THIRSTY OR HUNGRY?

Diverting our northern waters: Canada's sellout as a nation

By RON SMITH
adapted from the chevron

In late November, Ontario's Minister of the Environment, James Auld, denied in the legislature that any Ontario waters flowing into James or Hudson Bay would be part of a diversion scheme that would sell the province's water to the United States.

His reply to Opposition questions was either a lie or political double-talk, in view of the fact that the federal and provincial governments have already begun preparations for Canada's final destiny — our sellout as a nation.

Auld also told the legislature that since the resources of northern Ontario waters flowing into James and Hudson Bay come within provincial jurisdiction, "their development and use for whatever purpose will be evaluated from the viewpoint of what is best for the people of this province". His comments stop cautiously short of ruling out the possibility that such a diversion scheme will occur if money or other considerations make it seem attractive.

The Minister created further concern about his plans when he added, "Should the engineering studies establish the feasibility of diverting additional waters within or between northern river basins for hydroelectric or other purposes, no dam would be constructed without first assessing the socio-economic advantages of such a scheme, including the cultural and ecological effects on the area."

He didn't note, however, that such studies have already been undertaken and have shown the feasibility of such a plan to eliminate low levels in the Great Lakes during certain years and to help compensate during — like the one that lasted from 1961 to 1964 — periods of drought in the eastern United States. Auld also didn't let on that crash socio-economic and ecological studies have been undertaken within the region to be flooded, or that Hydro, the Ministry of Natural Resources, and other federal and even American departments have prepared confidential reports, now housed in Toronto, on the topic.

The sellout plan

When you get right down to it, Canada isn't much of a nation. Only 21 million people strung out along the border of a vast wasteland too big to defend from any major foreign power, and largely owned by the Americans.

The only thing Canada has that is truly Canadian is the water within its boundaries. Not even the soil or rocks are our own. Those worth anything are American-owned, and are shipped south for U.S. industries. Now, the government has plans for the final giveaway — our water.

As it now stands, most people in southern Ontario haven't really given the thought of this prospect much attention. It seems too remote an idea; too 'science fiction' to ever happen here. Well, tell that to the people along the Columbia, or the Skagit River Valley, or the Manitoba community of South Indian Lake. Water diversion projects do happen; sellouts have occurred, and are on the planning boards.

Thunder Bay's Dam the Dams committee has been doing a great deal of snooping and campaigning against the Northern Ontario "water plot" which would see all major rivers controlled, and to a large extent held, in a collection basin the size of Lake Superior. This water would also be diverted south wherever necessary and in whatever quantity desired for American use. There would be a 50,000 square mile area flooded by the project north of Lake Nipigon.

The campaign's aim is simple: to prevent the construction of dams and diversion projects before they get started and held those already in progress. At the moment, two Ontario rivers — the Ogoki River (1943) and Long Leke (1939) — have been diverted for power projects and flow into the Great Lakes. The massive, new plan is slated for this same general area.

'Northern vision' shrouded in secrecy

History of water diversion

Thadée Wilgot, chief of the Institute of Hydrography at the University Marie Curie-Skłodowska in Lublin, Poland noted last year that Canada is one of the five countries with adequate water to supply the world. Canada, he stressed, will be the logical supplier for the United States. He concluded that only three U.S. regions can guarantee water for the next 25 years, even though there is more water per person in that country in comparison to Europe. The problem is that most of its surface fresh water is polluted.

The lack of clean water was also realized by the Ralph M. Parsons Company of Los Angeles when they proposed the North American Water and Power Alliance (NAWAPA) in 1964. This plan, costing $100 billion over a 25 to 30 year construction period, would collect water from as far as the Yukon and transport it by the Rocky Mountain Trench to the southern California aqueduct network, and even supply parts of Mexico. The United States Senate endorsed the plan in 1966.

There was also a central plan, the Canadian Great Lakes Waterway (CENAWP), which would collect water from the Peace and Athabasca, the North Saskatchewan, the Ottawa, and Lake Winnipeg, and Ontario rivers flowing to Hudson and James Bay.

In 1966, Parsons Company estimates said Canada would need to spend approximately $40 billion to pay its part of the NAWAPA scheme, and for this Canada would earn $4 billion annually from hydro rates and investment. This $40 billion, of course, would have to be borrowed from the U.S. with an annual eight per cent interest rate worth about $3.2 billion. Having to pay the annual interest rate plus annual operating costs, it is likely that Canada would spend more yearly than it would earn from NAWAPA, putting us into perpetual debt. The Mackenzie Valley pipeline project is peanuts compared to this proposed plan.

The NAWAPA plan was not fully bought by Canadians, even though some political figures were advocating the project. A month before his death, General A.G.L. McNaughton called the plan "a monstrous concept, a diabolic thesis." Experience gained from the Columbia River sellout was still fresh in his mind.

Even though McNaughton said the situation was too hazardous to be left to giant U.S. corporations, other Canadians thought there was merit in the concepts. In December, 1965, John Turner, the man touted by some as the possible successor to Pierre Trudeau, spoke in Washington as the then parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Northern Affairs and Natural Resources to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. He said Canada may use its water resources as a trade lever to pry its way into U.S. markets and to drag industry into Canada's northland.

The Globe and Mail editorial of the day saw the potential water sellout as one big international poker game, a game that Canada would not benefit from if "it is flinched, thrown in too early, held too long, or traded for worthless tender." Even so, the concept in their eyes was good and they blamed federal-provincial feuding as the only hold up in the construction of diversion projects.

In the same issue, opposite the editorial page there was a large story written by Thomas W. Kierans. He too was advocating the "Grand scheme for Canada's liquid assets — water for sale."

And, why shouldn't he advocate the plan? After all it was the same man who brought out the first such plan for inter-basin transfer of water. His 1959 Great Replenishment and Northern Development Canal project called for the dyking of James Bay, collecting the fresh water in the bay, then pumping the water down the Ottawa, to Lake Nipissing and the French River to Georgian Bay. From there, the 'surplus' would be pumped out in Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, or Buffalo and into American waterways and homes.

At the bottom of the story in Italics The Globe explained, "Mr. Kierans, a professional engineer, has just completed a survey of Canada's water resources for the national resources committee of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce." By coincidence, Turner had spoken to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce that very same week!

By December, 1968, at the seminar on Continental U.S. Arctic-Flowing Rivers held at Pullman Washington, the Canadian position had changed. The waters in the Great Lakes, after all, were rising now, the drought conditions of the eastern U.S. ended by 1966, and people had begun to demand that water pollution be cleaned up — on both sides of the borders.

Assistant Deputy Minister (water) of the Department of Energy Mines and Resources A.T. Davidson stated water research was taking place in the Canadian north. This included joint federal-provincial studies on the quantity and quality of five Ontario river systems draining into Hudson and James Bay — however, no attempt had been made to develop an understanding of our current and anticipated requirements.

Although stating that the Canadian government's policy was "not to develop its water resources except on a foundation of knowledge as to its supply and the expected demands thereon," Davidson left the door open, saying, "One alternative use of water that might be considered in the planning phase of river basin management could be inter-basin diversion of a portion of the annual flow," and that the resolution of some of our diverse domestic problems may include large scale inter-basin water transfers."

Another seminar participant, E. Roy Tinney, had been director of the State of Washington Water Research Centre and was now director of water planning for the Policy and Planning Branch of Canada's Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Before his appointment, Tinney was a great advocate of the Central North American Water Plan (CENAWP). This plan involved damming the rivers flowing out of the plains and diverting the water south to the U.S. via either the Red and Missouri Rivers or the Great Lakes, or both.

The water sellout was still a hot topic in February, 1970. By now, the Ontario and Canadian governments were doing extensive work in northern Ontario, and the United States Army had even sent engineers to Lake Nipigon to study ice conditions the previous year.

Under Parliamentary cross-examination by Conservative G.H. Aiken and then NDP leader T.C. Douglas, Resources Minister Joe Greene had to flatly state that no Canadian water could be sold without approval of the Canadian government, and that the government was not contemplating giving any such approval. The Opposition wasn't satisfied, saying there was a likelihood of an "exchange package" of natural resources.

Greene dismissed the opposition by quoting John Diatenbaker. As Prime Minister in May, 1961, Diatenbaker termed the proposal "impracticable from an economic point of view on the basis of the engineering data available at this time." But, engineers had been working in the north since August, 1965 and additional research was becoming available to governments for evaluation.

Northern Ontario

The rivers of Ontario's northland are very big, with few settlements along their banks.

The Albany, for example, starts at Lake Joseph near Sioux Lookout, and runs east to James Bay. It drains an area of 53,000 square miles and includes a number of large tributaries, among them the Kenogemik, Nagemik, Pagwachuan, Kabinegami and Ogoki Rivers. The river is still undeveloped and unpopulated with the exception of isolated Indian communities. It is 650 miles long.

The Attawapiskat is almost as long, 500 miles approximately, with only two communities along the river. The Winisk River flowing to Hudson Bay is only 250 miles long, but drains 26,000 square miles. Most of the river is protected as Wild River Provincial Park.

The last major river system under investigation for diversion and power potential by federal and provincial employees was the Severn. This river, 610 miles in length, offers both beauty and solitude. There is only one settlement along its course from Sandy Lake to Fort Severn. The region is true wilderness.

Engineering feasibility studies and mapping of possible diversion of routes southward end into the Great Lakes have been undertaken. And, of course, there have been the inevitable sociological studies of the native population.

Very little hard core data has even been made public — most of it is secret. The Co-ordinating Committee on Northern Ontario Water Resources Studies Sixth Progress Report to the governments of Canada and Ontario was released in November, 1968. It states, "Approximately four miles of levelling was carried out south of the Pipestone River to complete a level grid extending from Pipestone River to the northern boundary of the Ogoki River and interconnecting structure sites along the Agutua glacial moraine. These sites were investigated in 1967 in connection with an engineering feasibility study of a scheme for using the Agutua moraine as a diversion barrier. A topographic survey by the transit-stadia method was completed for a dam site on the Ogoki River at Whitelake Lake to investigate the feasibility of providing additional storage required to regulate increased diversion flow to the Great Lakes. In addition, work described below was carried out in connection with engineering feasibility studies of power development on the Albany River and of diverting water to the Albany River from streams further north."

Also in 1969, Ontario Water Resources Commission (OWRC) released its Data for Northern Ontario Water Resources Studies, 1966-68. Again, the diversion theme appeared. On page one, it observed, "In October 1965, the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Ontario announced that the government of Canada and Ontario had agreed to undertake a series of co-ordinated studies on Ontario's northern water resources and related economic developments. . . . Most of the work is being undertaken in five large river basins draining to Hudson Bay and James Bay."

"The Co-ordinating Committee prepared a statement of objectives for the studies to be carried out separately by agencies of the two governments, as follows: With respect to waters draining James Bay and Hudson Bay in Ontario, to assess the quantity and quality of water resources for all purposes; to determine present and future requirements for such waters; and to assess alternative possibilities for utilization of such waters locally or elsewhere through diversion."

By May, 1969, the Seventh Progress Report of the Co-ordinating Committee was released and again revealed interesting investigations in the region. The federal Surveys and Mapping Branch had "compiled the preliminary mapping of a possible diversion route between the Attawapiskat and Albany Rivers. . . . A potential diversion route between Winisk Lake and the Attawapiskat River was also mapped by the (engineering) division."

Diversion plans were ready; ready for the right poker game, and the right political climate, the right American drought, and silent Canadians. This is the state we are in now. Given the right conditions, the green light could be given immediately.

Manitoba's inter-basin transfer

Water has yet to be shipped to the U.S. But, already Canadian waterways are being diverted to satisfy American power needs.

In Manitoba, ambitious plans to divert the Churchill River to the Nelson River fell through when the sponsoring provincial government got turfed out of office. Instead, a modified diversion scheme in which South Indian Lake will be flooded (although by less than a foot) has been approved by the Schreyer government.

Lake Winnipeg now has control dams at its north end. This will allow a constant flow for the Nelson River from two sources, and the major power development at Kettle Rapids, near Gillam, and others proposed downstream will generate not only Manitoba hydro, but also power for export.

At the Kettle Rapids site, only 75 men will be required to staff the plan when it's completely functional. The entire operation would be automatically controlled from Winnipeg, 660 miles away. Power is also being shipped by direct current for the first time in Canada. By using direct current, only two lines are required to carry the power, and less line loss would occur. All this added up to the fact that power could for the first time be transmitted over very long distances at less expense.

Ontario, in fact all of North America, is watching the Manitoba experiment. And, it all goes according to plan, the northern Ontario water control projects will be shipping power to as far away as Toronto, New York, and Detroit. The grid system is endless.

But, what about the natives? At Gillam, the Swampy Cree band didn't benefit from the power plant. The reservoir had destroyed the river valley for game, so now the Indians hunted as scavengers at the local dump. The town's taxi driver put 60,000 miles in a single year — driving the native people to the dump. "I'd leave them there for an hour, then come back and get them. They would have boxes of left-over food from the camp at the dam. Sometimes, the food was rotten, but they would eat it anyway. Some got sick; some died." Will this be the fate of the Indians of northern Ontario?

The water plot

Harry Achneepineskum of Ogoki, who spearheads the Dam the Dams campaign, is one of the many who are worried. "For five years now, people in the northern parts of northwestern Ontario have known that surveys of the water resources in our northern areas have been in progress," he recently wrote.

They suspected, he continues, that the surveys were connected with water diversion plans to the U.S., despite provincial and federal government dismissals of the northern activity as 'just a study'.

It wasn't until late August, 1971 that the Dam the Dams campaign committee had collected enough money to finance an aerial survey of a portion of the region to be affected by the diversion scheme outlines in government documents. It was only then, high above the wilderness of northern Ontario, that they were able to see the reality of the battle that they were fighting.

They recorded these findings in their report: "We... landed at Marten Falls (Indian Reserve) where we learned that the clearings were first observed in 1968 and appeared to be about one year old at that time. No residents of the reserve had been employed on this work even though the community is less than an hour away by boat."

"A 30 year old Ojibway medic at the community of Ogoki said the 200 plus residents of the Ogoki Reserve had been warned that they will have to move to a new land site because of flooding for a hydroelectric water diversion."

But he added that the people of Ogoki have no intention of moving or allowing their river to be diverted in any way.

We have not been officially told the dams are being built, but 18 miles down river and 20 miles up river the slashing of sites has already been completed as part of a plan to give water to the U.S.

"We have learned this is the reason for white men taking samplings and testing on our river. And we have no intention, no matter the reason, of allowing any dams to be built."

At Pickle Lake, Ontario Department of Lands and Forests officials showed the survey team maps of several proposed dam sites. The work, the officials told their visitors, was being done by Department of Energy, Mines, and Resources field crews "using unmarked rented vehicles".

The residents of Central Patricia, the team later learned, "are pretty upset about what we are hearing... There has to be an awful lot of thinking before the course of nature is changed," according to the local Anglican minister, Reverend A.R. Ohner.

"Some federal people have told us the overall magnitude of the project will dwarf anything ever done in Canada before. And, they added, studies up to now show enough to follow through with the complete diversion program," he added.

At Kingfisher Lake, a branch settlement of Big Trout Indian Reserve, a member of the band council told the team, it reported, "that his band council had never been consulted about any water diversion scheme, although they had heard reports of such things. After we told him what we knew, he was quick to point out the threat such a scheme would hold for his people..."

"We will not be happy. It will destroy our hunting and trapping lands. If the land is destroyed, we will be destroyed too. The animals in the forest and the fishes in the water are the things that give us life. If they go, what will become of us?"

At two other Indian reserves, the response was similar.

The latest investigation

This wasn't the last aerial reconnaissance mission to be flown in the area, however. This fall, a CBC Weekend television crew went north and covered the same rivers and reserves. On November 5, 1972, the program revealed to most of the Canadian public for the first time that, yes indeed, some waterways were going to be dammed in the forest.

For two and a half weeks after the airing of the show, the provincial government remained silent. And, the only after Opposition questions dealing with the diversion project did Auld say that no diverting of waters would be done until the area was studied.

For five or six years now, studies of northern Ontario's water, forests, climate and people have been completed.

A crash ecology operation over the entire northern Ontario region has been undertaken. Whether these surveys were to further assist the diversion work, or whether it was to save some unique plant life before the project is started, is now known.

The northern Ontario diversion area isn't the biggest inter-basin transfer plan. However, it is the closest and the one that seems, at this moment at least, ready to be transposed from the drawing board to the field.

Whose vision?

Current estimates put the United States water shortage at between 50 and 100 billion gallons in 10 years; unless, of course, other sources are found.

Northern Ontario would be an ideal source. Via the Great Lakes, the water could easily be transported to approximately two-thirds of the people of the United States. The Great Lakes are the natural waterway to the heartland of both countries.

Unfortunately, great climatic and ecological damage is bound to occur when such a project is carried out. Some scientists even fear a major imbalance with the marine plant life in Hudson Bay which could still further limit the world's supply of oxygen.

We just don't seem to know all the answers to the riddles of the north. We haven't studied it long enough.

When are the people of Canada to be told the full story of the diversion project by the federal and the Ontario governments? Why have the people's plans and ideas about their north been totally ignored?

Who is the northern vision for? And, what are the objectives? These priorities have to be decided before any northern development is allowed to take place.

McGill students to stage day care rally

MONTREAL (CUP) — Students at McGill University will stage a mass rally today to solicit support for a university day care centre and to back a two week old occupation of a common room.

About 35 parents, children and student supporters took over the common room on the eighth floor of The Leacock Building early January 30, and vowed they would stay until the administration met their demands or the police arrested them. So far, morale has remained high.

The occupiers are demanding the university provide facilities and money for daycare facilities for McGill students, faculty, and staff, and members of the surrounding community. They also demand the university agree to foot part of the bill with parents paying on a sliding scale based on ability to pay. They want immediate facilities for about 50 children.

Plans for a university-sponsored centre have been stalled by a delay in moving the Spanish department out of a building slated for day care.

More than 3,000 people have signed a petition supporting their demands, and many McGill groups have expressed solidarity and helped gather supplies.

On January 26 the McGill baby care co-op was told to leave an unused language laboratory it had been utilizing as an unofficial day care since last November.

On February 1, the administration issued two ultimatums to the occupiers. In a letter delivered by Sam Kingdon, Chairman of the space allocations committee, the administration said the presence of children constituted a fire hazard, and they must leave by 7 pm. Others occupiers were to leave by 11, because the building closed to the general public then, the ultimatum said.

After a brief meeting the occupiers decided to send the children home by the 7 pm deadline, but to remain themselves.

More than 40 people joined the occupation and despite Kingdon's threats, the university made no attempt to remove the occupiers by force.

The occupying forces have established the "Alliance for Child Care" to support the efforts of the baby care co-op.

The McGill situation is similar to one at The University of Toronto, where a women's group occupied a university-owned house in August 1969 after the university had claimed it had no space available for day care. The university allowed the group to remain and establish a centre for children under the age of two, but by the spring the provincial government demanded massive renovations to bring the centre up to provincial standards.

A dramatic 24-hour occupation of the university senate chamber in late March 1970 persuaded the administration to contribute enough money to pay for renovations.

In April 1972, a similar group occupied an unused university building and turned it into a day care center for children under the age of two. The occupation is still continuing, with the university trying to find alternative accommodation for the group, before it turns the building into its own administration-run day care center.

Pollution laws framed in private: lawyer

By DAVE LINE

Anti-pollution laws are drafted by civil servants who seldom consult the public, charged David Estrin of the Environmental Law Association, last week.

Speaking to 150 people in the Medical Sciences Auditorium at the 10th Annual Conference on Law and Contemporary Affairs, Estrin asserted that civil services have the power to frame legislation in public because elected politicians are often ignorant of environmental protection and therefore must rely on the expertise of the public service.

Estrin suggested that the public be given an opportunity to "protect and pursue its interests." He said citizens must have some form of review before a law is put into effect, and suggested the courts could provide this function.

Estrin said a problem is that "there are a lot of old fossils on the judicial bench," whom he called "precedent-bound pedantics". He contended that these "fat cat" judges and lawyers are often most concerned with protecting the status quo.

Panelist John Swan, a U of T law professor, agreed that there are difficulties in the legal approach.

He said laws, like maxims, give only broad guidelines, and are often based on extremely critical value judgments. He noted that the judicial process is expensive and can be corrupted.

Another law professor, Albert Abel, took this criticism one step farther. He drew an analogy between the automobile and the environment, to show the ineffectiveness of institutionalized legal controls. He said traffic laws are very loosely enforced, illustrating the difficulty of enforcing social controls.

U.S. environmental lawyer Victor Yannacone, summing up the discussion, said, "to light one candle is better than to curse the darkness, even if it is a firecracker".

He suggested the time has come for everyone to stop meditating and make a positive contribution toward solving the problem.

Developer attacks landbanking

By LARRY KRAUSS

"To most of us here, and certainly to me, government landbanking is not the answer" to high housing costs, stated Keith Morley, newly elected president of the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada (HUDAC).

Speaking to a luncheon meeting Thursday of HUDAC, the association through which the building industry voices its point of view, Morley emphasized that the land banking scheme proposed by the federal government does not provide real solutions to rising house costs.

The land-bank scheme introduced by urban affairs minister, Ron Basford proposes that the government pour federal money into housing and land assembly in and around the urban areas.

"We may not agree with the emphasis placed by Mr. Basford on Government ownership of land," continued Morley. However, we cannot overlook the merits of his intentions to work with all parties to seek and implement proper solutions," continued Morley.

"Residential lot prices rose by 50 per cent in the Metro Toronto area last year," he said. "Average prices are now between $17,000 and $20,000."

The association feels that there are many methods that the government could introduce to effectively reduce rising housing prices.

"Private enterprise has a lot of the answers if they are allowed to propose them and be listened to," stated Lloyd Gunby, a Mississauga housing developer.

Many association members felt that the main pressure on land prices results from the shortage of serviced land for building and if the government would flood the market with a large supply of serviced land, the price of land would fall merely by economic laws of supply and demand.

Other recommendations included relaxation of a long list of restrictions on new subdivisions, such as minimum lot size which is presently at least 50 feet wide.

Gunby concluded that "the industry is the one that is building the houses and it is unfortunate that they are not listened to more closely."

Prof calls for "restructuring of life"

By BILL HUTUL
 As a solution to the complex problems of maintaining environmental quality, professor Daniel Cappon Friday called for a "restructuring of life."

Cappon, who teaches environmental studies at York University, said at an environmental conference session that he would have to "return to his drawing boards" to accomplish this task.

Cappon feels that the attitudes of many people toward environmental concerns need changing. He questioned the necessity of great emphasis on material consumption and its value to the quality of life.

U of T zoology chairman Donald Chant expressed fears that it is dangerous not to take decisive measures to protect "our environment and thus ourselves." The speakers agreed that too much time is spent trying to pinpoint the ultimate cause of man's destruction of his environment instead of doing something about it.

The session emphasized that there are many dimensions to environmental problems, and that solutions must come from a variety of disciplines, such as ecology, biology, engineering, economics, sociology, and law.

Emission from cars, electric power generators, and industrial processes was given as a major cause of pollution by U of T industrial engineering professor Arthur Porter. He explained that with more efficient systems of energy use, there would be less pollution.

Further growth of Toronto was opposed and government planning to reduce concentrations of people in the city was proposed by Ontario Deputy Minister of the Environment Everett Biggs. Government plans are designed to encourage more growth in Toronto's suburbs and other cities that aren't as crowded, he said.

Profs support strike

MONTREAL (CUPI)— Students at l'Université du Québec à Montréal are continuing their general strike against the proposed expulsion of 3,000 students, despite attempts by the administration to infiltrate their ranks.

The university has been effectively closed by student picket lines. The faculty union, Le syndicat des professeurs de l'Université de Québec (CSN), is respecting the picket lines.

The strike began January 25 to protest an administration order that all students who owed the university money would be expelled on January 26. (The provincial government has since extended the deadline to February 15. Students want it removed and want to be able to re-pay their debts within three years after leaving the university and entering the labor force.)

At a meeting Sunday, students strongly resisted an attempt to split full and part-time and day and evening students by holding separate meetings. Earlier, about 12,000 letters had been mailed to the students announcing a separate meeting.

Many other delaying tactics failed, and after three hours of debate on whether to continue the strike, students voted almost unanimously to keep it going. The handful of defeated anti-strike students left immediately.

Labour body calls for state control of Bell

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Canadian Labor Congress (CLC) called last week for the nationalization of Bell Canada claiming the Canadian Transport Commission (CTC) cannot effectively regulate Bell's operations.

The CLC presented a 23-page brief to the CTC which condemned Bell's proposed rate increases because they would cause hardship to "the old, the infirm, the disabled, the unemployed, the pensioners on fixed incomes, the underprivileged, and native peoples residing in the regions of northern Quebec, Labrador, and the Northwest Territories".

Bell wants to increase the basic rate for telephones from $5.40 to $5.80 per month. It also wants to double installation charges from $11 to $22; double pay phone charges from 10 to 20 cents per call; create a "directory assistance charge" of 25 cents per item except in the case of a number not in the phone directory, from a blind caller, or calls tendered from a hospital or hotel room; and increased service charges on long distance calls and on the per minute overtime rate.

The CLC charged the CTC is not protecting the public's interest, but Bell Canada's, and suggested the "regulator has become the regulated".

The Congress' brief details what it says is illegal profit-taking conducted by Bell since 1958 in violation of rulings made by the Commission and the Board of Transport Commissioners (BTC). The Board is the CTC's predecessor. In 1967 Bell's earnings reached 6.8 per cent and climbed to a high of 6.9 per cent in 1969. The profit range for that period set by the Commission and the Board was between 6.2 per cent and 6.6 per cent.

Bell controls 6,000,000 of the 9,700,000 phones in Canada.

In attacking Bell's charges for services as excessive, the CLC compared the cost of a telephone in metropolitan areas with over 100,000 users.

Calgary-Edmonton $4.25 (public)
Winnipeg, $3.90 (public)
Burlington, Ont.: $5.80 (Bell)
Quebec City: $5.90 (Bell)

The main reason Bell gives for the requested increases is that "its rate of return is so far below the level of a fair and reasonable rate of return under existing circumstances and conditions that the company's financial strength is seriously weakened."

Bell says rate increases are "necessary to make telephone shares a more attractive investment". The 1973 requests will merely "prevent deterioration of the profit position of the company" while those for 1974 will "improve profit and thus improve the ability of the company to raise capital."

Bell's financial profile is much better than the corporation is willing to admit. A brief submitted to the CTC last March by the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE) is very enlightening.

"Bell Canada's net earning in 1970 were $210,759,000. Net income, after interest, discounts and premiums on longer term debt was declared to be $133,262,000. This figure when added to the declared provision for depreciation of $183,850,000, represents a cash flow through the corporated treasury for that year in the amount of $317,112,000."

The UE concludes "that the amount mentioned is a formidable sum and in our view it should be more than enough to maintain and improve the technological competence of the company of the company in providing service, especially domestic service." This idea is supported by the fact that Bell's net earnings "have increased in every year since 1943 and in the eight years 1963-70, net earnings have more than doubled." The UE said.

Environmental scientists assailed

By DON MOWAT

There is a "great temptation" on the part of community colleges to produce "environmental scientists", stated professor P.H. Jones at the Faculty of Education on Monday afternoon. Jones is director of the Institute of Environmental Sciences and Engineering at U of T.

Some community colleges "have actually fallen for this bait," he said.

"It must be recognized that you cannot produce a specialized generalist," he concluded.

The university affords a "unique situation" for environmental studies because of its combination of research and teaching Jones said. However, he cited the problem of a lack of interdisciplinary communication as a serious impediment to environmental studies.

Jones mentioned the same lack of communication as it applies to the industrial, governmental and public sectors. Experts from each of these sectors may be able to agree on the nature of a particular environmental problem, but they may disagree as to the proper solution. Jones therefore urged that an "attempt to develop communications" be made, to bridge the "vacuum between policy-making levels."

He also asserted that environmental education has become "a popular topic at all levels of education" and that it is highly significant "because it involves survival."

Jones rejected any suggestion that environmental studies was a discipline in the traditional sense, but viewed it rather as "a thread which runs through all subjects." Environmental education begins "in what we have traditionally called up-bringing," he maintained.

Absence fee imposed

Students living in University College residences and planning on renting out their premises for reading week should be aware of the penalties before setting their rates.

A notice from U.C. Residence Director E.M. Howarth addressed to all members of the residences warns that a fine of $10 plus a room charge of three dollars per night will be levied on members who allow guests to stay in their rooms overnight in their absence.

"Under no circumstances", the memorandum states, "are guests of members allowed to remain overnight in the residence during the absence of a member."

The rule has been in force since the residences were built, but, according to Howarth, it "hasn't been applied carefully." During the Christmas holidays the "privilege was abused", he said, so this is the reason for the new emphasis on the rule.

"Behavior is easier to control", Howarth said, if members are in the residences with their guests.

Students use cafeteria to help unions

BURNABY (CUP) — The students and workers at Simon Fraser University have scored what they term "a partial success" in their fight to have Kraft products and non-union lettuce removed from the university's cafeterias.

The cafeteria workers have reached an agreement with their employer, Mannings, on a new contract and have succeeded in having a clause included which should prevent Mannings from using Kraft products, or non-union lettuce, or any other non-union products.

The clause was promoted by a group of students who set up an alternate lunch counter last November to provide an alternative to the university's cafeterias, which are all operated by Mannings. The lunch counter challenged the caterer's monopoly contract with the university administration, provided better quality food at lower prices, and promoted the Kraft and lettuce boycotts.

The cafeteria worker's contract with Manning expired at the end of December and by mid-January a strike appeared imminent. The lunch counter worker-students, members of the IWW (Industrial Workers of the World), offered to support Manning's workers by closing down the lunch counter and joining the picket lines, provided that Mannings stopped handling boycotted products.

An 11th hour settlement avoided a strike but included the clause stipulating that Mannings must use union-made products. (Non-union products may only be used when union products are not available.)

"We only consider this to be a partial success," said one of the lunch counter worker-students. "There are still Kraft products and non-union lettuce in the cafeterias. Mannings has not had time to make the change over yet."

Both the Kraft boycott and the Lettuce Boycott were called in response to corporate control of the food industry.

The lettuce boycott has been called by Caesar Chavez and the United Farm Workers to force corporate farm interests to give lettuce pickers improved wages and working conditions. The same union led The Grape Boycott a few years ago and succeeded in winning better pay and conditions for grape pickers.

The Kraft Boycott has been called by Canada's National Farmers Union in an effort to fight the growing domination of the Ontario dairy industry by a few large corporations, the largest being Kraft.

Kraft is the largest processor of dairy products in North America. In 1969 its sales topped $2.6 billion. Its profits are 3 times those of the next largest corporation in the food business.

The NFU is using the boycott to force Kraft and the other corporate interests to grant farmers collective bargaining rights. Farmers will then be able to negotiate for better prices and other conditions.

In Toronto, a meeting will take place tomorrow at 7:30 pm at St. Paul's Avenue Road Church for everyone interested in helping to organize the Kraft Boycott.

The meeting will be held in the church's ballet room. St. Paul's is located at 121 Avenue Road.

Ontario fees strike working, says OFS

Over 20,000 students across the province have still not paid their second instalment fees, Ontario Federation of Students general coordinator Craig Heron said last week.

Heron said that 50 per cent of students had not yet paid at Lakehead and Laurentian Universities, and over 5,000 had yet to pay at both U of T and Carleton.

The most impressive, however, he said, was York University where 66 per cent of the total enrolment has not yet paid.

Twelve universities across Ontario are participating in the fees strike to protest cutbacks in educational spending.

At U of T, the administration has recently proved unwilling or unable to provide accurate figures on how many students still have not paid their second term instalments.

Until last week, SAC received daily figures from the administration, but since then vice-president John Helliwell has been unable to obtain similar information.

One problem is the recent discovery that the administration's figures of those with payments outstanding included those who last spring made deposits on their fees but failed to register. Since Hall is still attempting to sort out the number of those in this category, Helliwell said.

SAC waits for views on report

SAC will wait for further reaction to the Commission on Post-Secondary Education report released last Thursday before reaching a position of its own.

A position paper on the commission's draft report last spring was never adopted by a general meeting of the council, leaving this year's SAC without an official stand.

The unofficial position was written by last year's SAC president Bob Spencer, vice-president Phil Dack, present Ontario Federation of Students general coordinator Craig Heron and the education commission, headed by Dan Leckie, now a school trustee.

"We wrote a working paper based on distributing 7,000 copies of the draft report conducting campus wide discussions and approximately 1,000 interviews," Leckie explained yesterday.

The Leckie-Spencer brief has many close parallels to the final report.

The most significant change recommended in the student brief and supported by the commission was a revamping of the grant scheme to allow students to receive grants for five years instead of three. Also, age of dependence regulations are more lenient, than in the draft.

The SAC brief also suggested four instead of three central coordinating boards to advise the government on education policy and rejected their possible role in program approval. These were also adopted by in the final report.

SAC vice-president John Helliwell said yesterday that council will wait to discuss a response to the report until after campus wide discussions.

Helliwell said he was "quite impressed" with the COPSEO report. "It's not something we should reject out of hand".

Computer Sci chairman speaks

Everyone should know basics of computers

By BILL HUTUL
 Everyone should know the basics of computer science, while others should be learning all there is to know about this field of study, said U of T computer science chairman T.E.Hull, last week.
 Hull discussed computers in terms of the teaching of computing, the use of computers in the applications to other subjects, information systems, and computer assisted instruction.

He demonstrated that learning the basics of computing was easy. He compared the language and programming to following a recipe or knitting instructions, described by computer scientists as an algorithm.

Computers are being applied to biology chemistry, physics, psychology, economics, and statistics, Hull said. Using simple repetitive procedures, computers can work out the trajectories of a satellite's orbit at speeds 300,000 times faster than a human. Another possible application cited was a simulation equation which would predict the evolution of animal populations.

The professor explained how computers can be used in information systems, for example, medical records. In hospitals doctors, nurses, and laboratory technicians could all draw from the computer's patient information banks. Airline reservations and payrolls were two other information systems cited.

Hull wasn't convinced that computers could actually assist teachers in teaching. Computer assisted instruction is "OK for drill" in math tables, vocabulary, foreign languages, and even computer languages, but he added, "I wouldn't want my daughter taught by one."

Regional plan designed for growth

By DAVID KENNEDY
 Unless the Ontario government clearly defines its role in regional planning, "all Metro can do is scream and thrash around", said Metro Planning Commissioner Wojcieh Wronski at a U of T seminar last week.

The provincial government has developed a plan for the area surrounding Toronto, the Toronto Centred Region Plan. Wronski, however, believes it "is not a decentralization plan, but a growth plan."

If the plan was to stop urban sprawl and decentralize urban growth, the plan would have to be accompanied by implementing policies, of which Wronski said there are few yet.

Wronski also noted that planning legislation does not really accommodate regional planning. City planning is carefully set out, but has a vague role somewhat different from the provincial role, he said.

In the preparation of the Metro Official Plan, the Metro planners have had to use the Toronto Centred Region Plan as a guide. For instance, U of T architectural professor Hans Blumenfeld, a well-respected planner, asked where Wronski got the population density of three million people for Metro Toronto that he used in the discussion. Wronski replied it was taken from the provincial plan.

The planners did "not know how those figures got there", he continued. The growth of Metro Toronto was assumed.

Sociology professor William Michelson pinpointed the main problem: if the federal and provincial governments do not want to slow down growth, the Metro planners cannot do it. Forced to accept growth, Wronski said the planner tries as best he can too accommodate growth and develop ways of offsetting its negative side-effects of urban growth.

Erindale briefly holds Division IB lead

Erindale College, a long standing joke because of its rural location, has suddenly emerged as perhaps the top team in interfaculty basketball.

Whereas people used to ask Erindale players whether they had finished milking the cows before a game, opponents now address them as sir, or mister.

In the past week and a half, Erindale has won three straight games — including an 81-72 defeat of Law, and a 107-53 drubbing of PHE B.

Last Wednesday's tilt between Erindale and UC promised to pit the best teams of Divisions IA and IB against each other.

However, the game was no contest as Erindale trampled UC 90-72 to take over first place of Division IB (for the moment). Leading the scoring parade for Erindale was the usual duo of Al Nakrosius and Wally Feasby, who possesses the biggest bag of tricks in town.

Each scored 18 points, while Ted Stitsky and Budd Stewart added 16 an 12, respectively.

UC was led by Mike Betcherman with 29 points, Mel Possorski with 16, and Joel Levitan with 12.

Erindale's success since Christmas can be directly attributed to the team's zone press and hot shooting. If things continue as they are people will start clamoring for the Erindale squad to be split up.

While Erindale's stay in first place was short (the team is 6-3), Vic reclaimed first place in Division IB, defeating PHE B 95-58 and thereby raising its record to 7-5.

Seranaded by chants of "we want a 100", Vic ferociously drove toward the goal. However, the team was denied its objective as PHE B went into a stall with two minutes left to play in the game.

Nevertheless, the game's score sheet showed Vic winning 116-58 as all seven Vic players scored in double figures.

The point totals for the Vic squad included Andre Ezers, the fastest man out of a pair of warm-up pants (24 points), David John, the German veteran (19), Gord Whicher (16), Paul Mims — no relation to Jesse Mims of the Calgary Stampeders — (15), Joe Kastelic (14), Steve Mills, once again wearing borrowed gym shorts (14), and Roger Hollingsworth (13).

Scoring for PHE B were Fred Fairs (19 points) and Cor Doret with 16.

An interesting footnote to the game was PHE B team member Dave Stuart's claim that he played better drunk than sober. Although "Enzo" (as he is affectionately known around the jock shop) spent Monday in local brew houses preparing for the game, Stuart managed only three points in a game he would probably like to forget.

U of T women 2, York 2

Toronto's Ann Milburn put the women's team ahead twice, but York tied the game late in the third period.

Queen's ignores alumni influence

Last week we analysed the philosophy, history, and structural changes of athletics at Queen's University over a brief, five-year span.

This week we offer information on student (as expressed through the student's council) response to and participation in the changes, the financial obligations undertaken by the university and by the students, and the physical make-up of the new athletic facilities and the Department of Physical Education at Queen's.

A number of statements concerning student's comments on 'financial obligations', as such, are taken directly from the report of the Principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics. Other financial and related information is derived from documents provided to The Varsity by Men's Intercollegiate Athletics Director A.L. Lenard.

The responsibility for sports and recreation at Queen's University traditionally rested with the Alma Mater Society (student's council) through its standing committees, the Men's and Women's Athletic Boards of Control.

Students were responsible for the financing and, with the assistance of the School of Physical and Health Education staff, the administration of the various athletic programs. The structure at the time was challenged on several counts.

Adequacy of old structure challenged

To begin with, there was a demand for greater attention in the area of the so-called "secondary sports". These demands culminated in the formation of an AMS Commission on Secondary Sports early in 1969.

The Commission met often in the spring and fall of 1969, receiving briefs from all athletic teams, from both men's and women's athletic programs (with one exception), the School of Physical and Health Education, the Athletic Boards of Control, the Intramural Program and the Campus Planner.

The Commission's findings were then made available to the Principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics.

Secondly, the construction of the new physical education and athletics complex developed an increasing anticipation of an expanded program of intramural and recreational activities.

The AMS then presented a completed reorganization of the intramural structure to encourage increased participation.

Campus approves PAC on Athletics

After examining the proposals of the Principal's Advisory Committee in considerable detail (specifically in a series of meetings with representatives of the Prinphilosophical and educational reasons already mentioned.

Criticlan from Alumni

The Student Affairs Committee also considered — and successfully rejected — a brief submitted by an "interested group of Alumni from Ottawa."

The brief took exception to the premise stated in the report of the Principal's

University Council on Athletics, was sufficient guarantee that appropriate consideration would be given to all abilities and qualifications required for these positions.

In general, the Student Affairs Committee concluded that implementation of the report of the Principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics would greatly facilitate future efforts to expand and improve programs of sports and recreation at Queen's University.

Financial Obligations

The Principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics proposed that the assigning of the athletic fee become the responsibility of the university and that the AMS (student's council) fee be replaced by a university athletic fee as part of every full-time student's fee.

Accordingly, the Principal's Advisory Committee on Athletics recommended in 1970-71 that the university establish an athletic fee of $20 to be paid by all full-time students. (This raised the fee from $14 to $20; however, last week we mentioned that the initial fee at Queen's, before changes were begun, had been $20. Therefore, this raise was simply a return to the status quo ante.)

According to Men's Intercollegiate Athletics Director A.L. Lenard: "that $20 shows up separately in university expenses and it's allocated to the University Council... Queen's, program is now probably the most stable one in the province. I don't have to worry about next year's budget... I don't have to apply to the university and hope."

The Committee also recommended that the University Council on Athletics be empowered to recommend to the Vice-Principal (Finance) direct operating expenditures for intercollegiate, intramural, and recreation activities up to a maximum of the total (so derived) revenue.

Revenue from the university athletic fee which was not allocated at the beginning of the fiscal year by the University Council on Athletics, or which was not expended at the end of that fiscal year, would revert to the university.

And, the level of the fee was set with the assumption that the university would become responsible for the following expenditures: the salaries of the intercollegiate equipment manager, athletic trainer, and football-basketball coach (all full-time staff); honorariums for part-time male and female intercollegiate athletic coaches; salaries for a part-time trainer and equipment man.

Lenard added, however, that the salary for the football-basketball coach was only a transitional measure, applicable to a particular case. The salary for that position was eventually dropped and the staff coaches instead. "Salaries now go only to pay non-staff members who were brought on directly for the purpose of coaching", Lenard said.

In turn, the Committee further recommended that all revenue from admission charges to intercollegiate athletic events should accrue to the university. (For the year 1970-71, it was estimated that the difference between the costs borne by the university for the expenditure in the previous paragraph and the benefits accruing from admission charges amounted to $16,700). Furthermore, the Committee recommended that all full-time students at Queen's be admitted to the athletic events free of charge.

Ever since the structural changes at Queen's, the direct operating expenditures controlled by the University Council on Athletics have come overwhelmingly from students paying the $20 athletic fee.

Therefore, logically, the students control that portion of the budget.

Note: In considering the proportional distribution of funds to each intercollegiate team, one has to also take into account the number of players on each team, the number of games played, the cost of equipment per player, the length of playing the season, etc. However, the overall budget reflects the university's proportional interest in each sport.

Advisory Committee that "... a sound athletics program has a multitude of indirect benefits which should not be ignored to the spectator, to the Alumnus, to the community, to the institution... the latter 'by-products' of athletics, however, should never take precedence over consideration for the student participant."

The Alumni brief advocated that at the intercollegiate level these interests, together with the commercial benefit are not "by-products" and should not be secondary objectives.

The Student Affairs Committee agreed "that these interests should not be overlooked, and while there is no evidence to suggest that they would in fact be overlooked under the new proposals (nor that anyone would want them to be), nevertheless we reject the proposition that these interests might outweigh consideration for the student participant."

To assist in determining the appropriate size of this fee to cover the direct operating costs for intercollegiate and intramural athletic and recreation programs, excluding administrative and salary costs, the Committee asked the existing Athletic Boards and Intramural Councils to prepare estimates for the following year's (1970-71) athletic programs.

The budget estimates were submitted on the basis of costs for additional programs which became viable in the new Physical Education Centre, and took into account "the correction of certain deficiencies and inconsistencies in some parts of the existing athletic programs as identified by the student's council Commission on Sports."

The Alumni brief also suggested that "athletic jurisdiction ought not to be treated as a department of the School of Physical and Health Education, but should be accorded status separate and apart from the School."

The Student Affairs Committee reported back that it was in sympathy with this view, but was satisfied that the proposal made in the report of the Principal's Advisory Committee, namely, that the appointment of the Intercollegiate Athletic Directors must be ratified by the

Strike on despite SAC

Wednesday's SAC meeting decided to withdraw its support from the fees strike. The Coalition Against the Cutbacks, however, will carry on the campaign. For story on SAC, see p. 3.

The SAC-endorsed Coalition Against the Cutbacks yesterday urged U of T students to continue withholding their fees, "in solidarity with students across the province", in spite of SAC's Wednesday decision to withdraw support from the strike.

The meeting, in the Medical Sciences Auditorium, made plans to enlarge the scope of the campaign by seeking support from unions and community groups, "to demonstrate that the cutbacks in education are but one aspect of the whole crisis in social expenditures."

A city-wide meeting will be called for representatives of students and staff from U of T, York, Glendon, Ryerson, community colleges and high schools, to plan joint actions against the cutbacks.

The coalition reaffirmed support for a province-wide demonstration at Queen's Park, but left the date unspecified, so that support could be built at U of T.

The small turnout at the meeting (about 65 people) contrasted with not only last fall's referendum giving overwhelming backing to the OFS demands against the fee hikes, but also the large numbers of students currently withholding their fees.

Students expressed bitterness against SAC for what UC SAC rep Marty Stollar called "undermining the interests of students", and for creating disillusionment with the struggle.

Frank Rooney of the Old Mile said that Wednesday's decision "removes SAC support from what is so far the only action taken by students on this campus". Another student suggested the danger of students giving up and paying their fees "because they've noticed a lack of direction."

The coalition has urged students to ignore any late penalties threatened by the university, pointing out that the $15 late penalty does not increase with time.

The Stop the Student Surcharge Committee, chairman Peter Havers said last night, is also advocating that students ignore SAC and continue the fees strike.

SAC vice-president John Hellwell affirmed that a temporary, symbolic fees strike "is the way I've seen this all along". However, he supported the strike being extended for one more week.

The meeting also unanimously "condemned" The Varsity for failing to provide the leadership given in last year's library struggle, and for "consistently downplaying efforts to organize around students' interests".

A motion was passed favouring circulation of a petition to students continuing the fees strike, to urge them to maintain the strike and to participate in further "collective action".

A statement recognizing that layoffs of U of T workers should be opposed as part of the cutbacks was agreed upon, as well as a call to work for a critical evaluation of the Wright report on higher education.

The meeting reaffirmed that further action should centre around the demand to stop the cutbacks and the call for free and universal access to education, but some disagreement developed over whether an additional slogan should be included offering a partial solution to the education issue.

Over objections that students aren't responsible for solving "the financial problems of the ruling class", and that the problems being attacked cannot be fully solved within the present system, the meeting accepted the Young Socialists' suggested slogan of "Tax the corporations".

Further planning will go on through reading week, after which more proposals will be raised, depending on the continued strength of the fees strike and the response of other schools to the demonstration call.

Students at George Brown Community College, which has announced layoffs of 100 staff, are asking U of T students to support a demonstration next Thursday at noon, probably at the Casa Loma campus, to protest the layoffs.

University breaks promise, presses trespass charges

By JOHN CAMPBELL

According to police, the University of Toronto has failed to live up to a promise to drop trespass charges against all 19 persons originally charged during last year's Simcoe Hall occupation.

Metro Detective Arthur Lymer said yesterday that "the university, in consultation with the Crown" decided to let the trespass charges stand against defendants Tom McLaughlin, Bill Getty, Randi Reynolds, and Mark Goldblatt all of whom were charged with other offences when police were called in to end the occupation.

It was previously believed that the charges had been dropped by the university against all the occupiers, as it agreed to when negotiating with students during a subsequent sit-in.

In a telephone interview yesterday, last year's acting president Jack Sword disagreed with Lymer's statement, saying, "From memory I would say there was no distinction made among the defendants with respect to the university's request to have the trespassing charges withdrawn."

He added that the university cannot have the charges dropped on its own, and the problem will have to be settled by the court.

The matter came up during Getty's trial when Crown Attorney William Donaldson introduced a document called an "undertaking to appear" which set out the charges.

The notice is issued when prisoners are released on their own cognizance on the promise they will appear in court at a designated date.

Getty countered Donaldson's submission with a typed statement from Metro Inspector Fred Maxwell which stated, "The U of T, having indicated that it does not wish to prosecute under the Petty Trespass Act this is to notify you that no further proceeding will be taken on that charge."

This statement was delivered to all the defendants.

Donaldson said yesterday that he has been concerned only with the assault charges against Getty in the present case, but in his opinion the trespassing charges still stand.

Dare workers picket scab CN transport

By GREG McMASTER

About 150 picketers struggled with police and security guards yesterday morning, in an attempt to disrupt operations at the Canadian National railway at Keele and Highway 7.

The picketers were supporting the nine-month Dare Cookies strike, which has seen the Dare management employ professional strikebreakers against the union, and use CN to transport scab produce for the company.

Although the picket line was planned as an attempt to obstruct CN trucks, the picket leaders from the Dare union urged arriving picketers not to cause any trouble. Only about half the picketers made any serious effort to block traffic in the CN driveway. At the Kitchener Dare plant, there has been militant picket-line action by the mostly female Dare workers.

Five transport trucks driven by Teamster sympathizers of the strike turned back, refusing to cross the picket line, but the CN transport trucks were escorted through by a combined force of the York Regional Police and CN's own private police force.

The CN truckers' union, the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers, has not gained a contract provision allowing them to refuse to cross other unions' picket lines, but several of the drivers proceeded as slowly as they could, under the "move along" orders of the CN police. One driver managed to stall his truck for 20 minutes in the driveway.

Picketers who stood in front of trucks were thrown aside by police, who threatened people uttering obscenities with being "thrown in the clink."

Picketers included members of the Teamsters' union, representatives of the Wardair stewardesses (currently on strike), U of T students, Waffle members and independent leftists.

A busload of women from the Dare plant in Kitchener was also on hand, and while several of these helped block the road, most of them followed their picket captain's advice and remained one side of the road.

A leaflet was distributed to drivers who slowed down for the picket, urging them to support the Dare strike for fair wages in the face of strikebreaking. Dare has so far refused to give in on the issue of equal pay for women.

A union member said it was unclear if there would be further actions in Toronto.

SAC meeting kills its withholding campaign

The Student's Administrative Council ended eight months of work Wednesday when it reversed an executive recommendation by voting to stop the fees strike after one month.

The motion came up automatically at the meeting held in the Sid Smith foyer, as the motion to go ahead with the fees strike included a review after one month.

The motion urged students to pay their second term instalment fees less the $15 late penalty which it ordered the executive to ask the administration to drop. Vice-president Jill Conway last night reversed an earlier firm refusal to a similar request by saying she will be "interested in what the executive will say in a meeting scheduled for today."

The decision to reject the strike came in a 22-9 vote with six abstentions after several members had called the strike strategy "bankrupt".

Education commissioner George Strathy charged that the fees issue had become SAC's "sacred cow". "Its time we looked at the fees strike", he said.

Governing Council member Paul Cadario said that the fees strike had been occupying the council too long, and now that the Commission on Post-Secondary Education report had been released it was "necessary that we concentrate our efforts on it."

Eric Miglin, who had supported the motion that SAC continue its support and re-iterate its demands, said that there was a "general feeling" on council that the strike had "reached a stalemate" and that "we should be moving on to other things".

Miglin's motion, after the strike had been called off, that SAC ask the administration to waive the late fee, followed a comment by UC rep Bob Anderson, the only speaker in favour of continuing the strike, that students withholding their fees should not be left "holding the bag".

In another test of its mood on the education cutbacks issue, the council overwhelmingly rejected a motion calling on students to work for the opposition parties in the March 15 St. George by-election. The motion, recommended by the executive Tuesday, was intended to urge students to demonstrate their opposition to "the course of government policy on post-secondary education."

SAC also called for a day of study on the Commission on Post-Secondary Education report released last week, deciding to ask the administration for at least three hours off classes one day after reading week.

The education commission was asked to draw up and distribute a precis version of and response to the report. The COPSEO report costs $2.50; the precis will cost 15 cents.

SAC also endorsed yesterday's Coalition Against the Cutbacks moratorium which repudiated SAC's decision and voted to continue the fees strike. SAC gave the coalition up to $100 to publicize the moratorium.

Equal access to Robarts stacks recommended

A working group within the committee proposing library policy has recommended that the Robarts Library stacks be opened equally to "all members of the university community".

The Library Subcommittee of the Academic Affairs Committee did not come to a decision on the recommendation, but student members are hopeful it will pass at the sub-committee's next meeting, February 21.

One working group member, David Esplin, is one of three associate librarians. A year ago, he was strongly opposed to open access.

Asked by a Senate meeting last year to determine what "academic need" for stack access is so that differentiated degrees of access can be granted, the three-member working group of Esplin, humanities professor W.M. Dick, and student Kathy Feldman reported that it was too impractical a task.

The policy recommended by the Library Subcommittee must be approved in turn by Academic Affairs and the Governing Council before it is implemented.

The decision may lead to at least a partial victory for students who occupied the Simcoe Hall Senate Chamber last spring in support of free and open stack access for university and community members alike.

The administration eventually agreed to support virtually open stacks, but a later meeting of the Senate balked and insisted on maintaining some degree of differentiated access, to be determined according to academic need.

The working group found that:

- Any cut-off point in academic rank "made an arbitrary distinction among users that bears little relation to need", in part because of the widely varied courses under the New Program;

- Any "attempt to judge each individual case according to need, unless it were merely a facade (for determining by academic rank), was judged to be administratively impossible"; and

- "Most important", the number that would be permitted to enter under the first two strata "was so large as to undermine the original premise behind restricting access, namely the belief that the security of the collection depends on keeping the number in the stacks down."

The group did recommend that if the stacks become overcrowded on any given day, the chief librarian or deputy can refuse admission until stack space is available, but several committee members feel this is unlikely to occur.

In deciding to advocate equal access, the working group observed that the library system seems to discourage people from desiring stack access.

The group noted the difficulty of physically obtaining access through narrow corridors and entrances as well as the small number of elevators. It also concluded that the undergraduate collection at the Sigmund Samuel Library will be relatively attractive because of the availability of books.

An extremely tight proposed security system alleviated fears that book stealing might become a major problem.

The subcommittee also decided to amalgamate the extension library collection, providing that extension students received preferential access to the collection once inside the library. There was no opposition to the move from the extension department.

The subcommittee also put off further discussion of amalgamation of the New College and University College libraries into the undergraduate collection until a UC committee studying the college library reports.

Int Affairs meets secretly

By RANDY ROBERTSON

The Internal Affairs Committee went into closed session on the advice of chairman Paul Cadario Wednesday to discuss the code of behaviour proposed for the university.

The meeting did not come to any conclusions about the code; discussion will be continued at the next meeting February 22, also expected to be closed.

Cadario said that premature disclosure of the proposed code "might destroy the value of the document."

There was no debate about the move, although some members not present at the time later said they would have opposed it.

Cadario suggested the meeting be in closed session in a private note to committee members two days before the meeting.

Vice-provost Robin Ross, who had written a paper on university discipline, was allowed to remain.

Graduate student member Clair Henschel, who was unable to attend the meeting, said she was surprised when notified by Cadario of his intention to hold the meeting in closed session.

"We are supposed to be getting input from the university community. But if they aren't given any information, how can they make any suggestions?"

Henschel claimed that Cadario had scheduled the meeting knowing that she had a class at the same time and so would be unable to attend. She said that he had done this before and that he had said that he would not do it again. "He doesn't like me objecting."

Student member Ian Morrison said that when he arrived (late) he was surprised to see the meeting was in closed session. He said he would have objected if he had been present for the vote.

Part-time student representative Norma Grindal said, "There is nothing for anyone to worry about. We didn't get that far."

She said she "couldn't remember one vote being taken."

Morrison said that the committee had got half way through the paper. He said that "nothing substantial" had been encountered and that the paper contained "the things you'd expect."

He said the committee had debated generalities.

Let profs do hiring: math head

By LANNY COOKE

"Students rate highest those teachers from whom they learn the least," math chairman George Duff told about 75 math students in the McLennan Building yesterday at noon.

He was responding to criticism in a petition signed by over 1,000 math students which requested that students be represented on all departmental hiring and tenure bodies.

The petition also requested that Professor David Spring, denied tenure last year, and part time Professor Stephen Salaff, dismissed this year, be retained on the faculty.

One hundred and twenty-five of Salaff's students signed a petition stating,

"We consider Salaff to be an excellent mathematics professor, both in the form and content of his lectures, and in his teaching methods." In response to criticism from students Duff expressed added concern about including students on hiring and tenure bodies, saying that there is confidential information required for evaluation and, "I do not know if the letters of recommenation would remain confidential."

He added that teaching is only one part of a professor's profession. The pursuit of mature scholarship and public service are also expected from professors, he said.

He quoted a motion from the Faculty Council of Arts and Science: "While welcoming student participation on all matters of university governance, (the council) affirms its determination that its academic staff members continue to be judged in matters of appointment solely by members of the academic staff of this university or, where proper, by professional colleagues outside this university."

Sociology professor Tony Smith explained that the sociology department has student and faculty parity when making decisions about the hiring and firing of professors.

Smith said that a great many professors are not primarily interested in teaching undergraduate courses. He believes that the reason for this is that their faculties control their own conditions of employment.

Math professor Peter Rosenthal agreed with Smith. He said that teaching first year students is a "chore", and added that professors are not motivated to make the courses interesting. Professors are more worried about getting papers published in order to get promoted, he said. "We need departmental encouragement by having teaching count in promotion," he recommended.

Varsity desisting awhile

Varsity hacks yesterday got caught with their hopes showing.

The staffers had prematurely announced that the paper would cease publication until Wednesday, February 21 effective today, assuming Thursday's Hart House debate resolving that The Varsity cease publication would win an easy victory.

Instead, the quarrelsome Debates Room jury refused to parole the paper's inmates, tying the contentious vote.

Indignant Varsity bureaucrats last night insisted they would not have their undeserved vacation canceled. "The readers be damned," said one, "Enough is enough, we want to go skiing too."

Apparently, there's little fear that The Varsity will reappear before the 21st.

SAC Press crumbling

By BRIAN NASIMOK

The SAC executive yesterday came out of an in camera meeting to announce that two of three SAC Press employees will be laid off in two weeks, a move that probably spells the end for the coping and printing function of the service.

Several closed discussions preceded the decision, including one meeting Sunday, at which accusations of incompetence were thrown at the service by the executive, who claim the business is losing an average of $1500 a month.

The move must come up for approval at a full council meeting, probably in two weeks.

During the first two weeks of December, the operation reportedly lost $2300 and may have been heading for a loss as large as $20,000 over SAC's financial year.

SAC Press manager John Webb said that he could not verify the figures because he does not receive monthly statements about his books from SAC. Webb admitted, "It was a bad setup to begin with. Other printing houses around campus are less expensive, and more efficient."

Consistently a money-loser since its inception, SAC budgeted a $9,000 loss for SAC Press. Previous years have seen several attempts to curtail or drop the operation, located in the basement of the SAC building.

SAC Press began in 1966, predominantly to handle SAC printing. It was run by a part-time manager, while utilizing student labour at a low wage. In its first three years the operation made money.

In 1969 the shop unionized, hiring a full time manager and a larger staff. The total salary costs was the same as at present.

In 1971 the press decided to cut out some services and pared down the staff to a full-time manager, a full-time and a part-time employee. The amount of SAC business to the press lessened considerably, requiring the press had to go to outside sources for business.

Staff departure delay political

Refusing to miss out on all the pre-election editor politicking, Varsity staffers have delayed their departure for places unknown long enough to hold a short, but potentially revealing staff meeting today at 1 p.m.

Otherwise, campus political pundits are insisting they'll refuse to think about the paper until the week after next.

Big task ahead for Jews, Arabs

The letter from the Arab Students Association in your issue of February 7 makes a number of valid points and expresses a fond hope shared by many: a non-sectarian broadly democratic state where Christians, Jews, and Moslems can live together in equality. Their letter obfuscates and hides reality. It does not represent the expressed wishes of the Arab world outside of Israel and the West Bank. It certainly does not represent the expressed wishes of the military, political or religious leaders of the Arab countries. Therefore, it does not form a basis for action, or even for serious consideration as a short-term program. As a long-term program, it is beautiful, and many would even regard it as a step toward a still better world: the withering away of any state in Palestine, Jewish or Arab. Einstein, a Jew, among others, argued for such a holy non-state.

I had the opportunity of discussing these issues with members of the student council of the University of Haifa last summer. Of the nine student council members present, three are Arabs. Students at Haifa, helped by a radical student paper, have elected a radical student council. The editor of the paper was also present for the discussion. It ranged over many issues, from the immediate ones such as relative scarcity of advanced educational opportunities and work for Arabs in Israel, especially educated Arabs, to the political issues. We even discussed, don't laugh, the "Canadian model" of a bilingual and bicultural state and its possible application in Israel. We agreed that a sectarian state, exclusively Jewish, and the first-class and second-class citizenship inherent in such a situation, are anachronisms. The dreams and hopes of all of us were beautiful.

But, when one of the students was challenged on his reference to "the sacred cow of security", the atmosphere changed. This student had fought at Suez. He wanted no more war, no more blood: he has seen enough to last a lifetime. But the harsh, unpalatable fact is that the Jewish Israeli stand in mortal danger from religious fanatics in the Arab world spurred on by greedy feudal barons and power-hungry politicians and military men. Security is not a sacred cow, nor can it be swept under the rug in Israel. There, truly, eternal vigilance is the price of peace.

When looking for answers to the many Palestinian problems, Arab students should turn their attention to the leaders of the Arab countries.

The vision the students hold out is certainly shared by most of the people I met in Israel and Palestine last summer: Jews, Moslem Arabs and Christian Arabs. But, there is a powerful barrier to its realization: a wall of hostility and hatred erected for the self-aggrandisement of the few Arab leaders and not for the benefit of the Palestinians. There is much to be done on both sides: Arab students of goodwill have an enormous task among their own leaders if they wish truly to contribute to peace in the Middle East.

Reader dislikes our sports pages

I am utterly incensed by the trend which The Varsity sports section is taking. I find the sports coverage extremely insufficient and in lieu of adequate reporting. I discover myself being presented with very lengthy articles which have little to do with the athletic activities of the University of Toronto.

An illustration of this observation occurred in The Varsity of February 2. In that issue, the entire sports section consisted of -

1) The intercollegiate hockey standings - eight days outdated.

2) A very lengthy and somewhat boring article which discussed in explicit detail the administrative lattice structure of Queen's University's Athletic Association.

3) Another lengthy article which was concerned with the future of intercollegiate football at U of O.

4) Sportalk — that feeble and minute collection of facts which constituted the only reporting of sports for the whole U of T campus.

I hope that in future The Varsity sports editor will concern his articles more on reporting intermural and intercollegiate sports activities involving U of T students and will dispense with this current trend which includes elaborate book reports as well as what I have mentioned above.

Gentlemen, your paper is deteriorating rapidly so either - 'get on the ball or on the bus'.

Addison Collier

Ed.'s Note: The intercollegiate hockey standings were not eight days outdated. The Eastern Section was complete up to January 28 (not January 25 as reported) and the eastern Section was complete to January 31. These were compiled from the OUAA weekly newsletter and the Toronto daily papers up to the night before publication.

The series on athletics at Queen's University was designed to provide an analysis of how one other university has changed athletics in spite of difficulties.

The future of intercollegiate athletics at the University of Ottawa affects the league — OUAA — in which Toronto participates. The sports department is not attempting to be totally parochial.

Sportalk is a compilation of information that comes to the newspaper from coaches, or through telephone calls we make. Our staff is voluntary and we are unable to cover every university event to the same degree.

We have a sports editorial policy at the office available for anyone to see.

Polarization disgusts writer

In reading a recent Varsity in which an article was written accusing one or other of the ad-hoc committees opposed to the policy of the provincial government's policy of raising the costs of education, I became disgusted by the identification of anti-government movements being associated with either the left or the right. That one organization should call itself (or be accused of being) Trotskyist is to me irrelevant and immaterial. I am opposed to the current policies of the government of Ontario, but as long as any bodies and organizations are affiliated with any political group, not only shall I have nothing to do with them, but I would also ask every sane and reasonable student either in agreement with or opposed to current government attitudes to disassociate with the radical politicizers of the campus. Forcing one's way into a building or denying others the right to act according to what they believe they ought to do (i.e. paying their fees at the fees office) is wrong, therefore I applaud the university administration when they put police in a building to protect it against the rampant ragnings of politically oriented ego-tripping psychopaths.

Petition, fund to help defence

Yesterday the seven people who were arrested at 215 Huron Street on February 1 were remanded for trial on March 1, 14, and 16. These seven people, workers and students on campus, need your financial and moral support.

The U of T Workers against the Layoffs and the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee are circulating a petition on campus. Here is the substance:

It was the Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council of U of T that called the Metro police on campus February 1, and ordered the campus police to beat up picketers. The Governing Council is empowered by the University of Toronto Act to raise tuition fees and in fact the Governing Council imposed the student surcharge. John Evans decided this policy to contract out work and layoff campus workers — see The Varsity, February 23, 1972.

John Evans is president of U of T and we hold him responsible.

1. Drop the charges against the seven people arrested February 1.
2. Reinstate suspended groundsmen Browne and Keilly.

3. Stop all layoffs and contracting out.

4. Stop the student surcharge.

In order to pay legal fees to fight the charges, we are asking for donations from everyone on campus. Cheques should be payable to the Legal Defence Fund for U of T Workers and Students, Box 5, Station E, Toronto 4. We also need support for our petition, as described above, signatures, and petitioners. For further information, phone 964-1174.

Abortion ruling sets precedent

Two weeks ago, the U.S. Supreme Court released its decision to liberalize the American abortion laws. The new ruling permits abortion until the seventh month of pregnancy with no state interference, requiring only the recommendation of one doctor. Beyond the seventh month, a reason, such as danger to a woman's mental or physical health, must be established before a woman can get an abortion.

This ruling is a significant victory for women in the United States. It completely undercuts the argument that the fetus is a human being who can be defended by law. More important, it means in principle that up to the seventh month of pregnancy, it is any woman's right to decide whether or not she will bear a child.

This victory can be attributed to the pressure of those forces organized against the anti-woman abortion laws, spearheaded by WONAAC (Women's National Abortion Action Coalition), as well as the pressure of growing feminist consciousness in the United States.

The American ruling is a direct challenge to the Canadian government, which has been avoiding debate on the abortion issue for a number of years. And, it is a direct challenge to Trudeau who has stated that abortion is murder. The U.S. decision has set a precedent which women in Canada must use to pressure the Canadian government not only to debate the abortion issue in Parliament, but to repeal its anti-woman abortion laws. It poses the necessity for immediate action by women in Canada.

The Canadian Women's Abortion Law Repeal Coalition has begun to make plans to step up the fight against the Canadian abortion laws — the major one being a national conference to be held in Toronto in March. As well, women at University of Toronto are making plans to draw women at the university into the fight against the Canadian abortion laws, including a debate on the campus between Pro Life and the Canadian Women's Coalition.

All women at University of Toronto are invited to attend this debate and the conference in March. Anyone wishing more information, or wanting to get involved should contact me at 368-9407.

Medswomen here doing desired work

I wish to comment on the article in The Varsity of 29 January, "Male chauvinism. . ."

First, how can we be surprised if outdated ideas are to be found in 1952 textbooks? The 21 years intervening have brought great changes to medicine as well as to the public view of the role of women. One can hope the author does not depend on 1952 theories for medical treatment.

While offering no apology for the advertisements of pharmaceutical companies, I object to the implication that the physician is neglecting duty and perpetuating social injustice by prescription of psychotropic drugs. Few doctors have the time to become social activists but they can offer some help to those who suffer anxiety and depression. This is their job. To deny that the hormone changes of menopause causes great stress in some women is impossible. This is once it cannot be denied that men and women are different and must be considered so. This is why the apparent suggestion that aggressive men be given estrogen is ridiculous. Are women to be made to suffer menopausal stress without help because someone interprets this as condescension?

In a section on women doctors, the article laments that few women do neurosurgery. That's not surprising: few men do. Tell us instead how many women want to. The article notes that women doctors are heavily concentrated in pediatrics, obstetrics, radiology, and general practice. It says, "It is open to question whether these jobs are considered 'more suitable for women' because they are lower in prestige or vice versa". Two quarrels: What do women graduates choose to do? A survey of 52 women doctors in Toronto last fall indicates that they are doing the work they prefer. Even more, I quarrel with the label low-prestige applied to pediatrics, radiology, obstetrics, and general practice. Who declares these to be low prestige? Medical Centre? The Bold Ones? Television thrives on glamour, not prestige, and while the public may feel neurosurgery to be glamorous and prestigious the medical profession certainly recognizes all the varieties of practice to be essential and important.

Let me pose one more question. How many applicants to medical schools are women and what is the relative proportion of them accepted? Unless this information is known, there can be nothing but speculation about discrimination against women.

If there is to be criticism of the status of women and medicine, let it be valid criticism and not invidious, misapprehensions, and 20-year-old quotes.

Wasn't there, didn't say it

I wish to publicly repudiate a statement in The Varsity of February 2 which implies that I was present at a Hart House debate featuring Margaret Scrivener.

Your reporter quotes me as saying that women do not take part in politics because it is so boring.

Actually, William Molson, a long-time contributor to your Write-on column and one of your own staffers made the above quip. Since I was not present, I would have had some difficulty in so doing.

"Labour rep" on Governing Council

U of T man runs for Steelworkers' office

By ZOYA STEVENSON

A U of T governor is running for what is perhaps the most powerful office in one of the most powerful unions in Canada.

Lynn Williams, a United Steelworker of America staff representative running for the steel directorship of a district comprising all of Canada west of Quebec and including 126,000 members is the only union representative on the Governing Council.

His campaign for Tuesday's election and other union matters have taken up so much time that recently he has been criticized for failing to live up to his responsibilities on the council.

An appointee of Premier William Davis, Williams has been absent from more than half of the Governing Council's meetings since last June, and has attended fewer than three of seven meetings of the Planning and Resources Committee, of which he is a member.

Williams admits that "events in the union have made my role in the Governing Council virtually non-existent." "My union responsibilities have increased considerably because of the district director's illness and elections within the union," he says.

Present District 6 director Larry Sefton was too ill to run for re-election, but is firmly backing his second in command, Williams. Williams is opposed by Harry Greenwood, a Stelco machinist and the recording secretary of Hamilton Steel local 1005.

A graduate of Hamilton's McMaster University in philosophy and english, Williams says he agreed to be on the Governing Council because "we in the labour movement grumbled over the years because educational boards and university boards in particular, were in the hands of corporate business and unresponsive to the needs of the working community."

But Don Barclay, business agent for campus Local 204 of the Service Employee's International Union, says he's disappointed with Williams' lack of activity on Council. He believes that "in concrete terms, the labour representative on the Governing Council should be meeting periodically with university worker's committees to find out exactly what the workers' problems are so that he can better represent them."

Barclay contends that Williams has failed to communicate with the SEIU, even though Barclay sent him three letters asking for his opinion or support on a number of issues affecting campus workers.

Williams conceives of his role on the Governing Council differently than Barclay does. He believes that labour representation of Council is important because "working people have not had access to the universities as they should have. A university education ought to be available at the expense of the state for anybody who's able," he stated. "It should not only be available on the basis of ability to pay fees."

Despite Williams' beliefs, when Joyce Denyer, a part-time student representative on council, approached him for support for student opposition to Ontario government education cuts she says she found him "non-committal" and "feeling his own way."

Apologizing for his inactivity on council, Williams says that "most members of the Governing Council have a greater familiarity with the university than I do," despite the fact that he is already university educated. As U of T's labour-management relations director John Parker says, "Williams is experienced in administrative work in the labour movement."

Williams, whose father was a minister, was profoundly affected by the depression in his formative years and began looking for solutions to social problems. He did community organizing for the YMCA in Hamilton during his years at university until he graduated and joined the navy in 1944. Williams regards his work at the Mountain-Dale Community Centre there as his first introduction to trade unionism because there are large numbers of organized workers in the community.

After World War II, Williams became aware of "the contrast between the social work approach to social problems and the trade union approach," which he feels is "a much more constructive alternative because it deals with the question of power, and gives people power to change their living and working conditions to their own advantage."

In 1946-47, Williams did graduate work in economics and industrial relations at the U of T on Department of Veteran's Affairs credits, but "didn't want to do the university thing and then enter the labour movement as a researcher." Instead he entered the labour movement as an organizer.

After a short period working in the John Inglis Steel plant in Toronto, he was hired by the Canadian Congress of Labour to help organize white collar workers at the T. Eaton Co. in Toronto during the largest organizing campaign of white collar workers until the new drive this year. This eventually failed and he joined the Steelworkers district staff 18 years ago.

The election for district director is in some ways more significant than the election for national director of the Canadian USW of A section. While the union's two district directors deal specifically with economic issues and are responsible for collective bargaining, organizing, and the servicing of the membership, the national director is responsible for special services like public relations and questions of "national importance" in the union. The two districts are not responsible to the national office, but to the international executive board which has three Canadians on it compared to 23 Americans.

Williams' opponent Greenwood was nominated by only 21 locals compared to Williams' 277. But Greenwood insists that nominations are not representative of the total amount of support the contenders for the directorship of District 6 have. He says that in Toronto Williams was nominated by 107 locals representing only 12,000 workers, while his own support from only two locals in Hamilton and Algoma represent 20,000 voting members.

Greenwood sees the three offices of the Canadian section of the USW of A as a "drop in the bucket on the international executive board." He believes that the Steelworkers is an American-oriented union putting Canadian workers in the position of puppets dependent on the American leadership of the union.

A conflict between Williams and Greenwood arises over the Steelworkers' support for the protectionist U.S. Burke-Hartke Act.

The proposed act, designed to protect American business by placing a quota on the number of imports into the United States, also represents an attempt to set nation-states against each other by proposing to move plants from high wage areas to low wage areas, agree both Greenwood and Williams. Steelworker's international president I.W. Abel, while supporting the bill, is lobbying for special status for Canada, because it could put many Canadians out of work.

Greenwood views reliance on Abel's lobbying as an unhealthy dependence for Canadian workers, and doesn't expect the American president to fight very hard for their rights.

Williams, on the other hand, feels that the lobbying for special Canadian status demonstrates the value of the international union. He says "the needs of workers have always been international" where the workers are faced with the power of multi-national corporations.

"To permit workers in one country to be turned against workers in another is always to the disadvantage of the worker. The multi-national corporation is the real enemy," he declared, because it acts without consideration for national boundaries. He feels the USW of A is effective in protecting its membership against economic hardship because it is international.

Greenwood agrees with Williams on this issue, but is arguing for a greater Canadian autonomy within the international. "Constitutionally," he contends, "there have been no innovations which have benefitted Canadian workers in the history of the steelworkers."

He feels that the international's interference into local union matters has made the union less democratic than it should be. He says that in June 1970, Hamilton local 1005 decided in accordance with union bylaws that three workers were ineligible to run in the local's elections because they hadn't attended any union meetings. The international re-qualified the workers after an appeal, and the local was forced to allow them to run.

Lynn Williams, on the other hand, contends that the Canadian section of the union makes its own decisions as far as those decisions affect Canadians. He believes that the union does all its business in a democratic way because the locals decide when, where and how negotiations occur.

Greenwood, unlike Williams, contends that appointed staff members have disproportionate power in the union because they influence and control the information that gets to the locals. He says that staff people are appointed on the basis of patronage and many are staff without the confidence of the Greenwood would agree that Steelworkers are amongst the highest-paid Canadian workers, largely because of the backing of the international, but he charges that "the growth of the Steelworkers is not primarily the result of organizing unorganized workers. He argues that industrial growth, mergers, raiding, and natural population growth are just as likely causes of the union's growth as is the union's greatness."

"The Breakway of the union's Kitimat local in B.C. to form a Canadian union proves that workers are interested in more than just workers.

The underdog contender for the throne, Greenwood believes that "it is not a coincidence that not one staff representative supported me. I represent the rank and file movement in Canada which rejects opulent unionism and demands that the working man have a greater say in policy-making decisions of the unions."

"The leadership of the union must begin to discuss the problems of democracy in the union or eventually face the same fate as the leadership of the United Mine Workers of America, which was replaced by men who are moving the union offices back to the coalfields, and cutting salaries of union workers." (After a U.S. court found UMW elections rigged, the coal miners in a subsequent election threw out president Tony Boyle's regime.)

Williams believes that it is precisely his role as a staff person which has kept him in touch with the rank and file of the union. "I've never been removed from the rank and file and consider myself their servant who attempts only to offer leadership."

Greenwood views Williams in a different light. "Lynn Williams has never been a part of the rank and file," he says. "Twenty-five years ago, when Williams went to university, those who had the privilege were not working class. Williams' purpose in going to work for the few months he did was not to join the ranks of the working class. It was political expediency," he charged, because Williams hasn't worked in a shop since.

Williams points to the increase from 36,000 to 126,000 in District 6's membership in years as an indication of the Steelworker's strength. "Look at the record," he challenges, "we're the country's pace-setters in our collective agreements."

economic issues," says Greenwood tersely, "and the union has got to recognize this."

"Regional disparity and ethnic problems caused dissatisfaction at Kitimat at least four years ago when they nominated me to run (for District 6 director). The problems existed then, but the union ignored them. Still, I think the workers should have stayed and fought within the union for better, more independent policies on issues like Vietnam, Burke-Hartke, and greater democracy in the union. This way the movement's going to be split again."

Williams feels that the workers at Kitimat have been led into false issues against the USW of A when their frustration should have been directed at the multi-national corporations. He thinks that political issues are important, but that they should be considered within the context of the New Democratic Party, as the party best representing the interests of the Canadian working class. Greenwood has been active in both the trade union movement and the NDP around political and economic issues. He supported the leftist Waffle in the NDP, (although he subsequently left it), while Williams was instrumental in their expulsion this summer.

The Steelworkers are the leading union within the NDP and are attributed great influence with the party's Ontario leader, Stephen Lewis. Williams has been accused of stacking party conventions and councils with pro-Lewis Steel staff representatives whenever Lewis faces a tough fight.

Both unionists agree that there has been a myth built up around the power of the United Steelworkers, and that its power rests on the unity of its members against the more powerful multi-national corporations. Greenwood says succinctly, "The local corner store probably draws in a lot more income than the local union."

Job opportunity laws not enforced: Parent

By Wm. MOLSON

Ontario's legislation for equal job opportunity is the best in Canada, says Council of Canadian Unions' executive Madeleine Parent, "But I have a bone to pick with the enforcers - they aren't enforcing the legislation."

Federal labour minister John Munro and provincial secretary for social development Robert Welch, drew laughter and derision from the audience of 500 at the Wednesday night meeting on equality for working women.

Munro, arriving late at the St. Lawrence Centre with conservative MP Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands), was hissed by the predominantly female audience when he helped MacDonald seat herself.

Criticizing the Ontario legislation for containing a loophole in allowing unequal pay for women when it is based on any factor other than sex, Parent said that effective laws could be enacted if the government followed the example set by United Nations and American Federation of Labour bills and required equal pay for equal value.

Striking Wardair stewardesses publicized their demands for laws limiting the length of their working day which is now up to 24 hours long. Wardair flights are currently staffed with unqualified personnel including pilots' wives.

Also present was a representative of striking Dare Foods workers, who claimed that Dare is now trying to throw out the union. Welch promised to relay to provincial labour minister Fern Gündon Dare workers' complaint of sexual discrimination.

Munro said the priorities of the federal government with regard to equality for women were daycare, family planning and implementation of Royal Commission on the Status of Women recommendations.

When he began to explain the government's plans to make jobs, he was drowned out by laughter.

The abortion issue has social and moral aspects beyond the freedom of women, said Munro.

"Abortion on demand is not the issue", countered National Action Committee on the Status of Women chairwoman Laura Sabia, "we want abortion taken out of that damn Criminal Code. And we are not saying that everybody should rush out and get an abortion. Just get it out of the code."

If by some freak of nature all men suddenly became pregnant, remarked a speaker from the audience, abortion legislation would be changed within three weeks.

Getty says he was charged for his political activism

By JOHN CAMPBELL

At yesterday's final session, of Bill Getty's trial on assaulting police, Getty argued in his summation that police testimony could not confirm that he had assaulted Detective William Kearns. He also argued he had been singled out for arrest as a known political activist, when last March's occupation of Simcoe Hall was broken up.

He reminded the court that he had been charged by Kearns only with trespass at the time of his booking and learned that assault charges had been laid against him only two hours later.

The verdict of the trial will be given by Judge M. A. Charles February 19 at 10 am in courtroom 31 of the Old City Hall.

Getty interrupted Crown Attorney William Donaldson's concluding statements when the prosecutor made a reference to evidence against the defendant, to say that the incident concerned a different trial held three years ago.

The atmosphere in the Senate Chambers as police broke in to eject demonstrators was described at Wednesday's session as one of fear and panic by witnesses.

"We were afraid of what would happen. We were afraid all the police would come in and of what they would do," Tony Leah said in response to a question from Getty.

Throughout the trial, Donaldson exposed inconsistencies in the defense witnesses' testimony with highly detailed rapid-fire questions concerning the entry of police into the chamber and the ensuing action.

He introduced transcripts of an earlier trial against Mark Goldblatt in order to compare witnesses' statements about the event.

Goldblatt was found guilty in December of assaulting police.

With the exceptions of Tom Walkom and Debbie Curtis, the defense witnesses have stated that no warning of trespass was given before the police began breaking down the Senate door. They were instructed to do so before entering the chamber.

There was unanimous agreement among witnesses, however, that Getty was not on the table which had been used to barricade the door as Kearns came through the open panel. This was the location at which the alleged offence was said to have taken place.

Toronto Free Clinic to close next month

By HELEN COOPERSTEIN

The Toronto Free Clinic closes its doors March 15 after three years of service to the Toronto youth community.

Although the eight medical staff workers, a dental assistant, two shop workers (in the Free Store) and Dr. Dave Collins are saddened by seeing something they put their "life, body and soul into", come to an end, they are more than sure that the clinic was recognized as one of the best health operations in Toronto. The Experimental Health Care Service and the Department of Health had enough confidence in the clinic to supply the grants required for its operation.

Originally founded in Rochdale College, the Free Clinic broke away to new grounds and a new identity at Dupont Street near Spadina Road.

The eight medical staff workers were trained to diagnose and treat bronchitis, respiratory ailments, abdominal disorder and colds, as well as cuts and bruises. With no red tape of waiting to see a doctor, with forms to be filled, and fees to be calculated, it was a refuge to people they described as "hippies".

But since these people have long since dispersed, the patients now using the clinic request more than the clinic has to offer, according to one worker, such as personal doctors attention and X-rays - requests that can only be handled at a hospital. The clinic began to turn into an abortion counselling service as well as undertaking immigration physicals and referrals.

Dr. Collins said he will continue to do more of the same work he has done, probably involving setting up another clinic.

The other free clinics remaining in Toronto are the Village Health Centre, and Scarboro Medi-Free Clinic.

The University of Toronto Computer Centre announces an introductory course on the APL language.

The interactive programming language APL is both powerful and easy to use. Many computer operations can be accomplished with simplicity. APL is especially adept at manipulating data and printing out results with a minimum of fuss.

The course consists of six lectures to be held Mondays and Wednesdays, 7:30 - 9:00 p.m. beginning February 19 at the Food Sciences Building, 135 Bloor Street West, Room 124.

Guest lecturer will be Mr. E.M. Edwards, Manager of Systems Languages, Control Data Corporation.

A-bomb may be used in rebellion - MIT prof

By JONISEAGER

"Dissidents" or "lawless elements" may obtain atom bombs to blackmail governments and other institutions, an American scientist who helped develop the atom bomb predicted Tuesday night.

Massachusetts Institute of Technology professor Bernard Feld, lecturing in a series sponsored by the International Studies Program, said that if one-tenth of one per cent of the 300,000 tons of plutonium to be produced in the world by the year 200 is "diverted in some clandestine fashion" into the hands of these "dissidents", they will have the potential of building atom bombs.

Official estimates, he said, are that although great precautions will be taken to safeguard the plutonium, more than this minimum amount will be lost.

"No thought seems to have been given to this," he declared.

About 100,000 tons of plutonium will be produced in the United States, Feld said, and 10,000 in Canada.

The "gravest danger of all" dangers in nuclear power stems from governmental decisions that their country's economic well-being depends on increased power production, he said. Plutonium will be the main source of power.

Feld, who worked at the University of Chicago developing the world's first nuclear reaction, said "I believe that the nuclear genie is still more out of the bottle than in it," referring to the likelihood of nuclear warfare.

His main interests now in this field are in

The Varsity—Bill Stranks

disarmament and in "trying to ensure that these (nuclear) weapons will never again be used in war". He sees the solution of technical problems as a "prerequisite of solving the political problems".

Feld views the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) as "inadequate" and only a "small step" in disarmament. These talks, while they may rid the super powers of defensive weapons, allow for the maintenance and increase of offensive weapons.

SALT also allows for research and development of new nuclear weapons, and doesn't account for the problem of the increase in tactical weapons, Feld said. He sees the prospects for the second phase of SALT as "dismal."

Feld also pointed out that the missile freeze is not really a freeze at all, since it permits "at least a ten-fold increase" in the number of weapons now available as independent target bombs.

He commented that both the United States and Soviet administrations have made a "commitment to pursue all new developments in nuclear weaponry which aren't prohibited by SALT."

One of the basic problems of disarmament which he sees is that the super powers won't agree to "verification procedures". The Soviets offered to agree to three annual mandatory weaponry inspections, while the Americans insisted on seven.

For reasons that Feld finds "quite inexplicable, this impasse wasn't resolved". Feld suggested that possibly there was "a tacit mutual agreement" of both sides not to come to grips with these problems.

While the Moscow Treaty of 1963 banned most forms of nuclear testing, there was no limitation set on underground testing. Feld said that while both treaties, SALT and Moscow, contain "pious pledges" to pursue further disarmament procedures, these promises remain "unfulfilled" and "are abused" by intensive underground testing.

He sees the danger as being that "each new step in development... (of nuclear weaponry) serves as an excuse for countermeasures by the other side".

He says that countries like Canada, Japan and India "without nuclear weapons... are really much better off", both economically, in that money is saved, and politically. However, he says, there are growing pressures on these nations to join the "nuclear rat race" and to "aspire to the dubious advantages" of becoming secondary nuclear powers, such as Britain and the People's Republic of China.

Feld sees three basic steps that must be taken if appropriate disarmament policies are to be made. First, he says, the doctrines of "strategic analysis" that have been developed in the United States and adopted in other countries must be re-examined.

He says such doctrines are "monstrous" that hold the world "hostage" to the "whims of a handful of politicians". The superpowers have come to believe that the only viable deterrent is the capability to destroy half of the other country's resources and population. Feld sees this as responsible for the "erosion of the whole idea of deterrents".

The second step is to stop the "slow resurgence of the concept of the use of tactical weapons in so-called limited uses". He says that when the concept of limited nuclear warfare first "reared its ugly head", it was recognized that it would be impossible to stop it from escalating into a full scale nuclear exchange. "Detente is the order of the day in Europe" he declared.

SAC election rules change poses problem for losers

By FRAN JOHNSON

SAC presidential hopefuls who want to maximize their chances of being elected to the council may have to run in their college or faculty constituency at the same time as running campus-wide.

Under a new procedure both elections are timed for March 7 and

8. In previous years, the presidential elections were held before the constituency elections, so that defeated presidential candidates had a second chance at getting on council.

SAC vice-president John Helliwell, also election committee chairman, stated the change was made to hopefully "make SAC rep elections more meaningful".

He realizes the new problem it has created an said he is "trying to get around it". His present solution, to allow candidates to run for both offices, will be proposed following today's SAC meeting, although he realizes of it is "getting late".

If Helliwell's suggestion is adopted, a candidate could win two positions. Helliwell then proposes that the candidate be allowed to accept only one office and the runner up for the other position win it. He admitted that in such a case, the electorate would not really have the person they wanted representing the.

Since nothing has been formalized yet, Helliwell stated he was quite "open to suggestions" to help solve the problem.

High school students attack Canadian foreign aid schemes

By MELANIE JONES

Canadian governmental and non-governmental foreign aid policies were challenged last Thursday by over 100 Scarborough high school students who gathered in the auditorium of Woburn Collegiate.

Under attack was Mary Poaps, Canadian executive director of the Amazonian Hospital Foundation which operates a hospital in the jungles of Peru. Poaps has also worked for five years as associate director of Oxfam, Canada, has travelled extensively and spends several months of each year in the Amazon jungle.

During the hour long session taped by CITY-TV Poaps was confronted with strong criticisms concerning the kind of aid which Canada and the U.S. are sending to most Third World countries.

Student Sue Abbey, one of the panelists, described aid as the "big ripoff". She pointed out that not only does Canada spend less than most developed countries on foreign aid (less than half of one per cent of its gross national product), but also that most of this sum is in the form of private investment or is "tied" (two-thirds of the money must be spent on Canadian goods and materials, which could cost the recipient up to 30 per cent more than the same goods would cost elsewhere).

Asked how to develop agriculture in a country ridden with big landowners, Poaps suggested that the governments should begin buying up the land and dividing it among the peasants.

When Abbey asked if Canadians would be willing to accept a less affluent life style in order that South Americans can have a decent standard of living, Poaps smiled and said, "Well you can't take it with you so you might as well share it."

Brushing aside a series of demands for a cancellation of Canadian foreign aid in its present form, and the support of a Marxist revolution as a solution to the South American problem, Poaps, though conceding the possibility of revolution, suggested that at the moment what the South Americans' need is "guidance as children need guidance and adolescents need guidance... to bring them up to a living level".

Student reform slate for GC ready to go

A group of students have formed a reform slate for this month's Governing Council elections, pledging to focus their campaigns around the issues of open library stacks, educational cutbacks, and tenure.

The slate was born at a meeting of about 15 students Wednesday which decided to build a campaign organization and ticket which could present a unified reform front around certain core issues.

Former SAC vice-president Phil Dack, Political Economy Course Union vice-chairman Howie Stein, and history graduate student Bill Schabas chaired the meeting. Schabas suggested that an original

"open stacks slate" concept be broadened to become the "reform slate" by involving more issues in the campaign. The students agreed support for the ticket would increase in direct proportion to the number of issues on which it campaigned.

But the group failed to establish a set list of people to run on the slate and decided, instead, to encourage as many people as possible to file nomination papers. After nominations close they will decide who should remain in the race and get reform slate support.

Possible undergraduate "reform" candidates include Victoria College student council president Gord Barnes, third year Vic student David Laughton, arts and science faculty council member Howie Levitt, and Scin.

Dack and Schabas may run for the two graduate student seats. Some students at the meeting suggested canvassing professors to run on the slate in the faculty constituencies and also going through residences to seek more student nominees.

The slate, with headquarters and publicity, would provide a better opportunity to involve more students in the election than last year, Stein said.

They agreed that the $50 campaign allocation given each candidate by the administration should be thrown into a central fund for a combined campaign. Schabas suggested producing a four-page flyer.

The group will meet again Monday after nominations close to choose its final candidates.

Other campus politicians rumoured to be considering running for Governing Council include former SAC services commissioner Bill Steadman and university commissioner John Creelman.

Steadman was elected to the Sarnia Board of Education in December and quit his commission position job to spend more time representing his Sarnia constituents. He feels he can be mobile between Toronto and Sarnia and serve on the Governing Council as well.

Creelman says he will run for a part-time student seat without the blessing of the Association of Part-time Undergraduate students. APUS vice-president Arlene Dick and former chairman Norma Grindal, who now sits on the council, are both likely candidates.

Nominations close Monday and the elections will be carried out by mailed ballot later this month.

A & S union hires Depoe

Well-known radical David Depoe was appointed full-time fieldworker by the Arts and Science Student Union last night.

Depoe, who attained fame as a Yorkville Company of Young Canadians social animator in the mid-60's, and is now a member of the Canadian Party of Labour, will be paid $95 a week until the end of April. He will co-ordinate student educational and political activity in the faculty along with three part-time workers.

However, the money for Depoe's salary, and the other programs of the ASSU, has not been approved by SAC yet. ASSU executive member Rick Gregory told last night's meeting that SAC will not release the money to run the union until $200 is paid for an outside audit of its books.

Gregory said he thinks SAC feels that the Union is too new to be completely reliable. The ASSU was formed last fall. Depoe is the first worker hired.

Last night's ASSU council meeting also passed the budget, which includes $9000 for course unions and evaluations.

Huron demonstrators' trials set for March

Seven people charged with various offences after last Friday's demonstration at 215 Huron Street appeared in court yesterday and were remanded.

Trials of the five men and two women will begin in March at courtroom 34 in the Old City Hall.

The charges arise from a demonstration by the U of T Workers Against the Layoffs and the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee protesting the lack of guarantees against layoffs and contracting out by the university.

Denise Havers, charged with disturbing the peace, and Rhonda Flemming, charged with assaulting police, will be tried beginning March 1 at 2 p.m.

The trials of Larry Haiven, and Greg Keilty, both charged with assaulting police, and Myron Krymko, charged with obstructing police, will begin on March 16 at 10 a.m.

Claude Browne, facing two charges of assaulting police, and Peter Havers, charged with assault causing bodily harm, common assault, and mischief of private property will be tried beginning March 16 at 10 a.m.

Judge postpones McLaughlin fate

The judgment on Tom McLaughlin's charge of obstructing police in connection with last year's Simcoe Hall occupations was postponed Wednesday by Judge Cloney.

The judge said that because of the pressure of "many cases", he had not reviewed the case or the testimony of the witnesses and had not reached a decision.

The verdict will be given today in courtroom 24 in the Old City Hall at 10 a.m.

Fix, then demolish

Two houses acquired for the relocation of police station 52 will be rehabilitated for the tenants at a cost of $5000, Metro Council decided Tuesday.

The council adopted a recommendation from its executive to repair houses at 37 and 39 Darcy Street so that they can be occupied until at least August of this year. Building of the new station is not scheduled to start until next year.

However, the report from the Metro Property Commissioner recommending the repairs contends that restoration of the buildings for long-term use has "no economic justification."

Residents of the Dundas-Beverly area have protested against the relocation of the police station in their area on the grounds that the area is already too congested. The methods and alleged secrecy used by the Metro Property Commission in acquiring the houses on behalf of the police have also been questioned.

The eight houses necessary for the site have already been acquired, and two have been boarded up. Tenants of the two Darcy Street houses have had their deadlines for leaving extended twice already, and are now seeking to remain in the houses until October.

A report from the Metro Property Commissioner detailing the costs necessary to repair the houses for use until October is due before Metro Executive Committee next Tuesday.

Ward 6 Aldermen William Archer and Dan Heap are working on setting up a general public meeting with area residents and Police Commission representatives to discuss the whole subject of the relocation.

Free elections of the

— Hebert Marcuse

Laws enacted under Benito Mussolini's fascist rule have been re-activated by the present Italian government to repress growing worker-student militancy

Why would the Italian Minister of Education personally pay a visit to the Board of Education of a relatively insignificant, small town in northern Italy?

Simple.

Since the beginning of the school year, the high school students of the town of Gallarate have been agitating with strikes and general assemblies held jointly with workers against all mechanisms of selection, and demanding free transportation, free cafeteria service, and freedom to carry out political activity.

On December 6, 1972, while the Gallarate students were out supporting a joint metalworkers' and teachers' strike, the police arrived, called by a fascist teacher. The students ran back into the school and locked themselves in but the police broke in and charged. Stones started flying and shots were fired by the police. The cops finally withdrew with their "prize catch": a student who had accidentally tripped and whom they had severely beaten up.

The reaction of the students was immediate: after holding a general assembly with local workers, they staged a mass demonstration at police headquarters, demanding the release of their fellow student. Police reinforcements arrived immediately, armed to the teeth, and the whole area took on the appearance of being in a state of siege. Although ordered to disperse the demonstrators did not move until a teacher had been sent into the police station to check on the condition of their comrade.

It was a typical example.

Never before have students in all parts of Italy reached such a high level of politicization as in the current year. The militancy has spread from the university student movement of the late 60's to the junior and senior high school levels and turned many a neighborhood school into an arena of confrontation involving strikes, occupations, and clashes with the police and squads of fascist thugs. The state and the educational authorities have launched a counter-attack aimed at isolating the student movement and breaking its ever-stronger alliance with the working class and its struggles.

Italian students rally with fight neo-

What is behind this unprecedented mass mobilization among the students?

Following the wave of confrontation which ended with the "hot autumn" of 1969, the university student movement entered a period of general ebb. It needed to "find itself" politically, to move beyond the politics of ideological protest and its fragile solidarity with the workers' struggles, to a more precise understanding of the role of the student and his position in a class society.

What it began to discover has been referred to by "Il Manifesto" as the "organic ambiguity of the student" in a stage of capitalism where education has become accessible to unprecedented numbers but at the same time is fast losing its power to deliver its beneficiaries from the material hardships caused by unemployment and underemployment. Although the student is privileged with respect to those who still cannot get access to educational institutions, he is in a position of objective ambiguity because the increasing mass nature of education under capitalism has led to widespread de-valuation of degrees and waste of human resources. This combination of present privilege and future hardship is the crux of the student's position. This is underscored by the fact that even as a student he is really among the unemployed.

In order to overcome the ambiguity of their position, students had to begin developing forms of political struggle capable of rallying the broader mass of students around precise anti-capitalist positions. The growing discontent and sense of futility among large strata of students provided the material base for such a development. The political consciousness now evident all over Italy has its roots, unmistakably, in the daily reality of the student's life.

In the most immediate sense, this daily reality is made up of overcrowded classrooms (often accommodating two or three shifts a day), totally inadequate facilities (eg. libraries, labs, etc.), ever-rising transportation costs, old-fashioned authoritarian methods of instruction, etc. all of which are due to persistent failure to implement even the most meagre reforms.

The only reform of any consequence, passed over ten years ago, was that of extending the mandatory years of education from five to eight. Its effect was to draw in segments of the population which had been previously shut out, mostly from the working class and the rural peasantry. This reform, however, was a move prompted by the exigencies of capitalist planning and aimed at creating a base of technically trained labor in view of the economic boom which Italy was to experience throughout the sixties.

In the years that followed however, it contributed to the deepening of the educational crisis because the increase in the student population was not paralleled by a proportionate increase in available jobs. It soon became evident that large strata of the youth population had been channelled into longer educational programs in order to keep them from pressing immediately on a job market incapable of absorbing them. This "parking lot" function of the schools has underscored the total subordination of educational policies to the needs and contradictions of capitalist development.

It is at this level, where the ideology of education as the vehicle for social mobility is shattered, that the great mass of students live out the contradiction of their position.

The student's road to political consciousness often begins, as we have seen, with a vague feeling of being cheated, a feeling collectively expressed for the first time in the university upheavals of 1967-1968. In the years that followed, it has matured politically and spread to the junior and senior high school levels, taking root, in particular, among students in the technical high schools.

These high schools grant diplomas in areas such as accounting, engineering, primary school teaching, etc. Their programs are similar to those of Ontario's community colleges or Quebec's CEGEPS; their graduates would be competing for the same sort of jobs.

In the past ten years the technical high schools have had the largest increase in enrollment with a correspondingly high level of unemployment and underemployment. The areas for which they train are critically oversupplied as a result of imbalances in capitalist development — a phenomenon to which Canadians are no strangers.

As is frequently the case, the working class pays the highest price for such imbalances. The majority of the students in technical high schools are from the working class and rural peasantry. Their families, who have to shoulder the financial burden of their education, are in no position to bear the costs of prolonged lack of productivity due to unemployment. For these students, therefore, the shrinking job market and the broader political question of the capitalist use of education are of immediate and pressing concern, and this explains, to a great extent, why the technical high schools have become fertile ground for militant struggle.

As the student movement has acquired a more precise anti-capitalist character, it has been propelled towards an ever-clearer political alliance with the workers' movement. This alliance is one of the most crucial aspects of the present situation and is based on the collective recognition that the students have undergone a process of proletarianization which puts them, objectively, on the side of the workers. No longer is it a matter of simple solidarity. Students and workers alike recognize that they are only raw material for capitalist planning and therefore victims of its contradictions.

For the student movement, its alliance with the workers entails a sharp rejection of the idea that the present educational crisis can be solved via traditional forms of political activity such as parliamentary politics, pressure for government reforms, etc. Its aim is precisely to situate the educational crisis within a much larger political framework in order to avoid relapsing into reformist struggles based on narrowly conceived "student" interests.

A strategy along the lines of a new student unionism is rejected on the grounds that it would be capable only of consolidating certain privileges and fighting for new ones. The point, someone has said, is not to fight just for lower fees and smaller classrooms but for the abolition of capitalist control over the schools. To this end, unity with the workers' struggles and the building of a common mass base has become the order of the day.

The level of unity reached thus far became evident last fall when a new period of open conflict began with a) the opening of the new academic year under the direction of a new Minister of Education determined to restore discipline in the schools, and b) a new round of labour negotiations for the renewal of national contracts in key sectors of industry. The capitalist class has been preparing for the present season of struggles for the past three years following the major gains made by the workers during the "hot autumn" of '69.

In order to prevent the capitalist counter-attack from undermining its present position of strength, the student-worker alliance has developed new organizational forms of struggle, the most common of which is the "neighborhood committee".

These committees serve to launch actions, at the local level, such as occupations of nearby factories, coordination of worker and student strikes with joint assemblies and demonstrations, massive neighborhood rent strikes — many of which have led to self-reductions of rent to 10 per cent of income, campaigns for free public transportation, etc.

A recent example of such actions took place in the small northern city of Imola, where students from a local high school opened the doors of their school to striking workers from a nearby factory, and held a joint student-worker assembly. The principal immediately laid charges against three of the militants for disrupting the normal "didactic activity" of the school. The assembly responded by proclaiming itself collectively responsible and called a general strike of all the city's high schools. The following day the schools were empty.

If the students' alliance with the workers entails their very survival as a mass political movement, the workers, for their part, have increasingly recognized the necessary link between their in-plant struggles and the larger social struggles being waged in their communities. For this reason, they have fought militantly in the neighborhood committees and often provide the leadership.

One of the more recent slogans, "abolish full-time study, abolish full-time work", aims at breaking with the capitalist division of labour imposed on students and workers, and provides the basis for certain concrete demands.

The metalworkers, who are the most militant sector of the Italian working class, have recently demanded fifty hours per year of paid time-off for political and cultural education, to be controlled directly by the workers themselves. The plan which most of them favor is to hold joint sessions with students, teachers, the unemployed, and others who have an organized presence in their communities, in order to deepen their understanding of present-day conditions in Italy and develop common strategy.

The strength of the student-worker alliance has thrust the schools into the heat of struggle now underway between the owners and the working class as negotiations continue for renewal of key national contracts. This has made the authorities more determined than ever to regain control over the schools.

Their efforts to contain the student movement have already gone through two separate stages following the first wave of agitation among the high school students in '70-71.

The first consisted of granting certain concessions along "democratic" lines, the most important of which was the right to hold general student assemblies without interference. This was, in reality, a formalization of what the students had de facto gained through mass mobilization, and it produced the opposite of its intended effect. Instead of co-opting student militance by redirecting it into legitimized channels, it heightened the agitation.

The students refused to accept the notion of the school as an institution unto itself, detached from the interests of the rest of society, and demanded that their assemblies be opened to "outsiders": workers, labour unions, neighborhood committees, etc. The political space created by the students' militance and the mass base on which it rested were by now too solid to be destroyed by reformist bureaucratic "solutions". This led to the first wave of repressive measures which were to continue for the remainder of the 1971-1972 academic year.

In December of 1971, the Italian neo-fascist party (MSI) sent a letter to all high school principals throughout Italy in which the schools were described as being in a "state of emergency". It called for the strictest enforcement of "law and order" and proclaimed this to be the only way to bring the schools back to normal conditions. At roughly the same time, the Minister of Education issued a memorandum calling for the creation of parent's councils within the schools, in an effort to bring parental authority to bear on the situation.

Soon after, punitive measures began reining down in all of Italy's schools: student suspensions, school lock-outs, criminal charges against militants, transfer of teachers sympathetic to the students, police harassment, etc. These repressive measures served to identify the fascist teachers and principals, who enforced them with the greatest zeal, and confirmed the suspicion of many that the measures were neo-fascist in origin. This had a powerful radicalizing effect on the students and introduced into the schools one of the most pressing issues in Italy today: the struggle against a resurgent fascism.

This struggle began in earnest on December 12, 1969, when fascist bombs exploded in a bank at Piazza Fontana, in downtown Milan, killing 16 people and wounding many others. Several members of an anarchist group were rounded up for questioning while the media proceeded to pronounce them guilty. One of them, Giuseppe Pinelli, a railroad worker, was killed falling from a fourth-storey window at police headquarters (suicide, they said). Another, Pietro Valpreda, was charged and placed in custody.

As events unfolded over the past three years, one of the most despicable police frame-ups in Italian history slowly came to light. It revealed a fascist plot to create a climate of social tension and fear, with the collaboration of police, judges, and people in high places, aimed directly at undermining the recent gains made by the workers' movement.

The complexity of the case defies any facile prediction as to its final outcome, but the anti-fascist forces scored a major victory with the recent release of Pietro Valpreda, held for three years without trial.

Following the May elections, last year, a center-right coalition was asked to form the government and the result has been the creation of the 'strong state' capable of meeting the anticipated wave of workers' struggle with a firm hand.

The chief tools wielded by the 'strong state' are the renewed attempts to limit the right to strike, and wide extensions of the power of the police and the courts. A number of criminal laws legislated under Mussolini have recently been re-activated and there is a proposed law currently before the parliament which would empower the police to arrest a suspect and hold him up to 96 hours without formally charging him.

Employers have also been given increased powers to lay-off workers, and their strategy thus far has been to hit the most militant sections of the workers' ranks in the hope of weakening the entire movement. Mass lay-offs have already occurred at Pirelli — the nation's largest rubber producer — as well as in several auto industries.

The Government's policy of repression is seen by many militants as another indication of the growing fascism of the Italian bourgeoisie state, and for this reason it has become a focal point for student-worker struggles.

On December 12, 1972, demonstrations called jointly by groups of the extra-parliamentary left, commemorating Piazza Fontana, brought hundreds of thousands of workers and students together throughout Italy to protest government policies and to demand the release of Pietro Valpreda whose detention has become a symbol of the government's complicity in the fascists' design for terror. He was released shortly after.

Repressive measures aimed at the workers are paralleled by similar ones designed for the students. The 'strong State' is attempting to restore a regime of discipline which would no longer tolerate politics in the school and aims at destroying the unity between the students and the workers which is said to threaten the 'social peace' of the country.

According to the new program of 'reforms' outlined by the new Minister of Education, the mechanisms of selection within the schools would be strengthened, forcing students to comply more rigidly to the methodological and ideological orientation of their programs.

(Teachers who have refused to go along with these guidelines have been subjected to disciplinary measures). The mass political organization achieved so far would be severely undermined by a provision banning the general assemblies and replacing them with "mini-parliaments" made up of student delegates representing the various political (party) affiliations (including the neo-fascists).

The plan also calls for the intensification of extra-curricular activities which would create new ways to administer bourgeois culture and further de-politicize student organizations, especially where these are already weak.

In addition to expressing itself through common objectives with the workers' movement (against educational fees, the rising cost of living, unemployment, fascism, etc.), the mobilization among the students against the "program to restore authority" also attempts to locate objectives which attack head-on the class character of educational institutions.

"Lotta Continua", one of the national organizations of the extra-parliamentary left, to which many student militants belong, calls programmatically for struggle against all mechanisms of selection (grades, assignments, exams, etc.) and demands equal evaluation for all students, or guaranteed promotion. It also calls for the complete rejection of the class character of school curricula, and demands "assemblies and collectives as instruments for the autonomous political and cultural formation of students in alliance with the workers' struggles".

After past reformist failures to integrate the school, materially and ideologically, into national economic planning and policy-making, the latest attempt, which is still underway, is having to reckon with a mounting radicalization of the student masses who seem determined to maintain the school as a base for political mobilization. The present intensity of the struggle has led many to conclude that the fate of the schools is by now irrevocably bound up with the future of the workers' movement.

Linda Sorenson and Roy Frady in The Colonnade Theatre's Miss Julie.

Toman reins in Strindberg's stormy 'Julie'

Lest waak Classical Stega Productions opened a revival of Miss Julie, one of the finest of August Strindberg's stormy psychological dramas. Appropriately billed "A Tragedy of Obsession", this play is perhaps the best introduction to the work of this turn-of-the-century master of tragedy, end a most welcome offarring for those who are already devotees of this ganre.

Most walcama, Indaad, tor, although Miss Julie has long been a staple of classical theatres end a favourita of univarsity drama departments, it is rere that ona finds a company that does justica to this truly tina script. Parhabs this is dua to tha intense amotional content of the play, and tha technical damands it mekes upon actors. For although the play providas a taast of opportunitias for tha talented and wall-trained actor, it is tilled with a varlaty of pitfalls. A cast of Miss Julie must feel somewhat in the position of a tightrope welkar, for the Impact of the play depends upon its ability to rise to a great emolnel pitch; at the some time, the fragility of the drama depends upon superb use of restraint at precise momants. This is one of those delicate dramas that loses all cradibility if there is overIndulgence on the part of the actors.

Director Adolf Toman has achieved a fine balance in this production, bringing the audience, with the characters, almost, but not quite, to the breaking point many times bafora tha tinal tragic closing. The pace is lively, and tha cast is quite adept at twisting and turning its way along the path to the Inavitable, displaying Infinita varlaty in technique es each actor sustains his full and highly complex role. Each of the plays threa characters ara highly, almost bewldeeringly complex, and the cast meets the demands of the roles with laudably clear portrayals.

Linda Sorenson sustains the ditficult titla role beautifully; never losing the thread of the often conflicting elements of her character. Sha happily avoids the temptation to which many actresses in the role unfortunately succumb of allowing her character to disintegrate into nervous fluttering, and always maintains tha essential dual personality of Miss Julie. Occasionally she does tend to pose. This however, decreases as the show progresses, and her final scene is truly a chilling tour-de-force.

Roy Frady, playing the role of Jean opposite Miss Soranson, is to be commended for his equally strong performance. Mr. Frady's many-taceted characterization of the obsessively social-climbing valet is gripping. His interpretation displays the sensitivity and insight necessary in playing Strindberg. He loses no opportunity to show us yet another of the many sides of this complex character.

Pauline Carey, in the smaller but no less important role of Christine, brings some needed (if judiciously limited) comic relief to the stage. Christina is often played as a sullen, rather sinister moralist, but Miss Carey has chosen a far more interesting interpretation in portraying her as a mildly hysterical and often amusing hypocrite who operates behind a facade of almost vain virtue.

Despite the fact that the first act may seem rather contrived by today's theatrical standards I feel that Director Toman and his cast have put together a show well worth seeing. In short, this production of Miss Julie succeeds where many others have failed.

Definitive job of O'Casey's Juno & Paycock

Sean Kenny's production of Juno and the Paycock is the definitive version of the O'Casey tragedy. The Irish Arts Theatre's production has a striking authenticity that could be noticed in the reactions of the opening night audience, largely familiar with the ethnic background dealt with in the work.

Perhaps the fact that the actors are personally familiar with Irish culture makes the production ring true. Certainly the faithfully produced lilt of the dialect is an important factor in the success of O'Casey's lyrical text. Whether it was Mrs. Tencred's outcry at her son's murder (a brief jewel of a performance by Maureen Fitzgerald), Maisie Madigan's small talk, or Juno's touching final monologue, all the speeches are handled with a musical sensitivity.

The simple set design is completely acceptable as a Dublin tenement in 1922. This design, along with costumes provided by the Abbey Theatre of Dublin, provides the framework which complements the memorable characterizations.

One couldn't imagine a more strong-willed Juno than Siobhan McKenne, a more irresponsible, blustering Jack Boyle than Niall Toibin, a more haunted young veteran than Nial Buggy, nor a more slippery Joxer Daly than Brendan Cauldwell. And what's more important, the actors know how to be foils for one another. Dominic Hogan, as Mr. Bentham brings out the ethnic richness of the Boyle household with his straight-faced "good breeding."

Juno and the Paycock is a fine example of "fourth-wall" theatre that doesn't need to be updated. It so happens that Ireland's political situation is as turbulent as it was in 1922. Apart from that fact, however, its content still retains a universal appeal. Sean Kenny, director-designer of this production expresses it well: "The bloodshed and civil strife of 1922 is the background against which Sean O'Casey sets his play, but it is his razor sharp characters, who live in and around the tenement room of the Boyles, with their violence, vanities, humour and courage that lifts the play into the universe of universal drama..."

See, hear Nitty Gritty

When you're watching a very good live performance there is a point when everyone realizes just how good the music is and the pursed lips break into smiles and people begin to nod their heads perceptibly, as if they were all agreeing on some important matter. That point was reached before The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band finished their first song, at their opening set at the El Mocambo Tavern on Monday night.

The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band is a five man group that goes through more musical evolutions in hour than most bands can even contemplate. The strength of this group, which has managed to maintain its current membership since 1969, lies in the versatility and personability of each member. They change instruments on each song, with little effort and time, so that the band takes on a slightly different sound with each change.

The musical versatility of each member means that the band can change its sound in seconds and that no one personality is the focus of attention. One of the most gratifying aspects of their performance was the virtuosity which each member displayed on every instrument he picked up. John McEuen, buckskinned, tall and bearded, won much of the audience's attention as he alternately showed his prowess on the fiddle, banjo, mandolin, guitar, steel guitar and accordion. Jimmie Fadden played a great blues/country harp and some mean electric guitar licks. His voice was a nasal blend of Dylan with the wispiest of Eric Anderson. The other members, included Jaff Hanna on guitar, drums and washboard, Jimmie Ibbatson on bass, guitar, drums and piano, and Les Thompson on bass, drums and mandolin.

"Anyone that we hear that we like, we'll attempt. We can do jug music, country, pure acoustic mountain music, Cajun, folk-rock, just anything", said Jeff Hanna.

The Dirt Band plays other peoples' songs with the emphasis on interpretation. They played songs from their last three albums that included their hit version of Jerry Jeff Walker's "Mr. Bojangles", a few tunes by Hank Williams ("Jambalaya" and "Honky Tonkin"), Doug Kershaw, Kenny Loggins, Buddy Holly and Jackson Browne (a former Dirt Band member).

The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band will be at the El Mocambo tonight and tomorrow and judging from the packed house on Monday (yes, Monday!) and the rousing encore for the second set, you'll have to get there early if you want to see one of the most entertaining bands to come here in a long while.

Will Tha Circa Be Unbroken (United Artists) is the title of Dirt Band's new album. It's a massive three album set that needs a bit of explanation. Producer Bill McEuen (John's brother) had the idea of arranging a recording session in Nashville that would include the greatest names in country music, (not slick clichéd country and western).

McEuen managed to get a hold of Earl Scruggs, Doc Watson, Mother Maybelle Carter, Merle Travis, Roy Acuff, Jimmy Martin, and Vassar Clements among others for the session that took place in August of 1971 with the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band.

The album is basically a collection of some of the best traditional country music and the guest performers are really the stars while the Dirt Band stays pretty much in the musical background.

The sessions was recorded on two tracks and mixed live with most of the songs going down in one take. McEuen has even left on some of the studio discussion before each song. The result is some beautiful acoustic country music, cleanly executed and crisply produced with many of the familiar songs played by their composers.

Doc Watson and Earl Scruggs stand out most, with some unparalleled guitar and banjo picking. But every lick was so good that you have to mention almost everyone, especially the Nashville studio regulars, fiddler Vassar Clements and bass player Junior Juskey (who died not long after this session), Dobro player Norman Blake (who works with Dylan and John Hartford), Roy Acuff's dobroist, Beecher "Bashful Brother Oswald" Kirby (of the Smoky Mountain Boys) as well as Earl Scruggs' guitar-playing son Randy.

It took a lot of coaxing to get some of the musicians to play with the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band 'cause most were a bit doubtful of the long-hairs' purpose and ability and it was reported that Bluegrass great Bill Monroe refused to take part in the session.

There are only about four songs where Dirt Banders are on an equal footing with the greats; on those the leading light seems to be harpist Jimmie Fadden.

The album is very uncommercial and the $13.98 list price may put it out of reach for a lot of potential listeners. But it does deserve your attention. McEuen and the Dirt Band are to be commended for a job well done, bringing good country music to a new generation.

True Nature: maturity of Quebec film

La Vrai Nature da Bernedatta, a regi-comic film directed by Gilles Carle, is on occasion for Ontarians to taste the life of the Quebecois. As in the majority of contemporary films from that province, Le Vrai Nature de Bernedette makes a valuable commentary on Quebec culture. Gilles Carle successfully demonstrates the tensions that exist between rural and urban Quebec.

Bernedette Brown, wife of a Montreal lawyer, tires of the urban life of violence, noise, pollution, carbon monoxide and plastic. With her young son Yen-nick she leaves, her convertible full of apples, bananas and oranges, and settles in an old abandoned house in the country. The name B. Bonheur is on her mailbox. As soon as she meets her neighbours in the country she talks about vegetarianism, free love, masturbation and living the natural life. The farmers aren't quickly convinced of the merits of vegetarianism. But they are very enthusiastic in their acceptance of her other notions.

She is quickly accepted by the community and her house becomes a commune for three old men, an invalid named Roc, the mute son of the village prostitute, and finally two bendits, St. Luc and St. Marc.

Developing in contrast to Bernedette's ideal life is a drama between the farmers and the big agricultural companies.

The role of Bernedette is well played by Michelle Lanctot. At times she's exclaiming and one is captivated by her enthusiasm. In the same way, the three old men and Thomas, Bernedette's neighbour, become real people for us. On the other hand, St. Luc and St. Marc are a little too evil and resemble the stereotyped villains of American westerns. There's nothing about them that's sunny. Perhaps they are there as a contrast to Bernedette's naivety and generosity.

Along with Mon Oncle Antoine, Le Vrai Nature de Bernedette represents the maturity of the Quebec film. Even those who are anti-Quebec profit from it; at least they will be exposed to Quebec humour. And for those who cherish Quebec, the film makes two hours when you feel at home even though you're still in Toronto. . . .

'America' rock triumphs over potted plants

The visual effects of clusters of giant potted plants on the Massey Hall stage last Friday night might have detracted from the presentation of a less unaffected, more pretentious group than America. The three young singer-guitarists with two hit singles and two even more impressive Warner Brothers albums to their credit in a relatively short period of exposure, displayed ample proof that their brand of soft-rock deserved the spontaneous applause accorded each of their songs in concert.

Each of the three up-front members of America — Dan Peek, Dewey Bunnell and Gerry Beckley — were equally adept at handling lead vocals on an assortment of their familiar compositions such as "Riverside", "Never Found The Time" and "I Need You".

America's concert was carefully balanced with two distinct sets, each of which was devoted to the polarities that their musical spectrum lends itself to. For forty minutes, the group worked with acoustic guitars and the softer sounds of what they termed their "mushy love-ballad material", but after an intermission the acoustic guitars gave way to Telecasters and Stratocasters which ripped away on about twenty minutes of songs which only loosely served as wrappings for extensive guitar solo exchanges between Dan and Gerry. Bass lines were solid on the entire evening's presentation, while the drumming on the acoustic segment was amateurish to say the least.

Before America's headlining act, the audience was sufficiently warmed up by the Tom Rush-style folk-singing of John David Souther. Souther's own material was fresh and his patter was particularly humorous on his introduction to a dirge he composed to the MacDonald's hamburger outlets. Aiding Souther on piano and bass, as well as on some fill on tenor harmonies was David Jackson, and the duo worked particularly well on "Fast One" and a song about Souther's best friend's wife, and some complications relating thereto.

Clem Hambourg died this past week, which while it will mean nothing to most readers, will mean a lot to a few. Hambourg was one of Toronto's first and last Bohemians. He had long hair in the fifties. For a dozen years he ran The House of Hambourg, the city's first coffeehouse, and one that gave a start to every Toronto jazz musician you can name. The club closed back in 1960. Since then, Hambourg supported himself (meagrely) playing piano. He was seventy-three. Respecta and thanks.

'Little Me' is glorious corn

The Victoria College Music Club's production of Neil Simon's 'Little Me' is based on a solid foundation of good old theatrical corn. Directed by David Rotenberg with choreography by D'Arcy McHayle, it moves with high energy to a thoroughly entertaining end.

Patricia Cross, as Belle, turns in a notable performance, complemented by Allen Stratton's virtuoso rendering of all seven of her equally endearing paramours. Whatever flews are evident in individual supporting performances are easily balanced by such highlights as Brian Nasimok and Stan Leske as the indefatigable Bushbaum Brothers.

Working with a simple set, the production gets comfortably and carries the audience easily through Simon's unbelievably contorted yet inevitable plot. Light — it definitely is, but a hell of a lot of fun. It runs through Saturday. Mimsy Reesoner

4 x Sada Thompson = great

The title of "Twigs", currently playing at the Royal Alexandra Theatre, is taken from Alexander Pope's Moral Essays: "Just as the twig is bent, the tree's inclined." There are four scenes in the play, each concerned with one of three sisters and their mother — three twigs and the tree.

Sade Thompson plays in all four roles. Each sister is seen in her kitchen, at different times on the same day. The first is the lonely widow, the second a survivor of two nervous breakdowns and prisoner of a terrifying marriage, and the third is the only one who has made a good match. The mother is dying, but hides this fact from her daughters. Sade Thompson is excellent in each role.

The play is witty, but it is also touching. Although written by a man, it is very sensitive to the female condition. The men are not pictured as villains, but the sympathy definitely lies with the sisters.

A DAY OF STUDY FEBRUARY 22

The Report of the Commission on Post Secondary Education in Ontario (the "Wright Report") was released last week. It proposes major changes in the operation and financing of Ontario post secondary education.

SAC is preparing thousands of copies of an abbreviated version of the Report (which will be available next week) and is planning a cross-campus study session in two weeks.

GET A COPY OF THE MINI REPORT AT SAC NEXT WEEK AND READ IT! IT'S GOING TO AFFECT YOU! THEN COME TO THE STUDY SESSIONS.

SAC ENDS THE FEES STRIKE

SAC decided to call an end to its support of the fees strike, since this action has accomplished its main goal - demonstrating student anger at the Government. When you pay your fees, pay them without the $15 penalty (if the university won't accept your money without the $15, then contact SAC - we're working on having the penalty waived)

SOME STUDENTS, NOTABLY THE STOP THE STUDENT SURCHARGE COMMITTEE (SSSC), WISH TO CONTINUE TO WITHOLD FEES. IF YOU DON'T FEEL THIS PROTEST SHOULD END, CONTACT SAC (928-4911) OR THE SSSC (964-1174)

Goldwin Smith miscast as oily-moustached villain

"The classic case for union with the U.S." flashes at the front of the soft-cover edition. The U of T press is making sure no one will miss the point in their reprinting of Goldwin Smith's famous classic, Canada and the Canadian Question.

They are providing a real service to Canadian demonology, a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity for purveyors of pap, moralism and mock heroism to take on Goldwin The Dragon. Critics and students can join in the chorus with tulle cues provided by Carl Berger's introduction.

Berger acknowledges the book to be "one of the most effective and challenging critiques of Canada ever penned" but says it was written by a man whose "major blind spot was his incapacity to penetrate into the sentiments and emotions which underlay the sense of Canadian nationality" because he had a deliberate conviction that emotions and sentiment were negligible factors in human affairs in the long run.

In fact, Smith was quite penetrating in his analysis of the rhetoric and emotion of those who criticized him, "Canadian Jingoism or 'Papal Tigers' as they are called":

"But there is a blatant loyalty which it is very easy to praise too highly. If a man makes a violent and offensive demonstration of it against those of whom he accuses of American sympathies, you are apt presently to find him in the employment of some American company, peddling for an American house, or accepting a call to the other side of the line. We have already, in our historical retrospect, had occasion to observe that when by untoward circumstances interest is divorced from sentiment, the loyalty which before had been most fiery in its manifestations can suddenly grow cold. If England ever has occasion to call on her children in Canada for a real sacrifice, she may chance to repeat the experience of King Lear."

We will leave to our readers the selection of appropriate candidates for these barbs with a reminder to emotional patriots, (Energy Minister Greene and others), that he who has not sinned may throw the first stone.

This is one of the most important books in Canadian history and warrants every cliché to that effect. But Smith's popularity in Canadian demonology and his central place in most interpretations of the 1890's is assured by more than sheer ability. In a country where history is written as a melodrama of survival against American absorption, British colonialism and French-Canadian parochialism, Goldwin Smith can play the role of anti-hero parallel to that of the oily-moustached saloon keeper of American westerns. We have also our honest, all-Canadian, sarsaparilla-drinking George Grant who panned him down in a famous review and left us a grandson to write a Lament For A Nation.

Secondly, the traditional interpretation of both Smith and his opponents as poles apart in humanity, sentiment and loyalty is crucial to the normal panegyrics to Laurier, that Galahad of compromise between nationalists, imperialists and continentalists. "Such was the burden", sighs Carl Berger in yet another introduction (Imperialism and Nationalism, 1884-1914: A Conflict in Canadian Thought) "of the two extremes which tore apart the man who searched for the tragical consensus."

Goldwin Smith wrote and polarized opinion at a time when history was demanding basic choices of Canadians.

Discussions of a "new nationality" had been prominent at the time of Confederation, and the young professional patriots of Canada First had plied their sentiments in the 1870's.

But Canadian policy in the 1870's and 1880's was dominated by John A. Macdonald's orientation to concrete nation-building (like the CPR) rather than to nationalist philosophizing.

Then, in the late 80's, the trade crisis, the crisis of federal-provincial, French-English and Protestant-Catholic relations sparked a great debate which had all the appearances of an adolescent identity crisis coming to grips with career choices. Dissatisfaction with Canada's status was prevalent. Almost 50 per cent of the popular vote in the 1891 election had gone to the Liberals despite the omnipresent charges that their policy of unrestricted reciprocity was valled commercial union. John A. Macdonald campaigned in that election as a citizen who was born and who would die British and he died shortly thereafter and was buried in an American-made coffin.

Dissatisfaction with Canada's colonial relation to Britain was particularly prevalent in all the lineups of Canadian politics. "Canada cannot continue long a mere dependency", argued George Grant, leading imperialist, in 1889. "No living organism can continue long in a condition of arrested development". In that context, Goldwin Smith's call for annexation was no more unusual than Canadian nationalist-independantists or French-Canadian quasi-separatists like Mercier. The debate was wide open.

On the surface, Smith's argument has the dry logic of a mechanical determinist and warrants all the whimpers moaned by those who assert he didn't comprehend emotional aspects of Canadian nationality. On the one side are the "primary forces" of "geography, commerce, identity of race, language and institutions, which with the mingling of population and constant intercourse of every kind, acting in ever-increasing intensity, have brought about a general fusion, leaving no barriers standing but the political and fiscal lines".

These primary forces will ultimately prevail over the secondary forces of politics and emotions as Canada moves toward her continental, North-American destiny. This was the Canadian Question.

It he was not in the mainstream of Canadian life he was moved by many of its currents and shared many sentiments with his best and most important critics. It was not for nothing that his most effective critic, George Grant, penned his attack in sorrow rather than anger. For Smith articulated the concerns common to both imperialists and nationalists.

All were committed to an Anglo-Saxon vision of the world which excluded both French-Canada and the non-white world. Canadian integration into either the American or British Empire was designed to improve Anglo-American relations. In this drive for Anglo-Saxon unity, Smith was as devout as his imperialist critics.

On the paternalistic side, all were committed to enhancing the purifying role of the intellectual in Canadian politics. "We need prophets as well as princes" argued Grant and such a prophet Smith might have been. Canadian readers, Grant wrote, "are grateful to such a man for having cast in his lot with Canada, for having done his best to purify journalism and political life and to awaken the people... out of party slavery and intellectual torpor."

In fact, what was central to Smith's critique of Canada was the style of parish-pump politics that were necessary to its maintenance. This hatred of the corruption and narrowness of Canadian politics he also shared with his critics.

To the imperialist Stephen Leacock, the politics of Canada, divorced from larger worlds and patriotisms was "maple leaf politics, by which money may be made

INSTITUTE FOR THE HISTORY AND PHILOSOPHY OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

"Schemata for Social Science" by J.O. Wisdom, Department of Philosophy, York University, at 4:00 p.m., Room 2135, Sidney Smith on Monday, 19 February, Sponsored by the School of Graduate Studies.

and places and profits fell in a golden shower. . ."

It is the great hero of Canadian history, Egerton Ryerson, who wrote: "Our character as a people is gone, and our institutions are hardly worth preserving, if our elections are to be controlled by money thus obtained (graft-WR) and if the policy of thus controlling elections by money so obtained is endorsed by the country. I grieve for the ruin of the character of able, public men and look to the future with painful apprehension. The predominance of the principles of honour, honesty and morality in our government, legislation and business transactions of public men is now the only advantage we have over our American neighbours, and if these go, all is gone."

Was Goldwin Smith really very odd, then when he wrote to a friend: "I am not sure that if you could spend a few years in a Colony you would think the perpetuation of Colonialism worth a great struggle against nature?"

His critic Grant was quite self-righteous in his attack on Smith's supposed appeal to the base and materialist side of people. "Surely the lessons that history teaches are that wealth is not the one thing indispensable to people; that commercial prosperity may be bought at too great a price; that if wealth be gained at the cost of the slightest loss of moral power: it proves not a blessing but a curse. . ."

But Smith was not discussing the selfishness of individuals but the material forces that shaped history. And he had a ready reply for Grant: "That would be a weak nationality indeed which should depend on a Customs line."

Thus, it was not the critical spirit which animated Smith nor even the quality of sentiment which distinguished him from his critics. He differed in geo-political solutions only. It is testimony to the bankruptcy of the Canadian political system that the critical animating spirit of the discussion on Canadian nationality was never taken up.

Laurier, with a style of politics which Creighton compares to a magician pulling rabbits out of his hat, focussed attention on the geographic solutions and, quicker than the eye could see, distorted some of the real issues at hand. Canadian historians have followed in Laurier's footsteps and continue to avoid confronting some of the major issues which Smith articulated.

Smith was wrong in his fundamental premise. He believed that to understand the possibility or impossibility of Canada one must start with a look at the physical map and confront the incongruities of geography. Today increasing attention is being paid to political economy rather than geographic maps. For it was not the prophets but the profits of Canadian nationality which underlay much of Canadian development. At one time, Canada's was a competing economy in North America, competing for the trade of Europe. Today it is an economy largely interlocked with the needs of American corporations.

The categories of Grant or Smith are no longer relevant except for the wringing of genteel hands over cocktails. But the issues they posed are well worth pondering today as we continue to search for a solution of the Canadian Question.

I shot my bolt on Robert Altman last week. This week his best, McCabe and Mrs. Miller, is at St. Mike's Friday and Saturday. Some didn't like it much, others (including me) think it one of the greats.

scutioner, a funny, morbid soufflé starring Stacey Keach. The movie is both empty and infectious. It doesn't deserve a place in film history, but it's nice that it isn't altogether forgotten.

This weekend you can still see The Drama Centre's production of The Intruder by Meeterlink. It is the first in a series of productions originating in a course given at the Centre for the Study of Drama by Professor F. Marker: Theatrical Interpretations. Most of the exercises worked on by students in this compulsory class (all of whom are required to act in at least two plays during the year) have been lengthened into three night productions.

For the week of February 21 to 24, Gerda Grice will direct The Iona of Don Perlimpin and Ballsa in the Garden by Garcia Lorca ("the tragic farce about a marriage between youth and age"), and Debby Nathan will direct Saloma by Oscar Wilde.

With Warren Beatty, Julie Christie and Leonard Cohen's music. $1

With all the art and repertory houses now operating it's hard to come up with a first. Bob Huber and the revue have done it though, with a festival of Italian films produced for RAI, the Italian television network. Fellini's The Clowns was an RAI production, if that's an indication. The festival runs February 13 to 18 at $1.50 per showing. Call 531-9959 for details.

On February 14, and again on February

On Saturday, February 17, the Association of Vietnamese Patriots in Canada is celebrating the Vietnamese Lunar New Year.

The program includes workshops on current topics in Vietnam, songs and dances of the Vietnamese renaissance, a photographic exhibition, and films from the North and from the liberated zone in the South, as well as a buffet dinner.

In addition, there are speakers: Ann Buttrick (a member of the Committee to Free Political Prisoners in South Vietnam), U of T professor Chandler Davis, and York professor Gabriel Kolko.

The program begins at 10 am, at OISE, 252 Bloor St. W. Call 767-5798 for further information.

21, the museum is presenting a programme of NFB films. The shorts are good, very good, but when you see a few in a row, the film board's notorious censorship becomes apparent. The board encourages social comment, but denies social criticism. After a while it's like watching actors perform on a stage with a very low ceiling. Call the ROM for details.

On February 15 the Art Gallery of Ontario is showing underground films of the early sixties. There are only 100 seats, and two showings on a first-come basis. 5:30 and 8 pm.

Starting February 16 the first two ape movies, Planet of the Apes and Son of Planet of the Apes (or something like that) open at the Avenue Cinema, which seems to be having a festival of the best and worst movies of the last few years — witness Nicholas and Alexander this week $2.

On February 20, Bertolucci's first work of renown Before the Revolution plays the Revue. I hope his obvious artistry is enough to carry him through the mountains of hype surrounding his new film.

And on February 22, The good ole 99c Roxy is showing The Travelling Ex-

More shows will follow. Admission is free, the time is 8:30, and the place is the Studio Theatre, 12 Glen Morris.

Also this weekend, Little Me at Hart House.

Continuing for the next few weeks will be Eyes, the Globe Village's latest musical, Battering Ram, another new Canadian work at the Tarragon Theatre, Gebe, yet another work drawing from Canadian history to be seen at Toronto Free Theatre, and finally a classic of modern theatre, Miss Julie, playing at the Colonnade Theatre (see today's review).

Godspell is offering a special performance on February 13, for the deaf community and their friends. Tickets for this evening performance at the Playhouse Theatre will be $3.50, and are available at the Canadian Hearing Society, 60 Bedford Road. Phone 964-9595.

The Firehall Theatre, located at 70 Berkeley Street, will feature The Woman between February 15 and March 3. This is a comedy hit of 1936 written by Clare Booth. It runs Tuesday to Saturday at 8:30, with a $2.00 charge for students between Tuesday and Thursday.

Ryerson Theatre has gone to trouble and expense to convert its theatre into a suitable environment for the rock review, Riot. It plays February 15 to 17, and 22 to 24. Students are $1.00, while their non-student friends pay $1.50.

O'Keefe Centre presents the Royal Winnipeg Ballet's production of The Ecstasy of Rita Joe, February 13th to 17th.

Trinity College presents Shakespeare's The Winter's Tale between February 15 and March 3 at Hart House.

February 18 is the closing date for Theatre Passe Muraille's engaging creation, 1837.

The Irish Arts Theatre residing in West Park School (Bloor and Dundas) present several one-act plays beginning February 20, when Juno and the Pycocok will have finished its run. (See today's review.)

U.C. Playhouse will feature a noon-hour production today, Laugh. Tonight and tomorrow night, you can see Graham Jackson's new play, Moat Children His Age — for fifty cents.

For a lot more, you can see what sounds like a fine production of the Royal Alexandra, Twigs — with veteran actress Sandra Thompson taking the four main roles.

Gane MacLellan is a Canadian singer-songwriter, appearing this week at the Riverboat. He is, I suppose, what the music industry calls Middle of the Road. Some of his recent songs have a nice jazzy feel, emphasized in performance by bass and electric piano, but it's not strong enough to nudge him out of Easy Listening. While his lyrics aren't poetry, there are some good lines. I would think the reason his songs get through for many people is that they deal with easily recognizable experiences and emotions. (I don't share his strong concern with religion, although many do — witness the success of his "Put Your Hand in the Hand" etc.)

I liked his voice, it's flexible and rather husky. He lacks "stage presence" which might bother some people. But, it's a pleasant enough evening if you like your music uncomplicated and you can spare the $3.50.

String Band, a sharp local quartet made up of banjo/guitar, guitar, bass and fiddle, and a lot of good feeling is appearing at Etherea Restaurant in Rochdale tonight and tomorrow. Admission is $1.50 and the first set begins sometime after 10 pm.

You can see Anne Murray too, in concert, at Massey Hall on Sunday, February 18 at 8:30 pm. Maritime fiddler John Allen Cameron is on part of the fare, also.

Santana is appearing on Tuesday, February 20 at Maple Leaf Gardens. Bobby Womack is on the bill as well, with tickets going at $4.40 to $6.60.

John Prine is doing a solo concert at Massey Hall on Thursday, February 15 and with tickets at $3 to $5 it would be a good chance to see what all the fuss is about.

I first heard about John Prine when Kris Kristofferson did a concert in Toronto about a year ago. Kristofferson was enthusiastic about a new writer he had heard and he played some of his songs. We were told that even Bob Dylan had picked up a few of his songs and was planning to record them on his next album. That was quite a bulldip for the 26 year old singer/songwriter from Chicago. His first album was released a few months later (John Prine-WEA) and it was apparent that Prine had a remarkable way with words, and an album full of great songs. Prine first came to Toronto for the Mariposa Folk Festival though and showed that he was in actuality a more Dylanesque type performer — his voice much gruffer than the one on the album and his wit and manner quite pleasing. His performance can't really help but bring back echoes of an early Bob Dylan.

Blues almost get caught on Rams' horns

By BOB PRITCHARD
Basketball Blues evened their season record at 5-5 with an 82-65 victory over the Ryerson Rams Wednesday night in the Ryerson Gym.

Toronto, leading 46-34 at the half, was never really threatened by the Rams, who only came as close as seven points throughout the rest of the game.

Varsity's first encounter with Rams this year was marred by over 50 fouls. Although this number wasn't equalled in Wednesday's game, both teams played disorganized and unnecessarily rough ball.

The referees did not help the situation by ignoring many blatant infractions.

Ryerson used a full court zone press on the Blues throughout most of the game, and it did pressure Toronto into giving up the ball on turnovers, bad passes, and jumps. But, Varsity team members managed to put in enough of their shots once the press was broken to enable them to stay ahead of the Rams.

Although Blues' shooting average of 36 per cent in the second half was not impressive, it was better than Rams' 24 per cent.

Varsity gave up several points on easy lay-ups and tip-ins by shooting the ball too hard off the backboard. At one time, Toronto had a chance for a lay-up, only to miss it and three consecutive rebounds.

On offence, Blues actually appeared to be overconfident. They took their time to work the ball for a good shot, but at times waited too long.

On defence, in the man-to-man situation, Blues were frequently beaten by their Ryerson opponents.

The Rams, while not a very organized team, proved to be quick on their feet. Ryerson's Mike DeFricas, a small guard, put in a solid performance for his team with 18 points.

Frank Cress put in a solid defensive game for Blues. Although Cress isn't hitting the high figures on the score sheet, he has demonstrated good defensive skills in Toronto's recent matches. On Wednesday, he 'stuffed' several Ryerson players. Unfortunately, Blues had some of their own shots checked at the other end of the floor.

Peter Oolup lead the Blues in scoring with his best performance to date, sinking 18 points.

Tip Offs: Blues meet York Yeomen Friday, February 16 at York for what could be the deciding game for a the fourth playoff spot. Blues' last league game is against Ottawa February 17 at 2 pm in the Benson Building. Varsity defeated York 81-74 only two weeks ago, but lost to Ottawa 97-85 the following weekend.

Queen's acts to build complex

Today we complete our analysis of physical education at Queen's University with a look at the athletic facilities, the degree of access allowed to the community and alumni, and the School of Physical Education and the 'progressive' courses taught by it.

Queen's University's new Physical Education Centre, completed in the fall of 1970, cost $6 million to build and was paid for chiefly by the provincial government — 90-95 per cent government funds, according to Men's Intercollegiate Athletic Director A. L. Lenard.

The $6 million structure serves approximately 9,000 students, faculty, and staff as a recreation area, as a practice and playing site for intercollegiate and intramural athletics, and as a teaching facility for degree programs in Physical and Health Education.

The centre was planned to provide flexible, multi-use areas which would meet the needs of as many of the above users as possible, and to provide a building which would be a participation centre for the university. Lenard said that "our user's committee had a basic philosophy that our building was to be as multi-purpose and flexible with as much funds as we had."

Building plan

The second floor of the complex contains three gymnasia, administrative offices, classrooms, and laboratories, as well as seating for the pool and arena.

The main gymnasium (Bartlett Gym) is one of three gyms designed for a variety of sports activities including volleyball, basketball, badminton, and gymnastics. The Bartlett Gym provides bleacher seating accommodation for approximately 2,000 persons.

In addition, the second floor includes two other, smaller gymnasia (Ross and Bews Gyms). Bews Gym provides seating accommodation for approximately 600 persons, and can be divided into two areas by an electric folding door.

The second level also features a gymnastics mezzanine approximately 110 feet by 40 feet to be used for teaching and practising gymnastics. Both the gymnasium and mezzanine floors in the Bartlett Gym have tartan surfaces (similar to the gym surface in Scarborough College's new athletic centre).

The ground floor of the complex includes the pool and arena area, as well as women's and men's dressing rooms and squash and handball observation areas.

The Harty Arena was designed to be used as an ice hockey and skating arena, lacrosse floor, examination and registration hall, and as a site for university functions and convocations. A tartan-covered indoor practice, 220-yard running track is situated at the top of the arena seating area.

The arena provides permanent seating accommodation for approximately 1700 persons, while another 400-500 people can be seated on the running track for hockey games. (A further 1500 seats can be placed on the arena floor for concerts and convocation.) The arena is a self-contained unit and includes its own dressing room and service facilities.

Below the arena floor is parking accommodation for approximately 76 cars, while six (open-air) tennis courts are located on the roof above the arena.

The swimming pool features a movable bulkhead, enabling the facility to be used for competitive swimming at 25 yard or 25 metre distances simultaneously with diving activities. Movement of the bulkhead towards the shallow end of the pool provides a 25-25 yard deep-water area for water polo and synchronized swimming.

The pool is equipped with underwater lights and speakers and a room below the pool deck contains an underwater viewing window with direct communication by speakers both to deck level and underwater. The pool gallery accommodates almost 500 spectators.

Men's intercollegiate Athletic Director Lenard said that because of the area provided for the building an Olympic-size pool was out of the question. The building would have had to be built out onto the street.

However, Lenard added that an Olympic-size pool was not a necessity for the Kingston area. "What are we going to use it for during the other 15 years when we don't want to hold an Olympic capacity event?", he said.

The third floor of the centre contains the running track, an area for gymnastics, the dance studios, and the upper gyms. The dance studio includes ballet bars and mirrors and built-in sound equipment, with provision for dividing the total area into two practice areas.

The lower, or basement floor, contains a projectile range, squash or handball courts, and combatives and weight exercise rooms.

As well as having acoustical treatment, extra ventilation and a bullet stop for a pistol shooting range, the projectile range is equipped with nylon curtain drops for indoor archery and golf.

The combatives room contains a 40 foot x 40 foot resolute mat and padded walls for wrestling, judo and other combative activities. Also located in the lower level are four singles and two doubles squash courts and four paddleball-handball courts with the accompanying observation and spectator gallery.

In addition, the centre also includes service areas — men's and women's locker rooms, a central equipment storage and distribution room, trelning and first aid rooms, athletic team areas and offices for administrative personnel, and media observation areas overlooking the Bartlett Gym, the Ross Gym, the pool and the arena.

Support Staff

The planning of access points to the building enables the costs of operation to remain minimal. The complex operates on two daily shifts (8 am — 4 pm, and 4 pm — midnight), with 10 people per shift — the gymnasium supervisor, janitorial staff (three people per shift), equipment control (four), and control check (recently instituted because of pilferage — two per shift).

A new stadium has also been recently constructed at a cost of $250,000. The former stadium, situated on the main campus, was removed due to the land value. The land was needed for another building. The new stadium is situated on Queen's West Campus.

The George Richardson Stadium seats "10,300 people with room for extension on the student side to 12,360" according to Athletic Director Lenard. "General admission is 4,200, while there is room for 6,200 students", he added.

athletics?

Community Involvement and the School of Physical Education

Lenard admitted that the facilities were not designed to be used by a great many extra-university people. However, he said, "We've extended facilities as much as we could — to student, staff, families and the district alumni. There are community evening programs", he added, "some open free skating, special times for use of the facilities, and special events."

The School of Physical Education, as such, teaches three "progressive" courses, including the Psychology of Sport and Physical Activity, The 'Sociology of Sport and Physical Activity', and the 'Psychology of Coaching'.

The 'Psychology of Sport and Physical Activity' is a lecture, seminar, and reading course surveying the psychological implications of participation in physical activity and sport. Participation is discussed in terms of motivation, attitudes, values, self-esteem, personality, and life style.

'Sociology of Sport and Physical Activity' explores the role of sport and physical activity in light of current sociological theories. Sport and activity are discussed in terms of their place as a part of culture, interaction with various social institutions, the socialization process, social stratification, and social mobility and the 'counter culture'.

The third course — the 'Psychology of Coaching' — investigates the problems of coaching and discusses the typology of coaches; the role of the coach; the player — his personality, his motives, problems; inter-action of coach and player and with the team; influence of third parties on performance. (And, course content is presented in terms of both male and female coaching.)

In the short span of five years, Queen's University managed to effect major changes in its total athletics program. Students, administration, and people professionally involved with physical education at Queen's effected change through co-operation and reasonable compromise. As a result, the "education of the body" is now seen in a more progressive light.

McLaughlin appeals after six days of jail

Tom McLaughlin, who was handcuffed and thrown in jail for six days after being found guilty February 9 of obstructing police, is out on his own recognizance awaiting sentence.

A charge of trespassing, laid as well during last year's Simcoe Hall occupation breakup, was withdrawn.

Two other demonstrators, Randy Reynolds and Mark Goldblatt, charged with the more serious crime of assaulting police, were set free in December after being found guilty on the charges. They received "absolute discharges", a procedure which allows a defendant who is found guilty to emerge without a criminal record or penalty.

McLaughlin, unlike those charged with the more serious offence, conducted his own defense. He tried to argue his case on political grounds and was challenged many times by the judge and the Crown Attorney for violating courtroom procedure and rules of evidence.

The unusually harsh treatment (most first offenders are not imprisoned even after sentence) followed a lecture by Judge M. J. Cloney accusing McLaughlin of "depriving others of their rights", and "wanting to make trouble".

"It's easy for someone who wants to make trouble to abuse our system."

In his judgment, Cloney described various defence witnesses' evidence as "a hodge-podge of nonsense" and "purely make-up evidence". He believed that there was "fabrication", though it didn't amount to perjury.

The defence witnesses, who were participants in last Year's occupation over library access, were "a uniquely unimpressive group", ac-ording to Cloney, who considered police evidence to be reliable. Bob Spencer, then president of SAC, and one of the defence witnesses in the trial, was described by Cloney as "a big operator, laying down the law to the university".

Cloney found that the occupiers were all guilty of trespass and declared the testimony of last year's acting president Jack Sword a waste of time. Although Sword stated he did not intend to have the occupiers arrested as trespassers, calling the police in took the matter out of his hands, Cloney said.

The judgment against McLaughlin was handed down on February 9, the Friday before Reading Week, in a courtroom nearly empty of spectators. It was originally scheduled for the preceding Wednesday, and many supporters turned out then, only to hear the judge remand Demonstrators protested McLaughlin's jailing hours after verdict.

McLaughlin for two days.

After being found guilty, McLaughlin was jailed without the possibility of bail, waiting on preparation of a pre-sentence report.

"That should take about three weeks", said Cloney, although such reports usually take less time to prepare. He claimed he wanted to find out what makes McLaughlin "tick".

Later in the day, 50 supporters demonstrated in front of the Toronto Jail, chanting "Jail Sword, Jail Ross, Free McLaughlin now", referring to last year's acting president and vice-president Robin Ross. They ignored a police warning that "shouting is unconstitutional".

After six days of legal manoeuvring, McLaughlin's lawyer, Paul Copeland, was able to obtain McLaughlin's release by filing an appeal. No date for appeal hearings has been set.

McLaughlin will appear in Old City Hall courtroom 27 at 10 am Tuesday to be sentenced.

OFS calls off fees strike

GUELPH (CUP) — Within three days of U of T SAC's decision to pull out of the fees strike, the Ontario Federation of Students cancelled its province-wide boycott.

Meeting at the University of Guelph February 10 and 11, an OFS general meeting decided to focus instead on promoting a province-wide moratorium on classes March 13 to discuss post-secondary education.

OFS organized a province-wide boycott of second term fee payments to protest the provincial government's imposition of a $100 tuition fee increase and a $200 increase in the student aid loan ceiling. The fee strike began January 1.

The OFS executive report revealed the fee strike failed totally at some institutions and at others, such as Carleton University in Ottawa, students must soon pay their fees or be expelled.

OFS employs only two people full-time, and did not have the human resources to co-ordinate the strike, a spokesperson said. Other executive members could not devote sufficient time to the strike because of classes and work with their own student councils, the report said.

The OFS report found the Ontario government "powerful and inert" and said new tactics and policies are needed to promote student interests. But, the report did not outline these new policies.

Instead of a fee strike, OFS will publish a newspaper on the educational cutbacks and a leaflet outlining the reasons for cancelling the strike.

OFS is requesting that its member student councils organize a one-day moratorium of classes on March 13. Seminars and discussions will then be held on the cutbacks, the recently released Wright commission report on post-secondary education in Ontario (COPSEO) and why the fee strike was not successful.

OFS also plans to use the moratorium to try to gauge student interests and plan for future OFS action.

The February 10 session of the OFS meeting was aborted by a bomb threat. University of Guelph campus police cleared the building where the meeting was being held, and the OFS chairperson asked delegates to reconvene in another building. No one showed up.

The general meeting revealed a deep split between militant and conservative elements in the student organization. The There was strong disagreement about the moratorium and delegates were divided about the COPSEO report. Although most delegates had not read the commission's final report, they agreed that a stand should not be taken on the report itself but rather on legislation which may develop from it.

U of T waives late fee payment penalty

Since SAC "the official student organization", called off the fees strike, the administration has waived the $15 late payment penalty to all students paying their fees by February 28, vice-president Jill Conway said last night.

And, to the "not very large number" of students who have already paid the penalty, the money will be returned, she said.

The action is in response to a SAC request to waive the penalty since it called off the strike February 7. A request made to cancel classes March 13 for a province-wide moratorium to discuss post-secondary education, particularly the recently released Commission on Post-Secondary Education Report, will be similarly favourably received, Conway indicated.

The administration is "delighted that there is such a clear interest in discussing the report," she said. "We have every intention to cooperate."

The Stop the Student Surcharge Committee and the Coalition Against the Cutbacks announced after SAC called off the strike that they intend to continue promoting it to fight the government's education financing policies.

SSSC was reported yesterday to be planning to ask SAC to reverse its stance on the strike at tonight's 7 pm general council meeting at Trinity. Two previous SAC meetings have been disrupted by SSSC in attempts to force SAC to support it.

Inter-faculty department recommended for Food Sci

By MARK BOHNNEN

A dramatic reorganization of the Faculty of Food Sciences featuring the creation of a new inter-faculty department could be approved by the Academic Affairs Committee early next month.

The changes would follow the recommendations of a majority report released last Monday by the Food Sciences Implementation Committee.

The strongly divided committee also released two minority reports each containing recommendations at variance with the other two reports.

The majority report recommends that the present faculty be split up into two newly created departments — the Department of Nutrition and Food Chemistry, and the Department of Bionomics.

Nutrition and Food Chemistry would include such subjects as dietetics, nutritional science and food chemistry. Bionomics would include "home economics" subjects such as housing and community development, textile and clothing, family and child study.

A new dean would be selected for the proposed Faculty of Food Science and Bionomics.

Most of the important changes recommended concern the Department of Nutrition and Food Science.

The report recommends that this department should be responsible for both undergraduate and graduate degree programs.

It adds that the department should be part of the Faculty of Health Sciences if such a faculty is established in the near future.

The department would, for the present, however, be identified with more than one faculty.

In discussing this recommendation, the report suggests that staff positions in the department should include persons identified with the School of Hygiene as well as the Faculty of Medicine, "thus establishing the university department in at least three faculties concurrently." The report continues: "under this arrangement the hudget support provided by each participating faculty would be negotiated by the chairman with the dean of the faculty concerned."

A minority report signed by committee member Martha Leitch, who is also assistant Food Science dean, takes issue with the administrative recommendations of the committee.

Leitch upholds the creation of a new type of department "for inter-disciplinary and inter-faculty graduate pursuits".

However, she states that an administrative structure created for several undergraduate programs "would be unwieldy, awkward, impractical and could place an undue burden on the senior administration of the university.

Food Sciences professor J.J. Moran said that many staff members support the views held in Leitch's report.

Moran is currently heading a four member committee in the faculty which is preparing a rebuttal to the majority report. This report will be submitted to the Academic Affairs Committee.

The report upholds the continuation and strengthening of the present bionomics program by cooperative means. After a "trial period" of five years, the program would be re-examined.

However, another dissenting report, signed by committee member Jacob Seigel of the Faculty of Management Studies, has recommended that "what is required is not additional support, a 'new trial period', a dean with the mandate to develop home economics, but radical surgery".

Getty is acquitted of assaulting police

Despite a last-minute prosecution attempt to reopen the case "to introduce new evidence", Bill Getty was acquitted because of "reasonable doubt" as the final library trial ended Monday.

Getty, who was arrested during last year's Simcoe Hall occupation over free library access, was not identified with sufficient accuracy to allow Judge Charles to convict him of assaulting police, although the judge warned he would have sent Getty to prison if he had convicted him.

He also stated that he considered all occupiers of the Senate Chamber at the time of the arrests guilty of creating disturbance, but no one was charged with this offence.

In delivering the not guilty verdict,

Charles commented that although Detective William Kearns "was honestly trying to give his impression of what took place" when he identified Getty as his attacker, the arresting officer "was in a better position" to see what happened.

This officer, Gus Salamendes, was unable to identify Getty in a courtroom during one of the previous trials, and, since other evidence did not "in any way indicate that the accused did anything to aid and abet" those who allegedly attacked Kearns, Charles therefore acquitted Getty.

Commenting on the occupation itself, Charles said that U of T students "had no right to occupy the building", but "there was no doubt that they were prepared to stay as long as necessary to achieve their demands".

Therefore, he said, "Detective Kearns and other policemen who were there were acting in the execution of their duty", in breaking into the Senate Chamber and forcibly arresting the occupants.

The court was scheduled to convene at 10 am Monday, but the Crown immediately moved to have the case reopened, claiming to have evidence that would further establish Getty's identity as the assailant of a police officer during the arrests.

Crown Attorney William Donaldson claimed to have uncovered two weeks ago the fact that the arresting officer pointed out Getty's picture from "17 or 18 other pictures" at the police station "the day of the arrest", saying "That's the man who assaulted Officer Kearns".

The 30 spectators groaned as the judge told Getty to return the next day for a ruling on the motion, but he agreed to reconvene the trial the same afternoon after Getty objected to "this cheap ploy to delay the trial longer".

Getty pointed out that in his 12 court appearances over the nearly 12 months since his arrest, as well as in the three other library trials, "obviously the question of identity was important", and he questioned why such important evidence would not have been uncovered already.

David Depoe, a member of the Canadian Party of Labour, to which Getty also belongs, pointed out yesterday that a police photographer had testified in an earlier trial that the pictures in question had not been developed until the day following the arrest.

When court reconvened in the afternoon, the judge disallowed the prosecution's motion, saying he feared it would "set a dangerous precedent" for reopening cases in the future.

Commenting on the acquittal, Depoe said "it shows that you can win if you fight these guys hard enough". Depoe was acquitted last year of willful damage over $50, in connection with a demonstration outside U of T's personnel office at 215 Huron St.

Vic to build high-rise project

Charles Street houses may become victims of Vic development.

By PAT REDICAN
A new development on the Victoria College campus may be built without any student input, according to Vic Students' Administrative Council education commissioner Rick Gregory.

Gregory's remarks followed last

Thursday's Board of Regents decision to look at plans for a "residential high-rise" in the area bordered by Sultan, Charles and St. Thomas Streets at the eastern end of the campus.

Although VUSAC asked that no decision be made before October 30 of this year, the board has indicated it will make its decision in six months, during the summer.

This would mean that most students would have no chance to express an opinion on this development, said Gregory.

"When that decision is made the college can't change it." The development is to be a joint venture of the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company and the college.

After a study made of the proposal is accepted, only Manufacturers Life will be able to pull out of the agreement.

"President Goldwin French said that VUSAC could represent the views of the students to the board; we replied that we did not feel qualified to make aesthetic judgements for 2,500 people," Gregory added.

It has not been decided exactly what size or shape the building will be, or what its uses will be, said Gregory. VUSAC has said that it is opposed to "any development" in the area.

Committee approves of Scar credit system

By BENNETT McCARDLE
Students at Scarborough College, starting this summer, will be able to "proceed toward a degree at their own rate of choosing", according to a motion approved by last week's meeting of the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council.

The new credit system, as described in the report the Curriculum and Standards Subcommittee, ends the distinction between full and part-time students at Scarborough.

By allowing a maximum of six credit courses in the winter session and a maximum of two in the summer, the system eliminates the need for special petitioning in order to take an abnormal number of credit courses. Full-time students will be able to take credit courses in the summer, and could complete a three year degree in two years.

The proposal still must be approved by the Governing Council before it can be implemented. It has already received the blessings of Scarborough's curriculum committee and college council, before coming to Academic Affairs.

Provost Don Forster called the plan "a significant innovation."

Scarborough principal Ralph Campbell described it as "logical" and "working toward the convenience of the students". It would cause administrative difficulties, he said, but expansion in part-time studies had been duly accounted for in the arrangements. He noted that the system had been proposed to the Macpherson Committee (which proposed the New Program in 1968) but had not been taken up then.

The credit system will also be recommended for the St. George campus by the New Program Review Committee. Erindale principal J. Tuzo Wilson said there was strong feeling among students and faculty in favour of a credit system at his college, but that it would wait to observe the results of Scarborough's move.

Committee member professor Milton Israel at first described the closeness of Scarborough's academic life to that of the main campus as "more an illusion than a reality" and expressed fears that the proposal would move the college even further away from the St. George academic programme.

Scarborough dean J. D. King replied that Scarborough students and faculty felt that it was no illusion that they were part of the U of T. Israel relented, saying that the relationship was "complicated and difficult to understand" rather than illusory. Professor William Dunphy noted that Scarborough has curricular autonomy as of this year.

Forster said that there would be no loss of income to either the U of T or Scarborough as a result of the new system.

Vice-provost Peter Meinke emphasized that the provincial government would be sympathetic to any financial problems arising from the new proposals if it felt that change had been made "in the right spirit" (i.e., not merely to bring in more grants). Some universities regularly define students taking four credits as "full-time" in order to increase government income, he said.

Forster suggested that the report either be given "academic approval in principle" or referred to the executive committee to consider "resource implications" if the committee foresaw financial trouble.

Debate followed on the maximum numbers of courses allowed for credit. The college had considered setting no maximum at all, said King, but the faculty felt that a maximum "normal load" should not merely be counselled but imposed out of academic responsibility to the student.

City's repeal power challenged

By DOUG HAMILTON
Discussion on repeal of three bylaws governing the controversial Windlass, St. James Town West and Quebec-Gothic developments dominated City council last week.

Despite a warning from city solicitor William Callow that the city could be prosecuted by the developer, council last Friday voted 11-1 to repeal the Quebec-Gothic development. Ten alderman abstained from voting and only mayor David Crombie raised his hand in opposition.

The bylaw, approved in 1971, permitted the erection of four apartment towers and 28 townhouses on Quebec and Gothic Avenues near High Park.

The developers, a consortium of Greenwin and Cadillac, issued a writ against council to halt debate on the repeal motion sponsored by Ward 1 alderman Elizabeth Earys.

Callow cautioned council that because the matter was now before the courts any alderman speaking on the motion may be charged with contempt of court.

The writ states that the city has no power to repeal a bylaw which was passed by another council, and asked for an injunction to prevent discussion of the issue.

Council asked Callow for his opinion on whether the meeting could be continued but the solicitor declined to give his opinion, stating only that each councillor had to decide on his or her own whether to speak on the motion.

The writ will be heard by the Supreme Court of Ontario in about two weeks time.

Ward 7 alderman John Sewell dismissed the developers' action as a "bluff". His Ward 7 colleague and city executive member Karl Jaffary contended that the matter might not be decided by the courts for several years and council would be faced with the question of repealing the bylaw all over again. He urged council to repeal the bylaw immediately.

When a vote on the motion to repeal was called, 10 alderman left the chamber. Voting for repeal were aldermen Jaffary, Sewell, Dorothy Thomas, Earys, Michael Darcy, Goldrick, Anne Johnston, Colin Vaughan, Ying Hope, Dan Heap and Archie Chisholm.

Council also voted last Friday to hold a special meeting to hear deputations on the St. James Town West apartment project.

The Meridian Building Group received permission in 1971 to erect three 30 story high-rise towers at Sherbourne and Wellesley Streets.

Residents in the Sherbourne, Bleecker, Wellesley area have fought the development for over two years.

The special meeting to be held March 2 will consider repeal of the bylaw. However a decision on the St. James Town bylaw may be stalled until the Supreme Court reaches a verdict on the Quebec-Gothic affair.

Caution prevailed at the Buildings and Development Committee last week when a motion by Ward 5 alderman Ying Hope to repeal the Windlass project was defeated 6-5.

The motion was lost when council moderates Reid Scott and Art Eggton, fearing that the city would face prosecution, voted against repeal over the objections of area residents. The Windlass project involves the construction of two high-rise apartment towers and a recreation centre near St. Patrick and McCaul Streets in the historic Grange district.

Speaking on behalf of area residents, lawyer David Greenspan told the committee that the "Grange area might die" if the bylaw permitting the development was not washed by the committee.

He attacked the Windlass Holdings development on the grounds that it contained no provision for low income family housing, rooming houses and workshops for the Chinese community.

If Windlass is allowed to build in the Grange, he asserted, more developments would be attracted to the district, thus destroying the "remaining homes for some 8000 people."

Greenspan called for a "development freeze" in the Grange and the completion of a part two planning study for area.

Greenspan argued that the Grange district was zoned for institutional use by the city, when requested to do so by the University of Toronto.

He asserted that U of T intended to expand to the south and asked City Hall to zone the area accordingly. Although the university since abandoned such plans, the zoning designation is still in force. Greenspan urged the committee to consider changing it in order to preserve the Grange for family housing.

Architect Jack Diamond supported Greenspan's criticism of the Windlass proposal. He said the area is plagued by "instability . . .

induced by the expectation of high-rise."

He suggested if the Windlass project was approved, the Grange could become a "monolithic wall of high-rise."

"At least this (bylaw) has to be withdrawn and at best repealed," he concluded.

St. Patrick Street resident Abrer Steinberg summed up the feeling of Grange residents: "We object to the Windlass bylaw and we would like to see it repealed."

Steinberg charged that area residents were never consulted on bylaw changes, and said the developer used unscrupulous tactics in assembling land.

"The manner of (land) assembly was immoral," he declared. People "were duped" into selling their property "at very low prices."

He added that a city buildings inspector urged him to sell his land to the developer and the city works department issued him with 300 work orders (to repair his property) in order to harass him.

Steinberg complained that property in the Grange "has devalued due to Windlass."

His voice cracking with emotion he concluded, "Do you want to be the council that approved this bylaw? Or do you want to be the council which listened to its citizens?"

The committee, however was in no mood to heed Steinberg or the other residents who protested the project. Ying Hope's motion to repeal the bylaw lost by one vote. The matter will now be dealt with by City Council.

Doesn't serve the public interest

Media give police news veto

Last week's revelation that private radio and television broadcasters and the country's police chiefs have worked out an agreement to give police veto power over what news will go out over the nation's air waves during periods of crisis is just one more sign of this country's unhealthy trend towards police rule.

The so-called "working document", secret until now, surfaced during a Quebec National Assembly committee session last week. The CBC and the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association declined an invitation to take part in drawing up the agreement.

Drafted following the 1970 Quebec crisis, the paper describes the news media as partners with police in the fight against crime. "The police must have the right to make the decision on release of news for publication," it continues.

Once implemented, the censorship blueprint would establish a national committee of broadcasters and police chiefs to determine guidelines for the handling of police and crime news. And, it goes on to suggest punitive measures against media employees who ignore the agreement.

The document advocates "day-to-day planning" between police and news media on how to "co-operate during emergencies".

Canadian Association of Broadcasters executive director T.J. Allard admitted last week that the agreement could cover such things as plane hijackings or trouble at a university.

Although frightening in its casual surrender of the already limited freedom of the press, the document and its contents should come as no surprise to the critical reader. And, it isn't terribly far off current practice at some professional newspapers.

Government and police officials have long encouraged the media to exercise utmost restraint in covering reports of discontent. Let's not exaggerate its importance, is usually the way they phrase it.

During the Quebec crisis, for example, the prime minister publicly suggested that the CBC should muzzle some of its reporters because they weren't portraying things the way he saw them or would prefer to see them.

It isn't a giant step from recognizing the supportive role of the professional media in our society to understanding their willingness to give in to police pressure for greater control of news. Professional media operate to make a profit. And, to ensure they keep on making that profit, they're vitally interested in keeping everything peaceful and tranquil.

They may favour replacing one government with another, but they're smart enough to figure out that advocating major social change would be against their self-interest.

Certainly, it'd be wrong to suggest that the professional media have been operating at cross-purposes with the nation's law enforcers. Should they clash, it's most likely over the supposedly premature release of some petty information or a not-yet-completely-dormant pursuit of the unknown (It sells papers, you know).

Indeed, the media have long been in the forefront of this country's conservative movement. Recently, their paranoia about the supposed crime menace facing this city has only been exceeded by that of the police. And, they had a major role in building the weekend "Cops are Tops" rally, a rally which wrongly sought to idolize Toronto's police force and give it uncritical support.

The police-media document isn't far off the mark when it talks about why it's important to have police and the media co-operate in deciding about what the public will be informed. It recognizes, although not in so many words, that crime is not the product of demented madmen wandering the streets, but a reflection of our society's shortcomings and its failure to satisfy not only the legitimate aspirations of the populace but even the bare necessities of life for so many. The paper acknowledges the media and police's mutual loyalty to "the prevention of crime and the preservation of domestic peace upon which all proper functioning of the community depends".

That sounds amazingly like Judge M.J. Cloney's diatribe against students who occupied Simcoe Hall last year following the academic Senate's refusal to grant unrestricted access to the stacks of the John Roberts Library. He lashed out against students who had taken their dissent beyond the acceptable bounds of passively making their views known, completely ignoring the Senate Library Council's refusal to listen seriously to the students' case.

When Cloney sent defendant Tom McLaughlin off to Don Jail to await sentencing, he was taking what little vengeance he could against someone who had so brazenly violated "the preservation of domestic peace" which to Cloney, the police, the university, and the media was more important than the principle involved.

Don't just talk, do something

The U of T Coalition against the Cutbacks was dismayed to learn that the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS), which includes our own SAC, decided to end the fees strike. The tactic, they claimed, proved to be of minimal effect. However, they failed to criticize their own hall-hearted organization of the strike which was instrumental in its failure. As a compromise gesture, the OFS has called on every educational institute to close down on March 13 in order to hold a moratorium for the purpose of discussing the COPSEPO report. (This report, by the Commission on Post-Secondary Education, used to be the old Wright report).

The report advocates fee increases and proposes other measures which will make free and universal access to postsecondary education an impossibility. SAC wants to limit the activities on March 13 to a discussion of this report when 11,000 students have already indicated in a referendum last fall that they are opposed to fee hikes. Thousands of students have backed this up by withholding their fees, a fact SAC has chosen to ignore by calling off the strike. To make a day of study worthwhile, the major focus should not be merely on discussing the report, but on criticizing government policies which besides the fee increases, include such sinister measures as grant cutbacks, staff and faculty layoffs, and course cuts.

The U of T Coalition Against the Cutbacks will support the day of study if criticism of government policy is made a part of it. Also, we feel that proposals for action against the cutbacks should be presented. Students already know they are getting screwed — the important thing is what are we going to do about it. This is an important question and we will not allow SAC to sweep it under the rug by keeping students' grievances purely at the level of discussion.

Come to the coalition meeting this Thursday, 7-30 in ASSU Sid Smith. Coalition against the Cutbacks

Wants "good prof" to stay

It is advisable that, at all times, while students are learning, no matter what the subject, they should be experiencing clarity in diction, colour in verbal association and in this connection my former English teacher always impressed upon us, that blind memory work does not induce retention of facts which will enable students to make use of said facts at a future date when they are desirous of proving that they have mastered the subject.

Only when enthusiastic students have enthusiastic teachers can the desired and beneficial results be obtained. It requires constant and willing co-operation all round. Strange as it may seem to some people, there are enthusiastic students whose main desire is to work with equally enthusiastic teachers. Therefore, I feel I would like to bring to your notice the unanimous student opinion that this most praiseworthy situation exists in Professor Salaff's math class of which we are, definitely most satisfied students. Now, in connection with math 110 class, we are faced with a situation which gives us to understand that this atmosphere of rapport to which I have made reference is to be terminated and this has brought consternation to the whole class, because professor Stephen Salaff definitely meets all those requirements.

It is said that second thoughts are sometimes better, and, accordingly the entire class would be eternally grateful if it could be possible to nullify the decision already reached and thereby enable professor Stephen Salaff to continue to carry on with his "good work" as in the past.

If I were in Greece, I would not be able to approach the authorities as I am now taking the liberty of doing on behalf of the entire class, but, fortunately, democracy works in Canada!

Therefore, I trust you will pardon me for thus approaching you and will not consider me to be presumptuous.

A number of important points are raised by the University of Toronto Communist Club in their January 31 letter to The Varsity (Left shouldn't attack treaty). They tell us that the Vietnam settlement is a great victory for the Vietnam liberation movement, and that since the Vietnamese support it the Canadian left has no right to criticize it.

With the involvement of Canadian forces in Vietnam now, we have to take a look at this settlement and decide whether or not we should defend the intervention of our government. The Communist Party says yes. The Young Socialists say no.

The arguments put forward by the CP are not new. There have been many similar instances in the past, raising the question of how best to defend liberation struggles around the world.

When the British moved into Vietnam in 1945, they were welcomed by the Vietnamese liberation fighters as "liberators". Then, the British proceeded to return the country to the French colonialists. Should we have supported British entry because the Vietnamese supported it?

When the popular Congolese government of Patrice Lumumba was threatened by secessionist, Belgian stooge Moise Tshombe in 1960, Lumumba invited the United Nations in. The UN force isolated his government, allowed Lumumba to be kidnapped and murdered, then allowed Tshombe to take power. Should we have supported this?

In 1969, the majority of the Northern Irish Catholic population welcomed British troops into their country, thinking that the British would defend them against the Protestants. The British proceeded to turn on the Catholics. Should we have supported that?

No. The most effective defence is based not on the particular negotiating stances of the parties involved, but on basic principles. The anti-war movement in Canada has based its actions on polarizing and defending the right of self-determination for the Vietnamese. It put forward the principled demands of unconditional, immediate withdrawal of all U.S. troops and material from Vietnam, an end to Canada's complicity and no Canadian intervention. These demands put the responsibility for the war where it belonged — on the U.S. and Canadian imperialists. They rallied people around basic, easily-understood concepts that were consistent with Vietnamese rights.

Should we change that now? Young Socialists think not.

Does the treaty guarantee Vietnamese self-determination? The CP say, "The Paris agreements... represent the end of an era in which corrupt, reactionary, puppet governments in Saigon can rest upon the military force of a foreign imperialist power". Later in their letter, they tell us that the signing of the agreement "removes U.S. military support from the Thieu regime." Who do they think they're kidding?

The U.S. is not out of Vietnam. It has built up the Thieu regime into a powerful armed force — now the third largest air force in the world. Thousands of U.S. "civilian technicians" are entering as the troops withdraw. And, the U.S. has its allies, including Canada, on the international supervisory force to back up their policies.

"But, if Thieu attempts to affect a return to 1954 by sabotaging free elections and starting to battle, who will bail him out when, as in the past, his troops desert or refuse to fight?" the CP asks. Who indeed? The U.S. has stated that it will not abandon its friends (or puppets). They will not hesitate to use the troops and bombers stationed in Thailand and off the coast.

The agreements do not, as the CP asserts, mean a victory for the liberation forces. They maintain an unstable situation with the balance of forces in the favor of the Thieu regime. The agreements do not recognize YS questions role of Canadian troops in Vietnam.

Vietnam as one country or bring about the necessary reunification of the country. Rather, the agreement recognizes "that the South Vietnamese people's right to self-determination is sacred, inalienable and shall be respected..." The question of reunification is postponed to future negotiation among the Vietnamese parties. In this sense, the present agreement is not even as good as the 1954 Geneva Accords, which created a temporary division of the country, to be reunited within two years. And the Saigon regime, backed by the U.S. and Canada, is just as likely to sabotage the reunification as they did in 1955.

Nor do the agreements resolve the political situation in the South. Two governments are recognized, with an almost impossible national council to work out disputes that a civil war has been fought over for decades. Elections are promised, as they were in 1954, under international supervision. But, there have been many experiences with elections in South Vietnam, the latest being last year when Thieu ran against Thieu. If the U.S. puppet cannot win the elections by rigging them (with the international force in place to justify him), then the elections will not be held.

The civil war will rage on. As it stands, certain territories, including the major cities and most of the population, is controlled by Thieu. Other sections are controlled by the liberation forces. Huge sections are controlled by Thieu in the daytime and by the PRG-NLF at night. Can anyone seriously expect that the struggle for control of these territories will occur in the spirit of "reconciliation and concord."

No. There is no peace in Vietnam, and the agreements do not take us one step closer to it.

Why, then, did the Vietnamese accept a settlement that is clearly less than total victory. In the past they have rejected such proposals, declaring that they could not accept a settlement that did not resolve the political problems in the South and that removed all forms of imperialist intervention. To find the answer, we must look beyond the immediate military situation to the world political situation.

The settlement was imposed on the Vietnamese. It was imposed on the one hand by the U.S. which devastated all of Indochina with its carpet bombing. The Vietnamese fought U.S. imperialism heroically, and were able to score major victories in the field. But, their victory was not total. What tipped the scale and allowed Nixon to get away with his settlement was the betrayal of the Soviet Union and China.

Did the Soviet Union, as the CP asserts, provide adequate military aid to the Vietnamese? A look at the pictures of bombed-out Hanoi and Haiphong answers the question. Soviet aid to North Vietnam is about one-tenth of what it gives to capitalist Egypt. China, which seems unable to provide weaponry to the Vietnamese, has come up with $300 million worth for the reactionary Pakistani government. Moscow has sent Egypt S-band SAM-2 (surface to air) missiles, as well as the advanced SAM-3 and SAM-6. Only the most primitive SAM-2 C-band missiles have been sent to the Vietnamese.

Moreover, in inviting Nixon to negotiate arms limitations and trade accords in Moscow, at the same time as the U.S. was mining the North Vietnamese harbors and bombing the dikes, the Soviet bureaucrats gave U.S. imperialism a green light for further aggression. They were serving notice that they cared more for diplomatic deals than they did for the Vietnamese revolution.

This is fully in accord with Stalinist foreign policy, which puts the quest for "peaceful coexistence" above the advance of world revolution. As Vietnam and a host of previous examples show, such a policy does not promote peace, but simply gives the aggressor the go-ahead for more aggression. Imperialism can be stopped only by firmly standing up to it.

The Soviet Union and China never did this. They did not provide adequate military aid.

They did not declare, as the Soviet Union did for Cuba and Eastern Europe, that North Vietnam was inviolable territory, that an attack on North Vietnam would constitute an attack on the Soviet Union. They did not form a united front of workers states in defence of the Vietnamese (which Cuba repeatedly called for). They did not call for and build a worldwide antiwar movement.

It comes as no surprise that the Communist Party, which is famous for its craven support of Soviet policy, from Czechoslovakia to Latin America, should be found in the camp of those who are supporting Nixon's treaty. It logically follows that they should be supporting Canadian intervention in Vietnam, violating the most basic principle of socialism — opposition to foreign deployment of the forces of our own country. Now the CP is consciously disarming world opinion and promoting illusions in the ranks of the anti-war movement. Their advice to keep a "watchful eye" on the Canadian forces would be laughable if it was not such blatant treachery.

The Vietnamese are having a settlement imposed on them. They may well be forced to accept it because of the tremendous pressures placed upon them, both by U.S. imperialism and their erstwhile allies in Moscow and Peking. But, the left in Canada and the antiwar movement is under no such pressure. We have the continued responsibility to defend the basic rights of the Vietnamese.

In desperately seeking to defend their indefensible position, the CP calls anyone who disagrees with them "anti-Communist" and "unconscious allies of reaction". Yet, it is the CP, not those on the left like the Young Socialists who oppose the treaty, who now are supporting Canadian intervention.

In this light, it might be instructive to remind the U of T Communist Club of the attitude Lenin took to the German Social Democratic Party who voted for the treaty which Lenin's Soviet regime had been forced to sign with Germany in 1918:

"You swine. We are objectively compelled to negotiate in order not to be annihilated, but as for you — you are politically free to vote for or against, and your vote implies whether or not you place confidence in your own bourgeoisie."

In accord with our basic principled position on the Indochina war, the Young Socialists will continue to participate in the Canadian anti-war movement, which today must be clear and unequivocal in its opposition to any and all Canadian intervention. All those who seriously oppose the war should be with us.

SAC HAS ENDED THE FEES STRIKE.

The fees strike accomplished what it was meant to accomplish. Twenty thousand students across Ontario gave another very strong indication that we are not prepared to sit still while the Government moves to decrease accessibility to the University system. We have demonstrated our concern.

Now we must move into another phase — examining what the Government should be doing, and trying to initiate the changes we want to see. The final report of the Commission on Post Secondary Education ("Wright Report"), which was presented to the Davis Government early in February, suggests some of the directions the Government could go. It's time for us to devote our attention to these new directions.

For these reasons, SAC has called an end to the fees strike, in co-operation with the rest of the Universities of Ontario and the Ontario Federation of Students, and a day of study of the COPSEO report has been called for March 13.

The University has responded by clarifying the situation with regard to the $15 late payment penalty:

YOU CAN AVOID THE LATE PENALTY BETWEEN NOW AND FEB. 28

The penalties have been waived for fee payments received on or before February 28. If you've already paid the late fee penalty, refund cheques can be collected at 215 Huron Street on or after March 2.

Victoria College, St. Michael's College, and Trinity College have agreed to follow the same policy.

Every university in Ontario is planning for a day-long study session on the Commission's report, on TUESDAY, MARCH 13. Call SAC or your college or faculty student council if you can help us organize or publicize the sessions at U of T.

Council member attacks health fee increase

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Governing Council student member Brian Morgan has denounced the necessity of the recent increase, from $10 to $12, in the student health fee.

"The usual edict has again been applied," he said. "When in trouble, increase the fees, increase the pressure on students". This, he said, is "taking the easy way out."

Morgan claimed that the increase is "a covert way of raising the whole fee, for students, of coming to university."

The increase, approved by the Governing Council on the recommendation of the Internal Affairs Committee, will be collected as part of registration fees next September.

Morgan derided the action of the Internal Affairs committee in proposing raising the fee before a detailed and searching review of the service, a review that might conclude that the service is not that important to students and therefore that the increase is not justified.

Internal Affairs Committee chairman Paul Cadario pointed out that the committee, after its current review of discipline, will be reviewing the whole philosophy of services on campus. "We will be considering who the services are for, how much they are costing, whether subsidies are involved, and so on," he said.

The director of the service, Dr. George Wodehouse, claims that the increase is necessary because the service faces a "loss of $58,000 — more likely to be $65,000 or $70,000" in its income.

The Governing Councils' budget committee last year overestimated the service's income for this year "by $25,000 or $35,000". At most, Wodehouse said, the service will receive $225,000 and not the $250,000 suggested by the committee.

The budget committee, on which Cadario sits, has as well, reduced the university subsidy to the service from $73,000 to $40,000, a reduction of $33,000. This reduction "is the crunch," Wodehouse said, emphasizing at the same time that the service is not being treated any differently in the university's general austerity plan than any other department or service.

The Advisory Bureau is facing a budget cut of 22 per cent, in contrast to the Health Service's 45 per cent grant cut.

The service has three sources of revenue: student health fees, the university subsidy, and monies recovered from OHIP.

It has been explicitly told by the budget committee that its grant cannot be exceeded.

The amount the service has been recovering from OHIP has been increasing. It has gone, Wodehouse said, from almost nothing five years ago to, in 1973, a projected $200,000.

Yet the service cannot collect for all its expenses from OHIP. Many students on reaching 21 forget to apply to OHIP for coverage or deliberately decide not to apply. Students from the United States and other foreign countries are not covered by OHIP.

"The money will have to be made up some way if we are to maintain our services at their present level. The only way seems to be a raise in fees," Wodehouse said. He noted that the fee had been $10 since 1963.

Wodehouse said that health costs to students at other universities range from one dollar — "with service at that level" — to $20. "So the U of T is around the median."

"If the students decide, in their wisdom, that the service is not worth the extra two dollars, then we can reduce our services. The whole service can be abolished. There were, however, 11,000 people who used the service last year — half of the registered students on the downtown campus. The service is not unused."

Cadario said that Internal Affairs "had approved the increase, noting that the Governing Council had already approved a reduction in the university grant."

In fact, Cadario's committee recommended the fee rise before the budget committee had cut the grant, the ostensible reasons for the fee hike. The executive committee of the Governing Council was forced to instruct Internal Affairs to wait until the budget cut had been approved.

Morgan claimed that most of the student body is paying double for its health services since it pays OHIP charges and the student fee.

He claimed as well that students who do have OHIP are paying through the fee for those who have come from outside the province to attend the university and who do not have OHIP.

Wodehouse said that 80 per cent of the student body has OHIP coverage. Of this, one quarter will not or cannot produce the information the service needs to collect from the government.

He noted that there is supposed to be liaison across the country in health coverage. Technically a student from British Columbia should have treatment provided here covered by his provincial health plan.

But there is a variation in services. The benefits provided by Ontario are not provided for by other provincial systems (especially by Quebec) and the service cannot collect for these benefits.

Cadario said that the Internal Affairs Committee is recommending that the administration collect OHIP numbers at registration.

"This would prompt some students to obtain their numbers and aid collection", he said. "These numbers would also have value for the students themselves as a source of identification in the event of an accident."

There are a number of people covered by OHIP who do provide the necessary information but for whom the service does not collect. This is primarily because the confidentiality of the service rendered might be revealed.

OHIP used to send out random audit letters asking if services being collected for had indeed been rendered. In this way a parent might find out about a daughter's abortion or an offspring's psychiatric treatment.

The practice of audit letters has ended. But Wodehouse has been unable, he said, to receive written confirmation that it will not return. He noted that audit letters have been discontinued in the past and have returned.

"The number of these cases, anyway, is small," Wodehouse said.

Morgan charged that the health service's infirmary is a luxury. "It is not used; therefore it is not needed. Its phasing out would represent a significant saving."

Wodehouse admitted that the service cannot recover money from OHIP for the infirmary. "The building is inadequate; it does not meet the standards OHIP has set. We are stuck with this situation until we obtain a proper building," which he said is "not in the foreseeable future."

He defended the infirmary's value, however, to "students living away from home, to emotional upsets, to students discharged early from the hospital, to people with athletic injuries released from the hospital the day of an operation; all these are housed here."

Wodehouse pointed out that the infirmary, which is staffed 24 hours a day, provides medical advice and assistance after the hours of the health service and on weekends.

Cadario said that the matter of the infirmary had been discussed at the meeting of the Internal Affairs Committee dealing with the fees increase. "It was noted that occupancy is low at certain times of year but also that occupancy is high — the place is full — at other times."

"The infirmary is an area we should look at more closely — but the committee was not ready to consider the matter at the time."

Morgan attacked the psychiatric service health service provides as the main cause of the deficit.

Wodehouse defended it — "a damned good service". Its team includes a psychiatrist, two assistants, a psychologist and a social worker. It provides same day service as well as continuing therapy.

"Students with limited academic careers cannot afford to fiddle around" if they do have mental problems, he said, stressing the service's importance.

The fees increase will raise approximately $45,000 for the service, Wodehouse said. Yet there is still another $25,000 to pick up. "This will have to be done through internal organization and economy."

If the fee had not been increased, a reduction in staff would have been necessary.

"Yet this would have been moving in a vicious circle", Wodehouse said.

Ottawa is delaying guaranteed income: Ross

By FERNANDO TRAFICANTE the Canadian Council on Social Development, accused the government of using delaying tactics in implementing the guaranteed annual income. Ross presented a paper to the Ontario Anti-Poverty Conference held at the Lord Simcoe Hotel over the weekend.

He said that the government's "income experiments are another form of royal commission" to delay any action.

Ross continued: "the problem is squishing the income distribution and not pulling some figure out of a hat" to represent an adequate guaranteed income. He also said that money is not enough to alleviate poverty and what is required are services such as improved health care and legal aid.

The Anti-Poverty Conference was held to organize the various groups in the province who work with poor people in areas such as legal aid, welfare rights groups, Indian groups and labour organizations.

York University, social welfare professor Wilson Head called for "a re-distribution of income". He stated "The guaranteed annual income is only one short step but by no means the only answer", to poverty.

A Toronto group, the Toronto Caucus of Labour Committees, was prevented from presenting a paper to the conference by the steering committee. The steering committee stated the paper was "a political document and not a valid part of the conference".

The Toronto Caucus was later removed from the conference by the vote of a majority of the members. Conference chairman Mike Carson said that they were "trying to inject party politics into the conference." Karl Stevens, a spokesman for the International Caucus of Labour Committees, claimed steering committee chairman Normand Brody "is following the orders of the Communist Party in the United States to expel our members from the conference."

Psychotherapist blames value erosion for our dehumanization

By GRETCHEN ROEDDE

The erosion of traditional values has resulted in our society's dehumanized attitudes to sex, drug-taking, alcoholism, and violence according to Dr. Viktor Frankl.

Frankl, an Austrian psychiatrist who survived three years at the Nazi concentration camp, Auschwitz, was speaking to a capacity crowd of 3,000 at Massey Hall last week in a Catholic Youth Corps-sponsored lecture.

President of the Austrian Society for Psychotherapy and author of Man's Search for Meaning, Frankl discussed the sense of meaninglessness and frustration, the "universal existential vacuum," which he said expresses itself in a "capitalist and communist country alike", and particularly affects academic youth.

"Education reinforces this sense of vacuum with a reductivist concept of man, expressed by such books as Desmond Morris' The Naked Ape, and a behaviourist philosophy of life.

He later explained that he considered the reductivist analysis a "nothing-but" view — man is "nothing but a naked ape." Values and meanings are considered "nothing but reaction formations and defence mechanisms. Enthusiasm and conscience are undermined."

Opposed to this approach, Frankl stressed that man's basic human motivation is a "will to meaning", and survival is dependent on a sense of meaning derived from our courage and patience, rather than from a drug-induced subjective experience which "often only steers an individual away from the unique tasks which each person has to perform in one's life."

"Meaning cannot be attributed, but must be discovered by oneself through personal dedication to one's goals," he explained. "Our conscience is ultimately our guide to the unique meanings lying dormant and hidden in the chain of situations which is our life.

"It is our conscience which makes our suffering meaningful, and it is this great quality to turn our tragedy into triumph which is an essential feature of our humanness."

Asked his opinion of encounter groups for emotional therapy, Frankl replied he felt they are "basically a vulgarization of the spirit of encounter. It is group strength of spirit and love being commercialized".

PRG has won "tactical victory", says Kolko

By GREG McMASTER

The recent Vietnam cease-fire agreement represents "a tactical victory of self-determination but not a final victory" for the Vietnamese, according to York University professor Gabriel Kolko.

He was speaking in one of a series of seminars presented last Saturday by the Association of Vietnamese Patriots in Canada as a celebration of the ceasefire, which they described as "a victory in that it means complete withdrawal of all U.S. forces and allies from Vietnam".

Despite last year's "regrettable" overtures by the U.S.S.R. and China to the U.S., and the "reticence by both countries" to fully support Vietnam, "the NLF (National Liberation Front) is the most powerful national political organization in South Vietnam today, said Kolko, and "the balance of forces has moved very significantly against the U.S. and their puppet regime."

"People who say the war is over are unrealistically deluding themselves, said Kolko, pointing out that "the PRG (Provisional Revolutionary Government) has the overwhelming support of the population" against the Thieu regime, of whom "the essential characteristic is gangsterism". He added that "the Thieu army is largely finished as a fighting force", even though the regime cannot be dismissed lightly, due to large arms shipments from the United States, and American pressure on the South Vietnamese and China "to exercise restraint" in their support.

Evidence that resumption of direct U.S. reinvolvement is unlikely includes recent opposition to the war by the Wall Street Journal, and the world outrage at the latest bombing raids, which came "for the first time from people who share in managing the world economy, said Kolko.

Debate raged throughout the conference on the nature of the ceasefire, and on the role of Canadian forces in Vietnam.

Speakers from the Patriots Association were optimistic about the outcome of "free and democratic elections under international supervision", but this was challenged by speakers who recalled that such elections were promised in the 1954 agreement as well.

One participant, while conceding the increasingly favourable balance of forces, described the situation as one of "dual government which perhaps you'll agree can't go on. The liberation forces have not achieved the overthrow of the Thieu regime and the establishment of a socialist, united Vietnam".

Patriots member Nguyen Phu referred to a recent statement from North Vietnamese premier Pham Van Dong, who said the liberation forces "must renew the struggle, to complete the revolutionary work of the Vietnamese people".

Nguyen An said that the struggle's "next stage is to overthrow the puppet regime". He pointed out that "repression is essential for the puppet regime's survival, and this will only arouse the people's anger".

The NLF would attack the "puppet regime" if repression continues, and "meanwhile, the movement in the free areas will increase tenfold", he said.

Another speaker said "the question now is whether the revolutionary forces will honour the agreement religiously and demobilize", when the aim of the Thieu regime is "to wipe them out." This speaker was repeatedly shouted down by the Vietnamese and by members of the Communist Party of Canada.

Phu accused president Thieu of "ordering many actions aimed at sabotaging implementation of the agreement", and of "harrasing the NLF and North Vietnamese as aliens". Kolko suggested the best way to prevent ceasefire violations was to "cut off all aid to Thieu."

Some speakers stressed that Canadians should support the use of "our" troops to implement the agreement, but others disagreed. One suggested that "insufficient support forced the Vietnamese to make concessions they otherwise wouldn't have made, and we must oppose imperialist intervention in any form."

Kolko acknowledged that "Canada is an ally of the U.S., that's why it was chosen to supervise the ceasefire. Everything Canada has done in the past has been coordinated with the U.S.," including the recent recognition of North Vietnam, which Kolko described as "part of the U.S. two Vietnams policy".

Anne Buttrick of the Committee to Free South Vietnamese Political Prisoners spoke on the need to build a movement in the prisoners' defence. She said that "mass arrests and killing of civilian prisoners have been carried out since April by Thieu, to ensure his success in the upcoming elections, which Canada will help supervise through the International Control Commission".

One speaker called for a "visible consistent movement to defend Vietnamese prisoners, to defend the Vietnamese revolution against the counter-revolutionary forces of Thieu and the U.S. imperialists who back them."

A questioner asked whether prisoners can be safeguarded "under circumstances less than the achievement of a single government by the PRG", and was told that the PRG and Thieu have agreed in the ceasefire to "try to do their utmost" to reach agreements on political prisoners.

A speaker questioned the role of Canadian troops in enforcing a ceasefire "in which Thieu can imprison thousands of NLF cadre," but was answered by a Vietnamese: "Canadian troops are invited".

The Varsity—Bob Gauthier

Waterloo vague on sports philosophy

"Broad participation, of course, is the goal and gauge of a successful program — availability of adequate facilities the key", according to the University of Waterloo document "The Philosophy of the Department of Athletics" (February 1972).

Although the priorities of the athletic program at Waterloo are not clearly defined (as are those already mentioned earlier this month concerning Queen's University — that is, the participant first and the spectator second), the Waterloo program attempts to appeal to everyone (or, as the document states, all "interest groups").

"We are attempting to run a broad athletic program relating to the needs of the university community",

Waterloo Director of Athletics Carl Totzke told The Varsity. "We have a role to fill in the development of sport in general. We should relate to this development, and should make facilities subject to community use."

Totzke added "We don't overdo three or four major sports. We have a strong intramural program at several levels. We want a strong competitive, strong recreational, strong instructional program. Intramurals has enjoyed increased budgets in the past three to four years."

As a result, what the athletics department states in words is actually impossible to analyze in a more realistic context. The document fails to define priorities, and suffers as a result.

Starting from the assumption that one believes athletics is primarily an individual, educational experience integrated with a participation experience, the 10-page Waterloo document contains "some of the good, and some of the bad", carefully straddling the fence.

One the one hand, discussing the intramural program, the paper states, "Concern should be registered of the possibility of spreading the available energies and resources too thinly".

On the other hand, the document's opening section asserts, "The apparent needs of the students can be met only by a multi-faceted athletic program which recognizes the requirements of all of its participants. It must fill the needs of those seeking basic skill instruction and those who pursue excellence in sport. It must satisfy the player seeking leisure involvement through physical activity, as well as the athlete interested in competitive sports at various levels." That is, the program seeks to serve all of the students all of the time.

Role of spectator

The spectator also fits strongly into Waterloo's philosophy of athletics.

In fact, one of the aims of the Department of Athletics is "to present a program which is an enjoyable experience for all participants and which is a unifying and integrating focus contributing to the school spirit of the general student body."

Elsewhere in the paper, it is stated that, "The value of the contests and displays as an interesting spectacle for the student body, the alumni, and the community at large must be emphasized". But the very next sentence continues "Noting the suggested dangers of 'Spectatorism' as opposed to active participation, the skill and proficiency of the representative teams can be a model of excellence for the university as well as the high school and grad school students of the community."

When asked to comment about whether spectator sports are forms of escape from participation or attacking various social problems, Totzke said that he believed spectator sports had some value. "I think it's valid", he said.

"We always used to de-emphasize spectators. Now, we want to make the games attractive, but not in a show business way."

However, Totzke feels that spectator participation is all right "if we can enhance our product and get crowd response and make a few more bucks."

So, what is it to be, the spectator or participant first, and in what order? Or is the Waterloo administration attempting to spread its program — to use its own words — "too thinly"?

Intercollegiate philosophy

Consistent to the remainder of the document, the section dealing with the intercollegiate program is also highly general. Apparently, the intercollegiate program "appeals to the athlete aspiring to excellence, although some of its values and contributions are realized by a much broader group than just the participants" (i.e. the spectators too).

A balance is required in a student's life, according to the paper, but there is no definitive statement on this 'balance'. It merely remarks, "While it is recognized that the program is a most important adjunct to the academic diet of the student, training intensity and scheduling commitments must be kept in proper perspective so as not to jeopardize the student's normal academic progress" (whatever that may be).

With the proper coaching and leadership, Waterloo's administration feels that qualities accruing to the individual from the program can be "development of sportsmanship, courage, resourcefulness, emotional control, respect for authority(?), stability, and sacrifice." All these 'qualities' are presumed to represent 'good' or positive values for an individual in our society.

Intramural philosophy

The stated purpose and objectives of the intramural program, divided into four classifications — competitive, instructional, recreational, club — are considerably more valuable to the participant.

"We think the best amateur sport in Canada should be in the universities and we promote clubs for participation after university," Totzke said.

The program is designed to, among other objectives, "enable an individual to learn a particular activity and to participate in activities that may carry over into later life", "encourage an individual to enhance his level of personal health and fitness" and "enable an individual to understand and appreciate the values inherent in sport".

As with the intercollegiate program, the goals of the intramural program are extremely general: "Intramurals should span the spectrum of proficiency and provide an area for students at all levels of ability and interests to compete with their peers."

The intramural program also provides an added bonus in that "the onus of enthusiasts for the development of new programs... should be on the students."

(In intercollegiate athletics, the university is already committed to the OUAA and a given number of sports.) Given these restrictions, the intercollegiate program does not allow for student participation in the developmental process of the program.)

In fact, the instructional/recreational program is perhaps the most worthwhile for the athletic department to follow. The document says, "this aspect of the program should emphasize individual sports with carry-over value" and "... should offer exposure to a broad calendar of activities."

Winning, recruiting, financing

Where the document finally becomes more concrete and touches important areas, however, is with respect to the philosophies of "winning", "recruiting", "developing professional athletes", and "financing".

Waterloo's athletics department believes that "as long as rules are being observed... it should be the intention of the participants to direct their efforts toward winning." However, "it is most important that something of value should accrue from 'the game' not just 'the result'... Learning to accept defeat with grace is a valuable lesson."

The University of Waterloo is opposed to recruiting. "Acceptable contact with prospective students (athletes) would be in the nature of familiarization and exposure to what the U of W has to offer both in academic and athletic programs..." Athletic scholarships "will not be given." Waterloo feels that "a continued honest approach is bound to bring favourable results if we are offering quality."

However, Totzke admitted that "recruiting is being forced on us from the national Directorate of Fitness and Amateur Sport. Personally, I'm very much opposed to it," he added.

Furthermore, while Waterloo realizes that "our programs are not geared toward developing professional athletes", it does accept the fact that "world class and Olympic level athletes can, and have, emerged from our programs, and others may use this route to arrive at a professional athletic career."

Totzke thinks the universities should help Olympic-class athletes. "The government is looking all around to help its Olympic development plans. The universities have said we will help. The document (on philosophy) is flexible. We could change our ideas of recruiting or training for the government. It's job training, in effect, and why couldn't we do it in hockey for instance? However, he added that this was a "pretty remote possibility."

With regard to financing, Waterloo proposes that the intramural and intercollegiate athletic programs are fundamental and integral components of the educational structure of the university" and "should be financially supported in a manner similar to any other function or program which is a basic component of the university educational structure."

In summary, the document emphasizes that "the department must recognize the leadership role it can play in the development of athletics in the community with the provision of premium facilities for regional and district play-offs, the offering of coaching clinics and workshops, field days, invitational competitions and the like, provided that internal needs are not ignored by so doing."

Also, "staff and workers should be inventive, prospective and leaders (not only followers) in the dissemination of knowledge and experimental data relative to their sphere of interest."

The document fails to provide priorities, attempting instead to cover all areas equally. While the paper represents the goals of the athletic department, the outcome might be different in reality. (We have not been able to study the program over time and evaluate it.)

However, even though an athletic program might depend upon the "integrity" of the administrative and coaching staff, there is at least a recent document at the University of Waterloo which provides for some direction and something to appeal to if the goals of the program were changed.

Organizational Structure

The overall departmental structure of athletics and physical education at the University of Waterloo is separated to a greater degree than the organizational item existing at Queen's University.

Whereas at Queen's the academic and athletic areas of physical education have attempted to join together under a common philosophy and common goals, Waterloo the pattern is somewhat separate, even within athletics (between intramural and intercollegiate programs).

Waterloo's Faculty of the School of Kinetics and Leisure Studies is recognized as a legitimate body by the university administration, equal to other faculties with respect to hiring, firing, staff salaries (with some minor variations), etc. (Again, this structure is similar to that at Queen's.)

Three distinct departments exist in the faculty — recreation and leisure, kinesiology, and athletics. Both the departments of recreation and leisure, and kinesiology have academic status, while the athletics department is non-academic."

Director of Athletics Totzke said that the staff in the department of athletics does "teach, and service teaching salaries are all funded through the (intercollegiate) athletic fee." Totzke added, "We have argued that the university should pick up all salaries and they rejected it, but I don't know why."

Department of athletics staff were considered faculty until one year ago, but they now have staff rank. This means "we don't get tenure, are possibly not eligible for sabbaticals, and are on an 11-month appointment versus an eight-month appointment for faculty", he said.

Within the department of athletics itself, the Athletics Advisory Board is "responsible for determining the policies governing the conduct of the Athletic Program of the University of Waterloo, with power of delegation in all matters" (Constitution of the Athletic Advisory Board, January, 1971).

Prior to the organization of the Athletic Advisory Board, power in the department of athletics had rested mainly with the dean of the school and the director of men's athletics. Totzke said, "The constitution was accepted by the university, but it doesn't say who the advisory board is responsible to." He added, "Things have been going well and until you get a problem you don't really change it (the structure)."

Totzke said that the purpose of the board is, in theory, to "work out from the teams their needs, which come from the intercollegiate council. We collate all budgets and then go to the advisory board and from there to the dean and on to the President's Advisory Council on Athletics (for budget approval)."

Unlike Queen's, the Waterloo structure has more visible control at the top administrative level, rather than within the department of athletics itself.

Like the Queen's University Council on Athletics, Waterloo's Athletic Advisory Board is representative of the university community. However, there the similarity ends.

Waterloo's AAB consists of seven ex-officio members, and several appointed members. Only a maximum of seven of these appointed members can, at the present time, be selected from among the student body.

The structure, although not student-controlled, reflects in part the financial situation of athletics at Waterloo. While students pay a $20 per year fee for intercollegiate athletics, the university administration has taken over the funding for all intramural athletics at a rate of eight dollars per student (for 1972-73), and $18,500 for rentals (i.e. ice, stadium, et cetera).

However, Totzke noted, "There will be changes made to provide a student majority... We have accepted that philosophy." Totzke added that there will be more members appointed by the intercollegiate and intramural councils, but said, "We want a large senior group to remain to retain a continuity of the program — a group that knows what's happened in the past so that we don't have to react to passing fancies."

Totzke said that the experience at the University of British Columbia (where athletics was completely controlled by the student body) revealed that teams were dropping out of leagues and various sports. He commented, "It's difficult to build a respectable team only to drop it and then try to pick it up again." (Totzke apparently feels that Waterloo should not drop competitive, intercollegiate athletics.)

He said, "We rejected student control (athletes plus non-athletes), although we are not opposed to student majorities on any committee. They (students) wanted 75-80 per cent students, and 20 per cent 'other' because they claimed that students pay that part of the money. Our objection to it was because there was no other reason given other than the fact that the students paid the money."

"Students weren't critical of the program and didn't have long lists of grievances. The people criticizing (the move for student control) were student politicians interested in the idea of control. They're almost revolutionaries for revolution's sake."

According to the Athletic Advisory Board constitution, the board "shall have overall responsibility for formulating, developing, and operating the athletic program and related policies and budgets."

The board also "received(s) from the Department of Athletics the annual operating budget estimating and showing sources or means of revenue and items of expenditures." The board is then responsible for detailing budgetary estimates and recommending a total budget showing income and expenditures to the Committee on Ancillary Enterprises.

Furthermore, the AAB "may recommend to the President... rules and regulations for the good order and conduct of athletic events, both on and off campus".

At present, the structure of the AAB consists of an Executive Committee, and four Standing Councils — men's and women's intramural athletic councils, and men's and women's intercollegiate athletic councils.

The Executive Committee (consisting of three members) calls regular meetings of the board and structures the agenda of these meetings, acts on behalf of the board where immediate decisions are necessary, and, is responsible for organizing membership appointees.

According to the AAB constitution, the men's and women's intercollegiate councils "serve as advisory bodies to the Assistant Directors of Athletics and to the Athletic Advisory Board on the policies and programs concerning intercollegiate athletics. The Councils... report regularly to the Board and present recommendations for its consideration and approval."

The membership of each of the Intercollegiate Councils consists of the Assistant Director of Athletics and at least one student representative from each of the intercollegiate activities", with a student for president.

Also, according to the AAB constitution the Intramural Athletic Councils (men's and women's) "direct the operation of the Intramural Program, act as an Advisory Board to the Intramural Director, promote the Intramural Program, and obtain approval of the AAB for any significant policy changes."

Similar to the Intercollegiate Councils' membership, each intramural council consists of the intramural director (men's and women's), and one student representative from each of the intramural units. The president of each of these councils is also a student.

Ontario's health system inefficient: MPP

Jan Duzsza assails Ontario's inadequate health system.

By GRETCHEN ROEDDE
Inefficiency, mismanagement and overspending caused by the present organization of provincial health care was criticized by NDP health critic Dr. Jan Duzsza last Thursday.

Duzsza, MPP for Parkdale, told about 50 people at a Holy Trinity Church Noon on the Square meeting that he recommended a preventative, interdisciplinary and community oriented approach to medicine.

Originator of the power-sharing concept of administration involving staff and patients at Queen Street Mental Health Centre, Duzsza said there is a need to combine professional expertise with patient and community participation.

"There is an old saying that war is too serious to be left to generals, and I think health is too serious to be left entirely to doctors. We currently train diabetics in self-diagnosis and treatment. This social orientation can be extended."

Duzsza agreed with a Hastings Report on Community Health Centres recommendation that district health councils would create interaction between the community and the central health administration.

"However elected boards for community health centres should be involved in decision-making, or we will have only token citizen participation."

A member of the audience asked if a magistrate can legally direct someone to a psychiatric hospital on the basis of evidence given at a preliminary hearing.

"Unfortunately this is the case," explained Duzsza, "if it is on the recommendation of a doctor. You are also compelled by law to declare on your passport if you have ever been hospitalized for psychiatric treatment."

"The practice of this law results in class-basis discrimination", he charged, because, he said, people who are well off can hire expensive lawyers and doctors to avoid being hospitalized.

"There should definitely be a Statute of Limitations, so that a psychiatric record is only carried for a short time."

A young man who said he agreed with much of Duzsza's analysis of health care questioned the slow acceptance of acupuncture and chiropractic by the medical profession, and related this to control by the drug companies.

"New types of diagnosis and therapeutic treatment should be included in a reorganization of health care", concurred Duzsza.

"In Florida, osteopaths, who use a more naturally oriented approach to treatment, have been recently admitted on parity with doctors in the medical association. Not recognizing those with a slightly different approach only results in an under-use of available resources."

"Currently doctors and the hospitals dominate the system totally", he continued. "We must remove some of the power from the hospital."

"Unfortunately (Health Minister Dr. Richard) Potter's contradictory statements about community health centres, encouraging decentralization and supporting hospitals, are confusing the issue. Potter seems to be a sheep in wolf's clothing — lots of talk but little action."

"Decentralization might break the medical-industrial complex which is pushing priorities right now. Drug companies have power because of their collusion with the hospitals - and the drug industry is threatened by profit - diminishing therapies like acupuncture and vitamin therapy."

