Committee recommends restructuring of Food Sci

By DAVID AITKEN

The Faculty of Food Sciences, which came close to being dissolved in 1971 will survive and is in the process of being restructured.

Last Wednesday, the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council passed a recommendation by Vice-president Don Forster that an implementation committee be set up to advise on how to reform the faculty, based on a report which was made last June. The recommendation will be forwarded to the Executive Committee.

In January 1971, Vice Provost (Health Sciences) John D. Hamilton proposed that the faculty be phased out. He claimed that there was an insufficient demand for graduates, a high cost to the university to maintain the faculty and that it was superfluous in view of the availability of similar courses elsewhere in the province.

Immediately, students, faculty and alumni protested Hamilton's recommendation to the Senate. The Senate established a committee to look into his charges, which reported in June.

The committee found that, contrary to Hamilton's opinion, there is a demand for dieticians, nutritionists, food chemists and high quality secondary school teachers of home economics.

It also found the university could combat the high cost by increasing the freshman enrolment from 60 to 75 "with very little additional cost." In addition to increased tuition fee revenue, the faculty would thus qualify for more provincial grants. Hence the report concluded that "the overall financial effect on the faculty would be favourable."

A third major recommendation was that Food Sciences should upgrade its academic standards by "encouraging the development of a strong Graduate Department of Food Chemistry and Nutrition with the aim of creating a centre of excellence".

The implementation committee recommended by Forster would be charged with examining the feasibility of the report's recommendation and mechanisms for their implementation.

Academic Affairs Committee to impose penalty on non-registering graduates

The Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council voted last Wednesday to recommend that graduate students who fail to re-register pay a penalty.

The recommendation goes to the Executive Committee before arriving at the full council for a final decision.

Until now, a graduate student studying away from Toronto was not penalized for failing to re-register each year. If his department and the Council of the School of Graduate Studies recommended him, a simple payment of the total re-registration fees which he owed would render him eligible for his degree once his thesis was completed.

Assistant Dean Sherk claimed at the meeting that the university was losing roughly $3000 per year in government grants for each student who was not registered. Accordingly, the committee adopted an SGS council recommendation that there be a re-registration fee for each year in which a grad fails to re-register.

The harshness of the penalty was lessened, however, with the acceptance of three other proposals. Brian Morgan's motion that there be guidelines for leaves of absence established was passed, as was his suggestion that there be differentials in the penalty fee for students with varying personal circumstances.

The committee also decided that students should be informed of the means of appealing the penalty fee.

Library stacks decision could depend on views of top administrator

The Varsity — Kris King

Don Forster has a habit of recommending committees that report to him.

By LINDA McQUAIG

The power to determine who will use the new $45 million John P. Roberts Research Library may fall almost entirely into the hands of Don Forster the university's vice-president and provost, if a recommendation by Forster is accepted.

The recommendation, made to members of the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council September 6, calls for either an advisory committee to report to him, a subcommittee, or both. Forster indicated, however, a slight preference for the former. A subcommittee would report to Academic Affairs, not him.

The committee would grant stack passes to undergraduate applicants who provided their 99 academic need to the committee's satisfaction.

Undergraduates not granted passes by the committee will lose direct access to the 900,000 books now in the Sigmund Samuel Library stacks when the collection is moved to the new library in May.

All students, except freshmen now this collection — the largest. The committee, proposed by Forster, would replace the now-defunct Library Council which last year created a controversy on campus when it turned down a request, backed by petition signed by 7,000 students, for undergraduate access to the library stacks.

The advisory committee would include only four student representatives on a 12-person body similar to the 35-member Library Council which contained only 12 student seats.

Other members of the committee would be faculty administrators and librarians.

The proposal for an advisory committee to report to Forster brought some unfavorable responses from members of the Academic Affairs Committee who feared it might give Forster, who is considered to be one of the most powerful men in the U of T administration, too much control over the controversial issue of library access.

Access to the stacks in the Roberts Library will be restricted to graduate students and staff, and to undergraduates, who are able to line up stack passes.

A collection of approximately 250,000 books — the amalgamation of library collections from various colleges and faculties on campus will replace the Sig Samuel books as an undergraduate collection.

Organizers of fees strike optimistic

By one observers' estimate, about 80 per cent of these students paying their fees at the Drill Hall paid in two installments. For a background story on the campaign against the fees hike across Ontario, see page 21.

Organizers of a proposed second term fees strike at U of T are cautiously optimistic about student response to their campaign.

SAC vice president John Helliwell, a key U of T organizer, said last night that about 90 per cent of the students he asked at the Drill Hall last week were paying their fees in two installments. The proposed strike is to protest tuition fee increases.

However the overall figures may be lower since many students paid by mail before they were fully informed of the campaign.

SAC Communications Commissioner Debra Lewis reported that it seemed at Victoria College about 80 per cent of the student were paying by installment. (Students at federated colleges paid there rather than the Drill Hall.) Some of those who paid all at once were forced to do so in order to receive money from scholarships.

Clarks at the Drill Hall could not estimate what proportion of students were not paying all their fees at once. One accountant commented that the proportion seemed higher than last year.

Paying by two installments was prime focus of the campaign last week, since a proposal for a total fees boycott was dropped in the summer. SAC was instrumental in having this dropped, as it knew students could not register without paying fees.

The campaign is primarily one of publicity directed against the Ontario government, which last spring announced tuition increases in all university courses. These amounted to about $100 for undergraduates and about $400 for graduate students studying all year.

At the same time, the Conservatives increased the loan portion in all OSAP award to $800 from $600.

As its part of the province-wide Ontario Federation of Students' campaign against the fee and loan hikes, SAC sent out 22,000 letters to nearly all undergraduate students at U of T urging them to pay only their first installment. These arrived after the university's fees form, however, and many students may have paid by the time SAC's letter arrived.

In 1000 of the letters, SAC put postage paid return cards asking the recipients to indicate how they were paying their fees.

Out of about 290 replies, 209 students said they would pay in two installments, according to Helliwell. And, of the 72 who said they were paying in one swoop, about 25 said the SAC letter had arrived too late to allow them to pay in two.

U of T officials have refused to provide more accurate results until late September.

However, the administration has cooperated in other respects. It has already agreed to reduce the penalty for paying by two installments to $10 from $12, and will reduce it a dollar more if it can afford to do so. This would require about a 70 per cent participation rate by students.

As well, Vice Provost Robin Ross told a SAC meeting on July 15 that the simultaneous increases in fees and the reduction in the bursary part of student awards was "totally unjustifiable".

SAC's campaign will continue with teach-ins and publicity on student financing and the increases. In October, there will be a referendum on whether students should hold up payment of the second instalments.

Although the referendum question may demand a rollback of the increases, Helliwell admits the real point of the referendum is to demonstrate that students object strongly to the Conservatives' action.

Thus the government will be deterred from raising fees again soon.

There will be a teach-in on the OSAP program this Thursday at 7 p.m. in Alumni Hall, Victoria College.

Committee ups daycare cost 20%

After approving a proposal that would hike parent fees at the campus daycare centre by over 200 per cent, the Governing Council's external affairs committee meets today in Simcoe Hall's Council Chambers to decide the issue of parent control.

On Thursday the committee approved funding proposals that would levy a fee of $85 a month per child at the daycare centre.

Fees charged by the present parent-controlled centre is a minimum $40 a month, depending on parental income.

But committee members say that parents will be able to apply for provincial assistance if they cannot meet daycare fees.

Parents in the campus community daycare centre have demanded that parents be given full control of daycare facilities for their children.

But the university has been reluctant to grant parent control, and in a proposal drafted by Vice-provost Robin Ross has suggested that control be given to a university department.

Under the Ross proposals though, an advisory committee on programs would be set up, consisting of three people from the internal affairs

Full-time, part-time library staff hit by budget cuts

In an attempt to meet budget cutbacks, the U of T library system will probably hire fewer students this year for part-time work, U of T associate librarian David Esplin said last night.

The system comprises most libraries on campus, excluding those at the federated colleges.

Esplin added that this year's cut in the library budget, the third in three years, forced the library to lay off some full-time workers last May at the beginning of the 1972-73 fiscal year. He said he could not estimate off-hand how many workers had been affected except that he believed there were less than 20. Neither would he divulge what the amount of the budget cut was.

He says no further lay-offs were expected but positions which become vacant over the year may not necessarily be filled.

There will be no cut in library hours for the rest of this academic year, however, Esplin said, contrary to reports last year that this might be one of the services cut in the case of a budget squeeze.

In addition to staff cuts, supplies and equipment for library administration have been hit by the budget tightening, Esplin said.

He pointed out also that although the allotment for buying books has not been cut, the purchasing power of this amount has greatly decreased with spiralling book costs.

committee, four parents, and one from the university administration.

Although the advisory committee would be authorized to control admissions (within university guidelines), actual control of staffing, and the daycare program would lie with the university department.

And according to committee chairman Paul Cadario, the Ross proposal will pass today.

Thursday, the internal affairs committee considered funding proposals for the daycare centre, approving a formula that would see the university paying $42,000 of renovation costs, with the remaining $15,000 to be raised by the levy against parents.

Cadario says he hopes the levy can be reduced.

All decisions of the committee must be approved by the Governing Council.

The meeting is in the Senate Chamber, Simcoe Hall at noon today.

So long as the world is divided into classes, the press will remain an instrument of class

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Dalsons Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

What change?

GC doesn't practise true openness

The Students' Administrative Council has called it "The Year of the Change". And, student governor Paul Cadario, writing in the Change Handbook, has described the Governing Council, the university's new top governing body, as "The Biggest Change of All".

Either they know something we don't or their idea of change is pretty myopic. The council, lauded as a representative body which would give students, teaching staff, administrative and support staff, and community representatives a meaningful voice in running this university, has done little to encourage optimism about its responsiveness to its constituents.

Indeed, the council wasted quite some time debating whether its committee meetings would be open, something readers of the U of T Act can be forgiven (Council meetings themselves are required by law to be open unless they are in committee of the whole.)

Wednesday's Varsity will detail the content of this controversial debate. In short, significant minority of governors, notable among them the carry-overs from the closed-meeting Board of Governors, were concerned lest their constituents be able to make their views known at a sufficiently early stage in council deliberations to affect the eventual outcome.

"My real concern is that the committee discussions of any particular issue will be discussed in the press and elsewhere" before committees even make decisions, Board of Governors veteran John Tory told one meeting.

Other governors lamented the possibility that publicity given to committee meetings might allow concerned individuals within the university to pressure their representatives to advocate certain views. It's all fine and well, they seem to be saying, for our constituents to stamp us with their sign of approval once every year or so in elections, but that's where their role should stop.

We disagree. Strongly. The Governing Council—in theory at least—was set up to represent the community, not the personal views of those few persons who managed to get themselves elected or appointed to the council.

And, let's not forget that 24 of them were not even directly elected by their respective constituencies. (Another two are handpicked to represent the president.)

Eight of them supposedly represent the university's alumni. In fact, they were elected by an electoral college composed of representatives of the constituent electoral alumni associations. Most alumni were never consulted about the choice. The other 16, intended to represent the public interest, were appointed by the provincial government.

It would be sheer folly to suggest that these 24—and indeed most of their 26 colleagues—could ever hope to ascertain, divinely or otherwise, their constituents' perspective on the many issues which will confront the council.

Having lost the fight to deny committee access to the public, the conservatives sitting on the council's Executive Committee are apparently planning to at least make the acquisition of information on council and committee meetings and documents as inconvenient as possible by stalling Varsity requests to be included on the council's mailing list. (Nine university groups, including the three campus reference libraries and organizations representing the estates afforded seats on the council, were added to the list last month. But, a Varsity request was apparently never even discussed by the Executive Committee.)

One reason for this, we suggest, is that The Varsity, as a left-wing paper, has a reputation for being consistently critical of the undemocratic nature of university governing bodies, and of many aspects of the university policies which they set, both internally and in relation to the social role that the university plays. And often, as the significant allotment of corporate executives on the Governing Council, are aware, The Varsity carries facts and editorial comment that question corporate hegemony in the university and society — something rarely to be found in the commercial media with which these men are accustomed to dealing. Their response to criticism, it seems, is to suppress facts that could be subject to scrutiny.

Council apologists have suggested that financial consideration limit the size of the mailing list.

The Varsity as the one media serving the whole university certainly merits being added to the council's mailing list, even if it's going to cost a few cents more a mailing to keep the university community informed about council developments.

While the issue of openness is probably a minor one when seen in relation to other matters that the Governing Council will have to deal, the way in which it has been treated is perhaps indicative.

The reaction of at least the council conservatives has been — predictably — to continue long-ingrained habits of secrecy and elitism. It is a pattern that can be expected to continue in all spheres of decision-making, given the unrepresentative nature of the members of the body and the underlying assumptions that they seem to work with. Power in the university has not been significantly transferred. Rather, the old hierarchical structures have been given a more modern, stream-lined form.

In one sense, the Executive Committee's response to The Varsity application, now slated for Wednesday, can be seen as a test of how it responds to pressure from the constituencies it supposedly represents.

In a deeper sense, however, it can be seen as an indication of how far from the ideal of participation — let alone control — by the university community and the general public the reality is, and how difficult the battle to realize these ideals in the university and in society will be.

Parents fight Simcoe Hall

Day-care issue remains unresolved

As the new term commences, one of the major problems facing the university community remains the issue of day care.

It exploded at U of T in the spring of 1970 when day care supporters occupied Simcoe Hall to force the administration to provide the money needed for renovations at the 12 Sussex under-two centre. The building at 12 Sussex itself was illegally occupied by a group of women's liberationists after prolonged negotiations for a building with the administration failed to produce any results.

The sit-in at that time finally produced what months of going through "the proper channels" had failed to get: minimal financial backing from the university.

At the same time, however, the administration, under then President Claude Bissell, took pains to emphasize that it considered its backing a response to a specific situation, not a general policy implying continuing commitment for the provision of day care at U of T. Also in order to relieve student pressure, the Presidential Advisory Committee on Social Responsibility was sent up to recommend on the university's responsibilities to its own and the surrounding community.

The committee, although seen as an attempt at co-option by many of those involved in the sit-in, produced recommendations that the administration found unacceptable. It recommended that the university carry out a comprehensive survey of campus daycare needs and accept a major share of responsibility in meeting those needs. Finally, last winter, all the members of the committee resigned en masse, declaring the committee ineffective because of inadequate funding and other obstacles.

Meanwhile, another issue had come to the forefront. The successful Campus Co-operative Day Care Centre (the Sussex Centre) had produced twenty 'graduates' — children over two years of age whose needs could not be met by the under-two centre. (Provincial law requires the two age groups to be separated.) Parents from the Sussex Centre now sought another building within the university which could house a centre for these children, and for other children aged two to five.

The university's response to their requests, however, was bureaucratic inertia, while all the while professing sympathy. There were no buildings available, it said. The matter would have to be 'studied'.

Finally, in April, after months of red tape and runaround, and after an intensive publicity campaign of lobbying, leafleting, newspaper articles, and demonstrations, parents and supporters took matters into their own hands. They occupied an empty clubhouse behind the Meteorology Building at 315 Bloor St. W., a building the administration later admitted was "eminently suited" to day care. According to the university, it was slated for unspecified other uses, although it has stood empty for a year.

The new location was rapidly turned into a well-functioning, albeit illegal, over-two centre. The university officially took no action other than to warn the occupiers that they were trespassing. Since April, however, parents, volunteers, and sympathizers have maintained a 24-hour occupation of the building, fearing that they would be locked out by university police if they left it.

For his part, U of T Registrar and Vice-President Robin Ross, who negotiated on behalf of the administration, told the occupiers that he would not discuss the future of the over-two centre until the clubhouse was vacated. He also stated that he did not recognize their negotiating committee as a legitimate body.

The Varsity — Frank Rooney

For several years parents in the university community have fought an up-hill battle against the U of T administration to obtain adequate day-care facilities for their children.

At the same time, however, the administration continued discussions with SAC, and a Day Care Board created in the spring by the administration, met to consider the problems. In mid-May, the university produced a document which admitted that there was "a clear and undeniable need for increased day facilities," while professing uncertainty as to the university's responsibility and ability to meet this demand.

By a remarkable coincidence — Ross denied the occupation had anything to do with it — the document suggested the use of the "available" clubhouse at 315 Bloor as the best site for a centre. It made no reference to the fact that a day care centre was already occupying the premises, nor did it explain why the building, which earlier, according to the administration's claims, had been slated for other uses, was now suddenly available.

It proposed that any centre to be established there should be operated must be licensed, and that it be managed by a board of directors composed of representatives from SAC, GSU, APUS, the U of T Faculty Association, the U of T Staff Association, the university administration, and the Social Planning Council of Toronto. It further proposed that students have first priority in using the centre, staff (both faculty and support) have second priority, and that remaining space, if any, go to community members.

The university would meet the cost of renovations "not directly the result of adapting the building as a day care centre" and would make it available rent free for the first three years. Users would have to pay for changes required by the province, and for operating costs.

Finally, it suggested that 'graduates' from the Sussex Centre and children from the St. Andrew Centre which was scheduled to close within two or three months because its building was being taken over, share the clubhouse facility.

Although the administration attempted to present the proposal as a major concession to day care, it came under immediate attack. Members of the occupying group pointed out that at present 63 children were being served by the two centres, while the university's proposed centre would lower this number to 30 — less than half. This at a time when, for example, a random survey of university workers taken in March by Cheryll Seaman indicated that twenty-six families with thirty-two children would place their children in an estimated $100 per month under the university's plan.

As well, the financial burdens imposed by the need to pay for renovations would have been too heavy for many low-income families on campus or in the surrounding community. Costs for the centre, presently $40 per month minimum per child, would have risen to an estimated $100 per month under the university's plan.

The university's proposal would also have removed the feature of parent control of the centre, replacing it, as the Campus Co-operative Day Care Centre put it, with "an official alphabet soup day care board" with no experience.

Finally, the requirement that any centre in the building be licensed was seen as an attack on the philosophy of the Campus Co-operative group, which has been unable over three years to yet win a license for its centre. The reason for this lies in the government's requirement that any centre have trained staff, with credentials which can only be obtained in training courses based on a completely different philosophy of child care than that favoured by the Campus Co-operative group.

Day car supporters also pointed out that the adoption of this proposal by the new Governing Council, coming into office July 1, would in all likelihood mean that the university would then accept no further responsibility for day care. They claim that the university's role as an employer and residence for thousands, and as a landlord and builder makes it responsible for the social welfare of all those within its boundaries. As an educational institution committed to the education of all society, the university must play a special role vis a vis women, given the care than that favoured by the Campus Co-operative unequal role which they face, co-op

In the face of opposition from the St. Andrew and Campus Co-operative group, and from the GSU and SAC, the administration proposal was held in abeyance, and the entire matter went to the Internal Affairs Committee of the new Governing Council.

The committee brought down policy recommendations which provide that the university provide capital subsidies but not operating costs for day care facilities for the university community, that the centres be licensed, and that admission to them for university parents be on the basis of need.

Although the new proposals mention the principles of access on the basis of need and "parental involvement", opponents point out that the proposed form of day care would have significantly less parental and volunteer involvement, and considerably higher operating costs.

Although the Internal Affairs Committee had unanimously recommended the policy to the Governing Council, there was considerable debate at the council meeting of Aug. 31. Faculty conservatives, like Charles Hanly and William Coutts, and others who admitted they believed the university had no day care responsibilities, realized they had lost that battle.

Children play outside the second centre. They have occupied the building since last April.

Dick & Jane learn about

The Varsity

Chapter 1: The Workers

Look, look. See The Varsity people. They do all kinds of interesting things. Some of them are reporters. They go places and find out what's happening. They cover news, sports, and cultural things. Sometimes, they write longer stories called features. Anybody can be a Varsity reporter. All you have to do is go to The Varsity office and say you want to help. See the people with cameras. They are Varsity photographers. They go to the same kind of places as reporters and take pictures. Their pictures illustrate The Varsity stories. You can be a photographer, too. They work in the same place as the reporters. The SAC Media Building, 91 St. George Street (two buildings north of Harbord and St. George, opposite the new library), second floor. There are even more things to do at The Varsity than write or take pictures. Some people do drawings to go with features and editorials. Others help design the paper. There is something for everybody to do at The Varsity.

Chapter 2: Editors All

Look, look. See the other people who work at The Varsity. Most of the time, they don't leave the office when they are working. They are called desk people because they sit at desks. They help get the other people's work ready to go into the paper. All of them are editors. There is a city editor and a news editor to help the news reporters. The city editor asks the reporters to cover stories. Then, he edits their story with them, showing them how they can make their stories better and making sure they have everything in them that they need. The news editor gets the story when the city editor is done. He checks the spelling and grammar, and doublechecks the facts. When that is done, he tells the layout editor where in the paper the story is going. Sports people have an editor, too. He does the same things the city and news editors do. People who write features and do reviews work with their section's editor and associate editor. Surprise, surprise! They do the same things as the city and news editors do. See the man who works in the darkroom. He is the photography editor. He makes sure that people take pictures of all the things of which the paper needs pictures. After the pictures are taken, a duty photographer develops them in The Varsity's very own darkroom. The Varsity supplies the film, chemicals, and equipment. The duty photographer and the desk people decide which pictures will go in the paper. When all these people are done with their work, the layout editor decides how to design the newspaper pages to get everything on them and make them look as nice as possible. She does this for most sections of the paper. Sometimes, she has helpers.

Chapter 3: Top Dog

Look, look. There is only one person left in the office. He is the editor. The editor is the person responsible for making sure the paper gets done three times a week. He is The Varsity's general co-ordinator and business manager. He takes care of letters-to-the-editor and editorial pages, and is in charge of features.

The editor is not a student. He is a full-time employee of the paper. (This year, so is the city editor.) He has to apply for the job the spring before he begins work. Then, the people who work on the paper and the people who direct business affairs interview the people who want the editor's job.

The workers suggest one of them for editor and the directors decide whether to accept their suggestion. If they don't, the workers have to make a second choice. This has never happened.

The editor is hired for one school year. He can only be fired if both a majority of the workers and the directors agree.

Chapter 4: Big News

Look, look. See the funny machine.

It is a telex machine. It lets the people at The Varsity and other university and community college newspapers keep in instant touch.

It is how The Varsity gets the CUP news from across the country that it prints in every issue of the paper.

Cup also provides The Varsity with news from outside Canada, from Quebec and around the world. That news has the name CUPI, Canadian University Press International, at the beginning of the story. CUP means Canadian University Press. It is the national cooperative of the student press in Canada.

CUP does more than just send out news. It has an office in Ottawa where people work on news, features, and helping member papers with all the problems they have.

The people who work for CUP have lots of experience. They come from the member papers and are elected at the annual national conference.

The conference takes place at different universities every year. People from all the member papers come together to discuss their problems, the role of the press, and learn about all kinds of things, like how to put out better newspapers.

CUP had has three different regions - the Maritimes, Ontario, and the West. Each region has a fieldworker who travels from paper to paper to help them with their work. Once a year, each region has a conference to get to know each other better and exchange ideas and information about producing a paper.

CUP also has a national advertising co-operative owned by the participating members. The Varsity belongs to it. Its name is Youthstream.

Youthstream gets The Varsity national advertising which ehlp[s] pay for the paper. Without Youthstream, The Varsity couldn't reach all these potential advertisers and get their ads. Youthstream makes The Varsity an awful lot of money.

Chapter 5: Far Away

Look, look. See the man in the car. He is the copy runner. He takes the material for The Varsity to the printer.

When the copy runner brings the printer the copy, the printer gives it to someone to typeset. The Varsity is typeset on computer equipment. The typesetter sits at what looks like a big, big typewriter and types the copy, using all the proper codes to make it look the way The Varsity wants it to look.

Instead of getting the type in hot metal chunks, The Varsity's copy is developed on photographic paper. Then, the stories are cut out and pasted down on paste-up sheets. There are red windows left for the pictures and they are done separately.

When the paste-up is done, the printer shows the page to The Varsity's proofreader. The proofreader works at the printers. He checks to make sure everything is done the way it is supposed to be, indicating typographical and other errors. Then, the printer and the typesetter correct the errors and show it to the proofreader for approval.

Sometimes, somebody makes a mistake at The Varsity offices and a story is too long or too short. If it is too long, the proofreader has to cut something out so it will fit.

When the page is done, it is taken to a camera room. Here, they take a picture of the entire page and make an aluminium plate from the negative. That is why this method of printing is called photo offset.

But everything isn't done yet. The Varsity delivery people have to pick up the paper and distribute it to the 75-plus delivery spots on the St. George, Scarborough, and Erindale campuses.

Chapter 6: Boreds

Look, look. See the Students' Administrative Council people. They are the publishers of The Varsity.

But, they are the government and the government isn't supposed to control the press. So, they don't really control The Varsity.

They give the paper a lump sum grant every year, less than a third of its operating budget, and in return get to appoint people to the paper's Board of Directors.

Most of the money for The Varsity comes from advertisers. The paper has its own advertising office and the people who work for it solicit and prepare the campus and local advertising.

The Varsity Board of Directors is an independent body. It looks after the business management of the paper and receives formal complaints about its editorial or business management.

People dissatisfied with the paper's response to their complaints should write the Board's Campus Relations Committee at 91 St. George Street, Toronto 181.

The committee investigates complaints and recommends appropriate measures to the Board.

But, The Varsity Board of Directors and the Students' Administrative Council cannot interfere with the paper's editorial policy.

The editor is responsible to the Board for the paper's journalistic integrity. Speak to the section editors and then the editor if you have a complaint about something the paper did or didn't do.

Chapter 7: Power

Look, look. See all the people who work on the paper. They are the staff or editorial collective.

They are the only people who control the paper's editorial policy.

Anybody can be a member of the collective. All they have to do is work on a minimum number of papers.

In late summer, the staff decides what the broad policy guidelines for the paper should be. All later decisions have to be made within this framework unless a weekly staff meeting decides otherwise.

The weekly collective meetings determine major editorial and business matters. Meetings held the day before the paper is published, production days, approve the next day's editorials and rate stories as to their relative importance.

This story is very short. That's not because it's unimportant. It's because the workers control the paper's editorial policy. That's called staff democracy.

We like it. That's because we believe people should control decisions affecting their own lives.

Move to Sussex Street

New building approved for Innis

By BRIANE NASIMOK

With final university approval for a new building, Innis College ends eight years of being a boarder at U of T.

Presently the college is in the former home of Sir John A. Macdonald, a three-storey white brick house on St. George St. owned by Knox College.

And Knox has let it be known that Innis College will not be welcome there after August 1974.

But since its inception in 1964, Innis College has strayed from some of the traditional ideas of what a college should be at university.

To accommodate residential requirements, for instance, Innis rented a number of older houses along Huron St. and formed student co-operatives.

And under the Innis aegis, interdisciplinary courses with no fixed format, and often no teachers made their first appearance at the university.

Named in honour of the late Professor Harold Innis, a pioneer in the areas of economics, history and communications theory, Innis College, along with New College, were established to relieve the overpopulation of the existing colleges.

Both were planned as residence colleges, with Innis to be housed in one of the New buildings. In 1964, the first New building was complete, with the second phase under construction for Innis.

The then Principal, Robin Harris, along with the College Council recommended that New be given both buildings, and that Innis be allowed to establish a separate site.

Meanwhile the doors to the college opened in September, 1964, as Innis occupied a temporary building, constructed in 1948 as a bookstore, on Hart House Circle. Old university maps and the Music Faculty Freshman Handbook still show the spot as Innis College. Space was scarce as the college consisted of an enormous common room, some athletic lockers, and the offices of the Principal and the Registrar, surrounded by 240 students.

In 1965 a Users Committee was established, to find a permanent home for Innis.

Original architects' plans called for two towers of residences, with each group of twelve sharing a common room, and three sections, 36 residents composing one house. Non-residents would be assigned to a house, along with dons. Overnight bunk beds could be used by non-residents, with the towers being joined by administrative wings, and the library, beneath which a Common Room, a middle quad, with grass, and student facilities were planned.

The cost of the building was estimated between 16 and 18 million dollars. The University asked the users to pair down the cost to $10 million, but after getting rid of the Deans, the Dons, and making the residences Co-Educational the estimated cost was 1.6 million dollars over the amount the Federal Government was willing to spend.

Acting Principal Peter Russell, and the College Council held an open meeting at which it was decided that Innis would stop enrolling new students, if the university did not find the funds. The College was already overcrowded in its space, and many facilities were lacking.

Within two days then-university President Claude Bissell found the money, and the college was given the go-ahead.

But the election of Pierre Trudeau to Ottawa brought a cutback on proposed expenditures, one of these being the building of Innis College.

In 1968, the university provided additional space to Innis by giving the college the first and second floors of 63 St. George, the Macdonald-Mowat historical site, on Knox College land. The college existed in two places at the same time for a year and a half, at which time the college got exclusive use of the building, and left the Hart House Circle.

In 1970 Harris announced his retirement, with Peter Russell succeeding him in the fall of 1971. On his return from teaching in Uganda, Russell established a building committee to discover if the 63 St. George site was adequate as a permanent home. The Building Committee, composed of students, faculty and administration, looked at other available locations on campus, and travelled to other campuses for new ideas.

The Varsity — Doug Hamilton

After eight years in an old St. George Street house, Innis College will move to a new building to be erected on this site.

The Varsity — Doug Hamilton

Innis College wishes to integrate its building with the surrounding community. Sussex residents are wary of such developments.

Their decision on staying at 63 St. George was made simpler when Knox College said it wanted the building back by 1974.

The College could have fought to keep the St. George site, but a majority of the Building Committee wanted the College to construct a new building, plus use the existing buildings on the Sussex-St. George site. In January, 1972, the College published "Towards a Permanent Home For Innis College" which was a report on the work of the previous six months, outlining the Colleges suggestions on the new building.

The qualities the college listed as the ones it hoped the building will foster, are a small modest building, with a variety of design, with an absence of long, gleaming corridors. The report states that the college should be open 24 hours, as much as possible, and it should not be "fortress"like, providing some needed commercial or social services for our community".

When the report was distributed the question of the existing houses was discussed. The College does not want to level the site, but hopes to integrate the surrounding community, including the Day Care Centre, at 12 Sussex, and the other houses managed by Crown Trust, and inhabited by students and families.

$1.2 million Innis building to be erected on parking lot

Eight years after its birth, Innis College has obtained approval to construct a $1.2 million building, on the north side of Sussex Ave. at St. George St.

Although University officials have not yet approved concrete plans, the Innis building committee is presently screening 16 possible architects to design the new college. Meetings are open to all members of the campus and public.

Five final names will be chosen and submitted to the university's Governing Council.

Ine

In one of their last acts as supreme authority in the university, the old Board of Governors approved in principle last June a report from the Innis College user's committee, recommending the construction of a 24,000 square foot building.

And according to Art Hall, assistant to Innis principal Peter Russell, the whole building will be financed without one dollar of provincial funds. Hall said money would probably be obtained from sources like the Varsity Fund, the university's alumni rainy days cookie jar.

Construction of the building will be counted as part of the university's available floor space with the Ontario government cutting down the amount of money available for constructing new buildings.

The planned college will be built on the site of a present parking lot, created several years ago when houses were torn down to make way for the anticipated building.

But no new residence space will be created by the building. In their report, the Users' committee recommends that the university seek outside funds from government housing agencies to construct any residence space.

The proposed building will contain 24,000 square feet of classrooms, administrative and student union offices.

In approving the plan, the Board made no firm commitment to keep existing houses in the Sussex block adjacent to the present parking lot. Instead they suggested that the architect should investigate integrating existing structures on the block into the college.

All property between St. George and Huron St. along Sussex is owned by the university and reserved for possible Innis expansion.

Abortion uproar sweeps SMC

Kelly assails birth control info

By MARINA STRAUSS

Controversy at St. Michael's College erupted during orientation because birth control and abortion information was distributed to freshmen.

The discovery of the Abortion Counselling and Birth Control Collective phone number in the freshmen's "survival kits", given away on the first day of orientation, triggered off a handful of complaints from parents and college president

Father John M. Kelly.

On Kelly's insistence, the Roman Catholic college's student union, responsible for the kits, inserted in the remaining kits letters from both Kelly and from the union president Al Nigro.

Nigro's letter included the phone number of Birthright, a pregnancy counselling service that advises women to have their babies, which is associated with the Catholic church. Birthright's number was not included in the kit.

In his letter, Nigro justifies the inclusion of the abortion and birth control number by stating "we feel that providing all sides of a question is essential in order to make a rational judgment". He apologized for any offensive information contained in the kits.

Kelly's letter expresses his administration's stand against abortion, and makes it clear that "the student union alone is responsible for the inclusion of the information on birth control and abortion".

Kelly wrote that "on the abortion issue, the administration thinks that it is an unjustifiable destruction of innocent human life".

Kelly's move was sparked by, he later said, "fewer than a half dozen calls" he received on one day.

"A lot of these students' parents have taken public stands against abortion", Kelly said.

He admitted that he himself has not as yet seen the survival kit. "It's all second hand information I got".

The information which caused the controversy was included in a listing of services' phone numbers in the Toronto region. The list was a reprint from titled "A Survival Handbook", produced by Guerilla.

The York University Student Clinic was the only other listing that mentioned abortion and birth control counselling and referral.

Kelly claims that "only one aspect was presented, with complete disregard of the other side".

Kelly objected to the fact that "the single Catholic college on campus had not included any counselling service that Catholics conduct".

He feels that what was presented was "a leaning of the student opinion" and "the approval of liberal unmarried sex". Kelly himself said he is not in favor of premarital sex.

"I went through this (complaints from parents) last year with the inclusion of the Birth Control Handbook in the freshman students' kits," Kelly recalls.

"This handbook was doubly bad last year and completely out of taste. It included illustrations and drawings that I thought were in outrageously poor taste."

The Birth Control Handbook, published by McGill University students and distributed across Canada in the few last years, provided information about intercourse, birth control, abortion, and venereal disease.

Referring to the student union's autonomy, Kelly begrudgingly said "I hate to admit it, but I have no control over the student union." He added that he finds their lack of consultation "discourteous".

"If I tried to pull that on the students, they would be after me", he said.

Former student union president John O'Grady describes Kelly as a "shrewd conservative, not a reactionary, who wants to retain the status quo".

"His position of power is unassailable at St. Mike's, and has been for the past 15 years", O'Grady added.

Last year he refused to accept student demands for an academic majority on the college's top governing structure, the Collegium, which presently composed entirely of Roman Catholic Basilian Fathers.

And again, last March, he strongly opposed giving into students pressures at the Simcoe Hall occupation over undergraduate and public access to the new John P. Roberts library.

Kelly objects to student tactics in achieving their aims, although he did not comment on the aims themselves.

"you don't do anything immoral to get something you want", he charges. "It's a very serious mistake in moral judgment for achieving your aims". Kelly feels that the college's administration and its student union are working at "cross-purposes".

As classes get underway, calm seems to have returned to St. Michael's College.

"The inclusion of his (Kelly's) letter in the survival kit satisfied him and, along with our letter, satisfied us also", said student union vice-president Tim Hamer.

Paucity of votes cast in Arts and Science election

By NADIM WAKEAM

The Faculty of Arts and Science committee elections, held last May, resulted in a less than seven per cent return of ballots by students, in great part due to the late timing of the elections. In contrast, most SAC-run elections elicit in at least a 20 per cent vote.

According to the faculty office, of 11,250 ballots sent by mail to students, only 778 were returned.

Victoria College students voted the least often for their own college representatives, with only 65 votes coming in from 2650 being mailed out. St. Mike's students voted most 94 out of 2200 eligible voted. Only 82 of 2150 at University voted. (Some students may have voted for committee, but not college representatives.)

Innis, New, Erindale and Trinity College's representatives were all acclaimed. Scarborough is independent in curricular and thus its seats are vacant.

The elections were held at the end of the academic year, one of the busiest times in university. Nominations for committee seats closed on April 7. This was also the last day of term. Ballots were then sent out by mail and were to be returned by May 8.

During this period students were heavily involved in writing essays, term tests and preparing for final exams which began April 17 and lasted to May 5.

As well, The Varsity had ceased publishing by the time nominations closed. Therefore, although statements from the candidates were sent out with the ballots, the paper could not cover the election.

Of the 34 positions open on the faculty council committee, 16 students won by acclamation and one seat on the Life Sciences Curriculum Committee remains unfilled.

In some cases candidates were elected with as little as 51 or 53 votes.

The faculty voting was substantially better than student voting. Of approximately 1300 arts and science faculty, ballots sent out 479 were returned. There were 23 acclamations and 20 elections. It would seem that faculty interest was also affected by the late date of the elections.

The policy on the conduct of the Council elections is that voting takes place in the spring of the preceding academic year.

Assistant Dean William Foulds claimed Saturday that the administration was expected to run the elections but it was occupied with the Library Council and Governing Council elections.

Instead, the faculty ran its own elections. And, "It takes time to get things done", Foulds commented.

Evans forms committee to study New Program

By MARI-LINN ASBURY

The New Program in arts and science instituted in 1969 is scheduled to come under intensive review this year.

U of T President John Evans announced in July he was forming a Presidential Advisory Committee on the New Program will make its first report on February 1, 1973.

The first meeting of the Committee, will start to scrutinize financial and academic aspects of the New Programme. It is scheduled for Thursday at 7:30 p.m. in the Council room of the Pharmacy Building.

The review committee is a parity body consisting of fourteen members recommended by: the Students Administrative Council, the Association of part time Undergraduate Students, the Graduate Student Union, Provost Don Forster and the Dean Greene.

Seven are faculty members including the chairman, Daniel Berlyne (Psychology), Frank Watt (UC English), Paul Fox (Political Economy), P.P.M. Meincke (Erin Physics) and Robert Jervis (Chemical Engineering). Three are full time undergraduates Linda Hall (Vic. III), Ron Struys (Innis III) and Robert Anderson (UCIV). The extension student is Kurt Loeb, the graduate student from extension is Rita Mifflin (OISE), and the graduate student is Pamela Chellev, a teacher. One other recent graduate will be added to complete the committee.

Much controversy has arisen over the expense and academic results of the New Programme. Bob Greene, dean of arts and science, said that many of the older conservative faculty members feel a more highly structured program is preferable, resulting in a closer fellowship between Professors and students, and students and their colleges. They also feel that the range of subjects is too wide and the students tend to feel lost because of inadequate counselling. Dean Greene considers the formation and decisions of the committee will be the most important events in the Arts and Science Faculty this year.

The New Program was an extensive liberalization of the arts and science course structure.

Implemented after a report headed by Political Economy professor C.B. MacPherson recommended sweeping changes, the eventual result was considerable liberalization. The distinction between four-year honours and three-year general courses was abolished and students were allowed to choose practically any combination of courses to lead to a degree.

Rigidity in a number of programs was lessened in several departments and a trend away from emphasis on exams began. Another result was the flowering of many new courses, including some that involved more than one department.

While the reaction from students has generally been favourable to the changes, others have been upset by the proliferation of "easy courses" and generally higher marks. The increased emphasis on essays has also contributed to higher incidences of lending and selling term papers.

The review committee will examine the general regulations of the New Programme and the requirements for standing as outlined in the Calandeeer. Evans urged committee members to recommend, "in the light of both student enrolment patterns and the experience and views of faculty and students, such changes as may seem appropriate".

Topics to be discussed include, the statistics of enrolment patterns in the New Programme as compared with previous ones, student and staff

Summer ins and outs of SAC safe deal not ratified

Besides working on developing a U of T response on the fees hike, SAC kept busy over the summer on other matters. Some of the more noteworthy goings-on were:

SAC — owned Hogtown Press refused to sell 175 copies of Origin of the Family to the University Bookstore because the Bookstore was going to sell the publication at a profit. In making the decision the Education Commission said there would be no resale for profit on U of T campus. Hogtown Press has been owned by SAC since last spring. It reprints educational material.)

SAC had three general meetings over the summer, the most in recent memory during a summer.

SAC Services Commission decided to undertake a systematic study of food price and quality at the various campus cafeterias. The study will be conducted by Food Science students.

SAC received approximately $1,000 from Warner Brothers for aiding in the filming Class of '44', the sequel to "Summer of '42". SAC was given $400 for rental of its building, and $600 for cap and gown rental. In addition, SAC received a free interior paint job, and was due to get a 1944-style phone booth to use as a free phone.

It was discovered that the 10-year contract with "the funny little obnoxious man" who handles the prophylactic machine in the SAC office was never ratified and that details of the commitment would be searched out since the product leaves something to be desired in the opinion of some.

A decision was made through SAC initiative to set up a committee to review the New Program in Arts and Science.

At the third SAC executive meeting on May 17 vice-president John Helliwell and Communications Commissioner Debra Lewis moved that Ulli Diemer and Ernie Hobbs be named Handbook Editors. At the Fourth executive meeting, SAC president Eric Miglin and vice-president John Helliwell moved that the motion regarding editorship of the SAC Handbook be reconsidered. The motion to designate Hobbs and Diemer as handbook editors was defeated. It was moved that SAC undertake the co-ordination of the handbook under the direction of John Helliwell, and that he be directly responsible to the SAC for the production of the handbook. SAC justified the motion on the grounds that the SAC Handbook provides the initial contact between the SAC and the students and represented a vital and important means of communication on the part of SAC.

Teaching excellence to be stressed

Scar principal calls for closer ties with UofT

The Varsity—Doug Hamilton

By DOUG HAMILTON

The new principal of Scarborough College hopes to preserve close ties with the St. George campus during his term of office.

Ralph Campbell said that until the college is sufficiently mature to depart from the orbit of the U of T, "it should be closely integrated with the university."

A symbiotic relationship between Scarborough and the main campus exists, he said in an interview Friday. For example, the university gains from the research undertaken by Scarborough College faculty, and the college benefits from being a component of a long-established university.

Campbell succeeded A. F. Wynne Plumtre as the new principal of the college last July.

Plumtre, principal for seven years, retired from the college's administration to take up a teaching post in Ottawa.

Campbell's firm endorsement of continued affiliation with the U of T may relieve the anxieties of some faculty and students who believe the university's largest satellite campus is slowly creeping toward separation from St. George.

When asked if Scarborough could survive as an independent university, Campbell replied; "I think that it is possible." However, he emphasized that "it would take a major operation in terms of effort in promoting accreditation for a graduate programme. This would be a major hurdle."

"It would be chancy getting students to become part of such an institution. It would be quite an effort."

Like his predecessor, Campbell possesses considerable administrative expertise.

He served as Associate Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science from 1964 to 1968. The governments of both Jordan and Kenya have employed him as an advisor on economic planning.

However, Campbell gained notoriety throughout the university community as chairman of the Presidential Advisory Committee on Disciplinary Procedures which convened in 1968 at the most intense period of student discontent on campus.

The committee was formed, in Campbell's words, "because not much attention had been paid to disciplinary procedures over the previous decades."

A growing amount of student unrest focused attention on the Caput — a committee comprised of 24 administrators which ranks as the highest disciplinary body over students in the university, judged infractions of the rules committed by students.

The committee's report advocated sweeping reforms of disciplinary procedures, but it was never adopted due to hostility from some faculty and administrators who wanted to make no concessions to student activists.

Are the recommendations still valid today? "Yes," said Campbell. "But some modifications are desirable."

Because "faculty and administration moved pretty rapidly to make changes in the structure," student radicalism has subsided, he asserted.

"The overt action era generally has waned, Campbell added. "Whether it the student movement has gone underground, I am not close enough to these affairs to say."

At Scarborough College, Campbell should experience little hostility from the student body. Student leaders at the college have traditionally eschewed direct action and have opted instead for promoting reformism.

Campbell has taken a cautious approach to the question of parity. "It is, certainly, in items like discipline, an absolutely desirable principle." But, "it is not a principle that should prevail in all organizations."

Introducing parity to all of the college's legislative committees "is something we will have to look at," he said. Campbell has proposed a number of changes affecting the power structure of the college. An official has been appointed to "supervise budget preparation and financial analyses." Under Plumtre, budget preparation was his own responsibility.

Ralph Campbell was named to succeed A.F.W. Plumtre as new Scar chief last May.

Tories slash stipends of para-med students interns stipends

By PAT REDICAN

The elimination of living allowances for students interning in para-medical professions may cause a shortage of these workers in Ontario hospitals, according to a brief from the Students Administrative Council.

The brief, written by University Commissioner John Creelman (Scar 11) and SAC rep Irene Miller (Food Sc. III) will be presented to the Ontario Ministry of Health. It has already passed the SAC executive, and will come before the full council for endorsement this week.

Student nurses in diploma programs, registered nursing assistants, technicians and other interns including therapists now all receive either free room and board or living allowances while in training. These are all being cut off, while the work they must do in this period is not discontinued.

In addition, nurses and nursing assistants previously paid no tuition.

Now nurses are required to pay $250 and nursing assistants $150.

Nurses at university are not subject to these regulations. Instead, like the rest of university students, their fees went up in the general rise last spring.

The removal of the stipends is due to "constraints on financing" according to a letter from Ontario Health Minister Richard Potter to the heads of institutions affected by this policy. However, the SAC brief argues that in the long run the cutbacks will hurt the Ontario economy.

The presentation, which is specifically concerned with dieticians and physical and occupational therapists, cites the fact that Ontario already imports large numbers of personnel in these categories, and that most of these do not stay longer than two years. Because the living wage for interns has been discontinued, it will become more expensive for a physiotherapist or dietician to obtain a diploma, and will act as a deterrent for students to intern in Ontario hospitals. Therefore, the current shortage will not be alleviated and may well be intensified, the report argues.

One important area such a shortage may affect is the trend towards medical teams. This concept emphasises using specifically trained para-medics in order to free doctors for services only they can provide. Since para-medics charge less, the team approach leads to much lower medical costs.

Creelman will present the brief to the health ministry on Wednesday. Potter is on vacation and will not be available until the end of September.

Manager rips-off Erindale's money

SAC-sponsored book store project flops

By MARINA STRAUSS

A project for a permanent, centrally-run, campus-wide used book store system fell through this summer due to both lack of work by the organizer and lack of support from local student councils.

Rob Morningstar, who was to be paid $450 by SAC to organize it, has left Toronto with $120 of Erindale students' money, after doing little work on the project.

Morningstar had run a sale, called Students Association for Levelling of Expenses (SALE), at Erindale for the past two years. The third year Erindale student was employed by SAC to study the feasibility of a cross-campus SALE during the summer and report back to council.

Last May, Morningstar had approached SAC with the suggestion that the seven arts and sciences colleges and SAC support the non-profit store.

Students bringing in books to sell would quote their desired prices. SALE would try to sell these texts with a five per cent surcharge, and return the price asked to the seller, less five per cent. The ten per cent commission would be used to provide operating funds, including paying staff.

The expected savings to students would be substantial.

Morningstar hoped to have five stores, covering all three campuses, located in various art colleges. If successful, the stores would eventually sell records, tapes, clothing, and handicrafts.

In principle, all colleges and SAC heartily supported the concept of a student-run store for buying and reselling of used books among students.

Unfortunately, plans collapsed in mid-August when SAC finally realized Morningstar had done little more than contact college and the engineering faculty councils in late-July.

In early summer the SAC executive had voted a total of $1,050 for SALE, including Morningstar's salary, pending a detailed report by Morningstar on SALE and local councils financial support of it. The executive agreed that local councils would have control over store operations in the first year, and SAC would not necessarily take control later.

Morningstar reported back regularly to SAC services commissioner Bill Steadman, responsible for the project:

"I took his word for it, and waited for his final report", Steadman explained with disappointment.

He could not reach Morningstar the week before his report was due. However Morningstar had earlier assured Steadman that "it looks like things will be all set up".

When Morningstar did not show up with his report on August 12, SAC defeated the motion to give him any money.

"By that time I was getting complaints from St. Mike's and Trinity, asking what Morningstar was doing", Steadman recalled.

"Morningstar tried to put something over on us", he continued. "He did not honor an agreement, and I had placed my trust in him.

Meanwhile, Morningstar had collected $125 from the Students' Administrative Government of Erindale (SAGE), money which, SAGE president Paul Moran says, it will never get back. No other council had agreed to give Morningstar the $120 he requested from each.

Morningstar left Toronto at the end of August, is now attending first year law at Queen's University, and cannot be reached. The only explanation Steadman ever received from Morningstar came two days after he was refused payment by SAC. Morningstar claimed he had "problems of cooperation", and couldn't follow through. "A few things have changed since I talked to you last", he told Steadman.

Moran explained that SAGE gave Morningstar the $125 because "SAC approved the plans. But communications between SAC and us are not so good. It was both our faults".

"We definitely want a co-operative type of used-book sale", Moran said. "But we already set up a bookstore here at Erindale, and we don't need another level of bureaucracy."

"We're still willing to help and cooperate with other colleges, although we ourselves have no need for a central-run campus store", he said.

Morningstar, a former SAGE vice-president and one-time defeated presidential candidate, was faced with the major disadvantage of seeking money for a project during the summer when most local council members are not around to make such decisions.

Admitted Scarborough student council president David Onley "The matter was not discussed by council because it was difficult to get a quorum in the summer".

"It was a great idea", Onley conceded, but "we decided to wait until Morningstar gave us a full, detailed report. All we had received so far from him was one letter of one page. We weren't going to risk the money ourselves, and we waited for SAC to react to his report".

The reaction of other local councils was similar.

"I thought it was a good idea", said Victoria University Students' Administrative Council (VUSAC) education commissioner Rick Gregory. "People are getting ripped off all the time at the Textbook Store".

But, "VUSAC was unable to get a quorum," explained Gregory. "By the middle of August we hadn't done anything. Things always fall apart in the summer."

The Engineering Society was also very much in favor of the idea, although it could not see its being implemented.

"In Engineering, there aren't many who want to get rid of their text books, except perhaps first year students", said the Society's president Scott Joliffe. "We'd be lucky if we could transfer 1,000 books".

Joliffe sent Morningstar a letter in the first week of August expressing enthusiasm over the project and promising to look into the scheme more closely. The Society never received a reply from him.

Joliffe suggests that major plans be made for "one big good used-book sale on campus.

The University College Literary Society did not look into the matter until mid-mid-August.

"We would have had the sale, we thought it was a good idea, but our college is being renovated and we could not get any room for it", explained the Lit.'s president Vicki Grabb.

However, St. Michael's Student Union is not so enthusiastic about the project.

"We decided unanimously against the idea" said the union's vice-president Tom Hamer. He preferred his college's system of operating its own annual used book sale. "Our college book sale is not in it for the profit. We sell books at the seller's price, and at no more than 50 per cent of the original cost".

St. Michael's Union felt that if a used book store was not subsidized enough, to put a mark-up on the books was pointless. St. Michael's own book sale is heavily subsidized by its student union.

New College council, although supporting it in principle, was wary of SALE's benefits for its college, because of the large number of professional students at the college who tend not to sell their books.

Meanwhile, SAC plans to set up a committee to look into setting up a bookstore.

SAC ran a used book exchange quite successfully for many years, until three years ago. Then it expanded to sell new books as well, lost money and was closed down.

In the long run, says Steadman, the onus will be left up to "local college initiative" in coordinating an amalgamation of used-book stores to serve the university.

Although the possibility of a central, student-run used-book sale has been aborted for this year, four colleges are holding their own sales within the next few weeks run by their respective student councils.

Trinity College is running its fourth annual sale. A three-day collection period begins on Wednesday, and the sale will be held for one week beginning next Monday at Cartwright Hall at St. Hilda's College. Students ask for a price for their books, and if they are not sold, the books are returned to their owners. The books are usually sold at about half the original price.

The St. Michael's College sale, at Brennan Hall, Room A, will start selling its books today. Students can charge any price up to 50 per cent of the original cost, and if the book is not sold, it is returned to the seller. The sale will run until the course change deadline October 6.

The Scarborough College sale takes a ten per cent commission on sales for operating charges. The sale will run for three to four weeks starting next Monday at the council's reception office.

Erindale's "Ministry of Plenty" store charges 5 per cent on the price that the student put on his or her book.

Old, new faces people top

First of a series...

With all the pomp and dignity befitting the occasion, the new governors of the University of Toronto somberly gathered together on July fourth for their first formal meeting. Only three days before, the 50 had taken control of the country's largest university from their predecessors, the academic Senate and financial Board of Governors.

The move threw the university's varied estates -- students, teaching staff, administrators - support staff, alumni, and government community representatives - together in a permanent body for the first time in the university's history. And, it precipitated a shake-up of the administration's top hierarchy and parallel office switches.

The new University of Toronto Act creating the Governing Council and laying down the guidelines for its operations was passed amidst acrimonious student-faculty debate before the provincial legislature's Human Resources Committee. Students had championed equal student-staff representation on the new governing body, while U of T Faculty Association representatives had threatened to close down the university if the government gave in to the student demands. In the end, then Colleges and Universities Minister John White gave in to the faculty pressure, leaving faculty with 12 members to the students' eight.

During the clash, students and faculty had initially agreed on one area; that there should be an academic majority on the council (there isn't - with 16 government appointees and eight alumni) and that the so-called community representative should not be government yes-people. (Nearly half the government appointees were Board reappointments, and most are businesspeople.)

Despite the prestige attached to the new jobs, the government reportedly had some difficulty in finding people to fill its slots, although no effort was apparently made to satisfy the student demand that government appointees more accurately reflect the socio-economic composition of Ontario. There were some minor exceptions, but not really of the kind the students wanted.

Lynn Williams, United Steelworkers of America District 6 representative, was their concession to student calls for labor representation. Williams is not exactly the picture of the working man students probably had in mind. A bureaucrat, Williams sided with conservative unionists in denouncing the NOP's Waffle wing.

The government appointments came straight from the office of Premier William Davies, bypassing Universities Minister George Kerr. Simcoe Hall insiders diagnosed it as a blatant attempt to appease the press by picking four media people: Maclean's editor Peter Newman, CFRB Radio's Betty Kennedy, Southam Press Vice-President Gordon N. Fisher (an uncle of Mrs. Evans coincidentally), and Toronto Sun publisher Edward A. Dunlop (a former Conservative MPP and Cabinet Minister).

McMaster University Medical Centre trustee Marnie Paikin, who worked with Evans while he was Health Sciences vice-president and dean of McMaster's medical school, was among the relative unknowns included in the government's honors list.

U of T Medical Faculty Associate Anthony Cecutti relinquished his position with the university to accept government appointment.

All the others' claim to fame, like their Board of Governors predecessors, lies in their business acumen, there apparently still being a feeling that you need hard-headed businessmen and lawyers to run a university. They number seven in businessmen (plus two of the media people whose jobs are more management than journalistic) and two lawyers.

Chairing the council is former Board vice-chairman C. Malin Harding, chief executive officer of Harding Carpets Limited and director, like his fellow business appointees to the council, of a string of corporations.

Harding solemnly advised the council's first official meeting that members would "have to make sure we spend our time at these meetings as profitably as possible." He also presents the image of being always disorganized, unsure of what's about to come up next. Despite several erroneous rulings, council members have been reluctant to challenge him. He always seems somewhat perturbed by the time some members spend questioning what he apparently regards as minor details.

Former Board chairman and now vice-chairman Bill Harris, often accused of being less sympathetic to student causes in the past, has shown himself in the open council meetings to be a liberal, clashing with the more conservative elements of the council. An investment dealer, Harris has several directorships under his belt.

Liberal Senator Daniel Lang accepted council appointment, though like many of his Board compatriots, he distrusts the council's unicameral (one-tier rather than two) system of government, dismissing it as a lot of "jingoism".

Fellow Board veterans-alumni John Tory and Sidney Hermandt seem to have a contest going to see who can be the most conservative. Tory, according to a close associate, has described Radio Varsity as "communist".

"I would plead with this council . . . to forget the words unicameralism and bicameralism", Hermandt told the council's first meeting

On another occasion, he announced, "I would like to go every further to the right than Mr. Mackenzie;

Former Board member W.O. Twaits, chairman of Imperial Oil expressed his current knowledge of university affairs at one meeting.

"The academic year begins in early October doesn't it?" deadpanned Twaits.

Most government appointees are content to let the administrators carry the bag.

Speaking to a meeting of the Ontario Federation of Students, Universities Minister George Kerr said lay people were "overimpressed" by university administrators.

The government appointees, reflecting their divergent philosophies, apparently have not attempted to form as a cohesive caucus. Teaching staff members, on the contrary, seem to vote together, led by their most conservative elements, Philosophy's Charles Hanly and Political Economy's Harry Eastman.

Hanly has been the campus' resident champion of the academic guild mentality, with a zeal that has probably discredited him in the eyes of his fellow governors by now. Hanly has sat on the Ontario Confederation of Faculty Associations executive for many years and was recently appointed by the Governing Council to represent the university on the Ontario Council of Universities.

Hanly, who contested the seat on the unicameral body doesn't like unicameral bodies.

He blames it for what he calls the "disastrous breakdown of planning at the College of Art" (referring to the incident last spring where conservative faculty engineered the ouster of the college's radically innovative president).

He insisted that the government was very skeptical about unicameralism, citing this spring's bicameral University of Waterloo Act as proof of his thesis. (Part-time council rep Joyce Oenyer corrected him, pointing out that bicameralism was requested by the U of Waterloo administrators and not specifically favored by the government.)

Eastman, like Hanly, has been less than discreet in his irritation at the council to allow faculty majority on its Academic Affairs Committee, he argued that the council "really needs people whose business has been professors" and have taught. Warming to his case, he said the non-academic majority structure would be taken as a "sign that the Governing Council distrusts" teaching staff on the committee.

University College's R.M.H. Shepherd initially associated himself with

No booze at Sid Smith: LLBO cans SAC pub

Drinking hole dries up: A ruling by the Liquor Licencing of Ontario Board has effectively killed a SAC-sponsored pub at Sid Smith.

There will be no pub on the eastern plaza of Sidney Smith Hall this year due to an unexpected, last-minute ruling of the Liquor Licencing Board of Ontario. The ruling prohibits the sale of liquor in outdoor locations which are not adjacent to licenced indoor premises.

The refusal came as a disappointment to the Students' Administrative Council which hoped to repeat the successful pub held there last September. SAC Services Commissioner Bill Steadman said the final refusal came Sept. 1 after he had worked six weeks planning and arranging the project.

The university police, U of T Health Services, Arts and Science Dean Bob Greene and U of T Vice-President and Provost Don Forster had all given written endorsement of the pub.

Any presently licenced building on campus could be licenced for an outdoor pub, however, according to an official from the Liquor Control Board.

Several campus buildings already have indoor pubs. SAC Vice President Ross Flowers, said the late refusal for the Sid Smith Plaza left no time to devise a plan for an alternate location.

The pub, which would have served food and beer, was to be open from noon to midnight six days a week from Sept. 11th to 29th.

A pinball machine and other games were to be set up on the site. Flowers said when he asked the board why it had allowed a licence for the same location and activities last year, he was told that the agreement made last summer was a mistake due to a failure in realizing the true nature of SAC's intentions.

Regulations state that outdoor vending of liquor may take place only in connection with a building which is already licenced. In such cases, although the drinks are served outdoors, sales are considered an extension of indoor activities.

While some concessions on outside liquor sales are made for banquets and special occasions permits lasting several days, SAC's request was for too long a time period, the official said.

The Liquor Licencing Board has recently received a number of similar applications from other universities, he noted. While all have been refused, they have caused the Board to begin a study "to revise the whole question of liquor on campuses". New guidelines favouring the creation of temporary outdoor campus pubs may be created, he said.

SAC requests administration grant to reactivate information bureau

By HEATHER-JANE SANGUINS

Starting today, the SAC Information Bureau will again be operating at the new SAC number of 928-4911.

To be directed by Services Commissioner Bill Steadman and SAC Vice President Ross Flowers, the bureau's main function is to assist students after normal SAC office hours. Services provided will include information about on-and-off campus events, facilities and aids to students.

At the beginning, the bureau will operate from 5 pm until 9 pm, Monday to Thursday. Later, if it proves successful, Steadman hopes the service will expand to include Sunday evenings and Saturdays throughout the day.

Four or five workers, to be paid two dollars an hour, will be recruited by advertisement to man the phones. The Services Commission has budgeted $1060 to run the bureau.

Last year SAC received approximately $400 from the U of T administration to help fund the bureau. Simcoe Hall cooperated because it reduced the load on their own staff.

This week, Steadman and Flowers plan to request $1200 from administration coordinator of student services Lois Reimer. Rather than augment the service, whatever is received will save SAC money. Last year, says Flowers, the bureau's staff were somewhat inexperienced and the service was inadequately publicized. This year he hopes for improvements in both areas.

Steadman intends to carry the bureau one step further and act as an unofficial ombudsman for students. He feels such a service is needed because the university does not have an ombudsman.

Capitalist "welfare bums"-major issue: Lewis

By HELEN GOSS

David Lewis, federal NDP leader, lashing out at "corporate welfare bums" pledged to the party's provincial council yesterday to make taxation the major issue in the upcoming federal election campaign.

The long-awaited tax reform bill, according to Lewis, worsened the lot of the average Canadian while leaving corporate taxes untouched. The corporations sighed with relief after seeing the new law, he said, quoting Stelco's annual report that "the new law is not expected to have any direct effect on Stelco's operation." He noted that personal income taxes will go up 3% as of Jan. 1, 1973.

"Deferred taxes," through which corporations can withhold taxes due indefinitely, were denounced by Lewis as a "corporate community chest-most of which is coming from hard-working Canadians." The council applauded when he spoke of "improvised corporate directors driving to Ottawa in Lincoln Continentals to collect dough amounting to hundreds of millions."

He emphasized that he was not talking about small businesses but about giant corporations. Up until the end of 1968, the total amount of deferred taxes was $3.6 billion. At the same time, the total budget of the Department of Health and Welfare, including all social assistance programs with the exception of old age security payments, was only $2.6 billion-one billion less than is owing in deferred taxes.

He pointed out that six corporations accounted for one-third of all deferred taxes — Inco-$238 million, Stelco-$161 million, Bell Canada-$224 million, Alcan-$132 million, Dofasco-$104 million and Imperial Oil-$144 million.

"The government provides the corporations with the loopholes and the corporations provide the Liberals and Conservatives with the money for their election campaigns," he said, adding, "They both hold hands in your pockets."

While Lewis' hard-hitting speech was enthusiastically received, some party members criticized him for not taking a strong socialist position. The position of the left dissidents is that increasing corporate taxation would act like a band-aid.

Until the basic structures of society are changed, they say, the problems that concern Lewis — poverty, unequal distribution of wealth, and the corporate rip-off of the people, will continue.

Prof invents recyclable plastic commercial rights assigned to UofT

A non-pollutant plastic has been developed by James Guillet, a U of T chemistry professor. The new plastic reduces pollution by disintegrating gradually into a powder which can be attacked by bacteria and converted into carbon dioxide and water.

This process is achieved by introducing a light sensitive chemical into the long chain of plastic molecules. When the chemical absorbs ultra violet light from the unfiltered rays of the sun, the chain breaks. However, plastic is unaffected by artificial light or sunlight filtered through glass. The time for the process of disintegration can be adjusted during production.

The chief advantage of the plastic, known as Ecolyte, is that it will automatically recycle into the earth. Thus, it offers a partial solution to the garbage disposal and litter problems. Since Ecolyte is stable, it can be safely used for food packaging.

Guillet has assigned all rights and titles to Ecolyte to the University of Toronto. In turn U of T has granted Ecoplastics a world licence. Ecoplastics signed an agreement in May 1971 with a Dutch company granting it the right to manufacture Ecolyte.

SAC circuit*INFORMATION SERVICE

The Students' Administrative Council this year will be providing an extensive information service to students. The service will be run out of the S.A.C. office, but information will be made available to Scarborough and Erindale students through their own student governments as well. During orientation, a booth will also be set up in Sid Smith (100 St. George St.), so that a broader scope of the campus is served. On September 7, 8, 11, 12, various organizations will be setting up tables to provide information to the student body. If you are interested in an organization, chances are you'll find them at Sid Smith on those days. It will be a chance to meet the people who are most intimately involved with student clubs and associations.

In conjunction with the information service, there will be a liaison resource person available to handle any bureaucratic problems or difficulties experienced on campus. Any difficulties may be reported to the S.A.C. office (either in person or by phone). From there, your difficulty can be handled through this office to aid in establishing a satisfactory solution. We hope that if you need information, you call the S.A.C. office (928-4911) or drop in personally (12 Hart House Circle).

DAVID CROMBIE: 12:00 Thurs.

At 12:00 noon on Thursday, September 14, 1972, Mr. David Crombie will be addressing the university community at Convocation Hall. Mr. Crombie has been known as a dynamic, progressive member of the Metro Council. The past three years he has represented Ward 11 (which is the northern part of the City of Toronto). While no one else had declared up to September 1st, it is widely speculated that both Tony O'Donohue (Ward 4) and David Rotenberg (Ward 11) will declare their candidacy. Mr. Crombie has been very co-operative to take time out to appear on campus. Issues such as public transit, downtown development, and community development are pertinent to all students, whether or not you are from the Toronto area. This shapes up to be the most dramatic municipal election in recent history. Be sure to hear David Crombie, mayoralty candidate speak on the coming municipal election. This forum is to take place Thursday, September 14 at Convocation Hall at 12:00 noon. This is the first of many S.A.C. forums planned for this year.

LEGAL AID

On the second floor of 44 St. George St. is located the Campus Legal Aid Centre. The centre, run by funds obtained from the S.A.C., provides a wide range of legal counsel and advice. One of the main areas of concern is the landlord-tenant act, since many legal difficulties emanate from abuse of this piece of legislation. The centre is run by student volunteers from the Faculty of Law, whose time and dedication allow the programme to continue to operate. Never feel that any difficulty is too minor to handle. In fact, much of their work is processing legal forms for various purposes. In an effort to provide added service this year, a lawyer is being commissioned to aid the centre for a few hours per week. Such an effort will provide added expertise to the facilities already available.

If ever you need legal help, the Campus Legal Aid Centre is here to help you. It is on the second floor of 44 St. George St. The Phone number is 928-6447.

VARSIY BOARD

The Varsity, although it receives a large grant from SAC, has consistently strived to maintain its independence from the Council's influences. To help achieve this end, the Varsity Board of Directors was created. Its purposes, as outlined in the SAC constitution, are to oversee the financial workings of the paper and to mediate complaints concerning the paper's editorial integrity. In the past, there have been many objections to The Varsity's content. However, seldom have these been voted to any of the legitimate avenues of communication with the paper, i.e. the Editor, the Staff or the Varsity Board. Members of the community are encouraged to forward their criticisms to any of these people.

The Varsity Board is in the midst of reconstruction. If proposed changes are passed at this Wednesday's SAC meeting, the Board will have the following composition:

- 5 positions appointed by SAC
- 1 position appointed by the Graduate Students' Union
- 1 position appointed by the President of the University
- 1 position appointed by the U of T Faculty Association
- 1 position appointed by the support staff
- the Editor
- the Post Editor
- 1 position elected by the Varsity staff
- 2 positions appointed by the board itself

APPOINTMENTS:

SAC currently has 4 positions open on the Varsity Board. Applications should be sent to Debra Lewis, Communications Commissioner, SAC office, no later than Friday, 22nd September.

PUB: what happened?

The SAC Services Commission had hoped to operate a licenced area in the Sid Smith Plaza from September 11th to September 29th. However, due to the Licencing Board's refusal to grant a licence (it is illegal to temporarily licence an outdoor area) the project has been cancelled.

Last year by cheating a little, we were able to set up the pub--this year they caught up with us. The Services Commission is currently investigating possibilities for a permanent pub. If you have any ideas, contact Bill Steadman, Services Commissioner.

No responsible community role to play

Sewell damns students at St. Mike's forum

By PHILIP FISCHER and ALEX SHEVCHUK

Reform Alderman John Sewell told about 40 students last Thursday that they can't play a responsible role in the communities in which they live.

The Ward 7 alderman told a St. Michael's College orientation forum that lofty ideals, a tendency to transcendence and disinterest prevent students from developing a true sense of community values.

Unless someone has lived in a community for a number of years, he doesn't really have a stake in it, he said. The only people he trusted were working class and over 30.

"This is just a fact of life we have to accept."

However, there are a lot of "juicy" issues that students can get their teeth into, he added. One of these is the University of Toronto's policy of tearing down habitable buildings in order to qualify for construction grants.

Sewell, smartly attired in a French underground jacket and visibly worn jeans, appeared relaxed as he answered students' questions such as "Who is my alderman?"

In a more serious vein, Sewell said that he is afraid that people are losing control of their communities. Over the objections of many citizens, the pro-development City Council, led by Alderman David Rotenberg, has continually approved street widenings and high-rise re-zoning applications.

He stated that such issues affect residents much more than matters dealt with at the provincial or federal levels. To Sewell, garbage collection was of more immediate concern than Canada's diplomatic relations with China.

When asked about the upcoming Dec. 4 municipal election, Sewell predicted that only six or seven "closely-knit" reform candidates would be elected to the 23 seat City Council.

He also predicted that Rotenberg would lose his bid for mayor. When asked who would be a viable alternative for mayor, Sewell quipped, "Try Tony O'Donohue, I guess, because he's stupid."

Neither Rotenberg nor O'Donohue have yet announced plans to contest the mayoralty, but both are expected to in the near future.

Students cannot develop a true sense of community spirit, claims Alderman John Sewell

Prairie councils call for national student union

OTTAWA (CUP) — Canadian student council representatives will meet in early November to attempt to initiate a new national student union, following several nationwide meetings during the summer. But it appears that major support for the new organization comes from western Canada, with little interest in Ontario and almost none in the Maritimes. The new organization would either replace or resurrect the now-defunct Canadian Union of Students (CUS) which collapsed in 1969, amid charges that it had adopted too radical a political stance.

A preliminary meeting at the University of Windsor in May set the ball rolling, with the formation of a national steering committee, mandated to solicit proposals for the new union and write a draft constitution.

Delegates from Ontario's larger universities questioned the feasibility of establishing a national organization and said they preferred to consolidate and improve the fledgling Ontario Federation of Students (OFS), which was formed last spring.

Few representatives from the Atlantic provinces attended the Windsor conference, while the main protagonists for a national union were delegates from Simon Fraser University, the University of Saskatchewan (Regina campus), the University of Manitoba, and the host University of Windsor.

At a conference of prairie student councils in Regina on July 14-16, representatives from eight universities and technical institutes agreed that a national students' union is the best vehicle for tackling problems that face students.

Only the University of Saskatchewan opposed this resolution. Delegates passed a statement of principles listing priorities in forming a new union, although no delegation had the power to commit its students' union to definite plans.

The prairie schools indicated a regional association will be organized even if a national body is not established.

Meanwhile, plans for the November conference are well behind schedule.

Bruce Cameron, president of the Carleton University Students' Association and a member of the national steering committee for the new union, said the committee had hoped to have a preliminary draft of a constitution sent to member councils by now, but the person drafting the document at Simon Fraser was tied up working for the New Democratic Party in the recent British Columbia election.

"By our original timetable we had hoped to have a draft constitution sent out, feedback returned, and a new document produced, on which councils could have then mandated delegates to act upon in november," he said in an interview.

"Now I don't know how successful this timetable is going to be." Cameron noted "a certain amount of arrogance" among Ontario university student councillors toward the idea of a national organization.

"In Ontario, there's a feeling that we've got to get OFS off the ground, and in dealing with the Wright report, we find the national issues tie in anyway, and there's a certain amount of arrogance that we can do it ourselves," he added.

There's a feeling that national issues can be dealt with by Ontario as Ontario, and with only informal relations with other provinces." Cameron added that the Maritime provinces were "very suspicious" about anything happening west of the New Brunswick border.

The problem with the Atlantic provinces is that the universities are now in a fairly conservative state and are suspicious of CUS and anything like it."

Cameron asserted that the November conference will probably see an organization form with representatives from most provinces.

Indications are that conferences will take place in Ottawa, but final plans have not been made. Steering committee members are chasing various sources of funding, including the federal government.

Originally, students planned the conference in Toronto during the annual meeting of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, but apparently they now want the new union to be born free of administration connections. Another factor in the move from Hogtown is a disastrous national conference on university financing held there in July.

Oppositions mounts

OFS launches campaign against fee increases

By KRISTINE KING

As Ontario post-secondary students return to classes, a major campaign is being organized among students and the public to oppose the provincial government's increase of tuition fees.

Last spring, Colleges and Universities Minister George Kerr announced that all college and university fees would be increased by $100. At the same time, nursing schools began charging fees and residence for the first time, and graduate fees were increased by about $400.

The vehicle being used for organization of the campaign is the newly-formed Ontario Federation of Students, successor to the Ontario Union of Students.

OFS consists of the membership of 18 student councils. It was founded just after the announcement of a scheduled fees increase last March. Although OFS was intended to place more emphasis upon communication between its members and less emphasis on political activity, it has since found it necessary to plunge into direct political action.

The 18 student council members of OFS held two meetings over the summer to discuss the situation and pass various resolutions. In order for resolutions to become OFS policy, a majority of local councils must later pass them.

In the second general meeting held July 24 at OISE, the OFS rejected the concept of a September fees strike which was proposed at the earlier meeting in June at Guelph. This stand was felt to be too militant as it would endanger students' registration. Fees must be paid prior to registration at most universities and colleges.

At this time the OFS decided to encourage a province-wide study day in October 10 followed by a two day referendum in which Ontario post-secondary students will decide whether to protest the increased tuition costs by a second term fees strike. Nearly two-thirds of the 18-member councils had preferred this method of fighting the province, while only two councils favoured the immediate strike.

The campaign was introduced at the individual student level by a mailing of 50,000 pamphlets asking students to pay their tuition fees in two installments. Thus the option of opposing the Ontario government by withholding second installment due in January, is left open.

The OFS education campaign specifically focusses on two demands:

- deferral of the tuition fee increase until there has been full consultation of affected groups about the financing of post-secondary education, and the final report of the province's Commission on Post-Secondary Education has been released (expected, in November) so that Ontario Student Awards Program regulations be amended to facilitate greater student access to the program, including eligibility of part-time students, lowering of the loan ceiling from $800 to its former level of $600, and reducing the age at which students are considered to be independent of their parents from 25.

OFS members have presented these demands in meetings with government officials.

On July 26 five student members of the OFS executive committee including Eric Miglion, OFS treasurer and U of T SAC President, met with Ontario's Minister to these demands of Colleges and Universities George Kerr. Kerr's response to these demands was a flat and unequivocal "no", but he made a personal commitment to keep fees from increasing in the future.

The OFS feels that there is more at stake than a $100 fee increase: the threat of further more substantial increases, which will continually lesser the low-income student's accessibility to higher education in Ontario.

OFS also met with Gordon Parr, Chairman of the Committee on University Affairs. It had scheduled an appointment with Darcy McKeough, Provincial Treasurer, but he resigned from his post just before the meeting was scheduled, last Thursday.

One result from the OFS confrontations with the government is that the age at which students are considered to independent of their parents has been lowered to 24 from the previous 25 years. This tidbit has failed to placate OFS, however.

OFS met with the executive of the Ontario Federation of Labour at which time the OFL endorsed their support of OFS demands. The OFL will send representatives for campus study days October 10.

The study day will play a crucial part in discussing the strategy to be taken in January. OFS intends to encourage students not to attend classes on this date so that they will familiarize themselves with the issue. Students will be able to hear and talk to various speakers and groups on their campuses.

Not all Ontario post-secondary educational institutions are members of OFS. The Universities of Windsor, McMaster, Brock and Waterloo Lutheran have yet to join the organization.

In the first general meeting of OFS, the University of Ottawa and Laurentian University were adamant in their support of an immediate fees strike. The University of Ottawa later withdrew from the federation because it felt that the stand being taken then was insufficiently strong (There is a higher proportion of students from low-income families attending both Ottawa and Laurentian.)

Other universities are more actively involved in the OFS campaign. The University of Toronto Students' Administrative Council printed and sent out its own copy of the pamphlet urging students to pay in two installments.

The York University student council, made the OFS education campaign a part of their orientation, discussing the importance of opposing the government's fees increase.

Loyola College survives, but will merge with SGWU

MONTEAL (CUPI) — Loyola College of Montreal won a fight to ensure its continued existence during the summer after the institution's students, faculty, and administration hoined forces to oppose acceptance of a report by the Québec Council of Universities (QCU).

Education Minister Francois Cloutier announced in mid July he would not follow the QCU recommendations which called for the phasing out of university level instruction at Loyola by 1975. The recommendations were based on expected space requirements of the college compared with those of other post-secondary institutions in the area. It was suggested the facilities be turned over to a French speaking community college (CEGEP).

After announcing Loyola's new lease of life, the Quebec government entered the merger negotiations already underway between Loyola and Sir George Williams University (SGWU). Cloutier said the QCU report did not take human factors into account. The uniqueness and assets of Loyola were heavily stressed in protests mounted after the report was leaked to the Montreal Star July 5. By July 10 the opposition movement had gelled into a highly organized mechanism.

The minister's announcement followed meetings he held with Loyola president Patrick Malone and student representatives.

During the short campaign the movement charged the QCU with irresponsibility and unfairness. Malone said statistics used in the 37 page document were inaccurate.

"They're set down to make a case," he charged.

The Loyola Students Association started a massive campaign to obtain support in the Montreal community. Information booths were set up at major shopping plazas to collect 30,000 signatures on a petition to be set to Cloutier protesting the recommendations.

Expressions of support came from other student unions in the Montreal area, as well as from other sectors of the city community.

It appears the public protest forced the government to make a quick decision on the report, which critics condemned for jeopardizing the SGWU-Loyola negotiations in progress since 1969.

The first tripartite merger meeting held August 15 merely brought the government up to date on the situation. A joint statement released afterwards said the Education department will have put together the main elements of the file that the Minister of Education wishes to receive before he announces more specifically the government's views regarding the creation of a new university.

vice-provost (Student Services), Rankin vice-president — Business Affairs, and Stone assistant vice-president. Each will work with the appropriate Governing Council committee.

Twice acting president Sword gets moved down the hall to become vice-president — Institutional Relations and Planning. His functions include acting as the company representative at official gatherings and planning long-range policy.

These appointments involve establishment of a new division — Institutional Relations and Planning — and simplified designations for existing administrative areas.

The OUA A Football League has been rearranged for the 1972-73 season. Last year the league was divided into two sections, with two divisions in each section. After Laurentian University decided not to participate in football, the league was reorganized into two sections, with four teams in the east and seven in the west. The Blues will play Carleton, Ottawa, and Queen's in home and away games, while each team in the Western Section will meet the other members of the section once. At the conclusion of the regular schedule, the first-place team in the east will meet the third-place Western Section team in one semi-final game. The other semi-final puts the first-place Western Section team against the second-place team in the west. . . . York Yeomen head coach Nobby Wirkowski had over 30 returning players at training camp this year. These included quarterback Doug Philp and offensive end Steve Ince, an OUA A All Star last year. Wirkowski will be looking to his experienced players to improve on the team's total offence. The Yeomen had the second highest number of interceptions in the OUAA last year and undoubtedly this record will have to be improved if York is to make a play-off berth. . . . men's athletic complex has been built, the University of Toronto Men's Athletic Association will move their offices and activities to that building. Although locker rooms in Hart House will be required for teams using the adjacent playing field, most of the North Wing will be available for new programs.

Redevelopment includes retention of the pool, locker room, showers and squash courts, which with the addition of a sauna would provide on one floor an area devoted to casual athletic programs for both men and women.

The Men's Athletic Association stressed the need for recreational athletics. It expressed doubt that, even with the proposed new men's athletic complex, there would be adequate space to meet this need, and observed that no university of more than 18,000 students on this continent has been able to meet the demand for physical recreation. This argument suggests that even with a new men's athletic complex there would still be an important use for the gymnasium in Hart House, not as an overflow area for organized programs but as the home of more casual athletic recreation.

"In view of the cost of renovation and in consideration of the general demand for physical recreation, it appears desirable to proceed experimentally in the North Wing. When the Men's Athletic Association moves out, a certain amount of space now used for business offices would be released for other uses, but the main gymnasium, pool and locker—shower areas should be used for new programs of recreational athletics. At the end of a trial period of about five years, an assessment of the success of and need for the program should be made. If, at that time, the use of the North Wing for casual athletics appears less important than the redevelopment suggested by the Board of Stewards, the plans for remodelling can be implemented.

"Our sixth recommendation is that, when the Men's Athletic Association moves into its new premises, the Board of Stewards arrange to use the north wing for casual athletic programs which should be co-educational and that at the end of a trial period of not longer than five years the use of the north wing be re-examined by the Board of Stewards."

Although the decision has finally been made to build a new complex, Hart House will still have to meet the men's athletic needs for the immediate future.

York Yeomen challenge Blues tonight

By PAUL CARSON

Something old, something new, something borrowed, and it should add up to a good night for the Blues in the season's opener at 8 pm against our northern neighbours, York Yeomen, on the artificial turf of the CNE Stadium.

The old are the veterans, particularly all-Canadian quarterback Wayne Dunkley and a corps of speedy, effective receivers. The new are perhaps the finest collection of high school grads the Varsity coaching staff has ever seen. The borrowed is the single wing, a venerable passing formation made popular by former Varsity athletic director Warren Stevens when he introduced the forward pass to Canada in 1931.

Games against York used to be little more than a heavy workout however, this year's edition of the Yeomen have size, experience and the ability to score points—many points. York opened its season Saturday, trampling RMC 48-0, and according to Varsity head coach Ron Murphy, the score is an accurate reflection of York's improvement.

"York has an excellent football team," Murphy said after the game. "Most of their key players are back from last year, and they have the additional advantage of already playing one real game compared to our practice scrimmages."

Due to the numerous graduations among offensive linemen, Dunkley will probably have to throw frequently until the running game slowly comes into shape. Key receivers should be sophomore Barry Wagdin, who sparked last year's comeback against York, plus Dave Quick, John Raimey, Brent Elsey, and Libert Castillo.

Dave Quick moves into tight end, replacing veteran Stew MacSween who's returned to the defensive secondary where he starred for two years before making the switch to offense in 1971. Two other familiar names from the offensive backfield, Cor Doret and Guido lantorno, will also spend most of the 1972 campaign on defense, but since turnabout is always fair play, defensive tackle Jake Lipsett has traded roles and is now working as an offensive guard.

Murphy and his assistants Dave Copp, Tom Watt, John McManus and Doug Wyles hope that tonight's game will provide some answers to their lineup problems in time for this weekend's home opener against University of Ottawa.

Forty-nine candidates are still in the race for the twenty-four starting positions, but versatility and depth can certainly compliment, but never replace, solid ability among the members of the starting units.

The football Blues have never lost to York, although last year Varsity needed three touchdowns in the final quarter to gain a 24-12 victory.

Looking back on the past two weeks of rugged training, Murphy expects his team to be ready for tonight's activities.

"We have excellent personnel and without doubt the smartest group of rookies I've ever coached. Also, we've been lucky since there are relatively fewer injuries compared to past years."

So far, most of the publicity has focused on Wayne Dunkley, the fourth-year PHE student who is unquestionably the key to Blues' offensive strategy.

Shaking off a painful ankle injury late in the 1971 season, he completed a phenomenal 60 passes in the final two games against Queens as Blues narrowly missed the playoffs.

Perhaps that's why there are no traditional starting rosters for tonight's game. As Murphy said after a recent practice, "with so many positions up for grabs we will be doing a lot of substituting and experimentation."

Offensively, speedy veteran Paul Kitchin has shown well as a running back behind the blocking of rookie tackles Jim Blainey and Mike Sokovnin.

Blues practice last week on the back playing field for tonight's exhibition game against York.

Sokovnin is also in the wide-open race to replace last year's standout kicker Donny Thomson who hasn't fully recovered from that serious knee injury in Kingston.

With so many excellent rookies and the extensive lineup juggling that's been a feature of most practices to date, it's both unfair and virtually impossible to single out many players for special attention. However, interfac fans might watch for former Vic half-back Aarne Kartna who's raised several coaching eyebrows with his outstanding broken field running on the kickoff and punt return teams.

Defensively, it's three familiar faces and rookie Ken Hussey on the front four. Veterans Jim Nicoletti, Nick Grittani and massive Walt Dudar all are looking over their shoulders apprehensively since some changes must be made when svelt Jim Orfanakos comes off the injury list. Orf was orphaned for his finest training camp before defensive end Jon Dellandrea stepped on his ankle during a scrimmage.

Linebacking is again solid with returnees Hartley Stern and Bob Bloxham, and 1970 all-star Peter McNabb should be back to his old form.

McNabb, who sat out most of last season following a freak injury in the York game, is temporarily sidelined with a pulled hamstring, but he should be ready for Ottawa on Saturday.

Blues' prospects look bright, as the talent and coaching are first-rate and if Murphy could dress all the capable rookies, who knows how high the scoring could get. Realistically, if Varsity can eliminate the perennial problems of injuries and foolish penalties, we could be in store for three playoff games at the Stadium.

But that is the future. The present is York and kickoff is eight o'clock at the CNE.

BLUES NOTES: Murphy was unable to get any practice time on the artificial turf but apparently York has encountered similar problems . . . veteran trainer Howie Ringham doesn't expect many problems with the footing since most Varsity players are already using the rubber cleats; however, Ringham says, he does foresee numerous painful arm and leg burns from sliding along the turf . . . assistant trainer Ed Armstrong and student manager Sandy Henderson are also back for another year . . . several former Varsity players such as John Chapman, Walt Schr and Vic Albino are involved in the Toronto Touch Football League which is packed with former CFL stars.

Hart House to be replaced

New facilities planned for men's athletics on Harbord

By BOB GAUTHIER

A new $6,000,000 men's athletic building will be constructed on the south side of Harbord Street to the west of the Benson Building.

According to the U of T Bulletin "It is hoped that the building will be ready for use in September 1974." However Athletic Directorate President Dr. G. E. Wodehouse said that this date is "unrealistic. It will be three or four years at least", he said. "Underground construction will have to be done and a detailed engineering letter was sent out to the consultants last week." Wodehouse said that the future of the Spadina Expressway may also affect the construction of the new building.

The sports complex will have 110,000 square feet of usable space, with some facilities shared by the Benson Building.

"This is 70,000 square feet less of usable space than was suggested in 1967," said Wodehouse. The building will include a new gymnasium, a 50 meter, eight lane Olympic swimming pool, with one, three and five meter diving facilities; squash and handball courts, rooms for boxing, wrestling and other forms of exercise, showers, and administrative space.

The present site of the new building is owned by the university, with the major part being presently used as a parking lot. Construction may necessitate demolition of three buildings on Spadina Avenue which are currently being used for academic offices. The new building and the Benson Building will be combined in some manner, but "it will be difficult to join them physically from the west side", added Wodehouse.

A portion of the $6,000,000 cost of the building will have to be raised through public subscription. Wodehouse said that member of the Governing Council C. Mackenzie King is the provincial appointee charged with the raising of funds. At the present time $1,000,000 is available from the provincial government on the condition that the new complex is open to the premier's office. Wodehouse explained that although King was in charge of fund-raising, "all of us will be asked to help raise money". Wodehouse said that the sale of Connaught Laboratories by the university "does not affect the new building. It only affects the university as a whole."

The new facilities will be almost solely for the use of the university community. "We expect the building to be used to capacity, with some weekend use of the building on a free basis" said Wodehouse. There will be no extension of the facilities to the surrounding community. "There will probably be some public things," said Wodehouse, "but it's doubtful we'd throw the doors open."

"Hart House will be used to a greater extent by faculty, staff and support staff, although this requires amendments to the 'tradition' of Hart House", asserted Wodehouse.

However, the north wing of Hart House, which has been almost the sole centre for men's athletics and other recreational purposes since 1920 is inadequate. The present gym is not of regulation size, the swimming pool is far below standards required for swimming competitions, and it doesn't provide for high-diving.

Hart House will continue to be used for voluntary mixed athletics outside the organized programs of the School of Physical and Health Education for the Men's and Women's Athletic Association.

"There will be no reinstatement of a first year compulsory athletics program", Wodehouse said. "I'm in favour of getting rid of any regulation which can't be supported on a concrete basis", he said. "The first year compulsory program was discontinued because of the lack of facilities at Hart House. The women's athletic department dropped its equivalent regulation two years ago."

The Board of Governors made the decision on the new athletic complex following several surveys and reports which indicated the pressing need for new facilities. The board reported that the university's indoor teams had to hold their intercollegiate home games outside the campus due to the lack of proper facilities.

The Board of Governor's decision is the conclusion to a series of events which began in the early 1960's with the first User's Committee Report on Hart House. In 1962 the report indicated that the university was in dire need of expanded athletic facilities.

In 1969 the proposals for a new athletic facilities building received top priority. However, none of the money for university capital expenditure for that year was slated for athletics. The same year a feasibility study on the Second User's Committee Report was completed and sent to the Property Committee of the Board of Governors.

The Report of the Presidential Advisory Committee on the Future Role of Hart House added further stimulus for the construction of the new complex.

Completed in May 1971, the report stated in part that "... Hart House was built to serve the needs of a community less than a quarter the size of the present University. Any realistic assessment of the future of the House will involve considerations of space."

"The first area of concern is the athletic side of the house. . . . At present the North Wing of the House, used as the main centre of the men's athletic program of the University, is totally inadequate for this purpose. The need for new athletic facilities has been fully documented in reports of other committees and we are confident that the University will move with all possible haste to build a new men's athletic complex."

"We understand that when a new Administration-run day care accepted

By ERIC MILLS

The Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council Monday recommended a proposal which left the running of the university's future day care centre almost entirely up to the U of T administration.

The committee adopted a proposal by vice-provost Robin Ross that left an "Advisory Committee on Programmes", half composed of parents, only the power to run a volunteer aid programme and to decide on admissions. However, even this power of admissions has been limited, as the Governing Council has excluded anyone not connected to the university, and said admission should be on the basis of personal and financial need. As well, the committee Monday decided that children now using the present Campus Co-Op centre on Devonshire Place, the St. Andrew's University Day Nursery, the Charles St. (Married Students' Residence) Day Nursery and the Sussex centre should have first priority in the new centre.

Other than these limited powers, the advisory committee could only advise the university administration on how to run the centre. A second model drawn up by Ross which would have let the parents of the users run it, subject only to Governing Council policy, was defeated 4-3. In this plan, the parents of the children using the centre would have been required to pay half the costs of renovating and equipping the Devonshire building, estimated by a contractor at $57,000.

Under the recommended plan, the university will pay $42,000 for renovation and the parents will have to foot the $15,000 equipment bill in addition to subsequent operating costs, estimated at $53,000 annually.

Some of the users will likely be eligible for municipal subsidies, but even the university, said Ross, has been unable so far to determine what the rules regarding subsidies are. Bob Davis, a parent and member of the Campus Co-Op group occupying the clubhouse behind the Meteorology Building, told the committee that few children get subsidies, and that the process of obtaining them is difficult.

The first model was accepted by the St. Andrew's nursery, who said in a letter to the committee that they believed "both models provide for full involvement of parents in the development and routine running of day care programs. They assumed "the university acts in good faith" and in fact were pleased that the proposal would relieve them of responsibility for "administrative functions."

Even committee chairman Paul Cadario admitted "there's a difference between parental involvement and control."

The decision represents a further defeat for the Campus Co-Op Operative Day Care group, whose basic principle of running day care is that the parents should be in complete control. However, Davis points out that the real battle was lost last week when the committee rejected the recommendation of a university day care advisory board that there be separate centres for each of St. Andrew's and Campus Co-Op. The decision to have only one centre means that groups with sharply conflicting philosophies of day care must be combined.

Chairman Cadario cut off debate whenever the issue of philosophies came up. "I don't think we need concern ourselves with that," he said at one point after Marnie Paikin had asked how parents could decide whether to register their children "when they don't know how it will be run".

Another occasion, Norma

This occupation of Simcoe Hall led to the first day care centre. Now another occupation has won another one — but university-run. For more on day care, see pages 4, 6 and 7.

Grindal asked the committee to realize they were dealing with two different groups. Cadario stopped discussion with: "we are discussing policy, not specific people or groups."

Committee member Ian Morrison told Cadario that how the centre was to be run "was made an issue by those who are now using day care, and you are trying to pretend they don't exist."

The decision means that the demand for places in the centre will probably, far exceed the 50 places available. Davis told the committee that the eligible children from St. Andrew's and Campus Co-Op total 49, and that there are many at the St. Charles St. nursery eligible.

The advisory committee on the centre will be composed of seven parents of users; one representative each from SAC, GSU, Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students (APUS), University of Toronto Staff Association (UTSA), U of T Faculty Association (UTFA), Internal Affairs Committee and the labour unions on campus and a non-voting assessor from the administration. Until the university officially runs the centre, the parents' representatives will be protom appointments. There will be two each from the St. Andrew's, Charles St. and Campus Co-Op over two centres, and one from the Campus Co-op under two centre on Sussex St.

The committee's recommendation now goes to the Governing Council's Executive Committee, after which it must be ratified by the whole council.

Cadario expects the decision to be passed by the council at its meeting September 21.

"I think it will pass", he said, smiling.

After that, John Wintjes of contracting firm Fairwin Construction estimates it could take as long as three months for the necessary renovations to be completed.

Residence requirements clarified

Students can vote: Chief Electoral Officer

OTTAWA (CUP) — University students may vote where they live while at school, if they consider that dwelling their "ordinary residence", Canada's Chief Electoral Officer said yesterday.

The statement by J.M. Hamel appeared to contradict earlier indications that enumerators would hinder students attempting to register to vote in their university constituencies.

"If a student tells the enumerator his ordinary residence is room 105 in a certain university residence, well, that's it," he said.

"We cannot ask any more from a student than we can from any other citizen. We don't ask any other people for proof of age or of citizenship. So we can't ask for proof that a student is really on his own. If a student says he's on his own, then we'll have to accept that."

Under the new Elections Act of 1970 students lost the right to be enumerated in both their parents' home constituencies and in their university ridings. Instead, parliament gave them the right to vote by proxy in their parents' constituency if they couldn't be there on election day.

Regulations from Hamel's office directed enumerators to determine whether students living "away from home" were "on their own." If they were, they could vote in their university riding, but if they lived elsewhere they could be enumerated only at their parents' home.

"All we are asking enumerators to do if they are in doubt is to ask students if they would be willing to take an oath about the location of their ordinary residence if challenged on election day," Hamel said in an interview.

"It's a personal decision a student must make by his own conscience," he added.

In directives sent to local returning officers last January Hamel said "enumerators should be instructed that whenever an occupant of a dwelling describes his occupation as 'student' they should determine which of the four basic situations applies to that person by determining the relationship of that person to the occupants of the dwelling and the nature and frequency of that person's occupancy." (The four situations were married, single living at home, single living away from home, and single on their own.)

The tone of Hamel's instructions indicated enumerators would be scrupulous in ensuring that only students who were financially independent of their parents would be enumerated in university ridings.

But Hamel said today that students would vote in university ridings if they wanted to.

I want to emphasize that we're not going to submit students to a means test," he said.

Local returning officers have contacted university residence officials to determine "which students, if any, should be enumerated," according to Hamel's earlier regulations.

Hamel explained today that the move was designed to save time, and that any student who was not included on the list provided by residence officials would meet an enumerator in a residence common room and get placed on the voters list.

"In Edmonton this morning, we got a report that authorities in a university residence said that 150 students might claim the building as their ordinary residence, but now there will be as many as 700 on the list," he said.

"So residence authorities have nothing to do with the result. They're just saving us the time needed to knock on every residence door and allowing us to allocate the appropriate number of enumerators."

The Election Act itself only mentions students in its section on proxies. All other rulings for student voting are interpretations from Hamel's office.

National New Democratic Party secretary Clifford Scotton said today he is certain students can choose where they want to vote and is unaware of Hamel's memos indicating anything to the contrary.

"I have a daughter at York and I provide support for her but consider her on her own. I expect she will vote there," he said.

The unquestionable right to vote where the student pleases must be established."

Hamel claimed such a principle violates the spirit of the Election Act but that students would not be prevented from considering their university dwelling their ordinary residence if they were willing to swear it on election Day.

War Measures humanitarian: Sharp

Mitchell Sharp, Secretary of State for External Affairs, last week described the use of the War Measures Act in 1970 as "humanitarian."

In an informal visit to The Varsity offices last Friday, Sharp compared Germany's recent action against Arab terrorists to Trudeau's handling of the FLQ crisis.

"It looks as though we handled this pretty well", he said. The Trudeau cabinet took a hard line in negotiating with the FLQ when British Trade Commissioner James Cross was kidnapped on October 5. Five days after Quebec Minister of Labour Pierre Laporte was kidnapped, Trudeau reactivated the War Measures Act, intended strictly for wartime use.

The act curtailed the civil rights of all Canadians in an attempt to aid police forces in capturing the kidnapers. Hundreds of citizens were arrested and many were interned incommunicado for up to three weeks. Several media outlets, including The Varsity, were censored in the name of the act.

Nevertheless, Sharp claimed "it was a very humanitarian way to handle" the crisis. "We got Cross off and captured the terrorists".

He did not mention that Pierre Laporte died the day after the act was invoked.

"Those who have been more critical of us must have second thoughts about what we did," he added. "Obviously we handled this one correctly."

Asked whether he thought the threat of violence in Quebec has dissipated, Sharp responded that there has been "no further trouble". Even former FLQ revolutionary Pierre Vallieres has renounced violence, he pointed out.

Would he advocate using the War Measures Act again in a similar situation?
"I don't know," he replied.

The Varsity - Frank Romano

"Critics of us must have second thoughts."

Grad students urged to fight higher tuition

The Graduate Students Union is waging a campaign against higher tuition fees similar to SAC's campaign for undergraduates.

In an attempt to combat a proposed $392.50 fees hike, the executive of the GSU is asking its members not to pay the full portion of fees now, and to withhold payment of $100 of the second installment of their fees.

This year the graduate students have been hit with the same $100 fees raise that the undergraduates must pay.

The GSU is recommending that the $100 be put in a trust fund to be administered by a trust company, and should be subtracted from the second term fees installment, in January.

In addition, all graduate students studying in the summer, beginning this year, are being charged $292.50 for the summer semester. Previously there was no officially recognized third semester. For the summer of 1973, only, the university is picking up the remainder of the fees, under the name of a special tuition bursary.

Other graduate schools met with the University of Toronto Saturday with a majority showing their support for a strike. Guelph will be taking similar action, while other universities pay fees in different methods and will have to find other approaches to endorse the strike.

All graduate students have been asked to attend a meeting on October 3, 7:30 pm at the GSU, 16 Bancroft Street to discuss the strike. Organizers hope to president Evans and members of the Department of Colleges and Universities on hand.

