should probably run him right off the campus for his efforts at diverting us from our immediate enemy — the university and its Students' Administrative Council. As the article in the January 18 "Toke" so aptly put it, SAC does not represent the students of the U of T. When SAC is selling us out to the university, we owe it to ourselves to disband it. Stollar's reference to us as "Hitler Youth" is designed to discourage us from kicking out a rotten student council. It will not work. SAC's main activity has been to confuse and deceive the students. The students at U of T are going to stop the student surcharge this year, and if that means getting rid of SAC, we will do it.

justice, namely -Ms. Peacocke's letter of Wednesday, January 17 ("Keep quiet out of good manners"). It illuminates man's inherent evil manifest in all attempts to generate moral revolution and liberation or to preserve freedom of speech.

To quote Ms. Peacocke at length, changing the characters and circumstances involved, but preserving the chain of logic: "When Sebastian Rump accepts a job in a sweatshop on Spadina Avenue for $1.50 an hour through financial necessity, he should keep quiet on the matter of his working conditions out of good manners. However, if it is difficult for Sebastian to reconcile the dollars brought in by working under such conditions with his feeling of guilt for tolerating such injustice (or his fear of destitution), he should not have accepted the job."

Right on!
One must be careful, however, not to chastise those in Indochina who are making a lot of noise and fighting for their countries against the Americans, or those in Chile upset at corporate threats to their representative government. After all, although they are exhibiting uncivilized behaviour, they never had the opportunities we have had to accumulate the social graces prerequisite to moral strength.

May I suggest that Ms. Peacocke, who is also evidently aware of the essential issues involved in Women's Lib, follow the example of rectitude set by Carrie Nation — mount her ass, ride to 91 St. George Street with hatchet in hand, and demolish the building and equipment of The Varsity.

Education: satisfying the market's demand

"Liberal education seems to me to be indispensably necessary; and the completion of it by the establishment of a university in the Capital of the country . . . would be most useful to inculcate just principles, habits and manners among the rising generation."

Upper Canada Governor
John Simcoe Graves

By WYNTON SEMPLE

Liberal education has always been viewed within the context of how it could best serve the prevailing economy. Three distinct ruling class attitudes towards education have existed; each corresponding with and varying with structural changes in the economy.

Simcoe's quote expresses the traditional elitist view of education which corresponded with an agrarian/mercantile economy. This economy supported a ruling class made up two strata, each of which made its money in similar ways. In agriculture, they made the peasants give them a share of their produce in return for the privilege of tilling the land. In trade, they made it by buying things in one part of the world at a low price and then selling them at a high price in other parts of the world. In Canada, this was the age of the fish and fur trades, and extended into the wheat and timber eras around the middle of the nineteenth century.

The traditional ruling class view of education focused almost exclusively on its moral value. The line between education and religion was imperceptible. In this context, education performed minor cultural services for the ruling class by drumming the virtues of hard work and thrift into the children of working people, and developing in the sons and daughters of the bourgeoisie the appropriate mannerisms and affectations of "culture" to distinguish them from their inferiors and to enable them to occupy their leisure time.

The second distinct set of ruling class attitudes towards education was associated with the onset of industrialism. Industrialism ushered in capitalism (or perhaps vice versa). In this situation, the ruling class made its money in a very different way.

Instead of simply appropriating the wealth other people had created, the capitalists set about to produce their own. They assembled all the elements of production and set them in motion. They then took the commodity to market to exchange it for what it was worth. There was just one catch — they had to buy the various factors of production (labour, raw materials, equipment, et cetera) on the market. It they paid what each of these factors of production was worth, there would be little left over after having sold the total combination of factors for what it was worth. In fact, if this happened, the capitalist would secure for himself only the value of the labour he himself actually expended in producing the commodity.

However, as it turned out, the capitalists did not have to pay the full value for all the factors of production. They were able to pay labour much less than the value of what it produced. This circumstance arises partly from the motivations with which each party — capital and labour — approaches the market. Their motivations are fundamentally different.

The capitalist wishes to buy labour power to put it to use in combination with physical capital with the ultimate aim of making a profit. The worker, on the other hand, wishes to sell his labour power in order that he may live. He is compelled to sell his labour power to the capitalist, whereas the capitalist is not compelled to buy it. It is a perpetual buyer's market. Consequently, the capitalist will not pay a worker the full value of his labour.

With capitalism, the composition of the ruling class changed from the landowners and shipowners of before to the owners of manufacturing enterprises and finance capital. This ascendancy of the industrial bourgeoisie was not achieved without some difficulty. In 1837 Upper Canada, a war almost broke out when the conflict between the landed "family compact" and the rising industrial bourgeoisie took the form of a dispute over "responsible" government. Over the next few years, the question as to which section of the ruling class the government would be responsible was settled in favour of the industrial bourgeoisie.

Their interests were soon asserted in the field of education. Ontario's first Chief Superintendent of Schools, Egerton Ryerson, spoke on behalf of the new elements of the ruling class and their interest in education, writing in a report that became the basis for the Schools Act of 1846:

"The knowledge required for the scientific pursuit of mechanics, agriculture and commerce must needs be provided to an extent corresponding with the demand and exigencies of the country; while to a mere limited extent are needed facilities for acquiring the higher education of the learned professions."

It was apparent to Ryerson that the newly "responsible" state had definite responsibilities in the realm of education:

"The very end of our being is practical... The age in which we live is likewise eminently practical; and the conditions and interests, the pursuits and duties of our new country, under our new government, are invested with an almost exclusively practical character. Scarcely an individual among us is exempt from the necessity of 'living by the sweat of his face'. Every man should, therefore, be educated to practice."

In recognition of Egerton's foresight they later named a school after him. It is fitting that this school, Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, was one of the first schools in Canada to unabashedly produce graduates on a demand schedule set by industry.

Monopoly Capitalism

Around the turn of the century, industrial capitalism underwent a major shift from its competitive to its monopoly phase. The ruling class became more compact as ownership of the means of production became concentrated in fewer and fewer hands. The mode of production changed with the increased importance of technology and the unit of production becoming larger and more vertically integrated. It is important to examine the reasons for this shift in some detail since the Canadian economy is presently under the tutelage of American monopoly capitalism. There were two major factors which led to the monopolization of capitalism:

Falling Rate of Profit

The tendency for the rate of profit to fall was occasioned by:

- (1) a decrease in prices due to manufacturers' competition for markets;
- (2) an increase in the cost of the capital equipment required to incorporate technological change into the productive process;
- (3) increasing cost of labour due to a shortage of skilled manpower;
- (4) the increasing costs of the anarchy of production, the typical business cycle in which each manufacturer produced as much as possible leading to piles of unsold goods and factories and workers sitting idle in a non-profit-making state; and
- (5) the relative saturation of domestic markets, and other factors.

People Getting Ticked off with Capitalism

This was becoming increasingly common around the turn of the century. The problems associated with maintaining the rate of profit led to wages being cut and people thrown out of work. Increasing numbers of workers engaged in militant strikes which had an explicit anti-capitalist orientation.

If capitalism was to remain intact, the ruling class would have to develop a more acute class consciousness — it would have to actively maintain and expand capitalism — which is exactly what happened.

All in all, if amounted to the ruling class becoming much more sophisticated, learning to put a velvet glove over its mailed fist, and developing allies outside of the ruling class itself.

The first group to be co-opted and put to work on behalf of the ruling class, helping them solve their problem with People Getting Ticked off with Capitalism, were the liberals — the people who, although they had a sincere interest in changing society for the better, could not bring themselves to break openly with the ruling class inasmuch as they had some interests in common with the ruling class. Since they were motivated by a social conscience pricked by other people's misery, not their own, the liberals did not feel the necessity of challenging the system, but rather were content to try and reform bits and pieces of it.

American historian Christopher Lasch describes the various ways in which the liberals' energies were harnessed to help save capitalism:

"Everyone who has studied the history of American reform agrees that the reform tradition underwent a fundamental change around 1900. Some people identify the change with a changing attitude towards government, a new readiness to use government (particularly the federal government) as an instrument of popular control. Others associate it with an abandonment of the old populist distrust of large scale institutions, like corporations, and an acceptance of the concentration of wealth and power. Still others define the change as a movement away from the dogma of natural rights towards a relativistic, environmentalist, and pragmatic view of the world."

This was when the ruling class began to hire people to "rationalize" consumption. The need to stimulate and direct people's needs into profitable channels gave birth to the advertising industry.

The ruling class also discovered that its ever faithful handmaidens, the state, could help it out with its new problems. In the past, the role of the state had been restricted to fighting wars on behalf of their foreign interests and doing small domestic favours such as donating land and money with which to build railroads. (In Canada, the government contributed around $50,000 per mile of track laid). It was now even more helpful to have the state as an agent since it meant that the ruling class had at its disposal the state's troops and law courts to break strikes, its legislatures to pass anti-labor laws, and its courts to rule against labor, and so on. It was not until the 1930s that the state, for the first time since the 19th century, was forced to act in the interests of the workers.

Education became even more important since it now shouldered the major burden of training the new generation of skilled workers. The public schools were expected to go to the government's recognition of everyone's right to an education, and to provide the utmost his peculiar ability to be educated.

The schools were called upon to provide capital in nearly finished form, but also to provide the means of exploiting it. Cecilie Watson, one of the leading planning experts and head of the "Education" department of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, introduced the concept of manpower planning in her 1937 book, "Manpower Planning in Canada."

"A great contribution to labor management studies in the United States around the turn of the century was made by F. W. Taylor, who realized, through his 'scientific management' studies, that a large part of the work would greatly improve by making him highly skilled. He was the first to make part of the entire work performance of the production line. He applied the principles of Scientific Management to the progress of the economy. This led to a spur to labour efficiency, and a considerable increase in the productivity of labour input."

Through his theories and practical applications, Taylor provided the foundations of North American scientific management.

years. He also provided the ruling class with the material for its velvet glove. His book, "The Revolt of the Masses," is a classic work on the subject.

"Men have long had some intuition that education may be consciously used as a means of producing these ills, and some intuition that education may be made an instrument of a better hope of men. But we are not aware of the potential efficacy of education as an agency of improving society."

Dewey's sincere but naive liberalism was a response to monopoly capitalism. Dewey was part of a broader stream responding to the rise of capitalism.

Lasch gives some idea of the perception of the new psychology, the child psychology, the idea of scientific management, the philosophy of pragmatism, that confirmed the experience of material and social progress, that which had so long troubled the masses, and which was to be eliminated by means of scientific management. The old techniques of control of the agencies of institutionalized violence were to be eliminated. The mark of progressive education was their ability to govern themselves.

During the first half of this century, monopoly capitalism developed a steadily increasing dependence on education. For the United States, the total annual outlay for human capital (in terms of primary, secondary, and tertiary education expenditures) rose from nine per cent of the annual investment in physical capital in 1900 to 34 per cent in 1956. However, in the late fifties, education rather abruptly became more important to the ruling class. The exact reasons for the upsurge in interest are not clear; however, at least the following seem to have been involved:

(1) imperialism became less lucrative, making it necessary to increase the rate of exploitation at home by increasing the value-producing capacity of labour via training;

(2) in connection with this situation, capital was about to enter new technologically-oriented fields and a pool of surplus labour would be needed in order to keep labour costs down;

(3) the ruling class ideologues realized that higher education offered a unique if temporary solution to the problem of what to do with all the post-War babies who, if unemployed and left to their own devices, might develop into that old nightmare — People Getting Ticked off with Capitalism.

Higher education would not only take up their time, it would also give them the illusion of upward mobility along with all the conservativizing tendencies this induces.

Since the late fifties, there has emerged among economists, educators, students and others a widespread conscious adoption of in the development of policies for relating education to economic requirements. It discussed targets for educational investment during the decade 1961-1970 and reached general agreement on the necessity for long term planning of educational investment in the OECD member countries."

Interest and activity in the field of manpower planning increased generally at the international level in the early sixties. Organizations such as the International Labour Office, the International Association for Educational and Vocational Information, and UNESCO, held conferences, circulated literature, and collected information.

In 1963, the first annual U.S. Department of Labour Manpower Requirements, Resources, Utilization and Training report was transmitted to the Congress. In the same year, an act was passed requiring an annual inventory of manpower requirements, resources utilization, and training.

In Canada, the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act (TVTA) was passed in 1960. By 1966-67, there were 185,000 students in Ontario alone who were in schools and courses approved under the federal-provincial agreements concluded under the TVTA. The increases in federal government expenditures for technical and vocational training were dramatic — 35 million the first year of the TVTA, 207 million the second year.

Given Canada's relationship to the United States, it is understandable that Canada's manpower planning policy was not one that Canadian had independently and consciously conceived. There appears to have been little research published prior to the passage of the TVTA. Two of the more important pieces of Canadian research — Wilkinson's study for the then Department of Labour and Bertram's work for the Economic Council of Canada — were done outside Canada (at MIT and the University of Washington respectively), using American research hypotheses.

In 1964, schedule 10 of the TVTA came into effect, providing for research on a cost-shared basis with the provinces. Manpower's research program gave birth to its first offspring in 1968 when Canada's Manpower Requirements in 1970 was published.

The educational Planning Division of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education completed Part I of a two-part study which projects the future manpower needs and resources of Ontario to 1986. The Economic Council of Canada carried out a number of research projects for its seventh annual Review. One of the key studies attempts to measure the relationship of operating expenditure, capital expenditures, and total cost per student, to student output.

Education's manpower planning aspects have many ramifications for the interests of the ruling class. In the introduction to Higher Education and The Demand for Scientific Manpower in the United States, a 1963 OECD study, the authors explain the study was done because "there is much worry in high places that shortages will be present in 1970 unless immediate and drastic measures are taken to increase the supply — shortages which will impair the economic and scientific efficiency of the United States and endanger her political and military role in the world."

There are overtly political problems, too. Wilkinson, in his study for the Canadian Department of Labour, partially financed by the Imperial Oil Company Limited, points out:

"Another difficulty is that — even if the projections are roughly correct insofar as the desire of students or of parents for their children are concerned, there is still no assurance that the type of students trained will be what the economy actually requires for production purposes. Considerable misdirection of effort, not to mention thwarted aspirations, may arise. In backward countries, as Van Den Haag and others have pointed out, a pool of unemployed intellectuals may provide the spark for revolution. Clearly, it is not sufficient to look only at satisfying students' demands for classroom space and instructors. The needs of the economy for trained and educated people must be considered as well."

Wilkinson would have been fully entitled to say, "I told you so," after the Ouebec CEGEP students occupied their schools.

However, most of the explicit concern is with producing a surplus of people with the requisite skills for participation in "our" economy. The people who do these studies are not monsters, they are not witting servants of the ruling class — they seek only to understand things the way they are. Since the structure of the economy assumes a ruling class and since the dominant brand of social science is committed to refining and reproducing existing social relations, not subverting them, these studies are necessarily carried on from the point of view of the ruling class.

The study done by Meltz and Penz on Canada's manpower needs from '61 to '70 illustrates the class bias referred to above. Two of the assumptions they use in doing their study are:

(1) "the industry and occupational structures of employment in the past have been determined primarily by the structure of output and by the prevailing technology, rather than by labour supply conditions interacting with demand conditions"

(2) "the structure of output and technology of labour force is based on the assumption that the education structure too is labour-demand determined and independent of labour supply conditions"

They describe these assumptions as "gross oversimplifications of reality". The reality they are simplifying, as may be seen from their assumptions, is one in which the needs of the ruling class for trained manpower are the basic determinants of the structure of the labour force and the structure of the educational system. Their assumptions state quite clearly that in both of these areas the needs, desires, and rights of the people who make up the structures — students and workers — are inconsequential.

To question the degree of universality to post-secondary education deemed appropriate by the state or to assert that the main purpose of post-secondary education should be the cultural enrichment of the entire society is to challenge priorities and fundaments of the economic and political orders in which we live.

U of T student Wynton Semple was general co-ordinator of the Ontario Federation of Students. He has a long background studying post-secondary education, and is a student member of the Ontario Committee on Student Awards.

the human capital approach to education, euphemistically known as "manpower planning". Much of the impetus for manpower planning came with the 1958 passage of the U.S. National Defense Education Act. The act greatly increased the funding for certain subject areas which were vital to the national "defense" effort — sciences, mathematics, education, and foreign languages. This was a step towards manpower planning in the sense that a conscious attempt was made to plan the supply of skilled personnel for the defence industry which is a major sector of the American economy.

Concurrently, at the international level, the Committee for Scientific and Technical Personnel was established as a branch of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation. Its task was to "develop policies aimed at increasing investment in education so as to supply the qualified manpower necessary for the implementation of a policy of economic growth". One of the committee's first acts was to set up "The Study Group on the Economics of Education" which, in the words of its chairman, Dr. Henning Friis, was "to promote and exchange research and statistical data on the broad subject of the economics of education, that is the relationship between education and economic growth, the educational needs of the 1960's and the formulation of policies for increasing the supply of scientific, technical, and other qualified manpower." In Washington, D.C. in October, 1961, 13 months after the "study group" was established, manpower planning took a giant stride forward with the holding of the Policy Conference on Economic Growth and Investment in Education. This conference was of international scope and importance. Dr. Friis described it in the following words: "This conference was a major step

World must support Argentine left: activist

By JIM MARTIN

The military government of Argentina will continue to silence dissident voices within the country unless the world demonstrates support for the Latin American left, Argentine, medical student and activist Daniel Zadunaisky, said Thursday night at Hart House.

Zadunaisky, on a speaking tour for the Committee for Justice to Latin American Political Prisoners, is seeking Canadian and American support to release and free from persecution the estimated 1200 political prisoners in Argentinian jails.

As an example of the effectiveness of international pressure he cited a well known magazine editor who had been jailed despite public outcry, and then was suddenly released. The presiding judge admitted that the reason for this action was the receipt by the government of "several letters from North Americans aware of your case."

Zadunaisky urged Canadians to demonstrate solidarity with all Latin American political prisoners by writing letters to the appropriate governments.

Zadunaisky said three groups exist in Argentine politics: a traditionally strong working class; the nationalist bourgeoisie, typified by Juan Peron, leader of the country until the mid-50's; and the industrialists supporting foreign corporations, mostly American.

The military governments in power since 1958 have allowed foreign corporations to dominate practically all the nation's steel, auto, petroleum and textile industries, Zadunaisky said. Union strength has been cut by the imposition of a government controlled bureaucracy at their head.

The activist described the present condition of Argentina as "pre-revolutionary", for since May 1969, when police attacked and killed several students in a demonstration at Mendoza, a military junta has been necessary to suppress revolts against foreign domination of the economy.

The ruling generals consider themselves, perhaps with some justification, to be in a state of siege, said Zadunaisky. Thus there is arrest without trial, he said, and special political courts, which quickly dispense harsh non-appealable sentences, sometimes with no defence counsel present.

Many cases of torture have been reported, and the Argentine claimed it is common for the bodies of "released" prisoners to be found a few days after their "liberation". Even acquitted political workers can be detained if thought to be "security threats."

When questioned about the possibility of a leftwing political victory, Zadunaisky pointed out that the only effective opposition to the Argentinian dictators comes from the trade union movement.

But the unions' central bureaucracy prevents consolidation of their power because the head offices are regulated by the state, he added.

The Peronistas, a faction centred around former strongman Juan Peron, enjoy little popular support, according to the Argentine medical student, for although Peron himself is still liked by workers, the other leaders of the party are not trusted.

Most small parties organized by working class groups will not appear on the ballot of future elections because high membership requirements are necessary before such parties can be officially recognized.

Thus, as in Paris in 1968, resistance is limited to disorganized protests, strikes, and unsupported guerrilla action without the guidance of a common front or coordinated leadership.

Papandreu calls for new economic system

By PAT REDICAN

Two hundred people packed the auditorium at the International Students Centre to hear York University economist Andreas Papandreu outline his vision for a socialist "utopia" Thursday night.

Speaking to West Metro Waffle meeting, Papandreu, a member of the Greek cabinet until the 1967 coup, called for a hierarchically structured, but community-based political-economic system.

The community, which could vary in size from the city to the neighbourhood to the village would own all the resources within its bounds. Resources would include factories, universities, stores and natural resources.

These communities would be organized into "regions" in which organization would involve a sort of bargaining between communities.

Similarly regions would be organized into nations and nations into a global structure.

In Papandreu's envisioned community, resources would be controlled by the workers. Although government and state functions would be filled by elected representatives, there would be some attempt to control the elitist tendencies that have manifested themselves in other socialist states.

Papandreu suggested adopting a system akin to the Chinese one, legislating against specialism. An individual would be required to hold several different kinds of positions during his lifetime. Although the state might lose some efficiency, the economist admitted, it would combat both elitism and alienation of labour.

Papandreu stressed that his "utopia" seemed a long way from realization, given the "centralizing tendencies" of the present governments both in socialist and capitalist countries.

Kent State murders Blues 64-49

By PAUL CARSON

Kent State University won nine of 13 events to defeat U of T men's swim team 64-49 in a dual meet Friday. Four pool records were either set or tied as Toronto succumbed to the enviable depth of Kent State.

Although Blues received outstanding performances from captain Jim Adams and Olympian Byron MacDonald, Kent State had simply too many well-rested, experienced swimmers, especially in the non-freestyle events.

"Kent State are going nowhere in U.S. college swimming rankings, but they demonstrated the wide gulf between college swimming in the U.S. and Canada," said Varsity coach Robin Campbell.

Thanks to numerous first class facilities and an excellent age group system, American universities can draw from a virtually inexhaustible supply of talent.

"It's roughly comparable to our system for producing hockey players," Campbell said. But, he added, Canada could become a swimming power if the necessary facilities were available. "Toronto is full of hockey rinks but does not have even one indoor 50-metre pool. "If we could get a similar facility here," Campbell predicted, "it would serve swimmers in the entire city and be in use almost 24 hours every day. But the government doesn't seem to want to spend the money."

The following is a summary of Friday's meet:

400-yard relay:

- 1. Toronto A (Farquhar, Phillips, MacDonald, Adams), 3:44.5;
- 2. Kent State, 3:48.5; 3. Toronto B, 4:02.5.

1000-yard freestyle:

- 1. Mike Stolkey (KS), 10:25.7; 2. Shawn Laari (T), 10:33.5; 3. John Sebben (T), 10:41.0.

200-yard freestyle:

- 1. Greg Penn (KS), 1:50.9; 2. Dave Wilkin (T), 1:53.0; 3. John Dailey (KS), 1:57.1.

50-yard freestyle:

- 1. Jim Adams (T), 22:0; 2. Jim Devenentis (KS), 22.1; 3. Kirk Semler (KS), 23.2.

200-yard individual medley:

- 1. Al Smith (KS), 2:08.0; 2. Jeff Montgomery (KS), 2:09.2; 3. John Twohig (T), 2:16.4.

One metre diving:

- 1. Gary Bishop (KS), 243.35; 2. Tom Sandercock (KS), 204.75; 3. Doug Vickey (KS), 192.95.

200-yard butterfly:

- 1. Byron MacDonald (T), 1:59.5; 2. Don Dunkle (KS), 2:00.7; 3. Bob Peeling (T), 2:10.7.

100-yard freestyle:

- 1. Devenentis (KS) 48.3; 2. Adams (T), 48.5; 3. Wilkin (T), 50.3.

200-yard backstroke:

- 1. Jini Muske (KS), 2:05.3; 2. Penn (KS), 2:05.8; 3. Russ Farquhar (T), 2:12.0.

500-yard freestyle:

- 1. Stolkey (KS), 5:02.1; 2. Laari (T), 5:06.9; 3. Craig Konwinski (KS) 5:16.5.

200-yard breaststroke:

- 1. Montgomery (KS), 2:20.9; 2. Sebben (T), 2:21.4; 3. Nick Rotmanian (T), 2:26.2.

Three metre diving:

- 1. Bishop (KS) 270.90; 2. Alex Lau (T), 182.80; 3. Sandercock (KS), 174.75.

400-yard freestyle relay:

- 1. Toronto A (Peeling, Sebben, Peters, Twohig), 3:29.9;
- 2. Kent State, 3:31.1; 3. Toronto B, 3:40.0.

Gymnasts third at York

The Varsity—Al Forest

Bryan Alcock flies through the air in part of his floor show Saturday at York.

The University of Toronto men's gymnastics team scored 119.41 points Saturday to place third behind York and Queen's at the Queen's Invitational in Kingston.

The mid-season competition featured routines of almost Olympic difficulty by gymnasts from York and Queen's, and they often performed well. The other two participating teams, Ottawa and Toronto, lacked this emphasis on difficulty, and as a result both suffered on the scoreboard.

York won the team competition with 132.88 points while Queen's finished a close second with 130.46. (The point totals were tabulated by adding the top three scores from each of the six events for each team.)

The sole Toronto participant with a competitive standing was captain Gary Wicks, who placed sixth in the all-round competition with 37.98 points. Brian Euler placed third in the Toronto team standings, giving controlled performances in the five events he competed in, but Arnold Bishop and Al Swett agreed the Queen's meet wasn't their best.

Blues' Rick Jeyzman won the vaulting competition with an 8.3 score from a straight arm hand-spring vault. Although other Blues' members Bryan Alcock and John Kelly did not compete in all events, Alcock did perform a floor exercise routine, while Kelly went to the parallel bars.

Toronto's Hans Frick was out of the competition with a shoulder injury, and with his absence Varsity's team totals were reduced by at least 10 points. However, Frick may be able to compete in the finals at York University on February 24.

Blues will next compete in the semi-final matches at Western on February 10.

Blues rebound past Queen's, 80-79

By BOB PRITCHARD

Basketball Blues, defeated 72-56 by Queen's Golden Gaels in a contest earlier this season, squeaked by the Kingston visitors 80-79 on Saturday night in the Benson Building for their third league victory. Blues record is now 3 wins, 3 losses.

It was unfortunate such a sparse crowd chose to witness the game, for both teams treated the spectators to some exciting, even if somewhat hard-hitting basketball. A total of 57 fouls were called, 35 to the Blues. Had Gaels not shot a poor 52 per cent from the foul line in the second half, Varsity might have come out on the short end of the score.

Toronto's Glenn Scott, while only scoring six points of his team's total, made the most of four of the six. With Blues leading 76-75 and just over a minute left in the game, Toronto had the ball in its end. Taking advantage of a serious defensive lapse by the Gaels, Scott positioned himself uncovered under the Queen's basket, grabbing a court-length pass and popping the ball in the basket, to make the score 78-75.

Queen's then retaliated with a basket of its own, changing the score to 78-77. Then Scott once again found himself with the ball, but was fouled while shooting with 40 seconds left on the clock. The 6'4" forward remained cool, dropping both his shots through the hoop, to bring the score to 80-77.

Next, Queen's Norm Hagarty, fouled by Toronto, put in two foul shots to once again reduce the Varsity lead to one point. However, Blues had possession of the ball, and it was just a matter of using up the clock. But with 7 seconds left, the Varsity lost the ball to the Gaels, much to the chagrin of Toronto coach McManus. Fortunately, it wasn't enough time for the Kingston team to get a clean shot at the basket, and Blues kept their single point lead for a 80-79 victory.

Toronto started the game sluggishly, letting Queen's jump to an 11-5 lead. Gaels held the lead for the first eight minutes, but by then Blues had settled down to tie the score. For the remainder of the half it was a see-saw battle, each team alternating in the lead. They went into the changerooms at halftime deadlocked at 36 points apiece.

Both Toronto and Queen's used man to man defences throughout the game, which, apart from the excessive fouls and turnovers, contributed to the quick pace. The main fault in the Blues' play lay in their rebounding (12 compared to Queen's 21). However, they did improve in the second half, outrebounding Queen's 24-15.

Another costly error on Blue's part was their careless passing on a fast break. On several occasions, Varsity had a man in the open, only to throw the ball too far ahead, and lose not only the ball, but an easy basket.

Toronto did exhibit some good man to man defence, and coach McManus must have been pleased, for not until this game has he used that defence for the full forty minutes. Although Blues were often slow to react to pies and screens in the early portions of the game, and were frequently beaten by their opponents, forcing them to foul, the defence tightened as the game progressed.

Queen's Roh Smart, high scorer in the game, put in 26 points. Smart frequently used a behind the back dribble, and was difficult to stop once he had a step on his Toronto opponent. But when Varsity began to put a little more pressure on the Queen's guards, the Kingston team had more difficulty working the ball around.

Credit must be given to McManus, for substituting freely throughout Blues' games. In practice, this means that Toronto can rely to a certain extent on bench strength. Naturally, Toronto has a starting five, but every team member is getting some game experience. This paid off Saturday when all but one player got on the scoresheet.

TIP OFFS:

Blues meet York Yeomen, tomorrow at 8:15 P.M. in Hart House. York is only 3-5 in league play this year... Toronto's Dave Ferguson played much of Saturday's game wearing a face mask to protect a broken nose he received in a game against Waterloo two weeks ago.

Senior volleyball defeats Ottawa, Carleton

By JOAN SCHWARTZ

Women's senior volleyball team won both league matches in Ottawa this weekend, defeating Carleton University 3-0 Saturday, and the University of Ottawa 3-1 Friday.

Blues' Saturday games against Carleton were uninspiring compared to the display of spectacular volleyball Varsity showed against Ottawa.

In the first game with Ottawa, Blues built up a commanding 12-4 lead, only to have it slip to 13-12 before rallying to win. The second game was close for the first half as both teams fought hard to make the halftime score 8-8. Although Blues grabbed the next five points, play again began to see-saw. Ottawa tried to salvage a win when Toronto was ahead 14-9, but it was only able to take two more points before Blues won 15-11.

Toronto slipped on an early 5-3 lead in the third game and Ottawa never looked back. Ottawa went ahead 7-6 and built up its lead to 13-6, and although steady play by Lynne Shearon and Peggy Duff brought Toronto up to 10, the game went to Ottawa, 15-10.

In the deciding game Ottawa grabbed the first three points, but Toronto came from behind to tie the score at 4-4. Ottawa then pulled ahead 9-4 and 10-6. However, Toronto tied the game again at 10-10, dropped one point, and then rallied to win, 15-11.

Against Carleton Saturday, Toronto's steady play coupled with several exciting rallies and dramatic saves, defeated a determined Carleton squad 15-13, 15-11, 15-6.

Notes: Toronto's 3-1 victory over

Ottawa was a two hour marathon which began an hour later than scheduled. Both teams and spectators became increasingly frustrated as the net in Ottawa's new athletic complex broke several times during the warm-up... already short-handed, Blues lost the services of setter Vera Kosinkova in the second Ottawa game, out of action for at least three weeks with torn ligaments... Kosinkova was replaced by Marion Thomson, whose steady setting helped Toronto spikers penetrate the opponents' defence... strong serves by Roxsolanna Wankewycz, well-placed spikes by Fran Walmsley, and effective blocking by Marg Grieve were responsible for the strength of Blues' sustained attack... Toronto next plays second-place York Tuesday, January 30 at York.

Although Marg Grieve (28) missed the blocks, Toronto went on to defeat Ottawa, 3-1.

Art students protest cuts

By PAT REDICAN

Fifty students from the Ontario College of Art marched to Queen's Park yesterday to ask the Ontario Government to intervene in the administration of the college.

The group was armed with signed statements from 27 per cent of the student body saying they will not return if feared staff cutbacks and curriculum changes are implemented as announced; seven faculty have already resigned.

Acting OCA president Clifford Pitt announced Monday that, due to a reduced enrolment, a deficit of $58,000 or 28 per cent of the budget had occurred. Noting the "hard to justify student-teacher ratio", he announced the layoff of about 15-20 full time faculty.

At a press conference following an initial "informational" meeting with deputy Colleges and Universities Minister Gordon Parr, student representatives Barbara Laffey and Paul Casselman explained that the students are opposed to the cutbacks for three reasons:

- Pitt has not shown conclusively that the only way to correct the deficit is faculty layoffs;
- The students have not been told either the criteria used to decide who will be laid off or who will be dismissed, and they fear that dismissals will hit radical faculty hardest; and
- They feel the students should decide who should be laid off.

For these reasons and because "the future and curriculum adopted by council is not supportive of the future recommended by the student body," the students have decided to ask for government intervention, at least to the extent of "preventing any faculty layoffs this year," said Laffey.

Casselman added, "we have tried to establish a dialogue with the administration, but they are only willing to talk, not to discuss and compromise in an open and productive fashion. We have decided to sidestep Pitt and come to the government."

"So far the deputy minister has been very helpful. He has assured us that the minister will talk to us soon."

The results of these talks will be known later today.

While Casselman and Laffey talked to the press inside, 50 students camped on the legislature steps. One student, gagged and bound to a chair, supposedly symbolized the student status at OCA.

Student members of the PAC which will decide who will be laid off have refused to co-operate with the student group which has been organized by Casselman and Laffey. Laffey charges that these were appointed by Pitt and are not represented by the students.

The student council, which Casselman caricatured as "a dance committee" has offered financial support to the students but refused to involve itself further.

The basic conflict in the college centres around two methods of teaching.

A radical tradition, established by former president Roy Ascott and supported by a large minority of teachers as well as a large segment of the student body has been in effect since 1970.

Ascott was fired last spring when the council running the college decided the radical program Ascott had introduced just 10 months earlier had gone too far.

According to Tom Hodgson, a Toronto artist who resigned from the faculty over the curriculum dispute on Monday, this approach was more "un-structured and questioning" with few compulsory classes and a more "conceptual" approach to art.

When Pitt called for student ideas on the future direction of the college, students brought forth a plan called "Future Zed", which calls for a continuation and extension of this approach. It would reduce the student-teacher ratio substantially, eradicate the semester or year-by-year system in favour of individual development, and break down the idea of school taking place in a building.

In a November vote 89 per cent of the 467 of 916 students voting favored the proposal.

But next year's curriculum, already announced, reverts to the more traditional master-apprentice approach. For example, second and third years would require 24 hours of compulsory classes, all of which must be chosen from a given list. Now there are no compulsory classes and students can decide their own programs.

The faculty are also split along these traditional-progressive lines. According to Hodgson, 22 of the 60 faculty favour the newer concepts, but since any positions which allow the faculty input are elective, they have no voice in the college's policies.

As well, the 40 or so part time faculty, numbering among them many famous artists, have no say in the future of the college.

Student protests strangulation of Art College by government cutbacks.

Female professors' pay will match mens'

By LINDA McQUAIG

In a major attack on discrimination against women professors, the U of T administration will raise the salaries of female teaching staff to match their male counterparts.

The funds for the salary hikes, which have been provided in the university's as-yet-unpublished budget for 1973-74, came in response to revelations last year that gross salary and promotion discrimination exist at U of T.

Although Internal Affairs Committee chairman Paul Cadario, when asked last night, refused to reveal the amount involved, he did say it was a "considerable" sum.

"We were surprised how much would be needed," Cadario said.

A committee which is composed of three men and three women will review individually the cases of all full-time women teaching staff at U of T. It will then make recommendations to vice-president and provost Don Forster on whether or not compensation should be made, according to its chairman, vice-provost Peter Meincke.

In this sense it is an action committee, rather than merely an investigative body, according to engineering professor Ursula Franklin, who sat on the U of T Faculty Association Salary and Benefits Committee.

"We assume the world knows discrimination against women exists, and we are now trying to find the best, fastest and fairest way to rectify it," said Franklin.

Last year three women professors at U of T presented a brief to the provincial government with statistics revealing startling examples of discrimination against women.

The report cites, for instance, a marked difference between the average salary paid to men and women teaching staff of equal academic rank — $4,000 in the case of a full professor.

It also suggested that discrimination existed in the area of promotion, pointing out that the lower the rank, the greater the concentration of women teaching staff.

Jill Conway, one of the authors of the report and now a vice-president of the university, points out that the administration, once presented with the facts, was "extremely sympathetic and anxious to correct the situation."

The University of Toronto Faculty Association has not been so helpful, however, according to psychology professor Wendy Potter another report author.

In fact, when the association made its submission to the budget committee of the Governing Council, the committee criticized it for not giving top priority to the question of discrimination against women, said Cadario.

Slater resigns in York's "best interests"

Critics force York's Slater to resign

Bending beneath the criticisms of his colleagues, David Slater Monday night resigned as president of the financially troubled York University.

Although his resignation takes effect June 30, Slater requested and received Board approval for a leave starting yesterday.

In his letter of resignation, Slater wrote that the president's office involves "difficult inter-personal relations and I do not believe that I can be sufficiently effective to my own standards in serving the needs of the university in the present circumstances". He said he was resigning "in the best interests of the community".

Law professor Walter Tarnopolsky admitted he had probably started the tide leading to Slater's resignation when he quit as the university's academic vice-president last month, complaining that he couldn't do his job properly within the York administrative set-up. He felt Slater tried to do too much himself, being unable to delegate authority. The president had spent too much time on minor matters, Tarnopolsky said.

"You can't hate David Slater, but you can't rely on him," he said.

Slater's troubles started last Fall when York was particularly hard hit by Ontario's decline in university enrolment. The university had estimated that its enrolment would increase by 1,550 students; but, it only got 150. Since provincial government grants based on the number of students attending a university cover 80 per cent of operating costs, the shortfall meant a drastic reduction in the amount of money available to York for next year.

Slater panicked when he learned of the enrolment decline and originally told the university's academic Senate that 160 faculty would have to be fired, throwing the entire university into turmoil. Further investigation revealed that Slater and his associates had miscalculated the necessary cut. He told the Senate that $4 million would have to be cut, eventually revising this figure down to $1.2 million. A 1971-72 surplus of $300,000 trimmed the deficit to a more manageable $705,000.

The man who quit as dean of York's administrative studies program in protest against Slater's leadership, Barry Richman, said, "The budget crisis called for high quality management and leadership. Slater didn't have the experience or the staff to handle it."

Richman said he wouldn't have quit had Slater resigned earlier.

Slater also clashed with popular Atkinson College dean, Harry Crowe, at one point before Christmas giving him five minutes in which to declare his loyalty or resign. Crowe refused, walking out. Slater later tried to cool that controversy by offering Crowe five months in which to reconsider his refusal.

Speculation had developed that Slater would resign at the end of the current academic year, but most of the university was caught off balance by his sudden resignation. He had been scheduled to release a statement to the university community explaining his actions in recent months. The 15-page statement had apparently been drafted and redrafted, but never released.

York's Board of Governors chose American social historian Richard Storr acting president, pointing out that he would not be a candidate for the presidency when his term expires this June. Board chairman Robert MacIntosh appealed to members of the university community to work together with the acting president in the best interests of the university.

He said a new president will be chosen "by means of an agreed process of consultation throughout the university".

Slater came to York from Queen's University in 1970. The then Queen's Dean of Graduate Studies was not the presidential search committee's first choice. All of the favourite candidates had withdrawn from the running when the York student newspaper, Excalibur, revealed their identities.

Assailed by colleagues, Slater quit York on Monday night.

OFS kills moratoria

TORONTO (CUP)—The Ontario Federation of Students executive Monday night reversed its Saturday decision to organize three days of moratoria and study sessions protesting cutbacks in financing post-secondary education.

"Something like this would require a lot of enthusiasm," OFS executive member Shane Roberts explained yesterday.

"The solid support for such action was lacking, from member institutions," OFS general co-ordinator Craig Heron reported. He had spent Monday telephoning member councils to inform them of the executive decision. "The response was reasonably lukewarm," he said.

Except for one or two councils, the members greeted the proposal with reluctance or lack of enthusiasm, Roberts noted. The executive, realizing that planning another action with less than enthusiastic support from a majority of its membership would be "a mistake", decided to call off the moratoria. A demonstration outside the provincial legislature last November fizzled for lack of active support, and the month before voter turnout for OFS' province-wide referendum on federation demands regarding the financing of post-secondary education had been poor on many campuses.

Heron had argued against the initial executive decision in favour of holding the moratoria on the very grounds that in the end led to their cancellation. Roberts admitted there had been disagreement about the practicality of organizing the action, but said the executive had finally endorsed a compromise plan to spread the moratoria over three days.

Technicians may strike

Forty-five U of T animal lab technicians will take a strike vote tomorrow, if the local union's business agent has his way.

Service Employees International Union Local 204 business agent Don Barclay says he will "strongly recommend" that a strike vote be taken at tomorrow's emergency meeting of the technicians.

The workers have been bargaining with the university since November, just after they were organized. Barclay says the only matter not yet settled involves wage increases. The university has made an offer during conciliation which Barclay feels is "not acceptable."

The union is seeking wage rates in the area of $3.61 to $4.01 an hour for the technicians who now earn $2.51 to $2.84 per hour. The university's offer will be revealed to the membership at tomorrow's meeting, but is known to be about 50 cents less than the union is asking.

The workers' jobs involve cleaning cages, and feeding and caring for animals to be used in research. Most work in the Medical Sciences, Zoology, Banling, and Dental Buildings.

Barclay says that on the basis of his recommendation, a strike vote will probably be taken. He says he wants a mandate to strike, if necessary, so he can take it to the next conciliation meeting on February 8 to force the university's hand.

Police charge woman for postering building

Metro police were called on campus late last Thursday to lay a summary charge against a woman accused of putting up posters on university property.

Jackie Larkin says that she and a friend were chased by U of T police after her friend was grabbed and accused of putting posters on the pillars of Sidney Smith Hall. Her friend escaped, but Larkin reports that she was headed off with the police car on Spadina Crescent.

"I wasn't even arrested; they just shoved me in the car," said Larkin. "They called the Metro cops to make the charge. They said that I would be receiving a summons for defacing U of T property or something along those lines."

After being questioned by a Metro policeman in the Borden Building headquarters of campus police, she was released.

Larkin had not received the summons as of yesterday.

A university policeman replied, "I don't know anything about it" when interviewed by phone Friday afternoon at headquarters.

The posters, publicizing last Saturday's Indochina Solidarity demonstration, were later torn down. Sidney Smith has traditionally been used by posterers.

Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway and campus co-ordinator Lois Rejmer yesterday both confirmed that U of T policy prohibits sticking posters to university buildings. The university has increased the number of bulletin boards provided for posters, Rejmer noted.

They both disclaimed knowledge of any directive to detain or charge people who violate the policy. If someone is caught postering a building, they are simply told not to continue, Rejmer said.

Questioned Sunday, U of T security chief J.F. Westhead at first denied any knowledge of the incident. "Never heard of it," he said. "That sounds interesting."

He later "recalled overhearing some conversation about it", but denied knowledge of the laying of charges. "She'd better get her facts straight," he added.

When asked if the police action represents a change in university policy on postering, Westhead said, "I don't think it represents anything at the moment. I'm not making any statement about it. In fact, I don't even know who you are."

He then hung up.

Attempts to re-contact Westhead yesterday were unsuccessful.

SAC to discuss tactics

The SAC executive decided last night to organize a general meeting to discuss tactics to fight the educational cutbacks. The meeting will be held next Tuesday from 12 till 2 pm.

Speakers at the meeting will probably include representatives of SAC, the Ontario Federation of Students, the Erindale Student Council and possibly speakers from occupied universities, Brock, York and Trent.

The call for the meeting is a result of a motion passed by Erindale and Innis student councils with the support of three other college and faculty student presidents.

The last two SAC meetings have been unable to finish because of disruptions. Education Commissioner and Law student George Strathy said he is consulting lawyers about requesting an injunction against the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee (SSSC) to prevent it from disrupting the next meeting to be held at Scarborough College next Tuesday.

The executive agreed before taking that step, it would talk to the SSSC to prevent a repetition of the disruption.

The executive agreed to spend up to $400 to publish a university wide newspaper on the fees boycott and educational surplus to be circulated before the meeting.

President Eric Miglin and three other executive members will meet with President John Evans later this week to try to get the administration to waive entirely the late penalty of $15 for students with holding fees.

They agreed to pay former communications-services fieldworker Paul Carson severance pay of two weeks, even though he resigned and it isn't necessary under the Canadian Union of Public Employees contract.

It also passed a motion supporting open athletic directorate meetings.

Over 6,000 have yet to pay fees

Over half of U of T's students who chose to pay their fees in two instalments had not yet paid their second term fees by Monday.

Comptroller's office supervisor D. Caston said yesterday that 6,114 of the 11,469 students who are paying in instalments have yet to pay. These figures include both graduate and undergraduate students.

More significantly, this proportion of students is approximately 50 per cent more than had not paid last year, SAC vice-president John Helliwell estimates. Because the $100 rise in tuition fees was applied to the first instalment, the proportion of fees owing for the year collected by the university has been is "within one per cent" of last year's proportion, he added.

"I'm very encouraged," Helliwell commented, "although I'm surprised so many were late paying last year."

President Eric Miglin commented last night that the fees strike is going "better at U of T than at any other Ontario University."

The fees were due January 15, after which a theoretical late penalty of $15 was to be charged. However, the university has informally waived the fee to support students' struggle against cutbacks in education financing.

Approximately 1,000 students paid their second term instalments in the first two weeks of this term. Another 1,000 paid a week ago, Monday, 1,500 the next day and 964 on Wednesday.

Only 270 paid on Thursday, 339 on Friday and 205 Monday but Helliwell admitted this might be attributable to the mail strike.

If the mail doesn't move, "our strike is a great success," he commented wryly.

Caston commented that he expected a "big influx" of payments by tomorrow because the mails are moving again.

"A university president in Canada is required to have some of the qualities of the superintendents of lunatic asylums or of ring masters in circuses."

— Harold Innis

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Daisons Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

BLAND is GRAND!

We hear that the university is launching a massive campaign to eliminate the proliferation of posters presently disfiguring this campus. We can, of course, only approve of this program. Our artist has reconstructed a "before" picture and one of how things will look when they've fully implemented the program.

"BEFORE"

Notice the "before" picture. Hundreds of groups of all sorts using the cheapest form of advertising to reach the largest student audience, delaying students who should be in class and destroying the serious atmosphere of this university with their garish posters.

"AFTER"

And, now look at the "after" picture. What an improvement!!! The dramatic, sweeping lines of the U of T buildings emerge from under their layer of vulgarity and become once more... respectable!!

Imagine. The bare brick of the Ramsey Wright building glistening in the smog, or the concrete slabs of Sidney Smith Hall without one speck of colour to mar them! Yes, we already have a campus that is huge and impersonal; now, we'll have one that is bland as well!!!

Warning given to Board of Trustees

Brock students may escalate occupation

ST. CATHERINES (CUP) — Brock University students may escalate their occupation from the 13th floor of the Brock Tower to financial and administrative offices if the university's Board of Trustees does not find a way to rehire teachers who were dismissed due to cutbacks in educational spending.

Students applied pressure to the board after a meeting with Brock representatives and Ontario Colleges and Universities Minister Jack McNie.

The occupation of the Brock Tower has been in progress for a week.

The board meets today and students will discuss future action at a general student union meeting Thursday.

The Brock delegation which met McNie included teacher and administration representatives, the board chairman and vice-chairman, and only one student — union president Drew Davidson.

Davidson said McNie talked about a new financing system for universities, "but he didn't say that would add anything to the university".

McNie said after the meeting, "we're trying to find a new way . . . the present formula (geared to enrolment) worked well for an expanding enrolment," he said.

The government is trying to remain non-committal until it presents its budget in March, when university reaction would be minimal. Indications are the government hopes the raise the amount students are required to pay for education, while providing easier, larger loans, repayable as a surcharge on future income.

But, Brock president James Gibson hopes the government will alter the basic income unit BIU to increase money available to Brock under formula financing.

The Brock representatives wanted McNie to either increase the BIU value, increase the grant Brock receives as a relatively new university, provide a supplementary grant for lower income universities, or approve funding for graduate programs.

The Brock delegation reported the results of the meeting to about 400 students later that day at a general student union meeting.

GOVERNING COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY ANNOUNCEMENT OF ELECTION

1. In the event of any conflict between these guidelines and the provisions of the UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ACT, 1971, the provisions of the ACT prevail.
2. These guidelines are with respect to the election of members from the University's staff and student groups only.
3. Enquiries may be directed to the Office of the Governing Council at 928-2160.

Powers and Duties of the Governing Council

The University of Toronto Act, 1971, vests in the Governing Council, the government, management and control of the University and of University College, and property, revenues, business and affairs thereof, and the powers and duties of the former Board of Governors and Senate of the University. In view of the size and complexity of the University and the extensive duties of the Governing Council, it has delegated many of its review powers to working committees. In addition to an Executive Committee, the Council has established an Academic Affairs Committee, a Business Affairs Committee, an External Affairs Committee, an Internal Affairs Committee, and a Planning and Resources Committee. All members of Council currently sit on at least one of these committees, and a number of members sit on more than one. The working committee structure is outlined briefly below

Academic Affairs Committee

- 25 members, 15 of whom are members of the Governing Council. Terms of reference include policy on the following:
 - Academic standards and practices
 - Curricula
 - Admissions
 - Examinations
 - Awards (and student aid in general)
 - Degrees (including honorary)
 - Academic Appeals
 - Faculty appointments and records, promotions, tenure, discipline, and procedure for appeals.
 - Academic services (libraries, instructional media, computers, records (students), schedules, room allocations, academic counselling services, research administration services).
 - Matters of policy associated with:
 - Adult education curricula (extension, conservatory)
 - Liaison with secondary schools, CAATS, etc.
 - Degree convocations.
 - University calendars (and other "academic" publications)
 - General publications regarding the University (e.g. AUCC Handbook, etc.)
- #### Business Affairs Committee
- 11 members, all of whom are members of the Governing Council. Terms of reference include policy on the following:
 - All financial services, investment, pensions, trusts, legal contracts, insurance, and annual review of current budget.
 - Properties, physical planning of the University, and construction.
 - Subsidiary enterprises: Insulin, Conservatory, Harris, Press.
 - Non-Academic personnel services and other Administrative procedures.
- #### External Affairs Committee
- 12 members, all of whom are members of the Governing Council. Terms of reference include policy on the following:
 - Community relations: neighbourhood, city.
 - Information and public relations.
 - Ceremonials (except degree convocations), public lectures, dinners, carillon, building openings, etc.
 - Relations with giving community.
 - Relations with alumni.

- Internal Affairs Committee
- 12 members, all of whom are members of the Governing Council. Terms of reference include policy on the following:
 - Discipline.
 - Campus Services — some examples: Athletics, bookstore, residences, food services, housing, health, security, communications, campus police, parking, all theatres and concert halls including Hart House theatre, use of Convocation Hall, career counselling and placement services, Hart House, Faculty Club, International Centre and other special services for overseas students (e.g. C.I.D.A.), day care, campus centre, general counselling, and other campus services as new ones appear and existing services vanish.
 - Policy issues arising from relations with campus organizations.

Planning and Resources Committee

- 15 members, 13 of whom are members of the Governing Council. Terms of reference include policy on the following:
 - General objectives and priorities of the University.
 - Initiation and termination of academic programmes and review of all other matters with major resource implications.
 - Research policy.
 - Operating budget planning and annual review of current budget.
 - Capital budget planning including priorities for major new and renovated space.
 - Review of major University policy submissions to external agencies.

COMPOSITION

The Governing Council is composed of 50 members as follows:

- 1 - Chancellor (ex-officio)
- 1 - President (ex-officio)
- 2 - Presidential Appointees
- 16 - Lieutenant Governor in Council Appointees
- 12 - Teaching Staff
- 8 - Students
 - 2 graduate students
 - 4 full-time undergraduate students
 - 2 part-time undergraduate students
- 2 - Administrative Staff
- 8 - Alumni

FRANCHISE

"Teaching Staff" means the employees of the University, University College, the constituent colleges and the federated universities who hold the academic rank of professor, associate professor, assistant professor, full-time lecturer or part-time lecturer unless such part-time lecturer is registered as a student. ("Lecturer" includes associates and clinical teachers in the Faculty of Medicine, and associates in the Faculty of Dentistry.)

Teaching Staff Constituencies:

In all cases a teaching staff member's constituency will be determined on the basis of his major teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school. Only in the case of a teaching staff member without a teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school, will his constituency be determined by another appointment.

Constituency I - 6 seats - divided as follows:

- Constituency IA - 1 seat - W. B. Dunphy - term expires June 30, 1974.
- all teaching staff members who hold their major appointments in the federated universities.

Constituency IB - 1 seat - FOR WHICH AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED

- J. M. R. Margeson - term expires June 30, 1973
- all teaching staff members who hold their major appointments at Scarborough or Erindale Colleges.

Constituency IC - 1 seat - FOR WHICH AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED

- R. M. H. Shepherd - term expires June 30, 1973
- all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Arts and Science who hold their major appointments in the University College or New College Departments of Classics, English, French, German, Near Eastern Studies; or in the University Departments of East Asian Studies, Fine Art, Islamic Studies, Italian and Hispanic Studies, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Sanskrit and Indian Studies (excluding those who are members of Constituency IB).

Constituency IO - 1 seat - H. C. Eastman - term expires June 30, 1975

- all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Arts and Science who hold their major appointments in the Departments of Anthropology, Geography, History, Philosophy, Political Economy, Sociology, Psychology, (excluding those who are members of Constituency IB).

Constituency IE - 1 seat - J. E. Dove - term expires June 30, 1974

- all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Arts and Science who hold their major appointments in the Departments of Astronomy, Chemistry, Computer Science, Geology, Mathematics Physics, Botany, Zoology (excluding those who are members of Constituency IB).

Constituency IF - 1 seat - C. M. T. Hanly - term expires June 30, 1975

- all teaching staff who are members of Constituencies IC, ID or IE.
- Constituency II - 1 seat - H. W. Smith - term expires June 30, 1974
- all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering.
- Constituency III - 2 seats - FOR ONE OF WHICH SEATS AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED

J. C. Laidlaw - term expires June 30, 1973

E. A. Sellers - term expires June 30, 1974

- all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Medicine.

Constituency IV - 1 seat - FOR WHICH AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED

A. M. Fallis - term expires June 30, 1973.

- all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Dentistry, Faculty of Food Sciences, School of Hygiene, Faculty of Nursing, Faculty of Pharmacy, School of Physical and Health Education.

- J. H. Parker - term expires June 30, 1974.
- all administrative staff members.

Terms of Office

Administrative Staff - three years
Students - one year
Teaching Staff - three years

NOMINATIONS

Nominations for four teaching staff, eight student, and one administrative staff seat will open on January 22nd, and will remain open until February 12th, 1973, at 12:00 noon. Nominations must be sponsored by the following number of nominators:

Teaching Staff - 10; Graduate Student - 15; Full-Time Undergraduate Students - 50; Part-Time Undergraduate Students - 15; and Administrative Staff - 20.

Nominators must be members of the same constituency as the nominee, and a nominator may not nominate more candidates for election than there are seats vacant in his constituency. Nomination forms may be obtained, upon request, from the Office of the Governing Council, or the Registrars' Offices at Scarborough and Erindale Colleges.

The onus is on the person nominated for election to file a bona fide nomination paper. Errors or irregularities in these papers constitute grounds for rejection of the nomination. Such errors or irregularities may be corrected prior to the close of nominations but not afterwards. The Office of the Governing Council will attempt to notify candidates of any errors prior to the close of nominations. Consequently, candidates are advised to complete and submit their nomination forms early in the nomination period.

The names of candidates nominated for election will be considered public information as they are received. The names of nominators will not be released by the Office of the Governing Council.

A person nominated as a candidate in the election may withdraw his nomination by notarized instrument in writing received by the Office of the Governing Council within 48 hours after the close of nominations. A successful candidate must resign his seat at any time at which he ceases to meet the eligibility requirements for election to that seat.

CITIZENSHIP

Any person nominated as a candidate must be a Canadian citizen at the time of nomination if his candidacy is to be acceptable.

ELECTION EXPENSES

Candidate campaign expenses will be refunded up to a limit of $50, on production of bona fide receipts at the close of the election. Each candidate claiming a refund shall submit to the Secretary of the Governing Council a detailed statement of all election expenses incurred by him or on his behalf. Such statements shall be open to examination by any constituent.

ELECTION SCHEDULE

- nominations open - January 22nd
- nominations close - February 12th, 12:00 noon
- voting to be conducted by mailed ballot, ballots mailed on or about - March 2nd
- close of election - March 20th
- announcement of results - shortly thereafter

BALLOTING METHOD

- ballots will be mailed to each voter at his home address as recorded in the University's record systems;
- each ballot will be accompanied by a small secrecy envelope into which the marked ballot should be sealed;
- also provided will be a return-addressed envelope into which the small secrecy envelope should be sealed;
- voters will be required to provide, on the upper left-hand corner of the return envelope, information sufficient to allow verification of their ballot return;
- each ballot will also be accompanied by an information sheet containing candidates' statements, information on the correct method to return the ballot, information on eligibility to use that particular ballot, and a short description of the powers and duties of the Governing Council;
- persons who receive the wrong ballot due to an error in records will be advised in the information sheet how to obtain the correct ballot;
- persons who receive no ballot due to an error in records will be advised, through advertisements in the campus media, how to obtain the correct ballot;
- all eligible voters are entitled to vote using one ballot:
 - members of the teaching staff who hold a non-academic appointment will vote in the appropriate teaching staff constituency;
 - full-time students who are employed by the University as teaching assistants, research assistants, temporary library help, or in any other way, will vote in the appropriate student constituency;

- part-time students who are employees of the University may vote in the appropriate student constituency or in the administrative staff constituency, but not in both constituencies;

- in the case of two or more ballots being received from any one voter, both being ballots for a constituency in which the voter is entitled to vote, only the first ballot received by the Office of the Governing Council will be considered valid.

VOTING IN MULTIPLE SEAT CONSTITUENCIES

- a voter may vote for up to the number of seats vacant in his constituency.

BALLOTING BY VOTERS ABSENT FROM THE CAMPUS

- It is suggested that voters who will be absent from campus during the balloting period arrange to have their ballot forwarded to them. Two weeks are allowed for return of ballots.

BALLOT RECEIVING LOCATIONS

- for the convenience of voters who do not wish to return their ballots through the mail, ballots may be handed in at:

1. Simcoe Hall - Information Desk
2. Sidney Smith Hall - Main Foyer
3. Erindale College - Registrar's Office
4. Scarborough College - Registrar's Office

BALLOT MAILING LISTS

- a list will be available shortly prior to and during balloting for inspection by any person at the Office of the Governing Council at hours convenient to the person and the Office.

SCRUTINEERING

- scrutineers shall be appointed by the Governing Council of the University. The decisions of such scrutineers in any matters of contention regarding validity of nominations, voter eligibility, and verification and tabulation of returns, shall be final.

- in addition, each candidate for election may appoint a scrutineer for the tabulation of returns and such scrutineers may also check the completed verification of ballot returns prior to tabulation.

BALLOT SECURITY

- all returned ballots will be held in security by the Office of the Governing Council.

EQUALITY OF VOTES

- in the case of an equality of votes for candidates for any office for which only one person is to be elected, the successful candidate shall be determined by a lottery conducted by the Office of the Governing Council.

IRREGULARITIES

- the election shall not be invalidated by any irregularity which does not affect the outcome of the election.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF RESULTS

- the number of votes received by each candidate will be announced, as will the number of spoiled ballots received.

RETENTION AND DISPOSAL OF BALLOTS AND RETURN ENVELOPES

- all ballots received, and all return envelopes, will be held in security by the Office of the Governing Council for a period of sixty days after the announcement of election results. Any re-count requested by any candidate will be conducted if authorized by the Governing Council of the University. After the period of sixty days all ballots received, and all return envelopes, will be destroyed.

AUTHORITY FOR THE CONDUCT OF THE ELECTION

- the election is conducted by the Governing Council under the authority of the University of Toronto Act, 1971.

Bewitching insurance company ads offer unpromising careers

The Will to Succeed

IT takes more than will power to succeed in life. It takes a healthy vigorous brain and a well built frame with no weak spots. The time to build that kind of a—foundation for future success is in early adulthood.

Students looking for permanent jobs cannot be lured by the insurance company ads for another year. in a couple of weeks, the recruit is faced with the horrible problem of finding more people to try and sell but without any real formal selling training and only the most tenuous grasp of the technicalities of the policies he is selling. The agent is in trouble. To help him out, the manager will give the recruit a list of names to contact. What the unsuspecting salesman does not know is that this list originally belonged to another new agent who didn't make the grade and the people on the list are probably adept at refusing the poor guy's advances. In the end, unless he is either inordinately lucky or one of those strange people who can grasp the intricacies of the industry and the nature of selling in a short time, the new recruit quits the business, leaving behind his list of friends for someone else.

Of 24 companies approached about this natural market, 12 openly boasted about using it, six grudgingly admitted it, and the last six denied it completely although their salesmen admitted it.

Those people who survive three years of this kind of thing can be assumed to have survived and make a good income, averaging about $10,000 a year. These agents are worth dealing with because they know that their policies say and they know what to sell their clients. They also have a reputation to protect, whereas the new man will often be so anxious to make a sale he will actively suppress information from the client and cheat him.

But, how do they share these recruits? In a newspaper or at Manpower, you can expect that half the ads asking for people to join a financial industry or promising huge incomes are insurance salesmen ads. These ads often ask for graduates whereas the truth is that they will hire anybody if he knows someone who might buy a policy.

Most insurance companies give a selling or aptitude test to the applicant. These are laughable parodies of true aptitude tests and are only designed to give the person seeking the job a sense of superiority. When the agency manager very professionally totals up your score, you can be absolutely certain he will tell you "in strictest confidence and with utmost sincerity" that you are the most promising and talented person to walk through the hallowed chrome glass doors of the and go through an interview. This private talk goes something like this:

"Listen, let me tell you what it's really like," he says as he lounges in a nifty sports jacket, mismatched wide tie, spiffy cuffed pants and unctuous voice. "This business is only for those who want to work. Only those who can keep at it and sell. You have to have a liking for people because we are here to serve them. Our only aim is to provide them with something they really need and this company has the best for the people".

From the tone of his voice, you get the feeling that anybody who would want to make money off these poor unfortunates isn't wanted in the company and you half expect him to tell you he donates his commission to charity. The final comment goes something like this: "Life insurance is like a religion and we are its priests, we look after the poor and the sick. God is on our side."

Even if you're hired, you get no salary. You either make commissions which equal the total of a year's premium on one policy, or you get a set sum from a drawing account.

This means that you have to sell a certain amount of insurance in a month. If you don't make the quota, the company will graciously give you the difference between the total commissions and your "salary". If next month you go over quota, the company will subtract the difference to make up your debt. Generally speaking, an insurance agent is not entitled to sick pay or vacation time although in Canada this is changing. An agent is not a member of the company despite what the company says. An agent is a contracted employee which means the company is not responsible for him and does not have to support him.

What about the companies? There are roughly 2,000 companies in North America selling life insurance and they employ 500,000 salesmen. Metropolitan Life, for example, insures 50,000,000 people.

These companies make 100 billion dollars a year in sales. Of this, the industry is forced to pay out four and a half billion to people who are inconsiderate enough to die. The remainder of the money is invested by a couple of thousand investment officers who control 200 investment companies. The industry says it owns 150,000,000 million dollars worth of assets.

Insurance companies own several multinational rent-a-car operations, several casket manufacturers (nothing like hedging your bets), liquor companies, several of those highly advertised loan sharking outfits that cover the country so well, and so much real estate they could become a major world power.

As a matter of fact, the life insurance racket is the world's largest business, short of making war, although in the long run insurance comes out on top. Its advertising budget some years ago ran about $70,000,000.

In selling life insurance, several tactics are used by the salesmen apart from the regular crude ones. These take the form of applied psychology, such as fear of death. The most popular tactics are what is called canned sales pitches which are a formula used by the salesman that requires the customer to answer every question put by the agent in the affirmative. After a series of seemingly innocent and simple questions, the agent casually asks the client to buy. Because the client has been conditioned to the word yes during the pitch and because the questions are phrased in such a way that to answer no would make him sound a fool, the client automatically buys the policy.

Another great practice which best illustrates the industry's avarice and greed is illustrated by this short quote taken from an industry trade magazine published some years ago, but still valid:

"Death is a morbid subject and you don't like it. Neither, you feel, does the client like it, and you refuse to back the hearse up to his door. Well, I agree. I don't think we should back the hearse up to the door — I think we should put him in it! We've got to kill him!"

A PROTEST TO PREMIER ALEKSEI N. KOSYGIN DOES HUMANITY HAVE A PRICE TAG?

In the name of human rights, on this 25th anniversary of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, this petition is published.

AN APPEAL TO PRIME MINISTER PIERRE ELLIOTT TRUDEAU

On August 3, 1972 the Soviet Government imposed an unconscionable and inhumane "head tax" on all educated Soviet citizens seeking to leave the country. And since this decree applies principally to Jews wishing to emigrate to Israel it has transformed Soviet Jewry into a new class of indentured servants.

We, members of faculty of the University of Toronto and York University, deplore this ransoming of human beings in violation of all canons of international law and human decency. And we take specific offence to the anti-Jewish intent and effect of the decree, particularly as it follows upon a series of intolerable harassments, political persecutions, arbitrary dismissals from employment and committal to "psychiatric wards" and labour camps for Soviet Jews and their families.