Duzsza considered the political aspects of health care organization to be very important.

He explained, "Our socialization process teaches us that power is tied up with professionalism. We are moving towards power possessed by the people themselves, which is encouraged by community organization."

"If health is linked with hope, and disease with despair, we can see that one's sense of power and certainty to change adverse conditions in one's life is crucial to one's health."

"We can maintain respect for the doctor's skill, but we must recognize awareness and healing qualities in others, perhaps by utilizing volunteers", Duzsza stressed. "We must also see the political implications which the present system of health-care has on the rest of society."

No word on student award cut

A spokesman for the Ministry of Education said recently that he doesn't know why the decision was made last June to cancel the financial award for Ontario Scholarships last June. He did admit that the government has been "under pressure" from various groups since then to reinstate them.

The ministry announced February 2 that it would give $100 with each Ontario Scholarship granted to Grade 13 graduates achieving 80 per cent or more. In 1968 they were cut to $150 from $400.

Asked if the Commission on Post-Secondary Education Report's recommendations would affect the reinstatement of the award, the spokesman, who asked not to be identified, stated that he didn't know as he hadn't read it. The report recommended abolishing all scholarships and grants in favour of one integrated financial aid system.

However he pointed out that the small and non-recurring nature of the award indicated the ministry did not consider it to be substantial financial support, but rather only a recognition of achievement.

Cites discriminatory practices

Lawyer denounces Canadian immigration laws

By JOHN CAMPBELL

Civil rights lawyer Charles Roach blasted Canada's immigration policy in a speech delivered at the First Unitarian Congregation church last week, charging that it is "racist" and based on "political expediency".

Stant discriminatory practices were removed from the Immigration Act in 1967, he said. These practices included distinctions between preferred and non-preferred nations, but at present "administration of the act is altogether different from the spirit of the act".

The new arrangement uses a 50 point system, in conjunction with other criteria such as sponsorship of the prospective immigrant by a Canadian citizen, in which the immigrant receives scores for useful faculties such as an ability to speak English or French. A minimum of 25 points must be achieved for an application to be accepted.

Roach argued that the uneven distribution of Canadian visa offices throughout the world is proof that the new act has not eliminated the racist element in Canada's immigration policy. Of 135 offices in 1971, 22 were in the British Isles, 66 in northern Europe, a few were scattered throughout Asia, Latin America, and the Far East, and none were in Africa, he said. Canada sells itself in England and Europe, he declared, but does not do so in the non-white countries.

Statistics Canada figures indicate that in the first nine months of 1972, Canada received 17,000 persons from the U.S., 13,000 from the U.K., 25,000 from continental Europe, 17,000 from Asia, and only 2,500 from Africa, and 5,000 from the West Indies.

Roach said he was appalled by the use of the old part of the Don Jail as a detention centre for persons with difficulties relating to their immigrant status. Noting that most frequently these were non-white people, he described the crowded conditions in which they are kept as "inhuman treatment even for criminals".

The lawyer linked this statement to a larger accusation that immigration and criminality are often connected in the public's mind as a result of media exploitation of spectacular immigration cases which occur when political radicals seek asylum or criminals go abroad to seek refuge from the law.

Roach has provided legal assistance to the Committee Against Racist Immigration Policy which has actively opposed the government's decision of last fall to prevent visitors to this country from applying for tanded immigrant status after their arrival. The policy, applied retroactively to November 3, 1972, was announced by then Minister of Manpower and Immigration Bryce Mackesey as a temporary measure designed to prevent speculators from taking advantage of new immigrants by promising to get their friends or relatives into the country legally for a fee. The matter is expected to come up for debate in the House of Commons this year.

The major argument in favour of present policy implementation — that it must be limited and selective in order not to aggravate unemployment problems, cannot be substantiated by statistical analysis according to Roach.

"Immigration is a moral issue, he stated, "Free movement is what has to come as man develops."

Company ends suit against the 4th Estate

HALIFAX (CUP) — The owners of Le Chateau Men's Wear Limited, a Halifax clothing firm, have terminated a 21-month-old libel suit against the 4th Estate newspaper by accepting a settlement of one dollar.

Le Chateau had earlier claimed serious damages to its business because of allegedly libellous items published in the 4th Estate in the spring of 1971. The items were part of news coverage of a public campaign against slum housing.

In a statement to the court, Brian Flemming, the 4th Estate's lawyer, said the newspaper denies the items were libellous. The issue of slum housing was not "a legal issue", he said, "but a profound moral issue of the community."

Nick Fillmore, editor of the 4th Estate, said, following the court statements, that Le Chateau carried on the case for so long principally to harass the newspaper. "When they finally realized they couldn't win, they backed out and took the one dollar that had been available to them for almost two years," he said.

Fillmore said the case had been an annoyance, but now the 4th Estate is better prepared than ever before to build the kind of strong and socially responsible newspaper Nova Scotia needs.

The alleged libel was committed when the 4th Estate published an advertisement and photograph from another publication, in which, according to an apology printed in the 4th Estate, "it was suggested the company was the owner of a certain slum property" in Halifax.

The apology said that the property was actually owned by a shareholder of Le Chateau and by a company not connected with the libel suit. The 4th Estate apologized for linking Le Chateau directly to one slum property.

In court, Flemming said everything published about the slum property, except its ownership, was true. The material published "was in the public interest and something which the public was entitled to know because of the need for the elimination of all such housing in this province," he said.

Le Chateau's counsel said, in agreeing to the settlement, his client "feels that a legal wrong has been done to it and that it has suffered a substantial financial loss as a result."

George Simms, Le Chateau's solicitor, also said, "the defendant (the 4th Estate) performs an important function in this province. The plaintiff believes that the defendant publishes a newspaper which is entirely predictable, devoid of humor or taughter and on occasion, mean-minded and vindictive. Yet, even if this is true, it still has a valuable contribution to make and an important function to fulfill.

Lawyer Charles Roach claims Canada spurns African immigrants.

Women's lib is making slow progress: artist

By MYRNA KOSTASH

"Many people still don't have the first grasp of the issues" of women's liberation, according to feminist sculptress Maryon Kantaroff.

Speaking at a lecture in the Interdisciplinary Studies women's course, she continued "I would like to feel that I have nothing new to say, but when I look around me I wonder if we've even started".

Kantaroff says she meets women at meetings who are still worried about "putting down men and marriage", if that's what women see as the issue in feminism, she wonders just how much they have grasped the reality of their lives.

Kantaroff recalled one version of human history: the transition from "egalitarian" hunting bands to settled agricultural communities in which women developed "all the so-called domestic arts" and the accoutrements of civilized life to the point where - "no one knows quite how" - power became concentrated in the hands of men.

She speculated that this might have occurred because of a primal conflict between women, who were the producers of food, and men, who were hunters and possessed weapons.

A very important element of primitive culture was "fear and respect" in the masculine mind at seeing women "pop a child" and the obvious connection between childbirth and the fertility cycles of the earth.

This had an unfortunate result, according to Kantaroff, in the rigid categories of male and female symbolism and their "hopeless thrust on the individual". For example, the "egg, the curve, roundness" became forever associated with women and "anything that looked like an erected penis" with men.

The confusion among symbol and personality characteristics and roles was one of the "terrible mistakes" in human culture. To this day, people still equate femininity with the female and masculinity with the male, not seeing that the suppression of opposites in the individual has created generations of human zombies, she said.

Kantaroff admitted that she grew up as a "male, culturally speaking". Like all women in a phallogocentric society, she said she absorbed masculine values of work and accomplishment, learning to demean women and accept male contempt of them as either "matrons or prostitutes."

Part of this process was the systematic expunging of women from accounts of history, literature, politics and revolution, she claimed, so that women don't know their own past.

As an example, she cited witchcraft in medieval Europe. "Perhaps the witches were women who had stepped outside the bonds of female roles and who were developing a political understanding of their oppression."

Modern suffragism and the struggle for women's rights really got started when women became involved in the campaign to abolish slavery. "When the women working for abolition discovered that they themselves didn't have the legal right to speak in public, they started to think about their own situation."

It was a straight line from that realization to Yoko Ono's "woman as nigger". One way of comparing slavery and women's oppression, Kantaroff said, was to remember that at first the blacks in America resisted the campaign for abolition.

"Today that seems unbelievable. I hope someday we will see the attitude of women today is just as ludicrous. What, get married? Take a man's name? You mean all those generations of women raised to be domestics?" But of course women will be terrified of their own liberation, Kantaroff predicted, just as the blacks were, so long as their only alternative is economic debilitation.

Feminist analysis as such grew out of the Civil Rights movement in the States, she said. "Blacks developed an analysis that cleaned their guts out of all 'Whitey's' conceptions about them".

With more and more women participating in the left, studying racism, capitalism and imperialism, and Marxism, and observing the experience of blacks who "the minute they saw a white face, curled up inside into black roles", it was only inevitable that movement women would "stop making coffee and sandwiches for the men and begin to ask questions."

"Why should we wait for your Revolution before we gain equality? Why should we serve you?"

Speaking of her own "political lute-in", Kantaroff described it like satori: "a physical experience, sweating palms and palpitations and a blinding light." The crucial insight from that experience was to realize that everything she had thought was a "personal problem, my own hang-up" was in fact a reflection of her "caste status".

"We are all in the same boat", she emphasized, with something like passion. "I saw myself as 99 per cent socially or politically fashioned, not at all as an individual responsible for my own life."

"When I realized that I was raised female, I saw that his had nothing to do with what I wanted to do and be. Life became so much easier and happier. Now I know I have the chance to learn; it's not in the genes. You have no idea what a relief it is to be aggressive without collapsing at the seams with guilt."

SAC fails to reach accord on election guidelines

Non-existent SAC presidential election guidelines which threw SAC into mass of confusion last year trying to avoid acclamation of a Young Socialist slate have reared their ambiguous heads again.

The Students' Administrative Council last week failed to reach agreement on what to do if one of the compulsory three-member ticket drops out.

Last year, Eric Miglin ticket member Joyce Witton withdrew from the ticket, forcing it to drop out along with her. The SAC constitution requires candidates to run on a ticket composed of a president and two vice-presidents, and nominations had closed by the time Witton decided to opt out of the team.

The constitution does not provide for withdrawals, leaving council to establish guidelines covering such a situation as part of its election rules. Last year's council hadn't prepared for this eventuality, creating a constitutional crisis which sent some council members scurrying to find some way of re-opening nominations to prevent the US ticket from taking office by acclamation. (Another slate had pulled out earlier.)

Elections committee chairman and SAC vice-president John Helliwell had proposed a rule which would have prevented a ticket member from dropping out unless his or her teammates agreed to withdraw too. Otherwise, the Helliwell rule would keep the unwilling member on the ticket at least until after the election.

Rules, Helliwell told the executive, about subsequent replacement of the resigning ticket member would have to be worked out.

Other executive members disputed the fairness of forcing someone to stay on the ticket against their will and suggested a more lenient replacement provision be considered.

In the end, the executive referred the Helliwell proposal to council without endorsing or rejecting it.

No other major changes are proposed in the council's election rules. The rules themselves come up for council approval at tonight's meeting. However, nominations for the presidency and vice-presidencies opened Monday. They close a week later.

Gas chairman assailed

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

Oakah Jones, chairman of the board of the Consumers' Gas Company came under attack from all sides when he appeared at the Noon-on-the-Square program at Holy Trinity Church.

Dallard Runge, a former city planner who ran against alderman Fred Beavis in December's municipal election, criticized Jones and the Harbour Commission for wanting to tear down the old CNE stadium and pull up a new one that would be more accessible to cars. Jones is a member of the board of the Toronto Harbour Commission and the Toronto Redevelopment Advisory Council.

Runge asked Jones how he determines what is in the public interest.

Jones replied, "I read the newspapers, watch television, listen to the radio and talk to cab-drivers."

"We (the Toronto Harbour Commission) operate in a goldfish bowl — the public are always welcome to come to our meetings," he said.

A woman in the audience of 44 people said she didn't feel the Harbour Commission operated openly enough in making its decision to remove Union Station and put up six high rise office buildings instead.

"You didn't send me an invitation (to the meeting)," she said. Jones wasn't sure whether or not an ad appeared in the paper announcing the open meeting that discussed the fate of Union Station.

The gas man from Oklahoma felt there was more public advantage in the high rises, although earlier he said "we should not tear down buildings with historical or architectural attractiveness."

U of T income is higher than expected

While declining enrolments have hit universities all over Ontario with budget deficits, U of T is receiving approximately $1,700,000 more than it expected from the province and about one quarter as much again in student tuition fees.

Figures released by the office of Statistics and Records reveal that the university received a total of about 61,260 Basic Income Units (BIUs) from the provincial government instead of its expected 60,370.

A BIU is about $1,700 paid to the university on a per student basis. Arts undergraduates are worth one BIU, each part-time student's course about one-fifth and PhD students six. Total enrolment at U of T was shown as 40,570 students, including 27,785 full-time and 12,785 part-time students.

There were 27,390 undergraduates, including 20,614 full-timers and 6,776 part-time students. Of these full-time students, 8,163, or about 40 per cent of the undergraduates, were women, while almost two-thirds of the part-time undergraduates were women.

At a meeting of the Academic Affairs Committee, where enrolment was discussed, president John Evans said that the university expects 3100 new first year students in arts and science next year.

Assistant registrar and director of admissions Wm Kent reported to the committee that the colleges had over-registered and that they were going to have to re-evaluate their admission targets. Committee chairman R.M.H. Shepherd emphasized, however, that "No one was admitted who did not clearly hold the minimum requirements of admission."

Arts and science undergraduates comprised more than half the total number of students in the university, with 22,330 students. The engineering faculty was second most populous, with 2,162 students (43 of them women), medicine has 1,184 undergraduates, and pharmacy has 587.

Architecture has 319 undergraduate students, Forestry 214, Food Sciences 193, Dentistry 601, Law 449, Music 367 and Nursing 402 and Phys Ed 381.

The School of Graduate Studies has a total of 7,089 students, of whom slightly more than 2,000 are women, according to the statistics.

The School of Hygiene has 115 graduate students, Dentistry has 46 graduate students, and the Faculty of Education has 1939 students. The Faculty of Management Studies has 288 students, Medicine has 1,169 graduate students and Music has 24 grads.

UTS admits women

Yet another all-male U of T institution has been opened to women. Beginning next fall, women will be admitted to the University of Toronto Schools, a male preserve since its establishment as a practice teaching school nearly 63 years ago.

UTS was always meant to accommodate both male and female students, although in two separate buildings. However, the university never got around to building the women's facility.

Opening the private school's doors to women didn't pass without one Governing Council member expressing concern that using quotas to admit students might damage its academic quality.

Approximately half the students accepted for next year's Grade 7 and all those then being admitted to Grade 8 must be female, the Governing Council decided, on the Academic Affairs Committee's recommendation.

Both male and female students are to be considered for vacant places at higher levels in the school. If possible, women are to be included on the UTS teaching staff before the next academic year.

Teaching staff governor Dr. E.B. Hendrick told the council he "would regret it if the particular qualities" of UTS fell as a result of the female student quotas.

Another councillor, part-time student rep Joyce Denyer, replied that should academic standing become the sole criterion for admission to UTS male students would soon be outnumbered by females.

Academic Affairs Committee chairman R.M.H. Shepherd explained that the quotas have been devised in order to move the school toward an equal proportion of male and female students as soon as possible.

Primal encounter is answer to repression, claims doctors

By DAVE LINE

North Americans strongly repress their feelings, said Dr. Bill Swartley at a recent discussion of primal encounter in the Medical Sciences Auditorium.

Swartley, who is president of the Centre for the Whole Person, described primal groups as a synthesis of the "body armour" techniques of William Reich combined with encounter. They are designed to "de-condition psychosomatic repressions stemming from traumatic incidents" in an individual's past which affect interaction with other people.

This is achieved by attempting to teach adults to make direct emotional contact with their childhood. Participants are encouraged to seek altered states of consciousness through nude encounter, massage, massive skin contact, and uninhibited dancing or playfulness. A pool heated to body temperature and "peak music" are used as part of the technique.

Swartley said that during a primal encounter "people are obviously out of their heads". He recalled a primal experience in which he said he returned to Egypt as it was 3000 years ago.

He said it is possible to have a primal experience anywhere, and mentioned an incident that occurred in the ballroom of UCLA. After Swartley said a few key words to his dancing partner, she flopped down on the floor and began to have a "primal".

This experience, he said, is "beyond definition."

He noted that primal encounter can be dangerous, but stressed that dangers are minimal. In 10 years he has seen three broken ribs, two neck or spine injuries, several skinned knees, and one guy who "completely flipped out".

Swartley said that for most people a primal experience can be beneficial in helping them to gain greater self-understanding. He said it is possible to live a "perpetual primal."

The Claremont Centre for Human Potential, which sponsored the meeting, recruited participants for an $80 weekend of primal experience.

Determining sex is not easy

Determining the sex of an individual may not be as easy as it appears, according to Michael Barrett of the Sex Information and Education Council of Canada.

Barrett, a U of T zoologist, speaking on "Gender and Sexuality" yesterday at the Medical Science Auditorium, outlined seven levels of sexual identification.

The first three levels, genetic, gonadal, and hormonal, are basic biological determinants of sexuality and contribute to the development of the next two levels, internal reproductive ducts and external genitalia.

Barrett said the most important levels of identification are actually cultural, gender role and identity, and sex of assignment and rearing.

Barrett said that none of the physical variables of sexuality is more important than the cultural one. Culture becomes increasingly important, he said, when there is a conflict of the biological determinants.

He emphasized the need to learn more about the factors that determine sexuality, and also about the influence hormones such as androgen exert on the development of the brain.

Specialists chase intellect

Contribution to their intellectual growth is why students attend university and taking a specialist program, according to a survey conducted for the New Program Review Committee. Of the 1000 questionnaires distributed to full-time students, 354 students responded, while 254 of 500 faculty members answered.

Nearly half of the students answering were in specialist programs, and almost two-thirds felt faculty-scheduled exams should be held in some courses, determined by the instructor.

Only 21 per cent of the students responding plan to get a job immediately after graduation, while 57 per cent intend to continue their education.

Over 40 per cent of the students are planning careers in education. Staff who answered the questionnaire were evenly split on whether the New Program, with its relatively unrestricted "shopping" list of courses should be remodified back to more closely resemble the old honours general system. One-third wanted remodification of the new Program, while another third were opposed.

Slightly more than half the faculty, compared to 29 per cent of the students, felt students should be required to take courses in more than one division in arts and science. The four divisions are the humanities, social sciences, life sciences, and physical sciences.

Seventy-one per cent of the staff felt students are insufficiently informed to plan their programs wisely.

The committee, which since last fall has worked on recommendations to make to president John Evans about the future of arts and science, is expected to report by the end of this month.

U of T balks at Ontario request

The University of Toronto has balked at an Ontario Legislature committee's request for a nationality and education breakdown of the make-up of the university's teaching staff.

Instead, president John Evans will canvass staff through department chairman for information normally supplied to Statistics Canada and provide bulk figures based on this data to the committee.

The dispute between the university legislature's Select Committee on Economic and Cultural Nationalism and the university centres around the committee's demand for individual data and U of T's reluctance to provide information which can be traced back to individuals.

The president cautioned last Thursday's Governing Council meeting against the danger of providing information which could be used to embarrass or harass individual faculty members.

Evans said that even if doing so was desirable, there would be "extraordinary difficulty" in supplying the requested information.

As Evans completed his remarks, student governor Paul Cadario rose to ask whether the president would appreciate a council motion endorsing his action. Evans replied affirmatively and the motion was passed without debate.

Other Ontario universities have adopted a similar non-co-operation stance on the issue, angering some committee members. The committee had given the universities two weeks within which to reply to its request.

Anticipating a possible committee subpoena for the missing information, Evans said Ontario universities would ask Premier William Davis to modify the committee's demands under those circumstances. Evans is a personal friend of the premier.

Teachers declassified

MONTREAL (CUPT) — The Quebec government has declassified a substantial proportion of the province's CEGEP (community college) teachers, resulting in a loss of salary and status for many teachers.

The new classifications determine a teacher's salary by years of teaching experience and schooling. The intent of the classification system is to ensure province-wide uniform criteria for gauging salaries.

Montreal's Vanier College Teachers' Association says about 85 of the college's 280 teachers have been de-classified. About 10 out of 50 teachers have apparently been declassified at Champlain College in Lennoxville.

A spokesman for the Federation nationale des enseignants quebecois, which represents most CEGEP teachers, said the declassification appeared to be widespread.

The spokesman said some colleges are refusing to comply with the new classifications.

Most of the declassified teachers are newly hired. Apparently most were declassified because they received some of their education outside Quebec or because they don't hold teaching certificates.

Wrestlers finish fourth at OUAA finals

The University of Toronto wrestling team tied with York for fourth place with 14 points at the OUAA championships February 16 and 17 at the University of Windsor.

Western finished first with a total of 68 points, Waterloo was second with 56, and Guelph third with 36. Eleven teams competed in the two-day meet.

Western captured the Porter Trophy for winning the team championship, and Tony Dethonasis of York (177 pounds) was awarded the Keegan Trophy as the outstanding wrestler.

Toronto team members participated in nine of the 10 events at the meet, winning one third and five fourth place finishes.

Peter Mathews placed third in the 142 pound weight class, behind Egan Beiler (Waterloo) and Clive Llewellyn (Western).

U of T's Ken White finished fourth in the 126 pound class, won by Guelph's Grant McAninch, while Toronto team member Rob Moore finished fourth in the 134 pound weight class, won by Tim Wenzel of Waterloo.

In the 150 class Roger Vachon finished fourth to Western's Rick Finkenzeller; in the 167 weight category Doug Lake gained fourth place to Western's Bill McDonnell and in the 177 class Len Broderick finished fourth to York's Dethonasis. Lake, Broderick, Moore, and Mathews are all rookies.

Western finished first by virtue of five first place, two second place and one third place finishes. Waterloo team members won in two weight categories, as well as posting four second place and two third place finishes. Waterloo had three Olympic competitors on its team.

Guelph ended with one first place finish, two second place, two third place and two fourth place finishes to come third.

Toronto coach Joe Rabel believes the Varsity team made considerable improvement over last year's group. For example, Jon Davis (167 pounds), last year's only second place finisher, was injured and did not compete, and last year's two third place finishers found themselves in extremely tough weight classes.

In 1972 U of T won one second place finish, and two thirds. This year with one third place winner and five fourth place winners the team showed improved depth.

Gymnasts second

The University of Toronto men's gymnastics team placed second with 179.32 points in the Western Section Gymnastic Championship February 10th at the University of Western Ontario.

McMaster University was first with 239.05 points, while Western and Waterloo followed Varsity with 106.95 and 45.70 points, respectively. Toronto's Gary Wicks finished fifth in the final all-round individual scoring with 43.0 points. Steve Mitruk of McMaster was first (52.90 points), Dave Copeland, also of McMaster was second (48.5), and Mike Provencher of Waterloo third with 45.7. McMaster's Don Marinacci was fourth (43.05).

In the individual events, Wicks placed fourth in the side horse, fifth in the floor exercise, third in vaulting, and sixth on parallel bars. Rick Jeysman was the only other Toronto competitor to place in the top six in any single event. He finished fourth in the vaulting competition.

The OUAA gymnastics finals take place next Saturday at York.

Swimmers win Guelph meet, advance to finals at Waterloo

By PAUL CARSON

After defeating all their league opponents during the dual meet season, the men's swimming team is regarded as a top-heavy favorite to win Varsity's 13th consecutive OUAA title this weekend at Waterloo.

Blues maintained their supremacy over Canadian swimming rivals with a decisive 86-27 victory over Guelph February 10 in the final dual meet prior to the championships.

Blues swept 12 of the 13 events in rather slow times, and veteran Alex Lau took first place in both the one and three-metre diving.

The swimmers seemed to regard the Guelph meet as little more than an exhibition workout as the Varsity times were among the slowest of the year.

Captain Jim Adams tied his own team record of 48.5 seconds in the 100-yard freestyle, establishing a new pool record for the Benson Building in the process. However, with the exception of Lau's steady diving, the other Varsity results were somewhat mediocre.

Blues should return to form in Waterloo, leaving the other OUAA schools to battle for second place. Based on the times recorded during the dual meet season, Varsity has a somewhat stronger team than last year's contingent which made a shambles of the OUAA championships but lost to McGill at the national CIAU finals.

Blues could sweep all the freestyle events as Jim Adams has posted the fastest times in the country in the 50, 100 and 200 yard distances. Freshman Shawn Laari leads the field at 500 yards and is second to Ottawa's Tom Johnson at 1000 yards.

Coach Robin Campbell also has unexpected depth in the freestyles from freshmen Dave Wilkin and John Sebben. In fact, Varsity holds the top three places at 500 yards with Laari, Adams and Sebben; at 1000 yards, Blues have second, third and fifth with Laari, Sebben and another freshman, Dave Chutter.

Olympic veteran Byron MacDonald is conceded gold medals in both the 100 and 200-yard butterfly as his dual meet times of 52.4 in the 100 and 1:56.2 in the 200 are both unofficial Canadian intercollegiate records.

Zvi Eldar and five-year veteran Bob Peeling give Varsity a good chance to sweep the top three places in both races.

Following the unexpected retirement of Western's Ken Fowler, Blues can also expect to score heavily in the breaststroke. Sebben established a Varsity team record of 2:20.6 for 200 yards in his first competitive race six weeks ago, while veterans Nick Rottman and Wayne Phillips are stronger over 100 yards.

Blues are weak in the backstroke as only Russ Farquhar has posted respectable times and Western's duo of Olympian Bill Kennedy and freshman Wes McConnell are several seconds faster. Varsity should also be outscored in both the 200 and 400-yard individual medley.

In addition to the prestige of winning the league title, the OUAA championship also serves as the major qualifying meet for the CIAU finals, to be held this year in Calgary March 1-3.

In previous years, the first and second place finishers in each OUAA finals automatically qualified for the CIAU meet. However, many coaches complained that this system often led to abuses, and for this year at least there is a new qualifying process consisting of the winner of each race, the top four divers, plus all other swimmers who have bettered a set of national time standards.

Eleven Blues have already bettered those time standards, and if a few others improve by only one or two seconds each in Waterloo, virtually the entire Varsity team could qualify for the trip to Calgary.

Blues win three more, meet York tonight

By PETER DUX

Hockey Blues added to their so far perfect league record this season with two reading week wins over Brock and Queen's universities, 15-5, and 9-3, respectively.

Toronto remains alone in first place with 15 wins, no losses, and no ties. Laurentian is in second place with an 11-4-1 record, although Toronto could pad its lead since it has a game in hand.

Last Saturday at Kingston Blues took eight of 11 penalties but outshot the Queen's Golden Gaels 40-31. Gord Davies and Kent Ruhnke scored two goals each, while singles went to Nick Holmes, Bob Munro, Bill Buba, Don Pagnutti, and Bill Fifield.

Blues also defeated Loyola Warriors 10-5 in a return match exhibition game February 9 at Varsity Arena.

Ivan McFarlane led Blues with two first period goals. Both goals appeared "flukey" with the first going in off Loyola defenceman Jim Houston, and the other off the leg of Loyola's Bob Lagarde.

If not for those two gift goals Loyola would have had a well deserved lead after the first period. Blues played their worst hockey of the season in the opening 20 minutes. Overall, they were shaky all-round and looked totally disorganized.

Blues tightened up their game in the final 40 minutes of play, and the team was rewarded with goals by Leroy, Holmes, Munro, Buba, Pagnutti, Herridge, Fifield, and Davies.

Loyola was held scoreless in the second period but counted three times in the third due to a somewhat porous Toronto defence.

A third period fight saw Blue's Nell Korzak win an easy victory over Loyola's Jim Houston. Both were awarded double majors by referee Bilbo, who apparently didn't want to give them game majors in an exhibition game.

Loyola's goal scorers were Don Morris and David Brandt with two apiece, while Bob Lagarde added the fifth. Toronto outshot Loyola 35-29.

Blues play their final two regular season games this week — against York tonight at Varsity Arena, and then Sunday in Sudbury against the Laurentian Voyageurs.

Canadian capitalists want subordination

By MARK BOHNEIN

"Foreign investment is a result of the structure of Canadian capitalism, and not an alternative to it", said Tom Naylor, speaking at the Ontario Institute for Studies in education last week.

Naylor, a York University economics professor, was speaking to several hundred people at one of a series of public lectures sponsored by the Waffle.

Naylor asserted that "foreign investment is not a problem. Capital is the problem and foreign investment is totally derivative."

Canadian capitalists don't want to be treated in the commercial sphere, he said. They want the "freedom to be subordinate".

Naylor attempted to show that the pattern of foreign domination has logically developed from the mercantile structure of Canadian capitalism.

He stated that nine-tenths of Canadian fortunes were founded not on industrial but on commercial capital.

These are the businessmen whose line of descent runs from merchant capital - banking, finance, railways, utilities and land speculation.

According to Naylor, they do not produce anything but intermediate flows of goods between producers and consumers, or of capital between savers and investors.

The present dependent state of Canadian industry was part of a historical pattern of government domination by mercantile capital, according to Naylor.

The pattern was strongly established by confederation when a group of merchant capitalists from Montreal "created the Canadian state in their own image".

"They were creating in the beginning a state so deprived of any basis for industry", said Naylor, "that the path was set for the American takeover".

According to Naylor, the Baring Brothers, a merchant house in London, may have been the moving force behind confederation. This view is supported by the fact that George Brown, a father of Confederation, explicitly supported confederation to increase the value of Canadian bonds in London. The act was justified when the value of the bonds went up, Naylor said.

"Confederation", said Naylor, was "purely a financial transaction" engineered by a few railwaymen and bankers to pay off Canadian debts.

There was no broad franchise involved, Naylor added. In Prince Edward Island, for example, a few bankers brought confederation about over the expressed disapproval of 80 per cent of the population.

The pattern of economic dependence on Britain was accentuated by the fact that Ottawa was now ruled by merchant capitalists who were in turn dependent upon British capitalists.

John A. Macdonald's "National Policy" was, according to Naylor, "an explicit invitation for the Americans to move in". The tariff was needed, not to protect existing industry, said Naylor, but to attract American industrial capitalists through branch plants.

The branch plant industry benefitted the railwaymen and the transportation industry, he slated.

Because provinces lacked the financial means to industrialize, they developed a "bonusing system" to attract local American industries.

Women swimmers second

The women's speed swimming and diving teams placed second overall with 271 points at the OWIAA championships February 16 and 17 at McMaster University.

The University of Waterloo team, led by Maida Murray was first with 382 points, while Guelph finished third with 222 points. Teams from 10 universities participated in the 14 event meet. Toronto women captured three first place, five second, and one third place finishes in the meet.

Olympic veteran Merrily Stratten earned all three Toronto first place finishes. Stratten placed first in the 200-yard freestyle in 2:02.5 (last year she set an OWIAA record for the event in 1:59.8) 100-yard freestyle (56.5, —equalling her last year's record), and 400-yard freestyle (4:24.1).

Second place finishes were recorded by Nancy Thompson (200-yard breaststroke, 100-yard breaststroke, and 200-yard individual medley), and by the 400-yard freestyle and 400-yard medley relay teams.

Toronto's lone third place finish came from Pam Lemay in the one-metre diving event.

Both Thompson and Stratten made the necessary standards to compete in the CIAU finals to be held in Calgary the first weekend in March. The meet will mark the first co-ed swim championship in Canadian intercollegiate competition.

The men's fencing team failed to retain its OUAA title at Hart House last weekend as Windsor edged the Blues 45-43 under a new scoring system that combined results in both individual and team competition. Windsor's Bruno Ciccoletti went undefeated to win the individual foil as Varsity's Johannes Kaczynski placed third. Blues' veteran Eli Sukunda defeated Windsor's Brian Grimley for individual sabre honours in an exciting tie-breaking barrage. Ben Joyce defeated Trent with its first-ever OUAA title with an upset victory in the epee. Blues fenced well in the team competition, winning two of three weapons, but Windsor won the team epee and added a second and third in the others to guarantee the narrow victory. Kaczynski, Wing Nip and Oscar Wong won the team foil and Sukunda led Andrew Beney and Lorenzo Liscio to the team sabre title. Martin Humphries, John Roth and Bernie Tsui gave Varsity a third place finish in the team epee behind Windsor and Queen's . . . the University of Western Ontario won

Blues' playoff hopes ended at York

By BOB PRITCHARD

Basketball Blues missed their opportunity to qualify for this year's playoffs when they lost 74-58 to York Yeomen at York last Friday night.

Blues then came back the next day to win their last game of the season, defeating the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees 89-78 in the Benson Gym.

The Blues ended up in a fourth place tie with York in the Eastern Section. Toronto beat the Yeomen in Hart House by nine points, but on the merits of York's 16 point victory on Friday, they advanced to the quarter finals against Laurentian.

With the half time score 36-28 in Toronto's favour the teams started the second half playing evenly. Taking advantage of defensive lapses by the Blues, Yeomen proceeded to outscore Toronto 14-4 in the next few minutes to change the score to 49-48.

Having tied the score, York went into a half court, and then a full court press for the remainder of the contest. This rattled the Blues sufficiently to let York put together a 16 point lead — more than enough to put them into the final playoff spot.

Twice in the first half Blues had a 10 point lead, only to have the Yeomen whittle down the difference to two points.

Saturday's game against the Gee-Gees started out to be a one sided contest in favour of, surprisingly enough, the Blues (Ottawa easily defeated Varsity 97-85 in their first game this year). Toronto jumped to a 17-6 lead after only five minutes of play. Ottawa then put a full court press on Varsity, and five minutes later the Gee-Gees were 29-24 trailing.

Good outside shooting by Varsity's Peter Oolup, along with good ball handling by the Blues in general, put Toronto ahead 49-34 by the end of the half.

Going into the second 20 minutes, Varsity made the most of some careless passing by the Ottawa team, and using some fast breaks quickly put in 12 points to Gee-Gees two, making it a 61-38 half game.

Ottawa then reverted from the zone defence they had been using, to a man to man defence. This put more pressure on the Blues, who began to turn the ball over, as Ottawa chipped away at the Varsity lead. The Gee-Gees then moved into a full court press, and with four minutes left in the game, the Blues one time 25 point lead had been reduced to a bare four.

Rich Kurczyk picks the ball off in Saturday's final game, against Ottawa.

The Varsity—Michael Davis

In their enthusiasm, however, Ottawa began to foul, although many of the calls by the referees were close, and in some cases, questionable. It was only the fouling on the Gee-Gees part that kept the Blues ahead until the final. By the end of the game, four members of the Ottawa team had fouled out, and there were several choice words spoken to the referees afterwards, with Ottawa coach George Polvin leading the verbal assault.

Despite Gee-Gees valiant comeback, the Ottawa team was outplayed by the Blues. Toronto shot 50 per cent from the floor, and 66 per cent from the foul line, in comparison with Ottawa's averages of 40 per cent and 60 per cent, respectively. The 61 fouls called in the game were evenly distributed, 32 to Ottawa and 29 to Toronto.

The '72-'73 season saw the Blues win half of their league games for the first time in five years, and three out of their seven exhibition games.

The main fault in Blues' play over the season was best summed up by Coach McManus: "If they're one thing, they're inconsistent". Varsity managed to come up with big games against the better teams, but faltered against poorer clubs. They split games with York, Queen's, Carleton and Ottawa, lost twice to Laurentian (who ended up in first place in the east), and defeated Ryerson twice.

Toronto also fared considerably better at home, winning all three of the matches in Hart House, and four out of the six in the Benson Building. They lost seven of their nine away games.

Looking ahead to the next season, Blues will only lose one player to graduation: Dave Ferguson. Fortunately, Varsity has potential for a strong centre to replace him in Frank Cress. Forwards Skyvington and Scott will return next year, along with co-captain and top scorer for the Blues this year, Dave Watt. With guards Rudmik, Filinski, Francis and Oolup, who is probably the most improved player on Blues' lineup in his rookie year, Varsity should have a strong backcourt.

With a little "consistency", Toronto might sneak into that playoff position in 1974.

Nordic skiers win Carleton Invitational

The University of Toronto men's alpine ski team remains in second place with 36 points after the fifth meet of the seven-meet season last Friday at Georgian Peaks.

Meanwhile, the nordic team won the OUAA championship and the Paul Allen Trophy at the OUAA and Carleton Invitational Ski Meet February 9 and 10 at Mont Ste. Marie.

In the University of Western Ontario Invitational alpine meet at Georgian Peaks February 16, Toronto's Doug Carter won both runs in 37.34 and 40.08 for a total of 77.42 to score 10 points and earn the individual lead in the series with a total of 32 points.

Rob Langevin, representing Carleton University, finished second with times of 38.20 and 40.60 for a 78.80 total.

Jamie Neilson of Queen's University placed third on the strength of his second run of 40.59. Combined with his first time of 38.70 this gave him a 79.29 total.

Neilson's eight points for the day enabled him to remain in second place at 31. Neilson's brother, Ian, also from Queen's, remains third in the series with 26 points.

The team from Carleton

University won its third successive meet, placing three competitors in the top seven. Carleton now has 38 of a possible 40 points so far in the season.

Toronto gained nine of a possible 10 points on Friday and remains in second place. Western and Queen's are tied for third place with 29 points each.

The OUAA has adopted a new points system this season to judge both team and individual performances over the entire season. The system awards ten points to the winner, nine points to second place, eight to third and so on down to 10th place. The points will be aggregated over the entire season.

February 9 and 10 the Toronto alpine team placed second in the OUAA slalom team results and third in the OUAA giant slalom, third in the Carleton giant slalom results, and third in the Carleton slalom results at the Carleton Invitational.

Carleton uses a graduated point system stressing individual times whereas the OUAA system stresses teamwork and consistency. The OUAA system is more competitive as a result with a broader point spread.

In practical terms this means that a team can place first in the OUAA system with, for example, team members finishing in three consecutive positions somewhere near the top. With Carleton's system, a person placing ninth out of ten would not necessarily detract from his team's position if the two other members finished near the top. U of T's Doug Carter finished eighth in the giant slalom individual results with a time of 84.6. Bill Honeywell from Dalhousie was first in 82.5.

Other Toronto competitors included Grant Wilson, 11th, (85.8), Britt Roberts, 21st, (89.7), and Alan Abbott, 45th (106.2).

The OUAA giant slalom team results had Carleton in first place with 297.9 points, while Queen's was second with 293.9, and Toronto third with 286.4.

Toronto also finished third in the invitational giant slalom team results with 285.7 points.

Toronto team member Rod Behan finished fifth in the slalom event individual points total in a time of 75.7. (Behan tied with Rod Munro of RMC and Mike Ryan from Carleton.) Carleton's Rob Langevin was first in 72.3.

Other Toronto team competitors included Alan Abbott, 11th (78.2), Britt Roberts, 15th (79.1), Doug Carter, 29th (84.6), Grant Wilson, 53rd (150.7).

Toronto finished second overall to Carleton in the OUAA slalom team results with 96.0 points. Carleton was first with 98.7 points. In the invitational slalom team results Toronto was third to Carleton and Dalhousie.

Dalhousie team member Bill Honeywell won the alpine individual with 198.9 points. Toronto team members Britt Roberts and Doug Carter were 13th and 14th, with 183.4 and 183.0 points, respectively. Grant Wilson finished 31st with 144.2 points.

Overall in the 13 team meet Toronto finished third in the invitational to Carleton and Dalhousie.

The same weekend Toronto nordic skiers won the OUAA championship at the Carleton Invitational.

Doug Garfield finished third in the cross country individual results with 94.5 points in a time of 37 minutes 43 seconds. Darrell Frank from Laurentian was first in 35:38 with 100 points.

Other Toronto team members in the field of 24 included Ken Sidney in 38:50 (for 91.8) and Dave McClyment in 42:09 (for 84.5).

Toronto won the OUAA cross country results while Laurentian placed second, and Queen's third. However, the invitational team results had U of T in second place to Laurentian.

In the individual jumping Rob Behan placed fourth with a two jump total of 174.5. Carleton's Rob Langevin was first with a combined total of 181.0.

Other Toronto competitors included Grant Wilson, sixth (170.5), and Doug Carter, 13th (144.5).

Jumping team results had Toronto finishing second to Carleton, with Queen's third.

Toronto finished first in the nordic team results (jumping and cross country), with Carleton and Queen's second and third, respectively.

At the combined OUAA meet Rod Behan was awarded the bronze medal in the alpine slalom, while Doug Garfield won the bronze in cross country.

The next alpine meet is the McMaster Invitational at Collingwood, March 2, while the nordic team will compete March 3 in the 30 kilometre championship for eastern Canada.

Cops attack U du Q pickets

MONTREAL (CUPI) — Montréal police moved to break up student picket lines at l'Université du Québec yesterday, but most classes remained closed.

Police drove their motorcycles through student lines injuring at least three students, as the UQAM administration decided to try to forcibly end the strike which has kept the university closed since January 26.

Only when the riot squad appeared on the scene in the morning did the students disperse, but they returned for mass picket lines in the afternoon. They plan to return for mass picketing today and expect the police to return for more violence.

Yesterday's action followed an opinion poll by a private polling firm which the administration commissioned the night before. The telephone poll was designed to discover whether students favoured calling police to end the strike or whether they wanted their terms annulled. Some 1296 students told the pollsters to "get lost", 279 refused to answer and another 208 hung up. Only 559 favoured calling the police, and 301 wanted the term annulled.

Québec education minister Francois Cloutier said Wednesday the time had come to restore order on the UQAM campus. Students have been demanding the right to pay tuition fees during the three years after graduation, if they find employment in the field they studied.

The student strike had forced the administration to withdraw its January 26 deadline for the payment of fees. (The university would have expelled students failing to pay by that time.)

The Québec government lifted all province-wide deadlines February 6 and said each university could decide for itself how to collect fees. This week the Conference des recteurs et principaux des universités de Québec officially withdrew its dictum calling for strict fee payment. But the students still seek a guarantee from UQAM that they may pay up to three years after graduation.

Students were expecting police action yesterday and they got it. UQAM recteur Leo Dorais announced Wednesday night he intended to re-open the institution.

About 200 pickets arrived before 8 am at the Joliette campus on the busy downtown St. Catherine Street. Another 200 students massed outside a nearby science building. Montreal police stood nearby but didn't move until students outside the science building parking lot tried to stop a professor from entering with his car. About five police tried to move the students but they were pushed back. Almost instantaneously the police moved away and one motorcycle policeman drove his vehicle through the crowd of students, injuring at least three people. One woman was taken to hospital with a cracked bone in her leg. Two more motorcycle policemen managed to disperse the students.

Meanwhile by 9 am at the St Catherine Street campus, police had cut traffic in a two-block area and about 30 police forced 200 students to leave the sidewalk in front of the campus entrance and walk on the sidewalk on the opposite side of the street.

Soon about 10 motorcycle police drove past the students, made a quick U-turn and drove through the students on the sidewalk. The students scattered, shouting "Dorais fasciste", "Dorais assassin".

Students then re-grouped, lined the sidewalk and faced about 30 police across the street. One policeman then ordered them to disperse and repeated the command. At 9:20 the riot squad arrived, armed with helmets and clubs. The students decided to leave.

The students then walked to the science building, but dispersed by 10 am. They re-grouped at noon across the street from the St Catherine campus. Few policemen remained, but 100 student picketers were on band by 4 pm.

Throughout the day few professors reported for work and few classes convened. The professors' union has been supporting the student strike.

Staff might not be cut at Advisory Bureau

The university's Advisory Bureau, faced with the prospect of axing one senior staff member next year because of a $22,000 budget cut, may be spared that fate.

The bureau and internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway are working on proposals which will allow it to carry on without the loss of any senior staff and without violating the budget committee's decision to reduce the amount of direct university support to the bureau.

Conway said she hoped it would be possible to maintain "as fully as possible the current level of support".

The solution to the bureau's financial problems may be supplementing the bureau's operating budget by a "mixture of outside funding and funding from academic sources", according to bureau director Don McCulloch.

In the past, he explained, bureau staff have been cross-appointed to teaching positions in various departments, often without being paid for this work.

Normally, departments with cross-appointed faculty credit each other with the teaching time provided by each other. However, in the unusual case of the bureau's teaching administrators, this system would be impractical and consequently the grant teaching resulted.

A proposal currently being explored would have departments receiving teaching service from bureau employees pay the bureau for their services, thereby augmenting its budget.

Although final details have yet to be worked out, McCulloch agreed he is "a lot more optimistic" than he was before about the bureau's future and its ability to avoid firing one of its three senior employees.

Letters supporting the bureau had flooded its office after word of the proposed budget cut and its effects leaked out, McCulloch reported.

However, "It's not yet done," he cautioned.

Students rally to defence of soon jobless professor

By BRIANE NASIMOK

Math students are rallying over the firing of another professor, after Erindale professor Michael Mather announced recently that he will not be rehired next year.

Students in his class Wednesday presented mathematics department chairman George Duff with a petition supporting Mather and his teaching ability. Forty-five of 50 students present at Wednesday's class signed the petition, which asked Duff to respond, either by letter or in person at the math rally planned for Tuesday, at 11 am in the Sid Smith foyer.

Math students at the St. George campus have organized two petitions protesting math policy after two professors whom they considered excellent teachers, David Spring and Stephen Salaff, were effectively dismissed.

Mather has been trying to find out the reasons for his dismissal since last spring, when he was told his services were no longer required. He said last night he has received the explanation from Duff that Mather had not published enough.

Duff also showed him a letter from a student complaining about his teaching, but Mather said that Duff told him the tenure committee did not pay much attention to the letter.

Mather said that "the department is preventing me from improving as a teacher by not telling me what's wrong with my teaching. They would rather ruin a career than help me become a better teacher."

Duff was out of town yesterday and could not be reached for comment.

In connection with the alleged lack of publishing material, Mather said he, in his five years at U of T, had published a paper in the math journal Topology, and helped J.F. Adams with his book Lectures on Lie Groups. He will publish two other papers, one in the Canadian Journal of Mathematics.

Mather said that he cannot ask for a letter of recommendation, "because they will not tell me the reasons why I was fired."

Erindale student Lynett Spencer speculates that one reason Mather may not have been rehired was due to his support of a student strike. She went to Duff early in December to complain about the dismissal, but said Duff would not discuss Mather's case.

Spencer said that Duff told her previous professors who have been let go never had problems getting jobs elsewhere, especially in industry. She said that university policy for hiring young professors ran in a cycle system; it releases professor after only a few years.

Mather and the protesting math students received support Wednesday night from SAC when a general meeting voted to "condemn the firing of teachers of proven ability such as David Spring, Stephen Salaff and Michael Mather."

Council, in a letter to Duff, (copies of which went to president John Evans and vice-president Don Forster) also reaffirmed its position "that teaching ability be a prime factor in matters of promotion, granting of tenure, and firing, and that students be represented on all teaching bodies decision-making bodies".

Over 1000 math students in one petition demanded more student voice in departmental affairs, especially hiring, firing and tenure. They also demanded that more emphasis be put on teaching evaluating professors and less on examinations in evaluating students.

Another petition, signed by about 150 present and former students of Salaff and Spring, called for their retention.

Report advocates Interdisc dept

Interdisciplinary Studies will become a full department in the faculty of arts and science if a draft report by the New Program Review Committee is implemented.

The report recommends that Interdisciplinary Studies have its own staff as well as a chairman and operating funds. There would also be a new departmental council established.

This comes only two months after a major threat to the existence of the innovative department abated.

The recommendation was included in the PAC on the New Program's draft report, which recommends far-reaching changes in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

A committee meeting yesterday discussed the draft, written by chairman Daniel Berlyne, making minor revisions to the recommendations earlier agreed to by several of its sub-committees. The final report will be forwarded to president John Evans after next Thursday's meeting.

Among the most controversial recommendations are the setting up of a credit system to replace the present year system in arts and science which would end of the distinction between full and part time students.

Student committee member Bob Anderson, who is also a member of the faculty's General Committee, predicted that the credit system would have difficulty passing if the report is referred to the Faculty Council, since such a system has been rejected for the last two years.

Other important recommendations include the setting up of four types of undergraduate degree programs as "desirable norms", including a single major, double major, liberal arts and thematic foci.

Each would have a board of studies to administer it made up of representatives of various departments, colleges and curriculum committees. This would be a movement toward a Faculty Reform Caucus recommendation that programs be coherent as well as flexible.

The credit system would allow students to progress toward a degree at their own speed. Normal course load would be 10 credits per year or the equivalent of five full courses.

However, students could take as many as 14 credits per year by taking 10 during the winter term and four in the summer. A normal four-year degree could be telescoped into three years.

"College X" would be established especially for part time students, or in the new scheme, those students who are taking a small number of courses.

Degree certification would be a B.A. (30 credit) and a B.A. (40 credit) and corresponding BSC degrees.

For curriculum development, the report recommends that faculty and college program directors be appointed to develop and coordinate new programs and courses.

In the controversial area of the relationship of health care professional faculties to arts and science, the committee recommends setting up two "pre-health" programs with restricted enrolment.

One of the important teaching recommendations is that as many introductory courses as possible have lecture-seminar sections with under 50 students per class.

Along with this would be a biweekly 80-110 minute tutorial with substantial student participation, replacing the present weekly tutorials in first year.

Behaviour code approved

By RANDY ROBERTSON

The Internal Affairs Committee passed yesterday "without dissent" its draft code of behaviour which will now go to the Governing Council for its consideration and approval.

The decision on the code completes nearly five months of work on discipline by Internal Affairs, which had hoped to agree on a policy recommendation by Christmas. If accepted, it will end over three years of work on discipline which began with the Campbell Report in 1969.

The behaviour code, U of T vice-president Jill Conway told the committee is intended to make as clear as possible the kinds of conduct that constitute violations of principles of behaviour necessary for the "proper functioning" of the university.

"These principles," the report says, "derive their legitimacy from the academic functions of the university".

The code enunciates several rights and obligations it finds binding on both students and faculty.

Among these is freedom of enquiry which "entitles members of the university to hold public meetings, to post notices, subject to guidelines developed by the Governing Council, and to engage in peaceful demonstrations subject to the development of reasonable and impartially applied rules, to be established by the Governing Council." These rules must reflect "the purpose of the university" and be "designed to ensure the safety of the campus."

Conway said that numerous complaints had been made about inadequate rooms being assigned campus groups for public meetings and the protection costs for police the university is forcing these groups to bear.

For example, Students for a Democratic Society spokesman Bill Schabas complained yesterday that the university is charging SDS over $300 for rooms and $100 for imposed police protection for this weekend's conference on racism.

Conway said policy on these matters would have to be provided for the university by the Internal Affairs committee.

The code's freedom of enquiry also involves the obligation not to interfere with the freedom of members of the university to pursue normal academic and administrative activities, including freedom of movement.

Conway offered as examples of freedom of movement "the freedom to walk to the Faculty of Arts and Science office without having to walk over 50 sitting bodies," and "the freedom to enter 215 Huron Street".

(Students protesting the Faculty of Arts and Science's refusal to approve staff-student parity on the General Committee in 1971 occupied parts of Sidney Smith Hall, where the faculty offices are located. Three weeks ago, Stop the Student Surcharge picketers attempted to prevent entry to the 215 Huron Street administrative building.)

Freedom of enquiry involves as well "the obligation to respect the right of members of the university to privacy in offices, laboratories, and residence rooms, and to keep personal papers, confidential records, and effects, subject only to the law of the land and written agreements voluntarily entered into."

It allows the university or members of it the right to recourse for discipline if any member of the university destroys, damages or interferes with the operation of the learning resources.

The code specifies the rights of the university itself. Among them is its "right and obligation to protect members of the university community and their visitors from physical harm, threats of harm, or abuse, the university's property from damage and unauthorized use, and its academic and administrative processes from interruption."

The code leaves up to the tribunal to determine specific sanctions to be imposed for breaches of university regulations, although it does suggest a list of penalties.

The code emphasizes the responsibility of members of the university to ensure the various rights and freedoms it propounds, but leaves the definition of this responsibility up to the tribunal as well.

Chairman Paul Cadario, acting on advice solicited from law dean Martin Friedland, recommended to the committee that the tribunal involve not just one chairman as originally proposed, but five.

"If you had a panel of five chairmen, each of whom I think we have to assume will be neutral, objective and acceptable to all major bodies within the university," Friedland said in a letter presented to the committee, "you could use one of them to screen the proposed cases, one to act as (tribunal) chairman, and the other three to review the case if an appeal is brought."

The committee recommended that the number of chairmen on the tribunal be increased to at least six and that one of these serve full-time.

The quality of persons who might be attracted to the positions was a cause of concern to the committee members. Student member Ian Morrison said that good people "will be very difficult to get and to keep and it will be difficult to maintain the quality over the years."

Governor Keith Hendrick asked if these people — "Solomon-like, who will understand the student situation" — can be found.

Marnie Palkin warned that "if the chairmen are incapable of deciding justly, fairly, then the whole thing will fall apart."

The committee, acting in agreement with the U of T Act, resolved that the suspension or dismissal of a teacher or the suspension or expulsion of a student must be confirmed by the Governing Council acting on the advice of the President.

Hendrick wondered if this would not entail a new hearing of the case by the Governing Council before it could act, casting doubt on the tribunal's authority as the ultimate court that it is supposed to be.

The committee made frivolous or vexatious appeals a violation of the code of behaviour. It is leaving the determination of the nature of the penalty up to the tribunal.

Vice-provost Robin Ross pointed out to the committee that the code of behaviour applies only to the University of Toronto and not to the federated colleges, which have independent jurisdiction.

Chinese math is "red and expert": profs

By MICHAEL O'KEEFE

The gap between scientific research and social needs was attacked in a series of discussions held Wednesday in Sid Smith as part of the Math Day activities.

An audience of about 40 people heard math professors Chandler Davis and Steppen Salaff speak on mathematics in China after the revolution. Physics professor Jim Prentice former math prof David Spring followed with a general critique of the role of science in society.

Salaff began with a discussion of the problems facing mathematics in China in 1949, the year the revolution succeeded. These included a rather heavy emigration of top professors, a shortage of Chinese texts, and a tradition of rote learning.

China also suffered from what Salaff described as a "semi-colonial legacy".

Chinese math had long been dominated by western institutions and journals, especially in the selection of research topics. This left Chinese mathematicians extremely vulnerable to "imperialist hostility," which manifested itself in the U.S. blockade of the Chinese coast during the Korean war.

The goal of Chinese mathematicians, said Salaff, was to become both "Red and expert." They sought to develop and expertise that was relevant to the stage of development of the Chinese political economy. This goal was pursued in three main phases; the Great Leap Forward (1958), the Socialist Education Campaign (1962-65), and the Cultural Revolution (1966-70).

Chandler Davis, who visited China in the fall of 1971, added his impressions of the present state of Chinese mathematics.

The universities, which had been closed during the Cultural Revolution, reopened in late 1970. By this time, all of the math professors had spent at least two years in either a factory or an agricultural commune, working on problems relevant to the productive needs of the Chinese society.

Davis commented that the effects of this campaign were quite noticeable, especially in the subject matter of the texts. While some theory remains in the texts, the emphasis lies heavily on the application of math to specific, relevant problems.

Entrance requirements to universities reflect the changing priorities of the Chinese educational system. A university applicant must have completed upper middle school, have two years of factory or commune experience, and be nominated by his fellow workers. Davis noted that only 30 per cent of Chinese students are admitted to upper middle school, but added that they participate in "excellent" on-the-job study programs, which can also lead to university training.

Davis cited a lack of national mathematics associations, poor communication between universities, and the absence of a coherent program to train new professors as weaknesses within the Chinese system. He was quick to remind the audience, however, that the universities had only been in operation for a year when he was there. He emphasized that "the program of self-criticism is a continuous one."

Ball results hanging

Today's one o'clock staff meeting will be devoted to celebrating the morning's victory over SAC, unless we lost.

Because the outcome of the annual SAC versus Varsity conflict is not known at press time, staffers are requested to attend today's meeting to find out the outcome of this morning's ball hockey game. Champagne will be provided if Good triumphs.

No matter the outcome, this week's gathering, at the Daily Planet office, 91 St. George Street, will feature a talk on staff democracy, by outgoing editor Alex Podnick, although no one else will be allowed to say anything.

Even at this late date, new blood is invited to join the bloodstream of this vital organ.

SSSC trailer used to organize pickets and fees strike since September was found moved from outside 215 Huron (fees office) to delivery area behind Roberts library. It was last seen by SSSC members outside 215 Huron at 6 pm Wed night, according to spokeswoman Denise Havers. SSSC has arranged for it to be taken back. U of T police had no knowledge of how it happened.

Nationality isn't a false issue

The Legislature's Select Committee on Cultural and Economic Nationalism and Ontario's universities are on a collision course over the committee's request for a nationality and education breakdown of the composition of university teaching and administrative staff.

The committee gave Ontario universities two weeks in which to provide it with individual data listing department, academic rank, 1972 citizenship, country of first degree, country of last degree, and province or country of previous employment.

The universities, including U of T, quickly tossed this suggestion aside. Instead, they replied, they would supply the committee with bulk figures, grouping together the individual data.

This, they reasoned, would protect individual staff from identification and potential harassment or embarrassment because of their background. Without outrightly suggesting it, they hinted that the committee was opening the way for a witchhunt against non-Canadian staff.

That possibility is very real, especially considering Canadian liberals' recent fascination with nationalism. Groups like the Canadian Liberation Movement's 85% Quota Campaign Committee have all but created a picture of a new McCarthy era in which non-Canadian profs will be indiscriminately turfed out because they don't have the required citizenship.

And such a simplistic approach smacks of nothing more than narrow bigotry and racism. When discrimination — and discrimination in reverse is what we're talking about — is proposed for no other reason than mere "nationalism", it can be nothing more than racism. The legitimate aspirations of any people for self-determination cannot be denied, but these aspirations must rest on principle and not nationality.

Merely being Canadian, however, is no guarantee of teaching ability or intellectual capability, which be two important attributes of university staff.

Nonetheless, citizenship and nationality carry with them important cultural implications for what is being taught in our universities, implications which the academics running Canadian universities have ignored when making staffing decisions. Despite their denials, culture permeates everything that one does and the experience and socialization of a person's background play a crucial role in shaping their world vision.

Non-Canadian teaching staff and administrators (administrators who not only decide who will be hired, but what they will teach) dominate most Canadian universities. (U of T is a rare exception, and even here the number of non-Canadians is a significant minority.) Their lack of familiarity with Canada and issues which concern it breed, if not outright contempt, then disinterest. The dearth of Indigenous course content in Canadian universities bears witness to this fact. And, even the little there is today hasn't been there long, but is a recent response to increasing criticism of the lack of such content.

Even the long absences which many "Canadians" experience while pursuing higher degrees throw up potential obstacles to relating their work to Canadian experience.

One Canadian political scientist, for example, confessed during a seminar on student unrest that his knowledge of the Canadian scene stopped years before when he left for the States to do his graduate work. Accordingly, all he could offer his students by way of example was the American experience. Such occurrences are not isolated.

Administrators, deans and department heads, including U of T's, still only begrudgingly admit the place of Canadian content in their faculties and the relevance of Canadian content and Canadian perspectives within their divisions.

They have resisted, and continue to resist, teaching staff quotas not so much because of their fear of persecution of non-Canadian staff, but because they don't want to provide information which might invite external interference to ensure that they put a stop to existing discrimination against Canadians and graduates of Canadians institutions of higher learning.

Just as ultra-nationalists overemphasize the nationality question, Canadian academics have too long insisted that what's American or British is best. Both positions are equally indefensible. For years, cliquish departmental hiring practices have friends consulting friends at the foreign institutions where they got their graduate degrees to fill staff vacancies. Only recently, for example, have Canadian universities advertised openly for staff.

So, it's easy to understand the legislature committee's desire for the facts and figures. If protecting individuals from undue harassment is indeed the real concern of the reluctant Ontario universities, then it would seem quite appropriate that they be required to provide the requested data — not the camouflaged data — confidentially to the committee and its researchers. The committee could then undertake a serious study to ascertain whether hiring and course selection practices still discriminate against qualified Canadians and what the direct co-relation between non-Canadian administrators and neglect of Canadian staff and content is.

If their findings reveal that such discrimination and negligence still persists, the government should not hesitate from taking appropriate remedial action — either direct or indirect. The universities, despite their attitude, should not be completely beyond the influence of the people of the province.

Must pay for 'free speech'

In the process of booking the Medical Sciences Auditorium for the SDS "Teach-In on Racism" this Friday and Saturday, I have been informed by the administration that it requires two campus cops to be on duty at our expense, due to the controversial nature of the meeting.

This is nothing more than a "protection racket". It's "freedom of speech", if you can afford it.

SDS will be charged $100 this weekend for "freedom of speech". That's the cost of rented cops at $6.20 an hour.

Even if we wanted "protection", the U of T cops are the last people to go to. Deputy Chief Irwin testified in the trial of Bill Getty that their only responsibility the day the sit-in was busted was to pick up newspapers and magazines. They left the rough stuff for the Metros. I don't think U of T cops can offer $100 worth of protection. Why, they even have trouble with the SSSC-CLM!

This "protection" is an example of the price of "freedom" here in Canada. A worker can run for parliament — if he has the money to quit his job and run a campaign for two months. Anyone can express an opinion — provided they own a newspaper or tv station. A man is innocent until proven guilty — if he hires a lawyer and gives up several days salary for missed work in order to fight in court.

Lewis Freuer, John Crispo, and Ian Hector of the medical faculty (who says Italians are "culturally predisposed" to lying), are paid by the U of T to teach racist and anti-working class ideology. The U of T cops and Jack Sword help send Tom McLaughlin to the Don Jail, without paying for "protection". But, SDS wants to have a teach-in on the cruelty and injustice of racism and the administration decides to charge us $100 for "free" speech.

Real story on women in Meds

To answer David McKnight's (Varsity, February 9) query about "How many applicants to medical schools are women and what is the relative proportion of them accepted?": In 1967-68, when 12.7 per cent of the applicants to Canadian medical schools were women, 4.4 per cent of the admissions were women (Fish and Neisb, CMAJ, 1968). So now we're not speculating...

Fifty-seven per cent of women applicants were accepted. 43 per cent of men applicants were accepted. There is discrimination. The history of "educational opportunities" leaves little doubt that it requires more "affirmative action" to break traditional white male admittance patterns (if there is ever to be social justice).

Still, three Canadian universities demanded a 10 per cent higher academic qualification from the women into the medical program (Report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, 1970). "Affirmative action plans" to increase representation of women are based upon the idea that once women are in occupations that are traditionally male, the sex-typing of these occupations will be eradicated and it will be clear that women are wanted. Using a relatively few number of women (795 out of 5,054 — 1970 enrolment, according to Collishaw and Grainger, CMAJ, 1971) as role models, how can we expect to make all women feel welcome, confident, and ambitious?

You miss one small but deep point, David McKnight. One-half of the people in Canada are women. One-eighth of the applicants to medical school are women. Yet, the doors are open to women...

I guess it isn't so easy to forget all those years of sex-role conditioning that our society taught us so well.

Arab claims are called fantasies

This is in reference to the Arab Students' Association's letter concerning the double standard of the advertisement placed on behalf of Soviet Jewry. Admittedly some Palestinian Arabs in Israel circa 1945 and 1956 were forced out, but the question is by whom?

Correct me if I am wrong, gentlemen, but weren't those same people urged most strenuously by the surrounding Arab governments to leave their homes and businesses in Israel (then "Palestine") so as not to be in the way when the mighty forces of Arab aggression rolled their war machines through the tiny state and pushed all Jews, oh forgive me, Zionists (the exact same thing) into the sea? Weren't those same "Palestinians" excited in 1967 when Nasser once more advocated that the Jews be pushed into the sea, when pictures of mothers and their children being drowned under the Arab heel were very common in the daily papers? So much for your myth of "systematically dispossessed".

As for another fantasy, the oppression of the remaining "Palestinians", the most recent example of the Western Bank will do. Prior to June, 1967, the "Palestinians" were kept by their governments, under the most despicable conditions and no outcry was heard from the present Arab organizations, at least none against this oppression. They were too busy with the first myth to bother. After the Six Day War, sanitary conditions were enforced, electricity was brought to these areas. Other benefits were accrued, including increased prosperity.

Gentlemen: kindly inform me as to one specific example of persecution against the non-Jewish population in Israel as such. If any of you had ever visited Israel during the present era, you would realize just how ridiculous these fanciful accusations are.

As for "repatriation", pray tell when, within 2 years of 1948 or 1956 was this requested? As for administration of the "occupied territories", the Israeli authorities have gone so far as to refuse the right of their own citizens to be buried there, while allowing the return of the Arabs to their cemeteries of pre-1967. Please cite me one desecration of Arab cemeteries and non-Jewish holy places. You can't!

Admittedly, certain strategic locations will never be bargained with, such as Jerusalem, the Golan Heights, Sharm el Sheikh, for they represent the most basic religious and security needs for the effective life of the country.

In summary, the Arab Students' Association is citing many wrongs which have not been committed as their giving the issue a better perspective. They are only clouding the issue

Marxist derides capitalism as "inflexible"

The Varsity—Jim Martin

By JIM MARTIN

"Capitalism is an inflexible system preventing labour from getting a larger share of national income" through multi-national expansion of corporations, said Yale economist Stephen Hymer to 40 people at a West Metro Waffle meeting Tuesday night.

To find labour willing to work at the pace and price demanded by capitalism, the corporations have moved to the third world, Hymer said. There still exists in the third world a large "reserve work force" to pressure the workers earning wages to be subordinate and to maintain a high "cheap labour" level of production.

But there is another motive antagonistic to labour behind the rise of multi-national corporations according to Hymer an expert on multi-national corporations. He used the example of IBM, 55 per cent of whose assets are now located outside of the U.S. Each IBM plant makes only a limited number of components and these same parts are often made elsewhere in the world.

Thus labour strikes no longer can cripple IBM's production; manufacture of the affected items is merely transferred, and plants in "troublesome" areas can be closed.

Italian workers who took over several factories recently found in at least one case that the technical information needed to run their factory was not even located within the country, Hymer stated.

This situation has prompted unions increasingly to strike and bargain on a national level, rather than limiting themselves to action against a particular employer.

But, Hymer pointed out, the "active army" of wage earners soon discovers, when negotiating on a large scale, the basic inflexibility in the capitalist system. Wages of a few can be increased at the expense of others, but attempts to increase wages nationally involve the wage earning segment getting a larger share of what they produce, which their employers will resist.

Hymer drew from Marx for a breakdown of the types of workers used by capitalist owners of the means of production. "Marx saw three groups in the capitalist labour force: the 'active army' of steady wage earners, the 'latent army' of non-wage earners, such as farmers, and the important 'reserve army', unemployed or not steady wage earners".

The threat from the reserve army to the security of the active segment is used by the owners to keep the workers disciplined and at a high level of production, Hymer contended. This has been the case recently, as labour consciousness has risen with the growth of capitalism.

However, Hymer said the 25 years since the war and depression have faded memories of mass unemployment and wartime production, resulting in a "loss of discipline" of the "worker's army" with respect to their bosses.

Capitalist reaction to this and the obvious advantages of worker takeover has caused fear in the U.S. of fascism due to the fact that business interests see this logic, Hymer said. He described a Business Week article on "Union Trouble" warning that a great number of workers were "discontented and frustrated" with the system. Strikes were criticized for hurting both the worker in his role as consumer and business profits.

Thus the defenders of capitalism are urging price and wage controls to save the collapsing monetary situation, Hymer asserted, while spreading out their interests to underdeveloped nations, where workers have not the organized power to challenge their control over the means of production.

Maintenance strike looms at York

DOWNSVIEW (CUP)—Thirty York University maintenance workers have returned to their jobs, after five colleagues were reinstated. The five had been suspended February 15 for refusing to agree immediately to a request to work overtime.

The maintenance workers voted to return February 17 after a tentative agreement was reached between Jack Bird, national representative of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) and Don Mitchell, York's head of personnel. In the agreement, the university recognized that overtime was a voluntary procedure. The workers thought they had won their point on a "matter of principle", and didn't want to endanger last-minute contract negotiations that were conducted yesterday.

The workers believed the requested overtime work was part of management's plans in preparation for a possible strike beginning Monday. On February 11, 238 York maintenance workers, members of CUPE local 1356, voted to strike unless a settlement is reached before then. At present, the union and the university are deadlocked over 33 bargaining points.

The overtime work in dispute February 15 was "preventative maintenance", usually accorded secondary priority as regular work lags. The workers have said they will only work overtime in emergencies while contract negotiations continue.

The union is asking for a one dollar across the board wage hike and 100 percent paid benefits, giving them a comparable contract to North York school board workers.

Male cleaners now receive $3.50 an hour, female housemaids $3.00 and tradespeople between $4.50 and $5.90.

The university is offering a six percent increase to cover both wage and benefit increases.

The union is also seeking plant-wide seniority to protect job security.

ty. The administration wants classification seniority to give them leeway to lay off junior people in any category they declare overstuffed.

The union wants to prohibit the use of non-union labor in any campus building. The old contract only covered existing buildings, leaving the administration free to determine how to handle maintenance in new buildings. The issue of voluntary overtime was not a bargaining point and it is now too late to add it to the new contract negotiations.

After learning of the suspensions, the thirty men at the university's physical plant unanimously decided to stop work until the five were reinstated.

One of the suspended workers suggested the suspensions were a deliberate intimidation attempt. Last month, nine workers were laid off after contract talks entered their crucial phase.

SACPress will fold

After years of talk about shutting down its unprofitable, basement printing bureau, the Students' Administrative Council has finally decided to close up shop effective February 28.

The decision to close down the money-losing press was made by a council meeting Wednesday. Ratifying an executive motion, the council decided to request one employee be kept on part-time, to help with layout and design needs for course evaluations.

Winding up the operation will cost the council $3,740.73 in severance pay for SAC Press' three employees. But, the executive felt the expenditure was justified by SACPress' $14,000 loss over the last seven months. The council had budgeted for a $9,000 SACPress deficit during the current fiscal year.

Council started SACPress in 1966 to handle its printing and duplicating needs. From its commencement the bureau has been losing money.

Last year council phased out much of SACPress' composition work and pared its staff, concentrating instead on bulk photocopying and poster design and printing. However, even elimination of the bureau's most inefficient services failed to stem its substantial losses.

Just before Reading Week, word leaked out that the executive was once again toying with the perennial proposal to shut down SACPress. Within days, the executive announced it was taying off two of the bureau's three employees, leaving the SACPress manager to run the shop himself. The executive passed the necessary motions terminating SACPress' operations the following week.

Police watch as Marxists beaten

The Varsity—Peter McMillan

Metro Cops stood by in Sunday's demonstration while Western Guard members beat up Marxist-Leninists.

Toronto police stood by as Western Guard members beat and kicked a member of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist), and then arrested seven of his comrades and none of the attackers, at Sunday's 5,000-strong law and order rally Sunday.

Organized and publicized by the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, the Toronto Star and CHUM radio in support of Toronto's police, demonstrators were being told "what a great bunch of young people you are" by CHUM's Dick Smythe, when the Maoist group's counter-demonstration was begun attacked by the Guard and by demonstrators carrying "Toronto's Cops are Tops" signs.

A witness said that "about 20 people punched and kicked in the face" the Maoist, who was handing out leaflets claiming that capitalism created crime and police murders.

The Maoists had circled the demonstration twice, chanting "cops are not the issue". After gathering a crowd of about 300, they were beginning to make speeches when their signs were ripped down and the fighting occurred.

Witnesses said that police ignored the fight, waiting to make arrests until it had settled down. One cop was later overheard telling a Western Guard member: "I hear you're on our side". The Maoists later said that most of their leaflets were confiscated by police before the rally began.

The rally, which The Star predicted would attract 50,000, featured spirited cheering for Metro police, described by speakers as "the best cops on the continent". Mayor David Crombie spoke, stressing the need to support the police since the recent shooting of two policemen.

Western Guard members, saying "We're Canadian nationalists", accused China of sending crime-producing drugs to Canada, but the Maoists responded that capitalism leads to crime, and that drugs are distributed by profit-making businessmen.

Board orders Black activist deported to U.S.

By ELAINE FARRAGHER

A man who fled the United States because of threats on his life has been ordered deported because he was once alleged to have committed a crime of "moral turpitude".

James Wilson, who served time at Attica State Prison for manslaughter, made his first appeal Wednesday to the Immigration Appeal Board. A decision by the board is still pending and is expected to be made by early next week.

According to Lyn Blair, who is working to build support for his case, Wilson became politicized at Attica and upon his release, joined "Action for a Better Community" (ABC) in Rochester. He subsequently became a strong force in the black community.

According to Blair, Wilson was soon arrested on an assault charge in spite of the fact that he in no way fitted the description of the man who was being sought. Wilson is black and the description called for a white man, she said.

Groups in Rochester banned together in his defence and to challenge the judicial system, but as the trial date approached, numerous threats were made on his life.

As a result of the threats, Wilson fled to France and then entered Canada legally on a visitor's visa, near the end of last September.

In November, Wilson was picked up in Toronto on charges which according to Blair "were so obviously false that they were dismissed at a preliminary hearing."

But because of this incident, his criminal record in the U.S. was discovered and actions were started to have him deported back to the United States. Officials in the U.S. have made no attempt to have him extradited. Wilson has been held in the Don Jail since November.

At the appeal, defense lawyer Edward Greenspan stressed the vagueness of the term "moral turpitude". The term, he said, was redundant. Meaning "morally immoral", it had never been defined in the law books and was in fact undefinable, he contended.

Greenspan also claimed that the deportation special enquiry officer had violated the privilege of a defendant not to incriminate himself by compelling Wilson to admit that he had been convicted of manslaughter.

Greenspan submitted that compulsory testimony in the case of deportation is the same as forcing a defendant to take the stand against himself. Since the evidence was improperly obtained he argued, it must be excluded, and there is therefore no evidence to support deportation.

Greenspan continued that even if moral turpitude was accepted as a viable term, manslaughter does not necessarily involve it, since it is possible to commit manslaughter by accident.

Greenspan concluded that Wilson had not entered the country illegally (which would be reason enough for deporting him) since he was never asked if he had a criminal record and thus did not purposely withhold the information.

A decision on the appeal will probably be handed down early next week. If the appeal is turned down, Wilson will have the federal appeal courts and the Supreme court to make further appeals to before he is actually deported.

However, in one case last fall, Edwin Hogan was forcibly deported before his last avenue of appeal had been closed to him.

Workers happy with settlement

Both sides say they are pleased with the outcome of U of T's animal laboratory technicians settlement, but the university came closer to obtaining its last offer than the workers.

The 44 workers, organized last fall by the Service Employees' International Union, won substantial increases in their first contract, which will run until July, 1974.

After October 1 this year, when the last of three pay boosts occurs, the workers will be earning between $2.97 and $4.25 per hour. Presently they are paid between $2.51 and $2.84 per hour.

SEIU Local 204 business agent

Don Barclay said Monday he thought the settle was "very good". Except for the lowest category of lab technician he said the settlement is "exactly what we're looking for", although the union had demanded wages between $3.11 $4.11 per hour.

Some of the workers obtained up to 50 per cent hikes because of a combination of reclassification and the pay hike. Ironically, Barclay said, some of the workers received notification last week from the university of the 3.5 per cent raise they would have been given had they not joined the union.

The workers voted 100 per cent in favour of the settlement last Wednesday, Barclay said.

U of T labour relations manager John Parker said yesterday that he is "quite pleased" with the agreement, achieved during conciliation February 8.

The outlay required to meet the terms of the contract is close to the theoretical limits defined by grants and other income that the animal lab division of the university generates.

From Elton John to Groucho Marx

The music world could hardly believe that Elton John composed the fragile melody to "Your Song" in 10 minutes and that, in fact, all his songs are written in less than half an hour. But with the release of the newest album, Don't Shoot Me I'm Only The Piano Player, Elton's phenomenally short compositional time is not only believable but all too obvious in this, his weakest selection of songs to date.

Apparently, after the Madman Across the Water LP, Elton John was disenchanted with working with strings as well as the large number of people who added other back up instruments. Part of that feeling evolved from the complexities of the recording situation and part from a desire to get back to straight rock'n roll. So Elton acquired the services of guitarist Davey Johnstone to add to those of Dee Murray on bass and Nigel Olsson on drums. Now he had a band with which he could both tour and record. The "new" Elton John made his album debut on Honky Chateau, which marked the first time the novelty aspect of Elton's live performances infused his recorded efforts.

But now the doors have swung wide open. The newest album is rushed (coming only six months after the last one), ill conceived and artless. All the arrangements are uninteresting, and lack depth and excitement and undoubtedly reflect a general substitution of commercialism for artistic quality. "Daniel" is probably the best song on the album but it suffers from a sickly effete arrangement that features an inappropriate organ (piano would have been a vast improvement) and an excess of maracas and cymbals plus plain poor production.

On a general level, the melodies are undramatic with Elton rarely using the vocal range he's exhibited in the past on better songs like "Burn Down The Mission" and "Tiny Dancer." Then too, many of the tunes are reminiscent of other songs. For instance, "I'm Going To Be A Teenage Idol" echoes "Honky Cat" while "Midnight Creeper" sounds remarkably similar to James Taylor's "Night Owl". The very nature of "Crocodile Rock" gives it license to borrow from Freddie Cannon's "Pallades Park" and lift the falsetto line from Pat Boone's "Speedy Gonzales".

Lyricist Bernie Taupin should take some of the blame for his increasingly banal lyrics. He seems to be more rapped up with "the state of teenage blues", as illustrated by titles such as "Teacher I Need You" and "Teenage Idol", than more relevant material like the portrait of the Western redneck painter in "Texan Love Song".

It's unfortunate that lacklustre efforts like "Crocodile Rock" are snapped up by a musically ignorant public, because it will certainly encourage artists like Elton John to lower their standards. Don't Shoot Me, I'm Only The Piano Player is in the main a highly commercial album with few laudable merits.

The English trio of Barry, Robin and Maurice Gibb, the Bee Gees, began their recording career in 1967 and have put out some nine albums since then, as well as having composed over 2,000 songs. Life In A Tin Can (Polydor) follows much the same pattern as former albums and the compositions are identical in style to their earlier tunes.

The album sides are labelled "A" and "B", rather than 1 and 2 and it could very well be an accurate classification of the compositions by quality. Songs on "B" employ too much vibrato in the vocals and less control in the melodies and lyrics than on "A". The Gibb brothers do make good use of the contrast between soft acoustic guitar passages and those that employ a full blown orchestra (arranged by Johnny Pate). The production, credited to the Gibbs, is commendable. It's definitely a quality recording that will appeal to a middle of the road (easy listening) audience.

Groucho Marx has always been one of my favourite comedians, so I approached the twin album set, An Evening With Groucho (A&M) with high expectations. The affair left me somewhat unsatisfied.

The album is a recording of a Groucho Marx "concert". Groucho sits on stage and reminisces about his family, and many famous friends, like W.C. Fields and T.S. Elliot. But, too often, the aged Groucho has trouble getting his words out, and then too much of the album is devoted to songs from the Marx Brothers movies and stage productions. Groucho, although quite short of breath, wades through the tunes quite admirably considering his age.

In the last few years Traffic has maintained a core membership that includes the original trio of Stevie Winwood, Jim Cappaldi and Chris Wood, plus percussionist Rebop Kwaku Baah. On Shoot Out At The Fantasy Factory the new "guest" members are Dave Hood on bass and Roger Hawkins on drums, replacing Rick Grech and Jim Gordon. The overall difference in sound caused by the change is imperceptible. As always Stevie Winwood's production is understatedly superb.

The songs on this new album tend to be long so there are only 5 in total. Shoot Out At The Fantasy Factory features phased vocals over strong rhythmic lines that are carried by drums, congas and bass. It's too bad that the lyrics are mumbled. The 14 minute "Roll Right Stones" comes close in stature to "Low Spark Of High Heeled Boys", as a tight melodic evolution that leaves room for what are almost sensual instrumental riffs. It's only fault is in length. The song should build to a climax and end abruptly, but instead it continues for at least two unnecessary minutes, culminating in an undramatic fade out.

Learned societies:
opportunities for self-praise by the incompetent

Rampant mediocrity: a U of T hallmark

When the chairman of the mathematics department, Professor Duff, recently told protesting students "Mathematics is learned and not taught," his statement was not a characterization of the essential and irrevocable nature of things, but a tacit admission of the real state of affairs.

For the last two decades, the University of Toronto has been involved in the pursuit of Acadamerica. With its view of reality clouded by the mistaken notion that it must become the Harvard of Canada, an aggressive attempt has been made to turn this university into an institution specializing in the closely allied activities of graduate education and research. In the process the quality of undergraduate education has suffered immeasurably from a continuous redistribution of resources away from this activity. As the university approaches what may turn out to be a very long academic winter, it is important to realize that the emperor has no clothes.

The U of T's conception of itself would be easier to accept were the place not entirely naked. If Toronto had really become a first rate knowledge-producing institution, the sacrifice of undergraduates might have been more palatable. As matters stand now, however, this university has compromised the education it offers for little more than an inflated conception of its own ego.

Beyond this, and even more serious since it casts into doubt the University's ability to adjust to its new reality, the pursuit of Acadamerica has delivered a large part of the control of this institution into the hands of a group of academics whose unity springs from their mediocrity, and whose every action is oriented to protecting their own self-interest. To understand the membership of this group and how it achieved power, it is necessary to understand the process by which the university cast its image in the research mould.

Thirty years ago the U of T was a very different place. A small elite university (in fact a series of religiously affiliated colleges) it catered primarily to the children of the very wealthy. With the advent of mass education (expansion in enrolments, extensive government support, and the ideology of education for all) the university changed its image. U of T, like other universities of comparable social-class stature in other societies (Harvard, Princeton and Yale in the U.S., and Oxford and Cambridge in the U.K.), traded in its social class image for an academic one. Using a reputation based on its social-class prestige it was able to attract academically superior students. Where the old image had emphasized education for the children of the ruling class, the new image catered to upper-middle and middle-middle parents who wanted to ensure their children places in the newly emerging technocracy.

Yet if this was the face the university turned to students' parents, it was little more than good public relations. An image of "academic excellence" is paradoxically not measured by the opinions of those who consume the educational product, but by the opinions of those who produce it, other academics. The real ambitions of the University lay not in pleasing students' parents, but in the pursuit of a North American reputation. U of T became a slavish copy of Harvard, the university of then-President Claude Bissell's dreams. These dreams were even more illusory than the myth of open accessibility for students.

The realities of the educational situation in Canada imposed different constraints. Two of these were a particular problem. First, there was insufficient money, and this money became increasingly tied to teaching activity. Second, the academic marketplace in Canada was unfavourable. The chief problem here lay in the weakness of supply of high quality academic manpower.

In comparison with Harvard (or Princeton or Yale or even certain state schools such as Berkeley) Toronto was poor. It could not as did Harvard use endowed funds to build a research establishment. In Canada moreover, the sources of research money have been fewer, the amounts of money available much smaller, and the research grants insufficiently large to cover the actual costs of research. Whereas in the U.S. research increasingly offered the way for a university to grow rich, in Canada it required continuous subsidy from other income. In Canadian universities the only other income was money paid to the university for the education of students. In Ontario "formula financing" was the ultimate recognition of this constraint.

Bissell's ambition for a university primarily devoted to the research-aggrandisement of the faculty was thus thwarted by financial constraints. While tax money given to the university for the education of students could be covertly used to subsidize research, the level of budget flexibility was low. In its submissions to the Committee on University Affairs and in the lengthy pleas of Charles Hanly (Who Pays? University Financing in Ontario) Toronto was to enter its pleas for more money to build "academic excellence." But as the strategy of mass education lost its political appeal to the Progressive Conservative Government, these pleas fell on increasingly deaf ears.

Reckoning the account in 1973, measuring the rating of the U of T in Acadamerica, the conclusion is inescapable. This university is one of many large "state schools" on the North American continent. Its academic, knowledge-producing reputation is at best middle level. As in so many other areas, the slavish copying of the U.S. resulted in a second-rate Canadian replica.

The failure of the Bissell strategy did signal the end of the attempt. The expensive white elephants from this era are to be found all over the campus. The Roberts Library, intended exclusively as a graduate-research library in Humanities and Social Science, was built against provincial government advice. The overstuffed Medical School absorbs 115 per cent of the income that it generates for the University. Some of its faculty draw professorial salary for teaching two weeks per year. There are numerous specialized research institutes (Quantitative Analysis, Criminology, Environmental Science and Engineering). Most have minimal involvement in undergraduate education, some are now foundering for lack of funds. All of these, and more invisible things such as the Library's rare-book collection, are symbols of the Bissell era. All were obtained by tightening the screw on undergraduate education.

Next to money, the second major constraint on the U of T's grandiose plans lay in the area of academic manpower. The supply of academic manpower in Canada was weak. After World War II the academic community became "internationalized." ("Internationalization," the creation of a "world academic community" was the misnomer which described the academic equivalent of U.S. imperialism.) Academic salaries in the U.S. became so high, and research opportunities so great, that there was a steady flow of both notable academics and able students from other countries to the U.S. As the U.S. came increasingly to dominate world science, its attractiveness as an academic setting increased. Academics in the U.S. taught less, researched more, and earned more money. Other societies could retain their talented researchers only because they offered the particularistic advantages of distinct language and culture, or loyalties to family and friends.

In this competition Canada was at a severe disadvantage. Its own universities were expanding fast at exactly the time at which the "brain drain" reached its height. Canadian universities were forced to recruit from the academic manpower that was available. Its own graduate schools were weak and producing an insufficient number of PhD's to fill the fast expanding number of university positions. The U.S. was importing a steady flow of talented professors and graduate students, retaining the best, and permitting a return flow of second rate goods. In short there was little competition for academic jobs in Canada and few applicants for universities to choose between.

The conclusion suggested by this reasoning is fairly obvious. Many of the academics who came to the U of T before the late sixties presumably came here because this university was more attractive than universities in the U.S. to which these people could have moved. At no time during this period would Toronto have ranked among the top North American Universities, and in general the most able knowledge-producers would not have been attracted here. (As might be expected, the exceptions to these generalizations are in the low-expense, slower-expanding, traditional disciplines where market conditions have been more favourable. Philosophy is one such example.)

Nor did the problems cease at the level of initial recruitment. Judgements about competence are always relative. There is little point to firing the incompetent who can only be replaced by another incompetent. At this university through the sixties, tenure was given as a matter of routine by deacanal committees which made favourable decisions on the flimsiest evidence. In an obvious response to changed market conditions (around 1970 there was suddenly an abundance of academic manpower) tenure refusals are now beginning to occur.

The nature of tenure granting procedures at this university are themselves a comment on the absence of past standards in this area. They are, in a word, sloppy. The notion that academics should be subjected to "peer judgement" is supposedly well shared among university professors. The ideology suggests that only the "competent" shall sit in judgement. Yet the University's present regulations contain only the vaguest of such safeguards.

The chairman of a department is enjoined to consult with a senior committee whose composition is not specified. The deacanal committee to which a chairman recommends and which in turn makes the final, binding recommendation includes two voting members who are (or who are designated to represent) the Dean of the appropriate faculty, and the Dean of the Graduate School. Since these people would not normally be competent in a faculty member's discipline, the expertise they bring to the deliberations is entirely obscure. In short, they are not "peers," and according to academic ideology should not judge at all.

With tenure given as a matter of course, it was of no consequence that judgement was not by peers, and that recommendations from departments were based on ad hoc and entirely informal discourse between members of the ruling administrative cliques in departments. Tenure decisions could be made over lunch at the Faculty Club. Had any serious stakes been involved in these proceedings, there would have been loud complaints, and a house-cleaning long ago.

All of the comments so far have been addressed to the question of knowledge-producing standards: to an assessment of the U of T in the terms in which it wants to view itself. It is easy to slide unawares into a definition of university worthiness which weighs as important only the verblage that, passing for wisdom, piles higher and deeper in every university library. I make no mention of teaching because most departments in this university have not viewed this activity with any seriousness for two decades.

It is of course true that when backed into a corner by undergraduates, academics will mouth a few well worn phrases about the essential relationship between research and teaching. "No man can be a good teacher unless he is actively involved in research." These phrases have the empty resonance of statements delivered from authority alone and are easily discredited.

First, the people who make them are also prone to make lengthy arguments which suggest that teaching effectiveness cannot be evaluated. (Student ratings are, after all, not peer ratings and are ipso facto threatening.) If teaching effectiveness cannot be evaluated (a statement with which I strongly disagree) it would be impossible to know that good researchers are good teachers. The inconsistency between these two arguments is seldom recognized.

Second, the relationship between research and teaching ability is a matter of evidence and cannot be reduced to a truism. Is it in fact the case that the best researchers make the best teachers? There is no systematic evidence on this score, and most academics can remember at least one instance of a teacher who wrote well but was inaudible from more than six feet or who was so nervous before an audience that he gave totally disorganized and incomprehensible lectures. The existence of disconfirming instances such as this ought to suggest a more cautious approach to the "necessary" relationship usually asserted.

Finally quite plausible arguments can be made on exactly the opposite score.

First, there is an enormous amount of variation in the "level" of university courses. Introductory courses do not seem to require teachers with gnostic research involvements, but rather people who can make what are simple, and to them routine ideas come alive. That most researchers regard first year courses as a necessary drudge is well known. Such attitudes aren't likely to be conducive to vibrant performances.

Second, it is also fairly clear that the more time spent on research, the less time can be given to lecture preparation. There are, after all, only so many hours, even in an academic day.

Apart from arguing that assessments of research are automatically evaluations of teaching, faculty have made little attempt to institute teaching assessment. Professors do not attend one another's lectures. Indeed there is a taboo against so doing. The assessment of teaching is thus plagued by a convenient lack of "peer" information.

Teaching evaluations which are completed by students are a recent creation at this university, and clearly cannot have formed the basis of any assessment for most of the present faculty. They are, furthermore, usually discounted on one of several grounds.

In general, they are neither well constructed nor given sufficient administrative attention. As a consequence, much of the variation in response is accounted for not by characteristics of the person teaching the course, but by uncontrolled features of the setting in which they are administered. If 60 per cent of the students fail to show up on the day the evaluation is administered, what do the data mean?

I'm not suggesting that such problems can't be handled better; they can. There is, however, a neat circularity in the approach of most departments to course evaluations. Since faculty don't really want to evaluate teaching, little effort is devoted to the attempt. The poor quality of the resulting data is then used as a demonstration of the uselessness of the attempt. Teaching performance is judged impossible to evaluate.

The Varsity—Kris Szanowek

Mediocre professors often

Another favourite device having much the same twist is to allow students to administer the evaluations. This fact can then be used as prima facie grounds for discounting the whole thing. Finally, it all else falls there is Duff's strategy of turning a blind eye. "Students rate highest those professors from whom they learn least." The Mathematics Department apparently acts on this presumption by firing its highest-rated teachers.

The emotional, negative response that the whole question of teaching evaluation creates in many faculty goes far beyond what can be attributed to rational doubt about the effectiveness of procedures. The root of this problem is fear; fear that students will come up from slavery.

Plenty of faculty are poor teachers. Were it not for ways of protecting themselves against this realization, most poor teachers could not continue. It's hard to go on in the face of continuous negative feedback from exactly the people who are supposed to be benefiting. Professors protect themselves in much the same way as do prison guards and asylum attendants. They ascribe to those they oversee the status of non-person. What begins as circumscribed positional authority becomes a world view. The word "student" on the lips of many faculty members is a condescending sneer. Negative conceptions of students are a resource on which faculty draw to bolster their own self-concepts. Student opinion can thus be discounted simply by virtue of its origin.

The second thing that teaching assessments do is to expose faculty in a very public way to a common standard by which they can be compared with other faculty. Insult is thus added to injury; not only do student opinions form the basis of evaluation, but the results also allow students to compare professors. Research activity by comparison is a relatively private matter, the property of an elite community of "colleagues" who can in general be relied upon to be polite.

What's more, in contrast with research incompetence, it's much harder to persuade students that a man's demonstrated incompetence as a teacher is offset by his performance as associate chairman. This is how the poor researcher reaches a tacit accommodation with his "colleagues." For the students who sit through three incomprehensible hours every week there's no percentage in this. Where the poor researcher can offer his colleagues relief from administration, the poor teacher offers mediocrity.

If it's assumed that the major functions of the university are teaching and research (a statement which, subject to some restrictions on relative priorities, I buy), then the conclusion seems inescapable that in the last twenty years this university has had no systematic evaluation procedures for making sure that its employees did these two things.

I am always hesitant to draw analogies with business enterprises since in general I don't laud the workings of corporate capitalism, but any business firm which proceeded along the same lines would cease operating in an exceedingly short time. I find it absolutely incredible that the University of Toronto, or for that matter, any other university, has had no mechanisms that ensure that the faculty it employs actually perform the task they were hired to do. The fact that it has not sheds a great deal of light on the behaviour of those who control the Faculty Association, strangle the Faculty of Arts and Science, caucus over lunch at the Faculty Club, administer numerous departments, and who forever beat the hollow drum of academic standards, as if seeking to drown out criticism of themselves by diverting the attack to others.

Most of the things recounted so far are things of the past. Yet, the future is gloomy, and it is gloomy exactly because of this group of faculty. The days of the University's inflated self-image are passing. It is only possible to live for so long with either a large be fired for incompetence.

That this will not occur is fairly obvious. There is now a virtual freeze on hiring at the University of Toronto. The age distribution of the present faculty is such that there will be a relatively small number of vacancies from retirements in the next decade. Money freed up by retirements, and firings of junior faculty will be used to inflate the salaries of those already entrenched. (The Faculty Association's argument to the Budget Committee this year, was quite explicit. Sacrifice an instructor to ensure salary increases for more senior faculty.) Tenured faculty already here will close the doors to a population of present graduate students who are more able and potentially more productive than those presently occupying positions in the University.

For the few positions that do become available, and for the tenure decisions that will be made, a peculiar situation will hold. Academics who entered the University under labour-market conditions markedly different from those now operating, and who once hired never faced serious evaluation, will sit in judgement on people whose calibre is higher and on whom the pressures to perform will be much greater. What will distinguish those subject to assessment will be first their superiority but second the ease with which they are replaced.

That those enforcing the newly discovered standards will resist vehemently the application of the same criteria to themselves as they apply to others is obvious. For one awalt with amusement the parade of fools who will rise to defend tenure when the University Administration suggests its modification next year. Professors whose most controversial behaviour in three decades has been an unpublished letter to the Globe and Mail, will discover a pressing need to be defended against sudden dismissal for statements which are politically unpopular. We will hear righteously indignant statements about the need to safeguard "academic freedom" from people who live in a perpetual state of erudite navel-gazing into which political concerns never penetrate. Predictably too, the small number of academics who do make controversial statements will line up in opposition to tenure.

There is thus little hope for spontaneous change in the area of conventional academic assessment. Presently entrenched faculty will no doubt cling to the mistaken notion that this is a first rate example of a knowledge-producing institution, that they are competent representatives of excellence, and that they do have the right to evaluate the excellence of others. Since the possession of power compensates for the lack of substance in these beliefs, those being assessed will be too timid to take issue with these claims.

The alliance of mediocrity and power is in fact a particular problem. The standard departmental solution to mediocrity is to move the incompetent into an administrative position. This has a number of advantages. The continuing absence of research can then be explained by a professor's "heavy administrative duties." Meanwhile, those who do research can get on with their business free from the boring routines of paper shuffling and meeting attendances. Yet this "solution" gives the most power to the worst people. I am persistently and forcefully reminded of E.P. Thompson's characterization:

The behaviour patterns of one of the true members of the species are unmistakable. He is inflated with self-esteem and perpetually self-congratulatory as to the high vocation of the university teacher; but he knows almost nothing about any other vocation, and he will lie down and let himself be walked over if anyone enters from the outer world who has money or power or even a tough line in realist talk. He is a consummate politician in university committees and can scull over every inch of his own duckpond; but... he knows next to nothing of the world outside his own farmyard. Academic Superciliosus are never able to see beyond their next meeting, and are continually overcome with amazement and indignation when unwinvited intruders — public opinion, the Press, local political movements — interpolate themselves upon the agenda.) Superciliosus is the most divisible and rubable creature in this country, being so intent upon crafty calculations of short-term advantages — this favour for his department, that chance of promotion — or upon rolling the log of a colleague who, next week at the next committee, has promised to roll a log for him, that he has never even tried to imagine the wood out of which all this timber rolls. He can scurry furiously and self-importantly around in his committees, like a white mouse running in a wheel, while his master is carrying him, cage and all, to be sold at the local pet shop. (Warwick University Ltd.)

With Academicus Superciliosus firmly in the saddle the University is in sorry shape. Pressure for change can only come from one of two sources — from above from the Governing Council and Senior Administration or from below from students.

often leave classes without any real teaching. They may find themselves without students, too.

Teaching evaluations also put senior and junior faculty in positions in which they can be directly compared. Academia has its own "grandfather clauses," presumptions that at some point a person's research productivity will "peak." Provided there is some evidence of past performance, senior faculty can command the sort of respect that's given tribal elders. Often, they return to teaching basic courses and make room for the better researchers to teach graduate courses. But from a student point of view there is, again, no percentage in this. If Professor X can't teach MAT 100 now, there's no great consolation to be derived from the fact that he made an important contribution to mathematics in 1952. As a consequence, and particularly for senior faculty, there's nothing to be gained from teaching evaluations and everything to be lost. Who needs to find out at age fifty-five that he (it's almost exclusively this gender) is lousy at what he's been doing for thirty years?

All of the above leads me to a particularly unpleasant conclusion. It is a conclusion which is reinforced by day to day witness of the activities of academics at this university; it is, in a word — discrepancy between self-concept and reality, or with the pretence that the University is in the process of achieving a greatness which never arrives. Shortages of money are likely to get worse and faculty hiring is now frozen. The survival of the University should dictate the abandonment of pretense.

At the same time, the timing of this change of fortune is an unhappy one. Beginning around the end of the sixties, the manpower constraints on Canadian universities began to change. The U.S. became less attractive as an academic setting. Not only was spending on higher education in the U.S. cut back, but the image of the "great society" became tarnished beyond refurbishing. In short Acadamerica became a place which was no longer as attractive as it was. In Canada, in contrast, an increasing nationalist consciousness has created stronger desires on the part of graduate students to remain here. The number of Ph.D.'s produced by Canadian universities has increased to the point where output has exceeded the number of positions available for academics in most disciplines. For the first time in over two decades, there is the possibility of real selection between applicants for university jobs, and of finding replacements for those who could

It has been a long and tortuous road for Pierre Vallières from the raucous beverage room of the Hôtel Nelson in Montréal's Place Jacques Cartier to the chancelleries of the Canadian International Paper Company in the quiet Laurentian village of Mont Laurier.

Vallières, for seven years the leading theoretician of the Front de libération du Québec (FLQ), once discussed strategy with revolutionary partisans in the dingy malodorous tap room in the Nelson. Today, in Montréal's left-wing milieu, he is mentioned rarely, and save for an occasional brief reference in Le Devoir or the labour-sponsored leftist tabloid Québec-Press, his name seldom appears in newspapers.

Vallières has been written off as 'a damn sellout'. Since the publication of his latest book, L'Urgence de Chosir, by Editions Parti Pris, Vallières has been reviled by much of the Quebec left, and even his former comrade Charles Gagnon denounced his endorsement of electoral politics and the Parti québécois as "petit bourgeois opportunism."

The left's disenchantment with Vallières, once ranked by the U.S. marxist magazine Monthly Review with Che Guevara and Régis Debray as the world's most significant contemporary revolutionary tacticians, stems from his stunning renunciation of terrorism and the FLQ in a series of articles published in the Montréal nationalist intellectual daily Le Devoir in December 1971. These articles later formed the substance of L'Urgence de Chosir.

After his emergence from self-imposed clandestinity and his dramatic surrender to police at their massive Parthenais Street headquarters in Montréal's grimy east end, Vallières joined a welfare project financed by the federal government's Local Initiatives Program in the logging town of Mont Laurier.

However, Vallières says he still firmly believes that the overthrow of the capitalist state in Québec is possible. It will be overturned not by a violent coup he says, but by electing the Parti québécois.

While organizing the unemployed of Mont Laurier, Vallières told Nick auf der Maur of the Last Post: "What I'm doing in Mont Laurier is what I dreamed about. You can't liberate Québec by concentrating on the island of Montréal."

Vallières' about-face on the strategic importance of terrorism provoked intense debate inside left-wing circles in Québec over the merits of his newly adopted stance. Nevertheless, Vallières' ideological reversal should not be astonishing if one considers the erratic nature and turbulent history of the Québec left over the last two decades.

L'Urgence de Chosir is the enunciation of Vallières newly discovered faith in electoralism. It is a terse book, the product of a "self-criticism" of several months undertaken when he went underground in 1970 to avoid capture by the Sûreté du Québec.

L'Urgence de Chosir has often been compared to Negres Blancs d'Amérique, Vallières' first book. There are some grounds for comparison, but the works were written under different social and political conditions.

It is impossible to analyze the contradictions in L'Urgence de Chosir, let alone comprehend Vallières' motives for writing such a book without taking into consideration the events which shaped his life.

Vallières' early years have been well documented by the press and in his own "precocious autobiography" Negres Blancs d'Amérique, first released in 1968 by the left-wing French language publishing house of Editions Parti Pris.

Born into an impoverished working class family in Montréal amid the "darkness" of the despotic Duplessis regime, Vallières roamed the streets of the east end with a gang of tough, sadistic youths who got their thrills setting fires in backyards and terrorizing little girls.

Vallières detested his domineering, God-tearing mother who frowned on his gang activities. His father, who easily fits the definition of the alienated and exploited 'white nigger' was a pathetic man; a politicized proletarian who lacked the stamina and fortitude to translate his socialist ideals into practice.

The father frequently discussed politics with his son and so helped mould Pierre's attitude toward capitalist society.

Poverty and the slow deterioration of his father's health left an indelible impression on the young Vallières.

In Negres Blancs d'Amérique Vallières astutely and accurately summarizes the role of the working class family within the capitalist system.

The working class family, writes Vallières, is a product of centuries of exploitation of man by man.

"The terrible thing about the working class family is the function imposed on it by the present system of renewing and perpetuating the supply of slaves, of niggers, of cheap labour to be exploited, alienated and oppressed. And the inhuman thing about a working class childhood is the child's powerlessness to resist the conditioning of not only system, but all the frustrations of life around him, frustrations that are generated by the capitalist organization of society and that contaminate him even before he becomes aware of their existence."

A working class child will revolt, stated Vallières, because he is ashamed of his class origins. He feels humiliated and isolated and

"often seeks, through individual success, to be admitted to the middle class even at the risk of betraying his own."

Throughout his adolescence, Vallières resisted what Marx termed "ideas of the ruling class". He found school boring and depressing and spent much of his time bombarding the teacher with spitballs.

When Pierre was seven, the Vallières family moved from the crowded and dirty flat at Rue Hochelaga to the south shore suburb of Longueuil-Anneke (now known as Ville Jacques-Cartier).

In the mid-1950s when corruption was rampant in the Québec government, Longueuil-Anneke was a desolate shanty town dotted with tarpaper shacks; a town where the stench of raw sewage fouled the air because funds for waste disposal were pocketed by the local Union Nationale bosses.

The seven years Vallières spent at Longueuil-Anneke proved to be a watershed in his life. Much to his mother's consternation, he totally rejected the church-dominated educational system.

By the age of 18, Vallières had written and destroyed three novels. Not content to live like "a stranger" in Ville Jacques-Cartier, he left the town and joined a Franciscan order. He quit the order in disgust and departed for France.

In 1962, when Vallières arrived, France was a deeply troubled nation. It was split over involvement in the Algerian war. The left indulged in fratricidal conflicts; the right was gaining strength, and De Gaulle ruled the country by personal fiat.

France has always been regarded as the motherland of Québec. In the early 1960s, Québécois writers and artists flocked to their "spiritual homeland" to study at the great universities or to publish their work at the prestigious Paris publishing houses.

Pierre Vallières, however, was concerned with neither of these preoccupations. He journeyed to France to obtain a more complete knowledge of the working class — a politicized proletariat in a highly stratified state.

While in France, Vallières discovered Marxism, but his sojourns into the French countryside produced few encounters with revolutionaries. The leaders of the French left earned Vallières contempt; he accused them of wallowing in their own bureaucratic mire.

He found no trace of revolutionary activity in France and returned to Québec, weary and disillusioned.

During his absence, the political temper of Québec had altered dramatically. The Quiet Revolution, marked by the election of the Lesage Liberals in 1960 had spawned new nationalist forces..In 1963, the symbol of British imperialism in Québec City, Wolfe's monument, was toppled from its foundation by zealous militants. In the same year, Montréal felt the first blasts from the bombs of the FLQ.

On his return to Québec (at a time when revolution seemed imminent), Vallières wrote: "I had not changed much, but the situation in Québec, that was really beginning to change... Now revolt was coming out of the catacombs."

Vallières continued to write, and his insight and polemical style impressed Pierre Trudeau and Gérard Pelletier, the editors of the intellectual journal Cité Libre. They asked him to edit the magazine along with Jean Pellerin (now with La Presse) in late 1963.

Vallières accepted the position because he wanted to transform Cité Libre from a magazine representing "the liberal bourgeoisie" into "a weapon for the Québec workers".

His efforts to do so outraged Trudeau and Pelletier, and Vallières' stewardship of Cité Libre lasted a brief six months before the editorial board (pressured by Trudeau and Pelletier) demanded his resignation.

However, Pelletier, as editor of La Presse recognized Vallières' skill as a writer and forgetting the rancour created at Cité Libre, asked Vallières to work for his newspaper.

Although a brilliant and inspired writer, Vallières expended little energy as a La Presse reporter. He concentrated his efforts on organizing protest marches against the Viet Nam war and on trade union activities with the Syndicat des journalistes de Montréal (SJM). The SJM was affiliated with the Confédération des syndicats nationaux (CSN), which, at that time was beginning to cast off its Catholic legacy.

After participating in the bitter seven-month La Presse strike, Vallières joined the FLQ. His articles in left-wing journals such as Revolution Québécoise and Revue Parti Pris, urged the unification of all revolutionary groups in Québec.

Vallières' membership on the 'central committee' of the FLQ introduced him to Charles Gagnon, a sociologist at l'Université de Montréal. Both men share similar traits: they are polemical, skillful writers; master propagandists and competent revolutionary theorists. The combination of these talents enhanced the image of the FLQ in the eyes of Québec's academic community.

Throughout 1966, the FLQ enjoyed only sporadic success. Recruits did not join the organization in large numbers and the government had not been seriously weakened by the bomb attacks which rattled Montréal.

Vallières and Gagnon decided to utilize other means to draw attention to their case for Québec independence. They demonstrated in front of the United Nations in New York to obtain coverage on the U.S. news media.

The demonstration backfired and both were arrested and charged with illegal entry into the United States. (Gagnon and Vallières were wanted by Québec police in connection with a bomb blast which killed a woman employee of a factory on strike against the CSN.) The police implied that Vallières and Gagnon participated in a meeting where the act was planned. They were both deported from the United States although they asked for political asylum.

The Vallières-Gagnon trial was a monumental judicial farce.

The Crown had a weak case and thus resorted to using Vallières' writings to prove that he was capable of committing murder. The judge, according to a decision by the Québec Court of Appeal, bullied and deliberately misled the jury.

Vallières was finally released in May 1970, pending a new trial after three and a half years of incarceration. Gagnon was acquitted after spending a similar period behind bars.

Vallières' freedom was shortlived. He was arrested again in October 1970 during the FLQ kidnapping crisis and charged with a variety of crimes. He skipped bail and went underground until January 1972. L'Urgence de is based on federalism, the preservation of the status quo in terms of economics and politics, say Vallières. "Catching up" is the creed preached by Trudeau and Bourassa. Its tenets are that Québec is economically backward, and therefore must import capital from foreign sources to develop industrially.

The ideology of surpassing ("étapisme", in French), claims Vallières, will put an end to capitalism in Québec.

By securing independence, Vallières claims, the Québec collectivity will be free to pursue socialist policies which will liberate it from the shackles of Canadian and U.S. colonialism. Thus, when a socialist system has been created Québec will have 'surpassed' the historical stage of capitalism as foreseen by Marx.

Vallières' concept of socialism is never fully developed anywhere in l'Urgence de Choisir. He foresees the state playing an expanded role in a socialist Québec, hints at some form of stipulating collective ownership for private ownership in key sectors. This is the only way to free the economy of foreign domination, and to develop the purchasing power of the masses, along with their social and cultural well-being...

The most contradictory aspects of Vallières' new book are embodied in his analysis of Québec's colonial status. He chastizes marxists throughout the text for being too abstract and for believing in antediluvian theories.

However, Vallières' economic analysis is based on the work of two American marxists, Paul Baran and Paul Sweezy.

Vallières writes: "This is our situation; the United States is at the top, Québec is at the bottom of the ladder and English Canada, positioned between the two, dominates and exploits Québec while itself being dominated by the United States..."

The marxist model of capitalist development is useless, maintains Vallières, because it is based on "an analysis of a competitive capitalist system". The existing economic system, says Vallières, is no longer competitive in the sense that national companies vie with each other on a global framework. Non-competitive multi-national "monopolies" and the "imperialist mode of production" have superseded 18th and 19th century economic systems.

By declaring independence, Vallières contends that Québec will free itself from the imperialist mode of production. Because, according to Vallières, Québec is not capable of exploiting any other state, he says, it will not become part of the international monopolist system.

However, what is the possibility that national capitalism will be created in Québec? None, maintains Vallières.

"In the world imperialist system the construction of a national capitalism by a society like Québec... is an economic and political impossibility."

Québec "can not establish a national capitalism... because such a capitalism could not compete in the world capitalist system dominated by the imperialist mode of production..."

If the Parti québécois was a mass-based party dedicated to the replacement of capitalism with socialism, then Vallières' theory may have some validity.

However, the PQ is not a socialist party; it has never claimed to be one, and it has no strategy or plan to create a socialist Québec.

Therefore, we may conclude that the PQ will change very little if it assumes power. Capitalism will continue to function smoothly.

David Rockefeller of the Chase Manhattan Bank subscribes to this theory. He asserted that U.S. capitalists would have no difficulty in living with an independent Québec. "I do not think that outside investors should be the ones to decide what form of government you (Québécois) should have," he said.

Vallières' praise for the PQ is little more than apologetics. He plays down the important point of the Québec left that the Parti québécois hierarchy is comprised of separatist refugees from the Liberal Party, technocrats and petit-bourgeois professionals.

"The PQ isn't the product of divine inspiration, or even of bourgeois inspiration... Even though some of its 'official' founders are former members of the Liberal Party, it's not therefore a bourgeois party. For its founders were also you and me — all the Québécois who, through their militancy and their faith in the future of Québec have constructed the political bases for the creation and development of this party."

This statement is antithetical to an earlier position outlined Negres Blancs d'Amerique.. In 1966, Vallières wrote: "I am not against the independence of Québec but against the illusionary independence of Québec which, dressed up in various guises (from Associated State to a Republic), is now being proposed to us by the parasitic petty bourgeoisie of French Canada... I am for revolution, because only a revolution... can make us independent."

Vallières even suggests, contrary to his earlier writings, that the PQ is the only genuine working class party in Québec. The creation of a labour party by trade unions, he fears, would "divide the Québec masses between parties which are almost identical."

This is a distortion of the political realities of Québec.

The Parti québécois is not a workers' party. It incorporates distinct rightist, centrist, and left-wing tendencies and is a broadly based party held together by a common goal: independence for Québec.

René Lévesque and the PQ hierarchy have eyed Québec's militant labour unions cautiously. Lévesque refused to endorse the La Presse demonstration in December, 1971 which produced the Common Front and the PQ never fully endorsed the objectives of the common front in bargaining with the Bourassa government.

Vallières argues unconvincingly that support of the FLQ must cease because Ottawa will not hesitate to invoke the War Measures Act again. He insists that all radical political activity must be channelled into electing the Parti québécois.

Vallières ignores the fact that Trudeau or any other prime minister may resort to armed force to prevent the assumption of power of even a moderate social democratic independentist party like the PQ. Logically, the only way to resist this would be to form a popular army - something which Vallières scorns. Radicals have never really been welcome in the ranks of the PQ and they will never be allowed to exercise any power. The only alternative for the Québec working class lies in the formation of a labour party by trade unions, citizens groups and the cooperative movement.

In l'urgence de Choisir Vallières has abandoned most of the principles he has held for years, ignored many of the laws of bourgeois politics, and has traded the FLQ for the PQ, one bankruptcy for another.

l'Urgence de Choisir, par Pierre Vallières, Parti Pris, Montreal, $1.50

English Translation by Penelope Williams: Chosir by Pierre Vallières. New Press $5.95.

Pierre Vallières has renounced his revolutionary past

Chosir appeared in Montréal bookstores several months after his surrender to the Sûreté.

L'Urgence de Choisir is a political statement incorporating the following principles:

- There are two main conflicting ideologies in Québec at the present;
- Québec is a colony both of English Canada and the United States;
- All left-wing organizations have failed to win independence and socialism;
- The only organization that can liberate Québec is the Parti québécois. Any attempt to form a workers' party will fail and will merely split the progressive forces within the province.

According to Vallières, the "two main ideologies that have appeared in Québec since 1960 are the "ideology of catching up" and the "ideology of surpassing."

The ideology of catching up workers control, and spurns democratic centralism.

The state seemingly would function much as it did under Jean Lesage, although Vallières would probably deny it.

Under Lesage, the state was used as an instrument to promote 'la survivance' — the preservation of French-Canadian culture and well-being. The provincial authorities provided services which capitalists had neglected, such as hydro-electricity.

Lesage also established a host of crown corporations to deal with investments and resource development. Vallières is merely continuing in the tradition Québec established in 1960.

"In order to pull Québec out of its underdevelopment and stagnation, the Québec state must obviously... appropriate internal markets to itself and enlarge them by radically shaking up forms of appropriation and by sub-

A paraplegic battles against "normal" society

In Creeps, David Freeman examined the backgrounds and relationships of a group of paraplegics, stunning audiences with this seldom-treated side of human experience. His most recent work, Battering Ram, now playing at the Tarragon Theatre concerns the paraplegic in the "normal" world. It is a well-made play, capable of both entertaining and troubling its audience.

The dramatic conflict contained in Battering Ram revolves around Virgil - the provocative characterization of a young man condemned to a wheel-chair. His presence in the home of television addict Irene and her daughter Nora, a "no bullshit, please" college student' aggravates the rivalry which already exists between the two women. Virgil is an expert manipulator, and succeeds through game-playing, suicide threats, and pathetic bids for sympathy in playing mother off against daughter. His object? Like any young man, he yearns for a sexual experience. However, because of his situation, Virgil must go to a considerable effort, above all mental, to fulfill his desire. It is the disturbing ambiguity of the character - both understandable and despicable in his designs, both victim and oppressor in relation to the women, which sustains the interest.

Frank Moore displays the varied resources of Virgil's character with terrific ease. The strained good humour of his early conversations, and well-planned needling later on show a particularly fine vocal expression. His aggressive, bitter Virgil of the final scene is a spine-chilling revelation of that force which Freeman indicates in his title, Battering Ram.

Patricia Hamilton has mastered the character of Irene, exploiting the comic potential of the role to its fullest extent. The reasoning used by a woman of such limited understanding and sensitivity is expressed in each word and gesture. Her few silent moments in front of the television set are among the richest of the play. Yet a certain naive capacity for tenderness and a spontaneous, though conventional, sort of pride give Miss Hamilton's role more interest than a convenient stereotype.

The daughter, Nora, is probably the character who most approaches the unbelievable. Freeman has supplied Nora with a poorly repressed sadistic tendency, which complements Virgil's never-ending bids for sympathy in quite a daring fashion. It is Nora's calling to verbalize all the reactions that most "normal" people repress in the presence of a handicapped person. Instead of avoiding all mention of his infirmity, Nora taunts him with it, defending herself against what she suspects is cold manipulation. All the more chilling, then, when she, too, is caught in Virgil's web.

Freeman's dialogue shows an insight into the background and motivations of his characters as well as a fine sense of the overall effect of their interactions. He accomplishes moments of tension and of humour without a contrived effect.

Bill Glassco's direction displays the same economy and dynamic rhythm that was evident in Forever Yours, Marie-Lou. He has kept the mood light, punctuating scenes with Mozart, the effect being to allow a certain amused distance on the audience's part. The second act is noticeably heavier, working toward the final crescendo.

A play worth considering part of the new Canadian repertoire, Battering Ram is a stimulating piece of psychological drama.

"Gothic musical" splits self in half

The Global Village is currently working with a curious theatrical genre described as a gothic musical. It is a macabre combination of styles but the most discomforting thing about Eyes is the consistent build-up of an idea that does not work.

The play deals with the self-willed decline into madness of Lisa who cannot escape the tragic visions of the past - the sudden death of her mother and the accidental burning to death of her lover Larry. Lisa returns from a trip to Europe and rejoins the remnants of her family in their isolated Gothic-Victorian mansion. Here the characters of the story act out their separate obsessions, displaying the varying degrees of madness or sanity which structure their lives. The consistent medium of expression is song. Each character gives a view of the eyes that surround, the images that distort, through some variation on the general melancholy melodies that pervade the play.

To disjoint this fairly straightforward approach to misery, distortions are imposed on the sense of time. The atmosphere is Gothic, the setting Victorian and the vernacular contemporary. References abound to planes, cars and other anachronistic paraphernalia which might add ambiguity. Instead of doing so, they become part of a game between play and audience as the stage action tries to cover up its lack of substance with yet another thin veil of meaning.

The attempt to sustain this kind of atmosphere with song somehow hovers on the absurd but the production was not totally without interest. The set was effectively threatening with its abundant plants and incongruities - such as candleabra coupled with an electric chandelier. The opening and closing sequences were also dramatically picturesque with their white shrouded furniture. The general atmosphere was well-controlled in its oppressive build-up to the final transfiguration of Lisa. Unfortunately the play split itself in half with a poorly developed use of song delivered by semi-automatons. Nor was it able to convince us that the musical score was an integral part of the thematic development of the play. With one half of this play working against the other the final result was total obliteration of the concepts behind it.

Carol Bolt's topical play "Gabe" does disservice to Metis problem

Gabe, a new play by Carol Bolt, which is being presented by the Toronto Free Theatre, amply illustrates what happens to a good idea if improperly handled.

Carol Bolt, who has also written Buffalo Jump fails to handle her subject matter adequately. The play deals with Metis-white relations in Canada and the psychological result upon the Metis peoples. Her understanding of the problems of the Indians, although well founded in fact, tends to get lost with the characterizations of Gabe and Louis, two Metis paroled from Prince Albert Penitentiary in Manitoba.

The two men play a game whereby they portray Louis Riel and Gabriel Dumont' roles which Gabe hopes will represent their position in society upon their release. They plan to lead a crusade which will restore the Metis to dignity with Louis becoming the new Riel. When paroled, Louis refuses to act upon his words and returns to his habits of near-alcoholism, whereas Gabe bears the sorrows of his people in an unrequited desire for justice. Gabe's politicization, which has resulted from his friend's talk, cannot act and is forced back into stereotyped patterns.

Gabe, the lonely-angry man, is poorly portrayed by Peter Jobin who, in striving to create a greater cliché character, spends his entire time on stage being bland. Saul Rubinek as Louis manages to overcome the weakness of the dialogue in short spurts which show his acting potential.

The one pleasure of the production is the characterization of Henry by Don MacQuarrie. Don conveys perfectly the part of the play's only white man, a "half-wit". He is the patronizing white who attaches himself to the Metis in a masochistic relationship. He is so obnoxiously, whinnying white that the audience begins to hate the sight of him - perhaps he remind them too vividly of their own reactions to the Indian throughout history. But he is still unable to overcome the handicap of being stereotyped by the script.

A considerable amount of the blame for the play's failure must be given to the director. Robert Handforth was unable to utilize the resources he had available both in the actors and the physical construction of the play.

Tonight at 8 pm. Erindale Student Theatre will present its final performance of The Little Prince, an original student adaptation of the novel by Saint-Exupery. The performance is free, and is located in the Preliminary Building, Room 292, at Erindale Campus.

The Studio Theatre, 4 Glen Morris, offers two final performances this weekend of The Love of Don Perimlin and Bellsa in the Garden ("an erotic lacepaper valentine in four scenes") by Garcia Lorca, and Salome by Oscar Wilde. Performances are free, and begin at 8:30 pm.

Tomorrow evening the Theatre du P'tit Bonheur offers a form of entertainment that knows no language

This performance has already been staged successfully at the Stratford Festival, the Shaw Festival, the National Arts Centre and has been filmed for CBC television.

Colonnade Theatre's Classical Stage Productions finish their run of Strindberg's Miss Julie. Saturday. Their next offering is two one-act plays by Chekhov, The Bear and The Anniversary, opening, we think, Tuesday, February 27.

The Winter's Tale opened at Hart House on Wednesday night. Trinity College Dramatic Society has put together a substantial effort under the direction of Alan Toff. From the point of view of design, some attempt has been made to accentuate the non-western flavour of the work. White, pillar-like formations are moved around from scene to scene to back up the bright oriental-style garments barrier. Paul Gaudin displays the art of pantomime. He has, incidentally, established the first school of mime in Canada. Students $2.00, other $3.00.

Irish Arts Theatre began its run of three plays by J.M. Synge on Tuesday, and will continue until March 11. Directed by Siobhan McKenna, the company will perform Tinker's Wedding, Shadow of the Glen, and Riders to the Sea.

The Theatre Company of the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts will try its hand at Greek tragedy with Euripides' Electra. The opening performance takes place February 27.

Factory Theatre Lab has put together a new production of one of last year's successes, Brussels Sprouts by Larry Kardish. Having returned from a three-day run at the National Arts Centre, Ottawa, it opens for a four week run at the Central Library Theatre on February 27.

On March 1, 2, and 3, the St. Lawrence Centre Town Hall will feature Tony Van Bridge in a one-man show. He will impersonate the writer, essayist and poet, G.K. Chesterton.

worn by the actors. The musical records and oriental themes we hear between scenes complement this visual effect. All this seems fitting for this tale which is essentially pagan in its philosophy. Nevertheless, the suggestion of fertility and rebirth prevalent in the second half of the play is not expressed visually. Too much white, for one thing, reduced the pastoral scene to a pale shadow of what it might be.

The actors give credible performances though no one stands out as particularly inspiring. There is an unquestionable purity about Shawna MacIvor's Hermia, and Tim Brook, in his black silk robe, gives us a silky Leontes. Geoffrey Garr-Harris' Camillo shows substance and integrity.

A livelier pace throughout the production, which most likely has more assurance than it did at the preview Tuesday night, will do justice to the interesting elements in this rendition of Shakespeare's fantasy.

It plays tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30 pm. Students $1.50, non-students $2.00.

music

The St. Lawrence Centre is showing three films of German operas in the vernacular in March, and because of the huge response more tickets will be available. The operas are "Die Zauberflote" of Mozart, Berg's "Wozzeck" and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg", to be shown on March 15, 22, and 25. Tickets are $2.50 per film. All performances are by the Hamburg State Opera.

"The Stars of the Kiwanis Music Festival" is the title of the Scarborough Sunday Concert, this February 25 at 3:30. It's Part I, and Part II is on March 4.

Tonight until the 25th the Toronto Opera Repertoire performs La Traviata at Central Technical School at 8 pm, $1.50 for students.

On CBC-FM at 9 pm on February 27, Glenn Gould presents a self-produced program of a concert featuring himself as pianist. He plays his own transcription of "Siegfried's Idyll", as well as the two French Suites by Bach and Scriabin's "Desir and Caresse Sclsee", op. 57. As usual, this Gould special should prove to be a radio highlight.

The second concert in the 8:30 pm Trinity Square Concerts features Janis Orenstein, soprano in a recital of French Art Songs. Single tickets are $2.50. Series tickets (five concerts) are $10.

On March 1, Thomas Legrady visits the Unitarian Church, 175 St. Clair West by way of La Chasse-Galerie (15 Glebe Road W.). He is pianist-faculty member from Loyola College in Montreal West, and his program comprises works by Debussy, Ibert, Bartok and Kodaly. Tickets on sale at the gallery, are $3.

This Sunday, February 25, the faculty of music presents its all-out concert of the year with a performance of Darius Milhaud's "The Creation of the World". Henry Brant's "Angels and Devils" is to be performed by Robert Aitken. There are a slew of student recitals, but I'm going to let you saunter into the Edward Johnson Building to get the info from the lobby advertising pavilion.

All music enthusiasts will regret to hear of the deaths of famous American flautist Elaine Shaffer and even more famous violinist Josef Szigeti. Columbia, ironically, has just released a Szigeti Treasury, heavily praised by Harry Goldsmith in January's issue of "High Fidelity". Also, by the way, in that issue is a tremendous article on some music (and recordings of it) of Dufay, Ockegem and of an apparently brilliant anonymous English Renaissance composer.

pop

Crowbar and La Troup Grotesque are being presented in concert tonight at 8:30 at Convocation Hall by the Hart House Music Committee. Tickets are a nominal 5c and are available at the porter's desk in Hart House.

Atkinson, Danko and Ford, Columbia recording artists, are appearing at the Riverboat tonight through Sunday. Another of Canada's fine recording and composing talents, Valdy opens on Tuesday. Admission is $3.50, and $3 during the week.

The Bee Gees have sold out their Sunday evening performance at O'Keefe Centre, but a second, earlier show has been scheduled. Of central interest in the English trio's performance will be the role of 30 members of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra who will appear with them.

Elephant's Memory the 5 man band that John Lennon adopted a year and a half ago as his Plastic Ono Band, is appearing at the El Mocambo, tonight and tomorrow. The band has much improved over their disastrous debut on Lennon's "Some Time in New York City" album. They have a chunky guitar-saxophone dominated sound that propels them through original material and good old fashioned rock. A dance floor and $2 cover charge are also featured.

Fiddler's Green is the site for an evening of folk music from the British Isles tonight, with Enoch Kent, Owen McBride and Ian Robb. The music shifts back to the North American scene on Tuesday evening (8 pm) when Michael Cooney makes one of his frequent Toronto appearances. The club is located behind the Y on Eglinton east of Younge, and admission is $1.

Music comes to Meat & Potatoes Restaurant on Saturday and Sunday night, from 9 to 12 pm. Don Di Novo, Lighthouse electric viola player and pianist Haraldur Edgardsson are featured. No cover.

Christopher Kearney and his band Permican are giving a concert and The Meeting Place in Scarborough College at 8:30 pm tonight. Admission is $2.

art

At the Art Gallery of Ontario, Sunday is the last day to see Appel's work, and today is the last day of the Gallery Shop Book Sale. On March 1 four more Underground Classics will be shown: Stan Brakhage's Mothlight, Ed Emshwiller's Scrambles his Totems and Kenneth Anger's Scorpio Rising. From March 3 to 18 a representation of the Florentine, Venetian, Flemish, Dutch and French traditions will be featured in the display of from the permanent collection, along with a selection of 19th and 20th century works from the Barblizon school.

At the Royal Ontario Museum until Sunday is the display of work executed by members of the Canadian Academy of Medical Illustrators. "The work covers various media from drawing to sculpture to motion pictures, and a range of subjects from anatomical and surgical work to abstract psychiatric problems."

Until March 5 the Faculty of Architecture offers an Alumni exhibit of drawings, paintings and sculpture.

John Greer is at the Isaacs Gallery. The Baldwin Gallery near McCaul features an exhibit of black women's photography March 2 to 26.

movies

Esquire turns its cynical presses this month (March) on the latest American Dreams as reflected and created by the movie studios. The magazine asked a dozen moguls what movies they are producing next and why. It's all in Esquire-ese which I'm defensive about liking, but it's fun to know what they think we think.

Among this week's movies: Friday through Sunday at the Revue it's Before the Revolution by Bernardo Bertolucci, better known for his skin flicks. Haven't seen it, but hear that it's good. 8:30 pm, $1:50.

Friday and Saturday night at 11 the Revue is showing Jack Nicholson's Drive, He Said, also for $1.50. Its about college basketball, radicalism and affairs. It doesn't hang together too well, but really shines in its parts. Actually I thought it was terrific but, be forewarned, most everybody else panned it.

Saturday, Vic Flicks is running a suspense double-bill of Fritz Lang's Ministry of Fear and Hitchcock's Shadow of a Doubt. 7:45 pm, Vic's New Academic Bldg., $1.

Monday and Tuesday at the Revue, Truffaut's Bride Wore Black and Mississippi Mermaid. 7 pm, $1:50 for the double-bill.

Freeze creating no hardships, says McNie

By DIANA WEST

"So far there is no evidence that there have been any great hardships because of the government freeze," on capital spending, Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNie declared Wednesday.

McNie who was appointed to the ministry last September was lecturing at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education in a series of seminars on higher education.

Asked how long the freeze, announced in late November, would continue, McNie rhetorically replied, "How long is a piece of string?"

He went on to say that the freeze would probably last at least a year, "but it's amazing how universities have found other space and by changing schedules are able to accommodate more." Some have even discussed sharing buildings between colleges, he said.

U of T is still awaiting for an answer from the provincial government to its request for renovation money to meet fire and safety standards in several buildings.

McNie also commented that the declining enrolment figures would probably solve some of the overcrowding problems and improve the "quality of environment."

"The government does not want to put itself in the position of an auditor." The ministry, he continued, wants universities to pursue their "individuality" and "uniqueness."

Asked about the Wright (Commission on Post-Secondary Education) Report and the effect it would have on government policies McNie stated, "The Wright Report is not the government's report. The government can accept or reject it but when it comes down to the university administration it's another thing again," insisting that the ministry wanted to allow the universities and colleges freedom to maintain their own administration policies.

The minister was then asked what his opinion was concerning the mixing of full and part-time students. McNie felt that varying ages within a single course or college allowed for a wider scope of experience among the students.

"Students go on through sequential education until they're 25 without knowing what it's all about. Then they go on to teach for 45 years."

On the question of the increase on student loan portions of government grants, McNie said that the government "felt students should be carrying a larger part of the burden. It was hoped that it wouldn't prejudice worthy students in need. It would simply mean they would be taking on a larger portion. Really, it's a question of spreading the cost."

Committee likes paper for future planning

By JOHN CAMPBELL

A discussion paper designed to help the university cope with the problems of "future shock" ran into only minor criticisms at Wednesday's meeting of the Planning and Resources Committee of the Governing Council.

The document, intitled the "Role and Function of the University", was authored by committee chairman James Lewis, and will form the basis of planning at U of T for the next several years. Lewis refused to allow The Varsity to obtain a copy of the document, claiming as his reason it was not yet an official statement.

The thrust of the committee's criticism was designed to "humanize" the paper's wording in order to make it consistent with the idea that the university should be a "community" in which learning and personal development can take place. Only under these circumstances most members agreed, could knowledge be effectively communicated.

Committee member John Morton cited Oxford as a model university community where faculty and students often go together to the local pubs after their classes.

"We may be able to disseminate knowledge", he said, "but people have to accept it, and this they will best do if they have a sense of community."

The graduate member was joined in his criticism by St. Michael's College principal John Kelly who declared, "There is a feeling on this campus that the faculty treats the students with something less than humanity."

The paper had said that the university must provide a learning "environment" for students. It did not mention "community".

Lewis took the offensive to explain his position on the question of whether specific priorities for the entire university, with respect to teaching and research, should be set by a central planning body. Emphasizing that he foresaw a "top-down, bottom-up" planning process at U of T, which he described as a two-way information flow, he said a central planning committee could not "dictate priorities" to the various divisions within the university.

U of T president John Evans agreed, adding, "Preservation of knowledge is more important in the humanities than in the physical sciences. There must be a broad framework for both their activities, but the priorities within each will be different."

Committee members generally shared Lewis' enthusiasm for a greater "integration" of knowledge in research at the graduate level.

Alluding to Pollution Probe as an example of an ad hoc body drawing on the talents of people from different fields to attack particular problems, he suggested that the university should formalize the process of developing such an interdisciplinary approach to problem-solving in the field of research.

Because of the diversity of its existing facilities, he said, U of T is in a unique position to "carve out this field as one of our own."

Pregnancy disrupts life: woman

By HEATHER-JANE SANGUINS

Ellen May of the Canadian Women's Abortion Coalition said Wednesday that pregnancy constituted a "major event in, and disruption of a woman's life", affecting her "physically, physiologically, socially, emotionally and psychologically".

She stated at a Hart House debate that the problem of unwanted and unplanned pregnancy "doesn't end with delivery".

May cited the recent U.S. Supreme Court decision to institute federal remedial legislation, rendering invalid state laws that deny abortions to women. Now with the consent of one physician, clinical abortions are legal six months into a pregnancy.

May declared that the decision, a result of the strong pro-abortion movement in the States, was a "big step forward", and hailed the end of "illegal methods, mutilation and death" that has historically been the fate of women who have sought abortions.

Jessica Pegis of the University of Toronto Pro-Life organization stated that "the core issue is lost under superfluities" and is a "touchy subject as it deals with rights".

She doubts that abortion is completely an "issue of private decision". Pegis cited the International Congress on Abortion (1967) decision that "life begins at conception", that is supported by U.S. scientist Ashley Montague.

Later, a woman from the audience of 50 suggested that the strength of support for the pro-abortion movement is partly due to belief that the "foetus isn't a human being, as we judge life not only on a cellular, but in a quantitative sense". Secondly she pointed out the "necessity of abortion for women". "Unwanted children is a fact in this society".

Martha Crean, also of Pro-Life, said that many discussions of abortion were characterized by "emotionalism" and "misrepresentation". She favours "protection of life in all stages".

Ellie Kirzner, also of the Women's Abortion Coalition, citing the history of birth control, said that "abortion is facing precisely the same charges today" that birth control did in the 17th century. She attributed this to the fact that abortion challenges the concept of "all women as child-bearers and childrearsers".

STUDENT-RAILPASS

The way to see Europe without feeling like a tourist.

So you plan to spend the Summer in Europe this year. Great. Two things are mandatory. A ticket to Europe. And a Student-Railpass. The first gets you over there, the second gives you unlimited Second Class rail travel for two months for a modest $135 in Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Luxembourg, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, and Switzerland! All you need to qualify is to be a full-time student up to 25 years of age, registered at a North American school, college or university.

And the trains of Europe are a sensational way to travel. Over 100,000 miles of track links cities, towns and ports all over Europe. The trains are fast (some over 100 mph), frequent, modern, clean, convenient and very comfortable. They have to be. So you'll meet us on our trains. It really is the way to get to know Europeans in Europe.

But there's one catch. You must buy your Student-Railpass in North America before you go. They're not on sale in Europe because they are meant strictly for visitors to Europe—hence the incredibly low price. Of course if you're loaded you can buy a regular Eurailpass meant for visitors of all ages. It gives you First Class travel if that's what you want.

Either way if you're going to zip off to Europe, see a Travel Agent before you go, and in the meantime, rip off the coupon. It can't hurt and it'll get you a better time in Europe than you ever thought possible.

Report urges Food Sci divisions be dropped

A minority report of the Food Sciences Implementation Committee suggests that divisions of the Food Science faculty be dropped if they are not financially "feasible".

Management studies faculty member Jacob Siegel differs with the majority report released last week, which would retain the present faculty, although dividing it into two departments.

Siegel recommends that the textile and community developments programs, which have low enrolment, "should be phased out entirely".

This view probably enjoys wide sympathy of committee members since, at one point during meetings, a motion recommending the discontinuation of home economics lost by only one vote.

In his analysis Siegel supplies data intended to demonstrate "the great discrepancies in the quality and productivity of the Home Economics program.

Siegel notes that the terms of reference within which the committee was to operate "suggest that the work of this committee be directed at both feasibility and implementation". According to Siegel, this implied "financial feasibility".

His financial analysis, based on salaries, equipment and existing non-academic staff, indicate savings of close to $200,000 over a five year period if the Home Economics program is discontinued.

Food Science dean Ira Armstrong said she would not comment on the report until it was discussed by the Governing Council's Academic Affairs and Planning and Resources Committees.

Other Food Science faculty members, headed by J.J. Moran are preparing a rebuttal to the report to be presented to Academic Affairs.

Sexes not friends: Needham

Globe and Mail columnist Richard J. Needham told an audience of about 80 Monday night that the "sexes should get together a bit more."

The discussion at the Medical Sciences Auditorium dealing with man-woman relations was sponsored by the Ukrainian Students Club.

Needham's talk largely consisted of short, witty dissertations bound together in a progression of ideas which he wanted to convey to his audience.

Needham opened his discussion by stating he was 60 years old, had spent 43 years in the newspaper business, made $600,000 and spent $610,000. He said that women were "the only thing in this whole damn world worth spending money on."

The columnist expressed his dissatisfaction about the apparent lack of friendship between men and women. Needham believes that "friendship between men and women is very desirable" and possible.

Needham laughed at self-imposed segregation of men and women. He cited an example of this in the downtown area where men and women seem to dine in their individual groupings rather than together.

According to Needham, the reason for anxiety in our society, "is the lack of human relationships." He said this was "the real problem, perhaps the only problem." Needham told his audience, "what's bugging you is the lack of a relationship with another individual."

On the topic of marriage, the columnist believed a person would be "better dead than wed". People should not think about marriage until the age of 30, he thought, and, better yet, not make a decision until 65. In this way Needham proposed that humankind would "solve the world population problem".

Needham said, "a Canadian man is a man that dies at the age of 25, and is buried at the age of 65."

Needham believed that nobody should be compelled to "promise to love anybody for the rest of their life". "Half of married women fear that their husbands will leave them; the other half wish that they did."

The columnist emphasized peoples' need to experience life through relationships with others.

He blamed men for slying away from friendship, saying, "men want to make love and disappear; women want to make love and stick around." He also thought that "men should improve their minds" and "perhaps their morals."

Needham thought decisions must be met head on: "Never look back", "All calamities are necessary", "The only wrong decision is the fatal one".

McGill head appoints "right-winger" as dean

MONTREAL (CUP) — Despite the preferences of a staff-student selection committee, the McGill University administration has chosen a right-wing professor as the next dean of students.

Principal Robert Bell chose Saeed Mirza for a five-year term as dean, ignoring the strongly-worded preferential list which ranked Mirza a poor third among suitable candidates.

Mirza has been acting dean since September. During that time students asked him to act against the engineering students' newspaper

The Plumbers' Pot, when it produced a racist and sexist issue last fall. Mirza mildly reproached the responsible parties, but blames the whole affair on "some members of the students council and The McGill Daily (who) were irresponsible in their behaviour and showed bad faith in the events following the publication". The Daily had objected strongly to The Pot edition.

Mirza also suspended McGill students Bob Wallace and Ze'ev Ionis for their attempted disruption of a speech by right-wing political theorist Zbigniew Brzezinski last October. He approved letters sent to professors demanding the two students not be allowed into class. Students in some of the classes concerned opposed the actions, and sent letters to the administration condemning the suspensions. (Wallace and Ionis are members of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist)).

"The strongly worded preference of the committee was ignored," said one of the selection committee's student members. "Principal Bell obviously made his decision beforehand: the committee was just wasting its time."

The 16-member committee included eight students.

Bell has denied his choice of Mirza disregarded the wishes of the committee. "The committee gave me three names from which to choose," he said, "and I chose one of them".

But according to a student committee member, the three names were ranked in order of preference, and Mirza was "a rather trailing third choice". Further, "there was no reason given for ignoring the committee's first choice and picking Mirza instead."

"Technically," said another student member, "Bell was within his rights in choosing Mirza, but it was very unethical to ignore the preferred choice of the committee. It was quite obvious that the committee had a low opinion of Mirza, on the other hand, there was a lot of enthusiasm for one of the other candidates."

"The wish of the students has not been taken seriously," commented a faculty member of the committee, "and I'm not at all happy with the choice. What is the point of having a selection committee if its advice is going to be ignored like this?"

19 students run for 8 GC seats

A total of 19 students have announced their candidacy for the eight available seats on the Governing Council, the top ruling body of the university. Elections will be held by mail between March 2 and 20.

Eight full time arts and science students are running for the two seats available to them. Leading the list is Vic student council president Gord Barnes, last year an unsuccessful candidate for the job.

UC student Tom Beckerman is a member of Faculty Council, of arts and science. Ian Gray is enrolled at St. Michaels in first year.

Robin Henry, one of the two female candidates is in first year at UC.

Vic student and active Faculty Council member David Laughton is still another pursuing a Governing Council seat.

Gretchen Roedde is active in community education, and municipal politics, as well as being a member of Innis College Council.

Faculty Council representative Howard Levitt and Political Economy Course Union vice-chairman Howie Stein are the "reform slate" arts and science undergraduate nominees. The slate which consists of seven members is calling for equal and open access to the new library, no fees hike, or loan cutback, and an increased student voice in University affairs.

The four nominees for the two undergraduate professional faculties seats are incumbent Aron Goldberg of Medicine, Mike Naemsh, and Richard Schabas, both "reform" candidates and SAC services commissioner Charles Vickery.

Three students are running for the two part-time seats. Eric Depoe, "reform slate", Arlene Dick editor of Voice, the part-time students newsletter, and incumbent Norma Grindal past president of the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students are all running.

There is one seat for graduate students with the three nominees Philip Enros, Tony Leah (reform), and Barry Mitchell.

The remaining seat for graduate students is for a representative from Educational Theory, Life Sciences or Physical Sciences. Former SAC vice-president Philip Dack, also a member of the "reform slate", won the seat by acclamation.

The Varsity—David Brian

With only two seconds left in the game Toronto scored, but the goal wasn't allowed.

Blues defeat York, 7-4

By PETER DUX

After Wednesday's 7-4 victory over York, hockey Blues appear to be on their way to a perfect season in league play. Their record is 16-0-0 with one remaining game.

Blues will be meeting those same York Yeomen in the first round of the playoffs — a sudden-death encounter next Tuesday night at Varsity Arena. If Wednesday's game was any indication of the Yeomen's challenge, Toronto has little to fear.

York put up a gallant fight and showed perseverance, but injuries have taken their toll this season.

Playing without their top men — Barry Jenkins is out with a broken leg and Paul Cerre with torn knee ligaments — York was forced to dress two other ailing players. Rick Ball skated with a pin holding together his separated shoulder, while Mike Travis looked weak from his recent attack of appendicitis.

York scored first on a powerplay, but thanks to two Yeomen penalties (leaving them two men short), Blues tied the score. With the second Yeoman just stepping out of the box, Varsity went ahead to gain the needed momentum to win.

The game's turning point came when Toronto was given two penalties and managed to kill both off without any damage.

Kent Ruhnke scored the insurance marker early in the second period, shooting from the faceoff circle to the goalie's far side, without lifting the puck off the ice — a move he has patented this year.

After Mike Keenan's goal, York coach Dave Chambers lifted his second string goalie in favour of Greg Harrison, who turned in a better showing. (Goalie Smith had let in five goals before Chambers replaced him.)

With a 6-2 lead and about two seconds left in the period, Varsity scored a goal which will never go in the record book — thanks to the Lady Godiva Marching Band and referee Zip Thompson.

The LGMB has a habit of sounding off about five seconds before the period end, often confusing the visiting team which can't distinguish their racket from the real horn.

Wednesday night the band's move backfired. As they were blasting away Blues scored; the red light went on and then off again — next the blue light came on along with the real horn. Zip looked at the clock and seeing one second left, ruled "no goal".

York outscored Toronto 2-1 in the last 20 minutes, with play see-sawing back and forth.

To York's credit, the team kept skating and didn't give up the game. Blues lone third period goal came on a shorthanded breakaway by Bob Munro.

Blues Notes . . . York has only four returnees this year two of which are on the injury list . . . the only veterans are Gerri Greenham and John Hirst . . . Varsity's Bill Buba didn't score Wednesday — this marks the first time this season that the speedy left winger has failed to score in a league game . . . Blues try to finish the league undefeated at Laurentian in Sudbury this Sunday night . . . goalie Gary Innes was spotted on the Blue's bench last night buried in paper work — he was scouting the Yeomen for next week's playoff game.

Law clinches b-ball playoff spot

Pronounced almost dead before Christmas, Law rose up Wednesday night to trample UC 75-59 in interfaculty basketball action, and clinched a playoff spot in the process.

Since the Christmas break, Law has been the hottest team in the league (except for St. Mike's). Law's return to prominence is the direct result of Al Sternberg's return to good health. No other team depends more on one particular player than Law.

Sternberg scored 21 points in Wednesday's game. However, he's more valuable than the points he contributes to the team. Without him, Law doesn't stand a chance of defending its crown as interfac basketball champions.

Other noteworthy scores on the lawyers' squad in the UC game included Scott Hunter with 16 points and James Hallinight, the Princeton prodigy, with 12.

Scoring for UC were Mike Betcherman (15 points), Bill Birnbaum (15) and Joel Levitan (10).

New, assigned the role of spoiler for this year, upset Erindale 73.67 in a game Tuesday night.

Mark Sherkin (20 points) and Mike Mendelsohn (14), led New's assault on Erindale, while Jimmy Walker (16) and Al Nakrosius (12) were high for Erindale.

New broke out early to a 10 point lead and managed to keep enough room between themselves and Erindale to win the contest.

St. Mike's A, trailing by six at halftime, defeated Meds 76-67 in the second game of Tuesday night's doubleheader.

St. Mike's win, coupled with UC's loss to Law, ensured that SMC will finish first in Division IA. As usual, St. Mike's A played just well enough to win - an act they have been performing all year.

Carrying the play for St. Mike's were Larry Trafford (22 points, as usual), Tom Campana (20), and Jack Baynes, the Ventura freewheeler, 11 points.

The leading scorers for Meds were Lindsey Horenblas (19 points), Bill Caskey, the masked man, (15), and Ron Sternberg (12).

Next week marks the end of regular interfaculty basketball play, and some key games still remain.

SGS and PHE B meet Monday at 5 pm to determine the final playoff spot in Division IB, while Tuesday at 6:30 pm Erindale and Vic clash to determine first place in Division IB (Senior engineering, also from Division IB, is also in the playoffs.)

In Division IA, St. Mike's, UC, and Law are already playoff contenders. If Meds loses to NEW (8 pm Thursday) and PHE A wins its two remaining games against UC and NEW, PHE A will make the playoffs. If not, Meds is in.

FACULTY OF ARTS AND SCIENCE COUNCIL AND COMMITTEES ANNOUNCEMENT OF ELECTION

One half of the elected membership of the Council and its Committees retires each year, to be replaced by elected members who will be elected for two years. The following summary relates particularly to the responsibilities of the elected student and faculty members of Council and the function and role of the Committees on which they will serve.

The major committee in the structure is the General Committee which has 49 elected students, 91 elected faculty and 59 ex-officio members such as College Heads, Department Chairmen and representatives of other Faculties. The General Committee is responsible for the formulation of policy for the Faculty of Arts and Science. It is concerned, for example, with curriculum development, admissions policy, study abroad programmes, and evaluation of the academic session and day. It also serves as a forum for discussion of any matters of general concern to the Faculty, from which resolutions may be sent to other bodies, prominent among which, in the future, will be the new Governing Council of the University. Some student members of the General Committee are elected directly to it (2 from each College except Scarborough and 3 part-time students, giving a total of 17). The remainder assume their seats automatically upon election to one of the five Curriculum Committees; or the Committee on Counselling, or Study Elsewhere. Membership on all Committees is normally for a two-year renewable term.

There are five curriculum committees: Humanities, Social Sciences, Physical Sciences, Life Sciences and Interdisciplinary Studies, the last of which is also responsible for various special courses in the Faculty. Each committee is chaired by an Associate Dean and has 3 full-time students, 1 part-time student, and 6 faculty members. These committees review all course proposals submitted by Departments for inclusion in the Calendar, and may take initiative in proposing development of new areas of study and any other matters pertaining to the course offerings.

The Counselling Committee has 1 student member from each College (except Scarborough), 1 part-time student, and 4 faculty members. The Chairman will be appointed from among the members. This committee is responsible for co-ordination of counselling for undergraduates in Arts and Science and for secondary school students interested in eventually entering the Faculty. While many individuals and offices on the campus are involved in counselling of one kind, or another, students all too often do not receive the information and advice which they need at critical points during their years at the University.

The Committee on Study Elsewhere supervises the arrangements through which students in the Faculty may spend a year abroad to facilitate their studies in certain disciplines. It will have four full-time student and four faculty members. The Chairman will be appointed from among the members.

In addition there is an Academic Standards Committee, a Committee on Standing, and an Admissions Committee. Appointed faculty and ex-officio persons will sit on these committees.

A list of positions that are open will be published in the University media and is available at the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall, College and Departmental offices and the APUS office. In addition, a complete description of the structure of the Council and the accompanying rules of procedure may be obtained on request from the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall.

NOMINATIONS OPENED FEBRUARY 19

Full-time and part-time students registered in the Faculty of Arts and Science are eligible for nomination to the following committees: General Committee, Committee on Study Elsewhere, Counselling Committee, Curriculum Committee for Humanities, Curriculum Committee for Interdisciplinary Studies, Curriculum Committee for Life Sciences, Curriculum Committee for Physical Sciences, Curriculum Committee for Social Sciences. For nomination to a Curriculum Committee, other than Interdisciplinary Studies, a full-time student must be intending to take at least three courses within the group in the next academic year.

Nominations opened on February 19. Nomination forms may then be obtained at the Faculty Office, College Registrar's offices, or Departmental offices, the office of the Division of University Extension and the APUS office. Completed nomination forms must be returned to the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall prior to 4.00 p.m. March 5, 1973 to be valid. Voting will be by ballot box. Enquiries regarding this election may be directed to 928-3389 or 928-3392.

Wednesday, we looked at the philosophy and organizational structure of the athletics department at the University of Waterloo. Today, we conclude with an analysis of the athletic budget (especially as it pertains to men's intercollegiate athletics), and the degree of community involvement at the physical education building.

We will also mention the new building and how it was financed, as well as the recent referendum held on intercollegiate athletics.

Although, as we mentioned Wednesday, Waterloo Director of Athletics Carl Totzke said that "students weren't critical of the (athletic) program and didn't have long lists of grievances", the Athletic Advisory Board, with the approval of the President's Advisory Council on Athletics arranged for "student preference" to be polled on the university's intercollegiate athletic program.

And, the University of Waterloo information services bulletin announcing the "referendum-opinionaire" results stated, "The argument over intercollegiate sports has involved those students... who object that only the athletically elite benefit from them...".

Totzke told The Varsity that "the president created a fees study committee which looked at other university services. The university decided to assume the costs of the intramural program as well as a referendum on intercollegiate athletics."

The then proposed referendum was changed to an opinionaire by the President's Advisory Council.

Athletic Advisory Board president Marvin Brown explained that in view of the small student response in voting at Waterloo, the president's council felt that a similar small turnout would not be indicative of the whole student population. He added that if a select group of students desired to vote against the program, the returns would indicate a discontinuance, yet the number of votes would not be an accurate indicator.

The administration mailed out 12,740 ballots and received only 3,862 valid ballots in return. Yet, from this response, the administration decided that it could conclude policy for the entire student body.

Slightly over 50 per cent of the ballots returned indicated that the program should continue with a fee of $20 per academic year, while slightly over one-fifth of the ballots returned indicated the program should be kept with a $17.50 fee. Only 317 ballots called for the discontinuance of the program.

Financial divisions

The Waterloo referendum, held late last November, serves as one example of the split evidenced within the overall athletic structure at the university.

For example, the athletics department pays nine full-time staff members, who are responsible for organizing, and administering and coaching duties within the framework of the intercollegiate athletics program.

These people are all paid partially from the intercollegiate budget (through student levy) and partly by the administration (for intramural duties).

Conversely, there are several members of the school (on the academic side) who are paid by both the athletics department and the university.

In more concrete terms, Waterloo's proposed budgetary estimates for May, 1973 to April, 1974 include $129,980 for the intramural program, and $249,668 for the intercollegiate activities. Of the intramural program, the administration pay $8 per student plus the cost of rentals (ice, etcetera) - in this case, for next year, $18,500. The remainder of the cost must be made up from the intercollegiate budget, or else shared jointly by the athletics department and the university administration proper.

In effect, Waterloo has a budget totalling $376,648 for approximately 11,500 students (but this figure also includes salaries and a modest amount for ice and other rentals).

By comparison, Queen's University's budget totalled just under $178,000 for the 1972-73 academic year, without pay for salaries or rentals. However, one important exception to Queen's that is applicable to Waterloo is the trimester system at the University of Waterloo, forcing the athletic facilities to operate practically the year round.

fees costs for 1973-74 are estimated at $65,250, although this figure, unlike the $50,000 mentioned above, includes women's intercollegiate activities as well as men's. (For 1972-73, the combines cost was approximately $60,000.)

The chart reveals that Waterloo is funnelling its money largely into the "big three" intercollegiate sports — basketball, hockey, and football — with little regard for the so-called "minor" intercollegiate sports, which have the potential for involving more participants.

Physical education building

Waterloo's new building, paid for by the provincial government, according to Totzke, contains 156,000 square feet.

The building itself contains 64,603 assignable square feet for athletic activity and total capital cost to construct this portion of the building, including furnishings and equipment the main gymnasium floor is situated on the basement level.

The main gymnasium is, in effect, a triple gym, divided by a folding door into a double and single gym. The open space covers an area 210 feet by 140 feet and contains three basketball, 14 badminton, and seven volleyball courts. In addition, a main basketball, volleyball or badminton court can be set up in the double gym with seating accommodation for 4,000 people.

The swimming pool is L-shape in design with one and three metre diving boards. While one part of the L allows swimmers to compete over a 25-yard distance in six lanes, the other allows competition over a distance of 25 metres in four lanes.

The top floor (second) of the complex contains a general activity area and a gymnastics activity area. The general activity area consists of an open space 100 feet by 35 feet used for activities such as judo, fencing, archery, and golf.

The gymnastics activity area is similar in size to that of the general activity area, with front folding bleachers serving as a partial wall.

The university is responsible for all buildings and grounds maintenance and, according to Totzke, "they also accept the responsibility of all rented facilities, for such activities as hockey, curling, etc.". The university also put up six tennis courts in conjunction with the town (a $7,000 share) and has the use of them three days per week.

For football and other outdoor field activities Waterloo uses Seagram Stadium and the Columbia Playing Fields. There are 14,768 assignable square feet for athletic activity in the stadium, and its total value, including gymnasium, stadium seating, the field and floodlighting, but excluding furnishings and equipment is $484,556.

As for the playing fields, the cost of the two football fields, the two hockey fields and the baseball diamond total $100,000. (Total capital costs, etc. amounted to $4,791,556.)

The university pays maintenance costs totalling $191,193 for the physical activities building, $41,728 for Seagram Stadium, and $14,027 for the Columbia Playing Fields.

Community involvement

Community involvement between the athletic department and the surrounding geographical community is not great.

Totzke said, "I'm not happy with the situation; we do too little, too little." However, he added that all costs come out of student funds, and some costs are also presently borne by intramurals.

As for community use of the swimming pool, Totzke said, "frankly, there's no time available", although the gym is sometimes available between the hours of 8-11 pm, Saturday and Sunday evenings.

However, the facilities have been made available, for example, between May 1, 1970 and April 30, 1971 to almost 60 extra-university groups. These included facilities for local high school and grade school teams, rock festivals, and for the Montreal Expos baseball clinic.

Nevertheless, even with a comparably large budget, only a small portion of the funds filters down to the intercollegiate program. For example, the 1972-73 estimates indicate that under $50,000 found its way into the men's intercollegiate program for equipment, travel, rentals, and officials and fees. As the chart on this page shows what did result in paying for Waterloo's 19 recognized OUAA sports was distributed unequally.

Not much has changed for the forthcoming year. Equipment, travel, rental, and officials and was $3,253,000. The total cost of the structure, including offices and labs, and rooms for academic usage was $4,207,000.

Besides offices and labs, the basement floor contains 10 regulations squash courts (which can also be used for handball or paddleball), women's, visitor's, and men's locker rooms, and training, communications, and equipment centres.

The first floor contains a correctives and exercise gym, combatives gym, dance studio, and administrative wing, swimming pool, while Waterloo's L-shaped pool allows for 25 yard or 25 metre swimming.

Students at U de Q may defy injunction

MONTREAL (CUPI) — Students at the besieged l'Université du Québec à Montréal (UQAM) will stage a mass meeting tonight to decide what strategy to adopt in the continuing fight with the university's administration, and the Québec government.

One possibility mentioned is that the students may decide to defy an injunction banning picketing of the university to continue their strike. At the least, it is expected that they will continue to boycott classes.

UQAM students have been on strike since mid-January over government fees regulations. The Québec government wants the students to pay their second term fees immediately but the students want up to three years after they graduate to repay them. The administration has sided with the province in the dispute.

Police attacks and a court injunction have forced an end to the general strike, but students are continuing to boycott classes.

It is likely that many students will return today to participate in study sessions.

Support for the original demands still remains high, however, as witnessed by the fact that only a handful of students entered the open buildings on Friday. Having broken the strike, the UQAM administration still cannot rest easy. It faces the continuing hostility of students and the possibility of an employees' strike within the next few weeks.

Thursday morning, police broke up student picket lines outside the Louis-Joliette and Emile-Gezard buildings of UQAM by running motorcycles through the lines and threatening to arrest those who refused to disperse immediately.

In one incident outside a UQAM parking lot several students were injured when a police motorcycle drove full speed directly into a crowd of strikers attempting to prevent a car from entering. One woman was run over and taken to the hospital, seriously injured.

UQAM rector Leo Dorais announced to a press conference later in the day that normal activities would resume Friday at the university.

No classes were given Friday, however, and very few students entered the building. The UQAM professors' union met Friday and condemned their administration for its tactics toward the strikers. The professors voted to hold study sessions instead of classes as long as the injunction is in force. Negotiations between the Comité d'organisation provisoire des étudiants (COPE), which directed the strike, and the administration have been suspended.

The picketers were much more numerous than usual on Thursday morning, as police intervention was expected. Dorais announced the "resumption of normal activities" on Wednesday evening, and education minister François Cloutier had stated that it was time to restore law and order at UQAM, where "a handful of activists are blackmailing the rest of the university community." The UQAM administration conducted a survey of students Wednesday, asking them to choose between police intervention and having the session annulled. Of 2,643 students polled, only 559 requested intervention while the rest favoured annulment or gave other responses.

About 200 students were massed in front of the Pavillon Louis Joliette by 8:30 Thursday morning, while 250 others picketed the Emile-Gezard Building nearby and blocked entrances to the university parking lot. Police action was touched off when strikers prevented a professor's car from entering the parking lot. Police tried to push back the crowd, but they were unable to move the students, who started chanting "Solidarité". The police quickly moved aside and a motorcycle cop stationed across the street accelerated his machine directly into the line.

The motorcycle came to a halt a few yards inside the lot, stopped by the weight of the bodies it hit and ran over, and by the angry students who attempted to overpower the cop and demobilize the machine. Within seconds, half a dozen other motorcycles were on the scene, chasing picketers on the sidewalks and in the parking lot. At least three students were arrested.

By 9 am, the police had stopped traffic on St. Catherine Street and moved in with all their forces to clear away the line outside Louis-Joliette.

They first forced students to move out of the entrance way of the building and onto the sidewalk, on the pretext that they had to "keep moving." A line of about six motorcycles then turned onto St. Catherine from Bleury, passed the picket line, turned onto the sidewalk, and drove into the picketers, forcing them to scatter and regroup across the street. The motorcycles remained as a barrier in front of the building.

By 9:15, the students, who had started shouting "Dorais Assassinn" and "A bas les files" were confronted by over a dozen motorcycle cops, about twenty carloads of regular Montréal police. Within a few minutes, the riot squad approached, swinging their yard-long clubs and dispersed the students.

McNie tells all to students

Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNie (seated at the far right) tells part-time students that some people would rather spend $60 to watch a football game rather than invest it in education. The students were not amused by McNie's devastating wit. See story, page 3.

Pelletier criticizes church

By JOHN CAMPBELL

Federal communications minister Gérard Pelletier spoke out against church involvement in politics yesterday at the final session of a three-day conference on "The Survival of Canada and the Christian Church", held at St. Michael's College.

Pelletier, describing his remarks as "personal statement" said, "If clerics want to enter the political arena, I welcome them. But I want them to get their hands dirty."

He was referring to his stated opinion that clergy hide behind Christian rhetoric when they make political statements. There they "feel protected from criticism" and "never have to take a chance," he said.

The minister advocated that the church should defend the enduring "values of civilization" rather than concern itself with the day-to-day matters of politics.

He was not clear on how this division could be made however, "There is ambiguity in the language", he averred. "How can one define politics as a part of civilization?"

An essay written for the conference by St. Michael's religious studies professor Gregory Baum formed the basis of much of the weekend's discussion.

Describing the Québécois as a "conquered people", who had become "Canadians of second rank" because they remained faithful to their cultural heritage, he wrote.

"It is the task of the Christian churches in Canada to reveal (such) injustices present in Canada society — to stir people out of their apathy to make them critical and foster discussion."

Pelletier, in the final speech of the conference, took issue with Baum's political Church proposals and with the theologian's tacit acceptance of Québec's desire for independence.

"Avoicing that the federalist system 'favours minorities — including the French', the minister firmly declared, "I am a federalist. I do not share the pessimism of those who promote French-Canadian nationalism."

Four teams may seek SAC jobs

Three tickets have either declared their candidacy or filed nomination papers for the SAC presidential elections, as nominations draw to a close today at noon.

A fourth is a distinct possibility.

Elections committee chairman John Helliwell announced yesterday that he had received nomination papers Saturday from UC student Bob Anderson for president, along with vice-presidential candidates Mike Scott (Erin) and Stephen Moses (Meds I).

Under the constitution this year, as last, presidential candidates can only run with two vice-presidential hopefuls. One of the three must be from either Scarborough or Erindale College, another from a professional faculty and the third from arts.

Former SAC services commissioner Bill Steadman told The Varsity last night that his successor Chuck Vickery (APSC III) would file nomination papers, with the required 100 signatures, today. He will be running with finance commissioner Paul Bannan (Erin III) and Mike Weedon (Vic II).

The third ticket will be a United Socialist Slate, composed of Young Socialists and Old Mollers. Heather Rideout (Erin), a Young Socialist, will run for president, while graduate engineer Greg McMaster of the Old Mole will contest the vice-presidency with Young Socialist Alice Klein. Each of the vice-presidential candidates is required to have paid the $12 SAC membership fee to be nominated as neither is a SAC member by dint of being a full-time undergraduate.

A fourth ticket looms as a possibility, as Stop the Student Surcharge chairman Peter Havers said last night the committee is still considering running.

The March 7 and 8 election entails a $115 per week salary for the president, who is expected to be full-time, vice-presidents receive a $95 per week salary for a limited time period.

Vickery's team leads in SAC experience, with Vickery and Bannan each being on council one year and heading a commission since January.

Anderson is the only one of his team to be on SAC. However, he was education commissioner last summer during Marty Stollar's absence and has served on numerous arts and science committees, notably the New Program Review Committee.

Klein ran unsuccessfully for vice-president two years ago on the YS ticket.

SAC will promote day of study

At a poorly attended meeting, Wednesday, SAC voted $1,500 to promote the proposed Day of Study, on post-secondary education and finally granted the Arts and Sciences Student Union a two dollars per capita student rebate.

Vice-president John Heliwell outlined his plans for the Ontario-wide study day March 13, and circulated a precis of "The Learning Society", the Commission on Post-Secondary Education report which was prepared by SAC executive members. The report is available at SAC offices at no cost.

The Arts and Sciences Student Union got its rebate after waiting through months of disrupted meetings. Although finance commissioner Paul Bannon was not content to free the money until he had been reassured an audit would be done, the few members of council who remained until the end of the meeting voted strongly in favour of the motion.

Grants totalling almost $1,200 were given to Film Production '73, a group of university students making a film, college newspapers the Vic Strand and the Innis Herald, and Innis' Writ literary magazine.

A proposed $2,000 grant for Frontier College was declared unconstitutional.

Under the new constitution this year, SAC can only make grants to campus organizations. After a brief debate, council decided that Frontier College was not a campus organization.

McNie questions worth of a degree

Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNie disagreed yesterday with his student audience on the cause of the recent drop in university enrolment.

Speaking to a handful of part-time students at Hart House, McNie said that, while financial barriers were a problem, the real problem was lack of motivation.

"People are beginning to question whether or not a university education is worth it," he said.

"Some would rather spend $60 to watch the Tiacs win the Grey Cup than invest that money in a university education," he added.

His audience seemed to think financial barriers were a more significant factor.

Joyce Denyer, part-time student member of the Governing Council, said many part-time students were desperately in need of financial aid.

Part-time students are not eligible for government support under the Ontario Student Awards Program, the major source of subsidies for full-time students.

Denyer cited statistics showing that the average subsidy available for part-time students at Ontario universities was 32 cents per capita, compared to $60 per capita for full-time students.

McNie sidestepped a further question about financing problems with: "Problems exist even when there is lots of money."

Part-time student John MacMillan said that the government's recent tuition fee hikes have affected part-time students. Fees went up $20 per course for extension students at the same time as full-time students' fees rose $100.

"There is a significant drop in the number of part-time students taking three courses this year, and this is no coincidence," he charged.

"When it came to paying their fees, many found they could only afford to take two courses this year, which means they are delayed in getting their degrees," he added.

McNie, who has been a part-time student at McMaster University for the past 16 years, said his government was aware of the problems and he "hoped" some financial aid would be forthcoming.

He refused to disclose, however, whether it had in any specific plans in mind.

"Wait for the budget," he advised.

Part-time student and governor Norma Grindal also attacked McNie for his approach towards part-time education.

"You seem to have the same attitude that was around years ago, that part-time education is for people with lots of money and leisure time. What about the lower middle class person who wants to come but is just above qualifying for loans and grants" she said.

McNie, in his introductory remarks, had pinpointed increased leisure time, a desire for more than material gain, and the new ambitions of women as being responsible for the rise in part-time enrolment.

Several students also complained about the lack of professional degree courses open to part-time students.

One woman said that Toronto was the only city in Canada with a population over 500,000 where a degree in engineering cannot be obtained through a part-time program.

McNie answered: "If you think you have problems here, you should see the smaller cities."

Universities minister Jack McNie

Pres tacitly supports math students

By GRETCHEN ROEDDE

U of T president John Evans yesterday obliquely supported students struggling against the math department.

Evans spoke of the "need to develop good mechanisms for co-operative decision-making" when asked about the dismissal of math professor Stephen Salaff and the refusal of tenure to former math prof David Spring. He was speaking to the congregation at Bloor Street United Church.

Students are protesting the department's actions, saying that it paid too little attention to teaching qualities in assessing professors. Students of both Spring and Salaff, who are holding a rally tomorrow in the Sid Smith foyer at 11 am, have said that both are good teachers.

Earlier, in his speech, Evans praised student representation on bodies that make decisions that affect them. There are no students on the math hiring, firing and tenure committees.

"There is a growing recognition that the student has an increasingly important role in decision-making on curriculum and related matters," he said. "You may argue that a student is inexperienced, that she hasn't sufficient skills, but the contributions of students at McMaster, where students are involved in a major way, have been extremely positive.

"The new governing Council at U of T also has representation by all groups affected by its decisions. However, we must move towards increased sharing of responsibilities."

Evans admitted that "people have different values and standpoints, and the (math) department, which recognizes accomplishment of the basis of research, is at odds with students who are interested in a professor's ability to communicate or motivate students."

"The hierarchical decision-making which has characterized our society's institutions can no longer deal with the growing number of complex issues we are currently facing," said the president.

He blamed this lack of accountability and grass-roots participation for the increasing tension in universities, corporations, and communities.

"At the academic level," Evans stated "students are more highly motivated when they are responsible for their own learning. Many students experience negative reactions to obligatory education. Commitment increases with self-determination."

Nonnie Baker, a U of T economics student in the congregation, asked Evans his opinion of the proposed change to a freer curriculum in Toronto high schools.

Evans approved the change, hoping that students at high school level were mature enough to choose their own curriculum.

In an informal discussion with students, Evans used the People's Republic of China as an example of the extreme success of a country which in a generation has produced a strong sense of commitment, eradicated starvation, provided its citizens with all the goods and services of the Western world "and some we haven't got like acupuncture," without "help" from well-meaning Western countries.

"The fundamental question of priorities is also a problem in health care where the benefits of costly services like heart transplants must be balanced with the extensive needs for simple dental services", Evans said.

Priorities are also important, he said. "In education, where we have the choice of enhancing opportunities for gifted students, increasing the accessibility of education and perhaps lowering the quality, or extending services to the handicapped who already have difficulty keeping pace with society."

A woman asked Evans how he felt about the demands of women that they be represented in positions of authority in society.

"As women take positions of authority, they are commanding respect by their excellence of their performance, and this is more effective in changing public attitudes than confrontation politics."

CEGEPS fight back

MONTREAL (CUPI) — Montréal's English-language CEGEPS (community colleges) may be prepared to defy the provincial government's move to re-classify their teachers.

The administrations at Vanier and Dawson Colleges have said they will pay teachers according to their own, and not the government's criteria. The director-general (principal) of John Abbott College said his administration "will be doing everything in its power to minimize if not block, any adverse effects of the current review of teacher classification."

In an effort to cut costs, the Québec Department of Education is lowering the salary level of many CEGEP teachers. Before the beginning of this academic year, each teacher signed a contract based on provisional classification by authorities at the individual colleges. But when the official government classifications began arriving, many teachers found they were to receive a lower salary than expected.

The teachers and faculty associations are organizing a massive attack on the government's classification scheme. John Abbott faculty leader Gary Evans said the teachers "mean to try to stop the province from implementing this barbaric system in an effort to trim its budget. Not even in industry is labor forced to pay the cost of new contracts, yet we are here facing that very situation. This is one issue where we need to maximize support of our faculty along with the college and students. Our strength is in unity of purpose."

Evans and many other CEGEP teachers believe the government instituted the classifications to wipe out any salary gains arising from a recently-negotiated 10 per cent salary increase for CEGEP teachers over the next two years.

The Québec government's December 15 decree ending negotiations with the common front of Québec civil servants gave the government the right to impose salary scales without having to negotiate with workers' representatives.

Evans, chairman of the John Abbott Faculty Association, said "our administration estimates that nearly 50 per cent of the teaching staff will be affected." Because the government is handing out the re-classification notices in small groups instead of simultaneously, nobody is sure how many teachers will be affected.

Dawson's acting director general, Robert Gordon, said the college will pay its teachers according to its own classification "until the money runs out. We are hoping, of course, there will be some kind of reaction (from the government) before that situation arises."

Gordon said the college faces bankruptcy unless there are some "drastic" changes in the government's classifications.

The Vanier College Board of Governors also rejected the government classifications and decided to pay teachers according to its own criteria for now.

The Board of Governors at John Abbott has not yet met to discuss the issue but director-general Bruce Macauland has suggested to college faculty members the board may be prepared to take the same action as Dawson and Vanier. He said the college is "generally supportive of the teachers the way the situation is currently evolving."

The CEGEP administrations think they may not be able to attract new teachers or hold the ones they have if the government's salary schedules remain in effect. The Dawson Board of Governors said it "may not be able to retain the services of many of our teachers or to recruit suitable new personnel and will therefore be unable to sustain or raise the present quality of education."

The Québec government may require all Québec students to attend CEGEPS before entering universities. The schools doubt they can attract enough teachers if pay is cut.

U of T alters GC statement

A statement from a student Governing Council candidate has been prevented from being printed in The Varsity and the U of T Bulletin, despite the fact that the student twice reworded it at the university's insistence.

Richard Schabas (Meds I) said last night that because the university considered a statement he made in his submission to the Governing Council secretariat possibly libellous, he changed it twice to meet their demands.

However, the statement was not printed along with others for council candidates in Friday's Bulletin, and similarly, not in the Governing Council ad in today's Varsity. (The other candidate who has no statement printed, Robin Henry, said last night she did not submit a statement because she wanted to withdraw from the race but was two hours past the deadline in attempting to do so.)

Council secretary David Claringbold and elections advisory chairman Paul Cadario, a student governor, both refused comment on the matter last night. Council administrative assistant Richard Smith, who has been given responsibility for the conduct of the elections, was not available last night and refused comment Thursday.

The contentious part of Schabas' statement is apparently an accusation that a medical professor is a racist.

Schabas, on a reform slate running for seven council positions, charged last night that the university was trying to protect the professor.

Schabas says that after Smith twice forced him to agree to reword that part of the statement, he thought it would be printed. Smith and he agreed on acceptable wording by phone Thursday, which Schabas was to consent to in writing Friday. However, Schabas says Smith was not at his Simcoe Hall office when he went to see him, nor was the statement available as promised for him to sign.

The contentious part of Schabas' statement after the second reworking, reads, "Election to the Governing Council would provide an effective platform for these and other issues, like admissions practices, discriminating against women and professors who are racist (name deleted at university's insistence)," according to Schabas. The other issues referred to were the fees hikes and open stacks in the Roberts Library.

The second change replaced "racist professors" with "professors who are racist". The first change Wednesday replaced the professor's name with "(name deleted at university's insistence)".

Smith first called Monday to warn Schabas he might be sued for libel if the name was left in. Schabas told him he was willing to take the chance and thought he could prove the accusation in court in any case. Smith later said, according to Schabas, the statement was unacceptable to the university; as publisher of the Bulletin it might be sued for printing libellous statements.

The administration also threatened to not print the statement of another reform candidate, graduate student Tony Leah.

Leah reports that Smith required a signed statement from Tom McLaughlin, saying that the following would not be damaging to his reputation:

"Last year, faced with the legitimate demand for undergraduate and community access to the Roberts Library stacks, the administration called in the police. As a result of that action, Tom McLaughlin was sent to the Don Jail on February 9, 1973."

McLaughlin readily complied with this requirement, noting in his letter, "Since I am not John Sword, the man who made the decision (to call police in), I don't see how Mr. Leah's statement could be damaging to my reputation.

"And even if I were Mr. Sword, my reputation couldn't be damaged any further."

"Students rate highest those teachers from whom they learn the least."
—math department chairman
George Duff

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Daisons Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Re-instate dismissed math profs

Duff should stop ignoring students

Math students have given department chairman George Duff until 11 am Tuesday to respond to their demands that staffing decisions be made on the basis of teaching ability and that three popular teachers — Stephen Salaff, David Spring, and Michael Mather —, effectively dismissed by Duff, be re-instated.

More than a thousand math students signed a petition earlier this year requesting student representation on departmental hiring and tenure bodies and supporting retention of the two profs then known to be dismissed.

Nearly all the students in the dismissed professors' classes have signed separate petitions asking they that they be retained on staff.

The Students' Administrative Council Wednesday condemned the firings and reaffirmed its position "that teaching ability be a prime factor in matters of promotion, granting of tenure, and firing, and that students be represented on all teaching bodies decision-making bodies".

Nonetheless, Duff has continued merrily on his way, indifferent to student protests. "Students rate highest those teachers from whom they learn the least," he told a math students' meeting at the beginning of the month.

Teaching is only a part of a professor's job, he told them. Mature scholarship and public service are also expected.

And, he dragged out an arts and science Faculty Council motion rejecting student participation on staffing decisions, to back up his position.

All that doesn't bail Duff out of his quandry: Students are getting increasingly — and justly — angry with an administrator who has a knack for knocking off professors who seem to have established a meaningful learning relationship with their students.

Not surprisingly, the three unlucky profs have sided with students in various struggles within the department and the university, likely offending Duff's guild mentality, a mentality that would expect faculty to stick together against student interests no matter how legitimate.

Duff runs the department "like a monarchy", last year's Math-Physics Course Union vice-president told The Varsity. The chairman, he continued, consistently opposed student input at any level in the department.

It's more than a little upsetting that years after this university supposedly accepted the role of students in helping make decisions that govern it, a conservative chairman is still able to ignore their protests and freeze them out of decision-making which vitally affects the education they receive.

Equally disturbing is the knowledge that this administrator was only recently re-appointed to another five year term despite student opposition to him. Interestingly, the committee that made the decision to extend his term included no students.

Conservative faculty and administrators have long sought to deny students a significant voice in staffing decisions, claiming the students lack the expertise to judge the relative merits of their teachers. Yet, who better can determine professors' relative merits than the students faculties' primary function is to teach?

Really, all the conservatives are saying is that they don't want anybody jeopardizing their protection racket, that students might be a little too disrespectful of their professors' bent for research or writing rather than teaching.

These academicians would deny students any say in university decision-making. But, more liberal administrators have beat them to the punch, offering students limited power in less critical areas while leaving staffing as a faculty prerogative. So, the important power — power which most directly affects the students' potential learning experience — still rests with the academic guild. They decide who gets hired; who gets fired, and where the money goes.

Until now, that is. Autocratic, indifferent chairmen like Duff cannot be allowed to continue to ignore the students' will. Faced with universal student support for the dismissed professors and demands for a student input into staffing decisions, Duff has no choice but to open up his department's decision-making process, to democratize what until now has been a closed department.

When he's hunting around for excuses to lock students out of important decision-making, Duff will find it hard to ignore the sociology department's precedent-setting student-faculty staffing committee. It, rather than the guild models found in other departments, should guide his future actions.

Tomorrow at 11 in Sld Smith foyer math students will be waiting for Duff's reply. We'd suggest it should be more reasonable and judicious than his behaviour until now. If not, the issue will not — indeed ought not — be lightly dropped.

Women see sisters through male grid

Lesbianism offends male supremacy

By RITA MAE BROWN
reprinted from the Manitoban

What is a lesbian? A lesbian is the rage of all women condensed to the point of explosion. She is the woman who, often beginning at an extremely early age, acts in accordance with her inner compulsion to be a more complete and more free human being than her society — perhaps then, but certainly later — cares to allow her.

These needs and actions, over a period of years, bring her into painful conflict with people, situations, the accepted ways of thinking, feeling and behaving, until she is in a state of continual war with everything around her, and usually with herself. She may not be fully conscious of the political implications of what for her began as personal necessity, but on some level she has not been able to accept the limitations and oppression laid on her by the most basic role of her society — the female role.

The turmoil she experiences tends to induce guilt proportional to the degree to which she feels she is not meeting social expectations, and/or eventually drives her to question and analyze what the rest of her society more or less accepts. She is forced to evolve her own life pattern, often living much of her life alone, learning usually much earlier than her "straight" (heterosexual sisters about the essential aloneness of life (which the myth of marriage obscures) and about the reality of illusions.

To the extent that she cannot expel the heavy socialization that goes with being female, she can never truly find peace with herself. For she is caught somewhere between accepting society's view of her — in which case she cannot accept herself — and coming to understand what this sexist society has done to her and why it is functional and necessary for it to do so.

Those of us who work that through find ourselves on the other side of a tortuous journey through a night that may have been decades long. The perspective gained from that journey — the liberation of self, the inner peace, the real love of self and of all women is something to be shared with all women — because we are all women. It should first be understood that lesbianism, like male homosexuality, is a category of behaviour possible only in a sexist society characterized by rigid sex roles and dominated by male supremacy. Those sex roles dehumanize women by defining us as a supportive/serving caste in relation to the master caste of men, and emotionally cripple men by demanding that they be alienated from their own bodies and emotions in order to perform their economic/political/military functions effectively.

Homosexuality is a by-product of a particular way of setting up roles (or approved patterns of behaviour) on the basis of sex; as such it is an inauthentic (not consonant with "reality") category. In a society in which men do not oppress women and sexual expression is allowed to follow feelings, the categories of homosexuality and heterosexuality would disappear.

But, lesbianism is also different from male homosexuality and serves a different function in the society. "Oyke" is a different kind of put-down from "faggot," although both imply you are not playing your socially assigned sex role and are not, therefore, a "real woman" or a "real man". The grudging admiration felt for the tomboy, and the queasiness felt around a sissy boy point to the same thing: the contempt in which women — or those who play a female role — are held.

And, the investment in keeping women in that contemptuous role is very great. Lesbian is the word, the label, the condition that holds women in line. When a woman hears this word tossed her way, she knows she is stepping out of line. She knows that she has crossed the terrible boundary of her sex role. She recoils, she protests, she reshapes her actions to gain approval.

Lesbian is a label invented by men to throw at any woman who dares to be his equal, who dares to challenge his prerogatives (including that of all women as part of the exchange medium among men), who dares to assert the primacy of her own needs.

To have the label applied to people active in women's liberation is just the most recent instance of a long history. Older women will recall that not so long ago, any woman who was successful, independent, not orienting her whole life about a man, would hear this word. For in this sexist society, for a woman to be independent means she can't be a woman — she must be a dyke.

That in itself should tell us where women are at. It says as clearly as can be said: woman and person are contradictory terms. For a lesbian is not considered a "real woman". And yet, in popular thinking, there is really only one essential difference between a lesbian and other women: that of sexual orientation — which is to say, when you strip off all the packaging, you must finally realize that the essence of being a "woman" is to get layed by men.

"Lesbian" is one of the sexual categories by which men have divided up humanity. While all women are dehumanized as sex objects, as the objects of men they are given certain connotations: identification with his power, his ego, his status, his protection (from other males), feeling like a "real woman", finding social acceptance by adhering to her role, et cetera.

Should a woman confront herself by confronting another woman, there are fewer rationalizations, fewer buffers by which to avoid the stark horror of her dehumanized condition. Herein, we find the overriding fear of many women towards exploring intimate relationships with other women: the fear of being used as a sexual object by a woman, which not only will bring her no male-connected compensations, but also will reveal the void which is woman's real situation.

This dehumanization is expressed when a straight woman learns that a sister is a lesbian; she begins to relate to her lesbian sister as her potential sex object, laying a surrogate male role on the lesbian. This reveals her heterosexual conditioning to make herself into an object when sex is potentially involved in a relationship, and it denies the lesbian her full humanity.

For women, especially those in the movement, to perceive their lesbian sisters through this male grid of role definitions is to accept his male cultural conditioning and to oppress their sisters much as they themselves have been oppressed by men. Are we going to continue the male classification system of defining all females in sexual relation to some other category of people? Affixing the label lesbian not only to a woman who spires to be a person, but also to their situation of real love, real solidarity, real primary among women is a primary form of dehumanization among women: it is the condition which keeps women within the confines of the feminine role, and it is the debunking/share term which keeps women from forming any primary attachments, groups, or associations among themselves.

Women in the movement have, in most cases, gone to great lengths to avoid discussion and confrontation with the issue of lesbianism. It puts people up tight. They are hostile, evasive, or try to incorporate it into some "broader issue". They would rather not talk about it. If they have to, they try to dismiss it as a "ladies evening".

But it is no side issue. It is absolutely essential to the success and fulfillment of the women's liberation movement that this issue be dealt with. As long as the label "dyke" can be used to frighten women into a less militant stand, keep her separate from her sisters, keep her from giving primacy to anything other than men and family — then to that extent she is controlled by the male culture. Until women see in each other the possibility of a primal commitment which includes sexual love, they will be denying themselves the love and value they readily accord to men, thus affirming their second-class status.

As long as male acceptability is primary — both to individual women and to the movement as a whole — the term lesbian will be used effectively against women. Insofar as women want only more privileges within the system, they do not want to antagonize male power. They instead seek acceptability for women's liberation, and the most crucial aspect of the acceptability is to deny lesbianism — to deny any fundamental challenge to the basis of the female role.

It should also be said that some younger, more radical women have honestly begun to discuss lesbianism, but so far it has been primarily as a sexual "alternative" to men. This, however, is still giving primacy to men, both because the idea of relating more completely to women occurs as a negative reaction to men, and because the lesbian relationship is being characterized simply by sex, which is divisive and sexist.

On one level, which is both personal and political, women may withdraw emotional and sexual energies from men, and work out various alternatives for those energies in their own lives. On a different political/psychological level, it must be understood that what is crucial is that women begin disengaging from male-centered response patterns. In the privacy of our own psyches, we must cut those cords to the core. For irrespective of where our love and sexual energies flow, if we are male-identified in our heads, we cannot realize our autonomy as human beings.

But, what is it that women have related to and through men? By virtue of having been brought up in a male society, we have internalized the male culture's definition of ourselves. That definition views us as beings who exist not for ourselves, but for the servicing, maintenance and comfort of men. That definition consigns us to sexual and family functions, and excludes us from defining and shaping the terms of our lives.

In exchange for our psychic servicing and for performing society's non-profit-making functions, the man confers on us just one thing: the slave status which makes us legitimate in the eyes of the society in which we live, called "femininity" or "being a real woman" in our cultural lives.

We are authentic, legitimate, real to the extent that we are the property of some man whose name we bear. To be a woman who belongs to no man is to be invisible, pathetic, inauthentic, unreal. He confirms his image of us — of what we have become in order to be acceptable to him — not our real selves; he confirms our womanhood — as he defines it, in relation to him — but cannot confirm our personhood, our own selves as absolutes. As long as we are dependent on the male culture for this definition, for this approval, we cannot be free.

The consequence of internalizing this role is an enormous reservoir of self-hate. This is not to say the self-hate is recognized or accepted as such; indeed most women would deny it. It may be experienced as discomfort with her role as feeling empty, as numbness, as restlessness, a paralyzing anxiety at the centre. Alternatively, it may be expressed in shall defensiveness of the glory and destiny of her role. But it lies exist, often beneath the edge of her consciousness, poisoning her existence, keeping her alienated from herself, her own needs, and rendering her a stranger to other women.

Women hate both themselves and other women. They try to escape by identifying with the oppressor, living through him; gaining status and identity from his ego, his power, his accomplishment. And, by not identifying with other "empty vessels" like themselves.

Women resist relating on all levels to other women who will reflect their own oppression, their own secondary status, their own self-hate. For to confront another woman is finally to confront one's self — the self we have gone to such lengths to avoid. And, in that mirror we know we cannot really respect and love that which we have been made to be.

As the source of self-hate and the lack of real self are rooted in our male-given identity, we must create a new sense of self. As long as we cling to the idea of "being a woman", we will sense some conflict with that incipient self, that sense of I, that sense of a whole person. It is very difficult to realize and accept that being "feminine" and being a whole person are irreconcilable.

Only women can give each other a new sense of self. That identity we have to develop with reference to ourselves, and not in relation to men. This consciousness is the revolutionary force from which all else will follow, for ours is an organic revolution. For this, we must be available and supportive to one another, give our commitment and our love, give the emotional support necessary to sustain this movement. Our energies must flow toward our sisters, not backwards toward our oppressors.

As long as women's liberation tries to free women without facing the basic heterosexual structure that binds us in one-to-one relationship with our own oppressors, tremendous energies will continue to flow into trying to straighten up each particular relationship with a man, how to get better sex, how to turn his head around — into trying to make the "new man" out of him, in the delusion that this will allow us to be the "new woman". This obviously splits our energies and commitments, leaving us unable to be committed to the construction of the new patterns, which will liberate us.

It is the primacy of women relating to women of women creating a new consciousness of and with each other which is at the heart of women's liberation, and the basis for the cultural revolution. Together we must find, reinforce and validate our authentic selves.

As we do this, we confirm in each other that struggling incipient sense of pride and strength, the divisive barriers begin to melt, we feel this growing solidarity with our sisters. We see ourselves as prime, find our centres inside of ourselves. We find transcending the sense of alienation, of being cut off, of being behind a locked window, of being unable to get out what we know is inside.

We feel a realness, feel at last we are coinciding with ourselves with that real self, with that consciousness, we begin a revolution to end the imposition of all coercive identifications, and to achieve a maximum autonomy in human expression.

A panel of radical lesbians will discuss this issue as part of the Interdisciplinary course "Women: Oppression and Liberation" at 7:30 pm in the Faculty of Education auditorium, Wednesday.

FULL-TIME UNDERGRADUATES

"FULL-TIME UNDERGRADUATE STUDENT" means all students registered at the University in a programme of full-time study who are not registered in the School of Graduate Studies.

CONSTITUENCY I - 2 seats

all students registered in Arts and Science.

GOROON BARNES - 1971-72 on VUSAC, Vic SAC representative. 1972-73 VUSAC President, General Committee representative. Obvious concerns this year will be the discussion of the Wright report, the library, the academic program, review of the Governing Council and student financing; in these areas and others students need representatives with experience and commitment to express and achieve their goals. A personal priority will be the practice of holding regular informal discussions with student organizations and individuals.

TOM BECKERMAN - served on Faculty Council, Committee for Social Sciences.

IAN S. GRAY - One important task facing the Board in following years will be to allocate funds for University capital and operating expenditures. Considering the present provincial government's inconsistent policy on University financing, a fact witnessed by the formula financing history, raised loan ceilings and a recent capital expenditures freeze, this task, in conjunction with autonomous university existence yet responsible attitudes with tax money will be of primary importance. I have the faith - an excellent start.

ROBIN HENRY

DAVID LAUGHTON - Physical Sciences, General and Steering Committees, Faculty Council, 1972-73 - Physics Curriculum Committee 1971 - January 1973 - Ottawa School Board Education Subcommittee, 1969-70. Hiring procedures, the review of Governing Council, the Wright report and education financing will be major issues next year. I hope that open stacks will be obtained this year, but will fight for them next year if necessary. Hiring procedures must be changed so that we not lose teachers of the quality of Stephen Salaf.

HOWARD LEVITT - The Council must use its power to make education an involving and creative experience which it is not for many students today. I support emphasizing QUALITY TEACHING parity at all levels, library system open to all students, preventing further loan cutbacks and fee-hikes, strengthening acceptability of alternative evaluation methods, University supported daycare, rent control in University area, elimination of sexism in hiring, Experience - A & S Faculty Council, Library Subcommittee, A & S Student Union, Admissions Committee (sole student).

GRETCHEN ROEDOE - From my experience on the Building Committee of the Innis College Governing Council, and involvement in a tutoring program, I am concerned about University policy re co-operation with the community. I would stress shared resources as outlined by the Wright Report on Post-Secondary Education, encourage campus-community services such as tutoring, clinics, Pollution Probe, and Day Care. Re internal policy, I feel optional athletic activities of A & S students should be credited, partially as a 6th course.

HOWARD STEIN - Although students are limited by vote, a strong united voice is necessary to express our grievances and needs. As a member of the Reform State running for the governing council, I therefore will fight for open and universal access to the stacks, will fight the cutbacks, fee hikes and the resulting erosion of educational quality, and work for a solution to the question of tenure.

Constituency II - 2 seats

all students registered in the Faculty of Dentistry, Faculty of Food Sciences, Faculty of Medicine, Faculty of Nursing, Faculty of Pharmacy, School of Hygiene, School of Physical and Health Education, Faculty of Education, Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering, Faculty of Architecture, Urban and Regional Planning and Landscape Architecture, Faculty of Forestry, Faculty of Law, Faculty of Music, Faculty of Management Studies, Faculty of Social Work. (With the proviso that both members elected in Constituency II may not be registered in the same faculty of school. In the event that a member elected while registered in one faculty or school later registers in the faculty of school in which the other elected member is registered, the transferring member shall resign his seat).

A. GOLOBERG - III Meds; Member: Governing Council, Academic Affairs, Curriculum & Standards, External Affairs Committees '72-73. It is rather difficult to discuss the Governing Council within the restrictions of a 75 word limit. Rather than attempt to do so, I will be happy to air my views on the Governing Council, university government in general and student participation therein at length to anyone interested. Call me at 789-2036.

MICHAEL NAEMSCH - Reform State: I will fight for equal and undifferentiated access of undergraduates and the community to the Roberts library. Other issues I will raise in the Governing Council include tuition fee increases, the absence of job openings for graduates, and the layoffs of workers on the campus.

RICHARD SCHABAS -

CHARLES LORNE VICKERY - Chuck Vickery is a third year student in Chemical Engineering. In the past year he has gained invaluable experience in the field of student government and university affairs as first the Communication Commissioner of the Engineering Society and then as Services Commissioner at SAC. He feels that the Governing Council like many other bodies on campus is not responsive to students. Therefore, he pledges that if elected he will act as a student governor.

GRADUATE STUDENTS

"GRADUATE STUDENT" means all students registered in the School of Graduate Studies.

Constituency I - 1 seat

all students in Division I (Humanities) of the School of Graduate Studies; Division II (Social Sciences) of the School of Graduate Studies, with the exception of the Graduate Department of Educational Theory.

PHILIP CHARLES ENROS - I am seeking election for the simple reason that I would like to be on the Governing Council. I have no grand schemes except, perhaps, the ideal of working to protect the best interests of my constituents. If elected, I would support and work for any legislation which would help to develop sanity in this University, that is, an awareness of the needs of all the members of this University and of the surrounding community.

ANTHONY (TONY) OERK LEAH - Reform State. We must change the University administration's contempt for students, faculty, campus workers and outside community. Open Stacks, stopping educational cutbacks, no layoffs will be a start. Last year, faced with the legitimate demand for undergraduate and community access to the "Robarts" Library stacks, the administration called in the police. As a result of that action Tom McLaughlin was sent to the Don Jail on February 9, 1973. This is what we are out to change.

BARRY MITCHELL - Graduate student in the department of History. A faded, but not faded, radical. A great deal of money has been invested by the community in the production of M.A.'s and Ph.D.'s. The University and graduate students have a responsibility to produce recommendations which will ensure that they are not wasted. I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that if Canadian universities are to be staffed mainly by Canadian citizens, a quota system may be necessary.

PART-TIME UNDERGRADUATES

"PART-TIME UNDERGRADUATE STUDENT" means all students registered at the University in a programme of part-time study who are not registered in the School of Graduate Studies.

CONSTITUENCY I - 2 seats

all part-time undergraduate students.

ERIC OEPOE - Reform State. This university is intent on creating an academic elite. This tendency is embodied in the new Robarts library. Forty-two million tax dollars have been invested in a library to which only faculty and graduate students will have stack access. If elected I will work for open access. The university must assume a greater role as a community resource. I will work for a greatly expanded extension faculty offering high quality courses.

ARLENE OICK - has been active in Association for Part-time Undergraduate Students since its inception five years ago, Member of four APUS Executive Committees; Presently Vice-President, APUS; Voice Editor (four years); part-time student representative on Governing Council Sub-Committee on University Extension; Active history of committee participation at departmental level - Political Economy Undergraduate Curriculum Committee; And at general university level - University-Wide Committee (New U of T Act); Faculty of Arts & Sciences, (Old Structure).

NORMA GRINDAL - My policy has always been to keep in contact with as many students as possible, and to represent their viewpoint to the best of my ability. The experience and information gained from five years with APUS, one year on Governing Council and numerous committees, gives me the qualifications necessary to represent part-time students. Our objective is equality of opportunity for all students. My aim is to continue working towards that goal.

No vote taken for report on open access

By BOB BETTSON

A controversial report by three members of the Library Subcommittee of the Governing Council recommending open access to the Roberts Library stacks for the entire university community did not come to a vote at the Subcommittee's Wednesday meeting.

A last ditch attempt was made by chief librarian Robert Blackburn and supported by several other committee members to have access granted individually by library staff on the basis of need for various periods of time.

In a letter handed to the committee before the meeting, Blackburn repeated his stand of last year that there should be differentiated access to the stacks based on academic need.

At the last meeting of the subcommittee, a report by the committee members Kathy Feldman (law), assistant librarian David Esplin and professor W.M. Dick, recommended that the stacks be open to all members of the university community on an equal basis because of the impossibility of determining a criteria for need that wasn't arbitrary.

The report was tabled at the last meeting and a decision was supposed to be made Wednesday night. However in the intervening period, opponents of unlimited access, including Blackburn, decided to make one last attempt to retain the requirement of academic need for access.

The committee had a confused hour long debate on a motion by student Brian Morgan to assign the 1589 carrel spaces in the stacks on some criteria of academic need.

The Feldman-Dick-Esplin report had claimed that this was not a problem. Dick explained that "there are full-time scholars" who will need the carrels on a day-in-day-out basis.

A rambling debate ended up with graduate dean Edward Safarian admitting he had "taken the committee on a red herring to establish the principle of a large number of assigned carrels."

The debate on the stack access report was inconclusive, the meeting adjourned before voting on the motion to accept the report moved by student members Kathy Feldman and Clarice Henschel.

Arts and Science dean Bob Greene said he had second thoughts on unlimited access and suggested a compromise of students and faculty applying for passes, which would be automatically granted.

He admitted that this sounded "absurd", but insisted "a psychological barrier" is needed to prevent "people from wondering in off the street to use the library".

Student member Brian Morgan said people would only use the library when there was a research need. "How would a psychological barrier help".

Political economy professor Sanford Lakoff supported the Blackburn letter and added that a purely psychological barrier wasn't enough to counter-act the convenience of the Roberts Library.

However Morgan stressed that undergraduates should learn how to do research. "If they are not encouraged to learn the skill of research the quality of education at this university will go down", he maintained.

Support for the student position came from newly appointed faculty member engineering professor D.S. Scott who stated that students "should be taught to utilize library facilities".

He maintained there should be no differentiation in access between a first year student and a professor.

Scott said that heavy use of the Roberts library should be encouraged. He compared the problems of misuse of books to misuse of public streets.

The case for acceptance of the report was reviewed by Feldman who concluded that there was no other fair solution to the problem of conservation of the collection.

Safarian was cautious about supporting unlimited access. "We could look silly if the facility was abused."

Blackburn said that a psychological deterrent was not enough and that it only "tested a student's initiative".

Henschel charged that all the discussion was irrelevant and that there was no reason to worry about crowding because with the same materials Sigmund Samuel was never crowded. "Why are all these measures necessary?"

"The committee members are worrying about a problem that doesn't exist," added Morgan. The committee should encourage students to use the library instead of trying to "harass" them, he said.

Greene appeared to move closer to the open stack position when he stated that people thinking over-crowding would be a problem are "living in a fantasy world". He added that nine out of 10 professors wouldn't spend much time in the stacks.

Morgan stated at the end of the three-hour debate that people must realize there are "fundamental differences of opinion" and a consensus could not be reached. He urged that the report be voted on at the next meeting, set for Monday March 5.

Court backs Acme workers claim

Fired workers of the Canadian Acme Screw and Gear company were backed by Ontario Division Court Wednesday when it upheld the Ontario Labour Relations Board decision that Canadian Acme and Canac Shock Absorbers Limited could be considered one and the same.

Canac began operations at the Acme plant a few months after Acme shut down. The Levy brothers, owners of the now defunct firm, claimed that assets of the firm had been sold.

This decision opens the way for United Automobile Workers Local 984 UAW to investigate the financial dealings that led to the firing of 510 workers. The court allowed the union to call the Levy brothers to the stand to give evidence when the Ontario Labour Relations Board hearings will resume March 15.

Justice Maurice LaCourciere, in his judgment, stated his support for the rights of unions and asked Canac lawyers if they were attempting to put "blinkers on the board."

Lawyers for Canac argued that there was no need to investigate the purported sale since the company had already given the union bargaining rights for the present workers who had been hired after Canadian Acme had shut down. Union representatives refused to accept this offer, claiming that the company was trying to buy them off at the expense of the workers.

In the continuing court battles involving Canadian Acme, Anthony Kolody, who claims to be the owner of Escel Nut and Bolt Company, another company that has appeared in the former Acme plant site, was able to obtain a temporary injunction preventing picketing of the plant by the union until Monday.

The union had picketed Excel to publicize its belief that the company had merely changed names to avoid giving the workers adequate wages, fringe benefits and seniority benefits.

"This Excel thing smells as phoney as Canac," stated UAW vice-president Dennis McDermott who considers that the Levys are behind both companies. The UAW has launched a similar suit claiming that Excel and Acme are "one and the same" and has issued a press statement supporting the workers at the Acme plant.

"When the legal roadblocks have been cleared out of the way at Canac, we will proceed with all speed to try to restore the jobs and benefits which belong to our Local 984 members at the Weston Road premises; that includes both Canac and Excel and will include any other head that appears on this Levy Bros.' hydra."

TEACHING STAFF

"TEACHING STAFF" means the employees of the University, University College, the constituent colleges and the federated universities who hold the academic rank of professor, associate professor, assistant professor, full-time lecturer or part-time lecturer unless such part-time lecturer is registered as a student. ("Lecturer" includes associated and clinical teachers in the Faculty of Medicine, and associates in the Faculty of Dentistry). In all cases a teaching staff member's constituency will be determined on the basis of his major teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school. Only in the case of a teaching staff member without a teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school, will his constituency be determined by another appointment.

CONSTITUENCY IB - 1 seat

all teaching staff members who hold their major appointments at Scarborough or Erindale Colleges.

WILLIAM JAMES HOWARD - taught at St. Michael's College from 1965 to 1969 when he accepted a position at Scarborough. He has been convener of the Editorial Problems Conference, Chairman of the Staff-Student Committee for the C.D.E. and convener of a seminar on African scholarship at the Commonwealth Conference, Mona, Jamaica. He has published on Eighteenth Century English Literature and contemporary literatures in English. Currently he is Assistant to Chairman at Scarborough.

GARY ROSS THALER - was born and raised in Kitchener, Ontario, and has degrees from McMaster and the U. of T. He joined the Botany Dept. at Erindale in 1967, and has served on the U of T Senate, "The Varsity" Board of Directors, and a wide variety of College committees. He is currently on the College Council's Executive Committee; Chairman of the Erindale Joint Biology Curriculum Committee; and Erindale representative on the Council of the U. of T. Faculty Association.

CONSTITUENCY IC - 1 seat

Combined Departments of English 1969-70; member of the Council of the Combined Departments of English 1970-71. Undergraduate Secretary of the Department of English, University College, since 1969. Associate Editor of Modern Drama.

CONSTITUENCY III - 1 seat to be filled in this election.

all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Medicine

EARL V. DUNN - Current Reviews and revisions of Ontario health care delivery will have considerable impact on the Faculty of Medicine in both clinical and basic science areas. The Governing Council must receive the Faculty's views of increased student enrollment and the health care implications of budget restrictions. Good education of new physicians depends on maintaining excellent standards on clinical care, as well as teaching in an atmosphere of research and inquiry in basic and applied medical science.

JOHN COLEMAN LAIDLAW - graduated in Medicine in 1944 from the University of Toronto. M.A. (Biochemistry), University of Toronto, 1947. Ph.D. (Biochemistry), University of London, 1950. Member, President's Council 1965-69. Member, Ontario Council of Health 1971.

ADMINISTRATIVE STAFF

"ADMINISTRATIVE STAFF" means the employees of the University, University College, the constituent colleges and the federated universities who are not members of the teaching staff thereof.

CONSTITUENCY I - 1 vacant seat

all administrative staff members.

EDWARD E.C. BEAVEN - Aged 50; born in England, where learned trade as a printer; employed for last sixteen years at the University Press. Served in R.A.F. from 1941 to 1946. President of the University of Toronto Employees' Credit Union and director for the past eight years. Keenly interested in labour-management relations and union affairs. Believes that hourly-paid employees, tradesmen, and lower echelon of the administrative staff should have a voice in the affairs of the university.

GWEN RUSSELL - Joined U. of T. staff, Jan. 1958. First President University of Toronto Staff Assoc. Member of University Wide Committee, staff representative on U.W.C. sub-committee. Member of Governing Council, Servico on Business Affairs and External Affairs Committees. True integration into the University community depends on responsible, unbiased Governing Council representation. Effective two-way communication is the key to employees sensitivity and concern. As a member of Governing Council I have attempted to achieve both of these ideals.

When one questions the state's right to execute a human being, he really asks, "Does one person have the right to kill another?"

Once again, Canadians are debating that question as Parliament considers a government proposal to extend the ban on the death penalty for all killings except those of police and prison guards.

As when the ban was first introduced five years ago, retentionists are arguing vehemently in favour of its repeal.

U of T criminology student Dahn Batchelor, who spent several years in Canadian prisons in a supervisory capacity as a group counsellor and 15 months as an inmate, discusses the death penalty and its alternatives in the following article.

By DAHN BATCHELOR
edited by Obiter Dicta and The Varsity from the International Review

When one questions the state's right to execute a human being, he really asks, 'Does one man have the right to kill another?'

Obviously, there are times when man finds himself in such situations that the act of homicide is inadvertent. In times of armed conflict, soldiers learn the basic premise of war: 'Kill or be killed.' Some, therefore, argue that a soldier, if not in defence of his country, certainly in defence of his own life, is justified in killing a fellow human being.

It is accepted by many in our society that a man may kill another who through some act of violence, is placing his family in danger. Similarly, if a man is in danger of being killed, he may use whatever steps he feels are necessary to save his own life. If killing his assailant is the only way, then homicide is considered justified. Naturally the law places the onus of proving just cause on the man who used homicide as a means of saving his own life.

The law of most countries states that a person in fear of his life during an attack may resort to homicide. It does not, however, say that a person may resort to such extreme measures just to protect himself from a bloody nose. In other words, there are many physical dangers that may face a person short of being killed by an assailant.

If a man were in danger of physical mutilation, and found himself in possession of a knife, he would be legally justified in stabbing his assailant even though he would be aware that such a stabbing could bring about the death of his assailant. However, the man who stabbed his assailant must show that he really was in such danger. The threat of mutilation would not justify homicide. Only the fact that the assailant was actually making the attempt would be acceptable in proving justifiable homicide.

These examples are used to point out occasions where a case could be made for killing fellow human beings. Unfortunately, man since primitive times has also killed for reasons other than justifiable ones. Greed, vengeance, love, envy, lust, and power are just a few of the many reasons why men have killed each other. None of these reasons are legally or socially justifiable in Western society. It is these types of homicide that concern the state when considering the death penalty. These crimes are clearly culpable homicides.

Moreover, almost universally in the eyes of the law, crimes committed that result even inadvertently in the death of a fellow human being are considered culpable homicide. A person who rapes a woman and accidentally kills her is guilty of culpable homicide; a person who robs an old store-keeper who subsequently dies of a heart attack is similarly guilty.

There are three more types of homicide which, although equally against the law in most states, are to some extent socially justifiable.

The first type is voluntary euthanasia. Who could not sympathize with a person who killed a loved one because of the physical pain that loved one was enduring? The reference here is to terminal illnesses, where all hope is lost and the only release from pain is death.