Contracting out still disputed

Service Employees, university near agreement

By ZOYA STEVENSON

The University of Toronto and the Service Employees International Union Local 504 seem to be close to agreement on a new contract.

The major point of contention still left, according to the union, is a confidential memo circulated among top administrators last May which hinted at considerable job losses would occur on campus among service employees.

A copy of the memo in The Varsity's possession shows that U of T Management-Labour Relations head John Parker, who is also a member of the Governing Council, was to have received it. But Parker denies ever receiving the memo.

At the time, it caused a great furor, and made the threat of a strike very real. To cut operating costs and save $525,000, it proposed layoffs, cutbacks, reduction of working hours, and contracting out work to commercial outfits, most of which are non-unionized. These administrative decisions would have been taken at the expense of union workers.

The union defended their jobs by trying to force the university to ban contracting out. However, in one case, it was already too late. At Erindale, administrators have contracted out jobs to Charterways, a unionized bus company, because apparently they needed new buses and did not have the necessary capital.

Some of the drivers effected by the move, have transferred to Charterways, but in the process have lost their years of seniority accumulated with the university. Some have been given jobs with comparable wages in other departments, and two have taken pay cuts amounting to 35 cents per hour but may get substantial raises when the contract is settled.

Don Barclay, chief negotiator for the SEIU feels he has a responsibility to the workers to prevent this from happening on a wider scale in the future and that a banning of contracting out must be part of any settlement.

Jobs were also phased out at Scarborough College because busing service was cut down. Normal T.T.C. vehicles will now have to replace the major part of busing services for Scarborough students to the St. George campus. Service Union Employees will drive university buses when they run, but have been transferred to work on the grounds most days. None have lost their jobs and none will suffer wage cuts.

So except for monetary issues, which neither Parker or Barclay would discuss, progress is being made. Barclay hopes to conclude negotiations in two weeks.

Quebec NDP settles rift just in time to begin election campaign

By JULES LEBLANC

MONTREAL (QUEBEC-PRESSE) — The internal dispute between the Quebec wing of the NDP and the federal NDP led by David Lewis, which came to the surface last June, showed signs of disappearing in Montreal only eight hours after a Canadian general election was called for October 30.

The leader of the Quebec NDP, Raymond Laliberte, reported this to Quebec-Presse two hours after the end of the party's special two day convention. Approximately 200 people attended the convention, which was called to deal with the conflict.

The crisis was brought on for the most part by the concept of federalism which the Quebec NDP advocated, in particular the distribution of power between Ottawa and the provinces. Disagreement also arose over the more or less implicit understanding that Quebec will one day be independent. A third area of dispute revolved around the autonomy of the Quebec wing, and the possibility of it establishing a separate programme to take to the electorate.

On this last point Raymond Laliberte was explicit: the convention had shown without doubt that it was up to him to formulate his own electoral platform. However, he was aware enough of the situation to know that federal elections were imminent, and this probably determined his actions. Contrary to expectation no serious rupture occurred and no great debate on alignment shook the convention which finished two and a half hours later than expected.

With regard to "independence", the official platform of the Quebec NDP will continue to emphasize the necessity for building "a new society" — something which the national NDP doesn't object to. However, the latter wishes to add "and a new country" — a plank which those attending the convention refused to ratify.

On the other hand the national NDP was startled to see a sentence which began with the words "When Quebec independence occurs..." It wished to replace it with "However if the country splits into two..." The convention kept the initial wording.

One noteworthy resolution — "It is necessary to be ready for independence, but it doesn't have to be encouraged" — was scheduled to be discussed at a later convention.

As for the controversy over the division of powers between Ottawa and the provinces, the federal NDP statement was very vague. The Quebec convention finished discussion on an eventual reduction of federal spending and of Ottawa's powers in the areas not specifically reserved for the provinces in the constitution. However, the decision that the provinces must have the desired power to retain the initiative in the social and economic spheres was opposed by the federal NDP.

With these exceptions, the Quebec NDP accepted the statements of the federal NDP, sometimes with minor changes.

At the end of the convention, Raymond Laliberte reiterated that there were other points of disagreement between the Quebec NDP and the federal branch of the party. However, he had no opposition to the leadership of the federal party. The possibility for some disagreements was furthermore foreseen by the NDP federal constitution.

Admin plan throttles Devonshirites

Self-righteously congratulating itself on drafting this university's non-policy on daycare, the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee may have painted the final touches on one of the most sordid chapters in U of T's history — its refusal and then begrudging acceptance of some form of social responsibility.

Backed into a corner where realistically they could do little else than offer some support for daycare, the architects of the university's proposal have scripted a document that manages to pay token acknowledgment to the day care principle while sheffing the people who precipitated their action.

The plan calls for university renovation of the Devonshire site now occupied (without university consent) by the Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centre Number 2 and establishment in it of a university-run day care centre with room for 50 children, one more than the total eligible children now attending Campus Co-op 2 and St. Andrew's Day Care.

The scheme doesn't specifically call for the eviction of the Devonshirites. It merely, in the shortsightedness that is characteristic of bureaucracies, overlooks & or so they would like us to believe — the fact that the building is now occupied.

The proposed centre, displacing the Devonshire centre by its formation, would have a 14-member advisory board composed of seven parents and seven university community representatives, but would be administered on a day-to-day basis by the university officials and would not allow the Devonshire parents to continue their high level of involvement in determining what kind of day care their children receive.

Many of these parents occupying Simcoe Hall in the spring of 1970 first forced the administration to take a stand on day care. The shock and resentment resulting from the first occupation of a U of T building and then-president Claude Bissels's surrender to student demands for use of a building for a day care centre never gave away. They couldn't just forget its existence, what with the centre located on nearby Sussex Street.

Things would probably not have worsened terribly had not the day care children, sin of sins, grow somewhat old with age, old enough that the province's day care guidelines required them to be separated from their under-two playmates. This aging sickness precipitated the parent's request for an unused clubhouse the university had had recently acquired.

When Simcoe Hall replayed the 1970 game with them (months of unproductive, insincere meetings and discouragement dressed in poor excuses), the parents finally resorted to a replay of their 1970 strategy — but with a difference. They occupied the site that supposedly was unavailable. Not surprisingly, they found it empty and unused.

Still scarred from the first day care capitulation and fresh from the wares with students opposing the restrictive stack access policy for the Roberts Library, the Simcoe Hall mandarins stayed their hand. They neither sought the occupiers' eviction (it can be pretty brutal, they probably realized, to try to drag out two year-old children even if you do it in the early hour morning hours), nor legitimized their occupancy by giving them the building's use. Instead, they waited, hoping the occupiers would tire of their struggle and leave the building unattended just long enough for the campus police stationed outside it to rush in and lock the parents and children out.

With time running out and the incoming Governing Council expected to be more sensitive to the university's social responsibilities, the administrators needed another ploy. Their vehicle, similar to that used by governments in appointing royal commissions, was to appoint a Day Care Advisory Board.

"But Seymour... You can't take Bhd 200 — Advanced Blockbuilding because you failed Ddl 100 — Elementary Dribbling Last year. Now, if you had taken our Remedial Bedwetting you could take your prerequisite Tantrum 150, which would..."

But, even this failed as the Independent board recommended that the first phase of the university's day care policy should be to provide required space for the existing day care centres serving the university, Campus Co-op and St. Andrew's.

The only recourse left to the administration was to assemble its big whigs for the fight in the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee and have them convince the governors to ignore the proposals which would create a minimum of two day care centres and threaten to reward trespassing.

They succeeded, even though traditional conservatives like committee member Gus Abols, a former SAC president, came out in favor of initially responding to the immediate needs of the existing centres.

Vice-provost (student services) Robin Ross, campus co-ordinator Lois Reimer, and committee chairman Peul Cadario managed to fend off that whim, delaying action until a later meeting for which they could muster all their altruistic arguments about there being no point in dealing with specifics when a general, long-term policy was needed.

Not surprising, that Ross and Reimer were the administration officials who had been reportedly been most uncooperative about the day care requests. And, in return, the angry, impetuous parents had launched a counter-offensive to provoke a decision being made, including obstructing both Ross and Reimer's entrance to their offices on at least one occasion.

As for Cadario, an ambitious student governor, the university's social responsibility has never been one of his top priorities, notably not so during his stint last year as SAC's tight-fisted finance commissioner challenging most council grants to external groups.

And, when four of this year's SAC executive wrote a confidential letter to Governing Council chairman C. Mallin Harding recommending Cadario for the chairmanship of the Internal Affairs Committee, they assured him that the council need not worry about any radical Cadario leanings.

"In the face of strong opposition from certain interest groups, Peul supported a day-care policy advocating the provision of facilities to those members of the university community most in need. There would be no special consideration, he argued, to any group being a claim for day-care on precedent, previous support, or unlawful occupation and intimidation position; he has supported it persuasively and in many cases he has supported it successfully," president Eric Miglin, vice-president Ross Flowers, university commissioner John Creelman, and services commissioner Bill Steedmen wrote.

"The whip will be cracked whenever there's trouble from Campus Co-op," he told a few friends one evening this summer.

With this attitude from the key figures in the committee debate, it's not surprising the committee debate, it's not surprising that the retributive plan to deny the day care parents the type of day care to which danger themselves and their children has been proposed.

His voice rising to a near pitch, governor Fether Kelly, St. Michael's College president, observed, "Negotiating under the duress of having buildings occupied at least reminds me of blackmell." He, like governor John Tory, had sought to have the council if not take a decision on unauthorized use of daycare facilities at least let the administration know how they felt about it. And, neither was very pleased.

Their philosophy and the philosophy perhaps of many of the others who have supported not rewarding the agitation of the occupying parents has been one that will not tolerate appearing to give in to pressure tactics no matter whether one becomes convinced of the justice of the cause to which the tactics are directed (not that Kelly or Tory would likely otherwise accept the co-op demands).

The attitude represented by the proposed policy can at best be described as sincere but misguided and incorrect belief that authority cannot give in to pressure. (After all, the final composition of the Governing Council was effected by the conservative faculties' threat to close down the university if they didn't get their way. And, none of the governors seem quick to insist that their council lacks legitimacy.)

More accurately and less generously, the policy is revealed as an unjust and unreasonable insistence on punishing those who have forced the university to act faster than it was wont on a matter that had been too long ignored.

To play liberal political games about long-range policies is not to hide the pettiness and injustice of attempting to shoo people out one door so they can be reprocessed through another end shaped into the mold the administration has ordained.

Parental/volunteer day care is not necessarily for everyone. Campus Co-op never suggested it should be shoved down the throat of other members of the university community who preferred a less involved program. Similarly, run-of-the-mill day care should not be forced upon progressive parents who want to share in their children's upbringing and inculcate different values in them. Yet, that is what an administration-run, parent-advised day care centre would be doing to the Campus Co-op children.

The Day Care Advisory Board proposal for university assistance to the existing centres and establishment of additional centres should be implemented. The Governing Council should not be content to let petty feuding between administrators and parents determine their policy.

Regardless of the Governing Council decision, the Devonshire parents have said they will stay put. Should the council or the administration act against them within the framework of its inadequate policy members of the university community should support Devonshire in resisting them.

Can't tell student governors from admin

After a while, I got tired of moping around the refectory, and dropped out of school to find myself. That was three and a half years ago, and this fall I finally gave up and came back to UC.

It's more depressing than ever. All the friends I never had in the refectory have graduated. Worse, I can't even bring myself to sit alone there and reflect on the passing scene, writing letters to newspapers, because the new purple and green paint job gives me a headache.

So, I thought I'd join the college elite in the JCR, but it looks as if they've all been replaced by this ugly new furniture.

I was really happy when The Varsity finally came out Monday, because for a slow and careful reader it provides silent companionship three mornings a week. I can hardly wait till Here and Now gets bigger. Still, each page seemed longer to read, somehow. Funny.

But, what I wanted to write about was the group portrait of the members of the Governing Council. You know, I couldn't tell from the drawings which were the students and which were the faculty or administrators.

I think that student politics must have really come to a sorry state when that happens. Do you remember the last sentences in Orwell's Animal Farm? The pigs were having a meeting with the neighbouring farmers, the animals' supposed enemies, but the pigs and farmers were really getting along fine, drinking and laughing together. The pigs had long been wearing human clothes. The other animals, peering through the window, looked from the pigs to the humans, and from the humans to the pigs, and found they couldn't tell which was which.

That really gets me down. Thanks for listening to me.

Whether or not it was an oversight, it amounts to political censorship that not only the University of Toronto Communist Club, but all of the recognized left political clubs failed to appear in the SAC Handbook '72, "The Year of the Change". No description of our club was solicited. It certainly could not have been out of aversion to "extremism" in all its forms, since the Western Guard, our local racist fascists are listed.

Poet has thirst for Varsity verse

The sparsity
In The Varsity
Of versity
Is a prosaic situation of considerable perversity.

If the occasional line
Contains some pterodactyls (winged feet of a pedestrain nature) that's fine,

It's no disaster,
Little Milton was called a poetaster.
Let me digress:

I confess
That of your pages of student news some is interesting, but most is gruesome.
If a student newspaper gets too serious
The effect can be awful and deleterious;
On the other hand, if it gets too joyous,*
The effect can be sticky and cloyous.

So, O Editor,
I don't know whether you'll credit it or Not, but for a maximum and optimum of felicity

I suggest you employ a useful duplicity
Of styles, and castigate society
With drunken sobriety and stain impropriety.

Let me continue:
The sin you Commit is not solely Yours; it is wholly Ours: students of arts
Seem to divide their lives in parts
And never apply their learning
Where the need is burning.

Outside of class they smile their smiles seraphic
And discuss parking or traffic.
If they'd only essay something beyond their essays

They might get less A's,
But we could learn from each other
Without the aid of the great Alma Mother.
Will someone please teach the rudiments

Of writing to English studimts?
I may be an amateur
But I'm as sure
Of one fact as of the fact that I take maths:
Somewhere a few campus Cohens or Plaths
Are hiding their lights under a very large basket.

My verse sickens
And must be carted off in a casket,
But, somewhere, studying Dickens or his cares lift from his troubled brow, his kicking us out isn't day care answer

The Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee has adopted a day care policy which will displace the Davonshira Day Care Centre with a university-run facility and will in the process deprive any of the Davonshira children who choose to attend the official centre of the experience of co-operative day care. Below, The Varsity reprints a letter the Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centre Number 2 sent to Prasadant Evans requesting a meeting to discuss this policy.

care detail, if it can get away with it. Furthermore, your firm identification, on August 16th, with a policy that had been formed before your arrival was unfortunate. Some of us had expected that new imagination would improve things. We write now with our reactions to the new day care policy, with our intentions for the next few weeks, and with a request that you meet with representatives of our centre within this week.

We are writing to you because the Governing Council's meeting of August 31st made it clear that day care is now in the hands of the University of Toronto administration. Furthermore, the kind of flagrant railroad that is being conducted by Robin Ross' department — backed by Paul Cedarlo, the student chairman of the Internal Affairs Committee, who seems more zealous for the interests of the administration than the administration itself — suggests that Simcoe Hall is trying to engineer every last day

Because of a continuing 5½ month occupation of the Meteorological Clubhouse behind 315 Bloor St. W., the Governing Council has passed a policy supporting day care for university students, teachers and support staff. Official day care support by the University of Toronto must be backed by all people who believe that education cannot be provided without the necessary services which make it possible.

However, all people with their eyes open must examine the disgraceful terms in which the administration and its supporters on the Governing Council are trying to bring in this policy.

CLOBBER CAMPUS CO-OP, CRUMBS TO THE REST

Despite the fact that this policy would not exist without the tenacious action and lobbying of the Campus Community Co-operative, the university intends to break up this centre as a parent/volunteer-controlled group, kick out permanently the 11 community children in the centre, and send the 14 university-affiliated children off to god-knows-where while the building is renovated. The Sussax Centre and many others have been renovated with programs continuing. So it is clear that the eviction idea is meant simply to make a show of ending an embarrassing occupation. Notice, too, that the university wants to start its centre in the very building it declared was unavailable for day care last spring.

Campus Community Co-operative Daycare Centre Number 2 is an open living association of volunteers, parents and children who are building — through joint experience — an affective approach to raising children together. We're not willing to be broken up. We are a whole entity deserving full recognition and ongoing support.

Further, St. Andrew's Day Care Centre, which the University of Toronto has supported for five years, was no longer considered as a whole entity deserving ongoing support, once it was discovered that their lease would probably be extended for this year.

As a sop to these two centres, the administration is suggesting that the first priority of the new 50-child day care centre be given to the university-affiliated children in the two existing centres.

This fact raises the other main outrage in the plan — if eligible Campus Co-op and St. Andrew's parents were to accept this offer, the result would be that the 35 university-affiliated St. Andrew's children (total enrollment 45) plus the 14 university-affiliated Campus Co-op Number 2 children (total 25) would fill 49 of the 50 places at the proposed new university centre!

One extra place would be available for one new child as yet uncovered by day care on campus! THIS IS WHAT THE ADMINISTRATION IS TRYING TO PASS OFF AS NEW DAY CARE ON CAMPUS! One additional space for children not yet covered, and 11 children presently accommodated kicked out!

CAMPUS WORKERS ALMOST LOSE OUT

There is not much doubt that this Governing Council, where power is held by a combination of rich government appointees (called community members), university administrators, and conservative professors gave in to day care very reluctantly. Professor Hanly of Philosophy, once a progressive in the early sixties bringing teach-ins to the University of Toronto, gave a speech against any support for day care whatsoever. Senator Lang called day care a welfare matter having nothing to do with education.

Campus workers are fortunate they are even covered by the plan. The familiar mix of conservative professors and rich businessmen tried to insist that campus support staff should bargain directly for day care. It was only when John Parker pointed out that only 10 per cent of the campus was organized into unions that the idea was dropped.

Four things particularly bug these elite governors regarding Campus Co-op:

- OUR COMMUNITY PEOPLE. Why is it that Hart House, which operates with an annual subsidy of $100,000 can have community members, but day care centres cannot? Anyone with a degree from anywhere in the world can belong to Hart House, whether he has affiliation with the University of Toronto or not.

- We have constantly made the point that a university that serves mostly middle and upper class students yet gets 80 per cent of its money from the average taxpayer has an obligation to give more knowledge and service back to those same taxpayers. We do not quarrel with campus people being the main focus of day care coverage. But, it would clearly be a retrograde step to drop community involvement, especially for those already enrolled in campus day care centres.

- The Governing Council turned down the presence of community people by only one vote. This aspect of policy must be adjusted.

- OUR TACTICS OF OCCUPYING A BUILDING. Perhaps the university would care to debate which is more criminal — setting up a day care centre in an empty building unsited for other use, or building a second and unnecessary men's sports centre for $6,000,000? Perhaps they would debate which is more reprehensible: setting up a day care centre in an empty building, or pretending to establish day care on campus when potentially only one new vacant space could be available to new children!

• OUR DETAILED EXAMINATION OF THEIR POLICIES. Part of our role on behalf of hundreds of people who need day care on this campus was to lecture the issue of the costs of the service. The university has had to face that in its policy. But... just to continue some of our sleuthing of their stated plan:

The big wigs sounded very self-righteous at the Governing Council when they decided that the university could support initial subsidies but not operating costs. Once again: why can they support health end culture up to $100,000 per year at Hart House, but not do it for day care?

The administration implies that all those in financial need will get Metro subsidies so that nobody will have to pay a high fee who cannot afford it. Let them publish what income you have to have to qualify for a Metro day care subsidy. If they can find that out, hundreds of people needing day care in Toronto will be indebted to them. Up to this point, Metro has been unwilling to tell anyone in the public how they arrive at eligibility for subsidy. Something which is that much of a secret usually has a good reason for being so.

Until the University of Toronto gets this information to the campus, there is no guarantee whatsoever to the users of day care that their fees will be low. Campus Co-op fees have been kept low by the commitment of the people involved: coordinators working at low salaries, 50 unpaid volunteers contributing their time each week, parents who can pay as much as they can. Guarantees must stack up to this sort of commitment.

• SUSSEX CENTRE LICENCE FIGHT. It has annoyed people whose interests are so similar to the government's that Campus Co-op Number 1 (Sussex Centre) disputed Canadian Mothercraft's monopoly on training of under-two year old nursery supervisors. We went to an Ontario government appeal board in the fall of 1972, and the government has still to inform us of its decision. They don't seem to think our children are in imminent danger.

For Campus Co-op Number 2 (Devonshire Centre) we anticipate no trouble in getting a license. We except the Governing Council's insistence on a provincial license.

CHANGING DIAPERS

Finally there is the question of who is to run a day care centre. If administrators want a major part in decision-making about the centre, they should come to the centre and change diapers. The proposed management board, with half the seats given to the university, puts major decisions in the hands of people not directly involved in the centre and with the children. Control should rest with the university's members involved in the centre as volunteers and parents, a responsive type of decision-making similar to that being advocated in many institutions in our society. Let the University of Toronto take a lead in trusting its students and workers. A University which has room for Inns College, Interdisciplinary Studies, SHOUT (Student Health Organization of U of T), and the Advisory Bureau has room for parent/volunteer-controlled day care.

It also seems weird to us, that while parents have the know-how, and the university has facilities and funds, the university proposes that it should run the day care centres, and the parents pick up the tab!

CONTRAST YORK

Contrast these features with the proposed new day care centre at York University. Their centre presently serves 65 children.

Their proposal:
Size — $300,000 centre for 150 children!

Veriety — Part to be parent-controlled co-op, part stretight professional service.

Connected to Student Education — Departments of Psychology end new Department of Education to be observers with parent approval.

MODERATES IGNORED

The moderates on the Internal Affairs Committee and on the Governing Council have raised some of these points and many others:

- How can you set up day care policy without first having a complete survey of campus needs?
- Why was the policy rushed through before fall classes recommenced?
- Why were briefs not invited from people and groups who know about day care?
- Shouldn't a new policy contain provision for continuing support for centres already established on campus?

• How is it that offensive lobbying tactics are being used by the administration such as handing the Internal Affairs Committee a detailed 21-page plan "A" versus plan "B" outline at the beginning of a meeting on September 7, and pushing that committee to decide on one of the alternatives in two hours?

All important points, but so far the moderates have not been organized and not been able to make these points stick.

DAY CARE BOARD IGNORED

But, they are not the only ones speaking against the official lobby. The Students' Administrative Council's current stand is significant since this year's council is moderate. The SAC executive recently recommended to Internal Affairs that the needs of St. Andrew's and Campus Co-op be dealt with before a general policy was formed. The Graduate Students' Union consistently supported the two groups and the need for a general survey.

But, most significant of all: A Day Care Board appointed last May by the university itself recommended in August that St. Andrew's and Campus Co-op Number 2 each be provided separate facilities by the University and that a permanent day care board investigate with surveys developing a general policy.

The Day Care Board was shunned and their report ignored by the administration with the help of their supporters on Internal Affairs. This is the same tactic that the administration used with the former President's Advisory Committee on Social Responsibility (set up two years ago) and its report on day care. Appoint a group, ask for reports, then shelve them if you don't like them. Then, preferably, shelve the group too.

SPINNING THE WEB

We are not impressed by the earnest pleas of Ross and others on the Internal Affairs Committee about how "you've got to start somewhere". "We've got to start somewhere," said the spider, as he started to spin the smallest and tightest possible web around a bunch of delicious flies.

We won't allow this to happen to day care without a good fight, and we believe that we have supporters on campus who agree with us.

To sum up: You should not advertise as new policy, even as a pilot project, what is little more than a stick with which to disperse Campus Co-op, end a few crumbs for others.

We believe that you should immediately recommend to the Internal Affairs Committee that it prepare and administer a comprehensive survey of campus day care needs.

We believe that you should settle with Campus Co-op and St. Andrew's with two separate and equal facilities as recommended by SAC, GSU, and the University Day Care Board. We are not convinced by Buildings' boss Gregory's statements that little space is available. These estimates have proved wrong in the past.

We believe you should settle with Campus Co-op and St. Andrew's in addition to starting your pilot project, so that at the very least, 50 entirely new places will be open on campus this fall.

We believe you should immediately investigate ways of clarifying and improving the questions of cost and decision-making parts in your plan.

We believe that you must recommend to the Governing Council on September 21 changes necessary in the official policy on the questions of the variety or kinds of day care offered, the position of community people, and the question of costs so that giving priority to people in financial need is really a possibility.

We suggest, in view of your immense reluctance to accept more than the smallest responsibility for day care, that you consider becoming a lobby on the provincial government for free universal day care.

URGENT

We would like to see these matters settled this month.

To discuss these matters, we ask you to meet with representatives of our group this week. We do not wish to meet with any other members of your administration unless you are present. We have gone that road before.

Until you do this, and we jointly make a satisfactory settlement, we will continue offering day care to 25 children in the Meteorological Clubhouse and we will continue the 24-hour occupation.

We will also seek others on campus — students and workers especially — to help us.

WE DO NOT WANT POLICE ACTION ON THIS MATTER WE HOPE THAT YOU AND ALL INTERESTED PEOPLE ON CAMPUS WILL HELP US TO CREATE A PEACEFUL SOLUTION

Governments plan to shift ex

By WAYNE ROBERTS

In the course of the summer a number of graduate students were planning to donate blood to the Red Cross as they registered for the year. They thought a bleed-in was the most dramatic way of expressing their feelings of being bled dry by their $100 share of the $392 fee hike for graduate students. Undergraduates, whose fees are also going up more than $100, might have considered similar actions. For if present trends continue, there won't be much left but sold stone in the years to come.

It is crucial to recognize that this year's fee increase is only the first of a series designed to turn students into hemophiliacs in a continual bloodletting ritual planned by the federal and provincial governments. The intention of government to force more and more of the burden of post-secondary costs onto students is made abundantly clear in two government-sponsored reports of major significance — the provincial Wright and the federal Pelitchinis Reports.

The Wright Report, commissioned by the provincial government in April, 1969 to investigate the future of post-secondary education in Ontario, created widespread panic when its draft report was released last spring. The report is peppered throughout with a pastiche of clichés, sentimentalism, and expressions of high ideals. We read for instance:

The paramount value which the commission has brought to its evaluation of post-secondary education is its commitment to the individual. The commission wants to emphasize the importance of the individual in education: the individual must be central... We must preserve and cherish the fragile, exquisite, special animal of this earth we call man.

Similar phraseology tells us of their commitment to an educational process that lasts through a whole lifetime, to "universal accessibility to post-secondary education at all ages as our first principle, and to an educational process free from the scourge of beaureaucracy.

But as Star columnist and former NDP education critic Walter Pitman noted, they must have had a different person writing the actual recommendations. Verily, what they gave with the left hand in their posturing on principle, they took away with the right hand in actual policy formulation. Their dedication to lifelong education becomes concretized in a recommendation that employers permit their workers a six-month leave of absence from work every five years, paid out of a fund based on 10 per cent deferment of each worker's salary)

Their distaste for bureaucracy is transformed into a morass of need-test formulas for the individual and a government supervising body that would reduce autonomy in the university network to matters of administrative discretion. As a Treasury Board document leaked last January indicates, the techniques of this body will be blunt. Phyllis Grosskurth resigned from the Advisory Committee on University Affairs in protest against this Treasury Board document which was drawn up without consultation with CUA and was simply handed down to CUA with requests for advice on "constraint (re cutback) alternatives."

A citation illustrates how they plan to infringe on the essence of university autonomy while respecting its forms:

A freeze on the Basic Income Unit value would constitute an important cost-saving technique since autonomy (the quotes are in the text) makes it difficult for the Government to pinpoint areas where possible savings should be made. Holding down of grants would force (sic) the institutions to economize and improve their productivity.

It is clear, then, that their concerns in regard to costs will not stop even with increased fees for students. On the contrary, the fee hikes are part of a coherent attack on the norms and values currently attached to education in this province.

In similar fashion, their devotion to that fragile animal man proves rather facile in the scramble for more scholar for the dollar. Educational investments are cynically placed in the marketplace where you pay to consume education just like you pay for stocks in a land company and where the social value of education is ultimately judged relative to manpower needs.

Meanwhile, the dedication to universal accessibility is translated to encompass correspondence courses and part-time study. The older "open-door" policy whereby a student was supported to his level of competence is replaced by a more callous equation of competence with ability to pay and a more conscious direction toward profitable occupational training. Both the Treasury Report and the Wright Report are quite explicit on both points. On the latter point, the Treasury Board makes clear its intent to "shift their (the universities) emphasis":

De-emphasizing undergraduate, non-professional courses by reducing weighting would force universities either to reduce enrolment in these courses or selectively raise fees, thus putting pressure on or reducing enrolment.

For the courses that are still available, the Wright Report suggests shifting of public subsidies for operating costs from the institution to the individual. All students would be assigned 50 per cent of operating costs. (It is difficult to understand exactly how the 50 per cent figure was arrived at — one scholar suggested they subtracted the magic number 7 from the number on any Heinz ketchup bottle). Then, a sliding scale of grants and loans would be made available to each student according to both his parents income. Apart from enforcing child dependence on parental income, these recommendations have the added feature of providing free education to that "quartile" of the population whose parental incomes generally remove them from the educational system far before university.

It is a cheap gesture indeed!

Furthermore, while the reduction of grants to institutions are specific and eagerly anticipated, the increase of grants to needy individuals are yet to be witnessed.

Unless we become too anxious in anticipation, the Wright Report adds a necessary caveat: "There does not seem to be any way to achieve social mobility — except through the combination of public help and individual effort."

When it gets down to specifics, the Treasury Board once again saves us from undue speculation on the course charted by the Wright Report:

Limiting enrollment will mainly affect those students entering the system who are the least employable of the 18-24 age group. In terms of the 1972-73 projection, this will reduce the freshman intake by 16,000, and may result in a shift to part-time education....

Increasing the loan portion will discourage poorly motivated students on the one hand but it will also affect students from lower income groups unless a contingent repayment feature is introduced....

Their reverence to universal accessibility can be fairly easily measured: by their fees ye shall know them. Their words give little indication of what they are up to.

The more recently available Pelitchinis Report, commissioned by the federal government for the 1971 Federal-

Provincial Conference is, if anything, more ominous than the Wright Report. It recommends everything from the ending of all grant portions of loans after second year to the breaking up of 'conglomerate' post-secondary institutions into their constituent parts to save administrative and teaching costs. It concludes with the ringing declaration of recommendation 31:

The general subsidization of post-secondary education should be terminated forthwith. To the extent that it is socially desirable to subsidize certain programs or some students, the subsidies should be made specific and should be related to the attainment of the social goals. When pursued as a consumer good, post-secondary education falls into the category of a luxury good. In this context, it is grossly inequitable to subsidize the consumption of luxuries when large segments of the population lack necessities.

(Lest these reports seem to be outside of a national re-orientation, it is worth noting that the B.C. Social government was preparing a similar one. The Worth Report in Alberta takes its stand in calling for an end to university expansion and an 11 per cent increase in costs assigned to students. Its charm is captured in such comments as "Students need to escape the shelter of irresponsibility that basic education presently provides" and "The proposed changes in education should allow a more rapid and precise adaption of schooling to the shifting demands of the labor market.")

Together, these reports constitute a sharp reversal in the received wisdom of the past decade on the value of education. In the sixties the popularity of Galbraith's Affluent Society and the first report of the Economic Council of Canada made the concept of education as a public investment virtual household coinage. From the Massey Commission to the Bleden Report, funding recommendations were based on the central importance of post-secondary education as a stimulator of Canadian cultural and economic growth. The Cold War helped, too. The Wright Report sums up the experience:

It was definitely the use of post-secondary education as a social escalator and, for a time, as an indispensable tool in the race with the Russians that justified the unprecedented infusion of resources into post-secondary education in the United States and in Canada.

Claude Bissel, who was at the University of Toronto when the results of this process, just as transparent importation of the attitude at the turn of the century, a note of financial optimism circles that had previously been in despair. "Whereas the approach to an overhead expense implies the question: 'Isn't it?' Bissel rejoiced, "the economic to a capital investment in it enough?"

In fact, it was Bissel's concerns of the traditional that sounded one of the caution: "There must always be said piously, "lest a super-highway that intellectual wasteland."

reverted not only to an but a "luxury good". Both Pelitchinis Reports deny the relationship between society's manpower needs particularly the Pelitchinis definition of education as an image of students as drawing off the wealth of no other social, cultural activity in which the have to a greater extent than and there is no other more public funds are people over the age of higher education. Consider of the participants in the to pay the full cost of the considering further that participate would not participated even if they had cost, public subsidization participation contributes to tortion in the social structure....

It is suggested that rational to establish programs which will provide the academically weak nonacademic talents. The subsidization of the academic expense of the education are dispatched to the work early age to produce some is exploitative, dis perpetuates a social bias turbng when account is taken of the fact that the demand for semi-professional and technical workers the products of the technical colleges has been rising at a faster rate than the demand for those with general university education.

The concept of higher education as a right was never accepted by higher government officials even in the heyday of university expansion. Now, it will become a privilege with all the dressings of a suitable privilege — its luxury cost will restrict its users to the wealthy. And, it will be a privilege with a vengeance from the point of view of government demagogues. For, they will be able to entertain themselves with self-images as fee-hiking Robin Hoods, redressing social balances by removing students in lower-middle incomes from their wanton educational pursuits.

Although some of the revisions in official government thinking began as early as 1969, an atmosphere of crisis and panic exudes from their documents now.
With exclamation points galore, Peitchinis opens his study with statistics showing that enrollment had tripled and costs per student had doubled from 1960-61 to 1969-70!

One suspects that the motive here is panic-creation rather than presentation of startling new evidence. The fact is that these figures were anticipated with uncanny accuracy as far back as 1962.

The difference is that in 1962 people were trying to promote some kind of rational, long-term planning. Now, they are simply manoeuvring with statistics that will outrage and shock us into a pessive rejection of previously valued social goals.

All of this is done with little documentation. You can count on your thumbs the number of references which attempt to disprove the relationship between education and future manpower needs. There is not even an attempt to refute the relationships between education and social benefit. There is no attempt at a critique of the Canadian economy's inability to fully utilize the skills developed at universities. There are not even projections on long-term manpower needs of the economy. We are merely jotting to a halt. Too bad for those who are crushed in the braking process.

One social group will have to pick up the tab — the students. Where is the alternative source for funding the universities? asks Peitchinis. "There is only one potential alternative source and that is the students."

We even have to bear the brunt of their liberalism on universal accessibility.
Reasoning that since most lower income students are eliminated from the school process far before the university stage, they are reversing strategies to promote accessibility by getting at school children in the early years. While their utterances on this level are confined to innocuous gestures, they raise the most visible barrier to accessibility tuition. Perhaps, they would consider tuition for high school academic programmes which are also too late to engage minds already destroyed by poverty. They are capable of doing anything to avoid fighting for accessibility on the fronts where the war is being waged. For them universal accessibility becomes a cruel rhetorical gesture — a weapon in the fight for higher tuition.

Nowhere do they consider the potential for alternate sources of funding and alternate government priorities which could permit a coherent attack on a class-biased educational system. The percentage of federal government revenues derived from corporations has decreased 6.4 per cent in the last three years. The net provincial revenues from taxable income in Ontario zoomed from $151,844,000 to $948,000,000 between 1962-63 and 1970-
71. Meanwhile, corporations took a gentle slope from $185,718,000 to $457,000,000.
A 70-million dollar grant to ITT highlights last years federal government subsidies to wealthy corporations. Last year's defence budget was $1,946,000,000 or 600-million more than all government funds on education.

Conservative Minister George Kerr defended the raise in fees, speaking in the Ontario Legislature.

It is simply one of the ways for this government to raise more revenue. You know, you can only increase taxes on gasoline and park fees and licence fees and booze and tobacco so much without generally increasing taxes in certain other areas such as corporations, because of the unemployment we have at the present time. It was felt that there could be some increase in tuition fees without discouraging or making it too difficult for those students who wished to go to university, regardless of their family income.

A number of highlights emerge from a consideration of government policy on post-secondary education. First, apart from the conscious attempt to reduce enrolment and costs by raising fees, the whole system is chaotic and unplanned.
Apart from the lack of long-term planning, short-term planning is a crude juggling act. Liberal critic Bullbrook asked George Kerr why the government was spending 21-million dollars on a student employment program and then exacting 23-million dollars in tuition. Government is running very fast to go backward.

Secondly, the scorched earth policy toward universities is likely to be enduring one. Successive Canadian governments have shown a continuing inability to solve problems traditionally allocated to the public sector — particularly housing and education. Now, they have given up trying and are beginning a frontal attack on those who hold them responsible for high levels of social well-being.

Peitchinis rises to eloquence on this point:

The interpretation given by many to the concept of the 'affluent society' has been misleading and illusory; it has resulted in an increase in economic and social expectations far beyond the capacity of the economy to meet. It would be instructive to all in society, therefore, if from time to time we were to face the real constraints of scarcity. This will cause us to realize that inasmuch as there may be a general affluence, it is not possible to satisfy all social and economic needs at the same time. Even if the economy were to operate close to its potential capacity, it would still be necessary to make choices amongst alternative social needs.

Since governments are unwilling to solve the problems of financing the public sector by taxing corporations, they will follow the same policy as in welfare matters — tax the lower middle class level incomes of stably-employed workers and poorly paid professionals. Students fall perfectly into this category. Therefore, they will be assigned the brunt of their own costs plus the costs of government genuflections to those less fortunate than themselves.

The gateway to opportunity will become a tollgate. Students face the prospects of increased reliance on parents — an umbilical cord welded in gold is a useful social sanction in the government's war against student experimentation with different social ideals and practices, as well as a degradation for students of our age group.

Women will be the first to suffer. It should not be forgotten that it is women who have accounted for much of the percentage increase in university attendance. Any attack on increased enrollment must of necessity strike them first as the most vulnerable sector. And any of us who are responsible for our own fees will partake in the Wright Report's dedication to the work-study concept of education — working as waitresses, clerks, or laborers throughout the year (rather than just the summer months) to pay for our initiation fee into privileged domain.

Finally, although the governments' steps backward are marked by chaos, they are decisive. The Wright Report argues firmly against the concept of free tuition as a completion of a historical trend toward equalizing opportunity through taxation. "The commission cannot accept the belief that we are helpless victims of linear projections of history.
Surely, if we think a social trend undesirable we should be able to change it or, at least, to modify it."

Governments are moving to take their stand against history. It is now up to students, who occupy a decisive sector of this society's economy and future, who are situated in the vortex of a government's all-out attack on the whole educational system, to begin to fight back.

Numbers and action are of the essence. The commitment of the government to cut back on education and launch an attack on students will only be changed in the face of mess pressure. For those who delight in the apathy of the U of T campus, it is worth recognizing that apathy is an interesting and creative form of protest against student bureaucratic policies. But, it will not pay tuition fees.

Since last spring, students have engaged in a number of protest activities ranging from a graduate students strike, demonstrations of 1000 in Ottawa and a demonstration of 1500 in Queen's Park.
We are engaged in a long-term battle with federal and provincial governments on the rights of students and all that these might imply for a society geared to mex-imizing outlets for creative expression.
The struggle ahead promises to be a long one. It will even have its dull and routine moments. But as the Wright Report noted,
"our Commission was established in difficult and turbulent times for education." It is up to us, the students, to determine its future.

INFORMATION SERVICE

The Students' Administrative Council this year will be providing an extensive information service to students. The service will be run out of the S.A.C. office, but information will be made available to Scarborough and Etobicoke students through their own student governments as well. During orientation, a booth will also be set up in Sid Smith (100 St. George St.), so that a broader scope of the campus is served. On September 7, 8, 11, 12, various organizations will be setting up tables to provide information to the student body. If you are interested in an organization, chances are you'll find them at Sid Smith on those days. It will be a chance to meet the people who are most intimately involved with student clubs and associations.

In conjunction with the Information service, there will be a liaison resource person available to handle any bureaucratic problems or difficulties experienced on campus. Any difficulties may be reported to the S.A.C. office (either in person or by phone). From there, your difficulty can be handled through this office to aid in establishing a satisfactory solution. We hope that if you need information, you call the S.A.C. office (928-4911) or drop in personally (12 Hart House Circle).

SACircuit*TEACH-IN: student aid

SAC is sponsoring a teach-in on student aid on Thursday, 14th September at 7:00 in Alumni Hall Victoria College. Representatives of local college and faculty councils and any interested members of the community are encouraged to attend. Interested people should register for this event by 12th September. For further information, or to register for the teach-in, contact Debra Lewis or Ross Flowers in the SAC office.

VARSITY BOARD

The Varsity, although it receives a large grant from SAC, has consistently strived to maintain its independence from the Council's influences. To help achieve this end, the Varsity Board of Directors was created. Its purposes, as outlined in the SAC constitution, are to oversee the financial workings of the paper and to mediate complaints concerning the paper's editorial integrity. In the past, there have been many objections to the Varsity's content. However, seldom have these been voiced to any of the legitimate avenues of communication with the paper, i.e. the Editor, the Staff or the Varsity Board. Members of the community are encouraged to forward their criticisms to any of these people.

The Varsity Board is in the midst of reconstruction. If proposed changes are passed at this Wednesday's SAC meeting, the Board will have the following composition:

- 5 positions appointed by SAC
- 1 position appointed by the Graduate Students' Union
- 1 position appointed by the President of the University
- 1 position appointed by the U of T Faculty Association
- 1 position appointed by the support staff
- the Editor
- the Past Editor
- 1 position elected by the Varsity staff
- 2 positions appointed by the board itself

APPOINTMENTS:

SAC currently has 4 positions open on the Varsity Board. Applications should be sent to Debra Lewis, Communications Commissioner, SAC office, no later than Friday, 22nd September.

Galbraith Building

DAVID CROMBIE: 12:00 Thurs.

At 12:00 noon on Thursday, September 14, 1972, Mr. David Crombie will be addressing the university community at Convocation Hall. Mr. Crombie has been known as a dynamic, progressive member of the Metro Council. The past three years he has represented Ward 11 (which is the northern part of the City of Toronto). While no one else had declared up to September 1st, it is widely speculated that both Tony O'Donohue (Ward 4) and David Rotenberg (Ward 11) will declare their candidacy. Mr. Crombie has been very co-operative to take time out to appear on campus. Issues such as public transit, downtown development, and community development are pertinent to all students, whether or not you are from the Toronto area. This shapes up to be the most dramatic municipal election in recent history. Be sure to hear David Crombie, mayoralty candidate speak on the coming municipal election. This forum is to take place Thursday, September 14 at Convocation Hall at 12:00 noon. This is the first of many S.A.C. forums planned for this year.

Farmer union launches Ontario boycott against Kraft monopoly

OTTAWA (CUP) — Wander through your local supermarket or corner store some day and take a look at the variety of brands in the dairy products and salad dressing shelves. You'll find small Kraftco labels on almost all cheeses, and salad dressings. Kraftco Corporation has a virtual monopoly in this area of the food industry; it either makes the products or owns subsidiaries that do.

The National Farmers' Union has taken on this monopolistic giant in a boycott that is intensifying across the country as it enters a second year.

The boycott was called in response to dairy farmers' demands for better prices for their products through a collective bargaining agreement and the refusal by Kraft to discuss the matter with the NFU.

The NFU is fighting to enable farmers to negotiate in regional groups or on the national level with marketing boards and processors for the prices paid on farm products by the marketing boards and corporate business. Farmers have often been forced to sell their products at below production cost.

The NFU says that unless the present system is changed, the Task Force on Agriculture's goal of removing two-thirds of the present number of farm operators and replacing them with corporate farms will be achieved.

Collective bargaining is the vehicle to stop rural depopulation and strengthen rural communities, says the farmers' organization.

Locals are encouraged to formulate policy for their area and the national good of all farmers since local decision-making is an important part of NFU policy.

The Kraft Boycott is important to the NFU because it is the means through which farmers may obtain collective bargaining rights.

In 1966 there were 22,206 dairy farmers in Ontario; by 1971 7,664 of them had been squeezed out of business. In the last two-and-a-half years, 44 Canadian co-op and independent cheese factories closed down. They handled a combined volume of 600 million pounds of industrial milk.

While that was happening, Kraft received a $250,000 interest-free, forgivable loan from the Ontario government to build an addition to its Ingleside Ontario plant. (A forgivable loan does not have to be paid back.)

The same company that was virtually given a quarter-of-a-billion dollars is the largest North American dairy monopoly. The American-owned corporation has branch plants in more than 100 countries—it controls 80 per cent of the Canadian cheese production.

In 1970, Kraft moved from 32nd to the 28th largest corporation in North America with sales of $2,751,129,000 and a net profit of $82,006,000. The company's net profit increased to $91,300,000 in 1971. The president's salary was $318,000.

Meanwhile, the farmer's share of the food dollar has steadily decreased from 57 cents in 1949 to 37 cents in 1970. Between 1968 and 1971, total farm income declined by $137 million or eight per cent, while last year alone food prices increased by 7.4 per cent. The Canadian farmer's average net income in 1970 was $3700.

Ontario dairy farmers must sell their milk through the Ontario Milk Marketing Board (OMMB).

The OMMB also allocates the amount of milk cheese factories may receive through a quota system, introduced in 1969. Each processor was assigned quotas which could be bought and sold, thus encouraging the corporate monopolies to take over small plants.

In Leeds County near Brockville, Ontario, there were once 92 small plants; there are now two. The Plum Hollow co-op is one.

Local dairy farmers bought Plum Hollow in 1967 and invested $60,000 to make the plant a paying proposition. In 1970 the co-op paid an eight per cent dividend to its members. Its location allowed neighbouring farmers to ship milk to the plant for considerably less than if they shipped to the closest Kraft factory.

The new quota system limited Plum Hollow to receiving four million pounds of milk in 1971, half the amount it processed a year earlier. Once the quota was filled, farmers — who are in turn operating under a system that financially penalizes them for producing over their own quotas — are required by law to ship their milk elsewhere.

The OMMB price paid to farmers for milk fluctuates greatly. Here is how the prices changed in a one-year period for a hundred-weight of industrial milk:

January 1971	$3.70
September 1971	$4.75
February 1972	$4.48

While the consumer was paying more — not less — for milk products, the prices farmers receive can change monthly.

The NFU approached the Canadian Dairy Commission, the OMC and the OMMB with statistics showing dairy farmers are not paid enough for their produce. The figures also showed the corporations could well afford to pay farmers more out of the enormous profits taken from processing the milk.

The government agencies only offered excuses why it couldn't be done.

To bring attention to their plight, dairy farmers who were also NFU members, initiated a picketing action at the Kraft Ingleside plant on July 28, 1971. It was the culmination of seventeen meetings attended by some 4000 farmers held throughout Ontario.

The OMMB district representative, Sarsfield O'Connor, responded by setting up his office inside the plant. When the bulk milk truck drivers refused to cross the picket line, O'Connor attempted to coerce the drivers, many of whom were independent operators. He reminded them their contracts could be terminated and that under the terms of their contract, they were responsible for the milk in their trucks.

O'Connor did this, even though the NFU had given the Ontario Milk Commission a list of small cheese factories willing and able to handle all the milk diverted from Kraft. Some of these plants had even offered to pay up to fifty cents per hundredweight above the market price. They were willing to pay the higher prices since they suffered under the OMMB milk quota system.

The milk was finally diverted, but not to the small plants. It was sent to the Ault's plant at Winchester, Ontario. (Ault's is owned by LeBatt's Breweries which is also in the chicken and egg business.)

At one of the second day's picketing, the OMMB announced a price increase of $1.15 per hundredweight for industrial milk. The farmers decided to remove the picket line and hold a mass meeting the next day.

The following morning over 1000 people assembled in the parking lot across from the Kraft plant for a meeting called only 19 hours previously. Knowing the OMMB could change the price the next month, the farmers decided to demand collective bargaining rights with Kraft, without any government intermediaries.

The decision was reached realizing, the farmers contend, that the government agencies are merely vehicles through which corporation were assured a cheap supply of milk.

On August 19, 1971, the NFU called for a national-wide boycott of all Kraft products to back the farmers' call for collective bargaining rights.

Kraftco has refused to talk with the National Farmers' Union. However, people writing the president of Kraft of Canada receive a form letter reply. (R.J.)

Greenwood, 9600 Devonshire Road, Montreal 307 Que.)

Although Kraft refused to publicly discuss the Boycott, associations to which Kraft belongs or over which it has influence have attacked the NFU.

With the help of concerned citizens, the NFU is now widening its boycott activities, establishing urban support committees across Canada to carry out actions in urban areas. These groups are presently involved in informational picketing and leafletting at supermarkets.

The Moose Jaw committee circulated a petition which thousands signed, demanding the provincial government order the organizers of the Saskatchewan summer games not to purchase or use any Kraft products.

The provincial minister of youth and culture responded by writing to the chairman of the organizing committee, asking him to seriously consider not using any Kraft products and to avoid purchasing Kraft products with the government money allocated to the games. The Saskatchewan caucus of the New Democratic Party has also given moral support to the boycott.

Its position represents a switch from the provincial NDP convention last December when paid party organizers held members of the Regina City Police seize Boycott material from an information table operated by Boycott co-ordinator Don Kossick.

By the end of this year the NFU hopes a solid network of urban support committees will be operating across the country. Once the network is established, co-ordinated actions against Kraft will take place across Canada.

The Kraft Boycott is essentially a power struggle. If it succeeds, some power will be taken away from the corporations and redistributed into the hands of small Canadian farmers and consumers. If the Boycott fails, the quality of food will continue to deteriorate and prices will continue to rise, with little opposition to corporate power.

Since profits are the major consideration for the corporate decision-maker, Kraft will grudgingly press for legislative changes when the Boycott starts to hurt seriously. Because the laws now favor Kraft and the company has money to tap from its other subsidiaries around the world, the struggle could likely continue for years.

The American United Farm Workers' Grape Boycott required five years to win collective bargaining rights for California grape pickers. But the grape workers did win and so can Canadian farmers — with the help of the Canadian consumer.

UofT graduates will attempt to form labour union

By ELAINE KAHN
The Graduate Students Union is attempting to organize U of T teaching assistants into a labour union.

If successful, the University of Toronto Graduate Assistant Association would be able to bargain collectively with the administration on matters such as medical insurance, workmen's compensation and wages. The association would also, under certain circumstances, have the right to strike.

The decision to form a union was based on a recommendation in a report on graduate assistants passed by the GSU in May. According to Larry Hoffman, former GSU president and chief organizer of the campaign, a labour lawyer who was consulted said formation of the union would be legal.

The first step is to have the Ontario Labour Relations Board accept a definition of the bargaining unit and the association as a legitimate union.

Then, if 65% of the assistants in the bargaining unit have joined the Association, for the nominal fee of one dollar, there should be immediate certification. Hoffman hopes the required number will have joined by Christmas.

The university, in the person of Don Forster, vice-president and provost, was asked in the spring to recognize voluntarily the graduate assistants union. It refused, Hoffman says, because it believes the students want to unionize only in order to be able to strike. This has been denied by the GSU.

Graduate assistants have no official status in the university, being represented on no academic body, except through the GSU, which is also composed of non-teaching graduate students.

This gives them no vehicle with which to collectively bargain with the university over their grievances. A union would give them such an instrument.

Graduate assistants are in essence university employees.

However, they are provided with neither workmen's compensation nor medical insurance under a university plan.

- They have no say over tutorial size or course content.

- There is no programme to show them how to teach, because the prevalent attitude among faculty, according to Hoffman, is that teachers are born, not made.

- Twenty-eight percent of all graduate students are women yet only 16 percent are teaching assistants.

Unionized, the graduate students could fight to change these situations, as well as ask for higher wages.

The GSU report states that 30 to 40 per cent of the teaching done at U of T is done by graduate assistants. Hoffman says this is a conservative estimate and that the real percentage is closer to 50.

The report was mailed to all faculty and graduate students in the spring and distributed again, along with a flyer stating the main reasons for unionizing, during registration. Membership in the association was also solicited at that time.

A broad spectrum of students has joined the association, says Hoffman, including some from departments such as chemical engineering and physics, which are usually apolitical. Graduate students at McMaster University are also investigating the possibility of unionizing.

Spencer, Leckie run for Board of Ed

By RANDY ROBERTSON
Bob Spencer, past Students' Administrative Council president, and Dan Leckie, his former Education Commissioner, are contesting Ward 6 Board of Education seats in the December 4 municipal elections.

Spencer said the team would withdraw if candidates favourable to them and with a better chance of success should declare themselves.

Leckie is organizer of the university's Interdisciplinary "Alternatives in Education" course.

Spencer, defeated for re-election, in last spring's SAC elections and presently working with Screen Gem Productions, emphasized their campaign's importance would lie more in the impact it might make on the community than in the team's possible victory at the polls.

He wants to bring to public attention the "appalling" state of the Ward's schools and the ways in which they are failing both students and parents. Some of the money spent on suburban schools should be spent on inner city schools, he said.

Leckie said the team was an alternative to the incumbent trustees. "We don't accept the present status of most of the trustees. Their relationship to the area is one of paternalism."

He claimed that the team has "a great number of ideas and thoughts — on how schools should be run internally."

Spencer said he had discovered, as SAC president, that people learn to react to oppressive institutions and that he was sure they would do so at election time once they were aware of the situation.

Ward 6 is the city's biggest municipal constituency. It is bounded by Bloor, Palmerston, Sherbourne Streets and the lakefront, and according to Spencer, contains two-thirds of Toronto's inner-city schools.

The Leckie-Spencer team intends to appeal to U of T students for their votes. Spencer said that students — as former members of the system and as future parents — could not help but be concerned in this election.

Students support Kelly's letter

Abortion crisis met with little reaction at SMC

By BRENDA McNEELY

Many St. Michael's College students seem to feel that it was legitimate to include birth control and abortion referral information in the orientation information kit.

Controversy arose when a small number of parents of those students receiving the kit complained to Principal John Kelly. Kelly demanded the information about an anti-abortion counselling agency, Birthright, be included in the remaining kits.

Father Kelly also insisted that he be allowed to include in the kit a letter explaining the college's official position, which is against both abortion and birth control.

Orientation organizers complied with both demands.

In a random series of interviews, few students were surprised by the inclusion of Kelly's letter. They accepted the fact that he, as the president of a Catholic college, had a position to defend and a right to do it. No one seemed disturbed that the student union had met his requests.

Michael Signer, a graduate student, expressed the views of most interviewed in saying that the information was valuable. But he added, Father Kelly had a definite right to express his opinions at the Catholic college. He said that it was necessary to present both sides of an issue. In contrast, Mike Brehl, a first year student, denounced the inclusion, "I did not think it proper to include the information. I objected strongly to the abortion information. Abortion is murder," he said. Such information "should not be included in a SMC survival kit — a U of T kit, perhaps." Brehl added that he looked for information regarding Birthright.

Arts & Science student union proposed to co-ordinate political activities

By BOB BETTSON

A Union of Arts and Science students may be formed soon to coordinate student political and educational activities in the faculty.

Representatives of student organizations in the faculty will meet on Saturday September 23 to decide whether the Arts and Science Student Union will be established. Assuming they vote for a union, they will then decide what form it will take.

After the conference, the union must be ratified by three quarters of student councils and bodies such as course unions.

The proposed new body is mainly the result of the SAC constitution adopted last year which prevents SAC from intervening in individual faculties. In previous years SAC had spent much of its energy organizing arts students.

To fill the vacuum created in the faculty by this action, a group of students approached SAC and received a grant from the education commission to hire two full time staff to work over the summer.

Phil Dack, last year's SAC vice president and now full time field worker in Arts and Science was hired during the summer and helped lay the groundwork for the conference.

He said the conference "will have a great effect on the level of student political activity in the faculty of Arts and Science for the next few years."

Asked about opposition to the union, Dack said that Michael Steinberg (SMC III), a member of SAC's education commission, proposed that no union be formed and that its function be performed by a sub-committee of the education commission. Although some people support Steinberg, Dack said he expected that a large majority of representatives would support a union in some form.

At the conference, debate is expected to focus on the question of whether the union will operate as a policy making body or only an information and co-ordinating one. Dack said one proposal for which there is considerable support entails an executive with elected president and vice-president with other members appointed by college councils, course unions, SAC and Faculty and Governing Council student representatives.

He said the size of the executive would depend on whether the new union would be a strong body with wide ranging powers or only perform a limited function.

The budget for the new organization would come from the two dollar per capita education levy that is part of the SAC fees and would probably be used to hire three or four part time workers to co-ordinate various areas in Arts and Science. The total budget would be about $20,000.

Dack qualified his remarks by saying that there are a wide variety of proposals expected and the strength of the new union depends not only on the decisions of the conference but on the enthusiasm of college councils and other organizations.

When asked whether the new union was being set up to counter to SAC, Dack said that "there are much more important things to do."

During the summer, an ad hoc steering committee was formed. A major conference was held at Erindale in early June with representatives of course unions, college councils and faculty council representatives as well as arts and science, SAC reps. As a result of the conference, working groups were set up on course evaluations, the new programme review, and course unions. Work was also done with faculty council and orientation people.

Over the summer Dack and Rick MacFarlane, who was hired as the New Program review researcher, worked out of the union's office in the second floor lounge at Sid Smith. Besides laying the groundwork for the formation of an arts and science union, Dack and other student volunteers were involved in "most major areas of political and educational concern to students in the faculty."

The office was also a centre for information and counselling.

Co-op teach-in

The Campus Co-operative Daycare Centre thinks children should be seen and heard.

That's why they'll be holding an all-day teach-in tomorrow — with the centre's children — in the foyer of Sidney Smith Hall.

The teach-in is to explain the centre's position on U of T's new daycare policy.

The policy adopted by the Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council, calls for less parental control at the centre and a substantial fee increase from participating children.

The second instalment of The Varsity's Governing Council feature series will not appear as scheduled, today.

Keep heart, good readers. It returns Friday.

Poor freshmanturn out throughout university for orientation day fun

By PHILIP FISCHER

Over sixty per cent of the freshmen interviewed by The Varsity did not attend any orientation program last week.

However, of the 40 per cent of the students who joined in their college's activities, the majority said that they were satisfied with the events.

The reasons given by students for non-involvement ranged from having jobs, to passionate disinterest and a lack of information.

Bright Braune and Anne Rebane both of Victoria College said "We got to know the kids at Vic and now we feel like we're a part of the university."

For others, its significance was on a more practical level, "I couldn't have gotten around without it", explained Roger Simbert an engineering student. "It explained about buildings, timetables, and just how to get around."

Holly Henderson (New I) enjoyed her orientation program, offering the opinion that "... the most important thing is meeting people."

The size and complexity of the university and red tape proved to be a bewildering experience for Rita Romano of St. Mikes.

"When I came to register I didn't have a clue where I was," she said "but now I know what I'm doing."

Some of the activities that freshmen participated in were campus tours, sleep-ins with all night movies, sensitivity sessions and frisbee throws. Innis College freshmen spent the weekend at Innisfree farm near Delhi, Ontario where according to Roy Moore (Innis I), they ate and drank all night and just talked to each other.

The successful programs appeared to be those which encouraged people oriented activities, designed to cushion the initial shock of university life in an atmosphere of fun and friendship.

Reform mayoralty candidate to speak here tomorrow

Mayoralty candidate David Crombie will speak tomorrow noon at Convocation Hall on municipal politics in Toronto.

The Ward 11 alderman, although usually considered as one of the reform caucus on City Council, has won respect from other sectors of the council because of his moderate and reasonable arguments.

Although he normally votes against contentious developments when they threaten working class homes, Crombie has been chosen to mediate important disputes in Trefann Court and South of St. James Town.

Crombie is the only announced mayoralty candidate so far, although pro-development aldermen David Rotenberg and Tony O'Donahue are expected to join the race soon.

Study queries value of marks

The value of marks is being seriously questioned by a study being conducted at Trent University.

In a three-year research project commencing this fall at Trent, the usefulness of marking as a predictor of students' future performance is being challenged.

In this, the first study of its kind since the mid nineteen-fifties, grade 13 students are being admitted on criteria developed by the research group.

The 600 students in the study at Trent were divided into six groups. To each group the following criteria was applied; performance on SACU scores, mid-term Grade 13 academic results, an in-depth questionnaire to the applicant's Grade 13 teachers and personal interviews with the applicants themselves. The traditional criteria of admission — a summary of the student's achievements in grades 12 and 13, and school recommendations, were also included.

The traditional university admission criteria have been cast into doubt by the end of provincially-administered grade 13 examinations, the subsequent flexibility of high school programs and the introduction of new subjects into the grade 13 curriculum. This study is an attempt to assess the value of the "traditional yard stick" as well as other criteria.

Blues come out on top at CNE

The Varsity—David Lloyd

Aerne Kartne carries for Blues Monday night against York. Tight defensive play held both teams to low scores.

By STAN CAPPE

The day is fast approaching when U of T will not have to look all the way to Kingston for a football rival. It'll only have to look over its shoulder to the country club that calls itself a college, York University. The gap between the two was further tightened Monday night on the CNE synthetic rug as the Varsity Blues managed only a 14-7 victory over the Yeomen.

York football has come a long way in three years since the 38-2 drubbing in 1970. No one will forget the Yeomen's famous first half flurry in last season's league encounter. Monday night's third edition could very well have been theirs had it not been for some bad breaks.

The first of these came on the opening kickoff when Chris Sammut, too intent on running with the ball rather than holding on to it, fumbled into the hands of Charlie Wright to set the Blues up on the York 13 yard line. Varsity quarterback Wayne Dunkley wasted no time in getting his team on the scoreboard hitting halfback Paul Kitchen on a swing screen pass. Kitchen, returning after a year of absence, legged it the required distance taking advantage of a key block by end Dave Quick. Kicker Mike Sokovnin missed on the extra point.

After that the game became a "battle of defences". Although the Blues held the territorial advantage throughout the first quarter, they could only manage a single point for all their labours — that on a wide field goal attempt by Sokovnin.

The Blues' only other scoring play came early in the third quarter. After forcing the Yeomen back deep into their own zone, a short punt and a no yards infraction gave the Blues possession at the York 21. From there they advanced to the three yard line on runs by rookie back Henry Tobias and a "keeper" by Dunkley. Tobias took it in for the score, going off tackle. Sokovnin made the convert to put the Blues in front 14-0.

Though the Varsity aerial attack lacked the punch it has had in the past, the ground game was good enough to carry the night for Murphy's squad. Running backs Paul Kitchen, Libert Castillo and Henry Tobias consistently tore up large strips of yardage following the crisp, positive blocking of the offensive line. It would appear that head coach Ron Murphy has found some able replacements for the vacancies created by last year's graduates.

However, the passing attack couldn't get itself off the ground with Dunkley completing only 4 of 13 attempts for 30 yards. York's pass defence was excellent — split — second tackling and finger-tip deflections kept Varsity from mounting an effective performance.

For the York team the situation was the reverse. The Varsity defensive front four completely stifled the Yeomen's running game. None the less York was able to consistently complete screen passes and 10—15 yard tosses to bail themselves out of trouble on second and long yardage situations.

Varsity demonstrated a lack of confidence in their defence against the York running attack in the second half when York successfully elected to throw for the first down on a second and less than two yards situation. Despite their ability to complete passes, Blues still managed to pick five interceptions and the defensive line managed to get to the York quarterback twice.

Varsity's overall defense — in particular the front four — should not be overlooked. York only managed to pick up 43 yards running and virtually none of this was made between Varsity's defensive ends.

Individually, Hartley Stern and Guido Iantorno presented very impressive performances. Their heads — up play and fierce tackling were highlights of the evening.

However, the York defensive crew had little to be ashamed of. The defense limited a team whose offense averaged over 350 yards per game last season to 260, and never let the Blues work up any momentum. The Yeomen offense came closer than in previous years in mounting anything resembling a sustained drive against the Blues.

Looking ahead to Saturday and beyond, it is certain that the Blues cannot afford to make another lacklustre offensive showing if they want to get anywhere against Ottawa or Queen's.

Blues Notes' In other OUA A exhibitions games, Western downed McMaster 14-10 while Waterloo Lutheran took Windsor 22-8... A pair of twins faced each other at CNE Stadium Monday night — York's Dave Sammut and his brother Chris with the Blues... Attendance was in the vicinity of 2,500.

Rugby Blues opener Saturday

By GRAEME WYNN
And JOHN BARCLAY

The U of T Rugby Blues hope to better their 1971 record with improved consistency and more play of a winning nature. According to captain John Drummond the team had about a 50-50 win-loss record in 1971.

The team practices each evening beginning at 5 p.m. (Monday to Thursday) on the back campus playing field. Anyone interested in playing should report to coaches Jim McClements, Neville Nankivell, or Graeme Wynn at the playing field.

The Blues are rebuilding this year following the graduation of many of the 1971 team. For the coming season there will be two teams, with games on most weekends of the fall term.

The rugby team(s) will play teams from RMC, Trent, Queens, and York for the Gilbert Turner Trophy. The final game is November 11.

Rugby is an English sport which has not gained a considerable following around campus, but it is gaining increased popularity throughout North America.

To some people rugby first resembles "a disorganized cross between football and soccer, with no padding and protection." A brief outline of the game should help lessen confusion.

To begin with, a rugby team has 15 players who must play both offensive and defensive positions with no substitutions allowed during the entire game. Every player has the opportunity to run with or kick the ball, tackle, and score, in spite of having to play a specific position.

Although the coaches teach broad strategies as well as individual and positional skills, they have little control over the actual game. Games are therefore much faster and more free-flowing than football, with numerous opportunities for individual initiative. As a result the play looks chaotic, but such "broken field" running and passing is an essential part of the game.

Speed and skill are at least as important as size alone, since every player has a number of roles to play. However, the skills are easily learned, and anyone who has played some football, hockey, basketball, or soccer can play rugby.

Injuries are not a serious problem, despite the fact that neither team has padding or helmets. Tackling is more skilful and less traumatic than football, and blocking is illegal.

Rugby is more complicated than the foregoing description. However, further details of the play is best explained by the coaches and captain. The first game is Saturday when RMC plays the Blues on the back playing field.

Executive tries to push it through

Vote on day care may not be permitted

The contentious day care policy worked out by the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee is not planned to come up for a vote at the council, according to committee chairman Paul Cadario and executive member Brian Morgan.

Instead, it will merely be reported to the council as "information". The only item that will have to be voted on is the committee's recommendation that $42,000 be spent to renovate the centre.

However, if there are objections to the report, it is expected that a motion of adoption will be moved. If this occurs, the council may then show its displeasure at the "implementation" of its general policy by referring it back to committee.

The plan to replace the present parent-run day care centre on Devonshire Place with an administration-run one represents merely an administrative detail, according to Cadario.

The Executive Committee apparently agrees, as it has approved that status of the recommendations in time for it to be reported at next Thursday's council meeting.

Committee member Clarice Henschel and Morgan are known to object to the fact that the internal affairs report is not planned to come up for a vote.

Contacted last night, two other committee members, Ian Morrison and Norma Grindal, stated they objected to the procedure by which the policy is being herded through council.

In fact, Grindal thought the report could not become policy.

"I don't see how it can be put into force," she said. "I don't think it would be legal unless the Governing Council votes and approves it."

The status of a report classified as being for "information only" is that it can be accepted, refused, or referred back to committee. A report representing "policy", on the other hand, is a matter for Council to discuss and vote on.

In theory, committees of the Governing Council exist to implement policy decisions which the council has made. And according to Cadario and the Internal Affairs Committee, their report is only the administrative working out of the details of present day care policy.

The report recommends that the clubhouse behind the old meteorological building, presently under twenty-four hour occupation by parents from the Campus Co-op Day-care Centre, be used for university-run day care centre. The proposed centre would give preference to children presently in the Campus Co-op, Married Student Residence and the St. Andrew's Centres, but would give management control to the university.

The plan has the approval of the St. Andrew's people, but has been sharply opposed by the present occupants of the building. The Campus Co-op people believe strongly in the concept of parent control, and want to operate a centre run along more libertarian lines than traditional centres.

To Cadario and the Internal Affairs Committee, however, their three-page report, which replaces one kind of centre with another based on a fundamentally different philosophy, is not a policy matter at all. Their view is shared by the Executive Committee.

Do you know that Don Forster, U of T Vice-President and Provost started as a lowly don in a University College residence?

Do you know that the new $43 million library is 40 per cent waste space and that it has closed circuit TV? Do you know you can't even peek in the front door of the Faculty Club without a tie? And not even with a tie if you're only a student?

You would have found out all these things yesterday, at least, if you'd joined the Students for a Democratic Society's Radical Campus Tour.

The one-hour tour which ran Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday from the SDS table in the Sid Smith foyer, featured a running commentary by well-known campus radical, David Depoe. Visits were made to:

The faculty lounge, where the group was kicked out.

The U of T police headquarters. (There are almost a hundred police in the force and, according to Depoe, they spend 90 per cent of their time sitting around drinking coffee.

Simcoe Hall "See where the old Senate Chamber doors were smashed by police breaking into an occupation for open library stacks last year!" and look at the new John Robarts Library!"

In spite of all they had to offer, the tours attracted few students each day. Depoe plans to continue the tours next week.

SAC execs under fire

Secret letter led to censure try

By BOB BETTSON

A motion censuring president Eric Miglin and three other members of the SAC executive was defeated 15-10 at the council's first fall general meeting Wednesday night. There were 10 abstentions.

The motion, by UC SAC rep Bob Anderson, was sparked by knowledge that the four had written a written confidential letter, on SAC stationery, to Governing Council Chairman C. Malin Harding recommending Student governor Paul Cadario for the chairmanship of the Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council.

Details of the letter, signed by Miglin, vice president Ross Flowers, University Commissioner John Creelman and Services Commissioner Bill Steadman were revealed in a Varsity editorial Wednesday.

SMC SAC rep Michael Steinberg asked Miglin to explain to council the circumstances surrounding the letter. Steinberg questioned the propriety of writing the letter, stating it implied that the contents were SAC policy.

Miglin replied that "the letter sent to Harding was sent on the part of four individuals suggesting Cadario as chairman. People at SAC knew that Harding was selecting the committee chairmen and thought it would be good to have a student as chairman of a committee."

"Of the student governors we felt Mr. Cadario was most competent to be a chairman", he said. "We wanted to do what we could to get him selected. The letter was sent purely on behalf of four individuals."

Steinberg retorted that "the letter would have been read as an official act whether you wanted it or not."

Anderson added "I don't feel it is proper to take a position that could be taken to mean council support."

Steinberg and Anderson both pointed out that this is the second time Miglin, Flowers and Creelman have been caught sending a letter without council authorization.

In June the three executive members hurriedly sent a letter to George Kerr on SAC letterhead. The letter questioned an earlier one written on SAC letterhead by Toronto Union of Students worker Paul Johnson recommending Wynton Semple and Bob Spencer for Committee of University Affairs appointments.

The letter written by Miglin, Flowers and Creelman, questioned the effectiveness and representivity of Semple and Spencer.

In this case Miglin was instructed by the executive to write another letter to Kerr stating the letter was the individual opinion of three members and that the executive had not discussed the matter. As well, the letter was to regret that they implied that SAC questioned the effectiveness and representivity of Spencer and Semple.

Creelman replied that the Cadario letter was specific in saying that it was not a SAC position.

"Unless we sent the letter Mr. Cadario would not have been considered with as much interest and we might not have gotten a student governor as a committee chairman," Creelman said.

The complete text of the controversial SAC four letter is printed on page 7 of today's Varsity.

Communications Commissioner Debra Lewis also said "it was not a good idea to keep the letter secret." She criticized her fellow executive members for sending the letter on SAC stationery, signed with their positions, without the approval of council.

However engineering SAC rep Don Buchan bluntly countered that "it is not our business to discuss what anybody's position was on anything". He and some other reps who opposed the motion of censure seemed to regard the motion as a personal attack on Miglin.

Finance Commissioner Vince D'angelo said he was "not overjoyed" with the action of his fellow executive members, but did not feel it was deserving of censure.

Education Commissioner Marty Stollar stressed that steps must be taken to make sure that a similar incident does not take place in the future.

Steadman said that he would feel obligated to resign if the censure motion was passed, but defended the action by saying that he often wrote letters with title and letterhead. He didn't see this as being outside a person's right as an individual.

In summing up, Anderson said that a letter written by four members of the executive would inevitably have more weight than just a personal opinion. Though the action was serious it did not warrant resignations, he said.

Alex Podnick's team is skating on thin local Varsity staff meeting at 1 pm today.

Come one, come all. It's fun, it's healthy — and it's necessary.

Today at 1 pm the first general Varsity staff meeting will be held in the Varsity offices, 2nd floor, 91 St. George. The weekly meeting discusses just about anything to do with the paper and is The Varsity's major decision-making body.

For this week, it is rumoured that the editor is threatening to discuss this week's issues, and the production hassles which have delayed the Monday and Wednesday papers.

All staff are urged to attend this regular event.

New security company moves in Rochdale into receivership - Supreme Court

By BILL MacVICAR

Security guards from the Community Guardians protection agency replaced Rochdale College's own security force at four pm yesterday.

The Clarkson Company Ltd., appointed receiver of the controversial high rise residence Wednesday by the Ontario Supreme Court, engaged the private agency.

Four men will be employed on each of the three shifts. Rochdale's security force numbered five full time guards and two part time.

Residents voiced apprehension about whether the new guards would be able to maintain adequate security. Rochdale's own force, they said, had learned to recognize and exclude undesirable elements such as heroin addicts, motorcycle gangs, thieves and drug traffickers.

The Rochdale community was unhappy with the decision to let Clarkson oversee its administration and financial affairs, Rochdale spokesman Bob Nasmith said at a press conference yesterday afternoon. Charges of mismanagement, he stated, have long concealed an ill-advised and punitive mortgage structure.

The greatest fear was that Clarkson, in its attempt to make Rochdale "pay for itself", would overcrowd the building and leave no room for the educational facilities of the college. About eight per cent of rentable space is given over to the community's various projects. The rest is tenanted at 98 per cent occupancy, Nasmith said, and rent collection is about 96 per cent.

These figures are based on Rochdale's system of allotting fewer people to the suites than originally intended. Rochdale was designed as student housing, pointed out Jay Boldizar, another Rochdale resident, which is to say substandard housing. The Kafka suites, for instance, were to have housed three people in double and single rooms, both very small, with no kitchen facilities. Occupancy of these ill-designed suites ran about 30 per cent, before Rochdale installed hot plates and converted the double rooms to singles at a slightly higher rent.

Nasmith admitted that Rochdale was partly to blame for the financial situation which led to receivership. But, he doubts that Clarkson can make Rochdale pay for itself.

The company expects to collect $62,000 in monthly rents, of which $24,000 will go for operating expenses, $30,000 for mortgages, and $8,000 to paying the tax debt to the city. About $42,000 is presently collected each month.

Even if this plan proves feasible, Rochdale could not sustain a possible $12,000 increase in taxes which the city wants. Clarkson might be able to negotiate with the city on this point. Residents pointed out that the immensely profitable colonnade pays no taxes, because it stands on property owned by Victoria College.

Rochdale's early problems such as low occupancy and undesirable tenants stem largely from the bad publicity the press has given it, Randell said. The drug problem at Rochdale was exacerbated by the constant linking of the college's name with drug use.

The community which has grown up at Rochdale is one drawn together along defensive lines, Nasmith said, not more positive bases. In this respect, he continued, Rochdale could be called counter-revolutionary.

"To hear incorrect views without

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by DeLons Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Passivity breeds racism

A hundred and fifty people turned out to protest a meeting sponsored by the right-wing Western Guard, discussing whether or not Canada should be kept white.

That only 150 people were there is a sorry reflection on the passivity with which our society accepts racism. The Guard, successor to the Edmund Burke Society, preaches a gospel of racism and hate, frequently using terrorist tactics to put their beliefs into action. They claim the basis of Canadian society is "western Christian civilisation."

In the past year, Toronto has been the site of a revival of racism along the lines of the Guard, the Ku Klux Klan, and other factional groups. The ethnic and political minorities persecuted and taunted by the racists seem to be alone in fighting the growth of this movement.

Wednesday night's meeting was the place to confront the issue and the bigots advancing the cause of the Western Guard. But, when it came down to the crunch, only 150 people—mainly members of ethnic and leftist organizations—showed up.

Complicity of this kind in 1920's Germany allowed Hitler and the National Socialists to rise to power.

The fight against fascism is one which must involve us all. The left cannot but be a major part of this struggle.

Yet, those who were there did little enough to mobilize their members to turn out in force. And, two of the most regular demonstration attenders, the Young Socialist League and the Canadian Party of Labor, were notably absent. Such indifference cannot be excused.

As for the ultra-revolutionary Maoists, they did little to advance the cause by making themselves into pathetic martyrs as they tried to crash through police lines and into the meeting. This mindless masochism must stop. All efforts in this vein should be redirected to stamping out racism and fascism.

The like of the Western Guard will not go away by themselves. They will only continue to fester as a sore on humanity.

"...Now, what was it you were saying about crushing the inferior hordes beneath the jackboots of our invincible supermen?"

SAC four abused their positions in secret letter

The Students' Administrative Council decided Wednesday that confidential letters written on SAC stationery and signed by members of the executive with their titles are not attempts to misrepresent individual opinions as the opinion of council.

Or, that's what their decision not to censure four executive members who wrote Governing Council chairman C. Malin Harding advancing the cause of Paul-Cadario-candidate-for-chairman-of-the-Internal-Affairs-Committee represents.

The four,—president Eric Miglin, vice-president Ross Flowers, university commissioner John Creelman, and services commissioner Bill Steadman—glowingly cited Cadario's merits.

Wednesday night, they embarrassedly tried to paper over the incident. No, Miglin did not have a copy of the letter. But, as he recalled, the letter did not purport to represent the views of the council.

By checking page seven of today's Varsity, readers will discover, to the contrary, that the letter, printed on SAC stationery, fails to make mention of the fact that it does not represent council policy. And, the four signatures make no secret of the individuals' executive positions.

Well, then, why the titles? (That's if you accept the hypothesis that there was no attempt to misrepresent council policy.) Miglin, after accepting The Varsity's word that the titles were used (he couldn't remember, he told council), admitted that the four realized that, nonetheless, even unofficially their opinions would carry more weight than those of ordinary students.

That's the point of the whole thing. The four, individually and collectively, know that their opinions will be accorded special treatment by a system used to respecting titles.

And, the very confidential nature of their letter seems to belie the fact that indeed they were hoping their letter would receive such attention. Otherwise, why would they have written it? Harding hadn't solicited nominations from the four or from SAC for the position.

Whether or not Cadario should have the job is not at question in this debate. What is in question is whether four student bureaucrats should have interferred in the selection process of the Governing Council on behalf of any one individual without soliciting council approval, aware, as they were, of the implications of their sending the letter.

Perhaps, the letter was confidential and the authors were so visibly upset by its leak to The Varsity, because they knew that not only were the very ethics of writing it doubtful, but also that they were violating the will of the council. In June, the executive had implicitly repudiated such personalized letter writing on SAC stationery by groups of the executive when they made Miglin write a letter all but recanting from a position advanced in an earlier letter from Flowers, Creelman, and himself to the provincial government.

Council's Wednesday decision not to censure the SAC four for their letter-writing was wrong. The executive—and this was a theme of the Miglin ticket election campaign—should not, openly or secretly, be acting on behalf of students without having first made some effort to consult them.

At the very least, council should reconsider this whole matter and adopt strict policy guidelines which will prevent such things from reoccurring in the future.

First-run:
Fiddler on the Roof is the best show in town. There. True, it is shmaly and sthicky and the orchestra is far too big, but still it towers over everything else at the first run theatres, because it is large, not only in budget, but in conception. The Jews of Anatevke may act like horses' asses, like fools, but they never lose their dignity or their love for one another. They receive the respect of their creators, and if this doesn't sound so rare, try and think of a film since Murmur of the Heart where the director does not think he is better than his characters. Even Fiddler's student/revolutionary — the butt of fet old Hollywood's snidest jokes — has courage to match his callowness, and an innate sense of justice that Redford's liberal The Candidate knows nothing about.

So the women are not conceived of as clearly and heroically as the men; so the music, while better than most musicals, is not all that much better, largely slipping by on the strength of the Jewish scale; so — it's a musical, and doesn't pretend not to be, which is a kind of strength itself. When Fiddler was released, Pauline Kael described it as Jewish Hollywood's tribute to its grandparents. Maybe that's why they didn't bungle it. University Theatre, $2.50 for the Wednesday Matinee, up to $4.00.

The Candidate. The filmmakers are as devoid of social consciousness as are the image makers the film is about. (The moment when Robert Redford "lays it on the line" is humorously pathetic.) But given that, it is a very slick, very funny, entertaining movie, as well as an unfortunately accurate account of how Davis, Trudeau and the Kennedys got where they are today. Uptown, $2.50.

Slaughterhouse Five is pure Vonnegut, brilliant, funny, black, absurd, but un-moving. We can't be touched because there are no people in the film to touch us, just very clever caricatures. That's probably just as well, since SH5 centres on the bombing of Dresden. Timely. Towne Cinema, $2.50.

Revelations
Citizen Kane's Orson Welles (who was 251 created, directed and superstarred in this extravaganza based (libellously) on the life of William Randolph Hearst. (The working title, by the way, was American.) It's a great film, all right, and it changed the look of movies, but in 31 years not a frame or a line has gone stale or campy. This is the movie to see, no matter what. Astonishing. With Joseph Cotton, Dorothy Comingore, Everett Sloane, and a razor-sharp script by Herman J. Mankiewicz.

The Magnificent Ambersons, Welles' second film, lacks the verve of Kene, possibly because he stays off camera. Still, a good antidote to the solid, smell-town Arcadia that Hollywood spooned out through the 'thirties. The studios didn't let him finish, so you may think the ending has arrived rather suddenly. You're right. (Hitchcock's fine Shadow of a Doubt owes a lot to this film, I think). With Joseph Cotton, Agnes Moorehead, and Tim Holt. OJSE 252 Bloor West, Kane at 7:30, Ambersons at 9:30. $1.50 for both, $1.00 for the second only.

Poor Alex: Canadian films are better than you thought. Tonight through Sunday, noted Quebec documentary filmmaker Pierre Perrault's Un Pays sens, Sense. Tuesday through next Sunday, a Morley Markson double bill, Zero the Fool and Breathing Together. Markson will be there in the flesh on Tuesday. Bloor and Brunswick, $1.50 per film.

Report from Engine Co. 82 (Doubleday, $6.95) is a personal documentary by a young New York City fireman, Dennis Smith. It contains, obviously a lot of lurid detail about firefighting! how and why fires start (or are set) and how touchy and perilous an operation it is to put them out.

The book's extraordinary popularity (and the sheaf of praise-filled reviews, from William Buckley all the way left, it got) can be explained by the fact that, incidentally, it is a broader, more resonant documentary. It's a naive, eloquent statement of what it is to be lower-middle-class, to be worried, and yet to try to be a good citizen. Smith, as a matter of fact, is an authentic voice from the Middle America that Spiro presumes to speak for, that Archie travesties.

Engine Company 82's firehouse is in the South Bronx, a true Marxian lumpen-proletariat if ever there was one. Smith realizes how hopeless day-to-day life there is, and he doesn't mind the countless runs to administer first aid to heroin ODs, or to break up street brawls. But he cannot come to understand or forgive the kids who set fire to the same vacant slum night after night, or the ones who, after calling the firetrucks, almost killed him by dropping a full garbage can six stories down at him.

But then he didn't come by his compassion, his social conscience easily. An Irish Catholic punk, a wise-ass, he grew up in his own ghetto, hating dagos and kikes and niggers. He straightened himself out, sent himself to college, joined the department. His repugnance for roaches, which infest the slums and team on warm furnace-room walls, stems from his own tenement beginnings. Roaches are his Proustian maledoine, bringing back the acute squalor of his childhood.

Smith now lives, wife and kids, in a placid little upstate town. Still he comes back to the Bronx, and accepts the risks and the soul-corrosion. This is where he epitomizes that middle America. he does have pity, he does try to understand, he will go a long way to help. But he has little use for suave mayors with discreet commissions who don't, in his view, do or care worth a damn. He has a stern sense of justice, or retribution, as when he recommends a mandatory one-year detention for kids who turn in the hundreds of thousands of false alarms every year. A colleague fell from a truck on just such a false run, killing himself. The men of Engine Co. 82 painted the firebox black and added a plaque telling, in English and Spanish, of that man's death. Somebody turned in another alarm before the paint was dry, for a thrill.

SAC executive four laud Cadario merits in confidential letter

Wednesday, the Students' Administrative Council defeated a move to censure four members of its executive for writing Governing Council chairman C. Malim Harding a confidential letter advocating the choice of student governor Paul Cadario as chairman of the Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council. The complete text of the secret letter, a paragraph of which was printed in Wednesday's editorial, follows:

Cadario: letter's subject.

Students' Administrative Council
 Consell Administratiu des Etudiants
 University of Toronto/Toronto E/Ontario/Canada

Mr. C Malim Harding, Chairman,
 Governing Council University of Toronto.

September 27, 1972

CONFIDENTIAL

Dear Mr. Harding,

We understand that you will be meeting with the Executive Committee of the Governing Council in the near future to fix the membership of the standing committees of the Council and to appoint chairman.

We wish to recommend Mr. Paul Cadario for the chairmanship of the proposed Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council. In presenting the recommendation, we do not support the claim, expressed by some, that there "must" be a "student" chairman of at least one of the committees. We are suggesting Paul because he has the experience, competence and interest required for this critical position.

During his three years at the University of Toronto, Paul has served at all levels of student government. As SAC Finance Commissioner during the 1971-72 academic year, he took a keen interest in all phases of the Council's activities as well as performing admirably as chairman of the Finance Commission. Paul ensured that all material concerning the Council's financial policy was adequately researched and presented in a clear, unambiguous and understandable manner to the Council for its consideration. At no time did the financial deliberations of Council become bogged down with trivia and unnecessary detail, as Paul had left such matters to the attention of the SAC accounting staff. Thanks to Paul's careful preparation for the estimates, debate at the annual SAC budget meeting was succinct and remarkably cogent. He has acquired, we feel, a well-deserved reputation for thoroughness, fairness and honesty in his dealings with the Council and with others, such as university administrators, with whom he came into contact. Paul insisted publicly and privately on the rule of reason and moderation during the recent library incidents, and we believe he will continue to be a forceful advocate of reasonable disciplinary reform within the university. We refer to his timely remarks to the Senate on April 14 when he criticised the extremists who resort to confrontation tactics: "It is time for the university to return to its rightful role of being an institution based on the conflict of ideas and principles, not a conflict of personalities and power."

Paul has pressed successfully for student ombudsman services both within the Faculty of Engineering and again at several SAC meetings. On numerous occasions he has acted as intermediary for students with academic or other personal problems by undertaking personal research or, at the very least, referring the student to the proper university authorities. He is thoroughly familiar with the ancillary services structure and facilities provided by the university.

In the area of the university services, Paul has become involved with parking, the campus centre, the bookstore, day-care, and has served as a member of the Career Counselling and Placement Centre Board. In the face of strong opposition from certain interest groups, Paul supported a day-care policy advocating the provision of facilities to those members of the university community most in need. There would be no special consideration, he argued, to any group basing a claim for day-care on precedent, previous support, or unlawful occupation and intimidation position; he has supported it persuasively and in many cases he has supported it successfully.

Paul's familiarity with the suburban campuses, in addition to his extensive detailed knowledge of activities on the St. George campus, would be invaluable in all dealings with student organizations. He has served on numerous committees with members of the faculty and the administration (most recently, the current Search Committee for a new Dean of the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering), and his gained wide respect for his careful preparation and articulate presentation of issues. The confidence and wide support Paul enjoys from students in the Professional Faculties have been evidenced by his decisive victory in the Initial Elections and articles in the responsible student press. He is also well-known and respected in the Faculty of Arts and Science, having attended many meetings of the Arts Faculty Council and General Committee. Many Arts and Science SAC reps also urged Paul to run in the recent Presidential Elections.

We propose Paul Cadario as chairman of the Internal Affairs Committee because we are confident that he can effectively guide the committee through what will undoubtedly be a varied list of aims and objectives. We will bring, we believe, good-natured, hard-working experience to the demanding responsibilities of this position. Paul's confidence and desire to see the Governing Council function successfully and effectively in this, its very important first year of existence, will be a great asset to the Council and to the Internal Affairs Committee.

Sincerely,

Residence students can vote at U of T: official

By LINDA HALL

Students living in a university residence south of Bloor St. will definitely be allowed to vote in the Spadina riding in the federal election Oct. 30, despite earlier reports some would be forced to vote in their parents' home riding. The ruling, issued earlier this week by Canada's chief electoral officer and reported in Wednesday's Varsity has been accepted by Spadina riding returning officer Terrance Mott.

In one student residence at U of T, enumerators were given less than one-third the number of forms they would need to enumerate all of students in that residence.

Returning for more forms, the enumerators were reportedly told by Mott that not all students would be eligible to vote in this area.

When they insisted they needed more forms, Mott is reported to have said "Oh well, they can't all vote. It's not their permanent residence."

However, following news of the statement by the chief electoral officer which suggested that enumeration criteria for university students would be relaxed, Mott denied that enumerators under his direction would hinder students who declared their residence home to be their ordinary residence.

"We are making every endeavour to see that any student who wants to vote here, can vote" he said.

Mott is responsible for enumeration of all university residences south of Bloor St. since they all fall within the Spadina riding boundaries.

The relaxation in procedure will likely necessitate establishing many more polling stations on campus than under the previous policy.

Students who are not enumerated at this time may have their names placed on the voters' list during the revision period October 11 to 13. Voters lists will be posted in each poll before then.

The original restrictions on enumeration appear to have been based on a booklet for enumerators issued by chief electoral officer J.M. Hamel.

The booklet interprets the residence of a single student as "normally, the home of his parents" and makes no exception for students in residence. "If he is away from it while attending a recognized educational institution, his parent's home is still his ordinary residence," the booklet reads.

However, a statement issued by Hamel this week suggested that students would be enumerated according to the same regulations which affect other electors.

In that case, the definition of ordinary residence would simply be "the place where he sleeps".

Enumeration of students in residence has been continuing on that basis, says Mott.

Crombie shies away from attacking developers, but admits can 'shatter' areas

By DOUG HAMILTON

Reform alderman David Crombie yesterday refused to take an aggressive stance on uncontrolled development which has blighted many parts of Toronto.

Crombie, the only declared mayoralty candidate for the December election was speaking at a SAC-sponsored civic forum held at Convocation Hall.

When he was chided by a student spectator for not vehemently denouncing developers, the alderman replied that the solution to the city's planning problem entailed more than "a good guys and bad guys" analysis.

"It would be dead easy for me to talk about those rotten developers," he mused. But under questioning from the audience, Crombie conceded that several multi-million dollar development corporations "had shattered a number of neighbourhoods" in the city.

He placed blame for the city's development dilemma on the official plan which outlines density restrictions and green space requirements.

The planning process, said the Ward 11 alderman, doesn't integrate high-rise developments into long established communities. The solution, he added, involved changing the "official plan where it is necessary," to permit citizen participation in the planning process.

Although he at one time favoured the banning of automobiles in the city core to relieve air pollution and congestion problems, Crombie said that he did not support that position today.

He suggested that the number of cars on Toronto's roads could be restricted by refusing to widen streets and destroying communities to make way for automobile routes. Crombie added that banning cars was not practical.

The candidate deftly evaded questions from sociology professor Alan Powell who asked why he was running for mayor. He asserted that "it was important to do it now" but offered no other concrete reasons except that he possessed twenty years of political experience.

Community Organization for 1972, a coalition of civic reformers who are fielding several aldermanic candidates, came under fire from Crombie for stating that the mayor was not an important figure on council. (CO '72 does not intend to run a mayoralty candidate.)

This position, he said, is based on "a total misunderstanding between power and influence" The mayor can "have tremendous influence for good in the city," Crombie continued.

When questioned further, Crombie revealed that his ideological position "is essentially a conservative one." He emphasized that he favoured "conserving" downtown neighbourhoods, and he opposed the bureaucratization of municipal politics.

In an interview with The Varsity after the meeting, Crombie clarified his position on public housing.

"We must increase the supply of housing and de-centralize it," he said. But he stressed that he was against large scale public housing developments because "it ghettoes the poor," and "creates intimidation between them and government."

He thought "the amount of state intervention in people's lives is appalling," and claimed that housing projects could be built cheaper by private enterprise.

State-controlled housing is "far more expensive than private housing and it is not as good," added the junior alderman from north Toronto. "To be beholden to the state is bad."

protestors

The speaker emphasized that he didn't hate these other people, but recognized the natural order of things. He said that God had created different races with different ideas toward life.

A listener who was not quite as sophisticated on the subject of equality said vehemently, "An architect can wash dishes, but a dishwasher cannot be an architect." The same man contended that women don't have enough pride in their race and that Prime Minister Trudeau is the most dangerous man in the country. No doubt he had read an article, reprinted by American Opinion, and sold at the booktable, which is an "expose" of Pierre's real ideology and which "demonstrates" the process by which the "Communists" have taken over Canada.

A reluctant East German expressed the view that "Canada is getting not just pink, but red, because people are getting moved by propoganda laid on them as heavily as it is in East Germany." He said he believed that if "people don't want to act as responsible citizens they should move back to the jungles of Africa," supporting Andrews' idea that "the only thing that oppresses these people is their own brains."

A jumpy youth argued that the cause of World War Two was not Hitler. He contended that "Hitler was a guy who didn't horse around; he was a determined and resourceful man. He was not well-liked, but he did his job." That job, of course, had started with an assault on the Communists and the Jews as the cause of the problems that had overtaken the German state.

Twenty-seven years later, Andrews remarks that "the Western Guard is going to do everything physically possible to maintain Western European heritage", stressing the motive of "love of our own people in creating a nucleus of white identity."

Meanwhile, under the guise of fighting "anti-freedom" legislation, Western Guard gangs continue their campaign against non-white, immigrant, and progressive communities. Their campaign includes repeated disruptions of public meetings with mece, clubs, black-jacks, and other forms of intimidation. The wreckage of books at Bookworld, the Communist Party of Canada bookstore, and the recent shotgun blast through its window as well as the looting of the bookstore run by the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist), plus numerous attacks against the headquarters or progressive organizations like Praxis Corporation firebombed in January, 1971 have been credited to the Guard.

Assault and threats of attack against individuals, including various black leaders, homosexuals, and members of left-wing groups in the city are attributed to the Guard.

Scar seeks Seagrams grant for library

By LORNESLOTNICK

Scarborough Student Council is seeking a grant from Distillers Corp.-Seagram to build a much-needed new library. The college administration supports the move, but appears to be letting the student council line up the funds.

The students have sent a brief to Seagrams asking for a substantial, but unspecified, grant for the project.

The brief was endorsed by former Scarborough Principal A. F. W. Plumtre in a "very warm" letter sent to Seagram's, says David Onley, President of Scarborough student council. However, new principal Ralph Campbell who knows of the brief, seems content to "let it sit".

The brief, sent to Seagrams' donations committee in Montreal about three weeks ago has not been answered yet, but Onley isn't discouraged.

Seagrams' Toronto office doesn't know of the brief, but a secretary said, "Everybody asks us for money—it's pathetic."

Scarborough's present library is on the fifth floor of the building, in an area designated for office space. This system was only supposed to last until 1968, but it has become clear, Onley says, that there won't be a new library for quite a while unless there is at least some private funding.

There are not sufficient government funds available now to proceed without private grants, he said.

Half the books in the present collection are in storage, and someone wanting to take out a book must wait a day, Onley says. Principal Campbell indicated in an interview with The Varsity that he doesn't see the need for a new library as terribly urgent. He seems content to wait until Scarborough's third building, in which a library is planned, is finished.

Onley estimates the new library outlined in the brief would cost around $10 million, and believes it is possible that Seagrams may donate the entire amount.

"The tax write-off would be phenomenal," he said.

Seagrams was picked, says Onley, because they are Canadian, have large assets, and have a reputation for funding many projects. Recently, Seagrams offered to build a football stadium for McGill.

The company's assets last year were $1,350,380,000, sixth largest of any corporation operating in Canada.

No other company has been contacted by the council yet.

Toddlers invade Sid Smith to dramatize day care need

The Varsity/Frank Booth

Campus Co-Operative parents and children held a day-long "day care-in" in the Sid Smith lobby yesterday to gain support.

By DAVID WISE

In an attempt to dramatize the need for university-sponsored day care, the Campus Community Cooperative Day Care group yesterday set up a demonstration day care centre in the Sid Smith foyer.

The group, composed of about six adults and ten toddlers ate lunches of boiled egg and cheese sandwiches played games and rode tricycles in the train-station-like foyer.

The co-op group has spent the entire summer trying to elicit some response from the university administration, after occupying an unused building last April.

The Governing Council last week voted to support a day care centre which would exclude children whose parents were not directly connected to the university. A committee recommendation that only one centre be set up to accommodate the co-op group and three other day care groups is expected to pass the council next Thursday.

Yesterday's peaceful demonstration was an attempt to win support from the student body. According to spokeswoman Suzanna Pratt, the response was "satisfactory".

"We will not let this issue rest until the university administration responds to our demands," she added.

Present facilities at the occupied day care centre on Devonshire Place are stretched to the limit, and there is a long waiting list for places in the centre.

The centre also needs volunteers to help care for the children. Those interested in helping should visit the centre opposite Varsity Stadium, or call 925-7495.

'Welfare bums' attacks continue

Lewis: tax aids won't create jobs

NDP leader David Lewis was interviewed by Liberal MP Robert Kaplan at Holy Trinity yesterday.

Corporate tax concessions do not help Canada's unemployment problem, New Democratic Party leader David Lewis charged yesterday.

He continued his series of attacks against "corporate welfare bums" in an interview with Liberal MP Robert Kaplan (Don Valley) at Holy Trinity Church's Noon on the Square.

Lewis added that corporate tax concessions are not justifiable for the "financial risks", which corporations claim they are constantly taking.

He pointed to farmers as one sector of society which takes more risks than corporations, yet obtains far fewer concessions.

Asked whether corporations should pay the same tax rate as individuals, Lewis answered that it was not the tax rate of corporations that he wanted to change, but the huge tax concessions that often resulted in many corporations paying, essentially, no taxes at all.

Lewis pointed out that since the economy is in private hands the people of Canada are at the mercy of corporations. He maintained that he was not against the private sector, but merely objected to them having extra privileges. Corporations, he said, simply do not need the extra tax concessions.