The human mind and human body belong to the individual alone. Men and women must be free to develop their talents, to pursue their professions, to advance scholarship and knowledge, and thus to make their contribution to humanity wherever they wish. Otherwise a crippling blow is inflicted upon their rights as human beings, upon sciences and culture, and ultimately upon the welfare of mankind.

We therefore call upon the Soviet Union, in recognition of the rights of its own citizens, in conformity with international law and human dignity, and in the interests of further cooperation between our two peoples and two countries, to rescind this price tag on humanity.

We appeal to Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau and the Canadian Government to use its good offices to secure these objectives) and we call upon all Canadians of goodwill to join us in this protest.

Day care report "left to fall by wayside"

By FRAN JOHNSON

Although SAC voted in September to set up a committee to recommend to council a position on day care, work on the report has not yet been started.

And, nothing is planned to be done about it in the immediate future, says SAC vice-president John Helliwell.

Asked what council was doing about day care, president Eric Miglin replied "That's a really good question." He added that he assumes the report has been "left to fall by the wayside", since he hasn't heard anything about it since last summer.

Campus Co-op Day Care is now entering its 10th month of occupying a building on Devonshire Place, while the U of T administration has not yet found alternate accommodation to satisfy the occupiers' demands. The building is wanted by the administration to convert into a U of T day care centre which would exclude the co-op.

SAC vice-president Ross Flowers said yesterday that SAC's official position has not changed since the summer. It still supports the co-op.

He added that he did not know what the co-op's demands were, since the occupation had gone on so long and the co-op had altered them.

The committee was reluctantly established by council, Flowers felt, and only because day care had been made a priority. The committee never actually got under way because apparently "nobody felt strongly enough about it" to volunteer for it.

When Helliwell was asked what SAC is doing about day care, he admitted, "We haven't done a damn thing. We're trying to ignore the problem right now," he said.

He thought the co-op's demands were "somewhat unreasonable" because he said the group was not satisfied with the administration's offers.

The council has appointed Vic SAC representative Geoff Parker to the Day Care Advisory Committee, which is advising the administration how to set up its proposed centre in the Devonshire building.

Helliwell says SAC will discuss day care again after the advisory committee has completed its survey of the university's day care needs.

Real history of India ignored, says prof

By MICHAEL O'KEEFE

Imperialists have moulded the western conception of Indian civilization, contended University of Chicago anthropologist Bernard Cohen in a lecture Monday afternoon.

Speaking to an audience of about 35 at Sidney Smith Hall, the author of India: The Social Anthropology of a Civilization, addressed himself to the question, "Is there an Indian history?"

Historians from Karl Marx to Neville Maxwell have agreed that India lacks a viable historical theme, said Cohen. Conquered by a series of intruders, India has been characterized as a static and disorganized nation by most western observers. These remain as the basic assumptions of such contemporary liberal authors as Gunnar Myrdal and Barrington Moore.

Cohen challenged these assumptions of stagnation and disunity and described how they were derived from British Imperial strategy. He explained that the western interpretation of Indian civilization developed in three main phases.

The first of these was the theory of despotism, which described India as lawless and autocratic. The absence of a firm law of succession was blamed for the recurring chaos amidst a generally despotic form of government.

The British, as Cohen pointed out, saw this as "unnatural" and sought explanations for this Indian "proclivity" to live under despotism. This proclivity was attributed to everything from religious and climatic factors to the Indian customs such as the prohibition of alcohol.

As Cohen explained, this theory functioned as a rationalization for the British takeover. The East India Company, which was only pursuing its "natural right to trade", was forced to fill the political vacuum created by a chaotic despotism in order to protect its investments.

The company line did not fool conservative historian Edmund Burke, who understood that the company was responsible for most of the chaos in India. Most historians, however, ignored such factors as the British destruction of the relatively advanced Indian textile industry and the ensuing socio-economic dislocation. The company view eventually prevailed.

Once the conquest had been justified by imperial historians, the next step was to legitimize British rule, Cohen stated.

The second phase, therefore, emphasized the village community and the caste system. The villages were described as static little republics, undisturbed by national or international affairs.

The despotism-anarchy syndrome once seen as pervasive, was now attributed to only the national layer of Indian government. By replacing this layer, the British civil service claimed that they were acting in the interest of the Indian people.

Cohen pointed out the problems in British policy based upon this analysis. To begin with, the village was not the basic socio-economic unit in 19th century India. Refusing to recognize any native political maturity, the British overlooked the larger territorial corporate groupings that the Indians had established.

Conveniently, however, the village republic theory provided an expansionary rationale on the premise that more villages should be annexed rather than "left in chaos."

The third phase, the feudal theory, developed with the need to preserve British rule.

British historians began to describe the Indian society as strongly feudal, no longer anarchic nor republican. The once cherished Indian people were ignored while the aristocratic elite was emphasized. This elite brought India under the direct reign of the English crown by Queen Victoria's proclamation of 1858.

Cohen credited Gandhi for his perception of this feudal theory as the core of British policy. It was the Gandhian refusal to participate, the rejection of titles, medals, and honors from the British crown, that gave Indian nationalism its identity.

The notions of stagnation and disunity were merely intellectual artifacts of imperial historians Cohen concluded.

Committee to study marking

The General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science Monday referred a motion allowing the remarking of exam papers back to its faculty dominated Committee on Standing.

The motion, moved by New College representative Howard Levitt, was referred by a large margin of members voting with most students supporting the referral.

The 35 minute debate on the motion included arguments by conservative faculty that the standing committee had already spent time on the question and should not waste any more.

Interdisciplinary Studies Committee student member Seymour Kanowitch withdrew a motion condemning the administration for its apparent cutbacks in the Interdisciplinary Studies department and its refusal to appoint a new chairman to replace retiring Geoffrey Payzant.

The motion had been moved in December but arch-conservative J.B. Conacher then refused the unanimous consent necessary to discuss it.

Since then psychology professor Marty Wall has been appointed. Chairman Kanowitch commented that while he was happy with the choice he disagreed with the method of selection which involved no students.

On the recommendation of the Social Sciences Curriculum Committee, a sub-committee was set up to determine where courses should be taught if there is an overlap in subject matter.

The General Committee will meet again in February. Little controversy is expected until the New Program Review Committee report is released in March.

Abolition motions tabled

Faculty of Food Science gets reprieve

By MARK BOHNEN

The University of Toronto's Faculty of Food Science will probably not be closed for the time being.

Associate arts dean James Cruise, chairman of the Food Sciences Implementation Committee, predicted that the committee "would not recommend the closing of the faculty in the near future."

In a recent interview, Cruise said that the committee is considering a series of new motions which are "less dramatic" than four previous motions.

The previous motions, which contained proposals that could have meant the abolition of the faculty, were "tabled" according to Cruise.

These motions were set aside in a meeting last Monday, after the committee received a letter from the Faculty of Food Sciences staff urging it to first examine its terms of reference. The committee was set up to examine the feasibility of recommendations of a Senate report, and to propose ways to carry them out.

The motions were apparently set aside indefinitely because of internal disagreements among committee members on their terms. "In regards to the first four motions, the committee was split," said professor C. Dunkley, a member of the committee.

Although he would not discuss the content of the latest motions, Cruise said that they are more "middle of the road".

"The only kinds of motions that are going to find strong favour in this committee are going to be compromise motions because of the make-up of the committee.

"There hasn't been any unanimity in committee from the start because of the different backgrounds of the members, and their different perspectives."

Such diverse areas of study as food science, medicine, social work, and management studies are represented on the committee. Food science has only four representatives sitting on the 10 member committee.

"There has been a considerable degree of polarity in the committee," Cruise stated. "We hoped it wouldn't occur, but as a result we have had to settle for a compromise."

Cruise predicted that the final recommendations of the committee, due January 31, may suggest the initiation of "innovations and changes" in the undergraduate program to attract students over a "trial period" of five years. However he did not discuss the details of this proposal.

The Senate report found that although there is a need for and student interest in some departments of food science, others indicate little reason for continuation.

At present the department of textiles has a total of only three students and the department of community development has five. However the total number of students in the faculty, 83, is a new high in recent years.

Dunkley said that the committee would recommend a program in which the faculty could make use of other resources. She anticipated the increased cooperation of departments in the faculty with other areas of study such as Child Studies, economics, and sociology.

Asked if the food sciences building at the corner of Bloor and Avenue Road would continue to be controlled by the faculty, Cruise replied "I presume so."

Anti-war group claims parts from Canada used in U.S. planes

Three types of U.S. aircraft used to bomb North Viet Nam are built with Canadian parts, according to a Montreal research group.

In a press release issued by the Voice of Women in Toronto, Project Anti-War at McGill University states that the A-7, F-111 and F-4 fighter-bombers are built partly with Canadian corporate aid. Two of the companies involved in the planes have received Canadian government subsidies, according to the group.

Computing Devices of Canada, which manufactures the navigation system for the U.S. Navy A-7 fighter-bomber, received $1,165,000 in subsidies for war contracts in 1971, according to the project headed by professor Sam Noumoff.

The wing control system of the F-111 is fabricated by the Mensaco company of Montreal, it adds.

And the weapons release system computer of the F-4 bomber is built by Litton Systems in Rexdale, a suburb of Toronto. This company was awarded more than $750,000 grant from the U.S. Defence Department in 1972, the group says.

Litton also received more than eight million dollars from the Canadian government in 1971, under the Defense Production Sharing Agreement with the United States. This was less than the $6,571,000 in U.S. defense contracts the company received.

Project Anti-War points out that Litton has turned back all efforts to organize its 1,100 workers into a union.

The group adds that little of this information is available from the Canadian government, most of it coming from American Congressmen and American publications.

The McGill group recently released a report detailing Canadian corporate connections with the United States military establishment.

PHE A defeats Wew 4-2 Monday

By BOB BETTSON

The second place Division I A PHE A hockey team stole a 4-2 victory over first place Division I B New College Monday.

Help needed to assist women

Volunteers are needed to counsel women who need birth control, venereal disease and abortion information.

Women's Liberation Abortion Referral Service has a "desperate" need for people to give approximately 10 hours a month to assist women who need help. The service is non-profit and does not operate on LIP or any other grants, says Marlo Fieldstone.

To offer your help, call her at 923-6641, extension 524 (until 5 pm) or 363-6758. Or call the service at 533-9006.

New, coached by Varsity Blues' Bill Bubba, was ahead 2-0 until the final three minutes of the 40 minute game, despite the fact that the team only dressed seven players due to injuries and exams. However, the PHE squad was lucky to escape with a win.

Scoring for PHE were Taylor with two and Croke and Parpack with singles. Tessier notched New's first goal.

The New goalie, who Bubba said had not played for five years, had a shutout until the last three minutes. The New defence had protected him until then, withstanding several PHE power plays. (New's regular goalie was ill, according to Bubba.)

In other interfaculty hockey play Monday, Law I defeated New I 4-3, Med A downed Trin A 3-2, Dev House and Vic II played to a 5-5 tie, and Innis I lost to Fac Ed 5-0.

No more space on Monday so here's the rest of what we were able to get together on last weekend's intercollegiate competition. The women's fencing team defeated York and Ryerson Friday in the last tournament of the two part OWIAA sectionals. The four-member teams from Toronto and Ryerson battled closely, but finished with a 6-6 tie. However, when hits given were divided by hits received, Toronto came out on top. York, winning only four of 12 bouts, was easily foiled by Varsity. The U of T team stands first in its section with four victories, no losses, and qualifies for the finals to be held February 2-3 at the Benson Building... the men's wrestling team finished second to Royal Military College at the Carleton Invitational Sunday. Blues forfeited both the 118 and 190 weight classes. Four first place finishes were captured by Rob Moore (134), Peter Mathews (142), Roger Vachon (150), and Len Broderick (177). At heavyweight, Chris Preobrazzski placed second, while Dave Tanner (167) and Ken White (126) both finished third. White (118) placed third with wins on one pin and one decision, and one loss by a pin. Moore's first place finish came from a draw and a win by a decision. Mathews first was gained by three wins by decisions and one by a pin. Roger Vachon captured first place by wins in one decision and one pin, and one loss on a decision. At 158 pounds, Wally Crignan lost twice on decisions. Tanner's third place finish came from one win by a pin, two wins by decisions, and one loss by a decision. Although Len Broderick won the 177 pound class by forfeit, he competed twice in the 190 pound class, losing once on a decision, and once on a pin. Chris Preobrazzski (heavyweight) placed second to Claude Pilon on a 0-6 decision... U of T wrestling coach Joe Rabel urgently requests competitors under 130 and over 180 pounds to come out to practices, 5 to 6:30 pm, Monday to Friday... women's intermediate basketball defeated Ryerson last Thursday 34-13, but lost to Queen's 42-34 on Saturday in Kingston... women's senior basketball defeated Ottawa, 41-39 Friday and Carleton, 61-32 Saturday. Toronto is now tied with Queen's for first place with a 6-0-1 record... men's fencing team competed at the York Invitational Saturday along with Windsor, RMC, Ryerson, Waterloo, and York. York placed first in the foil competition, winning 36 bouts, while U of T finished second, winning 35. RMC was third with 30 wins. In the épée event, U of T finished last of five participating teams. Windsor was first, undefeated with 29 bouts; Waterloo came second with 18 wins, and RMC third with 16. U of T placed first in the sabre competition, winning 31 bouts (undefeated); Windsor finished second with 23 wins, and RMC was third with 18. Individually, Toronto's Eli Sukunda and Andrew Benyev were the best in the sabre competition... men's volleyball finished out of playoff contention at Ryerson Saturday. Toronto defeated Ottawa 15-9, 15-3, and Carleton 15-7, 15-2, but lost to Queen's 16-14, 16-14 to finish in third place in the Eastern Section.

However, the Eastern Section is split into two divisions, and Toronto finished second in its division behind York. Laurentian was third and Ryerson fourth. In the other division Queen's finished first, followed by Carleton and Ottawa. Queen's finished in first place overall and along with second place York, will represent the Eastern Section in the OUA finals next weekend at Queen's. In other games Saturday, Queen's defeated York, Laurentian, and Ryerson, all in two consecutive games; Carleton lost to York 2-1, but defeated Ottawa 2-0; Ryerson downed Carleton 2-0, and Ottawa 2-0; Laurentian defeated Carleton 2-0, but lost to Ottawa 2-0... the women's intermediate volleyball team defeated Queen's Saturday, winning three of four games to gain first place in the Eastern Section. Queen's held the number one spot until the weekend by virtue of Toronto's only loss — to Queen's — earlier in the season. However, at that time a full five games were necessary to decide the winner. (Toronto is in sole possession of first place because only four games were necessary Saturday to decide the winner.) The team also won its match against Ryerson last Thursday, 3-0... the women's ice hockey team defeated Western last Thursday, 2-0, and tied McGill at the arena Saturday, 2-2. Guelph and Toronto are presently tied for fourth place... in nordic skiing last Saturday four U of T participants placed well in the Ontario Zone Championships (not a university meet) near Sudbury. In the senior men's group (21 and over) Doug Garfield finished 12th with a time of 54 minutes, three seconds in the 15 kilometre, while Ken Sidney came 14th in 57:28. In the young men's age group (19-21), Peter Waisanen finished 10th in the 15 kilometre with a time of 60:40, and Dave McCleymont came 14th in 61:52... in the alpine meet at Collingwood, U of T was the overall total-point winner of the university meet, and competitor Doug Carter placed second individually... men's squash team finished third to Western and York (respectively) at the York Invitational Saturday. The team defeated Trent and Queen's, but lost to York 3-2. Individually, Varsity team member John Shales won the Ontario Junior Championship in a meet at Ridley College, St. Catharines... U of T's curling team placed fifth Saturday behind Guelph, Queen's, Brock, and Laurentian... the men's badminton team was chosen from among participants at the Benson Building Sunday afternoon. Team members include Pat Daley, Robert Young, Blair Faulkner, Lane Bishop, and John Corbett. The badminton finals take place February 17 at McMaster.

Blues swimmers, basketballers win in Hart House

University of Toronto Blues swimming and basketball teams both handily defeated their opponents last night in Hart House. Members of the swim team defeated an obviously weaker Ryerson squad 55-38, even though Ryerson was able to win five of the 11 events.

Upstairs in the main gym the men's basketball team was bouncing to an 81-74 expected win over York Yeomen. The York squad is now 3 and 6 for the season, while Blues' record is 4-3 going into a double-game weekend in Ottawa against Carleton University and the University of Ottawa.

The basketball team took an early lead and never looked back.

Blues were ahead by 16 points at one point, and at the half the score was Varsity 43, York 34.

However, with just over seven minutes remaining to play in the game York had closed the margin to within three points of a tie — 67-64. But at the 4:49 mark Yeomen's fourth highest scorer of the game, Jeff Simbrow, fouled out with the score a more comfortable 71-66.

Thirty seconds after, York had once again closed the gap to within three points of a tie, but Toronto's Bill Francis was fouled and given a chance to increase Blues' lead. Francis, Blues' third best scorer on the evening with 13 points, sunk both shots from the line.

With the game in their favour Blues seemed content to dribble and pass the ball around during the last few minutes of the game, forcing York to commit fouls.

Blues increased their lead by four points within the final three minutes of play on York's mistakes, two of those points coming from Blues Dave Watt, high scorer in the game with 17 points. Guard Peter Oolup added the other two to give Blues a last minute, comfortable margin.

Other Blues' scorers were Cress with 16, Oolip (11), Skyvington (10), Filinski and Rudmik with six each, and Scott with 2.

Downstairs in the pool the men's swimming team was eliminating Ryerson for the second time in the season. Blues' coach Robin Campbell used only John Rudderman, John Peters, and Tom Schonberg as regulars, substituting his reserves for some of the events last night.

Peters set two personal best times in the 50 and 500 freestyle events. Defeating team-mate Schonberg by a mere 2.1 seconds (with a time of 23.5) in the 50 freestyle, Peters went on to win the 500 free with more than over a half minute margin over second place D. Morden (also of Toronto). He clocked in at 5:39.6, while Morden finished in 6:08.2. Ryerson's B. Ritch was third in the event with a time of 6:37.3.

Adam Gesing won the 1000 freestyle in 12:06.2, with his closest opponent being team-mate D. Stripinis (14:39.3). Other events saw John Rudderman win the 200 butterfly in 2:17.1 and Schonberg take the 100 freestyle in 56.9. Toronto also won the 400 freestyle relay in 3:53.9, compared to Ryerson's 4:03.8.

This weekend Blues host the University of Ottawa on Friday at 7:30 pm in the Benson Building; Saturday the team travels to Hamilton for the McMaster Invitational.

New free course on sport begins

"The Individual and Sport" is the theme of a new free course beginning today from noon to 2 pm in the main lecture room in the Benson Building.

Co-ordinators of the course include athletics and recreation department instructor Andy Higgins, physical and health education assistant professor Jim McClements, and physical recreation consultant Al Lundquist. (Lundquist has done graduate work in the sociology of sport.)

Lundquist said Monday that the course is designed to be an open forum on the individual and his rights with respect to sport. The focus of the forum will be entirely dependent upon the interests of the students and faculty involved, although there will be some attempt by the co-ordinators to discuss political, sociological, and economic issues, which they feel might be overlooked.

According to Lundquist, "the 'forum' setting will be informal to allow for a spontaneous-flow of discussion relating to the individual in sport." However, he emphasized that the course was designed to be approached from a social and psychological perspective and not with an exclusively sociological viewpoint.

Unlike some academics, Lundquist does not feel that the course should be thought of as "value-free." "To say that you're value free is like saying you're committed to the status quo", he said.

The course, which bears a strong resemblance to the popular but defunct Free University of University courses, will take place Wednesdays for nine weeks during spring term. Critics, listeners, participants, and observers are welcome. For further information contact Higgins at 928-3949 or McClements at 928-7329. Better still, come to the forum today at noon in the Benson Building.

Varsity track members qualify for Maple Leaf Games

The University of Toronto placed several participants in the Toronto Star Maple Leaf Indoor Games by virtue of its showing in the qualifying trials held last Saturday at the CNE. The Games will be held Friday February 2.

U of T Blues Steve Hunt, Dave Colbert, Bill Johnson, and Gerry Feeney qualified to run in the mile relay. According to coach Andy Higgins, U of T's main competition in the games in this event will probably come from the East York Track Club Old Boys. (The U of T Track Club also qualified a team in the mile relay, two members of which are students at U of T — Aris Birze and Brian Prettie.)

Blues also qualified a team for the two mile relay, consisting of members Matt Duncan, Mark Minden, Ed North, and Gerry Feeney. (The U of T Track Club again also qualified a team, with the sole U of T student being Aris Birze.)

Toronto students John Sharp, Paul Glynn, and Andrew Reed will represent their respective extra-university track clubs in the Metro mile.

Bruce Simpson, another scheduled competitor at the games, was supposed to compete in Los Angeles over the weekend but was unable to attend because of an injury suffered in practice last week. The injury occurred in a work-out due to faulty equipment at the make-shift indoor facilities in the Canadian Forces Base on Avenue Road. Simpson received a bone bruise and it is not known whether he will compete at the CNE on February 2.

Combine books in Sig Sam

By BOB BETTSON

Two departmental libraries should be substantially amalgamated into an undergraduate library, an advisory committee has recommended. The committee made the recommendation over the objections of two course unions and a large number of petitioning students and staff.

The Governing Council's Library Subcommittee accepted by a vote of 7 to 3 a compromise motion that would exclude xeroxed and uncatalogued material from the undergraduate collection after the main stacks of the Sigmund Samuel Library are moved to the Robarts Library.

The same subcommittee will later make a key recommendation on a definition of academic need for stack access in the Robarts Library. Last spring students carried out three occupations of Simcoe Hall, after negotiations had broken down, in an attempt to win unrestricted access to the stacks.

The amalgamation vote came after a motion by Professor Peter Heyworth, author of last year's report recommending restricted stack access, to totally amalgamate the two libraries was defeated 6 to 5 with one abstention.

The compromise, moved by Vic alumnus J.H. Collins-Williams and seconded by Heyworth, would join the political economy and history libraries and keep only the xeroxed material, which makes up less than half of the circulation.

The motion will have to be approved by the Academic Affairs Committee of Governing Council and the full council before it is finally decided.

The compromise was not acceptable to student subcommittee member Kathy Feldman and political economy professor Sanford Lakoff who argued that frequently circulated books should be retained.

Lakoff said that he was certain that the amalgamation forces had won a "pyrrhic" victory because the staff and students of the departments would not accept the decision and would try and overturn it at a higher level.

A petition was presented from the Political Economy Course Union with 450 signatures gathered in one day. Among faculty signing were chairman Stephan Dupre and assistant chairman Arthur Kruger, as well as about 20 others.

The petition, according to PECU vice-chairman Howie Stein, will continue circulating until the amalgamation is overturned.

At the meeting, discussion centred on the necessity of amalgamation for a good undergraduate duplicate copy collection.

Lakoff and student Brian Morgan argued that what is needed is to prune the present departmental collections of less-used materials. They said all other points favoured the libraries' continued existence.

Morgan stated that if financial considerations aren't the main reason and the circulation continues to rise, the case for amalgamation has not been made.

UC principal Archie Hallet condemned the "radical conservatism" which he said ran through the briefs. He accused the opponents of amalgamation of not knowing what a library is.

"We must be adventurist," he added.

Chief Librarian Robert Blackburn said that the amalgamation was crucial for the future of Sigmund Samuel.

Music student M. Evans argued that the petition showed impressive results: "Staff and students have given an overwhelming indication of their desire to keep the library."

Students use the political economy departmental library in Sidney Smith Hall.

Transfers spare U of T teaching staff cutbacks

U of T will be spared the teaching staff cutbacks that have afflicted other Canadian campuses this year, Paul Cadario, a student member of the Governing Council's budget committee predicted Tuesday.

No permanent cuts in support staff are anticipated either but the number of maintenance jobs will be reduced since those who have will not necessarily be replaced, he said.

Layoffs of teaching staff will be avoided by transferring the surplus of professors teaching on the downtown campus to Scarborough and Erindale.

This practice has been used increasingly over the past few years as downtown enrolment has levelled off while the two satellite colleges have nearly doubled in size.

Although he refused to reveal details of the unpublished budget, Cadario said the committee planned to avoid layoffs by this "reallocation" system.

"If there are two extra German professors at the downtown campus and a shortage of German professors at Erindale, for instance, the departments should get together and work out an arrangement," he said.

Such meetings have already taken place, he added.

He refused to indicate in which departments such transfers would take place, but the example of the German professors kept cropping up.

Reduction in the size of the teaching staff would also be accomplished by not replacing retiring professors.

Engineering professor S.M. Uzumeri, president of the U of T Faculty Association, said last night that he approved of the university's practice of transferring professors to where they are most needed.

"I personally believe in the optimization of resources," he said.

He praised the university for "not panicking" as some other universities have when faced with financial problems.

Five faculty are rehired

Students end sit-in at Brock

Brock students meet in auditorium to hear results of meeting between student leaders and Board of Trustees.

ST. CATHARINES (CUP) — After a ten-day occupation of areas surrounding the administrative offices on the 13th floor of the Brock University tower, students have won a partial victory.

As a result of special meetings of the university Board of Trustees and Senate last Monday, five full-time faculty members have been re-hired and their termination notices officially recalled. This number is the total of all full-time faculty that were to be fired as a result of the university's financial problems.

But the part-time faculty that were dismissed will not be rehired, and the $91,000 of the budget that it will take to rehire the full-time professors as yet to be found.

"We've really won nothing," one student leader commented. The students have called off their occupation with little more than confirmations of good faith from the board and the senate.

Both those bodies pledged Wednesday to avoid faculty cuts whenever possible. Although a committee of the board is considering various approaches to fund-raising in an effort to cover the remaining deficit, there is no guarantee they will not fire other part-time staff.

Some students are not sure whether it was their pressure that forced the board to the rehiring: at least one representative of the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) has visited the Brock campus within the last week and sceptical observers feel that CAUT's power to blacklist any university for its hiring practices could have been the actual pressure that brought the matter to its tentative close at Brock.

An article in Wednesday's Varsity incorrectly reported that the total enrolment in the Faculty of Food Science is 83.

In fact, the faculty has 196 students, including 180 special students, and 83 in first year, a high in recent years for that year.

The article also stated that there were three students in the department of textiles, while the dean's office reports that there are seven.

Lab workers vote unanimously for strike

Over 30 animal laboratory technicians yesterday strengthened their bargaining position by unanimously giving their union bargaining committee leave to call a strike, if necessary.

A strike of the unit of about 45 technicians could occur in early March and lead to a refusal of the university's workers to service seven university buildings.

Service Employees International Union Local 204 business agent Don

Barclay reported yesterday that although the union was willing to compromise its position somewhat, the university still holds a rigid attitude as both parties proceed into what could be the last conciliation hearing February 8.

If conciliation officer John Dempster fails to bring the parties to agreement then, says Barclay, the union will ask him to report a "no board" report to the Ontario Minister of Labour. If this is done, which is usually automatic, Dempster will report about 10 days later that the parties could not reach agreement. The union will be able to strike legally 14 days later.

The only issue as stake is money, as both sides have agreed to accept the other provisions of the union's master contract for its 770 other employees with the university.

The union has demanded wages from $3.31 to $4.11 per hour for four categories of workers, while the university is offering $2.70 to $3.50. The workers' present wages range from $2.51 to $2.84.

Barclay said he was pleased with the unanimous strike vote, as was the unit's five member bargaining committee.

"It will force the university to bargain earnestly," Barclay said.

U of T labour relations manager John Parker said late last night that the strike vote was a normal part of an industrial union's bargaining strategy used in an attempt to strengthen its position.

The university had indicated during conciliation that it would be prepared to change its position, but not without some indication of flexibility on the union's part, Parker added.

The unit was organized only last November; Barclay said first contracts are always difficult because the management tends to suspect the workers are not solid.

Should a strike occur, animal lab technicians will set up picket lines in the Medical Sciences, Zoology, Bunting, Dental and Psychology Buildings, as well as at Scarborough and Eridale Colleges where the technicians work.

Refusal of the union's other workers to cross picket lines in front of the buildings would be automatic, Barclay indicated. He also predicted that other unions whose members work in the buildings, such as the operating engineers who operate heating and cooling equipment, would respect picket lines.

Union protests manner in which U of T workers being laid off

Eleven university service workers have been laid off temporarily in violation of their union's contract with the university, their business agent charged yesterday.

The physical plant workers, some of whom have up to two years seniority with the university, were given five days' notice, the minimum, last Friday, due to the lack of snow to provide work for them.

Service Employee's International Union Local 204 business agent Don Barclay claimed yesterday that the layoffs violate the local's contract with the university because under it workers should be laid off according to a campus-wide list in inverse order of seniority.

Although St. George campus superintendent Prichard has until Tuesday to hear the grievance, the union wants to speed procedures up, since the workers are due to be laid off today.

And, if it does not get a meeting today to appeal the order of layoffs, Prichard Barclay says the union will hold a small demonstration at noon today outside the university's personnel department at 215 Huron Street.

However, U of T labour relations manager John Parker said late last night he expects the matter will be discussed at a meeting today.

The union already lost the first round of the grievance procedure when assistant supervisor of general services Les Hubbard, who laid off the workers, refused to reverse his position.

Hubbard admitted last night that seniority clauses for layoffs require that those workers from all over the campus who have been with the university the least amount of time should be laid off first. He also admitted that the layoffs had been within his department, not campus-wide.

However, he emphasized that "this is only a temporary layoff," although he would not state that he thought the seniority clause did not apply to temporary layoffs as well.

"We've conformed to the contract," he insisted. "You can rest assured that the university will abide by the agreement."

The dispute was merely a matter of interpretation of the contract, he assured The Varsity.

Parker said last night that the dispute was about whether the seniority clause applies to temporary layoffs. It would be fruitless to train a person for a job that will be filled again by its original holder in a short period, he stated.

However, Barclay considers the grievance "a critical test of whether the university will honour the agreement."

If necessary, he warned the union would attempt to shut the university down.

Should picket lines be set up, other unions normally respect them by refusing to cross them.

Siesta time meeting nearby

There will be a meeting of The Varsity staff today at 1 pm. Every staff member is expected to attend this important gathering, perhaps the most important of the month.

(We'll see.) As usual, the locale is in the Varsity office, overlooking beautiful St. George Street at No. 91.

Quebec students strike

MONTREAL (CUPI) — Students at the University de Québec a Montréal began a general strike today after a brief occupation of their administrative offices Wednesday was broken up by a police riot squad.

The occupation and strike are in protest against the expulsion of about 699 students effective today because they owe the university more than $500 in tuition fees.

The occupation followed a general UQAM student meeting in which the university was given until noon Wednesday to cancel the expulsion order. About 150 students occupied the administrative areas to back up their demands, but were distracted by the presence of four policemen while they were discussing strategy. 50 members of the Montréal riot squad arrived and evicted the students. There were no arrests.

A general student meeting the next day, (January 25) voted to call a student strike, after the administration failed to respond to their demands.

Student leaders predicted the active support of about 1,000 of UQAM's 13,000 students. In addition, the union representing student employees of the university pledged its support and that its members would not cross picket lines.

Meanwhile, students at a general meeting at l'Université de Montréal, last Wednesday considered launching a solidarity strike, because they face similar administration harassment. They sent a similar ultimatum to the U de M administration. A strike vote was derailed by procedural wrangling, and another general meeting will consider the question next Monday.

At the U de M meeting, UQAM student Gilbert Rousseau pointed out that opposition to the growing Québec labor movement, as well as economic considerations, motivated the government's 25 percent cut in the education budget this year. The financial pressure is especially acute at the so-called "popular" U de Q, where 20 percent of the students come from working class families.

CEGEP student Nicole Fortin said administrative control and the CEGEP's Nouveau regime pedagogique are designed to continue a policy of producing well-trained graduates to bolster the capitalist system.

(After CEGEP students across Québec threatened a general strike in December, the Nouveau regime was shelved temporarily by the Québec government. The proposal would have increased compulsory class time, cut arts options, and allowed administrations to re-register troublesome students.)

Bernard Côté, a member of the Comité d'organisation provisoire des étudiants (COPE), which organized dissent against the expulsion orders at UQAM last fall, told the U de M meeting "a failure of tomorrow's strike will mean a defeat for the whole student movement."

Several Ontario universities, locked in struggle with their own provincial governments over tuition fee increases and cuts in student aid sent messages of support to the UQAM students.

Second term fees payments lag

An expected surge in payments of second term fees due to the resumption of mail delivery has not materialized so far. SAC officials are cautiously optimistic that students have largely supported the fees strike.

Figures released by the administration reveal that less than 200 students paid their second term fees owing on Tuesday, and only 87 Wednesday. Figures were unavailable for yesterday.

The number of payments has plummeted from a high of 1,500 a week ago Tuesday to the current low of 87. Officials of both the administration and SAC had expected that a large number of payments would be delivered by the mail this week, after the end of the postal strike, but the daily number has dropped off from 205 on Monday and 339 one week ago today.

The strike "appears to be going well," said president Eric Miglin yesterday. However, he feared that some mail might still be held up, giving a distorted picture of the number of students who are still withholding fees.

The figures released indicate that more than 5,800 of the 11,469 students who chose to pay by instalments have still not paid their second part. (The figures include both graduate and undergraduate students, as the administration says it cannot separate them at this point.)

Miglin said he would be "very surprised" if the administration agreed to drop the $15 late penalty for late payment, although SAC will be meeting with administrators Tuesday morning to seek its removal, as last week's SAC meeting requested.

Investigate McGill prof firing

MONTREAL (CUPI) — McGill political science professor Pauline Vaillancourt has been fired by the McGill administration and the Québec labour department has been asked to investigate the situation.

Vaillancourt is Secretary of the McGill Faculty Union and is the MFU's delegate to the Montreal Council of the Confederation of National Trade Unions (CNTU), with which the MFU is affiliated. Vaillancourt has charged the firing is in retaliation for her union activities.

Vaillancourt was notified December 13 by the Board of Governors that her contract, which expires in August, would not be renewed. The decision was supposedly based on an appraisal of two papers she had written and on alleged student complaints. When the hearing into her firing opened at McGill, she was not permitted by the appeal committee to present her other papers or published articles as evidence in her defence.

MFU president Immanuel Wallerstein, speaking at the appeal, questioned "the mode of operation of the committee," which made an important decision such as firing a professor "without having read the totality of the professor's contribution."

The university claims the reasons for Vaillancourt's firing are "substandard teaching ability" and lack of "Academic and administrative contributions."

In the political science department's own questionnaire, 85 per cent of her students, when asked to rate her teaching as "adequate" or "inadequate", rated her adequate. She has received testimonies from leaders of political science in Québec and elsewhere, saying that not only is her work satisfactory but she deserves to be promoted on the strength of her academic achievement.

Vaillancourt recently obtained a $21,000 research grant from the Québec Department of Social Affairs to study the co-operative movement in Québec.

The matter, which until now has been considered only on a departmental mental level, is currently in the hands of Robert Vogel, dean of arts, who has scheduled a February 1 meeting of his advisory committee to consider the matter. Vogel was unavailable for comment.

The labour department hearing will probably be held sometime next month.

NEWS ITEM - TIME MAGAZINE PICKS NIXON AND KISSINGER AS MEN OF THE YEAR... FOR CHANGING THE SHAPE OF THE WORLD (sic).

Ceasefire doesn't wipe out past

Nixon deserves no credit

None of the traditional revelry heralding the end of military engagements greeted Tuesday night's announcement that the four parties to the Paris Peace Talks had agreed to a ceasefire in Vietnam.

While some satisfaction could be taken from the knowledge that this time the Vietnamese people had been able to resist submission to imperialist warmongers, attention seemed to justly focus on the huge, unnecessary cost the United States war effort inflicted upon the Vietnamese: thousands and thousands of innocent lives lost and an entire country battlescarred and decimated by indiscriminate, inhuman bombing attacks.

And, through much of the injustice of it all, Richard Nixon sat in Washington, glibly mouthing platitudes about wanting a "just peace in Vietnam".

That a peace treaty has been concluded is no credit to this president. His intransigence and insistence upon saving face prolonged the war more than four years, at a heavy cost to both sides. In the end, his folly gained little — exactly what remains to be seen when the full details are revealed.

Conservative historians may well recall Nixon in years to come as the president who brought the fighting in Vietnam to a halt. But, few can honestly subscribe to this theory.

Indeed, he should be condemned by history as the American leader who escalated the conflict and prolonged an unjust war needlessly.

Time Magazine named Nixon and his so-called peace envoy Henry Kissinger men of the year, crediting them with changing the shape of the world. Not for the better, we would add.

Do something decisive about our education

Marty Stollar's comments on the infamous fees strike were closest to being on target or, perhaps I should say, they weren't far enough left of center. Personally, I do not condone any government inflationary procedures, especially my fees. Many students voted in the OFS referendum then for their own selfish interests. (Of course, as is the case usually at this university, most of us students could not even be overwhelmingly radical about our own greed.)

Anyway, I don't need reams of statistics to prove who pays the shots in our society. Ours is a regressive tax structure. Despite the fact that the working class pays the lion's share percentage-wise, they are in a small minority in the post-secondary education system. The liberal myth of universal accessibility is being denied them; and increases in fees along with decreases in student aid has quite adverse effects upon them as Mr. Stollar has correctly analyzed.

I believe, though, that Mr. Stollar, Mr. Havers, assorted CLM fanatics, SAC, and primarily the OFS have failed to deal with what should be the fundamental problem — the complete absence of universal accessibility to post-secondary education for low income families. The vast majority of these working class children have been streamed out of the system following completion of their elementary education. They are not even available to be affected by increases in university tuition fees. Long ago, they've been steered completely off the path to university by streaming and the imposition of values and standards foreign to their own ethnic cultures.

So, here we are wallowing in our affluence, and hoping that the tuition increase will not affect that "new stereo", or whatever. Come on, OFS, cut the shit, stop advancing your own elite, and attempt to do something decisive with the education system!

SSSC member denies it's only a CLM front

Of all the attacks being made on the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee, one of the poorest is that it is nothing more than the Canadian Liberation Movement in disguise. The relation between these two groups needs clarifying.

The SSSC was originally organized by the CLM. That group provided the initial ideas, personnel and finances that got the committee moving. While members of the CLM are naturally prominent in the committee, they are far in the minority as members of the SSSC.

The SSSC is a group of students who believe that the fees increase must be fought and fought hard, not only as an economic issue, but a political one. Rather than have a symbolic January fees boycott to fight a narrowly economic issue, we believe we must have a concerted struggle against an issue symbolic of the attitude of our government: that education is for the students who can pay.

Michael Nash, member
SSSC

Only SSSC supports students' interests

The letter to The Varsity on Friday, January 19 by Bob Bettson is an example of the phoney, rotten left on this campus. He and the rest of his degenerate crew, in setting themselves up as "legitimate socialists", throw a slur on all people who get out there and fight to really change things. Bettson and the rest of the opponentist left have done nothing to organize students to really win the fight against the university. For him to come out and attack the only group on the campus which is fighting to win is to attack the whole purpose of the fight. Bettson even has the deceitful gall to say that SAC has done a passable job on the fees strike. This makes him an outright liar. The only passable job that SAC has done on this campus is to confuse, deceive, and sell out the students to the university. If Bettson thinks this is good, he is as rotten as then are. This is where Bettson and the rest of the phoney left are most dangerous. All the time, people like Miglin and Helliwell sell out the students, people like Bettson are right there to defend their actions. They set themselves up as "revolutionary leftists", but the only thing they do is divert and confuse the issues.

You can tell what someone believes by seeing what he does. Bettson has a lot to say, but when asked at the meeting Wednesday, what he was doing to support the fees strike he said "Writing articles for The Varsity."

Bettson says, "If Canada is to become independent and the university is to become an agent for social change it won't be accomplished with limited one-issue campaigns." He goes on to say that "the only time that will come is if the working people of Canada and Ontario reject the capitalist economic system". Bettson never once says how the people of Canada and Ontario will "reject" this system. Dealing with concrete issues is the only way to do anything and that often means fighting single-issue campaigns.

Bettson says that the "CLM has no conception of who wields power in this university". The fact is that there are only two sides in this issue — the students and the administration. When the lines were drawn, SAC and people like Bettson who defend SAC joined the administration, and CLM and the SSSC continued to fight on the side of the students.

Students have to stop the student surcharge now. This $100 increase is only the first step in the plan to raise tuition to $1,500. The CLM and all the people who have joined the SSSC are fighting to win. If SAC and people like Bettson continue to stand in the students' way, then the students will have to get rid of them, too.

Monopoly killing is no panacea

Mr. Scott Bell's belief that a nationalized industry cannot be efficient and that nationalization is achieved by confiscation (that is, seizure without compensation) need not delay us, although it delayed him long enough. What is fascinating is his proposal to improve the telephone service by the introduction of competition. We should all have the wires and instruments of two or more companies, or choose to give our patronage not to the company we taken care of" and "They don't want to be free" and "Stop raising political questions!"

Another such subgroup, though this time not a minority, consists of women, and the slaveholders and Auntie Toms are hastily dusting off old Klan literature, substituting the words "wife" or "chick" for "nigger", and reminding us that if we really want to discover what women are for, we should, of course, go back to the Bible.

Obviously, if The Varsity were to refuse all advertising from sexist sources, revenues would drop appreciably; undoubtedly advertising would consist of little more than lost and found notices and the occasional Dan Heap campaign ad. But just as I would hope that The Varsity would reject an ad with a racist slogan, I propose that it should refuse ads which are explicitly sexist. There is more than politics involved here; we're talking about people. I don't know where you've been, but I recall meeting more than one sexist socialist.

Neil Young only second to Leafs

In reply to Alan Mandell's "Neil Young reaches bottom", I would first say that his criticism was unfairly one-sided. If there was nothing good about Neil Young's concert, why did he get a standing ovation? As an entertainer, surely the audience judged Neil's playing favourably. The Varsity critic missed the warm reception by the audience, and I think this is one criterion of reviewing the entertainment world.

It is a tradition in the Gardens to show special approval of a good performance by everyone striking a match and holding it up. That 18,000 people all agreed symbolically that Neil Young played well is an indication that it was a fine show.

It is too bad that The Varsity critic didn't like "Southern Man", "Cinnamon Girl", "Everybody Knows", "Heart of Gold", and "Old Man". I did. A final point that angers me is that The Varsity's criticism is so sure that Neil Young's performance was nothing to have missed. Perhaps, it is attitudes like that which tend to influence Canadian talent to leave Canada and find better reception in the United States.

Neil Young will hopefully return to Toronto again, and if he does he will probably sell out the Gardens again. What other Canadian talent has done that aside from the Maple Leafs?

Bill Hutul

Story distorted reality of demo

I would like to pass on a few critical remarks on your coverage of the anti-war demonstration in last Monday's Varsity. The feeling I got was that a number of criticisms and political attacks were being waged behind the cover of journalistic reporting. The article was written by Greg McMaster, a member of the Indochina Solidarity Committee (ISC), a participant in the demonstration.

One group in particular was subjected to these affronts. The Vietnam Mobilization Committee (VMC) is a long time builder of the anti-war movement and a key participant of the January 20th Action Coalition.

The ISC and VMC have basic differences on the defence of the Vietnamese. The ISC feels that protestors should "Solidarize" themselves with the Vietnam revolution by waving red banners that appeal for victory. The VMC supports the concept of the self-determination of the Vietnamese. They defend this by placing full responsibility for the war on the presence of US forces in South East Asia. They try to organize as many people as possible around the central slogans of US Out Now, and End Canada's Complicity.

The implications of The Varsity article is that the VMC and their program were in the minority in the demonstration; and that they went against the wish of the majority which wanted to "block traffic". McMaster accomplished this by saying that "about half the marchers poured out the street near Dundas" and that the VMC and their supporters "were content to remain on the sidewalk and urged other demonstrators to obey police orders". He also marveled at the number of red banners expressing support for the revolution.

After straightening out some of the facts and innuendos, we get an entirely different picture. The overwhelming majority of the demonstration carried the slogans and demands of the VMC - US Out Now, No Canadian Troops, and Vietnam for the Vietnamese. The front page photograph illustrates this fact.

Although there were over 1,000 protestors, at no time were there more than 100 who ventured to run out onto Yonge Street. The marshals of the demonstration — some from the VMC, some from the ISC — were instructed before hand on the route and the conditions of the demonstration. The January 20th Action Coalition was endorsed in the use of the whole of Yonge for the demonstration by the Toronto City Council, but were denied permission at the last moment by the Metro Police. The use of the sidewalk was a compromise. The role of the marshals was to protect the march, including the possibility of individual harassment by the police. The route and conditions of the march were discussed by a democratic meeting before the start of the demonstration. ISC members took part in that meeting.

If the ISC is apparently anxious to lead 1,200 people into a confrontation with the cops, perhaps they should have brought this up at the marshals meeting or at the pre-march rally so that everyone would have a chance to listen and discuss.

Certain members of the ISC, and McMaster certainly seems to be one of them, took it on themselves to go into the streets. They then try to blame others for not following them.

One last point, I find it unfortunate that there are three columns, and more on the ISC speech at the US consulate, and either little or nothing for other speakers. Alderman Dan Heap (elected from this ward) spoke. Don't you think that students here have a right to know his stand on the war? You devote nine lines to the League for Socialist Action and seemingly only for a slanted comparison to the Joe Flexer speech which dominates the article. You say nothing on the other groups and individuals represented at the demonstration, including, of course, the VMC.

Sexism is not only political

I wish to disagree strongly with your editorial claim of January 12 that the issue of sexism in advertising is primarily a political one. A question we seem to face regularly is whether or not a particular subgroup of the human race should be treated as animals. In the fifties and sixties, at least in North America, such a subgroup consisted of blacks, and we heard reactionary arguments of the type "Well, they like to be

Ward 6 Council backs residents' objections

By LORNE SLOTNICK

The fledgling Ward 6 Council unanimously confirmed its opposition to the Windlass development in a meeting of about 50 people Tuesday night.

The motion urging City Council to withdraw approval of the project came after Ward 6 alderman Dan Heap and Ward 5 alderman Ying Hope presented a report from the city solicitor considering the legality of repealing the bylaw which allowed the development.

Both Heap and Hope told the meeting in the University Settlement House that the solicitor's report did not actually indicate whether or not the action would be legal, but implied that the city may face a successful lawsuit from the developer if the bylaw is repealed.

"After two weeks of study, he tells us he doesn't know", said

Heap.

The Windlass "Grange Village" development, on the east side of McCaul street, was approved in 1971 by council over area residents' objections, but may be overturned by the new council if the action turns out to be legal. Objections to the three high-rise buildings of the project centred on the destructive effect they might have on the Chinese community in the area.

Representatives of Chinese groups at the meeting also expressed concern over the proposed widening of Dundas Street.

If the city is to repeal the bylaw, it must do so before the Ontario Municipal Board considers the case. Hearings on Windlass are slated to begin February 6.

The bylaw was an amendment to the official Plan which designated the area from University to McCaul as part of the city core, enabling Windlass to build there at a higher density.

The motion passed by the Ward 6 Council also called for the extension of the South-east Spadina planning area from McCaul Street east to Simcoe Street, just west of University Avenue. Development is frozen in the area until an extensive study is completed.

The Ward 6 Council has no formal powers, but copies of the resolution will be sent to all aldermen, communicating the feeling of Ward 6 people. The matter of repealing the bylaw will come before a meeting of the Buildings and Development Committee Monday evening.

The meeting was billed as an example of "ward-wide forums to discuss a local issue", in this case Windlass.

Panelists forget economics

By WILLIAM MOLSON

A panel of academics discussed "Private Rights and Public Good" for two hours at an OISE seminar Wednesday night without questioning the economic structure of society.

Moderator Gregory Baum, professor of theology and religious studies at St. Michael's College, was in fact at one point moved to interject that he found the complacency of Torontonians 'unbearable'.

Accusing the panelists of looking at only a small part of the issue,

Baum said that one must ask 'who has the money, who makes the laws... and then look at the people in the lower places.'

However, the panelists failed to direct the discussion to any particular area of debate.

Recently retired Ontario Municipal Board Chairman J.A. Kennedy, a "firm believer in people power" and presently a lecturer in planning law at the University of Waterloo, equated 'vox populi' with 'vox dei'. Challenged by U of T vice-president Jill Conway on the matter of abortion and capital punishment, Kennedy replied that he only answered for his own convictions.

Kennedy said that the rule of the majority is the rule of the jungle, and foresaw a 'new franchise of citizen participation', at the same time maintaining that the electorate does not habitually refuse to respect the opinions of persons more informed. Baum commented that he envied Kennedy's cheerfulness.

U of T law dean Martin Friedland commented that problems of criminal law bring the issue most clearly into focus.

The question of sexual roles was introduced by Conway, who said the female was saddled with the burden of moral responsibility in the bourgeois family, thus freeing the male to pursue an "amoral" course. She maintained that individuals permitted government control of private spheres such as divorce only when the particular area was not oriented towards economic success.

Former OMB head J.A. Kennedy advocated "vox populi".

Student quits study

A student has resigned from a task force to study the relationship between U of T educational institutions, claiming the task force was not interested in asking why there should be co-operation, but had already moved to specific proposals.

Education student Neil Keller says he left the recently-appointed task force on the relationship between the Faculty of Education and the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) because it did not lay a firm foundation for its recommendations.

"There was no discussion of principle," said Keller, "and I was interested in them defining each of the group's responsibilities and areas of study."

"There was already the feeling that it was going to take place, and I just didn't see the committee going anywhere."

Task force chairman and vice-provost Peter Meincke, countered, "We were not assuming the eventual interrelation from the beginning. In the first meetings we discussed real areas of co-operation. The two areas we identified were two that everyone agreed should already have been taking place. That may have given him (Keller) his impression that we were going ahead."

Keller commented that the group set up by Evans was "heavy" with senior members of both institutions and said: "Once they go in with a certain idea, it's not going to change."

Keller was also worried about the apparent "secrecy" with which the task force was working. The only public mention of it thus far has been an announcement stating that the task force was set up by Evans "to advise him on the most effective ways of interrelating the resources of OISE and the university (in particular, the Faculty of Education, Graduate School, Department of Educational Theory and other departments) to achieve shared objectives in the field of education."

Meincke said, "I will accept responsibility for the way we went about it. I wanted the task force to sink its teeth into some concrete matters before dealing with more basic definitions," he said. "The kind of things he (Keller) is worried about, we are also worried about."

Metro first target for drive to unionize white collars

By MICHAEL O'KEEFE

A major campaign to organize white collar workers in the Toronto area was officially launched yesterday at a news conference held by Secretary-Treasurer William Dodge of the Canadian Labour Congress.

Metropolitan Toronto has been chosen first target city for the drive because of its heavy concentration of office workers, but Dodge indicated that the campaign would eventually go nation-wide.

At its May 1972 convention, the CLC issued a mandate for white collar organization and established a surcharge of two cents per member per month for this purpose. This tax will provide approximately $400,000 per year for white collar organizing efforts. Local chapters of the newly formed Association for Commercial and Technical Employees union (ACTE) will be directly chartered by the CLC.

The campaign is directed at unorganized employees in banks, insurance companies, trust companies, finance companies, stock exchanges and real estate. There are an estimated two million unorganized employees working in these categories across Canada, some 200,000 of them in Metropolitan Toronto.

Dodge described white collar workers as a "very exploited group" and noted that about 65 per cent of them are females in the 18-25 age bracket.

He claimed that the top priority of ACTE would be in the realm of salaries. According to Dodge, the average salary for an unorganized junior clerk in a financial institution in Toronto was $81 per week in October 1971, as compared with $118 per week for Toronto City Hall clerks, who are represented by CUPE.

In addition, ACTE will be seeking improvements in working conditions, job security and stability, a fair system of classification and seniority, and an effective grievance procedure.

Dodge claimed that white collar workers have traditionally been "brainwashed by a flow of management propaganda." He pointed out, however, that the "mail boy to manager myth" has been totally destroyed in recent years.

He cited the role of the computer in making white collar work more tedious, more expendable, and less rewarding. Dodge hopes these changes have made the white collar worker more receptive to unionization than they have been in the past.

According to Dodge, signs of employer resistance to the CLC campaign have already surfaced. The management of the London Life Insurance Co. issued a 15 per cent across the board salary hike, stating publicly that they hoped to avoid unionization of their 2200 employees by this measure.

Dodge described this as a "typical management trick" and he saw no reason to assume that it would prove more successful against white collar workers than it has against blue collar.

Metro okays police move

Metro Council approved purchase of the final piece of property necessary to relocate a police station on Beverley Street Tuesday night.

Police station Number 52, now located in the Stewart building at College Street and Queen's Park Crescent, will have a new building on Beverley Street if the plans are implemented. But, local residents have objected to the destruction of good housing to make way for the station.

Ironically, one of the reasons for moving the station, the police say, is to get closer to the community. The former RCMP headquarters on Sullivan Street in the area is due to be vacated, but the Police Commission has not disclosed whether this site was considered for 52 Division.

The Ward 6 Council passed a motion Tuesday night asking for a public meeting with the police to discuss their plans with area residents.

A meeting will be held this Sunday of residents in the area to share whatever knowledge they have of the police plans.

One of their complaints is that both the police and the Metro Property Department have not been open about the situation and their intention.

Want gay courses and research

By HEATHER-JANE SANGUINS

Two briefs submitted to the New Program Review Committee have expressed a need for both a course on and research into homosexuality.

A brief from U of T graduate student Robert Wallace states that there is a "very real need" for a course of "immediate interest" to the homosexual as a "significant percentage of the university population is gay".

Wallace's brief further states that a course designed to educate generally, and investigate homosexuality from a psychological and sociological point of view would improve the situation "not only for homosexuals, but for heterosexuals as well."

He points out that the U of T is lagging behind York and McGill Universities and Vanier College in not instituting either a credit or a non-credit course on homosexuality. York offered a non-credit tutorial last year, and McGill and Vanier are doing so this year.

Wallace, a regular contributor to the Body Politic gay liberation newspaper, suggests that "any adequate treatment of homosexuality would necessarily be of an interdisciplinary nature". This then would "justify the establishment of a non-credit course taught by a graduate student" as is done by other universities.

Wallace offered to submit the names of gay graduate students who might fill requirements for instructors in this subject.

Graduate student Herbert Spiers submitted a brief asking for more research on homosexuality from a standpoint of the anthropological philosophy of sexuality.

Spiers wants the U of T both to institute a "gay studies program" and also organize the material presently available within the university library system under the topic gay studies.

Backing his argument in the brief, Spiers quoted John Hopkins University psychiatrist John Money who said that it "is time for medicine to respect the arguments of the gay liberation movement regarding their views of sexuality". The academics could help by making "a substantial body of knowledge available" in a "systematic manner to interested students."

New Program Review Committee chairman D.E. Berlyne, recipient of both briefs, said that they were two of 183 surveys, reports and briefs considered by the committee. The committee deals with general areas of interest, not specific submissions, Berlyne said.

• Panther Hogan suing Canadian government

By GREG McMASTER

The Canadian government is being sued for over a million dollars by a Black Panther who was kidnapped across the U.S. border by the RCMP.

Ed Hogan, who was secretly handed over to the FBI without his lawyer's knowledge last October, is basing his case on alleged violation of the Canadian Bill of Rights, which guarantees "due process" and "equality of treatment" under Canadian laws.

Hogan was ordered deported from Canada, for illegal entry, after the Immigration Appeal Board ruled against his contention that, as a political refugee, he would receive unusually harsh punishment if returned to the U.S. He was originally held for participating in a robbery-murder, although he contends he was framed.

On October 20, the day after the ruling, he was taken to New York State by the RCMP before the time elapsed during which he could appeal. His lawyer, Charles Roach, was informed of what happened on October 23, by which time, says Roach, the guarantee of the right to appeal was "a very sadistic joke."

Hogan is now in a jail cell in Lucasville, Ohio.

His present case is being handled in Toronto by Roach, who said on Wednesday that he is proceeding on a civil rights basis, to "test the worth of the Bill of Rights", which he charged was violated several times in Hogan's case.

The contention that Hogan is a political prisoner will be resumed if and when he is returned to Canada to appeal the previous decision, said Roach.

The suit was filed in a federal court on Monday. Hogan is asking the return of the right to appeal (which, said Roach, implies his return to Canada) and one million dollars in damages for false imprisonment, for conspiracy to violate civil rights, and as punitive damages.

Roach appealed for help, saying "Hogan sees the case not just for himself but as part of a cause for which he must fight." The National Black Coalition is paying to initiate the action.

Roach charged that the Immigration Department willfully denied Hogan the rights of counsel and appeal despite directives from former Immigration Minister Allen McEachen that "in future counsel will be advised" after similar previous cases. "This is not an isolated case", said Roach. "The RCMP should not be able to physically carry out a deportation."

Roach charged that, contrary to the Bill of Rights, Hogan was "treated differently from other such cases. Why was he treated this way? Is it because he's a Black Panther, because of his politics?"

He noted that letters asking for explanations from the Immigration Minister have received no answers, either before or since the federal election.

Roach suggested that various actions by the authorities constituted "a conspiracy" against Hogan. Evidence presented by Roach includes:

- the FBI were prepared to receive Hogan at the border;
- deportation proceedings (which entail less legal protection for the defendant) were used instead of an extradition hearing, the more usual procedure;

- a detective-sergeant from Metro Police personally urged the Ontario Legal Aid Director to deny legal aid to Hogan. "It's a subversion of the right to counsel for police to be messing around in this area", said Roach;

- part of Hogan's Immigration Appeal Board hearing was held in the Toronto Jail despite the legal requirement of an open court, and
- witnesses to another part of the hearing were followed, questioned and, "without just cause", denied admission to the hearing by the RCMP.

Roach also believes that Hogan was traded by the RCMP to the FBI for a suspected member of the FLQ named Leblanc, who arrived in Canada five days after Hogan was kidnapped.

Gas pipeline would be detriment to Canada, ec student charges

By DAVID WISE

By devoting the multi-billion dollar capital expenditure required to build a natural gas pipeline through the Mackenzie River Basin, Canada will be importing unemployment, charged a U of T economics student Tuesday.

Francois Bergha was attacking pipeline proponent Bill Wilder, chairman of Canadian Arctic Gas at a class in Canadian-American relations.

Bergha based his charge on figures he cited which he claimed prove that the natural gas and oil extraction industry provide the least employment revenue per revenue dollar, among major industries. Quoting pro-pipeline sources, Bergha said that the project will only provide 400 permanent jobs.

"The development of the pipeline will also hurt the future development of badly needed secondary industries in Canada," Bergha said. The pipeline project will tie up so much of Canada's capital, Bergha claimed, that little will be left for investment in other development.

Citing industry sources, Bergha said that for the pipeline to be economically feasible, the overwhelming majority of the gas channelled through it would have to be directed to American markets.

"In order to maintain a balance of trade with the United States," Bergha said, "Canada will be forced to import more manufactured goods."

Wilder countered this charge by asserting that the U.S. will be facing a severe energy crisis in the near future.

"If Canada can be in a position to supply these needs at this time," he said, "she will be bargaining from a position of strength in future trade talks."

The Varsity—Lanny Cooke

Arctic Gas chairman Bill Wilder defends his project.

This statement was challenged by a student in the audience. He claimed that the "so-called" imminent energy crisis merely reflects the present inefficient use of resources in the U.S. As natural gas becomes less accessible, and more expensive, he suggested, most of the present waste will abate.

Canada, by prematurely tapping its northern gas reserves, and building the proposed pipeline, "will be banking on continued wasteful consumption of energy in the United States."

Wilder asserted that the positive aspects of the project, basically future capital coming into Canada and royalties going directly to the Canadian government, would more than counterbalance the temporary negative results.

He said that the development of the oil had led to the industrial development of Alberta, and similar progress could be predicted in the territories, if the project is undertaken. He said that four billion dollars have been received in royalties by the province of Alberta which is unsatisfied with this income and claimed the reserves in the Arctic are much larger than those in Alberta.

Arts and Science Union grants $9,000 after chopping $1,000

The Arts and Science Student Union executive Tuesday approved budget grants for course unions and course evaluations of approximately $9,000.

The executive chopped a total of $1,000 from the budgets submitted by the course unions including $500 from the Political Economy Course Union request of $1,565. Its reduced budget was still the largest allotment.

An extra $4,000 outside the general budget is for printing all course evaluations in arts and science.

Financing of course unions and course evaluations was previously done by the SAC education commission. Last year, constitutional conference decided that SAC would no longer be responsible for educational work within the faculties. Instead, the responsibility was shifted to faculty student councils.

The budget will now go on to the general council of the ASSU which will be meeting in the next month to approve the final budget. This will also include salaries for one full-time fieldworker and three part-time workers to co-ordinate student educational and political activity in the faculty.

The union has received 31 applications for the four positions. Many of them, according to executive member Seymour Kanowitch, are BA's and coming from as far afield as England.

Kanowitch says one applicant is a PhD graduate of the London School of Economics, one of the most respected universities in the world. "We will have to write him and tell him he is overqualified", chuckled Kanowitch.

The union also agreed to set a date for a meeting with the Faculty Reform Caucus to discuss educational change in the faculty.

A complaint form which will be widely circulated was agreed upon. It is intended to allow students to complain about their classes and get action immediately.

The executive put off a decision on a proposal by industrial engineer Mario Vasilkovs to institute a special computer systems approach to course evaluations.

Ac Affairs fails to deplore Evans' move

By JULIA ELCOCK

The Academic Affairs Committee yesterday defeated 11 to 4 a motion to "register its disapproval" of president John Evans' formation of a task force on academic appointments policy without consulting the committee.

Establishment of the presidential task force was announced by Evans who had consulted the Planning and Resources Committee, at last week's Governing Council meeting. Some governors thought the body should have been directly responsible to a Governing Council committee.

Student committee member Brian Morgan said he moved the motion because he felt that the committee should be consulted on such important issues. He said that there should be co-operation between the committee and the Governing Council, not merely exchange of information.

However professor William Dunphy stated that he would not support the motion because he thought that the matter had been urgent.

He said that the Academic Affairs Committee should have itself formed such a task force. When it failed to do so, he maintained the president simply exercised his power to do it.

Evans told the committee that the matter had been "brought to the attention of the committee" and he emphasized that there would be "no attempt to withhold the report" of the task force from it. He said that as yet the task force had not yet been set up.

Internal Affairs Committee chairman Paul Cadario was present at the meeting to give a progress report on his committee's work on discipline in the university. The Internal Affairs Committee is acting in an attempt to present recommendations to the Governing Council on the three year old Campbell report before the end of the academic year.

Vice-president (internal affairs) Jill Conway is in the process of drawing up a code of behaviour, which is still confidential but will be discussed by Academic Affairs in three weeks. The committee members were invited to send in proposals for the code.

Cadario said that the committee will probably be recommending a "common law council" which will reduce costs. The composition of the tribunal, said Cadario, will be made in relation to the status of the individual and also in relation to the "milieu in which the offence was committed".

Academic infractions such as plagiarism and cheating will be dealt with by judicial procedures, he stated, but there will be attempts to settle all affairs by mediation since a tribunal is usually expensive for both the student and the university. In matters where a professor is accused of gross misconduct, such as in supplementary income, then the committee recommends that it be dealt with by a tribunal.

The Internal Affairs Committee, said Cadario, hopes to come up with something that will be both "credible and useful to the university".

Academic Affairs also approved unanimously the establishment of a subcommittee to deal with academic appeals. Members of the subcommittee, which will be small, will be chosen by Shepherd.

Prof studies Bahia elite

Professor Harry Makler of the sociology department has been awarded a grant by the Foreign Area Fellowship Program.

The grant is for a "collaborative research training project" in Brazil to be carried out this summer. It will be carried out by Makler, a Brazilian professor, and six graduate students from four universities.

The project is concerned with "The Role of the Salvador Industrial Elite in the Social and Economic Development of Bahia."

Sends him back to U.S. for trial

Tribunal rejects Armstrong appeal

The defence for Kerleto Armstrong, wanted in the United States for charges arising out of the bombing of a university research centre where war research was being done is asking the Supreme Court of Canada for permission to appeal the recent extradition verdict against Armstrong. The court's hearing on whether or not to allow the appeal will be next Wednesday at 10 am in court 1 at 330 University Avenue, lawyer Edward Greenspan's office said yesterday.

The last avenue of appeal is to Justice Minister Otto Lang.

The following analysis of the federal appeal court's judgment against Armstrong was written by Carol Woolverton of Amex magazine and John Liss, legal assistant to Armstrong's defence lawyers.

The Canadian Federal Court of Appeal, in a judgment released on January 5, dismissed an application by Kerleto Armstrong appealing the June decision which ordered him held for extradition to the United States. There he faces four charges of arson and one of murder, arising out of the 1970 bombings of the U.S. Army Math Research Center (AMRC) and three other buildings in Madison Wisconsin, in which research was being done to aid the U.S. war effort in Indochina.