Another type of homicide which is to some degree justifiable concerns a man who is threatened with death by another. There are cases where people have threatened others with death and have actually made attempts at it. A person who has survived such attempts may come to the conclusion that the state graphic reprinted from obiter dicta cannot satisfactorily protect him or his family. On reaching that conclusion, he may, in order to protect himself and his family, hunt down the prospective killer and kill him instead. What jury would not feel compassion for a man who says he would rather be in prison than be dead?

Finally there is the third type of "justifiable" homicide, highly questionable, involving vengeance.

If a man were brutally tortured by another for purposes of extracting information, he might want to kill his tormentor. A man who has been physically maimed (castrated, dismembered, blinded) would probably be emotionally justified in the eyes of a jury in killing his assailant. Although the jury would find him guilty of murder, they would in all probability recommend mercy. They might even find him innocent on the grounds of 'extenuating circumstances'.

People cringe at the idea of one man alone being the executioner of another. They say, 'Let the law do justice' and 'Don't take the law into your own hands'. But, the man who realizes that the law is not able to do justice may do it himself. There is a famous illustration of this reasoning, from the U.S.

On September 3, 1969 in Beverly Hills, California, a truck driver named Lou Watts was driving a truck with a revoked licence. He accidentally struck and killed a 10-year-old boy, Ethan Friedman. The truck driver was charged only with driving with a revoked licence. The father of the dead child, who did not feel that justice had been done, hunted down the truck driver and eight months later, slew him. Eugene Friedman was convicted of voluntary manslaughter and was sentenced to three years probation. He appealed and on October 12, 1970, a judge set aside the conviction. As a crowning climax to what must be one of the most unusual cases in the annals of jurisprudence, on November 2, 1971, a Supreme Court jury awarded the father $125,000 in damages for the death of his son.

Finally, there are other types of homicides in which the verdict is certain to be one of acquittal, such as cases where the accused is deemed not guilty by reason of insanity, temporary or otherwise.

In a recent Gallop poll, four per cent of those polled stated that they didn't feel that the taxpayers should have to support convicted murderers in prison for the rest of their lives.

In 1970, there were 7,641,731 taxpayers in Canada. The average taxpayer paid $790 in federal taxes that year.

The cost of caring for all prisoners in the federal penitentiaries was $51,900,000.

In 1970, there were 7,108 inmates in penitentiaries.

The annual cost of keeping a man in prison in 1970 was over $7,300.

The average taxpayer had $6.79 of his taxes used for the support of federal inmates.

The cost paid out by each taxpayer in 1970 towards the support of each inmate was one-tenth of one cent.

The cost of keeping one murderer 50 years in prison would be about $365,000 plus inflationary costs.

If a murderer is sentenced to natural life in prison and serves 50 years, each taxpayer will pay only five cents towards the entire support of the becomes legal inmate. The death penalty is generally invoked for homicides which are premeditated and wilfully committed by sane persons for such reasons as jealousy and ambition.

As for whether the penalty is just, the state normally abides by public opinion. In Canada, the consensus of the public seems to favour restoration of the death penalty. A Gallop poll recently showed that 63 per cent of Canadians interviewed were in favour of reinstating the death penalty. It may be assumed that those in favour of the death penalty feel that convicted murderers are not fit to live in our society and, rather than imprisonment with its care and menace, better, they say, to kill them and be done with it.

Further, some people may take the law into their own hands if they think that the state will not. If a man knows his wife's murderer will serve only seven years in prison for the crime, he may be inclined, and understandably so, to execute the murderer himself and serve the seven years in place of his wife's killer.

Depending on their involvement, the public looks on the execution of a killer differently. Those close to the victim, or sympathetic to the victim, probably look at the death penalty as a means of exacting vengeance. The social workers, police officers, judges and others playing the official role, may look upon the execution of a killer as a deterrent.

The retentionists argue that the death penalty is a deterrent. When imposed, it prevents any repetition of the offence by the executed murderer. On this point, there can be no argument. It is the one and only real deterrent.

But, the question that continually arises in the public mind is, 'Does the death penalty deter others from committing murder?'

'A' is hanged so that 'B' will be deterred from murdering 'C'. Unfortunately, what most retentionists forget is that 'A' was once 'B' and probably didn't consider the consequences when he murdered 'C'.

It is an accepted fact that there are murderers whom it is quite impossible to deter, who cannot be prevented from committing murder by either the threat of death or imprisonment. It is murderers of this type who are guilty of deliberate, premeditated killings of the most brutal sort; and killers of this type are most often put to death.

Murderers of this type are generally legally sane and such persons, if released from prison, are apt to commit more murders. The professional gunman and the political assassin are two in this classification. Another type of person who is usually unrepentant is the "anti-social" individual who has a history of aggravated assaults. It is of considerable interest to criminologists that in many such cases, the murderer has himself often been the victim of beatings.

For these types of murderers, the public execution of another seems to have no force as a deterrent. One more type apparently unmoved by the death penalty is the person who commits a murder of passion. In such cases, it would not be certain that the death penalty would act as a satisfactory deterrent.

Proof of the failure of the death penalty as a deterrent came during the reign of King Henry VIII of England. During his reign, 72,000 thieves went to the gallows, yet there are no contemporary records showing that there was any reduction in crime. When pickpockets, be they adults or children, were publicly hanged as a deterrent, there could be no doubt in the public mind that the penalty for pickpockets was death. And, when they thronged about the gallows to see the hangings, the pickpockets in the crowd did a thriving business. Later, however, in 18th century Britain, highwaymen were hanged and then left to decompose on the gibbet. It is the contention of some that this had the effect of deterring highwaymen and of changing U.K. attitudes towards crimes of violence.

More recently, in Chicago, a study was made which showed that the police and citizens of that city killed 1,993 criminals from the year 1923 to 1954, and that in that period of time only 81 were executed. The social conditions of the time may, however, have driven pickpockets to steal, since the alternatives probably were death by hanging or slower death by starvation. Further, it may be that the real modifying factor in the 18th century was the improvement of economic conditions rather than the deterring decomposition of the body in public.

Similarly, the social pressures on the 20th century ghettos may also have "necessitated" many of the crimes of violence. If the risk of death during a criminal act doesn't deter, executions afterwards won't either.

It has been suggested for years that when a murderer is executed, other persons go out and commit like crimes. When the mass killer Tropmann was publicly guillotined in Paris in 1879, several similar cases of wholesale slaughter occurred shortly thereafter.

During the last century, an Ohio man was executed for the brutal slaying of his wife. On the day of his execution, another man living near the prison killed his own wife in the same manner. These are two cases of a phenomenon sometimes related to executions. They show that capital punishment not only does not deter, but also can bring about the death of someone who was in no way involved with the first murder.

One of the greatest arguments against capital punishment is the danger of executing an innocent person. No miscarriage of justice is more terrible to contemplate. The execution of the innocent generally results from three types of testimony. The first is circumstantial. It is impossible to dispense with circumstantial evidence. If such evidence was not permitted to be heard in a court of law, criminals could laugh at the laws, because a legally sane person rarely commits murder in front of witnesses.

Nevertheless, it is very dangerous to convict on circumstantial evidence. A number of years ago, a man was accused of murdering his mother. There were strands of hair of a certain type in her hand. Each hair follicle was partly white and partly black. This, the result of a rare disease, was common only to the victim and the accused. However, it was discovered that another man in the neighbourhood also suffered from that rare disease. Further investigation proved the second man was guilty of the murder. The basic flaw with all evidence of the type called 'circumstantial' is that one cannot, however long or carefully one considers it, be sure of its veracity.

There is also the problem of convicting innocent persons on the testimony of eye witnesses. There are three types of witnesses: those who relate what they actually saw, those who relate what they think they saw, and those who relate something other than what they saw. There are many cases where innocent persons have been executed on the evidence of the latter two types of witnesses.

This brings up the danger of trying capital cases before a jury. It is a well-known fact that the average jurymen has no real idea of how to interpret evidence, real or fancied. Nearly every juror finds his position one of confusion and indecision. As the trial proceeds, he hears the evidence of eye witnesses, expert witnesses and psychiatrists, all in worlds of their own. In this confused state he finally decides, after listening to the oration of the prosecuting counsel, the guilt of the accused, a decision which, by the time the defence has reached his artful conclusion, is reversed. Finally, the judge's solemn and impartial summing up leaves him hopelessly bewildered.

There have unfortunately been capital cases before juries which have convicted the accused purely on sentimental grounds. A classic case of this type took place in Alabama in the 1930's. A young Negro, Roosevelt Wilson, was charged with the rape of a white girl. It was a foregone conclusion that he would be convicted, for the jury was not only white but were neighbours of the victim. When the Negro testified that the woman had encouraged him it only enraged the jury more. Members of the jury admitted that they believed the accused, but reminded a reporter that it was they who had to live in the community after the trial. The judge also admitted that he knew the Negro was innocent when he sentenced him to death. Even the governor of the state felt the same but he said that governors don't get re-elected freeing Negroes who have sexual relations with white women. The men was electrocuted at Alabama's Kilby Prison.

On another occasion several years ago, two citizens, one of New York and one of Massachusetts, were charged in their respective states with the same murder. It was established at both trials one held in each state, that only one person committed the murder. The New York jury found beyond reasonable doubt that their man was guilty and the jury in Massachusetts came to the same conclusion. Both men were convicted on the same evidence.

There have also been recorded instances of innocent persons being executed for the murder of 'victims' who appeared alive and well after the shooting, decapitation, garotting, electrocution and gassing.

Shooting has been a popular method of execution since firearms were first introduced. Today, the firing squad is used mainly for military offences and treason.

It is generally considered to be a painless death although there are instances where poor marksmen have inadvertently caused intense suffering by failing to cause instant death.

Hanging remains the most common method in use today.

It was the traditional method in the United Kingdom and throughout the Commonwealth. Although found in the United States, it is steadily executions.

There have been cases where persons have been convicted and executed purely on the evidence of their alleged confession. I remember working on the Chambers case as an investigator for Ontario Legal Aid. This man was hanged for the murder of a little girl whose body was never found. He claimed that he was tortured by the police into confessing to a crime of which he was innocent. Evidence was uncovered which showed that his lawyer was legally insane at the time of Chambers' trial.

The civilized world has resorted to six methods of executing condemned prisoners: hanging, losing ground. Only six states still have it on their books. Death by hanging has been traditionally used in Canada, (with the exception of the past five years), but the Attorney-General or the Governor-General may substitute for it execution by firing squad in cases of treason or subversion. Hanging is used in 28 other countries throughout the world.

In the earliest forms of hanging the criminal was suspended from the limb of a tree. The condemned man climbed a ladder and was pushed or jumped off. Death resulted from strangulation. The victim would ask his friends to come to his execution to pull his legs, thereby hastening death. It wasn't until the nineteenth century that the 'long drop' came into use.

This modern method consists of the dislocation of the spinal column which causes rupture of the spinal cord. This is normally the actual cause of death. But, sometimes death is caused by the internal rupturing of the jugular vein. If the rupture of the spinal cord doesn't bring about instantaneous death, the rupture of the jugular vein will. Strangulation is the third effect.

Decapitation is probably the messiest form of execution.

The old method of decapitation employed a large sword or axe. This, however, created problems. The major one was that the head was not always severed on the first blow.

It is believed that the town of Halifax, England was the first place to use a mechanical means of beheading felons. There are records of it being used in the sixteenth century. In a remote way, it resembled the guillotines used in France.

Dr. Guillotine, who was not the inventor of the guillotine, advocated its use because he claimed that hanging was more cruel and beheading by the axe more messy. By the twentieth century, very few countries used the guillotine; after the World War II, West Germany was the only country outside France that used it. Now, only France has the guillotine.

There is some evidence that severing the head does not bring about instant death. Some time ago in France, permission was granted to several surgeons to conduct studies and experiments on the bodies and heads of victims of the guillotine. It is a known fact that the brain does continue to function even when the heart stops beating for at least eight to nine minutes, on a diminishing basis. If the studies conducted at the site of the guillotine are conclusive, it means that the severance of the spinal cord does not necessarily bring about instantaneous death as was generally believed.

In the past, very few countries used garotting to execute prisoners; those that did were of Spanish origin. Today, Spain is the only country that uses the garotte. Garotting is another method of strangling the victim. In its simplest and most primitive form, the garotte consisted of a strong cord running through one of two holes in a post, passing in front of the victim's neck and through a second hole, death being effected by slow strangulation as the cords were drawn backwards.

An improvement on this primitive method was the use of a metal collar attached to the back of a chair in which the condemned man was bound. The collar which fitted loosely around the neck was tightened by a lever. A later modification of this form of garotting was the introduction of a metal spike attached to the back of the collar. When the lever is pulled down, the spike enters between two of the vertebrae and severs the spinal cord. Recently an improvement was added which provides for a double collar which brings about instantaneous death, or so it is claimed.

The first man legally executed by electricity, a man named Kemmler, was executed in the U.S. on August 6, 1890. It was an incompetent job and the man didn't die immediately. No fewer than 21 states in the U.S. use the electric chair. No other country now uses it.

The most recent method of inflicting the death penalty places the condemned prisoner in a sealed chamber and fills it with cyanide gas. Eight states have used this method in the past.

There is some controversy as to whether this method is truly as painless as claimed.

There have always been alternatives to the death penalty, although only recently have they been extensively used.

In many countries that have abolished the death penalty, natural life has become the alternative. By life imprisonment, I am referring to natural life. It has been said that capital punishment in a humane and painless manner is by far less cruel than spending one's natural life in prison. Perhaps this opinion was best expressed by Dennis Nell Lawrence, a convicted murderer in Australia, who had his sentence of death for the killing of an opal dealer in a robbery attempt commuted to life imprisonment. He said, "I regard the sentence of life imprisonment a less merciful and less compassionate sentence than the sentence of death." Under state law in South Australia, a life sentence is generally 20 years, but, with remission, can be reduced to 12 years or less.

The questions that disturb many judges in determining natural life as a supreme sentence are: Is this sentence to be given to protect society, punish the murderer, or act as a deterrent?

If our society is going to lock certain individuals up for the rest of their lives, there should be varying degrees of imprisonment. If there is no hope of changing a murderer's attitudes and he will be a continual menace to society, a maximum security institution is the answer. The offender who does show that he can be trusted within the prison setting, should be moved to a medium security institution.

No matter how heinous the crime, no matter how strong the desire to execute and remove permanently the offender, our society must find alternatives. One alternative can mean the placing of the offender in a prison for the rest of his natural life.

Girls become prostitutes, charges activist

By ELEANOR COLEMAN

Young girls brought to Canada from Haiti by the Haitian consul supposedly for legitimate employment have been forced through threats of violence to their families to become prostitutes, a Haitian activist charged Friday.

Philippe Filsaime of the Haitian Patriotic Action Committee gave examples of racism both in Canada and Haiti at a plenary session of the Students for a Democratic Society weekend teach-in on racism.

He stated that Haitian immigrants work for 12 to 14 hours daily for salaries below the minimum wage, because bosses neglect to tell them of their rights.

Filsaime also mentioned cases of discrimination in housing, and the plight of those who have entered illegally, and hide from authorities, 15 people often sharing a small apartment.

His main aim, he said, is to mobilize Haitians in Canada to contribute to the liberation of Haiti. He emphasized, however, "While we are here, we will fight for every right we are entitled to."

The Haitian government apparently encourages emigration to Canada, urging that "once you get there everything will be all right," Filsaime claimed. Last week, though, five Haitians were deported because their government had issued them all the same passport number, he said.

Haitians come to Canada because they believe they have the right to speak freely, hold meetings and hope to live and work more comfortably, according to Filsaime.

After 1960 there was a heavy immigration of Haitian professionals, and by 1968 there was an influx of Haitians from all parts of society. The immigration laws became increasingly stringent, however, and by 1969 Haitians were receiving a reception, which, in his words, was "not a compliment to a country that calls itself democratic..."

Many political refugees were deported to Haiti, and Filsaime was certain that they were killed upon their return.

He also gave a historical background of sufferings by Haitians in their own countries, describing them as a result of "white racist ideologies".

He described how foreign "war lords" from France, Germany and Italy descended on Haiti after the turn of the century, only to be succeeded by American troops who drove the peasants off their own land. When a peasant revolt ensued, Americans killed 300,000 Haitians to quash it.

Filsaime described the political repression in the regime since 1957 which has spurred immigration to Canada.

"When you live 15 years in a country like Haiti, you look on every man in uniform as an authority. . . He has the right to whip you. He has the right to shoot you."

The activist added that his sister had been terrified at the sight of a Brinks security guard.

Cites humorous examples to prove case

Racism used to control masses, says prof

By ELEANOR COLEMAN
Racism is not prejudice, but a tool of ideology for controlling the masses, University of Wisconsin associate black literature professor Finlay Campbell said Friday.

Speaking to a plenary session of the Students for a Democratic Society, Campbell claimed racism defines a group as being a separate race, and then creates its own system of justification of superiority be it religious, genetic, or environmental.

Citing humorous examples, Campbell explained "what racism isn't".

He said that it had nothing to do with psychological fear of a different race or the obsessive-compulsive desire to persecute. "Racism isn't about liking or disliking, but about controlling..."

Thus, he classed television chaacter Archie Bunker not as a racist, but simply as a bigot.

He likewise rejected the theory that racism is a result of ignorance and superstition. He described the prejudiced white masses of America as much as a victim to racist plots as the minorities they persecute.

Campbell's examples of racist actions were specific. He mentioned the American Constitutional Convention of 1787 where a black person was defined as three-fifths of a man, and an investigation carried out by John C. Calhoun which claimed to prove that one in eight blacks were mentally defective.

Both were deliberate moves to justify a system of economic exploitation whereby blacks remained segregated as a ready labour force, he charged. Similar theories existed in Europe during the rise of modern imperialism.

He also explained how the colour question was used to destroy the populist movement among American farmers in the 1890's.

Campbell reminded the audience of under 50 that the chief role of the black person in American society has been that of the worker, and not "to sing spirituals." Kept in ghettos, "storage areas for reserve labour," they are only considered a problem when they rebel against this situation.

After the riots of the 60's, the Kerner Report concluded that "the cause of black problem is white racism." This conclusion by a federal judge offered no hope, Campbell stated, since, as a Black Panther expressed it to him, "When everyone is guilty, no one is guilty."

He thus defined racism as an ideology which "automatically feeds into imperialism... the final smokescreen of that system that has ruined the earth."

Saturday's plenary session dealt with the same issues as Friday's, with Toronto civil rights lawyer Charles Roach protesting what he called racist Canadian immigration policies.

He stressed that racism as a single problem could be a phoney issue and that the real issue is "the distribution of the world's resources to the world's peoples."

He said that one way of detecting racism was to look in a country's jails. About 65 per cent of the prisoners found in Regina and Prince Albert jails are Metis and Indian, he said.

He mentioned that increased power given to police after the October 1970 crisis and in Toronto recently were effective weapons of the racist ideology. He concluded with an attack on the economic system, saying "I am a believer in the perfectibility of mankind."

International SDS Secretary Marti Reife gave examples of racist policies supported by American universities as well as the government. She called racist professors the "IQ Klux Klan." The race issue, she said, was being used to divide workers so that such measures could be put into effect with minimal opposition.

Following the speeches, several resolutions were proposed, most of which had originated in the morning workshops. One demanded that U of T fire medicine professor Ian Hector for teaching allegedly racist theories about Italians which would affect their eligibility for workmen's compensation.

SDS claims to have in its possession a letter from Hector in regard to Workmen's Compensation slating that Italians are "culturally predisposed to feigning injury." The resolution also called for the psychiatrist to be fired from Wellesley Hospital and from medical practice altogether.

Another resolution proposed sending a telegram to Israeli prime minister Golda Meir protesting Israeli aggression and in particular the alleged political frame-up of Dan Vared, who has been accused of being a spy by Israel.

Another telegram was to be sent to express sympathy with students of the Université de Québec à Montréal who have been boycotting classes recently in protest against an administrative decision to demand fees in a single instalment at the beginning of the year.

U of T grad student runs for CP in St. George by-election

U of T graduate student Brian Mossop has been nominated to run in the March 15 St. George by-election under the Communist Party label.

Mossop, also a teaching assistant involved in organizing the U of T Graduate Assistants Association, feels the main issue in the election is the Ontario government's cutbacks in social services, and notably in health and education.

A press release issued by the Communist Party criticizes a $24 million cutback in the Metro School Board by the province and tuition fee rises in post-secondary educational institutions.

The release also attacks cuts in active hospital treatment beds, "precisely when a surge forward in health services is necessary", and denial of right to strike by hospital workers.

Increased taxation of corporations is the party's main solution to these problems.

Mossop faces strong competition from all three major parties in the struggle for the seat held by Allan Lawrence. Lawrence resigned when he successfully ran for Parliament last fall.

Roy McMurtry, a close friend of Davis and influential Conservative Party man, was nominated by the PC's a week ago yesterday, the same day former Toronto controller and mayoralty candidate Margaret Campbell was nominated by the Liberals. Campbell resigned her family court judgeship to fight what she has described as the distant, from the common person — Tory government.

Ontario NDP leader Stephen Lewis' administrative assistant Ellen Adams, a leading figure in the confederation of Residents and Ratepayers Associations, is carrying the NDP banner.

The riding, bounded by Avenue Road, Queen's Park and University Avenues on the west, the lakefront on the south, Parliament Street on the east and Bloor Street on the north (with a sizeable chunk tacked on to the north west side) contains large numbers of students.

There are nearly 2,000 students living in Victoria and St. Michael's Colleges and the Married Students Residences; who could swing a close race. About 30,000 people voted in October 1971; Lawrence won easily with 16,916 votes to the Liberal's 7,424 and 5,801 for the NDP candidate.

However, with three strong candidates and no chance of the government falling, the race is expected to be much closer than in the last election.

Qualified persons not on the voters lists can be enumerated between March 3 and 8 by phoning 363-3458 or visiting the returning office at 77 Richmond Street East.

U of T prof, women discuss male sex roles

"What business do I have talking about male roles and male sexuality? After all, women have been critical of men talking about female sexuality — and that's a fair criticism", said U of T assistant philosophy professor Lorenne Clark, introducing her lecture on Male Roles and Male Sexuality.

The lecture was presented as part of the Women's Studies lecture series sponsored by the Interdisciplinary Studies course on "Women Oppression and Liberation," at the Faculty of Education auditorium.

Clark explained that the topic arose out of trying to analyse and assess the problems of women's liberation and people's liberation in the context of people trying to live a liberated life style. Problems involved in this are not only psychological but political as well, she said.

"This is an attempt to stimulate discussion among men about themselves. Men and women have been discussing female roles and female sexuality and we (women) are prepared to be very critical about what our roles have done to us crippled us. However men are not engaging in enough of this kind of discussion."

Clark said she hoped that "men will be stimulated enough to be critical of their roles and the kinds of reactions they have to women, especially women who are in any sense conscious of themselves as liberated women."

Clark discussed the situation in which there is an imbalance of sexual desire.

"What does that reflect? What are the problems of the liberated women trying to come to grips with herself as a woman, perhaps her immediate response is 'well, it's that old male chauvinist stuff about men initiating the sexual act or response'."

"In explaining the female role, questions arise such as in what way is the male role complementary? 'Why was the female role of passivity able to develop?'"

Given men's behaviour that is observed by all, there exists a mental set of attitudes that men must have. Clark presented from a female point of view an imaginary reconstruction of a certain attitude that leads to a certain kind of behaviour on the part of males, in other words, what is going on "when you are dealing with a guy who you suspect to be a classic male chauvinist pig."

In the early stages of most relationships, physical sexual contact is emphasized Clark explained, but after a while sex on the part of the man becomes a kind of hangover rather than an expression of love.

"Because of social conditioning women regard physical sex as an expression of love and they need it both for the love and the sex, so they wait and hope."

"It also seems that most men do perceive a woman's sexual passion as an expression of love for them", and at the same time "most men fear being regarded as sex objects by their women". This Clark concludes, "makes it extremely difficult for a woman to be frank with a man whom she finds to be something less than spectacular from the point of view of her own sexual satisfaction."

Both male and female self-destructive roles have to be challenged in order to achieve a level of "people liberation," she said. In answering questions about changing the position of men and women Clark assumed a change of both internal and external situation was necessary.

"It is important to recognize that societal roles enforce the roles that lead to this problem," Clark maintained.

"Society forces men into jobs and careers that necessarily cut them off from their sexuality and productive personal relations with women and children. Similarly for women their passive and dependent role has cut them off from having anything other than children and men as the source of their gratification and identity."

Key speakers absent from debate

By JOHN CAMPBELL

A conference held to discuss what contribution the church can make toward a reconciliation of the French-English division in Canada, got off to a faltering start on Friday when key speakers Parti québécois chief economist Jacques Parizeau and Le Devoir editor Claude Ryan failed to appear. Both were attending a PQ convention in Laval, planned several months in advance.

The absence of the Québec spokesmen apparently caught the conference organizers and the others speakers unprepared. Reverend Ben Smillie of St. Andrews College, Saskatoon, prefaced his remarks by saying he had written his speech in "about 10 minutes."

Called upon to present "a solidly western viewpoint of the French fact in Canada", Smillie criticized everything from railway prices between Regina and Vancouver to the War Measures Act. He would only be satisfied with an independent Quebec he stated, "if (Québec) overcomes its anti-socialist tendencies."

"Short-notice" replacement Maurice Vallières of the Nationalist Mouvement nationales des Québécois, the renamed St. Jean Baptiste Society, said that he had been told the title of the conference but that was all he could find out about it before his arrival.

At one point, Vallières explained in detail how a train porter in Montréal provoked his nationalist feelings by speaking to him in English instead of French.

Ontario social development minister Robert Welch, first to address the gathering, stressed the need for a better appreciation of the religious forces that draw people together.

"The Holy Spirit," he said, "is the unifying force in secular and religious affairs."

Laval University sociology professor Raymond Lemieux completed Friday's speech-making with a complicated account of three different "languages" the church could use in its approach to political problems. The first of these, he said, would be that of an uninvolved observer of the social scene, the second, of an organization with specified interests in various social institutions such as education and finally that of a source of theological teachings which is concerned only with universal values.

"The church cannot be silent," he declared, "It must testify to something — the values of justice, fraternity, and reconciliation."

Konzack offers karate demonstration at Benson

A campus karate and self-defence demonstration at the Benson Building this Saturday proved once again that you never know what your body can do until you put your mind to it.

Black-belt instructor Burt Konzack of the Toronto Academy of Karate phrased it another way in opening the demonstration. He pointed out that the aim of karate is to unite body and mind in harmonious action, and then set out to show exactly how.

The class, a women's self-defence program sponsored by the Benson Building's Department of Women's Athletics and led by Konzack, held an open session in which students practiced self-defence techniques, sparring and kata.

Kata is a series of manoeuvres combining grace and power, analogous, if there is an analogy, to a gymnast's routine. Individual students of different ranks performed beginner's and advanced katas to show the various levels of skill.

Then Konzack staged a number of displays which, though outwardly spectacular, inwardly said much about karate. One was the execution of a slow deep-breathing kata, called Sanchin, during which a student broke heavy planks over Konzack's bare arms and body. (Konzack had circulated the boards immediately prior to the demonstration; they were knotted and had a grain similar to marble cake.)

The second demonstration saw Konzack supporting himself between two chairs with cinderblocks on his stomach which an assistant smashed with a sledgehammer.

The Toronto Academy of Karate grew out of the women's self-defence class, a program that Konzack offered when he was approached by a group of women students two years ago. Today he's assisted in the instruction by some of the women who originally requested the course.

The senior student, Francoise Lemieux, a brown belt, is also a doctoral student in sociology. Another woman student is beginning a class in women's self-defence in April at the Scarborough YMCA under Konzack's supervision.

When non-university people asked to enter the class, Konzack set up a separate program at Clinton Street Public School, also offering Washin-Ryu Karate-Do, the style of karate presided over by Konzack's master, Sensei Hidehiko Ochiai. Only some of Konzack's students come for the physical conditioning; others come for the mental discipline that Konzack stresses.

No decision on interdisc courses

By BOB BETTSON

The Academic Standards Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science split Friday on a move for reconsideration of their earlier refusal to approve four interdisciplinary courses.

No decision was reached because of adjournment but not before an argument arose over the overlap of courses and how to deal with it.

A sub-committee of the General Committee is now looking at the problem of overlap, particularly with other faculties.

The Social Science Curriculum Committee had recommended refusing approval for four courses, three criminology and one physical education, earlier passed by the Interdisciplinary Studies Curriculum Committee, on the grounds that they duplicated offerings in the sociology department.

Interdisciplinary Studies sent two of the courses back for reconsideration and no decision was reached.

Innis principal Peter Russell lashed out at the earlier decision, charging "I don't think this committee knows enough about these courses and we have inadequate information to discuss the pros and cons".

A motion for reconsideration of approval for the courses was passed which will be discussed at the next meeting.

The committee, which has always previously met in closed session, has been the focus of student criticism for several years. It has no student members and its meeting are secret.

Dean Bob Greene said at the beginning of the meeting that he was not aware of any previous observers students or press attending the meeting; but since this was a meeting of a committee of the Faculty of Arts Science Council, and these are generally open, then he could see no reason why a Varsity reporter should not stay.

There were no objections from the approximately 30 member body. The committee has met in closed session a number of times each year to approve curriculum changes, marking and examination policy and anything relating to the "academic standards" of the faculty.

Its membership is composed of chairman of the 26 arts and science departments or their alternates, as well as a number of top administrators. Greene is chairman.

The committee also split on the meaning of an earlier decision not to list Erindale courses in the St. George campus calendar.

Erindale dean Peter Robinson charged the committee "doesn't understand the problems of Erindale. It is not in a position to understand all the issues involved."

Robinson demanded that the college's courses be listed and that the committee interpret an earlier decision not to list Erindale life sciences courses as only applying to those subjects.

The committee was deadlocked on the subject and a move by an English department representative to exempt the English department from the decision was defeated 11-7.

He argued that the earlier decision should not apply to the other divisions in arts and science; physical sciences, social sciences, interdisciplinary studies and humanities.

A subsequent motion to reconsider the general question later and decide before the 1974-75 calendar passed 11-5.

Political Economy undergraduate secretary Peter Silcox, a member of the editorial board of the calendar, defended the earlier decision and said that the editorial board had decided to interpret the decision to mean no Erindale course could be listed in the downtown calendar.

The committee also approved a request for pass-fail grading for a course in city politics headed by geography professor Jim Lemon.

Professors J.M. Daniels and D.J. Conacher (Classics) objected to a statement by the interdisciplinary representative that students were being marked on their effort because success in community organizing was hard to quantify.

Daniels claimed "it is a dangerous precedent for a student to be marked on his effort rather than his success."

Dean James Cruise said that most students preferred conventional grading, according to a survey completed by the New Program Review Committee, which was reflected in few students choosing pass-fail grading when given the opportunity to get a mark.

Swim Blues win lopsided victory

By ANNE LLOYD

University of Toronto Blues swept to their 13th OUAA (OQUAA) swimming title Friday and Saturday at Waterloo, scoring 507 points to Waterloo's 327 and Western's 303.

Blues were apparently not weakened by the retirement of such past outstanding performers as Ross Ballantyne, Alex Fedko, Mike Guinness, and Jim Shaw.

Returning to the University of Waterloo, site of their 1971 CIAU triumph, Blues seemed a little weak in the individual medley events (with a second in the 200 by rookie Dave Wilkin and a third in the 400 by newcomer Shawn Laari the best showings), and weaker still in the backstroke, where they had to settle for a fourth from Russ Farquhar in the 200 and a fifth from veteran John Twobig in the 100.

Toronto more than compensated for this 'f frailty' by completely dominating the freestyle events. Only Ottawa's John Duncan managed to break the Blues' stranglehold, and he needed a record-breaking performance to upset Jim Adams in the 200 free.

Adams, in one of the meet's outstanding performances, set new OUAA records winning both the 50 and 100 yard freestyle events. Adams' time of 21.7 in the heats of the 50 free was good enough to set a new Canadian native record for the event. Adams, along with Bob Peeling, Wilkin and Twobig, was also a member of the winning 400 yard freestyle relay team.

In the 1650 freestyle, Toronto's Shawn Laari, John Sebben and Dave Chutter made it a 1-2-3 sweep, with another Blue's swimmer, Dave Schappert, sixth.

Sebben, an outstanding and versatile rookie, also placed second in the 500 free and the 200 breast, while coach Robin Campbell gave "Rookie of the Meet" honours to Dave Chutter.

Chutter finished fifth in the 200 free, third in the 1650 free and then swam a fine race to take the 500 free. Along with John Peters, Sebben, Laari and Chutter took second in the 800 free relay.

Toronto also dominated the butterfly, with outstanding performances from Byron MacDonald in both the 100 and 200 yard events. In the 200, MacDonald shaved almost seven seconds off Peeling's old record of 2:02.5 to win in the new OUAA record time of 1:55.9.

Peeling was fourth in the event and Zvi Eldar sixth. MacDonald also set a new OUAA record in the 100 yard butterfly, with Twobig fourth and Eldar fifth. Peeling and MacDonald then joined team-mates Nick Rottman and Russ Farquhar to win the 400 medley relay.

Blues also fared well in the breaststroke events, with Wayne Phillips second. Rottman fourth and Eldar sixth in the 100, and Sebben second and Rottman third in the 200.

Divers Tim Beane and Alex Lau added to Toronto's total as Lau dove consistently to take fourth in the 3 metre, seventh in the 1 metre and finished fourth overall. Beane, a rookie, dove well to make both finals in his first major competition.

The competition results at this year's meet were noticeably closer, even in the Consolation Finals, than last year. Coach Campbell felt this was largely due to the introduction of time standards as the criteria for determining who goes to the CIAU meet. Whereas previously only the first two swimmers in each event went to the CIAU finals, now all event winners plus any swimmer meeting a predetermined time standard qualify. Under this system, the OUAA stands an excellent chance of winning the conference title at the CIAU meet, as the conference should field a team of 48 swimmers.

Although the final team has not yet been determined, Campbell felt that at least 12 and possibly 14 Blues will make the trip to Calgary. The nationals should boil down to a three team race, with the universities of British Columbia, Alberta and Toronto fighting it out for the team title.

However, given Saturday's performances, Blues must be rated as favourites to regain the title they lost last year to McGill University.

The following are the results of the 18 event meet:

1 meter springboard diving: 1. Lester Newby, Waterloo, 382.40 (points); 2. Doug Darling, Western, 378.30; 3. Tom Kinsman, York, 321.65.

50 yard freestyle: 1. Jim Adams, Toronto, 22.1; 2. George Steplock, McMaster, 22.4; 3. Dave Wilkin, Toronto, 22.6.

200 yard backstroke: 1. Wes McConnell, Western, 2:05.5; 2. Eric Robinson, Waterloo, 2:07.9; 3. Dave Wilson, Waterloo, 2:09.2.

200 yard individual medley: 1. Bill Kennedy, Western, 2:05.5; 2. Dave Wilkin, Toronto, 2:06.8; 3. Rob Herman, Queen's, 2:10.2.

200 yard breaststroke: 1. Rob Jones, McMaster, 2:21.9; 2. John Sebben, Toronto, 2:23.0; 3. Nick Rottman, Toronto, 2:26.3.

400 yard freestyle relay: 1. Toronto, 3:19.8; 2. Guelph, 3:26.1; 3. Waterloo, 3:27.4.

1650 yard freestyle: 1. Shawn Laari, Toronto, 18:09.0; 2. John Sebben, Toronto, 18:17.6; 3. Dave Chutter, Toronto, 18:19.4.

100 yard freestyle: 1. Jim Adams, Toronto, 48.7; 2. George

Gymnasts finish fourth

By GARY WICKS

York University's gymnastics team won the Carron Trophy for the second consecutive year this weekend, with McMaster University finishing second and Queen's third. Toronto was 20 points back of Queen's at 179 for fourth place.

McMaster University competitor Steve Mitruk captured the Werry Cup for the fourth consecutive year, scoring 53.6 individually, three points ahead of York's Tom Kinsman.

Individually for Toronto, Gary

Wicks finished with 41.8 all-round points to lead Blues in the individual standings. Both Bryan Alcock and Rick Jeysman gave excellent free-exercise routines and vaults, and Brian Euler's performance earned him 38.9 all-round points, and John Kelly and Arnold Bishop demonstrated more control and flexibility than in any previous meet this year.

Although Varsity was never in contention for first place team standings, Blues gave commendable performances for a squad allowed only four hours practice time in a gym which is 50 years out of date. Each of the three gymnastics teams Blues were competing against practice at least 15 hours a week in modern gymnasiums.

McMaster's Mitruk will be enrolled at Toronto next year and may take over coaching duties from Julio Roncon who has left for Switzerland after seven years as Toronto's gymnastics coach.

Blues undefeated in regular play

University of Toronto hockey Blues swept to their first undefeated season since 1954-55, trouncing Laurentian Voyageurs 9-4 in Sudbury yesterday afternoon. Blues' final regular season league record is now 17-0-0.

Appropriately, Blues finished their best season in 18 years at Laurentian, the same university team that had robbed Varsity of the chance to go undefeated last year. In the final game of regular season play last year Toronto lost to Laurentian 5-3 in Sudbury. The loss also cost Blues first place in the Eastern Section of the OUAA, a position they ceded to York with a single point more than Toronto.

Scoring for Toronto were Nick Holmes with two goals, while singles came from Bill Fifield, Rick Leroy, Bruce Herridge, Bill Buha, Ivan McFarlane, Warren Anderson, and Mike Keenan. For Laurentian was John Vanderburg, David Morris, Bill Best, and Ed Taylor with one goal apiece.

Blues' were expecting a tough scrappy hometown Laurentian squad, but, aside from a few relatively minor alterations the "Vees" didn't seem like the same team that threw their collective weight around in Toronto December 4, when Varsity came from behind a one goal first period deficit to win 5-2.

As in the previous game this season between the two teams Toronto won the game in the second period on a three goal spree, after taking a 1-0 lead on Holmes first goal of the afternoon midway through the first period. Toronto seemed to lose ground to Laurentian in the final 20 minutes, even though the team outscored the Sudbury squad 4-3 in that period.

Voyageurs held Blues to the lone goal during the first period through tight positional hockey, with the wingers closely watching their checks. Blues had numerous opportunities in the first period but failed to find the mark for the most part.

Laurentian defencemen were noticeably more offensive minded in the game than were Blues' blueline defenders, apparently attempting to bend Toronto into its own end and carry the play.

Toronto now goes on to play York tomorrow night at Varsity Arena while Queen's travels to Laurentian for the sectional semi-finals.

The OUAA semi-finals and finals will be held at Varsity Arena next Friday and Saturday.

Blues Notes: Blues' record under coach Tom Watt stands at 111-10-9 over the past eight regular league seasons... this is the first year under Watt that Blues have had a perfect season, although Blues have only lost one game in five of the past seven seasons... Blues should have little trouble defeating York tomorrow night. In other games this season Varsity has defeated York by 8-5 and 7-4 scores...

Chairmanship won

A student has won the chairmanship of an official university committee.

However, the committee involved, the Faculty of Arts and Science Library Committee, is mainly advisory and the student election was by acclamation. Eight faculty members and seven students sit on the committee, giving the students more say than on most other university bodies.

Chairman Bob Bettson (Trin II) says the committee is unlikely to meet during the rest of the 1972-73 academic year; its main duties will occur, he says, next year when it will likely act as a library users' committee, advising on library policy.

Occupation continues

Noon Math rally demand staffing voice

By GREG McMASTER

Students occupying the mathematics department offices last night reaffirmed their earlier decision to remain until a "satisfactory response" to their demands was received from math chairman George Duff. They want the rehiring of three fired professors and some student control over staffing policy. After rejecting an offer from arts and science dean Bob Greene to set up a vaguely-defined committee to engage in "substantive discussion" of the issues involved, they said they would welcome a response from Duff at today's noon-hour rally, which has been called to consider further courses of action. The meeting will be held in the department offices, on the fourth floor of Sidney Smith Hall.

After Duff had refused to comment on their central demands at an 11 am Sid Smith rally over 300 students streamed up the Sid Smith stairs, seizing the departmental office and half of the corridor. A unidentified man tried to guard the office door in vain, but had to change his cries of "You can't go in here" to "At least let me get out" as students clambered past him.

The meeting, which had begun in the first-floor lobby, was immediately reconvened by chairperson Dave Depoe. It formalized the demands that student wanted satisfied before they would leave. "That Duff offer a contract to Stephen Salaff for 1973-74 and write a letter to president Evans recommending that professors David Spring and Michael Mather be given tenure; and • That students be given immediate and substantial representation and effective decision-making power on all departmental bodies, including those dealing with hiring, firing and tenure of faculty".

A press release was prepared, stating these demands and announcing that the students "are staying here until we get a satisfactory response".

Committees were struck to obtain food and gather support from other students, and a "continuity committee" was formed to coordinate activities.

By late last night, about 50 students were preparing to stay overnight, and 200 more had vowed to return in the morning. The U of T police had set up operations in a classroom down the hall from the students, and kept a watchful eye on the proceedings.

Unanimous statement of support for the demands, as well as gifts of $25 each, were received from the Sociology Student Union and the Graduate Sociology Association, which both met last night.

None of SAC president Eric Miglin or vice-presidents Ross Flowers or John Helliwell however, even showed up at the occupation.

Discussions with Greene to set up negotiations collapsed last night when students turned down his demand that they leave the building before discussions with Duff continue. Students told Greene that in previous meetings with Duff, "we've been ignored as if we're the last thought in anyone's mind".

When asked if Duff has the authority to write the letter being demanded, Greene answered "I don't think your question makes sense". He had earlier made references to the normal "appeal mechanisms", which he felt the professors concerned had not made full use of.

He was reminded that they had little information on which to base an appeal, since they had been given no reason for their dismissal. Greene admitted that even he didn't know who was on the math department's tenure committee, other than its chairman, Duff.

Students told Greene "all that was offered was a meeting. That is no guarantee that anything will be done. We're going to stay until he writes those letters".

One student answered Greene's refusal to set up a meeting between Duff and the students with the question "Would you be willing to set up such a meeting if we occupied the whole building, if picket lines were set up to close down the university, like at the University of Quebec?" Greene didn't respond.

The occupiers then agreed to stay, pending Duff's response, and the decisions of today's mass rally.

Students gathered in the corridor outside Math chairman George Duff's office vote on demands submitted to him.

U of Q students vote to continue boycott

MONTREAL (CUPI) — Despite a court injunction against their strike, students at l'Université du Québec à Montréal plan to continue their boycott of classes.

About 3,000 of the university's 13,000 students voted overwhelmingly Monday night at Paul Sauvé Arena to continue the strike which has paralysed the university since January 26.

The students are striking to protest the university administration's attempts to impose a deadline for payment of academic fees. The students want to be able to pay their fees in instalments during the three years after they leave the university, and only if they find work in their field of study. The university's demand for prompt payment discriminates against students from low-income families, the students say.

At Monday night's meeting, students also demanded the lifting of the injunction which bars picketing of university buildings before they would resume negotiations with the administration. Students are also demanding that the administration take no reprisals against students who have participated in the strike. The strike is to continue until a negotiated agreement is reached.

The students plan to campaign for support among CEGEPS (Community Colleges) and other universities in Montréal. Besides organizing a study day for later in the week, they will hold a demonstration this Friday in front of the Palais de Justice (courthouse) when ten UQAM students are to appear on charges of violating the injunction and of causing disturbances while picketing.

The striking students received messages of support from the Central des enseignants du Québec, (the teachers union) local teachers' unions, and several CEGEPS as well as from social science students at the Université de Montréal who are also boycotting classes to protest the fees policy. Students at the Rosemount CEGEP announced they will hold study sessions until the UQAM injunction is lifted.

Monday's meeting sharply

contrasted with a poorly attended meeting held February 25 by student opposing the strike. Only about 600 people attended the meeting organised by "The Silent Majority Committee". Administration-backed groups have attempted and failed, throughout the strike, to break student solidarity.

The injunction was designed to open the university but, because the professors' union voted to hold study sessions until the injunction is lifted, few classes have been held. The administration has told the teachers their study sessions are illegal.

The administration sent letters to the university's maintenance workers in an attempt to justify its actions against the students. Both the teachers' and maintenance workers' unions have asked their members to respect the students' picket lines during the month-long strike.

The picketing was broken up February 22 when Montréal riot police drove their motorcycles through groups of striking students.

The administration denied responsibility for the police actions but it was in the process of obtaining the court injunction declaring the strike illegal and preventing picketers from approaching within 500 feet of any UQAM building. Student leaders were served the injunction while they were negotiating with UQAM rector Leo Dorais.

Admin may endorse student say on dept hiring committees

By ULLI DIEMER

Students seem to have won guarded administration approval for their contention that they have the right to sit on departmental staffing committees.

A staffing committee report Monday interprets a letter sent Friday from vice-president and provost Don Forster to Sociology chairman Irving Zeitlin saying that "there does not appear to be grounds for objecting to the present structure of the staffing committee."

Although this section of the report has not been approved by the committee as a whole yet, sources on the committee say there is little chance of objections being voiced against it.

Sociology has recently come under fire from some quarters for its decision to add students to its staffing committee, responsible for the contentious area of hiring, firing, promotion, and tenure. It has had staff-student parity on all other committees for two years.

Forster's three-page letter, sent with the knowledge of U of T president John Evans, is cautiously worded, and stops short of saying outright that the sociology move is permissible under university regulations.

The question was referred to Forster after U of T Faculty Association president S. M. Uzumeri wrote to Zeitlin and arts and science dean Bob Greene protesting last month's establishment of the parity staff-student staffing committee stating that in his view the university's Haist regulations prohibited such a step.

The Haist rules state that "appointments and promotions and other confidential matters should be discussed with a senior committee." In Uzumeri's opinion, this excludes junior faculty as well as students.

However, the rules also state that the chairman should seek the advice of his department on various matters. Perhaps significantly, the verb "should" is used. It is less definite than "shall" or "must", used in other parts of the document.

Forster acknowledges that there are various interpretations of the Haist rules, and gives no reason why the liberal interpretation (allowing students on staffing committees) would be invalid. He makes the point that, technically speaking, all staffing committees have no official decision-making status, but are merely advisory to the department chairman, who makes the final recommendations to a committee of deans. Since the committees themselves are not official bodies, a student presence on them is also not official, and breaks no rules.

An early reminder

This week's staff meeting — Friday at 1 pm — will be very important. Plan to be there!

The committee report describes Forster's letter as stating "insofar as it continues to be the responsibility of the chairman to recommend appointments, promotions and tenures to the dean", the structure is legitimate.

However, Forster stops short of giving outright approval. He also goes on to say that developments in the sociology department should not be considered a precedent, and asks Zeitlin for a year-end report on the governance of the department.

The participants in the manoeuvring involved have been reluctant to clarify their stands.

Forster told The Varsity that he had "no comment at all" on the matter.

Zeitlin said that he considered the issue a "departmental matter", not a "political issue". He wanted The Varsity to print nothing on the matter, and suggested that other departments "do their own thing" without reference to precedents set in sociology.

Zeitlin expressed irritation that The Varsity intended to print information contained in the Uzumeri and Forster letters, calling them "private correspondence." However, he has made copies of both letters available to other members of the department.

Zeitlin, who has supported the student presence on the staffing committee, did point out that Uzumeri's views were in no way binding on him, since "Uzumeri is not my superior in this bearchy."

Evans acknowledged having seen the Forster letter, but expressed uncertainty as to its exact content, and was unwilling to make a definite statement on the issue.

Uzumeri refused to discuss his letter, but said that "in general" he was not opposed to students having "input" into staffing decisions.

However, he characterized "input" as consisting primarily of "opinion" and "information". Students should "absolutely not" be allowed access to the "confidential" information that is a basis for tenure decisions and some staffing decisions, according to Uzumeri.

Although his letter to Zeitlin was written on UTFA letterhead paper, Uzumeri acknowledged that it represented only his personal views. However, he thought that his views were "representative" of the membership of the UTFA.

Opposition has come from within the department as well.

According to professor Tony Smith, a member of the sociology staffing committee, a vocal minority of faculty "neanderthals" have been manoeuvring to overturn the trend to increased democratization in the department. Forster's cautious go-ahead should be a severe blow to those faculty conservatives opposed to student involvement in hiring.

Students gather in the Sid Smith Foyer. Math Chairman George Duff refused to answer their questions on the dismissal of three profs.

Lecture sparks occupation

Yesterday's Sid Smith occupation was touched off when math chairman Duff lectured 300 angry students for 40 minutes on "channels of communication" and approaching issues with "reasonable balance of mind". However, he could only answer "no comment" when challenged to answer the questions around which the rally in the Sid Smith Foyer focused upon.

Just before Duff spoke, the crowd gave a lengthy ovation to math professors Michael Mather, and David Spring, whose positions were effectively terminated by the denial of tenure, and Stephen Salaff, a part-time instructor whose contract was not renewed.

The meeting was the culmination of several weeks' organization by math students in support of their professors, which included the collection of over 1000 names on a petition demanding more emphasis on teaching and the establishment of a student say in hiring and firing.

Sociology professor Tony Smith read out a letter which Salaff received from Duff that morning describing classroom discussions of teaching quality and jobs as a "diversion" from the "proper course of study", which would be treated "as a matter for serious concern" if not discontinued.

Students booted and jeered at the letter as Duff approached the microphone.

Duff began by outlining channels available for students to air grievances, including discussion with tutorial leaders, course unions and himself.

Students groaned as he proceeded to discourse on the merits of the U of T math department as compared with those "at most universities in the United States", and on the "substantial" input of students at this university.

At one point he defended his earlier statement that "mathematics are learned, not taught", saying that he had been quoting from an old issue of the Journal of Science. The volume and page number were lost amid laughter and boing.

After half an hour of Duff, the crowd became somewhat restless, shouting comments such as "We didn't ask for a review of your textbook", and "Why should we listen to you when you won't listen to us? You won't even answer our questions".

A student finally demanded that Duff give a direct answer to the question "Will you rehire the three professors, and will you give students a say in hiring and firing policies?"

Duff hesitated, and then responded that he would make "no comment" on those issues.

After considerable uproar, the meeting proceeded, with Duff parrying more questions.

Math professor Chandler Davis supported the inclusion of students in decision-making, adding sarcastically that it is unrealistic for Duff to have to make such decisions "by himself".

By this time, restless students were shouting for action, and applauded loudly a speaker's suggestion that "this meeting has been determined by the presence of professor Duff".

A motion from last year's SAC vice-president Phil Dack to "adjourn and reconvene upstairs in the math department" was supported by several speakers, who said that Duff had made it clear there would be no response to students' demands unless pressure was brought to bear.

The motion carried overwhelmingly.

Earlier Mather described how he was told last April, "I'd been denied tenure by the tenure committee of the math department. I don't know if this committee actually met, whom it met, who is on the committee, and what the reasons were for the decision".

He said he has been unable to get a letter of recommendation from the department, and he therefore "cannot get a job except with great difficulty."

He accused the department of "diverting first year teaching funds to fourth year teaching and research" and added that "those teachers who are conscientious and enthusiastic are being sacked."

He noted that "support from my students is just fantastic".

Carver Scobie, a first year math student, took up Duff's earlier remark that "students are here to rub shoulders with scholars". He said "we've been rubbing shoulders with three professors from whom we've been learning very much, but some of the scholars with whom we've been rubbing shoulders are dead."

"Some of the scholars think it's beneath their dignity to rub shoulders with us, but we are not prepared to leave our destiny in the hands of scholars of the past. We are responsible for producing change in our generation and for producing the conditions for change in the future."

He questioned Duff on his assessment of teaching, saying "How do we rate those professors from whom we learn nothing?"

"Here are our shoulders, let's do some rubbing," challenged Scobie.

Sociology professor Tony Smith told the meeting that Duff "has not been prepared to talk about anything that students are prepared to talk about". The students, he said, must have a say in staffing "so that the department won't be able to fire their best teachers in the face of student opinion."

SAC race crowded at the post

By BOB BETTSON

The high drama of last year's on-again off-again Trotskyist acclamation in the Students' Administrative Council presidential elections was missing Monday as five slates entered the race.

Five slates representing widely differing views are headed by SAC services commissioner Cbuck Vickery, Arts and Science Student Union chairman Bob Anderson, Heather Ridout leading a United Socialist Slate, Stop the Student Surcharge Committee chairman Peter Havers and UC student Peter Baumann.

Ridout with Greg McMaster (APSC) and Alice Klein (EXT) is running because of what she termed the inadequate leadership given by the present SAC. "We believe that SAC should build and organize student struggles in the university."

Ridout supported the occupation of the fourth floor math offices and stated that the leading issue next year would be the fight against government cutbacks in education.

Vickery refused to comment on the Math occupation in Sid Smith. Baumann opposed it, even though he called Stephen Salaff, who was denied tenure, a "tremendous professor."

Vickery, who is running with finance commissioner Paul Bannon and Mike Weedon (VIC ID), said the slate intends to shift emphasis to services, but supports open stacks at the Roberts Library. He added that they would support pulling out of the Ontario Federation of Students.

Anderson was unavailable for comment last night but his campaign manager, SAC communications commissioner Debra Lewis, said that his campaign will stress students' rights and improved teachlog at the university.

Anderson, a UC SAC rep, is running with Stephen Moses (Meds I) and Erindale student council vice-president and Arts and Science Student Union executive member Mike Scott.

A surprise candidacy was Baumann's a second year UC student not previously involved in student politics. Baumann is running with Ian Dignam (Erin I) and Doug Wilson (Meds I).

Math department chairman George Duff tried evading the question once too often. And he got the department offices occupied in return. It served him right!

Duff has been playing a hide-and-seek game with students protesting the department's firing of three popular professors — Stephen Salaff, David Spring, and Michael Mather — and its refusal to sit students on department staffing committees, for the last few months.

He's remained indifferent to petitions — one bearing more than 1,000 names — supporting the profs' re-instatement, and now to two protest rallies.

Last week, students gave Duff a week in which to reply to their demands. He turned up yesterday, but there was no reply. Instead, the chairman rambled on for nearly an hour sidestepping the issue every way he could think up.

It was only when students told him they'd had enough of his evasive tactics that he was forced to consider the real questions. And, even then, Duff tried to get out of answering their demands. He refused to comment on whether he would rehire the profs, and claimed that university regulations forbid student participation on staffing committees.

Duff has had more than long enough to think about the student demands that he re-instate the professors. By coming to a rally scheduled to hear his decision on the demand without being willing to honestly answer the question, Duff treated the students in the typically patronizing manner conservative faculty reserve for those below them.

Perhaps, he thought he could once more postpone any student action; or perhaps, he banked on the fact that he could drag out his boring discourse until the students' numbers had thinned sufficiently to make any action unlikely.

As for his claim that university policy ruled out student participation in staffing decisions, the chairman got caught looking rather silly when he was confronted with the sociology department precedent. That, and the information that the university's senior administrators have ruled students need not be excluded from staffing committees, clinched the deal.

Duff's excuse was just that, and nothing more. Had he ever seriously considered the students' demands, he would have looked into the actual university policy and found out he could agree to their request.

Having exhausted all reasonable channels of communication, students had to take direct action to demonstrate the seriousness of their cause. That action, democratically endorsed by a meeting attended by more than 200 students, was occupation of the math department offices and the corridors outside them. The occupying students have said they will not leave their vigil until Duff gives them a satisfactory response to the following demands:

- offer a contract to Stephen Salaff for 1973-74;
- formally ask president John Evans to grant professors David Spring and Michael Mather tenure, ensuring that they will be able to continue on staff; and

- give students an "immediate and substantial representative and effective decision-making power on all departmental bodies, including those dealing with the hiring, firing, and tenure of faculty".

Duff has no choice but to give in to these demands. It's time he started listening to the students in whose education he's supposed to be interested, and forgetting about his opposition to giving students a meaningful voice in department decision-making.

If Duff won't act, arts and science dean Bob Greene and president Evans should intervene. It's time everybody stopped tossing this hot potato around and did something to remedy the situation.

Students from all departments should recognize the common cause for which the math students are fighting, and join them in their struggle. The only way they can show that support is by turning up at the occupation site, if not before, then certainly for today's noon rally.

This is not an isolated struggle. It is a common fight for a meaningful student role in university decision-making, and to demonstrate that administrators will not be allowed to continue to ignore students.

Israelis only want homeland

Once again, one sadly finds an urgent plea for humanity and freedom for a large group of Jewish people (petition for Soviet Jewry) being transformed into a pedestal for the Arab Students' Federation to denounce the State of Israel. After quickly dismissing the petition as a "hypothetical contention", the writers, true-to-form, denounce it all as a Zionist plot.

I do not wish to get into the entire Arab-Israeli question other than to make one point clear. The Arab people have a homeland. As a matter of fact, they have a number of them — Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, Iran, Jordan, et cetera. The Jewish people, who through their long history in the area, must have some rights there, only ask for a single, relatively tiny piece of land of their own. The fact that this area called Israel is the area in which they developed, they grew, and would have always remained if not driven out by a continual spectrum of oppressive kingdoms from the outside, demands that the Jewish state be here.

The Palestinian Arabs do have rights to this area too, to this I agree. But, to the question of who deserves the actual control of the government, we must weigh both sides. The so-called Palestinian Arabs now living in the existing Arab countries share a common language, culture, ethnic background, and indeed are the very same people as their "host countries". Of what purpose is it to demand their "repatriation" in a country which they share nothing with the inhabitants and in point of fact do not recognize (and in many cases are in an army at war with!). Can one even suggest that their need is greater than that of millions of Jews who without Israel would have not one single country in which they can guide their own destination, express their own beliefs, and defend themselves from another Holocaust.

Of course, this does not hold water with the Arab Students Federation, who will concede nothing for their own ends. One cannot but stop to wonder if they continue in the path of the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem (the most influential Arab leader of the time) who lived in Germany during World War II and planned with Hitler himself to wipe out any Jewish homeland.

Peace will only find itself into the Mid-East when both people accept the inherent right of the other to a homeland. The Arabs have theirs.

Battle over art rages on...

I read Marie-Lynn Hammond's definition of art, "Art is when you hear things in Chinese restaurants and such like and put 'em in reviews and such like, like they were your very own", and thought that you were very wrong and cruel to take away her prize just because she began her definition with "when". I once heard a definition, "Time is when..." I don't know where I got that, but I know it can't be art because I couldn't possibly have heard it in a Chinese restaurant. Chinese food makes me sick.

I told all this to my one friend in the refectory, Ferd Gorman, and Ferd said a very beautiful definition of Art, "Art is Truth, and Truth is Art, and you know, that's all there is." Ferd thought it up right there, and think he ought to get the prize, since Marie-Lynn isn't getting it.

Humour abused ignorantly

With reference to the coverage of the Hart House debate on women in politics ("Best statesmen are women... January 31), I note that reporter David Line has misquoted me to the extent of rendering an originally humorous remark ignorant.

Fortunately, Mr. Line has saved me considerable embarrassment by attributing the statement to Tom Walkom.

Presumably this is an example of The Varsity's "strict criteria of accuracy" referred to by the Editor recently.

Hart houses adulterated art

Under the inspiration of Chris Ralph, secretary of the Hart House Art Committee, an exhibition of so-called kitsch art has been setup in the House Gallery until this Saturday. The exhibition seems designed to feel out the range of kitsch... and of the motivation which inspires it.

The kitsch—Chris Howard

Hart House goes kitsch until end of week.

What is kitsch? We normally think of it as debased art or junk offered as art. A paint-by-number of the Mona Lisa is kitsch; so is the illuminated mirror-gilted Last Supper, the assembly line reproductions of classical sculpture and the Confederation Life's Gallery of Canadian History — all in the exhibition. Those pseudo-elegant knives, forks, glasses and dinner sets which the oil companies generously dish out are also kitsch.

Perhaps the most salient feature of kitsch is its tawdriness despite (or because of) top-quality art supplying the content for kitsch-objects. If this is obvious, what is less so (but what is worse) is that kitsch supplies the biggest deterrent to taking the trouble to resort to the real thing. If people surround themselves with classical associations, that often seems to satisfy whatever inclination they may have to put themselves in touch with great art. Soon you begin to feel that Leonardo is not so arcane and mysterious after all. Maybe even you could do it, and so easily convince yourself of this as you fiddle with your Kenner paint-by-number. The theme of the exhibit may then be properly re-stated as "adulteration" — what was more will always be less, but we will continue to think it is more.

David Rifat's interesting decorative collage is the one serious art object, and it is meant mainly as a linguistic-pictorial probe: Is kitsch camp, estaz art, triviality? The value of the exhibit is that it vividly does what this article says it does — but with much more humour and imaginative resonance. Because kitsch, after all, is a sensual phenomenon. You will believe it when you see it because it is so real and you know that reality: it is over your grandmother's mantle, or blaring from your classical-sounds-til-dawn radio station. It is as big as life and costs less.

York service workers back down from strike

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — Workers at York University Sunday night backed down in their demands and narrowly accepted a new two-year contract just 18 hours before they were due to go on strike.

The workers, 238 cleaners, housemaids, tradesmen and groundsmen, voted 112-91 to accept a contract that gives them a few improvements, but basically accepts management's wage-benefits offer.

The negotiating committee recommended that the membership accept the proposal.

"We squeezed as much as we could get out of them," said Jack Bird, national representative for the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), who represented York's local 1356.

The new wage package is $4.04 for male cleaners, and $3.48 for women; and $5.91 to $6.60 an hour, for trades people. All wage increases are to be spread over a two-year period. The union had originally asked for a one dollar across-the-board increase.

With its offer, management is giving male cleaners 54 cents an hour increase and only 48 cents an hour more to women cleaners. The increases are based on job categories — an issue of contention that wasn't negotiated by union officials and management.

Management also agreed to pay three-quarters of all fringe benefits, up from two-thirds. The union had demanded 100 per cent payment by the university.

Fringe benefits were improved, but issues of job security through plant-wide seniority, the hiring of non-union labor for new campus buildings and the status of overtime — whether compulsory or voluntary — were not resolved.

The question of male-female parity was raised at the Sunday meeting of the membership. One angry woman complained she had been doing a cleaner's job at Glendon for three years and was still classified as a housemaid. Bird said the negotiation committee had not known about her situation.

There have been problems this year with moves to hire non-union labor, suspensions over refusals to work overtime, and layoffs because of budget cuts.

Many of the workers at the meeting were dissatisfied. Acting local president Ron Beaton denounced the contract; "Money wasn't the issue. We were after the security clause for the protection of the workers. I'm not happy with this deal at all." He said he expected further problems with the job security issue.

York personnel head Don Mitchell told the student paper Excalibur: "You have to report it as you see it but the union backed down completely. I don't want to see their nose rubbed in it."

Mitchell said the combined wage-benefits settlement would cost the university little more than its original six per cent offer. The total cost of union benefits is now under two million dollars, he said, and the increase over two years will raise that cost by less than one per cent.

Bird disagreed. He claimed management had come up "substantially" from its original offer and that the overall wage-benefits raise was nearer eight per cent.

"There are some improvements and I don't think we could have gotten any more by going out on strike. Any wage gains would have been lost in missed salaries," he said.

York faces a $845,000 operating deficit this year, and is expected to operate at a more than one million dollars deficit by 1974-75.

York workers face layoffs

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — Fifteen staff members at York University's Scott Library may be laid off because of budget cuts.

A hesitant confirmation of the layoffs came from William Newman, Scott's associate director for planning and development. According to Newman, the 15 "could be" laid off unless other contingency plans or funds appeared soon.

Scott Library's budget for next year was $3,670,000 — nearly seven per cent less than the amount originally budgeted for 1972-73. Because of large enrolment drops at York, the university entered a grave financial crisis, which led to the resignation of president David Slater in January.

The library's fixed costs apparently give it little option but to let staff go when under severe budget constraints. The average cost per book acquired rose from $8.77 in 1967-69 to $13.25 in 1971.

Despite his statement that "we're not going to roll over and play dead" in the face of the $235,000 cut, Newman had no plans to make it up or save the jobs.

The new budget cutbacks come in the wake of recent decreases in library staff and services, as well as rising costs. The pressure has been intense on many remaining staff members because of the increased work load, especially in the circulation department.

Leftists debate Viet ceasefire

By GREG McMASTER

A debate on the real nature of the Vietnam ceasefire developed into a discussion of historical theoretical differences last week at Innis College between Trotskyists and the traditional communist parties, after Nelson Clarke referred to Vietnam's national bourgeoisie as one of that country's "progressive forces".

Clarke, speaking for the Communist Party of Canada, was answered by Joe Flexer's contention that "nowhere in the capitalist world today has the bourgeoisie any progressive role to play". Flexer was speaking for the Old Mole and Red Circle organizations.

Clarke said that South Vietnam has "a capitalist economy with strong feudal carryovers", and the National Liberation Front (NLF) must "spearhead" efforts against "the U.S. imperialists and their agent Thieu". He predicted that "blatantly anti-democratic" actions by Thieu would lead to his isolation and defeat.

Clarke said the success of the Vietnamese liberation forces depended on them rallying "the very widest unity of all patriotic forces" behind a "national people's democratic revolution" against feudal landlord enemies.

Flexer countered "there can be no secure gains for the masses until the power of the colonial bourgeoisie has been broken."

Both sides agreed that the removal of U.S. troops represents, as Clarke said, "a clear gain", and Clarke doubted that Nixon would chance "the great political risk to himself" which re-intervention would mean. He suggested that such a move would bring "danger of impeachment" to Nixon.

Flexer acknowledged that the treaty gave "formal recognition to the strategic defeat of U.S. imperialism in its role as the world cop for imperialism", but warned that "the accords are paper. What is important is the balance of power." He noted that there are still 170,000 U.S. personnel in Vietnam today "to maintain the power of Thieu".

He described Vietnam as "a class war, and of the existing two governments, one must prevail."

Clarke, however, felt that "the treaty presents favourable conditions for the development of the Vietnamese revolution", and socialists should "support the full implementation of these agreements to the letter".

Flexer doubted Clarke's contention that a treaty in which both sides included "the right to private enterprise" as a guaranteed right represented "a significant victory". He added that problems of land reform and democracy "can nowhere be solved by capitalism but only by socialism."

Language abused on all fronts; suffering a slow, certain death unvarnished description could never elicit.

There is also the dependence on the catchphrase, slogan, or punch-line ("I can't believe I ate the whole thing"; "We try harder") which is usually devoid of meaning, and almost always of relevance, but which, because of its all-important 'catchy' quality, remains in the mind, and which becomes linked with the advertiser's name sufficiently to affect sales. Often, the phrase may even enter the language, at least temporarily, generally to language's detriment.

The catchiness of a slogan frequently lies in its very linguistic wrongness ("It's the refreshinest") which lends it, however distastefully, all the more impact.

Advertising is quick to seize upon misuses culled from the common speech, to endow its pronouncements with a colloquial, just-folks flavour, friendly and persuasive; spread through the mass media these misusages become reinforced and probably permanent.

One word which has been effectively destroyed — partly through this process — is 'fantastic'; as in "fantastic bargains", "fantastic values" and the like; bereft of meaning, the word is reduced to an ignoble, ancillary function as an unspecific modifier with some feeble connotation of unusual worth; its value to the advertising copywriter lies chiefly in its colloquial quality.

Contrast the above usages with the dictionary definition of the word: extravagantly fanciful, capricious, eccentric; grotesque or quaint in design (Concise Oxford Dictionary, 5th edition); it becomes obvious that this once valuable word, with a precise and useful meaning, has been ruined except as a bloodless epithet empty of any real significance.

This is a continuing and expanding process: advertising sullies almost every word it uses, robbing it of specificity, diminishing its potency and furthering the misusages which make communication more and more nebulous and less and less effective.

In George Orwell's 1984, one of the factors which helped guarantee the stability of the totalitarian regime he depicted was the invented language Newspeak, with its carefully controlled vocabulary designed to limit thought patterns by proscribing certain words and formations: if the words necessary to form a treasonous thought do not exist, then treason can not exist either.

In a more haphazard form, advertising's friends in the informational media, such as the newspapers, the family magazines, and the television news, are subtly achieving a like result.

Operating from their unique and unchallenged position as the public dispensers of 'fact', their power does not consist in merely being able to decide which fragments of reality shall be accorded the status of 'news' (although this in itself is sufficiently terrifying). From within a framework of fundamentally similar attitudes and beliefs, they couch their condescendingly proffered tidbits of information in a narrow, standardized linguistic format which depends upon a few key terms and simplistic categorizations to depict all phenomena, past and present, as resulting from the interaction of a relatively small number of social forces, whose individual natures remain, by and large, undiscussed.

This trend, combined with the frightening penetration of our culture which the mass-media have so quickly and easily achieved, has led to a situation in which these deceptive generalizations are so ingrained into our consciousness that they now present a formidable obstacle to rational analysis of our society: our thoughts become increasingly a succession of media-spawned clichés, trite and unsatisfactory, and so not only the manner, but also the content of our thinking is modified thereby.

The horrific aspects of this insidious loss of independence are obvious, and bespeak all too clearly the impending realization of the Orwellian nightmare.

Apart from the necessity to hurdle the barriers of cliché which the media have thrust upon us, communication has also been progressively undermined as more and more words whose usefulness would otherwise be inestimable have been degraded by label-happy newsmen in their ceaseless effort to condense history into bite-size, digestible morsels of verbal insipidity.

Witness the fate of 'anarchy'; this word, which was once the name of an idealistic political philosophy has now acquired negative connotations of disorder, disruption and mayhem — anarchy now means 'crime in the streets'.

Naturally, there has never been a period in history when language was not abused, nor when communication was much better, probably, than it is today.

But, it is only in the twentieth century, with the enormous power of the mass-media, that the possibility for a near-total decline or a mass uplifting in the quality of language (and hence in the quality of our society) has been made possible.

Unfortunately, with the media at the helm, we are heading precipitously in the wrong direction.

Education

Much of our language's current degeneration derives from attitudes ingrained in the public mind by our school system. The prevalence of these attitudes is a direct result of our pedagogical method, the form and techniques of teaching held to be adequate to our social needs. The mainstay of this technique is its authority structure, in which the teacher acts as a medium through which universally accepted knowledge is relayed to the student. Utilizing the terrain which falls between the power of scientific fact and the power of physical punishment, the teacher nurtures the mentality of the 'perpetual apprentice' among his students.

Success at school depends primarily upon the individual's willingness and ability to study — that is, to memorize. Society glibly refers to this process as the development of the well-rounded individual, the one who has been equipped to think for himself; yet the operative reality is simply the propagation of rote, the ability to replicate taught arguments without challenging either their validity or the authority of the individual(s) delivering them.

Since students are neither contributors to, nor users of, academic knowledge, their relationship to what is learned, and the language used to convey it, exhibits a passivity reflective of this lack of participation. Words are taken to have absolute meanings which, through memorization, we can make 'our own'; the majority of words in the average vocabulary come to have 'slots' wherein their meaning is guaranteed through regularized usage. Over time, this condition precludes a consciousness of words as preserving distinct traditions and origins, or of words containing varieties of subtly different meaning, dependent on context or intonation for their full value. The flat structural definition suggested by the dictionary, or, more often, by the teacher, tends to be treated as an infallible datum as opposed to a mere outline guide with as much potential for bad use as for good.

This passivity towards meaning requires a simultaneous inner passivity. At no time is there incorporated into our schools the consciousness that language is something remade through use; that each of us exercises a coercive and creative power over the forms our descriptions take; that all usage serves to diminish or augment the varieties of meaning and historical significance condense in any word.

That this order of learning can maintain its hegemony several things are necessary. One of these is that the potentially regenerative areas within the curriculum — history and English literature — be addressed by teachers and viewed by students as areas of inferior status, as frivolous in a practical sense. It is essential that culture and art be seen as ornaments, necessary attributes without which a society could justly be considered barren, yet ones which adorn social development rather than guiding and challenging it. History is the study of humanity's past; we do not allow or encourage it to make claims against our society's present and future. The classroom wherein these subjects are taught lend us a few moments in which we raise the monumental questions of life, questions which remain esoteric in that the life to which school confines the young prevents them from drawing any essential parallels.

The remoteness of literature and its language is broadened within the schools through the means by which proficiency in 'socially necessary' language is imparted. Foremost is the fetish of form in the teaching of language, a procedure in which defined structures are built up to aid memorization, in the hope that a sensibility towards linguistic taste and a feeling for semantic accuracy will arise unassisted.

This technique, with its necessary recourse to an all-powerful web of procedural rules — all of which, taught in exile from illustrative usages, force the acceptance of painful and essentially boring a priori — dulls the audience to the legitimate need for an operative structure in any language. It also encourages an attitude, which may only blossom later, that holds as a virtue the flaunting of language rules for its own sake — the exact negative correlate of a grammar taught for its own sake.

Similarly, composition, the act of mastering the language for the purposes of writing, tends increasingly to be an activity taught by imparting a structural format — the key to successful communication is the manipulation of a simple, time-tested formula (Introduction, rising action, climax, denouement) over literally any range of experience. Forgotten entirely in this recourse to structure is any attempt to encourage the art of making whatever format the author adopts work strictly in the service of the peculiar qualities of his experience and intent. With this general experience in hand the majority of us go forth into the world, semi-literate clerks of one type or another, equipped with as much specialized technological jargon as may be necessary to the performance of our chosen trade. With this decade-long mutilation of their literary and linguistic possibilities over, most people remain easy targets and willing accomplices of the agencies of decline active within our society.

An increasing number of people, of course, continue in the 'educational process', which subjects them to new and equally ruinous influences. If individuals opt for the natural sciences or mathematics what occurs is an intensification of the high school experience, in which the level of use of specialized scientific terminology escalates while association with disciplines treating social and political life directly is drastically reduced.

If the 'arts' are elected, there rapidly occurs an overspecialization of study-area as the student is initiated into an in-bred house language. It should be admitted that specialized languages have and must continue to have their place within the parent language; one would expect to see their rise, refinement, and integration into the general language structure as their use and accuracy are proved.

However, in the university these languages serve purposes other than the development of an accurate, flexible description of the reality of social life. Atomizing what is in fact an interconnected whole, the 'social sciences' see themselves as discrete entities with absolute intellectual dominion over their area of concentration. What we experience is the attempt to treat as universal and sacrosanct pronouncements which are in fact perspectival and whose overall meaning can only be understood by examining its connections with all other perspectives.

The failure to build languages adequate to that which is studied is amplified grotesquely by competing power groups within each knowledge empire; aggravating the tendency of each academic clique to contrive a new language is the general incorporation of pseudo-scientific language and technique into the study of social life, an ignominious effort to achieve the same degree of absoluteness as the natural scientist. This illegitimate and publicly unexamined theft of tools and language lends, given the stature of modern science, accords a weight and credibility to the discipline and user beyond that which their results merit.

Within the institution, words are used for stature, both academic and social, and for marks; there comes to exist a veritable 'top 40' of overworked words and phrases. Kitsch formulations, which may have made sense within the system of thinking through which they originated, come to be used more for the sense of drama and wisdom that we allow them to invoke (witness "anomie", "schizoid" or "Kafkaesque"), than for their applicability to any specific reality described.

More serious is the wholesale destruction of valuable terms like "alienation": words which have precise meaning and use value within the context of their own history but which have been pulled from that context, broadened and diluted such that they cover infinite ranges of circumstance, eventually serving the god of ease rather than the god of accuracy.

While each echelon of the school system, once completed, produces a categorically different product, all three tiers imbue in this product a common property. Each serves to promote the rise and acceptance of "functional" language — vocabulary which is retained on the basis of its ability to achieve for the user certain socially necessary forms which elicit uniform response from persons and institutions no matter who employs them.

That a vast educational network stretching across an entire civilization should be so almost conspiratorially involved in encouraging us to cut our linguistic throats is both remarkable and unfortunate — that this encouragement becomes stronger with time is tragic and alarming.

Counterculture

One of the most pervasive areas of language's current decline is the rotting away from within represented by the uncritical use of slang, particularly noticeable in the increasingly popular "counterculture" patois. Slang is part of that insidious mechanism by which semantic precision is sacrificed for the convenience of an idiom which lumps a whole range of objects or concepts under one generalized, hence inaccurate, label.

The outcome of this phenomenon is to dull the effect of the words we use, to render them vague and essentially meaningless, reducing our ability accurately to convey ideas with the minimum of distortion which effective communication requires.

Examples of this debilitating trend are rife: "far out", for example, can signify an entire range of widely differing attributes from unusual, exotic and eccentric through wonderful, exciting, exhilarating and remarkable, and even, more blandly, praiseworthy, interesting and many more distinguishable characteristics whose only common factor is that they denote an attitude of approval or wonderment on the part of the speaker.

It would be possible, though tiresome, to break down in this manner almost all the words which have found their way into the hip lexicon, words and phrases like "too much", "heavy", "dude" and, particularly repellent, "peace" — all formulations which do more to disguise than to express the realities which they are intended to describe.

Politics, being more intentionally deceitful, because it is more comprehensive than the counterculture, brings into existence an ever-expanding net of slang designed to entrap and beguile the user. Political slogans work to manipulate our minds; repetitious use of catchy phrases, as in advertising, triggers stereotyped imagery concerning the essential goodness of the person, party or program of the user and, usually, the essential badness of an opposition. In every case slogans contrive against an individual choice based on reasoned argument and operate sub-rationally to dupe or lull us into acceptance or neutrality.

While one must admit to the absolute necessity of generalized claims concerning the nature and direction of society by those wishing to preserve or transform it, the need for systematic analysis and the resultant categorical generalizations in no way justify an increasing reliance on the slogan as some type of "necessary evil". Rampant sloganeering is equivalent to the admission that above all else the pursuit of power is important and, moreover, that it is irrelevant whether power is achieved by convincing the populace or by cajoling and harrying it into compliance.

While we have unfortunately allowed ourselves to expect and endure the salesmanship of the established parties ("the land is strong"), it is alarming to note its increasing incidence in the groups constituting the remnant of the "new left". The unquickness of the new left, its ability to imagine a society beyond that of the present, coupled with its refusal to engage in the severely circumscribed language and tactics of its forebears in the effort to create that society, is disappearing rapidly under the aegis of a growing doublethink, a new jargon-riddled language incorporating the worst mistakes of its predecessors.

Beyond accepting as common fare the presence of catch phrases and slogans ("off the plg", "end Canadian complicity", "running dog"), which tactically contribute either some nebulous spiritual reinforcement to the user or provide blinders to channel his vision towards the important result, this usage increasingly debases the analytical value of leftist philosophy, systematically reducing it to a small number of universal claims, all of which are expressed by a few, ungrounded key words. Reality becomes simply "capitalism-imperialism", the antidote is the "proletariat" whose short term task is the eradication of the possibility of "fascism"; an endless rhetorical manipulation of these terms in the service of the revolution depletes the positive and once-potent analytic contained within left language while producing, rather than creative insight on the part of the user, subservience or allegiance to a cause already completely defined.

It would, of course, be fallacious to suppose that the effects of slang and jargon are entirely negative: without doubt, used sparingly and carefully they can do much to add colour and interest to our language, and often slang expressions eventually achieve orthodoxy and respectability as a valuable addition to the public vocabulary. This should not obscure the fact, however, that the commonest use of slang is as an interior substitution for the more precise words which in many instances can be more colourful and more interesting, simply because of their higher degree of precision.

In conclusion...

What we must recognize then, is that language, or, more exactly, the kind of language which permits a satisfactory degree of meaningful communication, may no longer be regarded as the exclusive province of pedants and intellectuals; that we can no longer separate the problem of a deteriorating language from the problem of a deteriorating civilization.

Perhaps, the fundamental reason why this decay has been allowed to occur is precisely because this artificial division is unconsciously made in the minds of most people: language is seen as an already developed tool which is serving mankind to its fullest potential; an essential tool, of course, but far less a shaper of society than, say economics, sexuality, or even religion.

Not until we realize as a species that our use of, and attitudes towards, language vitally affect the way in which we think and feel will we be able to progress toward a higher level of civilization. Honest!

HART HOUSE ELECTIONS

Hart House elections are coming up on March 14. Candidates are needed for seven committees which organize activities open to the entire student body. Since these activities are paid for by the students, any student may stand for election to these committees and all are entitled to vote in the elections. The major events of the House are undertaken by the five standing committees - House, Art, Debates, Library and Music. In addition, the Squash and Farm Committees are elected by the entire student body.

The House Committee deals with the functioning of the building - food services, common rooms etc. - and also sponsors programmes and dances such as the Christmas Tree and the New Year's Eve Ball.

The Art Committee organizes the exhibitions in the Gallery, and maintains and adds to the permanent art collection. This involves visits to artist's studios, and private and commercial galleries. The Art Committee is expanding into the area of art films, the most recent being the Museum without Walls series.

The Library Committee is responsible not only for the purchase of books and magazines, but also organizes Library Evenings of informal conversation with literary figures such as Mordecai Richler. In addition, it sponsors readings by poets such as Dorothy Livesay and novelists like Marian Engel.

The Music Committee presents concerts of every kind, classical, jazz and rock, and is responsible for the two record rooms in the House. This year the musical programme has ranged from the popular Sunday afternoon Quartet series to the highly successful Crowbar concert in Convocation Hall.

There are two other committees which provide services for the entire student body, and for which everyone may vote. These are the Farm and Squash Committees. The Farm Committee is responsible for the Hart House Farm in the Caledon Hills. It looks after the physical administration of the farm, and plans a number of activities there such as the Winter Farm Festival. The Squash Committee oversees squash activities in the House, organizing novice instruction and lectures, arranging tournaments, and establishing and maintaining the challenge ladder.

Since Hart House is a major centre of student activities and is run by student fees, every student has a stake in its elections, whether he likes or dislikes what the House does. Election day is March 14. Nominations are open from now until March 7. Nomination forms and election information are available at the Undergraduate Office, Hart House. It's your House; you should take part in its elections.

The Debates Committee sponsors a series of formal and informal debates. The latter are designed to allow students to develop the art of debating in a relaxed atmosphere. The formal evening debates cover a wide variety of topics, and the list of honorary visitors has included prime ministers, cabinet ministers, authors and a variety of controversial figures from the political, academic and social scene.

Crossed picket lines at Honeywell

Students are problem during strikes: author

By FERNANDO TRAFICANTE
Former Toronto Telegram labour reporter Marc Swelling charged Monday that students are indifferent to the problem of strikers during labour disputes. "Students are a tremendous problem during strikes," he contended at a Bellwoods NDP meeting at St. Raymond's School.

Zwelling is the author of the book Strike Breaking.

"In the Honeywell (Instruments) strike" "most of the scabs were students". He explained "they (students) don't look at Honeywell as a place where they will have to work" and will accept any conditions that exist.

Zwelling is trying to familiarize unions and the public with techniques used by professional strike-bearing companies, chief subject for attack in his Ontario Federation of Labour-sponsored book.

At the Dare Foods strike in Kitchener, "Canadian Driver Pool provoked violence and the company went to the courts asking for an injunction" to stop picketing.

"The only thing you have to prove is the likelihood of violence" to obtain an injunction he said. Canadian Driver Pool was a company which advertised itself as professional strikebreakers. The Kitchener city council has asked the provincial government to outlaw strikebreaking companies.

Companies whose only line of business is breaking strikes are something unique to Ontario, said Zwelling, now working for the United Steelworkers of America, which has faced professional strikebreakers in several strikes.

Zwelling accused the provincial government of creating legislation which corporations use to avoid settlement with unions. Licencing of companies as security agencies is a simple process, he said, so new strikebreaking companies "crop up all the time".

Legislation prevents anyone employed as a guard from joining in any union except one composed solely of guards. These unions tend to be weak and lack bargaining power with their employers, he claimed.

Another problem for a striking union, he claimed is that it cannot advertise boycotts of strikebound companies without fear of prosecution. Boycotts in progress now include Dare baked goods, non-union lettuce (boycotted by the United Farm workers) and Kraft products (by the National Farmers Union.)

Zwelling outlined a technique whereby companies involved in strikes dissolve the corporation and start up again as a new company.

Task force recommends close links between FEUT, OISE

Use U of T, OISE resources better: report

By ED PODGORSKI

More effective use should be made of available educational resources at the University of Toronto and at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE), a presidential task force urges.

The Task Force on Education was formed to recommend to president John Evans the most effective ways of inter-relating the resources of OISE and the University of Toronto in the field of education.

The task force suggested that formal cross-appointments between the Faculty of Education (FEUT) and OISE "should be encouraged."

The divisions of the university presently offering undergraduate courses related to education have been encouraged in the report "to draw on the advice and resources of FEUT and OISE in the design and staffing for current and future offerings."

A university-wide Committee on Education was proposed by the task force to "foster genuine interchange of information and views" among educational specialists and professors in other disciplines, as well as to facilitate cross-appointments. The main work would be done by a large number of sub-committees in the disciplines.

Another link would be established if the task force's recommendation of a FEUT-OISE informal liaison committee is adopted. The report also urges that "selected members" of each institution be "invited" to serve on the other's committees, although without voting rights.

The report also recommended that OISE and FEUT in turn "should be encouraged to draw on the advice and resources of those disciplines in the rest of the university in the design and staffing for current and future course offerings related to those disciplines."

The task force decided "to eschew a broad philosophical and historical overview" and, instead, concentrated on arrangements which could be implemented within the next two or three years.

The report carefully noted that it only offered suggestions for Evans' consideration and that it did not "presume to speak officially or formally for any of the three parties concerned."

At present OISE has in effect no undergraduate facilities and FEUT is not engaged in no graduate work.

Graduate studies in education, prior to 1965, were carried on with relatively modest staff and facilities at FEUT, then called the Ontario College of Education.

In 1964, then education minister Bill Davis decided to expand the Department of Educational Research. OISE was then established as an institute chartered as an independent college. OISE and FEUT have since developed in two almost entirely independent directions.

Report pleases top administrators

FEUT and OISE representatives were pleased yesterday that the Presidential Task Force on Education agreed to urge a great degree of cooperation.

OISE coordinator of Graduate Studies George Flower, who has a member of the task force, welcomed the report as a move establishing stronger links with FEUT.

FEUT assistant dean H.O. Barrett, also a task force member, predicted that the "suggested cooperation will be implemented."

Barrett admitted the document was "not a very radical report", but added that time constraints prevented examination of the organization and structure of the two institutions. The report task force had less than two months to complete its report by February 1.

Graduate OISE student Neil Keller resigned shortly after the task force began meeting, complaining that it refused to examine basic principles and reasons for cooperation and went ahead instead assuming a great deal.

Neither FEUT dean O.F. Dadson or OISE director R.W.B. Jackson were available for comment.

Conservatives sweep elections

SUDBURY (CUP) — Conservative students promising more efficient management of student affairs have been elected presidents of the Laurentian, York and Acadia universities student councils.

Students at Laurentian University elected two commerce students to lead their student council during the next academic year.

In an election which surprised all Laurentian political observers, Malcolm Jacobs became student president and running-mate Roger Campeau became vice-president.

The two campaigned on a ticket pledging students an "efficient management team" to run their affairs. They presented an unabashed image as straight, clean-cut commerce lads dedicated to the introduction of sound business principles to the student council bureaucracy, and very little else. The election produced an unusually large student turnout.

Current French-speaking vice-president Réjean Grenier, who was expected to win easily, placed a poor third. Grenier is somewhat of a left-liberal, closely identified with this year's lack-lustre council leadership. But that leadership managed to convince more than 50 percent of Laurentian students to withhold their fees in the abortive Ontario Federation of Students tuition strike which ended earlier this month.

Jacobs and Campeau strongly oppose independence for Lambda, the Laurentian student newspaper. The current council leadership was working on a proposal for severing ties between the council and the paper, assessing a separate publications fee, and incorporating the paper under provincial laws. The proposal failed to pass the last council meeting because it required two-thirds approval. Although it passed 10-0 with one abstention, about half the council was absent. With the conservative victory, Lambda's independence is uncertain.

York University students also elected a conservative student council president by a narrow margin over a candidate backed by the so-called United Left Slate.

Michale Mouritsen, the chairman of the faculty of arts council beat Young Socialist Dale Rich 434-414, but eight members of the United Left Slate won council seats. The Slate included three Trotskyites, 11 supporters of the Waffle and independent leftists. Theobald won a council seat but the legality is being questioned because the former president took only one course this year. Mouritsen apparently favors independence for the campus student paper, Excalibur.

Earlier, students at Acadia University in Wolfville, Nova Scotia, cast a massive protest vote against a student council rule prohibiting a first-year student from running for council president.

Although his name was not on the ballot, some 37 percent of the students voting cast write-in ballots for James Johnson, a former University of New Brunswick student, now in his first year at Acadia. Current vice-president of student affairs, Keith MacKinnon, won 54 percent of the votes and claimed he had gained enough of a mandate to take office. More than 40 percent of the students cast ballots.

Many students demanded a new election with Johnson's name appearing on the ballot, along with MacKinnon's. MacKinnon refused.

Won't release political prisoners

Saigon is violating agreement, says writer

By GARY NEIL

American agriculturalist and writer Don Luce yesterday indicted the government of South Vietnam for jeopardizing the recently signed peace Agreement designed to end the war.

By refusing to release a list of civilian prisoners held in South Vietnam or to begin giving them freedom, the Saigon regime is not keeping to the ceasefire agreements, he told a press conference. It is therefore posing a threat to the development of peace, said Luce who is in Toronto to publicize the plight of the more than 200,000 political prisoners held in South Vietnamese jails.

Luce first went to South Vietnam in 1958 to work as a volunteer agriculturalist in small villages. His political involvement in Vietnam began as he watched the bombing of villages by the American and South Vietnamese Air Forces, and as he saw the displacement of farmers from their land by the Saigon government.

He estimates that about half of the South Vietnamese farm population has been moved to the city slums in an attempt by Saigon to maintain control. This move has caused many problems such as family breakdown and prostitution, he stated, and has increased the people's resentment of, and opposition to, the government.

Luce said that these people and other "neutralists" took part in large mass uprisings in a number of major South Vietnamese cities in 1968. The uprisings were quelled by government bombing of its own territory, including a district of Saigon, because the people in the cities had begun to support the National Liberation Front.

Luce said that the neutralists, who are not communists but who are opposed to the Saigon regime, are the group subjected to the most severe repression. He said further that "to reverse the neutralists is the only way that the Saigon government can stay in power."

Luce made world headlines in 1970 when he revealed the existence of the infamous "tiger cages", small cells in the ground used to jail large numbers of civilians. "Their only crime," Luce contends, "has been to have spoken for peace, or in opposition to the Thieu regime, or even whose relatives have done so."

He says that the situation has not changed since his revelation in 1970; in fact, the United States has awarded a contract to build more tiger cages since that time.

Thousands of men, women, and children continue to be jailed without trial, he claimed, under a special law which allows the police to jail anyone for up to two years, a provision which is renewable.

Everyone in South Vietnam must carry identification with them at all times or face the possibility of jailing, he said.

In addition, as part of a technical assistance deal with the U.S., the South Vietnamese government has begun the compilation of 11.5 million political dossiers, he claimed. These dossiers are intended to document a person's voting habits, any demonstrations he may have attended, or any instances of questioning by the police.

Luce, who recently returned from Hanoi, contended that the North Vietnamese have few political prisoners in comparison to the South. "It's hard to hide any large numbers of political prisoners and if Hanoi had any, the Central Intelligence Agency would hold a news conference to publicize it tomorrow," he said.

The North Vietnamese have recently begun to agitate for the release of civilians imprisoned in South Vietnam. Luce believes that this is one of the reasons why Hanoi is moving more slowly on the release of American Prisoners of War. "If all the POWs are released, then the chances for the emancipation of civilians detained in South Vietnam are greatly reduced."

The question of political prisoners is important because "the jailed teachers, lawyers, students and church leaders are the ones who could bring about a reconciliation of a divided country," Luce feels.

He called on the Canadians in the International Control Commission to expose the plight of the civilian population in the jails. He believes that Canada can help solve many of the problems standing in the way of peace by playing an independent role in the ICC.

He is speaking today on the subject of political South Vietnamese prisoners from 12 to 2 pm in room 2117 Sid Smith.

The South Vietnamese government uses tiger cages to house political prisoners. Over 200,000 prisoners are being detained by Saigon.

Blackburn assails advocates of stack access

U of T Chief librarian Robin Blackburn has taken another swipe at proponents of open access to the stacks of the Robarts Library, suggesting that they are labouring under a "popular misconception".

In his report for the 1971-72 year released recently, Blackburn, long an opponent of open stacks, contends that "much of the discussion (last spring) of the whole issue was plagued by a popular misconception that 'stack access' is the same thing as library access."

Students occupied Simcoe Hall three times in early March in support of open access to the stacks for all members of the university community and the general public. The library, which will contain the main stack collection of the Sigmund Samuel Library is expected to be opened this summer.

Blackburn argues that "there has never been any suggestion that use of the library and its collections should not be available to all comers including the general public," but neglects to mention the conditions he advocated last year for such use.

Undergraduate students who wanted to borrow books would have to order them at the circulation desk, which would have prevented browsing as well as being time-consuming.

The general public would have to obey the same rules, Blackburn suggested — and pay an annual fee of about $50 as well.

The issue of stack access was eventually turned over to the Library Subcommittee of the Governing Council's Academic Affairs Committee, where it has yet to be decided on. The subcommittee was told to recommend a system of differentiated access based on "academic need".

However, a working group within the subcommittee, including associate librarian David Esplin, recently reported that it could not practically and unarbitrarily define differentiated academic need for stack access, and recommended that it be equally available to all students and faculty.

Blackburn attacked the recommendation at last week's subcommittee meeting, referring the subcommittee to its terms of reference.

He suggested giving all faculty and graduate students stack access on request, while undergraduates would have to have written recommendations under particular conditions from teachers to obtain access — and then only during a specified time period.

The subcommittee's decision is expected to be made soon.

U of T, Ottawa University escape province-wide enrolment decline

U of T and the University of Ottawa are the only two Ontario universities to emerge unscathed by a province-wide drop in the number of 1973-74 university applicants, according to raw data released by the Ontario Universities Applications Centre. Not surprisingly, the province's smallest institutions were hit hardest.

The enrolment numbers game is of crucial concern to the universities. Government funding of post-secondary education is determined by the number of students attending the institutions.

Seven hundred more students than last year have indicated U of T as their first choice, with approximately the same numbers as last year picking Toronto as their second and third preferences.

The small University of Ottawa was the only other university to buck the trend, by receiving an impressive increase of 100 applications.

York University, plagued by a serious enrolment drop this year which left the university in poor financial shape and precipitated the resignation of its president, ended up with 1100 less total applicants than last year. Six hundred of this loss came on the very important first choice option.

Brock and Trent applications fell significantly, as did Carleton's. McMaster University got 600 less applicants, University of Waterloo 700 less.

Although Queen's has approximately the same number of applicants as last year, it has 300 less picking it as their first choice.

Western, Guelph, Lakehead, Laurentian all dropped slightly in the total number of applicants.

U of T Director of Admissions Wim Kent stressed the data's limitations, describing them as "very raw, early figures" which have not yet been analyzed. "The only conclusion we can draw... is that we have more first choice applicants than last year," he said.

One discrepancy between the application centre's system and U of T's, Kent pointed out, is the former's practice of counting each application for a different program at the same university as a separate application. U of T regards them as one application.

Nonetheless, Kent said the figures represent a trend. Most of the applicants, he opined, were serious since they had to pay a four dollar application fee and an $11 Service to Admission to Colleges and Universities test fee.

Author attacks role of Viet peace force

By SCOTT WILLOWS

The Canadian military "supervisory" contingent in Vietnam is really "an army of occupation to launch a third Indo-Chinese War", according to Claire Culhane, a former medical administrative assistant for the Canadian government in Vietnam.

Culhane, author of Why is Canada in Viet Nam, made this allegation before a class of political science students Monday.

Culhane first became concerned with Canada's role in Vietnam when five years ago she took part in what she assumed was a serious government hospital program.

However, on arriving at the Vietnamese hospital she found that while essential equipment, such as X-ray machinery was allegedly "late in being delivered", in reality, hospital officials were involved in black market trade. Finally the patients and staff were evacuated to make room for a South Vietnamese army camp, Culhane stated.

When she demanded an investigation of these events by the Canadian government, she received a polite reply "thanking her for her interest in the problem."

Culhane sees present Canadian complicity in Vietnam as "a lever for trade relations with the United States." The Canadian government by its adherence to the defence party Agreement has said in effect, she claims, that "it is not interested in cutting down on profits accumulated by its war related industries."

"We are," Culhane added, "victims of a psychological warfare".

Canadians are conditioned to accept the fact of "American bomber practice on the prairies and torpedo practice in the Arctic." Culhane warned that Canada's present "supervisory" role in Vietnam is in danger of duplicating what happened after the 1954 French-Vietnamese peace settlement.

"It was Canada," she reminded her audience, "along with India and Poland, who over-ruled the Geneva agreement which recommended free elections for the Vietnamese people."

UPI, Swedish confirm reports

Group charges Greek police killed students

Several students were reported killed by police in the Greek city of Salonica February 23 during demonstrations against government interference in education.

According to the U of T chapter of Students for a Free Greece, Swedish television news reported two students were killed and United Press International (UPI) reported four student deaths. The Toronto, York and Ryerson chapters of Students for a Free Greece issued a proclamation declaring solidarity with the Greek students and denouncing the military junta presently controlling the country.

"We condemn the barbaric actions of the junta police. We condemn American imposition of the regime in the context of NATO. We call upon the government of Canada to break off diplomatic relations with the oppressive neo-fascist military regime."

A series of student strikes and demonstrations began in late January in support of demands for student participation in writing the new charter for higher education. The military responded with a conscription decree which is being used against student leaders participating in or inciting strike and protest activities. Students are usually granted draft deferments.

According to Students for a Free Greece, there have been at least five occasions when police acted "wildly" and "mercilessly" to break up rallies and occupations. Trials of students arrested during the unrest are reported to have been conducted "under conditions of terrorism. Even the lawyers are being harassed by the Security Police."

The University of Athens was occupied by 5,000 students as the struggle continued after the trials. The sit-in ended with declaration of a 10-day truce while faculty negotiates student demands — including repeal of conscription — with the military.

The government has refused to yield and has warned newspapers against giving prominent coverage to the struggle.

The Panhellenic Liberation Movement (PAK) and the Committee for the Restoration of Demmocracy in Greece, Rigas Fereos, will hold a mass protest rally in Nathan Phillips Square Sunday afternoon at 4 pm. Andreas Papan-dreou, a cabinet minister in the elected Greek government overthrown in 1967 and leader of PAK, will be the main speaker.

21 General Committee seats go to student incumbents

Twenty-one of 49 student seats on the General Committee of Arts and Science have been filled by incumbents returning for a second year, according to information released by the faculty.

A number of prominent student politicians returned to the committee, the major representative body of the faculty responsible for policy formation.

Governing Council candidates Gord Barnes (also president of Vic's student council), Howie Levitt (New College) and Tom Beckerman are among them.

Also coming back for another year are University College Lit president Vicky Grabb and vice-president Lindsay Kerrigan, St. Mike's SAC representative Alice Anjo, and former SAC cultural affairs commissioner Seymour Kanowitch.

Students remaining on the General committee only include Dana Gishman (New), Henry Reiser (Erin) and Roberta Dods (Extension).

P.A. Burford and William Krock (SMC), by being on the Interdisciplinary Studies Curriculum Committee, are also on the General Committee.

Joseph Halpern (UC) is on the Physical Sciences Committee, (and hence the General Committee) Keith Howlett (New) and Bob Bettson (Trin) are on the Social Sciences Committee, and L. Cohen is on the Committee on Study Elsewhere.

Seymour Applebaum (Innis), Jeff Eisen (New), Brian Gage (Vic) and Ann McKenzie (Ext) and O. Seeler (Erin) are all on the Committee on Counselling.

Information on elections to the remaining seats is available at the faculty office. Nominations close March 5.

Race fear tool of oppression: prof

By SCOTT WILLOWS

The racial anxiety which haunts the "popular white classes" is easily converted into a tool of class oppression by the power elite, claimed University of Wisconsin associate professor of black literature Finlay Campbell Saturday.

Speaking at a workshop in the Students for a Democratic Society teach-in on racism, Campbell noted that any proposed piece of civil rights legislation must be ushered in with a preliminary "fascist scare technique", as policy justification in order to overcome widespread liberal legislative reluctance.

Campbell challenged the heroic myth of America's golden age of Jacksonian democracy. The aristocratic flavour of the original Lockean claims to freedom which influenced the Declaration of Independence has become a collection of computer-age nightmares, in which the economic process of capitalism has asserted the existence of only two classes of individuals: "Those who owns and those who are owned."

Minority groups, stated Campbell, are encouraged by governments to assume their ageless role as psychological whipping-boy.

It is in the government's best interest to keep the classes divided, he said. The fear of the white man and the threat of the black man are used to keep their attention away from those in power and places the masses in a state of general immobility.

Blues overpower York 8-2; semi-finals next

By PETER DUX

University of Toronto Blues notched yet another win and advanced to the finals of the OUA's Eastern Section by defeating York Yeomen 8-2 last night at Varsity Arena.

York might have had a chance if not for a quick five goals in the first period — two each by Bill Buba and Ivan McFarlane, and a single by Blues captain Gord Davies. The opening 20 minutes resembled a Blues — Ryerson game, with Varsity taking control right from the opening faceoff, and going on to outshoot York 21-4 in that period.

Just after the first minute mark of the period captain Davies deflected a screened slapshot by Rick Leroy from the point past a cleanly beaten Yeomen goaltender Greg Harrison.

Buba's two goals — one on a power play — came off good positional plays from the lip of the crease, with assists from Bill Fifield on one, and McFarlane and Bruce Herridge on the other.

On the first of McFarlane's goals, York defencemen Murray Spence initially took the puck away from a Blues player and dropped the pass back only to have it picked up by McFarlane who snapped a quick wrist shot from Harrison's left side.

On another fine individual play, McFarlane won the faceoff just outside the blue line and slipped the puck quickly past an obviously surprised Harrison.

In the second period, York attempted to slow Blues down the only way a team can — by checking furiously. The plan appeared to work, since York then was able to score the lone goal of the period. And indication of the forechecking by York, and Blues defensive maneuvers was the relative decrease in the shots on goal ratio — this time Blues only outshot the Yeomen 14-8.

The only goal came midway, through the period by right winger Steve Mitchell. Toronto's defence looked bad on the play — as did the rest of the team all through the period. However, left winger Mitchell trapped a pass from Ron Maack in the Varsity end and flicked the puck in from the slot. Only York's two powerplays helped to relieve the relative monotony of the period. Yeomen goalie Greg Harrison had his only moments of glory in the game during this period thwarting Blues' numerous chances from close-in.

The final 20 minutes saw much of the same checking game, with Blues playing York's checking game and eventually outscoring Yeomen 3-1. Neil Korzack added two goals to Blues' lead, both times off assists by fellow linemen Don Pagnutti and Kent Ruhnke.

One goal was briefly disputed since it went off Korzack's leg and in behind Harrison. Blues even played well short-handed, with Fifield adding a goal. York's Andrew Sanderson scored Yeomen's only other goal of the game.

Blues Notes: Ex-Blue's captain John Wright, now with Vancouver Canucks of the NHL, was at the game along with Maple Leaf scout Johnny Bower, who was particularly impressed with Anderson and Munro... Bob Nadin, an OHA referee, plus two OHA linesmen officiated last night, perhaps a good move after some of the officiating over the past season... Blues meet the winner of the Waterloo-Guelph game at 6:30 pm Friday, one-half of a double-header. The second game sees the winner of the Laurentian-Queen's game play the winner of the Western-Windsor contest. If Blues win (?) they will be in the OUA final game Saturday at 8 pm and in contention for the Queen's Cup — awarded to the top team in the OUA.

All three games will be played at Varsity Arena and carried live over Radio Varsity... Blues were wearing sweaters designated for Toronto Maple Leaf's playoff games, which were lent to them since Leafs' chances of a playoff sport are doubtful...

SAC hacks Varsity players, 3-2

In a highly disputed game Friday morning (1 am), the SAC ball hockey team, which included players with questionable credentials, slashed and kicked their way to victory over a highly spirited team composed of Varsity staffers.

The final score of 3-2 is being investigated by an international gaming body.

Controversy arose when the SAC failed to provide enough bodies to fill a regulation team. Eric 'offside' Miglin had bought along his brother Sven 'the elbow' to augment the SAC forces.

Instead of playing short-handed the SAC was granted two players by The Varsity — Bob 'opportunist' Betson and Briane 'big mouth' Nasimok, the former playing defence, and the latter highly offensive (with two, count 'em, two assists).

After Sven Miglin took the SAC to an early lead Ulli 'slapshot' Diemer tied the score. SAC made the score 3-1 before Linda 'token' McQuaig passed to Lorne 'scoop' Slotnick to narrow the score.

Unbiased officials are looking into the alleged drug charges against the Miglin boys. The Varsity has demanded a rematch, but the SAC is reluctant to oblige.

Women pressured to open facilities

Only a short jog across campus from the men's antiquated athletics "palace" lies the secluded women's "exercise" building known as "the Benson".

Enviably by the male jocks on the St. George Campus, "the Benson" was first opened in October, 1959, as the new home of women's physical education.

In less than 14 years the building has slowly undergone a change of life, first dropping the women's compulsory athletic program, and then allowing the men into the building for the first time in its history, even if only for special events.

Although women's Director of Athletics and Physical Education Anne Hewett told The Varsity that "the women's program pretty well uses the building at the moment", most men athletes canvassed in Hart House, as well as their coaches, would probably express some reservations about their inability to gain access to the Benson because of supposed capacity use.

The University of Toronto is the only university in the province where facilities are not shared and there is no coed program.

Hewett claims, however, that "the men can use it (the building) if they pay for it" - that is, for janitorial staff and staff to keep the building open. (At the present time, operating within the annual women's athletic budget, the building is closed from 9 pm on the evenings and all day Saturday and Sunday, except for special events and occasions.)

Hewett said, "we are open after 9 pm, but not on a regular basis." She added that maintenance was one problem in keeping the building open past normal hours, but equipment breakage had made the administrators at the Benson skeptical of opening their doors to the men who could be expected to fully use the (by comparison with Hart House) palatial facilities. At present men do use the building for mixed badminton games, some intercollegiate basketball games, and for some practice time for part of the men's intercollegiate swim team.

For these and other reasons Hewett said she would prefer to see the building have "another year of semi-controlled use". As it is, she has had complaints from four men staff members in the Benson on the condition of the men's locker room after male athletes from Hart House have been permitted to use the building.

Facilities have apparently been abused and equipment (kept in unlocked bins in the main gyms, since the building has no equipment room as such for storage) has been either stolen or broken, on occasion, when men have been allowed into the building, according to Hewett.

However, the women athletes seem to have had trouble with their equipment control almost since the time of the first organized athletic club on campus. A.E. Marie Parkes, Secretary-Treasurer of the Women's Athletic Association from 1922-1959, wrote in her book The Development of Women's Athletics at the University of Toronto (published in 1961):

"In 1897 the (Tennis) Club obtained the use of courts at Bloor Street and Avenue Road, which were "rather far from the college". A sad note is injected in 1899 when some miscreant broke into the room housing equipment and stole balls and racquets, and, worst of all, 'our mirror, which will be sorely missed' "

Building problems

The building contains a pool 75 feet by 42 feet with both one and three metre diving boards, five gymnasias, a dance studio, staff offices, common rooms and locker rooms, the Margaret Eaton Library and Reading Room. As well, smaller areas include lecture, seminar and study rooms, and indoor archery range, golf cages, and equipment areas.

Apparently the construction of the women's athletic building went through a long period of difficulty similar to that now being experienced by the proposals for the men's building. Parkes wrote in her book: "... the pressure had been building up for over 40 years for a Women's Athletic Building. Faculty and students, alumnae and parents all worked to this end, and hope ebbed and flowed as the years went on. Plans were drawn and a location was first selected in 1925 and 30 years and a half-dozen locations later nothing had really happened. Then one day a hole was dug in the ground at Huron and Harbord Streets. A blue fence went up. Steel girders and brick walls appeared above the fence."

Given the existing situation of physical separation between the men's and women's buildings and programs, Parkes ironically recalls that "officials of the Men's Athletic Association have proved true friends of the women athletes throughout the years. The use of the Hart House gymnasium and pool was given to the women every year for the intramural basketball finals and swimming meet and for any intercollegiate events to be held in Toronto. The stadium was made available for softball and archery, and generous assistance was given in organizing hockey schedules and in many other ways."

Varsity basketball Blues play some home games in the Benson Sports Gym.

Elsewhere, Parkes notes that "Thanks are also due to ... Mr. T.A. Reed, Financial Secretary of the Men's Association, must be mentioned particularly, not only for his assistance in drawing up the Constitution, but for his continuing helpfulness throughout the years in all matters affecting women's athletics." The men would now probably appreciate some reciprocation on the women's part.

Hewett expressed the opinion that the main difference between the men's and women's athletic programs at U of T was in respect to priorities and emphasis. She defined the women's priorities as being "instruction, involvement of the women on campus in the physical activities program, and, secondarily, intercollegiate activities and the School of Physical and Health Education."

Hewett said that "women won't participate the way men do. Although this might be changed, I think there'll always be a hesitation of spontaneous play since it's not a natural female activity. It's one of those things society doesn't accept," she added.

Apparently, the "society" of the Benson Building hasn't changed its values and attitudes to a great extent over the years. Parkes wrote that, for example, "on January 19, 1910, a special meeting had to be called to discuss hockey problems and a motion was passed" to eliminate body-checking, which means that no shoving of a person into the boards by using bodily strength would be permitted. A similar meeting has been called almost every year since, and fifty years later this problem is still with us." (No where does Parkes mention why she considers "body-checking" a "problem".)

Hewett believes that men have different priorities with different emphases. She said that "Basically they're trying to provide competitive opportunity more than a recreational level (of athletics). There's more opportunity for competition than for education in the men's programme," she added.

In response to a question on the criticism of the level of response by the Benson administration to the desires of certain women for the establishment of a track club, Hewett told The Varsity that "in 1966 or 1967 we had hired Gwen Powell and Jill Fisher for track practices. Maybe one or two people showed up but we had no significant response. Their duties have since been transferred and people have other responsibilities."

However, at the first meeting of the Women's Athletic Association Directorate in December a women's track and field club was established. Hewett said that she got together with men's track coach Andy Higgins, and the club will participate next season in intercollegiate track meets.

Benson Structure

The women presently pay an athletic fee of $10 per year, 10 per cent of which goes to the university of Toronto Athletic Association (Men) for a share of stadium and arena maintenance. In effect, the women's operating budget consists of the number of undergraduate women - approximately 8,200 times the fee, less 10 per cent, according to Hewett. "We receive nothing from the university administration", she said.

Other income comes from locker rental for approximately 2,600 lockers in the building (all of which are rented this year for the first time), a small amount on facility rental, and investment interest of between 10 and 12 per cent on the women's assets amounting to some $225,000.

Of the total budget, approximately $26,000 goes to team travel, Hewett said, while other items include facility rental, and equipment for the instructional program.

Hewett said "the budget is available for anyone to see." She also suggested that "a men's directorate representative should sit on the women's athletic directorate and a woman on the men's", to facilitate better communication between the two organizations.

Furthermore, unlike the men's, the women's directorate meetings "are open for observers if there's space for them in the room", according to Hewett. (Although the men agreed in principle last month to make their meetings open, they appear to be stalling to prevent openness from going through this year.)

Staff instructors in the department carry a full teaching load of approximately 19 hours each per week on the average, according to Hewett, as well as four hours of coaching. There are 14 regular staff connected with the building, as well as four part-time staff.

The staff teaches a total of approximately 36 hours per week in the School of Physical and Health Education. Hewett said it would be a good set-up if the university did recognize the school, "then there would be mutual assistance - no one can assist us with our program yet we assist others."

The Women's athletic directorate is considerably more democratic in structure than its counterpart on the men's side. Whereas there are only seven out of 20 student representatives on the men's directorate, 15 of 22 members on the women's directorate are students. Since the women students do pay all the operating costs the potential for control of these costs is open to them.

The directorate has "complete jurisdiction over the affairs of all Women's University Athletic Associations. The Constitutions and By-Laws of the Women's Athletic Associations of the Colleges, Faculties, and Schools shall be submitted to the Directorate for ratification and no amendment thereto shall be effective until approval by the Directorate. . . The Directorate, through the Secretary-Treasurer, shall control the funds of the Women's Athletic Association."

When questioned what would happen if students decided, by virtue of their majority in the Directorate, to greatly change the policy and priorities of the WAA, Hewett said "the tone of the department would change, and there would be resignations. There's no way the women will give their time in a way they don't want to", she said.

Hewett said that there are basically no internal problems within the women's department, "except maybe some more than others think to win is more important" than to play or to gain instruction.

The WAA directorate presently falls under the campus services portfolio (Internal Affairs) headed by Jill Conway, for major changes in policy, according to Hewett. The budget is presently submitted to the Vice-President (Business Affairs) Alex Rankin, Hewett said, "but Jill Conway is involved in it." In the past the administration chain of reference for the WAA has been through Jack Sword, Vice-President and Provost Oon Foster, Vice-President (student services) Robin Ross, and, finally, Jill Conway.

Police meet on math sit-in Metro police yesterday held a conference with U of T police, while occupying students dug in on the fourth floor of Sid Smith, awaiting a visit from associate math chairman Ray Vanstone this morning.

The student occupiers are hopeful that Vanstone's visit will lead to a break in the situation, which remains stalemated after the math department's second long staff meeting of the day. The motions instruct Math chairman George Duff to establish one committee to look into first year teaching, and another to report "with due speed" on the "structure and governance" of the department. The students felt that neither of two motions passed by the meeting did more than begin to address their demands.

The students are demanding the reinstatement of professor Stephen Salaff, the offering of tenure to David Spring and Michael Mather, and the establishment of a student voice in staffing. Two hundred of them seized the math department on Tuesday after chairman Duff refused to answer directly the demands before 300 students at a rally. About 50 have been staying overnight in the building, vowing to stay on until the demands are met.

The occupiers received support yesterday, the third day of the occupation, for their struggle from the Graduate Students Union executive. As well, a petition supporting the reinstatement demand and a student voice in staffing was gathering faculty signatures last night.

After metro police in New College were overheard telephoning the campus police headquarters, math student Kevin McQuillan followed the metro cops there to the Borden Building, where a short meeting took place.

The secretaries of both president John Evans and internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway said their bosses were out at meetings when phoned by McQuillan. Conway's secretary said "she's dealing with that matter right now" when questioned about the police presence on campus, McQuillan reported.

After Wednesday's noon-hour rally, a meeting between math students, Evans, Conway, Duff, vice-president Don Forster and arts and science dean Bob Greene led to another discussion, held that night between five math professors and five math students.

Although the meeting itself was a concession, as the administration had insisted previously that the occupation end before discussion began, no new developments arose from it.

The student negotiators reported that Duff and the professors indicated they were willing to have further discussion on student participation in decision-making, but no concessions were made on the students' demand for "an immediate and effective" student voice". The professors refused to discuss the jobs of Salaff, Spring and Mather.

After yesterday's two staff meetings, several interested professors dropped in on the occupation to discuss the department's motions.

Professor Peter Rosenthal told the students, "You've done the math department a considerable favour. For the first time people are questioning the structures that led to the firings".

He noted, however, that most staff want "nothing to do with the occupation" officially, and quoted professor I. Halperin as saying "the department does not want to negotiate with the fourth floor".

Some students would be involved on the committee "to consider the problem of teaching" in first year service courses. Service courses, those with large enrollments from outside the department, are the focus of "the chief acknowledged complaint" of the occupation, according to Salaff.

The occupiers felt that setting up this committee did not deal with either of their demands, but there ensued a lengthy discussion with professor Edward Barbeau on the non-renewal of Salaff's contract. He felt that professors who were disturbed by the dismissal remained silent because of a feeling of "collegiality" within the staff.

When asked what some of the reasons for Salaff's firing were, Barbeau said "Many of my colleagues feel that if you work together in a department, you should work together".

He noted that Vanstone, professor Doug Clarke and himself were making this morning's visit "as individuals." Students expect the visit to lead to discussion of the merits of Salaff's case, which the administration has so far said should be referred to "normal appeal channels".

Code would expel students for demos, sit-ins

By TOM WALKOM

A tough new discipline code that would automatically ban student occupations and sit-ins, and make participants liable to expulsion from university will be presented to the Governing Council by the end of April.

Under the new code, passed last week by the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee, sit-ins like the present occupation to protest math department hiring policies would be explicitly prohibited by the university.

And each of the 100 students that occupied math chairman George Duff's office Tuesday would be eligible for penalty ranging anywhere from a fine to expulsion, under the provisions of the code co-authored by Internal Affairs chairman Paul Cadario, a student, and vice-president Jill Conway.

The Cadario-Conway report makes no differentiation between disruptions that are violent, and those such as a non-violent occupation, that merely obstruct.

In failing to make this distinction, the report runs directly contrary to the university's original recommendations on discipline, prepared in September, 1969 under the chairmanship of political economy professor Ralph Campbell. Campbell is now principal of Scarborough College.

The Campbell Report specifically differentiated between three types of student action: peaceful demonstration, violent disruption, and non-violent disruption. The Campbell Report only wanted to ban outright violent disruption.

It specifically repudiated any notion of using automatic procedures to deal with "disruptive demonstrations that do not clearly endanger the safety of persons or do not destroy the valuable property of the university."

Instead, the report called for negotiations between the university and all people involved in a disruptive, non-violent demonstration.

The Cadario-Conway report would permit only demonstrations, like marches, that do not at all interfere with "teaching, research, administration... or any other authorized activity on university premises, including public service activities of the university."

Students participating in the math occupation and six previous demonstrations could have been expelled if the behaviour code were in effect. See page 3 for details.

The Cadario-Conway code would allow individuals to be brought before a university discipline tribunal. This tribunal, after determining if the individual had participated in an obstructive demonstration, would be able to impose a penalty of anything up to suspension. Expulsion of a student could be effected by the Governing Council on the recommendation of the president.

The university administration rushed to complete the Campbell Report during a discipline crisis in the fall of 1969.

After a series of student disruptions early in the term, then university president Claude Bissell backed a series of law and order guidelines to deal with disruptive demonstrations. These guidelines would have obligated a university president to suspend any student engaged in a disruptive demonstration, after giving one warning.

Like the Cadario-Conway proposals, these guidelines did not differentiate between violent and non-violent disruptions.

Students reacted angrily to Bissell's stand. A series of mass meetings crystallized student opposition to the guidelines and SAC voted overwhelmingly that Bissell disassociate himself from them. Even SAC president Gus Abols, generally regarded as a moderate student leader, demanded Bissell withdraw from his tough position.

In response to this, the administration pushed the Campbell Report to abrupt conclusion. Faced with a week-long ultimatum by SAC, Bissell backed down in favour of the more liberal Campbell recommendations.

However, because of stiff faculty opposition, the Campbell recommendations went through one and a half years of stalemate in committee, before frustrated students finally pulled out.

Discipline recommendations were dumped in the lap of the new Governing Council.

And, even though the new code essentially returns discipline procedures to the guidelines of three years ago that students so angrily reacted against, co-author Cadario thinks his proposal will breeze through the Governing Council.

U du Q threatens to cancel some courses

MONTREAL (CUPI) — The administration of l'Université du Québec à Montréal in its latest move against the several thousand students currently on strike has decided to prolong the winter term for five weeks until May 25, and to annul any courses or activities that are not resumed by today.

The UQAM students, however, are still going through with their demonstration planned for this morning. Along with fellow strikers from the Université de Montréal, and students from the Rosemount and Maisonneuve CEGEPS, they will march to the Palais de Justice in support of 10 students who will appear in court today.

The students were named in the injunction the administration obtained last week to break the five-week old strike.

The administration warned that no credit will be given for any course unless it resumes today and continues uninterrupted until the end of the school term.

The UQAM teachers, who have been holding study sessions this past week in protest against the injunction, met last night to decide how they will counter this latest move by the administration. The administration has already declared their study sessions illegal, and at press time no decision had been reached, but informed sources believe the teachers will vote to return to classes.

However, a spokeswoman for COPE, the student strike coordinating committee, said last night that students would continue to boycott classes regardless of the teachers' actions.

The student strikers have formed "Groupes d'intervention" to ensure that courses are not given. Clashes with the university's security guards have occurred. The groups have also been visiting the CEGEPS during the past week to explain the present dilemma to the prospective university students.

The main issue in the strike is the move by the Quebec government to change the fee payment deadlines for Québécois universities. Up until now Québécois students have not had to pay their fees at the beginning of the school term like English-speaking students and could effectively delay payment for several years.

A spokesman for COPE says that if the new rules are implemented, approximately 3,000 UQAM students will be forced out of school. The students affected come from working class families.

Because of the student protest, the government has "officially" withdrawn from the controversy and handed over implementation of the rules to the university administration.

The students refuse to discuss repayment of fees until they receive a collective agreement from the authorities that they will not have to begin payment of fees until at least three years after graduation and only if they find employment in their specialized field of study.

The UQAM students next course of action after today's demonstration will be decided at a COPE-sponsored general assembly to be held on Sunday.

At U de M the administration obtained a court injunction yesterday to put an end to the two-week old strike there by the social science students.

Campbell hits Tories

By BILL HUTUL

"An apparent lack of policy" characterizes the present provincial government, claimed Margaret Campbell at a students' Liberal Party meeting yesterday in the Hart House Debates Room.

Liberal runner Margaret Campbell

Campbell, Liberal candidate for the St. George riding in the March 15 by-election, said that she resigned as a Family Court judge in order to run against the present "monolithic" Tory government.

The candidate explained that the government's attitude toward community planning doesn't adequately consider the feelings of members of that community.

The community issue has been very important to her. Campbell claimed to have been leader of the opposition to the Spadina Expressway.

She fought the expressway as City of Toronto controller from 1966 to 69, and during her unsuccessful campaign for the mayoralty in late 1969.

Her opposition dates back to 1961-62, when she requested the Metropolitan Transportation Committee to delay development until expert testimony could be given on the consequences of constructing the expressway. She claimed that "at no time can we justify the destruction of a city for the building of a road."

The provincial government's education policy was also attacked by Campbell for being inconsistent. While the government maintains that equal opportunities should be available, the recently released Commission on Post-Secondary Education report proposes a hike in tuition fees.

She did not mention what she proposes as an alternative to present education policies.

Campbell described her career beginning as an alderman and controller in Toronto from 1958 to 1969. After her unsuccessful bid for mayor in 1969, she became a Family Court judge June 1, 1971.

Conservative Roy McMurty, Ellen Adams (NDP), and Communist Party member Brian Mossop are running against Campbell.

Budget forces library to cut book purchases

Faced with a $100,000 budget cut, the U of T library system will be forced to reduce its book purchases by 10 per cent next year, chief librarian Robert Blackburn revealed

Math students vow not to give in

By GREG McMASTER

Math Student Bill Andrews summed up the spirit of Wednesday's rally to build the math occupation when he closed off his speech saying "The question isn't whether or not we're going to win, the question is how soon we're going to win."

The need to strengthen the occupiers' forces was stressed by several speakers, including dismissed professor Stephen Salaff, who said "It takes support from all students to advance democratic decision-making on this campus. Please make the math struggle your struggle as well."

Discussion centred on administration suggestions for meetings. Math student Dave Weber described these as "a type of trip on the part of the department to get us out of here. We have to prove to math chairman George Duff that we're not going to leave on hopes of some kind of meeting."

The initial administration offers for discussion were contingent on the occupation ending, but since a student meeting with president John Evans after the rally, this has not been insisted upon. Exchanges with dean Bob Greene and math professors have focused upon the various appeal mechanisms available to the fired professors, but not on the demand that they be given their jobs. There have been offers to have "substantive discussions" on student control of staffing, but with no guarantees that the students demands for an "immediate and effective" voice will be met.

Andrews pointed out that, until the occupation, "We've had nothing. When the sit-in came, they're running around like chickens with their heads cut off."

There have been three mathematics staff meetings of several hours each in the past two days.

Andrews added, "They've tried to get us to leave with no guarantee that Duff wouldn't talk about his textbooks, let alone make concessions."

Stephen Salaff, the professor whose contract has not been reviewed, spoke about "a secret meeting, for which some professors were called, and others were not".

He said that the meeting was held early that morning, and was attended by a group of "sectarian, authority-bound and narrow-minded" professors "to discuss the magnificent student occupation of yesterday."

The professors who were not invited included "three senior professors and several who are up for tenure" according to Salaff. He said the meeting passed a resolution which dealt with "nothing at all" except "discussion with committees."

The minutes of the meeting show that the math Curriculum Committee is instructed to consider "all aspects to be in the first year courses", and that members of the department are committed themselves to investigating "student dissatisfaction with first-year courses and to consider seriously the policies in the department with respect to hiring and tenure at a department meeting in the near future."

Salaff felt that progress could continue only if students maintain "their concern, support and pressure. It is not business as usual."

Salaff referred to Carver Scobie, a first year math student, whom he said, "was physically pushed and shoved" out of a faculty tea by "one of these sectarian professors", who said, according to Salaff, "We're mathematicians; we don't want your kind of person in here."

Past expulsions with code?

If proposed new discipline guidelines were in force now, all the students who have participated in the occupation protesting three math professors' dismissals would all be eligible for expulsion.

Past student actions that could have involved expulsion for participants if the proposed code had been in force include:

- last spring's occupation of Simcoe Hall by about 1000 students to protest the university's library policy and use of Metro police to break up an earlier demonstration.

- the student occupation of Simcoe Hall in the spring of 1970 to protest the university's daycare policy. This ended with the university agreeing to fund a daycare centre.

- the student occupation of Sidney Smith Hall in the spring of 1971 to protest insufficient student representation in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

- an overnight sit-in staged in the main U of T library last February to publicize student complaints about restricted library access.

- the picketing of a Victoria College parking lot last January by Vic students who wanted the lot turned into a playing field. The students successfully prevented all but two cars from entering the lot.

- the occupation (which has gone on for over nine months) of an unused clubhouse on Devonshire Place by parents and children of the Campus Co-operative Daycare Centre.

The library, which buys over 100,000 books every year to update and expand its collection, will have to cut its buying in "number and quality", Blackburn said.

Book acquisition seems to be bearing the brunt of the budget slice, since Blackburn anticipates no cuts in library staff or hours.

There will be reductions, however, in the number of staff working in service positions such as reference and cataloguing.

No lay-offs will be necessary, however, Blackburn predicts. The number of staff will be reduced by not filling positions left vacant when the members of the present staff retire or resign.

The budget cut comes at a particularly crucial time for the library system, with the opening of the new Roberts Library only months away.

Clarice Henschel, a member of the library committee of the Governing Council, said she was amazed that the library's budget would be cut at a time when its expenses will rise significantly with the opening of the new library.

"I wouldn't have been surprised, in fact, if its budget had been increased by $3,000,000 with all the new expenses that are involved," she said.

Asked if he thought the library system could survive the cuts, Blackburn answered, "It will be difficult."

Although the provincial government paid for the Roberts building, it has not set aside special funds to pay for its considerable operating costs, according to Joyce Denyer, a member of the budget committee.

The extra maintenance cost alone for the university to keep up the new library will be about $200,000 a year.

Some new library staff will be hired for the new building, but most will be transferred from other branches of the U of T library system around campus, some of which will close when the Roberts complex opens.

As well as cutting back book purchases, the library plans to eliminate special service features, such as the privilege professors currently enjoy of having books delivered to their departments upon request. See story on budget delays, page 17.

Slates clash over sit-in

By BOB BETTSON

Four of the five slates contesting the SAC presidential elections clashed yesterday over the degree of support each has shown for this week's student occupation of the mathematics department offices. The fifth slate, headed by Peter Baumann (UC II), did not appear.

Engineering presidential candidate Chuck Vickery said that he would support it as long as it was "non-violent and non-obstructive".

He was challenged from the meager Sid Smith foyer audience by Arts and Science Student Union fieldworker Dave Depoe, who called the occupation obstructive because Duff was not allowed access to his office.

Vickery had claimed that as long as professors had access to their offices it fulfilled his criteria for support. He did not respond to Depoe's barb.

The only contenders to come out in full support of the occupation were the United Socialist slate and the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee slate.

Greg McMaster of the Old Mole charged that the lack of involvement of the other slates in the occupation was indicative of the general lack of leadership given by SAC in the past.

He challenged the other slates to respond to his charges. His presidential running mate, Young Socialist Heather Ridout, said she was personally involved in the math struggle and maintained that SAC should "provide resources and help students to organize their struggles to achieve a real learning experience."

Presidential candidate Bob Anderson questioned the further effectiveness of the occupation as a tactic. He claimed that while he supported the demands of the occupiers, continuing the occupation would reduce active support in the department.

"The movement must regain its mass nature. The occupation should be ended in the near future," he added.

Havers said merely that he supported the occupation, stating he had to leave to attend the trials of two women arrested three weeks ago when police tried to open an SSSC picket line outside the 215 Huron fees office.

He said, however, that "I will send my engineering vice-presidential candidate George Huzcek up to join the occupation."

Laughter arose from the audience. Earlier Vickery had revealed an extensive platform amid considerable heckling. He said that a reduced SAC fee would be possible with cuts in the campus centre levy, communications, administration and by pulling out of the Ontario Federation of Students.

Stressing fiscal responsibility,

Vickery promised "maximum services, full scale preparation for next year, an extensive orientation and food and communications surveys." SAC completed a campus food survey earlier this year; an intended communications survey has not been carried out.

"SAC should mobilize to get a serious student response to the Commission on Post-Secondary Education report and oppose the contingency repayment plan it proposes," he stated.

Vickery also advocated a SAC fees rebate for Scarborough and Erindale as well as integration of athletic facilities.

He urged a "speedy solution to the daycare problem," but did not elaborate. The Devonshire occupation by Campus Co-op Day Centre is over nine months old.

Anderson asserted that the "fiscal responsibility" offered by the Vickery slate "is not enough."

"The students' council must have goals," he maintained. Anderson, a member of the New Program Review Committee, said one of his priorities would be the improvement of teaching throughout the university.

McMaster, speaking for the United Socialist Slate, stressed the importance of SAC leading opposition to the cutbacks in education.

Staff meeting

All Varsity hacks are urged to attend today's very important staff meeting. Financial wizard and editor Alex Podnick will unveil The Varsity's Finance Committee budget proposals for next year.

The staff choice for editorial tyrant will also be revealed, and a policy will be formulated on which SAC slate has a "correct line". Discussion on next year's paper will be encouraged.

The excitement begins at 1 pm at 91 St. George Street. Admission is free.

U of Q backs math occupation

U of T students occupying the math department received the following message on Wednesday from the strike committee representing the 12,000 students who have been on strike at the U of Q a Montreal since January 26: "Dear comrades, greetings from Quebec students fighting against the anti-student offensive of the Quebec government and local university administration. We offer 100 per cent solidarity in your struggle against the repression of radical math profs. International solidarity.

"Signed, Comite d'Organisation Provisoire des Etudiants."

In return, the U of T students sent a similar message, proclaiming support for their "fight against the anti-student offensive."

Behaviour code would unjustly silence dissent

The university's proposed behaviour code represents an intemperate attempt to effectively silence student dissent, dissent which has boiled over into several occupations in recent years.

The code, drafted by Internal Affairs Committee student chairman Paul Cadario and internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway, would ban student occupations and sit-ins, hanging the threat of possible expulsion over the heads of students who ignore its guidelines. It makes no attempt to distinguish between violent and non-violent disruptions, only allowing demonstrations which in no way interfere with the functioning of the university.

The Cadario-Conway proposal, already endorsed by the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee, would outlaw any activity which would interfere with "teaching, research, administration... or any other authorized activity on university premises, including public service activities of this university".

Individuals accused of violating the code would be tried by a university discipline tribunal which would determine whether they participated in a disruption and impose penalties as severe as suspension on those found guilty.

The code would push the university back to the days predating the writing of the Campbell Report, a presidential advisory committee report which rejects the hard line taken by Cadario and Conway. That document, supposedly the basis for the new guidelines, differentiates — unlike the current proposal — between violent and non-violent disruptions, reserving its prohibition for the former.

The Cadario-Conway law and order report ignores the legitimate role disruptions play in exposing widespread student dissent. All too often, university administrators, blind to the injustice of a particular situation, only discover the merit of the dissenters' cause following a disruption. "A... disruptive demonstration may prove to be justified", the Campbell Report concludes, going on to advocate that any "negotiations concerning a demonstration should be addressed as much as possible to the substantive issues of the demonstration and not just to the disruptiveness".

Too often in the past, students have had to turn to disruptive tactics to force the university to deal with major areas of dissent. And, the Cadario-Conway scheme, had it been in effect at those times, would have pre-empted such activity — except on risk of expulsion; would have worked to perpetuate the injustices reluctant administrators eventually conceded had existed.

It's not as if U of T students have been known to go on wild rampages just because they can't get their way. Quite the contrary, disruptions have only followed long months of trying to get the student point across to an administration which, unfortunately, all too often rejects automatically student initiatives and criticism.

It was only after months of vainly trying to get through to math department chairman George Duff that students resorted to occupying the department offices to express their discontent. That university officials have suddenly found some merit in the student dissent within the last couple of days betrays an administration predisposed to respond to confrontation rather than other expressions of dissatisfaction.

Nonetheless, the Cadario-Conway guidelines would prohibit the math department occupation, threatening the occupiers with severe penalties for championing their convictions.

Similarly, the 1971 arts and science occupation of Sid Smith followed on the heels of months of discussion and reasoned argument aimed at securing a meaningful say for students in the running of the university and, consequently, about the type of education they would receive. Months of discussion which, readers should recall, were reduced to nought when conservative faculty mustered their forces to overturn an arts and science general committee decision establishing a parity committee to recommend restructuring of the faculty council.

And, again last year, months of reasoned debate failed to influence the Library Council and the university's academic Senate in formulating access policy for the John Roberts Library. It was only after students occupied Simcoe Hall twice that the university was willing to seriously consider altering its proposals. (Interestingly, a year later, a Governing Council sub-committee admitted that one of the major points of contention between students and the administration — restricting access to the Roberts stacks according to something called "academic need" — was impractical.)

None of these legitimate disruptions caused serious harm to the university, while on the contrary they won at least partial victory for reasonable student demands. Yet, the new law and order edict would have banned these expressions of student feeling, feeling which each time the administration claimed did not exist — until students came out in the hundreds to prove them wrong.

There can be no reasonable grounds for outlawing disruptions which do not pose an actual threat of injury or excessive damage.

As for the penalties proposal, there similarly can be no basis for punishing students for expressing their dissent in a direct manner when there has been no physical injury or widespread damage. The behaviour code should not be used as a club to intimidate students from making their views known in whatever manner proves appropriate.

The Internal Affairs Committee would have been better advised to have spent its time working out a reasonable behaviour code rather than haggling over details of a tribunal model which proves relatively useless in the face of the code's edict against disruptions.

The Academic Affairs Committee, to its credit, refused to rush the proposals through in time for Cadario to get them on this month's Governing Council agenda. The Cadario-Conway prohibitions against disruptions should die in committee. They do not deserve to reach the full council; they have no merit.

And, if Cadario and Conway manage to push the proposals through the Governing Council, the university should not be so unwise as to assume that mere rules and threats will intimidate students into sacrificing legitimate modes of expression for just causes.

Didn't just slip past "our" reps

There's been lots of talk about the merit of student representation on the university's decision-making bodies. We certainly agree that effective, articulate student representation is worthwhile.

However, we cannot help but question the effectiveness and representivity of those students serving on the Internal Affairs Committee — Paul Cadario, Clarice Henschel, Ian Morrison, and Norma Grindel. One of them — Grindal — contesting her position anew in the current Governing Council elections.

These supposed student representatives sat on the committee which endorsed the proposal to outlaw all student disruptions. Grindal has a lot of explaining to do before she merits a second term. (Unfortunately, the other three may more easily get off without having to account to their constituents.)

Committee chairman Cadario, never mistaken for a vigorous student advocate, certainly was well aware of the implications of his proposal. As for the other student members — the committee report was adopted unanimously — the most charitable thing that can be said for them is that they didn't fully understand the effect of the guidelines. And, that excuse isn't good enough.

We deserve an explanation!

SSSC asks GC to hold hearing

Letter to the chairman of the Governing Council:

We read the statement of the Executive Committee of the Governing Council in the minutes of February 6, 1973 (report number 10 of the Executive Committee): "...since the University had found it necessary to call in the Metropolitan Toronto Police, charges should not be dropped unless the facts proved to be different than those presented."

We assure you that the facts of the events in question are not as in your statement.

We assume that the Executive Committee was serious in stating that charges would be dropped if the facts presented proved to be erroneous.

We, therefore, demand that you call an open hearing according to the proper rules of procedure so that the facts may be made clear through the presentation of evidence by all concerned.

Peter Havers, chairman
SSSC.

Wants Soc to favour Canadians

There is an argument being waged on by the American and pro-American members of the sociology department concerning the hiring of three new members for the sociology department. These members of the faculty argue that, "science is a collective endeavour and does not recognize national boundaries"; therefore, they would suggest, "the department should hire the best faculty available — regardless of their nationality". These influential interest groups have condemned every argument which favors the hiring of only Canadian faculty as utterly "bourgeois nationalism" at best and a betrayal of scientific progress at worst.

For the following reasons we feel that the position of these "objective" social scientists is biased against the Canadian applicants and harmful to the development of the department toward a Canadian sociology. Therefore, we urge the students in sociology to form a solid block and attempt to implement a policy which favours the hiring of Canadian faculty.

1. Unlike physics and chemistry, sociology is a culture-bound science; it is a human science. Its subject of study are people of a particular country. The reason why we do not have a Canadian sociology is because we followed a policy to Americanize our culture. We were after big commercial names; we had a "false consciousness" of our own identity. The more we bought these "big brand-names" the more inferior we felt. We always avoided our real need which was the necessity of having serious Canadian scholars who had definite interest in the Canadian society and not big foreign names. Sociologists, in our department, should be part of this culture, part of our people, and to share experiences and feelings with and to have commitment to them. If we want to develop a Canadian sociology, therefore, we need Canadian sociologists. Mao Tse-tung once said "one cannot import revolution". We believe that "one can not import sociology". A decade of importation in Canada is the living proof of our blatant error in the past. We have to stop this mistake.

2. A bourgeois counter argument can be launched against our position that, "sure we want faculty with Canadian interest and sure we would give preference to Canadians if, and only if, they have a similar qualifications," i.e. scholarly publication in American Journals, et cetera. It is our view that, although this seems to be a well-intended and non-prejudice argument, the latent function of this argument is to prevent Canadians from being hired in this department. The reason being that, of course, no Canadian applicant can ever match his U.S. counterpart with the amount of publication or teaching experience. Therefore, in any matching game the Canadian would probably lose. If the chances of a Canadian to become just a sociologist in our graduate schools are very slim, our expectation of his becoming a "productive sociologist" should be non-existent. Consequently, it is more than absurd to argue that a Canadian sociologist is not as productive or as experienced as his American professors in the first place. We have to stop repressing the Canadian scholar in his own country.

3. The forces of reaction might come up with yet another cliché; they would say, "what we need to hire is a radical macro-social theorist who would be able to see the Canadian society through a 'Marxist' light in a critical way," and, of course, Canadian sociologists who have been forced by their American teachers to see society in a "consensus light" and learnt to be conservative both in manner and thought would be automatically disqualified. We believe that a Canadian, so far as he has got the basic qualifications, must be hired. Our experience in this department has proved to us that "conservatism", liberalism, and radicalism of faculty members are purely political catchwords, emotionally tuned and lack a real practical significance. Every person has the potentiality to modify his position, and every person is able to put a false front.

4. The anti-Canadian faction might come up again with yet another "democratic subterfuge", and say, "we do not make our final judgement on the basis of candidate's scholarly publications but teaching ability and commitment to students as determined by his presentation in our colloquiums". We view a colloquium as a meat market and completely inadequate for judging a Canadian applicant. Canadians are neither familiar with auctioneering skills, nor do they have the dexterity of an American salesman. In the world of sociology, Canadians have been treated like niggers, like women and they have been forced into passivity and sociological subordination. Therefore, sociologically speaking, he does not have the necessary expertise in social encounter; he is reserved, does not throw smiles, does not initiate lively conversation. Consequently he fails compared to his American counterpart who would handle the colloquium like a Johnny Carson show. For the American it is a Hollywood style showmanship, for the Canadian, it is the boring job of proving that he is not as bad as you think he should be.

These are only my recollections as to what is happening in the department of sociology. We have to act now and stop the Americanization of our department. We have to help Canadians to get into this department. Let us think of him or her whose rejection by the sociology department is always a fait accompli.

Life Underwriters counter feature

The article on life insurance by Rick Grant in your January 24 issue is an abortion of the truth. It certainly does not apply to Canada.

In fairness to the students who read your paper, let's tell it like it is. In the life insurance business, there are great opportunities for university graduates in the career of selling life insurance and many are proving it. If Rick Grant or anyone else wants to talk to any of these graduates about their present life insurance careers, we can give them a long list.

Here are the facts. In Canada in 1965, five per cent of the new life insurance agents were university graduates. This proportion has increased steadily each year to 22 per cent in 1971. These statistics come from the Life Insurance Agency Management Association (LIAMA), a highly respected research organization which serves the life insurance industry in Canada and the United States.

If, in addition to the above figures, you include new agents who have some university experience, the total figures are 18 per cent for 1965 increasing to 37 per cent for 1971. Clearly the interest of university students in a life insurance sales career has increased dramatically in recent years.

Rick Grant suggests the odds against survival as a life insurance agent are 100 to one. His credibility gap is monumental. What are the real odds?

The LIAMA statistics for Canada show that 11 per cent of new agents survive with the same company for five years. In addition, 25 per cent of the terminators stay in the life insurance business but move to other companies. Thus about one-third of all new agents succeed through the first five years. After five years LIAMA figures show a continuing success ratio of over 90 per cent.

Next question. How does this compare with sales personnel in other industries? Quite favourably. Remember, however, that a sales career is a discipline that focuses the spotlight on failure or success rather quickly and decisively.

Assume you have a group of individuals who have the normal aptitudes required for selling life insurance. The great divider that separates the successes from the failures is the willingness to do an honest and intelligent day's work.

The above LIAMA figures show that two-thirds of all new entrants to life insurance selling don't really have the necessary desire or self-discipline to do the job.

We are convinced that the agent success ratio for university graduates is much higher. Unfortunately, LIAMA does not yet have success data for university graduates. We therefore give you the experience of several life insurance companies in Canada.

Since your article was adapted from Poundmaker published at the University of Alberta, here is a case history of a group of graduates from that University.

The Edmonton branch of the New York Life built a highly successful marketing organization from U of A grads during a twelve year period from 1956 to 1967. During that period 17 grads were recruited as life agents. At the time of recruitment their average age was 22. Today 12 (70 per cent) of these grads are still in the life insurance business. The oldest is age 37 and the youngest is age 27. Here's the 1973 box score for these 17 grads:

• Eight are still with New York Life — one head office sales executive, two branch managers, and five highly successful agents.

Their earnings categories are as follows:

- two — $50,000 plus
- four — $25,000 - $50,000
- two — $15,000 - $25,000

• Four are now with other life insurance companies — one branch manager, and three successful agents.

• Three returned to University for further study. One is now a lawyer and another is a doctor.

• Two left the life insurance business for another vocation.

The London Life has been actively recruiting at Canadian universities since 1954 for positions in their Group Benefits Sales Division and since 1963 for their General Sales Division. By the end of 1972 here is their outstanding result:

Sales Dept.	Grads	Hired	Company	Ratio
Group	105	60		57 per cent
General	107	64		60 per cent

Rick Grant doubts the sincerity of recruiting approaches for sales management positions. He should take a look at Manufacturers Life. This company has 35 branch sales managers in Canada and 14 of them were hired directly off campus. In addition there are five assistant managers and 26 management trainees in the stream all of whom joined the company after graduation in recent years. ManuLife, as it is called, has 11 university grads on the head office sales executive team.

The Canada Life has a specially designed campus recruiting program which has been operating more than ten years. Graduates are brought directly into the head office and then undergo training and experience both in sales and in sales management. Eventually, each individual selects his preference for either group business or individual business and for management or sales. Here is the box score from 1960 to 1973.

Seventy-three university graduates recruited
Forty-eight — still with Canada Life (66 per cent)

- Three — head office sales executives
 - Twelve — branch managers
 - Thirty-three — agents (group or individual)
- University graduates who enter the life insurance business as agents are usually quick to join the Life Underwriters Association of Canada (LUAC) which is the professional society for life insurance agents. In particular they take advantage of the Association's five-year program of training and education leading to the designation Chartered Life Underwriter (CLU). Those who succeed are thereby placed on the same plane as lawyers, accountants, and others who counsel the public on their financial affairs.

The life insurance agent's job is to obtain clients who trust him and look to him for continuing service. When this is done well it is a rewarding experience both for the agent and the client. In 1972 LUAC arranged with LIAMA to conduct a scientific survey of agency opinion among LUAC's 15,000 members across Canada. Here are their responses to some of the statements submitted:

If any university graduate is interested in exploring a life insurance sales career, his first step is to contact a life insurance company and request the opportunity to complete the Attitude Index Battery (AIB) which has been researched and validated by LIAMA over many years.

This particular AIB must be sent to LIAMA headquarters where it is graded and the result is sent directly to the head office of the insurance company. The company will refuse to enter into an agency contract with anyone whose AIB score is below the cut off point.

If the red light is not flashed by the IB result, then you can investigate further. In addition to learning all you can about a life agent's job, pay special attention to the nature and extent of the training and supervision which the company can provide. Is it really designed for university graduates?

Also talk to several graduates who are now working as life agents. Consider your own qualities of self-discipline and sincere interest in the welfare of others. Do you want to be an entrepreneur or a cog in some corporate machine? Whatever you do, don't be misled by Rick Grant's uninformed opinion.

In conclusion, a brief personal testimony. I am a graduate with two degrees from University of Toronto and am a graduate of Osgoode Hall law school. My career has been entirely in the life insurance business — 10 years as an agent and 16 years as an Association executive. The agency experience was of tremendous value — the period of greatest growth. I highly recommend it.

The long, troubled history of North Africa told

Anthropologist, historian examine Sahara

Jamil Abun-Nasr's history of the Maghrib, or "land of sunset" details the see-sawing of a multiplicity of tribal powers in Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Libya, from the founding of Carthage to the successful rising of the nationalist movements. The style is dry and pedestrian: Sahara without the camel. Some basic familiarity with the competing theocratic sects of Islam is recommended, and should help with passages like: This military setback made it easy for the Fatimids to conquer the Rustamids a few years later. The Umayyad rulers in Spain entered into relations with the Rustamids, whom they viewed as their natural allies against the Aglabids, the agents of the "Abbasids.

Among other bits of recalcitrant history hauled into daylight, the persevering reader discovers that Carthaginian traders reached the British tin markets during the fifth century B.C., and that the Vandals were not the baddies official Church historians claimed. Abun-Nasr points out that the Vandals adhered to the Arian heresy, confronting a tightly-organized Catholic Church with which they struggled until the end of their reign. Their behaviour as conquerors appears to have been no more atrocious than that of their contemporaries. As for the reputed single-mindedness with which Vandal leaders devoted themselves to raping Roman matrons, it seems they were so disinterested and unchivalrous as to prohibit Vandal intermarriage with the Romans. Abun-Nasr suggests that those Christian clerics who, unlike Augustine, deserted their posts under Vandal seige, invented the atrocity stories to explain their own lack of courage. However, the eventual defeat of the Vandals by the Byzantine, Belisarius, gave the Byzantine forces the opportunity to do everything to the Vandals which the clerics had claimed the Vandals did to the Roman Catholics.

Islamic law occupied an important place in the growth of nationalist policies. In Tunisia, naturalized French citizens who sought burial in Muslim cemeteries on grounds of being born in the faith, were refused. Bourguiba and the radical L'Action faction in the Destour party supported the mufti of Bizerta in his ruling that acceptance of French citizenship rather than the alternative jurisdiction of Muslim law caused the person to be classified as a renegade from his faith.

Colonial maneuvering of the several European powers allowed a number of modern "Christian" renegades to try their wings in some early demonstration projects. Among them were Marshall Badoglio in Libya and Marshal Petain in Morocco, where the later Vichy figurehead joined the Spanish dictator, Primo de Rivera, in putting down the rebellion of July 1943 let the world know that freedom for any colonial people had to rest on their demonstration of ability to govern themselves. After all, one of the big arguments was over alienation of indigenous land titles, and no North American wants to recognize in front of Indian witnesses that all private land titles rest ultimately on fraud or superior force.

The Sahara, whose influence is felt at varying depths along the North African coastline, served as a kind of sandy Mediterranean to the people readable, and the material is easily accessible to the non-specialist. In addition to the detailed study of a single village and its socio-economic functioning, the book contains an excellent extended glossary of Hausa terms and customs, with particular attention to agriculture.

The farmers of Batagarawa are divided into four economic groups for the purposes of this survey, with size and productivity of land-holding, tendency to buy and sell farmland, and other factors studied for each

Polly Hill's comments on the growing practice of purdah (seclusion of marriageable girls and married women) present a couple of interesting reasons for the increase: ...perhaps it would not have become so prevalent in rural Hausaland were it not for the high water-table (which permits of the building of many wells) and the ubiquity of the donkey, so that without inconvenience to themselves men could excuse women from their traditional function as beasts of burden.

of 'Abdul-Karim. Later, both the French and Spanish Popular Front governments made the blunder of holding to the imperial policy of opposing unconditional freedom for their North African holdings — a mortal error for Spain, considering the contribution to Fascist victory made by the Moorish troops under Quijote de Llano American contributions to North African nationalist hopes were not outstanding. An official U.S. state-

living around its edges. Among those with whom the North Africans have been linked by caravan routes, are the Hausa traders of Northern Nigeria. The exceptional vitality and economic inventiveness of the rural Hausa are appreciatively sketched by Polly Hill in her study of Batagarawa, a village near Katsina.

The approach taken is an appropriate and productive combination of economics and anthropology, the style is simple and group. One of the increasingly crucial points not mentioned by the author is the fact that in those countries for which statistics are available, the smaller farmer is normally the better agronomist. He produces more from each acre or hectare. However, the better return for the invested dollar is shown by the larger farmer. Unfortunately, the discovery that dollars are considerably less palatable than beans is usually made only at a critical point in the inflationary spiral.

The view from Ann Murray's h

Except that it doesn't have a number on it, Ann Murray's house looks like the rest of the upper income homes north-west of Eglinton and Bathurst. Inside it is a carpety, parenty, mantle-piece sort of a home.

Ann Murray's rise has been precipitous. In 1967 she was taking Friday afternoons off teaching gym to do CBC chorus work in Halifax. In '68 she went full-time, as a regular on a Toronto music hop program. She toured the Maritimes, made a cheap record. Then Capitol Records of Canada offered her and Brain Aheme, her producer $18,000 to do an album. It sold 200,000. And then came Snowbird.

Now she owns Balmur Investments which employs five people to take care of the business. She has the house. And she's the most famous woman in the country. (Including non-Canadians, she probably ranks third to Jackie and the Queen.)

We met her just after the release of Danny's Song and just before her European tour. She looked more tired than Ann Murray, and thought she was coming down with the flu.

We asked her about it all.

Why did you pick Danny's Song for your new single?

I went in to do a single because they wanted a single to put out. Of course they want an album but I don't want to give them an album because I've given them single after single and nothing's happened, so I said, "well I'll give you a single and if indeed it happens, then we'll put it on an album". So I went in to do this single session and I did four tunes. After two years you kind of never know what to do, you know, after two years without a hit. I had a thing called Killing Me Softly and a Robby McNeil song and a real country tune just for the heck of it and Danny's Song, that I got off the first Loggins and Messina album.

This would have been eight months ago. I figured, well, Danny's Song had a little steel guitar in it so it could break country. But it had great possibility to cross over onto the pop charts, because it's pop as well. Besides Kenny Loggins wrote it and he's on the pop charts with his albums. He has the number six song in the top 100 and the number twenty album, so all this was contributing too. And I loved the tune. So we decided on that one instead of Killing Me Softly and I was just reading Billboard yesterday and it's the pick of the week by Roberta Flack. But, then she has a much better chance of getting it on the charts because her previous hits have been that soft kind of melodic tune. God I'd love to be able to put out a tune like that because that's the kind of stuff I love to do.

After two years without a hit do you wonder about your own music?

No. I'm really satisfied with what's happening. I really like my music. And people say, well, it's wishy-washy. Like Rolling Stone says, "She's got a wishy-washy voice, it's bland, the songs are wishy-washy" and all this. Okay. Fine. So he doesn't like it. That's cool with me. I don't care. I don't like everyone either and I'll say that. But I don't think there's a performer in the world who doesn't have something good about them. And critics will go and shit all over someone and have nothing good to say.

What's the worst part of your success? Is it the public criticism?

No, because I don't let it bother me. But the success does make it difficult, because... there are things that I won't do. I'm probably a little over-sensitive about it. I don't like going to movies, because, I think people are going to stare at me. Now, in the U.S. I don't have to worry about that. You know, it's big, you can get lost there. There are very few places in the U.S., where I just can't walk around. But here I can't. There's no doubt about it. They do recognize you. I know it. And I see them. And they stop me.

And what happens. They say hi...

They say hi and I think that's very complimentary. But I would rather it didn't happen. I would rather just go with a bag over my head and just eat my popcorn in the movies.

I remember seeing the album you did with Glen Campbell on the front rack at A&A. All around it there was every freak you could imagine. But there was Ann Murray...

Squaresville.

How does the image fit? Do you feel comfortable with it? Do you laugh at it?

Well, to me, being hip has nothing to do with the way you look, the way you sound or anything, man. And people put labels on you. Just because I wear my hair a certain way and I've got rosy cheeks... I couldn't look unhealthy no matter what I did to myself. I could be as sick as anything and my cheeks are still red. I look healthy. It's as simple as that, and that's the kind of image I have. I couldn't say shit with a mouthful, you know. And it's not really true and at the same time it is true.

But you don't, say, refer to drugs.

Sure I refer to it. I've smoked up, particularly enjoy it, so why bother.

Do you feel pressure to maintain t

I am a little worried about scari think it might be a little tough to chair those hippy-dippy clubs in the U.S. las and sweatshirt. I wanted to show them doing some heavier stuff. It would be r would maybe put off the oth two bought the previous albums. And I don't appreciate what I do and I don't want time, I would love to be in that bag. Fo that's a heavy rock tune, you know, Ju And nothing. Nothing happened. I think is a little too complicated musically. An I don't know what really makes a hit tu heard, You're So Vain, it was going to be some of the other songs and, Holy Mo are on the air. I don't believe it. "I would rather just go with a bag over my head and just eat my popcorn in the movies."

How do you impress the industry?

Well, for example, people say if you put out an album with a lot of recognizable titles on it people will buy it. I say horseshit. You only go this way once if you are going to make any impact on the industry. It's really neat to put out a record and have ten unrecognizable titles, and then tum around and hear other people doing those tunes, because you know you have contributed something.

"I was sitting on my little swing out back . . . and it was, oh, about seven or eight at night and the moon was starting to come up . . . and the pool, . . . and I was looking at the back of my house and saying "God, why me". Here I am, 26 years old, and I've got an $80,000 house."

"Going down 22 floors, putting in a wash, putting in a quarter, going back up 22 floors, waiting a half hour for the wash, whipping back down, putting it into a dryer, whipping back up. Oh man, I hated that. Signing autographs all the way down and all the way back up."

All that play has made you pretty wealthy. Do you feel any political or social pressure because you are rich? Do you feel guilty?

No, but sometimes. . . I can remember when I came off that tour, I was on the road two and half months, and I was total zombie material. I mean I really was zombie. For a week I just stared. And I'll never forget: about, the second day I came back, I was sitting on my little swing out back with a beer in my hand. And it was, oh, about seven or eight at night and the moon was starting to come up and the pool. . . And I was looking at the back of my house and saying, "God, why me?" Here I am, 26 years old and I've got an $80,000 house. I've got this gorgeous backyard. I was shaking my head. Why me? Really. And I called home and said to my mother, you know, I was just thinking — I had to explain the whole thing to her — and she said, "Oh, Ann, don't brag." Maritimers are like that, you know. She said, don't brag — like the thing will disappear. I said, I'm not bragging. I'm thanking God that I have it. But it's weird. Every now and then that hits you. And it's why? Why me?

I don't know, but I sure appreciate it. I love the house. I really do. I figured I had the house for three months and I've already gotten my money's worth out of it. I love it so much. What a difference from an apartment. It's not my ultimate dream — which is to live in the country on the water.

But for now it's convenient to be here. If you've gotta be here, you should be here under the best possible circumstances and living in an apartment house was just the worst. Going down 22 floors, putting in a wash, putting in a quarter, going back up 22 floors, waiting a half hour for the wash, whipping back down, putting it into a dryer, whipping back up. Oh man, I hated that! Signing autographs all the way down and all the way back up.

Do you play free at all?

Do I play free?

Do you find yourself doing that ever?

I haven't. How long has it been? I would. Sure. Depending on the circumstances, you know. Like what I want to do is a tour up north. Because I want to get back to the days when I really enjoyed it, you know.

Do you not now?

No, not really. No, it's just that the more you perform, the more people you get to know and the more they expect and the more pressure. You know, I could talk to you about doing all those clubs and having all those reviewers come. And wherever you opened, you knew damn well there was going to be a reviewer there. And you know there's just that extra pressure. I want to get back to the days when people enjoyed what I did. They were being entertained, and just enjoyed it. And that's the way people would be up north.

What stops you from doing it?

I'm going to. There's no money involved, but I'm going to do it, because I've got to have that feeling again. . .

Are you politically involved at all?

Well, I think if I weren't singing anymore, I might be involved. But, uh, while singing, I think it's a little bit unfair sometimes, I think it's unfair for performers to use their influence over people. To con them into buying things. On the other hand a lot of people will say if you have that pressure, exert it if you really believe in something. I'm not sure I think that's right.

I certainly don't believe in doing commercials. I did an advertisement for the Retarded Children's Association because I'm the honorary president of the organization, so I will do anything to help them. But that's charitable. But as far as getting out and trying to convince people to buy coffee, I say — no. I feel pretty much the same about using the stage for politics or any particular belief. I think that when people come out for the evening they want to be entertained. They get enough of that, you know. They get their share of politics on television, newspaper, radio.

Remember James Taylor refused to play for McGovern at first but then changed his mind.

Well, the exposure was great, too.

For Taylor?

Yea. For everybody.

A rainy day in Brussels sprouts an afternoon of trolism.

Despite nude players, FTL's Brussels Sprouts remains a tepid comedy

The new Factory Theatre Lab production of Brussels Sprouts opened at the Central Library Theatre Tuesday night. Overall, it's a comic portrayal of two youthful male lovers encountering a female in a dingy hotel room in Brussels on a rainy night. Director Martin Kinch exploits the comic dimension of the situation but seems to ignore the dramatic intensity in the plot. The success of the former leaves the audience laughing, but the neglect of the latter left this viewer unsatisfied.

Although the first act is played entirely in the nude and the general affect is sensually pleasing, there seems to be no sense of real sexuality. This might be a function of the ambivalent sexuality of the characters concerned; however what is a tense situation, capable of arousing strong conflicting emotions on the parts of the characters, is rendered very tamely. The three attractive, sexually active adults become like three very young children exploring, fooling and testing each other in a play pen. None of them seem to have the sexual drive or energy necessary to undertake the two days of 'abandon' claimed.

The key to a successful rendering of the potential of the play would have been an equally strong and imaginative characterization on the part of all three actors. Earnie, played by David Rothberg, comes off the best; inept and unsure of himself, afraid of any real feeling but dogmatically determined to experience it all. Allan Harmon's Moby is cynical, a bit cruel and complementarily pragmatic to Earnie's romanticism. Thus the stage is set for the appearance of the catalyst, Charlotte, portrayed by Patti Oatman, whose function is that of spinning the web of fantasy which allows all three to leave the here and now and take the imaginary trip to Persia where senses are stimulated beyond belief through sexual abandon. The most crucial agent, she is also the weakest.

Oatman's general approach is very matter of fact and direct, her delivery is polished and careful and her appearance wholesome. Such characteristics would have added an interesting dimension to her characterization if her Charlotte was believable. It is never clear throughout the first act what her investment is in the potential situation, although in the second act many things become clearer. Her rendering of the "trip to Persia" fantasy lacks spontaneity and credulity. It does not succeed in opening the doorway for her or the two homosexuals to that world of earthly delights. This failure disrupts the energy buildup and flow so necessary to the play, the stimulation of sexual and psychic energy to a high point, its release in sexual activity, and finally the return to the mundane.

On the whole, the other elements of the production work well together setting a mood of whimsy and mild desperation. The set portrays the dinginess and gray comforts of transient rooms well; the haunting piano of Allan Wade suggests a contrasting domesticity. This production of Larry Kardish's play is successful in that it allows the audience to appreciate the funny and ludicrous aspects of what is a very real, perhaps sober human encounter.

"The Library" at UC Playhouse

The Library, the first of three plays which are the Young Playwright's Festival at UC Playhouse, opened on Wednesday evening. Written and directed by Lee Paikin, it deals with a situation well known in this university.

Set in a post-revolutionary society, the play is a re-enactment of the events leading to the death of the head of circulation of the library. For thirty years under her hand the library has remained exactly as it was on that day when she attained the position. Any changes which have taken place simply do not exist. Library workers shift files, obey memos and clatter and clang around in their ridiculous jobs which don't do anything as they cannot alter the library of the past.

An ordinarily overdone subject (revolution) and a too topical a situation (the locking away of books in an impregnable fortress) has become a stylized presentation of considerable imagination. The moments when the play gets entangled in its own pace and resorts to personal reflection seem to have an air of being dropped into the play by the author's desire to say too much within the one play. But Lee Paikin seems to realize his own weaknesses and these sequences are painlessly short.

The strength of the play lies in its group scenes when the actors combine to create sounds and images of incredible energy. Paikin's ability to work with large groups of actors and the tremendous control which the actors exhibit make this play a fine experience. But even here Paikin does show a tendency to overdo things. He presents stark visual images which, at times, seem to serve solely as stark visual images. These few faults — also perhaps overplayed — do not keep the play from being one that is worth seeing. If this is a picture of what the two remaining plays (Circus by Mark Manson and Wilton Remembers by Jay Teitel) portend, then the playwright's Festival will be a success.

Saxophones, piccolos cope with jazzy rhythms of modern music

Darius Milhaud said of his miniature masterpiece, The Creation of the World: "I made up my orchestra, as those of Harlem, with seventeen soloists, and I freely used the jazz style, blending it with a classical influence." Milhaud was mermerized by the jazz he heard in London and in Harlem — a jazz, as the program notes for last Sunday's music faculty recital of this work say, which was carried over from New Orleans to Harlem in the early part of the century. What the program notes do not say — in fact they suggest the opposite — is that Milhaud never gained much approval or sympathy from his jazz confrères. He was looked upon the way a Japanese classical dancer might have been who attempted the fox trot.

For all this, The Creation of the World, originally a ballet written in 1923, is an energetic, tragically lyrical, orchestral foliage. It masses around the sultry sway of the alto saxophone. If you don't know this work, but you know Ravel's Bolero, think of the Saxophone's sleazy arrogance in that work. Paul Brodie, of the faculty of music, has complete control of this bias in the sound of his instrument. His vibrato seemed flawless, and his playing was enough to win over many skeptics to the side of the saxophone, which, like the bassoon has been held in shamefully low esteem until very recently.

The opening massed legato passage demonstrated right off that the other "soloists" were well on top of the difficult ensemble writing, which increases with the intricacy of the polyrhythms. Some of the outer instruments were sometimes a bit rough and unsure in attack, such as the brass, and I suppose the loud passages needn't have been quite so fff. But considering Milhaud's theme, "the creation of the world," I don't think the volume was indiscriminately loud.

The work is just plain exhilarating, like its American predecessor, Ives' Overture to Robert Browning which offers even more fortissimo passages, louder, longer and more disheveled rhythmically. It was played with this in mind, and I don't see how the instrumentalists could have done more to get it across to their audience. Conductor Ezra Schabas revved up his crew to a perfect pitch.

Henry Brant's Angels and Devils is an odd piece for eight flutes and three piccolos. The musicians seemed to be students, except for Robert Aitken and John Hawkins who conducted. The four movements explore in succession, harmony, counterpoint, style and sonorities. The best movement is the first and with the emphasis on playing together in rhythmically simple phrases, there was mostly even and tonally balanced playing. The work tends to go onnn... a bit, and the rhythms do not get an awful lot more complicated, and with so many learning instrumentalists, both the work and the audience's patience suffered somewhat. Robert Aitken was very good though — completely adept at all the clever tricks which the modern composer knows how to build into his works for the flute. The very chic, tongue-in-cheek parody of the national anthem as encore, with its extended academic cadenza, was well received by the patriotic audience.

Lothar Klein's Six Exchanges for Soprano Saxophone is a dry, unoriginal blumph of a piece. Paul Brodie had trouble negotiating the aridly ferocious fast sections, and was cool but exact with the slow.

The Four Madrigals, arranged by Paul Harvey, by Wilbye, Morley, Farnaby and Pilkington, were played handsomely by the Brodie Saxophone Quartet. Perhaps the Flutes in Brant's piece were too much of a good thing and perhaps four saxophones are too. It was an interesting experience, though, hearing these renaissance harmonies and tonal lines in the voices of an instrument just coming into its own in this century.

Bruce Eves is at the Gallery 76 starting today. We are told the Women's Work exhibition there was exceedingly popular and that something in the way of a solemn artists' solidarity front is finally burgeoning at the college.

Beginning today until March 23 is an exhibition at Enndale College of 32 Swedish posters. These are on loan from the Art Gallery of Ontario.

The final day of the Towards a Definition of Kitsch exhibit at Hart House is Sunday. Hours are 11 am to 5 pm, Saturday, and 2 pm to 5 pm, Sunday. The gallery is open until 5 pm this afternoon. On March 5, Tony Paine and Eleanor Paine present their prints, drawings and batiks respectively. This is until March 20. The Kitsch exhibit is only lasting six days because it was an unplanned, spontaneous idea, for which only a limited time in the gallery could be found since its exhibit schedule was already pretty full.

Beginning March 5 at the New Academic Building of Victoria College is an exhibition of Student-artists Chris Ralph, Angelo Rao, Diane Wait, Helle Viirlaid, Bob Kane, Mark Filipiuk and Mary McLoughlin. That is until March 23.

Beginning March 8 at the Faculty of Architecture building is an exhibition entitled "Signs and Symbols": an exhibition circulated by the Extension Department of the Art Gallery of Ontario. This until March 19.

Forgot to mention this last week: "An exhibition of models and drawings, based on the note-books of 15th century artist and inventor, Leonardo da Vinci will be on view in the main foyer of the Medical Sciences Building Monday, February 12 to Thursday, March 8.

It's important to know that Valdy isn't just another Canadian folksinger. He has a friendly, almost lovable personality that's in complete harmony with his messianic appearance; flowing hair, bushy beard and expressive brow. On stage his manner is so comfortable that you feel like you're back in your own living room. His songs are melodically simple but interesting and his lyrics are always poetic, filled with images yet are thought provoking comments about relationships, rustic living and the environment. So it's good news that Valdy is back in town at The Riverboat (922-6216) tonight through Sunday. Most people who've heard him are instant fans, so it's no surprise that his opening set on Tuesday night was completely sold out. He covered most of the material on his Country Man (A and M) album and "Rock 'n' Roll Song", "A Good Song", "Country Man" and "Rainmaker" were obvious audience favourites. Valdy's voice is still gruff with gentle overtones. He purposely varies the introductions and sometimes the arrangements of his songs so they never go stale.

Also appearing with Valdy is La Troupe Grottesque featuring the offbeat humour of Michael Boncoeur and Paul Willis. It's a good double bill but admission is $3.50. Another A & M recording artist Lorence Hud opens on Tuesday.

Fiddler's Green Coffeehouse is holding a benefit for Sing Out magazine. Among the many guests will be Leon Redbone, Sweet Evening Breeze, the Sloth Jug Band and The Friends of Fiddler's Green. There will be a Saturday evening program as well this week, with the Bluegrass Express from New York. Contemporary singer-songwriter Doug Steiger is featured on Tuesday March 6. Fiddler's is located behind the Y on Eglinton east of Yonge and admission is $1.

An evening of music with good local talent (including String Band) is slated for Sunday at Bathurst Street-United Church, on Bathurst south of Bloor.

theatre

The PLS, a theatre group originating in the Centre for Medieval Studies, presents three medieval mystery plays at Seeley Hall in Trinity College this weekend. Admission to Baptism and Temptation of Christ, and the Woman Taken in Adultery is free. It is a chance to see a form of theatre that very commercial theatres would dare to produce because of the limited appeal of religious drama. They ignore the fact that these dramas were designed to create interest in Christian tradition and doctrine among a population far less sophisticated than ours today. Thus the plays are very often colourful and moving.

Leo Paiken's Library plays tonight and tomorrow night at University College Playhouse. Next Tuesday evening at 9 pm, and Wednesday to Friday at 1 pm, The Empire-Builders by Boris Vian will be performed there. March 8, 9 and 10 at 8:30 Classical Stage productions presents two one act comedies by Chekhov at the Colonnade Theatre. As well as the Tuesday to Saturday performances at 8:30, matinee performances will be held each Wednesday Thursday and Friday at 2:30 pm. Classical Theatre Productions has issued a challenge to Stratford to trade budgets: "We promise to produce as fine a show and finance an orphanage with the surplus. Awaiting reply."

Theatre Passe Muraille has premiered The Master, a play by "newly repatriated Canadian playwright" Will Seymour. It will run until March 18, Wednesdays through Sundays.

Hart House Theatre is housing the Toronto Dance Theatre until March 10. In its press release, the directors emphasize that the doors of the studio (26 Lombard street) are always open and the public is welcome to watch or attend classes and rehearsals. Performances are at 8:30 pm. Tickets are $2 for students and $3 for others.

Theatre du P'tit Bonheur turns back to the classics with Les Precieuses Ridicules by Moliere, playing Wednesdays through Saturdays at 8:30 from March 7 until March 24.

Also March 7, the Drama Centre will present another of its "20 Shows" series at the Studio Theatre, 4 Glen Morris. The Enchanted Night by Mrozek, is, in the words "a tragic metaphysical farce." It plays Wednesday through Saturday at 8:30 pm, along with The American Dream, Edward Albee's modern classic.

March 9 at Ryerson Theatre, Charles Weidman and his Theatre Dance Company will hold a single performance. Weidman is considered one of the "greats" of modern dance. Tickets are all $2.50 and can be obtained at the Benson Building as well as at Ryerson and Eatons.

The three one-act plays presented by the Irish Arts Theatre and continuing over the next week have been a disappointment. The brilliance of Synge's work is profound and difficult to capture. As in the work of O'Casey, much of its depth resides in the detailed richness of the characterizations. Only the second work, Shadow of the Glen, approached the expression of these qualities. Dianne Barrington's voice and physical presence conformed to Synge's poetical vision of the loneliness of the "lady of the house", imprisoned with her dying husband in a cottage on the moor. The humour of the play could have been treated even more deftly, though, to balance the pathetic element. Tinker's Wedding was too superficial a production to be the charming piece Synge intended. Frances Hyland's drunk old woman seemed forced and unconvincing. Her Masra in the third play, Riders to the Sea, also seemed peculiarly empty and unpoetic, a serious flaw in this most deceptively simple of tragedies. It must be said that in this production the visual element was sensitively interpreted by Sean Kenny's design and the blocking of the chorus. The basic set for all three works was versatile and substantial-looking. It is a little surprising though, to conclude that Siobhan McKenna, an actress so keenly sensitive to rhythmic nuances in her own characterizations, has allowed many flaws in rhythm to slip by in directing others.

Today through Sunday, The Revue is showing Playtime, Jacques Tati's third or fourth M. Hulot film. Tati's humour is silent and whimsical. His Hulot is often compared to Chaplin's tramp, though I think he is more like a physically expressed Peter Sellers. $1.50.

Friday and Saturday evening, St. Mike's is showing The Garden of the Finzi-Continis, not Two English Girls as previously announced. Finzi-Continis is much prettier than its theme — anti-semitism and entrapment in fascist Italy — suggests. Dominique Sanda is no small part of that. Why is that woman so attractive? $1.

Monday through Friday there is a festival of Woman Directors and their Films at York University, with sessions everyday at 2 and 7. Among the films: Paris 1900, Wanda, Orange, When You See This Remember Me. Monday evening Joyce Weiland will show and discuss her Reason Over Passion; Wednesday evening it's Tanya Ballantyne MacKay and Things I Cannot Change; Thursday evening, Mireille Dansereau and La Vie Revee; Friday evening (March 9) Pamela Douglas. The festival is free and being held in the Curtis Lecture Halls. For information call 667-3244.

Monday and Tuesday at the Revue it's a double-bill of Hot Millions, Eric Till's film of a computer heist carried off by Peter Ustinov and Maggie Smith, and John Ford's Young Cassidy with Rod Taylor as a bulky young Sean O'Casey (?) and Maggie Smith as the colleen who loved him true. $1.50. After that, although I am not sure of the exact days, Boorman's Leo, the Last.

Wednesday, the museum's NFB short film series continues, and it will continue to continue, Wednesdays, without further notice here. Call the ROM for the weekly roster.

Also Wednesday, The Student Christian Movement's Political Film Festival screens Costa-Gravas' The Confession, at St. Paul's church, the one with the green neon cross on Avenue Road, one block south of Davenport. 7:30, $1.

music

On March 3 in the Great Hall of Hart House, the Festival Singers gives its fourth concert. Tickets are $2 or $3.50 at 9 pm.

There is an unbelievable glut of concerts on March 4. At the Hahonim Synagogue on Holloman Road there will be a musically illustrated lecture by Ben Steinberg using an accordion, organ, piano and flute entitled "Jewish Music Through the Ages", at 3 pm. At Scarborough the same day at 3:30 pm at the Meeting Place is the Second Part of "Stars of the Kiwanis Music Festival". Admission of course is free. In the evening at 8:30 pm is a Chancel Concert at the Metropolitan United Church on Queen near Yonge (actually, 51 Bond Street). At 8 pm at Hart House as part of the Sunday Evening Concert Series is a recital with Sharon Tuttle, harpsichordist with Greta Kraus and a baroque group. At 8:30 pm at the Actors' Theatre the New Arts Chamber Players gives a concert of Vivaldi, Bach, Villa-Lobos and Handel. Students pay $1.50, and for reservations call 923-1515. It's at 390 Dupont Street.

On March 6 and 7 Karel Ancerl conducts the Toronto Symphony in works by Bach and Honegger (his third symphony). The solo pianist in an as yet to be announced work is the virtually incomparable Russian master, Emil Gilels.

Next Thursday, March 8, is a concert given by the famous group, I Solisti di Zagreb. The players are indeed virtuosos with a super-elegant sound.

Valdy plays at The Riverboat until Sunday.

Kilbourn claims U of T is bad developer

By SHEILA WHINCUP

"The university is among the biggest and worst developers in the city", ward 10 alderman William Kilbourn charged at yesterday's city government forum sponsored by St. Mike's Student Union in Brennan Hall.

made two years ago by St. Mike students in fighting the widening of St. Joseph Street. He urged that students organize on local issues and then broaden their involvement into city politics.

Ward 1 alderman Elizabeth Eayrs also commended the growing tendency among students not to isolate themselves on campus.

Party politics as they exist at national and provincial levels are irrelevant to City Hall, asserted ward 11 alderman Anne Johnston. Johnston was opposed to the hierarchical structure of political parties. Although an NDP member, she preferred to run independently, she said, commenting that she hoped the grass roots style of politics growing in City Hall will filter up into the other levels of government.

Eayrs pointed out that the more informal organization of city politics made it easier for women to enter. City Hall tends to work in "teams" of likeminded people rather than along party alignments, she she continued.

None of them would define the "reform council" as a discreet and static body, but they felt that many new members will make efforts to listen to a broader base of citizens.

Kilbourn said he was not a believer in "delegate democracy" in which an elected alderman always obeys the voice of the majority among his constituents. Instead, he saw his role as a broker, or 'maker of arrangements' for people to get information on issues and express themselves. Even if many people in his ward wanted to complete the Spadina Expressway, he would not vote for it, he said. In that case he would arrange for them to meet planners and engineers who could help them make "informed judgments".

The "octopus of community groups" developing in Ward 11 is a source of valuable information and opinions, commented Johnston.

Kilbourn agreed that community groups should take responsibility for governing themselves. However, he maintained they should be initiated and organized by indigenous individuals who can wholeheartedly fight City Hall. Aldermen are too busy and tied to City Hall, if only by salary, he noted.

Eayrs suggested revamping ward boundaries so that they aren't so big and unwieldy, and aldermen are closer to their constituents.

She supported Karl Jaffary's proposal to split each of the wards into two with one alderman serving each half. The present arrangement of two aldermen supposedly working together for one ward was like a "forced marriage," she declared.

Students want more say on GC

By BRIANE NASIMOK

Outgoing student representatives on the Governing Council agree that student involvement on the body was good, but disagree on what next year major issues should be.

Part-time student representative Joyce Denyer and graduate student member Clarice Henschel think more student representation on the body is vital, when the U of T Act is reviewed after next year.

(Last year, when the provincial government passed the U of T Act, which set up the Governing Council, students pushed hard for parity with staff. However after a strong conservative backlash, students were given eight seats out of the 50, compared to 12 faculty seats.)

Denyer said that student have to "take a more global view of the university." She suggested student representatives not only think in terms of the good of the student, but in terms of the good of the whole university.

Denyer said that this year the voting pattern "showed that students do not vote in a monolithic way", but said this was a "good, healthy thing."

Student representative Paul Cadario has been criticized by fellow student members for not voting as a student representative. Cadario, who is Internal Affairs Committee chairman, is often called upon by the administration to represent students.

Henschel stressed the importance of students working together as the only way to have an "effective voice", on council. She reiterated that students do not have "enough power" with only eight votes.

She outlined the problems that occur when a student is either taking a full load of courses or is a part-time student and works. "Dr. Evans has insisted that there is no automatic release from your duties (academic)." She said that there are two committees that have no elected student voice from two constituencies, and that there was no graduate student on the Business Affairs committee.

Henschel advised that the newly elected student governors make sure that either "student volunteers or students suggested by elected student bodies" are chosen as appointees to university committees. In the past year the administration has chosen appointees without consulting SAC or GSU, most recently choosing graduate dean Ed Safarian's nominee to the task force on academic appointments over the GSU choice.

McLaughlin kept on ice

The unavailability of a pre-sentence report has delayed until March 23 the sentencing of Tom McLaughlin, a defendant in the Simcoe Hall demonstrations trials.

McLaughlin was convicted February 9 of obstructing police during the breakup of the occupation in support of open library stacks.

Presiding judge M.J. Cloney read from a statement written by probation officer Frances Grant stating that she was unable to locate McLaughlin to obtain the brief biographical information that goes into the report at the address he had given on his bail release documents.

In remanding McLaughlin to appear in courtroom 24 Old City Hall, at 10 am on the 23rd, Cloney said to the defendant, referring to his change of address, "I hope you're going to stay there (at the new address) a few days."

McLaughlin was put in jail for six days following his conviction February 9. He was released on his own recognizance after entering an appeal against the verdict.

Waffler cites three centuries of sex bias

By CETA RAMKHALAWANSINGH
 "The predominant social attitude towards women in Canada has remained unchanged over the last three centuries. Despite increased participation in the work force, longer life span, safer birth control, better divorce laws and job protection, women still face discrimination," charged Krista Maeots of the Waffle Women's group Sunday night.

Maeots presented an historical analysis of women's economic participation in Canada as part of the lecture series presented by the Waffle.

Today the labour force and job opportunities are divided into separate male and female work forces, she said. Women earn less than men, and are used as a cheap source of labour.

Platitudes about womanhood do not match the reality of life conditions of most working women, she declared. The corporate world has shown itself to be "intolerably insensitive" to the needs of working women.

"When women were recruited to Canada in the latter half of the 1600's, their job was to produce children for the new country" said Maeots. "Children and women provided necessary manpower in the cotton mills, glass and tobacco factories."

"The length of the work day, from 6 am to 6 pm often through the night and without holidays" were some of the poor working conditions cited by Maeots. "Wages averaged 25 cents a day, and deductions were made, not for social benefits, but for bad behaviour, such as talking on the job".

"It is because of this kind of working conditions that companies such as Dominion Textile made millions," claimed Maeots. She said that documentation presented to the Royal Commissions in 1881 and 1887 demonstrated that masters had the right of correction according to natural law and divine law.

"Children were continually whipped, put into coal boxes or in tobacco sweat rooms as routine punishment."

"The emerging male labour force in the crafts industries and eventual prolonged labour movement struggles led to protection of labourers," said Maeots. "This protection", she said, "was not extended to women and orientals".

Women were in a different and separate work areas from men and agitation did not lead to a rise in women's status. "In fact there was an increase in the ghettoes of female labour in those areas which provided unskilled and semi-skilled jobs."

Maeots detailed racist attitudes that existed toward the oriental work force; "Chinese women were not accepted into the country, while Chinese men were brought in to work. Eventually the British Columbia Department of Labour imported cheap female labour from the east to replace Chinese men."

She also referred to the Japanese internment camps in the BC interior during World War II as an example of a racist act committed by the Federal government.

In the west where women participated equally in the rural economy, labour policies were more radical than elsewhere. Maeots severely criticized the labour movement, particularly the "trade union aristocracy who wrap themselves up in negotiations and take the economic system for granted."

Maeots drew attention to the full participation of women in the work force during the wars and the extensive government day care programs which went into operation to enable women to work. However after the war, unions demanded security for returned men, and government day care support was withdrawn to induce women back into the home.

She criticized day care services which may be established by employers because they will put women under greater control.

"Between the wars and after the wars government policy entered the archives and up to 1955 there existed a policy which stated that women were deemed to have resigned upon marriage."

"It has been suggested that anyone on the welfare rolls should be removed from the voter's list" said Maeots. "But there are over one million women in Canada who are on welfare, and these women are housewives without husbands, thus their social status is related to having a husband", she added.

Krista Maeots declared that it is a social myth that women house workers are respected. She said women work out of necessity, "not for the chatter of typewriters or the social pleasure of cleaning an office building alone at night".

Maeots called for the support of working class men and the union movement in the struggles of women. "Working class men are the class allies of working women. Both male and female workers are the scapegoat of the capitalist corporations' arbitrary and exploitative decisions".

She cautioned about new protective trade measures threatened by the U.S. and the weakening of the employment structure and the effects that would have in Canada, particularly in those service areas where female labour predominates.

Maeots called for increased female participation in the economy at all levels, protection for part time work, and urged young women to enter "male" areas of study and work.

Vic regents compromise on parity report

The Victoria Board of Regents has reached a compromise on the implementation of its mini-CUG report.

A special committee will be established to put into effect those recommendations of the document which do not require a change in the university of Victoria College Act, according to Vic student council (VUSAC) president Gord Barnes. The committee, established last week, will consist of two faculty members, representatives each from faculty, students and the board and is to report within eight weeks.

The decision at a board meeting two weeks ago came after repeated pressure from VUSAC to implement the mini-CUG proposal, which recommended staff student parity on the regents, in toto.

The board had argued that this would require the passing of a new University of Victoria College Act, and that this would be undesirable, since the government may not be amenable to the structuring of the top governing body as outlined in mini-CUG.

Some fear that any move in the Legislature might result in the appointment of government representatives to the board. The board presently includes 22 church-appointed regents on a board of 43. In addition, there are other ties to the church among regents, and the board is self-perpetuating as it chooses replacements for retiring members.

VUSAC in turn has argued that the recently released Committee on Post-Secondary Education Report (COPSE) report calls for "significant representation" of students and faculties on such bodies.

Barnes says he is "not at all happy" with the regents' response to the report, but is accepting it. VUSAC appointed him and vice-president Debra Lewis to the committee.

Due to a lack of consensus on some legal points, the board postponed its decision on the implementation of tenure at Vic until its next meeting.

The dispute centres on the provincial Statutory Powers Procedures Act, which regulates, among other things, the power of tribunals, and could make tenure officially illegal. However there is disagreement on whether a university, since it is based on a royal charter, is subject to this sort of institutional law.

An amendment, which was tabled due to difficulty in phrasing, could nullify the effect of the tenure motion if it were passed, according to VUSAC education commissioner Rick Gregory.

The amendment would allow firing of tenured faculty for economic reasons, in addition to the present grounds of gross incompetence or moral laxity.

"This is the only conceivable reason under which they might act anyway", said Gregory. "Given the careful selection process and the nature of the subjects taught here, I don't think they would fire anyone for any other reason."

Explanations to division heads delay budget, claims Evans

By JOHN CAMPBELL

U of T president John Evans blamed the two-month delay in the publication of 1973-74 university budget on "the very complex set of salary recommendations" that had to be explained to each of the university's division heads. Each head receives preliminary statements they received after final approval of the budget was given by the Governing Council last December.

The budget was made public last night.

"A good deal of the time," Evans said, "has been spent developing the right kind of letter to be sent to the division heads to tell them how to pass their recommendations into practice."

The budget is prepared by a special committee of the Governing Council which establishes a set of spending targets for each division of the university. These guidelines are then used by the division heads to compile the final estimates of expenditures for the year which are submitted for approval to the Governing Council in the spring.

Student member of the budget committee, Paul Cadario said he felt there has been "undue delay" in the publication of the document. He agreed with Evans that the "matter of wording" was a crucial factor causing the time lapse, but nonetheless, the report, he declared "should have been out long ago."

Executive committee member Brain Morgan concurred with Cadario's objection to the delay, saying "It doesn't take two months to write those letters." He speculated, without elaborating, that "political considerations" may have held up release of the report.

One "political consideration" that has already leaked out is a cut of 22 per cent in the Advisory Bureau budget, necessitating firing one of the three bureau staff. Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway and the bureau is working out possible ways of averting the layoffs.

As well, faculty salaries have been restricted to a 3.5 per cent raise.

In spite of the difficulties involved in presenting the budget to division heads, Evans stated that he was pleased with the final form of its recommendations.

Describing the document as people-oriented, he said, "The budget has emphasized people and the support of people rather than non-people resources on campus. Certain elements of this are desirable, very desirable."

The budget was developed in camera between July and December, 1972, when it was approved by the Governing Council. The Business Affairs and Planning and Resources Committees held in camera meetings on it.

High food costs due to monopolies, says NFU

OTTAWA (CUP) — Monopoly control of the food industry is one of the major contributors to high food prices, representatives of the National Farmers Union told the Parliamentary Committee on food costs last Tuesday.

"A few firms are transacting the bulk of the business in the country," NFU president Roy Atkinson said. "They have the leverage to decide how products are delivered to the consumer, and how they are received from the farmer. This is a power bloc that you're dealing with."

tion from acquiring any more companies until 1972. In 1967 the FTC moved to forbid Kraft acquisitions after 1972. "At the same time, Canada has allowed Kraft to take over much of its own dairy industry," Atkinson said.

"You mean there's no competition in the food industry?" Liberal MP Ross Witche asked dubiously.

Witche (a wealthy farmer from Ontario's Bruce Peninsula) claimed that overcapacity in the food retailing outlets indicates too much competition exists in the industry.

Atkinson denied the point, saying the gross overcapacity of food retailers demands immediate government control to ensure efficient use of resources. He said food store chains build more stores than necessary (in some areas of western Canada economists have estimated overcapacity at about 80 percent), therefore making inefficient use of their labour.

"With overexpansion and under-utilisation of your resources, you can expect low productivity."

Atkinson said labour unions can't be blamed for increased food prices, because management has chosen to use labour inefficiently in its search for profits. For example, Dominion Stores Limited, (owned by the giant Argus Corporation), is building two new supermarkets in Thunder Bay, Ontario, a centre with more than enough food retailers already.

NFU executive secretary Stuart Thiessen told the committee that Loblaw's Groceries, owned by the giant Weston empire, plans to close 400 stores.

Atkinson said that as food conglomerates spread their operations into more aspects of the industry, consumer prices increase because the corporations have more "profit centres", one at each stage of the production process. Vertical integration explains much of the markup between the price paid to farmers and the price charged to consumers.

The NFU spokesmen made clear that higher farm prices aren't necessarily incongruous with lower consumer prices and decent labour wages.

Former NFU organizer Alf Gleave, now a New Democratic Party MP, told his committee colleagues that while food processors are guaranteed stable prices for farm products, the consumer is at the mercy of the corporations' price regulating.

The NFU appearance was followed by testimony from the Canadian Cattlemen's Association which claimed that "far from being an undesirable system, it is free enterprise system which has been responsible for a 50 percent increase in the production and quality of beef.

People who are outraged at the high price of beef in Canadian stores will be interested in the cattlemen's declaration that "the Canadian consumer buys more beef per unit of income than people in any other country with the possible exception of the United States."

Group calls for coffee boycott

A boycott of Angolan coffee has been called in support of the Angolan people's struggle for independence from Portugal.

The Ottawa-based Southern Africa Information Group (SAIG) is urging consumers not to buy instant coffees distributed by General Foods, Nestles and Standard Brands. The group says the three companies use Angolan coffee in their instant brands.

According to a SAIG information pamphlet, taxes in Angolan coffee profits are spent by the Portuguese government on war activities against Angolan and other African independence movements in the Portuguese colonies. The boycott is also a protest against the use of forced labor to harvest coffee.

The instant brands on the boycott list are: Yuban, Maxim, Maxwell House, Sanka, Brim, Neseafe, Taster's Choice and Chase and Sanborn.

Alternative brands are: Red Rose, Top value, Pride of Arabia, High Park, Two Cup, Super Value Brands, Kadana, Food City, Dixon's, Mulken's, Sterling, Stuart, Pells and Daily Grange.

Canada imports one-eight of its green coffee supply from Angola; only Brazil supplies more. SAIG estimates the Portuguese government uses at least $20.8 million annually in taxes from coffee profits for the war effort. Trade with Canada supplies over one million dollars of these taxes.

supplementary candidate's statement
The following statement was approved recently by the underquoted candidate for election to the Governing Council from Full-time Undergraduate Student Constituency II:
RICHARD SCHABAS - Reform Slate. Fights for equal access to the Roberts library and against the fees increases have mobilized thousands of students in mass meetings, occupations and fees strikes. So far, the university and the government have ignored our arguments and protests. Vic leads Div IB; Law spring in IA

Three significant games were played in the final week of regular season interfaculty basketball play. Vic clinched first place in Division IB with a 44-41 decision over Erindale, while PHE B nipped SGS 69-68 to guarantee itself a spot in the playoffs. Meanwhile, Law appeared ominously strong, crushing St. Mike's A 70-59.

With Vic trailing 41-40 and less than a minute to play, Andre Ezers stole an errant Erindale pass and converted it into a lay-up to send Vic ahead for good. Seconds later, Erindale missed an opportunity to score and Vic went into a deep freeze. Ezers scored another two points during the stall to end up with 16 for the game.

Other scorers for Vic included Joe Kastelle, the Don Mills dart thrower (10 points), and Paul Mims (10). Meanwhile, Al Nikrosius, the leading candidate for rookie-of-the-year honours, potted 17 points for Erindale, and Jimmy Walker hooped 10.

Last Monday at 5 pm, a ferocious contest developed between SGS and PHE B for the right to the last playoff spot in Division IB. Both teams opened up with zone defences, but SGS had to soon switch to a man to man to stay in the game. After SGS' changeover to the man to man, the game was in doubt until PHE B's Rick Ward scored two key baskets in the final minute of play.

Rich hooped 13 points while team-mates Gary Boguski and Cor Doret, the non-stop train, were scoring 11 points apiece. Content to bomb PHE B's zone from downtown, SGS had three scorers in double figures. Steve Silberling (22 points), Ron Johnson (16), and Jim Maroosis, the bearded Brooklynite (11) were instrumental in keeping SGS within striking distance all game.

The Law-St. Mike's game Tuesday could have been a preview of this year's final. Law, having won six in a row prior to this game, seemed devastating as it easily handled St. Mike's.

SMC's Larry Trafford acquired three quick fouls, and this could be viewed as the turning point in the game. With Trafford on the bench in foul trouble, Law completely controlled the tempo of the game.

Al Sternberg and Jamie Halfnight were the leading point getters for Law with 27 and 10, respectively.

Meanwhile, Tom Campana and Trafford scored 10 points each for St. Mike's.

If one were looking for a trend in the interfac struggles, it would appear that Law is hitting its stride at the right time, and, at this time, is the best team in interfaculty play.

Blues head for season win 19, meet Waterloo tonight at Arena

University of Toronto hockey Blues will play second place Western Section finishers Waterloo Warriors tonight at 6:30 pm at Varsity Arena. Varsity advanced to the semi-finals by defeating York University Yeomen 8-2 Tuesday night.

In three other games against traditional rivals Waterloo this season Blues won by a narrow 4-3 margin in double overtime in the Hockey Canada tournament early in November. 5-3 in exhibition play in Waterloo, and finally 7-3 in regular season play in Toronto.

Although Blues won all three games, Waterloo appears to be back in good form, defeating Guelph 7-0 in quarter-final play Tuesday night. In the other quarter-final game in the Western Section of the OUA, Western dominated Windsor 7-1.

The other Eastern Section quarter-final game saw Laurentian narrowly defeat Queen's 5-4 in overtime play in Sudbury.

Blues will be looking for their 19th win this evening at Varsity Stadium. Western plays Laurentian at 9 pm for the other OUA final playoff spot.

The winners of tonight's two games meet tomorrow at 8 pm for the Queen's Cup, with the victor travelling to Edmonton for the two-out-of-three semi-final prior to the national championship game in Toronto March 17th.

ATHLETIC DIRECTORATE ELECTIONS FOR 1973-74

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14TH, 1973

Closing Date For Nominations — Monday March 12th, 1973 — 5:00 P.M.

To be eligible for nomination a student must be in the second or higher year, but not in his final year at the University. There will be one ballot only under which 121 members of the electoral body (composition available in the Athletic Office) will vote for one candidate for each of three groups as follows:

Group "A" Basketball, Football, Hockey

Group "B" Sports other than those specified in Group "A"

Group "C" College and Faculty Athletic Associations

The votes will be tallied under group headings and the elected representatives to the Athletic Directorate declared as follows:

The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "A"

The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "B"

The nominee polling the highest number of votes in Group "C"

(The second representative in this group is appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee — see next paragraph)

In addition to the five students elected as set out above, there is one student appointment from The Students' Administrative Council and one student appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee to make a total of seven student representatives upon the Athletic Directorate.

The basic aims of the Athletic Association are set out formally in Article 1 of its constitution reading as follows:

"The Association shall be called the University of Toronto Athletic Association, and its object shall be the encouragement of athletic sport, the promotion of physical education, the provision of recreation for its members and the maintenance of the highest standard of amateur sport."

The Athletic Directorate, as the controlling body for athletics at the University, meets twice a month during the academic year and deals with a wide range of athletic matters upon which decisions are required. A good deal of this business is considered in committee, all committees having student representation.

Students elected to the Athletic Directorate are expected to attend the formal meetings unless there is good reason for absence; also they are expected to take their share of the committee work. A student member may quite properly bring any matter before the Directorate which his constituents wish to have discussed.

Each nominee for election to the Directorate may submit a written policy statement which he is entitled to send to all members of his electoral body. This is the recommendation of the student committee which revised the method of election of student representatives.

Admin does not support athletics

Today we begin a series on men's athletics at the University of Toronto, and, more specifically, the trouble the program is in and why. We start by looking at the power structure of the University of Toronto Athletic Association and its relation to the administration of the university.

The administration of the University of Toronto pays nothing toward the athletic program at the university. By neglecting athletics the administration ignores what many people consider to be a legitimate area of the educational program.

And failing to subsidize the 'athletics' side of the university community, the administration is slowly starving the program to death.

By virtue of the existing structure and the lack of recourse for effective change, the administration is controlling an area of university life which virtually pays for itself.

In fact, the University of Toronto Athletic Association budget for 1972-73 shows that students pay for over 50 per cent of the total operating costs of men's athletics. Of a total budget of $341,421, students paid $201,901.

Although this budget is set on the recommendation of the UTAA and administered by that body, it is ultimately controlled by Simcoe Hall and the university auditor and Assistant Vice-President Frank Stone, and the Vice-President and Provost Don Forster.

Composition of the Athletic Directorate

Briefly, what is involved in the governing structure of the men's UTAA is the Athletic Directorate itself, composed of 20 members, only seven of which are student representatives from the athletic community. Moving up the ladder we find the executive committee of the Directorate and, finally, at the top of the organizational pyramid, the Governing Council (The UTAA falls under the campus services portfolio headed by Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway.)

By the terms of the UTAA constitution, "subject to the authority of the Governing Council all matters concerning the Athletic Association shall be under the control of a Directorate."

Student representation on the Directorate consists of five elected members, one member from the Students' Administrative Council, and one member appointed by and from the Intramural Sports Committee.

Other members include seven representatives from teaching or senior administrative staff of the university (appointed by the President), the President of the university, two representatives elected annually by the Advisory Board, the Director of the University Health Service, the Director of Athletics, and the Assistant Director.

Officers of the Directorate include an Honorary President (the President of the university ex-officio), a president, elected annually by the non-student Directorate members, a vice-president, elected annually by the student Directorate members, the Director of Athletics, appointed by the Directorate, but subject to the approval of the Governing Council. The secretary is the assistant director (administration) of the UTAA, and is appointed by the Directorate subject to the approval of the Governing Council.

Functions of the Directorate

Director of the University Health

athletics?

Service George Wodehouse is president of the Directorate this year. It is not clear why or how the UTAA constitution enables the director of a university health service to become the president of a body overseeing the operation of an athletics program.

Wodehouse presides at all Directorate meetings and "signs with the appropriate officers all contracts negotiated by the Association within its powers". He is also the enforcer of the Association's rules and has general supervision over the affairs of the Association.

In effect, the president has a fair amount of power, mainly in the area of financial matters.

On the other hand, Director of Athletics Dalt White has little power within the terms of reference of the constitution, and mainly fulfills an administrative role.

Under the provisions of the constitution he is responsible for "the general supervision and co-ordination of the Athletics Program conducted by the Association," and the arrangement and completion of all intercollegiate schedules. White must also supervise and control all full-time, part-time, or honorary coaches, instructors, and trainers. However, he is not empowered to decide positions, but can only "make recommendations to the Directorate for the engagement or termination of service of all coaching and instructional staff," and "recommends payment" of salaries or honoraria he considers adequate.

The position of vice-president, — this year held by law student Michael Penman — is totally powerless. Penman is only able to preside over meetings in Wodehouse's absence. Only a non-student member is empowered to sign contracts in Wodehouse's absence.

Assistant director (administration) David Tinker is responsible for "the co-ordination and general supervision of all administrative functions of the UTAA other than those coming under the jurisdiction of the Director of Athletics." Tinker also co-ordinates and supervises all administrative functions of the UTAA other than those under White's jurisdiction.

He is also responsible for "the general direction, supervision, and control" of both Varsity Stadium and Arena with respect to "rentals to outside organizations, the admission of the general public, and the proper maintenance of the grounds and buildings".

Tinker also "supervises and directs" the UTAA accounts, including "the collection, banking and disbursing within the budget approved by the (Governing Council) of all monies accruing to the (UTAA) from fees, gate receipts and other sources." Along with Wodehouse he "signs all contracts negotiated by the Association within its powers."

In addition, Tinker must prepare financial statements and the UTAA budget, "and such other information as may be required" by Executive Vice-President and Provost Don Forster. The accounts, must, in turn, be submitted to the university auditor, who later presents his report to the Directorate.

Executive Committee

The UTAA Directorate also has a select decision-making, "Executive Committee", composed of the Directorate president (Wodehouse) as chairman, the Directorate vice-president (Penman), three non-student members, the athletic director (White) and the assistant director (administration) (Tinker).

The executive committee studies "such matters as may from time to time be necessary", and makes recommendations to the Directorate. The seven members have the "power to act in such matters that require a decision before the date of the next meeting of the Directorate. They also consider and recommend to the Directorate the annual financial budget of the association.

The Athletic Directorate must consider the budget, based on that presented to and passed by the Executive Committee at its annual budget meeting (no later than April 30). When adopted, the assistant director (administration) must forward the budget for approval to the Governing Council through the assistant vice-president of the university.

Comparison with other universities

As we have tried to show through other articles in the past few weeks, there are structures at other universities — specifically Queen's and Waterloo — where students have been or are in the process of being given voting power representative of their financial contribution to the athletic program.

At Queen's, a student majority (of those students involved in athletics) is guaranteed, and at Waterloo steps are being taken to provide a majority. Even the women's directorate at the Benson Building contains a majority of women student athletes (15 out of 22 members).

At the University of Toronto there is a preponderance of administrators and faculty members on a directorate set up to control and regulate men's athletics. The students — those who have the greatest interest in the program — have no effective means of changing a structure controlling the program which they pay for.

The administration of the university appears to have accepted the status quo of the athletics structure, and although the need for change has been recognized by Simcoe Hall, athletics is apparently very low on the administration's list of priorities.

Monday: Budgetary difficulties, business enterprises with extra-university connections.

Negotiations break down at math sit-in

By BOB BETISON

Occupying students met Friday with associate math chairman Ray Vanstone in what proved to be a futile attempt to gain some break in negotiations which appear to be stalemated.

The math students decided last night to continue their occupation indefinitely. The occupation of the fourth floor outer office of department chairman George Duff is entering its seventh day with no end in sight.

The students, according to steering committee member Carver Scobie, are going to remain "until our demands are met, including a restructuring of the math department to include students in decision-making and the rehiring of the three professors whose contracts were not renewed," Stephen Salaff, David Spring and Michael Mather.

Scobie stated that the occupation has raised a lot of interest and concern for remodeling the department to serve the needs of the students.

In a discussion after the Vanstone meeting, which was also attended by math professors Peter Rosenthal and Ed Barbeau, the occupiers decided to continue until their demands are granted.

They set up a steering committee comprised of Arts and Science Student Union fieldworker Dave Depoe, students Bill Edwards, Andy Carder, Susan Goldberg and Scobie.

Students were told at the Friday noon meeting with Vanstone that they would not be recognized in negotiations. The associate chairman also said that while he had recommended Salaff for reappointment and thought he was a good teacher, he could not discuss the case because of the possibility of prejudicing formal appeal procedures.

He was supported in this by Undergraduate Curriculum Committee chairman Ed Barbeau, who while sympathetic to Salaff, said he recognized the official channels of appeal.

Rosenthal, however, said that the occupation had brought about the serious discussion that was "inconceivable" in the department before. He said Salaff had done "me a fantastic favour and he's done you (the students) a fantastic favour."

The students rejected the department's offerings, charging that "legitimate channels" were useless and haven't achieved anything in the four month campaign. They questioned the legitimacy of any present committees on hiring, firing and tenure because of the total absence of student input.

Though Salaff publicly stated that he was willing to have all confidential information made public, Vanstone avoided talking about details of specific cases.

The occupation continued through the weekend with varying numbers of students, SAC presidential candidates Bob Anderson, Chuck Vickery and Heather Ridout appeared but only Ridout of the United Socialist slate stayed a significant length of time.

Also among the occupiers were supporters of the Reform Slate for Governing Council.

On Sunday morning, students listened to speakers from the Université du Québec à Montréal, Trent and Brock Universities detail struggles at their campuses.

Charles Lee from Brock warned students not "to get suckered into committees". He explained how the Brock occupation had been ended when a parity committee of 12 people was set up to look at questions raised by the occupation. The Brock occupation also dealt with arbitrary firings.

Thérèse Faubert, from the strike-bound U du Québec explained how students shut down the Montréal campus for over a month.

According to Faubert, the mass meetings have replaced the traditional student government and for the first time since 1969 a province-wide student movement is forming. All this in spite of what she said were strong efforts by the university administration to suppress the strike through the use of riot police, suspensions, injunctions and other threats.

"The struggle can only go forward," she concluded. Faubert then voiced her solidarity with the occupation and returned to Montréal for a crucial rally.

The occupation has received support from all over the U of T campus. It has already been supported by the Victoria University Students Administrative Council, the Graduate Students Union, the Arts and Science Student Union, the Erindale students council, the Innis student society, and the Political Economy, Math-Physics and Sociology course unions.

Occupiers plan to have math tutoring 24 hours a day and speak to math classes in an effort to get students to raise their demands at undergraduate curriculum committee meetings Tuesday at 11 am and again at 3 pm.

A Sid Smith rally is being arranged for Wednesday to have the leaders of the Université du Québec student strike speak on their struggle.

There appears to be no threat of police action, according to Internal Affairs Committee chairman Paul Cadario. He also feels the occupation would not be prohibited by the discipline code being proposed to the Governing Council.

Students are also raising the issue of the weighting of first year exams. Salaff claims he was fired at least partially because of a dispute about the heavy weight given to first year exams.

Salaff advocates a grading system with more weight on term or exam work which ever the student does better.

Students, faculty discuss strategy at Friday meeting outside occupied office.

Cops were not at sit-in

A Varsity story Friday incorrectly implied that Metro police met with campus police Thursday to discuss the student occupation of the math department offices. In fact, the police were on campus in regard to a New College bomb scare.

The confusion about the reason Metro police were on campus arose after math student Kevin McQuillan overheard the officers telephoning campus police from New College and followed them to U of T police headquarters in the Borden Building. When McQuillan called internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway about the police presence on campus, her secretary told him Conway was "dealing with that matter right now", apparently meaning to refer to the unpublicized bomb scare and not the math department sit-in.

The Varsity regrets the inaccurate impression created by its publication of the story, compounded by a headline which went further than the story to state the police had been meeting about the math occupation. Varsity reporters did, however, try unsuccessfully Thursday afternoon and evening to reach Conway.

In another math sit-in inaccuracy, The Varsity's Wednesday report said more than 300 students initially occupied the math department offices. Although more than 300 students attended the rally preceding the rally and most of them were still around to vote in favour of the occupation, only about 100 of them actually began the sit-in.