When asked by Kaplan why he was not satisfied by the tax reforms recently passed, Lewis replied that these new laws did not apply to corporations until 1976 and that the corporation were wasting no time in taking advantage of the delay.

Lewis said that the "corporate-welfare-bums-issue" was also tied up with the very important question of foreign ownership, by making it easier for foreign corporations to extend their control.

The government bias towards corporations was also reflected in the favouritism it shows towards developers, at the expense of meeting real housing needs, Lewis said.

On the question of unemployment, Lewis rejected the idea of a shorter work week as a temporary solution and suggested instead that income tax be reduced for lower income people. He added that projects should be started to satisfy people's real needs — homes and pollution control. Lewis did not agree with the suggestion that these too were temporary solutions.

The NDP leader criticized those women pressing the abortion issue by saying that it was divisive. He said, however, that he objected to the fact that women and doctors were criminals under present laws, but was unwilling to talk further on the subject.

Lewis' support of the working class had its limits in the B.C. dockworkers strike which was recently ended by the government with NDP support. Lewis justified his position by claiming that the government was not criticized by the dockworkers themselves. He also claimed that the grain industry and the future of the wheat farmer depended on the termination of the strike.

"The interest of Canada as a whole must first be taken into account," he said.

U of T rates less than some Day care fees near commercial rates

By PAUL McGRATH

Although the University of Toronto's day care proposal will approximately double Campus Co-Op's per child charge, the new fees will still be less than those charged by expensive commercially-run day care centres in the city, according to Co-Op parent Bob Davis.

The university plans to up the fee from the present minimum $40 a month per child to just over $85 a month. Davis says most commercial centres in Toronto charge $100 and over, with some at $85 a month for smaller children.

Although the new fee places a bigger financial burden on student-parents, Davis sees the real problem as the difficulty the parents face in obtaining provincial subsidies to alleviate financial need. The government provides funds for parents who can't pay day care costs but, according to Davis, last year's funds ran out quickly, and latecomers found it very difficult, if not impossible, to arrange a subsidy.

The decision as to who is eligible for subsidies rests in the hands of the Metro Social Services Dept., who use a standard means test. It is not clear, however, how the information is used.

The City decides what constitutes financial need in a family where both husband and wife are working or studying.

The social services department told The Varsity that it will provide funds in a case where a mother is studying to qualify for employment to add to the family income, but will not subsidize the family if the mother is studying without intentions of employment.

In contrast to the U of T situation, York University day care people seem to be making a smooth transition from a centre run and controlled by parents to a larger, parent-controlled centre with no rise in the $55 fee.

Co-ordinator Maria de Wit says

York will subsidize the administration costs arising from the larger number of children being cared for.

The York centre will handle 150 children, while the proposed U of T centre will take in only 50.

Compounding the difficulty for parents is the lack of financially practical alternatives to day care.

Private babysitting, while it can cost as low as $15 a week, usually runs to $25, bringing the monthly charge to a par with commercial day care centres.

York University subsidizes its day care centre's operating costs, but U of T won't.

Everybody wants committees

Priorities SAC meeting drones on forever

By BOB BETTSON

The year's priorities were the chief order of business as SAC began another year of marathon meetings Wednesday night.

The final area of discussion proved the most contentious.

Services Commissioner Bill Steadman stated that the decision by the Governing Council Internal Affairs Committee on daycare made redundant his intended proposal to have SAC investigate the day care problem and present its views to the Governing Council. The decision has already been made, he said.

However, SMC rep Michael Steinberg said that SAC should still spend some energy to investigate what the university has done in regard to social responsibility and parental control.

He called Internal Affairs' day care policy "shitty".

Education commissioner Marty Stollar said SAC should decide whether the Governing Council answers are correct, and press its demands if there is disagreement.

Paul Cadario, chairman of the committee that passed the day care recommendations, said he supported its recommendations. There will be a review of the policy sometime in the future.

Council decided to set up a committee to study the day care situation.

Steadman said the chief priority in his area is to push the university into expanding student services, as well as setting up more student-initiated and student-run services. Council accepted his recommendation that a five person committee be set up to study present student services and report back on possible additional areas of concern.

President Eric Miglin said that in the area of financing of post-secondary education, there are two major concerns: "ensuring that there is a continuing year to year expertise in the field, and increasing student awareness of the problems involved. We don't have much hope of succeeding if students don't know about financing." He added that despite SAC's efforts to talk to students about the fee increases and other issues involved, the problem of communication was still a major one. Miglin recommended that a committee be set up to delineate the areas of post-secondary financing in which SAC should concentrate its research and study activities.

University Commissioner John Creelman said that although discipline had been around as an issue for four years, "we now have a chance of getting a liberal, intelligent policy through the Governing Council, hopefully by Christmas." He recommended that a sub-committee be set up to draft a SAC position paper on discipline to submit to the internal affairs committee of Governing Council. Steinberg recommended SAC set up a committee to deal with the library question with the warning that "if we don't do something about the library, there will be a lot of other people who will." The committee would research all arguments presented and recommend further

SAC action and tactics.

Stollar echoed Steinberg's sentiments, stating that "nothing is being done" on the library. "It hasn't been discussed".

Vice president John Helliwell said that in the area of university planning SAC needed to decide what the future of the one dollar campus centre levy on all students would be, possibly with a new referendum.

He claimed that every piece of research work has shown the campus centre is a bad idea.

Helliwell joined the rest in recommending yet another committee be set up to do background work on student involvement in all types of university planning.

Unexpectedly near the end of the meeting, Marty Stollar resigned as Education Commissioner. Stollar said that he was resigning for personal reasons that had nothing to do with SAC.

The meeting also gave the Varsity Board Constitution second and final reading. This significantly changed representation on the board, which is ultimately responsible for the Varsity.

Five directors will be appointed by SAC, the same number as before, two will be appointed by the board (down from three), one from the GSU (same), one from The Varsity staff (same), the current editor. Single new appointments will be made from the teaching staff, the support staff, and from the retiring editor and the president of the university.

The board oversees the operations of The Varsity, particularly financial matters.

New hope for eaters

SAC plans probe of campus eating

By LILLIAN MERSHEIN

The quality of campus eating facilities may be studied in a joint project of the Students' Administrative Council and U of T's Faculty of Food Sciences.

The proposed survey, to be carried out by the faculty, is expected to be more comprehensive and beneficial than the superficial examination made by a presidential advisory committee a few years ago.

SAC vice-president Ross Flowers, expects the survey to discover ways to improve the services. The nutritive value, price, quality and variety of food served would be studied by the Faculty of Food Sciences, which SAC approached because it felt an expert, scientific study would result in specific recommendations.

Although a definite decision by the faculty on its participation has not yet been reached, it appeared from an interview with Dean I. L. Armstrong that the only real problem left was planning the study.

The faculty may see the study as a way of proving its relevance to U of T following unsuccessful administration attempts to phase it out two years ago.

Both staff and students at the faculty reacted enthusiastically to the idea, according to Flowers.

It has been suggested that carrying out the study might be part of a food science course.

Services Commissioner Bill Steadman said that the food services on campus were failing to meet student needs. He felt, for example, that there was not sufficient service at certain times when it was needed.

Except for the Arbor Room in Hart House and some smaller cafeterias' most campus eating facilities are available only for a limited time at lunch and supper hours. Steadman suggested that restaurant-style facilities or short-order lunch stands might be alternatives.

A decision by the food sciences faculty may be forthcoming next week.

This year, the Varsity will carry a regular Friday weekly supplement, L'Hebdo. L'Hebdo will carry in-depth articles on a variety of topics more interpretative and of greater length than the news format of the Varsity makes possible. In addition, L'Hebdo will carry reviews of music, books, theatre, films, and other cultural activities, and a 'Wakeup' section that lists coming events.

In its first issue, appearing on Monday, L'Hebdo will carry a special community guide, dealing both with the university community and with the broader Toronto community.

Writers, artists, and other talented people are needed if L'Hebdo is to function well. Interested persons should call Ulli Diemer 923-8741; 999-3091 or Bill McVicar 823-8742; 920-2473.

Add weekly forums to GSU luncheons

Weekly forums on issues involving the university will begin next Wednesday with Governing Council member John Morton and Clarice Henschel.

The forums will be held in the GSU upper lounge 11:30-2:00 Wednesday. At least one of the two, both members of the Governing Council, will be present at each forum. A gamut of topics relevant to the university, especially those concerning the Governing Council, will be discussed.

U of T Sailing Club meets Tuesday

By IAN BROWN

The U of T Sailing Club's Fall schedule begins next Tuesday (Sept. 19) with a general meeting at Hart House. Racing sailors, recreational sailors and beginners are all welcome to attend.

Trials for the sailing team will be announced at that time. Last year the team competed in five regattas, winning the OUAA championship, and the Ontario Spring Regatta. The ultimate goal is the Canadian Championship, which takes place annually on Thanksgiving weekend at Kingston.

The Kingston event was won by the University of British Columbia last year, but Toronto stands an excellent chance this year. Several top sailors have already expressed interest. The winning school will likely sail in the North American Intercollegiate Championship next June.

Later in the season Wayne State University in Detroit is the focal point for competition for the Hudson International Trophy. The top Canadian team from this competition automatically qualifies for one of the premier intercollegiate regattas the Timme Angsten, which rounds out the season early in November.

The Ontario Spring Championship was a new event initiated by the U of T Sailing Club this past Spring. It was part of a massive revision of the sailing program which has been rather limited in the past.

Further information concerning the sailing club will be available at next week's meeting.

Injury clinic at Benson to begin September 19

By JANICE McKELLAR

Athletic injuries lurk wherever sports events take place. All too often, though, team-mates, managers, coaches and officials are not familiar with proper treatment procedures. In order to remedy the situation, the U of T Women's Athletic Association is hosting its first Athletic Injury Clinic.

The first course begins September 29 and continues through to October 5. Sessions will be held every Tuesday and Thursday evening from 6 to 8 p.m. in the third floor study room of the Benson Building. The instructors will be members of the St. John Ambulance Corps and Ed Knowlekowski, head trainer at York University.

Knowlekowski is skilled in properly treating all athletic injuries. He does not confine his talents to disabled football stars and will help to explain women's injuries in such sports as gymnastics, volleyball and basketball.

A second course will be given starting the week of October 23 and running for six weeks, one night a week. This session will be under the auspices of Sharon Wilson, instructor and basketball coach at the Benson Building.

The clinic has been organized in order to enable women to recognize the seriousness of an athletic injury and, at the same time, to diagnose and treat the problem.

The programme will include basic first aid, the treatment of skin splints, blisters and charley horses, methods of taping injuries and possible procedures for rehabilitation. The clinic will be largely practical — more doing than listening.

Both of these clinics are open to intercollegiate and interfaculty coaches and managers, nurses and physiotherapists as well as anyone else interested in athletic injuries. All women who wish to find out more about these courses should contact Sharon Wilson in the Benson Bldg. as soon as possible. Act now. First course enrollment will be limited to 15-20 women.

The U of T sailing club needs able-bodied individuals in order to retain their OUAA championship.

World Champ Fittipaldi at Mosport

By BOB GAUTHIER
And COLIN PILMER

World championship Formula 1 Driver Emerson Fittipaldi (Brazil) will lead the field of contenders at Mosport on September 24 when the Grand Prix of Canada is run.

However, at this stage of the competition the final two races (Mosport and Watkins Glen, N.Y. on October 8) will be somewhat anticlimactic. Fittipaldi has already shown himself to be a racing "hero" in 1972.

At a reception in his honour at Labatt's Toronto plant Wednesday evening Fittipaldi said that motor racing was on the increase in his native Brazil. There are going to be some circuits built", he said, "and there is a new circuit at Brasilia, the capital". Brazil receives Formula 1 racing by Telstar full-time from Europe. This is very important for the future of motor racing in Brazil."

Fittipaldi also mentioned that "The government subsidizes sport. The president is a great motor sport enthusiast; he sends me a telegram after every race", he added.

(One wonders if a Grand Prix race will be scheduled soon for Brazil. At this time the only Grand Prix race to take place in Latin America is in Argentina.)

Commenting on the development of the auto industry in Brazil Fittipaldi said that "General Motors is involved in Brazil" and "Volkswagen is turning out 1,800 cars per day for the market". "There is a tax on imported cars", he added "and prices are quite exorbitant. Nearly 50% of the price of imported cars is tax," he said.

Fittipaldi confirmed that "General Motors supports motor racing (financially), but doesn't officially race." Some of the major backers are the petroleum companies — Esso, Texaco, and Shell" as well as such native industries as "Banco do Comercio e Industria de Sao Paulo", he added.

Speaking of the stability of Brazil, Fittipaldi said that the "political situation is much better since 1964. (The liberal-leaning but unstable Goulart government was deposed that year by a right-wing coup.)

"The new Brazilian government is promoting new schools and helping the poorer people", Fittipaldi said. "Before 1964 Brazil was going downhill economically, but that's why we had the revolution", he added.

"There are no restrictions on what people try to do internally in Brazil", he said, but admitted that "there is some trouble with the press because of communist infiltration".

Fittipaldi added that the coup in 1964 has not "affected me personally or any of my family or friends." He affirmed that he was not directly restricted by the government in anything he might say outside the country, and expressed confidence in the new Brazil. "I'm only investing in Brazil now", he said.

With five Grand Prix champion wins to his credit so far this year Fittipaldi has a long-shot chance at equalling the record for the most number of wins in a single year. (The late Jim Clark won 7 in 1963.)

Fittipaldi clinched the 1972 world title last weekend with a win at Monza (the Italian Grand Prix). He had previously won Grand Prix races in Spain, Belgium, Britain and Austria. His present total of 61 points is more than double that of Jackie Stewart (27), last year's world champion. Fittipaldi's closest rival has been Denis Hulme (31 points at present).

At 25 Fittipaldi is the youngest driver ever to win the World Championship in Formula 1. When asked Wednesday evening what contributed more to a Grand Prix win, the car or the driver, Fittipaldi tactfully replied that it was "about 50-50".

Fittipaldi, who has only been racing in Formula 1 competition since 1967 appeared slightly overawed at the reception held in his honour Wednesday evening. He gave the impression of a successful man who had been quickly pushed before the world spotlight — a situation which he may or may not have completely enjoyed.

However, his relaxed manner indicated that he was not entirely averse to large gatherings of admirers. His tactful and patient handling of most of the typical personal questions from the Toronto and surrounding area press was commendably handled.

Fittipaldi said that "Nurburgring (where the German Grand Prix is held) is my favorite circuit". It is the most challenging circuit for a driver, with 125 different corners. To memorize all the breaking points is very difficult."

Asked about track safety at Nurburgring - Fittipaldi replied that it "is very safe for the moment" because of added safety features, "but the course is essentially the same circuit that it was a year ago." (The German circuit has been criticized in the past by its poor handling of safety precautions, most notably by Jackie Stewart.)

Fittipaldi said that "Jackie Stewart is the best driver in racing today". He echoed Stewart when he said that "when you are in motor racing you have to switch off the outside — it's like being in a different world."

"I have an exclusive contract with Lotus; therefore I won't race at Indy," Fittipaldi said. He added that "it is difficult to say whether or not Indy is harder to race at than a Grand Prix circuit. I just watch films on television. I have spoken to a lot of people racing at Indy. You need a lot of concentration on the oval track and it's hard to be relaxed."

Fittipaldi said that his first experience in motor racing on a major scale had been in "Group 1, in Brazil in 1965", and he drove his first Formula 1 car only two years later. However, his family has had racing "in its blood".

The world champion's mother raced in the 1950's and won a 24-hour race for production cars. Emerson's brother, Wilson (28), drives a Brabham on the Formula 1 tour.

Fittipaldi said that his "father was a motoring journalist for many years. Father took me to meetings and I developed it from there", he added. The senior Fittipaldi has been broadcasting racing in and to Brazil for over a quarter-century.

Fittipaldi's father will be at Mosport, September 24, when his younger son makes his second appearance at the Canadian circuit. (In last year's Canadian Grand Prix Fittipaldi finished seventh).

The race at Mosport is 11 in a series of 12 World Championship races. The final race takes place at Watkins Glen, N.Y., on October 8. Fittipaldi said, "We're going to do it one second quicker than Jackie Stewart."

AOSC flights to Moscow

By STEWART GOODYEAR

Through its contacts with student unions in the USSR the Association of Student Councils arranged a charter flight and tickets for 180 people for the remaining games of the Canada-Russia hockey series in Moscow.

These contacts result from the International Association of Student Unions—both the Russian Student Travel Bureau and AOSC are members. According to Rod Hurd, Director of AOSC, the tickets were acquired "by the simple use of a Telex to reach our Russian counterparts".

While students were given preference for the tickets, lack of student response caused AOSC to open sales to the public on a first come, first served basis. Hurd said the price for the flight is $649, equal to a similar charter package under Hockey Canada auspices.

He admitted that a few students have received a lower price, but stated that there hasn't been a policy to give special student discounts. Hurd said he doesn't know the details of how the lower rates were arranged and voiced a fear that knowledge of them might raise a clamour from those who paid the regular price.

The arrangement for a charter flight through Finlay Travel Flight Limited enabled AOSC to decrease an original cost of $730 which had been set for group fares.

The project was set up in late August when tickets arranged by Hockey Canada to distribute to the Canadian public through travel agents were sold out and a large waiting list developed. AOSC has arranged charter flights for students for three years, but this flight is considered unique, since it was done in short time and includes the tickets.

"Hurd said AOSC is "proud to get seats where others couldn't", bypassing official channels.

Between one-third and one-half of the tickets sold went to students. The Russian group showed no opposition to the sales to non-students. These were opened to the public only after AOSC had written to organizations in contact with students "such as Hart House and the athletic department at the U of T", said Hurd. He accounted for the low student response by referring to the high costs and the inconvenient time of the year.

Included in the arrangements are round airfare from Toronto to Moscow, accommodation at tourist class, hotels and tickets to all games and excursions. A total of nine days will be spent in the USSR, covering the time of the games, Sept. 22, 24, 26 and 28.

Though visas have not yet been received, Hurd said there have been no problems in arranging for them.

Profits made by AOSC will go to pay for a tour of Canada for Russian students. This will repay an old debt of the Canadian Union of Students, incurred in 1967 when 26 Canadian students spent a month in the USSR under the care of the Russian student union. One month in Canada for a similar number of Russian students should cost AOSC from $10-15,000, Hurd said.

Ottawa ruling rejected, enumeration botch-up at Devonshire residence

Action against fee hikes spreads at Ottawa universities

OTTAWA (CUP) — Most students at Carleton University appeared to be withholding their second installment of tuition fees this week, while University of Ottawa student representatives urged their students to follow suit, despite the school's withdrawal from the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS).

OFS is organizing the appeal to withhold the second installment to provide the possibility of a fees strike in January. The strike would be designed to force the Ontario government to retreat from tuition fee increases announced last spring.

Carleton Students' Federation president Bruce Cameron estimated that 75 per cent of the returning students who registered paid in installments.

"The overwhelmingly good response" confirms original plans to seek cancellation of classes for a province-wide day of study of the issues October 10," Cameron said.

Meanwhile, University of Ottawa student council president Peter Beach said his organization supported the OFS campaign because it had no choice.

"We were forced to take the OFS line," he said. "We feel there must be some solidarity."

In several summer OFS meetings Beach had demanded an immediate fees strike in September but most other student councils opted for the more cautious installment-paying approach.

About 5000 students have signed a petition calling for the cancellation of tuition fee increase, he added.

The disagreement was a major reason for U of O's withdrawal from OFS. But Beach conceded that a September fees strike by U of O alone would have been futile.

"We had hoped that Carleton would support us but because Bruce Cameron is on the OFS executive they followed the OFS line," he said. Beach said his council had mailed pamphlets to all registering students asking them to withhold their second installments, but the person running the campaign had been in a car accident and could not organize around the issue while students were actually registering.

He had no idea how many students had followed the council's plea. About 5000 students have signed a petition calling for the cancellation of tuition fee increases, he added. U of O will hold its study session on financing October 4.

In Toronto, the Graduate Students Union is joining undergraduates in urging the withholding of second term fees. In addition, as a symbolic project, the GSU is proposing that $100 of second term installments be held back and placed in a joint trust fund administered by a trust company. Fees for most U of T graduate students rose by $100 this year. Other graduate unions, including the one at the University of Guelph, are reportedly proposing similar actions.

Contrary to the policy of the chief returning officer in Canada, and Spadina riding returning Officer Terrace Mott, in at least one student residence, students are not being enumerated unless they are financially independent.

Mark Laughton (APSC I) told The Varsity that the enumerators for Devonshire Place claimed "accepting money from your parents means you must be enumerated in your home riding."

Last week, Canada's chief electoral officer, J. M. Hamel, stated that students could vote in the riding in which what they considered their "ordinary residence." In doing so, he appeared to overturn an earlier interpretation of voting regulations that stated that students' normal residences are where their parents live.

The Devonshire enumeration occurred Wednesday evening, according to Andres Mand (APSC II). Hamel's Tuesday statement on enumerating students was reported in Wednesday's Varsity.

On Thursday, Mott indicated that he had accepted Hamel's ruling. "We are making every endeavour to see that any student who wants to vote here, can vote", he said.

Yet, according to Laughton, the enumerators at the Devonshire residence maintained that if a student receives any money from his parents, he can only vote in his parent's riding, by proxy.

"Only three or four in all of South House" were enumerated, says Laughton

Harry Dunstan (APSC III) agreed that about three had been enumerated. There are about 80 residents in South House, one third of the whole residence, he said.

Mand, of East House, and John Stinson (FOR II), of North House, stated that they were enumerated in Spadina only because they were independent from their parents.

Several other students contacted by The Varsity said no enumerators had been in touch with them.

Gary Avain (APSC III) said that he didn't know anything about getting enumerated here. He thought he would end up by voting in his parents' riding.

John McCaugherty (FOR I) commented that he had not seen any enumerators.

Returning officer Mott, reached yesterday, said that he did not know Devonshire House had been enumerated in that fashion. He promised to check with the enumerators and enumerate it again, if needed, or any other residence he found had been improperly enumerated.

"I'm determined to allow every student who wants to vote to vote," he said. If necessary, "I will ask authority to extend the enumeration period."

Students will mass today: ask that charges be dropped

The Varsity — Frank Rooney

Nineteen students and supporters were arrested last year when police stormed Simcoe Hall.

A demonstration tomorrow against the U of T administration is being planned concerning the library crisis which erupted in three occupations last spring.

Called by an informal defense committee for four persons arrested in the break-up of the first occupation, demonstrators will rally in the Sid Smith lobby at 1 pm and March to Simcoe Hall. There they will demand that the administration use its good offices effectively to have the charges dropped, as was promised by then Acting President Jack Sword after the second occupation.

Facing a charge of assaulting police are Bill Getty, Mark Goldblatt and Randi Reynolds. Tom McLaughlin and Goldblatt are charged with obstructing police.

Their trials come up Tuesday September 26. The four are asking that as many people as possible attend their trials, which are slated for 10 am in the Old City Hall, court 33.

The university did stop charges of trespassing against 19 people as promised.

The issue of stack access has not yet been entirely resolved.

A Senate decision last spring would allow undergraduates access to the books if they had established "academic need". U of T vice president Don Forster recently recommended to the Governing Council's Academic Affairs Committee that they set up a committee to report to him on what "academic need" should be defined as.

This and the trials are expected to be discussed at an open meeting following the demonstration in the International Student Centre, 33 St. George, Pendarves Lounge. Last year's Open Stacks Committee, which helped organize the campaign, may be revived.

Varsity steps into info gap

Today, The Varsity publishes a special community guide theme issue of l'Hebdo.

The things contained in it — valuable information both for returning and new students about living in Toronto — could have been included in the Students' Administrative Council Handbook. They weren't.

Surprising, considering that the Eric Miglin-John Helliwell-Ross Flowers ticket got elected to SAC on a platform emphasizing communication and service.

This service-oriented SAC broke with recent tradition and decided against appointing an independent editor for the Handbook. Instead, an executive committee headed by vice-president Helliwell supervised production of the book.

The executive had, albeit momentarily, appointed two students to edit their publication, but began reconsidering their decision when some members had second thoughts about the control the executive could hope to exercise over the outside editors even with the rigid supervision guidelines they had adopted.

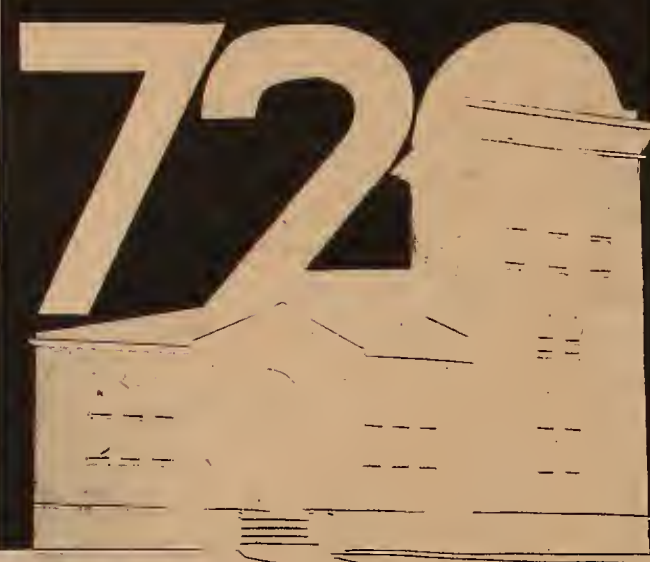

Past councils have been burnt by adverse public reaction to previous Handbooks edited by persons not currently sitting on the SAC executive. And, this year's executive felt that they didn't want to chance a rerun.

So, they set to work preparing an executive-supervised "apolitical" Handbook which sought to merely represent within available space limits the groups offered space in the publication. The result has been relatively useless, uncontroversial filler for the advertising copy abundant in both volumes of this year's effort.

The book, by its omission of a significant community guide, assumes that university students lead a rather restricted life, seldom venturing off campus. In those few areas where it pretends to supply some information, there seems to be little reason to trust its accuracy. In its section on bookstores, the generally more expensive U of T Bookstores come off looking best. L'Hebdo's community guide tells a different, more accurate story.

Students' Administrative Council University of Toronto

HAND BOOK VOLUME 1

THE YEAR OF THE CHANGE

Where to buy books and get a cheap, half-decent meal aren't the only keys to the basics of survival for U of T students. The Handbook falls down badly in its lack of discussion of the key educational and social issues facing the campus students. By abdicating this responsibility, it leaves students to wallow in an informationless vacuum.

Before setting its budget next spring, the council should seriously evaluate whether it believes it really is worthwhile publishing a student handbook. If it decides in the affirmative, it should not pretend that a useful document will likely be produced by a politically sensitive SAC.

The choice, at least in the near future, lies between having a creative, independent editor produce a useful book or a SAC committee hammer out something of little value.

Ad policy

Readers may be a bit puzzled by The Varsity's readiness to criticize some regular advertisers in its community guide. They shouldn't be. Advertising and editorial policy are two separate things at The Varsity.

In order to publish, the paper must earn revenue through accepting paid advertising. It would be hypocritical and economically impractical for The Varsity to attempt to assess relative political or moral acceptability when soliciting advertising.

Any which does not violate the paper's restrictions against ads requesting payment in advance of receipt of goods, non-AOSC charter flight ads, end ads which are judged to be misleading.

The Varsity reserves and indeed exercises the right to editorially criticize any advertisers it deems deserving of such action. Varsity advertisers will not be allowed to influence the paper's editorial policy in any way.

Eat, drink, and be merry

Toronto is the city where you can eat well without spending a fortune, thanks to the various ethnic groups which have, among other things, given variety and verve to the city's restaurants.

As everywhere else, Chinatown is where to begin searching for top-notch food at low, low prices. Usually, you don't have to search too long. The remnants of Toronto's Chinatown lie along Dundas Street between University and Bay. Sai Woo is the best, don't let anybody argue with you. But if you like a beer to wash down your won-ton's, go to the Kwongchow, which will help you out with pages of pre-programmed meals for any number of persons. Moon Wah, west of Spadina, is excellent too, if a little bony. Every one has a take-out service, some deliver, if erratically. If you just can't budge, call the South China (481-6101) which only delivers; stick to mundane items, and you'll be OK.

Pizzas, are filling, no-worry fare, too, and as far as I know, all pizzerias deliver. New York Pizza House has the tastiest pie around (925-1736). Pizza Pizza will put such things as marshmallows, pineapple and cherries on your order, if your tastes run that way, and there is a ten percent discount on orders picked up — they have branches all over the city. (Their $1.75 lasagna is just a heated 39 cent cent of the stuff, though.) The Pizza Patio, on Bloor diagonally across from Varsity Stadium, is overpriced, but then it's the only place in town you can get a beer with your pizza.

restaurants

Other places for pizza (some will deliver more substantial food as well — ask) are Papa Micelli at 920-2201, Mr. Pizza (Dupont end St. George) at 962-5001. If you're in the mood for a true Italian meal, where pasta is only a first course and veal is cooked as only Romans can cook it, go to Capriccio's, 580 College Street. Not too expensive, licensed for beer and wines, and very worthy.

There are several robust Hungarian dining rooms on Bloor down near Bathurst. The Continental, 521 Bloor West, is the best. For less than $2.50 you can get a bowl of earthy homemade soup, a goulash or wiener schnitzel with a peppery salad and potatoes or dumplings, a slice of cheese strudel and coffee. On weekends try their crunchy roast duck with red cabbage and a spicy stuffing. Good for the soul. Go before five or after eight: the Hungarians are very loyal to this place, and there aren't many seats.

A little further east there's the Rajput, which is a purveyor of Indo-Pakistani dishes. The solicitous staff will guide you through the multiplicity of dishes; do be sure to order a biryani.

The Old Spaghetti Factory, tucked away behind St. Lawrence Centre, is a huge, glitzy place chock-a-block with tiffany lamps and all manner of oddments. You can get spaghetti in a dozen or so styles, mixing several on your plate, if you wish. It's cheap, it's fun, but the pasta could be lots better (don't get taken in by the cheese and burnt butter version, that supposedly kept Homer alive while he was churning out the Odyssey). Licensed, and usually full. Reservations, 864-9761.

There will be times you'll want to splurge. Winston's, The Westbury, Three Small Rooms are all unparalleled, but who's kidding whom — they are not students' hangouts. La Cheumiere, which is full every night of the week, will give you a four-course French dinner for as little as $4.00, and the wine list is extensive and reasonable. Your mom will love it when she comes to town (Church & Charles 922-0500). Lunch at the Copenhagen Room, 101 Bloor West, can make a Danophile out of you. Those irresistible open-face sandwiches don't cost much at all and you can have a Tuborg, or some askuavit frozen in a barrel of ice. Go for lunch, though; dinner prices go up on exactly the same items. When spring comes again, and you're on the verge of graduating, wander over to the Park Plaza one day and have lunch, or brunch, on their roof. Really not too expensive, and a terrific view. You can sit in a lawn chair and sip coffee, or emuse yourself with their putting green.

For a refreshing alternative, try Etherea foods in Rochdale. An imaginative variety of vegetarian and health foods. Especially good are their fruit juices and colourful desserts.

On campus, go to the Huron Groceteria, on Huron one block above Harbord, for take-out sandwiches that are infinitely better than the plastic stuff you'll find in the university's cafeterias.

If you just want protein, and are in a hurry, you'll be able to find the string of places that will sell you a hamburger. Harvey's, Mr. Zum's, Harvey Wallbanger's . . . the list, alas, goes on.

markets

So you've had your fill of boiled turnips at Hart House? So you think that not every damn meal has to include crinkly, soggy French fries? So you decide to invite the gang over for Feljoado or Veal Prince Orloff. Where do you begin?

Well, there's no sense running around the city for brown sugar or ground chuck or converted rice; it's the same all over, so save the trouble. Dominion and Loblaw's and Power all have stores near the campus, and, anyway, you can't go far without coming across one. The milk stores, Mac's and Becker's, ditto. These are convenient for such things as cigarettes at 10:30 pm, and some of them can supply you with a bag of ice in a pinch.

But if you want something special, or just like shopping in places that haven't yet learned that chickens grow, disjointed, in sealed plastic rectangles, where do you go?

Well, for starters, you could walk over to Kensington Market, west of Spadina, south of College. Fruits and vegetables line the streets at the various vendors' stands, and you can poke about for hours deciding exactly which tomatoes and oranges you should choose. Butchershops, poultryers, fish markets and cheese shops are there too, and don't pass up the bakeshops which might have fresh-baked bagels. Have you ever tried a fresh-baked begel? Do.

The St. Lawrence market, down east of the centre of the same name, is housed in an old brick building which is usually thronged with shrewd shoppers. Some crisp Saturday morning this fall, take yourself down there. You can get chickens and turkeys with heads and feet still etched (not all. Thanksgiving fowl wines

The monopolistic Liquor Control Board of Ontario doesn't have to offer sale prices to draw customers, as you might expect. (In fact, it often seems as though the whole point of the board was to keep customers away, but this is chengling.)

Still, you can find bargains among its ever increasing stock list. You can get a good, reliable bottle of wine for less than three dollars. The trick is knowing what's what among that baffling cardboard forest of chateaux and varietals. Go to the self-serve store at Yonge and St. Clair, look at all the pretty bottles, and take your choice. Here are some worthy buys.

Red wines: Naoussa from Greece (1786B) might be the best wine bargain on the boards at $2.10. Close are Chianti Brolio (1066B) which, heaving jettisoned its raffia flagon, goes for $2.45 in a respectable-looking bottle. Sappelt Chaiambar Burgundy (951B) is $2.30. (Austrian wines, like this one, are inexpensive and good; worth trying). A bit classier is Sichel's delightful Beeurolais (993B); You can serve it slightly chilled and nobody can fault you for it. If you want a dork, sumptuous wine of true quality, you can't do better for the money than Barolo (1047B) at $3.40.

If you're cautious about your wine and want to stick with a safe rose, Bouchard's Vin Rose (942B) at $2.30 is a sturdy and safe buy. Por-

Reading between the lines

The Toronto Star

The Star calls itself "The First".

This superlative could mean just about anything, but in The Star's case it means that it sells more papers and makes more money than any other newspaper in Canada.

Its spanking blue trucks and posh new building at Toronto's most impressive address, One Yonge Street, Toronto 1, are there to remind the public that it really is the General Motors of the newspaper world.

"There's more for you in The Star", is another slogan they love to repeat — again a statement sufficiently ambiguous that it is not technically inaccurate. In terms of pages, the statement is true — The Star is definitely the heaviest paper in the city.

However, no promise of quality is made in the paper's slogan.

This isn't hard to understand, however, when one considers the stress The Star places on accuracy — a certain type of accuracy, that is. And, in its own terms, it does fairly well — it probably spells fewer names incorrectly, makes less grammatical errors, and has fewer headlines attached to the wrong story than just about any other Toronto paper.

As far as other types of accuracy go, however, such as whether all the significant details of a story are brought to light, or how accurately an issue is presented to the public, The Star doesn't score quite so well.

Some of the most dramatic proof of this can be found in its recent coverage of the Western Hospital worker's strike. The Star can take a considerable share of the credit for effectively killing any possible public support for the 350 fired workers.

The Star gave little attention to the real issue — the fact that the workers, mostly immigrants who spoke little English, were being paid rock bottom wages for long hours of menial, unpleasant chores.

Instead, The Star played up the inconvenience that the strike was for doctors and nurses, by forcing them — Heaven forbid to perform the worker's degrading tasks, (including a full-fledged surgeon who swept the floor) To illustrate the horror of this situation, The Star ran huge, teetering photos of doctors and nurses with mops. This, The Star reasoned, was more important than the fact that some hospital workers were forced to live on $70 a week, and now on nothing. They can't even collect unemployment insurance.

Or, more likely, The Star realized this might be too shocking for its readers, since, after all, one of its main purposes is to create a smug satisfaction with what's going on in Toronto, among Toronto's newspaper readers, just the way Father Knows Best managed to do it for TV audiences.

Which may partly explain why The Star runs dry, lifeless features on what Metro people are doing — like whether there was a crowd at the island this weekend, how many kids got lost at the Ex — while more significant issues, such as how Toronto is being gradually destroyed by developers or how our economic system is failing to solve unemployment, are not adequately analysed.

Apart from the fact that this makes for a boring, bland newspaper, it is just plain misleading.

On August 7, The Star ran a front page banner story with a flashy headline saying Metro air was getting cleaner by the day, which turned out to be mostly an interview with David Rotenberg, a strongly pro-development alderman and a probable candidate for mayor in the December election, who made some unsubstantiated comments about how great the pollution situation is.

Or, there was the "Insight" feature in July on the new superministries created by Premier Bill Davis in his cabinet reorganization earlier this year. The article, headlined, "New superministries quieten most critics", turned out to be nothing more than a series of comments by the new superpowerful ministers on how much they were enjoying their new, more powerful jobs. They seemed fairly pleased, the article revealed, and came out with some classic lines like "Well, it brings us closer to the people." The Star made no comment.

Ironically enough, though, The Star still likes to portray itself as champion of the underdog. That's why they run front page stories about women who needed $10,000 for a heart operation and the next day report that, thanks to generous Star readers, the money has been raised. Or carry on huge campaigns for downtown children to get out of the city in the summer. Although these may well be worthwhile projects, they are deceptive in that they encourage a patronizing approach to the "less fortunate" rather than examining the system that makes them less fortunate.

The Star does of course stray beyond charity for its big crusades.

There is its perpetual campaign for the Spadina expressway, and its obsession with an Independent capitalist Canada.

And, although the paper often sounds like the NDP between elections, once the writs are issued, there is always a sudden conversion to the Liberals.

Then there was the campaign to correct that major injustice that prevented Bobby Hull from playing for Team Canada. Although The Star's continual hammering on this issue failed to win its goal, it did manage to get the prime minister into the act, voicing his support for including Hull on the team.

Which actually isn't entirely surprising, when you consider all the favors The Star does for Trudeau, including running such gems of analytical journalism as the front page story revealing "Trudeau says Liberals unite nation."

But, then when you've got the best classified ad section in Toronto, you can get away with a lot.

The Globe and Mail

The Globe is so significantly better than The Star, that it probably deserves significantly less criticism.

That isn't to say that it is very progressive in its editorial policy or generally portrays an issue but it does mean that its approach to reporting is on the whole more honest and less patronizing to the reader.

There are exceptions — notably its coverage of the May general strike in Quebec, when The Globe ran vivid stories implying that mental patients, left unattended by striking hospital workers, were running wild through the streets of Montreal, foaming at the mouth.

Or, their completely misinformed editorial comments which continued throughout last year's crisis over access to the John P. Roberts Research Library, which moved John Crispo, dean of the Faculty of Management Studies, to refer to their arguments during a meeting of the university Senate as being "right in thrust, though wrong in content."

(Crispo, of course, missed the fact that they were also wrong in thrust — that the Globe tried the old "it was just a handful of rednecks" trick, despite the fact that a petition had been signed by 7,000 undergraduates, won the support of the Student's Administrative Council, the Graduate Students Union, Metro Council, the United Electrical Workers, the Ontario New Democratic Party, and many others.)

The Globe often joins The Star in its quest for the mundane local color. Car accidents, especially those involving fatalities, automatically merit coverage, according to standing Globe orders. They don't, however, often delve beneath the sensational level of the incident and try to find out why there are so many accidents and if car companies, which can be counted among newspapers' most lucrative clients, have ignored safety to maximize profit.

However, The Globe, at least, does have the guts to come out with exposes on government, where The Star usually restricts its exposes to small, rip-off outfits.

Not unexpectedly, The Globe does not long tolerate reporters whose stories continually don't jive with the paper's editorial policy. One-time Globe Quebec correspondent Malcolm Reid, recognized as one of the best English language reporters filling from Quebec, was given the choice last year of heading home to Toronto for re-assignment or quitting when his articles persisted in presenting a picture of Quebec life which didn't agree with the paper's editorial policy.

With the demise of The Toronto Telegram, The Globe raced The Star to pick up former Tely readers. "You make the choice", The Globe's posters proclaimed. They lost, badly.

However, The Globe may have the last laugh. The Star's expensive new presses have been breaking down all the time. Most of the Star's papers are printed at the Tely building, which they have leased until next year. And, The Globe owns the building after the Star lease expires. The Star has reportedly asked The Globe for an extension of their lease for another year. Without the lease extension and the use of the Tely plant, The Star may not be able to print enough papers to meet demand. And, many of the unserved readers will likely switch to The Globe.

THE TORONTO SUN

Little can be said about The Sun that is not obvious — that it's short, chauvinist, and usually misses the point.

Its preoccupation with sports, sex, and violence usually prevents it from adequately informing its readers any better than CHUM's "news" broadcasts could.

Reportedly funded by Toronto developers wanting a mouthpiece for a municipal election in which criticism of developers will play a key role, The Sun sits at the extreme right of Toronto's professional press. (Two Sun directors are also directors of development corporations, one is a former Conservative MPP; the list of Conservative connections goes on.)

Interestingly, The Sun is printed at a plant in which The Star now holds a majority interest. The cent, Newswebb-Enterprise Limited, also prints the recently popular Star tabloid inserts.

In a society racked with contradictions, it is understandable that young people, especially, should become politically active in order to change an intolerable status quo. Social problems, and personal problems that turn out to be widespread social problems, demand a response. Often the response is to move to the left, although occasionally the ideas of the right appeal. Religion, the 'counter-culture', despair, or cynical acceptance of the status quo also claim recruits.

However, the student moving to the left often finds that socialists are split into many factions, quarrelling over seemingly obscure theoretical points, and unable to relate effectively to the "masses" in their practice. Relations between people on the left turn out to not be idyllic, but fraught with conflict and tension, although not as barbaric as the inhuman interactions found in most of the rest of society.

This should not be surprising. The left seeks to overturn the entire world order. The task of finding the right path to defeating the massive power of the capitalist status quo cannot be an easy one, and theoretical questions acquire enormous strategic and practical importance when seen in this light. And the mutilation of human beings that poisons human relations cannot be overcome through will alone, but requires thought and on-going social practice. Complete change cannot come until the causes of the mutilation are removed.

To understand and participate in the social change that is necessary, it is crucial to relate to the left and its enemies. This guide is intended to provide help to that end.

Communist Party of Canada

The CP is heir to the mantle of Lenin and the Russian Revolution; the Canadian section of the "international com-unist conspiracy". Once a potent force on the Canadian political scene, the CP declined under the influence of decades of Stalinism and control from Moscow. Increasingly, it has become a cautious, non-revolutionary, reformist party, concerned with elections and united fronts on liberal-progressive issues. Its deserved reputation as an apologist for the Moscow line on everything plus the loss of much of its labour base in the 1930's and Cold War era have made it increasingly a party of old men and women, although a younger (and more militant) group does exist in the party.

On campus, it functions as the U of T Communist Club, operating a book table and turning out leaflets on on- and off-campus issues. They have been active in major struggles on campus, such as the library crisis, but their small numbers have limited the effect they have had.

Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist)

The CPC(M-L) and its front groups, the Toronto Student Movement and the Canadian Peoples' United Front Against US Imperialism, are Maoist, although admirers of Mao have been known to suggest that the party was started by the CIA to discredit Maoism. Be that as it may, they are in many ways caricatures of leftists, specializing in the mechanical chanting of slogans the production of wild rhetoric, (rival groups are "hens pecking on dung in the backyard of the working-class movement"), and suicidal attacks on police. They publish Mass Line and Peoples' Canada Daily News. Their activities include the holding of "mass democracies" in which they herangue audiences in Sid Smth lobby, and forums sponsored by another front group, the Academic Activities Committee. Two recent clashes with police have left many of them facing stiff jail terms.

Although their political impact is approximately nil, they must be taken into account because of their complete unpredictability.

Canadian Party of Labour

In many ways a carbon of the (American) Party of Labour, the CPL pushes a militant, pro-working class, revolutionary perspective. It believes that both the USSR and China have sold out to imperialism ("Nixon, Brehnev, Mao-Tse Tung, All the Bosses Must be Hung"). They view all nationalism as reactionary.

Despite (or because of) their revolutionary theory however, in political practice they concentrate for the most part on narrow economist issues (higher wages, shorter working week, etc.).

On campus, they will operate primarily this year through the Students for a Democratic Society, (again U.S.-inspired), in which they play a leading, but not controlling role. They will focus on the issue of racism, and on campus issues such as access to the library and support for library workers. They also give much of their time to supporting labour struggles off campus.

A group which operates as a caucus within SDS, but which may split soon, is called Bad Apple. Their differences with SDS and CPL are largely over the questions of gay and women's liberation. (The CPL-SDS line on these is that they are divisive in the main bosses vs. workers struggle, and that these can be worried about after the revolution.)

Old Mole

The Old Mole is one of the few campus political groups which has no ties with off-campus organizations. Formed about a year ago, the group is still in the process of working out its position on many questions. However, it does define itself as a revolutionary socialist group participating in the world communist movement. It rejects Stalinism and Maoism and considers all the existing strategies and practices of left parties to be deficient. Last year, it was active in the party struggle and the library issue.

The Old Mole sees the campus as its main arena of activity, but also supports revolutionary demonstrations and articles in Red Forums to stimulate disc

Young Socialists/Lea

The YS (the youth wing of the Communist Party) is a Trotskyist group, affiliated with the Communist Party. Although they call themselves revolutionary, they practice usually fallist an re

Through the Vietnam Mobilization Committee, they demand that the U.S. withdraw from Viet Nam (while the rest of the world is demanding that the U.S. withdraw from Viet Nam). Through their women's group, they demand the repeal of "Repeal Abortion Laws", refuse to support the women's liberation movement. They support the most progressive movements of the working class, and much of their time is spent in NDP.

They sell two papers, Young Socialist, and hold regular Friday night meetings. They are active on campus and involve many students in their work.

Canadian Liberation

The CLM is a Maoist group formed in Canada from U.S. Imperialist groups. They believe that the struggles for the liberation of the oppressed are indissolubly linked in Canada.

League for Socialist Action

League for Socialist Action) is with Fourth International, but the European Trotskyists. a vanguard group, they are in Communist. concentrate almost exclusively on nationalist issues devoid of socialist content. Their major campaigns have been for an 85% quota of Canadian professors, and for Independent Canadian questions. The urban team has done some noteworthy anti-developer work. Members tend to be reformist liberals, rather than radicals.

Community Homophilia Association of Toronto

CHAT seeks to raise consciousness among gay people, and remove sexist anti-gay structures and attitudes in straight society. It operates a community centre at 58 Cecil St., does counselling, sponsors speakers and dances, and holds regular weekly meetings. Includes both men and women.

Toronto Gay Action

More politically oriented than CHAT, although many TGA members are also members of CHAT. Holds demonstrations and other actions in support of gay lib. Has an analysis that ties sexism to the repressive nature of capitalist society. Contains few women. The gay paper Body Politic is put out predominantly by TGA people.

Christian World Liberation Front

Uses the rhetoric of revolution and the counter culture to peddle a reactionary form of Christianity. Says the world's problems can be solved through love and devotion to Jesus, rather than through active opposition to oppression and exploitation. (If only we love the imperialists, and teach them by our example to love us, all will be well!) Although a completely different religion, they can be compared to Hare Krishna for the way in which they boil down a major religion into a few vague platitudes, and for the way in which they foster personal salvation at the expense of social commitment.

Western Guard

A fascist group which seeks to promote racism ("We need a White Canada"), anti-semitism, and anti-communism. Known for the disruption of meetings and physical attacks on leftists, gay people, and drug users. Seeks to build a base among immigrants from Eastern Europe. Not a campus-based group, but has disrupted meetings on campus.

unions. This has tended to ally them with bourgeois (but nationalist) professors and graduate students, and with reactionary Canadian business unions.

They are not very active on campus, but occasionally sponsor speakers or forums and sell their paper New Canada.

NDP/Waffle

With the formation of the Waffle group in the NDP, the campus NDP club became a Waffle group. The group was active in sponsoring teach-ins and other activities supporting an Independent socialist Canada, but now, with the split of the Waffle into a left caucus within the NDP and an external Waffle Movement for an Independent Socialist Canada, the future is unclear. It is expected that Waffle/MISC will organize on campus in much the same way as the old Waffle did, since the group derives much of its support from students and academics.

University of Toronto Liberal Club

The U. of T. Liberal Club is the official party organization on campus. In the main, it consists of aspiring Pierre Trudeaues, and reflects the parent party, although it sometimes deviates from party policy on minor issues such as the legalization of drugs. They can be expected to be active in the federal election campaign, and the municipal if the party runs candidates.

University of Toronto Progressive Conservative Association

Like the Liberals, the party organization on campus. They too are active in elections and party conventions.

Harmful Drugs

Some drugs are addictive. You need to take them in order to function normally. Addiction, however, has as much to do with economics and social position as it has to do with biochemistry, though the press pretends this is not so. If you get strung out on things, you could get strung out on drugs. If you don't get strung out, don't worry about it.

Heroin, cigarettes, speed, coca-cola, cocaine, alcohol, m.d.a., t.v., opium, white bread, tranquillizers, and candy are all physiologically harmful in large or frequent doses.

Marijuana

Grass and hash are illegal and erotic. Hash is stronger than grass, depending on the grass and depending on the hash. Marijuana costs $20 and up an ounce, varying with the retailer and the quality. Hash sells for $65 and up an ounce. A reputable dealer should offer samples. Discounts for bulk purchase.

Note! Undercover police tend to be in twos, not very freaky looking, big with cold eyes. They often wear their high school football jackets. Look for black shoes and rubber soles. Police vibrate like police.

LSD

Acid has an upsetting effect on editors, parents, and people in politics (with exceptions). It is illegal. Otherwise there is no verifiable evidence of physiologically harmful properties. (Cohen's famous "chromosomal damage" conclusions were retracted after further research, although the retraction was not widely reported. This has been the case with most LSD horror stories.) The fact is, scientists do not know what LSD does or how it does it, only that it does it in spades. It is not considered addictive, although some people use it a lot.

Most people who take acid find their perceptions altered somewhere between slightly and drastically. In some cases, it can act as a mental laxative.

There are different conceptions of the "trip", varying from a completely individual thing to Leary's orderly procession through a universal religious experience. An acid trip is usually considered over after eight to 12 hours, although this is pretty arbitrary. The chemical cannot be traced in the body after an hour or two. The effects are usually noticeable 20 minutes to two hours after ingestion, and remain particularly strong for one to five hours after that. Then you come down.

The first trip is often disorienting, liberating to some, frightening to others. Many find it important to have a friend around to lean on. Some recommend a light dose for the first trip, others recommend a heavy dose. One-half to one tab of street acid (40 to 100 mcgs, clinical) is light. One to four tabs (200 to 300 mcgs, clinical) can be heavy. Above 300 mcgs, there appears to be no further effect. If acid is taken in the presence of those who are uncomfortable about it, that will become part of the trip. "Guides" seem to have gone out of fashion.

In purchasing, note that LSD salesmen are no different than any other drug salesmen in appraising their product. A careful consumer chooses acid recommended by friends. However, we have not heard of "bad acid" in some time. Orange Sunshine has a reputation for strength. Acid coats between $1 and $2 a hit regardless of quality. Discounts for bulk purchases. Store away from light.

We have seen no evidence of flashbacks, but we are waiting.

Other Drugs

Mescaline and psilocybin are psychedelics like LSD. Some say mescaline is physical, psilocybin perceptual, and LSD conceptual. But, it is a bit like comparing elephants. Many use street mescaline as a gentler incursion into psychedelics, although a sufficient dose of mescaline can fill your head with some very strange pictures.

Mescaline and Psilocybin retail for the same price as acid (or slightly higher). Sometimes, they are organic. Note: It may be called mescaline and not be mescaline.

Unless they have changed the law, it is our understanding that mescaline and psilocybin are legal to possess but not to sell. We wouldn't want to argue the point with a cop, though.

MDA is a speed-type drug, energizing and addictive.

STP is not done by university students.

Cocaine is a light physical trip and has been called instant happiness. Instant happiness costs $10 a hit and is addictive if taken immoderately.

Opium see McCabe and Mrs. Miller. Addictive.

Warning: It is especially illegal to cross a border with drugs, and it is often physiologically harmful.

...and coping with the law

When approached by a policeman, two things should be always remembered: the man has a lot of power and the power can be abused.

The individual must be aware that he has certain civil rights, and the individual must also be aware that some of these civil rights will be refused by individual police actions.

Remember Tactic Number One: If things are uncool, play along with the police.

You never have to tell a police officer your name, age, or address, unless you have been 'lawfully' arrested.

You never have to tell a police officer whether you have a place to stay or a job.

You never have to carry or show a police officer your wallet or any money you have with you.

You are under no obligation to stand and talk to a police officer. If you do not wish to talk to him, you may walk away. He cannot force you to remain with him unless he makes a 'lawful' arrest.

If you are accused of a crime, and you are not guilty, a simple denial — and no more — should be made. Your alliance cannot be held against you.

Insist on speaking to a lawyer before answering any questions whatever. This is your right: Insist on it. (It may also be common sense, especially if you do not understand what is happening and the police officer does.)

Generally, you are under no obligation to answer any question the police officer might put to you — with two exceptions:

1) If you are the driver of a vehicle — not a passenger — you must produce a Driver's License, and an Automobile Insurance Card.

2) If a police officer asks you what you are doing; that is, if he asks you to justify your presence in the place where you are found, you must tell him what you are doing. Walking, if you are just walking.

There is no such thing as an arrest "for suspicion" or something. If an officer tells you this, you may walk away and continue your legal business. The officer is obliged to tell you if you are arrested and the charge. Remember — the police officer is the only person who can use force and generally get away with it.

You do not have to submit to a search of your person unless the officer has probable and reasonable grounds. But, the officer does not have to inform you of these grounds. Unless arrested, the officer can only frisk you, but not enter your pockets or have you empty them. When under arrest, he can then "lawfully" search your person, clothing, bags and car.

To enter a private residence for reasons of search, the police officer must have a search warrant accurately describing the premises — address, room number, etc., the reason for the search, the offense that has been committed, and a description of the goods to be searched. The search warrant is only good for the day it has indicated on it. The police officer also needs a search warrant to search your car.

The following is a list of organizations in Toronto offering legal advice and representation. Some of these will only handle certain kinds of cases, for example law students are only authorized to appear as counsel in Provincial (Magistrates') Courts and in Small Claims (Division) Courts. For many non-indictable and summary conviction offenses, you will not require a lawyer to represent you in court, but you should definitely get legal counselling anyway. For indictable offenses — get a lawyer! All of these services can give a client information on obtaining Legal Aid Certificates and direction on what kind of assistance his or her situation demands.

Games people play: Boozing in Toronto

There are 37 valid reasons for going drinking, and Toronto has enough of a variety of drinking places to fulfill anyone's requirements.

The most publicized, and recently the most successful, are the so-called "swingers" bars. These are reported to attract embellous or horny young men and women, dressed in style and willing to pay a substantial (for poor students) cover charge, in order to hear good music and to try to pick each other up. Their long-term goal is monogamous companionship while pursuing a career of boredom and ladder-climbing. Examples are the Coel Bin, Queen and Bay, and the Nickelodeon, Yonge near Dundas.

Similar to these, but different in style, are bars which appeal to young, together people, primarily from the suburbs, who go mostly in small groups looking for a good time, ordering jugs of beer, listening to local hard rock or good blues bands (such as Toronto's Downchild's Blues Band), and bopping out to an adjacent alleyway for a toke between sets. Clothing is informal but nevertheless with-it, and pick-ups are often made here as well. Examples include the Gasworks, south of Yonge and Wellesley, and the newly-opened Generator, Yonge and Eglinton (both owned along with the Coel Bin, by the same fast-rising young man).

Other similar bars which cater both to suburban hippies and to young people living downtown, are Forbes Tavern, Mutual and Shuter (near Jervis), and The Attic in the Beverley, Queen near Beverley, (A favourite hangout of campus revolutionaries).

Establishments which aim to re-create the Old Country atmosphere right here in Toronto are the Brunswick House, Brunswick and Bloor, downstairs, which offers chintzy decorations, and fifth-rate music (although upstairs has Dixieland jazz), the Chez Moi, Charles east of Yonge, providing terrible singalong piano and jock, straight clientele' and the Red Lion Public Inn, Jarvis south of Wellesley, which comes the closest to a real English pub atmosphere.

Taverns providing a congenial atmosphere for relaxed conversations with friends, interspersed with various kinds of entertainment (from either the stage or the audience) include the Clinton, Clinton and Bloor, (the quiet rooms upstairs) and Grossman's Tavern, Spadina and Cecil, which is excellent for a cheap supper with a beer, and which offers good-time music and a clientele of street people, workers and American exiles.

Middle-class students may have an interesting experience in the Hotel Winchester, Winchester and Parliament, a decidedly unpretentious enterprise serving the needs of the workers and the unemployed of Cabbagetown. Authentic country music and a lively crowd and dance floor ensure an entertaining evening to the student who knows his place.

Developments to watch include the El Mocambo, Spadina south of College, (under new management), which is close to the university, and is promising such top-notch artists as Long John Baldry and the Grease Ball Boogie Band. Their slogan is "Of-fend a Friend, Bring Someone".

Many deserving establishments must necessarily be passed over in such a review, but omission is intended for some. In particular, the expensive bars which cater to the already-established bourgeoisie are beneath contempt, along with the sexiest topless bars, sections of a degenerate society that they are.

Hoechst thinks ahead

Hoechst Research Increases Highway Safety

Early perception of danger points and easy identification of traffic signs so that their messages can be instantly recognized, are two of the greatest problems of road safety.

The fluorescent colours now used to mark highways often fade after a short time. But Hoechst research has developed persistent fluorescent dyestuffs which have the valuable attributes of maximum lightfastness and striking visual impact. The qualities of these dyestuffs improve identification of highway danger spots, men working, traffic signs, railway crossing and unlit roads. In fact there is an almost inexhaustible number of identification uses. This is a major contribution by Hoechst to future road safety.

Ahead through systems thinking

The new fluorescent dyestuffs are the result of Hoechst know-how and experience in many fields. They are the product of collaboration between physicists and technicians engaged in research into dyestuffs and plastics.

Systems thinking is the Hoechst strategy. Research, development and product experience in many areas are concentrated on the solution of specific problems.

To keep ahead — to solve the problems of today and tomorrow — Hoechst employs 10,300 people in research and development with a research investment of more than 150 million dollars.

Helping Build Canada

Products and ideas from Hoechst have touched and improved the quality of people's lives in every area around the world, in a hundred countries on six continents. As an affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organization, Canadian Hoechst Limited has a full century of research and achievement to draw upon. In Canada, Hoechst is an autonomous company employing Canadians to serve Canadian needs.

Hoechst in Canada concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, plastics, printing plates, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst products and services, Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. Hoechst thinks ahead.

Best in browsing

If you're new on campus, you might make the common mistake of doing all your browsing at the University Bookroom. That's all right if your interests reside on the well-stocked shelves of literary criticism, drama, poetry or art. But don't expect any real bargains, don't expect books hot off the presses, and be prepared for curious emphases (the occult, for instance, and children's books), for odd gaps.

Fine all-purpose bookshops are the two Book Cellars, one at Avenue road and Yorkville, the other at Yonge and Cheries. These stores keep up with things, and they stock more periodicals than you'd ever want to read (though they're fun to leaf through). Good section (particularly in the Yorkville shop) on film too. There is, by the way, a store that specializes only in film: Cine Books, 692-A Yonge Street.

Britnell's, Yonge a block above Bloor, is a fine, old-style bookshop with gracious clerks and lots of burnished wood. Hard-covers are the big trade here, and they're pretty sure to have almost any newly-published trade book they keep their stock longer than most places, too. I've found, so you might try here for a title published a year and a half ago. The clerks are endlessly helpful about finding out things for their customers (or callers), too.

The Book Centre (their big sign says "Books and Music" so don't be confused, has a very lopsided stock, leaning to political ideologies of every description (though mostly left) and non-political ideologies, like the occult, as well. They have a smattering of current releases, however, and the silver lining is a substantial 20 per cent discount on almost all their books. There are other good, general bookstores around the city, notable ones like Classics Books (the nearest one in the Colonade on Bloor Street), W. H. Smith, and Coles. Coles biggest shop is at Yonge and Cheries and they have surely the biggest paperback stock in the city, but they also have tables littered with bargain books, usually remnants of best-(or non-) sellers, or technical textbooks and handbooks one edition old.

The SCM Book Room, in the Rochdale building (ground floor, separate entrance) is a very good store with a knowledgeable staff. If they get discounts from the publishers, they will pass them along to you. No such things here as mysteries or sci-fi, and general fiction is pretty jejune, but history, social sciences and philosophy compensate.

There are a few specialty shops around, like Cine Books, already mentioned, Hachette Toronto is a French and German bookstore at 607 Yonge. Longhouse Books stocks only Canadian titles, and is bigger than you think. There are more recherche specialties, too take walk down Yonge Street, with your eyes open, and hang a right at Queen. You'll find what you're after.

Second-hand shops do not abound in this city, as they do in some others, but walk over to Volume One, on Spadina near College. They keep a stock of second-hand scholarly books, textbooks and the like. You could find something there unavailable elsewhere, if you were persistent. Batta's Books, at 668 Yonge, has no extraordinary hard-cover selection (give it a once-over, what the hell), but this is a print-have grotesque white meat breasts pra-linjected with cooking oil), and all manner of things like ducks, geese and gama, though these are liable to be frozen. At the back of the market is a feast of seafood — oysters, lobsters and giant prawns, banked on beds of crushed ice. You'll get good cider here before almost anywhere else.

Tired of ground beef and the colonial's unvarying chicken? The Elisabeth Delicatessen on Bloor just west of Brunswick will always have fine, European-type veal scallops and boneless roasts (expensive, though), plus addict's paradise. Mysteries, sci-fi, very current fiction, all paperback, through this tiny store, and prices start at half the merked price. I've found stuff like The Godfather, new thrillers, even serious fiction on their shelves within a week of release. The best part is that they will BUY your old books, hard and soft, at substantial prices. Keep this place in mind.

Old Favorites, 250 Adelaide West, keeps old schoolbooks that nobody will every buy, decrepit Playboy mags and sets of old books. If you hunt around, it's just possible you might come across a set of Macaulay or some such, but wear your old clothes. Don't bother selling your books here; they give you lots better value. If you apply it to new purchases (even that value is stingy) and you'll end up with some godawful book you'll never look at again. Sorry, Old Feve, but Bafie has it all over you.

such nutritious delicacies as calva's liver, brains, veal kidneys and tripa.

Just next door is the Budapest Bakery (they have another branch down in the Kensington Market area) which has a caloria-chocked display case of pastries, strudals and tartas. Also, they have a big selection of sausages and smoked meats, which are sliced as you order them, and infinitely preferable to even the best callophoned brands. Try the smoked turkey, and the pork loin stuffed with onions and peppers.

Down on Harbord, two blocks west of Spadina, the Harbord Bakery has excellent Jewish breads and pastries. They also make good sandwichas.

Steak women (and men) will, I hear tall, scour the city for a thick enough slab of beef to singe over the coals. Pickering Farms, on Yonge two blocks north of Bloor, buys absolutely first-rate beef and cuts it thick and compatantly. You'll pay, however. This store is more expensive than most, but they earn every cent by stocking unusual items and being reluctant to pre-package vegetables. You can always get Schweppa's Tonic Water there, too.

If you're interested in such things as fresh wheat germ, cold-pressed oils, and unprocessed peanut butter, with bona maal or brawar's yaast addad (and you should ba), go to Homa of the Gourmat at 550 Yonge. Even if you're a dacadant, you can get lusciously rara silcad roast beef and make yourself the greatest sandwich in the world. Or they'll make one for you.

White wines of quality ara skyrocketing in price, and if you've davalopad a taste for Chablis or Pouilly-Fulssa, sava your pannias. A dacant white burgundy is Bourgogna Alligote (1349B) at $3.40. You're batter off alsawhara in Franca: a nice anough Graves (1020B say.) can cost two dollars and change; Crystal d'Alsace, a crisp, dry wlna (303B) is $2.60.

Trends in student financing "anything but encouraging" says student awards office

By BARBARA SHENSTONE

U of T's student awards officer last Thursday described the implications of the present trends in student financing as "anything but encouraging".

Patrick Phillips was speaking at a teach-in on student aid and post-secondary financing sponsored by the SAC Fees Increase Tactics Committee at Victoria College.

The purpose of the meeting was to provide students with a basic understanding of the issues behind the recent fees hike. Four guest speakers took part: Phillips, Wynton Semple (former coordinator of the Ontario Federation of Students), Ceta Ramkhalawansingh (member of the Ontario Committee on Student Awards), and Craig Heron (present co-ordinator of OFS).

The provincial government's tendency to increase loans and decrease grants in the Ontario Student Awards Program (OSAP) was stressed by all four speakers as one of the immediate issues for concern.

Phillips stressed that with the great dependency of students on OSAP, and the instability of its policy, the welfare of a great many students is at stake. Thirty to 35 per cent of university students are enrolled in OSAP he said.

Semple felt that the whole future of post-secondary education is at stake.

"The prospect of going into debt", he said, "acts as a disincentive to enrolment." He was speaking on the notion of accessibility, and how the present loan system is "inadequate" in ensuring equal opportunity of enrolment to all members of society.

Ramkhalawansingh said that OSAP funds are comprised of loan moneys supplied by the federal government, and grant funds supplied by the Ontario government. Last year, $14,000,000 of $43 million budgeted grant money was never used, she said, but was instead put back into the provincial treasury.

The grant budget was lowered this year to $32 million but it still will probably not be entirely spent, she charged. The surplus will presumably again be put back into the provincial budget.

It is convenient for the provincial government to rely on the federal funds, as loans, she claimed, and to use the saving on their own education funds to balance their budget.

Ontario grads form new student union

By RANDY ROBERTSON

The Ontario graduate student unions which pulled out of the Canadian Union of Graduate Students (CUGS) formed a new association last Saturday at Guelph.

The Ontario Union of Graduate Students is the successor to Provincial Action Committee established when the universities withdrew from CUGS.

OUGS will deal with the problems confronting graduate students at the provincial level. According to Stephan Kogitz, it will be more effective than CUGS would have been in lobbying against the fee hikes and subsidy cutbacks facing graduate students. These problems exist at the provincial level said Kogitz, last year's Graduate Students' Union president at the U of T.

The member universities, Queen's, Toronto, Waterloo, Western, Guelph, and MacMaster, found CUGS "not relevant" and "completely ineffective", Kogitz said.

Kogitz predicted the collapse in the near future of CUGS, and stated that many universities which are outside the Ontario union at present would soon join it. He believes that universities in other provinces will also form provincial or regional associations.

He said that in a few years there might be a need, again, for a national union. He cited the need for national graduate organization in the event of a readjustment of the amounts of money the federal government returns to the provinces each year.

OUGS will meet periodically on the campus of a member university. It has no permanent headquarters.

The Ontario government is negotiating now with the federal government for one billion dollars, from the Fiscal Transfers Act, ac-ording to a member of the audience. He said he expected a significant amount of this to end up as educational funds.

Faculty backlash provokes probe

PAC recommendations may revise the New PROGRAM

By NADIM WAKEAM

The committee whose recommendations may lead to major changes in the arts and science New Program began its work last Thursday night.

Appointed by president John Evans to undertake a major review, the Presidential Advisory Committee on the New Program began discussing the aims and objectives of the review.

(The institution of the New Program three years ago included abolishing honours-general distinctions and reduced the emphasis on exams. Since then there has been a conservative faculty backlash against the "lack of standards".)

U of T president John Evans prefaced the meeting by commenting that the role of the committee was "to make explicit problems in the faculty" and recommend changes if feasible.

The underlying themes of the report, Evans stated, will focus on the machinery and approach to academic planning, and the goals of the curriculum.

The report itself Evans said must be "succinct", and "clearly understood to readers" with "no mis-interpretation". He went on to say that suggestions in the report should be specific and practical.

The report is to be submitted to the president by March 1, 1973. Until March 1 the faculty of Arts and Science will review the report. During the summer, when most students are off campus, the Governing Council will review the report and implement those changes which are feasible by Sept. 1973.

According to Evans the "value of the report will be influenced" by its promptness.

Committee member Bob Anderson (UCIV) asked why these changes could not be implemented in 1974. Evans replied that some recommendations could be easy to implement by September 1973, while others such as printing calendar changes could not be made in one year.

"It gives you a target and forces the committee to sort out what can be done and what cannot be done in the time allotted," said Evans.

Robert Jervis (Chemical Engineering), a faculty member of the committee, asked how the president was likely to deal with the recommendations. Evans replied that the machinery for the implementation of proposals should be prepared beforehand by the administration so that recommendations will be implemented as they are received.

At the beginning of the meeting, the committee, under chairman Daniel Berlyne, discussed whether the meetings were to be open or closed to visitors. It was decided after a 15 minute discussion behind closed doors, to have open meetings, but with the provision that they can be closed by a majority vote.

Material distributed to the members of the committee included a list of 'terms of reference' or topics for investigation. Topics include student and staff attitudes towards the New Programme, the role of the fourth year, and the aims of undergraduate education in arts and science.

Others include the role of the colleges, part-time studies and the process of curriculum decision-making.

Further topics may be discussed if the committee feels there is a need.

The rest of the committee meeting centred on suggestions as to how opinions would be solicited and what terms of reference would be discussed.

After a lengthy discussion it was tentatively decided, to solicit views in writing from all aspects of the university community.

The committee also decided, again, tentatively, to use polls and surveys to gather opinions from full and part-time students, faculty and alumni. In an interview after the meeting Bob Anderson, one of the three undergraduate representatives on the committee, commented on the first meeting.

"I'm sceptical about the time allotted to the committee," he said. "It seems to me unnecessary to push it this hard because any substantial change can't be implemented by the fall of 1974."

"More time," he said "is needed on the report but one has to work within the deadlines that have been given."

Anderson concluded, "I'm relatively pleased with the way things are going."

The next meeting is scheduled for Tuesday at 4 pm in the council room of the Pharmacy Building, at Huron and Russell. Topics to be discussed will include the surveys and what terms of reference will be investigated first.

Wright Commission report to be released on time

The final report of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education will be completed and released as scheduled, Vincent Kelly, a member of the commission, told The Varsity on Saturday.

Known by the name of its former chairman, Doug Wright, the draft report issued last winter recommended, among other things, that students pay a substantially higher proportion of the costs of their education.

Kelly reported that no unexpected delays have been encountered in drawing up the final draft. Any slowdowns so far have been strictly procedural.

Public hearings on the commission's recommendations "dragged out" until March and some members of the commission were absent during the summer months, according to Kelly. However, he said, the report is presently being rushed through to meet the proposed deadline of this fall, probably late October.

A spokesman for the Department of Universities and Colleges confirmed that the final report is scheduled to be released on time.

Exclusion of women from Catholic ministry not objected to at St. Mike's

By DAVID WISE

An informal poll of women at a St. Michael's College residence indicated most are completely indifferent or only vaguely object to Pope Paul's edict excluding women from the Catholic ministry.

The pope's move last week was seen as a rebuke to liberals in the church, in order to preserve what he labeled a "venerable tradition".

Many of the Catholic college's women in Loretto College had not even heard of the edict, although it received much publicity in the media.

The edict "doesn't matter to me," said a first year student who refused to give her name. "The pope's too separated from the masses."

Another student, when told of the edict, objected to the pope's decision.

"I think women should be allowed to do anything they like in the church," she said. However she too did not want to be named.

The only student interviewed who was familiar with the edict and spoke with any kind of conviction about it, agreed with the Pope. Nancy Walla (SMC II), who considers herself to be a devout Catholic, felt for "religious reasons" that the Pope was correct in continuing the exclusion of women from the ministry.

"Christ, by choosing men for his apostles, chose men to be the ministers in his church", she stated. "Since it was Christ's decision, I don't think that we have the right to change it."

She believed that since the church was structured solely upon the word of Christ, to drastically revise the order of the church is to deprive it of its logic.

In contrast the nuns interviewed did not take this authoritarian view.

One said, with considerable asperity, that she felt "very strongly" about the pope's decision, but was unwilling to elaborate or give her name.

Sister Frances Nims very soft spokenly affirmed that she was "neither alarmed by, or indignant at the pope's decision". She added that it was a "sociological thing" and a "temporary state of affairs".

Nims also asserted that the women at St. Michael's were "not discouraged" by what they considered to be a decision which only "reflects the present situation" in the church.

Blues offence lacking in 24-7 loss

Ottawa trounces Blues

The Blues keep to the ground with draw plays, such as this, which were thwarted by the excellent defensive manoeuvres of the Ottawa Gee-Gees.

By STAN CAPPE and LARRY EISEN

Precision play and good breaks earned the Ottawa Gee-Gees a 24-7 victory over the host U of T Varsity Blues Saturday.

Ottawa combined a consistent ball-control offence and a stingy defence to end Blues home record of no losses in the past three seasons. Although the Blues never gave up, as exemplified by the work of the team's linebackers, they were plagued by inexperience and injuries at key positions.

The game was won and lost in the third quarter. Ottawa outscored the Blues 17-7 in the quarter. Ottawa quarterback Dan Smith directed a predominantly aerial attack, and a loose Varsity defensive backfield was unable to cope with it.

A key pass from Smith through the hands of Varsity back Doug Ball hit Jeff Avery, to bring Ottawa into field goal range. Neil Lumsden's field goal attempt from Toronto's 37 yard line was good.

Toronto came back to score on their next series, Cor Doret turned what appeared to be an innocent off-tackle play into a 65-yard touchdown run. This put Varsity on the scoreboard for the first and only time in the game.

At this point the Blues appeared to be getting on track. However, Ottawa quickly snuffed out any Toronto hopes by scoring on the next series.

The drive hinged on Ottawa quarterback Smith who scrambled for a first down, and then threw to Bill McNeely for another important first down. The drive was completed by a touchdown pass to flanker Barry St. George. Lumsden then converted to give Ottawa a ten point lead.

Ottawa's second touchdown of the quarter came off of a Henry Tobias fumble. This set up the Gee-Gees on the Blues 16-yard line. Smith wasted no time in setting up Jeff Avery for the six points, taking advantage of Blues loose pass coverage.

Varsity tried to mount a comeback in the fourth quarter, but was stopped by Ottawa's omnipresent defence. A very strong Ottawa pass-rush harassed Toronto's aerial-attack quarterback Dunkley, who was unable to find his downfield receivers. The harassment forced him to go to the short passes. Although Dunkley completed 11 out of 13 passes in the final quarter, they only resulted in short yardage.

The Gee-Gees successfully contained Toronto for the rest of the game. Defensive back Ron Armstrong stopped the Blues on two occasions, recovering one fumble and picking off an interception.

In the first half of Saturday's match, Ottawa outplayed

Toronto chiefly on the power running of fullback Neil Lumsden. The Gee-Gees established their running game, going up the middle. The Blues defence was unable to contain Lumsden.

Smith successfully took to the air in the second quarter. He hit Barry St. George to put Ottawa into Toronto territory. Lumsden then brought the Gee-Gees down to the 14-yard line where Smith again connected with St. George for the touchdown.

Blues offence came in spurts in the first half. When they first took possession Dunkley scrambled for 22 yards. However, the only other close play was a screen pass to running back Libert Castillo which he almost broke for a touchdown.

Blues take on Ottawa's crosstown rivals, the Carleton Ravens next Saturday in Ottawa.

Blue Notes: Blues Walt Dudar was shaken up in the third quarter, but finished the game.... Barry Wagdin of Toronto suffered a concussion in the first quarter, which detracted from the team's passing attack... Neil Lumsden (Ottawa) and Libert Castillo (Toronto) both spent their high school days at Northern Secondary, Toronto.... Honourable mention to Blues' linebackers Guido Iantorno, Alex Markobrada, Hartley Stern, Rob Bloxham and to Gee-Gees Neil Kumsden, Dan Smith, Barry St. George, and Paul Kilger for fine efforts... In other games this weekend, it was Lutheran 27, York 7; Western 31, Guelph 8.

Rugby Blues lose 22-15; RMC in better condition

By JOHN BARCLAY

Superior conditioning led RMC Redmen to a narrow 22-15 win over the University of Toronto Rugby Blues Saturday.

An inexperienced Blues team was unable to overcome a narrow 7-6 half-time deficit. Even though the team gave a promising display of skill and determination, it included only three veterans from last year.

The first half of the game was evenly contested in both scrums and lineouts, with RMC scoring an unconverted try and a penalty goal. The Blues responded with two penalty goals by newcomer Rick Hodder.

In the second half RMC took advantage of their excellent physical fitness. Skillfully placed kicks by their standoff and inside centre moved the game rapidly up and down the field. By the end of the game, a tired Toronto team had only been able to add 9 points to their score.

Roger Wright scored the season's first try after strong rucking by the Blues forwards near the RMC goal line. Rick Hodder converted, and shortly thereafter added a third penalty goal. RMC managed two converted tries and a field goal.

In spite of the losing score, coaches McClements, Nankiville, and Wynn feel the team shows promise for the seven remaining league games.

Blue seconds fell before a strong RMC second team in a game that was a repetition of the first match. The Blues played well in the first half and led narrowly at half-time, but the RMC cadets' conditioning carried the day in the second half.

Veteran Dave Palmer with his strong scrum play led an interesting melange of old salts and absolute neophytes. Newcomer Richard Brookes gave a strong performance and scored a first-half try.

The Blues host Trent University's teams in two games at 1 pm next Saturday. Practice will continue during the coming week at 5 pm on the back playing field.

Army spies on Quebec unionists

By DOUG HAMILTON

Enraged Quebec labor leaders bitterly denounced the secret report compiled by the Canadian army on the political activities of trade union militants opposed to the Trudeau and Bourassa regimes.

The dossier was released Monday night by the Parti

Quebecois executive members Rene Lesvesque, Pierre Marois and Dr. Camille Laurin.

Marcel Pepin, president of the 220,000-strong Confederation des syndicats nationaux said the report was designed "to discredit the CSN in the eyes of English-Canadians, to elect liberal candidates in the federal election, and to prevent the central committee (of the CSN) from organizing the civil service".

This report about the activities of the CSN "which are public and known to everybody, obviously is intended to depict us as a secret and subversive organization, Pepin added.

"As in October 1970, he continued, the federal government is trying to spread fear."

The report, said Pepin, was worded in a similar manner to a document compiled by the CSN's rival union federation, the Confederation des syndicats democratiques.

"Here is another example of the association between the three Ds (Dalpe, Dion and Diagle — the leaders of the CSD), the Liberal Party, and the Canadian army," asserted Pepin angrily.

Pepin was referring to the fact that the Quebec Liberal government recently granted certification to the CSN in a sitting of the National Assembly.

He denied that the information in the army's dossier was accurate and ridiculed the suggestion that the CSN and its Common Front allies, the Federation des travailleurs du Quebec (FTQ) and the Corporation des Enseignants du Quebec (CEQ) would form a labor party to contest the 1974 Quebec provincial election.

FTQ, president Louis Laberge joined the chorus of labor voices denouncing the report. He said that it is "scandalous" that the army would devote its resources for the purposes of spying on trade unionists.

But, the most inflamed statement was issued by PQ leader Lesvesque. He denounced it as "repugnant and ridiculous at the same time.

"Such activities are usually carried out by military regimes in occupied territories, but they are rather surprising in peacetime and in a country supposedly under the rule of law, added the PQ chief. He described Mobile Command as a "mini Gestapo".

Neither Lesvesque nor the other members of the PQ executive would disclose how the document fell into their hands, but a Montreal political analyst told The Varsity that it may have been released by an officer of the Quebec City-based Van Deuxieme Regiment.

The report was drafted by the Mobile Command units of which occupied Quebec during the 1970 October crisis. The army claimed yesterday that it is intended for internal use only and was not to be submitted to the Trudeau government as a research paper.

Few students turned out for a demonstration at Simcoa Hall. They called for the remaining charges to be dropped.

OFS calls for provincial strike referendum

By PAUL McGRATH

The Ontario Federation of Students yesterday announced a province-wide referendum to seek support for a second-term fee strike in most Ontario universities.

The referendum to be held on October 11 and 12, will ask students if they will support withholding tuition fees in January to protest the government's tuition fee increases and changes in the Ontario Student Awards Program. In addition, it threatens a full fee strike in 1973-74 if "further detrimental changes" to OSAP are announced.

The referendum will involve 100,000 students in member universities, including graduate students. Similar votes will be taken in non-member universities, such as the University of Ottawa, which withdrew from the OFS in disagreement over the OFS's cautious approach to the fee increase.

Eric Miglin, OFS executive member in charge of press relations and U of T SAC president, told a press conference that the issue was much larger than just protesting the fee hikes.

Accessibility to post-secondary education for all income groups is also at stake, he said. He feels the fee hikes, along with shifts in the loan ceiling of the awards program are discriminatory.

"At stake is the very future of post-secondary education in the province," he said.

The vote will be preceded by a three-week intensive information campaign, and a day of province-wide study sessions, seminars and teach-ins to inform students and the public of the issues surrounding the protest.

Miglin said this was necessary, as the students themselves are not fully aware of what is involved in the vote.

SAC feels that without the cooperation of college councils in organizing the students to vote, it will be a disaster.

Although past referendums have met with little support, Miglin said, he feels this one will attract support due to the direct monetary effect of the proposals on each student.

"The government feels our demands are just self-serving, and if the students are not solidly behind this, they may feel they can walk all over us," said Miglin.

Students have already shown wide support across Ontario for the strike, Miglin asserted. Unofficial reports indicate that between 70 and 90 per cent of their students paid their fees in installments. An unofficial SAC survey at U of T put the number at 70 per cent.

Miglin says there is staff and administration informal support as staff members would be put in a "difficult position" by giving endorsing publicly the protest.

However, as SAC vice-president John Helliwell has admitted before, the real reason for the OFS actions is to demonstrate to the Ontario government that students are concerned about these issues. Rollbacks of the fees hikes and OSAP changes are not expected, but it is hoped that future such actions will be prevented.

The ballot will seek yes or no answers to three questions.

"Do you support demands made by the OFS/FEO to the Government of Ontario?"

"Will you support withholding your tuition fees in January if OFS/FEO negotiations with the Government of Ontario are unsuccessful?"

"Would you support withholding all of your 1973-74 tuition fees if the Government of Ontario announces further detrimental changes in the Ontario Student Awards Program?"

Registrar warns Law, Medicine may not accept Innis courses

By LORNE SLOTNICK

Innis College registrar David King has warned students enrolled in Medicine and Law that some courses offered by Innis may not be accepted by the professional faculties.

Rumours to this effect have been circulating around the campus for some time. Last week King visited several classes to caution students that Innis and some sociology courses may not be accepted as credits.

The rumours have resulted in Arts and Science Dean Bob Greene calling a meeting of registrars and undergraduate secretaries in the near future. The meeting will discuss the whole problem of getting accurate information to the student about admissions, whatever that information is, says Greene.

The meeting was requested by Medicine Dean of Admissions J.W. Steiner, after Innis College Principal Peter Russell indicated to Steiner his concern that Innis and other courses would be given less weight than other arts courses by the faculty when admissions were being considered.

Russell told The Varsity that he had received some "intimations" from Innis students going into medicine that less weight would be given to what were deemed "Mickey Mouse" courses. These apparently included Innis College courses.

Since then, rumours have spread, and King has said that all Innis courses, some sociology and classics courses, and other suspected "Mickey Mousers" may not be accepted as credit by some or even all of the professional faculties.

Law dean Martin Friedland denied that his faculty was not accepting certain courses offered by Arts and Science.

He said that as far as he knew there was no substance in the rumours.

Dean of Medicine, A.L. Chute says the requirements for admission to medicine have not been changed. He said that "Mickey Mouse" courses, "if there are any", would be so designated by the Arts and Science faculty, not by Medicine. Only then would courses be weighted.

Medicine's dean of admissions, Steiner "doesn't normally talk to students", his secretary said. She added, however, that Steiner told Russell courses would be weighted only if it "comes down to the crunch, if everything else is equal" between two applicants.

Dean Greene says he shares Russell's concern that Medicine may not count some courses offered by arts and science.

Chairman of Sociology Irving Zeitlin hasn't heard any stories that sociology courses won't be accepted.

According to Russell, there is no definite list of courses suspected by Medicine and Steiner "certainly didn't name any" (courses).

Any department's courses could be suspect, he added because "we don't have a monopoly on Mickey Mouse courses."

King said that Innis "had a feeling all along" that there may be problems because of the nature of Innis courses.

Innis courses are generally unstructured and experimental, often with students doing their own projects for the whole year. This has sometimes led to charges that they are "soft" courses.

Day care's tomorrow

The university's top governing body, the Governing Council, meets at 4:30 Thursday afternoon in Medical Sciences 3153 to consider its day care policy.

According to a proposal being sent to the council as information by its Internal Affairs Committee and Executive Committee, a university-run day care centre, rejected in its current form by both of the existing university day care centres, would be established in the club house behind the old Meteorology Building on Devonshire Street, displacing the Campus Co-operative Day Care Centre Number 2 now occupying the building.

Students, support staff, and teaching staff should attend the meeting to let their elected representatives know how they feel about the issue.

Subcommittee gets Robarts headache

By BOB BETTSON

The power to determine whether undergraduates will have access to the new $45 million John P. Robarts Research Library will be assumed by a sub-committee of the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council.

Members of the Academic Affairs Committee yesterday rejected with little debate university vice-president and provost Don Forster's recommendation that the committee only be advisory to him.

However Forster along with chairman R.M.H. Shepherd, classics professor at UC and student vice-chairman Norma Grindal, will present recommendations to the committee on October 5 on the composition of the subcommittee. Forster's earlier recommendation had been that only four students sit on a 12 member body.

This nominating committee will also suggest specific persons to sit on the subcommittee.

The new committee would take over the policy function of the now defunct Library Council which last year turned down student demands for open access to the stacks at the Robarts library.

This action eventually led to the bitter confrontation of last March when students occupied Simcoe Hall three times as their demands for open access were repeatedly denied by the administration and the now defunct Senate. A compromise reached during the second occupations failed to be ratified by the Senate.

As the policy now stands, automatic access remains a privilege for graduate students and faculty. Undergrads will line up for stack passes to be granted on the basis of "academic need. The definition of academic need was left to the Library Council now to be superseded by the subcommittee.

The Academic Affairs Committee also discussed proposals by Shepherd on the power of the committee and its relationship to the faculty and college councils.

Shepherd recommended that power be delegated to the various faculty and college councils so that they will continue to operate as autonomous bodies. However he also said the committee should scrutinize all decisions.

Shepherd's paper, which will be discussed further at the October 5 meeting, recommends that the Academic Affairs committee have ultimate power over all academic matters in the university, but that "various faculties colleges and schools be given a reasonably high degree of flexibility in their operations."

However "all changes or new proposals with respect to curriculum regulations, and general policy and practice should be referred to the committee."

Forster and chairman Shepherd will play powerful roles under the recommendations, having wide powers to determine the agenda and what matters will be referred to the committee for ratification.

Scar's new building opened

U of T president John Evnas, Scarborough principal Ralph Campbell and Scarborough controller Gus Harris yesterday officially opened a major new building at Scarborough College.

The new building is officially phase 2A of the college building program. It consists of about three quarters academic and office space, and one quarter recreational facilities. Previously, there were no indoor athletic facilities at Scarborough, only outdoor courts and playing fields.

The inside of the building has not yet been finished.

The academic portion of the building consists of 24 seminar rooms. There are also offices, lounges, and a cafeteria.

The recreational portion, 40,000 square feet of the total 167,000 in the building, feature is a flexible gymnasium that can be adapted for volleyball, tennis, badminton and basketball.

Phase 2B of the building program will be the construction of a library building. The library is at present housed in the first building in temporary quarters.

The Scarborough student council, moved by the apparent need for an adequate library building and lack of action on the part of the administration, has requested $10 million from Seagram's Distillers to privately fund the library.

Rekindles student interest

Stacks committee is reactivated

By STEWART GOODYEAR

Following a march to Simcoe Hall yesterday, an informal committee developed plans to re-ignite student interest in the open stacks issue and to protest charges laid last spring against four demonstrators who occupied Simcoe Hall.

The committee's major concern is to build support for those who will come to trial next Tuesday.

Tom McLaughlin, one of the four, asserted that two of the trials will be political, that the charges of obstruction and assault laid by the police falsely reflect the true issues behind the arrests. He defined the real issues, as the university's "elitism", its identification of property belonging to the public as its own, and the question of limits of protest.

To present these issues to the court McLaughlin and Bill Getty intend to conduct their own defences. The committee hopes to influence students to attend the trial to show their support for the defendants.

McLaughlin stated that such a show of support will validate his defence and may lead to a more favourable judgment.

The committee also intends to demand that the administration use its offices to have the charges dropped, as Acting President Jack Sword promised it would do last spring.

The arrests were made in the break-up of the first occupation supporting open access to the new John Robarts library. While the university did stop the charges of trespassing against the 19 involved, the more serious charges were not removed.

Facing a charge of assaulting police are Getty, Mark Goldblatt, and Randi Reynolds. McLaughlin and Goldblatt are charged with obstructing police.

Although the march was joined by only a small number of people the organizers remained optimistic. McLaughlin said that the open stacks issue last year began with a similar small nucleus of people, the Open Stacks Committee, who developed support throughout the campus.

But by appearances at least, yesterday's demonstration was an anemic one. A Sid Smith rally was attended primarily by radical campus groups. Choams and McLaughlin made short speeches summarizing the history of the library access issue and the meaning of the trial.

A group of thirty then marched to Simcoe Hall carrying posters and shouting slogans such as "Open the stacks".

Two demonstrators were chosen to enter Simcoe Hall to present their case to the administration.

High school students end strike

PETERBOROUGH (CUP) — A series of rotating strikes by Peterborough high school students has been called off, after their teachers reached a tentative contract settlement with the Peterborough Country Board of Education yesterday.

The strikes began as a full-scale walk-out September 11 to protest a work-to-rule campaign by teachers, which had been depriving students of normal extra-curricular activities since the beginning of the school year.

About 3,000 of an estimated student population of 7,400 joined the city-wide strike, which was shifted to a rotating basis when student leaders realized they could not sustain a general strike. In the final stages, student council representatives were planning to run their own extra-curricular activities, rather than continue the strikes.

Today's agreement was reached after more than seven hours of negotiations. The proposed settlement will be presented to teachers today, but they will not vote on the contract until at least Thursday.

Meanwhile, a work-to-rule slowdown by Ottawa high school teachers continues with students considering further strike action after a one-day walkout last Friday.

The were stopped at the doors by U of T police, who said a day care delegation had already been granted an audience. While other students periodically entered Simcoe Hall without difficulty, the demonstrators were kept out.

Questioned later, the police sergeant who had barred the protesters said vaguely that the decision had not been his own. He would not give any indication from whom the orders came.

One short flurry of excitement occurred when U of T vice-president Alex Rankin rushed past the demonstrating students.

When they called out to ask what the university intends to do about the charges he smiled, turned his head away and said "I dunno."

York builds while U of T cuts day care

In contrast to U of T's proposed 50 day care places, York University has responded to an apparent need by planning a 150-place centre for next September.

York's centre already accommodates 65 children, while the proposed U of T centre on Devonshire Place will actually reduce the number of places available in university-aided centres. The occupied Devonshire Campus Co-Op centre, together with the St. Andrew's Day Nursery (which must move from its present location) already have a total of 49-children eligible for the new centre. In addition, each has many others, who because their parents are merely from the surrounding community and not directly connected to the university, are not eligible.

Maria de Wit, a spokesman for the York parents, says that the university plans to pay for about half the construction costs of the building, while the other half plus the operating costs must be born by the parents. By combining day care with academic activities within the centre, York vice-president Bill Small says the university will be eligible for government formula financing grants.

De Wit says the proposal allows the parents to control policy at the centre, again in contrast to U of T's proposal, which would set up an advisory board half composed of parents, with extremely limited powers.

At present, York's temporary centre is run day-to-day by seven full-time staff and three parent co-ordinators. Once a month, a general meeting of parents sets policy.

However, a portion of the centre will be allotted to commercial day care, for parents who do not wish to become involved in the running of the centre. It will be more expensive than the parent-run section.

U of T's Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council rejected a report recommending that the university support more than one kind of day care.

"Canada as a whole suffers when any of her citizens is denied his rights; for that injustice places the rights of all of us in jeopardy."

— Pierre Elliott Trudeau,
October 2, 1968.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by DeSons Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Who should university's day care policy serve?

Tomorrow afternoon, the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee will try to sneak through its controversial report establishing an unwanted daycare centre on the premises now occupied by Campus Co-operative Day Care Centre Number 2.

The committee's plan, which would displace the Devonshire day care centre for a university-run centre, was to quietly shove their report through the Governing Council as a matter of information rather than introducing recommendations on which the council would have the opportunity to vote.

Manoeuvre strategist Paul Cederlo, student chairman of the committee, reasons that the specific proposals do no more than implement the general policy adopted by the council at its last meeting and do not require full council consideration.

This is not the case. Although August 31 motions intentionally sidestep recognizing the children and parents occupying the Davonshira site, they do not blueprint a centre where parental control in its day-to-day operations would be minimal. The committee's proposals create this type of centre, the antithesis of everything for which the Campus Co-op people have been working.

It's true that the St. Andrew's Day Care people, who operate the other centre serving the university community, do not endorse as much parental control as the Campus Co-op does. But, the solution to this impasse is not to dictate that Campus Co-op children and parents cannot receive the kind of day care they want, but to offer the university community a choice of approaches that was the recommendation of the university-established Day Care Advisory Board, but Internal Affairs rejected it. (An earlier editorial has dealt with some of the probable reasons leading to this decision.)

And, St. Andrew's in a letter published on page 5 of today's Varsity, clarify their position, explaining that they too find the Internal Affairs proposal unacceptable.

One starts to wonder who the new policy is designed to serve: the consumers of the service or the administrators?

Students, support staff, and progressive teaching staff should attend today's Governing Council meeting to let their representatives know that the proposed day care solution is no solution.

And, governors should seriously question the propriety of the committee and the Executive Committee trying to get the proposals adopted without adequate council debate.

Gov't snoopers characterize police state

When the Trudeau government turned Quebec into a police state during the 1970 Quebec crisis many Canadians, it themselves believe that the suspension of civil rights and the dawn raids on the government's political opponents were a passing occurrence demanded by the gravity of the situation.

They were wrong. All that had happened was that the shroud of secrecy under which government agents spy on dissidents and activists could be momentarily lifted. Indeed, because of the mass scale on which the 1970 Quebec inquisition proceeded, it would have been difficult to have kept the large scale raids secret.

But, most Canadians, uneffected by the ravages of the government's unfounded attack, couldn't or wouldn't believe what was happening. And, with the passage of a little time, they found it easy to forget all about it.

Sunday's release of secret defence department intelligence files on top Quebec labor leaders may case them to think again. For once again, the government, unintentionally, has been forced to show its hand, forced to prove that, despite all the myths we hear about living in a really democratic country, government opponents here are as practically limited in their freedom of activity by (government surveillance) as detractors claim the communist countries are.

Describing the internal affairs of the Quebec-based, activist Confederation of National Trade Unions, the government snoopers accused the CNTU of assisting "various separatist and communist elements". That may well be. But, since when is the non-violent political activity of any organization the realm of government inquiry in a supposed democracy?

What we do know for fact is that the CNT and its leaders have been among the forefront of Quebec activism and thus by definition the harshest critics of the policies of the Trudeau and Bourasse governments. Since Trudeau is fond of denigrating his opponents by claiming they lack popular support, it's important to recall that the CNTU, the Quebec

Teachers Corporation and the Quebec Federation of Labor are the Common Front mobilized thousands of Quebec workers this spring to nearly paralyze Quebec when they were pressing their contract demands.

To suggest that the Common Front then enjoyed and its one-time constituent members now enjoy broad support cannot be debatable. It's equally obvious that the governments which pretend to represent the people of Quebec are not prepared to allow the Quebecers to determine their own destiny and have stepped up their surveillance of dissidents.

Canadians cannot repeat their 1970 complacency. They must demand an end to the army's spying on innocent citizens.

The Quebec labor paper is undoubtedly just the tip of the spy iceberg, an integral element of the web of intrigue and deception practised by government agencies on all levels. (A Globe and Mail report on last week's clash outside the Western Guard meeting detailed the presence of police surveillance teams photographing the protestors. And, a police official told that paper's reporter that he recognized many of those present from mug shots taken at earlier demonstrations.)

What this incident illustrates is the desperate struggle by those in power to repress reform and change from within the system, let alone from without.

Varsity editorial policy is approved at production day staff meetings. It is shaped within the guidelines set by a general policy staff meeting, held in late summer, and the weekly staff meetings.

Varsity editorials do not necessarily represent the personal opinions of the editor.

The existence of the staff or editorial collective, in which all staff members who have demonstrated their commitment to the paper, have an equal voice, does not presuppose that the paper's staff is politically monolithic. However, it does assume that the paper's published editorial policy positions represents its official editorial policy.

St. Andrew's doesn't like admin plan either

Friday's Varsity states that university's day care plan has the approval of St. Andrew's-University Day Nursery. This is incorrect. Moreover, there seems to be some misunderstanding as to the role St. Andrew's has played in the current day care situation. We would like to acquaint you, first, with the part we have played in the past in day care in this university, secondly, with our role in urging the administration to formulate its current policy, and thirdly, with our feelings about that current policy.

In 1967 St. Andrew's-University Day Nursery was established as a day care centre serving, mainly, children of University of Toronto graduate students. Rent-free space was provided by St. Andrew's United Church, and the renovations were paid for by the University of Toronto. In January of this year St. Andrew's Church informed us that their building would be torn down within the year and that we would; therefore have to seek new accommodation. We made a long and thorough search in the general area of the university and were completely unable to find any suitable space. In April, therefore, we approached the administration requesting that we be provided space in the university. We were willing to pay some rent for this space and to undertake the cost of renovations ourselves, since money had been set aside by our parents over the years for the relocation we knew would probably be necessary after our first five or six years of operation.

Another proposal that had been made earlier to the administration came from the Department of Psychology. It requested that space be provided them for child research facility, with the intention that St. Andrew's become that facility.

Again, some rent was offered for his space. Both proposals those of St. Andrew's and the Psychology department were turned down because day care had become an important issue in light of requests for space that were coming from the Campus Co-op. In response to the occupation of the Devonshire building by the Campus Co-op and to our requests for help the administration first indicated, in May, its willingness to provide space and support for day care on this campus.