The appeal hearing took place in early December. Karl Armstrong's lawyers, Clay Ruby and Edward Greenspan, had based the appeal of the original decision primarily on the fact that affidavits presented by the State of Wisconsin had been entered as evidence without Armstrong's lawyers having an opportunity to cross-examine the people who swore the affidavits. Two especially damning affidavits, one by Armstrong's former girlfriend and the other by a former roommate now serving in the air force in Spain, were the only ones that linked him specifically to the crime. Without the right of cross-examination, there was no way of verifying the information in the affidavits or establishing that they had not been sworn under duress.

The defence argued that admitting the affidavits into court under these conditions in the extradition hearing was contrary to certain sections of the Canadian Bill of Rights. These state that an individual shall not be deprived of his life, liberty, or security except by "due process of law" (i.e., following the applicable law); and that no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to "deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice."

The Extradition Act states that the extradition commissioner (judge) may admit affidavit evidence, which implies that the judge has discretion in this area. Armstrong's lawyers argued that Judge Waisberg (the original judge) perhaps had the power to appoint a commission to go to Wisconsin and question the swearers of the affidavits, and that he certainly had the power not to admit them into the court without cross examination.

In their reasons for dismissing the appeal, the appeal tribunal ruled that "due process of law" had been carried out, and went on to establish that Karl had had a "fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice." They said that what is required to give effect to the principles involved in this statement depends on the particular situation, and then went on to define "natural justice" by citing cases based on civil and property interests. They ruled further that since an extradition hearing is not supposed to determine the guilt or innocence of the fugitive, cross-examination is not necessary to fulfill the requirements of "natural justice" since the "trial and determination of the fugitive's rights with respect to the charge are left to the trial court" (i.e., to the courts of Wisconsin).

In criminal trials, affidavits are never admissible with some very rare exceptions. By confirming that affidavits can be used in extradition hearings, the court is actually encouraging the demanding state to have witnesses give testimony by affidavit rather than on the witness stand where they can be cross-examined and perhaps disqualified or discredited. Also, by refusing in this way to deal seriously with Armstrong's guilt or innocence, they are ignoring the fact that he loses his "liberty" for up to a year while he awaits trial in Wisconsin.

Armstrong's lawyers pointed out that the Extradition Act was written in the 19th century when it could take months to travel from country to country and affidavits were sometimes the only means of testimony. But, they argued, when a truly "fair hearing" can be accomplished by having people fly in a few hours to give testimony, it activity, the peaceful but futile demonstrations against the Army Math Research Center, which was supplying research for the destruction of Vietnam, the growing realization that the Vietnam war was related to the government's overall national and international policies, and the frustration at the inability of people to change them through peaceful means.

In the Armstrong appeal, even the opinion of a person logically biased the other way was discredited. Clay Ruby quoted the present governor of the state of Wisconsin as saying that the bombing was an act of "wanton political murder". D.J. Cameron, one of the appeal judges, replied, "But he wasn't governor at the time!" This is true, but he was running for that office at the time, and he was the one who later signed the extradition requisition.

The appeal tribunal also denied the political nature of the act by citing some definitions of the term "political" that would exclude this offense. They pointed out that the buildings destroyed were the property of the University of Wisconsin, not the central U.S. government (even though the government was renting or at least using them). They also asserted on seemingly little evidence that the killing of the scientist working in the Army Math Research Center was an aim, not an accidental and unfortunate result, of the bombing.

Although they thus covered themselves by upholding the extradition judge's ruling that the act was not political the appeal judges further ruled that the extradition judge didn't even have the jurisdiction to rule on this question in the first place. They depended on some intricacies and ambiguities in the wording of the Extradition Act and a comparison with English law, to lay the responsibility for determining whether the act is "political" or not on the Minister of Justice, not the extradition commissioner.

Discounting whether or not this was a correct interpretation of the law, this means that the court has set a precedent that will relieve it of the responsibility of ever determining the possible political nature of an extradition case. It also means that since it is unlikely that a Canadian Minister of Justice would ever acknowledge the political nature of a crime in the U.S., meaning it is also unlikely that the U.S. will ever be the site of a political crime in which the perpetrator is given asylum in Canada. The court, which the "independence of the judiciary" is supposed to make a neutral body, has given the responsibility of deciding a political matter in this type of case to the government.

Police brought Armstrong to court in chains.

is unreasonable that affidavit evidence should be admitted at all.

The judge's refusal to consider the offence a political act was another basis upon which the appeal was based. Canada's Extradition Act states that no fugitive is liable to surrender to the demanding state if the offence he is to be prosecuted or punished for is of a political character. Various witnesses had been brought from the States to testify for the defence in the extradition hearing as to the political nature of the act—including Noam Chomsky, Staughton Lynd, Tom Hayden, SDSers Mark Levy and James O'Brien and Phillip Ball, who had known Armstrong at the Madison Tenants Union. They all described the forces in Madison that had led up to the bombing: the intense anti-war

But these witnesses, who had come up to testify as to the connection between activity against the war policies of the government and the destruction of a building in which it was doing its war research, were all labelled as "biased" by the State of Wisconsin, and this argument was accepted by the judge. They were asked by Wisconsin's lawyer Austin Cooper whether or not they would like to see Armstrong extradited, and being witnesses who had come up voluntarily to testify in his defence, they said no, they would not. The appeal tribunal upheld this decision of "bias". This means that in effect there is no way that the political nature of a crime can be proven, since the defense does not have the power to subpoena witnesses.

Wednesday when the Board of Governors appointed the American head of its philosophy department to succeed acting president Richard Storr, also an American.

Storr, named to the post Monday night, said heart trouble would prevent him from taking over from resigning president David Slater.

Slater resigned Monday evening, climaxing a four-month crisis precipitated when the university fell 1,400 students short of its projected enrolment and the president's colleagues lost confidence in his leadership.

Yolton, describing himself as a "hard-nosed academic," said Wednesday he sees finances as the priority right now and "after that, I'd like to get the community back to teaching concerns". He's been at York since 1963 and this year was one of two senators elected to the board of governors.

A provincial or community scheme?

Position of legal aid in Ontario is discussed

By SANDY BOGART

The Ontario legal aid system "is at least one of the most advanced in the common law world," according to the chairman of the Law Society of Upper Canada's Legal Aid Committee.

John Bowlby was speaking at a legal aid seminar held at the St. Lawrence Centre Town Hall, Tuesday. The question to be debated was "Legal aid — for people or for lawyers?" However, debate pivoted more on the merits of a province-wide legal aid system compared to a community-centred legal services program.

Fred Zemans and Mary Hogan, director and articling law graduate, both from Parkdale Community Legal Services, contended that the concept of a community based service was more responsive to the legal needs of low-income groups than was the provincial scheme.

Bowlby opened discussion with a brief history of legal aid in Ontario, stressing the output of the program in terms of numbers of people assisted, both through counselling and direct legal representation by a lawyer in court.

He added that the number of people helped by legal aid, who would otherwise be unable to pay for legal services with their own means, "in part silences criticism of those who say the law is only a tool for the rich." Legal aid "makes available a right that was supposed to be in the system all along," he claimed.

Zemans replied that the legal aid plan needs to be more responsive to the public, and must demonstrate its credibility by making itself available to that segment of society it was created to serve.

He added that the bulk of cases handled at Parkdale deal with problems such as landlord-tenant disputes, and that most lawyers are less familiar with this aspect of law than with property, income, and corporation laws, which deal more with the interests of the affluent.

He said Parkdale's method of employing full-time lawyers gives them more expertise in those cases which occur frequently among lower-income clients. Zemans added that the full-time lawyer system, rather than the legal aid system of rotating lawyers, also establishes a continuum which makes the lawyer more acquainted with, and so more responsive to, that part of society he is trying to serve.

One observer, U of T student Gerald Fulton, said the discussion made one point clear to him: legal aid does not make available to the poor the same type of lawyer-client relationship which an individual lawyer shares with a more affluent client. This, he said, stems partly from the fact that legal aid does not use lawyers on a full-time basis.

Zemans went on to remark that the legal aid system, as administered by the government and the Law Society, lacked the input of lower-income people in helping direct or administer the scheme, adding that Parkdale tried to use these people from the community in administering the scheme.

Legal Aid Committee vice-chairman P.S. Fitzgerald, amid a chorus of boos from the audience, replied that "people from the bottom don't initiate things... poor people don't start things — that's why they're poor." He cited this as the experience of some of the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity schemes.

He later qualified his statement, adding that after the poor were helped to realize their problems as legal ones, and the alternatives open to them, they could assist in their solution.

Hogan replied she felt the "poor are quite capable of articulating their needs," in view of her experience at Parkdale.

She went on to reiterate some of Zemans' statements, amplifying his stress on the rapport needed between legal service and community. She cited Parkdale's use of group assistants from the community.

Bowlby countered that such a community service cannot offer aid to the province as a whole. A law student who works at Parkdale said it did not try to serve the province, but rather could work as a model for similar services throughout Ontario.

Another questioner identified herself as "one of your lower-income people" and inquired about the possibility of 24-hour lawyer service. She explained that affluent people can call a lawyer who will come to their home immediately, because of a continued lawyer-client relationship, which lower-income people do not have.

She urged a system which would get a lawyer to go to the home of a low-income person "as fast as the cops or the children's aid" do.

One audience member explained a new scheme to use volunteer lawyers to be on call on a 24-hour legal service available to its community.

Several audience members mentioned personal cases where legal aid had helped them. One added that, in his experience, it needed improvements, but is still preferable to the U.S. system of having an appointed lawyer or not having one at all. Ontario's legal aid system provides for a lawyer to choose a case which interests him, rather than being assigned to one, and for the client to choose his own lawyer.

Federal grant to day care is to be doubled

OTTAWA (CUP) — The federal government expects to double its allocation to day care centres in Canada, according to a national day care study released Tuesday, Jan. 23, by the federal department of health and welfare.

The department will spend about $8 million this year to support day care centres, but the move is unlikely to be much help to working mothers. Last year it spent about $4 million.

The dramatic increase results from amendments to the Canada Assistance Plan passed in 1972. The federal government will share rent or depletion on facilities, program equipment, supplies, food and other day care costs with provincial governments. Previously, only salaries were shared.

The Royal Commission on the Status of Women called for more federal funding of day care facilities in its 1970 report. The commission estimated only one per cent of children of working women attended day care centers. Mothers of about 1,380,000 children work for a living.

The department of labor estimates 59,000 "one-parent mothers" were in the labor force in 1971. Some 182,000 of 634,000 working mothers have children under the age of six.

The number of day care centre spaces in Canada almost doubled since 1967. But the federal government blames an increase in the number of women entering the labor force for keeping the percentage increase of working mothers' children enrolled in day care centres down to only one-quarter of one per cent from 1967 to 1971.

The Health and Welfare survey says programs relating to children of working parents (full day care and lunch and after school) constitute only about 43 per cent of the day care centres in Canada. The increase in federal funds is unlikely to significantly alter the situation.

Domination of the Ukraine goes back three centuries

By BILL HUTUL

Soviet dominance of the Ukrainian culture dates back to a treaty more than three centuries old, according to Ukrainian students.

This problem was discussed by about 25 members of the Ukrainian Students Club Wednesday, who met at Hart House to discuss the historical consequences of the Treaty of Pereyaslav, signed in 1659.

The treaty was a military alliance of the Moscovites and the Cossacks of the Ukraine, who were under the leadership of Bohdan Khmelnytsky.

The original treaty is not now in existence. What remains is a second treaty which is the foundation of one school of thought. The second treaty unites the Ukrainian peoples under the Moscovite state. This treaty is claimed to have been imposed on Khmelnytsky's son, George, after his father's death.

The other interpretation states that the original treaty, signed in 1654, was just an alliance between the Cossacks and the Moscovites for protection from the Poles and the Tartars.

The Ukraine has never been an independent political entity since; thus the treaty has consistently been a matter of considerable debate.

Club members were especially interested in applying this material to some 20th century issues. The assimilation of the Ukrainian culture by the Soviets was opposed by members.

Although not a political entity, the Ukraine is striving to maintain its social customs, religious practices, and identity as a people. Conflicting viewpoints emerged on what Ukrainians should do to preserve their culture.

The meeting stressed the need for better education of the public to the Ukrainian position. This is necessary the members felt, before any consensus on the proper course of action, can be taken.

The dilemma of academic standards

"Now," says Mr. Gradgrind, "what I want is Facts. Teach these boys and girls nothing but Facts. Facts alone are wanted in life. Plant nothing else, and root out everything else. You can only form the minds of reasoning animals upon Facts: nothing else will ever be of any service to them. This is the principle on which I bring up my own children, and this is the principle upon which I bring up these children. Stick to the Facts, Sir!"

—Charles Dickens, Hard Times

The high school I attended was a great place for standards, academic and otherwise.

When I was in grade 12, it made headlines for banishing a student to the halls for a period of several months because his hair came over his ears. Nowadays, any with-it junior executive has longer hair and flashier clothes. But, then, things were seen in a different light.

The school paper editorialized darkly that relaxing standards of appearance would mean a "return to the Dark Ages". Our health teacher told us that giving in on even such a small point would set off a snowballing avalanche of events that would eventually result "in the collapse of civilization." And, he was deadly serious. Yet, remarkably — this may provide a hint about the workings of such a mentality — it was this same man who lectured us in the importance to civilization of life-long monogamy, and who then later lost his job when he was caught having an affair with another teacher.

In grade 13, a request for an 'honours system' of attendance for senior students with good marks was opposed by many teachers, with doleful prophesies of a complete collapse of academic standards. The system came into effect anyway, and the doomsayers were to a large extent borne out. Day after day, the cafeteria and the common room were filled with students playing chess or cards, or shooting the breeze.

Similar experiences seem to have plagued other experiments of the same kind. "Free" high schools are frequently filled with kids doing nothing more productive than listening to records and smoking dope. "Unstructured" courses at this university are all too often the Mickey Mouse farces that the conservative faculty who act as the self-appointed guardians of academic standards predicted they would become.

At times, what postures as "free education" turns out to be a grotesque parody of the original idea.

The concept was based on a critique of 'traditional' education that said that, when learning becomes the memorization of a pre-determined sequence of facts and techniques, the student, bored and alienated by an experience that has no meaning to him, develops anti-intellectual values.

At the same time, the student accepts what he is taught, precisely because he doesn't care and has no criteria by which to judge. Boredom tends to destroy his resistance and his faculty for critical thought, and, increasingly, he comes to expect that, in education, nothing will really make sense anyway. After the content of the rote-learned education has largely been forgotten, the effect of the form remains. This means that a student never learns how to think and learn independently; he depends on external discipline to tell him what to learn, and to force him to learn.

What should happen? Instead, the argument goes, is that a person should learn — all through his life — because he is motivated by his own curiosity and desire for learning to do so. Discipline should be self-discipline, rather than that associated with the pressure of marks, money, or moral authority. Since each person's experiences and capacities are different, there cannot be a pattern of learning that is appropriate for all.

Indeed, it is pointed out, traditional ways of organizing reality for the classroom — the chopping up of the world into arbitrary subject-areas and disciplines, when everyone knows reality is interdisciplinary and continuous — is patently absurd. And, not only absurd; it perpetuates a confusion about the world that serves those who presently have power, and who cloak the nature of their power with a clouding and atomizing ideology.

Finally, it is argued, there is so much more knowledge than it is possible for one person to assimilate, that each person must make choices, based on his own needs, as to what his priorities in learning will be. No other person can make that choice as effectively, and, certainly, it is clear that the entrenched pattern of 'disciplines' is not fundamentally capable of meeting the needs of a changing world.

"You appear to be astonished," he said, smiling at my expression of surprise. "Now that I do know it I shall do my best to forget it."

"To forget it!"

"You see," he explained, "I consider that a man's brain originally is like a little empty attic, and you have to stock it with such furniture as you choose. A fool takes in all the lumber of every sort that he comes across, so that the knowledge which might be useful to him gets crowded out, or at best is jumbled up with a lot of other things, so that he has a difficulty in laying his hands upon it. Now the skilled workman is very careful indeed as to what he takes into his brain-attic.

He will have nothing but the tools which may help him in doing his work, but of these he has a large assortment, and all in the most perfect order. It is a mistake to think that that little room has elastic walls and can distend to any extent. Depend upon it there comes a time when for every addition of knowledge you forget something that you knew before. It is of the highest importance, therefore, not to have useless facts elbowing out the useful ones."

"But the Solar System!" I protested.

"What the deuce is it to me?" he interrupted impatiently: "you say that we go round the sun. If we went round the moon it would not make a pennyworth of difference to me or to my work."

—conversation between Sherlock

Holmes and Doctor Watson

Paradoxically, there seems to have occurred a coming together between two seemingly opposite poles. On the one side, there is what we can call Gradgrind-Holmes school of thought (though in fairness it should be borne in mind that Holmes was really pulling Watson's leg): the dogmatically hard-

Sherlock Holmes believed that the brain was like a little attic, in which there was room for only so many facts and no more. He didn't like his little attic cluttered up with useless facts.

headed conception that measures knowledge by utilitarian value and nothing else. Nothing is intrinsically worth knowing or universally important to know.

On the other side, there is the line that it's all a matter of "doing your own thing". If your thing is Shakespeare, that's fine. And, if your thing is basket-weaving, that's fine too. Crossword puzzles or the solar system, it's all a matter of taste.

So, we have what are (for me, let me hasten to add, lest I be accused of making arbitrary value-judgements) two equally repugnant philosophies of education meeting in the same malodorous quagmire of pure relativism.

There is, of course, one other alternative: the traditional one of the liberal humanistic education, with its rich history. But, it is only too apparent that its day has long since passed.

It is incapable of meeting the needs of a booming technological society. The day of gentlemanly elites is over. And, even more important, it is guilty of all the charges brought against traditional education that were listed above: it rarely succeeded, even in its day, in producing the well-rounded self-motivated individuals that it ostensibly was meant to do.

It seems indisputable that you can't force people to learn the accumulated wisdom of their culture. For technocratic knowledge, there is a certain case to be made that even the barbaric conditioning techniques of a B.F. Skinner can successfully bring about rote learning of the subject. (Though the effects it has on the mind of a person subjected to it makes the technique one that should be avoided at all costs.) But, an appreciation of Shakespeare, say, cannot be brought about in the same way. And, to memorize Shakespeare without coming to an understanding of his meaning and his importance in the cultural heritage is surely the most philistine approach of all.

If there is one lesson that our high schools have taught us, it is that the surest way to kill interest in and enjoyment of anything is to have it rammed down your throat in school.

But, on the other hand, there is much evidence that left to themselves in a "free" environment the young will tend not to do the hard, disciplined work necessary to master the accumulated wisdom of their culture.

Are we left, then, with the prospect of seeing this wisdom either force-fed, in the way it is now, self-defeatingly, or seeing it disappear altogether?

Some would argue that it is just as well if it disappears, that we have no need for the culture of a dead past, produced by an elite supporting itself on the exploitation of the masses. The future, it is argued, will produce its own art and better wisdom, once the shackles of the feudal and capitalist past are thrown off.

But, this is too simple and it is wrong. For, to understand the present and shape a future, it is necessary to understand the past, and come to grips with it. The development of societies, of cultures, is a historical process and to be ignorant of the past means to cripple the future. The art and knowledge of the past are often class-biased, limited, and even wrong. But they also contain at least elements of important wisdom and they are necessary, building-stones for we will not build the future in a vacuum. (This is not to say their only value is as tools to build the future, as human accomplishments; they have a value of their own.)

It is a dilemma from which there is no easy out.

But it may be useful to note that it is a myth that there is an extensive tradition of a humanistic past in which scholarship in the classical sense flourished. Always, the vast majority of those who received a humanistic education were learning its 'content' by rote, without internalizing its values. It is surely instructive, for example, that it was Nazi Germany that led the world in the quality and quantity of its culture — there were more opera houses, libraries, and individuals with classical humane educations in that barbarian land (including its armies) than in any other. If that is the best the western cultural heritage could produce, then perhaps it would be as well if it were to disappear.

And it remains as much a myth today. Those who carry on the cultural tradition do so, not because of the fact that it is taught, however badly, in the universities, but more often in spite of it. Their achievement has not been to learn from their education, but to survive it with their faculties relatively intact.

The educational system today performs other functions.

For one, it keeps people off the job market, crucially important in a time of wide-spread unemployment. (The problem, of course, is that it costs enormous amounts of money to keep people off the job market by keeping them in school. Which is a dilemma for the government.)

It supplies the training and skills

The self-appointed guardians of academic standards are seeking to preserve a mythical status quo.

which the corporations need in their employees. (From reading and writing to advanced work in science.) Implicit in this is social stratification: the placing of different people in different layers in the economic and social system.

It socializes students: gives them the ideology, values, and appropriate behaviour patterns of the capitalist society.

And the universities provide direct service to the economic system and its state apparatus, through research, interchange of personnel, etc.

Only incidentally, and fairly inefficiently, is the 'cultural heritage' passed on.

So the conservatives who cry wolf at the erosion of academic standards are seeking to preserve a mythical status quo. It is not, and has not been, in an important, central way, the educational institutions, that have fostered the development and survival of an artistic and cultural heritage. The schools and universities have served primarily as the location where these activities take place. But they themselves have been more of a hindrance than a catalyst.

At the same time, the concepts of 'free schools' and 'unstructured learning' have functioned largely as escapes for alienated middle-class youth and some adult mentors. Understandable as this is in the face of the repressiveness of existing educational institutions, it is not furthering education or culture. Much as we must learn from the principles on which 'free schools' are based when we replace the present educational system by one that is truly educational, for the present, we must realize that they are not viable as agents of learning, or of change. There can be no islands of freedom in an oppressive capitalistic sea.

The cultural heritage of the past will survive but it will do so because of the museums and the libraries, not because of the university and its phony 'academic standards'.

And an environment in which learning takes place because of curiosity, creativity, and self-discipline will be created, not through the proliferation of Mickey Mouse courses, but through the destruction of a society that represses these human potentialities.

Narrow view mars book on

The first time I told a heterosexual friend I was gay, he reacted with the shocked surprise I was afraid of. But he also told me about being propositioned in a public washroom by another man. Strong loathing was his reaction.

The surprising story that his good friend was also gay must have forced him to see me in a different light. If he didn't wonder whether I too went in for washroom encounters, he seemed to wonder whether his otherwise "normal" friend went in for drag, since he thought all male homosexuals like to dress as, and be, women. In his universe, that just isn't natural.

His unquestioned assumption — that there must be a role for the man and one for the woman — left something to be desired, but he was quite emphatic that his encounters with homosexuals in washrooms did too.

Perhaps if he could see my other gay male friends being around the men they feel close to, he might change his mind.

The way faces light up when lovers/boyfriends meet might give him a hint that the games and propositions do not go on all the time, or go on with everybody. If he were to look closer he might notice the affectionate glances two men exchange or the oblivious enjoyment they find in each other. He might not see them wake up to each other in the morning because people like to keep these moments to themselves, but he ought to know such moments exist. The fact that they exist side by side with the stereotyped images of all homosexuals he had before does not take away from their validity, or their similarity to his own means of expression with a woman. The forms of expression may be different, but the content and the feeling are the same. It's not a big secret, but many people don't realize this.

Most people in society agree that we are the sad stereotypes depicted in books, plays and the like. If they have any doubts, they can usually find a psychiatrist or a York University professor to that it usually does not proceed from a description of real symptoms to an analysis of equally real causes. The authors interviewed a lot of sad people and described part of a world that does, in fact, exist for many homosexuals.

That part consists of bars, where many people meet, often only for sex; hustlers who charge for their services; and mainly, fear that one's horrible secret will be revealed to a particularly unsympathetic world. That means social and family ostracism and possibly loss of a job.

This is as true of Canada as it is of many other places in the world. It is also true that the conditions described and the games homosexuals play with each other are not unlike those games played by heterosexuals. They may be, and often are, carried to extremes, but the resemblances are too close to be ignored.

The other thing the authors failed to realize is that these conditions do not have to stay this way. They can change. Gay people do not need to be afraid of their sexuality, and neither does anyone else.

But the book's authors, who use pseudonyms, don't seem to realize any of this. Their book says, in effect, "this is the way we are. You may not like it but please like us, and please stop being mean because we won't hurt you."

The book is made up of a short introduction on homosexuality, Christianity, and its successor, psychiatry. Then it gets into case studies. For example, Eugene, "a tall, well-built man in his late thirties" is "attractive, intelligent, articulate" and not "fragile and limp-wristed nor excessively burly" and he thinks "loneliness is the greatest problem of homosexuality. I think it follows many people to their graves. And I think it drives many homosexuals to their graves". On the other hand, Paul, the interior decorator whose apartment "reflects his excellent taste" says, "on a per capita basis, if you took the number of homosexual relationships that are in existence right now, and stacked them up beside the number of heterosexual marriages taking place this year, their lasting ability would probably come out just about the same."

Unfortunately, to arrive at that conclusion he had to answer a number of insipid questions from the authors on effeminacy, about which the authors seem particularly obsessed. Another stereotype they have hangups about is the masculine woman. Now, it isn't always true that the masculine woman (put-down as truck-driver types or "diesel dykes") is automatically a lesbian, or that the really "beautiful" woman is either, in the conventional sense, like "Merle, a leggy blonde with an easy manner and a warm sudden smile" because physical characteristics really have very little to do with peoples' sexual preferences. They almost seem to be saying "We're not the stereotypes you think we are, we're different stereotypes. Gay people have transcended the faggy effeminates of song and story and have now become articulate, cool, sophisticated leggy blondes with perfect taste.

While they're so busy trying to prove what "normal" people we are, the authors have lost sight of one very important thing. It was evident twelve years ago to the American author James Baldwin:

People do not take the relations between men and boys seriously, you know that. . . They do not believe there can be tears between men. They think we are only playing at a game and that we do it to shock them.

The advantage of that view, apart from the fact that it is a far healthier approach, is that it leads to an understanding of homosexuality as a form of loving rather than as a form of "deviance." To arrive at an understanding of homosexuality, you have to understand heterosexuality and the games straight people play.

People of the same and different sexes have always related to each other. Heterosexuality and homosexuality have existed side by side with each other for centuries and they probably always will because they are two expressions of human sexuality. It should be obvious that the important question to be addressed is not why people relate to one another in different ways, but why they cannot.

Homosexual relationships, like heterosexual relationships, depend on the environment around them as much as they do on the people in them. The interrelationship between the people and their surroundings (remembering that everyone is largely a product of a society that has definite opinions on how two or more people should relate to one another) has much to do with moulding the character and the structures of the relationship. The influence of the surrounding society even decrees that there must be structures: husband and wife unit, man and woman unit, each half having definite roles. Even the concepts of "masculine" behavior and thinking as opposed to "feminine", are reflections of that structuralization. And then there are those privatized relationships which none but the two participants may enter. Larger society uses this concept in most other areas. It's called private property and the designation in both instances is quite apt. "Hands off, he's mine!"

The fact that a man and a woman can destroy each other in a relationship does not mean that male-female relationships are sick and that none of them can succeed. On the other hand, the fact that a man and a woman can enrich each other in incredible ways when they get together does not mean either, that this is the only way men and women can and should relate, or that some deity had this plan tucked up his sleeve all along. I don't suppose it's necessary to add exploitative gay relationships exist or that this means gayness itself is sick.

But homosexual relationships are prejudged to be failures because of their homosexuality, and not because of the people in them. The failure of a heterosexual relationship, on the other hand, is blamed on the people, not the structure. There is no scientific basis for assuming the relationships are different, but there is a lot of prejudice that will make people look for some.

An old story about two psychiatrists discussing their patients might illustrate this. One says, "Doctor, all my homosexual patients are sick." The other replies, "That's funny, all my heterosexual patients are sick too." So the question does not only amount to "you" in the straight world understanding "us" in the gay world. We all play the same games for the same purposes in our relationships.

In Toronto, for example, the gay bars and clubs on Yonge street have their equivalents in the straight dating bars that are sometimes located practically next door. In one, fashionable swinging Young Toronto makes the weekly trip from the suburbs in the ceaseless quest to Get Laid. A few doors away fashionable "swinging" Young Gay Toronto also makes the same weekly trip from the suburbs or the downtown gay ghetto for the same reasons. Nobody wants to go home alone.

Perhaps the hustling and the mad search to pick up a partner produces the same competition and the same insecurity about not being as "desirable" as others in the place, and the crushing realization that one never will be.

The fact that it really doesn't matter what you look like to the other human beings who are attracted to you doesn't always come out in an atmosphere designed for plastic people. The people weren't plastic in the first place, really, but they can't be anything else after a while. You either have to play the game or make a new one. Plastic, Madison Avenue, Playboy, private property, and the "just-so" look we all have to display didn't find their way into the descriptions in "Not so Gay World", but they belong there too.

It's no use writing a book for straight people that says, "Please like us 'cause we're not going to hurt you". They just replay in their magazines, that faggots are really 'just folks' after all, but different "folks" from them.

A book which doesn't get beyond a plea for that kind of acceptance, a book whose authors do not even feel free enough to use their own names, has serious problems.

It doesn't even make it as a handbook. It spends a lot of time talking about Toronto without even mentioning where to go to meet other homosexuals. Stating that somewhere in the 241.57 square miles of metropolitan Toronto there are other gay people isn't exactly what I was looking for. (The book, by the way, did not provide me with that information either.) But even if the book had named all the bars and had given the telephone numbers of the authors ("for a good time, call . . .") it wouldn't have been much of a help. Unless we can get past that stage, the "gay world" won't be any happier than it is now.

It's certainly necessary for gay people to assert pride in being gay. There's no reason not to. And it's certainly necessary to get other people to understand us once we do. If we can't realize that our humanity, gay or straight, above everything else allows us to admit that there can be tears between men, then we really are only playing at a game to shock people.

And there are more important things to do.

reassure them "society must step in and limit the damage he (the homosexual) may cause to others, if not to himself". (D. Cappon, York Professor in Environmental Studies, Toronto Star, Wednesday, January 10, 1973).

And if they still want to be told how dangerous we are, all they have to do is read A Not So Gay World, "the frank, inside story of what it is like to be a homosexual in Canada." 'Inside' means homosexuals wrote it (a man and a woman), and "frank" stories never lie.

Unfortunately, the trouble with this kind of "frank" descriptive look at a particular subject is

Troell's epic "Emigrants" ranks with Kane

Despite their critical acclaim, I delayed seeing Eric Rohmer's Chloe in the Afternoon and Jan Troell's The Emigrants for the same reason that I don't go to Stratford: I find serious art a bore. While I am appreciating it, my ass is moving all over the seat. This was certainly the case with Claire's Knee, Rohmer's last film. I don't begrudge it the praise it earned elsewhere, but I was ready to leave the theatre well before it ended its delightfully sculptured course. With Troell's Emigrants my reluctance was strictly guess-work. The only Swedish films I know are Bergman's and I avoid them scrupulously. Too solemn. The plot of The Emigrants (a group of peasants flee the hardships of their homeland, suffer the middle passage, and face the difficulties of settling America's North-west) lent itself too easily to brooding, religious black and white. As it turns out, I could not have been more wrong: it is a great, bright, colourful, joyful movie and I would have been happy to have it continue well past its present two and a half hours.

Chloe turned out to be a pleasant enough experience too, although I still was bored. This might be a problem of translation. Rohmer is an intellectual (during the preparation of Chloe he finished his doctoral thesis on "The Organization of Space in Murnau's Faust") and he fills his films with intellectual dialogue. By that I don't mean dialogue that must be considered, like Pinter's, but lines spoken by characters who have thought out their positions and express to one another the conclusions they have arrived at. If their imagery is evocative, and it often is, it is a bonus but essentially these are thoughts being given voice. Whether movies can serve as this kind of vehicle, whether thinkers can make gripping heroes, is a moot question. Godard and Rohmer are the evidence, pro or con, depending on how you like them. My ass is certainly clear in its position, but my head is not, in part because nobody makes intellectual movies in English. When the thought is quick and difficult, so are the sub-titles, and I am never sure whether it is my mind or my eyes that are over-taxed.

Otherwise, Chloe in the Afternoon is a light, witty film, a comedy in the un-Americanized sense. For example, Frederic, Rohmer's thirtyish, happily married businessman hero, fantasizes himself wearing an emulet that robs women, at least most women, of their free will. He then, still in fantasy, proceeds to utilize his power with utterly tactful restraint. It is a fine, funny sequence, the opposite of slapstick, and of most filmed fantasies. It is true and silly end we laugh without losing respect.

Such is Frederic's gently manipulated life when he re-encounters Chloe, an acquaintance to whom he was attracted a half-dozen years before. She is his perfect complement, her slightly desperate bohemianism matching his slightly laboured efforts at extracting the full measure of happiness from the bourgeois. Neither is fully happy though certainly not unhappy and both are content with their chosen directions.

These are mature characters, and ones that allow plenty of room for supposition. Rohmer seems to have cast Bernard Verley and Zouzou with one another in mind: her solid masculine bones and wide lips against his soft baby's eyes. Zouzou, by the way, is a well-known figure in the Paris underground and pop scene, where she was an early and great go-go girl. The image of her working with fastidious and puritanical Rohmer gives rise to a fine sequel to Chloe.

Rohmer has a particular depth and flair for casting, rendering even his walk-ons three dimensional. Frederic's secretaries, seen whenever someone passes through his outer office, are full universes of approval, disapproval, discretion and schoolgirl glee. Even the women that Frederic ogles on the street are real women, and he eyes their woman-ness, not their parts. It is the pleasantest sort of anti-sexism imaginable.

But for all his consciousness of women and of himself, Frederic is still a damn prude, the articulate version of the starched English banker. He fits his passion to his plans, he lacks balls. As a character he slips down towards being entertaining. When he finally flees from Chloe's open advances, it is like a little boy's flight from a first, pre-mature glimpse of the parts of shame. It is so ludicrous that his resistance to temptation becomes comic, and the moral of Rohmer's "moral tale" as he calls it, twists around to "don't be like that." As with Milton, Eric Rohmer appears to be of the devil's party without knowing it.

It is much harder to write praise than it is to write criticism, the greater the praise, the more dearly purchased the sentences. So understand that, from here on, I am simply expanding "wow" to a respectable length for a review. The Emigrants is easily the best film of the year, probably the best of many years. I doubt if it will ever date, or need to be forgiven the follies of the period during which it was made. It stands with Citizen Kane.

What Troell has created in The Emigrants, and I can think of no precedents, is a realistic epic, something small and bright. Somehow in movies, long stories always get large-scale treatment (not to mention the little stories that get inflated by force-feeding the budget). Similarly, sunshine seems to stretch movie-screens as if the weather was different for kings and commoners. Perhaps because movies are made in the presence of so much money, personal or borrowed, film-makers have developed a squalid picture of poverty and an inflated respect for wealth and grandeur. Even poor Teyve, in Fiddler on the Roof, had to be blown up to reach a "dignified" proportion. Although, it is to Norman Jewison's credit that he made the man dignified at all: Most directors would have missed it.

Troell taps the grandeur that is there all along. His scripting and camerawork are beautiful and devoid of tricks: Liv Ullmann, joyfully passing a sunny hour on a swing, is not setting up a counter-point to the hardship and tragedy that must envelop her because she is poor. She is having fun on a swing, part of the network of fun that is as real as the network of hard-work and too little food. A Man for All Seasons is the only other film that comes to mind that was big, but shot small, and it never got passed trying to look small — an awful task given Bolt's self-righteous and overblown script. Troell's filming is as effortless as it is beautiful. He catches moods with the skill of a confident artist, and, secure in his confidence, stays out of the way and lets them work.

The Emigrants combines the best of the year's other good films: the easy flow of Sounder, the broadness and detail of The Sorrow and the Pity and the room for supposition of Chloe. Even where it skates on dangerously thin ice — the illiterate immigrants' blind faith in American immigration propaganda — it negotiates with authority and force drawn from the story and the time, not an from easy identification with contemporary sophistication. Max Von Sydow, Liv Ullman, Eddie Axberg, Monica Zetterlund, Alan Edwall, Pierre Lindstedt all match one another's fine performances. Perhaps the whole cast and crew should be singled out: they have created one of the most sensitive volumes of our history.

With this issue, L'Hebdo expands its book review section to include not only reviews of current books, but critiques and evaluations of books commonly in use in courses at this university. We invite articles and critiques from students that examine the important ideas and books that circulate in the classrooms, to be submitted to The Varsity building at 91 St. George. These can involve, not only discussions of books, but also in-depth evaluations of courses that are not possible within the rigid format of course evaluations, with their "objective" short-answer format.

What C.E. Black attempts to do in The Dynamics of Modernization is to use a comparative approach to history to study the processes of modernization as they occur in different places at different times. While comparative study of urbanization and disruptive social change could clearly be a fruitful endeavour, it is not so in this case for two major reasons.

The first is that Black does not understand the dynamics of past modernization, the second is that he does not understand the dynamics of the present.

But, while these two failings have resulted in the writing of a dismally bad book, it would be unfair to dismiss The Dynamics of Modernization as being totally useless, for the book does have some redeeming features. Its virtues stem from the fact that Black has been able to cram so much nonsense into one relatively concise and well-written book. Since his errors are similar to those committed by many other writers on the same topic, the manuscript acquires potential as a textbook of what to avoid.

Black begins by defining "modernization" as "the process by which historically evolved institutions are adapted to the rapidly changing functions that reflect the unprecedented increase in man's knowledge, permitting control over his environment, that accompanied the scientific revolution."

He then goes on to describe some of the defining features of this process. It means, according to him, increased centralization, the replacement of arbitrary administration of individuals by legal systems, increased emphasis on efficiency, a process of rapid urbanization, a trend away from individual or family ownership of business activities to corporate forms (the corporation may be either privately or state-owned, since the "relationship of public to private enterprise in a society is... more a function of its cultural heritage than of its level of development"), mechanization and decreased relative importance of the agricultural sector, the development of a more fluid social structure and the emergence of "modern" leadership.

Black then goes on to describe the logic of the comparative method in history. Comparative history can be more fruitful in studying modernization than more traditional approaches, he says, because it is concerned, not so much with institutions and forms, but with causes and functions, not with completed events and a static reality, but with change and the dynamics of history.

He rejects "objectivism" — a tendency to stay close to detail and shy away from generalizations. He also dismisses Marxism, in a back-handed way, stating that "determinism" leads to "narrowly based conclusions", and that class analysis is a "relic of an earlier era that has ceased to serve a useful purpose".

Dynamics of mystification: "Explaining" modernization

Instead, he prefers to use "more refined conceptions of occupational categories, social strata, and interest groups, which have been developed in recent years by behavioural scientists." (sic)

Taking politically organized societies as the basic units of his study, he goes on to describe some of the central features of the modernizing process that he says are common to all societies undergoing it. These are "the consolidation of modernizing leadership", "economic and social transformation", and "the integration of society".

He then outlines the seven patterns of modernization that he has identified. The first pattern comprises Great Britain and France, the second the United States, Canada, New Zealand, Australia, the third the rest of Europe excluding Russia, the fourth America south of the Rio Grande, the fifth Russia, Japan, China, and four others, the sixth primarily former colonies outside the Americas, the seventh, colonies and former colonies primarily in Africa south of the Sahara.

He then sets out a typology as a basis for comparison based on five criteria: (1) whether the transfer of political power from "traditional" to "modern" leadership occurred early or late relative to other societies, (2) whether the immediate political challenge of modernity was external or internal, (3) whether the society enjoyed continuity of territory or underwent regrouping, (4) whether the society had been a colony, (5) whether the society entered the modern era with institutions that could be adapted to new functions.

One might begin an analysis of the book by noting the biases that it conceals and appeals to, that, for example, Black admires Weber and Parsons, and uses their approaches, that Black in turn is admired by academics of the stripe of Crane Brinton and Canada's own Karl Deutsch, or by noting the kinds of books he discusses, and does not discuss, in his bibliographical essay.

Beyond this, one might point out that he presents nothing more than a taxonomy of "modernization", and that, quite apart from the fact that his classifications are very much open to question, it is precisely an analysis of the dynamics of modernization in different societies that he lacks. Also revealing are the criteria he uses for "modernization" — he dates the period of modernization in European countries for example, from the time of the bourgeois revolution in each country — and his use of liberal categories of analysis and liberal definitions.

But perhaps the most noticeable characteristic of the book is its almost total lack of documentation. The book has no footnotes, no statistical charts, and exhibits a near-complete reluctance to ever back up a statement with facts. Even when one makes allowance for the fact that the book is an essay, a thesis, it is still impossible to condone Black's practice of making, in his best professional manner, sweeping generalizations and unsubstantiated claims. Statements such as those claiming that when modernization occurs "privileged elites must compete with the formerly underprivileged", that "private enterprise... is generally the most efficient method of production" that "Nationalization of property devoted to production is a rather primitive form of control", that "what is called for by the rationalizing tendencies of modernization is less a leveling than an equalization of opportunity", that "modernization fosters a more equal distribution of income" that the use of the term "elite" is not suited to "those disciplines the principal concern of which is the study of political power", that nationalism tends to "divert" energies from "modernization", that the terms "capitalism" and "socialism" are becoming meaningless, that what is needed in the world is the formation of a new international consensus, (the same theory can be found in Talcott Parsons', Sociological Theory and Modern Society), are surely statements that require some substantiation?

Similarly, his use of the comparative approach does not free him from the necessity of examining the actual societies in which "modernization" has taken or is taking place, and the processes and dynamics that are at work. It would not be fair to state that Black neglects those facts that disprove his contentions, for he ignores all facts with equal disdain. But it probably would be correct to suggest that the reason he proceeds without the aid of facts or logic is because his contentions are in fact totally without basis in either fact or logic.

One may take as one example is analysis, (if this word may be used,) of the process of urbanization. For Black, urbanization and modernization are almost synonymous. The large-scale growth of cities, together with the rationalization of agriculture and the growth of industries in the cities, are the central processes of modernization. He fails to realize, however, that the growth of cities in certain countries, the early modernizers, was completely different from that in countries he considers to be undergoing modernization now. Where in Great Britain and the United States, for example, urbanization meant industrialization and the development of what Black calls a "modern" society, the growth of cities in Latin America, for example, is indicative of a completely different process (or, in another sense, of the opposite end of the same process.).

In the "older" countries, urbanization meant economic development and the creation of the social patterns that Black calls "modern". In the "new" countries, however, the growth of cities has been associated with what Andre Gunder Frank has called "The Development of Underdevelopment". What occurred, and is still occurring, according to Frank and others of his school, is the extension of a metropolitan pattern to the "un-modern" countries, which by this process were, and are being, economically and socially "under-developed".

The growth of cities in these countries has meant, not modernization, but the increasing entrenchment of conservatism and elites. The model that Frank, Paul Baran, Hobsbawm, and others have been positing for the process of "modernization" is that when "modernization" occurred in countries such as Great Britain and the United States, it was a process which was imperialist and metropolitan in nature, made possible only by the exploitation of the "un-modern" world by the modernizing countries.

Furthermore, it is incorrect to suggest that countries that have not modernized are at previous levels of development, a level that modernized countries reached, say one hundred years ago. Quite the contrary, says Frank, "the operation of the capitalist system over the past centuries effectively and entirely penetrated even the apparently most isolated sectors of the under-developed world. Therefore, the economic, political, social, and cultural institutions and relations we now observe there are the products of the historical development of the capitalist system no less than are the seemingly more modern or capitalist features of the national metropolises of these underdeveloped countries."

When the imperialist nations modernized, in other words, the whole world was modernized. The same process that created what Black calls "modern" society in Western Europe and the U.S. also created at the same time what Black would call un-modern societies in the "backward" world. The one was not possible without the other; the same dynamic that created development in the imperialist nations created underdevelopment in the "backward" nations. It is therefore fatuous to suggest, as Black does, that the whole world will eventually become what he defines as "modern". If the "modern" nations are to remain "modern" within Black's definitions, then the "backward" nations must remain "backward".

The role of the city is crucial in this question of imperialist modernization, for modernization occurred within a metropolitan framework. Within the "modernizing" countries, the growth of cities was associated with the turning of "backward" countries into raw materials suppliers. This meant the growth of national and regional centres in these countries as well, but the growth of cities here has an opposite effect.

Instead of making for industrialization, the city here made for the growth of pseudo-feudal conditions, the entrenchment of elites, and the creation of obstacles to modernization. As one authority has put it, "The privileged position of the city has its origin in the colonial period. It was founded by the Conqueror to serve the same ends that it still serves today; to incorporate the indigenous population into the economy brought and developed by that Conqueror and his descendants. The regional city was an instrument of conquest and is still today an instrument of domination." In Mexico, for example, "the mestizo population... always lives in a city, a center of an intercultural region, which acts as the metropolis of a zone of indigenous population and which maintains with the underdeveloped communities an intimate relation which links the center with the satellite communities."

The process of capitalist modernization, in other words, meant the creation of a worldwide metropolitan framework, analogous to a system of satellites, in which the "modern" conditions of the leading centres are made possible precisely by the creation and maintenance of "un-modern" conditions in the colonized centres.

What Black has done, then, is to abstract from one-half of a certain historical model of modernization — capitalist modernization — certain features which he assumes, incorrectly, to be common to all models of modernization, and to construct an ideal kind of "modernization" from these abstractions. The dynamic of this model, however, is not universal, ie — ahistorical but historically specific, and cannot be repeated.

To study the dynamics of change in the "un-modern" world — and the changes are not what Black would call "modernization" — and to study the means by which modernization can take, and to study the way in which "modernization" occurred in the past, it is necessary to reintroduce the concepts that Black rejects, and put them at the heart of the analytical effort: the concepts of exploitation, imperialism, and class. Only then will it be possible to go beyond the practice of comparing, as if they were two different things, opposite sides of the same coin, and to understand both the past and the present.

Read this and discover fifties revival

Just about a year ago, the Everly Brothers staged a kind of resurgent assault on the rock music haunts which had seen them as perennial tenants in the bygone "Bird Oog"-days. At that time, their album, Stories We Could Tell, attested to the truth that their Nashville brand of rock with a twang was merely in hiatus awaiting the return of rockabilly which was probably initially re-motivated by the multi-Buffalo Springfield off-shoots. But back they were — Oon and Phil augmented by a myriad assembly of rock heavies — Crosby, Nash, Bramlett, Gordon, Cooder, and twice as many less known studio players who made that Everly album one of the bright spots of early '72.

Now, with an album title that's as much an imperative as a guide to its contents, Pass The Chicken And Listen, marks the return of Oon and Phil to the tutelage of Mr. Guitar — Chet Atkins. Chet produces an album for the ageless Everlys which is as mixed in genre as it is in blends of pure country with the sophistication that permeates the Nashville-Sound in this post-John Cash bonanza.

While Stories delved into a tougher kind of country rock, Chicken is marked by the type of John Prine tune included called "Paradise". It's a nice enough lilting folksy tale, but compared to the short flurry of excitement the boys generate on the old Crickets' better "Not Fade Away", it pales in comparison. Most fans of the Brothers will lament the absence of more material such as "Lay It Down" and "Not Fade Away", while others may feel that "Husbands and Wives", the old Roger Miller song, is decidedly treated in fine fashion, but if never really creates much of a challenge for the pair of voices which have influenced everyone from Peter and Gordon to Lennon & McCartney. Perish the thought that Oon and Phil will, like Elvis, seem satisfied with covering other performers' material, and forsake the energetic sessions that used to result in genuine rock classics.

Rick Nelson's "Garden Party" represented not only a reminder that festival and revival fans are sometimes the ficklest of admirers, but also that Nelson and his Stone Canyon Band had played themselves into one of the tightest groups to surround a steel guitar this side of Memphis. Since "You Belong To Me" from late '69 announced that Rick was not interred, a steady succession of excellent Oecca albums has flowed from Rick and his band at regular intervals. The latest is titled after the recent hit — Garden Party — and the ten songs included are not relegated strictly to the confines of the soft country-rock genre.

"I Wanna Be With You", penned by two of Rick's sidemen, is a lot closer to rock than "Garden Party", while "Are You Really Real", one of the half-dozen items from Rick's pen, is a softly-stated ballad which showcases the mature voice of Nelson — which has evolved from the wispy, slightly off-key, teenage murmurings of his fifties hits, "Be Bop Baby" and "Lonesome Town", into a viable vocal style equally adept on ballads like few years. Included are: "Mother and Child Reunion", "Brown-Eyed Girl", "Knock On Wood", "Crazy Mama" as well as a 1972-3 version of "Memphis". Though these tunes are all popular and topical, they don't really become part of Rivers' musical make-up in the way that Presley is able to transform "Proud Mary" and "Polk Salad Annie" into his own style.

This Johnny Rivers album may well become one of the pieces of nostalgia when Americans attempt to recall the hopeless fight of George McGovern against you know who. The final cut on the album is called "Use The Power", and one of its lines is the admonition to "Oig Nixon, Before He Oigs You".

The Grateful Oead Is Jerry Garcia's assembled multitude who made such a radical, but wholly justified transition from the feverish insanity of short-lived psychedelic rock into the comfortable confines of country-rock. A lot of Europeans had the opportunity to show appreciation of the Oead's blend of rock and duster-music, when the entourage toured Europe in 1972.

So you plan to spend the Summer in Europe this year. Great. Two things are mandatory. A ticket to Europe. And a Student-Railpass. The first gets you over there, the second gives you unlimited Second Class rail travel for two months for a modest $135 in Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Luxembourg, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, and Switzerland! All you need to qualify is to be a full-time student up to 25 years of age, registered at a North American school, college or university.

And the trains of Europe are a sensational way to travel. Over 100,000 miles of track links cities, towns and ports all over Europe. The trains are fast (some over 100 mph), frequent, modern, clean, convenient and very comfortable. They have to be. So you'll meet us on our trains. It really is the way to get to know Europeans in Europe.

But there's one catch. You must buy your Student-Railpass in North America before you go. They're not on sale in Europe because they are meant strictly for visitors to Europe—hence the incredibly low price. Of course if you're loaded you can buy a regular Eurailpass meant for visitors of all ages. It gives you First Class travel if that's what you want.

Either way if you're going to zip off to Europe, see a Travel Agent before you go, and in the meantime, rip off the coupon. It can't hurt and it'll get you a better time in Europe than you ever thought possible.

Rick has worked on the road with the Stone Canyon Band for going on five years now, and their evolution into a smooth-singing, gussy-playing back-up quartet is a big reason behind Rick's return to popularity.

That man of "Memphis"-fame, Johnny Rivers, has assembled a top-notch set of musicians for his release L.A. Reggae (United Artists), from which "Rockin' Pneumonia-Boogie Woogie Flu" has been culled. Rivers is nobody's fool — it would be difficult to employ such names as Jimmy Webb, Larry Knechtel, Jim Gordon, and Joe Osborne and ex-Crickets' drummer Jerry Allison for a session and come up with a dud album. The instrumentation on the Rivers album is no doubt outstanding, but the material, with the exception of "Rockin' Pneumonia", is mostly things that have been hits for their writers over the past

Now the highlights of that tour are captured on 3 bargain-priced discs complete with colour brochure depicting the Oead "live", plus the itinerary.

The record's quality is excellent, considering the varied acoustics the tour had to encounter, and the usual waves of boring applause are kept to a bare minimum. Most of the familiar Oead tunes are included — "Cumberland Blues", "Sugar Magnolia" and "Truckin'" — some of which are extended with long solo vehicles for Pigpen, Garcia, and friends to strut their stuff. There are seventeen songs in all — most of which average 6 or 7 minutes of music — a must for all Grateful Dead adherents, The Grateful Dead/Europe '72.

Consumer protection vs big-bad rock

In the hazy days of the late '60's, the good guys had long hair and smoked dope, while the bad guys, the young capitalists, wore horn-rimmed glasses, and pin-striped suits, got bombed and splashed you as they drove by in their Jags and 'Vettes.

Now the young capitalists have long hair, smoke dope, get bombed — and splash you as they drive by in their Jags and 'Vettes.

Nails have been hammered into the counterculture casket for some time. But the last spike was hit in a recruitment ad for Manufacturer's Life in last week's Varsity. That ad told us (in stream of consciousness form) that whoever we are, whatever we do, whatever our politics are, ManuLife can absorb us, can fit us in.

We don't care what you wear as long as you can sell insurance.

On all levels, the illusion of the counterculture is being smashed. Students who become Student Protestors are shot in the U.S., arrested in Canada; Nixon and Kissinger are Time's Men of the Year (remember when Youth was?); capitalism, the establishment, the system (whatever you want to call it) after a momentary hesitation, opens, swallows and absorbs.

In music, the exciting, raw often crude sounds of hard acid rock are replaced by the good-time music of big-bad rock.

Like Lighthouse. Lighthouse has a new album out, called Sunny Days. There's nothing wrong with the album — Lighthouse is a proficient group, good vocals, good instrumentation. It's sort of a let's-sit-in-the-back-yard-where-the-neighbours-can't-see-us-and-smoke-dope kind of record; in fact that's the theme of a lot of the lyrics. Listening to it, I got the impression of late 50's lyrics within the more complex musical structure of the late 60's. But the music, although sophisticated, still doesn't challenge us the way hard rock did.

Bob McBride's first album Butterfly Days, is a lot like Lighthouse's last. That's not surprising since McBride is the group's lead singer. The record is billed as McBride's big break — successful singer attempts to express himself personally, the Paul McCartney sort of thing.

McBride sings about butterflies and sunshine and his girlfriend — calm subjects, calm songs. Like the Lighthouse album, Butterflies is well put together, and McBride sounds good — just like he does on Sunny Days. But still...

One of the best songs appears on both albums. In Sunny, it's under the title "Merlin", in Butterflies it's called "Back in my time". "Merlin" hearkens back to wizards and Camelot, and comes across as the sincere yearning of a good-time big band for the real good-time past. When Tolkien published his hobbit series wizards were a symbol for a good place to go; now they're a symbol for a place to return to "In a world that's back in my time".

Fergus, the star of the album, Town of Fergus, was born in 1950. That gave me a twinge of humility when I read that on his promo. Here's a guy born the same year I was and who has actually created something, instead of simply writing snarky reviews.

For a moment I wondered what right have I, who have never cut a disc, to make any sort of judgement on someone who has. So I asked Varsity record mogul Allan Mandell why I should write a review, what the purpose of a review is.

To warn people who might buy records which ones are rip-offs, replied mogul Mandell.

Consumer protection. So, in my fortified role as the Ralph Naden of reviews, I can safely say Town of Fergus is made of top-quality vinyl, comes in a cardboard jacket (with no plastic or paper liner though) and produces sound when rotated at the speed of 100 revolutions for every three minutes.

It also contains some songs that are good enough to make the hit parade.

But then, the hit parade hasn't been great lately. Lighthouse, Sunny Days, GRT Bob McBride, Butterfly Days, Capitol

Perth concert warms

When you leave a Perth County Conspiracy concert you feel warm and relaxed. The music of the past two or three hours has been soft and delicate, about love and internal peace and living in the country. That's just what Friday's Conspiracy Concert at Convocation Hall was like.

But Perth County lacked the dynamism of one of its strongest members — Cedric Smith, who is

"into the music. We just like to play our music", as one of the lead singers put it. So they sing pleasant songs about love and peace and joke around and everyone has a good time.

Perth County Conspiracy has gone through many changes since they first started in 1969. Two of their former guitarists are out on their own, touring around Ontario. There is a new guitarist presently in P.E.I. with poet Milton Acorn doing poetry readings. Smith has historically been the only one in the Conspiracy who injected serious social comment and theatrical effects into the group's performance. He is also their finest vocalist and his absence, although perhaps unnoticed by those who haven't followed the Conspiracy, left their general presentation lacking solid meat.

It is no coincidence that Smith is with Acorn, who has been nicknamed the people's poet for his very human and left wing poetry. Smith generally sings about the same themes.

The rest of the Conspiracy is on acoustic, along with Richard Keelan, and the bass player who have always been with the Conspiracy. A more recent addition to the group is Judy, who plays flute and piano — although we missed most of it on Friday due to a faulty mike.

Cedric Smith isn't gone altogether. He will be joining the Conspiracy for their February tour which will take them through Ottawa, Montreal and on to Winnipeg.

I just hope their next performance in Toronto includes Smith, who lifts a concert beyond the realm of "nice".

Madman and Nun fails to fuse fantasy with drama

The Theatre du P'tit Bonheur is currently offering Le Fou et La Nonne (the Madman and the Nun), by Witkiewicz, the least interesting production they have presented this season. Perhaps this expressionistic piece would have disconcerted audiences in 1923, the year in which it was written, but the half-hearted mise-en-scene by John Ven Burek seems only to accentuate the play's most superficial and banal elements.

Mad poets, "corrupted" nuns and devilish psychoanalysts no longer titillate the imagination, (not that this should be the purpose of the characters). To be used effectively, they should be seen from a specific point of view. This production promises fantasy, with its bright, stylized setting, but brings us melodrama for the most part. The plot's fantastic conclusion does not render the play a fantasy, because what precedes it seems to be an attempt at realistic characterizations.

If this impression is not the one intended for the spectator, it only serves to illustrate the half-hearted nature of the production. It is reflected in the confusing mixture of acting styles. The poet (John Gilbert) comes across with romantic bravado that approaches but does not quite encompass the exaggerated stereotype. His early exchanges with the nun (Marie-Paule Brochant) suggest soap opera. Soeur Anne is represented with an attempt at realism, but a lack of profoundness or subtlety in the characterisation. Confusion sets in when these characters must interact with a caricature, that of psychoanalyst (Jean-Marc Amyot). Here, the actor has been permitted to exploit the comic and grotesque aspects of his role to the point that one is uncomfortably caught between a love story and a satire, each taking itself seriously. The supporting characters are neither realistic portrayals nor caricatures; sometimes they support the melodrama and sometimes the satire.

If these two threads of the production were not working against one another, there would be no reason to condemn the production. However, no point about the definition of insanity, the methods of psychoanalysis, or the attitudes of society is effectively made. If the work were approached in a unified style, with a view to utilising all its expressionistic and satiric possibilities in the characterisations, a more coherent piece of theatre would result. Included there should be a great improvement in the rhythm and pace of the performance, which now includes some inexcusably empty pauses.

Like other sufferers of "dementia praecox", this production juxtaposes some qualities which are not necessarily negative in themselves, but which work together toward the destruction of the whole

Updated Shakespeare play relies on gimmickry

Two Gentlemen of Verona is a light and frothy American musical which has aligned itself with Shakespeare. It entertains, stimulating eye and ear. The individual performances are beyond reproach. It exploits and invents theatrical gimmicks in the very latest vein. How does one approach the problem of being left, nevertheless, untouched by this polished, unified effort?

It might be a question of expectations. To go to see this musical with any intellectual pretensions concerning Shakespeare or anything else is a grave error. First of all, The Two Gentlemen of Verona is William Shakespeare at his least complex and least symbolic. Themes of love and friendship are part of a celebration of youth and life at its most fertile. Though its plot contains betrayal its basic statement does not contain cynicism.

In this sense, the musical is "faithful", being a huge celebration of youth, love and living together. Apart from this, Shakespeare's text is cheerfully manhandled or ignored, not only in the terms of the script, but (and it must be said) in terms of its delivery. Performers who are marvellously adept in the realm of American comedy strangle poetry and prose of the English Renaissance. Does it matter? Well, think of a sour note that keeps cropping up in the midst of a well-played march.

The musical was commissioned by the New York Shakespearean Festival for its 1971 season. This setting is important, since the collaborators John Guare, Mel Shapiro and Galt MacDermot claim to be using the play as a metaphor of The Big City, where so many ethnic and racial groups rub shoulders. This has determined the multi-racial casting which seems so important in the staging of the musical.

If its intention, then is to promote good will towards men through Shakespeare, it certainly makes its point without depth. Tinsel is the order of the day. The design includes a gorgeous array of flattering costumes, which, while flouncy, belong to no one period or style. It exploits multi-level staging quite cleverly. In addition, the audience submits to a series of stage gimmicks some conventional, some original, and some downright vulgar. (The dog, it must be said, appeared in the Shakespearian version.)

This is a variety show in the great American tradition, vehicle for a talented chorus and a group of principals who are gifted all-round performers. Jonelle Allen stands out as the most dynamic, doing a strange justice to Shakespeare's lines, "Who is Sylvia . . ." In her portrayal of the amorous "maiden". As anything other than light entertainment, it is out of the question. The over-generous doses of social criticism that emerge in certain characterisations and musical numbers are unfortunate. Since they revelled in clichés, so shall: the satire is about as subtle as a ton of bricks.

Perhaps Galt MacDermot is the most inspiring name connected with the production, since the musical score follows that of the now-classical Hair. This score is pleasant but it lacks the spark which would make it stand on its own the way the themes from Hair do so admirably. Its variety of rhythms accommodate the show's impressive choreography.

Certainly there are elements of wit, and an interesting use of choral voices. There are too many songs, though, and they seem to resemble one another too much.

Two Gentlemen of Verona is a fine, flamboyant show that has a many-faceted appeal. Yet despite its noblest intentions, it is a show without a heart, and that stops it from being a great musical. One can admire the production as one admires tinsel — without responding to it.

Fine drama about Upper Canada Rebellion avoids the usual documentary pitfalls Theatre Passe Muraille has assembled a fine cast for their current production, 1837, a documentary drama dealing with the Upper Canada Rebellion led by William Lyon Meckenzie.

Written by Rick Salutin for ensemble performance, the play is a series of vignettes dealing with the various aspects of the uprising and the lives of those people intimately affected by it. The cast, under the direction of Paul Thompson, displays a mastery of various performance techniques ranging from readers' theatre to mime. It is this flexibility that is the key to the production's success.

The play opens with the entire cast, in two groups, seated around tables reading newspaper excerpts concerning the rebellion and the circumstances that perpetuated it. Unfortunately, this proves to be a rather slow and listless beginning to an otherwise spirited and provocative evening of theatre.

The actors quickly find solid ground, however, when they move into a series of scenes depicting the growth of conflict between the Reformers and the Tories of the colony. These scenes, some of the strongest, in my opinion, are characterized by a most effective counter-balance of poignant realism and satire. It is here that the production has artfully avoided the greatest pitfall of documentary theatre — that of dreary and heavy-handed polemics. It is a refreshing change to see a company which has retained enough objectivity to take an occasional tongue-in-cheek jibe at their protagonists.

Special mention should be made of the excellent performance of Nell Vipond in the role of Mackenzie. Vipond displays a finely honed sense of characterization in his portrayal, never losing sight of Mackenzie, the man, beneath the eloquent rhetoric of Mackenzie, the public figure. He conveys all the charismatic strength of the character, while never permitting himself to overpower his fellow actors.

On occasion the show drags a little, mainly due to the script itself. This emerges in scenes involving the introduction of each member of the Family Compact in a seemingly endless procession, and an equally prolonged procession of condemned rebels toward the end of the play. While these two scenes are, in essence, quite interesting, they have unfortunately been milked to the point of tedium. These few weaknesses, however, are far outweighed by the spontaneity and imagination of the production, which achieves a high level of invigorating creativity.

What makes us walk away satisfied from a moving experience in the theatre? What ingredients define our gratification? Somehow, Siobhan McKenna's Irish world is movingly real, simple and human. In Here are Ladies she fills the empty stage with her musical voice, commanding us to see people and settings. Her gestures leave you spellbound. Be it Yeats, O'Casey, Beckett or Joyce, you share her moods — happy or sad, sober or sensual. Perhaps it is basic purity plus supreme skill that lifts the Irish Arts Theatre into the realm of genuine experience. These are rare qualities not to be missed. Four more productions are in store at West Park School, Bloor and Dundas. On Tuesday, January 30, Miss McKenna will take the title role in the premiere of Juno and the Paycock. - H.W. Coleman.

Tuesday past saw the opening night of A Touch of the Poet at the St. Lawrence Centre. It is one of Eugene O'Neill's autobiographical works, as is A Long Day's Journey Into Night. More commentary next week. It plays through February.

For those of you who haven't caught the performance of Strawberry Fields now playing at the Factory Lab, you are in for quite a heavy night. Violence, homosexuality, dope freaks... the rest you have to see for yourself. The audience is seated on all sides to ensure you get the full benefit.

It concerns the lives of three people — two so-called trineds and one stranger. Taking place on a field in the span of a day during a rock festival, it portrays quite authentically how the two accept the stranger (and is he stranger). It's gripping and at times funny. By no means will you be bored. Helen Cooperstein

U.C. Playhouse is featuring noon-hour theatre next Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday between one and two. Something called Orizon.

Next week there is a new rash of openings. Until then you have 1837 at the Theatre Passe Muraille Two Gentlemen of Verona at the O'Keefe Centre, La Fou et La Nonne at the Theatre du P'tit Bonheur, (see reviews for those three), the Mendrake at the Colonnade Theatre, and Toronto Free Theatre's long-running Hedda Gabler. And — lest we forget — Hemlel at the Hart House Theatre.

pop

John McLaughlin and his Mahavishnu Orchestra, composed of Billy Cobham on drums, Jan Hammer on piano, Jerry Goodman on violin and Rick Laird on bass, will be in concert at Convocation Hall tonight at 8 pm.