Students at U du Q vote to end strike

MONTREAL (CUPI) — While bouncers armed with baseball bats patrol corridors, students at the Université du Québec à Montréal are returning to classes today in the wake of a concerted offensive by the administration to break their five week strike.

Students faced with threatened cancellation of their school year, voted at a general assembly yesterday to return to classes and continue their battle against the administration and its new fee policies along different lines. The new fee policies would force the expulsion of many students who are unable to pay.

Despite an injunction against the strike obtained two weeks ago by the administration, few courses were held last week. Students and teachers boycotted classes in protest against the injunction.

But, threatened with fines and salary cutoffs, the teachers voted last Thursday to return to classes.

The administration, at the same time, announced that the school year was extended until May 25, and that any courses not resumed immediately would be cancelled.

This tactic, it was pointed out in yesterday's meeting, would divide students course by course, activity by activity.

To ensure that the university remains 'open' and classes are held, the administration went so far as to hire professional bouncers (reportedly at 150 dollars a day) to patrol the halls and to deal with 'disruptions'. Students claimed that some bouncers carried baseball bats.

Despite these intimidations and threats, few classes were given on Friday and over 1500 students, from UQAM, Université de Montréal, and several CEGEPs, demonstrated that morning in a march to the Palais de Justice. In rows of seven or eight, the protesters at one point covered all of St. Lawrence Boulevard from Sherbrooke to Ontario Streets.

The students rallied near the Palais de Justice to hear short speeches by lawyer Robert Lemieux and sociologist Charles Gagnon condemning the collusion between the university and the state's judicial and police arm.

Meanwhile, inside the court buildings, judge E. Martel agreed to prolong the administration's injunction to prevent picketing until tonight. He also refused to hear the pleas of the teachers' and workers' union against the injunction until they were presented in writing.

The unions maintain that the injunction, directed against not only eleven students and COPE, the students' strike coordinating committee, but also "all non-designated persons" who support the strike, is a flagrant violation of their right to strike.

Court hearings will resume today, as the administration seeks to make the injunction permanent.

It was in this context of intimidation and threatened cancellation of their school year that the UQAM students voted yesterday to return to classes.

The resolution finally accepted by the assembly took into account that the 'university and the government refuse to recognize COPE and the general assembly because they fear the recognition of a militant student movement which can disturb their 'social peace' and that 'the state cannot allow the students to organize on an autonomous base and ally themselves with the workers' and teachers' movements'.

In returning to classes, the students are aware, as the resolution points out, 'that we haven't yet achieved our main demand for the non-exclusion of students for financial reasons'. But the resolution made it very clear that the struggle against the fee policies will continue, especially next September.

The five-week strike was far from a total failure. Its very length was a testimony to the strength of the students' resistance against university and government pressure.

The students were able to force the administration to repeatedly delay its fee deadlines.

They were able to compel the government to postpone for at least one year its province-wide policy which had precipitated the strike.

Classes may be cut for study of report

Classes will probably be cancelled Tuesday, March 13, for a "Day of Study" on the report of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario (COPSEO).

Vice-president Don Forster said yesterday that, acting on a SAC request, he had sent a letter to each faculty, requesting that classes be cancelled between 11 am and 2 pm.

"The issue now is determining what members of the Wright Commission will speak," said SAC vice-president John Helliwell, who is organizing the Day of Study. SAC is waiting for a reply from former commission chairman Doug Wright on whether or not he will speak.

SAC and the U of T Faculty Association are co-sponsoring the Day of Study. The Alumni Association, the Graduate Students Union, and the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students have all endorsed the plans.

SAC will receive a $2,500 grant from the Ministry of College and Universities to publish and distribute SAC's 30 page version of the COPSEO report, Helliwell said. He hopes that 30,000 copies of the precis will be distributed across the province.

SSSC trials start today

Trials of two women arrested in picket-line violence at U of T a month ago will take place today.

Denise Havers, charged with disturbing the peace, and Rhonda Fleming, facing an assaulting police charge, will appear in courtroom 33 of the Old City Hall. Crown Attorney Applegath said he was not ready to proceed last Friday. The trials were then remanded until today.

Both women are members of the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee, which demonstrated outside the university's fees office at 215 Huron Street February 1. When U of T police attempted to keep access to the building, which also houses the personnel and other administrative offices, open, shoving and fighting broke out.

Seven persons were arrested, most SSSC members who were attempting to persuade students not to pay their second term fees instalments. They were also supporting a group of service workers who demanded prohibition of layoffs.

Judge McMahon said Friday the trial will definitely start today, rather than being remanded again, and ordered subpoenaed witnesses to appear.

SHOUT has cheap dental aid

The Student Health Organization at U of T (SHOUT) has inexpensive dental services available near the campus to students.

Each visit to the 64 Augusta Avenue office costs only three dollars, in contrast to high professional dentist fees.

The service's hours are between 10 am and noon, 2 and 4 pm and 7 to 10 pm Mondays and Wednesdays. Appointments are necessary, and can be made by calling 364-4107.

Task force member asked to resign

The Graduate Students Union has called for the resignation of a member of a presidential task force, calling the method of his selection "highly improper" and "a rebuke to the GSU".

The union's recommended persons for the task force on academic appointments were passed over by president John Evans without explanation, says GSU president Wendy Le Blanc.

Le Blanc says she has nothing against Byron Wall, the only graduate student on the task force individually, but has asked for his resignation in a letter to Evans because of what she describes as his making "a farce out of student participation in university affairs."

Evans admitted last night that Wall's recommendation came from the dean of graduate studies' office. Assistant graduate dean F.A. Sherk Thursday refused to comment on the propriety of the move, calling it "the president's business."

The president last night explained there were a number of factors involved in his choice, among them the academic background of those considered. It would be "unfortunate", he said, if too many came from one division. He said he wanted those task force members with "the best qualifications."

He declined to comment on the GSU letter until he had spoken to Le Blanc.

In passing over two GSU suggestions for the task force, Evans violated a tacit understanding that members of most similar committees be chosen from suggestions by the constituency involved, particularly in the case of student bodies. Le Blanc described the move as "out of accord with what seemed to be (Evans') philosophy of student participation".

On several other occasions this year, Evans and the administration have chosen student governor Paul Cadario to represent students or be the sole student on important bodies, usually without consulting either the caucus of student Governing Council members or SAC.

Several times, SAC and individual student governors have expressed opposition to this practice.

The GSU threatens not to participate in what it fears is a "facade of legitimacy" in recommending names in future. "Each time we have made a submission our names have been refused," the letter charges.

"To ignore the GSU places the integrity of the committee and yourself (Evans) in doubt."

In fact, Evans passed over the GSU suggestions twice, not just once. His first choice from among SGS dean

Ed Safarian's nominees, Jake Rice, turned Evans down because of time commitments.

Although Evans rejected the GSU suggestions, the only undergraduate on the task force, SAC communications commissioner Debra Lewis, was among those SAC suggested.

However, SAC president Eric Miglin is still "not completely happy" with the composition of the task force, which has been asked to study "the types, nature and review of appointments appropriate to a period approaching a 'steady state' of total enrollment." Tenure, "limits to the size of the academic staff establishment", and dismissal are among a list of specific suggestions for topics to be considered.

Miglin said the president's decision to appoint only two students was "unfortunate".

He said he wanted "another one or two students" on the body.

The task force, to be chaired by vice-president Don Forster, includes six professors, two administrators and one provincial government appointee to the Governing Council, in addition to the two students.

SAC objected to initial reports last month that the task force would contain only one student, saying there should be at least 20 students.

Some student governors objected to the structure of the body as a presidential task force, rather than a committee responsible to the university's representative and authoritative body, the Governing Council. They also complained about the faculty-dominated nature of the body, when it was to deal with such a vital concern to students as teaching.

The task force was instructed by Evans to make an initial report by the end of June, in time to be implemented in the 1974-75 budget, which will be planned in the subsequent six months.

Vickery can't occupy two positions

SAC services commissioner Chuck Vickery is running for two important campus posts although he would not be able to serve in both positions simultaneously.

Vickery is running for SAC presidency, as well as for the Governing Council. The SAC presidency is a full-time job, so the incumbent is never a student in the year in which he serves. However, Governing Council members must belong to the constituency which they are elected to represent. A non-student, such as the SAC president, would not be eligible.

Vickery has indicated that if he were elected SAC president, as well as to Governing Council, he would resign his Governing Council position by September 1, when he would officially cease being a student.

Accordingly students voting to elect him to Governing Council must do so with the expectation that he may well have to resign early in his term, leaving them without representation until he was replaced.

Even then, his replacement would require considerable time to learn the ropes of the Governing Council. Outgoing student governors have stressed that newcomers should be as knowledgeable as possible about the council.

Similarly, those supporting him for the SAC presidency do so in the knowledge that he may be devoting part of his energies to the Governing Council.

Student governor Paul Cadario, also an engineer, has called Vickery "extremely irresponsible" for running for both positions at once, when he knows he would not be able to serve in them both. (Cadario is backing Bob Anderson for the SAC presidency.)

Mike Naemseh, running for Governing Council on the Reform Slate, has come up against a similar technicality. He is a student in the Faculty of Education, in which students remain for only one year. This means that he would no longer be a student by the time his term commenced, were he to be elected.

He points out, however, that this rule effectively leaves Faculty of Education students disenfranchised, since 1973-74 students will not know until August if they are admitted — too late to run for Governing Council. For this reason, says Naemseh, he is running anyway.

Authors deny code will ban demos

The authors of a report on discipline which may be approved by the Governing Council next month have denied it will prohibit all peaceful demonstrations and sit-ins.

Internal Affairs Committee chairman Paul Cadario, who co-authored the report along with vice-president Jill Conway, says he hopes that any interpretation of it prohibiting demonstrations is not the intention of the Internal Affairs Committee, which has approved it. "It's definitely not my opinion", he said, stating that, for example, the current occupation of the mathematics department offices would not be prohibited. He thought math chairman George Duff would be permitted to enter his office.

Conway agreed last night that peaceful demonstrations would not be banned if the proposed code is implemented. She also stressed the liberal intentions of the committee.

Asked if the math occupation would be permitted, she replied, without directly answering the question, "Classes are going on as usual."

As long as the academic functions of the university were not impaired enough to hurt its educational function, she felt a peaceful demonstration would be allowed.

In fact, the code specifically states that "freedom of enquiry," which is protected under the proposal, "entitles members of the university... to engage in peaceful demonstrations."

However, it also prohibits "intentional or reckless obstruction or disruption or undue disturbance, by any means, of teaching, research, administration, disciplinary proceedings, or any other authorized activity on university premises."

The above is merely one of eight examples of prohibited conduct.

Some students have interpreted the clause to mean what they believe it literally says, that any intentional disruption of an activity such as administration, for example the administrative offices of the math department, would be banned.

Cadario admits, although Conway does not, that the wording of the clause is "unfortunate" in that it is open to interpretation. Internal Affairs should "perhaps" consider adding an interpretation to the clause, or reword it at tomorrow's meeting, he thought.

Should demonstrators be found guilty of improperly disrupting the "normal, vital functions" of the university, according to the proposals, they would face sanctions ranging from fines to expulsions.

A tribunal, with a majority composed of the accused's peers, would act as judge.

Should the university administration decide that a demonstration was sufficiently disruptive as to require the use of police to break it up, Cadario feels under the proposed code that a representative body "such as the Internal Affairs Committee or the Governing Council" should be consulted. As well, a warning should be given to the demonstrators.

Cadario stressed that demonstrators would not be found guilty of any crime by the university until a tribunal had so decided, even if police were used.

However, those arrested in last spring's breakup of the Simcoe Hall demonstration found in court recently that as soon as the police were called in, the demonstrators were liable to charges of trespass, even though the university later decided not to press charges.

In addition, any university member, not just the administration, can initiate a charge.

Cadario differentiated between different types of protest and whether or not they would be allowed.

Demonstrations that "interfere in a significant way with a small number of people" would be prohibited, he said.

Disruptions that interfere, again in a significant way, with a large number of people would also be prohibited, he thought.

Along with the math occupation, Cadario thought the two occupations of Simcoe Hall, one last spring, the other in 1970 in support of day care, would not be prohibited, he said, because they were not interfering with vital administrative functions. Each took place in the Senate Chamber, which Cadario stressed was not designated for alternative use at the time.

However, in each case, Simcoe Hall workers were sent home from work by the administration. And, last year, then-acting president Jack Sword felt constrained to call in Metro police to break up an occupation of less than 50 people, on Sunday morning.

Cadario pointed out that it is unlikely that 1000 people, the maximum involved in last spring's occupation, would be charged with an academic crime by the university.

"It's a matter of degree," he added, noting the wide support for the protest.

Greeks call for end to junta

By GRETCHEN ROEDDE

Several hundred Greek and Canadian supporters pledged solidarity with the resistance movement opposing the military junta in Greece at a demonstration Sunday in Nathan Phillips square, sponsored by the Pan Hellenic Liberation Movement (PAK) and the Committee for the Restoration of Democracy in Greece.

PAK leader and York professor Andreas Papandreou urged support for the resistance movement which has been opposing the terrorism, imprisonment, and persecution utilized by the military regime, which was responsible for the death of five students last week.

"At this moment in the history of the fight of the Greek people for liberation from dictatorship, and the recent deaths of students involved in the struggle, the progressive leaders of the west must take a stand," said Papandreou. "Insist that your government break off diplomatic relations with the junta; protest the American occupation of Greece. Collaborate with Greek students and workers involved in the struggle here", he urged. "The fight has just begun" declared the former Greek cabinet minister. "The final victory will be ours."

Support has already been pledged by the Ryerson Student Union, the Students for a Free Greece at U of T, the Confederation of York Student Federations, McGill professors and the Ontario NDP.

Also on the platform with Papandreou were aldermen Karl Jaffary, Bill Kilbourn, Dan Heap and Elizabeth Eayres, U of T professors Danny Goldstick and Frank Cunningham, and York University history professor Gabriel Kolko.

Greeks rally at Nathan Phillips Square to hear Andreas Papandreou.

Last Monday edition

Monday ends today for The Varsity... at least until next fall.

Today marks the last Monday The Varsity publishes this year. Next week, the paper will limp along with two issues — Wednesday and Friday. The following two weeks wind up the year with one issue each, both appearing on Wednesday.

So, jot down those publication dates or you may miss getting your letter, Here and Now notice, or ad in the issue you want. Here and Now and ad deadlines remain the same: Here and Now by 1 pm the day before publication, ads by noon three working days before the date of publication.

The remaining Here and Now columns will list all events occurring between the date of that day's paper and noon the day of the next paper.

And, what does this all mean? Just that exams and essay deadlines are uncomfortably close at hand.

It's not late sixties

SAC can't leap ahead of its constituents

Student government has fallen from its proverbial high point during the late sixties. No more do student councillors passionately throw themselves into student struggles and social problems. Whereas student politicians of the last decade were striding ahead of their constituents, urging them to cast aside the old academic confines of the indifferent university, most of today's aspirants keep amazingly in step with their electorate. And, that electorate is becoming increasingly conservative, increasingly conscious of the university as an all but crumbling job mill.

Gone are the days when student councillors dared to discuss the affairs of the world in the council's lofty chambers. Indeed, the latest draft of the Students' Administrative Council constitution prohibits the council from spending money on non-university activities.

As universities remain committed to the pursuit of academics, more and more of the bright, young high school students who used to carve out a career for themselves in the university jungle are not coming here. Increasingly dwindling job prospects have done little to convince skeptical students that it's worth overcoming the hurdles government is placing in the university student's path to get a degree. More and more, those who bother coming to university are the mere job seekers who care little about the world around them, who know they're just at university to get a degree.

Student awareness is not completely vanquished. It's just re-directed, re-directed to the personalized interests that dominated the fifties and early sixties. Even student rallying cries have shifted. In the late sixties, recruiting for a company supplying the U.S. with napalm for Vietnam and absent day care facilities provided the focus. In the seventies, it's libraries and departmental teaching. The activists' perspective is still progressive, still just, but it lacks a world view. To have meaning, a cause must touch the individuals' life directly, not merely as one member of humanity.

A year ago, U of T undergraduates turfed incumbent president Bob Spencer, one of the leaders of the popular library struggle, out of office in favour of a relatively conservative ticket headed by then Engineering Society president Eric Miglin. Spencer's active involvement in the three library occupations wasn't the only reason for his ouster, but it did play a major role. Admittedly, the Miglin ticket attracted a heavy professional student vote, the heaviest in the student council's history.

But, the professional students alone didn't elect Miglin. Arts and science students gave Miglin strong support too. He promised them an end to confrontation and improved student services. SAC would, the Miglin ticket told its electorate, communicate, not confront.

This year's council has come under scathing attack from the left for its failure to actively champion student interest as actively as they would like. The Miglin council, for example, pulled off a near record setting turnout for the Ontario Federation of Students' fall referendum on the funding of post-secondary education. However, when the OFS decided to demonstrate student sentiment by holding a province-wide demonstration outside the provincial legislature during the opening of the new session, SAC refused to participate. It might create a bad public image, they reasoned.

And, later, when OFS started talking about putting the referendum results into action and calling a second term fees withholding action, the local council was notably reluctant to participate. When they did decide to give the go-ahead to a U of T withholding campaign, the council restricted itself to a mailing and lacklustre publicity campaign which were relatively successful, but laid little groundwork for any follow-up. A month later, the executive divided over prolonging the strike; the council called it off.

All throughout the campaign, the council was criticized for not offering the necessary leadership. That criticism was justified. But, considering the Miglin ticket's mandate, that unenthusiastic, reserved response was what they were committed to give.

Where the Miglin team excelled was administration. Miglin and vice-president John Helliwell, especially gave the council a strong sense of management, and a capacity for getting things accomplished that its predecessor lacked. The Spencer council jumped in — sincerely but unrealistically — wherever an issue developed; the Miglin council cautiously stood on the sidelines, hoping the issue would blow over.

Somewhere between these two is undoubtedly the realm of the practical, the ground on which a responsible council can establish its freedom. In surveying the possible for future student councils, one must keep the matter in its proper perspective. Romantic left-liberals must stop dreaming of the days of yore in which a student council could change the campus overnight and stuff progressive politics down its constituents' throats.

A student government must deal with the realities of its campus, not with what it would like to be. Vanguard movements will only turn off their constituents, antagonizing them to even more moderate proposals.

A student council need not be as conservative as its electorate, but it must frame its policies within the context of the realizable. At U of T, that seems to be to confine itself to offering leadership in matters that affect the lives of its constituents so directly that they can easily appreciate how it relates to them.

In considering what it can do, any ticket contesting the SAC presidency and vice-presidencies must size up the council with which it will have to work. Excessively radical or conservative platforms are not likely to successfully weather a council lacking a majority with similar views. Yet, none of the five slates running for office this year have apparently encouraged like-minded people to run for council in any large numbers.

Hard-working Anderson is more of a committee person (liking to shunt issues into committees) than a natural leader. And, many of his attitudes — writing the fees withholding campaign off as ineffective, being willing to settle for an educational role rather than that of catalyst, and his reluctant endorsement of occupation tactics — sound an awfully lot like those the Miglin team possess.

Doug Wilson and Ian Dignam join second year UC student Paul Baumann in what many write off as a lark campaign. None of the trio have any student government experience. They don't really have a platform, instead mouthing platitudes about "getting people involved in what they want to do in films, in dances, in whatever they want". Not surprisingly for a group with their limited goals, they don't think they'd have any problem running council because of their lack of experience.

For the first time, the chauvinist Canadian Liberation Movement has fielded a team, sending Stop the Student Surcharge Committee (SSSC) chairman Peter Havers and Roman Olszewski and George Huczek into the fray. That isn't too surprising; the CLM has stepped up its campus profile this year. The Havers-Olszewski-Huczek ticket's platform pretty well consists of the programs of the 85% Quota Campaign and the SSSC. The weak logic characterizing these campaigns has been dragged into the SAC race.

Havers and group have no student government experience, and the SSSC's superficial rhetoric and disruptive tactics do absolutely nothing to encourage anyone to want to put their student council in CLM hands.

The traditional Young Socialist slate, which has continually picked up strength in recent years, has been superseded by a United Socialist Slate, uniting the YS and the Trotskyist Old Mole. Heather Ridout is USS presidential candidate, Greg McMaster and Alice Klein her v-p running mates.

The USS platform comes as no surprise. It sums up the issues for which the two constituent groups have been struggling on the U of T campus for the past few years. When the USS condemns this year's council for inaction and lack of leadership, they are not suddenly voicing criticism in hope of election, but repeating an attack they have waged all year. The YS and Old Mole have aligned themselves with student groups fighting for improved day care, unrestricted access to the Robarts Library stacks, and an end to the cutbacks in education. As a USS-led council, SAC would not ignore progressive student struggles, they say.

The USS slate, however, has not tossed aside the principles of revolutionary socialism, principles which could very well leave a USS executive frustrated by a council unwilling to accommodate its policies and a student body opposed to its leadership.

While our student government should have a role in articulating a student position, care must be used to ensure that this not become a major pre-occupation of the SAC — unless it wishes to completely ignore its constituents' consciousness. Besides, short of "expressions of solidarity", the council cannot at present do anything about international issues, according to its constitution. The USS rates international issues as an important priority, one that the council should be able to act on.

SAC services commissioner Chuck Vickery is the self-styled "conservative" ticket's presidential candidate. SAC finance commissioner Paul Bannon and Mike Weedon round up the slate. The ticket only appears to offer experience; both Vickery and Bannon, for example, have only held their council executive posts since the new year. And, Vickery is covering all bases by also running for a student governor position. (Should he win both, he plans to quit the Governing Council come fall.)

Vickery suddenly appeared from almost nowhere to contest almost every position in slight this year. He won and he lost some, as they say.

Vickery is free with his platform proposals, although he's had to do some backstepping when he found out he was completely misinformed about the Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario recommendation about the contingency repayment plan. We'd suggest the all-too-busy Mr. Vickery and his colleagues are probably similarly uninformed about a number of other issues on which they delign to speak. The Vickery ticket does not represent a credible alternative.

Varsity forgot most of meeting

Bob Bettson's coverage of Thursday's SAC presidential candidates' forum left much to be desired — i.e., most of what actually happened. Granted that it is impossible to report everything that takes place at such a forum, it nonetheless strikes me as irresponsible reporting when over one-third of the article is devoted to outlining the platform of one of the candidates (to the relative exclusion of the other three), and when the candidate's responses to questions relating to that platform go unmentioned.

Allow me to point out a number of facts which might be of interest to students considering voting in this election:

1) Although Vickery in his platform had said that "SAC should mobilize to get a serious response to the COPSE report and provide alternatives to it", he later admitted under questioning that he had not even read the entire report, since he had been "too busy campaigning for various positions". As to his contention that SAC "oppose the contingency repayment plan COPSE proposes", he was later forced to admit, again under questioning, that he had totally misunderstood the plan and was in fact not really opposed to it.

2) When asked what SAC should be doing in the field of education and education reform, Vickery could only suggest that more money should be rebated to the faculties and colleges; Havers' answer was that SAC should "fight the cutbacks"; only Ridout and Anderson seemed concerned with a SAC-run education program.

3) Although Havers said that he supported the occupation, it should be pointed out that because of his platform — Havers could not support the demands themselves since one of the fired professors is an American citizen.

4) When questioned on various features of his platform and on how he would deal with certain problems, Vickery's usual response was "I can't give you an answer off the top of my head".

5) The statements of Greg McMaster and Heather Ridout, and Bob Anderson were generally quoted out of context, to their mutual detriment. In particular, Anderson had said that he had been involved in the math department affair for nearly two years, that he strongly endorsed the demands, and that he felt that the occupation had already accomplished a great deal in terms of bringing about open discussions of the problems in the department — discussion which had been previously cut off by the department. Anderson did not question the tactic; rather he questioned its further effectiveness in light of the stalemate which appeared to be materializing. Other channels for pursuing the demands had to be developed, said Anderson, if the movement were to regain its mass nature and if it were to be successful.

6) The article did not outline the platforms of the other three candidates; and for Ridout and Anderson in particular this was grossly unfair, since virtually everything was taken out of its natural context.

Governor pokes holes in code

Your news story and editorial on Friday, March 2 on the new disciplinary structures and code of behaviour, may have left some people with the impression that these proposals are flying forward to the Governing Council unimpeded. This is not true. They are presently before the Academic Affairs Committee, where those of us who oppose aspects of them are making every effort to change them.

It is indeed unfortunate that a report containing such anti-student measures should come forth from a committee with several students on it, the Internal Affairs Committee. One can only assume that the progressive students on this committee just became battle-weary after so many months of dealing with discipline and of paring away even worse parts of the report than eventually emerged. They may have gotten the impression from the great support given by the student chairman of the committee to the administration proposals for a law-and-order code that all they could do was to minimize the damage, and that they would have to accept bad parts of the report in order to get what was good. There are good parts of the report, such as the proposal that offences peculiar to one estate be tried by a jury on which there are a majority of members of that estate. For example, students caught cheating on an exam would be tried by a jury of three students and two teaching staff. However, the presence of these acceptable proposals in no way justifies the lamentable treatment of disturbances on campus.

Those of us who have not been involved so far now have the opportunity to see the report freshly, not in comparison to how bad it might have been, and outside of the context of the Internal Affairs Committee, where the chairman so ably and powerfully supports administration interests. The following is the critique that I am submitting to the Academic Affairs Committee, including the proposals for specific changes that I will be recommending:

In its attitude toward disturbances on campus, the new discipline code proposed by the Internal Affairs Committee is an attempt to use law as an instrument of order rather than of justice. It assumes a view of the university as a well-oiled machine, whose highest value is that it run smoothly, regardless of what this machine is actually doing. It completely ignores two factors. First, students have no way of legitimately influencing many of the central decisions affecting academic life, such as criteria for staffing decisions. Second, "interruptions" of the university frequently aim at constructive changes in academic life and have extremely wide student support. They are not wanton disruptions for the sake of disrupting, carried out by a small group of revolutionaries.

In addition, this "code of behaviour" offers no guidelines for the behavior of the university in dealing with disturbances while these disturbances are on. This is an extremely serious omission. Together, the disciplinary structures and the code of behaviour propose procedures and punishments for use after a disturbance, but nothing is said about procedures during one. One can only conclude that the authors of the report expect the law of the jungle to apply during a disturbance, and only after the smoke has blown away would they call in the calm figure of rational procedure.

In the code, all "interruptions" of activities of the university are Platform fails to reflect past

We, members of the Arts and Science Students' Union executive, were mildly amused, at the all-candidates meeting of last Thursday, when Chuck Vickery outlined his campaign platform. The fifth plank stated that they would "enforce the constitutional non-involvement of SAC in the internal affairs of Arts and Science". Considering that one of Vickery's running mates is Paul Bannon, SAC's present finance commissioner, we can assume that they plan to continue the present SAC's policy of ham-stringing the ASSU.

Originally, the SAC constitution was amended because it had been felt that SAC, as a body with an university-wide constituency, was spending too much time in the affairs of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Thus, a separate body was to be set up, designated as the Arts and Science Students' Union, to represent and serve the needs of arts and science students, in much the same way as the Engineering Society represents the engineers. Unfortunately, theory did not conform to reality, for in the struggle to create the ASSU and make it a viable body, we have met with nothing but grief in our dealings with the SAC executive, and specifically, Paul Bannon.

As finance commissioner, Paul Bannon constantly refused to live up to the terms of the SAC constitution. When the ASSU sought the money ear-marked for it by the SAC constitution, Bannon would not turn it over. At first demanding the right to sign all ASSU checks, he then would only turn over part of the money as a grant, on the stipulation that SAC receive a letter from an accounting firm stating that the ASSU would be audited. Thus, at every turn, Bannon and the SAC executive sought to enfringe upon the jurisdiction and sovereignty of the ASSU, seeking to ensure that in matters of budget the ASSU would be firmly under the thumb of SAC. As it was, the ASSU did not receive its money until well into the second term. This was hardly "non-involvement".

As a result of the activities of the SAC executive and Paul Bannon, the constituent members of the ASSU, especially the course unions, were able to do little and act even less, since they were dependent on the ASSU for their own budgets. Thus, under the guise of "non-involvement", SAC has exercised power without responsibility — indicating even more strongly the need for an independent ASSU. Bannon, by his activities, has shown that he has little faith in the tenets he purports to support. Vickery, by implication, can be counted on to continue the present SAC's hypocritical stance of on the one hand supporting "non-involvement" in the affairs of arts and science students, and on the other hand castrating their representative body, the ASSU.

All sides back Anderson ticket

We, the undersigned, wish to announce our support for the Bob Anderson-Stephen Moses-Mike Scott ticket in the upcoming SAC presidential elections. Bob's experience and ability speak for themselves. His concern for the quality of teaching and a student-centred curriculum are evidenced in the final report of the New Program Committee, of which he wrote a substantial part. As a member of the Arts and Science Faculty Council, as acting education commissioner of SAC last summer, and as one of the organizers and prime forces behind the Arts and Science Student Union, he has always evidenced concern for these same basic issues. As an active member of the Education, Finance, and University Commissions (as well as the main contributor to the final SAC discipline report) and as an active, if somewhat frustrated contributor at executive meetings, he has been integrally involved in virtually every area of SAC concern in the past year.

As for Bob's abilities, little need be said. All who have worked with him have been impressed by his intelligence, political foresight and shrewdness, leadership, and the breadth and depth of his understanding of the nature of the university and the problems facing its students.

In short, Bob possesses the kind of experience, intelligence, ability and foresight which are essential for the kind of leadership SAC needs in the coming year — the kind of experience, intelligence, ability, and foresight which the other candidates lack.

lumped together and forbidden. This failure to discriminate between violent, destructive disturbances and non-violent, non-destructive disturbances will in fact encourage the possibility of violent and destructive disturbances. If members of the university who "interrupt" in any way are subject automatically to the same procedures and to severe penalties, then there is a much greater probability for "interruptions" to become violent and destructive.

First, the total ban on disturbances will mean that people will have to reach a much more militant state in their grievances before any interruption will occur. This alone will encourage any disturbance that does occur to be violent. It will remove the stage where people believe interruption of some aspect of the university is the only way for them to have any effect, but they still believe strongly in the safety of persons and the preservation of property.

Second, once a disturbance is in progress, the lack of discrimination by the university between different kinds of disturbances and the total lack of any procedures to deal with them (thus leaving the university to use any means at its disposal) will encourage those in the disturbance also to obliterate that discrimination and to use any means at their disposal for their purposes.

It would be highly irresponsible of the Academic Affairs Committee to pass this code, and those of us on the committee must work to make the code rational and just, which it is not in the form it comes to us from the Internal Affairs Committee. Since we are restricted to dealing with parts of the code which deal with academic life, we must formulate improvements that deal with disturbances of teaching, research, and administration that supports teaching and research. We can only hope that these changes will be considered by the Governing Council as models for dealing with disturbances affecting other aspects of the university.

Specifically, the principles that should be endorsed by the Academic Affairs Committee are as follows. In regard to disturbances that interfere with the academic functions of the university:

1. There must be guidelines for a procedure to deal with disturbances while they are in progress.

2. The distinction between violent, destructive disturbances and non-violent, non-destructive disturbances must be reflected in the guidelines of number 1.

3. The guidelines should include the principle that all attempts must be made to resolve non-violent, non-destructive disturbances in a non-violent, non-destructive way through negotiations between the parties concerned on the matters of substances involved in the dispute.

4. There should be no automatic prosecution of members of the university participating in a non-violent, non-destructive disturbance.

5. The details of these guidelines should follow the recommendations of the Campbell Report (pages 72 to 74).

These principles would form a new section of the code. A suitable place would be to include it among the other responsibilities of the university, as part 3(e). Following from the fourth principle above would also be the deletion of section 6(d) of the present draft code, which states that anyone taking any part in any disturbance is automatically liable to prosecution. The following two sections, 6(e) and 6(f), completely cover disturbances that endanger the safety of persons or which destroy property of the university. This kind of disturbance would be forbidden by the above principles (page 72 of the Campbell Report), and the code should make this prohibition explicit.

In addition, the committee should affirm that the academic health and vigour of the university cannot be equated with the fact that it is efficient, smooth, and uninterrupted in its operation. This principle should be included among the statements that attempt to describe the conditions of freedom of inquiry in Section Two. Also the statement that one of the "most important" obligations of the university is to protect "its academic and administrative functions from interruption" (in 3(d)) should therefore be deleted. The Academic Affairs Committee must explicitly reject the view of the university as most healthy when most closely approximated a smoothly functioning machine.

Unless they are to be enforced by a police state, any set of rules and procedures governing behaviour depends for its success on overwhelming acceptance by the people to whom the rules and procedures are to apply. Only then will these people regard the rules and procedures as acting in their interests and will they support action taken against those who transgress the rules. A code of behaviour of a university must have this kind of support from members of the university community. The code must acknowledge the present conditions of the university and it must embody the current norms of behaviour of that university.

The code of behaviour proposed by the Internal Affairs Committee will not obtain this support from the members of this university, especially the students. The code does not acknowledge the present conditions here. First, it ignores the fact that students do not have the opportunity to participate in all decisions affecting their academic

Anderson: the caretaker "who got an awful lot done"

Stephen Moses (left), Bob Anderson (centre) and Mike Scott emphasize a coherent program. They have strong credentials.

By DAVID WISE

The SAC presidential slate of Bob Anderson, Stephen Moses and Mike Scott emphasizes a need for an executive with an overall, coherent program and direction.

According to Anderson (UC IV) the presidential candidate, the lack of direction of the present SAC executive has been exemplified by its ineffective support of the fees strike.

Anderson believes that the fees strike was an ineffective tactic to begin with. Once SAC had made the decision to support it, he charged, it had no plan to mobilize student support, nor did it make any effort to consult the student body after the initial referendum last October, which indicated a strong desire to strike.

Stephen Moses (Meds I) stressed that by concentrating attention only on the $100 fee increase, the strike obscured the larger issue of equitable accessibility of university to students from all income brackets.

According to Moses, the way taxes are now assessed, people in lower income brackets are effectively subsidizing the education of the middle and upper income brackets which most benefit from Ontario universities.

"Grants and loans and fees must be considered as interrelated," he stated.

According to Moses, the cost of higher education should be based on ability to pay. This, he claimed was the spirit of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education report.

"The principle of the report, that finances should not pose a barrier to higher education was good. It is important to ensure that the report is implemented as a whole and not piece-meal. By raising the fees alone without a corresponding increase in grants and loans, the government is going against the spirit of the report."

In this area, the slate believes that SAC should mainly serve an educational function, keeping the broader issues in the minds of the student public. Additionally, it believes that SAC should encourage research into student finances.

The entire ticket, and especially math major Anderson, feel very strongly about the current math strike and occupation and the larger issues involved.

"We strongly support the demands of the math students," Anderson said, "and feel that the occupation, in the sense that it has forced the department to respond, has done a great deal of good."

In order to counter arbitrary hiring and firing policies by the various departments, Anderson believes that student evaluation of faculty, assessed by a more objective system than is presently employed, should be an essential criterion in contract renewal and granting tenure.

Bauman ticket says it is the "viable alternative" for SAC

By PAT REDICAN

According to a Varsity ad, the Peter Baumann SAC presidential ticket is the "only viable alternative for SAC presidency"; according to Baumann, this means that only his ticket can offer a "fresh approach" to SAC.

"Fresh approach" in turn refers to two things: their previous lack of experience in campus politics and their method of campaigning for the office.

To date Baumann (UC II) and running mates Ian Dignam (Erin I) and Doug Wilson (Meds I) have distributed neither posters (which they say are coming) or pamphlets (which are not). They skipped the major SAC forum Thursday and have run only one ad in The Varsity.

"We don't think a mass publicity campaign would do us any good" says Baumann. "Rather we are taking a personal approach. We've canvassed almost all the residences." (Baumann and Wilson both live at Knox College.)

This method of campaigning is consistent with their desire to "get more people involved. We think that SAC is a clique and that there are no channels for eliciting student involvement; we think this could be changed," says Baumann.

They see this involvement coming through a stepped-up services program. "SAC should be getting people involved in what they want to do, in films, in dances, in whatever they want," says Wilson.

They stress that there should be something to do every weekend; the fact that most students aren't involved in the university is a function of this lack of services, according to Baumann.

On the other hand, they admit that the SAC is doing a "pretty good job now."

Like last year's successful ticket of Eric Miglin, John Helliwell and Ross Flowers, Baumann-Wilson-Dignam stress services, communications and responsibility.

They are aiming their campaign at the residence students, in particular, "non-involved" students in general and they see their failure to turn up at the SAC forum as a logical extension of their view that only "student activists and hacks go to meetings" We are not appealing to those voters" said Baumann.

They do not feel on the other hand, that their lack of experience will hinder them in tackling the large SAC bureaucracy.

"We will be more likely to revise traditions and procedures; we can be more flexible on these things.

Their fresh approach, they admit, does not extend to the possible issues of this campaign; on these questions they appear to be unsure or unformed.

On the issue of the math occupation, Baumann doubted the legitimacy of the occupation tactic.

"There must be a better way to accomplish change", he said, while expressing support for dismissed professors Stephen Salaff and David Spring.

"SAC sees it mainly as a failure of communication; SAC should also be responsible for improving communications," he added.

Both Baumann and Wilson expressed "unfamiliarity with COPEPO," the Commission on Post-Secondary Education.

In spite of a campaign so "lowprofile", it seems non-existent, both Baumann and Wilson feel they have a chance with students who are "uninvolved."

president. Havers (UC IV), who is running on the "Stop the Student Surcharge Committee" (SSSC) slate with George Huczek (APSC II) and Roman Olszewski (Erin II) as running mates believes that the student masses can be organized around a drive to "win the fees strike" and to "stop the Wright report" (of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education).

The slate feels that student response to the fees strike has been good "despite SAC and OFS" calling it off. The SSSC was formed last summer by the Canadian Liberation Movement to organize against the education spending cutbacks. Since then they have set up a trailer as their organizing centre outside the fees office at 215 Huron.

In a struggle with police, February 2, Havers, along with other SSSC - Canadian Liberation Movement members, were arrested outside the offices when they attempted to block the entrance while demanding guarantees of no university employee layoffs. Havers was charged with assault twice.

Havers pointed out that the major fee increases are in the professional and advanced studies and cited the de-industrialization of Canada as the reason for this bias. "Canada is being moved very quickly towards being a full colony of the U.S." said Havers. "Canada does not need professionals"

The slate claims that the implementation of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education report would increase American control of Canadian universities. Abolishing Grade 13 and raising tuition fees would make Canadian universities more accessible to "a flood of U.S. undergraduates" since American students can more easily afford the higher fees, he stated. At the same time, the slate claims that the increased fees would cut enrolment in the universities which would mean the firing of teaching staff. "Canadian faculty, often in the untenured lower-paid positions, are the first to go while U.S. professors on fat

Socialists stress women's lib, Indochina, math occupation

By PAUL McGRATH
This university stands as an institution to serve the bourgeoisie. We need a university that serves the oppressed sectors of this society, says Alice Klein of the United Socialist Slate alliance.

Young Socialist Klein, along with YS presidential candidate Heather Ridout, and Old Moler Greg McMaster, stresses "fighting the cutbacks and struggling for free and universal access to higher education."

They see these two issues forming the basis of the universities' surrender to the government's conscious "discrimination" against economic minority groups. Their fight is "to make education in this province a right for all, instead of a privilege for only those who can afford to pay."

Ridout (Erin II) and Klein, an extension student who ran on the YS ticket for vice-president two years ago, were involved this year, with McMaster in the Coalition Against the Cutbacks, a SAC-endorsed body.

They criticize the Commission on Post-Secondary Education report, saying it reflects "the need of the Canadian ruling class and its governments to change the entire post-secondary education system to further correspond to their interests."

The USS policy statement calls for a rescinding of the fees hike and a lowering of the loan ceiling on student aid programs, besides asking the government to tax corporations to pay for education. They are also demanding that the university rehire "all fired faculty and staff and end the layoffs."

All three have been involved in the occupation of the mathematics department that continues into this week. The socialist slate supports the occupation.

They see the cutbacks as a further attempt by the governments to determine by economic barriers who should enter universities and shape the future of institutions.

"They (the government) would like to make the university serve the needs of capitalism and not of the students," says McMaster, a graduate engineering student, member of the Graduate Students Union council and Varsity reporter.

Vickery "follows" Miglin, presents 'conservative' slate

Chuck Vickery (left), Paul Bannon (centre) and Mike Weedon decided to run at the last minute. Vickery says he is "pissed off" with SAC.

By BOB BETTSON

SAC presidential candidate Chuck Vickery feels that his slate will present a "conservative" alternative in Wednesday's and Thursday's SAC presidential elections. Following in the footsteps of fellow engineer Eric Miglin, Vickery is running on a platform of "experience and a new approach."

He admitted in an interview Saturday that his use of the same poster and leaflet design as the Miglin slate last year meant that his slate is "running with the same policies as Miglin did."

However, most of the present executive is backing Anderson, including education commissioner George Strathy and communications commissioner Debra Lewis (who is Anderson's campaign manager).

Vickery (APSC III) is now SAC services commissioner and is in his first year on SAC. He is also running for the Governing Council, but says he will resign in the fall when he is no longer a full-time student if he wins both positions.

One source, who has done considerable work in the Engineering Society, says that although Vickery is on numerous committees, he has spent little time and energy on his responsibilities — "He's built up a portfolio" of credentials. Vickery is Engineering Society communications commissioner.

In an unprecedented move, Engineering Society president Scott Joliffe has publicly endorsed Vickery's opponent, Bob Anderson. Student governor Paul Cadario (APSC IV) has joined him in endorsing Anderson.

The decision of Vickery, finance commissioner Paul Bannon (Erin III) and Mike Weedon (Vic II) to run at the last minute was explained by Student dissent and freedom of expression: a troubled U of

By PAUL McGRATH

The occupation of the math department offices last week not only starts another chapter in the long fight for a meaningful student voice in university decision-making, but is also another citation in the long history of educational and political activism on the campus. The topics of interest since the 1880's and the on-and-off-again intensity with which students reacted to these issues provide some erratic, though interesting patterns. Many of the issues of former years may sound familiar to present students.

The student strike of 1895 provided one of the first major outlets of student dissatisfaction with the running of the university. The students were at that time unimpressed with the calibre of their professors, a judgment which prevails at almost any time in the history of the university.

Students' complaints arose from one specific incident: a seemingly incompetent professor, who happened to be the son-in-law of the chancellor of the university, was appointed to a chair in the history department over two better qualified contenders.

A Varsity editorial during the troubles said: "There are men in some departments who don't earn one-tenth of the money they draw. Some of them are too indolent to earn it, and some are too ignorant of their work," words that were not taken lightly by a very conservative 1895 administration.

Political science students led by William Lyon MacKenzie King, became vocal activists when they were informed by the administration that two speakers in a lecture series on social issues would not be allowed to speak. The Varsity created a side issue by publishing editorial commenting on the denial of free speech. The editorial maintained that the men were not allowed to speak because of their "unorthodox religious views". The Varsity's editor, W.F. Montgomery was suspended and the new editor was given a week to retract the statement or face suspension. A week later he was no longer a student. A staff member named William Dale also entered on the side of the students, casting aspersions on the teaching ability of the recently deceased president, Sir Daniel Wilson. He too was quickly suspended.

The political science students called for a government inquiry into affairs on campus, and boycotted classes for two days to support their demands. Mackenzie King, although an early leader of the action, was one of the first to be branded "traitor" when he continued going to classes.

The government arrived and their report was inconclusive. The Varsity editor was reinstated, and the paper continued its editorial policy with a little more caution:

"While The Varsity's freedom shall never be allowed to deteriorate to license, its freedom of speech shall be jealously and faithfully guarded."

This incident illustrates one of the longest campus political struggles for the right of a free press. The paper continued the movement for independence from outside authority through many clashes with the Students' Administrative Council and the Board of Governors and attempts by either body to enforce control over The Varsity's editorial policy.

An interesting example came in 1929, but the issue was not politics. At that time the Board of Governors met to discuss The Varsity, and finished by recommending the SAC joint executive fire the editor-in-chief. They were upset at The Varsity's editorial stance, with specific reference to an editorial that appeared in the current issue entitled "To Pet Or Not Pet". The Varsity had supported petting wholeheartedly.

The joint executive refused to comply. A week later, the Board announced they had no intentions on the paper, after the joint executive assured them that "every effort will be made to see that there in future should be no cause for complaint."

The Varsity agreed not to publish editorials, saying "This is indeed to preserve our paper from the system."

Although The Varsity's freedom of expression issue throughout its history, the occasion was used as a rallying point for student battles were not fought by the committees between bureaucrats and staffers usually losing until more times was the only consistent voice. Governors tried many tricks to suppress the policy.

In 1930, the Board of Governors allotment of funds to the paper from the joint executive that handled then Director of Extension and Publicity was being set up to look into the matter.

The Varsity, of course, felt the possibility of editorial say in the paper, what attempts are made, or what to cloud the issue, the question is one of "These officials are lured by pointing paper about the muzzling of our bureaucrats. Here surfaces in plain faculty that is usually voiced by student staff ears."

The Toronto Star, ever leery of the possibility of open student opinion, had this to say: "The probability is that if The Varsity goes under owing to official action, there may arise in its place a student's publication entirely beyond the control of the authorities." A prospect obviously as terrifying as allowing beer-soaked engineers into Loretto College at three in the morning.

With the rise of virulent anti-Communism in the thirties, any sort of dissent became a suspicious and sometimes dangerous thing to engage in. The failure of the world capitalist system during the depression saw the appearance of revitalized socialist movement around Toronto. Socialist and labour leaders were unpopular, and the Toronto Police Commission, fully established as public watchdog, kept a wary eye on any sort of troublemaker. In 1931, they instituted a free speech ban in the city — specifically aimed at "Communist meetings".

The commission also accused certain "ministers of all denominations, lawyers and university officials" of helping the communists spread the word.

Later that month, 68 professors at the university wrote a brief opposing the ban. It read in part: "The attitude which the Toronto Police Commission has assumed towards the public discussion on social and political problems makes it clear that the right of free speech and free assembly is in danger in this city."

The Globe, in an editorial the next day, called it "a brief for the communists" and advised the profs to stick to their work.

The Mail and Empire added: "The representatives of decent elements in the population should not ally themselves with any movement to aggrandize the very limited communist minority in our midst, and to facilitate their propaganda."

The Globe wanted to know if this represented opinion at the university as a whole. The Varsity complied, conducting a poll that showed the staff supported the professors 3 to 1, and the students 5 to 1.

One medical staff member, obviously against the brief, General J.T. Fotheringham, had unkind words for The Varsity. "As far as I'm concerned, The Varsity should have been buried under a dung-hill long ago."

The next day, The Varsity replied with a humorous piece consisting of an interview with a drunken faculty member, coincidentally named General Frothingmouth.

The Progressive Arts Club, a U of T drama group, came up against the police commission a couple of years later when they attempted to produce a play called "Eight Angry Men". The play had a lot to say about the Canadian prison system, and the police commission had decided that the public shouldn't hear it. A hatchet man from the provincial Treasury Department politely informed the manager of the theatre that was to host the performance that his theatre would be closed if the play opened.

There was no specific charge made against the play. "We just don't want it, that's all," the man said. Further pressing of the issue revealed that the action was initiated by everybody's friend, the Toronto Police Commission, in another attempt to protect the public from things the police didn't want to hear.

E. Cecil-Smith, secretary of the club said, "We're not going to take this lying down." Horizontal or not, their play didn't open.

The police in the 1930's were truly worried about both students and labour leaders, but broke into a cold sweat when there was any possibility of the two forces getting together. In the winter of the 1934-35 school year, police broke up a campus meeting that was being addressed by A.E. Smith, secretary of the Canadian Labour Defense League and an unpopular man in staunch Toronto. After the meeting, he was charged with sedition for some interesting comments about government collusion in the attempted murder of Tim Buck, a labour leader who was at that time a prisoner in Kingston Penitentiary for his efforts on behalf of workers.

This sheds light on an interesting "domino" theory of radicalism that the university subscribed to. To prevent the students from making any trouble, all that had to be done is remove the possibility of differing opinions and the students wouldn't think for themselves. This policy continued throughout the 1930's with continually disrupted meetings. The last of that specific brand of censorship occurred in 1940 when university police were posted outside the doors of a meeting that was to hear Charles Millard, president of the Ontario CCF. Millard was to present a speech entitled "Hepburn Must Go", referring to the then premier of Ontario. One wonders from which level of civic or university government the no meeting order came.

It was about this time that a great deal of student energy and attention were directed away from problems at home and on the campus. The arrival of the Second World War brought a long period of silence, lasting almost a decade.

Sexism is big problem year's SAC for failing to initiate response from students on the fees issue and working against the fees strike.

The slate is also heavily involved in what some consider outside issues; the Indochinese revolution and women's liberation. They are the only slate that has stated any policy on the latter, they consider it a very important part of the platform.

"The problem of sexism is the hardest thing to solve in this university," says Ridout. USS literature states that "in education we (women) are denied the right of equal opportunity and streamed into 'safe' secretarial, commercial and nursing occupations," and calls for repeal of existing abortion laws. The socialist slate wants the establishment or birth-control and abortion clinics, a Women's Commission on SAC and expanded women's courses.

Klein sees the cutbacks in expenditure as a specific barrier to this last goal: "Once the cutbacks start, the first things that usually go are the peripheral things."

Earlier this year it appeared that the Interdisciplinary Studies program was going to be one of the hardest hit by cutbacks. That department has one of the two women's courses on the campus.

Their Vietnam program defends "the Indochinese revolution" calling for self-determination for the country and unconditional withdrawal of foreign troops. They are especially critical of Canada's role in the conflict and demand that Canada withdraw not only from Vietnam, but also from NATO and NORAD, and that the university stop all war research on campus.

"The Canadian government, after years of providing the warmakers of Washington with arms, training space, university research and diplomatic cover, is now proclaiming neutrality in its peace-keeping mission in Vietnam. This is a sham!" proclaims one poster.

They feel these issues are important to each student on the campus.

"The university is not isolated," says Klein, "and we have a responsibility to point out the problems outside it."

The USS platform insists that it is necessary to have a leadership "which looks beyond the campus towards fundamental social change in all sectors of society." They see similarities in the struggles of the student movement and the Vietnamese people:

"The same political and economic interests of imperialism which have slaughtered the people of Indochina, which have made war materials and conducted research right here on our campuses, are now attacking students with education cuts and tuition hikes."

They maintain that the students fight should also be oriented "towards the establishment of a socialist society," and believe SAC should be vocal in leading the direction.

They criticize this year's SAC for being important "not for what it has done, but for what it hasn't done."

No policy on COPSEO

salaries stay", notes their campaign leaflet. "They will send the rich kids to the colony to learn how to be colonial administrators", said Havers.

The slate supports the two Canadian math professors that were dismissed, David Spring and Michael Mather. Havers said that not one Canadian professor should be fired until an 85 per cent quota of Canadian professors is reached, the goal of the CLM-sponsored 85% Quota Campaign. Havers said that along with the other math occupation demands, he would also support the re-birthing of American professor Stephen Salaff. "If the math students want him back, then we feel that they should have the right to have him back."

Havers noted that in spite of the cutbacks, the professors are getting a 3.5 per cent wage increase. He stated that if money is only what they are interested in, then it doesn't matter if they quit. Olszewski noted, "The money must be good enough already or they'd be gone".

Havers claimed that there is no solid policy on the COPSEO report from other candidates and that the SSSC slate is the only one which has not accepted increased fees for students.

Havers denounced presidential candidate Charles Vickery for being "gutless" for not telling students what he thinks, but only saying that he will do what the students want. He described it as a "typical bourgeois political trick".

Olszewski said that the United Socialist Slate has "come out with things like women's liberation which we don't think is a real issue for the university". Havers described it as a long term issue.

"A quota is probably the only way that women are going to be given a chance to get their rights in the university".

Havers criticized the facts that students elected to the Governing Council are in no way accountable to the student body, and that as ex-officio SAC members they are "in a way obligated to report to SAC the information they receive from the administration". Havers pointed to the recent discipline proposals submitted to the Governing Council by student member Paul Cadario and vice-president Jill Conway as examples of how student governors do not work in the student interest. The slate proposes that SAC be represented on the Governing Council since it is the organization that represents undergraduate students.

Havers, who with the SSSC prevented two SAC meetings from continuing in January in an attempt to force SAC to take action against the cutbacks, criticized the present council for working only to further their own political careers.

Havers said there should be more open discussion in SAC. For example, students who are not SAC reps should be given the opportunity to speak, which Havers feels the present council has obstructed.

SAC members should go to council meetings and course union meetings to find out what the student are doing, so that action can be taken on their behalf, said Havers.

Student interest in fees strike is dying

Interest in what remains of the fees strike appears to be dying, as other events in which students and student groups have an interest steal the spotlight.

Governing Council and SAC elections, the release of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education report, (COPSEO) the St. George by-election and, probably, the onset of exams and essay-due dates have led to less emphasis on the fees strike.

And, as Coalition Against the Cutbacks spokesperson Barbara

Cameron says, once SAC and the Ontario Federation of Students pulled out in the first two weeks of February, "I think that means it's over."

Over 1900 people had still not paid their second term instalments by February 28, the last day before a $15 late penalty was applied, according to vice-president Don Forster's executive assistant Jack Brook.

The administration agreed to waive the penalty, usually applied after January 15, until the end of last month in apparent cooperation with SAC's attempt to protest the provincial government's hikes in tuition fees and rise in the loan ceiling of Ontario Student Awards.

Over 5,000 were still holding out before the strike was officially called off.

While the Coalition Against the Cutbacks has broken up, the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee is continuing to fight, according to SSSC chairman Peter Havers.

Havers, who is also running for SAC president, says the committee is the only group organizing those who haven't paid yet. Participants in the SSSC trust fund have not yet even called a meeting to take a vote on whether to pay their fees to the university, he stated.

Havers cited claims of strong withholding actions still going on at other universities as proof of continued desire to fight.

Carleton University is de-registering 800 students who have yet to pay, although about the same number were in the same position last year.

He also claimed that over half of the students at Lakehead University are withholding their fees and that there is a strong action at York University. The York student council, however, called off its fees strike protest against the Ontario government last Tuesday night.

The coalition broke up, Cameron stated, after the ground had been cut out from under it by the SAC and OFS pullout, leaving only a loose collection of left groups still in it.

The U of T Communist Club, of which she is a member, has now decided to stress the COPSEO report. Although some sections of the report are acceptable, she said the financing sections in particular should lead students to reject the whole thing.

Carleton drops 500

OTTAWA (CUP) — Over 500 students at Carleton University who didn't pay their academic fees last week were de-registered Friday.

Carleton registrar, J.I. Jackson, sent a letter to that effect during the last week of February to 863 students who owe the university a total of $128,700 in tuition fees.

Since then, about 300 students made arrangements to pay their fees.

Over 100 students who had paid their fees into a trust fund operated by the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee voted to turn their money over to the administration to avoid being de-registered.

Unlike other universities, Carleton does not assess charges for late fee payment or withhold students' marks until they pay. Carleton students who have not paid are simply de-registered — it's as if they never registered in the first place. A student suffers no academic or financial loss for failing to pay. Students can re-register the following year.

A de-registered student can appeal to a board consisting of one student, one faculty member, and the university registrar.

Student council president Bruce

Cameron says this policy has absolutely nothing to do with the recently-cancelled Ontario Federation of Students fee strike against provincial education policy. The policy was instituted last year but this is its first year of full operation. Students last year persuaded the university to extend the February deadline because the policy was introduced in the spring, and students said they didn't have enough warning.

Cameron thinks the policy is "a good deal for students". If students are doing poorly in the spring, they can simply not pay the final fee instalment without academic consequences, Cameron says. "As well, you don't have to pay the $15-25 late payment fee charged by other universities."

About the same number of students were faced with de-registration at this time last year. Cameron says students who are de-registered are people who are failing, have dropped out, or those who cannot pay. But "I don't anticipate anyone wanting to get back in (after being de-registered) who can't," says Cameron.

Survey reveals engineers dislike courses

Engineering students are strongly dissatisfied with their courses and teachers, but less with grading systems, an Engineering Society questionnaire reveals.

Most students want different teaching methods and flexibility in choice and availability of courses, according to about 150 respondents.

But engineering students, traditionally noted as among the more conservative on campus, have less desire for innovative grading methods.

Between 67 and 83 per cent of the students surveyed would like to have different teaching methods used such as seminar discussions, more practical work, short optional courses, experimental courses and smaller units of courses. Programmed instruction is favoured by 53 per cent.

More student-prepared panel discussions is the only questionnaire suggestion not endorsed by more than half of the students answering.

One comment reported by survey coordinator Jack Lubek claims "Additional methods might not be necessary if lectures were understandable."

More optional courses and fewer core courses are advocated by nearly 60 per cent, while similar proportions of students say they are prevented from taking courses they want to and want additional courses to be offered.

While a strong majority four-fifths of engineering students complain that too much emphasis is placed on passing rather than learning course material well, less than two-thirds prefer more variety in grading and fewer still back any of the suggested alternatives. However, only 14 per cent knew of a course in which a mark based entirely on a final exam was appropriate.

An honours-pass-fail system received the most support, with just over half the students saying they know courses for which the system would be more suitable than the present marks system.

Forty-one per cent know of courses in which the entire mark could be based on termwork, and about the same percentage back a "no-fail" system for some courses.

Slightly less than one-third support oral examinations or a written report for the grading system in some courses.

Impersonal and bad teaching were cited by a large number of students in the survey. Large classes, excessive red tape, poor textbooks and inadequate library and physical plant facilities were other complaints noted by Lubek.

Twenty-eight per cent of the students stated they study engineering to "help solve some of the environmental, political, social problems of our society." Others said they were more interested in careers.

life. Second, it ignores the fact that disturbances have occurred, and will occur when all other channels are blocked. It ignores the fact that disturbances often have represented, and will represent, legitimate grievances that have been ignored when presented through all other means.

Neither does the code embody the current norms of behaviour of this university. It is a current norm of behaviour that any disturbances that do occur should be non-violent and non-destructive. The U of T has had several non-violent and non-destructive disturbances, but, unlike many other large universities, it has no history of student-initiated violence and destruction. It is also a current norm of behaviour that the university should make all efforts to negotiate a peaceful resolution on the substantive matters of non-violent, non-destructive disturbances. This norm is supported by two facts. First, the administration has in fact negotiated, at least initially, with every non-violent, non-destructive disturbance in recent years (1970: day care occupation of Simcoe Hall; 1971: arts and science occupation of Sid Smith; 1972: library access sit-in in the library, and later in Simcoe Hall, Victoria picketing of parking lot, and Campus co-op occupation of Devonshire Place clubhouse). Second, there has been overwhelming condemnation of violent retaliation by the administration to non-violent, non-destructive disturbances, both in abstract and in particular when it occurred last spring when the Metro police were brought in to break up the occupation of the Senate Chamber over the issue of library access.

The proposed code of behaviour does not acknowledge these conditions, and it does not embody these norms. It is, therefore, not legitimate, and it will not be accepted, even if it is passed by the Governing Council, with students having eight out of 50 seats, and even if some of those students vote for it. It will not have the goodwill and support of the university community. In this crucial aspect — the matter of campus disturbances —, it is not a good or a just code, and it will not be able to function without imposition by force.

Toike preferred to Varsity

Only two per cent more engineers never read The Varsity than never read the Toike Oike, according to an Engineering Society survey.

Over 150 engineering students responded to the survey, results of which will be published in the society's annual report.

However, of those who do read at least one of the papers, 91 per cent always read the Toike, the Ensoc paper, and eight per cent "sometimes". Only 28 per cent always read The Varsity and another 67 per cent sometimes.

Five per cent never read The Varsity, while three per cent never read the Toike Oike. The latter comes out about every three weeks, while the former is normally published thrice weekly.

Another publication surveyed, the U of T Bulletin, was always read by only four per cent, sometimes by 39 per cent and never by 70 per cent.

"What is the University Bulletin?" some asked.

Typical comments chosen by survey coordinator Jack Lubek include a suggestion to "Put the Toike on bulletin boards and above urinals." The paper is often noted, and sometimes criticized, for its racy and predominantly sexual humour.

Suggestions for The Varsity included, "The left bias of The Varsity should be balanced with editorials of differing political positions" and advocacy of more university news and an engineering column in the paper.

The Toike needs "More Dirt!", according to some students.

Ninety-one per cent of the students surveyed thought the Toike should be continued with little change; only 36 per cent thought the same of The Varsity. Sixty-four per cent believe The Varsity should not be continued, or only with major improvements; only nine per cent thought the same of the Toike.

The Students Administrative Council fared little better than The Varsity; 46 per cent thought it should continue with little change while the rest wanted it not continued or only with major improvements.

The Engineering Society was much more appreciated than SAC; only 13 per cent thought it needed major change or discontinuation.

Traditional engineering social and athletic activities were well-publicized and generally more appreciated than more intellectual pursuits such as the French Club, the students revealed.

Quebec-Presses sues Creditiste for libel

MONTREAL — The Labour-backed, Montreal leftist tabloid Québec-Presses filed a libel suit against Quebec Creditiste leader Yvon Dupuis Friday.

The action filed in the Quebec Superior Court by l'Association cooperative des publications populaires, the publishers of Québec-Presses, claims damages for $52,300 from Dupuis.

unscrupulous tactics during the Creditiste leadership convention held last February in Quebec City.

During the convention, Dupuis assailed Québec Presse and other Montreal newspapers for employing journalists in the pay of the separatist Parti québécois.

The host of Politique autour, Andre Payette, asked Dupuis on the air if Goin's charges of electoral impropriety were accurate.

Dupuis replied, "Be serious Mr. Payette. Québec-Presses, look..."

When Payette pressed Dupuis, the Creditiste chief retorted, "It (Québec-Presses) is more than Pequistes (supporter of the PQ), it is revolutionary, it is the FLQ, therefore look, be serious..."

"Yes, these are grave accusations, serious accusations," said Dupuis to Payette. "Québec-Presses praises the FLQ. I am going to say one thing. When a guy from Québec-Presses says: I took two (delegates), cards and voted twice, that proves that he is not honest. A guy that goes to vote twice is not honest."

Dupuis denied that "there was any dishonesty" at the Creditiste convention, despite the evidence uncovered by several newspapers. "I am an honest guy" he said on Radio-Canada.

Dupuis has a reputation for being a hard-line rightist and frequently accuses "communists" of trying to destroy Quebec. Before he ran for the leadership of the Creditistes, Dupuis hosted a popular radio bot-line show in Montreal and edited the right-wing newspaper Defi (Challenge).

Wright tacitly endorses education report

By JOHN CAMPBELL

Deputy Minister of Social Development Douglas Wright has tacitly endorsed the Commission on Post-Secondary Education Report (COPSEO).

Speaking last Wednesday in the last of a series of seminars on higher education at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, Wright explained and commented on the report of the commission, without criticizing any portion of it. Wright was chairman of the commission until after its draft report was released about a year ago.

Higher tuition fees will reduce the tax burden on the poor, he insisted, commenting on the report's recommendation that students pay one-third to one-half of the costs of their education. The present system of financing a higher proportion of education through taxation is regressive, he stated.

Wanting public support for expanding educational budgets in the late 60's necessitated the through-going review of the structure and purposes of post-secondary education that the commission conducted, he said.

The fact that the review was conducted by a commission rather than through regular government channels was described by Wright as a "pioneer" innovation in the field of education.

According to Wright, the commission was surprised to find that people were not as dissatisfied with costs as they were with the lack of "integration" in educational facilities that would make them more accessible to adult learners.

"People were fed up with the rigidities of the system and the use of papers (degrees) by employers", he said.

He stressed that the numerous briefs which made this complaint "very profoundly influenced commission members personally", and as a result the effort to broaden the concept and availability of an education became the basis of the commission's 126 recommendations.

The main thrust of the report, explained Wright, aims at a revision of the educational system in order to deal with "the needs of persons rather than institutions" and the acceptance of a concept of learning as a "life-long" process. Consequently, it plays down the special importance traditionally attached to education obtained at a specified learning institution with a strictly defined time period culminating in a degree.

"A degree", Wright intoned, "is only a piece of a paper."

The commission wants part-time long-term study to be regarded as the norm and calls for social recognition to be given to learning that takes place outside school.

"All learning is legitimate", said Wright, adding, "The value of quality is not as sharply differentiated as we have traditionally thought."

The report urges the creation of "open academies" and suggests that professional associations develop their own testing machinery to screen job applicants rather than merely accepting proof of academic qualifications.

Wright stated that public reaction to the completed report has been almost as mild as response to the draft report had been extreme — although in his opinion the "substance" of the two documents is the same.

He hinted that reason for the difference may be the tacit recognition by educators — many of whom had objected strongly to the recommendations of the preliminary report — that the shift toward a life-long style of education was probably a process "not caused by the commission; they merely identified something already happening".

The deputy minister expressed optimism about the future of higher education in Ontario. He said that the changes in education delineated by the commission could help the system cope with declining enrolment and budget cut-backs. The growth pattern of the 60's has stabilized, he told his audience, such that "the resources for post-secondary education (can) be kept up from a declining percentage of the GNP" (gross national product).

"This is a new market," he declared, referring to the new social demands on education, "and different processes have to be created to deal with it".

Montreal poor spurn social work

By WM. MOLSON

Montreal poor people are rejecting social workers' attentions and taking community matters into their own hands.

Marxist sociologist Mariette Riel of Université du Québec said last week the fusion of influences of French and English social workers had heightened the "tactical awareness" of the people although it hadn't raised their economic status. This left them increasingly apathetic to transient social workers.

Outlining the history of community organization in Montreal at a sociology seminar in the Borden building, Riel said the current situation was the result of the two differing approaches.

As the French Catholic institutions — education, social services and nursing — surrendered control to the provincial government in the early 1960's, the consequent demand for professionalism gave middle-class women social work mobility.

There was also importation of a Marxist analysis, largely from Europe, Riel claimed.

At the same time, the traditional English "missionary" attitude — influenced by U.S. studies of poor minority groups — turned to rationality rather than emotional as the motive power. This shift was completed by identification of power relationships as the crucial issue with stress placed on conflict, she stated.

Anderson assails SAC

Anderson stressed that it should be used only in cases of departmental intransigence, "such methods tending to burden bargaining positions".

Anderson has a background of serving on several important decision making and advisory councils. Most notably, he is completing a stint on the hard-working Presidential Advisory Committee to Review the New Program.

Former education commissioner Marty Stollar, whom Anderson replaced last summer, has nothing but praise for the job Anderson did.

"He was intended as a caretaker, but he ended up getting an awful lot done," Stollar said, noting that his replacement held a full-time job while he worked on the commission.

As well, he helped rewrite SAC's brief on discipline after university commissioner John Creelman's draft proved unacceptable, says Stollar.

Scott (Erindale II) is vice-president of the Students' Administrative Government of Erindale.

A first year medical student and the ticket's representative from the professional faculties, Moses has campus political experience, but it is limited to committees within the medical faculty. He said he was involved in the student opposition movement which effectively killed year end "survival" examinations for medical students.

Anderson explained that while the support for the ticket among the professional faculties was adequate, in terms of the election, it still was one of the primary concerns of the ticket.

Traditionally, campus-wide tickets have gained their bases of support from particular factions. The support received by the Anderson ticket, on the other hand, has spanned the spectrum of campus politics. Anderson has received the support of last year's finance commissioner and the present student governor Paul Cadario, generally considered on the campus "right", along with the support of last year's SAC vice-president, Phil Dack.

Anderson said that most people who have come to know him through SAC, consider him to be "left-centre".

"My support from the traditional right," said Anderson, "is attributable to a leadership vacuum."

According to Scott, this year there has been a complete lack of coordination between SAC and local student councils. Their ticket, he claimed, would make a special effort to extend the services of SAC to the suburban campuses, "which have been particularly ignored in the past."

Rather than rebating part of SAC fees back to the suburban campuses, as the Vickery ticket has suggested, the Anderson ticket believes the effort should be made to extend activities, wherever possible, to the suburban campuses.

According to Scott, the suburban campuses want to become part of the whole. The implementation of this desire would be one of the primary focuses of the Anderson ticket.

quired for effectiveness requires that the money be levied".

Cadario also questioned the Vickery slate promise of a rebate to Scarborough and Erindale. "If you give it to Scarborough and Erindale, you'll have to give it to everyone," he added.

Vickery said that he would leave it up to the local councils at Scarborough and Erindale to decide on the seven dollar rebate. He added that if there wasn't a rebate, services will have to be improved. "They can decide whether they want the services or the rebate."

At an all candidates meeting Thursday, Vickery proclaimed his opposition to the contingency repayment or CORSAP plan proposed by the Commission on Post-Secondary Education.

Since then, he revealed in the interview he has found out he was "misinformed". He admitted that it was a "sticky point" because he was "labouring under a misapprehension". "I didn't get involved in the study of the COPSEO report... that makes me more interested in making a deep study of the report".

Stressing services, the Vickery slate wants, like the Miglin slate last year, to improve communications.

Yet Vickery stressed that his slate would have a much stricter grants policy and cut the communications budget.

On discipline, Vickery said that he opposed the Cadario regulations proposed to the Governing Council.

"The report almost predated Campbell with the strictness of treatment it would give to demonstrations."

Vickery's running mate Weedon said that though he had not had any experience in student politics at U of T, he had had organizational experience, mainly with the Young Progressive Conservatives.

Campaign manager Steadman is also a PC.

Bannon, finance commissioner for the last two months says he would act as administrator next year.

He admitted that SAC had held back funds allocated to the Arts and Science Student Union but said that the union hadn't been officially recognized and that they had to be financially accountable to SAC. Anderson, Bannon's opponent, is chairman of ASSU.

In spite of this action, the Vickery slate still claims to endorse the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of the ASSU.

Vickery: "Earlier, I had thought of running. But, I got pissed off with SAC. So, I ran for Governing Council. Then, Bill Steadman and quite a few other people showed quite a bit of support so I again considered running." Steadman, his predecessor as services commissioner, is the slate's campaign manager.

Vickery, despite his conservative views on campus politics and the conservatism of his running mates and campaign manager, claims to support the New Democratic Party. He said that he saw no contradiction in this.

Vickery, who considers himself the only "credible" alternative to the slate headed by Bob Anderson, is running on a program of fiscal responsibility.

He defended his plans to reduce the SAC fee by two dollars, saying "the communications budget could be cut back... also the campus centre levy (of one dollar) could be cut."

Weedon added that they would save $5,000 by pulling out of the Ontario Federation of Students. He called the present money spent on OFS "wasted".

A populist plank, this fee reduction was rejected as almost an impossibility by student governor and former SAC finance commissioner Paul Cadario, who added that "to run SAC at the scale re-

Blues earn eighth Queen's Cup

Varsity Blues won their eighth consecutive OUA championship, defeating Western Mustangs 8-1 Saturday night at Varsity Arena before an estimated 3,700 spectators.

The victory represents a milestone in coach Tom Watt's career. In his eight years with the Blues Watt's teams have won 200 games (including exhibition), lost 34, and tied 16. Blues also defeated Waterloo Warriors 13-2 Friday evening.

Team captain Gord Davies accepted the Queen's Cup on behalf of the Blues and asked that it be handed over to Watt, who seemed genuinely surprised by the move and was too embarrassed to say anything to the crowd. He came onto the ice and hugged Davies, a gesture which drew a wild round of applause from the fans who had also stood up and cheered during the last minute of the game.

Blues now have to play a two out of three series against the winners of the Alberta-Lakehead game, with the winner returning to Toronto for the CIAU finals March 17 against either Loyola, Moncton, or St. Mary's.

Blues seemed to settle down in the second frame of Saturday's game, scoring three goals in under three and one half minutes. Nick Holmes checked a Western player in the corner to free the puck for Bob Munro's go-ahead goal — a screen shot between goalie Peter Lambert's legs, and Bruce Herridge lifted a backhand shot off a rebound over a prone Lambert and his defencemen for the insurance goal.

With Blues ahead 3-1 Western seemed to collapse, with their first period hopes for an upset dwindling. Mike Keenan's drive from 10 feet back of the blue line eluded a surprised Lambert who didn't see the puck until it was too late.

And as Toronto gained confidence play shifted to the Western end, and Varsity continuously stopped Mustangs at the Toronto blue line and dumped the puck back, preserving their lead through defensive play.

Toronto played its familiar third period game and chalked up four more goals with Western unable to keep up due in part to Blues apparent superior conditioning. However, in all fairness to Mustangs, they had played a tough game the evening before against a bruising Laurentian squad (with the game ending at midnight).

For Toronto's fifth goal, Don Pagnutti was left all alone in front of the net and easily flipped the puck in, while Bill Buba was allowed to cut across Mustangs' crease unhindered to backhand in his shot for Varsity's sixth.

Neil Korzack scored after stealing the puck from 'Stang' defenceman Phil Howard who was trying to freeze the puck in the slot. Surprisingly, Bruce Herridge's shot rebounded in off this same defenceman for Blues' final goal.

In Friday's 13-2 rout of supposed rivals Waterloo Warriors before an estimated 3,200 spectators, Varsity quashed any rumours that Waterloo would be a thorn in its side. In two exhibition games earlier in the season Toronto barely squeezed past Warriors before decisively defeating them 7-3 in late season play.

Blues succeeded in keeping the pressure on during the entire game, dividing their 13 goals between the three periods. Nick Holmes notched his second hat-trick of the season season, while many other Blues had multi-point games.

Rearguard Warren Anderson, always one of the steadiest players in his own end, showed fine two-way play in tallying five points, including one goal. Neil Korzack and Kent Ruhnke scored two goals each, and Korzack, Pagnutti, and Bill Fiffeld each had four points on the evening.

Blues went ahead in the opening 20 minutes with four unanswered goals including two on power-plays — both due to good digging by Korzack and Ruhnke in the crease area.

Play was mild in the opening period, but hitting picked up in the final five minutes as Waterloo finally decided to show its former aggressive style of play, with the pace becoming even more furious in the second 20 minutes. Spectators were given a demonstration of solid hitting and fast skating by both clubs.

Near the beginning of the period Waterloo captain Roger Kropf and Neil Korzack were making menacing gestures at each other. Waterloo player Ted Porter then skated over and knocked Korzack on the head — a move which cost him a game misconduct for bringing the third man into a fight. Korzack and Kropf were given two minutes each for the "fight".

Holmes scored two of his goals in the second period — the first on a good shot to the glove side of Waterloo goalie Jake Dupuis after stealing the puck from Kropf. His second came off a similar shot — this time on a pass from behind the net from Munro, after captain Davies' hard work in the corner.

However, on Waterloo's power-play goal by Jim Nickleson, Holmes was the goat, sitting out a holding penalty for grabbing a Waterloo player in a bearhug right in front of referee Blair Graham.

The final period of play saw Blues score five times after an early Waterloo goal by Jim Morris off sloppy corner play by Varsity players in the Toronto end. Holmes got his hat-trick goal on a fast slap shot using the Warrior defence as a screen.

Play in this period seemed tame compared to that witnessed in the second, except for a fight with only 10 seconds left in the game. A usually easy-going Harry Sems started it off with a highstick as he checked Russ Elliott into the boards. As they skated to the other side Elliott reciprocated by taking Sems out of the play. Both then dropped their gloves and went at it, with Elliott appearing to win the decision.

Blues Notes: Nick Holmes was elated with his hat-trick Friday and explained why: "I was always sent onto the ice to do what I could best—hit—it's nice to be a scorer for a change." Holmes spent the last year playing senior OHA with Barrie

The University of Toronto judo team took the OUA championship title by defeating York in the finals 47-0 Saturday at York University. Excellent coaching by Soki Uemura, current Canadian Lightweight Champion, was more than evident on Saturday. Team members were Greg Doulet, Ford Kawano, Bill Ennis, Chris Preobrazenski, and Morris Ostrowiecki. Kawano took first place and Ostrowiecki came in second in the over 170 pound weight class. The U of T judo team has not lost any collegiate team tournament in the past five years, and team members are hopeful that the sport will be reinstated by the CIAU as a national university sport for the coming year. . . . The University of Toronto alpine ski team placed third in the McMaster Invitation at Blue Mountain Friday. Carleton finished first and Queen's second. Individually, Carleton team members Mike Ryan and Rob Langevin placed first and second respectively, with Toronto's Doug Carter placing third. The meet was only one of seven scheduled for the 1973 season, and Toronto remains in second place overall, with Carleton first and Queen's third. Racing for Toronto were Carter (team captain), John Triste, Alan Abbott, Britt Roberts, Steve Pumoli, and Grant Wilson. The first four times of these six team members went toward the final total. The University of Toronto women's team finished third in the meet. Altogether 11 teams competed. The last race of the circuit is the Guelph Invitational scheduled for next weekend at Georgian Peaks. . . . In the second and final interfaculty II swimming meet last Thursday evening, Vic finished first with 60 points, Engineering was second with 52, Trinity third with 48 and Law fourth with 32. . . . St. Mary's University Huskies of Halifax defeated Lakehead University Nor'westers of Thunder Bay 79-67 in Waterloo Saturday to capture the CIAU basketball title. Both teams carry a large number of American players, and seven of the 10 starters were from the United States. Nor'westers edged Loyola College Warriors of Montreal 68-63 in two overtime periods Friday night, while the Huskies rallied from a four point deficit with 1:18 left in regulation time to tie the game and eventually beat University of Windsor Lancers 91-84 in one overtime period. Windsor beat Loyola in the consolation final Saturday.

Swim Blues help OUAA to national title

By PAUL CARSON

The University of Toronto men's swimming team re-established its dominance over other Canadian universities with a convincing victory in the unofficial team championships at the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union finals in Calgary this weekend.

In leading the OUAA to the official conference title, Varsity regained the London Free Press Trophy awarded to the school scoring the most points in the as yet unrecognized team competition.

Taking their sixth team title in the last seven years, the Varsity swimmers finished about 120 points ahead of the University of Alberta while the third place race between Western and the University of British Columbia had not been settled at press time last night.

Varsity captain Jim Adams was named Swimmer of the Meet after setting two CIAU records in the heats of the 50 and 100-yard freestyles; appropriately, Adams won the championship final in both events and also anchored Blues' victories in the 400-yard freestyle and medley relays.

Official results were not available last night, but Varsity timers clocked Adams in 21.8 seconds in the 50 free and 48.3 seconds in the 100. Adams had shared the former mark of 21.9 in the 50 with another Toronto sprinter, Theo Van Ryn, who graduated in 1971.

Adams might have swam his last races for Varsity as he is contemplating doing graduate work in Europe next year. He narrowly missed an unprecedented fifth gold medal in the 200-yard freestyle as Ottawa's John Duncan repeated his narrow victory of last week's OUAA finals.

Only two other CIAU records fell in the three-day meet that featured the first joint national collegiate championships for men and women in Canadian swimming history.

Olympian Byron MacDonald easily took both butterfly events in record time, formalizing the new standards be established during Blues' dual meet season.

MacDonald also provided some unexpected excitement by placing fourth in the 100-yard freestyle while swimming butterfly. Although he had produced a record-setting butterfly less than 15 minutes prior to the freestyle final, MacDonald used flip turns and superior conditioning to give Varsity some valuable points and an important psychological boost at that stage of the meet.

"We really needed to open up a lead on Alberta at that point, and even though he was very tired Byron volunteered to swim the butterfly in the 100 free for the sake of the team," said former Varsity captain Terry Byron.

Varsity's Merrily Stratten dominated the women's freestyle, winning both the 400 and 200-yard races and adding a close second in the 100 free.

Marilyn McCormick, Nancy Thompson and Joan Dolson were the other Toronto swimmers in the women's section.

Varsity coach Robin Campbell had planned to grab an early points lead Thursday night in the distance freestyles, and freshman Shawn Laari came through with a solid victory in the 1,650 yard marathon and helped out in Blues' winning effort in the 800 yard freestyle relay.

Laari later proved to be the best of a somewhat slow field, winning the 500-yard freestyle as Varsity took six of seven possible gold medals in that section.

Overall, the times were below expectation as the best of Canada's college swimmers just couldn't adjust to Calgary's 4,800-foot altitude.

"In U.S. college swimming, there is an allowance of almost 20 seconds for a swimmer who does a 1,650 freestyle at any altitude over 3,300 feet, so Laari's time of 17:34 is actually very respectable," Byron said.

Most of the 15-member Varsity men's team turned in solid efforts, particularly veteran

John Twohig and freshman Dave Schappert.

Twohig atoned for a very disappointing display in last year's CIAU finals with three outstanding freestyle races that produced a close third in the 100 plus two solid relay splits under 50 seconds.

Schappert placed well in three consolation finals and might have done even better but for a loose string on his bathing suit in the 1650 freestyle. He was challenging for fifth after about 200 yards when the string came untied and Schappert had to pull his suit up at every turn.

Finally he stopped completely in the middle of his lane and somehow retied the string; a frantic sprint over the final 150 yards resulted in a well-deserved eighth place.

Veteran Bob Peeling concluded his college career with a sixth in the 100 fly and Zvi Eldar made the finals in the 200 fly. Freshman Dave Wilkin was a strong third in the 100 yard freestyle and swam well in the freestyle relays.

Diver Alex Lau qualified for his first CIAU meet and placed ninth off the three-metre board and tenth in the one-metre diving.

Breaststrokers Wayne Phillips and John Sebben each grabbed one bronze medal, and Nick Rotman placed second in two consolation finals.

Other Varsity entries were freestylers Dave Chutter and John Peters, plus backstroke Russ Farquhar.

Stratten and MacDonald will probably continue heavy training in preparation for the World Student Games, while Adams may decide to enter the WSG trials in his native Brazil.

Track finishes second

The University of Toronto track team placed a close second to the University of Western Ontario Saturday at the OUAA finals at the CNE grounds. The Western team earned 119.5 points to Toronto's 118.8.

Other participants in the meet and their standings included Queen's University with 84.3 points, York (42.8), McMaster (30) and the University of Windsor (25.5). Eleven universities competed in the 23 event meet.

Toronto's best events of the day included the pole vault and the women's high jump. U of T members Bruce Simpson, Dave Barrett, and Dave Rudicbuk finished in the top three positions in the pole vault with heights of 16'6", 13'6", and 13'6". Louise Hanna finished first in the high jump with 1.78 metres.

In the men's 50 metre hurdles event Greg Ross placed third in 7.1 (a personal best time) and Avo Albo finished fifth in 7.5. (Albo has been on the basketball court for the past few months with the Varsity team.) Albo placed second in his best in 7.2, while Ross was third in his in 7.4.

Bob DeGroot placed second in the 50 metre final event in 5.7 seconds after finishing first in his best in 5.8. Henry Tobias followed in fourth place with 6 flat, and finished second in his best with 5.8.

In the 600 metre event Gerry Feeny finished second in 1:21.5 to Windsor's Walter in 1:20.6. Mark Minden placed fifth overall in the 1000 metre event in 2:32.7.

In the 5000 metre Toronto's Morley was third in 14:55.

In the jump events, Erik Little tied for first place (and eventually placed second) to Ray Anthony of Waterloo, both with 1.88 metre jumps. Another Blues basketball team member, Dave Watt, finished second in the triple jump in 14.41, with Toronto's Keith McKenzie fourth in 13.54.

The Toronto team runners placed a close second to Western in the distance medley, with first-second place times of 10:23.4 and 10:25.8. The Toronto team also placed second in the 4 x 400 relay, one tenth of a second back of Queen's in 3:26.1.

Three Toronto team members also placed within the top five in the 1500 metre event. John Sharpe was second to Western's Grant McLaren in 3:52.5, while Paul Glynn and Joe Sax finished three-four with times of 3:55.1 and 3:57.5.

The following is a listing of the top three finishers in each event:

Basketball playoffs begin

The annual basketball playdown for the Sifton Cup commences tomorrow as all eight teams swing into action in sudden death quarter-final games.

St. Mike's A and PHE B meet at high noon. In their only other encounter earlier this season, St. Mike's outscored PHE B in the final minute of play by a count of 8-2 to win 77-71. PHE B won't be that close this time. St. Mike's will probably have the game out of reach long before the last minute of play. Call it St. Mike's by 15.

At 5 pm Tuesday, Vic tangles with Meds. Meds trampled Vic in their only meeting this year. In addition, Bill Caskey, the masked Meds forward, has stated publicly that he will let the captain of the opposing team which eliminates Meds from the playoffs (if indeed they do get eliminated) remove this mask at centre court following the loss. Meds by 10 is the betting line.

UC goes against Sr. Engineering Tuesday night at 7 pm in a game which promises the greatest likelihood of an upset. The engineers have a wealth of talent; if they can put it together, watch out. However, seasoned observers of Interfac playoffs say Big Red experience will carry UC through this contest.

Open stacks get closer

Over a year of struggle came one step closer to partial victory Monday night when open stacks in the Robarts Library was advocated by a committee asked to study the question.

However, an amendment moved by arts and science dean Bob Greene would set up bureaucratic hassles that may discourage undergraduates, graduate students and faculty members alike from using the university's main book collection.

By a vote of 10 to 2, with one abstention, the Library Subcommittee voted to recommend equal access to the stacks for all university members.

After the subcommittee completes its report on the library, first the Academic Affairs Committee then the Governing Council's executive and finally the council itself must approve the recommendation.

If it is approved, the demands of three occupations of Simcoe Hall last spring for open access for both university and community members will be partially met.

There was little debate on the main motion Monday, as most of the issues had been thrashed over at two previous meetings.

The recommendation, which came from an internal subcommittee working group that predicted differentiated access would be almost impossible to put into practice, urged that "all members of the university be granted equal admission to the stacks and that a thorough review be made after one year".

The amendment recommended that stack passes to be granted automatically to any member of the university upon application, be required. Applicants would have to state the "subject area in which they will be working and the nature of their research; and the period of time for which the application is made".

The minimum length of time for which a stack pass would be granted is one month; the maximum would be one term.

The amendment, passed by the same margin as the main motion, concludes that all "these procedures" will be reviewed at the conclusion of the first year of operation of the Robarts Library, which is expected to open within five months of the end of the elevator workers' strike.

Greene said that his amendment was a "form of differential access which makes necessary formal application for admission" and that "the community using the stacks will be self-selected and self-divided on the basis of research needs".

While it was not stated, Greene may have been referring to the terms of reference of the committee, which was instructed to differentiate stack access on the basis of "academic need".

Political economy professor Sanford Lakoff criticized Greene's amendment, asking what would happen if 30,000 people turned up? He also questioned the necessity of stating subject area on an application if there were to be no access restrictions.

Greene replied that this procedure would enable "the library to get a far better perception of the stacks in this exploratory first year" and said that it was an "expression of (his) concern for conservation".

Student representative Brian Morgan declared that he had originally found the amendment "distasteful" but that he would now support it.

Lakoff also suggested at the meeting that the use of the library could be limited by putting restrictions on the access of first year students to the research library.

Lakoff said that the people who need the library most were faculty members, post-graduate students and undergraduates doing major research essays. He also said that people should be encouraged to be "self-limiting".

Alumna Jean Collins-Williams suggested that this restriction be a "positive" rather than a "negative" restriction, by encouraging first year students to use the other libraries on campus instead of the Robarts Library.

Collins-Williams also suggested that first year students have their applications endorsed by a member of the department.

Professors W.M. Dick, who sat on the working group, and Hans Kunov objected to this suggestion, stating it was neither necessary or practical.

Collins-Williams' motion that "members of the university registered in their first year would require endorsement in a manner to be decided before admission to the Robarts Library stacks" was defeated 4 to 9.

Students rally at Sid Smith

Monday featured Arts and Science Student Union fieldworker David Depoe singing "The George Duff Talking Blues" in support of the math occupation.

Today, it may be the Lady Godiva Memorial Band's turn, as occupying math students have invited the engineering band to a noon rally.

Students from l'Université du Québec à Montréal will attend the rally in the Sid Smith foyer to relate their struggles to the math students' fight. Progress reports from the occupiers will also be given.

For more stories on the occupation, see page 3.

Kunov unsuccessfully suggested that any member of the university be required to pass a computerized library test before granted admission to the library.

Morgan said that people should rather be "encouraged to take a course in library instruction", but not required to.

Most committee members were in favour of some kind of orientation course. Associate librarian H. Sholler said that the library was about to expand on a "major orientation program".

Technical problems at The Varsity's printers made it necessary to eliminate four pages from the paper early this morning. Part II of the freedom of expression feature will appear Friday.

U of T lawyers throw out behavior code

By RANDY ROBERTSON

U of T solicitors have tossed the proposed code of behaviour into the wastebasket — at least as far as it has any force in law.

The discipline code proposed for the university is valuable only as a statement of principle and has no legal validity, student governor Paul Cadario, co-author with vice-president Jill Conway of the code, admitted yesterday.

After the Internal Affairs Committee came out of closed session, Cadario announced that the university's solicitors have advised him that "the code's general statements will not suffice as a discipline code."

The solicitors, Cassels Brock, have advised that a code of definite prohibitions be formulated, he said.

Part-time student governor Norma Grindal said last night, that as a result of the lawyers' advice and concern about the wording of a clause of prohibitions, the earliest she thinks the university's discipline policy can be implemented is June. Cadario hopes it will be passed in May.

After both Internal Affairs' and the Academic Affairs Committee have approved the present code, the Governing Council must pass it. Then possibly in April it must be drafted in legal terms which will then have to be approved by the council.

The code as it is, Cadario said, is "too positive" and too vague. The principles it enunciates are acceptable only as principles and cannot be acted on.

"It is necessary for us to be exhaustive in formulating these prohibitions," Cadario said. "It is not sufficient for us to merely provide examples," Cadario said.

Section Six of the proposed code includes a series of "examples of conduct to be prohibited wherever the university is uniquely involved or affected." The solicitors recommend that these examples be presented not as examples but as prohibitions.

A controversial section of it, which because it is drafted in negative terms, Cadario said is the only one that could be legally implemented, prohibits "wherever the university is uniquely involved:

"Intentional or reckless obstruction or disruption or undue disturbance, by any means, of teaching, research, administration, disciplinary proceedings, or any other authorized activity on university premises, including public service activities of the university."

Cadario said that the committee had not intended by means of this subsection to ban all peaceful demonstration and picketing "and the section should be read in light of this intention."

Cadario defined a peaceful demonstration as "one which does not obstruct, disrupt or disturb". He realized, he said, that it is now necessary for the committee to define what constitutes "obstruction", "disruption," and "disturbance".

The committee referred the matter to an internal task force, which, after consulting lawyers, will report in time for the committee's March 22 meeting, Cadario said last night.

Conservative faculty member Stanley Schiff claimed that this subsection in no way prohibits any demonstration that does not interfere with "the guts of the university," which he said are teaching, research, administration.

Schiff concluded "from the flak in The Varsity" that those who are opposing this subsection of the code "want to be able to continue to disrupt to attain their own substantial ends even when the Governing Council does not approve these ends."

He asked the committee "whether we can have these allow these alternative means — what I can only call 'running in the street?'"

Graduate student governor Clarice Henschel asked if the current math occupation would be considered an "intentional or reckless obstruction or disruption or undue disturbance". Cadario refused to discuss the occupation in relation to the code.

"We are not a tribunal" he said, "We are a committee trying to develop a discipline code for the university."

Professor Michael Grapko wondered whether the code was of any value if the math occupation could not be discussed.

"The code should allow me to make a judgment that I can feel comfortable having made. If it does not allow me to make such a judgement, then it is worthless."

Chilean working class supports Allende, says prof

By VAL ROSS

"The overwhelming majority, nine out of ten working men in Chile identify themselves as socialist", said University of Wisconsin sociologist Maurice Zeitlin last week.

Addressing 200 students in Sidney Smith in a lecture entitled "The End of Capitalism in Chile", Zeitlin termed Chile "the only country in the western hemisphere (except Cuba) with a revolutionary socialist mass movement."

Calling Marxist Chilean president Salvador Allende "The modest alternative to an increasingly militant peasant class", Zeitlin implied his hopes for the outcome of yesterday's general election in Chile.

However, he reminded his audience that, for the U.S.A. "the stakes in Chile's future are high indeed... close to $1 billion for American investors alone." The Allende government came to power publicly vowing to nationalize foreign monopolies.

But in addition to foreign pressures, Chile has been beset by internal problems. Inflation is running rampant while food has been rationed since January. The Allende government has faced threats from the radical left for being too cautious.

In contrast to the optimism elsewhere Allende did not expect a victory for his socialist Party yesterday, Zeitlin said. Opinion polls suggest the party will get 40 per cent of the popular vote. As long as the Socialist control one third of the Chilean Congress, they can block legislation; should they fail to get that third elected, a more centrist Congress could impeach President Allende.

For Chile, one of the world's most stable political systems, this election could abort what has been called the peaceful revolution.

Maurice Zeitlin says most of Chile's workers are socialists.

Profs ease up in CEGEP fight

MONTREAL (CUPI) The Board of Governors of John Abbott College (CEGEP) voted at a special meeting to adopt a middle of the road position on the cuts in status and salary imposed on its faculty by the provincial government.

Last December 15 the Quebec Department of Education arbitrarily announced implementation of revised criteria for determining scholarship (the amount of formal education and teaching experience by which teachers are classified and thus paid). Dossiers on all teachers employed by the province were then forwarded to Quebec City for re-evaluation within 90 days.

In early February, Vanier College received the first of the new classifications of about 80 teachers. Some 90 per cent were declassified. At its next meeting, the Vanier Board of Governors voted to continue paying the teachers at pre-declassification rates.

The Board of Governors at Dawson College CEGEP adopted almost an identical motion shortly after the Vanier decision.

On February 26 Vanier's bank announced it would not honor cheques issued contrary to government regulations. Dawson's bank followed suit shortly afterwards.

On February 27 the John Abbott Faculty Association adopted a resolution calling on the board to follow the example of Vanier and Dawson and to pay teachers at pre-declassification scales. The teachers had the full backing of the students' association and the college's support workers.

When the Board met February 28 Chairman Robert Layton stressed the action taken by Vanier's and Dawson's banks and questioned the effectiveness of the proposed motion.

The Faculty Association's motion (which was presented by the students' representative) was left to die, without being seconded. Faculty representatives were legally ineligible to vote on this question. The Board, which is composed mainly of successful business figures and middle class parents, then voted on a resolution drawn up by College Director-General, Bruce McAusland, which would place funds for the faculty in trust.

"The most successful politician is he who says what everybody is thinking most often and in the loudest voice"

Vickery solution

The sit-in at Sid Smith, the past few days, has been a major concern of ours during the SAC presidential campaign. We have stood solidly for a reasonable approach to all campus disputes. Any attempts to create a confrontation are to be shunned. There is, however, an obvious difference of opinion between the students and the math department. We would like to see a quick solution to the problem. With this in mind, we propose an approach similar to the following:

(1) that all committees (including tenure) be structured so as to include student positions,

(2) that the restructured committees review the positions of professors Mather, Spring, and Salaff with regard to the granting of tenure to the former and the renewal of the contract of the latter for the coming year,

(3) that the restructured committee review the whole concept of tenure with a view to replacing it with another form of hiring - for example, five-year renewable contracts.

We would like to reiterate that our main concern is for a reasonable solution to the problem.

Vickery, Bannon, and Weedon

Rehiring the start

The United Socialist Slate (Old Mole and Young Socialists) urges all students to attend today's rally in support of the students who are trying to wrest control of their education away from George Duff and the autocrats of the math department.

Maintaining the employment of professors Mather, Spring, and Salaff is only the beginning of the math students' struggle for democratic control of their department, which is part of a university fully integrated into the administrative machinery by which an economically-based ruling class manages every aspect of our society.

We feel the struggle is therefore in the interests of every student, not just the math students. The greatest mobilization is the only way to decisively defeat the medieval, clique-ridden despotism of the university.

United Socialist Slate

Profs proposals

We, the undersigned, faculty members at the University of Toronto are in favour of the following measures to resolve the issue in the mathematics department:

1. That students and faculty have a substantial voice in the matters of hiring, firing, and tenure of professors, and police-making decisions.

2. That professors Spring, Salaff, and Mather be re-hired pending disposition of their cases by such a procedure.

Misinformed: prof

Some members of the university community have been surprised that advocates of greater student participation in university government and heavier weighting of teaching performance in staffing decisions are not supporting the current "occupation". The following may clarify this and other misunderstandings.

Several months ago, before the present movement started, Mr. Salaff asked me to help him organize "a student reform movement that might force the mathematics department to give me a job". No other specific demands or individuals were mentioned. My response was such that Mr. Salaff did not communicate with me further.

The movement began with a burst of enthusiasm by students in Mr. Salaff's class. If those involved had drawn other students and faculty into a discussion of the genuine grievances and issues facing the mathematics department, there could have developed a movement that would have earned the support and participation of all forward-looking students and faculty. Unfortunately, it soon became evident that the students were acting on the basis of misinformation.

Mr. Salaff was presented as a man who had been fired, whereas in fact he held only a temporary, part-time appointment, carrying no presumption of continuation and made without the investigation and competition with other candidates that takes place for regular appointments. The demand that professor Spring be rehired was made without his knowledge, although he graciously made an objection when he learned of it. He, also, was represented as having been "fired," although he resigned a year ago and has a prestigious appointment in Paris. Both professors Spring and Mather were presented as being fired for their activity in attempting to improve teaching or otherwise reform the mathematics department, whereas no one in our department is aware of any such activity on their part.

The mathematics department was falsely represented as not being interested in teaching and not considering teaching in matters of hiring, promotion, and tenure. Because of limited space, I mention only that in recent years the department has hired two full professors primarily because of their reputations as teachers, that many members of the department have a commitment to teaching that takes priority over research, and that tenure has recently been denied to professors who were deficient in teaching.

It was claimed that the mathematics department did not support its chairman. Before the rally on February 28th, Mr. Salaff was told by a member of our department that we had passed a resolution supported by our chairman by a vote of 27 to 2 with about a half-dozen abstentions. (Several other staff members had to leave before the vote and asked to be, but were not, counted as yes votes.) A few minutes later Mr. Salaff told the rally that the chairman of the mathematics department "cannot even muster a majority of his staff. Only 27 people voted for his resolution." The fact is that many members of the mathematics department would welcome student collaboration, but they are united in support of professor Duff and in the determination that no one is going to obtain a job by force.

Instead of politicizing the movement, the leaders have personalized it into a slanderous vendetta against our chairman designed to force him to use his imagined powers to grant demands that are either contrary to his conscience (and those of the overwhelming majority of the staff) or outside his jurisdiction. Their conduct has been such that even the most liberal members of the department have (after considerable soul-searching) declined to support the sit-in. Speakers sent to mathematics classes and allowed to appeal for support of the occupation have evoked a negative response. Student comments suggest that this is not due to a lack of student interest in improving teaching or increased democracy, but simply to suspicion that self-interest rather than issues have dominated the affair.

As a result of these events, the occupying forces have dwindled to three people wanting jobs, a professor of sociology, a handful of Mr. Salaff's students, and a few others. Unless someone blunders and creates a pointless confrontation, the problem of the occupiers is how to terminate a putsch that failed. I hope that when the dust clears we shall be able to sincerely thank those students who, in spite of errors caused by lack of information, have behaved reasonably and helped members of the mathematics department to realize that better organization and communication is needed in order to guarantee an adequate and healthy participation by both students and faculty in the conduct of its affairs.

Student governor sees the future

The Governing Council elections presently underway may have long-term implications for the quality of education at this university. Education is people, but it is also structures. A large student vote will demonstrate to the government that we take our participation in the university seriously. When the Governing Council is reviewed next year, such a vote will give grounds for increasing student representation on Governing Council. This would have a far-reaching effect on the amount of say that you will have in your education.

Many other important issues will come before Governing Council next year. The New Program review, hiring regulations, and the university's response to the COPSEO report are among them. I personally support David Laughton and Gord Barnes to succeed me as arts and science representatives to the council, but my major plea is for a large turnout. Please inform yourselves and vote.

MPSCU wants you to vote

It is very important that during the Governing Council elections that as many students vote as possible. Only by demonstrating our concern in expanding these channels of student participation can we hope to have a long term effect in improving the education available at this university.

There are many important issues which will be coming up next year (tenure and hiring procedures, New Program Review, the COPSEO report are just a few). We have thrown our support behind two particular candidates for the Arts and Science seat - David Laughton and Gord Barnes - but the main point is to get out and vote.

Reader laments feature

Rita Mae Brown in her article of February 26 stated that "Lesbianism offends male supremacy." If indeed this is true, surely the logical corollary would be that homosexuality offends female subservience, an assumption which is somewhat contestable.

To suggest, as does Ms. Brown that lesbianism is the foremost expression of liberation may be considered "oppressive" by those women who experience heterosexual desires!

Certainly, any homosexual relationship is a liberation in that it rejects formal sexual roles propagated by society. However, lesbianism (or homosexuality) should only be considered a liberation if it is the expression of natural inclinations on the part of both partners. The proposal that lesbianism (ie. denouncement of the male sex) be necessary for ultimate liberation is not only ridiculous, it's downright lamentable.

Student no to open budget meetings

By JOHN CAMPBELL

In spite of their broad support for openness on decision-making bodies on campus, student members of the budget committee go along with senior administrators and faculty members in the decision to have committee meetings held in closed session.

The meetings, which developed proposals for the budget released Friday, ran from July to December last year.

The policy of openness was the focus of vigorous debate at the inception of the Governing Council last year, and many students and student organizations, including SAG and the Graduate Students' Union, expressed themselves publicly in favour of an open policy-making process.

Part-time student budget committee member, Joyce Denyer said she was in agreement with secrecy in principle when policy bodies were "discussing areas that are very sensitive," but added, "personally I think it would be preferable to have open discussions on most matters."

Referring to the discussions on open policy-making which took place around the same time the format of the budget committee was decided upon, she implied that some university administrators did not share the latter view.

"You have to play by their (the administrators') rules", she declared, "if you want to get students on those committees."

Internal Affairs Committee chairman and student budget committee member Paul Gadario also stressed the important role students played during last summer's debate.

He argued that the "openness principle" enunciated in the U of T Act was used by students to secure an open format for standing committee meetings of the Governing Council. "The principle that meetings of the Governing Council should be open was quite persuasive in getting the meetings of committees of the Governing Council open. We used it," he said.

SAG president Eric Miglin declared that the SAG's opposition to closed policy-making meetings applied as well to those of the budget committee. Describing the committee as a "very powerful body", he said its meetings should be open "before the final decisions are made."

In contrast, student member of the executive committee Brian Morgan was concerned about possible speculation that could result from public budget committee meetings. "What people should worry about is what comes out," he said, "not the different alternatives that are considered during the meetings."

A consensus exists among Governing Council members of the budget committee that direct interference by the divisions of the university in the working stages of the budget would seriously hamper the committee's decision-making ability.

U of T president John Evans stated "all sorts of questions are raised in budget committee meetings, but no decisions are taken until it's all put together. "As decisions are reviewed or questions asked, people may take out of the meetings implications that such and such will be put into practice. That would not be done until the final meetings of the committee."

A second reason for secrecy, he added, was that "the budget committee has no authority."

Will CORRA control City Hall?

By DAVID KENNEDY
and LORNE SLOTNICK

After three years of battling an old City Council controlled by the property industry instead of bourgeois community groups, things are looking better for the Confederation of Resident and Ratepayer

Associations (CORRA). Star columnist Michael Best now contends that "Toronto Council dances to citizens' tune."

In fact, CORRA has developed a reputation for so much influence that one delegate at last month's meeting complained that the organization was in danger of becoming an "endorsement house." The meeting became bogged down discussing whether to support three non CORRA groups who wanted CORRA's help in getting money or moral support from the City of Toronto.

Observation of a CORRA meeting clearly reveals that the 15 or so delegates in attendance know what's going on in the city, know how to influence their aldermen, and exercise a certain degree of power over the new majority at City Council.

Active individuals and member groups in CORRA helped elect several aldermen on the new council. Two aldermanic novices, Colin Vaughan of Ward 5 and Elizabeth Bays of Ward 1, were members of the original CORRA executive.

Other aldermen have been involved with community groups belong to CORRA. Aldermen William Kilbourn, Anne Johnston, Dorothy Thomas, Karl Jaffary, John Sewell, and Dan Heap all have past ties with CORRA.

CORRA regulars hesitate to admit that the organization possesses influence and power. "CORRA has influence," says Vaughan, "but no more than any of its member groups. Not every organization is represented in CORRA. There are many others."

In fact, it is noticeable that some of the more active, working-class citizens' groups such as the South of St. James Town Tenants Association, Grange Park Residents Association, and the Greater Riverdale Organization have not joined CORRA.

CORRA is a confederation of 36 associations of between 40 and 700 members. These range from ForWard 9 in the east end to Humberside in the west end, with Don Vale in the inner city. But CORRA is "very heavily rooted in the east end of Ward 5", admits U of T geography professor Jim Lemon, CORRA's newly elected chairman. Such active groups as the Anr'sx Ratepayers, Rathnally, and Avenue-Bay-Cottingham represent this part of the city.

Many CORRA executive members have also come from Ward 5. Throughout its three and a half years of existence, CORRA seems to have been controlled by a small, knowledgeable, and articulate group of bourgeois professionals, including several U of T professors.

The federation was spawned by ratepayers' groups around Ramsden Park were fighting the intrusion of a high-rise apartment building into their low-rise area. At the same time, the Humberside Residents were fighting the upzoning of Parkside Drive. In both areas, residents wanted the support of other community groups from across the city. Letters of support were written for each other, but these arrangements were quickly seen to be excessively ad hoc.

In August 1969, representatives of groups from South Elinton, Parkdale, Swansea, Rathnally, Asquith-Collier, and

With the victory in the December election of reformers, like Anne Johnston, CORRA may become redundant unless it changes its tactics.

† CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY

Aware of its weakness but relying on the presence of Christ and His Spirit, the Congregation of the Holy Spirit is forming Christian communities in more than forty countries around the world.

For information write to:

Community of the Holy Spirit
54 Clarendon Avenue, Toronto, Ontario

Wychwood Park assembled at the Humberside home of Jim Heal, who later became CORRA's first chairman. At the meeting, says Elizabeth Eayrs, two options were discussed.

First, it was thought that the new group could become the focal point for a participatory movement of community groups -- "Citizen's United".

However, the meeting soon realized that it was actually only composed of representatives of ratepayers' groups and that a confederation of ratepayers' groups was the simplest option. This latter option was chosen and endorsed by CORRA's founding meeting in September of that year.

Two questions have dominated CORRA's history:

Should CORRA, on the one hand, become a co-ordinating body to make the views of the members of its groups known at City Hall, and assist organizing and communication at the grass roots level?

Or, on the other hand, should CORRA formulate its own views on municipal issues and perhaps become an independent political machine?

In practice, CORRA's nature has been the outcome of the conflict of these two views.

The drafting of CORRA's constitution graphically illustrates this conflict. Derek Hayes, from the Rathnally area, and later a CORRA chairman, proposed that the confederation have a council made up of delegates from member groups and an executive to guide the operation of the group. He and the representatives of the more traditional ratepayer groups did not believe an organization could get along without an executive structure.

But in the eyes of U of T microbiologist and Don Vale representative Jeremy Carver, the purpose of an executive was "mainly to organize meetings." In fact, Carver "wanted to do away with an executive altogether and have secretarial duties rotate from group to group with the monthly council meetings."

In the end, CORRA accepted an executive structure, but made the executive responsible to the monthly meetings of the delegates. The executive is composed of the chairman, three vice-chairmen, the secretary, and the treasurer.

Three executive members are connected to universities; chairman Lemon, vice-chairman Jack Granatstein, a York history professor, and secretary Eilert Frerichs, Hart House Chaplain. Vice-chairman Ellen Adams, Ontario NDP leader Stephen Lewis; administrative assistant, is running in the March St. George by-election.

The constitution outlines some liberal goals of the organization which can only be described as "motherhood", such as improving the city's quality of life. The constitution is not specific on any issue.

"CORRA's chief set of activities have focussed around issues that are not local but city-wide in impact," says Lemon. The organization has developed policy stances for its members on such issues as the waterfront, Metro Centre, and transportation.

"Usually, the people who went to CORRA were like-minded," says Eayrs, who formerly represented Swansea Ratepayers. Only the representative from Parkdale objected to CORRA's stance in opposition to the expressway. However, Eayrs noted, "it was difficult to get my association to go along" with the majority.

Perhaps the groups not affected by the Spadina were bulldozed into supporting the CORRA viewpoint. "This really was not that democratic a decision for some groups", admitted Eayrs.

The prevalence of the Spadina Expressway controversy in the news media made it easier for CORRA's stance to be formed by a consensus of many member groups. However, the position on the mammoth waterfront Metro Centre project is an entirely different issue.

Metro Centre, is to be located outside an established neighbourhood and is to be built over a long period of time. CORRA's position in favour of family housing and for a mixture of housing types in Metro Centre was only an abstract idea to many delegates.

Members' attitudes to CORRA's fight for amendments to the project were summed up by Carver: "People were baffled with all the information and were glad someone was dealing with it."

In these broad issue areas, CORRA faces the problem of our so-called technocratic society. CORRA must simplify and present complex issues in a fashion digestible by all its member groups.

"CORRA realized this problem", says Carver, "but I do not think most of the delegates were concerned". If this is so, Eayrs' statement that "CORRA is elitist by its nature", may be valid.

With the 1972 municipal election approaching, CORRA had to establish its position and the nature of its involvement. Hayes proposed that CORRA help form a coalition political party with the support of other community groups and the Toronto and District Labour Council. The coalition would possibly sponsor local candidates.

But Vaughan, then representing Wychwood Park, argued that "people do not want to be constrained by a party platform. People do not like to be told what to do."

Agreeing with him were many ratepayer groups who were afraid that direct participation in the election would divide their memberships. As well, direct partisan action would break a long-standing ratepayer viewpoint -- if you do not support any candidates, you can work with the winner.

While this debate was taking place within CORRA, private meetings were being held in Jeremy Carver's basement. Reform aldermen and CORRA regulars attended.

The result of these meetings was a new organization called Community Organizing for 1972 (CO '72). CO '72 aimed to support community organizing at the local level in preparation for the election.

Carver proposed a compromise for CORRA on the election issue. CORRA should endorse CO '72, he argued, but not necessarily CO '72 methods. This position left individual members and member groups of CORRA free to decide their own role in the election.

Looking back at the election, Eayrs thinks CORRA's support of CO '72 was the best choice. CO '72, says Carver, "gave the political parties an excuse for not entering the municipal arena this time." In a number of closed meetings, the small CO '72 groups also helped narrow down the number of reform citizen candidates to no more than two per ward, the number of aldermanic seats.

By the time of the election, CO '72 had served its purpose, the election was very much a locally-based affair. Eayrs said she realized, "that there was not enough energy to do it effectively at both the central and local levels this time."

The election of a reform City Council has, in a way, deprived CORRA of its old function. Instead of reacting to the negative aspects of such projects as Spadina and Metro Centre, CORRA and the community movement must take a more creative role. If this does not happen, then CORRA will no longer have any raison d'être in city politics.

Some CORRA supporters are a little dismayed at the success of both CORRA and the community groups. "City Hall's atmosphere is very clubby," warns Carver. "We need citizen pressure to keep the new bunch of aldermen on track", he argues.

Perhaps the establishment of ward councils to which the aldermen would report would overcome the problem, Carver believes. "If you give ward councils power, then you will get involvement."

Carver is backed up by CORRA's official position: "These councils should have certain limited powers over such environmental matters as street widenings, garbage collection, and park programs, for example." Recently, CORRA people have been suggesting even more power for these councils, such as a role in determining housing standards and control of planning and development. Through these strong councils, an effective community base could be maintained to control the aldermen. There is, however a risk that these councils may be controlled by bourgeois citizens -- the same people who run CORRA.

Hayes is dismayed as well, but for different reasons. In his opinion, the community movement is closely connected to a reaction to the impersonality and homogeneity of megalopolis. But professionals returning to the inner city to find and create diverse communities, are eating up low-cost housing. For example, Rathnally, which was once a multi-class and multi-ethnic area, has been turned into a homogenous, "an 1867 Don Mills" of affluence. Hayes says a renovated town house next door to him is selling for $84,000. The neighbourhood has been protected, but for whom?

This concern leads directly into the necessity for creation of a housing policy which encourages diverse inner city communities. In the evolving process, this concern need not be separate from the demand for community participation. If ward councils and more community organizing are a success, then new people will be recruited as members. And, these new people may end up to be those with a personal stake in more housing for low-income people. As Carver says, "If you get more people involved, you will get better policy in the end."

The important point is that CORRA must move into these new fields of organizing the unorganized and policy-making, says Lemon. If not, there will be no base of support for the new council -- the new aldermen rather than the people will make the decisions. As John Sewell says in his book Up Against City Hall, "politicians like myself who want to make change must have a base, a strong group of people they are responsible to... if the base is strong enough, then I will have to pay attention to it."

In order to adjust to the new council, CORRA itself must change. The complex city-wide issues that CORRA has dealt with in the past have easily drifted into the hands of a small elite. CORRA must become more participatory. It must be responsible to the people it represents, just as the aldermen must be responsible to the groups in CORRA.

There are several ways of making CORRA more democratic, but it still will be a tough to convince CORRA people to make it happen.

Ward councils may help, and in effect, CORRA people are developing initiatives in this direction. CORRA must also help draw in people and groups who have more than just a moral responsibility to provide housing for low-income people and adequate services for working class areas. In order for the needs of the poor and the immigrants to be properly articulated, they must themselves be part of the politics of the city. In this way, CORRA could accomplish another aim, that of broadening its policy to include more "social" as opposed to planning issues.

Delegates to CORRA must be more closely bound to their associations and must put forward the actual views of the people in their groups, rather than taking positions at CORRA without consulting the membership, as is a common practice now.

"CORRA should not be representing its own point of view -- its view is solely what the membership thinks", says Vaughan.

Even the preparation of briefs can be made more democratic if the member groups are involved in a longer process. CORRA is now preparing a brief to the provincial government's task force on housing. While the initiation of the process began at the CORRA council, the end product will be the result of a "bottom-up" process of the member groups. The Annex and South Eglinton Ratepayers, for example, will consider a draft of the brief at open meetings of their executives. To what degree this is happening at all CORRA groups is a crucial question.

Former mayor Bill Dennison compared citizen's groups to rabbits in a swamp-cities of tracks, but few rabbits. The future of CORRA and the new council depends upon community groups refuting this description of themselves.

Send letters to: Rob Cleverley,
UC Playhouse,

Applications are also being accepted for use of the Playhouse this summer and next year.

The Governing Council next year will be a very demanding experience. It is crucial that student representatives do not compromise their viewpoints in order to maintain a useless credibility which gains the students a few minor and token concessions. On the other hand, grandstanding rhetoric is equally ineffectual. What is required, in order to make the students' less than parity voice felt is a lot of hard work, a better than adequate command of the issues and powerful, persuasive argument. This is extremely important in next year when the question of library access, teaching quality and academic tenure, and the New Programme review all come before the Governing Council.

Close contact must also be maintained with the students through the S.A.C., local councils, clubs etc., if the student governors are not to become alienated (as they were often this year) from the mainstream of student concern and interest.

OAAA swimmers win CIAU title

The Ontario University Athletic Association won the CIAU conference title with 560 points on the weekend in Calgary. The University of Toronto men's team accounted for 420 of the 560 points.

The Canada West University Athletic Association placed second with 484 points, while the Atlantic Intercollegiate Athletic Association was third with 162. Well back of the front runners was the Quebec University Athletic Association with 60 points and the Great Plains Athletic Association with 22.

The OAAA women's team also placed first with 446 points, with the Canada West UAA a close second with 415. The Atlantic IAA was third with 243, and the Canada West QUAA fourth with 163 points. In last spot was the Great Plains conference women's team with 95 points.

The OAAA presented the strongest showing numerically as statistically, sending nine university teams to the finals. The Atlantic IAA sent five university teams, while the QUAA and the Canada West AA sent four each. The last place finisher Great Plains AA only entered two teams from two universities.

U of T team member Jim Adams was named the outstanding male swimmer at the meet, while Sue Smith of the University of Alberta was chosen the outstanding female swimmer, University of British Columbia team member Alan Crawford was named the outstanding male diver at the meet and University of Manitoba participant Janet Nutter was honoured as the outstanding female diver.

Toronto swimmers Byron MacDonald and Jim Adams set two CIAU records -- the only two set at the four day meet. MacDonald broke the old CIAU 200-yard butterfly record of 1:58.3 in a time of 1:55.9, and Adams knocked one-tenth of a second off the old CIAU record in the men's 50 yard freestyle in 21.8.

Toronto team members scored 12 first place finishes in the 34 event meet.

The following is a result of the first three place winners in each event:

800 freestyle relay (men): 1. Toronto, 7:24.0; 2. Western, 7:35.7; 3. Alberta, 7:36.0.

400 metre freestyle (women): 1. Merrily Stratten, Toronto, 4:17.5; 2. Kim Cassidy, Calgary, 4:28.7; 3. Maida Murray, Waterloo, 4:32.1.

1650 yards (men) 1. Shawn Laari, Toronto, 17:34; 2. Nelson Stewart, Alberta, 17:42.4; 3. John Sebben, Toronto, 18:21.5.

100 yard butterfly (women): 1. Sue Smith, Alberta, 1:02.3; 2. Jill Quirk, MacDonald College, 1:03.5; 3. Debbie Prince, New Brunswick, 1:03.8.

200 yard butterfly (men): 1. Byron MacDonald, Toronto, 1:55.9; 2. John Duncan, Ottawa, 2:00.6; 3. T. O'Brien, Alberta, 2:04.1.

SMC 'A', Vic ahead in hockey playoffs

By PAUL CARSON

Semi-final play is well underway in both divisions of interfaculty hockey competition.

In Division I action, SMC 'A' hammered Erindale 12-6 in the first of their two-game total goals series; the concluding game will be played next Monday at 7:30 pm.

Goals by Mike Johnson and Phil Adams gave Vic I a close 2-1 lead over New I in the other semi-final matchup. The eventual winner of this series will play St. Mike's (assuming Erin-dale can't fashion an incredible comeback) in the Jennings Cup final.

In Division II, Vic II holds a four-goal advantage over Law II following a 7-3 victory in their first game. This series will be decided tonight starting at 9:30.

PHE B and a surprisingly tough team from Graduate Studies are paired in the other semi-final. That series opened last night and the deciding game is scheduled for 7:00 pm Friday. All games are played at Varsity Arena.

Fee hike pays for increase in costs

The University of Toronto Athletic Association (UTAA) may have to propose a raise in student athletic fees in the near future if the university continues to offer the association no financial subsidies.

This move would follow closely upon the heels of a fee raise from $15 to $20 in the 1972-73 academic year. That raise was precipitated by declining income and rising expenditures, the probable rationale for a further hike.

The UTAA "Report on Finances 1970-71 and Estimates 1971-72" noted that from 1914 to 1971 the men's athletic association had always paid the full cost of its program, and that a deficit had not existed before the 1970-71 financial year.

In fact the UTAA had even paid construction costs for the stadium and arena (including interest paid to the Board of Governors for the financing of capital construction) totalling $1,366,904.34 up to 1971, with no subsidies from either the university or the government. (By comparison, the athletic facilities at Queen's and Waterloo were paid for by the government and maintenance costs are subsidized by the university.)

Other than the athletic fee, supplementary sources of income have included revenues from the rental of Varsity Stadium for a variety of purposes, including intercollegiate football games and from Varsity Arena, when it is not being used for various stadium maintenance.

Former UTAA financial secretary Philip Loosemore, for example, reported at a November 10, 1970 Athletic Directorate meeting that the high costs of maintaining the arena were "uncontrollable, in that the athletic association was obligated to pay invoices rendered by the physical plant of the university, and to pay the union rate for its labour force as set out by the union contract with the university." And, furthermore, "the stadium expenses... were subject to practically the same conditions..."

The university is not subsidizing the "physical maintenance" costs of the athletics program, but merely imposing the ground rules under which the program will operate. In this department, it is not even a case of students paying for part of the program, as is true of a university "academic" education. At the University of Toronto, students pay the whole shot for athletics, but have no control on how that money is spent.

Of the other operational expenses, athletic clubs bear the main brunt of the cost side of the accountant's ledger. These figures include the cost of operating the 21 different sports U of T competes in as a member of the Ontario Universities Athletic Association, and mostly pays for travel, coaches, uniforms, meals, et cetera.

The Report on Finances notes that university-related activities (for example, intercollegiate, intramural, and women's athletic association games).

In 1969-70, the gap between income and expenditure was minus $42,000 and the estimated shortage for 1970-71 was approximately $62,000, with expected revenue even lower than in 1969-70.

UTAA has little financial control

The UTAA has little control over the fixed costs which consume most of its budget. Operating costs, for example, include expenditures for salaries, pensions, health and unemployment insurance, and arena and these costs, "together with the costs allocated to the Intramural Program represents the focus of all athletic activity on the campus and constitutes our main reason for existing as a department of the university."

Ironically, the administrators of this program have to spend a considerable amount of time seeking to "make both ends meet" rather than devoting themselves to the athletic program. In fact, Athletic Director Dalt White and Assistant Director (Administration) David Tinker have to become "quasi-businessmen" representing the university and the UTAA in its business dealings with the "outside world".

For example, in the 1971-72 financial year alone, UTAA increased its revenue through business deals with Prosoccer Limited (September, 1971), for the use of Varsity Stadium, Paquin Productions Company Limited (musical series for the summer of 1971), the North American Drum and Bugle Championships. More recent deals have been with North American Soccer League and Encore Productions Limited (for the summer of 1973).

And, because as true businessmen the profit motive has come first, the UTAA has turned down reasonable applications for the summer use of Hart House by such organizations as a summer football camp for boys and local "ethnic" (as the UTAA minutes report) soccer teams, in favour of large league teams.

However, technically, all contracts are subject to the final approval by the Governing Council. Once again it's a question of delegated responsibility by the university to the UTAA, with no real power over renting. The October, 1970, "Guidelines for the use of Varsity Stadium and Varsity Arena by non-University Groups" begins: "Technically all contracts for the rental of the Stadium and of the Arena to non-university organizations are the responsibility of the Board of Governors (now replaced by the Governing Council), but certain powers are given to the Athletic Association in its constitution to negotiate and sign contracts without direct reference to the board. Again, the UTAA becomes the administration's hired hand.

Reasons for the Decline in Income

Income had declined in recent years for several reasons, the UTAA concluded. The 1970-71 deficit was largely a result of a decrease in the estimated figures for football and hockey receipts, and stadium rentals.

The athletic fee also failed to provide an ongoing source of increased revenue, since the UTAA report entitled "Changing Trends in Income" found that the increase in enrolment over the previous 25 years was levelling off.

Football revenues had shown a steady decline since 1968, for a variety of reasons including lack of support from grads and the public at large, only a slight increase in student support in the previous 10 years despite the great increase in enrolment at the university. And, finally, the addition of new teams to the league and the loss of games with traditional rivals had an adverse effect upon gate receipts. Furthermore, there had been a decline in student support of intercollegiate hockey with the formation of the new OUA league.

An attempt was made to show in the article entitled "Marketing athletics: how U of T pays for its sports program" (January 10, 1973), that the UTAA then began to embark on a piece-meal plan to raise funds.

The plan began with a study discussing the reasons for the decline in football revenue and solutions to the problem. Most people connected with football who were interviewed in the survey chose the easiest short-run solution - promotional campaigns to sell tickets, half-time shows, and even the idea of an athletic newspaper for publicity.

Proposed Integration of the UTAA with the Department of Athletics and Recreation

The UTAA financial situation began to look a bit brighter in the fall of 1971. The Athletic Directorate minutes of October 26 discussed the proposed integration of the UTAA with the Department of Athletics and Recreation, with the university for the first time proposing to subsidize the athletic program.

Integration was deemed advisable because of the UTAA budget difficulties, the changed nature of the program carried out by the department since the abolition of the phys ed requirements, and the advantages derived from combination under one budget of the athletic program of the university (for example, the elimination of payment from two sources to instructors who also carried out coaching duties).

The Varsity - Frank Rooney

Until recently provost Don Forster was heavily involved in athletics.

At the request of vice-president and provost Don Forster, the university financial analyst, G.L. Court, made recommendations toward resolution of the problem. These included, again, "integration of the budgets of the association and the department in exchange for which the university would assume maintenance costs of the stadium and the arena (exclusive of program costs), plus maintenance grants to cover services rendered by the athletic association for the School of Physical and Health Education.

However, even though the motion on "the principle of integration of the budgets" passed and changes were to be made to the constitution, the situation remains up in the air. The UTAA constitution has not undergone any major revisions since 1968 and the Athletic Directorate minutes for January 13, 1972 record a motion passed stating "that at a time when the governmental structure (of the university) is changing rapidly and many aspects of the university administration are unsettled, the proposed amalgamation" is deferred.

Lately, administration offices have been passing the "athletic buck". Calls from The Varsity to internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway (under whose campus services portfolio athletics is now supposed to exist) only brought the reply that she was new to the job and a reference to vice-provost Robin Ross, who in turn passed the buck to vice-president and provost Forster who passed it back to Conway.

So goes the administrative game.

Writer expands upon earlier letter

I would like to comment on what you published under my name in last Friday's Varsity. This was a position paper meant for internal circulation and generating discussion in our department and was not signed as a letter to the editor. I am inclined to think that this position paper might render itself to useless political propaganda and empty rhetoric in the hands of those who would like to interpret it in a very narrow way.

Moreover, some students who have read my argument in favour of hiring more Canadians in the Department of Sociology have made suggestions that are somewhat against my position. Without considering their counter-argument, the issue of Canadianism in our department would remain obscure and would not stimulate serious discussion. I personally regard the nationalism issue to be a touchy and emotional subject.

A sociological analysis of the matter, therefore, must try to avoid all of the emotional and polemical overtones. We have to present, therefore, the other side of the case with equal vigor if we want to generate an unbiased debate. This would permit the reader to decide on his own which position to take -- knowing "fully" the implications involved. It is with this aim in mind that I would request that the following qualifications of my asserted position be made in order to present the case in its total perspective rather than a partial interpretation which can be condemned as useless polemics in favour of hiring more Canadians.

Many students feel that my argument in favour of hiring more Canadians in the sociology department is one-sided. They have presented valid reasons for their case which can be summarized as follows:

1. If the department wants to be internationally known then reputable scholars like Feuer and Zeitlin are invaluable assets toward that end. Through their constant creativity they would provide a positive image of the department externally and would form a readily available role-model for our students. These scholars are not guided by the so-called "American values"; and, indeed, at times, they have fought against such values. Their international reputation has made them secure and self-confident, and their devotion is to the enhancement of knowledge rather than any predetermined national boundaries. Moreover, these American scholars have enriched the sociology department and their daily presence gives a facade of creativity to an otherwise dull and unproductive department. This is not true, however, of Canadian scholars already in the department. The most powerful Canadian member of the department at present, except for some "editorial works" in his youth and a few commonplace articles later, has really never been able to present himself as a creative intellectual or at any rate an ordinary nationally known productive author.

Therefore, some students would argue that if we want to hire Canadians, at the senior level, simply because they have edited a book or two or have put forth a few research articles in some obscure journals, which had neither a theoretical nor a methodological significance for the discipline, we definitely are degenerating this department in the name of pseudo-nationalism. At the senior level, therefore, any creative scholar of international reputation, who may enhance the quality of the sociology department, should be hired regardless of his nationality. Editing books and publishing petty research reports is no substitute for the intellectual creativity and sociological sophistication.

2. In response to our position that, "Canadian scholars would be much more helpful to Canadian students who desire to get through the PhD program than their American counterparts; and, therefore, we should be hiring more Canadians," some students have validly argued that "this hypothesis have proven to find no support in our department". Through the concentration of power in the hands of one Canadian, for reasons not clear at the moment, the Department of Sociology of this university has become the graveyard of many PhD candidates. The most distinguished Canadian in the department has proven to be the hardest to approach, and the bastion of anti-student policies. This Canadian professor has been unwilling to initiate policies which would help to humanize the PhD program. On the contrary, some powerful American members of the faculty have been instrumental in liberalizing the department and are sympathetic toward students.

3. When we insisted that "Canadians are better teachers for Canadian students and better administrators than foreigners", some students pointed out that the most powerful Canadian in the department has been recognized as the most inefficient administrator. And the most distinguished one has on many occasions discouraged students from registering in his courses -- because he is simply too busy with politicking to have any time for students. Further, he has shown a great tact in dissuading students from any creative work.

4. In defence of our position, we insisted that "Canadian sociologists, because they themselves, when young, were oppressed by their American teachers, are less power hungry than their American colleagues. They would, therefore, concentrate more in scholarly efforts rather than in accumulation of power for dominating others". Some students, however, questioned the validity of our assertion. They pointed to the fact that neither Feuer nor Zeitlin have ever shown a craving for power. Indeed, Zeitlin has shown a remarkable constraint -- somewhat to the extreme -- in the usage of his power. Our Canadian professor, on the other hand, in his long ordeal with the so-called "old-guards" accumulated a tremendous amount of power in the department. It is, therefore, a Canadian and not an American, at least in our case, who has shown a compulsive thirst for power. It is he who is employing this power against his other Canadian colleagues who are labelled as "old-boys" and otherwise are excellent teachers. It is a Canadian who has shown an extreme propensity to exist in order to exterminate the intellectual life of other Canadian scholars in the department. It is he whose identity has thrived on the negative images of others and hate symbols that he has created and not the American scholars.

Students are angry and I sym-want Canadians in our graduate schools to remain there in order to continue their unchallenged, privileged position; but, there are many younger ones who do not share this sort of complex.

I hope very much that I have provided a broader version of what is actually happening in our department. I hope we would start some soul searching and would try to make up our mind as to what should be done in view of the dialectical positions which I have explored in my argument.

Schabas attacks low female Meds enrolment

By JOHN CAMPBELL

Only one candidate of the seven member reform slate running in the Governing Council elections spoke at the slate's rally in Sid Smith foyer on Monday.

Others appeared at the meeting, but only Richard Schabas, running in full-time undergraduate constituency II, spoke.

Schabas (Med I) reiterated to a small and apparently indifferent crowd, his campaign platform against male chauvinism in the U of T Medical Faculty. Schabas criticized the fact that women only constitute 20 per cent of the enrolment the faculty, which he argues is "exactly the same figure as in the days when the administrators now admit there was a quota on women."

Stephen Salaff, one of three math professors fired by the university, took time off the fourth floor Sid Smith occupation to join the meeting.

He declared that math department chairman George Duff has failed to demonstrate that he (Duff) has "the monolithic support" of the department behind him in the present dispute with the professors.

On the contrary, Salaff said, the math department "is in a state of flux unlike it has ever been in the past 100 years". He noted that $50 has been collected from faculty members to support the occupation.

Salaff called upon U of T president John Evans to create a fund of $100,000 to hire extra teachers and make other improvements in first year math courses.

Speaking on the possible repercussions of the demonstration for other departments of the university, he added, "Math reform means sociology reform, geography reform, and medical school reform."

Activist says let women make decisions on abortion

By HEATHER JANE SANGUINS

Decisions to perform abortions should be left to women, said Ellen May of the Canadian Women's Coalition to Repeal Abortion Laws, Monday night.

"The responsibility for an abortion should be put in the hands of the women concerned," she declared.

She contended that it is time for "women to unite" around the issue of liberalized abortion laws.

The public meeting that filled the Town Hall of the St. Lawrence Centre to three-quarters capacity began with a panel discussion moderated by Toronto journalist June Callwood.

The women's coalition national coordinator Joan Campana said that abortion was not as much an "abstract or theoretical question" as a "burning political question". She quoted a male Winnipeg radio announcer who stated that "the time seems to have come to repeal abortion laws". She noted the emergence of the strong pro-abortion movement in the past year and a recent public opinion poll showing 61 per cent of Canadians of all ages as being in favour of repealing all abortion laws.

Montréal doctor Henry Morgantaler pointed out that "any woman undergoing an abortion outside of a hospital is liable for up to two years imprisonment" under section 251 of the Criminal Code. May quoted prime minister P. Trudeau, who said that "every woman who has an abortion must account for her actions like criminal does".

The panelists were disrupted by two shouting seemingly irrational members of the Right-To-Life (anti-abortion) organization, who began to distribute full colour, glossy leaflets showing 28 week-old fetuses to young teenagers in the audience.

Student attacks math advisory body

By JOHN CAMPBELL

Math department occupier Jeff Eisen charged yesterday that proposals for a new advisory committee on service courses in the math department will create "just another bullshit committee to do little things."

At the afternoon session of the math curriculum meeting, called to explain the format of the new body, Eisen pressed committee chairman Ed Barbeau and undergraduate math secretary Nick Derzko to clarify what actual power it would have to influence department policy.

His skepticism reflected the feeling of the audience that the meeting and the proposed committee were obstructions to the prompt resolution of math department problems.

Barbeau admitted that "technically" the department chairman would retain a veto over resolutions passed by the committee, but in his view, faculty support for it would make veto use unlikely. "Formally, I am not competent to guarantee anything," he said, "but I hope the service committee will pack a hit more clout than an advisory body."

Derzko, who has agreed to chair the new committee, took a dim view of the possible effects it might have on future department decision-making.

"There is a real danger," he declared, "that the committee will degenerate into a power group to tell the department what to do."

Earlier in the day, he had argued that the department was not entirely at fault for the present breakdown in communication between staff and students. The students, he said, had not made sufficient use of existing channels of communication to air their grievances.

The occupiers of the math department offices on the fourth floor of Sidney Smith Hall have demanded increased student participation in policy-formation bodies within the department as a pre-condition of their departure. They have occupied the offices since February 27.

Outside the meeting, Eisen said the new committee was conceived by the demonstrators as a step in the direction toward a greater student voice in policy-making.

He was dissatisfied however, with the lack of definition given by the meeting to the powers of the new body and charged that Derzko would control the committee's initial discussions to prevent resolution of those questions in favour of having a strong body.

About 100 people crowded into the morning session to hear Barbeau announce that the new committee would be composed of first year students and their lecturers and tutors, in equal numbers, and two of the department's associate chairmen.

Describing it as a permanent and independent body, he said he hoped it would not merely handle complaints but deal effectively with a wide variety of the academic and administrative problems that have plagued the department over the years.

The crowd, impatient to voice its complaints, voted to go beyond the strict purpose of the meeting -- to discuss the structure of the new committee -- and begin a full review of the department's present policies and practices.

Requests by several students that detailed resolutions for reforms be passed on the spot, were rejected by Barbeau. He agreed instead to place the points of the discussion on the agenda of the committee's first meeting, expected to take place Friday morning at 8 a.m.

Students used the opportunity to complain bitterly about cheating, discrepancies between tutors' marking, the irrelevance of the course textbooks, and the staff-student ratios in the department.

Barbeau was pessimistic about the prospects of the new committee for resolving students' complaints that service courses have too many students per teacher. Reminding the audience that the committee will not have a role in the department's budget formation, he said, "We cannot expect a large flotilla of staff members to be hired to help out and additional tutors are not available."

Students stop equipment removal

By BOB BETTSON

The calm of the occupation of the fourth floor math offices broke Monday afternoon as professor Ken May and two other math department officials tried to remove equipment from the outer office of math chairman George Duff.

The math officials and May suddenly entered the offices and began to remove the typewriters, according to student witnesses. One student struggled briefly with May before the math professor agreed to put a typewriter down.

Students hurriedly called a meeting of the occupiers and decided to set up a tight security system with two guards on duty at all times.

They decided not to give up any equipment to the department. One student stated that they needed the equipment, and that since Duff's office was occupied, all equipment should remain at its present location.

Earlier in the week department personnel had been allowed to enter the office and remove various office supplies.

Charges dropped against two SSSC members

After two hours of continuous cross-examination of its first witness, the crown Monday withdrew charges of causing a disturbance lodged against Rhonda Fleming and Denis Havers.

The charges against the two Stop the Student Surcharge Committee members, stemmed from a February 1 outbreak of violence at a picket line outside the U of T personnel office demanding an end to layoff of U of T outside workers.

Crown attorney Applegath, said yesterday that the charges were dropped because of a "lack of sufficient evidence."

Asked why the charges were dropped in the middle of testimony, he said, "there was no point in going on with the proceedings."

Asked if the testimony of prosecution witness U of T policewoman Joanne Pugh had influenced his decision, Applegath stated, "I can't recall whether the testimony being revealed at the time had any effect on my decision."

Fleming, who defended herself, was questioned several times by the judge about the relevance of her line of questioning during the course of her two hour cross-examination.

During the first 40 minutes of cross-examination, Fleming's questions pertained solely to Pugh's career as policewoman. She asked about Pugh's previous employment with the Metro police, her education as an officer of the law, her salaries over the years, her daily routine and her opportunities for promotion in her present job.

Asked to defend the logic of this line of questioning, Fleming explained that she could not do so in front of the witness. The judge then proceeded to clear the courtroom.

When the court reconvened, the judge explained that he would temporarily allow the questioning to continue, but would reserve the right to disregard all testimony that did not directly relate to the charges at hand.

According to Pugh, who had charged the defendants, she and several other U of T police were stationed on the third floor of the 215 Huron Street building on the morning of February 1. The SSSC had been picketing the building for several weeks by that date.

At noon, according to Pugh, campus police were informed that a disturbance had erupted in front of the building. When she arrived in the foyer, Pugh said she saw, "scuffling both inside and outside the building."

At this point, she saw Fleming try to get into the building from the outside, to aid one of the picketers. After informing her that she was not allowed to enter the building, Pugh claimed that Fleming swore at her and pushed her aside to take part in the scuffle. Pugh claimed she saw Fleming assault U of T constable Marie Weaver. "I saw the defendant take a swing at Constable Weaver. I did not see whether it landed or not."

A vigorously cross-examined Pugh revealed that while she originally had informed Fleming that she was charged with assault relating to the pushing incident by the door, she later decided to ignore that, and rather charge her with assault for her "scuffle" with Weaver.

A leaflet released by the SSSC after the trial was denounced by Applegath. He said that it represented a case of irresponsible journalism and that to his knowledge, several things stated in it were "definitely untrue."

According to the leaflet, the Crown-Attorney had interrupted the proceedings (the cross-examination of Pugh) to consult with lawyer for U of T President Evans. The leaflet continues, "this proves the charges were trumped up. The fact that the Crown consulted with Evans' lawyer, and only after that consultation did they withdraw the charges proves these charges were laid in fact by the University of Toronto."

Forty lonely souls hear pres candidates

Four of the five SAC presidential slates turned up at yesterday's SAC forum -- only to find they faced a nearly empty lecture hall of 40.

The rally at the Old Physics building was typical of a lacklustre campaign ending in today's and tomorrow's election of next year's occupants of the ivy-covered hut south of Hart House.

The voting will take place today and tomorrow between 9 am and 5 pm at approximately 40 polling booths, according to chief returning officer Joe Redican. One may be located in the fourth floor of Sid Smith, so that math department occupiers won't have to leave their posts.

Redican hopes that results of the counting, which will take place in the St. George Drill Hall, will be released by 7 pm tomorrow.

At the sparsely attended forum, SAC presidential candidate Bob Anderson stated that student faculty parity on decision-making bodies will not be reached by next year. He suggested that five years was a more reasonable estimate.

Anderson stressed teaching quality as a criterion for tenure or promotion, and added that more attention needs to be given to course evaluation results.

Questioned on how student positions on staffing committees could be implemented, he commented that the student body has a "natural ally" in the university administration in this particular area, since the University of Toronto cannot afford to get a reputation for ignoring student opinion on teaching quality.

Chuck Vickery, whose slate stresses "fiscal responsibility," advocated reduction in SAC fees, by discontinuing the $1 campus centre levy. He said SAC could also save money by withdrawing from OFS. In an earlier interview, Vickery indicated that membership in OFS was a waste of SAC's time.

He also called for a decrease in communications expenses, including a cut in funds allocated to The Varsity. He contended The Varsity refuses ads, and thus loses money. Several Varsity staffers in attendance explained that The Varsity refuses only those ads from blacklisted firms - i.e. those who do not pay their bills.

When he commented that The Varsity should print one more page of ads, Varsity staffers again explained that four pages must be printed if one is to be added. Vickery was also criticized for his lack of attendance at recent Varsity Board of Directors meetings.

Vickery called, further, for "maximum services at minimum cost," a "rational critique and reasonable alternatives" to the Wright Report, support of open stacks, and a "speedy solution to the day care problem." He did not elaborate further.

Vickery agreed with opponent Peter Havers, SSSC candidate, that students elected to the governing Council be made responsible to students, but neither gave specific ways of accomplishing this. Havers cited student governor Paul Cadario's "discipline scheme" as an example of a student not responsible for student interests.

Havers' platform focused on the fees strike. He contended that an end to wasteful spending by the university administration and the Ontario government would counter the need for increased tuition fees.

Havers was jeered by the engineers present when he commented on employment opportunities, adding that only five per cent of last year's engineering graduates found jobs in their fields.

Greg McMaster, running on a socialist platform, also criticized the high tuition fees engineers pay, as well as decreased job opportunities which confront them when they graduate.

Only the socialist slate stressed women's liberation as a major priority at the meeting. McMaster said the SAC should expose discrimination against women whenever it occurs.

Several women in the meagre crowd commented on the need for a settlement to the day care problem, to ensure women the accessibility to a university education. They also contended that the engineering paper, the Toike Oike, discriminates against women.

Int Affairs resists admin pressure

The Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee yesterday resisted apparent administration pressure to recommend an end to the math department occupation. However, in doing so the governors maintained that "members of the university must have the right of access to their offices."

The administration requested the special meeting after the math department occupiers refused to let internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway, arts and science dean Bob Greene, and math associate chairman Ray Vanstone remove files from the occupied offices of department chairman George Duff Wednesday. The three administrators had not made it clear that they only wanted to take the files pertaining to the grievance waged by the two professors denied tenure whose case the students are fighting.

THE Varsity TORONTO

Vol. 93, No. 59
FRI., MARCH 9, 1973

Shouts of "That's not true, that's a lie!" rang out when Greene told a Wednesday noon rally that the three had made it clear that they wanted to get into Duff's office to obtain files on the background of the professor — Stephen Salaff — whose contract has not been renewed, in order to review his case.

By yesterday afternoon, Greene had backed down from this claim, instead telling the Internal Affairs Committee that there had been a "genuine misunderstanding" Wednesday morning. Minutes before the meeting began, the three administrators had returned to Duff's office, bringing back half the files they needed. The other half remained locked in the chairman's desk because Duff forgot his desk drawer key at home.

Conway continually tried to encourage the committee to recommend some course of action should the occupation ever become disruptive or violent. She said the administration wanted to know when an occupation would cease being a legitimate grievance procedure.

The committee, however, continually reverted to discussion of the substantive issues involved in the week-and-a-half old occupation.

After more than an hour of discussion, the committee passed a motion recognizing that the sit-in is non-violent in its present state and does not require any disciplinary action. If the situation changes, or continues until Internal Affairs' next meeting, the committee further declared it will review the matter.

The governors then went on to note in their minutes their conviction that members of the university must have the right of access to their offices. Anyone interfering with that right would be subject to disciplinary action, they concluded.

The Governing Council's Executive Committee, holding a regularly scheduled meeting yesterday afternoon, also discussed the sit-in. It also avoided backing the administration initiative.

The executive instead affirmed its support for the established staffing rules and procedures, and encouraged the administration to "continue" attempting to resolve the substantive issues raised by the protest.

A special issue of the university's house organ, the U of T Bulletin, was to appear this morning, explaining the university's view of developments until now and outlining the Executive Committee decisions.

Internal Affairs' position about office access evolved after two committee members, professor Michael Grapko and government appointee Marnie Paikin, expressed reservations about ignoring the possibility that Duff might be refused access to his office should he try to use it. Until now, the chairman has steered clear of his occupied office.

Earlier in the meeting, Greene had detailed the background of the student complaints and the administration response to date. Committee members were critical of the department's refusal to sit students on the committee it established to review its governing structures. The committee was struck after the occupation began.

Equally unpopular was the department's unwillingness to negotiate with the occupiers until they ended their sit-in.

Graduate student governor Clarice Henschel asked why the department was refusing to negotiate with the students obviously most concerned about the matter, the occupying students.

"Many members of the department are indignant" about the occupation and the pressure the protestors were placing on Duff, Greene explained.

Chairman Cadario reminded the committee that the substantive issues were not within their terms of reference. "The point of this meeting is to give the administration guidance about the occupation," he told them.

Graduate student governor Clarice Henschel told her fellow governors that she didn't "think this is the time for the Internal Affairs Committee or the Governing Council to be dragged" into an attempt at resolving any alleged disruption. In fact, she said, "I don't see it as a disruption."

New SAC president Bob Anderson beams moderately as students gave him a half-hearted win.

Anderson wins hands down, mandate strength doubted

By BRIANE NASIMOK

With fewer than 3,500 of a possible 21,000 undergraduates voting, UC student Bob Anderson coasted to an easy victory in the SAC presidential election yesterday.

Anderson with 1,715 votes finished with a lead of more than 1,000 over his nearest competitor, engineer Chuck Vickery.

Spoiled ballots and abstentions accounted for more than 400 votes.

Anderson and his vice presidential candidates, Stephen Moses and Mike Scott, were declared winners at 6:30 pm, one and one half hours after the polls closed. They carried most of the colleges and faculties except engineering, Vickery's home faculty.

Abstentions carried Physical and Occupational Therapy, Scarborough and Architecture. Architecture students abstained 51 times out of 60.

The lowest turn-out in at least six years saw the United Socialist Slate win 306 votes; the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee ticket got 197; and the Peter Baumann ticket had only 120 voters supporting them.

Last year over 7,500 voters turned out to elect SAC president Eric Miglin, with a 1300 vote plurality. Anderson attributed this year's poor turnout and high abstention vote to "the inability of this year's SAC to relate to students."

Anderson said the most serious problem he faces is to "have the students see the SAC as a viable source in the university."

Anderson was very happy with the campus-wide support he received, especially in Engineering. Although his slate had been concerned at first about a split in the campus he said, no split materialized.

Vickery said that "perhaps the results were indicative of the feeling on campus." Although he thought Anderson received a "ridiculously small mandate" he did concede that it was "clear."

The ballot box from Emmanuel College could not be found, chief returning officer Joe Redican reported, because the responsible returning officer could not be found. It could not substantially change the result, since fewer than 50 votes are expected to be in it.

Apathy prevails at SAC contest

By ALEX PODNICK

It was nearly all over before it had really begun. Standing among the tables in the Drill Hall last night, the SAC presidential aspirants faded almost inconspicuously into the background.

There was no excitement, no tears. There had never been any real contest. Fourth year math student Bob Anderson had the election sewed up before it ever began, starting off with support of all shades of campus politics — right, centre, and left of centre.

The campaign never really got off the ground. The enthusiastic politicking which characterized past campaigns was missing, the victim of an apathy which precipitated the lowest voter turnout in recent years.

And, last night was the culmination of all that non-drama, faring worse than a Grade B movie.

SAC president-elect Bob Anderson stood off to the side, shyly smiling as the Anderson — Stephen Moses — Mike Scott ticket swiftly chalked up a more than 1,000 vote lead over its nearest competitor.

Almost everybody had a different explanation for the poor turnout. Anderson and United Socialist Slate vice-presidential candidate Greg McMaster blamed it on this year's council.

"The lack of impact SAC has had this year" was the way the president-elect put it. He admitted the biggest task confronting his council would be to re-establish students' confidence in SAC's ability to influence the university and educational decisions.

McMaster, the Old Mole member of the USS ticket, said the small percentage of students voting "represents a generalized disillusionment with the possibilities of achieving anything through student government", a disillusionment resulting from the poor performance of recent councils.

Retiring SAC president Eric Miglin saw the low turnout as "for the most part a function of the seemingly low-key campaigns that all of the candidates ran, and the lack of a central issue." Last year, when the numbers voting hit a near record high, the library occupation provided the central issue, he said.

SAC chief returning officer Joe Redican complained about lack of co-operation from local councils in organizing the election. "General apathy" and the math sit-in's domination of The Varsity's news pages accounted for the low turnout, he thought.

The loyal few present for the official count harboured no illusions about the Anderson mandate.

A chastened Chuck Vickery, the engineering student who headed the second-place team, concluded the low turnout "leaves Bob in a really poor position to effectively represent students". "I can't help but think it weakens their credibility," he commented.

Miglin concurred. "I think it undoubtedly weakens their mandate; it indicates the (students') lack of interest or lack of knowledge about their students' council." However, "I'm confident that the three of them will do a good job," he was quick to add.

SAC chief returning officer Joe Redican wandered listlessly around his domain, raising the megaphone in his hand to call for volunteers to count one last box of ballots and to cart the boxes back to the SAC office.

Asked about a missing Emmanuel ballot box, he replied, "It must be around some place. By tomorrow (Friday afternoon), we'll know where it is."

Greene praises open math meetings

Arts and science dean Bob Greene praised Tuesday's open math curriculum committee meeting, at a Wednesday Sid Smith rally supporting the math department occupation.

He declared to a crowd of about 300 people that the meetings had given math students an opportunity to air their grievances and that it was a positive indication the math department has moved "to respond to the legitimate concerns of first year students in the service courses."

The curriculum meeting heard faculty proposals for the creation of a new permanent service course committee, comprised of students, lecturers, tutors, and two administrators. The service course committee is expected to advise on a wide range of academic and administrative problems in first year math courses.

A committee with no student members that will examine the governing structure of the department has also been established.

Greene said he had "run into a great deal of flak" from the math department for calling the students' complaints legitimate but, he added, "I don't think any department in this university is above reproach."

The crowd listened attentively as the dean replied to criticism from several speakers that the math department has failed to deal with the "real, substantive issues" raised by the 10-day old occupation which was sparked by the refusal of the university to retain three math professors.

The occupiers have demanded: "That Duff offer a contract to Stephen Salaff for 1973-4 and write a letter to president Evans recommending that professors David Spring and Micheal Mather be given tenure, and that students be given immediate and substantial representation and effective decision-making power on all departmental bodies, including those dealing with hiring, firing, and tenure of faculty".

Greene placed the blame for the eruption of the crisis on the three professors themselves, claiming they had not taken advantage until last Friday of the proper legal channels to seek appeals against their dismissals.

As early as last December, the dean said, he had invited one of the professors involved, Salaff, to his office to discuss why his (Salaff's) annual contract had not been renewed. He added that the offer was extended more than once.

"Out of a sense of equity and fairness to the others (who did follow the correct procedure), my position and that of Dr. Evans is that appeals against (such) decisions must be pursued through legal channels," he stated.

Salaff said last night he found Greene "most unsympathetic" in a December meeting, during which the dean refused to deal with the issues, instead sending Salaff and students back to Duff and the departmental curriculum committee.

As well, Salaff states, Greene accused him of "aggrandizing" himself for personal gain in coming with students to complain. The math professor considered discussion "broken off" with that remark.

Arts and Science dean Bob Greene tells student rally that he likes open mass curriculum meetings.

Greene also says he suggested Salaff to the U of T Faculty Association's Grievance Committee.

Salaff replies that the committee "does not behave as union" in the interests of professors and that there were no precedents for action "in a case like mine". He added that Spring had been discouraged from appealing to the committee.

"Pressure brought about in any way through occupations and rallies is unfair to other individuals who do not have this kind of support," Greene insisted.

Earlier in the rally, speakers severely criticized the math department's present policies and its attempts to resolve its differences with math students.

Sociology professor Tony Smith described the department as autocratic and staffed by a faculty pre-occupied with research and "prestige-maintenance", rather than teaching.

He declared that new service committee was a powerless "sandbox committee" that will ultimately become a paradox of the occupation's apparent gains.

Instead of being an organ of effective student input into department policy-making, he said it would be a place "where the faculty will gain the courage and opportunity to voice their opinion".

Indifference evident in constituency elections

Student indifference to campus political elections, evident in an extremely low turnout in the SAC presidential elections, was also made clear by constituency elections of SAC representatives.

Fewer than 150 of University College's over 2,000 students, voted and not many more turned out at the New College polls. St. Mike's and Scarborough Colleges acclaimed all SAC reps, as well as their top officers in their college councils for next year.

Former SAC cultural affairs commissioner Seymour Kanowitch topped the UC polls with a meagre 86 votes in his third successful election to SAC. Sandra Margulis, Paul Till, incumbent Larry Weidbrod and Allan Salzman also made it into SAC for next year, defeating two other candidates.

The big winner at New College was Ken Burgess with 146 votes, closely followed by Susan Goldberg, Glen Morris and Geoff Eisen rounded out New's slate, defeating four others, including three Stop the Student Surcharge Committee members.

Incumbent Alice Anjo, SAC presidential chief returning officer Joe Redican, Governing Council candidate Ian Gray, Michael Waud and Judy Wahl were acclaimed to SAC by St. Mike's students. Tom Hamer and Leo Longo took over the student union's presidential suite with no opposition.

SAC vice-president Ross Flowers took over David Onley's office as Scarborough student council president, along with vice-presidents Scott Cavalier and Chris Waddell with no one to fight. Flowers, Cavalier, John O'Donohue, Vivian Rossman and Sreela Sengupta rode to power as SAC representatives without their electoral strengths being tested.

McGill students vote funds for day care

MONTREAL (CUPI) — McGill University's Alliance for Child Care (ACC) finally won its victory Wednesday when students at a general meeting voted to allocate $1 of their student society fees to a parent-run co-op day care centre.

The victory came with no credit to the McGill administration which obtained an injunction February 12 forbidding the ACC from establishing a day care centre anywhere on the McGill campus. The injunction effectively ended a ten-day ACC occupation of a university lounge, after the administration had evicted a temporary ACC centre from another building where it had been since November.

When the injunction was issued, the ACC left the occupied area and established an interim centre in Hillel House. Hillel, a campus-oriented Jewish youth group, is not controlled by the McGill administration, and therefore is not affected by the injunction. The group fully backed the ACC action.

Observers expect the new ACC centre, financed by the student levy, to be located in a house near the campus, to overcome the injunction.

In early March ACC members circulated a petition calling for a special student society meeting to deal with the issue. It proposed that McGill students pay $1 of the $24 student society fee for ACC-run day care, with the proviso that students could opt-out by requesting their $1 fee not be channelled toward day care.

The McGill student society constitution provides for general meetings if at least 300 students request them. If 300 students attend decisions reached are binding on elected representatives.

Students at the Wednesday general meeting approved the day care motion overwhelmingly.

The McGill administration has consistently refused to deal constructively with the ACC demands for a cooperative, parent controlled day care centre. It wants to set up one of its own, but even its own effort has been slow in getting off the ground, because of an alleged lack of space.

The day the injunction was issued to end the occupation February 12, McGill vice-president Stanley Frost claimed that negotiations, which had broken off that morning, would resume three days later. His statement was a ploy to remove the ACC members from his office where they had escalated their action. Two hours later key ACC organizers were served with the injunction.

Meanwhile, an occupation of a University of Toronto building by a parent-controlled day care centre approaches its first anniversary with no end in sight. The university wants to establish its own centre on the site premises, but the parents refuse to end the occupation which began in April 1972, unless the administration guarantees an alternative building. The university is reluctant to call in the police.

Administration manoeuvre flops

Internal Affairs agrees sit-in okay

Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway went to the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee special meeting yesterday to convince the governors to give the administrator a relative carte blanche to deal with the math department occupation.

It wasn't a new tact. University president John Evans sent Conway to the committee twice before to snare approval for possible university disciplinary action. That way when the potentially embarrassing decisions get put into effect the president is spared from any blame which may follow the action. Evans, after all, is only too aware of the negative effect breaking up unauthorized activities had upon the career of then acting president Jack Sword. The first time Evans sent Conway to get the Internal Affairs to recommend keeping access to 215 Huron Street open and call Metro police for assistance if necessary. The second time, the committee went in camera to advise Evans about how to deal with workers soliciting funds in a university lunchroom for a defence fund for people arrested following the 215 Huron violence.

But, this time, his manoeuvre failed terribly, leaving Conway looking rather foolish and completely helpless. Despite her several attempts to get the committee to recommend what the university should do if the math department situation got out of hand, the governors would not be moved to respond to a non-existent threat.

Instead, they concluded the sit-in was not interfering with the university's functions and, albeit indirectly, that the occupation represented a legitimate expression of grievance.

That decision was the only reasonable one the governors could make. Good for them! It's about time Governing Council committees started refusing to be rubber stamps for administration policies.

Salaff suggests novel appeal

I have been strongly pressed by both dean (Bob) Greene and vice-president (Jill) Conway to institute "appeal proceedings" to seek redress of my grievances in the Mathematics Department. However, neither of them has referred to any precedent for an appeal in a case such as mine, except the benevolence of the dean. This lack of established appeal channels contrasts with the relatively well-defined procedures available in tenure review cases.

Accordingly, I have taken the liberty of suggesting a novel form of appeal hearing, outlined in the following letter. A public hearing, during which all aspects of my dismissal from the mathematics department would be aired before a jury on which students hold a parity voice, is the best and perhaps the only way for me to gain a fair hearing:

This letter (to vice-president Conway) follows our conversation of March 7, in which you expressed your interest in facilitating grievance procedures which will help to protect my career as a mathematician at the University of Toronto. I appreciate your concern in the matter, and I wish to request that the following procedure be followed in my case. I hope that you will consider my suggestion in an open-minded way.

I propose that a public hearing be held Monday noon, March 12, with a mutually agreeable chairperson, during which all relevant information on my case be brought to light. I am prepared to sign a statement indicating my willingness that all confidential information concerning my case be made public.

I wish to be accompanied by my advisor at this hearing, and I feel that the presence of Professors Duff and Vanstone is required. Since I hold the view that a substantial student voice in university decision-making is needed, I ask accordingly that the panel or jury which hears the proceedings consist of an equal number of students and faculty.

I shall be pleased to discuss any further aspects of the matter with you.

Unbelievable excuses for arbitration rejection

Toronto's media have been waging one of their typical anti-labor campaigns against the province's six month old elevator strike. All of a sudden, the media is flooding us with dire tales of the dangers facing the public as a result of the strike, preparing the groundwork for possible government intervention.

Instead of spreading fear tales, the media should consider the elevator industries' refusal to submit to voluntary arbitration. The unions have already agreed to that proposal, but the companies have rejected it.

"It's a gamble," said Toronto area elevator union local president James Hughes, referring to voluntary arbitration.

"We could lose our shirts. But, we'll try it."

The companies try to rationalize their refusal to co-operate, claiming hiring, assessment, and training of employees "are issues we cannot compromise with the union, we cannot accept the risk of having them compromised by an arbitrator."

Compromised by an arbitrator, indeed! What exactly do the companies want us to believe about the irresponsibility of arbitrators — that they'll sell out public safety to cater to the whims of the workers? Hardly!

Such an unbelievable excuse for non-cooperation only throws the companies into further disrepute.

Toronto's elite and Miglin hear Trudeau promote unity

By DOUG HAMILTON

Two thousand of Toronto's wealthiest Liberals, a Kitchener beer carnival king and SAC president Eric Miglin heard Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau Wednesday night laud the virtues of a united Canada and castigate the Conservatives for promoting bankrupt policies.

Speaking at the annual Metro Liberal fund-raising dinner, Trudeau told enthusiastic partisans his government would risk defeat in the House of Commons rather than submit to Opposition demands which he termed "reckless giveaways". The Royal York Hotel meal cost party faithful $75 a plate.

In an impassioned speech, delivered with the verve reminiscent of his 1968 style Trudeau asserted that a Conservative government would spend money "hand over fist".

However, he boasted Opposition Leader Robert Stanfield would not succeed in his attempts to topple the Liberal minority government.

"Very seldom have the irrational, purely electoral approaches succeeded in this country, and then when they did, it was only temporarily," said the Prime Minister.

The Conservatives also came under fire for scuttling a Vietnam supervision plan conceived by External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp, who attended the dinner.

Sharp proposed an on-the-spot examination of the Vietnam truce by an all-party delegation. The plan disintegrated Wednesday night when Conservative foreign affairs critic Claude Wagner dismissed it as a futile exercise.

The Prime Minister claimed the Conservatives had "no policy on Vietnam" and other important issues such as capital punishment.

Although he scathingly denounced the opportunism of the Conservatives, Trudeau said nothing about the New Democratic Party whose 31 members have supported the Liberal minority.

"I think it was good of Mr. Trudeau not to attack the New Democrats," a Liberal party spokesman told the Varsity. "It showed that he is being positive."

The Varsity—Doug Hamilton

The Conservatives have "no policies", says Prime Minister Trudeau.

Trudeau criticized the Conservatives for advocating wage and price controls and a fiscal deficit greater than the $2 billion budgeted by the Liberals. He claimed the Opposition had offered no viable solution to halt runaway prices.

The Prime Minister avoided discussing the high rate of unemployment which the Canadian Labour Congress had attributed to Liberal policies the day before he flew to Toronto.

Switching his attack from the Opposition, the Prime Minister asserted only the Liberal party could ensure national unity without resorting to regional bribes to maintain confederation.

The Liberal policy of bilingualism, he said, is just as important today as it was in the Lester Pearson administration which drew up much of the Liberals' present policy. Trudeau spoke only briefly in French, in contrast to last year. He emphasized French-Canadians must enjoy equal rights with their English-speaking counterparts, and must be allowed to participate fully in "their government" in Ottawa.

Trudeau said the Liberals were humbled at the polls last October because they "failed to consolidate" the policies which they proposed in the 1968 election. He conceded his government made blunders in its four years in power.

"We have stumbled as Liberals," the Prime Minister confessed. "God knows we have made some mistakes."

Canada, said Trudeau, has escaped much of the conflict which has erupted in the world over the past few years. He cited the interecine conflicts which have wracked Northern Ireland, the execution of diplomats in the Sudan and the downing of a Libyan airliner by the Israeli air force.

Trudeau abandoned his lecturer's style several times during his speech to throw out some witty comments to the audience.

He joked about the opposition to the planned airport for Pickering and described himself as a "lovable corporate welfare bum."

The largely bourgeois crowd responded with polite applause to Trudeau's humour but was more subdued than last year.

According to a Liberal Party spokesman, the dinner produced revenue in excess of $100,000. While most of the guests seemed to enjoy the menu consisting of Gazpacho Valencia, Fiddleheads Saute, Steak Esterhazy, a man from Ottawa stumbled into the press room complaining that the $75 dollar dinner "was only worth 16 hucks."

The dinner helped reinforce the party's links with corporations and a Liberal spokesman admitted letters were sent out to firms urging them to send representatives. The chairman of the event was Gordon Sharwood, president of Guaranty Trust Company of Canada.

No left-wing demonstrators were present this year as they have been at past Trudeau Dinners.

Women's courses: tough problems, far-reaching aims

One of the most recent, and most interesting, appearances on university campuses, are 'women's courses'. They are also difficult to analyze, perhaps impossible to evaluate definitively at this point.

The kind of course offered varies from department to department, from university to high school, and from the educational institutions to the community.

However, it is fruitful to look at some of the general issues which have arisen in trying to plan and operate general introductory courses on women within the university setting. Some of these issues may arise as well in one form or another in discussing consciousness and education, in settings other than the university.

The impact of the women's liberation movement on our society is being manifested in many different ways. There has been a mushrooming of courses on women across the country, and at the same time there is a growing interest in women's writing, art, films, non-sexist children's literature, and increased active political participation at most government levels.

Women: Oppression and Liberation, one of the women's courses offered by the University of Toronto in the Interdisciplinary Studies Department, is an introductory course in which an attempt is made to identify the position of the individual woman, and women as a group, within the social and economic framework.

Three years ago when the course was in its early stages of planning, there were no women's courses offered at the University of Toronto and there was very little available Canadian material. At that time, there were about half a dozen female faculty members at U of T who appeared to be interested in such courses but it is difficult to say then, and even now, how many of them could afford to put their careers on the line for a women's course.

This is perhaps more crucial in 1973 than 1969 because economic scarcity has forced academics to entrench themselves wherever they are, and very little money is being spent on educational innovation.

When the Interdisciplinary Studies course on women was approved in the spring of 1971, it passed with very little difficulty. By setting up a program such as Interdisciplinary Studies, the Faculty of Arts and Science, besides allowing for some experimentation and innovation, siphoned off many of the dissatisfied elements — teachers and students.

In presenting an introductory course on women, one has to take into consideration where women's "heads are at", and work from there. It becomes necessary to decide if the study of women should proceed in an "objective" manner or whether it should relate in the first instance to the person engaging in the study.

The final goal or women's studies is realized at the point where study of women, the female point of view, perspective and contributions are fully integrated into any existing program.

The intermediate step assumes a combination of general introductory and highly specialized study areas. The primary step thus calls for initially developing broad analytic tools so that in the future those tools can be applied to specialized work.

Recognizing the personality traits present in the typical female role — passivity, dependence, insecurity etc., it is crucial that women teachers not set themselves up in the style of males (academics) and proceed to lecture women on why they should change.

This is related not just to the male-female dichotomy, but to the traditional authority pattern of teacher transferring his knowledge to the student. It is fair to describe the teacher as "his" in this case: less than 10 per cent of academics at the University of Toronto are female, and academic survival requires that female academics conform to those standards established by the men before them.

It is easy and simplistic to accuse the teachers of a general introductory course on women of being anti-intellectual. But initially the study of women by women must necessarily take the psychological state of women into consideration, if it is to relate to them in a way that is meaningful to them.

It is dangerous if you are at all interested in social change, to use the established methodology of the social sciences when engaging in the study of women. For example, is it possible for a quantification-oriented method to take a psychological set of characteristics into consideration?

The point is illustrated to some extent by the inaccuracies and misinterpretation of female sexuality by male "experts". Similar errors in developing analyses of the history of the family occur in studies by male historians. By and large, the formalized bodies of academic knowledge do not include women in a real sense, mostly because this knowledge has been developed by men.

Thus there exists a situation in which it is crucial for female academics and intellectuals to validate the claims of those feminists engaging in the preliminary work of teaching women about themselves.

It is at this point that strategy becomes important. Should one try to subvert the system from within, i.e. be ladies, or should one try to develop alternatives, i.e. be radicals. Those two choices have traditionally been pitted against each other. However, it is not clear that they are mutually exclusive. But in making a choice, many questions are raised:

Whose standards am I using? If I want to engage in developing feminist analysis in a certain area, to what extent will I be compromised by the established guild (master-student)? If I am a female student will there be an academic in the department — male or female — to assist me, let alone one who thinks that women have contributed any serious intellectual work that needs to be studied?

If you are in a department in which there are one hundred male professors and two female professors will the prevailing attitude mitigate against students even beginning to question the allowed "correct" interpretations?

But these are problems which exist not only in the study of women, but in any critical approach to learning. For example, are there any courses on fascism in the Political Economy department? Why does the Faculty of Management Studies train people to run businesses instead of helping them to investigate alternative methods of economic organization?

It is clear that existing structures cannot be ignored, but depending on the specific case, most structures are next to impossible to work with and at best are accommodating to a certain point.

Advanced specialised courses on women need a basis from which to operate, but whether those courses are given from a straight university department or a Women's Studies department is not crucial. However, practically speaking, it may be necessary to actively set up a separate program with affiliates to catalyse production in this field.

Given a general criticism of authoritarian methods of teaching, it is necessary to assume that students are responsible and should be encouraged to participate in an active manner.

The initial study of women involves a variety of approaches. Sociological, psychological, economic, political and historical questions must be considered, and this can be done within a framework of themes such as those used in 71-72 in the Interdisciplinary Studies course.

The themes covered were images, sexuality, family, work and work force participation, revolution, and other countries, and were covered by employing film, novels, poetry, plays, polemics, lectures, seminars.

In trying to operate an undergraduate university course on women, the variety of experience of people taking the course enters the picture. For example an average day time section is composed of nineteen to twenty-year-old second year university students. An average extension section is more likely to be composed of housewives, teachers, secretaries, parents — people who have had to confront societal images and expectations of themselves.

Younger women on the other hand have had limited contact with employers, with being mothers and wives. By the time they get to university their career expectations are higher than most other women and the reality of business practices have not been exposed to them. But even then, they are making choices about careers which they may be able to combine with marriage, children, and homemaking.

This is an argument which supports a general re-education of the public to consider alternatives to present living arrangements, for society to generally assume and pay for many of the functions that women perform for nothing, so that young girls do not have to choose between being a person and helping another person be a person.

Given an ambivalent image of themselves, it is necessary for women to be in serious and conscious contact with other women. It is vital for men to meet with men and women with women to discuss roleplaying. At some point during the process of this type of discussion both men and women have to reconvene.

However, it is difficult for this to occur at this point in time because men's discussion groups are not meeting. In the women's courses in Vancouver and Toronto unmixed sections have been necessary.

Many men have responded in a manner which indicates that women's liberation is a thing that they want to study; that has aroused their curiosity; that it is incorrect for women to meet without them; and that it is not necessary or valid for men to talk about themselves.

The full time university program provides a very comfortable setting to study anything, its primary limitation being who gets there. The people who can take advantage of these programs are limited by their financial situations, and arrangements should be made to provide some forum for general community participation. Of course this is a sop to the public and will continue to be so long as the university operates as a class institution.

The public lecture series run by the Vancouver and Toronto women's courses draw approximately four to five hundred to the weekly sessions.

The huge attendance at these sessions indicates at least two things. First, that people are interested and want to talk about the position of women in our society, and secondly, that the general community will participate in an educational program which costs them nothing other than what they already pay for through taxation.

In discussing the philosophy and framework which exist and operate in such a manner that men and women are forced to relate in terms of structures rooted ultimately in economics, rather than as people, the following are some of the specific areas that must be considered:

- The relationship between production and reproduction,

- The necessity for the nuclear family structure and the dependence of the state on the existence for this type of organization of people.

- The implications of laws governing divorce, desertion, custody, marriage, incest, rape, prostitution.

- The fact that society does not provide directly for the maintenance and rearing of children other than by natural parents.

- In whose interests are the decisions about efficiency, poverty, unemployment and profit made and who makes them?

- Is it necessary for people to work eight hour workdays, given our technological capacity? The study of women, then, is not a study in and unto itself. It is a study which questions the basic values of our society.

Dead-end dangers: a long way to go for women's lib

Adapted from The Chevron

The effects of the off-shoots and outgrowths of the Women's Liberation Movement of the late sixties can be felt at almost every cultural and economic level of North American society. Yet, many women — those who have watched from the sidelines as well as those who shared in and struggled with the birth pangs of the new feminism — regard the current state of the movement with mixed feelings.

Perhaps the greatest of these sometimes contradictory mixed blessings is to be found in the successful popularization of the movement over the last few years. Some of the positive aspects of this popularization evolved in part from the progressive tendencies of youth, student, black and assorted other radical

Today in North America, the women's movement is more diffuse and diverse — and less cohesive — than it has ever been. The volumes of printed material, radio and TV time devoted to women recently have made many of the demands and positions of the women's movement (superficially at least) household catchwords from one end of the continent to the other. Women from all races, religions, age-groups, educational backgrounds and social classes have become involved in one form or another.

From the Radicalesbians to the Voice of Women, from consciousness-raising groups to the women's caucuses of left movements, from the Women Teachers' Federation to women's collectives organizing around specific issues or

The conference's chief organizer, Susan Geason, OFS secretary, commented at the final plenary that, "It was not my idea to get a horde of the converted together to reinforce each other positively. It was time we tried to work in some people who didn't know." Certainly not a bad idea, yet for Geason, the conference became "fouled up in technicalities and politics... Next time, let's have an educational experience that doesn't turn into politics."

It is perhaps understandable that in drawing up the agenda for the meeting, she should wish to avoid the factional ideological arguments between established left parties or 'vanguard' groups. It is too often an argument in which only the initiated and articulate can participate and one which perpetuates the splits in the the speakers. Discussion seemed unable to develop beyond the narrow parameters set by the few women at the front of the room, or in the odd case, by the most vocal of the 'audience'.

Although the word 'class' and even 'socialist' were far from unmentioned, the thrust of the sessions was primarily directed toward getting women a greater slice of the professional and academic pie. The majority of the resolutions which were approved were directives to government agencies regarding university accessibility, hiring, scholarships, student loans and day care facilities.

There was no examination of the role and development of the women's liberation movement — its past, its present, or its future. There was little discussion of the roots of the oppression of women — or the means of eliminating those root causes and building a truly egalitarian alternative.

Instead, there was a necessarily superficial and limited look at the symptoms of a sick society primarily as they affect middle class women — coupled with an attempt to find the appropriate band-aid that would mask the symptoms, and keep the increasingly conscious pain of women within the range of the tolerable.

movements of the last decade. Working within and alongside them, many women developed for the first time, the theoretical and conceptual tools — and, to some extent, the confidence — with which to understand their own position in society.

And, of course, the real revolutionary potential in the rising consciousness of women of their cultural and economic oppression — and its role in the social and economic organization of capitalism — provided the greatest positive impetus to the movement as a whole.

On the other hand, were the less progressive roles played in the popularization of the movement by the male-dominated bourgeois media, which selectively and paternalistically played up the least offensive (to them) aspects of the 'women's lib' and laughed at the others. The male liberalism which evolved particularly within young radical movements (and had its parallel in the white liberalism which uncritically elevated black militancy to the position of revolutionary vanguard) deprived activist women of the only possible external source of constructive criticism.

But perhaps the most inhibitive input into the fledgling radical movement was that of professional and academic middle class women who adapted the principles of the movement to their own respectability; and saw in it the chance to gain equal privileges with the men in their own already privileged economic class.

programs — women, and women's groups, are demanding (and sometimes, taking) more and more freedom from their traditional roles in the home and work force.

The more consciously political decay the type of consciousness which seeks, through legislation and 'proper channels' to merely cut women in on the power of control in a society that remains based on capitalist exploitation and oppression of one class of people by another.

Yet even that type of action has its progressive effects, (primarily as educational value for women isolated from movement action per se), however limited those effects may be in the long run.

But as long as the ideology of the Women's Movement remains ill-defined, there will be no more coherent and effective formulation of strategy and tactics for the years of struggle ahead. The rift among the theory-generators of the women's movement over the primacy of the feminist struggle versus the primacy of the struggle for socialism must also be resolved.

But for the present, the diffusion and diversity of the women's movement remains one of its primary characteristics. Last month, the Ontario Federation of Students and the Victoria College students' society at U of T sponsored an Ontario Conference on Women. It was an interesting study in the types of thought of the women who link themselves, however peripherally, to the women's struggle.

movement without even providing a vehicle for raising the consciousness of the interested women on the sidelines. But the women's movement is nothing if it is not political, and the recognition of this basic fact is essential to the formulation of effective action.

Over 200 women from as far away as Ottawa registered for the sessions on women in the arts, athletics, politics, and health education; and on day care, women's studies, and academic discrimination.

A quick survey of the crowd around the registration tables indicated a predominance of well-dressed professional looking women in their twenties and thirties. The many carefully coiffed heads and equally carefully made-up faces are common at liberal-issues women's conferences in cosmopolitan areas across the continent. Similarly unsurprising was the number of grey heads, the young students and the not-quite-freak women. The old 'heavies' were conspicuous only by their absence, and the teachers and secretaries and professionals and professors were much in evidence. If there were representatives of lower-income women from working class homes, they were remarkably quiet.

The effectiveness of the seminar-format teaching/learning experience was limited by overcrowded classrooms, speakers' lists which generally prohibited dialogue and kept the topic of conversation changing as frequently as did

Such measures may be necessary to provide the breathing space for further growth and development of women's consciousness. But at the same time, it must not be forgotten as it seemed to be at the conference on Ontario Women, that a band-aid measure may screen an offensive sore from view but cannot correct the systemic disorder that caused it.

There was a time when I could leave a women's conference with a feeling of intellectual and emotional excitement — a feeling of sisterhood. Not this conference. Perhaps it was because the one-time activist leadership has become a less visible minority. Or perhaps it was because so many of the conference-goers visually epitomized the current societal stereotype of women so that the element of trust was lacking.

It is clear that the access of respectability to the women's movement has allowed it to reach women not attracted by its exuberant, frenetic beginnings. But it is also clear that if the women's movement is to effectively fight for the elimination of all that is repressive, limiting and inhuman in the present role of women; the movement must not be held back by women who would retain the privileges of middle class position. Only in the elimination of class stratification in society itself lies the possibility for full development of the potential of all people.

So you plan to spend the Summer in Europe this year. Great. Two things are mandatory. A ticket to Europe. And a Student-Railpass. The first gets you over there, the second gives you unlimited Second Class rail travel for two months for a modest $135 in Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Luxembourg, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, and Switzerland! All you need to qualify is to be a full-time student up to 25 years of age, registered at a North American school, college or university.

And the trains of Europe are a sensational way to travel. Over 100,000 miles of track links cities, towns and ports all over Europe. The trains are fast (some over 100 mph), frequent, modern, clean, convenient and very comfortable. They have to be. So you'll meet us on our trains. It really is the way to get to know Europeans in Europe.

But there's one catch. You must buy your Student-Railpass in North America before you go. They're not on sale in Europe because they are meant strictly for visitors to Europe—hence the incredibly low price. Of course if you're loaded you can buy a regular Eurailpass meant for visitors of all ages. It gives you First Class travel if that's what you want.

Either way if you're going to zip off to Europe, see a Travel Agent before you go, and in the meantime, rip off the coupon. It can't hurt and it'll get you a better time in Europe than you ever thought possible.

Stunning lights, visuals enhance the appeal of Toronto Dance troupe

There is little enough modern dance available to local audiences and happily what the Toronto Dance Theatre has to offer is satisfying. The three artistic directors, Peter Randazzo, Patricia Beatty and David Earle, display a solid training in the finest tradition of their craft, and they have managed to train or attract a surprisingly large number of talented dancers. Finally, their original works are all uniformly pleasing to the eye and imaginative.

The first on Wednesday's program was Excerpts from the Baroque Suite, choreographed by David Earle and perhaps the strongest piece of the whole evening. Corelli's music, the symmetrical measured movements of the dancers and the formal patterning of the dance group all served to create a mood of clarity and measure. The theme of the duet, danced beautifully by Amelia Itush and Barry Smith, was elaborated and transformed by the group of dancers in the 'Lament' sequence.

The Last Act danced and choreographed by Peter Randazzo, was a radically different type of offering. Using comparatively elaborate props, Randazzo created a total character, a moving situation that seemed the fitting last act of any number of great dramas the viewer could conjure up. As a dancer, Randazzo had no difficulty in creating through that short piece the tragedy and madness of defeat for a proud and fearsome king. It was a really fine example of dance theatre...

Rhapsody in the Late Afternoon provided an opportunity for the development of more subtle psychological themes and situations. Choreographed and danced in part by Patricia Beatty, this work centers around the rather humorous enactment of relations between two aspects of one woman and the same man. The lighting and props served to maintain the mood of earnest levity.

Starscape enabled the audience to escape into a space-like fantasy of shimmering blue light and Stryx music. The choreography by Peter Randazzo was halting and tense as the space man, danced by David Earle, moved tenuous constrained by four silver life-support cables in the unearthly atmosphere.

Finally, last on the program and newest in the repertoire was Figure in the Pit, based on an idea from an Edgar Allan Poe short story. The visual effect was stunning. Lighting created the feeling that the dancers were moving within either physical or psychological depths. The group of female dancers, draped in shimmering silver costumes, moved with the inevitability and purpose of tormenting visions while the subject of their torment lay at their feet.

Each piece thus appeared unique and complete. Although individual criticisms can be made about this or that aspect of the particular works, there is a larger overall failing that must be pointed out. Perhaps the fact that five short pieces were presented is the root of the matter. The company and choreographers were never given an opportunity to develop the intricacies and wealth of material inherent in any one of the concepts utilized. No theme was thoroughly exploited and allowed to seek its natural end. The audience was not given the opportunity to become involved in any one setting before it was replaced by a new one.

Perhaps because of a desire to avoid melodrama, there was a lack of passion in the total program; an inability on the part of the dancers to create for the audience experiences that were more meaningful and memorable than an evening's entertainment.

Students' paintings for sale at Vic exhibit

The Victoria New Academic Building has some interesting things by students in the Fine Arts Department. The first work you see is an oil painting by Mary McLoughlin. It depicts a girl reaching up to a chair, but with a firmly coloured, tricky overlay of her lying or sitting, as if it were an overlay of a previous slide in a film strip. The perspective and body parts are in disarray purposely. I am reminded of the Cubists trying for two or more perspectives when in reality each perception is from a single vantage point, except here the perspectives are temporal. The head of the girl is strangely yet lovingly Botticellian. A very fine piece, and perhaps worth the high asking price. McLoughlin has some other interesting pieces here too, but none on such a large scale, nor worked to such perfection I would say.

Helle Viirlaid has an interesting lithograph entitled 'The Idiot' made up of criss-cross matchstick strokes becoming denser towards the centre of the bearded figure with Svengali eyes.

Mark Filipiuch's self-portrait is a self-flattering, straightforward piece, except that only three-quarters of his head is shown off to the right, with an off-white tracing of his glasses dominating the white left foreground: a cute trick.

Angelo Rao's collagraphs and etchings are well-crafted and one reminds me of microscope slides of tissue or perhaps particularly well-detailed oak bark. The raised burnt-brown contours are especially eye-appealing.

Diane Wait has some decorative flowing woodcuts, Bob Hare some suggestive and complexly shaded portraits and Chris Ralph has just one painting: 'Colour Progression', with three jagged fields of colour vertical across the canvas. Altogether, a fine show.

Euripides' Electra splendid

Monique Mercure as Electra, and Richard Monetta as Orestes in Euripides' Electra.

For its fourth production of the season, the Toronto Arts Foundation Theatre Company at the St. Lawrence Centre brings us Euripides' timeless classic Electra. They play is a challenge for audience and artists alike, for it demands a thorough comprehension of Greek drama. To complicate matters further, this play might well be considered representative of theatre in transition, for Euripides was not the traditionalist that his two famous predecessors, Aeschylus and Sophocles, were.

It was Euripides who began the long journey away from theatre as a primarily religious ritual remain apparent in the script of Electra. Unlike the earlier Greek tragedians, Euripides uses ritual as a frame upon which to hang his drama. It is the vehicle for the human drama that unfolds, and Euripides' characters are intensely human figures whose motivations come less from divine will than from their own earthly emotions. The formality of the dramatic ritual with its economy of language and its extreme issues of matricide and exorcism through blood sacrifice remain, but the characters move through a world that in today's language might best be described as Freudian. Even today, the psychological realism without the accompanying ritual would be totally lacking in the all important final release through catharsis, that legacy from the Greek theatre that still satisfies one of modern theatre-goers' strongest needs.

The drama deals with Electra's all-consuming jealousy of her mother's sexuality, which can find release only through Electra's matricidal scheme to avenge her father's murder. A challenging role for any actress, and one which is admirably handled by Monique Mercure, a veteran of Montreal's finest French-language theatres, and an actress whose name will undoubtedly soon become familiar to English audiences here.

Mercure's Electra is both high priestess of revenge and a deeply tormented human being. She moves gracefully from brief domestic quarrels with her peasant husband to highly charged scenes of frantic supplication to the gods. She is at once virgin princess and sexually frustrated woman, bereaved daughter and mastermind of multiple murder. It is Mercure's strong performance which pulls the production together; her fluid movement and fine vocal range make her powerful interpretation a chillingly cathartic tour de force.

Richard Monette effectively portrays Orestes, the brother whom Electra uses so cruelly in her passionate plot for revenge. Hardly deaf to the murmurings of his conscience, Orestes can find no consolation through retribution. Monette's low-key performance is appropriately touching; he elicits sympathy from the audience for the one truly tragic figure of the drama.

In the role of the doomed queen, Jennifer Phipps is less successful. Her cardboard character portrayal of Clytemnestra provides us with a bloodless villain who is all too easy for us to hate. It remains possible for us to condone Electra's bloody revenge for her father's murder; Clytemnestra's protest against the sacrifice of her daughter Iphigenia by her own husband remains unconvincing from the lips of one so totally devoid of maternal feeling. It is a regrettable choice of interpretation, for how much more neurotic Electra would appear, and how much more tragic her brother, if only their victim were a little more human in nature.

Director Kurt Reis has effectively used his chorus of Argive women to hold together this fast-moving and often frenetic drama. Using traditional chanting and dancing, the chorus provides an aesthetically pleasing backdrop against which the action of the drama unfolds. The chorus, as tradition demands, is not merely a crowd of extras, but a symbolic voice that functions as a mirror for Electra's mental conflicts.

Murray Lauffer's highly effective and functional set is reminiscent of the ancient amphitheatres which housed the first productions of these early plays. In front of Electra's primitive cave-like dwelling flickers the eternal flame at the sacrificial altar; a reminder of the ritualistic beginning of this, and indeed all, drama.

U of T's changing attitudes dissent becomes more assertive

By PAUL McGRATH

The 1940's, although an unquiet time in all other parts of the world, were fairly peaceful on the U of T campus. It's probably true that most students at the university were just thankful they weren't fighting, and remained silent about other things. The focus of student and newspaper attention was on the war in Europe and its effects. Some of the biggest problems of the university in the late forties were in accommodating several thousand veteran soldiers returning to school. They were an aggressive group who caused many grey hairs for the administration with their demands for proper treatment.

There appeared little need or opportunity for dissent, and some of the conflicts that arose were of another nature. In 1952, president Sidney Smith was forced to seize all copies of a Varsity gag issue that had reprinted one of his recent addresses on remedial English, substituting "sex" for "English" at every mention. Pirate issues of the paper were selling for one dollar a copy by evening.

The increasing ugliness of the Cold War had its effects on the students and in the early fifties the campus was beginning to recognize the threat to free discussion posed by the backlash against Communism.

The Varsity devoted three issues in 1953 to a discussion of civil liberties. It elicited little student response. The students, however, mysteriously arose the next week — after the paper decided to drop the sports page. One athletic editorial in 1953 and 1954. SAC moved in February, 1954 to elect their own choice as the next year's editor of The Varsity over the staff's candidate, forcing the staffers out on strike for one issue. SAC president John Stalker said, "Members of the staff of a paper will, I believe, work for any editor whose policies are sound and whose primary objective is to produce a paper worthy of the institution which it represents." The Varsity still had a long way to go, as SAC won that one easily and the next editor of Varsity shuffled along quite accommodatingly.

Nathan Phillips came to Hart House in 1955 and was embarrassed by a picture of a nude couple. He called it "objectionable", and it was removed from the wall for a short time. The Varsity the next day thanked the mayor "for proving beyond a reasonable shadow of doubt that four-star, triple-plate, gold-spangled, 19th century pompous bigotry is still firmly entrenched in Ontario". There was no rebuke from SAC for that specific remark; most on campus were upset over the intrusion of a civic official into university morals.

The Canadian University Press 1956 conference presented The Varsity with the unenviable position of 17th on their list of comparatively free student newspapers, noting that more student editors had been fired from it than from any other publication. Things were bleaker for the ones lower on the list. Many Canadian university papers were still submitting to teaching staff censorship on every article.

An interesting clash occurred that year between Governors, after the Board drew up new SAC's responsibilities. SAC hired a legal firm to their chances saying that "the Students' Adm. sense is subservient to the Board of Governors, its whims..." Claude Bissell resolved the matter announcing that the bylaw would not be in the SAC came away with a bit of a stronger foothold university.

The 1965-1966 school year saw increased anti-war. The voices were especially critical of destruction of North Vietnam by systematic bombing students went to Washington and Ottawa to governments. Varsity editorials were critical of the war effort.

Students also appeared at Queen's Park demanding accessibility to post-secondary education and a familiar.)

University College students, who were censored and demanded the resignation of college.

And, the Fugs were turned away from the peculiar appearance.

Universal accessibility to higher education SAC president Tom Faulkner led a demonstration protest the inequity of the Ontario Student Awards.

Staff members became vocal that year when prime minister Lester Pearson protesting the way the infrequent forays of staff members into the public level.

Such participation was to increase the next and leadership in the sit-in against napalm manufacturing Placement Centre. The sit-in, aimed at banning interviews with company representatives, brought and Skulemen throwing snowballs when the demand to carry their protest onto sacred Skulemen Building. student shouted agitatedly at a SAC meeting, "A couple of days ago The Varsity discussed civil liberties and now they're telling us what to do." The sports page returned shortly thereafter.

Not too much later, the Civil Liberties Club (in sheep's clothing) had a motion put before them to ban a certain number of Communists from their group. Club president Murray Chusid (a name you might know), stated: "We should make it clear that our purpose is to construct and not to subvert." The motion was defeated.

The February 20 Hart House debate probably best described the state of student opinion at the time. The resolution passed read "We fear militant Stalinism, but in destroying it we may destroy our right to criticism."

Things became more active in the following school year, when some Vic students burned in effigy Senator Joseph McCarthy (America's most beloved bigot at the time). They were reprimanded severely in three U.S. papers, one of them asking for a look into Canada. In fact, the next concerned editorial came from The Varsity over the visit to Canada of Senators McCarran and Jenner, both aides in the McCarthy battle and the former responsible for the McCarran Act (an immigration law with great potential for political manipulation).

A model of it was already considered by the Canadian Parliament, the infamous Bill 93 of Varsity editorials that year. They were indignant, especially about the visit. "Perhaps our own Immigration Department could do something more about detaining carriers of the big smear from getting their claws into Canada," said one editorial.

The most surprising incident that year came with the detention of two U of T students at a Florida border under the provisos of the McCarran Act. On their way back from Christmas break, they were told by the guards that they were "Communist sympathizers" and that their names were in a "Communist black book". To the rescue came then-MP Roland Michener and they were freed with an apology from the Americans, with no explanations of the odd behaviour of their border guards.

The Varsity, as evidenced in their continual conflict with governing bodies above them, has always had trouble meeting the standards imposed upon it by the authorities it represented. The history of the paper has been a slow but constant struggle not only for free speech, but for autonomy from the SAC, to whom it was usually answerable. SAC could not help but try to interfere in the policies of the paper it was funding, and The Varsity could not help but see this as a detrimental form of patronage.

Although the official break did not come until more recent times, the campaign to slowly remove the paper from SAC-influence was obvious in Russia's military intervention in Hungary in 1956 received a large amount of attention from U of T students. There were demonstrations of support for the students of Budapest and the students asked the university to receive, tuition-free, refugees from Hungary. On January 7, 1957, 128 students arrived here ready to take up studies, and they were warmly received by a sympathetic population.

SAC and The Varsity clashed briefly in February 1958 when a report of the Publications Commission of SAC suggested, as a better guide to future policy, a contract signed between SAC and the editor, with the goals and ideas of the paper firmly outlined.

"By answering these questions the applicant will be subject to a certain type of censorship before he begins," said one SAC representative.

Little more was heard until a headline later that month declared that editor Mike Cassidy had been fired, with Cassidy demanding that The Varsity be autonomous and complaining that the paper was being "muzzled." The matter was resolved the next day when the campus learned that it had been taken in by another Varsity gag issue, an annual event that usually caught people by surprise. This one had a slight twist to it. After The Varsity staff had sent a normal issue to the printers, a group of SAC people had gone to the printers and rewrote the front page and the editorial.

Although a quiet year at the U of T campus, 1958-59 was an unquiet year for other campuses.

A new movement was rising in Quebec and many student newspapers were running into trouble over editorial policy, especially the French-language newspapers in bilingual colleges. La Rotunde, the Francophone paper at the University of Ottawa, clashed with their student council and continued to do so at least twice a year into the sixties. Many editors later, the paper was still confirmed in separatist editorial policy, despite frequent intervention by the student council. Editors at Acadia University and the University of British Columbia also were fired that year.

Remarkable on the relative peace at the university that year, a late Varsity editorial read: "It no longer seems the worst of times for Canadian universities. Those great, dark forces of authority which haunt the minds of children and journalists, seem to be more aware of the problems facing students than we could hope possible."

They must have been asleep that year.

The year 1959-1960 bought the topic of racism on the campus to the forefront of attention. It was first mentioned early in the year when a black girl complained that she had been asked not to seek membership in one of the Faulkner resigned to run against Charlton in a by-election. The election, although it had a poor turnout, proved that more students felt Faulkner did speak for them. Faulkner was returned with an 800-vote majority.

Faulkner that year lent a strong voice to the student fight to see the implementation of the newly-released MacPherson Report, a report on curriculum in the Faculty of Arts and Sciences that had called for substantial changes in educational priorities. The university was offering what SAC called "tokenism" and the dissatisfaction built into the next year as the faculty continued to drag their feet on implementing reports they had asked for.

After B7 years of official dependency, the Varsity officially cut its strings with outside influence when SAC accepted a motion that would place a Varsity Board of Directors in control of the paper. This certainly would never have been granted by many previous SAC executives, but increased activism on the part of both SAC and the paper had probably brought the two bodies closer together out of their mutual, distant suspicion of each other than had been tradition.

SAC had backed The Varsity earlier that year when the paper was verbally reprimanded by Caput over the reprinting of an article that had started a fight between the McGill Daily editors and their administration. The article's author was Paul Krassner — resident tasteless wonder at the Realist — who said it was the suppressed chapters of William Manchester's book, The Death of a President, in which Lyndon Johnson commits some fairly bizarre acts upon the body of the dead president.

"The Caput wishes to express in strongest possible terms its disgust and revulsion at the article," Caput announced. They referred the matter to SAC who backed up The Varsity, saying that the article was necessary to understand the situation at McGill.

The next year's SAC, under Steve Langdon, continued the tradition of its predecessor, making public statements on the Vietnam War. A Vietnam rally 10 days later finished with 34 arrested after scrimmages between the lefties and U of T's own Edmund Burke Society were broken up by the beloved police horses. Allam Lampont, long a vanguard of City Council intellegensia, called them "troublemakers, bums, and anarchists".

The move for parity and curriculum restructuring gained a lot of headway that year. Course unions and staff-student committees were more numerous, acting on a small scale to implement the MacPherson Report. Student members were elected to the Committee on University Government, set up by Bissell to look into restructuring the government of the university and assist in the making of the new University of Toronto Act.

Provincial government leaders threatened to take university discipline into their own hands early in 1969. Bill Davis, looking to Quebec where students at Sir George Williams University had destroyed a computer, announced in March that he would call in city police to deal with any disturbance in Ontario universities.

This attitude was repeated early in the 1969-1970 school year in a report from the Committee of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario, of which Bissell was an active member. The report recommended that demonstrations be dealt with by "counter-violence" and gave the city police the right to enter the campus "on their own initiative" at any sign of danger "to life or property." The report was extremely vague in its differentiations between "legitimate dissent" and "illegitimate disturbances".

At this time, U of T's New Left Caucus was busy and tense meetings were taking place between freshmen administration and leftists as the NLC disrupted orientation proceedings in different parts of the campus in the first concerted attempt to politicize the freshmen. The administration and faculty were shocked at these disruptions of what was a normally quiet, sacred tradition of orientation proceedings, and Bissell announced shortly thereafter that "the disruption of any lecture, class, seminar or meeting sponsored by the university or any division of the university is a serious offense!"

The NLC continued, later in the year, to disrupt political science classes and met some opposition from students who at one point forcefully ejected them from a classroom.

Greg Kealey and Bob Barkwell, two student members of the Interim Disciplinary Committee instituted as a replacement for Caput until the release of the Campbell Report, resigned when Bissell refused to retract the COPUO report he had signed. Students converged for a meeting the next day and SAC demanded that Bissell disassociate himself from COPUO and release the Campbell Report on discipline as soon as he received it. Bissell appeared at a Convocation Hall student meeting smiling and saying the Campbell report "was the document on which the university should make its decisions on campus discipline". The Campbell Report, recommending a staff-student committee as an integral part of Caput, was released shortly.

The Commission on University Government reported back to the president in October, recommending restructuring of the university government to include student parity, and throwing official backing to a heated issue that most levels of university government could not accept.

The fight for parity — presently lost on most of the campus — became the most popular rallying issue of the year. Arts and Sciences students continually disrupted faculty council meetings, and faculty members promised the first of a long series of committee meetings that dragged down quite quickly. The students watched the administration drag their feet, decided to hold a parity festival at Sid Smith and called for a strike referendum that failed by a slim margin even though some students boycotted classes and occupied the faculty offices. The conservative side of the faculty, marshalled behind Jim Conacher and Bill Nelson, valiantly controlled the situation with vague promises of the ultimate committee. At one point in March, the faculty had to go underground for a meeting, but students managed to force their way past a locked door guarded by campus cops.

The War Measures Act, instituted after the kidnappings by the Front de Libération du Québec brought a moderate amount of response on the campus. Some students and staff were sufficiently disturbed by arrests and military government in Quebec to speak out and attend rallies although more preferred to think that what was happening 300 miles away was not their concern. The Varsity was censored three times at the printers when it attempted to print FLQ manifestos that had already appeared in newspapers across Canada. In March, one of the few demonstrations resulting from Trudeau's Quebec policies ended in hand-to-hand combat with Toronto police. Thirteen were arrested and five police were sent to hospital after demonstrators started to throw sandwiches and vegetables at the milk-coats entering the Royal York Hotel to attend a Trudeau fund-raising dinner.

The women's movement, mobilizing on campus after a few quiet years out of the public limelight, presented a brief to Bissell that year asking for a revision of the inequitable abortion laws in Canada. Yet, it was not until a year later that the university went as far as admitting women as members of Hart House.

SAC started the 1971-1972 school year with a demand that acting president John Sword resign, as a result of Sword's calling in of police that summer to clear out Wacheea, the tent city that had occupied university territory.

Arts and Sciences organizers moved quickly in September to work up a slate of students that would run for the student on the faculty council on the condition that they would resign if not granted parity. The plan didn't manage to gain enough strength and students were put on another committee that broke up quite quickly. Faculty strategy, conscious or unconscious, was becoming quite efficient.

The Varsity had a short look at older days again in January of 1972 when a motion came before SAC to abolish the Varsity Board of Directors and once more bring the paper under SAC's wing. Feeling the situation to be a little too touchy, SAC rejected the motion.

The day-care movement was running into increasing difficulty with the administration that year. Having been moved out of their house on Willocks Avenue, they found the university would not pay the $2,000 necessary for improvements on their new quarters. Demonstrations with the Day Care Marching Band, entirely composed of under-fours, took place in front of Simcoe Hall. The refusal of the administration to provide adequate day care facilities for over twos led the parents and children to establish the new Devonshire Campus Community Day Care Center (for-over twos) in the building they are still occupying.

Two months after John Evans was chosen as new president of the university, students started to mobilize on the issue of access to the new Roberts Library. A Library Council meeting in February was well-attended by students, who listened to the council's "no" on undergraduate and public admission. An all-night stacks party brought a further "no" from the council. The students, after a final "nyet" from the Senate, occupied the Senate Chambers. For the second time in nine months, John Sword called the police on campus, and the appeals are still being heard in court.

Who knows what the outcome of the math sit-in will be? The threat of police intervention doesn't seem likely and the negotiations drag day by day. The outcome will influence much of the activism in the future and can only lead to a more unified fight for the goal of student-staff decision-making on an equal basis.

A look at the history of student dissent on the campus provides a glimpse of many interrelated and unrelated issues. Reaction over the years has run in a peculiar ebb-flow pattern of interest and non-interest. Issues like the Vietnam war, parity and course revision have been some of the very few that have managed to last over a summer. Yet neither the parity nor the library problems have been solved with any degree of satisfaction, shoved away in a committee somewhere along with day care policy.

The administration somehow manages to keep the lid on the pot, smugly knowing they have the last say, and at this time nobody except the math demonstrators seems to want to prove them wrong.

Stokowski's great (but not that great) career

Leopold Stokowski is famous and he has his golden discs to prove it.

He will always be able to sign his name and have it instantly recognized (and not least because of his glitzy Hollywood days when he acted — distantly — and conducted scores for Walt Disney.) But perhaps no critic who knows his alphabet from a to z, that is from Richard Strauss to Pierre Boulez, would choose Stokowski as one of this century's best conductors. His cumulative achievement, granted, is great, and yet not even at his best are we ever reminded of Bruno Walter, Furtwangler or Toscanini, for these are the greats with whom a conductor of so much renown must be compared.

The career of Stokowski has successfully seen him rule the podiums of these orchestras: The Cincinnati Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the NBC Symphony, the Hollywood Bowl, the New York Philharmonic, the Houston Symphony and the American Symphony which he founded in 1961. Lately he has conducted the London Symphony with which he has done a number of his hundreds of LP recordings. He has consistently been a champion of new music and recently revealed he uses most of his free time to study new scores.

So Stokowski isn't exactly merely nearly-successful but again, you sometimes suspect that because he has been so brash (and for such a long time) and so massively, almost gratuitously, productive, the musical world was forced finally to turn around and face him, saying rather less endearingly than he could want, "yes, Leopold, yes". I know Stokowski was praised from his debut in 1909 (so this characterization may seem inaccurate) but never so widely it seems, until after he had turned himself into his own advertising manager. One does not ignore the vast number of accolades our conductor thus garnered, but the acknowledgement of them seems legitimately to be a grudging one — like that of the mountainous approval of young people for Sesame Street or Captain Terific. I acknowledge, after all, that he is now famous, well-liked and endlessly energetic, but with something less than enthusiasm.

I know too that to venture this close to a critical war really requires that a large battery of his recordings be marshalled for the offense, but I will have to rely on my memory of his past style and several recent auditions of a new release. It is a live performance at Royal Festival Hall in London, and is notable because its program is a duplicate of Stokowski's first concert with the London Symphony Orchestra sixty years ago. The works were and are: Brahms' First Symphony, Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger, Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun, Glazunov's A-minor violin concerto and as an encore, Tchaikovsky's Marche Slave.

The first work, Brahms' First, is about the best thing Stokowski could do, and never had, it seems. He plays the couplets in a clipped and martial fashion by comparison. Von Karajan may ask for legato when he shouldn't but the result is so ravishing and monumental that it is difficult to believe he is doing anything less than the greatest possible service to the composer. For example, the first G Major sforzando in the exordium is such a colossal and extreme burst of sound that this one note, like so many others, seems invested with the periodic elegance of the whole melodic sequence which precedes it. Stokowski's sforzando, on the other hand, is foreshortened, conventional, indifferent.

Let there be no mistaking, Stokowski conducts Brahms adequately. But not as well as he and some people think. Lesser lights such as Bernstein and Lorin Maazel actually conduct this type of music with more power and passion, not to mention Von Karajan and Klemperer. People are finally coming around to admitting that Toscanini treated Brahms with all the Italian fervour and sprezzatura from which Rossini's music so benefited — and that what is good for an Il Barbiere duet will not do for a German passacaglia. I am wondering how long it will take us to make a similar judgement about Stokowski's conducting.

But all is not lost, because the rest of the symphony and of the concert fares better. The andante is refined and undistinguished. The third movement is set at a clipped pace, with some rare firm emphases. The contrapuntal section leading into the fourth movement's climax is powerful and lucid, although the whole movement seems to receive a somewhat unorganic and indifferent treatment.

The best-played piece on the two-record set is Tchaikovsky's Marche Slave. The jaunty rip of the first string notes is absent from most other recordings of this piece and it is obviously Stokowski's music. The central flute-topped sections are played with the most thrilling and debonaire slavic flair imaginable.

The Prelude to Die Meistersinger receives an elegant reading, for Stokowski is always in command; but as so often with this conductor (and a decade ago less often with this orchestra) the string tone is a bit too high-pitched and screechy. The boisterous finale is lucid, big and well balanced.

The Glazunov A-minor piano concerto begins in a tragically lyrical vein and is genuinely beautiful. Stokowski conducts a straight-forward, graceful reading with fine pianism by Silvia Marcovici.

Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun is played with an elegant string tone — the London players can do it when they want — with perhaps not enough dynamic shading. What always surprises listeners about Toscanini is the huge conception and diamond cutter's precision applied to Dsbussy's music under his baton.

Perhaps this is another reason why Stokowski can't make the big league on the strength of his conducting alone: great conductors like Toscanini and Von Karajan raise the interpretations of the music within their respective national traditions to a kind of apotheosis, and then startle us by stepping outside those traditions and doing something wholly unprecedented but equally successful in these foreign regions. Von Karajan recently did this with Verdi's Requiem, into which he reads an immense profundity.

Stokowski, it seems, has no tradition to raise to a peak or outside of which to step and bring light. He goes, as most average — yet good — conductors must, from one adopted composer to another, treating each with difference, sometimes eagerness, but rarely with an insight which will profoundly illuminate his relationship with them.

Even the achievement at Philadelphia, shaping the orchestra into one of the most respected in the world, is an unrepeatable one, whereas Von Karajan and Klemperer swept Europe raising mediocre orchestras to virtuoso status.

Perhaps our very inclination to pit Stokowski against the very best is an indication of his superiority. I would say it is, but not of his supremacy. As this London recording demonstrates for perhaps the 150th recorded time, his achievement is a cumulative one; individual performances do not rate superlatives. The self-advertising (and it is implicit even in the packaging of this set) always seems to say more than we can believe about the workmanship of this musical retailer's individual products.

have conducted to demonstrate his tepid Mediterranean approach to Teutonic Romantic grandeur. Tempos are unexpectedly leisurely, string tone is highly vibrato a la Hollywood Bowl. Inevitably the brass becomes intrusive. Climaxes have their peaks sliced off, cantabile sections submerge and fail to re-surface. Phrasing is rigid and Haydn-esque. All this in the first movement, the most important movement of the work — one of the most important in the symphonic literature.

climax is supposed to be black, catastrophic; Stokowski plays it with almost grazioso affection.

Following the climax are those marvellously lush legato couplets, A/B, F/A-flat, and four bars later O/E, B-flat/O-flat. Only the first note of each is dotted and admittedly, Von Karajan almost draws out the second note too. But the methodical baroque grandeur of his orchestra's playing transforms the couplets into a Gothic arch of sound which Stokowski has no

Steelyard, Payday show cocky appeal of B-movies

King Vidor was at the Science Centre this fall for the opening of a festival of his films. His active career spanned the full history of Hollywood, from the silents to the late sixties. After the screening of his silent movie The Crowd (not a good movie, just old) he took a bow and said, "It's strange to see these pictures turning up again at revivals and festivals, because when we made them, we made them for a three week run. When we finished, and it never took us terribly long to make a picture, we went on to the next one, which would also have a three week run. We never expected them to be seen after that."