A committee set up in July to study the situation made recommendations that were generally acceptable to both St. Andrew's and the Campus Co-op. During a series of meetings in July between our two day care centres it had become evident that our philosophies of day care were so different as to make it impossible for a joint program to be set up. This was recognized by the committee in its recommendation that separate facilities be offered to the two groups so that the two programs, both proven successful, could continue. The committee also recognized the greater ability of St. Andrew's to pay a large part of its own way. The administration, however, has chosen to ignore the recommendations of that committee for separate facilities.

St. Andrew's did support a much modified version of the model for day care that was approved by the Internal Affairs Committee last week. It should be noted, however, that our proposed modifications were not accepted by that committee. The position taken by us then was that if there were to be only one day care centre our modified version of Model I would be the model that would be most acceptable to our parents. But we are absolutely opposed to the model of day care finally accepted by the committee as well as the more general day care policy they approved.

We have been offered something that is unacceptable to both of the groups now providing day care to the university community. You are aware of the Campus Co-op's objections. Our own are as follows. First of all, we regret the waste that is involved in doing away with a successful and unique program. St. Andrew's has established a reputation for excellent day care, and there are very few, if any, private or co-operative day nurseries in the vicinity of the university that are able to match it. Secondly, the university's proposal will probably help only a few of our parents. Because of the fact that access to the 50 spaces provided will be on the basis of financial and personal need, many of our graduate students will simply be too "rich" to compete with undergraduate and staff parents (although they are too poor to buy a house in the downtown area or pay $700 or $800 a month rent for suitable space). Those who are not accepted into the university's centre simply have no place else to go that matches the quality of St. Andrew's. Third, it is extremely difficult to see how a program can be set up in the university's new day care centre that would be very appealing to both the kind of parents that would have been attracted to St. Andrew's and the kind that would have been attracted to Campus Co-op.

Certainly the Campus Co-op has little to gain from the university's new policy. We have probably less to gain. It is unfortunate that, with minimal assistance, we could have continued to provide a valuable service for at least one segment of the university community. We are glad the university has formally recognized the need for its involvement in day care, but we feel strongly that the particular policy it has formulated is wasteful because it does not make use of resources already available, and that it will certainly be of little benefit either to us or the Campus Co-op.

In reply to Brian Mossop's letter about non-inclusion of leftist groups in the Handbook, I wish to sincerely apologize for my negligence in this matter.

A lot of the assembly of Handbook submissions from campus groups was left to other people working on the book. It was my understanding that all the groups we could locate were contacted. I have checked and been assured that this was done, but unfortunately the contacts were mostly by phone and were not adequately recorded, so I cannot demonstrate that the effort to contact leftist groups was as vigorous as the effort to contact the groups which were included. Certainly, there are other campus groups which were not included because the member who was contacted and who assured us he would arrange for a submission failed to do so.

Nonetheless, the overlooking of all leftist groups was inappropriate in a Handbook that was intended to reflect the diversity of campus opinion, and I apologize for not making a special effort to get submissions from leftist groups to ensure better balance in the Handbook.

Chairman dislikes bureaucracy

Perhaps some clarification regarding my position on the Arts and Science Union would be helpful. I have tried in the past to keep my criticisms private, as I am chairman of the ad hoc steering committee; but now that I have been mentioned and my opposition cited, I guess I'd better own up.

I began the summer convinced that an Arts and Science Union was not only a constitutional necessity; I felt it would aid immensely the work of course unions, college education groups, and other student groups within the faculty. I am no longer so convinced. An organized union, from my point of view shared, I might add, by a great number of people would amount to a middle-level bureaucracy, nothing more. The diversity of the faculty creates organizational problems no co-ordinating unit can deal with; an organized, structured union by its own logic would create policy for such undertakings as course evaluations and participation on departmental committees. No representative body can avoid legislating.

To be sure, co-ordination and aid in these undertakings were the intended functions of an Arts and Science Union. But, we had conceived these matters to be the province of informal working groups. To create a governing body with elected presidents and executives would be to set up a monster; it would in no way aid such efforts, but would through frustration alone, perhaps attempt to bring these under its control.

It seems clear to myself, and to a number of other concerned hacks, that a subcommittee of the Education Commission, with guaranteed autonomy, would facilitate informal contact among groups in the Arts Faculty without multiplying governing bodies, executives, hired fieldworkers, and policy resolutions to the point of absurdity.

I ought to add that this is in no way the opinion of the Arts and Science Steering Committee, nor the official policy of the St. Mike's Students' Union, nor the stand (not as yet taken) of SAC or its Education Commission; and that it does not reflect on the energy or the quality of the work Phil Dack has done through the summer.

SAC tasters pick best Toronto pizza

I wish to point out a grave oversight committed by Bill MacVicar in his article "Eat, drink, and be merry" in Monday's issue of The Varsity.

Let me first point out that it is not my intention to criticize MacVicar on grounds of lack of comprehensiveness. For it was quite obvious that the reporter in question was not attempting to be comprehensive in his treatment of Toronto's gastronomia. And indeed one would and should not demand or expect comprehensiveness in such a matter!

However, I do believe that the readers of The Varsity have a right to demand and expect thoroughness and taste!

Now, I fully agree that New York Pizza House has a "tasty pie" indeed, it has a very "tasty pie". But, for MacVicar to refer to the mentioned establishment's product as "the tastiest pie around" reveals not only his lack of experience and worldliness but also testifies to his ignorance in matters of campus politics.

If MacVicar had more thoroughly researched his article, he would have known that on August 10, 1972, after months of extensive and costly research covering two continents, the Education Commission of the SAC passed the following motion. "Posillipo Pizzeria makes the best pizza in Toronto". (For the information of editor and reader, Posillipo Pizzeria (531-5213) is located at 1140 Davenport (at Ossington). Though the location is, not overly convenient for most people, Posillipo Pizzeria does offer fast, reliable delivery).

At the September 13 meeting of Council, the SAC accepted this motion as official SAC policy!

Now, I grant you that the adoption of this important policy stand did not go entirely unopposed. Charles Vickery, SAC rep from the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering, moved to table the minutes in question undoubtedly so as to allow himself the opportunity to research the matter more thoroughly an earlier motion to table so as to allow a pizza to be ordered having been censoriously defeated. Though Vickery's motion failed when the policy was finally adopted, a number of oppositions were recorded. However, it should be pointed out that of those who voted against the motion had had the opportunity to be seduced by the wicked charms of that tasty dish known so endearingly as a "Posillipo pizza".

I would further mention that any readers who are interested in pursuing the matter at greater length are cordially invited to the Arts and Science Conference to be held this Saturday in the Music Room of Hart House, where there will undoubtedly be a proliferation of pizzas palpatingly perfectly produced by the proprietors of the pizza palace known as "Posillippos".

I trust that the oversight in MacVicar's article will be corrected. Dare to order: Dare to eat!

Loretans do care about church role

Spurred into reaction by David Wise's Varsity article of last Monday, we feel the need to question the definitely misleading headline as well as to clarify and express opinion on the issue he presents.

While the article makes it fairly clear that only a few women of Loretto College were informally polled, the headline, "Exclusion of women from Catholic ministry not objected to at St. Mike's, leaves the casual reader with the distinct impression that the opinion is shared by the entire community of women here, not to mention men.

Perhaps our first reaction to the decision in question was dismay at the apparent setback in defining the role of women in the Church, but like Sister Frances Nims, quoted in the article, we recognize the sociological cause influencing the pope: namely, that the status of Latin women is among the lowest in the world. We felt that instead of prohibiting the bishops throughout the world from officially using women in any type of recognized ministry, Pope Paul should have given them the power to decide within their own dioceses the role and need for women in their geographical areas. Perhaps a greater awareness of the situation of women in North American and elsewhere would have changed his decision in this regard.

We can't agree, however, with those who hold "religious reasons" to be excuses for the continued exclusion of women on the altar. To those who do, we can only recommend the book, What Every Modern Catholic Believes About Women by Sister Albertus Magnus, which clearly and thoroughly presents the life-style and teachings of Jesus Christ as positive reinforcements for the equality of women.

By PAUL HOCH

Avery Brundage, kingpin of the international sports establishment, recently told the assembled throngs at Munich that this year's Olympic Games had been subjected to what he called two vicious attacks. One, he said, was the threatened boycott by African states (and black American athletes) if white-supremacist Rhodesia was allowed to compete. The other was the chain of events that led to the deaths of the Israeli athletes. TV commentators covering the games expressed much shock that the 'Olympic peace' had been shattered. And, there were loud laments on all sides that 'politics has invaded sports'.

One may of course wonder about the sort of mentality that equates a peaceful boycott against a racist regime with a commando action which leads to 11 deaths. And, the people of Vietnam may be excused if, in the midst of the delly hell of American bombs and deaths, they wonder what the American news media mean when they say that the 'Olympic peace' has been shattered. Nor was there any 'Olympic peace' for the hundreds of student demonstrators who were simply rounded up and shot by Mexican troops at the 1968 Mexico City Olympics.

It's interesting to review the record of the sporting establishment that wept such plentiful tears at Munich. Once before there was a German Olympics. And, then too, the Olympic kingpins charged that politics had invaded sports. The incidents which at that time sparked a mess movement in America to boycott the 1936 Berlin games are eloquently described in Professor Richard Mandell's book The Nazi Olympics. At that time, the issue was whether Hitler was barring Jewish athletes from the German Olympic team.

The American Olympic establishment repeatedly claimed that the Nazis weren't discriminating against Jewish athletes or, if they were, it was irrelevant. Eventually, as the movement to boycott the Olympics gathered momentum in America, they sent General Charles Sherrill (a member of the American and International Olympic committees) to Berlin to negotiate with the Nazis. Sherrill vigorously opposed the boycott and, upon his return, discussed the reasons for his mission:

"I went to Germany for the purpose of getting at least one Jew on the German Olympic team and I feel that my job is finished. As for obstacles placed in the way of Jewish athletes or any others in trying to reach Olympic ability, I would have no more business discussing that in Germany than if the Germans attempted to discuss the Negro situation in the American South or the treatment of the Japanese in California."

He also claimed that he knew many Jews who opposed a boycott and who feared that it would be overplaying the Jewish hand in America as it was overplayed in Germany before the present suppression and expulsion of the Jews were undertaken. The next day, Frederick Rubin, then Secretary of the American Olympic Committee announced his position:

"Germans are not discriminating against Jews in their Olympic tryouts. The Jews are eliminated because they are not good enough as athletes. Why there are not a dozen Jews in the world of Olympic calibre."

General Sherrill later appeared before the Italian Chamber of Commerce in New York and praised Mussolini as "a man of courage in a world of pussyfooters," adding, "I wish to God he'd come over here and have a chance to do that same thing."

The president of the American Olympic Committee (and close colleague of Sherrill and Rubin) was Avery Brundage. He has remained at the top of the Olympic establishment ever since, and is presently head of the International Olympic Committee. He opposed the anti-Nazi boycott just as he was later to oppose the black boycott. He opposed exclusion of 1896. Professor Mandell points out that, though Baron Pierre de Coubertin, the founder of the modern Olympic Games, is usually depicted as some sort of saint concerned solely with the welfare of mankind, he was in reality a French jingoist, nursing a grudge against Germany for her victory in the 1870 Franco-Prussian War. Baron de Coubertin explicitly proclaimed that he saw the Olympics as a badly needed way of reinvigorating French youth, and toughening the nation up for another round with Germany. A position, incidentally, not so different from that of President Kennedy, who saw competitive sports and the Olympics as a good way to build up the 'national fibre' for the Cold War with Russia.

American Association of University Professors last year, the University of Tulsa football coach declared that "football prevents communism". The rationale for this kind of thinking was given a few years ago by Homer D. Babbidge, president of the University of Connecticut. "Our teams and our players", remarked Babbidge to the National Association of Collegiate Athletic Directors, "by and large, are the guys in the white hats they keep their hair cut short, they're clean, they're orderly, aware of the importance of law and order and discipline. The students and others who come to watch us play are the people who respect tradition and institutional pride..." Similarly, in a recent speech to the Touchdown Club of Birmingham,

A couple of years ago, paraphrasing the Duke of Wellington, the deputy editor of the London Sunday Telegraph, Peregrine Worsthorne, noted that what he called "the race of Imperial Men that built the British Empire" was formed on the playing fields of Eton and Harrow, the elite English prep schools. Peter McIntosh in his able book Sport in Society notes that the militarized games like rugby that gained popularity during the renaissance of British Imperialism in the latter part of the nineteenth century "encouraged just those qualities of cooperation and conformity to the needs of the herd which were so much prized by a middle class which was establishing its power and influence throughout the world."

In our own increasingly turbulent era, there are many important voices in the athletic establishment who look upon sports almost as a weapon of class warfare. "To me", says Washington State University football coach Jim Sweeney a couple of years ago, "football and athletics are a fortress that has held the wall against radical elements. I look for them to continue to play that same role". Speaking before a chapter meeting of the Alabama, in which he attacked critics of the sports establishment, vice-president Spiro Agnew remarked that, "Sports all sports is one of the few bits of glue that holds society together..." But, whose conception of 'society'? And, where there is disagreement about which forces in society should predominate, how much does the present organization of American sport give support to one side of the argument over the other? What Berkeley sociology professor Harry Edwards calls the "plantation atmosphere" of American sports with black athletes on the bottom end white officials and coaches on the top has already given rise to athletic strikes, boycotts and disruptions at over 100 American colleges, as well as threatened boycotts at the last two Olympics. Oberlin athletic director Jack Scott says that a nationally prominent track coach told him that "unless" we can find a way to separate the decent Negroes from the troublemakers and militants, we're going to stop recruiting all Negroes."

"Football is not a democracy," says University of Pittsburgh grid coach Carl DePasqua. "There's nothing to debate. The players can debate in political science class." Syracuse's Ben Schwartzwalder agrees. He says that, as coach, "you look upon yourself as a kind of benevolent dictator."

Richard Nixon could hardly have said it any better. His press releases on Vietnam constantly depict the war as a sort of football game, in which we are all expected to give undying loyalty to our 'military team' and to our 'field generals.' Defense Secretary William Laird described the blockade of Halphong as 'operation linebacker.' And, Nixon in diplomatic communiques refers to himself as 'quarterback'. Presumably Americans should not disagree too loudly on Vietnam because, as in football, only the quarterback talks in the huddle.

On the other hand, when people like Olympic discus-thrower Olga Connolly start complaining about the repressiveness of the sporting establishment, the coaches and writers complain that the athletes are becoming "political."

Back in the days when the jocks at the University of California, Columbia, and a score of other institutions were beating up student demonstrators, there was no great fear that the athletes were "political" Jim Bouton, in his book Ball Four, points out that as long as professional baseball players could be depend upon rabidly to support the Vietnam war, the army, the generals, and the flag, no one in baseball's establishment worried about what they were saying or whether it was "political".

In 1970, for the first time in history, the American Broadcasting Company (ABC) refused to televise the half-time show of the Holy Cross-Buffalo football game because it was "political". The Buffalo marching band had scheduled simulated formations of smoking factories and exploding bombs and would play such "controversial" songs as "We shall overcome" and "Give peace a chance". A few weeks later, ABC and the NCAA proudly televised the half-time at the army-navy game, complete with a squad of army Rangers who had just returned from an abortive raid on a North Vietnamese POW camp, and greetings from the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Nothing "political" about that.

Similarly, when the two balck American trackmen Wayne Collette and Vince Mathews were evicted from the Munich Olympics, many American sportswriters complained that it was because they were trying to make a political demonstration. This may well be true. But, the fact is that the playing of national anthems at an international sporting event that claims to be above politics is, in itself, a highly political act. The fact was then that Collette and Mathews were thrown out, not for anything they did or didn't do in the actual Olympic competition, but because their casual behavior was regarded as an unwarranted interference in what amounted to a political demonstration by the international Olympic establishment.

Nor is the Olympic competition itself all that apolitical. Though the actual athletic events themselves be as pure as the driven snow, when you introduce nationalistic tv commentators to root for their national teams, spend millions of dollars on build-up and promotion, fill the stands with thousands and thousands of fans (not to mention the multi-millions of tv watchers around the world), you end up with something which is so overblown and overpublicized that it becomes what the Roman emperors used to call bread and circuses for the masses.

Paul Hoch, a former U of T graduate student, is an assistant professor specializing in sport sociology at Oberlin College. He is the author of the forthcoming Doubladay Anchor paperback Rip Off the Big Game, on the political sociology of sports and their relation to society.

Rotenberg runs for mayor, rejects money from developers that will prejudice him

By DAVID KENNEDY
To the surprise of no one, Alderman David Rotenberg declared his candidacy for th mayoralty of the City of Toronto yesterday at City Hall.

"I bring a clear commitment to continue the prosperity and well-being of our city," said Rotenberg.

He will join his Ward II colleague David Crombie in the race for the city's top post.

While many people ere questioning the philosophy of growth and the health of the communities below Bloor, Rotenberg sees the major issue as the management of growth of Toronto and of the Toronto-centered region.

He denied he was part of the Establishment at City Hall but he revealed he had the support of the majority of sitting alderman and of key election workers of Mayor Dennison. Walter Tedman, Dennison's campaign manager, Rotenberg said, is helping him.

In an apparent response to charges made by Alderman John Sewell about where his capaign funds came from in 1969, Rotenberg announced that he would not accept money from developers.

Rotenberg claimed that his fund-raising "bagman", Dan Kert, of Kert Industrial Chemicals, has been directed not to accept any money that would prejudice or limit his action.

Rotenberg is generally conceded to be the leader of the pro-development forces on City Council. He has consistently voted in favour of controversial developemnts against the wishes of community groups.

"I encourage citizen groups," Rotenberg said. "Ratepayers' groups give individuals a voice at City Hall."

An elected representative should not be bound by the feelings of community groups, he emphasized.

Campus computer info system soon operational

By MARI-LYNN ASBURY
UofTINFO, a computer system which will disseminate information to the whole university will be operational as soon as financial difficulties are ironed out, says SAC vice-president John Helliwell.

The system was designed by Bill Smook, a U of T student, and SAC hopes to install terminals in public areas such as foyers, lobbies and lounges.

UofTINFO will enable anyone within the university community with no previous knowledge of computer programming to obtain information easily.

Facts will be released on music, news events, movies and pubs.

At present, only one terminal is in operation, in Sir Sandford Fleming (Old Physics) Building room 127. Students who wish to use the service must get in touch with SAC in order to obtain account numbers. Computer time is charged to these numbers.

There are two costs involved in the financing of UofTINFO, SAC is hoping for material support from IBM to help cover the cost of renting the terminals. IBM already supports the university in computer research and may decide to donate or rent the terminals at a reasonable rate. Helliwell claimed, SAC may, however, have to absorb the costs of the terminals for a trial period at approximately $100 per month.

The second basic cost is computer time. A report prepared by Helliwell states that an average individual session of 10 minutes costs $5.00. At the level he claims the system is warranted, at 100 users per day, the cost per month would be $1000.

There will be daily up dates of information. It will also be possible for users to comment on the system or to reply to advertisements or news announcements.

Helliwell claims UofTINFO is designed to supplement rather than compete with The Varsity and Radio Varsity.

Several people at the meeting suggested that many students who write papers from a radical point of view are cheated out of the grades they deserve by professors who refuse to accept their point of view as legitimate.

Prof attacks distortion

Marxism is only included in university courses to be vulgarized and ridiculed, philosophy professor Frank Cunningham charged Monday.

"Since the university is paid for by the people, the Marxist point of view, which is held by one third of the world's people to be the correct interpretation, should be dealt with as a legitimate alternative."

Governing Council may veto plan

Med and Ed students will try to leave SAC.

By ED PODGORSKI

Two faculties, Medicine and Education, plan to try to withdraw from the Students' Administrative Council this year, according to their student presidents.

However, these requests may run into difficulty at the Governing Council, which must approve all withdrawals.

Motions put forward to the council by the Medical Society and the student union at the Faculty of Education to withdraw from SAC will probably be denied, according to SAC finance commissioner Vince De Angelo.

The Governing Council only wants to deal with SAC, the Graduates' Student Union, and the Association of Part-time University Students, he maintained.

Paul Cadario, chairman of the council's Internal Affairs Committee, to which such requests must be submitted, said last night that he "has no knowledge that withdrawal motions) are even pending. There have been no applications since July" when the council came to office, he said.

If requests were made, he indicated the committee would not deal with them until after Christmas, since withdrawals could not be effective until next year.

Michael Ginsberg, president of the Medical Society states that his society's motion "is not very high on (the Governing Council's) priority list and probably won't be considered for quite a while". However, "the society is still anxious to get out," he says.

Disagreements with SAC over financial autonomy for local councils and politics provoked medical and Faculty of Education students to withdraw from SAC in referendums last year.

These were the same issues which prompted Eric Miglin, as president last year of the Engineering Society, to lead a fight for a 50 per cent rebate on engineers' fees paid to SAC. SAC rejected the demand.

This year's society president, Scott Joliffe, says the Engineering Society "has scrapped the issue of a 50 per cent rebate on SAC fees".

Although Joliffe expects each council this year will receive a $4,000 rebate, he says "money isn't the only issue. They (SAC) haven't involved themselves in fantastic political issues."

Last year's president of the student union at the Faculty of Education, Christina Dobrowski, says "the union received an unusual amount of co-operation during the past summer (from SAC)."

However, they still wish to withdraw, she said.

Residence students can vote in civic contest for first time

For the first time in Toronto, students living in residence will be able to vote in the municipal elections.

Due to the lowering of the voting age to 18 years and a more liberal approach to enumeration, more people will be eligible to vote in these elections than ever before.

Students who want to vote in the ward in which they are living for the school year will be able to do so simply by stating that their present address is their permanent address, and they no longer consider their parents address to be their permanent address.

According to Bob Baylee, a clerk at the provincial enumeration office for the municipality of Toronto, the only problem that faced the enumerators was that students did not know if and how their parents had registered them.

Enumeration ended last Friday, but if you missed being enumerated then you still have the opportunity to register to vote.

To do this, you must write the Toronto assessment office at 222 Yonge Street stating your year of birth, religion, residential status (owner, or permanent or temporary tenant), citizenship and sex.

The voters lists will be posted on trees or telephone poles in local areas, probably not until at least late October. Baylee refused to even estimate when this would be.

If you discover on the posted lists that you have not been enumerated, you must go to the clerk's office at City Hall before the election and swear out an affidavit containing the necessary information.

Both procedures are more difficult than the federal procedure for getting on the voters list. Federally, you merely have to call or visit the local riding returning office.

Football — and what it means

The following article analyzes football from a political, alternative, viewpoint. By including the article in the Varsity we do not mean to indicate that its contents are to be applied to Canadian intercollegiate football. We have little information to indicate that this is so. However, we believe the comparison which McMurtry makes between the NFL and the CFL is, to some degree, valid. The article should not be tossed aside lightly, but deserves considerable attention.

Comments by letter would be welcome.

A few years ago, I played professional football — I was a corner linebacker — for a team called the Calgary Stampede. The Stampede, as well as the eight other teams that form the equivalent in Canada to the NFL, are much like any pro team in big — league football. Any difference between them and say, the Minnesota Vikings, is essentially that they have some Canadian players, whereas the Vikings have none at all.

Indeed, the similarities in this particular case are extensive when one considers that the Vikings' ex-quarterback Joe Kapp, their general manager Jim Finks and their coach Bud Grant all performed these functions in Canada (two of them for the Stampede when I played) for longer than they've been with the Vikings. In short, professional football is much the same in principle and practice on both sides of the 49th parallel.

Like most players I did not seek to become a pro from some personal quirk. I acted, rather, upon the dominant imperative of North American male culture, which is to show how tough and competitive you are.

Recognizing that being a top dog in a violent game lent one much the same magic as packing a fast gun in Tombstone, I trained, weight-lifted and backed people down until I was a well-publicized fullback, being drafted by the pros. I made the team the only Canadian college player in my year to break into a starting lineup — essentially because I had developed the obsessional competitiveness and agile cunning required for success in any elitist structure.

At first, I rarely reflected on these prerequisites of the game, but as time went on the concealed became more and more manifest to me — that pro football was not so much a sport as a sick society's projection of itself into public spectacle. It now seems obvious to me that the increasingly popular Sunday contests, between sophisticated systems of big — men power — the pro football games — should not be viewed as mere weekend diversion but rather as a growing religion, an idealization into morality play of the bellicose American way before a congregation of tens of millions.

The tremendous rise in popularity of pro and college football in America since the second world war is a result of people not having anything on which to act out their aggressions during the cold war.

Support can be marshaled for this claim almost as soon as one pauses to look. To begin with, the first major principle of football is possession — holding onto the desired object (the ball), protecting it by rule-governed violence from the other team. "Possession" the key to football: "private property" the key to our society; legalized violence the sanction of both.

It is no accident. When one considers as well that the inevitable conclusion of such a game whether gridiron or social is monopoly by the most powerful, the analogy then becomes more compelling.

But the similarity does not end there. In football one must not only try to keep possession, one must also try to gain it from the other side. This is done, literally, by forcing the opponent off his territory, yard by yard, until he has nothing left. When that occurs, the scoring side acquires abstract points, and the contest begins again.

The likeness of this process to the capitalist law of increasing what is owned by outmaneuvering others of what they own and thereby gaining abstract assets called "money" is too obvious to comment on. In both "games", the goal is more and more abstract value, without upper limit or concern for the competitor.

The role of the competitor is indeed interesting enough in both spheres. In football, the truly professional attitude is not to think of the opponent as a human being at all he is a "position" to be removed as efficiently as possible in order to benefit the team's corporate enterprise of gaining points. The mask over his face and the other protective equipment he wears reinforce this status of non-humanity: while if all that is not enough, official fines for "fraternizing" with the other side diminish any points of contact that might remain.

Of course, one need hardly elaborate how this resembles life outside the stadium: the business or political opposition as simply something which must be removed in order to secure corporate, part or national interests, whose representatives are generally in something like a conventional coverall uniform and head style, and with whose products or agents it is unwise to associate. The only difference is that in football, the antagonism is overt.

The circumstances and manner in which football is played are also suggestive. Millions of dollars are spent on the most lavish technology and expertise of entertainment, while huge segments of the population live in squalor. An infinitesimal elite plans in secret and plays the game, while the rest watch from the sidelines. The participants are concerned not with the activity as such but with the cash payoff.

The qualities most universally celebrated in the game are a combination of fear of failure "hates to lose" and ruthless aggression "mean". The onlookers feel that it is "their" team though they have nothing whatever to do with its function. A suppressed sexuality keeps expressing itself in concealed forms (bottom-touching, pile ons, clutching embraces and virginal girls twirling batons).

Football as a part of the American way of life is closely connected to the political structure in the US. President Nixon hands out trophies to winning teams and is the typical middle-American spectator, while defense secretary Melvin Laird and Billy Graham, Nixon's spiritual confidant, are parade marshalls for bowl games and Lockheed Aircraft sponsors the half-time show.

The theme of the field is reinforced again and again in the commercial ads for cars that are ever bigger, faster and more powerful (the predator nomenclature for both football teams and cars is worth noting).

The language of war is habitually employed "field general", "long bomb", "boys", "blitz", "front line", "pursuit", "good hit" on ritual and grandeur, on the national anthem and the pre-game hush that cast a spell or religious sanctity upon the whole event. And so forth.

But perhaps most important to football is authority: the strict hierarchy of the club and its exhaustive control of every aspect of the game and, even, the personal lives of the player employees. The unforgivable sin of a player is to question someone above him if he does that he's finished. The chain of command moves from the owner (who is almost never seen), down through the general-manager, the coach, the quarterback and trustworthy veterans.

Unlike any other game, every pattern of movement on the field is strictly dictated by nonplaying superiors detailed formation, movements of formulation (i.e. plays), and every possible decision on the field are all given from above. Similarly, patterns of Sports should be human, human and spontaneous, just the way work should be, just the way university should be. That's the revolution, man.

People should be participating, not just watching a lot of guys beating hell out of each other.

behaviour off the field are strictly regulated the bedtimes of the players, their physical pleasures, their travelling clothes, their habits of speech (my old coach formally prohibited all "cussin"), the mode and times of their relations with the public (commercial, social or political activity that is not to the authorities' liking may lead to fines or dismissal).

Even the team one plays for is decided by higher officials the player being "drafted" (this term is revealing) by a club through a procedure in which he has no voice whatever. Any defiance of any part of this whole structure of command means permanent banning from the game.

Though there are certain evident resemblances between the football corporation and other types of corporation, the more striking similarity is of course to the military, or indeed to political conservatism bordering on "fascism". In all three spheres, absolute obedience to higher authority is required in every aspect of life, the principles of uniformity and order are rigidly enforced, and destructive violence is the fundamental mode of extra-group communication.

The correlation between the growing tendency toward extreme right politics in North America and the increasing popularity of big-league football should not be overlooked. If this appears fanciful, consider the widespread coincidence between devotion to football and to socio-political conformity in American learning institutions and in the people as a whole.

Nationalistic displays are conspicuously and increasingly evident at football games (recently there was an official period of silence for US military personnel held captive in North America). And the late dean of coaches, Vince Lombardi, outlined football's mission as follows: "We must regain respect for authority. We must learn to respect authority. A man must be part of a group and subject himself to that group. Discipline, that is what football is."

If the connection between football and politics still seems ingenious rather than substantive, ponder this remark by the former California superintendent of public instruction, Max Rafferty: "Critics of college football are kooks, crumbums and commies hairy, loud-mouth beatniks. Football is war without killing they are the custodians of the concepts of democracy. As football players, they possess a clear, bright fighting spirit which is America itself."

And then consider the words of President Nixon after US troops recently and unexpectedly invaded North Vietnam: "Sometimes you have to take them by surprise. It's like football. You run a play and it fails. Then you turn around and call the same play again because they aren't expecting it."

The connections between right-wing politics and the mania for football are too many to be ignored: both ground themselves on a property seizing principle, apothecize struggle and competition, publicly idolize victory and the powerful, make authority absolute, and relate to opposing groups by violent aggression.

When the president of the United States compares war maneuvers to football plays and the head of the education system in one of the richest states suggests that war principles of football represent "America itself", the associations become somewhat sinister. One might be excused for wondering whether the "game theory" so popular with Pentagon and White House strategists might not be inductively fleshed out into a football model, with the world as gridiron, the game plan as "possession" and America as history's "greatest ever" football machine.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 22, 1972 TORONTO

The varsity — Tom Walkom

Administration day care architect vice-provost Robin Ross (extreme right) prepares notes as chuckling vice-president Don Forster and campus co-ordinator Lois Reimer take places.

Council ignores day care objections

After two hours of seemingly futile debate, U of T's Governing Council decided yesterday, by a vote of 19 to 10, to accept the report of the Internal Affairs Committee concerning the running of the proposed day care centre on the campus.

The report recommends the establishment of one administration-run centre, and was objected to by two existing day care groups, Campus Co-Op and St. Andrews nursery.

About 60 people from Campus Co-Op, whose occupation of an unused building forced the Governing Council to agree on a policy of some kind, were at the meeting, clapping on occasion and jeering at the ineptitude of the debate.

Paul Cadario, chairman of the Internal Affairs Committee, presented the report calling for a university-university-operated centre with space for 50 children, but excluding children of parents not connected to the University. The plan also will result in doubling the minimum fees that parents are paying at Campus Co-Op, from $40 to about $85 a month per child.

A few council members opposed what they thought were the inequities of the report. Student Joyce Denyer recommended that the centre be equipped to handle a larger number of children, specifically the 65 children in the existing centres, the two Campus Co-Op centres and the St. Andrews Day Nursery. Administrative staff representative John Parker added that the parents of these children should also run the centre.

The other administrative staff rep, Gwen Russell, who was also a member of the administration-established Day Care Board whose report was ignored by the administration, recommended that the committee give the matter further thought.

Brian Morgan, student member of the council, proposed that the report be sent back to the committee to amend the committee's recommendation concerning parental involvement. The new policy requires that the University be financially and legally responsible for the centre, and that parents be involved essentially by way of an advisory board. Feeling that an advisory board half composed of parents, with extremely limited powers, was not enough, he asked that it be sent back. The motion was defeated 17 to 16.

Further debate was crowned by the ramblings of president John Evans on such policy questions as the danger of allowing one group to have philosophical control over the centre.

"It's going to be difficult to accommodate all these groups," he added. In this, he echoed St. Andrew's, Campus Co-Op and the Day Care Board. Their recommendation, however, was that more than one centre be set up, to allow each group to run its own centre.

A move to reopen the policy concerning parental control met with confusion from council members. One stood up and said "I don't understand what we're doing here."

Applause and shouts of "We don't either" came from the Campus Co-Op people observing the meeting.

As 7 pm neared, the committee by this time thoroughly tired and confused, decided to vote to accept the report.

The Campus Co-Op group is dissatisfied with almost every aspect of the report.

According to Julie Mathien, former co-ordinator with the group, there is not nearly enough room for the number of children already using day care around the campus.

The new day-care centre will exclude many of the children already involved in day-care, notably those whose parents are not members of the "university community".

Campus Co-Op has been running their centres successfully on a parent-controlled, parent-operated basis. The role of the parent would be significantly downplayed in the university's plan.

Yet, John Evans feels the policy is very flexible.

"Yes, but they (the administration) have got the flex," replies Tom Mathien.

The council seemed to ignore the fact that the site of their future centre is occupied presently by Campus Co-Op for their over-two day care centre. Co-Op people look upon the plan as a move to get them out of the way without providing a satisfactory day care program.

Bob Davis, coordinator with the Co-Op, said, "They won't get this through without a lot of trouble."

Possible picketing of Simcoe Hall is planned, and other demonstrations are being considered.

One thing is certain: they are not leaving their building voluntarily. They left the meeting shouting "You'll have to arrest our children."

Marxist scholar denied Canadian entry visa

By MARK BOEKELMAN and MARILYN SMITH

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — An internationally known professor hired to teach York undergraduate and graduate political theory courses has been refused entry to Canada for "security reasons", Excalibur learned last week.

The case of Istevan Meszaros, Marxist theorist, literary critic, political scientist, philosophy teacher, teacher of philosophy and aesthetics, is under review by a special committee, said York dean of arts John Saywell earlier this week.

Meszaros, a British subject since 1965, comes from Hungary. He was a member of the 1956 provisional government and fled to Italy when the Russian Stalinists regained power in Hungary. He has been teaching in the social science department at the University of Sussex for the past six years.

York hired Meszaros last spring as the hub of a new graduate program — social and political thought. He's already scheduled to teach two undergraduate courses, said Mel Hill, head of York's social science department.

In June, according to York officials, the Canadian embassy in London refused to give Meszaros a visa, saying that Meszaros' entry was not "in the best interests of the country".

According to Ed Fanning, the district admissions supervisor of the immigration branch office in Toronto, immigrants can be refused entry visas for having a criminal record, medical reasons, and security reasons. He said the latter category is subject to interpretation by immigration officials and may include persons suspected of "treason, espionage, and deserting a ship".

Saywell has been negotiating with government officials since June, but would not comment on the talks.

York president David Slater said Wednesday "the matter is being actively worked on. We're not engaging in public debate over the matter because we've found in the past that beyond a certain point, this does more harm than good."

Neither knew when the review decision might be released.

Meanwhile, according to Hill, Meszaros is waiting in London with his family for the final word. He hadn't thought there would be any difficulty and resigned his position at the University of Sussex and sold his household goods.

Fifty York faculty members have circulated a petition urging Slater to take action and the Canadian Association of University Teachers have expressed their "concern" to Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau.

York urged to recruit more worker students

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — York University's part-time college should recruit more working class students, a report to the dean from the college's political science students' union says.

The report recommends that Atkinson College conduct a recruiting program in factories and at union meetings, and advertising in union periodicals.

Dean Harry Crowe was unavailable for comment.

The 17-page report was given to Crowe in August and circulated to Atkinson political science professors, with the demand that a student-faculty committee study it and suggest a future course for Atkinson "as a part-time institution of higher learning for working people."

The administration has taken no action yet but the student union meets this week to discuss it.

Besides the recruitment of workers, the report suggests "more courses which are relevant to industrial workers"—such as class and race relations, union history, organization and structure, and the literature, politics, and history of the working class in Canada.

Atkinson should also sponsor pre-university courses to upgrade any worker students who lack reading and writing skills needed for university work, the report says.

The document reveals that out of 1523 students in this summer's term, only 1.5 per cent were workers. And out of 2,235 students in the 1971 winter term, only 2.6 per cent were workers. The majority were professional, mainly teachers.

Audience paying more, unimpressed

Kerr defends fees hikes, attacks foes

By EXCALIBUR Staff

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — Speaking to approximately 200 York students yesterday, Ontario Minister of Colleges and Universities George Kerr called recent statements by student leaders "inaccurate", and attempted to dispell "misleading impressions" about government policy on universities.

He implied that many of the full-time student politicians responsible for the statements are just organizing the fees strike "to justify their jobs". But, judging from the occasional hisses, laughter, and brief outbursts during the two hour session on the crisis in post-secondary education, the audience was not very impressed by his argument.

Kerr classed as "fiction" a recent statement in McMaster University's student newspaper The Silhouette which suggested that the province had cutback its support of education. He told the audience that in fact the education budget has increased and that the two billion dollar expenditure represents a major portion of Ontario's five billion dollar budget.

Kerr explained that the rationale behind the $100 tuition fee increase this year was to "charge the user a slightly higher proportion of the cost of education".

He said that the Ontario taxpayer has already been asked to "dig deep in other areas" and referred to tax increases on alcohol and gasoline.

"We couldn't ask a man struggling to support a family," to pay more for the cost of education, he said.

(Shouts from the audience called for taxation of 'corporate welfare bums'. (NDP leader David Lewis has made the key point of his election campaign the charge that corporate giants are living off the working man by accepting large grants and avoiding taxes.)

Kerr pointed out that students pay only 15 per cent of the cost of education through tuition and that tuition fees have not changed in seven years.

He criticized the charge made by Ontario Federation of Students spokesmen that the tuition hike will affect the goal of universal accessibility and used as a counter-argument the fact that there have been more applications for student aid this year.

He said that the fee hike would not "deter low and middle income students from the goal of post-secondary education", and argued that since two out of every five students qualify for assistance, "we're achieving the goal of providing education to all strata of this society".

He also stated that although the loan ceiling for the Ontario Student Aid Program had been raised from $600 to $800, the Ontario program is still the most generous in the country. He added that the age of independence had been lowered from 25 to 24.

York president David Slater later pointed out that low income students do not enjoy the advantage of these loans because they don't reach university. He suggested that changes were necessary in the whole system and not just in post-secondary loan financing.

Kerr's final point was that university enrolment has not declined in the past year except in three or four institutions. He said that enrolment has gone up at U of T, Western, Queen's, and Guelph, and suggested that this was an indication students had not been deterred from university by the fee hike. He mentioned only Carleton and Windsor as universities which have experienced a drop in enrollment.

Art and Science students to meet, consider new union

By FERNANDO TRAFICANTE

The St. Michael's College Student Union has called for a non-bureaucratic, yet non-policy-making arts and science union.

However, the Victoria College Students' Administrative Council (VUSAC) sees a need for a stronger body, which while still not having a large bureaucracy, would have the ability to initiate and press policy.

The union's fate is to be decided tomorrow at a constitutional conference in the Hart House Music Room, beginning at 10 am. If the conference wants the union, it then must be ratified by three quarters of college student councils, arts and science course unions, and similar bodies.

The SMC council does not see arts and science students as a cohesive whole, separate from the professional students' faculties.

Its brief said "it seems that the most important issues that will face the students, at least in the foreseeable future, will face students generally rather than those in any particular faculty."

It further stated that the union should not make policy statements since these are more precisely the role of college councils and course unions.

A VUSAC brief, proposed by vice-president Debra Lewis and education commissioner Rick Gregory, whose principles were adopted unanimously last night, tries to evolve a structure for the union from the needs and functions of such a body. Its basic premise is that a union should not develop into a new bureaucracy but be decentralized with coordination and policy initiation functions.

It proposed setting up a system whereby more than a simple majority of representatives to the union would be needed to set any policy. It wanted to set up guarantees of support, such as that if two thirds of any one estate disagree with a policy, it be implemented.

Since SAC is prevented from interfering in the various faculties by its new constitution, a need for union of arts and science students to coordinate the functioning of the various college councils and course unions was seen.

The student representatives on the General Committee, of Arts and Science although elected in administration-run elections to a committee which students formally don't recognize, may also be tied in to the proposed union.

If passed, the union will have a budget of about $20,000, raised by a SAC levy of two dollars per student. Some of the money has already been spent in summer research, including paying workers Phil Dack and Rick MacFarlane.

Dack, whose term as fieldworker expires tomorrow, says that "given the problems in arts and science, something must be done to maintain gains". One such gain is the New Program, currently under review (and perhaps attack) by a presidential advisory committee.

The conference promises to be a day of "heavy politicising" and may develop into a "theatre of the absurd", Dack says.

Creelman knocks bourgeois press for not fighting stipend cuts

By PAT REDICAN

SAC university commissioner John Creelman criticized the "established press" this week for refusing to "take on" Richard Potter, Minister of Health, over the issue of dropping stipends for para-medical interns.

The remark came after a meeting last week between deputy minister Stan Martin and a SAC delegation which included president Eric Miglin, Food Sciences student president Rosie Fuss, SAC rep Irene Miller, Creelman and a few other "interested students". SAC submitted a brief on the stipends to the health ministry at the meeting.

Martin "conceded many points in the brief," said Creelman. "More important, he didn't defend the government action. He acted like he had nothing to do with it and had no sympathy with it."

It was announced last April that the living allowances for students doing work as interns would be abolished, because of "financial considerations".

The SAC brief argued that the action would create a shortage of para-medical personnel and, in the long run, damage the province's economy. According to the brief, para-medicals are becoming more important in medicine today because they can do work doctors would normally do, at less cost.

Miller reported that Martin, after much persuasion, finally admitted that cutting off the stipends would be a "disincentive" to students planning to study in Ontario.

She adds Martin said he would "make the Cabinet aware" of the SAC brief. Martin could not be reached to confirm this.

Creelman said that, in light of this, "efforts have been redoubled" to arrange a meeting with Robert Welch, Minister of Social Development, and his colleagues.

Meanwhile, the minister of health, Potter is presently out of the country and will be unavailable until the end of the month.

Colleges and Universities Minister George Kerr said at York that students should pay a higher proportion of education costs.

The Varsity errs; Steiner wronged

An article in Wednesday's Varsity incorrectly implied that Medicine's Associate Dean J. W. Steiner does not normally speak to students.

Responsible for admissions to the faculty, Dr. Steiner's work closely parallels that of arts and science college registrars. As a matter of course, Steiner's assistants handle queries directed to Medicine's Students Affairs office unless they are unable to provide the requested information or the inquirer insists upon a direct contact with Steiner.

Steiner's office receives more than 500 telephone inquiries a day and is responsible for student affairs, including admissions, for the 4,000-member faculty.

The article in question dealt with a warning by Innis College registrar David King that Medicine and Law might not look as favorably upon experimental Innis and Sociology courses as they would upon the more traditional arts and science courses.

In an interview subsequent to the story's publication, Steiner pointed out that he had requested guidance from the Arts and Science Faculty in weighing the relative difficulty of various courses offered by the faculty for admission purposes for the closely-contested places in the medical school, some time ago. The faculty declined his request and he has since resubmitted it for review.

The information, Steiner explained, would be used by Medicine's admission committee to decide between applicants with equal academic records applying for admission to the school.

Unless the faculty provides the information, the school's admissions committee, less familiar with arts and science courses, must attempt to weigh their relative difficulty. Arts and Science faculties in some other Canadian universities already supply this information to professional schools.

The Varsity regrets any embarrassment or confusion the incorrect information may have caused Dr. Steiner.

Varsity staff trots

The Varsity team is off to the races as another year of weekly production meetings is well under way.

Post time is 1 pm today in The Varsity offices. All types of wonders, four-legged and otherwise, are bound to turn up.

Last week, some staffers weren't too pleased when the horses crossed the finish line when they weren't looking, so make sure you're present or forever hold your peace.

In the running, among others, are women and their pages, SAC people, and nationalists, with increased accuracy rated a favorite.

Murphy's coaching is a 'comedy of errors'

The time has come for a re-evaluation of the questionable talents of football coach Ron Murphy. After Saturday's comedy of errors against Ottawa University, one just can't help but wonder who is the coach and who is the water boy.

It is hard to believe that out of 26,000 students at the U of T campus the players are not of at least equal calibre to those of the opposing teams. In other words, there is no doubt that Murphy has more raw talent to draw from than any other coach in the league. Indeed, that talent has remained just that — raw; and so it seems from Saturday's performance, it is quickly going bad. Come, on, Murphy.

Promising stars were left on the sidelines while old favorites were allowed to play no matter how poorly they performed. We cannot remain silent about one of these sentimental has-beens, Cor Doret. Doret's dismal performance was characterized by instinctive nose dives into the turf at the slightest shadow of an Ottawa uniform. His fear of injury could be offered as an excuse for his poor play. But, a full game of poor play is inexcusable when during all this time sitting on the bench was Paul Kitchen whose brilliant performance against York was distinguished by gaining almost 100 yards in the first half. (This was before Murphy benched him for the second half.)

Dave. Quick wasn't too swift either. On the one occasion he did catch the ball, he nearly had to be restrained from kissing his teammates in uncontrolled elation as if he had just scored the winning goal in the Stanley Cup. This isn't hockey. And, it doesn't look much like football either.

As for our all-star quarterback, his fabled passing arm proved to be no more than a grim fairy tail tucked between the legs of centre

Russ Mitchell. Surely, every quarterback is entitled to an off day, but it is the coach's responsibility to recognize this and make corrections as the game progresses. Where was Steve Kerr who more than filled Dunkley's shoes against York? Is it necessary that Dunkley be injured before Kerr can be played? Think about it, Murphy.

Although mediocrity was the order of the day, there were some who played very well. Libert Castillo demonstrated what second effort is all about. The few times he was given the ball. Are you listening, Doret? Other players who deserve recognition for a fine afternoon were Neil Lumsden and Torris Cross. It's too bad they played for the Gee-Gees.

Back to Murphy. What excuse can he offer for consistent mediocrity which in professional football would have cost him his job long ago? (A pretty good argument against giving tenure to Varsity coaches?) Talent should be recognized and ultimately utilized to best advantage. This is the job of the coach. And, despite Murphy's good example, he shows to his players of being a good loser — a very good loser — a very regular loser; what we need for the Varsity football team is a good winner.

YS insists it's not LSA youth wing

The Varsity's article on U of T political groups has once again reaffirmed our view that nobody can represent the program of the Young Socialists better than ourselves. Just for the record of your press and for students at U of T, we would like to take up a few lines to correct the "errors", "oversights", and "exaggerations" of your political writing staff.

To begin, the YS is not the "youth wing of the League for Socialist Action". We are an independent student group having chapters established in high schools and on campuses across both Canada and Quebec. We are the biggest revolutionary youth organization in the country and support the LSA because we realize that students cannot change society by themselves but must form an alliance with Canada's working class and the nucleus of their revolutionary leadership.

The article asserts that the Vietnam Mobilization Committee (VMC) is controlled by the YS. This is the type of byline that has been used consistently by people opposing the anti-war movement, women's liberation, the gay movement, or anything else they happen to disagree with. Call it "communist-controlled" or a "Trot-front", and immediately these struggles are supposed to become irrelevant. This is known as red-baiting. In fact, the VMC is a coalition of various groups and individuals, all opposed to the war in Vietnam, and working together to end it. Drop out to the next meeting and find out first-hand.

You next say that our demands in the anti-war movement are for withdrawing U.S. troops, "(while the rest of the left calls for victory to the NLF)". If you were at all in tune with the Canadian anti-war movement you should realize that its central demand is "U.S. Out Now" — meaning all American personnel, military equipment, and material support to the Thieu regime in Saigon. Who, may we ask is the "rest of the left"? — the Old Mole? On this latter demand we would like to note that it is not the task of revolutionaries to tell the Vietnamese that the NLF will win their battles for them or to provide cheerleaders for their victory celebrations. Anti-war activists in Canada must mobilize people around concrete demands against the complicity of the Canadian government, against the genocidal policies of the Pentagon, and in solidarity with the massive American antiwar movement.

On women's liberation The Varsity claims that we refuse to raise anything except the abortion issue. This is entirely false. Marxists have a full program against women's oppression, and we carry this both in our press and election campaigns. The YS, however, emphasizes and supports the abortion-law repeal campaign in particular because it has been raised by women all over North America and Europe as the central issue of the women's liberation movement, it unites women from right across Canada and Quebec, and most importantly, it poses mass actions challenging the Canadian government — the only way in which women can hope to achieve full liberation.

The Varsity concludes this stream of consciousness by parroting right-wing attacks on our movement by the NDP brass — attacks designed to stifle political discussion and disagreement inside the Party. The Young Socialists is the only revolutionary student organization in Canada that supports the NDP, the political arm of the Canadian working class. We campaign for the NDP in our press and defend it at meetings. We don't have to "infiltrate" the NDP as your article claims — we are already a part of it, and will continue to build it until it wins power in Ottawa.

CPL not complicit in Maoist tactics

The Varsity editorial on Friday, September 15, "Passivity breeds racism", claims the Canadian Party of Labor's "indifference" to the Western Guard meeting last Wednesday is "inexcusable". Our absence at the demonstration is cited as evidence that we intend to sit by idly while racism and fascism grow in strength.

You do not mention The Varsity's indifference, for you also gave no call to action, nor did you even mention this demonstration in your Wednesday issue. According to your editorial, The Varsity must also be called "a sorry reflection on the passivity with which our society accepts racism."

There are several reasons why we did not attend the demonstration. Certainly, we have no intention of leading people into a blood bath created by a sect of provocateurs, the Maoites. Did it occur to you that their antics, not "indifference", may keep people away from such demonstrations.

Varsity, like most liberal journals, only sees fascism and racism when it wears a Nazi armband. Consequently, you see in Western Guard the rise of reaction, rather than looking to the far more vicious and institutionalized racism in this society. The Canadian government, the Workman's Compensation Board, and the University of Toronto commit more racist acts in one hour than Western Guard does in a year.

At this university Prof. Ian Hector of the Medical faculty wrote a report for the Compensation Board claiming an injured Italian construction worker was "culturally predisposed to feign injury". This resulted in the man getting only 25 per cent of his compensation pension. Another example: Mutual of Omaha insurance company is refusing to pay an Italian worker, also permanently disabled, a pension that he deserves, because he is Italian (even office workers in Mutual agree that this is the reason). Students for a Democratic Society have been having demonstrations at Mutual's office every Wednesday at noon. This is where the racism is. This is where we should concentrate our fight. May we presume that The Varsity's complete indifference to these struggles is coming to an end, since "passivity breeds racism"?

If you are concerned about contenders for a fascist movement, you should look more widely. Many "left wing" nationalists, for example, have basically the same chauvinistic and racist slogans as Don Andrews and the Guard. Andrews hates blacks, and Jim Laxer hates Americans. On this campus people have tried to organize around quotas on foreign professors. How about saying there are too many Jewish professors, instead of too many Americans? Then people might be prepared to call racism what up 'til now goes under the euphemism of "anti-imperialism". But Varsity, ironically, instead of attacking these racists, has a record of promoting them over the last two years.

We want to fight racism and fascism, but at its source: in the heart of the ruling class, not amongst a small sect of lumpens. Western Guard's meeting last Wednesday is actually an indication of fascism's decline, if numbers are to mean anything. Nazi John Beattie used to get more supporters out in Allan Gardens 10 years ago. All this talk of "united action of the left" will do what it did in the 1930's: get revolutionaries and leftists to ally with "progressives" in the fight against fascism. But the "progressives, as in the 1930's (where they included FDR, de Gaulle, etc.) turn out to be far more effective sources of racism than the far right weeds.

W.W. Theatre Productions is currently staging an exceptional piece of theatre by the French author Albert Camus. The Just Assassins—are terrorists in pre-Revolution Russia (1905) who are scheming to assassinate a grand duke, and eventually to wrest Russia from the clutches of the Czar and restore it to the people.

The characters attempt to justify their terrorist methods and their killing, and they do develop a concept of justice which renders their conscience innocent and their actions just. It is interesting to compare with this the thorough moral lambasting delivered by today's media to current terrorists. Their argument can be made to sound convincing.

The production itself is well-conceived and smoothly executed. The director and actors have worked together to produce the existentialist point of view from which the play was written. The actors deliver their lines in a very personalized, frank and open manner, and come across as individuals with a cause. The director has created a world with a mood of hostility and confusion, so that the audience understands and sympathizes with the characters' alienation.

You may not leave the production with schemes of planting bombs in the trashcans behind Simcoo Hall, or under the limousines of our esteemed governors, but any lurking discontent that you may have previously held with our educational system may creep toward some unexpected realization.

film

CANADIAN film-makers are the racial equal of any other country's film-makers, and contrary to can't a Canadian picture is not an automatic box-office disaster. This has been merrily borne out by the season of Canadian movies now winding down at the Poor Alex. Tonight through Sunday, are the last days for Breathing Together, which won first prize at the Ann Arbor Film Festival. While not so hot as film, it is a solid, gloriously biased documentary on the halcyon days of the youth culture revolution combination. With those days gone, Breathing becomes first-rate cultural history particularly, because director Markson had the good sense to let the figures he documents hold forth in long unedited bursts. Since these include Allen Ginsberg, Klaus Oldenberg, Fred Hampton, Abbie Hoffman, Jerry Rubin, William Kunstler, Buckminster Fuller and Timothy Leary, a very theatrical cast to begin with, Markson really just had to hold the camera steady and keep the mike in close. He did, and the result is funny, ironic, informative and sometimes very sad when you consider the fortunes of the speakers (and of America) in the four years since the film was shot.

Markson's first film, Zero the Fool, shows at eight o'clock, but unless you are given to experiments in dramatic form—with no redeeming content—you would probably better enjoy the evening by just arriving at ten for Breathing Together. $1.50 at the Poor Alex, Bloor at Brunswick. Through Sunday.

Everything you Always Wanted to Know About Sex: Woody Allen has chosen seven rubrics from Dr. Reuben's dumb, dumb book and turned them into something like comedy. There is a classy send-up of an Antonioni film (appropriately about frigidity), subtiles and all; a love story about a man and a sheep which is elegant, not bucolic; and a mission-control center skit about scoring, complete with crises and cameraderie. When the gags fail, this movie begins to look very smutty indeed. But then Allen has always been a scatter-shot comic. Uptown, $2.75 for about $1.25 worth of entertainment.

Play It Again, Sam: Many of the gags are at the Playbox level, but Woody Allen end Diane Keating turn their characters into real mensches, so this becomes a nice movie. Uptown, $2.50.

L'Hebdo is the Varsity's regular Friday supplement section. It will carry in-depth and interpretative articles on a broad variety of topics, as well as reviews of music, books, theatre, and other cultural activities.

Persons wishing to write, draw, take pictures, or assist in any other way with L'Hebdo are asked to come to a meeting Monday at 1 p.m. in the L'Hebdo office on the first floor of 91 St. George. popular records

Looking at any ten block square area in Toronto you're likely to find at least one store selling records. If you're interested in good selection and low prices you'll probably do your shopping at a discount record store on Yonge or Bloor.

I took a stroll one morning to price some recent releases on different labels that listed at $8.29 and one double album, the Rolling Stones' Exile on Meln Street, which lists at about $10.98.

The worst prices were quickly found at Simpson's with the 629's at an inflated $4.98 and "Exile" going for $8.98. These prices should eliminate this department store from any further serious consideration.

The Yonge St. pair, Sam The Record Men A & A come out with identical prices on all items with 629's at $4.49 and "Exile" at $7.95. Between the two stores you can get almost any record you may want — the variety and amount of stock is staggering and includes many imports at wallet-busting prices of course. Both stores feature weekend or 15 minute specials (at 9 am) which can net you a top selling album for $2.99 to $3.49. The special is the cheapest but most painful way to buy records. Many manufacturers' delisted albums are available for $1.90 at both stores. If you're trying to decide whether to buy a sele priced album at Sam's or A & S, you might remember that A & A is owned by the American based CBS corporation (Columbia Records).

Eaton's prices are now the same as Sam's. There seems to be a reasonable amount of stock but you can't expect 629's on sale for less than $3.99. The main advantages of this outlet are simply those of any department store. Phone orders and COD's are possible and payments can be delayed using a charge account.

Target Tapes stocks very few records, but of those available 629's were being offered at $3.99 and "Exile" was $6.29. The store's main business is tapes so the record shelves are sparse. On the day I visited, I could find no Columbia discs. My guess is the $3.99 price tags won't last very long.

Round Records is easily my pick as the best place to shop. With a 34 per cent discount applied to the list price of all albums, 629's were being sold at $4.15 and "Exile" was a very low $6.75. It's a small personable store with consistently low prices. Many delisted albums are also available at $1.90 as well as used albums (some recent and in fairly good condition) at about the same price. If you're tired of your old records they can be sold to Round.

With the store being so small the stock is also limited, but you can order any album that's not in, and usually receive it in a day or so. You still get regular 34 per cent discount off the list price. Round owner Larry Ellenson can rep with you for hours about records, music or anything else that might turn you on. It's a one man operation, with no big business ties, no supermarket style shopping aisles, and most important, no rip off prices.

People who are short of money can listen to records at end borrow them from any North York Public Library. Collections are small and releases take many weeks to appear. Classical fans can choose from a complete librery set up in the Edwerd Johnson Building to listen to music.

There are many defects in the albums that are being sold today. If you thought it was your hearing when that album you bought sounded scratched on its very first spin around the turntable, you can stop worrying.

Many of today's new discs are carelessly pressed, resulting in bubbles in the vinyl that cause pops or skips. The new thin discs and the elaborate triple fold-out five-poster extravaganza jackets result in some unusually sheped records these days.

At the kinds of prices you have to pay for records, you should rebel against such shoddy practices. The first thing you should do after buying the album is place the bill in a safe place. If after a first play you think the record would be more comfortable in a boomerang collection, or if a few pops or skips appear, don't be afraid to return the defective item to the store with the bill. Demand a new copy. And if that one's defective, take it back too, until you're entitled.

If the store refuses to exchange albums, tell them that you'll never be back again. Then call up the distributor (any record store can tell you what company distributes a given label). If for some reason the company refuses to send you a new record, write a letter to the manager. That's always good for some action. The main thing is to let people know that you won't be passive while you're being given shoddy goods at fancy prices.

classical music scene

Just as Toronto is now considered a miniature New York in the world of theatre, so too the city has suddenly become a miniature London in the world of serious music. chamber, choral and symphony concerts abound, although one evening in the orchestre here often costs as a week of Festival Hall concerts in London. Prices are, not unreasonable, however, the fullest slate of music events in the city. Phone 928-3744 and watch The Varsity's "Wetsup" for info.

International Artlist Series at Massey Hall. This is probably the second most enterprising classical series in Toronto. Six concerts will feature artists such as Victoria de Los Angeles and Zubin Mehta conducting his old orchestre, the Israel Philharmonic. You can do almost as well price-wise as the TS series too: $16.50. Two separate concerts feature Segovia and the Vienna Boys Choir in the special events of the series.

St. Lawrence Centre. There are chamber concerts all through the year usually, and this year the town hall is hosting the International Quartet Series, from November 2 to April 16 of next year. The quartets will be the Amadeus, the Quartetto Italiano, the Laselle (renowned for their recording of modern music, having just completed Bartok's string quartets), the Bartok, the Orford, the Czech, the Borodin. Phone 366-1656 for information. Prices are $3.50 and $4.50. Subscription is sold out.

The Candian Opera Company at O'Keefe. Unfortunately we have to wait until 1976 even to hear Berg's Lulu Wozzeck, considered by many the best opera written in this century, is still presumably too radical at the ripe age of concerting process going on in the music industry which I call "Great Distortion Shift." Ten years ago records were thick, flat, robust things which lacked only superior play-back equipment to do them justice. In the last five years audio fidelity has become a precise description of countless stereo components at moderately high prices, when it used to be a merely optimistic label on every Eaton's home console.

But here is the irony: records have become thin, flimsy sheets of plastic, sometimes warped into absurd convexity. At the same time, prices continue to go up. Angel (EMI) Records is a perfect example. They are the largest recording company in the world and once produced a sumptuous, unrivalled sound. No more. Recordings are often cheaply and/or badly miked, and (my biggest gripe) are as thin and out of shape as the cardboard they are packaged in.

Only London Records and Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft consistently retain the "full" sound for classical, and perhaps Reprise and Elektra (among some others) are being fair much of the time to rock and jazz. Bargain classical labels such as Mace, Nonesuch, Tourabout, Ace of Diamonds (with sound equal to the best — it's London's bargain label), Seraphim (Angel's bargain label often competing with its fullpriced peer), Monitor and Everyman are unquestionably the mainstay of the classical audiophile.

A trip to New York or Detroit makes the bargain-hunter from Toronto temporarily woozy, but chances are in the rest of Canada there's no street like Yonge Street for low prices and wide choice.

The following list is by order of preference, based on price, selection, and to some extent atmosphere.

Round Records (110 Bloor West near Bay) second floor. The on-hand stock is exclusively rock, but the proprietor will order any classical record (the Swenn Catalogue is on the desk) and easily undersell A & A (who are equally obliging about ordering). Their discount is 34 per cent off list except DGG, discount for which is one quarter. If you know what you want, this is clearly the best place to order from.

The Varsity — David Long

especially for some of the more "radically" programmed concerts.

It has been estimated that with the advent of FM stereo the classical audience in large cities has risen 10 per cent (taking into account the rise in population of course) and it is evident that by the increasingly interesting programs and slate of top-name artists, musical entrepreneurs in Toronto are doing something to fill the more in-depth requirements of a larger and yet more discriminating audience.

The following list comprises musical enterprises and institutions, with some minimum admission prices.

Toronto Symphony: last season was the 50th anniversary of the TS and apparently the orchestre enjoyed a near capacity audience for the series A and B concerts. Besides Maestro Karel Ancerl, Erich Leinsdorf, Seiji Ozawa and Rafael Frubbeck de Burgos will conduct the 100 or so musicians. Guest artists include Jacqueline De Pre, Emil Gilels, Rudolph Serkin and Yehudi Menuhin — almost all visiting regulars now. Some interesting programs are also promised: Mozart's stunning requiem finally gets a Toronto hearing (June 23-4) after being passed over several times for Verdi's secular lament. Shostakovich's ninth symphony (April 3-4) and Somers' brilliant Pessecigle and Fugue (January 16-17) are two more anticipated works to be performed.

The two top series of 12 concerts each are A and B, costing $20 for the gallery. The B series is split in two at a cost of $13.50 for gallery seats. Phone 368-4631 for their brochure, or watch for full-page ads in the Toronto papers.

Hart House and the Edwerd Johnson Building. There is of course the Hart House Orchestre and Boyd Neel, as well as Sunday evening concerts in the Great Hall. The Edwerd Johnson Building has

50. But music-lovers will have the company's production of Wegner's second act in his Ring Cycle, Siegfried, as well as the usual fare of re-processed Italian leftovers to look forward to Tosca, Aida and Le Boheme. Eugene Onegin in English will prove a faux pas, I believe, as it turned out to be with the 1970 English production of Figaro. However, some outstanding singers, including Louis Quilico and Judith Forst, can't help but make the uninspired fare quite palatable.

The cheapest seats are on opening night in the balcony at $9, but a better bet is really Wednesday or Thursday at $14.50. Saturdays in the rear or middle balconies are also a good bet at $18 for the series.

Metropolitan Church. Many churches in Toronto sponsor chamber recitals, and this is only one of the more ambitious of them. Students get in for a dollar. Imagine Bech's St. Matthew Passion (April 14) for a buck (which is still a buck more than Bech's fellow parishoners had to pay!). Watch Wetsup for dates.

Wymliwood, The Royal Conservatory of Music, the Royal Ontario Museum and the Art Gallery of Ontario all have free concerts at some time during the year, and not so unprofessional as you might think. Also check with Goethe House (924-3327) for their surprisingly good programs (e.g. I believe Kerl Heinz Stockhausen is to be hosted again this year).

For all the attractive bargains and wide selection on the Toronto record market these days, there is a dis-listening to folk

Folk, wooden or chensonner music is still hanging in, maybe even relying lightly. The Riverboat on Yorkville, and Gumbles on lower Jarvis Street bring in big names (Van Ronk, Hartford, Welker, Browne, etc.) at big name prices. When it is crowded you have to leave after one extended set; weeknights you can often stay for two. In between names and sometimes on the same nights are local musicians. Watch for Rolf Kempf at the Riverboat.

Fiddler's Green on Tuesday end Friday nights, through the parking lot behind the YMCA, a block east of Eglinton and Yonge, has the best in traditional music and local performers. The atmosphere is friendly and anyone can get up and play a few songs. Never costs more than $2, most of the time less. 489-3001.

The Whistle Stop operates Sunday nights in the house beside Fiddler's (through the parking lot, etc.). Local performers, most often quite good, plenty of guest sets, informal atmosphere. $75.

The Stanley Steamer operates Monday nights in the basement of Nell Wyck College, Gerrard, two blocks East of Yonge, the big red multi-story building. Local musicians, guest sets, loose atmosphere, $1, I think.

Fat Albert's runs Wednesday nights in the basement of Bloor St. United Church, Bloor at Huron, on the same policy as Stanley Steamer and the Whistle Stop.

And way out on Eglinton just East of Markham Road is The Coffeehouse, good local musicians on Friday end Saturday nights. $1.

All of the above get going in the vicinity of nine o'clock.

A guide to university curriculum

By GARY WEBSTER

Here it is tall again and, as in past years, thousands of freshmen are entering the Arts Faculties of Ontario universities expecting educations they aren't going to get. Many, perhaps most, believe a B.A. will make them prime contenders for choice jobs in industry, government and education.

A lot of them are in for disillusionment — not because the industrial and bureaucratic elites wouldn't like to absorb them, but because the branch-plant Ceneclen economy simply is not geared to use the abundant human resources which the high schools and universities disgorge every year.

Those who are in for an even greater disappointment, however, are the minority who come to university with the primary purpose of learning what the world is all about. These are the idealists — admittedly the high schools produce less and less such naive types each year — to whom the university, especially the University of Toronto, appears as a temple of the higher mysteries, a sanctuary of truth, where a carefully groomed priesthood painstakingly initiates the new generation of the elect into the secrets of the way the world runs.

There are, unfortunately, many ways in which the University of Toronto does resemble the most hierarchical of churches and these have not been fundamentally changed by the revisions of the top structure. U of T is authoritarian and elitist in the style and form of its teaching-learning functions and of its government. It is notably defensive about criticisms of its privileges and of its role in the Ontario community emanating from the unenlightened — those who are not members of the priesthood, regardless of whether or not they are among the less than 10% of all Ontarians who have ever attended a university. But the worst aspect of this whole inflated metaphor is that the eager freshman will learn as much about the way the world really works in his classes at Toronto as he might have learned about heavenly truth in the corrupt Church of the Medici popes.

The arts and social science students will be the chief victims of this gap between reality and the gospel according to most U of T professors (there are a few heretics of course — we're very liberal — but don't mention institutional political commitment, it's worse than birth control).

The scientist will learn a lot about his physical environment and will probably become a fairly good employment prospect, even though he will get little idea of the social implications of his knowledge or of the means by which it will be expropriated for the benefit of the very few.

The arts student will study the intellectual playthings and the ideological emanations of all of Western men's pest and present ruling classes. He will encounter hardly any of the literary, philosophical, visual or with their "intellectual limitations," have obtained or expressed their awareness of their environment. Unless his specialty is esoteric, he will hardly even awaken to the existence of that European phenomenon, culture. In the non-Western world. In short, most of his old class and cultural prejudices will be expended upon, uplifted, and dignified by a flattering petina of intellectual jargon.

The failure of the arts subjects to transcend the boundaries of upper-class Western culture is compounded by the tendency of the academic disciplines to divorce all forms of artistic and intellectual expression from the social and political milieu in which they developed. English and classics professors should not be sociologists, say the rules of the game (see Bronwan Wallace's excellent article on this subject in Winter, 1970, This Magazine is About Schools). The result of often a fraudulent transformation of the messages of spokesmen for particular classes and personality types within a society into the spirit of a whole age.

It is as if we took the views of The Globe and Mail or the New York Times as the quintessence of the attitudes of all Canadians or all Americans. Add to this factor the fragmentation of culture into 'Literature', 'Philosophy', 'Fine Art', 'Music' — it's even a separate Faculty — and the dimensions of the problem become even clearer.

The student trying to understand the world might hope that the social sciences would offer some sort of antidote to this incapacity of the university to comprehend man's experience in any given age as both diverse — in terms of the activities of different classes, races and sexes (how many women does history record?) — and integrated — in the sense of interplay both among these groups and among their various modes of self-expression, i.e. art, politics, economic activity and intellectual creation. The social science curricula afford scant fulfillment of that hope.

Anthropology courses focus chiefly on the exotic ignored by other departments although this is one discipline in which a capacity for dealing with the integrity and interrelatedness of human experience has not entirely disappeared.

Psychology, sociology and political science all suffer from a tendency to impose the norms of middleclass behaviour and existing social arrangements on the subjects of their study. Their essential goal is to orient students to the idea of society as a reconciliation system in which all interests and viewpoints can be accommodated without messy conflicts and Controlled as it is by the ruling class of society, this university serves their needs (at the expense of the needs of the people) and as such is an instrument of oppression. What could be more obvious?

Forst, Thomson and Rideout in Eugene Onegin

Fragility in Tchaikowsky work

The operas of Tchaikowsky are rarely performed, and seeing Eugene Onegin staged last Saturday was a treat on this account. It is an intriguing opera, based on a story by Pushkin and changed by Tchaikowsky into a fine-needle conversation piece. The effect is interesting with Pushkin's tragedy dipped into Tchaikowsky's sugar-plum fairy powder, but emerging looking a little too refined. The contrasts of story and setting were not unlike an loon, with cold, impressive visage framed by ornate glitter.

After such a verbose preamble, it would be redundant to stress the weakness of the plot. But one became aware of the burden placed on the singers who had to contend not only with intricate (and often inconsiderate) arias but also weak characterizations for all the main roles, save Tatyana.

The acting inability of Victor Braun was painfully exposed, as he sang the role of Onegin. As the haughty, self-assured playboy he was convincing; but in the final act his desperate pleas to Tatyana and crushing rejection by her were much less plausible. On the other hand, Mr. Braun was vocally superior and dominated the huge stage with his beautiful baritone voice.

Heather Thomson as Tatyana sang and acted wonderfully and her bedroom aria in Act 1 was perhaps the highlight of the evening. Somewhat weaker was mezzo-soprano Patricia Rideout as the nurse, Filippovna. Miss Rideout has difficulties in the lower range where she strains to project. We noted this difficulty first with her interpretation of Suzuki in Madame Butterfly last year.

The production as a whole was coherent and staging problems were adeptly solved. The orchestra, led by James Craig was tightly paced, in the usual first-night tradition.

China comes to the Ex; glut infects the midway

"Do they know?" This was my first question at the startling announcement last year that the People's Republic of China were coming to the Canadian National Exhibition. The bamboo curtain was splintering, yes, and China was anxious to display the fruits of its collectivist labor to jaded capitalist consumers. But, surely, they had been somehow misinformed the "National" in the name had thrown them off, maybe, made them think that this was to be another Expo '67, another Flushing Meadows Fair, a little more folksy and loose, possibly, but a big deal nonetheless.

What would they say, then, when they arrived to find among their neighbors the sheep and swine pavilion, the stand where you could squirt mustard and catsup against a whirling canvas to make kaleidoscopic designs that "look and smell like the CNE", or the round-the-world rides on the midway, depicting their country as a never-never-land where buck-toothed coolies shuffled along under the benevolent smiles of Buddha? Heeds would roll.

There was a reason to go to the Ex now, at least a pretext. It was quite all right to gawk reverently at the lacquer were, even to suppress a smile at the Chariman's sturdy homilies which, I wrongly expected, would pester the walls. But, though I was eager to see just what notes China would strike amid all the ricky-tick of the fair, the rest of the Ex was starting to lure me, too. The midway is something of a twingeing tooth for me, and my tongue keeps nudging over to prod it.

Most of my life, I lived a few miles from what was billed as the second biggest country fair in the U.S.A. To go was tantamount to a civic obligation, and in a town without much else to do, it was easy to find excuses for returning a second and a third time. It never occurred to me that I was free not to go, though I hated it, as I had hated (a little kid) parades and circuses which invariably I left in tears. Why they affected me so, I have no idea. Surely, dumb kid, I had no inkling of the behind-the-scenes dolings of carry folk. Creven dishonesty. Common-law jealousies. Mickles of rye. Vendettas rolled up with the tent-canes and unfurled half a continent away.

No, it wasn't 'til I started to sneak-watch late movies when I should have been in bed, and Nightmare Alley stuck with me for weeks, that I was able to put reasons to my queims. (Tyronne Power ends up as the ghestly after-hour spectacle, a geek. Usually a terminal alcoholic, a geek horrifies the yokels by biting the heads off live chickens).

Once I got over that picture, that melodrama about things and ways of life which I could not, then, imagine, the same old fairs began to attract me for precisely the same reasons that had repelled me before. It had been quite a while since I had let myself indulge a leering curiosity; China had now given me a pretext. One Friday afternoon I jumped on a Bathurst car and rode down; I would get the China pavilion out of the way at the start, leaving the night for voyeurism.

The queue, rather surprisingly, completely circled the Queen Elizabeth Building, but it was moving along efficiently. People were not loitering, I surmised, in The People's Republic Pavilion. The good Dr Bethune was there to greet us among the photo-studies of friendly solidarity. Beyond the foyer you couldn't help being struck by the heavy artillery. Lathes, gear hobbing machines, and (my favorite) a bore core simple tracer. All were contoured, as if of plastic, in no-nonsense battleship grey.

The walls were alight with color transparencies. Oil refineries loomed large, making China look as exotic and inviting as Beyonne, New Jersey. You could follow, as if in a World Economy schoolbook, the whole process from drilling to packgeing. "Number 1505 drill team chalked up a new drilling record," boasts one photograph, in good idiom. Nearby is a display of petroleum products, of every hue, gleaming in their flecks as opulently as the shelves of liquors aboard the SS France: Vacuum Sealing Grease Number 3 and 4, Anti-Rusting Agents Number 3 and 4. What had happened to one and two?

Agriculture was conspicuous. "The capital construction of farmland is being vigorously carried out in the spirit of self-reliance and arduous struggle." Yes, indeed. Meticulous reconstructions of terrain, the kind over which a spoonful of water, poured over high ground, will sluice in proper channels and not seep into one of the tiny buildings. Erosion. Scientific ploughing. Irrigation. Straight from that battered grade nine textbook: production of grain, of oils, of vegetables.

Further on, another under-the-Christmas-tree model settlement: "The newly built village of Tachal". Tachal was no doubt a dream of efficiency and a happy home for its people, but I wasn't bowled over. But then, I'd seen it before, and so have you. Do you remember the long, dreb terraces of adjoining checks, coal-towns, in How Green was My Valley? (You can see the same thing in the newsclips from Londonderry and Belfast.) Tachal was a company town. No doubt it was spanking clean and had free clinics, but the spectre of robber-beron industrialism was there.

Leaving the rether sombre economic lessons behind, I strolled over the domestic displays, of the sort you might see a cross the way in the Live Better Electrically utopia. There was the "Snowflake" refrigerator (no automatic ice-makers yet.) Two chubby phones, baby blue and canary yellow, every bit as ugly as Bell's "futuristic" instruments. The "Typical" sewing machine, (looking just like the one that gathered dust for years in my aunt's attic, but without the foot treadle), intricate gold fillgrees curling up its sturdy frame.

So far I had been peering at all these proudly selected exhibits with a kind of snide amusement; all right, with smug Western condescension. This is quite unfair, I know; we find this national pride rooted in bumper crops and oil refineries a little naive (but then have you taken a look at the back of the new ten-dollar bills?). Friends of mine who know these things, who can tell about machinery and electronic gear by looking at it, were impressed. Not quite up to western standards yet, clunkily designed, to be sure, but an enormous technological leap easy for us to forget. It would be churlish to belittle their accomplishment and to gey their pride. Still, it is disquieting to see China steaming headlong into the same sooty fallacies as the West. If it's good for the economy, its good, period.

These were morose thoughts. There was still the rest of the exhibit, handicrafts and amusements, and the mechanisms of culture and leisure. It would have been heartening to see more of these things, but it was something that they were there at all. Five years ago, I doubt whether we would have seen anything of them.

The Chinese liked tobacco (too much, I hear) and alcohol. This was obvious. Cigarettes with names like Coco Palms and Golden Camel caught the eye with sultry Arabien scenes, like Anglo-American brands in the twenties — Mecca, Egyptian Prettiest, Fatimas — when smoking was still a topplish, Eastern vice. (Westerners like to orientalize their vices; the Chinese get theirs from the decadent West).

There were varieties of Chinese vermouth, Special Fine Brandy, Chee Foo White Wine which came in something looking like a catsup bottle. Other brands came in levlshly decorated pottery crocks. I wondered if we would soon be seeing Mao-tai, the brackish sorghum brandy, at the LCBO.

A semblance of a queue still collected through the pavilion, kids poking at the scale models, women with shorts and varicose veins pushing baby strollers past the valve seals and anti-rusting agents. The only real thickening of the line occurred around the artifacts; often it was hard to get close. (You could have shot a cannon at the gear hobbing machine with only property damage resulting, by contrast). The cloisone, to my untrained eye, looked every bit as finely crafted as the imperial leccuware in the Royal Ontario Museum. There was a grouping of musical instruments; how the violins and bassoons would sound when accompanying such revolutionary mesterworks as Teking Tiger Mountain by Strefagy I don't know, but they looked splendid.

There were more artifacts, knick-knacks really, and these were less inspiring. Figurines, every male torso bearing the ruddy cheeks and rippling musculature of socialist realism (I remember Alex's ransacked lobby in A Clockwork Orange. More carvings, pointlessly intricate dust-catchers. Have you ever seen those toothpick models of the Taj Mahel or Notre Dame that somebody has spent seven years and 400,000 splinters of wood? You oh and ah over the craftsmanship end think and god, what a monstrosity).

The cascade of fabrics had scant appeal to Western eyes. The designs, various stylizations of foliage, mostly, were close and busy, the colors themselves hot and feded. Imagine a room upholstered and draped with these fabrics, fill it up with the lacquer cigarette boxes, some cloisone, a few lacily carved figurines. Throw a richly woven rug on the floor and a tepestry of admirable handicraft along the wall. You might as well be in some barrister's study in the days just after Victoria, when dusty orientalle cluttered the mansion-flats of the realm. All the artifacts, all the skillful weavings, seem geared to a fading market, an imperial opulence, a sense of booty and destinies that has almost totally let us. The East is not mysterious, the exhibit seemed to proclaim, it is de-ja-vu. We've been this way ourselves, 15, 20 years ago, e hell-century even.

As we left the pavilion, damn the precision machinery. The ones who loitered in the parking lot, smoking defiantly.

This one's muddled dem, trying to check on two little hons racing from the Zipper to the Wild Mouse. The wife, sequined eyebrows on her sunglasses, a lumpy beehive of strew-cloased hair, tralls behind, then. They looked so much older than me in high school, I used to despair. They still do, end I had e pang of compassion for all the wise toughs from those days who had sneered themselves into crummy, installment-plen lives.

All this sent me ott to a reverle. Sentimental Journey, I mused, time trips. County Fairs, exhibitions — what were they supposed to do? Bring the life of the cities, gaudy and neon-bright, to the hinterlands. Bring the future of sophisticated appliances, scientific marvels, new designs to the workaday present. The twenties and thirties with their med, just around-the-corner dreams for the good life: just sit in your penthouse and push buttons, all day long. The Shape of Things to Come. Ditto the well-olled fifties, spece-age fantasies every week in the magazine section, in Life and Collier's.

Somewhere along the way the machinery got stuck in reverse. The hinterlands come to big cities, we step back a decade, or two or three. The slideshow lures us with clippings from the Arkansas Gazette, end we don't gawk, we titter. We find out that those people from years ago are still around; where else do we see them anymore? The biggest attraction of all on the midway — go back, wherever you went. The fifties. The forties. That time between the wars. It's ell there. That time between the wars.

And how well The People's Republic blended in. At such forward-looking extravaganzas as Expo, China would have looked country-cousin indeed. Impoverished little countries squandered their treasures to keep up with the great-power Joneses, like Bette Davis in The Cetered Affair. You couldn't imagine Chine doing that, even if it had begun to break out of its self-mede shell. So, they chose the chunky old CNE. Who would notice the chunky sets with screens the color of egg yolks boiled too long? Not the tired lines of people who spent their brief youth watching American Bendstand on just such a set. Or the unstylish dry goods, the gerish bric-a-brac? Not the people who still see this stult in Honest Ed's end who furnished their first flat with three rooms of furniture from a post-war emporium with easy budget terms, end who still hed the end tentables.

The cooking smells along the midway were thick and exotic, like e brochette of Innard amoking over coals in a North African bazaar. But we opted for the reliable fare over an Ontario Pleca, which looks worlds away. "Labyrinth" was playing — it had been the hit of Expo '67, I had heard — so we joined the lines snaking into Cinesphere. That damn music from A Clockwork Orange ushered us in, (omnious, thet), and we fidgeted through e third of an hour of split-split-screen lyrclism, half Midnight Cowboy, helf National Geographic. "Is the last room empty?" asks the bilingual narretor, epropos of nothing, "or is it filled with ell the shapes and sounds in the world?" Good question, that. I decided I was ready for e bracer still es a double bourbon: the fatty, Phillistine lures of the midway.

All day the sky had been the color of hot zinc, without a breeze. A singular odor collects over the fair on such a day, and is the same ell over the country. It may vary e little, depending on which of its components predominetes — manure, machinery oil and ozone, canvas, blackening grill grease. The essence remains, however; they could bottle it, as now they bottle pungent raw musk-oil, as Carnivel Cachet. This particular night, e blanket of charcoal smoke, gritty with cerclrogens, lay over the lights, end the stench of food sizzling in long-rencid fet cut eesly through the other ripe smells.

The genteel afternoon crowds, those who had come for Better Living Electricly end the Food Pavilion end e browse through Cine, had mostly disappeared, gone home or packed in the grandstand for the skirl of pipes and the swirl of kilts. The kids now possessed the midway, just e few days before the schools redivoured them 'til June.

The younger they were, the less distinguishable. The boys' jeans flopped over white shoes with four, or two, or five stripes, on them, end wore t-shirts with funny things on the ell, end they rekishly jerked the hair out of their eyes. Their girls' elmond-shaped faces peeped tentatively out from symmetrical cascades of heir. They kept rhythm in their strides and in the mastication of their gum. Queueing up for the rides, it was boy-girl, boy-girl, boy-girl, only occasionally broken up by e goggle of stag-visitors, who horsed around in the lines end only rode things that turned upside-down.

Or there were the women, who travelled, like extre-careful nuns, in threes and who all wore pents suits. Mother and sister end daughter, or the three plain girls from the office. Mostly they welked up the midway end down again, shrieking when one of them guessed, then blew the rest of the night on Bingo. One trio, out for loughs, cejoled each other into a spree on the Wild cat. They bought their tickets only to find out that the seats were for two, and empty space is no way to run e business. The odd-gir-out was hunted aside, looking forlorn, soon to be paired off with one of the stag males, who endured the furtive japes of his companions.

We strolled over to the side shows. The Ape Girl, Princess Something, in an "electronically sealed cage", would change into a gorilla, sprouting hair, before you very eyes. $1000 if not true, the come-ones wheedled, $1000. Further on, you could see such mutants es a sheep with five legs, and more eresting fauna. Rivalry ran high between the chicken with backward feathers and the one with fur instead of feathers. The star attraction was the giant jungle rat "from the sewers of Hong King."

The various neons of ferris wheels, twisters, end ell the whirling torture-instruments, glared and shitted against all the facades: Rattle Dattie, Char-burgers, Latt in the Dark, a lurid sound and-light show through the smokey haze. Peak feeding hours were past, the high rancidity of the air had diminished to a point where any further dilution would have left me disappointed. This chip-oil smell of beddy run concassions usully epalls me. That night, it hed heir) activated an odd set of cravings.

There are genteel gremdmothers (bless their twinkling blue eyes end blue hair) who won't miss the wrestling on their color consoles. There are people like myself who in mid-June, open the windows wide and douse the lights to squeeze every possible shiver from e two em horror movie.

People, a lot of people I'll bet, go to these fairs and exhibitions end carnivals precisely to savour that perverse glamour. We creve vulgarity, the game savour of the reftish, mush es our bones crave calcium or our blood iron.

It's e relative thing, I suppose. Thet women with the beehive heir and sunglasses were right to be bored; the street she lives on probably dishes out every week es mush of the seemy side es I get to see ell year. And spending evenings with Middlemarch or The Cembredging Ancient History probably induces severe psychic deficiencies. Is it any accident that ecademics are the most voracious consumers (end producers) of shameless thrillers? There's some Inverse ratio end work here, even es the most successful flights of prose-poetry usually have the heaviest bellet of the earthy, the clinical, the Phillistine, or es the most cherming cities (Venice, New Orleans) have their most elegant byways and palezzos ebutting on the sordid end jizzy night towns.

We have come to en etrection called The Chembre, which from the pictures of loosely veiled, uberously breasted women in every sort of contortion, seems to be e psychopath's wet dream. Loudspeakers coaxed us in. "See e young girl hung on e meathook," the voice rasped engegngly. "See e young girl on a bull-wheel being rosted alive." Cute little buys, pride of the cub scouts, were counting out their querters. We began to move away. "It's e groovy happening," the voice wheedled plaintively, to our becks. Glut was beginning to set in, fest.

The fireworks were spattering the sky es we milled down to boerd e street car, jammed with pestel pendes end outlandish sombreros. Stop and go up Bethurst, windows open to the close night. Outside the Wheet Sheef Truck, at King Street, e very drunk young women in crimson hot-pents, very unsteady on her high-heeled black boots, shrieked etter e geunt laborer who was deserting her. Outside the Peddock, et Queen, somebody ley spread-eegled on the pavement. Nearby, e very old man poked visulously through green gerbage begs with his ce.

At the Bethurst station, someone collapsed on the platform etter smeshing a bottle down eglinst the tracks, putting e furtive mouse to flight. On the train, two kids, 13 or 14 et most, necked furiously. As the train brakd to our stop, I wetched e tired looked women with e bebuskhe leen forward to speak to the girl. A reprimend, I wes sure. But no, she seemd to be the girl's mother, asking e question. Satisfied, she settled back to stare et the tunnel wells, end her daughter rejoined the embraces. The boy's t-shirt asked the cutely stenciled question: "Wenne beil?" Glut hed set in.

 Elections
Canada

PROXY VOTING

Students "away from home"

Every Canadian citizen* 18 years of age or more, may vote if residing in Canada on the first day of enumeration week.

To vote, your name must be on a list of electors—the list for the polling division in which you ordinarily reside. These lists are posted in each Polling Division and copies are mailed to each household in urban areas.

If you are absent during an election from your place of ordinary residence, due to your full-time attendance at a recognized educational institution in Canada during an academic term, you may vote by proxy.

* If you are a British subject, but not a Canadian citizen, have been residing in Canada since June 23, 1967 and were at least 20 years old on that date, you may (until June 26, 1975) vote at a federal election.

Where is my place of ordinary residence?

• Married students. It does not matter if both husband and wife are students, nor does it matter if you live in one room, or in a student's residence or at the home of parents. Your place of ordinary residence is where you are physically residing on enumeration day and your name should be on the list of electors in that Polling Division.

• Single students living "at home". No problem. You should be on the list of electors in the Polling Division in which your home is located.

YOU MAY VOTE BY PROXY

• Single students living "away from home". The home of your parents or guardian is your ordinary residence, even if you may be there for only relatively short periods of time each year. Your name should be on the list of electors in the Polling Division in which your home is located.

• Single students "on their own". Your place of ordinary residence is where you are physically residing on enumeration day and you are entitled to be on the list of electors in that Polling Division.

How can I be sure my name is on a voters' list?

— if possible, examine the list for your Polling Division, or enquire from someone back home. The name and telephone number of the RETURNING OFFICER for your home electoral district are available from "Directory Assistance" there.

What is a recognized educational institution?

— any organization, within reason that teaches an intellectual or manual skill.

I am away from home but am I a full-time student?

— you are if your main reason for being away from home is to attend a recognized educational institution, even if you work at some other job part of the time.

How may I vote by proxy?

If you are absent during an election from your place of ordinary residence due to your full-time attendance at a recognized educational institution in Canada during an academic term, you may vote by proxy.

- obtain a statement from the Registrar of your educational institution confirming that you are a properly registered full-time student, and
- get a "Form 47" from a RETURNING OFFICER. Fill it in and attach the Registrar's statement. These papers must be handed in person by your proxy voter or yourself to your RETURNING OFFICER back home before 10 PM of the Friday preceding polling day.

Who can be my proxy voter?

Any person who is on the list of electors of the same Polling Division as yourself and not appointed proxy voter for another elector.

That's it!

Published by the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada.

* Regular full-time students in the Faculty of Arts and Science may obtain a Registrar's Statement form and a form 47 from their College Registrar. All other full-time students may obtain both forms from their Faculty (or School) Secretary. Copies of the Proxy Voting folder shown above have been distributed in College, Faculty, School, SAC and GSU offices.

without departing radically from existing institutional and economic models. Deviant behaviour and social disruptions are treated as enormous problems rooted in the personal or group failures of the individuals or "minorities" concerned or as temporary aberrations in the essentially correct functioning of the system. There are exceptions to this pattern of analysis among individual professors, but we are speaking of the general impression conveyed by the curricula of these departments.

Economic courses by and large ignore the exploration of radical alternatives to the existing mode of production and distribution of wealth, treat capital as an entity with a life of its own rather than as the product of socially mobilized labour and human will, and bypass the political, social and cultural effects of American ownership of Canada.

Non-development of the third world is interpreted in nearly every discipline as a failure of the indigenous social systems (which are usually not even studied as they were before outside incursion) rather than as a by-product of centuries of imperialism and the capitalist organization of the world market. If only all peoples and all classes could be as rationally bureaucratic as the Western elites! (See, e.g., David Apter's Politics of Modernization, which tells us they inevitably will be).

It is a commonplace among those who have had experience of this and other universities to note that their government and the educational process within them are undemocratic and conducive to the development of master-servant relationships between teachers and taught, graduates and their fellow Canadians.

It is less frequently pointed out that the very content of our education fails to acquaint student with the real life, thoughts and social experience of the mass of humanity in this and every other age. The articulate, the privileged and the victors of history are paraded before us year after year as the only real representatives of life on this planet. And since most of us expect to join one or all of those categories, small wonder that we accept this feeble and untruthful version of past and existing reality, as the classicists expound the virtues of slave-based, Imperial Athens, the medievalists tout scholastic hierarchy and feudalism, and the political scientists tell us the benefits of the war in Vietnam.

Plato, Aristotle, Locke, Churchill, Franklin Roosevelt, Herold Wilson and Pierre Elliott Trudeau are slyly peddled off on us as contributors to the development of the democratic ideal, while Stalin and Brezhnev are passed off as the logical products of Marxist approaches to political problems. Major contributors to the growth of the democratic idea such as Marsilius of Padua, Herder, Thomas Paine, Rose Luxemburg and Frantz Fanon are virtually ignored.

And in an era when minor variants of the fascist form of government are mainstays of the free world and the Russian bloc, it is all but impossible to find a course in any department which deals with the history, politics, economic base (invariable support by the biggest industrialists, including British and American), psychology and sociology of the well-documented instances of full-blown fascism in the 1920's and '30's.

These and other deficiencies of the university curriculum are commonly blamed on the evil machinations of the corporate elites who supposedly dominate the universities through their boards of governors. They have played their part in the past, but in the present the buck need no longer be passed so far. Universities are controlled from within, and the enemy of free thought is within.

The fact is that it is the faculty members, aided by a largely quiescent, unquestioning, upper-class or aspiring upper-class student body, who are responsible for the shoddy state of the academic community. Those professors who have the tenure and concomitant security which should enable them to act independently are themselves, for the most part, the internal pole in the university of the anti-democratic, manipulative Canadian and American upper classes (and NDP affiliation does not exonerate most professorial members of that party from this indictment).

If real changes are to be made, they will be made by the students in concert with a small minority of the present faculty. The method of achievement of such changes remains an enigma. The type of reforms from above attempted in the last few years will clearly not work. We must rethink.

If we want a democratic education, a democratic, informed and independent Canada, and a world in which men can again live as men we must conceive every alternative. And we must not be afraid to include the Ontario public, in whose name education is conducted so duplicitously today, in our attempts at transformation. In this, as in most other aspects of the transformation, in this, as in most other aspects of the transformation of education, we have failed up to now.

Gary Webster was a doctoral student in political science at U of T. He was a member of the Commission on University Government (CUG) which recommended democratization of university structures. He now teaches at the University of Prince Edward Island.

A & A Records (2 locations: 351 Yonge above Bloor and 131 Bloor West, in the Colonnade). The Yonge Street store (upstairs) is the best classical merit in town. It has frequent manufacturer's clearance sales, very wide selection of old releases, and a progressively campaign-like eagerness to stock recent releases. They will order records, but if it comes from Europe you'll know it by the stiff price. Prices are otherwise reasonable: $4.50 - 5.50 for regular releases and 99 cents - $3.00 for bargain releases. Also a fair selection of 8-track cartridges and cassettes. Some reel to reel tapes, but at twice the price of an album - no wonder they're becoming obsolete.

Sam the Record Man 347 Yonge, nudging A&A). Good classical section at the beck of the first floor, with the standard bargain labels and prices (equivalent to A & A most of the time). A well-stocked renaissance and medieval music section is a nice surprise.

Eaton's (190 Yonge at Queen). We shouldn't blame department stores for high prices, shallow selection. It is the price the buyer pays for the convenience of having every other commodity at his disposal at the same location. Apologies aside, prices are high, choice limited. Chances are, record buffs don't require "every other commodity" and should know better.

Simpson's (178 Yonge at Queen). Here is a partial exception to the rule. While the rock section is poor, the classical section is not bad at all. If you don't know quite what you want, here is a place to begin without being overwhelmed by an infinity of choices as is the case at A & A, for example. There is a good selection of classical DGG cassettes, too, at regular (high) prices.

The Book Celler (2 locations: in the Charles Promenade below Bloor on Yonge, and on Yorkville, two blocks above Bloor off Avenue Rd.). Both stock exclusively classical records. The Charles St. location is poorly stocked with only Seraphims which selling for a dime less than the regular bargain price of $2.39. The Yorkville location devotes a whole room to records. The setting is attractive, but the choice is limited to full-price ($5.00) Angels and DGG's.

Target Tape (corner of Isabella and Yonge, 1 block south of Charles). A fairly good classical selection in cassettes and 8-track, as well as a well-stocked rock section makes this the best tape merit downtown, but the prices seem somewhat ungenerously high for an all-tape store (in classical music).

Circle of Sound (Toronto Dominion Concourse, King at Bay). High prices (e.g. Tournabouts, of which they have a fairly large stock, are selling for nearly $4 while A & A and Sam's price is about $2.75, fair selection in cassette and 8-track, in an attractive setting-you get what you pay for.

A guide to the theatre

Theatre's version of Russian roulette, the subscription series, is upon us again. The theory is that you save a lot of money by paying a lump sum at the beginning of the season for which you receive seats at a discount. The bullet in the chamber is the quality of the shows themselves. A series ranges from four to eight shows and all the entries may be excellent. Or there might be one bomb, or two, or...

The Royal Alexandra, 260 King St. W. (363-4211), is usual, is first off the line; its series has already started, beddy, with The Rothschilds. However, subscription rates are still being offered on the remaining live road shows, How the Other Half Lives, Irene, Henry IV, and Voyage Around My Father. For students, subscribing is about the only way to see these shows at a decent price. Seats for The Rothschilds vary from $15 for a pew in the orchestra, evenings, to a low of $4.50 for a seat up with the gods at a matinee. Subscription prices are $39 top down to $12.50 for the live shows. These amounts are slightly above half price and are better than average for theatre ticket discounts in Toronto.

The O'Keefe Centre, Front and Yonge, (363-6633), offers the largest subscription series with eight shows. Seven of these have been raved to date: The Sound of Music, Two Gentlemen of Verona, Two by Two, Follies, The London Palladium Show, Ballade and Gona with the Wind. The price range is stunning, from $60 for weekend orchestra seats to $18 for the rear balcony, only an Olympic record javelin throw away from the stage. There are no student discounts on subscriptions because the prices have already been reduced. The O'Keefe does offer a good deal on its many non-subscription attractions like the Canadian Opera Company and the National Ballet.

Students are admitted for half price to Wednesday and Saturday matinees and to evening performances on student standby after 7 p.m. if ticket sales are slow.

The best place to see straight drama, although it is not always the best drama, is the St. Lawrence Centre, Front just east of Yonge, (366-7723). Toronto's only large rep theatre this year offers live plays in its season: The Trial, Twelfth Night, A Touch of the Poet, Electra and Las Belles Soeurs. It is a conservative selection, designed to eliminate memories of previous experiments that ended in disaster and to consolidate a growing corps of followers. The St. Lawrence keeps its prices reasonable at $25 top for the live shows and if you want to go to Saturday matinee previews, it's $5 for the lot. That's cheaper than a good many movies around.

Several of the smaller companies have also gone the pay now, play later route. Oldest of these is Toronto Workshop Productions, 12 Alexander St. (925-8640). Students can pay $10 to see five plays: Hay Rubei, The Inspector-General, Indians, Lattars From the Earth and

The Good Soldier Schweik. Three of the plays are either original material or adapted by the workshop which has a long standing reputation for innovative and exciting productions.

The University Alumni Dramatic Club, after years in coach houses all over the city, seem to have found a permanent home in the new Firehall Theatre, Adelaide and Berkeley, (241-0112). Oddly enough, the theatre is a converted 19th Century firehall and a piece of local architectural memorabilia. To celebrate, the UADC offers its first subscription series of four plays: The Plough and the Stars, Le Temps Sauvage, The Women and The Zykovs. A subscription is $8 but does not save the student any money unless he wants to attend on Friday or Saturday night when the standard student price goes up from $2 to $3.