McLaughlin is one of those guitarists who's been kicking around jazz circles for a number of years. Only recently has word of his impressive guitar virtuosity filtered down to the rock world (on an underground level). His style is based on craftsmanship and sensitivity, ranging from flighty intriguing electric jazz riffs through pure rock avenues and on to a soft spiritual acoustic fingerings. Some of the music employs the discordant element of progressive jazz that rock fans find hard to accept. But as one of the most technically proficient guitarists, McLaughlin should not be missed. Try SAC for student tickets at $4 — no reserved seats.

It's been quite a few years since Ian &

Sylvie were a vital force in folk music in Toronto. As times changed so did the Tyson & Fricker duo, — they added country rock instruments and left the coffeehouse in favour of the TV studio. But with his TV show, Tyson was able to bring some great folk performers to Toronto. On Sunday night Ian & Sylvie will make one of their rare live appearances in the city at Massey Hall, with the Great Speckled Bird. The tickets are priced from $3.50 to $5.50.

Murray McLaughlin is in concert tomorrow night at Scarborough College as part of the Winter Carnival. Tickets at $3 and information are available from SAC.

Jane Voss is at Fiddler's Green Coffeehouse near Eglinton East of Yonge (behind the Y — call 489-3001) tonight. Grit appears on Tuesday. Admission is still only $1.

Sunday night there will be a Thog music and food benefit at Bathurst United Church (one block south of Bloor). Very fine local talent is usually featured.

The concert season is beginning and should peak near the end of next month. The following list should help you juggle your timetable:

Americe, Monday February 2, Massey Hall ($3.50 - 6.50)

Wer and Tower of Power, Thursday February 8, Massey Hall ($3.50 - 6.00)

Melenle, Monday February 12, Massey Hall

John Prine, Thursday February 15, Massey Hall ($3 - 5)

Ann Murray, Sunday February 18, Massey Hall ($3.50 - 6.00)

Santana and Bobby Womack, Tuesday February 20, Maple Leaf Gardens ($4.40 - 6.60)

Gordon Lightfoot, Wednesday-Sunday March 21-25, Massey Hall ($3.50 - 6.00)

B. B. King, Monday April 2, Massey Hall

Incredible Stringband, Monday April 23, Massey Hall ($3.50 - 5.50)

Kris Kristofferson and Rilla Coolidge, Sunday May 6, Massey Hall

Ian and Sylvie are making a live appearance

The Riverboat stage has taken on the appearance of a jet cockpit this week for John Mille-Cockett. Cockett who left Syrinx last July is accompanying himself on synthesizer, organ, piano and pianette, and mixing some old Syrinx tunes with newer material. The thin watery vocals are a new but not very welcome addition to John's music. Some good sized speakers have been added and the sound was superb on Tuesday night. The trippy electronic sounds of Cockett will continue to Sunday. Starting on Tuesday is John Alan Cameron, a Maritime folksinger and tiddle player. Within weeks of the closing of Grumbles Coffeehouse, there is doubt whether Stanley Steamer will continue operations much beyond this weekend. It's a very worthy place in the basement of Neill-Wyck College, on Gerrard east of Church. (It's the tall, red-brick residence, in case you haven't been there before). Tonight, the String Band; tomorrow the rock group called Allier. The Steamer opens at 9:00 pm, admission $1.

Music returns to Etherea in Rochdale (341 Bloor Street West) with Micheal end Terry (of Perth County Conspiracy) tonight and tomorrow at 10 pm. Admission is $1.50.

art

If you finish your lunch early or you don't have a class for an hour or so and you know you have to study but you don't feel like it, yet you know if you don't you'll feel guilty, compromise and saunter down Prince Arthur dropping in on the three galleries between Avenue and St. George. I say compromise because it won't be half as tedious as studying yet you should be able to convince yourself that by visiting art galleries you are doing something like academics. Going east from St. George, the first gallery is the Dunkelman. Starting tomorrow an exhibit of well-hangings (that's the only word I can think of now) of Mie West begins. They are huge projections of a curious indifferent tan and there is also a huge sprawling rug-like ensemble — well, it's there and explains itself. Hopefully. Then on to the Albert White Gallery which is exhibiting some modern primitivists such as Marino, Ozende and Legeese. I'm tempted to call the Umbrian Marino's works simplistic, but then that's what they said about Rousseau's first jungle painting. Anyway, it gives one a chance, as usual, to enjoy (while half trying not to since you know that's not the attraction), the gallery's slew of modern drawings and sculpture. A couple of houses down is the Morris Gallery at which is a Robert Hedrick exhibit. If you saw and liked Ronald Bloore's white paintings at Hart House last year, you'll probably like Hedrick's, even though their painterly dictions are somewhat different. Evanescent stripes are barely perceptible in parallel form in each picture, and here is another successful collection of which each painting, comments on, modifies your impression of the others.

music

Three presentations of Verdi's Falstaff by the U of T Opera Department remain: January 26 (tonight), 27 and 29, at 8 pm. If you're still looking for tickets, try Monday. Tonight at 7 pm the Early Music Group and the Pocoli Ludique Societas of U of T plans to re-enact the Coronation of Henry V at Trinity College Chapel at 8 pm. A repeat performance will take place Saturday evening. The Coronation ceremonies are to be followed by a Mass for the King. No admission charge, no tickets required. The Toronto Dance Theatre is having a piano recital on Sunday, January 28, at 8:30 pm. Who knows who the pianist is, but the works are by Bach, Haydn, Chopin, Ann Southan, Ravell, Copeland and Rachmaninoff.

movies

Fair warning: this may be the last week to catch, no, not London Iliu but Eric Rohmer's sixth and last moral tale Chloe In the Afternoon, at CineCity.

The Roxy this week has some good films, starting tonight with Tony Richardson's version of Hamlet, with what is supposed to be an astounding portrayal of the unhappy prince of Denmark by the volcanic Nichol Williamson. Monday night Antonioni's masterpiece L'Avventura, a film released in 1960 that made almost the splash on filmmaking that Citizen Kane did in 1941. It's not as likeable as Kana, which is no reason not to go see it. Francois Truffaut's The Wild Child is playing Tuesday and Wednesday with The Whispers.

Marcel Ophuls' very great documentary The Sorrow and the Pity will be playing Tuesday and Wednesday at the Ontario Science Centre. We've mentioned this one before, and will certainly do so again.

Tonight and tomorrow at St. Mike's Robert Altman's M.A.S.H. will be shown. Need we say more?

All this week at the Avenue Cinema you can see Rohmer's fifth (and penultimate) moral tale, Claire's Knee, along with Truffaut's Bed and Board. Two very civilized comedies, so bring a thermos of black coffee, very strong.

poetry

A series of five "alternative poetry" workshops is being presented at Holy Trinity Church, beginning on Tuesday January 30 at 8 p.m. The workshops (sponsored by LINK — a group of Canadian poets) hope to feature Milton Acorn and Doug Featherling in open access discussions.

The first workshop, on Tuesday, will deal with "Poetry — In Search of Definition".

Holy Trinity Church is two blocks south of Dundas, west of Yonge. For information, call 362-4521.

Yonge Street's future perused by meeting

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

"If a little old lady wants to see a dirty movie, she has a right to."

This is a comment that Michael Hertzman of United Clothing, a store on Yonge Street, made at a meeting of 35 people at Holy Trinity Church Wednesday night.

The topic under discussion was "The Future of Yonge Street" but most of the talk revolved around pornography and morality.

In commenting on the nude and semi-nude pictures which are often displayed as come-ons for the massage parlours and blue movies, Major George Clarke of the Salvation Army's Albert Street Temple was aghast.

"If the Lord walked along Yonge Street he would be shocked to see sexual acts displayed so openly," he said.

Peter Kellner, a Toronto resident, said he likes Yonge Street the way it is. He didn't feel the sex shops had made him "perverse or weird".

However, Peter Clark, of Clark's Shoes, said Yonge Street needs to be cleaned up. People should be able to use the street without being hassled by panhandlers, unlicensed vendors and handbill distributors, he said.

"People are panhandling because welfare is not adequate," replied Eilert Ferichs, United Church chaplain at Hart House and secretary of the Confederation of Resident and Ratepayer Associations.

An architect said he didn't want to see Yonge Street turn into "one long room", referring to the Eaton Fairview development, planned to stretch from Dundas to Queen Street.

Ferichs also favours low-rise development and the renovation of old buildings to the construction of high-rises.

Yonge Street is made lively and colourful by the leather-work and candle merchants who peddle their wares right on the sidewalk, in Ferich's view.

Sam Sniderman, of Sam the Record Man, wants to get rid of the street people.

"We must remove the street people and have a well-ordered, well-policed street for happy normal people. There is no freedom without order," he said.

Spotlight on Honest Ed Mirvish

By DON MOWAT

"I try to do things as simply as possible," said department store king Ed Mirvish yesterday afternoon. Mirvish, owner of Honest

Ed's department store, the Royal Alexandra Theatre and the Ed's Warehouse restaurant, spoke at the weekly Thursday Noon on the Square meeting, held in Holy Trinity Church.

Referring to the business world, Mirvish warned: "There's no doubt it's a jungle; it's very competitive."

He attributes some of his business success to the fact that he tries to be close to the people he works with. "For me, it's a way of life that I enjoy, perhaps because I was born into it."

From his contact with the theatre industry, Mirvish noted that there is "a great shortage of product," and that "this is becoming more and more acute with each passing year." Mirvish termed live theatre "a feast or famine business."

On the subject of his competitor, the O'Keefe Centre, he noted that "government theatre is unsuccessful everywhere on this continent." (O'Keefe is owned — and subsidized — by Metro Toronto.)

Mirvish, who substantially renovated the Royal Alexandra, urged Toronto to preserve its old buildings, "or we'll be living in a city that looks like a hospital." Referring to the old Holy Trinity Church he stated, "There's warmth here that we don't get from a skyscraper."

He revealed plans for a new restaurant to be called "Old Ed's", which will offer full-course meals for two dollars. All of the waiters are to be over 60 years of age.

Podnick promotes paper publicly

A debate slated for yesterday on whether The Varsity should cease publication was called off Wednesday, when opposition to the paper's existence bowed out.

Heartened by the apparently unanimous support for the paper, Varsity staff members have agreed to continue publishing.

"Probably no one could be found who opposes The Varsity's rigorous and devastating attacks on hypocrisy, injustice and bad guys," said Robert Bettson, a former member of the prestigious Hart House debates committee, which organized the abortive match.

"I'm really encouraged by the way students have demonstrated their support for the paper," said Varsity editor Alex Podnick last night.

"Once again this shows that direct action always wins," smiled Podnick. "The direct inaction Varsity opponents showed when they refused to debate, is simply the flip side of direct action."

"It's all dialectical," Podnick said dialectically.

The cancellation caught Varsity supporters off balance. Pro-Varsity debaters had amassed a mass of statistical evidence to prove that the newspaper actively benefits the continuation of our free-enterprise economy.

Capitalism is only kept alive by military spending and conspicuous consumption induced by advertising, according to noted economist Paul Sweezy.

And The Varsity, by advertising luxury items such as beer, jobs and SAC, does its bit to keep this artificial demand up.

"Chee," said Podnick. "I didn't know we were so important. It's nice to be part of something so big."

Hockey Blues outplay Waterloo, 7-3

By PETER DUX

Varsity Blues skated to their 10th league victory Wednesday night handing Waterloo Warriors a 7-3 defeat. The score was not indicative of the play, with Toronto having to rely heavily on goalie Bruce Durno to keep Varsity in the game.

The second period saw Blues come from a 1-0 deficit with four unanswered goals to decide the game's outcome. Neil Korzach began the scoring at the 3:45 mark with a slap shot, using Kent Ruhnke as a decoy on a two on one rush.

At 6:17 McFarlane took the puck from Durno (who was awarded an assist on the play) rushed up the ice, and passed to Herridge on the lip of the crease for the go-ahead goal.

A combination of good checking and skating by Blues, and a dazed Jake Dupuis from a Munro shot which caught him on the facemask, allowed Toronto to dominate this period.

In contrast, the initial frame saw Warriors check the Blues in their own end and, despite Varsity outshooting Waterloo, Warriors were the team in control. Everything was going wrong for Toronto — passes didn't click, no one was skating and shots were hitting the cross bar. If not for Durno's valiant efforts Blues would have been further behind going into the second period.

The third period saw Waterloo slow down, allowing Toronto to skate around Warriors' net unharmed. Frustrated by then, Bob Munro scored on a breakaway Wednesday night to make the score 6-2 for Toronto.

Warrior's style precipitated two outbreaks of shoving which officials kept under control.

Blues Notes... Warrior's forgot their jerseys Wednesday and had to play in Varsity's old sweaters. Anyone coming in late was no doubt confused by Blues being in white and Waterloo in blue?... this was the third meeting of the season between these two clubs with Toronto winning all three games... Buffalo scouts were at the game... Blues play Carlton tonight at 8 pm at Varsity Arena.

SGS loses two in interfaculty basketball

Composed of diverse players from varied backgrounds, School of Graduate Studies found its playoff hopes, albeit temporarily, thwarted as it dropped two games in interfaculty basketball this week. SGS losses to PHE A (78-67) and Meds (78-45) kept the team in a tie with PHE B in the fourth and final playoff spot in Division I B.

SGS stayed close all the way until the final moments when PHE pulled away. PHE's Eric Quackenbush, coming off a one year layoff, proved too much for the slower SGS forwards, scoring 30 points. Assisting Eric was Ron Pugi (he of the blue dress shoes) with 12 points. SGS was led by Jimmy Maroosis (23 points) and Ron Podesta (14).

The Meds game, however, was a different story, SGS was never in the game. Tom Barker (18 points) and Ron Sternberg (13) were the leading scorers for Meds (perhaps the best team in interfac ball now that St. Mike's has lost the services of its fine centre, John Henninger, via a freak accident).

Steve Silberlund with 16 points and Jimmy Maroosis with 12 points were SGS' leading point getters.

SGS' appearance in the first division this season is the brainchild of Maroosis, a former Brooklyn playgrounder, who felt there was enough talent in the graduate school to pose a serious threat to other teams in the first division. Although SGS seems to possess talent, the team has suffered from a severe lack of discipline and organization.

Hence, they have not realized their potential and are struggling to make the playoffs as a result.

Victoria College gained sole possession of first place in Division I B by defeating Sr. Engineering 64-56 yesterday, and, in the process, dropped the engineers to third place behind Vic and Erindale (a 107-53 winner over the PHE B Wednesday night).

Down 29-28 at halftime, Vic stormed out to reel off 10 straight points at the beginning of the second half to take charge of the game. Vic's zone press took its toll of the engineers as Vic employed to maintain an 8-12 point lead throughout the second half.

Steve Mills, wearing borrowed gym shorts, scored 14 points for Vic with Gord Wicher and Dave John adding 13 and 11, respectively. Uri Siksa hooped 12 points for Sr. Eng.

The Bid:

3 S! pass pass pass

This hand actually happened recently in a common room bridge game. The bidding was fairly standard for common room bridge, the chief feature being an overall based on a four-card suit.

West found the perfect opening lead of the king of diamonds, followed by the ten. This was overtaken by the jack, and then ace of diamonds, on which West threw the jack of hearts.

East now switched to the two of clubs, on which South made his only real mistake of the hand by ducking.

West rose with the king, and played another club, which East ruffed. East cashed the ace of hearts, upon which West completed his high-low "echo" with the nine. A heart was ruffed, followed by a club ruff. The remaining cards were:

S Q92	S J
S K7	H 65
C 975	S A863
	H 8
	H Q10
	D 62

East cashed the queen of hearts, and then played the ten. South ruffed low and West over-ruffed.

A club was ruffed by the nine in dummy, jack by East and six by South. A further diamond lead ensured that West would score his now singleton king of spades, and at last South got his only trick with the ace of spades.

The defense had done their best, but couldn't prevent the ace of trump from taking a trick!

Hoch unmasks spectator sports as escapist

Rip Off the Big Game:
The Exploitation of Sports by the Power Elite
by Paul Hoch
Doubleday and Company, Inc. (Anchor Books)
Garden City, New York
$2.15

Last March, fourteen hours before Metro police evicted students from the Senate Chamber, acting president John Sword joined about 5,000 other hockey nuts in Varsity Arena to watch 34 students commit legal mayhem on each other in a traditional pastime known as ice hockey.

Before 5,000 "fans", York and Toronto "fought it out" for the OUA championship. The 5,000 largely ignored the university's policy of unequal access in favour of the diversion at the arena. One can only speculate as to what effect an additional 5,000 people sitting in at Simcoe Hall might have had on changing the library policy.

Nevertheless, at a time of crisis affecting everyone within the university community — virtually everyone has to use the library at some point during university years — the modern-day "gladiators" (read "hockey players") were providing a needed — by the university administration — escape.

At university, you are apparently supposed to feel immune to societal pressures so that you can get a degree, have a good time, and leave, ready-made to be meshed into the societal grid. Sometimes the university's socialization process fails. It failed with Paul Hoch.

Hoch, author of Rip Off the Big Game: The Exploitation of Sports by the Power Elite analyzes the "world of sport" in relation to the North American society in which it exists. Presently at Oberlin College, Ohio, Hoch lectures on the political sociology of sport in the Department of Physical Education.

Although the subject of sports as a "drug" appears at several points throughout the book, Hoch has devoted a full chapter to the broader implications of the escapism of the sport-entertainment industry. He views sport as directly linked with the preservation of the status quo, as a static force linked to an unprogressive, unchanging society.

Spectator sport is one area of the established liberal democratic "smoker-screen" used to prevent people from believing that there is anything seriously wrong with their society. Sport has become an object to be manipulated for the good of the few (the money-makers) at the expense of the many. As Hoch says, "It is much easier to think about the 'long bomb' that scored the winning touchdown than the one that killed fifty Vietnamese peasants". Or, even the napalm produced in Canada by Canadians working for American branch-plants that was used to kill in Vietnam.

Sports spectacles tend to frustrate the solution of pressing social problems by providing individuals with a temporary escape, but the games do nothing to deal with these problems — per se. Sports "shows" also provide the individual with "a distorted frame of reference or identification which encourages them to look for solutions through patently false channels", according to Hoch. That is, spectators are so swept up in the emotion of the sports event that they tend to lose awareness of what is happening to them, instead identifying "with the values and personalities being communicated from the field". In this way, a person is dragged out of attacking the status quo (with the goal of improving it) and into accepting society for what it is.

However, Hoch emphasizes that there is no "planned conspiracy" as such in the sense of "a directorate of political functionaries" deciding how to brainwash the public. But, it exists in the sense that most team sports we play developed historically in the elite private schools of those who control our society, and therefore, as a consequence, reflect the values of that elite.

There is the danger that Hoch's book may turn the reader off because of the academic manner in which he analyzes sport. However, the analysis is backed up with fact, and, as Hoch said in a conversation last week, "I'd already gone through the jock thing." In a Toronto radio interview, he added that he played football in high school, and basketball and track in graduate school. So, he is not anti-athletic.

In the introduction to Rip Off by Oberlin athletic director Jack Scott, the warning is given that in the past "attacks on sports by critics outside the sports world only served to heighten group solidarity among sportsmen". Scott says, "This book is neither an attack on sports nor on America. It is, in fact, a defense of both, against their perversion by forces less interested in sport than in their own continued wealth and power.

Part of Hoch's sport philosophy is that "there is a clearly a certain artistry in a well-played game of ball, in the smoothness with which the players move around the field, and the deftness with which they execute their moves. Moreover, they are likely to derive important physical and psychological benefits from the game, provided that the external incentives toward intense competition are not such that they completely swamp out the enjoyments of the game itself."

After clarifying where he stands with relation to the concept of sport, Hoch moves on to a detailed exploration of the relations between sports and the developing capitalist society in which they operate, the ways in which both players and fans are socialized for production and consumption, for their roles on the assembly line and, generally, to be docile citizens of a materialistic, racist, and male-dominated society.

Hoch's method of analysis of "sports" is historical materialist in nature, delving into the political economy of the "sports world". He justifies the method, saying that to discover how the character of sports is shaped and influenced by its social system and how, in turn, these sports influence the development of the system and the people living under it, one must employ a method which brings political economy into the open.

From this launching point, Hoch believes, "We can, then, see how different sports, the sports industry, and the ideology of sports, arose as a consequence of the developing material conditions of capitalist society, and how the sports industry functioned to facilitate the smoothness of authoritarian capitalist class relations generally; how it helped socialize workers for their coglike roles on the assembly lines; how it built upon a symbiotic relationship with the developing mass media industry; how sports and the media helped socialize workers to think of themselves mainly as passive consumers; how sports spread the poisons of competitiveness, elitism, sexism, nationalism, militarism, and racism — all of which have kept the international working class divided against itself; and, finally, how there has developed within the sports world a movement of athletes to build a more human society."

Rip Off the Big Game differs radically from other academic works in its approach to the subject. Up to this time, the authors of sports books have studied the place of sport in society and how well sport serves to the existing social system when confronted with its "functional problems of adaptation, attaining collective goals (imposed from the top of the social structure), assuring continuity of beliefs and orientations, training, integrating, and coordinating". Hoch's book breaks with academic tradition in criticizing and challenging the established views of and its relation to society.

Hoch traces the manipulation of the sporting ethic from the time of the rise of monopoly capitalism (about 1870 in the United States and probably after World War I in Canada). Furthermore, it should be obvious to most people at university that "the character of what passes for 'play' is decisively shaped by the social system in which it occurs; and so, too, are both the 'players' and the 'non-players'".

"We may well wonder," Hoch adds, "whether the production of sports spectacles... has all that much in common with the play of primitive peoples, or whether it is, in fact, something qualitatively different, something more readily understandable in the language of money and profit than in the myths of good, clean — workers' control, that is, not government control — and there would be no distinction between players and fans. Hoch believes, "Nearly everyone would become a player, and we would have a drastic reorientation from spectator to participation sports (and centring on the kinds of sports that both men and women could take part in together.)"

One can only begin to scratch the surface of Hoch's research in a review. Nevertheless, it is a complete, soundly-based analysis of sport and its relationship to our society. Hoch has used numerous Canadian examples which show that Canadian society has its similarities with its counterpart in the United States. And, moving from the provincial to national level, Hoch even looks at the purpose and function of today's Olympic games.

The concluding chapter of the book knits together the threads of emotionalism that one finds hard to ignore while reading the book, and also attempts to make a political point. Hoch believes that society is polarizing and the choice lies between socialism or facism. One wonders whether this is true of the early 1970's. The sixties fun and games."

Rip Off analyzes in some detail the "socialization" of the player for "production", and the socialization of the spectator for consumption of the sports spectacles and products, for, as everyone knows, sport has become big business." The players must, above all, have a "positive attitude", not be "trouble makers" by questioning or criticizing the coach. One must win, and, never mind that one's performance and individual satisfaction may have tremendously improved over the previous game, you still lost, and that's all that counts. However, — and it must be emphasized — Hoch says that "to give coaches their due it must be admitted that there is a distinctly right-wing flare in many a football fan's eye."

Hoch makes some reference to American university intercollegiate sports. Although the pressures in Canada have not reached the stage they are at south of the border, it would be advisable to read his words. "The money now spent," he says, "on varsity teams and intercollegiate sports... could be spent on intramural sports aimed at making everyone a player. If everyone was out playing they would have much less time to be fans. And if they had fulfilling, creative jobs, they wouldn't need to look for the pseudo-satisfaction of being fans."

Ideally, in a socialist society, players would have control over their own teams were, granted, a time of intense polarization and confrontation, but this later brought a large right-wing reaction. Change is now being attempted within "the system" much more than during the previous decade. Hoch is an optimist in believing that polarization is coming about. He is not as caught up in the student politics of the 1960's however, as his statement might indicate. For example, he admitted in a Toronto radio interview last week that "the time for screaming in the streets was over about three years ago". Rip Off the Big Game should not be interpreted as an attempt "to get people into the streets."

In the final analysis, Hoch realizes that the oppressed groups in society all have the one thing in common — their oppression — and that divisiveness can only harm the struggle for a better, more human life. Sport is seen as only one interacting component of a broad society. He says, "There is, of course, no such thing as jock liberation, apart from the more general cultural revolution in society as a whole, apart from black liberation, women's liberation, the student's and worker's control movements. The cultural revolution in sports is nothing more nor less than the reflection of these larger movements in society as a whole. It can be no more successful than their combined effectiveness."

Women should reject parties, says feminist

"We must look on politics in terms of power relationships not in terms of parties. All the present parties are male dominated" said feminist Alene Gregory Saturday. "I have never worked in a party and I won't do anything myself for any party."

Gregory was speaking to an all women seminar on women in politics at the Ontario Conference on Women at Victoria College. She charged that an economic revolution is not enough. "The women in the USSR, Cuba and China are oppressed. The socialist revolution alone is not enough. There must be a feminist revolution which will make a person's genitalia irrelevant to his or her role in society."

Gregory, who was an independent feminist candidate in the 1972 federal election in Rosedale, was on a panel with Fiona Nelson, vice-chairman of the Toronto Board of Education and Kay Macpherson, Women for Political Action candidate in St. Paul's in the last election.

Nelson, who has run for the NDP provincially, disagreed with Gregory. "You can achieve something inside the system," she insisted. The Toronto board has passed all four of my committee's recommendations.

"Now Toronto has day care for all its employees, part time work is emphasized, there is pairing of teachers to allow women to take care of domestic obligations and men will benefit."

She added that women must fight to achieve change despite "male chauvinist pigs like my partner (Bill Charlton) in Ward 5 who beat a woman by 28 votes and last year continually used his position as chairman of the board to snipe at my committee."

Gregory agreed that women should struggle for more power in decision-making, but she said "we are only now at the level of participation of twenty years ago. We have a right and an obligation to participate."

Macpherson maintained that it was best for females to work within the system for women's rights. When interviewed later by The Varsity she said that it was important for men to work with women for their own liberation. She disliked the tendency some liberationists have in leaving men out of their solutions. Any advances in women's rights she added, have come from pressure. "I doubt if the five women elected in parliament can adequately represent the women in Canada."

Several women from the seminar disagreed with all the speakers. They said the feminist revolution must be preceded by a socialist revolution or it won't mean anything. This seemed to become a refrain of questioners.

The speakers, especially Gregory criticized this approach. She charged "Marxist analysis is conceived by a man. It does not apply to women. Executives' wives are oppressed too. It is good but within its limits."

Gregory believes that it's the society that is the cause of women's oppression and the society is male dominated. "For that reason, I am a man-hater," she said.

"I have to hate men because they are a pretty bad bunch," she continued. Some women claim that their husbands are liberated but these same men oppress women away from the marriage relationship she explained.

Gregory is not interested in transforming women into oppressors but advocates eliminating the differences between the sexes through feminist revolution. "The point of being male or female is immaterial," she said.

The image of woman needs to be changed and Gregory believes that a slogan that men object to is one way of commencing the change. She recommends, "Woman is Strong".

"Men are never going to be our allies".

Service employees will demonstrate today

A demonstration by fellow workers to support 11 laid off U of T groundsmen will take place at noon today outside the U of T personnel office at 215 Huron Street.

A meeting of about 75 members of the U of T Service Employees' International Union Saturday voted unanimously in favour of the demonstration after learning that the university had not yet agreed to rehire the men and lay off 11 in reverse order of seniority across the university.

Student support, while not being solicited, will be welcome.

A hearing Friday by U of T labour relations manager John Parker of the union's grievance was to be continued today. SEIU Local 204 business agent Don Barclay said yesterday that if the matter is not resolved to the union's satisfaction today, the union will hold a bigger demonstration tomorrow at Simcoe Hall and may consider pulling workers off their jobs.

"It's just too serious a matter to let the university procrastinate on it," Barclay said.

The union had made its case Friday that the men, who were temporarily laid off because there was no snow for them to shovel, should not have been laid off solely from the grounds department. Rather the 11 workers across the university who had worked the least amount of time (as the union claimed was provided for in the contract), should have been laid off.

The university maintains that the university-wide seniority clause in the contract does not apply to temporary layoffs.

The university agreed with the union that a posted notice of the layoff with the minimum five days' notice was insufficient. Accordingly, the workers are not scheduled to be laid off until the end of tomorrow, five working days after individual letters were sent out.

Although Parker will legally have until next Monday to make his decision known, Barclay says the union will keep pressing for an early decision because the layoffs are to take effect tomorrow.

He called it a "precedent-setting case" on whether U of T will honour the contract, which was negotiated last fall.

Even if the university agrees to rehire the workers and makes no layoffs, Barclay will not be satisfied until it admits it has acted incorrectly. He cited arbitrated precedents, the contract, and dialogue during its negotiation as his part of the case against the university's action.

Although lack of snow was cited by the university as the cause for the layoffs, Barclay reported that the union also made a case to Parker that there was a sufficient amount of work to be done that to keep on many of the employees.

One of the suggestions was that much of the work involved in pruning trees, which is contracted out, could be done by the university's grounds crew.

Fees strike meeting tomorrow at noon; SAC decides later

Tomorrow's students general meeting to discuss the fees strike, will start at noon in the Medical Sciences auditorium.

The meeting will bring viewpoints on the fees strike from SAC, the Ontario Federation of Students and students from other universities into focus, and is expected to have a large influence on SAC's decision on whether to continue the strike.

SAC will be meeting in the Meeting Place at Scarborough College at 7 pm, under the threat of further disruptions. Although in past SAC has arranged for a bus to take representatives and interested students to SAC meetings at the suburban colleges, SAC vice-president John Helliwell said yesterday there would be no bus tomorrow.

The general meeting will feature SAC president Eric Miglin and OFS general coordinator Craig Heron, said Helliwell. There will also probably be students from Brock and York Universities, where students have recently occupied administration buildings in support of demands related to cutbacks in education spending, and from Trent, which faces a massive budget deficit.

SAC's threat to take out an injunction against disruptions at tomorrow's meeting has apparently abated.

The executive failed to muster a quorum at its planned meeting yesterday, and thus an earlier suggestion to take out an injunction was not raised.

Helliwell said last night that it was "unlikely" that the executive would move to prevent further disruptions, which stopped the last two SAC meetings from effectively covering a significant amount of their agendas.

At each meeting, members of the Canadian Liberation Movement-dominated Stop the Student Surcharge Committee heckled and physically disrupted deliberations.

Education commissioner George Strathy, who had been looking into the possibility of obtaining an injunction, said last night he is considering moving a motion at tomorrow's meeting to continue the fees strike by encouraging students either to put their second term fees money in a trust fund or to withhold it individually.

Asked what trust fund was meant by the resolution, he replied,

"presumably the CLM-SSSC trust fund."

He explained that he wanted to "put an end to the conflict between SAC and CLM", as there has been too much debate on tactics.

SSSC chairman Peter Havers says in a letter in today's Varsity that such a motion would be acceptable to the committee.

Strathy admitted he was not even convinced that the fees strike should continue, because he had always maintained it was an ineffective tactic.

Emphasis should be shifted to future changes in educational financing, such as the report on post-secondary education, he said.

However, he said he would wait until the general meeting to assess student reaction.

Evangelist defends Christ

By VALERIE TATE

Evangelist Leighton Ford defended his claim that Jesus Christ is the son of God in three lectures at Convocation Hall last week.

Sponsored by about 15 campus religious groups, the brother-in-law of Billy Graham drew 750 to 800 people, many of them non-Christians according to organizer Bill Scadding, to his lectures on the theme "Jesus on Trial".

According to Ford, each generation tries anew the claims of Jesus Christ. The purpose of his lectures was to present clearly and concisely these claims, the evidence for and against, and to reach a verdict about him.

The first lecture asked the question, "Who is Jesus Christ?" Ford says that the real Christ has been buried under centuries of ethnic characterization. Thus, there was Christ, the revolutionary; Christ, the establishment freak; black Christ; WASP Christ, and countless others.

Ford denies these pictures of Christ, saying that Jesus is the "Truth", the "image of the invisible God" come to earth so that man might comprehend God.

Although Jesus was a Jew, he is a "God for all nations", for his teachings and his influence are universal, Ford added.

The second lecture dealt with the evidence to support these claims. He began with the historical records of Christ's existence and ministry, and went on to discuss the reliability of the Biblical texts. Then he considered the claims that Christ was either a fraud or a lunatic and found them inconsistent with his life and influence.

Further proof, says Ford, may be found in the personal and, thus, social influence that Christ possesses. He cited many cases of the transformation in people who came to believe in God, and of the influence that these Christians have in the community in the way of social reform and public service.

While Ford admits that many atrocities have been committed in Christ's name, he says that they were perpetrated by those who had no personal relationship with the true God.

Ford didn't expect immediate conversion. He asked his audience only to believe as much as it could at the beginning, even if it was only that Jesus was just a good man and teacher. However, he feels that further investigation into the life and teachings of this man will undoubtedly draw one into full belief that Jesus is the true God.

"Faith is not belief without evidence, but commitment without reservations", he says.

Build upon fees withholding momentum

Step up the struggle against the cutbacks

The Students' Administrative Council is finally convening a general student meeting to discuss tactics to fight the province's educational cutbacks, cutbacks which are adversely affecting the complexion of post-secondary education in Ontario.

The meeting and the strategy that may evolve from it does not stem from the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee's (SSSC) noisy disruptions of recent SAC meetings, meetings scheduled to deal with further action in this area. Nor, it must be equally stressed, does it result from a sudden burst of energy by SAC.

Rather, the meeting is taking place because Erindale student council chastized the university's senior student government for having dealt with the issue with less than full enthusiasm. And, the council, perhaps recognizing its shortcomings in this area, acceded to the general meeting demand with little opposition.

It is indeed regrettable that it took the Erindale letter and motion to get council doing something more than passively encouraging students to withhold their second term fees. This is an area where a council truly sensitive to the issues involved and the interests of its constituents should have taken the initiative.

(But, it should be remembered that this council finally did respond to the discontent recorded in the Erindale letter.)

Disruptions alone have not kept the council from taking more decisive leadership on the cutbacks question. Admittedly, the pessimism many members of council felt about the withholding campaign's chances of success coloured their willingness or lack of willingness to get wholeheartedly involved in organizing anything more substantial than a low key publicity campaign.

The apparent success that this unenthusiastic effort has had proves that the student body supports the campaign to protest the government's negative attitude toward post-secondary education.

What is required now is decisive, energetic leadership on SAC's part to ensure that the campaign is not allowed to wane. The SSSC charges that SAC plans on calling off the withholding campaign by the end of month, plans cleared in advance, they say, with the administration.

SAC's rationale, according to the SSSC, is that the campaign has only been symbolic and there's no point in alienating the supposedly sympathetic university administration by prolonging the campaign until the university begins to feel the pinch.

Realistically, there can be little disagreement that the campaign is unlikely to win a rollback of the $100 fees hike. But, that, in itself, is no reason to abandon the legitimate demand for repeal of the increase.

More importantly, post-secondary students and those who agree with their demands for universal accessibility to our province's community colleges and universities should be stepping up their pressure — and the withholding action is a form of pressure, indirect though it may be — at a time when the provincial government is putting the finishing touches on its budget for the next fiscal year, and getting ready to release the final report of its Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario (COPSEO).

That budget, it is widely rumoured, may include further adverse changes to the Ontario Student Award Program, possibly hiking the loan ceiling to a new high of $1,000. It should be remembered that the very policies the withholding campaign is protesting were slipped into effect in last year's budget.

As for the final report of the COPSEO, there have been no indications that the commission has opted for changes in its draft proposals which would shift a greater portion of the cost of a post-secondary student's education onto his or her shoulders and orient the province's post-secondary educational institutions to satiating the job market.

February represents not a time to abandon the struggles of the past few months, but an opportunity — indeed an obligation — to build upon the momentum that has already been generated and make our voices unavoidably audible in the government chambers.

This does not mean that students attending tomorrow's strategy meeting should unrealistically plot the unrealizable. It means that they should seriously and conscientiously attempt to assess the mood of the student body and what actions will most likely earn their active support.

It is the fear of unrealistic tendencies that makes council moderates cringe when they hear talk of mass meetings. Complete turnabouts like last weekend's on again-off again Ontario Federation of Students three days of moratoria re-enforce their qualms. It is this kind of decision-making in a vacuum which must be avoided at tomorrow's meeting.

If it isn't, the decisions or proposals coming out of the meeting will only harm the cause they are meant to support. The cutbacks struggle needs victories, not more wipe-outs.

To do less than actively support the cause is to desert it. Make sure you're at the general meeting tomorrow between 12 noon and 2 pm in the Medical Sciences Auditorium. And, then, help put what you decide into practice.

Rod Beattie as Hamlet duels with Reed Needles as Laertes.

Hamlet at Hart House is stimulating, well-produced

When word came that Hamlet was to be staged at the Hart House Theatre, one was tempted to quote Shakespeare's hero himself and say "buzz, buzz," (Hamlet's nonchalant reply when Polonius announces that the actors are coming). It is difficult to be optimistic, let alone excited, over the prospect of a non-professional production of one of the world's most over-produced plays. Surely such dark lordings added to the surprise, when it became clear that Martin Hunter's Hamlet was the most stimulating, well-tailored production Hart House has presented this season.

Not only does it compare favourably to other productions by members of the university community, but it does incredible justice to the ambitious project of bringing freshness to Shakespeare's well-worn masterpiece. Though the director hasn't given a radical slant to the production, his vision of the characters and their relationships is detailed enough to be genuinely interesting. The accent seems to be on making the characters as human as possible. Ophelia, for example, has lost some of the other-worldliness one is used to expect, but she has gained a sense of humour. Polonius is somewhat more robust than one is tempted to imagine.

Visually, the production is a delight. The substantial-looking set design is equally successful in portraying throne room, rampart, graveyard, and the shadowy passageways of Elsinore. It is exploited skillfully, so that the scenes blend into one another without that sense of affectation certain "versatile" sets often inspire. A rather uninhibited use of lighting has echoed in passionate hues, the various steps of the tragedy. Costumes, too, are festive and provocatively designed — all part of what seems an attempt to take the darkness out of Hamlet.

With all these positive elements, it is still obvious that the production owes much to Rod Beattie, whose lively, assured performance must have infected his co-workers with confidence. His Hamlet is a dashing Renaissance man, gifted above all with a mischievous comic sense. Many aspects of what had been, in Ophelia's words, "the glass of fashion" emerge in the portrait. He is highly perceptive — admirably shown in the scenes with Rosencrantz and Guildenstern. He has a flair for the dramatic, expressing this with a physical agility that is both natural and dynamic. His most successful moments occur when he is baiting those around him with his ironic wit. The soliloquies are less impressive, because this Hamlet seems less of a loner, less of a tormented soul than the lines indicate. One has the impression that he enjoys his predicament, the way a child is fascinated by a difficult puzzle.

The cast which is, with one exception, non-professional does not have to be forgiven the limitations of amateurs; it works as a sensitive, unified group. Even the fact that Gertrude is young-looking does not jar the spectator, because her comportment is quite convincing, and secondly, Hamlet's mother (Marcia Perly) is being interpreted as a rather empty-headed, aging coquette.

Martin Hunter's Hamlet makes for an enjoyable evening of theatre, whether one is attending in order to see Shakespeare, or merely to be jarred out of some unpleasant preconceptions concerning both Shakespeare and amateur theatre.

Communist Club supports meeting

Over 6,000 students are still withholding their fees in opposition to government cutbacks in education.

Across the province last fall, we demonstrated by referendum our readiness to act against government policy. But, the present SAC leadership hasn't listened to students, as it promised when elected. It has provided no leadership; just a half-hearted campaign for token withholding of fees for a couple of weeks beyond the deadline. This can hardly count as being in the spirit of the referendum mandate to act.

The way was left open for the CLM with their strategy of fighting the administration instead of the government in theory, and fighting SAC instead of the administration in practice. They are antagonizing the campus and confusing the issue by making SAC the enemy rather than the government, which can provide funds for education by higher corporation taxes.

The fees deadline has passed. Clear leadership against the government is required now or it will be too late. The CLM refusal to endorse an open meeting to decide on a definite line of action indicates sectarian aims on their part rather than a desire to win, and stop education cutbacks.

The Communist Club agrees with the signers of a letter in last Monday's Varsity, representing various student societies across campus, who call for an open meeting on this question. Such a meeting is scheduled tomorrow, Tuesday, from 12 to 2 in the Medical Sciences Auditorium.

We hope a maximum number of people will come out and unite around the course of action the meeting decides on.

No disruption terms: SSSC

On Thursday, January 25, the Graduate Students Union council passed a motion that it would inform graduate students that they have two alternatives on how to carry on the fees withholding: one is that they may withhold individually, and the other is that they may join the SSSC trust fund.

We feel that this is a reasonable position for a student council to take. This has always been our stand in relation to the Students' Administrative Council. We demand that SAC fulfill its responsibilities to the students by supporting a fees withholding that can win, and take a fair position with respect to the SSSC and the trust fund.

SAC, however, has done neither. It has planned all along to call off the fees boycott by the end of January. It has attacked the trust fund and tried to scare the students away from the SSSC — the only group on campus which is organizing a real fees strike — a fees strike to win.

SAC was thinking of getting an injunction against the SSSC to prevent students from coming to the next SAC meeting tomorrow night at Scarborough College. According to The Varsity of January 24, the SAC executive "agreed before taking that step, it would talk to the SSSC to prevent a repetition of the disruption." We have been consulted and SAC has wisely decided not to take out an injunction.

The GSU has never pretended to be leading the student struggle against the fee surcharge, and they have taken the position in relation to the efforts of other groups that if any student wishes to participate in the SSSC trust fund, that is a matter between the individual student and the SSSC.

SAC, on the other hand, has actively attempted to discourage students from participating in the SSSC trust fund, while having no superior alternative of its own. It has been trying to convince the students of this campus that we have disrupted SAC meetings for the sheer pleasure of it.

The proof that this is not true lies in our attitude to the GSU. We are only interested in defending the political rights of the students. The GSU has not attempted to actively harm the interests of the students, therefore we have not attempted to disrupt any of their meetings.

SAC feels that it has the right, as given by the university administration to harm the interests of the students. Given that the SSSC will defend the interests of the students, we are on a collision course with SAC at this time.

If SAC doesn't want this to be so, they have only to change their actions. The quickest glance at the position of the GSU and our action in reference to the GSU, should convince any honest person that we have been denouncing SAC only in so far as it has been attempting to harm the interests of the students of the U of T and the people of Canada.

If the SAC does not wish us to attack them, they should realize that all the threats in the world will do them no good. They have only to act like the GSU and then we will treat them in the same manner.

Writer explains critical article

I see that a member of the Vietnam Mobilization Committee was passing on a few sour grapes in a letter in Friday's paper. I would like to assure the writer of the correctness of his feeling that "a number of criticisms and political attacks were being waged" in the article which I wrote on the Indochina demonstration.

The Varsity has no pretensions of being unbiased, as do most other papers, and indeed encourages critical writing. At the demonstration in question, the behaviour of the League for Socialist Action-controlled Vietnam Mobilization Committee cries out for criticism.

The LSA describes itself as the Canadian section of the Fourth International, World Party of Socialist Revolution. For revolutionaries to continually present a reformist position to attract everyone up to apolitical pacifists and liberals to their "movement", while at the same time organizing their forces to squelch any political impact by militants to their left, is beyond excuse. They have consistently refused to publicly push a revolutionary alternative. They oppose Canadian complicity in the war, but they will not bring the class struggle home.

I admit to possible inaccuracy in my estimate that "half the marchers" disobeyed the police.

However, the important point to note is that the LSA physically supported the police efforts to contain the march, as they always have.

When the VMC claims that "the role of the marshalls was to protect the march, including the possibility of individual harassment by the police", I can only recall their actions on May 9, 1970, when hundreds of demonstrators were attacked by the Edmund Burke Society and the Metro police, while the LSA contingents marched around in circles on the opposite side of University Avenue.

As far as being anxious to "lead 1,200 people into a confrontation with the cops", it was clear from the beginning that the ISC favoured the demonstrators taking the streets, if they could successfully and safely do so (as occurred at the Amchitka protest, in spite of the LSA). We at no time entered a binding irrevocable agreement that we would stick to the sidewalks come hell or high water. As to majorities and minorities, I would remind the VMC of Leon Trotsky's words: "Majorities are won over, not counted up."

The LSA saw itself losing political control to the solidarity contingent, and resorted to crude organizational remedies, such as physically obstructing ISC marshalls and parking their sound truck beside our contingent. Some political re-evaluation might be more appropriate.

It should perhaps be noted here that the product of what was publicly announced as a joint money collection at the demonstration is now being withheld from the ISC by the VMC. Such childish petulance is unbecoming.

Friday's letter objects to the emphasis of reporting on the different speeches. The fact that Dan Heap was covered extensively in The Star to the exclusion of everyone else should show the VMC his relevance at such a demonstration. As far as the other speakers are concerned, I have written considerable copy this year on LSA speeches. When a revolutionary alternative was available, I felt that enough was enough.

Now that a ceasefire has been signed, and Canadian troops are heading over to be watchdogs over the NLF, I wonder if the VMC will organize material opposition to Canadian complicity, or will instead be content to chant "withdraw Canadian troops" to Trudeau and Sharp, without ever injecting a hint of class politics.

Ed's Note: The Varsity's editorial policy demands that reports published within the paper adhere to strict criteria of accuracy. To merit publication, articles must be both accurate and fair.

What The Varsity, unlike the professional press, admits is that decisions about which events to cover and what prominence to accord them is determined in all media by its editorial policy. The Toronto Star, for example, publishes many inane articles on Canadian nationalism on page one regardless of their relative importance. The Varsity, in its turn, affords priority to important developments affecting the lives of its readers, with a definite preference for events of a progressive political nature.

Subjective comment is meant to be reserved for its editorial and comment pages.

Male chauvinism permeates medicine, affecting women as patients and doctors

Medical schools and the medical profession have always been bastions of male supremacy. University of British Columbia medical student Kirstan Emmott's paper, Women and the Health Service, provides the basis for this study of woman and medicine, originally published in the Ubysey.

Gynecology texts

You would think that gynecology textbooks, not to mention the lectures of individual professors, would provide a calm, unprejudiced view of women patients. This is, unfortunately, not the case. Authors of medical textbooks are as likely as anyone else to include their personal biases as if they were scientific truths. A random sampling of available textbooks reveals the following shortcomings:

- 1) It is assumed that all gynecologists are men.
- 2) There is little or no mention of how to put a patient at her ease.
- 3) Women are attacked for being uncontrollably emotional and most complaints are assumed to have strongly psychogenic overtones.
- 4) Women are attacked for being foolish, undependable, and untrustworthy.
- 5) Women are attacked for being dirty and immoral.
- 6) Dysmenorrhea (painful periods) is simultaneously described as a widespread, troublesome problem and as a neurosis which deserves no treatment.
- 7) Menopausa is similarly treated.
- 8) Discussions about sex reveal ignorance, discredited anatomical and psychological ideas, and weird moralisms.
- 9) Women are attacked for being masochists.
- 10) Women are attacked for wanting abortions.

A large component of these attitudes is the women's guilt. Women are made to feel guilty, not only for having cramps or pregnancies but even for wanting regular checkups!

"A patient, either out of curiosity or because she is a nymphomaniac, comes in for gynecological examination," a 1952 gynecology textbook intones.

While the occasional gynecology text emphasizes kindness to patients, few mention such courtesies as warming instruments, and most ignore such topics entirely. Any woman who has felt embarrassed and humiliated lying on the examination table knows what help a little kindness and gentleness can be sometimes.

Women are assumed in these textbooks to be neurotic individuals, always complaining about pain or tension for no reason. Dysmenorrhea is especially bothersome to the gynecologist, as is premenstrual or menopausal tension. One text even suggests, "Most gynecologists consider that there is a strong emotional component in the genesis of trichomoniasis (crotch-rot), but this has not yet been clarified." If it ever is clarified, it is certain to revolutionize the thinking of those who used to think spontaneous generation was impossible!

Another text, however, warns against a diagnosis of psychogenic illness until all organic causes have been ruled out. It relates the story of a woman who had unusual pain and tachycardia, which her general practitioner attributed to neurosis. The relatives insisted on a second opinion and the consulting doctor recognized the symptoms of ectopic pregnancy. By the time they reached the patient's home, the tube containing the pregnancy had ruptured.

Women are portrayed as ignorant and foolish. One text says, "Many are extraordinarily careless about the dates of menstruation and keep no records. If reliable information on these matters is wanted, ask the husband."

Anyone who had ever actually had a menstrual period would know the pointlessness of keeping "truly accurate records". The only reason to do so would be to avoid the scorn of a gynecologist, and it simply isn't worth the trouble. And, anyone who actually had a husband would know how reliable his information on "these matters" is.

When it comes to a discussion of sex, these textbook writers reveal ignorance of female genitalia and their functions, pass on outdated information on female sexuality, and make moralistic judgments about women.

Doctors are not unaware that a poor doctor-patient relationship may contribute to poor success in treatment. Yet they seem to be even more concerned about annoyances for doctors caused by unhappy patients. One book written "to guide physicians in their management of the doctor-patient relationship" refers in the foreword to patients as behaving "stupidly, childishly, mean — always ready to put the doctor in a bad spot". It explains that with better patient management (sic) "patients will behave more maturely and will be more appreciative and co-operative" and there will be a reduction in "the unearned incidence of dissatisfied patients quitting the doctor, failing to pay his fees, bringing malpractice suits, and generally gossiping and causing trouble."

Medical journals

Doctors are constantly receiving publications, samples, even free gifts from companies engaged in selling medicines and medical equipment. A tremendous amount of space in medical journals is devoted to such advertising, mainly from the large pharmaceutical firms. If you look through recent issues of medical journals with pecial attention to how women are portrayed in drug company advertising, you will come away with the following general impressions:

- 1) Women are portrayed as patients more often than men are.
- 2) Women are often portrayed with hostility or contempt.
- 3) Advertisements for psychotropic drugs usually portray women, not men.
- 4) Women's problems, especially as portrayed in psychotropic drug advertisements, are shown as neuroses rather than as problems amenable to social solutions.
- 5) Women's bodies, nude or partially clothed, are used to decorate advertisements.
- 6) All doctors portrayed in advertisements are men.
- 7) Advertisements are aimed at men, especially those inviting the reader to respond to sexual innuendo.

For a quick impression of the sexism behind drug company advertisements, here are the partial results of a survey of the advertisements in the Canadian Medical Association Journal over a period of six months (July 18 to December 5, 1971):

Ads showing	Females		Males
	Only	Only	Only	Only
Total	72	42
—anxious or depressed	19	2
—bitchy, dullwitted	5	1
—nude or in underwear	13	0

A survey of eight consecutive issues of the American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology (September to December, 1971) showed that about a quarter of the women were portrayed in a distinctly unfavourable light. The large number of women shown smiling were nearly all in advanced pregnancy, and were advertising such things as vitamin supplements. Most were wearing very short skirts or were otherwise seductively posed.

The consumption of mood-changing drugs by North Americans is extremely high, and they are taken by twice as many women as men. In advertisements in medical journals, doctors are told that the answer to the "tired housewife" syndrome is to drug the patient — her problems may not lessen, but at least she won't come back so often.

Dr. Robert Sidenberg, clinical professor of psychiatry at New York State University at Syracuse, states in the January, 1971 issue of Mental Hygiene that such ads are not psychiatrically sound nor medically ethical. The drug industry openly acknowledges the enslavement of women behind bars made of mops and brooms. Another advertisement pictures a woman who, we are told, has a MA degree but who must now be content with the PTA and housework. This, we are advised, contributes to her gynecological complaints, and she should be given mood-altering drugs.

Surely, the doctor could "set her free" by, say, getting her a day care centre and a job. He could get the father of these troublesome children to look after them or do some of the housework. He could stop thinking that all single women are psychoneurotic failures, and that marriage is the only goal in life for women. He could agitate for better career opportunities for women and better pay for the jobs they do, so that they could find satisfaction there. He could stop drugging women into adjusting to a bad deal.

Even worse are the advertisements in which doctors are invited to drug women simply because they are bothersome. A distraught, angry man exclaims, "Women are impossible!" The copy explains that his wife is suffering from premenstrual tension and needs meprobamate. An insomniac in curlers keeps her husband awake. "How can this shrew be tamed?" Why, with sleeping pills. Another must be tranquilized because she demands too much of the doctor's time.

Worst of all are ads for estrogen replacement. Copywriters really go to town on the supposed "witches' curse" (an actual phrase used) of the menopause. An ad for Premarin shows a long suffering bus driver with the caption "he is suffering from estrogen deficiency". We turn the page to see "she is the reason why" under a picture of harassing menopausal bus passenger who "makes life miserable for everyone she comes in contact with".

Another Premarin ad shows a kindly gentleman interrupted at his morning paper. This time "the reason why" is his wife, whom we see on the next page, in curlers and robe, teeth gritted, finger pointed, and glaring at her husband.

In contrast, a quite unusual advertisement, from an eight-page supplement about men and their chances of getting coronary heart disease shows a man being obnoxious and troublesome in a restaurant. The copy says, "Pattern Type A is an aggressive individual who must assert himself as one who deserves recognition and good service, whether from fellow workers or a waiter. Pattern Type A has been associated with a significantly higher incidence of CHD as compared to other patients with the same coronary risk factors". His behavior is not offered as sufficient cause for treatment with hormones or psychotropic drugs, as is so often the case where women are portrayed in this way.

Needless to say, drug companies do not much care how women feel about their advertisements so long as doctors keep prescribing what is offered. The situation will change only when women force doctors to supply safe, effective treatment based on verifiable evidence and not advertising innuendo.

Women doctors

Only seven per cent of Canada's doctors are women. In the United States, the percentage is nine per cent, in India, 12 per cent; Philippines, 25 per cent; Western Europe, 13 to 20 per cent; Eastern Europe, 30 per cent; Soviet Union, 65 per cent. Medical schools have historically discriminated against women.

An article by Dr. Harold Kaplan in the New Physician described a study of attitudes in North American medical schools to women. Over 95 per cent of the schools in the U.S. and Canada responded to this survey. As his first conclusion, Kaplan states that a significant number of schools were very negative about single or married women (what other kinds are there?) in medicine: "... while no school in the United States overtly or officially refuses to accept women, prejudice does seem to manifest itself by refusing medical school admission to married women with or without children, schools being very unimpressed with single women as medical students, or simply by the administration of a school being uninterested in adapting to the unique problems women have."

Kaplan found that some schools are ambivalent in their attitudes toward women, pregnancy, and medicine. While they deny any problem exists or avoid facing it, they make special provisions for this "non-existent" problem when it occurs. He describes the University of British Columbia as a classical example of avoiding facing the conflict the school itself describes.

"We would not admit students where there is likely to be a conflict between two jobs; that is, the academic pursuit and the responsibility of looking after a family. . . . There is no discrimination against women students, there are certainly no special privileges for them. We have several women medical students who have children but they carry on exactly the same as any other medical student."

Emmott considers "this absolutely wrong. Where marriage and childbirth are concerned, women (especially young women) are special and deserve not rigid equality but special privileges. We demand this in the same spirit that black people have demanded special financial terms to build up their businesses, improve their ghettos, and desegregate their schools: to equalize opportunity."

Some medical schools allow schedules to be juggled somewhat to suit the students. While this makes it slightly easier for a woman medical student to have children while in school, in many schools such women return to the full academic schedule in from three days to two weeks — too short a recovery period, and potentially dangerous to the woman's health. The reason they return so soon is that "there has been no provision made for their absence and they fear that they will lose their academic year's credit if they stay out longer".

In fact, female medical students do quite well. In 1970, 19.7 per cent of women students were in the top 10 per cent of their classes. While 15 per cent of those leaving for non-academic reasons had children.

Often, women interested in a career in medicine are shuffled into "light" (read: low-pay, low-prestige) work to become paramedics, such as dental assistants and contraceptive technologists. Women doctors are heavily concentrated in pediatrics, obstetrics, radiology, and general practice. Rarely do women enter such high-prestige fields as neurosurgery. It is open to question whether these jobs are considered "more suitable for women" because they are lower in prestige or vice-versa.

In spite of the lack of arrangements for childbirth or childcare, women medical school graduates manage to do quite well in their practice. In a survey of the graduates of seven medical schools between 1945 and 1951, 91 per cent of the respondents (all women) were practising. Ninety per cent of the married women were practising. All the single women practised full time.

A 1967 survey reported that 38 per cent of the 17,000 women doctors in the U.S. took off an average of four years from practice because of pregnancy and motherhood. They calculated that the nation therefore lost 25,440 years of practice. By this logic, since women live an average of seven years longer than men, the U.S. would gain 119,000 extra years of practice just from these women physicians — at that rate, why not have all doctors be women?

Present civic system is useless: Clarkson

By MARK BOHNEN

Toronto should abandon its present "bizarre" municipal system of government in favour of a parliamentary model according to Stephen Clarkson, mayoralty candidate in 1969.

Speaking to the University Arts Women's Club last week, Clarkson, a U of T political economy professor, said that the present system was in no way a part of the Canadian tradition. It originated with a city reform movement in the U.S. around the turn of the century, he said.

The movement was initiated to keep important powers out of the hands of corrupt political machines by creating separate independent authorities in the form of boards, and separating the election of mayor and aldermen.

Toronto adapted the system "holus bolus" said Clarkson, although we had no "Tammany Hall", a corrupt New York machine, to contend with.

Clarkson contrasted the inefficient features of the present municipal system with those of the parliamentary system.

Apart from the inefficiency of its internal structure, the power of the municipal government is circumscribed by the Ontario government he pointed out. The government itself can be restructured by the provincial government.

Power is divided under various boards, commissions, and committees, some of them partially autonomous.

There is not enough coordination among these bodies in formulating policies, Clarkson asserted. Often power over one area such as transportation is divided among a number of bodies.

Thus there is no body or person responsible for policies, according to Clarkson. A complaint about law enforcement could as easily be presented to the chief of police as to the metro commissioner, he said.

The process of city government is characterized by tension and frustration at a human level. It is an inefficient system according to Clarkson, characterized by "high energy input" and a "low level of output."

Partly because of the division of responsibility among officials, and the fragmentation of power, the government is not responsive to the public.

The legitimacy of City Hall as a viable institution has suffered as a result. The source of any power is perceived to lie in Ottawa or Queen's Park, according to Clarkson.

Debates in city hall, he said, are like a "circus". There is a feeling that the whole thing is a travesty.

Parliament, on the other hand, enjoys a high level of legitimacy, Clarkson said. Its proceedings are orderly and the level of debate is high.

Parliamentary government is more responsive than its municipal counterpart, Clarkson added. He pointed out that legislation on pollution, however inadequate, was forthcoming after a public outcry.

Clarkson traced the history of a continuing fight to change the structure of city hall.

"Round 1" according to Clarkson began in 1968-69. At this time some authorities such as Harold Kaplan agreed that city government was unworkable. Meanwhile citizens were becoming increasingly aware of American urban problems. Public consciousness was, however, relatively low at this time, asserted Clarkson.

A group of parties, the NDP, the Liberals, and CIVAC, supported a number of reform candidates with broadly similar views.

Among the policies of the Liberal party, for which Clarkson ran for mayor, was a platform to reform city government along parliamentary lines.

In "round 2" the four "reformers", aldermen Bill Kilbourn, Karl Jaffary, David Crombie and John Sewell had "cracked the system". They supplied the public with much-needed information about the internal workings of City Hall. Up till then much of this information had been inaccessible according to Clarkson.

Issues such as the Spadina Expressway were not openly discussed. When the reform caucus won on this issue the group "overnight became a majority" said Clarkson.

By now the media had become more aware of and sympathetic to the reform viewpoint, he said.

People's consciousness was being raised and citizen groups were mobilized around issues.

"Round 3" saw the coalition of reform candidates and their supporters in the 1972-73 election campaign and their victory in City Council.

In "round 4", occurring now, the "rules of the game" favouring developers are being changed. The energy of the reform majority is being "percolated through the system," said Clarkson.

However for Clarkson this is only the beginning of a more important and fundamental change.

"Round 5", which is yet to occur, should see structural changes in city government. According to Clarkson the process has begun with Jaffary's proposal to have smaller wards, each represented by 1 alderman instead of 11 wards with 2 aldermen each.

Centre is in doubt

The future of a student building "is up in the air", according to SAC vice president John Helliwell because provincial grants for capital construction have been cut back.

Last November, Helliwell proposed the construction of the building to be built beside the SAC office. The student building was to include space for services and activities including commercial outlets.

The centrally located building was a first step towards integrating the university under the Campus as Campus Centre Project.

Helliwell said that "certainly within this year" the student building will not be built. Although "nobody knows what is happening", Helliwell said, the loss of "capital funding may hit us."

Until last November, the university counted on provincial grants of over $20 million for new construction and renovation. Then colleges and universities minister Jack McNie announced that capital funding for projects not underway would be frozen.

Helliwell said that the university was in the process of asking the province to reconsider their cutting of funds for renovation.

These renovations will have to be financed out of the university's general revenue if the government refuses to pay for them, prohibiting carrying out the student proposal.

Helliwell is hoping that the administration will be able to pay for a student building if renovation costs are reassured by the government. The university is also planning to construct a building for Innis College and a men's athletic building.

Dissent alive in Soviet Union claims socialist

By ELAINE FARRAGHER
 Despite severe repression in the form of mass arrests and the commitment of dissidents to mental institutions, the opposition movement in the Soviet Union is continuing.
 In the first of a series of public meetings sponsored by the Committee in Defense of Soviet Political Prisoners, two of its members, Zaine Boyd and Marko Bojunc Friday described the various forms of dissent in the Soviet Union and the difficulties of organizing and spreading their views in an oppressive state.
 Bojunc said that the movement is not anti-communist or right-wing. Although it is not composed strictly of "marxist-leninists," it is pro-socialist and focuses very strongly on the concept of democracy.
 Boyd described the three main currents of dissent in the USSR. The first is a liberal current of "prominent scientists, technicians and cultural people" who have not yet broken with the Kremlin and are seeking reforms within the existing state structure.

 The second current is the radical democratic elements, which include radical students and workers who consider the Soviet ruling class to be their enemy. This group has sent appeals to the United Nations about repression, but have not received replies.
 The third group is the revolution ary current which seeks to overthrow the government. Much of their activity is secret and only hints of their activity come through to the West.

 The last two groups pose the greatest danger to the Kremlin bureaucracy and are thus dealt with most severely, said Boyd.
 Bojunc described the Ukraine as having the most advanced dissident movement in the Soviet Union. News of their activities, which include demonstrations, strikes and riots, is kept out of both Eastern and Western news he claimed, since these actions show the strength and militancy of the workers, and neither side wants these ideas to spread.

 Bojunc explained that dissident students and workers are trying to win back the gains they had made during the revolution that were later reversed by Stalin. The Ukraine has suffered from cultural and linguistic repression and social immobility due to Stalin's rule.

 Bojunc said that 50 to 60 per cent of the prisoners in the Ukraine were in jail for political reasons.
 The repression that the Kremlin is inflicting on the opposition movement shows the great fear it has of a force which wishes to return to socialist democracy, said Boyd. The Kremlin sees the appeal that a revolutionary opposition would have for the people as a great threat to their own power, he claimed.

Controversial head of Memorial U resigns

ST. JOHN'S (CUP) — Lord Stephen Taylor, president of Memorial University of Newfoundland since 1966, has resigned effective August 31st 1973.
 Taylor, who had three years left to go on his contract with the university, said "as many people know, I have undergone major surgery several times in the last few years, and the pressure of being president of a large university are increasing all the time. Although I feel reasonably fit at the moment, I feel the time has come for me to retire."

Opposition to Taylor's presidency has become increasingly vocal in recent months. It was at Taylor's insistence that the university's Board of Regents decided last November to discontinue compulsory collection of students union fees. The successful occupation of the arts and administration building that followed dealt Taylor a slap in the face which was probably a major factor in his decision to retire.

 Taylor, a medical doctor from England who is a member of The House of Lords, was hired by former Premier Joey Smallwood in 1966. He was signed to a ten year contract at thirty thousand dollars a year, and an expensive house near the university was expropriated, torn down and then rebuilt almost identically to suit him.

Taylor's power as president was minimal as the vice-president (academic) has virtually run the university ever since Taylor became president. Taylor's main function has been as a figurehead and public relations specialist.
 However, the power was always theoretically there and occasionally Taylor decided to use it, as in the union fees controversy last term. By the end of the occupation, he had lost support of virtually everybody in the university, including students, faculty, other top administrators and even some regents.

Quebec films portray class struggle: prof

By JOHN CAMPBELL

Contemporary Quebec films reflect the new tensions in French-Canadian society — an increasing concern with violence and the class struggle, said Université de Montréal professor Michel Brulé last week.

These phenomena Brulé regards as Québec's collective search for a national identity, again indicating the emergence of a consciousness of history.

"We are dirty, but we like the way we smell", said Brulé during a seminar on the sociology of literature and cinema in Québec.