Vidor was candid like that for a half-hour or so, but it was that first remark that stayed with me. Times have changed, at least peripherally. The movie palaces where The Crowd was shown for three weeks have been torn down or converted to five or six small auditoriums, and any movie that aims to attract an audience for reasons that go beyond its subject matter, aims for a long run in one of these small houses. If directors are not claiming art as their concern, they are at least after a hit. It makes for spectacular successes and embarrassing, pretentious failures. But it leaves very little cream to sweeten the hundreds of lesser, Crowd-type movies still being churned out. B movies have become the province for giving up rather than catching hold.

Steelyard Blues and Payday, at the Uptown 1 and 2, are what B-movies should be like. They each have enough holes to sink a heavier vehicle, but the film crews in each case bail it out by the obvious care they put into the low-budget projects. They may not be poetry, but there is concern in the tone. The rough edges and bad seams are covered by the overall intelligence.

Of the two films, Steelyard Blues was less of a risk financially — the presence of Jane Fonda and Donald Sutherland guaranteed distribution and attention — but more of a gamble aesthetically. It's a comedy, and comedies contain their own version of the talent show applause metre: you draw laughs or you flop, no way around it. For the first while I figured it was touch and go, but then we started to laugh and, if we had more time than we needed to catch our breath, we still laughed more often than at any film since The Candidate. (The Candidate was another good B movie, only one with an A movie's budget. Steelyard Blues is a B movie with a B movie budget.)

Hanging out at a wrecker's yard is a gang of petty criminals who prefer to see themselves as outlaws. (That distinction is a good example of the film's particular intelligence.) One of their number, Veldini, a demolition driver and second-story man (Donald Sutherland) is hounded by the law, represented by his older brother, a district attorney with his eye on the attorney-generalship. Veldini, his hooker love Iris (Jane Fonda), an insane ex-human fly (Peter Boyle) and other cronies conspire to steal parts from a navy air hangar to render operative a vintage World War II cargo plane back at the junkyard. The plane will take them away — someplace, they hope, with no jails.

Although you don't realize it for a while, and that's a fault, the film is in essence a big heist picture, only with a working-class, Bowery Boys bias replacing the usual aristocratic, Frank Sinatra one. Outlawry too has its right and left-wings. (Steelyard Blues is clearly a subversive movie, and while it suffers the fault of the genre and occasionally goes didactic — "You know, Veldini, there ain't no place without jails" — it generally manages to stay discreetly indirect. Anyway, I like subversive movies.)

Failure is never far out of frame with Steelyard Blues and while it would be easy to dwell on the flaws. I don't want to. Steelyard has the amiable quality of friends' music; you don't want to be too harsh. Anyway, the worst of it is that the movie has enough reality, enough vision, that one wants to demand it more consistently: if Iris is going to go for Veldini with approach-avoidance, then let there be more time and dialogue spent on it. Still, that the lovers do other than moon, squall and be noble for one another is a blessing rarely enough received in movie-houses. Sketchy as she is, Irish makes a touch more sense than Tillie, in Pete 'n' Tillie, although I much preferred Burnett's performance. Jane Fonda's diction is too distinct and constant to play two whores in a row.

Sutherland's performance on the other hand is a gem from start to finish. Prior to this I never knew whether or not he could act: he always did great in easy roles. (So did Elliott Gould, to make clearer my hesitancy to judge.)

This time, however, Sutherland not only works in a dicey vehicle, but he draws out every bit of difficulty in his character. His Veldini is fun-loving but also angry, even hateful. He's uncowed, but he's aging, being defeated and he knows it. Sutherland gets it all across and, surprising, given his previous work, by expression. Veldini is a character of great joy and great anger, not one or the other. His motivation is complex, but not confused or confusing. Sutherland's is, I think, the best performance I've seen in some time, although I doubt that it will be widely credited because, like Irish, the character is sketchy.

David Ward's script and the general continuity are spotty, although with some fine spots: "Come with us", argues Veldini wooing Iris, "if you stay here you go to jail for six months". "They might let me off," she says. "If you say 'might', they still got you" Veldini shoots back.)

When it's good, Steelyard is like the Mike Bloomfield — Paul Butterfield score: the sloppiness is part of the fun. When it's not so good it is like the photography (credited to Laszlo Kovacs and Steven Lerner). Aural reminders of cheapness seem appropriate, visual ones too much.

Payday too has a mushiness in its colour photography that, while appropriate, I can't turn around into being pleasing. This is a story about a mean country-and-western-singer and his sleazy life on the road, shot in sleazy colour. Actually, sleazy is too strong a word and it is Payday's strength that is not so unremittingly kitchen-sink as Martin Knelman's review made me think it would be. (Knelman generally seems to see things nastier than they are. Cheer up, Martin.) It is the after-hours jam session of buck-dancing music, a totally uncynical act, that makes the cynical business plausible, it is the manager's real smile that gives his phony one credence; it is the new groupie's sheer sexual joy at getting pumped by the star in the back seat of his Cadillac (while the chauffeur watches smiling at the rear-view mirror) — it is all the suggestions that people do the slimy things for some kind of unsimly pleasure, that lets Payday work.

There is, of course, no shortage of sleaze, including a totally gratuitous manslaughter. In fact the whole plot is gratuitous. As with Klute, the story (concocted in the hope of reaching a broader public?) is far outshone by the documentary on its periphery.

Daryl Duke, a director who served out his apprenticeship at CBC and CTV in Toronto, and writer Don Carpenter are well able to keep several meanings in the air at once. The film is at its best in a conversation between an influential disc-jockey in a back-water town and the star. Each is cynically expert, and each recognizes that the other is too. They fence while, somewhere, Harold Pinter looks on and nods. The next best footage is of the chauffeur and the groupie discussing omelettes. And so on. (As often as not scenes are allowed to run on too long, but that is a minor sin.)

Rip Torn, as the singer, doesn't act much, coasting most of the time on thinly suppressed anger, but he does have a beautifully anonymous face. His character's battle for recognition is lost physiologically. A nice touch.

Payday and Steelyard Blues both brought to mind Mailer's explanation of the real battle of live theatre, the one between the actor and the audience, with the actor's ego on the line. Quite separate from the quality of the script, it is this nightly skirmish that makes the excitement. (In fact, the better the script, or at least the better known, the less the actor has to watch himself, the less he has to put out — and, usually, the less immediate, the less exciting the performance.) There is a cockiness in standing up and demanding the attention of strangers for Heaven knows what.

The same cockiness is inherent in movies, though it is dispersed among the full company, none of whom are there to take bows or vegetables at the curtain. It is that cockiness that shines through Steelyard and Payday and carries them farther than they ought to go (Pete 'n' Tillie struck me as not as good as it should have been, Steelyard and Payday as better than they should have been.) Perhaps the promise of these movies would be more easily felt were they plays. At any rate they could play at workshop prices and not be thrown into automatic competition with films like The Emigrants or Chloe in the Afternoon. The movie industry is not the fairest.

"Looking Our Way": August 1911. The Laurier government fell when it advocated reciprocity with the United States.

National question unanswered

"The Twentieth century belongs to Canada", is a cliché that has been passed down to us as defining the prevailing spirit of optimism in Canada at the turn of the century. In historical retrospect, however, at least a turn in that phrase might seem warranted. For it is in the beginnings of the twentieth century that one can loosely say that Canada began to belong to the United States.

The processes involved in this were viewed by contemporaries essentially in the categories of moral witness rather than sociology or political economy. Opponents waxed hysterical about high divorce rates and race riots in Babylon to the south. Proponents basked in the evangelism of inevitability. Thus, the original title of Moffett's book, in keeping with the spirit of progressive expansionism that marked it, was The Emancipation of Canada.

Moffett, an American journalist of considerable sophistication, attempted to deal with the processes working toward continental integration. Canadian patterns of demography, political practice, governmental machinery, anti-aristocratic social norms, communications, trade relations, institutions and popular culture were breaking the "silken tie" with the British Empire and assimilating Canada into a common North American mould. At one time it was true to say that Canadians "preferred to remain under the English King three thousand miles away rather than to join their English neighbours with whom they had been colliding in reciprocal scalping expeditions for a hundred years." By 1907, "the conclusion to which all the converging lines of evidence unmistakably point is that the Americans and the English-speaking Canadians have been welded into one people. . . . The English-speaking Canadians protest that they will never become Americans — they are already Americans without knowing it."

Moffett's editor in this reprinted edition, Allan Smith, likewise protests that Canadians were not becoming Americans and challenges Moffett's astigmatism which prevented him from seeing "that whatever might be happening to its economy, its railways, or its divorce rate, there remained in Canada the sense of an historical experience more than marginally different from the American, which fed and sustained a reservoir of national feeling the measure of whose depth he had not taken." But what Smith is really protesting is the categories and methodology Moffett used. As a Canadian historian, Smith is trained in an idealist methodology which focusses on sentiment.

In fact, a more reasonable critique of Moffett would not direct itself to his failure to deal with unmeasurable sentiments and commitments. Moffett's real shortcoming is his failure to look beneath the patterns of communication and social demography to see what was going on in the mines and resources industries that were already coming under the domination of American capital. Interestingly enough, capital investment ranks along with divorce rates and sports in his chapter on "miscellaneous factors."

In fact his analysis is based on socio-cultural "sidelights" and vignettes (as he states in his preface) and not on the feature of political economy that underlay the process that was going on.

Likewise, in explaining Canada's relative economic and political integrity at this time, one is best to look not to sentiments but to the National Policy strategy which continued to dominate the formulation of government economic policy. This in turn rested on the allegiance of dominant sections of the business community to an East-West internal economy and a balanced European-American directed export economy. Canadian businessmen may not have been looking for American scalps. But they were not about to willingly relinquish their wampum.

After World War I, an event which tied Canada to America's purse strings economically (see the excellent article by Duff and Granatstein in the latest Queens' Quarterly) and ideologically, intellectuals were discussing more and more freely the concept of Canada as an American nation. There were a few lingering loyalists who ran the gamut of one-night rhetorical stands and there were even artists who portrayed rocks, trees and streams, but when J.S. Woodsworth, Labour's representative in Parliament, fretted to the House in 1927 about the American takeover of the economy, he struck no chord in the left, let alone in the business community. While economists like Innis worried about Canada's transition from colony to nation to colony, the dominant teleology was more concerned with identifying a common muse which held the continent together. The Muse was not the one they expected, however, not population or political traditions — but the multinational corporation.

When Rip Van Winkle woke up in the late 1960's he was not an encrusted languid man of dozing but distinguished beard but a cheeky, toothy and unkempt militant. He swept aside the centennial reader — Peter Russell's Nationalism in Canada, an anthology that displayed all the ambivalence, equivocation and ambiguity of the tugboat set that is the Canadian intelligentsia. He stridently issued his call to close the 49th Parallel. This year's version of Russell to Lumsden to You is Gary Teeple's Capitalism and the National Question in Canada, an anthology based on the belief that it is "only through the use of Marxist theory and practice that a way can be found for Canada to escape from imperialist exploitation and to shape an egalitarian socialist future for the whole country."

The book makes no pretension to represent broad left or nationalist thinking, although a glance from Lipton's paranoid, irrational and parochial attack on international unions to the cool steady appraisal of class in the twentieth century by Johnson reveals at least a breadth of intelligence. The books tour de force, though a tendentious and flippant one, is Naylor's "Rise and Fall of the Third Commercial Empire of the St. Lawrence", the axis of its case for a marxian national liberation movement. Its significance relative to Canadian nationalist intellectual traditions is its imposition of marxian categories on a Chreightonesque morality play.

Naylor's essay is an attempt to point to the peculiarities of the Canadian capitalist class that led to integration with American capitalism. In doing so, he relies heavily on the staples framework of Canadian history, first elaborated by Harold Innis. This approach is itself somewhat suspect from a marxist viewpoint since it tends to confuse identification of high growth areas with political economy and the structure of power. In this, it is somewhat of a historiographical parallel to the Turner frontier thesis in the United States, which turned historical attention away from the more dynamic east. At its most misleading, the Innis approach has directed attention of students to "the era of the wheat staple" at the turn of the century. This has resulted in the neglect of major processes such as urbanization and the growth of corporate power, which in historical hindsight emerge as the most profound processes of these times. In this respect, one could say that Innis is Canadian political economy's version of the Group of Seven, taking our sights away from city streets to the dynamics of the rocky, rugged north. Certainly it is not an interpretation which generates the most fruitful understanding of the development of social class.

Naylor proceeds from this framework to interpret the process of growth in the Canadian economy in terms of the domination of merchant over industrial capital. He highlights the dominance of this class, basing its wealth on trade rather than production, oblivious to national loyalties in defining buyers or sellers, as the dynamic agent of continental colonialism. To summarize from the more simplified version of Gary Teeple: "The central fact of the Canadian ruling class before and after Confederation, was and is, its foundation in mercantile capital. This form of capital is accumulated in the process of circulation of goods; that is, money is made by buying and selling articles (raw materials or manufactured goods) — not by producing the article, this latter process being the basis of industrial capital. It is this central characteristic of the Canadian ruling class which explains why, even to the present time, Canada has not become the industrial nation with a large population that it might have been. The point is, as Marx argued, that "wherever merchant's capital still predominates we find backward conditions." This distortion from the classic structure of a capitalist ruling class is cause and result of Canada's colonial position.

Since the distinction between merchant and industrial capital is so crucial to their analysis and conclusions, it is worthwhile placing it in the context of classic marxist writings on the topic. For Marx, the distinction was central to the difference between money (a device of circulation) and capital (a social relationship) and underlay his analytical assessment of the unique mode of creating wealth in industrial capitalism — the extraction of profit, via the robbery of surplus value from labour. Merchant capital only uses "a capitalist's method of exploitation without its mode of production." (That is to say, a merchant buys bread from a peasant to sell to a townsman. An industrialist buys flour to produce bread and makes his essential profit from the profit of production and exploitation of the work force rather than circulation.)

Marx makes this differentiation not only in isolating the specific features of capitalism. He also uses it in his macro-analysis of history and his micro-analysis of society. In his analysis of the transition from feudalism to capitalism, he declared the merchant capitalist an obstacle to industrial development. Far from revolutionizing the mode of production, they fed on the backwardness that isolated individual buyers and sellers. They had no interest in rationalizing the overall economic or productive processes of society. Thus it came to pass that industrial capital had to subordinate commerce to its ends. "That system was a strange god who had mounted the altar cheek by jowl with the old gods of Europe, and who, one fine day, with a shove and a kick, swept them all into the dustbin. This new god proclaimed the making of surplus value to be the sole end and aim of mankind." Finally, Marx made use of the distinction in his analysis of the functional components of the capitalist class and even commented on their somewhat distinct interests. Here again, he had a special word for merchant capital; "the lumpenproletariat of the bourgeoisie."

Maurice Dobb, in his classic Studies in the Development of Capitalism also assigns a central role to the analytical distinction between merchant and industrial capital. Eager to stress that capitalism is qualitatively different from feudalism, he argued against the concept that capitalism arose in the disequilibrium fostered by the corrosive agent money in feudal society. "But other instruments of accumulation than a mere snowball-tendency had to intervene before this capital became dominant and ubiquitous as it was to be in later centuries" he wrote. Industrial capitalism was largely the creation of new classes, not the extension of old ones. Certainly the distinction has relevance for Canadian history. It helps us understand the nature of an early economy based on the sale of furs to Europe. Here we have a classic merchant bourgeoisie robbing its products from Indians, opposed to the development of a rounded economy and indifferent to modernization, in particular modern transportation systems.

The distinction is also useful in comprehending the growth of the Canadian bourgeoisie. Marx posited two basic models. One, "the really revolutionary way" was for producers to supplant merchants, on their way to becoming capitalists. The transition can also take place in a more conservative fashion, "serving historically as a mode of transition" whereby merchants "take possession directly of production." The latter may be more suggestive for Canada where a process took place from the 1830's on of the penetration of merchant capital into production. This was the way of the Molsons, the Redpaths and many others. (While the instance of "the really revolutionary road" are less spectacular, save in the case of the agricultural implement industry, this process did take place, though not to the same degree as many other countries.) In other words commercial capital was not so much preempted as transformed. In this way a close relation (rather than antithesis) of commercial and industrial capital can be explained, along with its decidedly conservative social and political ramifications. What in America came to birth in Radical Republicanism came to birth in Canada in Confederation and the National Policy, the still-birth of an uninspiring class. (In a review such as this, it is not possible to get into a war of counterquotes and citations. Recent U of T PhD's in the history of Montreal and Toronto for this period are good starters).

"A British subject I was born and a British subject I will die," said John A. Macdonald, architect of the National Policy. Shortly thereafter, he did die and was buried in an American-made coffin.

To proceed from these aspects to Naylor's mechanical application of a sophisticated Marxist distinction is however incorrect. Incidentally, it also runs counter to Innis' call for a model of Canadian economic growth not directly transplanted from Europe. For Naylor, the distinction between merchant and industrial capital is arbitrary rather than crucial. Railways are defined as an outgrowth of commercial capital, despite the fact that transportation is frequently dealt with as part of production costs by Marxists, and despite the fact that numerous ancillary industries are created, despite the fact that transportation improvements revolutionized Canadian social and economic life. All this is a bit unlike the role assigned to commercial capital by Marx. Perhaps Naylor is confusing commerce with commercial capital.

Furthermore, Naylor is factually incorrect in asserting that industrial capitalism was not elaborated in the visions of Confederation or the National Policy. One has only to read George Brown at Charlottetown or John A. in the National Policy debate. Finally, the facts are that it was industrialists who carried the fight in the Hamilton, Toronto, and Montreal Boards of Trade for a protective tariff, despite the fact that certain industries opposed tariffs on the grounds that it would raise their input costs (ie coal). But this was an intra-industrial estrangement, not one between commerce and industrial capital. The tariff was certainly not the creation of commerce capital, not in its design or its instrumentality.

Naylor's error magnifies as we enter the twentieth century. Here he treats finance capital as a species of commercial capital. Suffice it to say, that this would set Lenin twirling around in his glass cage and that it flies in the face of all previous marxist writing. Lenin's classic Imperialism saw finance capital as an outgrowth of industrial, not a hold over from merchant capital.

The error of Naylor is simple. He confuses functional differentiations within the capitalist class with sociological differences between different species of ruling classes. Thus anyone connected to the function of circulation is derivative from commerce capital. Carrying that logic to its logical conclusion, all capital is commercial since the transaction is not completed until the sale takes place. Marx after all only talked of commerce being subordinated, not eliminated.

But then, Naylor is not borrowing his categories from Marx but from Adam Smith and Madison, who hold to a functional definition of class and capital. Or, if we wish to impute more home-grown origins, it has more in common with populist agrarian hatred for the merchant than a marxian critique of a system.

The argument here is of course more than a technical one. Naylor is interested in proving that the relation between American and Canadian capitalism has distorted the social structure of capitalism in Canada. Viewing Canadian manufacturers as a repressed class opens the door to a national liberation movement in an advanced capitalist country. Its tendency is only hinted at in a recent meeting of the St. Andrews-St. Patrick NDP riding association, a Waffle dominated riding, when Waffle advocates opposed a motion for 30 hours work for 40 hours pay on the grounds that it would harm Canadian manufacturers.

At any rate, if one wishes to pick one's history to fit one's politics, a stronger case for socialism can be made through an argument of the interpenetration, mainly one way, of any and all forms of American and Canadian capital, in all its diverse functions. Tariff proponents were aware of this when they recognized that the tariff would draw in American branch plants. But they had no alternative, save to stagger under the blows of American manufacturers creating for huge markets and "dumping" their leftovers in Canada at wholesale prices. Canadian capitalist options were never wider than coexisting with American capital in Canada or in North America.

Interestingly enough, when we come to a real case for an analysis of capitalism and the national question — Quebec — it is sadly neglected. Two essays in the anthology deal with the relation of ethnicity and class in Quebec. Prior, and more important questions, are not dealt with. There is no discussion of Quebec as an oppressed nation. There are a whole variety of questions here that are not even asked. Is Quebec oppressed as a nation? If so, by what mechanisms? Is its social structure distorted? Will cultural questions merge with class questions, as for instance in the language question? How do you account for the heightened combativity of the Quebecois working class? The failure of the anthology to address itself to these questions is a political-intellectual scandal of the highest order.

As a compendium on strategy, the anthology is also less than adequate. The analysis of the labour movement borrows from the stalest 'American' institutional approach to labour history, an approach which even American historians are rejecting. All comprehension of the norms, modes, oppression and socio-historical processes affecting working people are subordinated to the question of American 'international' unions. Unions are urged to take up the cudgels of the national-democratic revolution and overthrow their American bureaucratic leaders. Are Canadian workers then to renounce faith in American workers? Are they to renounce the traditions of internationalism, firmly rooted in the realities of corporate power in North America? Or has a possible tactic been confused with a strategy?

The last two essays of the book break from Canadian tradition and end with a bang not a whimper. The NDP, it is said, is like its predecessors in the CCF and presumably Social Credit, is a wart on the socialist vision. Now, the NDP has its problems as any activist can testify. The argument can easily be made that it is historically opposed to the struggle for socialism. But it is another argument again to deny its role as a reflection of the traditions, illusions, and, yes, home-grown labour and party bureaucrats, of the labour movement. The argument that socialists should not support the NDP because it is merely a state capitalist party is a formalistic argument, one based on reductionist rather than dialectical logic. Dialectics allows us, in a very unilateral way "to see two sides to every story." It is every bit as important for socialists to see that independent labour politics, under whatever banners, provides a school for working people to learn the ground rules of socialist politics and to test their leaderships in politics. For socialists to eliminate themselves from this process in the absence of any other significant radical current in the labour movement can only lead to self-righteous loneliness.

As an anthology, then, this book falls short of its possibilities. If instead it is viewed as an opening shot in the battle for sensitivity to peculiar Canadian problems, it could still earn a place as having some worth. If we must end charitably, that is the only way it can be salvaged. Samuel E. Moffet, The Americanization of Canada, U of T Press, $3.50

Stage Two, the upstairs of the Firehall Theatre has two plays by Edward Albee playing from March ninth to 11th, and 16th to 18th. Box and Quotations from Chairman Mao Tse-Tung are described by the New York Post as "an intricate experiment in the McLuhan idiom by a bold dramatic adventurer." Regular admission is $2.00 while Firehall Subscribers pay $1.00.

Speaking of Albee, you can still see The American Dream at the Studio Theatre, 4 Glen Morris this weekend. It is playing along with Enchanted Night by Slawomir Mrozek. Admission, as for all Drama Centre productions, is free.

Global Village Theatre presents a new theatre piece called The Big Apple, beginning March 13 at 8:30 pm.

The Jest Society has a reputation for versatile, knife-edge satiric comedy sketches. It has teamed up with veteran Toronto performer Oave Broadfoot at the Poor Alex. Performances begin at nine o'clock. The price is three dollars.

The Theatre in the Dell has been well attended lately, since the Canadian revue, The Apple Tree has been its main attraction. Tom Kneebone and Oinah Christie have apparently put together a sparkling musical adaptation of the writings of Mark Twain. If you are planning to splurge, know this: tickets are three dollars. Monday through Thursday and $3.50 on the weekend, plus a ten per cent cover charge. Drinks, sandwiches etc. are above and beyond that.

Getting back to student theatre and its economic advantages, the Cercle Francais of University College is presenting Moliere's Bourgeois Gentilhomme at the UC Playhouse this weekend at 8:30 pm. It is a celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of Moliere's death. (Why celebrate someone's death?) The following week the UC Playhouse will house a Polish-speaking theatre group which will perform (yes, in Polish) a play called The Card Index. Performances of this group, Arabeska, take place next Thursday at eight, Friday at seven and nine, and Saturday at three o'clock.

The Colonnade Theatre is still showing the two one-act comedies by Chekhov. The first one The Bear, is a real treat for those who enjoy hearing middle-class nineteenth century attitudes towards women. Pauline Carey plays the traditional hysterical female to the hilt.

You can still see Brussels Sprouts at the Central Library Theatre, three plays by Synge at the Irish Arts Theatre located in West Park School, The Master, a new play showing at the Theatre Passe Muraille, Electra at the St. Lawrence Centre (see today's review), and Godspell, still playing at the Playhouse.

If you're interested in modern dance, don't forget Charles Weidman's Theatre Dance Company, appearing at Ryerson Theatre, Friday evening. The master is also hosting a dance workshop at the Benson Building, Saturday from 9:30 to 12:30 and from 7:30 to 9:30. More on dance — the Toronto Oance Theatre completes its run at Hart House this weekend. Its worth a look, even if only to see David Earle's Ray Charles Suite, the company's new plunge into rhythm and blues.

Eve's New Rib
by Robert T. Francoeur
Longman; $7.50

The changing life styles and the new morality born, to be paradoxical, of the pill are the subjects of Octor Francoeur's book. He starts off very well.

The new discoveries in the biological sciences where the sex of a child can be predetermined or where by cloning duplicates (as many as are wanted) of a person may be grown from a single cell; or even so commonplace a concept as artificial insemination are all treated, at the beginning, with candor and a matter-of-fact style that is all the more refreshing for its lack of pretentious soul-searching.

This is too good to last. Or Francoeur becomes bogged down in the morality of the results of these new facts. Speaking from the point of view of Roman Catholic dogma, he postulates, rather worriedly, where it is all going to end. By freely quoting from a few avant garde theologians and psychologists, he offers up problems but presents no solutions. He does present a spectrum of life styles that may be very shocking to those easily shocked — group marriages, sequential adultery, unisex unions, but that is all. A pity he did not stick closer to the lab.

Reform Slate pledges united student voice

and its runners

With this issue, The Varsity begins a series on student candidates for the Governing Council with the seven candidates on the Reform Slate.

There are eight student seats available: four undergraduate full-time (in two constituencies), two graduate (in two constituencies) and two part-time. Ballots, which have been mailed out, must be returned by mail or in person to ballot boxes around campus, by March 20.

See page 29 for a story on three other student candidates.

By LORNE SLOTNICK

The eight student members of the Governing Council must "put forth a united and strong student voice on essential issues facing students today", says Reform Slate candidate Howard Stein.

This view has led to the formation of the Reform Slate, which is contesting all but one of the eight student places on the Governing Council.

Stein, running in the arts and science full-time undergraduate constituency, says the Governing Council needs "livening up." This can be done, he says, by putting forth the student position on the issues the slate is emphasizing — equal and open access to the new library, fighting fees hikes and loan cutbacks, and increasing student representation on committees.

Most present student governors have supported these positions on council.

Members of the slate stress their ability to work together for the benefit of all students, in contrast to the lack of cohesion they see among the present student governors.

Several of the slate members have experience in university politics, but others will probably have to learn a great deal about the operation of the university before they can function effectively on the council.

Stein, a second year economics major, is also vice-president of the Political Economy Course Union, and a member of the Open Stacks Committee. He is a member of Students for a Democratic Society, as are slate members Mike Naensch and Richard Schabas, both running as full-time undergraduates in the professional faculties, and Tony Leah, trying for one of the two graduate student seats.

The other members of the Reform Slate, graduate student Phil Dack (already acclaimed), part-time undergraduate Eric DePoe, and arts and science undergraduate Howard Levitt, have no political affiliation.

Levitt, a second year psychology student, listed a number of committees he serves on, including the arts and science Faculty Council, committee of admissions. He emphasizes the worsening quality of education, particularly the lack of "teacher-student interaction."

Levitt would also like to see more experimentation with alternative teaching and marking methods. He has been active in the current math occupation, as have other reform candidates. In fact, the three dismissed math professors have all endorsed the Reform Slate, although Stephen Salaff has also endorsed Victoria College student Dave Laughton, because Laughton also supports, the occupation.

Leah, a graduate sociology student running for the arts graduate seat, was active in last year's open stacks fight as a member of the students' negotiating committee during the Simcoe Hall occupations. He is concerned that the provincial education cutbacks are causing "great deprivation" among graduate students, who, he says, are "terribly underpaid."

He vehemently opposes foreign professor quotas, which he calls "racist". Quotas "destroy the fight for jobs" for graduate students, and ignore reasonable criteria for hiring faculty, such as teaching ability, Leah maintained.

One Reform Slate candidate, Phil Dack, has been acclaimed in the education and sciences graduates constituency. Dack was last year's SAC vice-president, but lost out a year ago in a bid to keep the job for a second term. As full-time fieldworker, last summer, he helped set up the newly-formed Arts and Science Student Union. He is presently a graduate student at OISE.

Schabas, a first year meds student, condemns sexism and racism in medical schools. He contends that racist doctrines are being promoted by some professors, and calls the treatment of women at U of T Medical Faculty "indefensible."

Although Naensch, a Faculty of Education student, has been at U of T since 1963, he has little campus political experience.

Unless he becomes a full-time professional undergraduate next year, he will not be eligible to take a seat on the council, since he expects to graduate from the one-year Faculty of Education course this year. Student governors are required to be students in their constituency during their term of office.

However, he says Simcoe Hall would have "mentioned something" if he were not qualified to run, so he feels there would be no problem if he won.

Naensch hesitated when asked what the most important issue is.

"That's a good question", was his first reply, but he finally came up with student parity on hiring and firing committees as his main concern.

The reform candidate for one of the part-time undergraduate seats is Eric DePoe, a first year history student. He also has little university political experience, but is the brother of well-known activist, presently ASSU fieldworker, David DePoe.

The other part-time undergraduate seat is not being contested by the Reform Slate.

Undergrad candidates for GC state views the race and its runners

By ALEXANDRA MERCER
In the following article, The Varsity presents an outline of the opinions of the undergraduate arts and science student candidates for the Governing Council.

IAN GRAY

An undergraduate arts and science full-time candidate for the Governing Council, Ian Gray is "running as an individual to put forth certain ideas on council". Gray (SMCI), was surprised when it was suggested that his platform was similar to the Reform Slate's, but he still felt strongly that he "does not want to be associated with them".

Along with the Reform State, he feels that university libraries should be universally accessible, i.e. open to the public, as well as all students. He also agrees that there should be stronger undergraduate representation on the Governing Council.

And like the Reform State, he is concerned about the fees increases. He feels that the commission on Post-Secondary Education report should be "looked into thoroughly" because he thinks that the commission's suggestion to the government that it supply unlimited loans to students will justify the universities' raising tuition fees.

In addition, he thinks the Governing Council should investigate The Varsity (because he says most students don't like it), as well as all campus media. The Governing Council, however, has no jurisdiction over The Varsity.

Gray has no experience in campus politics, but worked for David Rotenberg's unsuccessful mayoral campaign last fall. He plans, to go into law.

GRETCHEN ROEDDE

Gretchen Roedde, a pre-med student and undergraduate Governing Council candidate, says she differs from the Reform Slate because she is "more interested in cooperation with the reform part of council". Seeing president John Evans as "an evasive administrator", she nevertheless posits that "he realizes the need for greater student representation".

She agrees with many Reform State policies; specifically, their stands on library accessibility and amalgamation ("equal and open access to the new library" and "no amalgamation of branch and college libraries".)

She sees an alternate role for college libraries if amalgamation occurs: supplying reading materials for college level courses.

She accepts tuition fee increases, provided students and faculty attain more control over what happens to the increases. She feels if this occurs, the increases will be plowed back into grants, thus returning money to students who need it.

The daughter of Helen Roedde, community organizer and former provincial NDP candidate, Roedde sees the Governing Council as a valuable body because it is the university's closest link with the government. She feels that the university's financial difficulties with the province stem from the fact that the Government "hasn't been consulting anybody except their advisors" on university problems.

Roedde has had experience on the Building Committee of the Innis College Governing council. She stresses using university resources in the community as outlined in the Wright Report, and favours campus-community services such as tutoring, clinics, Pollution probe and day care.

TOM BECKERMAN

Tom Beckerman, another arts and science undergraduate council candidate, who served on the arts Faculty Council's Social Sciences Committee was unavailable for comment.

No OK for Vic development yet

Victoria University's decision on a proposed commercial development won't be made until next fall at the earliest, president Goldwin French said yesterday.

"Everyone who has an interest... (will be able to) participate in the decision," he said in a telephone interview. The important point, he said, is that nothing will be decided in the summer, when most of the student body is off campus.

The Financing and Property Committee of Vic's Board of Regents has set up a subcommittee to "examine possible plans" for the proposed Manufacturers' Life Insurance development, he said. The project would be built on university land on Charles Street at St. Thomas.

The subcommittee, which may be composed of a faculty member, a student, a board member and the president, is empowered to consider both financial and structural aspects of any proposals.

Vic is looking into commercial proposals in an attempt to generate revenue for the debt-ridden university, which has already leased the Colonnade property on a long-term lease at what is now considered low rent.

(Victoria University has the same legal status as the University of Toronto, including property rights; as distinct from Victoria College, which is similar to University College under U of T.)

French could not specify how much annual revenue the university wants from the project, saying that in any case, income would be reduced if some of the residential-commercial development's facilities were available to Vic.

Vic Students Administrative Council president Gord Barnes says VUSAC wants a set of principles agreed to by the subcommittee.

Low cost student housing in the present houses on the site should be replaced, VUSAC argues, and other residents in the houses should be financially compensated. Any college facilities consumed by the project should also be replaced, VUSAC thinks.

French was sympathetic to the council's requests, although he could not commit the subcommittee to insist on them.

Revenue would be adversely affected relative to the amount of facilities used by Vic, he stated, adding that the project should be "as useful as possible" to both students and tenants.

French was particularly amenable to one of VUSAC's suggestions: "Nobody wants Charles Street widened."

Two years ago, St. Michael's College fought a major battle to prevent St. Joseph Street from being significantly widened.

ELITISM

Student representatives should work against any form of elitism in this university - this includes student organizations. They should show that students are responsible members of this university; concerned with its welfare, not only their own.

Teaching assistants seek collective bargaining

By JOHN CAMPBELL
Newly-hired teaching assistant and union organizer Andrew Stanley, said Wednesday that "hundreds" of teaching assistants have signed up to join the organization.

The Graduate Assistants' Association is striving to obtain union certification to represent the university's approximately 2000 teaching assistants in collective bargaining with the administration. Wages and working conditions are the chief issues the association wants to improve.

The association must satisfy the Ontario Labour Relations Board that it falls within the definition of a proper bargaining unit. At least 65 per cent of TA's on campus must become members for the association to receive automatic certification, over half to obtain an OLRB supervised vote.

Stanley, who started on the full-time job Monday, said his main task so far has been to "rationalize" the organizational efforts that have been carried out by a steering committee of the Graduate Students' Union since last fall. At that time, the GSU distributed a report published last spring showing that the average wage of the assistants was less than $1,000, that women were underrepresented among the teaching ranks and that assistants had no representation on course decision-making bodies.

Stanley said that the appeal for members includes undergraduate students.

A graduate assistant, he said, is defined by the association as "any student who gets paid through a university department for chores such as marking, conducting in-class demonstrations, or helping in lab research". This means for example, that about 120 undergraduate markers in the math department are eligible for membership.

Stanley, who is not a graduate student, but attended university at York and Waterloo, said his his job with the GSU is slated to last for six weeks. At the end of that time, he said, he hopes the association will be in a strong enough position to carry on its activities over the summer.

GSU administrative assistant Larry Hoffman, an early organizer for the new union, said he expects the association will be ready to begin bargaining next fall.

Beverley station under attack

By CHRIS NEWELL

The proposed new site for Metro Police station 52 came under attack Monday night as Metro Police Commission chairman Judge C.O. Bick met with area residents to defend the commission's present choice of a location at Beverley and Dundas Streets.

Bick found himself agreeing with the residents that this location, where many old houses are located has an excellent alternative, which has been given very little thought.

In a presentation at the beginning of the meeting, Bick stated that renovation of the present station opposite U of T on College Street near University Avenue would not be sufficient to meet projected police needs in the next 20 years.

He outlined these needs, but did not say specifically why the commission chose the Beverley site, except to mention that it was "geographically acceptable", and later, that it was "one of the most economical" of the available sites.

The proposed station is two storeys high, occupies 30,000 square feet, and will eventually be occupied by an estimated 400 police.

Opposition to the Beverley site was made obvious by a show of hands in which the residents voted 44 to 2 in favour of an alternate location.

The residents feel that in choosing this site, the police would be destroying buildings of considerable architectural and historical significance, said city planner Alan Dean, who is heading a study of the southeast Spadina area.

More importantly, police would be levelling low rental housing valuable to the working people of the area, he declared. There is also concern about the effect of the increased traffic flow that the station is expected to generate.

In response to questioning, Bick said that no study had been made with regard to the traffic at the station's present location or to the effects of the projected traffic flow on the community, at the proposed location.

Dean went on to mention the 12 alternative sites available to the police in lieu of their present choice.

These were the north-east corner of Beverley and Queen Streets, now a gas station-parking lot, an area behind the Hospital for Sick Children, also not built up; and the Toronto Parking Authority property on Dundas West at Simcoe St.

The latter proved most popular with the meeting, and Bick admitted that it was geographically a better location than the Beverley site, which was chosen, Bick said "with ample consideration of all the sites made known to us." Bick contended that he had only recently been made aware of the Parking Authority property, and said that he would not object sharing the land with a six-storey garage which the authority is apparently planning.

It remains uncertain whether the police commission is likely to suddenly become sensitive to the desires of the community by changing the location of their new station to the Parking Authority's land after veiling their plans in secrecy for so long (the Beverley site was chosen in October 1971).

In any event the move would have complications — the parking authority is unaware of this development and shared occupancy of the land may not be easily arranged.

Metro Toronto has already expropriated the land for the Beverley Street site, and has set aside money for construction there, beginning this year.

U of T execs support budgeting in secret

Top U of T administrators support the university's secrecy in drawing up and approving its $115,000,000 budget.

In spite of widespread student support, and at times, considerable faculty and administrative favour, openness in all decision-making was not required by the province when it redrafted the University of Toronto Act in 1971 and established the Governing Council.

Accordingly, drawing up the budget in a technically administrative body and approving it in Governing Council — always in closed session — by exploiting the wording of the act, the university effectively sidestepped what many interpreted as a "spirit of openness" in the provincial government's attitude towards the act.

In a telephone interview last week, institutional relations and planning vice-president Jack Sword stated that the budget is "worked over for such a long period of time and in such detail that having day-to-day reports (of the proceedings) would simply cause confusion".

Vice-president Don Forster, who chaired the budget committee, was more blunt.

"I don't see how the process could be carried out in any other way," he said, without further explanation.

Student governor and budget committee member Paul Cadario speculated on the possible political consequences of open budget meetings.

He said he felt that under such circumstances, "some division heads would appeal more to the sympathy of the gallery and the public for support than to the budget committee itself".

The relevant section of the Act (1971) permitting closed meetings reads:

"The meetings, except meetings of committee of the whole of the Governing Council shall be open to the public... but where intimate financial or personal matters of any person may be disclosed at the meeting, the part of the meeting concerning such person shall be held in camera", unless the person consents otherwise.

According to Planning and Resources committee chairman, and budget committee member James Lewis, this passage "applies only to committee meetings of the Governing Council as a group". He explained that the budget committee was "appointed by the president as an administrative committee under the authority of the Governing Council," and as such, "it is even further removed from the Governing Council than Governing Council committees."

Cadario concurred with Lewis' interpretation. This portion of the act, he argued, is relevant only to the regular meetings of the whole of the Governing Council held usually once a month.

The committee, which met only to develop the budget, drew its personnel largely from the standing committees of the Governing Council.

Its membership included: chairman Forster, Sword, business affairs vice-president Alex Rankin, part-time student governor Joyce Denyer, Cadario, Lewis, executive member Harold Eastman, alumnus Patti Fleury, faculty Harold Smith, and vice-provosts Robin Ross, and John Hamilton. The committee also received technical advice from three budget officers.

This is the first time students have participated on the budget committee. Their selection by Evans was made in consultation with other members of the administration.

"It was pretty well understood that the budget committee meetings would be closed", said Cadario when asked if much discussion was held on the decision to proceed in camera. He added, "I don't think the openness factor is a big issue for the budget committee".

Soc prof exposes sexual myths

By SCOTT WILLOWS

Sexual myths "provide sanctions and motives which preserve the status quo", said sociology professor Robert James, speaking to an open lecture last week.

James stressed the role of socialization in sex-typing, warning that there is a difference between the physical criteria for calling individuals male and female and the behavioral mannerisms which society has come to associate with "masculinity" and "femininity." Throughout his discussion James contended that sex-typing is part of a general tendency of society to promote "self-fulfilling prophecies". Every child is trained by models, sanctions and punishments until "systems of behavior become a part of personality", he said.

He demonstrated this by challenging the "motherhood myth" and the "male aggressiveness myth".

James defined the motherhood myth as the belief that "a woman's true fulfillment only comes from the birth of a child". "Why", asked James, "must people go to books to care for children?" He further affirmed that "some females would make lousy mothers."

James noted that a respected contemporary, William Kephart, claims that only 10 per cent of women actually "enjoy" sexual activity. This is an important part of the "male aggressor myth", he declared.

James cited Kephart's association of male aggression with a pre-ejaculatory "congestion frustration". This "fluid buildup" and the resultant "discomfort from within" according to Kephart, is indicative of a definite "need differential" between the sexes.

James questioned the validity of biological explanations such as these. "Sexual expectations are established by other influences, he said. "Young males are told, 'yes, go and get it before it's too late', while 'young females are told no, wait and keep your legs crossed."

James concluded that as long as ideas of "identity and fulfillment" must coincide with particular vocations of society sexual behavior will continue to be chosen by others.

Women to form soc caucus

A tentative step towards forming a women's caucus in the sociology department was taken Tuesday when more than 25 women sociology students and faculty members met to discuss their problems.

No decisions were taken, except to meet again Tuesday night, but participants said they felt that women had problems they could usefully work on together.

The meeting was the first in the university's history in which women came together on a departmental level to discuss the position of women, according to organizers.

Among the problems discussed was the discrepancy between participation by women as students and as faculty members. Only seven out of 50 faculty members in the department are women, said one person, whereas the majority of students, both undergraduate and graduate, are female.

"Fast Eddie" Goodman lashes into reformers

By PAT REDICAN

"The reformers are trying to suck and whistle at the same time and it just can't be done", charged E.A. "Fast Eddie" Goodman, prominent developer lawyer.

"You can't slow down development and meet the housing needs of a city like Toronto."

"The city has been in bed with the developers so long, they can't imagine any other partner," retaliated Jim Lorimer, journalist-professor-author-reformer.

The two clashed in the fourth of St. Michael's Students' Union city government forums before an audience of about fifty students.

Lorimer, a professor at both U of T and York and the author of three anti-developer books on city politics, called Goodman, also a high-ranking Conservative Party official and financier, a "hagman, fixer, and campaign fundraiser" to start off the debate.

Lorimer drew a connection between the "land development industry, the senior political parties, and City Hall" which, he claims, are responsible for the high cost of housing and the kinds of development being perpetrated in the city.

Goodman, chief lawyer for Cadillac Development Corporation, in turn charged that the reform movement was "an unholy alliance of those who would preserve the status quo at any cost and those who offer an unattainable panacea — a simplistic answer to difficult and complex problems."

He denied what he called Lorimer's view of "a conspiracy of people who meet in dark rooms and smoke opium and decide how to subvert the city next".

"This is not a homogenous group," said Goodman, "There are literally several dozen developers with large holdings and they have no relation to each other; they are in competition and this is a very competitive business."

Lorimer pointed to various developments around Toronto which involve several developers in one project, for instance the 3,500 unit Bramalea development which involves five companies, including Cadillac. Cadillac is also involved with Greenwin in the controversial Quebec-Gothic development, planned to destroy nearly 100 old, substantial houses.

"In the board rooms over discussions of projects like this is where the developers meet", declared Lorimer. "There exists in this industry a network of links and connections."

Goodman replied that this "several-company" approach to one development simply offered a diversity of approach: "It's more practical; it doesn't diminish competition."

Lorimer pointed to the fact that land is more expensive in Toronto than in any other Canadian city and the fact that there was a great deal of capital for land development coming into the city from all over the world.

"This can only mean that there is no place where a developer can make more money than in Toronto and the reason for this is that the developers keep the prices up."

Lorimer offered the alternative of building "housing projects from non-profit community organizations." This would include such groups as labour unions, community organizations and the like, according to Lorimer.

Goodman agreed with Lorimer that land prices were too high, but said the solution to this problem was to speed up development.

This, he said would mean that housing, and consequently land would not be in such great demand, and prices would naturally go down. He pointed to OHC figures which stated only one per cent of all apartments in the City of Toronto were vacant at the end of last year.

Goodman came under heavy fire from both the audience and Lorimer for the margin of profit which developers extract.

"We are here to provide adequate housing at reasonable rates", the lawyer replied, "we are also here to make money." Asked what he thought was a reasonable profit rate, he answered, "It depends on the risk involved."

Lead dust from factory affects health in Bathurdt-Niagara area

By GRETCHEN ROEDDE

A spokeswoman from the Niagara and Bathurst Streets district yesterday charged that a local factory's pollution has produced high lead-content levels in neighbourhood children.

Gisella Regina, speaking at a UC geography Seminar at U of T, asked for support from students in fighting Toronto Refiners and Smelters, whose battery-crushing operations have caused lead dust to contaminate the area, she said.

"It's a very serious situation concerning the children," said Regina, whose four children she claimed have been affected.

"The Environmental Law Association, which is associated with Pollution Probe, helped us get a court injunction against this factory last August," prohibiting battery-crushing, she stated.

"However we (the residents) doubt the injunction has been obeyed, because trucks have been seen entering the refinery yards full of batteries."

One effect of the injunction, however, has been the construction of a brick fence at one end of the yard. As well a canvas sheet has been hung over another fence, making it difficult to see what is going on inside the factory.

"We also have a lot of evidence against the factory, and have been gaining support from politicians, like (Ward 6 alderman) Dan Heap, and doctors at Sick Kids (Sick Children's Hospital). We've been fighting this thing for six years now, and think we have a good chance of winning," said Regina.

She declared, "Community organizing is helping to strengthen the community."

Community residents want at least the battery-crushing part of the operation relocated, and some legal guarantees that residents in the neighbourhood will not have to move to allow for expansion of the refinery.

Vic wins Div I, loses II hockey

By PAUL CARSON

Victoria College hockey teams both succeeded and failed as the interfac playoffs moved closer to the championship stage following three key games this week.

Vic I advanced to the finals of Division f with a close 3-2 total goals victory over New I.

However, Vic II fell victim in the highest upset of the playoff round to date as Law II used four goals by Boh Armstrong en route to a 9-2 win in their second game. That overcame a 4-goal Vic lead and sent Law II into the Division II final with a 12-9 series win.

The other Division II semi-final saw the first game solve nothing as PHE B and Graduate Studies huddled to a 7-7 tie. Each team produced three two-goal scorers, with Mark Ackley, Brain Walters and someone named Buzz connecting for PHE B and Jim Moinar, P.McLaren and Taylor replying for Grad Studies. The second game, and overtime if necessary, will be played tonight at 7 pm at the Arena.

In Division I, the opponents for Vic f won't be known until Monday night when SMC and Erindale meet at 7:30; SMC carries a six goal lead after their 12-6 win in the initial game earlier this week.

Students vote Wednesday for UTAA reps

Students from faculty and college associations and the various UTAA athletic clubs have until 5 pm March 12 to file nomination papers for the five student positions on the 1973-74 Athletic Directorate.

Appointed representatives will vote for the student nominees next Wednesday, March 15.

At 4 pm yesterday less than the minimum of five candidates had been nominated, and only one position was contested by two people. One seat in "Group B" is left uncontested.

Last March three of the five seats were won by acclamation. Hartley Stern and John Wright were acclaimed in Group A, and Michael Pennam in Group C. Terry Byron and Dave Watt were elected in Group B.

So far this year Bruce Durno (hockey) and Jim Nicoletti (football) are the only two members running in Group A, while Peter Hillier (soccer) is contesting one of the two seats in Group B. Andy Fraser (UC) and Bob Bauer (Law) are running for the lone college and faculty association student seat.

Elections are held on an electoral college system, with intercollegiate athletic clubs electing four of the five representatives. Only one representative is elected to represent college and faculty athletic associations, where most students are involved.

The electoral college is composed of three groups — "A", "B", and "C", with a total of 128 voting representatives. Twenty-four Group A representatives elect two nominees from the "big three" intercollegiate sports — hockey, football, and basketball. Each of the three athletic clubs appoints eight voting representatives.

Group B, with 54 voting representatives, consists of intercollegiate sports other than those specified in Group A. This group also elects two students to the Directorate; its representatives are appointed by the Executive Committees of each of the athletic clubs in the group.

The rugby, soccer, swimming, and track and harrier clubs each appoint six voting representatives; rowing, volleyball, water polo and wrestling clubs each appoint three, and badminton, curling, fencing, golf, gymnastics, judo, skiing, squash, and tennis two.

Group C has 50 voting representatives, appointed by each of the college and faculty associations. Applied Science, Medicine, UC, Vic, and St. Mike's each appoint four; Dentistry, Law, New, Trinity, and Scarborough appoint three; Architecture, Forestry, Innis, Pharmacy and PHE appoint two, and Emmanuel, Erindale, Knox, Music, and Wycliffe two each.

All students eligible for nomination to the Athletic Directorate must, under the terms of the UTAA constitution, be in their second or higher year at the date of nomination; they must not be in their final year at U of T.

Each nomination must be made on a special form obtained from the athletic office; it must be signed by two active members and certified by the registrar or secretary of the nominee's college or faculty as to his academic standing.

Assistant Director (Administration) David Tinker is responsible for putting the list of candidates on the Association notice board at the close of nominations.

At the time of filing a nomination paper each nominee must submit a written policy statement, which he may send to all members of his electoral college.

The policy statement would include what the nominee would attempt to do as a member of the Directorate and might include some of the following policies:

President of the UTAA George Wodehouse, Athletic Director Dalt White, and David Tinker. Wodehouse asked for more power for White and Tinker at Tuesday's Internal Affairs meeting.

- the relative importance of minor and major sports;
- what action could be taken to obtain new facilities;
- the question of integration of the men's and women's athletics departments, and of both of these associations with the School of Physical and Health Education;
- attempting to integrate co-educational programs.

- making athletic participation a priority over "spectatorism";
- compelling the UTAA to define the priorities (as yet undefined) of its athletic program.

By late Thursday afternoon the following representatives had submitted their names to the UTAA intercollegiate office for voting purposes:

- basketball (8): Avo Albo, Doug Baker, Rick Kurzyk, Bill Francis, Peter Oolup, Glenn Scott, Brian Skyvington, Dave Watt.
- football: (8) Cor Doret.

- gymnastics (2): Gary Wicks, Rick Jeysman.

The remaining 117 eligible voting representatives have yet to submit their names to the intercollegiate office.

Queen's University students (athletes) now have majority control of the athletic department they finance, as will those at the University of Waterloo soon. Even the Benson Building women members have the potential to control their program.

As a student involved in athletics at the University of Toronto, where over 50 per cent of the athletic budget comes from the students, and where only five students can be elected to a 20 member Directorate, I strongly support a majority student voice in the UTAA Directorate.

Yes No

The construction of a new men's athletic building should be placed at the top of the university administration's priority list. The administration should appeal to the provincial government for construction funds, and should also pay for the maintenance costs themselves.

Yes No

Co-educational physical education and athletics should be encouraged; and the men's athletics program, the women's program, and the School of Physical and Health Education should be integrated.

Yes No

I urge the UTAA to set up a committee with a majority of student (athletes) to define the priorities of the men's athletics program at the U of T.

SMC, Meds, UC, Law reach interfac basketball semi-finals

The interfaculty basketball playoffs opened Tuesday with St. Mike's, Meds, UC, and Law winning. (This year's Sifton Cup has been dubbed the Kleberg Klasic since Ross Kleberg is coaching, playing, and refereeing in the playoffs.)

At noon Tuesday, St. Mike's A, employing two lines, which alternated every five minutes, trampled PHE B 93-50. St. Mike's looked ominous in this outing as they played a stingy full-court man-to-man defense for the entire game. If St. Mike's can continue to play this way, watch out.

The real story of this game, however, was the return to action of St. Mike's fine centre, John Heininger, who scored 16 points. Heininger hadn't played since before Christmas but judging by his performance Tuesday, it seemed like he'd never been away. Other scorers for St. Mike's included Tom Campana (20 points) and Larry Trafford (13).

Meanwhile, Cor Doret hooped 12 points for PHE B. Another PHE B player, Rick Phillips, perhaps enunciated PHE B feelings best when he said, "They kept coming in waves!"

The second tilt of the day featured Meds defeating Vic 65-44. The rookie-laden Vic squad (only two members were returnees from last year) made too many mental errors in the game to upset the taller Medsmen. Although Bill Caskey remained masked, he was shutout in the scoring column.

Instead, the principal damage was done by the shooting and playmaking of Bobby Lewis who got off his death-bed to play in the game. Bobby ended up with 14 points while team-mate Lindsay Horenblas potted 17, most of them after the game was no longer in doubt. Replaying for Vic were Paul Mims (12 points), and Gord Wicher (10).

Following the game, Vic coach Bob Garton was properly philosophical about the game, musing, "It hurts too much to laugh and I'm too old to cry."

In the third game of the evening, UC was tied 33-33 at halftime, but blew Sr. Engineering out in the second half to win 82-65.

The engineers opened up with a 1-2-2 zone press and would have been ahead at halftime by a large margin if Gordie Betcherman hadn't been shooting so well. However, Mike Becherman made four quick baskets at the start of the second half and UC started rolling.

Sr. Engineering was plagued again by some strange substituting, a state they had been immersed in all year. The brothers Betcherman — Mike and Gordie — tallied 23 and 16 points, respectively, while Bill Birnbaum added another 17 for UC.

Engineering relied on Ron Gratz (15 points) and George Mohasei (12) for their scoring.

The final game of the day saw Law outlast Erindale 62-49. Erindale strategists threatened to start pressing Law from the locker room. Instead, the team played a box-and-one on Al Sternberg. Still, Sternberg scored 19 points while his side-kick Rich Pirie scored 10. Meanwhile, for Erindale, Bill Stewart hooped 12 points with teammate Al Nikrosius adding another 10.

Law jumped to an early 10 point lead in the game and managed to stay ahead by a similar margin all game. Although a dull and unpectacular team, Law played well enough to win. However, to defeat St. Mike's in the semifinals, the Lawyers will have to look more than just ordinary (as they did against Erindale) or they, too, will be whistling in the dark.

All-faculty body to study math dept

Math chairman George Duff Monday implemented a department decision to appoint an all-faculty committee to study the department's governing structure, even though the committee's formation was itself sparked by an 11-day occupation of department offices by students protesting their exclusion from its decision-making processes.

A department meeting a week ago specifically decided to keep students off the committee, afraid the precedent of seating them on the committee would force the committee to recommend giving students a large voice in department decision-making.

The four member committee according to dismissed math professor Stephen Salaff — whose re-instatement was one of the student occupation's demands — is completely made up of "Duff men". Its members will be Paul Rooney, Baron Brainerd, Jim McCool, and Stuart Smith.

Asked why there is no student membership, Duff yesterday replied, "It was just set up in this way. I did what I understood I was told to do by the department."

"Students' opinions will be solicited" he added. "There will be some open meetings".

The committee on governing structures was one of two established last week by the department in response to the occupation. The other was a committee to examine the so-called "service courses", mass-enrolment first year courses which have caused major complaints among students because of the high student-teacher ratio, grading structure and poor textbooks.

The 40 students who had occupied the fourth floor math offices and corridors decided Friday afternoon to end their occupation in order to broaden the struggle for increased student say in departmental decision-making and the rehiring of the three professors.

At a Saturday night meeting in their new headquarters, the Arts and Science Student Union lounge on the second floor of Sid Smith, the former occupiers decided to mobilize student support for a mass meeting confrontation next Tuesday with Duff, arts and science dean Bob Greene and university president John Evans.

Students contended the 11 day occupation was becoming too time-consuming to continue and that little had been won in the form of concessions from the department.

The demands have been shifted to stress a greater student voice on "all departmental bodies including those dealing with hiring firing and tenure of faculty."

Other demands include the end of heavy emphasis on exams in first year courses and the rehiring of the two professors, David Spring and Michael Mather, who were denied tenure, as well as the retention of Salaff until his case is reviewed by an open hearing before a parity committee of students and staff.

Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway Monday apparently turned down Salaff's request for an open hearing saying "it does not conform in any way to the established approaches to this question in the university."

Conway advised Salaff to write letters to Greene, and the U of T faculty Association stating his grievance and requesting a review. The other course she advised was appeal to the president.

Salaff says he does not interpret Conway's letter as necessarily barring his suggestion of an open staff-student parity tribunal hearing his case. He notes that Conway does not specifically rule out his suggestion, adding that appeal procedure is informal enough that it could be done.

Accordingly, he has written Greene requesting an open hearing.

Some informal gains were made from the occupation. Some improvement in grading of first year courses was promised and a committee set up to examine problems in these large enrolment courses has already met (see page 3).

Sentiment at the Saturday meeting was that math students should rally support with pamphlets, leaflets and a newspaper explaining their cause.

Students also voted to try to widen the struggle to include students in other departments in the general battle for more student representation on hiring firing and tenure committees.

They decided to retain the demand that the three popular professors be rehired but maintained that this demand is "inseparable" from a greater decision making role.

Student council president-elect Bob Anderson, also a math student called the occupation "successful", but added that the department response has been "unsatisfactory".

Anderson maintained that the occupation illustrates "a critical problem for the university, that quality teaching must be stressed as a primary function rather than concentrating on research."

Math chairman George Duff, seen here strolling down the corridors of Sid Smith, has implemented a faculty decision to appoint an 11-man committee to study the governing structure of the department.

Is post-secondary education going down the drain? Do you get the impression that lectures are getting a bit sluggish? At this time of year, many profs can't get up a full head of steam. Above photo: U of T's Faculty of Plumbing.

Minister tells crowd report on education is "on the right track"

By GREG McMASTER

The final report of the commission on post-secondary education in Ontario (COPSEO) is apparently in line with the Tory government's objectives for the province.

Colleges and universities minister Jack McNie told about 500 people in Convocation Hall yesterday the report was "on the right track" and sets out the government's goals "very well." His opinion of the Commission's proficiency was supported by commission member J.M. Careless, also a U of T professor, but questioned by U of T president John Evans and several students during the SAC-sponsored Day of Discussion — part of a province-wide examination of the report.

When challenged by Stop the Student Surcharge Committee chairman Peter Havers about fee increases, McNie said the "the government's position is universities should be accessible to those who are qualified and interested in going, and we're working very hard on this".

The minister expressed support for the commission's proposed contingency repayment loan scheme, which Havers said would put some students "in debt for 20 to 30 years".

Careless said, "We must harmonize" the factors of accessibility and quality." He felt the commission has done its job, since "when you're attacked from both sides (administration and student) it follows that you're somewhere in the middle".

He predicted "absolutely free education for those who are, so to speak, at the bottom of the income levels."

Vice-president-elect Steve Moses — the only SAC speaker — sought and received assurance from Careless that the commission saw its report as a "package" and did not want proposals for fee raises to be separated from suggested changes in grant and loan schemes.

Evans criticised the report for ignoring existing programs and problems, inadequacy of detail, preoccupation with process rather than outcome, lack of adequate costing and lack of evaluation methods for proposed approaches to education.

He said two problems the commission could have studied more are the role of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) and difficulties faced by smaller universities — specially in northern Ontario.

He suggested that administrative bodies being proposed to ensure universities' independence from "unwelcome political developments" don't have the financial control to provide them with the necessary power.

Evans chided the commission for not examining critically proposals for mechanisms of "continuing education", quoting a Latin motto which, he said, translates roughly: "It's more fun to make a mess than to clean it up".

Careless defended the report's "ideas, values and purposes". He said it introduced "planning in terms of what we call social demand", which puts a "premium on individual choice".

The university "should fill various forms of social need", such as studying "the tremendous social strains we come up against in urbanized industrialized society", doing work on problems of "ecological balance" and the "creation of new knowledge", he said.

McNie hedged his answers to specific criticisms saying he didn't want to be charged with undermining other government committees. He added he attended the meeting "to get some kind of reading from the student body on the report."

Students oppose U.S. prof

WATERLOO (CUP) — Students in the University of Waterloo's school of urban and regional planning are opposed to the recent appointment of an American as director.

But, their disapproval of Sydney Saltzman appears to be too late. The only thing that may stop Saltzman's official appointment is his refusal to take the job. He was expected to decide by March 7, but the date passed without any word.

The students believe the implementation of Saltzman's conceptual framework and educational philosophy would be detrimental to the development of planning education at the university.

More than half of the planning students signed a petition in late February opposing Saltzman's selection. But the petition appears to more of a reaction to the selection than part of a complete campaign to ensure he was not selected.

The selection process allowed some involvement by students and gave students chances to meet the candidates they did not know. Only two candidates of the final five on the possibility list were from the University of Waterloo.

Boycott wants volunteers

The Toronto Kraft Boycott Committee is asking for supporters to help leaflet two Toronto supermarkets.

The boycott is designed to force Kraft to bargain collectively with Ontario's milk producers and to publicize the National Farmers Union campaign against multi-national corporation domination of agriculture.

Leaflets asking consumers not to buy any Kraft products will be distributed at the Dominion store just west of Bloor Street and Spadina Road, and at Loblaw's near Spadina and Dupont Street Thursdays and Fridays between 5 and 6 pm, and 7 to 9 pm, and Saturdays from 11 am to 5 pm.

Supporters wanting to help are asked to appear at those times, or to pick up leaflets at St. Paul's Avenue Road Church at 121 Avenue Road before 5 pm weekdays (ask for Kathrine Jennings).

A general meeting of boycott supporters has been called for next Thursday, March 22, at 7:30 pm at the church.

Information can be obtained by writing the Toronto Kraft Boycott Committee at Box 1053, Statio Q Toronto M4T 2P2, or phoning Jennings at 922-5432.

PAC member criticizes Evans

By ELAINE KAHN

A faculty member of the New Program Review Committee has, in a minority report, criticized president John Evans for putting "unreasonable" constraints on the committee.

The Presidential Advisory Committee to review the New Program was asked "to do far too much too fast", political science professor Paul Fox stated in a minority statement to Evans supported by undergraduate student Linda Hall and graduate Rita Mifflin.

Fox wrote the president that "The technique of assigning to the committee an enormous work load to be accomplished in an unreasonably brief time may give a superficial impression of decisive executive action, but I doubt that the method is conducive to reaching sound conclusions."

The 12 member committee was given approximately five months to undertake a major review of the far-reaching program instituted three years ago. Its report, whose major recommendation was the institution of a credit system, was released late last week.

Mifflin said she did "a lot of soul-searching" before endorsing Fox's objection, because she felt dissent within the report might make it seem less valid, to others.

Soon after the committee began meeting, Mifflin drafted a letter of resignation because she felt she would not have enough time to consider in sufficient depth all the documents presented to the committee. However, she remained on the committee after other members assured her that this lack of time with an overabundance of work was "par for the course" on committees and that she would be able to do as good a job as anyone else.

Though she feels the report is good for the amount of work that was able to be done, she felt there was an "inability to really establish priorities" in committee.

Evans had indicated that the terms of reference he originally gave the committee could be narrowed down to a more workable amount if necessary, but the committee attempted to fill its full mandate.

When interviewed Monday by The Varsity he did speak of the danger of narrowing the area down too far. But had the committee ignored many of the terms of reference, he claimed there would have been dissent from those thinking an insufficient area had been studied.

Evans felt the committee "struck a healthy balance".

Evans said that the report has been sent to the Dean of Arts and Science so he may establish procedures for "reviewing" it. It has also been sent to all the other deans and division heads so they can comment on the areas in it. Mifflin felt that since most of the over 200 briefs were given to the committee early, priorities could have been set while waiting until January for returns from 2,250 questionnaires.

She felt that, while she did become very familiar with the area under study by her subcommittee, she remained ill-informed concerning the areas that were considered by other subcommittees.

Evans felt the report dealt with the most important issues. He sees the report as a "transition" between the Macpherson Report, which is the basis of the New Program, and further discussion in depth of specific problems that the SAC identified and began to deal with, but could not consider fully.

Fox also disagreed with the report's recommendation that he says "implies" that a Bachelor of Commerce degree should require 15 or 20 courses like BA's and BSc's rather than the present 23.

He felt the report was very critical of the program in commerce and finance and considered the suggestion that the program be moved to the Faculty of Management Studies to be "ill-founded, foolish and bizarre". He was supported in this objection by graduate history student, Bruce Bowden, also a committee member.

Bowden feels that the B.Comm. program "has been a credit" to the Faculty of Arts and Science, and hopes a reconciliation will be reached. He said the committee received little evidence "either way" stating that the course load should or should not be reduced from 23.

Professor Frank Watt disagreed with the establishment of a credit system, in another minority statement appended to the report.

He stated that he supports the traditional view that "the quality of this university depends on the vitality of its intellectual and social community of full-time students". This vitality would be weakened by the new system, he felt.

"On-going studies" throughout life, Watt felt, cannot replace "the ideal of concentrated full-time commitment to university studies in the traditional phase of life for such studies, early adulthood."

Watt also feared that "spread-out higher education" would fragment the university and "continue the trend towards streetcar, shopping basket, cafeteria style university studies" that many of the recommendations in the report are trying to combat.

For example, the report calls for establishment of a thematic BA degree, in which a student would be expected to integrate at least the theme of his or her subjects, in order to provide some kind of cohesion given the wide choice of courses available, even if the student did not wish to specialize in a given subject.

Occupiers rebuffed by dept

By JOHN CAMPBELL

A contingent of math occupiers received a rebuff from the math department's new service course committee during its first meeting Friday, when the committee voted against the occupier's demands to unseat its chairman, math undergraduate secretary Nick Derzko.

The new committee was established by the math department to deal with academic and administrative problems in first year math courses in response to students who ended an 11-day occupation of math department offices in Sid Smith last Friday evening. The committee comprised of an equal number of students, tutors, and lecturers.

The occupiers spoke against a motion to make Derzko permanent chairman, charging that the undersecretary had made it clear he would retain "tight control" over the committee — an attitude they felt would adversely affect the direction the new committee would take.

The motion carried after professor Jim McCool observed that, as undergraduate secretary, Derzko had the greatest contact with undergraduate students.

Derzko accepted comments from the student observers, but warned that persistent heckling would result in closed meetings.

He outlined the problems the committee would address itself to: "In general, to improve the first-year service courses; make best use of available manpower; careful choice of texts; freedom the professors are allowed in designing and conducting their courses (sic); the marking scheme for next and future years; and the procedure for selection of first-year profts and tutors."

When pressed by professor Stephan Slaff, one of three professors whose dismissal sparked the occupation, to describe the powers of the service committee, Derzko replied that it had "the power to advise". However, he emphasized that recommendations of the committee would be "very seriously considered not only by chairman (George) Duff, but by the faculty as well."

Commenting on the outcome of the meeting, which adjourned after deciding to create further subcommittees centred around each individual math course, math occupier Bill Andrews declared it a partial victory for students.

Such items as reform of marking schemes, he said, referring to the first order of business to be dealt with by the sub-committee for math 130, "are a small concession on their (the department's) part but a big victory from our point of view". He added, however, that in his opinion, "Nothing took place this morning to indicate to me that the committee will take a strong stand on any of the substantive issues involved: class size, teaching, hiring and tenure criterion, budget allocation and course organization."

The fact that it took an occupation to get the math department to consider mark reform was cited by Andrews as a "significant indication of the way things are run in the department."

Derzko described the committee's decisions to retain him as permanent chairman and to proceed immediately on his objectives as "fair", and said he hoped it would "approach the issues in a businesslike fashion" in the future.

He did not agree with Andrews that an occupation was "the only way" to bring about change in the department. He argued that internal pressures such as increasing enrolment fostered by the introduction of the New Program in 1969, would have moved the department to reform without sit-ins by next year.

UTAA opening

The U of T Athletic Association moved towards opening its meetings yesterday, but allowed itself an out whenever it wants to go in camera.

According to conditions imposed, on its openness guidelines the directorate can at any time close its meetings through a simple majority vote. One condition specified that the meeting should be closed when anyone's personal affairs or character is to be discussed.

And, meetings can be postponed or attendance by non-directorate members can be restricted, if the presiding officer decides the meeting room is inadequate to accommodate all observers.

In addition, the directorate emphasized that the guidelines it passed only stood only until the association's constitution, now undergoing review, is amended with the openness principle enshrined. Non-members will be allowed to address meetings if permitted by the presiding officer, unless a majority of the members disagree.

Student rep Bob Heatley, supported by student Terry Bryon, expressed concern that if the place chosen for the meetings is deemed to be inadequate by the presiding officer then it would be difficult to make "an instantaneous switch" to another room. However, Heatley added, "Maybe I'm not reading it right."

Graduate member J. W. Macdonald replied that he believed the intent of the proposal "is to adjourn and then maybe meet five minutes later. What we're discussing is the guidelines of the principles," he added.

Macdonald said he understood the proposal would mean a restriction on the number in the room if necessary, but not necessarily closed meetings.

Law professor F. Iacobucci agreed that that was the intent of the proposal. Iacobucci added that the word "person" in the section on closed discussion relating to the affairs or character of an individual actually referred to corporations, and the directorate's business dealings with them.

UTAA president George Wodehouse commented that he understood this procedure (of non-disclosure of contractual or personal individual dealings) was in line with the Governing Council's policies to the best of his knowledge, and asked for a general understanding to move in camera if such an occasion arose.

Iacobucci agreed with Professor Juri Daniel's declaration that "any matters we might discuss might be interpreted to fall within the 'in camera' category".

Three SAC slates cough up $

Three of the five slates running in the SAC presidential elections Thursday lost $25 deposits after failing to garner one-third of the winning ticket's vote.

The Anderson and Vickery slates were the only ones to receive the deposit back as well as reimbursement for campaign expenses.

Final results released by chief returning officer Jôe Redican yesterday show that the team of Bob Anderson, Stephen Moses and Mike Scott handily defeated Chuck Vickery 1,716 to 665 votes.

Abstentions and spoiled ballots totalled 442, while the United Socialist Slate tallied 315 votes. The Stop the Student Surcharge slate lagged behind with 197 votes, while Peter Baumann's ticket was supported by only 199 voters.

Abstention and USS totals were boosted the most when Emmanuel College votes, missing Thursday night, were included. Fourteen Emmanuel students abstained and five voted USS, while the SSSC picked up two votes, Anderson and Vickery one each and Baumann none.

USS vice-presidential candidate Greg McMaster criticized the deposits, declaring, "Ours was not a frivolous candidacy."

"We oppose the imposition of financial criteria for participation in so-called democratic procedures."

SAC vice-president John Helliwell, also chairman of council's elections committee, explained that the deposit requirement was "a deterrent to frivolous candidacies." the same "as in all elections with deposits"

SAC election rules also require candidates to be nominated by 100 eligible voters, a stipulation also intended to ensure candidates are serious.

Deposits, required in both federal and provincial elections, have been criticized by many politicians and voters as an unfair stipulation for less well-heeled candidates. Municipal hopefuls need only a specified number of nominators to appear on the ballot.

Helliwell agreed that a financial deterrent is "not such a good idea", adding he may press for its abolition in favour of demanding more signatures on the nomination forms. He thought this would be "political, rather than a financial deterrent" to a political decision.

Can't continue to downplay athletics

For many years, the male "locks" on the St. George Campus have cried in their beer about the lack of facilities and the inadequacies of the existing athletics program. Now, they have a chance to do something about it.

On today's back page (as we did Friday), we're publishing a 'referendum coupon' which can be completed and mailed free from any campus mail box. The tabulated results will be delivered to the university administration at Simcoe Hall, athletic administrations in Hart House and the Benson Building, and announced in The Varsity.

The controversy surrounding athletics on the main U of T campus has revolved around five related ideas: the lack of adequate facilities for the men's program, the undemocratic organizational structure of the men's program, the non-co-operation between the men's and women's administrations with respect to programs and facilities, the understaffed and badly financed School of Physical and Health Education, and the inadequacy of response by the university administration to athletics on this campus.

Everyone coming into contact with the Hart House facilities realizes how woefully inadequate they are, yet coaches, athletic administrators, and, above all, students, have failed to channel dissent in the proper direction — toward the university administration at Simcoe Hall.

The university has demonstrated in recent years — through its reaction to the library, day-care, and more recently math sit-ins — that its unwieldy bureaucracy only reacts to confrontation, and ignores or short-circuits every appeal "through the proper channels".

Athletic administrators such as athletic director Dalt White have been pounding their heads against the brick wall of an imaginary building which has now been "seriously" talked about for 10 years. And White and other Hart House administrators appear to be content to follow students (ironically, since they fall to follow students in other matters) rather than lead them. White has said that until there are complaints from students the program will stay much the same. Hopefully, a referendum will bring results.

New athletic facilities have been constructed at almost every university in this province over the past 10 years. The University of Toronto has had several architectural plans for a new men's athletic building drawn up, but has been forced to scrap them, apparently because of a lack of funds. Most other universities however have had their athletic facilities paid for almost totally by the provincial government. Queen's and Waterloo universities have had new facilities constructed with government funds, as have Laurentian, Waterloo Lutheran, Carleton, and Ottawa. Even Scarborough College, with enrolment under 3,000 has a gymnasium superior to that found on the St. George Campus. It should be somewhat of an embarrassment at Simcoe Hall.

The provincial government's mismanagement and poor planning again helped to can the building — a victim of last fall's budget freezes on university capital construction. Now, no one seems to know if or when a building will be constructed to ease the pressure on the existing antique facilities.

Isn't it about time the so-called administrators at Hart House — White, UTAA assistant director (administration) David Tinker, and UTAA president George Wodehouse (how can the Director of a Health Service become head of the athletics program?) — and, most important of all, the students using Hart House facilities, found out what the university intends to do, and why the building has once again been deferred. The referendum might give some indication of opinion on this campus.

Vice-president and provost Don Forster has been little more than a thorn in the side of progressive change in university athletics. The overabundance of presidentially appointed faculty members on the UTAA Directorate have joined with Forster in deferring proposals.

And internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway, generally responsible for athletics under her student services portfolio, seems incredibly naive as to what goes on at Hart House. Her questions at Internal Affairs last week indicated her ignorance of the subject.

Besides the blockage within the administrative bowels of the university between Simcoe Hall and the men's athletics side, there's also the internal squelchiness. The anachronistic Athletic Directorate, as we have attempted to show in our recent features, is undemocratic. The students pay for well over half the athletic program, yet the UTAA constitution only allows for seven student seats on a 20-man directorate. (Meanwhile, the women's athletics directorate contains 15 athlete students out of a total of 22 members.)

Students on the Directorate aren't forceful enough and allow themselves to be pushed around in "supposedly" managing a program they pay for. The older members on the directorate — until last year separated from the student members by the term "senior" — act in a very paternalistic fashion, allowing students to arrange for such important priority items as the annual athletic dinner. Last year's student members even said — as recorded on the athletic directorate minutes — that they didn't feel that student representation on the directorate should be increased.

There is even talk that next year's directorate president will be a (token) student member. White and Tinker told The Varsity that they support the principle of a student majority on the directorate. However, neither have put much effort into changing the constitution so far.

Even the athletic directorate meetings — held twice a month during the academic year — were, until yesterday held in "star chambre"-like procedures with closed meetings.

The student elections for directorate members are being held today under an undemocratic "electoral college" system. The system offers disproportionate representation (two seats) to the major intercollegiate sports — basketball, football, and hockey — while allowing the 18 minor sports (two seats), and the colleges and faculties (one seat).

The directorate has also avoided establishing priorities for its athletics program — for example whether or not competition is to be emphasized over recreational and instructional athletic pursuit.

The men's intramural program is dynamic and flexible by comparison, even if competition is overemphasized by the students in the program, but it lacks the facilities and funds. Why, for example, are there so few basketballs for recreational use when the intercollegiate teams get so much "free" equipment from the student body?

In recent years, the UTAA has had some progressive, open-minded coaches enter the fold. However, the existing structure in which they work is oppressive and frustrating, to say the least. If the situation doesn't change, coaches may choose to go elsewhere.

A third impasse exists between the men's and women's programs and facilities. Women's Athletic Director Anne Hewitt claims she is receptive to the idea of men using the relatively luxurious facilities at the Benson Building under controlled conditions. However, her administration continues to obstruct the use of the building — not in principle, but in fact. And, this further complicates any co-operation between the men's and women's programs.

In our opinion, Hewitt and company have their priorities correctly defined — that is, participation, instruction, and competition, in that order — but they are totally antagonistic to the men enterring "their" building. The leotard sports at the Benson only maintain the status quo of women in our society — non-competitive, male-dominated, and, generally, oppressed. They are "ladies" first, and "women" second.

The Tolke Oike was correct in writing an editorial last week advocating, as the authors put it, "Let the Boys in Benson . . ." The last sentence of the editorial said, "We firmly believe that it will take about 40 minutes after this paper hits the streets before the boys hit Benson". Unfortunately, it wasn't true. The Varsity thinks the men should walk into the Benson and start using the facilities. Hewitt told us last month that she wouldn't call in police if the men attempted to use the building.

And connected to both the men's and women's programs yet separate from them is the School of Physical and Health Education. The school is poorly financed by the administration and the women instructors from the Benson Building teach there at the expense of the WAA. The hidden administration budgets between the UTAA, the WAA, and the school are too complicated for anyone but an accountant to figure out, and probably serve to confuse the situation and maintain the status quo. The university continues to neglect the school.

The Varsity supports athletics at this university. But we do disagree with the quality and priorities of the programs. The Varsity supports participation over "spectatorism", a majority of student athletes on the athletic directorate with minority representation from other university community members. We also support the idea of co-educational physical education and athletic participation — a practice followed everywhere else in the province at the post-secondary educational level, university financial support for salaries, the maintenance of facilities, and the immediate construction of an adequate new men's building. These are realistic demands. They are minimal proposals to change an outdated athletic program. This is 1973.

Sees point of GSU objection

I read in The Varsity that the Graduate Students Union has called for my resignation from president Evan's Task Force on Academic Appointments. I note that the request for my resignation was contained in a letter to president Evans. No one has approached me directly. I would, therefore, like a few days to consider what my response should be. In the meantime, let me attempt to clarify the issue.

I agree with the GSU that members of such committees who are intended to be representative of a constituency should be selected only in consultation with that constituency or its elected representatives. For graduate students, the obvious body to be consulted is the GSU. The other elected representatives are the student members of university bodies such as the Council of the School of Graduate Studies, or the Governing Council. I was chosen from among the members of the SGS Council, presumably because I am the Humanities Division representative and therefore could serve to balance the interest groups on the committee. There are two legitimate charges to be levelled here. One is that while I am an elected representative of the graduate students, I was chosen for the task force from among other elected representatives by the administration — not by a caucus of those representatives. This puts my appointment in the same category as that of Governing Council member Paul Cadario to various committees, which, according to The Varsity, has been opposed by SAC and other student governors. The second charge is that the GSU and not the SGS Council is the representative body. Considering that the GSU Council holds regular monthly meetings for representatives of all departments to discuss graduate student concerns, while the SGS Council student members never meet by themselves, but only attend SGS Council meetings as individuals (back-benchers par excellence), it seems that the GSU is clearly the more representative body.

There is a third charge which could be raised, but I think it has little merit. That is, since I was acclaimed to my seat on the SGS Council on the strength of my two nominations, I don't represent anybody. But, this raises the question of why I was unopposed if there are more "representative" students available. (Indeed the other two seats for my division are now vacant.) I also invites corresponding scrutiny of the mandate of members of the GSU Council.

When I was selected for the task force, president Evans explained to me that I was not the choice of the GSU, but after considering the recommendations of both the GSU and dean Safarian, he had chosen me. Since the task force was a presidential committee, this choice was within his purview. What he asserted is his right (and obligation) to appoint as he sees fit, after taking whatever advice he saw fit. GSU president Wendy Le Blanc has complained that (1) Evans should have accepted the names the GSU recommended, and (2) if he wasn't going to, he should not maintain the "facade of legitimacy" by asking for recommendations. The legitimacy of these charges seems to hang on the interpretation one gives to the president's assertion of his right.

Soon after I was appointed, I addressed a meeting of the GSU Council to explain the nature of the task force, and my participation in it as the graduate student member. One of the questions I was asked at that meeting was to what extent I had sought the views of graduate students on the matters before the task force, so as to be a more representative member. I replied that, other than attending that GSU meeting, I had done nothing, and planned to do nothing. My conception of my role was to act as an individual from my own perspective, not to attempt to represent a lobby. My attitude is the same toward my position as SGS Council member. Not to act according to my own judgement seems mindless. That this is an elitist point of view, I am well aware. I offer it as grist for someone's mill. My opponents may also be horrified to learn that I have no firm views on tenure and review procedures for faculty.

In summary, then, I was pleased to have been chosen for the Task Force on Academic Appointments and intended to work on it to the best of my ability, mindful of its importance. I was also satisfied that the president had acted correctly in appointing me. However, the objection of the GSU has merit, and if president Evans makes no further statement about my appointment, I shall have to decide for myself whether it is right for me to remain on the task force. I would appreciate feedback from the student body as to my best course of action.

Large class may mellow May

In his letter to The Varsity of March 7, in which he referred to my conversation with him about my position in the mathematics department, Professor Kenneth O. May identified himself as an "advocate of greater student participation in university government and heavier weighting of teaching performance in staffing decisions". I am grateful that as a result of the occupation of chairman (George) Duff's office, professor May has gone on record in favour of these principles, which are at the heart of the mathematics reform movement.

Knowing that professor May has held forward-looking social views, and aware also of his past reputation as a concerned teacher and author, I naturally approached him about my case. I reported to him the problems I was having with the departmental administration, which came down on me for siding with students advocating a more flexible marking scheme in MAT 139 last March and April. I told him that I was also under pressure for opposing the 50 per cent final examination in MAT 130. (My position on the final exam in this course was, after countless hours of rallies and 11 days of the occupation, endorsed by the department's Service Courses Committee on March 12, 1973) Finally, I informed professor May that my efforts at establishing an open classroom environment had met with a good response from students, even though these efforts violated the chairman's common front" of faculty versus students.

Although he acknowledged that my grievances were genuine, professor May showed a surprising disinterest in first-year mathematics students. He casually remarked that he had stopped teaching freshmen after a bad encounter four years ago with a "bunch of architects" in MAT 100. He also claimed that it was useless for a "junior, part-time" teacher like me to challenge the authorities, and that clashes of principle over teaching should be avoided. In short, he said my case was hopeless, and bluntly advised me to quit and go somewhere else.

But even if professor May would offer no support, it remains puzzling why he should cast aspersions on me for building my case and joining it with the struggled against the autocracy in the mathematics department and its defenders in the upper administration. If all professors crawl away and quit when they are fired, then the university is going to be in much worse shape than it is now.

Part-time faculty in this university are in a difficult position. They constitute a cheap, exploited, and expendable labour force (my own salary for teaching 100 students in MAT 110 this year is $3,650) who can be used to perform the teaching duties of regular faculty who prefer to avoid what is to them the unpleasant task of teaching service courses. Part time faculty are safeguarded by no university procedures relative to biring and firing, and are not protected by the University of Toronto Faculty Association to which they do not belong.

Under these circumstances, I have taken my case to the mass of students on this campus, over 1,000 of whom signed a petition supporting David Spring and I. This has affronted some academics like professor May, who espouse progressive social principles, including militant strike action to preserve the jobs of workers struggling in capitalist enterprises, yet who are prepared to maintain an alliance of convenience with the establishment in their own affairs.

Professor May's letter in fact implies some nice distinctions between my own motivations for defending my employment as an undergraduate teacher, and the motivation by which he pursues his career. If my action is personal aggrandizement, what are foundation grants obtained by professors May, Duff, et al for their favourite mathematical projects? I do not begrudge them these grants, but they are irrelevant to undergraduates. My salary, on the other hand, goes exclusively for teaching first year students and in a real sense I sincerely believe that my interests in protecting my job coincide with the interest of students seeking better mathematics education.

Events will show whether the occupation was, a professor May terms it "a putsch that failed" or the beginning of a beneficial renewal of our commitment to democracy in the university and to the vital interests of students and faculty alike. As limited as they may be, the reforms in the Service Courses Committee are already giving part of this question. Meanwhile, I trust that professor May will heed his own advice and work to improve the channels of communication between mathematics students and faculty.

As a first step, might I suggest his join me at the workbench by volunteering to teach a big MAT 130 section next year.

If he returns to the classroom, I am confident that his views will mellow considerably.

Endorsers did him disfavour

Challenged before CHM 120 students as to whether "everybody" meant the general public or just members of this university, with respect to open access to the Roberts Library, H. Levitt cited the taxpayer's $43 million contribution to its construction as justification for their inclusion. Mr. Levitt has been done a disfavour by those members of the faculty who in the March 6 issue endorsed the Reform Slate which represents 'free and open access to the Roberts Library for members of the university', ignoring the public.

Such indifference to the needs of the taxpayer does not go unnoticed. The unkindest cut of all may not be the last reduction in university funding, but the next.

PECU for own, others

After months of preparation, petitions with 10,000 names, occupations, and finally arrests, the Senate last year ignored the pleas and refused stack access to undergraduates. Since then, the University of Toronto Act has endowed us with a new group of ruler who still continue to pass the ball back and from from council to committee to subcommittee. Yet, our eight student representatives sit meekly by and watch unsure of the correct action. In some cases this process is actually encouraged as in the case of the outspoken chairman of the Internal Affairs Committee, Paul Cadario.

There is no doubt we in need of a strongly unified caucus of students. This alternative has been presented by the Reform Slate who are running in the government council elections. The slate which is comprised of students from different parts of the university is pushing unification on a variety of key student issues.

These include a strong stance on open and universal access to the Roberts Library, fighting fee increases and cutbacks to avoid educational quality erosion, and pushing for parity on department hiring and tenure and tenure committees (the matter will be brought up next fall on council).

The candidates involved with the slate include our own PECU vice-chairman Howard Stein who will be strongly opposing the planned amalgamation of the political economy branch, Tony Leah, vice-chairman Howard Stein, who will be strongly opposing the planned amalgamation of the political economy branch library, Tony Leah, Eric Depoe, Richard Shabas, Phil Dack Howard Leviss and Mike Nannsch. The choice is yours, but if a strong student voice is to be heard above the din that choice must be the reform slate.

Davis' policies under fire

St. George is test for Tories

Tomorrow, the provincial riding of St. George will go to the polls in the first test of premier Bill Davis' government's popularity since the general election 17 months ago.

The by-election is required because Conservative MPP Allan Lawrence was elected to a federal seat in Parliament last October. Polls are open from 8 am to 7 pm.

The riding, which runs south of Bloor Street to the lakefront, from Avenue Road-Queen's Park-University Avenue to Parliament Street, includes Victoria and St. Michael's Colleges and the Married Students Residences on Charles Street. There is also a section running north and west of Bloor from Avenue Road to Yonge Street.

Adams vows to work with citizens groups

By ZOYA STEVENSON

New Democratic Party candidate Ellen Adams "warned" St. George constituents during a Monday interview, that if elected, "I will demand that groups work with me so that there is constant communication and feedback between them and Queen's Park."

She believes that the victory for the "reformers" in the municipal elections December 4, established the fact that "people power exists as a force which has not yet permeated the upper levels of government."

As a founding member of the Confederation of Residents and Ratepayers Association (CORRA), a vice-president of the Avenue-Bay Cottingham Ratepayers Association, and a special assistant to NDP members at the provincial Legislature, Adams is running on her record as a civic activist.

She says that in her 16 years at Queen's Park, she has already acted as an unofficial legislative representative, and if elected, will continue to represent the people of the St. George riding.

Adams charges that Conservative candidate Roy McMurtry's campaign around "community involvement" and the "preservation of neighbourhoods" is nothing more than "empty phrases" because "as a member of the Davis government, he would be part of the developer's government."

The municipal governments must have the power to refuse to issue demolition or building permits in order to prevent developers like Meridian (in St. James Town) blockbusting in accordance with their own interests, without thinking about housing shortages, or the community in which they build, she says.

Adams also feels that the university community has a lack of awareness about its influence in the city as a whole. She contends that "any major development in the university area affects larger numbers of people than only those who attend university."

"I am not bothered if educational monies are well-spent," she says, "but I am not impressed with the $43 million Roberts Library. It is a periscope-like fortress which intimidates people and is completely unsuitable to the area."

Neither is the candidate impressed with the fact that the Bloor Street Colonnade was built on Victoria University property, and is exempt from taxation as a result.

The Varsity—Chris Newell

Challenging the Tories: NDPer Ellen Adams.

"It's fine that buildings used for educational purposes don't pay taxes," she says, "but to hand over a tax exemption to a commercial enterprise is inexcusable. If Manufacturers Life builds on Victoria property, and is also given a tax exemption, then Victoria is exhibiting the tendencies of a developer," she continued.

"It's obvious that students didn't make these decisions," she says, "but I would like to see students taking more responsibility for them. She suggests that Victoria students involve themselves with CORRA to effect changes in the university's role towards the community.

Adams says that one of her major concerns in the election is the lack of educational services available, in relation to the Davis government's cutbacks in education and health expenditures.

She says the cutbacks are largely the result of a "lack of planning," and in education, a sub-conscious desire on the part of the government to do away with post-graduate unemployment by decreasing accessibility to post-secondary education.

The real effect of the present attack, Adams says, "is to make post-secondary education again the privilege of the rich." And yet she finds it "puzzling" that the cutbacks are happening under the Davis government, because as education minister, Bill Davis was "really interested in opening up education facilities in the province."

"The cutbacks are total madness, she charged, because as we can down in certain areas, costs rise in others. The laying off of the 48 caretakers at Ryerson only means that we pay out more in unemployment insurance and perhaps later in welfare, if the men don't find jobs, so why not let them keep their jobs and their dignity?" she asks.

Adams contends that cutbacks in health expenditures will unnecessarily put people out of work. She thinks that a shift in emphasis from active treatment beds in hospitals which cost from $85-$100 per day, to home-maker and home care which cost up to $65 per day less would not only keep people employed, but would lower expenditures.

In a recent press release, Adams states that the $50 million extra pumped into OHIP last December would not have been necessary if a constraint program had been adopted to discourage doctors from over-billing.

She declared the Davis government incurred the extra costs because it "shows greater concern for the welfare of the Medical profession than the people which may require its services."

"Amendments to hospital and medical care legislation between 1969 and 1972 effectively transferred the control of the public health dollar from the government to the medical profession," she claims.

Adams would have doctors paid a salary instead of fees because "many think of themselves as god-like creatures who don't have to answer to anybody, though there are those of the younger generation who are more community-minded."

The lack of day care services is an important issue in the election, Adams feels, because "it is still looked upon as a welfare service rather than a service needed by growing numbers of working women, who have become members of the work force in their own right."

She believes that day care should come under the jurisdiction of the municipal governments to allow for a "flexibility in methods which would permit people to become involved. Costs could be reduced through the encouragement of co-operative day," she says.

Adams supports the right of workers in the public sector to strike because "unfortunately people employed in the service industries are under-paid. Either we accept the fact that the work they do is vital, and not enjoyable, and pay accordingly, or we must face the fact that they will strike for a living wage."

As a staunch NDPer, Adams supports party leader Lewis' move against the Waffle last summer because "you can't have a party within a party." "But I also realize that there is no point in having a mutual admiration society for a political party and feel that left and right wings within the party can be positive influences."

McMurtry says he's not a yes-man for Davis

By LORNE SLOTNICK

"I wouldn't be a candidate if I was satisfied with the government's performance," says Roy McMurtry, Progressive Conservative candidate in tomorrow's St. George by-election.

However, despite this seemingly rebellious statement, McMurtry, a 40 year old trial lawyer, admits he "can't think of a major issue" on which he disagrees with the policies of the Davis government.

He advertises himself as "a strong new voice", trying to convince voters that by electing him they won't just be getting another body to add to the Conservatives' already large majority.

Rather, he sees his role, if elected, as someone who will "push" the government, make it "more aggressive in certain areas", more "progressive".

For example, he feels that the government should emphasize greater communication with the people. He dislikes the label "maverick", but says he "may be abrasive", especially when he "steps on bureaucratic toes."

McMurtry, who is closely identified with premier William Davis, is clearly the front-runner in a riding that has voted Conservative for over 40 years. St. George is one of the most diverse ridings in Toronto, including many groups such as students, winos, nurses, homophiles, tenants, and active ratepayers.

However, even though retired MPP Allan Lawrence was elected in 1971 with more votes than all his rivals combined, a Conservative victory this time is no certainty.

Unlike in 1971, both the Liberals and New Democrats have fielded well-known and respected candidates, Margaret Campbell and Ellen Adams. McMurtry feels that Adams is running the best campaign of his opponents, but that Campbell is the best known name of the candidates. With the government's fate not at stake, the results of the by-election are unpredictable.

Asked how he expects to fare with the large student voting group, McMurtry admitted there are reasons for students not to like the government.

"If students are only concerned with fees increases, then I won't do well," he stated.

But he says he is optimistic that students' concerns go "much farther" than provincial education policy, and predicts that if his workers can get across his other policies to students, he will "do all right".

McMurtry denies there have been any education cutbacks, maintaining they are only "ceilings". He said the province is spending more on education very year, so that it is unfair to talk about cutbacks. The "ceiling" for construction and renovation budgets is zero until further notice, while the Conservative government has also cut back student financing.

He argues that the education ceilings "don't have to affect the quality of education." In fact, he says, they could be advantageous, because they will encourage trimming the "tremendous amount of administrative waste."

McMurtry, a former U of T student who played varsity football with Bill Davis and John Evans, also complains that "students have been shortchanged" by lack of emphasis on teaching by faculty.

"The university should show less concern for the quantity of education and more for the quality," he added.

On the other hand, McMurtry feels that universities should be made more accessible, disputing the claim that fee hikes lessen accessibility.

"The vast majority of students can handle the fee raise", he argues, adding that needy students should be aided.

Despite the existence of provincial issues such as education, the by-election campaign has generally been centred around mainly municipal issues such as neighbourhood preservation, parks, and public transit.

McMurtry admits there has been "undue emphasis" on municipal issues, but denies he is at fault, even though his literature highlights issues which are popular with ratepayers' groups in the northern part of St. George. McMurtry is president of the Oriole Park Ratepayers and lives just north of the riding.

CP's Mossop wants higher corporate taxes

CP candidate Brian Mossop.

By MICHAEL O'KEEFE

The province of Ontario should raise corporate taxes in order to provide the necessary funds for expanded social services, according to Brian Mossop, the Communist Party candidate for St. George in tomorrow's by-election.

In an interview yesterday, Mossop claimed that "the main issues in this election are the Davis government's cutbacks in health and education." Noting that all the candidates "are talking about increasing social services," he stressed that only the CP platform had any concrete proposal for funding such an increase.

Mossop accused his opponents of side-stepping the funding issue by confining their attacks to bureaucratic inefficiency or administrative fat. He explained that, for example, salaries of all Metro school board administrators account for only one 10th of one per cent of the Metro school budget.

"Belt-tightening cannot provide the needed funds," he concluded.

Mossop insisted that taxpayers earning less than $15,000 per year are already overtaxed and that the government should shift the burden of its finances to big business.

He cited 1968 figures which showed that 80 per cent of Ontario total revenue came from personal taxes, while only nine per cent came from mining and business fees.

"If these business and mining fees were raised by one half," said Mossop, "the amount raised could have paid the total cost of post-secondary education, including tuition fees and a $1,000 stipend for each full-time student in Ontario."

Mossop cited the Alberta case as an example of alternative methods of financing higher education.

Under that province's Conservative government according to Mossop, the burden is being shifted from property taxes to an increased mineral extraction tax. He argued that "the corporations can afford to pay" and that they should be made to do so.

(Bill Davis' legislative secretary with special responsibility for resources, Darcy McKeough, recently criticized Alberta for not making enough use of its royalty powers).

Turning to the Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario (COPSECO), Mossop described its recent report as "fraudulent and contradictory"

"They talk about removing barriers to higher education," he said, "but at the same time they raise fees and propose an extremely regressive loan plan." He went on to say "the vague and utopian proposals in the COPSECO report serve only to mask the real cutbacks that it includes."

Mossop called for free tuition, emphasizing that it involves no giveaways.

"Since all wealth is created by labour, students pay for their education with past or future labour, even if the payment takes the indirect route of corporate taxes."

Mossop is supporting a wide range of somewhat less than revolutionary proposals, including a provincial supplement to the old-age pension, increased provincial aid to municipalities and to public transportation, and expanded OHIP benefits.

He feels that housing should be a provincial matter and that it should be a public utility. "Rent should be fixed at no more than 20 per cent of the income of the principal wage earner."

Mossop described the CP as seeking social change, not through radical rhetoric, but by addressing the important issues. The CP is thus trying to broaden its base, a task made rather difficult by what Mossop described as "gross discrimination by the big media."

Mossop is a U of T graduate history student who has been active in the Graduate Students Union. He has been acclaimed to its vice-presidency for next year, and has done extensive organizing work for the GSU, particularly for its Graduate Assistants Association, a proposed labour union for teaching assistants.

A member of the Communist Party since 1967, Mossop has been organizer of the U of T Communist Club for three years.

CPC-ML charges cops attack their workers

By GREG McMASTER

Campaign workers for the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) candidate in the St. George by-election are charging that Metro Police are making "unjust and illegal attacks" on them.

Mitchell Bornstein, speaking yesterday for Marxist-Leninist candidate Hardial Bains, said "we are only doing what every capitalist party is doing in this election" as he outlined several weekend incidents of harassment and arrest.

Party member Normand Lake, said Bornstein, was "physically grabbed and thrown into the police wagon" on Saturday, after he refused to stop putting up election signs at Yonge and Carlton Streets.

Bornstein said Law was beaten; "we don't how how seriously because he is still in jail".

That night police denied arresting Lake, and at a Monday hearing party representatives were "thrown out of court" when they to offer bail, said Bornstein.

He added that Lake was called "French-speaking scum" by police, "because he's a native of Quebec; even though he's a citizen of this country".

Bornstein said that "this kind of intimidation is not an accident. On the orders of higher authorities, a concerted campaign has been waged to intimidate CPC (M-L) from doing what every other party is doing in this election".

A total of six canvassers have been arrested for "offences" such as putting up signs and distributing literature, he said. "All the arrested comrades were beaten except the two women", declared Bornstein.

He described an incident Sunday afternoon in which two campaigners at Jarvis and Wellesley were "standing there talking, holding bags of campaign literature" when a police car containing four police arrived. The campaigners refused to show them their leaflets, which, said Bornstein, "they have every right to do".

One was then "grabbed by police, pushed against the car and thrown into the road," after which, said Bornstein, police ran after him and charged him with obstructing traffic. Further charges of causing a disturbance and assaulting police were laid at the police station, he added.

He said that the fact that the state is "so frightened of communists running in elections" is proof that in Canada there is "democracy for the ruling class and dictatorship over the working people and other oppressed people of Canada".

He described as "capitalist parties" the Conservatives, Liberals, NDP and "the so-called Communist Party", and referred to CP leader William Kashtan as "a revisionist cur".

CPC (M-L) claim that their candidate presents "the only real alternative to the existing social conditions", representing "the march of society forward from capitalism to communism through socialism". Their leaflets claim that "capitalist society has reached the end of its development" and is "rotting".

"Just like the feudal society of the middle ages was rotten and could provide no solutions for the problems of the people, in the same way capitalist society is rotten and can provide no solutions", they say.

What CPC (M-L) wants is "a socialist society which, at once, is opposed to the U.S. imperialist and Soviet social imperialist models".

"A lot of us", they say, "wonder why with all the means of modern production and science the majority of the people cannot have a decent living — housing, pollution-free environment, food and clothing, education and, most important of all, our initiative in our own hands. "Under the capitalist system, what assists the maximum profit of the monopoly capitalists is decisive, rather the basic demands of the people.

"The successive capitalist governments are part of the old society. They support U.S. imperialism, the worst criminals and gangsters the world has ever seen."

The Marxist-Leninists reject the NDP for creating illusions of "reforming the capitalist system". They feel "the majority of the working people can accomplish something in life if they have political power", and this can be achieved only by "the overthrow of the capitalist system".

Campbell says she "faces up" to the issues

Margaret Campbell of the Liberals denies McMurtry.

By PAT REDICAN

"The Davis candidate in this election seems to think that this election would be better fought on municipal issues," says Margaret Campbell, ex-controller, ex-alderman, defeated mayoral candidate and Conservative turned Liberal. "But the Davis candidate (Roy McMurtry) simply won't face up to the issues. I have tried to."

The issues, according to Campbell, all seem to boil down to the same thing: the "unconscionable" way in which the Conservative government has treated the people of Ontario.

Thus the fact that the provincial government is progressively taking on more responsibility in municipal affairs becomes "the mailed fist eroding the authority and the autonomy of municipal government".

Turning to student issues, Campbell says she consistently raised the issue of education cutbacks throughout her campaign. The Davis government's rationale for cutting back financial support "boils down to the disgusting way in which the government has treated students on this and other issues," she declares.

There are few important issues in this campaign; all three parties in their main pieces or literature and their addresses have steered carefully away from anything except the relatively safe ground of "community" control and the record of the Tory government.

Campbell's literature, for instance, talks about "the quality and kind of representation" as the main thing "at stake" in the election.

Her literature also stresses her record as "the spiritual leader of the reform movement" at City Hall and includes continual references to her municipal experience.

She was one of the early municipal leaders in opposition to the Spadina Expressway.

Campbell thinks that contrary to opinion both in and out of the Liberal Party, the Liberals are in a position to present a more effective opposition in the legislature.

"It was Albert Roy (Liberal Ottawa East) of the Liberal caucus who first researched the Fidinam affair and brought it up before the House. And he didn't end up having to make any apologies or retractions" says Campbell referring to prime New Democrat muckraker Morton Shulman.

What Campbell failed to mention was that Roy was willing to let the Tories off the book by asking for a departmental investigation instead of a royal commission. This meant that the Attorney General's office ended up investigating itself, no charges were laid.

Although Campbell claims that she received no promises from the party when entering the race ("The reason I joined the Liberals was because they are a democratic party") there has been much speculation on her political and career future. Certainly more than one Liberal worker sees "Maggie" as the answer to the problems of a badly failing provincial party—a new leader; on the other side there are reports of a supreme court judgeship offer from the federal Liberals if she is defeated.

But the possibility of defeat is very possibly the furthest thing from Campbell's mind; although she claims she has not looked carefully at her practical chances, she also says that, if the voters come out, she will win.

"I am strong from end of the ward to the other."

But it's not a municipal campaign.

Math struggle, open stacks are GC issues

By BRIANE NASIMOK

Third year medical student Aron Goldberg thinks that representatives on Governing Council should be "effective and responsible", which is why he is running for reelection.

Goldberg, one of two student governors seeking re-election, sees change coming to the university "by small steps, rather than radical transformations". He feels that the report of the Committee on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario is the "most important issue facing the council this year," the same sentiments he expressed during last year's campaign.

The biggest problem Goldberg faces is his lack of time to attend meetings. Some of last year's governors criticised Goldberg because he had not attended all of the student caucus meetings, and some of the council sessions, although he was considered "co-operative and always willing to work."

Goldberg acknowledged the problem of a medical student governor saying that any medical, dental or certain engineering students would have difficulty attending all the sessions of the council and its committees.

Goldberg sits on the Academic Affairs Committee of council as well as its Curriculum Standards Subcommittee, and the External Affairs Committee. Goldberg says he faithfully attends Academic Affairs, but the other two less frequently.

"Most students at the University of Toronto are ignorant about the Governing Council," Goldberg claims. "In the professional faculties, only four out of 7,000 students are running for council", he continued, saying this demonstrated students' "lack of interest".

In the past, the university was run by the Board of Governors, "a private club of narrow-minded, very wealthy, very influential businessmen," Goldberg said. With the Governing Council, now in its first year, Goldberg contends that the "arbitrariness of the administration" is curbed, "a contrast to the previous clique."

Sixteen of the 50 governors are appointed by the provincial government; only eight are students, while 12 are faculty members.

In response to the Reform Slate, Goldberg said the issues stressed by the slate; open access, no fees hike and student representation on hiring committees; are presently favoured by student governors, and that "results have been respectable."

He cited the fact that the proposed executive for the School of Physical Education was not passed by council because the director could show no reason for not having student representation.

Goldberg would like to see a "codification of student rights," which is especially important, he says, to students who are applying to a professional faculty. He would like students to be made aware of the exact procedures that are available for appeals processes, in cases such as suspicion of cheating and plagiarizing.

Goldberg would like to see greater student representation on the Governing Council and its committees. He said that one of the problems is to "get the student who sits on the committee to show up after the first few couple of meetings."

The problem of apathy, Goldberg said, is one of the most important facing students. "The only safeguard is an informed electorate," and if students continue to be apathetic, they are "only inflicting the problem on themselves."

SAC services commissioner Chuck Vickery feels that he could "do a good job, and represent his constituents (engineering)", if he were in The Varsity seriously undermined his presidential campaign, and appeared unprepared to discuss issues with The Varsity last night. He jokingly suggested that he stood for "apple-pie and motherhood", and that the paper should refrain from printing any comments on issues.

By JULIA ELCOCK

Third year math and physics student David Laughton, one of eight undergrads contesting two Governing Council seats in the arts and science constituency, says he supports "the goals enunciated in the math struggle", but did not support the tactics used.

Laughton's major interests next year will be "the Governing Council structural review report and what it may recommend". "Some of the structures need clarification," he said, citing the council membership. He said there should be equal number of teaching staff and students on the body.

"Students have just as much to say in officialdom as any member of the teaching staff," said Laughton.

For these same reasons, he does not support in camera discussion of the budget.

Laughton also felt that students should have more voice in "the hiring and firing of professors" so that "undergraduate teaching will be taken more seriously". He charged that the "academic life of the university is too professionalized". "Governing Council along with SAC has a responsibility to the Wright (COPSEO) report", said Laughton. He agrees with some of the recommendations, especially those which propose increased student aid, but feels that certain of the report's qualifications must be defined, such as the age of independence and the actual amount of the grant and loan scheme. Without these things, it is hard to tell, said Laughton, whether the report might not be a "ploy" to sneak in fee hikes.

"Open stacks may be obtained this spring," he said, but if they aren't he will continue to support the issue.

Laughton is a member of the Physics General and Steering Committees and the Arts and Science Faculty Council, among other committees. He was also a member of the math undergraduate affairs committee but resigned "because the committee was essentially powerless". Laughton was a representative to the founding caucus of the Arts and Science Student Union and has since been a delegate to the union. He also has had experience from working on the Ottawa school board education subcommittee in 1969-70.

GORD BARNES

Governing Council candidate Gord Barnes, a second year

sociology major, says that his approach to the council would be to be consistently prepared on as many items as possible "instead of concentrating on issues."

However, one of his major concerns is the teaching report that will come out next year from the Presidential Task Force on Academic Appointments.

Barnes feels that "anything less than parity between students and staff is inadequate" on the Governing Council. He thinks that there should be an equal number of students and faculty members on council (at present there are 12 faculty members)

He also feels that student governors should "keep in close contact with the student body". One of Barnes' priorities would be "keeping in contact with the college councils" and exercising his vote on the students administrative Council. (All four undergraduate student governors are automatically SAC representatives).

Barnes said that discussing the budget in camera is a "complete disgrace" and he added that it was "some indication of how much it's been cut by". "It is the kind of information that everybody should get a chance to look at" he said.

Gord Barnes

In a platform similar to the Reform Slate's, Barnes advocates open stacks in the Roberts Library and further recommends that there be "open and equal access to all campus libraries". He cited the Victoria library as one of the most backward because only Vic students are allowed to use it.

Barnes is this year's president of the Victoria University Students' Administration Council and a Vic rep on the Faculty of Arts and Science General Committee. He is also a non-voting member of the Vic Board of Regents.

Last year, Barnes was both a VUSAC and SAC rep and a delegate to the Arts and Science Student Union. He was also a Vic delegate at Ontario Federation of Students' meeting's.

Vickery feels that the Reform Slate has little chance of winning in the professional students constituency, "from indications" he has received.

Canada hops back into Vietnam: more complicity

ASIAN '73

By DON HUMPHRIES
Canadian University Press

Canadian "observers" are back in Vietnam now after another great power has withdrawn from the country. Although the Americans have not left Indochina — they've only pulled across the border into Thailand — perhaps in the next few months Vietnam will be freed of foreign occupiers for the first time since the initial French incursions occupied Da Nang in 1859.

No one can seriously believe Richard Nixon's claim that he obtained major concessions in the truce terms, or, as he put it, "a peace with honour". Looking at the proposed October text and the one signed in Paris on January 27, one can see the Americans obviously gave the concessions.

The Paris Accord stipulates the withdrawal of all American "troops, military advisors, and military personnel, including technical military personnel and military personnel associated with the pacification program", plus advisors from all para-military organizations and police forces within 60 days.

The original draft only mentioned withdrawal of troops, military advisors, and personnel.

The agreement makes no mention of the demand made by Nixon and Saigon dictator Nguyen Van Thieu to have all National Liberation Front (NLF) forces withdrawn north of the 17th parallel. After the Vietminh defeated the French in 1954, they agreed to regroup north of the 17th until after the holding of the free elections as agreed to in the 1954 Geneva Accords. (The Vietminh was a coalition of communist and non-communist nationalist forces who fought the Japanese — with American aid — and then the French to gain independence for Vietnam from foreign occupiers.) The election never took place because the dictator the Americans put in power, Ngo Dinh Diem, refused to hold them.

The 1973 Paris treaty calls for the release of the 300,000 mostly political prisoners in the Saigon regime's jails within 90 days. The protocol provisions maintain that all "civilian detainees must be treated humanely"; "they shall be protected against all violence to life and person in particular against murder, and forms of mutilation or torture and cruel treatment and outrages against personal dignity..."

Although the Americans and Thieu were demanding a 5,000 man heavily-armed control commission, the accords only provide for a force from Hungary, Indonesia, Poland and Canada with a maximum strength of only 1,200 troops. The force is supposed to do little more than observe and report disputes.

Hungary, Indonesia and Poland do not recognize the Saigon regime; they recognize only the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (DRV). Canada recognized the Saigon regime when it was established and the DRV only last February 7.

The agreement confirms the Geneva provision that the 17th parallel is only a provisional demarcation line and "not a political and territorial boundary".

Again, free elections have been guaranteed — if the present Saigon government can be trusted to co-operate in conducting such elections, considering its past refusals.

Canadian involvement in Vietnam is back virtually to where it started 20 years ago.

On July 21, 1954, the Canadian government received a message from the British and Soviet co-chairmen of the Geneva Conference announcing an agreement and brazenly stating that "an international commission shall be set up... composed of Canada, India and Poland".

Canada had not been told about the commission and did not even have copies of the agreement. Before accepting, the Louis St. Laurent government first consulted and received support and encouragement from the United States administration, according to a press release from the Canadian Department of External Affairs, July 27, 1954.

Although it was never officially stated, Canada was considered to be the representative of Western interests, while Poland would represent the communist position. India was supposedly the neutral chairman, but until recently sided with the Americans.

Canada's role on the original International Control Commission (ICC) can best be described as support for the Americans.

Before the French defeat at Dien Bien Phu in 1954, the French had established a virtual puppet civilian government in Vietnam within the French Union. The French Union, like the British Empire, was a development of the imperial policies through which the French government could essentially maintain its colonial rule. Bao Dai was set up by the French as emperor of Vietnam.

When the Americans replaced the French, they soon replaced Bao Dai with their own puppet, Diem. Diem was in the U.S. while the Viet Minh were fighting to end French colonial rule. Diem cancelled the elections and answered civilian dissent with imprisonment and torture. (The policy of repression was Diem's downfall resulting in the reportedly CIA-instigated military coup in November, 1963. The coup marked the first of five government changes within 18 months ending with the triumph of a group including current president Nguyen Van Thieu.)

Diem announced on July 16, 1955 that the Republic of Vietnam was not bound by the Geneva Agreements.

In August 1955, Canada provided Diem with a "false judicial basis" for renouncing the Geneva Agreements and the up-coming elections by submitting a minority statement to the Fourth Report of the ICC. The Canadian statement claimed that Saigon government was not "formally engaged" to carry out the terms of the agreement and therefore had a perfect right to call off elections.

The report had no foundation in reality.

France signed the Geneva Agreements of 1954 on behalf of the "Associate State of Vietnam", before the Republic of Vietnam was given its sovereign status.

The agreement contained a clause binding the signatories and their successors to the terms of the agreement.

The treaty with France establishing the Associate State of Vietnam as a sovereign entity stipulated the Republic of Vietnam would "take over from France all the rights and obligations resulting from international treaties."

But, treaties in international law are not binding on nations possessing the might to break them. Former U.S. president Dwight Eisenhower revealed in his memoirs the real reason for halting the elections:

"I have never talked or corresponded with a person knowledgeable in Indochina affairs, who did not agree that had elections been held as of the time of the signing, possibly 80 per cent of the population would have voted for Ho Chi Minh."

So, under the legitimizing cover of the Canadian report, the American crusade against the communist menace began to surface into full view.

Canada's next major contribution was the ICC Special Report of June, 1962. The report contended that "aggression from the North" was occurring. The theory was supposedly based on "conclusions" of the Legal Committee. These conclusions have never been presented to, nor have the sanction of the ICC or any of its committees.

The Canadians ignored well-documented violations of the agreements by the Americans and the Saigon regime. Only the insistence of the Polish representative ensured this documentation was included in the report.

The Americans used the Special Report as justification for their increasing intervention in Vietnam. A U.S. State Department white paper, "Aggression from the North", quoted the report to give its claim credibility.

The 1965 Canadian minority statement again quoted the report, or rather the "conclusions of the Legal Committee", as the basis for the claims of aggression from the North.

While the American and Canadian governments held the aggression theory as the undisputable basis for the massive intervention that followed, the aggression theory has been revealed as a convenient fabrication.

American officials cannot discredit the Pentagon Papers which show the facade that the U.S. used to justify massive intervention.

According to CIA reports, the Saigon regime had alienated the entire population by 1959. The anti-Saigon guerillas were people who lived in the south — not from infiltrators from the DRV. And, they were using weapons captured from Saigon troops against them. Until the Americans openly intervened with troops in 1965, the National Liberation Front needed no supplies or men from the DRV.

But, the Saigon regime depended heavily on American support and would have fallen if American troops and aircraft had not been introduced into Vietnam. The Americans were, and still are, supporting an unpopular, repressive dictatorship under the guise of protecting democracy.

Canada has backed the Americans continually throughout the war's long and dirty history.

The Gulf of Tonkin incident in August, 1964 which Lyndon Johnson used to get a virtual free hand in Vietnam is a good example. American warships supposedly were attacked without provocation by three DRV patrol boats in the Gulf of Tonkin. The Canadian government didn't seriously question the American claim.

General Ky who then ruled the south, openly boasted that South Vietnamese commando units were carrying out raids against key industrial and harbour facilities in the north during July that year. American destroyers collaborated with the commandos on their hit-and-run raids and the attacks had increased during July.

The DRV complained to the ICC on July 27 that American and Saigon warships intruded into its territorial waters and carried away 11 fishermen. The DRV lodged a further complaint on July 31, protesting the bombardment of two small islands by two Saigon patrol boats under protective cover of the U.S. destroyer Maddox. It is now known that the Maddox, at the time of the infamous August 2 exchange, was violating the 12-mile territorial water limit recognized by the DRV.

The bill passed by the American Congress, approving vast sums for escalation of American involvement in Vietnam, was actually prepared several weeks before the Gulf of Tonkin affair.

What was the Canadian government's response? Lester Pearson approvingly said, "The action taken (by the Americans) was a reaction to an attack made on the United States ships on the high seas."

United Nations secretary-general U Thant made repeated attempts in 1964 to get the warring sides to negotiate. A Newsweek magazine interview with Thant in December 1966 revealed:

"Early in September ... Thant sent his inquiry to Ho Chi Minh: would Ho agree to ... an unofficial dialogue? This was Thant's first contact with Ho since 1954. The message was oral, and it went through the Russians. Three weeks later, the Russians came back with Ho's answer. He welcomed Thant's suggestion, and he would send a Hanoi envoy to meet a Washington envoy. Thant reported to (American U.N. Ambassador Adlai) Stevenson. And Stevenson was elated.

"Then — the silence of Washington, once again. Thant felt no great alarm at first; the presidential campaign was on. But the silence persisted. Finally, with the end of the year, he had to go back to Stevenson in January of 1965. The ambassador was deeply distressed. He had been advised that Washington had made its own soundings — through Canadian channels in Hanoi — and had concluded that Ho Chi Minh had no interest in talking peace.

"To Thant, this judgment seemed unreasonable. For if Ho wanted private talks, how could he be expected to announce this to any inquirer? Moreover, the only possible Canadian source was Canada's representative in Hanoi on the International Control Commission. So Thant made his own check — with the highest officials of the Canadian government. They quickly confirmed his belief; their ICC representative dealt only with lesser Hanoi officials — with no direct access to Ho Chi Minh whatsoever."

Not long after, the bombing of North Vietnam began.

Did the Americans conceal U Thant's contact with Ho from the Canadian government, or did the Canadian government knowingly collaborate in the escalation of the war? Either way, the government kept silent when it knew the Americans were not telling the truth.

But, could anyone expect the government to act in any other way? On April 2, 1965, while External Affairs Minister Paul Martin was telling the House of Commons about Canada's "balanced position" comparable to that of the United Kingdom or the Scandinavian countries, prime minister Lester Pearson was south of the border at Temple University, reassuring Americans their motives were neither "mean" nor "imperialistic", but "honourable".

"The government and great majority of the people of my country have supported wholeheartedly U.S. peace-keeping and peace-making operations in Vietnam," he declared.

This was a remarkable statement for Pearson to make, especially when he must have known: first, the U.S. had resisted the efforts of U Thant and the French to effect a reconciliation among the Vietnamese themselves in the autumn of 1963 and thereafter; second, the U.S. had spurned a reconvening of the Geneva Conference in July of 1964; third, the United States ignored U Thant's plan for secret negotiations in the autumn of 1964; and fourth, the United States had refused to approve a reconvening of the Geneva Conference in January and February of 1965.

Lester Pearson and Paul Martin have left the Liberal government to be replaced by Pierre Trudeau and Mitchell Sharp. Has there been a change in policy?

According to Sharp, "Canada is not a supporter of either side in this tragic war."

Unfortunately for Sharp, actions speak louder than words and Canadian actions have been heavily pro-American.

Several factors support this conclusion. One is the large number of arms shipped from Canada to the U.S. to feed the ultimate machine of destruction. Another is the diplomatic recognition and monetary aid the Canadian government has given to the Saigon regime.

Canadian industry has given considerable military support to the U.S. for the Vietnam war. Until this year, the government refused to release a list of companies who received military contracts from the Pentagon.

The situation results from the U.S.-Canada Defence-Sharing Agreement of 1959. The agreement gives Canadian companies a special position in bidding for war contracts. Canada already had "defence" agreements with the U.S. through NORAD and NATO at the height of the Cold War.

Project Anti-War, a Montreal group, released a study of Canadian economic involvement in American militarism in October, 1972. The study was appropriately called "How to Make a Killing" and was compiled by a group of McGill University students and professors.

"How to Make a Killing" attempts to list all Canadian-based companies receiving military contracts from the Pentagon. The Canadian government at first refused to release any names, so the group went to the Pentagon for the information. And, they got it.

When contacted by the study group, the Canadian government refused to divulge any names of companies holding military contracts with the Americans. After the study group obtained the information from the Pentagon, the Canadian government released a list of the companies. But, it still refuses to release names of companies holding contracts directly with the Pentagon. The government's official position is that to release such information would "affect the competitive position of the companies concerned."

The government's position appears credulous when the Americans are more than willing to release the list of the companies.

The group also had much difficulty establishing the ownership of many of the companies because only incomplete information is available to the public.

The total value of military contracts each worth more than $10,000 awarded to Canadian-based firms since 1959 is $540,539,535. The total value of awards from 1969 to 1971 going to companies whose ownership the study could identify was $83,050,727. Of this amount, $71,628,727 or 87 per cent went to American-owned companies, while another $1,035,000 went to European-owned companies.

The official rationale for the defence-sharing agreement is to provide support for Canadian business.

Most unclassified contracts are routed through the Canadian Commercial Corporation (CCC). The study was unable to identify recipients of $485,355,202 in sub-contracts.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has a Defense Industry Productivity (DIP) program that, coincidentally, has also been in operation since 1959. The purpose of DIP is to provide money to companies in the defence industry so export sales can be increased.

During the period from 1967 to 1971, 154 companies received $458,643,906 under DIP. At least 45 of these companies are American-owned and received $224,492,428 or 47 per cent of the total. The figures could be much higher, but unfortunately the study was unable to determine the ownership of 52 of the companies involved.

One of these Canadian companies — Litton Systems of Rexdale, Ontario — is 100 per cent American-owned. Litton makes the weapons release system computer for the F-4 Phantom fighter, one of the world's most sophisticated fighter-bombers.

In 1972, Litton Systems of Rexdale was awarded one-quarter of a $3,025,139 research and development contract from the U.S. Department of Defense. The rest of the contract went to Litton in Woodland Hills, California, and Litton in Salt Lake City, Nevada. The contract is for ASN-92 Carrier Airborne Inertial Navigation Systems (CAINS).

In 1971, the Canadian government gave Litton Systems, which was the second highest contractor for the U.S. Department of Defense operating under the Defence Production-Sharing Program in Canada, a $8,051,000 subsidy for being in the war business here.

Litton's Pentagon contracts were $6,571,000 — substantially less than the Canadian government subsidy.

The American head of Litton Industries, Roy L. Ash, is now director of the Office of Management and Budget, a Nixon appointee who did not require Senate confirmation.

Litton management in the U.S. also strongly supports the Greek dictatorship and enjoys some of the largest Pentagon contracts in the world.

To promote research in Canada, our federal government awarded a total of $261.4 million and $229.2 million respectively of the years 1967-68 and 1968-69. The government spent $68 million and $72 million respectively for research and development in military science during those years.

A minimum of $30,786,000 was funnelled into Canadian educational and non-profit institutions by the U.S. defense department for military contracts on research, developmental, test and evaluation work from 1967 to 1971. A further minimum of $4,183,186 was granted for "basic scientific research".

These minimums are inaccurate and the true figures are unavailable. American senator J. W. Fulbright read into the U.S. Congressional Record on May 1, 1969, that the Pentagon would spend $9,769,340 on research in Canada. The official Pentagon figure is $6,816,802.

The difference is even more significant when one finds the Pentagon figure includes $5,831,000 granted to the Canadian Commercial Corporation in 1969. Fulbright's figures have only $114,000 going to the CCC.

What of our government's aid to Vietnam? Canadian government aid has only gone to the Saigon regime. It was approximately two million dollars between 1953 and 1966. More students have been accepted from South Vietnam for post-secondary education study than from any other country. There were more than 386 in 1967.

"A good portion of our aid was strictly for political purposes that were of no value to the people in the areas concerned," said David Anderson, new leader of the B.C. Liberals, and former administrator of the Vietnam aid program.

Mitchell Sharp, a former vice-president of the giant Brascan corporation, now occupies Paul Martin's position as external affairs minister.

In a Canadian Press report of December 18, 1972, Sharp said, "We've had direct word from Hanoi that they would like Canada to be a member of the supervisory commission". "They positively want us. They rely on our objectivity."

"We're not in touch with Saigon," the minister added. Sharp quickly retracted those incredible statements when pressed for an official statement. On January 2, 1973, an external affairs official said, "No formal invitation has been extended by the participants in the Vietnam negotiations to any of the four proposed members of the new commission".

Sharp told the House of Commons on January 17, 1973 Canada had definitely not received any request to participate on a truce force.

Sharp regularly consults United States Secretary of State William Rogers about Vietnam policy. The day after the Paris signing, Sharp flew to Washington for talks with Rogers.

No one — not even the Toronto Star — can believe Sharp's threat that Canadian troops will be withdrawn from the commission if the government is displeased with events in Indochina.

The Canadian troops are led by Michel Gauvin, a member of the old ICC. If there is dissent among observers, Gauvin has promised Canada will submit its own report. Hopefully, the reports will be founded more on fact than the reports of the old ICC were.

The press has publicized the eagerness of the Canadians to get into action on the truce lines. The eagerness included not waiting for the Joint Military Commission to provide transportation for the truce teams. (The commission is composed of all parties in the dispute.)

The first group of observers left Saigon February 5 for the provincial capitals of Hue, Da Nang, and Pleiku aboard a C-46 aircraft rented from Air America. (Air America is a front used by the CIA to carry out its operations throughout Asia. Although it's supposedly a private company, Air America has loaned U.S. Air Force planes and used American military flight and service crews and bases.)

Queried about the use of Air America equipment, a Canadian external affairs official bluntly stated the department doesn't care whose equipment it uses to do the job. The same official served with the ICC in Cambodia, where a coup, reported to have had CIA backing, toppled the generally neutralist Prince Sihanouk in 1970 because he would not support the Americans in the Vietnam war.

Although the ceasefire agreements have been signed and the Americans are leaving Vietnam, the war has not ended — it has merely entered a new phase.

Panelists agree with COPSEO recommendation

By JIM MARTIN

Panel members at yesterday's "federated colleges" forum on the Commission on Post-Secondary Education report expressed general agreement with recommendation 115, which urges equitable financial support to secular and church-affiliated colleges, but questioned the meaning of some of the recommendation's provisions.

St. Michael's College president John Kelly claimed that although the government grants for undergraduates at federated colleges now reaches those colleges through Simcoe Hall, there exists discrimination in the funding of capital (building) expenses and the small graduate theology programs at St. Mike's, Trinity and Vic. He thus welcomed the recommendation, which in principle would eliminate any discrimination that does in fact exist. However, he questioned two of the stipulations of the recommendation. One ensures that there are no religious barriers to admission and staff hiring; the other require that "Public Funds will not be used for religious indoctrination".

Kelly termed the latter of these insulating because he said "everyone knows" indoctrination is no longer practiced by any college. He questioned the motive of these provisions, since U of T's federated colleges already obey them.

"What do they want us to drop?", he asked, stating that St. Mike's only had a "different, intellectual and religious 'atmosphere', not a 'legislated' different, intellectual and religious 'atmosphere', not a 'legislated' difference".

Trinity vice-provost A. Dalzell and vice-president Goldwyn French both agreed that some forms of financial discrimination did still exist against the "affiliated" colleges, and that the elimination of this is an important part of the COPSEO report.

Dalzell claimed that Trinity receives only about 17 per cent of its total operating costs in provincial grants. He hoped that the implementation of COPSEO would end the "second class citizen" status of religious-affiliated colleges.

The existence of affiliated institutions was defended by French who stated that "we are committed to pluralism in a liberal society". He maintained that the availability of an education at a somewhat independent, autonomous college helps break down the "monolithic, homogenized" university structure.

Victoria University SAC president Gord Barnes said that he was encouraged by the provision that "church-affiliated colleges such as Vic would be required to have direct and significant representation of students and faculty on their governing bodies to qualify for full grants."

VUSAC is pressing for implementation of a college report recommending faculty-student parity on Vic's Board of Regents. Changes to the composition of the regents would require revisions in the Victoria University Act, which some Vic members fear could lead to a lessening of the United Church's domination of the board.

Trinity student Murray Ewing feared that any COPSEO recommendations aiming to make the colleges more publicly accountable would bring them under the control of government policy. He contends that the university affair advisory committee recommended in the report would be dominated by its full-time chairman, a government appointee.

A student in the audience of about 60 at Brennan Hall attacked the pluralistic system of colleges at U of T.

He called the church-affiliated colleges redundant, saying that looking at them from outside, they seem to have no basic differences from the rest of the university.

Dalzell replied that "differences can't be made the dominant feature" of the affiliated colleges, but that the capacity for difference from the rest of the university was enhanced by their autonomy. The vice-provost had previously agreed that diversity among colleges was desirable.

Ontario will not give up power, says U of T prof

The Commission on Post-Secondary Education's associate secretary predicted yesterday that "there is a real chance that the government will not give up its powers" as advised to in the commission's report.

H.L. Dyck, also a U of T history professor, was addressing about 50 people in the Galbraith Building in the COPSEO moratorium session on "Governance and the teaching-research split."

Dyck agreed with U of T philosophy professor Chuck Hanly's fears that a power struggle will result if the Ontario government accepts the commission's recommendation to set up a Council of University Affairs. The council would have the power to allocate funds, now held by the government, as well as act in an advisory capacity.

Hanly, also a member of the Governing Council, predicted that the government may balk at giving up some funding powers. Even if the province agreed to this recommendation, he feared it would attempt to control the council.

Another U of T faculty governor, political economist Harry Eastman, said that there were "dangers" in separating research and teaching funding, as recommended by the commission. Eastman pointed out that a separation "gives rise to a new bureaucracy" and that the "distribution of research funds on a political basis" may result.

He thought the formula basis of funding may be undermined and that cuts in grant would be made easier when funds were separated.

Dyck thought "the formula system was equitable for funding institutions." "The reason for separation is clear," even though the separation of research and teaching grants may be complicated, he said.

Dyck believed the central issue was that institutions tended to drift into a homogeneous mass.

For example, universities in northern Ontario tend to do the same type of research as universities in southern Ontario, he said.

According to Dyck, universities should concentrate on areas of research which best suit them.

Dyck added, "the commission would change this" by splitting grant funding in order to better satisfy social needs.

Dyck said the recommended funding system would maintain post-secondary educational institutions' independence "and at the same time permit planning and direction" by the council, which would specify what proportions of an institution's grant is to be spent on research and teaching.

Specific projects and areas of concentration would still be determined by individual institutions, Dyck said.

He thought that separation of funding would result in both better research and better teaching. Some people were gifted in research ability, while other professors were good teachers, he thought.

"In the main, this is not recognized at all," said Dyck.

Vic student David Laughton suggested that the University of Toronto was "trying to form a graduate university of Ontario," causing undergraduate education to become secondary.

Dyck replied, "It is essential that some institutions have more research than others."

He said that with in the international educational framework, prestige should be taken "very seriously". According to Dyck, "we have failed in our responsibilities" to create a strong research centre.

Dyck added that in recent years at U of T, "undergraduate instruction has not suffered but has actually improved."

At one point Eastman said the COPSEO report as described by Dyck was "not only adequate but encouraging."

Eastman said that the Commission recommended only a minimal increase in student fees, which proposes that students pay one-third to one-half their education costs. In the case of professional students, tuition could rise to close to $2,000 under this plan.

He thought the increases would raise approximately three million dollars.

Dyck was asked if the report was a "smoke-screen" to cut back provincial funding of post-secondary education. Dyck said that teaching was a provincial responsibility, but suggested that the province could demand research money from the federal government if there was a separation of funding.

Dyck also said that nothing in the commission's report suggested that there be cuts in education expenditure. He said "irresponsible" estimates about the growth of education expenditures about five years ago caused some people to panic. Over the next 20 years, provincial expenditure on education is "not expected to rise at all," he concluded.

Relate student struggles to workers: NDPer

By GREG McMASTER

"Student struggles must be related to what is happening in the workers' movement, which in turn must be related to international capitalism itself", said Left Caucus spokesman Steve Penner at a weekend conference of leftist students in Peterborough.

He told the students that increasing strength of the Japanese and European economies have closed the gap between them and the U.S. "in some key sectors of the (world) economy".

The traditional disparity of wages between the U.S. and the rest of the world, the growth of competitive European multi-national corporations, and the expense incurred by the United States' financing of counter-revolutionary forces and wars in the third world have produced a deficit of payments for the U.S., resulting in "reduced competitive advantage and reduced foreign policy manoeuvrability", said Penner.

"Increased rivalries between the various imperialist economic powers", he said, would lead both to "threats to workers' standards of living, which are based on imperialist profits", and to "reduced abilities to pacify militant workers". This will result, he predicted, in "more attacks on the working class", such as the wage freeze in Britain, wage restraints in the U.S., and Trudeau's deliberate unemployment policy of 1969-70.

Although workers' resistance has been in the past been "defused by integration of the labour bureaucracy into the state", Penner suggested that an "increasingly larger section of the bourgeoisie demands a harder line against the workers' movement", including speed-up production, "more and more repressive labour legislation", and "privately-financed repression such as fascist goon squads in Europe and strike-breaking companies here".

Although "massive deficit spending" has moderated the "gap between the productive capacity of society and the purchasing power of the working class", replacing depressions by recessions, the long-term result has been "institutionalized inflation" and unemployment.

Consequently, he said, the state is taking more "responsibility for protecting corporate profits," through incentive grants and more social welfare. This has entailed more public service employment, which, although it has partially alleviated unemployment, causes "an enormous public financial burden", leading to "a growing fiscal crisis", said Penner.

Since the slate "must either play less of a role in serving capitalism or else reduce spending in areas it considers less than essential", public service workers, hospitals, and students will be the first to suffer from decreases in spending, he suggested. Research and development and manpower retraining programs will be supported, but other educational sectors will be "abandoned", according to this scheme.

"The front edge of the attack on the working class has been in the public service sector", said Penner, but moves to ban strikes and "effective wage freezes have only led to rapid growth of militancy and unionization".

He referred to a liaison between students and workers in Saskatchewan who "see common problems", and said that the education cutbacks are a "small part of a" "small part of a general social crisis of capitalism. The development of a strategy must be done in this context".

The conference, sponsored by the Trent Student Union, and the Old Mole, among other groups, included students from eight Ontario Schools.

There was general agreement among participants that the Ontario Federation of Students had limited itself this year to purely student demands on the lowest level possible.

U of T student Chris Huxley called for a political campaign "emphasizing solidarity both between isolated campuses and within the much wider context of student struggles". He added that a campaign based on purely "conjunctural" student demands "is doomed to stagnation".

"Either we should argue that each different sector in Canadian Society should pursue its own demands in its own way, or else we should try to see the links between these struggles, to see them as part of a totality".

African assails Portuguese wars

By FERNANDO TRAFICANTE

"Portugal doesn't even manufacture toy airplanes," but through NATO it obtains sufficient material to withstand major liberation forces in Mozambique and Angola, says Richard Van Lierop of the African Information Service.

Speaking about the liberation struggle in Mozambique at the Medical Sciences Auditorium last Thursday, Van Lierop charged "NATO has enabled Portugal to fight three colonial wars."

"Portugal has on a percentage basis a greater number of its army (in southern Africa) than the United States had in Indochina", he continued. The Portuguese are able to maintain their NATO commitment with one regiment of troops in western Europe.

Van Lierop explained that South African and Rhodesian troops are being used to protect strategic rail and road lines which go through Mozambique from these countries. Mozambique provides the shortest access to the sea for important areas of both countries.

Napalm was used in the early stages of the revolution against the Mozambique freedom fighters (Frelimo) Van Lierop claimed, but "herbicides are a rather recent development." He continued, "South African civilian pilots were hired to fly over liberated areas for 'crop-dusting' but the pilots discontinued flights when one plane was shot down.

Both South Africa and Rhodesia, as well as several major international corporations, have extensive investment in the Portuguese colonies. For example, Van Lierop said "Gulf Oil has turned Canada into the world's largest consumer of Angolan oil" due to the company's fear that exports to the United States would lead to reaction from the American black population.

The Portuguese must maintain political control of these areas as the only means of retaining some measure of economic combination, Van Lierop stated. In many former colonies European nations were able to surrender political control while retaining economic power.

The Portuguese government had announced a policy of settling over one million whites in strategic sectors of Mozambique as a line of defense against African nationalists' he claimed but they have been unable to obtain settlers. Many are frightened off by the guerrilla movement.

Economic Council steals work, says prof

A Trent University economics professor described Saturday how his research refuted the claims of economic theories which have been used to support the North American educational system, and then charged that the Economic Council of Canada has appropriated his work to justify cutbacks in education.

Sandy Lockhart, addressing a Peterborough conference for left students on "Crisis in Education", said that he presented his thesis to the council in 1970 as "a left critique" of education in capitalist North America. It surfaced in a council publication two weeks ago, said Lockhart, as part of an attempt to present in a favourable light "the rationalization of our education system" to further fulfill the needs of the economy.

He described how "ongoing changes in the production system" led to changed needs, and thus to changes in the educational system in the late 1960's.

"New kinds of workers" were required, he said, "for the continued success of the capitalist system, which is to say, the growth rate of the capitalist system".

The result, he suggested, was the development, originally by Chicago economist Milton Friedman, of the theory of "human capital," which viewed education as an investment which society, and students, should go into with a view towards a future return of "technocrats".

Lockhart said this was "a wish-fulfilling theory", which failed "a need to mystify the failure of previous theories". These included theories of free competition and free consumer choice, and of Keynesian economics, which, he said, rests on a series of false assumptions such as the independence of domestic economies from colonies". Friedman, said Lockhart, noted that one sector of the North American economy, the field of electronics, and aerospace technology, had immediate potential for advancement. Growth was not stymied by what classical economists call a "bottleneck of capital goods" (machines), and so it was concluded that there must be a bottleneck of brainpower.

Thus the theory of human capital, when applied to create massive expansion in some sectors of education, would provide "the necessary accoutrements to the new innovative industries", as well as pleasing sociologists who saw it giving an "instant answer" to the social problem of equal opportunity, which Lockhart described as "the theory that everyone has an equal chance to end up unequal".

Lockhart claimed that his economic research had proven invalid several justifications given by the human capital theorists. "As economists of the econometric school often do, they noted a high correlation and mistook it for a causality" when they announced that an increase in educational level led to an increase in the productivity of North American workers he said. Lockhart said employers had accepted this notion and hired more educated people, although higher productivity probably stemmed from America's then-advantageous position with respect to world markets and levels of technology.

Laughter broke out in the audience of about 75 students when Lockhart reminded them of the cliché of earlier years that more schooling led to better chances of employment. "Real occupational needs did not require the kind of educational levels demanded by employers", he said. "Higher education became more and more a barrier to employment", resulting in people with less education being "bumped down" and educated people being considered overqualified.

"As each new level of technology is introduced, there is a brief increase in demand for skills to operationalize this, followed by a large decrease", he added.

He pointed out that the great demand for engineers in the 1960's has been followed by a period of low demand for middle managers and junior engineers. Unemployed engineers in Seattle recently received a care package from a city in Japan, he noted.

Lockhart also criticised the Economic Council of Canada for "the idiocy of how they make predictions". The assumptions of most manpower planning models, he charged, are "totally out of touch with reality".

Also responsible for the implementation of the human capital theory, said Lockhart, was "cold-war hysteria" and "the need for penetrations or world markets" by the North American economy. He referred to a best-selling book written by Dwight Eisenhower advisor and ex-Harvard University president in the 1930's which dealt with "Soviet competition" and "the relation between education and the welfare of the U.S."

The book expressed interest in "friendly free-world markets", or, said Lockhart, "as Marxists would say, taking off surplus value from the hinterland and returning it to the metropolis".

Lockhart suggested that this view of education as developing human capital "offered students a mobility route", but in fact "reinforced existing class traditions".

His research, he claimed, demonstrates "why things aren't working", and why "higher education further exacerbates stratification levels" in society. Although the Economic Council did not publicise his thesis at first, they have now polished it up and printed it, in order, says Lockhart, "to justify cutbacks in social expenditures on education".

The real reasons for these cutbacks, he suggested, lie in "the fiscal crisis of the state", which, he added, "certainly concerns a lot more than the universities".

The state, he said, is faced with "the breakdown in the human capital theory", rendering "economically unsound" any further investment in education. There is also a "social crisis" developing from unfulfilled expectations and the "proletarianization of student" into the work force.

In the face of this, Lockhart cautioned the students present not to formulate demands "that present us as arguing for the status quo, for retention of the present situation". We should, he said, ask "how we can link up with other oppressed people. We have to demand control of the institution by workers and students, and must bargain on an industry-wide basis."

Budget planning made easier

The introduction of "slip-year" financing of post-secondary educational institutions will allow U of T to plan its budget with greater certainty, says institutional relations vice-president Jack Sword.

He noted that the plan to pay universities grants based on enrolment in the previous year, rather than the current year, as is now the case, "allows more stability" in planning since the university does not have to estimate its income for the next year.

The change was announced recently by colleges and universities minister Jack McNie in response to university complaints that not only could they not predict their budgets accurately, but that the province had encouraged them to overbudget by insisting that enrolment would not fall off to the extent that it has.

Provincial grants are dispensed on a per-student basis; universities with leveling off or declining enrolments have found themselves in perilous situations as costs continue to increase.

The new system alleviates the squeeze for institutions with declining enrolment, as grants will be based on the previous year's figures, not current enrolment. In addition, McNie stated that "certain adjustments" will be made in the 1973-74 year as "transitional" payments to institutions who are still expanding.

And, even institutions whose enrolment has declined during the past two years will be covered, because in such cases the province will use the 1971-72 year as the basis for calculating grants. It remains to be seen whether the government will increase the per student grant, the Basic Income Unit (BIU), to sufficiently cover rising costs.

Sword said that as the long range predictions for U of T are for little growth, the university's income will not be greatly affected by the change in financing methods. Other institutions, particularly the newer universities such as Brock and Trent, may find the system is more helpful in sustaining them.

However, Sword expressed concern that Scarborough and Erindale Colleges are expected to continue to expand, which may mean a time lag in increased grants to cover costs that rise earlier. The special grants were announced only for the 1973-74 transitional year.

But in any case, Sword pointed out, the whole scheme is likely to be applied only for a short time, as substantial changes are envisaged by the Commission on Post-Secondary Education.

The government's apparent generosity comes after substantial cutbacks in student and university financing, in addition to complaints that the financing was not satisfactory in the first place.

A mounting wave of protests both from students and universities may have been at the root of the government's province's change in financing. The slip-year method of financing, with the condition that emerging universities be given special grants, was a suggestion of the Council of Ontario Universities.

However, the freeze on capital construction is still continuing with no end in sight.

And, Sword said, he thought the province has not yet even acknowledged U of T's request for special grants for badly-needed renovations to some existing buildings, among other projects, men's athletic and Innis College buildings, among other projects, depends in part on whether or not the university is forced to dip into general revenue to carry out essential renovations.

Posting nude pic is no protest

If The Varsity cares to attack the sexism of medicine teaching or that of engineers and their news paper, it may well take a look at geographers these present days. The picture included here is one among many posted in the graduate lunch room for geographers in Sidney Smith and no doubt is meant to make female students feel most at ease.

The posting of this collection of pictures in the Taylor Room was meant as a retaliation for one of (department chairman J. Spelt's action — him denying the right to a technician of the department who owns the pictures to have them up in his private office in the Borden Building. However, it may be said that such a Mickey Mouse type of student protest shows a lack of seriousness, a lack of consideration, and a definite lack of taste.

If the graduate students were considering it a matter of principle to defend the right of an individual, they could take effective courses of action: complain in group to the present chairman for mistreatment of staff, go higher up the hierarchy, or open the matter to the public. A policy of annoyance without any political action is a non-policy and only serves to discredit the student body and reinforces professor Spelt in his decision and general course of action. Furthermore, such behaviour ignores completely the feelings of the female minority and does not say much about the value of defending the feelings and right of one male individual.

This is exactly what prof said

I recently have been misquoted in The Varsity and would like to set the record straight. I did say that I thought that Salaff and the occupiers had done me and the mathematics department a favour by stimulating serious discussion of decision-making procedures in our department.

I did not say or imply that the decisions regarding the three dismissals are likely to be reviewed. On the contrary, I am not at all confident that any new procedures will lead to a dispassionate review of these cases (although I am strongly in favour of such a review myself). Also, I have not in any public utterances quoted any of my colleagues (and I wonder what made your reporter think I had).

I appreciate the opportunity to correct any false impressions that misquotations may have given.

Prof Peter Rosenthal (Matb)

Not their fault they surround it

The letter of Professor Morris Wayman (The Varsity, February 19) has avoided the issue raised by the Arab Student Association and has drawn an image of the Arah world in a subjective and impressionistic manner.

It would have been more significant had Professor Wayman criticized our view that there is no humanitarian justification for putting pressure on USSR to open the door for the Jews in order to immigrate to Israel. Such an immigration would not only increase the possibility of war and probably make it inevitable, but also would increase the Israeli pressure on the Palestinians living there to leave the country. If the Jewish immigration from the USSR would lead to such effects it is our opinion that it cannot be justified on the basis of humanitarian principles.

Also, the letter of Mr. Wayman was subjective and impressionistic because it did not reach beyond his immediate sight. For instance he says that the "harsh", unpalatable fact is that the Jewish Israelis stand in mortal danger from religious fanatics in the Arah World spurred on by greedy feudal barons and power-bungry politicians and military men. That "the Jewish Israelis stand in mortal danger" is not very difficult to see, but that the Jewish Israelis stand in mortal danger from religious fanatics in the Arab world" is not as easy to see. It seems an oversimplification of the issue.

It is a geographical and political fact that Israel is surrounded by Arah states. But is this a mistake on the part of the Arahs, that they surround Israel? Should the Arah states withdraw into an invisihle world so that the Jewish Israelis can escape the mortal danger: In fact, the Jewish Israelis are not in danger because they are surrounded by Arab states but because they have usurped one of the Arab nations, they have taken the Palestinian land by force, killed a great number of the Palestinians, drove another number, and dominated the rest. Therefore, the responsibility of the danger of the Jewish Israelis cannot be thrown on "religious fanatics in the Arah world". This is deception. The responsibility falls on the shoulders of those who created a Jewish nation on the bodies and despite the wills of the Palestinians themselves.

It might be true that there might be some religious leaders who are fanatics and some greedy harons — and our intention is not to make them immune from criticism, but this does not mean that they are the source of danger for the Jewish Israelis and it is quite unrealistic to make them the sole responsables for that while ignoring the role of the Israelis themselves in creating the danger for themselves as well as creating the opportunity for some religious leaders to be fanatics. In addition, couching the danger in religious terms has the disadvantage of isolating oneself from the real nature of the issue between the Palestinians and the Israelis.

The Arab Student Association

Thinks Israelis after more land

I take issue with a letter appearing in The Varsity, February 23, entitled "Israelis only want homeland". Let me remind the writer of the following points:

1. The Zionists in the past 21 years have occupied by force of arms 33,000 square miles of Arab territory and in the process dispersed over a million Palestinian people and directly subjugated thousands others. As ex-United Nations Commissioner-General of UNRWA John Davis wrote in the Evasive Peace: "The extent to which the refugees were savagely driven out by the Israelis as a deliberate masterplan has been insufficiently recognized." Zionist leader Moshe Dayan himself admitted that "without iron helmets and cannon, we would never have been able to plant a tree or build a house" (Le Monde, July 4, 1969).

2. Palestinians call today for the establishment of a democratic, secular, and socialist state in Palestine in which Christians, Jews, Moslems, and humanists would live in co-operation and equality, as opposed to the Zionist concept of a racist and clerical state based on the expulsion of the indigenous population.

3. The hattle in the Middle East is not between Arah and Jew, hut a contest for supremacy in that area of the world between the liberation movement on the one hand, and imperialism on the other. The struggle for the emancipation of the Third World has reached a new phase, and this is what gives the Palestine Liberation Movement a cosmic dimension. This is clearly perceived by the left in this country, some of whose leaders (for example, from the Quebec lahour movement) visited the area and pledged support for the Palestinian revolutionary cause.

4. Racism (including anti-semitism) is not a problem of human nature, but of capitalist society. This why Jews should break from Zionism, forge links with the Palestinian movement and with the progressive forces in the rest of the Arab world who are in the anti-imperialist camp, and struggle with them to build the new society of tomorrow along the road of the emancipation of all humanity.

Hedi Mizouni

Slow reaction to downing

In response to a number of criticisms in regard to the question of a "double standard" when considering the Middle East, I would like to point out that rarely has it been so obvious as in the last while. The shooting down of an unarmed plane-load of civilians is completely inexcusable; yet reaction to this disaster has been slow in coming because the plane was an Arab one. One can well imagine the furor over the shooting down of a BOAC or Pan Am jet under the same circumstances, yet because it was a Libyan airliner, the whole event is dismissed as an "incident", an unfortunate event which was never meant to happen, etcetera. Yet, very revealing is the difference in stories emanating from Cairo and Tel Aviv, and the Israelis have been caught out a number of times with gross inconsistencies and subtle distortions within the story which they tell. If the Israelis really regret what happened, why are they not offering to compensate the families of the innocent victims, to the same very large extent as the money paid out to the victims of the Arab guerillas in Munich at the time of the Olympics.

Remember this Progressive Conservative ad from the 1971 election campaign?

Ever wonder why the P.C. candidate in St. George isn't telling students that "We're all in this together" in 1973?

Let's see what a vote for the PC candidate means:

- It means that you endorse the $100 fee increase.
- That you endorse the raising of loan ceilings.
- That you're in favour of cancelling summer allowances for Health Science interns.
- If you're a nursing student, it means that you support a fee increase of more than $1,000.
- If you're a graduate student, it means that you're in favour of an increase in your own fees.
- It means that you support the Wright Report's provision for total state control of the Universities.

Fiscal squeeze, Ryerson lays off 48 workers

TORONTO (CUP) — Ryerson Polytechnical Institute has laid off 48 maintenance workers in its latest attempt to alleviate its unstable financial situation.

The employees, members of local 233 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, received letters March 6, telling them of the news. No warning had been given before the announcement. Most of the "indefinite layoffs", as the administration coins them, become effective at the end of March. The jobless include 39 caretakers, two carpenters, three matrons, two painters and two pool operators. As stipulated in the CUPE contracts, the layoff will be conducted on a seniority basis. The letter to the workers, signed by the director of the physical plant department, read:

"As has been publicized, Ryerson, with most other universities, is experiencing some financial problems. In an effort to improve our situation all departments have been directed to reduce expenditures in the forth-coming fiscal year."

Administrators and the union have been in contract negotiations for several weeks without coming to an agreement. There is little doubt that a settlement is even further away after March 6's tough measures.

At an informal union meeting held after the layoffs were announced, Union spokesman Bud Moynes told the 60 workers present, that action had been inevitable because of Ryerson's 1.3 million deficit.

"Somewhere along the line," said Moynes, "they (the Institute) just ran out of money."

He said that the almost 59 per cent cutbacks in staff meant a cutback in cleaning by five times as much. Offices which are regularly cleaned once a day will now be taken care of once every five days, he told them, Moynes added that the Institute was not expecting to get the same maintenance it receives now.

Besides the Union maintenance people, Ryerson also hires several private companies to assist in the office cleaning. Several of the workers suggested that the private contractors be released and that the CUPE members replace them.

Moynes said this would be discussed at the bargaining table, but since the private cleaners cost less, he doubted that the Institute would agree to these terms. He also said that there was no provision in their contract to allow the firing of contracted workers and the replacing of them with union members, as in this case. However, under their agreements, contract cleaners cannot be hired to replace union members.

"It's a cutback," said Moynes, "and it isn't a matter of you people going out and somebody else coming in"

Many of the members believe the layoff is a tactic for weakening the Union's bargaining position or even breaking the local completely. Moynes, however, disagreed with this suggestion.

A spokesman at the Wednesday meeting told Moynes that the members voted on March 4 to have their bargaining team break off negotiations if any layoffs were announced. Moynes who had been unaware of this development, said he did not advise such action now, but would if the Union called for it.

Canadian, Quebec workers unite: Waffler

By ELEANOR COLEMAN
Ontario Waffle group spokesman

James Laxer declared last week that only an anti-imperialist alliance between English-Canadian and Québécois workers could prevent all Canada from becoming a mere resource hinterland for international corporations.

In his lecture on Québec in the Canadian political economy at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, the York political science professor traced the evolution of French-Canadian nationalism to its present state of consciousness, noting the transition from the term French-Canadian to Québécois as an important indication of national identity.

He divided this evolution into two main phases since confederation; one, a basically defensive nationalism concerned with survival, and the other, beginning after World War II, which erupted into an aggressive expression of national feeling.

Laxer described confederation as a project of the Canadian merchant finance class intended to unite the west with Canada in order to enlarge eastern markets.

Georges Etienne Cartier provided the link between the English Canadian bourgeoisie and French Canada, he said, and it was his influence which secured for French Canadians the language, educational, and legal rights now considered insufficient. The issues which proved a thorn in the side of Confederation proved to be just as "guaranteed" rights, however.

Mentioning the Riel rebellion and the problem of Manitoba's status, Laxer asserted that many French Canadians participated in the movement which crushed Louis Riel and the Metis, and that it was only at the time of his trial and subsequent execution that the rebel was seen as a symbol of popular nationalism.

Also, the influx of immigrants from Ontario was largely responsible for the withdrawal of French language rights throughout that province, engineered by Dalton McCarthy. Laxer remarked that French Canadians were, thus, "victims of McCarthyism 70 years before the rest of the continent."

Surveying the growth of nationalism in the 20th century, he noted a movement toward Québec provincial rights, as opposed to French Canadian rights in the country as a whole.

The first major battle, the conscription of French Canadians during the Boer War, saw the province's population obliged to fight for the British Empire even though 62 out of 65 of Quebec's members of Parliament were against conscription. According to Laxer, 99 per cent of French Canadians conscripts appealed for exemption.

Laxer compared this figure to that of English Canada where, surprisingly, 90 per cent of those conscripted also appealed for exemption.

Canada might well be "the world's greatest draftdodging nation," he quipped.

He traced Catholic nationalism of the post-World War One era, led by Abbé Lionel Groulx, through to the rise of the Union Nationale party and Maurice Duplessis. Laxer explained that in Groulx's idealized version of French Canadian history, French Canada had a providential mission.

A priest had even declared that between 1608 and 1759, only one illegitimate birth had occurred in French Canada, as an example of its virtue. However, Leandre Bergeron's recent historical study claims French Canadians to be the descendants of criminals and prostitutes exiled to the New World.

More illusions were foisted upon the public by the Duplessis regime, which, while proclaiming nationalism and rejecting federal aid, placed advertisements in New York newspapers inviting American investment, Laxer noted.

The 1947 Asbestos Strike opened what Laxer considers the second main phase in Quebec nationalism. It revealed a newly organized union movement endorsed, this time, by a prominent clergyman, Archbishop Charbonneau, who was forcibly retired soon after by the church establishment.

The end of the Duplessis regime and the emergence of what was to be called "the Quiet Revolution" was welcomed by English Canadians, who thought, according to Laxer, that a "decent, clean, Liberal, reform government" was the solution to this thorn in the side of confederation.

Instead, the increasing needs of the new, emerging middle class caused a crisis in federal-provincial economic relations, he stated, which continues to this day. Laxer cited the creation of the Parti Québécois, the student power movement, the October 1970 crisis, the La Presse strike the following year, and the current controversy over the James Bay project as examples of this continuing conflict of interests.

He concluded the lecture by drawing attention to the larger issue of working class struggle.

Ottawa, he said, is the back door of Washington and New York, and "Rockefeller doesn't care if Quebec is independent or not," so long as it is still open to American investment.

When asked whether the Waffle group would support an NDP federal government which dispatched troops to prevent the secession of Quebec, Laxer sidestepped the issue, saying that there was certainly a danger that the NDP would make such a move.

PEI may certify farmers' union

CHARLOTTETOWN (CUP) — The Prince Edward Island government has introduced legislation which would establish a framework for certification of the National Farmers Union as bargaining agent for the provinces farmers.

Potato producers will be the first to hold a plebiscite to certify the NFU as their bargaining agent under the new enabling legislation.

It is the first time in Canada that comprehensive legislation to enable farmers to certify a farmer's union as their bargaining agency has been introduced by any government.

It marks a significant and historical point in the NFU's drive for full certified, collective-bargaining rights for all Canadian farmers.

"With the introduction of the Prince Edward Island legislation, we establish the principle of certified collective bargaining for farmers, and it's a principle the other governments of other jurisdictions in Canada can ignore only at their own peril," commented NFU president, Roy Atkinson.

"We're very pleased the (Premier Alex) Campbell government introduced this legislation. It's being handled through a free vote of the Legislature. The Premier has indicated his support and we expect no trouble in seeing it adopted," he said.

"The first referendum will be of potato producers, but the legislation provides the same opportunity to farmers producing other commodities," he said.

Atkinson said it would be foolish to raise people's hopes by claiming the plan will solve all the problems of Island potato producers.

"It's a first step, an important one, but still a first step, and whenever you do something new, pioneer something, you always run into difficulties you didn't foresee."

Under the plan, the provincial government will establish a potato marketing commission composed of three persons who will be selected by agreement between the minister of agriculture and the National Farmers Union. One of the three will by agreement be designated chief commissioner.

The commissioners may be removed from office at any time by the NFU. In such a case, a new commissioner or commissioner would be reappointed through negotiations between the government and the union.

The commission would have the power "within the province to control and regulate in any and all respects, to the extent of the powers which may be vested in the commission, the marketing of potatoes, including the prohibition of marketing in whole or in part."

The commission will be required to enter into negotiations with the certified collective bargaining agency - the National Farmers Union.

This bargaining will result in an agreement stating the terms and conditions under which potatoes within the province will be marketed.

A copy of the collective agreement will be filed with the Minister of Agriculture.

The NFU's negotiating committee is set out by the legislation as four persons, three potato producers appointed by Island locals and a chairman appointed by the NFU.

Only potato producers who are members of the National Farmers Union will be eligible to vote on matters related to the terms and conditions of a collective bargaining agreement.

A service charge will be deducted from the sale of all potatoes to pay for the operation of the Potato Marketing Commission, and expenses incurred by the National Farmers Union in respect of potato marketing.

After one year a petition signed by one-third of the registered producers can force a plebiscite on the plan. If a majority of people voting reject it, the plan will be discontinued.

Each local of the NFU on Prince Edward Island will select five members who are potato producers who will comprise a committee known as the National Farmers Union Potato Committee to act as a link between the Union and Potato producers in the local.

The legislation is expected to pass through the house about ten days after being introduced.

Law plays SMC in clutch game tonight

Meds, UC tied at one game in semi-finals

Interfac basketball playoffs moved into semi-final play last week. Based on a two-out-of-three games format (for the first time), the results to date of semi-final action show a tie between Meds and UC at one game apiece, while Law possesses a one-game lead over St. Mike's.

Meds won the initial outing against UC last Thursday night by a score of 65-62. Meds came out flying (courtesy of their black bags some claimed) in the game with a devastating zone press which rolled back into a 3-2 zone if UC broke it.

Using this press, Meds was up by 10 at one point in the first half. This lead was especially noticeable when one realizes that Meds' two starting guards, Ron Sternberg and Bobby Lewis, scored 14 and 13 points, respectively, for the game.

However, UC closed quickly to be down only by two at halftime. In the second half, Meds played 'straight up' basketball to hold on for the win. Lindsay Horenblas, Meds premier tiddy wink player, scored 19 points in the game to lead all Meds scorers. For UC, the brothers Betcherman — Mike and Gordie — hooped 22 and 14 points, respectively.

Friday night was a different story, however. UC rolled over Meds 57-46. Just as in the first game, Meds jumped out to an early lead (22-15).

However, they fell victim to a UC lead of 19-2, to be down 34-24 at halftime. The game was essentially over at this point.

Meds' strong rebounding — which had played so prominent a role in their earlier win — was missing Friday. The UC forwards — Joel Levitan, Gordie Betcherman, and Bill Birnbaum — badly out-rebounded the Caskey-Horenblas-Hibloom front wall. An observer could not help but notice how Birnbaum's presence in this game (he didn't play in the first one) hampered Meds, as he scored 13 points in addition to his strong rebounding performance.

After the game, Birnbaum remarked that "grabbing rebounds is like picking apples in a strong wind, you have to time your jump and concentrate closely on the fruit."

Other scorers for UC included the other two forwards, Gordie Betcherman and Joel Levitan, with 15 and 12 points respectively. For Meds, Lindsay Horenblas scored 15.

The final game of this series takes place tonight at 9 pm. For Caskey to remain masked, Meds will have to get off the floor. Otherwise, look for UC in the finals.

Nonetheless, playing before an overflow crowd, Law went ahead by a score of 39-29 at halftime (Law was up by 18 at one point).

In the second half, St. Mike's man-to-man full-court press began to wear down Law, and the SMC team began to close quickly. Still, the rally fell just short of victory.

Al Sternberg, the virtual one man gang for Law notched 26 points while team-mate John Hunter was popping in 12. Replying for St. Mike's were Larry Trafford (15 points), Mark Dziemianczuk (14, and George Poland (12).

Despite the fact that they were missing their star forward Jamie Halfnight, Law stole a victory from St. Mike's 62-61 — something Law has been doing to opponents all year. Law came out smoking in the first half on the strength of some excellent outside shooting, a rare commodity for the lawyers.

"A third game, if necessary, (and it probably will be) between the two teams will be held tonight at 7 pm preceding the UC-Meds game.

The second, and perhaps final, game of the series was played last night; too late to meet the press deadline.

Bias discussed

By CYNTHIA FARQUHARSON

The university's recent attack on discrimination against female teachers fails to adequately alleviate the problem, philosophy professor Lorrenne Clark charged Friday at a meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Status of Women at U of T.

Last month the university allocated $150,000 to raise women's salaries to par with those of men, in response to complaints that major salary discrimination exists at the university.

This sum applies to full-time professors only, however, and therefore does not offer any compensation to the large numbers of women who work part-time, Clark added.

Moreover, discrimination against women is prevalent at all levels of the university, both academic and non-academic, psychology professor Wendy Potter told the meeting.

"The problem is too big to deal with all at once, so we simply concerned ourselves full-time professors first," Potter said.

The committee will attempt to correct discrimination against part-time women professors next.

Clark pointed out that part-time professors (both male and female) are deprived of privileges enjoyed by full-time teaching staff, such as tenure, and paid insurance, OHIP and pension benefits, even though they may, in effect, be working full-time.

She was referring to the fact that teachers are often employed part-time by more than one department, and therefore put in as many hours as full-time professors.

This affects women more significantly than men, since the majority of part-time staff is female.

Furthermore, part-time professors are particularly vulnerable to drops in enrolment, which means they are often not sure of being rehired until late September, Clark said.

"I don't even know if I'll be teaching the second half of my course," said one woman who has taught English on a part-time basis at UC for the past six years.

She said that she feared being replaced by a fellow teacher at any time.

Blues meet Huskies in CIAU final

By PAUL CARSON
The Varsity Blues and St. Mary's Huskies, two teams undefeated in league and playoff competition this season, have qualified for the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union hockey championship.

The title game will be played Saturday afternoon at 2 pm at Varsity Arena.

Blues qualified for the CIAU final, the first incidentally to be staged in Toronto, by ousting Alberta Golden Bears in two exciting games played before near capacity crowds of about 4,000 in Edmonton's Varsity Arena last weekend. (Huskies had a somewhat easier time disposing of Loyola College Warriors in Halifax 9-

2 and 9-6.)

Boh Munro was named the outstanding player in the Varsity-Alberta series by the press contingent, following his two-goal performance in Blues 5-2 opening game win and his steady penalty-killing in the second game, which ended 5-3.

Coach Tom Watt has at least two crucial decisions to make before Saturday's face-off which marks the fourth straight year Blues and Huskies have met for the national title.

Rightwinger Harry Sems suffered a torn cartilage in the second game and is definitely lost for the final. Watt could use either winger Doug Tate, and OUAU all-star last season at Waterloo Lutheran, or decide to dress an additional defenceman, either Rick Cornacchia or Albie Shames.

Tate is a proven veteran of intercollegiate play who has never had the thrill of being on a championship team. However, Blues have been going with only four defencemen and should one be injured early in Saturday's game, the team could be in serious trouble.

Watt's other problem involves goaltending, since both Bruce Durmo and Gary Inness turned in outstanding games in Edmonton as Blues were surprisingly outshot and often careless in their own end. If Durmo plays, it will be his final game in college hockey, while Inness has one more year of eligibility.

Blues used superior skating and some quick scoring thrusts to eliminate the young but well-coached Golden Bears, as the best of three series ended after two games. Varsity's record in league and playoff games now stands at 22-0. However, one of their three exhibition losses was 3-1 to St. Mary's in Halifax last December. The teams' other game resulted in a 5-5 tie.

Both teams opened Friday's first game on a cautious note as neither Watt nor Alberta's Clare Drake seemed to want a wide-open game. Varsity defenceman Mike Keenan opened the scoring midway through the period on a soft rolling shot that skipped by Bears' netminder Barry Richardson. It was an unfortunate break for Richardson who played a solid game especially when his team wilted in the third period.

Alberta left-winger Marcel St. Arnaud evened the score in the final minute of the opening period and the score remained 1-1 until Ivan McFarlane put Blues in the lead to stay, converting Bill Buba's rebound late in the second period.

Varsity raced to a 4-1 lead with two goals within 70 seconds early in the third period.

Neil Korzack and Warren Anderson set up Kent Ruhnke for a well-placed wrist shot from close in, and then on the next shift Munro easily beat Richardson after taking a perfect pass from captain Gord Davies.

Munro later made it 5-1 with only five minutes remaining but Alberta came back on Steve McKnight's screen shot at 17:44. Davies took a charging penalty moments later, but Gary Inness continued his steady play and Blues were full credit for a 5-2 victory.

Drake changed his tactics for the second game and Bears were rewarded with an early goal by Jerry Hornby. Blues seemed somewhat unco-ordinated for a few shifts, but struck for two quick goals within 24 seconds midway through the period and were never in serious trouble thereafter.

Ruhnke assumed the unfamiliar role of playmaker instead of goal scorer as he set up line-mates Don Pagnutti at 12:52 and Keil Korzack at 13:16.

Bears made it interesting in the final period with an early goal by Gerry LeGrandeur and another point shot from McKnight in the final two minutes. Munro and Davies skillfully killed off some late penalties, and a 5-3 victory put Blues into the championship game.

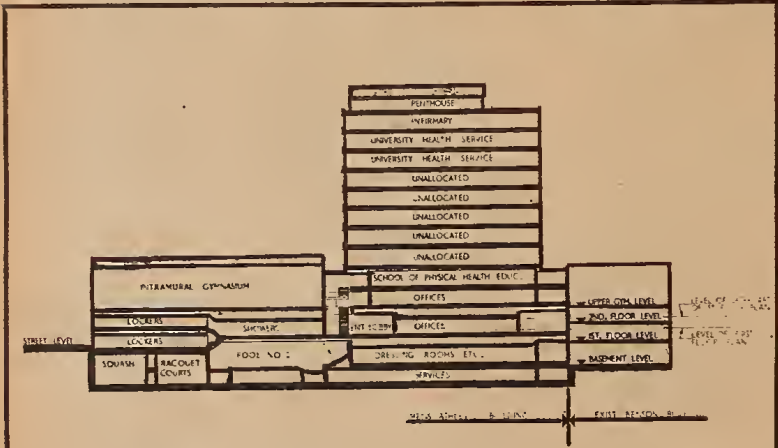

In contrast, St. Mary's had little trouble with Loyola as the Huskies bombed at will in the 9-2 rout and outshot Warriors 38-16 in the freescoring final.

St. Mary's always boasts several experienced semi-pros from the Eastern League and has a solid two-way veteran in rightwinger Mike Quinn.

Saturday's nationally televised game should be a good display of first class college hockey as both teams feature several experienced veterans and Huskies are one of the few teams that can skate with the Blues over three full periods.

"St. Mary's had a great advantage from their fanatical home crowd for the two games in December," Watt said in an interview yesterday. "I hope we can get some solid fan support on Saturday- after all Toronto has waited a long time to host a CIAU final."

Blues Notes... Watt and Drake coached together last year on the Student National team that included Munro, Davies, Buba, Richardson and Alberta center Dave Couves... Durmo was in goal for the CIAU final last year when Blues shutout St. Mary's 5-0; the previous two title games were far closer as Varsity needed late goals from Paul Laurent to win 3-2 in 1970 and Brian St. John to take the 1971 game 5-4... sellout crowds at both Edmonton and Halifax indicated the CIAU will probably continue the present playoff format instead of the four-team tournaments used in prior years... Radio Varsity will also be handling play-by-play broadcasting in addition to the full CBC radio and television network coverage.

SMC, Vic in finals

By PAUL CARSON

Pulling the goaltender in favor of an extra forward has become a recurrent hockey coaching tactic, but it's not often that a game ends with both goaltenders on the bench at the same time.

The unexpected happened Monday night as St. Mike's and Erindale tied 3-3 in the second game of Division 1 semi-finals. The tie enabled SMC to advance to the Jennings Cup final on the strength of an earlier 12-6 victory.

Erindale was expected to play strictly offensive hockey but the team seemed totally psyched out by the St. Mike's decision to play defensive hockey in spite of the Irish's six-goal lead. In fact, Erindale didn't get a shot on goal for the first 11 minutes, while John McCarthy's two goals gave St. Mike's a 14-6 lead in the total-goals series.

Erindale did get one goal back from captain Mike Mathe but SMC forward Paul Kahnert clinched the series with a clever goal while his own team was playing two men short.

Erindale pulled its goaltender in the final minute for one last ganging attack despite the 15-9 score and St. Mike's coach Don Pagnutti immediately followed suit. The concluding seconds produced several exciting plays and several near misses at the two empty nets, but no further goals were scored.

The finals between St. Mike's and defending champions Victoria began tonight at 7:30.

Finalists in Division II have also been settled as PHE B meets Law II Thursday evening also at 7:30. The jocks squeaked past Graduate Studies 2-1 on goals by footballer Mark Ackley and Brian Walters; Al Molto replied for SGS.

The intermediate league is still in second round action but six quarter-finalists were decided in games last week.

Results:

Meds B 4	SMC F 0
Meds E 6	Eng Sci Grads 0
Vic IV 3	Vic VI 1
Emmanuel 6	Business 0
Trin B 8	Wycliffe 1
Grungies 3	For B 2

Upcoming intermediate games are Vic V-Scarboro tonight at 9:30 and Meds-PHE C Thursday at 9:30.

Shepherd wants no students on tribunals

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Academic Affairs Committee chairman R.M.H. Shepherd is attempting to prevent students from being allowed to sit on tribunals judging students on academic offences.

A paper presented to the committee Tuesday by Shepherd claims that students charged with academic offences "should be" judged mainly, if not entirely, by those most competent for this task, i.e. members of the teaching staff, in whose hands decisions in matters of evaluation have always rested and surely must continue to rest.

The paper defines academic offences as "offences of fraud or misrepresentation committed by students, in connection with their academic work, for the purpose of obtaining unjustified standing in a course or improper credit towards a degree, or any other object, e.g. admission to another faculty".

The move came as Academic Affairs considered the Internal Affairs Committee's proposal for a discipline system, which is expected to be decided on by the Governing Council by summer.

Although Internal Affairs ran into criticism for not differentiating between types of protest to be banned, it did implement recommendations from the three-year-old Campbell Report that students be a majority of any body judging students.

Shepherd claims that the presence of students on the tribunal cannot "be justified on any academic principle or logical analogy".

He claimed that a tribunal would have no credibility in the eyes of academics, if, for example "it were composed of three first-year undergraduates and two instructors drawn from various professional faculties and non-humanities departments of Arts and Science, and charged with the duty of judging a case of alleged plagiarism in an essay on Restoration Comedy."

He envisaged that a tribunal for such a case might easily "comprise one lecturer and two first-year students drawn from dentistry, forestry and nursing, plus one lecturer in commerce and a first-year student drawn with minimal experience in literary questions."

The proposal makes a distinction between academic and non-academic affairs in direct opposition to the Internal Affairs Committee's intention. Internal Affairs recommends a single university tribunal which would deal with all offenses "in which the university is uniquely involved or affected as an academic institution."

Academic Affairs student member Brian Morgan charges that Shepherd is "trying to pretend that there is no difference between assigning a grade and judging whether there has been a breach of regulations which deserves the imposition of a penalty."

"Right and wrong are becoming confused," he said, "with the quality of the work a student does."

Academic Affairs Committee graduate member John Morton claims that the proposals are clearly an attempt by university academics including Sheehar, John Dove and William Dunphy to maintain or extend their power. He said that the issue was plainly a jurisdictional one.

"There are no criticisms, no proposals from the Academic Affairs Committee faculty members that cannot be answered procedurally within the structures proposed by the Internal Affairs Committee," Morton said.

"The peer structure is flexible" Morton said, "it allows students to be judged by a tribunal with a majority of students, and academics by a tribunal with a majority of academics."

The problem is "just that there are too many academics on Academic Affairs."

"The Internal Affairs Committee is more representative of the university community," Morton said. "Twelve of the 25-member body are academics while only two of the 12 Internal Affairs Committee members are faculty."

Morton said that a number of lay people on the Internal Affairs Committee are angry since their committee was clearly given the task of formulating discipline codes and structures by the Governing Council.

Morton said that the lawyers present at the meeting — Professors Stanley Schiff and J.B. Dunlop and representatives from Cassels, Brock, the university's solicitors — opposed Shepherd's proposals.

The law system works by jury by peers, has for hundreds of years," he noted. "Experts are called in as witnesses, but judgment is always by peers."

Morton said that he tried unsuccessfully a number of times to move approval of the Internal Affairs proposals so that the jurisdictional issue could be decided by the Governing Council.

Morgan noted that "each committee is trying to define the issue of jurisdiction for the other", and that it was futile for them to try to do so.

Academic Affairs Tuesday decided that academic discipline is its proper concern.

It also agreed to have a working group precisely define academic discipline and academic offences which would be subject to academic discipline. The working group will report to the committee at its March 27 meeting.

Publish or perish in math

By DAVID WISE

SAC president-elect Bob Anderson yesterday told the Governing Council that "research (is) interfering with teaching" in the mathematics department.

Anderson, also a fourth year math student, was one of two students to address the council on the occupation of math department offices which ended a week ago.

"Research is important in the university in itself, and insofar as it positively contributes to the teaching abilities of faculty," he stated.

The most important issue at stake in the occupation, he said, was the relationship of teaching and research in the university.

Two professors who were refused tenure, David Spring and Michael Mather, have said that the only indications they received of the reasons for their denial were their supposed failure to publish enough research. The occupation demanded that they be given tenure, that another dismissed professor be rehired, and that better quality teaching be instituted in first year courses.

Anderson stated that the way tenure procedures are now established in certain departments the teaching ability of a faculty member is judged solely upon what his or her colleagues know of it.

Anderson expressed concern for the individual rights of faculty up for tenure. According to him, in certain departments the teachers being considered for tenure "do not know who are on the tenure committees, are not allowed to make submissions to these committees, get lawyers to represent their interests to these committees, or even get the reasons for refusal of tenure, once that decision has been made."

Anderson said the occupation was the direct result of an unwillingness to negotiate or consult with the student body on a matter that directly affected it. The incidence of arbitrary departmental decisions has decreased, he added, with the recent establishment of curriculum committees in most departments, with considerable student representation.

The math department, however, stated Anderson, implemented a uniform grading scheme for first year courses without ever consulting the math curriculum committee, upon which he sits.

Arts and science dean Bob Greene briefly expressed his disappointment at what he labelled "the irresponsible statements based on hearsay evidence," that Anderson had made. He specifically alluded to Anderson's statement concerning tenure procedures.

He said, however, that he had not been aware that Anderson and Murton would be speaking to the council and stated that he was not in a position to "sufficiently deal with the charges" Anderson and Murton made.

Greene last night stated that he found only the section of Anderson's statement dealing with the procedure of tenure committees to be irresponsible, and that he had no objections to the rest of what Anderson had to say. He said that he objected to "the general tone of the statements concerning the conduct of tenure committees", which he said were "made without real evidence."

In an interview last night, Anderson noted that no departments, aside from sociology, have students on their staffing committees, and that not all have student course evaluations so that tenure committees have some idea of students' judgment of professors.

Asked whether there were specific departments whose tenure policies warranted Anderson's charges, Greene said, "All departments take their tenure decisions very seriously."

Greene was earlier overheard, however, admitting to Anderson that there were several departments in the faculty which were "notorious" for arbitrary tenure policies. He was heard to have said that on occasion, over the objections of departmental chairmen, he had forced departments to release the reasons for refusal to rehire or grant tenure, to the concerned faculty member.

Greene then labelled this right to information, "a basic human right."

Fourth year math student Phil Murton told council that the occupation alone forced the department to negotiate with the students.

He expressed concern that the new discipline code, now being considered in committees by the council, would not distinguish between violent and non-violent demonstrations, "and would make peaceful and non-disruptive demonstrations such as our own, illegal."

With no debate from council members, an executive motion affirming that "established rules and procedures on appeals" should be adhered to was passed.

The motion also encouraged the administration to "continue their constructive attempts toward resolution of the substantive issues involved in the dispute."

Pigeons come to roost at Varsity

Varsity staff should bome in on 91 St. George at one this afternoon as the paper holds a very important staff meeting.

Election of next year's production staff and details of this year's banquet top the afternoon's agenda.

Remember, there is only one more staff meeting this year. So, don't miss out on this chance to rack up another one.

Eng faculty scuttles course

By BRIANE NASIMOK

The Faculty of Engineering has apparently arbitrarily, and without consultation, decided to prevent its students from taking an independent studies course for credit.

"Engineering students will not be allowed to take INI 213, for credit, next year", physics professor B.P. Stoicheff said Wednesday evening at a meeting of the Curriculum Standards Sub-Committee of the Governing Council. His announcement was the first indication arts and science dean Bob Greene received of the move, and he was noticeably surprised.

INI 213, next year's equivalent to INI 203, is an independent studies course offered by Innis College, which allows students to set up their own programs. They can choose to be graded by the pass/fail system or by numerical grade.

The Innis independent studies course has had a history of controversy within the university. Three years ago its grades were rejected by the faculty council of arts and science, and all students received only a pass.

Stoicheff said that "if we would have known that 313 and 413 were to be offered, we would have done the same thing. If that is the kind of course offered under independent studies, I am very, very worried."

Stoicheff said that next year's engineering calendar would have a note to students, telling them they couldn't take the course.

When reached yesterday, engineering associate dean G.B. Craig said that he knew "the problem was under study," but had not been advised of the decision, and had not seen the calendar. He could not give "a definite answer" to who made the decision, and if the policy was definite.

There are at present 11 engineering students enrolled in the course.

Greene said that he had "not been informed previously" of the decision.

Innis College registrar David King "regretted that the Faculty of Engineering had not consulted with Innis College before making the decision". He said that on a number of occasions he had offered to talk to the Faculty of Engineering about the course, but he was never invited to do so.

was receiving credit for studying scuba diving. Most of the faculty seemed displeased with the idea that academic credit should be given to such a study program.

Chemistry professor John Dove said, "One can clearly see what should not be credited by this university," in reference to INI 203. He suggested the committee discuss "where to draw the line, and who should draw it" concerning the development of interdisciplinary courses.

Law professor R.E. Scane felt that the sub-committee should pass all the interdisciplinary courses, "with reluctance", and send a report including the question raised about the courses, to the Academic Affairs Committee.

Victoria College principal Jack Robson said that a distinction must be made between the INX offered by the Interdisciplinary Studies department and INI (Innis) courses, and the courses offered by the other colleges. He said that he had "consistently voted against" courses such as INI 203.

Greene expressed his "faith in Innis College and its courses". He said, "I feel that Innis College presents something very valuable and very valuable academically, in the university."

"Because most of the debate concerned the "scuba diver", a majority of the courses were not discussed by the committee.

The problem now goes to the Academic Affairs Committee which will decide the fate of Interdisciplinary Studies.

GC approves Scar credit system

The Governing Council yesterday gave final approval to the credit system at Scarborough College, after it followed the committee trail for over three months.

The motion recommended that "students of Scarborough College be permitted to proceed towards a degree at a rate of their own choosing except that a maximum of six full courses can be taken in the winter session for credit and a maximum of two full courses in the summer session be approved."

Last week the Executive Committee of the Governing Council recommended that Scarborough's credit system should not be implemented until the report of the Planning and Resources Committee was received.

According to student Governor

Brian Morgan, no one could provide the members of the executive committee with sufficient information pertaining to Scarborough's new system.

However, at the Governing Council meeting, Scarborough's principal Ralph Campbell reassured council with more facts about enrolment and financial aspects of the system. After becoming more fully informed, the governors endorsed the proposal, which had been submitted by the Academic Affairs Committee.

St. Michael's College president John Kelly feared that introduction of the credit system was the "first step in the implementation of the trimester system," which he labelled a "sure money loser." Campbell rejected this assertion.

Greene delays tenure appeals

Arts and science dean Bob Greene has held up two math professors' tenure appeals nearly two weeks.

David Spring, who along with Michael Mather was denied tenure last spring, says that the two have not yet been allowed to get information promised to them on which to base appeals. They formally requested this information March 5, but have not yet received a reply from Greene.

Granting tenure to them, and the rehiring of dismissed math professor Stephen Salaff was a key demand in the math department occupation ended a week ago.

If the dean allows them to appeal, they can be granted tenure only if president John Evans decides to do so. He can only act if a committee decides the original denial was improperly arrived at.

Salaff has also not received a reply yet from Greene, from whom he requested and open hearing on his case in front of a parity committee. However it is reported that Greene has called this suggestion "ridiculous".

A general meeting of math students yesterday agreed Salaff would have been rehired had students been on the body that decided not to renew his contract, since he is held to be a good teacher.

The meeting also called for a rally in the Sid Smith foyer Tuesday at noon, to which Greene and math chairman George Duff have been invited.

The students decided to ask Duff at the rally why no students sit on the department's governance and structures committee set up in response to the occupation's demand that students be allowed to sit on all decision-making bodies in the department. The committee is meeting today in camera.

The math department appears to be relaxing its demands on first year students, as the Service

Courses Committee set up after the recent math occupation voted to increase the potential weight given to term marks.

The committee passed a motion Wednesday morning recommending that final marks in Math 134, 135 and 139 be computed by weighing the higher of term and exams marks at nearly two thirds. The same resolution was passed at the committee's Monday meeting (it meets every Monday, Wednesday and Friday at 8 am in Sid Smith 1085) for math 130.

The committee, which was established by math chairman George Duff as a concession to the occupiers, voted "almost enthusiastically" for proposals to alter the percentage composition of final marks in first year math courses, according to Salaff.

Salaff noted that the committee's decisions, which are technically only advice to math chairman George Duff, will probably be implemented, since Duff voted for the measures.

At a general meeting yesterday, math students declared: "We have won substantial gains in first year exam reforms and increased concern for teaching by the department which would not have happened without the occupation of chairman Duff's office."

Salaff added that the decision "represents complete endorsement of the principles myself and the occupation stood for". He also considered the committee "went further" by passing an amendment to count the best five out of six tests in determining the term mark.

Although committee attendance has dropped in half since the first meeting, Salaff felt the atmosphere was "fairly open for discussion" on teaching quality at future meetings.

Campbell sweeps St. George

By PAT REDICAN

"We're on our way back," Margaret Campbell's workers told each other last night after recovering from the surprise of a double Liberal victory in yesterday's provincial by-elections.

Campbell took St. George with 9,408 votes, well ahead of second place finisher Progressive Conservative candidate Roy McMurtry. McMurtry, who was favoured to win, had 7,434 votes and Ellen Adams of the NDP finished a distant third with over 4,338. Western Guard and communist candidates trailed badly, according to these almost complete results.

Communist party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) candidate Hardial Bains led Communist Party of Canada flag-bearer Brian Mossop 100 to 86. Right-wing John Ross Taylor of the Western Guard got 83 votes.

Less than 40 per cent of the voters bothered to cast their ballots in spite of temperatures reaching into the high 60's and extensive media publicity on the campaign.

St. Michael's, Victoria College, and the Married Students Residences were the only university polls in the riding. The Charles Street residences went to the NDP by about 3-2 over the Liberals, with the Tories a distant third. At St. Mike's, Campbell recorded a landslide victory and at Vic she narrowly edged Adams.

The Liberals also won easily in Huron, the only other by-election, with the Tories finishing second and the NDP third.

"It was people protesting against the Davis government," said Campbell, returning to a theme she has stressed throughout the campaign.

"This was no Big Blue Machine; this was an organization of individuals, working hard and working with enthusiasm," she said as she stood in her campaign headquarters flanked by provincial Liberal leader Robert Nixon, individually thanking the workers who came forward to shake her hand.

At 8 pm, an hour after the polls closed, Adams told about 100 workers that the massive media campaign the Liberal party had sponsored had contributed largely to her loss. "We have met the Big Blue Machine again and as well we have had our first contact with the Big Red Liberal Machine," said Adams.

Adams blamed the loss on both McMurtry's failure to run on the issues ("He ran as a close friend of Bill Davis") and the fact that "every time I raised an issue, the Liberals stole it."

NDP leader Stephen Lewis appeared later to congratulate Adams, calling her "a candidate who did credit to the party". He said that the election reflected "a strong anti-government undercurrent" and added that "there are a great many ridings in this province where it will not be so tough for us."

McMurtry had less to say. After conceding defeat at 8:15, he spoke to about 300 dejected supporters: "I'm sorry I couldn't do a little better. I knew it would be a difficult fight," he said.

However, most of McMurtry's workers were amazed at their candidate's poor showing.

"I thought it would be a shoo-in," one commented.

Allan Lawrence, the former St. George Conservative MPP whose resignation caused the by-election, dropped in to offer his condolences.

"We've won before, and we've lost before", announced Lawrence, now a federal MP.

Back at Liberal headquarters, spirits were running high as various Liberal luminaries as well as Adams and McMurtry dropped by to offer their congratulations.

"This is just what the party needed," said Toronto Executive committee alderman Art Eggleton. "This will start us on the way back."

"It was not nearly so close as I thought it would be," added U of T political science professor Stephen Clarkson. "I thought we would win, but by a couple of hundred votes."

Nothing wrong when they benefit

Faculty fight student majority

Faculty conservatives have lined up their forces to try to sabotage an Internal Affairs Committee proposal giving students a majority on discipline tribunals judging students.

Shepherd told the Academic Affairs Committee, in a paper presented Tuesday, that students charged with academic offences should be "judged mainly, if not entirely, by those most competent for this task, i.e. members of the teaching staff". He did not, however, take issue with teaching staff having a majority on tribunals judging faculty charged with academic offences.

This is not the first time Governing Council teaching staff representatives have thrown reason to the wind to champion self-interest. During the summer, the faculty representatives fought an unsuccessful battle to give them an absolute majority on the Academic Affairs Committee. Then, as now, they refused to concede that non-professional academics could possibly do justice to consideration of academic matters; the guild mentality persists.

Trial by one's peers is a long-established principle of justice. Yet, Shepherd and his colleagues refuse to grant students the right to judge fellow students, unless faculty have a dominant voice on the discipline tribunals.

There can be no justification for this position. To date, students serving on university governing structures, for example, have given no example of neglecting reason for self-interest, sacrificing relevant academic pursuit for chicanery.

Faculty, on the other hand, have disgraced themselves of late by their constant obstructionist, myopic tactics designed to protect their already too secure positions. During the Governing Council's day care debate, for example, teaching staff governors opposed university expenditures in this area, insisting academic spending (read: their salaries) was a more important priority.

Furthermore, experience proves that, if anything, students are harder on their peers than are professors. Courses in which student tutorial leaders grade other students are those in which marks are lowest. Similarly, conservative faculty might very well find that those students serving on the discipline tribunals were less understanding of academic breaches by their peers than they were.

Moreover, the pompous attitude conservative faculty have adopted — that they alone know best — poses a real threat to the development of any kind of meaningful university community. The teaching staff can offer no credible rationale for the position their representatives have adopted.

There are serious shortcomings to the Internal Affairs' proposed behaviour code; we have dealt with them earlier. However, as for the mechanics for resolving internal discipline problems, we would agree that the committee has evolved a reasonable and fair structure: judgment by one's peers.

Academic Affairs has been given until the end of the month to examine the Internal Affairs' proposals. They should not waste their time dealing with the petty objections of faculty conservatives — even when such conservatives happen to include their committee chairman. They should instead concern themselves with the discipline plan's academic aspects, especially its prohibition against student occupations and sit-ins and the accompanying threat of expulsion for engaging in such manifestations of dissent.

If the university's eventual discipline structure is to have any meaning, it must be acceptable to the university community. And despite the conservative faculty's unwillingness to concede this point it must enjoy student support. No longer will — or indeed should — teaching staff conservatives be able to deny students their legitimate voice in the running of this university.

Greene cooled down situation

Once again by smooth administrative action, a student crisis has been temporarily cooled out. Dean Greene's performance a week ago Wednesday in the foyer of Sid Smith Hall showed the qualities that make good administrators so hard to find. The act was effective. It is doubtful whether any other action could have cooled out a potentially threatening situation as well as the polished delivery and coherent arguments of dean Greene. Any other action would only have sharpened the issues. Send in the police and you've got charges and evidence of police brutality on your hands. Give into demands and you've shown that occupation tactics work and encourage more of the same. But, co-opt half the group into putting more Paul Cadario's on more committees and make the other half look foolish with your wit and sophistication and you've not the answer. A real victory. Well done.

But while you are busy congratulating yourselves take a minute off to listen to the sound of those underdog feet out there.

Just doesn't sound as loud as if used to, does it? If that doesn't mean anything to you attach a price tag to those pairs of shoes. That's money out there. And, there just isn't as much as there used to be. Think about what that means to.

Are you a grad student supporting yourself as a TA? What happens if you don't get enough shoes to justify your three teaching hours? Do you think you are going to get a job teaching? No? Couldn't have anything to do with a lack of students could it?

Junior faculty? Are you one of those "dozens" or "hundreds" dean Greene spoke of, to be fired very soon? Or, are you part of the new plan to increase the number of part-time personnel because it is easier to fire them when the shoes don't show?

Senior faculty? What are you going to do without any junior faculty or ta's to teach those dull, dreary, first year courses? And one more little problem just for you, that's right, you, with tenure! Do you know what the word "redundancy" means? Well, it's one of the reasons you can still be fired, even with tenure. How many fewer students need show up before you become "redundant"? Think about it, especially while those junior faculty are lining up candidates for retirement to save their own necks.

So, every time you win a victory, every time you resecure your own position, everytime you make undergraduate education less meaningful, think of those feet and all that money going down the drain!

Cuts denounced as unresearched

It was with great displeasure that I read of the Governing Council's decision to cut back the budget of the Advisory Bureau by $22,000. Apparently, the decision was as arbitrary as it was unresearched.

It seems peculiar that such a move should be made prior to an upcoming report on student services which has been commissioned by the university. If the Governing Council had facts on hand concerning student services, why the need for a duplicate report? Perhaps some money could be saved by eliminating an unnecessary report, rather than slashing funds indiscriminately from organizations which are providing a useful and necessary service to both students and people in the surrounding community.

Personally, I am not at all convinced that the work being done at the Advisory Bureau is not necessary and is not successful. Governing Council member Paul Cadario's blanket statement that the "Advisory Bureau is not providing the kind of counselling required" betrays an insensible negligence and marked bias to evidence which surely points to the contrary. More people than has been the case previously are requesting advice and getting it from the bureau. It would be only proper that they be the judges of whether they are getting the counselling they require or not. Although he is quite certain of this, Mr. Cadario in the same breath, says that he (along with the other members responsible for the decision) was not aware that a monetary loss of $22,000 would result in the firing of a staff person, thereby greatly hindering the functioning of the bureau. Either a callous disregard to the implications of such a decision was displayed, or the cutback is a deliberate attempt to phase out the bureau by gradual withdrawal of financial support from the university.

I question the untimely nature of this move, and if it is not already being done, would request that the decision be re-examined and deliberated upon in a more equitable and knowledgeable fashion.

No discrimination; men witches too

Maryon Kantaroff's suggestion on mediaeval witchcraft quoted by Myrna Kostash in the February 21 Varsity, "Perhaps the witches were women who had stepped outside the bonds of female roles . . .", shows lack of acquaintance with the historical documents of European witchcraft. The sources show that men as well as women participated in the activities and practices of witchcraft; the late professor Margaret Alice Murray wrote (The God of the Witches pages 65-6): "The word coven was used both in England and Scotland to designate a band of people of both sexes . . . who were conspicuous in the ritual." Easy verification is forthcoming from the appendix of names garnered from court proceedings of the time in the same author's The Witch Cult in Western Europe. As far as the actual practices are concerned, there was a good deal which men and women could do indifferently, but there was some in which male and female roles were definitely differentiated, notably in observances concerned with fertility and fecundation.

Toike won't fit above urinals

I'd like to point out an error in the story "Toike preferred to Varsity" in your March 5th issue. Typical comments chosen by survey co-ordinator Jack Lubek did not include a suggestion to "put the Toike on bulletin boards and above urinals". Rather, such a comment was made about the Engineering Society's quasi-weekly newsletter, the Tiny Toike, in an effort to ensure that the latter would at least be seen, if not read, by most Skulemen. I'm sure that our readers realized that reading the Toike Oike at a stall is a difficult proposition and that such an activity is best carried out in the arsenals.

How to reform Games, help us

Supporting the Montreal Olympics, to borrow from Claud Cockburn, is like advocating the abolition of capital punishment and being patted enthusiastically on the back by the bloody hand of a man who has just murdered a child.

That's the problem with the Olympics: Jean Drapeau is promoting them. The Montreal mayor has callously abandoned his people to squalor and disease. After merrily overspending his Expo budget, he presented the taxpayers of Canada with an additional bill of $123 million. Now, he wants to do the same for the Olympics. Despite his assurances to the contrary, he delayed the building start of the Olympic Stadium until he got something from Ottawa. Moreover, Drapeau and his apologists pervert the Olympics by making them a celebration of elitism and cold war rivalries.

No wonder there's a crescendo of protest.

Cut, to oppose the Olympics categorically is to make two crucial errors. The first is to abandon the Olympic movement to its enemies. The second is to accept the restrictions capitalism places upon sport and recreation.

Men like Drapeau have always tried to use the Olympics for political ends. In fact, the much admired Baron de Coubertin, the founder of the modern games, started out as a super-patriot who saw international sport as a means of preparing young Frenchmen for the next war with Germany.

In spite of this, thousands of people can really experience the Olympic ideals of international brotherhood (sisterhood too) and understanding. Such was my own experience as an athlete. When I won in 1962 (at the Commonwealth Games in Perth), I wept as they played the national anthem — actually it was The Maple Leaf Forever — but what really brought on those tears was that there on the other side of the world thousands of fellow athletes and spectators could stand up and cheer for something that in Canada had been virtually a private pre-occupation. When I lost — disastrously — in 1964 (at the Tokyo Olympics), a place came not from those strange telegrams, "Canada is proud of you anyway", however grateful I was to receive them, but from the encouragements to keep running from distance runners from other countries.

For the communities which host them, there's a "contact high" from international games. Vancouver experienced it during the British Empire and Commonwealth Games of 1954 and so did Winnipeg during the 1967 Pan-American Games. In its highest forms, sport creates such beauty that it can transcend ideological and chauvinistic rivalries and bring peoples from many different countries together. Talk to any Canadian who paid his own way to Munich to confirm this. Performances by athletes of many different countries were so spectacular that it was impossible for any but the blindest of chauvinists to identify with a single ideology or country. People identified with a universal movement for excellence in sport.

Critics point out that Olympic athletes have become pawns. "The patriotic pressure for the prestige that winners bring has made victims of the physically endowed citizens of many nations," writes historian Richard Mandell in his book, The Nazi Olympics. Most athletes would agree. But, cancelling the Games is no alternative. What we need is control of the International Olympic Committee by athletes and coaches. If such were the case in Munich, you can be sure that Vince Mathews and Wayne Collett, expelled by the International Olympic Committee for their indifferent posture during the Star Spangled Banner would still be competing.

Critics like the Rev. Donald Stirling of the Stop the Olympic Rip-off Committee also point out that the Olympics encourage elitism and it has, especially abetted by the cheerleading of television and the press. But again, such need not be the case.

The thrust of Stirling's argument is that if something doesn't work, then abolish it. By the same logic, we should abolish Christianity because many North American churches have become slum landlords.

Sport is not necessarily elitist.

In recent years, top athletes in many countries have supported struggles to increase playing opportunities for ordinary people. In Canada, the competitive amateur and the fitness buff have frequently allied themselves to get facilities from custodially-minded school boards.

At York University, athletes in several sports have changed their practice times so that during the most popular time (from five to seven pm) the facilities could be used for the recreation program. Competitive athletes know they ultimately have to go to the community for the special support they need, so the democratization of sport is in their interests too.

Olympic knockers also err when they argue for financial cutbacks on sport because other basic needs, such as health care and housing, are still to be met. This is the trap in which sports-writer Dick Beddoes now finds himself. In accepting the necessity for such trade-offs, he accepts the desirability of the capitalist definition of the state. As a former municipal councillor, he should know better.

Under capitalism, every levy and expenditure of government are closely scrutinized, while the giant monopolies are free to invest, spend, or tax (by rising prices) at will. Ian Adams provided an example of this difference in The Real Poverty Report: "In 1967 the government refused to bring in medicare, but for the same initial amount of money allowed the private corporations to bring in color television." Which need was greater?

In addition, the main expenditures of the capitalist state, such as defence production and the giveaway grants to industry, go for the direct support of business. Only what little remains goes for housing, health, and so on.

In a rational society, a society where the first goal was the satisfaction of basic human needs, not profit maximization, everyone would already have decent housing and ample play facilities. Such a society would welcome the Olympics. As it is under capitalism, our basic needs are forced to compete against each other. Why should athletes have to feel guilty because the capitalist state ignores many basic needs? We should refuse to accept the idea that sport and housing are mutually exclusive.

So, the prospect of the 1976 Olympics in Montreal places Canadian athletes in a terrible dilemma. If we join the campaign to Stop the Olympic Rip-off, we deny the legitimacy of the very movement to which we have given so much of our lives, and we abandon the idea that the human experience can be greatly enriched through international sport. On the other hand, if we support the Games and remain silent, we become scapegoats for one of the most irresponsible politicians in Canadian history. Either way, we lose.

It seems to me that concerned Canadian athletes face two alternatives. The first is to support the idea of a reformed Games at Montreal, while at the same time joining the struggle of workers and citizen groups across Canada to win better living conditions. (Drapeau doesn't own the Games. He's a bad mayor, so we help get rid of him, but we don't cancel the Games.)

The second possible course is to oppose the 1976 version of the Games, while working for a more humane Olympics for future generations. Clearly, a boycott of Montreal wouldn't work: it would penalize athletes, many of whom have already been victimized enough, and it would be little understood. Opponents could charge that the boycotting athletes were simply afraid to compete. The only

May didn't find other job first

Professor K.O. May's letter to the Varsity of March 7 makes several misleading comments on my role in the mathematics reform movement. While it is true that I resigned last spring and that I accepted a one year position in France, the juxtaposition of these statements requires some elaboration. Last April, I was informed that I was denied tenure. I then consulted with Professor Duff and the UTFA representative about the possibilities for appeal in my case. While Prof. Duff suggested I had no grounds for a successful appeal, he would give me neither written reasons for denial of tenure nor the composition of the tenure committee. I needed this information on which to base an appeal.

Unsatisfied and disheartened, I decided to leave and look for job opportunities elsewhere and in February, 1973, I was offered a one year position in France. This offer had nothing to do with my resignation last year, as implied by Professor May.

Since September, there has been a new student movement pressing for reforms both in undergraduate teaching and in the regulations and practices governing hiring and tenure decisions in the mathematics department. I had direct knowledge of the extreme difficulties encountered by students and staff in the first year engineering mathematics program, which I taught for three years. Through my experiences in this engineering program and in the undergraduate arts and science program, I have long felt the need for changes throughout undergraduate life along the lines of the movement's demands. Therefore, my name stands in support of these demands. I am happy to report that, over the past two weeks, many of my former colleagues have expressed similar support for reform in the mathematics department.

In this connection, I find it perplexing that Professor May, who has said on several occasions that he supports student participation on key departmental committees and is concerned about pedagogy in first year courses, finds himself obliged to dissociate himself publicly from the math reform movement, rather than find common ground with their legitimate grievances.

With regard to my interest in good teaching, I would be happy to go into details with Professor May; for now, I also refer him to:

(1) Professors Duff and Ross, with whom I was associated for the past few years as co-teacher in the first year engineering mathematics program.

(2) Professor Salaff, with whom I spent many hours reworking the presentation of ideas which are inadequately explained in first year text books.

(3) the mathematics evaluations compiled by MPSCU.

Although committed to a one year appointment in France for 1973-74, I believe I have good grounds for insisting that I be offered the opportunity to return to the University of Toronto should I be granted tenure after a new hearing.

"EXPOSURE DRAFT"

General Objectives of the University of Toronto

PREAMBLE

The Planning and Resources Committee of the Governing Council has been working to formulate a set of objectives for the University. We cordially invite the participation and assistance of members of the University community in this work.

In our work on the draft below, we have been motivated by the conviction that an explicit statement of objectives is an important prerequisite to effective planning and utilization of resources. We suggest, moreover, that the process of formulating and agreeing upon these objectives is itself likely to be beneficial in that it will develop an increased sense of purpose in the University, and thus will contribute to achieving those objectives. At the same time we are very much aware of the magnitude of our task and of the difficulty of finding a satisfactory general statement of objectives for such a diverse community. For this reason we are inviting the participation of members of the University at a relatively early stage of our work. We are very conscious that the draft which follows is still imperfect and indeed we as a Committee are not fully agreed upon all of the features of this draft. It is in this spirit, and with this understanding, that we invite your comments and suggestions. Amendment will then take place in response to comments and suggestions received and the final draft will be submitted to the Governing Council. The Committee acknowledges imperfections of style in the draft, but has chosen to place speed of communication ahead of elegance of expression. Written comments should be sent by April 13th, 1973, to the Secretary, Planning and Resources Committee, Office of the Governing Council, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, University of Toronto.

THE NATURE OF A UNIVERSITY

A university is a community of individuals who have come together for the pursuit and dissemination of knowledge. This pursuit of knowledge is directed towards the intellectual and cultural development of the individual, the better understanding of man and his relation to the universe, the improvement of society, and the responsible development of the human use of the environment. Essential features of a university include a diversity of fields of study, and a framework for the free yet responsible pursuit of the university's objectives.

The university, as an institution of society, has major responsibilities towards society. These responsibilities include the open dissemination of knowledge, and the offering of guidance to society towards the responsible application of that knowledge. Society, for its part, supports the university by providing it with resources and by assuring to its members the freedom to assess critically the contemporary expressions and applications of knowledge within society.

THE FUNCTIONS OF A UNIVERSITY

In its pursuit of knowledge, a university community engages in many inter-related functions including:

1. Learning and Teaching

This function, which is very much more than a mere transfer of information between persons, has as its main object the intellectual, cultural and professional development of individuals. Successful performance of this function involves the communication of man's intellectual heritage with an enthusiasm which will generate an infectious eagerness for ideas and a love of truth. This function also involves the open communication of knowledge within the university community, and between the university and society.

2. The Expansion of Knowledge

A university is expected to contribute to the expansion of human knowledge. New knowledge is generated through research as well as by the critical analysis and creative synthesis of existing information.

3. The Integration of Knowledge

By bringing together within its community a wide range of intellectual activities a university performs the increasingly important and difficult task of integrating the various specialized branches of study into the stock of human knowledge.

4. The Application of Knowledge

Universities have an increasing responsibility to contribute to understanding the problems of society and to provide leadership in the application of knowledge, in a sensitive, responsible and flexible way, to the solution of those problems. This function is closely related to the teaching and research functions but implies, in addition, involvement with society; a university undertakes, towards society, the dual roles of critic and resource.

5. The Preservation of Knowledge

A university has a responsibility to preserve and refine what is known from the past. This preservation occurs not only in a university's library resources but also through a university's support for subjects with little obvious contemporary relevance.

6. Individual and Collective Development

Closely related to all of the above is the responsibility of the university to provide an environment in which personal and collective development can thrive through the processes of learning and living in an atmosphere in which objectivity, rational argument, critical judgment, independence of thought and co-operation are all encouraged.

7. Responsiveness to Society

A university, as a part of society, has no exclusive claim to the functions above. Accordingly it has a responsibility to integrate its activities into the total social system and to respond to the longer term needs of society.

No single university is likely to be able to fulfil all of these functions equally well, nor may society demand it. However, all universities must meet a reasonable standard in the dissemination of knowledge by the education of students and communication with society. Moreover, for all of the above functions it is essential that a university should provide an atmosphere in which objectivity, rational argument, critical judgement, independence of thought, and co-operation are encouraged.

THE SPECIAL POSITION OF THE U of T

The University of Toronto is the largest university in Ontario. Currently its full-time undergraduate enrolment is roughly one quarter of that of the entire Province. Furthermore, the University of Toronto depends on the policies of the Government of Ontario for much of its income. The University thus has a special responsibility towards the people of Ontario; it fulfils this responsibility by the way in which it takes its place in the Ontario university system. The University, is of course, subject to the constraints imposed by the people on Ontario through the Provincial Government.

In the first place, the University, because of its many years of academic experience and because of the size and scope of its facilities, should strive to achieve a high standard of academic excellence in everything it undertakes and in particular in all of the functions outlined above.

Secondly, the size of the University, as well as the concentration of resources and facilities that its size implies, impose special obligations for the preservation, development, integration and application of knowledge within the Province.

Thirdly, the University must accept and live creatively within the limitations on its own growth and activities as a part of the Ontario post-secondary educational system. It must limit and control its financial demands on the Province and co-operate fully with other institutions in planning its activities whenever such activities impinge on those institutions.

Next, the University of Toronto is in the centre of Metropolitan Toronto which contains 30% of Ontario's population and which has a major concentration of cultural, service, recreational and residential facilities which are available to the University community. These facts require that the University be a community which is responsive to the life, opportunities and problems of the city.

The University's facilities are needed by one of Canada's major centres of population. This is reflected in the fact that two-thirds of the University's full-time undergraduate students and substantially all of a rapidly growing part-time and continuing student enrolment are drawn from Metropolitan Toronto.

Thus the University must respond readily to the changing requirements of the Metropolitan Toronto area. At the same time the University has a unique opportunity to apply its store of knowledge to the study of the special problems of an urban society.