The Menagerie Players has a four play subscription season at the Centre Library Theatre, Collega and St. George, (924-8950). It Oh Dad, Poor Dad, the first in the series, is an indication, this group's productions should be taken on at a time and offer careful consideration, rather than in a lump on speculation.

One other group, Classic Stage Productions, has begun an eight play season, no subscription, at the Colonnade Theatre. And if its first production is any indication, it is just as well that no series has been offered.

The only organization on campus that has thus far announced a season is Hart House Theatre. Now that the economic crunch has come, Hart House has abandoned its policy of presenting seldom-seen (often with good reason) plays and is trying more well-known and popular fare in order to increase interest and box office. Only three plays instead of the usual four will be presented this year: The Misanthrope, Rosmersholm and Hamlet. Watch the Varsity and posters for announcements of productions by other campus groups.

The other theatres in Toronto seem to work, in public at least, on a pro tem basis. Two of them are now presenting works. Tarragon Theatre, 30 Bridgman St., (964-8833) has Laavng Home, a successful piece being revived from last season. Wednesday a new Canadian play, Foul Play, opens at the Factory Lab Theatre, 374 Dupont St. (921-5989).

Other experimental small theatres are Theatre Passa Murella, 11 Trinity Square (366-3376); Globe Village, 17 St. Joseph St. (964-0035); Studio Lab, 209 Adelaide St. E. (366-6451); Actors' Theatre, 390 Dupont St., (923-9792). These can offer most absorbing and creative theatre.

The Theatre in the Dell, formerly the only surviving home of the revue in Toronto, will present a double bill of straight, non-musical comedies, opening October 2 for a three month run.

QUAKER MEETING

The common form of Quaker worship is an hour of silence. We find that in this silence there may be a real meeting of people, one with another, and each with something deeper. Intransigence threatens Loyola-SGW merger

MONTREAL (CUP) — Intransigence and traditionalism from the Loyola Faculty of Science may scuttle merger negotiations between Loyola College and Sir George Williams University.

Although spokesmen claim the top-level talks are going well, the Loyola science professors are bitterly opposed to their administration's willingness to eliminate an honors program from Loyola's science offerings.

A proposal from Loyola vice-president Joe Burke during the summer called for a Faculty of Science at Sir George, containing honors, majors and interdisciplinary programs, while the Loyola division of science would have only majors and an interdisciplinary program.

According to the Burke document, the new federated university would contain faculties of arts, science, commerce and administration, and a Loyola faculty which would specialize in the humanities, social sciences, technology, commerce and the natural sciences.

The science faculty here is being unrealistic about its position," Loyola's domestic committee member Mark Tigh said. "They're not willing to compromise one bit by fighting to keep the honors program."

He termed identical science faculties on each campus "unfeasible" as long as enrolment continues to decline.

Although the Burke proposal was rejected by Sir George Williams officials, it stood as the working document for the merger talks. The negotiating committee has now agreed on another document which retains the features unacceptable to Loyola's science faculty.

It calls for faculties of arts and of science at Sir George, two university-wide faculties of commerce and business administration and of engineering, and the faculty of Loyola College with divisions of arts and science.

The document ended a threat to Loyola's Faculty of Commerce which had been slated for complete integration with the Sir George faculty, eliminating what is generally considered one of Loyola's most innovative departments.

The plan was approved recently by the Sir George Board of Governors and received Monday by the Loyola Board of Trustees.

Loyola science professors consider their honor students their "best students". They fear the loss of their honors program in the merged university would represent a loss in importance for the faculty.

But Loyola spokesmen say the general trend in science is toward interdisciplinary studies along liberal arts lines, while the need for specialization is declining. The Loyola Science faculty appears obsessed with specialization.

Students want equal hiring say

REGINA (CUP) — Students at the University of Saskatchewan Regina campus plan to nominate their own candidate for the position of vice-principal of Regina campus. The move was initiated after the student demand for parity on the selection committee was rejected by the university administration.

The position became vacant when the former vice-principal Ray Harvey was appointed deputy minister of the newly-created Saskatchewan Department of Continuing Education.

Student members on the committee contacted 11 people considered progressive and asked them to allow their names to stand for nomination. Only one has agreed to stand.

The selection committee choosing the vice-principal is composed of two Board of Governors members, two members of the Regina campus administration, two faculty members and two student representatives.

The students demanded equal representation on the committee but were turned down on the grounds that students already had "parity"; that is the same representation as other groups. The student representatives felt that students should have six members because they comprise the majority of people at the university.

The vice-principal is the chief administrative officer of the campus. The committee has decided to hire a Canadian if the candidate has qualifications equal with a non-Canadian. Only a person from Canadian complicity in Vietnam attacked

By DAVID WISE

The Executive Secretary of the Vietnam Mobilization Committee Wednesday attacked Canadian complicity in the war.

Speaking to a meeting of about 25 people sponsored by the U of T Committee to End the War in Vietnam, Rivhard De Gaetano said that despite world-wide opposition to American escalation of the air war and their bombing of the dikes, "Canada continues to apologize for the Americans and pretend that they are scaling it down".

In fact, he continued, "The U.S. is dropping bombs and killing Vietnamese at an unparalleled rate."

According to De Gaetano, most Canadians are resistant to any notion of Canadian guilt concerning the war. "The fact is," he stated, "that Canada is the U.S.'s largest supplier of war related materials and the world's third largest exporter of war supplies."

De Gaetano said that the actions of the anti-war movement and the impact of world opinion has led American troops to engage in what amounted to "open rebellion against their officers".

Incidents in which soldiers would refuse en masse to obey the orders of a superior officer and numerous outright attacks on officers with fragmentary bombs, "were the direct result of the actions of the anti-war movement," he claimed. These also "eventually forced Nixon to change his strategy."

He said that because of the consequent escalation of the air war and the bombings of the dikes, the war is now entering a critical stage.

"With monsoon rains expected to be heavier than ever because of American seeding of rain clouds, if the United States does indeed succeed in destroying the dikes, as many as fifteen million people could consequently die by drowning or starvation."

De Gaetano emphasized that the North Vietnamese will never surrender to the Americans, but that even if they win on the ground, facing America's "automated and computerized air war with outdated weaponry" they can only win a Pyrrhic victory.

The Vietnam Mobilization Committee plans to stage demonstrations across Canada against the war on November 8.

Hellyer says Tories will end inflation, unemployment

By ELAINE KAHN

"Elect Bob Stanfield and the government that will change the course of Canadian history," urged Paul Hellyer yesterday afternoon.

Hellyer, conservative candidate for Trinity and a former Liberal cabinet minister was speaking at a meeting sponsored by the U of T PC club in Hart House. Only a dozen people attended the meeting.

Hellyer said he joined the PC's because the party will change the direction of the management of Canada and is the most open of all the parties to new ideas.

He asserted that the business cycle is not inevitable, instead advocating solving unemployment and inflation by control over monopolies.

"We have the worst run economy in the Western world," he charged, using graphs and charts of comparative wages and prices in Canada and fourteen other countries, to support his point.

He stated that inflation can be reduced to three per cent in Canada. "I think it would be closer to two per cent," he added "but I pick three because it's a Conservative figure." Several members of the audience giggled.

Hellyer's controls would not be used on small businesses, only unions and big corporations. He posited that if all wage increases were limited to the real average increase in productivity in industries such as steel, glass and automobiles, there would be no inflation. His three per cent figure is based partially on the fact that 30 per cent of the goods Canada consumes are imports.

The minimum wage could be brought up and jobs provided to eliminate unemployment, Hellyer said. Thus the "paternalistic Big Brother" attitude of bureaucracies toward the unemployed could be eliminated.

People would have a greater range in housing choice, he claimed.

Though a great deal of media support would be needed to convince Canadians of the need for controls, Hellyer does not think it will be hard to sell the idea, because of its advantages. He said it is simply a "question of thinking through something that is rational" and claimed that 70 per cent of Canadians already favour such controls.

Asked what he would do to prevent situations like the high density apartment growth in downtown Toronto and landgrabbing by major developers, Hellyer said that he is opposed to the rezoning of single family dwelling areas.

Education faculty expands

Huron parkette slated to disappear

This park at Huron and Washington will vanish if expansion plans go ahaad.

The Huron-Washington parkette has been given only 18 months to live. The death sentence was apparently confirmed this week by Keil Gregory of the U of T's office of business affairs.

Alan McAllister, spokesman for the Committee on the Huron-Washington Parkette, originally reported that the U of T planned to let the park exist only 18 months.

The Faculty of Education building, at Bloor and Spadina, is planned to expand to encompass the whole block containing the park. The parkette, just opposite several Campus Co-Op residences, came into being when local residents discovered that the vacant lot was not going to be used for building in the near future.

The land on which the park was established is apparently owned by the provincial government, although Gregory was not able to explain its status. The college will have money available for the extension to its crowded facilities, and it is only a matter of time before architects' plans are drawn up and construction is started.

At first, Gregory said there would be a "college extension built in two to three years".

Asked about the 18-month deadline for the park, he then admitted that it was "quite possible". However, Gregory did not know what body was making the decision on the Faculty of Education extension.

Present plans for the extension require the entire north side of Washington Ave. As of last April, the provincial government had bought all required land with the exception of one house.

Despite residents' complaints and suggestions that the building extend only to backyard lines, the plan has not been changed.

Gregory said Monday that he was "quite sure that the architects are thinking of eliminating the parkette". Questioned as to whether or not the architects had considered building the extension vertically instead of laterally, Gregory answered, "I'm sure they will have considered everything."

Hospital "oppressive"

Mental health care under fire as archaic

By MARK BOHNNEN

"Mental hospitals are dinosaurs that have outlived their usefulness", according to Don Weitz, a psychologist who is a former staff member at the Queen St. Mental Health Centre.

He was speaking Tuesday night at a forum sponsored by the Psychiatric Hospital Patients' Welfare Association (PHPWA), a citizens' lobby, held at the Consumers Gas building on Toronto Street.

Weitz charged that mental hospitals are "archaic institutions, more anti-therapeutic than therapeutic, more oppressive than anchiorative."

He went on to outline many of the dehumanizing features of mental institutions, features which "control rather than liberate" the patient.

Among them were pacification by drugs and shock treatment, intimidation through the use of psychiatric interrogation and withdrawal of basic rights. Patients are often deprived of the right to leave their rooms or even to wear their own clothes, he said.

Under such circumstances, he charged, they soon begin to feel like "irresponsible, mad children."

Criticizing government policy, Weitz noted that during occupational therapy, patients are often paid "less than one third of the minimum wage in Ontario" for their work.

Jan Dukszta, former staff psychiatrist at the Queen St. Centre and NDP, MPP for Parkdale, asserted that the time is past for lengthy incarceration. "For too long," he said, "we have tolerated the approach 'out of sight, out of mind'. We put away people who bother us."

According to Dukszta, many people seek out psychiatric help more "because of social causes — differences at home, differing work situations, and less from what has been called mental illness."

He advocated the concept of a community support system as the only viable alternative to an institutional one. Under such a system, he felt, community workers would increasingly replace "over-trained professionals".

Other speakers at the forum complained about poor or inadequate hospital facilities, overdrugging of patients and an unresponsive or inaccessible hospital staff.

Panelist Edward Greenspan, a Toronto lawyer, was highly critical of the 1970 Mental Health Act, which allows victims to be easily deprived of their civil rights.

He singled out one "dreaded" section which permits a review board to determine privately, without patient consultation, whether a patient will be released.

One slated speaker, a psychiatric patient, failed to appear. Tori Salter, chairman of the forum, explained that the patient feared recriminations if she publicly criticized the hospital where she is being treated.

The PWPWA has prepared a brief calling for the establishment of legal clinics in psychiatric hospitals to inform patients of their rights.

The brief is addressed to the Minister of Health, the Attorney General and the Canadian Bar Association.

U of T second in car contest

Canadian teams took the first three places in the recent Urban Vehicle Design Competition open to North American universities. Preliminary results announced at the close of the competition had suggested three Canadian universities finished first, third and seventh. There were 60 cars entered in the race.

U of T's entry, Miss Purity II, listed in the preliminary results as third, was upgraded to second place in the final results recently announced.

The University of Western Ontario came first, while the University of British Columbia was third. The Massachusetts Institute of Technology whose students organized the contest, by contrast, was 29th.

Cars were rated in accordance with a number of tests, including the level of exhaust emissions, safety, cost space utilization, fuel efficiency, and a variety of performance tests.

All raw data were multiplied by a factor. Miss Purity II was awarded a very high factor which enabled her to gain second place, despite an undiagnosed fault that limited speed and prevented Miss Purity II from participating in four of the tests.

Scar expressway proposed

1,200 homes threatened

By VAL ROSS

A spectre haunts at least 1200 homes in east Metro: the proposed Scarborough expressway. Whether it will be temporarily defeated depends on the unknown strength of east-end Torontonians, and the new tactics being used by Metro to push it through.

The Scarborough is to be a continuation of the Gardiner Expressway eastward, intended eventually to link up with Highway 401. Twelve hundred working class homes, many of them already owned by Metro, and acres of valuable parkland are threatened by the proposal.

The expressway was first conceived in 1943. Its functional plan was approved by Metro Council in 1957, and $30 million was voted for the Scarborough with the proviso that "... $2,100,000 is to be debentured for acquisition of land only." Approximately 150 acres of land was acquired at this time.

The Ontario Municipal Board's original order was amended in 1965 to provide a further $3 million for land and engineering costs. In 1967 the functional design of the expressway was approved by Metro Council. Metro proceeded to acquire another 220 properties between Leslie and Birchmount (making it east Toronto's second largest land-owner). Just four years ago, the OMB approved Metro's application to build the Scarborough from Leslie to a point 3000 feet east of Birchmount at a cost of $102.5 million.

The expressway seemed to be a fait accompli, but opposition to the Spadina Expressway was beginning to change the acquiescent temper of east-end home-owners. Pending the decision of the Ontario cabinet on the Spadina, the OMB spurned Metro's previous application for funds.

Under section 42 of the Ontario Municipal Board Act, the OMB has the right to review its own decisions. It has ordered Metro to make a new application and report justifying the Scarborough Expressway. But Metro, recalling past battles, is understandably wary of the OMB; its Scarborough strategies are quite different from those that may have lost Metro the Spadina.

Metro has chosen not to comply with the OMB order to reapply for and rejustify the expressway. Rather it has gone to the Provincial Court of Appeal. It claims that section 42 of the OMB Act is illegal, and that the OMB does not have the right to review its approval.

"Metro is playing this quietly," said Dorothy Thomas of ForWard 9, a local citizens' group.

"That's why they're going to court instead of to the OMB. They want to avoid any discussion on the merits of the expressway." ForWard 9 is preparing to fight for an OMB review as far as the supreme court if necessary.

Dorothy Thomas is running for alderman in the '72 municipal elections on a platform of opposition to the expressway.

Reid Scott, the incumbent alderman, holds basically the same position: "The proposal as it stands isn't adequate, 35,000 cars are coming off the Gardiner into the area every night and there's certainly a traffic problem; but we need more study to get the best solution."

Andrew Brewin, MP, and Tom Wardle, MPP, have both conducted polls which show 2:1 support in Ward 9 for the expressway. However, Scott points out that the polls were loaded with questions such as, "Are you in favour of the expressway to cut down pollution?" "The majority of those living in the path of the expressway oppose it," says Gerry Thompson of ForWard 9, "as do those who are aware of the route or its effects on the area."

What are the merits of the expressway? The Joint Technical Transportation Planning Committee has prepared a report, not for the OMB, but for the Metro Chief Executive. Not surprisingly, the report recommends that "an active programme for the protection and acquisition of the right-of-way (i.e. buying houses) be reinstated immediately..."

While the report states that present traffic in the east end is "not enough to justify the construction of costly additional facilities", there are other reasons for its construction.

The Scarborough, also described as "the easterly extension of the Frederick G. Gardiner Expressway", has acquired a new title in the report: "the Lakeshore Transportation Corridor". The expressway, then, is seen as an element of a province-wide tourist and commercial transport network. Its construction will make it easier for commercial traffic from the east to reach the downtown, and will provide a transport route to and from downtown Toronto and the cottage country to the Northeast.

The expressway also serves to fill a gap in the city's cross-town linkage system, carrying suburban traffic from east and north Scarborough and Pickering to central Toronto, and to other expressways in the Metropolitan area.

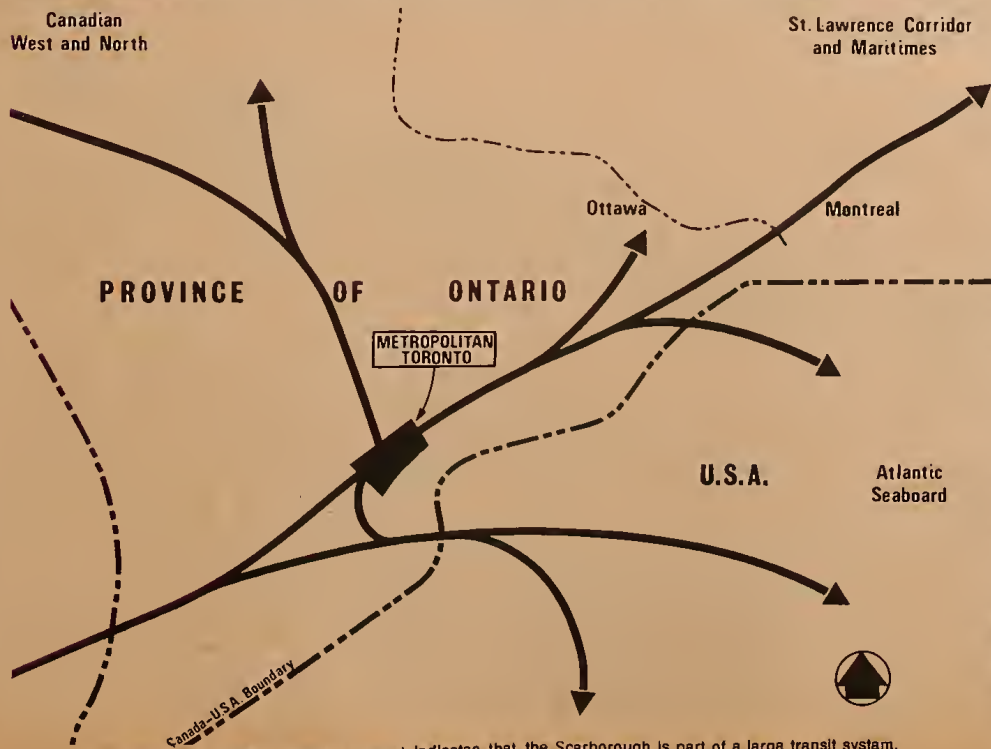

Kingston Road, the present link between the Gardiner and the 401, is a "grossly inadequate" part of the grand scheme. Yet a 1967 engineering study promises that the Scarborough expressway's special ramps and interchanges will actually generate traffic on Eastern Ave., Queen Street and Kingston Road, instead of lightening the load.

Secondly, "the improvement of the transport system within the Borough of Scarborough and east of Metro is an important incentive to economic expansion... stimulating the eastern corridor to a higher growth rate." "The expressway is an important part of the Toronto Centered Region Plan to urbanize from Bowmanville to Hamilton by the year 2000.

The importance of the expressway is underlined when the report explains that urban problems — sprawl and social problems — far from being the result of hasty commercial development and lack of social planning, are caused by "inefficiencies in the provision of economic, transportation and service networks."

Thirdly, the recreational needs of Scarborough and southeast Toronto require transportation to the cottage country and to downtown. Ironically, however, if the expressway is constructed, it would affect east Toronto's three major parks. Eastwood and Oakcrest parks would be destroyed; both are the only parks in their respective areas.

The ambiguity of the merits of expressways will be obvious to Scarborough College students, while the route of the expressway has not been disclosed past Birchmount, it will cut diagonally somewhere just south of the College to join with the 401 further east. If the Scarborough is built, students will travel to the College quickly and easily. They will have more access and closer links to the downtown. However, if it is built, it may disturb local ravines, add to the volume of traffic and raise nearby land values.

This map in the Joint Committee report indicates that the Scarborough is part of a large transit system.

Rotenberg wants more power

By ULLI DIEMER

"I want the power and prestige of the mayoralty," executive alderman and candidate for mayor David Rotenberg told an audience at Holy Trinity Church yesterday.

He explained that if he were elected, Toronto could expect that he would use the "power and prestige" of the position to continue the policies he has been pushing in his three years on the city executive.

In his term, he said, city government would function in "a better and more open manner", although he did not elaborate on how this would happen.

Rotenberg didn't disagree with a statement from interviewer Stephen Clarkson Liberal candidate for mayor in 1969 that in the past three years, Rotenberg, as budget chief and executive alderman, has already been "the real power at City Hall". The position of mayor, he said, would make it easier to carry out his policies because of the weight attached to the post.

Questioned about the controversial issue of high-rise development, Rotenberg avoided dealing with the problem directly, but stated that he followed the Toronto official plan on this question. Where the official plan permitted high-rises, he said, he voted for them, where it didn't he voted against them.

He said that he thought that a "reasonable balance between low and high density housing" now exists in Toronto, and denied that he was either "pro-developer" or "anti-developer". (Rotenberg is considered one of the chief "old guard", pro-development members of council by citizens' group).

On the question of how plans and policies or development should be formulated, he indicated that decisions should be made by the "elected representatives" rather than by citizens' or neighbourhood groups.

The city government should be advised by its own planning board as now, he said. (A majority of present planning board members are present or past aldermen).

He did say, however, that panels of citizens should "provide feed-in" for the planning board, on which it could partially base its decisions.

He reaffirmed his support for the Spadina Expressway, which he said would help solve the "major traffic problem" in the northwest sector of Metro, something rapid transit could not do alone.

Rotenberg denied that his connections within the Conservative Party (he was a senior organizer of ex-Provincial Treasurer Darcy McKeough's leadership bid) would play an important part in his campaign or would have an effect on his relations to the Tory government in Queen's Park after he is elected.

"National political parties have no basis at City Hall", he said.

David Rotenberg says he will improve Toronto city government if elected mayor

Information about stack access to the Roberts Library, and Faculty of Education Student Union plans to attempt to withdraw from membership in the Students' Administrative Council published in Wednesday's Varsity was inaccurate.

The library story incorrectly stated that stack access to the Roberts Library will be automatically granted to teaching staff and graduate students. According to plans adopted by the academic Senate last spring, no one will have automatic stack access.

Instead, all members of the university community wishing entry to the stacks will have to apply for a stack pass. Passes will be issued, technically, according to academic need and not academic rank. The passes will be for periods of time varying from one day to one year.

In practice, teaching staff and graduate students will probably have less difficulty in securing extended stack passes than other members of the university community, especially in light of university plans to refurbish the Sigmund Samuel Library as a central undergraduate library.

Faculty of Education Student Union withdrawal plans have apparently been dropped over the summer, as relations with SAC have improved.

A withdrawal request would have to come from the Student Union Assembly, which has not been elected for this year.

Rowing Club future in doubt: boatmen needed

Poor turn-out for the U of T Rowing Club in past years is one of the reasons why practice sessions have been changed from morning to evening. New recruits are badly needed.

However, "There are a number of other reasons for the switch", said Geoff Wright, last year's Varsity captain.

"Last year the Argonaut Rowing Club (the rowing team's point of departure for practice) obtained the services of Tudor Bompá, former Romanian National Coach", said Wright. "Tudor offered us his services last year but he was only free in the evenings", Wright added. "Tudor also felt that an evening training regime is more physiologically sound."

These reasons, plus the fact that for years people expressed interest in rowing but showed disdain for early morning practices, caused the change to evening practices.

However, according to Wright, the "turn-out for practices this year is terrible, and we may have trouble boating crews. Part of the problem was caused when some of the more experienced oarsmen graduated. In addition, a number of those who are interested have evening classes which conflict with the practices."

"The problem is compounded," Wright added, "because there is a general shift away from organized intercollegiate sports. Furthermore, the transformation of the St. George campus into honours, professional, and graduate courses, and away from a general program serves to eliminate interest in the less well-known sports."

"The distances are extreme for students from either Erindale or Scarborough while students on the downtown campus who are closer to the Argonaut Club have appeared to lose interest."

"We anticipated this possibility", Wright said, "and tried to start rowing at Erindale College, situated only one-half mile from the Don Rowing Club. We thought that it would catch on there, since it allows Erindale students to participate in an intercollegiate sport located much closer to their campus — and yet, the participation at Erindale has been no greater."

According to Wright, the Rowing Club offers a variety of competitive categories. These include categories based on weight (under 155 lbs. and heavyweight), and experience (novice, junior, and senior). "Although we need people in all categories", Wright explained, "we are most anxious to attract people in first or second years".

The Canadian rowing clubs are now starting to prepare for the Montreal Olympics in 1976 and new recruits are the people most likely to attend, according to Wright. In addition, the Sports Canada athletic grants go mainly to undergraduates, thereby making it more advantageous to begin rowing in the first year at university.

Time is extremely short until the first regatta at Western on October 9. The rowing season is quite brief, with successive regattas at Trent, Brock, and McMaster, while the OUAA final is at Brock on November 4.

Rowing practices will continue through September at 5:15 pm in the hope that anyone interested can find the time to participate. For further information, contact the athletic office, Hart House.

Carleton students delay building

OTTAWA (CUP) — Carleton resident students are threatening to delay the construction of a new building on the site of the only grassing playing field in the residence area.

A decision will be made Monday about the playing field. The students intended to occupy the field with continuous football games, campires, and tents until the university had found another site for the building.

Carleton president Michael Oliver assured residence students that construction would not begin until the Buildings Advisory Committee had dealt with a dissenting brief, presented last Wednesday.

Other Teams - Eastern Section

This year is shaping up as a repetition of last year's final confrontation between Western Mustangs and the Ottawa Gee Gees.

While Western poses as a long-range threat for the Blues, the immediate challenge is to get past Queens and Ottawa. The only other team in the Eastern Section the Carleton Ravens have not displayed any improvement so far this year over their past season's showing. At the least, the Blues should finish third.

The Gee Gees, who defeated McMaster Marauders 18-9 in the semi-finals last season, were defeated by Western Mustangs 13-0 in the final. With the new league structure, Ottawa comes into contention with Queen's in both home and away games. The competition should be hottest between these two teams this year.

Although only 18 players from last year's Gee Gee squad have returned, two of the returnees are tight end John Rodrigue and Paul Kilger on defence. (Both are OUAA and All Canadians in their positions). Also, Gil Sabourin (OUAA All Star) will return as defensive half-back. Quarterback Dan Smith has had experience with the McGill Redmen and appears capable in this position, as demonstrated by his performance in Toronto last Saturday. Fullback Neil Lumsden also looked promising last Saturday against the Blues. He ran for 120 yards on 19 carries, handles the Gee Gees' punting and place-kicking chores, and was even available to block in the Ottawa team's backfield.

This so-called Ottawa "rebuilding year" may result in a team that is stronger than the last one, and almost certainly no weaker. A good indication should come tomorrow when the Gee Gees play Queen's in Kingston. Last year, Ottawa defeated Queens 26-17 in Kingston. Queen's University Golden Gaels are, in a word, strong. Although the Kingston squad lost in the semi-final last year 42-3 to Western, it nevertheless finished ahead of Carleton and Toronto last season. Although Queens lost narrowly to Toronto at Varsity Stadium 31-29, the Gaels defeated Toronto in Kingston 28-25.

(33¢ plus 2¢ tax)

The rivalry should be continued again this year, although Queen's appears from its first game last Sunday to have another strong team. The Gaels defeated Carleton's Ravens 33-0.

Frank Tindall, starting his 25th year as coach will have a veteran backfield, but the progress of the offensive line will be important to Queen's overall success. The offensive backfielders pose a serious threat to an opposing team's defence. However, if last Sunday's game is any indication of future play, the Gaels offence will be chiefly along the ground. Against Carleton the team had only 37 yards passing, but 207 yards rushing.

Gord McLelland and Brian Warrender tied for the scoring lead in the OUAA last season. Their 12 touchdowns (each) set a season touchdown record, as well as a season scoring record. Last Sunday Warrender gained 84 yards on 16 carries and Dave Hadden had 62 yards on 11 carries. Doug Cozac, Gaels' kicker and punter, moved to within five points of the all-time team scoring record, kicking two converts and one field goal in the game. Gaels quarterback Tom Taylor was 5 for 16, two of which went for touchdowns.

At the moment, Carleton Ravens appear to be the weakest team in the east, even though quarterback Dave Redmond is equally adept at passing or running. However, he is beginning his second year as a starter and could prove to be a valuable leader for the Ravens. Receiver for Redmond's passes is often Don Gormley (OUAA All Star) who averaged 34.4 yards a reception last year, catching 15 passes.

Outside linebacker Chris Harber (another OUAA All Star) is also the Ravens' kicker. Last season, he led the Eastern section with an average of 40.5 yards per kick. Last season, the Blues lost their season opener to the Ravens 12-3, but gained a win in early October at home, downing the Ravens 22-2.

Only the top Eastern Section team will make the play-offs this season because of the restructured league. Queen's and Ottawa are likely contenders for first Place, with Toronto and Carleton coming third and fourth.

Scarcity of facilities alters Intramural Program

The intramural (interfaculty) sports program begins another season next week with a reorganized structure.

By this fall the "Sub-Committee on Restructuring", appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee in November 1971 issued its report. It was set up "to study the present intramural organization and to consider some restructuring of the program".

The report states that "the sub-committee met on three occasions" and "The members recognized that the existing program was structured along solely competitive lines and there was considerable discussion as to the desirability of moving towards a more recreational approach."

Furthermore, "the committee was aware of the looser, less structured programs being offered at other universities and was concerned with the lack of purely recreational activities being offered at U of T."

Secretary of the Intramural Sports Committee Dave Copp, "pointed out that the present program had evolved over a period of 35 years and was really an inter-college league", said the report. The report added that "facilities had placed severe limitations on the development of activities. To maximize use of inadequate facilities, it becomes necessary to plan virtually every minute they are available. This severely restricts their recreational and unstructured use."

In effect the Sub-Committee made the following recommendations:

- "that the present competitive program should be continued with certain minor modifications,"
- "that activities of a more recreational nature be sponsored by the UTAA through the Intramural Department".

"that co-ed activities be sponsored in co-operation with the WAA".

"that since the Benson Building at present closes at 9 pm, arrangements to be made to run activities there between 9 and 11 pm."

The intramural program covers almost a dozen team sports including football, soccer, and lacrosse as well as several "individual" sports, such as golf and tennis. Almost all of the schedules are underway by mid-November.

Last year the Intramural Sports Committee successfully undertook three new activities. Twenty-four teams took part in the recreational touch football league, started last September. A co-ed tennis tournament was held on the St. Hilda's courts, and recreation skating at the arena attracted between 135 and 210 skaters each Sunday evening for nine weeks.

A Snow-Bowl Football game was played on January 21 between the Mulock Cup winners (the winners in the interfaculty football league), Victoria College, and a team of Interfaculty All-Stars. (The game was a "Charity Bowl" with the receipts going to the Indian-Eskimo Association of Canada.)

For the 1972-73 season, a ski club and a recreational inner-tube water polo league is being considered. The touch football was expanded from a total of 24 teams last year to a present 30. Two games will have to be played per field because of the lack of facilities. (That is, the team with the ball moves from centre field to goal line.)

It is a tribute to the intramural program that it is student-run for the most part. The students intramural program is as much an exercise in democracy as it is in running a league. They run the program and sit on the board which handles all the appeals and programs.

Small conference votes to set up arts student union

By BOB BETTSON

Forty students representing student organizations in the Faculty of Arts and Science almost unanimously decided to set up a faculty student union on Saturday.

Only St. Michael's College students opposed the union which will represent all 13,000 students registered in Arts and Science.

The founding conference at Hart House set up a committee of six to draft a constitution by October 2.

Their proposal will then be submitted for ratification to college councils and course unions in the faculty. Three quarters of these bodies must approve the constitution before the union can be formed.

After a long, dreary debate marked by constant procedural wrangles, the delegates passed a number of resolutions to guide the constitutional drafting committee on the purposes, duties, and structure of the union.

The conference formally limited the union to a service, information and co-ordination role for students and student organizations in the faculty.

Paul Moran of Erindale voiced the sentiment of a number of delegates when he said that "a policy and decision making role would destroy the union."

A proposal, which would have committed the union to a policy-making role was defeated 8-6. However any decision is a matter of policy, and the union would decide in each case how far it would go on individual issues.

There was a consensus on the duties of the new union, as yet not formally named.

It will have an $18,000 budget from the SAC education levy, to organize new course unions, support existing unions, research and co-ordinate services for Arts and science student representatives on various university bodies.

There was general agreement that the union should be completely autonomous from SAC. Only SMC representatives Pat Redican and Al Nigro dissented.

Redican explained "students can't identify with the Faculty of Arts and Science. This body would be meaningless to the average student on campus."

SAC rep Bob Anderson said the SMC idea that the union be established as a sub-committee of SAC's education commission would entail many difficulties.

"It is better to have power on our own", he said. "We should only go Hert House's Music Room hosted the founding conference of the arts and science student union.

under SAC if there is no other way."

Redican later challenged the legitimacy of the conference saying "the way delegates have been accredited is a joke." He charged a number of delegates did not represent their constituency properly.

A number of delegates were voting for departments in which no course union exists.

Delegates agreed on a structure consisting of a large council of approximately 50 people with representatives from college councils, course unions and the faculty General Committee student caucus, and an executive.

However, a proposal by David Freedman of New College, which had been accepted in principle, caused disagreement on the number representatives suggested from each constituency.

The final decision on the council's composition was left to the recommendations of the constitution drafting committee.

Committee debates issue

Final examinations for history may return

By PAUL McGRATH

Should University of Toronto history students be required to write final examinations?

Should exams be required in lecture courses over a certain size?

A special committee set up by the U of T history department will meet "sometime this week" to discuss these and other related questions in an attempt to arrive at recommendations for an examination policy for the department before its next meeting on about three weeks.

The committee was requested by faculty head J.B. Conacher and other department members at the last department meeting September 11, in order to clarify the department's vague position on the matter. No guidelines have been set for the committee to follow.

The committee will consist of two faculty members, Kenneth McNaught and Milton Israel; one undergraduate student, either Jim Longo or Gus Richardson, executives of the History Student's Union, and an unnamed teaching assistant.

The faculty stands divided on what the policy should be. According to Israel some members feel an examination is necessary, while others don't.

Some feel exams should be required in large lecture courses that have no tutorials because there is little way of knowing individual students. A combination of increasingly larger classes and more emphasis on essays has led to the blossoming of the pirate essay trade.

Conacher says "at present, some students may be getting course credit for two essays they may not have written."

Some faculty members, having tried courses without exams are switching back.

"There are 70 members of the department", says Israel, "and about 68 different opinions."

He added that previously the Faculty of Arts and Sciences had required final examinations for all first-year students, but all professors who wanted to waive that were allowed to do so. Some faculty members feel the policy should be the responsibility of departments, and not left up to individual professors, said Israel.

In preparation for whatever the committee might recommend, Conacher has asked professors teaching large first-year courses to make no commitments about final exams, unless, of course, they have already stated there will already be one. He too feels that there is some doubt about the accuracy of a mark given on two or three essays in a course where the professor does not know the student.

"There may have to be a retreat (sic) in the whole area," Conacher says. "We have made no decision as of yet: we'll rely on the committee for some ideas."

He added that for large courses, there aren't many alternatives to exams.

Professor W.H. Nelson sees other considerations in the matter: "If the material covered is mainly factual, examinations seem sensible, but if the course relies on original work by the student, it can be judged on the papers."

In his course last year (History 370), Nelson required students to write a take-home exam, with a time limit of a week. He hopes to repeat the practice this year.

"There seems to be little purpose for an exam in a tutorial course," he says. "If the tutorial leader doesn't know the student after a year, there's something wrong."

Longo says the History Student's Union member on the committee will bring the student voice to the meetings. Early this week the union will distribute questionnaires to history students concerning exams, so their position will be better represented on the committee.

Longo expects many no-exam votes.

Waffle to wage campaign for fed election

By NADIM WAKEAM
 York university professor James Laxer announced at a press conference Thursday that the Ontario Waffle Movement for an Independent Socialist Canada will wage a political campaign during the federal election.

However, the Waffle will not field any candidates for the October 30 contest.

Wafflers who were running under the NDP banner have withdrawn "because we were no longer in a situation to change the policies of the party we were part of," he said.

"The point of our campaign is to bring attention to those issues being ignored by politicians."

"We are not a political party." According to press release, no political party is dealing seriously with the vital issue of the independence of Canada.

The release states that "it is almost unbelievable, that the parties have said so little about the effects of Nixon's economic policies on Canada, the critical trade talks still proceeding between Canada and the United States, and the question of Canadian resource policy, particularly in the far north."

THE Waffle campaign, said Laxer, will be one way the independence movement can put forward its views.

The press release stated that the movement "opposes the Trudeau concept of federalism" and suggests that "only by recognizing the right of self-determination for both of Canada's peoples can be built a new alliance between English and French to deal with our common problems."

Laxer continued, "we intend to run our own campaign. We are not going to tell people how to vote".

As a movement, "We do not plan to support any candidates in any campaign." However, both Laxer and U of T political economist Mel Watkins, another Waffle leader, stated they personally would vote for the NDP on October 30. Each also intends to remain a member of the New Democratic Party.

GSU miffed at Miglin invitation to ceremony

By ELAINE KAHN
 The Graduate Students' Union has expressed concern over the administration's decision to invite SAC president Eric Miglin to speak as the sole representative of the entire student body at the installation of president John Evans this Thursday.

In a letter to presidential assistant, N.S. Dickinson, GSU president Wendy LeBlanc said that Miglin "in no way represents or speaks for the close to 7,000 graduate students" of the university.

She was also perturbed that she had not been consulted before the choice was made. She was informed of the choice of Miglin, she says, by receiving a copy of a letter sent to the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students, saying he had been picked.

Larry Hoffman, GSU executive assistant, complained that the university has begun Evans' term here "by disenfranchising graduate students." He admitted that SAC represents more students than any other student body but thought LeBlanc should have also been given the chance to speak.

Dickinson said he supposed the group who chose Miglin had not thought it necessary to consult LeBlanc because of the non-political, non-academic nature of the event.

"Nobody should get uptight about it," he said.

He stressed the simplicity of the installation ceremony and added that it would take six or seven hours to let every duly constituted body on campus speak, even though the speeches will be about one minute long.

Miglin, who represents more than 20,000 undergraduates, said that he didn't think anyone had deliberately intended to slight LeBlanc by not asking her to speak. Miglin added that he would have let her or anyone else from other student organizations speak.

'Stuff peddled is not mescaline'

In reading the section on drugs in your "Community Guide" (September 18), I noticed that several popular misconceptions had been included.

The information on mescaline and psilocybin was factual. However, it is important to note that despite the widely held belief that both these substances, as well as peyote and THC, are readily available in Canada, there seems to be virtually no basis in reality for this assumption.

Over the past three years, numerous samples of substances alleged to be mescaline, both organic and inorganic, psilocybin, THC, and peyote have been analysed by the Addiction Research Foundation in Toronto - and none of these drugs has ever been detected. The majority of such samples actually turned out to be one of three things: LSD, PCP or a combination of the two.

They moved; we didn't know it

I wish to inform you of an error in the September 18th issue of The Varsity.

The correct address for the Ontario Human Rights Commission, and the Women's Bureau is 400 University Avenue rather than 74 Victoria Street, their former location.

Their telephone numbers remain unchanged.

PCP (phencyclidene) is a drug for which the only current pharmaceutical use is as an anesthetic for animals. Adverse reactions for humans can include "speedy" symptoms, such as increased heart rate and blood pressure, as well as nausea, vomiting, and visual hallucinations (the latter action partly explaining why PCP turns up as a counterfeit for the "exotic hallucinogens). It is, in short, a potentially harmful drug.

The article also mentioned that MDA is a speed-like, addicting drug. It is, however, classified scientifically as a hallucinogen rather than an amphetamine, and there has been no evidence to date that would indicate the use of MDA causes physical dependence.

I hope you will decide to re-inform the students in these areas I have outlined. Drug information is only useful when it is factual.

As to what I said, I recall it to be mainly a criticism of the view that Marxism should be studied in extra-curricular, counter-courses. In my opinion, this would deny students the right to study Marxism as a legitimate university subject.

To aid executive members

SAC hires more office assistants

By LINDA HALL

In a move designed to aid its executive members, SAC plans to hire office assistants to fill two existing positions and create one or possibly two positions of a similar nature.

SA C will fill the executive assistant's position, and will also hire an education assistant for a post created in 1967. As well, an assistant will work for both the services and communications commissions.

Present executive assistant Paul Carson is re-applying for his job, along with approximately 30 others. The education position was filled during the summer first by last year's education commissioner, Dan Leckie, then by interim commissioner Bob Anderson and most recently by present commissioner Marty Stollar.

The positions were advertised in a $30 Globe and Mail advertisement, as well as in campus media. President Eric Miglin later said he regretted the move, as the ad brought forth many applications from people with little knowledge of U of T.

Stollar said last week that if the Arts and Science Union does not come into being, SA C will need a second paid assistant to share the duties that would fall under the education commissioner's jurisdiction. A conference Saturday decided to form the union, but to get underway, it requires ratification by various student bodies and a SAC grant.

The position of university researcher, created during the summer to serve the student members of the Governing Council, was terminated when researcher Craig Heron resigned to work for the Ontario Federation of Students.

A SAC executive meeting on September 1 decided that the student caucus for the Governing Council was not making effective use of the university researcher, and that the SA C university commission could not by itself provide sufficient work to justify the hiring of a full-time assistant. SA C also employs two general secretaries as well as an assistant to the accountant.

At a SAC executive meeting early this month, Miglin expressed the philosophy behind the proliferation of paid assistants. Ideally every commission should have a resource person to handle bureaucracy and research, but not policy formation, which must be the role of the elected students.

In an interview this week, Miglin asserted that for its size and significance, SAC has a relatively small paid full-time office staff.

The executive assistant, for example, Miglin said, is "occupied with a lot of things that come up around the office". He said there are no major projects planned for the executive assistant this year.

The major responsibility of the one or two education assistants is information dissemination. The assistants will also organize course evaluations and non-editorial work on Hogtown Press, which SAC acquired last March.

The newly-created position of services and communications assistant is designed primarily for work on a number of surveys planned by both commissions.

Hiring committees to consider the applicants were being established last week. "We hope to have filled the positions by the end of the month" Miglin said.

Quebec law students meet today, may decide on general strike

MONTREAL (C U PI)—A general strike of Quebec law students at the Quebec bar now seems imminent, following a meeting Saturday night at the University of Montreal.

An ultimatum from the U of M students demanding the restructuring of the bar examination was ignored last week.

Consequently, law students at the University of Montreal, the University of Sherbrooke, Laval University, the University of Ottawa and McGill University are considering strike action.

William Friedman, president of the McGill law undergraduate society has called a meeting today at which he will ask for student support for the strike.

If they agree, they will join more students who have already begun picketing the Palais de Justice.

Bar examinations have been scheduled during the time of demonstrations, yet the doors have already been barred by angry students.

The lawyers' guild, however, has a police permit to demonstrate between 8:30 am and 12:30 p.m.

The major objections of the striking students are aimed at the structure of the bar exams. Six tests are given both morning and afternoon on three consecutive days; each lasts three hours.

Fifty-eight per cent of those tested in Quebec earlier this year failed.

The strikers hope to pressure members of the bar into restructuring the exams at a meeting planned for next Tuesday.

"We wanted to end the sit-in because it had no purpose."
— Jack Sword explaining why he called police on campus to evict Simcoe Hall occupiers.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Daisons Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

We are all on trial

Drop charges against library four

Although John Evens has been U of T president since July first, the vestiges of the turbulent reign of caretaker president Jack Sword still linger. Tomorrow, four people arrested during the police assault on last March's first Simcoe Hall occupation come to trial.

The tour, along with between 25 and 100 compatriots, had occupied the university's main administrative building when the academic Senate rejected student and community demands for unlimited access to the stacks of the John Roberts Library.

The occupation followed months of futile debate, first in the Library Council and then the Senate, all talking on deaf ears. It was like a rerun of the previous summer's U of T Act legislative debate. The students had all the reasoned arguments; the conservative faculty the clout to prevent the students from winning their point.

More than 7,000 students manifested their support for the open stacks campaign, signing petitions and coupons. A wide variety of community groups voiced their support for the student campaign in letters presented to the initial Senate meeting which rejected student demands.

But when acting president Sword thought student numbers were sufficiently low, he ordered Metro and campus police to evict the occupiers, early on a drowsy Sunday morning. For the second time in his one year tenure as Claude Bissell's temporary successor, Sword had given in to impulsive reaction and broken with long-standing tradition by bringing Metro police onto campus.

The police assault was quick and brutal. Despite alleged orders to U of T chief constable J.F. Westhead to inform each student that he had the right to leave the building voluntarily, no warning was given to the Simcoe Hall occupiers.

Rejecting negotiation, the phalanx of campus and Metro police crashed up against the ornate, wooden doors of the Senate Chambers, eventually beating a path through to obtain entry. Despite student cries to avoid fighting between cops and students, Metro cops began attacking the students, punching and kicking wildly in all directions.

Students mess outside Simcoe Hall before reoccupying Senate Chambers to protest then acting president Jack Sword's action in having police evict occupiers.

In the bitter irony that characterizes riot police offensives, people resisting police attacks were beaten all the harder. And, persons who came to their rescue were charged with assaulting police.

Nineteen people were arrested for trespassing however the university later dropped the charges following the re-occupation of Simcoe Hall by more than 600 students protesting Sword's action.

Charges against four of the occupiers for assault and obstruction were, however, not dropped by the police despite a public statement by the university's top administrators that "the interests of both the university community and the public would be best served if all charges were dropped. These are the charges which come up Tuesday.

The four open stacks supporters shouldn't be on trial. Instead, the cops who assaulted the occupying students should be standing in the docket. It's time overzealous head-busters were made to own up to their actions.

The university, too, should join "Metro's finest" in the docket. It should never have called police on campus to settle an internal matter.

The occupation, expressing the just discontent of thousands of students, was a legitimate vehicle of dissent and was not interfering with the university's operations. In fact, the occupiers restricted themselves primarily to the Senate Chamber area so that the university would be able to carry on its normal functions when its business offices reopened Monday morning.

There are serious doubts that the university has pursued the dropping of these charges as vigorously as it could have. Vice-presidents Sword and Donald Forster (now the undisputed number two man in the administration) and vice-provost Robin Ross have been subpoenaed to testify at the trials. They should seize the opportunity to reassert firmly the university's desire that proceedings be dropped.

All three signed a March 13 statement admitting that "there was some misunderstanding and difficulties of communication because of the circumstances under which the police had (sic) to act". There need be no room for "misunderstanding" now. The university was wrong in calling police. The police were overly enthusiastic in carrying out their orders. And, the charges have no basis in fact or justice.

As long as the tour remains charged, we are all on trial because the must face legal sanction for defending our principles, so should we.

When the trials begin at 10 am Tuesday in courtroom 33 of the Old City Hall, the 7,000-plus students who signed the open stacks petitions and coupons should be there, as well as new students who support the struggle to make the university serve the community.

And, lest Simcoe Hall bureaucrats think otherwise, let them be fully aware that Roberts Library stacks is not Roberts Library attack is no yet settled. These trials, should they be allowed to continue, are just a detour along the way. The stack must be open to everyone!

Sword, Forster, Ross to testify

Simcoe Hall brass to appear at Tuesday trial

A parade of U of T stars is expected to visit City Hall tomorrow — in a trip to court.

But first a parade of supporters of people arrested in the first "open the stacks" occupation last spring is expected to arrive, after assembling at 9 am in front of Simcoe Hall — the scene of the arrests.

The trials of the four people arrested in the break-up of the first occupation are due to come up in court 33 of the Old City Hall at 10 am. The arrests came after a group occupied the then Senate chambers of the chief administrative building in support of open access to the stacks of the new John Robarts Library.

Charges of trespass against 18 persons were later dropped when the administration responded to a second and more massive occupation by giving in to some of the demands.

Jack Sword, then the acting president who called police on campus to evict the protesters after the Senate had refused their demands, is expected to appear as a witness.

According to one of the accused, vice president Don Forster and vice-provost Robin Ross, who were involved in the decision to call police in will also testify. Deputy chief constable of campus security J.C. Irwin has also been subpoenaed.

As well, last year's SAC president Bob Spencer, many students and members of the surrounding community who supported open access are also expected to appear as witnesses.

Facing charges of assaulting police are Bill Getty, Mark Goldblatt and Randi Reynolds. Tom McLaughlin and Goldblatt are charged with assaulting police.

McLaughlin promises that his and Getty's trials will attempt to raise some of the political issues involved in the arrests. These include rights of the community to use university resources, particularly libraries, the rights of dissenters on campus and the ability of the administration to call police on campus.

(In response to the second occupation acting president Jack Sword promised he would not again call Metro Police on campus "unless there is clear and present danger to the essential functions of the university" and, where possible, consultation "with the students directly involved."

(However president John Evans has stated he does not feel bound by Sword's statement, reached after negotiations with students.)

McLaughlin and Getty intend to conduct their own trials, McLaughlin said. He expects the trials to take several days.

Tells students first

O'Donohue says that he will run for mayor

By PAT REDICAN

Alderman Tony O'Donohue ended months of speculation Saturday by admitting he intends to run for mayor of Toronto. He said an official announcement of his candidacy can be expected "soon".

This disclosure came in an interview following the Toronto taping of "Crossfire", a television show similar to Under Attack.

In the introduction to the CHCH-TV show, O'Donohue allowed himself to be referred to as "a candidate for mayor" in the December 4 municipal election.

After the show, which is intended for broadcast later this week or next week, he said he was unaware while the show was being taped that reporters were present.

However, he confirmed his intentions to a reporter after the show.

His campaign will emphasize the importance of family and community in modern society, O'Donohue said, although reformers and some of the "Old Guard" feel the real issues are urban growth and development.

The ward 4 alderman, who is also on the city executive, repeatedly asserted that the breakdown of the nuclear family the biggest problem facing society today.

One solution to this problem, he claimed, was a deeper commitment by parents to their children. He rejected the notion that the communal family is an alternative.

O'Donohue also said that a tightening of discipline in the schools was necessary, although he later admitted he knew "very little about school systems. I can only go by my own experience."

O'Donohue was educated in Ireland, in what he described as a strict educational system.

Much of the programme centred on Rochdale.

O'Donohue, a long-time foe of the high-rise co-op building, claimed it "sets a bad climate for Toronto's young." Although "99.99 per cent of the kids are good kids", Rochdale gives youth a bad name, he stated.

O'Donohue referred to Rochdale as the "tip of the iceberg" of the breakdown of the social order that he is making the main theme of his mayoralty campaign.

O'Donohue elaborated little on the other possible campaign issues. He said he didn't think the Spadina Expressway would be an issue because "Davis has said no". O'Donohue was in favour of the expressway when the issue was before city Council in 1970. Questioned his chances of winning the election, he merely stated that he "couldn't be the election".

He added that Alderman David Rotenberg "is certainly not short of money. I am not in his position, I'll have to win it another way". Rotenberg, along with Alderman David Crombie, is a declared majority candidate.

Asked about how the "reformers" will do in the December municipal election, O'Donohue said "I don't consider someone who is against development a reformer. Every new alderman considers himself a reformer and as far as that goes, I guess there will be a couple on council next year."

O'Donohue also promised to reveal his campaign expenditures before the election is over.

Provinces want more paperwork in Canada student loan plan

OTTAWA (CUP) — The provinces have established tough new regulations for the Canada Student Loan plan which could further restrict access to post-secondary education.

The regulations include a requirement for photostated copies of T-1 income tax forms of both students and their parents to be included in loan applications. The forms are supposed to be private information for the Department of National Revenue but the law protects a citizen from misuse of that information only by that department and no other. If copies of the T-1 form are not provided, the loan will not be granted.

Some western Canadian student unions are reportedly considering legal action on the clause as a breach of privacy. But the regulations were made by the provinces, not by the federal government.

Some of the changes benefit students. The maximum annual loan was increased to $1400 from $1000, while the total borrowing limit was raised from $5000 to $7500.

But the most controversial new regulation requires students to save a certain amount of money from summer work. The exact amount is determined by a chart based on a student summer employment survey conducted in 1971 by the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

The provinces all agreed to this change and to the use of the chart.

However, British Columbia government officials appear to be backing away after student protests over the rule began.

Seymour Archibold, provincial student affairs department superintendent in Victoria, claimed that his department eased the regulations despite opposition from Ottawa. He said that expected earnings had been cut by $100 across the board.

Federal officials told CUP that British Columbia is now using the chart prepared for Alberta B.C. had earlier agreed to use its own chart which called for students to save an average of $875 over the summer.

The expected savings vary according to sex and the number of years of study completed. All student loan applications will be processed on the assumption that everyone worked during the summer. Students wishing to appeal the decision must do so through the appropriate provincial authority.

Ontario students may have the hardest time getting appeals processed because of their large number of Canada's university students attend Institutions in Ontario.

The Canada Student Loans Act was passed by the federal government in 1964 to allow more young people to attend post-secondary institutions. The act outlined certain minimum regulations the federal government felt were necessary.

Because the act is administered by the provinces, the ten provincial educational representatives meet and decide under which regulations they will administer the act. Unanimous agreement must be reached before changes can be made. A federal Department of Finance representative chairs the meetings.

The new regulations were effective July 1, the beginning of the plan's fiscal year.

The provinces will meet again in November to discuss the B.C. decision not to use the previously agreed upon tables.

Student opposition to the new regulations may be able to force the governments to retreat. The B.C. example indicates that it can be done

Rugby Blues defeat Trent 24-3, 34-7

Consistent aggressive play by the scrum led the Rugby Blues to a 24-3 victory over Trent University Saturday on the back campus playing field.

The Blues were greatly improved from their game against RMC the previous Saturday. The team was ahead 10-0 at half time and continued to dominate in both loose and set play, holding Trent to their own half of the field for most of the game.

Blues captain John Drummond scored early in the first half of play with a run from the base of the scrum to the blind side from the Trent five yard line. John Barclay later added a second try following a scrum drive over the Trent goal-line. Rick Hodder converted for a 10-0 score at half-time.

In the second half, marked by powerful rucking by the scrum and solid running in the backs, scrum-half Drummond added two more tries for the day's only "hat-trick".

Later in the game, wing forward Neil Sorbie scored the final try for the Blues, and Hodder added two points with a field goal. Trent's only points came in the second half with a penalty goal by Keith Burton.

The Blues now stand 1-1 in league competition, with six remaining games.

Blues' second team complemented the first team's win, by trouncing the second Trent team 34-7. Duncan Taylor and Diego Gaueli led the scoring with two tries each.

The remaining points were scored by Bill Procnier, Mike Braney, Greg Sprick, and Richard Brookes — all with one try. Trent replied with a lone try by Peter Adams, and a penalty goal by Tony Sherman.

The Blues host the University of Michigan Rugby Club from Ann Arbor next Saturday afternoon in annual exhibition play. (Last year the Michigan team defeated the Blues in Ann Arbor.)

University of Toronto barred women from medical school in 19th century: organizer

By AGI LUKACS

The University of Toronto blatantly discriminated against female students in the 19th century, asserted Jackie Larkin at a forum on the history of women, sponsored by the Department of Interdisciplinary Studies.

Larkin, a member of the NDP women's caucus cited the case of Emily Howard, a woman who attempted to enrol in the U of T's medical school in 1860.

Because she was a woman, Stowe was refused entry to the University of Toronto's medical school. She was told by one official: "The doors of the university are not open to women, and, I trust, never will be."

Larkin spoke to a large crowd in the Faculty of Education auditorium. Stowe, Larkin said, got her degree in New York, but was almost prevented from practising medicine in Ontario because her degree was not Canadian. In fact, the first medical degree granted to a Canadian woman in Canada went to her daughter.

But the U of T had tried hard to fight this, Larkin stated. It had helped to establish a 'separate but equal' medical school for women in Toronto, which evolved into today's Women's College Hospital.

In the 19th century, women who attended secondary school were considered worthy of only half the government grant that applied to a man. Until around 1920, fewer women went to high school than men and for these women, Larkin asserted there was special treatment: courses in "needlework and morality". QLarkin discussed why most women did not go to school as much as men in the nineteenth century.

Even if they weren't busy making clothes, soap, candles, bread, and preserves from their gardens, their place was considered to be in the home. There were children to take care of, and probably usually many of them, because sons were needed to do the farming. Childbirth was dangerous, given the scarcity of doctors.

The importance of women was recognized in an 1870 legal decision, when a husband was awarded $500 for the loss of his wife's labour after she fell on ice and broke her leg. She received nothing.

About this time, Larkin told the audience, a woman lost her nationality, property and wages if she married. She had no legal power over the apprenticeship or adoption of her children. If she committed adultery, the law could forbid her access to her children. The same thing did not apply to a husband who "sinned". It was not until this century that a wife could sue for desertion or child support.

When women began to get paid jobs in numbers, their jobs, not surprisingly, were extensions of the home duties which they performed so well: they became servants, housekeepers, and textile workers. As the latter, Larkin asserted, they often worked 16-18 hours a day, and sometimes were excluded from unions on grounds which are reminiscent of the present: women are not steady workers; they leave to get married.

Their wages remained below those of men. In 1907 female workers' wages averaged only two-thirds of male workers'.

Since then, the percentage of the labour force which was female rose from about 15 per cent to 15 per cent. During the Second World War, women became involved in work not usually deemed suitable for them. Mothers were granted flexible hours or daycare centres, because their work was needed. These necessities largely disappeared after the war.

THE VARSITY BOARD: TIME IS RUNNING OUT

Applications for the four SAC seats on the Varsity Board must be received by 4:00 Wednesday. Send Applications (or requests for further information) to Debra Lewis, Communications Commissioner, SAC office.

PRIORITIES

At the last general meeting of SAC, the council decided upon a number of areas which require our immediate and intensive attention. Committees are being organized to investigate the following areas:

1. STUDENT SERVICES: Those working in this area will be involved in evaluating the quality of present SAC and University student services and making recommendations to SAC concerning existing and possible additional areas of student services. If interested in this area, contact Bill Steadman, Services Commissioner.

2. FINANCING OF POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION: The purpose of this working group is to ensure a continuity of student expertise and competence in the field of post-secondary financing and to increase the general awareness among the student body as a whole with regard to issues in this field.

Contact: Eric Miglin President.

3. DISCIPLINE: With discipline soon to be an issue in the Governing Council, it is essential that SAC issue a position paper on this topic. It will report to council by October 1. Contact: John Creelman, University Commissioner.

4. THE LIBRARY: SAC feels that the question of the Roberts Library is still very much an issue, and one in which we must take an initiative. The Library Committee will be surveying the arguments concerning the library and presenting their evaluation of these to council by October 30. Further actions may be taken upon adoption of a SAC policy. Contact: Michael Steinberg

5. UNIVERSITY PLANNING: Since the idea of a single campus centre has been rejected by many of those concerned, SAC has turned its attention to planning of the University as a whole. SAC commits itself to analysing students' needs and desires with respect to physical planning, and commits itself to seeking the broadest possible student involvement in long range university planning. Contact: John Helliwell, Vice President

6. DAYCARE: In the light of recent developments in this area, discussion of this topic was tabled until the next general meeting.

We need people to work in all of the above areas. Any of the contacts can be reached through the SAC office (928-4911, 12 Hart House Circle). Everyone is encouraged to help.

THE FEES REFERENDUM OCT. 11, 12

As a member of the Ontario Federation of Students, SAC at U of T has already expressed support of two OFS demands on fees: that the fee increases be deferred until those affected are consulted and until the Wright Commission Report is discussed, and that the OSAP changes be reversed, so the loan ceiling would return to $600.

Now OFS is asking all students in Ontario for support for these demands, and for an opinion on the tactics proposed for realizing the demands. A province-wide referendum is being held October 11 and 12 asking three questions:

1. Do you support the demands made by the Ontario Federation of Students to the Government of Ontario?

2. Will you support withholding your tuition fees in January if OFS negotiations with the Government are unsuccessful?

3. Would you support withholding all of your 1973-9174 tuition fees if the Government of Ontario announces further tuition fee increases or further detrimental changes in OSAP?

The way your education is paid for will be one of the great educational debates of the seventies. It is an issue that affects everyone in Ontario. For this reason, student actions now are extremely important. They must be carefully thought out; they must be reasonable and responsible; and above all, they must have the support of the great majority of students.

This referendum is your opportunity to tell student organizations what you think of their proposals. The issues are complex, and SAC will seek to present them as fairly and as clearly as possible. Each of the questions must be understood and voted on by an informed student body.

SAC will make clear all of the consequences of a yes or no vote to each question, but you must make up your own mind.

Blues blank Waterloo 4-0 in season opener

By PAUL CARSON

Varsity Blues combined an outstanding defensive effort with two first half touchdowns to defeat Carleton Ravens 14-6 before 1500 noisy fans Saturday in Ottawa.

The victory evens Blues' season record at 1-1 and puts them into a second-place tie with Ottawa Gee Gees who lost 16-13 to Queens in Kingston.

Although Carleton mounted a furious drive in the final two minutes, the game was actually decided during a fifteen minute span in the first half and the opening portion of the third quarter.

In the first half, Blues were leading 7-0, thanks to Cor Doret's two-yard plunge, when penalties and two Carleton end sweeps carried the Ravens to the Varsity one yard line. Captain Hartley Stern stopped Raven fullback Joe Colvey on second down, an with third and goal Blues entire defensive front four (Jim Nicoletti, Jim Orfanakos, Jon Dellandrea, and Jim Blainey) plus Stern and Rob Bloxham piled up Colvey again and Blues took over the ball. One series later the Ravens were back inside Blues' 15 but linebacker Alex Markobrada threw Montagano for a six-yard loss. Carleton kicker Derek Roberts was then wide and short on a 24-yard field goal attempt.

Blues couldn't move the ball and were hit for a "no yards" penalty on de ensuing punt, then a roughing penalty on Carleton's first play. The Ravens were back in a familiar spot — the Varsity 15 — but again had to settle for a 24-yard field goal attempt. Stern broke through to cleanly block it and carried the ball out or danger to the Varsity 40.

On the next play, Dunkley lofted a pass to flanker Aarne Kartna who raced the remaining yards down the sideline past two surprised Carleton halfbacks. Dunkley kicked his second convert of the day an Blues went into the dressing room leading 14-0.

Ravens opened the third quarter with three quick first downs but successive blitz by Nicoletti and Bloxham set them back 22 yards an forced a punt.

On the next series Montagagano hit Raven halfback Bill Mason on a screen to the short side an Mason rambled to the Varsity seven-yard line Stern again was in the right place intercepting a seconddown pass on the goal-line to keep Carleton off de scoreboard.

Cor Doret puts Blues on the scoreboard in the first half of Saturday's game against Carleton in Ottawa.

The Varsity—David Lloyd

Ravens kept Blues' offensive unit pinned inside the Varsity 15 for the next few minutes but midway through the quarter rookie Brent Eley recovered a fumbled punt on the Tronto 35 and Blues were out of danger.

A Bob Billingham interception plus inside running by Doret and Libert Castillo maintained Blues favourable field position until one of the seemingly endless "no yards" penalties put Carleton on de Varsity 47 with about eight minutes remaining in the fourth quarter.

Montagano moved the ball well and hit flanker Scott Alexander on a key third down gamble before passing 19 yards to Alexander for the touchdown. The convert sailed directly over the right goal-post and Blues led 14-6 but Ravens had five minutes to get another touchdown and try the optional two-point convert provided in college rules.

Ravens picked up the ball once more on a fumble and with rookie quarterback Steve Kerr at the controls (Dunkley left the field in the fourth quarter with a painful rib injury), Blues' offensive squad kept the ball on the ground. Carleton finally regained possession on their own 16 with 1:34 to play and Montagano again combined with Alexander for 30 yards on two crucial completions.

After another completion, Montagano ran twice himself for thirty yards, but ignored two opportunities to run out of bounds and time ran out with Carleton on de Varsity 25.

Overall, Ravens scrimmaged inside the Varsity 25 on no less than seven separate occasions and came away with only six points. Blues were in the similar position exactly once in the entire game and made it count with Doret's touchdown capping a 65-yard march late in the first quarter.

Blues defeat Carleton 14-6

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues began their defence of the OUAA Western Division championship with a 4-0 win over the University of Waterloo Warriors Saturday.

Gong into the game at Varsity Stadium, the Waterloo squad had already completed one league game, beating McMaster 2-0. Any dreams the Warriors had of recording a second shut-out were quickly shattered.

In the first minute Blues' Mario DaRosa just failed to convert a good scoring opportunity. DaRosa made good shortly after when, with the game only two minutes old, he intercepted a Waterloo pass, and squared the ball to Vito Polera, who promptly hit a fast rising shot beyond the goalkeeper's stretched hands.

The hard, uneven pitch made accurate interpassing difficult, but the Blues continued to press. At the twenty minute mark Blue's Vicen Ierullo played a penetrating ball to DaRosa, who moved powerfully forward before striking a ground shot into the corner or de Warrior net to give the Blues a commanding 2-0 lead.

Despite the opportunity of handing the Warriors a real dribbling, the Blues lost their composure, and the Waterloo squad began to carry the play.

Even so, with Bob Cazzola paying a sturdy defensive game on the left flank and Tim Burns making timely interceptions in his role of "sweeper", very little real danger to Blues' goaltender Joe Dattolico emerged from the visitors' pressure. On two occasions the goalkeeper made key saves, handling an awkward bouncing shot, and then clutching a high cross from among a thicket of players.

Suddenly the flow of the game changed and the Blues began to string together a series of passing plays, several originating from Bruno Bruni in left midfield. Close to the half time break the Blues' attacking play pressured the Waterloo player-coach, Hans Weisner, to concede a corner kick. The kick was accurately crossed to Vito Polera, who immediately relayed the ball to the back of Waterloo's net.

Holding a 3-0 lead the Blues began the second 45 minutes with confidence, but were soon into another period of indecisive play. Joe Dattolico worked hard to preserve his shut out, making one save at point blank range, and obtaining assistance from a friendly crossbar on a Warrior lob.

However, neither the goalkeeper nor the woodwork were required to repel the greatest Waterloo threat, a penalty shoy conceded by Eugene Konarski who tripped a goal-bound attacker. The unfortunate Warrior penalty taker hit his shot harmlessly wide of the net.

The lucky escape restored the Blues' momentum, and within minutes team captain Vito Polera completed an interpassing move with DaRosa to enable him to notch his "hat trick" and the team's fourth goal. During the remaining seven minutes the Blues went on to successfully preserve Dattolico's shut-out.

Coach Bob Nicol was satisfied with the results, considering it was Blues' first league game. Nicol said that he feels that, as more games are played, the cohesion and teamwork shown in spurts will become consistent throughout a game.

May solve day care impasse by house rental to Co-op

New proposals which may wholly or partly free the two major campus day care centres from the yoke of the Governing Council's day care policy have been formulated.

The major proposal, as far as the Campus Co-Op group occupying the Devonshire clubhouse is concerned, is the possibility that the university may rent a house to them on a similar basis to that of the first centre on Sussex Street. The centre, for children under two, is in a university-owned house which is rented at a subsidized rate to the co-op.

This possibility was first raised even before the final decision of the Governing Council on day care policy was made last Thursday.

In reply to a letter from the Campus Co-op group, also printed in The Varsity September 13, U of T president John Evans arranged a meeting last Tuesday.

According to Bob Davis, a spokesman for the occupying parents, the co-op's suggestion that the university could rent a house to them was greeted favourably by Evans. The president pointed out, says Davis, that the Governing Council policy could not likely be changed at such a late date.

However, a solution to the impasse might be found if it did not conflict with the council's policy. The rental of a house would be purely a real estate matter and not fall under day care policy.

However, there were still several problems.

First, the university must be able to find a suitable house that will shortly become vacant.

Such a house would probably be one of the university buildings currently rented out for residential purposes. Under an agreement made with the local ratepayers group a couple of years ago, the university must discuss plans to convert a building from residential to university use with the ratepayers.

Evans apparently repeated an offer the administration had earlier made to loan the co-op money to renovate and equip the house, if the loan could be made to a legally liable body.

Administration Campus Co-ordinator Lois Reimer, who has been working closely on the university's day care policy, confirmed last night that a house might be made available if all obstacles can be overcome.

However, the university's emphasis now seems to be on a proposal to allow both Campus Co-op and the St. Andrew's Nursery to buy portable building units to be installed on the Devonshire property.

Under this proposal, made by vice-provost Robin Ross last Saturday, both groups would have to finance the portables. While the groups would have more autonomy in these than in the centre to be established by the university in the Devonshire building, they would still be subject to the advisory board set up run the university centre, says Davis.

Although Reimer said she personally feels that portables are not the answer, St. Andrew's is very interested in the idea, the vice president of the parent executive last night said.

Gertrude Currie continued "It looks good, but we'd like to know what we're getting before we accept it." She said the proposal was "very vague", and did not have any estimate of the costs or a suggestion of a guarantee of occupancy of the land.

St. Andrew's has set up a committee to investigate the details, particularly costs, she said. St. Andrew's probably has space for its centre at least until next May, and thus is not in a great hurry.

On the other hand, Campus Co-op Number 2 which is still maintaining a 24 hour occupation of Devonshire after five months, is wary of the portable proposal.

The primary objections the co-op has is the cost and the lack of complete independence which the proposal entails. In addition, they object to what Ross described as the gradual "phasing out" of community non-university children.

The co-op told the administration that under certain conditions the house offer would be acceptable, says Davis.

The house must be in reasonable shape, so that renovations are not prohibitively expensive. As well, the need an interest-free loan and low rent with payments arranged in such a way that the co-op's present low charges to parents do not have to be raised.

Davis says the co-op's position is that any proposal is unacceptable "if it leaves our case in the hands of the advisory committee". In addition, they are concerned that the matter be settled soon.

Campus Co-op's response has been outlined in a letter sent to the administration.

An administration reply is expected soon. Meanwhile, the co-op plans a demonstration at tomorrow's installation of U of T president John Evans protesting the university's inadequate policy on social responsibility.

U of T vice-president Jack Sword yesterday testified that he authorized the use of Metro and campus police to clear the March 13 Simcoe Hall Senate Chamber occupation with the understanding that the occupiers would not be considered trespassers.

They were simply to be evicted from the building after sufficient warning had given been, he said.

Instead, 19 people were charged with trespassing, although these charges were later dropped at the request of the university.

Four persons remain charged with more serious offences. Bill Getty, Mark Goldblatt, and Randy Reynolds are all charged with assaulting police, while Goldblatt also faces an obstruction charge. Tom McLaughlin has been charged with obstructing police.

Their trials are being held this week and next. Sword was testifying at Goldblatt's trial yesterday afternoon.

Reynolds and Goldblatt are represented by prominent local lawyer Austin Cooper. Cooper acted as prosecutor in the Karleton Armstrong extradition case. Getty and McLaughlin, facing trial October 4, chose separate trials and will act as their own advocates, planning to emphasize the political nature of their trials.

Sword recounted that he had ordered campus safety and security officer J. F. Westhead to call in police at 10:20 the morning of the raid.

The next witness, U of T's chief security officer Gordon Huff, testified that he had been instructed by Westhead to summon police at nine am that morning. He said he understood the instructions to mean that "people who did not leave were to be assumed trespassers," contradicting Sword's interpretation of the orders.

Huff said that two groups of police were assembled before the raid. One third of their number were to go inside and ask the occupants to leave while the rest were to enter by the main doors and "escort" them out, ensuring that they leave.

He said he led the second group up the stairs and it took them from two to three minutes to get to the hall directly in front of the Senate Chambers. Although he reported that the first group was to give the warning, he said he still felt it necessary to shout a warning in the hall because of the noise.

Within seconds, he said, his group was at the Senate doors which had been barricaded by students and supporters. Questioned, he admitted that under the circumstances, it may have been hard to hear warnings.

Huff said the upper panel of the Senate doors was knocked in by police when they were trying to force the doors open. The space left gave police access to the inside of the chambers where a number of struggles occurred.

When asked whether the police had been peaceful or aggressive in gaining entrance to the occupied quarters, Huff replied that "the police had a duty to perform" and that he hadn't seen any excessive use of force because "people were resisting police". Yet, he could not remember specific instances and had no recollection of who was involved even when shown explicit photographs.

The defence used pictures taken by Varsity photographer Frank Rooney which showed police manhandling students, pulling their hair, and throwing them bodily out of the building.

The prosecution on the other hand, used photographs reminiscent of the physical situation at the hall taken by Police Detective Brown, a photographer with the force at 52 Division. However, Cooper made Brown admit that not all of the pictures he had taken were being offered as evidence.

The photos he exhibited pictured the disarray and disorder of the Senate Chambers and surrounding halls devoid of people, following the raid. The police officer repeatedly pointed to the food left about, the papers strewn over the floor, and the blankets and sleeping bags which had accommodated the overnight stay of the students and other supporters of unrestricted access to the stacks of the Robarts Library.

The broken upper door panel was the subject of at least three pictures, though it was the only property damage which occurred during the occupations and was not done by students.

Other police photos showed some of the slogans posted by students in the windows of the chambers, saying "Open the Stacks" and "Come Join Us".

There were no police photos of people being taken out of the building during the round-up, though they were later introduced as a result of pressure from the defence. These photographs tended to confirm other evidence of police violence, but some did not picture the action, only the faces of students.

Called to the stand, Sword suggested that at the roots of the matter were "differences of opinion about how the Robarts Library should be administered" and "irreconcilable differences about methodology".

He agreed with defence counsel that the occupation had been a reaction to a decision taken by the Senate which had endorsed differentiated access. He said that negotiations with students during the occupation did not deal with occupation of the chambers, but had forced discussion of the access issue.

The judge intervened at this point stating that the main legal question before the court was "did the occupants, in the law, have the right to resist the eviction?"

Only four Vic students sign up

Civic enumerations slow at U of T residences

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Only four people out of more than 500 students and staff living at Victoria College have been enumerated for the December 4 municipal election, according to the enumeration office.

Jack Frye, an assessor working for the provincial assessment office, which is responsible for the enumeration, said yesterday that his office had four signed forms from Victoria. He would not say whether these forms were from students or not.

Frye contended that the enumerators had used the names of people listed in the assessment books as occupying the college. Assessment roles normally indicate who the owner and chief tenants of any property are.

Enumeration ended almost two weeks ago.

"There are a lot of people we didn't get; we know that," he said. "The best thing to do now," he said, "is to wait until the lists come out."

Those who want to vote must then register with the deputy returning officer or the city clerk.

This requires sending a letter to the returning officer (2221 Yonge Street) listing date of birth, religion, residential status, citizenship, and sex, or a visit in person to the clerk at City Hall. Many people have complained that this is a very inconvenient procedure.

The voters lists will appear at the end of October.

Larry Whalen, a senior don at Vic, said that the dons of the male residences had themselves collected the signatures of the male students for the enumeration office. Having done so, the dons thought they had done everything required to get residents on the voting list.

Margaret Penman, Dean of Women at Victoria said that no enumerators had come to the women's residences. Several dons and students contacted agreed they had not seen any municipal enumerators.

Penman added "I trust it is a mistake and not discrimination against any of the students." She noted the confusion in many students' minds about the municipal and federal elections, and their rights in each.

There are 68 students living at Annesley, 200 at Margaret Addison, the two women's residences. There are some 250 male student residences.

Reports that New, University and Trinity college residences had been overlooked in the enumeration could not be confirmed.

However, the portress at St. Hilda's College thought the residence had been enumerated for the federal, but not for the municipal election. A New College men's residence porter said that the residence had not been visited by the municipal enumerators.

No deans of residence could be reached. Porters at other residences were not able to say whether or not enumerators had come.

There are no longer any property or minimum period of tenancy qualifications for anyone to meet.

Any Canadian student over 18 who wants to vote in the ward in which he is living has simply to state that his present address is his permanent address.

Ryerson students assail appointment of Sword

The Varsity — Frank Rooney

TORONTO (CUP) — A coalition of Ryerson students has organized a strong protest over the appointment of John Sword to their Board of Governors.

They started the action Monday by asking for the removal of Sword. Since then, over 1,200 students have signed a petition calling for the immediate removal of the former acting president of the University of Toronto.

There has also been widespread support from the faculty of the school who feel Sword could damage Ryerson. Other campus groups such as Woman's Liberation and the Students for a Democratic Society have indicated they will be supporting the action to the end.

The coalition is calling for a demonstration tonight when Sword officially takes his position on the Board.

The demonstrators will confront the Board of Governors at the meeting to present their grievances and the petition.

The students don't want Sword because they feel he is unacceptable for several reasons, which stem mainly from his action as U of T president.

During his term, he called police on campus twice. Once during July 1971 to evict the residents of Wabecia, a summer transient hostel program, and again last March during the John P. Robarts Library dispute.

The students are also questioning the fact the University of Toronto has an appointee on the Ryerson Board. The appointment is a provision of Bill 81 of the Ryerson Charter. Under the same bill the Association of Professional Engineers of Ontario also has a standing member.

The coalition feels the Act is outdated and Ryerson is sufficiently large to govern itself without outside interests. They would like to see the bill revised to include four students, four faculty and four outside members plus the president. At the present time there are only two students and faculty, eight outside members (including a U of T member and the engineer) and the president.

If the students don't receive any satisfaction at the Wednesday night Board meeting they will demonstrate on Friday when Minister of Colleges and Universities George Kerr visits the institute.

Student union president Dave Guptill said, "John Sword is wrong for the school. I don't feel he can serve the best interests of Ryerson given the political climate that has been generated around the man."

Tony Cote, editor of the Eyeopener and one of the organizers of the coalition, says of the Wednesday night meeting, "We won't settle for anything less than the removal of Sword from the Board and a change in Bill 81 to make sure this type of situation doesn't occur again."

When confronted with this statement, Ryerson president Mordell said he would do everything possible to change things. He admitted that he hadn't thought of student reaction to the appointment.

Everything possible meant that Sword would not take his seat on the Board. Mordell said he would go to Kerr if Sword did not resign on his own initiative. It has become apparent that Mordell didn't follow this course of action and probably never intended to.

In several meetings held yesterday, Mordell and his associates have stated they did not want to see any trouble on the campus, and stated they could handle the Ryerson students but they feared groups from off campus.

Several groups are expected from the University of Toronto to show up and support the action.

A student coalition will demonstrate against Sword tonight.

Compulsory finals offset recent reforms

Varsity won't censor letters

Writing in today's Varsity, Blues football team captain Hartley Stern indicts the paper for not verifying facts in a letter criticizing the team published Friday.

By referring to the letter as an article, Stern apparently missed the point of the Write on logo which appears on all Varsity letter pages. The symbol indicates that the views and opinions expressed in reader contributions are solely those of the writer, and that the paper does not necessarily endorse the published letters.

No newspaper does or could endeavour to check reader contributions for accuracy. The most we can do is ensure that traditional libel and slander conventions are respected.

A letters page is designed to allow a paper's readers to express themselves. It is a reader's service. And, as such, it would be presumptuous of the paper's editor to begin censoring contributions.

Indeed, the paper's staff does not enjoy the luxury of having the necessary time to doublecheck the veracity of all claims made in readers' letters. It's enough of a hassle doing all the other odds and ends required to publish a paper.

The only criteria, short of legal considerations, used in determining whether to publish letters are space available, immediacy of letter topic, length of letter (The Varsity prefers to avoid editing letters for space), and whether the letter is submitted in usable form (typewritten preferably, and signed).

As for "false accusations", it's a tautology that two people seldom see anything exactly the same way.

And, when Stern starts talking about "inaccurate thinking", it reminds us of the imposed orthodoxy of totalitarian states. The only way The Varsity could satisfy this demand would be to censor readers' contributions, denying those whose views differ from The Varsity's a forum for their opinions.

The Varsity rejects all these possibilities. We will not knowingly be complicit in the printing of unchallenged, inaccurate facts. But, we will also not jeopardize our readers' right to self-expression or the paper's ability to function by attempting to police all reader contributions.

The letters page frequently carries incisive criticism of Varsity coverage and editorial positions, as well as advancing positions with which we stand in substantial disagreement. (The 85% Quota Committee letter published on today's Write On page is an example of such a letter.)

That the Friday letter drew a critical response is not bad. It is healthy. We trust that, without encouraging inaccuracy, the Varsity's letters page will continue to host a variety of views on current topics.

This newspaper remains open to the views of its readers.

History may reinstate them

Conservative history department teaching staff are leading a move to reinstate compulsory final exams in large enrolment lecture courses to combat the supposed threat posed by the booming pirate essay trade.

The proposal would deal the New Program reforms, introduced but a few years ago, a serious blow, sending the department back to the feudal days when what counted was not original thought but the ability to regurgitate course material.

(Conservative faculty early this spring manoeuvred the creation of a presidential advisory committee to review the contentious New Program which they claim has reduced standards by eliminating the honours program and de-emphasizing exams and lecture courses.)

Consideration of history's final exam policy, currently being studied by a departmental committee, curiously coincides with professor Jim Conacher's takeover of the history department chairmanship. Although Conacher may not have initiated the move himself, he has given some indication of where he stands on the matter by asking professors teaching large first year courses to defer making any decision to scrap finals until the committee reports back.

"I see a swing to the right in curriculum matters over the next few years," history professor Bill Nelson, Conacher's only rival for the department chairmanship, said last year, "and I think Jim would join it more enthusiastically than I". And, he added, "Conacher had deep reservations (about the New Program)".

But, the debate goes much further than the personalities involved in the current episode. The whole question of the purpose of university education is thrown into doubt by the conservative faculty's offensive.

Examinations have enjoyed a revered status in educational institutions because they supposedly prove that a student has been diligent in his or her work. In reality, they only measure which students have been able to cram and can parrot the course contents in reply to generally irrelevant questions under stress conditions.

The exam advocates undoubtedly would be content to reduce their argument for finals to a defence of honesty and integrity in meeting course requirements. While the existence of pirate essay companies may suggest that increasingly large numbers of university students are submitting unoriginal work as their own, the answer is not to be found in ruling out exams where profs don't know their students closely enough to definitively conclude whether they were the actual authors of the work they submit.

Instead, the flourishing plagiarism should encourage teaching staff and students to re-examine the purpose of university education and within that context decide on the appropriate ethics to govern their behavior.

Captain disputes critical letter

That the severest criticism of athletes and sports teams often comes from those who know the least of what they are talking about disturbs me, but does not surprise me. Such was the case in the September 22 issue of The Varsity in the article "Murphy's coaching is a comedy of errors" by Mr. Blair Christie and Mr. Jeff Hayes. However, I find it incomprehensible that the editors of The Varsity who are responsible for checking articles for accuracy could allow the glaring errors, false accusations, and inaccurate thinking to be printed.

The poor performance of the Varsity football team against Ottawa is acknowledged by the players and coaches. However, the players who came under the heaviest criticism, Wayne Dunkley and Cor Doret, were curiously the players who performed best for the Blues. This can be borne out by statistics, films, and a reasonable understanding of football.

Doret gained 115 yards rushing, caught three passes, and was the Blues' best punt returner. In anybody's terms, those are excellent statistics. The accusation that Doret took "nose dives into the turf" is a fantastic creation of someone's perverted imagination. No one who has ever seen Doret run and who knows anything about football could accuse him of that. If Mr. Christie or Mr. Hayes would like to see films of Doret running, I am sure something could be arranged. Doret was our finest offensive player in the Ottawa game, in the opinion of players, coaches, and others actively concerned with Varsity sports, such as former Varsity sports editor Paul Carson.

There is no "fairy tale" regarding Wayne Dunkley's ability to pass a football. To watch him throw in any game is enough proof. In the Ottawa game, he was rarely given enough time to throw. Receivers were running poor patterns and dropping passes. Had Messieurs Christie and Hayes paid a little more attention to the game and/or asked some of the players, they would have known this. Steve Kerr will eventually be a fine quarterback. However, he himself would admit that at present he has neither the skills nor the insight into the game that Dunkley has.

For Mr. Christie and Mr. Hayes' benefit, Russ Mitchell plays guard, not centre as they maintained. That is something else they would have learned, had they watched the game a little more closely.

Another disgusting feature of the article was the use of cute puns purely for literary effect without regard to meaningful statement. To say that right end Dave Quick, undoubtedly one of the most dedicated and hardest working members of the Blues, Blues Chris Sammut topples Ravens Marc Brula in Ottawa last Saturday.

The Varsity — David Lord

"wasn't too swift" because he became excited over making a fine catch in the game does not make sense. The attack is unfortunate because Dave is a sensitive person who is truly bewildered by the thoughtless insult.

Ultimately, the blame for a football team's failures, whether unjustified or not, is always absorbed by the coach. I do not intend to discuss coach Murphy's assets and shortcomings as a coach, but Mrs. Hayes and Mrs. Christie would be advised to forget their clichés and euphemisms and do their homework, researching some facts. In every season since coach Murphy has been at Toronto, the Blues have either won a chamampionship or have been eliminated in the last game or second last game. He is not a loser.

It is difficult to defend against unjust criticism without sounding like sour grapes. The best method of deterring detractors is to win. Hopefully, the process has begun with this Saturday's victory over Carleton. Perhaps in this way, Mr. Christie and Mr. Hayes, aided by some uninformed Varsity editor, will be forced to eat their own words, which I believe is equivalent to eating shit.

CLM doesn't like US arts dean

Dean Greene has lived in Canada for 14 years and yet remains an American citizen. Thus, he remains part of the ever growing number of foreign citizens, in particular Americans, who teach in our schools. The 85% Canadian Quota Committee recognizes this trend as part of the increasing domination of Canada by the U.S. This take-over has reached the point where only 49.9% of our professors are Canadian citizens. The Quota Committee interviewed Greene September 7, with the objective of getting Greene to commit himself one way or the other on the issue of Canadianizing our universities — and he did.

Greene agrees that the United States is an imperialist country and Canada is a colony. He also states that independence is a "very laudable end." But like all liberals, that was as far as he would go. He would not accept any concrete action — like the 85 per cent quota or taking out Canadian citizenship himself — to build a Canadian university.

Dean Greene tried to play down the importance of his position, saying that his powers were greatly exaggerated.

"Conciliation, persuasion, and exhortation" were his only tools. But everyone knows that if you don't listen to a Dean when he is "persuading" then you are in trouble. The real reason for trying to make his position unimportant must be that Greene did not want to take any responsibility on the question of Canadianization of the university.

The Dean of Arts and Science at the University of Toronto — the largest faculty in the largest Canadian university — has an enormous responsibility to all Canadians.

He must make sure that the university serves them. This is very important in a colony like Canada, where specific action must be taken to fight U.S. domination — imperialism Dean Greene, however, says, "I am not as emotionally committed as you are to righting all these wrongs."

Greene also stated that he found it outrageously inhuman to sacrifice individuals to an ideology, when referring to the 85 per cent Quota. But this ideology is Canadian independence, which Greene agrees with. The individuals are not citizens of Canada. Greene forgets that Canadians are being sacrificed to an ideology — continentalism, which means U.S. control. A colony struggling for its independence does have the right to make demands on individuals.

Why then would Greene reject this idea? It is because he is one of the individuals who does not want to give in to the demands of Canadians. The clue to this jumps out of Greene's admission, "I won't change what I am by becoming a Canadian citizen." This follows logically from his statement that he considers himself a Bostonian, and that citizenship to him is an intensely emotional thing.

This is the true feeling of all reactionary non-citizens who refuse to become Canadians. To them, rejecting their old citizenship, their emotional attachment to the U.S. is not a mere formality. Taking out Canadian citizenship would mean changing their allegiance, committing themselves to the Canadian people, and their struggle for independence. By maintaining their American citizenship Dean Greene and his cohorts are committed to an ideology — that of the U.S. and the U.S., by Greene's own admission, is an imperialistic country. He does not want to "sacrifice" himself or his friends to the ideology of national liberation for Canada.

Greene tries to lead us on, though, when he says that he would be "scrupulous" in hiring that Canadians should be given preference. It is obvious that to do this, he would have to submit individuals to an ideology, something that he says he is loathe to do. This is a contradiction. Dean Greene would not and could not possibly be serious about hiring Canadians.

It is clear that he cannot be left to his own scruples. Stronger, more direct action is the only way to force Greene, and people like him, to accept the fact that Canada must have Canadian universities. Because Greene refuses to accept this he says that he is "out of sympathy with an 85 per cent quota."

Canadian students must ask themselves what an American who has emotional ties with the imperialist country that is oppressing Canadians, is doing in the position of Dean of Arts and Science in Canada's biggest university.

SAC didn't pay Anderson salary

I wish to correct an error which appeared in the September 25 issue of The Varsity.

The article concerning the hiring of office assistants by SAC implied that, while I was acting education commissioner, I was employed by SAC. This is in fact not the case; at no time was I paid by SAC.

GSU supports fees referendum

The Graduate Students' Union welcomes the initiative taken by the Ontario Federation of Students in calling for a referendum on the fee increase. Actions, of this kind, leading to more substantive measures among the undergraduates is extremely encouraging.

While we are not participating in the referendum, we, as with undergraduates, are faced with severe fee increases. Despite bookkeeping arrangements which the province has forced upon graduate schools, we have had our fees increased by $392.50. This year we are only paying $100 of that increase; next year we may be paying it all. Furthermore, there is good reason to believe that within the next five years, graduate fees will be up to $1500. To stop the province from its arbitrary use of power, action is necessary on all fronts. Hence, we of the Graduate Students' Union support the referendum. It aims specifically at the problems now encountered by the province's undergraduates, and should receive overwhelming undergraduate affirmation.

We look forward to a resounding "yes" vote on the 11th and 12th of October, and anticipate working closely with the OFS/FEO and undergraduates in planning and coordinating all actions aimed at eliminating the fee increases.

Innis registrar states position

Permit me to clarify and correct some of the statements and impressions contained in Mr. Slotnick's story on page one of The Varsity (September 20th) about the acceptability of some Arts and Science courses for admission to professional faculties.

"King visited several classes to caution students that Innis and some Sociology courses may not be accepted as credits" is not quite true. My statements to the classes and to individuals who enquired emphasized that taking any course not directly connected to the intended profession, and particularly those of an experimental nature, may involve a certain risk, and that students who were concerned about the degree of acceptability of their course choice should consult the admissions office of the faculty or school to which they intend to apply.

The offerings of the Department of Classics were at no time mentioned in my telephone conversation with Mr. Slotnick. This has been verified by my associate, Miss Patricia Cole, who was present in my office during the entire conversation.

Communist Club dislikes garden

Your nameless wanderer in the political garden displays all the anti-communist and anti-soviet attitudes of a typical student in capitalist Canada.

The Communist Party is now, as it has been throughout its history, a revolutionary party whose aim is the achievement of socialism in Canada.

The onslaught of reaction through the years of the cold war (a period ignored in your article), both outside and inside the labour movement, was directed against our party because of its revolutionary anti-imperialist program and one would be naive to suggest that reaction did not score some success.

But, we have no apology to make for being the first party in Canada to raise such issues as: Canadian sovereignty; the right of self-determination of Quebec; the need for a united front against the war plans of U.S. imperialism; the autonomy of the Canadian labour movement in the struggle against Canadian, and U.S. monopoly capitalism. We also reject the elitist view that socialist transformation will come through a small, valiant band of revolutionaries and project as the road to socialism a broad coalition of all anti-imperialist and anti-capitalist forces led by the working class.

As for your blatant anti-sovietism, the history of the last 55 years of socialist advance should by now have proved that anti-sovietism is the weapon of the capitalists to divide and weaken the revolutionary struggle and when it is taken up by sections of the left only betrays the extent to which they are still prisoners of capitalist ideology.

SMC faces financial woes

By BOB BETTSON

St. Michael's College is facing bankruptcy, according to Arts and Science Dean Bob Greene.

SMC and the other federated colleges, Victoria and Trinity, are faced with a financial crisis which he predicted will probably result in the termination of their present autonomous status.

He was speaking to about 50 students Saturday at the founding conference of the arts and science student union.

The crisis comes as a result of steadily growing deficits for religiously affiliated colleges which receive less than full provincial grants per student. In order to receive full grants they would have to relinquish their autonomy and religious connections.

When reached Monday Father John Kelly, president of SMC, agreed with Greene "it's an annual fight to stay alive. We live from one year to the next."

He added that "I haven't heard of any threat to our autonomy. St. Michael's is certainly not prepared to go secular."

Greene, who took office July 1, also said that he could see "no possible rationale" for the present division of subjects within the faculty between six college and 22 university departments.

He said this division of subjects was based on old academic principles which no longer have any meaning.

Asked whether the value of a U of T degree had diminished, Greene replied, "rumours like this persist because of the nostalgia of certain faculty for the old honours courses."

"The New Program has been traumatic for some faculty," he admitted.

The New Program, which abolished the distinction between honours and general courses and put less emphasis on exams, is under review by a presidential advisory committee.

Conservative critics claim that academic standards have diminished since its implementation three years ago.

Greene said that the total hudget of the faculty or the departments is not public information. He added it was up to each department chairman to set his department's budget.

Greene said faculty salaries make up 70 per cent of the budget.

He also pointed out that the increase in grants yearly has been exceeded by increases in faculty salaries, therefore cuts have to be shifted to other items.

Few students at demo and KIM RICKETTS

Approximately 20 people yesterday morning rallied in front of Simcoe Hall in support of the four students arrested at last year's first "open the stacks" occupation.

After the rally, they went down to Old City Hall court 33 where the trials are taking place.

Bill Schabas of the open stacks Committee said that he "hopes the crowd will make sure the judge is fair, by their presence."

The twenty demonstrators vocally supported the accused and chanted, "Drop the charges, Jail Sword" open the stacks."

Steve Moore, who had been at the first occupation last March stated at the rally that "the university is supported by the society as a whole and lives off it like a parasite, but when it comes to the university doing anything - like day care and opening the library - for the community, it doesn't contribute."

Using a loud speaker, Renate Manthel, who had also been at the first occupation, expressed the group's support of the four on trial.

"We're here to support the poor people who were arrested last year while supporting open stacks, she said. We were all part of the occupation so we should have been arrested too."

Evans raps little staff support for UA

"We who work in the university are in the informed and privileged group that should carry its full responsibility in caring for the less fortunate," according to president John Evans.

This admonishment came in a statement kicking off the beginning of the 1972 United Appeal campaign at U of T. He criticized university staff for their lack of support in previous years.

"In 1971 only 2,682 persons contributed to the $147,041 raised within the university", he wrote, but there were more than 9,000 persons on our payroll."

The letter stated that "if 400 of the 6,400 persons who did not contribute through our campaign last year will do so, this will represent an increase of 15 per cent and enable us to meet our share of the increased need."

"The welfare of the unfortunate members of our society... is the responsibility of all those who are able to help, whether their contribution can be large or small", he said.

"Regular payroll deductions of even a small amount can produce a helpful annual total."

Campus Centre stalemate:

By STEWART GOODEYAR

For over 10 years, the University of Toronto's lack of a student centre has been a source of frustration for the Students' Administrative Council, a concern which has received much thought, planning, and negotiation without success. This university is one of the few major campuses in North America to lack such a centre.

One viewpoint asserts that without a focus for student activity the U of T cannot become a true community, while the opposing one argues that the size and diversity of this university make a single centre a simplistic and impractical answer.

These basic divisions of thought have determined campus centre planning at U of T. The former held prominence until early 1969 and nearly led SAC to success in obtaining a campus centre building.

The latter emerged from study and re-thinking of problems of the U of T environment which took place after the collapse of the previous plans. Having a broader perspective, it considers the university environment as a whole and relates campus centre planning to the university's position and social responsibilities within its urban environment, to the general planning of the university, and to the purposes of campus life. This viewpoint holds precedence today.

THE DIVERSITY AND LACK OF cohesion at U of T is partially due to its growth as a federation of colleges. First University College was established as part of the university, then the sectarian colleges of Victoria, St. Michael's, Knox, Wycliffe, and Trinity became linked with U of T, leading to the development of professional schools and faculties. In 1906, the University of Toronto Act established the university's present framework of administration.

From the federations until 1950, there was gradual development of the university and expansion of the city. The originally rural university was enveloped by an urban environment for which it had made no provisions. U of T's tendency became to turn its back on the surrounding city.

In the late 1950's and early 60's, the growth of student population forced the university to break the boundaries it had previously accepted and to expand west across St. George Street. First the School of Nursing, then plants to provide for the university's physical needs, then Ramsay Wright, Sidney Smith Hall, New Physics, the McLellan Labs and New Collage were constructed. While providing excellent facilities, these buildings turned the university into a bastion of single functionalism.

There was no consideration of the city, no effort to integrate or communicate with surrounding communities. Nor, was there thought of creating a true university community in the area west of St. George. Expansion tactics were the arbitrary welding of power. The University became even less integrated within its urban context.

TWO THEMES CENTRAL TO present campus centre planning reflect these conditions: the university must open itself to a greater variety of cultural and commercial services if it is to provide a rich and communally-shared educative experience in both academic and non-academic life; and the university must integrate within its urban context, offering greater educational and cultural services to wider society.

The basic guidelines for present campus centre planning were set last October when SAC published "The CAmpus as the Campus Centre", a manual prepared by members of the department of Architecture. Employed by SAC through the summer of 1971, this group, composed of Professor Doug Engel and five students, made a detailed study of campus facilities and student life. An unsuccessful Campus Centre Advisory Committee, with representatives from SAC, the faculty, the administration, and the Board of Governors, was set up by SAC to supervise the team.

The manual re-interated the position that no single student centre should be built, that instead the campus as a whole, particularly the southwestern area, be carefully studied and markedly changed. The main area studies, west of St. George and south of Harbord, accommodate the most concentrated student activity on campus. The architects deplored the "monolithic features" and "single functionalism" of the massive Ramsay Wright, Sidney Smith Hall, New Physics, and the McLellan Physical Labs. St. George, they felt, is a cold freeway which cuts the campus in half.

Supporting their view that improvements of the campus should take the place of a single student centre building, Engel's group argued that focusing activities in one centre would be done at the expense of the rest of the university. Another massive building would create merely another campus focal point which would further disperse activity, said the manual, and would separate non-academic activities from other university activities, thus reflecting the attitude that non-academic time is non-educational time. Doubt was also voiced whether the cultural and leisure activities of the large and diverse campus could converge upon one focus.