He was referring to the new self-confident sense of nationalism in Québec, which in a two hour discussion he traced through 40 years of French-Canadian film productions.

Brulé made a distinction between traditional art, which he said is "for the elite" and the newer mass art forms. He pointed out that the latter is usually considered "not serious", but its importance to him derives from its very popularity as a mode of social expression.

Frequently apologizing for the 'inadequacy' of his English, the young, bearded film specialist began by outlining a Marxist theory of the cinematic art form which he used as a framework for his analysis.

A film, he said, represents "a vision of the world — a totality" and therefore, like the novel, it conveys values. He interpreted French-Canadian movies on this basis, in terms of the image they indicate Québec has had of itself.

In the early 1940's, the dominant theme in films and radio soap operas was the "survival" ideology — the portrayal of a quaint rural Québec as the epitome of French-Canadian values. This image he argued, began to lose its force when rapid social change and the example of Algeria suggested that really it "had been constructed by someone else" and represented the product of "imperialism and colonialism". Within a capitalist system, these forces managed to keep the Québécois poor and isolated.

Brulé compared the process by which Québec discovered that "we don't have to be ashamed of ourselves" to the American blacks' realization that black is beautiful. This, he said, is Québec's own "cultural revolution" and it is one that prime minister Pierre Trudeau "doesn't understand". It involves a positive re-interpretation of the traditional values within their socio-historical context — and is manifest in the present popularity of French-Canadian "camp" heroes.

"We must re-evaluate our history", he said, "the interpretation we have of ourselves."

No tyranny under Castro, says Cuba society president

By DAVE LINE

Cubans today enjoy greater freedom and prosperity than ever before, according to the president of the Canada-Cuba Friendship Society.

Roland Nunez, said on Saturday that students and workers are now able to control their political destiny through the Communist Party in a way that was not possible before the revolution.

Panelists at the taping of the television show Crossfire in Toronto where Nunez was speaking, challenged this point. They questioned why the general election promised for soon after the revolution has not been called, and why opposition political parties are forbidden in a country that is supposedly free.

The president said the fact that students and workers are armed bears witness to their freedom. Lack of time and unanimous popular support for the government of Castro were presented as the reasons why an election has not been called.

Panelists maintained that Cuba has more problems than some are willing to admit. These problems include failure to meet production targets, heavy debts to the USSR, and the large scale flight of refugees to the United States.

Nunez answered these charges by calling the refugees "worms" and stated that the United States is "the garbage dump of history". He stated he came to Canada before the revolution and now feels his greatest contribution to Cuba can be made through promoting friendship between the two countries.

Men swimmers practise for OUAA finals

By PAUL CARSON

Byron MacDonald broke two Canadian intercollegiate swimming records Friday during an exhibition swim meet at the Benson Building against the University of Ottawa and Etobicoke Memorial Aquatic Club.

MacDonald was clocked in 52.4 seconds for the 100-yard butterfly, two-tenths of a second faster than the former mark set by Varsity's Bob Heatley at the 1971 OUAA championships.

A few minutes later, MacDonald shaved almost two full seconds off the record time for the 200-yard butterfly as he recorded a 1:56.5 to shatter the standard set last year by Bill Kennedy of Western.

MacDonald's times will count as pool and team records but will not be officially recognized by the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union since they were not established during a CIAU championship meet.

MacDonald, 22, was a member of the Canadian team at the 1972 Olympics in Munich where he placed sixth in the 100-metre butterfly. He graduated in May 1972 from the University of Michigan and enrolled a few weeks ago in U of T's Faculty of Management Studies.

MacDonald's two unofficial records are among only a handful of respectable times Blues swimmers produced in two somewhat disappointing weekend meets.

The expected coaching dual between Varsity's Robin Campbell and Fouad Kamal of Ottawa failed to materialize Friday night since Kamal has only six swimmers of intercollegiate calibre despite the new 50-metre indoor pool at the U of O campus.

Consequently, the meet was run as a series of time trials with generally poor results.

MacDonald was helped to his record times by strong butterfly entries from Ottawa and EMAC, and Varsity' captain Jim Adams managed to swim the fastest 200-yard freestyle in Canada this season at 1:49.2

Nick Rottman continued his successful comeback after a year's absence with a solid 1:05.9 in the 100-yard breaststroke.

Saturday afternoon Blues just went through the motions at what could have been an outstanding meet in the 50-metre pool at McMaster.

The Mac Invitational was run as a long course meet using the full length of the pool instead of the usual 25-yard distance. But instead of inviting the best swimmers from all OUAA schools, the McMaster officials limited the entries to Varsity, the six Ottawa team members, a woefully slow contingent from Ryerson plus only about half of the McMaster team.

MacDonald swam a very competitive 1:00.3 for the 100-metre fly and freshman Shawn Laari won both the 200 and 400 metre freestyle. John Twobig produced almost a slow motion 200-metre backstroke but won by at least 25 metres and Ryerson gained a moment of glory by winning the 400-metre individual medley. "The idea of an exhibition long course meet is certainly worthwhile," said a disappointed Campbell, "but unless the best swimmers from the entire league are invited, it really isn't worth doing.

Most of our people were just fooling around and really didn't learn a thing."

Blues final dual meet before the OUAA championships is February 10 against Guelph at the Benson Building.

Women's swim team places first

As a result of two weeks of heavily concentrated training, the Toronto women's swim team came through with a fine effort Saturday to win the first annual Queen's University invitational swim meet.

U of T, last year's Ontario champions, placed first with 90 points, followed closely by McMaster with 88 and Queen's with 40. Five teams competed in all.

Despite the absence of Merrily Stratton, a 1972 Canadian Olympic team member, freestyler Karen Young and Laurie Sims, the Tarpons captured six of the 12 events.

Nancy Thomson, a second year phys ed student, won each of her three events and swam butterfly on the winning 400-yard medley relay team. Thomson took the 100- and 200-yard breast stroke events in 1:17.4 and 2:50.0, respectively, and finished more than six seconds ahead of the McGill swimmer to win the 200-yard individual medley in 2:36.1.

Third year science student Joan Dolson, after swimming backstroke on the medley team, went on to win the 200-yard backstroke in her fastest time this year of 2:41.4. Dolson finished one tenth of a second behind the McMaster swimmer Shirley Schmidt to take second place in the 100-yard backstroke in 1:12.2.

Freshman freestyle specialist, Marilyn McCormack, a top sprinter and middle-distance swimmer, outdid her former times by capturing the 100-yard freestyle title in 1:03.4. She also anchored the medley relay, which Toronto won in 4:53.7, more than 12 seconds ahead of the McMaster A team.

Despite the lighter training due to injury and sickness, breaststroker Janet Van der Eyk, backstroker Rona Posen and freestyler Cheryl Wong were able to swim good times in each of their events.

First year swimmers Nora Dobbell and Joyce Drohan, and second year veteran Dinny Biggs, knocked seconds off former best times to place well in their events.

Along with freestylers Janis

Williams, Kathy Smith and Judy Davidson, and breaststroker Diane Irvine, the team hopes to fair well against the other eight teams at the provincial finals February 16 and 17 at McMaster.

According to coach Liz Daniel, "The fact that the strong Waterloo team has so many established swimmers should not dampen our hopes. Due to the great spirit and hard work of the girls, their individual performances have improved to such a degree that we will most certainly be a challenge to the favoured Waterloo team".

Track finishes first at CNE

The University of Toronto track team finished in first place at York University's invitational indoor track meet at the CNE Saturday. Toronto team standings totalled 81 points. York was second (67) and Queen's third (52) out of a total of 10 teams that were scored.

The meet marked the first time in U of T's history that a woman's track team entered. Its four members competed in three of five women's events.

Barb Richardson placed ninth in the 400 metre finals in a time of 67.0 seconds, while May Grenier was 13th in 73.1. In the 50 metre event, Richardson and Grenier placed second and third in their heats, with times of 7.4 and 7.7, respectively. However, they failed to qualify for the finals. The women's team placed third in the 4x1 lap relay, but were disqualified for a change out of zone.

For the men, U of T's Henry Tobias placed third in the 50 metre event, while Varsity's Greg Ross ran 6.4 in his heat. In the 1500 metres Mark Minden, Toronto's only entry, finished third in a time of 4:03.3. U of T student Gerry Feeney finished first in 50.3 seconds in the 400 metre finals, while Bill Johnson finished fifth (52.5) and Dave Howes sixth (53.1) in their respective sections. (The race was run in seven timed sections.) Varsity's Matt Duncan finished second in the 800 metres (also run in timed sections) in 1:58.4.

In Toronto's best event of the day — the 5000 metres — track team members captured the top four positions, as well as the sixth and eighth places. Joe Sax finished first in 14:39.4, John Sharp second (14:42.4), Paul Glynn third (15:01.0), Andy Reed fourth (15:03.0), Brad Morley sixth (15:09.6), and John Curten eighth (15:14.4). The U of T 'A' team placed first in the 4x3 lap relay event, in 6:06.8, while the 'B' team was fifth of nine in 6:29.8.

In the jump events, Varsity's Greg Ross finished ninth (approximately, since scores were not counted after the top eight positions) in the long jump with 5.80 metres, and Erik Little second in the high jump (six 6 feet).

50 metres: 1. Hugh Fraser, Queen's; 2. Dave Jarvis, Queen's; 3. Henry Tobias, Toronto. Time 5.8.

1500 metres: 1. Ken Hamilton, York; 2. Mike Lanigan, Waterloo; 3. Mark Minden, Toronto. Time 3:59.0.

400 metres: 1. Gerry Feeney, Toronto; 2. Hugh Fraser, Queen's; 3. Rick Walter, Windsor. Time 50.8.

800 metres: 1. Mike Lanigan, Waterloo; 2. Matt Duncan, Toronto; 3. Dave Yagger, Guelph. Time 1:57.9.

5000 metres: 1. Joe Sax, Toronto; 2. John Sharp, Toronto; 3. Paul Glynn, Toronto. Time 14:39.4.

4 x 3 lap relay: 1. U of T 'A', 2. Queen's; 3. McMaster. Time 6:06.8.

Long jump: 1. Tony Geoghan, McMaster; 2. Becke, Queen's; 3. John Griffin, York. Height 6.74 metres.

High jump: 1. Mark Alter, York; 2. Erik Little, Toronto; 3. Allan Schweiger, Waterloo. Height 6 feet.

Blues' playoff hopes dimmed in Ottawa

By BDB PRITCHARD

It was a dismal weekend for the basketball Blues in Ottawa, losing a close game 74-72 to Carleton Ravens on Friday night, and then bowing to the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees 97-85 on Saturday.

Friday night's game against the Ravens was not as close as the two point margin might indicate. At one time Blues were down 14 points. Toronto did have a chance to score a tying or winning basket twice in the closing moments of the game, but failed to connect with the hoop. Blues only hit 37 per cent of their shots from the floor, compared with Carleton's 50 per cent.

Saturday's game against the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees started out to be a reasonably close contest. Although Varsity was on the lower side of a 28-20 score midway through the first half, Blues tied the score at 34, six minutes later, only to have Gee-Gees pull ahead 44-39 by half time.

Going into the second half, Ottawa jumped to a 50-41 lead after two minutes of play, but five minutes later Blues had closed the gap to 60-56.

Ottawa coach George Potvin then put a full court press on the Blues. Varsity, who have not had a great deal of experience working against a press, gave up the ball on turnovers and jumps, and in desperation began to foul the Gee-Gees.

Whereas the Ottawa team had only hit 50 per cent from the foul line in the first half, they improved their average to 70 per cent in the second half. Ottawa used the press for the better part of the remaining 20 minutes, and Blues, showing some fatigue from the previous night's game and the travelling, had to be content with staying within 10 points of the Gee-Gees. The final buzzer sounded with the score 97-85.

Toronto did manage to come up with some good shooting in the first half. Varsity usually relies on getting the majority of its points from fairly close to the basket, but a tough Ottawa man to man defence and half court press slowed the team down. However, Tony Rudmik and Doug Baker (in his best performance this season) put in 18 points between them with some accurate shooting. Dave Watt came up with a strong individual performance, scoring 27 points for Toronto.

Leading Gee-Gees in scoring was Merv Sabey, an aggressive and formidable centre, with 23 points. John Plaskacz and Vic Chandler, both impressive outside shooters, combined for 29 of Ottawa's points.

With three league games left to play, the Blues have a 4-5 record. To have a chance at a playoff spot, Toronto will have to win at least two of the three. Varsity meets Ryerson and York at their respective gyms—Blues have defeated both teams once already—and host the Ottawa Gee-Gees in the Benson Building after reading week.

Tip Off: Blues' next game is Saturday in the Benson Gym against the Western Mustangs in exhibition play. Game time is 2 pm... Ottawa has a new athletic complex con-

Hockey Blues earn 11th league victory

By PETER DUX

The line of Neil Korzack, Don Pagnutti and Kent Ruhnke led Blues to a 9-2 victory over Carleton Ravens Friday night. They were responsible for six of the nine goals in the typically one-sided victory.

Blues scored early when Harry Sims fired in the puck at 1:14 of the first period after a good set up from Bill Buba. Korzack made the score 2-0 by 5:21, but Carleton's Mark Potvin cashed in on poor defensive play in Toronto's zone when he stole the puck and blasted it past Inness. Ruhnke put Blues ahead 3-1 on a 'low slapshot before the end of the period.

Blues and Carleton were playing completely different styles; Varsity tried to have one man carry the puck in, and he would be "gang tackled" by four or five Ravens. Carleton, on the other hand would shoot the puck in from the blue line thus avoiding the chore of going around Varsity defencemen.

The second period saw the Blues score three consecutive goals — one by Pagnutti on a rebound off a Leroy slap. (Leroy had four points Friday.) Ruhnke scored his second goal on a breakaway when Don Pagnutti passed from his own end, behind Raven defencemen to Ruhnke waiting at centre ice.

The teams exchanged goals off the faceoff — first Bill Buba for Varsity, then Bill Potter for Carleton on a powerplay with Herridge in the box for tripping.

Blues were breaking through the Raven defence this period, beginning their passing game and playing most of the period in Carleton's zone.

Varsity scored three more times in the last period. The play slackened off for a while but at other times Blues would turn on the attack, and it appeared Toronto was trying to get a winning goal in an already decided game.

Near the middle of the period Blues were firing the puck at the Raven goal with reckless abandon but they hit the post or crossbar six consecutive times before Ruhnke scored his hat-trick goal. The crowd exploded with applause when the puck finally went in.

After the game Ruhnke explained why the line was so effective after being a disappointment in recent games: "We were being less selfish and passed the puck around a lot more."

Coach Tom Watt said he had been after the whole team to pass more and had worked on this in practice.

Blues Notes.... Ruhnke also had an assist along with his three goals.... centre Don Pagnutti with one goal and four assists was awarded a watch by Labatt's as the team's most valuable player.... Mark Potvin of Carleton is the brother of Ottawa 67's defenceman

Dennis Potvin, a likely candidate for the number one draft choice this year.... Blues travel to Ottawa for games against Gee-Gees Friday and Carleton Saturday.... Blues heat Ottawa 12-3 in their first match but Gee-Gees are hot of late, with recent victories over Waterloo and York, 5-2 Friday.

Students told to continue fees strike

By BOB BETTSON

The Students' Administrative Council executive decided yesterday to urge students to continue withholding their second term fees indefinitely. They also agreed to support a February 20th province-wide Queen's Park demonstration called for by Brock and Trent University student councils.

The full council failed to ratify the decisions when it fell three short of meeting its 20-person quorum for last night's meeting specifically scheduled to decide future action in the withholding campaign. Council's original motion supporting the campaign had an end-of-January review rider built into it.

Although the executive decisions must still be ratified by a general meeting, SAC vice-president John Helliwell felt certain last night that there would be little likelihood of the council reversing the decision. The executive he said, represented a good cross section of council. He also pointed out that none of the other SAC and political group members present at an informal gathering in the SAC office last night except the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee had objected to the executive action.

SSSC spokesman Peter Havers denounced the SAC decision to support what he called the "Trotskyist" Stop the Cutbacks Committee.

Havers was reacting to another part of the executive motion stating SAC welcomed the formation of a Stop the Cutbacks Committee at yesterday's general student meeting on the fees strike and the cutbacks.

The SSSC, Havers said, has decided to withdraw support from the Stop the Cutbacks Committee which he said "ridiculed" the SSSC position that the committee should be named the Stop the Surcharge — Stop the Cutbacks Committee.

Havers said SAC can't fund the committee "in any form in any method". He maintained that supporting another demonstration "would only waste the students' money on a useless cause".

Helliwell said the executive had agreed to help organize a Friday meeting of the new cutbacks committee and fund further actions up to $500.

Last fall, a similar committee was set up when SAC refused to support the November 21 Queen's Park demonstration called by the Ontario Federation of Students.

Havers said the SSSC had tried to find unity with the other groups but could not. He stated that the university and the provincial governments are both enemies.

The Governing Council has the power to set fees and Havers said that the U of T should have refused to implement the fee increase and cutback in other areas. "There's enough graft going on at this university," he claimed.

It appears that the SSSC still intends to oppose SAC in a disruptive manner. Havers charged that SAC could not continue to meet until it agreed to the GSU position that a trust fund is an alternative to individual withholding of fees.

Havers claimed the SSSC trust fund was the only way to make the withholding action stress "student solidarity".

He said any student can join and 10 per cent of the membership can call a general meeting at any time. He added there had been three meetings of the members of the trust fund advertised publicly, but closed to members.

Helliwell said that the trust fund "locks students in". It contains a clause requiring 50 per cent of the membership to agree before funds can be released from it.

"It serves no useful purpose," he continued, but apparently students in the fund can have their money released if the three SSSC signing officers agree. The signing officers are Peter Havers, Denise Havers, and Rhonda Fleming.

Havers claimed the "beauty" of the trust fund is that it does not include the $100 fee increase. He said the SSSC will not pay the $100 no matter what the university threatens in disciplinary action.

U of T rehires laid off workers

The immediate grievance of 11 laid off workers was solved Monday when weekend snowfall led to their recall, but the issues surrounding the layoffs are still not clear.

A demonstration called Monday by the Service Employees' International Union Local 204 was called off by the local's business agent, Don Barclay, after he learned of the recall, but a small group of militants demonstrated against future layoffs and contracting out of work.

Calling themselves the U of T Workers' Committee Against Layoffs, 10 of the 11 previously laid off workers and supporters also demonstrated at noon yesterday, outside the U of T personnel office at 215 Huron Street and claimed that they had effectively prevented entry to the building for 30 minutes.

Although the local's resolution at its Saturday meeting had called simply for a demonstration against the layoffs of 11 grounds crew workers, Barclay maintained that the union's main grievance was its contention that the university had violated its contract with the local. Instead of laying off 11 from one division of the university's service workers, Barclay contended that the 11 workers with the least seniority from across the university should have been laid off.

However, Barclay told The Varsity before noon, and the workers who came to demonstrate at noon, according to the committee, that the workers had been rehired and the grievance won.

However, although the workers had been rehired, the university had not yet met that day with the union to discuss the grievances about seniority.

About nine workers who came to the demonstration, and members of the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee, who claim to have been invited by some workers, complained that Barclay had unilaterally called off a demonstration the local had demanded while the grievance had not been settled.

Citing a letter from the university one worker had brought stating that the 11 workers had been rehired "because of the snow removal work now available," SSSC chairman Peter Havers accused Barclay of lying, said Havers last night, because he said the grievance had been settled.

According to grounds crew worker Clyde Brown, Havers called Barclay a "... a liar leading the people".

Both Brown and Haver claim that Barclay lost his temper and hit Havers, after which a short altercation developed.

Barclay was not available last night to give his version of the story.

The demonstration continued, committee members said, against further layoffs feared because of budget cuts, and contracting out of work. The committee maintains that there is sufficient work to be done, and it is protesting that jobs are contracted out to commercial firms, as in the case of tree pruning.

The committee intends to demonstrate every day at noon outside the personnel office until their demands are granted, which Brown said means that no layoffs and contracting out must be guaranteed.

According to U of T labour relations manager John Parker last night, the university will in future guarantee that a similar situation in regard to temporary layoffs will not recur.

Although he termed it simply "an unfortunate experience", Parker said the dispute was "necessary to jolt the university into understanding what it had in terms of a contract".

He said the university would not guarantee that temporary layoffs would not be made in reverse order of seniority across the university, but it would give "as much notice as possible" of temporary layoffs instead of the given minimum of five days. Parker said a letter to the union also guarantees that a worker to be laid off could see an employment counsellor within U of T to see if a suitable job could be found which would replace a worker with less seniority.

Victoria U is silent on development plans

By LANNY COOKE

Victoria University is considering developing some of its property commercially, but college officials are tight-lipped about their plans. Chairman of the property sub-committee H.J. Sissons admitted yesterday that the committee is considering a development at the eastern end of the campus, in an area bordered by Charles, St. Thomas, and Sultan Streets. He added that proposals are not yet in definitive form.

Administrative Council is "adamantly opposed" to development in this area, according to educational commissioner Rick Gregory.

Last year VUSAC supported students who effectively fought a proposal to use some Vic land for a commercial parking lot. Gregory claims that many facilities would be threatened by new proposals, if, as he suspects, land from St. Thomas is leased over to a playing field on the north side of Charles Street. Low cost housing and a field house would be destroyed, he says, an underground garage would prevent the construction of a hockey rink and Charles Street might have to be widened due to the increased traffic flow.

"The college is broke and they need the money," he admitted. By developing property the college hopes to generate $200,000, according to Gregory. He complained that VUSAC could get little information on the project.

Sissons explained that a steering committee has been set up to deal with the financial plight of Victoria University. "It deals with the overall financial picture, including possible revenue from non-academic real-estate holdings."

A report on development was to be made at a Board of Regents meeting two weeks ago, but the meeting was preoccupied with other matters. Since then, officials have released no further details.

When questioned about the development Victoria president

Goldwin French refused to comment. Bursar F.C. Stokes had little to add except that, "No action has been taken."

And Victoria University steering committee chairman Don McGibbon would only say, "Study is under way. I have no idea when it will be ready."

Sissons said that the property sub-committee is now considering various alternative approaches to development, but said he could not reveal them now.

Fees meeting called

A committee set up during yesterday's open meeting has decided to call for a public meeting Friday to discuss further action in support of the fees strike.

Meeting in an adjoining lobby to the Medical Sciences Auditorium, where the SAC sponsored meeting had taken place, the committee decided that the objective the larger meeting should be to push for broader goals than reversing the fees increases faced by students.

Some students suggested that the committee make specific demands about the $15 late penalty, but most people considered this secondary, saying that the committee should simply urge students to ignore this threat.

Other tactics which will be considered at the Friday meeting include organizing a February demonstration which is already being called for by students at York, Brock and Trent Universities.

The committee, which included members of several political groups, including the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee (SSSC), the Old Mole, Students for a Democratic Society and the Young Socialists, and unaffiliated individuals including SAC vice-president John Helliwell, also decided to call itself the Stop-the-Cutbacks Committee, an ad hoc U of T group that organized for the November demonstration.

It was decided that publicity would be built up around the slogans "Stop the Cutbacks" and "Support the fees Strike".

The committee will undertake to contact college student councils and also to appeal to organizations representing non-students who are also affected by the increasingly restricted access to higher education. Efforts will be made to get support from the U of T locals of CUPE for the positions of the committee.

There was some disagreement on the relationship of the committee to SAC, but it was decided to act as an independent body, while still trying to pressure SAC into supporting the committee.

OFS action criticized

By LINDA McQUAIG

A mass meeting called by SAC to discuss the future of the fees strike, ended in general agreement that universal access to post-secondary education, not the $100 tuition fee hikes, should be the focus of student protest.

Most of the campaign organized by the Ontario Federation of Students over the last few months against the provincial government's cutbacks in educational spending has focused on the $100 hike.

Gus Richardson, a member of the History Students Union, said at the meeting that the real issue was the changes in student aid regulations which make it even more difficult for low-income students to attend university.

The new regulations force students receiving aid from the government to repay a larger proportion of this assistance than they had to previously. Under the new system, no student receives a non-repayable grant, until he or she has received at least $800 which must be repaid after graduation. Last year the loan ceiling was $600.

The meeting, which attracted only 200 students and two administrators was called so that SAC could hear from students before voting last night on whether or not to continue to urge them to withhold their second instalment fees, which have been due since January 15.

The university has announced plans to enforce the $15 late penalty for any instalments not paid by tomorrow, February 1.

Political science student Marko Botcun said that accessibility to universities was the real issue and protest should be arranged around this.

"We should be going down to the Italian neighbourhoods in Toronto and trying to organize them to fight for equal access," he said.

During the meeting, an independent committee was set up to organize a more effective and broadly-based protest.

The committee, created in the dying moments of the meeting before a class took over the Medical Sciences Auditorium, came in response to charges that SAC has been ineffectual in organizing the strike.

"You did nothing to promote the strike on campus, then you assumed no one was interested," shouted former vice-president Phil Dack to a round of applause.

Richardson described SAC's role in the strike as "mythical."

SAC vice-president John Helliwell, who chaired the meeting, conceded that "SAC hasn't done that much."

OFS general coordinator Craig Heron said the cutbacks are only the beginning of a trend which the provincial government is planning to introduce.

He predicted a rise in the loan ceiling to $1,000 as part of the government's attempt to "dismantle the education industry they built up in the 60's."

Peter Havers, chairman of the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee, which has disrupted two SAC meetings in the past three weeks to protest SAC's inaction, pleaded for students to pay their fees into a special trust fund his committee has set up.

He refused to disclose how many had paid into the fund so far, but admitted, "It's not enough to win."

Havers also said his committee will stop disrupting SAC meetings only when SAC lives up to its responsibilities to the students.

Lawyers' action questioned after Windlass deferral

Garbage litters site of "Grange Village", an apartment project proposed by Windlass Holdings.

Less than honourable conduct on the part of the lawyers acting for Windlass Holdings is suspected following an unusual turn of events at Monday night's meeting of the Buildings and Development Committee.

The committee was to consider the repeal of the bylaw allowing Windlass to build three apartment towers on McCaul Street, but late in the afternoon, the City Clerk received a letter from Weir and Foulds lawyers for Windlass, asking for a deferral.

The committee eventually yielded to the request. When it was obvious the request would pass, Alderman Ying Hope, chairman of the committee, admitted the members had been "tricked into deferral."

"As usual, we are being slighted by the developer," he said bitterly.

The letter, from Weir personally, claimed that he did not know far enough in advance that Windlass would be discussed at the meeting and that the tremendous amount of information involved in preparing a deputation prevented his firm from being ready in time.

Yesterday, Hope told The Varsity that even though Weir himself was out of town, his firm knew the matter would be discussed well in advance, and could have easily prepared a deputation.

At the meeting, Hope called on the large audience to "take courage to come in two weeks" when the matter is now due to be discussed.

The matter is further confused by the unexplained cancellation of the Ontario Municipal Board hearings on the project, originally scheduled to begin next Tuesday. If City Council wanted to repeal the bylaw it had to do so before the OMB hearings began. But one reason why committee members were willing to defer the matter is that the hearings appear to have been postponed indefinitely.

Hope would not tell The Varsity who was responsible for the OMB move, or how it was done, but did say it was "pulled off by our side", meaning opponents of the development.

Even Ward 6 alderman Dan Heap, not a committee member, but who has worked closely with citizens who oppose the project, expressed surprise Monday night upon learning that the hearings were postponed.

Ward 6 alderman William Archer introduced the motion to defer and it quickly gathered support.

John Sewell, originally opposed to the idea, changed his mind, and the vote was unanimous. Archie Chisholm said he suspected the developers' lawyers were not acting honourably, but added that the committee could not make a judgment and would have to accept Weir's word.

There are several theories on why Windlass felt it would be advantageous to have the matter deferred. Absent from the committee meeting were Fred Beavis and Paul Pickett, who have in the past consistently voted in favour of developments.

A motion to recommend repeal of the bylaw allowing another controversial development, Quebec-Gothic, was carried by a 5-4 vote later in the same meeting, and a similar motion on Windlass seemed likely to pass by the same margin.

Hope told The Varsity that it is "possible" that the lawyers had a deputation prepared, but knew that Beavis and Pickett would not be there.

He told the meeting that "Windlass is after more votes and they can't get them tonight."

A more elaborate theory of Windlass' actions takes into account the fact that there are two other developments which could be repealed — Quebec-Gothic and West St. James Town.

Hope and other aldermen believe that that the bylaw allowing Windlass would be the easiest of the three to repeal. Hope's case in the event of lawsuits would be the weakest of the three in the Windlass case, says Hope, because Windlass is the "cleanest cut" — there are no complicated agreements with the city.

The bylaw is an amendment to the Official Plan extending the city core to McCaul street from University Avenue so that Windlass could build at a higher density. Hope called it an "unconscionable" move designed solely to accommodate the developer. This would make the city's case against the project stronger, he said.

In this case, it is possible that the developers of Quebec-Gothic — Cadillac and Greenwin — and the developers of West St. James Town, — Meridian —, pressured Windlass into seeking the deferral so that the weaker cases (from the city's viewpoint) would be considered first, possibly setting precedents. The alternative would have been to let a repeal of Windlass set the precedent.

Heap called Windlass "small potatoes" compared with the other three developers.

Windlass would have "set the whole thing in motion", said Hope. Hope said he "didn't know" if the other developers had anything to do with Monday's deferral request.

The committee also deferred the matter of West St. James Town, because it was past 1 am when the discussion of Quebec-Gothic was finished.

Drapeau finds new white elephant

Montréal's showman mayor Jean Drapeau is up to his old tricks again with ambitious plans for the 1976 Summer Olympics extravaganza.

Drapeau, who never seems to find time to deal with more plebian, less colourful problems like housing for his city's impoverished, is set to host the 1976 version of the sports world's gladiatorial battles. To allay federal government fears that the effervescent mayor may again get the senior government into the bind of bailing out his expensive adventure, Drapeau has dreamed up all kinds of money-making projects to finance the games. All Montréal needs, he's telling the nation, is federal government co-operation in authorizing his schemes.

Montréal plans on paying the Olympics' tab by selling Olympic coins, national lottery tickets and special postage stamps.

Ottawa isn't biting just yet — although Trudeau is weakening a little under the constant barrage of Drapeau's public relation campaign. The Ottawa politicians remember Drapeau's 1967 World Fair all too well, and the enormous debit from it that Ottawa had to pay off.

There's little reason to suspect that Drapeau's 1976 plans will work out any better than his 1967 caper. By giving in to Drapeau's hard sell, Ottawa would be opening the door to all kinds of financial headaches: headaches from which the weak Quebec government may be unable to bail it out.

(The provincial government has offered to kick in up to $10 million to help cover any deficit the games incur. But, even the federal government is smart enough to figure out that Drapeau's spree will likely lose much more than that. One Ottawa estimate, according to the '76 Summer Olympics commissioner-general, has the loss going as high as $100 million.)

Montréal has a lot of things that need doing before it begins to contemplate wasting a fortune on staging another glamour show. The city boasts the worst tenements north of the American border, a drinking supply daily polluted by untreated water, and one of the lowest standards of living in the country.

And moreover, the federal government shouldn't be stepping in to help out with publicity-seeking schemes which won't do anything to help the people of Montréal or Canada, and will siphon off taxpayers' money despite widespread disagreement about Montréal hosting the games.

The Olympics will, however, benefit some Montrealeers, the ones who need it least: the construction and tourist-based industries. These are the very people who have gotten rich off the poor planning, high cost Drapeau schemes of the past — projects which have been funded instead of the long overdue social reforms Montreal is lacking.

Revenue-generating projects like those Drapeau has up his sleeve should be reserved for worthwhile social projects and not the aggrandizement of a petty politician's ego.

"Jubilant" was the word used to describe Le Duc Tho at his press conference in Paris discussing the agreements. "The conclusion of such an agreement," he said, "represents a very big victory for the Vietnamese people. It is the crowning of a valiant struggle waged in unity by the army and the people of Vietnam on all fronts, at the price of countless sacrifices and privations."

He went on to speak of the accords as a big victory of the peoples of the three countries of Indochina, of the socialist countries, of the oppressed people, and of "all the peace-loving and justice-loving peoples throughout the world, including the American people, who have demonstrated their solidarity and given devoted assistance to the just struggles of our people".

Jubilant also should be all those throughout the world who in one small way or another contributed to a struggle to defeat the U.S. aggressor in its war against the Vietnamese people, finally resulting in an agreement in which all the military personnel and equipment of the U.S. is to be removed from Vietnam within 60 days.

The statement by the Vietnamese negotiator that the agreements as signed were in essentials no different from those negotiated in October indicates that the U.S. effort at using saturation bombing in December had no effect on Vietnamese morale and their refusal to stop short of an agreement which would ensure the withdrawal of U.S. forces and gain the ability of the Vietnamese people to determine for themselves how they will live.

Massive as it was the bombing failed to force North Vietnam and the PRG into an agreement on U.S. terms for the same reasons that this tiny nation has been able to drive out the forces of the strongest imperialist power in history; the steadfastness of the Vietnamese people themselves; skillful use of sophisticated and plentiful weaponry (in the December blitz, U.S. planes were shot down by MIGs and missiles at a rate which would have meant the destruction of the entire B-52 force within three months); relentless and increasing public pressure within the U.S. and throughout the world. We should not forget that it was pressure of Canadians upon Ottawa for public statements that led to the unanimous House of Commons resolution concerning the renewed bombing. Coming as it did from one of the U.S.'s nearest neighbours, it is not surprising that the resolution received top news coverage in the U.S. or that MP Andrew Brewin was told in Hanoi that the Vietnamese considered it a factor in ending the bombing.

There are those who argue, like George Bain in the Globe and Mail, that we are back to 1954, that the Paris agreements have only reiterated the Geneva accords. What a narrow view of the last 18 years! For one thing, socialism has been built and maintained in North Vietnam since then. Does it mean nothing to Bain and others that down-grade the Paris agreements, that they represent the end of an era in which corrupt, reactionary, puppet governments in Saigon can rest upon the military force of a foreign imperialist power? What a difference exists between a cease-fire with all forces in place and the decision in 1954 that moved troops north and south of the 17th parallel. Indeed, what about the difference between up to 10,000 so-called peace-keeping troops once proposed by the U.S. and the agreed figure of 1,160 observers?

Of course, no one expects the reactionary government of Thieu and the PRG to become the best of friends. Struggle of some form (peaceful or otherwise) will continue between the PRG, which has always held most of the land in South Vietnam and commands the loyalty of the people, and Thieu, whose army is made up of unwilling conscripts, incompetents, and cowards. But, if Thieu attempts to affect a return to 1954 by sabotaging free elections and starting to battle, who will bail him out when, as in the past, his troops desert or refuse to fight?

The liberation fighters of Vietnam constantly reiterated that first and foremost was the removal of U.S. forces from Vietnam. We will supply the red carpet and the brass bands, said Ho Chi Minh on more than one occasion, adding that they would even be glad to help the U.S. save face, but go they must, and this determination has been central to their strategy through all these long and arduous years.

As Le Duc Tho put it, however, "With the return of peace the struggle of the Vietnamese people enters a new period. . . . But the Vietnamese in the North, as in the South, at home and abroad, rich in their traditions of unity and perseverance in struggle, following a just policy, strengthened by the close solidarity of the peoples of Laos and Cambodia, and benefiting from strong aid from the Socialist countries and all the peace-loving countries of the world, will be able to smooth out all difficulties and victoriously accomplish their tasks."

These people do not deserve the mindless rantings of sections of the left in the U.S. and Canada which denounce the agreement as a sell-out and presume to decide for the Vietnamese what should be their strategy and their tactics. These left groups seem to stand in such awe of U.S. imperialism that they cannot imagine that it is possible to inflict a defeat upon it.

There are two aspects to the line of those who would not join in the world-wide demand on Nixon to sign the treaty, although the Vietnamese had called on all peace activists to do so. The first, and most obvious, is their usual anti-communism, their unsupported statements that it was the Soviet Union and China who had pressured the Vietnamese to accept any agreement and who had withheld needed aid. At no time has anything been produced to back up these statements, and everything said by the Vietnamese contradicts this position. Brezhnev has said that normalization of relations between his country and the USA could only continue if the U.S. signed the peace treaty whose terms represent a victory for the Vietnamese. If the written and oral views of the Vietnamese are not sufficient proof that far from being pressured to sign an unwanted agreement by the socialist countries, they were materially as well as morally assisted by them, surely the display of fire-power this last month was a powerful reminder to friend and foe alike that Vietnam did not lack support. Foreign observers agreed that the air defence was the most effective in the history of aerial warfare.

However, beyond this usual anti-communist verbiage, there is another difference between those critics on the left and the Vietnamese, and this is about the exact stage of the development of the struggle in Vietnam. They put forward the view that the stage of struggle has been of the workers and peasants versus landlords and capitalists for socialism; hence, any end of the fighting before actually attaining socialism is seen as a defeat. The Vietnamese, however, see the struggle as one of national liberation, a fight against U.S. imperialism and their puppet administration, in which the unity of all anti-imperialist forces, including sections of the capitalists and landlords, is the basis of political action. It is this sort of alliance which is reflected in the Provisional Revolutionary Government.

The signing of the agreement which removes U.S. military support from the Thieu regime was seen by the Vietnamese as a precondition for the next stage of the struggle. As Tho put it in Paris, "We must say that the situation in our country and in the world is developing in an extremely favourable way for the cause of the Vietnamese people." Tho, of course, is himself a socialist with a history of over 40 years of dedicated service to the cause of bringing socialism to his nation. He sees no contradiction between a struggle for national self-determination and for socialism in Vietnam. But this does not prevent him from seeing that socialism and national liberation are not identical. The struggle for socialism can now be won, given the conditions provided by the treaty. Concerning the treaty, Tho said, "We have the conviction that the dark designs of the reactionary forces in the country and abroad to obstruct the application of the agreement, or to sabotage it, can only fail." Those truly concerned about solidarity with the people of Vietnam should not allow themselves to become even unconscious allies of reaction by their denunciation of the agreement.

The whole question would be academic if the Canadian peace movement had nothing to do now but reminisce. But, there is much yet to be done and faulty analysis of the present situation in Vietnam can only do harm.

In addition to keeping up pressure that the 60 day pull-out by the Americans does in fact take place, a watchful eye must be kept on the Canadian observers to ensure that they do not become tools of the U.S. State Department, as in Canada's disreputable role in the International Control Commission. The Canadian observers' reports must be carefully scrutinized.

Article nine calls for the return of Vietnamese civilian prisoners on negotiation by the two South Vietnamese parties. With somewhere between 200,000 and 300,000 prisoners in Thieu's jails, their release becomes an issue of international concern. Already in Canada there is a branch of the International Committee to Free South Vietnamese Political Prisoners from Detention, Torture, and Death. Also the Ad Hoc Committee of concerned Canadians who organized the delegation to Ottawa on January 3 have sent messages to the Canadian government and the United Nations calling for action to ensure that there is no massacre by Thieu of these prisoners.

The agreement recognizes that Vietnam is one country. It does not designate a single governing unit for South Vietnam. Is it not time for Canada at least to develop full diplomatic relations with the Democratic Republic of Vietnam?

Finally, the U.S. has agreed to give massive assistance to the reconstruction of North and South Vietnam. As a country which, through arms sales, has materially benefited from the war and contributed to the pain and suffering inflicted by arms made here, surely there is an onus on Canada also to offer material assistance in rebuilding this war-torn land.

Canadian people in increasing numbers have been showing solidarity with the Vietnamese and this must continue. No reactionary force will be able to slow down the forward march of the Vietnamese people, and their victory is a sign to peoples all over the world that imperialism can be defeated.

An ear to the air waves: the story of surveillance

By ROBERT YAFFEE
reprinted from the chevron

Priority considerations of national defence, national security, and domestic law enforcement have been used to justify support of secret research into the areas of total surveillance and total control.

Several kinds of surveillance and control techniques may constitute a threat to, or violation of, fundamental freedoms provided for in the Canadian Bill of Rights. If telephonic wiretapping, telephonic eavesdropping, non-telephonic eavesdropping, and electronic biological control were to be used arbitrarily and inequitably, substantive rights of responsible free speech, press, and assembly contained in the Bill would be eroded away or effectively eliminated. In that instance, basic guarantees against unreasonable searches and seizures, cruel and unusual punishment or treatment, as well as equal protection of the law would be flagrantly deprived of effect.

And, if any of these techniques were used illegally to obtain information, resulting in such effects, the clause which maintains that none of these rights may be withheld or infringed, unless by due process of law, is also violated.

Modes of surveillance

The nature and design of surveillance systems allows for a tripartite classification, based on wire connection and transmitter location. According to John E. Cunningham, author of the book, Security Electronics, such surveillance may be categorized as follows: 1) "hidden microphones connected with wires," 2) "hidden radio transmitters," 3) "wiretapping of telephones."

In the first of these groups, there are a multitude of small and miniature microphones. For the most part, they are to be concealed within the area of immediate audio pick-up. Included in this group is also the "spike-mike", a microphone attached to a spike. The spike is driven into the wall of the room or house under surveillance. Vocal vibrations of the person or persons speaking are conveyed from the air to the wall, and from the wall to the spike. The vibrations, having been conducted to the spike, are, in turn, transferred to the microphone where they are converted to oscillations of electrical current flowing through the connected wires to an amplifier and then to a tape recorder. These devices must be at or in the room or rooms under scrutiny.

Concealed radio transmitters are also sometimes within the immediate area of scrutiny also. With recent discoveries and developments in microminiature electronics, such as integrated circuits and solid state design, these marvelous little toys have been reduced in size such that they may be installed in the stirring stick of a cocktail, in the buffons of a suit, in the cuff links or tie clasps of a jewelry assortment.

The less minuscule of these intricate curiosities are usually installed near a power source — such as a lamp, light-socket, radio or television. Their size necessarily imposes some limitation on their amplification potential, for which reason they are generally characterized by short-range — approximately from 300 feet to one mile. Most of them are frequency modulated to reduce static and noise difficulties. Because they cannot have long antenna, more often than not, they operate between the frequencies of 60 to 112 mhz, a band which is eagerly monitored by your friendly government agencies using equipment of wondrous sensitivity. To preserve the baffles or the tape on the recorder reels, these gadgets may employ a voice-operated relay, set to turn on the equipment at the sound of someone speaking.

Means of wiretapping telephones comprise the third group. Strictly construed, wiretapping signifies a physical connection of outside wires to an internal telephone circuit. There are three ways by which such intrusion may be accomplished. First, there may be a connection of outside phone lines to wires leading to an amplifier, tape recorder, and headset. Second, it is possible to install a "harmonic bug", which transforms the telephone handset into an active microphone while the phone remains on the hook. After a particular installment and a rewiring of the telephone handset, anyone who desires to eavesdrop on the room in which the phone is located can dial the telephone number of the tampered phone, cause a 500 cycle signal to be activated within pick-up range of his own phone, and proceed to listen. That 500 cycle signal has a double effect on the rewired telephone, automatically connecting the phone and disconnecting its bell, before it can begin to ring. In this way, the rewired telephone is transformed into an eavesdropping device. And third, there is the possibility of installing in the telephone handset a tiny radio transmitter capable of transmitting, whether or not the phone is on the hook. All of these three ways of wiretapping involve tampering with the telephone circuits.

There are ways of eavesdropping on telephone communications, however, that do not necessitate such tampering. Knowledge of two of these means is no secret. One technique utilizes the attachment of a suction cup to a microphone, with leads running to a tape recorder. The suction cup microphone is merely affixed to the handset of the telephone. Another technique utilizes an induction coil, which is nothing more than a wire wound around the telephone lines at a convenient point with no physical contact necessary. The leads connect to the input of an audio amplifier, which, in turn, is connected to a tape recorder and headset. Whereas these techniques are not wiretapping, their effect is the same as that of wiretapping. In either case, there is interception of the telephone communication.

Perhaps the most interesting means of eavesdropping is that of remote sensing. Equipment employed for these purposes may be simple or complex. Frequently, means of remote sensing may be difficult to detect and locate, insofar as detection and direction-finding may require the use of expensive and sophisticated apparatus. Remote sensing may be accomplished by acoustical or electronic means, as well as by a combination of them. An acoustical device is a highly directional microphone, consisting of a parabolic reflector which focuses sound sensitivity into a narrow beam. It may be used at a distance of 100 feet to pick up conversations in a room of a building across a busy street. It has a range of approximately 100 to 300 feet, varying in accordance with the amount of intervening environmental noise.

The electronic devices used for remote sensing are generally a form of a radar. Although short-wave may be used, the general procedure utilizes the higher frequencies. If microwave is used, the system may be based on maser (microwave amplification by stimulated emission or radiation) operations. If infrared frequencies are used, the system may generally employ an iraser (an infrared laser-light amplification by stimulated emission or radiation). It follows that if light is used, the sensing system may employ a laser. Acting as a radar system, the device detects the amount of vibration in a window pane, resulting from conversations in the room. A beam of radiation is directed at the pane and reflected from it. The changes in distance between the surface of the window and the laser are detected, thereby converting the vibrations of the conversation into changes in electrical current, which is then amplified. A speaker reconverts the electrical changes to vibrations of air; the reproduced sound is the reproduced conversation, which may be tape recorded.

In fact, at Fort Holbrid, Maryland, the United States Army is alleged to have assembled a massive data bank, complete with dossiers on all persons with criminal records or political affiliations. What is sometimes considered elegant about remote sensing is the combined lack of physical intrusion and lack of juxtaposition of physical equipment.

Bio-electronics and remote control

The biological effects of radio frequency electromagnetic energy are not unknown to scientists in the esoteric field of bio-electronics. Some of the information managed to find its way into print. As long ago as May 4, 1959, in "Aviation Week and Space Technology", an experiment at the National Institute of Health in Bethesda, Maryland, U.S.A. was reported. A monkey had been placed in a resonant cage, into which an antenna was fed approximately 100 watts of power on a very high frequency. According to Dr. Peirce Bailey, who observed the effects, the animal lapsed into convulsions, and within five minutes, was dead. Bailey proffered the suggestion that otherwise inexplicable airplane accidents might result from careless radio frequency energy propagation. More recently, syndicated columnist Jack Anderson wrote an article entitled, "Laser Snoops a Threat to Health," in which he sought to bring to the public attention some of the adverse effects of the careless use of certain electronic surveillance devices. Anderson wrote:

"The lasers, microwaves, and infrared beams can cause cataracts and other long-range injuries to people they strike. Thus the electronic smog created by surveillance equipment may be ruining the eyes of spies, Communist diplomats, and innocent citizens who just happen to be in or near the rooms where the hazardous rays are unleashed.

"It seems that although the United States Government had been aware for some time of the adverse biological effects of certain frequencies, power levels, concentrations, and proximities of electromagnetic energy, equipment capable of producing adverse biological effects may nonetheless be in current use."

If it is claimed that advances in technical knowledge permit more precise use of laser and similar surveillance and control technology, this claim cannot be denied. To be sure, recent refinements permit pinpoint accuracy in aiming these devices, some of which are alleged to be capable of heating to a boil a pot of coffee at a distance of 1000 miles. As the plane approaches its target, a laser beam is trained onto it, heating a spot in the metal. An infrared heat-seeking rocket or "smart" bomb is then zeroed in on the hot spot, with perfect accuracy. But, accuracy of aiming from or to moving targets is not the only improvement of this kind of technology.

A more specific biological explanation of the 66 kinds of changes that may be effected within the organism may be found in the book authored by Dr. Harald Thom, — Introduction to Shortwave and Microwave Therapy. Thom has it that the irradiation of the biological organism results in high temperatures in the area of focus; this effect is called hyperthermia. In moderate doses, it usually causes no difficulty. In fact, it is often beneficial. But, in more heavy than moderate doses, the biological effects can be harmful. Some of the noted effects of such hyperthermia are that it kills flies, inhibits tumour development, produces changes in the blood sugar as well as in the food counts. It has been noticed that irradiation of the web of a frog up to a point produces a dilation of the blood vessels; beyond that point of power concentration, vasoconstriction is effected. In addition to causing changes in the pulse frequency and blood pressure, doses of radio frequency energy have been observed to cause wild temperature imbalances in rabbits. These are only some of the affects that may be produced and that are known to specialists in bio-electronics.

They are also interested in the subject of remote conditioning and control of animals or humans. Dr. Jose M.R. Delgado of Yale University Medical School had recently published a work, which he designates, Physical Control of the Mind — Toward a Psychocivilized Society. On the basis of studies in which brains were mapped for the effects produced by a small electrical stimulus, Delgado began experimenting on animals with a view toward learning about such things as "activation of the will", production of "sensory deprivation of the adult mind", in addition to the production of "heaven and hell within the brain" as a means of conditioning or control.

Delgado implanted electrodes in the brains of his experimental subjects and attached a receiver-stimulator on each subject to the electrodes. With a radio transmitter, he triggered the receiver-stimulator, which he called a stimociver, which in turn sent the appropriate impulses into the brains of his subjects. More sophisticated approaches might use beams of concentrations of radio frequency energy focused on the brains of subjects equipped with stimocivers. Possible effects could be injurious or lethal. This kind of remote electronic stimulation of the brain is believed to have been used both in the United States and Canada.

Unprofessional meddling and political repression

Anyone of good faith and good will might be reasonably disposed to object that the threat to and the violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms of the kinds being considered does not really exist, for few persons of authority would stoop to such heinous activities. But, a glance at the American scene could indicate that precautionary safety is preferable to dilatory sorrow. If Hala Boggs, Congressman from Louisiana, was impelled to stand up and deliver a speech in Congress on how the FBI was harassing him with wiretapping and if Cornelius Gallagher, Congressman from New Jersey, was moved to complaining in Congress of an FBI sub rosa effort to ruin his career and marriage on the basis of trumped up charges, it may not be unreasonable to consider the validity of the disclosure that Pershing Garvais, in connection with the FBI, was said to have falsely testified against Jim Garrison, New Orleans district attorney. While nothing is conclusively proved in regard to these cases, there is sufficient indication that it might be worthwhile to take precautions against abuses of power.

That is to say, legal provision and administrative machinery of hearing and appeal should be established whereby a person or group of persons to whom injustice is being administered under the cloak of secrecy can turn with hope of just and adequate redress of grievance. Influences including not only mere social and psychological pressures but also electronically induced bio-physical sanctions are examples of abuses of political power that cannot legitimately or constitutionally occur in a democratic political system. The invocation of such influences is categorically totalitarian.

A Canadian perspective

There are several Members of Parliament in Canada who believe that there are reasons for instituting safeguards of precious rights. They claim that there is need for the specific protection of these rights. To wit, there is a need for the protection of privacy, for a protection of freedom of speech, for the protection against unreasonable searches and seizures, for equal protection of the law, and for the due process of law. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) on May 2, 1972, mentioned the allegations of an alderman that the city jail of Saskatoon had its phone wiretapped by the police, with the result that when a person who was placed there proceeded to call a friend or a lawyer, the police were able to overhear the conversation. And, John Gilbert (Broadview) mentioned the case of the Redpath Sugar Company of Toronto. That company had allegedly hired a firm known for its "union busting" activities. After the disclosure that a member of the Toronto police force had aided and abetted the firm in its eavesdropping endeavor, reason for concern arose. In the words of Gilbert, "... this indicates that we have reached a serious state." If this situation is generally that of modern democracy, it is to be concluded that adequate protection against capricious and unjust infringement of the above-mentioned rights should be provided for in any society that is structured on ordered liberty.

In the event that the general factual situation in Canada is as serious as Gilbert and Orlikow seem to think, the present legal structure may be inadequate to the task of safeguarding and upholding fundamental human and civil rights, particularly in regard to the issues of surveillance and control. As regards the matter of surveillance, there is a general, not an absolute, prohibition against wiretapping. Furnished with a warrant to do so, police are permitted to wiretap, and they are free to reveal relevant informational evidence so obtained in a court of law. The warrant, obtainable from the chief of police, must be based on reasonable and probable cause for the belief that a crime has been or is about to be committed.

There is no legal rule rendering illegally obtained evidence inadmissible in court. With the only current deterrent from invalidating their case in Canada being the possibility of having to pay the costs of the defendant, the police may illegally obtain evidence. Inasmuch as they do, the government and the courts partly participate in breaking the law, which they are bound to obey and uphold. In consequence, such activities detract from the development of respect for and maintenance of the law.

The Ontario Telephons Act of 1960 makes an indictable offense out of eavesdropping on or divulging of telephone messages. The problem with the law is that it provides such negligible penalties for its violation that its real deterrent effect is subject to doubt. As a result, there is neither greatly effective guarantee of freedom from wiretapping in Canadian society today, nor is there much of any effective legal prohibition against the other kinds of electronic surveillance at the present time.

A proposal for a right to privacy

The Protection of Privacy Act that was under consideration by the Justice Committee of the House of Commons during its last session was a commendably constructive legislative proposal to remedy major problems deriving from the effects of technological advance in the field of surveillance and control techniques. Fundamentally, the bill attempts to fill the legal lacunae regarding non-wiretapping surveillance, by concentrating on the theme of establishing and safeguarding the right of privacy.

As Minister of Justice Otto Lang stated, "Privacy must mean the right to be alone, to live one's life with a minimum of interference... Each individual requires individual privacy to nourish his individual creativity, to preserve his personality balance, and develop his individuality."

Toward this end, the act renders the illegal (without a warrant) interception — whether by electromagnetic, acoustic, mechanical, or other devices — of private communication and/or the divulgence of such communication, when unlawfully intercepted an indictable offense. What was not covered by legal prohibition before — that is, almost all general surveillance involving remote sensing — is now made an offense.

Only the most advanced techniques are not necessarily covered by this legislation. Unlike the Telephone Act of 1960, the proposed legislation has effective deterrent sanction. It furthermore creates an offense for anyone, not properly authorized, "to possess, sell, or purchase any devices or components of them primarily" designed for such illegal interception. This provision should contain an element of demonstrated intent to commit an act above-proscribed.

In applying these strictures to both the citizenry and the Crown, the Act proceeds partly to implement the effect of the exclusionary rule without enacting that rule of evidence. Itself, the outcome probably being increased respect for and co-operation with the law as well as increased faith in and loyalty to the Government. Moreover, the legislation provides for a transfer of the power to grant an authorization from the chief of police to the county judges. In effect, the granting of authorization is placed into the hands of a third or impartial authority, rather than one with a vested interest, assuring greater objectivity in the assessment of need and propriety. Still, emergency warrants are made available.

Committee votes for Quebec-Gothic repeal

Despite the risk of a successful multi-million dollar lawsuit against the city, the Buildings and Development Committee has recommended that City Council repeal the bylaw allowing the erection of the Quebec-Gothic apartment development.

The recommendation, carried by a 5-4 vote early yesterday morning will be considered at today's council meeting. If council approves the recommendation, a special council meeting February 16 would be the developers' last chance to oppose the repeal. The Ontario Municipal Board would also be asked to defer its hearings on the four high-rise tower project, due to begin next Monday.

A report by City Solicitor William Callow has warned that the city would face a "considerable" risk of a lawsuit from the developers, Cadillac Development and Greenwin Construction, if the zoning bylaw were rescinded.

The developers' lawyer, Edwin Goodman, told the committee meeting in a packed Council chamber, that the "best estimate" of his clients' "out of pocket loss" if the bylaw were repealed was 4.5 to five million dollars. The main portion of these damages, he said, would be the difference between the prices paid for the 99 houses

Cadillac-Greenwin intends to demolish, and the prices they would have to be sold for.

Goodman, who is also former national president of the Conservative Party and present co-chairman of the Committee for an Independent Canada, warned the committee not to subvert the "integrity of the planning process." But Alderman John Sewell argued that the planning process of the old council has "broken down."

"They (the developers) don't care about a planning process as long as they get what they want," he exclaimed.

The bylaw allowing the high-rises on Quebec and Gothic Avenues in the High Park area was passed by city council in 1971, over strong objections from area residents. However, the election of a new "reform" council has raised hopes that the project may still be stopped before it goes before the OMB.

Ward 1 alderman Elizabeth Eayrs, who was elected largely because of her opposition to the development and former alderman Ben Grys' conduct in the affair, introduced the motion to recommend repeal of the bylaw. Grys failed to declare a conflict of interest, a judge later decided, when he voted in favour of the project while his wife held mortgages on two houses on Quebec Avenue.

Also voting for the motion were Sewell, Ying Hope, Archie Chisholm, and Ann Johnson. Opposing the motion were Reid Scott, Art Eggleton, William Archer, and Joseph Piccininni. Fred Beavis and Paul Pickett, whose votes would probably have reversed the result, were absent.

Eggleton and Scott had been opposed to the original bylaw but after reading Callow's report and hearing Goodman's deputation, decided that the risk to the city was too great to support the repeal.

Eggleton said that taxpayers would be faced with an "astronomical" sum of money to pay if a damages suit was successful. He added that he was prepared to appear before the OMB as a private citizen to oppose the project.

"We've gone down this road too far," lamented Scott, who is a lawyer.

But Sewell, also a lawyer, argued that the legal consequences are "probably minimal." He said that City Council is "free to make political decisions without the threat of being sued."

Citizens making deputations to the committee before Goodman spoke warned the committee not to be intimidated by any financial risk. Many argued that the risk to the environment of the city outweighs the risk of the lawsuit.

Newly elected Confederation of Residents and Ratepayers Association chairman Jim Lemon called on the new council to "set the precedent for the future in this city."

Two student governors run again

Only two of the present eight student governors say they will run for re-election on the Governing Council for 1973-74. Another four are ineligible for re-election.

Of the four undergraduates, only medical student Aron Goldberg is likely to seek his seat on U of T's top governing body again, although arts student Ian Morrison says he hasn't decided yet.

Both Paul Cadario and Brian Morgan have won Rhodes Scholarships and are thus off to Oxford next year.

Both graduate student members of council have indicated they will not run again, while one of two part-time student governors is in the race.

While citing lack of time as his reason for not running, graduate student John Morton blasted both the administration and Cadario as preventing students from being effective.

Cadario, who is Internal Affairs Committee chairman, and is often called on by the administration to represent students, has a "self-aggrandizement policy", according to Morton. The administration, he says, is trying to run the university with as little obstruction as possible; "they try to stamp everything they think students shouldn't see 'confidential'."

Graduate member Clarice Henschel, who is graduating with a Masters degree in library science, also criticized Cadario. "Paul worked as an individual, not as a student," she stated.

She felt the upcoming Governing Council term would be more important than the first and urged the representative student bodies to hire a researcher for the student caucus.

Part-time student governor Joyce Oenyer is also graduating and not running. Potential candidates for office should be attending council and committee meetings now, she felt, so that they would understand the workings of U of T government.

The other part-time student governor, Norma Grindal, says "everything has just started on the Council", and is running again.

She criticized the lack of openness on the part of other governors and administrators dealing with the council. "You really can't depend on what everybody says as being the truth," she said.

New site for 52 Division

Citizens attack police station secrecy

By LORNE SLOTNICK

Secrecy surrounds a proposed relocation of police station number 52, but residents of the Dundas-Beverly area are determined to uncover the reasons for the move and stop it.

Metro Police Division 52 currently occupies the historic Stewart Building at the corner of College Street and Queen's Park, and the Police Commission refuses to give a complete explanation of why they intend to move the station, rather than renovating the building.

Residents are concerned about the detrimental effect the station could have on their already congested area.

A meeting Sunday of about 20 people held on Darcy Street, one block north of Dundas, considered strategy for stopping the police action, but decided to first wait for a new report from the Metro Property Commission on the future of the houses acquired for the station.

All eight houses necessary for the new station have already been acquired by the Metro Property Commission which administers them for the police. The houses, on Dundas, Beverley, and Darcy Streets, had been occupied by between 80 and 100 people. Tenants have been evicted from two of the houses on Beverley and these houses are now boarded up.

The police argue that too many repairs are required to make the houses habitable. The police are evicting the tenants, even though the new building is not slated to be started for about a year and a half.

The area is also threatened by the proposed Dundas Street widening, the Windlass "Grange Village" apartment complex on McCaul Street, and a possible Canada Trust development. The existing housing shortage and danger to the Chinese community in the area will be worsened, residents feel.

Darcy Street residents at Sunday's meeting complained about harassment from city housing inspectors, up to once a month.

Ward 6 alderman Dan Heap told the meeting that he would fight for local control of housing inspectors to ensure that absentee landlords like Metro are not let off free while property owners are harassed with work orders until they are forced to sell.

Some residents accused Metro of using building inspectors to "encourage" them to sell their homes. Others said the Metro Property Commission had used threats of expropriation if residents were reluctant to sell.

Police Division 52 covers the area from the CNR tracks north of Dupont Street south to the Toronto Islands, from Spadina Avenue to Jarvis Street. A floating police station in the harbour was suggested at yesterday's meeting.

The division is noted for having the riot squad, but the police claim it will be removed from 52 division when the new building is completed. According to Heap's assistant Ron Struys, the police will not say how many people will be working at the new station, but have said that they want it to be like 14 division. (There are 325 police working out of 14 division.)

As a concession to area residents, the police have agreed to make the entrance to the new station off Dundas. However a parking lot will inundate the surrounding streets with traffic, say residents.

Heap said that police had a list of 12 sites for the new station, and picked the Dundas-Beverly location. He said that the police will not reveal the other 11 sites, probably because at least some of them are more rational. Struys said he is sure some of the sites are parking lots. Heap has talked to Inspector Marks, who is in charge of "com-

job. The police argue that moving into this neighbourhood will help control crime, but Struys says that crime in the area is "non-existent" compared with other neighbourhoods in which police have located. A petition signed by 70 people community relations" for the police.

A Property Commission report ordered by Metro Council last week considering whether the eight houses can be lived in is due next Tuesday, said Heap.

Marks told him he "couldn't understand" why the people in this area do not want the building because people in other areas welcome new stations. The police have said that one of the reasons for this location is contact with the community.

Heap said he told Marks that this area is different, because it is already too crowded. He told the meeting that people in the area must tell the police that they must have co-operation from the neighbourhood in order to do their condemns the "secret planning, secret acquisition, and needless evictions" used by the police, and yesterday's meeting considered several further courses of action.

Zoning changes were rejected because they take too long, and because police stations are allowed in almost every residential area. The area is presently zoned as residential, but the zoning also allows for institutional use.

A detailed Part 11 study is being done on the area and it is possible that the new police station will be contrary to the new study's proposals. However, the meeting was told that the study will not be completed in time to stop the station.

tion representative, a Property Commission representative, the ward aldermen, and area residents, to make suggestions about the area.

"I don't know how much power we have," he admitted.

The last resort, Heap said, is lobbying at Metro Council, which must allot the money to build the new station.

He added that police forces are now being studied by a provincial task force and they "have to be concerned about public opinion". He noted that fellow Ward 6 alderman William Archer is on the task force, and told the people to "keep pushing on him" because "Bill can do more".

Dalhousie council vetoes editor of Gazette

HALIFAX (CUP) — The Dalhousie University Student Council last Sunday overruled the staff of the student newspaper, The Dalhousie Gazette, and appointed one of their own council members, Ken McDougall, as editor of the paper for a one-year term.

The action was a violation of The Canadian University Press (CUP) Statement of Principles. The Gazette was a founding member of the 35-year-old student press organization. The staff had elected Marg Bezanson who worked on the paper for two years as editor before the council meeting. However, under the student union constitution, this election had to be ratified by the council.

Both applicants were screened by the council applications committee and it recommended Bezanson for Gazette editor.

This is the first time in The Gazette's 105-year history that the staff's choice for editor has been overturned by the student council.

Bezanson fulfilled the qualifications for editor as outlined in The CUP constitution. McDougall, on the other hand, has very little experience with the paper. He worked for it for a few months last year, was unable to work with the staff, quit and ran for a position on the student council.

Bezanson planned to continue the policy of staff democracy and collective decision-making. McDougall intended to enforce his power as editor and carry on a form of autocracy. However, he did concede the supreme authority would be the student union.

The council overlooked the relative experience of both applicants and the fact the present staff would strike if McDougall was chosen editor. It voted overwhelmingly in favor of McDougall.

Following the passage of the motion appointing McDougall editor, The Gazette staff, a majority of which attended the meeting, left. A motion was then made to make McDougall editor effective immediately. It was defeated. The motion was intended to prevent the present staff from publishing this week's issue of The Gazette, possibly the last one.

McDougall takes over the editorship today, according to The Dalhousie Student Union bylaws.

A motion was also made and carried that the last issue put out by the present staff be screened and censored by a representative of the student council. This was carried out by the president Brian Smith.

The action was supposedly to prevent any blatant slander of outside organizations or persons which would bring a lawsuit against the student union. The councillors thought this tactic was most likely to be taken by The Gazette staff in retaliation for the council's actions.

Since the meeting, The Gazette staff has made preparations for a special edition which will explain what has happened and will call for a student meeting to discuss the issue. This has also been done in an editorial on the student radio station which broadcasts in the student union building and to campus residences.