However the University of Toronto is the largest university in Canada in terms of available research facilities and in terms of its concentration of qualified staff in a multitude of disciplines. This provides the University with an opportunity and responsibility for the extension, application and integration of knowledge as it pertains to Canada. At the same time, the University recognizes that no nation or society exists in isolation and that knowledge is the supranational concern of all mankind. Therefore the University must have international concerns and strive for international stature.

A final comment has to do with an effect of the special problems of the University of Toronto. These problems stem from the interactions of its size, its fiscal responsibilities to the people of Ontario, its special relationships with the Metropolitan Toronto community, its obligations to the entire post-secondary educational system in Ontario and its special opportunities to extend, integrate and apply its resources to matters of urban, national, and international concern. The nature of these problems leads to the conclusion that the University must strive to be a sufficiently diverse community to be able to accommodate a positive approach to each. At the same time it must be flexible enough to respond to the changing requirements of the societies of which it is a part.

OBJECTIVES FOR THE U of T

The foregoing leads to the following six specific objectives for the University of Toronto. These objectives are expressed in broad terms here but they will form the basis of later, more specific policy statements.

1. Functions:

The University of Toronto will fulfil, in co-operation with other universities and colleges in Ontario, the following specific functions.

- | | |
|---|-----------------------------------|
| (a) Teaching, learning and the dissemination of knowledge | (c) The application of knowledge |
| (b) The expansion of knowledge | (d) The preservation of knowledge |

2. Fields of Knowledge:

The University of Toronto will maintain a breadth of endeavour and will fulfil, again in co-operation with other universities and colleges in Ontario, some or all of the functions in 1. above in each broad field of knowledge including the following:

- | | | |
|---------------------|-----------------------|--------------------------------------|
| (a) Social sciences | (c) Physical sciences | (e) Professions |
| (b) Humanities | (d) Life sciences | (f) Graduate studies in these fields |

3. Interdisciplinary Approaches:

(a) The University of Toronto will undertake special responsibilities for the integration of knowledge by making a deliberate attempt to avoid the narrowness and loss of perspective which can be associated with specialization, and to develop an environment conducive to the creative synthesis of disparate fields.

(b) Also as a special responsibility, the University of Toronto will take initiatives in selecting certain local and national problems to which its resources of expertise can be advantageously applied from appropriate ad hoc interdisciplinary bases.

4. Excellence:

The University of Toronto will establish and maintain, in all of its activities, the highest standards of scholarly and instructional excellence.

5. Organization:

The University of Toronto will continue to develop an internal structure that will realize a diverse, flexible and decentralized academic, physical and social environment, in order that, within the constraints imposed by these objectives, the members of the University may enjoy to the greatest possible degree the excitement of ideas, the love of truth, and the satisfaction of personal and community development.

6. Responsibility:

The University of Toronto will, through critical examination of its own activities and through co-operative action with other universities and colleges in Ontario, ensure that the University's obligations to the people of Metropolitan Toronto, Ontario and Canada are responsibly fulfilled, and that its financial requirements do not grow at a rate exceeding the normal economic capacity of Ontario. An integral part of this responsibility is to ensure that funds granted to the University are wisely and effectively expended in the pursuit of the University's purposes and to ensure that the University's demands upon the Province are kept within reasonable limits and justified by the quality of our service.

"Best of..." albums often belie their name

It's inevitable that any recording artist who's been around for a good length of time will have at least one album of "Greatest Hits" or "The Best of..."

Such song collections have both positive and negative aspects associated with them. Most record buyers are aware of at least some of the advantages of "Best Of" albums but the disadvantages are rarely considered or discussed. The advantages seem almost overwhelming, but the disadvantages explain why such albums aren't always all they should be.

The Best Of album is usually superior to an ordinary LP simply because every cut has "merit" which, it would seem, is defined in terms of popularity. But such albums afford buyers the opportunity to enjoy an artist's music without going to the expense and without expending the time that would be involved in acquiring and wading through that artist's entire discography. That could be important when, as is so often the case, a performer has one or two albums which only a few good tracks on them. Also, one can usually make substantial savings in album purchasing, as many Best Of sets are double LP's which are offered at a reduced list price.

In order for the negative aspects to be more clearly understood one should explore the "reasons" underlying the release of Best Of's. At the root of all intentions are, of course, the pecuniary motivations of rarely altruistic record companies. The basic differences in such intentions are that they are manifested in varying degrees of exploitation. The specific possibilities are usually one of the following: 1) The artist has legitimate altruistic reasons (it rarely happens); 2) is under contract to produce a fixed number of albums and can't meet the quota — so be or the company opts for the Best Of as a quick solution; 3) leaves one record company to sing with another. The record company can usually do what it wants with the old material which happens often; 4) just has no control.

So the basic situation is the greedy record company versus the legally impotent artist. And with no input by the performers, it's no wonder that the end product suffers.

These records are usually put together from tapes, not masters, and dubs of those tapes are sent to branch plants for local mastering. This haphazard process results in "noisy" discs that are considerably poorer in sound quality than the originals (there is a very definite "hiss" that results from the tape transfers).

Collections are often put together by some unnamed corporate designate and the criteria for inclusion are questionable, especially since many poor anthologies are turning up. In the light of this, some recent additions to the group of Best Of's can be discussed.

Duane Allman; An Anthology, (Capricorn/WEA)

Guitarist Duane Allman died in a motorcycle crash on October 29, 1971. "An Anthology" follows Allman's musical beginnings with the group Hourglass through songs by Wilson Pickett and Aretha Franklin (on which Duane was a session guitarist) to his work with the Allman Brothers Band. Complete information is provided concerning each of the 19 songs and an illustrated booklet written by harp player Tony Glover offers some insight into Duane's virtuosity and playing history.

The album, in trying to cover Duane's career is uneven in musical quality — from the plodding beginnings imitating B.B. King, into later sessions that showed his innovation in adding to someone else's sound. But the high point of the album is really in Duane's work on "Layla" with Eric Clapton. The last side is devoted to the hackneyed rock style of the Allman Brothers.

Allman comes across as a fine guitarist with a rare adeptness to inject solid joyful riffs into other's music. It's unfortunate that his voice and songwriting ability never had a chance to mature.

More Hot Rocks, The Rolling Stones, (London) $9.98

Shortly after the Stones left London records and formed their own label, London released "Hot Rocks", a double LP of "hits". With this success behind them London has found a new moneymaker in "More Hot Rocks". This is an obvious exploitation disc as it becomes FIFTH Best Of LP for the Stones to be made up from their 11 original albums. Many of the songs on this double record package which range from the earliest days of "Not Fade Away" up to "Let It Bleed" were already available on the earlier Best Of's.

Side four of the album is made up of "songs never before released in the US and Canada". That's false advertising. I have a copy of an EP (extended play record) on London that contains three of the songs — "Money", "Poison Ivy" and "Bye Bye Johnnie". In any case, these supposed previously unreleased goodies are early recordings that only give a small indication of the Stone's talents and are poorly performed and recorded. In fact, although there's no indication on the album, most songs were recorded in mono and electronically reprocessed for stereo.

This is one case where I'd recommend going back to one of the first collections like "Big Hits". As for the intentions of the record company, note the following quotations from the London Record News Letter: "Dealers of the World... Remember... The new Stones fan wants to collect all of their records and it is financial foolishness not to cater to the instinctive desire of obese buyers to buy!!!" (Their emphasis and punctuation).

Bob Dylan's Greatest Hits Voll. 11, (Columbia)

This double LP is a fine Dylan collection that includes material from his earliest albums to his last one and does a good job of juxtaposing various musical periods. The early folk flavored "All I Really Want To Do", is effectively sandwiched between the countryish "I'll Be Your Baby Tonight" and a folk rock styled "My Back Pages".

But the album does include some material previously unreleased. This includes very good recordings of "Watching The River Flow" and "When I Paint My Masterpiece", plus popularized songs like "You Ain't Goin' Nowhere".

The only complaint is the "hissy" sound quality.

Anthology, Steve Miller Band, (Capitol)

This is a strong, quality album mainly because of good material, but it was the only LP that was put together by the artist. "Anthology" was made up of Steve Miller's favorites, taken from the seven LP's cut to date. The personnel on each recording, the date and place of recording, is listed. Strangely, all but two songs of the 16 were recorded in 1969.

The cuts vary in mood from the solid rock base of "Livin' In The USA", to the gentle ballad form of "Seasons". Backup musicians include the talents of Boz Scaggs, Paul McCartney, Lee Michaels, and Nicky Hopkins.

No sore spots.

Eric Clapton At His Best, (Polydor), $7.98

Clapton, (Polydor), $5.98
Polydor Records is playing an interesting game with record buyers and Eric Clapton. Maybe you can guess exactly how many new Eric Clapton albums they can put out which are made up of permutations of songs on the LP's, "Layla", "Eric Clapton" and "Blind Faith". So far the number is three.

First came, "The History of E.C." and it together with the single "Layla" was an unexpected success. Then followed a group of four double LP's centred around Cream and its personnel. "E.C. at His Best" is part of that packaging concept. It's a fine collection and content-wise far superior to its historical predecessor. Tracks like "Presence of the Lord" from "Blind Faith", "Let It Rain" and "After Midnight" from "Eric Clapton" and Derek and The Dominos "Layla" are clear evidence of Clapton's most innovative guitar work, as well as representing some of his best vocals and compositions (except for After Midnight). The low list price for a double album set is another plus mark in its favour.

But the blatant exploitative nature of "Clapton" is unforgivable. Four of the eight songs come from the "Eric Clapton" LP and the others from "Layla". It doesn't stand up well on its own.

Both album sets are "hissy" and both give credit for research(?) and collation to Shelly Snow. Unfortunately, Snow's address isn't given.

Honeymoon as plastic as society it bemoans

"And countless plastic things": That was the sub-heading given on the program of the musical called Moon and June and Honeymoon, now playing upstairs at Old Angelo's. If you've arrived at the point where a Saturday evening's entertainment consists of a table in a nightclub, then you too might find that this musical is one of the plastic things it bemoans so ridiculously.

Director Ronald Ror has taken songs of Ooug Randle and devised a musical that, at least formally, reminds one of the famous Jacques Brel Is Alive and Well and Living in Paris. That is, we see two men and two women singing in various combinations with some suggestion of dramatic conflict and character portrayals, though no pervading plot. The performers have the vocal gifts to do justice to the revue format, but, unfortunately, a workable format does not a successful musical make. Jacques Brel and his American arranger, Mort Schuman, have the advantage of a poetic imagination, wit, and true musical inventiveness. Of Moon and June and Honeymoon. Does not.

One basic theme of the production is a sense of disgust and disillusionment with the wonders of a technical, corporate society. Numbers like Coloured Plastics, Batteries Not Included, and The New Industrial State are an attempt at satire, but the dissatisfaction they communicate is at best vague and diluted. The lyrics are predictable and repetitive. The social criticism, as heard in Vive le Company, has been much more imaginatively treated in How To Succeed in Business Without Really Trying or What Makes Sammy Run. Here we learn what we already know, and the cliches can't even be drowned in Angelo's special Oubonnet and Vodka cocktail.

Perhaps the fact that we see four impeccably groomed, fashionably clad performers reduces our ability to believe that they do indeed feel oppressed by capitalism. Songs like Lots of Luck Little Children and What Went Wrong With the World just don't ring true. When we remember that the clientele that so warmly applauds Randle's songs is the supposed inhabitant of the stagnating society they describe.

Interspersed are songs of the sentimental variety, many of which have very hummable melodies. Humming might be the solution, for the lyrics are at times excruciating. Great God Almighty, I Miss You Girl, Its Best This Way, To Love You Again. By way of a left-handed compliment, it must be said that the songs are sensitively handled by the performers, even when their content shows a flatness that is unforgivable. As in the case of the social criticism, it has all been said before, with infinitely more soul.

The second from last number is the most daring confrontation of "The System," Who'd Be a Kid Again? It contains a soul-searching process whereby Robert Jeffrey, the principal singer, rejects the middle-class values presented in tuneless rhymes by the other three. Verbally the number is awkward and a bit embarrassing in its accusation and bitterness. However, there is a good amount of passion in Robert Jeffrey's portrayal, enough to make the audience uncomfortable for the first time. Why, then, does this effect have to be nullified by the final company number, My Friend, a work of pure corn syrup?

The answer is fearfully simple. We are in a cabaret. The admission fee is four dollars per person plus drinks. And beer is not fifty cents. We have come in order to be entertained, or more precisely to be served. Or it could be we have come to serve the needs of the society mentioned so many times in Ooug Randle's songs. In any case, we are supposedly expecting light entertainment, and anything too thought-provoking or too threatening is not going to ensure a healthy cabaret business. In fact, the perfect kind of entertainment for the crowd appearing at Old Angelo's is Randle's light and genuinely charming The Man Who Wrote a Hit Song. It makes no intellectual pretensions. It is gay and uncompromising.

Of Moon and June and Honeymoon is a variety show that pretends to make a point about modern life. There is not enough continuity in the production nor enough imagination in the content to make this point effectively. Slick staging, and the combined substantial talents of Robert Jeffrey, Christine Chandler, Brian McKay and Barbara Barsky cannot create a respectable whole out of an essentially two-faced production.

Western mighty clever but too slick

On over at the TWP (Toronto Workshop Productions) the Yanks is gettin' it in the neck again for your casual genocide. Don't get me wrong now. This here ain't about the Vietnam War. I'm talkin' about what our good friends south of the border done to their injuns long about the second half of the last century. A city fella by the name Art Kopit has wrote a damned clever thing about this story.

First thing you know, Buffalo Bill himself rides out on stage — the big spotlight hittin' him all the while. Only thing is his pony's made of plastic and some guy keeps comin' on the PA and telling him to get off the stage. This ain't the big hero we heard about since we was kids. It turns out this whole shebang's a combination of Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show and This is Your Life Buffalo Bill Cody.

Just what you'd expect of a Wild West Show, the stage has three parts. On the right is Old Glory on a pole. This part is fro your Yanks:

Senators, Wild Bill Hickock, Annie Oakley and the President of the USA himself. On the left is a bunch of poles tied together and stuck in the ground with a cattle skull on top. This side's for the Indians especially Sitting Bull, Spotted Tail and Chief Joseph. The middle part is usually for Buffalo Bill who kinda holds the show together.

But, like I already said, this ain't your average Wild West Show. You get to see Bill killing buffalo, talking to the Injuns, performing for the President, scouting for the cavalry all these incidents strung together like for a movie or a T.V. documentary. The part that come off funniest was when Buffalo Bill, Wild Bill Hickock and Jeff Braunstein was performing this here awful skit for the President and the First Lady. Wild Bill kept on balkin' on account of he didn't think it fit for him to be playin' himself as a character. He stuck it out though and ended up raping a white woman he saved from an injun who warn't really a injun but a high-powered Kraut actor brought over special by the President to give the greatest performance ever of your noble savage with a German accent.

Now don't get me wrong. This shebang weren't all laughs even though it was a Wild West Show. The more you watched the seriouser you got 'cause the Injuns was gettin' a raw deal and Buffalo Bill was chewin' his guts out on account he knew he helped kill 'em off and he didn't wanta die in the middle of his Show with makeup on his face.

I gotta admit this part of the show got a bit preachy at times. Now I know the Yanks like to take progress with 'em wherever they go, so it figures the Injuns, who was unfortunate enough to live where the Yanks was movin', got a bit rolled under. But since I never killed no Injuns I felt a mite squirmy for Buffalo Bill when he delivered hisself of a Sunday-style sermon. Maybe this was 'cause he didn't really fool me into believing he was Buffalo Bill. And them Injuns didn't fool me nuther. I ain't never seen Injuns with such clean lookin' duds, such cream-white faces or fuch high-pitched, fast-movin' citted voices.

Apparently this shebang weren't put together by Bill Cody but by a slicker by the name Barry Wasman. Maybe that's how come it drug its feet. For a Wil West Show, it didn't have enough hootin' and hollerin' by a long shot Well, I got my reservations about Indians (that's what Art Kopit calls this show) but I must admit that by the end I was a mite choked up seein' as how our good neighbours south of the border acted kinda mean a century ago and seein' as how they ain't learned much in the meantime about killin' what stands in the way of progress. If you want to shed a tear for the bygone Indian race, mosey on down to Alexander Street and stop in at Bill Cody's Wild West Show.

Contraception means: control over bodies, Third World repression

It was Thomas Malthus who first saw the possibility of human overpopulation in the early nineteenth century, but it was not until recently that the full implications of uncontrolled population growth were fully comprehended and the population panic started.

The immediate reaction of scientists and governments has been to facilitate research into, and distribution of, contraceptives. Their reasoning is that over-population can be avoided, or at least minimized, by restricting the size of future generations. Almost all literature on the problem of overpopulation is more or less a variation on this theme, although some writers can see no hope for survival at all. Bonnie Mass's pamphlet "The Political Economy of Population Control in Latin America" examines the actions, policies and people involved in population control programmes, and challenges the validity of the traditional, narrow, interpretation of population problems.

The U.S., for reasons that will become clear later, feels the threat of the population explosion most deeply. Government attitudes have undergone a complete reversal from being anti-birth control before the World War II to forcing birth control programmes onto the populations of many Third World countries today.

Philander P. Claxton Jr., a special assistant to the U.S. Secretary of State on "population matters" voices the position taken by the different U.S. birth control agencies: "The real tragedy is for the individual family. The very quality of life is threatened by the quantity of life. Human dignity is degraded. For the vast majority of families in the LDCs (less developed countries) the possibilities of improvement of the welfare of parents and children are submerged by sheer numbers. Health of mothers is impaired by multiple births. Lives are imperilled and lost by abortions. Children suffer malnutrition and death. Education is low or impossible for many or most". A World Bank Statement of 1968 gives perhaps a more plausible reason why such huge agencies promote birth control programmes: "All such activity arises out of the concern of the bank for the way in which the rapid growth of population has become a major obstacle to social and economic development in many of our member states. Family planning programs are less costly than conventional development projects and the pattern of expenditures involved is normally very different. At the same time, we are conscious of the fact that successful programs of this kind

The agencies involved — the International Planned Parenthood Federation (IPPF), the World Bank, the Agency for International Development (AID) and many others, controlled and directed by the male capitalist elite of the U.S. now spend millions of dollars in the Third World convincing governments of the crisis, dispensing and fitting IUDs and carrying out large-scale sterilizations. Latin America received around $18 million in 1972 from AID for population control programmes.

It has proved easy for the U.S. to "convince" Latin American governments of their population crises: Bolivia, for example, with a population density of only 4 inhabitants per kilometer, accepted birth control programmes when threatened with the withdrawal of aid.

The women of Latin America have likewise been "convinced" of the need for birth control. Bonnie Mass documents evidence of the persuasion techniques. Offers of free medical services for themselves and their children, medicine and milk, and, in some instances, lipsticks and plastic pearls, have been sufficiently convincing. In Brazil between 1965 and 1971 over a million women were sterilized. In the Dominican Republic the Ford Foundation has been known to buy out young people with offers of $5 to $7 a month for life in return for sterilization. AID instituted a similar programme in Costa Rica.

But what actually constitutes a population crisis or problem? A large population in itself is not a problem, the problem arises when the survival of a significant proportion of the population is at stake. Insufficient food supply and exhaustion of natural resources must be the determining factors in the definition of the problem. The assumption that there is a world shortage of food jars with the fact that Canadian farmers were recently forced into not growing wheat despite massive starvation in parts of the Third World; the fact that only one tenth of the world's total land area is under cultivation; the fact that vast areas of fertile land in the Third World are used, not for growing food, but for growing non-food crops such as coffee, to please the palates of the "haves" in the First World. (The paltry sums of money earned from such crops is insufficient to import food for the general population, let alone allowing a change over to food production. In any case, the U.S. would not allow a government that proposed to do that to take power — witness the Bay of Pigs, the invasion of the Dominican Republic in 1965, of Guatemala in 1954, etc.)

Are we wrong then to think of overpopulation and lack of food as problems in themselves? Are they not, in fact, only symptoms of the real problem? And is not the real problem the system which divides humanity into the haves and the have nots and ensures that the former survives at the expense of the latter?

The U.S. with 6 per cent of the world's total population already consumes 55 per cent of the world's natural resources. A more equitable distribution of food and other resources would inevitably lead to a drop in the standard of living enjoyed by the bourgeoisie of North America. The presence of a large starving population in those countries from which the U.S. gets its wealth is dangerous for the U.S. and for the elites of the countries concerned. A quote by a conservative Colombian student in "The Political Economy of Population Control in Latin America" illustrates this fear: "Since it is the lower classes which are growing the fastest, and the ones that have the least to contribute to the country and who are also the most anxious for political change, I would say that population growth — that is the growth of the working class — is dangerous." If the starving demanded and obtained an equitable distribution of resources, the whole capitalist system, and the U.S. on the top of the pile, would collapse.

Now we can understand the reason why the U.S. promotes birth control as heavily as it does, and why such programmes in the Third World are aimed specifically at the poor. The U.S. is, in fact, trying to eradicate the condition of not having by controlling the numbers, and therefore the strength, of those who do not have. The threat of communism and equal sharing of resources has driven the U.S. into using economic sanctions and bribes to force sterilization and IUDs onto the masses of the Third World.

"The Political Economy of Population Control in Latin America" makes clear that for women in western society, contraceptive and sterilization techniques have given us greater control over our own bodies, and have been an important factor in our own liberation. But while we fight for control over our own bodies, we must also fight against the male elites of the USA using the same technology to control the bodies and voices of our sisters in the Third World.

Bonnie Mass, "The Political Economy of Population Control in Latin America".

COPSEO brilliant

Time is running out for the wonderland of liberal education.

Lewis Carroll has met his match. A government report that favours universal accessibility and human centered learning in the context of educational cutbacks and more scholar for the dollar? "When I use a word," Humpty Dumpty said, in rather a scornful tone, "it means just what I choose it to mean — neither more nor less."

"The question is," said Alice, whether you can make words mean so many different things."

"The question is" said Humpty Dumpty "which is to be master — thats all"

A report that recommends cutbacks in continuous education in favour of continuing education? "The open door in the learning society would not then be a revolving door but would lead onward through a lifetime of continuing or recurring education, as far as any individual's capacities and interests could carry him", the report says. "The rule is, jam tomorrow and jam yesterday — but never jam today". "It must be sometimes to jam today" Alice objected. "No it can't be" said the Queen. "It's jam every other day. Today isn't other day, you know."

A report that sees education as a necessity not a trill, yet refuses to treat it as a public utility in terms of costs? "Contrarywise", continued Tweedledee, "if it was so, it might be; and it it were so, it would be; but as it isn't, it ain't. That's logic".

A report that predicts that "total government control of post-secondary institutions is perhaps the end to which present trends are leading us" and then proposes a board to act as a buffer? "Curiouser and curiouser."

"It's a poor sort of memory that only works backwards" the Queen remarked. Noevertheless, it might be useful to view this report, The Learning Society: Report of the Commission on Post Secondary Education in Ontario, in historical context. Commissions have been looking at education since the beginning of the century trying to work out an appropriate relationship between the dismal sciences of economics and bureaucracy and education. The degree of continuity with the COPSEO report is high.

In the days when men were more honest, the Royal Commission into the University of Toronto in 1906 sought to resolve the conflict before them. "The universities of the new world had, in the main, been formed after the pattern of those in the Old Country. But now came the age of science and of demand for an education which should not only cultivate the mind but tit for the practical occupations, and help to the prizes of life." As they saw it; "In this new world, with great natural resources to develop, and with an ever increasing variety of material industries to attract the energies of young men, the objects of university education have been both multiplied and modified. The modern university, still cherishing the love of learning and intent upon the pursuit of knowledge, must adapt its courses of study to every phase of human progress. It must set the standard of public education. It must minister in ways hitherto deemed to lie beyond its domain, to the practical as well as to the intellectual and moral needs of the country."

To this end the Commission proposed a rash of administrative and bureaucratic reorganization to facilitate modernization. It also tiled some financial proposals, in the best spirit of the new age. "Not less is it the interest of the State to devote a generous share of the public funds to the development of an institution so intimately associated with the material interests of the country. Canada must train her own sons to be her captains of industry. The agricultural, mineral and forest wealth and the waterpower of this Province call for a practical capacity and a specialized knowledge which only a modern university can supply and it is the happy function of the Legislature not only to sustain the moral influences that come from higher education but to contribute to the national prosperity by adequate votes of money for the training of youth."

Government and the university: an intimate partnership.

The lower echelons of the educational hierarchy were also in for a revamping. Using Froebel and the new concepts of educating "the whole boy" as condiments, mass public education was served as a new meal of Education For Industrial Purposes. As John Seath, author of the report of the same name introduced his 1911 study to the Ontario government: "For a varying number of years the problem of Education for Industrial Purposes has engaged the attention of almost every country in Europe and almost every state of the Union as well as of almost every province of our own Dominion. The present importance of the problem is the result of three main causes:

1. The rivalry amongst commercial supremacy and skilled workmen;
2. The imperfect public education to include cultural training, maintained wholly at public expense.
3. The modern external education to include cultural training, maintained wholly at public expense.

"Of the foregoing causes the keen rivalry amongst the world — a rivalry which intensified by increasing production and transportation, a general desire for wealth is cause." Even the federal system. As their Royal Industrial Training and Technical: "The schools in most cases

The university of the past was small educational development for a small society is geared to providing mass educational philosophy.

ficials, professional people and the leisure class.
They must now adapt themselves to the needs and circumstances of existing society, most of whose members are productive or conserving manual workers or workers with machinery."

A major problem which both these reports highlighted was the inability of apprenticeship systems under the direction of trade unions to supply and 'adequate' pool of skilled labour. A large part of the function of the new industrial education was to undermine this guild monopoly, this "decadence of the apprentice system" and provide an alternate source of skilled labour.

The essentials of the educational system of Ontario today derive from these important reports. The current rash of commissions do not exhibit any drastically different concerns.
Following a long period of government neglect (Between 1917 and 1950, university matters were debated in the legislature only four times, and on none of these occasions was a vote taken, the COPSEO report notes), education became a blue chip investment and social panacea. The pinnacle of rhetoric was reached with the Hall Dennis report of 1968 with the clarion calls for universal accessibility and child-centered learning.
Now the problems faced by the commissioners is that the occupational and manpower training needs of the economy have changed and they have been left with a hot bag of old rhetoric.

They are trying to overcome this handicap by wooing the public with the proverbial
"something old, something new, something borrowed and something blue." The blue of income is low enough. Honorable traditions are of course maintained to the last, too, as recommendation 108 calls for the complete removal of all vestiges of "in loco parentis". In this, the report reaches the apex of its liberalism

— the individual is released from all non-market restraints so that he may do battle with the market only on the basis of his class position.

A little word juggling also handles the other contentious aspect of the first report, the problem of university 'integrity'. We return now to the theme of the reports at the turn of the century — the attack on the guild. Student housing and library services are to be opened to the public in a delightful gesture of egalitarian liberalism. Post-secondary education is to be more carefully plugged into rationalized programs of manpower training.
The university, like its ancestors in the skilled guilds, is being proletarianized. The battle against privilege can be joined by many an odd corporate fellow.

The university's students are facing total subordination to the needs of industry on the financial and structural level. In dealing with this, the policy of OFS and SAC are as outdated as the old elite university which was replaced at the turn of the century. We are not negotiating with gentlemen. We are dealing with a business proposition.

Ultimately the regearing of education to serve social rather than industrial needs, to serve the working people as a whole rather than capitalism, will require a major restructuring of this society's institutions. That much seems clear when the proposals of this report are posed in historical perspective. The missing link in the capacity of the government to carry out the cutbacks remains the willingness of students to struggle against them. "The best university that can be recommended to a man of ideas" Emerson recommended many years ago "is the gauntlet of the mobs." Its time to test some of our ideas and aspirations in struggle.

rhetorical hangovers. Except for Commissioner Careless' reservations about the "misuse" of limited resources through a misplaced egalitarianism, they all seem to stand behind the Ameri-Canadian dream. The borrowings come from the anarchist Ivan Illich and his concept of deschooling society which has been brilliantly abused. The new is of course the cutbacks which the main purpose of this report is to sneak in.

The call to battle in the holy name of cost benefit analysis that marked the first Wright Report is missing from this rendition but the scorched earth policy of their financial proposals, is still there. Recommendations 109 to 126, for those who have the patience to read that far, contain all the proposals necessary to pass the costs of education on to students while inflating hopes of bursaries to come if the parental

Rapid change has left the university system in chaos.

Presentation surpasses poems

Press Porcepic crafts handsome books

For those of you who are wealthy aesthetes, who like little books of poetry accompanied sometimes by charming scribbles, Press Porcepic may be of interest. There is no doubting the visual quality of these four books from Erin, Ontario. The fineness of the paper and printing, the borders and illustrations are uniformly delightful. This is where poetry likes to be, between good stiff covers in a small, unimposing collection.

But the quality of the poetry itself is disappointing because it is so uneven, ranging from the utterly mediocre to clear brilliant song in some of Joe Rosenblatt's stuff. But mostly this poetry is crouching somewhere on its knees, in some literary half-embrace, unable to stand on its own two feet. It seems embarrassed by its own precociousness because the setting is so good on these beautiful pages.

Without money, one can make nothing perfect. But money cannot make everything perfect. We come to know that more and more in this grant land of Canada. A sad lesson.

There are patches of things striking home, well-stated lines, but not enough to keep the collection together, not enough to justify the prohibitive cost of these books. Tales and Bumblebee Dithyramb were by far the most pleasing to me. Angel I found revolting and Tim Inkster's, The Topolobampo Poems left me too bored to review.

Eldon Garnet has written a pretty little book of poetry about rape and death and body hatred. Another in the series of long-winded examples of that startling new art form of battered love poems by jaded young men spoilt by sex.

Its interesting to follow the passage of his successive woman images from madonna-shaped angel to single-minded whore to some semi-holy female form so pure as to not stir any violent fantasies. On the whole Garnet's women seem to be the scum of certain John the Baptist fantasies. It is hard to imagine if Garnet held the church to be sacred that he would ever admit women to it. But this is not to say that the poet, the "I" in all the poems, the man that is set against all these women is pure. He is powerful and that is what distinguishes him above all else.

The book's last poem is about castration, the fitting end to a compulsive rapist and all the miserable poems preceding it. But why write poetry about this self-defeating poisonous experience? To shock lovers out of their reverie, to bring them down to the more real existence of compulsive sex hatred? To woo a woman, to convince her that she, above all others, is the only one that can now grant sexual salvation to a miserable sensitive poet by a single act of love?

I conjure up some picture of this poet as a small boy who after having the toilet seat cover fall down for the first time on his poor "thing", rushes to his mother and after laying it on her bed says, "Yes, mother, you were right. Take it away. It's caused me too much trouble to be worth having."

Garnet's woman hatred seems to be based on the filmsiest of evidence, as shown in "Cigar Smoke in her Eyes." The reason here seems to be her body, her tits because they have been claimed by lesser men.

tits are for virginal boys planning their escape from mother's bed tits the cheap breakfast.

Perhaps he dislikes these innocent apporitions of womanhood because they can serve a nurturing function, because they have an organic viability that he disavows entirely. Perhaps he hates them because they cannot be victimized like a cunt.

Cunt you can measure me with your screams.

This miserable lover-poet goes on and on, ramming woman in bed. It's like looking at Freud's repetition compulsion through a sheet of cellophane. Bad dreams. There is no continuum. Sexual experience seems blunted past a certain point, the point of credible experience. Garnet describes sex as power grabbing, fame-grabbing, anything but mutual and loving.

I swear it on my masculinity someday fuck the sky
... I will come to the rhythm of air not hips
I will reign
the world
I will be worshipped like the fountain of youth.

Garnet does not reveal any particular facility with words. He describes that which is easy to describe. There is nothing in this book that is either delicate or moving or for that matter does it convince me of the power of the penis. There is no basis for penis envy here. As a woman described it in a movie, in a line that was later edited out or reasons known only to the CBC, "it reminds me of a piece of old rope."

Good stuff! Joe Rosenblatt has written a delightful sunny book about bumblebees and other warm, cosy things one finds on picnics, at home and abroad. Wonderful read aloud to children and cooks over mid-day dinner preparations — the suggested light reading companion to The Voyage of the H.M.S. Beagle. Indeed, if Darwin had been given the social go-ahead, he might have unearthed this treasure himself — the sight to see fantastically human portraits of creatures as Rosenblatt has taped so deeply. Gerald Durrell taped it amusingly.

But Rosenblatt's insects are given a very personal sexual thrust; the minds of men and women on the make; being made; all the postures of humanity. Without references or embarrassment, he looks at nature minus the titch of original sin. A topical trespass into the perspective of man as polluter would have been easy, forgivable, but he's avoided it. Rosenblatt writes as one who partakes in the DNA embrace. The poems are examples from gleaming sunlit life by a man who seems existentially captivated by the dance of his own sperm — carried away by the organic lushness of life.

His poetry conjures up kaleidoscopic visions of impossible colours — a man on a trip through a premature reincarnation as a bumblebee. "I'll try another flower", thinks the honey bee/ "tast so goddamn delicious, this flower/ ummm... such O, dour & colour".

There are some good poems about humans in this book. Poems about some unfettered children of God, poems about death that curiously admit no shadows.

"Passing by the Jewish Funeral home
... I suddenly encounter the orbs of Mr. Z
... Years ago Mr. Z had fitted my uncle into a walnut".

"The Shell Game" reminds me of nothing so much as the photographs of Diane Arbus; the head-on quality of looking out on a world more beautiful than oneself with the assurance of knowing oneself too well to have to look in.

"For twelve hundred bucks which shell is the poet under,
MR. DEATH?"

This is sharp stuff in a world where people firmly grasp the trigger of death paranoia.

For unfettered children read, "Grass Head", perhaps the most accurate description of being stoned in Canadian literature. All those space-time warps, those (whoops! almost had a bad dream) weirdies come racing back, ALIVE.

This is a good book. The word plays are excellent — geometric bundles of word repetitions. The shapes of all his BZes bring to mind the sound of bees better than a cassette would. Not to forget his drawings, superb nice skinny tangled things. I shall probably dabble in this book before bed for months to come.

Tales is a collection of dreams, glances out the window — the stuff and temperature of the child world. Vigneault's captured the still and absolute quality of events caught in the memory, in the spider's web.

In stark prose, he's lifted symbolic objects out of a rich domestic world-without waiting, pushed them out of home and into a story. Glasses of water in cheap restaurants, black pianos, picture frames — these things have so much power, not only as sentinels who let the past be known in dribs and drabs by allowing out only those memories which reinforce the prevailing beliefs, but they also change the texture of the present. We live voluntarily blinded by past experience.

These are small stories about big people and rooms, conveying the very smell of smallness and stuffy parental interior design. "Thinking she was alone, Julie climbed the high stool and firmly perched on it as to be able to reach the book on the table. With a lot of patience she managed to open it wide. From every illustrated page innumerable little people emerged, quite plump and alive, the tallest barely two inches high and scattered in all directions."

The brown book cover helps. At least that was the prevailing colour of my childhood. I remember lots of dark skinned furniture, only slightly lighter rooms, violin rosin Rosedale dust (the closest urban kin to the rural variety). I never remember much light coming indoors, the greedy house plants taking it all as they cluttered together on the window sills. Vigneault has taped these memories.

But childhood is also fearful and bizarre and mysterious. "Without making the slightest movement towards the streetcar, inside which I could imagine some filthy horrifying torture was taking place, I began walking slowly towards the way out of town, which I guessed to be between two huge masses of green, the last available exit from this peaceful hell of calm and sweetness."

The impact of these stories is weakened by slight shifts of perspective from the deeply childish and personal to the narrative for a total effect of an autobiographical myth. I find this confusing when added to the rather abtuse enigmatic "messages" that seem tacked on at the end. The structure of the stories is too regular and predictable in this respect. For this reason the stories together do not work well towards the advantage of each individual one. They cancel each other out leaving a strong general impression but little to the stories themselves.

There are moments of delightful imaginative flights such as in the "Street Lamp", "A little girl who had her own garden had planted in it some electric bulbs in the hope (a very dim hope) that they would grow into luminous flowers or perhaps, although she wasn't quite sure which shape it would take, simply some light."

But the regularity of the stories gives me the impression that they have been ground out, dregged up from the memory and imagination. Slow and easy. Tales slow and easy.

Diary of amateur abortionist

Fine Toronto novel limns alienation - lightly

Dave Collins, the medical part of Toronto Free Clinic, has written a remarkably good short novel.

Darwin updated

In these uncertain times when religious bookstores appear and disappear with bewildering rapidity, what can a family man do to keep his shit together? Questions of this magnitude fit about the brainbox, induced by the glib grimness of Margaret Atwood's book. True, underwear is necessary in Ontario and people have been known to sweat to death in Louisiana. I am reminded of a story told by The Hawg of Downchild Blues Band during a recent performance. Describing a friend, he said "Hank is the kind of guy when you ask him a question he faints thinking about the answer."

Can you imagine a new development in West Bramalea called Rolling Survival?

So to survive the immediate deathlike effects of the use of the word 'survival' you have to split your head in two and stop thinking about saving paperclips, or your thoughts.

At certain points survival is 'imagination', at others it is habit. There is a new species of red worm in Lake Ontario that eats garbage. An imaginative natural response on the part of creation.

The key to understanding the variability of survival is the concept of homeostasis, harmony within a body. Maybe there isn't a picture that will contain all this, but we can study images - animals, hand gestures, chants that sound like water. We must study them actively - in the sense of being receptive to the influence of whatever it is we wish to know about.

Survival is the marriage of habit and imagination. Come and hear Donna & Teena & the Churlettes sing Wedding in the Chapel at SURVIVAL next week.

The Mending Man is the diary-in-retrospect of a pseudo-naturopath turned amateur abortionist. His continuing trouble appears to be that he very terribly wants to be someone or something, but has been unable to find anyone willing to agree that he's made it. Even his attempt at an abortion fails, since, as he explains, "... I had trouble getting all the geography right. You're looking at a picture and trying to see something that is solid, that has depth as well as length and breadth." His preparation consists of reading seventeen books in one day, during his first and only visit to a medical library.

We never learn the name of the Mending Man, and he limps through his diary without a face, although someone comments that he looks something like John L. Lewis.

We do learn a great deal about him, and since the whole thing is first-person, the style, which is excruciatingly consistent and obsessively precise, does a lot of the telling.

Our man is hooked on Numerology, Health and Vibrations - and the capitals are his. He has worked as a foundry apprentice, carnie hand and slaughterhouse helper. He explains that he doesn't enjoy chaining up cows so the knife-man can do his job, but that it helps pay the bills for his Health Enterprise. In the Health Enterprise, which is the front part of his one-man apartment, he "rents" glass jars of nutrition supplements to avoid any charge of dispensing medicines. He also builds some machinery to test Vibrations and get them in Harmony. His description of the equipment is vague, but it seems to be a cross between a stethoscope and a milking machine.

Our man grew up on a mixture of Shakespeare, James Fenimore Cooper, and Flash Gordon. About Don Winslow of the Navy, Renfrew of the Mounted, and the Lone Ranger, he muses, "... I always thought, there should be more talking between them. I always wanted them to sit down by the fire some place out there where they did all their adventures and have a good talk about different things, but they didn't." He tries desperately to get close to someone, anyone - to touch - and it is this overwhelming need that finally contributes to his willingness to perform the abortion.

What it's all about is the aloneness of being human in these "scientific" times. Our man is not so much a freak as a quite reasonable, if irrational, product, of these oh-so-rational, but quite unreasonable, years. Just when you think he's at his most freakish, you nod and say, "Hell, I did (or thought) something just like that!" He's very sensitive to the pain and enjoyment of others, this Mending Man. Working on one of the carnie rides, and watching the smaller kids, he says, "... they would climb in the little airplanes and go round and round, with their eyes as big as saucers, never saying a word. Just living those couple of minutes up there all of eight feet off the ground. It was like there was some kind of poetry around that the kids were listening to, and you couldn't hear it, but you could watch their faces and see them enjoying it."

There may be a few who will disagree with The Mending Man as one more unnecessary salient into the no-man's-land of alienation. But it's a more human book than most, and one in which the author has consistently remained within the mind and style of the personality he is helping us to experience. And we'd better experience him, because he believes man is broken and lives by mending - and he means to be part of the glue. He's determined to help, somehow, to try it again when they let him out of jail.

DAVID M. COLLINS.

Anthony & Eleanor Paine exhibit cyclopes, batiks

Anthony Paine and Eleanor Paine, husband and wife, have a combined exhibition at Hart House until March 30. Anthony Paine was born in England and has taught on the east coast. His drawings and prints indicate that he is obsessed in a mild way with the Cyclopes, which figures in most of the pieces. His drawings have titles like "Holy Cycloptics Descending" and "Western Cycloptic Family". As he says, they are like cartoons and rely on careful shading for their contours.

The statements the drawings make seem to be primarily social, rather than artistic or technical. He could not tell me what he really had in mind in blending Western garb with the figures of the Cyclopes, which he limns sparsely rather than grotesquely as you might expect. The prints are in series and tell a story: a cycloptic romance continuing through marriage and child-bearing.

I like his two drawings, "Rain Clouds" 1 and 2 the best, and this is what he is doing now. The shading is elegant, the content primarily technical. This is also true of "Near Cambri" which seems an exercise in perspective. There is nothing to push you over in this exhibit, though expert handling of media mark the pieces although the effect is more of a veneer of good draftsmanship than a depth of artistic eloquence.

His wife Eleanor was born in Singapore and she bases her work on the Javanese batik. Batik technique is simply as follows: a cloth is painted with a mixture of molten wax and dye. The wax is then removed by chemical treatment (in this case, dry-cleaning) and the dye remains. Eleanor claims that her result differs from traditional batik in that the latter is usually decorative and does not require much skill; abstract designs come about by rather casual application of the wax-dye mixture. Eleanor's pictures are carefully stylized reminiscences of medieval illuminated manuscripts. The most original one is titled "International General Bullsup" which is a directly frontal view of a huge, square-shouldered, bald if duce — it reminds me of some of Ben Shahn's anti-facist pictures.

Each batik has its own carefully graduated colour scheme and I believe this is the most beautiful aspect of her work, although she must be given credit for the mammoth technical achievement involved in her version of batik. She has some gouaches of vegetables and other plant life as well using a magnifying glass to achieve a surrealist effect.

Generally, the two artists do not complement each other, and none of the work here seems major to me except in a very technical sense — in the sense that is, of fine workmanship. This is enough to make the exhibit fascinating and educational, but the feeling of "I never expected this" doesn't open your eyes wide with amazement — something I regrettably feel like saying about many Hart House exhibits this year.

Film dwarfs triumphs of play

Sleuth a sampler-box of Olivier's dazzling gifts

There are people who like nothing better than a good practical joke; others who find them, if not downright stupid, a waste of ingenuity and time. Sleuth is similar, a sort of elaborate practical joke on its audience, and, no matter how lavish and dramatically sharp you make it, you can't disguise that fact. It will delight some, bore others — its appeal is so largely a matter of tastes.

Sleuth's a joke that was custom-built for the theatre. Anthony Schaeffer's thriller, still running in London and New York, was a cunningly wrought piece of theatrics, a wind-up toy that exploited all the resources of the stage to spring its trap. By no means was it great drama but, granted the peculiar goals it set itself, Sleuth was a brilliant success.

Properties as hot as this are picked up by the big studios soon after opening night, but Sleuth has made it from Broadway to Hollywood in what must be record time. Joseph Mankiewicz directed the movie version, with Laurence Olivier and Michael Caine as its stars. Not surprisingly, the translation to film of such a studied, brittle theatre-piece has not been a complete success, but it has resulted, despite the problems, in an even splashier entertainment.

Now that sounds like a film buff's unfathomable paradox, but movies and theatre engage our imaginations in different ways. When we go to the theatre, it's to be impressed. Any bamboozling the actors or playwright try to put over on us is done with our complicity. We overlook, even relish, the artifice of the stage.

Movies are something else. Whenever a stunt is brought off on film, though it may startle or amuse, vague suspicions lurk in the back of our minds. We remember all the film-cutters, the make-up artists, the special-effects men and set designers who can work extravagant wonders. It's just not the same as having it done right in front of our eyes by actors who have no outside help, no second chance. So what was daring and triumphant on stage may look laborious or trivial on film. It's just too easy for them to work up this sort of shell-game to hoodwink the audience.

The particular stageisms in Sleuth that have grown a little rusty on film I could describe only at the risk of jeopardizing the plot, hence the generalities. But there is one major change in the film version that tells against it: there is no intermission.

That may seem a quibble. But the intermission is one of the most eloquent passages of Schaeffer's script. The first act, which is supposed, after all, to set us up for the climax, culminated with an event so unexpected that it seemed the play had nowhere else to go. A good part of the fun was speculating about what could possibly happen now, scrutinizing the program for possible clues, and eavesdropping on the theories of other bewildered theatregoers. The movie, though it preserves the shock intact, just doesn't afford such a delicious stop, smack at the most maddening point in the action.

Since I had seen Sleuth already, I wasn't preoccupied with negotiating all the hairpin turns of the plot. Sleuth with foreknowledge is like a jack-in-the-box the second time it springs at you. Either you find it silly, or you go critical, and start examining the workmanship.

During stretches that were inevitably dull second time around I was prepared to amuse myself with the ingeniously detailed set, with Schaeffer's rather precious wit. (There are some interminable doldrums when Inspector Doppler is plodding around clue-hunting; this is Alex Cawthorne's first movie role, and I suspect it will be his last). But I wasn't ready for Olivier, and all at once I was glad there were no surprises to distract me from watching him.

He plays Andrew Wyke, best-selling creator of St. John Lord Merridew, a portly fictional snop. Wyke invites to his fusty manor house Milo Tindall, ("whose hairy chest in summer is matted with suntan oil"), a London hairdresser who has been servicing Wyke's wife. Things take off from there.

Wyke's is a broad role, a deliberate cliché, and Olivier can do what he couldn't do with Hamlet or Archie Rice or even Richard III: he can pull out all the stops. Those of us who haven't seen much Olivier before, or know only his rather eccentric Shakespeare (about which we are liable to have our own opinions) can glut ourselves on this a sample box of his talents. For the space of five or six priceless words, in dialect, he becomes a completely different character; he throws out Schaeffer's epigrams with a pitcher's curve; he slides his eye a quarter-inch, and it's a stroke of comic genius. Only toward the end, when he gives Wyke a bit more tragic grandeur than this rarefied play can support, can he be faulted.

For the rest, a few words. Caine is fine, but who, frankly, cares with Olivier there. The set has just the right clutter detail, with Wyke's leering penny-arcade gadgetry in every corner. But there is just too calculated a use of trappings dear to upper-middle-class America, like booze bottles with recognizably affluent labels.

As a mystery tour-de-force, Sleuth ranks with Agatha Christie's The Murder of Roger Ackroyd, so if you have any sympathy for that sort of thing at all, you'll appreciate this specimen. If you've seen the play already and have decided, understandably, to pass up the movie, be advised: Olivier makes an insubstantial confection like Sleuth more satisfying than you could have imagined.

Neglected work of an old-fashioned craftsman

Humanness of Canada informs Reaney's poetry

James Reaney's (collected) Poems don't fit the pattern carved by some of the more recent critics of Canadian literature, who talk a lot about victimization, and about how cold it is out there, and how cold we are in here. True, Reaney has been linked to Frye's theories of mythopoeisis; but it may not have been mentioned often enough that he is also one of a rare sort of Canadian literary heretic — I group with him Robertson Davies and Stephen Leacock, and there may be more — that looks at the country genially, and from that cast of mind sees that it is, above all, a human place.

Reaney is less a poet who has to say something than one who has something to say. GOOD MANNERS! Reaney is a masterly and traditional technician; further, he has a lot of respect for his readers, and doesn't mislead them. The formal elegance of his verses, since he began to write publishable poems in the mid-40s, has usually been like a warm hand in which we sit. Here are a few lines from "A Suit of Nettles". Branwell, the melancholic goose, opposes his friend Mopsus, who counsels detachment:

... I want offspring summerson autumnman wintersage
And trickerrain thawwind panetap uleap windrage
Plow and seed and hoe, green, suckeple, yellowripe,
sicklestraw and all such glamourie.

Al Purdy, in the Globe and Mail, worried about Reaney's nostalgia. It's there, but it isn't as important to notice in any of Reaney's works about childhood, birds, animals, small towns and their eccentricities, clichés, birth-copulation-and-death, whatever, as is his amazing richness of expression. Purdy's poems and his readings of them (this is ad hominem criticism, but it makes the point) look and sound so casual that it's hard to tell if he worked on them at all; I always suspect that Reaney's poems are finished, that they bear the mark of his goodwill upon them. There has obviously been a collaboration between the tradition and an individual talent. Very few of his poems have been, or appear to have been, swatted out of the air like fijas, and just pinned on the page.

And for a citation I keep returning to "A Suit of Nettles", by far the most articulate set of the poems in this collection. Here's the eloquent Mopsus, telling how his father subdued the owl Melancholy:

... It made all life seem edgeless, blurred
And sat upon his head
Fouling his shoulders and his hair,
Raising its young in that strange lair
And vomiting up the dead.
He never stirred to shoot it off
But waited late and long enough
Until it sank from sight.
Soft answered did its wrath dissolve
And sink into the gay revolve
Of his thoughts so light.

One thing Reaney's humour and ease with the demands of language present the reader with is a sometimes deceptive lessening of tension when he talks about death. This book includes the sequence, "The Dance of Death at London, Ontario", statements by various representative inhabitants of the town, and replies to them by Death. All the poems are amiable, understated quatrains, macabre in their offhanded stillness. No anguish, just a measured insistence on what comes to us all. This is ever Reaney's way.

The Bride & the Bridegroom

SHE: Mother & Father have spared no expense.

Is that someone's foot on my train?

HE: I bet I remember this moment
Again & again & again.

DEATH:

There go the bride and the bridegroom!
They'll stay at our hostelry.
To its luscious bridal chamber
We've devised an ancient key."

Reaney's vision is essentially comic; the form taken in these poems by his denunciations of what he dislikes is mildly satiric, at its most severe. He doesn't get savagely polemical or ironic. In his early poems there is Death also, a big, hollow puzzle. But later, in the "Dance of Death" series, and in "Eight Christmas Cards", we are fed the Word made Flesh. The baby defies Death's Dance; he admits to being "one of your things", but bears Death no dread, for I know a Holy One who some day will Shut up thy book with the hands of Life."

Perhaps Reaney means Christ, perhaps the Poet, who, according to Blake (and here Blake's identities are likely valid, because of Reaney's identification with Northrop Frye's ideas) is Christ anyway, the Honest Man who speaks his mind. In a sense the Holy One is all of us, or could be, if we would stop the habit of wanting our own death by wanting that of others.

The complexity of Reaney's poems peaks with "A Suit of Nettles" (1958), a group of eclogues following a year in the lives of some all-too-human geese on an Ontario farm. (Reaney has apparently collected no ordinary poems since 1965; he's a prolific dramatist, and this large book ends with a few Patches-like poemdrawings, and some lyrics from Reaney's plays, 1953-71.) The English model for "A Suit of Nettles" is Spenser's "A Shepherd's Calendar", and there are numerous others in earlier European literature. Here we see the geese (who talk, provoking us to forget who they are, and lest, become too proud, or because we have become so, who we are — how often did my elementary school teacher, or a sentimental lover, call you a "silly goose?") argue over the bringing up of goslings, the lack of love, the widow or foolishness of birth control, progressive education. They sing exquisite songs to spring and to each other, visit the archetypal Ontario fall hooraw, Mome Fair (a microcosm — the topical and cultural allusions in these eclogues are sometimes trained, and Reaney provides footnotes); also, we witness their deaths, as they go to serve the farm family, becoming roast geese and goose feathers, goosegrease and toothpicks, plucked geese for market sale.

The structure of the poem is circular and it slides in and out of the pastoral mode, implying again and again that Reaney sees the universe as having a real meaning, that there is human or goosey order round about. Despite the despair before death of Branwell Goose, who can't see a path that leads between one's Head & one's body, there is always an old goose like Kezia, who escapes the chopping block. Sad only perhaps, she nevertheless goes on laying "all the possible eggs inside her".

A few words about the physical package in which these poems come. The colophon is gigantic by contemporary trade standards — four paragraphs. Handset titles, with major headers set in wood type, the kind old circus posters used to be made of. Tim Inkster of Press Porcepic got Reaney's Alphabet press when that magazine bit the dust, and he pulled the proofs for the titles, and with Mike McDonald designed and printed the entire book. So much for background information. The offwhite paper feels opulent and heavy, but the whole inking job is grey, and many pages are so full of print as to be really uncomely. I don't know how it happened, but an entire one-page poem has been set upsidedown. The title, page number, and line numbers, and likely the illustration opposite (the mistake is on page 189) are right side up. The mistake comes in the middle of a signature, and there isn't any excuse for such a hilarious pasteup error.

I am a little ashamed to confess that James Reaney is a Canadian poet of whose work, until I had undertaken to read this large book of his (281 pages), I had known only by a couple of lines from a couple of lyrics in A.J.M. Smith's Oxford anthology of Canadian poems. I shouldn't have waited so long, although I have loved the lines I have carried with me. The editor of this volume, Germaine Warkentin, of Victoria College, provides an informative & unpretentious essay to introduce Reaney's writing to the persevering reader. If this review drives a few more people to look at his poems (and plays), then it will have done its job.

The Albert White Gallery has another African Art exhibit: "The Ivory Coast and Sierra Leone", until March 29. At the Shaw-Rimington Gallery until March 30 is a photograph exhibit by Neil Newton: "Durham County: People and Countryside." Gallery Seventy Six has an exhibit "Stuffed Painting and Drawings" by Karen Viva K. Haynes. Until March 25. Beginning March 22 Irving Grossman, an architect, exhibits some of his work at the Faculty of Architecture building at 230 College Street.

Beginning March 24 the Art Gallery of Ontario hosts an exhibit of original drawings and proof sheets surveying the history of the American comic strip. The exhibit includes Rudolph Dirks' The Katzenjammer Kids, 1903, Frank D. King's Gasoline Alley, 1921, R.F. Duncanson's Buster Brown, 1923, Pat Sullivan's Felix the Cat, 1935, Charles Schulz's Peanuts, 1951, and Walt Kelly's Pogo, 1954.

Gallow's Humour by Jack Richardson is The Drama Centre's most recent production. It will open next Wednesday, play until the 24th, and then the following week from the 28th to 31st. To be seen, free of charge, at the Studio Theatre.

Circus, a creation of Mark Manson, also plays from March 21 to 24, at UC Playhouse, 79a St. George St.

Toronto Workshop Productions began its run of Indians last night. It plays Tuesdays through Sundays at 8:30 pm. See today's review, partner.

Elizabeth Swerdlow's musical, The Big Apple, also opened last night at the Goyal Village. It runs Tuesday through Saturday evening. It is the story of a dancer's struggle to live her art without outside restrictions, told through dance, song and spoken word.

The Factory Theatre, which called itself, "the home of the Canadian playwright" is closing down due to lack of funds. Its recent local initiatives program application was turned down due to its recent dispute with Actor's Equity over Works, the Factory Short Play Festival. According to the artistic director, Ken Gass, the lack of funds would have seriously affected the artistic quality of their planned production of Bagdad Saloon by resident playwright George Walker. Apparently the Factory staff has been working without salary since December 20.

By making the Canadian identity of the playwright a prime factor in producing its plays, Factory provided a sympathetic atmosphere for young unknowns. Most of the over one hundred productions will fade back into obscurity, but some, such as Creeps and Battering Ram by David Freeman, and Esker Mike and His Wife Aguluk by Herschel Hardin will receive more attention both in Toronto and in the rest of the country.

Innis College, 63 St. George Street, is sponsoring something called The Revolting Theatre Wednesday at noon and Friday evening. Come and find out.

For classical farce at its most impetuous, try Les Precieuses Ridicules, playing weekends at the Theatre du P'tit Bonheur.

You can still see Electra at the St. Lawrence Centre, Battering Ram at the Tarragon Theatre, The Master at Theatre Passe Murelle, and Tommy Steele's London Palladium Show with dozens of dancing girls.

music

At the Faculty of Music on March 16, 19, 20, 21, and 22 there are student recitals. Phone 928-3744 for info and confirmation on the day of the concert. March 22, for the Thursday Afternoon Series, Arne Nordheim gives a lec-

At the St. Lawrence Centre tomorrow night (March 16 at 8:30 pm) Ann Chomodolska gives a recital as the fifth recitalist in the series Young Canadian Performers. This soprano will sing works by Cesti, Mozart, Schubert, Spohr, Dvorak, Faure, John Rapson clarinet and John Newmark piano accompaniment.

On March 25 from 3 to 4 pm in the Sculpture Court of the Art Gallery of Ontario is a concert of works by Beethoven, Schumann and Martinu performed by Jennifer Jahn, cello, Anne Rapson, violin and Beverley Cavanaugh, piano. No admission charge.

On March 25 on CBC-TV at 3 pm Stravinsky's A Soldier's Tale is being televised. Stravinsky's witty piece may be acted or narrated and the production is from England.

pop

The Survival Conference Spring Festival (see Survival section in Watsup) is putting on some fine music all next week, all free. Monday at 10 pm it's Luke Gibson and the Killaloe Mountain Band at Innis College, 63 Harbord St. Tuesday, same time, same place it will be The James Hartley Band. Wednesday at 10 pm, with the location shifting to the Hart House Music Room, it's String Band. And Friday at 4 pm, back at Innis, there will be a song-writers workshop with Tuli Kupferberg (of the Fugs), Luke Gibson and others to be announced. The one festival event for which there will be a charge is Thursday's benefit for the Quebec-Gothic Residents' Association. The price is $2 in advance, $2.50 at the door, for a concert by Bill King, Beverly Glenn-Copeland, Horn, Bruce Miller and John Lyle. 8 pm, Convocation Hall.

Survival will be presenting other music at various times. For that information call the Survival office 928-2738 or 928-2697.

Murray McLaughlin is at the Riverboat, on Yorkville (922-6216), tonight through Sunday displaying that puckish grin so reminiscent of Michael J. Pollard, that graces the cover of this month's McLean's. Murray's doing many of the tunes from his first two True North albums and his guitar playing is stronger than ever. That flat picking style of his seems to be giving him access to more notes these days and a lot of neat tricky riffs are in evidence. Dennis Pendith (formerly of Simon Caine) is helping out on bass and Murray's even using the piano for a few songs. The keyboards are a good idea since they force Murray to alter his vocal phrasings a bit. Also there are a sprinkling of new songs with one for the best, being "You Need a New Lover Now" which gives Murray's voice a challenge which he meets quite well.

When you use the word "big" with the Downchild Blues Band it refers to the added brass section not the weight of the band. That "big" version is at the El Mocambo tonight and tomorrow. Check the cost of beer and the cover charge by calling 961-2558. Fats Domino opens on Monday.

Kenny Loggins and Jim Messina represent some of the finest elements of the composing-production-performing sphere of rock music. They'll be at Massey Hall on Sunday.

survival

If you've survived the university well enough to have any time these days, next week's rather underpublicized Survival Conference and Spring Festival is worth dallying at. The "survival" of the title means everything: individual survival (what are you going to do when you don't find a job?), neighbourhood (where are you going to live?), cultural (how are you going to live), ecological (on what?) and psychic (why and with whom?).

The week begins with Canadian Indian philosopher Wilfred Pelletier leading off a session on living arrangements, at 8 pm Monday in the Wilson Hall lounge, New College. From then on the conference is an incredible hodge-podge: artist Joyce Weiland talking about the plugging up of James Bay, once-Fug Tuli Kupferberg leading sing-songs, Quebec-Gothic people discussing their urban resistance campaign (and putting on a big music benefit), Joe Rosenblatt talking and reading his poetry, Dr. Duncan Blewett suggesting consciousness exercises. There will be sessions on food (politics, nutrition, herbalism, cooking), architecture without architects, dome-building, song-writing. (For a partial music list see Watsup music section.) And a number of survivors will talk about how they have done it, among them Cree medicine man Ernest Toutousis and Sara Bowser (How to Survive with Whiskey and Work). It's all open-microphone, very informal, and free, with the exception of Thursday's Quebec-Gothic benefit concert.

As there is no Varsity on Monday, you might clip our Survival schedule elsewhere in today's Varsity. The meetings are also included in Here and Now, in a slightly more up-to-date version. All next week the Advisory Bureau at Harbord and Spadina (above the bank) will be an open-house conference head-quarters. Ever-expanding schedules will be available there or at the SAC office. For information call 928-2738, 928-2697.

Already thinking how to do well course of action appropriate to this strategy is a counter-Olympics, a parallel Games staged under conditions determined by athletes and coaches themselves. There's some precedent for this. In 1936, several hundred athletes opposed to Hitler's policies tried to stage a parallel Games in Barcelona. Unfortunately, the Spanish Civil War broke out three days before it was to begin.

At the moment, I support the first strategy for the following reasons. In the first place, the Montreal Olympics could provide a tremendous boost to Canadian sport. They would break down the isolation that has stifled Canadian sport since World War II. They would expose Canadians to the ideal of excellence in sport that the pervasive monopoly of the National Hockey League and the repressive teaching of physical education in the schools has never let them see. They would offer an alternative to the popular view that sport is just another commodity for buying and selling. And, they would likely encourage millions to discover the joys of physical culture.

Properly speaking, the Olympiad is a four-year period, not simply two weeks of competition. Thanks to Jean Drapeau's procrastinations, we've lost much valuable time, but we don't need to wait for him to begin. As soon as the snow clears, other countries will be sending their top coaches to scout the conditions of Montreal. We should borrow a trick from the Mexicans and detain these coaches for Canadian clinics. Now that Canadians are already thinking about how their athletes can do well in 1976 — usually they don't address their thoughts to the Olympics until Lloyd Robertson gives the summary of the semi-finals — it's a good time to fight for the facilities and other supports like good medical services that will give us a fair chance at a medal. It goes without saying that such facilities should also be resigned for men and women who have no Olympic ambitions but need a good place in winter to play.

During the next 42 months, we should also use every opportunity to dramatize the association of sport with the other arts forms — music, painting, the dance, and so on. Before 1952 Olympic competitions were actually held in the arts, at the same time as the athletic events. Last year, the Germans revived the tradition, although with festivals not competitions, and we should too. Almost every Canadian artist at some time or other has tried to draw or paint an athlete and some, like Greg Curnoe and John Boyle, have done extensive work on sporting themes. Let's unleash all their creative energy on the celebration of sport and play. They could certainly help us break down those puritan hang-ups still too many Canadians have that sport is for heart patients, juvenile delinquents, sadists, and ne'er-do-wells.

Secondly, Canadians have an obligation to sustain the Olympic movement. We've been competing in it since the 2nd Games in Paris in 1900 and between the wars, when many more men and women made sport an active part of their lives, we actually won several medals. Other small nations (Finland, Holland, Australia, Mexico) have hosted them, so it's certainly our turn.

Thirdly, the presence of the Games in Montreal gives us some clout with the Organizing Committee and the IOC. They want the Games to go on even more than most athletes do. As a price for our participation and support, we should demand a number of reforms, the most obvious of which would be the decentralization of events across Canada. According to the budget presented by the Organizing Committee (COJO) last week, capital expenditures will eat up $250 million of a $310 million budget. But as several people have pointed out, other parts of Canada already have world class facilities for many events. Sure the IOC would object, but at this point what could it do? Health Minister Marc Lalonde, the cabinet minister responsible for sport, has said privately that Ottawa wants the Games shared with other Canadian cities. So the climate is favourable.

Many other reforms come to mind: athletic representation on all IOC disciplinary bodies, the elimination of national anthem victory ceremonies (at the World Student Games they play Gaudeamus Igitur at every victory ceremonies) and parity among officials. At the 1968 Olympics in Mexico, the last Games for which figures are available, there were 4,362 officials in sports like swimming and gymnastics in which men and women competed in equal number; 4,237 of these officials were men and only 125 were women. Any group of athletes could quickly add to this list.

Finally, concerned athletes should support the idea of the Olympics because it will keep them in touch with other sportsmen and sportswomen, many of whom still believe that sport exists in isolation from other forces in society. If we are to be successful in our efforts to change the character of Canadian sport, we must keep talking to the athletes. Rejecting the 1976 Olympics will make that considerably more difficult.

Recently, a number of athletes and sportspeople met to organize support for the Montreal Olympics. Now that the IOC has given Drapeau and Rousseau its continued blessing, athletes must continue to meet to map out the strategy and program for the next 42 months.

The difficulties in organizing sportspeople for this purpose should not be minimized. The demands of athletic perfection — the long hours, the physical strain, the concentration — have always made it difficult for world class competitive athletes simultaneously to pursue another complex activity. Politics is certainly a complex activity. In addition, not all Canadian sportspeople are concerned about the militarism of recent Games. In the current issue of the Canadian Track and Field Association News, executive director Harry Kerrison writes:

"We must be honest and practical and face the fact that, from both the team standpoint and that of the individual: "the aim of the game is to win!"

International sport is, to a great measure, a form of substitution for or miniature form of war, but far less tragic and with far fewer casualties.

It is to counteract views such as Kerrison's that athletes must begin to caucus and organize. Subsequent action will have to be determined accordingly, but it is encouraging to note that athletes in many other countries share these concerns — remember the Olympic Movement for Peace last summer — and they can be expected to help.

It's not, as I say a happy prospect. No longer can sports people plunge into their training and expect that all will be well with the world. But the opportunities for a saner, more democratic, more humane sporting culture are just as real as the villains and the problems. It's those opportunities athletes should fight to develop. Bruce Kidd

Finals may be returned

Arts and science students will be able to get their final exams back if the faculty's General Committee accepts a recommendation Monday — but only for a fee.

And, the faculty's Committee on Standing urges that proposes that students be able to petition to have exams remarked if they are dissatisfied with their marks.

Students now have no control over the disposition of the exams, which in many cases constitute a substantial portion of final marks, except they can pay five dollars to have internal addition of marks checked.

The five dollar fee is retained in the Committee on Standing's suggestion to cover costs of photocopying the exams to sent to the student requesting it. The original paper would remain with the faculty.

The all-faculty committee's recommendation was sparked by the referral of a student motion at the General Committee calling for automatic remarking of exams for the same five dollar fee. New

(editorial)

College student rep Howie Levitt, who along with UC rep Seymour Kanowitch moved the original motion, is now supporting the forthcoming resolution, according to arts and science minutes.

However, Committee on Standing student assessor Bob Anderson, also newly elected SAC president, says the resolution avoids the real issue.

Anderson complained that the suggested procedure is only concerned with students dissatisfied with their marks, and has "nothing to do with a learning process."

The New Program Review Committee (on which he sat) has recommended that exams be automatically returned so that students can realize where markers feel they went wrong, he noted.

The resolution is "very unsatisfactory", Anderson stated, "but an improvement over the present situation."

He predicted that the mild reform would pass the General Committee.

Aid proposed for crucial early school years

By ALEXANDRA MERCER
 "The problem of accessibility to post-secondary school education begins at the lowest level", professor David Stager said Tuesday at a panel discussion on tuition fees and financial aid plans. Stager felt that "the concept of accessibility" must include not only post-secondary school student aid but also help disadvantaged students where they need it most—at the initial stages of the school system.

Stager, co-author of a report on the educational opportunity bank for financing post-secondary school education and a U of T economist at the Institute of Quantitative Analysis, was speaking to 50 people in the Medical Sciences Auditorium during the day of study on the Commission on Post-Secondary Education report.

Stager thought the contingent repayment financing scheme, recommended by COPSEO whereby students repay their educational debts on the basis of their later earning income was, an "attractive mechanism".

"Payment according to means is more equitable than assessing an individual's eligibility on the basis of his family's income when his family may have nothing to do with his educational funding" Stager asserted. He emphasized that the area of student aid becomes important to students "only when they have made it to the university level", lower income students having been weeded out long before.

U. of T law student Dick Nowlan suggested that poorer students should be made cognizant of financial aid schemes when they are in Grade 9 when they can decide to take university pre-requisite courses.

Nowlan, a researcher on student financing for the Ontario Federation of Students, described high school guidance programs responsible for informing students of educational alternatives as "inept at best and a farcical waste of the taxpayers' money".

"Now that numerous colleges of applied arts and technology have been constructed, lower class students are streamed off into them", Nowlan stated. There is still "no organized effort to discover lower class students with university potential".

Describing himself as "a fluke" as a "lower class" university student, Nowlan said he felt that the proposed government plan to cut off loans to students after their first five post-secondary school years would leave poorer students who wished to go on to professional and graduate schools in the lurch.

U of T student awards officer Patrick Phillips said he would like to see "an examination of the values which the post-secondary school system in Ontario is promoting".

There seems to be "an assumption that public and private benefits accrue to a person's education and the individual should pay for the private benefits" he said. "But does the student benefit from his education?" Phillips sees student protest in recent years as "a protest at the diminution of quality in higher education."

"Quality of teaching has declined; educational benefits have declined but the draft (COPSEO) report sees tuition fees doubling or tripling," Phillips exclaimed.

Part-time student governor Joyce Denyer asked the panelists why they were being so critical and reminded them that "education now takes 40 per cent of the provincial budget". Hence, she contended, "the governments can't go on stretching the tax dollar indefinitely".

Describing "benefit-cost analysis as deceptive", Stager stated that we shouldn't think there's a magical upper level where education financing has to stop". Asked by a member of the audience where the money was being spent, Stager said it is "difficult to discover where the educational dollar is going".

According to Stager, faculty salaries have remained stable and administrative expenditures are difficult to establish. Nowlan volunteered suggestions for financial savings; buildings could be much less elaborate and administrative expenses cut back, but "on no account should the student have to suffer for tight budgeting".

Students protest honour to prof

LONDON (CUP) — University of Western Ontario President D. C. Williams condemned last night a student protest against the granting of an honorary degree to Canadian-born economist Harry Johnson.

Referring to a planned student counter-convocation as "utter lack of co-operation of their part," Williams said in an interview Wednesday that administration officials who decided to move the special convocation and study session to March, when the students would be on campus, "are regretting their decision."

"We decided to move the date (from June) to March for the benefit of the students," Williams said.

Without hesitation and in obvious anger, Williams called the event an attempt to embarrass the university's own convocation events to be held for four days next week.

Students plan to give awards of their own to author and commentator Pierre Berton and federal NDP leader David Lewis at ceremonies Thursday night in Alumni Hall.

The move was triggered by the administration's decision to give an honorary degree to Harry Johnson, a Canadian-born economist who believes North America should become one economic unit ruled by market forces.

Williams felt the student move, referred to as Confidence Canada by the organizers, was the latest of several student moves taken this year to sabotage university affairs and traditional events.

"Mr. Berton and Mr. Lewis are both welcome guests on this campus," Williams said, "but I wonder if they know that they are being used by the students."

Williams said he had not tried to contact either Lewis or Berton to discuss the issue.

No attempt has been made to stop the counter-convocation nor will any attempt be made before the event takes place Thursday, Williams said.

At its last meeting, the students' council had rejected several other requests for funds, Williams pointed out. But the USC, in approving this event, found the money problem non-existent.

"I find it funny that they can find the money now," he said.

Williams was adamant on his stand of non-co-operation with students as a result of this latest protest move by students. He inferred in the discussion Wednesday that attempts at joint efforts with students in the future would seldom occur.

Workers leave as hearing bars witnesses

Two workers suspended by U of T over a month ago recently found their case sent directly to arbitration after both the university and their union refused to allow them to take witnesses into a university-level hearing. Grounds workers Greg Keilty and Claude Brown were not permitted independent witnesses at a February 21 hearing, U of T and Service Employees International Union Local 204 says, because their attendance would likely have violated the collective agreement between the two parties, possibly rendering the entire appeal procedure invalid.

Keilty and Brown said they wanted witnesses in case of possible legal repercussions from the grievance appeal. Both fear the suspensions, which came after they refused an order February 1 to work at a property away from the downtown campus, are the first step in their firing.

Each was arrested and charged with assaulting police later that day after participating in a demonstration against feared layoffs outside the university's 215 Huron Street personnel office. The charged the university's order to work away from the downtown campus was an attempt to prevent them from demonstrating.

U of T labour relations manager John Parker says that although the university's contract with Local 204 does not specifically prohibit outside witnesses at the initial hearing of the grievance, the validity of the procedure might be challenged at a later appeal if witnesses attended.

The collective agreement calls for, in addition to the university's attendance "their (the grievors') presence, union representatives and that's it," Parker maintained.

He added, "It's my responsibility to conduct the meeting (properly) . . . and I won't authorize other witnesses."

Local 204 business agent Don Barclay agreed with Parker, admitting "I refused to let them in."

He also called the Brown's and Keilty's insistence on witnesses "a violation of the collective agreement."

Since the grievors would not enter the hearing without witnesses, and union and management would not hear the case with them, the appeal went directly to arbitration. Both the union and management have named representative to the arbitration board; the third (picked by both bodies) and a date for hearings have yet to be settled on.

Although Barclay did not support the aims of the workers, and opposed their witnesses' attendance at initial hearings, the union is still backing their grievance.

Meanwhile, both are without pay.

Synthetic food to be main future diet: prof

By VALERIE TATE
Within the next 100 years, synthesized foods will form the largest part of man's diet, while natural foods will become gourmet delicacies for only the privileged few.

In the field of materials production, there will be more and more compulsory leisure time as the use of mechanization and robot-run factories make full employment impossible.

This was one of many predictions made at Convocation Hall Wednesday by U of T chemical engineering and applied chemistry professor Ray Woodhams in a lecture on materials engineering.

The earth's natural energy deposits will be largely exhausted in the next 100 years, Woodhams stated, and only by the efficient use of nuclear power will the present state of North American affluence be maintained.

According to Woodhams, at the present rate of population growth, all arable land will be utilised in the next 30 years. This condition will necessitate the use of artificially produced proteins, such as are now being used to feed animals in England and Japan.

In an effort to convince his audience of the delicate balance in materials and energy needs and potentials, Woodhams explained that should method technology by destroyed, there wouldn't be enough natural resources left to raise the level of society above an agrarian state.

Experiments in biological and genetic engineering have resulted in the production of a protein-making machine and the synthesis of human growth hormones. Eventually, this ability to modulate human growth will lead to the treatment of genetic disorders such as hemophilia and diabetes, Woodhams predicted.

Woodhams, co-inventor of a synthetic rubber, was giving the second lecture in a series commemorating U of T's engineering faculty's centennial.

College hockey moves toward pros

By BRENT SWANICK

The middle class emphasis on university education in recent years has affected the aspirations of young hockey players. The traditional Junior A route to the professional ranks is by-passed by many in favour of university education first, hockey later. Some players have an honest interest in the university environment, while others simply want to improve their bargaining position at contract time.

The theory goes something like this: a degree equals an alternative job opportunity and consequently a pro team must pay more to sign a player with a degree than one without. Also, what one could call "the safety valve effect" plays on the minds of aspiring pros, the "If I don't make it to the NHL I better have a degree to fall back on" idea.

Canadian players go to the United States on "hockey scholarships" with the express intent of hockey first, books later if I have time. John Danby of Mississauga, Boston University, and the New England Whalers is one self-admitted example. Technically, Canadian universities offer no hockey scholarships but some schools make "concessions" to their athletes, not only in hockey, but also in other sports (notably football).

There is tremendous emphasis placed on winning at these schools, but in the quest for hockey excellence they have compromised their academic standards for the benefit of a few athletes.

St. Mary's University is one example. Huskies' coach Bob Boucher has drawn better players from the Eastern League in the past, and these recruits usually play at St. Mary's for a few years then return to the Eastern League not appreciably closer to receiving a degree.

However, the real issue is: what is the purpose of university athletics? At St. Mary's the university must provide winning teams to have an identity (witness the success of the all-American Huskies basketball squad, this year's CIAU champions).

This is not the case at the University of Toronto. Athletics at U of T are just part of the total university environment. Participation by many, rather than victories by the few is stressed, as evidenced by the intramural program run by Dave Copp, Kaye Boyd, and Susie White.

The emphasis on winning has also led to changes in the eligibility rules. For example, a player who in the past failed was ineligible to play the next year. Now a player is only ineligible if he fails, is not accepted by his original university the next year, and transfers to a new school.

Former Blues' goaltender Dave Tatarny, now at Laurentian, is, technically, ineligible. He failed his first year at Toronto, was not accepted back, and transferred to Laurentian where he now plays for the Voyageurs. Why? Mainly because there is some reluctance on the part of other schools to lodge an official protest about the situation.

The advent of the WHA, NHL expansion and a shift in middle class attitudes toward university education are current forces of change operating on college hockey. First, the two pro leagues need bodies badly, and therefore many prospects forsake university for the opportunity to play pro for inflated salaries. And, others have left university prematurely in order to make a quick dollar. Gavin Kirk, for example, spent last year at Loyola, then this year joined Ottawa of the WHA.

In the search for players, scouts follow college games more closely than in the past. Red Sullivan of the Boston Bruins, for example, attended the December 1 Laurentian-Blues game to scout Bill Buba. And, if Boston places Buba on their negotiation list, no other NHL team can deal with him. However, he is free to talk to WHA clubs.

Boston also owns the pro rights to Gord Davies and Bruce Durno, and Philadelphia Flyers offered Francois Ouhmet of Sir George Williams a pro contract after a league game last November. In fact, the McGill hockey coach was instrumental in arranging the offer. Quite a conflict of interest — the coach works for an organization that seeks to secure professional contracts for opposition players. The McGill coach was eventually forced to resign.

Do college coaches like scouts chasing their players? Blues coach Tom Watt doesn't, since he feels such attention may affect a particular player's approach to the game.

The pro influence on college hockey has been aided by Hockey Canada, or, as it might better be known Hockey NHL. This body supports college tournaments across the nation (usually at Christmas time), and gives scholarships to deserving players based on financial need, academic excellence, and hockey ability. But, the real basis of the awards is the "hockey ability". Is this the beginning of hockey scholarships and possibly a system to feed the pros like the American college football machine? The NHL would certainly welcome it.

Since a BA no longer equals a job, a degree is not the bargaining wedge it once was with the pros, so why go after one? Also, many young people seriously question the value (and not value in purely monetary terms) of a university education. Witness the drop in enrolment at York and Laurentian this year.

What are the ramifications of these changes for college hockey in general? First, the calibre of hockey must drop, at least in the short run, with more players by-passing university for the pros. Second, and more important, how far will the pro influence extend?

St. Mary's coach Bob Boucher would like to see a national super-league of the best teams, with an annual draft by the NHL of the best graduating players. This is just a duplication of the American football machine.

Blues coach Tom Watt wants no part of the pros — college hockey exists for the enjoyment of players and spectators, not for the production of pro prospects. How far the pro influence goes depends on how many Bob Bouchers there are in college hockey. The university is one of the last places where sport is played for its own sake and not for profit. For this reason alone college hockey is better off without the NHL.

Brent Swanick is a former Blues hockey player.

Law in 'ball finals

Law and Meds advanced to the finals of the interfac basketball playoffs with victories over St. Mike's and UC, respectively. The Kleberg Klassic continues tonight at 7 pm in the first game of a best two-out-of-three final series.

Down one game to none, St. Mike's destroyed Law in the second meeting of the series, 84-46. However, the game wasn't that close. St. Mike's 3-1 full court and three-quarters court press — especially the three-quarters court press — completely unnerved the usually cool Lawyers. John Baynes and Larry Trafford scored 32 of St. Mike's first 40 points. For the game, Baynes, the Ventura freewheeler ended up with 23 points, while Trafford scored 21.

The third and final game of the series was a different story, however, as Law defeated St. Mike's 59-54.

In this game, St. Mike's press was not nearly as effective as it had been in the previous game. The game was close until midway through the first half when Al Sternberg scored 11 straight points to St. Mike's 0. Law carried this lead into the half by a score of 35-24.

The second half was a curious half, indeed. Al Sternberg, who possessed four fouls at the half, started the second half and played 18.5 minutes before finally fouling out. The oddness of the situation was that St. Mike's never challenged him to draw his final foul. A second curious feature was Trafford's reluctance to shoot in the final 10 minutes of the game (he took one shot) after scoring 12 points in the first half.

Al Sternberg hooped 16 points for the game, while Rick Pirie and Gerry Saltzman each scored 11. Meanwhile, Larry Trafford and John Baynes were carrying the scoring load for St. Mike's with 17 and 16 points, respectively.

Meds defeated UC 50-43 in the third and final game of their series following Law's win in the preceding game.

Two things were readily apparent in this game from the outset — Meds wanted every rebound and UC was determined not to break a sweat. Meds' frontline of Bill Caskey-Joel Hibloom-Rick Seppala scored 34 of Meds' 50 points. At the start of the game Hibloom, a player not known for his scoring, popped in eight of Meds' first 12 points.

One has to go with Law as the favourite for the Sifton Cup. This is the last year for most of their players while this Meds team is the start of a dynasty. Look for the last year's champs (that is, Law) to postpone Meds win streak by a year.

Yes No

The construction of a new men's athletic building should be placed at the top of the university administration's priority list. The administration should appeal to the provincial government for construction funds, and should also pay for the maintenance costs itself.

Co-educational physical education and athletics should be encouraged; and the men's athletics program, the women's program, and the School of Physical and Health Education should be integrated.

I urge the UTAA to set up a committee with a majority of student (athletes) to define the priorities of the men's athletics program at the U of T.

University workers strike in Quebec

MONTREAL (CUPI) — A common front of five unions has gone on strike, closing down three Québec universities.

The workers are pressing for changes in the job classification system presently in force, increased sick pay and salaries. The three affected universities are the Université de Montréal (U de M), Université du Québec à Montréal (UQAM) and Université Laval at Québec City.

Université de Montréal administrators say their institution will be kept open for classes despite the current strike. If this pledge is to be observed, the university will have to hire strikebreakers and seek an injunction to prevent picketing. Given the past actions of the students and faculty members, such a development may force a showdown with the police and the provincial government.

The workers at U de M have been without a contract since last April.

The five unions represent secretarial, library and maintenance workers and are affiliates of the Confédération des syndicats nationaux (CSN) and la Fédération des travailleurs du Québec (FTQ).

The main point of contention in the dispute is a move by the universities to create a hierarchy among the workers that would not be based on equal pay for equal work. For example, a dean's secretary would be better paid than a secretary working for an assistant dean, even if the work is the same.

The unions are proposing a scientific evaluation of jobs, with a job description and precise criteria of remuneration to avoid individualism and paternalism. The government and universities oppose the plan because it would lift the employees out of the control of their immediate superiors.

Negotiations have been going on for weeks with little progress. On March 14, more than 200 U de M employees marched on the building housing the Québec Department of Labor. Workers carrying placards entered the building and proceeded to the sixth floor where negotiations were taking place. The workers silently filed into the room with the placards, but left quickly when a stink bomb was tossed in. They continued their protest outside for an hour before quietly dispersing. U de M employees went on strike in October Cannons boomed, the Ontario legislature opened for a new session, and a Martian invaded the U of T campus. Nothing strange for the day before spring at Canada's largest multiversity. Meanwhile, The Varsity prepared to publish this, its second last issue for 1972-73.

1971 demanding equal pay with workers in other universities, maternity leave and better job security. Maintenance workers were paid up to $2,500 less than Laval workers. U de M refused to grant paid maternity leave despite UQAM workers ability to take eight weeks off at two-thirds pay. The union also wanted guaranteed job security after six months instead of the 18 months, then in force.

The strike, which lasted for a month, brought support for the maintenance workers from the students, other unions and labor federations. U de M and UQAM faculties are organized under the CSN.

On October 28, 1971, 1,000 students demonstrated in front of the Ministry of Labor to support the workers. The students declared they would not return to classes if a back-to-work order was used against the unionists. A group of students had also briefly occupied the administration's offices. The administration closed down the student centre forcing all student organizations to find provisional headquarters.

The strike was settled on October 29 with little real wage gains for the workers. However they obtained maternity leave and other fringe benefits. Workers can now enjoy job security after one year instead of the previous 18 months.

While the strike was on, the university hired squads of baseball bat wielding goons besides its regular security forces, to intimidate the strikers. A member of the board of governors who is a labor representative leaked the information to the strikers.

One group of strikers manning picket lines one night were attacked by goons using iron bars and bats. A major clash was finally broken up by police who arrested only striking workers. The workers were charged with mischief against private property and their trial will be held soon.

Quebec unions may unite again

By DOUG HAMILTON

The Common Front of Québec trade unions which helped stage the largest general strike in the history of North America last May will probably be reconstituted within a year said the secrétaire-général of the Confédération des syndicats nationaux (CSN) Paul Thibeault yesterday.

"I see another Common Front" in "12 to 18 months", said Thibeault approvingly. "It will be much stronger" and "more committed", he added.

The secrétaire-général said the front will be reformed because "the workers want it".

The Common Front was formed by the CSN, la Fédération des travailleurs du Québec (FTQ) and la Corporation des enseignants du Québec (CEQ). The front withered when the Québec government legislated an end to the strike.

During December, differences between the FTQ and the CSN exploded into a bitter dispute over recruiting in the construction industry.

The Québec government sanctioned a raiding period which permitted the CSN, the FTQ, and the Confédération des syndicats démocratiques to pirate each other's memberships for recruits. At one point, the conflict between CSN and the FTQ was so intense that FTQ president Louis Laberge threatened to sue the CSN for slander and libel.

The suit was later dropped and when Laberge, CSN president Marcel Pepin, and the CEQ chief Yvon Charbonneau went to jail to serve a one-year term arising from charges laid during the strike, rumours buzzed throughout the Québec labour movement that the front would again be established.

Thibeault asserted that there are "no real problems" between the CSN and the FTQ and the confrontation which occurred over construction raiding was not as serious as was originally thought.

He said a renewed Common Front "would be twice as strong" as its predecessor.

Asked if English-speaking workers support the idea of the Common Front as enthusiastically as their French-speaking comrades, Thibeault replied that Anglo-Québécois "have more awareness now after the Common Front."

He said nine of the officers who were imprisoned after the May strike were English-speaking.

"There is more awareness now than ever" among English-speaking workers, continued Thibeault.

The secrétaire-général said there is a possibility that Ontario workers might be asked to participate in future Common Front activity.

other authorized activity on university premises."

The co-authors of the code, Internal Affairs chairman Paul Cadario and vice-president Jill Conway, deny that the regulations are intended to ban all demonstrations and sit-ins.

In separate interviews, they insisted that as long as the educational function of the university was not disrupted, peaceful demonstrations would be allowed.

Campbell asserted, however, that Cadario's interpretation of the subsection dealing with demonstrations was "questionable". "Really," he said, "it's phrased so that it could be interpreted the opposite way".

Although Cadario has said that the math occupation would be permitted under the code, Campbell thought it might not be allowed, noting that it "was intentional".

Discussing the experience of his own committee, Campbell said the main problem lay in defining what is a demonstration. "To me," he stated, "a demonstration is a very short-run thing, lasting a few hours".

He added that this was the operating assumption of the committee.

The Campbell Report attempted to make distinctions between non-violent non-disruptive demonstrations, such as leafletting or peaceful picketing, and the disruptive type which could be either violent or merely obstructive. Examples of behaviour belonging in the latter two-part category included blocking access to rooms and buildings, creating excessive noise or inconvenience to working staff, classes or meetings, and carrying out "threats of violence and destruction of facilities."

The committee found it easy to define the extreme cases, Campbell said, but it could not reach a consensus on whether charges could be laid in cases of "obstructive" protest.

Such cases may be shown "later by objective criteria to be justified", Campbell said, and as result the committee took the position that negotiations should centre around the issues involved and not the disruptiveness itself. The steps taken during the math occupation were an example of this approach, according to Campbell.

The college principal speculated that the Internal Affairs Committee may have been similarly stumped over definitional issues.

"In fairness, I suppose we had done it a different way," he stated. "They (Internal Affairs) haven't been as specific in labelling the different categories and we weren't specific when we got down to the one that was really tough."

"I wouldn't want to be critical of them on that regard," he added.

Campbell praised the report for preserving the basic structure of the disciplinary machinery the earlier committee had developed.

The new report proposes the establishment of a university tribunal to deal with disciplinary matters affecting the entire university, and faculty and divisional tribunals to handle local disputes. The accused in each case will face a panel on which a majority of his or her peers will sit.

Campbell expressed particular gratification that "the principle that staff and students be on this panel is once again elaborated".

"That's a big step forward. It really is," he declared. "That was one of the major issues three years ago."

Implementation of the new code has been delayed as result of the document's rejection by the university's solicitors for use as a legal document on grounds that the code's general statements will not suffice as a discipline code.

A revised version, stating definite prohibitions, is expected to come forward for approval soon.

A progress report from the committee's working group on discipline will be made tomorrow at Internal Affairs' 4 pm meeting in Simcoe Hall's Council Chamber. Cadario indicated Monday that the contentious clause's content is unlikely to be changed.

The Academic Affairs Committee Tuesday will consider chairman R.M.H. Shepherd's proposal to make students a minority on all disciplinary tribunals.

New discipline rules are malleable: Campbell

By JOHN CAMPBELL

The author of the Campbell Report on discipline says that proposed regulations against demonstrations are "fairly sweeping", but not contrary to the guidelines set down in his own committee's report published three years ago.

However, Ralph Campbell, now Scarborough College principal, suggested the regulations could be interpreted as banning even the recent math occupation, which the regulations' authors say would have been permitted.

The university's proposed code of behaviour, passed by the Internal Affairs Committee three weeks ago, states that the "freedom of enquiry" principle it seeks to protect "entitles members of the university... to engage in peaceful demonstrations".

But among eight items it prohibits by way of example, is "intentional or reckless obstruction or disruption or undue disturbance, by any means, of teaching, research, administration, disciplinary proceedings, or any

Math profs appeal directly to Evans

Appeals for tenure from two math professors have gone to U of T president John Evans, while professor Stephen Salaff's appeal of the non-renewal of his contract is awaiting comment from math chairman George Duff.

Professor David Spring last night said he and Michael Mather yesterday formally appealed to Evans for a review of a decision last spring to deny them tenure. The appeal came a few hours before the two received information requested March 5, which they felt they needed to base appeals on.

The information they received, the names of those on the secret tenure committee and scholars the committee had consulted, while "very useful", Spring said last night, is incomplete. Accordingly a request for more information made to Evans, while partially already met, still stands.

The names had been left out of a Thursday reply to Spring's and Mather's original request, according to arts and science dean Bob Greene, because permission had to be obtained from the people involved.

Greene said last night he had asked Duff to comment on injustices Salaff alleged he had suffered in applying to Greene for a review of his non-renewal of contract.

Greene said he had not yet decided whether to grant Salaff's request for an open faculty-student parity hearing on his appeal. In a Friday letter to Salaff, Greene called the procedure "unusual and unprecedented", but he did not rule it out last night.

Salaff's formal statement to Greene explaining the reasons for his appeal charges that "as a result of the hostile, antagonistic attitude toward me (in the math department) as of November, no other question concerning my employment...was capable of objective consideration by officials in the department."

The hostility was due to "three clashes of principle", which he said "were the cause of sharp bias and hostility directed toward me by departmental officials." He notes as evidence that Duff did not reply to his November 27 application for a full-time position until March 2, three days after math students occupied Duff's offices, demanding, among other things, Salaff's rehiring.

Salaff also declares that "It is generally known that in the period of (the three clashes) all significant decisions in the department were taken by the chairman with only minimal consultation with the faculty as a whole."

All three incidents were brought to the attention of Duff, Salaff states in his letter to Greene.

The first clash Salaff refers to was his backing first-year students last spring in a dispute over marking. The second led to him being transferred out of teaching MAT 130 last fall "within a matter of hours" after he informed course leader D.A. Clarke, Duff and associate chairman Ray Vanstone that he would continue to express his opposition to the course's 50-50 exam-term work marking scheme.

The third clash occurred in late September when Salaff refused to teach the same basic calculus course for students with Grade 13 Math A (MAT 130) to students without the senior high school course (MAT 110), although both of the department's courses were similarly described in the calendar.

The department has since recognized the legitimacy of his refusal, he claims, by setting up MAT 110 with another term's work included as part of it.

In reply to a request from Spring to state why he was refused tenure, Duff said the tenure committee decided "the level achieved in the doctoral thesis had not been sufficiently maintained or extended, and that performance in this category did not show sufficiently substantial achievement."

Reports have circulated that the committee was not aware of all the research Spring had done, but the reply to his request asking what the committee had considered of his work was not specific.

Spring's teaching ability, which students have maintained is alone enough reason to grant him tenure, was "regarded as mainly satisfactory" by the tenure committee, according to Duff's letter.

Greene said he would make a recommendation on Spring's and Mather's cases to Evans "within the next three or four days". He requested that he thought their comment for the names of the tenure committee members and consultants was reasonable, and said he was "sorry about the delay".

Spring and the main campus fence mean it's time to study, but neither this student nor the weather is taking it seriously.

SSSC members win acquittals on 3 charges

Members of the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee have won acquittals on three of the 12 charges resulting from disturbances February 1 outside the university's 215 Huron Street personnel office.

In the only trials completed so far, charges of causing a disturbance against Rhonda Fleming and Denise Havers were dismissed on a technicality and Greg Keilty was acquitted of a charge that he assaulted a university policeman during the SSSC-sponsored demonstration.

Fleming, Havers, Keilty and four others were arrested following a picket-line attempt to block entry to the Huron Street building, which also houses the university's fees office. In addition to supporting a group of workers fearing layoffs, the SSSC was attempting to persuade students not to pay their second term fees instalments.

Fleming and Havers successfully argued that the charge of creating a disturbance was not valid since the only Crown witnesses were members of the U of T police force.

The court agreed with their contention that, by legal definition, it is impossible for a police officer to be "disturbed".

Keilty's assault charge was heard in a lengthy trial that began at the unusual hour of 8:30 am daily and dragged on for almost five days.

The Crown suddenly rested its case Friday without calling all the available witnesses, and Keilty appeared confused and unprepared to begin any defence.

After a hastily called recess, Keilty began an opening submission in which he claimed that senior administration officers "are engaged in a deliberate and well-planned conspiracy in this and the other cases resulting from the events at 215 Huron."

Suddenly presiding judge M. A. Charles ruled that the Crown had failed to prove its case and declared Keilty acquitted before he called any witnesses.

At the time of the demonstration, Keilty was an employee of the university's physical plant and was working as a groundsman. He was subsequently fired for refusing to work at Sunnybrook Hospital grounds on the day of the demonstration.

Fleming was also charged with assaulting a university policeman and that case is now well into its second week of somewhat confused testimony and rambling cross-examination. Like the others, she is conducting her own defence.

Fleming is in the second week of her trial on a charge of common assault.

U of T policewoman Marie Weaver testified at yesterday's session that when she arrived on the scene of the demonstration, she found "picketers attacking our officers without any reservation whatsoever... we had to defend ourselves."

Weaver later testified that "she (Rhonda Fleming) called me a bitch and struck my left shoulder". Fleming, who is conducting her own defence on charges of common assault, didn't dispute this at the time.

Weaver admitted that after the demonstration she did go to a medical center, but no treatment to her shoulder was needed.

The trial was constantly interrupted by Crown Attorney Kelp making comments about Fleming's ability to defend herself, and her ability to execute a proper cross-examination.

Kelp's main concern seemed to be that Fleming was wasting "time and money" by acting as her own counsel. At one point early in the trial he declared that "if she doesn't know how to handle a cross-examination, I suggest she sit down."

After a two-hour session, Fleming asked for adjournment. The trial will continue tomorrow at 2 pm.

SSSC chairman Peter Havers appears in court to-morrow on another assault charge stemming from the same demonstration.

Havers, who has received one remand already, has indicated he intends to defend himself when the trial actually begins.

Havers has subpoenaed several high-ranking university administrators including internal vice-president Jill Conway, president John Evans (currently on a skiing vacation in Colorado), internal affairs committee chairman Paul Cadario (APSC IV) and the university's manager of labour relations, John Parker.

All four were involved in the decision, subsequently confirmed by the Governing Council, to call Metro police during the February 1 demonstration.

Should any of them not appear in court when called, the SSSC intends to demand bench warrants for their arrest, Havers told The Varsity Monday.

Parker was subpoenaed last week by a committee supporter following a frantic car chase through downtown Toronto streets. Parker eventually went the wrong way along a one-way street, according to Fleming, and eventually stopped a policeman, claiming that the supporter was harassing him.

However, the unidentified police officer said that the subpoena was valid and Parker was officially served, Fleming said. Parker later told The Varsity that even if he is forced to testify, he will argue that he is not a material witness since he could not see any violence on the picket line at the time of the arrests.

The successful service of the subpoena culminated what amounted to a three-week struggle to find Parker by friends of the defendant and the County of York's Sheriff's office. Sheriffs tried seven times, and others more, to find the seemingly elusive Parker.

Old hacks

Hear ye, hear ye, Varsity staffers, come to the last staff meeting of the year and clear your record of attendance. Plan to be there at 91 St. George St. as the banquet plans are unveiled, at 1 pm. See Maestro Podnick conduct (sans baton) the last (thank goodness) meeting of the year and display his usual savoir faire. So, remember now, this is the absolute last one, Friday at one and old Podnick has laid on a great program.

Students, profs reject Innis course veto

Students and faculty at both Innis College and Engineering have objected to an engineering faculty's decision not to allow its students to take the Innis independent studies course for credit next year.

The Faculty of Engineering decided that INI 203 did not meet its criteria for credit, according to associate engineering dean P.E. Burke.

"The course is not broadening in an academic sense," Burke said Monday. The Engineering Council's Undergraduate Studies Committee accordingly could not "rationalize" allowing credit for the course as it was described in the calendar.

"It (the calendar) does not suggest something as simple as scuba diving," Burke declared.

INI 203 came under fire at last week's meeting of the Governing Council's Curriculum Standards Subcommittee because one student is studying scuba diving for credit in the course.

"The whole situation is stupid," says Innis education commissioner and arts and science interdisciplinary Studies Curriculum Committee member Briane Nasimok. "The engineering administration is equating the whole course to the specific program of one student. A lot of people in INI 203 do more work on it than on any other course."

Engineering Society education commissioner Pat O'Neil backed up Nasimok's claim.

"Five kids in my class are taking the course, and some of them have told me they are working harder on it than on others." He said that there are 11 engineers taking the course.

Second year engineering student Peter Hoades, who is the scuba diver, said that at no time did the Undergraduate Subcommittee consult him on what he was doing. He said that he cleared it with a "sufficient number of people", and had no idea that the "people at engineering were upset".

Hoades spends two hours a week in practical study, and one hour in lectures, which are given by a qualified instructor, through Hart House. Last week he took a regulation exam, and is sure he got over the necessary 76 per cent to pass the test.

Hoades said that he "seemed to be doing quite a lot compared to some others in the course". He suggested that the reason the engineering administration objected to the course was because he was "both enjoying and learning at the same time."

Innis principal Peter Russell said that he was "concerned not only about the decision, but also by the procedure whereby the decision was made".

He was concerned that the decision was made "without getting full information on the purpose of the course and the way it functioned". "All the pertinent facts were not looked at," he felt.

Each engineering student is allowed to take a non-technical elective, a course which is outside the normal courses offered to engineers, Burke explained. The engineering faculty had allowed credit for all the Innis courses in the past, but decided, because of the scuba diver, that INI 203 could not be taken for credit next year.

The Undergraduate Studies Committee, the body that made the decision, is composed of a majority of faculty, and some students. The decision was ratified by the Engineering Faculty Council Executive Committee.

Nasimok concluded, "it seems the engineering administration feels the only legitimate education one gets at university is obtained in the classroom. They have erred if they don't realize the educational value of running your own individual course."

Should reverse no credit decision

The engineering faculty's decision to prevent its students from taking Innis College's independent studies program for credit represents yet another chapter in conservative faculty and administrators' battle against innovative courses.

These conservatives were never very happy as the university was swamped with less orthodox, more creative courses. Their myopic vision of academia could not encompass the less structured, interdisciplinary approach to learning. It seemed to be a violation of all they held sacred.

Yet, there was little they could do initially as students, progressive faculty, and some administrators pushed for the innovative courses. But now, as conservatism reclaims its hold on the university and students more and more return to their role as passive consumers of "education", these conservatives find their views less isolated, their dissent becoming the predominant expression in the university's decision-making bodies.

The university's changing mores permitted the furtive, unsuccessful attempt to scrap the interdisciplinary studies program to get off the ground and almost succeed late last year. And, it accommodated the engineering faculty's decision to refuse credit for the Innis course.

The course under attack, INI 213, allows students to set up their own program and choose either pass-fail or numerical grading. Engineering students have been able to take the course as a non-technical elective.

Engineering's decision not to allow its students to take the course next year apparently stemmed from one supposedly objectionable independent studies program. One of the engineering students enrolled this year is learning scuba diving as his project. A debate over the academic legitimacy of this project occupied most of last week's meeting of Governing Council's Curriculum Standards Subcommittee.

Rather than overreacting to one questionable project, the engineering faculty should have taken the time and effort to investigate the work being done by the other engineering students enrolled in the course. According to a news story published in today's Varsity, many of them find they're doing more work for the independent studies course than for their non-elective courses.

That knowledge, rather than the scuba diving example, should have guided the engineering faculty in making their credit decision. Instead, the administrators responsible apparently seized upon the opportunity to scuttle an innovative course (for their students), a course which probably does more to broaden their students' horizons than do most of the other non-electives available to them.

The manner in which the engineering faculty went about making the no-credit decision also throws their motives into question. They did not canvass the 11 engineering students now enrolled in the course to find out their views about its worth, nor did they let the scuba diver know they were displeased with his project.

And, the people making the decision did not bother to talk to the Innis College faculty and administrators responsible for the program to determine what their views about the situation are.

The engineering faculty should reconsider its decision and, if it feels that it's absolutely necessary, set down some reasonable guidelines about the broad limits within which its students' projects should fall to merit credit. There is no justification for simply denying the faculty's students the option of taking the course.

Help, don't hinder planned parenthood

Ontario health minister Richard Potter last week objected to the Ontario Health Insurance Plan covering therapeutic abortions, reasoning, "We don't hand out free birth control devices so why should we hand out free abortions?"

This type of non-logic coming from the man responsible for the province's health policy is appalling. If birth control devices are not provided by the health plan, then it's about time the government included them under the program's coverage. A responsible government should be doing whatever is necessary to remove obstacles from the path of people who favour planned parenthood, rather than imposing some kind of moral-financial sanction on them. Such a practice should be an integral part of an evolving concept of adequate health care.

Similarly, where birth control has failed or not been employed, there should be no attempt to backtrack and remove the coverage now provided for therapeutic abortions. Here too, this attempt to discourage a type of birth control which some people find morally offensive has no legitimacy within the public sphere.

Ironically, at the same time Toronto's media were playing up the health minister's statements, the Cross-Canada Coalition to Repeal the Abortion Laws was holding a conference at U of T. We would suggest that instead of looking for ways to discourage birth control the Canadian government move to give women control over their own bodies, to make "every child a wanted child" by repealing the existing abortion laws and leaving the abortion decision up to the person concerned: the potential mother.

Witch-hunt won't solve the nation's unemployment crisis

Last week's revelation that Unemployment Insurance Commission benefit control officers have been conducting a virtual "witch-hunt" for people to chop off the unemployment benefits roll, should come as no surprise.

Overzealous benefit control officers have been harassing people and scaring claimants into signing statements admitting they hadn't sought jobs when in fact they had, evidence presented to appeal boards shows.

The government's intentional exploitation of the backlash against the number of people collecting unemployment insurance benefits could not but help to foster this type of situation. It's become the popular rallying cry of the demagogues: catch all the ne'er-do-well's who are taking the government for a ride.

The only hitch is that it's an inept government and an economy with unemployment built into it, and not the unemployed who are to blame for the country's unemployment crisis.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission's (UIC) boards of appeals — established to hear appeals by persons disqualified by the commission's benefit control officers — have been putting people back on the benefits list almost as quickly as they consider the appeals.

About 600 of more than 1,000 appeals have been successful, according to the UIC public affairs director Yvon Charlebois. One Toronto appeal board heard 14 appeals last week and unanimously decided to put 10 of the appellants back on the benefits list.

Instead of continuing its search for scapegoats for a backlash it nurtured to excuse itself, the government should concentrate its energies on combating the real causes of unemployment, and that solution won't be minor tinkering with the system.

Who owns "Canadian" sports?

By PAUL HOCH

Hockey Night In Canada, symbol of national unity in a diverse and often divided country, was for many years the property of the Imperial Oil Company. The latter is the British sounding name of the Canadian subsidiary of the Rockefeller family's Standard Oil of New Jersey. So, for years, Canadians got their hockey nationalism courtesy of America's second largest corporation.

Moreover, MacLaren's, the advertising firm which now owns Hockey Night in Canada and chooses its announcers, is the public relations firm for both the Liberal Party of Canada (and of Quebec) and for Imperial Oil — that is for both Trudeau and the Canadian subsidiary of his boss, Rockefeller. Confidential memos from MacLaren's to its advertisers have repeatedly stressed how, as a "national institutions", Hockey Night in Canada is particularly well suited to selling their commercial products.

Tinsel Canadian nationalism sells everything from Senator Molson's beer (or Sam Bronfman's whiskey) to Rockefeller's Esso gasoline. And, MacLaren's which does such a big business in this phoney hockey nationalism is also the ad agent for mammoth American companies like General Motors and General Electric. With complete impartiality, the firm uses hockey to sell both Canadian nationalism and American imperialism.

Hockey is, of course, Canada's national game. Sometimes, it's even called our national religion. Virtually all the professional hockey players are native born Canadians. Yet, as Bruce Kidd points out in The Death of Hockey, 45 of the 53 professional hockey franchises are located in American, not Canadian cities.

Indeed, with the gradual redirection of amateur hockey into a farm league for the American-dominated National Hockey League (and now the World Hockey Association as well), senior amateur hockey is now a dead duck and the junior leagues are, more or less, a pre-professional training ground for NHL (or, WHA) gladiators to provide bread-'n'-circuses for the masses in the American cities.

Similarly in pro football. Approximately seven out of the nine general managers in the Canadian Football League are Americans, not Canadians. Perhaps this is not surprising, since their main job is to recruit top American, not Canadian, players.

Although the CFL claims to encourage Canadian national pride (possibly because it sells at the box office) by placing a stiff upper limit on the number of "imports" each Canadian team can have on its roster, a statistical survey by University of Victoria sociologist Derek Ball published last year found that all of the main CFL positions — quarterback, linebacker, et cetera — are dominated by Americans, not Canadians. The Canadians, according to professor Ball, tend to be "stacked" at least two-deep at all the more insignificant positions — linemen, defensive back, et cetera — so that one Canadian tends to be another's replacement, and thus only one of the two can be in the game at any one time. Ball also made a careful statistical analysis of the stacking of black players in America's National Football League (NFL).

Amazingly enough, he found that the stacking of Canadians at insignificant positions in Canada's own Canadian Football League exceeded even the stacking of blacks in the NFL. Put another way, black Americans are apparently subject to less discrimination in the NFL than Canadians are in their own country's pro football league.

In the past year, the CFL has started broadcasting its games into scores of American cities. It even hired two ex-

American pro players (who previously didn't even know the rules of Canadian pro football) to give "expert" commentary on the games. Obviously their "expertise" consisted of their known popularity with the American tv market. And, so too with many of the "Canadian" Football League's top players. The CFL's comprador owners have admitted that, in order to sell CFL football over American television, it's necessary to field starting teams dominated by the names of well-known American players.

In short, Canadian football, like Canadian hockey before it, is rapidly being sold

Needless to say, the owners of teams in the smaller Canadian cities (who would be left holding the bag under this arrangement) were less than enthusiastic and threatened to blow the whistle.

Even more important, the player's associations in both leagues have threatened strike action if such a merger goes through, because it would deprive them of what little right they now have to up their salaries by threatening to go to the other league. (This right is, in fact, fairly mythical because like international cartels the two leagues have a "gentlemen's agreement" to respect each pastime.

Indeed, it has been largely in these same 10 years that the present militarized version of hockey (in which skating has given way to body-checking, and even fighting, as the dominant element) attained its present high level of popularity with American audiences. The war in South-east Asia has tremendously magnified the attraction of the American spectator public to more war-like games at home, and has made the games themselves more war-like. For example, if fist-fighting (or even stickfighting) sells big to the now well-militarized American spor-out to American tv interests. The parallel with the sell-out of Canada's other natural resources is obvious enough. Indeed, there's been increasing evidence that the owners of CFL teams in the larger Canadian cities are not content with making this country's pro football league a virtual subsidiary of American TV. They want to fold the CFL into America's NFL completely, and dispense with a Canadian league altogether. Under this deal, Montreal, Toronto, and perhaps Vancouver would be "granted" NFL franchises and their teams would move into the American competition.

other's option clauses, and refrain from "raiding" without giving compensation.) So, for now at least, this latest sell-out of Canadian resources has been placed in mothballs.

Perhaps the most serious effect of the increasingly absolute subordination of Canadian sport to the American tv market has been the increasing militarization of this country's games that comes as another fall-out of the Vietnam War. It's well known that only in the last decade — a decade in which America fought its war in Indo-China — has pro football surpassed baseball as America's national ting public, professional hockey league owners are only too happy to provide it.

The victims, of course, are the Canadian players in these leagues, who are expected to bash each other harder and harder so that predominantly American owners can make bigger and bigger profits. It's all in the game. But, whose game?

Says we lied; facts back us up

I have observed with interest your policy of misrepresenting my opinions on several occasions during the session, and have from time to time thought of writing corrections; but have not done so, feeling that it would serve no useful purpose.

However, your headline "Shepherd wants no students on tribunals" (front page of Varsity for 16 March) compels me to break silence, for it is quite simply a lie. The document under discussion, which was a first draft not intended for publication in any case, makes it clear that in my view a tribunal created to deal with academic offences (narrowly defined as mainly cheating and plagiarism) should contain a majority of teaching staff and a minority of students. There was no proposal to exclude students from this type of tribunal, nor was anything said about tribunals for all other kinds of offences which do not concern the Academic Affairs Committee.

There are many other distortions and suppressions in the article, which I will not trouble to explain. Since neither Randy Robertson nor any other Varsity reporter was in fact present at the meeting, you must have relied on singularly biased or inaccurate sources.

I hope you will be able to publish this without delay and give it some prominence.

R.M.H. Shepherd, chairman
Academic Affairs Committee

Ed's Note: As professor Shepherd notes, The Varsity did not have a reporter present at the Academic Affairs Committee meeting in question. However, the details of the disputed article have been distilled from the professor's own "Draft Proposals for Academic Discipline" (presented to committee members in advance of the meeting) and phone interviews conducted after the meeting.

Shepherd's paper stated academic offences "should be determined and judged mainly, if not entirely, by those most competent for this task, i.e. members of the teaching staff". It did concede that a student presence on academic tribunals could be argued for on "psychological and human grounds — excluding purely political notions about 'credibility'" and concluded that the committee's goal should be "to ensure that...a majority of members be drawn from the teaching staff".

Consequently, The Varsity story is supported by the facts.

Students there self-disciplined

In connection with the controversy over student participation in committees dealing with student discipline, the following bit of history may be helpful, even though it comes from a country whose customs Canada would be ill advised to adopt wholesale.

When I was an undergraduate at the University of California at Berkeley in the thirties, all student discipline cases (for both academic and other violations) were handled by an all student "judicial committee". Members were appointed in some way jointly by the presidents of the student association and the university. Typically, they were junior or senior students with reputations for high scholarship. (Among the members of the committee in 1935-1936 was a future president of the Ford Motor Company and Secretary of Defense, now rumored to be involved in international banking. The committee established its own procedures. Its penalties were quite severe, especially in cases involving dishonesty. Cheating on exams or plagiarism usually resulted in suspension or expulsion. Although the committee was merely advisory to the president of the university, he rarely modified sentences and then only in the direction of clemency. I believe that the powers of the committee were gradually eroded in the following years as part of a deterioration in student self-government accompanied by student apathy and administrative repression, so that when student activism revived in the sixties, the tradition of student responsibility was almost forgotten. But, it is a fact that for many years at a great university students proved themselves quite capable of disciplining their peers.

Moral treatise motivates writer

In reading the March 7 Varsity, I found the title to the second front-page article, ironically appropriate as relating to my grounds for writing this letter. U of T lawyers certainly have "thrown out their behaviour code", but unfortunately this is not only in terms of how they relate to the university as a whole, but also, as they relate to each other. Additionally ironic is that it is not only the defenders of justice but also those other future professionals nurtured in this "seat of higher learning" with the fertilizer of the "competitive spirit" which brings about this open letter.

In a time of such "important political issues", I doubt as I write this that a treatise on moral behaviour will at all appear in a paper aimed at informing the all-too-knowing informed. Cadario said reportedly that "we are a committee trying to develop a discipline code for the university". Cadario's statements are said to be valuable only as statements of principle and to have no legal validity. Are we then in such a time where the principle is seen to be of lesser value than legal statements which can only be exercised when the culprits have been found and convicted? Is not principle that thing which makes for a university and more particularly, for a professional way of life?

This letter is not written rashly, but incredulously. An incident of theft in a professional faculty of personal school-notes belonging to a member of that faculty has been the instigation of this tirade. What strikes hardest to the naive idealist in this situation is not the act of the theft (which is itself amoral, unscrupulous, and unforgivable), it is not the theft I insist, but the response to it. Clichés about the state of the world, the state of the competition over jobs, the commonness of the event fly back and forth like ticker-tape business cards. All are seemingly shocked, but as to the responses which I have received, they have all finally come to a series of self-confessions or at best, a kind of consolation for my depression. The PLS has recently drawn to our attention a maxim which seems appropriate at this time, as in all time, "Let he who is without sin among you cast the first stone". So be it that neither do I cast that stone. Yet, the conception of destroying another's academic endeavours by theft, either of his personal work or of material that must be accessible to others, is entirely beyond the powers of the imaginations of most of us, I still believe.

Professionalism must contain a code of ethics so ingrained that respect of these ethics stands above any personal fears or considerations.

Without this set of ethics there can conversely be no professionalism. Without principle there is no need for life and certainly in an age which professes such idealism as our present one, the act must correspond to the principle or it destroys both. Justice is enacted at present only after the misdemeanor has occurred. Certainly it is the problem of prohibition within the conscience of the individual which is of more essence than exterior prohibitions after the fact.

Recently, the female members of the medical faculty were advised to keep their professional problems among themselves and not to allow these to be discussed or interfered with by laymen. This is both the elitist principle at work and the professional superiority syndrome. Yet if a professional training is only of value insofar as it leads to fiscal gain, where consideration of one's colleagues and one's own ethical slance is of no importance, then elitism is of no value whatsoever. The sheep herd together for protection only to find that all of the interiors are those of wolves competing through trickery and scandalous means.

"This time of year" becomes the reconciliation and sympathizing justification for too many immoral acts. This university is founded on assumptions of "fair play" and a respect for ideals and achievement. Without this, no university can exist as such. And such it must be. Essay services and theft of ideas should have no place in an institution attempting humanitarian dealings with individuals and individuals who are dealt with through adult means and adult assumptions. Professionalism is a way of life and one as necessary as every form of respect to maintain a standard of life superior to Dickensian grovelling. Since it is in education alone where we can place our trust, it is also of supreme importance that this education be one of ethical principles above all personal considerations.

The self-righteous author of this work, if so he is deemed, would be more than grateful for something other than worldly and cynical response.

Palestinians reject letter

When we wrote our statement on the double-standard implied in the Zionist Campaign for Soviet Jewry, we could not for lack of space use scholarly references and quote at length to prove every sentence. We wrote the statement with concerned emotion. Thus, we had no inclination to anticipate which of our sentences would be picked at by Zionists for arbitrary attack. It seems, however, that the Zionists stubbornly refuse to accept responsibility for the Palestinian refugee problem or to admit that discrimination exists in Israel. Such negation emanates from the Zionist leadership, and it is held with self-assuring conviction but no evidence.

The insidious reply in Varsity on February 23, 1973 was in line with the common Israeli version (it is written by "Abdul Caleb," a clearly fictitious name; it defeats its purpose, since in Arabic the name means "the slave of a dog"). This version maintains that the Palestinians were ordered to leave by Arab leaders in 1948 — an impossible assumption which we feel correct, if nothing more, for the personal integrity of "Abdul Caleb". Such a response by Zionists is indeed a psychotic inversion of history, springing from an automatic attempt at self-justification and absolution from guilt. (We saw the same sort of tendencies recently in the Israeli accounts about the shooting down of the Libyan plane.)

Our description of the discriminatory policies against the Palestinians in occupied Palestine, and the systematic dispossession of the large majority, are both based on our own experiences, in addition to reports by Western — including Jewish — historians. It is, however, doubtful that any Zionist would readily believe our personal narrations. For this reason, we will not relate our experiences or those of our relatives, we will not rely on Arab or even Western sources — for fear these shall be promptly deemed "pro-Arab" or "anti-semitic". We will rather report the words of conscientious Jews, as well as accounts by Israeli leaders who inadvertently support our conclusion that most Palestinians were indeed systematically dispossessed by Zionist force and deceit.

One important fact is that the Arab armies did not enter Palestine until the declaration of Israel on May 15, 1948. The Palestinian population was practically unarmed, and was at the mercy of the British first, then the Israelis. For several years before, Western Jewish terrorist groups made innumerable attacks on civilians. The most renowned was the Deir Yassin Massacre of April 9, 1948 (i.e. before May 15, 1948) executed by the Irgun gang. "When it was over, the Jewish authorities endeavoured to prevent an impartial inspection. A policeman reported one Arab killed... On the 10th, however, the Red Cross discovered the corpses of 254 men, women and children" (Christopher Sykes, Crossroads to Israel, London, 1965). The massacre was part of Operation Nachson, which directly resulted in the expulsion of 20,000 villagers and many more later by allusion to the massacre. As the leader of the terrorists, and now illustrious member of the Knesset, Menachem Begin said in The Revolt: "The massacre was not only justified, but there would not have been a slate of Israel without the victory at Deir Yassin" (he actually dared to call it a "victory" when there was not a single armed man in the village.) The recent book Jerusalem substantiated the mercilessness and premeditation of massacre, as opposed to the spontaneous responses of the Arab population.

The Hagannah (regular Jewish defense force) undertook similar but less spectacular actions under orders from the Agency in 1947 and 1948 before any Arab government interfered. On other forms of psychological warfare waged against the Palestinians, the present Israeli Deputy Premier Yigal Allon said: "There were left before us only five days before the threatening date, the 15th of May. We saw a need to clean upper Galilee... We therefore looked for means which did not force us into using force, in order to cause tens of thousands who remained in Galilee to flee... I gathered all the Jewish Mukhtars who had contacts with Arabs in different villages, and asked them to whisper in the ears of some Arabs that a great Jewish reinforcement had arrived in Galilee, and that it was going to burn all the villages in the Huleh. They should suggest to these Arabs, as their friends, to escape while there is still time. The flight numbered myriads. The tactic reached its goal completely" (Ha Sefher Ha Palmach, Hebrew only, vol. II, 286).

Even after May 15, as Erskine Childers reported in "The Other Exodus" after extensive research (The Spectator, May 12, 1961), there is not a single indication of orders by Arab leaders for the Palestinians to leave. What he found from recorded monitoring is that the Israeli Hagannah loudspeaker vans and radio broadcast in Arabic threats in Haifa and Jerusalem: "The road to Jericho is open! Fly from Jerusalem before you are killed! (Also Meyer Levin in Jerusalem Delivered). Bertha Vester, a Christian missionary, reported that another theme was, "Unless you leave your homes, the fate of Deir Yassin will be your fate."

Similar methods were used in 1967 on a more limited extent. The New York Times reported on June 11 and 12: "It was clear yesterday that thousands of these Arabs were again fleeing from Israeli troops who appeared to be encouraging them to go... Senior United Nations officials who have sifted many reports from the refugees believe that a pattern of expulsion is emerging... In the frontier villages, they say, soldiers have ordered people out of their homes to police stations, where they have been picked up by buses, bound for a place called Wadi Badan. From there they have been obliged to walk to the river... In other places, they added, loudspeakers warned the inhabitants: 'You have two hours to leave. After that we cannot guarantee your safety.'

As for the improvement in sanitary and living conditions, we have to remind Zionists that agriculture, medicine and electricity existed in Palestine before 1948, and that the whole world (including the Arab World) has improved its living conditions since then. It would have been stupid of Israel not to adjust its production to the enormous increase in immigrant population.

But, granting the claimed Israeli improvement in physical conditions for Palestinians, are we to concede this way to the imperialistic principle in treatment of a "native population"? Are we to substitute bare physical well-being under slavery for the freedom of self-determination? Finally, remember that the resources with which the Israelis are so "generous" now were stolen from the original Palestinian population.

Confiscation of land, arbitrary detention, oppressive restrictions on cultural expression, limitation in educational and employment opportunities, discrimination in every respect are all implied in the very premise of Israel as a state where the Jews are an enforced majority. That means minorities have to be "controlled" if not dispensed with altogether. It may be interesting for those who wish to challenge this to consult the report of the unofficial Israeli League of Human Rights, whose president is Dr. Israel Shanak. A definitive book on the subject is The Arabs in Israel (Hebrew and English) by Sabri Jiryis. There are also the analysis by well-known American Jewish writers such as Alfred Lilienthal (The Other Side of the Coin; What Price Israel?) Rabbi Elmer Berger, and Moshe Menuhim (The Decadence of Judaism in Our Time).

Finally, for the circumstances surrounding the Palestine refugee problem, there are few statements more apt than that of Nathan Chofshi, an early Jewish immigrant to Palestine, who courageously replied to an American Zionist rabbi's denial of Israeli responsibility: "If Rabbi Kaplan really wanted to know what happened, we old Jewish settlers in Palestine who witnessed the fight could tell him how and in what manner we, Jews, forced the Arabs to leave cities and villages... Some of them driven out by force of arms; others were made to leave by deceit, lying and false promises. It is enough to cite the cities of Jaffa, Ramle, Beersheba, Acre from among numberless others. We came and turned the Palestinian Arabs into tragic refugees. And still we dare to slander and malign them, to besmirch their name. Instead of being deeply ashamed of what we did and trying to undo some of the evil committed... we justify our terrible acts and even attempt to glorify them. (Jewish Newsletter, New York, Feb. 9, 1959).

So, despite our approbation, we feel some pity for Zionists like "the Abdul Caleb". They lack the mental integrity to examine themselves and their recent history. Thus, they can only engage in generalizations, derogation, and distortion. They are unaware of their supremely self-deceptive process, and even venture to commit the ultimate mental perversion: that is, to accuse others of engaging in fantasies. These Zionists cover up their guilt by blind aggressiveness and by an inversion of fact and historical sequence.

Great guitarist with pleasing voice, Eric Clapton synthesizes a unique medley of string forms

One of the best guitarists in the US, Mike Bloomfield, once called Eric Clapton the perfect guitarist. He said, "His attack is flawless... He has ideas, attack, touch, ability to transmit emotion and ability to transmit his ideas... Eric does all of these about as well as you can do them."

The first new recording of Clapton's in almost two years, Derek and the Dominos In Concert (RSO/Polydor) was released in the last month. And don't be mistaken, this LP is clearly an Eric Clapton showcase, not giving the other members of the group any of the spotlight. But that's not a matter of concern. Bobby Whitlock on keyboards and vocals, Carl Radle on bass and Jim Gordon on drums are all superb in their understated roles, but are effectually incidental to Clapton's performance.

The double album consists of live cuts recorded at the Fillmore East almost two years ago. As the material has been recorded by Clapton before on "Layla", "Eric Clapton" or "Blind Faith". But the "live" situation allowed a lot of improvisation was also added before each verse that changes the phrasing in a most pleasant way.

More generally, Clapton's voice is revealed as being quite pleasing live, as well as having interesting subtle qualities. It's too bad that the vocal pickup was less than perfect. There are no complaints about the instrumental production though.

Clapton is a great guitarist, not only because of his technical ability — any number of people can boast that — but because his style is a synthesis of guitar forms rather than an imitation. He isn't really perfect. — the blues lines in "Have You Ever Loved A Woman" could have been more emotionally interpreted — but he represents something very close to it.

Rory Gallagher is another one of those guitarists whose name comes up these days when the "greats" are discussed. Hailing from Cork, Ireland, his first recording exposure was with the three man rock group Taste. He and the group concentrated on translating the blues into their own rock-blues style. But Taste never gained popularity out-that stretched most cuts out to over 10 minutes.

Despite the length of the songs, Clapton's timing is perfect and the repetition is minimal. All the instrumental lines are surprising in their deliberateness — a quality uncommon in long rock-guitar solos.

One of the more impressive cuts is a new version of "Presence of the Lord" which Clapton first recorded with Blind Faith. That original recording was made using Stevie Winwood on vocals. Clapton's guitar was subdued while Winwood's keyboards took the instrumental lead. The instrumental break in the middle is then dominated by Clapton. The live cut features Clapton on vocal and he does a very sensitive, soulful job that's even better than Winwood's. But now Clapton's guitar is the pivot instrument while Whitlock's piano is subdued. A delicate little guitar riff side the British Isles and Rory left the group after about four LP's.

Blueprint (Polydor) is Rory's third solo album. It's an uneventful production that has many weaknesses.

Gallagher's voice, while passable, is unexciting and forced. His songwriting, which is the base of the album is mediocre in almost every respect, melody, structure, arrangements and especially lyrics.

That brings us to ask the question why is Gallagher a "great" guitarist? The answer is that he isn't. He's good. He's a fair technician but his lines are often repetitive and lack dynamism. The acoustic slide guitar on Big Bill Broonzy's "Banker's Blues" is simply sloppy and lacks good attack. It isn't even fair to compare him with say, Ry Cooder. Enough said.

Offbeat tragicomedy about hangman, victim is intriguing: Richardson looks at death

Once again the little Studio Theatre will prove its surprising versatility, as the latest production, Gallows Humour begins its run there tonight. Director Marc Diamond is working with two distinct sets facing one another on either side of the audience. It won't be a case of gratuitous virtuoso set design, however, for the two halves of the setting for Gallows Humour correspond like the two acts of the tragic comedy. They are mirror images, both distorted by the author's absurd view of the living.

The common denominator is Death. Jack Richardson's characters are intimately dominated by the process of dying. Their lives are devoted to carrying out this process in an orderly, consistent fashion. In the first half, a convicted murderer awaits his execution with a measure of tranquillity until the warden presents him with Lucie, whose calling is to sweeten the final hours the prisoner spends in his cell. Their confrontation treats the problems and paradoxes of vibrant self-destruction versus deathly predictability in daily life. It is both a desperate game and a pathetic farce.

Act two's death chamber is the kitchen of the hangman. A brush move on the part of the warden sets off a confrontation between the hangman and his wife. The conflict is of the same dimensions as that between the prostitute and the convict about to be hanged. Philip and Martha belong to the dynasty of happily married couples" we find in Strindberg, Albee, and Anouilh, to mention only a few. The hangman and wife have a relationship that nevertheless can boast its own peculiar imagery, its own symbols of rejection and resignation.

Gallows Humour enjoyed success as an off-Broadway production. There are enough intriguing ideas in the play to allow a free creative hand to experiment in translating the text to live theatre. There are relative possibilities for the use of farce, visual and psychological realism, and rhetoric.

Marc Diamond's cast and crew have dealt with these possibilities pragmatically rather than academically, be it a case of a well-equipped (and masterfully wallpapered) kitchen, or one of finding the most effective delivery for a key speech.

The result of their efforts will be presented between Wednesday and Saturday nights, both this weekend and next.

Tiger proved toothless, lost in America's past

Save the Tiger might also be called "Save the World", or "God Save America", and, on the micro level, "Save Harry Stoner".

Harry Stoner is the businessman-cum-war-veteran protagonist of the novel and of the movie of the same name — the hub of the wheel through which the spokes of the work penetrate. Stoner personifies middle-aged Middle America.

But he's bright enough; he realizes what's going on, but is too weak to help himself. Swept up and under by the currents of his past and America's present, he's not strong enough to either preserve his acquired moral values or adapt to different ones. He feels, "I just haven't got the fucking strength to get involved", and rationalizes away his actions, substituting past involvement for present anomie.

The past is Stoner's America — baseball as it used to be. "They spat tobacco juice on the ball", Harry reminisces, "they scratched their ass... they were something... Goddammit, they were something."

Harry might be your father, or any survivor of war or economic depression, with no way to communicate his experiences to a new generation which hasn't had them to understand.

Although the novel is a better produced work than the movie, its pulpy style leaves it wanting, appearing to be a hastily completed and largely unfinished work. However, what the novel does reveal is the all important dimension of Stoner which the movie fails to get hold of and carry through. The film offers no "past motif", no insight into Harry's past and its effect on his future as the cause of his actions. Jack Lemmon as Harry Stoner is as good as might be expected in the situation, but not good enough. Harry as a war veteran is sublimated to Harry as a businessman.

For Harry the war was home, but now his business has become the alienating substitute for the war's camaraderie. He says, "there (are) 'no guys' anymore. Guys that had that special thing for each other in that long ago war... the thing that had nothing to do with causes. That special thing you never talked about but was there. You could see it on a professional football team... The thing was you always covered the other guy and he always covered you. That's how it was. But, what the hell...today it is every man for himself."

And Harry's problems is the movie's problem: how to get Stoner across to the audience. Where the book develops it, the movie fails.

The girl he picks up hitch-hiking on the Strip in Los Angeles tells him that "a war is so male. It's so full of balls." Later he's surprised to hear that she does not know the United States ever fought a war with Italy. He's only able to answer, "Yes, we did."

The irony and dilemma of Harry's situation is that the war he fought was supposed to preserve his vision of America, while it only imprisoned him, and forced "his" country in a different direction. Again he realizes his plight but is powerless to do anything about it. "They nailed you. They sucked you in. Get the things... get the things. And maybe they were right. If you made it why not live it up. It was over so fucking fast..."

For Harry there are "no more rules. Only referees."

EATON'S

Movies: pandering to sadist in us?

In the hierarchy of my private concerns, film violence has only recently become a "problem". Although traumatized at an early age by the witch in The Wizard of Oz, thus beginning a lifelong aversion to anything resembling a horror film, I have always been a Western freak, whether of the classic Stagecoach or one of the innumerable Randolph Scott or Audie Murphy oaters; and with no qualms about the villain's violent end, either, since the hero's fury was always both provoked and appropriate. His guns were either hung up or headed farther west at the fadeout, and he would never have thought of taking the opportunity to dispose of his enemy's wife, kids, and relatives (a staple of both Greek and Chinese tragedy). Although the morality was a simple one of white horses and black hats, it did serve as sufficient justification for the events of the plot.

Thus I don't think that I have any basic objections to the depiction of violence, provided that it has some organic relationship to context. Clearly, there are numerous examples of works of art where violence is integral to the realization of the author's intentions, and could not be omitted without irreparable weakening of force: the execution of the three soldiers in Paths of Glory, the murder of the old lady in Crime and Punishment, and Goya's drawings of the Napoleonic Wars in Spain suggest themselves at random. To forbid an artist the use of violence would make as much sense as outlawing one of the colors of the spectrum — we would see less, and be the poorer for it.

In viewing several recent films, however, I have been particularly struck by the gratuitous and excessive character of the violence portrayed. Although it happened to be The Godfather which aroused the desire to write something about film violence, A Clockwork Orange, Straw Dogs, or Dirty Harry could just as easily have touched off this particular string of mental firecrackers, and of emotions all the more personally significant precisely because they do not seem to be shared by my friends. With regard to The Godfather, especially, I found myself at odds with those whose opinions I usually share, or at least comprehend; thus, they felt necessity to tackle the "Violence in Films" problem, despite the slightly boggling amount of attention it has already received in the Middle — and Highbrow — media.

I think there are at least two major consequences for the social surroundings in which we live. The first is difficult to characterize precisely, but essentially involves a kind of numbing effect in terms of our sensitivity to the suffering of others.

Whether one chooses to use the phrase "Freedom of the Press" or "Repressive Tolerance", it seems clear that the mass media expose us to substantial doses of human misery, to which we as isolated individuals can react in only limited ways — of which turning off appears to be the most popular. Whether one chooses to describe this as desensitization, alienation or information overload, the basic situation is one of learning to ignore unpleasantness over which one appears to have no control.

The second consequence may seem much less significant, but it is personally important in terms of the manner in which I want to discuss film violence. It concerns the method of argument characteristic of the muckracking style, which is essentially the a posteriori marshalling of causes to explain a given contemporary effect. The advantage of this method is that one can "explain" just about anything through a judicious selection of causes: thus although The Greening of America and Future Shock describe antithetical social situations, and project antithetical futures, each is to a degree convincing within the context of that set of information which the author has decided to stress. The point is not that Reich or Toffler are phonies, or are necessarily wrong. It is, rather, that their conclusions are determined by the particular intellectual filters through which they view the world, and have a corresponding degree of validity.

Thus it would be quite simple to "explain" film violence by choosing X number of causes. The only problem would be that you wouldn't know anything more about it than when you started to read this. And neither would I. Q.E.D.: we'll have to try another strategy.

When in doubt, describe the situation.

If we start by examining the nature of film, we are immediately confronted by the fact that film is an industry, a business which operates on the same principles as General Motors or Standard Oil. The name of the game is profit, and maximum profit requires the maximum possible audience. That the cinema was rapidly exploited by some very adroit businessmen, and not preserved for the exclusive pleasure of a privileged class (as the ballet has been, for example), is perhaps to be deplored, but should not delude us as to the possibility of an "artist's cinema" free of commercial considerations. The production companies exist, the theaters and distribution apparatus exist, and these are social facts requiring the production and consumption of film.

Production and consumption. The "success" of a film equals the number of people who are willing to spend money to see it; and in a competitive situation in which movies are but one of several potential choices available to the seeker after entertainment, they must present an alternative to that which is available for "free" — i.e. television. Since television programming is fairly rigidly controlled as to violent or sexual content, primarily because of its greater accessibility to children, it is not surprising that the film industry has chosen to emphasize that which is forbidden to TV: explicit sex and exaggerated violence. Marshall Dillon makes it with Miss Kitty; Doc performs open heart surgery on Festus' umpteenth wound.

Unlike the continuing furor over overt sexual content, which has already brought about a four category rating system, those few individuals who have concerned themselves with the increase in film violence have not provoked any sort of mass protest against this phenomenon. In view of the Social Darwinist ideology of contemporary conservatism, and the identification of a "liberal" position with a distaste for any kind of censorship, we should probably not expect either analysis or concern from the usual sources of controversial social issues; but remembering the deficiencies of the "social criticism-muckraking" discussed above, this would not seem to constitute an objection to a continuing consideration of film violence.

Perhaps the most overtly violent type of film is the Western, where the drama of Good vs. Evil reduces to a naked contest of force in the absence of strong social controls (the impotent Sheriff). In the "classic" Western (roughly, pre-1965), the last twitch of the villains signals a moment of choice for the hero: settling down with the banker's daughter, or riding off into the sunset to seek further adventure. If we take these as metaphors for the acceptance of triumph of an advancing civilization, either decision symbolizes the victory of the community over the individual. Gemeinschaft marches on, either absorbing or pushing westward the man whose capacity for violence is no longer relevant.

Contrast this with such more recent examples of the genre as Little Big Man and A Fistful of Dollars. In the former, the tables have been completely turned: it is the cavalry and the settlers who destroy the more humane Indian culture, with General Custer presented as the bloody-minded leader of a Mongolian horde, rather than as the brave but injudicious gallant of They Died With Their Boots On (1941) or Bugles in the Afternoon (1952). A Fistful of Dollars celebrates the destruction of a community through Clint Eastwood's clever manipulation of competing sub-groups, and its sequels, particularly The Good, The Bad, and The Ugly, continue the theme of the protagonist's abstraction from events in the surrounding society. In the latter film, only the jerks enlist in either the Union or Confederate armies, while the smart guys hang loose and pursue personal profit at the expense of both sides.

Although Little Big Man and Sergio Leone's "spaghetti Westerns" present different pictures of the advancing society — in the one case, pathologically aggressive, in the other, beset by idiotic factionalism — both convey rather similar attitudes toward the moral turpitude of American civilization. They indict a society rather than an individual or a discernable group, as the background of social corruption justifies the foreground of personal violence: in a world of rats, he who grabs the most cheese is King.

"Indict a society" is perhaps too strong a phrase... or is it? If we deal with the concept of "justification", it would appear that the traditional Western legitimated violence as an appropriate response to a specific and temporary historical situation, whereas more recent examples of the genre present violence as a structurally organic feature of contemporary social life. In terms of our increasing awareness of the ways society does violence to people (women, ethnic minorities, nonconformist youth), we could be tempted to conclude that this represents an intellectual "coming of age" of the cinema, a fuller comprehension of the "Violence is power" equation understood by such diverse men as Napoleon, Max Weber, and Mao Tse-Tung. In view of the contemporary film's absence of any mitigating sensibility or thought regarding the consequence of social violence however, I doubt that we can accept it as some sort of "reality therapy" for the past deficiencies of movies — particularly when there exists a strong correlation between the inclusion of graphic violence and the economic success of the resulting film.

If the first thing we can derive from such films as Straw Dogs, A Clockwork Orange, Dirty Harry, and The French Connection is a communication about the inherently violent nature of our world, the second is surely a message about the appropriate behaviour in this situation. The aggressive brutality of the police in Dirty Harry and The French Connection is perhaps the most obvious example: don't take the chance of misjudging Joe Citizen, man, if he looks cross-eyed, zap him! The contrast with the old style Western Sheriff, who had to be ridiculed and snat on before retaliating, is evident; it's almost as if the old "Preemptive Strike" theory of the think-tank nuclear madmen has seeped down into the collective unconscious. Nice guys finish last; shoot first, talk later, the only good _____ is a dead _____: old cliches achieving a frightening reality.

The consequences for the social fabric, that precious area of intersubjective agreement which makes social life possible, can hardly be exaggerated. They are most evident in the sort of Fortress Persona mentality operative in New York City, where doors are triple — and quadruple — bolted and strangers are enemies until proven otherwise, but may also be observed in the 52 per cent increase in personal assaults in Canada over the last five years. We appear to be moving towards a realization of Hobbes's conception of society as a "war of all against all": habits based upon a general trust of most people in most situations are replaced by a generalized suspicion of everyone characterized by evasion, dishonesty, and the mobilization of hostile feelings.

To attribute these disturbing phenomena solely to an increase in cinematic violence would of course be ridiculous. Up to this point I have been attempting to provide a background, a context, within which we can sensibly discuss and try to understand an artificially isolated case of what is commonly perceived as the alienation, depersonalization, commercialization, whatever, of contemporary life.

To use these giant-sized and mind-boggling words, however, is to end discussion, to invoke the incomprehensible, to admit defeat. The fault is not in the words themselves, or in the very real situations which they describe, but in their promiscuous use as the coins of a conventional wisdom in our time. If we wish to make some intelligent application of them, I think that we have to provide some content which we can understand together: hard, shared, collective experience, of which watching films, and experiencing violence, is perhaps as good an example as can be found.

So what happens when we see a particularly graphic depiction of violence on the theater screen? For a significant portion of the audience, we would probably have to define "see" as "see as unreal": as the advertisement for the film Last House on the Left reiterate, "Keep repeating, it's only a movie...only a movie...only a movie." While this may be a "healthy" response, in the sense that it at least temporarily preserves the sanity of the viewer, we should perhaps examine a bit more closely the type of conditioning going on here. ("Keep repeating...it's only a gas chamber...only a gas chamber...only a gas chamber.")

It has become quite commonplace to decry the desensitizing effects of the barrage of violence in the news media, of watching the day's installment of the Vietnam war and attempting to relate to "93 Dead in Bolivian Air Crash." Although this is usually described in highly moral terms, as a kind of not-nice callousness towards the suffering of others, a more important consequence would seem to me to be the acceptance of violence as normative, as a basic and typical occurrence in the social world. Sure is hard to get excited about Bolivian air crashes (picket-line violence in Kitchener, a scream down the block); familiarity breeds... familiarity: ho-hum, la-di-da, and the automatic inclusion in the taken-for-granted world of everyday phenomena.

From accepting violence as normative, it is but a small step to adopt a totally fatalistic attitude towards it. In the case of Bolivian air crash victims, this is both realistic (What could we do about it?) and necessary (How can we internalize the pain of the victims' loved ones?); but what about other situations in which we have some actual or potential influence? Far from representing either greater realism or the dissemination of social consciousness, it would seem likely that the experience of an unremitting flow of media violence operates to destroy our capacity to either comprehend or deal with it.

Although the above remarks refer specifically to the news media, we should not underestimate the role of film violence in encouraging a similar apathy. Most of us go to the movies as a kind of special event, to which we devote some thought, discussion with friends, and expenditure of money; we expect some return for this investment, and are proportionally more attentive to (and thus more open to the influence of) whatever film we have chosen. The question of the relative weight of the cinema and the news media in promoting affective anesthesia can be left to the social scientists; what is important here is the substantial contribution which film violence makes to this phenomenon.

In contrast to those who see film violence as an unreal and fantastic thing, and deny any validity or impact to what they see on the screen, those who enjoy graphic violence grant it a validity which overshadows the events of their own lives: the former conceive of violence as an unreal adjunct to life, while the latter conceive of life as an unreal adjunct to violence. Assuming that there are reasons for accepting the reality of both daily life and violence (which I hope that the reader will grant), either reaction can be fairly classified as a withdrawal from, or denial of, the basic conditions of being human.

Before moving on to a consideration of what can be done for this "deranged community," I should add that I do not want pressures towards conformity characteristic of social groups, and conscious of the fact that if we hang out with folks we don't like, it is probable that (1) we will lead rather depressed lives, and (2) are more likely to be affected by their collective influence than they are by our individual one. Therefore we quite sensibly seek a satisfying level of social reality.

With regard to "culture" or "entertainment," however, we seem to be much less aware of the effects of taking in what is simply because it is readily available. If we accept the idea that society shapes us, we need not accept the proposition that it shapes us all in the same way; quite obviously, it doesn't which seems to leave some room for the exercise of individual choice and self-determination. We hold others to account for their actions, we attempt to control some of the content of some of the areas of our lives, and I can see no reason why we should not attempt the same thing concerning other kinds of inputs. Like Kultzah.

Perhaps some exaggeration will make this clearer. Imagine, if you will, someone who confines his entertainment to whatever happens to be on the Top 40 or the best-seller list or, for that matter, whatever happens to appear in the paper. What will he be doing to himself? "Experiencing reality," or placing himself at the mercy of social processes which grind out mass culture on purely economic criteria? And even if you enjoy the products of the latter, it is difficult to applaud a life lived with such a high degree of unconsciousness.

With the above in mind, I think we can have some immediate influence on what is presented to us as entertainment or culture by using our available assets of mind and awareness in a more sophisticated way, based on thinking about how "You are what you eat." For example, I have recently turned down invitations to see Deliverance and The Getaway on the grounds that, having read their reviews, I would find their violence upsetting, and found that none was mystified by it or thought that it cast aspersions on my intelligence, personality, or sex.

If we can succeed in taking control over our personal range of entertainment choices, we thus may begin a process which will rescue audiences from a status equivalent to that of the Victorian wife: prone and unresponsive? If this presumes too great an influence by isolated, turned-on individuals, perhaps we should next consider a social correlative for increasing awareness.

I think a clue is provided by a previous reference to entertainment as that which "is presented to us" — is in some sense beyond our control. My suggestion, which may again seem simplistic, is that we devote more thought and energy to constructing (rather than merely choosing appropriately) a culture which is rewarding in terms of creation as well as appreciation.

The major obstacle here, aside from again becoming conscious of the value of creating one's own culture, is probably the cult of technical excellence which has had a strongly inhibitory effect on broad participation in cultural activities. It is perhaps most obvious in the sports culture, which consists of the progressive elimination of practically everyone from competitive sports, but can also be observed in such areas as "musical education," where the talented child passes through a series of filters leading to the social role of "musician". Although these filters are often justified as timeless and eternal aesthetic criteria, anyone familiar with either the changes in these standards over time, or with the large number of talented (and usually innovative) musicians who receive no formal musical education, will be aware of their culture-bound and highly relative nature.

I am not arguing against excellence, but against a system which operates so as to define it as that which is the exclusive province of the few rather than a potentiality for the many. The net effect of this attitude, when multiplied over most areas of cultural endeavor, is to create the ideal consumer: passive, unthinking, and certain of his own lack of ability, alive only when applauding the efforts of someone else.

The antidote? Again, I think, we must begin to be conscious of how things happen and how they affect us. If we arrive at the conclusion that available cultural options are unsatisfying, we have to move towards creating new ones; if our music, literature, cinema, or whatever is inadequate, better an attempt of our own, no matter how apparently inept, than either useless bitching or fatalistic acceptance. This will almost certainly require the ability to work outside established institutions, not least because our products will rarely meet accepted standards, but also because these institutions are incapable of relating to culture based on individual needs for satisfaction rather than an elitist conception of "excellence."

If we can overcome our conditioned attitudes about cultural forms and realize, for example, that there is no need for us to make "movies" with professional actors and expensive production processes, but that there probably is a need for us to use the medium of photography in recording and understanding our lives, we may be able to begin. If we can realize that "literature" is not merely the printed page, but also those thoughts and feelings which we scribble down and want to share with others, we may be able to begin. And if we can realize that "music" exists independently of records and concert halls, exists wherever there are voices, hands, and feet with something to express, we may fucking well succeed.

Before any of this can happen, however, a tremendous amount of demystification and consciousness-raising needs to be done, of which this piece of writing has been a personal jumping-off point. It started out as an attempt to understand what freaked me out about violent movies, grew and accreted and escalated into whatever it has been for you, got kicked around, initiated, and encouraged by lots of good people, and it came out here. Somewhere along the way it ceased to be work and became an experience — sort of like making love when you're tired. Well, I'm tired, I'm spent, but if any of us got off together... it was worth it.

to imply some sort of exalted status for those who react negatively to violence in films. Obviously this could be an equally reality-negating response, although it at least contains the potential for a constructive reaction to what seems to me to be a rather unhealthy situation. We are familiar with the cultural stereotypes of the bluenose, shrinking violet, or little old lady in tennis shoes, however, and will not expect help from that quarter.

How then should we attempt to deal with a phenomenon such as violence in film? My first suggestion will likely seem simple-minded, but it is made in the conviction that it is both an often overlooked and potentially powerful method of getting some feedback into contemporary communication processes. Simply put, it is that we have to become more conscious of ourselves as consumers of culture, and act accordingly.

In terms of personal relationships, for example, I suspect that most of us act so as to minimize contact with people whom we find either offensive or simply boring, and if they were the only people inhabiting our social world, we would probably do our damndest to find another one. We are aware of the

The preceding article was adapted from The Chewon. A reply to Stuewe's position was published the next week, and it is printed on the following two pages.

We emulate films; deploring violence isn't all there is to solving problem

adapted from The Chevron

The discussion (problem? question?) of excessive violence in film is dangerously close now to becoming a cliché.

"Excessive", I fear, is a word which demands parameters and cannot be left to a presumed consensus of opinion. "Excessive film violence" means no more than does "pornography" unless it is accompanied by an attempt at fixing it in an understandable context.

(Admittedly, at first glance we seem to be caught up, as far as definition goes, on an almost classically liberal escalator of permissiveness and personal freedom, but this is a discussion of personal views and consumer choice, not of law-making and "protection of society from itself" — and, ultimately, we will be concerned here with the quality of violence rather than quantity.)

For example The Godfather, A Clockwork Orange, Straw Dogs and Dirty Harry upset me, but if physical violence was what put you off these films, I think you missed the real impact of their message.

"Violence", as we all know in these days of enlightened mass awareness of psychology, can take on many forms, and the physical violence presented in the above-mentioned films were, to me, certainly secondary to the "mental violence" aimed at the audiences. At some I wanted to vomit, but mostly simply to walk out and demand my money back. These movies, plus The Getaway, The New Centurions, The French Connection and others of recent vintage have put me off or angered me, not for their portrayal of physical violence, but for their mindless and uncritical reinforcement of society's roles, their intellectual and literary banality and often — as with Clockwork Orange — simply for their lack of sufficient technical competence to interest me for the hour-plus. Perhaps some of these require individual comment about content to demonstrate the roots of my objections, before stating the objections themselves.

The Godfather, for instance, turned into — after only 15 minutes — simply a series of exhibitions on how to kill people. Soon, I was not interested in the characters, the plot, the acting... only guessing who would be done away with next and what glorious new way the mafiosi would uncover to carry out the murder. Even if you were able to brush aside this distraction and pay attention to the characters, what was presented? Two rival gangs of killers and exploiters, killing each other off for the right to get the biggest cut out of the dope, gambling, prostitution, show business and various other ventures they were involved in.

Except that that was not the way they were presented at all. What you saw was a script dwelling almost lovingly on a "good" gang of killers, and a "bad" gang came on screen occasionally to supplement the sense of competition. The camera took us inside the one family and we suffered with them the trials of big-time crime through the murders, death and "persecutions". We got to know them; many viewers were even brought to like them. Since the other gang was just a bunch of faces behind guns, what was there to like about them? So we were "told" (cinematically) to like the only people presented in any depth, however shallow. I was appalled when many people I saw the show with and talked with later actually felt sorry when Sonny got machine-gunned by "the others" at the end. They had been manipulated into identifying and empathizing with this gunman because the presentation had been so one-sided, and we all know a movie-goer will pick someone to identify with or lose interest, and The Godfather was too cleverly and slickly produced to lose most people's interest.

And the presentation of women in The Godfather: Either mindless receptacles for a penis and raiser of children or passive, accepting ornaments with shoulders on which to cry between he-man gun battles.

Straw Dogs at least started off with an acceptable enough premise: pacifistic professor-type and wife try to get away from it all in the smotheringly-closed-in society of a small English village. Fine. Except that the wife turns out to be a flirtatious nymphomaniac who has had an affair before with the village's most menacing young workman. And then the whole village (men only; since that's all we see) turns into a gang of murderous idiots and the wife gets willingly raped and the husband finally unpacifistically kills a handful of the idiots in order to protect his house (a man must choose a place to make a stand). The view of men is that they are aggressive and possessive by nature — even the ones who try to hide it or repress it, like the professor — and the view of women is that they are constant prey to their overpowering sexual needs and give themselves (sexually and loyally) in the end to the man who will fight hardest for them.

Director Sam Peckinpah — who classifies females as either "women" or "pussies" — has denied the universality of Straw Dog's characters in several interviews, but the Peckinpah stamp on a movie has become easily recognizable and almost undeniably representative of the stereotypes of Straw Dogs. Take his most recent "adventure", The Getaway. Other than the fact that it is badly made and poorly paced — in a word, boring — the film presents Steve McQueen as a man who loses his sense of manhood when he learns his wife has had sex with another man in order to get him out of prison; not only that, but the "other man" has — as she put it — "gotten to her" in some cryptic, dark, sexual way. In the same picture, the (previously content?) wife of a veterinarian immediately becomes the willing sexual plaything of a sadistic gunman when he abducts the couple and eventually drives the vet — who has, natch, lost all sense of worth upon losing the sexual loyalty of his wife — to suicide. It would be hard for even Peckinpah to deny the message of the simple-minded wife lingeringly fondling the villain's upraised phallic gunbarrel in unmistakable masturbatory fashion. Again the statement is there: men are for dominating and fighting, women are for fighting over and fucking.

In Dirty Harry, the "criminal" was presented as a slaving sadist, a craven coward of a sex maniac and he dressed funny. The heroic policeman, on the other long hand of the law, was beset by liberal legal restrictions and effete permissive politicians. The only women were peripheral, but again: a prostitute, a murdered nude girl and a passive policeman's wife whose weight on the cop finally drove him to denounce his manly job and, by inference, his manhood. He was "going back into law", which from the cop's point of view is going from the side of the law to the side of crime.

French Connection, basically the same story. The only female in this movie was a promiscuous girl with whom the cop spends one night before discarding her and going back "to the job", which has no place for women.

If this has not formed into some kind of identifiable and almost conspiratorial pattern by now, try tuning in some of the TV cop shows some night; they are, if anything, even more explicit in their portrayal of men and women, crime and society. In the only episode of Streets of San Francisco I have seen the other night, the story centered on a young woman who had gone to police college and wanted, of course, to work alongside the men in the apprehending-dangerous-criminals work. Now, all thoughts of the desirability of female cops over male cops aside, the issue to be resolved in this episode was clear: either she would make it and prove herself, or she would learn once and for all the superiority of men. Of course, in our present North American liberal atmosphere, I was sure the outcome would not be as clear-cut as the situation seemed. Sadly, I was right. After a vicious sadist had raped and killed the girl's roommate — also a woman cop — she wanted naturally to be a part of the hunt for the killer. The wise, old head cop said no — you know how emotional women can get about these things — and she kept disobeying orders and messing things up trying to get him anyway (women aren't as disciplined as men, and are ruled by emotion, not mentality). In the end scene, the murderer returns to her room while the men cops are out looking for him and confronts her. She is a cop trained in karate and other kills, but falls apart and screams when she sees him (have you ever seen a male cop in film or on TV scream when confronted with his quarry?). He knocks her around, her karate evidently forgotten in the emotion of the moment, and the killer is finally shot from outside a window by a male cop who had returned to the scene to rescue the woman.

Without letting this become a one-issue essay on male and female role-playing, I simply want to make it clear through these examples that it is this form of media violence, carried over in popular, classical and rock music, art and books, which disturbs and worries me much more than the realistic and even "excessive" portrayal of physical violence.

That being said, I will try to return to the topic of physical violence which I left off at the front of the piece. I believe, first of all, that there is an important difference between "fantasy" or "illusory" violence and "fictive" or "non-fictive" violence. I will try to define these terms as I see and use them.

"Fictive" and "non-fictive" violence is that which occurs or has occurred in either a general or a particularized context, such as gunfights, sword duels, wars of ancient or modern type, murder, rape, etc. These appear in our newspapers and on our TV sets and around us everyday and, while generally overdramatized by the media, are not creations of it. An example of "non-fictive" violence would be a pseudo-documentary of a real event, like In Cold Blood or Gunfight at the O.K. Corral. "Fictive" violence would be films like Straw Dogs or Clockwork Orange. These types are films which emulate, or even project beyond its present scope, the violence of the society; emulating it, they are also liable to be emulated in turn by those who see it, and are turned on by it (Bremer being macho-sexually turned on by Clockwork Orange before gunning Nixon and finally settling for Wallace; his own real-life experience with "the old ultra-violence").

"Fantasy" or "illusory" violence, on the other hand, portrays ("projects, in the best sense of the word) types of violence which come from the folk-tales, fantasies or violence-repressive stories and themes of society, such as werewolves, vampires, witches, invasions from Mars and horrible mutant creatures. These stories rarely emulate any form of real violence around us and, hence, do not leave themselves so open to emulation. It is an enjoyed and shared illusion through which one can absorb and repress: "It made me feel."

But to break this statement down into a simplistic two-sided categorization of "those who are turned on by violence" and "those who are upset by it" is both unfair and shallow. Speaking personally, I am "turned on" in a semi-sexual way by some forms of "fantasy" violence, but extremely upset by either real violence or most portrayals of real violence, especially war films. So which category shall I condemn myself to? Obviously, the question is much deeper.

To make my point here clearer perhaps than I need, a heritage of overwhelmingly approving and patriotic war films provided an almost-perfect atmosphere for which men growing up in the United States between 1940 and 1965 were prepared to go to Vietnam and carry out there all the atrocities and "normal" carnages of war. There were, of course, wars before there were war films, but my point here is that patriotic films took the place, during that period of American history, of folk tales and heroic stories which had before been passed on to young men by spoken or written word; these films were an extension of that reinforcement agency of society and gave those men something to emulate, even often be proud of. The same can be said of Westerns. They serve, with only the handful of recent exceptions to reinforce the "rugged he-man individual-frontier" mentality and the male macho image which America still tries desperately to hold dear. While few men, it is true, are tempted to strap on their guns and shoot it out, it is the portrayal of frontier justice, which is nearly the anthesis of modern liberal interpretations of social and legal justice, which emerges as the lasting and cumulative effect of these sagas. Matt Dillon is the perfect attorney-general for the U.S.: cold, dedicated unmovably (and unmoved) to the Law, he places the unbending execution of the Law above any human or humane considerations; it is the Law which must be preserved, not the human beings caught up in it.

Seen in this light, Straw Dogs is almost the perfect Western updated. The hero, deserted by "civilization" during his hour of crisis, ostensibly does not wish to use his guns (he has "hung them up", dislikes bloodshed, etc.) but in the end is "forced" to — because of an arbitrary tolerance line he has drawn (protection of his house, the citizens, Law, etc.) — and when he does kill, it is completely "justified"; the killings are seen, in retrospect, as "inevitable" and now, under Peckinpah, even as enjoyable — a necessary release.

"Fantasy" violence — and here I should add that I include the highly sensual sense of fear which many so-called terror movies employ instead of actual blood-and-guts violence conversely gives the viewer-reader-listener no role to emulate, no heritage to uphold, no background of which to have great pride; the person or persons you identify with in order to experience the "fright" have no carry-over outside the walls of the theatre. It is ephemeral, non-particularized, too difficult to bring down to the level of our own lives and, on top of that, too much fun. If a quote-horror-unquote movie is done badly or is too much of a cliché, I laugh through it; indeed many are done with just this purpose in mind... they are intended to be parodies of the genre. If a war movie or western is done badly I do not laugh, and neither do those who take them to heart.

And so my conclusion, I think, is this — talk of "excessive" violence in films is a red herring; is, in fact, totally undefinable and misleading, like "redeeming social value" in the argument over literature. It draws you away from the real issues, the "gut" questions, the aspects which we must live with, day by day.

The graphic portrayal of physical violence was paramount to films like Catch-22, Deliverance or The Wild Bunch. It was central to the film's — and book's — theme and without it the power of the movie would have been lost. But that is a moot point: it is my personal evaluation, it is telling you where my "squeamishness line" is drawn. It is important only after a first consideration is applied: what type of violence was portrayed and how was it presented (approval or disapproval). The gore in Catch-22 sickened Yossarian, and it sickened me and it should have shocked and sickened everyone who saw it; that was its purpose. It was not meant to make a hero or martyr of the man who was killed, but to show him as a victim, in the full and absurd sense of the Catch-22 mentality. Was it "excess" to show the kid's guts hanging out? The question is unanswerable. But ask this question: What was the intent of the film, how did it portray people? Or, perhaps better, what sort of people did it give us to portray? Those are questions that can, and should, be answered before questions of technical skill in presenting death and dismemberment are argued. Catch-22 presents a view which runs counter to the prevailing patriotic and military heritage in North America and the Western World; The Green Berets is just another attempt to present that heritage. The question of which, or even whether both, presents, "excessive" violence in its physical form does not interest me. Enough.

Now, having come to that, there is still the question of alternatives. The first, of course, is critics. This is admittedly a weak alternative, but one worth mentioning. After comparing a few reviews to the movies, you can draw some definite conclusions as to which critics you can trust as far as fairly articulating the thrust of the film, and which cannot or do not. I have seen enough previews and read enough reviews by people I trust and respect to avoid The Green Berets and even comment on it without having seen it. I knew I did not want to pay the people who made it, nor subject myself to the forms of violence and role-portrayal it presented. While that particular decision was fairly straight-forward, I must confess that other movies present less precise distinctions. I still don't know, for instance, whether I should have avoided Patton as I did, since some reviewers indicated it approvingly portrayed the general and others saw it as having an almost anti-war tenor. But, I stayed away from it.

There are other, and probably better, forms of action. Walk out, demand your money back. There are few movies I have felt that strongly about, but the alternative exists; even if you don't get a refund, the manager is aware of your objection and you have removed yourself from an unpleasant situation. Write letters to editors, talk to your friends. When you disapprove of a popular movie, ask your friends why they enjoyed it. Perhaps they honestly haven't thought it out; at any rate, it is better to talk it out than just nod and say, "Well, I didn't like it."

And "making our own" (music, art, films, etc.) can be an alternative. But they are weak and fairly unrealistic alternatives at this point. In the first place, until you are working at it full time, few of us can manage financially or time-wise, to produce any form of art but the most basic, the most amateur and so, the least appealing and powerful. This is not "mystifying" the process of making films, music, etc.; it is recognizing the realities of the hard work, time and experience demanded in doing them in ways that contain potential to affect people's lives in ways other than making them laugh at incompetence.

In the end, I suppose, it comes right down to you; your judgement, your choice of critics and friends to trust, your own method.

George Kaufman

Censorship is more than a board of men; money, fear and toadying factors

"The official censor is pretty small potatoes. He walks behind the elephant, and the elephant goes where the guy who owns the circus decides.... Business and government are the Scylla and Charybdis filmmakers have to sail by. To the few who make it through, the censor is a minor squall very near port."

Phoniness always bothers me more than the vice it covers, so plain old garden-variety, we-won't-let-you-see-that censorship doesn't trouble me much. I'll be alright if they bar Last Tango in Paris. I can imagine scenes that would burn holes in the film.

Often enough I get a kick out of censorship. Mona Lisa does nothing for me, but put a black rectangle across her eyes and she becomes art; I really dig not being allowed to see things that are OK in New Brunswick; I loved it when the Varsity appeared during the FLQ affair with "CENSORED" replacing lines of type; I love the beeps and little soundless passages in talk shows, the triple asterisks in Esquire. Was it shit? cock? fuck? cunt? pee? poo? tit? Are you allowed to say tit? Once I was given $100 to play a left-wing extremist on a Norm Perry show and I wanted to test the aesthetic possibilities of beeps. For example, I would answer a perfectly civil question with a chain of curses, all the time looking composed as a cucumber. If Perry tried to ask why I'd done it, I'd swear while he did, making him beep back at me. I thought about using beeps for punctuation (I'm fine, thanks, Norm, beep). Unfortunately I found out that the show was live and uncensored, so I didn't get to do it.

Overt censorship makes everybody an artist. When Abbie Hoffman appeared on the Merv Griffin show as a black band on the screen and a disembodied voice, we were told it was because he wore a shirt made from the flag, but can you ever really be sure? In my heart I run with that fringe per cent who don't believe for a second that anybody has been anywhere near the moon.

Phony censorship, however galls me, and for every ounce of the old high school debating topic, there is a ton of sneaky programmed selections advertising themselves as free choice. Most of it isn't at all connected with censorship boards, but a little of it is, in a grey, semi-overt way.

There are two co-ordinates for a censor: the boinggg test is one. (If a work makes him go boinggg, it's bad and oughtn't to be shown). The other co-ordinate is pressure, and the censor reacts to pressure on his office the same way he reacts to pressure under his robes. The Ontario Film Censorship Board, for instance, takes community standards — i.e. standards from the community — very seriously. So, if you want to see Last Tango, write the board. I'm told it really will make a difference (particularly because they will be tottering on that one anyway. Deep Throat, however will be an uphill fight.)

It is not only the public who apply pressure, though. Titticut Follies was a cinema-verite documentary filmed in an American mental hospital, as critical as film can be. ("How often do you masturbate", asks a psychiatrist. "About three times a day", a patient replies. "Too much!" says the doctor.) The film was turned down for showing here at the same time as Morton Shulman was muck-raking the Ontario Mental Hospital system. The provincial government did not want the added publicity and asked its board to block the movie. It was banned for nudity and profanity, if I recall correctly.

The censor board also sways to movie industry pressure, which while it serves some films, leaves others even more vulnerable. Movie distributors are not artists, they are businessmen, and they try to put a buck where it will bring back two. The Godfather was a sure-fire hit; Sweet Sweetback's Badass Song on the other hand was keyed to a black audience that didn't exist in Ontario, so if it was banned it would not be a big revenue loss. It was banned. A Clockwork Orange, fronted by Kubrick's name, fame and distributor support,

 Son of the Godfather Paramount. Eleven per cent of the total paid admissions for all North American theatres in December was spent on The Poseidon Adventure. Etc. It wouldn't matter, except that, what is financed is also an indicator of what is not financed. Perhaps the greatest blacklist in the history of art is against ugly people.

The pressure of sticking with what will be sure to make money comes as close as the local theatre. Those terrible, awful shorts that are the staple in Toronto first-run houses (particularly the Hollywood) are not just bad by chance. They are either part of the distributor's package (i.e. the short comes with the movie) or they are chosen because they are free (a promotional film for French wines, or the like.) And there is a strong incentive to book the worst short available. It is usually estimated that a theatre makes 25¢ for every admission dollar out of the overpriced popcorn and soft-drinks, and the worse the short, the more popcorn sold. If the theatre is running The Godfather and returning 90 per cent of the profit to the distributor, you can bet the manager wants to butter a lot of popcorn.

Even where the theatre people are in it for love of movies, as they are at the Roxy or the Revue, there are still plenty of barriers between what they would like to show and what you get to see.
 With most art films, there are only one or two prints in the country, and they must be shipped to the independent operator from wherever they were last shown, perhaps right across the country.
 If the film hasn't shown before in the country, a fee must be paid to each provincial censorship board for clearance. (Approximately $70 for an average length film in Ontario.) In many cases the distributor figures, rightly, that it isn't worth it for the money involved. So the Revue lost Marco Ferrari's Wedding March. In some cases a North American distributor wants far more money than a small Canadian art house can take in, which is why Jodorowski's El Topo, distributed by Alan Klein, has never been seen here. And, since the repertory theatres are dependent on later showings of films receiving their first-run downtown, they suffer whenever a first-run art house discontinues its booking policy — and first-run art houses are dropping like flies.

Theatres showing Canadian features have the added burden of having to compete with the massive pre-selling that American films have before they cross the border. Just how massive this pre-sell is, can be seen by the fate of Syrinx, a high-quality local art-rock group. (While this is switching industries, the recording business and the movies business can be regarded as pretty much interchangeable: Arlo Guthrie was told by Warner Brothers Records to shorten down his version of The City of New Orleans in order to assure it enough AM air-play for a chance at top fifty sales. Guthrie was a big enough star to refuse.
 Most aren't. The standard recording contract, like the old movie studio contract, gives the company the right to release a record in pretty well any shape it bloody well pleases.) Syrinx's Canadian records were backed by a financing house who market researched the U.S. and concluded that, while the record could sell 70,000 copies there, that would not be enough to pay for the advertising necessary to break into the market. The band stayed here, and later split up.

The alternative to business money for filmmakers and artists is government money. But government censorship is just as bad, only more openly political. The National Film Board and the CBC are notorious for the restrictions they place on projects. The This Hour Has Seven Days case was only exceptional for the arrogance the network showed in the face of the public's support of the program. The Canadian Film Development Corporation has been more discreet, but it becomes clearer and clearer that certain films don't get financed. There was a spate of movies promised out of the FLQ kidnappings and repression, but none raised the money. Now even La Guerre, Yes Sir has had its financing dropped by the CFDC, for reasons that a number of film people suspect are pretty political. Business and government are the Scylla and Charybdis filmmakers have to sail by. To the few that make it through, the censor is a minor squall very near port.

Beyond official censorship and economic censorship there is the more opaque territory of self-censorship and censorship of style. It is the most pervasive and hardest to describe. I used to have a regular column in Maclean's Magazine called Token Radical. It continued until the editor who hired me, and the editor in whose section I appeared, were both fired. I wasn't fired though, and sent in my next column, which was about that demonstration at the American consulate a few years back where the police made a lot of arrests and broke it up with their horses. The column was the angriest I had written. It was also the first one that was ever rejected — on the grounds that it just wasn't very well written. Who knows, it might not have been. In writing as in movies it is hardest to create a committed work. It is equally hard to read one, often embarrassing or threatening to turn embarrassing at any moment. It is not the style.

Earlier at Maclean's, I wrote about a friend who climbed up the CBC tower one lunchbreak and got arrested for attempted suicide, a bit beaten up and booked into the mental hospital at 999 Queen Street for observation. My approach was a straight, fact by fact, biased narrative, except for one point where I broke into italics to write:
 "Sweet God — excuse me this one editorial comment — the cops ask a man if he was attempting suicide and he says no, and they book him for attempted suicide; and he says don't push me so they push him harder; they kneel him and punch

by the end I found myself more and more learning the style. I hadn't been bullied. If anything, I'd been protected. It just happens to you. "When people of talent get involved in the movie business", says Pauline Kael, "They rarely play their talent straight, they bend it to what they think of as the "demands" of the medium — that is, to what movies have already done."

The last piece of mine that McClean's published was a follow-up to an earlier one I had written giving Hell to the National Hockey League for ripping off hockey. I received over a hundred letters (a Maclean's landslide) and did the follow-up piece by confronting Clarence Campbell, Hockey Canada, John Monroe and some others with my bulging portfolio. Of course I discovered that none of them gave a sweet damn about my hundred representative, angry hockey fans, who had about as much sway with the NHL as they had with General Motors. So that was what I wrote.

After I handed in my copy I got a call from Phil, the interim editor after Gzowski's dismissal. Phil

"It'll be all right if they bar Last Tango in Paris.
 I can imagine scenes that would burn holes in the film."

him and he asks for a doctor and the doctor arrives with the man who kneed and punched him;
 and a psychiatrist asks him if he heard voices, and he says no, and so he gets committed to a mental hospital; and then THEY say that HE is acting strangely!"

When I handed the piece in, Peter Gzowski, who was then the editor, particularly liked that paragraph, saying that was the kind of thing he would dearly love to write, but couldn't. Not that he didn't have the skill, not that he had been for-bidden, but one in his position just didn't.

(As an aside, McClelland and Stewart recently called me to say they wanted to reprint the CBC tower piece in a new sociology textbook for high school students. The only change they wanted was the deletion of that paragraph, which they hoped I would understand. It was a sunny day and I was feeling spry so I told them all or nothing.)

I was only at Maclean's eight months or so, but was warned that my piece was so cynical it would make the section of letters to follow pretty superfluous. He wondered if I couldn't offer a little more hope — not change my beliefs, but maybe just lighten my prediction some. He asked me to think about it. I did and I figured, when you came right down to it, a sentence or two, surrounded by thousands of others, laid out between bright-coloured, high-priced, motivationally-researched ads — a sentence or two couldn't make much difference. I thought, "What the Hell". I was low on money at the time, unsure about a job, and changed the ending to read, "Actually, I would be pretty pessimistic if it weren't for the letters, but if that many people stay that mad, and start getting together with more mad people, we sure could unseat some politicians and maybe even some hockey czars" — which made us all as happy as we could be, under the circumstances.

Bob Bossin

Canadian capitalism gone on the blink

"In key sectors of the Canadian economy non-residents are in a position to take decisions contrary to the well-being of Canadians. And that has in fact come about in industries as important as automobiles, titanium, radios, chemical products, optical products and many others. Foreigners will decide if our oil wells are to be worked or closed... and will collect the profits."

—Pierre Trudeau, 1958

Much has happened since 1958 to further reduce Canada to an economic and political satellite of the American Leviathan and yet the telling evidence of dependent status has almost become lost in a shuffle of useless reports masking almost total inaction on the part of successive Liberal and Conservative governments.

Trudeau's essay is one of "14 probes into the workings of a branch plant economy" contained in a Last Post special called Corporate Canada.

Edited by Marc Starowicz and Rae Murphy of the Last Post staff Corporate Canada attempts to serve "as a layman's guide to the basics of Canada's economic and political crisis". Most of the articles appearing in Corporate Canada have previously appeared in the Last Post, a muckraking alternative Canadian news magazine.

In the essays on various Canadian corporations and their activities the authors go beyond the distortions and superficialities one reads daily in the average commercial newspaper and analyze what is behind the events.

Contemporary writing on economics in Canada is by and large an economics of acceptance, acceptance of the myths of orthodox liberal economics. Mel Watkins, a left-wing U of T economics professor, says in the introduction that the conventional economist relies on two myths: that the market is the basic source of power and that the state is a "neutral entity able to intervene when the populace wills to correct any imbalance."

Watkins argues that Marx offered the best insight into the modern capitalist state when he said "the executive of the modern state is but a committee for managing the common affairs of the bourgeoisie." He goes on to observe that "in hinterland areas therefore it is the owners, top managers and financiers of the foreign based multi-national corporations that are the contemporary ruling class. Where the power lies is mostly outside Canada."

However, the essays in Corporate Canada are not merely about the well-documented activities of American multi-national corporations. Eaton's, one of the most well-known Canadian corporations, comes under fire in what is one of the best essays in the collection.

One might well prescribe this piece as required reading for those who might think an independent capitalist Canada is an objective to be worked for.

Eaton's is exposed by Starowicz as a corporation that has continually fought attempts of its employees to unionize. It was investigated during the 1930's by a Royal Commission because of its high prices and sweat shop wages.

Eatons now has 50,000 employees across Canada and the Eaton family owns 48 department stores, 5 warehouses, 352 catalogue sales offices and many undeveloped parcels of land. With an estimated fortune of 400 million dollars the Eaton empire is one of the largest concentrations of political and economic power in Canada.

Starowicz details how this empire has been built by super-exploitative wages, poor working conditions, arbitrary management, and powerful pressure on the press and on governments.

In the thirties it was revealed by women employees that they were harassed and harangued into making the minimum of $12.50 a week on piecework. This required the completion of twelve dresses a day, which was almost physically impossible.

In those days a group of 40 women in a department were fired when they tried to bargain with management as part of a union. In 1951 a vote was held on certification of the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union and after a three year union organizing campaign the workers voted 4880 to 4020 not to join the union. This reflected a massive organizing and publicity effort by the company against unionization which spread lies about the union and which also involved four well timed raises, a better pension scheme and benefits.

Yet in 1970 the average wage for saleswomen in a Toronto store was $1.70 an hour as compared to $2.00 an hour for salesmen, far behind the unionized industrial sector. The union still gets many calls from Eatons' workers but they are told about the loss in 1951.

Starowicz also reveals how the daily press in Toronto and Montreal are influenced by the moguls of the Eaton empire. One reporter in Montreal was fired after an Eatons' boss complained about a humorous piece he had done about the Santa Claus parade. In Toronto the Telegram twice killed a Marc Zwelling story about the layoff of 200 Eaton's employees in 1970. Zwelling now works for the Last Post.

The Eaton's empire was built on many questionable practices, including the use of loss leaders to drive smaller retailers out of business, special discounts from manufacturers to undersell competitors, the forcing of workers to work at intolerable speeds at low wages.

In another article titled "Why the CPR doesn't Like You", Bob Chodos demonstrates how another huge Canadian corporation has dedicated itself to phasing out rail service in spite of passenger demand. Begun with government financing as part of Macdonald's National Policy in the 1880's, the CPR is a corporate agglomeration unconcerned by people's needs and solely concerned with profit.

In fact when the National Railways Act came into effect in the late sixties, which required railways to justify any cuts in service, the CPR applied to drop all its passenger service except its lucrative Toronto to Montreal run. Apparently now more interested in developing its hotel chain, airline, transport system and freight service and other enterprises, Canadian Pacific greeted the refusal to cut off many runs by curtailing services and discouraging passengers.

It made its times inconvenient, it raised meal prices, cut dining and sleeping car service and did everything it could to discourage passengers. An apathetic Liberal government in Ottawa did not fight too hard and CPR was allowed to make some reductions in service. This co-operation with federal governments has remained despite the fact Sir John A. is long gone.

Chodos goes on to explore the trends in Canadian rail service, suggesting that even CN appears preoccupied with a desire to make a profit from passenger service. He cites a study made by an Ontario transportation economist which argued that not only is rail service cheaper than air but a considerable deficit is justified in view of the fact that more expensive airline transportation is subsidized through airport and other subsidies which add up to more than $100 million.

In the last essay in this expose of the Canadian dream Ralph Surette explores the decline of the family farm and how this development has actually been encouraged by government policies. The facts of the desperate situation of rural Canada are quite familiar but what Surette explains is that the trend to corporate farming, which is destroying a way of life, has been encouraged by a heartless federal government in concert with agri-business.

Branch plant economy hurts most Canadians

No wonder a small farmer can't stay in business when the free market allows wholesalers to reap huge profits while farmers and small retailers get almost nothing. The farmer only gets ten per cent of the final selling price of his produce while vast corporations such as Kraftco milk every last penny out of consumers. The eastern urban elites of Canada, Surette charges, have aided in these developments, encouraging rural depopulation and ignoring the chaos in the free marketing system.

Overproduction has been encouraged by corporations eager to get cheap products for processing and maximize already exorbitant profits. Surette concludes that in essence the problem is the same as that in other sectors of the Canadian economy; that not enough is spent on research and development and nothing is being done to fight American control through land ownership and the exploitative practices of its large food processing corporations.

In the second series of six brief essays Corporate Canada explores the continentalist pressure on the Canadian economy and the disastrous results in energy resource industries, in high technology industries such as computers and electronics and finally the war industry and the National Hockey League. In all these case studies the authors detail how American control has resulted in detrimental effects for Canada. Much of the information on the extent of American ownership in the Canadian economy is common knowledge but what is often forgotten is just how that ownership leads to control and how decisions are based on profitability on an international scale. The stories in the computer industry and the electronics industry are a case in point.

As in all high technology Canadian industries there is a high degree of American ownership and this has resulted in the decline of both computer and television and radio tube manufacturing. While Canadian and world sales are booming Canadian branch plants such as General Electric and Westinghouse are closing plants. While the computer industry is the fastest growing industry in the world Canadian firms are going out of business and branch plants are phasing out operations.

The degree of American control has resulted in an increased tendency to import what technology still is required and not even produce enough for the Canadian market. Research and development in Canada by Canadians is almost non-existent. The proportion of imports is increasing in proportion to domestic production. Clearly Canada has completely lost control of her economy in these vital areas.

Despite the Science Council of Canada's warnings about these trends in high technology industries and the dire consequences of foreign control, the Trudeau government has done absolutely nothing to develop publicly owned industry of this type in Canada. This despite the fact that particularly in the computer industry, this is vital to our future economic development and independence from subservience to the American empire.

One of the most obviously distasteful areas of foreign control is in the arms industry. Canada is one of the world's leading arms producers and its largest customer is the United States. Starowicz shows how this industry is dominated by American firms and is in fact subservient to the American State Department. Though the Canadian government has kindly set up a marketing agency for the branch plant war industry, deals must still be approved by the American state department because most of the arms producing companies are American owned.

Canada is a leading producer in aircraft, radar, guidance systems and guided missiles. One government official is quoted as saying: "Let's face the facts — as long as we have defence forces we have a defence industry, and as long as we have that industry, they have to have foreign markets."

Therefore, Canada acts as a chief supplier of the U.S. war machine in its various efforts from Korea to Vietnam co-operating through a defence sharing agreement as well as two military alliances, NATO and NORAD. "An independent Foreign Policy for Canadians" was the title of a Trudeau review of our foreign policy published several years ago. Can anyone take this seriously while Canada acts as a powder monkey for the largest imperialist military power in the world?

In resources the same story unfolds as Trudeau and Joe Greene tried to conceal the obvious when they denied the existence of a continental energy pact. Gord Cleveland looks at Joe Greene's nationalist speech at Denver and exposes it as a ploy to distract Canadians from the sell-out of their natural resources. He shows how high-level American planning committees consider a continental energy policy as essential to America's continued growth as the most powerful state in the international capitalist economic system.

The continental energy pact never needed to be signed. It is proceeding as scheduled with the James Bay development (financed by American capital to exploit Quebec's hydro power for American consumers), and the Mackenzie Pipeline while natural resource industries continue to have the highest degree of American domination in any sector of the Canadian economy. Canada's most irreplaceable resources are being sold out and the Trudeau government just sits back and watches, occasionally rousing itself to help the Americans complete their takeover.

The final insult is the decline of Canada's "national sport", hockey, with the expansion of the National Hockey League to the United States in 1967, ironically the centennial year. This has resulted in a lower quality of hockey and marks the complete commercialization of the sport. Only three franchises out of 16 in 1973 are in Canada (and only two are Canadian owned). Hockey Night in Canada has fallen from its former top position in Canadian television ratings as the game becomes so diluted that aficionados no longer bother watching what was once the weekly showpiece of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The final section deals with the government response or lack of it. It is fittingly titled "The Politics of the Last Resort". The Trudeau government is lambasted in three successive essays for its bankrupt policies such as the DREE (Department of Regional Economic Expansion) grants that have only contributed to the coffers of large corporations and failed to solve regional disparities; and its lack of effective response to Nixon's protectionist economic policies of August 1971. All Trudeau could do was go to Washington and beg for exemption.

Corporate Canada is in many ways a depressing book but necessarily so. The utter bankruptcy of the response of the present government and the Canadian capitalist classes has been reflected in encouragement they give to the imperialism

Major league hockey a bush league sport of American multinational corporations. Behind the figures lie the real effects of American control, the degeneration of Canada into an advanced banana republic, manipulated from Washington and New York. We are what economist Kari Levitt calls "the world's most developed underdeveloped country".

However Corporate Canada fails to go beyond pointing out the deficiencies of the capitalist system. Its only failure — but a crucial one — is the limitation of muckraking journalism: solutions are only vaguely stated and alluded to, not clearly stated and integrated into an overall critique of the system.

For example, the Globe and Mail, Canada's "national newspaper" publishes muckraking stories, but refuses to realize that these are just examples of the inherent contradictions of the capitalist system. And while the Last Post journalists are certainly more analytic, "Corporate Canada" is still limited in its overall analysis. It suffers, as many collections of essays do, from a lack of a coherent analysis.

What should have been included to lengthen and increase the effectiveness of the book is an overall analysis of why Canadian capitalism has ended up in this sorry state and what are the forces that maintain it that way.

At times, the book also makes it possible to conclude that some of the Last Post writers have plunked for socialist solutions to the problems they outline only because Canadian capitalism has failed to produce Canadian independence. They sometimes seem to reject an independent capitalist Canada only because Canadian capitalists don't want it, rather than because they consider it undesirable per se. This can come close to anti-Americanism, rather than opposition to American imperialism. On the whole, however, the book does steer clear of this pitfall.

Certainly, though, the point Corporate Canada could have made more explicit is that the bourgeois solutions of the ilk of the reformist Committee for an Independent Canada are irrelevant in terms of solving Canada's problems. What Canada is facing is a crisis of capitalism. The only solution is the establishment of socialism, and this, in the Canadian context, implies a strategy that links the struggle for socialism with the struggle for independence, while never losing sight of the fact that socialism is the overall goal.

Thus, such reformist goals as 51 per cent Canadian ownership, more laws restricting corporate dealings and other CIC type demands are mere tinkering and won't solve Canada's economic crisis. It is necessary that socialists continue to expose the contradictions of Canada's state as a dependent capitalist satellite, subject to the dictates of the metropolitan power of the American empire.

The book does, however, make the useful contribution of detailing, in no uncertain terms, some of the major problems of the Canadian economic system.

Corporate Canada, the Canada of bought-off capitalists and corrupt Liberal politicians is fast reaching its crisis. As its collapse becomes more complete socialist alternatives will become essential if Canada is to survive as anything other than a junior partner in the American empire.

Last week, in a review of James Reany's Poems, we stated that an entire one-page poem had been printed upside down, which was perfectly true. However, we ascribed this to a "hilarious pasteup error". Tim Inkster of Porcepic Press has since instructed us that the poem was so printed deliberately. Our apologies.

And, three books reviewed, also by Press Porcepic, sell in a set of four for ten dollars. The books already mentioned are Tales sur la pointe des pieds, Angel, Bumblebee Dithyramb and the fourth is The Topolobampo Poems.

movies

No doubt you don't have any time to wander off to movies these days, but if you do, there's a few things around. Tonight you can see Citizen Kene at the Roxy (seven and 10:45) in the increasingly unlikely event that you haven't seen that staggeringly good movie. At 9:05 Touch of Evil is playing, an example of later, lesser Welles — a stylish, empty thriller.

Friday and Saturday evening at St. Mike's Woody Allen's Play It Again, Sam is the bill. Allen is somebody you either like a lot or not at all, so caveat emptor.

Revue Repertory Theatre has an odd pairing of films Saturday and Sunday. Harold and Maude is an offbeat, May-December romance starring Seymour Cassel and Ruth Gordon. Tristana is one of Luis Bunuel's unique works of cinema art.

Next Tuesday at the Roxy, you can see a pair of films appropriate to the dull, oppressive exam-time feeling. Appropriate, that is, to relieving the feeling. A Day at the Races and At the Circus by the Marx brothers. Their comedies are as viewable as ever, and will do wonders for your doldrums.

pop

The Survival Conference continues this week, providing some good free music. That great U of T favourite, String Band is playing tonight at 10 pm in the Hart House music room. Humphry and the Dumprucks entertain at Innis College, 63 St. George, on Friday at 10 pm. A songwriter's workshop with former Fug Tull Kupferberg, Luke Gibson, Bob Bossin and others (possibly Valdy) is scheduled for four pm Friday afternoon in Innis College.

As well as learning how to survive at the conference you can help the Quebec-Gothic Tenants' Association pay off their $4000 legal debt incurred in their fight against high-rise developers by buying a ticket to the Gothic Rock-It Concert at eight pm at Convocation Hall tomorrow. The $2 admission brings five hours of entertainment including the talents of Toronto singer Beverly Glenn-Copeland and the illusions of magician Doug Hennling. Also featured are keyboard man Bill King and drummer Bill Usher and the folk guitar duo of John Lyle and Derek Stephenson, plus the eight member band Horn, who record for GRT.

Appearing at the Riverboat this week is Toronto's Joe Mendelson who's just released an album called "Mr Middle Of the Road" (Nobody/GRT). Mendelson accompanies himself adequately on guitar, drums, piano and bass on the LP's 16 selections (many of them 1-2 minutes). Mainline fans will be pleased to know that group's original member has retained his silly sexist, chauvinistic lyrics and egotistic smugness. Mendelson has always been a fair guitar player but this collection is at best less of a waste of vinyl than Mainline's albums. One of the best slide guitarists, Ry Cooder, comes to the Riverboat starting Thursday, April 5. Besides working on three of his own LP's (on Reprise), Cooder has distinguished himself on sessions with an incredible number of performers including the Rolling Stones, Gord Lightfoot and Arlo Guthrie.

Gordon Lightfoot has sold out every night of his concerts scheduled for Massey Hall tonight through Sunday.

Fiddler's Green presents English, Scottish and Irish folk songs with Owen McBride, Enoch Kent and Lan Robb on Friday at nine pm. Flatpickers Nigel and Jesse appear on Tuesday, March 27 with a repertoire of North American folk tunes.

Former blues-rock lead guitarist of "Taste", Rory Gallagher is at the Colonial Tavern on drawings and watercolors on March 26 (until April 13).

survival

That mad hodge-podge, the Survival conference, continues. Tonight you can attend a session on alternative health care. After that, listen to some country music by Stringband.

Survival in jails might have a particular usefulness for you; if so, go to the Advisory bureau noon on Friday.

Architecture without architects is a substantial topic, appearances notwithstanding. At the Pendarves Lounge, International Students' Centre, ISC, two pm. At eight pm that night, in the music room at Hart House, Survival and the body will be under discussion.

Yonge Street until Saturday. The evening could be expensive ($3.50 up), so check prices first at 363-6168.

The legendary Fats Domino is at the El Mocambo until Saturday and the cover charge ($1 to $2) is lowest tonight.

The Mariposa Folk Festival presents its third concert at Glebe Road United Church, at 7:30 pm on Saturday. The program features Fred McKenna, Adam Mitchell, Owen McBride and Sweet Evening Breeze. Tickets are $2.50 and further information is available by calling 922-4871.

art

At the Art Gallery of Ontario an exhibition entitled Information and Perception begins March 24. It was created and mounted by eight fourth-year art students and its theme is "what the individual 'thinks' he perceives". Both this and The Art of the Comic Strip will be on until April 18.

At the Evans Gallery Fred Tymoshenko, born in Windsor, shows his landscapes inspired by a recent trip to the West Coast. This gallery is at 124 Scollard Street, and the hours are 10:30 — 5:30 daily (closed Sunday). Until April 7.

La Chasse Galerie hosts Rita Scalabrini and her paintings beginning tomorrow, March 22. Erindale College host realist painter Mary Pratt beginning March 26. You might have seen this artist and her husband on a recent program of Telescope. Beginning March 30 until April 20 at Erindale is an exhibit, Art of the Canadian Eskimo, mainly prints.

At Victoria's New Academic Building Shelley Graves Shaw begins showing her

An issue closer close to home is Quebec-Gothic city survival, Thursday at two pm in the Pendarves lounge.

Friday evening Tull Kupferberg, Fug manque, will be honored guest at the Revolting theatre. Humphry and the Dumprucks follow that act. Innis college is the location, 63 St. George. Keep on coming.

theatre

It's The Big Apple, yes indeed. And there are good things in this musical now featured at the Global Village. Elizabeth Swerdlow's dancing and choreography in the production provide its most positive element. Her fellow performers rally to the demands of the choreography fairly well.

One has to mention these things first because other elements of the production simply cripple its potential as a durable musical. Its plot is too vague and loose and (the term is becoming a cliché itself) cliché-ridden. There is no character development of the supposed central figure of the dancer, Monta Suma. As Elizabeth Swerdlow has no singing talent that was evident on opening night, there is a pathetic contrast between her majesty as a dancer and her inadequacy when expressing herself vocally. Even when speaking, she is not easily heard. Between the flatness and repetitiousness of her lyrics and her obvious vocal limitations, the intended tragedy of the dancer was not effectively communicated.

There are vague suggestions of plot that are like thumbnail sketches lying in no particular order: the progress of the three male tempters, the temptation of Monta's two fellow dancers, the tongue-in-cheek look at the consumer society. If the musical had a more precise idea of what is wanted to say, it might come closer to coherency.

As it is, it comes closer to a variety show, which, characteristically, has some rather fascinating acts and some more dull and forgettable ones. Monte's Dence, Putting On The Beast and The Big Apple are certainly enjoyable to watch. If Elizabeth Swerdlow wants to accomplish more than a fragmented evening's entertainment, she had better stand back and look at the whole Apple. Perhaps she bit off more than she could chew.

More dramatizations of Canadian history are flowering this spring. Tonight the Theatre Passe Muraille will premiere its play concerning the life of Pauline Johnson. Carol Bolt, who created Pauline along with director Paul Thompson, wrote Gabe, Toronto Free Theatre's modern salute to Riel and his friend. If Thompson's influence is still strong, we can count on intriguing use of the actors' gifts in presenting Upper Canada to the spectator.

The Backdoor Theatre Workshop is located at 474 Ontario Street. Wednesday two original one act plays open there, Yo Yo, by Michael John Nimchuk, and And At Night We Dream by David Mutch. Performances are Wednesdays through Sundays at 8:30 p.m. until April 15th. Performances are pay-what-you-can. Call for reservations 961-1505, or 964-1513.

More from little theatres: The Scarborough Players present Slawomir Mrozek's Tango from tonight until Saturday night, at the Theatre in the Pines, 4130 Lawrence Avenue East. The student price is one dollar. Others pay two dollars. At the Palmerston Library Theatre, 560 Palmerston Avenue, the Q Theatre Company is performing George Furquar's The Beaux Stratagem. It runs from March 22 to 31 at 8:30 p.m. Students pay $1.50, others $2.50.

music

Hart House on March 25 hosts a concert of jazz and experimental music, at 8 pm. At the Faculty of Music on March 26, 27, 28 and 29 there are student recitals — phone the box office for info and to confirm. On March 29 compositions by student composers will be performed at the International Student Symposium in the concert hall at 2:10 pm — no tickets, no charge. That evening at 8:30 the University of Toronto Concert Band under Robert Rosevear presents a concert — no tickets, no charge.

On March 27-8 at Massey Hall the Toronto Symphony under Victor Feldbrill plays music by Bizet, Prokofiev, Debussy-Freedman. The guest pianist will be Horacio Gutierrez.

On March 29 the second to last concert in the International String Quartet Series takes place at the Town Hall St. Lawrence Centre, at 8:30. Works to be performed are Bocherini's quartet in D major, Beethoven's quartet in A minor and Revel's string quartet in F major, by the Quartetto Italiano.

The famous Guernerli quartet comes from a round of concerts in New York to perform at the Eaton Auditorium, March 31 at 8 pm. Tickets are from $6 to $3.

On March 31 Victor Treykov, a 27-year-old Siberian-born violinist performs at Massey Hall as part of the International Artists series. His program is made up of works by Tartini, Beethoven, Prokofiev and Paganini.

SAC conveys support to McGill Daily staff

After rejecting an earlier stronger motion, the Students Administrative Council last Wednesday voted to support the staff of the McGill Daily in their struggle against the McGill Student Society.

Newly elected SAC president Bob Anderson, a UC rep, told council that the McGill society might reject the student newspaper staff's unanimous choice for editor. Such a move would have been a violation of the Canadian University Press Code of Ethics, to which the Daily subscribes as a CUP member.

Thursday the McGill student council agreed to allow the paper's choice to take office.

The successful motion stated, "We feel strongly that the opinions of the staff are a prime consideration in the selection of a newspaper's editor". It noted that The Varsity's editor is elected by the staff and ratified by an independent board of directors, and urged the student society to "consider these principles" in making its decision.

The motion passed only 14 to 12, after vice-president John Helliwell said he objected to it because council knew nothing of the milieu in which the decision was to be made.

An earlier version of the motion, defeated 10 to 15, included the statement: "No government should attempt to control the media of its community; neither should a student council attempt to impose an editor on the paper's staff."

Helliwell also objected to this motion, stating he was not prepared to say all papers should be independent of their student councils. The later motion did not include any declaration that media should be independent of government.

Education commissioner George Strathy argued that no telegram should be sent, since he thought it was 'premature'.

Council rejected an executive motion supporting a petition against holding the 1976 Olympic Games in Montreal, with several representatives maintaining it was outside SAC's jurisdiction.

The executive was questioned again on its grant of $160 to students who were occupying the math department. UC rep Bill Steadman, himself an executive member until January, called the emergency under which the executive felt empowered to make the grants "questionable."

However, since the money had already been spent, little or nothing could be done.

This week's Advisory Bureau-sponsored Survival Conference was granted $2,000 with the proviso that any unspent money would be returned.

Anderson reminded council that last year's SAC had pledged a grant and that the Madness Conference, last year also organized by the Advisory Bureau, returned $1,200 of its grant.

An alternative school for working class students, Laneway, was refused a $750 grant after council found giving the money would be unconstitutional.

Laneway representatives pleaded for money on the grounds that SAC had a responsibility to the alternative school, having substantially aided its establishment and continued operation.

The Toronto Board of Education will finance only one teacher and supplies, since there are only 14 students. The school felt that two teachers were essential to the education it wanted to provide.

Last weekend's abortion conference was granted $55, the Lithuanian Club was given $3,000 for a lecture series and the Young Socialists $100 to cover the expenses of a Marxist study class.

Because grants require a minimum of 18 affirmative votes, the U of T Homophile Association was refused $330, even though the vote on it was 16 to 2 in favour.

One perennial political football, the North Carolina Exchange, was granted $300 without opposition. Past councils have had extended debates over giving money to a small group of students who, some charged, were essentially going on vacation at the expense of 20,000 SAC fees-paying members.

The Canadian Congress of Engineering Students was also refused its request for money because it had received outside financing.

Welfare decisions made behind closed doors, Borovoy charges

By VAL ROSS

One of the greatest dangers to civil liberties in the field of social welfare is that "decisions concerning welfare recipients are not made in the light of day," Alan Borovoy said last Thursday at Holy Trinity Church.

Borovoy, chief counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, and a professor of law at Dalhousie and the University of Toronto, was addressing about 50 people on topics ranging from the Bail Reform Act to the future of civil liberties in Canada.

Speaking about the Unemployment Insurance debate in particular and welfare programs in general, Borovoy commented that "most of the laws are not made in legislative debate, but in the secrecy of private cabinet meetings."

In the case of family welfare, he said that "the appeal tribunal, the board of review, does not publish its judgments. The government knows what the precedents for appeal decisions are, but the public does not. This makes it almost impossible to prepare a case."

The board of review claims that if it published its decisions on appeals, it would destroy the confidentiality its clients want. Borovoy pointed out that this could be easily protected, if the Board published its decisions using false names.

Commenting on proposed changes to the Bail Reform Act, Borovoy cited the act as "one of the most enlightened pieces of criminal legislation in Canada." To the objection that many criminals are released from jail only to commit further crimes, Borovoy argued that the law, if properly administered, "provides ample opportunity to hold these people".

Under the old bail laws, he said the same "repeating" criminals would have been released if they had been able to raise sufficient money: "The Bail Reform Act no longer looks at a person's money, but asks if their release is a risk society can take".

Asked about future concerns of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, he suggested it would concern grass roots political movements. "Citizen groups use pressure tactics to pursue their goals. Our problem will be to examine how far they can lawfully go in the pursuit of their interests."

City plan would dot core with skyscrapers

By CHRIS NEWELL

Alderman Ying Hope Thursday criticized developers for their mercenary attitude toward development before a local chapter of the Association of Professional Engineers of Ontario.

Speaking at a Medical Sciences Auditorium seminar on "Is the Developer a Bad Guy?", Hope, a consulting engineer himself, stressed that profit from development must be social and aesthetic as well as monetary.

He cited University Avenue and Bay Street as areas where "there has been a complete lack of respect for the acceptable environment", noting the "canyon effect" and the wind-tunnel conditions created by the high buildings. The windlash effect around City Hall sometimes amounts to 50 pounds per square foot, he stated.

Hope showed the small engineering audience a map thickly studded with skyscrapers which depicted an area east of Yonge Street and south of Bloor Street built to maximum density under the current city plan. The origins of the plan are now obsolete, Hope declared since it was made when the mood of the city was more favourable to development.

The Ward 5 "reform" alderman pressed for more stringent government controls on development, coupled with a greater degree of community involvement at the planning level.

Hope's fellow panelists, developer Herbert Stricker and chief city planner Dennis Barker, later both refuted the plausibility of his map, saying that "the market would not support it" and that it was "unrealistic". Hope was unable to reply as City Council business forced him to leave the meeting early.

Barker chose a middle ground between Stricker and Hope, saying that "dialogue is healthy" and "we must have a planning process which tries to perceive the needs of the people, then goes from there."

Alderman Ying Hope shows meeting disputed city plan. Where is it?

He asked, "Just how much control (over developmental planning) does the community want?"

Stricker related the problems that Toronto developers had experienced with city councils over the last decade, and explained how the present city plan came into being.

"In the future I think we have to plan for whatever we think is going to happen in the future," he commented.

Developers would be willing to cooperate with government guidelines, he predicted, but added that if the government was to become directly involved in development, through land banking, for example, the developers would "pull out". Then, "it would be just like Communist Russia — people would be told what to do."

Seminar moderator Oscar Sigsworth, a former Old Guard alderman who is employed by a builders' supply company, closed the discussion by noting that "though there are divergent points of view, most people are trying to do what they think is best."

TA's union a top concern: GSU exec

By BILL HUTUL

The recently acclaimed president and vice-president of the Graduate Students Union both agree that getting the U of T Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA) under way is their top priority.

President Cliff Watson (management studies) and vice-president Brian Mossop (linguistics) said that they need 1200 signed members in order to receive official certification of the association from the Labour Relations Board. The Association would function as the teaching assistant's legal bargaining agent with the university.

Mossop, a GAA organizer and defeated Thursday as Communist Party candidate in the St. George by-election, estimates there are 300 to 400 teaching assistants signed up so far.

The equalization of grad assistants' salaries will be a matter of concern to Watson and Mossop, as will the right to determine course form and content. Mossop said that he wants formal guidelines of responsibilities for professors and grad assistants, rather than the present "unacceptable" informal guidelines.

Mossop said he feared the university may not absorb a $292.50 summer fee increase in 1974, as it did for this summer, and that the province may not repeal it. He also noted the government's cutback of funding in the Ontario Fellowship program from five to three million dollars in the past four years.

Watson opposes the Commission on Post-Secondary Education report, commenting there is "nothing in it for grad students to wish to recommend it." He went on to say that a cut in the number of grad students was implicit in the report.

Watson took particular exception to the report's recommendation that research funding become the responsibility of the university.

Mossop and Watson both intend to act on the recommendations of a GSU income survey to be published in a few weeks.

One recommendation, Watson said, is for more funding of graduate students in humanities.

Watson also considers important a recommendation that all graduate teaching assistants be paid at least $3,000. McMaster University guarantees graduate teachers $3,600.

Disgruntled economic historians form union

The Union of Economic History Students (UEHS) was formed Monday as a result of growing disillusionment with the graduate economic history program of the political economy department.

The students' major complaint is that the program overemphasizes modern economic theory at the expense of an historical approach.

A spokesman claimed that in the first two years of the program's existence, over 70 per cent of the students were dropped because of failure in the theory course, although their work in other courses was deemed satisfactory. This led Ann Cooper, a PhD candidate, to charge that "it has been the course in economic theory that has certified an economic historian as fit for advancement into the PhD"

Monday's meeting, attended by 12 of the program's 16 students, was called so that the students could present a strong and united front in negotiations with the faculty on proposed changes in the program.

The major point of contention between students and faculty concerns the content of the program's required core course, ECO 2006. The course was advertised as "an important feature of the program... which focuses on the application of theoretical concepts to historical problems".

According to a UEHS spokesman, the majority of those who enrolled in the economic history program did so in the hope that such a course would provide an attractive alternative to the "irrelevant drudgery of conventional economics".

But, as one student put it, "the core course proved to be nothing more than a crash course in advanced neo-classical theory". The economic history faculty yielded to the economics department in the teaching of the course and the result was "an almost totally ahistorical approach."

The students who failed did so out of "disillusionment and disinterest," he said.

Due to student protests last year, program supervisor Andrew Watson agreed to allow for a range of options in fulfilling the "theory requirement".

ECO 2006 was not offered this year because the faculty felt "inequipped to teach the course as advertised," but the students were satisfied because the options included a course which offered an alternative to conventional economic theory.

Over the summer, however, and just before he left for a year's sabbatical, Watson reversed his decision without consulting students and made the theory requirement for economic history the same as that for economics, eliminating the options.

The failure to provide the advertised core course has left the economic history program, in the words of one student, "a parasitical adjunct of the economics program, desperately in search of an identity."

The union is at present negotiating the content of a new course.

The students would like to see the course include some discussion of the marxist approach to economic history, since most of them have found "bourgeois" theory to be rather limited. But, they have been told that this is an unreasonable demand. Acting supervisor John Munro told them, "We don't live in a marxist society."

Copy of exams passed

Arts and science students will be allowed to obtain a copy of their final exams as a result of a motion passed at the General Committee on Monday.

A motion by Governing Council candidate Dave Laughton and SAC president-elect Bob Anderson that a student "may request a reproduction of his (sic) final exam for a fee of five dollars" was accepted. If not satisfied, the student may petition for the paper to be re-read.

In the past, students could only ask for a clerical check of marks on the paper, and could not get a copy. Students now may also request a clerical check in courses with no final exam, for a five dollar fee.

A motion to endorse the maintenance of high academic standards, as a priority in the faculty, and "excellent teaching standards in all courses including the so-called service courses" passed committee.

Earlier, conservative faculty had amended the motion, deleting a phrase which deplored the release of any staff member "of proven excellence in teaching ability from any department in the faculty".

The deletion was an obvious demonstration of non-support for three dismissed math professors. The motion was originally moved during the math occupation.

A by-election will be held in October to fill any vacant seats on the General Committee.

In previous years, there were hard-fought elections for the student seats, but this year seven seats were not filled at the close of nominations. No seats were to be contested in elections; there were 15 acclamations.

Foreigners fear new laws

A recent survey at McMaster University showed that 98 per cent of foreign students there felt they would be adversely affected by new immigration regulations that make it almost impossible for students on student visas to get summer employment.

The new regulations, which came into effect January 1, treat student-visa holders the same as tourists on visitors visas, although many students have been here for three or four years. Thus, in order to get a summer job, a foreign student must:

- obtain a written offer of employment detailing the nature, location, and duration of a particular job,
- take this job offer to a Canada Manpower office which will determine whether or not the job could be filled by a Canadian or a landed immigrant. If so, no work permit will be issued.

Then, if no Canadian or landed immigrant can fill the job, the student must then get a letter stating so from the Manpower office and apply at the Immigration office for an employment visa.

This procedure must be repeated for each job applied for.

The McMaster survey covered 204 student-visa holders, about one-quarter of the total at McMaster.

All but five felt they would be hurt by the regulations. Fully 63 per cent expected to drop out of school and go home if they could not obtain sufficient aid, while 25 per cent intended to leave Canada to study elsewhere. Sixty-five of the students indicated that they did not even have enough money for their return fare home.

At the University of Toronto, nearly 2,000 students on student visas will be affected.

President John Evans has sent a letter to Immigration and Manpower Minister Robert Andras asking that current student-visa holders be exempted "from the restrictions of the new policy".

He stated, "I am concerned that this legislation will have serious implications for those studying in Canada on student visas. It seems certain that a majority of the foreign students on this campus — and these number nearly 2,000 — will be forced to curtail their studies if they cannot work this summer, and the effect of the new regulations will clearly be a significant reduction in employment opportunities for non-residents."

Critics of the policy, including professor N.L. Wilson of McMaster University, have commented on the unfairness of applying the new regulations to students who were here before they were announced.

Wilson said, "Foreign students here now have been invited to Canada to study... They came to Canada on the understanding and with the expectation that they would be permitted to take summer employment. This expectation was created by previous government policy and such a policy implies a clear commitment."

The November 3 regulations, which came into effect with no warning, prohibit students and others from applying for landed immigrant status from within Canada and thereby gaining the right to work.

A great many students have said that they sought landed status months, or even years, ago and were advised by the Immigration Department to wait until they graduated.

Now they cannot apply to be landed and they cannot get summer jobs, both of which they knew to be common practices when they made their decisions to come to Canada.

Students at several campuses, including Ryerson and McMaster, have been organizing against the new regulations. A meeting of several hundred Ryerson students with Manpower and Immigration officials was told that "someone must suffer". Rob Rolfe, a Ryerson library assistant and member of the Committee Against Racist Immigration Policy, said, "This new policy is racist and the government is using foreign students as scapegoats because it is incapable of handling the unemployment problem in the country."

Tonight, foreign students from U of T, Ryerson, and several other campuses are planning to present their demands to Immigration Minister Robert Andras. Andras will debate civil rights lawyer Charles Roach on the subject of racism in Canadian immigration policy at Arlington Public School (501 Arlington Ave., just north of Vaughn Rd.) at 8 pm tonight.