THEREFORE, THEY CONCLUDED that effort should be aimed at "defining the features of the university which have best potential to accommodate a broad range of activities". The attempt should also be made to "develop an urban character" and to "suture the university's treyed edges back into its urban context". Specifically, it was proposed that St. George be turned into a boulevard, that a winter garden, and pub be built on the eastern plaza of Sid Smith and that the western plaza become a summer terrace; that the four massive buildings be linked by a series of "interventions" which would contain restaurants, benches, theatres et cetera; that Huron and Wilcocks streets be closed; and that a park-and amphitheatres be created at their intersection.

These suggestions and the project itself were a continuation of the work started by Wayne Richardson as SAC campus centre co-ordinator during the two previous years. In one sense, they develop his philosophy of campus planning into concrete plans. Yet, in another sense, they narrow his campus planning themes.

Faculty attending a Department of Architecture meeting strongly criticized Engel, accusing him of raising no political demands in his manual. No concern had been shown for the surrounding community, no brakes upon university expansion had been planned, few principles about general university planning had been put forward, they said.

Contrasting with these reactions was that of Toronto architect George Benz, who wrote an article giving unqualified praise to the project's results, calling them an "enriched development approach scaled down to the needs of human individuals rather than institutions".

INTERVIEWED RECENTLY Engel admitted the limited scope of the manual while stressing its practical nature. Essentially, the purpose was to determine student needs and then plan to fulfill them. Engel said that he and the students involved had debated the scope of their report. While supporting the wider themes in principle, he stated, the study was meant to contain concrete plans of action to be presented to SAC and the administration with hopes of their realization. So, it was meant to avoid alienating possible support.

Engel also asserted that the report does have a dynamic and political importance as an alternative to the conventional building and development method the university uses. It offers "a decentralized concept of campus planning", he said.

The beginning of this concern for campus planning rather than campus centre planning occurred in early 1970 when SAC decided on the need for a campus centre co-ordinator, choosing Richardson who had been a leading student negotiator in earlier attempts to attain a campus centre building. This move followed almost a year of relative inactivity, the aftermath of losing the student centre SAC had felt was within its grasp. The renewed study of campus needs and facilities and the development of a new philosophy of planning were partially a reaction to this failure.

There are differing views of the negotiations which led to apparent success and then to failure. These vary from a feeling that both SAC and the administration truly attempted to create the centre, but failed due to mistrust, lack of communication, and circumstances, though neither was actually to blame, to a feeling that the administration and the Board of Governors caused the failure through the manoeuvring of business interests and the fear of student radicalism and power.

BY FALL 1967, SAC HAD a final design for the proposed centre, which was to be built on the vacant lot at the corner of St. George and Russell. They had received promises that the provincial government would fund half of the required $4 million and that the administration would pay $250,000. Bids were obtained from the Bank of Montreal and the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce to fund the remainder of needed capital, some $1½ million. When SAC accepted a B of M offer of $1,837,000 for 8,500 square feet in the student building for exclusive rights to on-campus banking for 50 years, they felt the centre was in their hands. It was to contain social and commercial services. Inadequate supply on campus, and was to become the seat of student government and the hub of student activity.

But, the Board of Governors declared the agreement unsuitable because it required exclusivity, and they told SAC to re-open the bidding. This angered the students who accused the board of stalling the centre. They noted that Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce directors outnumbered B of M directors on the Board and that the CIBC was the university's banker. They also charge that the administration was stalling because it feared student success in these negotiations might provide the radical student council with greater power.

While the administration claimed to be enthusiastic about a student union building and had provided some of the funding, SAC dismissed their claims of good will, citing the Board's failure to offer any satisfactory solution of financing to replace the B of M offer.

Then, in March, 1968, the province granted 95 per cent of funding for non-commercial space in the campus centre. The Board of Governors offered to pay for the remainder of such space. Feeling the students were now in a better position, the administration expected SAC to accept the new arrangements. But, the students continued to refuse to re-open the bidding, sure that the agreement with the B of M was still the only course of action which gave certainty of providing all needed funds.

IN FEBRUARY, 1969, THE provincial government decided that U of T would be given no more revenue for new construction and revoked the agreement to fund the campus centre.

There was another serious problem in negotiating for the centre. While the argument over financing was still raging, the city decided to adopt a get tough attitude toward U of T and enforced a bylaw requiring 20 foot building setback from the street. The campus centre had been planned to extend to the sidewalk of St. George. Remembering a past history of city concessions to the university, the administrators, architects, and students had not worried about the bylaws. Arrangements had already been worked out with the departments of public works and roads. But, the City of Toronto Planning Department decided that St. George was too important an artery to be encroached upon.

SAC then proposed that the building be redesigned as a narrower, higher structure which could retain all previous facilities, but U of T Physical Plant stated that the site could not withstand a taller building. Therefore, unless the traffic flow along St. George was eased or the physical structure of the street was changed there could be no campus centre at this location. The university found there was little it could do to change these conditions.

A final obstacle was the Toronto Library Board who objected to the student centre being built immediately neighbouring the Central Library and were ready to oppose a building permit. Considering its problems, the university made little actual effort toward application for a permit.

Although the university administration and SAC did collaborate to an extent in negotiating with the city, their communication was poor and the administration's actions appeared to result only after the repeated insistence of the students.

TWO AND A HALF YEARS after the construction of the campus centre was originally stated to begin, the project had reached an impasse. Then SAC president Steve Langdon, said in March, 1969 that little more could be done: there would be no campus centre for at least two more years.

When SAC hired Richardson, in early 1970, he was requested to reconsider the identity, purposes, and planning of the campus centre. In May of the same year, SAC also commissioned Brian Carter, an architect just graduated from the university, to work under Richardson's supervision, and asked him to make a study of infilling the area around Ramsay Wright and Sid Smith with facilities that might constitute a campus centre. Already, the question was whether a single building could satisfy campus needs or whether the improvement of an area of the campus by the addition of desired services and facilities was preferable.

To obtain the revenue necessary to pay for these studies and the work intended to follow them SAC held a referendum which requested students' permission to levy an additional dollar in SAC fees per student each year until a campus centre was built. The students agreed and the first levy as set for the academic year of 70-71, giving SAC an additional $20,000 annually.

Richardson and Carter worked through the summer and brought out a report in September which set out the alternatives SAC could follow in planning a campus centre. Stating that SAC must establish planning principles for the university to express their wishes concerning the physical development of the entire campus, Richardson argued that a single building was unsuitable. Despite its facilities it would merely be another monolith - inflexible, with no provision for campus development or links with the surrounding community, he said.

While the university had facilities for study and meditation it lacked "the proper environment for discussion and experimentation" needed by the individual to educate himself.

Carter's report suggested that new facilities should be located in the most intensely used area of the campus, so as to attract the greatest numbers and act as the true focus of student life. In this report, the area bounded by St. George, Huron, Harbord, and Wilcocks was first set out as the location for campus centre planning. Carter described a plan to use the space between the massive academic buildings which was the forerunner of the interventions set out in "The Campus as the Campus Centre" report.

RICHARDSON CONCLUDED THE report by suggesting that the university develop a consensus about its position in society which could guide further planning. To determine policy he proposed a committee of students, faculty, and administrators. An architect should be chosen by SAC to analyze previous planning campus centre planning and then devise a detailed plan to satisfy the new objectives, said Richardson. Finally, he suggested that some sources of income other than the student levy should be investigated.

In December, Richardson presented the "Campus Centre Project Manifesto" which summarized the philosophy behind the previous report, linking the concept of a campus centre to wider concerns of the university. He aligned the theme with that of turning U of T into a complete educator. The "broadening of individual perspectives", enriching "the appreciation of life", and "stimulating critical faculties" are best accomplished in an environment offering wide choice, he said.

This university "limits the expression of life" by its tendency toward a single academic function and by its turning away from the city. It has become a place of academic business which closes at night, he stated. The campus centre project's purpose then was "to nurture new life by breaking down single functionalism".

Richardson felt the lack of services at U of T reflected an ivory tower approach which must be erased before the university could become an attractive place to live. Commercial operations on campus are thus necessary to provide variety as well as services. Adding that the university's desires and plans of expansion were driving variety and richness of life from the surrounding community, Richardson equated a plan to improve campus conditions with one which would attempt to stop that expansion and make the facilities of the campus open to the wider community. He also attributed "the shallowness in the quality of life" here in part to the transience of students and stated a desire to plan an environment conducive to the creation of "a body of citizens".

RICHARDSON ASKED A NUMBER of architectural firms to study the campus planning situation at U of T and to present a summary of their feelings to SAC. These were received in January, 1971 and studied as SAC considered hiring one of the firms to fully develop the new concepts. Richardson also put forward motions that SAC ask the university administration to establish a planning body students could communicate with and that some revenue be put into small scale improvements such as benches and trash cans around campus.

In February, SAC president Ron Hurd began conferring with Department of Architecture chairman Peter Prangell. Prangell asserted that his department could handle the job of developing the concepts, chose Engel as project coordinator, and set out a preliminary scheme of the work that would be required. The next month, SAC agreed to pay $18,000 for the work outlined, set aside a budget allotment for the kind of small scale improvements Richardson had suggested, and determined to continue the student levy.

So was born the "Campus as the Campus Centre" report and the accompanying Campus Centre Advisory Board. Bob Spencer, who set on the board as SAC president for the 1971-72 academic year, recalled that soon students had further cause for disillusionment with the administration. While both Simcoe Hall and the Board of Governors consented to place representatives on the advisory committee, these men vice-president and provost Don Forster and Board of Governors chairman William Harris "could never make themselves available" for meetings. As an effective means of communication and debate of view concerning campus planning, student needs, and the university's place in the urban environment the advisory board became a "farce", said Spencer.

One of the proposals which met favour and offered a chance to publicize the report was the winter garden and pub suggested for Sid Smith's eastern plaza. SAC obtained permission to hold a temporary pub there in September. It was titled with a dramatic ramp which had pannelled slides picturing the plans developed by Engel's group. This was to enable students to visualize what the project's implementation could lead to, while the pub itself was meant to preview the pleasant atmosphere, convenience, and potential for social focus offered by the plans.

It was perhaps too great a success, overshadowing the other proposals in the manual. Noting the pub's popularity, Simcoe Hall approved the principle of a permanent enclosed pub in front of Sid Smith. The Board of Governors gave the go-ahead for its planning and ordered the Physical Plant to check its feasibility. By the end of October, executive vice-president Alex Rankin was presenting a proposal to SAC that the administration provide $250,000, arrange for design and construction of the pub, and appoint a full-time manager. A combined student-faculty body could fix prices and service policy, he said. SAC felt the administration was pushing the issue toward its own ends, and Spencer stated that students would accept administrative financing only if SAC controlled the arrangement and activities of the pub.

THE READY ADMINISTRATIVE acceptance of the pub also caused both Spencer and Engel to voice fears that the Board of Governors was using the pub as a concession which would enable it to scrap the more important features of the report. Engel called the pub "a panacea to real environmental problems facing the campus" and stated that plans called for a true winter garden on the eastern Sid Smith plaza rather than a mere enclosed pub. Later, Physical Plant was to find that the plaza foundations cannot withstand the kind of structure called for in the report, and the search began for an alternative site.

U of T bodies receive grant to study cities

By STEWART GOODYEAR

Two U of T bodies will receive a federal grant to study municipal government and financing, it was announced last week.

According to William Michaelson, director of the Centre for Urban and Community Studies, Urban Affairs Minister Ron Basford himself agreed to the grant.

Research will be the joint effort of the urban and community centre and the Institute for the Quantitative Analysis of Social and Economic Policy, said institute head Albert Breton, who will direct the study.

As yet no contract has been signed and no money has been received, Breton stated.

Michaelson believes that full notification of the size of the grant and Ottawa's requirements will be received next week.

He was unable to verify a Toronto Star report fixing the grant at $232,095. The Star article also stated that research is to focus on the financial situation of Winnipeg, Toronto and Halifax to determine the effects of federal and municipal grants on municipal spending, the use of municipal services by sub-urban communities and the effects of zoning on land markets.

In regard to the latter, a recent study by management consultants Price Waterhouse for the Borough of York showed that the financial benefits of high-rise apartment construction were almost negligible.

Proposals for the study were made 8 months ago by Richard Soberman, then director of the Centre for Urban Studies. Six areas of research were set out:

- possible means of financing city urban expansion,
- alternative solutions to urban fiscal problems,
- restructuring of local government as an alternative to purely fiscal solutions,
- the influence of the fiscal system and land use controls on urban land values,
- the effect of transportation investments on land values and the potential for financing them, and
- a detailed study of problems and prospects of urban public economy of Metro Toronto.

Michaelson predicted that the study will take four years and stated that further grants will probably be required as it develops.

Farmers' union seeks city aid for boycott

OTTAWA (CUP) — The National Farmers Union (NFU) is moving to consolidate urban support of its boycott against Kraft products during the next two months.

National boycott co-ordinator Don Kossick told CUP Saturday that urban support committees should be established in most major Canadian cities by the end of this year.

Kossick had just arrived from Toronto where he met with the newly formed Toronto boycott committee. He was in Ottawa to talk to members of the local committee here and left yesterday to meet with the Kingston organization.

He plans to use the next several months to strengthen the existing urban support committees and to establish new ones. The process is slow because the NFU's only source of operating funds are farmers willing to pay $25 a year in membership fees. During the summer, collection slows down because people are out working the land. Enough money is now coming in to permit an acceleration of the campaign.

The Manitoba New Democratic Party government appears to have backed down from its plans to assist Kraft in the construction of a rapeseed oil plant, Kossick said. The NDP incurred the wrath of party members (who voted to support the boycott) the Manitoba co-operative movement which owns its own rapeseed plant, and the NFU.

If the plant is scrapped, the NFU does not intend to let the NDP off lightly. It wants a public announcement that the government has dropped its plans, along with a message of support for the boycott.

The Saskatchewan NDP was forced into a similar position after the Moose Jaw support committee circulated a petition demanding that the government not allow Kraft products to be used at the Saskatchewan summer games.

The NFU has learned that the Saskatchewan government has stopped using Kraft products, at least in the Regina area. No public announcement of this decision has been made.

Kossick also said that the spectacular rise in the cost of food this summer was a direct result of increased corporate control in the food industry. The so-called rationalization of agriculture is being stepped up, with more farmers being forced off the land.

Kossick said that large multinational corporations like Kraft are able to dictate their own profits while the farmers and consumers suffer.

Despite the continual rise in food prices, governments have refused to consider taking action. Because of this, people must consider the corporations and the government as their enemies, he said.

Prime Minister Trudeau said recently that his government has no intention of introducing food price controls.

It appears the new British Columbia NDP government will introduce provincial regulations to try to control the spiraling cost of living at an emergency session of the legislature, Kossick added.

He believes that costs will decline only when people actively seek alternate food processing and distribution methods by confronting monopoly control that the corporations now hold.

PROXY VOTING

Students "away from home"

Every Canadian citizen* 18 years of age or more, may vote if residing in Canada on the first day of enumeration week.

To vote, your name must be on a list of electors—the list for the polling division in which you ordinarily reside. These lists are posted in each Polling Division and copies are mailed to each household in urban areas.

If you are absent during an election from your place of ordinary residence, due to your full-time attendance at a recognized educational institution in Canada during an academic term, you may vote by proxy.

* If you are a British subject, but not a Canadian citizen, have been residing in Canada since June 25, 1967 and were at least 20 years old on that date, you may (until June 26, 1975) vote at a federal election.

Where is my place of ordinary residence?

- Married students: It does not matter if both husband and wife are students, nor does it matter if you live in one room, or in a student's residence or at the home of parents. Your place of ordinary residence is where you are physically residing on enumeration day and your name should be on the list of electors in that Polling Division.
- Single students living "at home": No problem. You should be on the list of electors in the Polling Division in which your home is located.

YOU MAY VOTE BY PROXY

- Single students living "away from home": The home of your parents or guardian is your ordinary residence, even if you may be there for only relatively short periods of time each year. Your name should be on the list of electors in the Polling Division in which your home is located.
- Single students "on their own": Your place of ordinary residence is where you are physically residing on enumeration day and you are entitled to be on the list of electors in that Polling Division.

How can I be sure my name is on a voters' list?

— if possible, examine the list for your Polling Division, or enquire from someone back home. The name and telephone number of the RETURNING OFFICER for your home electoral district are available from "Directory Assistance" there.

What is a recognized educational institution?

— any organization, within reason, that teaches an intellectual or manual skill.

I am away from home but am I a full-time student?

— you are if your main reason for being away from home is to attend a recognized educational institution, even if you work at some other job part of the time.

How may I vote by proxy?

If you are absent during an election from your place of ordinary residence due to your full-time attendance at a recognized educational institution in Canada during an academic term, you may vote by proxy:

- make sure your name is on the list of electors in the area in which you ordinarily reside;

- obtain a statement from the Registrar of your educational institution confirming that you are a properly registered full-time student, and
- get a "form 47" from a RETURNING OFFICER, fill it in and attach the Registrar's statement. These papers must be handed in person by your proxy voter or yourself to your RETURNING OFFICER back home before 10 PM of the Friday preceding polling day.

Who can be my proxy voter?

Any person who is on the list of electors of the same Polling Division as yourself and not appointed proxy voter for another elector.

That's it!

*Regular full-time students in the Faculty of Arts and Science may obtain a Registrar's Statement form and a form 47 from their College Registrar. All other full-time students may obtain both forms from their Faculty (or School) Secretary. Copies of the Proxy Voting folder shown above have been distributed in College, Faculty, School, SAC and GSU offices.

Decision to be made by Metro

Marks attacks meeting on Spadina's future

By VAL ROSS

Alderman June Marks denounced the Monday night special Works Committee hearings on the uses of the Spadina expressway ditch.

"In the light of Metro's refusal to hold public meetings hearings, this meeting is redundant," she said. "These hearings are at the city level but the decision will be taken by Metro," she added.

At present the Spadina (officially named the William R. Allen Expressway) ends at Lawrence Avenue. Metro Council has proposed an "arterial road" (four-lane as opposed to the expressway's original six) to be extended to Eglinton.

The "arterial road" has been dubbed the "mini-expressway" by reformers who see the road Spadina's return, thinly disguised.

Ying Hope agreed with Marks that while it was Metro's decision, Metro Council should reopen hearings.

"Metro's legality is at question tonight, whether we oppose or support the expressway", he said. The Premier has ruled that the province will not participate in any construction of the Spadina, but Metro has $1.5 million of its own which it may use to go ahead with construction.

He concluded, this would be unprecedented and unconscionable.

Countering the anti-mini expressway group were residents from North Forest Hill the area near Bathurst and Lawrence Streets, including Esther Shiner leader of the Go Spadina campaign.

They spoke of traffic congestion and the danger to school children in their area resulting from traffic pouring off the Spadina spur through their streets. In all, six delegations, claiming the support of 40,000 people, urged the paving of the arterial road.

U of T professor David Nowlan, co-author of "The Bad Trip" a book devoted to the case against the expressway outlined some of the options to attack these problems.

"The Allen Expressway should be closed

The future of the Spadina Expressway has not yet been decided. Pro-expressway groups want it paved.

south of Yorkdale" he advised. "This is an interim solution to stop traffic on residential streets until mass transit is built." A subway is planned to be built on the site before 1980.

The ditch may be transformed into a park and large commuter parking lots. It may also be the site of Buckminster Fuller-designed apartments, or a scenic boating canal.

Related to the future of the Spadina ditch is the choice of rapid transit route. On September 8 Metro Council recommended that the subway line be constructed by the cut-and-cover method through Cedarvale Ravine.

It desired "proper restoration" of that ravine and the Nordheimer Ravine.

Board of Education trustee Fiona Nelson pledged support for the Bathurst, as opposed to the Spadina, rapid transit route.

"The ravines are irreplaceable", she said I know that the city is already all but unanimously in support of the Bathurst route I am here to strengthen your resolve."

A new theme at this meeting was strained relations between Metro and the province over the arterial road, and between the city and Metro over the subway route and Metro's decision against public hearings.

"Premier Davis is a dictator" claimed pro-expressway Shiner. By reversing Metro's decision to build the Spadina, he has made a monkey out of Metro.

A supporter added, "Metro should secede from Ontario."

Ward 5 aldermanic candidate Colin Vaughan countered that "Metro will be respected only if it respects its component parts. If Metro ignores the wishes of the City and the Borough of York in this matter, it may mean the destruction of Metro."

First students graduate

Halifax community legal course a success

HALIFAX (CUP) — Twenty-seven Halifax laymen have graduated from what appears to be Canada's first community course in para-legal work.

The program to aid working class citizens in Halifax's north end area was undertaken by the Dalhousie University legal aid service.

After five weeks of intensive legal training, the majority of the graduates were put out to work as part-time counsellors to assist legal aid clients seeking divorces. Another two were hired on a full-time basis in a legal aid centre to assist, advise, research and counsel in family court problems.

The program concentrated on training divorce counsellors because the local Matrimonial Counselling Association has just published a detailed do-it-yourself divorce kit to reduce the cost of legal action for poor people. The counsellors will help people to use the kits. Sixteen of the graduates are working for the association on divorce cases out of the local family service bureau.

"It's absolutely essential that lay people be trained to handle routine law office matters and assist in counselling clients," said Dalhousie criminal law professor and legal aid service director Ian Cowie. "Otherwise there is just no way to cope adequately with the demand being made on legal aid services."

The training program is an innovative one, and a smashing success, Cowie added.

The graduates included a retired clergyman, nurses, social workers, high school counsellors and members of the north end community who never made it past high school. More than 100 people applied, including three lawyers.

"We could have filled our program with university graduates but we wanted a good cross-section of people with varying academic backgrounds and experiences," Cowie explained.

Most applicants wanted to join because "they could see the need for this kind of program. There is also a fascination for the law on the part of lay people and many felt this would be a good opportunity to learn something about how it operates," Cowie asserted.

The demand for service of the para-professional has been "consistent and is increasing", the director added, and the legal aid clinic sees the need for training more people.

The course was designed and taught by seven second and third year Dalhousie law students. They also interviewed and selected the 27 who finally took the course.

Since it was set up almost three years ago, the clinic has handled some 2800 cases, not including telephone enquiries, clients handled on a referral basis or given summary advice. Apart from its training program, the clinic also has its law students in court every day. Many of them are involved through a credit course from the Dalhousie university law faculty.

This summer, eleven students carried out research projects and assisted in the clinic's legal aid work through an Opportunities for Youth grant. Five persons looked into the need for legal aid service in the province's mental hospitals and future plans involve a training program for para-legal professionals right within local prisons.

It's the special or innovative programs that keep Ottawa interested in funding the clinic. Last year Health and Welfare minister John Munro contributed $35,000 from his department to keep the agency operating and agreed to pay some of its bills again this year.

Runs roughshod over requests

Carleton admin to build on student field

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Carleton University administration has run roughshod over student requests and yesterday began constructing a new building on a residence playing field.

A threatened confrontation this morning was averted this afternoon when Carleton president Michael Oliver intervened to reverse a Board of Governors decision.

The Board had decided earlier yesterday to renege on an agreement not to start work before eight am. each morning.

The Building Advisory Committee Monday decided to proceed with plans for a new classroom and office building for affiliate St. Patrick's College on the only large playing field in the residence area of Carleton's campus.

Students had delayed construction by threatening to occupy the field with continuous football games and camp fires, but the committee said Monday that costs and time factors prohibited the choice of any alternative site.

Residence students agreed before the meeting that further opposition would be futile, but came demanding 17 concessions to minimize harmful effects of construction.

The committee approved all demands except one in principle, and referred them to a sub-committee for further discussion.

But, notice that one of the concessions would be broken came yesterday afternoon, residence council president Leonard Greenspoon said in an interview. "The secretary of the Board of Governors called to say that due to contractual obligations, construction would have to start at seven am every day," he said. Otherwise, the university would have to pay overtime.

"My position is that we are allowing our living conditions to be completely disrupted this year, so they should be able to fork out some money for overtime to make things hearable."

Students were considering obstructing the bulldozers when they arrived today to enforce compliance with the agreement.

But, Greenspoon phoned Oliver, who called back to say construction would be moved ahead to eight am as previously agreed.

"We hope the administration will meet the concessions," another residence spokesman said. "If it doesn't, we'll see what has to be done."

Other conditions agreed to by the administration include university responsibility for residence expense for maintenance and rodent damage due to construction, a delay in a road extension until next year, and replacement of the field on a smaller scale by next September 1. The university also agreed not to build or change the use of residence buildings without "direct consultation with the residence council."

Greenspoon condemned administrators on the building advisory committee for showing little consideration for the residents' needs.

"One of them called us 'little kiddies playing games'. They have no regard for the fact that this is our home."

Enrolment down, Carleton U hit by deficit

OTTAWA (CUP) — Carleton University faces a possible 1972-3 deficit of $3,000,000 because of a decline in enrolment.

Carleton's new president Michael Oliver said last week that about 600 fewer full-time students registered than were expected at the time the university's annual budget was prepared. Administrators expected an increase of four per cent, but absolute enrolment actually declined 160 students from last year's figure of 10,690.

An enrolment decrease means less provincial money for the university because government grants are based on enrolment figures.

Oliver said he was concerned that tuition fee increases may have prevented many interested and qualified students from enrolling.

The decline is uneven, with enrolment in arts and graduate studies dropping, while registration in journalism, commerce, science, architecture, and music increased.

The deficit means staff cut-backs may be inevitable.

A university Senate committee on redundancy said at Tuesday's Senate meeting it would be unreasonable to cut staff for budgetary reasons except as a last resort.

The committee reported that academic expenditures should take precedence over other university expenditures, such as administration and maintenance. If cuts become necessary, the report recommends that the Senate be the only body with power to cut programs or personnel.

No cuts should be made until a special Senate committee reviews the entire budget and ensures the university's money is being allocated wisely, the report says. The document, which was prepared in May, has not yet been adopted by the Senate, although some faculty members are seeking its speedy passage, in case cutbacks become necessary this year.

Meanwhile, Sir George Williams University in Montreal was affected more drastically by enrolment decreases. Registrar Kenneth Adams said Tuesday that the decline from 17,221 last year to 15,560 this fall was attributable to phasing out the community college program.

The projected enrolment was 15,850 for the school year, he said, adding that this should be surpassed when late registrations are completed.

At the same time, however, the total number of first year undergraduates in the day division rose about 300 from last year's 1200.

Sirnia, Niagara in Welland and Northern with three campuses in northern Ontario — have actually registered decreases in enrolment. Four showed small gains and only two went over their predictions.

George Brown in Toronto realized only a 25 per cent increase, although it had predicted 63 per cent. Metropolitan Toronto's Centennial College had predicted a 50 per cent increase, but only got another 16 students, an increase of one-one-eighth of one per cent.

RCMP expands narcotics squad

One hundred men will be added to the RCMP narcotics squad by next year, bringing the total number of officers engaged in drug-law enforcement to more than 400.

"We used to have 185 - 190 drug enforcement officers across the country, in 1969" said Inspector Gordon Tomalty, "and the number has jumped significantly each year."

Tomalty, the officer in charge of the narcotics squad, said only a few men were engaged in undercover investigations. He would not specify how many men were engaged in these activities, because to do so, he said, would jeopardize their positions.

Because training procedures for municipal and provincial police forces have improved considerably in recent years, the RCMP has abandoned much of the routine drug detection work and is now concentrating on the apprehension of traffickers.

The drug law enforcement section is presently the largest group within the RCMP's criminal investigation branch. Its operations are directed from the force's Ottawa headquarters.

According to an RCMP spokesman, the use of marijuana in Canada is levelling off, but the use of "hard drugs" such as heroin is increasing. Cocaine trafficking has also increased recently.

The number of persons charged with marijuana offences during the first six months of 1972 decreased by 5.7 per cent from the same period of 1971. The RCMP also reported that many drug users have switched from marijuana to hashish.

The spokesman asserted that liquid hashish is now being smuggled into Canada because it can be imported in large quantities and brings greater profits to traffickers.

The decreases in both enrolment and projected enrolment at universities around the country were expected to affect community colleges, as students chose to leave the larger institutions in favor of the colleges.

In Ontario, this did not occur according to projections. The province's community colleges enrolled 4000 fewer students than administrators had expected. The 20 college had predicted a growth rate of 25 per cent, based on the number of early applications last winter, up from their original 14 per cent estimate.

An Ontario government telephone survey Tuesday showed the earlier prediction was more realistic. So far, the growth rate for community colleges is 13 per cent, and is not expected to increase. This is the same growth rate as last year.

Commercial use for biodegradable plastic

By early 1973, plastic coffee cups, meat trays, and egg cartons in supermarkets may be made of Ecolyte-S, a biodegradable plastic invented by a U of T chemistry professor James Guillet.

Since it breaks down into a powder which can be further changed into carbon dioxide and water by bacterial action, the new plastic can help solve problems of litter. Plastics in present use do not break down.

The federal Food and Drug Directorate recently announced that Ecolyte-S may be used in commercial packaging, the only man-made biodegradable plastic to be allowed for use in packaging food.

All rights to the new plastic have been assigned by Guillet to U of T, which has reassigned them to Ecoplastics of Toronto in return for royalties. This company has joined with a Dutch firm to form Van Leer-Ecoplastics Limited.

According to results from tests made in the Van Leer main laboratories in Passfield, England, Ecolyte-S has mechanical properties comparable precisely to similar unmodified plastics. Its time of disintegration can be controlled to vary between hours and months.

According to Paul Wright, president of Van Leer-Ecoplastics Limited, the new plastic will be available commercially in Canada early in 1973. It is expected that the Ecolyte plastics will be about 10-15 per cent more expensive than conventional plastics.

Participation emphasized in track and field

By PAUL CARSON

Participation has become the dominant feature of a new Varsity co-educational track and field program, according to coach Andy Higgins.

Over 50 students, alumni and just general track buffs are participating in the daily afternoon workouts at Varsity Stadium supervised by Higgins and other Toronto area coaches.

Higgins formed the University of Toronto Track Club during the summer as a method of expanding the existing track program which he felt was tied too closely to the annual OUAA championship meet in October.

"We had an excellent program while it lasted, but once the league meet was held most of our better athletes were forced to continue their training programs at other city clubs," Higgins said yesterday.

The new program allows Varsity athletes to continue training together on campus for almost the entire year.

"Fortunately, the facilities at the stadium are not in use most of the time, so we are not depriving any other sport of its practice time," Higgins said.

A weight-training apparatus has been installed in one of the unused football dressing rooms and, as Higgins points out, the minimal, annual membership fees cover all the operating expenses and help defray the costs of travel to provincial meets.

"Varsity Stadium has become, in effect, a multi-use facility with track and field practicing in late afternoon before the football team takes over," Higgins said.

Formation of the UTTC should be a boost for women's track since the campus already contains several highly regarded female performers and track will soon be an official sport in the women's intercollegiate program.

Orillia's Doug Reid won the first annual Club Decathlon last weekend amassing 6101 points to edge out Ron Nastiuk, Dave Barrett and Dave Watt.

The men's intercollegiate team swings into action Saturday in the McMaster Invitational and then travels to London October 3 for a dual meet against Western, last year's OUAA runner-up.

Higgins expects many of Toronto's points will come from pole vaulter Bruce Simpson who finished fifth at Munich, OUAA record holder in the discus Grant Tadman, Dave Watt in the triple jump, plus distance specialists John Sharp and Peter Pimm.

Simpson and fellow Olympian Tony Powell are perhaps the biggest names on the UTTC but Higgins stresses that publicity and building reputations is not the aim of the dual program.

"We're trying to create a program that will attract novices whether they are students, graduates or whatever. Most of the fun in track comes from participating and that's what we are encouraging."

Daily practices start about 4:30 at the Stadium.

Golf team 4th at Trent

The University of Toronto golf team finished second to Waterloo's threesome last weekend at the O'Keefe Invitational College and University Golf Tournament, and fourth at the Trent Invitational Monday.

The Toronto threesome finished with a 471 total for 36 holes with John Bays leading the team at 154. The other two Toronto players, Doug Findlay and Tony Sergautis, finished with scores of 158 and 159, respectively.

The U of T team also placed second in the best-ball event with a 137 total, three over Waterloo's 134 winning total.

The team did not fare as well on Monday at Trent placing fourth out of seven participating universities. U of T had a combined score of 314 for the 18 hole match with front-runner Waterloo scoring 301, Queens and Lakehead tying for second at 305, and Carleton coming third at 306. (Four of the best scores on the five man teams comprised the total.)

The best four for Toronto were Paul Skinner with 77, Geoff Morawitz, Steve Johnson, and Glen Placido, all with 79. Placido expressed regret yesterday at Toronto's poor showing and said that a stronger team would be field ed for the next tournament.

In Georgetown last Friday and Saturday U of T fell 16 strokes behind the first place University of Waterloo team. The Waterloo squad's success was largely due to Tim McCutcheon's Saturday charge. Warriors finished with a threeman gross of 225 on Friday to take seven stroke lead over second place finishers, Lakehead University.

McCutcheon led and Brian Harrocks tied from Algonquin College tied in the first round at 75 each. However, McCutcheon was three under par on the outgoing nine Saturday to pull away from all the other individual challengers, with the exception of Harrocks.

Harrocks played 74 on the next nine for a 36-hole score of 149, three shots behind McCutcheon. Waterloo's Ed Heakes placed third, and U of T's Bays fourth.

The O'Keefe tournament, conceived by Sheridan College's athletic director John Cruickshank, will seek to become an annual event. Cruickshank's senior aide, Dick Ruschensky, commented last weekend that the event would probably take place the weekend after Thanksgiving next year at the end of the regular season and the college leagues.

The tournament sponsors hope to bring in the top two teams from each college section. The sponsors had also hoped to make the event a national competition, but the cost proved to be too prohibitive.

As for the future, this Friday the U of T golf team will travel to Kingston for the east section finals. Toronto's team will be represented by Doug Findlay, John Bays, Tony Sergautis, Richard Hughes, and Paul Skinner. The top four teams at Kingston move on to the finals at Carleton on October 5 and 6.

The common form of Quaker worship is an hour of silence. We find that in this silence there may be a real meeting of people, one with another, and each with something deeper. The Other Teams - Western Section

Western Mustangs once again lead the Western Section of the OUAA as the midway mark of the intercollegiate regular season approaches.

The Mustangs have defeated last year's semi-final contenders — the McMaster Marauders — twice — once in exhibition play and again early in the regular season. In Hamilton the exhibition score was 14-10, while the Mustangs won at home 21-3. Western's only other game so far resulted in a lopsided 31-8 victory over Guelph.

Unless there are some major injuries on the UWO squad, it will be hard to displace last year's Yates Trophy winners. (Western went on to beat University of Alberta Golden Bears 15-14 to capture the Canadian College Bowl).

The Mustangs appear to be the Queens equivalent in the Western Section. The team has only lost three first-team players from last year and that speaks for itself as an indication of strength. (Furthermore, over two-thirds of last year's players have returned.)

As was foreseen at the beginning of the season, an important part of Western's offence will depend on the kicking of Paul Knill, who picked up seven points in the season's opener against Guelph — one field goal, plus four converts. Knill led the Western Section last year with 51 points (on 11 field goals, 14 converts, and four singles). Western's kicker averaged 40.1 yards per punt, while standing third in the west and fifth overall in the OUAA in punting.

Last season Western had a 2-1 rushing versus passing margin, and their game is likely to be along the ground again this year for the most part. In the first game of the season, total offence along the ground was 169 yards, while quarterback Joe Fabiani made 10 passing attempts for 72 yards. Dave Kerr, third best rusher in the west last year with 552 yards is also back.

While Western did not have an extremely powerful offensive squad last year (although they were first in the west in this category), their defence shone, conceding only 80 points in eight games.

However, the Mustangs also led the Western Section in yardage lost because of fumbles (34 yards on 16 fumbles) and penalties (837 yards). Nevertheless, end Don Dulmage (OUAA and All Canadian All Star) and defensive back Jim Budge have returned to bolster the team.

With few exceptions, the Mustangs look like the most complete team in their section. They should make a good run at league title again this year.

McMaster Marauders will fight it out with University of Windsor Lancers for second place in the west. At this time of the season, and based on the Marauders' past performance, one would expect the team to be playoff contenders for the second consecutive year.

A key reason could be the return of Jack Kennedy as coach, while head coach Ray Johnson is on a one year leave of absence. (Johnson has coached the team for the past four years.) Kennedy was head coach of the team before becoming director of athletics at McMaster, and guided the Marauders to the Canadian College Bowl in 1967 (where they lost 10-9 to University of Alberta Golden Bears).

Last season Marauders finished first in the (old) Central Division of the Western Section, with 11 points, one point greater than Western, the first place holder in the other western division.

The Marauders are potential threats chiefly because they finished second in the west last season in both rushing and passing totals. However, the team's game was, for the most part, along the ground with a net gain of 1454 yards rushing, and 940, passing. Overall, the team was second in yards gained for a 2894 total.

On offence, Barry Findlay is expected to continue at quarterback while half-back Greg Higson (OUAA All Star) has also returned. Higson was second in the west last year with 556 yards on 62 carries.

For McMaster's defence, Paul Perras, returning to strengthen the team joins Derek Forbes.

The only questionable part of University of Windsor Lancers this year is its defence.

Offensively, quarterback, Andy Parichi (OUAA All Star) was the leading passer in the west with 1,095 yards to his credit on 71 completions (of 105 attempts). Jim Wakeman, while only placing sixth as Windsor's leading rusher, was the second highest scorer in the section. Mike Urhan placed second in the west as receiver with 24 completions for 383 yards.

Last year, Windsor tied with Western in the Western Division of the section with identical wins and losses (five and three, respectively). However, the Lancers had an offensive point total of 127, while the defence gave up 147.

McMaster's 155 for and 129 against looks more promising. Also, if initial showings are any indication, the Marauders dumped Windsor 27 to 14 in the opening game.

The other four teams in the Western Section are likely to fight it out for the remaining four positions, — none of which lead to semi-final playoff games. (The third place Western Section team meets the first place Eastern section team.)

Across the road rivalry between Waterloo Lutheran and the University of Waterloo will probably decide fourth and fifth spots in the division. The Lutheran Golden Hawks have only 18 returning players. However, the quality of the veterans is impressive.

Offensive halfback Gerry Blacker, who led the section in rushing yardage last year (579 yards on 104 carries) is back, as is defensive halfback Stacey Coray (OUAA All Star). Last season, Lutheran also placed first in the west in team rushing and first downs (2082 — net, and 127 yards respectively) yet finished only sixth in passing.

Linebacker Wally Parker also handles Lutheran's place-kicking chores. Last season he finished second in the west, with success on seven of 10 attempts.

Lutheran should be able to capture fourth place if the defence holds firm and there is some improvement on offence. Last season, Lutheran was 148 for and 133 against, while Waterloo was 97 and 133 by comparison.

Up to now University of Waterloo Warriors have only played Guelph, won by Waterloo 11-3. To add to Waterloo's troubles a new quarterback has had to replace Chuck Wakefield. The Warriors' running game will depend upon Brian Beatty and Rick Howse this year.

In 1972, Beatty was third in the west in receiving (17 completions for 189 yards), while Howse was fourth in rushing with 479 yards on 104 carries. (Howse finished fourth despite starting the season as a flanker. He didn't really begin to carry the ball until halfway through the season.) Even though offensive tackle John Buda (OUAA and All Canadian All Star) has returned, the defence will take a great deal of booiding to put the Warriors in contention.

It is difficult to say at this time which team — the York Yeomen or the Guelph Gryphons — will end up in the Western section cellar by season's end. York has switched from east to west this year, and remains somewhat of an unknown quantity. Yet past performance indicates that York's only competition will come from Guelph.

Last year, the Gryphons were undergoing a "rebuilding program. The inexperience showed in the team's season record of one victory, six losses and one tie. Gryphons hope to improve upon their meagre 79 point offence with help from their leading rusher from last season, Bruce Morris. (After one week of play Morris was the fourth leading rusher in the west.)

All in all, head coach Dick Brown is relying upon the maturation of his football team. He'll need it to put York Yeomen in the cellar.

York was mentioned a couple of weeks ago in connection with the Blues-York exhibition game. Since that loss, York has also gone down to defeat twice (a 27-7 loss to Lutheran and 11-2 to Windsor). The only bright star after one week of play appeared to be Gerald Verge, who led the league in passing with 231 yards on 26 attempts. (Steve Ince also looked good with 121 yards.)

If the present season continues in the same pattern, Windsor will likely meet Queens or Ottawa in one semi-final, while McMaster and Western decide who will represent the Western Section in the OUAA final November 11.

UC principal Archie Hallett and Arts and Science dean Bob Greene (hidden) assist in the gowning of president John Evans yesterday. Also seen on the platform are (from left) Engineering dean James Ham, vice-provost Robin Ross and Governing Council chairman C. Malin Harding.

Evans installed amid protest

By EDWARD PODGORSKI

Ignoring two groups of student protestors and dismissing the serving of subpoena on him with a joke, John Evans delivered his first major address as he officially became U of T's ninth president in a regal ceremony performed on the front campus yesterday.

Nearly 4,000 spectators sat through the hour-plus performance, remaining fairly indifferent to small groups of students protesting the university's day care policy and the current library trials and finally warming to a 1950's style performance by the Engineering Society's Lady Godiva Memorial Band.

Sharing the platform with Evans were Ontario Premier William Davis, Lieutenant-Governor Ross MacDonald, U of T Chancellor Pauline McGibbon, Governing Council chairman C. Malin Harding, assorted dignitaries from other universities, and U of T's administrative big wigs.

Seconds before Evans was to begin his inaugural address, Tony Leah and Bill Schabas, students active in the defence campaign for the library trials, mounted the platform. Leah moved swiftly towards Evans, presented him with a subpoena, and asked him to read it. (Legally, a person being presented with a subpoena must be made aware of its contents when it is served.)

Simultaneously, Schabas handed vice-provost Robin Ross a similar subpoena.

The subpoenas require both men to appear at the trial of Tom McLaughlin and Bill Getty, arrested during the March 12 police raid on the Simcoe Hall occupation.

Leah later explained that Evans is wanted to explain to the court on behalf of the university what constitutes trespassing on university property.

Platform speakers frequently had to raise their voices to be heard above the protestors, who were chanting various slogans. About forty demonstrators supporting the Campus

Co-operative Day Care Centres, threatened with eviction by the Governing Council's day care policy, shouted, "Police out, day care in" and "Two, four, six, eight; day care cannot wait".

A smaller contingent marched separately to draw attention to the library trials.

Evans' speech, the only substantial remarks delivered at the inauguration, contrasted markedly with the non-controversial platitudes of other platform guests, including SAC president Eric Miglin and the premier.

Taking careful aim at the smiling premier, a former football chum of the president when both were U of T students, Evans chastized him for his government's refusal to fund the university's federated colleges at the same level as university colleges, and deplored the recent tuition fee increases.

He received loud applause when he told Davis: "Let them (students) go now and pay later, not through the discharge of burdensome loans but through the established practice of after-the-fact taxation."

Evans reasoned that higher tuition fees and limited bursary assistance deter individuals of certain social groups from attending university.

Evans asked Davis "to reconsider the implementation of this approach to the sharing of the costs of education through higher tuition fees on the basis of accessibility."

"It is true that there is justification for asking those who benefit directly from higher education to accept a larger share of its cost," he admitted, but society is the principal beneficiary of their education," Evans said.

In asking for full provincial grant support for church-affiliated colleges, Evans told his audience that "economic developments of recent years have made Victoria, Trinity, and St. Michael's into depressed areas receiving inadequate equalization payments".

"It is our strong hope that the plight of these colleges may soon be alleviated, and that the Ontario government will recognize financially something that has been a fact academically for 85 years, that is, the equal status of the students enrolled in church-related colleges. Action by your government would be timely, Mr. Premier, to say the least."

Also, in his speech, Evans said that "our attention must be strongly focused on the anticipation of future needs." And, he acknowledged the New Program in arts and science as one of the prerequisites for success in making changes in the university.

The president added that the university should also reconsider revamping its traditional PhD program.

The speech also praised last year's acting president Jack Sword.

"Dr. Sword has had the kind of experience that the post requires, and his steadfastness, integrity, and evolution to the university have no parallel of which I am aware," Sword who last year called Metro police on campus twice, is now vice-president — institutional relations and planning.

The installation ceremony has occurred at the U of T only two other times in the last 40 years.

The "coronation" ended as the Lady Godiva Memorial Band paraded onto the field to serenade Evans and Davis, and perform some of their well-known childish antics.

Presenting Evans with a construction hat, the apparent leader of the group, welcomed more warmly than the protestors and under circumstances apparently pre-arranged, advised, "This hard hat is to lead the university with."

Accepting it, Evans concluded, "I'm sure this is the most important part of the academic dress."

Concluding their exhibition, other engineers and friends parodied the Godfather movie, mimicking an Italian immigrant's accent amid scattered crowd objections to the racist nature of their performance. None of the platform guests seemed offended by their display, and Evans later claimed to have been oblivious to it all.

The afternoon concluded with four o'clock tea on the back campus.

Present petition to president

Ryerson students demand removal of Sword

TORONTO (CUP) — A group of 59 Ryerson students met with campus administrators Wednesday in a bid to have Jack Sword removed from their Board of Governors.

Sword, former acting president of the University of Toronto was named as Ryerson governor under Bill #1, the Ryerson Charter, which stipulates U of T must appoint a representative to the board as an academic advisor.

Students protested the fact Sword had called police to the U of T campus last year during the John P. Roberts Library dispute. They felt he might be able to institute similar action at Ryerson. They also condemned Sword for saying that "most of all women borrowers" will default on loans for education. Sword is also against student parity with faculty on decision making bodies.

Student union president David Guphill presented Ryerson president Donald Mordell with a petition hearing 1600 signatures against Sword and Bill #1. Mordell said he would make sure that Sword received the petitions.

Mordell said he agreed with student demands to change Bill #1 and would notify Queen's Park immediately but due to the tight schedule of the Ontario government, action should not be expected before November and may take up to as long as a year.

Mordell said it was not within his power to have Sword removed. He said he felt the man could give sound academic advice to the institute and until Bill #1 was amended Sword would remain as governor. In the birthday party atmosphere of the confrontation, students reacted with uncertainty over the outcome.

The president pledged his support for student action but rejected demands to have Sword removed.

After the confrontation, the board convened and discussed the evening's events. They unanimously passed a motion to present to the new Minister of Colleges and Universities, Jack McNie, to change the composition of Ryerson's board.

The motion, calling for a new board consisting of four students, four faculty, four alumni and four lay appointees was to be presented to McNie as soon as possible.

Dick Reid, Chairman of the Board, said he would present the petition and an outline of what went on at the meeting to Sword as soon as possible.

The board was under the opinion this action would force Sword to resign or at least be an absentee member until the bill could be amended.

Student governor Mike Welton addresses other members of Ryerson's board Wednesday evening. Sitting at near right is board chairman Dick Reid, with President Donald Modell next to him.

During the meeting Mordell read a letter from Sword which said he (Sword) felt compelled by law to sit on the Ryerson board.

The board will sit in two weeks to discuss the Sword issue and bill #1. In the meantime the students at Ryerson are still demanding Sword's resignation. Organizers of the action against Sword and the bill say they would like to confront the new minister with the issue.

Conflicting evidence heard at Goldblatt trial

By ALEXANDRA MERCER

Yesterday's third session of the trial of Mark Goldblatt on charges of assaulting and obstructing police during the break-up of last spring's first occupation of Simcoe Hall focused on whether the occupants were legally charged with trespassing.

On Tuesday, U of T chief security officer Gordon Huff testified that he called in police assuming that the occupants of Simcoe Hall were trespassers.

Huff maintained that he had obtained his instructions from campus security and safety officer Westhead. But, university vice-president Jack Sword, acting president at the time, said the same day that he ordered police into Simcoe Hall believing the occupiers would not be considered trespassers.

Yesterday, two prosecution witnesses who had both recorded the critical conversation between Westhead and Sword when Sword gave the orders for police involvement gave differing evidence as to the use of the trespassing order in Sword's statement.

Theresa Falcioni, a university employee describing herself as a communications secretary, stated that her notes of what Sword said were: "Go ahead in five minutes; around 11 o'clock; no individual arrests; only those who resist should be arrested."

U of T policewoman Joanne Pug who was listening in on another telephone extension noted the same items as Falcioni. However, her record of the conversation also contained the statement "advise them that they are trespassing."

Later, Pug could not recall the content of the notes which she had just finished reading when she was cross-examined by defence counsel Austin Cooper.

At one point, Cooper asked her if she was certain that she was on duty the morning of March 12 when the conversation between Sword and Westhead occurred. She stated that she was adjourned, after only one hour of testimony.

Earlier during the short court session, Cooper attempted to invoke the Canada Evidence Act three times in response to the prosecution's use of the secretary's and the policewoman's notes as direct evidence.

One point of contention, as Cooper saw it, was that Felicioni and Pug presented evidence in writing concerning a witness's testimony which the witness had not first approved. Such a presentation would be inadmissible under the Canada Evidence Act, he claimed.

However, Judge Charles Drukarsh ruled that the Felicioni and Pug evidence was valid because "they were witnesses to the scene." He added that they were not presenting statements written by the witness (Sword), but had made notes of his actual statements.

Once the court admitted the two sets of notes as evidence, the defence examined extensively the disparity in the trespassing evidence.

Goldblatt's trial will be continued on November 12, while the trials of Bill Getty and Tom McLaughlin, also charged in the March 12 raid, are slated for next Wednesday at 10 am.

For a report of Wednesday's trial session, see page 7.

Marxist prof fights entry denial

By MARK BOEKELMAN and MARILYN SMITH

DOWNSVIEW (CUP)— Although unable to assume his teaching duties, because of his legal "visitor" status, eminent Marxist scholar Istvan Meszaros, hired by York University but refused a Canadian entry visa by the Canadian Government, has nonetheless established close liaison with York since his surprise arrival in Canada last Tuesday.

Seven University of Toronto and 14 York faculty members yesterday sent an open letter to Minister of Mopower and Immigration Bryce Mackasey asking for a "comprehensive review" of the case in view of Meszaros' anti-Stalinist actions in the 1956 Hungarian uprising and his security clearance by both Italian and British officials subsequent to his leaving Hungary.

After waiting 26 weeks for a reply to his appeal to Mackasey, Meszaros decided to come to Canada to fight his case and bring the reasons for the denial into the open.

Lawyer Paul Copeland, who successfully fought a case for York history professor Gabriel Kolko in 1970, has taken on the battle to get Meszaros accepted by Canadian immigration officials. York president David Slater met with Meszaros and Copeland for the first time Tuesday and told them "York intends to support you in all reasonable applications and appeals."

Slater has written to Mackasey on behalf of York asking for a "an urgent and sympathetic review" of the case.

And the York faculty have established an Ad Hoc Committee for Freedom to Teach. The group is holding an open discussion Monday with several of the supporting faculty.

Although York continues to deposit his more than $20,000 a year salary in a bank account Meszaros cannot draw from the account as officials could accuse him of working illegally. The strain on Meszaros is intense and in an interview earlier this week, he appeared tired and nervous.

"I was never told what the reasons were for my refusal. Who know what is in that file?"

"Under the cloak of secrecy, I have no power to challenge it (the decision). For the last 26 weeks my family and I have been the victims of arbitrary and bureaucratic action," he charged.

"A terrible allegation had been made about me—that I am a security risk. I don't think it's any of their business to censor my political beliefs". Meszaros told Vocalist, the York student newspaper.

"I am here to defend my integrity and my family's dignity".

Asked how long he would stay, Meszaros replied, "as long as necessary".

He stated he had the support of his wife and three children still in England and the support of his former employer, the University of Sussex, as well as the entire intellectual community in Europe.

Meszaros told the York student newspaper that a close friend, Hamza Alavi, a social anthropologist hired to teach at Queen's University recently, was refused a visa for security reasons. He said the delaying tactics and the "disheartening political interviews smacked of political inquisition."

Alavi became discouraged and decided not to pursue his career in Canada. However Meszaros says he will fight to the bitter end.

The prominent U of T faculty who signed the letter include political scientist C.B. Macpherson, English professor Northrop Frye, Law dean Martin Friedland, Vice principal John Robson, Innis principal Peter Russell, and Graduate dean Ed Safarian.

Signing at York were Graduate dean Michael Collier, political science chairman Edward Dosman, Social Science chairman Mel Hill, Science Faculty dean Robert Lundell, philosophy chairman John Yolton, Glendon College principal Albert Tucker, and Atkinson College dean Harry Crowe.

The letter was also signed by political science professor Neil Wood, who interviewed Meszaros in England last year before York hired him.

No discussion on stipend cuts with SAC, says Welch

By NADIM WAKEAM

Minister of Social Development Robert Welch has refused to meet with a SAC delegation to discuss the cutting of living allowances for paramedical interns, claiming that it is not his department's responsibility.

He asserts that the matter "falls squarely within the responsibility of the Ministry of Health", with which SAC has already dealt.

In a letter to SAC university commissioner John Creelman, received yesterday morning, Welch said "It would be most appropriate, therefore, for you to continue your consultation with officials in that ministry."

The letter was in reply to a request for a meeting submitted with a brief on the stipends by SAC.

The brief argued against last April's announcement that the living allowances for students doing work as interns would be abolished because of "financial considerations".

Welch's reply comes in the face of a statement by Robert Sirman, Executive Officer (Secretariat) for Social Development. According to Sirman, once SAC had gone through the Ministry of Health, their brief could then be considered by Welch.

The brief was in fact submitted to Deputy Minister of Health Stan Martin last week.

Creelman commented on the letter yesterday morning, "If Welch isn't concerned with something of this magnitude, what is the man doing?"

"Is he merely sitting on his butt writing this sort of letter?"

Welch, as one of our "super ministers", oversees the ministries of Colleges and Universities, Health, Education, and Correctional Services.

'Society is the principal beneficiary of education'

Dr. John Evens yesterday delivered his first major address as president of the University of Toronto. His comments focussed on the college system, recent fees increases, and planning within the university. Excerpts from his speech are printed below:

In this university, the federation of church and state colleges was the basis for institutional development. From the very beginning, Toronto has given full academic recognition to all its Arts and Science students without reference to their colleges. Unfortunately, the economic developments of recent years have made Victoria, Trinity and St. Michael's the three church-related colleges into depressed areas receiving inadequate equalization payments. It is our strong hope that the plight of these colleges may soon be alleviated, and that the Ontario Government will recognize financially something that has been a fact academically for 85 years, that is, the equal status of the students enrolled in the church-related colleges.

Action by your government would be timely, Mr. Premier, to say the least! It would endorse an academic reality, and it would enable us to preserve and build on a valuable inheritance. The legacy of separate colleges can be turned to our advantage in an institution of this size. One of the early decisions of Dr. Claude Bissell after he became President of the University was that the college system should be the basis of the undergraduate expansion which began its steep climb at this university in the late 1950's. There had been a plan for a massive high-rise dormitory development which would have created two different kinds of university bisected by St. George Street.

Dr. Bissell made a persuasive case for keeping to the concept of the small unit and thus establishing a structural safeguard against the disadvantages of bigness. This was only one of the far-sighted actions that marked a presidency of great insight and imagination. It is interesting in 1972 to find strong expressions of interest in the United States in college systems as a means of "avoiding the inflexibilities associated with excessive bigness".

In spite of their important social role most of our colleges, however, have not developed a distinctive educational character. An interesting analysis made this year by the Registrar of Trinity showed that social, denominational and geographic considerations, rather than academic, govern the applicants' choice of college in most cases, and my own conversations with students tend to confirm that finding. Indeed, it is difficult for advisers in the high schools to help students choose among the various colleges and to identify significant differences between them.

Moreover there is evidence that the subjects which at Toronto have traditionally been identified as college subjects are on the wane in the free market that now exists in the secondary schools.

It seems to me highly desirable for the colleges to attempt to establish a distinctive educational flavour, and I recognize that this may be impossible to accomplish within the framework of the traditional college subjects. The problems involved in making changes should not be minimized, but I suggest that some of the prerequisites for success are already in our hands. We have the flexibility given by the New Program in Arts and Science' the multi-faculty concept at New College and Innis College; and the tradition of the sharing of resources which is well established, though restricted in its application, between University College and all the other colleges.

I have made separate comments about full-time students, part-time students, and graduate students, but there is one common theme that is currently of concern to all students. That is the policy direction taken by your government, Mr. Davis, in asking students to assume additional responsibility for the cost of their education through the tuition fees they pay. It is true that there is justification for asking those who benefit directly from higher education to accept a larger share of its costs, but society is the principal beneficiary of their education.

Furthermore, a countervailing argument of even greater significance is the influence that this policy of your government's may have on accessibility to university education and this applies not only to full-time, but also to part-time and graduate studies for mature students. The combination of higher tuition fees and more limited bursary assistance will act as a serious deterrent to individuals from lower income groups, from large families, and from those families who have come recently to Ontario and who are least certain about their future.

I hope, Mr. Premier, that your government will be willing to reconsider the implementation of this approach to the sharing of the costs of education through higher tuition fees on the basis of its impact on accessibility. Let them go now and pay later, not through the discharge of burdensome loans but through the established practice of after-the-event taxation.

Planning is not an activity that is confined to the centre, although there is much work to be done centrally in the handling of information and integration of concepts. But a major share of the discussion and definition of objectives must be a grass-roots activity. Given the dimensions of the task, it will take time and make heavy demands upon the energies of all of us.

Different groups will have different contributions to the determination of objectives, and there will be conflicts and abrasive differences of opinion. Such conflict is essential to generate the energies that are required to cope with change and achieve reform.

The thing to watch is to ensure that the conflict is task-oriented, and not merely directed against other groups or other individuals. Conflict becomes sterile - indeed, counter-productive if it is focussed on other individuals or groups. A tug-of-war doesn't cover much ground. But the process of resolving genuine differences of opinion should evoke the best and most creative potentialities in the powers of all concerned, and set off the sparks from which new initiatives and conceptual breakthroughs originate.

The planning problems of a large university today are inevitably linked to the problems of the whole country as it tries to cope with the post-industrial society, and, indeed, linked to the planning problems of a world facing the implications of total responsibility for the world environment. The Munich tragedy, and Ulster, and Vietnam, illustrate that the world scene, like our own, is plagued with conflict that is focussed on other individuals and groups rather than on the crucial tasks to be done. These considerations are within the frame of reference of the new generation of students, and their views, arising from their sense of sharing world responsibility, should be part of the planning process.

The challenge ahead involves maintaining or increasing quality and adapting much more rapidly to new needs in education, research and public service, without an enlargement of purchasing power in real terms. As I have said, our ingenuity is obviously going to be severely taxed, but this is preferable to taxing more severely the income of the public which supports us.

Mass protest again exam rules

Quebec law students boycott classes today

MONTREAL (CUP) — Quebec law students may have gained some support in their fight with the provincial bar association.

Provincial justice minister Jerome Choquette appeared sympathetic in a meeting with students Monday night. He told the students to go through the normal channels in their negotiations, but to return to him if they failed.

The students are protesting bar admittance exams which 58 per cent of the students writing failed earlier this year. They say the exams are an attempt by the bar association to maintain its privileged position as a select professional group. Students must regurgitate their entire law studies during three intensive days of tests.

Fearful that their years of study may be in vain, Quebec undergraduate law students and graduates who have not been accepted to the bar sent an ultimatum to the bar association two weeks ago calling for the abolition of bar exams.

Jean Moisan, battonnier of the bar, refused to consider the demand. "Law rules and resolutions of the bar oblige us to hold exams," he stated, "and you must understand that our answer to your request must be negative."

In response, the students passed a resolution Thursday asking the National Assembly to pass a private bill doing away with the law.

Moisan's decree was handed down on Thursday, one day before the latest set of bar exams were to be written.

McGill Graduate students responded by boycotting the mid-term tests and setting up pickets outside the Quebec Bar School and the Palais de Justice in Montreal. They were joined by undergraduate law students from the University of Montreal and McGill, making a group of over 1000 demonstrators.

The day before, 700 of the 1000 University of Montreal law students voted almost unanimously to abolish the bar exams and join the picketing. The McGill Law Undergraduate Society also voted unanimously to boycott all classes today "to show our support for the action of the bar students."

On Monday, three students representing Quebec's 4,500 law students met with Choquette and came away saying, "The Minister was extremely sympathetic to our cause."

Sword's testimony contradicted

Orders given to arrest trespassers: police

By STEWART GOODYEAR

Campus safety and security officer J.F. Westhead yesterday disagreed with U of T vice-president Jack Sword's previous assertions that he authorized police to evacuate Simcoe Hall with the understanding that charges of trespassing would not be laid against occupiers.

According to Westhead, when Sword phoned his orders for the evacuation he made no mention of trespass but gave no explicit instructions that demonstrators not be charged.

Instead Sword instructed that police were to enter Simcoe Hall, order demonstrators to leave, allow a short period for voluntary evacuation, then remove those who remained, arresting resisters, stated Westhead.

He interpreted these instructions to mean that all occupiers removed by police from the Senate chamber should be charged with trespass.

During the March 13th evacuation 19 people were arrested for trespassing, though these charges were later dropped at the university's request. Four were charged with more serious offences:

Tom McLaughlin and Goldblatt with obstructing police, Bill Getty, Randy Reynolds and Goldblatt with assaulting police.

Appearing as a witness for the crown Westhead stated that he relayed Sword's instructions to chief university security officer Gordon Huff to organize the evacuating force. The eviction began 40 minutes later.

Westhead said that his conversation with Sword was recorded by secretaries listening in on other lines and that he will be able to present a transcript of the orders to verify his statements.

Questioned by the Crown attorney, Westhead said the students had broken into Simcoe Hall after a rally in Convocation Hall on Friday March 11th in what he described as an illegal occupation.

Campus police were dispatched to the upper floors to seal off rooms, particularly the office of the vice-president, said Westhead. He added that he witnessed aggressiveness and "throwing of fists" by the students when they were restrained by police.

The Crown attorney then suggested that this was representative of the tone of the entire occupation.

During the weekend demonstrators barred entry to Simcoe Hall to all but their supporters, Westhead asserted.

He stationed campus police nearby to inform those entering that they were doing so illegally.

While in Simcoe Hall during the eviction, Westhead didn't witness the entry into the Senate chamber, but said he watched demonstrators leave via the main hall and stairs.

Most left peacefully, he said, though some were in "various stages of resistance", shouting and struggling. He stated that the police were "restraining" a few of the occupiers, but that he saw no signs of violence.

When shown photographs of police manhandling demonstrators, Westhead became vague and repeated that he saw little violence.

At one point during his testimony, Judge Charles Drukarsh told Westhead that rather than reporting hearsay, he should merely speak factually of what he himself had witnessed.

Later, he identified the woman who was taken out of Simcoe Hall by two police with her sweater pulled up to expose her breasts.

Westhead first stated that he observed the woman apparently rolling her sweater upwards as she turned to descend the stairs. Although he said he could see the position and motion of her hands, Westhead added that he had a poor view of the woman and couldn't see whether she was leaving peacefully or being restrained.

Under cross-examination by defence lawyer Austin Cooper, Westhead admitted that she was being forcibly brought down the corridor, in the grip of two officers. When shown a photograph he admitted that both of her arms had been tightly held.

After more questioning, Westhead finally stated he couldn't swear what had happened with the sweater, because his view of the situation had been a poor one.

When questioned about the effectiveness of Huff's warning to demonstrators that they were about to be evacuated and that they had the opportunity to leave voluntarily, Westhead said that he heard the announcement. But under further examination he admitted that there was much noise and confusion outside the Senate chamber and that occupiers may not have understood their position.

Westhead added that he was unable to identify Goldblatt.

The Crown then called Inspector David Sproule of the 52nd precinct of Metro police to the stand. Sproule stated that he led the city police in their actions during the evacuation.

After being called by Huff at 8:15 Sunday morning, said Sproule, he was given a briefing by Westhead and the chief of the campus police. According to his testimony he was told that students were trespassing, that they were to be given a chance to leave voluntarily and if they remained in Simcoe Hall they were to be removed, forcibly if necessary, and arrested.

Sproule emphasized that Westhead was clear in his request that the occupiers be charged with trespass.

Metro police followed the university police to the 2nd. floor of Simcoe Hall where they found that some demonstrators had retreated to the Senate chamber, barricading the door, said Sproule.

There was disturbance in the corridor, and though he was able to observe a police detective apparently speaking to the occupiers through a small opening of the Senate door, Sproule said he was unable to hear what was said. Nor did he hear the warning allegedly given to the occupiers by Huff.

The door was then shut, said Sproule; to force entry police broke one of the door panels, knocked it out and climbed through the opening.

According to Sproule any violence had subsided by the time he entered the chamber; police were "restraining" demonstrators and he saw no assaults. He escorted one person from the building and waited outside until all occupiers were gathered. The demonstrators were then photographed and taken to the police station.

When questioned by the defence Sproule agreed that the photographs exhibited represented the kind of action he had seen, but maintained that police had held themselves in check, "guiding" occupiers from the building.

SAC to finance campaign for upcoming fee strike referendum

By FERNANDO TRAFFICANTE

SAC, while narrowly voting to support in principle a fees strike in January if Ontario Federation of Students demands are not met, steered clear of conducting a strong "vote yet" campaign in the upcoming referendum.

Instead, the council voted Wednesday to finance to the extent of $1150 a campaign, that according to communications commissioner Debra Lewis, would be "factually oriented".

"We will try to present as clear a picture as we can, she said. "The committee running the campaign will try to explain both sides of the question."

The last time an issue of this nature erupted was in 1969 when SAC ran a referendum on the now defunct Canadian Union of Students. Conservative forces on council strongly objected when SAC voted $500 more to the pro- than anti-CUS organization.

The parallel was strongly in the minds of at least some at Wednesday's meeting. This time, however, a council committed to supporting the OFS demands and fees strike decided to run both a for and against campaign.

The stand adopted by council was the watered down version of a motion originally moved by president Eric Miglin, vice-president John Helliwell, Lewis and university commissioner John Creelman. Amendments were passed that explicitly committed SAC to publicize the rationale for voting against the fees strike as well as changing from outright support to support in principle.

Earlier, a motion by UC SAC rep Marty Stollar to finance a campaign by those members in SAC that oppose the fees boycott was defeated. SAC is constitutionally forbidden to give grants to any external groups, and thus would have had to find an opposition group among SAC members.

A further motion asking that half the money allocated for the campaign be allowed for representation of the opposing viewpoint was also defeated.

The decision to hold the referendum was nearly unanimous, while the motion to "accept in principle a fees boycott in January" if the OFS demands are not met passed only by 20 to 17.

The vote supporting the eventual motion to hold run the "factual campaign" was by a margin of two to one.

In the debate, Miglin said that "SAC must be prepared to take a meaningful role vis-a-vis the fees boycott."

He added that although he does not believe that the referendum or a fees boycott would cause the government to reverse their decisions regarding fees and loans, a strong stand by the students might reduce the size and number of future fee increases.

In other matters, a constitutional amendment which would allow SAC to give grants to groups both within and without the university was referred back to the constitutional committee. Straw votes had revealed that Council was deeply divided on the question.

Law SAC rep George Strathy defeated UC rep Seymour Kanowitch in the election for education commissioner to replace Marty Stollar, who resigned at the previous meeting.

John Simopoulos, the Erindale representative on the executive, resigned for personal reasons.

Minister refuses to discuss fees increase with Miglin, students

By BRIANE NASIMOK

Former Minister of Colleges and Universities George Kerr refuses to come on campus and discuss the rise in tuition fees, with students, says SAC President Eric Miglin.

"It's an inopportune time to come," replied Kerr's aide, Gord Hampson, in a phone conversation with Miglin, "just before a referendum."

Miglin, along with university commissioner John Creelman, has been trying to get members of the government to talk at forums, on the fees hike planned for the week of October 5, with little success. It seems that most of the members of the Department of College and Universities are busy, or out of town during the proposed forums.

Creelman first approached Gord Hampson when Kerr spoke at a forum last week at York University. At that time Hampson said that he didn't see any reason why the minister could not come, Creelman says it was simply a matter of checking his timetable.

Miglin telephoned the next day, but it took two or three days for the Minister to return his call. Finally Hampson told Miglin that the timing was "inopportune".

Miglin asked if someone else was available and received a negative reply. On Wednesday Creelman and Miglin then tried to contact the deputy minister, but have not yet received a reply to messages. Miglin next phoned the premier's office to register a complaint with his assistant, Clair Wescott, again with no response.

Miglin attempted to talk to Premier Davis, at president John Evans installation yesterday, but was unable to confront him.

SAC is still trying to arrange government speakers, but have found that Allan Grossman, Doug Wright and Robert Welch will all be out of town.

Officials in the Department of Colleges and Universities could not be reached for comment.

If donors agree, Rotenberg will publish their names

By LORNE SLOTNICK

Mayorally candidate David Rotenberg said Tuesday night that he is willing to make public a list of all campaign donors who agree to have their names published.

This apparent change in policy came at a Citizen's Forum meeting of about 70 people at City Hall on the problems and politics of wards 5, 6, and 9.

Rotenberg, remained for only a few minutes, but the audience had a chance to challenge him on the subject of campaign funds. The question had originally been directed to aldermanic candidates in the three wards.

Rotenberg said that "if a person has a right to a free and secret ballot, then he has a right to a free and secret campaign contribution."

But he added that he agreed with a proposal set forth by Ward 6 candidate Dan Heap with regard to campaign fund disclosure Heap had said he would disclose all names except those of people who specifically wished to remain anonymous. The amount of each anonymous contribution would be published.

Even though Rotenberg said he agreed with this, it was clear that he meant he would only give a list of people who wished that their names be published. Some spectators indicated they had already received letters from him asking for money, with no mention of disclosure.

Several aldermanic candidates in wards 5, 6, and 9 attended the meeting but there was little disagreement about issues, because most of the candidates are part of the "reform" group. Only ward 5 Alderman William Archer provided some controversy.

Archer said he would not publish a list of contributors, because some people will not donate to his campaign if he does. He said that it didn't make any difference in an alderman's performance no matter who give him money.

Ward 6 candidate Rose Smith said she would disclose her sources of funds, as did ward 5 candidates Colin Vaughan and Ying Hope, and Dorothy Thomas and Reid Scott, running in ward 9.

Archer made it clear that he is switching to ward 6 this time, but says he has "no lack of confidence in being able to take ward 5". Ward 6 includes the whole U of T area south of Bloor.

Heap says he is running to aid the movement for resident control or neighbourhoods, and to help stem the "overdevelopment" of southern Ontario. He said the present Metro governmental structure has the effect of subordinating the needs of the city's people to those of the people in the suburbs.

The Spadina Expressway was an example of this, he said. He also said that there is "far more for an alderman to do outside City Hall in the ward than in City Hall."

Dorothy Thomas said she is running because she felt "incredible frustration at trying to be heard at City Hall."

Vaughan said it was his "absolute promise" to fight "anything that makes this city less habitable."

Part-time student succeeds Kerr

Perhaps signalling a change in emphasis within the department, Hamilton West MPP Jac McNie, a one-time U of T student who has been working on his BA in extension courses at McMaster University, yesterday became Minister of Colleges and Universities.

He replaces George Kerr who takes over the super-ministry of Provincial Secretary of Justice vacated by Allan Lawrence when he decided to contest the current federal election.

McNie, who only learned of his appointment at noon yesterday, took a year of university at Victoria College following the Second World War. President of a Hamilton advertising and public relations company, he left U of T and full-time university attendance after finishing highest of 500 first year students in his field.

He still has one credit to go before getting his BA from McMaster.

McNie's first steps in the political arena were at U of T where he became a vice-president of the Progressive Club when he went to their first meeting, later, he graduated to the vice-presidency of the Ontario Young Progressive Conservatives and later its presidency. He also married the OYPC secretary.

In an exclusive interview last night, McNie described himself as "not a highly partisan person."

"What makes this portfolio so interesting", he said, is that it deals with the priorities of living.

"We want to be sure we're doing the things we're doing because they should be done" not just because they're the most economical, he commented when questioned about his priorities.

Noting that it was easier for him to go on record about an issue before his appointment to the cabinet, McNie reported that he has criticized some government policy initiatives, including last spring's graduate tuition hike.

It was "too stiff a hike", he said. The government, he reasoned at that time, should have a better understanding of the contribution graduate students make.

McNie also questioned the disproportionate government expenditures on the five to 20 age group compared to the 20-80 age category. Speaking of "amenities and programs", he suggested the latter group has been overlooked in the past, although stressing that this attitude did not mean that he felt spending on the under 20 group should necessarily be cut.

Discussing the undergraduate students' protests against last spring's tuition hikes, McNie commented, "I know there's dissatisfaction."

He avoided discussing details of the issue and the Ontario Federation of Students' demand that the fees hike be rolled back, but said that consultation of parties concerned before hiking fees would probably be the best approach. "In the final analysis, the government must make this determination," he concluded.

Although he saw "some justification" for the fees increases, McNie admitted that "there are persons who because of no fault of their own can't meet the increases". Students from low-income families, familiar with the debt cycle in which many of their parents are caught, are "very often reluctant to get involved in loans."

McNie was reluctant to discuss the Robarts Library controversy. He did say, however, that "as a matter of principle, I subscribe to the view that the facilities should be as widely available as possible" without prejudicing the interests of the persons for whom they were created.

COU urges government to revise grad fees structure

By MARK BOHNEN

In response to increases in graduate student fees, the Council of Ontario Universities (COU) has been meeting with the Ontario government in an attempt to persuade it to revise its fees structure.

U of T's assistant dean of Graduate Studies F.A. Sherk said in an interview Wednesday that the COU has been trying to persuade the government to lower the tuition fee formula, which the government considers graduate students to have paid, to "about $600 for all graduate students."

He added that most Ontario universities and graduate deans are in favour of this action.

The government formula announced last spring requires full-time graduate students to pay $877.50, or $292.50 for each term. Previously students studying in the summer were not required to pay extra tuition.

Sherk could not predict how successful the COU campaign would be. In fact, he stated that the government might increase its formula fee again in 1973-74.

A major question, he said, was whether the university could afford not to charge the students the full fee in the event the increase is not cut back.

For this year only, U of T is absorbing the summer fee hike of $292.50. Thus the present fee for U. of T students is $585.

The Queen is most anxious to enlist everyone to join in checking this mad, wicked folly of Women's Rights, with all its attendant horrors. . . .
 Woman would become the most hateful, heartless and disgusting of human beings were she allowed to unsex herself, and where would be the protection which man was intended to give the weaker sex?
 Queen Victoria

Revolutionary slogans, like this one urging solidarity with Vietnam, punctuate Cuban streets.

USSR's influence, but maintained that Cuba was still the best of the workers' states (e.g. those countries that have socialized their means of production), and that it continued to enjoy relative autonomy in the field of foreign policy, never stooping to the reactionary "peaceful co-existence" line of its bureaucratized big brothers.

Of course, we talked about Quebec and English Canada too. Lanctot felt quite optimistic about the future of the radical movement in Quebec, seeing last spring's general strike plus the recent adoption of socialist manifestoes by the Common Front unions recently as real turning points. He predicted a split from the petit bourgeois nationalist Parti Québécois of its leftwing elements in the next couple of years to coincide with the emergence of a mass labour party from the local Political Action Committees (CAP's).

His orientation now was towards mass action politics, having rejected his terrorist past. He said that the only value that his cell's action two Octobers ago had was in that it was politically educational, showing Ottawa's determination to crush any growing independentist sentiment and that it led to the dissolution of the disunited and incoherent FLQ. Now, most of its former activists are operating at the trade union base.

Although Lanctot looks forward to the day he can return to an independent, socialist Quebec, he made it clear that he was comfortable in Cuba, that he enjoyed its slower pace of life, and liked particularly his access to information on world events. He said it was like "being at the centre of things."

Despite CIA-inspired myths to the contrary, political refugees, like Lanctot, are being treated well in Cuba. They have work, housing, and a steady income. The only problem is that it tends to overburden an already weak economy, and so the Cubans are now reluctant to welcome such immigrants.

As well, they'd feel relieved to be able to get rid of most of the bourgeois elements disinherited by the revolution who also prove a nagging burden on the state, but the United States won't take them, nor will anyone else.

When will prosperity come to Cuba! When will the revolution be complete! And how can socialists elsewhere aid the Cuban cause! Perhaps the best answer to these questions came from Jacques Lanctot. The day before I left Cuba to return home I asked him, in the presence of some Cuban comrades, what could be done in Canada to best aid the Cubans in their struggle. "Make the revolution here," he replied. The comrades nodded their agreement.

Elton John's fireworks flash through lyrics

Before fame and torture found Elton John, he was just a pudgy keyboard man known as Reginald Dwight. Reggie was an unspectacular boy who often worked as a studio sideman. Early experience in the recording studio was gained in a most unlikely manner - he recorded cover versions of pop songs - you know those albums you find in the supermarket with "30 top chartbusters" and the like. Well somebody somewhere has a copy of Elton John trying his damndest to sound like Little Stevie Wonder.

Reggie wasn't doing all that well when he saw an advertisement looking for composers to set lyrics to music. He could write music but never had much luck with lyrics so he answered the ad and was introduced to a lyricist named Bernie Taupin who couldn't write music. The rest is history.

Taupin writes the lyrics first. He starts with a title idea and expands from there. The completed lyrics are then sent to Elton John who composes the melodies from the first line down. The pair always work completely separately. Elton writes the music at an unbelievably ferocious pace and most songs are completed in a half to three quarters of an hour, some sooner. You can appreciate the genius of the composition by following the words to some of their better songs. The phrasings are woven into the melody with a deftness and balance that's absolutely uncanny.

Honky Chateau (MCA), is the sixth and latest album for Elton John and Bernie Taupin. Like each of its predecessors this is a distinctive sounding work which carefully avoids tried and true production paths.

Personnel on this album has been limited to a small core group consisting of Nigel Olsson, Dee Murray and Davey Johnstone (all of whom are with Elton on his current tour). Gus Dudgeon, Elton's indispensable control room wonder, is producer once again. There are some notable omissions too. Arranger Paul Buckmaster who added the lavish string sections to many of Elton's successful recordings is missing as is guitarist Caleb Quaye, who until Honky Chateau played fantastic lead riffs and acoustic rhythms on all the studio produced albums. Allan Mendell

Stones are rolling downhill

The front cover of the Rolling Stones double album, Exile on Main St., is made up of a number of photos of circa 1930 sideshow acts and freaks. The pictures are black and white and grainy. The back cover blends into the front but is made up of fuzzy shots of the Stones with torn edges. It's a sloppy package, indicative of the production and composition to be found inside.

This album is a four sided disappointment. The vocals have been carelessly miked rendering almost all the lyrics muddy or inaudible - a far cry from the excellence and clarity of the Stones' last few releases.

Were the only difficulty with this set the atrocious vocal quality, I might be inclined to be somewhat forgiving (albeit frustrated), but the compositions - all by Jagger and Richards - are second rate musically (perhaps lyrically as well if they could be deciphered). Most of the blame for the final product rests with Mick Jagger and the rest belongs to producer Jimmy Miller. The musicians include Nicky Hopkins, Jim Price and Bobby Keys - they accompanied the Stones on tour too. The melodies and arrangements are trite and offer few opportunities to exploit the band's talents.

The better tracks are oddly the first and last cuts on each of the tour sides, and only side four is bearable in its entirety. The fillers on the first side are disgraceful examples of static rock.

It's strange that such a weak album, offering an ineffectual Mick Jagger was released before the Stones American tour. In concert in Toronto, Jagger was a dynamic satanic force, smoothly manipulative and unshakably in control. I can only surmise the album was rushed to release. You might be able to put together a short album by discriminating choice from among the eighteen songs on Exile, but even at that, most cuts would need more work to bring them up to standards.

Applause thunders for Charlebois

The Varsity - Christine Sosnowski

Quebecois singer Robert Charlebois' controlled performance at Massey Hall last Saturday night evoked two encores and a standing ovation amidst thundering applause from the predominantly French-speaking audience.

Fuzz-haired Charlebois, 28, in a white Indian shirt and brown and white palomine, studded trousers began the concert with "Conception", a bouncy, carumba-like song off his new album. He was backed up by a six-man group which gave a free-flowing jazz flavour to the music.

Charlebois' movements on stage give the semblance of being calculated to produce a super-star effect. His energy is not total and his physical involvement not complete, but rather comes in spurts.

Undisputedly, Charlebois does possess a good strong voice which carries itself in English as well as French but his chansons (releases were soothingly sentimental and had more interesting musical arrangements).

Charlebois, who sold in a press conference that he was interested in communicating in another language, alternated introductions in French and English and sang two new English compositions "Hallowe'en in Hollywood" and "The Greatest Idea".

It is somewhat confusing, however, as to just what Charlebois wishes to communicate. The lyrics in "Hallowe'en in Hollywood" lament the passing of a glorified Hollywood era.

Often the music to his songs will be serious, whereas the words are absurd, and he frequently uses joul, a slang peculiar to French Canada.

Although Charlebois is the only rock hero to emerge recently from French Canada, he surprisingly did very little political material. That may not be his objective at all. His audience was more than satisfied with the style and content of Saturday evening's concert.

Women rewrite history...

The Canadian left has often been criticised for its U.S.-oriented analyses of Canadian society and the problems that confront it. While much of this criticism has been directed to writing off what the left has to say as somehow irrelevant to Canada, nevertheless, it has been taken seriously. In response, independent progressive groups have begun to gather the relevant facts and formulate their own theories and strategies.

To do so, it has been necessary to investigate such questions as the roles that the bourgeoisie played in the economic development of Canada, and to understand the history of labour movements, suffrage movements and anti-communist attacks. In order to develop a strategy, the history of Canada needs to be re-investigated and fundamentally re-written.

Women Unite! is an early product of this process. The history of women has been written to a large extent by men — exceptions are primarily the journals and diaries of the ladies of the privileged classes. Existing volumes of Canadian history make very little reference to the day-to-day lives of women and the working class. As history reveals it, they were not involved in the establishment of this country.

Women Unite! attempts to fill part of the gap in Canadian women's history. This anthology represents the first major bringing together of experiences and thoughts of Canadian women. Some of the material in this volume has been floating around in left circles for several years, and has undergone a process of criticism and rethinking and rewriting. All the work done to produce the book comes from women who have participated in the women's liberation movement — people who believe that oppression can be overcome only through a radical and fundamental change in the structure of our society. The strategy for such a change varies from place to place and from woman to woman. Women Unite! provides a view of an overall strategy with varying components.

The introduction to the book chronologically outlines and analyzes how the women's movement in Canada emerged from the peace movement in the early 60's. The first section of the book is a chronological account of women's role in Canadian history. However, there is a time gap between the suffrage movement and the beginnings of the New Left.

The rest of the book is directed to strategy and discusses (1) alternatives to the family, (2) economics of working women, and (3) politics of sex. This anthology, like other women's anthologies, presents theoretical, historical, personal, and artistic pieces of work. The significant difference between this book and other women's books is that Women Unite! is distinctly Canadian.

The writing, editing, proof-reading, etc. were done by the press collective. It is significant that women have had to produce their own material for their existence to be recorded. At the same time, Women Unite! does not attempt to flatter or exaggerate the role and contributions that women make or have made.

The social criticisms are levelled not at men — but rather at the capitalist system. The book emphasizes the need for human beings to function cooperatively, for children to be treated like people, and for men and women to break down stereotyped images of themselves. Articles criticize the loss of sensitivity and emotion particularly in the male and the repression of overt aggressiveness and decisiveness in the female.

The Press Collective makes no pretence that the women's movement has been centered anywhere except in the university and the middle class — and the book reflects this. Nor does it address itself to questions about native women or to Quebec. Even so, many basic questions are raised about the direction of social change.

The critical analysis and questioning in Women Unite! is of a completely different order to that in the Lace Ghetto. The Lace Ghetto to some extent is a personification of imagery of a woman — glossy, frilly, expensive. It's a swank coffee table book which somehow legitimizes the discussion of "what do the women want anyway" for the upper middle classes more than a cheap paperback might.

... examining the role of women

Unitel claim to be the first Canadian women's liberation publication. One is a fun book full of pictures, the other is full of words and ideas. They compliment each other very well.

The Lace Ghetto offers no analysis — the pictures and reproductions of advertisements speak very clearly for themselves. The authors very skillfully chose and organized statements and pictures and interviews so that the reader very easily feels empathy for the "repressed women". The book describes the world as it is and the power of the book forces an awareness of what is. It does not provide any analysis, explanations, or suggest alternatives.

The historical section of the Lace Ghetto is its most interesting. In it, the role of violence is discussed by Nellie Hall-Humpherson, a militant organizer for the Women's Social and Political Union (an English suffragist group). Even though she herself has smashed windows, was jailed et cetera she feels that she had a right to do so, because women then had no part in making the law. But — the interview reveals — she feels that women now have the vote so that they participate in some way in making laws, therefore women's liberation groups should not break any laws.

The pictures and statements from the 1900's show a marked similarity with pictures and advertisements in 1970's magazines. The Lace Ghetto provides a visual presentation of the fact that women's rights and social positions and roles have not substantially changed.

However, the appearance of these books is a strong indication that women are not prepared to tolerate their oppression much longer.

Women in love: frustration, pain, and rage

ISN'T IT FULFILLING TO BE IN LOVE?

She: I think he loves me.
Do you love me?
He: Yes, I love you.
You are beautiful.
She: I feel so good. He loves me.
I am worth something.
I feel so good.
I love him.
He: I love you but I have important things to do.
She: Talk to me, because I love you.
He: You are a good listener, but I have to read the newspaper.
She: (The newspaper is more important than I am.)
He: Your liberation is impossible without my liberation.
She: So what is important is I should strive for your liberation.
He: You're always trying to prove you're equal.
She: No, I'm always trying to remind you I'm equal.
You seem to forget.
He: You're very bright. How amusing!
She: You're very bright. I am impressed.
He: Does that mean you love me?
She: Sometimes I think I hate you.
He: You're castrating.
She: My psychiatrist calls it penis envy.
He: What's the matter with you?
She: I'm not sure. I'm always dissatisfied.
He: What do you want anyway?
She: A friend. Some intellectual stimulation.
He: I can give you stimulation.
She: I am not a sex object.
He: You can't take a joke.
She: You are a joke.
He: You're very hostile.
Your problems are of their own making.
What's the matter with me?
He: Let me tell you...
She: You always want to be on top.
He: That's where I belong.
She: Because you love me.
He: That's right.
She: But I'm despicable. What's the matter with you?
He: I like you in spite of yourself.
She: Thank you, thank you very much. I love you.
You're so kind.

FOR A SISTER

Finally the dishes are done,
Floor swept
Children bathed and put to bed.
At last there is time for coffee, cigarettes
And quiet talk between us.
(Woman stuff — the men would say).
Tonight you tell me how it was when you were young and single (as the saying goes) Describing parties, dances, love affairs
Your face alive and laughing

Until you rise, your body heavy with another child,
And I remember:
You are not yet twenty.

MY THINKING ABOUT RELIGION IS A MESS UP.

Farm's fresh air triumphs over Foul Play

Two new shows of some significance opened last week, Foul Play at Factory Theatre LeB and The Farm Show at Theatre Passe Muraille.

Foul Play admirably describes Lawrence Russell's play. It is chock full of dirt of various sorts, sexual perversion, weird fantasies and enthusiastically degenerate decadence. It is definitely an urban comedy, replete with those strange breaks one sees skulking around corners in the inner city. In fact, some of the five separate scenes that make up the play seem to be so shrouded in urban smog that their meaning becomes totally obscured.

In refreshing contrast to this urban blight stands The Farm Show, which, to dust off the hoary cliché, is a breath of fresh air.

The show is a collection of vignettes, skits and monologues about country life. The cast gathered their material during a summer's sojourn in the Clinton area of southwestern Ontario. The author, Paul Thompson, should actually be called an editor because all the dialogue consists of the words of the people of the region talking about their way of life.

The show could have been a rip-off of farm life by presenting only a superficial romanticized view gained from a short visit. Fortunately, editor Thompson seems to have been aware of that danger. In addition to the folksy barn dances and Orange Day parades, he provides sights of the other side of farming. He includes a sequence on the dreariness and enforced insularity of winter with people crawling around from box to box on the stage. The troupe also mimes a farm accident in which a man is killed while trying to repair a moving blinder.

The atmosphere surrounding the farms folk of Clinton is dignified, decent and much more desirable than that which cloaks the characters in Foul Play.

Two French-Canadian plays zero in on Quebec's despair

The Theatre du P'tit Bonheur started off an ambitious second season last Thursday night with two disturbing plays by Quebec playwright Jean Berbeau. Both Solange and Goglu bring us into the world of a lonely individual who finds no gratification in the reality of his milieu. Each main character is a misfit who has resorted to fantasy and illusion in order to survive. At critical moments, however, they cannot hide their misery and frustration. In the silence of a barren forest where we see a single park bench, we learn of their dreams and disappointments.

Louise Nolan gives a very engaging portrayal of Solange. In her monologue, she takes us, her imaginary listeners, through her past. We learn of the influence convent life has had on her, not only from the details given, but also from her wide-eyed girlishness. She is now a twenty-seven year old woman, who, despite her background, has encountered sexual perversion, censure, and rejection. The different aspects of Solange's character make us laugh at one time, and shock us at another. A profound sensitivity to the character's way of thinking adds to its dramatic potential.

In Goglu, we witness an exchange between a nervous, sexually frustrated young becheur, and his easygoing buddy, Godbout. As Goglu, Daniel Dayiva stresses a sense of feeling trapped by his hyperactive manner. The character tries to fill the space and silence around him, just as he tries to fill his inner emptiness with fantasies. He cannot pretend indefinitely that he is satisfied. As his emotional crisis intensifies, it stands out in relief beside the insensitive complacency of Godbout. The exchanges between the two friends have been well timed by director Jean Ven Currek. Less original and polished a performance than Solange, on the whole, Goglu still makes its point about loneliness.

The milieu described in the two plays is distinctly Quebecois. Those francophones attending will immediately notice the dialect and idioms used by French Canadians. There are numerous references to traditional pillars of Quebec society—its church, its rural attitudes, and its long-term rejection of the new and different.

Cartoon-like hero time-trips to war

Slaughterhouse Five lays grim Dresden holocaust to comic rest.

Billy Pilgrim, the hero of Slaughterhouse Five, is lying unconscious in a double hospital room in the late 1960s. He shares the room with a Harvard military historian who is visited by his young Redcliffe-student wife. The two of them are discussing the old hawk's recent book on the bombing of Dresden, and how publication was so long delayed by all the bleeding-heart liberals. Billy comes alert for the first time when he hears what they are talking about and says quietly, "I was there." This isn't heard, and the old man continues to praise the military operation. "I was there", Billy says again.

"What's he say?" asks the old hawk.

"He says he was there", his wife answers.

After a brief silence, the historian says, "Well, let him write his own book!"

The scene is like one of a rural friend of mine regularly creates by announcing in the presence of guests that there are too many people around. We all then pretend nothing was said, or nothing personal was meant, or anything that will side-step the obvious knives. It is Kurt Vonnegut's and screen-writer Stephen Geller's artistry that they parry with such elan; it is their allure that, like us, they have no idea what else to do.

So it goes with Slaughterhouse Five. It is such clever satire that one almost forgets that is all it is, that one mustn't look for passion, drama, heart or bells, because that is not the kind of show one has gone to. Think of Slaughterhouse in terms of Strangelove, not All Quiet on the Western Front.

Having said that, I am robbed of much of my copy, because character is not an element of satire, and I respond primarily to character. With the exception of Billy, everyone is a type, sometimes a very funny type, sometimes a dead horse type. And Billy, while he has a history, wears it in a way that invites little empathy.

Billy Pilgrim has seen the horror and it has turned him off like a faucet. He has an accepting, vaguely stunned manner, like a 1972 version of The Pawnbroker. The difference is (and perhaps it is a difference between the sixties and the seventies), it doesn't trouble him much, and therefore doesn't really trouble us all that much. At one point we share Billy's premonition of the imminent crash of his plane, but it doesn't raise goose bumps because Billy is essentially a cartoon (or at least a devotee of a philosophical sect so different from ours that he is like someone from space), and we all know that cartoon characters do not die.

So we can watch the scenes of bombed-out Dresden and not be horrified, which, if it seems like some kind of moral failure on the film's or on our part, is also a serious relief. (I write that having last night seen Deliverance which affected me not unlike bad stomach flu, and which I would recommend about the same way I would recommend sleeping with someone who has gonorrhoea.)

Enough nay-saying. You won't go wrong seeing

Billy Pilgrim scours ruins of fire-bombed Dresden for wartime mementos in Vonnegut's Slaughterhouse Five

Slaughterhouse Five. It provides more to think about than most current films. Traffemedorian philosophy (conceived by Vonnegut and proscribed to by Billy Pilgrim) makes as much sense as common knowledge does. Ondricek's photography visualizes the film's diffidence well. Glenn Gould's music adds, and the actors do what they are given to do. Director George Roy Hill (Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid) very deftly keeps the incredibly intricate plot from tripping over itself, which is no mean feat. And, some of the laughs are deep, healthy and uncomfortable, comedy laughs as opposed to gag (Woody Allen is a first-rate gag writer, Vonnegut writes comedy.) Slaughterhouse Five is really quite a good film. It's just that Nietzsche seemed to have it in mind when he wrote that a joke is the epitome of an emotion.

movies

A Fan's Notes has its premiere (and possibly only) engagement starting tonight at the International Cinema. One wants to say something nice about it, in part because Eric Till lives here, in part because his previous movies Hof Millions and The Walking Stick were pretty humane for their genres, and in part because a good comedy director has decided to really do something serious. Mainly, however, one wants A Fan's Notes to succeed because of the hassles and butchery the film has gone through in the three years since it was begun. Scenes cut by the studio distributor because they made the hero less sympathetic, that kind of thing.

So, one wants to say something nice, but I'm sorry, it is an awful movie, and not just because of studio censorship. You just can't fill all the extra and bit parts with starlets, you can't make nearly every scene an interior decorator's dream, you can't get away with satire, gibb dialogue, sharp focus technicolour, easy listening music and expect to say something about an alcoholic failure. I am not universally down on slick, big-screen serious pictures. In fact, I am a sucker for them. But it takes a juggler like Schlesinger or Losey to keep it all balanced, and though his intentions are admirable, Till is just not in that league. With Jerry Orbach and a very sympathetic performance by Patricia Collins. $2.50.

If... it struck me recently that I had not learned to hate until high school, and that my five years at N.T.C.I. had taught me rebellion. So I am a mark for it... I like the movie so much I make no pretence at being objective. I think that it must be a good film and that Lindsay Anderson deserves his reputation, and I am sure that he sees how limited, how reactionary, the film's vision is. But that is all defence. The fact is, that's me up on the roof giving it to the principal right in the middle of his status-quo, liberalizing forehead.

On the same bill is Zero de Conduite, Vigo's short 1933 film of a schoolboy rebellion, which I hear is even better than it... Showing Thursday, $1.50, at OISE, right in the belly of the beast.

Bezazlea. Dudley Moore as Faust in the guise of a London postman, asks Peter Cook as Satan, also dressed as a postman, to explain The Fall. Cook says he will demonstrate and hops up on a mailbox, assuming the role of God on His throne. "Now, dance around praising me", he says. Moore shuffles a bit singing, "You're great! You're terrific!", then stops. "Go on", orders Cook. "No", answers Moore, "I'm getting bored." "Exactly!", says Cook, jumping down off the mailbox. Roxy, Thursday, 99 c.

Eric Anderson is back at the Riverboat, 134 Yorkville (922-6216) until Sunday. Accompanying himself on guitar and occasionally piano, Anderson weaves a poetic web over an enthusiastic audience. His set on Tuesday included older material as well as songs from his new album Blue River. His compositions are gentle and thoughtful, with Blue River and Faithful being standouts that night. Viola's Dawn was an unexpected opening bonus that was smoothly and emotionally performed and brought back acres of good memories. It's probably be crowded so get there early. The Columbia album Blue River is well produced to the point of old-shoe-comfort. Piano and background vocals, especially on Round the Bend and the title song are perfect in every way. Peter Thom, a native Montrealer with an even, pleasant voice and an album on U.A. to prove it's also on the bill with Anderson. Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee will be featured October 3 thru 22.

The Canadian Opera Company faithfully continues its productions of "our favourite operas": Tosca at 2 pm Saturday and Siegfried that night at 8 pm sharp. Aida is on Monday night at 8:15, La Boheme, Sunday night, 8:15. Tosca (haven't I seen that name somewhere before?) on Wednesday evening, 8:15 and Aida Thursday evening, 8:15.

The Matro United Church is hosting their first "Chancel Concert" this Sunday at 8:30 pm at $1 for students. There's a Monday organ recital by Mel Cook at 8:30 pm at his favourite organ, $1 for students.

A reminder that October 2 is the date on which free reserved tickets for the October 21 concert of the U of T Symphony become available.

I am going to try to make mention of CBC-FM highlights here every week, as the best musical offerings in the city can often be had at 94.1 millihertz on your FM dial. CJRT also has ample classical selections, items like their recent "Bruno Weltar Legacy" being pure inspirations on someone's part. Actually, Allan Ludden is the program director and deserves a hefty pat on the back for his devotion to the airing of serious music.

On CBC, watch for the Atlantic Symphony's first concert next Friday, at 6:30. Saturday's New Records at 4:00 is one of the most enjoyable programs on the network and serves the purpose of a record column, but with audio accompaniment. Always, if you can, tune in to BBC Concert on Sundays at noon. The concerts feature name-brand orchestras, conductors and soloists who appear regularly in London. Bob Karr's Off the Record, weekdays at 11:00, is an absorbing, unpretentious but not uneducating hour of his own records — e mile and a half above Clyde Gilmour's cozy, docile my-favourite-tenor slummary and his card-index of records no longer in the catalogue.

Try to avoid Afternoon Concert, unless you can suffer the insufferable, stifling antics of the two prissy hosts, always neatly stepping on each other's toes and apologizing to no end and for no reason. They are the reigning Embarrassments of the CBC, but I don't think they know it. The problem is, the music is usually first-rate — for example, one current theme is Great Chamber Music and they have dared to play Bartok's third string quartet. Usually there has to be some audacious pretext to play things "radical".

Listen for the CBC Vancouver Chamber Orchestra with John Avlon. They are a masterful little group of musicians who know as well as some of the best chamber groups from Germany what they are doing when the play Haydn.