Attempts are also being made to have a motion of reconsideration brought before the next council meeting.

The staff is also prepared to put out an alternate newspaper, should the council stand by their decision not to have Bezanson as Gazette editor.

Student questions SAC's role

By BARBARA SHENSTONE

The role of SAC came under attack last week when a motion calling for a referendum among Trinity College students to decide whether they wish to remain members of SAC, was put forward by Trinity student Bob Bettson.

However, after some debate at the college's joint meeting, the formal motion for a referendum was withdrawn by Bettson. It was replaced by another stating that Trinity SAC reps George Kidd and Sheila Dunn prepare a report on SAC to be presented at the next joint meeting, along with a report by Bettson himself.

The motion "that a referendum be held to determine whether the students of Trinity College wish to remain members of SAC", was not, according to Bettson, intended to be "hostile" to SAC, but rather to promote discussion about it.

"Most students have very little knowledge of what SAC really does, of its functions and of its relationship to the students or to college councils," he said. "How does a body which meets every two weeks, spending $200,000, communicate to 25,000 students?" he asked.

Objections to calling a referendum were made at the meeting, on the grounds that if no one knows what SAC's duties are, it would be irrational to ask people to make an informed decision about its role.

To some students the motion calling for the referendum sounded like a vendetta against the present SAC leadership. Jeremy Paltiel pointed out "dislike of present leaders is not sufficient reason to opt out of SAC."

Bettson countered by explaining that the motion was not meant to reflect a particular dislike, but rather "a general dissatisfaction with the organization; the lack of good candidates to run, and the general lack of interest among students."

SAC vice-president John Helliwell stressed the importance of informing people about "the whole nature and structure of SAC".

Grads step up drive to unionize assistants

By SANDY BOGART

Teaching assistants are presently escalating their recruitment drive, in preparation for formation of the proposed U of T Graduate Assistants' Association.

According to Brian Mossop, a spokesman for the newly formed recruitment committee, they aim to organize at least 65 per cent of the teaching assistants. If successful, this will be followed by an application to the Ontario Labour Relations Board of Ontario for certification as a labour union.

The ability to bargain collectively, Mossop stated, will give teaching assistants a better position vis-a-vis the university.

He added that a constitution must be drawn up and submitted to the labour relations board upon application. The board may then question this, or other aspects of the association, such as criteria for membership, before granting certification.

John Jessup, another recruitment committee member, said organizers are needed from individual departments, since these people will be most familiar with the issues of their particular department.

Both Mossop and Jessup insisted that any specific moves the planned union will take must be determined by the membership, but did suggest some issues.

"Equal pay for equal work" is one direction the proposed union may move in, said Mossop. This would raise the salaries of lower-paid teaching assistants in those departments where they receive less money for the same type of work than do assistants in another department.

Other possible concerns, Mossop indicated, were the number of students in tutorial groups, and both the amount of work and time spent by the assistants.

He added that of the 56 graduate departments, about half now have organizers who are recruiting other members from their departments.

UC, SMC on top in Division IA basketball

The University College basketball team tied St. Mike's for first place in Division I A by virtue of its 102-89 overtime victory over SMC in Saturday's feature game.

The game's style was back-and-forth throughout until St. Mike's Larry Trafford fouled out with a minute to go in regulation time.

Although St. Mike's naturally missed Trafford's scoring — he scored 21 points — the team missed his playmaking a lot more. In the overtime period, UC outscored SMC 15-2, primarily on the efforts of Gordie Betcherman, the key to the UC squad.

Overshadowed in the past by his older brother Mike, who scored 16 points in the game, Gordie has emerged as the player UC goes to in the clutch. He scored 36 points (10 in the overtime period) in Saturday and was responsible for settling down UC against Vic earlier in the week after Vic's press had dissolved UC's comfortable 15 point lead.

Other scorers for UC included Bill Birnbaum with 29 points and Mel Posesorski with 12. Assisting Trafford for St. Mike's were Tom Campana and Mark Dziemianczuk with 23 and 16 points, respectively.

Friday featured the also-rans of Division I A, Law and New. Both teams are struggling to make the playoffs by attempting to catch PHE A, the fourth place team in the division.

However, PHE A, an extremely inconsistent team, has put together two consecutive wins (including a 78-77 overtime win against Meds on Saturday) to establish a stronger hold on the final playoff spot. For the record, Law trampled

New, 78-54. Rich Pirie (21 points), Jim Halfnight (16), Allen Sternberg (14), and Scott Hunter (13) led Law to the victory. Meanwhile, Mark Sherkin, carrying New's scoring load as usual, potted 20 points.

Synchro swim team fifth at Western

The University of Toronto women's synchronized swimming team earned 10 team points to finish in fifth place in the OWIAA sectional at the University of Western Ontario Saturday.

The Toronto women's team competed in only one of four events. Coached by Pam Bonnell, U of T concentrated on a presentation of its team routine at this sectional, and will work up routines in the other categories for the final meet.

Toronto competed in the team event, scoring 52.8 for 10 of a possible 144 team points. Queen's scored 54.2 for 14 points, while McMaster finished third in the event, scoring 47.5 for eight points. Queen's finished first in total team points in the sectional with 45. Waterloo was second with 35, McMaster third with 20, and York placed fourth with 11.

Meets are divided into four categories — figures, solo, duet, and team. Figures consists of compulsory performances executed to precise standards as in figure skating. The other three events are performed to music.

Routines are judged according to their difficulty, composition, synchronization, variety and presentation. With solos and duets it is important to incorporate skills and strokes with a maximum degree of finesse and difficulty.

In team routines the emphasis is on choosing stunts to all swimmers' abilities and sharpening the synchronization to the greatest possible degree so that each swimmer makes the exact choreographed movement at each beat of the music.

Standings in other events — team points in parentheses:

Figures: 1. Denise Bonnell, Waterloo, 93 (8); 2. Ann Marawetz, Queen's, 80 (6); 3. Heather Demeza, Queen's, 79 (5).

Solo: 1. Bonnell, Waterloo, 59.2 (8); Barb Lyons, York, 58.4 (6); 3. Marawetz, Queen's, 58.4 (5).

Duet: 1. Bonnell, Mary Ann Finn, Waterloo, 58.8 (9); 2. Marawetz, Ann Malone, Queen's, 57.6 (7); 3. Marie Reilly, Elizabeth Angus, McMaster, 54.2 (5).

The men's wrestling team travelled to the Guelph Invitational with two members gaining third place finishes. Roger Vachon (150) took one third place position out of 15 competitors with two wins by decisions (10-0, 10-5) and one win by a pin, with one loss, also on a pin. Dave Tanner (158 pounds) took the other third place position for Toronto on two wins by a pin and two losses by decisions (3-1, 5-3) out of 17 competitors in the weight class. Other team members and their results included: Len Gang (118), two losses by decisions (4-1, 6-4); Ken White (126), two losses, one by decision (9-3), and one by a pin; Rob Moore (134), two wins by decisions (22-0, 6-4), and one loss by a pin; Doug Lake (177), one loss by a decision (13-9) and one by a pin; Len Broderick (177), two losses by decisions (2-1, 14-4); Chris Preobrazenski (heavyweight), one win by a pin, and two losses, one by a pin and one from a decision (9-0). In the Ontario Novice Tournament, Wally Cringan (158) took first place out of a class of 25 competitors on five wins and a draw (four pins, one bye, one draw, one decision (13-2); Richard Zurawski (158) had two losses, as did Pete Gillies (158). . . . York University Yeomen won the OUAA volleyball championship Saturday, defeating Queen's University 3-1 in the final game of a four-team round-robin tournament. Defending champions Queen's won the first game of the finals 15-5, but York came back to win 16-14, 15-12, and 15-7 to capture the Jim Forsythe Memorial Trophy. . . . the free course on "Sport and the Individual" continues today from 12-2 pm in the Benson Building lecture room. . . . the women's fencing team competed in the Carleton Invitational Sunday. Two three member teams coached by Maitre Ken Wood participated in the event, which drew a total of nine teams. The U of T 'A' team reached the finals along with Carleton and Queen's to make a three-way tie for first place. When the hits scored were divided by hits received U of T took third place, with Carleton placing first and Queen's second. The 'B' team was defeated by Ottawa and Trent. Team leader Pat Luckett suffered torn ligaments and pulled muscles and may be out for the season. 'A' team foilists A. M. Gutierrez (captain), Maureen Selway, and Maureen Evans are preparing for the OWIAA finals to be held Friday and Saturday in the Benson Building. . . . women's senior volleyball defeated York last night 3-1 (15-6, 10-15, 15-0, 15-10). . . . U of rifle club held a meet Friday in Hart House, hosting a team from the University of Guelph. Guelph had 1131 points compared to Toronto's 1096 in the three position sporting rifle event, while Varsity's B. Scarlett was the top shot with 282. In the three position match rifle event, Guelph had 1052 points compared to Toronto's 995. Varsity's Jaan Peets was top shot with 278.

On Saturday, January 27, a union meeting of U of T Workers decided unanimously to demonstrate in front of 215 Huron Street on Monday. We were demonstrating against the layoff of 11 workers from the Physical Plant Ground Department.

We spent Saturday and Sunday making signs.

At the appointed hour of 12 noon, we showed up at 215 Huron only to find that Don Barclay, the business agent of the Service Employees International Union (which we belong to) had failed to bring the placards as he had promised. He, not the workers whose union it is, had taken it upon himself to call off the demonstration. Barclay said that the layoff had been cancelled. He said, "We (the union) won."

However, the university didn't think so. The university administration passed out a letter on Monday saying that the layoffs had been cancelled because of the snowfall on Sunday night. They promised nothing more and at a meeting later on, made it clear that if no more snow were forthcoming, the layoffs would proceed.

Determined to show our resolution to the university, we ignored Barclay's talk and decided to hold a demonstration in spite of him. We wanted to be sure there were no more layoffs. He stomped off angrily.

We find it strange that Barclay would sound off to The Varsity in a Monday front-page article about how tough he was going to fight the university. On Monday, he was just as determined to stop us from picketing.

We also find it deplorable that The Varsity should print a pack of what turned out to be lies from Don Barclay, especially when we had submitted our own article earlier on Sunday evening. We thought The Varsity listened and trusted the workers, not the union hacks like Don Barclay.

Barclay really exposed himself on Monday in front of all the workers. If a Varsity reporter had been assigned to the picket line, he or she would have seen it for him/herself. At that time, one of the students picketing 215 Huron for the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee, Pete, pointed out that he had been told by Barclay that the grievance against the university had been won and therefore the protest was unnecessary.

When we arrived with the letter from the university administration, it was clear that Barclay was lying. The student pointed this out in no uncertain terms.

Barclay kept yelling, "Don't call me a liar." Then he started punching the student. The student responded as anybody would have and a fight broke out. Barclay soon fled.

In that demonstration, we kept everybody out of 215 Huron. We demonstrated again on Tuesday at noon. We intend to demonstrate again today and we intend to keep on demonstrating until the university gives us the answer we want.

Don Barclay, it must be pointed out, doesn't care that 11 workers are laid off, as long as the university does it according to the holy "contract". We say no layoffs at all. No matter which way you look at it, Barclay and his American union are not what U of T Workers need.

Queen's U decides to support athletics

With this issue The Varsity begins a look at the administrative structures and facilities of university athletics elsewhere in Ontario. Today, we begin a series on Queen's University. Future issues will deal with the University of Waterloo.

The first article explains the recent history and initial changes in the Queen's athletic program.

Unless otherwise indicated, all quotations are from the Report of the Principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics on Structure and Responsibility for Athletics at Queen's University (May, 1970).

Queen's University principal J.J. Deutsch requested the Principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics in April, 1969, to review and advise on the structure and organization of athletics at Queen's. The terms of reference laid out in Deutsch's letter were:

"In particular, I would ask the Committee to examine the organizational structure and responsibilities for athletics, and advise what changes should be made in the light of present and future circumstances and requirements.

".....The Committee should consider also the relative responsibilities of the University and the AMS (Alma Mater Society, Queen's student council), and, in this connection, should consider the proposals of the AMS and the problems and requirements which will arise when the new expanded facilities become available (in 1970)."

On May 28, 1970, the Queen's University Senate established a new organizational and policy-making structure for athletics in the university.

The Senate's action was based on the Report of the Principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics which was studied by the Senate and in particular by the Senate Committees on Student Affairs and Operations Review. On the recommendation of these committees, the Senate accepted the report.

In late 1965, then Queen's principal Dr. J.A. Corry established the Curtis Study Committee on Athletics because of concern within the university community about the conduct of athletics and recreation.

The Curtis Study Committee reported to Corry in February, 1966, but conceded that in the limited time available it had been unable to suggest fundamental changes in the existing organizational structure of athletics at Queen's. Instead, the committee's report concentrated on making essential administrative adjustments in the existing arrangements for athletics and recreation.

The MacPherson Committee carried out the implementation of the Curtis Committee's recommendations. These essentially committed the university in an official way to the support of athletics at Queen's. Less than two years after the first committee had been formed, the following changes became effective (July 1, 1967):

- The School of Physical and Health Education now organizes and administers a recreation program for staff and students.

- The university now assumes administrative responsibilities for the conduct of intercollegiate and intramural athletics through an administrative office for the School of Physical and Health Education.

- The university now assumes responsibility for the preparation and maintenance of all athletes and recreation facilities at Queen's.

- The School of Physical and Health Education now provides from its staff the directors of intercollegiate and intramural athletics as well as coaching services for intercollegiate athletics, within reasonable limits of the total work responsibilities of the school. The university also assumes the financial responsibility involved in limiting faculty teaching loads to carry out these functions.

- The Principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics was set up with the following terms of reference by Queen's principal Corry:

(i) The committee was to consider and advise on all aspects of policy to promote athletics and recreational athletic activities at Queen's, and make recommendations on expansion of facilities.

Society (students' council), remained responsible for policy-making and budgeting for men's intercollegiate athletics and for the approval of the budget of the Men's Intramural Council.

The Men's Intramural Council continued to be responsible for the men's intramural athletic program.

Similarly, the Women's Athletic Board of Control set the policy and budget for women's intercollegiate athletics, and its subsidiary body, the Women's Athletic Council, dealt with the co-ordination of women's athletics.

The Alma Mater Society athletic fee was changed from $20 to $14 to reflect the university's assumption of the financial implications of taking over the maintenance of athletic facilities, as well as administrative and some staffing costs for athletic programs.

The Alma Mater Society, therefore, continued to be the body ultimately responsible for the sponsorship of in-

"Competitive sports provide living experiences in education, offering many opportunities — to make decisions, to work cooperatively, to assume responsibility, to be well-disciplined, to function with a group, to be a leader, to have a goal.

"...It is felt that athletic activities must remain an integral part of the university educational program. This facet of an over-all philosophy is fundamental and has validity only if it is part and parcel of the total program.

"If it be granted that athletics is such an integral part of the educational institution, then 'physical education' is its logical administrative unit. This would allow policy-making and decision-making to remain in the hands of professional personnel, students, and other persons directly involved with the conduct of the program.

"Ultimate authority should rest with the Senate, the Principal, and the Board of Trustees as in the case of other university entities. In this way, athletics will be placed and maintained in proper perspective within the university.

"Athletics and physical education in combination, assist each other in advancing toward educational goals. Accordingly, these units should be integrated into one cohesive organization, thereby allowing greater all-round efficiency — especially in relation to faculty welfare, teaching assignments, and use of facilities and equipment. In this way, too, the university can ensure that the quality of staff and coaches be maintained at a level commensurate with its educational goals.

"It is strongly felt that the athletics program should not be considered extracurricular or ancillary. The history of athletics is replete with cases of failure due to mis-guidance and mis-management, and for this reason the committee's recommendations centre not around student-controlled programs, nor around alumni-influenced programs, but deliberately on a university-sponsored-and-controlled entity."

Athletic Director Lenard gave one example of AMS mis-management. Apparently the AMS sub-committee on athletics had at one point "inadvertently developed a surplus of about $75,000 over 10 years," he said, "and $45,000 of that had been allocated toward the construction of a new arena, but it never came about."

Lenard added that some of the sub-committee's money went toward the construction of a student residence. As for the athletic surplus, he said "we got the surplus over a period of 10 years due to an under-projection of enrolment, hence a surplus to play around with."

"As well as the benefits that normally accrue to the participating individual, a sound athletics program has a multitude of indirect benefits which should not be ignored — to the spectator, to the alumni, to the community, to the institution.

"There appears to be little question that interest in school teams and individuals provides a valuable uniting bond, a continuing link with one's alma mater.

"The latter 'by-products' of athletics, however, should never take precedence over consideration for the student participant."

Lenard added to the written philosophy by saying that "there are other things (to be gained from sport) besides just winning at all cost and that idea is supported here. Our general philosophy is that as much as possible we would like to have a number of phys ed staff which is also trained for coaching."

Report of

THE PRINCIPAL'S ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON ATHLETICS

on

Structure and Responsibilities for Athletics

at

QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY

AS REVISED BY THE SENATE IN MAY, 1970

(ii) The committee was to make recommendations concerning the structure and function of permanent policy-making and administrative bodies, and such central and coordinating authorities as would be required for them.

(iii) The committee was to report to the principal of the university and to the president of the Alma Mater Society.

Director of Men's Intercollegiate Athletics A.L. Lenard told The Varsity that Queen's University's new structure came about as a result of a referendum put to the university as a whole, including the administration. Lenard said that in effect the university community wanted to know whether the administration considered athletics and physical recreation to be a part of university education and, if so, what it intended to do about it.

Athletics was still student controlled

However, policy-making for the conduct of intercollegiate and intramural athletics remained essentially the same as before.

The Athletic Board of Control, a standing committee of the Alma Mater intercollegiate and intramural athletics at Queen's University.

PAC's report based on premises and philosophy

The Principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics report found that "athletics do have a legitimate place in our colleges and universities; it is accepted that interest and participation in sports is both normal and desirable.

"It is also widely held that the university has a responsibility to provide opportunities for the student to develop his total personality, and to prepare him for community life through the provision of a variety of meaningful educational experiences. Toward this end, athletics can make a major contribution.

Fights, cops and busts at Huron demo

By BRIANE NASIMOK

Seven persons were charged yesterday after a demonstration at 215 Huron Street turned into a fight between campus police and members of the U of T Workers Against the Layoffs (members of the Service employees union) and the Stop the Surcharge Committee, at 215 Huron Street.

Five men and two women were taken into custody by campus police, when they blocked the entrance at noon. They were later turned over to Metro police.

Demonstrations have occurred daily this week after no guarantees against layoffs and contracting out were given to the Service Employees Union, when U of T announced it would not pursue threatened layoffs.

A special meeting of the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee was called Wednesday after a personnel supervisor was reportedly injured in a disruption.

The meeting decided that free access to the building must be maintained and, if necessary, Metro police would be called on campus. The administration, however, did not forewarn the demonstrators of its intentions.

Charged with assaulting police were student Rhonda Flemming, and Larry Haiven. Student Denise Havers was charged with disturbing the peace and her husband Peter, a fourth year student, was charged with assault causing bodily harm, common assault, and mischief of private property.

U of T grounds worker Claude Brown faces two charges of assaulting police. Another U of T worker, Greg Keilty, was also charged with assaulting police. U of T student Myron Krymko was charged with obstructing police.

SAC president Eric Miglin was shoved and kicked by some demonstrators as he watched the proceedings. Miglin was asked to join the demonstration and when he refused, he was physically dragged into the fray by the picketers.

Last night, Miglin told The Varsity he was not certain whether he would press charges.

The fracas developed around yesterday. Five demonstrators left the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee information trailer in front of the building and set up a picket line that circled in front of its entrance. Four campus police officers were guarding the doorway.

The placard-carrying marchers asked that no one cross the picket lines until later that day. By 12:15, the number of picketers had increased from eight to 10.

A student tried to cross the line, hesitated, and decided to come back later. An office worker was later impeded from entry as the demonstrators formed a chain across the entrance.

One of the campus police announced that he was giving "fair warning not to obstruct traffic". As the office worker entered the building, the police and demonstrators pushed each other.

Violence erupted when a third person tried to enter the building. She paid little attention to one of the demonstrators' screams of "Don't you care about female workers being laid off?"

As she tried to enter the building, the picketers pushed the police against the doorway. In order to let the woman in the building, the police pushed the demonstrators back. The shoving match led to scuffles as the demonstrators exchanged punches with the police.

A plainclothes officer inside 215 Huron radioed for assistance. Within five minutes, about 10 more campus police came out.

As the fighting continued, the glass doors at the entrance of 215 Huron were broken. It seemed that the glass smashed as the police reinforcements inside the building tried to get outside to reach the fighting in front of the doorway.

After the fighting subsided, some of the demonstrators were carried inside the building.

One of the organizers, who refused to give his name, took a bullhorn and asked a group of spectators why they did not "get in there and fight these bastards. Get in here and help, you bunch of cowards."

On recognizing Miglin, the organizer asked him to join the remaining picketers. "You represent me, Eric. Tell these guys to get out of here."

Then he and fellow demonstrator Rudy Haiven grabbed Miglin and tried to force him to join the picketers. Spectators asked Miglin if he needed help, but he told them not to get involved.

Six women protesting charges arising from yesterday's scuffle at 215 Huron Street disrupted a dinner attended by U of T president John Evans last night at the Hyatt House Hotel.

Evans was attending a function held by presidents and board chairmen of universities and colleges in Ontario.

The women, members of the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee and wives of men arrested in a scuffle with campus police outside 215 Huron Street, demanded that charges against seven people arrested in the melee be dropped.

The six women took over a microphone and shouted demands

They crashed a dinner but Evans smiles to the startled audience. However, when they became too vociferous, the microphone was cut off.

"Evans just sat there and ate," Denise Keilty told The Varsity. She complained that Evans paid no heed to the women's protest. "He just sat there smiling," exclaimed Keilty.

Some waiters tried to persuade the women to leave. The demonstrators resisted and some dishes were broken, according to a witness at the scene.

The Director of Information of the Department of Colleges and Universities of Ontario told The Varsity that the women overturned six tables in protest.

He claimed the women were "inciting reciprocal violence". Some food was reportedly spilled on Evans and other guests sitting at the tables.

"Unfortunately, people chose violent methods to try to prevent others from doing what they want to do," remarked Evans, after the incident.

Wright proposes greater access to college

By BOB BETTSON

The final report of the Ontario Commission on Post-secondary Education yesterday recommended a consolidated loan-grant system to replace all present loan, grant and scholarship schemes.

This, combined with tuition fee increases for graduate, professional and community college students, represents a new approach to financing.

The report advocates students contribute from a third to a half of the total cost of his or her education. Since undergraduate Arts and Science students are already doing so, it says. "The shift of the cost burden would not significantly affect the present fee structure for undergraduate Arts and Science students."

The final report is a modified version of a draft report released last year, which had similar recommendations.

Student commission member David Black said at a Queen's Park press conference after the report was released that the financing proposals would allow increased accessibility to post-secondary Education.

Commissioner Vince Kelly, a Toronto lawyer, said the commission report on financing was not adequate.

In his dissenting report, Kelly stated, "Tuition fees and associated costs should be abolished by having the provincial (and indirectly the federal government) increased its support to those institutions."

He also advocated quotas to ensure the representation of all socio-economic classes be in proportion to their population by 1990.

Kelly demanded corporations and individuals who benefit most from the economy pay for the educational system.

The new financing proposals lack a concrete fees schedule because responsibility for setting fees would rest with individual institutions. Black said there was no possibility of any more across the board increases if the report was implemented.

Black claimed, "The public funds available should promote as much accessibility as possible. The major guideline is accessibility and fees will depend on ability to pay."

The commission's loan grant scheme recommends the grant program should "be large enough to pay the student's tuition fees... and provide for his maintenance while he is studying."

The size of the grant would be determined by the individual's personal and family wealth; the upper limit for eligibility was set at $15,000. Lower income students would receive the largest grants of up to full tuition and living expenses.

Repayment for a loan system is based on future earnings, and everyone, including those from upper income groups, is eligible for interest-bearing loans to be paid back over 20 to 30 years.

Commissioners warned the Ontario government to implement the financing scheme as a package and not on a piecemeal basis.

Part-time students, for the first time, would be regarded as fully equal to full-time students. This includes full eligibility for loans and grants. Commissioners stressed that the Ontario post-secondary educational system should be an integrated system with universal accessibility for people of all ages.

The Ontario Ministry of Colleges and Universities would be abolished, if the report is implemented, and replaced with a new Department of Post-Secondary Education. According to one commission member, Queen's University president John Deutsch, the new department would be a policy ministry directing the province's education system.

In a minor change from the draft report, the commission recommends the creation of four advisory councils on university affairs, college affairs, the open educational sector and the creative and performing arts.

The 14-member councils would control budgets and review policy for their respective sectors. They would include six public appointees, two each from student and faculty organizations and the Council of Ontario Universities. There would also be one non-academic support staff representative and a full-time chairperson.

The draft report had recommended 13-member coordinating boards.

The report gives less power to the new planning and coordinating councils, stressing individual autonomy and removing control originally recommended over new programs and discontinuing unnecessary programs.

The report also urges the creation of a permanent Ontario Committee on Post-secondary Education to regularly review post-secondary education in Ontario. It would have 14 members, including four post-secondary educational institution representatives.

According to college and universities minister Jack McNeil, his department is already preparing for major shuffles and a complete reorganization.

In another significant new move, as reported late last year, the commission recommended church affiliated colleges receive full funding, if they fulfill some minor conditions. At present, they receive only half the normal grants.

The commissioners at the press conference stressed the report's recommendations were intended to broaden the scope and accessibility of post-secondary education to all social classes and age groups in society.

The commission also repeated earlier recommendations that high school education be condensed into 12 years, and that professional status should be granted with the passing of qualifying exams, rather than requiring formal university or college attendance.

Pearson eulogized

By DIANA WEST

"I do not think of Lester Pearson as a great man," but rather a product of a society trying to stamp out greatness, stated professor Northrop Frye in his address at the memorial service for the late Lester Pearson, Wednesday afternoon. Frye referred to Pearson as a "good man of ability" who used those abilities to better his society.

Pearson arrived at Victoria College in 1913 and did not graduate until 1919, after taking time out to fight in the first World War where "he saw enough of war to make him prefer peace," said Frye.

In 1929, Pearson joined the external affairs ministry, leaving his assistant professorship at Victoria College to take the civil service post.

Pearson's later work in the United Nations as the Canadian representative gained him "the admiration of the whole world" and the Nobel Peace Prize in 1957.

GOVERNING COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY ELECTION REMINDER

Prospective candidates for election to the Governing Council are reminded that nomination papers must be filed by noon on Monday, February 12th, 1973. Nomination forms and copies of the regulations (Election Guidelines) covering the election are available from the Office of the Governing Council, Simcoe Hall, or the Registrars' offices at Scarborough and Erindale Colleges.

There are vacancies in four teaching staff constituencies, all eight seats in the three student categories, and one seat in the administrative staff constituency.

Nominations must be signed by the following number of nominators:

- teaching staff - 10
- graduate students - 15
- full-time undergraduate students - 50
- part-time undergraduate students - 15
- administrative staff - 20

Present members of Governing Council whose terms expire on June 30th next may be nominated again if they are continuing in the same constituencies for which they were elected in 1972. Those elected this year for the teaching staff and administrative staff constituencies will serve for three years from July 1st, 1973, and for student constituencies for one year, as required by the University of Toronto Act, 1971.

Descriptions of the constituencies were published in The Varsity of January 24th last. Enquiries or requests for further information should be directed to the Office of the Governing Council at 928-2160.

Election shall be by mailed ballot.

Change to credit system adviser by PAC

By ELAINE KAHN

U of T will be changing over to the credit system, if a recommendation approved Saturday by the Presidential Advisory Committee to Review the New Program is implemented.

Under the new system, students will be able to work for 30-credit or 40-credit degrees, with a credit being defined as a half-course. The committee stated, "A policy of a fee cost per course would probably be an inevitable result of introducing a credit system", according to the minutes.

At a meeting yesterday, the committee approved a recommendation that a student be allowed to proceed towards a degree at his own rate.

If all these recommendations are implemented, there would be no difference between full-time and part-time students.

The move towards a credit system caused a lengthy discussion yesterday about Bachelor of Commerce degrees as commerce students are now required to take 23 courses for their degrees, though they are part of the Faculty of Arts and Science. The committee felt this discrepancy with the guidelines of 30 or 40 credits should be reviewed and suggested that Commerce and Finance become the undergraduate part of the Faculty of Management Studies.

A subcommittee report recommended that failing grades should not be marked on a student's transcript, because, to a future employer, for example, "Failure can be interpreted as a fact about the student's nature rather than his academic record." It did not condone abolishing failing grades.

The report suggested that the number of essays required in courses be reduced from two or three per course to one long essay that could be worked on all year. Criticism from other students and the professor would be helpful during this time, it said.

The report considers examinations useful "to promote collation and organization of the year's work," and said exams are preferable to frequent tests. However, it stated that the discussion periods following the return of tests are beneficial to learning and suggested that a small period at the end of the year be reserved for students who wish to discuss with their professors the exams they wrote.

The report recommends that instructors should "demonstrate or acquire the essential pedagogical skills by following a training course provided by the Faculty of Arts and Science" and that teaching assistants should be given formal training and assistance in group learning techniques.

The report suggested that the capacity to teach well should "probably" rank with scholarship as a criterion for hiring and that faculty devote more time to teaching duties.

Graduate teaching assistants have listed lack of training in teaching as one of their reasons for wanting to organize as a labour union.

No wrongs at OCA: McNie

By PAT REDICAN

Colleges and universities minister, Jack McNie has refused students' requests to intervene in faculty layoffs at the Ontario College of Art.

After meeting for two hours Tuesday with representatives of the dissatisfied students, as well as students "in opposition to these views" and acting president Clifford Pitt, McNie announced he was "satisfied that the democratic process is being upheld in the faculty layoffs at OCA. Specifically I do not think there was any discrimination against teachers appointed by (ex-president) Roy Ascott."

A group of students had protested that a minority group of faculty, many of whom had been hired by Ascott, were especially hard-hit by the dismissals and cutbacks in hours which had ensued as a result of a $487,000 deficit in the college budget.

Pitt claims that of the 24 faculty members who were either laid off or had their hours reduced, only 12 were originally hired by Ascott. The students countered that not only have they not been accurately informed of the cutbacks ("He gives me a different figure every time I ask him" says Laffey) but that the staff which make up the minority "conceptual" school of the faculty are not necessarily Ascott-hired. Seven of this minority, which according to one of their number, painter Tommy Hodgins, numbers 22, have resigned in the last month.

The students had also argued that it has not been conclusively proved that the only way to correct the deficit is faculty layoffs and that, if there must be layoffs, the students should decide the cuts themselves.

Barbara Laffey and Paul Casselman, representatives from an ad hoc committee of students which is protesting both the faculty layoffs and recent curriculum changes, were not satisfied with the meeting.

"It was completely unproductive" said Laffey. "We were hoping that the government could step in and help us out. Now I know that that would be worse."

Casselman and Laffey, who represent at least a quarter of OCA's 916 students, have said they do not know what action they will take next. They are among 240 students who have signed statements saying they will not return if the curriculum changes and staff cutbacks are carried out. At a press conference a week ago Tuesday they said they regarded McNie as their last chance.

"We may try to start our own school," said Laffey. Some of the faculty who have resigned or been laid off in the past month have already begun talking of this possibility, according to Laffey.

Stop the Cutbacks Committee meeting gathers steam

Today's noon-hour public meeting of the Stop the Cutbacks Committee has been gathering support from within and without the campus since Tuesday's SAC executive decision to back their campaign.

The meeting has been called in the Hart House Debates Room to consider tactics to strengthen the fees strike and to further the campaign against the cutbacks outlined by yesterday's report of the Commission on post-secondary education.

As well as support from SAC, the student councils of Victoria, Innis, and Erindale Colleges, the Sociology Students' Union, and the Faculty Reform Caucus, the committee has received individual endorsements from Trinity head of college Geoff Seaborne, former SAC vice-president Phil Dack and Rick Gregory of the Arts and Science Students' Union.

Last Tuesday's student meeting agreed that the scope of the fees struggle should be broadened to encompass non-students who are affected by the increasing difficulty in gaining access to education which the cutbacks represent.

So far, on the basis of stopping all the cutbacks and calling for free and universal access to education, the committee has obtained support from CUPE Local 1230 president Audrey Nichols, Services Employees' Union Local 204 (both unions represent U of T workers), the 247-member committee of Ontario College of Art students who held last week's Queen's Park demonstration, Campus Community Co-op Day Care coordinator Jude Angione and high school teacher

Bob Beardsley, who ran for the NDP in the Spadina riding the October federal election.

OCA student committee chairman Paul Casselman said he is "ready to try anything" after a "useless" meeting with colleges and universities minister Jack McNie on Monday.

Students at Brock York and Trent have called for a province-wide demonstration at Queen's Park in February, and the SAC executive endorsed this call on Tuesday night.

A cutbacks committee spokesman urged students to ignore the $15 penalty on late fees being threatened by the U of T administration.

The Stop the Cutbacks Committee also includes political groups such as the Students for a Democratic Society, the U of T Communist Club, the Young Socialists and the Old Mole.

A spokesman for the Canadian Liberation Movement-dominated Stop the Student Surcharge Committee said that they refused to work with "a Trotskyite committee", and would continue to publicize their trust fund, into which they want students to deposit second term fees.

Food sci report secret - for now

The final recommendations of the Food Science Implementation Committee will not be made public for the time being.

On Wednesday, the committee added the finishing touches to a report which has been forwarded to vice-president Don Forster. The report, which contains recommendations on the future of the Faculty of Food Sciences, will then go before the Academic Affairs Committee.

When questioned about the contents of the motions, committee chairman James Cruise said that the report was "no longer in our hands".

Cruise indicated that the members of the committee had agreed during the meeting to refrain from commenting on the report. Only Forster had the right to comment at this point, he said.

Forster could not be reached for comment last night.

Management must rule: U of T labour boss

By RANDY ROBERTSON

U of T labour relations manager John Parker Tuesday defended "the rights of management to take punitive action against employees for engaging in anti-administration activities as well as for the improper performance of employment duties."

Parker was speaking at a meeting of the Internal Affairs committee discussing its position paper on university discipline.

Conservative faculty member Stanley Schiff, who thought the Campbell report on discipline too liberal, supported Parker's views.

"Anything relating to the employee," he said, "is cause for dismissal. He can be fired for all kinds of things."

Schiff drew no distinction between "a secretary's incompetence" and a "secretary's sitting in the president's office" as reasons for dismissal.

Parker said that the employee is guaranteed fair dealing since "he has recourse to arbitration procedures outlined in his contract."

The committee debated whether non-union employees should be allowed recourse to the single tribunal the committee proposes be set up for the whole university.

Parker said that while unionized employees were covered by their contracts non-unionized employees would either have "to be allowed recourse to the tribunal or would have to have new, different methods formulated for them, e.g. recourse to the Internal Affairs or Budget committees."

U of T Staff Association representative P. A. Slaton, said that non-academic staff should have final recourse to this tribunal. "This might give the workers a sense of involvement and unity with the university community which they do not now have," she said.

But she did not favour the elimination of present grievance procedures. "There is a lot wrong with these," she said, "but they should be improved, not eliminated. The workers don't want just one arbitrator."

Parker favoured the formulation of new methods "to avoid the impression that disciplinary action is empirical, singular action." He did not want the university tribunal to become "a super-arbitration board."

The committee was unable, however, to decide how to deal with grievance procedure for non-academic staff. Parker asked what could be done if the personnel department bows to the wishes of a head of a department and fires an employee?"

If it's Friday, have a meeting

There will be another meeting of The Varsity staff today at 1 pm in the office at 91 St. George Street. Among the topics to be considered today will be obscenity. Staff meeting policy has changed; today, instead of door prizes being offered, attendance may be taken. So, watch out.

Mistaken facts ruined argument

It was disappointing to see the lack of editorial attention accorded to Monday's centrefold article ("Male chauvinism permeates medicine..."). Had that prerogative been exercised and the more blatant of Miss Emmons' mistaken assumptions and misdirected assertions removed, you might have salvaged something resembling a logical argument.

There is no question that professions, medicine included, had been male-oriented in the past and, like most professions, it tends to propagate itself through the generations, changing only gradually. But, to equate the medical profession with the companies which peddle drugs to the profession is nonsensical. Whatever "chauvinism" may permeate drug advertisements (or any advertising) in no way reflects upon the profession which is thus parasitized. Which would eliminate about half of Miss Emmons' article.

It is a fact that the number of male medical students is in considerable excess to the number of females. However, it is logical reasoning on the part of the financing bodies (whoever they be) to look for maximal return (in terms of service hours) from their "medical student dollars". Of the students who drop out as undergraduates, as interns, and even as residents, women predominate. Many go through the course never to practise, while others practise only part-time. The attractiveness of specialties such as radiology and anaesthesia lie in part to the relatively fewer hours involved. It is hard to believe that women are coerced into these "low-prestige" (as Miss Emmons implies) fields against their will.

There is little to be gained in re-emphasizing the difference in male/female ratios between "traditionally male" and

"traditionally female" professions. Much more understanding comes from examining the changes within a particular profession over the past few years. In medicine, this has included more women as undergraduates, interns and residents, and a woman president of the OMA, among others.

While there is always room for discussion and controversy on this subject, vituperative and paranoid essays like Miss Emmons' only distort the issues rather than promote improvement.

Students lose out to Eaton's

The new year brought a small surprise to a few Architecture students who had presented two proposals to paint the students' lounge and four to paint the cafeteria of Victoria College. The proposals were presented one week before Christmas after V C indicated its desire to have those halls painted anew.

From the response of the persons in charge (?), it seemed that our proposals were liked, especially the one from the group Vito Wong-Amerigo Marras for the students' lounge. This proposal was based on such elements as (1) painting the left hand columns white; (2) using a colour pattern of yellow, orange, and amaranth; (3) making a design of constant "waves" of the selected colours retreating and re-emerging from the floor.

The deciding commission preferred instead the dearly paid-for job from Eaton's. Though, strangely enough, the design used in painting the cafeteria has similar features with the above proposal for the lounge; namely there is the same pattern of colours and similar motifs. Only one difference (or a camouflage?) has been the inversion of the design of the Architecture students.

We think it would have made much more sense to have an honest collaboration between the faculties especially since students were ready to paint it for free, rather than commissioning Eaton's to do a similar design.

This occurrence shows how weak the community spirit is within the university, where different faculties and colleges do not use their own human resources.

Maybe certain U of T executives feel more at ease in an Eaton's world design?

Wants exchange with Hanoi now

Good news that U of T will help in a graduate engineering program at Havana...with CIDA funds! Good news that Japan is admitting some students from North Viet Nam! This is a good time to revive the proposal which the Faculty Committee on Vietnam made to the University in 1968 to set up an academic exchange with Hanoi. Nothing much came of the proposal then. The uncertainties of wartime prevented even a specific plan for such an exchange. But, surely now, the possibilities exist.

If the government could be persuaded to contribute, let's say, one-tenth what it gives in subsidies to US war industries in Toronto, then the program would be free of the usual financial worries.

GSU didn't mention SSSC

The letter from the SSSC regarding the GSU motion passed unanimously at our meeting of 25 January is somewhat incorrect. The motion specifically states: "Moved that the official policy of the GSU is that of non-payment of second term fees, and that it should be a matter for each individual as to whether he/she withholds second term fees or puts money into a trust fund."

As you can see, we mention "a trust fund", not the one organized by the SSSC. We are not recommending the SSSC as an alternative, nor any other trust fund that presently exists or may, in the future, come into being. All we are doing is acknowledging the presence of a variety of options that are available to graduate students.

Peace treaty not obvious victory

The U of T Communist Club gives itself away with its concern over "jubilation" in Hanoi (Varsity, January 31). If victory is so apparent, why be so concerned about a few complaints? But the Communist Party knows the treaty is not such an obvious victory, and that there's some explaining to be done.

"Jubilant" may have been the way to describe Le Duc Tho; it was also the way to describe Nixon, Kissinger, and the New York Stock Exchange. Of course, Le Duc Tho, Ho Chi Minh, and the U of T Communist Club were also "jubilant" over the invasion of Czechoslovakia. They applauded the French Communist Party's attempts to abort a revolution in Paris during May, 1968. They supported the dispatch of UN "peacekeepers" to the Congo who arranged the murder of Patrice Lumumba. They backed Lyndon Johnson for president in 1964 as the "lesser evil". They wrote poems mourning the death of President Kennedy. Only a few months ago, the CP of Canada sent condolences to Pearson's widow lamenting the death of a "peace-loving Canadian" (Pearson told Johnson that the bombing of North Vietnam was okay with him).

This ought to remind people of the role the Soviet Communist Party, the North Vietnamese Worker's Party, the People's Revolutionary Party of South Vietnam, and the revisionist CP's around the world have played in destroying revolutionary struggle. Here at the U of T, the CP has a few "Czechoslovakias" of its own. Students will long remember Phyllis Clarke of the CP in the library sit-in last year, constantly urging us to leave the Senate Chambers, hobnobbing with "Robin", and pushing a strategy of negotiation and compromise. Only a few days ago the CP joined hands with Paul Cadario as the only students opposing the intention of a large meeting to form a committee to fight the fee hike. When the Communist Party tells you "We won", you better find out how badly you lost!

The big gain in Vietnam, according to the CP, is the withdrawal of US troops. They might look at the original "ten point program" of the NLF which called for overthrow of "the camouflaged colonial regime of the American imperialists" as task number one. Now correct me if I'm wrong, but according to the treaty the "camouflaged colonial regime" of General Thieu is still running the South. This time it has a powerful, well disciplined army, and the fourth largest air force in the world. Compare it to the feeble, tottering regime of Diem in 1954 and you have to conclude that US imperialism is more firmly entrenched in South East Asia.

The imperialists have also made inroads into North Vietnam, with Hanoi's acceptance of the Kissinger-Marshall Plan. (Marxists call "foreign aid" a type of imperialism.) Nixon can count on the inaction of Brezhnev and Chou. They didn't try and stop him mining Haiphong, or bombing the dikes. And if they do get a bit cranky, all he has to do is offer them a wheat deal, a new tv station, or a Lincoln Continental. The Communist Club probably settles for less: maybe a summer vacation in Prague at an IUS conference.

Vietnam is an obvious setback for revolutionaries and communists. The opportunist strategy of negotiation instead of armed struggle, and the dependence on cheap talk in Paris led to the defeat. The leaders tried to alter the military approach, from the increasingly successful guerrilla war to positional battles and tank encounters, which led to one disaster after another (Tet, Quang Tri, et cetera).

But, at the heart of the revisionist strategy for Vietnam lay the reliance on "national liberation" instead of communist politics. The lawyers and local capitalists who backed the NLF had no desire to liberate the workers and peasants in Vietnam. All they wanted to do was enhance and strengthen their own position as exploiters.

A word ought to be said about the Trotskyite (of all varieties) attitude to the treaty. They are now critical of its signing, although until a few weeks ago they refused to criticize the NLF-DRV line, claiming that victory was imminent ("On to Saigon"). This is based on the nationalist assumption that revolutionaries of one nationality cannot criticize the struggle of another, and on the traditional Trotskyist line that defeat is necessary, valuable, et cetera.

Those with a truly internationalist perspective have never been afraid to criticize mistakes of revolutionaries in other countries. And, internationalists can be certain that our disgust with the treaty is shared by many in Vietnam, in spite of the chicanery of Hanoi pr-man. Those who pointed to the shortcomings of the fights for socialism in Vietnam years ago did so in the hope that defeat might be turned into victory — not with a desire for a didactic setback, or a phony victory.

McLaughlin awaits judgment as trial ends

By LANNY CDDKE

"The stories told by the defense witnesses are like Mother Goose nursery rhymes," Crown Attorney William Donaldson told the court trying former U of T student Tom McLaughlin yesterday.

The trial was adjourned yesterday until next Wednesday at 10 am in courtroom 31 in the Old City Hall when Judge Cloney will render his judgment on McLaughlin's charge of obstructing police during the breakup of last spring's occupation of Simcoe Hall.

In his summation of the case yesterday, Donaldson accused the defense witnesses of fabricating their stories.

He said that the witnesses told about four different stories concerning what went on outside of the Senate Chamber previous to the arrests.

He cited McLaughlin as saying that he heard someone talking outside the chamber, but also telling the court, "I didn't hear anything."

Donaldson claimed that Tony Leah's testimony was entirely different because he claimed that he didn't hear anything said by the police.

Tom Walkom then testified, according to Donaldson, that there were words from the outside of the chamber saying "You are all trespassing."

"There is no possible reason why they couldn't hear what was going on," said Donaldson. He charged that the words heard by the defense witnesses were "in complete chaos."

The attorney submitted that the police did give a warning before entering the Senate Chamber. "The others just didn't want to hear the warning," he claimed.

"It boils down to a straight question of credibility," Donaldson concluded.

Donaldson then told the judge that there are "thousands" of "riots" like the occupation break up. When questioned by the judge as to what he meant, he added that Edmund Burke Society members often attack speakers at Convocation Hall.

He added that the atmosphere of the Senate Chamber on the day of the arrests last March was consistent with the "punching" of officers and "jumping" on officers.

McLaughlin, he said, obstructed a police officer arresting Mark Goldblatt, who was recently found guilty of assaulting police.

According to one police witness, Donaldson said, McLaughlin put his hand on the officer's back. But another police witness testified that McLaughlin had jumped on the officer.

Donaldson concluded that

McLaughlin's testimony indicated that he had jumped on the police officer's back.

McLaughlin was evasive, according to the Crown Attorney. His favourite response to questions was "I can't recall" and "To the best of my recollection..."

Defence had difficulty presenting evidence

By ELAINE FARRAGHER

Tom McLaughlin, accused of obstructing police in the breakup of last spring's Simcoe Hall occupation, ran into considerable difficulty in eliciting information at Tuesday's session of his trial.

Judge Cloney made many interruptions in McLaughlin's questioning of six witnesses throughout the day and several times cautioned one of the witnesses for the defense, Randy Reynolds to be more specific in her testimony.

For example: Reynolds: "...uniformed policemen came through the door and Bob Spencer was hit..."

Cloney: "Who hit him? One of the people occupying the senate chambers?"

Reynolds: "No, a cop hit him."

Cloney: "Well then, be more specific. This is a courtroom."

When McLaughlin questioned Reynolds about her treatment by the cops and the treatment of others who were arrested, the judge said this evidence was irrelevant to his case and wouldn't be considered by him. But when McLaughlin objected to cross-examination of Reynolds by the Crown as similarly irrelevant, the judge said the Crown was "testing the credibility of the witness".

The judge was reluctant to accept some of the defense witnesses' testimony. At one point he interrupted student Tony Leah's testimony to state, "That seems highly unlikely, but proceed."

In questioning Leah, McLaughlin attempted to find out whether Leah knew that it wasn't Sword's voice that he heard ordering the occupiers to open the doors to the Senate Chamber.

The judge interceded. "He says he doesn't know what voice it was. You can't ask him what voice it wasn't or you're making him a liar. Don't ask him any more questions about voices."

In spite of the fact that Crown evidence had already been heard, the Crown Attorney was allowed to call another witness for the prosecution to give evidence directly related to the case.

The judge admitted this can only be done if the evidence is "minimally or marginally important" and only if it pertains to the defendant's credibility. But Cloney said that he would consider it only in relation to McLaughlin's credibility and not as direct evidence of his guilt or innocence.

The testimony accepted was that of Detective Kearns, who said that he recorded in his notebook a statement McLaughlin had made when he was brought into the station after his arrest.

"He stated he jumped on the officer's back (Ainnis) because he did not like the way the officer was handling his prisoner". Kearns said that "this was his explanation for what was reported he had done", and which McLaughlin denied.

References to the nature of the statement were made in court even before the judge had made a ruling, so that the judge knew what it said even before it was allowed.

The prosecution, without being interrupted, stressed the fact that Reynolds was not a student at the time of the occupation. But when she tried to explain why she felt she had a right to be there, Cloney said that he did not want to hear her philosophy.

Leah once attempted to explain how he got on the committee to negotiate with the university administration to open the stacks;

Leah: "There was an election in which I was elected by the students as a member of the negotiating committee."

Cloney: "How was the vote taken?"

Leah: "The people raised their hands."

Cloney: "It was a sort of impromptu yahoo affair, was it?"

Earlier, after Leah had replied to a question that his first name was Tony, Cloney answered back, "Tony is a nickname, eh? If your nickname was Squirt, I suppose you'd say your name was Squirt Leah."

Sword failed to impress judge

By PAUL McGRATH

Last year's acting U of T president Jack Sword stated Monday that he couldn't remember if he had told U of T police that occupiers of Simcoe Hall last March were to be treated as trespassers.

He was testifying at the trial of Tom McLaughlin, charged with obstruction of police during the break-up of the occupation when Sword called Metro police to evict the occupiers.

In the trial of Mark Goldblatt last fall, Sword had testified that "I gave no explicit instructions that they be regarded or charged as trespassers."

However, Judge Charles Drukarsh concluded he was "not impressed by (Sword's) manner" of testifying, "or the evidence he gave."

Under questioning from McLaughlin, who is defending himself, Sword testified that on March 12, operating "under general instructions as presiding officer of the Senate", he called in the Metropolitan Toronto Police to clear the Senate Chambers, as he felt the university police force was not large enough to handle the task.

He said they were called in "to remove those persons from the Senate chambers if they would not leave."

According to a document produced by the Crown Attorney that was sent, signed but undated, by Sword to the Metro police shortly after the incident, his instructions were that "only those who resisted were to be arrested or charged."

Sword also testified that he had posted people outside the doors of Simcoe Hall notifying all those that entered that they were doing so illegally. When asked if he had ever mentioned to U of T police that they should be treated as trespassers, Sword replied that he couldn't remember.

He said he had done this under his powers "related to the health of the institution", but added that he was "hesitant to claim final authority."

McLaughlin, and his aide U of T math professor Peter Rosenthal, ran into increasing difficulty with the rules of evidence during Monday's session.

Crown Attorney William Donaldson was quick to object to any violation of the rules, as McLaughlin tried to introduce evidence referring to past sit-ins at the university. Judge Cloney ruled that past incidents at the university were not relevant to his case, even though a Simcoe Hall in 1970 closely paralleled the occupation last March.

Rosenthal came into trouble with Cloney over evidence. According to the rules of evidence, Sword, a defense witness, could not be questioned over previous testimony. Detective Kearns, called to the stand by Donaldson, declared that he had heard Rosenthal tell McLaughlin that he could read from Sword's previous testimony contrary to an earlier ruling by Cloney.

The judge called Rosenthal "sneaky", and warned him, "Step out of line once more and you'll be excluded from this courtroom."

Best statesmen are women, says Scrivener

By DAVE LINE

Efficiency would be doubled if 250 women were elected to the House of Commons, according to St. David's Conservative MPP Margaret Scrivener, debating at Hart House Tuesday.

Scrivener felt that countries where women have been elected heads of state are farther ahead than Canada is and named India under prime minister Indira Ghandi as an example. The question for Debate was, "Women have no place in politics", to which Scrivener was opposed.

She stated that women have been excluded from politics because "man is a powerful animal" who does not wish to share his power with others. She said it is for this reason also that "for centuries women have been treated as chattel".

The Ayes opposed her views, saying legislation intended to equalize the sexes is ineffective because it cannot change the image of women, which they felt was most important.

They felt women are oppressed because as children they are socialized to accept a position of inferiority. In childhood, girls are taught to play with dolls and act out maternal roles, where as boys are given guns and trucks, one speaker pointed out.

Scrivener countered this point by listing many accomplishments of women in politics, and tracing their fight for political equality through the ages.

At the end of her 30 minute speech, it was suggested by the Ayes that Scrivener might be more effective if she changed sides. This sentiment received support from several members of the audience.

Tom Walkom (IV UC), speaking from the floor, suggested that the reason women do not take a greater part in politics is because it is so "incredibly boring".

Another observer remarked on the compatibility of the sexes. He suggested that men and women have complimentary strengths and should work together in politics.

All four of the debaters were men, as was a majority of the audience. The motion that women have no place in politics was defeated 30 to 8.

MPP Margaret Scrivener appeared at a Hart House debate Tuesday on woman in politics.

City moves closer to stopping Quebec-Gothic

By LORNE SLOTNICK

The bylaw allowing the controversial Quebec-Gothic apartment development to be built will likely be repealed at a special City Council meeting February 16.

The special meeting, which will hear presentations from supporters and opponents of the project was set up by a 12-8 city council vote early yesterday morning after a three-hour debate featuring almost every member of council.

However, not one of the speakers said that the four-tower development deserved to be built. Rather, the argument centred on the alleged financial risk to the city if the bylaw, originally passed in 1971, were to be repealed.

A report by City Solicitor William Callow has warned of "substantial" risk of a lawsuit from Cadillac and Greenwin, the developers of the project. E. A. Goodman, the developers' lawyer, told a buildings and development committee meeting Monday that the damages could amount to five million dollars.

Although the February 16 meeting is intended to "consider" repeal of the bylaw, it was obvious from the Aldermen's speeches that everyone who voted in favour of the meeting intends to vote in favour of the repeal. These 12 votes comprise a bare majority of council.

Favouring repeal were Elizabeth Eays, William Kilbourn, Karl Jaf-fary, Colin Vaughan, Mike Darcy Goldrick, Dorothy Thomas, Anne Johnston, Dan Heap, Archie Chisholm, John Sewell, Ying Hope, and Ed Negrice.

William Boytchuk declared a possible conflict of interest, and did not vote. Fred Beaves was absent, and George Ben slipped out of the council chamber just before the vote was taken.

Scott called the repeal a "dangerous and reckless gamble", but Sewell argued that the city "can expect to win in court" if the city is sued after repealing the bylaw.

Eggleton said the tax increase in the event of a successful lawsuit would "literally put people out of their homes." Ninety-nine houses would be destroyed if the development was built.

Crombie appealed to council to uphold the process that will send the bylaw to the Ontario Municipal Board for approval if council does not repeal it. He forecast that the OMB may let the city have the final decision.

"Go with the OMB route; I betcha it comes back" he declared.

But Jaffary argued that because of "changes in personnel" at the OMB — there is a new chairman — the results of OMB hearings are uncertain.

"What God giveth, God can taketh away," contended Ward 5 alderman Ying Hope.

Service union happy with seniority pact

Service Employees' International Union Local 204 is "very definitely" satisfied with the university's decision on its layoff seniority grievance, says its business agent Don Barclay.

The decision was that the maximum notice possible of temporary layoffs would be given, and efforts would be made, "where practicable", to arrange layoffs so that workers with the least seniority would be laid off first.

The grievance arose after 11 workers in the grounds crew were laid off with the minimum five days' notice. The union complained that the layoff should have been in inverse order of seniority university-wide.

Barclay admitted to unilaterally calling off a demonstration Monday after the university rehired the workers because of the weekend's snowfall.

He did, so, he said, because university labour relations manager John Parker verbally agreed before the demonstration on future procedure for temporary layoffs.

Although Parker told The Varsity shortly after the abortive demonstration that he had not yet made a decision, yesterday he said he wasn't sure when the decision was made.

Barclay explained that a fight occurred between him and Stop the Student Surcharge Committee chairman Peter Havers Monday at the demonstration site after he replied to a Havers' questions that his union supported the fees strike if it was carried out by a proper legislative body such as SAC.

Havers, said Barclay, declared that "SAC was a sellout agent of the students and the Service Employees were sellout agents of the workers, hand in hand with the university."

Screaming and yelling between the two developed, according to Barclay, during which Havers moved closer to Barclay and moved his arm in what Barclay thought was a threatening gesture.

"I took a shot at him," Barclay said, because he was worried Havers was going to hit him. He was not sure if the blow had landed.

Immediately, a scuffle developed, the agent said, but was quickly broken up when others intervened.

The SSSC, which attended to support the demonstration, was described as "one and the same" as the Canadian Liberation Movement by Barclay. He said the SEIU supported neither CLM nor the SSSC.

Board suspects chameleon firm

Acme workers on picketline in October. UAW v-p Dennis McDermott says picketing will resume.

By PETER MATILAINEN

The Ontario Labour Relations Board decided Wednesday in favour of striking workers of Canadian Acme Screw and Gear when they accepted their union's contention that it and Canac Shock Absorbers Ltd., which now operates from the former Acme plant site, can be considered as "one and the same".

This is the union's first taste of victory in their struggle to get out of work employees of the plant reinstated, following the shutdown of the first company.

The union will attempt now to prove that the company site and equipment has not changed hands, and therefore no sale has been accomplished.

Canac-Acme representatives are challenging the right of the board to hear evidence from the principals of Acme this and have appealed to the Divisional Court of Ontario to prevent the union from calling them before the board. The court will hear evidence on Monday, to decide whether the March 15 OLRB hearing will be allowed to hear evidence from the principals, the Levy brothers.

The OLRB's ruling followed lengthy presentations by the Canac-Acme lawyers who hoped to prevent Ben, Mark and Edward Levy of Levy Industries from taking the stand. It allows the union to investigate the financial operations of their employers, the Levy brothers, and to try to make clear some of the entanglements that make up their dealings which United Auto Workers vice-president Dennis McDermott described as "corporate wizardry".

The union, UAW Local 984, went on strike last summer after workers refused to take a second 18 month wage freeze that was demanded by the company. Acme then announced on August 23 that they were closing down, putting the 510 workers out of work.

Some have now been able to find work elsewhere, but most are depending on the union to win their jobs back.

The company (Canac) offered to let the UAW certify a union in the plant, but refused to take back all the striking workers. They have hired over 60 non-union workers instead and will not give any returning worker his seniority and wage levels held before the strike.

If the final board decision goes against the union, other companies may shut down and reopen "new" firms every time a contract runs out, warned McDermott.

Late fees penalty charged

Penalties for late payment of second term tuition fees are being exacted according to schedule. U of T vice-president Jill Conway indicated last night.

She confirmed an earlier refusal of the administration in spite of SAC's attempts to persuade otherwise, to continue its "liberal interpretations" of regulations to not charge the $15 fee past February 1, yesterday.

Although she did not know if students paying their instalment due yesterday were charged the fee, "if instructions were followed correctly, the fees office would have charged the fee," she said.

She saw no possibility "at the moment" of the policy being reversed.

Or when dealing with a press reluctant to give a campaign event the publicity it needs: "one group of protesters used to get excellent coverage through a member who used to ring the press and television the day before in a hectoring upper-class voice and tell them not to cover this exhibitionist display by a tiny handful of trouble-makers, that it would be irresponsible to publicize people who opposed the rightful authority, and that he would make trouble if they sent their cameras and reporters just because the other lot were covering it."

It is important, however, to recognize the limitations of the approach of the Householder's Guide. It is a strictly defensive, conservative approach, useful for preserving neighbourhoods, but having little value for those seeking to re-structure blighted areas, or those wanting to organize for wider social change.
The book is clearly conservative and middle-class in its orientation (witness the title). It emphasizes the polite organized approach of educated professionals in dealing with bureaucracies — efficient in some instances, but hardly suited to an angry working-class community aroused over basic social inequities.

Beyond this, it even serves to deflect activism. With its stress on opposition to government bureaucracies, it ignores the main cause for the destruction of communities: the imperatives of a social system based on private ownership of land and corporations, imperatives which compel both business and government leaders to act in socially destructive ways.

Further, it helps to spread the fallacies of community control, a concept which ignores the fact that power is organized on a wider level than the community, and not susceptible to 'community control', that power is often corporate rather than governmental, a concept which stresses the supposed homogeneity of the "community", rather than the opposing class interests within it which exist in fact.

It would be interesting to speculate, for example, how much social change could be achieved if the energies used in this type of organizing were directed to organizing against the capitalist system itself.

Nevertheless, on its level, it does make a contribution.
While some of the tactical advice it proposes is well-known to those who have worked in election campaigns or who have read Saul Alinsky, a good deal of it is new, and interesting. And some of it could even be adapted to radical kinds of organizing.

There is no alternative to the overthrow of the capitalist system that lies at the root of most urban problems. But campaigns directed at preserving neighbourhoods and trees have some value, since it is desirable to preserve as much of our urban environment as possible from being laid waste by corporations and their bed-fellows in government. We have to live in the present, after all, while organizing for the right to determine our futures in socialism. And, since the revolution isn't coming tomorrow, we're better off to at least have liveable neighbourhoods and shady trees.

Altman's slick "Images" baffles brilliantly

Robert Altman's movies M.A.S.H., Brewster McCLOUD, and McCabe and Mrs. Miller, have been very, very good, but in such a trendy way that one is reluctant to rank him among the great filmmakers. So far he appears to be one of the greats, but I can't help remembering Tony Richardson and Tom Jones: what seemed great at the time was merely early. The tricks Richardson introduced have been done far better since. Seeing Tom Jones now, you're embarrassed at having been crazy about such a bad movie.

Altman's trick, and it is one of the few things connecting his movies to one another, is to blend the story into the background as if the characters were making it up and we stumbled onto it by a mix of perceptiveness and good luck. It is a conceit, of course. We know that Altman is planting what he intends to reap. But he does it with thrift: he knows that he doesn't need scenes to establish Julie Christie's affection for Warren Beatty (in McCabe). He just places her squerily in the background centre when the news is delivered that gunmen are after Beatty. She looks worried. So does everyone else, but everyone else is not Julie Christie, and Altman leaves the rest to inference, there being no doubt as to what we will infer. Ultimately, as movie conventions change, this demi-direction may start to appear pretty arch and contrived. But for now it works, and so well, that we project extra virtues. We find a humanism in M.A.S.H. that really isn't there; we allow the good bits of Brewster McCLOUD — how many different ways can persons face the problem of having to say "birdshit" — to overshadow the stuff that is just plain weird; and we hardly notice that McCabe and Mrs. Miller has been the classic Western (the small farmer vs the big cattle-baron. When Warren Beatty gets up from the card-table to go outside and pee, we are so grateful to find him doing that that we forget it is Altman and not biology that commanded the act.

Images, Altman's new movie opening tonight at Cinecity, is his first one that doesn't work. He has added a level and somewhere in the welter of visions — the audience's the director's, the characters', and now the mad heroine's — the whole cart topples over, spilling Images all over the place. It is still a stunning movie and most of the screening audience appeared to leave the theatre upset and confused. But the upset didn't push in any direction and the confusion didn't synthesize into anything. A movie that powerful ought to do more than tease.

Susannah York plays Cathryn, a youngish, rich, attractive English wife who is cracking up. She envisions and converses with people whom other characters cannot see; she phones warnings to herself that her husband is cheating on her. At her urging, the husband takes her to an isolated country place in Ireland. He then leaves her there alone. She drifts in and out of fantasy and may or may not murder someone.

Of course plot is never central to Altman movies. In Brewster McCLOUD it didn't matter that loose ends dangled all over. The film was essentially a satirical revue with a theme, a school show of a movie, and like all school shows, it got by on verve and wit, not continuity. But Altman has the same careless attitude to plot in Images and this time I can't go along with him because there is nothing else solid enough to grab hold of. In McCabe the characters were so gritty that they carried their own story. And the lampoons, M.A.S.H. and Brewster McCLOUD assumed the reality of the things they made fun of. But in Images we are half the time wired to the personal visions of a woman whose history we don't know and who is herself confused as to what she is seeing. The rest of the time we are following a director who is more desperately than ever trying to cover his tracks. We are at a loss as to what to think of much that goes on.

René Auberjonois, as the husband, for instance, wears gloves to the point of a Dicken-begged question at the centre of Images, a card missing. Like a conversation on LSD, sentences start full of promise and energy, only to realize no conclusion. The movie is ultimately as diffuse as its title. To retain it we have to care, and to care we have to know more than we are given to work on. To be sure, there is Altman's usual bevy of clues secreted about corners of the movie, but they are clues to what is going on, artist, a master at composition. I found myself almost completely at his mercy, being shocked when he contrived to shock, taking relief where he gave it. (At the end of a particularly grueling thirty minutes or so, there is a shot of a lake at sunset. The whole audience exhaled.) I have quibbles: some tricks that got caught, too many prismatic, tinkly things and lurking lenses. But basically Images works like good Hitchcock, nothing less, but, unfortunately nothing more. And not only do we want more, but we know Altman was trying for more.

Unlike Hitchcock, Altman is more than a master craftsman and entertainer. With Images he obviously wanted to explore madness, possibly woman's psyche, and certainly the line between fantasy and reality. Perhaps he was bound to fail because film is such a blithely realistic medium — the theatre is much more open to such questions. We know too much about what cameras and editing can do to jump from the ease of filming a fantasy suddenly come to life, to the horror of having it reelly happen. If this is not a failure inherent in the medium, I can think of no director better equipped to try it again. But for now, Altman bit off more than he could chew.

sian fetish: is this his characterization or is it his wife's fantasy? A neighbour, Hugh Millais, is monomaniacal in lusting after Cathryn. Somehow we have to read this as both how she sees him, and as the reason that she sees him as she does. It would work alright if there was other, conclusive evidence as to why Cathryn is cracking, but here the evidence and examples are one and the same. There is a not to How Come it is going on. Coming out of the theatre, we wanted to talk about the film, only to find that there was not enough to talk about.