The Ryerson students will present Andras with a petition urging "that student-visa holders be given the same rights to find and accept summer employment as citizens and landed immigrants".

OFS is concerned

TORONTO (CUP) — The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) has established commissions to study the problems of foreign students and the report of the Ontario Commission on Post-Secondary Education (COPSEO).

The commissions were set up at the OFS general meeting held at Glendon College last weekend.

The foreign students study was motivated by news the Ministry of Colleges and Universities is concerned with the percentage of foreign students in Ontario post-secondary institutions. OFS general co-ordinator Craig Heron said in an interview that the federation is not sure the percentage is any cause for concern at all, but student leaders want to study the issue in some depth.

OFS delegates also passed a motion asking the federal government to exempt foreign students from tough new rules against non-landed status immigrants working in Canada.

The commission studying the COPSEO report is scheduled to report back at the next OFS general meeting in May. The meeting may include a week-long educational seminar.

The Glendon meeting followed the rather disappointing OFS moratorium March 13, called to discuss the COPSEO report and government educational policies. Student "apathy" was not to blame as much as bad organizational work by member student councils.

Where organizational work was good, student turnout was respectable. About 800 students at the University of Toronto came to hear colleges and universities minister Jack McInnis support the COPSEO recommendations. Queen's University students held a small meeting, as did students at Lakehead University. But the rest of the campuses reported no moratorium activities.

West Indians must tackle their communication gap, seminar says

By FRAN JOHNSON
 A seminar on education during last week's Black History Week concluded that West Indian peoples must overcome a communication gap on two levels to cope with the Canadian educational system.

One difference, discussion participants noted, was that Canadian parents are more lax about hours for their children than West Indian parents.

Several black parents stressed that they feared this freedom would promote sexual permissiveness, as well as cause inefficiency in school. However, one audience member pointed out that sex is just as much a problem at 11 pm as 2 am. A social worker and 18 year old black student both concluded that sexual behaviour depended upon the child's upbringing. "Kids are pliable," they said, and have relatively little trouble adjusting to their environment — it is the parents who don't adjust, since they have relatively few social dealings outside the family.

Many of the West Indians present felt that their children entering the educational system are misguided into the lower "vocational" educational streams. Upon this accusation, a guidance counsellor from George Harvey Secondary School promptly arose to justify the practice of guidance designed to help the new students. Several parents countered that their children had been arbitrarily placed in courses and programs below their capabilities.

The discussion became quite heated between the counsellor and the group, ending finally when chairwoman Ariadne Johnson and another social worker bailed out the counsellor.

They expanded upon a suggestion from the group that "these problems, which exist for not only us West Indians but everyone, can only be solved if guidance counsellors are informed, and if necessary, pushed by us to realize their errors... We must speak with these people, it is up to us, they won't know unless we tell them."

A rival for OFS?

A province-wide student organization, intended to vie with the Ontario Federation of Students for leadership of any student movement in Ontario next year, was initiated at a conference of "left students" held recently in Peterborough.

Seventy-five students discussed the nature of the cutbacks in education and their economic basis in "the general crisis in social expenditures", and concluded that a student movement based exclusively on students' own "conjunctural interests" could not get very far.

They established a liaison committee to organize a future conference to arrive at a common analysis of the students' situation, with an emphasis on the need to relate to the trade union movement in Ontario "in common struggle against the state".

Students from nine Ontario universities and community colleges attended the conference.

Groups want leaders freed

By DOUG HAMILTON

The Canadian Labour Congress and the World Confederation of Labour - La Confédération mondiale du travail have joined the growing number of voices in both Canada and Europe demanding the release of three Québec trade union leaders imprisoned last May.

The CLC represents 1.8 million workers in both national and international unions. The WCL based in Brussels, is a confederation of world trade unions with a membership of over 14 million workers.

CLC spokesman Charles Bauer told The Varsity in a telephone interview from Ottawa that the congress is demanding "immediate and complete amnesty" for the three leaders: Marcel Pepin of la Confédération des "cruel and unwarranted" when "compared with treatment meted out to others in similar circumstances."

The letter maintains that the sentences place the three leaders "in the same class as common criminals." The jailings are designed to "crush the spirit of the labour movement," it alleges.

CLC president Donald MacDonald bitterly denounced the imprisonment of the Québec leaders last May. "The sentences aren't based on the charges at all," he contended.

The CLC has not indicated what further action might be taken if the Québec government ignores requests for amnesty.

The WCL, however, has announced that an international workers' boycott against Canadian ships and aircraft that the committee is appealing to "supporters of trade unions in Canada" and "other interested people."

Tolentino asserted that there is "a need to bring to English Canada the situation that is taking place in Québec". The plight of the three chiefs has "tremendous bearing on English Canada", he continued.

Asked if the committee was affiliated with any of the three Québec union centrals, Tolentino replied that the body is "non-partisan."

"We don't want to align ourselves with any party. . . . We don't want to align ourselves with any union," he said.

However, the committee has been backed by the FTQ and "we are trying to get endorsement from the CSN", added Tolentino.

In Ontario, the NDP and the Canadian Union of General Employees (CUGE), affiliated with the CSN, have both given the committee their blessing.

CUGE is also circulating a petition drawn up by the CSN in Montreal demanding "the liberation of the three union presidents". The petition is currently being circulated on the U of T campus.

According to CSN secrétaire-général Paul Thibeault, the petition already has been signed by thousands of people in the Montréal area.

"We are trying everything legally to influence the government," he said in an interview with The Varsity.

The Common Front leaders "have done nothing," he asserted. They "did not forcibly stop anyone. . . it is unbelievable that they should be in prison."

Although the committee's work is in the nascent stage within English Canada, Tolentino reports "a united front" of various unions and political groups has been formed in Montreal. "Their efforts are going to pay off," he declared.

The committee is arranging for several Québec trade unionists to tour Canada to explain their cause. Fernand Daoust, secrétaire-général of the FTQ has already agreed to visit Toronto, said Tolentino.

Daoust believes the incarceration of the "trois chefs" has occurred at a critical juncture for the Québec trade union movement.

"Their jailings come at the same time as the Québec government has moved ahead with the vicious anti-labour, anti-strike Bill 89 - a bill which if passed into law will grant the state powers to ban strikes deemed to involve 'essential services,'" he said.

Bill 89, introduced by the Québec government last December, prohibits employees from striking in so-called essential services. The mass-circulation tabloid Québec-Press has described the bill as "the most anti-worker law in the history of Québec".

Daoust believes that laws similar to Bill 89 will be adopted by other provincial governments "if we are unable to defeat it here".

Other labour leaders, like Daoust, believe Bill 89 will be instituted while the unions are without their leaders.

Le front commun (permanent) des employés de La Presse, comprised of six CSN and six FTQ unions at the Montréal daily La Presse, has also called for the release of the three leaders.

The La Presse employees have called for the formation of a new common front and has urged unionists "to forget their quarrels in order to fight against Bill 89."

syndicats nationaux, (CSN or CNTU), Louis Laberge of la Fédération des travailleurs (FTQ), and Yvon Charbonneau of la Corporation des enseignants du Québec (CEQ).

The three union chiefs were given one-year jail terms for contempt of court last May. They were found guilty of counselling public service workers to disobey a court injunction ending a strike involving 210,000 civil servants.

Outraged at the harsh sentences imposed on their leaders, hundreds of thousands of Québec unions took to the streets in the largest general strike in the history of North America.

The three chiefs were later released pending appeal, but in November, 1972, the Québec Court of Appeal upheld the verdict of the lower court. Forty-nine other union executives were imprisoned along with Pepin, Laberge, and Charbonneau.

Bauer said the CLC "has made several approaches" to Québec Premier Robert Bourassa's government in attempts to get the three men freed. So far, the congress' efforts have yielded no results.

On March 6, said Bauer, the CLC's executive council, its paramount legislative body, wrote Bourassa "urging" him to grant amnesty for the three leaders.

According to Bauer, the letter described the sentences given to Pepin, Laberge and Charbonneau as Conference seeks repeal of abortion laws

By HEATHER-JANE SANGUINS
Dr. Barbara Roberts of the U.S. Women's National Abortion Action Coalition attacked Richard Nixon's opposition to abortion at a massive rally kicking off a weekend conference sponsored by the Canadian Women's Coalition to Repeal the Abortion Laws. Nixon, Roberts said, bases his opposition to abortion on upholding "the sanctity of human life". But she insisted that anti-abortion laws are "a brutal example of the oppression of women."

dinator Joan Campana proclaimed arrival at a "new stage" in the campaign to repeal abortion laws.

Women's Coalition executive secretary Lorna Grant stated to the audience of over 250 that the law makers, not the women who procured the abortions, were "the real criminals," and demanded that "all laws on abortion be stricken from the Criminal Code".

During the rally Grant read several telegrams that had been received in support of the conference, from New Zealand, France, MP Grace McKinnis, and a U.S. organization in support of Dr. Willie Pierce, who is in a position similar to that of Morgentaler (see separate story). Women's groups representatives from all across Canada, including 35 from Winnipeg, attended the conference.

While the rally was in progress outside the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education building, representatives of the Right-to-Life and ProLife anti-abortion groups picketed.

The coalition is urging women to testify before a public tribunal it is setting up that they have had abortions to confront the federal government with evidence that a large number of Canadian women have had abortions.

Abortionist applauded

By CYNTHIA FARQUHARSON
Out of 5,000 illegal abortions performed by Dr. Henry Morgentaler, none were fatal, none necessitated hysterectomies, and only 27 were followed by further hospitalization.

At a meeting of the Canadian Women's Coalition to Repeal the Abortion Laws last Friday night, Morgentaler charged that "the Canadian Abortion Laws are a violation of the Canadian Bill of Rights, in that an unwanted pregnancy is an invasion of another person's body, and denies that person her fundamental right to privacy."

He received a standing ovation after his first public announcement, made against the advice of his lawyer, that he had been performing abortions in his Montreal clinic "for the past few years."

Morgentaler, past president of the Canadian Humanist Association, is being prosecuted on three charges: two for illegal abortions, and a third for conspiracy to perform an abortion.

His admission caused two other doctors to proclaim that they had supported this "conspiracy" by sending their patients on to Morgentaler. Three women from the audience then announced that they had procured "illegal" abortions, and that if Morgentaler were held as guilty, then they were equally so.

The doctor pleaded, "It is my moral obligation and duty as a medical doctor to help my patients. Denying women safe abortions and exposing them to death and injury is criminal."

Morgentaler, who invented the vacuum suction method, denounced hospitals' use of methods requiring general anaesthesia instead of suction, which needs only local anaesthesia. General anaesthesia increases the rate of blood loss, he stated.

"Moreover, the dangers involved in abortion increase as much as four times after the first three months of pregnancy," he said. "Often a patient is forced to wait past this time period before being granted rights to abortion under the present system."

"If a woman cannot plead danger to personal health, as reason for abortion it is unlikely that she may be credited with psychological instability (an alternative criterion) in the initial stages of pregnancy."

The whole sexual revolution, she added, was "the seizure of control over their own bodies by women".

Eleanor Wright Pelrine, author of Abortion in Canada, asserted that "safe, legal abortion has to be available as a backstop" to accidental and unwanted pregnancies "with no qualifications".

In reference to prime minister Pierre Trudeau's anti-abortion stance, Pelrine decried the latest alliance of "King Pierre the L. joined by Otto Laing, Crown Prince of Injustice, in trampling on the rights of Canadian Women". Laing is the Minister of Justice in the Trudeau cabinet.

Under half of Canadian hospitals would perform legal abortions as late as last spring, Pelrine noted. She predicted a "massive disobedience campaign" against abortion such as one in France.

St. Catharines broadcaster Laura Sabia, also former chairperson of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, pointed out that in view of the present precarious position of the federal government, abortion should become "a beautiful political issue" in the next six months.

Because of the recent U.S. Supreme Court decision to revoke all anti-abortion laws, Canadian Women's Coalition national coor-

FOR FUTURE CONSIDERATION

To be a disciple of Christ isn't easy. Discipleship costs. The same for priesthood. One could paraphrase G. K. Chesterton's famous comment about the Church and say,

"It is not that the ministry has been tried and found wanting, rather-it has been found hard and not tried."

In a world where men love themselves, the idea of loving others seems to be hard for some to understand.

In a world preoccupied with getting, the idea of giving may be hard to understand.

In a world preoccupied with comfort, the idea of 'doing without' may be hard to understand.

In a world preoccupied with saving itself, the idea of Someone who has saved the world, may be hard to understand.

Hard to understand. Quite possibly! A commitment for life to truth, to justice and to brotherhood is the challenge presented to-day to the missionary priest.

Considering your future? Why not examine the challenge presented to the missionary priest?

Bankers, not businessmen, steer economies

By JIM MARTIN

"Anyone studying foreign control of Latin America must consider the important role of international banking behind it", Frederick Goff told a meeting of about 30 people in Sid Smith Thursday.

Goff, an American raised in Colombia, is a co-founder of the North America Congress on Latin America, a group examining U.S. power in Latin America. He believes that bankers, the "high priests of capitalism", play an international role greater than businessmen in multi-national corporations, generally the focus of more study and criticism.

Goff pointed out the importance of American multi-national banks to the direction of economic development. He said those controlling capital and financing in a capitalist economy are in the "driver's seat".

Unlike corporations, which deal with only a few product markets, financing is in constant demand from all areas.

In Latin America, large banks have a considerable advantage in being able to make economic predictions, according to Goff.

The advantage stems from the "rights of capital" that a bank holds over industries and businesses for the alleged purpose of determining credit risks, the bank can demand monthly outlines of the development plans of its customers. Goff asserted that even the governments of Latin American countries do not often have access to this key information.

Goff also said that American banks exert an influence on international development by shaping U.S. foreign policy. He cited the number of bankers in top government posts which relate to foreign policy as an example.

Goff then outlined the concentration of financial power by a few leading American banks. He said that two thirds of the stocks available in the U.S. are held by the trust departments of 50 U.S. banks. In 1945, half of the national wealth was held by banks, which grew at the fastest rate of increase in the U.S. Goff found it ironic that 100 billion dollars in workers' pension funds is controlled by bank officers.

Lately "bank-holding companies", combining a bank and investing institutions such as insurance and real estate firms, have been created to expand even further the field of influence of multi-national banks.

Bankers have found a lucrative market in the underdeveloped third world, according to figures quoted by Goff. While in 1968 the domestic earnings of the three leading American banks fell two per cent, their overseas earnings "rocketed" upward by 30 per cent. The First National City Bank "earns" half of its income abroad.

Most Latin America countries have not imposed restrictive reserve requirements, taxes, and interest rate ceilings which would reduce banking profits. Brazil's prime interest rate fluctuates around 26 per cent, and it is even higher for less powerful borrowers than for large corporations.

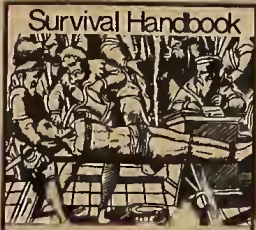

Goff said that large banks do not release figures on their degree of control of local deposits, but he estimated that 55 per cent of the deposits in a nation such as Chile are controlled by large banks. Seventy-eight per cent of the capital used for the creation of industries is generated from local sources, and from this Goff concluded that "development by foreign capital" is largely a myth in South America.

Foreign financiers have other types of power in addition to the control of capital and industry, Goff pointed out. He said that the Chilean government, for example, will have to bargain with foreign bankers in Chile to repay the national debt of two billion dollars.

Goff outlined how American bank investors have guarded against nationalization of their Latin American interests. However, he added that multi-national corporations with large assets cannot afford to ignore nationalism. He claimed that foreign investors have recently assumed an "important intermediate function" in South America - rather than directly owning factories and real estate, smaller amounts are loaned to this sector while more capital goes to endeavours such as shipping, advertising, and the building of large warehouse centres in Panama.

"Nationalization by a popular government" is the best long-term action towards reducing dominance by foreign banks according to Goff. Short of this, he advocated the imposition of reserve requirements, and restrictions on foreign bank ownership of industries, businesses and local banks. He used Trinidad and Tobago as an example of a country that has legislated against control of its economy by American bankers. That government has decreed that all insurance companies must be locally owned.

Goff maintained, however, that many Latin American nations are still "wide open" to exploitation by multi-national banks, citing Brazil, Panama, and until recently the Bahamas as examples.

Meanwhile, "democrats" plan coups

Chileans give marxism a vote of confidence

SANTIAGO DE CHILE (CUPI-PL) — The results of the hardfought Chilean parliamentary elections display the sharp class polarization that characterizes the present political moment in the South American country.

The left forces belonging to or supporting the ruling Unidad Popular (UP) coalition were more successful than they had predicted. However, the united right, which now claims victory on the basis of having achieved a majority in a non-existent plebiscite, lost ground and will have fewer senators and deputies in parliament.

UP took over the government in 1970 with just 36.2 percent of the vote. This time, they obtained over 43 percent, while their senate caucus rose from 16 to 19 and in the lower house from 56 to 63. These figures are considered historical by the government because no other administration has ever increased its electoral percentage in a mid-term election.

The right obtained about 55 percent of the vote, a considerable drop from 1970 when its forces were split. Then, the presidential candidates of the Christian Democratic and National Parties totalled a vote of 62.7 percent.

The obstructionist right-wing caucus fell from 93 to 87 in the Chamber of Deputies and from 16 to 14 in the Senate while their primary campaign dream of obtaining a two-thirds majority in order to impeach president Salvador Allende met with resounding failure.

An air of pessimism surrounds the right now. Inside the "Confederación de la Democracia" (CODE), the strategists are shuffling figures and feelings, with the differences within, and between the Christian Democrats and the National Party sharper than ever.

One of the first CODE conclusions is that the electorate did away with their allies of the left Radical Party (PIR), which arose from a right-wing split in the Radical Party, began life inside Unidad Popular and subsequently duked under the reactionary tent, and small ultra-right grouping known as Democracia Radical. PIR used to have nine deputies and now has one, while the DR has four and now has two.

The Christian Democratic daily "La Prensa" reflects these elements: "True enough, the hopes of the extreme optimists didn't come true. Their main idea was to come up overnight with a majority strong enough to overthrow the Government whenever they saw fit."

Now everything indicates the right will head straight for a coup d'état, predicts the pro-Government daily "Puro Chile". With a greater subtlety it can be predicted the CDP will be unable to disguise its growing rightwardness for the simple reason that former president Eduardo Frei, who in the recent elections confirmed his role as top opposition leader, will not give up his post.

As for NP leader Sergio Onofre Jarpa; he is the only defeated opposition leader, but can be expected to bing support for Frei on acceptance by the latter of his own coup-making strategy.

The lingering phantom of the October 1972 lockout movement, which, according to Interior Minister General Carlos Prats, brought the country close to civil war, is taking on flesh in the post-election picture.

The newly elected senator Frei will conduct a hard offensive against the Government in the legislature with two alternatives going: institutional, with an eye to the 1976 presidential elections and coup-making, if circumstances and/or the CDP's allies prove to be ripe.

On the left, the victory heralds both realignments and a continuation of the pre-election discussions on the way to conduct an advance of the revolutionary process.

In general all the left forces now proclaim that the results of the mid-terms provide more favorable conditions for advance and for a strengthening of left unity.

An analysis of the results shows the left vote was eminently working class with substantial increases in peasant support and in the traditionally rightist women's vote. But this solid backing also led the Socialist Party, which doubled its members in the lower house from 14 to 28 and elected all their upper house hopefuls, to say the Chilean people have won another battle but not the war.

The reiterated failures of the enemy stated, the SP political commission, make them commit actions of any kind in their attempts to recover their privileges.

The Communist Party, whose main candidate Colodia Teitelboim obtained the second highest national total reflects the same state of alert and claims the UP program now enjoys the popular backing of more than 43 percent of the Chileans.

It added the popular movement does not fear dialogue, from which the people gain while their enemies are the ones that lose.

In the midst of these formulations, the country's economic situation and the government's solutions will now come to the fore. Here too there will be a reflection either of a unified left attitude or of the tactical differences expressed before election day.

Blues 3-2 win marks fifth straight

By PETER DUX

Varsity hockey Blues won the CIAU championship Saturday afternoon by defeating St. Mary's Huskies 3-2 before a sellout Varsity Arena crowd of 4,719. This was Blues fifth straight CIAU victory and seventh in the past eight years.

The game was hard fought and Huskies certainly had no reason to be ashamed as they suffered their fourth consecutive loss to the Blues in a championship game. A number of St. Mary's players were in fine form — most notable was veteran goaltender Chuck Goddard who turned back 35 Toronto shots in an often brilliant performance.

Several Blues had an exceptional game, including goalie Gary Inness, Don Pagnutti, Mike Keenan and Gord Davies. Davies was awarded the game's MVP trophy — a fitting tribute to Blues' retiring captain who also scored the winning goal. Coach Tom Watt was pleased that Davies' strong work was finally recognized.

"He's the hockey player's hockey player," Watt said later, "not great at any one thing but an all-around player."

Blues opened the scoring after five minutes of the first period when Nick Holmes banged in Keenan's rebound with a good second effort around the crease.

Blues second goal came late in the opening period on a well-executed two-on-one breakaway as Kent Ruhnke took a Pagnutti pass and flipped the puck just inside the post on Goddard's stick side.

Huskies played right with Toronto all through the period and only Inness' fine work blanked them. Referee Jim Lever kept the game from getting out of hand by strictly enforcing the rules as both teams dealt out a series of stiff checks.

Mike Keenan (5) covers up in the crease while goalie Gary Inness is temporarily out of play.

St. Mary's showed the Blues they could play a good forechecking game in the first half of the second period and put a good deal of pressure on Toronto.

At the three-minute mark Huskies were stymied on a two-on-one break when Inness made the initial stop and rightwinger Mike Quinn hit the post on the rebound. However, their perseverance paid off at 11:03 when Varsity lost the puck in its own end and it slid to Dwight Lewis who was all alone in the slot.

He drew Inness' attention and then passed to an uncovered Doug Abbass who whisked it past Inness from the left side.

Blues stormed back after the goal and soon broke out of the Huskies' forechecking shell.

The winning goal came when Munro blocked a shot at The Varsity blueline and passed ahead to Holmes who carried the puck into the St. Mary's corner, then passed from behind the net to Davies who scored from the slot.

The third period saw Blues keep the puck in the Huskies end by ferocious checking. They peppered Goddard with 17 shots and didn't ease up for a moment. It was a surprise to see Blues take complete control against the Huskies because the latter are reputed to be the only team that can skate with the Blues for a full 60 minutes.

Coach Bob Boucher yanked Goddard in the final 30 seconds and it paid off in a goal by defenceman Gerald Gibbons, but alas it was only two seconds before the end of the game and Blues emerged the victors.

Blues Notes... several vacancies will exist on The Varsity roster next year as definitely not returning are goaltenders Inness and Bruce Dur-no, Keenan, centers Munro and Pagnutti, plus wingers Davies and Doug Tate... Blues whooped it up after the game with champagne and dunked Watt and manager Rodger Wright into the showers... stats man Graham Francis' new toupee was thrown into the bubbly by the exuberant players... Neil Korzack will play the rest of the year with Peterborough Petes in the OHA junior league... among the fans were Loyola coach Paul Arsenaull, players from Sir George Williams, a lively contingent of St. Mary's fans, and NHL scouts such as Claude Ruel and Ranger coach Emile Francis... Munro and defenceman Warren Anderson were selected to the All-Canadian team by the Canadian Hockey Coaches Association while Boucher was named Coach of the Year.

Irish, Jocks win

By PAUL CARSON

The Irish and the jocks will share the Jennings Cup as a result of the interfac hockey playoffs that featured a record 46 teams in post-season action.

St. Mike's A took Division I honors last Friday by ousting defending champions Victoria in two straight games, 3-1 and 5-1.

John Rodgers, Joe Brady, Paul Noble, Mike Spudoni and Pat Kahnert provided the goals in the deciding game while SMC's apparent weakness in goal disappeared as Bob Werbicki and Pete Schmarr allowed Vic one goal in each game.

Varsity Blues center Don Pagnutti coached St. Mike's to its first Jennings Cup victory since 1970.

"I didn't really have to do very much, since once our players saw those nifty jackets the football team got for winning the Mulock, that was all the motivation they needed," Pagnutti said after the game.

PHE B finally captured the elongated Division II final Monday night by edging Law II 3-2 in the third game of a close series that saw the two earlier games end in ties.

Mark Ackley collected two goals for PHE and Dave McGuey added one while Kemm Yates and Jack Armstrong scored for Law.

Playoffs in the intermediate league are still underway as Meds E gained the semi-finals by defeating Vic IV 5-1 and in the only other result available at press time yesterday PHE C beat Meds B 3-1.

Law leads in basketball

Law, the betting favourite in this year's interfaculty basketball playoffs, took a giant step toward claiming their second championship in as many years defeating Meds 60-55. The second game of the series will be played tonight at 7 pm with the third game, if necessary, Thursday at 7.

Meds came out flying in the first seven minutes of the game and completely dominated play. However, as all pundits know, you have to beat another team on the scoreboard or all your statistical edges are unimportant. The score after seven minutes of play was 8-5 in favour of Law.

Law is essentially an opportunistic team. They had only four "good" shots in the first seven minutes. However, they made them all.

Meanwhile, Meds were not converting their possible baskets. In addition, Meds were getting a large amount of foul shots in the same time interval, yet they managed to hit only two out of 10 from the foul line.

Law lead 27-21 at halftime and slowly began to pill away from Meds in the second half until, with approximately nine minutes to go in the game, Coach Kleberg and Meds succumbed to the inevitable and told his troops to start pressing Law all over the floor. The Meds rally closed the gap to three at one point. However, whenever Law needed a basket, they got it.

The unsung heroes of this game (and for many other games this season) for Law were John Hunter and Gerry Saltzman with their rebounding. While team-mates Rich Pirie, Jamie Halfnight, and Al

Sternberg carry the scoring load for Law, the aforementioned two are assigned to task of getting the ball off the board.

Scoring in double figures for Law in this game were John Hunter (13 points), Rich Pirie (12) and Jamie Halfnight (12). Noticeably absent from this list is Al Sternberg, who scored only eight points. However, he was closely guarded by his brother Ron Sternberg (who plays for Meds) who quipped following the game that "Guarding Al at Hart House was almost like guarding him in our own basement at home. The only difference is that he can't deke behind the pingpong table to get away from me at Hart House."

Double figure scorers for Meds included Bobby Lewis (16 points), the fast closing Joel Hibloom (10), and Lindsay Horenblas (10).

Scott proposes radical sports ethic

By JACK SCOTT

The dominant North American sport ethic is best captured in Vince Lombardi's famous remark that "winning isn't everything, it's the only thing." If this ethic only ruled the relatively small realm of professional athletics, it might be of no serious concern. But as we all know, it is the Lombardies, Tom Landrys, and Punch Imlach who are the high priests of the North American athletic world.

The Lombardian ethic is the rule of the day from the professional ranks down to the colleges, high schools, junior high schools, and even the "little leagues".

Though we often hear many pious and hypocritical utterances to the contrary, Lombardi's comment that "you have to have that fire in you to play this game, and there is nothing that stokes the fire like hate" reflects how followers of the Lombardian ethic view their opponents. In American sport, the opponent is the enemy — an obstacle in the way of victory.

The Lombardian or North American ethic, as I see it, is a product-oriented system that has turned out an excellent spectator product as a result of the sacrifices and hard work of many dedicated men. One of the ways this excellence has been developed has been by believing winning isn't everything, it's the only thing. Not too surprisingly, the opponent at best is viewed as an obstacle, at worst an enemy, that must be overcome in order to achieve victory. Almost needless to say, this entire struggle takes place in a rigidly authoritarian structure.

Counter-culture ethic — "antithesis"

Though it was around a long time before the birth of the counter-culture, a saying that sums up this ethic is one I'm sure you're all familiar with — "it's not whether you win or lose, but how you play the game that counts."

Being the antithesis, the counter-culture ethic takes every value of the Lombardian ethic and proposes the exact opposite value as its position. Cooperation replaces competition, and emphasis on the process replaces an emphasis on the product, sport as a co-educational activity replaces sport as a stag party, a concern for enjoyment replaces a concern for excellence, and an opportunity for spontaneity and self-expression replaces authoritarianism.

Being basically apolitical and lacking any radical analysis, the counter-culture sees no distinction between essences and forms. Out of frustration and anger with the cultural manifestation of sport in North American society, the counter-culture strikes out at sport itself. The counter-culture has performed an invaluable service by highlighting the abuses of the American system, but its alternative has been rejected by the overwhelming majority of American people. It has been rejected quite correctly, I think, for it does not offer a sound, rational, humane and viable alternative.

Sport cannot exist separate from the reality of society. Sport, like all other institutional activities will reflect and in turn help to reinforce dominant values. If the dominant values of a society are alienating and destructive, then any major institutional activity in that society will reflect these values regardless of how pure and intrinsically valuable the essence of that activity may be. Not understanding this relationship, the counter-culture looked at the institutional manifestation of sport in American society, saw its dehumanizing nature, and concluded that something was wrong with sport itself. The mistake was to not distinguish between the essence of sport and its institutional manifestation.

will have equal access to the competitive sport experience. There are no sound psychological or physiological reasons why the competitive sport experience should be denied to women.

Though not against co-educational sport activity on a recreational basis, the radical ethic does not see allowing women to compete against men as a means for providing women with equal opportunity. Because of size and strength limitations, only an extraordinary woman athlete will be able to compete against an average male athlete in most sports.

tion of your brother — your opponent.

The radical athlete has an intense desire to achieve excellence and victory, but he just as intensely wants to seek out and experience the agonistic struggle. The champion radical athlete, rather than attempting to maximize his chances for maintaining the victor's throne, will share his knowledge and skill with lesser athletes in the hope that they will rise to his level. Since victory isn't the only thing for the radical athlete, he takes little pride or satisfaction in a victory easily won over a less-skilled or weaker opponent. His victory comes

Jack Scott proposes a radical ethic of sport that would turn sport into pleasure but maintain the essential competitive spirit of the activity.

Radical ethic — "synthesis"

The radical ethic of sport says there is nothing fundamentally wrong with the essence of competitive sport. It says that the agonistic struggle in sport of team with team, man with man, man with himself, or man with nature, is a healthy, intrinsically valuable human activity. It does not view sport as either solely a competitive or solely a cooperative venture.

As many fine physical educators have tried to point out in the past, there is a vital interplay between competition and cooperation in healthy sport activity. Competitive sport is in trouble when this balance is lost either in the direction it is today on the side of competition or in the direction the counter-culture would have it go on the side of cooperation.

Rather than replace the Lombardian emphasis on the product with the counter-culture's emphasis on the process, the radical ethic refuses to view human experience in such a fragmented manner. The radical ethic recognizes the excellence of the outcome as important, but equally important is how the excellence is achieved.

In fact, since it has a deep underlying faith in man, the radical ethic believes the sport experience will be ven richer than it is under the Lombardian ethic when a humanistic process — a process that will allow and encourage man to develop his full potential — replaces the present dehumanizing system.

The radical ethic assumes women

Consequently, rather than sound the drum for co-educational activities as a panacea, the radical ethic says that women who want to have the competitive sport experience should be provided with the same economic and institutional support that men receive.

The radical ethic views the athlete as an artist who is struggling to express himself, but like the followers of the Lombardian ethic, radical proponents understand the need for dedication and hard work. No matter how esthetic a setting may be, a counter-culture long distance runner will not have a peak experience during a long distance run if his physiological conditioning is such that he has a gut ache and cramps after the first mile.

The radical ethic sees nothing wrong with team sports as long as the team spirit stems from a genuine development of community rather than from authoritarian intimidation. Sharing and cooperating with others in a healthy team setting makes one more human rather than less. Under the radical ethic, team spirit would flow from a genuine concern for one's team-mates rather than from a superficial and imposed conformity of blue blazers and crew-cuts.

But perhaps the most fundamental aspect of the radical ethic of sport is reflected in how one sees his opponent. The opponent is not simply an obstacle in the way of victory; he is not simply an instrument to be used for one's own glory. In a very real sense, the opponent is a brother who is presenting you with a challenge. You cannot experience the agonistic struggle of sport without the cooperawhen he struggles courageously in the face of a real challenge.

Since the degree of alienation would be minimized under a system of radical athletics, the sporting contest would be guided by a general ethic of sportsmanship, and specific rules and regulations would be kept to a minimum. Rather than denigrate the many accomplishments of those who have been guided by the Lombardian ethic or the counter-culture, the radical ethic attempts to build a system based on the achievements of these two systems while avoiding their abuses and excesses. The radical ethic understands its indebtedness to men like Knute Rockne and Vince Lombardi for what these men accomplished, but it does not see them as representing the apotheosis of the sport experience. The radical ethic in sport has a commitment to excellence integrated with a desire to achieve that excellence by a process that will humanize rather than dehumanize man.

Anyone who would attempt to implement the radical ethic on any significant scale in the North American athletic world today will discover just how radical and revolutionary these ideas are! The fact, though, that a rational, humane ethic must be classified as radical or revolutionary should tell something about the nature of contemporary North American society.

Jack Scott is chairman of Physical Education and Director of Athletics at Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio. This article was adapted from a speech he made in March 1972.

VOL. 93, No. 63
WED., MARCH 28, 1973 TORONTO

Finally, we arrive at the question of the so-called nonpolitical man...

if an industrialist champions a rightist party, this is easily understood in terms of his immediate economic interests. In his case a leftist orientation would be at variance with his social situation and would, for that reason, point to irrational motives. If an industrial worker has a leftist orientation, this too is by all means rationally consistent - it derives from his economic and social position in industry. If, however, a worker, an employee, or an official has a rightist orientation, this must be ascribed to a lack of political clarity, i.e., he is ignorant of his social position. The more a man who belongs to the broad working masses is nonpolitical, the more susceptible he is to the ideology of political reaction. To be nonpolitical is not, as one might suppose, evidence of a passive psychic condition, but of a highly active attitude, a defense against the awareness of social responsibility. The analysis of this defense against consciousness of one's social responsibility yields clear insights into a number of dark questions concerning the behaviour of the broad non-political strata. In the case of the average intellectual "who wants nothing to do with politics," it can easily be shown that immediate economic interests and fears related to his social position, which is dependent upon social opinion, lie at the basis of his noninvolvement. These fears cause him to make the most grotesque sacrifices with respect to his knowledge and convictions. Those people who are engaged in the productive process in one way or another and are nonetheless socially irresponsible can be divided into two major groups. In the case of the one group the concept of politics is unconsciously associated with the idea of violence and physical danger, i.e., with an intense fear, which prevents them from facing life realistically. In the case of the other group, which undoubtedly constitutes the majority, social irresponsibility is based on personal conflicts and anxieties, of which the sexual anxiety is the predominant one.

Greasy spoons in an imperial campus chain

Low-quality food has long been one of students' major complaints about the campus environment.

At Memorial University in St. John's, Newfoundland, more than 200 students were stricken with salmonella poisoning last December after eating cream puffs in a residence dining hall. At McGill, a dismissed cafeteria worker recently wrote to the student newspaper describing how the chef dropped a shed some light on the corporate entities responsible for the food situation on many Canadian campuses.

Versafoods into everything

Perhaps the best known catering company is Versafoods Services Limited. Versafoods is the company linked to the food poisoning incident at Memorial; it has a monopoly food service contract there. Other campuses with Versafoods contracts include York University and Laurentian University.

Versafoods is controlled by ARA of $716,128,000 and profits of $21,979,000.

ARA's prime corporate activity appears to be buying up smaller firms engaged in similar or related activities. In 1966, it purchased eight food catering and vending machine outlets in every corner of the United States. In 1967, the year it bought control of Versafoods, ARA purchased seven food service firms, one real estate company, and one management consultant firm. In 1968, ARA bought more than 30 food service and vending machine outlets, along with Nacional Hotelera, a Mexico City hotel and restaurant chain, to supervise the kitchens at the October Olympic Games.

Besides its massive stock of vending machines and related equipment, ARA owns a fleet of trucks, and through its subsidiaries owns and leases distribution centres throughout the U.S. and Puerto Rico.

Versafoods Services was incorporated in Canada on June 15, 1961 under the name Vendomatic Services Limited. Chief mover behind the firm was Allan D. Baker, who was already in the vending machine and food service business as president of Baker Vending Services, Nation-Wide Food Services, and Vendomatic Limited.

Baker merged these companies with Industrial Food Services, a division of Canadian Food Products Limited, (a distributor of processed food to institutional kitchens) to form Vendomatic. The "Versafoods" label was adopted in 1964. Last July 12, the name was officially changed to VS Services Limited.

In February 1969, Versafoods acquired a 50 per cent interest in Versair In-Flight Services Limited of Kingston, Jamaica. Perhaps more significantly, it bought a 70 per cent interest in a West German firm which processes frozen prepared meals. Thus, Versafoods, to that point principally a distributor, branched into the processing level of the food service business, following the tried-and-true principle of vertical integration.

Versafoods also wholly owns Jiffy Foods Limited, and holds a 50 per cent interest in Versa-Service Limited of London, England.

In 1971, Versafoods reported a profit of $1,156,000 on sales of more than $72 million. The profit figure represented a 500 per cent increase over the previous year.

(The University of New Brunswick recently signed a new contract with Saga, after being forced to agree to a reduction in the number of meals per week to avoid a price hike.) Saga is well established on such campuses as Carleton University, Bishop's University and Brock University.

Reliable sources indicate that Saga is deliberately underpricing its bids for food service contracts to establish its foothold in the Canadian university market. The company's fastest campus growth has been in the Atlantic provinces where it has been undercutting its competitors in open tendering. The competitors expect Saga's prices to rise once it has established some degree of market control.

Saga is 100 per cent owned by Saga Administrative Corporation of Menlo Park, California. Separate balance sheets are not provided for its Canadian operation. Its business here appears to be a minuscule affair after one examines Saga's list of subsidiaries.

Moody's Industrial Manual lists them this way: Saga Dining Halls Incorporated, Saga Food Services of Alabama, Arizona, California, Canada, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii... plus 37 more states and Puerto Rico.

The Saga Administrative Corporation was incorporated in New York in 1957 as a successor to a partnership formed in 1948. In July 1969, it acquired Straw Hat Restaurant Incorporated of San Leandro, California, and Pizza Specialty Corporation of Terrence, California. The same year, it established a joint venture with

The only major institutional caterer serving the U of T campus is Beaver Foods. It runs the New and Trinity food services. The prices at both spots are lower than the average dining spot.

University College offers two different food services, with catering from Canada Caterers, and a college-run service in the residences.

The UC Literary and Athletic Society operates a small snack bar which usually breaks even. This year, however, it was showing a "$200 profit as of Christmas", said former UC SAC rep Marty Stollar.

SAC services commissioner-elect Seymour Kanowitch commented on the quality of food at UC, "It's edible."

St. Mike's and Victoria's food services are run by the administration. Vic's, although inexpensive, has received some criticism about its quality. SAC communications commissioner and VUSAC vice-president Debra Lewis commented "It's cheap", but mentioned the "adverse criticism" about the food.

First year music technology student, John LeBerg, who was in Wymilwood, the Vic cafeteria, said he just drinks coffee there. "The food looks awful, institutional, and dreadful," he commented. However, LeBerg suggested the service was good.

The only completely student-run food service is at Innis College. The Innis College Student Society picks up the annual $500 tab the college snack bar loses.

"The Innis food is quite reasonable," according to part-time student Will Krichner. "I eat here quite regularly."

Snack bar manager Steve Easterbrook, a third year Innis student, said that it was hard to compete "with the rising prices". Easterbrook, who occasionally works in the snack bar, said, "We have a woman who we hire for eight hours a day, and students who work from four to eight in the evening. It gets really hectic around lunch, and really slow around dinner. But, we have to keep the snack bar open in the evenings for part-time students."

Two months ago, SAC, under services commissioner Chuck Vickery, distributed questionnaires at the various campus food outlets. Although many replies have been submitted, the forms are just sitting on Vickery's desk, without being processed.

An alternate service to the college eating areas are the catering trucks. With names such as Humpty Dumpty, Taste Freeze, and Meals on Wheels, the trucks do a phenomenal business along St. George Street.

One "chef" who refused to give his name when interviewed wouldn't discuss the mark-up on his goods.

Stack decisions come later

By ERIC MILLS

Controversial decisions on stack access in the new Robarts Library, and on amalgamation of smaller libraries to create a duplicate collection, will be made after most students have left the campus.

The Governing Council's Library Subcommittee, set up last September to deal with these and other library matters, has yet to report to the Academic Affairs Committee, where a vigorous debate is likely to ensue. The earliest its report can go to the Governing Council, subcommittee chairman Milton Israel says, is for the council's May meeting.

And, the history professor is not optimistic that Academic Affairs will be able to deal with the report quickly. Important decisions on discipline, the Department of Extension and the Faculty of Food Sciences will have to be made first.

As well, he said, "It isn't conceivable (that the committee can) discuss all the recommendations in a couple of weeks." He noted the complexity of the subcommittee's jurisdiction, and observed that initial decisions on the research library "will affect the university for years."

In any case, the Library Subcommittee may not be able to conclude its deliberations at its next meeting, April 4.

Discussion of the proposed amalgamation of New and University Colleges' libraries into a duplicate collection at the Sigmund Samuel Library did not get underway at last Wednesday's meeting. The sub-committee may have to wait until later in April to consider the UC Laidlaw Library, as the college has not yet resolved its own opinion on the future of its library.

New College principal Donald Ivey has already appeared before the sub-committee to argue against the disappearance of his college's library, setting the stage for contentious debate when the question comes up.

Merging the political economy and history departmental libraries into the duplicate collection has already been recommended.

The subcommittee is also awaiting a report from its own working group on conservation of library resources, and last week barely began a discussion of the relationship of satellite libraries to the main system.

The meeting, in fact, did little other than to reaffirm an earlier decision to amalgamate the extension library into the duplicate collection, and to agree with a year-old Senate decision on lending regulations.

The subcommittee agreed with the Senate that all readers in the Robarts and Sigmund Samuel Libraries should be allowed equal loan periods, instead of the present widely differentiating terms favouring faculty members and graduate students.

Chief librarian Robert Blackburn, who as recently as the subcommittee's previous meeting opposed equal access to the Robarts Library stacks, said he would accept longer loans for faculty and graduate students, but regrettably conceded, "at the moment, this seems out of style".

The subcommittee has already decided to recommend equal stack access to Robarts, substantially meeting a demand of last spring's Simcoe Hall occupation.

In correcting minutes describing this decision, political economy professor Sanford Lakoff decried "the failure of this committee to restructure stack access on the basis of need", as instructed by the Senate. "There will come a time when this ill-advised decision will be reviewed," he warned.

The subcommittee found that requiring passes would naturally restrict stack access to those in need; any artificial differentiation would be impractical and unnecessary.

Under the Senate regulations, library users will be able to borrow monographs for up to two weeks, with no renewals; serials will be available for use only in the library. Special arrangements may be made for Scarborough and Erindale Colleges, and for doctors at off-campus U of T teaching hospitals.

Lakoff served warning that he wants the committee to look into the feasibility of forcing faculty, departmental and college libraries to amalgamate with the central library, even if they are independently funded by the body they are attached to, rather than the library system.

He described as "sleight of hand" any argument that such libraries were beyond the jurisdiction of the sub-committee; just as funding for the political economy and history libraries will revert to the central library, he argued, so could resources now used to maintain libraries by bodies outside the library but funded by the university return to the system.

"I would not suggest we have a 'Quebec problem' at Scarborough (which is growing increasingly independent of the St. George campus), but we do have a separatist problem," he said.

Robarts open late

The Robarts Library won't be open until at least August, according to vice-provost Peter Meincke.

The $42 million complex was originally expected to be in operation last fall. However construction slowdowns, particularly the recent elevator maintenance workers' strike, postponed the opening date.

Meincke last week described as "optimistic" vice-president Don Forster's estimate several months ago that the library could open less than five months after the elevator workers were back on the job.

The vice-provost said U of T is low on the priority lists of elevator companies, which started operating last week after the provincial government introduced a bill ordering strikers back to work.

Day care refused operating licence

The Varsity—Chris Newell

Campus day care centre has once again come under attack.

By PAT REDICAN

The Campus Cooperative day care centre on Sussex Street has been refused a licence by the Day Nurseries Board, mainly because it refuses to hire certified personnel.

Although the parents haven't decided how, they definitely will appeal the refusal, which could mean the end of a four year old experiment in parent and worker control of day care.

According to Jude Angioia, a co-ordinator at the centre, the parents who control the centre believe that they should have the right to hire people whom they feel are qualified.

"We want to be able to choose people who have experience, who we feel are good, rather than on the basis of a piece of paper."

The Day Nurseries Act requires that at least one person at the centre be a certified graduate of the Day Nurseries or Child Care courses offered at technical colleges, community colleges, or universities. At present, none of the hired co-ordinators at Sussex St. are qualified under these regulations, according to Angioia. They are all experienced with children, however.

Several other grounds for refusal were also given, mostly involving fire and safety regulations. According to Angioia these were largely false accusations. "On the day the people from the board came to inspect there was no-one upstairs with the sleeping children; according to the regulations there must be at least one person there at all times; usually there is," Angioia said.

Most of the breaches were of this nature, she added. "All of these have been or can be easily corrected; this was not the main ground for refusing us the licence."

There were also some grounds for refusal which Angioia termed "purely bureaucratic." For instance, according to the act, crawlers and walkers must be kept in separate rooms. "Here we keep them together," said Angioia. "I don't know why they should be separated."

The centre appealed an original decision against them before the Day Nurseries Appeal Board, but lost. The co-op has three possible courses of action: they can re-apply for a licence; they can comply with all the rules and then re-apply; or they can appeal to a district court of appeals on the grounds of a mistrial in the Day Nurseries hearing.

However, no definite tack has been decided upon. Angioia was hopeful about getting the licence in the long run. "It will be a long, draw-out hassle; but we'll probably get it eventually," she said.

However, "licence or no licence, we'll go on as long as we can; after all, we're operating for three years without a licence."

Miglin and Helliwell play musical chairs for money

Retiring SAC president Eric Miglin has quit his $115-a-week job one month early — to take a higher paying job.

Miglin is not retiring as SAC president immediately, however; he will continue to work some evenings, while vice-president John Helliwell moves up to take the full-time job.

Coincidentally, Helliwell's own salary ran out a week ago last Friday, and he originally hoped to take over from Miglin a week ago Monday.

Miglin, however, found that his $160 a week construction job, which goes up to $250 at the end of April, couldn't begin until two days ago. Helliwell, who has recently bought a car, had to rest content for a week.

Miglin admitted Sunday night that his switch into a "non-thinking, apolitical job" was for "mainly financial" reasons, to prepare for his stay at Harvard University next year.

The outgoing president already has a $5,000 scholarship lined up at the prestigious university's business school, and has worked at the SAC pub, but says the $2,400 tuition at Harvard and the extremely high cost-of-living in Boston means he needs to save money in order to survive the year.

"There's not that much left to do", in any case, he said, adding that he had discussed the move with many people, including president-elect Bob Anderson, although the executive was never officially informed.

Helliwell said at Monday night's council meeting that he intends to work on constitutional amendments, changes in SAC meeting procedure, "general tidying up and housekeeping", and simply to be available to help incoming executives and constituency reps.

The threatened collapse of the Association of Student Councils (see elsewhere in this paper) is absorbing the active vice-president's energies this week. In fact, Helliwell came down from Ottawa where he is lobbying the federal government for a few hours to attend the annual joint meeting. Coincidentally, Helliwell is reported to be angling for a job with AOSC this summer.

Miglin, who also considerably lessened his activities towards the end of his vice-presidential term two years ago, made a pessimistic speech Monday night about this year's council.

"SAC kept its profile too low," he said "We tried to make SAC less political and talk down less to students, but it didn't work."

"Sometimes we had to be prodded into action more than we should have".

The running mate of Helliwell and Ross Flowers in a ticket elected on a program of communications and services. Miglin admitted, "we didn't communicate with (the students)."

Although U of T SAC got the best turnout of any campus in the October fees strike referendum, and three-quarters approval for the strike, Miglin said the militancy of SAC's position then was not adequately reconciled with council's refusal to participate in a demonstration in November.

It wasn't wrong to oppose the demonstration, he said, but SAC failed to communicate effectively to students why it went against it.

But "in the area of services, we made real and valuable inroads," he added. This year's council set up SAC pub and an information service, but the pub lost money and the service was so little used that it was disbanded.

Government is silent on freeze

Province holds up U of T building funds

By PAUL McGRATH

University of Toronto administrators are ready to spend money on building and renovations needed for University College, the Wallberg Building and Innis College, but the provincial government has been slow to respond to an application made by the university in December for funds to initiate the work.

The freeze on capital building allocations imposed by the government in November has slowed down the university's building program and necessitated the application for special grants, which has been answered with almost total silence by the Ontario government.

U of T planning and resources vice-president Jack Sword says the administration is waiting for the new provincial budget, to be tabled on April 12, for any hopeful signs of a softening of government policy to university building.

At present the university is using operating capital for continuation of projects that would be aided by approval of the grant, capital that would go to the building of men's athletic facilities and the Innis academic building.

Capital appropriations from operating funds totalling $105,000 have been made for renovations to the Wallberg Building. The administration has also allocated $22,500 for architect's and other fees for the new Innis building and other expenses, and requested an extra $650,000 to be added on to an already approved $5,271,580 for the continuance of the construction work required on the Scarborough campus.

The university's Business Affairs Committee decided February 28 that, until approval of funding for this project has been received, business affairs vice-president Alex Rankin may allocate up to $269,495 from operating revenue, "should MCU (Ministry of College and Universities) approval not be received."

The university is gambling with money slated to go to the Men's Athletic Building and Innis College, and response from the government has been virtually non-existent.

"All we know is that they've said we can go ahead with all existing projects," said Kiel Gregory, administrative assistant to Vice-president Don Forster.

This was echoed by government sources.

"We know that all projects to which they (the university) committed themselves in the last fiscal year will receive enough to be completed," said Stan Orlowski, in charge of the Capital Support Branch of the Ministry of Colleges and Universities. "If the contract was signed, and the university or college committed, we (the branch) are hoping to get 100 per cent of the money."

Projects already started that this applies to are the Robarts Library, the student services building (Phase IIa) of the Scarborough College project and laboratory completion on the Erindale campus.

Gregory complained that the government's capital budget freeze announcement was open to interpretation, but that the government had given little help in clearing up its vagaries.

In fact, Sword commented recently that the government had not even acknowledged the university's request for special grants.

However, colleges and universities minister Jack McNie has been reported as saying the freeze would be lifted for "very worthwhile and badly needed projects." McNie was unavailable for comment yesterday and Monday.

The St. George Campus Land Use Plan, the university's document outlining future growth, states that because of the reductions in capital support, the university has "reassessed its plans for the consolidation of lands in the north-west quadrant of the campus."

The plan, revised after the government announcement, says that the graduate student complex planned for the east side of St. George Street south of Bloor Street "will be long-delayed." This complex will house the School of Graduate Studies offices, the Graduate Students Union offices and a residence for single graduate students.

The report also states that the Men's Athletic Building, needed to relieve cramped conditions in Hart House, will be constructed "hopefully commencing in 1974."

These two developments are only part of the university's five-year program for capital appropriations.

Demolition of a large number of houses will be required for the development of two future sites, although other sites now vacant will not be used for several years.

One site, on Washington Avenue between Spadina and Huron, will be used for expansion of the Faculty of Education, although there is no mention of the possible starting date for the project.

Development of the other site, which will necessitate demolition of houses on Sussex Avenue, Glen Morris and Huron Streets, will make way for an athletic field, even though vacant sites possibly suitable for the same function, exist on campus. These sites, including the lot on St. George opposite the Robarts Library are being used as parking lots, and the report notes that there development "is not imminent."

The university is waiting for the April 12 budget, which may bring word on the renovation grants. The throne speech delivered in the provincial legislature last Wednesday promises "to make funds available for the restoration and maintenance" of "selected" historic buildings and sites. This may apply to University College, which has been declared an historical building by the federal government.

Orlowski also told The Varsity that his branch is working on a report on emergencies in building on Ontario campuses. The branch's first priority will be to deal with clear cases of inability, such as George Brown College, to accommodate students, said Orlowski. The next priorities will be inadequate accommodation, and then accommodation "that would be nice to have."

The U of T administration wants to spend money for renovating University College, but the Ontario government has frozen building funds.

Meeting produces no results on Salaff appeal

By JOHN CAMPBELL

A meeting last Thursday between math professor David Salaff, math chairman George Duff and arts and science dean Bob Greene failed to produce any concrete results in Salaff's appeal for his contract renewal.

The meeting was held after Salaff submitted a formal statement to Greene charging that, "as a result of the hostile, antagonistic attitude toward me (in the math department) as of November, no question concerning my employment... was capable of objective consideration by officials in the department."

Salaff said his effort to move the group toward a discussion of the open staff-student parity jury he wants to review his case was blocked by Greene.

"I want students to see and bear the exploration of my case," Salaff said, "to see how principles, in my opinion, have been pushed aside." He said he was referring to the principle of student participation in the conduct of classes.

In his letter to Greene Salaff outlined three occasions when he supported students in disputes with the math department over marking schemes and course content.

Greene described the meeting as being one of a "exploratory nature", adding, "Quite frankly, I haven't been as concerned about the make-up of the review committee as I have been about the nature of the grievances (of Salaff) and the circumstances around them."

Greene said he has received recommendations from faculty members about the possible structure of an open committee, all of which have involved "a bearing the constitution of which and membership of which would be agreeable to both Salaff and Duff".

Math professors Michael Mather and David Spring, both appealing decisions denying them tenure last spring, found a meeting yesterday with U of T president John Evans similarly disappointing.

Mather said, "we still do not know what mechanism will be used to make the decision (on their appeals)".

He said the pair pressed Evans for more information to make their appeals.

For example, Mather said, he wants to know "how an outside referee made his opinion and report on my teaching. How long did he spend reading and considering my research before making his report?"

Part of Mather's appeal rests on his complaint that American research institute worker Peter Hilton did not consult enough people within the math department before submitting an unfavorable report on Mather's teaching ability to the tenure committee.

Mather said that Evans informed both him and Spring that a decision on what future steps would be taken on their appeals would not be ready for "three or four weeks".

Evans was not available for comment after yesterday's meeting.

Math governing kept secret; Duff thinks he'll take advice

By ELAINE KAHN

Math chairman George Duff said Monday that he "guessed" that he would implement a service course committee recommendation made two weeks ago to put more emphasis on term work in some first year courses.

The parity service course committee was set up in response to the math occupation, at which time students were demanding improvement in math course quality and greater student representation on all departmental decision-making bodies, including those dealing with hiring, firing and tenure.

Although the committee was limited to making recommendations for correcting academic and administrative problems in the first year courses, students received assurances from committee chairman Nick Derzko that these recommendations would normally be accepted.

The Governance and Structure committee, set up to investigate the structure of the math department, has met once in camera. The committee has agreed to withhold disclosure of its activities, which are still in the procedural stage, until the math department has been informed about them, said professor Stewart Smith, a committee member, Monday.

Committee chairman Paul Rooney told The Varsity, "Quite a good deal happened (at the meeting) but I'm not going to tell you about it."

The all-faculty committee, also established because of the occupation, has sent questionnaires to math faculty members asking if students should be seated on the committee.

Smith said that "answers (to the questionnaire) are coming in, but are not complete".

He added "the committee wants full student input on this committee before students leave" for the summer.

At its weekly Wednesday meeting the service course committee considered a motion to attach tutors to certain lecture sections.

The motion addresses itself to one in a long list of complaints students have about tutors which include: the failure of tutors to attend their students' classes, discrepancies between tutors' marking, and the inability of some tutors to speak English.

An amendment to the motion to disallow transfer from one tutorial section to another was defeated.

Derzko said this motion will be the first order of business at the committee's meeting to-day.

Day Care occupation year old

Campus Co-op may get respite and new Innis home

By PAT REDICAN

Campus Co-operative Community Day Care Centre Number 3 will be celebrating a birthday on April 7 — its own; the first anniversary of the occupation of the empty building on Devonshire Place by the day care people.

The party is a tacit salute to the intransigence of the university. The day care people had negotiated with the administration for a building on campus for over a year when they finally occupied an unused building on Devonshire Place; they have been negotiating with the Governing Council ever since — and they are still, officially, without a home.

Not that the situation has been completely static; on the surface, at least, it has been a very live issue—definitely a sore point with the administration. Ultimatums have been issued from both sides, but agreement has never been reached and so the co-op continues to maintain a 24-hour occupation, the longest-running occupation in North America.

The occupation may be over soon, as a home in the Innis College block of houses on Sussex Street may become available. But first, the centre must overcome administration inaction and hostility, which the group has met continually in its four year existence.

The co-op was formed in 1969 when a group of university students and workers and community residents attempted to find cheap space for much-needed infant day care. After months of negotiations with the university, the group occupied an unused house at 12 Sussex Street and proceed to repair and paint it.

However, they could not afford to bring it up to standards, and after another nine month fruitless negotiating period with the university, the first occupation in U of T's history at Simcoe Hall forced the administration to cough up $2,000.

Another futile year of negotiations led up to the Devonshire occupation to set up an over-two centre.

The day care problem became the focus for several important issues, the most important of which was probably the thorny question of social responsibility.

The side the co-op took on this was that the university had significant responsibility to its own and surrounding community members; the administration argued that the university only owed subsidized day care to university members. The presidential advisory Committee on Social Responsibility quit on then-acting president Jack Sword a year ago when he refused it what members considered adequate funding.

A further problem on which there seemed no possible agreement was who should control a university day care centre. Campus Co-op, using their own working model, said that parents and volunteer workers should have decision-making powers. The university was not able to accept this. Although at one point they conceded a parity decision-making board, they would not allow the parents to have day to day control of administration. As Internal Affairs Committee, student chairman Paul Cadario admitted, "Parent involvement is not parent control."

Another irreconcilable difference seemed to be the extent of subsidization. The university offered a plan which the co-op said would be much too expensive; the university replied that it could not be done more cheaply.

But in the end it seemed to hinge on the fact that the student and community parent group had "illegally" occupied the empty building on Devonshire Place. Several members of the Governing Council, including St. Michael's College President John Kelly, could not get over this fact. "Negotiating under the duress of having buildings occupied at least reminds me of blackmail" said Kelly at one point during the debate.

The Varsity—Chris Hessel

Another difficulty was the administration's desire to combine the university-assisted St. Andrew Day Nursery and the Campus Co-op centre in one centre smaller than both. While St. Andrew's was willing to accept the merger because has to vacate its present premises co-op again balked. The proposed union they charged, was a shotgun wedding of two totally incompatible philosophies of day care (St. Andrew's is fairly conventional); the university had no business trying to put them both under one roof.

In the end, the debate the Governing Council agreed with all its own principles, compromised not at all and said it was setting up its own centre, without the campus co-operative people. The campus co-operative was out in the cold, illegal, but still there.

In early November the co-op began negotiating with the administration for a new home; the Governing Council had decided it wanted Devonshire for its own operation. The co-op had three basic demands; they wanted reasonable alternative space, they wanted it at a nominal rent, and they wanted it soon (by this time the occupation was almost eight months old).

The university was slow in answering, and the parents issued an ultimatum; the university responded with a resounding silence. Campus Co-op centre Number 2 began to settle in.

But the university's Devonshire centre is still far from completely established; several renovations that would bring it up to Ontario Day Nurseries Act standards have yet to be made. The occupation has prevented the university from proceeding with its proposed $57,000 facelift to make the building suitable for its centre.

The solution may be that the over two centre finds a home on Sussex Street in one of the Innis College houses, which include the under two centre. But this solution may be some time in coming because it hinges on Innis College's plans, which depend on U of T's building priorities, which in turn turn on whether the Ontario government at least partially lifts its capital budget freeze.

Specifically, the plan involves leasing a building by U of T to Innis College, and from Innis in turn to the Co-op. But another intermediary is involved — Inn-Res Co-op, at present an autonomous corporation closely connected with the Innis. Under the new plan Inn-Res would take over responsibility for the houses left standing on the north side of Sussex after the Innis College plan is approved.

However, the most recent Inn-Res Co-op proposal mentions only "the present day care facilities" on the block the under two centre. It remains to be seen whether Innis is willing, or able, to help the over two centre.

The Varsity—Faran Boreau

Campus Co-op Day Care has occupied this building since last April.

Earlier letters get challenged

In stating their case, the spokesmen for the Arab Student Association has incurred a factual error that touches upon the very essence of the Arab-Jewish conflict in the Middle East.

The letter says that "they (the Jews) have usurped one of the Arab nations, they have taken the Palestinian land by force... In all of Palestine's long history, there has never existed an Arab nation called Palestine. The land called Palestine by the Romans was a geographical expression for the home of many peoples, including the Jewish people. Throughout all ages, a sizeable segment of the population of Palestine was made up of Jews.

The Jews do not deny the fact that the Arabs have rights in Palestine. Rather, the present day Arab-Jewish conflict stems from the Arabs' denial of any Jewish right to settlement in Palestine. Why weren't those Arab advocates of a multi-national state around when the Arabs rioted in 1921 in protest against Jewish immigration? When German Jews were expelled from Hitler's Germany and some fled to Palestine, the Arabs ran amok during the years 1936-1939 in an orgy of bloodletting. That this attitude against co-existence still prevails is borne out again in the Arab Student Association letter which says "Jewish immigration from the USSR... cannot be justified on the basis of humanitarian principles".

The statement quoted from professor Wayman's letter that "Jewish Israelis stand in mortal danger" with which the Arab Student Association seems to concur is likewise erroneous. The Israelis may be in danger, but the events of the last past years have proven that this danger is far from being "mortal". The wheels of history are turning towards the era of the ingathering of the Jews in a country which is already multi-national. The first step to peace in the Middle East will be achieved when the Arabs realize that the Jews also have their rights in Palestine and that Jewish settlement there is not some fly-by-night affair but rather the outcome of an historical force which is here for good and which no amount of bloody terrorism will deter.

I also wish to reply to Hedi Mizouni's letter. 1. The first part of the "occupied Arab territory" was conceded to the Jews by the United Nations as the only alternative in face of virulent Arab reaction to Jewish immigration. The second part of those 33,000 square miles became part of Israel when all of the neighbouring Arab countries decided to drown all the Jews in their own blood, but somehow failed. The third portion of those 33,000 square miles became part of Israel when Abdul Nasser thought he could do the same job to the sound of the chanting Cairo mobs calling "Butcher the Jews". Let us hope for the sake of further Arab territorial integrity that no Arab statesman will commit a third error in judgment.

2. In Palestine today, about 40 per cent of the population is non-Jewish. The aim of a multi-national state has been achieved. 3. The conflict in the Middle East is primarily one between Arab and Jew. When each side realizes that the other side has some rights, then there will not be any need to "liberate" the country from the other but to share it. 4. Jews have participated in all major revolutionary movements.

Many Jews would like to join the progressive forces in the Arab world, but where is one to find them? Shall we seek them out among the Persian Gulf oil barons, or consider as our leader in this movement a religious fanatic like Libya's Khadafi, or Hussein the absolute monarch, or Sadat the bumbling bureaucrat?

I would like to answer Chris Roger's letter as well. Like you, I would like to see the Israeli government pay out a larger amount of money to the victims of the Libyan passenger plane that was shot down by an Israeli air force pilot. The downing of that plane was from all points of view inexcusable. Please bear in mind though two facts. (1) Jewish money is compensating Arabs. No Arab money compensated those Israelis that were cut down by Black September. (2) The Black September boys were greeted as national heroes in Libya and in most Arab countries after Munich. No Jew is proud of the Israeli pilot who shot down the Libyan plane.

In which we look back

Has anything really changed?

Big changes were in the wind for U of T this year, we were told last summer, what with a new president and a new governing structure. But, has anything really changed?

Not really.

President John Evans constantly sings the praises of the university's Governing Council, exaggerating its role in university decision-making out of all proportion. Indeed, Evans has usurped into himself and his chief associate, vice-president and provost Donald Forster, more control over the university's operations than his recent predecessors had.

The council and its committees mainly serve to rubberstamp the administrators' decisions, "recommendations" fed into them by the president and his senior administrators. The Governing Council set-up is a liberal's dream. It makes the university's decisions all the more acceptable because they appear to enjoy popular support.

When situations have gotten touchy, the president has avoided the mistakes of his predecessor, calling the appropriate council committee to suggest courses of action to the administration. These consultative missions have generally taken on the appearance of a fishing expedition in which senior administrators gingerly push the committees towards recommending the administration policy. The only time it didn't work was when internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway made a rather lacklustre attempt to convince committee members that the paltry small, non-disruptive math department occupation might cause a problem.

When the president isn't certain the Governing Council will give him what he wants, he goes ahead without consulting them, later advising the governors of his action "for information only". That's how he appointed both the New Program review committee and the presidential task force on academic appointments.

Student representation on the university's decision-making bodies — fought for by their radical predecessors — has been exploited to rob the official student governments of what little influence they already had over university decisions. When the university supposedly wants to assess student opinion, the administration ignores the official student governments, maintaining that the Governing Council's student caucus represents the students. Even then, the president has been known to handpick student representatives even without consultation with their caucus.

Has anything really changed?
Not really.

Jottings of a retiring editor

Conservatism regains its grip on campus

The Canadian university community is drifting back towards its old conservatism, increasingly distancing itself from the social concerns which — willingly or not — came to pre-occupy much of its time during the late sixties. The university's new-old face mirrors the dominant values of its student body, values shared by administrators and faculty. On the way back, students have cast aside their short-lived, socially conscious student governments and student newspapers, returning to the status quo ante.

University administrators have not missed sensing the changing student mores. "We seem to have turned the corner from negativism and alienation to a more constructive form of criticism (as far as the overwhelming majority are concerned)," University of Toronto president John Evans told the Canadian Club last month. "In the student body as a whole there is an entirely different mood to that of two or three years ago — a far greater sense of responsibility," he reasoned.

Greater responsibility, that is, if responsibility — as university administrators would have it be — means students sticking to their books and programming themselves for the jobs that are the reason they came to university, rather than rocking the boat by worrying about social and political problems outside their immediate sphere.

This has been a predictable response to the worsening economic situation. University students used to be able to count on getting a job after graduation. Now, odds are they won't. With that prospect in mind, it's no wonder students are becoming increasingly job-oriented and reluctant to do anything political that might endanger their status within the university or in the job market after graduation.

And, not surprisingly, the university that for a short while at the end of the last decade seemed to bend to student radicals' demands that it start caring about social issues has concluded that the potential threat posed by dissatisfied, socially conscious "radicals" no longer exists, and it's begun retrenching on the few advances sacrificed to this illusory threat. Student services, in large part a creature of the Canadian reaction to trouble on the University of California's Berkeley campus, may, for example, find themselves eliminated in these more responsible times, expendable in an era when the university's budget gets tighter and tighter.

It's not as if every student used to be a flaming revolutionary. Quite the contrary. However, the university of the sixties could not help but feel the pressure of campus activists. Their numbers may not have been legion, but they occupied most of the influential student positions within the university — notably on student governments and newspapers — and were able to mobilize the support of the less committed students; there seemed to be the potential for development, for positive political education and action.

Perhaps, it was never there; perhaps, the prospect of achieving social change by working within the university community was never very real. But, there were students who believed it was a possibility and struggled towards achieving that end. And, they had some success. The committed minority dragged the university begrudgingly along the path towards recognizing its role in society, to accepting the fact that the university does not exist in a vacuum.

By 1964, the Students' Administrative Council had accepted its right to take action on social and moral issues of a national and international nature. The sixties saw a spate of protest marches demonstrating U of T students' discontent with everything from the Province of Ontario Student Award Program to South Africa's apartheid policies. Eventually, community organizing projects and support for American draft-dodgers joined the list of issues enjoying council's moral and financial support.

Not everyone was happy with council policy, however. Unhappy campus conservatives tried to impeach SAC president Tom Faulkner in 1967. The Tories pitted council critic William Charleton against Faulkner in a presidential by-election. Charleton rejected the council's political policies; Faulkner supported them. Faulkner was re-elected, although with less than a 1,000-vote plurality.

The conservatives began to regain the upper hand in the fall of '69 when U of T students voted overwhelmingly to withdraw from the Canadian Union of Students (CUS). CUS had been smeared by media searching out sensationalism, willing to take reasonable positions and distort them into prediction threats of violence. But, CUS — whose loss of a number of member universities led to its sudden but predictable demise — didn't get the axe just because of media-misrepresented goals. The marxist student union could not continue because it had gotten too far ahead of its member council's constituents. It appeared to be constantly hammering unwanted dogma at them. CUS was not relating to its membership. Even many leftists who would have formed the core of CUS in previous years could not support its continuance; they knew it was no longer relevant.

That year, too, U of T undergrads had broken with their practice of recent years of electing leftists to head their student council, putting conservative Gus Abols into the presidency. He was followed by a string of liberals and left-liberals who generally found social issues to be less and less pressing than their predecessors had.

Students had given up on looking to their student governments for leadership or relevant activity, but the left-liberals couldn't accept this fact. SAC, in the eyes of its constituents, had become nearly as irrelevant as CUS, and although nobody was about to seriously suggest scrapping SAC, the really committed, socially conscious students who had once made the vehicle run were no longer interested in its limited potential.

The mood on campus.

Ironically, it was the most progressive council of the last few years — the 1971-72 council — that presided over SAC's political sterilization. Not only did last year's council-organized Constitutional Conference effectively remove council from participation in areas where local student governments exist, but it also ruled out financial support for non-university causes.

The Constitutional Conference decision, however, did not suddenly break with the past. It merely recognized what had been happening on campus the last few years: the reversion to relative apathy, parochialism, and the job mill mentality.

But, not by all. Increasing graduate unemployment and disillusionment with university have combined to alter the university's demography, at least in so far as it concerns the inquisitive, socially sensitive. If not yet aware students who used to come to university, who used to see university as an appropriate environment in which to learn and to better their society. Their realization that attending university would not in fact accomplish these ends, and the disincentive of expending valuable energy on an education which more and more seems destined to lead nowhere satisfying job-wise have left conservatives in an even greater majority than they would otherwise have been.

"Students no longer look on the university as an inevitable or obligatory continuation of secondary school," president Evans told the Canadian Club. "This new eclecticism among students is coincident with an enhanced emphasis outside the university on meeting society's needs in an immediate, practical way," he argued.

Not all politically conscious students have written off university. But, those who do come to university have widened their horizons, have begun to realize that the university is too isolated a community in which to concentrate their efforts. They are aware that their future ought to lie not in localized, personalized struggles within the univer-

But, for these people, like their student council colleagues, their journalistic endeavours had not meaning without political purpose. When the Canadian Union of Students folded, old time "radicals" were fond of referring to Canadian University Press (CUP) as "the last national student movement in Canada". And, it was that — for a while.

However, somewhere along the way a few years back, reality started catching up with the student press. Student newspapers started on a downward slide from which they were destined not to recover, at least never for long. For an organization dedicated to being "an agent for social change", CUP fared badly as member papers' staffs became increasingly liberal and uncritical, their main reason for CUP membership not being the national news and feature service but the lucrative national-advertising co-operative.

December, 1971 found CUP enthusiastically admitting alternate papers as full members in an attempt to pump fresh, politically conscious blood into a floundering organization. A year later, plans were made to advance the review date for the alternate papers' admission decision, and more and more members questioning whether CUP was a viable organization for people committed to alternate journalism.

Like their student government opposites, most member papers' staff members could not contemplate ending an organization even if it no longer had any real purpose or common interest. So, CUP continues to limp along.

Just as CUS' demise reflected students' attitudes not only about it but also about their student councils, CUP's problems are only a reflection of a similar problem confronting student newspapers. So, it is not surprising that people coming to work on The Varsity in recent years have been increasingly less political, less interested in social problems. It seems not unlikely that The Varsity's fate will not be much different from that of SAC, that the paper will stop seeing itself as an agent of social change, an exposé of contradictions within our society and accept the old student paper role, merely reflecting what is happening on campus, with participation in the paper's production more and more becoming just another extracurricular activity rather than any political commitment.

If, indeed, socially conscious students are going beyond the confines of the university and working in the outside community, these developments need not be overly lamented. It is not within the university that meaningful social change will be achieved.

Evans defends GSU nominee

By LIAM LACEY

University president John Evans indicated Sunday that the Graduate Students Union should not feel slighted by his appointment of the graduate school dean's student nominee to the Task Force on Academic Appointments.

"Names were solicited from various sources and qualifications were considered," said Evans. Byron Wall, his appointee, is not expected to represent "only graduate students", but rather he should work "as an individual", explained Evans.

His comments were in response to a GSU letter to him claiming the appointment of Wall was "highly improper" and a "rebuke to the GSU". Evans chose Wall, the second choice of graduate school dean Ed Safarian, ignoring a list of suggested candidates the GSU presented at the president's request.

In passing over the GSU recommendations, Evans apparently violated a tacit understanding that a nominee to a committee intended to be representative should be selected in consultation with the nominee's constituency or its elected representatives.

GSU president Wendy Le Blanc described the move as "out of accord with what seemed to be (Evans') philosophy of student participation", in her letter to the president. She referred to the request for recommendations as a "facade of legitimacy", because the GSU's nominees were passed over.

Evans responded to the charges by pointing out the "task force has no power" and that members were chosen "on qualifications."

Le Blanc reports that Evans phoned her and "explained the procedure used in selecting (Wall), and I indicated that the GSU disapproved of that procedure."

"There's nothing we can do about it but see what happens in the future", she added.

Wall, in a letter to The Varsity (March 14) said he was satisfied that the president had acted correctly

"but grants that the objection of the GSU has merit."

"I shall decide myself if it is right for me to remain on the task force," wrote Wall. Wall was unavailable for comment because he is holidaying in Jamaica for a week.

The Task Force on Academic Appointments has been asked to study the "types, nature and review of appointments appropriate to a period approaching a 'steady state' of total enrolment".

Committee bogs down

By BOB BETTSON

Many of the main recommendations of the New Program Review Committee were not even discussed as the arts and science General Committee bogged down Monday on questioning members of the presidential advisory committee.

The report, requested last spring by the General Committee, recommends significant changes in the Faculty of Arts and Science program, including the establishment of a credit system and improvement of teaching of first year courses.

The committee heard New Program chairman Donald Berlyne explain how the committee had been set up and how its deliberations had proceeded before being confronted by history professor Jim Conacher, long an opponent of the liberal New Program, who questioned the amount of time the general committee members had had to think about the report. Two committee members complained to president John Evans that he did not give the committee enough time to do the work asked of it.

Conacher also criticized the lack of some of the supporting documents on which the committee had based its report.

The debate was marked by charges and counter charges. History professor Michael Marrus called the report "a secret report", saying "there has been no time for discussion."

Finally, with time running out, SAC president-elect Bob Anderson introduced the first recommendations of the report.

Anderson said the recommendations, setting up four types of program for certification, single major, combined major, theme, and liberal arts, were a "response to developments in the New Program."

Library book buying may stop

Stable or declining grants to the U of T library system may force cutbacks to the extent that book buying may cease, chief librarian Robert Blackburn declared last week.

Speaking to a meeting of the Governing Council's Library Subcommittee, Blackburn said that if the system's budget is left at approximately its present size, "in six or eight years, we may not be able to afford anything except subscriptions".

Faced with a $100,000 personnel budget cut for 1973-74 and a static book-buying budget while book prices rise 10 per cent annually, Blackburn said the library is already encountering "more than usual" complaints from departmental and branch libraries about their inability to keep up to date in books.

Duplicate buying, which stocks libraries other than the central library, has been one of the first victims of buying power shrinkage in recent years. Many resigning workers will not be replaced to save more money, the chief librarian said earlier this year.

Similar warnings can be found in Blackburn's 1971-72 annual report, which noted that if the book budget is held constant and the same number of titles are bought, "we are obviously concentrating on the cheaper material and becoming a library of cheap books."

And, staff layoffs are not inconceivable if the 1971-72 year is used as a model.

Blackburn's report states that the library unwillingly laid off five employees at the end of the year "to live within its budget" and had also been forced to reduce the size of its work force the two previous years.

"It is extremely regrettable that... staff so laboriously brought together and trained" must be let go, the report says.

Inadequate funding is a particularly acute problem because of the impending opening of the Roberts Library. Large numbers of staff will be needed to service the new library and books bought to widen the scope of the duplicate collection to be housed in the Sigmund Samuel Library.

Business borrows for free

Library Subcommittee members were amazed to discover last Wednesday that the university's library lends to corporations free of charge.

The revelation came up inadvertently during the subcommittee's discussion of lending regulations.

Approximately $120,000 more is spent on loaning books to outside libraries than other libraries spend on loans to U of T, chief librarian Robert Blackburn said after the meeting U of T lends approximately 30,000 items annually, at a cost of about five dollars each, and borrows 4,000 under an agreement with between libraries.

U of T delivers books free if the borrowing institution is inside Toronto, Blackburn said. Otherwise the books are mailed.

UC English professor Peter Heyworth, who last year chaired a committee on stack access, charged the situation was "scandalous".

There is "no need to subsidize corporations like Shell Oil or Proctor and Gamble", he declared.

Corporations may be using the university when they ought to be financing their own libraries, he noted.

Subcommittee chairman Milton Israel, noting with a smile that the firms Heyworth mentioned are multi-national, said, "We may want to change that."

However, political economy professor Sanford Lakoff disagreed. Corporations pay a "fair share" of taxes, he said.

Later, on another item of business, Lakoff said he believed the U of T library system "is bound to reflect society's social structures."

Blackburn admitted after the meeting that inter-library loaning is "a real cost problem".

New York State libraries have a compensation system for libraries that spend more than is spent on them in borrowing, he said. A similar system has been suggested for Canada, and is being studied by the Association of Research Libraries.

Fasters protest U.S.-Greece link

By PETER MATILAINEN
About a dozen supporters of Greeks struggling to overthrow the country's military regime held a symbolic hunger strike outside the U.S. consulate in Toronto last weekend.

They hoped to bring to public attention to the deaths of at least two and possibly four students and the arrests of scores of demonstrators across the country who had been battling police in street fights.

Bedding down in sleeping bags on the sidewalk in front of the consulate, the demonstrators set up signs explaining the reason for the strike, demanding "Freedom for the Greek Students" and "Americans out". (The American government supplies the Greek regime with arms.)

The strikers called on Canadians to get Canada out of NATO because they claim it links Canada, through a common defence program, to the military regime.

The action had been planned to coincide with the 151st anniversary of Greek independence and followed period of growing dissent through out Greece.

Law students had seized the Athens Law School, but were driven out by police, who left injured students bleeding in the streets. Violent demonstrations also forced the closing of the Polytechnic school in Salonica, during which acts of brutality were witnessed.

Journalists who have reported student actions in a way favourable to the students have been threatened with expulsion from the country, say the demonstrators. Greece has imposed a strict blackout on news going to foreign countries and its own press is being censored by the military.

The increased violence in Greece has provoked an outcry from many Greek communities throughout the world and, in Toronto resulted in a rally of over 1,000 expatriates and supporters March 4.

The demonstrators promised further actions to "make Canadians aware of the Greek struggle, and to Demonstrators camped outside the U.S. consulate last weekend.

let those in Greece, the people more involved than anyone else, know that someone outside cares."

The demonstration in front of the consulate ended with the singing of "When the skies are clear again", a song that has become the anthem used by those who have continued to hold out against the junta, a song which is being sung on the campuses of universities and technical schools in Greece this year.

SSSC still fights on fees

According to Stop the Student Surcharge Committee Chairman Peter Havers, "the fees strike is still on - the trust fund is still in existence."

The Ontario Federation of Students and SAC called off their fees strike over a month ago, but approximately 1,100 students had still not paid their second term instalments by last Friday, vice-president Don Forster's administrative assistant Jack Brooke said Monday. Fewer than 600 had not paid a year ago.

Havers said that the amount of money in the trust fund, which consists of fees being withheld from the university by SSSC supporters, and the number of participants, is still confidential.

The SSSC is planning no new tactics to respond to student indifference and the fast approaching end of term he said. "Our tactics are private to us in the SSSC." "Publicly," he continued, "we are battling the trials."

Havers was referring to the trials on charges lodged against SSSC members during disturbances outside the comptroller's office February 1.

Across Ontario, students still owe their universities a total of over one million dollars in fees.

Approximately 2,000 students are holding out at York, which was the last student council to end its strike. York didn't impose academic sanctions against late payers, but has adopted for future use withholding of grades and marks transcripts as threats.

Carleton University recently deregistered 441 students for not paying their fees on time. However, procedures exist for recalcitrants paying up to reregister.

Western is considering using the same procedure, according to finance officer Allan Adlington. Approximately $40,000 is owed the London university in tuition fees, compared to only $12,000 a year ago.

Reformers want more humanized U of T

By ALEXANDRA MERCER

The newly elected student representatives to the Governing Council should work toward creating "an environment conducive to the development of thinking, creative people where people (students) have control over their own lives", according to Howard Levitt, who polled 760 votes in Constituency I, comprising all full time undergraduate students registered in arts and science.

Gord Barnes, who came second, polling the largest number of votes, 819, felt that student-staff parity on all university bodies, including the Governing Council, would "give students the necessary control over their own lives".

Levitt, who ran on the Reform Slate stressing parity, open access, reversal of education financing cut-backs and re-examination of tenure, felt that the point of his presence on council will be "to raise issues", and "effectively expose the anti-student, anti-community bias implied by administration policy". The library issue, for example, was "sprung on people once it was decided".

Although all the candidates who ran on the Reform Slate in the various constituencies agreed that a united issue platform had been "amazingly effective" — "it got a lot of people thinking in ways they wouldn't have thought otherwise", according to Levitt — non Reform Slate candidates almost without exception expressed dismay at the apathy which they felt the voting indicated.

Incumbent Aron Goldberg, (III Meds.) who took Constituency II (professional faculties — mostly undergraduate) along with defeated SAC presidential candidate Charles Vickery, described the "degree of apathy" in his constituency as "terrible". Approximately 1,200 votes were cast out of a possible 7,000.

Goldberg, saw the big problem with student participation as "financing students to participate". "Unless they are willing to get involved, students deserve whatever they get". Vickery who polled the second largest number of votes, 707, agreed with Goldberg that the voting turn-out was "indicative of the apathy on campus", rather than of positive change".

Vickery, who is retiring SAC services commissioner, would like to see "more benefits to students" from university services, such as the Placement Service and Hart House.

"What we need is qualified people on council who know the fine art of compromise", "know how to get the information and how to use it" said Vickery.

All the new student governors felt "the need for more student representation on the Governing Council". Phil Dack (acclaimed in the other graduate constituency) and Howard Levitt, the two Reform Slaters on council, felt that to effect increased student participation on the Governing Council, the "larger community of students should be mobilized", according to Dack.

Levitt felt that the Reform Slate's polling approximately a third of the votes across the board indicated that "student movementism is not dead", and that "people were receptive to that type of perspective."

"This year we have what's potentially a radically progressive SAC and we hope to combine our efforts with them," said Levitt.

Goldberg is more optimistic about council's receptivity to student demands. In comparison with the old Board of Governors which made decisions secretly, the new council, is "more liberal" because "its decisions are made in the open", he thought. The council's rejection of the fees increases and its favourable position on open access to stacks are "indicative of its liberalism in contrast to the old Board of Directors (sic)", according to Goldberg, who sees a liberal council as the major vehicle for student-oriented reform, as "most students aren't interested in becoming involved to change things".

All the student councillors interviewed agreed that "they would probably work together on council" and there are plans to organize a formal student caucus which will meet to discuss the issues and plan strategies", according to Phil Dack. The Reform Slate is officially non-existent now that the election is over.

Along with Dack, Barry Mitchell will represent graduate students on council. Mitchell a history student, polled 314 votes out of 593 valid ballots cast. Dack, who was acclaimed, studies at OISE and is last year's SAC vice-president.

Norma Grindel will be going on to a second year on Governing Council, having polled 906 votes in the part-time undergraduate students constituency. Arlene Dick, veteran of numerous university committees and editor of the Voice, the part-time student newspaper, will be joining her from that constituency. She polled 994 votes.

Erindale professor Gary Thaler, who lost last year, won this time with 82 votes out of 161 ballots cast.

Victor Graham and John Laidlaw also won positions on the Governing Council for the teaching staff.

Keith Hendrick and James Joyce have been re-elected to three year terms as alumni representatives. Alumnus Harry Riva was elected to replace Walter McNell, whose resignation has been accepted.

SAC grants $2000 to women's committee

By ZOYA STEVENSON

As last year's SAC departed office on a contradictory wave of self-criticism and self-exaltation, the new council was sworn in to the strains of O Canada hummed inharmoniously by the lamenting crew, during the traditional joint-SAC ceremonial budget meeting Monday night.

The budget report revealed that SAC's projected income from student fees next year will total $315,000 with each undergraduate paying a $14 fee, including a one dollar levy for the campus centre and two dollars for education.

SAC and its administrative services will consume $81,055 more than one-quarter of the proposed budget, while The Varsity will get $44,000 and Radio Varsity, $19,775.

The newly-sworn-in council also decided to fund a SAC-initiated committee on the Status of Campus Women with $2,000 for research into discrimination against women at U of T.

The committee, which has yet to be formed, will include the SAC president and vice-presidents, as well as SAC members and interested people on campus. Women in particular, are invited to a formative meeting of the committee on Thursday at noon in the Innis College film room.

As in other years, a task force will deal with the feasibility of the implementation of campus centre proposals.

A motion to double the present $300 honorarium to SAC executive members for summer work was defeated, because it was argued that students, such as those involved in Governing Council and other time-consuming campus activities, were not paid for their work.

Because SAC Press had a deficit of about $20,000 last year, the council agreed to negotiate with a printing cooperative which believes it can rectify the deficit on the basis of a profit-sharing agreement with SAC.

Members of the co-op, Amaurot Press, argued that if they are given the chance to buy the SAC Press machinery, and allowed to solicit contracts outside of SAC, that they will have the necessary initiative to make the press profitable. They say they can do this on the condition that they be legally identified as the manager of SAC Press on behalf of SAC, because they will be able to buy paper cheaper than at present and reduce overhead costs to the point where they can charge about half of what the established presses charge.

They propose that SAC receive one-third of their profits because they say they are interested in expanding the availability of quality, inexpensive printing to needy groups in the city.

Before the budget, was adopted, president-elect Bob Anderson outlined issues that would be of importance to council in the coming year. The issues included "the question of teaching and the emphasis placed on it this year," "the development of services," and

The recently elected and the outgoing members of SAC meet to discuss proposed $315,000 budget.

"the role of women in the university."

Anderson said he hoped the new council would "work for the equality of women and an end to the discrimination which exists." As well he warned members that they had "better get involved in the commissions" because "there is no way that an executive working alone will communicate to students what SAC can and will do for them." Agreeing with him, newly-elected communications commissioner Geoff Parker (from Vic) stated that "we should not fall down in letting students know what SAC is, and what services it performs."

He also said that "if it is not possible to have a special SAC column in The Varsity for better SAC communications, I propose that SAC put out its own paper for this purpose."

His defeated opponent, Innis rep Mike Edwards opposed a SAC column in The Varsity because it would be "a heavy-handed approach to an independent organization handled by volunteer labour."

The only other person opposed in a bid for a SAC commission SMC rep Joe Redican, elected to the position of finance commissioner. He felt that SAC should finance outside organizations rather than just university groups, as they do now.

Redican ran on a platform of commitment to the "abortion issue," and Erindale and Scarborough. As well, he said that SAC "should get the maximum return from the money we give in grants to organizations and commissions."

Three other commissioners were acclaimed to office, including Seymour Kanowitz (UC IV) who staged a comeback as services commissioner after being cultural affairs commissioner two years ago.

Also acclaimed was SMC rep Alice Anjo to the position of university commissioner. She said she was interested in the coming revisions to the U of T Act, and in working with the Governing Council committee investigating the wages of women in the university.

Rick Gregory filled the position of education commissioner on the basis that he will resign in September to concentrate his efforts in the Arts and Science Student Union.

Outgoing commissioners were not optimistic about the possibilities of office this year, but had recommendations for the new SAC. Education commissioner George Strathy urged council to consider the publication of a revised edition of the student rights handbook for high school students.

Chuck Vickery defeated in a presidential bid, said he would like to see the development of SAC services into the area of student pharmacies and tutorial services to aid students in their studies.

John Creelman outgoing University Commissioner said that the university commission could be better used to inform students of the Governing Council's activities and to make more effective contacts with the provincial government in the students' interests.

Our Mistake

A story from Canadian University Press printed in the March 21 edition of The Varsity erroneously stated that three universities in Québec were closed down by striking maintenance workers.

Workers at l'Université de Montréal, l'Université du Québec à Montréal and Université Laval reached an agreement March 22 with the respective administrations, thus averting a strike.

Non-union workers are target of CSN drive

By DOUG HAMILTON

The militant, Montréal-based Confédération des syndicats nationaux (CSN) will attempt to organize more than 60,000 non-union Ontario hospital workers over the next few years, said CSN secrétaire général Jean Thibeault in a telephone interview with The Varsity.

There will be "no limit" to the number of workers that the CSN will try to recruit, said Thibeault, adding that workers already enrolled in existing unions will be considered as potential members. "They are all workers", he continued; "they are all part of the labour movement."

The CSN has already signed up the 2,100 members of the Canadian

Union of General Employees. (CUGE), the bargaining agent in several Toronto hospitals. Three weeks ago CUGE members voted to join the CSN overwhelmingly. However CUGE had links with the CSN several months before the affiliation papers were signed.

The CSN provided the Toronto workers with moral support and an undisclosed amount of money during a strike last summer against Toronto Western General Hospital. Other city unions, mostly affiliated with the Canadian Labour Congress gave little support to CUGE, branding it as a "mickey-mouse union."

CUGE president Pat Murphy, who helped found the Council of Canadian Unions (CCU), castigated CLC affiliated unions as "a bunch of dues collection agencies". Asked why he did not affiliate CUGE with the CCU, Murphy said he had a disagreement with the CCU over its political direction.

There was "a long debate on accepting the group from Toronto" during a CSN conference, said Thibeault. However the Fédération nationale des services (FNS), which governs hospital workers, decided to admit CUGE because it is "an aggressive union," he declared.

All unions affiliated with the CSN must belong to one of 11 autonomous federations within the labour central, he said. The FNS is comprised of over 60,000 workers.

Although the CSN is based mainly in Québec, the confederation has also signed up unions in Brockville, Ontario and in Newfoundland.

CUGE joined the CSN because it is "the only pure labour organization in Canada," said the union's president, Pat Murphy. He described the CSN as being "purely controlled by Canadians."

Asked if the CSN contained militant pro-separatist elements, Murphy retorted that separatism "was defeated 98 per cent" in a vote taken within the confederation.

By admitting CUGE to its ranks the CSN "has proven that it is not separatist," said Murphy.

Thibeault said that the CSN is interested in signing up unions in all parts of Canada, not just Québec.

He derided the Parti québécois, which enjoys considerable working class support in the Montréal area, claiming the separatists "cannot be trusted."

The secrétaire général asserted that he and many other members of the CSN had "no faith in politicians."

The PQ would give the CSN "the roughest time at the bargaining table" of all the parties in Québec politics because it would make the workers pay for independence, claimed Thibeault.

Murphy emphasized that the CSN membership has not adopted a particular political analysis or strategy.

He rejected the claim that the CSN is actively engaged in Québec politics, saying that it "is not a political machine."

Thibeault, however, said the CSN may support some "labour candidates" in the upcoming Québec election which is expected to be held next year. (The statutes and bylaws of the CSN contain a clause forbidding the confederation from affiliating with a political party.)

Hospital workers who struck last summer are now part of the CSN.

Both Thibeault and Murphy agree that there is "some similarity" in the working conditions of hospital workers in Ontario and Québec.

However Thibeault said that Ontario was "10 years behind Québec" in the area of collective bargaining. Both provinces, however, have laws prohibiting hospital workers from striking, abrogating what has been unions' traditional basic right.

In Ontario, Bill 41 prevents hospital workers from walking out. In Québec Bill 89, which has been introduced in the National Assembly, designates activities in the public service, and in the private sector at the government's arbitrary decree, as essential services which cannot be struck.

Murphy declared that Bill 41 "tears at the very roots of our freedom... because unions can't strike to get better treatment." He claimed the management at Toronto Western "refused to negotiate" because "they knew compulsory arbitration could force the workers back to work."

Although it directed mainly at public service workers, Bill 89 can also apply to workers in the private sector. Thibeault said if a service station employees walked off their jobs halting fuel sales, Bill 89 could be used against them to force them to return to work.

The CUGE president asserted that his workers are engaged in a class struggle in order to secure rights to "live in human dignity." He added that it is "a bunch of crap" that "the class struggle is communistic".

Asked if he would support a general strike in Ontario like the one which paralyzed Québec last May after three labour chiefs were jailed, Murphy replied affirmatively. "I would support that," he answered.

Thibeault said that the three Québec union groups which comprise the Common Front of public service employees may ask Ontario workers to join them in future Common Front activity.

Asked if the CSN would dispatch organizers to Ontario, Thibeault said CUGE would "get as much as they need." Murphy asserted that CUGE would also receive funds from Montréal, but declined to specify an amount.

Canadian Beaver chomps on campus food catering bus available, Saga Administrative Corporation reported sales of more than $107,422,000 and claimed profits of $2,258,000. The profit figure represented an increase of about 10 per cent over the previous year.

Chairman of Saga's board of directors is William Price Laughlin. He was president and chairman of the board of Saga and its predecessor company from 1949 to 1968, but relinquished the presidency in 1968, remaining as chairman. He was chairman of the board of the Michigan Equity Corporation of Kalamazoo, Michigan from 1960 to 1967 and chairman of Scope Corporation of Menlo Park, California from 1964 to 1967. He is currently chairman of the board of regents and trustees at Gonzaga University (where Saga owns property) and a trustee of St. Mary's College and Kalamazoo College. "Who's Who in America" lists his political affiliation as Republican.

Beaver — the local version

Beaver Food Service Associates Limited of London, Ont. is the food catering business' answer to the Committee for an Independent Canada. It's the only Canadian-owned company of any significance operating food services on the nation's campuses. But, it's a private company which does not release full official information to the public.

In a telephone interview, a Beaver official said the company holds food service contracts at Dalhousie University, Mount St. Bernard College at St. Francis Xavier University, the University of New Brunswick, St. John campus, Loyola College, Queen's University, Trent University, Glendon College; University of Windsor; University of Winnipeg; Brandon University; and the University of Saskatchewan (Saskatoon and Regina campuses).

It offers food services to institutions in educational, health care and industrial markets. But, Beaver has explicitly stayed out of the vending machine business which has drawn so much energy from Versafoods, Beaver's traditional rival.

Beaver was actually formed by several dissatisfied executives working for one of the firms which later merged to form Versafoods. Current Beaver directors A.R. McIntosh and J.O. O'Rourke were both working for Industrial Food Services, a division of Canadian Food Products Sales Limited, in the late 1950's. (As mentioned earlier, Canadian Food Products was a holding company which, through subsidiaries, operated bakery plants, bake shops, coffee shops and restaurants. Its major operations currently are Hunt's and Woman's Bakeries.)

McIntosh and O'Rourke left Industrial Food Services and bought out a restaurant in London. After the formation of Versafoods in June, 1961, several old customers of Industrial Food Services came to the partners and asked them to contract their food services. According to Beaver general manager W.R. Carmichael, the two at first refused. But on August 16, 1963, Beaver Food Service Associates Limited was incorporated under Ontario law.

Another former Canadian Food Products executive, Roy Mitchell, had left the firm about the same time as McIntosh and O'Rourke, and rejoined his colleagues in late 1964. He became president of Beaver in late 1970.

The fourth member of the four-man Beaver board of directors is Ernest John Spence, who was president of Canadian Food Products Limited from 1951 to 1959. Spence joined the Beaver board in 1969 and serves the company in an advisory capacity, Carmichael said.

Spence is a professor of business at York University, besides being chairman of Arvak Corporation, and director of Bovis Corporation Limited, Reed Paper Group Canada Limited, and First Toronto Corporation Limited. During the Second World War, he was chief of the prices division in the federal government's wage and price control administration.

Carmichael said Beaver has "17 or 18 people in senior management positions" who were once Versafoods employees.

He estimated Beaver's total revenue for the last fiscal year at between $25 and $30 million, with profits of about $350,000. But, he said the company did not keep precise figures because as a private firm it is not required to provide financial information to the government.

Carmichael agreed that Versafoods, Saga and Beaver are the "big three" food catering companies operating on Canadian college and university campuses. He indicated resentment toward the American interests which were attempting to dominate the Canadian market. He said that Saga, which until recently, had no Canadian board of directors, was attempting to establish a separately incorporated Canadian subsidiary to run its Canadian operations. The proposal would establish Saga's parent firm in roughly the same relationship to the Canadian subsidiary as ARA relates to Versafoods.

ITT frozen out

Another catering firm recently lost its last Canadian campus contract when Saga outbid it for the food service at Brock University. Canteen of Canada, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Canteen Corporation of America, was involved in a labour dispute with its Brock employees about three years ago. Students supported an attempt to block the firm from using strikebreakers against its employees, and the union won many of its demands.

The Canteen Corporation, in turn, is owned by ITT (International Telephone and Telegraph), the multinational giant accused of conniving with the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency in a plot to overthrow the Marxist government in Chile and of giving illegal campaign funds to Richard Nixon. An anti-trust suit has led to an order for ITT to divest itself of several holdings, including Canteen Corporation. But, the conglomerate intends to appeal the order in the courts and the case will probably be tied up for years.

(editorial)

Students aren't powerless to improve food service on their campuses and undermine control of the catering giants. At Simon Fraser University, students have established an alternate lunch counter serving food prepared on the spot. The alternate counter offers lower prices than those at the privately-catered campus cafeteria.

During recent contract talks, alternate counter workers offered to stop work if the cafeteria workers went on strike. The show of strength worked, and the caterer agreed to many of the union's demands including a stipulation that the cafeteria stock union-made products whenever possible and support the Kraft and lettuce boycotts.

If people on campuses are to have direct control over the food they eat, they will have to consider these directions. Despite the claims of so-called "representative food service committees", few campus kitchens will respond to consumer demand unless the users themselves prepare the broth. That can't happen if the means of nutrition are controlled by far-away corporations.

Dare Foods Ltd. — producer of Dare Cookies has refused to negotiate with its striking employees for six months. Intimidation, threats and arrogance have characterized the company's approach to the predominantly female work force.

Advisory Bureau "being used more than ever": director

Governor Cadario still gunning for it

Internal Affairs Committee chairman Paul Cadario, an acknowledged critic of the Advisory Bureau and one of the governors who sat on the Budget Committee panel that slashed $22,000 off next year the Bureau's operating budget for next year, advocates canning the service by June, 1974 because "it is failing to meet the needs of the students".

Cadario has been known to mirror administration views about student services in the past. And, vice-president and provost Don Foster is known to share Cadario's skepticism about the worth of the Bureau.

However, internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway seemed to be resisting the Cadario-Foster initiative when word of the 22 per cent budget cut first broke last January. Asked whether the cut should be interpreted as the first step in shutting down the bureau, Conway replied, "That may be the opinion by some people about how the cut should be interpreted, but that's not mine."

In a Varsity interview yesterday, Cadario cited a survey of arts and science students in which 83 per cent of the 250 respondents said they had never used the bureau, and 70 per cent of those who had found the services "of little value". However, were the survey results representative, close to 4,000 students might use the bureau annually.

Advisory Bureau director Don McCulloch, moreover, reports "the bureau is being used now more than ever before."

Bureau will retain its present format for the coming year, despite initial fears it would have to drop one of its three senior staff members.

The three are now to be paid for their interdisciplinary teaching by the departments involved, according to Cadario.

McCulloch, a psychiatrist, added that he hopes to get some of his salary covered by OHIP.

Cadario suggested that both academic and psychiatric counselling services presently offered by the Advisory Bureau be decentralized and presently incorporated into such functions as those of the Placement Centre, the psychiatric department of the Health Services, or possibly the Student Awards Centre.

An alternative might be to centre such services within the separate colleges and faculties to provide a more encompassing and immediate understanding of the student's problems, he suggested.

McCulloch said the bureau's services extend far beyond psychiatric and academic counselling.

"Not only does it reach some 750 students through psychiatric counselling alone, but it has also been responsible in the past for the installation of Student Legal Aid, certain Innis College Interdisciplinary courses, orientation programming, and conferences such as last week's survival conference."

The battle over the Advisory Bureau is essentially one between the left and the right, according to McCulloch. "The bureau has been charged with catering to left-wing freaks in that it is considered as being biased towards certain kinds of classes," he said.

"Such criticism is representative of a prevalent conservative backlash in all functions of the university," the director added.

Male athletes plea for new home

Pleas supporting a new men's athletic building dominated the speeches during the annual men's athletics awards dinner held March 20 at Hart House.

Athletic Directorate vice-president Michael Penman put some sting in the traditional honorific toast to the university by complaining that "there has been no serious discussion of the role of athletics within this university."

"The proposed men's athletic building has been a case study in futility and frustration," he added.

Penman was a member of the users' committee for the six million dollar men's athletic building at Huron and Harbord. However, planning was halted last November when the provincial government froze all further payments for university capital construction.

"Athletics has been neglected and we urgently plea for the attention and concern of the university," Penman talk the dinner, attended by about 300 including university vice-presidents Jack Sword and Jill Conway.

Penman, who received the Sidney Earle Smith Trophy for his contribution to intramural athletics, said "Participation in the athletic program helps to alleviate the impersonal nature of this university."

During the lengthy awards presentations, athletic director Dalt White reiterated many of Penman's complaints about the lack of suitable facilities.

Noting that Varsity athletes had managed to win seven OUAA titles, White said that nevertheless inadequate facilities had severely hampered the development of seral sports, particularly badminton, gymnastics and volleyball.

Prior to the dinner, basketball coach John McManus complained that promising athletes often don't come to U of T after seeing the outdated facilities in Hart House.

"A couple of good high school players were in today for a look around", McManus related, "and when I showed them the Hart House gym they couldn't believe that a university team would be playing in anything that small."

UTAA president George Wodehouse urged the athletes to write to Universities and Colleges Minister Jack McNie and the university's Planning and Resources Committee protesting the effect of the capital budget freeze on construction of the men's athletic building.

Flights banned, AOSC may lose $100,000

By JOHN CAMPBELL

About $100,000 may be lost by the Association of Student Councils if recent regulations banning charter affinity flights in Canada are not lifted to allow a massive charter flight program to proceed on schedule this summer.

AOSC allied itself last fall with the British University North American Club to obtain cheap fares for 12,000 passengers expected to come to Toronto and Vancouver this summer. Of these, 1,000 are known as "affinity" passengers and thus banned from Canada, since their charter agent, the British Student Travel Service, is affiliated with a larger organization.

AOSC, a non-profit student council organization whose main activity is operating an air travel service, had enjoyed special exemption from a law forbidding commercial businesses from selling one-way tickets to their customers.

But the new regulations passed January 8 abolish this exemption and add a tariff onto charters entering Canada which has the effect of pegging charter prices at the level charged by Canadian commercial charters.

The regulations forbid affinity flights from taking place after June 30 and will therefore prevent the AOSC from fulfilling its part of a contract entered into with its British counterpart with Western Orient Air Marketing (UK Ltd.).

As a result, AOSC may lose its $100,000 deposit on in-Canada flights for the group, and according to director Rod Hurd, may have to fold. Another $170,000 in hotel and flight deposits from the British group is also in jeopardy.

A lobbying campaign in Ottawa to gain exemption for AOSC from the new rules is still in its early stages.

Last week, SAC vice-president John Helliwell opened a permanent office in the capital from which members will press their plea to cabinet ministers and members of parliament.

The basis of their campaign will be briefs submitted to federal minister transport Jean Marchand, which states:

"It was assumed by both the AOSC and the carrier at that early time (the fall of 1972) ... that the affinity category for flights would be permitted to co-exist with the new ABC (advance booking) category at least until September 1973."

It adds that "The date changes caused by such a restructuring (as called by the regulations by June 30) could not be incorporated to carry many of those passengers already booked and would not serve future passengers adequately whether they buy one-way or round-trip reservations."

Hurd, a former SAC president, said he thought the government's intentions in passing the new regulations were to protect Canadian airlines from unfair competition, and to "clean up the Atlantic air charter mess".

He applauded these intentions, but added that AOSC wants the government "to admit they have forgotten us" in the shuffle — meaning it overlooked AOSC as a special type of charter when it designed its rules to apply to all charters.

It is "grating", Hurd said, for the government to lump AOSC in with the commercial agencies, some of which have gone bankrupt — taking customers' deposits with them or leaving tourists stranded in foreign countries without return flight arrangements.

"We have cleaned up problems even their own travel agencies won't," he declared referring to occasional emergency aid AOSC has given to non-member tourists in such cases.

Hurd said he was optimistic that the government "will bend on these rules".

He indicated that "almost all Western countries have student affinity categories" and that the AOSC request is for an "equal opportunity" to provide inexpensive travel arrangements for students.

Call for Soc parity

A meeting of the sociology women's caucus last week urged the department to move forward parity between men and women among its faculty members.

Of the 59 professors in sociology, only nine are women, none of whom have tenure or even senior positions in the department.

The 15 people at the meeting, one of a series of discussions among women, drafted a letter to the department's new parity staffing committee recommending that the two faculty positions available next year in the department go to women.

Striking workers to get meeting with Dare

By GREG McMASTER

Five hundred people protesting at Queen's Park last Wednesday against anti-union legislation and strike-breaking, successfully urged the government to arrange a meeting between the management of Dare Cookies limited and the strike committee of the workers' union.

The demonstration was called by Local 73 of the United Brewery Workers to mobilize support in their nine-month strike against Dare. A crowd of leftists and union workers, including a busload of female workers from the Dare plant in Kitchener, heard union official Norm Wilson announce that he had just been informed of the arrangement of the meeting for April 2.

The early-morning protest began with an hour's picketing in front of the main Queen's Park Legislature entrance, and continued with several speeches of support.

Ted Bounsell, NDP MPP from Windsor, denounced "all the elements of society conspiring against the workers on this strike".

"The Kitchener police, the judiciary with its use of injunctions against picketing, and the government, with its allowing strikebreaking", were among those working against the union, he said. He also pointed out that the Dare strike was "the first with equal pay for women" as a major issue, in Ontario. The strike has centred around the equal pay for women demand because the plant's labour force is 80 per cent female.

Several arrests have been made in picket line fights against professional strikebreakers and police, and two of the workers were scheduled to begin jail terms that afternoon. One of them spoke to the crowd, urging other unions to extend support for the campaign to boycott Dare products by organizing more boycott committees.

"We're not getting the support we need so far," he said. "With the injunction against picketing all we can do is organize the boycott". He singled out Dominion Stores for "backsliding" on earlier agreements to boycott Dare.

The company is legally able to institute decertification proceedings against the union in June. Ontario labour laws, besides allowing management to limit picketing through court-issued injunctions, and permitting the hiring of scab labour during strikes, also condone strikebreakers currently working in the plant to participate in a decertification vote.

Ontario Federation of Labour president David Archer pledged "full support" from the OFL for the strikers and the boycott campaign. "Our retail unions must make sure that Dare products don't get on the shelves", he said.

Steve Penner, who was introduced as a member of the NDP provincial executive, but stressed that he was speaking for himself, described the strike as "one of the most important facing the working class of this country". He said that "the most serious economic crisis facing the capitalist world since World War II" has led to "deliberate unemployment and the spreading imposition of wage controls" in efforts to "undermine the militancy of labour organizations".

A large contingent of postal workers who sparked the recent wildcat strikes in Toronto cheered Penner when he listed their actions along with the Dare strike, "the coming general strike in Britain, the campaign to free the Québec labour leaders, and student resistance against education cutbacks" as being "all part of the same struggle".

The demonstration included contingents from more than a dozen union locals from around the province, and several socialist organizations.

Ontario Liberal leader Robert

Nixon spoke briefly, but was loudly booed and heckled. Referring to his party's opposition to "the continuation of ex parte injunctions", he suggested that "at least we can agree on this".

When he said that he didn't like strikebreakers, someone shouted "what about the Liberals?" Ignoring this, he closed by saying "As soon as Steve Lewis and I get in the legislature, I hope we'll be able to do something about this". Lewis was absent holidaying in Kentucky.

Behaviour code will be reworded

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Proposed regulations against demonstrations in the university are being worded to make it clear that they are not intended to ban all demonstrations and sit-ins, says Internal Affairs committee chairman Paul Cadario.

Reporting on the progress of the committee's task force on the behaviour code, Cadario said Monday that the regulations reworded for presentation to the Internal Affairs committee by the task force are now "sufficiently strictly worded to make it clear that they wouldn't ban peaceful demonstrations."

Cadario noted that the code is being reviewed in light of the comments of the university's solicitors, who found the code had no legal validity. "We are looking at things more legally now," he said.

"Since all charges laid in law have to be proved," he said, the regulations are now worded so that "it would be difficult to prove that a demonstration is a violent one if it is not."

However, Cadario said that the regulations do not explicitly incorporate the Campbell Report's distinctions between non-violent non-disruptive demonstrations, such as leafleting or peaceful picketing and disruptive demonstrations, either violent or obstructive.

He said that the distinctions were already present in the code and had in fact been present in the original draft.

Cadario said that the section on academic offenses had not been considered in detail by the task force. Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway said Sunday the section was "being left blank at the present."

The task force has been set up to deal with only the Internal Affairs Committee's concerns, she noted.

Cadario said that academic offenses that fall within the purview of the Academic Affairs Committee will be determined by Academic Affairs.

Eng exams set for passover

By DAVID WISE

Engineering dean James Ham says exams will be held in his faculty this year on Passover holy days because "this is a particularly bad year for Passover."

Ham was referring to the fact that according to the Jewish Orthodox calendar, there are four restrictive days during Passover this year, falling within the exam period.

The faculty of Arts and Science, however, will not be holding any exams on the designated days: April 17, 18, 23, and 24.

Ham said that "consistent with past policy", special arrangements will be made for students who "register a sense of religious conflict with the department." "I have talked with rabbis on several occasions," he added.

Asked to comment on the fact that while there will be no engineering exams on the Christian Good Friday, there will be exams on Passover holy days, the executive director of Hillel House (a campus Jewish cultural centre) said he had suggested a change to the engineering faculty.

"I was told", Ben Meyer said, "that this would mean the loss of four of the 10 available exam days." He said that he then requested the faculty to try to cancel exams at least on the first two days of Passover, and had thought that this option was still under consideration.

Asked what this would mean to Jewish engineering students, Meyer said, "Orthodox students won't take the exam and will be forced to take substitute exams, which will likely be more difficult."

Non-orthodox, but practicing Jewish students, he suggested, "might be forced to compromise their religious values."

Engsoc fees will go up $3 for next fall

Engineering Society fees will go up three dollars next fall, the society has decided.

Citing costs of the extensive Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering's centenary celebration, coming Engsoc president Dave Field says that outside funding, which has supported the society this spring, will not be available next fall.

Field (Geo III), who defeated David Matthews (Chem III) to succeed Scott Jolliffe, says that in any case, the society's program is the most active of any college or faculty student council on campus. Fees will go from seven to 10 dollars, in addition to SAC fees.

The Engsoc executive next year will include a representative appointed by new dean Bernie Etkin. The faculty member, who will have voting rights, will facilitate better communication with the faculty, according to Field.

The society's executive suggested appointing a voting faculty member, said Field.

Other executives include vice-presidents Les Rapchak (Mech III), who defeated Torben Frost (Civil II), and Stephan Swigger (Elect II), who was acclaimed.

Erindale students voted in a mixed bag of surprises in their elections held last Wednesday and Thursday.

Pre-election favourite Arnold Brody, currently a visible SAC rep from Erindale, was defeated by Peter Smith in his bid for the Students' Administrative Government of Erindale (SAGE) presidency. Smith, also a SAC rep, edged out Brody 218 to 204, with Brian Kasey trailing at 75 votes.

Erindale's elections to SAC were at least as surprising, as a Young Socialist topped the polls, followed by an arch-conservative and a Stop the Student Surcharge member.

YSer Heather Ridout, recently defeated in the SAC presidential race, came first, by one vote, ahead of present SAC finance commissioner Paul Bannon, who as part of the conservative Chuck Vickery ticket was also beaten by Bob Anderson in the SAC contest. SSSC member Roman Olszewski, another defeated SAC vice-presidential candidate, won a council seat, as well as Donna Cameron and Rick Zurawski.

Tanya Abolins approximately doubled the vote for Steve Mickelson in the SAGE vice-presidency race. Close to 500 students, or one quarter of the electorate, voted.

Second year student Shelly Sinukoff will be taking over from Mike Walker as Innis College Student Society president next year.

Sinukoff doubled the vote for president Innis Trotskyite Mike Edwards, 78 to 36. However, Edwards, who lost last spring in a try for a Governing Council seat on a Young Socialist ticket, was consoled by retaining his seat on SAC.

He and Tony Campbell defeated Steve Garety to occupy Innis' two SAC chairs. Innis Herald editor Henry See (who along with present education commissioner Briane Nasimok Thursday won the U of T Debating Union crown) and Lee Pearce were defeated by Ginny Moore for the college student council vice-presidency.

Only 105 students, or about 14 per cent of those eligible, voted, but even this reflected more interest in council elections than at Vic, where all but one position on Vic's student council was acclaimed.

Brian Guzley won the presidential suite from student governor-elect Gord Barnes, and Doug Jackson defeated Randy Brown 121-40 for the vice-presidency.

This year's education commissioner Rick Gregory was elected to SAC, where he becomes an executive member. Incumbent Geoff Parker, along with David Galbraith, Brian Clarence and Andrew SueChue-Lam will be the college's SAC reps. Three Stop the Student Surcharge Committee members were defeated in the election.

Endicott lauds China communes

By JIM MARTIN

The ability of communes to act independently, and their co-operative spirit, has enabled China to solve many of its problems, James Endicott told the Canadian China Society Sunday.

"China under Mao has done the unbelievable—the commune system has solved the food problem" said Endicott, who lived in China for 30 years.

Endicott, former chairman of the Canadian Peace Congress, noted that many projects, all labour-intensive, were underway during his recent two-month visit to China. Labour intensity allowed work to progress at a local level without holdups due to lack of equipment.

Large numbers of workers carried earth in baskets rather than depending on the availability of bulldozers, he said. As evidence of the effectiveness of this approach, Endicott cited the new reservoirs, canals and even riverbeds which he saw throughout China.

Endicott recalled being driven through an area that had been rainless for 300 days, a drought which in the past would have meant disaster and starvation for several million people. But due to massive irrigation, the people reaped "an 80 per cent of normal harvest, and no damage to the fruit crops in the region.

The speaker emphasized to the audience of about 250 in the Medical Sciences Auditorium that orders for these projects did not come from a central bureaucracy, but that often the ideas came from the governing revolutionary committees of individual communes. This de-emphasis of central control over the communes was, according to Endicott, the main effect of the Cultural Revolution.

He described the three year revolution as having "broken up the crystallization of the bureaucracy" that administered China, and compared its impact to that which Martin Luther had on the rising capitalist world. The Cultural Revolution has advanced Mao Tse-Tung's aims of "centralism and democracy, discipline and freedom, and personal ease of mind and liveliness", according to Endicott.

He described one typical reaction to the Cultural Revolution: "It has given us a freedom to criticize".

Officials were hard to question before 1966 but since then people could discuss the functioning of organizations with the chairman of the committee running them. Any consensus of opinion reached at such meetings was usually acted upon, said Endicott.

Endicott denied that the structure of the Chinese Communist Party was destroyed by the revolution, although he admitted that there had been several bloody struggles. He found that the people's relationships with the party had not changed drastically; about 95 per cent of the people he questioned that were party members before the Cultural Revolution were still members. About half the workers he talked to were Communist Party members which Endicott said was the same as he had found on previous visits.

From these direct observations and private talks with figures such as China's United Nations delegate and premier Chou En-Lai, Endicott concluded that the Cultural Revolution was a significant change for one-quarter of the world's population. However it involved not an overthrow of the existing government, as some observers in the west have maintained, but a restructuring of it.

The problem of family planning has been solved under the guidance of Mao's interpretation of Marxist-Leninist thought, Endicott claimed.

Although China's perennial food shortage has been overcome, large storehouses of grains are now stockpiled on every commune the nation's 150 million women of child-bearing age make mass birth control prudent, he said.

Para-medics distributing free contraceptives and encouraging males to undergo vasectomies were observed by Endicott.

Endicott told the meeting that Chinese peasants have successfully learned to "live and interpret" Mao's thought so that the Maoist system will not collapse at his death.

A minister in the audience (Endicott was a United Church missionary in pre-Communist China) asked whether China, with all its progress would develop a more sophisticated form of government with the opposition to the government and openness to the press common in liberal democracies.

"I don't think we have much to offer — our system has executed rebels such as Oliver Cromwell, William Lyon Mackenzie and Louis Riel", Endicott countered.

When the minister asked about freedom of religion in China, Endicott said that even children of Christian parents who have been raised in Mao's spirit of "personal liveliness" and Marxist-Leninist thought have found no need in their lives for a religion.

Threatened citizens vow red tape

The Cadillac-Greenwin development would rape the community of old sturdy homes like this.

The fate of 100 houses facing destruction on Quebec and Gothic Avenues will not be known for at least two years said community organizer Walter Weary last week.

The homes, in the High Park area, are owned by the Cadillac and Greenwin development corporations and are scheduled for demolition to make way for high-rise units and townhouses. City Council, however, has voted to repeal the bylaw permitting zoning changes for high-rise in the district, but the repeal has been challenged by the developer through an injunction.

Speaking to a group of students at an informal seminar at the International Student Centre as part of the Survival Conference, Weary asserted that the bylaw changes to permit the development are mired in a bureaucratic swamp.

Citizens opposing the Cadillac-Greenwin proposal are going "to create so much bureaucracy" that the Ontario Municipal Board and City Council will not be able to handle it said Weary.

The project is now being debated at three levels of appeal, added the organizer, and in the future it will be "fought at six levels".

Weary and other residents of the area described the painful growth of their citizens group and how it became conscious of the threat to their community.

The Quebec-Gothic development was discovered by "one of the straight ladies in the area", remarked Weary. The matter of the Greenwin-Cadillac plan came to a head when then Ward 1 alderman Ben Grys was found to have a conflict of interest.

Grys' wife owned two houses on Gothic Avenue which she sold to the developers for a considerable profit. The houses were sold when Grys was chairman of the Buildings and Development Committee of City Council, which approved the development. The Supreme Court of Ontario later ruled that Grys had violated the Municipal Act by not declaring the conflict.

Weary remarked that the conflict of interest controversy "got the whole community pissed off."

Originally a group of about 10 people were involved in fighting City Hall, but last year the group mushroomed into a more broadly based community planning group. Weary said he hoped it would expand further.

One of the main grievances of the residents is that they were not consulted about zoning changes in their district which would permit high-rise development.

People should be allowed to participate in the planning of their own community, said Weary. "It shouldn't be done . . . downtown (at City Hall) or anywhere else."

The Quebec-Gothic citizens stressed that there is a paucity of good quality, low-cost housing in the city. Destruction of the 100 houses in the area will merely exacerbate the housing crisis, the residents claimed.

Both Weary and Andy Smith, another member of the citizens group, lauded the community spirit which exists in the area.

"Everybody knows what's going on," declared Smith. Quebec-Gothic "is a really pleasant place to live."

Smith said a food co-operative and a street newspaper had been established and relations between youth and "the straights" were amicable.

He added that the developers began renting the houses on the two avenues to "freaks" whom they thought would let the properties deteriorate from misuse. Smith said the plan "didn't work" because many young people decided that the community was unique and worthy of preservation.

Although there is little conflict within the Quebec-Gothic community, Weary maintained that Metro Police were conducting "illegal searches" and harassing some youthful residents.

He added that meetings were then called to discuss strategy. "It won't be long before we start suing them (the police)," Weary concluded.

GSU study laments disparity in grad income

By SANDY BOGART

Graduate student underdogs in the race for financial support include arts students, women, and part-time students, according to an incomes study commissioned by the Graduate Students' Union.

Lesley Towers, author of the report, found that "there is a significant discrepancy between the arts divisions and the science divisions in support levels." Fewer arts students receive assistantships, she continued, but tend to get more money for them.

GSU vice-president Stephan Kogitz said Monday that the findings were significant because, up until this report, data on graduate students' incomes, both amount and sources, "has simply not been available."

The recently formed Graduate Assistants' Association needed the information, he added, to know what action to take regarding graduate assistants' wages. The GAA, which the GSU hopes will be certified as a bargaining agent for teaching assistants, is pressing for a policy of equal pay for equal work in both arts and science divisions, and in the various departments.

The report, to be published in mid-April, also found that while the median total income for graduate students is $4,000-5,000, there are still "24 per cent of full-time students (who) receive no support whatsoever from university or government sources. Thirty per cent live on less than $3,000, while six per cent live on less than $1,000".

As a result, the report recommends that "the University of Toronto move toward a guaranteed minimum support level for all graduate students." Since the Ontario Student Award Plan (OSAP) considers approximately $3,000 a minimum for a single graduate student living in Toronto, the report recommends "a $3,000 minimum plus tuition support level."

Further recommendations suggest the School of Graduate Studies "should investigate additional sources of support" for arts students, and that "university-wide standards on rates of pay, hours of working, and working conditions should be established for all GAs."

Kogitz explained that research grants were in part responsible for the greater amount of money available to science students. He claimed that for arts students "there is really nothing equal to the National Research Council and Medical Research Council grants".

He cited this as the reason for more Ontario Graduate Fellowships being necessary in the arts divisions. The OGF budget itself has been cut from five to three million dollars in the last four years.

Towers also found that, "in general, women receive fewer assistantships and grants" and that there are fewer women GAs in all divisions. She recommends in the report that "a program to ensure equal opportunities for grants, assistantships, etc. for women should be established by the School of Graduate Studies."

The report further indicates that "Canadians receive fewer assistantships than do landed immigrant or visa students." Only 43 per cent of Canadian graduate students receive GAs, compared to 57 per cent of students with landed immigrant status, and 44 per cent of those holding student visas. "Canadians do tend to receive more money," the report adds.

No recommendation is made in regard to this particular finding.

MA students suffer from the financing disparities as well; according to the report, there is "a dearth of support" for MA students, compared with those working toward a PhD, particularly in the arts divisions.

Part-time students, as well, are not given much support. Of the 436 part-time students (not including educational theory students, most of whom fit this category) only 41 receive support from the university, the report states.

Towers said these students contend that "they were forced into their position (i.e. as part-time) because of insufficient university support" and that "once they were part-time, they were excluded from the grants which were given to most students."

She therefore recommended a review of the awards policy for part-time graduate students.

"Awards based on academic merit are not open to part-time students," she stressed.

The report's information was gathered from questionnaires distributed to over 6,500 graduate students. Slightly more than half of the full-time students at SGS responded.

Survival means feeling

By MARK BOHNEN

"I fell ambiguous talking about survival," said Simon Dejung last week, introducing a seminar on the city and the neighbourhood. "Survival is a felt thing involving how you share your feelings with others."

A Vancouver community worker on a LIP grant, Dejung helped establish a community craft factory, medical clinic, and food co-op. His craft factory has supplied work for unemployed potters.

"Sociologists note the lack of community in our society, as social forces and technology are increasing alienation and fragmentation," he said, addressing a few dozen people at New College's Wilson Hall.

"Necessities are created for people. They live their lives arranged. . . . The monster creates spaces for people in an iron-tight way. Society creates needs, he said, by remarking "the self" in society's own image.

Dejung noted that education thus produces a peculiar situation. "We expect more things than the system can deliver. . . . Should we continue accepting things, and try to achieve happiness through an individual job effort. . . . or collectively try getting outside things?"

Most people have difficulty adjusting to a communal life style alternative, according to Dejung. Many are conditioned to be individualistic; their situation demands a creative effort to seek "new spaces, attitudes, and ways of relating."

University of Waterloo sociologist Jim Harding stressed the need to discuss personal experience. "Unless we question from our own predicaments, we don't get the knowledge to survive."

Discussing his own experience on a farm commune, he noted that "country communes fragment, as attempts at survival, into couples and transient individuals."

Many of his friends who expected group sex became disillusioned because there wasn't any, he said. Laziness and self-absorption of members hastened the break-up of his commune.

"I now believe that probably the family unit is the basic one." He added that an ideal community should not exceed 5,000.

Dejung, however, replied that city life could be less impersonal than generally thought. He recalled an undeveloped beach in Vancouver, where people bathed nude — the atmosphere was very warm, he said.

Paul Esseau sought a community model that would accommodate shifting relationships. He recalled a commune where partners related after they broke up. "There was a base of continuity with the kids," he said.

Dejung sought a flexible community accommodating temporary inhabitants. "The individual uses the facilities for a period, but continuity lies with the people who use it."

He envisioned a community kitchen, a people's garage, operated and owned on a block level in a city.

One person complained that no concrete issues were raised in the discussion.

"I can't spend the whole year working on my own space. Meanwhile spaces in the city are being destroyed. . . . Or is it (the discussion) merely an excuse for alternate culture people to come and gaze at each other's neighbourhoods?"

Most Canadian studies frivolous — Symons

By JOHN CAMPBELL

The chairman of a university commission on Canadian studies said last Wednesday that "the country is littered with Mickey Mouse courses called Canadian studies".

The Massey College session, part of a year-long investigation sponsored by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, was held to solicit information and opinions from U of T academics on "teaching and research in studies relating to Canada at Canadian universities."

A "fantastic disservice" to legitimate academic study of Canada's problems and achievements has been caused by frivolous courses, said chairman Thomas Symons, adding that "repeatedly, Canadian studies courses have been misused this way."

There was some speculation that lack of seriousness in the treatment of Canadian studies may be the function of a prejudice against indigently produced literature.

Communications theory guru Marshall McLuhan told the AUCC commission that the existence of such prejudice is not peculiar to Canada. Until the 20th century, said McLuhan, a St. Mike's English professor, Americans and Britons held the study of their own country's authors "beneath contempt".

Now, young people are "ashamed to speak their own language," he said.

The session also expressed concern for the role of the French language as part of Canadian studies.

Symons, who last year was a one-man commissioner on French-language education, noted that "despite all the national interest in bilingualism and an array of programs to encourage it, there has been a steady downward trend in the number of Anglophones involved in French studies and who make use of French in their regular reading".

Citing Ontario enrolment figures which show that the number of students opting for French in Grades 9 and 10 have dropped 24 per cent in the last two years, he said, "A major barrier of the undergraduate to take Canadian studies is the requirement many colleges have to have a reading knowledge in French".

He said he didn't think the declining enrolment was the result of "backlash", but rather that the students felt they could not measure up to the higher standards of French-speaking ability implied by the new emphasis on bilingualism.

The audience of less than a score chuckled at English professor Robin Harris' remark that the commission should be at least as concerned about students' ability to speak and write in their first language, (English), as it is in their ability to handle French.

Harris, until last year Inns College principal, linked some students' inability to use English effectively to the fact that "English is not a required subject at this university".

The old honours program, he argued, in which students were required to specialize after first year, provided "expert" instruction in different, but related, disciplines.

Extending his argument for gathering separate disciplines in a unified approach, he urged the commission to recommend the creation of "programs" in Canadian studies, rather than specific courses.

Symons, Trent University president until last summer, expressed shock that Canadians are unprepared to deal adequately with projects having national impact, such as the Mackenzie Valley pipeline and the James Bay power project, and dealt extensively with the subject himself.

Characterizing the problem as one of "applied Canadian studies", Symons, last year's Council of Ontario Universities chairman, criticized Canadian universities for failing to mobilize interest and resources around these issues.

"It is painfully obvious," the unsuccessful Conservative federal election candidate said, referring to the James Bay project, "that even preliminary studies haven't been done".

He quoted former U of T geographer Kenneth Hare, now a science advisor to the federal government, as saying that "no basic ecological studies" have been done on the project. Such studies, Hare estimates, would take five years, at which time the dam system is expected to be half completed.

Symons said that "absolutely uninhibited inquiry" is needed in such cases, and he doubted that industry and government studies would fall into that category.

Forestry professor D.V. Love agreed with the chairman that lack of Canadian studies in the educational system has hampered the country's ability to cope with national problems.

He said that although he felt the university "is just beginning to feel its responsibility in this area", it is not, in his opinion, making sufficient preparations for the day when our non-renewable resources are depleted.

Symons noted there has been a "sudden outburst" of interest in Canada in the U.S., Britain and Western Europe. The room rang with laughter when he said the commission has discovered a "massive program" of Canadian studies in Algeria, and another in Havana.

What on earth is AOSC?

Among other things, it's a little house in Toronto that is the rock bottom place to buy travel.

AOSC stands for Association of Student Councils, a non-profit organization owned and operated by the student bodies of 60 Canadian campuses.

As a student who may be thinking about going somewhere sometime, you are eligible for all kinds of special privileges and services you probably don't even know about.

You see, AOSC's principal function is to make available to students the best, most economical travel arrangements possible.

The idea is to provide a service, not make a buck.

And it shows.

You're offered the lowest dependable airfares available, on 40 charters flying between April 30 and October 5. For example — jet Toronto to London for $86 one way, or $155 return; Vancouver to London from $225 return or $125 one way.

Through AOSC's affiliation with the international network of student organizations, you have access to another 5,000 special flights originating all over the world.

All in all, this results in some fairly incredible deals.

Say, for example, you wanted to fly Toronto—Hong Kong return. A normally-routed ticket would take you westward and allow one stopover... for about $1,200. AOSC can fly you the long way, through Europe, with stopovers, for $600.

Such fare savings of up to 75% make your flying a dirt cheap proposition.

AOSC also offers a wide variety of land arrangements, all specially designed for students, all ridiculous bargains.

For example, you can spend 22 days in Turkey for $235... sail the Greek Islands for a week on $54... or go on a 72 day camping safari from London to Katmandu, 10,000 miles, for about $400.

If you're thinking of travelling, there is more you should know about. A whole lot more: lists of student restaurants and hotels, Eurail pass deals, special car-leasing arrangements, overseas job opportunities, the International Student Card...

AOSC. It's your travel bureau. Use it.

Why not pick up more specific information from your student council office.

U.S. academics dominate Canadian ivory towers

An awareness of American domination of Canada has grown in recent years. It is a commonplace that economically, politically, culturally, Canada is under the suffocating hegemony of the United States.

There is much less agreement as to what, if anything, can be done to reverse this state of affairs, or indeed, whether anything should be done.

But, certainly, among those who think that this problem is in fact a problem, there is a consensus that something must be done soon, before the takeover is complete.

Especially disturbing to a great many people is the foreign domination of Canadian universities — the cultural and ideological centres of society, the focal point for creativity, experimentation and discussion.

The university may have been overrated as simply a culturally significant force. Equally importantly, it has a powerful economic impact, an impact that affects the entire society, while the cultural and ideological contributions it makes filter down much more gradually.

Since Canada's economy is controlled by American interests, our universities have become geared to the production of trained technicians and professionals for a branch plant economy, in which capitalist and imperialist priorities dominate.

There is less need for scientists and engineers on a per capita basis in this country than in the U.S., because employment opportunities are fewer in the branch plant than in the metropolis. It is probably significant that the greatest fee increases resulting from the recent university cutbacks in Ontario hit the professional faculties. Canada, with a less developed industrial structure, and more emphasis on raw materials, simply does not need technicians to the same extent as the developed United States.

Thus, in the academic year 1970-71, Canadian students made up just 47 per cent of ME degree students in engineering and 37 per cent of the PhD enrolment.

Too often, the question is simply posed as one detrimental to the Canadian people. But this is misleading. Some Canadian people — specifically the Canadian bourgeoisie — benefit materially and significantly from American domination of the Canadian economy. Even a junior partnership in a going imperial concern is nothing to be sneered at. So the Canadian state and the Canadian capitalist class has, for the most part, complied with this domination, accepted its terms, and reaped somewhat limited, but still major, benefits.

Domination of Canadian universities is just one — very important — facet of this mutually agreeable deal.

The Canadian bourgeoisie has not cooperated with the American one because it is totally weak, decrepit, or defunct. (Though weakness has played a role.) It has displayed considerable adeptness at are sometimes posed, however: Canadian professors can be villains just as easily as Americans can.

imperialist exploitation itself. But it, with its main interests in banking and transportation, has seen its interests as bound up with those of the United States.

Canadian capitalists both invest in Latin America and the U.S. and welcome American branch plants to Canada. They both exploit other countries and aid other countries in exploiting Canada.

Since Canadian capitalism has benefitted from its close interaction with American capitalism, Canadian liberals have not hesitated in embracing the American model of capitalist development, American concepts of freedom and "social justice", American pragmatism and empiricism, etc.

The Canadian liberal academic establishment has been practically void of any original contributions to political, scientific, or intellectual thought generally and has failed to undertake any critical analysis of Canadian capitalism or arrive at any understanding of Canada's colonial relationship to the United States. The notoriety accorded to the few exceptions only proves the rule.

This is hardly surprising, of course. The ideas of American liberal capitalism have been accepted in one form or another in most of the capitalist world. They are accepted in Canadian universities not simply because Americans teach there, or because the U.S. dominates Canada, but because they are capitalist ideas, and Canada is a capitalist country.

Opposition to this domination has come from two (somewhat overlapping) sources: sentimental liberal nationalists, and leftists of various persuasions.

Liberals such as those in the Committee for an Independent Canada seem to have concluded that their American partners in exploitation are taking more than their share of the pie and that they are quite capable of exploiting the Canadian people on their own, thank you.

Thus, there is the ideology that there is something uniquely special and good about "Canadian culture" and the "Canadian way of thinking" that has been buried by the big bad U.S. and that only has to be uncovered in order for Canadians to again enjoy their own pure, special way of living.

While there is certainly some Canadian culture worth preserving, the important fact is that Canada has always been dominated by some form of imperialism, either British or American. There is little point in looking to the past for values to preserve: the Canadian past has been as ugly, in many ways (though different — and it is important for Canadians to understand their own history if they are to move beyond it) as the American. Nor is there a Canadian ideology that has been superseded by American ideology. The general outlines are only too similar. Only the details differ.

If Canada is to have a different culture, and different values, ideals and outlook than the U.S., then these have largely to be created. An independent capitalist Canada like that advocated by the C.I.C., is an impossibility, for there is no basis of differentiation strong enough to overcome the homogenizing influences.

In the universities, their approach cannot lead to the development of a different culture and ideology, only to the hiring of Canadians to teach the same set of ideas. At best, the examples, the details, might be Canadian. But the ideas, the general system, would remain those of American liberal capitalists. The struggle hardly seems worth the bother except for the Canadian graduate students currently having difficulty competing for jobs at Canadian universities with their American counterparts, whose ideas they predominantly share.

The noisiest 'left-wing' response, meanwhile, has come from the Canadian Liberation Movement. Although calling themselves socialists, they advocate simply an 85 per cent Canadian quota campaign, reducing the whole question to nationalities and percentages.

This, too, was the level of debate in the University of Toronto Waffle group in 1971. A team of students was actually sent out to do a quick survey of some 100 students to find out what they thought would be the correct figure for a quota. The CLM, meanwhile, stuck to its 85 per cent figure. This leaves only 15 per cent for foreign professors. Presumably an 85 per cent quota makes the liberation of Canadian universities possible, while an 80 per cent quota would not allow it to happen.

This approach totally ignores other considerations. It should be obvious, for example, that a Canadian citizenship does not guarantee that its holder knows anything about Canada, has a 'Canadian perspective', let alone that he is opposed to American domination of Canada or Canadian universities. American radicals coming to teach in Canada are often obviously more desirable to have.

Indeed, Canadians have always been importantly instrumental in furthering American domination of the universities. It is they who introduced the latest ideological mystifications developed at U.S. universities, and brought in Americans to teach them. More recently, Canadian students have been going to the U.S. in large numbers to get degrees. They come back to teach after receiving their degrees, joining the large numbers of American professors who have come up to enjoy the tax breaks and peddle the same ideas. Canadian students then learn the approaches of the empire from Canadian professors in Canadian universities. No quota campaign can touch this kind of 'continentalization'.

Nevertheless, the desire to end U.S. domination of Canadian universities touches an important problem. Clearly the state of affairs in the universities is not a desirable one and needs to be changed.

What is needed is — especially in the social sciences — academics who are critical of the status quo, and who can contribute to an understanding of social realities, rather than the mystification of those realities.

For social change to take place in Canada, it is necessary that study be done on Canadian problems, that intellectuals and students begin to develop detailed knowledge about Canada, and the ideas and approaches necessary to eliminate the status quo.

American cultural domination is a factor not only in the universities, but in everyday life.

It means, again especially in the social sciences, that the process of continentalization (the de-emphasis of Canadian content and material) must be combated, that there be a conscious effort to reverse the trend.

This must necessarily mean a deliberate bias, a policy of consciously discriminating in favour of Canadian content, courses, and programs in order that resources be devoted to Canadian studies. A setting of priorities in budget, in hiring, in creating courses, in research grants, would be called for.

At the same time, this should not mean ignoring 'non-Canadian' content. For social change to occur in Canada, Canadians must understand world conditions, and must also have the technical expertise to man the professions, free of foreign interference and 'professional' biases.

Naturally, the economic, political and academic elite that control Canada's universities have no intention of agreeing to anything of the sort.

But in an era when liberal co-optation has chosen to give students greater roles in decision-making in many universities, students, and their allies on the faculties, can help to force the academic establishment to move in such a direction. Rather than accepting the aimless co-optation that is so often their fate on departmental committees, they can push for certain specific objectives.

They can work, on curriculum committees, for courses that provide a critical, radical analysis of society, especially Canadian society, and that deal with Canada, the country they must know and understand if they are to change it.

In staffing decisions, they can establish a set of priorities. The first priority should go to radical professors who have done work on Canadian society. The next priority should go to other radicals. Next in hiring preference could be Canadians who are not radical. (Any information about Canada, even if covered in reactionary ideology, is better than none at all for those who want to transform it. And there is no need to pay unemployment benefits to Canadian PhD's while American graduates pick up the education tax dollars.)

Of course, students do not have the power to implement this as a consistent policy. But by making it their own priority they can intervene at least occasionally to alter the balance of forces in the universities — not in terms of nationality, except incidentally—but toward universities that can help in the process of bringing about a revolutionary transformation of Canadian society.

Bookworm's goulash: a taster's choice of the good, bad and indifferent

Space and time necessarily dictate that every year, some books will go unreviewed. For some, this is a well-deserved fate. For others, it is an unfortunate but unavoidable exigency.

Herewith, a brief resumé of at least some of this year's books that should not go unmentioned.

Irving Abella's Nationalism, Communism, and Canadian Labour, U of T Press, $4.50, just released, is an indispensable study of the politics of Canadian unionism, from 1935 to 1956. Abella traces the two themes which he says dominated the interaction of the Canadian Congress of Labour and the CIO in Canada: "the internal threat from the Communists and the external threat from the Americans".

Much of the book deals with these struggles being fought out among the leadership of the unions. Abella justifies this by saying that the themes he deals with were "irrelevant" to rank and file unionists. "Only at times when his own well-being is at stake—during strikes and collective bargaining negotiations—does he take more than a passing interest in the activities of his union."

It is unclear whether Abella thinks this is necessarily true, or whether he thinks it was the case because of the structure (or other conditions) of the unions he describes. Indeed, on the evidence available, it is questionable whether his point is true at all. Some of the facts that he gives of rank-and-file political activity certainly seem to point to other conclusions.

The study makes it clear that the CIO did not come to Canada to unionize the backward Canadians. Rather, Canadian workers themselves were responsible for most organizing activity, and had to drag a reluctant CIO across the border.

Abella shows that Canadian Communists did much of organizing work for the Canadian union movement, thus debunking the myth that Communists specialized in taking over unions created by someone else.

The purge of the Communists was largely due to the fanatically anti-communist pro-CCF forces in the CCL, he shows.

The blame for the domination of Canadian unionism by the U.S.-dominated "internationalists", however, can be laid at the doorsteps of both the Communists and the CCFers. The Communists adhered to a rigid "internationalism" that amounted to suicide on their part, given the hawkish anti-red nature of the American labour bureaucrats to whom they were subjecting Canadian unions. The CCFers, meanwhile, found valuable allies in these hacks in their rivalry with the CP, and cultivated ties with them, no matter how unequal.

An important book.

A must, even at the price ($7.50) is FORUM: Canadian Life and Letters 1920-1970: Selections from The Canadian Forum, edited by J.L. Granatstein and Peter Stevens (U. of T. Press).

For fifty years the Forum has been just that: a forum for Canadian literary and political expression. Founded in 1920 by some students and faculty at the University of Toronto it struggled through its early years with a low circulation and frequently a deficit. In 1935, it was taken over by the League for Social Reconstruction, the "brains trust" of the CCF. A circulation of 1,000 to 2,000 in the 1930's was doubled by the war years. During this period, it was the sounding board for a good deal of the social criticism of the academics who shaped much of the ideology of Canadian social democracy. When the LSR was disbanded in the early 1940's an editorial board took control.

Perhaps the most consistently enjoyable part of the Forum has always been its poetry. It has encouraged unknown young writers, and has published many of Canada's major poets. Earle Birney, A.M. Klein, Irving Layton, James Reaney, Milton Acorn, Dorothy Livesay, and Alden Nowlan, and many others, can be found in its back issues.

The selection is also fascinating as a mirror of at least one current of development in Canadian political thought. Frank Scott moves from social critic to liberal constitutionalist in its pages.

Frank Underhill, seen by some in the 1930's as "the dean of a sinister communist conspiracy among the nation's professors", published much of his work in the Forum. His opinion of Mackenzie King (always a major object of attention in the Forum) moved, over the years, from considering him a manipulator in a phony two-party system which provided a "screen behind which the controlling interests pull the strings to manipulate the Punch and Judy who engage in mock combat," a man who "towered up like a mountain in the House of Commons because of the flatness of the landscape opposite him", to seeing him as "the representative Canadian, the typical Canadian, the essential Canadian, the ideal Canadian, the Canadian as he exists in the mind of God." Economic nationalism, too, is a consistently popular topic in the Forum.

One of the more fascinating contributions on this issue comes from the pen of Mel Watkins in 1964. Reviewing a book by Harry Johnson, the continentalist economist now commuting between Chicago and the London School of Economics, but formerly a Canadian—presently considered the arch-enemy of Canadian economic nationalists—Watkins blasts "misguided economic nationalism." He says "Professor Johnson takes Canadian nationalism too seriously. It is, after all, only economic. Though deplorable, it is a relatively harmless variety compared to much of what we see in the world today... more empirical work is necessary on the nature and causes of Canadian economic nationalism in the hope that we can exercise this devil from our midst".

A local group, The Labour Education Project, 92 Bedford Road, Toronto 5, is distributing a pamphlet entitled For Canadian Workers: Lessons From Italy. The booklet deals with organizing experiences of Italian workers, especially at the mammoth FIAT works, in trying to bring about workers' control.

Their militancy reflects a determination to bypass both the bureaucratized Communist Party and the tame, bought-off union hierarchies. Mass struggle for radical goals has been a feature of Italian politics since 1969.

A preface ties the new tactics and organizational forms from Italy to the Canadian scene where the docile international unions, the senile vanguard parties, and the liberals-in-a-hurry in the NDP have proven inadequate against attacks on workers' living standards and the widespread use of strike-breaking companies. When new strategies and forms of organization are obviously necessary, contributions such as this pamphlet are valuable. The emergence of non-sectarian groups such as the Labour Education Project and Windsor's Community Resource Centre are hopeful signs as well.

Another contribution comes from an interesting current of political activity: radical Christianity (a most welcome antidote to the mind-fucking mystifications of that current plague, the Jesus Freaks.)

A 56-page booklet, Chile versus the Corporations, A call for Canadian Support, comes from two progressive Toronto groups that still maintain religious ties, The Latin American Working Group (Box 6300, Station A, Toronto) and the Development Education Centre (200 Bedford Road, Toronto). It sketches corporate (including Canadian) involvement in Chile, the attempts of the Allende government to reverse this domination and the massive repression against Chile instituted by the capitalist countries.

Useful both as a brief guide to the Chilean situation, and for the philosophy it adheres to: "The position of Christ was in no way ambiguous: his was an option for the poor and against anyone or any system that stood in the way of man's liberation. The present international economic system is a situation of sin, and as such it must be rejected."

I.F. Stone's third collection of articles, Polemics and Prophecies, 1967-1970, has come out in paperback. (Vintage, $3.25). Like the first two volumes, The Haunted Fifties and especially In a Time of Torment, it is a superb collection of masterful journalism. With an uncanny sense of news Stone ferrets out facts, many of them in little-known reports of the U.S. government itself, that damn the holders of power. While his analysis is not always perfect (whose is?), his pieces on the two-party system ("When Two Equals One"), The Vietnam War ("The Monster with Little Brain and No Heart"), Richard Nixon ("The Evil of Banality"), militarism, social measures ("Billions for Missiles and Pennies for Poverty"), disarmament ("A Century of Futility"), the Mideast, and other topics, are invaluable. I can't think of a better regular interpreter of the current scene than Stone. When it comes to powerful radical journalism, Stone has a lot to teach to, say, The Varsity.

Also of current interest is Ernest Mandel's Decline of the Dollar: A Marxist View of the Monetary Crisis. (Monad Book, Pathfinder Press, N.Y. $1.95). Useful for a deeper understanding of what you read about in the business pages of The Globe and Mail.

Another major marxist writer, Paul Sweezy, has published a collection of essays, (Modern Capitalism and Other Essays, Modern Reader, Monthly Review Press, $2.15). Sweezy, writing in the pages of Monthly Review, a magazine out of New York which he edits, has long been contributing insightful (and sometimes controversial) interpretations of the state of modern capitalism.

From the excellent Pelican Latin American Library, there are three more volumes: Servants of God or Masters of Men; The Story of a Capuchin Mission in Amazonia ($2.50); by Victor Daniel Bonilla; Brazil: The People and the Power, ($1.65) by Miguel Arraes; and Cambao — The Yoke: The Hidden Face of Brazil, ($1.50) by Francisco Juliao.

Bonilla traces the history of a Columbian Indian tribe facing a Catholic missionary community, but sees much larger implications in the subject matter: "the everlasting story of the West against the Indian." "That civilization (ie, the West), having exploited the Indian for centuries, and having taken a large part of his culture away from him without replacing it with anything at all of value, is still pursuing its work of pillage and destruction. And it always does it in the name of what it holds as its most sacred principles: democracy, progress, 'acculturation' of 'primitives', Christian charity, and the expansion of the reign of God in Indo-America."

The Arraes book is a study of the economy and recent political developments of Brazil. A lengthy chapter on the Brazilian economy is interesting as an example of the impact of imperialism on a "Third World" nation.

Francisco Juliao is an exiled member of the Peasant League in northeastern Brazil, writing a personalized account of the league's struggles against the intolerable oppression that Brazilian peasants suffer.

Attacks from the right on Pierre Trudeau's Quebec policy are hard to come by nowadays, or so I had thought. But The Honourable Joseph T. Thorson has effectively squelched that theory.

In Wanted: A Single Canada (McClelland & Stewart, $6.95), Thorson, President of the Single Canada League, natters in rather poor English, about the evils of bi-culturalism and bilingualism. "How can there be national unity in Canada," he bristles "as long as the Quebec leaders insist that the integrity of the French-Canadian nation must be maintained and that French Canadians must remain French?"

How indeed? He advocates a Canada based on a partnership between individuals — a perfect way for ensuring the hegemony of the dominant culture and the disappearance of cultural minorities. His blindness to the nature of nations is further evident in the fact that he argues—solely from constitutional and legal grounds — that Quebec has no "right" to self-determination or separation. This, of course, is hardly the point. The constitutions of a colonizer rarely contain provisions for the right of the colonized to secede.

Attempting to capitalize on Buckminster Fuller's fame is Buckminster Fuller to Children of Earth (Ooubleday & Company Inc, $4.35).

It's a slim little paperback full of arty pictures of trees ("Nature is so beautiful... How she is working is so beautiful...—the entire text of one page) and children ("A child plays with balls that are round like the earth and touches whole things"). On the facing page of each picture there are short quotes from Fuller, intended, no doubt, to appear as pregnant profundities, but coming across more often as trivial banalities.

Some of the pictures are nice but the phony self-seriousness of the format detracts from them. Not worth the price.

of facts, but it is questionable whether the book really provides a "perspective". Certainly it can't and doesn't provide all the information about the pill that simply doesn't exist because insufficient research has been done on it. To provide that information, women taking the pill today are acting as unwitting guinea pigs.

Jim Christy's The New Refugees: American Voices in Canada (Peter Martin Associates, $7.95) is a collection of short essays by Americans exiled in Canada. Predictably, it is quite uneven in quality. The best pieces are Looking at children from another perspective is the truth & other stories, by Terrence Heath, (Anansi, $2.50). It consists of short passages of very tight descriptive prose, each outlining a different incident, many of them childhood (especially boyhood experiences) from prairie life.

Many of them are violent or ugly, painful to read about in a way that descriptions of adult violence never quite match. The starkness of the writing style, with its predominance of verbs and nouns and its absence of softening adjectives or subordinate clauses, adds to the gut reaction it evokes. It captures the matter-of-fact unfeelingness of boys, the cruelty that comes more from curiosity for the results rather than from a conscious desire to do harm.

Also captured are the ugliness of adult-inflicted experiences, as well as some situations that are quite funny, or simply the taking in of new facts from the external world.

I can't decide whether I like this book or not, but it did hold my attention.

A book on a timely topic is James Paupst's The Pill: A True Perspective (Clarke Irwin, $1.75). It's a concise guide to the problems associated with the pill: mood changes, weight gain, infertility, headaches, etc. It contains a lot those describing experienced in America itself: the Army, the family scene back home. The contribution by Mark Trent is especially good. The worst are generally those giving impressions of Canada — these combine gee-whiz travelogue with naive political assessments. That sort of stuff may have anthropological interest, but not much else to recommend it. Also disappointing are most of the interviews. These seem to be unedited, an approach popular among lazy journalists, but really indefensible.

Still, it's an interesting book to read through. It's not rich in literary gems, but there is the odd prize to stumble across. And that makes the book a worthwhile experience—though maybe not worth $7.95 to get.

Catering to the peace-and-love, back-to-the-farm generation is Communism in America: The Place Just Right, by Elinor Lander Horwitz (Lippincott, $5.25).

It's a simplistic, superficial history of utopian experiment in the U.S. It looks a lot like a children's book: big print, facts without analysis, platitudinous conclusions. It might appeal to some of today's hippie love freaks, however: it's got a bright, posterized cover, peace symbol and all. And it's washable.

A wartime glance

With a great deal of fanfare, the Canadian public is being made aware that 1973 marks the centennial of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Glowing reports of the Mounties, who always get their man and whose image is that of the world's proudest, best, and best-known police force, are appearing everywhere in the media.

But there is another side to the Mounties. The low morale in the force has already been sensationally exposed by former RCMP corporal Jack Ramsey in an article for Maclean's magazine.

And, next month, two Saskatchewan writers, Caroline and Lorne Brown, are publishing another part of the story: An Unauthorized History of the RCMP, published by James, Lewis, & Samuel. The book, an excerpt from which appears below, deals with the anti-labour activity, the infiltration into political groups and onto campuses, and other less well-known activities of the force whose motto is, rather fittingly, when translated into English, "Maintain the Right".

By CAROLINE and LORNE BROWN

In 1904 the name North West Mounted Police was changed to Royal North West Mounted Police in recognition of service to the Empire.

In the next few years the Force underwent a period of expansion. The West was settled very rapidly in the period from 1900 to 1914. In 1905 Saskatchewan and Alberta achieved provincial status. When these new provinces retained the RNWMP to act in the capacity of provincial police rather than establishing new forces of their own, it looked as though the future of the Force was assured in the West.

The Eastern provinces had provincial police forces and the Dominion Police. The Dominion Police had some jurisdiction throughout Canada though it was concentrated in the East. They specialized in enforcing federal acts and also operated as political police to keep an eye on "subversives" and other enemies of the prevailing system.

For the first couple of years of World War I, both the Dominion Police and the RNWMP were kept extra busy. Social unrest, which had been growing as the country industrialized before 1914, increased with the strains brought on by the war. From the beginning there had been only lukewarm support for the war in Quebec and among certain sections of the labour and agrarian movements in English Canada. This significant minority increased in numbers and was further alienated by the way the war was conducted at home and abroad.

On the home front profiteering, gross corruption, outrageous price increases and deteriorating working and living conditions became a national scandal.

On the fighting front incompetent leadership and heavy casualties, sometimes caused, as in the case of the Ross rifle, by shoddy equipment supplied by friends of the government, caused much bitterness.

The government did very little to curb profiteering and corruption, but a great deal to suppress critics of the war effort by using the War Measures Act to deny them their civil rights. Critics of the war and the way it was conducted included most Québécois and large numbers of reformers, socialists and pacifists in the trade union and farm movements across the country. The government attempted to silence such critics by means of strict censorship, internment, police harassment and propaganda branding critics of the war effort as unpatriotic and pro-German.

The real crunch came with the imposition of military conscription under the Military Service Act in 1917. Conscription was anathema in Québec and was opposed by a large and militant minority elsewhere. The federal government relied upon troops to maintain control in Québec when the enforcement of conscription was met with demonstrations, riots and street fights.

The government took dictatorial measures to combat draft evasion and criticism of conscription throughout Canada. Section 16 of the Military Service Act empowered the government, with the approval of the central appeal judge, to suppress any publication containing matters thought to hinder the operation of the act. This, along with regulations under the War Measures Act, made life extremely risky for anyone in militant opposition to conscription. That the authorities were prepared to use their increased power is indicated by the thousands of arrests. During 1917 and the first three months of 1918, 3,895 people were arrested on charges connected with anti-conscriptionist activity. Some received fairly lengthy prison sentences. A few were less fortunate and were seriously injured or killed while evading the draft or participating in anti-conscription demonstrations. One case of what passed for "justice" involved Albert (Ginger) Goodwin, a past president of the British Columbia Federation of Labour and an organizer for the Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers in 1918. Goodwin had been called before a conscription board in 1917 and placed in class D, that is, unfit for military service because of his health. Later, while Goodwin was leading a strike of smelters in Trail, he was by a strange coincidence ordered to report for immediate active service. Like hundreds of other opponents of the war, Goodwin went into hiding in the wilderness. On July 26, 1918, Goodwin was shot dead in the bush by officers of the Dominion Police who were searching for draft dodgers. This outrage provoked a one-day general strike throughout much of British Columbia. During the strike soldiers organized by city businessmen ransacked the Vancouver Labour Temple and badly beat at least two labour leaders.

It fell to the RNWMP during the early part of the war to assist the Dominion Police and other forces in maintaining internal order and harassing opponents of the war effort. The RNWMP were still mainly in the Western provinces, though occasionally they loaned personnel to the Dominion Police for use in other parts of Canada. In the Western provinces they carried out investigations in districts where there were large numbers of "enemy aliens" and patrolled the international boundary with the United States. The United States was a neutral country until 1917 and the authorities feared, apparently quite unnecessarily, that German-Americans might make raids into Canada for the purpose of sabotage.

The term "enemy alien" was used to refer to residents of Canada who had emigrated from countries controlled by Germany and Austria-Hungary. This included a large part of central and south-eastern Europe and, after the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, the term was broadened to include as well all immigrants from countries and territories that had belonged to Czarist Russia and were to become part of the Soviet Union. The so-called "enemy aliens" numbered in excess of 200,000 in the Prairie provinces alone. They suffered considerable harassment during the war by the authorities and the superpatriots among the public. Hundreds were interned on the grounds that they endangered or might endanger the war effort. Besides watching "enemy aliens", the RNWMP kept any eye on socialists, pacifists and trade union activists who were actively opposed to the war and assisted the authorities in enforcing regulations under the War Measures Act. It was during this period that Commissioner A. B. Perry constructed a network of plainclothes detectives and undercover men who were to comprise part of the Security and Intelligence branch (S and I), which was to become notorious in later years as Canada's secret police.

By 1917 the number of RNWMP on active duty in Canada had begun to dwindle significantly. Saskatchewan and Alberta established provincial police forces of their own and, with the United States' entry into the war, the obvious fact that the "enemy aliens" were causing no trouble, and the demand for reinforcements on the battlefield, the Force decided to allow many of its members to join the regular army. A special squadron of RNWMP was also formed in 1918 and sent to Siberia to fight for the reactionary forces in the Russian civil war.

During 1916 and 1917 there had been considerable talk of disbanding the RNWMP after the war and leaving policing entirely to the provinces and the Dominion Police. Many people failed to see the need for a semi-military mounted police force under federal auspices now that frontier conditions no longer existed and the whole country except for the sparsely settled North West Territories and Yukon had achieved provincial status. What saved the RNWMP from abolition as a force was intense industrial and social unrest at the end of World War I. Events during this period caused great anxiety in business and governmental circles, and the Mounted Police assured their own future by making themselves invaluable to the economic and political elite of the day.

The industrial unrest which had been increasing since 1914 reached unprecedented proportions by 1917. Rapid urbanization brought on by the quick growth of war industries caused a deterioration in working and living conditions. Inflationary price increases were an added burden on the poor. By 1917 there were more trade unionists than ever before and more people went on strike than in any previous year in Canadian history. The military conscription of manpower and more stringent enforcement of the War Measures Act added to the frustration of the trade union radicals. There were prolonged and militant strikes in 1918, including one which nearly developed into a general strike in Winnipeg. Unrest was especially widespread in Western Canada, where many trade unionists were not only critical of the economic system but also alienated from the more conservative Eastern leadership of the Trades and Labour Congress (TLC).

The federal government reacted to an unstable situation by imposing ever harsher measures, to the point where they increased the probability of a major explosion at the end of the war. The government stepped up secret police activities and appointed C.H. Cahan, a prominent corporation lawyer, to survey conditions throughout the country and recommend a course of action. The police found no evidence of a revolutionary conspiracy afoot, and Cahan reported that the unrest was due primarily not to radical agitators but to general disillusionment with the war, disgust at the performance of the federal government and deteriorating economic conditions: "I am convinced that the unrest now prevalent in Canada is due to the weakening of the moral purpose of the people to prosecute the war to a successful end; to the fact that people are becoming daily more conscious of the bloody sacrifices and irritating burdens entailed by carrying on the war and to the growing belief that the Union government is failing to deal effectively with the financial, industrial and economic problems growing out of the war which are, perhaps, incapable of any early satisfactory solution". (emphasis added)

The problems growing out of the war became more immediate after the armistice. The closing down of armament and munitions factories and the disbanding of a large army caused widespread unemployment and a generally depressed economy. Added to this was the fact that workers who had made sacrifices during the war now demanded the gains which had been postponed in the name of the war effort. Soldiers returning from the front also demanded jobs and the chance for a decent life after fighting "the war to make the world safe for democracy". Most of these people were to be sadly disappointed, and their disappointment was not long in turning to frustration and anger.

Unrest increased as the government failed to tackle the problems which Cahan had described as "incapable of an early satisfactory solution". To really tackle such problems would mean demanding concessions from the vested interests which had fattened on the war effort, and the government was not about to attempt such a solution. Since Cahan recognized this clearly, he recommended instead repressive measures designed to maintain order over a difficult period of post-war readjustment. The government established a Department of Public Safety with Cahan as director. Numerous Orders-in-Council were passed under the War Measures Act to provide for the following: (1) broadening the category described as "enemy alien" and requiring the registration of all such people, (2) severely restricting the right to strike, (3) prohibiting publications in 14 languages, (4) prohibiting the use of several foreign languages at public meetings, (5) declaring 14 different organizations to be illegal, including such moderate groups as the Social Democratic Party, and (6) allowing the authorities to declare any association unlawful. To implement these sweeping measures required greatly increased police activity, and during the last months of 1918 and early 1919 the federal government began to build up the strength of the RNWMP and assign to them many duties previously undertaken by the Dominion Police.

By the time a major showdown between capital and labour came in the form of the Winnipeg General Strike in May, 1919, the government and business community in Canada had become extremely frightened by growing labour radicalism. Western labour radicals had been busy laying plans for the organization of the One Big Union (OBU) a large industrial union which they hoped would eventually embrace all workers and struggle for the overthrow of the capitalist system as well as fight for immediate economic gains. The British Columbia Federation of Labour and many trade union councils and locals throughout the West endorsed the OBU idea and called for a major economic concessions, removal of restrictions on civil liberties and the release of political prisoners.

The Western Labour militants held a conference in Calgary in March, 1919, known as the Western Labour Conference and laid plans to hold a referendum in union locals throughout the West on the question of severing relations with international craft unions and forming the One Big Union. They agreed that if the results were encouraging, they would hold a conference later in the year for the founding of the OBU. They also expressed sympathy with the Bolshevik Revolution and threatened a general strike by June 1 if Canadian forces were not withdrawn from Russia.

All of these activities in Canada coupled with the recent revolution in Russia and revolutionary developments in other parts of Europe helped to create an uneasiness among Canada's ruling elite which bordered on hysteria and grossly exaggerated the possibility of an attempted revolution in this country.

Before the referendum on the OBU could be completed or any effective organization established the Winnipeg General Strike, under more moderate leadership than the OBU and with very limited aims, broke out on May 15. The events leading to the general strike began on May 1, when the workers in the building and metal trades struck on the issues of higher wages and the right to collective bargaining. The employers not only refused the wage demands but also refused to recognize the Metal Trades Council as the common bargaining agent of the unions. The unions took their case to the Winnipeg Trades and Labour Council, which conducted a referendum among its affiliates on the question of a general strike on the issues of collective bargaining and the need for general wage increases. The result was overwhelmingly in favour, and on May 15, 30,000 workers left their jobs, 12,000 of whom were not members of trade unions but who joined the strike spontaneously. The population of Winnipeg in 1919 was about 180,000; 30,000 strikers and their families therefore probably represented at least half of the population. The strikers included municipal, public utility and post office employees and even the city police.

The general strike paralyzed the entire city and the strikers found it necessary to direct their operations by means of a strike committee and a disciplined organization if they were to prevent general disorder and avoid unnecessary hardships to the population as a whole. The city police returned to work at the request of the Strike Committee in order to prevent looting and outbursts of vandalism and violence. Milk and bread deliveries were resumed and essential services like the city water works resumed limited operations by permission of the Strike Committee. The strike was conducted in an exceptionally peaceful manner, and this helped to gain wide public support in Winnipeg and other cities where there were several sympathetic strikes and talk of general walkouts. Indeed several of the strike leaders were pacifists who abhorred violence, and the rank-and-file were repeatedly warned to remain peaceful and beware of provocateurs who might attempt to provoke violent incidents as a means of discrediting the entire strike. For a time it appeared probable that the employers would have to yield to the workers' demands.

However, the forces of capital and the State soon united in a powerful combination to smash the general strike at all costs. All three levels of government, the business and professional communities and the press began a campaign designed to create an atmosphere of hysteria throughout the country by depicting the strike as the beginning of a bloody revolution engineered by the Bolsheviks and supporters of the OBU. A Citizens' Committee of 1,000 organized by professional and businessmen in Winnipeg to break the strike worked closely with government agencies, including the RNWMP. The Mounted Police did not act simply as the military arm of government but played an active role in the propaganda campaign as well. Commissioner Perry made public speeches denouncing the strike and specialized in fostering anti-labour sentiments among the farming population. On May 21 Perry appeared before the executive of the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association (SGGA) to describe the strike as a OBU conspiracy aimed at confiscating all private property and establishing a communist form of government. This type of official lying was soon paying dividends for the employers and the government. Some farm leaders joined the anti-labour crusade and J.B. Mueselmann, secretary of the SGGA, made the headlines on several occasions with dire predictions about a "red peril" threatening Canada.

As the propaganda campaign got underway throughout Canada, the attitude of government officials and some employers hardened towards the strikers. Early in the strike federal Minister of Labour Gideon Robertson gave the postal workers an ultimatum of returning to work or losing their jobs. When fewer than one-quarter returned, the government dismissed the rest and proceeded to recruit scabs. The Winnipeg City Council fired the regular police force, which had been doing an excellent job of maintaining order without resorting to violent tactics, after they refused to sign a "yellow dog" contract stipulating that they must not be associated with the trade union movement. The regular police were replaced by "specials" recruited with the help of the Citizens' Committee; some of these specials rode on horses donated by the T. Eaton Company. The council also fired all civic employees who refused to return to work and replaced them with scabs. The provincial government adopted the same policy towards employees of the publicly-owned telephone system.

The federal authorities seemed prepared to take a more militant anti-labour position even than many Winnipeg employers. Robertson was opposed in principle to any significant concessions to the strikers: "This is not an opportune time to make a declaration in favour of the principle of collective bargaining as it would be grasped as an excuse by the strikers to claim that they have forced the government and thereby proved the success of sympathetic strike." When it appeared that the metal employers were about to recognize collective bargaining and the strike might be settled on reasonable terms, acting Justice Minister Arthur Meighen cautioned against any settlement which might be interpreted as a victory for the strikers. It was obvious that the federal government was determined to defeat the strike as a lesson to labour across the country that general strikes and similar kinds of militant tactics could not succeed.

The RNWMP fit into the picture as a well-trained military force upon whom the authorities could absolutely rely. The RNWMP could also spy on the activities of the strikers and arrest strike leaders. That many regular soldiers would not do such jobs is obvious from the fact that a clear majority of returned soldiers in Winnipeg were supporters of the strike and, in fact, more militant than the civilian strikers. When the 27th Battalion arrived back in Winnipeg from overseas during the strike, only two members of the entire battalion volunteered for service in Winnipeg. The authorities thereupon promptly disbanded the battalion, and General Katchen, the Commanding Officer in Winnipeg, recruited volunteers instead for four militia units, knowing of course, that only men opposed to the strike would volunteer. The authorities also sent additional machine guns to Winnipeg surreptitiously, and made arrangements to demobilize a squadron of RNWMP returning from overseas in Winnipeg and place them at the disposal of Commissioner Perry. If soldiers in the regular army could not always be relied on to break civilian strikes, members of the Mounted Police with a long tradition of anti-labour activity, could.

Sonny & Brownie, Butterfield, tops

Paul Butterfield is one of the few white blues performers to have gained a high degree of acceptance from his black counterparts. Butterfield paid his dues on the streets of Chicago's south side where he learned how to play the harmonica and blues from such masters as Little Walter, Howlin' Wolf and Otis Rush.

Butter put together the first Paul Butterfield Blues Band (in 1965) with Elvin Bishop, Mark Naftalin, Jerome Arnold, Sam Lay and finally Mike Bloomfield, which was featured on the first of his Elektra albums playing raw, saw-tooth edged Chicago-style urban blues. In the seven albums that followed, the band underwent numerous personnel changes as well as explorations of various musical styles that included Eastern influences, jazz and rock. Eventually, the addition of a horn section played an integral role in the musical direction of the band.

Better Days is Butter's latest aggregation and is made up of Geoff Muldaur on vocals, slide guitar and piano, Ronnie Barron on keyboards, Bill Rich on bass, Amos Garrett on guitar and drummer Christopher Parker. The band's style is a mellow kind of funk that stresses the more polished elements of the blues.

Butter's voice has mellowed as much as his music so that his soothing vocals on "New Walkin' Blues" are in no way comparable to his raspy-throated treatment of the same song on the East-West album. Geoff Muldaur, a former member of Jim Kweskin's Jug Band, who was on the east coast, playing New York-style blues when Butter was just getting into his thing in Chicago, is probably one of the album's biggest influences.

Butterfield compositions are notably absent from the LP. Instead, there are songs by composers covering a wide spectrum of the blues. The styles range from the silky Ella Fitzgerald-a-la-big-band crooning of Muldaur in Percy Mayfield's "Please Send Me Someone to Love" to the gutsy gospel chanting in Nina Simone's "Nobody's Fault But Mine".

Better Days — a worthwhile addition to your collection.

Another form of blues, distinct from the slick New York variety or the raunchy, electric urban blues of the Chicago ghetto is represented by the folk blues of Sonny Terry & Brownie McGhee.

Sonny and Brownie, both in their sixties, have been playing together for about 30 years. This latest album, the first on A & M, is different than all the rest, because it uses a backup band that stresses percussion and often uses electric instruments. But the additions only seem to add to the magic of Terry and McGhee.

Brownie takes on most of the vocals and plays guitar, while Sonny plays harp. The music is infectious and well produced. Several of the backup artists were surprising, including such performers as Arlo Guthrie on guitar, John Hammond on slide guitar, John Mayall on guitar and harp, and Sugarane Harris on violin.

Some of the songs stray from the usual folk blues style. Tunes like Curtis Mayfield's "People Get Ready" and Sam Cooke's "Bring It On Home To Me" are unconventional for the duo but beautifully done.

One of the best songs is Randy Newman's "Sail Away" — a song about west talking the blacks in Africa into coming to America.

"White Boy Lost In The Blues" features Sonny, Brownie and John Mayall each taking verses while Mayall and Terry trade harp lines.

If I made up a list of the year's ten best records, Sonny and Brownie would be on it.

William Russo, Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra (Sielgel-Schwall Band), Leonard Bernstein, Symphonic Dances from West Side Story, San Francisco Symphony Orchestra — Seiji Ozawa.

Seiji Ozawa was in Chicago in 1966 as music director of the Chicago Symphony's summer season at Ravinia Park, when he became interested in a blues band he heard at "Big John's", fronted by Corky Siegal and Jim Schwall, the Siegal-Schwall Band. Ozawa became intrigued with the idea of including the Siegal-Schwall Band in one of his concerts.

Fortunately, composer William Russo, who was himself experimenting with rock at Columbia College was interested in Ozawa's idea. In 1967, on Ozawa's advice, the Ravinia festival commissioned Russo to write an orchestra/blues band piece. Russo, after discussions with Siegal, finished the "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra" in 1968.

Generally, the pieces represent an area of rock-orchestra involvement which has never really been attempted on record before. Past efforts were virtually symphonies that included rock instruments or more often rock songs that used the orchestra in the background, so that one of the elements could be left out without destroying the composition. But Russo's pieces are quite different, often employing the Blues band and orchestra playing alone in juxtaposed passages.

Russo treats the blues band as soloists and allows them to improvise while only specifying certain rhythms. The orchestral parts though are scored, save for a few solo passages.

The resulting performance including Siegal on harp and electric piano, Schwall on guitar and the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra conducted by Ozawa is interesting and a valiant step in the right direction. Most rock fans will find it most difficult to get into the first movement in which long dissonant orchestral passages are infused into the blues band lines. The second movement is a more straightforward, slower, almost funky piece in which the orchestra gets to show its stuff.

The improvised oboe solo at the beginning and violin solo near the end are real highlights.

In hoping to reach a more rock oriented audience, Ozawa's choice of Leonard Bernstein's "Symphonic Dances from West Side Story" to fill side two is somewhat defeating. These "Dances", created by expanding the movie score of "West Side Story" in 1961 certainly represent some of the better contemporary symphonic works but are probably less compatible with Russo's pieces than some classical compositions.

Procul Harum, Grand Hotel, (Chrysalis/WEA)

Procul Harum left the A & M label following their successful live recording with the Edmonton Symphony last year and have just completed their first album on Chrysalis and probably their finest yet.

Each cut ties in loosely with the central metaphor of the "grand hotel" — a symbol of the upper classes, certainly a properly pretentious theme for Gary Brooker's symphonic melodies. Keith Reid's words capture the extravagance and grandeur of the upper class lifestyle all the while exposing the accompanying decadence, conceit and greed.

Emperor baby dumping loaded, bloated, curse Mighty baby dumping stuffing till he bursts.

Brooker's accomplishments are impressive. Besides composing the melodies, doing the vocals and playing piano, he has even scored the orchestra and choir parts. Mick Grabham becomes the third guitarist in as many albums for the group but he fits in splendidly.

It's a shame that a record produced as carefully as this was so poorly pressed. WEA deserves the rubber record award of the year for their unwanted contributions in the field of warps and pops on this disc. Maybe you'll be lucky and find a good copy.

The Byrds, Byrds, (Asylum/WEA)

When the Byrds first caught the attention of the listening public in 1965 it was because of their fresh approach to rock music and their introduction of folk songs into the rock sphere that was soon coined "folk-rock".

Their unique musical style was dependent on three and four part harmonies that were unusual for their period and the dominating twelve-string electric guitar work which came to be identified as the "Byrds sound".

The harmony was integral but Roger McGuinn's vocals were always up front. Most of the songs recorded by the original Byrds, McGuinn, Chris Hillman, David Crosby, Gene Clark and Michael Clarke, had "folk" origins with much of it borrowed from Oylan. It was probably McGuinn's insistence on doing Oylan's material that led to the eventual departure of each member. The only original Byrd to stick it out was McGuinn.

break between the verses that doesn't add to the song.

Young's "Cowgirl In The Sand" was given an increase in tempo and a chord change from a minor to a major that turns it into a country ditty that I can't enjoy. So much for interpretation.

McGuinn, Crosby, Hillman, Clark and Clarke are on different wavelengths and without the kind of composing collaboration that produced "Eight Miles High" it's not really surprising they could only come up with an unexciting album that can only be labelled "not bad".

The Six Wives of Henry VIII, Rick Wakeman, (A&M)

From the moment I first heard this album, I knew it would be a difficult one to describe.

Rick Wakeman is the talented multi-keyboard artist who is currently responsible for changing the sound of Yes in the direction of the unique subtleties characteristic of "Fragile" and "Close To The Edge". This is Wakeman's first solo LP and it represents the highest endeavor.

The album is meant to reflect Wakeman's "interpretations of the wives of Henry VIII". Each of the six cuts represents one of the wives; Wakeman's "personal conception of

The new members, primarily Gram Parsons, were instrumental in destroying the Byrds' uniqueness by shifting the emphasis from Dylan and folk music to country. Parsons soon departed to form the Flying Burrito Brothers with Hillman who has lately been involved with Steve Stills in Manassas.

Gene Clarke had left to concentrate on his own writing with Dillard and Clarke and as a solo performer. Of course David Crosby has been a solo performer and producer (for Joni Mitchell), as well as one quarter of Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young.

It was Asylum Records' David Geffen who persuaded the original Byrd members to get back together for Byrds. The idea was more invigorating than the final result.

The harmonies are still there but in the seven or so intervening years they've been improved on by Crosby Stills and Nash among others. And the twelve string guitars are less dominating and there is more of an acoustic inclination (which isn't necessarily a bad thing).

Hillman, Clark, Crosby and McGuinn have each contributed two songs. Crosby comes out on the top as the most mature composer with "Laughing" and "Long Live the King". The other compositions come from Neil Young (two) and Joni Mitchell.

"(See The Sky) About To Rain" lends itself well to the Byrds' harmony while Crosby knows exactly what he wants with the vocal on Joni's "For Free". The interpretation is low key with the only real change (beyond the addition of percussion) being the precious little guitar their characters in relation to keyboard instruments".

Wakeman's keyboard versatility and imagination makes the concept work. Playing as many as three keyboards at once, covering two mellotrons, a grand piano, electric organ and harpsichord and two synthesizers, Wakeman has defined a new brand of music that is both cerebral and sensual but uncategoryable. All six pieces borrow from classical and contemporary stylings as well as employing Wakeman's own techniques used to dramatize Yes' music.

The LP includes brief histories of each of the wives so that you can follow the musical interpretations. Each piece conveys the excitement of Wakeman's keyboard virtuosity and musical inventiveness from the high spirits and promiscuous deceit represented in "Catherine Howard" to the meekness and submissiveness of "Jane Seymour".

Those interested in Yes' music should pay close attention to this album.

New Beethoven albums an earful unclassified

The musical world has been waiting a long time for Maestro Solti's recording of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with his orchestra, the Chicago Symphony. Stereo Review, in conjunction with London's promotion department offered a free seven-inch preview record, which I duly sent away for, quickly received, and found less than impressive. Listening to the whole recording has reinforced that sense of my first impressions: the surface noise begins to rival rice crispies and the bass response tends to bloatedly persevere on very low powerful notes.

Yet this recording is in many ways startling, unique and enjoyable. For example, the detached quavering strings which open the first movement are unusually crystal-clear, which I am sure is exactly what Solti wanted. There is no fussing around with murky textures, or muted portentous harmonies.

I was first made aware of Solti's approach to Beethoven when I bought and listened to his recording of the Fifth symphony with the Vienna Philharmonic. I did not really know Beethoven's Fifth then and so you might say I grew up on Solti's version. The strings have a lucidity and muscularity which Herbert Von Karajan would be pleased to accept from his own orchestra.

Then I listened to Solti's Seventh, Von Karajan's version of which I was nurtured on: I never knew there was that much for the horn in the whole symphony. Suddenly I was discovering previously unnoticed passages for woodwinds or brass and because they were so sudden I did not know if it was what Beethoven and I wanted. Because, there is something to be said for actually trying to blend instruments and douse the intrusiveness of the brass. Solti may agree, but he still seems to have an unbreachable empathy with the little forgotten sound of the flute masked by the thirty odd prima donna strings or the strident horns who can do nothing to stifle the roughness in their voices. They deserve a chance, I can hear Solti insinuating to his grumbling virtuosos.

So those detached strings are right out in front, and so it goes through the course of the symphony, especially the first movement. The big drums in the climax of this movement are about as prominent and as energetic as I've ever heard. The string section is kept taut and powerful, though, so you cannot say the drum is loud because the ensemble work is weak or under-nourished.

The second movement, scherzo, is rather conventionally played and so was the slow movement. Some say this is the heart of the symphony and in its intimacy and directness it is: that famous slow modulation on the strings (which the notes point out) from C flat to B flat gives you time to both listen to the music and reflect on the way it so substantially moves you. Solti guides his orchestra through this passage and the movement as a whole deftly and very slowly, allowing even more time for savouring and ruminating.

The last movement does not surprise like the first, but then its orchestration is not as radical. The soloists, Stuart Burrows, Pilar Lorengar, Yvonne Minto and Martti Tavela sound fine, especially Martti Tavela, the bass who sings the baritone part. I really prefer stronger soloists though, because I think the passages for them are unsurpassed in their formal strength and emotional strenuousness. The four on this recording could perhaps have put more heart into the singing than they did, especially Pilar Lorengar who successfully raises herself to the demands of a similar expressiveness in Mozart's Così Fan Tutte in the well-known recording.

This recording will supplant no previous recording of the Ninth which has proved itself a landmark: Von Karajan's recording, Bruno Walter's several recordings, Otto Klemperer's with the Philharmonia or Furtwangler's several. But as long as it surprises as much as it does and because of the powerful directness that it will not lose with time, Solti's Ninth will be able to afford the company of its Penthouse rivals. (London CSP-B; 2 records).

Among other recent releases which are of interest is a London (CS6750) recording of Romantic Cello Concertos played by Jascha Silberstein, the chief cellist of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, and l'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande under Richard Bonynge. You can always tell a serious romantic concerto by its key: if it's minor it means to be serious, especially in the first movement. And the ones in this recording are all in minor keys. Auber's first concerto and Popper's E minor are the two biggies and are characterized in their first movements by heavily minor, distressed passages and big-R Romantic musical gestures. But the music is absorbing and moving, as is the playing. I think Silberstein has a rich engaging tone and he is of soloist calibre. Bonynge's conducting is as usual poised and well-rounded.

Pierre Cochereau recorded the four big Bach toccatas (BWV's 565, 540, 564 and 538) for Philips on the Treasures Classique label (6504.087). He uses the massive Notre Dame de Paris organs and his style is suitably massive. I have these pieces on Archive with Helmut Walcha, whose approach is consistently careful, masterly and lucid. Cochereau often employs rubato and a stylized rhythmic emphasis, especially in the F major toccata.

The sound of the recording is bad on my pressing. I wish it were better, because Cochereau has something to offer in spite of the curious largesse of keyboard virtuosos which won't allow them to stop treating us to recordings of these same four pieces.

Colin Davis and Arthur Grumiaux have recorded two Mozart violin concertos (K. 207 and 218) for Philips (6580-009). The performances are discreet — perhaps a bit too discreet, although fine and elegant nonetheless. The London Symphony is usually a touch more refined.

Colin Davis conducts this orchestra for Philips (6580050) in Beethoven's Sixth Symphony, the Pastoral. Frankly, I am very disappointed. The orchestra plays unforgivably weak-heartedly with no power, not even much serenity. I think the issuing of the recording is a mistake.

Neville Marriner, on the other hand, in a recording with the Acadmy of St. Martin-in-the-Field of Beethoven's first and second symphonies, pleases us. We are impressed. The exordium of the first movement of the second symphony is wonderfully weighty and lucid, followed by a rather fast allegro. The larghetto is lyrical and exact, especially the filigree which appears at the beginning and towards the end of the development section.

The choral crescendo advancing towards the middle is not as climactic as Karajan's, whose recording is definitive, but it blends with the gentle decorum of the rest of the movement. The scherzo is perhaps too Mozartian since the sforzando and forte outbursts are meant to sound fierce and they do not. So here I believe Karajan and Klemperer are clearly superior. Trills are sometimes slurred. The first symphony is as equally impressive, but I don't have the space to talk about it.

Colin Davis recorded Berlioz' previously unrecorded opera Les Troyens and it was a smashing success. Last year he conducted another unrecorded Berlioz opera, Benevenuto Cellini, and recorded it for Philips (6707019). I would say it too should be a smashing success.

Very briefly, the story is about the rivalry between two sculptors, Fieramosca (Robert Massard, baritone) and Cellini (Nicola Gedda, tenor) for the patronage of the pope. Teresa (Christine Ede-pierre, soprano) who is the daughter of Fieramosca's "business manager" who is also the papal treasurer, falls in love with Cellini, and the opera relates all the machinations and intrigues which eventuate Cellini's success, both with the pope and with Teresa.

The music is incredibly varied and when one considers that it was written in 1834, altered in 1851 and virtually unplayed since then, it is quite surprising that it is practically unknown, except for excerpts. It certainly has had enough time to become popular, but time was also its bane. To accommodate conventional notions about opera in 1851, the opera was fudged around with Liszt. The opera took on an incomprehensible, but more "suitable" form: Davis' version reverts almost completely back to the original Paris version of 1834.

Generally, the performances are very good. Nicolai Gedda and Christiane Ede-Pierre give very adequate if not great performances. Just before the famous duet between the troupers and the people Teresa sings, and then there is an ensemble for Teresa, Ascanio, Cellini and Baldici. All this is beautifully done, as is the famous duet following. There are some superb quiet passages like scene I Act II between Teresa and Ascanio, Cellini's apprentice, (Jane Berbie, mezzo-soprano) and ravishing arias, such as that at the opening of scene three of Act II, which is really a duet between Cellini and Teresa. And Davis conducts perfectly. To my ears, anyway, since some may say his orchestra sounds a bit too classically poised and too slow. The sound is excellent.

So in spite of what would seem to be a lack-luster crowd of singers just by looking at names, the production comes off as a sparkling and precise rendition of exciting music, perhaps even important music. Ian Scott

So you plan to spend the Summer in Europe this year. Great. Two things are mandatory. A ticket to Europe. And a Student-Railpass. The first gets you over there, the second gives you unlimited Second Class rail travel for two months for a modest $150 in Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Luxembourg, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, and Switzerland! All you need to qualify is to be a full-time student up to 25 years of age, registered at a North American school, college or university.

And the trains of Europe are a sensational way to travel. Over 100,000 miles of track links cities, towns and ports all over Europe. The trains are fast (some over 100 mph), frequent, modern, clean, convenient and very comfortable. They have to be. So you'll meet us on our trains. It really is the way to get to know Europeans in Europe.

But there's one catch. You must buy your Student-Railpass in North America before you go. They're not on sale in Europe because they are meant strictly for visitors to Europe—hence the incredibly low price. Of course if you're loaded you can buy a regular Eurailpass meant for visitors of all ages. It gives you First Class travel if that's what you want.

Either way if you're going to zip off to Europe, see a Travel Agent before you go, and in the meantime, rip off the coupon. It can't hurt and it'll get you a better time in Europe than you ever thought possible.

Blind shutterbug hides in bathroom

In a world so foul, so amoral, that barns are stripped for coffee tables, and streetcars are an endangered species, and it costs $43 to have a cat spayed, there is only one refuge — the bathroom. This periodic retreat into self indulgence is the very foundation of Western civilization. Even the best marriages need bathrooms. Some couples in their misguided search of intimate security are often tempted into the can together, to continue a torrid war without interruption. What a dreadful mistake! Mothers of young children are the most oppressed group in this respect — as they are inevitably followed into retreat by their offspring. This probably accounts for the high incidence of insanity in this group.

Bathing together is alright — positively transcendental. But going to the can, in the interests of sanity, equality and brotherhood is best done alone.

Which brings me to the subject of Joe Rosenblatt's latest book, Blind Photographer which include some squiggly drawings of people and animals in the bath and pipes. There aren't any clear distinctions drawn between animate and inanimate matter here but everybody and thing seems to be having a good time. The captions would lead one to believe that there are some major themes running through these apparently casual doodles, themes like "the rape of innocence", "the boyfriend", and "in quest of the orgasm".

The poetry is more impressionistic than I have been familiar with in his work before. I think it not as good in this respect as the earlier collections. I found myself wishing the poems were longer, with a more developed focal point. But perhaps this was the intended effect by the poet.

If you have the opportunity in this uncertain spring, to strip down to nothingness with your loved one and bask in sunny loveliness by the pool and you and your lover discover for the first time that you have absolutely nothing to say to one another, you're mutely terrified because your highly developed skill at academic bluffing cannot be transferred to lovetalk, then perhaps you would like to read this book and see what happens.

Broadfoot bites

The Jest Society and Dave Broadfoot is largely a hit and miss proposition; an honest spontaneous laugh from the audience constituting a hit and embarrassed silence or nervous tittering, a miss. Happily for all concerned the hits out-numbered the misses Thursday night when the review opened at The Poor Alex.

The relationship between honest, spontaneous laughter from the audience and the material used was tenuous. Being devoted to Canadian topics, the five person company worked all the favorites — the FLQ, the blandness of the Canadian identity, Canada's halting bi-lingualism and so on. I am not faulting the selection of topics but rather their under-development of themes so rich in possibilities and so dear to our hearts. I understand that the skits were improvised or developed from improvisation, but particularly in the first part of the program, many of the skits not only lacked the spontaneity of improvisation but also the ordered realization of well conceived and developed inspiration.

Dave Broadfoot, of course, steals the show, mainly through his ability to create ludicrous reflections of real life personalities without robbing them of their charm. His characterization of MP Muckfuster under attack by a student panel and the audience is unforgettable. Everything prior to this seemed simply to warm the audience up for Muckfuster; for what happens in this sequence is a totally different kind of theatre — a real theatre of participation. Audience, Muckfuster and the other members of the cast are all slugging it out with the heavy-handed pun, scatological humour and general irreverence all for their own entertainment. The show is definitely worth seeing, not just for the salutary effects of honest, spontaneous laughter but more for the giddy experience of the extended belly laughs Broadfoot is capable of generating.

Mimsy Reasoner

Pauline sketchy but well done

Pauline Johnson lived her poetry. As portrayed by the Theatre Passe Muraille's newest production Pauline she is a woman of passion, dominated by the desire to bring her poems to life before the world. The best compliment Pauline can be given is the fact that more than one spectator, myself included, expressed the desire to read up on Pauline Johnson and her poems.

Anne Anglen brings to light not only the passion and daring of the well-travelled Mohawk poetess, but a naivete that prevented her from seeing the smallness in other people. A good deal of the performance consists in recitations in which she evokes the splendour of the Canadian wilderness and the nobility of the Mohawk brave. Miss Anglen accompanies her dramatic elocutionary style with gestures that present clear images in the minds of her spectators. One wonders if Pauline Johnson was indeed this spellbinding creature.

Janet Amos and Peter Kunder portray the people with whom Pauline came into contact on her journey to fame. They change roles countless times, and often within seconds. Miss Amos has proven before how well she can sketch out a character type with specific comportment, tone of voice, and most strikingly, facial expression. We see a host of Canadian ladies who introduced Pauline at recitals, men who welcomed her on her western tour, and other isolated character parts. Peter Kunder has perhaps less of a variety of roles to contend with. He plays a number of different men who were linked with the poetess — a honky-tonk pianist, a conventional suitor, a money-hungry manager, and some other brief sketches. There is obviously a good amount of thought and discipline behind every characterization. Without these ingredients, the format of the production would be impossible to accept.

The three platforms and single chair make for a singularly austere set. It is left up to the actors to create the essential atmosphere of the various milieus represented by the way they position themselves on the set, and of course by the characters they portray. Thus we witness scenes in train compartments, recital halls, private homes, and in the wilderness. We shoot the rapids, arrive in London or ride a horse madly through the night with Pauline. Sounds and gestures from Janet Amos and Peter Kunder become considerably abstract at times in order to create the dynamics of the situation being resented.

It is hard to believe that only three people are responsible for creating such a wealth of moods. Naturally there are those behind the scenes, notably Paul Thompson, the director responsible for the unique acting style this company presents.

Could we have wished for more? We see Pauline Johnson largely the way her public saw her. In this play, she is the only character that shows some development. The others pass too quickly to be more than expert sketches. Thus it is possible to weary of the constant change, and hunger after the treatment of one relationship, or one conflict, in detail. After learning more about the Mohawk Princess, as this production has inspired me to do, I will no doubt have more comments to make.

Areas of colour make grand effect

Hart House is staging its biggest art show of the season now until April 15: paintings of Gershon Iskowitz. This man emigrated from Europe after the war during which he was imprisoned by the Nazis, and has had successful one-man shows all over the Western art world since. There is a concurrent exhibit of his work at the Gallery Moose which I was unable to see before writing this article, but I urge all to see both exhibits if possible.

Iskowitz works with areas of colour — prodding contours, oblongs, ellipses or no-shape shapes — onto the canvas by accumulating splotches of either one on multi-toned colour within a certain area thus creating these contours. I don't know if there is anything highly original in these recent and very large canvases, but the most ingenious artist today (to my mind) is the one that always has figure-ground notions floating around in his mind as he does what he does with his pigments. And Iskowitz creates, if anything, figure-ground studies.

My favourite canvas is "Painting in Lilac" which collects splotches of the psychological primary colours, blue and yellow, along with orange, lilac and around the edges, lilac. Up close the canvas is clinical, objectifying, disposing the colour patches relatively evenly, indifferently. From about twenty feet away or even ten, the canvas becomes alive with the starburst of colour animated most by the dominate lilac. Very cleverly, the light creamy lunatic fringe seems to resolve into the lilac, which creates perhaps the impression, more than anything else, that this pastoral, passive shade is the dominate and defining one.

The large Tryptic is of three arched canvases, the centre one higher than the symmetrical outer two. The colour scheme is blue-green-blue going across the piece, with fields of white above and below on all three tableaux. It is a simple piece, but very curious and perhaps even question-begging with its forthright use of primary colour (although not pure, of course).

A set of canvases which seem to go together are marked by their free use of indiscriminately coloured splotches, creating the contours I spoke of before. Again, these are simple paintings, but they have the hazy richness of a Seurat as well as an uncanny fluency. Step back from these as you did with the "painting in Lilac" and the monstrous forms are alive with a figure-ground activity.

There are also three water colours in the exhibition. They are perhaps the most subtle works here, the edges of the canvas fraying more than in the oil splotches and featuring much more adulterated hues. The figure-ground relationship is less stark and the splotches do not gather themselves into distinct forms as in the oils.

I don't think it is difficult to guess why Iskowitz was chosen to represent Canada in last year's Vienna Biennial, in which the canvases here exhibited. There is a grandness, an extroversion which is neither blatant nor New Yorkish. Iskowitz has been heavily influenced by the Impressionists and by his expressionist teachers (in the grandness of his design), but to good effect, and his canvases are not derivative. It's not an overwhelming show, but one of rare high merit.

The Theatre: Retrospect and Prospects theatre (—ter), n. Building for dramatic spectacles, playhouse; room, hall, for lectures etc. with seats in tiers (operating— for surgical demonstrations); dramatic literature or art; scene, field of operation, as the— of war; good — (pred.), effective on the stage; —goer, — going, frequenter, frequenting of theatres (Greek theatron f. theamai — behold) — The Concise Oxford Dictionary, 1964.

What definition of theatre are we using, when we speak of the Toronto theatre scene? Let's look at the first meaning given above. Certain buildings are called theatres because they were constructed for the presentation of dramatic spectacles. Independent of what goes on within their four walls, they remain theatres. When they no longer house performances, they are "old theatres". The O'Keefe Centre and the Royal Alexandra Theatre fit this traditional definition. So does the St. Lawrence Centre, with the qualification that its more versatile interior looks ahead to a multi-functional gathering space for community activities, theatrical or otherwise.

There are buildings which become theatres through renovation of their interior. Consider the handful of downtown theatres that inhabit warehouses: Tarragon, Factory Lab, Passe Muraille... And even more novel adaptations: The Firehall Theatre, "The Church" (Studio Theatre on Glen Morris), and various religious institutions that offer themselves regularly as public theatres. This latter phenomenon seems like a throwback to the origins of theatre, which were in religious ritual. The Central Library Theatre and the Colonnade Theatre are two other examples of theatres contained within a larger concern.

Still, there are other places that serve as theatres — gymnasiums, halls, parks, the street... For an hour or two they become a playing space of as the dictionary puts it, "a field of operation." Then their everyday function resumes. More and more experiments are being tried with this concept. Again, it is a return, this time to the atmosphere of the mobile Commedia dell'Arte and the wandering troubadour.

"Going to the theatre" is an expression that is becoming ever more symbolic. What has to be kept in mind is that theatre is a human activity. When we go to see theatre, we are placing ourselves within the space that contains the activity in order to, in some fashion, bear witness to it. This is one basic difference between theatre and film, incidentally.

A performer, or performers, a performing space, and a public: these are three requisites for the art which emanates from the expressive resources of man's mind and body. What will be expressed? How will the choice of material be related to the environment outside the playing space? Certainly there are theories on this subject, but they are about as reliable as the Titanic. We stand to learn more by looking at the theatrical activities around us.

We mentioned the large commercial establishments that house different forms of theatre throughout the year. The Royal Alexandra is the most prosperous example. It offers the Toronto theatre-goer lavish productions of international renown, often featuring performers whose reputations for excellence are commonly assumed. This past year it presented musicals (for example, Christopher Plummer in the pre-Broadway run of Cyrano), current hits (How the Other Half Loves, direct from its London triumph), modern classics (Rex Harrison in Pirandello's Henry IV) and special attractions (British pantomime theatre).

A fortune is spent to engage the artists concerned. Admission to performances is proportionately high. This system perpetuates a theatre of the elite. When a certain sector of the public feels it is in the position to "buy the best" in theatre, attending theatre becomes an expression of class consciousness. It tends to follow that the business interests which support this theatre will not engage productions which directly question the place of the elite.

Does the theatre of the elite work in Toronto? Ed Mirvish has next year's season all set up. But then his revenue comes from his restaurant and discount store as well as from the Royal Alexandra.

The O'Keefe Centre has not survived the competition well. Its image is becoming less and less elitist. Student prices and "rush seats" are one indication of the shift. It still features performers of international fame, and with its larger stage, it can house a greater variety of productions. Except for opening nights, theatre-goers dress more casually than they used to, when going to the O'Keefe.

Its next door neighbour may have had some influence. The St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts is a subsidized theatre foundation. Unlike the other two large theatres, it houses a repertory company, its repertoire is more "serious", in the sense that it presents dramatic works that have been critically acclaimed although they may not have universal appeal. This year we had tastes of Kafka, Shakespeare, O'Neill, Euripides and (soon to be seen) Michel Tremblay. The last author is the only living one, a French Canadian playwright whose reputation for excellence couldn't be ignored. It still seems strange that the one Canadian work in the repertoire had to be a play which will lose much of its richness in the rendering to English of the Quebec dialect. In fact, three fifths of the repertoire consists of translated works.

The St. Lawrence Centre offers far more innovation in the way of set design than the other two large theatres normally do. It has not yet (to this spectator's knowledge) dealt with the role of the spectator. This problem is more effectively dealt with by smaller theatres.

Toronto has a number of small theatres which, although humble in appearance, give every indication of continuing as a vital force on the cultural scene. Their repertoire is less conventional than the three theatres just mentioned. There are degrees of innovativeness, obviously, and the energetic repertory companies take different routes in expanding the concept of theatre in Toronto.

Theatre Passe Muraille has one of the most interesting approaches. Many of its productions are developed through improvisations on a basic theme, linked together in a near-crystallized form. The charm of their recent production, 1B37, was largely due to the actors' spontaneity, a direct result of the improvisational approach. The group also seems committed to maximum exploitation of the actor's personal resources and minimal use of costumes and properties. In 1B37, actors underwent role changes without costume changes, women took men's roles and vice versa, and actors represented animals, plants and even cities. The set was designed to represent the general atmosphere that pervaded the play.

Canadian content is rapidly becoming the measuring stick of a progressive policy in theatre production. Passe Muraille favours Canadian themes. The Tarragon Theatre is committed to the Canadian playwright. At the moment, it seems to be the Jackpot of Canadian successes with David French, David Freeman and Michel Tremblay in its repertoire. The combination of sensitive direction and good material has earned it the reputation of a theatre for thinking people. A new group of theatre-goers from a variety of backgrounds are being attracted to its productions. Next season there will be another play by Freeman and one by Tremblay, in addition to the new works presented by the theatre which describes itself as "by concept experimental". Its predecessor, the ill-fated Factory Lab Theatre largely created the sympathetic atmosphere for Canadian works.

Other small theatres present a variety of works, some of which are Canadian. The Firehall has produced Anne Hebert, Edward Albee and a adaptation of a medieval romance. Toronto Workshop Productions, the best known repertory group in Toronto, has a lively, versatile company, and is probably most successful with contemporary action-filled spectacles like Hey Rubel and Indians.

Prices vary in the small theatres. Some groups offer a certain number of "pay-what-you-can" performances to encourage attendance from lower income-bracket groups.

The university campus offers even more room for innovation than the small theatres (many of which have not been mentioned). There does not exist the pressure to cater to the public created by financial considerations. The usual difficulties are being provided with the proper materials to mount the production, and finding people with enough experience to handle the material presented.

A mini-community in itself, the university has its own hierarchy of theatres. At the U of T, one finds the Hart House Theatre, which in addition to importing productions from outside the campus, houses the large scale campus productions. Experiments with the classics often find themselves there, in addition to musicals and revues. The Studio Theatre is run by the Graduate Centre for the Study of Drama, and though by no means a repertory theatre, it tends to have a core group of graduate students and professors influencing its direction. Works both classical and tion Two is the name of a group of a dozen or so actors, who, for the past two years have lived together, and put together works designed to confront the spectator with his environment and his role in it. The group takes its inspiration from the city and its paradoxes. On one occasion, apparently, they returned the admission charge to their audience because their performance did not, in their view, have the proper effect.

A new group has formed with a precise format for reaching the non-theatre-goer. The Open Circle Theatre wants to create "a professional community theatre" as a result of research in the community. Its first show (April 5) will be a documentary of welfare and unemployment. The material is taken from interviews which the actors themselves conducted. The method comes from England, where director Ray Whelan studied its successful use in a small industrial town.

Open Circle wants to live up to its name. Although not narrowly political, it is interested in eradicating elitism in the theatre arts by creating works relevant modern rarely seen elsewhere in the city get produced there by enterprising Drama Centre students. The UC Playhouse produces even more original productions by students, as well as housing the odd professional group. Its excellent resources allow more variety in the productions than is normally possible at The Church. In February it housed the controversial experiment in theatre called "Survival" (the word does seem to be in vogue lately!), which might be defined as an actor's marathon.

College and Faculty theatre guilds are a phenomenon which does not lend itself to generalization. There seems to be a swing toward original works. The Centre for Medieval Studies continues its artful productions of miracle and morality plays, revelations for the modern theatregoer.

From the small theatre and the university-based theatre, we often obtain the idea of theatre as a community activity, motivating both artist and public. Some groups adopt this social commitment as a philosophy determining their artistic character. Creato the experience of the average citizen. Unlike the Tarragon, it does not see its role as stretching the theatre-goers' consciousness but as reflecting his interests. It has a small grant from Theatre Ontario. The rest of its revenue will come from contributions and the pay-what-you-can performances. St. Paul's Church will be its regular spot, although there will be some performances in public parks.

The group invites interested parties to help them with set building, research and whatever needs to be done. Call 967-6584. Theatre is not just the domain of the performing artist, and the theatre-goer need not see himself as impotent in relation to the artist, according to this approach.

Will community-oriented theatre supplant the theatre of the fourth wall? Do people really want to come face to face with themselves in the theatre, or do they still want to participate indirectly or even escape from themselves? Perhaps the fortunes of Open Circle will indicate which way the tide is turning in Toronto.

Canadian film industry needs protection to survive

On a little-remembered day in 1949, the grand poobah of the Liberal Party, C.D. "What's a million?" Howe, had the president of Famous Players in his office.

"Mr. President" said C.D., in a manner which befits a mere cabinet minister, "Mr. President, wouldn't it be a great idea if Famous Players channelled some of the immense profit which it annually drains from the Canadian economy into the development of a Canadian film industry?"

"No," replied the president. He suggested that Canada wasn't yet ready for its own film industry and that Canada's international reputation would be better served if Canadian names and references were dropped at random into American movies — all at no charge of course.

C.D. discreetly dropped the idea.

A more recent attempt to achieve a workable Canadian film industry has been the establishment of the Canadian Film Development Corporation. This body puts money into Canadian films with the hope of getting some of that money back after the films have been distributed. Up to now the Corporation has been faced with two major difficulties; deciding precisely what constitutes a Canadian film and getting some of its money back.

Initially about 30 per cent of CFDC's budget went to American studios filming in Canada. The rationale was that these gave jobs to Canadian technicians and also provided valuable experience which they could later utilize in Canadian films. Canadians were not yet ready to produce films on their own. It was best to learn from the American masters.

Today the Corporation is now leaning away from this cultural inferiority complex.

However, the problem of funds is more serious.

Canadian films are being produced but few of them are getting the distribution necessary to return their initial investment. In 1971 Canadian films which had been subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer but which had not received distribution included The Abyss, The Edible Woman, Get On To Get Off, and Saturday's Passage. Only films of obvious commercial and artistic merit such as Goin' Down The Road and Mon Oncle Antoine have been guaranteed commercial distribution in their own country.

This difficulty is created by the fact that about 80 per cent of Canadian cinemas are foreign-owned. The two largest chains are the American-owned Famous Players and the British-owned Odeon.

Another factor is the tie-on system by which a production company sells its films to a distributor in what amounts to a package. If the distributor wishes to get films which are proven commercial successes he must also take films of less merit. This system gives the foreign producer considerable leverage over the distributor in Canada.

A prime example of this type of influence is seen in the treatment of Clarke Mackey's award-winning The Only Thing You Know. After several failures Mackey approached Premier Operating, a distributor linked to Famous Players. Over a nine month period Premier indicated that it would give Mackey playing time at the Cinecity theatre. Finally in August the film received a midnight screening. Because of its success at that screening it was scheduled to play in the fall. Then it was postponed to make way for Mon Oncle Antoine. Next it was to be shown following Mon Oncle. Again it was postponed, this time to make way for an American film which wished to cash in on Cinecity's popularity following Mon Oncle. Mackey wound up $13,000 in debt. One can understand the frustration of Canadian producers.

In an effort to resolve this problem and others facing the Canadian film industry, the Ontario Government Exploration Team on Film Industry under John Bassett has suggested that a quota be imposed upon theatres in Ontario to encourage the exhibition of Canadian-made films.

This quota would force Ontario cinemas to show Canadian feature films for eight weeks in every two year period. This quota would enable Canadian films to gain a toehold which could easily be expanded if future Canadian production justified it.

Despite the storm of protests from distributors these proposals are quite moderate when compared with the measures taken by many foreign nations.

The most direct parallel is the United Kingdom which also has the problem of sharing a common language with the United States. Debate about the weak state of the British film industry first occurred in the British Parliament in 1925. This prompted the Federation of British Industries to put forward a proposal involving both a quota and subsidies. The Cinematographic Exhibitors Association reacted strongly. It feared a loss of profits from a public which had grown accustomed to American movies. When private industry failed to reach a consensus on suitable action Parliament acted with the Cinematograph Films Act of 1927. This act required cinemas to initially reserve a minimum of 5 per cent screen time for British films increasing to 20 per cent in 1938. A new act was introduced in 1938 but the quota system was thrown into confusion during the war when severe restrictions were placed on British film production. In 1948 another act was passed which provided for quotas to be set on an annual basis after consultation between the government and industry. In 1948 the quota was set at 45 per cent; in 1949 it was 40 per cent. The following year the quota was reduced to 30 per cent and it remains there.

Although the quota system is no longer necessary since British films now occupy about 40 per cent of their nation's screen time it is generally recognized that it played an important role in establishing the British film industry in the 1920's and 30's and in protecting it from an influx of American films following the war.

Other European countries, though not faced with the problem of a common language, have also utilized quotas at various times to build their film industries and most of them continue to do so.

Prior to the Second World War the French film industry was protected by a quota which limited American imports to 120 films per year. In May, 1946, this was replaced by the Blum-Byrnes Agreement which established a screen quota reserving four weeks in each quarter for the exhibition of French films. In fact this was far below the French productive capacity. By the end of the year more than half of French studios had suspended operation and unemployment ran over two-thirds in some sectors of the industry. As a result negotiations were re-opened in 1948 and in September of that year a five year agreement was signed. This limited foreign imports to 186 annually of which 121 could be American. In addition the screen quota was raised from four to five weeks per quarter.

The Ontario proposals are much more modest than anything presently in effect in any major European nation. This is so since the Canadian population could not support the same number of feature films as the much larger English or French populations. Nevertheless the provincial government should note that all major European nations wishing to develop their own film industries have used a quota system at some point. Indeed several have used an import quota which is an even more potent weapon than a quota on screen time. At present over 100 nations around the world have some sort of restrictions against American movies. Many of these restrictions have their origins as early as the 1920's.