Queen's Golden Gaels' Doug Cozac became the all-time scoring leader at Queen's University last Saturday when he scored nine points. This gave him a career total of 156. This betters Queen's old scoring record held by Ron Stewart (145). However, Queen's University officials feel that there's a three point difference between the OUA and their own records. More to come when the matter's clarified... McMaster Marauders are in trouble. The team lost six players during the game last Saturday against Western, including their entire starting backfield. Outstanding running back Greg Higson suffered a broken leg, while quarterback Doug Finlay broke his collarbone. Both are out for the season. Andy Roy also left the game with bruised ribs... McMaster's football injuries will undoubtedly affect their play-off chances. Look for Lutheran to make a bid for a contending spot in the Western Section... In games this weekend, Carleton will play Ottawa, while in the west Western is at York tonight, Windsor visits Lutheran, and Waterloo travels to McMaster Saturday... More on the Inter-faculty Track Meet last Tuesday — The Rowell Memorial Cup (team championship award) moved from Scarborough to PHE, and the Cody Trophy, given to the individual with the most points, went to Eric Little of Scarborough... The U of T Sailing Club was narrowly defeated by a strong team from Queen's University in the Ontario Championships held here last weekend. The Kingston team won the event with 39 points, followed by Toronto with 43, while McMaster and Waterloo tied for third with 66 points each. The four best teams qualify for the Canadian Championships Thanksgiving weekend in Kingston. The Varsity team, chosen in a series of trials at Port Credit Yacht Club, consists of skippers Jim Schoenhardt in A division and Ian Brown in B. Crewing for Schoenhardt is Charlotte de Heinrich, while Brown's yeoman is Jay Nicholson. The team is considered to be strong, and should do well at the Canadians'... Recreational sailing will also be continued. For further information, call Bruce Buttmore at 483-9332 or Ian Brown at 924-0354... The weather affected the Interfaculty Tennis Tournament held Monday, but approximately 50 of the 64 entries showed. There is still time to enter the mixed doubles tournament which starts Monday at St. Hilda's. Information is available from the intramural office, room 106, Hart House. Matches begin Monday at noon. A basketball referees' clinic begins Tuesday at 7:15 pm at the Centennial Building (Keefe and Eglinton Avenue W.). The clinic will continue for four consecutive weeks, one night per week. Anyone interested in qualifying as an approved official for the 1972-73 season is invited to attend. Meetings are being conducted by the Metropolitan Toronto Board of Approved Basketball Officials. For further information, contact Ron Pleasance (293-4690 — nights) or Bob Little (459-3615 — nights)... An Olympic handball clinic will be held tomorrow from 10 am to 1 pm in the Benson Building gym. The clinic will include a demonstration of the game and a breakdown of the various skills and rules. The clinic is sponsored by the School of Physical and Health Education, the Men's and Women's Departments of Physical Education and Athletics and the Ontario Team Handball Federation... On the lighter side, despite carrying 12 engineers in their 18 foot bath tub, the LGMB (the Lady Godiva Memorial Band to the uninitiated) was unable to beat the U of T Outing Club's valiant canoe portagers in their intra-campus race last Friday.

Blues vs Gaels: a must game

The 1972 football season will be made or broken tomorrow when the Blues host Queen's Golden Gaels at Varsity Stadium. Kickoff is the usual 2:00 pm.

Gaels are in first place atop the OUA eastern division with consecutive victories over Carleton and Ottawa, while Blues are tied for second with a 1-1 record following last week's 14-6 win over Carleton.

The new playoff arrangement provides for a sudden death final between the first and second place teams; but if Blues lose tomorrow they will be 1-2 with only three games remaining. Varsity hopes would then rest on the unlikely possibility of winning all remaining games including Queens and Ottawa on the road.

Win-or-else situations involving Queen's have become almost second nature to coach Ron Murphy and his team since 1968. Each season has seen Varsity's title hopes crushed in the key game. Last year was perhaps one of the most painful as Blues blew a 16-point lead in Kingston and lost 28-25. The team then rebounded to beat Queens 31-29 in the final game of the schedule at home, but by then the playoff pairings had been decided and Blues were out.

As Blues prepare for Saturday's game, there are several parallels with the situation which confronted them a year ago. Varsity quarterback Wayne Dunkley is on the limp from painful rib injuries and Blues offence may have problems getting untracked.

On defence, Blues will need all the outstanding performances they got last weekend, since Queen's has demonstrated a powerful attack with all five starters returning from 1971. Gaels' leader Tom Taylor usually concentrates on runners Brian Warrender, Dave Hadden and Gord McClellan and can count on flanker Stu Lang for needed passing yardage.

Queen's also boasts an excellent two-way kicking game with their all-time scoring leader Doug Cozac handling punts, field goals and converts. McClellan and Lang have hurt Varsity badly in the past on punt returns, and Blues must be concerned about their somewhat erratic downfield tackling evident so far this year.

Varsity got excellent kicking last season from rookie Don Thomson until he was injured in Kingston. This time, Blues' strategy will depend on another rookie, Mike Sokovnin, or veteran Peter McNabb.

However, one key difference from the Varsity standpoint will likely be evident in game tactics. Last year Blues went with a shotgun in the two Queen's games and Dunkley completed a phenomenal 60 passes in 120 minutes of football. So far this year, Blues have concentrated on developing a running attack; in the victory over Carleton, Dunkley and rookie Steve Kerr attempted only 13 passes compared to 39 running plays.

The loss of sophomore flanker Barry Wagdin leaves Aarne Kartna as Varsity's only deep pass threat, but Blues have had some success going to tight ends Dave Quick and Esteban Andrewojewz.

If Blues experienced defensive unit can repeat their miracles of last weekend, Varsity could be in a three-way tie for first place after tomorrow's game. However, a loss could portend a very short football schedule before 1972 becomes another year to forget.

Interfac Football Opener: PHE routs Vic 8-0

Bruce Kennedy scores only touchdown in game Wednesday which saw PHE defeat Mulock champs Vic.

Competition for the Mulock Cup got underway this week, with Phys Ed downing defending champions Victoria College 8-0. In the second game of the interfaculty season Thursday, it was St. Michael's College 17, Engineering 6.

In the first football game of the interfac season, PHE won a largely defensive battle. During the first quarter, the Vic punt receiver was forced into his end-zone and tackled by Terry Nedoszytko for a 2 point safety touch.

Only four minutes into the second quarter Vic had the ball on its own twenty-five yard line when PHE defensive end Bruce Kennedy broke his tackle, intercepted a rushed pass and raced in for the game's only touchdown.

Viteo Sinopoli's convert attempt was blocked by Vic and the score remained 8-0 at the half.

In the third quarter the Vic squad missed a field goal attempt, and was stopped twice in the last three minutes of the game on the PHE 20 and 2 yard lines, respectively.

As the score indicated, both teams displayed rather ineffective offensive play, but countered with strong defensive work on the muddy back campus field.

Wednesday afternoon it was St. Mike's making a comeback to defeat Engineering, which had led 6-0 at the half.

The Skulemen kept the St. Mike's squad off the scoreboard until the second half when they ran up 17 points, mainly on two touchdown plays.

Klien and Hoo went for 6 each, while MacConnell added three on a field goal attempt. MacConnell and Desimini both added one point to bring the score to its final 17-6 total.

Next Week — There are four games in Division I next week beginning Monday, with PHE playing Eng. Other games have U.C. against New College, Tuesday, St. Mike's plays Vic Wednesday, Forestry meets Meds Thursday, and Trinity plays Scarborough out in the east end the same day. All games begin at 4 pm.

Blues look solid against Brock

Blues record second consecutive shutout

U of T Blues soccer team recorded their second shutout in as many games by defeating Brock University 5-0 Wednesday at Varsity Stadium.

The score indicates how one-sided the game actually was with the Blues dominating all but fifteen minutes of the game.

Bruno Bruni opened the scoring for the Blues five minutes into the game. Picking up a loose ball, he slammed a low shot that caught the inside of the post.

Mario Da Rosa then carried the pay, picking up the his first hat trick of the season. He fired in two rebounds from shots by Vince Ierullo and Ian Harris, then released a flying shot high into the corner of the net after a pass from Vito Polera.

Blues' scoring was completed in the second half when Polera sped down the left wing and around the Brock defence. He then passed to Vince Ierullo on right wing who just tapped the ball into the open net.

Brock only threatened in the first fifteen minutes of the second half. Playing most of their men on the attack, they were able to hem the Blues in their own end. Although Brock pressed in this period, Blues leftback, Bob Cazzola, upset the St. Catherine's team attack, preventing them from any consistent harassment of the Toronto goal.

Brock's only scoring chance came in the final minute of play. However, the Blues' crossbar stopped a long shot from just outside the penalty area from finding its mark.

Blues' goalkeeper Joe Dattico was untested in the first half, and the team's second-half goaltender, Bob Ho, was only called on once to make a save. He picked off the ball by diving at the feet of a Brock forward.

This year Blues team appears to be balanced in all positions. The forward line of Polera, Peter Hillier, Da Rosa and Vince Ierullo possesses great speed on the wings as well as strength up the centre.

Halfbacks Bruno Bruni, Tim Burns and Ian Harris have demonstrated skill in playing the ball out to the forwards even when under considerable pressure. With a 9-0 goals for and against record, the goalkeeping and defence of Bob Cazzola, Eugene Konarsky and Ed Cartes also speaks for itself.

Blue Chips — Vito Plera and Mario Da Rosa now lead the Blues (and the Western Section) with three goals each after two regular seasons games... In the Western Section last weekend two other teams earned shutouts, with Guelph defeating Laurentian 3-0 and Waterloo downing McMaster 2-0... As of Wednesday, Guelph, Toronto, and Waterloo were tied for first place in the west... In the Eastern Section York was out in front. In games in the east last weekend it was York 2, Queen's 0, Trent 1, Carleton 1, and Queen's 3, Ryerson 3... This weekend Ryerson is at Carleton and Trent plays at Queen's in the east, while Western is at Brock, Guelph travels to Waterloo, and Toronto heads to McMaster.

Merlo Da Rosa scores one of three goals as Blues win 5-0 Wednesday.

Student support for SAC campaign against high fees pleases Helliwell, Miglin

By MARK BOHNEN

SAC vice-president John Helliwell said Saturday that he was pleased with the extent of support shown by undergraduates for the first stage of the SAC campaign against higher tuition fees.

Helliwell, a key organizer of the campaign, based his opinion on statistics released last Friday by the U of T comptroller's office. 56.8 per cent of undergraduates (10,053 students) have paid their first instalment, a figure significantly higher than last year's, which was about 30 per cent.

Many professional faculties produced returns higher than 60 per cent opting for payment in two instalments as Child Study had 73 per cent, followed by Architecture (71), Rehabilitation Medicine (64) and Music (63).

Final figures from the federated colleges have not yet been announced. Of the arts colleges which have reported to date, Scarborough shows the highest proportion of students paying by instalments (60) while University College is the lowest at 47 per cent.

SAC president Eric Miglin, commenting on the figures, said that "there is no doubt that students paid attention to the letters from SAC and their local councils."

Letters were sent to all SAC fees-paying undergraduates in late summer to urge them to pay their fees in two instalments. This enables them to have the choice of withholding the second instalment to protest the government's action.

A SAC survey during the summer indicated that about 70 per cent of the undergraduates would withhold their second instalment, he said.

However many graduate students who hold scholarships are forced to pay their entire fees before registering according to the conditions of the scholarships.

A letter to vice-provost Robin Ross from the director of U of T's Office of Student Awards, Patrick Phillips, confirms that students paying in two instalments will be charged a penalty of $10 by the fees department, down from $12 last year. It adds that the late payment penalty, imposed after January 15, will be maintained at $15.

And, in the event that a fee strike does occur, the fees department will pay the second instalment of student awards to students entitled to them whether or not the second part of their fees have been paid. The decision was announced by vice-provost Robin Ross in a letter to Miglin. Previously the administration had required that the remainder of their awards be applied to their second instalment fees.

Students receiving OSAP money have signed a declaration promising "to use the proceeds of any award granted for payment only for educational and living costs directly related to his/her course of study... and further, agrees that first use of such proceeds will be to pay his academic fees."

However, the university does not act as a policeman for this regulation and a student could pocket the cheque if he or she is supporting a fee strike.

Harsh sentences imposed on three

Students guilty in Waterloo trespass trial

WATERLOO (CUP) Amid a flurry of conflicting evidence, three defendants charged with petty trespassing from the occupation of the University of Waterloo business office last March were all found guilty.

The sit-in was the result of a day of discussion and contemplation on the situation of the students within Ontario universities. In particular, attention focused on the then pending University of Waterloo Act and the Wright Commission interim report.

Found guilty at Waterloo provincial court Wednesday, September 27, were Chantal Tie-Ten-Quee, Michael Gertler and Edward Hughes. All received relatively harsh sentences considering the 'pettiness' of the offense. Reinhold Lade, the fourth person charged failed to show for the trial.

Tie-Ten-Quee was put on probation until September 1, 1973 and banned from any campus except for the use of the libraries of Sir George Williams and McGill in Montreal where she resides. Sentence was passed with the knowledge that Tie-Ten-Quee was not attending university this year, but will be returning in 1973.

Both Gertler and Hughes are still attending the University of Waterloo and for that reason, a fine of $100 plus court costs was imposed.

The pattern for the trials was basically similar, the Crown attempted to prove that the accused had no right to be in the business office, while the defence counsel argued that the students had a "fair and reasonable supposition that they had the right to be there."

At the beginning of the occupation students had moved into the office and had been told by the administration president Burt Mathews that he was willing to let them stay as long as they wished in order to avoid a confrontation with security. However, the following day as the staff returned to the offices, the security police arrested four of the remaining 30 demonstrators.

The question of possible acts of violence resulted in a discussion of the throwing of paper darts. A witness stated that he had seen Tie-Ten-Quee seated on a filing cabinet, toss "roughly one" of these lethal missiles, while the security officer who apprehended her stated he had seen "at least four or five" thrown over a period of ten minutes. There appeared to be no other violence committed on the officials present or upon university property.

A high point in the trial of Gertler came when he was asked in cross-examination whether he had ever participated in any previous demonstrations. Gertler cited the motorcades and other activities of political party campaigns, visibly unnerving the Crown attorney by the association between conventional politics and the tactics of 'sub-political' groups.

The bias of the court became apparent in the Crown attorney's questions as he labeled the demonstrators "hoodlums". When Gertler in the course of the trial was asked to identify a young lady as one of the business office secretaries, he was unable to do so definitely but noted that, she did look like a secretary. "She's clean and neat and tidy."

Shot Judge Kirkpatrick, "Is that how you tell a secretary from a student?"

In the sentencing of Tie-Ten-Quee, Kirkpatrick commented, "To guard our freedom we must insist that protest be done within the laws of democracy," and on these grounds and on the urging of the Crown counsel, the maximum fines were levied and a rather harsh probationary period imposed on one of the three defendants.

Engineering Society censures SAC for fees strike stand

Engineers attacked Miglin's stand on strike.

The Engineering Society executive unanimously passed a motion, Thursday night seconded by SAC president Eric Miglin's brother Sven, censuring SAC for its stand on the fees strike. The executive felt that it was improper for the SAC to take a stand supporting a fee strike before the referendum occurred.

The motion stated that "the secretary send a letter from the executive to the SAC censuring them for taking a stand on the fees strike and for not searching more extensively for alternatives to a fees strike. This executive feels this is a decision that each student should make for himself."

"This was not a motion of censure or condemnation," said Engineering Society president Scott Jolliffe. "We were not happy with the SAC motion (which supported a strike), and had decided last week, at an engineering executive meeting, that we would not take a stand until getting the results of the referendum, in order to represent the students' decision." He added, "as a representative body, the SAC has no right to take a stand."

In response to the motion SAC president Miglin, himself an engineer, reaffirmed that it was SAC's duty to take a stand on this issue in order to gain as strong support as possible.

Harding's carpet profits double

Harding Carpets Limited of Brantford reported profits more than doubled in the nine month period ending last July 31, to $1,691,516. Sales rose 22 per cent, to nearly $29 million.

C. Malim Harding, chairman of the U of T's Governing Council, is the chief executive officer of the company which is Canada's largest carpet manufacturer.

Profit per share over the nine month period rose to $1.02 per share. Analysts say the year's profit will likely meet the projected $1.40 per share.

Harding Carpet "A" shares closed Friday at $23.125, close to the high for the year of $24.50. Following tax concessions made to corporations in the last federal budget, the company has revised to two million dollars from $1.7 million its intended capital expenditures.

In spite of its seemingly sound position, the continued growth of the company seems uncertain.

Lower corporate income tax rates, effective at the beginning of next year, will be an aid to Harding in its next fiscal year when sales are expected to remain buoyant. However, the three per cent personal income tax surcharge, to be reimposed next January 1, is expected to have some inhibiting effect on consumer spending.

Puerto Rican held for nearly a year

Pagan allowed to consult Montreal lawyer

Pagan speaks here at B tonight.

OTTAWA (CUP) Puerto Rican Independentist Humberto Pagan has finally been given permission to consult his new lawyer, Bernard Mergler, in Montreal.

The Immigration Department granted approval yesterday following threats Pagan would go anyway, thus possibly causing some embarrassment if he were arrested once in Montreal.

Since Pagan's former lawyer, Clayton Ruby, is now studying law in Berkeley California, Mergler had to talk to Pagan about the appeal hearing on his deportation to be held before the supreme court in Ottawa tomorrow.

Pagan was arrested in Ottawa nearly a year ago on a charge of killing San Juan riot chief Juan Mercado during a riot at the University of Puerto Rico on March 11, 1971.

Humberto Pagan will be speaking tonight at 8 pm in the Hart House Debates Room.

Since then, both his extradition and deportation hearings have been stalled and taken months to complete. The extradition hearing judge decided Pagan should be sent out of Canada, but the deportation hearing hit a snag.

American authorities have tried to obtain permission to deport the student to Puerto Rico, but in a precedent-making decision June 27, Carleton court judge A. E. Honeywell refused the application. This is the first time a Canadian judge has refused an American deportation request.

Honeywell virtually said he did not believe witnesses who said they saw Pagan shoot the riot chief. Since there was not enough evidence to bind him over for trial in this country, then he should not have to stand trial in Puerto Rico, Honeywell said, and therefore he should not be deported.

Shortly after that the supporter of Independence for Puerto Rico was freed on $3000 bail, but has not been allowed to travel outside Ontario under terms of that bail. Hence the problem seeing Mergler who could not take time off his work to visit his client here.

In an unusual move, the counsel for the U.S. appealed Honeywell's decision to the federal court (formerly the Exchequer Court) on August 3 but was turned down. He based the appeal on the grounds that this was "a case of extraordinary importance".

The hearing tomorrow will merely be held to determine if the supreme court will allow the appeal to be heard in the lower court. The same arguments are again being used by the Americans.

Mergler would only say today he thought the Americans had no grounds on which to launch an appeal.

If the supreme court denies the American request Tuesday, Pagan should then be free to leave Canada for the country of his choice.

Cuba, Chile and Algeria have said they would accept him. If the court decides to allow the appeal, Pagan could be in Canada for up to another year, waiting for the hearing to take place.

Administration lends helping hand

Hold fees referendum in class time

SAC's campaign against higher fees strike has received significant, though formal, support from the U of T administration.

Simcoe Hall assisted in producing a mailing list so that SAC could mail out letters to all undergraduates asking them to pay their fees in two installments. Then it allowed SAC to put information tables in the St. George Drill hall, where many students paid their fees.

As well, the university said that if it would not lose any money, it would lower the penalty for paying in two installments. Last week Simcoe Hall confirmed the late fee would be two dollars less than last year, since added income from a higher proportion of students paying in two installments made up the difference.

Now that the Ontario Federation of Students referendum on a fees strike, which involves withholding second term fees instalments, is coming up next week, the administration is still cooperating, although without violating any agreement with the government.

Vice-president Robin Ross said last week that Ontario Student Award Program cheques would be distributed outright to students who would be participating in the strike. Previously, the money was only given to the student for the purpose of paying fees.

SAC's plans to co-ordinate an intensive educational and information campaign prior to the referendum received another boost last week in a letter from vice-president Don Forster to principals, deans, and directors throughout the university.

SAC wanted to set up a system of student speakers to cover all classrooms for about five minutes this week. Forster formally requested all teaching staff "to cooperate with the speakers sent by the Students' Administrative Council and allow them between five and ten minutes of classroom time to address classes."

Forster also invited the teaching staff to participate in a SAC-sponsored forum on the increase in tuition fees and the OSAP loan ceiling scheduled for Tuesday October 10 at 1 pm in Convocation Hall.

Miglin hopes that newly appointed Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNie will attend the October 10 forum. President Evans, Liberal MPP Jim Bullbrook and former NDP education critic Walter Pitman have already accepted invitations to speak.

"It will probably be McNie's first official speech as minister, so we hope he will come," Miglin said yesterday.

Government officials have so far refused to participate in either of this week's scheduled forums featuring NDP education specialist Floyd Laughren on Wednesday and Liberal leader Robert Nixon Thursday. Both will be held at 1 pm in Convocation Hall.

Simcoe Hall has also agreed to allow balloting to take place in classrooms when the referendum occurs on the 11th and 12th of October, he added.

SAC voted last week to endorse the call for a fee-strike on the Toronto campus, pending results of the referendum.

Kanowitch runs against Hallett; charges committee 'rubber stamp'

Former SAC cultural affairs commissioner Seymour Kanowitch last night announced that he would challenge UC principal Archie Hallett for the position of vice-president of the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science at its meeting this afternoon.

In doing so, he charged that the striking committee, which recommended two of its own members as candidates (including Hallett) was merely attempting to "rubber stamp their selection of themselves."

He called the striking committee "perfect example of senior faculty seeking to perpetuate their own strangle hold on the General Committee."

The striking committee nominated only two students, one of them SAC Services commissioner Bill Steadman, both for the minor positions of proctor.

Innis student Briane Nasimok intends to run against these two and the third nominee for one of the positions.

Kanowitch also charged that many of the student members of the committee did not receive proper notification of today's meeting

Labour unions pick day care rep

By BARBARA SHENSTONE

Labour unions at the U of T are to decide among themselves who is to represent them on the controversial Day Care Advisory Committee. There had been earlier administrative difficulties about the method of selection of the unions' representative.

There are nine labour unions at the U of T, of which the Canadian Union of Public Employees and the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) are the two largest.

The unions will not be permitted complete freedom in choosing their own representative, according to Governing Council Internal Affairs Committee chairman Paul Cadario. Their choice must not be a business agent of a union, he says, but "an employee of the university."

Internal Affairs recommended the university's day care policy, and is overseeing its implementation.

The chosen representative would be one of seven representatives of all the constituencies of the university on the Day Care Advisory Committee. The committee has the power to run a volunteer aid program, decide on admissions, and advise the university on how to run the centre.

The other constituencies asked to participate on the committee are SAC, the GSU, The Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students APUS, U of T Staff Association, U of T Faculty Association, and the Internal Affairs Committee. There will be seven parents on the committee as well.

The GSU executive has decided not to appoint a representative to the committee, said executive assistant Larry Hofman yesterday, although the policy is under review.

The GSU agreed with the Day Care Board set up last spring by the administration that separate facilities should be set up for separate groups.

On the other hand, Campus Co-op Day Care, which has consistently fought the administration's policy and is still occupying a formerly unused university building, has decided to accept its two seats on the committee.

It's mainly a matter of expediency, explained Co-op spokeswoman Julie Mathien last night.

"While we don't agree that the committee should run university day care", because it forces different groups together, "its decisions may affect us", she said.

Faculty association to champion cause of marxist

The Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations, (OCUFA) has decided to champion the cause of Professor Istvan Meszaros' who was hired by York University but refused Canadian landed immigrant status for "security reasons".

The explanation of immigration officials in London, that Meszaros' entry was not "in the best interests of the country", was sufficient to satisfy neither Meszaros nor OCUFA.

As a result, to support the eminent marxist scholar, a telegram was sent to Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and Manpower and Immigration Minister Bryce Mackasey on Friday, criticizing "the actions of the Canadian government in failing to provide any acceptable reasons for its dismissal refusal to grant landed immigrant status to professor Meszaros."

After waiting 26 weeks in England for a reply to an appeal of his status, Meszaros decided to come to Canada as a visitor to fight his case openly and strongly.

Since his recent arrival, pressure has built up on the federal government to allow him to teach. Support from for the anti-Stalinist Hungarian marxist has come from not only York University administration and students, but also from prominent faculty at both York and U of T.

OCUFA, which represents university teachers across Ontario, has called for a full investigation.

Library trials Wednesday

The trials of two more persons arrested in the police break-up in the occupation of Simcoe Hall last spring come up on Wednesday morning.

The trial of Bill Getty, charged with assaulting police, is expected to come up first, while Tom McLaughlin's trial on a charge of obstructing police is also slated for Wednesday.

The two are encouraging supporters of open stacks in the new Roberts Library to attend their trials, which will start at 10 am in courtroom 33, Old City Hall.

Campus Co-op upset writers, LGMB didn't

It has been rumoured that the demonstration of the LADY GODIVA MEMORIAL BAND at Dr. Evans' Inauguration was childish and irrelevant. To silence, once and for all, these vicious slanders, we present.....

THE SECRET SYMBOLISM OF THE LADY GODIVA MEMORIAL BAND (MARXIST-LENINIST)

Thursday's day care demonstration at the installation of president John Evans sent pens quivering in U of T land. Five SAC reps, including the chairman of the Governing Council committee which recommended the university's inadequate day care policy, were sufficiently upset by the spectacle, a small but vociferous group protesting their grievance, that they wrote The Varsity (see the opposite page for the text of their letter) to condemn vehemently the action. (They took pen in hand not as SAC reps, but as members of the university community.)

It's understandable why student governor Paul Cadario would like public criticism of his committee's policy kept out of the limelight. But, it's more disconcerting that four other students, active in campus and all members of the SAC executive politics should have allowed themselves to share his rationalization for attacking the protestors.

The live would have preferred the day care people to have blended into the background and not bothered the assembled guests with the plight of Campus Co-operative Day Care Centre Number 2 or any other socially relevant topic. They were there for the coronation of the new president and felt that for these few minutes the world should stop.

Embarrassing problems, so the liberal credo goes, should not impose themselves upon us. They should fade away as if they never existed at all.

To do otherwise, as the persons demonstrating in support of their principles did Thursday, is to breach the accepted social etiquette surrounding official university functions. And, this is never to be accepted by people like the letter writers.

Dregging the red herring about supposedly exploiting "forced (child) participants" into their letter, the five further reveal the shallowness of their position. Taking children for an afternoon stroll (i.e. the demonstration) can't be seriously called detrimental.

Besides, the children are at the very core of the dispute and should be present. Perhaps, the letter writers would have felt more at ease in ignoring the children's plight if they hadn't been present at the installation.

Apparently less irritating to the five was the 1950's college style humour of the Engineering Society's Lady Godiva Memorial Band which delayed the official recessional for at least 10 minutes. (The day care demonstrators, by contrast, while forcing the platform speakers to raise their voices did not impede the progress of the program.)

That the LGMB performance was apparently pre-arranged with Simcoe Hall is not surprising. Aside from poking irreverent fun at the president and the premier of Ontario, the "demonstration" was designed to be politically irrelevant.

But, its creators failed in that aim. Part of the performance satirized The Godfather movie, mimicking an Italian immigrant's accent and suggesting that Italians and the Mafia are one.

That's the type of racist humour in which many from other ethnic backgrounds may unintentionally indulge. And, we would not go as far as to suggest that the engineers meant to be particularly anti-Italian by including the skit.

But, the whole complexion of the matter changes when despite adverse audience reaction protesting the racist nature of the satire, the engineers continued their performance. Some of their number, in fact, responded to legitimate criticism by threatening to pummel their critics.

All the while, the platform guests and assembled masses ignored the objections, grinning broadly as they continued to leop up the cheap humour.

That the letter writers found no cause to criticize this performance perhaps reveals their insincerity when they talk about "principles involved" and just ceases. What they really desire is a return to the irrelevant days of yore, in which the university detached itself from society and its problems and housed itself in "Ivory towers".

The university's social problems demand just solutions. And, when these solutions are denied as in the day care case, the plaintiffs have cause and, in fact, the duty to continue to advance their struggle in every possible political arena. They days when the university's internal political problems can be swept under the carpet are gone never, hopefully, to return.

OFFICE-VARSITY

Don't like Co-op Day Care tactics

The day care demonstration during the installation of the president Thursday is just the latest in the theatrical antics which have dominated the day-care issue on campus. The justice of their cause increasing accessibility of women to the facilities of the university, and providing a needed service for students and low-paid university employees is not aided by the shameless exploitation exhibited by recent protests. The "adults" involved in this issue are hiding behind their children in the promotion of their cause; they drag them to every possible location on campus to set up temporary day-care centres. While the Campus Co-op parents have insisted that any move from their present quarters will unnecessarily and harmfully upset their children, surely their cross-campus performances 'with babies' are as detrimental to their children as are the other events surrounding their activities the "constant fear" of eviction and the alleged "recalcitrance" of university officials. Only when the issue is fought on the basis of the principles involved, and not on the cheap theatrics of a travelling show with innocent, forced participants, can Campus Co-op hope for their "reasonable (for them) settlement".

Letter writers disapproved of day care demonstrators' presence at president Evens' Installation Thursday afternoon.

Maybe capitalistic, sports not sexual

This letter is in response to John McMurtry's analysis of football from a political, alternative viewpoint, published in The Varsity on September 20th.

The analogy of the football system, with regards to regulation of play and to the ideological aspects of performance, to that of the development of capitalist interest and political theory appears to be an excellent analysis. This opinion was reached only after I had managed to negate myself from any form of sociological determinants that would have influenced a biased tendency towards the socially acceptable premise. Instead, I realized that an abstract philosophical approach was required in order to understand, as well as accept the fact that football has been used as a means of developing 'socio-political conformity in American learning institutions and in the people as a whole'.

Its development as a sport for the masses follows both the capitalistic overtones of big business both on and off the field as well as the projection of a large segment of society's need to experience self-identification with the struggle that is ensuing on the field of battle. In itself, there is a feeling of accomplishment akin to that struggle felt in the tackling, blocking, and competitive nature of the capitalist machine.

However liberal I might have been in accepting your references to football as a capitalistic political expression of a sociologically sick society, I can't help but feel you've overstated your case with the reference to suppressed sexuality being expressed in concealed forms. Here sport, both professional and amateur, would suffer from such an encompassing generalization for who could now deny the obvious implications of a 'hole in one' or a 'birdie' in golf; a 'lay-up' shot in basketball; the maul in rugby; the rhythm of sculling.

The hierarchy of the football club is undoubtedly a reflection of the political and financial control that operate in the interests of capitalistic competition. As a result, 'he who pays the piper, calls the tune' which invariably leads to the conclusion that if you don't want to play by the rules don't play. Competition sets itself out as performance of one entity against another, to which the rules of sport do not totally apply. This level of sport is a business whereby the joy of effort is made more joyful by winning.

Health Service is only luxury

I wonder how many of us realize that we are all being taxed $10 a year to provide a luxury service for the privileged few who use it.

The university Health Service has no advantage over the governmental OHIC plan except that medical attention is available without the appointment most doctors require.

By the way, in case anyone didn't know it, OHIC is free to anyone over 21 who had no taxable income last year. So, if you can, go get it.

Perhaps the Health Service was necessary back in the dark days of private insurance, but today it remains as an anachronism which itself needs the immediate attention it offers the student.

Let the Health Service pay its own way through OHIC like any other clinic and not continue its charmed survival on the dollars arbitrarily siphoned from we starving students.

Evans: image politics at top

By ALEX PODNICK

Amid the pomp and ceremony befitting the regal event John Robert Evans Thursday afternoon became the ninth president of the University of Toronto.

The man who only months earlier had seemed completely lost when asked to comment about major problems facing U of T ("I'm not really very familiar" with the issues was his usual rejoinder the night his appointment was announced), has swiftly and smoothly moved in to decisively take over the reigns of Simcoe Hall.

Evans had resisted the appointment, reputedly only agreeing to accept the presidency when his former U of T football buddy, Ontario premier William Davis, personally intervened and asked Evans to accept the position.

Talking in his cosy yet unostentatious second floor Simcoe Hall office early one morning last month, Evans told the Varsity, "I'm still amazed at the size of the institution. The size is much greater than the numbers would suggest. It's all the different packages, groups, units, all these elements which give an understanding of what they mean."

That's the familiar refrain one hears from Evans, his constant awe at the size of the institution. While that may well be the case, he hasn't been shy about shaking up the Simcoe Hall bureaucracy and aggrandizing more and more power unto himself.

He tries, effectively, to camouflage his takeover behind a cool, indifferent facade as when he pretends to canvass student and faculty opinion on the various issues confronting the university and refuses to commit himself publicly on any almost any issue.

Evans' office has been the site of innumerable, precedent-setting meetings with the "little people" who make up the university. He seems to grant interviews to anyone who calls up and asks for one.

Evans maintains an incredibly low profile in not committing himself to positions, trying to dazzle his listeners with his style rather than by engaging in detailed debate.

Cool and cagey, Evans skillfully avoids giving himself away by working in quiet, yet effective ways in the backrooms of Simcoe Hall.

And, by presenting what should in fact be policy proposals as informational details and thereby creating the illusion that he has power he doesn't really épsess. Evans solidifies his empire.

Some members of the Governing Council's Academic Affairs Committee were more than a little annoyed when Evans dropped in to the committee's first meeting to tell them that he had decided to appoint a presidential advisory committee on the New Program rather than seeking the committee's approval for his move. (The Arts and science Faculty Council had voted to request the committee's establishment, but the structure of the Governing Council seemed to suggest that such a committee should really be established by its appropriate committee.)

Image has been the key word with Evans. Always going out of his way to praise the university's new Governing Council, Evans slyly reserves for the administration major powers.

"I really think it's (the Governing Council) done a good job of trying to organize itself to do something other than study process," he told The Varsity. His inaugural address also lauded the council.

For your own personal pin-up, turn the page. It's free for the taking.

Varsity photos by David Lloyd.

"I see the Governing Council as the body responsible for major matters of policy in the university, particularly in the area of broad controversy. I see the administration as responsible for implementing the policies that are established by the Governing Council. I see things like committees in different areas, like say in the library area, as responsible for the sub-policy issues within the major policy established. And, I see the administration within the library area (for example) as responsible for implementing those sub-policies," he added later.

The size of the problem determines whether an issue is a major or minor issue, he continued. "There's always latitude and interpretation and so on," he cautioned, warning to his subject.

Evans described his job as making "sure that we don't get a situation where the Governing Council is pitted against the administration. That won't do the Governing Council any good and certainly will be suicide for the administration to get into that situation."

Although Evans has seldom revealed his own stance in public meetings, he asserted that the president "shouldn't hide behind anonymity" in making his views known.

Covering all bases, he noted that it would be wrong to construe Governing Council decisions going against his views as being votes of non-confidence. "We shouldn't expect them (our views) to be carried," he declared, "... this is not my university."

Evans surprised some Thursday when he publicly chastized the premier of Ontario for the government's failure to subsidize federated colleges at the same level as university colleges and for its tuition fees hike last spring.

But, in retrospect, it wasn't all that daring a move. First, the positions advanced were not particularly radical and are probably shared by his colleagues across the province. And secondly, the brashness of openly admonishing the premier can be risked when you're on a first — name basis with him. Nonetheless, the manoeuvre had the desired effect: making his audience believe that Evans had taken a particularly adventurous and progressive position.

Discussing Governing Council policies, Evans said, "We have to make these policies work once we've adopted them."

Still, he had his qualifying clause. "I don't think that any issue is ever settled." "I think that you make a judgment at a point in time and I don't think that it's a victory or a defeat six months later that your judgment no longer fits the situation because I think the experience and the attitudes change in the interval."

He was answering questions relating to disposition of the John Roberts Library stacks access question, pointing out that the matter will be reviewed by the Governing Council's Academic Affairs Committee this fall.

"I don't think anything has been finally settled. I'm sure that the experience (of last year's debates and occupations over the library issue) will influence decisions. I don't mean in an exclusively negative way."

"I would state," he continued, "that whatever decisions are made this fall about the library still won't be the final decisions; that when one gets into the place, into the building, and one has experiences with it, one will make different types of decisions. These will be based on new force fields outside and inside the library."

Pressed about the type of "impartial" recommendations that can come out of a committee headed by one of the chief conservative spokesmen against unrestricted access in last winter's Senate debate, classics professor R. M. H. Shepherd, Evans opined, "We should be prepared to accept that no one can be 100 per cent objective."

As for his hypothesis that changing circumstances and experiences can influence the Governing Council to alter its policies, Evans, who reportedly harboured a distinct preference for the parent-controlled day care model, has told associates that he doesn't believe the council's official limited parent input model will work.

In practice, he advised them, the university won't be able to run the adopted model effectively and the parent-controlled model would end up being the reality.

The day care issue may have represented Evans' first major defeat on a policy matter. Although he had restricted himself to the low profile role of summing up all the possible shortcomings of the university-administered centre at the council meeting, he had confided to the people responsible for working out the accepted proposal with the Internal Affairs Committee that he preferred the parent-controlled model.

Yet, just days before the council was to ratify the university-run model, Evans told The Varsity that the university's Day Care Advisory Board's recommendation in favour of the continued existence of the St. Andrew's and Campus Co-op day care centres would not be "as easy to carry out in practice as it sounds in theory".

Apparently brushing off the strong opposition of Campus Co-operative Day Care to the proposed university-administered centre, he said, "I would be surprised if every major group would be satisfied" with Governing Council policy. "It doesn't mean," he continued, "that the policy of either day care centre is wrong."

Evans has worked hard to keep his image untarnished, probably suitably impressed by the alacrity with which last year's acting president Jack Sword got himself in hot water by overreacting to issues.

As campus conservatives press for police action to evict the Campus Co-op Day Care Centre Number 2 residents from their illegally occupied home, Evans shies away from responsibility for taking action.

Totally non-committal on the matter publicly, he appears certain to avoid calling police himself, instead leaving that move to the Governing Council so that he can avoid responsibility for the action should it feel the need.

Evans has refused to commit himself to his predecessor's guidelines for necessary consultation before calling police onto campus to deal with an internal matter. Following Sword's debacle in calling police to end the March 12 Senate Chambers occupation, Sword agreed that all concerned parties should be consulted and warned before police were called on campus.

In his Varsity interview, Evans would not accept the Sword policy as binding. Discipline, he stated, would be reviewed by the Internal Affairs Committee. But, surely there must be some interim policy, he was asked.

Yes, he did have some interim ideas, but he would go no further than point out that it wouldn't practically be possible, in his opinion, to consult all parties before summoning police as new groups were constantly creating themselves in such a situation and it would be impossible to cover all bases and know which to consult.

(Sword's policy had dealt with this possibility, calling for him to consult student government leaders.) While Evans' strategy may be working in the university generally, it's reportedly having less success within the walls of Simcoe Hall. Giving the image of delegating authority to his subordinates, Evans has apparently kept them well in line, checking any unfavoured ambitions, and throwing the administration into disarray by shifting personnel and offices. For instance, most top administrators' titles and some responsibilities were changed over the summer.

Often viewing others with disdain, Evans has the habit of turning up unexpectedly at various meetings at which his subordinates should be taking charge. Nobody talks about his usurping their power, but the malaise permeates the building, especially at lower and middle levels of the bureaucracy.

Constantly checking up on top level correspondence, Evans has also sent shivers through the lower echelons, atomizing their legions. A clear, unmistakable knowledge of the hierarchy has been burned into their consciousness. Simcoe Hall, never the best of places to work, has become even less tolerable for its employees.

Behind the image of "Mr. Nice Guy" lies the dilettante of Simcoe Hall, cast much in the mould of Pierre Trudeau: the same apparent supposed pragmatism and logic, the same aura of charisma, and the same grasp of real power, power that will not easily be given up.

U of T embarrassed by 'corporate nature'

Connaught Labs sale to CDC closed Friday

By ERIC MILLS

As of Friday, the University of Toronto became $26 million richer and a medical research division poorer when it sold the Connaught Laboratories to the Canada Development Corporation.

U of T's former Board of Governors' intention to sell the Connaught Medical Research Laboratories, part of U of T since its inception as the Antitoxin Laboratory in 1914, was first announced last May by its chairman William Hennis.

Under the terms of agreement released at that time, research in both human and animal disease will continue to be an important function of Connaught. Production of manufactured biological products will be continued, perhaps on an increased scale, under the profit-oriented CDC.

Connaught has been described as "a major commercial operation" engaged in the development, manufacture, and sale of biological products. Named Connaught under the terms of a grant from Colonel Albert Gooderham in 1917, the labs grew to do major work in the fields of diphtheria, smallpox, tetanus, whooping cough, and other diseases. It is perhaps best known as a major producer of insulin.

The CDC, in its first purchase since its creation in 1971, acquires 165 acres of land at the main Dufferin division and 500 acres at a Bolton farm, including over 90 buildings. Connaught now uses only a small part of its familiar building on Spadina Crescent.

In a press release announcing the sale, vice-president business affairs Alex Rankin stated as one reason for the sale, "The university will be unable to supply much needed capital for the improvement of manufacturing facilities and for the desired acquisition of allied operations." He added that the CDC proposal "appears to offer the most promising solution to the future growth and stability of Connaught."

Connaught director Dr. Robert Wilson told The Varsity that the labs wanted to be able to borrow money, in quantities which its profits, which have financed all expansion since near the beginning of the labs, could not generate. The CDC is preparing to invest more money, he said.

Woman work at packaging drugs, which along with manufacturing, is a dominant activity.

According to Hennis, reports that the CDC is willing to invest $10 million are "more or less accurate."

However, it seems the main reason for the sale was that U of T was embarrassed by this division of the university that in many respects acted like a business-oriented corporation.

"It had to be salt-supporting from the beginning," said Wilson, thus creating a strong incentive to make profits.

According to Rankin, Connaught is "primarily a manufacturing and packaging" operation, although much research is always going on. Former chairman Hennis explained the Board "didn't feel the university should be actively engaged in business."

At the same time, the university said it was also embarrassed because as an aggressive sale corporation, under the U of T, Connaught was not subject to property or income taxes. Thus, it had an unfair advantage in competing with commercial firms. The Board felt that under taxable ownership, Connaught "could compete more aggressively."

The Board had been looking for a buyer for some time when the CDC indicated interest last spring, added Hennis. Conscious of both its end Connaught's public reputation, the Board wanted a benevolent buyer who would continue the public service aspects of the labs' operation, including research, relatively cheap production of drugs, and Canadian ownership.

Indeed, one of the stipulations of the agreement is that Connaught "will always remain under the control of Canadians". Another "guarantees the continuation of the present role of Connaught in the field of public health," according to the Mey press release.

Where will the $26 million from the sale go?

It hasn't been decided yet, vice-president Rankin said on the weekend. "It will probably go into a trust fund" under the direction of the Governing Council. He refused to state what he would recommend it be used for.

Along with the sale price, a trust fund built up by past profits of Connaught will remain with U of T. The amounts of neither the fund nor Connaught's normal profits could be determined, as financial data of the labs has never been published in the U of T's president's annual report, even as part of the overall university statement.

Rankin indicated that the reason for this is the U of T's dislike of being thought of as a financial giant, when compared to other universities.

Wilson said he hopes the fund will be used as in the past, mainly for research. Its former function of providing expansion money will, of course, be discontinued.

The Board believed the sale to the CDC "would ensure the continuation of close collaboration with the university". The primary means of collaboration will be in the research and teaching fields. U of T will benefit by the continuation of cross-appointments of research personnel as teachers.

There are about six researchers at Connaught at the present who teach at the university, said Wilson. Although the university only pays them a token salary, about $500, he believes the CDC is willing to subsidize teaching.

Rankin believes that the Canada Development Corporation, although by its charter committed to investing to make profits, will continue this practice. Advantages to the corporation of "close collaboration" include access to the university's library.

The staff of the labs, which has numbered between 750 and 900 since 1945, is expected to remain at its present level of about 800.

Connaught has been primarily located at its Dufferin division, with 165 acres, for several years.

Turn in a pusher program comes to Toronto

"It does my heart good, son, to see you stone drunk rather than hopped up on grass."

By STEVE SHARATT

Turn In a Pusher (TIP), a London, Ontario organization set up to receive anonymous phone calls regarding drug pushers and pass the information along to the police, has begun to encourage calls from Toronto area residents.

TIP was created about six months ago by a group of business, civic and religious leaders in London to combat the traffic of hard drugs, especially heroin, in the area.

According to an advertisement placed in newspapers, the program is being extended to Toronto on an experimental basis. To turn in a pusher, Toronto residents will have to call a London number, paying the long distance tariff themselves. The caller need not identify himself as code names will be assigned.

The information will then be passed on to local police and, if it leads to the conviction of a pusher, the caller may receive a reward up to $500.

The results of the program so far have been somewhat less than spectacular. In its six months of operation TIP has received about 200 leads, according to spokesman Colin Brown, but these have only led to eight arrests.

He admitted the majority of those arrested have not been heroin pushers but rather dealers in amphetamines and hallucinogens. No convictions have yet resulted from TIP leads and organizers admit that the program has not dried up the supply of hard drugs in the city.

According to Dr. Mario Faveri, chairman of the London Board of Education's task force on drugs, TIP's activities have had the result of inhibiting the work of drug treatment programs in London by escalating the level of fear and mistrust among the area's drug users. Faveri explained young people are now reluctant to contact his organization for fear that information given to task force workers will be passed on to the police.

Official reaction to TIP has been markedly cool. Although Metro police have agreed to look at TIP leads they have refused to give the program official endorsement.

In addition, police and RCMP in the Calgary area have voiced serious reservations about a proposed TIP operation in that city. After studying the results of the London operation, these agencies have concluded that TIP would show very poor returns for the amount of work required for its implementation.

Calgary's Drug Information Centre has also opposed the program, charging that TIP could only have an adverse effect on drug rehabilitation activities in the city by eroding the trust on which this work depends.

Enrolment figures at St. George exceed last year's predictions

By DIANA WEST

While registration is down in fourth year arts and science, first year and overall enrolments on the St. George campus are well above figures projected last year for December 1, 1972.

In a statement released last week, the faculty of Arts and Science said total registration of 9502, as of September 22, exceeds the projected figure by 250. When the figures from Scarborough and Erindale are added, the total arts and science enrolment for the whole university is 14,000.

First year St. George registration is up 400 from the projected figure of 3100, although the number of students in first year arts and science may drop by December.

Fourth year arts and science enrolment, however, is 275 below the projected figure of 1530.

University College registrar L. W. Fergusson commented that the government has been asking for the projected registration figures "earlier and earlier" each year so that they are becoming increasingly less valid. "It's almost," he remarked, "like pulling a number out of a hat."

This year's figures were projected even before they had the final figures from the previous year. Accordingly, the faculty did not know the number of students eligible to go on to second, third and fourth year.

Fergusson explained the drop in fourth year enrolment by the fact that the number of students leaving in second and third year arts and science to join faculties such as medicine and law is increasing greatly. This gap left in the arts and science registration is not being filled by the number of students transferring to the University of Toronto from other universities, he said.

The drop in registration of fourth year students is not expected to affect the total government grant to the university. Fergusson said he believed the number of undergraduates is much more significant in the assignment of money than the distribution according to year.

Women launch media group

By LINDA HALL

A group of ten women working from an office in Rochdale have produced ten video tapes which examine various issues such as welfare, rape and the history of women in Canada, from a female perspective.

The group, the Women's Involvement Program, is financed by a Local Initiatives Program grant for the development of women in the mass media.

Its members are involved in both the content of the programs and in the technical aspects of the production. The women do all the researching, writing and taping themselves on portable video equipment.

Their purpose, according to Ebe Durlach, one of the members of the group, is "to demystify the media and to demystify women's relationships to society and to other women." She cited rape and abortion as two issues involving "basic myths" which programs have been designed to combat.

"Women have been kept from finding out about themselves through the media and through other aspects of their lives," Durlach said.

The rape program, for example, begins with a scene of a woman being raped. At the end of the tape, there is a similar scene, but the woman fights back. "We want to show that women are strong," Durlach explained. "They're not appendages."

The group regards their work with media as an alternative to commercial media. Their philosophy is that "anyone can be on camera, anyone can operate or direct the tape. Television should be there for anyone who wants or needs it."

The group's success has already disproven the pervasive myth that women are less technically competent than men. Only two or three had previous experience in the media, but with the help of RCTV, the Ryerson TV station, and Keeble Cable they produced ten shows in a few months.

The women agreed that the possibilities offered by television as a medium are of prime importance to the women's movement, which has until now neglected TV, focusing on print and on vocaliza-tion in groups. They felt that the presentation of images possible through television could, by expressing clearly and dramatically the reality of situations shared by women, elicit responses from women in the audience.

Several members criticized commercial television for not being able to create responses. Images of real women do not appear in TV so women watching do not identify with them, they said. The group planned its own programs so that the audience would relax and respond.

They often tape outside studios. "If you take things out of the studio, it is just like someone else talking," said Michelle Marcil, who joined the group with experience in radio and television arts.

Their message? "We don't have a line," said Durlach. Most of the women had never been in any women's group before the project. "We research and formulate what we think," explained Marcil.

Laurentian student council takes over paper

SUDBURY (CUP) Laurentian University's student council is attempting to take over the campus newspaper.

To cover up financial problems, Laurentian's Student General Association (SGA) is reducing its subsidy grant to the newspaper, the Lambda.

The Lambda's grant will be cut by some 51 per cent, according to a budget report from the SGA executive. The budget cut was one of many submitted by the executive for adoption by the students council.

The SGA found itself in a financially embarrassing position earlier this year and offered this as justification for the cutbacks. The executive has also decided to manage the paper's advertising sales through a central advertising bureau. The revenue will then be retained to help ease the association's financial problems.

Lambda editor Lyn Downer pointed out to the council that all budget proposals concerning the paper are contrary to the SGA constitution. He cited pertinent clauses from the Lambda publications brief, including a constitutional by-law which said "all surplus revenue will be retained by Lambda for the purchase of equipment and to meet future deficits."

Brian Gatien, managing editor, reiterated that under the present constitution, Lambda is to receive a minimum of $3 per head from the student fee levy. This represents some $2000 over the amount proposed in the budget.

SGA president Yvon LaChapelle responded to the constitutional points with disdain.

"Don't bother me with trifles. If I have to ignore the constitution, then damn it, I'll do it," he said. "We've probably broken the constitutional rules ten times today," added

LaChapelle.

Although the council ignored all arguments put forth by representatives of the newspaper, and passed the budget, the Lambda staff pledged to continue the fight against the SGA.

Canadian-U.S. program may have CIA links

VICTORIA (CUP) Three British Columbia universities have been asked to form an educational network with a US college which would involve having American military aircraft land at the Canadian universities.

The communications system, called Can-Am I for Canadian-American Instruction, was proposed by Dr. Herbert Taylor, dean of research and grants at Western Washington State College in Bellingham.

He envisages twice daily helicopter runs, computer hookups, educational broadcasts and the sharing of library resources among the participants. In BC these would be the University of Victoria, the University of British Columbia and Simon Fraser University. Several community colleges have also been approached by Taylor.

Direct funding would be entirely by American funds. Taylor is asking the US Senate for $7.5 million over a five year period. One-quarter of this amount would reimburse the universities for lost faculty time and one-fifth would cover operational expenses.

The remainder would be used to purchase computer equipment. During the first five years there would only be indirect costs, such as the mutual sharing of transportation expenses, to the BC universities.

In the fifth year of the program the US federal grant funding would be phased out and those institutions deciding to remain in the system would use their own budget.

The program would be governed by a senior faculty committee drawn from the three Canadian universities and western Washington, plus a representative elected by the American community colleges.

The technical aspect would be supervised by the directors of those colleges and universities with computer facilities.

According to Taylor, "no one has denied an interest yet." He added that "if we have opposition from students of a university, we won't want to start."

He admitted that the most likely objections would be over the provision of helicopter transportation.

The helicopters would be obtained from the US department of defence. Alternatively, service would be provided by US Armycopters on regular training missions. Both avenues are currently being explored. Taylor added that he is extremely hesitant about the possibility of American armed forces landing auxiliary aid.

"We have to convince students that we are not part of a military program. We have to convince them that it is not part of an American military play, or we must call the whole thing off. If we do use military equipment, there must be token Canadian contingent involvement."

Aside from the helicopter question, there are other areas of possible dispute in the Can-Am I scheme. The initial funding is entirely of U.S. origin, and success or failure depends entirely on the American authorities.

There is no mention of Canadian costs after the initial five year development period. So far no approaches have been made to either the BC or Ottawa governments. Taylor regards this as the job of the Canadian participants.

According to Taylor the ultimate goal is to develop close Canadian-American educational links.

For Canadian administrators the question of whether they want this closer relationship may be the ultimate question in whether they participate in Can-Am I.

A study done last year by professor Bill Livant of the University of Regina, detailed the rise of interest in the US of Canadian studies.

Counsellors to set up governing body

The elite of the profession of social work, having failed once to gain control of their profession, are trying once again with an attempt to set up an Ontario College of Social Workers. The Ontario Association of Professional Social Workers, whose membership is restricted to those with a Bachelor or Master of Social Work, wants to prevent social workers with diplomas from Ryerson, community colleges and in-service from getting jobs that are "semi-autonomous".

According to Mae Harman, executive director of the association, diploma graduates would not be able to get accreditation from the proposed college.

Graduates of these institutions have changed the shortage of staff in the profession in the recent past to a surplus.

In early September, the association asked the province for the right to set up a self-governing body, but were turned down.

Like the legal and medical professions who have similar power, the association says it wants to restrict these jobs to degree-holders for the stated purpose of giving the public an adequate level of service.

The association also proposes that the college carry out periodic testing to "weed out" those who cannot give the public an "adequate" level of service.

Capitalists profit from CDC

By TOM-TOM
Imagine a government agency that is designed to build up a Canadian-owned economy. Then imagine that this agency purchases a corporation whose president is the son of one of the directors of the Crown agency.

Imagine further that the Crown agency pays $4.5 million out of the $8 million equity in the company but settles for 35 per cent representation on the company's board of directors. If you can imagine the Canada Development Corporation, you can imagine the above scenario — because it's true. Last week the CDC made its first venture into the real world of private industry, to buy a company called, appropriately enough, Venturetek.

It was the type of venture that no doubt earned CDC director Douglas Kendall's family holding company a handsome profit. It is Kendall's family company that set up Venturetek, and Kendall's son Jeremy who is president of the investment company.

Interestingly enough, the senior Kendall is still president of Herme Electronics, a company in which Venturetek has a large financial stake.

Venturetek companies have received more than $2 million in federal aid through loans, grants, and research and development contracts.

Golf team retains eastern championship

The U of T golf team successfully defended its Eastern Section championship last Friday in Kingston, with a 27-hole score of 461.

Queen's placed second nine strokes back at 470, and York was third with 481.

Doug Findlay was low man for Toronto, while Tony Sergautis and Paul Skinner tied at 116. Richard Hughes and John Bays finished at 119 each, with one of their two scores dropped to make a foursome total (best four, high man out). The final holes of the scheduled 36-hole tournament were rained out, enabling Toronto to preserve its lead.

Other universities represented at Queen's were Carleton, Trent, Ryerson, and Ottawa. The best four teams travel to Ottawa this weekend for the OUA championships.

Last year Toronto lost by two strokes in Western Section championships Waterloo at Brock.

Soccer Blues tie McMaster Marauders 2-2 in hard-fought defensive game in Hamilton

By JOHN COBBY

The intense rivalry between the Blues and the McMaster Marauders produced an exciting struggle on Saturday in Hamilton, and for the third time in four years the two soccer clubs played to a tie (a 2-2).

As in their two previous games this season, the Blues pressed from the start and were rewarded with the lead after three minutes. A fierce free kick, taken by Bruno Bruni, could only be parried by the Marauder goalkeeper and Mario Da Rosa alertly cracked the rebound into the net.

For the next five minutes the Toronto squad continued to carry the play, nearly increasing the lead after another free kick. Vito Polera headed the ball across the goal to DaRosa, whose shot was kicked off the goal line by a defender.

Aided by consistent hard running McMaster began to play some skillful soccer and radically reversed the momentum of the game. For the first time this season the Blues' defence came under sustained pressure, and the assault created havoc which at times resembled panic. Were it not for an obliging stop by the crossbar the Blues would have conceded the equalizing goal earlier than they did.

As it turned out, Mac scored fifteen minutes into the game. The goal was a direct result of the ceaseless harassment of the defence. A poorly hit back pass from Eugene Konarsky was caught by Marauders Brian Pirie who rounded the stranded Blues' goalkeeper to easily score the first goal conceded by the team this season.

Encouraged by the turn of events, the Marauders continued to swarm down the slight slope, and Joe Dattolico was hard pressed to prevent the Blues from falling behind.

McMaster threatened Blues' most vulnerable point, the middle of the defence, where Konarsky was not displaying a willingness to apply himself to the primary task of a centre back, that of close marking the opposing centre forward.

Yet Toronto came back surprisingly to take the lead 30 minutes into the game. A precise 40 yard pass by Bruni was cleverly carried forward by DaRosa. His angled shot beat the amazed goalkeeper, who was caught failing to cover the near post.

Within five minutes McMaster's centre forward Pirie also obtained his second goal, showing great speed and strength to reach a through pass and skillfully push the ball wide of the advancing Dattolico. The Marauders would have had a commanding lead at halftime were it not for some fortunate interceptions by Lurello and others, helping out the defence. Luckily the Blues survived the hectic mauling on even terms.

Soon after the break Dattolico made two courageous saves at the feet of the sleek McMaster forwards. His efforts appeared to help the Blues, whose defence began to show more composure. Coming off the bench, Herb Dubsky marked the dangerous Pirie relentlessly and starved him of the ball. Tim Burns was thereby released to deal with crosses, which became fewer as Bob Cazzola's tackles won more of the hall on the left.

Under pressure the Marauders became less accurate in their distribution, and allowed Blues' midfield to pick up more possession.

Although there were few openings to score, the soccer display did prove to be both skilful and exciting. The nearest attempt at goal came after an intricate dribble by Polera. His pass to Ian Harris was hit firmly but just scraped the crossbar.

sports

Forwards tired as the game progressed and neither defence came any hint that the tie would be broken.

The Blues will have to work hard to defend their Western Section championship, but they have both the ability and resilience to do so. Even when playing below potential, the team was able to withstand all that their fiercest and cleverest rivals could muster, and remain undefeated in trying circumstances.

Rugby Blues lose 12-6 to Michigan in exhibition play

By JOHN BARCLAY

In a hard-fought, evenly-contested match, the U of T Rugby Blues lost 12-6 to the University of Michigan Rugby Club in exhibition play Saturday on the back campus field.

The first half of the game was markedly even. Though outweighed by the Michigan scrum, the Blues were able to hold their own in both loose and set play.

Both teams came close to scoring several times, until Michigan was able to capitalize on a defensive error by the Blues in the middle of the first half. One of the Michigan forwards kicked the ball through and fell on it under the goal-posts. A successful conversion made the score 6-0.

Within minutes the Blues evened the score inside centre Rick Hodder scored with a picture-play try.

Hodder also followed up by converting his own try.

Due to the muddy condition of the field, the remainder of the play in the first and second halves was born largely by the two scrums. The Michigan scrum held the edge in play in the second half, preventing the Blues' scrum from delivering the ball to their own stronger backs.

The clean play of the game was tarnished by an incident in the second half. Blues' veteran scrapper David Palmer was found flat on the field following a swift upper cut to the forehead from an unknown American assailant in the midst of a loose ruck. He was unable to finish the game.

In the final play of the game, Michigan perseverance paid off, as the visiting team capitalized on a blocked kick from the Blues' end-zone, scored a try, and then converted. The game ended 12-6 for Michigan.

In the follow-up game the Blues' seconds lost to Michigan's second team 6-3 in a game marked by Toronto superiority in nearly all aspects of play. However, the Toronto team was unable to complete any of its scoring plays, missing six penalty shots. Eric Seery scored the Blues' only points with a penalty goal in the first half.

Scrum-half Greg Sprick was the standout player in the game for the Blues, playing well on both offence and defence. Nevertheless, Michigan scored late in the second half to win the game.

In an exhibition game earlier in the week the Blues defeated the University of Guelph 13-6 at Varsity Stadium. Hodder again figured predominantly, scoring of the controlled kicking of standoff Ian Lindsey. Roger Wright added a second try later in the game. The second team defeated Guelph 15-6 with tries by Nick Bala and Peter Bullem. The next Blues' game will be Wednesday at 8 pm, when the teams host York University, a string game in the intercollegiate league. (York recently had a successful Yugoslavian tour.)

In last week's Western Section game it was Western 37, Waterloo 6, and in games this weekend in the east RMC tied Trent in Peterborough 6-6 and Queen's lost to York 10-0 in Toronto.

Blues upset Gaels 46-18

By PAUL CARSON

The football Blues spent a pleasant Saturday afternoon practising kick-offs as they defeated Queen's 46-18 before 8,000 fans at the stadium.

Tackle Mike Sokovnin booted the ball a total of seven times during the game, while his team-mates scored six touchdowns.

To protect quarterback Wayne Dunkley's injured ribs, Blues' coaching staff decided to abandon the running game in favour of the shotgun offence that worked so well against the Gaels last year. Dunkley and back-up quarterback Steve Kerr passed 50 times (27 completions) for 412 yards (net) and called only seven rushing plays for a net loss of 28 yards.

Guards Bruce Parrack and Russ Mitchell provided the blocks for Libert Castillo and Cor Doret on short plunges in the first half following timely turnovers engineered by Blues aggressive defensive unit.

Doret scored Varsity's opening touchdown for the third successive game as he took a short pass at 2:46 of the first quarter and scampered 45 yards behind excellent downfield blocking. A Peter McNabb interception paved the way for Castillo's touchdown later in the quarter, and Queen's fumbled on their own one-yard line to set up Doret's second major.

Gaels recovered well from this shaky start, as co-captain Gord Squires intercepted a Dunkley pass and quarterback Tom Taylor hit flanker Stu Lang for a quick six points.

Lang had another touchdown cancelled by a penalty against Queen's shortly before half-time and Doug Cozae's 27-yard field goal cut Varsity's lead to 22-10.

Dunkley amassed 227 yards in passing during the first 30 minutes, but Blues had lost flanker Aarne Kartna and end Mike Clark with serious shoulder injuries by that time. Gaels offence was also hurting as halfback Dave Hadden didn't dress and speedy Gord McClellan was carried off in pain in the second quarter after a 40-yard kickoff return.

Determined not to repeat last year's script when they blew a 16-point lead to Queen's, Blues turned the game into a rout early in the third quarter, scoring two touchdowns within 93 seconds.

Helped by a sizeable gain from a pass interference penalty, Dunkley passed to rookie Mark Ackley who was all alone in the end zone after Queen's safety Darryl Penner slipped on the wet grass.

Boh Billingham intercepted Taylor on the next series and Dunkley immediately capitalized on the opportunity with a quick pass to Brent Eley who made a leaping catch for the touchdown, in spite of close Queen's coverage.

Sokovnin added a 20-yard field goal a few minutes later and Blues had a comfortable 39-10 lead.

Gaels refused to quit but McNabb and Billingham each picked off their second interception's and defensive end Walt Dudar stopped another drive with a fumble recovery. Dunkley received an ovation when he left the game midway through the final quarter and the applause quickly multiplied as Kerr fired a 37-yard touchdown pass to John Rhamey on his first play of the game.

Coach Ron Murphy substituted freely after that, and Lang finished the scoring for the day on a short pass after three successive Varsity penalties took Queen's to the Blues' five-yard line.

Taylor and his replacement, Raold Serehrin, combined for 17 completions on 32 passes (167 net yards) but the aerial show produced by Blues' shotgun attack was clearly more impressive.

Murphy said the team had been practising the unique offence for several weeks, "but with so many rookie receivers it took a long time and a lot of patience to finally develop."

Dunkley received most of the attention following his 26 completions, going for 380 yards and three touchdowns.

Rookie Mark Ackley eludes Queen's Joe Pal (24).

However, in the Blues dressing room after the game he was the first to stress that the win had been a complete team effort.

"Credit must go to all 34 of us, since the defence set up at least three of the touchdowns and I got fantastic blocking from the offensive line all day," Dunkley said.

"I was getting pretty tired in the fourth quarter but it certainly felt good beating Queen's the way we did."

The rookies definitely matured Saturday as Ackley finished with eight receptions for 130 yards, Eley caught four for 57, and Esteban Andryjowicz two for 24. Doret led the veterans with 140 yards from five catches, Castillo added 35 from four, tight end Dave Quick grabbed three short passes for 15 yards and Rhamey had one touchdown catch for 37 yards.

Sokovnin contributed ten points from his kicking game by converting all six touchdowns plus the field goal and one single. He also nullified Queen's explosive punt return strategy by continually kicking out of bounds. Even so, Sokovnin edged Gaels' punter Dave Campbell in the final averages, 31.2 to 29.3.

To make the Varsity domination complete, Blues add a 22-14 advantage in first downs and took only 75 yards in penalties compared to 92 for Queens.

The result leaves both teams with identical 2-1 records and tied for first place in the OUAA Eastern Section with Ottawa Gee Gees, who demolished Carleton 30-0 in Saturday's other eastern game.

Blues take on Gee Gees this Friday night in Ottawa as the season has become a three-game showdown to decide the two playoff contenders.

In Western Section play over the weekend, York lost 24-0 to Western, Waterloo edged McMaster 7-6, and Windsor defeated Waterloo Lutheran 26-11.

Blues Peter McNabb runs into Don Gordon near Queen's 15 yardline.

Vic cancels Klu Klux Klan taping to avoid violence

By DAVID WISE

Due to the threat of violence, tonight's scheduled taping of a television show at Victoria University featuring a prominent official of the Klu Klux Klan has been cancelled one day before it was to go on.

The decision to cancel the segment was a joint decision of the producers of Under Attack, Victoria president J.E. Hodgetts, and Vic's student council (VUSAC).

Hodgetts said yesterday he was apprehensive about the possibility of violence when he was first informed last week that Roy Frankhouser, Grand Dragon of the Pennsylvania KKK, would be one of the guests. He said that evidence of potential violence provided by "official police forces" and threats received by VUSAC led to the cancellation. These threats consummated his fears that the taping would become, "a rallying point for the left...an excuse for a hood-down."

VUSAC education commissioner Rick Gregory stated that the council had no concrete evidence that any groups planned violent activities in response to the tapings. He said a woman from Canadians Against Fascism had informed him of her organization's intention to peacefully picket the taping.

This woman, whose name Gregory did not know, "thought" that the Maoists and the right-wing Western Guard, two violently opposed groups who clashed at a near-riot three weeks ago, "might come".

Gregory said that although the evidence did not constitute "substantial grounds" for cancelling the show, the "implicit" threat in the well-publicized appearance of a speaker representing an organization as provocative as the KKK justified the cancellation.

John Martin, producer of Under Attack, concurred "we did not want to be a party to violence just to put together a TV show." He said that Under Attack plans to film the Frankhouser show later at another university.

According to Hodgetts, the decision to allow five segments of Under Attack to be taped at Victoria was made with the "full knowledge of the student body." However, it was not until last week that he was informed of who the guests would be.

Despite Frankhouser's political views (he advocates "race War"), Hodgetts maintained that it was the KKK official's right to be given an open forum to advocate his view, in the exercise of his right to free speech.

Gregory and VUSAC vice-president issued a statement yesterday, ratified last night by the council, supporting the administration's decision to cancel the taping.

They stressed that they supported Hodgetts only because of the threat of violence. "It is our firm belief that all men and women have the right to speak without censorship," the statement continued.

According to Gregory, there was some dissatisfaction with the statement among some members of VUSAC. He said they believed the KKK segment should not have been allowed to be taped in the first place for "political reasons."

Forster hits fee hike

By DIANA WEST

U of T Vice President Don Forster charged last night that after the government had cut back the scholarship program from $5 million to $3 million, increasing the student fees was "the last straw" and the issue should be brought before the public.

Speaking to about 35 people at the GSU, Forster said that although the administration had accepted the $100 increase, it would fight against further increases "with every bit of vigour we have."

Ultimately, he said, any further increases would depend on any changes made in the government's policy.

Graduate dean Ed Safarian stated that the Ontario Committee on University Affairs had accepted a proposal that a formula fee of $600 be withheld by the government. The Committee agreed to recommend it to the Conservative government.

The government's increase in student fees has led the GSU to ask students to withhold $100 from their second term instalment to "show our determination to oppose the educational policies," stated GSU president Wendy LeBlanc.

Students and administration must fight together, she continued, to ensure fees do not rise again next year.

Asked what would happen to those students who did withhold $100, Forster replied, "One crosses bridges when one comes to them."

Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNeil had been invited to speak at the meeting, but the GSU never received a reply from his office.

Political exile describes American grip on homeland

By ZOYA STEVENSON

Puerto Rican exile Humberto Pagan, himself fighting American attempts to get him deported from Canada, began a U of T speech Monday night with a moving indictment against imperialism.

Speaking before 150 people in the Hart House Debates Room, Pagan said, "I have come here tonight to speak not only of the Puerto Rican independence struggle, but in the name of people all over the world who are willing to endanger their lives for their freedom ... in the name of people who have said, 'It is enough,' that it is better to die on your feet than to live on your knees as a slave."

"I come in the name of Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia, and all the countries of Latin America and Africa to make this accusation against imperialism," he continued.

Pagan was introduced by Rosie Douglas, a prominent member of Toronto's black community who also faces extradition.

Douglas said that in his own case, "the Canadian government is re-writing its laws to extradite me because I have a criminal record as a result of my activities fighting discrimination at Sir George Williams University in Montreal." In 1969, during an occupation at Sir George, millions of dollars of damage was done to the computers.

Douglas stated, "the government knows that as long as I'm here, I will organize the black community and attempt to relate that struggle to the world-wide struggle against imperialism." He noted that the Vietnamese people were at the forefront of the struggle.

"Those," he said, "who are dedicated to a life of political struggle should view as their responsibility the creation of a reality where the liberation of all will be the condition of freedom for all.

"Humberto Pagan has so dedicated himself," Douglas added. "The extradition of brother Pagan to Puerto Rico would be similar to allowing the loss of someone in the mould of Che Guevara. Complete support and solidarity are needed to end this case and the others like it," Douglas continued.

An example of real support, he said, is Bernard Mergler, the prominent Montreal lawyer defending both Douglas and Pagan. He has offered his services almost free of charge to Douglas for about three years, and has defended people charged under the War Measures Act in October 1970.

The meeting, called in support of Puerto Rican exile Pagan, unanimously passed a resolution protesting "the government's policy of deporting anti-imperialists like Karelton Armstrong, Subir Roy, Ed Hogan, and others for their anti-imperialist actions, and also for the deporting of individuals who are victims of discrimination as members of persecuted immigrant groups in this country."

The resolution was presented by Daniel Goldstick, professor of philosophy at the U of T.

Pagan gave a brief history of the struggle of the Portuguese Puerto Rican people against foreign domination.

Puerto Rico has lived under colonial occupation for nearly 400 years since the Spanish invasion and genocide of the island's three native peoples, he said. He emphasized that the people have not been passive in their acceptance of colonial domination. At least three uprisings were squashed under Spanish rule and many more since the United States takeover of the island after the Spanish-American war.

"Three times in its history," he said, "the island has selected a government which would break Puerto Rico's ties with the US in a move towards independence and three times, the US military regime has refused to recognize the mandate of the people and allow them independence."

Pagan also cited a history of uprisings against the US military regime in which many were wounded and killed, while others were put in jail and further repression followed. In 1948, he said, the US sent 26,000 troops to quell one such uprising and bombed the areas taken by rebels. He called it "terrorism on the part of the government towards the people."

"In 1954, Puerto Ricans attacked the U.S. House of Representatives and wounded four Congressmen," Pagan said. Those who took part in the attack are still in jail — some with sentences of up to 460 years, he informed the audience dryly.

Demonstrations took place in 1964 at the University of Puerto Rico; thousands were wounded and two were killed. In 1967, two students and a taxi-driver were killed, while 81 were wounded in the demonstration.

In 1968, Puerto Rican Jews refused to join the U.S. army, he said. And in 1969 and 1970, other confrontations occurred without dampening the support of the Puerto Rican people for the left independence movement.

A 1971 demonstration of 120,000 (according to official statistics) shouted "Yankee Go Home" at American government representatives.

Earlier that year, the commander of the chief of police, a police sergeant and a Regular Officer Training Core member were killed during student demonstrations, while four ROTC officers were wounded. Pagan is charged in Puerto Rico with the killing of the police chief.

Pagan said that any one of the 8,000 demonstrators of the 14,000 in the university could have actually done the killing. "More important," he said, "is that whoever killed him shot a soldier of U.S. imperialism, an enemy of the Puerto-Rican people, and was a soldier of national liberation."

He said that while Puerto Rico is a U.S. colony under direct rule, the rest of Latin America except Cuba and Chile is held in the grips of neo-colonialism, under indirect rule. "From Mexico to Argentina, guerilla warfare is being carried out and Puerto Rico is not an exception."

"In the imperialist exploitation of Latin America, 5,000 children die every day of incurable diseases, while 30 million Brazilians are dying of starvation," he reported.

In Guatemala, 70 per cent of the people can't afford a pair of shoes and the United Fruit Company controls 700,000 acres. One third of Nicaraguan land is in foreign hands. Shell, Esso and Standard Oil own 100 per cent of Latin American oil production and make gigantic profits as a result.

"In Puerto Rico," Pagan noted, "the U.S. owns 90 per cent of the economy and made profits of $50 million in 1971. Yet, Puerto Rico owes the U.S. $2 or $3 billion and will owe them $5.5 billion by 1975."

Ottawa trying to exclude radicals: lawyer

By MARILYN SMITH

Excalibur
DOWNSVIEW (CUP)— "It's the Canadian government's policy to keep out individuals who don't agree that the capitalist order is the best form of government," said Paul Copeland, lawyer for Marxist professor Istvan Meszaros, the Hungarian born professor hired by York University and refused an entry visa to Canada.

Speaking at a Monday rally of 100 students and faculty at York, Copeland announced Meszaros was refusing the federal government's offer of a one-year work permit. Copeland said the offer was made contingent on the withdrawal of immigrant application, and also meant Meszaros couldn't apply in the future without an order-in-council passed by the Cabinet.

In addition, Meszaros felt the offer didn't clear his name of the security risk label attached to his original application made in England last June. He entered the country two weeks ago as a visitor to fight the case and bring it into the open.

Copeland asserted that, "the Meszaros case is of great importance to Canada and Canadian universities."

To date, the government has given no reasons for declaring Meszaros a security risk. He is a British subject who underwent British and Italian security clearance since he fled Hungary in 1956.

Meszaros has had no chance to argue against the charges because under Canadian immigration law, an applicant from abroad has no right of appeal.

"The government is exercising their bureaucratic privilege of secrecy, it's important that they not be allowed to use vague phrases," Copeland stated.

Mel Hill, chairman of the social science department where Meszaros was hired to teach said: It's strange to note the times Meszaros has had to step forward to defend civil rights—once under the Stalinist regime in Hungary, and now under the Liberal government of Canada.

"In Hungary they called him a dangerous bourgeois ideologist," added Hill.

With the federal election just three weeks away, Copeland commented that the time was right to fight Meszaros' case because "the government is vulnerable on its immigration policy".

Ian Lumsden, a political science professor at Atkinson college said the Meszaros case was interesting because "York is coming forward as the advocate of true liberalism and it receives favorable publicity." But he said the liberals weren't challenging the conservative liberal image of York.

Lumsden, who was injured by a truck in the Texpack strike in Brantford last year, said Meszaros and Gabriel Kolko, another York professor and client of Copeland's who has immigration trouble in 1970, are not radicals.

He described them as Marxist scholars, tolerated by liberals. He commented that no Canadian Marxists could get jobs in universities.

"There's no radical Marxists employed by this university. The problem is not merely the government, but right here at York," Lumsden said in a plea to broaden the issue.

He urged students, whom he said had no real weight with the government, to put pressure on York administration where their influence mattered.

York-wide support for Meszaros continues with a unanimous senate statement of support, and numerous faculty petitions. The Canadian Association for University Teachers has added their voice, and York president David Slater continues to pressure Mackasey's office.

Istvan Meszaros has received support from York, U of T faculty.

Constitution for arts and science union soon to be submitted for ratification

A draft constitution for the Arts and Science Student Union has been drawn up and will be submitted, beginning this week to various student bodies for ratification.

The constitution was drawn up by a six person committee on general guidelines set by the founding conference of the union on Saturday, September 23. Three quarters of arts student bodies, including college councils, course unions and a caucus of student members of the General Committee, must approve the constitution before the union comes into existence.

The union "is to provide services for the political and educational work of representative student organizations in the faculty."

The draft constitution clearly restricts the union to this service and administrative function. If the document is ratified, the union will have an $18,000 budget from the SAC education levy to organize new course unions, support existing unions, research and co-ordinate services for arts and science student representatives on various university bodies.

The draft constitution calls for at least three meetings of the about 60 member council a year. Each college council will have three representatives, course unions two each, as well as five from Erindale and 14 representatives from among the student members of the General Committee. All members will be chosen by their own organizations.

The council's main functions will be internal policy-making and approval of the budget. Its five person executive will meet more frequently than the council and will handle day to day work.

The executive is to be responsible for the hiring of workers, calling council meetings and preparation and administration of the budget. Three affirmative votes will be required to pass any executive motion.

The draft constitution is now being circulated to the college councils and course unions for ratification. If, as expected, most ratify it, the union will then be formed when SAC approves the transfer of money. Indications are now that of the colleges, only St. Michael's has strong objections.

Independent woman attacks old-line parties

By ERIC MILLS

Independent federal candidate Kay Macpherson Monday criticized political parties for failing to allow women to run for Parliament in constituencies where they have a good chance of winning.

Speaking at an all-candidates meeting at Hart House for the riding of St. Paul's, the wife of U of T political theorist C.B. Macpherson, asserted that "I am speaking particularly of my two colleagues here."

Mary Boyce (NDP) and Elizabeth Hill (Communist), like Macpherson, are given little chance of defeating incumbent Liberal MP Ian Wahn.

Boyce and Hill did not dispute her charge, although the NDP candidate later said that as an independent, Macpherson could not be a very effective MP.

Wahn, who has represented the riding for 10 years, opened his remarks with a repetition of the Liberal themes of "integrity" and the strength of Canada.

"We must work very carefully to continue to build a strong and independent Canada"; but on the other hand, he added, "Canada must play its full part in the world."

Boyce and Progressive Conservative candidate Ron Atkey attacked Wahn for supporting the Trudeau government's foreign ownership policy. (Wahn was chairman of a Commons' committee which recommended that 51 per cent of the shares of corporations in Canada be controlled by Canadians. Trudeau ignored most of the committees recommendations.)

The Liberal's foreign take-over bill was "a copout, almost a joke," charged Atkey, a lawyer teaching at Osgoode.

Wahn explained a large part of the reason why the government had not acted strongly on the foreign investment problem was that Quebec Liberal MPs are concentrating almost exclusively on fighting separatism.

He said these MPs saw the situation in this light: "when your house is burning down, you don't bother trying to buy a fire insurance policy." He said the separatist "situation" is less critical than two years ago, in October 1970.

Atkey suggested that social justice did not mean invoking the War Measures Act.

Macpherson said she is running for Parliament because there is only one woman in the House at present. The past president of the Voice of Women said more women are needed to promote the needs of women. She noted that fewer women are running this year than in 1968.

She explained why she was not running as a party candidate. "There are elements in each party platform I might want to support," she said, adding that she did not want to be bound to party discipline.

She would press for legislation "that will improve the lot of the little guy and stop the corporate rip-off," she stated, borrowing some of NDP leader David Lewis' rhetoric.

Wahn also defended the handling of the economy by Trudeau and his finance ministers Edgar Benson and John Turner.

"Even the Toronto-Dominion Bank has paid tribute to the fact that this is one of the best run economies in the world," he stated. He hoped that the unemployed, "those who don't participate fully in the economy", would be better off in the near future.

Boyce countered "I'm sure that as far as the T-D Bank is concerned, we do have a well run economy." However, she said that it was not run in the interests of the working class, of which she said the NDP is largely composed.

"We in the New Democratic Party are not afraid to offend big business", she asserted.

Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) candidate Crawford McNair challenged Boyce, saying that while the NDP claims to be socialist, "it props up and pumps blood into capitalism." Hill's party, the Communist Party of Canada "is neither Marxist nor Leninist," he contended.

As for the Conservative's and Liberals, "can the people who provided the problems provide the solutions?"

Communist Hill charged that the Liberals and Conservatives "have been mainly attacking the unemployed instead of unemployment." She called for a meaningful program to create jobs.

Asked how much he would spend on his campaign, Wahn answered about $15,000. Atkey is estimated to spend approximately $10,000, while Boyce said that she would spend $2500, all to be raised by the local riding association.

Macpherson is spending at about the rate of $50 per day over the 60 day campaign, she said, while Hill will spend $1000, not including literature distributed by the Communist Party. McNair, said he would spend about $450, of which $200 would pay the candidate's deposit.

Collective bargaining undermined

Public mislead into accepting anti-labour bias

Over the past few years, management and their media supporters have managed to deceive the public into believing that labour is the ogre in labour-management conflicts and thereby discrediting it in the public's mind.

This task has been made that much easier as growing union militancy and strikes on the part of some unions, particularly in the public sector, have increasingly inconvenienced larger numbers and disrupted people's day-to-day lives more than past actions.

Rather than realizing that the real cause of the disruptions is management's intransigence and unwillingness to share a reasonable portion of its profits with its staff, the public has been content to oversimplify the situation and hold labour responsible for their troubles.

Management and media, meanwhile, have supported this misconception by exploiting these relatively minor inconveniences to the point where instead of identifying with the workers, the public associates itself with a management and adopts an anti-labour stance.

Today's centre-spread feature on strikebreaking points out that this developing anti-labour attitude has so entrenched itself in the public mind that it sanctions strikebreaking tactics which attack the very nature of the collective bargaining ethos.

Not surprisingly, the government has not been slow to act to prevent strikebreakers from violating the principles supposedly behind its labour legislation. As the article illustrates, the government has in fact been complicit in the development of strikebreaking operations like Canadian Driver Pool by overlooking their infraction of their own laws.

That they do so should not be surprising considering where their largest campaign contributions come from: big business.

It's time people began thinking of the long-run implications of strikebreaking and their acceptance of it rather than the short-term inconvenience they endure during a strike.

Students, for example, should refuse to allow themselves to be exploited into being strikebreakers during summer strikes when struck companies try to continue operating and avoid serious negotiations with their workers by bringing in job-hungry students. This phenomenon, which has Police hold back people protesting use of student strikebreakers.

recurred for the past few summers, must be stopped: students should not be trying to get around the government-created low employment economy by jeopardizing the livelihood of strikers.

Strikebreaking must be outlawed. Management should not be allowed to use this additional club to beat collective bargaining to death.

And, we, as consumers, should support boycotts of struck firms and offer whatever assistance the workers feel necessary.

Sought to avoid explanation

Meszaros should be granted immigrant status

Without elaborating a detailed reason, the Canadian government continues to deny Marxist political scientist Istvan Meszaros an entry visa to teach at York University.

Citing ambiguous "security reasons", the government refuses to come out in the open and really say why they don't want Meszaros in the country.

Canada has a bad record on this score, characteristically hiding its reasons for denying individuals entry visas behind the "security reasons" facade.

At York alone, East European academics have regularly had to do battle with the federal government to get into Canada to teach. And, none of them flaming revolutionaries.

Monday's government offer to exchange Meszaros' withdrawal of his entry visa request (now that he's in Canada, the government would have to make public its reasons for denying him the visa) for a special one year minister's permit belies the fact that the government knows that it has nothing to fear from him and confirms the suspicion that it has no grounds that would stand up to public scrutiny for keeping him out of the country.

That Meszaros spent several years living in both Italy and Britain and that he was granted British citizenship in 1965 strongly suggest that ideological and not "security reasons" are behind the government's reluctance to give him an entry visa.

In recent years, Canada has become a haven for American rightists while making it increasingly difficult for foreign dissidents to gain entry. This inequitable and unjust policy cannot but be deplored.

The government should stop scheming to find a way out of disclosing its reasons for resisting Meszaros' entry request. And, it should re-examine the political considerations which have motivated it to try to keep Meszaros out of Canada.

Meszaros' colleagues have rallied to his defence, notable among them not radical professors but liberals who insist that a democracy cannot sustain the attack waged upon it by the imposition of unjust criteria.

Other Canadians should join them in demanding that Meszaros be immediately granted landed immigrant status and that the minister responsible, Manpower and Immigration Minister Bryce Mackasey, should be called to account for the government's behaviour in this matter.

Political criteria should no longer determine whether an immigrant gains entry to Canada.

Government fails to act honestly

Every student in Ontario is affected by the tuition fee increases forced by the Government of Ontario and by the detrimental changes in the Ontario Student Awards Plan. Concern has been voiced by SAC, by college and faculty councils, and by individual students, through the Ontario Federation of Students, through The Varsity, and at student gatherings since the start of this term.

The Ontario Federation of Students has made two demands which were ratified by U of T, and by most OFS members. The first demand is "all tuition fee increases in post-secondary institutions for 1972-73 be deferred until full consultation has been held with affected groups, and, in particular that no increase be approved until full public discussions have been held on the Wright Commission Report."

The second demand states that "regulations governing the Ontario Student Awards Program be amended to facilitate greater access to the program; that part-time students have access to the program; that the loan ceiling recently raised to $800 be lowered to a maximum level of $600 and that the age of independence be reduced."

These demands were presented to the government in August. The only concession so far has been the lowering of the OSAP age of independence from 25 to 24. This move could benefit only 2,000 students among the 176,000 in Ontario.

The quarrel is not with the universities. Although the universities of Ontario were not overly vocal in protesting the fee increases, they generally agree that the financing changes are wrong and they support, sincerely we believe, the student desire to have them corrected.

The principal villain is the provincial government which initiated the changes when they were politically popular.

The Government of Ontario may honestly believe its actions are in the best interests of the people of the province. If so, this government should honestly state its reasons for its belief and should honestly debate its belief with the students and with the public of Ontario.

Premier Davis in the legislature stated that he does not believe the changes will prevent students from continuing their education — yet his own cabinet documents suggesting the cutbacks predict an enrollment drop of 16,000 for 1972-73.

The government claims it cannot afford OSAP, but loan money comes from the federal government and the OSAP fund in 1971-72 was underspent by some $12,000,000.

The government further emphasizes that those who reap the benefits of post-secondary education should pay the costs. The government has failed to demonstrate just what fraction of the benefits of the post-secondary educational system accrue to the graduate, and what fraction to the general public, to the employers of graduates, or to the government itself in the form of important research.

We do not claim that the government has no points in its favour. We do claim that the government has failed to deal honestly and fairly with us and with the public.

If the only way to confront the government is through the presentation of demands with the threat of a January fees boycott, then we support the demands and the fees boycott.

SAC encouraged all U of T students to "keep their options open" when paying fees. The 57 per cent undergraduates who paid by instalment now have the option of using that second installment as a lever in January.

SAC has given support in principle to a January fees strike, which is the best tactic available at this time. If a boycott is to have any effect, however, it must be supported by a large part of the U of T student body and by most students in Ontario.

The referendum on October 11 and 12 is your chance to voice your opinion on the OFS demands and on the boycott.

This is our opinion; tell us yours.

SAC abdicates leadership role

As members of the university community who are strongly opposed to the cutbacks in education spending initiated by the Ontario government, we are interested in meeting with other individuals and groups to consider a campaign, both to bring out a "yes" vote in the October referendum on a second term fees strike and to pursue further courses of resistance which would involve students in a more active way.

We believe that the non-partisan, informational campaign being conducted by SAC is an abdication of the leadership which will be needed in the upcoming defensive struggle

Study exposes strike

By DAVID CUBBERLEY
reprinted from The Chevron

A 322 page report charging the provincial government, numerous local police agencies and the press with encouraging and permitting the rise of strikebreaking activities throughout the province was presented to the Ontario Federation of Labour on July 21, 1972. Prepared at a cost of $30,000 over a six month period, it was authored by former Toronto Telegram labour reporter Marc Zwelling.

The study, commissioned jointly by the OFL and the Metro Toronto Labour Council is premised in the belief that the current rise of strikebreaking "may threaten the balance of collective bargaining and the security of the community" and concludes that "strikers, management, the police and the government are all potential victims of professional strikebreakers."

The body of the report outlines the prominence of strikebreaking as an accepted management practice in Ontario. It illustrates both the way in which the corporate bias of existing law and of provincial agencies encourages such activities; and the extra-legal methods strikebreaking agencies employ. Zwelling's research culminates in a lengthy list of indictable offences on the part of such agencies — most of which were known to authorities — that points to a pattern of government and civil complicity in anti-labour affairs.

Despite the mass of criminal evidence elicited, Zwelling argues that "an investigation — even of this scope in time and resources — can barely open a crack in the wall of mystery that shields professional strikebreaking rackets and labour-spy rings operating in Ontario today." He concludes that "only the government has the capacity to conduct a definitive investigation."

From labour's vantage, organized and legally protected invasion of the picket line is easily the most potent tool available to management. Since 1965, over 50 legitimate unions have been broken in Ontario alone. Parallel to this is the massive growth of privately owned, provincially licenced "security agencies"; Ontario sports over 200 registered agencies which in turn command an army of 16,000 men. Many of these firms provide security for struck plants, supply drivers, dockers and equipment or simply break picket lines. Other firms (McDougal Associates, W. R. Broak and Associates, et cetera) specialize in maintaining labour spies — permanent infiltrators inside the union — who make weekly reports on union activities for a fixed fee.

Rent-a-cop is a booming business in Ontario — licences are remarkably easy to come by and the "standards" security agents are required to meet are abysmally low. Salaries also remain low — usually around the federal minimum — except in the case of highly specialized operations involving continual risks. Characteristically the three largest security agencies are American owned (Pinkerton's of Canada, W. J. Burns International Detective Agency, The Wachenhut Corporation) and all three are actively involved in strikebreaking. Anning Investigations Ltd. (now Wachenhut) "boasted" working 35 strikes in Ontario in a three year period; Anning claimed a gross profit of $1,000,000 in 1969, a figure said to double each year of operation.

Despite the ease with which licences are acquired, operations which specialize in trampling the rights of labour could not succeed without a willingness of the part of provincial and civic officials to aid their operation or at least ignore their activities.

Indeed, without hinting at a conspiracy, the study outlines a pervasive indifference on the part of elected representatives and public servants towards the machinations of strikebreakers. Nowhere is this more evident than in the case of a highly organized and often employed strikebreaking firm like Canadian Driver Pool Limited. Zwelling's investigation shows the Driver Pool operation to be, if not typical, illustrative of the direction strikebreaking is taking — the practices engaged, the types of men used and the conditions they are subjected to, not to mention the enormous profits reaped.

The report eats away the glossy image of Richard Grange, CDP founder created and publicly flaunted by the press. He has been pictured as a hard nosed individual, a graduate of the Ontario College of Art and the messiah who will save industry from the spectre of international unionism while becoming a millionaire by age 27. This immaculate picture is sullied somewhat by his early history of vendalism outlined in the study — including a train derailment, a bombing, and a conviction on 12 counts of breaking and entering in 1963.

The OCA business is a fabrication which the press swallowed whole. Grange's final escapade before his mature career was a partnership in C & C Seles, a Toronto front for a Mafia-connected, stolen car ring in Buffalo; the cars were rebuilt and re-licenced in Canada and sold for a handsome profit. Smashed in 1968 by Metro police, Grange's partner and three employee-friends were sentenced but Grange himself managed to stay clear.

Testimony given during his trial for illegally wiretapping union phones at Redpath Sugar recently indicated that Grange had destroyed evidence which would point to his role in the stolen car ring.

A criminal past is a poor brush with which to tar a person's present; however in Grange's case there is no break, only continuity. After an initial venture into the trucking business which established Cart-Rite Cartage Ltd. — through which Grange raided established haulage outfits and occasionally ran overloaded rigs — he became actively involved in strike work. While the existing legal structure is receptive to this type of move, Grange managed to overstep even its limitless bounds in the following manner.

Zwelling notes that inter-city trucking licences are hard to obtain under the Public Commercial Vehicles Act. However by setting up two corporations, "one company to lease drivers and another to rent trucks", one can still gain an almost legal entry to an "already overcrowded and fiercely competitive business."

In late 1970, Grange requested and was permitted to incorporate both Canadian Driver Pool and Intercontinental Container Leasing under the auspices of the provincial government. The report notes that the application was routinely forwarded to the Department of Labour for inspection, but that no investigation of the range of CDP's activities was undertaken. • Zwelling notes that Grange was not above misleading prospective clients from the outset of his career. In the widely circulated letter, information about the number of previous strike involvements under his belt, the number of successes, and the level of plant productivity achieved during a strike was all fabricated.

both to classified government information and restricted police information.

Also interesting is the unique mix of men said to comprise the work force used by the strikebreaking operation. Typically, former police, security, or military types co-ordinate much of the tactical area while the drivers and cameramen are often men with a lengthy criminal background.

As background to the idea of an overlap between police and strikebreaking agents, the report quotes Syd Brown of the Toronto Police Association as stating that "several hundred" officers have left the force to go into security work "in the past several years". Zwelling also adds that "the three Ontario guard mogul Georgia Wackenhut in 1971 all were headed by ex-policemen".

Much of the drawing power of firms like CDP can be attributed to money. Drivers often work from 60-80 hours a week and overall paychecks may hit $400 a week. Rewards are juicy for the corporation as well. Court records from Grange's wiretap trial indicate that Redpath Sugar Limited paid out as much as $75,000 for CDP services; the report also notes that during the recent, lengthy strike at Gidon Industries Limited, Grange was picking up $4,000 a week.

However, working conditions in the Grange operation are far from pleasant. Apart from the violence and danger built into the job, working relationships within the firm appear fiery and short lived. The study quotes a long line of "former" drivers, most of whom have nothing good to say about the conditions they experienced. Further, even in his capacity as employer, Grange has few qualms about overstepping the law.

- Part of the strikebreaking service is the firm's capacity to resume production, using "scab" labour in face of union pickets. This serves both to defer the economic leverage the strike gives the union in its bargaining and demoralizes those who man the pickets from day to day. In this regard CDP has been instrumental in the recruitment and transfer of immigrants, staying in Canada on visitor's permits without the proper legal status to take on employment to operate production lines at struck plants like Gidon. The report claims that Grange does not inform the immigrants concerning either the labour dispute or their legal status before hiring them on to the job.

- The report charges him with evasion of the provincial laws on "wage exploitation, vacation pay and hours of work". CDP operatives work well over the stipulated weekly maximum; Grange protects himself by breaking down the total monies owed to each driver into smaller amounts, each of the remaining sums paid by cheques from different corporations he controls. The report states that the Department of Labour knows of the practice, but has done nothing about it.
- Driver Pool continues to employ, in a management capacity, a non-Canadian who has no work permit and who has reportedly been refused one by federal authorities.

Zwelling takes pains to show that strikebreaking is bad for everyone involved, not least of all the struck firm. He makes a case which proves that it inevitably brings violence, negative publicity, and a prolongation of settlement.

The report indicates that Grange has a way of endearing himself to the struck company, a method of making his services, once employed, essential to the further progress of the strike. His initial draw on the corporate mind can be attributed to the many services he professes to provide — sold to management as a combative to the strength the international unions seem to represent, a means by which to tip the balance in bargaining in their favour.

Once in action, Grange would seem to control further developments. "When a management's telephone lines have been swept for non-existent taps, when floodlights are up, when Grange astonishes them with the exploits of his crew, the company is under his spell. He becomes their security advisor, a confidante of presidents, a Rasputin in the corporate castle."

There is no doubt that thus far Grange's work has been impressive for a good portion of the business community. In fact, he has been actively courted by none other than the Canadian Manufacturers' Association which, under the auspices of a high ranking Honeywell executive, has arranged speaking engagements for him and publicly endorsed his efforts.

There's no gainsaying the accuracy of the information presented in the report or the necessity of making it public. It is quite clear from the materials documented within it that Ontario is rife with legally supported, anti-anti-labour practices to which, for the most part, public servants lend support by their refusal to use available powers to curb them. Further, inasmuch as the press has lent its assent to this situation, the report is a potential forum for focusing discussion on the secrets surrounding strikebreaking, labour spying, and slave and scab labour markets. Finally, considering the nature of the evidence presented, which implicates at least four provincial agencies, the call for a full scale publicly-financed investigation is entirely legitimate.

Certain other aspects of the report are less satisfying. For the better part, it centres directly on the development of CDP while the numerous other outfits currently providing similar services — all equally worthy of description even if they are less cavalier in their style than CDP — are mentioned mainly in passing. Because of this, the study tends more to examine violent excesses of one particular group, than it raises the question of the social and legal conditions which make possible the growth of such activities. Out of this, many sympathetic readers may be encouraged to look more closely at the nature of existing law and the interests its current administration serves. However given the exigencies of time and money, the report is probably best viewed as a hasty but necessary response to pressing social evil.

Getting the Ontario government to move on the matter is quite another battle, one requiring massive doses of public pressure. This summer's DFL convention in Toronto presented a resolution to its delegates calling upon the legislature to "outlaw professional strikebreaking and anti-union espionage in the public interest". Members were asked to take the resolution back to their local councils to rework it and then to attempt to pass it through their city councils. DFL president D. B. Archer characterized the strategy as a "winning of public support plus legislative backing and approval".

Early indications are that labour executives will concentrate on gaining "legislative backing" on the local level, a strategy which in the absence of a strong bid to create open discussion among rank and file unionists and the community at large entails a number of dangerous pitfalls.

When labour places its case before city councils across the province, its arguments will fall on disinterested ears. Councils are often dominated by "good corporate citizens", individuals who in the absence of a vocal community pressure will "note and file" petitions at will. Barring that, some will pass "versions" of the original resolution distinctly not in labour's interest.

Strikebreaking does not arise as a simple function of legal loopholes being utilized by certain social misfits. The entire social fabric must be receptive to its rise before it can ever reach the proportions indicated in Ontario. A real solution can only arise from the creation of a socially conscious citizenry.

Survey reveals strong opposition

History students reject final examinations

By PAUL McGRATH

Results of a questionnaire distributed at several classes show U of T history students almost unanimously reject the idea of formal exams at the end of the year.