Images does not, however, cast any doubt on Altman's talent. Such is his control that the person with whom I saw the film hated it from the first frame. Take that as a back-handed complement to a visually relentless

Workshop not up to Gogol's Inspector General

Toronto Workshop Productions has undertaken to stage the comic masterpiece of Russian theatre, The Inspector General. Judging from the resulting performance, this seems to have been an unfortunate move, for, despite certain original touches and some funny moments, the production does not live up to its material.

Nikolai Gogol's comic satire of provincial life in Tsarist Russia requires delicate treatment. On one hand it is wordy, requiring incredible skill in acting and directing to create an interesting variety of comic nuances in the text. On the other hand, its characters are ugly caricatures, providing numerous occasions for slapstick-type comedy. The English translation is stilted, providing the added difficulty of making a strange-sounding text seem natural. These are the kinds of problems Stratford should tackle. This company is not ready yet.

The treatment here is heavy-handed. The mayor, a grotesque tyrant, is constantly shouting, so that we become immune to the humorous content of his outbursts. His confidences to the audience are well-staged, but there is not enough vocal variation to give them the necessary comic rhythm. The other officials in the town are not caricatured with enough conviction or physical detail to make them laughable. Only the portrayal of the twin bourgeois, Bobchinsky and Dobchinsky approaches the sublime combination of satire and slapstick intended by Gogol.

As mentioned before, there are original touches. The design is intended to promote the sense of hysteria engendered by the arrival of the inspector. The mayor's drawing room is surrounded by a path representing the little town; it leads on one side to the inn, where the inspector is discovered, and on the other to the rest of the mayor's house. Upstage, painted backdrops depict provincial life, and a series of open corridors are available for several absurd sequences where the townspeople rush about hysterically. It is a set with interesting possibilities. The inn scene became a little irritating, though, when the path was exploited as a way of digressing before the audience. One had the feeling that the lack of economy in the blocking was an attempt to disguise a lack of faith in the text.

Khlestakov, the office-clerk turned inspector general, is given the most convincing portrait.

This tall, spindly bundle of affectations reaches his most grotesque point when he courts the mayor's daughter. Both daughter and mother are amusing characterisations in themselves, but do provide the comedy suggested by the juxtaposition of their personality differences. The caricatures have to be pushed further and the rhythm of their interchanges used more sensitively.

This is not an entirely bad production. As mentioned before, there are some funny moments. It is only disappointing that the company that has appeared so polished in contemporary productions such as Hey Rubel! is not up to handling a classic like The Inspector General.

Director wants more woman film-makers

Sylvia Spring, Canada's first female feature film director, spoke Tuesday night at the Faculty of Education Auditorium, as a participant in the continuing series of lectures sponsored by the Interdisciplinary Studies Women's Course (INX 260, Woman: Oppression and Liberation).

Spring made her first feature, Madeline Is, in 1968 in Vancouver in "pre-awarans days". The film concerns a young woman who seeks escape, through a fantasy clown on a magic island, from her relationship with a domineering, egotistical, brutish pseudo-revolutionary man. The film ends with Madeleine, having rid herself of both the clown and the monster, standing alone and laughing.

Spring now works in television, and is about to start her second feature, this time with an all-women crew working collectively, rather than in the hierarchies that are normal in the film industry. Spring explained during her informal, personalized talk, that she had great hopes for women working in film, because she feels that women are more used to working co-operatively, without competition or battles of egos.

Her first film was made with an all-male crew, who were all young purists interested only in the abstract ideal of Art. Now she is questioning all her earlier assumptions about artistic standards and the relationship between politics and art.

Spring outlined the thought-processes that she had gone through when asked to lecture. She took as her model Virginia Woolf's A Room of One's Own, asking how it applied to her as a modern feminist and to film rather than literature.

She wondered about Woolf's ideal of "androgynous fiction" and the necessity of transcending one's sexuality, looking to films made by other women directors for examples. She concluded that women do have a special vision which combines the personal, political, and artistic, all planted firmly in a woman's point of view.

With an enthusiasm which quickly captured the audience, Spring described several films by women, and own personal responses. Mai Zetterling's The Girls had its audience, including Spring, shouting and waving their fists. Spring said that the film was not only deeply complex and superbly made, but obviously provided a much-needed "non-destructive" outlet for the repressed anger of the women in the audience.

Nelly Kaplan's Le fiencce du pirate (Dirty Mary) also showed a woman triumphing after a life as the town slut, rising to expensive prostitution and thereby attaining both economic power and the means to revenge herself on all the people of the village who had used and despised her.

Spring noted that most of the recent films by women are about women, and that a surprising number end with the women heroes laughing — her own, Kaplan's, and Mireille Dansereau's Le vie revea, which is the first feature made by a woman in Quebec, and which this year won the special jury prize in the Canadian Film Awards. Spring told of a conversation with Dansereau, who said that the films must end with women laughing, since we are refusing to be victims any longer.

Spring mentioned her own experiences as a woman filmmaker, her troubles in raising money to make the films, her present hassles with male co-workers at CBC, and her plans for the future, which include forming her own company, Fromunder Films, to make movies with women crews.

She spoke of several other positive projects now underway with women in film and the media. Last week radio, television, and newspaper journalists met to discuss ways of combating the negative images of women perpetuated by men (and some women) in the media.

For the last five months a group of women has been organizing a huge international festival of films by women, to be held in the St. Lawrence Centre for ten days in June, 1973. The festival will gather films from the past and the present, from all over the world, in many genres and styles, all made by women. Most of them haven't been seen in Toronto before.

Spring concluded by showing a short film that she made in 1967 as a pilot for her later feature. But just before the film began, she asked some questions, leaving them for the audience to think about.

What are our critical standards of film or any art? Where did these standards come from? Are they male-defined? Are they suitable to women? Do the sexes necessarily have the same artistic aims and ideals? Are women ready to reach the "higher reality" of pure art? Do we want to?

Verdoux is offbeat

"With deep regret" wrote film critic James Agee in The Nation, "I must postpone my attempt to review Chaplain's Monsieur Verdoux. I cannot hope to do it justice. . . I think it is one of the best movies ever made." When Agee had composed himself enough to write three lengthy columns on this 1947 film, his enthusiasm did not flag. In comparison to "this great poet and his great poem" he asserted, "every movie since Modern Times and Zéro pour Conduite is so much child's play."

These are startling comments about a film which is so obscure. You can investigate the matter further, if you wish, because Monsieur Verdoux is in town now, at the Eglington. I recommend that you do.

It is an odd film. Henri Verdoux is a resourceful milquetoast of a bank clerk who, fired from his job after 30 years, devises other means to support his wife and child. He is forever darting off on journeys, and his family thinks him an entrepreneur; so, with a bracingly ironic eye, does he see himself. "Business is a ruthless business" he remarks at one point, and he conducts his own with an impeccable ruthlessness.

Verdoux's business is murdering rich, lonely women and investing their money. He seems to take particular delight, not in murder, but in the suavity and polish of his operations. When a snoop from the homicide bureau catches up with him and expects to bully the timid murderer into a confession, Verdoux dispatches him smoothly, displaying only the clipped satisfaction a riverboat gambler or stock market speculator might allow himself on bringing off a dishonest, but very neat, deal; a "killing".

A brassy, indestructible woman (Martha Raye) is his one big failure. She has as many lives as a litter of kittens, but Verdoux doggedly persists in trying to do her in. These lethal schemes supply the film's force, and are the most sure-footed moments in the movie (Chaplain's indisputable genius being a comic one).

It's the rest of the thing that bothers people. The icy, cynical dialogue has the portentous sound of scriptwriters' aphorisms, and there are, as always in Chaplain, glutinous lumps of sentimentality. The story lurches uncertainly from the philosophical to the macabre to the bofo. There are, in short, chunks aplenty in the movie (as there are in Cabaret) for detractors to wedge their crowbars in and pull it apart. What is disputable is whether Monsieur Verdoux merits such demolition.

My own feelings are in disarray. I enjoyed Verdoux, but might easily have convinced myself into thinking it wasn't a very good movie. Agee checked that, at the risk of my fabricating a weird, cryptic defense of the film as a "masterpiece". The upshot of all this is that I started looking around and under the flaws and clumsiness to see what else Verdoux had to offer.

First, it offers Chaplain's most disciplined and subtle dramatic performance. It offers some inspired grotesquerie on the part of minor characters. And it offers an unobtrusively cohesive script, eloquent in its details.

None of these details is forced. In fact (Chaplain not being one to soft-peddle his fator, others have called them as elemental end terrifying as Lear. The fact is, such a reazor's edge is walked that your reaction will depend almost wholly on what you expect. You might even want to turn Verdoux into one of those parlor games like "soul" vs "strait city" or "messcult" vs "midcult" that cleave the world neatly into two groups. Even that's OK, as long as you get out to see Verdoux.

A few more words about Agee. Dwight MacDonald, who claims to be a friend of Agee's, took it upon himself some years ago to explain away all that extraordinary praise. Agee had such a fine directorial sense, according to his rationale, that he remade every movie inside his head. Then he proceeded to review, not the actual film, but points) I wonder whether the director realized what an allusive, tightly-knit screenplay he had produced. This, I think, is illustrative of the basic problem both with Chaplain and this movie. When he is conscious of an effect and grasps for it, he is a butcher. When he acts, or writes, or directs through his instincts, he is an artist.

Monsieur Verdoux is the most ambitious and most schizoid of Chaplain's films. Nowhere is this more apparent than in the ending, where Verdoux, his wife and child lost, his profession abandoned, allows himself to be captured. With bitter composure, he addresses the court, the press, even the church. He refuses the traditional cigaret on his way to the guillotine, but accepts a glass of rum. "I've never tasted rum before."

Some critics have lumped these last moments together with the disastrous soliloquies in Limelight and The Great Dic- the much more interesting movie that existed in his imagination.

This is a curious criticism. How else does a poem, or a painting, or film become "art" but by setting off reactions within the imagination? MacDonald writes as though a film were a pattern of light and darkness on a large screen sixty feet before his eyes, caused by beaming light through treated celluloid. And this is how he reviews them, in a crabbed, mechanical way. Like John Simon's, his comments may be astute or informative, but they are mere annotations. Both men are monumentally unimaginative reviewers. Agee's writing, by contrast, like Pauline Kael's, is exciting because it strikes off so many sparks.

That is why Agee and Kael are the two best writers on film in English, critics whose opinions are a delight to read even on films never seen, or long forgotten.

Bill McVicar

Ian & Sylvia matured

There have been a great many trends and innovations in the music of the early sixties which was the home for folkies for whom "Four Strong Winds" became something of a Canadian National anthem. Ian & Sylvia, the originators of that classic, went on the boards at Massey Hall last Sunday night to prove that their music has matured with the times. Oh they sang "Winds" alright, but saved it for one of three enthusiastically applauded encores; the main body of their concert was a rich blend of close-harmony duets, such as "Some Day Soon", and some throaty, sexy blues solos from Sylvia, such as "Time For Change".

Sylvia's style diverged considerably from the accustomed wisp delivery of Baez-folky volcings, with her cocktail torch-blues version of "Losing Is An Easy Game" — a tune on which lead guitarist David Wilcox earned an ovation to signify approval of his excellent licks as he led the Great Speckled Bird to an uninspired, but adequate back-up performance.

Interspersed with Ian & Sylvia material that an almost capacity audience seemed to know and love, were such songs as the "line-out" religious folk-song "Amazing Grace", and a new Canadian epic Ian is composing in parts on the current coast-to-coast tour — "The Grand Canadian Tour". Ian's introduction of close friend Adam Mitchell — a former rock musician — opened the second half of the concert, and Mitchell surprised the crowd with his own songs which were inventive and above all humorous in a Roger Miller kind of way.

Probably the most critical thing a purist Ian & Sylvia fan might remark regarding this concert was that its brevity — slightly under the two and a half hour accepted time limit — was not correspondingly marked by any reduction from the normal concert prices.

Falstaff surpasses flaws

It took a great deal of persuasion on the part of librettist Arrigo Boito to get the egeed Verdi to write one last opera. That opera, Falstaff, was first performed in 1813 in Verdi's 80th year, setting to music a skillful libretto for which Boito drew heavily on Shakespeare's comedy The Merry Wives of Windsor. The mainstay of Boito's persuasive arguments is the libretto itself. Gone are the maudlin plots, the melodramatic exaggerations of Aida and Trovere; Falstaff is a tightly woven comic opera where music and action are inextricably intermeshed and characters are painted with both words and notes.

Its completeness and self-sufficiency make Falstaff a difficult opera to stage. The University of Toronto Opera Department did a generally splendid job in this regard, when they performed Verdi's comic masterpiece at the MacMillan Theater, January 24 to 29.

Vocally, the production was strong, especially the two male leads, Avo Kittask (Falstaff) and Glyn Evans (Fenton). Kittask, who sang this role in the Falstaff fragment presented in 1971 has a powerful voice and fine comic timing. As he lumbered on stage in Act III, his bald dome festooned with stag's antlers, he resembled some grotesquely rotund Wotan, the classic everyman, cuckolded by the world. Of the merry wives, Jill Pert as Dame Quickly made the most of this well-written comic role, with much gesturing and mugging. The major problem confronting some of the singers was that an excessively loud and brassy orchestra

(this is a chamber opera) forced them to strain, thus exaggerating the discrepancies between their strong and weak registers. In Act II, Ford's big aria was constantly in danger of being swamped by the trumpet accompaniment, actually fading to inaudibility in the lower registers. This is not to fault the singers but rather the orchestra for the lack of sensitivity by which such vocal shortcomings are usually bridged.

The orchestral tempi were generally good, both stage and pit skillfully commanded by Maestro Barbin. The brass sounds of the score were quite strong, and unequally matched by the required contrast of quick soft string notes. Violins were at fault here, with sloppy phrase endings and a general lack of finesse, especially in accompanying the "patter-songs" in Act I. Verdi's writing here has been compared by some to Wagner; yet Verdi takes Wegner's upward sweeping chromatic storms, turns them upside down and serves them softly, with détaché phrasing. Unlike some of Verdi's operas, where the orchestra merely serves as an amorphous setting for opulent ariatic jewels, Falstaff requires perfection of every intricate detail both on stage and in the pit to put the production across.

Stage direction was difficult to judge in Act I, since the cast seemed a little tired of the slapstick shenanigans required. Added to this was an unusually somnolent audience, January 29, resulting in a visually flat beginning. The pace picked up in Acts II and III, and the fairy scene at the end was a delight. Considering the economy of set changes, the sets designed by Ed Kotanen were rather drab in colour and contour while the doorways and platforms often seemed to obstruct the flow of movement. The colourful and imaginative costumes (including a Dr. Cajus dressed as the perfect Elizabethan fop, complete with Walter Raleigh's collar, hat and beard) were a delightful contrast and great credit to Suzanne Mess, the designer.

Much has been said about the inferiority of Act III in comparison to the rest of the opera. It is static in action, and musically Verdi (who is said to have drawn considerably on Beethoven for inspiration) almost capsize the boat with his own version of the Grosse Fuge. Whatever the answer to these problems, it is not in the dancers who appeared ex machina in this act to gesticulate in an uncoordinated fashion during Nanetta's one big aria. While dancing is "traditional" in operas, this is no traditional opera, and must be treated with consideration.

Avo Kittask sings as the great Falstaff.

Mahler, Chopin fill discs

I do not believe Gustav Mahler's seventh symphony is anywhere near as good as his fifth, sixth or ninth symphonies, but it does pack a wallop and emerges filled with Mahler's customary brilliant instrumental flourishes, and long elegant melodic lines. A more or less recent recording by Raphael Kubelick and his Bavarian Radio Symphony (from his integral set) has stiff competition with the also recently released version of Solli and the Chicago Symphony, which some consider among the three best orchestras in the world.

Kubelick has a fine feeling for detail (as does Solli), and the lyrical line of a piece. The andante amoroso receives an especially graceful and fluent reading. Consequently, this seventh is idiomatically accented and nicely outlined. Like Solli at times, though, he does not fully enhance the tone, but rather leaves the strings to decide their own power output — an undemanding conductor is like a low-power amplifier. Depending on the listener, this is a good or bad thing. It is not Bernstein's way, and if it is not your way you should turn to his version of the seventh.

Kubelick is probably more at home in the serene Mahler, like the sixth, and the fact that his old Brahms Fourth is one of the best in the catalogue supports this notion. The DGG sound is fine, although the trumpet was slightly distorted throughout. A concluding remark might be that if you like (end of course you should — the point is if you're a nut on) inner voices of the orchestra, Kubelick gives each one opera diva attention. Mahler's Seventh Symphony, Kubelick and the Bavarian Radio Symphony, DGG. 11st $13.96.

There are many solo piano Chopin discs coming out these days, and of course "that's what we want" chorus Chopin buffs. Ivan Davis is a relative newcomer to the international concert stage and one of his first recordings is an all-Chopin effort. The pieces include the Fantasia Impromptu in C sharp minor, a Barcarole in F sharp minor and the famous Valse in C sharp minor. Davis' tone in these works is comparatively unpoetic, although it is rounded and at times eloquently understated when the notes demand, as in the opus 10 Etude. His choice of phrasing seems often dictated by the difficulties of the score rather than by his mastery of those difficulties. In other words, certain passages sound the way they do because he might not be able to play them articulately any other way. But we can only make judgements like this because we have Rubinstein's and Rachmaninoff's who have done as they pleased, and superlatively. There was a nice ruminative delicacy in the first Ballade, and in general much fine playing. So the record may well serve as an introduction to Chopin for initiates as well as to Ivan Davis for Chopin buffs hitherto unacquainted with his playing. Either Davis or the engineers muted the sound — it is deep but shy on highs. Pleno Muelc of Chopin, Iven Davis, SPC 21071, 11st $6.29. London Four Phase.

Here is more Chopin, but by a resident master (residing in this century, that is). Vladimir Ashkenazy is not too keen on recording these days, but he did agree to do two concerts before cameras for Allegro Films and both sound tracks are being sold separately on London discs. Side One is devoted to the Funeral March sonata (no.2) and is as finely architected as any recently making its entry into the catalogue. And since we can take his proficiency for granted, it is nice to be lulled through the nocturnes (nos.1 and 2 of opus 15) without biting our nails over how he will manage with the Grand Valse at the end of the second side. The other work on side 2 is the A flat mazurka.

The sound, unlike the Phase Four disc reviewed above, is sharp, natural, as well as amply resonant. Part of the credit can go to the Allegro Films, by the way, is a non-avant-garde yet extremely enterprising producer of art films, which both the CBC, channel 19 and NET are wisely picking up.) The televised concert will be seen sometime in the near future. Chopin Racifal, Vladimir Ashkenazy, London CS 6794. List price, $6.29.

EDITOR THE VARSITY

The Varsity Board of Directors invites applications for the position of Editor-in-Chief of The Varsity for the 1973-74 academic year. The Editor is responsible to the Board in all matters affecting the newspaper. As the job carries considerable authority, applicants should submit detailed proposals for the management of the paper. These may include proposed changes in the current format, editorial policy, or internal structure, and names of prospective staff. The amount available for production staff salaries in recent years has ranged from $7,500 to $10,800 per publishing year, including a salary of $3,150 for a full time editor.

Applicants will be interviewed both by the current Varsity staff and the Board of Directors, with the Board making the final decision. The editor may be removed from his or her post only by concurrent decision of The Varsity staff and the Board.

women

The women's studies course in the Interdisciplinary Studies department is continuing its series of lectures in the second term, through February and March. The lectures, which are open to men, take place every Tuesday at 7:30 pm in the auditorium of the College of Education (on the south side of Bloor between Spadina and Huron.)

This Tuesday, a film on 'Sexuality and Communication' is being presented. On February 20, Lorene Clark speaks on male roles and male sexuality. On February 27, there is a panel discussion of radical lesbianism. Welfare and single parent families are the topic on March 6, followed on March 13 by a panel on women in the penal system. The March 20 lecture is on communal living and day care, and the final one, on March 27, has Abigail Hoffman speaking on women in the athletic profession.

movies

Friday and Saturday St. Mike's is running Arthur Penn's crack at the Great American Western Epic, Little Big Man. It isn't the Great Epic, but there is plenty of entertaining stuff along the way and some that is quite sensitive, particularly in comparison to other entries in the G.A.W.E. sweepstakes. With Dustin Hoffman and Chief Dan George. $1. Also Friday The Battle of Algiers plays the 99c Roxy. It's a moving, deeply angry movie that retains its political commitment without idealizing the Resistance or caricaturing the French.

Sunday night, the SMC Sunday series continues with Welles' The Magnificent Ambersons, one of Bill MacVicar's all-time favourites.

On Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, Emile de Antonio will be on display at the Roxy along with his films: Tuesday, In the Year of the Pig and Millhouse, Wednesday, Point of Order and Millhouse, and Thursday, his new film Painters. 99c.

All week, La Vrele Nature de Benadette, the most praised Quebec film since Mon Oncle Antoine, continues at Cinemalumiere. Haven't seen it. $2, I think. And the Avenue Cinema is reviving Bob and Carol and Ted and Alice. I wonder how it looks in retrospect. If you go, be sure to avoid Getting Straight, the companion feature. I think it is the worst movie I ever saw.

pop

The Stanley Steamer coffeehouse is in danger of ending operation. It will be open only tonight this weekend, and needs all the support it can get. String Band, featuring Bob Bossin, can be heard for only $1. The Steamer is located in the basement of Neill-Wyck College on Gerrard Street, east of Yonge.

Three expatriates from the U.S., who reside in England, make up the soft rock group, America. Their sound is dominated by acoustic guitars and Crosby-Stills-Nash-type harmonies. America is at Masey Hall tonight.

Luke Gibson and the Kitalo Mountain Band is at Ethere's Restaurant in Rochdale, tonight and tomorrow. The set starts at 10 p.m. and admission is $2.50.

John Allan Cameron, a lone country-toolk fiddler hailing from Capa Braton, is at the Riverboat Coffeehouse, 134 Yorkville, until Sunday. Call 922-6216 for information.

The Wer-Towar of Power concert slated for Thursday has been cancelled. One of the members of War is Canadian and would not be able to return to the US until his working papers were approved. The concert may be rescheduled in March.

If you've ever browsed through a well stocked record store, you've probably noticed the myriad of new albums by groups you've never heard (an probably never will, thank to the restricted playlist policy of Toronto's only so-called "progressive" radio station, CHUM-FM). Until recently, I used to wonder about the kind of music that was hidden under the plastic-covered jackets, destined to remain unheard unless I risked the cash. But lately I've been afforded the pleasure (?) of listening to stacks of unplayed records and I soon reached the conclusion that they are almost all garbage. The main reason that I'm telling you this is that even though 95 per cent of it is trash (compared to about 70 percent of the things that do get played) there is still a lot of truly great music that is overlooked.

Two albums in particular have caught my ear in the last few months and I've yet to hear them on any radio station. The best is the second LP by a four-man English group called Caravan. Waterloo Lilly (London) is a well-produced blend of intelligent rock with strong jazz overtones. The flowing melodic shifts led by Steve Miller's (not the guitar player) beautiful electric piano and Pye Hastings's guitar are reminiscent of Stevie Winwood and Dave Mason at their best. A twelve-minute melange of tunes beginning with "The Love in Your Eyes" really deserves to be heard. The song begins in the style of the Moody Blues and quickly shifts into traffic type music featuring piano, flute and guitar.

The other interesting album is Introducing The Iceman's Band (Mercury). The LP features the instrumental work of Jerry Butler's back-up quartet and intersperses a Few Female, background vocals. The music is mostly original and well arranged and owes a lot to Isaac Hayes (and maybe even Herbie Mann) for its funky sound.

theatre

The Drama Centre presents The Intruder, a play by Maurice Maeterlinck, February 7, 8, 9, 10 at 8:30 pm. Maeterlinck was called a mystic and his plays were termed symbolic. People like to define silence and examine stillness. Maeterlinck believed he wrote plays. The Intruder is the second he wrote. Richard Shotchet Playing at the Studio Theatre, 4 Glen Morris Street. Admission free.

Global Village premieres yet another musical on February 8, with low price previews February 6 and 7. This time it's Eyes, "a gothic musical", described as a "blend of Gothic sensibility and contemporary emotions set to music." It runs Tuesday through Saturday with regular seats $3.50, students and seniors, $2.00 and rush seats $1.50.

The U of T Troupe Cate Theatre brings to life its cabaret in the sub-basement of the Praff Library on February 8 at 8:30 with an evening called Tardisquement la votre.

Two interesting openings will take place on February 6. Toronto Free Theatre will feature Gabe, a "serio-comic play" dealing with the myth of Louis Riel and his general, Gabriel Dumont. The theatre is located at 24 Berkeley Street, near Front and Parliament. At the Tarragon Theatre, you can see another play by David Freeman, the author of Creeps, (a successful work dealing with the lives of cerebral palsy victims). This one is called Battering Ram.

Nikolai Gogol's The Inspector General opened a Toronto Workshop Productions last week. It plays Tuesdays through Sundays. For more information, see today's review.

Juno and the Paycock opened Tuesday night at the Irish Arts Theatre, West Park School. Sean O'Casey's classic runs until February 18. A Touch of the Poet continues at the St. Lawrence Centre (see today's review), as does Two Gentlemen of Verona at the O'Keefe Centre.

Once Hamlet has completed its run at Hart House this weekend, Little Ma, a Neil Simon musical will take its place. Victoria College Music Club will present it from February 6 to 10 at 8:30 pm. Tickets are $2.00 and $2.50.

Tonight and tomorrow night you can see The Lendlord and Tenant Act a comedy by Randy Brown (who very well may be a student but we are not certain). This will take place in Room 3 of Victoria College at 8:30 pm. Admission is fifty cents.

play works by Newsidler, Bach, Becker, Sor, Busotti, Heubensstock Ramati, Luciano Berio, McCabe. He is accompanied by his wife, Claudia Brodzinska. The concert is free and guitar maniacs should flock to the concert (not to mention regular music freaks).

The Toronto Symphony will be conducted by the popular Spanish conductor, Rafael Fruhback de Burgoe in a performance of Haydn's second or third best symphony, the 88th. Furtwangler fans will be listening with ears attuned to the register of the Berlin Philharmonic in the performance of this work, which is otherwise under-represented in the current catalogue. Other works in this concert are Bruch's dispensable violin concerto, but perhaps made not so by the playing of Pinchas Zukerman, violinist and De Falla's much-played but yet much-loved Three-Cornered Hat ballet suite. (We apologize to all Mozart enthusiasts for our unfortunate neglect of the Mozart Requiem played last week.)

Gellary Seventy Six is hosting students Pet Morley and Brian Naal until February 4. At the Shaw-Rimington Gellary, which is closed Mondays, the Society of Canadian Artists has an exhibition until February 16. Beginning Saturday until the 25 at the Art Gallery of Ontario is an exhibition of paintings and sculptures of Dutch artist Karel Appel. There is a public tour the first day at 2:30 and others on the 7, 8 and 10.

music

The University of Toronto Concert Band presents the second performance of its tenth anniversary season on Sunday, February 4 at 3 pm in the MacMillan Theatre of the Edward Johnson Building, playing music by Shostakovich, Gustav Holst, the E flat trumpet concerto of Hummet and Bartok's Petite Suite. Soloist in the Hummel is Stephen Chenette, new faculty member, and Melvin Berman conducts. No admission charge, no tickets required.

On February 4 at 3:30 pm at the Meeting Place on the Scarborough campus, the famous guitarist Siegfried Behrend will

The Bartok Quartet has come and gone, and on February 9 the Orford Quartet will play at the St. Lawrence Centre at 8:30 pm. This notice is really for the ten or fifteen ambitious melomanes who will wait who knows how long for the returned tickets for this sold-out concert of works by Prokofiev (quartet no.2) and Elliot Carter (no.2 — nice to see this composer on this quartet's program). Paul Armin, viola, joins the foursome after intermission for Ludwig Van B.'s string quintet in opus 29 in C major. This work is less delightful than the piano quartets and of course the early quartets, but in its Mozartian (very Mozartian) rigour, it has much to say worth listening to.

At the Edward Johnson Building this week there is: Harold Clarkson, cello at 8:15 in the Concert Hall, Marilyn Anthony, French horn, at 5:15 February 5, Patrice Wait, clarinet, at 8:15 pm on February 7. All these are free. On Thursday, February 8 Richard Bunger delivers a lecture-cum-illustration entitled "History of the Avant-Garde" at 2:10 in the concert Hall. Also free, no tickets required.

University of Ottawa may drop football

OTTAWA (CUP) — An enrolment decline and an ensuing projected deficit of two to three million dollars for 1973-74 may take their toll on sports at the University of Ottawa.

Students and faculty of the University's School of Physical Education will know within two weeks how much money they must ask the students for to continue their intercollegiate sports program.

In a January 3 meeting, the Sports Advisory Council, a nine-member autonomous body with five student members, told the university administration that if it completes plans to cut back seven per cent of each faculty's budget, the university's intercollegiate football program will be the first sports activity to go. But that may be just a threat.

Dean of Physical Education, Dr. Bill Orban, admitted university administrators may be shocked by the suggestion to drop football, while a suggestion to drop a less expensive sport would have a higher chance of being approved. The administration, Orban said, simply asked "what implications would be created" by the proposed budget reduction. When it learns physics would cut football, it may consider not cutting that faculty's budget.

If the administration does reduce the sports budget, Ottawa "Gee-Gees" may still not have to go.

"I'm optimistic," Orban said January 25, "that the students would be in favor of support through an increase in their fees."

A referendum in mid-March will probably ask the students to increase their activities fees from $16 to $25. Orban and University of Ottawa Athletic Director Carol Turgeon both insist there will be a need for more money — and thus a referendum — whether or not the administration reduces the sports budget.

"The only difference will be the amount asked and the arguments used," Orban said. If the budget is cut, students will decide whether Ottawa wants a football team: if not, they will decide the fate of some other, less expensive activities.

Students now provide $134,000 of the athletics' operating budget of about $196,000. With or without the university's grant, Turgeon claims he cannot operate on less than $200,000.

Last winter, students defeated a referendum virtually identical to the proposed March one.

The university's deficit is typical of financial situations for most Canadian universities. However, only Brandon University, threatened with its existence, has said it will drop its intercollegiate sports program.

Universities unite in face of state power

By DON MOWAT
Dependence upon a single source of funds has been "a powerful incentive" for universities to adopt collective action, stated John B. Macdonald, executive director of the Council of Ontario Universities. Macdonald, who spoke at a meeting held at OISE last Wednesday afternoon, is head of the largest consortium of universities in North America. The COU is composed of fourteen member universities, plus several post-secondary institutions which have observer status.

Macdonald cited "the threat of unilateral action by government" as another driving force behind the COU. When asked whether the universities had been consulted before the current capital freeze was imposed upon them by the Ontario government, Macdonald replied: "The answer is no; they simply announced the freeze." Macdonald termed government proposals to raise graduate school fees to $900 "punitive" and "damaging to the welfare of graduate students." The COU has recommended $600 fees.

Another example of government arbitrariness, he suggested, was its limitation of teaching assistants' salaries. The COU, he said, had persuaded the government to apply this only to future assistants.

Efficient planning on the part of the COU and its subsidiary body, the Advisory Committee on Academic Planning, has resulted in a "careful use of resources."

Macdonald voiced a concern over "predatory recruiting" on the part of some universities, and noted that in the last year, they had "tried very hard to obtain students to secure their financial security" (provincial grants to universities are made on the basis of enrolment). The COU has established a committee to report on the ethics of recruiting.

The problem with such committee findings is that not all universities will honour commitments to uphold them. Macdonald therefore advocated that the COU "consider publicly censuring universities that do not agree to collective decisions."

Queen's students control athletics but are responsible to university

Wednesday we looked at the history of change in athletics at Queen's University, and at the philosophy and premises adopted by the Principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics on which the changes were based.

Today we reveal the organizational structure at the university as provided for in the Queen's University Council on Athletics Constitution, and also, the university administration's assumption of leadership and administrative responsibilities.

The principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics argued that athletics are an integral part of the educational process of the university and that the organizational structure and policy-making for athletics should parallel those of other university entities.

The Committee therefore recommended that a University Council on Athletics be formed by the Senate.

The Committee gave three reasons for the recommendation: first, to bring athletics under the direct control and supervision of the Senate so that educational aims of athletics coincide with Senate policy; second, to ensure that athletics is a regular part of the university program and not an ancillary service or commercial venture; and third, to enable students and faculty to have an effective voice in the planning of athletics and recreation.

Terms of reference of the University Council on Athletics

Under the direction of the Senate, the University Council on Athletics has responsibility and authority in all matters concerning athletics. This responsibility and authority includes the development of general policies concerning athletics and the coordination of specific policies among its various athletic committees.

The University Council determines the relative division, among its five committees, of the total monies available for athletics from the university athletic fee. All budgets are forwarded to the Vice-Principal (Finance) for approval and are administered according to accepted university practices.

The Director of the School of Physical and Health Education acts as the Executive Director of the Council. He is responsible for coordinating administrative actions relating to the work of the Council and its committees.

The Council itself may appoint such subcommittees as it deems necessary for its purposes.

The Council reports to the Senate annually and at any other times requested by the Senate or Council.

Composition of the University Council on Athletics

The University Council on Athletics, although responsible to the university community as a whole, guarantees students half the seats.

The Council is composed of two elected representatives from each of the five committees — recreation services, men's intercollegiate athletics, women's intercollegiate athletics, men's intramural athletics, and women's intramural athletics.

One of these representatives from each committee is to be a student. The Director of the School of Physical Education and three Senate appointees (two of whom are students) also serve on the Council. The executive officer of each of the committees is to be an ex-officio non-voting member of the Council.

The Principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics argued that policy-making for athletic programs should be in the hands of persons who are primarily concerned, interested, and qualified to make appropriate decisions. It was agreed that policy-making committees within the new framework should be composed of specially-selected students and of other qualified persons.

Therefore, it recommended that there be the five above-mentioned committees, responsible to the University Council on Athletics, and that they be directly concerned with policy-making and budgeting in each of their respective areas.

Composition of the five committees

The structure was set-up with the provision for a better-than-parity situation — in fact, a guaranteed student majority on each committee. Queen's has accepted the idea that students who pay for the majority of the athletic program should participate in the administrative structure as a majority.

In the recreation services committee, for example, of a total of 10 voting members, six are students. The Men's and Women's Intercollegiate Athletics Committees each have a total of seven voting members, four of whom are students (in each committee). The Men's and Women's Intramural Athletics Committees are almost entirely student-controlled, with an additional two or three non-voting members.

Appointments to the Council and to the committees are made on a two-year overlapping basis to ensure continuity and the development of some expertise in athletics policy-making by student members. The chairman of each committee is elected annually by members of the respective committees.

The executive officer for each committee is responsible for:

- Planning and administering the day-to-day operation of the program.
- Providing necessary liaison with the Administrative Office for Athletics and Physical Education.
- Representing the committee at appropriate meetings of external athletics organizations.
- Bringing forward recommendations regarding policy and budget, and implementing the budget through the administrative Office for Athletics and Physical Education.

- Calling meetings of the committee at the request of the Chairman, or at his discretion.
- Recording and distributing minutes of all meetings.

Men's Intercollegiate Athletic Director A.L. Lenard told The Varsity that "our ultimate budget goes to the AMS and to the Journal (the university student newspaper)". The non-voting members of committees "have a fair bit of sway", according to Lenard, "...since the person who supplies all the information probably has a reasonable amount of say."

Lenard also added that the "University Council through the executive director of the council, reports to the Senate", and that's "the only body it (the budget) goes to." He said, "you do want a body of at least 50 per cent students to be in charge of finances, but you also want the highest possible body to report to."

Lenard added that, even though final budget approval has to come from the Senate, "in the few years of its existence the University Council budget has never been refused by the Senate."

Administrative and leadership responsibilities

The Principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics felt that "the quality of leadership is the most important factor in determining the outcomes of athletic programs."

Therefore, the Committee recommended that the responsibilities for providing leadership be assumed in full by the university.

One of the findings of the recent AMS Commission on Sports was that there were great disparities in the leadership provided to different intercollegiate teams at Queen's University. The School of Physical and Health Education staff had not been able to provide coaching services for all intercollegiate athletic teams.

Therefore, the President's Advisory Council on Athletics made the following recommendations for securing additional coaching and supervisory staff for athletic programs at Queen's (all of which have now been carried out):

- increase the presently-designated portion of the School staff's work load to athletic functions from one-third to one-half. (This meant increasing the full-time academic staff in the School from 12 to 14.)

• appoint casual academic staff to the School of Physical and Health Education who are qualified to coach at least one intercollegiate sport, who would also teach in proposed non-credit, one-term instructional skill courses to be offered by the school for all university students (this program replaced the compulsory freshman physical education program), and who would supervise intramural athletic events. (The School asked for three such appointments in its 1970-71 budget requests.)

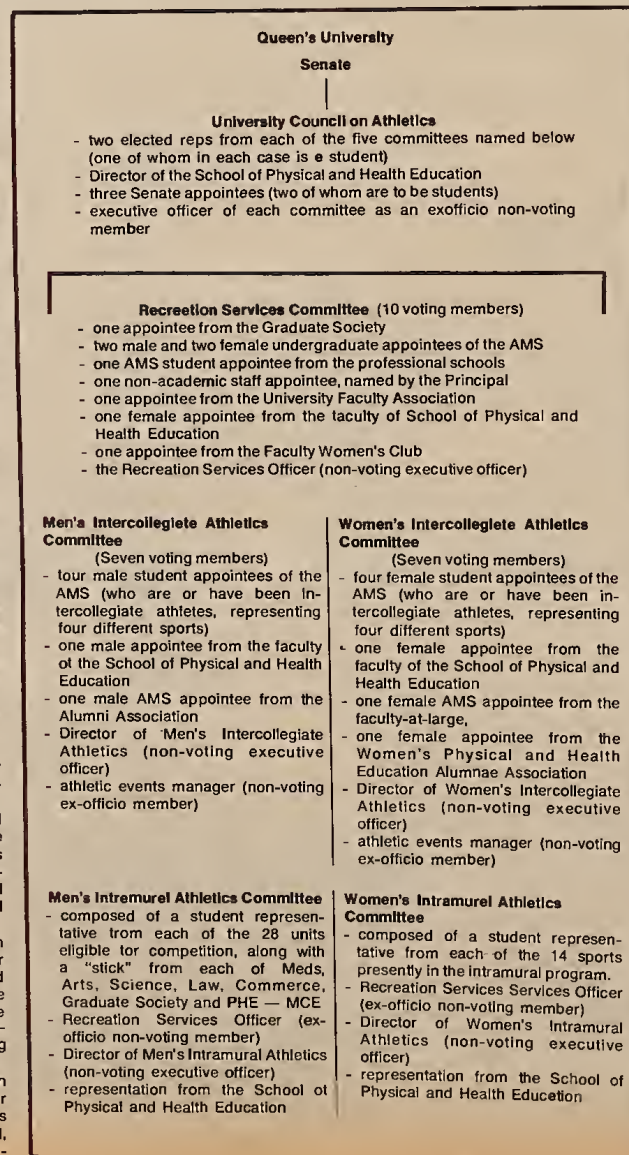

- assign two non-academic appointees (the pool supervisor and the recreation services officer) intercollegiate coaching and intramural supervisory duties and establish criteria for these appointments that the successful applicant be qualified to coach at least one appropriate intercollegiate sport.

• coaching responsibilities which are not filled by the above, are to be filled by part-time appointments with funds provided for this purpose in the budget of the School of Physical and Health Education.

The PAC on Athletics also recommended that the university assume the salaries were, at the time, paid by the Athletic Board of Control and it was proposed that these persons be assigned to the school of Physical and Health Education academic and non-academic staff.

SSSC members tried to occupy Simcoe Hall but couldn't breach the doors.

Little support for bid to occupy Simcoe Hall

By JIM MARTIN

While 300 engineers frolicked nearby at their chariot races Friday, about 15 Stop the Student Surcharge Committee members failed to draw support in a bid to occupy Simcoe Hall.

Earlier, 60 people had listened to SSSC chairman Peter Havers urge them to "come with us to president John Evans office" at a noon-hour rally in the Sid Smith lobby, but most of the applause came from his fellow SSSC members. Havers called for charges to be dropped, which he said were laid after the "campus goon squad and Metro cops attacked a peaceful demonstration Thursday", referring to the SSSC police fight following the picketing of the fees office, at which seven arrests were made.

At the Sid Smith meeting other left groups tried to speak but Havers shouted them down. Shortly after about 15 SSSC members charged off to Simcoe Hall followed by seven media persons.

At Simcoe Hall all the doors were locked including those to Convocation Hall and the back door used to get in last year during the library occupations.

The Simcoe Hall administrative staff locked their offices. About 30 U of T police milled around, with about 12 at the main door. Provost Don Forster ran around making preparations, as did vice-provost Peter Meincke.

Among spectators at Simcoe Hall were some of last year's occupiers of the library and members of various political groups and SAC.

The only other attention paid to SSSC at Simcoe Hall came from people already gathered to the engineering games. Havers yelled "Come and join us" through a bullhorn, and a few engineers returned eggs and jeers.

"Evans is so terrified of workers and students that he has to lock us out" yelled the demonstrators, who then began kicking at the heavy doors. Unlike last year's occupation, when a large number of students pushing caused the doors to yield, they held this time.

The group then tried to obtain sympathy from spectators, but the crowd remained hostile.

One member of the last year's Open Stacks Committee which helped organize the library occupations, commented "there are more productive things to do than occupying Simcoe Hall this year."

Several scuffles occurred between engineers and SSSC members along with numerous shouting matches. The majority of onlookers were either amused or disinterested, with no support building for the occupation, and eventually the SSSC group decided to leave.

After promising "we can't get in now, but we'll build our numbers and return", Havers led the demonstrators across to Huron Street and down to the fees office, again with no large following.

As soon as the SSSC gave up at Simcoe Hall, security chief J.F. Westhead radioed on his walky-talky to U of T police at 215 Huron and deployed half of his force there while the rest of the men continued to guard Simcoe Hall.

At 215 Huron the overwhelming numbers of police present made confrontation pointless. SSSC limited its activities to arguments with onlookers, during which one spectator was punched in the face.

Instead of letting the office staff into the building when their lunch break ended at 1 pm, before the protesters arrived the police told them to wait across the street in the rain. The moment the demonstrators reappeared and were in a position to obstruct entry as they did Thursday, the swarm of policemen paraded the workers into the fees office.

Evans stated yesterday that workers were locked out of the offices since they couldn't be escorted in safely with most of the campus security force deployed elsewhere.

However, there were more than 15 campus police at each location, plus Metro policemen at the fees office.

The demonstrators eventually drifted back to the trailer they have maintained outside the office during the fees strike.

One woman commented on the effect of their day's activities: "At least we're persistent..."

Funds for Robarts may be cut

By BOB BETTSON

Funds might be cut back for the new $43 million Robarts Library operating budget if it is not open equally to the public and all students and faculty at the University of Toronto, according to Commission on Post-Secondary Education members David Black and Vince Kelly.

They made the statements at a press conference last Thursday when the commissioners were questioned on the implications of their long awaited reports.

The commission recommends that "Citizens of Ontario should, subject to reasonable rules and regulations, have access to all libraries, including those in universities..."

Last year, in support of open stacks students occupied Simcoe Hall three times and conducted a petition campaign which resulted in 7,000 signatures and the support of 50 organizations including both opposition parties in Ontario and many unions.

Stack access will later this year be debated at the Governing Council when a report from the library subcommittee of the Academic Affairs Committee is released.

The commission report emphasizes "universal accessibility to educational resources" and lifetime learning which stresses "increasing interplay and integration of learning with work".

It states "students and employees (full-time workers) should be encouraged to interming-le study and work in ways that are now uncommon."

Kelly, a Toronto lawyer, said it might become necessary for the province to abandon what he termed its "laissez-faire" attitude toward the universities.

He stated if the U of T Governing Council decided to restrict stack access, they must "justify the reasons."

Black maintained that though the government should "keep out of the university", if students approached Queen's Park through the proposed central Council of University Affairs, "that body might look harder at funding a library with restricted or differentiated access than perhaps the Governing Council at U of T would."

Small gathering takes militant stance

Moratorium called Thursday on fees strike

By MICHAEL O'KEEFE

A moratorium this Thursday to protest educational cutbacks was endorsed by a meeting of the Stop the Cutbacks Committee (SCC) Friday in the Debates Room at Hart House.

SCC is a coalition of individuals and various groups who are fighting the fees hike, the raising of the loan ceiling in Ontario Student Awards, and other cutbacks in the financing of higher education in Ontario. SCC has been endorsed by the SAC executive, SDS, Old Mole, Young Socialists, and about ten other groups on campus.

The moratorium is to consist of two hours of discussions at the Medical Sciences Auditorium on educational cutbacks, including the Commission on Post-Secondary Education Report released last week, said SCC spokeswoman Barbara Cameron yesterday.

The administration is being asked to cancel classes between 1 and 3 pm Thursday (and an hour earlier at Scarborough and Erindale Colleges to give students time to get downtown), Cameron says.

With less than three dozen people in attendance, Friday's gathering hardly lived up to the mass meeting which was expected. This was the second SCC meeting in a row which failed to attract significant popular support and those in attendance were obviously disgruntled by this fact.

From the outset, the meeting was haunted by the spectre of a competing Stop the Student Surcharge Committee demonstration. SSSC, which speakers at the SCC meeting considered a Canadian Liberation Movement front, was simultaneously holding a meeting in Sid Smith to protest Thursday's use of police by the university to break up a picket line outside the fees office.

Until learning that the CLM-SSSC meeting was as small as their own, the SCC group had planned to move to Sid Smith in order to prevent the CLM from wresting the leadership of the fees strike movement.

The possibility of the CLM stealing their thunder seemed to be the major concern of the groups gathered at Hart House. At one point, they engaged in a heated debate over their official position on the CLM-police clash of the previous day. By far the harshest comments were reserved for the CLM, while they defended the police action on the basis of SSSC provocation.

One member, apparently overlooking the size of the meeting, expressed fear of a "loss of popular support should we be identified with the CLM."

The meeting finally endorsed a statement of opposition to "the use of city police on campus", and a demand that charges against seven people arrested Thursday be dropped.

When the meeting was about half an hour old, a SSSC representative came to announce that the Sid Smith gathering had dispersed and that a contingent was headed for U of T president John Evans' office. At this point, the SCC group realized that the SSSC meeting had also failed to gain significant popular support.

Reversing an earlier decision to adjourn their meeting in order to move to Sid Smith, the Hart House group decided to proceed with their meeting.

The discussion promptly degenerated into a series of vague declarations. "We've got to build the movement" and "We have to develop the politics" were offered as courses of action.

In their search for a concrete proposal to counter the SSSC trust fund, SCC settled upon the moratorium which had been proposed by the Faculty Reform Caucus.

The SCC group then elected a coordinating committee to build popular support for Thursday's moratorium. Therein lies the real problem as evidenced by the fact that the engineer's ground hog day chariot races outdrew the SSSC and the SCC meetings combined.

Prof cites women's problems

By ALEXANDRA MERCER

The problems of women in universities are the same as in society generally, says Marylee Stephenson, a University of Windsor sociology professor.

Speaking at a women's studies workshop of the Ontario Conference on Women, Stephenson mentioned lack of information, a fostered passivity, discrimination on a sexual basis, and the refusal of male professors to take an intellectual woman seriously, among the problems.

U of T vice-president Jill Conway, who teaches a women's history course, and U of T student Ceta Ramkhalawansingh agreed with Stephenson. The three panelists felt that the development of women's studies could not be trusted to male administrators and professors who were usually indifferent or hostile.

University deans and administrators stall requests for women's studies or sabotage their potential popularity by relegating them to extension slots, according to Stephenson.

She cited the University of British Columbia as an example, where despite an enrolment of 500 students, the women's course there was not given a budget, and the dean appointed an unsympathetic professor to supervise it.

Stephenson claimed that the only course outlines which are ever questioned at departmental meetings are those submitted for women's studies. Male professors often ask, "But what is there to say?" when they hear of proposed women's courses, she said.

She asked for "increasing and continued pressure" by women on the university. Otherwise, women's studies "would get nowhere".

Scar credit system clears hurdle

Scarborough College's move towards a credit system went one step further last week when the Curriculum and Standards Subcommittee approved its implementation by a 3 to 1 margin.

Before the proposal can go into operation next fall, it requires approval from the Academic Affairs Committee and the Governing Council.

Added to a motion passed at its previous meeting to abolish the distinction between full- and part-time students was a resolution that students be able to progress towards a degree at a rate of their own choosing.

Victoria College principal R.M.H. Robson, who voted against the motion, said that one result of the credit system would be that students would take fewer courses, with the "immediate transient effect of decreasing the college's income."

However, other subcommittee members pointed out that Scarborough students already take a significant number of courses off their campus, indicating that the finances of the college, which depend in large part on student enrolment, would not greatly change. A study done by the college indicated that enrolment would not greatly decrease in Scarborough courses.

Committee member Peter Salus, a Scarborough linguistics professor, pointed out that the switch to a credit system may encourage more students to take courses, at least countering attrition from full-time students.

For provincial grants, each part-time course taken is equivalent to one-fifth the grant the university receives for a full-time student.

The maximum number of courses a student would be able to take would be six in the winter session and two in the summer.

Students in part-time studies would be given Scarborough registration only if they intend to pursue the bulk of their degree at the college. Otherwise, they would have to obey the regulations of other colleges, which will not work on a credit basis.

'Participation' described as liberal buy-off

The offer of participation in decision-making to citizens' groups "is only a ruse to make people think what they want is something small and can be easily acquired," charged civic activist James Lorimer Saturday.

He insisted that "people aren't looking for participation, but for power" over their own lives.

Lorimer, also an architectural consultant, represented the strongest current of opinion in favour of citizen power at the final law conference session, on citizen participation in environmental planning and protection.

Earlier, Ontario Hydro chairman

George Gathercole told the audience that "not all citizen participation is good; it should be structured to represent the population."

The social and political environment must be considered in planning, he said, not just the natural one.

Although he thought "ad hocery is the curse of democracy," former Ontario Municipal Board chairman J.A. Kennedy admitted, "It takes an issue to bring people out." He explained, "there's a difference distinction between matters of general interest and those of local or block interest."

He thought the planning act

"must be changed so that it is compulsory that the people be consulted before actual planning begins."

Kennedy long considered a supporter of citizen power at the OMB, where he often denied municipal councils' requests when there was strong opposition from local residents, listed a few such examples of projects killed by the board.

The critics were upset with these decisions, he said "because the wrong people were right". Critics of the OMB in Toronto have recently become vocal with their contention that the OMB usurps local municipal power.

Kennedy described the "reform" victory on Toronto City Council in the election last December 4 as "a giant step forward, the first time in history that the voice of the people was really heard."

Lorimer, campaign advisor to Ward 7 alderman John Sewell, agreed that "it's fair to say that things have changed tremendously on December 4, but the important thing was not that we participated, but that we took over."

Previously, at city councils "all across Canada" the property and land development industry was in control. Lorimer said. Decisions were made to promote the desires of large corporations.

"Political power can't stay in their hands; we need a piece of it," Lorimer declared.

Ontario Hydro was directly attacked by environmental lawyer David Estrin, who said there was no opportunity for public participation in the selection of the Niagara-Toronto transmission route until the recent Solandt commission.

"Decisions are made by people in isolation for public input" only after they are substantially made, he said.

"There's a need to have some guarantee in law that the planning process will go on," Estrin thought.

"Ontario Hydro has to be taken over at the top," Lorimer stated; "It ought to be run by representatives of the ordinary people, by workers in the government, and by people who are interested in what it's involved with."

Gathercole countered that in his opinion, Hydro is representative of the people. Formerly a crown corporation, the commission is now a government agency.

Gathercole also maintained that "at the end use, electricity is the cleanest of the energy resources," although after some prodding from the audience, he admitted this was not the case at the production end.

Seneca administrator sues paper

TORONTO (CUP) — An administrator-turned right-wing politician is suing the editor of the Seneca College student newspaper for libel.

Richard Kirkup, Seneca's Director of Student Affairs, is suing Gunnar Forstrom over a series of articles in The Seneca, which linked his campaign for a Toronto aldermanic seat to a key high-rise apartment developer.

Kirkup ran against aldermen John Sewell and Karl Jaffary in Toronto's working class Ward 7 in last December's municipal elections. He attacked the incumbents for opposing indiscriminate high-rise development, and called for more apartment projects, earning the label "a developers' man". Kirkup was badly defeated.

Besides Forstrom, Kirkup is suing the president of Seneca College, the student council president, and several employees of The North York Mirror which reprinted one of the articles after it appeared in the Seneca in November. (The Mirror is owned by The Toronto Star.)

Kirkup is claiming $200,000 in total damages.

Observers are unsure why Kirkup has taken on the entire college in his suit. He had previously threatened to sue the Board of Governors but is now apparently satisfied to only take action against the president.

Forstrom has told Kirkup he will launch a counter-suit for slander, also arising from the Toronto election campaign. During a confrontation, Forstrom says Kirkup accused him of being "a Communist, a thief, and having been bought off by Sewell and Jaffary".

"He also sent out his heavies to harass me and (newly elected mayor) David Crombie," Forstrom added.

Professors back Montreal student strike

MONTREAL (CUP) — Le Syndicat des professeurs de l'Université du Québec à Montréal (SPUQ), affiliated with the militant Confederation des syndicats nationaux (CSN), is urging its members to respect student picket lines thrown up around Université du Québec's (UQAM) perimeter.

Because many of the professors are having problems with the university's administration, observers in Montréal feel that they will overwhelmingly endorse the students' actions.

If the professors do not cross the picket lines in large numbers, the university's operations will be brought to a halt, although the administration insists that it will strive to keep the institution open.

The students are protesting an ultimatum handed down by the provincial government which states that students must pay all past debts to the university including second term tuition by February 15 or they will be expelled permanently.

Students from U du Québec and Université de Montréal staged a teach-in at McGill on Saturday on the current struggle of U de Québec against the government's fee ruling. At l'Université de Montréal, the administration backed down from a headline stance due to widespread student protest, and have extended the fee deadline to next September.

However, students are still opposed to this half-measure and plan to intensify the fight against the government and the university's administration with UQAM students over the next few weeks.

At the McGill teach-in, a student from UQAM expressed the necessity for solidarity among students from all universities who, if not now, will later face similar "economic blackmail."

Speakers at the meeting detailed how many students at the respective universities would be put out expelled for their inability to pay fees by February 15.

At UQAM, 3,000 out of 11,000 students and 1,000 out of the 15,000 students at U de M will be eligible for expulsion, because of the ruling.

With the opening of the colleges d'enseignement general et professionnel (CEGEPs or community colleges) and l'Université du Québec, the student population of the province has greatly increased.

However, due to today's economic crisis and the resulting unemployment, the government is attempting to cut back on the already excessive number of university graduates.

The students most affected from this ruling on fees are those from the working class who must rely on part-time jobs and government aid to pay their tuition. Although 3,000 students at UQAM receive financial assistance from the province, only 300 do not have to repay the government.

The students have denounced "economic measures that become selective measures". They want up to three years after graduation in which to pay their fees so that no one will be denied an education through lack of money.

They pointed out that the $15 million owed by them to the university is nothing compared to the $55 million the administration sees fit to spend on building a new UQAM campus.

Toronto not on verge of crime wave

Overreacting won't solve anything

Panic is gripping Toronto. The city has been turned into the violence capital of Canada: maddened criminals wandering the streets looking for innocent victims to shoot down. And, all the while, Toronto's finest have been hampered from defending themselves and protecting us because we won't go along with all their plans and insist on not strangling these "animals" who would dare kill them rather than ordinary citizens.

Full-page ads protesting one-cop patrols and unsubtle threats about trigger-happy cops have been used to step up pressure on the lawmakers to give in to the police demands, following the recent spate of unrelated police shootings. It's worked.

Hours after Toronto's second police killing this year, Mayor David Crombie, pre-election darling of the city's liberals, was rushing to assure the men and women in blue that the new council would follow its predecessor's lead and back up police demands for a police radio tower in Winston Churchill Park. The next day, the self-styled "reform" council proved its mettle, with only two members opposing the mayor's motion.

The councillors didn't pause long enough to pay even lip service to their election cry of returning power to the people whose lives will be affected by their decision. The Ontario Municipal Board had five times rejected the Winston Churchill site, supporting area residents' arguments that the tower would ruin the park and could just as easily be relocated on nearby non-park land.

All throughout the long, involved hassling about the park site, the city police commission and the council had refused to seriously consider alternative sites. The police had decided that they wanted that location and they would not budge. The city, characteristic of governments afraid to resist their enforcement agency, was little more open-minded. Metro and city council rejected several alternative sites suggested by an independent electronics consultant in 1971. (Then OMB chairman James A. Kennedy rejected the last two of these in October. He had suggested another site in the park ravine.)

Although several aldermen recognized that a Friday council decision would be giving in to "panic", only John Sewell and Dorothy Thomas held out against the decision.

The city's elders were giving in to fear and hysteria, a panic fueled by the intemperate, unveiled threats made by police association president Syd Brown. Never one to mince his words, Brown has earned himself a well-deserved reputation as a hard-line cop who believes criminals and suspected criminals should be offered no compassion. He has exploited public and police concern over the recent shootings to create fear of a city about to be overrun by violence — unless it starts listening to its police.

Shortly after the second fatal shooting, Brown somberly warned that Toronto police might be less restrained in reaching for their guns in the future. He was quick to state that he would hope this would not be the case. Nonetheless, hardline statements like his could well backfire and open the door to itchy-fingers pulling triggers too readily. That kind of attitude already characterizes American police forces. And, Toronto's notorious riot squad has been known on many occasions in the past to act with less than reserve.

Police officials all too quickly gloss over the fact that nobody begins working for the police force unaware that there's a much greater risk of danger involved in that particular vocation than in most others. And, accordingly, police undergo rigorous training programs to equip them to deal with whatever contingencies arise. If this training is inadequate — and indeed it may be —, then it should be improved. Police also receive pay and security benefits commensurate with the risks they encounter. But, under no circumstances, should the police be given a free rein to go out and gun down suspects.

Police officials have long demanded that they receive special protection under the law, strenuously advocating retention of the death penalty for killing law enforcement officers. It is no surprise that they have exploited the recent shootings to argue for retention of the death penalty during Parliament's current review of the hanging ban.

What is more troublesome is that a large number of people who opposed the death penalty when the ban first went into effect five years ago may allow themselves to be stampeded into supporting at least retention of hanging for law enforcement killings because of the hysteria the Toronto police and media have created surrounding the police shootings.

There is no rational reason to retain the death penalty for any offence. It is not a deterrent and only serves to satisfy the bloodthirsty appetite of people bent on getting revenge.

Torontonians must stand back from the current hysteria and rationally survey the facts. If they do, they will not allow themselves to be misled into adopting harsh policies which will only increase any violent tendencies.

Kierans says "Cosmo-Corps" threaten state

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Former cabinet minister Eric Kierans said Saturday night that the rights of nation-states are being threatened by multi-national corporations.

Yet, he also said that this stance does not make him a Canadian economic nationalist nor an opponent of capitalism.

Kierans, now an economics professor, was speaking to 175 people at a banquet at New College concluding the "Law and the Environment" conference sponsored by the U of T Faculty of Law.

"In a democracy," Kierans said, "all social institutions are called on to justify their stewardship. All except corporations, they have a life of their own. They can survive the time-bound organisations with which they must deal."

Kierans attributed the rise of the corporation to an 1819 decision of the U.S. Supreme Court judge Marshall defining a corporation in such a way as to enable it to accumulate wealth continuously and in perpetuity.

He said that corporations "are seeking for a new Chief Justice Marshall who will add the right of extension to a corporation's rights, to make it complete unto itself."

"Now that the corporation has conquered time, it wants to conquer space — to conquer the environment, to extend itself in world terms."

The corporations, he said, "are searching for a supra-national body of law to place them in an apolitical situation. Yet they can never be truly apolitical. The inner dynamic of the corporation, the fact that growth, the accumulation of wealth, is the principle of its existence, and its organization conflicts inevitably with national sovereignty."

"The corporation wants to be in the best position for growth and this leads to the expropriation of local resources and the distortion of national priorities. There is a basic similarity between international corporations and national bodies."

Kierans said he believed in the free flow of international capital, but he was opposed to the "presently changing definition of the rights of international capital."

"Today they involve ownership and property rights. It does not leave control and ownership of the future in the hands of indigenous promoters and entrepreneurs."

The multi-national corporation, which Kierans preferred to call the "cosmo-corp", "has the power to initiate change and to create obsolescence. The mass production of the mercantilist environment favours requires mass consumption. And so the habits, the tastes, the differences, of the world's people are changed or eliminated. People are made to want the same thing."

"Corporations," he continued, "should not decide for people in individual nations. Only communities speaking through their political institutions can decide what emphasis they want to place on economic activity."

Kierans said that the classic concept of growth — as formulated by Smith, Ricardo, and Mill — was opposed to the idea of the corporation. "They didn't believe in them. They believed that growth came from below, not that it was imposed from above by a huge unit."

Kierans said he was not suggesting the abolition of the concept of the corporation, but rather that "we shouldn't rely so much on these corporations as the levers of economic life."

Kierans asserted that he is not convinced of the efficiency of the "cosmo-corp". "Efficiency in doing what is not wanted is not efficiency at all," he said. But he is convinced of the efficiency "of the competitive situation in which middle- and small-size firms struggle and make money and lose money."

Kierans suggested that Canada combat the presence here of the "cosmo-corps" by "no longer feeding them with Canadian taxpayers' money." He said that "tax exemptions and depletion allowances don't really help Canadian industry, don't really help you or me. Fifteen hundred of the 209,000 corporations in Canada get most of these tax concessions."

He suggested that if primary and secondary industries were treated equally for tax purposes it would be possible to have a flat 25 per cent tax rate and still receive the same amount of income that is derived from the current 50 per cent rate. He suggested that subsidiaries of foreign firms pay what the parent company pays in taxes in its own country (with 25 per cent as the minimum).

Kierans claimed that the Canadian manufacturer operates on a short-term basis. "He develops a business and then he looks for the payoff — the sellout."

He suggested that Canadian manufacturers be "encouraged to build firms that will continue after they are gone." He also suggested laws prohibiting the selling of Canadian properties and businesses to foreigners be passed.

Kierans, however, does not support boycotting American industry. "None of what I am saying is anti-American. America hasn't done this to us; we've done it to ourselves."

"The problem must be settled on a policy level. The government makes the policies."

"We own our resources," he said, "but we have surrendered them for a quick and easy headline — 'More jobs'."

Kierans suggested that instead of giving resources away, Canada should at least put them up for competitive bidding or perhaps develop them indigenously.

Kierans emphasized the importance of resources. "Most of the corporations' power stems from a resource base. It is the control of resources, not the money made in refining the resources, that is profitable."

Marxist leads class

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — Istvan Meszaros, noted Marxist scholar who fought nine months to get federal government permission to teach in Canada, started his first seminar at York University recently by recommending the works of three bourgeois theorists.

When the choice of texts for Meszaros' political theory course were discussed, the former Sussex

University professor strongly urged use of books by Ralf Dahrendorf, Karl Mannheim and John Kenneth Galbraith because they are important to western social and political thought, he said.

Meszaros was given permission to teach last month after returning to England to re-apply for landed immigrant status. Earlier, he had been refused that status, necessary in order to teach, for several months while in Toronto.

He had been refused entry into Canada initially last spring in England, for undisclosed "security reasons." Meszaros, an anti-Stalinist, is a former assistant to Hungarian culture minister George Lukacs, who fled the country after his and others' efforts to defeat the 1956 Russian takeover failed.

Before Meszaros' first seminar, some students had feared that he would want the class to run in a more formal European manner. However these fears proved unfounded, students reported, as Meszaros participated as an equal member and resource person.

The class, a graduate seminar on ideology and class consciousness, had been running on an interim basis with two other professors and six students.

EDITOR THE VARSITY

The Varsity Board of Directors invites applications for the position of Editor-in-Chief of The Varsity for the 1973-74 academic year. The Editor is responsible to the Board in all matters affecting the newspaper. As the job carries considerable authority, applicants should submit detailed proposals for the management of the paper. These may include proposals for changes in the current format, editorial policy, or internal structure, and names of prospective staff. The amount available for production staff salaries in recent years has ranged from $8,350 to $12,100 per publishing year, including a salary of $3,150 for a full time editor.