No major European country has been able to develop a feature film industry in the face of unrestricted competition from the well-established American industry. The problems are even greater in Canada with our common language and a distribution system which is 80 per cent foreign owned. Experience has shown that foreign controlled distributors will not give Canadian films a fair break at the expense of their own nation's films. Unless the provincial government acts there is little chance of Canada acquiring a truly competitive feature film industry in the face of such odds. As for whether Canada needs a feature film industry even Premier Davis must realize that anything dreamed of by C.D. Howe and advocated by John Bassett can't be all bad.

All the laughs can't hold The Heartbreak Kid together

The Heartbreak Kid is a scatterbrained comedy that continually loses sight of its goals. When it finally sights them and comes within sprinting distance, it panics and pulls up lame.

Lenny (Charles Grodin) marries Lila (Jeannie Berlin), a girl much like himself. Both are Jewish, middle-class, unmistakably New Yorkers. As they drive down to Miami for their honeymoon, Larry becomes increasingly disintegrated with his bride. When they make love, she requires him to chant "It's wonderful, it's wonderful" like a litany; in her afterglow, she amuses herself by tracing little circles in his chesthair, which he detests. "All right then, I'll make little squares instead," she compromises, when he finally gets the nerve to tell her.

By the time they reach Miami, he's ripe for rebellion. By a convenient fluke, Lila burns herself to a cinder the first day out in her deck chair, and is confined to quarters. Larry, left to his own devices, meets up with a practiced little tease, a blonde shiksa from Minnesota named Kelly Cochoran (Cybill Shephard). Her glacial seductiveness gets him hot (his wife's gypsy passion embarrasses him). When Kelly's father decides to move out of the hotel because of a "bad element" (Jews), Larry is all resolution. He decides to divorce Lila and marry Kelly, unphased by the fact that Mr. Cochoran, a rock-ribbed WASP, loathes him. ("I've found that the decent thing isn't always the right thing to do" Larry says to Mr. Cochoran, explaining away the problem of his five-day bride).

Basically, on its own terms, what the story boils down to is this: a smart New York Jew, on the verge of setting down into stifling tribal life, decides what he really wants is to make it in WASP-dom, in the unattainable Camelot of America's Republican heartland. That could be an acidulous satire on social climbing, and I reckon that was the thrust of the original tale by Bruce Jay Friedman. Friedman is an impish devil whose forte is exaggeration into grotesquerie (his touch survives in Mr. Cochoran, played by Eddie Albert, the WASP-as-dragon, bellowing that nobody was going to take his "little baby girl" away from him).

Unfortunately, other cooks have been at this broth. Neil Simon, the maven of the Broadway bellylaugh, added his own gimmicks — frantic deceit, split-second schemes that go awry, push-button jokes about Miami Beach and geriatric Jews. And last comes Elaine May, who directed the movie from Simon's play. What caught May's eye, it seems, was the rather subtle manoeuvres involved in Larry's unravelling his affection for Lila and snaring Kelly. Her interest is psychological — what makes a nice guy like Larry, no cad, act so abominably?

The result of all this, though (with big reservations) it is funny enough, is a muddled, purposeless mess. The three authors hover like satellites around the movie, exerting their pulls at different times, frequently cancelling each other out.

Lest anybody think I'm being particularly obtuse, I'm not demanding that movies should set themselves a clear "theme" then walk it like a tightrope. But if a movie gets ambitious, and tackles several aspects at once, somebody should at least take the time to see that everything is integrated into a coherent whole. The Heartbreak Kid, is, to put it bluntly, bewildering.

Our first thought, for instance, when the marriage is breaking up, is that Larry is sick of Lila because she's a klutz, smearing herself with Noxema and nattering about their old age together. She's like the newlywed cook in the Alka-Selzer commercial, and we're happy for Larry finally realizing how ghastly their life would be. But she's not a klutz; she has some bad habits and she's had a few bad days, but she knows enough to get herself up in hoop earrings, gold chokers and bright scarves, accenting the oriental in her fine Jewish features. She's reasonably sensitive, too, though a little too exuberant in bed.

So then we think, well, when Larry meets fresh, golden Kelly, he finally sees what he never saw before: that Lilas are a dime a dozen, while Kelly is unique. But at the beginning of the film, Larry hadn't even met, Lila and once he does, he's in one almighty hurry to get her to the altar. And there are plenty of Kelly Cochorans, too, in the singles bars in New York City where he picked up Lila.

No one has thought any of this out. That might otherwise not be so great a flaw except for Elaine May. She makes us wonder about these characters, makes us want to rationalize Larry's behavior. Her sensitive direction spotlights, inadvertently, all the flaws.

But The Heartbreak Kid is a big success; everybody in the packed theatre laughs as punctiliously as if each and every one of them were wired to Harry Cohn's infallible ass. And so did I. A comedy can be shoddy, hackneyed, dishonest, it seems, as long as it supplies an evenly distributed quota of laughs. It's enough to bring pity to the heart of George Bernard Shaw, who thought that comedy, unlike tragedy, was serious business. Bill MacVicar

Slither goes slimy

Slither is an occasionally diverting comedy-suspense job, mercifully lacking one of those sadistic studs suddenly indispensable to thrillers. One striking feature is its rather exotic locale — middle America. Airstream trailers, bingo parlors, coin laundromats deck out this story of an ex-con called Dick Kanipsia (James Caan) who leagues up with Barry Fenaka, an emcee for American Legion banquets (Peter Boyle) to recover a cache of embezzled money. A kook named Kitty Kopetsky with a yen for Kanipsia (superb little part by Sally Kellerman) zooms in and out of the action.

There are careful touches. Wherever Dick goes, a van is sure to follow. And what a brilliant job of casting was done for the van! Verminous, slime-green, blunt-snouted and repellent. Lazlo Kovacs' devotion to the telephoto lens for once pays dividends; Fenaka's bright trailer bounces into view — and seconds later, that lizard-like creature slithers over the top of a hill in stealthy pursuit. This disquieting vehicle somehow spawns a twin, and the revolting pair trail Fenaka (who soon disappears) and then Kanipsia alone across the countryside. Sally Kellerman puts a goofball curve on the whole dizzy venture, the big appeal of which is that it doesn't take itself at all seriously.

But at full-fledged prices, you could demand a little more seriousness. Slither is a dishonest suspense story that bluffs along on the strength of ominous touches, knowing full well there's no solution in the offing, no real problem, even, to be solved. You can get away with that particular gambit — barely — if you develop the side issues to such an extent that they eclipse the original gimmick in interest (see the Maltese Falcon). This little picture doesn't even try to do that, so at the end whatever enjoyment the actors or dialogue may have given you crumbles away, leaving you thinking not of poor Dick Kanipsia's missing $312,000, but of your own squandered $2.75.

Maugham, Flanner, Vidal: fine prose

Robin Maugham, though nowhere so famous as his uncle Somerset, is an author of some distinction in Britain. His novel (and later play) The Servant has been filmed, and North Americans will probably know him best through that odd work.

Escape from the Shadows (Musson, $13.00) is a noteworthy autobiography. There is the requisite stuff for general interest. Maugham was brought up in a wealthy household ruled by his father, a peer of the realm and unregenerate Tory. Young Robin did war service in Africa (which he came to love), hobnobbed with Winston Churchill, tells scintillating stories about his world-famous uncle.

But what sets this "lesser" Maugham's autobiography apart is his candid and unmaawkish discussion of his own homosexuality. It's a commonplace that English fallen for Jim; within minutes, the new lovers had left together, and Maugham never again saw the man he had lived with and loved for so long.

That experience seems to have changed Maugham's life so that at one point, after a long night of drinking and the sham clarity it brings, he attempted suicide. When Maugham writes of it, he makes it clear that it he does not write it off as the attempt of a drunk, nor is it something that shocks him. Maugham has revealed himself as few autobiographers do, and his book is worthy and moving because of it.

Memories of Paris in 20's

For that whole generation of talented young people whom Gertrude Stein called "lost" the greatest European summer of them all was Paris between the wars. Janet Flanner, a girl from Indiana eager to become a writer, joined the expatriate colony off the Rue St. Germain and began sending, to the New Yorker, her famous Letters from Paris, over the signature Genet.

Dispatches from 1925 until the outbreak of war are collected in Paris was Yesterday (Macmillan, $10.50). That note of wistful elegy sounded in the title echoes through the volume itself. So many pieces are the marking of notable deaths — Clemenceau, Claude Monet, Marie Curie, Diaghilev—and even their anniversaries—Brillat-Savarin, Emile Zola. But she writes charmingly of that exciting time in the arts, of the exotic world when figures as different as Marlene Dietrich, Charles Lindburg and the American "negress" Josephine Baker captured Paris.

Government scandals and spectacular murders give Genet space for long discussions of Gallic ways and attitudes. And as the years progress, that ominous thunder flashes menacingly on the horizon — talk of war. The volume ends when lightning struck, on September 3, 1939.

Flanner writes a wonderfully tart, moving prose; I can think of no way of paying this grand woman tribute than by quoting from her description (in the introduction) of learning Hemingway, who had been a friend, was dead:

"So, years later, I did not believe that Ernest's death in Idaho from that grotesque gunshot was an accident, as officially reported at first and only a year later officially denied in favour of the more profound truth. I had automatically recognized that fatal gunshot as his mortal act of gaining liberty. But I grieved deeply when the pitiful facts of his final bondage were made public... At Ernest's death, I grieved most because he died in a state of ruin."

Homage to Daniel Shays

Daniel Shays was a Massachusetts farmer who, soon after the American revolutionary war, led a rebellion against the new federal government. Rule from New York was scarcely more tolerable than rule from London, thought Shays and his rebels, a point unappreciated by the landed gentry who drew up the new constitution, a document tailored to preserve and protect their wealth. His rebellion was crushed, and Washington has since supplanted New York as the hub of an empire rich beyond the dreams of the Hudson Bay or East Indian companies.

Gore Vidal's collection of essays from the last twenty years is fittingly called Homage to Daniel Shays (Random House, $10.25). Vidal's progressive disillusionment with government (a course travelled by many in the last decade) can be traced in this volume. The early, exuberant pieces on Jack Kennedy, whom many thought a fearless reformer (!) give way to notorious reconsiderations like The Holy Family, in which he demonstrates how the Kennedy clan used their princely wealth to force a passage to power. (Jacqueline had become the "ci-devant tragic Empress of the West"; the boys' schools are hotbeds of homoerotic behavior; Maugham gives a new angle: the common practice of masters exploiting their young charges sexually.

Late in life, Maugham tells the story of returning to London, after a long recuperation after an earthquake, and arriving unannounced at his flat. There he found his lover for thirteen years, thirteen years his junior, with a young boy from the merchant marine. Such betrayals, of course, are not the stuff of tragedy, nor anything exclusively homosexual. But when Maugham withdrew to calm himself with a drink, his lover Jim followed him to say that he had met the boy four days ago and had fallen in love with him as unexpectedly as Maugham had once feeble dissent from bureaucrats against Vietnam were but "stirrings within the camp of the Great Khan at Washington). With Nixon's accession to the Khanate, Vidal has abandoned hope altogether, looking rather wistfully to the destruction, through slow poisoning and overpopulation, of Spaceship Earth.

But there is more here than exquisitely honed pessimism. Vidal's range is wide, from a look at Nasser's Egypt through a critique of the French New Novel to a blitzkrieg attack on Dr. Reuben's famous collection of old wives' tales about sex. What Vidal says, as he readily acknowledges, is rarely original — he speaks for commonsense, tolerance and civility — but rarely are opinions expressed with such striking aptness.

Quebec: the people are in motion

Somehow the issue of Quebec independence has faded into the background for English Canadians since the war measures crisis of 1970. Since then, the demands of increasing numbers of Quebecois for fundamental change have been forgotten by many Anglo-Canadians.

The federal election of 1972 was fought not on national unity or federalism but the dismal economic record of the Trudeau government.

However, for French Canadians the situation has not changed since they gave Rene Levesque's Parti Quebecois 24 per cent of their votes in the spring 1970 provincial elections.

A collection of essays are reprinted detailing events in Québec since 1968 in a book called "Quebec: A Chronicle". Last Post, an English language alternate Montreal newsmagazine where the essays first appeared, has consistently given excellent coverage of the Quebec situation to its small readership.

Most of the articles reprinted were written by the Last Post staffers who edited the collection, Nick Auf De Maur and Robert Chodos. Auf Der Maur is Last Post's Quebec editor and one of the most knowledgeable journalists in French Canada. He has contacts with many influential Quebecois from inside the Liberal government to the FLQ.

Fittingly, the postscript to the collection is written by the leaders of the Common Front, which led the militant civil service strikes of 1972. Pepin, Laberge and Charbonneau, leaders of the three biggest Quebec unions, are now in jail for their defiant actions.

"Quebec: A Chronicle" is a valuable contribution to English literature on Quebec because the six essays expose in a way which other English Canadian journalists and authors have not the realities of the struggle in Quebec.

It is a struggle which has become increasingly militant and which has radicalized all the participants. The first essay, titled "The Failure of the Quiet Revolution", by Auf Der Maur, reviews events since the early sixties when Jean Lesage and his Liberal government embarked on their idealistic reforms, with a flair since lacking in electoral politics in Quebec.

However as he demonstrates, the enthusiasm of the Quiet Revolution has given way to the repressive bureaucratic politics of Bourassa. The opposition to the dominant classes of Quebec has been growing in strength under ever increasing repression. As evidenced by the workers' rebellions of 1972, dissent has pervaded every part of the society.

In 1949 Pierre Trudeau was fighting the brutal government suppression of the Asbestos strike. In 1970 he proclaimed an act that was used to throw hundreds of innocent progressive Quebecois in jail. No fact more eloquently reflects the immense changes in the Quebec political milieu in the last 20 years.

Auf Der Maur discusses the various reflections of the desire for change: the growth of the separatist movement, the radicalization of trade unions, the growing militancy of students. All these developed during the sixties, stimulated by confrontations such as those over the use of the English language in the schools. One need only recall the St. Leonard school crisis and the huge McGill Français demonstrations to realize the determination and militancy of dissenting Québecois.

In one of the most fascinating essays in the collection Auf Der Maur traces the growth of two workers' movements that exemplify the difficult struggles facing any progressive elements in Quebec.

Les Gars de La Palme — the Lapalme postal drivers — were screwed by the federal government. They had a long battle to unionize but as an affiliate to the CNTU they had finally won large concessions and had gained among the best wages of any postal workers in the country. However the government canceled the contract of the G. La Palme company to transport mail in the Montreal area and decided to ignore the union. They offered some of the workers their jobs back but without seniority and with a wage cut.

The Lapalme boys went on strike. That was in 1970. Now after more than two years of fruitless negotiations with the government and a kind "Mangez la merde" (eat shit) from the Prime Minister, the few remaining drivers are still on strike supported, almost as a symbol of resistance, by the CNTU central council.

Their struggle compared to one in the private sector in which militant taxi drivers tried to organize a union in the late sixties. This finally resulted in the violent firebombing demonstrations of La Movemente Liberation du Taxi in 1969.

Under the leadership Germain Archambeault the taxi drivers had fought for several years to gain collective bargaining with the exploitative taxi companies who paid them starvation wages and few benefits. They often worked 80 hour weeks for a pittance in unsafe vehicles.

However the taxi companies collectively refused to give up their lucrative position. The increasing militancy of drivers finally burst out during the Montreal police strike when taxi drivers attacked the Murray Hill Limousine offices because of their monopoly on business at the Montreal airport.

One of the MLT drivers, Marc Charbonneau, later joined the FLQ and participated in the Cross Kidnapping, which triggered the October crisis of 1970. This debacle was discussed in the essay aptly titled "Trudeau's Santo Domingo", a reference to U.S. military intervention under Lyndon Johnson in the Dominican republic.

Though the events of 1970 are familiar to most of us, the Last Post staff portray the kidnap crisis in a different light. They expose the many lies and scare tactics used by Trudeau and his cabinet to justify their military crackdown on progressive elements in Quebec. The most obvious include the efforts to link Claude Ryan to an attempt to set up a provisional government and the claims by Turner and Marchand that the FLQ posed a real threat to the government of Quebec.

In retrospect the War Measures Crisis shows the lengths to which the federal government was willing to go to suppress legitimate dissent in the province of Quebec. Their calculated overreaction to the terrorist acts of a minority cannot be justified.

The final three essays all deal with perhaps the most encouraging new development in Quebec: the development of a radical trade union opposition to the status quo. Fueled by increasing unemployment, low wages and poor working conditions the workers of Quebec in all sectors of the economy have become increasingly militant in the last two years.

The roots of radicalization lie in this economic crisis, the crisis of a dependent Quebec economy exploited not only by English Canadian capitalists but American capitalists, governed by an administration perfectly content to sell out to anyone to "develop" Quebec.

Starting from the La Presse demonstration in 1971, Auf Der Maur traces the rapid development of militancy and determination in Quebec's three largest trade unions: the Quebec Federation of Labour, the Confederation of National Trade Unions and the Quebec Teachers Corporation.

This culminated last spring with the publication of three manifestos opposed to the capitalist system and calling for a socialist economic system. These were followed by a strike in the public sector which resulted in the jailing of not only the three top union leaders but other rank and file workers for defying a government injunction intended to break the strike.

This resulted in the May walkouts and demonstrations on a scale never seen in Quebec history, as workers occupied radio stations, closed down factories and generally disrupted economic activity in the province.

Since then things have cooled down somewhat but increasing militancy is spreading through the Quebec populace. Last month students completed a five week strike at the University of Quebec over increased barriers to education for poor students.

However the fight is not over and the calm in Quebec right now is only on the surface.

"Quebec: A Chronicle" has few faults. Its analysis of the events of the last few years is perceptive and one that English Canadians should be aware of. Quebec is a province unlike any other and will become independent if English Canadians don't take a hard look at the oppressive nature of the federal system.

However, as the book points out, an independent capitalist Quebec is no more desirable than an independent capitalist Canada. Given French Canadian capitalists like Paul Desmarais, head of the super-exploitative Power corporation, the Parti Quebecois reformist stance can offer little attraction for progressive Québecois.

The PQ's lack of support of the struggle of the trade union movement indicates the bankruptcy of their so-called alternative. Former Liberal cabinet minister René Levesque, who has promised to co-operate with American capitalists, is hardly the answer to the problems of Quebec.

The forces that will be critical to the development of an independent socialist Quebec have already begun to coalesce. "Quebec: A Chronicle" is valuable as an analysis of their development over the last four years and the directions they will follow in the inevitable struggles to come.

A motorcade demonstration of militant Montreal teachers ties up streets.

Not all harmful drugs are illegal

There are few books more fascinating than those odd compendiums that do nothing but list facts: the deepest ocean trench, the most lavish dinner party, the most disastrous volcano, the most outrageous stunt, the most grotesque deformity. The Guinness Book of World Records is the bible of this sort of useless data, but there are others in almost every field.

Licit and Illicit Drugs: The Consumers Union Report on Narcotics, Stimulants, Depressants, Inhalants, Hallucinogens and Marijuana — including Caffein, Nicotine and Alcohol is the jaw-breaking title of a recent study. It is far from a trivial book, though it is an endlessly absorbing storehouse of trivia, having an irresistible appeal to a browser. It collects and discusses almost every known fact about mankind's pursuit of stimulation, intoxication and narcosis through chemicals. Such a determined pursuit it is that we can find few cultures (the Eskimos until recently the sole holdouts) that did not have some sort of socially condoned mood-altering drug. (I've always thought that alcohol, contemporaneous with civilization, is in fact the evidence of civilization. When men reach that stage in their social development when it occurs to them to store some grain for the winter, or for a bad season, fermentation begins in the storehouses.)

Just as a tease, let me drop a few facts your way.

- Michael Feodorovich, the first Romanoff Czar, condemned tobacco smokers to slitting of the nostrils, to the bastinado, to the knout. His rather more zealous colleague in Constantinople, Sultan Murad IV went further: Tobacco smoking was a capital crime. (By one of history's exquisite ironies, a popular brand of cigarette in the 1920's was called Murads).

- Homer and Herodotus had tale tales to tell of strange plants whose vapours invested men with religious or prophetic powers. Herodotus wrote of the Scythians, who threw hemp on red-hot stones in a chamber and became transported, shouting aloud. The plant hemp of course, is the source of marijuana.

- In 1902, a respected authority wrote that "coffee drinkers, finding the drug unpleasant, turn to other narcotics, of which opium and alcohol are the most common."

- All the harrowing facts related to heroin addiction, from crime through overdosing to disease, are the results, not of the drug, but of its prohibition.

Clearly, however, the importance of this volume goes far beyond its substantial fascination. It is one of the most important books in years, as far as its social usefulness goes.

A subject as momentous and distressing as the non-medicinal use of drugs (if largely because of the strife such use causes) needs sensible treatment. Thus far, little but arrant nonsense about mind-altering chemicals has been disseminated. We are more ignorant about the effects of even the most common drugs than we are about sex (which, by all accounts, means we are woefully ignorant).

Not that precise, reputable work has not been going on. It has, but who hears about it? A study about the deleterious effects of cigarette smoking is met by a criminally self-serving "rebuttal" by the tobacco cartels. A commission report that denigrates the hazards of marijuana is treated with contemptuous silence by moralizing, sanctimonious administrations. About what other subject can an American chief executive, whom etiquette, at least, demands we call a rational human being, say what Richard Nixon said of marijuana: that even if it is proved to be harmless, he will not legalize it? (Giving the devil his due department: Nixon knows what he's doing, say what Richard Nixon said of marijuana: that even if it is proved to be harmless, he will not legalize it? (Giving the devil his due department: Nixon knows what he's doing. When the Watergate case gets a little too hot, he can dampen it by howling for stiffer penalties for the drug

The Consumers Union, which financed this report (and whose editors wrote it) is a staunchly middle-class, no-nonsense organization that publishes Consumer Reports. That exciting journal tests such things as electric toasters, water pics, spray starches, daiquiri mixes, septic tanks, dandruff shampoos and frozen pizzas. Solemnly they communicate their findings to consuming America. A faintly ridiculous organization — or so I'd always thought.

But follies and single-mindedness have a startling habit of turning into virtues. The dogged respectability of the Consumers Union is a valuable asset when you're dealing with a delicate, myth-ridden subject like drug abuse. The Union is untempted by profit, not pressurable, not easily hoodwinked, thorough, conscientious, methodical, with no goal but protecting any citizens who desire its protection and no pleasure but the underrated one of letting chips fall where they may — and allowing oneself a quiet chuckle.

For this study on drugs, Consumers Union did not, repeat not, run its own tests. (Not only would it be scandalously out of its competence to do so, but they would have soon found their headquarters raided. The United States Bureau of Narcotics is so solicitous of its citizens' welfare that it severely restricts the use of marijuana and LSD even for research, with volunteers, by qualified doctors.)

What the Union has done is to sift through virtually all previous literature on the subject — propaganda, hearsay, rigorous research, conjecture, even government reports. (The preliminary report of the Le Dain Commission in this country, by the way, is cited as an exemplary study, one that future investigators would be well advised to take as a model). When responsible research is compared, it seems, the findings about various drugs are surprisingly similar; the myth that different studies show radically different results (hence the ponderous calls for "caution", for a "moratorium") is truly a myth, a convenient story to scare the children with, a myth ruthlessly exploited by interested parties.

The only problem with this heavy book is how to review it. Any attempt to discredit its findings would be a gigantic, an expensive enterprise, undertaken by a counter-army of biochemists, physicians, psychologists and sociologists. No doubt there will be disputable or erroneous statements in a study this broad; I readily confess I am not competent enough to ferret them out. The book has an unassailable authority to it, though, and if a major error or misrepresentation of fact is found in it, I would be astonished.

Everyone, quite simply, should read this book, for it deals with a problem that affects everyone. Or almost everyone. I know of only one person who uses neither marijuana nor alcohol nor tobacco, not even tea or coffee or Coca-Cola. (Paradoxically, he is the most eager to read this book). So, since the distribution of the volume, costing a well-earned fifteen dollars, to every household in North America is hardly feasible, the best service that can be rendered is to summarize its findings. —

TOBACCO

Tobacco, along with caffeine and alcohol, is one of the most widely used drugs in the West. And while to talk about tea and cocoa in alarmist terms seems farcical, tobacco is taken seriously. At least, the talk about tobacco is taken seriously; action is something else. It's hard to find anyone who disputes the linkage between smoking and cancer — anyone, that is, but the paid mouthpieces of the tobacco industry. Heavy smokers with hacking coughs refuse to give up their cigarettes. Sigmund Freud, who thought cigars were phallic symbols, wouldn't give them up, despite a painful mouth cancer, despite the fact that he was made to look ridiculous by his own loony theory (some cigars are phallic symbols, he explained, but other cigars are just cigars).

The reason is simple. Smoking is not a habit, it is an addiction to the drug nicotine. This is not speculation. Double-blind tests have demonstrated that when nicotine was directly administered, without their knowledge, to cigarette smokers, the rate of cigarette consumption decreased. A diminishing level of nicotine in the bloodstream causes the desire for a cigarette. Not all cigarette smokers are thus addicted; some smoke out of awkwardness — something to do with the hands, or for oral gratification for a desire to be glamorous. All smokers start for reasons like these, of course, but in almost all cases simple addiction takes hold.

The scare about cancer has had some unfortunate results. People think the beast to be shunned is nicotine. Low nicotine cigarettes, filtered cigarettes and so forth have flooded the market, products to reassure the smoker that he is protecting himself.

Nicotine, to be sure, is a harmful drug, affecting, among other things, the heart. But the most pernicious effects of tobacco are not connected with nicotine, but with the inhalation of smoke. Therefore, low-nicotine cigarettes only force the addict to smoke more cigarettes to get comfortable level of nicotine in his bloodstream. The report therefore urges some rather startling measures.

Cigarette smokers should be converted to cigars and pipes, which are rarely inhaled (this suggestion is familiar). Chewing tobacco and snuff should be again popularized; nicotine can be absorbed without the smoke carcinogens. Such sources of pure nicotine as tablets or inhalers should be put on the market and, most feasible, short cigarettes with very high nicotine content should be developed and promoted.

CAFFEIN

The spread of coffee from Ethiopia through the Moslem world and finally into Europe was, as has been noted, met with opposition every bit as brutal and intolerant as meets with marijuana today. Its novelty did account for some strange abuses — fashionable ladies used to have coffee (or cocoa) brought to them in church.

Today, coffee and tea are domesticated drugs, and to link them with opiates or marijuana seems ludicrous. Yet people who will not admit that caffeine is a potentially harmful drug will not supply it to their children. Caffeine (one of a family of drugs called xanthines) increases the metabolic rate; in coffee it irritates the gastro-intestinal tract, as any heavy drinker of strong black brew can tell you. But it is a mind-affecting drug too, acting in the peculiar way addicting drugs do. To infrequent or non-users of caffeine, a few cups of tea or coffee may result in nervousness, headaches, muscular tenseness and spasms. To regular users of coffee (i.e. people addicted to caffeine) the deprivation of caffeine will cause these symptoms (or some of them) and a coffee "fix" will alleviate them. The regular use of caffeine abruptly terminated, then, will result in withdrawal symptoms.

Yes, you say, but through all this may be true, it is true in such a negligibly small way as not to be a problem. But heavy users of caffeine have been known to go into fits of hysteria, displaying extremely violent and "profane" behavior. And rats, fed massive doses of caffeine, become aggressive, launching unprovoked attacks on other rats and sometimes biting themselves with such ferocity that death from haemorrhage resulted.

No humans (the response goes) would willingly drink enough coffee to produce such extreme symptoms. To this objection, the report answers:

"Let us promptly and wholeheartedly agree. There is a lesson to be learned, nevertheless, from the rat reports. If the drug producing this effect in rats were marijuana or LSD, or amphetamine, the report would no doubt have headlines throughout the country. One of the distorting effects of categorizing drugs as "good", "bad", or "nondrugs" is to protect the "nondrugs" such as caffeine from warranted criticisms while subjecting the illicit drugs to widely publicized attacks — regardless of the relevance of the data to the human condition."

ALCOHOL & BARBITURATES

Alcohol, as everyone should know by now, is by any reckoning the most gargantuan and baneful drug-problem we have. But it is also the most intransigent, as that disastrous experiment, noble in purpose (Prohibition) showed.

The reason is simple. Europe for centuries had no coffee or tea, no tobacco, almost no marijuana or opium, no sedatives or stimulants. Alcohol became the all-purpose drug, serving innumerable purposes, social, medical, sacramental, it was used as a sedative, stimulant, narcotic and tranquilizer; it was a means of celebration and, with water so often perilous, the only safe beverage. That European heritage persists, despite the competition of tobacco and caffeine (often just adjuncts to alcohol) and despite the recent and valiant attempt to replace booze with marijuana as a social drug.

The report deplors the insidious effects of alcohol, to bodies social and physiological, but admits there is nothing to be done. Prohibition seems a cure worse than the disease. The only measure they recommend, rather dispiritedly, is a complete ban on the advertising and promotion of alcohol. Barbiturates, however, pharmacologically almost an exact equivalent of alcohol, do interest the commission. A craving (addiction) to alcohol can be satisfied with barbiturates, and vice-versa. It is known that an overdose of alcohol is fatal. (Not long ago in Toronto such a foolish death occurred. Two young men, on what seemed to have been their first attempted drink, chug-a-lugged a fifth of rum each. One died within minutes). The confusion about alcohol and barbiturates has resulted in many deaths, including the much publicized one of Dorothy Kilgallen. In effect, taking both drugs together is the equivalent of taking a massive dose of one or the other. Yet barbiturates are freely prescribed, without, it seems, sufficient warning of the dangers involved.

Though they admit alcohol is here to stay, the union recommends that traffic in the barbiturates be closely watched. These drugs do have legitimate medical uses, but are used insaintly. (Heroin addiction, according to his book, often has the startling effect of investing futile, meaningless lives with purpose. Getting heroin is a challenge; each day the user must perform a series of exciting and dangerous tasks before he can get his drug). The speed freak, partially due to his younger and more sheltered social background — most speed freaks are young, middle class whites — is ill at ease in the drug scene. Continued use of this drug brings about a paranoid psychosis. The two lads on Madison Avenue who shot, without provocation, a policeman may be freaks but their crime was not a fluke. Such irrational, desperate behavior is not uncommon.

Addiction to amphetamines threatens to become an even greater problem. Sweden, which tends to take sensible attitudes to drugs, has experienced an exacerbation of their amphetamine crisis. Solutions here are not so easy as with heroin. The drug itself, for one thing, is harmful, and prohibition would drive users to cocaine — another disastrous drug. The real dangers of speed must be publicized, discouraging curious young people. Once hooked, the only way out seems to be to convert to the less physiologically harmful drug heroin or methadone. Such a drastic measure might point up just how terrible a life is that of the mainliner of amphetamines. Of course, it's little help until either heroin or methadone is supplied legally. Until that time, the speed scene looks bleak indeed.

LSD

LSD disproves the old saw about there being nothing new under the sun; it was not discovered until 1938 and its psychoactive properties were not realized until five years later. Not until the good Dr. Leary informed us of its wonders did lysergic acid diethylamide become a common drug.

Things like LSD had been around for a while, though; most notably peyote, used extensively in Indian religious ceremonies. This dried button from a certain cactus plant, when chewed and swallowed, causes spectacular effects. The peyote trip "comprises the kaleidoscopic play of visual hallucinations in indescribably rich colors, yet auditory and tactile hallucinations and a variety of synesthesias are among the effects". A typical synesthesia, the report comments, is "the 'seeing' of music in colours or the 'hearing' of a painting as music." An experience of deep insight is a common reaction. Other plants produce similar effects — nutmeg, morning glory seeds, various mushrooms.

LSD's psychoactive effects were stumbled on by accident. A Swiss chemist, working with ergot derivatives, fell ill one day, experienced delirium and exciting fantasies. He had accidentally ingested some LSD-25. He repeated the experiment discriminately as "thrill pills". The likelihood of such controls is reduced by the admission of a basic hypocrisy in our drug policy: "Alcohol is treated as a nondrug; it is on sale in multidose bottles at some 40,000 liquor stores and in countless other outlets as well. . . . The barbiturates, in contrast, are legally salable only on prescription in pharmacies; other sales are severely punishable criminal offenses. It is a curious fact, indeed, that Americans today are bombarded with advertising urging them to buy a liquid that, if secured without a prescription in tablet or capsule form, could lead to imprisonment for both buyer and seller."

COCAINE & AMPHETAMINES

If any drug comes close to fulfilling the grotesque warnings issued about drug addiction, it is speed. The amphetamines are a group of stimulants acting in ways similar to cocaine (often thought to be a narcotic) and benzedrine. Amphetamines have been abused for a long time — used by athletes and businessmen — but only recently has the devastating practice of injecting them become common.

Compared to the speed freak, the heroin addict appears and got more than he bargained for on his second trip. This is a common property of this class of drugs — what you get is closely tied to what you think you're going to get.

Hard, specific information on LSD seems more elusive than any other drug. The postcards from good and bad trips give us a rough picture of those psychic landscapes liable to be encountered, true. But suspicion still lurks that LSD might have effects hitherto unexpected. Consumers Union scotches a lot of the more imaginative yarns about suicides, genetic defects, spontaneous reprints, and the like. But...

Much of the information about LSD comes from its use as a drug in treating mental disorders; since LSD is a drug with idiosyncratic effects, such data are not very helpful to sane, stable users. But LSD is not addictive, no fatalities seem to have resulted and, happily, it seems to have been largely "domesticated" — used by people who know what they're doing. But there is still the possibility of its abuse, as it was abused in the heyday of the sixties. All in all, the subject of LSD is one that disquiets the authors of the report; it is the one drug about which it is not a distortion to say we don't know enough to be dogmatic.

THE OPIATES & HEROIN

In the last century, and most of this, you could walk into drugstores and take off the shelves such innocent-sounding proprietary medicines as Godfrey's Cordial or Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup. Many women did, and became quite reliant on them. Some were so convinced of their beneficial effects that they gave them to their babies, when the poor things were crying. The crying usually stopped — such medicines must have been a godsend in those prolific days. The reason they worked, of course, was that in addition to a base of molasses or saffras or whatever, such medicines contained a hearty dose of opium. Nineteenth century America was a "drug takers' paradise".

This wicked state of affairs cannot be ascribed solely to ignorance. Physicians knew full well the seductive charm of elixirs, but addiction to opium was, if not respectable, at least tolerable. Alcoholics were often weaned from the bottle by substituting opiates. Women who were too fond of their Cherry Pectoral were whispered about, of course (and it was a woman's addiction, then) but they were not shunned. There was, in short, no drug "subculture" which developed its own antisocial mores.

Much could have been learned from a shrewd look at that century, but when the Federal Narcotics Bureau in the US burst on the scene in the early part of this century, it preferred to go its all-or-nothing way: prohibition, prosecution, harassment. The genteel drug-culture went underground, only to re-emerge as one of the ugliest monsters created by human stupidity — heroin addiction.

The common source of such different mood altering substances as Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup, codeine, opium, morphine and heroin is the opium poppy, papaver somniferum. It grows extensively in the middle east and Southeast Asia, and through devious and exotic channels as lore-ridden as the spice routes of antiquity makes its insidious way to North America.

The commission devotes the greatest number of pages to the opiates, all of which is fascinating. But heroin is the main problem here, and I'll limit myself to talking about that.

Heroin is, virtually, a very powerful form of morphine, the most potent of the opiates. An administration of heroin (it can be inhaled, smoked, taken by mouth, absorbed through the mucous membranes of mouth or anus, injected under the skin or mainlined — shot into the bloodstream) effects most non- or infrequent users with euphoria, often following an orgasmic-like "rush". Unpleasant and harmful side effects may result, too. The catch is that heroin is one of the most addicting substances known to man, and the heroin addict develops a tolerance — that is, it takes ever greater amounts of the drug to achieve euphoria, then euphoria comes no more. But heroin must still be taken or dysphoria — withdrawal symptoms — occur. Withdrawal is, by all accounts, an excruciating experience. (It has been suggested that heroin addicts use heroin in order to achieve withdrawal symptoms — which can then be exquisitely alleviated by an injection of the drug. This is moot, to say the least).

If that rare thing, successful withdrawal, occurs, intense cravings for the drug afflict the ex-addict. Such cravings recur in waves, often months or even years apart. They are quite irresistible, it seems, and account for the desperately low figures of heroin addicts successfully kicking the habit. Such rare "cures" are given such extreme publicity by well-meaning public officials, charges Consumers Union, that they have started the destructive belief that kicking heroin is easy for some one with "will power" — which makes, in our perverse world, it even more appealing for kids out for a kick.

The Varsity—Frank Rooney and Will Quamer

That is the heroin horror story, and it's reasonably well known. What is not so well known is the silver lining. A person addicted to heroin can live a long, productive healthy — and happy as any other — life, provided that he gets his daily fix of the drug, which costs only a few cents to produce. (The Study cites examples of such people — famous ones). But when heroin is illegal, its value to criminals skyrockets. The average addict in New York City (which is to drug addicts what Paris is to gourmets) must spend at least $20 for his daily supply of heroin. Such an expensive habit is supported, with only a few exceptions, by crime. Few addicts, since they are forced to seek out and use heroin several times a day, have the time to work. The epidemic of theft in New York City is due not to heroin, but to heroin prohibition. The British system, of registering all addicts and supplying them with the drug at cost, is a dream. Why don't we adopt it?

The moral element, of course, is at bottom. Evil must be stamped out, no matter what the cost in misery. There is no earthly reason to prevent heroin addicts, who are, like it or not, addicted for good, from getting their drug. Even that mysterious and much-publicized danger "heroin overdose" seems to be a chimera. Addicts can tolerate immense amounts of their drug, but deaths result, often within minutes, after certain injections. This seems to be a reaction to the standard adulterants used to cut heroin for the street market — to judge the profit even higher. (One "fix" of heroin, which costs about a quarter of a cent to manufacture sells for five dollars in New York.)

There is one other solution — methadone. This is a synthetic opiate which replaces heroin, makes heroin intolerable to the addict. It is an addicting drug, and must be taken daily. But it seems, all things considered, the only solution to the heroin epidemic. The report urges its use, after a long and careful discussion of this extraordinary drug problem.

More even than with marijuana or LSD, the heroin problem seems to have been created and exacerbated by meddlesome, moralizing legislation. The same mentality now sends out scares and misleading statistics about the only two solutions to the problem — legal heroin at cost or methadone maintenance. A solution — not a panacea but a solution — seems magically simple, unbelievably easy. It is ignored. Instead, we get stern rhetoric about death penalties for pushers. There's enough profit in the business now to persuade people the risk is worth it. The harder the laws get, the more profit there will be.

MARIJUANA & HASHISH

Despite its importance in putting a rational perspective on the broad problem of drug abuse, licit and illicit, I doubt this report would have got much mention at all in the press were it not for one of its many recommendations; it called flatly and unequivocally for the legalization and state regulation of marijuana.

This proposal came at the end of one of the most absorbing sections in this most absorbing book. Marijuana, it seems, has been along much longer than most people realize. The first mention of it is in a Chinese document from 2737 BC, and there are mentions of what is very probably cannabis in Homer and Herodotus, in the Atharva Veda, in the Bible, and in Rabelais. One reason for marijuana's longevity is that its practical use long outweighed its recreational one. The hemp plant was bred for its long fibres, used in rope and linen. One of the least endearing qualities of the plant to marijuana growers today is its extreme height; it towers over other crops with a lamentable lack of discretion. For centuries, entrepreneurs interested mainly in rope and linen bred the crop for the longest possible fibres; illegal entrepreneurs today are trying to undo all that genetic tampering, with some success.

In the West, cannabis is readily available in two forms; marijuana and the concentrated resin hashish (bearing roughly the same relation to each other as do wine and brandy). In India for instance, where cannabis use in some areas is as prevalent and unremarkable as our use of tea or coffee, connoisseurs' distinctions are made among varieties and strengths of marijuana; some are smoked, some are ground into beverages, some are eaten. A detailed etiquette dictates when and how the various types shall be used. But then there are an estimated 200 to 250 million regular users of marijuana in the world, and it is only likely that its use should become as ritualized as that of its competitor drugs, caffeine, tobacco and alcohol (marijuana runs a clear fourth among mankind's preferred drugs; the situation holds true for North America).

Cannabis, in extract form, was known pharmacologically since the last century, but was not nearly so popular as the ubiquitous opiates. The demand for marijuana skyrocketed when alcohol was prohibited; dingy, unofficially tolerated "speakeasies" sprang up where, for a quarter, you could get high on smoke. This development did not escape the notice of Harry Anslinger, then a prohibition officer. When alcohol became legal again, the energies and resources of his federal agency turned against drugs, the favorite target of which was the "lethal weed".

Following Anslinger's new crusade, state legislatures drew up Draconian laws about marijuana with exemplary haste (death sentences were not uncommon for a second selling offense or selling to a minor). Sensational crimes linked to marijuana smoking were ruthlessly exploited by the press, which often ignored the fact that the grass smoked was often a rather peaceful lull in a binge of alcohol consumption. Marijuana became the scapegoat in no one knows how many drunken crimes. (A similar situation led to the banning of absinthe in Europe after a brutal mass-murder by a raging alcoholic, only a small fraction of whose daily consumption of booze was taken in the form of absinthe.)

The intolerance of marijuana continued until the mid-60's, when, as one young grass-smoker put it, it was "illegal to smoke marijuana unless you have your hair cut once a month." There is more truth than hyperbole to the statement. Adults, or the children of well-known or prosperous parents, were rarely charged with possession or use of the drug; on the rare occasions they were, lenient sentences were given. If you were young and looked rebellious, however, (or black, for that matter) watch out. Discretionary powers in sentencing were used with appalling lack of discretion by officials who persecuted, not marijuana use, but the counter culture that marijuana came to symbolize. (This has been as much as admitted by some candid opponents of marijuana.)

But, despite all the harassment and bad press, marijuana is becoming domesticated. Passing round joints is as common at smart New York dinner parties as passing round martinis; shrewd hostesses, as a matter of fact, divide their guest lists into pot- and booze-users, and hold separate parties with appropriate offerings. Marijuana, in fact, is making the first serious challenge to alcohol.

This report, however, doubts that alcohol will be supplanted. Marijuana use and alcohol use, often thought to be inimical, seem to go together — abstainers from alcohol are unlikely to use grass, grass is more and more likely to be smoked over wine.

In its careful and thorough discussion of marijuana use in North America, the union praises the Interim Report of the Le Dain Commission in Canada for its sensible attitude towards the drug. American reports, it says, had tended to present ponderous sociological or psychological "reasons" for the inconvenient fact of marijuana use; the Le Dain report for the first time included the prime reason — that marijuana use is enjoyable.

Though the Consumers Union does not absolve marijuana of all danger — no drug, it repeats, is harmless — it none the less recommends complete decriminalization, legalization and government control of a drug that is easily acquired, unstoppable, and, compared to tobacco or alcohol, benign.

movies

As our ultimate watsup for the year, we're not going to direct you to this special screening and that revival for every Tuesday and Thursday all summer long. What we thought might be nice is to round up what's good and what's not so good, what's playing now and what's liable to be playing soon.

The best movie in town may well be The Emigrants, the first half of an epic by the Swedish cinematographer-director Jan Troell. Superbly photographed, impeccably acted, this story of a pursuit of the early American dream is a slow one in spots, and subtitled ("It bodes ill for the crops"). Nonetheless, it is far more worthy than many a more gripping film. At the International, Yonge and Manor Road.

Sounder is another utterly likeable film, this one about a family of poor black sharecroppers in Louisiana during the depression, and the problems they face when the father is imprisoned for stealing some food. The charge of sentimentality has been made against it, unsuccessfully I think. It is a simple, moving, film that does not shun emotion. Cicely Tyson does a shatteringly good job as the beleaguered mother. Sounder is now at several neighborhood theatres, but if it won a major award last night, it will surely be back downtown.

Cabaret is in its second year now, at the Cinema, Toronto-Dominion Centre. Some found it the most exhilaratingly daring musical ever, others found it clever and tuneful but a little hackneyed. The in-between parts about Nazism, anti-semitism and general decadence in pre-war Berlin are nothing special, but when Bob Fosse sets up his songs and dances in the seedy little cabaret, it's nothing short of brilliant. Liza Minelli reaches full star-incandescence when she sings, and Joel Grey as the magnetically repellent emcee just about steals the show. If you haven't seen Cabaret, do.

This is being written on Monday, and Tuesday night the Oscars will be known. Smart money is on The Godfather for best film and god knows what all else. My reason for saying this is that it will certainly be brought back. A lot of people haven't been to see it, on the grounds that it's only a "gangster" picture, or that they object to its violence. Too bad — it is truly an extraordinary entertainment, not far from art. Brando's much touted performance as the patriarch Don Corleone is a bravura piece of character acting, but the real kudos should go to Al Pacino as the quiet, scholarly son who ends up as the new godfather. Three hours long and not really for the squeamish, but a deep portrait of an the Italian-American subculture and a gripping pseudo-documentary on the workings of the Mafia.

Sleuth is immense fun, thanks largely to Olivier's stunning talents. Anthony Schaeffer's mystery play looks a little tedious and brittle on screen, but director Mankiewicz has turned out an extravagant, amusing production. No one admitted after the show begins, at the University Theatre.

We can't promise you Last Tango in Paris, but it's been approved for showing in Quebec, so chances look good (or bad)... This hothouse treatment of sexual tensions has gotten extraordinary praise from Pauline Kael, unmeeking condemnation by John Simon. Clearly, a controversial film. Bertolucci would be a superb pornographer. His use of exotic settings and lush lighting effects are mere gimmicks; he hasn't yet shown himself to be an artist. It'll be interesting to see who's right on this one.

Bunuel's The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie (the best film title since Godard's Two or Three Things I Know about Her) may be in town soon. If you don't know Bunuel's totally idiosyncratic work, you may be startled; there is no other filmmaker who grinds his axes so fearlessly and wickedly as this grand old man.

Avoid like the Plague department: The Getaway (not only Peckinpah's worst film, but a bad film in itself. Ali McGraw surpasses herself); Travels with my Aunt (a hysteroid acting job by Maggie Smith is no help to this geriatric production of Auntie Mame as rewritten by Graham Greene); Deliverance, (still going strong, god knows why); Man of La Mancha (getting a good movie out of that clunky property was an impossible dream); Sliether (enough said); Shamus (if only out of terminal boredom with Burt Reynolds); and Lost Horizon (which, by all reckonings, makes The Sound of Music look like Last Tango).

Neither here nor there department: The Poseidon Adventure, Lady Sings the Blues, Payday, Fiddler on the Roof, Pete 'n' Tillie, The Heartbreak Kid.

Anytime, anywhere you notice Sunday Bloody Sunday playing get yourself off to see it. It will survive all the gaudy hype of A Clockwork Orange, Straw Dogs, The Godfather, probably even Tango. It's one of the finest, least obtrusive pictures ever made.

art

Your best bet, as always in summer, for learning what's going on in town in the galleries is the Globe and Mail on Saturdays.

Remember that the Fontainebleau exhibit, subtitled Art in France 1528-1610, at the National Gallery continues until April 15. Lectures are in progress and the exhibit involves over 200 pieces. At the Art Gallery of Ontario an exhibit entitled "Germanic Objects" begins March 30, and beginning May 19, "The Art of Jean Hugo". On July 7 the curator digs up from the gallery's collection treasures of "Canadian Heritage", and beginning August 1, "Progress in Conservation". This exhibition illustrates how scientific examination and analysis can be applied to the care and treatment of works of art.

Erindale still has several exhibits left, in fact which continues all through the summer: beginning April 16, a retrospective exhibition by the internationally known Canadian sculptor, Dora dePedry Hunt. The exhibition is from Germany and France. From June 1 to September 18 there will be a showing of prints by Erindale students working in association with the Artist-in-Residence.

Alan Collier is at the Roberts Gallery until April 7. He has gone on a number of sketching trips to various parts of Canada and spent some weeks on a Canadian Coast Guard icebreaker — so he's had plenty of scenic inspiration.

The Isaacs Gallery is featuring Graham Coughtry's new paintings and his water figure series until April 10.

Joan Pattee, a Montreal Artist who studied under Arthur Lismer, is at the Saint-Louis-de-France, 1415 Don Mills Road on April 4 (8-10 pm), April 5-6 (1-10 pm) and the admission is free. Jim Fraser is at Gallery 76 until April 1. And the climax of this column, Royden Ranowitch, is at Carmen Lamanna until April 12.

pop

Apologies to anyone who went to the El Mocambo last week to see Fats Domino and expected the cover charge of $1-$2 as mentioned here. The cover charge at that establishment has a habit of varying from week to week and depends on the drawing power of the performer. As I've advised before, always call first to check if you can afford the cover and usually extravagant beer prices.

Bars are the least recommendable places in which to enjoy music because the managements' emphasis is on alcohol consumption, not musical quality. For that reason (and the high costs involved), I've only listed saloon entertainment on rare occasions. The El Mocambo, Spadina below College (951-2558) has been listed more often because the cover charges are usually lower than most places and the waiters less pushy (but there is a required coat check charge). It's possible to order only once and not be hassled. That's not true of too many other places. Joe Walsh, former lead guitarist of the James Gang is currently there and upcoming acts include Sam and Dave and Merry Clayton (on April 30). Clayton has worked as a backup vocalist for Joe Cocker and the Stones as well as a solo recording artist. Most recently she sang the part of "The Acid Queen" on the new "Tommy" album.

There is a lot of cheaper, and even free music around the city but you have to be a little less choosy about the day and time.

Good folk music is always available at Fiddler's Green, behind the Y on Eglinton east of Yonge, on Tuesday and Friday nights. Admission is only $1. Call 489-3001 for more information.

Free music, usually performed by top Canadian bands, is available if you want to be part of the audience for the taping of CITY-TV's Music City show on Sundays at 2 pm. Past performers have included Valdy, Chillawack and Crowbar. The number for information is 867-7979.

Bathurst Street United Church, Bathurst below Bloor, is the site for THOG and TANC music, theater and food evenings almost every Sunday night. Admission varies from $1.50 to nothing. Many performers who are appearing elsewhere in town often drop in to play.

There's a restaurant in Rochdale has been presenting musical evenings, with a $1 cover on weekdays and $1.50 to $2.50 admission on the weekend. You can get information on times and artists by calling (929-3416).

There is a profusion of concerts and appearances over the next few months but these are the ones of note.

B.B. King, Massey Hall, Monday April 2, ($3.50-$6.00) Randy Newman, Sandy Denny (formerly on Fairport Convention) and Eric Weissberg and Deliverance, Massey Hall, Friday, April 6, ($3.50-$6.00).

Lou Reed and Genesis, Massey Hall, Monday April 9.

Paul Butterfield and Better Days and Jeff Beck, Maple Leaf Gardens, Friday April 13.

Incredible String Band, Massey Hall, Monday April 23, ($3.50-$5.50).

Isaac Hayes, O'Keefe Centre, May 21-26. Frank Zappa and the Mothers plus the Mahavishnu Orchestra are scheduled for the Gardens on May 4. Both acts belong in Massey Hall. If you were planning to go, protest Cimba Productions singular interest in money and lack of concern for the listener by staying at home.

Wishbone Ash is in concert at Massey Hall, tomorrow ($3.50-$5.50). They were here only months ago and gave one of the most boring concerts of the year (tickets were only $3 then) after being upstaged by Howard Kaylan and Mark Volman. The only reason you might be interested in this particular concert would be to see Gentle Giant (who are difficult to describe, but similar to King Crimson) and Vinegar Joe (featuring Elkie Brooks on vocals).

The Riverboat (922-6216) has Ry Cooder in on Thursday, April 5, and the blues duo of Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee from May 15 to May 27.

The Mariposa Folk Festival will be taking place on July 6, 7 and 8 on a new site on the south side of Centre Island (last year's site might be closed because of rising water levels in Lake Ontario). Ticket prices have increased slightly to $12 for a 3 day pass or $4.50 per day in advance. Last year's festival was so huge a success that tickets will be restricted to only 8000 per day. There will be almost no publicity for the event, so contact the Mariposa office, 329 St. George (922-4871) for information and mail-order tickets.

If you're still interested, here are some quick observations about this year's new records. Best Records — Tommy, The London Symphony Orchestra; Catch Bull At Four, Cat Stevens.

Most Disappointing — Don't Shoot Me, Elton John; Journey Through The Past, Neil Young.

theatre

This week and next, between Tuesday and Saturday, The Menagerie Players present I am a Camera at the Central Library Theatre. They have been mentioning that the current musical, Cabaret, was adapted from the Van Drueten play. While this is true, it might be misleading, since the play tells the story of Sally Bowles minus the cabaret scenes. Tickets are $3.00 and $2.50 for students.

Firehall Theatre, 70 Berkely Street will begin its run of Maxim Corky's The Zykovs tomorrow night. Snitten in 1914, the play concerns the Russian middle-class. Though it is basically concerned with a family situation, there are moral and political overtones evident in the text of the writer now revered throughout the Soviet Union.

Tarragon Theatre is presenting its most ambitious undertaking yet, a festival of one-act plays. The Du Maurier Foundation has subsidized the effort, which has required a good deal of time and coordination. There are two separate programs in the festival, entitled Gifts and Turtle Songs. Seven plays will be seen in all, during a repertory program which will continue until April 22. Tarragon's director, Bill Glasco, hopes to discover not only new dramatic material, but new directors. Gifts opens March 26, Turtle Songs, March 30.

There is considerable excitement over the English adaptation of Les Belles-Sœurs, scheduled to open April 5 at the St. Lawrence Centre. The comedy, which translates The Sisters-in-Law was a tremendous success throughout Québec and established Michel Tremblay as the foremost Québécois playwright. It is the Centre's final production of the season, and the only Canadian work on the program.

More on French-Canadiana. On April 17, La Sagouine an Acadian theatrical show by Antonine Maillet will be presented by La Chasse-Galerie, an organization devoted to promoting French culture in Toronto. It will take place at the St. Lawrence Centre. Viola Leger will appear on the same evening with a monologue called The Show of the Year.

University Women's Studies has an interesting presentation on French-English relations to be offered at one pm today, tomorrow and Friday at UC Playhouse. It is the dramatization of an unusual book called Dear Enemies or in French Chers Ennemis. (It was published in both languages simultaneously.) This dialogue between writers Solange Chaput Rolland and Gwethalyn Graham is an attempt to clarify the issues that divide English and French Canadians in every-day life. Its tone is often forceful on both sides, but the genuine affection that exists between the women makes this a healthy rather than a bitter frankness. It might be kept in mind that the book came out in 1964, in the blossom of the Quiet Revolution and before the heat of 1970. Bilingualism was still a shining ideal, a panacea of English-French problems, and separatism was the mania of a few. The two actresses performing the adaptation evidently feel that enough of the points made in the book still apply in 1973.

UC Playhouse has more to offer in original productions. Nancy Reason's play about the theatre, Audition, will play March 28 to 31 at 8:30 pm. The final production, Wilton Remembers, described as a "nightmare of expose and macabre justice," plays April 4 to 7 also evenings.

St. Michael's College has produced the musical, The Boyfriend, to be performed March winner of the New York Drama Desk Critics Award for best foreign play of the year. Tickets are available from the Poor Alex box office and The United Nations Association. The play is banned in South Africa, incidentally.

The Factory Lab Theatre, which is in its death throes, is opening its next production, Bagdad Saloon tonight. Don't be surprised to encounter a fund-raising campaign at the theatre. Ken Gass knows that only public support in the eleventh hour will raise Factory up from the dead. And it just may happen. We can only hope. Tuesday night admission is pay-what-you-can. Wednesday to Sunday, students pay $2.50.

On April 2 the London comedy hit, Move Dver Mrs. Markham will move into the O'Keefe Centre. The big name connected with the production — Honor Blackman.

From May 14 to 19, D'Keefe will feature Les Grands Ballets Canadiens, Montreal's resident ballet. Isaac Hayes will appear in concert from May 21 to 26, and from May 29 to June a new century comedies. A Month in the Country by Ivan Turgenev is psychological drama in the Chekhov tradition. Nikolai Gogol's The Marriage Brokers is a farce in the style of The Inspector General (recently mishandled by the Toronto Workshop Productions). While the adherence to classics can be understood when considering choice of repertoire for the Festival Theatre, one wonders why modern works, even relatively established modern works weren't chosen. Why not Pinter, Beckett or Ionesco? Why not American and Canadian contemporary works? Stratford does not exist in a vacuum where the complexities of modern living are of no interest.

The answer might be given us that there does exist a small theatre for contemporary works — The Third Stage. This year it will house a stage adaptation by Michael Ondaatje of his book The Collected Works of Billy The Kid. It won the Governor General's award in 1971. Billy The Kid opens July 10. On August 14, a play for marionettes and people, Innok And The Sun, will open there, and on August 15 a newly commissioned opera called Exiles will have its premiere.

Toronto's theatres will be playing out their final offerings of the season in the near future. You can still see Indians at Toronto Workshop Productions, Pauline at the Theatre Passe Muraille, and The Jest Society at the Poor Alex (See today's reviews for the latter two). But once June rolls around it will be up to the larger theatres to provide live entertainment for the diminished theatre-going public. O'Keefe Centre and St. Lawrence Centre will probably offer light productions for the summer months.

With the idea of community theatre becoming more predominant, its best to check the newspapers, small Toronto publications and lampposts carefully for notices of more intimate theatrical happenings. Best of luck.

music

I won't be too extensive in this last watsup because I do not want to be. First and foremost remember that the Metropolitan Festival Choir and Orchestra with "treble choristers" from the choir of St. George's College and Grace Church on-the-Hill is presenting Bach's St. Matthew Passion on April 14 at 8 pm (so you needn't miss the first after-dinner hour of Saturday-night exercises at Starvin' Marvins). Tickets are $2 and $4.

Remember Stratford and both the New York Philharmonic and Chicago Syphony. The Beaux Arts Trio, Philippe Entremont, Alexandre Legoya and the Orford String Quartet among others will also be there at various times during the summer.

The Festival Singers still have April 4 and May 5 concerts left. The Etobicoke East York Symphony has a concert with Lois Marshall on April 20 and April 22: write 550 Mortimer Avenue, Toronto 6 for info and tickets. Also remember the last two concerts in the International String Quartet series at the St. Lawrence Centre: April 6 and April 16: the Borodin Quartet and the most noteworthy quartet in the world, the Amadeus quartet.

Tomorrow night the University of Toronto Band plans to give its last concert of the season, at 8:30 pm. The colourful program includes Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, Vittorio Giannini's Symphony no. 3, Karl Kroeger's Divertimento for Band and the Fanfare and Allegro by Williams. No charge and no tickets.

The Toronto Chamber Society directed by Annegret Wright presents its spring concert in Trinity College Chapel March 31, 8:30 pm. Soloists and choir and orchestra will present an integrated and perfectly balanced program of works by Antonio Caldara, Heinrich Schutz, Monteverdi, Buxtehude and Johann S. Bach. Students may if they are lucky get in for $2.50. This is because they're gallery seats and limited.

The Opera Department presents its final concert: L'Ormino by Francesco Cavalli, "excavated" and restored by Raymond Leppard, in an English translation by Geoffrey Dunn. Students can get in for $1.50 (box office opened Monday) on April 12, 13, 14, 15 at 8 pm.

30, 31, April first, seventh and eighth at 1515 Bathurst (at St. Clair).

The Pucoli Ludique Societas, theatre group originating from the Centre for Medieval Studies, will present The Townley Crucifixion at the Royal Ontario Museum on March 30 and 31. The presentation at the Museum will precede their planned tour of the U.S.A. Admission is free. The performance takes place in the Armour Court of the Museum at (note) six pm.

Classical Stage Productions have completed their season of classics at the Colonnade theatre and are preparing their first off-season production, The Last of the Red Hot Lovers, by Neil Simon. It will open on Wednesday, April 5, for an indefinite run, normally Tuesday to Sunday at 8:30 pm.

Hart House Theatre will receive Toronto's French Theatre group, Les Tretaux de Paris, on April 6 and 7. The troupe claims to be the first in Toronto, but then the Theatre du P'tit Bonheur claims to be the only one. The two one-act plays presented will be Les Marquises de la Fourchette by Eugene Labiche and La Baby-sitter by Rene de Obaldia.

The Poor Alex Theatre is housing a play called Boesman and Lena between April 3 and 28. It concerns two people who live under apartheid, and has been produced with the support of the United Nations Association. It is musical from the Charlottetown Festival, Ballade will grace the stage.

Springtime has brought three musical productions to Toronto. This week the Busby Berkeley spectacular, No, No, Nanette will be at the Royal Alexandra, and from April 2 to 21, the new fifties musical comedy, Grease, will play there. On April 23, Carol Channing will open at the O'Keefe Centre with her "new" production, Lorelei taken from the popular film Gentlemen Prefer Blondes. That was a long time ago, though, wasn't it? Trust Godspell to continue at the Playhouse through April 22.

Workers want Ryerson books open

Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNie hinted yesterday to three hundred Ryerson students, workers and supporters that their demand to inspect Ryerson's books may have some justification, but refused to make a specific statement to their Queen's Park demonstration.

Sixty-five Ryerson faculty members have signed an open letter demanding that president Don Mordell open the institute's books to show that laying off 48 Ryerson maintenance workers is justified. Included in the letter is a pledge to donate part of their own salaries to the fired workers.

The lay-offs, which became permanent last Friday have reduced the ranks of CUPE local 233, which represents Ryerson workers, from 106 to 58.

A call for an investigation of Ryerson's administrative operations and spending has also come from the Liberal MPP for St. George riding, Margaret Campbell.

Campbell has demanded a full public inquiry but McNie has refused the request. The newly elected MPP has also sent a letter to Mordell deploring the layoffs.

Labour Minister Fern Gaudin promised Monday to launch an immediate investigation into Opposition charges that the firings "are a scheme to defeat the true purpose of the Employment Standards Act."

The maintenance workers, meanwhile, have been demonstrating in front of the institute's administrative building, Jorgenson Hall.

Since the workers will not legally be in a position to strike for 2 months, all they can do at present is to try to bring public pressure to bear.

At a meeting of students, workers and teachers held two weeks ago, Ryerson's Student Union president Marc Belanger said that the maintenance people were fired because the administration thought they were not important to the campus and would be easy to release.

"By next year, the students will be cleaning the classrooms. It's a disgrace. They're firing 50 per cent of the maintenance staff, most of them with families," Belanger said.

The workers marched on Queen's Park yesterday, along with family members and supporters. McNie had agreed to see them "if I can break another appointment." He did so, but was repeatedly heckled by evading questions.

300,000 held in Saigon jails

Thieu is murdering captives, says teacher

By GARRY NEIL

A recently released South Vietnamese prisoner charged Monday that premier Nguyen Van Thieu's regime has begun to "liquidate" many of the estimated 300,000 civilian political prisoners held in its jails.

Speaking to 50 people Monday in Sidney Smith Hall, French school teacher Jean-Pierre Debris pointed to recent reports from South Vietnam that hundreds of people in prison clothes have been found floating in water near a prison. He called on world public opinion to react to help prevent a wholesale massacre.

When Debris was released, along with fellow schoolteacher Andre Menras last December 29, he said, "Our first reaction was not to want to leave, because we were certain that the Thieu administration's motive for freeing us at this time is to get rid of a couple of potentially embarrassing witnesses to the liquidation of the political prisoners which has now begun to occur."

Debris went to South Vietnam in 1968 to teach in the French colleges in Saigon and Danang. He soon discovered the corruption of the Saigon regime when senators and other high government officers began to offer him money and gifts in exchange for copies of the exams which would enable their sons to obtain admission to French universities.

He said he became more indignant when he saw corpses on the roadside being mutilated by American and Korean soldiers, when he saw thousands of peasants displaced from their land and when he saw young women forced to become prostitutes in order to survive. Both French teachers appeared before the National Assembly building in Saigon, on July 25, 1970 unfurled an NLF flag, and began to distribute leaflets calling for peace. They were beaten and arrested by Saigon Secret Police, he said, and were immediately jailed in Chi Hoa prison where they remained until their release last December.

During the two years in which they were imprisoned they saw prisoners whose only "crime" was to be a "neutralist" or to have been in the "wrong place at the wrong time" — to fill police "quotas" of Communists arrested. These prisoners were subjected to tortures and "appalling" conditions, he charged.

Debris spoke of people who had their eyes gouged out and their ears and fingers cut off, and of guards who drove nails into the bodies of the prisoners and needles under finger nails.

"Women students were almost all raped . . . and had live eels and Coca Cola bottles thrust into their vaginas," he said. Debris related tales of the Tiger cages of the Con Son prison colony located off the south coast, where almost all of the prisoners were paralyzed and a large number had tuberculosis, were blinded or suffered from other diseases.

In the prison the daily diet decreases every year, he said, and is now only 600 grams of cooked rice and a little salt. And for the "stubborn" prisoners — the majority — who refuse to salute the Saigon flag every morning, there are continual beatings. Each prison has an American advisor who is aware of the conditions in the prison, he commented.

Debris stated that not only are the tiger cages still in use, but more are being built. He showed a photocopy of a $41,521 contract an American company, RMK, was awarded the Navy on January 7, 1971 to build new tiger cages.

Debris himself was subjected to severe beatings in the "movie room", of Chi Hoa prison he claimed. The room becomes a movie theatre when the International Red Cross or American politicians visit, but is the torture and interrogation room the rest of the time.

Debris remarked that great changes overcame Chi Hoa prison in the past nine months. From about March 1972, the prisoners began to see "lawyers, intellectuals, professors, students, even Catholic students, Buddhist monks; in fact, an entire category of prisoners that until then, we had not been accustomed to see." At first we were extremely surprised. Then we understood: these people belonged to the neutral 'third force' that Thieu is so afraid of.

In addition, on November 15, Colonel Nguyen Van Ve became director of Chi Hoa prison, which is a clearing ground for all political prisoners. Ve was director of Con Son prison at the time the tiger cages were discovered.

Ve immediately began to change the classification of political prisoners to that of common criminals and began to disperse them throughout the prison said Debris. Ve also systematically destroyed all of the files of these prisoners, about the time Debris and Menras were released.

Debris said that the Saigon Government continues to violate the Paris ceasefire agreement by refusing to release the civilian detainees. Debris called on Canada to remain within the control commission and the Canadian Red Cross to return to Vietnam and begin to investigate the situation within Thieu's prisons.

Cites "crisis of capitalism"

Consciousness rising in UK, says leftist

By GREG McMASTER

"There is more class consciousness now in the British working class than at any other time in its history", according to British Trotskyist Robin Blackburn, speaking at a Monday press conference in Sidney Smith Hall.

Blackburn, whose talk on Thursday night at U of T will begin a Canadian tour for the British socialist magazine, New Left Review, said that Canadian socialists should see "an understanding of what's happening in workers' struggles in Europe as very important for understanding the generalized, world-wide crisis of capitalism."

The escalation of these conflicts he said, gives them an importance equal to that of national liberation struggles in colonial countries, and represents a "harbinger of struggles coming in North America, including the still-dominant imperialist power, the United States".

Blackburn will speak on "workers' Control" in five Canadian cities in the next two weeks, beginning at U of T's Cody Hall on Thursday night.

He went on to say that "the class struggle in Britain has recently been fought out more vigorously than in most of the other advanced capitalist countries", although it "still remains an economist and defensive struggle against a very strong assault by the bourgeoisie".

He described the "day of national action" against the Heath government's wage freeze, which the British Trade Union Council has called for May 1, as "a real step forward for the British working class". He considered workers' "morale and state of organization" to be on a much higher level than in 1927, when a general strike closed down most of British industry.

Although union leaders "haven't actually called it a general strike, it's quite clear that it can't be anything else", he claimed, adding that his own political organization, the International Marxist Group, "will be pressing for the day of action to be extended to involve factory occupations and teach-ins, to draw in workers and other sections of the population to discuss the government offensive".

Blackburn dismissed the British Labour Party as a "marginal" force in workers' struggles of the past year, due to its refusal to undertake extraparlimentary action. Labour "only inhabits the bourgeois state machine", he said.

Blackburn criticized the British Communist Party for not developing "a proletarian response to the capitalist offensive" in economic campaigns which they controlled, but described the Party as "an important organizing force" in several strikes and factory occupations.

Discharge given

After spending six days in jail awaiting sentence former U of T student Tom McLaughlin has been given a conditional discharge on his conviction of obstructing police during the breakup of the Simcoe Hall occupation a year ago.

The conditional discharge means that if his record is clean a year from now, McLaughlin will have no criminal record. During that time he must:

- visit a probation officer once a month;
 - not associate with people his probation officer considers "undesirable";
 - remain within the court's jurisdiction (Ontario) except with special permission from his probation officer; and
 - make efforts to get a job.
- While McLaughlin was jailed six days awaiting sentence immediately after his conviction, February 9, and has these stringent conditions to fulfill in order to wipe clean the slate, two others found guilty of more serious offences, assaulting police, were given absolute discharges, without conditions.

McLaughlin, who had to appeal his conviction in order to be sprung from jail, says he is still consulting with his lawyer, Paul Copeland, over whether he will proceed with the appeal. He can also appeal his sentence.

When McLaughlin, last year's Political Economy Course Union chairman, was sentenced Friday, Copeland was not in the courtroom. Although McLaughlin told the court that Copeland could attend in less than two hours, Judge Cloney insisted on sentencing him at 10:30 am.

No students for committees

By BRIANE NASIMOK

Arts and science dean Bob Greene has established two search committees for departmental chairmen but said he was unable to appoint any students to the bodies.

The committees, to recommend appointments for new chairmen of anthropology and the newly constituted department of Italian Studies, both have Greene as chairman, and associate dean Joan Foley as a member.

Each body consists of a representative from graduate studies and five professors. There are no representatives from full- or part-time students, graduate students or alumni.

Greene said yesterday that the rules did not allow for student representatives. He referred to the Haist Report, regulations written in 1967, which outlined the composition of departmental search committees. In 1971 the rules were revised to allow up to three students on search committees for deans and principals, and allow an advisory committee for departmental chairmen.

"I don't have the power to change the rules," Greene said. Earlier this month, on a recommendation from the physics department, Greene requested that students be allowed to sit on the physics department search committee. He suggested that it would be a "worthwhile experiment to have at least one student in the role of assessor", but the Provost decided the suggestion "premature", because in six weeks the Presidential task force on academic appointments is expected to announce some recommendations.

Greene said that he had "spoken to anthropology students and would keep them up to date" on the progress of the search committee. He suggested they write letter to give him their opinions.

Arts and science student General Committee member Dave Laughton said yesterday that having students on the committee does not violate the Haist Report. He said it states that the committee must consist of the dean and a representative of the graduate school dean, plus at least "two other representative from the field of study."

In response, Greene said that it is clearly understood that it means those representatives be from the faculty.

Referendum pending for Arch SAC withdrawal

By JOHN CAMPBELL

Architecture students have decided to withdraw their representative from the Students' Administrative Council pending a referendum on whether or not to remain in the central student body.

Elliott Rovon resigned his position as the school's sole SAC representative effective just before two weeks ago's council meeting. According to a statement released by Architecture Students' Union president Dave Thom, the faculty will not be sending a representative to SAC until a referendum decides "Architectures future role in the SAC".

Neither Rovon nor Thom, a former SAC communication commissioner, could be reached by The Varsity for comment. But Architecture's move may reflect a growing campus dissatisfaction with the SAC.

SAC vice-president Ross Flowers, also next year's Scarborough College Student Society president, says the problem is particularly acute at his college, as demonstrated by the high number of abstentions cast in the recent SAC presidential race. Only 90 Scarborough students voted, and 34 of these abstained or spoiled their ballots.

Flowers said that he "sees the need for a central political body" for students but stressed that physical distance from the St. George campus and the comparatively smaller enrolment at Scarborough makes it impractical for SAC to provide more entertainment and other services to the suburban campus.

Citing SAC sponsorship of a concert as an example, he estimated the largest auditorium at Scarborough would hold only about 600 people — not enough to make it financially worthwhile.

The "fairest scheme" for overcoming these problems, Flowers declared, is a change in the formula by which SAC distributes its funds to local student councils.

At present, each council negotiates for a kickback portion of the $14 fee paid by every student to support SAC activities. Scarborough's portion this year was four dollars.

The Flowers formula would retain the four dollar basic rate, but add a "compensatory" rebate for the strictly downtown services provided by SAC. The rebate would be based on the proportional difference in student enrolment between the campuses, which in Scarborough's case according to Flowers, stands at about 10 to 1. Through this arrangement, SAC would rebate Scarborough $100 for a downtown project costing $1,000.

Flowers said he hoped SAC would be receptive to his financing idea, but said that a referendum on pulling out of SAC "might" be called at Scarborough next year.

Students' Administrative Government of Erindale vice-president Mike Scott says that although Erindale reps were "somewhat frustrated" by their failure to get a larger rebate out of the SAC budget meeting last fall, the student council there had no intention of quitting SAC.

He accused the student government of failing to develop "a coherent program" of services and as a result, he said, "Everyone suffered and we suffered along with them."

The main problems, Scott, next year's SAC vice-president, argued, would be solved when SAC and the local student bodies start "working together".

Student councillor in the faculty of education Lionel Racine voiced a similar complaint.

SAC, he maintained, "makes no great effort to involve us". Specifically, he noted that the members of the council were "not well consulted by the SAC over the fees referendum".

Former Dentistry Student Society president Dave Randall, claims that opposition to SAC's "radical politics" and dissatisfaction with its services led dentistry students to vote in favour of getting out of SAC in a referendum held last year.

It was a futile effort however, because there is no constitutional provision for constituent groups in the SAC to opt out, except through the Governing Council.

This year, Randall said, Denis has supported "the middle-of-the-road, common sense views" of SAC president Eric Miglin, but were still unable to get more money from the student body for dentistry student services.

The ex-president said he expected the issue would die out after this year because "the amount of hassle and time involved to get out of SAC, we just don't have".

He stressed that dentistry students' heavy schedules and "professional involvement" were constraints which left them both "physically and politically detached from the main campus". As a result, he said, students unable to give more time to pressuring SAC for better services tended to use it as a "scapegoat" for complaints when these services were not forthcoming.

English CEGEP teachers form political body

MONTREAL — In a rare display of solidarity with their French-speaking colleagues, teachers at the English-language CEGEP Vanier College have voted to set up a political action committee to combat the education policies of the Quebec government.

CEGEPs are community colleges populated to a great extent by militant, working class students.

According to Vanier College Teachers' Association (VCTA) president Joe Rabinowitch, the decision to establish the political action committee is a first for an English-speaking teachers group in the province. Traditionally, Quebec's French-speaking teachers' organizations have been more militant than their English counterparts.

Last June the 70,000-member

French-language teachers' union, La Corporation des enseignants du Quebec voted in favour of establishing political action committees in schools.

"I think teachers are becoming aware that to change the system they can't remain political," said Rabinowitch. The resolution was passed by "a strong majority," he added.

The VCTA political committee in-ends to fight the Quebec Department of Education's ruling to declassify CEGEP teachers. The committee will draw public attention to the plight of CEGEP teachers who have been declassified and may form a common front with teachers and instructors in other CEGEPs.

The CEGEPs' dispute with the government arose last December when the Department of Education implemented revised criteria for determining scholarship (the amount of formal education and teaching experience by which teachers are paid). The revised criteria placed many teachers in lower pay brackets, thus saving the government millions of dollars in salaries.

VCTA has asked the CEGEP teachers' union, the Federation nationale des enseignants du Quebec (FNEQ) affiliated with La Confédération des syndicats nationaux (CSN), to act on its behalf in litigation against government declassification measures.

Attempts by several administrations to pay their staff at the pre-declassification rates have been foiled by the government.

The government ordered banks used by Dawson, Vanier and LaSalle CEGEPs to stop payments issued by the colleges. FNEQ president Francine LaLonde said last Friday at McGill University that the Quebec government is using banks as instruments to influence CEGEP policy by freezing the colleges' funds.

"The principal impression one has is that the government is trying to impede the colleges' functions," said LaLonde.

Trials resulting from disruption are postponed until next month

Trials resulting from the February 1 Stop the Student Surcharge Committee disruption at 215 Huron Street have been postponed until next month.

The only exception is the charge of common assault laid against second year arts student Rhonda Fleming which is now well into its second week. After lengthy cross-examination and several procedural hassles last week, the Crown finally rested its case Friday afternoon after the presiding judge ruled it had presented a sufficient prima facie case against Fleming.

SSSC chairman Peter Havers (UC IV) took over Fleming's defence yesterday.

Havers also faces an assault charge arising from violent disturbances at the picket line outside the university's personnel and fees office. He will appear in court April 6 at which time a trial date will be set.

SSSC supporter Greg Keilty, fired by the university from his groundsman's job for participating in the picketing instead of obeying an order to work elsewhere that day, comes to trial April 2 on a charge of assaulting university employee Robert Gibson with a soggy sandwich during a heated debate in a staff cafeteria.

Keilty, a U of T graduate who was a union shop steward at the time of the February 1 incident, has already won acquittal on an assault charge.

After listening to testimony yesterday from several university police officers at Fleming's trial, the judge ruled that "it would be dangerous to rely on the evidence of these Crown witnesses."

Fleming and fellow SSSC member Denise Havers also earlier won acquittals when the Crown dismissed charges of causing a disturbance for lack of evidence.

Former U of T graduate student Larry Haiven begins trial April 16 on a charge of assaulting police and New College student Myron Klymko faces a charge of obstructing police on May 4.

Claude Brown, like Keilty a former groundsman dismissed for his part in the picket line disturbances, will, on May 17, face two charges of assaulting police.

Power elite find RCMP invaluable

the Criminal Code. Section 98 made it a crime, punishable by up to 20 years in prison, to belong to any association whose purpose was to bring about governmental, industrial or economic change by force or which advocated or defended the use of force for such purposes. The property belonging to such an association might be seized without warrant and forfeited to the Crown. If it could be shown that a person had attended meetings for such an association, spoken publicly in its support or distributed its literature, "it shall be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that he is a member of such unlawful association." Persons printing, distributing, selling or importing material advocating or defending the use of force might also be imprisoned for up to 20 years. Section 9B remained on the statute books for 16 years and was an effective instrument for intimidating and sometimes imprisoning radicals. It made people cautious about being associated with any protest group because of the possibility that the organization in question might be declared an "unlawful association".

Least the above-mentioned Acts might not be sufficient, the government also amended Section 134 of the Criminal Code to change the maximum penalty for sedition from 2 to 20 years in prison. The Mounted Police arrested eight of the most important strike leaders and four less prominent strikers on the night of June 16-17. They were acting under instructions from A.J. Andrews, agent of the federal Department of Justice and prominent leader of the Citizens Committee. A few days later J.S. Woodsworth, an important supporter of the strikers and temporary editor of Western Labour News, was arrested and the paper banned. Still later Fred Dixon, who continued for a few days in hiding to put out the paper gave himself up to the police. The original intention of the government had been to deport seven of the eight main strike leaders (only one had been born in Canada). This plan was abandoned for fear of the public reaction it would cause and because of strong protests from trade unionists across Canada. Instead strike leaders were released on bail in a few days, to be tried later for seditious conspiracy.

The arrest of the strike leaders was the beginning of a concerted attempt by the RNWMP to crush not only the Winnipeg General Strike but the Militant wing of the trade union movement throughout the country by means of arrests, harassment, deportations and brute force. The first fatal casualties of this drive occurred in Winnipeg on June 21. The strike supporters among the returned soldiers organized a silent parade to protest the actions of the authorities. Banned by the mayor, the parade took place anyway, until it was brutally broken up by the RNWMP and the "specials" who had been hired to replace the regular city police. About 50 Mounted Police rode swinging baseball bats through the crowd twice. When two of their riders were unhorsed, they drew their revolvers and fired volleys into the crowd. Mike Sokolowski, who appears to have been only a spectator, was killed instantly by a bullet through his heart, and Steve Schezbanower was fatally wounded. Dozens more in the crowd were wounded.

Mounties and specials wielding clubs then cleared the streets. Masters describes a fight which took place in Hell's Alley: A portion of the crowd, estimated at about two hundred, had taken refuge in the alley which ran between Market and James Streets. Here they were caught by specials who entered from both ends. The specials attacked with batons, and at one stage with revolvers, while the crowd retaliated with bricks and missiles. The struggle lasted only ten minutes, from 3:40 to 3:50, but produced twenty-seven casualties before the crowd was overwhelmed.

After clearing the streets, the military assumed control. Immediately they banned public meetings and demonstrations.

The arrest of the strike leaders and the banning of any effective action successfully broke the back of the strike, which was called off on June 25. The strikers were promised some economic gains, a partial recognition of collective bargaining rights and a Royal Commission to look into the causes of the strike.

Following the strike, the government continued a virtual reign of terror against the OBU throughout Canada. Raids on the offices of the OBU and other militant labour and political groups were frequent.

In Winnipeg, Rev. William Ivens was arrested in the middle of the night while his children stood by crying. Alderman John Queen was arrested at the home of A.A. Heaps, later a Labour M.P.; police broke down the door, ransacked the place and took the two men away in handcuffs. No labour militant or political radical could be sure that he or she was not next on the list. Grace MacInnis, daughter of J.S. Woodsworth and now a New Democratic M.P., has described how she was instructed by her mother, who was teaching at Gibson's Landing, British Columbia, to bury left wing books in the woods lest they be seized by police as evidence against her father.

All eight strike leaders were tried for seditious conspiracy in January, 1920. Crown prosecutors included A.J. Andrews and at least one other prominent member of the Citizens' Committee. The jurymen all came from rural Manitoba, where considerable anti-labour hysteria had been whipped up, and there was some evidence of undue Crown influence in choosing the jury. Some of the testimony was provided by police spies including Mounted Police Corporal F.W. Zaneth, who had been infiltrating labour organizations for some time before the strike. Seven of the eight strike leaders were convicted of seditious conspiracy and sentenced to terms ranging from six months to two years. After Fred Dixon was tried for seditious libel and acquitted, the Crown declined to press an identical charge against J.S. Woodsworth. In addition, a number of immigrants involved in the strike were deported, and many of the victims of what could only be described as the police riot of June 21 were fined and others imprisoned for rioting and unlawful assembly.

Although authorities had won the day in the courts, the voters soon had the chance to express their opinion of the strike leaders. They elected William Ivens, John Queen and George Armstrong to the Manitoba Legislature in 1920. At the time of the election, Ivens and Armstrong were still in prison! In the federal election of 1921, the voters also elected J.S. Woodsworth M.P. for Winnipeg North.

The Manitoba government appointed the Robson Commission to examine the causes and conduct of the Winnipeg General Strike. The Robson Report indicated that the strike was neither an OBU conspiracy nor any other kind of conspiracy designed to overthrow constituted authority. The purposes of the strike were exactly what the strike leaders and the rank-and-file had claimed they were: to achieve economic concessions and to gain recognition of collective bargaining rights. Robson found the causes of the strike to be the high cost of living, profiteering, inadequate wages and poor social conditions in general. Robson's findings were conveniently ignored by the government, most employers and especially the RNWMP. To save face the federal authorities and the police had to perpetuate the belief that the strike had been a seditious conspiracy aimed at overthrowing the economic and political system. Many of them of course, sincerely believed their own propaganda.

Perhaps no group gained more in the short run by the defeat of the Winnipeg General Strike than the RNWMP. The force people thought might be disbanded a year or two earlier had suddenly earned the undying gratitude of most of the daily press. Nora Kelly, who wrote The Men of the Mounted in 1949 and submitted it in advance to RCMP Commissioner S.T. Wood, "who kindly had the manuscript read and so made sure that the information contained therein was correctly presented from the point of view of the Mounted Police," claims that the role of the Force during and after the Winnipeg strike was instrumental in persuading the federal government to create the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in November 1919. Although as Kelly's assessment appears to be accurate in this case, unrest prior to the strike had probably already persuaded the government to continue the RNWMP at least in Western Canada. The authorized strength of the Force was set at 1,200 in December 1918 and then suddenly increased to 2,500 in July 1919. By September 30, 1919, the government had already built the Force up to a strength of 1,600 and in November the act was passed to absorb the Dominion Police into the RNWMP and change the name to Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The new order officially took effect as of February 1, 1920.

The new name indicated that the Force would now exercise authority throughout Canada and not just in the Western provinces. The military structure was maintained intact, with special emphasis on the RCMP as an efficient organization for breaking strikes and dispersing urban crowds.

That the RCMP was created as both a military and political police force and that its top officers leaned towards the far right in political persuasion is obvious from an examination of Commissioner Perry's Annual Report for the year ending September 30, 1919. The RNWMP had been given a much more explicitly political-military character during the year leading up to the creation of the RCMP on a Canada-wide basis. The report emphasized that aside from enforcing public buildings and other duties which are normally assigned to a police force and are not explicitly political in nature, the Mounted Police were to serve in the enforcement of "all Orders-in-Council passed under the 'War Measures Act', for protection of public safety" and "generally to aid and assist the civil powers in the preservation of law and order wherever the Government of Canada may direct." It also noted that the government had taken pains to remove RNWMP squadrons from Europe and Siberia as soon as possible so as to increase the total strength in Canada. Commissioner Perry thought that there were enough reserves on hand to meet any emergencies as well as "to supervise the mining and industrial areas, to watch the settlements of enemy nationality and foreigners whose sentiments might be disloyal and attitudes antagonistic". He pointed out that the Force had taken over the secret service from the Dominion Police during the year and had been busy registering and controlling enemy aliens. Perry lamented the presence of unrest in Western Canada and observed that "some of the strikes have had a sinister purpose although probably not realized by many who took part." The report pointed out that several people had been convicted for possessing prohibited literature, "but there is a flood of pernicious and mischievous literature not on the prohibited list. Under the cloak of freedom of thought and speech, this literature is being spread for the avowed purpose of overthrowing democratic government and destroying the foundation of civilization."

The RCMP carried on and improved upon the strike-breaking tradition of their predecessors from the time they were officially founded in 1920. Over the next two decades they played such an important role in labour disputes that some labour experts have claimed they had a profound effect on the attitudes of working people towards the state in Canada. In his 1968 study of labour unrest for the federal Task Force on Labour Relations, Professor Stuart Jamieson asserts that the role of the RCMP helped to generate a distrust for the federal government among trade unionists: The RCMP has thus become a highly pervasive force in Canadian society. Its presence has been felt with enough force to tip the scales of battle in hundreds of strikes and labour demonstrations. The particular image of the RCMP, and the federal government itself, which this situation has generated in the eyes of many in the ranks of organized labour, in all probability has had a profound effect on the climate of labour relations in this country.

The government prepared to bear down on the strikers not only by making military preparations but also by providing themselves with more sweeping legal powers in case they were needed. On June 5 Parliament passed a bill amending the Immigration Act in order to make it possible to deport British subjects not born in Canada. This amendment was aimed at the Winnipeg strike leaders, most of whom were British immigrants albeit long-time residents of Canada. The amendment was passed through the House of Commons in 20 minutes and within the hour had been approved by the Senate and given royal assent. Later Parliament also passed what became known as Section 9B of Athletic facilities doubtful again

Contrary to expectation, the back page of the Engineering Society newspaper, the Toike Oike, has not provided the main source of amusement on the U of T main campus over the last decade. Rather, the running non-dialogue between the provincial government, Simcoe Hall, and the departments of athletics at the U of T has been enough to cause one to die laughing.

Today, we finish off the publishing year with a trip back down that same garden path the athletic administrators have been led over the past 10 years, pausing now and then to view the various athletic reports which, one by one, lie dormant like fallen leaves.

The new proposed and more than once planned for men's athletic building is apparently dying from the most natural of causes — the apathy of those students presently using the outdated Hart House facilities, and the apparent irrelevance of the building in the eyes of the people who could do the most toward making it a reality — President John Evans, and his Simcoe Hall mandarin Vice-President and Provost Don Forster, Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway, Vice-President Alex Rankin, Vice-Provost Robin Ross, and most of all, the Ontario government.

The athletic facilities are essential to any future physical and health education program envisaged by the university. Without them, the present School of Physical and Health Education might as well fold up, and the dedicated few who have survived its difficult years would be wise to pack their bags for the universities such as Alberta, Waterloo, or McMaster.

The athletic building carrot has been dangled several times in front of the athletic administrators' faces over the past 11 years, only to have it yanked from before a hungry jock audience when the time was ripe.

Late last November the proposal for a new building was once again suspended along with the provincial government's decision to freeze capital expenditures for universities.

In the minutes of the UTAA Athletic Directorate meeting for November 28, 1972, UTAA President George Wodehouse is reported to have said, "There is nothing we can do ourselves to aid the University in determining whether the project (the new building) will be allowed to go ahead."

However, as Athletic Directorate Vice-President Peter Adamson wrote in The Varsity on March 5, 1969, "There can be no question that there has not been overbuilding of athletic facilities at this university. Perhaps

Construction of a $40 million men's athletic complex underneath the back campus is the subject of detailed study by the university, architecture student Peter Orved confirmed last night.

The new men's athletic building was given top priority for new construction by the property committee of the Board of Governors last year.

Architecture professor Doug Engel charged that the Physical Plant Department is preparing a list of older university buildings to demolish, so that a need for space and for construction capital may be proven to the Ontario government.

some constructive student agitation might help."

Wodehouse also stated last November that "as yet no one knows the implications of the Ontario government's decision to freeze funds for financing capital construction and major renovation projects." He mentioned that "funds could still be received for the project and that we should not get depressed yet".

Intramural program needs a new building

For those who doubt that new facilities are in fact needed there is information to support the UTAA's contention. And, this information does not apply exclusively to the already well-financed and well-equipped intercollegiate sports at the U of T — football and hockey. It per-include an interfaculty swim league, indoor tennis and badminton, floor hockey and ball hockey, inner tube water polo. Squash and volleyball are severely restricted. At the moment there is only one interfaculty swim meet per academic year. As for indoor badminton and tennis, these activities are impossible within the present building; male students must go as guests of females to use facilities at the Benson Building. Also, the Hart House track is so crowded that only one indoor track meet per academic year is planned.

As for the existing programs, facilities are severely tested. Copp said that the intramural office hasn't had to turn down any lacrosse teams so far, but, on the other hand, the basketball season can't begin until the lacrosse playoffs are over due to judo also need improved facilities if they are to remain competitive in the OUAA league. This year the main gym was closed for recreational use on two consecutive weekends in order to host the men's fencing championships.

The 1972 user's committee report

The most recent in a long line of user's reports on the proposed new building was the 1972 "Report of the Users' Committee for the Proposed Men's Athletic Building" which emerged by the initiative of acting U of T president Jack Sword. Sword asked that a committee be set up to advise him "on the space facility requirements for athletes for the period which lies immediately ahead."

Sword's initial letter, dated February 24, 1972, was amended by the use of the Association (UTAA and WAA), and the exercise of general supervision through the Committee on Undergraduate Activities of the Board of Governors."

The 1972 committee's terms of reference were to re-examine the User's Committee for the proposed Men's Athletic Building that was submitted in 1967; to assume maximum integration with the Benson Building; to establish what purpose Hart House was to serve, since for financial and other reasons they were likely to remain available for 10 years or longer; to stay within a six million dollar financial ceiling; and to consider the needs of the School of Physical and Health Education.

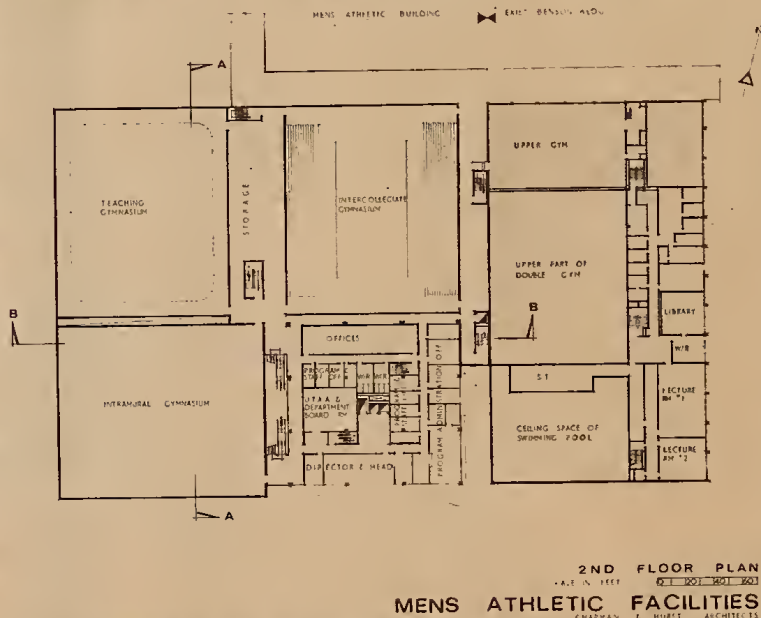

In completing their report, the committee, chaired by Dr. George Wodehouse, assumed that "while the limitation of time has not made it possible to involve complete public discussion amongst the many many persons interested in the Athletic program of the University, we feel that our views are representative of the great majority of those persons, and will carry their complete confidence." Of the 15 committee members, only three were students participating in the university's athletics program.

The committee's conclusions were surprising only in that the proposed new building was smaller by comparison with the original 1963 plans. And, as might be expected, the School of Physical and Health Education was hit the hardest.

The committee recommended that the office requirements of the School of Physical and Health Education be contained almost completely on the third floor of the Benson Building; that the present Margaret Eaton Library would, with minor modifications, serve as a common room for all three organizations (the School, the UTAA, and the WAA), and that a common board room would service the needs of the two associations and the school.

Unlike the 1963 report, which felt that space should be allocated within a new building for lectures, etc., the new committee's report concluded that there was adequate lecture and seminar facilities to serve the needs of the School within the buildings on Huron Street in the immediate vicinity of the proposed combined complex.

In drawing these conclusions the committee members contradicted the recommendations of the 1966 Winegard Report which felt that "As a long-term necessity, new facilities are required for the School which should be under its exclusive jurisdiction," and "as a short-term expedient, some office, library, and research space must be provided immediately so that the School may have a temains, on the other hand, mainly to the so-called minor intercollegiate sports and to a greater extent, the men's intramural program.

As early as 1936 complaints arose about the inadequate Hart House facilities. And, from that time forward, further reports have confirmed the criticisms. The most recent round of attempts at reviving the idea of a new athletics building began in 1956, but it wasn't until the 1962 Presidential Committee on the Athletic Programs that momentum really began to gather. The report concluded that the intramural program "has grown to the limit of its accommodation and will not be able to meet the demand for expansion now or in the future unless more space indoors and outdoors is provided". The report noted that in 1944-45 the participation rate of males in athletics had been over 52 per cent, and then to 38 per cent in 1960-61. Today the proportion stands at about 33 per cent.

According to men's intramural director Dave Copp the intramural program has been forced to cut back on its desired program, as well as limit the number of teams in competition and, to some degree, even the periods of play.

The dropped or desired programs scheduling problems. The three present courts are reserved for the whole day by B each day, and with the influx of women onto the courts this year the facilities are even more hard-pressed.

Interfaculty basketball competition has remained with the same number of teams this year as last in the interfaculty league. However, this year there has been a great demand for teams to play more interfaculty games — 12 or 14 per team, according to Copp. The intramural league plays six or seven games per team, and this year the number of intramural teams had to be cut down, and floor time for the second interfac division was cut from one hour and a half to one hour in order to increase the number of participants. Volleyball is another sport that suffers badly, according to Copp. The upper gym is inadequate for play, with players consistently hitting the ball on the beams or overhead ropes.

Other than the present difficulties of overcrowding, the potential for team play and individual participation and instruction would be vastly improved with the construction of a new building. Possibilities include indoor softball, soccer, and borden ball. The intercollegiate minor sports such as gymnastics, wrestling, karate, and a second letter of February 28, to make specific reference to the needs of the School of Physical and Health Education. As Sword put it, "In appointing the User Committee for the Men's Athletic Building, I omitted to include a representative of the School of Physical and Health Education. I am writing now to add the name of Professor Juri Daniel from the School of Physical and Health Education to membership on the committee."

School of Physical and Health Education always omitted

Sword's oversight was comical by its consistency, for the School has always been omitted in and neglected by the past plans of the U of T administration.

For example, the 1966 Report of the President's Advisory Committee on the School of Physical and Health Education (hereafter known as the Winegard Report) noted that, with respect to athletics and physical education, "the university takes no initiative in promoting or developing these (athletic) programs, its support being expressed mainly by the provision of land within the campus area, the advancing of money for capital expansion to be repaid with interest, the collection of an athletic fee for

Low turnout for athletic referendum

Only 308 students have replied to the "referendum on athletics" coupon carried for the past few weeks in The Varsity.

However, those who did reply voted overwhelmingly in favour of major reforms in the athletic programs.

The referendum results appear to reflect the opinions expressed in many of the university-commissioned reports on athletics held during the past 15 years. Up to now the university administration and the provincial government have both failed to act on advice given them.

The referendum is being run to serve as one indicator of students' opinion on several important questions related to athletics. Students have never before been questioned on athletics at U of T.

Of the 308 responses received so far, 245 students felt that there should be a majority student (athlete) voice on the men's Athletic Directorate. Forty-two replied negatively while 17 of the returned forms were blank. One respondent asked for a 50 per cent student voice, and two asked for parity.

Two hundred and seventy-one students felt that the construction of a new men's athletic building should be placed at the top of the university administration's priority list, and that the administration should appeal to the provincial government for construction funds and pay for the maintenance costs itself. Thirty-one respondents felt that the athletic building was not a major priority.

Two hundred and fifty-one students responded affirmatively to the statement that co-educational physical education and athletics should be encouraged, and the men's athletics program, the women's program, and the School of Physical and Health Education should be integrated. Negative responses totalled 49, with seven blank ballots.

Well over 50 per cent of the student responses (263) also indicated that the UTAA should set up a committee with a majority of student (athletes) to define the priorities of the men's athletics program at the U of T. Thirty-one students were against such a committee, while 14 responses were returned blank.

Athletic Director Dalt White said Monday that he felt the referendum had come too late in the year. "People have their minds on other things at this time of the year," he said. Nevertheless, White did say that the response, although small so far, could probably be projected within a slight margin of error on a larger scale to be similar to the results received.

Newly-elected student athletic Directorate member Rodger Wright answered that the UTAA Directorate should not contain a majority student voice, even though students pay for over 50 per cent of the program. Wright also felt that co-educational physical education and athletics should not be encouraged, and that the men's athletics program, the women's program, and the School of Physical and Health Education should not be integrated.

Wright is one of five student members on a 20 member Directorate, and one of three student representatives connected with hockey who now sit on the Directorate. The other two are Bruce Durno and Bob Bauer.

The results from the final tabulated referendum results will be sent to the university administration at Simcoe Hall, the men's and women's physical education departments, and the School of Physical and Health Education.

The referendum is still open and coupons sent or delivered to The Varsity offices at 91 St. George St. will help aid the voice for a new system of athletics on this campus.

As a student involved in athletics at the University of Toronto, where over 50 per cent of the athletic budget comes from the students, and where only five students can be elected to a 20 member Directorate, I strongly support a majority student voice in the UTAA Directorate.

The construction of a new men's athletic building should be placed at the top of the university administration's priority list. The administration should appeal to the provincial government for construction funds, and should also pay for the maintenance costs itself.

porary home." The report stated: "The facilities in Hart House are grossly inadequate and the present staff has served under conditions above and beyond the call of duty. New staff members are not likely to come here without some guarantee of a home for the School. The School must have its own facilities rather than be wholly dependent upon the Benson Building and Hart House. The School requires offices for academic and non-academic staff, lecture and seminar rooms, research and library space, small gymnasias and other facilities, all under the exclusive jurisdiction of the school."

square footage available had declined by almost 50 per cent from an estimated high of 212,076 in 1967 to 110,072 in 1972.

As the 1972 committee stated, "We recognize that unless the building is approved and begun almost immediately, increasing costs in future years may make this report, as they have the previous reports, another frustrating exercise in relative futility." (The accompanying chart shows just how much the facilities decreased from 1967 to 1972. Yet another joke in the athletic tragi-comedy.)

The 1972 report even envisaged the costly retention of Hart House facilities for "mixed voluntary athletics outside the organized programs of either the School of Physical and Health Education or the two Athletic Associations", with the continuation of the intramural games, since the proposed floor space of the new building was 70,000 square feet lower than the original proposal. "It may be necessary to continue indefinitely some minor parts of the organized programs within the present Hart House athletic facilities" the report stated.

Yet, with this problem, the committee ironically concluded that "certain areas of the facility will be capable of being opened to the public both for University and Community events", and with "increased family and individual use of the facilities of both buildings (the Benson and the new building) particularly over weekends."

Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNie has said that he will decide by April 15 whether or not to fund special projects. But the question remains whether the Ontario government will consider the new building to be "special". If not, it just might be back to square one.

Bob Gauthier

But when will the building be started? The situation is bleak until pressure can be brought to bear on the provincial government to supply funds for this specific purpose. This pressure, of course, must come from the university, from Dr. Bissell and the administration.

...There can be no question that there has not been overbuilding of athletic facilities at this university. Perhaps some constructive student agitation might help. Athletic Directorate Vice-President Peter Adamson in The Varsity, March 5, 1969.

The Winegard Report ended on a rather pessimistic note: "If it is not possible for the University to obtain the necessary funds, or at least some guarantee that the funds will be made available, steps should be taken to remove the course in Physical and Health Education from the offerings to the University. Toronto should not give or be expected to give programs inferior in quality to those given in comparable institutions elsewhere."

The report concluded that "it is apparent that the present situation in regard to Director, staff, budget, curriculum, and facilities has become less satisfactory compared to other divisions of this university and to Physical and Health Education programmes of other universities. A situation which was reasonable some years ago is no longer acceptable."

So, in effect, the 1972 committee report failed to take into account the recommendations of the 1966 Winegard Report. Coincidentally, no one on the Winegard committee was a member of the 1972 committee. Consistent with the past record of athletics at the U of T as being less academic and more "athletic", the School of Physical and Health Education appeared to occupy a low place on the athletic totem pole.

The new building shrinks

Next to the School of Physical and Health Education plans, the hardest hit cutbacks as reflected in the 1972 users report were the facilities to be made available for athletics. With only nine years between the first user's committee report in 1963 and 1972, the planned cost of the building had decreased from $10 million to $6 million, while construction and furnishing costs had risen appreciably, and, consequently the

Law wins Div I b-ball

By PAUL MIMS

Law made it two in a row in inter-faculty basketball championship play defeating Meds in the final game of the three-game series 45-41 last Thursday.

This third game was necessitated by Meds' victory in the second game by a count of 53-47. The second game was the most exciting match of one of the duller finals in years, as both teams played extremely mechanically, almost to the point of boredom.

Leading 29-20 at halftime, Meds allowed their lead to evaporate to the point where Law was ahead 43-35 with four minutes to play in the game. However, with Lindsay Horenblas bombing from downtown and Bobby Lewis driving at will on his check, Meds caught fire and outscored Law 18-4 in the final four minutes.

For the game, Bobby Lewis scored 17 points with team-mate Lindsay Horenblas adding 14. The leading scorers for Law were Al Sternberg (15 points), Jamie Halfnight (10), and John Hunter (10).

Despite the narrow difference of the final score of the final game, it wasn't really close. Meds lost the game on the boards since no Meds forward, save Rick Seppala, was unwilling to mix it up inside with Law's John Hunter and Gerry Saltsman. Law would continually have four rebounders on their offensive board so that they were getting three and four shots at a time. Law was not shooting well; yet, the probability of success in scoring points increased markedly with their increase in the number of shots.

Down 29-19 at halftime, Meds once closed to within three points only to fall back due to ineffectual play. Appropriately enough, Gerry Saltsman (17 points) and John Hunter (16) were the leading scorers for Law in the game. Bobby Lewis, Meds' most effective player in play-off action this year, hooped 11 for the losers.

Following the game, Meds' forward Bill Caskey was unmasked by Al Sternberg, Law's captain. Although some considered this unveiling of Caskey akin to Samson's loss of hair, Caskey got back quickly at his detractors in noting that Saltsman and Sternberg will be gone next year. As he put it, "We'll have Law to kick around all next year!"

Vic V wins hockey

By PAUL CARSON

The brawn proved mightier than the Bible as Victoria V won the intermediate hockey title Friday defeating a gallant band of true believers from Emmanuel 8-4 in the wrap-up of the interfac season.

The Vic V players, mainly present and former members of the intercollegiate football team, spent most of the game climbing in and out of the penalty box. But even when shorthanded, as they usually were, Vic V had simply too much size and scoring punch for Emmanuel who pined again that Truth does not of itself win hockey games.

John Bright led the winners with three goals, followed by footballers Jody Ortvad (with two) plus Glen Markle and Peter McNabb who each added one.

McNabb also had three assists and Paul Illidge scored the final goal. God was not with Emmanuel as the brothers MacDonald each scored once, with the other goals coming from Ken Hancock and A. Dumont.

Over 80 teams participated in the interfac hockey program this year with a record 46 qualifying for the playoffs.

Lea, Boyd receive Loudon

Phyllis Lea and Kay Boyd, secretaries in the men's athletic program for over 35 years, were presented the T.R. Loudon Award at the annual awards dinner held March 20.

The Loudon Award, named after the former head of civil engineering and Varsity rowing coach, is recognized as the premier award in U of T male athletics.

Lea and Boyd were the unanimous selection of the student members of the men's athletic directorate "for their outstanding services in the advancement of athletics."

Despite their many years of service, the two women were never formally invited to an awards dinner until last year when the students on the Directorate forced the abandonment of the former "men only" tradition.

Other women invited to last week's dinner included internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway, women's athletics director Anne Hewett plus two representatives from the women's athletic directorate.

Conference will focus on Spanish labour

A conference on Spanish trade unions this weekend will focus on workers' struggles against the Franco government's repression from 1939 to the present.

The conference, sponsored by the Canadian Committee for a Democratic Spain and to be held at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE), will feature several prominent Canadian and Spanish trade unionists and supporters.

Labour unions as independent bodies were banned by Franco in 1939 after his Republican Party, aided by Fascist Italy and Germany, came to power. The right to strike and freedom to associate, both keystones of unionism, were also banned.

Instead, vertical syndicates composed of both labour and management representatives, but dominated by governmental appointees, were set up to absorb the remaining functions of trade unions.

In spite of legislative and forcible repression, however, legitimate union organizing activities continue. According to the committee, real unions are gaining in support even as jailings and intimidation escalate.

Resistance to Franco's regime is particularly strong in the northern Basques region, where strong national feeling is also an important factor.

The conference will feature three Spaniards, including a labour lawyer and worker-priest who must withhold their identity. Canadian unionists participating will include Ontario Federation of Labour president David Archer, and officers of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), United Auto Workers (UAW), United Electrical Workers (UEW) and the United Steelworkers of America.

Registration fees to students for the three-day conference, which begins Friday night with an open public meeting, is two dollars.

Socialist Denounces Common Front Leaders

Labour bureaucrats were not radical, says Quebec Marxist

By PETER MATILAINEN
Quebec labour leaders of the Common Front avoided facing the real situation last May's general strike in Quebec, according to a self-proclaimed Montreal revolutionary socialist.

"The bureaucracy did not pose the question of state power for the workers to bring about the reforms of the society that it demanded, nor did it have a strategic plan for its followers," Kim Cameron contended.

Cameron, a member of the Revolutionary Marxist Group (RMR) in Quebec, was speaking at a forum on the Quebec workers' movement last Thursday.

The crisis that developed in Quebec, Cameron said, followed the growth of awareness amongst the working class in understanding the failure of the "Quiet Revolution" to effect real changes in the social structure. This he continued, forced the disintegration of the coalition of the bourgeois and new petty bourgeois (or technocrat) elements with the labour bureaucracy who formed the force behind the Quiet Revolution.

The economic "mini-boom" that grew through the 60's eventually slowed down with increased unemployment and labour unrest. The labour bureaucracy had to react, Cameron continued.

"They knew the economic struggle was coming. To avoid this, they outmanoeuvred their base, the working class, and moved sharply to the left with a 'Marxy' type of analysis."

The student revolts occurring after Bill 66 was brought before the Quebec legislature, affected young workers in Quebec but the unions couldn't control their militants. At this point the leadership Cameron said, kept much of the reaction under their control.

"The only way for the strike to succeed would have been to raise the political struggle and not leave it with economist demands."

With the failure of the general strike, the government was able to repress the front and its member unions' activities. This, he predicted, would lead to a period of minor labour action centering around purely economic strikes with no political leadership.

"Business unionism will be the dominant force, until the workers gain enough confidence to forget the repression."

Describing the NDP in Quebec, Cameron stated, "The NDP is just a sect like the CPC (M-L) (Communist Party of Canada - Marxist-Leninist). It has no implantation amongst the working class. The enormous flab of the Parti Québécois fills the gap of presenting bourgeois ideology in a form acceptable to the working class."

He sees no link in Quebec history with social democracy and this, he believes, is why the NDP could not elect any Quebec members of Parliament.

The student movement, in Cameron's opinion, has begun to get larger and also begun to make ideological breakthroughs to workers.

"The student movement, like the workers', has a large politicized layer without a strategic plan of action. The War Measures Act had the effect of chopping this movement into study groups with individuals dropping out to either reading books or leaving for the farms."

"Student corporatist struggles became the extent of campus politics," he said, "which would then swing to glorious 'ouvrierism' in full bloom."
"Workers learn their lessons by action," Cameron stressed that students, unlike workers, ideologically radicalize around their own demands alone. It is they, he feels, who most clearly are in conflict with the bourgeois ideology that is daily preached to them under the guise of the liberal society that exists, while they are witness to the dropping of napalm in Vietnam.

This crisis in bourgeois ideology, he maintained, would eventually draw students and workers into unified action. He criticized socialists who fail to draw this conclusion during the periods of working class upsurges.

"Each sector of struggle has an influence on another. You can't look at them in isolation but in a totality. These sectors must be co-ordinated to build the revolution," Cameron concluded.

Socialist Kim Cameron said Quebec labour leaders have avoided raising the question of overthrowing the state.

Zeitlin thinks twice

By PAUL McRATH

Smiling chairman Irving Zeitlin has decided to reconsider his unilateral decision made last week to declare dead the recent departmental assembly election of student representatives.

A meeting has been called for tonight with members of the old executive and the newly-elected executive and the elections committee.

The decision to reconsider his action followed meetings of both undergraduate and graduate students on the campus Monday, where motions were drafted denouncing the decision as "against the spirit of the constitution."

The motions were presented to Zeitlin at a meeting yesterday by the executive that he had declared illegitimate.

The disagreement surrounds the participation on the elections committee of two students, Bob Stacey and Larne Richmond, who were also successful candidates in the election. Stacey and Richmond were both student members of last year's eight-person executive committee for the department, but were running only for seats on the assembly last year.

Last week Zeitlin charged that fundamental violations of constitutional and democratic procedures had occurred. Richmond and Stacey both state they were co-opted into the committee with the full assent of the other members in order to do the "dirty work."

The motion passed by a joint meeting of both undergraduate and graduate students Monday night condemned the move, saying it was made without consulting students, the elections committee or the executive committee.

"We see this as a deliberate attempt to effectively block any student involvement in the department," the motion said. "We further deny the validity of the charges made against the elections committee."

The students have demanded that Zeitlin retract his statement and declare the election valid.

A separate motion drafted by the Graduate Sociology Association stated that the decision that the elections were improperly conducted appears to have been based on inadequate evidence. "And serious implications have arisen from the manner in which it was made."

As a result, they said, both

Response Slight For Petition

Petitions asking for more student say in matriculation decision-making have elicited little response when presented to the math chairman and the dean of arts and science.

About 125 present and former students of professor Stephen Salaff signed the petition presented to chairman George Duff on Monday, asking that Salaff be retained on the faculty.

Salaff has stated he fears dismissal because of his support of students in a conflict with the department over grading systems in a course last spring.

A petition presented yesterday to art dean Bob Greene, by over 750 students was taken back at his suggestion that it should instead be given to Duff when the students had finished collecting signatures on it.

This petition was originally addressed to U of T president John Evans as well, but was given to Greene at the suggestion of the math-physics course union executive.

It asks for Salaff's retention (as well as that of David Spring, who was refused tenure last spring), student participation in hiring and tenure decisions, and less emphasis on exams.

Greene said last night that rules governing the composition of the committees deciding on tenure were governed by the university's Haut regulations and could not be changed by arts and science.

Having students on these committees, in any case "will not make the difference the students think it will," he added.

Duff was non-committal on receipt of the petition concerning Salaff. He told The Varsity yesterday only that "I have the petition in my possession" and "it has been read" and it could be taken into consideration.

Student Kevin McQuillan said yesterday he was "disappointed" by the responses, but that the students would follow the suggested channels and see if positive results to their demands accrue.

He had hoped for a commitment of support from Greene, he said.

graduate and undergraduate students are excluded from participating in departmental decision, and some committees are unable to proceed with important business.

Zeitlin feels the matter is more ethical than political, and that his decision was based on the possibility of error in the proceedings.

"In light of the fact that the election appeared procedural, my decision was based on this," he said yesterday.

"When some people feel there's a problem, it has to be looked into. We don't have a supreme court, so I feel an inquiry is necessary."

Denying that there was any political pressure behind the decision to reconsider his action, he said "tomorrow will be a search for truth."

A spokesman for the Graduate Sociology Association, still preferring to remain nameless, said "we had better treat him (Zeitlin) carefully", reflecting the student opinion that Zeitlin may become stubborn if it appears he is succumbing to political rather than ethical pressure in attempting to arrive at final disclosure of the facts.

"I think on the basis of new evidence, he yielded to rationality in reconsidering. We at least have to give him credit for admitting a mistake," said the spokesman.

Respite for Interdisc

Interdisciplinary Studies will remain as a "program" next year, arts and science dean Bob Greene stated last night.

Although he said his suggestion that the courses be absorbed into existing colleges was not accepted by vice-president and president Don Forster, Interdisciplinary Studies would remain as it is presently constituted for at least next year.

Earlier yesterday, Greene had met a committee of Interdisciplinary staff and students appointed at a general meeting of the department last Friday which voted to fight for its survival. Chairman Geoffrey Payzant had originally urged faculty to make any move to find a replacement for Payzant, who is retiring in June, the chairman had called the mass meeting to discuss what he feared was Interdisciplinary's imminent collapse.

Greene said last night that Payzant's fears were "non-sense."

Historian chairman Jim Campbell's sociology chairman Irving Zeitlin and appointments were announced last spring but in the fall he said.

Payzant had feared that administrative inaction on finding a replacement which would have seriously hampered Interdisciplinary's ability to make in its tremendous budgetary problems, spelled the end for the innovative department. The budget is determined in the fall.

Payzant maintained last night that it is "absolutely necessary" for a chairman to be appointed immediately so that he can coordinate next year's program and arrange for professors' appointments.

Greene added that the fear that Interdisciplinary was being downgraded to a status below that of a department was unfounded, and "irrelevant" because it never was a department, but a program.

Then retiring dean Albert Allen referred to Interdisciplinary as being "a new departmental budget" in his official 1971-72 report.

However, Greene says, "It is not a department because it doesn't have full-time staff and isn't grant-funded. He called the inter-disciplinary a methodology."

Some outside funding, including a grant from the Campbell Soup Company is on the line, he said.

Greene had proposed that Interdisciplinary be responsible for most of Interdisciplinary courses with a smaller number — primarily more traditional literature courses — being put under the wings of Sen and University colleges or possibly the liberal college.

Funding for the course would be approximately equivalent to that now given to the interdisciplinary studies.

Greene and his proposal was his response to a recommendation from Interdisciplinary last summer that it be set up like a faculty with an independent budget to seek experimental course.

But he said he was unable to convince administrators, including Forster, that that "was the proper thing to do." He will hope it can be done in the future.

Forster was unavailable for comment last night.

Payzant says the Interdisciplinary committee fought for Greene's suggestion, as long as extra funding was made available.

GSU Slams SGS Report

By GREG McMASTER

A confidential School of Graduate Studies report is advocating "wage slavery" for underpaid graduate students, says Graduate Studies Union executive Larry Hoffman.

Hoffman was commenting on a report issued by the GSU executive which calls for guaranteed minimum support for graduate students and which criticizes the secret SGS report for recommending the transfer of U of T Open Fellowships to poorly paid students at the expense of students at relatively higher wage levels.

The GSU report says that this would be "benefitting only the staff," which would show a better distribution of money, but that "there would be the same absolute number of students without support."

There are at present wide differences in support levels to graduate students throughout the university.

Hoffman said "It's a good idea that they want to spread the money around." "The present situation like the real world, in that most people receive little or nothing and a small minority get a fortune."

He added, however, that U of T Open Fellowships only represent three per cent of total graduate support, and that redistribution of this wouldn't mean a great deal.

The SGS report is described by Hoffman as a "working paper which is subject to change; it is not in any way the final policy of SGS."

The report apparently suggests that students facing cuts in remuneration should be urged to appreciate the "non-pecuniary advantages" of teaching, says a GSU counter-report. The GSU says that if this suggestion is valid "we might modestly propose that faculty indulge themselves in this luxury and take a pay cut. The money saved in this manner would more than adequately ensure support levels for graduate students."

The GSU report refers to a proposed "Nereus Award" which would ensure more equitable support to students, but would require them to expend time and effort to receive rates "not commensurate with the work that it does."

Most professors don't like teaching, according to Hoffman, and they prefer that students do their work for them. "It's fine if students do the work, but they should be paid a commensurate amount."

He said that the SGS paper "holds up the philosophy department as a model," but that "our information from students in that department is that it's terrible."

"People should be paid for the work they do," he said, but in the philosophy department students are compelled to teach unspecified numbers of hours per week, getting anywhere from zero to $500 for preparing and teaching a full course.

Some students are threatened with "their supervisor's disapproval" if they won't teach, according to Hoffman.

A submission prepared for the GSU by graduate philosophy students says that the department's policy has "a disconcerting effect on our students and on students with parents and special needs."

The submission continues "the real danger of this policy is that it could be used as a model for the entire university." While it may assist in employment, the policy would "further entrench the upper middle-class core of the university."

Students in engineering and sciences get salaries of only $600-700, and often receive arts students who may earn $2,000, said Hoffman, but he added they should realize that such arts students have to organize and manage an entire course "on their own."

All his graduate students are inadequately supported, he felt, and should advance their interests collectively. The GSU is presently trying to organize a legally certified union of teaching assistants and tutors.

Hoffman called for "guaranteed support for graduate students for the duration of their program, of course taking their academic standing into account." He praised the system at McMaster, where 98 per cent of graduate students receive a minimum of $200 throughout their program, "which is something the U of T hasn't even been talking about."

Hoffman added that U of T president John Evans "came from McMaster, he must be aware of the program."

Lawyers Claim Armstrong's Rights are Violated

By DICK GOLDENSOHN

Lawyers for Karleton Armstrong, contended at the first day of the appeal of his previous extradition order that his rights had been violated since evidence from witnesses who could not be cross-examined was used.

Armstrong is wanted by the United States, on charges in connection with the 1970 bombing of the Army Math Research Centre at the University of Wisconsin in Madison, which resulted in the death of one researcher.

In the opening arguments yesterday, Edward Greenspan, who is one of two lawyers representing the 26 year-old American, maintained that Armstrong had been denied due process of law, since the court hearing the extradition case last June had admitted affidavits from persons in Wisconsin, as evidence but those persons had not been subject to cross-examination.

Greenspan contended that the Canadian Bill of Rights should assure Armstrong of the right to cross-examine the witnesses who gave the affidavits. He also argued that the evidence given did not justify the decision of the court here to allow Armstrong to be tried on a charge of first-degree murder.

In a separate case yesterday, lawyer Paul Copeland argued that Armstrong was being improperly held in isolation. The court ruled that it was not within their jurisdiction to hear arguments on the question.

On Monday, Armstrong had been sent to a solitary confinement in the Toronto Jail for the third time since his incarceration there. Throughout part of the rest of his stay in the jail, Karl has been held in isolation.

The Army Math research Centre had been the target of more than two years of protest on the Wisconsin campus because of its involvement in research for the army's use in the "automated battlefield" in Indochina.

At 3:42 in the morning of August 24, 1970 a large bomb exploding in the building that housed AMRC destroyed the building and killing a researcher, Robert E. Fassnacht.

Armstrong was named as a suspect by the FBI and was arrested in Toronto, by the RCMP in February of this year. Since then he has been held in the Toronto Jail.

Armstrong is charged with first-degree murder and arson. Although four persons, including his brother Dwight, were named in the bombing, only Armstrong has thus far been caught.

Since Canadian courts technically have the right to determine the charges on which Armstrong will be tried if and when he is returned to Wisconsin, his lawyers are also asking the Court of Appeals to drop the first-degree murder charge on the grounds that the death of Fassnacht was accidental and not premeditated.

Armstrong's lawyers contend that the order issued in June is return him to Wisconsin is illegal primarily because the treaty of 1842 that governs extradition between the U.S. and Canada does not apply to "crimes of a political nature."

They admit they are fighting an uphill battle since Canadian courts have never before prevented extradition on grounds that a crime for which extradition was requested was "political."

The last case on record in which the political argument was raised to prevent extradition from Canada was that of Sava Fedorenko, a Russian who was accused of shooting a village policeman in a town that had just been placed under martial law. The Canadian courts ruled that his crime was not of a "political character."

In May of this year, when the case first came to court, a number of American notions testified that the bombing was clearly political in the meaning of the treaty since it occurred as part of a national attempt to reverse state policy and to end the war in Indochina.

Stanton Lynn, New Left historian and anti-war activist and one of those who testified last spring, compared the bombing of Army Math to John Brown's raid on the arsenal at Harper's Ferry in the fall of 1859. He said that John Brown's raid has come to be regarded as a political act by all American historians, even those who remained hostile to what John Brown did.

A County Court judge subsequently dismissed the importance of the testimony of the American activists saying that their testimony could not be regarded as impartial.

SAC waffles on fees

By ZOYA STEVENSON

The Students' Administrative Council's Monday couldn't decide whether it would participate in the Ontario Federation of Students organized second term fees withholding campaign because their meeting lacked a quorum.

The meeting fell three short of the 30 necessary bodies for a quorum count. There are 60 student councils.

The SAC executive however, has officially ratified the strike, which they prefer to call a "boycott."

Three sub-committees either abstained or voted against the strike, because their constituent schools term make the withholding action impractical. Non-payment of tuition means non-registration. The University of Guelph and Lushwagh College abstained, and the University of Waterloo voted against the strike.

Several universities seized the strike on the grounds that it would be ineffective.

Even without council approval, SAC is already spending about $500 (per poster) and Varsity ads supporting the strike. They are also publishing an eight page newspaper for twenty-eight which will urge students to withhold their fees, and inform them about other important campus issues.

There is some question about whether a mailing should go out during the winter break to remind students individually to not yet pay their fees. The mailing would cost SAC an estimated $1500 because it would have to be sent to all of U of T's undergraduate population as well as in the way of telling who has and hasn't paid their fees.

Former SAC education commissioner Marty Sillar, strongly believes that the mailing or anything else should be done in favour of the strike. He said "let's start to rethink the whole concept of how we're going to budget for the fees strike. If we're going to do it, we might as well do it well."

University council executive John Tremlin on the other hand, thinks if we do it, we should not do it with a strong sense of success. The only way a fees strike can come off is if the individual universities uphold their responsibilities. It was mentioned that they should.

SAC will try to hold another meeting to decide what to do about the strike December 31, 10:00 pm in the E. Hall of Union St. College

Ex-SAC Commissioner Leckie Tops Poll for Ward 6 Trustee

By ELAINE FARRACHIER

Monday's election for the two school trusteeship in Ward 6 resulted in the split of progressive and conservative tickets.

Dan Leckie who ran with Bob Spencer, came in first 450 votes ahead of incumbent C. Dock Yip, who ran with Ben Rose. Also an incumbent, came in fourth and Spencer fifth.

With 146 of 149 polls reporting, Leckie led with 4,338 votes, Yip was second with 3,900, Peter Maloney got 3,261, Rose 3,154, Spencer 2,969, David Linn 1,925, Dan Martyniuk 921, Young Socialist Cliff Mack 792, and Murray Starr 500.

The victories of Leckie and Yip match two vastly different viewpoints. Leckie, the most radical of the leading candidates, won along with Yip, the most conservative.

The difference of about 4000 votes between Leckie and Spencer is unusual, given that they ran as a team on exactly the same platform of community control and special consideration of ethnic diversity.

Maloney though, who came in third, said that it was not surprising since Leckie "got top billing" and is "more qualified and knowledgeable" than Yip.

Leckie attributed the difference in votes largely to the fact that he canvassed between 35 and 40 polls by himself while Spencer was organizing the campaign. Leckie said that the importance of personal canvassing cannot be overemphasized.

Also, Leckie was listed on campaign literature as a teacher, while Spencer was listed as an associate producer. As well, a very small part of the difference, Leckie said, could be attributed to the fact that his own name was the first on the ballot.

Although Yip and Rose also ran on the same ticket, they differed from each other on issues. Rose opposes the streaming of inner-city children into opportunity and vocational courses, while Yip says the problem does not exist. Rose also favoured increased community involvement in the schools while Yip says that this is not an issue.

Rose said yesterday that evidently he is "not radical enough for some of the voters, but is too radical for others." Rose added that the vote shows strong evidence of student power in the ward.

Spencer, last year's SAC president at U of T, and Leckie, the education commissioner in the same year, had many students working for them. The ward includes all of the downtown U of T campus south of Bloor Street.

Spencer accused Maloney of "trickery" in sending out cards the day before the election that looked "just like a ballot" and misled him on a list of leading candidates. "I'm responsible for this government," Spencer alleged that Maloney deceived the voter into thinking that he was being endorsed by candidates like David Crombie, Dan Heap and Bill Archer. (The latter two won the aldermanic race in Ward 6.)

Martyniuk, who before the vote was confident of winning, agreed that there was a great deal of trickery employed "by a certain candidate."

Martyniuk said that it was a hard election to analyse, that it wasn't "an election of logic." He said that the results were a combination of "apathy and determination" and that it simply "didn't make sense."

As to the success of his campaign in upsetting the Yip Rose stronghold, Leckie gave a great deal of credit to community groups that supported his campaign.

Leckie suspects that he will have twice the expected responsibility for community organizing since Yip, instead of Spencer, won with him. Yip does not believe that the people are in favour of community control of schools.

The Leckie-Spencer ticket lost heavily in the North-Lakes community, which comprises 42 per cent of the electorate.

Leckie attributes this to the fact that they are middle class, professionals who are too "paranoid" to open their door to canvassers. As a result of this and their support of Crombie leading candidates "I'm responsible for this government," he claimed.

Dan Leckie beat the conservative ticket for Ward 6 trustee seat.

Some Valedictory Thoughts from Sly Old Trickster "R."

There is nothing to humble a reviewer like a new book by Vladimir Nabokov. Even if you don't care for him (and many, very many don't) you can't dismiss him as a charlatan, a literary stuntman, or as a consistent enough confederate of insubstantial tales. No, there are two approaches to this Russo-American writer, this unique hybrid: exegesis or paeon.

The first way is fraught with peril. Nabokov demands attention, intellectual spryness as do few other authors, you don't so much read between the lines as you scrutinize them for unsuspected flaps of meaning that lay folded casually underneath, with some odd wordplay the only clue. And if this isn't difficult enough, the author delights in setting traps for dilettantish critics, particularly disciples of "the Viennese quack." The exegesis of Nabokov has chosen no less precarious an occupation than the racing driver, the double-agent, the hooker specializing in kinky sex.

The safer way — mere praise — is hardly more satisfactory. You regret all the enthusiasm you've squandered so recklessly before. You've cried wolf too often, over-praising pleasant mediocrities, denigrating your superlatives in the process. Those shimmering comparisons, the grandiose words have all been sullied. You begin to envy the literary matron, the throat cutter who damn a book for its flaws and begrudge it its virtues. They, at least, have their miser's hoard of superlatives to fall back on.

Out of desperation, you consider splicing together a compendium of quotations, letting Nabokov speak for Nabokov. But, really, you can't get away with that, you have to write something about Transparent Things, which is a story, a puzzle, and a revelation.

The Story: Transparent Things is a brief work, almost brusque, yet as rich and allusive as Invitation to a Beheading (It seems almost an apology for the elephantine Invitation). Hugh Person is a protagonist, a nondescript 40-year-old who "had earned his living in the various dull ways that fall to the lot of brilliant young people who lack any special gifts or ambition and get accustomed to applying only a small part of their wits to humdrum or charitable tasks." Hugh is the perfect character in the way to plunder from my author that Euler calls zero the perfect number. He is a bland, passive man, moving apprehensively through life, little more than a palimpsest for several layers of insomnias, though rather startling ones for such a cipher.

High, now an editor with a New York publishing house, returns to a hotel in Switzerland where he had sojourned twice before, once with his father and once with his wife, both dead. It is an appointment in Sumarra. That is the skeleton of the story, and all you need to know.

Nabokov's watermark shines transparently through this work, all the patented devices are here. There is the Hoffmannesque wordplay. Sample: "young Pines was the lover of both mother and daughter, whom he had served in Cavaliere, California, during two summers." Less delectable sample: "she asked if he cared to see Counting Stars, an avant garde hit."

Those quotations should remind the astute reader of the thread of clownish sex that runs through his novels, Russian and English. The ponderous solemnity with which indolent men and women do utterly ridiculous things, all in the name of sex, is the standing joke in his fiction. Hugh and his wife used to make love fully dressed, at tea-time, with as little disarrangement of clothes as possible and without missing a beat of their manic cocktail prattle. Nabokov is a master of the art of details, of tantalizing allusion, of the outrageously off-color patentness.

One familiar character deserves mention, believe me, we move on the next level of our novel. Mr. R. is a world-famous author whose magnanimous Proletarians. Hugh is editing Mr. R. It is an essential figure "who wrote English considerably better than he spoke it." He is also the author of a novella called Three Tenors; he is often accused of seducing sparkling young girls, and you did not like his best book, The Puzzle. "We both like to play games." Robert Frost mused in comparing himself to T.S. Eliot, "but I like to play ciphers, and he likes to play Enchiridi." Nabokov is an inimitable gamster, too, but his is a grandmaster's game of chess. (His early novel The Defense was a sustained plotting of fiction on a chessboard.) He is a fabricator of chess problems, and admires it especially those sophisticated ones that define his solver on a "sound about route (setting landscapes, pangs, tapers, exotic customs, the three-repeated circuit of a married couple around the sacred fire of an earthen hearth). Fair (and fun) enough. The great Pale Fire was a forthright puzzle, to be pieced together out of a madman's notes to a murdered man's unfinished poem; it is the greatest extravaganza in twentieth-century fiction, and a substantial work of art to look at. But Nabokov tampers obsessively with even his straight-forward books. Pnin, this simplest story Nabokov ever wrote, has the narrator doubling inorganic as a character, and even the magnificent autobiography Speak Memory conceals malicious allusions and tantalized events. Invitation is subtitled "a new novel, from start to finish, from intuitive riddle to simple enigma."

Forewarned is forearmed. What sort of riddle has he devised for us this time? Well, haven't I quite puzzled it out, but I have some clues. Doubtless has been a recurrent and vital theme through Nabokov's works. In Despair, the hero stumbles into his doppelgänger one day and the book takes off from there. Invitation is set in the wilds of America, a world geographically like ours but where the last 150 centuries of global politics seem to have taken an entirely different course. Lolita steers neatly into the story of an old lecher who lusts after twelve-year-old girls, and the story of a man who gets the chance. Pale Fire juxtaposed the paranoid fantasy world of Dr. Kambac with John Shade's calm world of art; it somehow guided the boundary. There are some hints in Things: "A doppel shift covered her body" he writes, and "an electric sign DOPPIER shifted to white." Once is innocent wordplay, twice I think, is significant. Strange correspondences show up among the characters. There is a Person here and a Person fits, a Mrs. Chinnur and an Armande Chinnur, and then there is, briefly, our Armande Ruse, a housemaid who "had strangled his husband's incestuous sister. There is a Jack a Jack and Jacques. There is a guide history of sexual convulsion snaking through these characters' biographies, interlinking them as in Schatzel's La Route. I keep wondering if Things works like a topographic identity which, if you remember, began with a monstrous equation, full of curves, theta and tangents, something else. By an implausible series of in-versions and shifts across the equals sign, those recalcitrant hunk of numbers and symbols would change shape to become perfect images, the equals sign would melt away, become superfluous; you had created an identity.

Can we do the same with the odd cast of characters in Transparent Things? Can we double them up, once or twice, at once again, until finally nobody is left? I'm not altogether sure this is the solution, but in a more literal sense nobody is left at the end, which brings us up one more level.

The Revelation: Mary McCarthy, in a wild litany of praise for Pale Fire, called it a faberje jewel, a clockwork toy, a do-it-yourself kit, a cat-and-mouse game, a jack-in-the-box. She called it one thing, however, that is much more appropriately given to Transparent Things, for this brief tale unfolds stealthily and envelopes us with the irresistible fascination of an infernal machine. The metaphor is not faulted. There are more deaths here than in the The Spanish Tragedy. The major characters are all humped off, and casual parentheses are forever informing us of offstage fatalities. (Very strange, this little book.)

Of course Nabokov is not one to mope around when it comes to death. "This is, I believe, if not the tasteful denouement here been the staple of his fiction, all brought off with icy despatch. This novella is no different, and modalities of death are mounted as gleefully as in a Jacques Bond movie.

But there's a new note as well, gentle and elegant, reminiscent of the most moving passages in his autobiography. It is fitting tone for Nabokov offers us, implicitly and explicitly, a look at the reality of death. "This is, I believe, if not the crudest, unwork of physical suffering, but the incomparable pangs of the mysterious mental maneuvers needed to pass from one state of being to another."

Well, death is one of what the Catholic church calls "the four last things to be remembered" and those four things are decidedly not usual subjects for serious artists. At least not all the way. At least not in this raw, undisguised form. But Nabokov, sitting securely on the mountain-peak of his reputation (and it is a reputation of artistic intellectualism and implacable anti-sentimentality) can do damn well what he wants.

It's risky, I suppose, to say that Nabokov has issued a keivema. Or even that he has pretended to. People will chide me for even entering this is a very curious piece of fiction, fiction, after all, and one doesn't go poking around for truth. But then this is very curious piece of fiction. Nabokov himself appears, in a lucidram disguise, sending a letter to his publisher wanting to explain "the triple totality" he has discovered a few days before death. "Total rejection of all religions ever dreamt up by man and total composure in the face of total death." And we are in it too — Hugh Person (yes, you!) the cipher, the circle reader.

For some time now Nabokov has been playing around with those big old questions that are the province of philosophers and mystics, not novelists. And he has been doing it in dead earnest. The Texture of Time, palmed off on us in the middle of '44 as Vera Veeva's novella, was as heavily didactic a lump embedded in genuine art as Lucretius' exhaustive expose of the atomic source. Odd and significant intersections of time and space occur in Transparent Things. And now this last message: death is a quantum jump into a benign nothingness. (One might note that if we take this at face value, it is at odds with his musings on death in the autobiography, where he claims to shy away from even "the routine terrors of sleep.") Clearly the man is engaged on gigantic enterprise.

Enterprise. I confess, that I usually find about as compelling as double-crosses with solutions two weeks away. Constructs with no other purpose than to baffle me, like alle metamorphic specifications, are not my idea of recreation for enlightenment. But Nabokov gets along with it. Maybe he's an ideal inventor. A twentieth-century scientist who drives us into huge arguments before we know it. More likely he's a brilliant showman, a first-rank artist who can do anything he wants simply because what he does, he does far and away better than anyone living (or dead, for that matter) his wordplay and punning are, for his notions, better than Love's and his structure of timekeeping the equal of Proust's. No matter. I will take my cues from another paragraph, and I will continue to read Nabokov and read him again for "the orgasm of art (which) courses through the whole spine with incompatible more fire than sexual ecstasies or metaphysical pangs."

BREAD FACTORY

By Mitchell M. Littner
 Paul Robinson lived opposite a huge, misshapen bread factory that sprawled over half a city block. It was the one permanent thing in his life, and about it clustered his most important memories.

As a kid he played handball against its broad, red walls, and when he grew older, he banged a tennis ball against it with a cheap, broken-down racket. In the autumns of his early, carefree life, he would lean his back against its warm brick sides (for there were blazing furnaces beyond) and he would listen to the pleasant murmur of a thousand crickets whose music seemed to haunt the atmosphere.

Once, he could remember, that he had hugged that self-same wall with terror: For out of the house next to the factory had lunged a jealousy-crazed husband, brandishing a gigantic axe, a few feet behind his star boarder. It later appeared that he had caught him in a tell-tale posture with his wife.

And to make his memory of the factory more symmetrical, there lived on the other side a tongueless woman. She had nagged her loving spouse once too often; and he, being a butcher, was handy with a meat cleaver.

In his dreams, therefore, Paul often caught a blurred, Freudian vision of a stylized factory encircled by a bloody moat. Paul, however, could see no erotic symbol in the picture.

But the factory itself contained legendary mysteries, that partook of the fantastic, the horrible and yet the fascinating.

When he was at the fairy-book age, the factory seemed like some monstrous fortress, peopled by the brutes of Circe. On torrid summer nights, hairy men, pasty with the pallor of the tomb, crowded the dirty windows. Naked to the waist, they leered at the girls passing down the alley-like street and made indecent suggestions — suggestions which were sometimes accepted — but without guarantee.

Sometimes, in the middle of the night, when only the occasional clatter of machinery broke the unearthly quiet of the street... a strange thing happened.

Moved by a sympathetic rapport, a sinister and defiant murmur would spread through the factory. Rising to a horrible crescendo of mingled howls and yelps like some great beast in pain, it would break like a tidal wave, and waking suddenly in terror, Paul thought that the walls of the factory were even the walls of the city must crack, like the walls of Jericho. Soon that weird cry would disintegrate into a discordant rout of groans and wails, and Paul, knowing not why, was stirred by a profound pity and would sink back to sleep, sad and tear-stained.

When he grew up those cries were to symbolize to Paul the grief of the oppressed. But now they were only the half-human noises of enchanted animals. Circe's beasts! It was she who had turned these human beings into wretched creatures! This myth ran amuck on the twilight of his mind in those hours when thoughts flutuate to symbols — and symbols become fabulous in the phantasmagoria of the dream life. But who was Circe and why had she caused such sadistic metamorphoses? Then the fumes of sleep thickened in his brain and he would drift off again....

But once there came to the factory an Italian baker and Paul would wake up in heaven to the most paradisaical singing. The unearthly hush of the alley was accentuated by the thin sweet notes of some forgotten aria. There was an other-worldly quality about that voice that fused time and space and obliterated them from consciousness until the only remaining thing was that high clear voice overfadowing the universe and filling eternity with sweetness.

But in a few short days the owner of that voice had vanished — perhaps discharged by an un-musical boss — and the jungle cry began again.

Paul's sister was a hostess in a ten-cent-a-dance joint. Her bedroom window lay directly opposite the men's locker room. Paul's mother couldn't afford a blind for that window. Paul often wondered why, when his sister came home, the men would crowd to their window. He was glad because she seemed so popular with the men and his heart yearned to see their ruddy unshaven faces lit up so happily. When Paul grew older and perhaps wiser, he realized that his sister had indulged in a teasing bit of erotic exhibitionism in front of her lighned window, but he forgave her when he realized that she had brought a little joy into the lives of those melancholy creatures.

When he was sixteen, he actually met a baker personally! He was walking north, when somebody touched him on the shoulder. "Ain't you the kid who lives across from the bakery?" "Yes, sir, how do you do?" "Going to school, huh? Well, take my advice and stick to it, kid.

I was crazy enough to want a job as soon as I could get it, and here I've been stuck at a night job in front of a hot furnace for the last ten years. Guess I'll die that way too. Doc says I've got TB. If it weren't for my old woman and kids, I'd have a freight to the land of sunshine and fresh air." Here he spat disgustedly. "Anyway, I'll die in action," he smirked. "What a hell of a lot of action I'll get!" They walked along in silence for a while.

"Say, kid," turning confidently to Paul, "got a go?"

"None, not yet."

"Well, kid, take my advice, get a lot of experience wid 'em while you're young. Love and leave 'em plenty now, so when you're the marryin' age, you can thumb your nose at 'em when they try to talk yuh into marryin' 'em — like I didn't tuh my old lady. Christ, kid, I used to have ambitions! You'd never think it to look at me, but I was once going to take a cattle boat to Europe and see the world. Even China! Ah, Jesus, what can a poor bastard like me do — with no schoolin' and a pack of kids I never see but hear plenty making a racket when I'm trying tuh sleep in the daytime. A guy like me grabs at the first ting dat offers tuh keep him in his. So long, kid, I toin off here!"

"Gnood day, sir."

Paul felt that in those short moments of monologue he had turned in by accident on the group mind of those factory workers. So this is what those midnight groans and groans meant. Would he, Paul, have to face those alien problems? As an only boy and a younger brother, he had been well sheltered from the vicissitudes of life. It was unthinkable that he would end life like those bakers. He determined to stick to school.

Before he went to college, Paul interviewed a number of prominent politicians who became oratorical about the advantages of a university degree. But Paul made a tragic mistake by taking a general arts course. He was never told that most of those boys who graduated from college into business had been slated to succeed their fathers from the beginning. The real entered professional life at the bread line. The BA was just social embroidery. It proved that they were educated.

Paul worked hard but could do no better than B grades. While he worked, he felt socially useful and was not conscience-stricken at himself for loafing during summer months. When his first attempts at summer job-hunting proved futile,

Fighting now is winning the war...
 Thinking now can win the peace

Today millions of service men are fighting for "a better world to live in." Other millions of individuals are performing miracles of production through the united efforts of management and wage earners—all of one mind—for "an unconditional surrender."

Tomorrow these millions will be permanently employed in peacetime pursuits provided they—all of one mind—discuss sound peace terms calling for sustained prosperity.

If the world is to prosper, there must be the same cohesion among the United Nations during the transition period and thereafter as now exists during the world-wide conflict. Internal stability here and in other nations can be gained and maintained only by sustained industrial production and by economic interdependence.

The people of this country, in common with the people of other lands, will prosper materially and spiritually when this war is ended but only if insistence, world-wide in scope, is now voiced for a JUST AND DURABLE PEACE.

Relax with some Recorded Holiday Cheer

Angels should be Under the Tree This Yule morn

What record company would do as the Christmas Season rolls around. Anyway, I want to talk about a few of my favorite records that are especially good and that you should consider buying for yourself or for those who hold you responsible for making their Christmas morning a voluminous gift-filled affair. They are all angel records, too, though that is fortuitous.

Yes, I have to say that Angel Records (EMI) has probably done more than any other recording company to make virtuoso performances of works recorded decades ago available today — and cheaply. The company is now in the process of gathering up many of its "Great Recordings of the Century" on its bargain-label Seraphim. We now have all of Beethoven's sonatas on twelve Seraphim discs (Artur Schnabel) and last month a set of two records of Beethoven's cello sonatas was reissued on this label. The performances are the truly legendary ones of Schnabel and Pierre Fauriol, and it is thought by some that only the Cavas recordings outdo the near perfection of the performances by these great masters.

The last three sonatas are actually the re-releases since Nos. 1 and 2 appear for the first time. What I think Angel means is that the last two appeared for the first time way back in 1950 or so and so they are now re-released like the others, having been in the catalogue for years, are in a sense re-re-released — that is all ornamental 49's, onto an early mono LP and now onto this new re-release of that old mono recording. Unnecessarily confusing, I suppose.

Anyway, the performances are still ravishing and unimpaired by the years and fuzziness which usually accumulate as the Record Masters are thrown about over the years in some storage room. All performances were recorded in 1947-8.

Beethoven: Cello Sonatas, Fauriol/Schnabel, $5.98. Two discs, Mono, No. BB-6075.

Neville Marriner is indeed a very novel number and certainly not ancient. This young conductor of The Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields has just produced a brilliant recording of English music for strings. The first piece, Holst's St. Paul's Suite, will either please or bore, depending on one's taste for chromatinized odd-ball tunes, yet he does keep the interest alive by his tumbling rhythms and by bantering themes about from section to section. Conductor Marriner is relentlessly on top of the music, never giving into the temptation to melodramatize with rubato or let the miscelaneous tone of his strings become flabby and push.

Delius Fenby: Two Aquarelles is careworn with a soft, muted velvet, asny Wullum's "Touch Her Soft Lips and Part" from his film music to "Henry V." And yet there is a bite and staunch elegance in the playing of the Holst and Britten's familiar "Simple Symphony" Purcell's brilliant and unsurpassed (except by Bach's) Cracoon in G minor is applied and massively propelled by the fatmating energy of the strings.

The sound of the record is actually slightly cold, but in every other way, this is a first-class effort. I don't think many of the pieces have ever been inspired with more verve and sheer insight, in spite of the legendary, almost paradigmatic performances by Adrian Boult and Thomas Beecham. The notes on the back are A-1 too.

English Music For Strings; Neville Marriner conducting the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields. One disc, $6.29. No. S-36883.

The last Angel record I want to look at is another Seraphim release. It is also another zinger, Fernando Germani, perhaps one of the three or four best Italian keyboard masters of the century, plays four of Bach's biggest organ specialties on the massive Ruyal Festival Hall All-Organs-In-One Organ. The opening toccata from the Toccata and Fugue in D minor is a momentous, propulsive dance, and Germani eclipses all other performances for fullness rhythmic drive coupled with huge, unrestrained sound. Here is a rival for Virgil Fox and E. Power Biggs any day. Energetically pushing these monumental boulders of chords and arpeggios around as if they were treble irills, Germani makes these pieces sound almost frightening. Rhythmic precision and clarity so informs his reading of the famous Fantasia and Fugue in G minor that the monstrous noise this organ makes because of its size becomes part of the artistic elegance of Germani's whole performance. Sound is A-1 except near the end (which is a recurrent problem, especially on cheaper labels, because of the tone arm's deviation from its 15 degree tangent angle as it completes its arc across the record.)

I felt guilty about restricting myself to Angel records, because the other companies are putting out excellent things. Perhaps I could just mention the various Mahler recent releases, such as Kubelik on DGG (the seventh), Solti on London (also the seventh) and of course Bernstein's and Haitik's older versions of the complete symphonies. They are all admirable sets, and well-recorded. Look for Telefunken's continuing releases of Beethoven's cantatas and the soon-to-be-released version of the Grosse Fuge on DGG with Herbert Von Karajan. Ian Scott

Lavish Packages Glut Marketplace with Xmas Tinsel

In the pre-Beatle era, Christmas-time usually signalled the release of albums of Christmas carols by popular artists and groups. But now record companies simply glut the market with new releases to attract the gift-buying public. The strong competition in recent years has resulted in the spawning of a new breed of album, lavishly packaged, containing two or more discs plus books and/or posters. The Concert recording artist brought his idea of re-recording Tommy, using a well-known symphony orchestra to play the music, and having contemporary artists in character singing the various roles in operatic fashion, to Peter Townsend. With the cooperation of Townsend and the other members of The Who, Reizner began the project of casting characters and looking for artists. The work on the album took a full two years.

Peter Townsend plays the part of the narrator and, as well as adding acoustic guitar and ARP Synthesizer, Who's lead singer, Roger Daltry, plays the role of Tommy while bassist John Entwistle is featured as Cousin Kevin. Other soloists include Sandy Denny (of Fairport Convention and Fairport), Steve Winwood, Ringo Starr, Rod Stewart, Richie Havens, Merry Queen was a perfect performance. Likewise, Richie Havens was outstanding as the Hawker, injecting his free-flowing style and interpretation. Rod Stewart's interpretation of Pinball Wizard acted on different levels of consciousness. On one hand, his powerful raw vocals are immensely satisfying while in some lines his tendency to fall behind the orchestra's tempo and catch up later, destroy what might have been a high point in the opera.

John Entwistle used the orchestra to magnificent effect in his own composition of Conn Kerin. The character is more clearly two-faced and bifurcated vicious than in the original version, as Entwistle's voice shifts from clear tones of innocence to raspy-throated savagery supported by the orchestra's accompanying changes relative importance in relaying the mood in each passage must have been a monumental task.

Even the packaging of Tommy is extraordinary. The two album set, complete with an illustrated book of lyrics is found inside a larger cardboard cover. Each part of the package is embellished with stylized silver "pinball." The book of lyrics is itself a work of art, containing surrealistic photographs and impressive drawings of the subjects in character as done by a variety of artists.

Tommy represents the most outstanding achievement in rock music to date. It is unimpaired by a production which has completed encompassing any more musical complexities in a time less than the two years required. This album is a must for any serious rock music fan. It can't be more highly recommended.

Using a new packaging concept Polydiv Records has released a double album collection of hits by the new defunct Cream simultaneously with double album sets by each of the three members of that group: Eric Clapton, Ginger Baker and Jack Bruce. Heavy Cream is made up of most of Cream's best known material. It's essentially available in live or studio versions on two much older albums, The Best of Cream and Goodbye. The main advantage this set has is the low price but you might be a bit wary about the album. Some cuts are distinctly "hissy" in what should be quiet spots, while some instruments have lost depth. It may be the result of poor layers or masters. The Best of Jack Bruce serves as the indicator that Cream was in fact only two thirds a "supergroup." All the songs on-authorized by Bruce and Pete Brown are impressive and unweaving.

The Best of Ginger Baker is a very worthwhile set though. The album includes four cuts from Baker's stint with Blind Faith as well as some excellent rhythmic showpieces culled from Ginger Baker's Airforce. (Eric Clapton's record was not available at the time of printing.)

In the past, most folkies recorded their annual albums with the barest of accompaniment, songs arranged basically as they were written. Sooner or later, they felt internal pressures to beef up the arrangements adding instruments, until the ultimate — a string section — was reached. For some performers like Joan Baez, the evolution was natural enough, while still others like Jim Mitchell have managed to resist the orchestral temptations and modify their styles more subtly.

Murray McLaughlin, Toronto based minstrel, began his recording career last year with the release of Song from the Street. The songs on that album were well worn McLaughlin compositions played in Murray's typical style and few (fills) were added beyond bass, guitar and drums. But the new album, Murray McLaughlin (Columbia), reveals a lot of poor judgement, timing and writing on McLaughlin's part. The album, recorded in New York, is an example of the negative effects of a premature shift to the overstrated epitome. The overproduction is an ally, the vision perpetrated by producer Ed Freeman, but Murray is certainly responsible for much of the album's weakness. The new songs all seem to lack vitality and reason d'être, being instead, mindlessly and thematically forced. The first album was sincere and close to the man. This new one just uses strings and things to try and cover up for what is second rate writing in most cases.

Another artist suffering from overproduction these days is Rita Coslidge. Her first album, in early 1971, was a skillfully controlled collection of well chosen songs using a suppression of backup artists. The next album, Nice Feelings, was arranged on a smaller scale using only Marc Benni and the Dixie Flvers (from Muscle Shoals). The songs were more soulful and moody than its tempo rock numbers like those on the first album were avoided. But the record was somewhat relaxed yet honest.

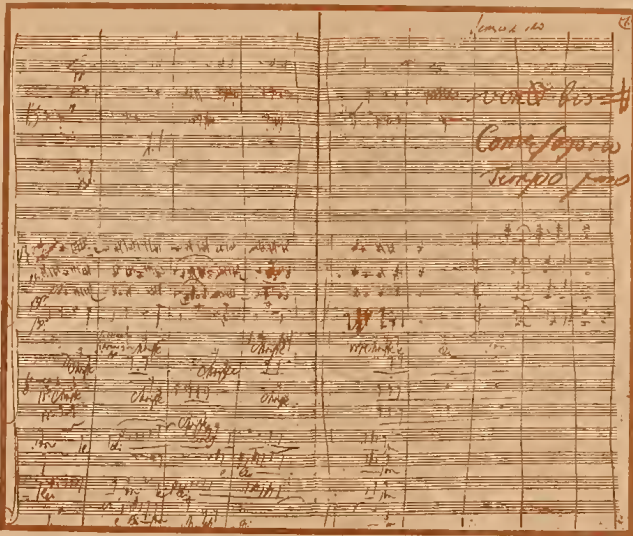

The Lady's Not For Sale (A & M), Rita's new record, once again employs the talents of a wide array of "super" musicians such as Al Kooper, Booker T and Priscilla Jones, and Kris Kristofferson, but producer David Anderle's hand was much too heavy. The songs have the artificial aura of touched up photographs. Rita breathes a little too heavy and holds her whirto too long. It all sounds a little too contrived, like slick continuity and western music aimed at a wide audience.

A surprising number of popular groups have been in fallow for periods in excess of a year and a half between new albums. Some of them including Joe Cocker and The Moody Blues have released their newest efforts in the past few weeks.

Joe Cocker has spent a long time in retirement, following the Mad Dogs and Englishmen venture with Leon Russell. Recently Cocker has put together a new big band led by his long time associates Chris Statton and Allan Spector, and they've spent some time touring and getting material together for the album Joe Cocker (A & M, SP-3368). Side one has a rough edges save for those in Joe's voice and the compositions by Cocker and Statton are more musically mature and the band is in better control than in the past. But it was rumored that there was some difficulty in selecting quality material for the record and it's an side two that the problems came to light. Cocker's interpretation of other writers' songs is somewhat lacking, and instruments in the band seem to get lost in the production especially in the live tracks, as was the case in Mad Dogs.

The Moody Blues' Seventh Sojourn (London) is just another Moody Blues album. The continuation of pretentious mellotron music (sounding like a canned orchestra) linking together equally pretentious lyrics in a loose thematic structure was a good idea when the Moody Blues were innovators years ago. But seven albums later the lack of musical (and political) evolution makes their efforts seem boring. Maybe on number eight they'll come up with something better.

Alan Mandell

for Bangladesh, George Harrison's All Things Must Pass, the four LP, live Chicago at Carnegie Hall set, and Jesus Christ Superstar are all albums of this genre.

This year's addition to the aforementioned club, is a startling creation (or rather re-creation) of the first ever rock opera Tommy, written by Peter Townsend and originally recorded by The Who in 1969. The new album is by far the finest rock album ever produced. That statement covers a lot of musical territory but it's a necessary response to the scope of the recording.

Tommy (A & M) produced by Lou Reizner, was carefully restored by Will Malone and Jim Sullivan and features the London Symphony Orchestra, conducted by David Meulman, the London Chamber Choir and various guest soloists. Reizner, an American producer (who signed Rod Stewart as a solo Clayton and Richard Harris.

The storyline of Tommy was explained by creator Townsend: "The central character is Tommy himself, born at the end of the First World War, he becomes blind, deaf and dumb after seeing a murder in the reflection of a mirror, perpetrated by his parents. Thereby, living in a totally isolated, introverted world that only he knows, all that he experiences is what he feels. He becomes a pinball champion, reaches a state of enlightenment when he regains his natural senses, and starts a religion. Eventually he finds himself discarded by his own disciples, again finds himself in isolation as he was in the beginning."

The new version of Tommy makes the storyline more vivid by separating the characters and giving them each identifiable personalities. Merry Clayton's characterization of the bluesy, sweating, stultish Acid in atmosphere Roger Daltry as Tommy is flawless while Townsend's narration is less dazzling. But Townsend's synthesizer and guitar parts are impeccably executed and integrated with the orchestra.

The real star of Tommy is the London Symphony Orchestra. Under the direction of David Meulman, who has worked as an assistant to Leonard Bernstein and conducted the London Symphony for tracks on Neil Young's Harvest album, the orchestra performs flawlessly, adding a new dimension to Townsend's music. Of course, the arrangers, Malone and Simpson, have done an incredible amount of work changing the music not only to fit the personalities of the soloists, but to bring out the complexities of the underlying themes within the story and yet maintain musical continuity. Laing's Offbeat Views in Trenchant Film

R D Laing was on the Dick Cavett Show recently with two other psychiatrists. Cavett asked them about Tom Eggleton. Good old Cavett. One said yes, one said no, and Laing didn't say anything until pressed, when he said that he thought the error had been in Eggleton's choice of psychiatrist.

Is that clear? I have been a convert to Laing's inverted, Alice-in-Wonderland vision of the world for several years. Most of my friends are as well, but I don't know what to assume about you.

In a nutshell, Laing dis-equates abnormality and sanity. A person who is abnormal may be saner than the rest of us. He may be crazier too, but he is not de facto sick, and we are not de facto well. The paranoid may really be metanoic, that is, paranoid when it is right. (Most people, Laing says, have a delusion of not being persecuted.) Who gets locked up and who enters the keys, who treats and who gets treated, who gives drugs and who gets drugged are questions of politics and economics. Who is crazy: the witches or the mausoleum? Most of Laing's writing is on the family and the devout, unspoken way it normalizes its members and erases any evidence to the effect that things might have been otherwise. From time to time this web becomes so tangled and strained that order can only be re-instituted by lining a doctor to remove and tame the family's least popular member. Laing writes about this in The Politics of the Family (CBC, paperback) and gives twelve exemplary cases in Sunair, Madness and the Family (Penguin). Wednesday's Child, Ken Loach's new film at the Odéon York, is the movie version.

Janice (Sandy Ratcliffe) lives at home with her lower middle-class parents. She is sulky and depressed. She won't hold a job, sleeps with men, and acts mildly defiant by standing in a tube station making no attempt to board a train. Her parents take her to a young psychiatrist and she ultimately becomes an inmate in his liberal "experimental" ward. However, his contract is not renewed by the hospital ("We think a man of his intelligence and fresh ideas might be more valuable in circulation") and Janice is put on the more traditional treatment of drugs and electroshock. She escapes with her boyfriend, is apprehended and returned to hospital. Her "condition" worsens and she moves more and more out of reach.

Sandy Ratcliffe plays the disturbed Janice, oppressed by her family, in Ken Loach's film.

This is heavy stuff, and it hits heavily because the film is, at heart, a documentary. So few films are. Even titular documentaries — Lady Singe the Blues, for example — usually turn out to be fantasies pegged to real names. Loach's, however, is strictly a no make-up, natural light, um and ah approach. This does not mean it is dull: Aes his last film, was a funny, sad masterpiece. But it wasn't flashy, and flash is the silver on the silver screen in Wednesday's Child only the title, changed for North American consumption, is flashy. The English title, Family Life is plainer but far more trenchant.

I recommend the film. It is not the perfect little work that Ker was. Its failures are embarrassingly apparent. But even when it fans it does so in a league that few movies reach, that few even try to reach. The criticism that follows is friendly and based on approval.

It is hard not to be peevish when you are indignant. To call what the Americans are doing to Vietnam genocide sounds peevish, even though it is the appropriate, literal use of the word. Such is the politics of language.

Despite his record as one of England's top contemporary playwrights, David Mercer, the author of Wednesday's Child gets peevish. The parents he has created are one-dimensional. They are bad guys. Of course, in real life, that is exactly how they would come across, but this is art, representation, and it is fair to ask for more. Mercer is not entirely to blame; in part, it is the drawback of an amateur cast. Bill Dean, a seasoned professional, wins some sympathy as Janice's father even though he browbeats her awfully. But Grace Cave (the mother) is an amateur and cannot project hurt — most of us can't — and so remains a tyrant, which fudges the point.

And Loach has cut a few corners that were best got round some other way. What he gains in time, he loses in authority. Even unmade up, Sandy Ratcliffe, as Janice, is comely. What if she were fat or old? There are as many troublesome old folks committed to institutions by their children, as there are disobedient youngsters committed by their parents. Janice is given the seven equivalent of political power — looks — at the same time as the script tries its best to take it away. Further, she is too prim, even in her slovenly way. She does not do the bizarre things that many mad people do, and that is where the fat really hits the fire, when family and friends are continually assaulted for their own habits by a loved one no longer so constrained. It is when I tell you that our friendship is bulkiest and I don't want your help, that you are tested. I have seen some very open minds close at that point and call for sedation (for the other). This is not to say that Janice and her family could not exist as is. But as a test-case they are a little white, civil rights for barbarians is the real issue.

The last criticism is a specialized one for those already steeped in the lore of radical therapy. Loach's film demonstrates, it does not add nor does it trace the more delicate interstices of double bind and the meta-rules that ban the social rules from consideration. (But then, Laing doesn't make movies.) And it does not raise the post-Laing question, what do we do when we have waded the straight-jackets and the tranquilizers? As David Cooper said when he spoke here last winter, "Many of you would not put a person in a mental hospital, but how many of you would take one out?"

Bob Bossin

Players in Rats line up for one of the skits in Robert Swerdlow's unsipable satire.

Einstein, Dietrich, Nazis: Old Berlin

It is not surprising that a play called Rats would come out of the experiences of a Canadian playwright in New York City. Last year Robert Swerdlow created and directed a brilliant musical, Justine, which ran about seven months in Toronto and almost that long off Broadway in New York. It was his experience in taking Justine (later Love Me Love My Children) to New York that provided the basis for the material of Rats.

Rats is subtitled "A Playwright's Revenge" and a revenge it is. This shows a satirical protest against the power of one man, Clive Barnes, the New York Times theatre critic. He has the power to open or close any New York show at his whim, and it was against the weight of his heavy judgment that Swerdlow fought to keep Justine alive, and won.

None too subtle in both its title and substance, Rats contains deep tones of the bitterness that resulted from Swerdlow's experience with Justine in New York. The play seems a manifestation of the playwright's cultural shock. An outsider comes to the big city, in a different country, but with a creation that inflames with a sense of purpose. His understanding fails when this purpose is fouled by the Swerdlow produces some stirring musical numbers. It seems that the musical aspect of the show succeeded at the expense of the rest of the show. Although I laughed aloud at some of the skits, for the most part the show falls flat. Much of it is full of sarcastic little digs at the New York theatre community, most of which pass right over the heads of a Toronto audience. The action is sluggish and for much of the show (1 hour and 50 minutes) I sat there waiting for an intermission which never came.

If Rats is subtitled "A Playwright's Revenge", Swerdlow's New York producers will have the last laugh, Rats will never make it to New York. Swerdlow still has his head full of Justine and New York, but perhaps when he has purged his mind of what must have been a very involving personal experience, a wiser Swerdlow will produce better things to come.

Dan Lyus

'Playwright's Revenge' against Critics' Fiat

Before the Deluge covers the Weimar Republic, Hitler's casual, incredible rise, and what it was, in the 20's, to be a Berliner. Berlin was then a place of impermanent renaissance, but, despite its cosmopolitanism, it had the inherent seeds that would generate the SA. Otto Friedrich's book, however, is not concerned solely with Nazism's ascension. Against the larger political tapestry he plots the careers of those people of Berlin, apart from the Rockefellers, those who survived.

Christopher Isherwood, who has created, more than any other German writer, the image we have of Berlin in the 1920's, hearing that Berlin was another Sodom, decided to go there as soon as possible. Rudolf Serkin played with Einstein — "a terrible violinist." Walter Rathenau, who was assassinated because he was a Jew, was the first in a domino-line of corpses that paved the way to Hitler's Chancellorship.

The Bathos, (its influences are still felt in design today), the assassination of Nabokov's father, Pola Negri fleeing bullets in Lame, Dietrich's cultivation of Sternberg, Friedrich's haunting Spartacists, all this is grist for Friedrich's mill. And it is this technique that mars his book. It is a good chronological account, but the focus shifts from the state to the individual, the politicking to the personal dilemmas, the diaries of Goebbels to the astronomical inflation of the mark. Obviously, Friedrich knows his subject, (there is a copious bibliography), but I could wish for a steady overview, over all those glimpses. A fascinating and somewhat daunting book but a shrewd achievement notwithstanding.

One Dizzying Madhouse of a Play

Oh yeh! Oh yeh! It's absurdity! One of the advantages of a weekly review is that one can savour longer the pleasures of a show, a very nice advantage where Ken Campbell's Pik's Madhouse is concerned. I worked with Ken on a show in London and his humour now is as manic and as peevish as it was then.

Madhouse is a series of sketches all around the subject of the pleasures of being mad — much like the Happy Gang, the Goons, or drunken charades. A few scenes may argue for the whole: The Amazing Diminishing Men, who are really women, would make Bormann proud; Tossed Off — all about a reduction suicide; The Man Who Couldn't Tell The Difference — exactly how high is a table (would a midget agree?) and what exactly makes up the concept of tableness. Ad Contaminum.

For Pik, and perhaps for Campbell as well, "Absurdity is my light and my god." A madhouse is a place to go to be mad in. But it is not all sweet fun and light games. Non sequiturs lead to strangulation in a protest against the well-ordered life. A professor Dimitrieff offers, almost hesitantly, an academic apology for Pik. The Stratford style is pilloried perceptively, and we reach to the idea of Nietzsche in Total Tango Time, when the fact, that God is Dead is coupled with Pik's impression of a hoi.

It would be invidious to single out individual cast members for, with Bob Dermer's Marty Feldman face, Andy Jones' mother, Philip Schrieblman's Groucho and Jennifer Watts' myriaph we have a rogues' gallery of characters that would do credit to any zoo — and so do here. If perhaps, at times, the style evades them, there is no real harm done. In a time of multiple elections, it is good to see how accurate Pik's Madhouse is.

"Magical Animals, scheming Courtiers and thwarted Lovers wander through the enchanted Palace and forest of Sweden. The King is trapped in the body of a Stag while his sinister Prime Minister attempts to steal the Throne and the fair Angela."

The Tarragon Theatre presents a fairy tale for children of all ages between December 19 and January 21. The Stag King, after 300 years of eighteenth century Commedia, combines the talents of Stephen Katz, who apprenticed at Hart House and May Keri, who may be remembered for her dazzling ensembles that appeared in The Insect Play shown at Hart House two years ago. It plays Tuesdays through Sundays with a mixture of matinees and evening performances. Call for details 531-1827.

Continuing in the realm of children's theatre, one of the more delightful by-products of our Christmas season, we find Magic Mountain, the Studio Lab Theatre's offering for the season. Since theatre for children has been this company's mainstay for some time now, the production will remain until March. There is also a Copper Mountain to be found at the Global Village before Christmas.

The larger Toronto theatres have remembered young audiences without fail. St. Lawrence Centre's Young People's Theatre presents The Dandy Lion, about a young boy and a friendly lion trying to make the big top at the circus. It plays at the Town Hall most afternoons in December, with scattered performances after that through March.

The Royal Alexandra features a spectacular pantomime from London, Goldlocks and the Three Bears. There will be circus acts, dancers, a pot-pourri of musical numbers and dazzling sets to mesmerize children and adults (and those of us who are both). No surprise that the O'Keefe Centre will be housing the National Ballet's Nutcracker. The enchanting Christmas fairytale can be seen for as much as $7.50 evenings in the "gold" or as little as $1.25 afternoons in the "greys".

Toronto Workshop Productions opens at last with a revival of one of its hits. Hey Rubel! Premiering December 7, it will run through the middle of January. The late Nathan Cohen acclaimed it as "Total Theatre, an exhilarating adventure among the theatre arts."

Main Hunter's interpretation of Medea will be playing in the Church on Glen Morris St. this Wednesday through Saturday. See the Centre for the Study of Drama at work.

Twelfth Night comes to the St. Lawrence Centre on the eve of December 12 and thereafter. Production is by Leon Major.

Several productions will be continuing through the holidays for indefinite runs. Ponce Morille is still showing Erik's Machine, (see article). The Colonnade theatre has another Classical Stage Production, White Nights, dramatization of the Dostoyevski novel. It is described by Dostoyevski as being "a sentimental story from the diary of a dreamer." One hopes for a palatable adaptation. Toronto Free Theatre offers Hedda Gabler — for free. Factory Lab will be alternating its two programs of Canadian works till the end of the month.

January, come she will, and with her an exciting season of Irish plays directed by Sinéad McKenna. Irish arts is a unique company of Canadian and Irish talent. The shows which will play between January and March are Here are Ladies, an evening where Siobhan McKenna presents the women of modern Irish literature. Confusion, a one-man show by Niall Toibain, Juno and the Paycock, by Sean O'Casey, three one-man presentations of Samuel Beckett's work by Jack MacGowan. The place is West Park School, near Bloor and Dundas. Subscriptions are available and make a worthwhile investment.

It could be we have left out some productions worth noting either now or in the past. To readers whose teeth have been set on edge thereby, remember Christmas, be joyful and forgive.

Deadlines make it impossible to actually see John Hartford before praising him, but it isn't necessary, really. By me, Hartford is one of the three best song-writers in the language. Paul Simon and James Taylor being the other two. He wields a very wry pen in a bluegrass idiom, country but sophisticated. His performance (vocals, banjo, guitar, fiddle) is invariably understated, which may be why he hasn't a wide following. The last time he played the Riverboat he turned up with three of the best Nashville musicians. They don't know who if anybody he is billing this time. He's here through Sunday 8:30.

music

Well, here it is, our X-mas issue and some of the biggest musical X-mas mussy bushes are already over. Solomon, as well as a couple of Christmas Oratorios (Bach's). There is more to come, though, so you can still impress relatives, and yourself with the amazingly multifarious musical fare offered in this block-offer of a city which a decade ago probably had reason to bewep its musically outcast state. A decade ago, we were probably regaled with The Messiah, period. No one is putting down Handel — in fact, hurrah for Handel much less the Mendelssohn Chori — hurrah for the Mendelssohn Chori. Rut, please see, said Oliver. I want more. And there is more.

Down to business: The Toronto Opera Repertoire will present Verdi's Un Rallo In Maschera at Central Technical School Auditorium, 725 Bathurst Street, as this season's opening production, December 6 to 9 at 8 pm. It is directed by Giuseppe Macina. Tickets are $1.50 for students and can be obtained by calling 962-8819.

On December 10, The Canadian Chamber Orchestra will be conducted by Walter Babjak in a concert of orchestral music to "suit the season". This is at Scarborough College and is at 3:30, free as usual.

On December 17 at the college the Scarborough Chamber Choir, directed by Garth Allen, will present a concert of choral music for Christmas Time. Again, at 3:30 and free admission.

This December 8, Karel Ancerl, hopefully fit and ambitious after his long illness, (I wonder if that sounds funny) will conduct his symphony in works by Weber, Glazunov and works by Weber, Glazunov and Nielsen. On December 28-9, the former conductor of the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, will conduct an all-Wagner concert

The second concert in the St. Lawrence Centre's International Quartet Series is on December 8 with the Czech Quartet. The famous Rudolph Firkušny will perform too. Works are Joseph Haydn's quartet, op. 76, no. 4, Leo Janacek's quartet no. 2 and Antonin Dvorak's piano quintet in A major. Although tickets are sold out for the series, you can be sure a number of returned and uncollected tickets will go on sale around 8 or 8:15. The concert is at 8:30.

On December 11 at 8:30 pm Vladimir Ashkenazy and Irzhak Perlman (pianist and violinist) will perform at Massey Hall. The works are Beethoven's sonata no. 1 in D major, op. 12, no. 1, his sonata no. 10 in G major, op. 96, and Franck's Concertante Canada for the Performing Arts presents, on December 16, the Beethoven String and Noxon MacMillan, organ, in works by Arensky, Dvorak, Foote, and Poulenc. Single tickets are $2.50. It's at Trinity Square at 8:30 pm.

All sorts of films are opening for the holidays, but we haven't seen any of them, so we can't recommend. Among the titles are John Huston's The Life and Times of Judge Roy Bean, with Paul Newman; Sam Peckinpah's The Getaway (Steve McQueen); the film of Graham Greene's Travels with My Aunt; Louise's Assassination of Trotsky; Rhoemer's Choe in the Afternoon; Fellini's Roma; the new film by the Five Easy Pieces team, called King of Marvin Gardens; and, possibly, Robert Altman's Images.

Among the hold-overs, we recommend Fiddler on the Roof and Sounder, although the latter will be bumped from the Hollywood North by Up the Sandbox with Barbra Streisand (Meanwhile, the shallow, nasty Dillenare rolls on and on at the Hollywood South.) You might also check out Luch's Wednesday's Child a Bowed but high-aiming movie at the York.

Archer, Heap Win in Ward 6

By BOB BETTSON
 Dan Heap scored an upset victory in Monday's civic election, beating incumbent Ward 6 alderman June Marks by 750 votes and finishing only 240 votes behind William Archer for the top aldermanic post.

Heap's win over Marks, who had the backing of local businessmen and landlords, was greeted with a jubilant celebration at Bathurst Street United Church where his supporters were gathered.

He attributed his victory to a "residents' movement against development. It was a vote for people over money," he added.

In a thinly disguised swipe at Heap, Archer, who said he supported David Rotenberg for mayor, told a television audience, "It's one thing to run an election campaign; it's another to run a government."

"The alternative to high-rise is to spread," he added, "...to use more of our farmland."

Heap said he was surprised by his win but maintained that "nobody had it in the bag." His organization, which was largely made up of local NDP supporters, functioned "less smoothly than others but it was a mass movement," he said.

Archer, a former Ward 5 alderman, was tight-lipped after his narrow victory over Heap. When asked for his reaction to the "reform" majority on council he replied, "It will be interesting to see what they do with the responsibility of government."

"I was not surprised by Heap's victory," he added. Archer's opinion of Toronto's new mayor was "Crombie is mayor, period. I have no expectations."

Marks refused to make any comment on her defeat yesterday. "I am not doing any interviews for anybody," she said.

However, Monday night, she told a television audience that she was a victim of "unfair criticism" from Heap. She has said that it was the dirtiest fight she had ever been in.

Heap replied in an interview that he didn't refrain from criticism but based it on her record. He stated "now the citizens control City Hall, not the developers."

With 148 of 149 polls reporting, Archer polled 7,395 votes to Heap's 7,155 and Marks' 6,396. Trailing were incumbent Horace Brown, who mounted a weak campaign, with 2,928, and Arthur Downes with 2,127.

Horace Brown blamed the weather for his defeat. "If it was a heavy turnout it would have favoured my candidacy," he said. "I was not surprised by the result," he added.

An NDP member, Brown insisted, "I have been a reformer for 12 years. We didn't disagree on the campaign was just a scramble between people to be maintained."

Brown, considered an Old Guard member of council, and he would return to his writing "to finish my novel."

Arthur Downes, who finished last, although his showing was a considerable improvement on his 800 vote showing last year. He blamed his loss on a lack of exposure. He said that the ward had spoken and they had elected a reform council.

"The council question will be whether Dan Heap has satisfactorily initiated programs in the ward and brought people together," he added.

Old Guard stalwart William Archer topped the polls in Ward 6, 240 votes ahead of Dan Heap.

Dan Heap defeated June Marks. Horace Brown in a post-election interview.

The Government of Ontario has made OSAP assistance more difficult and expensive; it has raised your fees by at least $100.

The worst part of this is that no warning was given, and that it hurts low income students much more than others. Now, the Government is planning for next year. And the Government refuses to tell us what they're planning. They've said tuition fees won't go up - but they said that last year, too, and they still won't commit themselves publicly. They also won't tell us what will happen to OSAP loan ceilings.

Over 5,000 U. of T. students said in October that they'd withhold fees in January if the Government would not negotiate. SAC is now asking you to do that.

The withholding of fees is not a weapon; it's a way for you to express your concern about a whole series of Government measures that downgrade education by hitting students.

When you get back in January, we'll give you full information on late payment penalties and on the status of OSAP Grant Cheques. These matters are still being negotiated. Don't pay your fees until you get back; they're not due until January 15 anyway. Show Queen's Park that there is concern in the universitiee.

North Being Defiled: Writer

By KEN WYMAN
A former London Times correspondent who has spent several years in Canada's north attacked last week the way in which Canada's natural resources have been exploited. The oil resources of the north are very small compared to projected needs, almost useless, said ex-Times reporter Bruce Richardson. The key is that production is set to begin just before the U.S. oil contracts in the Middle East run out.

"In fact, the main reason for exploiting Canada's arctic oil is that America will use it as a counter-balance to keep prices down when those new contracts are negotiated," Richardson, who spoke at the weekend American Anthropologists Association conference, is the author of a new book about Quebec Hydro's James Bay project. According to one of his aids, Canadian publishers all refused the book, and he had to turn to the U.S. Sierra Club to get it published.

"All the major man-made lakes," he said later, "have been built in the last twenty-five years; every one of them has had disastrous ecological results. To build another one, especially in an environment we know nothing about, without at least five years of study, is insane."

"The Indians and the Eskimos are the only one who know that area, and they have no way to communicate that knowledge to us. Our residents' group received a small grant to study the situation, but two weeks before they were supposed to present their conclusions, one of the construction companies received a $2 million grant to study the pure environment."

"Baldzeers are already up there, concrete is being poured," he charged. "How can they study the pure environment? Now that report is scheduled for 1976, the year before the project is due to be completed."

Richardson, and representatives of native peoples groups from around the world were at this year's AAA convention at the Royal York Hotel because of the agitation of a new group called Anthropologists for Radical Political Action. Radical seminars were scheduled in every time slot of the five day convention.

At one seminar, Mike Mitchell of Akwesasne Notes, a Mohawk newspaper, called for digs in white pioneer cemeteries for "red anthropologists," exactly like those in Indian graveyards that whites have led for years. Elsewhere, a packed room listened to Marxist anthropologists.

And at a session on women in anthropology, an AAA committee reported that women have much less chance to rise academically than men, despite the achievements of Margaret Mead and other well-known females in the field.

In their study, they found "a distribution of occupational positions dreadfully unfavourable to women, who are generally under-represented in the higher tenured ranks and over-represented in the lower ranks. For example, 14 per cent of the women and 28 per cent of the men are professors, whereas 41 per cent of the women and 34 per cent of the men are assistant professors."

The committee also gave statistics against the argument "that the disproportionate representation of men in the higher ranks reflects a greater average age." Further, "recent studies at Rutgers," note the lower salaries of women, especially married women, and the more tenuous application of promotional criteria to women than to men."

At a symposium on contemporary political struggles of native peoples, several women questioned why all 13 speakers from the third world were men.

Paul Carr, of the Australian Aboriginal power movement, spoke bitterly of white, North American women going to mission stations and imposing ideas of women's liberation without any knowledge of the actual cultural relation between the sexes in the area. He was supported by an Ontario Indian woman who said she had seen the same problem with "radical chauvinists."

There was a great deal of self-conscious introspection. Two Harvard graduate students, who insisted on remaining anonymous so that they could speak freely, condemned their professional colleagues for teaching "concern for traditions and societies being wiped out, like those in Brazil, with whom there are these people remain available as subjects of study, like pieces of wildlife."

Another Harvard grad publicly condemned his university for inwanning 100,000 shares of Gulf Oil Co stock. And in an early session the association narrowly passed a resolution condemning both the numbers at Southern University in Baton Rouge, and the socio-cultural conditions that led to it.

Repeatedly, the conference message was that there are radical anthropologists who want to, as one delegate said, "end the study of people's times, and begin the study of people's oppression."

Conacher vetoed debate on cuts affecting Interdisciplinary Dept.

Students Have No Say in Judging Profs' Skill

A report on academic tenure released recently at Victoria College allows for no student involvement in decisions regarding the competence of professors.

Victoria University Students Administrative Council education commissioner Rick Gregory stated yesterday that he is certain the report will be passed because there is not sufficient interest among students regarding tenure for any mass action to be taken against the report.

"Any protest will be made through committees, to point out the discrepancies between this report and the recommendations about tenure in another report (on discipline) released last February."

The first report recommended some student input in judging the competence of professors and assigning penalties for incompetence. The tenure report leaves the decision in the hands of a hearing committee of three tenured professors, to be chosen jointly by the professor being judged and the president of the university.

In fact, only the principal of Vic can raise the issue of incompetence or termination of tenure to begin with, the report says. Some mention is made of considering student course evaluations, though this is not guaranteed in the report.

There is very little definition in the report of the things professors can be penalized for, such as "neglect of duty." In fact, Gregory stated, there has been a very liberal interpretation of most possible reasons.

Gregory said that the report parallels U of T's Harist Rules on tenure. Tenure would become final if the report were implemented, giving professors a legal firm of job security.

Vic's Board of Regents, to which the report is addressed, is expected to consider it at its next meeting, in January or February.

Conacher vetoes debate on cuts

The General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science Monday refused to change its agenda and have an emergency debate on the threatened cutbacks in the Interdisciplinary Studies Department.

History chairman Jim Conacher refused the unanimous consent necessary to discuss a resolution presented by student members Seymour Kanowich and Bob Bettson.

The resolution called for the committee to condemn the proposed cutbacks in interdisciplinary studies and support the continued expansion of the department.

Usually under committee rules substantive motions cannot be discussed unless 10 days notice is given. The Kanowich-Bettson motion will be discussed at the next meeting in January.

As on November 6, once again the committee ground to a halt on a recommendation that two college and two branch libraries be amalgamated into an enlarged Sigmond Samuel Collection.

Debate on the amalgamation centred on an amendment that the New and University College libraries be left on. Several students opposed the amalgamation, citing their importance to the maintenance of the college system.

The General Committee also received a report from the Academic Standards Committee, which has no student members and meets in secret. The committee reported that it will continue to have the sole power over final exams in first year courses.

A motion to refer the matter to a newly formed student-faculty library subcommittee was defeated and discussion will continue next meeting.

Seven faculty members were nominated to the subcommittee. The 8 students elected included Rick MacFarlane, Howe Levitt, David Freedman and Bettson.

Stipends to Stay?

By EDWARD PODGORSKI
A delegation of interdisciplinarians said that they received a "positive response" from Health Minister Richard T. Potter when they met yesterday to discuss the elimination of living allowances for students entering in para-medical professions.

University Commissioner John Creelman said that Potter was reconsidering the discontinuation of living allowances and stipends and would make a recommendation to cabinet soon. According to Creelman, the Minister is looking at remuneration for interns in terms of the service they provide hospitals.

The delegation presented a thirty page brief which was a collection of statements concerning the functions interns provide and the duties they perform. "In addition, the Health Minister received petitions from Queen's Park and Toronto numbering over two thousand names.

Student interns receive living allowances and stipends, but last

April, a letter from Potter to the heads of the institutions concerned ordered them discontinued as of January 1, 1973 because of "cost-consciousness on financing."

At the same time, students of occupational and physiotherapy, dietetics, and hospital administration were still required to do hospital internship. Approximately 600 students from the University of Toronto, Queen's and Western are affected by the change in government policy, according to the delegation.

An earlier brief written by Creelman and Hene Miller, faculty of food sciences SAC representative, and submitted to the Ontario Health Ministry argues that in the long run the cutbacks will hurt the Ontario economy.

The brief said that lack of support will produce a deterrent factor likely to create a shortage of trained health science professionals at a time when the use of para-medicals is being advocated as a means of reducing costs.

Para-medicals are becoming more important in medicine because, at less cost, they can do work doctors would normally do.

The brief argues that because the living wage for interns has been discontinued, it will become more expensive for a physiotherapist or dietitian to obtain a diploma, and will act as a deterrent for students to intern in Ontario hospitals. Therefore, the current shortage will not be alleviated, but, instead, will be intensified.

The decision to cut off stipends has been attacked by the Ontario Council of Health, Ontario Federation of Students, and by numerous school and department heads and staff.

Two months ago Creelman reported that deputy minister of health Stan Martin had not defended the government action in a meeting with students.

"He acted as if he had little to do with the decision and had no sympathy with it," said Creelman.

Court Reverses Decision to Dismiss Libel Case Against Halifax Community Newspaper

HALIFAX (CLIP) — The Appeals Division of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court has reversed an earlier decision to dismiss a libel suit lodged by Le Chateau Men's Wear Limited, a Halifax clothing firm, against the 4th Estate, a weekly community newspaper.

The case now returns to the supreme court's trial division for a new trial, but for the hearing has yet been set.

Halifax lawyer, Brian Flemming, representing the newspaper in the case, said it was unlikely the new trial will come up before February.

The libel suit against the newspaper was started by the clothing store chain 18 months ago, in June of 1971.

The case was dismissed without going to trial in early October by Mr. Justice F.W. Bissett of the supreme court. Bissett dismissed the case October 2 after ruling that in order to sustain an action for libel "in corporation must be defined in the way of its business."

The two items specifically alleged to be libellous by Le Chateau were published in the spring of 1971 in connection with a public campaign against slum housing in Halifax. One of the two items cited in the case is a photograph and the second is an illustration reprinted from the Dalhousie University students' newspaper, The Gazette.

The 4th Estate alleged that the proprietors of Le Chateau owned several run-down houses in Halifax.

The Gazette is not being sued for the allegedly libellous illustration.

Defence lawyer Flemming contended at the first hearing October 2 that the phrase "Le Chateau — slum housing" was ambiguous and because no defamation had been made against the company in its own trading field — men's clothing — there was no prima facie case of libel.

In dismissing the case on the grounds the company was not defined in the way of its business, Bissett said the item reprinted from The Gazette was ambiguous and therefore did not constitute a libel against the company.

Halifax lawyer George Simms, who represents the clothing chain in the libel suit, presented the company's appeal of the dismissal before the appeals division on November 23.

Simms contended that Bissett erred in law in his decision to dismiss the case before Le Chateau Men's Wear Limited had opened its case.

The three members of the appeal court ruled unanimously that Bissett should have waited until counsel for Le Chateau presented evidence before making his decision to dismiss the libel suit.

The appeal court ruled that costs incurred at the appeal hearing and at any new trial of the case would be decided at the conclusion of the new trial. However, the appeal court decision on costs does not affect Bissett's earlier ruling in the October 2 hearing. After dismissing the case, he ruled the newspaper and Le Chateau would each pay their own court costs incurred up to October 2.

St. Andrews May Get Land

St. Andrews Day Nursery, if an agreement restrictive city bylaws and other problems, may be given subsidized land by the University of Toronto.

However, Campus Co-operative Community Day Care has been told that if it were given a house at a subsidized rent, it would fall under the Governing Council's day care policy prohibiting non-university community children and requiring its centre to be run by the U of T administration.

Administration campus coordinator Lois Reimer says that St. Andrews, which has been connected to the university for several years, may be allowed to erect a portable building for its day care centre on the land near the clubhouse presently occupied by Campus Co-op.

Although it would get no other assistance, Reimer says St. Andrews may be able to use the land at "at nominal rent". The parking lot to the south of the clubhouse is a possible location, she added.

St. Andrews has about $100,000 to spend on its new location, says one of its executive members, Joan Grusec. This amount has been saved since the nursery became aware more than three years ago that relocation would be imminent.

Grusec says that the prospect of finding off-campus accommodation is "extremely unlikely", since the nursery conducted an "absolutely thorough" search last spring without success. Accordingly, it has set up a committee to investigate setting up a nursery on the university land.

Although these are presently prohibited by municipal bylaws from use as day care centres, Grusec is hopeful that the university would let the nursery secure dispensation from the city if it wanted to use portables.

The university's day care advisory board would have a strong voice in the location of their centre were it to proceed, she added.

Campus Co-op has been told that if it were rented a house at a nominal rent, the resulting subsidization would cause it to be ruled by the Governing Council's day care policy.

Earlier in the fall, the co-op was informed that renting a house would remove it from under the yoke of the university's day care policy because the deal would be considered a mere real estate transaction.

Meanwhile, the co-op's occupation of the clubhouse is in its eighth month. Nearly two weeks ago, a co-op ultimatum to the administration stating that it might settle in permanently if a house was not found for it expired without an administration offer.

The have been no subsequent offers.

U of T institutional relations and planning vice-president Jack Sword said yesterday that he did not think Ontario's capital budget freeze would affect the proposed renovations of the clubhouse to transform it into the university's day care centre.

However, "the full implications of the freeze haven't been examined," he said.

A U of T request to lease the site of the clubhouse to enable it to be legally used as a day care centre is proceeding, said vice-provost Robin Ross. Since City Council has risen for the elections it could not be dealt with before January, he thought.

Trent Hit by $300,000 Deficit

PETERBOROUGH (CUP) — In announcing spending cuts to make up a $300,000 deficit, Trent University's president has accused the Ontario government of considering higher education of little importance.

F. W. Nind, who took over from T. H. Symons this year, said the recent capital budget freeze on universities announced by colleges and universities minister Jack McInnes "makes it all too clear that post-secondary education occupies a very low position indeed in the order of priorities at the present Ontario government."

He added that "it would be foolish to assume" that Trent's requests for additional assistance this year would be granted.

Nind's cost-cutting measures would reduce expenditures by at least $125,000, he hoped. These included cuts in library acquisitions ($50,000), administration ($50,000), academic spending ($25,000) and a five-month freeze on furniture and equipment purchases.

In addition, he indicated that Trent would not hire any new professors this year, stating that "minimal staff attrition through retirements or resignations" would complete the required cost-saving, along with other schemes.

Albertan takes Rhodes Prize

Forty per cent of the eligible student members of the Governing Council have now won Rhodes Scholarships, with the latest addition being executive member Brian Morgan (Trin IV).

Morgan joins engineer Paul Cadario in the winners' circle. Morgan's feat is exceptionally stunning. As late as last week he was telling all inquirers that he wasn't in the running for the prestigious scholarship endowed by 19th century British imperialist Cecil Rhodes, the founder of white minority ruled Rhodesia.

Cadario, the council's Internal Affairs Committee chairman, last week won one of ten Ontario scholarships. Morgan, who grew up in Lehigh, led 13 other applicants to gain Alberta's only Rhodes.

Rhodes specified that his highest was not to be made available to women. Consequently only five out of the eight students on Governing Council were eligible for a free ride at Oxford and a lifetime entrance into prominent circles.

Day Care Centre Wants More Kids

The University of Toronto Day Care centre is soliciting applications for the approximately 50 places for children aged two to five.

The centre, to be located in the clubhouse behind the Meteorological Building at Bloor Street and Devonshire Place, will open "within the next few months" according to its advisory board. This board, to be half composed of parents, will advise the U of T administration how to run the centre.

At least one parent must be a member of the university community in order for a child to be eligible. The cost will be between $85 and $100 per month per child, with some parents likely eligible for municipal assistance.

Children will be accepted on the basis of their parents' personal and financial need.

Boycott Kraft Needs Help Here

The Toronto Kraft Boycott Committee is planning to organize the boycott in Toronto.

People wanting to help plan and work on the campaign should phone 536-8131.

The boycott of Kraft products is intended to pressure the huge multi-national corporation into agreeing to bargain collectively with dairy farmers.

The boycott sponsor, the National Farmers Union explains that the huge market power of Kraft, combined with the government dominated milk marketing boards allows farmers little say in the prices they receive. As a result, farm incomes are declining and rural Canada is being depopulated.

only a strong Quebec government.

He was speaking to about 50 people at an educational forum sponsored by the Toronto Waif at the International Student Centre.

"We know a majority of the members of the QFL" voted in the last election for the separatist Parti Quebecois, he said. However Leclerc said that the QFL does not feel that separatism is a solution in itself but only a part of a strategy to solving Quebec's political and economic problems.

Nationalism in Quebec, Leclerc said, has become "linked more and more with socialism"; "the working class labour movement is instinctively going to reject the present society."

Although a majority of the members of the QFL do support the PQ, he stressed that this does not mean that the QFL has the same interests and nature as the PQ.

"Their view of socialism is not the same as ours," he continued.

A recent bill requiring children to be educated in French is justified because French Canadians are in danger of being assimilated and lost. This is due to the dropping birthrate and the fact that immigrants to Quebec, and even some French Canadians themselves, prefer their children to speak English because of better job opportunities.

Coach Charged with Tampering

MONTREAL (CUP) — Charges of conflict of interest with implications of unfair tampering with other teams has been levelled against Dave Dies, the coach of the McGill University hockey team.

The charges were made last week by Quebec University Athletic Association (QUAA) coaches.

Dies is not only the hockey coach at McGill, but is also college representative with Pro Sports Inc., a group of lawyers who represent hockey players in contract negotiations. One of its activities is contacting young professional prospects for their business.

This involves sending letters to colleges' players urging them, if they turn professional, to make use of Pro Sports' services. These letters are signed by Dies.

Rival coaches have suggested Dies could use his position to weaken opposing teams by enticing their star players into turning professional.

The controversy came to a head recently with the case of Francois Oupel, a defenceman at St. George Williams University, who is represented by Pro Sports.

Oupel recently jumped from the St. George hockey team to the WHA Philadelphia team. Because of his position, Dies was charged with interference.

Dies claimed, in reply that Oupel acted against his advice and that he is now back with St. George because of the McGill coach's efforts on behalf of Pro Sports.

However, the damage has been done.

The QUAA council has passed a motion calling Dies' position a conflict of interest. When questioned, McGill Athletic director Harry Griffiths implied the QUAA had given him an ultimatum. He reported that the QUAA had notified him they expect him to correct the situation or they will take the matter into their own hands.

Should Canada host the Olympic Games in 1976?

The people of the State of Colorado voted on November 7 to cut off state spending for the 1976 Winter Olympics, thereby effectively killing the games for that year. Nine years ago Denver organizers promised the staging of the games would cost only $14 million — by November of this year the estimate had sky-rocketed to $35 million.

The defeat of the Olympics was managed by a popular progressive group calling itself Citizens for Colorado's Future and based its campaign on economic and environmental issues.

An anti-Olympics movement has been growing in Montreal since the announcement that the games would come to Canada in 1976. Many people would rather see money spent on social needs than grandiose exhibitions.

In the following article Bruce Kidd unifies some of his objections to an Olympics games for Canada in 1976.

By DENNIS MCGANN

As Jean Drapeau, fresh from his Expo '67 world party, will now try his hand at a world get-together of another variety — the Olympic games — but this may prove more difficult than the world's fair.

Given the political significance and world-wide impact of the Olympic games, it is no wonder that Mayor Drapeau found it appropriate to jump on the bandwagon — such is his style. Unfortunately, the shortcomings of hosting a gala event such as this do not directly affect the good mayor, but rather the Quebec taxpayer and Canadian sport in general.

Drapeau was invited to a symposium on "Politics and the Olympic Games" hosted by Queen's University last month, but did not attend. Present at the discussion, among others, was former track and field competitor Bruce Kidd, now a political science instructor at the University of Toronto. Kidd spoke about the impact of a Montreal Olympics on the taxpayer and those persons heavily involved in Canadian sport.

What price the Olympics?

"For me the lesson from the Munich Olympics is that the games cannot continue as they have gone up to this point. They are far too costly for any one community, far too unmanageable given the large number of people that have to be accommodated, and they are far too vulnerable to the political manipulators and strategists — whether these be the people who have power, or the people who are on the 'outs' as in the case of the armed guerrillas.

"When the eyes of the world are on the games, it becomes a very valuable stage for anyone who wants to use it, and sport becomes very vulnerable in the process.

"The Montreal situation is a specific case which reinforces the need to come up with a different solution for these games. In my opinion, sporting considerations and the socio-political considerations — which one would have to consider in looking at the future of eastern Canada and particularly Quebec — were never taken into consideration of the decision to apply for the Olympic Games for Montreal in 1976.

"Certainly the people who bear the brunt of the responsibility for these games and particularly their legacy for sport in this country, were never really consulted by Jean Drapeau when he embarked on his Expo year particularly on his one-mission to bring the games to Montreal. Essentially Drapeau, as I see it, is an another ego-trip and the delegates of the International Olympic Committee (IOC) who are primarily interested in a good time and a chance to see their little circus grow bigger and bigger every four years, fell for his argument.

"Drapeau got the games, I feel, for two reasons: he was able to wine, bribe and whore all the IOC delegates at the 1967 Expo. If you will check the newspapers at that time, you will see that virtually every member of the IOC came and spent a pleasurable week in Montreal that summer.

"Secondly, the politics of the IOC were that the majority of the countries did not want to see the United States get the summer Olympics for its bi-centennial in 1976, and therefore any city that would run in opposition to the United States seemed a good bet to get the games. Sporting considerations were never really taken into account in awarding those games to Montreal.

"Sport can only thrive and grow if it is in general harmony with the community which supports it, and doesn't fold up that community with unreasonable demands in order to continue. I believe the Olympic Games will place a serious strain on the fabric of Canadian society, if not tear it in some irreparable fashion.

"There is a tremendous cost in staging the Olympic Games. The Munich Games cost a total of 780 million dollars (gross expenditure). Premier Bourassa says the Montreal games will realistically cost 300 million dollars.

"The 300 million dollar figure is sizeable; it is about the cost of all the health and hospital services in the province of Ontario in one year, for example.

"It not only costs dollars, but our best brains. An event like the Olympics requires tremendous organizing and creativity — we just don't have that many people in our society today. For the last four years in Munich, there has been an apartment of professional people — economists, city planners, engineers, architects working on the games — that's a tremendous output of creative and intellectual talent to go into a two week event.

"In order to sustain the cost of these games, our city will have to foster economic growth so that we can reap additional tax revenue to pay for it entirely. We all know the tremendous crisis we are facing at our present rate of economic growth. The Montreal Olympics will require that we completely abandon an effort to come to terms with that crisis in order to support it.

"In deciding to put out this tremendous amount of money and to invest in continued growth for the purpose of supporting it, any society must make two kinds of decisions. One along the whole gambit of public needs and public expenditures; the trade off between high unemployment, environmental protection measures, social services and so on. Now, with that trade off in the province of Quebec, one wonders how important a major sporting event of this kind is.

"They already have the highest level of unemployment in the country and the sewage problem around the St. Lawrence River is Canada's number one pollution problem. The social services of that city have already been considerably cut back by the expenditures for Expo and the son of Expo.

"Drapeau said he was going to support the structures from the recreation budget; well, the recreation budget last year was six million dollars. In order to support the facilities he has in mind, it has to be cut back and possibly put in the red for some time. During the Expo period many public services were cut back — for example, very few libraries were able to buy new books.

Canadian sport will suffer

"A second kind of decision that has to be made is what kind of recreation programs expenditures one wants to make. I said before that the people involved with recreation were never consulted and I suspect if they were, the Olympic Games would be far from the top of their list.

"We have a tremendous shortage of facilities in this country; in our national sport, hockey, for example, we have a desperate need for ice space. We don't have enough swimming pools; people cannot swim in the winter although a lot of time is spent around water in the summer months. Indoor tracks are also necessary for athletes and others who want to keep fit during the winter, as are hiking trails and canoe routes — things which are fully in keeping with the climate and activities, which are based more on public interest.

"This is not the time to go ahead with the Olympics in this country; in the last ten years this country has just been coming to grips with how to develop a sports program. We're still working out the bugs, we don't have enough trained officials or trained coaches. Where, for example, are we going to get track and field officials and how are we going to train them?

"I think we are in the situation now where the government is ready to go ahead with the games, but not the city of Montreal and sport as a whole will suffer if some of the adverse problems we see coming down the road are not averted.

"Montreal is a real hot-bed politically and Drapeau is an extremely powerful but increasingly unpopular dictator — a dictator who is so unpopular now that he had to travel around with a bodyguard all the time and only travels in an elevator, according to the latest press reports, with his dog.

"Every population in recent years has been disenchanting with the money allocations for the Olympic Games. In Mexico there were riots prior to the games. I suspect the demonstrations occurring in the two previous games will be very small compared with what will occur in Montreal.

"Sport development will be set back because we will not be able to get our own development on track. We'll be spending all our energies on the Olympic Games. We'll be so exhausted after '76 that there will be little funds and less energy for further development of sport.

"Drapeau is interested in providing a beautiful city for conventioners; he is not primarily concerned with the people who live there. The Montreal Olympics was not designed for sport or with the best interest of the citizens of Montreal in mind.

Alternatives

"The most popular alternative to reduce the number of competitors is by eliminating, essentially, all the team sports where the great majority of athletes come in.

"Another alternative is to decentralize the games in one of two ways, within the countries which host the games (in Canada that would mean having various competitions in different cities). Another possibility would be to decentralize the games around the world as is done with the European games, the second largest activity in the world of sport.

"A third alternative would be to select a permanent site for the games. This could be a permanent site for the entire games, which in the intermediary years, could be used for other games. Another alternative would be to have the games as they are now, but stage them over a longer period of time so that only a limited number of athletes would have to be accommodated at any one time.

"In conclusion, I believe the games cannot go on as they are without even greater crises. I believe the Montreal Olympics are more vulnerable in the kind of crises mentioned and I also believe that the staging of the Olympics in Canada at this time is singularly inappropriate.

"I think the only people for whom the games should be staged (the athletes) should get together and put pressure against the present method of staging the games. All the other people interested in holding games are interested in the gigantic staging of a little circus, they are not interested in sport and therefore they are not willing to do very much to change it.

"The cry by Kidd and many others involved with the analysis of the Olympics games is for 'pure athletics'. Separate the games and disallow any possible political platform. The only alternative to continuing the games in their present form, changing sites every four years, would be to submerge politics even more in the sport arena.

"The Olympics will be a painful death if present trends continue. Why not honour the passing away by opening the political platform to perform some function of peace where the financial expenditure will be toward some idealistic pursuit of world harmony, where the athletes will serve the same minimal function they do now?

"This obvious question, when posed by The Chevron, met with the following response by Bruce Kidd: "The British Commonwealth Games, the Pan American Games or the European Games are the ones where the mythological values are somewhat attained because they are much smaller.

"The community gets much closer to the athletes when they are staged on a smaller scale. The people of Winnipeg, for example, were very much involved with the games and the athletes during the Pan American Games. There is just too much attention focused on the Olympics to really get anything together."

Throughout the world, athletes are hard at work in preparation for another Olympic games, most realize the shortcomings of the Olympics but find it the only opportunity to compete with the best in the world. All this, while the symptoms of disaster in Montreal are too obvious to be ignored.

The Olympics as we all know it to be from the two last symposes the C.F. allowed us, in an affable festival which doesn't manifest its major symptoms in the living room television, but gravely ill, nevertheless.

Attempts at healing were applied in Munich, but Montreal, from all indications, will be the graveyard.

Speaking OF SPORT

Women's senior basketball defeated queens last weekend 91-43, with Chris Crawford scoring 21 points for Toronto. Women's senior volleyball also came back from Kingston with a win — 3-0 over Queen's. Women's fencing team travelled to Buffalo last weekend for an invitational race with Cornell, Ohio State, and Buffalo State College. Cornell routed U of T 15-1, with Anne Gutierrez winning the bout that prevented the shut out (the Cornell women's team holds the American Intercollegiate championship). Toronto came back to defeat Buffalo State 14-2, with one of the Scottish performing well. U of T went on to also defeat Ohio State (mid-western American champions) 10-6. The women's team finished second overall. Canadian University Press informed us last night that members at the Quebec Universities Athletic Association (QUAA) will meet Thursday to decide whether Loyola College should be barred from the association for having too many Americans on its basketball team. The meeting will discuss the Loyla question for the second time in less than two weeks. At the November 29 meeting a Loyola representative labled a motion to have Loyola barred from further QUAA sports. The motion was presented at the urging of the Université de Quebec, at Sher-

Editorial Comments

The following editorial is reprinted from The Varsity of February 3, 1969.

The report of the Athletic Committee, which was presented to the Literary Society on Friday night is a very important document — so important that the Society thought it advisable to postpone the consideration of it until after it had been published in the Varsity and thus placed in the hands of every student.

For several years back the matter of athletics has been comparatively untouched by the Society, and now this report settles, business-like way calls for more than the ordinary amount of consideration at the hands of the Society.

The members of the committee have apparently devoted considerable thought to the problems of the support of athletics around the college, and as a result they are prepared to offer a solution of that very important question. Whether the proposals in the report are the best that can be made remains for the members of the society to decide.

The report directs attention to the annual games and the usual financial failure that attends them and suggests that the society take them under its control. The reality of the Society is sheltered everything under its big broad wing seems being put merely to the test, but there is very little reason to fear that this will be the proverbial last straw.

The Society is becoming so thoroughly a representative of the whole student body that it will not require a great stretch of the imagination to fancy it managing the annual games. One thing is certain and that is the annual games must be retained and, as the Society will probably do, in the future as it has done in the past, that is, make up any deficit in the accounts of the games, the assumption of control by the Society appears to be the best possible thing to do under the circumstances.

The committee gives the Society credit for a knowledge unpossessed, we venture to say, by the great majority of the students. That one dollar of the fees annually collected by the college from the students was once applied to the support of athletics will be news to very many. Ignorance of this will render the probability of a similar state of affairs in the future none the less welcome.

The Society should at once proceed to interview the authorities on this subject and endeavour to effect a return to the old order of things. There would then be a sum of $700 or $800 at our disposal and this would place athletics on a sound basis.

It is to be hoped that an effort will be made to procure greater space for field sports of all kinds. The Senate has appointed a committee to consider this matter and memorials to that committee may probably have greater effect than they would to each and all of the bodies named in the report.

Though not distinctly saying so, yet the inference is that the committee believe that the lawn at the rear should be so arranged that an entrance fee may be charged. This will doubtless be viewed with disavour by some and their views are entitled to the highest consideration. If the effort to obtain the one dollar fee should prove successful their position would be very much strengthened.

The Association football Club might be gainers if a fee could be charged, as the Western Association, anticipating that the Association will always be in the final, has legitimized our club out of the right to play on our home ground, the lawn but were the charging of a fee about to be disadvantageous to the whole student body the Association club will doubtless be found ready to waive its right in the matter.

It is to be regretted that the formation of an athletic association cannot be proceeded with at once, but the committee is right in advising participation in the above mentioned questions are finally settled. The members of the committee are deserving of praise in having pressed such an interesting and practical report.

brooke, which complained to the league's directors that Loyola was not keeping with the spirit of the league by having 11 Americans on its varsity basketball team. A vote was taken with the French universities voting for the banishment of Loyola, and the English universities voting on the other side of the fence. The subsequent tie vote left deciding power in the hands of QUAA president Andre Huneau (of the Université de Montreal), who also supported Loyola. The Sherbrooke team had been scheduled to play Loyola December 2, but it was postponed. Loyola coach Doug Daignault felt that it would not play any further games with Loyola. Daignault tried to defend his position. "This recruiting (of Americans) has been going on for years in schools other than Loyola, but now that we are in a position to be a championship, they (Sherbrooke) are complaining. It depends on your point of view. Either you want to win and work towards that goal, or you don't. It's a matter of philosophy. I think we've done a good job of representing the team."

Loyola's meeting is expected to finally settle the matter, although it appears unlikely Loyola will be found to pull out of the already stipulating QUAA and find competition in another league.