Applicants will be interviewed both by the current Varsity staff and the Board of Directors, with the Board making the final decision. The editor may be removed from his or her post only by concurrent decision of The Varsity staff and the Board.

Address written applications to:

The great food scandal: where your money goes

By DON HUMPHRIES
Canadian University Press

Grocery bills continue to climb monthly. But, the extra money isn't finding its way into the farmers' pockets.

Between 1961 and July, 1972, total food prices rose by 25.4 per cent. But, this increase was wiped out by a 40.2 per cent rise in farm production costs, leaving farmers with a 14.8 per cent loss in income during this period.

Someone made a lot of money during that 10 year period and it clearly wasn't Canada's farmers.

The last four years have been disastrous for farmers. As their costs went skyrocketing, their income has dipped drastically.

According to Statistic Canada figures, farm net income dropped to a low of $1,209 million in 1970. The 1964-68 average income was $1,564.8 million.

While farmers were making less money to meet those rising costs, the economy was booming. Canada's Gross National Product increased steadily, climbing from $72.586 billion in 1968 to $93.094 billion in 1971.

TASK FORCE RATIONALIZING

According to a federal government-commissioned study of Canadian agriculture in the seventies, by 1990:

- there will be a reduction of the rural population to three or four per cent of Canada's total population,
- the basic farm unit will be the huge corporate farm that hires employees to produce food with the same type of management procedures that are currently applied to industrial manufacturing, and
- access to land by individuals seeking to start farming will be impossible.

The federal government has repudiated the report as a model for Canadian agriculture. But, it has yet to take any steps to protect the rural population from further destruction. All indications are that federal policy is actually directed toward the acceleration of rural depopulation.

NO PRICE GUARANTEES

Canadian farmers are not guaranteed a price that will cover their cost of production. This is the reason behind the decline of the rural population.

If farmers in 1968 were going to earn the poverty level as established by the Economic Council of Canada, they must receive between $2.35 and $2.65 per bushel of wheat produced in Saskatchewan. This would represent an approximate eight per cent return on their investment or just enough money to cover the interest payments on the money they borrowed to keep farming.

The highest price Canadian wheat ever fetched on the world market was $2.24 per bushel in 1918!

The Canadian Wheat Board (CWB) regulates the sale of wheat. It was established by federal statute in 1949, as an attempt to end profiteering by the grain brokers. These brokers still operate out of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange.

The Wheat Board wholesales wheat, mainly to overseas buyers. However, the price wheat is sold for is not the price the farmer receives. In 1968, number one wheat sold for $1.94 per bushel. After deducting shipping, cleaning, and other costs, farmers received $1.70 per bushel.

Suddenly, last year, wheat prices climbed dramatically after hitting a low of $1.68 in 1971. At the end of July, 1972, the price reached $1.70 per bushel. One month later, the price jumped to $1.84. By the end of September, the price leaped up to $2.31 per bushel. Throughout October and November, consistently high prices prevailed.

A farmer who can't cover his cost of production is called unviable and in the spirit of the agriculture task force must be "rationalized" off of his land. The farmer really has only two options for survival: buy more expensive machinery or buy more land, thereby owing the banks more money.

The natural question of why doesn't the farmer get a fair price for his produce arises.

The food industry is probably one of the most profitable in this country. While thousands of farmers are forced off their land because of low income, fantastic profits have been made and continue to be made by the corporations involved in the processing, distribution, and sale of agricultural produce. This is the phenomena known as "agribusiness".

Just how profitable is the food industry?

THE OLD CASH REGISTER

The price of farm-produced foods increased by $2.8 million between 1961 and 1970. The corporations received 64 per cent of that increase.

For a typical 25 cent loaf of bread filled with non-nutritious chemical additives, 23 cents goes to the corporations.

Ever notice a decline in the number of dairy farmers? A quart of milk costing 33 cents has 16 cents going to those so-called middle men.

For every dollar spent on a chunk of tough, fatty beef, be prepared to throw away 43 cents.

Statistics Canada reports the profitability of Canada's food and beverages industry for the fourth quarter of 1971 was 7.87 per cent. Profitability for the total manufacturing sector was only 6.69 per cent. Seven out of the other 13 manufacturing sectors were lower than food and beverages.

The food industry is more profitable than the petroleum and coal industry. Food is more profitable than chemical, electrical, paper, or even metal mines.

Let's make the picture a little clearer by taking a look at a few well-known companies operating in Canada. The list below shows the return on capital employed for the year ending in 1971.

Canada Packers	7.63 per cent
Canada Safeway	8.73 per cent
General Foods	10.30 per cent
Oshawa Group (IGA)	5.03 per cent
Steinberg's	4.78 per cent
weighted average	6.99 per cent

Between 1968 and 1971, the five companies reaped a total profit of $173.2 million. This represents a 23.3 per cent increase in profits for the period.

Canada Packers 68-72, 24.7 per cent increase,	from $8.1 to 10.1 million
Canada Safeway 68-71, 25.3 per cent increase,	from $12.0 to 15.0 million
General Foods 68-72, 36.2 per cent increase,	from $6.8 to 9.2 million
Oshawa Group 68-72, 29.6 per cent increase,	from $4.8 to 6.2 million
Steinberg's 68-71, 47.8 per cent increase,	from $6.4 to 9.5 million

Food prices — the good old Consumer Price Index — rose in the period between 1968 and 1971 by 7.7 per cent.

The Basford Report on Concentration in Industry shows a higher level of concentration exists in Canadian manufacturing than in the United States, with the 100 largest corporations operating 1,263 establishments in 114 industries and accounting for 42 per cent of total manufacturing sales. The remainder of manufacturing sales are distributed among 32,000 establishments many that are only single plants.

Just what does such a high level of concentration mean for the average Canadian?

"Economic theory and actual experience suggest that the level of concentration is an important determinant of market behaviours. Other things being equal, the smaller the number of leading firms which account for a large proportion of an industry's output, the more likely it is for the monopolistic practices to prevail," according to the Basford Report.

And, prevail the monopolies do.

Monopoly is not quite the correct description because one company does not yet control all sales in any one sector of the economy. What has developed is price fixing, euphemistically referred to as "price-leadership", by major companies, giving rise to an oligopolistic situation.

Price-fixing or "price-leadership" does not mean prices will not change. It simply means profits and prices will have a tendency to rise, regardless of cost factors in the industry.

Just as the North American automobile industry is controlled by four big corporations, so the food industry is controlled by large corporations.

The largest food conglomerate in Canada is the multinational Canadian-based Weston chain. Westons is owned by the Garfield Weston Charitable Foundation. It is a vertically integrated corporation, which means it supplies itself with everything it needs.

Weston's holdings in retail stores, including Loblaws and Power supermarkets, is complemented by a wide-ranging list of wholly-owned suppliers, wholesale, and transportation industries, and even its own farms.

The advantages of vertical integration that allow for increased profits are: warehouse operations can be run more efficiently and at lower costs, private label products may be produced at less cost than national brands, and the ability to produce "private" or subsidiary labelled products increases the bargaining power of vertically integrated chains with national brand suppliers.

The growing power of vertically integrated chains has induced a pattern of excessive advertising by food manufacturers and created an additional inflationary cost factor in the industry as a whole.

The dual reality of concentration and vertical integration has brought the following description of the food industry in a study of retail oligopoly by the Batten Commission: "Grocery retailing today is seriously deficient on at least four counts: 1 - profits are excessive; 2 - excess capacity has added to costs; 3 - advertising has favored a concentrated structure, created monopoly power and increased costs; 4 - the promotion of the luxury store has inflated gross margins."

Studies have estimated efficient use of store space alone would reduce costs on every dollar spent.

Advertising practices of oligopoly are the principle means of control over sales. They also prevent the entry of new competitors, limit location, and represent a substantial factor in final food prices.

"The fact that large Supermarkets are able to advertise more for the same per dollar of sales than are small stores estimated statistically by correlation with the sales of eight (store) supermarkets in the five prairies. These estimates include with $10 million in sales per dollar of sales, even though

Advertising, in short, is a basic tool with which corporations can gain and sustain power while expanding surplus through a greater share of market sales in a given commodity.

Hence, every breakfast cereal or canned soup is new, unique, and has "something added", all of which may rationalize consumer price increases and the introduction of cheap chemical additives which are non-nutritional but seem filling.

RISING COST OF PRODUCTION

The previously mentioned increase in the cost of production was caused by factors very similar to those involved in the rise of food prices.

The farmer must buy supplies from companies to maintain his operation. But, probably the most important cost factor is machinery. The highly mechanized nature of Canadian agriculture has resulted in a dependency on machinery that has been the downfall of many a farmer.

To survive, a farmer must buy the necessary machinery that will produce a crop as efficiently as possible. Unfortunately for the farmer, the companies controlling the farm machinery business fix prices and do not compete in the free market—that only exists in Agriculture Minister Otto Lang's vivid imagination.

Tractor and combine prices increased by about 40 per cent from 1961 to 1968. The greatest increases were for tractors in the higher horsepower ranges where the least competition exists and where plant inefficiency is the greatest.

This whole area was thoroughly investigated by the Barber Royal Commission on farm machinery prices. Retail prices for automobiles increased by only 10 per cent from 1956 to 1968 while appliance prices actually declined by 14 per cent. Farm machinery, on the other hand, increased by 34 per cent between 1956 and 1968 even though, according to Barber, retail dealer margins were substantially reduced.

The cost situation faced by machinery manufacturers in this same period included a 78 per cent hourly wage increase to production workers, 15 per cent increase in steel rolling mill products, and a 3 per cent increase in pig iron. The wage increase was largely off-set by a 32 per cent productivity increase as measured by the value produced per man hour paid.

It is noteworthy that wage levels of industrial workers engaged in production of farm input commodities is substantially higher than that of industrial workers in food processing plants.

The leading firms in the manufacturing industry (International Harvester, John Deere, Massey-Ferguson, and Ford) account for 67 per cent of tractor sales, 69 per cent of combine sales, and 69 per cent of haying equipment sales.

According to Barber, a tractor earning a company a profit return of 11.8 per cent at an output level of 20,000 units would yield an estimated 32.7 per cent at 60,000 units and 44.8 per cent at 90,000 units. The actual units produced by the 11 companies selling on the world market varies from 7,000 to 153,800 units. Yet, virtually no price competition exists.

John Deere is the acknowledged price setter for the farm machinery industry, according to evidence presented by the Barber Commission. Between 1963 and 1968, Deere was the first to announce price changes every year except one for tractors, combines, and haying equipment.

It is interesting that the larger volume producer with the lower per unit costs and higher profits continues to determine price levels, while high-cost small producers such as Versatile or Canadian Co-operative Implements Limited are the only companies to attempt price competition.

Farmers are caught in a vicious circle of the cost-price squeeze which has driven thousands of people off the land. Barber explains that low prices for farm products act as an incentive to buy more land and machinery, thus creating the vicious circle but providing improved profits for machinery companies.

Canadian farm machinery investment has increased 10-fold from 1941 to 1967, from $800 to almost $9000. In terms of debt, the investment has meant an increase in outstanding credit of 150 per cent between 1961 and 1966 for farm machinery purchases alone.

While the farmers' debt has increased, so has his productivity. Between 1947 and 1955, productivity rose 75 per cent. But, the return on his investment is very low. In 1958, it stood at an equivalent weekly wage of $38 minus interest charges. A study today would show inflation having wiped out any gain by increased prices.

The farmer not only hes to deal with profit-hungry machinery companies, but with all other agribusiness outfits that are out to "make a killing". To combat such companies, farmers in the past founded commodity pools and other co-operatives. That form of action has obviously failed to protect farmers from exploitation.

The formation of the National Farmers Union (NFU) in 1969 can be credited to the determination of many farmers to stand end fight for their land.

The NFU is demanding collective bargaining rights for Canadian farmers so they can obtain enough revenue to continue operations. This approach requires farmer to realize they will not obtain a just return for their labour under the present system unless they use their collective strength to reverse present trends.

Committee outlines structure of tribunals

By RANDY ROBERTSON

The composition of university discipline tribunals should vary with the type of offence being dealt with and the academic status of the accused, according to the Internal Affairs Committee.

Meeting last week, the committee decided on its recommended structures for discipline procedure, although it will meet Wednesday to formulate a code of behaviour before its final recommendations go before the Governing Council for approval.

Offences not relating to the status of the accused are to be dealt with by a panel composed of two teaching staff, two students and one representative of the alumni. This would include non-academic offenses such as disruptions.

Panels concerned with offenses involving faculty (eg. improper use of human research subjects) are to be composed of three teaching staff and two students.

Panels concerned with offenses involving students (eg. plagiarism) are to be composed of three students and two teaching staff.

The discipline structure also involves setting up informal "local pre-hearing screening procedures" to reconcile aggrieved parties. These "procedures" would be voluntary and not binding; they cannot impose a settlement. Their structure would be "whatever the individual faculties can come up with", said committee chairman Paul Cadario.

According to the committee, the procedures must involve students and teaching staff, must be able to function speedily and expeditiously, and must have the confidence of student representatives and faculty.

The numbers, membership and method of selection for procedures, have to be approved by Internal Affairs Committee.

It would not be necessary, Cadario said, to move to pre-hearing screening procedures just because these have been suggested. These procedures would not rule out even more informal arrangements.

"The university court is essentially one court", Cadario said, "with underparts that plug in when they are needed. There are a lot of pools but this is preferable to having a lot of courts that don't see action."

("Pools" would be standing lists of people to be used in setting up tribunals.)

The university pool — chosen by lots — is to be composed of 30 teaching staff and 30 students (18 full time undergraduates, six part-time undergraduates, and six graduate students).

Local pools are to be chosen by lot for each panel. Numbers, membership and method of selection have to be approved by Internal Affairs Committee.

If an offense takes place in a particular faculty, three members from the local pool in the faculty concerned and two members from the university pool plus the non-voting chairman are to sit on the panel.

If the problem can't be particularized, five members from the university pool are to sit on the panel.

All the panels are to be chaired by the same paid non-voting appointee of the university. He or she is to have "procedural expertise" — to be "perhaps a partner of some law firm, perhaps a member of the Supreme Court of Ontario, perhaps a former Royal Commission Chairman, perhaps a member of the Faculty of Law."

The system, Cadario said, combines the advantages of centralized and decentralized situations. It permits the establishment of a common law and the provision of expertise, throughout the campus.

MP defends Canada's Viet force

By MACK BARFORD

NOP MP Andrew Brewin defended the federal government's decision to send a peace-keeping force to Vietnam Saturday.

Speaking to about 150 people at the Faculty of Education, the Member of Parliament for Greenwood, said External Affairs minister Mitchell Sharp's decision to send a 280 man contingent to Vietnam on a 60 day trial basis will give a good indication of how serious all concerned parties really are. Brewin who recently returned from a one week stay in North Vietnam, warned that unless the major parties involved were acting in "good faith", peace efforts would be futile.

Invited to North Vietnam with Swedish and Norwegian observers to examine the damage of aerial bombardment and to influence their respective countries in support of North Vietnam's peace intentions, Brewin felt North Vietnam was acting in good faith.

He reported that North Vietnamese prime minister Pham Van Dong told him Canadians would be regarded as a "useful and necessary instrument in making peace." The Americans, he felt, were also sincere, but he remained vague on the intentions South Vietnam.

A Glendon College professor, asserted that the peace agreement didn't adequately protect the prisoners of South Vietnam. An audience member backed this up by pointing out that South Vietnamese president Nguyen Van Thieu has not designated 200,000 captives as political prisoners, but regards them as civil prisoners.

Asked why the treaty was acceptable to the North Vietnamese, Brewin replied that despite references to elections and self-determination of South Vietnam, the North felt it could win the battle of reunification through a "workable agreement". Also, should Thieu repudiate the agreement, the North Vietnamese feel they could deal with the situation better if the U.S. wasn't there, said Brewin.

He continued that the treaty was far from perfect, that it was vague and that it had been laid out "in terms of hopes rather than agreements."

U of T engineering professor Ursula Franklin, also a panel member, observed that although there are three separate governments in Vietnam, Canada recognizes only one. Brewin acknowledged the problem, and replied that Sharp told him he was contemplating the recognition of "both governments".

Corporate polluters escape charges: advisor

By VALERIE TATE

Governments rarely prosecute large corporations for pollution offences, environmentalist Gregory Morley charged Friday.

Legislative bodies take on only what they can easily handle, so that while the individual polluter may be charged the large corporations get off "scot-free", he said.

Speaking at an afternoon session of a law conference on the environment, Morley asserted that usually, enforcement focuses on symptoms rather than the disease of pollution.

Although the session was entitled, "A Challenge to Legislatures and Administrative Agencies," there was no member of either the federal or provincial legislatures present.

According to Morley, former policy and law advisor of water resources in the federal Department of the Environment, one of the major problems in pollution control is that there is no enforcement of anti-pollution laws to a large degree.

Another panelist, lawyer V.J. Yannacone, a founder of the Environment Defense Fund, said that our laws can't protect the environment because there is no definition that the public or business can understand.

Harvey Clare of Imperial Oil disagreed with the government belief that the universe can't assimilate certain pollutants.

Nature has rejuvenative powers which allow it to rid itself of impurities, and that nature itself is a large polluter. In some cases, man's contribution to pollution is minimal, contended Clare, Esso's Environmental Protection Coordinator.

Is it worth spending billions of dollars on pollution control, Clare asked when only the three largest cities in the country will register the reduction? Clare further questioned whether industry can survive if enormous expenditures are required.

Student governors want teaching stressed

By JOHN CAMPBELL

A meeting last week of six of the eight student members of the Governing Council decided that it would be desirable if greater emphasis were put on the importance of teaching in the university.

The comment arose out of a discussion on a paper authored by Planning and Resources Committee chairman James Lewis, which dealt with the structure of the university and its role in society. The paper will likely have a strong influence on planning policy within the university for the next several years.

Lewis' paper said the primary goals for the university should be "cultural and intellectual education of the student", and the development, "integration", and preservation of knowledge. He emphasized that U of T is in a special position to carry out research because of its location and availability of facilities.

At the same time, he advocated limiting U of T growth to a rate not exceeding that of the province as a whole.

Graduate student Clarice Henschel accused Lewis, who is president of Prudential Life Insurance, of taking "too much of a business approach."

Others said that arbitrarily limiting growth would be elitist.

Graduate student John Morton urged that teachers should be required initially to fulfill obligations in both teaching and research, in order to discover which they were better suited for. The result, he said, "should then be reflected within their terms of employment".

A similar approach was suggested by part-time student Joyce Denyer, who is also a member of the Planning and Resources Committee. She said she would "like to see a document setting out minimum standards teachers would have to conform to" with respect to duties such as having reading lists and lectures prepared in advance and being available to students for help after class.

The topic of research was related by group members to academic excellence. For example, the University of Guelph has opted for excellence in a limited field — agriculture — while providing a wide range of liberal arts subjects.

Morton argued that, at present, genuinely "innovative research" is being done in the U.S. mostly by large multi-national corporations, whereas Canadian research and development has tended toward "the refinement of known techniques to the Canadian environment". The best research on Arctic problems is being carried out in Canada he said, but the pipeline consortium and University of Alaska are now putting forth a strong effort in this field.

The group also listened to proposals put forward by Paul Cadario concerning the structure of disciplinary bodies within the university. These he said, would be five-member panels whose composition would be related to the offence being considered.

In the case of infractions "peculiar to students", such as plagiarism, the panel would consist of three students and two teachers.

No crisis with toothbrush

The electric toothbrush is not creating an energy crisis.

This statement emerged Thursday from a Holy Trinity Noon on the Square meeting featuring Darcy McKeough, energy management assistant to premier Bill Davis.

"I don't think we, as a government, should ban the electric toothbrush," McKeough, a former hardware merchant from Chatham, said. Although he personally didn't like electric toothbrushes, McKeough felt they weren't drawing enough of Canada's diminishing energy supply to be a danger to the future of the country.

GOVERNING COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY ELECTION REMINDER

Prospective candidates for election to the Governing Council are reminded that nomination papers must be filed by noon on Monday, February 12th, 1973. Nomination forms and copies of the regulations (Election Guidelines) covering the election are available from the Office of the Governing Council, Simcoe Hall, or the Registrars' offices at Scarborough and Erindale Colleges.

There are vacancies in four teaching staff constituencies, all eight seats in the three student categories, and one seat in the administrative staff constituency.

Nominations must be signed by the following number of nominators:

- teaching staff - 10
- graduate students - 15
- full-time undergraduate students - 50
- part-time undergraduate students - 15
- administrative staff - 20

Present members of Governing Council whose terms expire on June 30th next may be nominated again if they are continuing in the same constituencies for which they were elected in 1972. Those elected this year for the teaching staff and administrative staff constituencies will serve for three years from July 1st, 1973, and for student constituencies for one year, as required by the University of Toronto Act, 1971.

Descriptions of the constituencies were published in The Varsity of January 24th last. Enquiries or requests for further information should be directed to the Office of the Governing Council at 928-2160.

Election shall be by mailed ballot.

Arts and Science Council Elections

Nominations will open Monday, February 19th, 1973 for membership on the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science and its committees for 1973-74. A list of vacancies will be available at that time.

Senior basketball defeats Queen's 56-38

By LESLIE McINTOSH

The few fortunate spectators at the Benson Building Friday night were again treated to an impressive display of basketball skills as the women's senior basketball "Blue Bloomers" maintained their hold on first place, defeating Queen's Golden Gals 56-38.

Blues started off slowly with Queen's jumping to a 4-0 lead in the first minute of play, but Toronto quickly rallied to take the lead 10-6 and maintained about a three point spread for the rest of the half. The score at half time was 23-20 for Toronto.

In the second half, third-year guard Daina Zukauskas took advantage of the Gals' wide 2-1-2 defense to drive down the middle for 13 points. With the Queen's defense more conscious of the middle, Toronto forwards were able to hit from the outside. Terry Knight and Chris Crawford accounted for 28 points collectively (17 and 11, respectively), as Toronto outscored Queen's 14-2 in the opening minutes of the second half.

A combination of a tight 1-2-2 zone defense by Toronto and cold, hesitant shooting by the Queen's team put the must-win game out of reach.

The win gives Toronto a record of 8 wins and 1 loss. Laurentian is in second place with a 7-2 record while Queen's is third with 6-3.

The first and second place teams from the Eastern (Toronto, Laurentian, Queen's, Ottawa, Carleton and York) and Western (Western, Waterloo, McMaster, Guelph, Windsor and Waterloo Lutheran) Sections will participate in the championship section in the final tournament February 23-24 in Ottawa, while the rest of the teams will compete in the consolation round.

Queen's must now rely on the Blues to defeat Laurentian (Toronto's only loss) in their last season game, to enable Queen's and Laurentian to tie for second place and the final playoff spot. A tie would be broken by a single sudden-death game.

Although Toronto has definitely locked up a playoff spot, the game is important because a win would give the Blues first place and match them against the second place team in the west in the first round of the final tournament instead of Western, last year's (OWIAA) champion.

A win for Laurentian would give the Sudbury team first place because although Toronto and Laurentian would have the same number of losses, both of Toronto's losses would be to the Voyageurs.

Blues hope to have the services of captain and centre Cathy Cullis who missed the York and Queen's games this week, and guard Magda Havas who missed the York game and saw limited action in the Queen's game because of the flu, for the game against Laurentian next Saturday, February 10th, at 1 pm in the Benson Building.

Track team members place well at Games

Toronto's Brad Morley (71) went on to win the two mile event, while Reed (72) finished third.

University of Toronto track team participants placed second with 26 points at the Maple Leaf Indoor Games Friday afternoon. Western was first with 29, while Queen's and Waterloo tied for fourth with 21 points each. McMaster placed fifth with 12 points out of a total of 10 participating universities and one community college.

Toronto's Henry Tobias placed third in the 50-yard dash with a time of 5.7, only one second off the pace set by Alan Greer of McMaster, and Dave Howes finished second in the 300-yard event, with a time of 33.5.

In the 600-yard Toronto's Gerry Feeny finished first in a time of 1:15.5, while the U of T's Brad Morley and Andy Reed finished first and third, respectively, in the two mile event. Morley ran it in 9:24.3, and Reed was clocked at 9:27.5.

Toronto's Ross finished fourth in the 50-yard hurdles in 6.7, a scant 0.4 seconds behind first place finisher Dave Jarvis of Queen's. Dave Barrett placed first in the pole vault event, with a 13'6" height, followed by Western's Don Anderson at 13'0".

In the evening meet, John Sharp won the mile in 4:19.9, 5.9 seconds back of his own personal record set two weeks ago.

U of T entered a mile relay team of Mark Minden, Dave Colbert, Bill Johnson and Gerry Feeny, which placed second to the East York Track Club. Bruce Simpson, competing for his extra-university track club vaulted 16'6" to place third.

(Simpson decided to participate even though he suffered an injury in practice two weeks ago.)

50-yard dash — women: 1. J. McIntyre, Western, 6.3; 2. Barb Burton, McMaster, 6.5; 3. Louise Gauthier, Laurentian, 6.5.

50-yard dash — men: 1. Alan Greer, McMaster, 5.6; 2. Bill Clark, Western, 5.7; 3. Henry Tobias, Toronto, 5.7.

Toronto team wins karate

The University of Toronto karate team members finished first on Saturday in the first ever OUAA karate tournament. Toronto finished with three wins and no losses in the five team round-robin meet.

Ryerson finished second with two wins and one loss, while Guelph was third with one win and two losses. Other participating teams included York and Western.

Western's Ken Lam finished first in the kata (free form dance) event with 19.9 of a possible 30 points. Ryerson's Don Chow was second with 19.4, and Toronto's T. Lee placed third with 19.3 points. Lee and Chow had originally tied for second with 19.1 points each, and another event was run to break the second place deadlock.

York's John McKenzie finished first in the kumite (individual, open fighting) event, defeating team-mate Harvey Pope. Lange Hayson of the University of Guelph finished third. Hayson defeated Ryerson's Gerry Macpherson in the semifinals, while he in turn was defeated by York's Pope. McKenzie also defeated Macpherson to reach the finals.

Toronto participants Mike Lipczynski, Jake Orbach, and Willie Holtzman were all eliminated in the first round of the kumite event.

In presenting the awards to the winners, Toronto Men's Athletic Director Dalt White commented that the karate tournament was held "on an experimental basis". But, he expected "that at the next meeting they'll probably ratify this as a regular OUAA meet."

York's McKenzie (left) defeated Pope for the individual championship.

Women fencers fourth

The University of Toronto women's fencing team finished fourth on the weekend in a round-robin tournament at the Benson Building.

Toronto won two bouts — against York and Western — but lost three others in the six team meet. The University of Ottawa team finished first with an undefeated string of five victories. McMaster was second, winning four bouts, while McGill placed third with three wins.

Participants on the Toronto team included Maureen Selway, Maureen Evans, Isobel Heathcote, and Anne Gutterrez.

In the individual bouts (the women's teams only fence foils) Judy Krupanski of Queen's and June Mallin of Ottawa tied for first place with eight victories each. In a bout to determine first place Krupanski prevailed, and Mallin finished second. Western's Robyn Sargeant placed third with four victories and four losses.

Blues top 100 for first time in four years

By BOB PRITCHARD
Basketball Blues recorded their first century in four years rolling over the University of Western Mustangs 102-81 in exhibition play on Saturday in the Benson Building.

The last time Blues reached the hundred point mark was in February, 1969, when they defeated the same Western Mustangs 105-76. Varsity then went on that year to lose its first playoff game and was eliminated.

The fact that the Blues enjoyed a considerable height advantage over the London team cannot detract their victory, as Toronto out-hustled, out-shot and out-rebounded Mustangs in some impressive playing.

At halftime, Western was actually leading the Blues 48-47, with both teams playing evenly, except in rebounding, where the Blues were ahead 28-21.

With the start of the second half, Blues slowly began to pull ahead of the London team, and by the 10 minute mark were leading 70-60. As well as maintaining control of the boards at both ends of the floor, Blues tightened up their man to man defence, making it difficult for the Mustangs to penetrate.

Even when Western did get close in, it often failed to put the ball in the hoop. In the first half, Mustangs had maintained a respectable floor shooting average of 42 per cent. But in the last 20 minutes of play, Western only connected on eight of 30 shots for a 27 per cent average.

Varsity seemed to have an endless supply of energy, as the team continued to fast-break up the floor, beating Mustangs on several occasions. Coach McManus substituted freely throughout the game, usually in groups of twos and threes, giving his players adequate rest.

Western used a half court press on the Blues for the majority of the half, and the first few times Toronto brought the ball up the floor, Mustangs managed to steal it.

Unlike their reaction to the press last week in Ottawa, Blues quickly recovered, and began to move the ball in with quick passes.

With five minutes to go in the game, Blues were up 94-70, and the only question left was whether they could make it 100. They almost didn't, since it took them three minutes to make it 98.

But with 90 seconds left, Dave Ferguson put in Varsity's hundredth point with a jump shot from the top of the key. The game ended with the score Toronto 102, Western 81.

Both clubs used man to man defences throughout the game. In the first half, Western really gave the Blues a contest with some accurate passing and quick drives to the basket. Toronto was somewhat slow to react to screens, and on offence failed to roll to the basket or missed the open man on several occasions.

A noticeable change in the Blues' playing was in their offence. Toronto uses a number of pre-set plays, and in earlier games the team seemed to be tense while using them. Varsity seemed more relaxed on Saturday — possibly because it was only an exhibition game — and seemed to work the plays more by instinct than by regimentation.

Near the end of the game, Blues began to foul, and by the end of the match Watt, Cress, Scott and Skyvington had fouled out (although many of the referees' calls were questionable). Western didn't take full advantage of their foul shots, hitting only 27 for 39 from the line. Blues were 18 for 28.

The real story of the game lay in the rebounding, where Blues came out ahead 56-37. Toronto might have increased its score, had team members not missed several tip-ins from right under the Western basket.

Varsity put forward a real team effort in the scoring department. Twelve Blues got on the scores sheet, six of them in double figures.

Tip Offs: Blues meet Ryerson Rams at Ryerson Wednesday night. This is an important game for Varsity if it wants to make the playoffs. They should win, having defeated the Rams 99-73 earlier this year . . . Western, third place finishers in the West last year (and in third place in the West so far this year) lost two of their top three scorers to graduation. The third didn't play on Saturday . . . Even with Saturday's victory, Blues record is only 4-5 in the league and 3-4 in exhibition.

Hockey Blues solidify hold on first place in Ottawa

By PETER DUX

Varsity Blues clinched first place in the Eastern Section of the OAAA this weekend in Ottawa with 11-3 and 4-1 victories over Carleton and Ottawa, respectively.

The Gee-Gees proved to be a much improved team since their 12-3 drubbing in Varsity Arena earlier in the season. They provided Blues with one of their toughest games of the schedule in a tight-checking, yet fast-skating game.

Not until third period did Blues' stamina pay off when they took over the game and broke a 1-1 tie wide open with three unanswered goals.

The still high-flying line of Pagnutti, Ruhnke, and Korzack scored two quick goals at 0:14 and 0:52 of the third period to notch the winner and insurance tallies.

Play in this period differed from that in other games so far this season, with Varsity controlling the puck and Gee-Gees being forced to take long shots from the neutral zone, while Blues checked furiously to protect their lead.

Gee-Gees were playing up with Varsity, never letting up with their solid-checking and fast-skating game. Ottawa's penalty killing crew managed to work away one and one half minutes when the team was minus two players — a rarity against Blues' strong power plays.

The second period ended scoreless although the pace was even faster than the first. Only the two goalies — Ottawa's Gary Doyle and Toronto's Gary Inness — prevented the third period — one defenceman deep back, with two forwards and two "halfbacks". This assured a three man defence and essentially allowed a four man attack. Watt did not try to continue this game plan against Ottawa the following day.

Munro and Doug Tate who couldn't fly out of Toronto Friday due to weather conditions. Tom Watt dressed Roger Wright, the team's manager, who responded

Friday's game against Carleton was a continuation of last week's encounter in Toronto, with Blues toying with a vastly outclassed opponent. Harry Sems, playing without his contact lenses, still managed a hat-trick and one assist. Bill Fifield and Bill Buba also managed four points apiece.

22% cut off Advisory Bureau

The U of T Advisory Bureau's 1973-74 budget has been slashed by $22,000 in a move which will force a reduction in bureau services and may signal the bureau's eventual demise.

The bureau, which provides counselling and guidance in an informal, relaxed way, learned of the 22 per cent budget cut on December 28. Bureau officials, director Don McCulloch told The Varsity yesterday, had not been forewarned that they were in line for the cut.

Over the last three years, the bureau has had its budget cut back by approximately five per cent annually, the across-the-board cut dealt most university departments and programs.

McCulloch says the substantial reduction in operating funds means one of the bureau's three full-time staff will have to go. And, he continued, it would be hard for whoever drew up the cut not to realize that staff cuts would be the effect.

Student governor Paul Cadario, a member of the budget panel that made the cut, maintains he and vice-provost Robin Ross had discussed the implications of the reduction and had not anticipated that firings would be necessary.

Vice-president and provost Don Forster, however, admitted that the move represented "a quite substantial cut". Although he referred The Varsity to Cadario and internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway for elaboration about any implications of the cut, McCulloch says Forster, the senior administrator responsible for budget preparation, told him that if it were up to him he would have phased the bureau out by June 30, 1973.

Forster, McCulloch continued, said he had a hunch the bureau would be eliminated by the end of June, 1974.

Last night, Conway maintained that as far as she was concerned the budget cut "represents no policy". She pointed out that the decision had been taken before she took office January 1. "I'm trying to learn about the reasons for the decision being made," she told The Varsity.

Referring to the suggestions that the cut signalled a university desire to scrap the bureau, Conway noted, "That may be the opinion by some people about how the cut should be interpreted, but that's not mine."

She confirmed that a review of the decision is currently underway.

Forster criticized the bureau for spending too much time involving itself with social issues, and accused it of being out of touch with the students, according to McCulloch.

Yesterday, Forster confirmed that there is a feeling that the university should be "putting more resources into a formal academic training program".

Cadario said that he thinks people had a negative feeling about the bureau, a feeling that the "Advisory Bureau is not providing the kind of counselling required".

Questioned about why the budget panel cut the bureau's budget so drastically, Cadario again referred to this "negative feeling", a "belief that it is not doing the job it was set up to", and a conviction that the service being offered was not worth the money being spent.

McCulloch observed that it seemed unusual to axe the bureau's budget so heavily before the Internal Affairs Committee's planned review of student services later this year. Especially, he added, at a time when the "demand for our kind of services is continuously rising".

The bureau was established after on the recommendation of a presidential advisory committee. Its creation followed a mid-1960 SAC survey which revealed that students with problems wouldn't rely on the university Health Service for help.

The bureau opened in September, 1965, to offer direct counselling, increase community awareness of existing sources of specific student services, and address itself, according to the director's first annual report, "increasingly to an examination of the changing emotional and intellectual pattern of undergraduate life...

Cold, impersonal university life has sent many students to Advisory Bureau for counselling. Steep budget cut will reduce bureau staff next year.

Occupation trespass charges may still hold, trial told

By JOHN CAMPBELL

Charges of trespassing may still be in effect against 19 students involved in the occupation of Simcoe Hall during last year's open stacks demonstrations.

The revelation came at the trial yesterday of Bill Getty, charged with assaulting a police officer during the breakup of the occupation of March 12 last year.

Crown Attorney William Donaldson presented as evidence a document charging the demonstrators with trespassing in an attempt to prove that Getty re-entered the building the day after the breakup knowing that he was charged with the offence.

In reply, Getty produced a statement from Metro Inspector Maxwell saying that the charges had been dropped by the university.

He said the document, which had been delivered by the police, stated that although no further proceedings would be carried out on the trespassing charge, he would still have to appear in court on the charge.

Although presiding Judge Charles agreed that technically the charges were still in effect, he also accepted Maxwell's statement.

"It appears the charge has not been withdrawn," Charles said, it was "still proceeding."

Randi Reynolds, found guilty in December of assaulting police in the same incident, said last night she thought that at the end of her trial the trespassing charge had been dropped.

Getty, taking the stand to testify on his own behalf, began with a series of political statements which were ruled out of order by the judge.

The Robarts Library was built for "racist psychologists", he said before being interrupted.

"The courts are used to crush students and working people in the community (for the library)."

Charles intervened, saying "I am not concerned with your political feelings or what the capitalists do".

The defendant then described police action when they entered the Simcoe Hall Senate chamber, calling it "brutal". He said he was "singled out" by the enforcement officers in particular by deputy campus police chief John Irwin.

Student Michael Neamsch claimed that Irwin said, "Get him (Getty), he's a red!"

A second major figure at the break-in was Detective William Kearns, who was identified as the first person to come through the hole broken in the Senate door by police.

Although Neamsch testified that Kearns had been engaged in a struggle with one of the protestors, Getty, under cross-examination from Donaldson, stated that he "did not see him (Kearns) come into contact with anyone immediately after Kearns entered the chamber.

Earlier, he had told the court he had seen Kearns and Mark Goldblatt struggling.

The witnesses agreed that at no time did they hear a warning given by police that they were trespassing and were required to leave or they would be arrested.

On this point Getty stated, "I would have gone if I had received a warning."

Former acting president Jack Sword admitted on the stand that he took responsibility for calling the police on campus. He stated that his instructions to police were that he "did not want individual arrests of those occupying; just those who would not leave the room."

Under questioning from Donaldson, he insisted that he accepted the advice of U of T Chief safety and security Officer James Westhead that there would be an interval of five to 10 minutes between the time a warning would be given and the chamber would be rushed.

Although it was ruled as inadmissible as evidence, Donaldson quoted from a telephone transcript between Sword and Westhead in which Sword agreed that less than five minutes warning was acceptable. Charles ruled the evidence inadmissible since it could not be authenticated.

The Varsity will not publish during Reading Week, February 12 to 16, nor on the following Monday, February 19. Listings for events occurring between noon, February 9th and noon, the 21st will be published in this Friday's issue. Closing deadline for inclusion in that issue remains 1 pm, Thursday, February 8. U of T suspends arrested workers

Two workers who were arrested Thursday during a demonstration outside the university's fees and personnel offices were suspended "indefinitely" Friday, in what could be the first move towards dismissal.

One of the reasons for the suspension, according to general services assistant superintendent Les Hubbard, is their refusal to obey an order to work at a university property away from the downtown campus Thursday.

According to the two workers, Clyde Brown and Greg Kelly, they will protest their suspensions on the grounds that they were discriminated against in being ordered to leave the main campus.

Each had participated in daily lunch-hour demonstration last week against threatened layoffs of themselves and nine other grounds crew workers demonstrations which included some violent incidents. They charged that the order to work on a piece of university property near Glendon College at Bayview and Lawrence Avenues was planned to keep them away from the demonstration.

In addition, they said there was little possible work to do at the Bayview site, which has a staff of one, they say, and that the sudden order was unusual.

Hubbard countered Monday that even a day's notice of a place of work change was "not normal". It would be "ideal if we could plan a day or two days ahead," he said.

The work, he said, was cleaning up the Bayview site, was deemed as necessary by a "supervisor on his way down to work from home".

U of T labour relations manager John Parker said yesterday that Keilt's and Brown's refusal to follow orders, and "a number of complaints about their activities in front of 215 Huron Street" were being investigated.

"Both workers are convinced that the suspensions are "first notice of firing", especially since they received vacation pay owing with their notice of suspension. They will not cash the vacation pay cheque until the result of the investigation is known, they say.

Business agent Don Barclay of the Service Employees International Union Local 204, which represents the workers, stated that issuance of vacation pay "usually indicates termination."

Although he does not agree with either the position or the methods of the demonstrating workers, he says the union will support their grievances.

Keilty feels that Barclay could not have constitutionally unilaterally called off a planned demonstration a week ago Monday, since a general meeting of the union local had called for the protest.

Some of the workers calling themselves the Committee of U of T Workers Against the Layoffs, the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee and supporters decided to demonstrate each day in any case to oppose layoffs and the $100 rise in student tuition fees.

SAC exec: don't stop fees strike

Today's noon-hour SAC meeting will be presented with recommendations by the executive to continue the fees strike moratorium called by the U of T Coalition Against the Cutbacks.

The executive also recommends that SAC ask the administration for a day off classes the week after reading week, tentatively February 22, to discuss the Commission on Post-Secondary Education (COPSEO) report.

While the executive endorsed tomorrow's moratorium it refused to ask the administration for time off—classes, although it did vote up to $100 to publicize it.

Today's meeting is to be held in the Sid Smith foyer, partly to attract a quorum of SAC representatives which the council was unable to attain last week. Vice-president John Helliwell says that a phone survey of SAC reps indicates enough will attend to hold the meeting.

It is also hoped that a large public meeting will discourage disruptions which have plagued the last two meetings which did get a quorum.

The executive decided Sunday against the use of U of T police to prevent disruption by the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee (SSSC) which has repeatedly vowed not to let SAC meet unless it gives at least partial endorsement to their trust fund.

And on the basis that free access to university buildings must be maintained, the executive decided that it "deplores the use of physical intimidation and violence by the SSSC-CLM" on Thursday.

While reiterating its support for the Ontario Federation of Students' stand against the cutbacks in student financing, the executive decided not to recommend endorsement of a proposed province-wide demonstration at Queen's Park.

It also decided to urge students to work for the Liberals or NDP in the March 15 St. George by-election to express their opposition towards the government's education policies.

The U of T Coalition Against the Cutbacks moratorium tomorrow will take place at the Medical Sciences Auditorium between 1 and 3 pm. A spokesman said yesterday that there is no rostrum of speakers planned, in the hope that students will be free and have the time to express their own feelings.

The coalition, formerly the Stop the Cutbacks Committee, contains numerous left groups and college councils, and has SAC executive endorsement.

Subpoena to embarrass university, Evans charges

By JULIA ELCOCK

U of T president John Evans said in letter to provincial court that a subpoena presented to him by Bill Getty is for the purpose of "vexation" and "embarrassing" the university.

Getty is on trial for assaulting a police officer, Detective William Kearns, by punching him in the chest at the breakup of last March's library sit-in at Simcoe Hall.

Evans was served his subpoena when he was about to begin his inaugural address at his instalment as president of the university September 28.

The letter from Evans was presented to the court by F.R. Griffiths. In the letter Evans said that it would be pointless for him to appear at the trial since at the time of the sit-ins he was teaching at McMaster University and had no connection with the affair.

Getty pleaded not guilty at Monday's session of the trial and charged that he has been "harassed" by detective Arthur Lymer.

He said that Lymer had called him and offered to make a deal, with the conditions that Getty would be cleared if he agreed to plead guilty. But if Getty followed his plan to plead not guilty, he might be "sent to jail," Lymer reportedly said.

Judge Charles said that it "was a bad practice" for a police officer to be engaged in threatening and called Lymer to the witness stand.

Lymer admitted to having made a phone call to Getty to discuss the case, but he denied that he had made any mention of jail.

Crown Attorney William Donaldson said that "plea-bargaining" is an accepted practice.

"It is a common thing to discuss those matters with defense" said Donaldson and since Getty is representing himself, it is natural that these proposals would be addressed to him. "A plea of guilty is indicative of penitence" he added.

Getty however maintained his charge of harassment and said that he was also being harassed at his job and by his landlord.

At the time of the sit-in Getty was not a member of the university community. Donaldson said that Getty told his arresting officer, Kearns, that he was a second year general arts student at the university. James Westhead, who described himself as U of T's Manager of the Environmental Hazard Control, Communications and Security division, testified however that there are no special rules governing the access of non-students to Simcoe Hall.

U of T chief security officer Gordon Huff and other witnesses testified that the occupying students were advised to leave the building. If they did so voluntarily, they would be allowed to go freely, but if they chose to remain the administration would have them forcibly evicted and charged with trespassing, he said.

Getty repeatedly questioned the witnesses about the level of noise that existed at the time the warnings were said to have been given and where they were given.

In examining the deputy chief of campus police John Irwin, Getty asked if Irwin knew that Getty was a member of the Canadian Party of Labour and asked Irwin how he felt about the term "reds". Irwin replied that he neither used the term nor liked it.

Getty also asked Irwin if he had pointed out certain people in the chambers to be arrested. Irwin denied that he had said this and stated that his main interest was directing his men to retrieve posters and papers that were on the floor.

Help wanted in winning Dare strike

People who support the Dare Cookies boycott can extend their support further tomorrow morning by helping the company's striking workers briefly shut down a Canadian National railway yard.

A CN transport contract with Dare contains no clause allowing CN workers to refuse to cross picket lines, as do many union contracts, and the Dare workers' efforts to prevent their bosses delivering cookies to CN in Waterloo has failed.

A main issue in the eight month old strike has been the company's refusal to grant equal wage boosts to men and women. The workers at the plant are about 80 per cent women. Last summer, Dare used professional strikebreakers, but picketline militance convinced the company to stop this practice.

A court injunction prevents picketing of exits at the Dare plant itself.

The workers will picket the CN yards at Keele and Highway 7 tomorrow from 7 am until 11.

Drivers and riders are asked to meet at the Keele Street subway station at 6:30 am.

The workers are also hoping to get support from a militant caucus of workers which is rumoured to have been organized in the CN union, the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway and Transport Employees.

Math union gets Duff

When Math chairman George Duff steps to the podium in the McLennan building at noon tomorrow to discuss hiring and firing of faculty, one member of the audience will be particularly interested.

That will be Stephen Salaff, the part-time professor that Duff fired.

The meeting has been called by students angry at the department's treatment of Salaff and another math professor denied tenure, David Spring.

Salaff had received terse notice in a letter dated December 11, that the university will not renew his contract next year.

The form letter, signed by Duff, and with Salaff's name typed in, told the math professor, who has been here two years, that he will have to leave the university by April 30.

No reason was given in the letter, but Salaff thinks he knows why his contract was not renewed.

In a telephone interview last night, Salaff described the conflict he had incurred last year with professor Ray Vanstone over how to weigh the final examination marks of Math 139, a calculus course designed for physical scientists. Vanstone and Salaff were team-teaching the course.

Salaff sided with student demands for less emphasis on final exams; Vanstone disagreed.

Vanstone was (and still is) the associate chairman of the math department.

But Vanstone denies that the "discussions" between himself and Salaff played any part in the latter's dismissal.

Before Salaff's firing had been formalized, over 1000 students in the math department signed a petition demanding the professor be retained. The petition also called for the rehiring of Spring.

But above all, the petition called for a student say in hiring and firing, so that the Spring-Salaff affair would not be repeated again.

When presented with the petition last November Duff suggested that students would put their time to better use studying rather than worrying about who teaches them.

According to a Math and Physics Society Course Union newsletter, Duff waffled over accepting an invitation from the course union to participate in the public meeting over math department decision-making.

But Duff said last night that he has always been willing to attend the meeting.

Broken doors aren't worth police charges. U of T might have avoided 215 Huron violence had it forewarned protestors of its plans to force entry and call Metro cops if fight started.

Might have avoided violence

Last Thursday afternoon, a carefully planned scenario was acted out in front of 215 Huron Street. It was like the moves on a chess board.

First, the demonstrators protesting the university's layoff policy — allegedly settled in advance of the demonstration — lined up in front of the building, linking arms to block entry to the building.

Then, with equal precision, university police played out the steps of asking them to allow people who wanted to enter the building to get in. They knew the answer would be no, but they asked once more. And, then, following the game plan, the campus cops began shoving the picketers aside.

Matching their move, the demonstrators resisted the attempt to break their line, fighting back vigorously. Both sides exchanged punches and the scuffle turned into a full-scale fight. U of T chief security officer J.F. Westhead then outfanked the protestors by throwing his reinforcements, hidden within the building until now, into the fracas.

As the campus police subdued the demonstrators by their greater numbers, they passed the word to senior administrators waiting on the sidelines to authorize calling Metro police to remove and charge the detainees. The reply was affirmative.

Everything had gone according to plan, at least for the university. The day before, the president had summoned the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee into special session to review an incident earlier that day when a personnel supervisor had been supposedly injured in a scuffle with the demonstrators, and to discuss what might happen Thursday. Although the committee didn't specifically consider the question of arrests, it did accept that Metro police might have to be called in if the situation couldn't be controlled by university police. Throughout the meeting, the president had emphasized that the campus cops were not meant to be a combat force and, with most of them over 40, they could not be expected to perform such a function.

One thing the committee never dealt with was communicating a warning to the protestors that any further violent interference with entry to the building would lead to the calling of Metro cops. Of course, Internal Affairs Committee chairman Paul Cadario told The Varsity, the demonstrators were aware they were breaking the law and any such warning was unnecessary.

The president was less sure. He ordered police to advise the picketers twice that their action was illegal and must stop before taking any action, he told The Varsity.

Yet, if the university was really only interested in preventing violence and allowing people to conduct their business in 215 Huron, it could have taken more pains to avoid the Thursday clash. It could have, indeed should have, sent a senior administrator to warn the picketers that the university would not tolerate interference with entry to the building and would call off-campus police assistance if necessary. Leaving this task — and how well it was carried out is hard to prove after the fact — to campus police whom nobody takes very seriously and the president reportedly regards more as commissionaries than as police is not adequate.

Or, another alternative would have been to station enough campus police outside the building in advance of the demonstration — publicly announced as slated for noon — to attempt to prevent the confrontation from developing. Secreting most of their numbers within the building did nothing to communicate how seriously the university regarded the situation.

Lost in all this confusion is the implication it has for future university action during clashes with demonstrators. After he completely flubbed the library occupation, then acting president Jack Sword promised to consult with the people concerned before calling in police during student occupations. In a case where the university felt it could not identify the leaders of the protest, he explained, it would make contact with their elected representatives, the Students' Administrative Council.

President John Evans made it clear last fall that he would not bind himself to this policy. He reportedly maintains that circumstances requiring the calling of police onto campus are so extraordinary that no firm policy can be set. Instead, he insists that each case must be dealt with as conditions warrant.

This policy is unacceptable. The Sword agreement represents a more reasonable approach to the problem of internal confrontations. It ensures that some attempt will be made to consult Advisory Bureau's hefty budget cut hides policy move

The university's epprent decision to at least downgrade, if not phase out, its Advisory Bureau almost represents a textbook example of abuse of power.

Operating in secret, the university's budget committee decided to lop $22,000 — 22 per cent of its operating budget — off the bureau's 1973-74 budget. No one from the Advisory Bureau was forewarned of the committee's intentions, no opportunity for defence and debate afforded the people most familiar with the bureau's operations.

In fact, the only people privy to the decision were the university's governors and the senior administrators. And nobody took great pains to point out the significance of this particular cut — relatively small in a total university budget in excess of $100 million — to the unsuspecting governors.

The university has defended preparing its budget in secret with the excuse that open meetings would prematurely concern faculty and department administrators before decisions were finalized. Equally, advance public exposure of the budget proposals would allow all parties concerned to attempt to influence the final form of the budget. This latter possibility undoubtedly troubles the administration as much as the former.

In this particular example, students — the sole users of the service — were denied any input into the decision to decrease bureau operations. The $22,000 cut means one of the bureau's three full-time counsellors will get the axe at a time when the bureau reports that students are making increasing demands upon their service.

The university's influential vice-president and provost — clearly entrenched as number two man in the administration — appears to be behind the move to de-emphasize the service. He admitted yesterday that the bureau's budget cut was "quite substantial". According to Advisory Bureau director Don McCulloch, Forster told him that the cut could be the first step of a plan to phase out the bureau by June 30, 1974. Yesterday, Forster was not ready to repeat his comments. Yet, the import of the cut cannot be missed.

The Advisory Bureau case is not the first time that university administrators have tried to sneak policy decisions by without allowing full discussion. It's a convenient way to shortcircuit the tricky policy approval procedure, since policy or not a program cannot continue operating without money.

The Advisory Bureau decision for example, in large part predetermines the outcome of an Internal Affairs Committee (whose chairman, Paul Cadario, sat on the budget panel that made the bureau decision) general review of student services as it affects the bureau. It'll be obvious to the councillors that the budget committee wasn't exactly impressed with the bureau, and will encourage them to go along with their sentiment.

The budget device also potentially affords the university the vehicle for getting around public explanations about why a particular program is getting downgraded. Nobody, for example, is openly admitting to the policy motives behind the bureau budget cut. And, by not publicizing its criticisms, the university denies the program or department concerned the opportunity to defend itself.

Once the budget has been worked out, there's little chance that a public outcry et any of its particular injustices will be sufficient to force re-examination of the budget. It'd cause too many problems, will be the convenient refrain.

All of which goes to show that despite the openness mystification surrounding the university's new governing structure, the university is still free to make its major decisions in private, relatively sure that later exposure will not force them to backtrack.

It's time for a change, one that will bring all the administration wheeling and dealing out into the open. Let's start with a complete explanation and reconsideration of the Advisory Bureau decision.

the grievors and to forewarn them of any decision to call in police. Such an understanding is the very minimum requirement of any attempt to deal responsibly with internal dissension.

Once Metro police have been called, the university leaves itself in the difficult position of either proceeding with criminal charges — something which should be avoided at all reasonable cost — or getting itself on poor footing with Metro police who insist on prosecuting all charges.

This dilemma should mitigate all the more against the university using external force to deal with internal dissension. Should force ever be used, the university should take all necessary steps to ensure that persons involved not be subject to prosecution by the courts.

Mike's Student Senate voted against supporting the fee strike, 'in consideration not of tactics but of goals'. While we cannot speak for the whole Senate, we offer this letter as explanation for our personal stand.

Free education enslaves public

You who have reached the university level must surely be aware by now that education does not appear out of thin air.

Books, lectures, and demonstrations are the products of human effort, and as such, are not free goods. Men agree to produce them to ensure their own survival. By selling his time and knowledge to students, a professor earns money for food and clothing. If he is to receive no reward for providing his services, then he will not voluntarily provide them.

There is, therefore, no such thing as a free education. Education must be paid for; the only question is, "By whom?"

Various groups on campus are demanding that students not be made to pay for their education; that education be provided at no charge, or at less than its market price, because it is "a right".

A closer examination of this claim is very revealing about the nature of those who utter it. Education, we remind you, is the result of other people's efforts. To claim education as a right for which one need not pay, is to claim the right to the efforts of others, which is to claim the right to slave labour. Anyone who claims the right to an education, is claiming the right to enslave those who will pay for it, because education must, of course, be paid for.

Whom would the students enslave? Their parents, their relatives, their neighbours, their working friends — taxpayers, in general — and industry. The Young Socialists clamor that education should be financed through corporation taxes. In other words, the government should appropriate all corporate profits, eliminating the incentive for production and investment, bringing research to a grinding halt, and forcing companies to raise the prices of goods so that the burden of payment falls once again on the shoulders of the average citizen.

By what right?

The principle of justice requires that consumer goods be paid for by the people who consume them. A man on a desert island cannot consume more than he produces. A man in society cannot do so either, except by consuming what someone else has produced. If a student has the right to consume in the form of education what taxpayers have produced by hard work, then what rights do taxpayers have?

Clearly, a student does not have this right. There is no such thing as the right to violate the rights of another.

So, pay your $100 and shut up about it!

Urgent everyone beat moratorium

The fees strike continues and has met with success at U of T and at universities across Ontario. But, the increase in fees is only one small part of the coming cutbacks in education. Next year, we can expect to see cuts in the grant portion of OSAP, increases in tuition and decreases in support for graduate education, the phasing out of courses and of whole departments, and the firing of junior faculty and support staff. These changes amount to a full-scale attack on the quality of and accessibility to post-secondary education in Ontario. Any gains made during the 1960's toward the goal of universal accessibility are being wiped out in one blow by the provincial government.

The fees strike called by the Ontario Federation of Students has let the provincial government know that Ontario students are not happy with tuition increases. Up to now, however, the opposition of Ontario students (teachers, faculty, etcetera) to the entire policy of cutbacks in education has not been articulated. It is for this reason that the U of T Coalition Against the Cutbacks (originally the Stop the Cutbacks Committee; ed.) has been formed.

The coalition is a broadly-based group made up of representatives of SAC, VUSAC, Erindale, Innis, the Arts and Science Students Union, campus course unions, and political groups. The coalition has called a moratorium this Thursday beginning at 1 at the Medical Science Auditorium in order to begin discussion on effective means of making our opposition known. Information will be provided at the meeting on the extent and implications of the education cutbacks and the coalition will put forward some proposals for possible action.

It is urgent that as many students as possible attend the Thursday meeting. We must begin discussion immediately of the action students, SAC, and the Ontario Federation of Students should take. Opposition to the new education policies of the Ontario government must begin now while there is still time.

Grad governor clarifies views

I wish to make a short comment on the article concerning Student Governing Councilors published in last Wednesday's Varsity, in which I appeared to be much-quoted (and misquoted).

My comment concerning Paul Cadario was correct though made some time ago and in heat, and arose from the imbroglio created by the moves of Paul and the SAC executive to have Paul nominated chairman of the Internal Affairs Committee of Governing Council without prior discussion with or notice to the rest of the elected student councilors. Paul is strong-minded, eloquent, and able, and the student body of this university has been well served by his presence and many of his actions on Governing Council. His political style is that of the individual, not the group, however, and the essence of my comment to Varsity was that the student interests of the University of Toronto would have been and will in the future continue to be better served by the co-ordinated, non-parochial unselfish effort such as has been performed so ably by Joyce Denyer, Clarice Henschel, and Brian Morgan on this year's Governing Council. As I see it, only in this co-ordinated way will the students maintain their hard-earned and potentially very significant say in the general affairs and policy decisions of the university; that is, by maintaining and wherever possible enlarging their presence on all the committees and sub-committees of Governing Council and by sharing this wide "across-the-board" representation with the strong effective official Student Association representatives. Only such co-ordinated effort and an associated swift dissemination and exchange of information, plus an improved sense of awareness on the part of the student representatives, will be able to keep abreast of the fast-footed actions and manoeuvrings of what

by all measures must be considered an extremely able senior administration.

Which brings me in closing to the misquote on "confidentiality". Horseshit! Student councilors will be making the effort can become reasonably aware of most things going on within this university's governing and administrative structure (Doing something about it is another matter.) And, if a document or documents are declared "confidential" there is usually good reason (though not always one with which one might agree, but can challenge). The most unfortunate aspect of such imposed confidentiality is, therefore, that of the resulting and generally annoying lack of discussion with and response from one's constituents. Such frustration or annoyance is not restricted to students, and the imposition of confidentiality of information is a right and proper part of any governing or administrative body.

Best of luck to next year's councilors.

Ad accused of double standard

This is in reference to a one-page advertisement that has been placed in Varsity, signed by certain "members of faculty" and initiated by a so-called "Canadian Academic Committee for Soviet Jewry". The advertisement appeals to "the canons of international law and human decency" in support of the demand for complete freedom of immigration from the Soviet Union to Israel.

We are not concerned here with the accuracy of the allegations made by the "appeal", since we do not wish to defend the Soviet Union. Different forms of this pressure campaign have been seen during the past few years, however, and we believe its real motives and ramifications have not been detected by most people. It is unfortunate that some sign such a protest with apparently good intention.

It is our duty to point out some facts that give the issue a better perspective, specifically about: (1) the historical effect of immigration on the Palestine conflict and Zionist occupation, (2) the condition of Palestinian Arabs in Israel, and (3) the Palestinians who have been dispossessed.

In harmony with the implemented Israeli policy of building new settlements in the occupied territories and forcing the departure of the indigenous population, this immigration campaign aims at increasing the demographic, economic, and military strength of Israel and thus enforcing a status quo regardless of the rights of others. The high organizers of the campaign are of course aware of the objectives, and they thus divert the issues and disguise intentions behind a barrage of humane mottoes.

The reality of these objectives are demonstrable by the developments and creation of the State of Israel. Immigration to Palestine has been the major cause of tension after the British gave the Zionists conditional support in 1917. In the early twentieth century, the small native Jewish community lived peacefully with the majority of Christians and Moslems in Palestine, all sharing descent from the successive inhabitants since pre-Biblical times. Conflict was then generated by the influx of politically-minded Zionist colonizers from the West, who pretended a source of authority and assumed a myth of continuity with the ancients. In 1948, the colonizers forcefully created the State of Israel, systematically dispossessed a million Palestinians and oppressed those remaining. Since then, immigration has been steadily increased, coupled by the aggressiveness and expansion of the Israeli state.

The Zionist propaganda machinery portrays this state as a "democracy" and as the realization of the peaceful dream of the persecuted and "homeless". What irony! The persecuted become persecutors; the homeless have caused homelessness for others who did not share in their persecution. In fact, the discriminatory policies of which the Zionists accuse the Soviet Union are being applied in occupied Palestine against the non-Jewish population, and worse: restrictions in educational and work opportunities, systematic downgrading in all aspects of living, suppression of cultural expression, arbitrary arrests and transfer of population, destruction of residences and confiscation of land, and innumerable violations which have been condemned by the UN and international commissions.

Such injustices against the Palestinians have not, however, been approved or glanced over by all Jews. Many Israeli and western Jews (genuine upholders of the principles of Judaism, we like to consider them) have courageously raised their voices against these distortions of universal Judaism and the inversion of elemental human justice.

But then, we get a group of academics here who hold up human principles by the tail to their particular whim or advantage. They cite UN decisions and declarations, when they should know that Israel and the Zionists accepted only one UN decision to their advantage and refused scores of others demanding repatriation for the Palestinians or withdrawal from occupied territories. They cite the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which certainly has an article reading "everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own..." (applying to Soviet citizens of Jewish background). But, they conveniently forget that the article continues to say "and to return to his country" (presumably because some of the signatories of the declaration also states that "no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.") What do we conclude? That human rights apply to some but not others?

We cannot deny the right of Soviet citizens, and all people, regardless of faith, to the freedom of choice. But, the freedom and enjoyment of some cannot (at least should not) be procured at the cost of victimizing and depriving others. There are priorities. The problem (if such exists) of Soviet Jews is no more than the problem of all citizens in communist countries. On the other hand, the inflow of aliens to Palestine has meant, and more will cause, an increased in the number of those displaced by force. As it become demographically impossible for the Palestinians to return, the chances of a peaceful solution will be nil.

We, therefore, urge concerned people to re-examine the implications of the Zionist campaign for Soviet Jewry. We wish also to urge students and faculty members to be attentive to the struggle of the Palestinian people for priority to their land — a struggle that is urgent and genuine. Their claim is certainly superior to the hypothetical contentions of those who will later use the unsuspecting immigrant as live fortification in a colonial bastion.

The Palestinians are for return whatever it takes. Right is with them, regardless of how much their revolution is maligned. Their aim remains pure: to seek as an ultimate the creation in Palestine of a non-sectarian, broadly democratic state, where Christians, Jews and Moslems (if they want to define themselves so), who have the legal and moral right to be there, can live and work together in equality.

Fees strike aim not progressive

There's been a lot of confusion about fee strikes, demonstrations, trust funds, and other tactical matters about the 'educational cutbacks'. What nobody seems to be discussing is the reason for opposing these supposed 'cutbacks'; it seems that only Saint Mike's decided to judge the fee strike on the basis of goals and not of tactics. We are expected to believe that the changes of the past budget with regards to OSAP and tuition fees has seriously affected the openness of Ontario's universities; that the Davis government has set out to destroy post-secondary education in the province. By taking part in the fee strike, we are standing up (so the ideology runs) for accessibility and universal education. But, this is an ideology in the Marxian sense — a set of ideas that serve to conceal, rather than express, the concrete historical situation.

Let us look at the situation. The aim of the fees protests is to return to the pre-1972 condition — 'rescind the surcharge' or 'stop the cutbacks'. Aside from the peculiarity of supposedly 'progressive' groups fighting to bring back the status quo, those of us who oppose the campaign can't believe that the university of a year ago was a very open institution. The bulk of students in Ontario's universities have always been middle-class and upper middle-class. A disproportionately small number of working-class children ever get near university.

This accepted, a look at the tax structure is necessary. Though income taxes are only mildly regressive, the additional taxes that support the provincial government — on tobacco, gasoline, liquor, and other 'luxuries', give the tax structure as a whole a regressive effect. The working-class pays for a great deal of government revenues.

Insofar as most of the cost of university education — an institution with a distinct class bias — comes directly from tax monies, the working-class in Ontario is supporting an institution they cannot make use of. Even now, with the additional fees paid by students, the provincial taxpayer pays for 5/6ths of the cost of every student's education. Were the proportion of working-class students in university to be higher, the situation would be better. But, even free tuition and stipends — as Sweden has learned — will not open the university to workers' children. The 'streaming' of children into academic and technical courses takes place early in life.

The solution to the problem of accessibility does not lie in changing the fee structure. This is the fundamental error of the campaign. What we should be interested in, what we should work for, is a restructuring of the financing of university education so we don't tax the poor to support the rich. We could try higher tuition fees, large grants to working-class students, and a loan system; this would shift the burden onto those privileged enough to attend university. And this, oddly enough, is what the government has recommended.

These were a few of our reasons, as individuals, for opposing the fees strike. On 29 November, the St.