The questionnaire was handed out last week by the History Students' Union to evaluate student opinion on the matter. Jim Longo, an HSU executive, will take the results, in the form of a draft of resolutions, to the first of three meetings Thursday of a committee set up by the history department to determine its position on academic requirements.

Longo feels there may be conflict on the committee.

"The staff may find it difficult to accept the student position," he says. "This Thursday will decide whether we're on opposite sides."

Representing the staff on the committee are Kenneth MacNaught, and W. J. Callahan. Longo and Steve Speisman will represent undergraduate and graduate students, respectively.

In a preliminary meeting last week, MacNaught asked each member to draft a policy outline for the department on four subjects: first, second, and third- and fourth-year exams, and plagiarism.

Although there is feeling among the faculty that exams are on the increase, according to Longo, a fact sheet given to the committee by MacNaught show no first-year exams at all last year.

In contrast to this, 64 per cent of second-year courses had a three-hour final. However, only six out of 35 third-year courses, had a final exam.

"When you break down the figures, it doesn't seem to be what MacNaught is saying," says Longo.

He feels the committee will probably have to present two reports to the department committee, one for and one against exams. The final decision rests in the hands of the department committee, made up of 70 staff and 14 students.

"I don't think they're trying to come up with a blanket pro-examination policy, just a clarification of departmental position," says Longo.

Among the alternatives put forward by many of the students who voted against formal examinations were take-home exams, additional essays, or a different weighting of the term mark.

A second part of the questionnaire asked about course evaluation. This year the department suggested that the staff be allowed to contribute to the evaluations. The system last year was a course evaluation put out by the students, with a departmental handbook representing the staff's opinions on history courses.

Students voted, again almost unanimously, against the department's suggestion. Most felt that the system of an independent student committee for this purpose was essential.

Pressure for exams by some members of the faculty has risen due to the blossoming of the pirate essay business. The knowledge that some of their students may be evaluated on essays they didn't write themselves is distressing to staff members.

Longo feels the problem may be exaggerated. He could remember only one plagiarism case brought before the Standards Committee last year. Either the essay selling business is not as large as the faculty fears, or the bulk of it is undetected.

Student challenge crumbles

Kanowitch fails in bid to oust Hallett

Former SAC commissioner Seymour Kanowitch challenged principal Hallett for chairmanship of the General Committee.

by BOB BEETSON
Former SAC cultural affairs commissioner Seymour Kanowitch was defeated 68 to 31 in his bid to challenge University College principal Archie Hallett for the vice-chairmanship of the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science on Monday.

Kanowitch told the committee he was running because it "has operated in a state of chaos. Faculty have tabled all important legislation. The committee is not functioning effectively because there is no trust between students and senior faculty."

He charged that there could be no trust while students operated in a minority position and senior faculty continued to seek to maintain a stranglehold on the committee.

Of the other two students who challenged the all-faculty striking committee's recommende slate only third year Victoria college student David Laughton was successful, getting a seat on the steering committee. Second year New College student Howie Levitt was defeated in his bid to upset geography professor W.G. Dean for the post of chief proctor.

Last year's chairman, political science professor Ken Bryden, was acclaimed as chairman of the general committee and Victoria College principal John Robson was second to Laughton in the balloting for the two steering committee positions.

A motion to reduce the quorum for the 200 member General Committee from 70 to 50 members by physics professor Bob Logan was defeated handily as conservative faculty joined most of the students in opposing the move.

Logan said that is is important that the General Committee "get on with its important work". He pointed out that three meetings last year were unable to be held because of lack of quorum.

New College Principal Donald Ivey said he was "irritated" that he had to second the motion but he felt that it was necessary. He suggested some sort of compulsory attendance mechanism be established.

However, fourth year Trinity student Phil Merton charged that reducing the quorum would allow faculty to call a meeting such as one held last spring during exams. He pointed out that at that meeting, which was adjourned because of lack of quorum, faculty had passed a controversial motion requesting a review of the new program.

Classics professor R.M.H. Shepherd also argued against the motion on the basis that less than a third of the membership was not adequate to conduct the business of the faculty.

Arts and Science dean Bob Greene reported that the faculty was in a "vulnerable" position on discipline problems. He said that in expectation of action on the Campbell report on discipline, the faculty had set up no mechanism to deal with discipline.

He pointed out that in a recent case it was discovered that the CAPUT, the university disciplinary body, had no jurisdiction over individual faculties and a special sub-committee of the committee on standing had to be set up.

Greene added that the discipline problem as well as action on the General Committee's recommendations arising out of the Presidential Advisory Committee on Extension report were awaiting the attention of the Governing Council.

REFERENDUM

The Questions:

1. Do you support the demands made by the Ontario Federation of Students to the Government of Ontario?
2. Will you support withholding your tuition fees in January if the Ontario Federation of Students negotiations with the Government of Ontario are unsuccessful?
3. Would you support withholding all of your 1973-74 tuition fees if the Government of Ontario announces further tuition fee increases or further detrimental changes in the Ontario Student Awards Programme?

It's your decision; it's your money.

Oct. 11, 12.

The President's Installation Address:

"I have made separate comments about full-time students, part-time students and graduate students, but there is one common theme that is currently of concern to all students. That is the policy direction taken by your Government, Mr. Davis, in asking students to assume additional responsibility for the cost of their education through the tuition fees they pay. It is true that there is justification for asking those who benefit directly from higher education to accept a larger share of its costs, but society is the principal beneficiary of their education. Furthermore, a countervailing argument of even greater significance is the influence that this policy of your Government may have on accessibility to university education - and this applies not only to full-time but also to part-time and graduate studies for mature students. The combination of higher tuition fees and more limited bursary assistance will act as serious deterrent to individuals from lower income groups, from large families, and from those families who have come recently to Ontario and who are least certain about their future. I hope, Mr. Premier, that your Government will be willing to reconsider the implementation of this approach to the sharing of the costs of education through higher tuition fees on the basis of its impact on accessibility. Let them go now and pay later, not through the discharge of burdensome loans but through the established practice of after-the-event taxation."

Puerto Rican war inevitable says Pagan

By ELAINE FARRAGHER

"A revolutionary war of the people of Puerto Rico is necessary to defeat the U.S. imperialists now controlling their country," asserted Puerto Rican independentista Humberto Pagan at a Monday press conference.

He predicted the outbreak of civil war in "two or three years" which would conclude the long struggle for freedom.

Pagan, who was in Toronto for speaking engagements at the U of T and at York University, faces deportation and possible extradition to the U.S. to face a murder charge which rose out of his participation in March 1971 anti-war riots in Puerto Rico. After the riots, in which 61 students were wounded and a police chief killed, Pagan was arrested during a mass round-up and charged with murdering the police chief.

Pagan related to reporters that after he was released on $30,000 bail, several attempts were made on his life by police and right-wing groups which forced him to flee, first to the U.S. and then to Canada under an assumed name. He arrived here in September of 1971 and was arrested soon after for illegal entry. He spent the nine months until July in jail awaiting his deportation hearings.

Canadian courts have refused the American request to extradite Pagan for trial because there was insufficient evidence to prove that he committed a criminal offence. But he has been ordered deported and under the Immigration Act he could be sent to the U.S. unless Immigration Minister Bryce Mackasey intervenes and grants Pagan's request to travel to Chile or Cuba. Once in the U.S., he would probably be detained by police to face the murder charge.

Discussing social conditions in his country, Pagan cited many examples of U.S. exploitation. On a per capita basis, he said, more Puerto Ricans than other Americans have been killed in the war in Vietnam.

The United States occupies 13 per cent of Puerto Rico's land space with its military bases, he added. U.S. control over the economy has increased to such an extent that 90 per cent of all investment in Puerto Rico is now American.

Living conditions in the country have not improved under American domination, says Pagan. One-third of the country's population lives in slums. The cost of living in the past twenty years has risen 34 per cent, he said, while the per capita income has only risen six per cent. In a country of four million, 224,000 live solely from public assistance and many have been forced to leave the country in order to obtain a livelihood. The average salary of a Puerto Rican worker is a third to a fourth that of an American worker.

Pagan stressed that with the gradual lessening of U.S. control of its Asian and African colonies, Canada and Latin America are becoming increasingly important to American imperialist interests. "Canadians should realize how much U.S. imperialism is taking over this country."

When questioned on Puerto Rico's cultural domination, Pagan replied that much as the U.S. has tried in this respect, it has never succeeded. In 1969 English was declared the official language of Puerto Rico in a supreme court decision. However he said that although for 52 years the people have been educated in English, today less than half the population can speak it. "The imperialists can never destroy our national feeling," Pagan said.

Polarization of Puerto Rican society is occurring rapidly, he asserted, as the contradictions of imperialism and capitalism are becoming more obvious to the people.

"In order for the U.S. to defeat us," says Pagan, "it will have to destroy much of the population of Puerto Rico."

NEA endorses McGovern

The executive of the National Education Association, (NEA), an American university student movement, will support George McGovern and Sargeant Shriver in the upcoming American presidential elections.

In doing so, the twelve member executive committee encouraged the 80,000 members of the NEA to vote Democratic on November 7th. This is the first time that the NEA has backed any ticket.

NEA president Thomas D. Creighton, in making the announcement, noted that McGovern's record "shows his commitment to our country's youth and their concerns". He asserted that the 12 million new voters produced by the recent 18 year old vote legislation "can and will determine who resides in the White House for the next four years".

McGovern, a one-time school teacher, is a "liberal" of long standing who tries to appeal to young people.

Driver Pool scabs are convicted

Four employees of Canadian Driver Pool Ltd. have been convicted of public mischief and await sentencing on October 6, while similar charges are still pending against four other co-workers.

The controversial company provides services such as drivers, watchdogs, photographers and security guards to companies whose workers are on strike. It has become the focus of a campaign by many unions, particularly the United Steelworkers of America, to outlaw strike-breaking.

Christopher Paynter, Jack Blair, Peter Gallagher and John Carrigan were found guilty of damaging a trailer which was being used as strike headquarters by a Steelworker local on legal strike against Central Precision Ltd. of Etobicoke. Three union members were confined to the trailer for an hour by the attackers last February 2.

Canadian Driver Pool president Richard Grange was previously fined $500 for conspiring to wiretap a union strike headquarters, as well as being convicted with the company of supplying security without proper licensing this summer.

"Leotard set" challenged

Myth of women's sports inferiority debated

By LESLIE McINTOSH and Excalibur

The problems and bias women face in sports was discussed recently at the annual Women's Athletic Association workshop.

The attitude of sport as an "unladylike" activity and one not socially acceptable still exists despite women's active athletic participation. Guests spoke on the image of women in sport and the attitudes holding back their progress and acceptance.

Dorothy Harris of Penn State University (Pennsylvania) said that "Many people believe that the serious female athlete cannot be feminine". Harris is a leading authority in psycho-social dimensions of physical activities.

Harris suggested that female athletes experience a psychological dilemma because their athletic ability is generally considered to be a male characteristic. She said this had led to a "labelling" process. Women were conditioned to feel a negative response to athletic achievement, reflected in the drop-out rate among promising women athletes.

Harris raised the question of whether or not women athletes and women in general see sports as a threat to their sex roles. "The problem becomes one of the relationship of sexual-social roles", she said.

"The woman who chooses competitive sport, who becomes committed to the pursuit of excellence within her own limitations, within sport, usually has problems in terms of society's expectations. It's just not fit and proper, supposedly, for a young lady to be willing to sacrifice all the other things ladies are supposed to do for the sake of developing excellence in sport. I think this is the source of all ensuing problems", Harris said.

Male and female athletes possess the same "psychological set" which enables them to succeed in sports Harris claimed. She made the point that the performance of the female athlete must not be judged by comparison with that of her male counterpart (or vice versa), but by the limitations of the individual.

As for limitations, Harris said that these had gone untested. She pointed out that women athletes are playing a "catch-up" game as far as national organization and levels of competition are concerned. Women are breaking records which men set twenty years ago.

In summing up, Harris urged female athletes to abandon their prejudices against one another. Women in the "leotard" sports such as gymnastics consider the "gym suit" athletes (in such sports as basketball and ice hockey) to be the lowest form of femininity. Conversely, "gym suit" athletes have a mental block against achievement in the "leotard" sports. In reality, the same strength, speed and coordination is required for all sports.

Mary Keyes, from McMaster, talked about the historical problems women faced in breaking into sports. In the earliest Olympic games, women were not even allowed to watch, much less participate, she said. It wasn't until the nineteenth century that women blouses.

As golf and tennis became acceptable, and then the bicycle in the 1920's, women still weren't considered athletes. The main attraction of women's sport activities involved courting and matchmaking, with athletic prowess a secondary issue.

"The general pattern of separate facilities, separate programs, separate organizations for sports is symptomatic of the distinction between sexual poses and social roles within the society", Keyes said.

"If we really begin to treat sport as something that's beneficial to human beings, then this whole parallel separate structure is somewhat ridiculous in terms of servicing the needs of human beings", she concluded.

The conference also discussed the "myth" that portrays the female athlete as a strong, aggressive, large-muscled individual who may not be all woman. She is someone playing out her suppressed male tendencies and seeking dominance over men.

By the turn of the century women were participating in gymnastics, but modestly prevailed—participants had to keep their anatomy covered with long bloomers and sailor

Femininity and masculinity, as culturally determined qualities, differ in each culture and society. In North America, the feminine woman is a spectator; she cheers for her man on the sports field, but any deviation from this role carries a negation of her feminine self.

Women help to perpetrate the passive feminine attitude in their own feelings towards women participating in sports by not rebutting the image of women athletes presented in newspapers and magazines.

Medical and physiological data has not produced any evidence to indicate that vigorous, competitive activity is harmful to women. So physiologically, a woman is free to do as she athletically pleases, limited only by her own body potential.

Furthermore, while sports is interpreted in a man-woman juxtaposition, with the emphasis on masculinity, the female needs sports as much as the male for basic human psychological and biological needs.

York University's Women's Athletic Council hosted the conference, which included members of the Ontario Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Association. There were 25 participants from U of T. Other universities represented included Queen's, Ottawa, Windsor, Western, Waterloo, and McMaster.

began to openly participate in some form of physical activity and such activity was considered "unladylike".

PHE continues to win along the ground; defeats Eng. 24-0

PHE continued its winning ways into the second week of interfaculty football play by downing a weak Engineering squad 24-0 Tuesday.

The team relied almost exclusively on its rushing game to drive the Engineering squad back, while the defensive line was able to dampen any skulldrivings.

However, even with its two wins to date PHE has not shown any evidence of an aerial attack.

Converts were missed on all four touchdowns, and a field goal attempt late in the game went wide. (In its first game of the season last week, the team was also unable to convert its lone touchdown.)

At halftime, PHE was ahead 18-0 on a touchdown by Bagg and two more by Matchett. The Engineers came into the second half determined to defend, but still managed to drop another six points in the third quarter to PHE's Ross. (Only minutes before scoring, the same Ross had been helped off the field with a head injury.)

Despite several penalties for considerable yardage loss in the fourth quarter, the PHE team almost broke through on an interception for another six. However, the interception was ruled incomplete and the ball reverted to the Engineers, who ran out the final four minutes of the clock.

In yesterday's game, it was UC over New 27-0 with most of the scoring taking place in the first half.

PHE's Ross (34), downed in Tuesday's game, went on to score.

Western Guard plans to disrupt all radical and black meetings

The Western Guard has threatened that all campus meetings featuring Marxist or black speakers will be disrupted.

The decision represents a return to their policy of a year and half ago, when they attempted to fight left politics by disrupting meetings. The move is a result of the cancellation Tuesday of the scheduled taping of a tv program Wednesday night featuring a prominent official of the Ku Klux Klan.

Vic president J. E. Hodgets cancelled the taping on the strength of rumours that the Guard and the extreme left-wing were planning to demonstrate. He feared violence would result, as it has in the past.

In an unsolicited call to The Varsity on Wednesday, a person identifying himself as Emilio de Bono said "the Western Guard will be on the lookout this semester and next for any Marxist or black... I mean radical black speakers."

As to what the Guard would do about such speakers, he continued, "We'll leave it up to the imagination, from past experience."

In the spring of 1971, the Guard, then known as the Edmund Burke Society, briefly broke up a packed meeting at Convocation Hall listening to radical Quebec unionist Michel Chartrand and lawyer Robert Lemieux. They threw mace into the hall and in the fight that ensued door panels were smashed and several arrests made.

The Burkers have attempted to disrupt many other left meetings, including one featuring Chicago 7 lawyer William Kunstler.

Last night, Kevin Boyd, who answered the Guard telephone number, confirmed that de Bono is a member of the organization. Although he was not sure that de Bono's statement was official policy, he stated that "I understand that it came down from the advisory council (of the Guard), so I presume it's official." He added that he had heard favourable discussion of similar proposals among Guard members yesterday.

Asked what action the Guard would take at a radical meeting, he said "It could be anything from a demonstration to a disruption."

Con Hall nearly empty for Nixon

By ELAINE FARRAGHER

Less than a dozen students went to the 1763-seat Convocation Hall to hear Ontario Liberal leader Robert Nixon speak yesterday on the increased tuition fees.

Nixon commented on the scarcity of students, suggesting that perhaps students were not interested in voicing their disapproval. "In looking at these empty chairs, I sense that there is something less than a total commitment of the student body," he said.

SAC president Eric Miglin later expressed concern that the turnout was so poor, but credited it solely to the lack of publicity it was given. Next Tuesday, he said, Jack McNie, the new Minister of Colleges and Universities would be speaking at Convocation Hall.

"The next turnout had better be good," said Miglin "or the government is going to think that the students are not interested."

In an informal discussion with the students present, Nixon said the demand of the Ontario Federation of Students that the fee increase be deferred is not "unreasonable or extreme".

Although he stressed that he was in favour of student mobilization against the government stand, he thought the best thing that could be done would be to withhold the one hundred dollar increase. (This is what U of T's Graduate Students' Union is urging its members to do next term).

Nixon said the government had made a "serious mistake" in increasing the fees. He claimed that plans for a similar increase next year had been thwarted by strong student sentiment against it.

Nixon was apparently referring to a report that Premier Bill Davis last week told a group of students informally that there would be no fee hike in 1973-74.

Although the report itself has not been contradicted, the new Minister of Colleges and Universities, Jack McNie, said last night that it was not government policy. "I hope they won't go up," he said, but he refused to go further.

Nixon pointed out that the fee increase will only contribute 23 million dollars toward meeting the $19 million dollar deficit of the Ontario budget.

He asserted that the Conservative government probably had no "ulterior motive" for increasing the fees.

"They just needed the money" he said.

He said that the program on which the provincial Conservatives ran their election campaign was "purely electoral". After the election had been won, he said, the people of Ontario were hit with a series of "bombshells," including the fee increases.

Ultimately, Nixon said, postsecondary education should be tuition-free. Questioned on whether corporate taxes should pay for increasing education costs, Nixon said that personal income taxes would also have to bear the extra burden.

The meeting Tuesday, at noon in Convocation Hall, will feature president John Evans and McNie, as well as Liberal MPP James Bullbrook and former NDP education critic Walter Pitman.

Organizers of the meeting consider it a coup to have McNie give one of his first public statements here.

McNie himself said last night, "I look forward to the meeting."

Court lets U.S. appeal Pagan extradition

OTTAWA (CUP) — Puerto Rican independentista student Humberto Pagan will be spending another year in Canada.

The Supreme Court of Canada decided yesterday the United States should be allowed to appeal the decision on Pagan's extradition, following a short hearing Tuesday. The appeal will be heard in the lower federal court sometime within the next year. The court is fully booked this year and most of next.

Pagan was arrested in Ottawa a year ago after he fled Puerto Rico where he is charged with killing San Juan riot chief Juan Mercado during a riot at the University of Puerto Rico March 11, 1972. He does not want to return to Puerto Rico because he fears for his life there.

During the past year, extradition proceedings went smoothly for the Americans, but the deportation hearing hit a snag. On June 27, Carleton County Court Judge A. E. Honeywell refused the American request to deport the student to Puerto Rico, setting a precedent in Canadian-American deportation relations. Pagan, who was kept in jail from the time of his arrest, was freed on $3000 bail in early July.

The counsel for the U.S. went to the federal court on August 3, asking for an appeal on the grounds that the case was of extraordinary importance.

The federal court refused to hear the appeal because it contradicted a 1955 Supreme Court ruling which prohibited a country seeking a deportation to appeal a case. The U.S. then went to the Supreme Court Tuesday asking that it allow the appeal to be heard in the lower court.

Pagan was consulting his lawyer Bernard Mergler in Montreal today and was unavailable for comment.

However, a Pagan Defence Committee member in Ottawa said the decision to allow the appeal was based on one of three things. Either the court disagreed with the 1955 Supreme Court ruling, it agreed with the American counsel that the case is of extraordinary importance, or it felt the federal court's ruling on the appeal was incorrect.

Another possible result of the Supreme Court decision, he said, is that the Americans may ask for a warrant to put Pagan back in jail. However, Judge Honeywell, who disallowed the first American deportation request, is the person who would sign the warrant and reliable sources report he has already refused to do so.

The Pagan Defence Committee and Mergler are expected to issue statements in the next few days on their future plans now that the appeal has been permitted.

Committee deciding on stack access chosen

By BOB BETTSON

After a 45 minute session, in camera, the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council yesterday decided who will sit on the subcommittee with the power to determine whether undergraduates will have access to the Robarts Library.

The committee's suggestion must still be ratified by the Governing Council.

The 15 member subcommittee recommended by university vice-president Don Forster, classics professor R.M.H. Shepherd and part-time student Norma Grindal includes four faculty members, three deans, one principal, one librarian and one alumni representative. Five students, include two undergraduates, two graduates and one part-time student.

The committee will take over the policy function of the now-defunct Library Council, which last year turned down student demands for open access to the stacks at the Robarts Library.

As the policy now stands, everyone will have to apply for stack access on the basis of academic need. One of the committee's responsibilities will be to define academic need.

The committee will be chaired by history professor Michael Israel. The five students are: Kathy Feldman (Law), Academic Affairs committee member Brian Morgan, graduate students M. Evans, Governing Council member Clarice Henschel, and part-time student L. Ayoub.

Other faculty include P.E. Burke (Engineering), W.M. Dick, and J.W. Scott (Medicine), and dean Bob Greene of Arts and Science. Graduate school dean Ed Safarian and Library Science dean F.G. Halpeny are also on the committee.

The other members of the committee will be U.C. principal Archie Hallett, Erindale librarian H.L. Smith and an alumni representative.

Chief librarian Robert Blackburn and two of his associates will be non-voting assessors.

Shepherd explained that the session was held in camera because "we had to discuss individual person's qualifications and make a choice between certain persons."

The committee refused to consider, by a vote of 8-6, a motion by Brian Morgan which would have condemned the Ontario government for increasing tuition fees and thrown support behind Ontario Federation of Student demands.

The motion will be discussed at the next meeting if Morgan is unsuccessful in getting the Governing Council's executive meeting to discuss it.

Several faculty members said that they would like more time to think about the motion.

Further discussion of a paper by chairman Shepherd on the Academic Affairs Committee's powers was left until the next meeting.

Magic: more jobs at less cost

Liberals give Canada the LIP - again

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Liberals are trying to dent the unemployment ranks by setting up the Local Initiatives Program (LIP) for a full year.

Manpower and Immigration minister Bryce Mackasey announced Wednesday the federal government will continue to contribute 85 million to the 1972-73 program, down from $80 million last year. It will come into effect December 1 and last until May 31, 1973.

Decisions will not be made on which programs will receive support until December 1, so no charges of political patronage can be made, the government hopes. The program is a supplement to the $40 million training-on-the-job program the minister announced last week in Toronto.

Tighter criteria will be used this year, Mackasey said. The emphasis will be placed on creating more job opportunities and the betterment of community services, rather than the quality of life theme.

Projects created under the program should be capable of starting 15 days after they receive approval so the main employment impact can occur between December 1972 and May 1973. The government hopes about 50 thousand new jobs will be created during this time.

"Projects must create employment for unemployed people," the LIP information pamphlet tells applicants. "This employment should be over and above that which would normally take place during the December to May period."

Project sponsors must use Manpower centres to hire unemployed people and show that they intend to hire those receiving unemployment insurance or social assistance and seeking work.

Last year's program included three extensions of funds for 5700 projects and created more than 92,000 jobs, the government claims. This year's appropriation is lower because of the tighter regulations, Mackasey said.

"A higher figure could well strain our resources," he commented. He did not know if the 85 million represents the total amount that will be allocated for the renewed scheme. The tighter regulations include a decrease in the maximum contribution allowable per project "in order to allow more money for smaller and more diversified projects", the minister's press release said.

Only projects which do not require federal funding after May 31 will be approved. Those that wish to continue must show they have alternate funding before approval is given, thus effectively cutting down on long-term benefit work.

Projects suggested by the information pamphlet include expanding and improving community "store-front" services by repairing facilities or adding support staff, groups organizing employment for themselves by providing new services for their communities, development of services for children, the elderly or the handicapped, environmental improvement programs, employment of natives by native groups to improve community facilities and services, extension of cultural and social organizations' programs, minor repairs to substandard housing, and employment of people in non-profit making projects by organizations with limited revenue.

No project that involves profit-making or subsidization of a profit-making enterprise will be supported. Other project types that will not receive support include those giving financial aid to employed people, those supporting "leisure activities" solely for the sponsors, and large construction projects.

Any project affecting the "social objectives and spending priorities of other levels of government" will be subject to consultation between the federal government and the province concerned. Applications from municipalities must have prior approval from their provincial governments.

Besides a maximum wage of $100 a week per person, projects may spend up to $17 per person per week on operating expenses, such as rent, supplies, unemployment insurance, Canada pension and workmen's compensation.

A project must involve at least 15 man months of employment or something equivalent to three months employment for five people.

Last year's scheme hardly made a dent in the unemployment figures which have been rising on a seasonally adjusted basis almost continuously over the last year. Critics of the LIP program say they don't expect this year's scheme to do much better, especially because none of the projects will provide more than a bandaging of problems and a token effort at community improvement.

Trudeau's protege leaves nest

By BOB GAUTHIER

Marc Lalonde told a group of Toronto businessmen yesterday that "the NDP and the Conservatives are courting the separatist vote — probably more the Conservatives than the NDP."

Lalonde said that "the Conservatives have one language for Quebec and one for the rest of the country". He felt that "when it gets down to not singing the national anthem at their (Conservative) meetings, it shows" how the Conservatives are appealing to the separatist vote. (Lalonde quoted a Toronto daily as his source.)

The Liberal candidate for Montreal's Outremont riding added, "Insofar as the Liberal Party is concerned, we are going to oppose the notion of separatism in Quebec with all the energy we can muster for the very simple reason that we are convinced that it is the wrong option for Canada, the wrong option for Quebec, and the wrong option for French-Canadians in particular."

Lalonde did not indicate what "all the energy" would consist of.

He said this stand reflected "not arrogance, but clarity of thought."

He also mentioned that Wagner's speechwriter and one of his advisors was formerly chief of the Parti Quebecois secretariat and in 1967 "a co-founder with Rene Levesque of the Mouvement Souverainete Association.

However, earlier on in his speech, Lalonde also made the point that "Mr. Levesque and Mr. Wagner were sitting in the same provincial Cabinet."

Lalonde accused the Conservatives of being "exceptionally indifferent to Quebec. In fact", he continued, "they have lost touch with it for decades and have neglected to establish any roots in French Canada between elections, as if the province of Quebec did not exist outside as part of Canada.

"They seem to believe that by buying or hiring at the last minute some big guns" when an election is called, they will get the support of Quebec voters. Time after time, the big guns' turn into mere "pea-shooters" and this time will be no different from the last one. In fact, I would bet my shirt that this time will be even worse for the Conservatives in Quebec."

Lalonde was attempting to counter-attack Wagner's speech of last week in which he is reported to have said that, according to Lalonde, "if the people in Quebec ever elected a government that favoured independence, he would go along with it."

Lalonde said that he felt "that relations between the Quebec government and the federal government have never been as harmonious as in the last few years". He said that "in several areas, the problems which had afflicted federal-provincial relations between Ottawa and Quebec have now been resolved. There are many other areas where problems no longer exist."

Lalonde criticized Wagner's statement "that federal-provincial relations would improve under a Conservative government, making the vaguest allusions to greater consultation and the allocation of powers between governments."

The former executive assistant to Trudeau in the secretive Prime Minister's Office, Lalonde said that "Mr. Wagner's recent statements here call for a distinction between fact and fiction and for a realistic description of federal-provincial relations in Canada".

Lalonde, considered by some to be the second most powerful man in the country after Trudeau, moved into the Prime Minister's Office in March, 1967 as the principal secretary and assistant to Lester Pearson.

Lalonde met Trudeau in the 1950's and taught law at the University of Montreal at the same time as the prime Minister.

In 1959, he went to Ottawa as special advisor to Davie Fulton, Conservative Minister of Justice. In the early 1960's Lalonde served with three Royal Commissions, and in 1966 he was hired on a special contract by the Privy Council as head of a task force on corporate disclosures and securities legislation, and also as an advisor on federal-provincial constitutional matters. From there he went directly into Prime Minister Pearson's office as chief policy advisor.

When asked Thursday how he foresaw his role in federal politics if a Liberal government were returned at the end of the month, Lalonde replied, "No plans, that's the Prime Minister's prerogative.

"The prime minister never talks to anyone about these things", Lalonde continued. "He hasn't talked to me and as far as I know he hasn't talked to anyone else. He may send me to Timbuktu or even to Toronto."

In 1970 Lalonde said, "In all my life since I completed my studies, I have never planned on committing myself for much more than two years ahead. Modern man must be mobile." It appears that Lalonde is now ready to commit himself to Trudeau's brand of federalism.

Rand expert claims Vietnamese losing

By GREG McMASTER and PETER MATILAINEN

The present Vietnamese offensive has already "failed completely", and the South Vietnamese economy is so healthy that the Thieu regime's territory is "seething with tractors, Hondas, transistor radios, and televisions", according to British "counter-insurgency" expert Sir Robert Thompson.

Speaking to a seminar in the Medical Sciences building in front of a large map of South East Asia, Thompson added that Japanese business had "made a killing out of the situation".

The seminar was organized by the International Studies Centre as the first in a series on "Strategic Studies" which will feature further "distinguished seminar leaders concerned with the Third World and questions of war and peace".

The 150 people who attended were given leaflets by an ad hoc group detailing Thompson's history of putting down anti-colonial uprisings in Malaya and Vietnam. The leaflets accused Thompson of planning a British anti-resistance strategy which resulted in the death of over 8,000 people in Malaya, and of advising U.S. President Richard Nixon to wage a "low-cost, long-haul war" in Vietnam with a "high contact kill ratio".

Thompson refused to respond to the leaflet when an audience member challenged his right to speak at U of T.

Thompson referred the audience to U.S. Senate reports as evidence of the "human cost of communism", suggesting that communist executions have far outnumbered the toll from incidents like My Lai and the years of American bombing and defoliation. He said the communists killed over 5,000 people in Hue during the Tet offensive. "We know because we found the graves."

Contradicting other reports which lay the blame on U.S. bombing, Thompson said that communist shelling reduced An Loc to rubble. A heckler then interjected that "the Vietnamese didn't bomb London or Washington".

He followed this with a brief outline of the strategic need to contain communist expansion which, he said, is more sophisticated now than during the Cold War period after which the U.S.A. was "popular" throughout the world (except, one student shouted, in Cuba, Malaya, Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia, South America, and the Middle East).

The Rand Corporation expert then gave the following equation as a sample of his conceptual analysis: A nation's power equals manpower and applied resources times "will" where "will" is less than or equal to one.

He said that, by this formula, Russian power has been increasing, and that of the U.S.A., decreasing, in recent years. The necessary response to all this is summarized by the Nixon doctrine, whereby the "nuclear deterrent" applies to all U.S. allies, the U.S. guarantees all treaty commitments, and the U.S. will assist those allies who provide manpower for their own defense.

The present implementation of this doctrine against the Vietnamese revolution consists of the Viet-

Simcoe Hall occupation trials postponed

The trials of two persons arrested during the occupation of Simcoe Hall last spring were postponed yesterday when the Crown attorney failed to subpoena his witnesses despite ample warning of the date.

Bill Getty, who is charged with assaulting police, and Tom McLaughlin, charged with obstructing police, were prepared to go ahead with their defences yesterday and had successfully subpoenaed some of the university's top administrators, including President John Evans.

However, both sides agreed that for the trials to come up in regular court, where they would be mixed in with a number of other cases, would entail considerable delay and inconvenience. Accordingly, they agreed to ask for a special session of a court, which would hear their trials and no others, until their conclusion.

The trials, originally scheduled for last April have now been put off until January 15 to 17.

Getty complained to the judge of the delay, pointing out that he had made extensive preparations to conduct his own defence and had been forced to take the day off work.

He said the Crown had no excuse for not calling his witnesses since he knew the trial was to proceed yesterday.

The two were arrested along with 17 others when police raided a two-day occupation of Simcoe Hall last March, a result of the university's refusal to grant public access to the stacks of the Roberts Library.

Charges of trespassing brought against 19 of those arrested were dropped last spring. The trials of Randi Reynolds charged with assaulting police, and Mark Goldblatt, charged with assaulting and obstructing police, will continue November 12.

Tomorrow, the hard-working Varsity staff will once again assemble at 91 St. George St., one hour after noon for their weekly meeting.

Topics under discussion will be the Varsity's representation at the Ontario Region CUP conference and staff democracy.

Make-work programs obscure unemployment

Wednesday's government announcement that the Local Initiatives Program has been extended into a year-long project is the logical conclusion to the government's entry into the youth make-work field two and a half years ago.

Alarmed by secret government documents indicating that 25 per cent of all university graduates from 1976 on will end up jobless, government strategists quickly hatched the Opportunities for Youth program as a test run for what they anticipated — correctly — would eventually become a year-long necessity. Their plan allowed them several years to refine the program so that it would cause little friction for government priorities, including its re-election, and to socialize a skeptical public into accepting the necessity and desirability of such make-work schemes.

OFY was designed to appear courageously radical and progressive. Indeed, the government proclaimed, the program would seek out creative dissidents who felt their society needed improvement and fund their projects. And, it succeeded in nurturing this illusion for the first summer of OFY.

With a few notable exceptions, the motley collection of year-one OFY schemes filled the bill the government set for them. Relatively innocuous, they earned modest praise from the public and significantly alleviated the feared summer student unemployment crisis.

Those projects that drew public criticism were swiftly dealt with — or retribution was saved until the final payments were due and they were denied. And, when the program came up for renewal the next spring, the government conveniently changed the terms of reference so that their protestations to the contrary, the troublesome, more political projects were no longer eligible.

During the interval between OFY's first and second summers, the government adapted the program for use as a winter job-finder for adults, although a preponderance of young people again worked on the projects. Slightly different than OFY, the Local Initiatives Program sought to quieten critical politicians and established interest groups by giving make-work grants to municipalities and clubs in addition to individuals. Understandably the tenor of the approved programs was less political.

(To combat election year criticism that it had ignored the country's aged, the Trudeau government introduced its New Horizons sop for the over-60 set this spring.

These programs try to obscure the reality of the country's soaring unemployment rates by pulling thousands of people out of the unemployed sector and giving them make-work jobs. They are, in fact, a recognition of the government's inability to manage the economy in such a way as to eliminate high unemployment, inflation, and recession.

This cycle in which the country is caught directly results from the collapse of the capitalist economy, a cycle from which the country cannot extricate itself within capitalism.

The government has designed its make-work programs to occupy the highly educated, mobile youth who are graduating into a jobless economy with high expectations, so that they won't be frustrated by their plight, start questioning their society's values, and end up doing something to rectify the situation.

Unfortunately, their plan has been working. Large numbers of young people are being kept permanently employed and content by the government's make-work merry-go-round. And, this appears likely to show up in the federal election results this month. Polls conducted by all three national parties show that the Liberals, the architects of the country's unemployment crisis, enjoy the greatest support from the 18 to 24 age group.

Not only have the programs managed to pacify large numbers of young people who may otherwise have been to critically question their society, but they have also drawn in many activists who have felt they could exploit the programs and use the government's money (if not against it, at least to provide necessary services which the government has been ignoring).

Even where these dissidents' projects have filled a useful function, their involvement in them has diverted their energies from real political activity. (And this again was one of the purposes of the government schemes.)

Politically active people must resolve this dilemma so that the government does not succeed in its ploy to eliminate creative political work by preoccupying dissidents with make-work projects. Whether to continue to accept government hand-outs or not is a question which can no longer be avoided. The risk of cooption has become so great that leftists must seriously consider abandoning their participation in the pacification programs.

'Hospital workers consistently and ruthlessly exploited'

I should like to comment on that part of Addison Collier's letter (The Varsity, September 29) which dealt with the Toronto Western Hospital strike.

In that letter, Mr. Collier called the striking workers "lazy and slow" and implied that their demands for higher wages and better working conditions were unjustified. I have worked in hospitals as an orderly over the last four and a half years and therefore feel justified in offering a reply to Mr. Collier.

The workers that he criticizes in his letter are largely immigrants who for reasons of language barriers, et cetera, are forced to start at the bottom of the economic ladder. Hospitals in particular make use of this source of cheap labour in filling out their staffs in housekeeping, central supply, operating rooms, et cetera. The work that they do is hard and dirty and the pay they receive is almost universally bad.

Judging from my experience, these people are consistently and ruthlessly exploited in every possible manner. Their pay scale, days off, et cetera are all subject to the whims of the budget and administration. In most cases, they have absolutely no grievance procedure to correct abuses which almost inevitably result from this.

I would guess that the lowly position accorded to hospital workers in general was particularly bad at the Western. Indeed, I heard comments to that effect even before the strike took place. This impression was further heightened in my mind by the arrogant and condescending attitude displayed by the hospital administration.

In passing, those doctors which Mr. Collier praises so much (and in many cases, rightly so) are among the highest paid people in our country. It is their inflated salaries (plus the inefficiency of hospital administration, government, and private industry) that account for the annual deficit in hospital budgets.

And yet, because they are an influential segment in our society, they can virtually dictate their own financial terms. The strikers at the Western Hospital, however, because they are immigrants and politically powerless, are forced to fight for a decent salary for work no "native born Canadian" will do. Unfortunately, their fight seems to have been unsuccessful.

Mr. Collier's remarks concerning the strike are clearly those of someone who has only a vague idea of what the strike involves. I hope this letter will in some way stimulate him (and others) to look into the problem before making sweeping generalizations and accusations.

Readers debate merits of Day Care demo

May learn reality by working shift

We were frankly amazed at the total ignorance shown by the writers of Monday's letter to the editor concerning last Thursday's day care demonstration. They apparently have no concept of what our "little peoples" like or needs are. This is regrettable considering that these letter writers (especially Mr. Cadario) are involved in administering a policy which so directly affects these children.

We would like to extend an invitation to these five people to volunteer for regular daytime shifts at either of the two centres on campus. They might start to understand that "parent control" and "community involvement" aren't just phrases to be used or discarded as the feeling moves them. Doing a shift or two might even temper their phillips with a little reality.

Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centres

Critic dismisses racism as humour

Although I don't entirely agree with the tone of the letter in Monday's issue of The Varsity condemning Co-op Day Care tactics, I found that the accompanying editorial required several readings before I could convince myself that the writer was serious.

The fact that the LGMB performance was pre-arranged with Simcoe Hall and enjoyed by the platform and crowd, fully justifies its delay of the official recession. It should also be noted that the first drum beat was not heard until the conclusion of all speeches. To label the skit as real, though unintentional, racist humour can only be done by taking obviously irrelevant humour seriously. The engineers' intentions were all good, and the purpose of the exercise was simply fun for the participants and entertainment for the spectators.

I fully realize that the political and social problems of this university require the attention and concern of all of us. However, there is a wrong way, as was shown last Thursday by the day care demonstrators. A demonstration is fine if it can make a positive contribution towards the interests of the represented group. Day Care unfortunately failed here by purposely antagonizing all present and consequently turning public opinion against the co-op through the observers' natural reaction to their behaviour. This is shown in the letter from Lewis, Cadario, Creelman, DeAngelo, and Steadman which says that Campus Co-op cannot hope for a reasonable settlement unless "the issue is fought on the basis of the principles involved, and not on the cheap theatrics of a travelling show..."

My only hope is that those people who are dealing with the problem of day care will not hold Thursday's mistake against Campus Co-op when making decisions. If they do, it's only human, and it's too bad.

Forget day care, learn birth control

That those people who espouse a cause get tripped up over their shoe laces and lose sight of their objectives in relation to the reality which surrounds them is a phrase which is an number of those who attended the installation ceremony might well have remembered instead of making the most complete idiots of themselves and instead of misrepresenting their causes so foolishly. I am of course referring to the Day Care Centre people, the Liberate the Library for the revolution people, the Stop the Trial people, et cetera ad nauseum et absurdum (sic)...

What did those people expect? Must the whole world stop because some graduate students and others have been proliferating instead of reading up on birth control methods? Must everything come to a complete standstill because a few stultified individuals had a run-in with the police?

By demonstrating at the installation ceremony without any support from the student body at all, these people showed to Premier Davis and other outsiders that student issues need not be taken seriously and that to do so would be foolish as no one really and truly cares anyway!

I am in favour of opening the stacks in the new John Robarts Extravaganza to all in the university community. I also am opposed to the rise in fees, and other issues represented in that petty demonstration at the installation ceremony; but I am damned if I will ever support any issue that is made into a great political contest. Why does everything have to be thrown into one great potpourri called the "revolution", and why don't those who want stack entry, lower fees et cetera realize that there would be a hell of a lot more people showing up for demonstrations if politics were discarded entirely.

In other words, to quote some anonymous graffiti, "It is not their left-wing views I dislike, but their omni-phobia."

Force replaced debate

Following an open SAC forum on the current fee referendum Wednesday, a discussion of members of the Old Mole and Young Socialists with the Canadian Liberation Movement ended with my being physically attacked by a member of the CLM. This was witnessed by several students.

Incidents like this poison the atmosphere on campus at a time when open and democratic debate, leading to concrete solutions, is essential. The YS organization, for one, feel that any trend toward replacing such debate with brute force and physical attacks cannot continue. Any hint of such a trend seriously undermines our ability, as students, to halt the Ontario government's attack on the availability of education.

The discussion between myself and a member of CLM was hindered throughout by illogical "Trot-baiting" and open threats of violence. The brief scuffle which ended the "debate" was an unfortunate incident, but nevertheless reflects the incorrect direction of CLM in their efforts to persuade people to their point of view. I witnessed their penchant for such efforts during their crude attempt to break up a peaceful anti-war rally in Ottawa last spring. I see only a continuation when I hear them as a group threaten myself and members of the Old Mole with physical harm, as they did Wednesday. Such tactics should stop if CLM wants their arguments to be taken seriously.

In the midst of a struggle to defend students against the recent fee-hikes, grant cut-backs, and overall drop in enrolment, an atmosphere of groups fighting among themselves can only dissuade people from becoming involved. If we cannot build a concerted campaign against the government policies, then they will feel at liberty to take further chops at the overall availability of education.

In the interests of a full, democratic discussion, I challenge the CLM to an open debate around the topics raised so dramatically last Wednesday that is, on the question of Canada, US imperialism, the fee hikes, and related topics.

Summer scabs at Hydro

Students cross picket lines by telephone

Adapted from the Chevron

The use of student scabs this summer was one of the things which kept the Ontario Hydro strike, which began July 21, out of the public eye. The strike, in which formal collective bargaining was abandoned after two weeks, is still going on.

When workers go on strike, it is usual procedure on the part of the company to continue operations by use of a skeleton managerial staff. In this case, however, Hydro hired university and high school students to do jobs such as reading hydro meters.

Some of these students crossed picket lines via the telephone wires. They were interviewed and hired in private homes, sent around in unmarked cars, and reported directly to management by phone.

Others were hired directly as scab workers. They were caught in the middle, in a sense, because for the most part, they were regular, often returning, summer help. Once they crossed the picket lines, however, they became strikebreakers. These students were then blacklisted by the Ontario Hydro Employees' Union and by all affiliated unions.

A CUPE spokesman said yesterday that she was aware of the use of student scabs especially from the University of Waterloo in the Kitchener-Waterloo area, and that elsewhere the hiring of students to fill regular summer jobs went on. This, she said, "made it easier for the company".

In Waterloo, the union contacted the University of Waterloo Federation of Students. They wanted to know if the federation could stop the students from crossing picket lines. The federation turned to the university's Department of Co-ordination and Placement which found alternate jobs for these students, but they chose to stay with Hydro.

The Waterloo placement office was placed in an uncomfortable position. It values its good relationship with the unions, since a large percentage of students in the co-operative program are placed with unions which sometimes make exceptions to accommodate them. On the other hand, it must have the support of company management to continue its co-operative program successfully. Generally, the student is offered alternate employment, and then has to make the choice himself.

With most students, except some from the co-operative program at Waterloo, now back at school, however, the strike is still going on. The latest company offer, made on September 24, is now being voted on by the union membership. The results will be announced Tuesday. The union executive, however, unanimously recommended rejection of the proposal which still contains the major components, pushed by the company, that the union is objecting to.

There are three main issues in the strike, according to the union, and two of them represent attempts to push the union backward. One is that of shift work. Management wants a work week which would force 4,000 tradesmen to work any five days, any eight hours between seven am and seven pm. This would replace the regular, Monday to Friday, nine to five work week. Convenient as this may sound to management, it would be very disruptive of people's lives.

A second issue is that of job security. One of the things that the company wants is a protection clause to be put into the contract. This would force the union to change its constitution which now provides that any union member may sue any other member who contravenes the interests of the union, for example, by crossing a picket line. The provision that the company wants would make this impossible. The union is at present prosecuting the company under the Ontario Labour Relations Act for this move, which constitutes an attempt to interfere in internal union affairs by forcing changes in the union's constitution.

Also involved in job security is the contracting out of design and construction to outside contractors. Hydro formerly did all of their own design and construction. The company's new plan includes a built in potential for loss of jobs. An example is the distributing station at Niagara Falls which was contracted to H. G. Acres Co. This alone will affect 1,000 union members.

The third issue is that of wages. Management wants a raise of four to six per cent to be applied unevenly on different levels. The union wants to keep the wage increase even across all levels to prevent fragmentation of the membership due to discontent.

The fact that there has been no lapse of hydro services during the strike, something made easier by the use of student scabs, has meant that few people are even aware of the strike, something made easier by the explained. "We are striking against the employer. Up to this point, we have not taken action against the public and do not intend to do so".

By delaying bargaining, management has put financial pressure on union members who are presently forced to survive on $30 a week strike pay. "I feel it is a matter of staying with it until Hydro is willing to come to the table and negotiate in reasonable conscience," said Vincer.

Hydro workers at the Pickering generating station, like their colleagues throughout the province, are on strike.

Fees fight is middle-class, says NDP critic

Floyd Laughren, NDP critic for Colleges and Universities.

By HEATHER-JANE SANGUINS

The NDP critic for Colleges and Universities Wednesday criticized not only the government, but also the students for their role in the fees hike.

Floyd Laughren advised students to "raise hell and raise the political consciousness of students across Ontario in the next six months."

The Nicklebelt MPP said to an audience varying from 45 to 60 students that he was somewhat "cynical and disturbed" because of the lack of earlier action, making the students resemble a "middle class lobby with middle class aspirations".

Laughren stated that "the answer is not to increase tuition fees, but to decrease them until there aren't any." He described the fees hike as a "reaffirmation of the hierarchical structure of our society" and "class legislation".

At the end of the meeting, a fight broke out between Peter Havers, a member of the Canadian Liberation Movement, and Young Socialist Mike Edwards, who is also an Innis SAC rep.

In a speech which followed Laughren's during the meeting, Havers asserted that the Ontario Government needs money because of reduced revenue due to American president Richard Nixon's surcharge last year.

Cliff Mack, the first speaker for the Young Socialists, criticized SAC for its nonaction on the fees hike. SAC should have a campaign culminating in a big meeting, he said.

"What we have now isn't a campaign. It's an apology".

SAC vice-president John Helliwell, who chairs the meeting, replied that SAC could only conduct a limited campaign as it had adopted this policy from the beginning.

As for the fight, which naturally broke out in the midst of a heated political discussion, it wasn't clear who won. One result was that two pairs of glasses were broken.

Farmers may get real union

SASKATOON (CUP) — The Liberal government has opened the possibility of granting collective bargaining rights to farmers, prompting a challenge from the National Farmers Union (NFU) for opposition parties to declare themselves on the issue.

Federal Agriculture minister H. A. Olson said in Wingham, Ontario Sept 28 that the Liberals would "seriously look" at legislation giving the NFU full bargaining power for all farmers, if the union had the backing of 51 per cent of the farm community.

NFU President Roy Atkinson wired to NDP leader David Lewis and Progressive Conservative Party leader Robert Stanfield October 2, asking them to declare their parties respective positions on Olson's statement.

Lewis told CUP in an interview last month that the NDP favoured collective bargaining for farmers.

"With a slight amendment, that's all we want," Atkinson said of Olson's statement.

"We think it would be appropriate for the government to set up enabling legislation first, then we would have a positive position with which to go out and sign up farmers. The legislation would not become operative until the NFU would have more than 51 per cent of the farmers signed into membership," Atkinson said.

He said farmers would have an improved chance of winning collective bargaining rights with this procedure because they would have a visible goal before them to work towards.

Into desolation of Fat City, Houston breathes gentle life

The Varsity - David Lloyd

Fat City is about Stockton, California, a town full of single men in the state's central plain — drab agricultural flats a world away from the golden fringe of the coast, just a few miles west. There isn't much to dream on, but California port is cheap, and people get by somehow.

This is forbidding stuff; the desolation and dead ends are there, all right, in this superbly photographed and acted film. John Huston has salvaged something from the shards of despair. Not much, but something. There is, for instance, a resilience and a humor left in the characters; we find ourselves harboring little pockets of affection for them, hoping the movie will do them justice. The film's one great accomplishment is that it does.

Stacy Keach gives an intelligent and admirably controlled performance as Billy Tully, who once had a wife and something of a reputation as a boxer. Nowadays he drifts around town, taking a job now and then as an onion-trimmer or walnut-picker. Most of his days are idle, spent lying on his bed, sucking beer out of cans, or sitting in Stygian, clandestine barrooms. Sometimes he wanders down to his gym with vague plans for getting back into shape. His dreams of fat city are no longer bright enough to give him back his purpose.

ONE DAY DOWN at the Y has spots a promising young boxer called Ernie Mungar; easy game, thinks Tully. (There is a craven streak of the swashbuckler in Tully, which grows on alcohol.) They spar a little, Tully pulls a muscle, so Ernie can spare some flattery: "I saw you fight once."

"Did I win?" jokes Tully, beaming.

"No."

Winning (narrow mind how or over whom) obsesses Tully. In a comeback fight he struggles mightily to win a decision over Mexican boxer who has to go through with the fight even though he is painfully ill. "Did I win?" Tully manages to ask, his eyes puffed into slits, as the loser throws his arms wearily around Tully's neck.

THIS IS A STORY largely about men, and the lives of its women are inflected though masculine paradigms, but much of its perception is shrewd and feminine. Tully meets up with a barfly, drunk on self-pity, whose dress is zipped just as far up as she can reach, playing sloppily the last six inches. There is a crone's attention to the bickering and ellipses of their common-law life: peas shoot across the table during one mealtime tug-of-war about nothing and Oma, desperately soused and skittering along the edge of some terrible, booze-filled abyss, butts her cigarette in her cream sherry.

Oma's role is pure, broad, burlesque, but Susan Tyrell manages to give it a wild, latter-day charm, too. I'd like to see her do something else before making any judgments, but it was wonderful to watch her trying to move her bloated, glistening face through some lugubrious play of features.

The young boxer who, by virtue of his white skin becomes "Irish" Ernie Mungar and who gets his nose fractured, has the most sense, the least reason for losing. It's a role without too much in it, and Jeff Bridges has played it before. He does it better here, concealing a surprising canniness in this amiable dumb guy, giving him a sense of compassion that goes beyond chumminess.

ONE NIGHT, TOO slow to slip away unseen, he is halled by Tully. "Have a drink with me," Tully cajoles, a drunk's dare in his tone. But Ernie's got to keep in training, so they settle for a cup of coffee in a green-walled diva full of lonely card-playing men. Tully, as they sit at the counter, seems to realize that it's a waste of energy to go on deceiving himself. We see him as a sententious old codger, just thirty, muttering whiskey-scented aphorisms, trying to excuse away his life by plundering whatever talk-wisdom he can remember. Ernie squirms.

They sit a few minutes in silence. "Hay, stick around a while," Tully asks, just short of pleading. Ernie does, and the movie ends. John Gardner wrote the script from his spare, somewhat cold novel. His writing is never glib or contrived, his ear for drunk and sober dialogue is flawless. John Huston has thawed out Gardner's story a little, without letting it melt into sentimentality or pathos. He knows the difference between humor and comedy and is chery of cheaply secured effects. The direction is underexplicit and impeccable; a sort of avuncular kindness holds this unlikely story together and turns it into something rather gentle and memorable.

IN 1941 THE Hollywood firmament flashed as if with meteors. There was of course Citizen Kane. Orson Welles hit the town with an earthquake and tidal wave unparalleled before or since. But not even that extravagance could submerge another director's amazing debut: John Huston's The Maltese Falcon.

Kane, nowadays, tops everybody's top-ten lists, while Falcon has become the campy kickoff to countless Bogie festivals in neighborhood theatres where the water fountains never work. One way or the other we hoot at. But movie critic Paulina Kael, then a college girl, writes of the excitement of seeing this stylish, cynical thriller and of how Kane, after the high publicity tides, seemed shallow.

The careers of Welles' and Huston have been similar. Neither man has made a film equal to his first. Both acquired, as they moved into middle age, organ-pipe voices, gargantuan bulks, and formidably bearded sage-faces. Increasingly these two giants lend their prestige to bit parts in juvenile, slick movies.

WELLES' DECLINE has been legendary and vertiginous, a clean slash down a sheet of graph paper. (After Kane and The Magnificent Ambersons, to be sure, he had a frightful way to fall.) Huston's fortunes have been more erratic, more baffling. He never had to fight the strength-sapping, humiliating battles for cash and credit that finished Welles. But he careened through moviedom with as little purpose and discrimination as a neutron through a reactor.

Falcon, The Treasure of the Sierra Madre, one or two more, are masterpieces. Under Huston's credits we can find many professional, polished entertainments like Kay Largo, The African Queen, Bat the Devil. Then there are the others: The Barbarian and the Gaiasha, Night of the Iguana, The Bible. . . Not quite trash, but, like tuna-fish salad three days old, enough to make you wonder about the wisdom of fine distinctions.

Huston has never had a signature style, like Hitchcock or Ophuls, Kubrick or Antonioni. His talents have always (except, oddly, in Falcon) been unobtrusive. Other directors, the best of them, play around with their films, use plot as a clothesline for stringing up whiter whites and brighter brights, treat actors as ambulatory props to be wheeled here and there for setting up some classy shot. Huston's films move along with his characters, at their own pace, in their own medium.

THERE IS AN immense amount of fun, of course, in obtrusiveness, in the seamy-side-out artistry that made Kane such an enjoyable masterwork. Judging by the success of such directors as Kubrick and Hitchcock and Nichols, people prefer this ingenuous sort of movie. Huston's quiet style is a little out of fashion now, and Huston himself, in his late sixties, is no longer a young-man-on-the-make. He can do just what he wants to do, and he eschews the gimcrackery of camera angles and portentous pans and jazzy cutting.

Fat City is not a prepossessing film, not one that people will line up in the rain to see, certainly not one that will gladden the hearts of Columbia execs like The Godfather did over at Paramount. Yet I can't help liking it far better than, say, Bogdanovich's The Last Picture Show, to which it bears a startling resemblance. You don't get that embarrassing higness of purpose in Fat City, that ill-concealed lust for greatness that makes you cringe. (It's a look that has become altogether too common of late.)

Yet it is inspiring to see this Hollywood veteran come out of a long drought (as Hitchcock, rather less fallidiously, has done with Frenzy) to show the elegant young directors who write columns and tancy thamsalvas oracles that moviemaking has not been left to them alone.

Fat City is not a great film (though it has assurance, artistry, and style) but it is unmistakably the work of a man who has — or had — greatness in him.

Canada-Soviet series over... winner in doubt

"Freedom," crowed an ecstatic Nancy Eagleson, "always wins out in the end."

Her outburst came after Paul Henderson firmly established himself as a Canadian folk hero by slipping a puck under Vladislav Tretiak in Moscow in the final minute of play last Thursday. The goal, of course, gave Team Canada a dramatic 6-5 win in the eighth and deciding game in the series against the Soviet National Team. The victory, close though it was, at least partially restored Canada's self-image, shaken by years of humiliation in international 'amateur' competition, and by defeats at the hands of the Soviets earlier in the series.

But what was involved was much, much more than a contest between two groups of superb athletes, or tremendously exciting entertainment for millions of spectators around the world, or even the pride of a small nation establishing supremacy over the Soviet goliath in at least one sphere of activity.

It was, as Nancy Eagleson, and her husband Alan, executive director of the NHL Players' Association, and spokesman for Team Canada, never lost an opportunity to point out, a highly charged, if largely symbolic, political clash between two nations on opposite sides of the Cold War, between different value systems, different attitudes to sport, and different life styles.

On the one side, there were the forces of light, the Canadians, defending their national pride, and representing the values that were billed as the keystones of Western Civilization: individualism, free enterprise, and the prestige of the National Hockey League.

On the other side, there were the forces of darkness, the big red machine of godless communism, representing machine-like precision, iron-clad discipline, dead seriousness, and faceless teamwork. For them, too, national prestige was at stake, for sport is an important component of Soviet foreign policy in an era when the accommodation with imperialism that is legitimized with the label of peaceful co-existence has taken the place of the theories of international proletarian revolution that the Kremlin bureaucrats long ago carefully buried in Lenin's tomb.

It has long been clear, of course, despite the fantasies of the Avery Brundages, that sports and politics are inseparable. On one level, this is true because sports events, especially on the international level, have been systematically used to make political points. This is made inevitable by the very nature of international sports, where the competition is between nations, not athletes, and where the glare of publicity makes winning everything, and the development of sportsmanship and mass participation in sports, nothing.

On a more fundamental level, sports are political because they are a reflection of the societies that produce them. Different class structures, different value systems, different cultures, produce different approaches to athletics in a nation. And as well, sports play a role in the social fabric of a nation. It is no accident, for example, that the campus 'jocks' moved to attack the radicals when a student rebellion shut down

Columbia University, or that Richard Nixon uses football analogies to explain his latest move in the game of genocide he is playing in Indochina.

Even before the series began, politics were very much in evidence. In Canada, Bobby Hull, J.C. Tremblay, and Derek Sanderson were banned from the team because they had exercised their rights as free-enterprisers in a way that was beyond the pale — signing with the World Hockey Association. The patriotism of the NHL did not quite extend to the point of relaxing its vindictiveness towards those who were threatening its profit position. Among NHL owners, only Harold Ballard spoke in favour of going "To Russia With Hull". It is probably only coincidence that the favourable publicity he received did much to obliterate the memory of his recent fraud conviction from the public mind.

In the Soviet Union, meanwhile, Anatoli Taresov, the man who built Russian hockey into a powerful force, was in disfavour, and excluded from any role in the series. Along with him, top Soviet stars Vitaly Davydov and Anatoli Firsov, known to be loyal to the old regime, did not travel to Canada.

Pre-series statements by the two sides were among the first contrasts that appeared. Canadian hockey writers, coaches, and assorted experts were virtually unanimous in proclaiming that Canada would win by a lop-sided margin. Team Canada, they said, had the edge in almost every department. The players were perhaps less boastfully arrogant, but all indications were that they too, for the most part, did not take the Soviets too seriously.

But then they were going on little more than a report prepared by Toronto Maple Leaf coach John McLellan and scout Bob Davidson, who, with no previous experience in international hockey, spent a mere four days in the Soviet Union, and saw two games in that time. On the basis of this experience, they reported that Soviet goalie Tretiak was woefully weak (in the one game they saw him play, he allowed eight goals). They did not realize his poor play was the result of an off night produced by nervousness over his upcoming wedding the following day. And most of their other evaluations proved to be equally far from the mark. The organizers of Team Canada, with typical NHL arrogance, didn't consider it worth their while to consult with Canadians who had experience with the Russians and international hockey, such as former national team coaches David Bauer or Jackie MacLeod.

The Soviets, on the other hand, displayed a markedly different approach. They hoped, they modestly said, to be able to learn from the Canadian professionals. They did not expect to win, but they were confident that they would be able to put up a good fight. To what extent this was designed to lull the Canadians into a false confidence, and to enable the Soviets to save face if they did lose a series they really expected to win, is not clear.

It is certain, however, that they approached the series like the professionals they are, while the Canadian professional hockey establishment approached it in the most amateurish way. The Russian coaches spent two weeks in Canada watching Team Canada practice, and took copious notes on all aspects of the team's play while they were there. The questions they asked sometimes flabbergasted the Canadians: the Soviets were concerned with things that Canadian coaches had never even considered, such as recovery rates, pass completion ratios, and distance skated. But, when, all this attention was flattering for the Canadians.

The play in the series proved a number of things. It proved that the Soviets were better, a great deal better, than anyone had expected. In teamwork, in play-making, and on the power play, they were clearly superior to Team Canada. The illusions of a decade ("if only we could play our pros") were shattered by the 7-3 humiliation in the Montreal Forum, and nothing Paul Henderson and Phil Esposito could do could quite make it up.

At the same time, Team Canada's victory should not be attributed to luck. The Canadian pros showed a tremendous ability to rise to the task that faced them and to come from behind to establish themselves as the better team. For better they were, and by a larger margin than the final outcome might indicate. Playing in September, when their physical and mental conditioning was far below the level of the Soviets, who in a year-round, made a major difference to the Canadians. Much of the lack of teamwork, too, should be attributed to the fact that Team Canada was hastily thrown together from players who had never played together before, rather than to "individualism". The refereeing, of course, went "From Badger to Vorst"; it was almost as biased as it was incompetent. And finally, the presence of Bobby Hull and Bobby Orr would have made a considerable difference.

But this does not diminish the tremendous strides that the Soviets have made. And more importantly, there is every reason to believe that Canadian hockey is deteriorating, or at best static, while Russian (and European) hockey is steadily improving. If Team Canada's victory is taken as grounds to maintain the smug self-satisfaction of the past, then the victory will have been pyrrhic indeed.

The reasons for this, of course, are not hard to find. In Canada, coaching techniques and approaches to the game have not significantly altered in decades. In Europe, on the other hand, the stress has necessarily been on improving what was at one time a dismally low level of play. The result has been that the Europeans are willing to learn from anyone, while Canadian coaches have seen no need to improve on their game or to learn anything. Consequently, the European (and especially the Soviet) game is in a constant process of development, always looking for more ways to improve, never satisfied with the level achieved.

The approach is decidedly scientific. Russian coaches have to pass extensive tests to become qualified. Players are given training in theory, and in physical education fundamentals, as well as in actual play. An elaborate structure that now boasts ten million registered hockey players in the Soviet Union has been built up, and on all levels, the stress is on constant improvement. And the improvement, of course, has been phenomenal. The series with Team Canada should give added impetus to the process.

In Canada, on the other hand, the commercialization of hockey, its position as an entertainment product, rather than a mass participation sport, have changed the nature of "Canada's national game".

The emphasis in Canada, even for the youngest players, is on playing games, not on learning skills and fundamentals. (And not just on playing games, but on winning them at any cost, including dirty play and no ice time for half the players.) Says Lloyd Parvizal, one of the few Canadian physical educationists to dissent, "the idea of development through coaching, testing and evaluation and problem solving, is, with few exceptions, given no attention."

The anti-structure of hockey is a pyramid leading up to the NHL, and hockey on all levels is controlled by, and geared to the needs of, the NHL franchises. And those priorities, needless to say, have to do with the making of profits, not the development of community-oriented sports programs.

The difference can be traced to what Bruce Kidd has pointed out is the difference between commercial sport and professional sport. A professional athlete (and both the Russians and the Canadians are that) plays his game for a living. But, in commercial sport, the goal is to make profits for those who pay the athletes, and the result is the introduction of many factors extraneous to sport. And things which are irrelevant to the making of profits, or which create competition for the NHL monopolists, such as senior hockey leagues, or the development of a Canadian national team, are ruthlessly axed.

Team Canada proved that it could rise to the challenge of changing conditions. Off the ice, the late-night drinking and partying ceased as the players took the Soviet team more seriously. On the ice, teamwork and two-way play replaced the sometimes more spectacular, but also, against the Russians, spectacularly inefficient individual virtuoso performances. In the process, Canadians learned that in team hockey, the Elises and Parises were more valuable than the high-scoring Vic Hadfields and Richard Martins. Some, like Hadfield, responded with childish petulance, others learned the lesson. Said Harry Sinden: "If I'd gone for complete hockey players (in selecting the team) a lot of the guys from the first three all-star teams would have been missing." Canadian coaches, and Canadian fans, were finding that the Russians could teach them, as well.

But while Team Canada learned some lessons (as well as teaching some to the Russians), it was not as clear if the Canadian hockey establishment was listening. Many, it seems, have let the euphoria of the hard-won victory wipe out the memory of the scare that the Russians inflicted on them.

The series, however, represented a meeting of cultures as well as a clash of hockey teams. On one level, this was apparent in the Swedish games. The Swedes specialized in subtle sparring and melodramatic hysterics when the Canadians retaliated. When the Canadians, used to taking the law into their own hands, retaliated, they were denounced as "criminals" and "gangsters" by the Swedish press (as well as by such astute hockey observers as the Canadian ambassador to Sweden and Wilder Penfield).

More important was the contrast between Canadian and Russian society that the series illustrated. Predictably, the traditional Cold War hostility was still in evidence, especially among the Canadians. "Nyat, nyet, Soviet" they chanted in Moscow. "The Russians," said Alan Eaglason, "have only one philosophy, only one system. That is the muscle system. I'd rather be a bum in Toronto than a major general in Russia." This, after Russian police took him into custody for jumping from his seat and knocking two of their number to the ground. Said Eaglason, "I was in their dressing room after the last game and some of them broke down and cried. I'm really sorry for them for being stuck in Russia."

But Eaglason, for all his persistent and insulting remarks about the Soviets, did not set the tone of the series.

Other indications pointed in other directions, and they predominated. There was the advertising prominently displayed on the boards of the Moscow rink. Or the scrupulous rule-consciousness of the Russians, a reflection, perhaps, of the same mentality that enabled Stalin to sell out communist-led resistance movements in Europe for the sake of keeping his side in a deal he had made with Churchill to split the continent.

Toronto art offers sumptuous variety of works

A potpourri at Hart House

Diverse in style, technique, and media yet continuous as a whole: This may best describe the overall effect of the Recent Acquisitions Exhibition 1969-72, showing in the Hart House Art Gallery. The show offers a wide range of media, from acrylics, oils and watercolors to pencil, ink and crayon. Air brush, hard edge, and heavy impasto are used. In many of the works, the show, leaving little to the imagination, includes everything from abstraction to naturalism, and more conceptually, from fantasy to reality. For example, Albert de Kergommeaux's "A System of 12 Blue/Violet" displays the modular, Paul Emile Borduas' "Le Temps se Met au Beau" the use of tachism, Louis de Niverville's "Still Life With Love" an almost metaphysical style, and Oscar Cahen's "Ancient Throne", abstract expressionism. Accompanying these are a host of others which yield naturalistic studies either figuratively or through landscape. Of special mention are the gifts from the Douglas M. Duncan Collection, the prize possessions from which are four David Milnes. It doesn't take much concentrated looking to realize why many Canadians have so eagerly acquainted themselves with his works. Hart House has a total of 14 Milnes in its Permanent Collection including seven acquisitions which have received especially high praise.

Although the gallery is filled with works of art by many different artists of varied backgrounds, the whole display presents itself as a total visual experience. Skillfully hung, the works display a pleasing interaction, with small, medium, large, and very large all harmonizing into one mosaic. The variety of colour ranges from garish reds through blue azures to blending whites, and contributes to a vivid orchestration of hues. And while the works of more serious artists such as Jack Bush and Marcel Barbeau tend to dominate intellectually, the op and pop works by Greg Curnow and Joce Wieland offer a sense of dramatic relief. The Curnow, Variety, then, is the key note in this exhibition, presenting a good cross-section of the quality and extent of the whole Permanent Collection. The closing date of the show is October 8, this Sunday, and Hart House is hoping that as many people as possible will make a point of seeing it. The viewer should feel en-entitled "Landscape Calamity Corners", which is balanced bilaterally with a Ronald Bloore on the west wall, looks puristic from a distance, but up close, very close, one sees a message few people notice and rarely read. couraged to walk around Hart House at his leisure (after all, he pays for it and its upkeep) to take in the rest of the Collection which is one of the largest privately-owned collections of Canadian art anywhere.

Olitsky's bold paints exciting

I approached the Olitski exhibit, now on display at the David Mirvish Gallery on Markham Street, with high expectations, for Jules Olitski is considered to be one of the leading Abstract painters on the art scene today. In his most famous work, layer upon layer of delicately colored acrylic paint was sprayed onto large canvases, producing exquisite atmospheric effects, and an almost mystical sensation of space.

In this show, Olitski seems to be following the recent trend towards more "painterly" surfaces, by using thicker layers of pigment, in some pieces completely abandoning the spray technique for which he is noted.

Unfortunately, the thicker paint presents certain problems for the viewer. Whereas in earlier works, the eye was able to penetrate the fragile surfaces of gently swirling pastel mists, in many of these pictures the opaque paint tends to bring the eye to a dead stop. This prevents the detail and drawing at the edge of the work from relating to the now solid, central area of color.

However, in a more successful piece, such as "Radical Love 12", the yellow paint has been worked with broad strokes, which break the surface into several facets, and allow the eye to move freely among the newly created planes. This results in a visual excitement that is further enhanced by the subtle patches of lemon paint that emanate from the rich surface. The slash of golden pigment at the top seems to force its way through this substantial mass to be magically transformed into a thin line drawn on the left. This interaction tends to further integrate the painting.

It is works such as these that assure us that our expectations are not vain, for the high quality of the paintings is evident.

Flux in American politics helps nobody but Nixon

Changing Sources of Power: American Politics in the 1970's
by Frederick Dutton;
McGraw-Hill Ryerson.

Changing Sources of Power is an examination of some of the ways that traditional American power bases are shifting. Sudden gusts of public emotions have always worried professional politicians because they upset the most careful calculations of even the shrewdest of statisticians. However, the dislocations in political thinking today have created additional problems for those who must assess America's mood during the election year.

It is obvious that Vietnam, inflation, unemployment, unrest among whites and the young, the emergence of blacks as a political force, all are having significant and crucial effects upon voting patterns. There are, for example, signs of a serious breakdown in party loyalty. All these factors make any accurate predictions virtually impossible. The imponderables are so many that only the amateur would attempt to say just why the voters are doing what they are doing.

Frederick Dutton, an aide to Robert Kennedy in the 1968 primaries, clearly recognizes that, while there has been a shift in the power balances within America, it would be unwise to forecast what will happen later in the seventies.

He is careful not to do so. He surveys the changes in public thinking, however, and, although he doesn't reach any major conclusions, gathers supporting evidence to justify the title of his book. Changing Sources of Power is worth reading for its grasp of the possible reactions of a seriously disturbed nation and the effects both internal and external stresses are having on the two party-system.

It is historically accurate to say that the broad center has usually decided elections in the States, even though the center itself has moved time and again. Dutton does not dismiss this theory but he cites considerable evidence to prove that the past is not a reliable guide to the future. A third and perhaps a fourth major party, each with strong constituent support, may lie ahead and may be strong enough to break the hold of the Democrats and Republicans. Of the newly enfranchised young voters Dutton writes:

"The potential impact of all the young people coming of age in the 1970's lies not in just their numbers but in the distinctiveness of much about them... These young people know the Depression, World War II, and most of the cold war as only episodes in the history textbooks. They have been shaped instead by the greatest material outpouring for almost an entire society that the world has ever seen, capped in the 1960's by the longest-sustained prosperity this country has yet had. And so the conditioning and the expectations they bring into the electorate are as different from the Depression rooted attitudes and insecurities as the ICBM is from the Model T."

Women, too, have taken a greater interest in and are more involved now than they ever were in the political process. Organized labor, with all its money and manpower resources, is a vital factor, despite the rank-and-file's split on foreign policy. Union leadership is not only of the older generation but was conditioned by the events preceding WWII and the eggrandizement of the Soviet Union in the years that followed it. The so-called "military-industrial" complex is more accurately identified, Dutton insists, as the "industrial-military-organized labor-scientific-higher education-coalition.... Roughly ten per cent of the entire labor force has come to owe its paychecks directly to defense spending, and practically all of that group is unionized. It provides a firm buttress for the AFL-CIO's hard-line foreign policy stance."

Cheech and Chong's debut album was a comedic bomb and a commercial success. So with nowhere to go but up, the pair has made a more realistic effort at provoking laughter in this era of uncertainty with Big Bambu (A & M). As in the previous LP much of the material centres on the drug culture, but unlike its predecessor, Big Bambu doesn't get into three or four minutes of boring dialogue aiming at a thin punchline.

Not all the cuts work but most of them are at least interesting. Ralph and Herbie offers a particularly funny look into a canine world. The conception is innovative and well performed. The T.V. parody, Let's Make a Dope Deal is another piece of right on humour.

In keeping with their image Tommy Chong and Richard Cheech have put their record in a cover designed like a package of cigarette (?) papers and have even included one super-sized paper. It's still a comedy-novelty album and like all the others, the jokes lose their sparkle after the initial listening.

I'm told that much of the humour is visual. You have a chance to find out for yourself on Oct. 10 when C. & C. are slated to appear at Massey Hall.

The Riverboat, (922-6216), 134 Yorkville, is featuring the super blues duo Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee tonight through October 22. Admission is $3.50 and the first set starts about 9 pm.

Fiddlers Green, near Yonge and Eglinton (489-3001), presents contemporary folk artist Jack Schechtman tonight and Chris Rawlin on Tuesday night.

Canadian jazz guitarist Lenny Breau can be heard at Grumbles, 71 Jarvis above King (368-0796), tonight and tomorrow. Next week, beginning on Monday is the 'Honky Tonk Angel', Ellen Mellwaine. Admission is down to $2.50.

Thirsty rock-fiends can content themselves at the El Mocambo Tavern, Spadina at College (961-2558), with April Wine this weekend and King Biscuit Boy beginning Monday. No cover is required but beer prices go up a bit when the band goes on.

Starting on Sunday, October 8 at 3:03 pm, CBC-AM Radio begins a special 13-week series of one-hour programs entitled The Beatles Story. Having taken over a year to produce by the BBC, the series promises to present many fresh interviews and a lot of music, including some extremely rare recordings tracing the rise and fall of the Beatles.

A plethora of new releases should be arriving in the record stores today. WEA Music has promised me you can find the following: Gordon Lightfoot's Old Dan's Records, the Jethro Tull double live album Live in the Past, John Prine's Diamonds in the Rough, a double set from Deep Purple entitled Passage, John Hartford's Morning Bugle, and a new Yes effort, Closer to the Edge. Yes will also be in concert on Oct. 31 at Maple Leaf Gardens.

Just a few years ago, a determined record buyer could, with luck, find six or seven recordings of Mahler symphonies. Today, there are over ninety available. To appreciate just how much work these records represent, consider what goes into recording a symphony. If the work being recorded is by, for example, Mozart, a day or two is needed, and some twenty to seventy players are involved, depending on the wishes of the conductor. Compare this to Mahler's greatest achievement, the eighth, popularly called the "Symphony of A Thousand". This involves two full choruses, a children's choir, a brass choir at the back of the hall, piano, organ, harmonium, eight vocal soloists, four harps, and a nearly double-size orchestra. Add to this the tremendous length, complexity, and intensity it possesses and you are faced with a gigantic recording project. Yet in spite of this, there are six recordings of this work available, five of which have been recorded in the past four years!

Certainly the most popular recording of a Mahler symphony available today is the Third, as conducted by Jaścha Horenstein. This is a top-selling, superb album, mixed using the Dolby noise reduction system, which makes for an almost noise-free recording. The symphony itself is a six-movement sonic orgy, with the ending of the first movement more than enough for the kinkiest stereo buff. This movement is a panorama of summer "marching in", with blaring horns, mystical themes, a riotous march, and percussion everywhere. The other five movements, while less muscular, are no less magnificent. Every trick in the Mahlerian symphonic bag is here, from the children's choir to the big choral movement to the faraway post-horn solo. The third and fourth movements feature the Ambrosian Singers, the Wadsworth Children's Choir, and the gifted contralto Norma Proctor. The London Symphony Orchestra plays superbly and with great love for the music throughout, making this the ideal way to get a start with Mahler. There are several other excellent recordings of the third available, but none of them feature this set's price: just $5.39 for two lp's.

If you think you'd like to take the plunge, the complete edition worth getting is the one on Deutsche Grammophon, conducted by Rafael Kubelik. The fourteen discs in this set are near-perfect both musically and sonically, and right now A&A's on Yonge has it at $29.00 (usually $56). Other symphonies worth the money are the Second, conducted by Bruno Walter, the Sixth, by George Szell, the previously mentioned Eighth led by Georg Solti and the Ninth, with Leonard Bernstein, (Dave Baskin)

The Canadian Opera Company will not give up and La Boheme will be staged tonight at 8:15, Eugene Onegin (tomorrow at 2 pm, Tosca at 8:15 pm and again on Monday same time, Eugene Onegin on Tuesday at 8:15 and Aida on Wednesday at 8:15.

Melville Cook never gives up either, and I wonder when CBC-FM's Organist in Recital series will take note of this fact again. He's about due for the series and there have been all these recent opportunities, for example last Monday, or this Monday at 8:30 pm. Students pay $1. At Metro United Church.

The Faculty of Music's season of Thursday Evening Concerts opens with An Entertainment for Elizabeth, a "production with a cast of 24" which "celebrates the unity of poetry, song, music and dance which made the Elizabethan court the wonder of its age." John Hollander provides the lyrics (they will be good, he is a first-rate poet and scholar) and the New York Pro Musica the music. It's in the MacMillan Theatre, at 8:30 pm, and $2 student tickets are available at the box office, although these are in short supply.

An exhibition honouring the late Healey Willan has been set up in the Alumni Common Room, second floor, Med Sciences Building until December 3. Memorabilia, pictures, scores, recordings of his music and the composer's awards are included in the exhibit.

Neon Palace. Nostalgia is a sweet pleasure, but it's one-shot, which is why Neon Palace can draw spontaneous applause at the very point that I am thinking of leaving if it doesn't perk up. It was in 1967 that I re-began singing Peggy Sue and found it sprang out of uncontrollable memory, perfect to the dotted quarter-note. It was 1968 when good old Dave Harding dispelled the Cuban boredom with Catch a Falling Star and Put it in Your Pocket, 1970 when Al Mattes laid me out with the (old) news that the thing she was looking for, that took her life that night, was a high school ring. Etc. But it palls, and now, in 1972, there are few touchstones that remain unturned. "We had a quarrel..." begins the quavery, oh my God, familiar tenor, and I shoot backwards, once more desperately in love with Joky Vink, and fully re-integrated in time to add "a teenage quarrel..."

But that was the only such moment for me

(until October 29) and Toronto Painting 1953-1965 (coming in November). I mention the latter a month ahead of time because the gallery plans a series of five lectures to complement this and the Ontario Society exhibit; unfortunately, information concerning the lectures reached us a bit late and the first lecture was yesterday, entitled Parties and Pastimes a Century Ago. (Psychologists tell us we are edified to find out what we missed.) The next lecture is October 12, so you will have to wait until next Friday to pick up this week-old paper to find out what you missed. It is entitled Toronto: No Mean City to be delivered by Eric Arthur.

As a timely salute to A. Y. Jackson who celebrated his ninetieth birthday on Tuesday, the gallery has set up a special exhibition which includes a selection of Jackson's oil paintings, sketches and water colours from the AGO Collection, as well as a number of books illustrated by the artist. It runs until October 24.

Erindale College: There will be as many as three shows running at various times in the next week: until October 21 is Graham Cantiem's large lyrical canvases. The young painter is from Quebec and he exhibited last season at the New Brunswick Museum. To the 25th is 3000 Years of Chinese Art, which is a colour photograph exhibit of the ROM's extensive collection, considered one of the best in North America. Starting next Thursday will be a one-man show by young Toronto painter William T. Kort.

Craft Gallery, on Prince Arthur: Stephen Hogbin, Canadian Design Award winner, has a show here until October 28.

Cedarbrae District Library: Pedro R. Leon exhibits his prints at the Scarborough branch on Markham Road until November 10, and the exhibit starts Monday.

Press Porcupic: Joe Rosenblatt, a poet and artist, is exhibiting 100 drawings at 102 Bloor West, 15th floor until October 17.

Morris Gallery: The Romantic Century: 19th Century European Drawings and Small Paintings. This is their second show of this kind, included in which are a few oil paintings from the School of Fontainebleau — Diaz, Daubigny, Harpignies. The drawings cover the whole period from neoclassicism to art nouveau. It closes October 14.

Victoria College: Douglas Martin exhibits his paintings until October 20.

Show-Rimmington Gallery: (Bunny, so they tell me) Wilson and Jack Joel are exhibiting paintings, sculptures, constructions and serigraph until October 15.

HENDRY'S DOUBLE HEADER: Canadian playwright Tom Hendry has two one acts at the Theatre in the Dell, a bar that normally presents musical revues. One good thing about the Dell is the fact that you can drink during the performance and this is essential during the first play, Seance. It's a silly little wedding night farce about a ghost who balls up the nuptials. It was a good idea in Hendry's head but it bombs on the boards. Since they won't serve during the show stock up on drinks beforehand to keep up your spirits. You Smell Good to Me, the second play on the bill is much better; perhaps even good enough to sit through sober but by then it may be too late. The piece is all about an unhappy hooker with a heart of gold who humanizes a computer programmer's digital brain. Reservations, 368-5309.

POOR OLD WORLD, WE LOVE YOU ANYWAY. This schlock monster about a group of North American dope-fiend kids who learn what real life is like on a kibbutz in Israel will make the worst tripe you ever saw in high school look like a Tony award winner. At the TWP Playhouse, 925-8640.

CANADIAN MIME THEATRE is presenting two shows in repertory through Oct. 28 at the Central Library Theatre. The first is Visual Delights '72, a series of skits and sketches that is much better than its stupid title. The second show is The Vagabonds, a sentimental tale about two bums who help a down-and-out girl on her way to fame and fortune. The plot is trite but very well executed by the company of four. 924-8950.

Parties ignore environment issue in election

By RANDY ROBERTSON
 Prominent environmentalist Thomas Beckett claimed Sunday night that no political party in Canada has seriously campaigned against pollution.

Beckett, a Hamilton lawyer, was speaking to about 200 people at a meeting sponsored by the Environmental Law Association in the Medical Sciences Building Auditorium. Along with two others, including Toronto mayoralty candidate David Crombie, he cross-examined three federal candidates from the major parties.

He claimed that government and industry were "too chummy". Donations from industry to party coffers paid off "obviously", he said, in the failure of government to enforce its anti-pollution laws. He did not, however, implicate any specific corporations. He was not alluding to actual instances, he said, but to the general attitude of the government, to the corruption of its responsibility to the public.

Beckett asked the candidates whether each, expressing a personal opinion, did not believe that there was a relationship between the donations that industry made to political parties and the protection these industries received from the party when in power.

Liberal Aideen Nicholson said, "I don't know".

Conservative Ron Atkey said, "I don't know".

But, NDP MP Andrew Brewin said "I do know."

Beckett later asserted that the NDP had no right to present itself as an environment-conscious party simply because it was left-wing.

David Estrin, a lawyer working with the Environmental Law Association, supported Beckett in his charges.

Ward 11 alderman Crombie who is running for mayor, called for a pragmatic approach to combatting pollution. He suggested there be a widely publicized telephone number for citizens to call in a pollution emergency. He also urged that there be pollution fighters on standby at all times. Beckett said talking about pollution means talking in terms of the whole world - he cited the fact that two thirds of the world's population was starving "to put things in perspective" - and about pollution in relation to population, industrial growth, food supplies and non-renewable resources.

"We have to realize", he said, "that our resources and food supplies are limited and that therefore we ourselves have to impose limits on population and industrial growth".

Pollution, he added, is a symptom of the problem, not the problem itself. The problem is the failure to impose limits.

"Our society will collapse within 100 years at the most," he claimed, "if we continue to operate as now".

He asked the candidates what plans "looking 30 years ahead" each candidate's party had to offer and what limits to growth each party would impose.

Atkey, Progressive Conservative candidate in St. Paul's riding, called for "access to redress" for citizens through an environmental bill of rights or through an environmental rights commission like the Ontario Human Rights Commission. Brewin, who is seeking re-election in Greenwoods, was "not too sanguine" about a bill of rights. He favoured serious enforcement of already existing laws and massive financing by the federal government of anti-pollution research. "Technology must defeat the technology that is causing pollution," he said.

Nicholson, Liberal candidate in Trinity, urged co-operation between citizens and their governments at all three levels - between the governments themselves, between government and industry, and between the federal government and foreign governments.

She cited programs instituted by the Liberal government within the past four years which embodied this principle, such as the equal contribution anti-research program begun this year by the federal government and the pulp and paper industry and the US Canada Great Lakes agreement signed this spring. She proposed that the federal government actively invite the participation of citizen's groups in environmental impact studies and in preventative measures.

Beckett suggested that the federal government provide unconditional funds for these citizens' groups.

Beckett claimed that the provincial government was diverting the public's attention to peripheral concerns through campaigns like the "Keep Ontario Beautiful" publicity campaign. Paper on the ground may make an untidy environment, he said but it does not make a dangerous one.

NDP's Harney cheered at forum

Canadian sweat earns Americans dividends

By VAL ROSS

"Every Canadian works three weeks out of the year to pay off the "Yankees" dollars, charged federal NDP candidate John Harney on Tuesday. "We pay $3.5 billion annually in pure dividends for the $60 billion the Americans have invested in this country."

There was no doubt that the Scarborough West candidate got the most enthusiastic response from the audience at a forum on foreign ownership held in a Political Science 202 class. Harney, Jim Gillies, the Conservative for Don Valley, and Boh Kaplan, the Don Valley riding's incumbent Liberal were present to outline their parties' positions on the foreign ownership question.

"The Liberal party has been continentalist since 1945" continued Harney. "What exactly do the Conservatives offer to regain control of our economy, a higher rate of exports?" "Guatemala has a high export quotient of bananas."

The Conservative candidate in Don Valley, James Gillies, described his party's policies to counteract the American takeover of Canada's economy as: increasing exports, and rationalizing secondary industries in Canadian hands. He added that a low interest rate would discourage foreign investment and strengthen the economy internally.

His incumbent Liberal opponent, Robert Kaplan, sporting a red and blue ceramic maple leaf pin, defended the Liberals' record. He cited the creation of the Canadian Development Corporation and Canadian content regulations in broadcasting as evidence of the good intentions of his party on the issue.

Harney insisted that the way to regain control of the Canadian economy was to develop a strong internal economy through government planning and intervention.

Ed Reid, an interviewer from the CBC commented later that he found that an overwhelming majority of students had already decided who to vote for. "They all seem to be Conservative or NDP," he said. "I can't seem to find a Liberal in the class."

Woman prof at Guelph dismissed amid charges of sex discrimination

GUELPH (CUP) — Amid charges of sex discrimination, a woman zoology professor has been forced to resign her position at the University of Guelph.

Anne Dagg was fired in November of 1971 and appealed the dismissal. Soon after winning the appeal, she was told by the administration that she would not receive tenure and would not have her contract renewed in 1973.

Dagg obliged and submitted her resignation last April, but it was not made public until last month, effective the end of last summer's semester.

Students plan to question the dean of the College of Biological Sciences about the Dagg affair when he returns from a holiday in Greece on October 21.

Dagg had been at the university of Guelph for three years.

Earlier this year a university tenure and promotion committee charged that Dagg was not available for consultation with students, her research was poor, her university participation was minimal and she did not take a part in community life.

Dagg claims the dean told her tenure was refused because she lived 15 miles out of town and had a family.

She feels a major reason for her dismissal was her opposition to the dean's choice for a new Zoology Department chairman in 1970. His choice was eventually rejected, but, she says, three of the other seven professors opposing the appointment were later forced to resign.

Dagg said her research work has been impartially judged as excellent by a representative of the Canadian Association of University Teachers and her students rated her a good teacher. She also said that women were not allowed to participate on university committees. The only remaining charge is that she lives 15 miles from the university and has a family.

"To find that my work counts for nothing because I have a family and live outside Guelph, the only accusations that I have received that are based on fact has been totally demoralizing for me", Dagg said.

Archer will shoot for easier target this time

By JULIA ELCOCK

Ward 5 alderman William Archer last week announced his intention to seek election in Ward 6 in the December 4 municipal election. In Ward 5, Archer would have faced a strong challenge from incumbent Ying Hope and reform candidate Colin Vaughan. The Ward 6 contest for the two aldermanic seats is among incumbents June Marks and Horace Brown, along with Dan Heap and Rose

Smith and others, and now Archer. Archer said in an interview yesterday that if he had remained in Ward 5 he feels sure that he would have done well. In fact, he said, he was asked by several people to run again in view of what he called his "wonderful record". However, he sees Ward 6 as a challenge for reform in downtown renewal.

He said the Yonge Street Mall, a project he worked on during the summer, is one of his main concerns. He talked of seeking answers to the traffic, pedestrian, and delivery problems of the mall.

He also mentioned the southeast Spadina area as one of special concern. This region, largely composed of Chinese, Portuguese and Anglo-Saxon people, is continually fighting the incursion of high density housing and institutional buildings.

At one time, he said, the University of Toronto planned to expand southwards but since then the idea has been scrapped, leaving the area without a plan for "reform."

Archer was concerned with park maintenance and the possible building of a community centre for the area. He added that this would be in accordance with the wishes of the community.

Explaining his roots in Ward 6 the junior Ward 5 alderman said he works and pays taxes in it. At one time it was part of the old Ward 3 which he represented before the boundaries changed in 1969.

Bomb threat scares college

A false bomb scare halted classes for an hour and emptied New College residences yesterday afternoon.

The threat, phoned into the main U of T switchboard at 1:50 pm, said a bomb would go off at 2:30 somewhere in the college. The caller did not say in which of the two New buildings or whether it was at 2:30 am or pm the alleged bomb was due to blow up.

U of T fire prevention officers and campus police informed building users of the threat and suggested they leave the building. At 2:25 the fire alarm was set off and the building was evacuated.

When the explosion did not occur, at about 2:50 pm, police again allowed re-entry, at one's "own personal risk."

U of T Chief Fire Prevention Officer H.F. Gladney said there was no way the caller could be traced.

The last time a bomb threat occurred, in 1971 at the Lash Miller buildings, it too failed to materialized.

A & S caucus formed

By NADIM WAKEAM

Student members of the Arts and Science General Committee decided yesterday to form a caucus in order to raise issues which concern students, but which are ignored by the faculty members of the committee.

The students organizing the caucus will try to decide a policy on issues before each meeting of the committee.

The General Committee, composed of 52 students and approximately 150 faculty and administrators, deals with course changes, exams and curriculum in the faculty.

Various speakers advocated formulating proposed changes in such a way that they are acceptable to liberal faculty on the committee.

Dave Laughten, who acted as chairman of the meeting, said that at present every student proposal is voted down by faculty opposition.

Earlier in the meeting, the student committee members voted unanimously to ratify the constitution of the new Arts and Science Student Union. However, the meeting recommended to the constitutional drafting committee of the union that the quorum for meetings be reduced to one third from a half.

Asked why the executive of the union is to be composed of only five people, Phil Dack, until recently full-time fieldworker in arts and science, replied that a larger executive would be unwieldy and could not meet often.

The caucus also decided to ask the Faculty of Arts and Science if vacant student seats on the General Committee could be filled by election.

A key game in the Eastern Section of OUA football will be played this evening in Ottawa when the blues meet the Ottawa Gee Gees. The only other time the two teams clashed Ottawa came out on top, 24-7. In the other eastern game, Carleton travels to Queen's. In the Western Section, Guelph goes to Windsor, McMaster travels to Lutheran, and Waterloo meets Western in London. Waterloo defeated McMaster 9-7 last weekend, and along with Western is the only other undefeated team in the west. In the Mac game, Waterloo's offence failed to score on four occasions from inside the Mac defence 30-yard line. Look for an improved attempt on this against Western. . . The OUA Football Championship is being held this weekend at the Carleton Golf and Yacht Club in Manotick, Ontario. The tournament consists of five players from four universities in the Western Section and four from the east. The best four of five scores are tallied to get the teams' scores. At the Western Sectional eliminations last weekend at Waterloo, the University of Waterloo retained its championship. The teams played only 30 of 36 holes due to rain, and Waterloo had a best-of-four total of 497. Western finished second with 509, McMaster was third with 522, and Brock fourth with 533. This weekend, Waterloo will be attempting to win its third championship in four years. They were defeated last year by McMaster in the finals. Teams will be competing for the Ruttan Cup, while the McCall Cup goes to the individual champion. As Western Section winners, U of T is sending Richard Highes, Doug Findlay, Tony Sergautis, Paul Skinner, and John Bays.

. . . The Eastern Section Tennis Championship continues today at York University. The Western Section Championship was held Monday and Tuesday at Western, with Western taking first place. U of T was the sectional winner last year and hopes to retain its title. The OUA championship will be held at the University of Guelph, Saturday, October 14. . . The Chevron informs us that the cross-country invitational track meet in Waterloo this week Saturday has been cancelled because of the Oktoberfest Marathon and the 5-mile Bier Doktor's Jog.

The University of Waterloo and the community are sponsoring the races in an effort to stimulate interest and participation in running. Entries have come from as far away as Ohio to the south, and Sudbury to the north. Both races begin at 1 pm from the U of W campus. The jog consists of three laps around the university's "ring road", while the Marathon winds through Waterloo County. .

Intramural Rugby and Lacrosse began this week with two divisions and two championships in lacrosse, and two divisions and one championship in rugby. In lacrosse, division I consists of PHE A, Vic, Devonshire House, Erindale, Eng, and St. Mike's. Division II includes PHE B, Innis, Scar, Knox, UC, For, Dent, Trin, and PHE C. There are five teams in Rugby Division I — Eng I, PHE A, Scar, Trin A, and St. Mike's. Division II consists of Law, PHE B, Eng II, Trin B, Wycliffe (tentative). More coverage to follow, staff allowing. . . In the Intramural Sports Committee elections last Monday, Bob Heatley was elected as the ISC representative to the Athletic Directorate in his first year on the committee. Mike Penman, serving a second year on the ISC was elected chairman of that body, while Marty Ahermae was elected vice-chairman. . . 96 free pre-season hours were distributed to the intramural hockey teams on a rotational system. . . Practices for the U of T Wrestling Team begin October 10 in the Wrestling and Judo Room, Hart House, from 4:30 to 6 pm. The team chances look good this year with the return of three veteran medalists, John Davis, Ken White, and Chris Preobrazenski. Davis, PhD candidate in psychology, contends there's a strong analogy between wrestling and a game of chess. A person in good shape can defeat a much stronger opponent simply by the use of better tactics. . . The Judo Club is accepting female members for the first time. The lessons are free with coaching headed by Goki Uemura, Canadian lightweight champion (150 lbs), and the holder of a fifth degree Dan Black Belt. The captains are Henry Pasma and Chris Preobrazenski (Ontario Heavyweight Brown Belt Champion). Classes are held regularly from noon to 1 pm in the Wrestling and Judo Room, Hart House.

Track team halts UWO challenge; wins 75-52

The University of Toronto Track Team was able to defeat Western invitational challenge meet by a score of 75 to 52 (points) Tuesday evening. In the Waterloo Invitational meet yesterday, U of T placed fourth out of ten teams with only six members of the team deciding to travel to Waterloo.

In Western on Tuesday U of T placed first in 11 of 19 events, and second in 9 of 19.

In the sprints, Peter Spitz placed first in the 100 yard event with a time of 10.4 seconds. Teammate Dave Colbert was second with 10.5, and Dave Howes, also of Toronto, finished at 10.9. In the 220, Colbert came second in 23.2 to Western's Terry Rotondo :22.6;

In the 440, U of T's Bill Johnson was first at 51.8 and Tony Rockingham third (52.5).

In the middle distance runs Toronto's Gerry Feeney came first in the 660-yard event in a time of one minute, 21 seconds, even. U of T's Matt Duncan came in third at 1:23.9. U.W.O.'s Dave Best was second in 1:21.2. In the 880 it was Duncan in 2:10.9 and Larry Hoo (U of T) in 2:11.3. Toronto's Joe Sax, Frank Aguanno, Paul Glynn and John Sharp took the top four spots in the mile run (in that order) with Sax's best time of 4:21.5 minutes. In the three mile run, Toronto again captured the first three places, with John Sharpe's best time of 14:23.8 (Peter Pimm and Brad Morley finished second and third, respectively). Western won the six mile run with Peter Camani's best time of 31:55.5

The 120 high hurdles were won by Toronto's Avo Albo at 16.9 seconds. Brian Anderson and Ray Anthony of Western placed second and third. In the 440 hurdles Toronto's Albo again placed first (3/4-1/2) and Paul Glynn (U of T) was second in 62.6.

In the 4 x 110 yard relay Toronto's team was first in 44 seconds. Western entered two teams finishing second and third. In the 4 x 440 relay Western came first in 3:30.7, while U of T entered four teams and won the next four positions.

Western and Toronto split the jump events, with U of T winning the long jump, and triple jump, and Western the pole vault and high jump. In the long jump it was Hung Der first (21 feet, one-quarter inch), and Erik Little, second (19ft. 10 in.). Dave Watt won the triple jump with 43 feet, 10 inches. Watt also placed second in the high jump at 5 feet, 10 inches, with UWO's Ray Anthony going for 6 feet, 5 inches. Western swept all three pole vault positions with a top height by Scott White, 13 feet, 6 inches.

Finally, in the throwing events it was Western the winner in all three. Harvey Barkauskas placed first in the shot put (51 feet even) and the discus (148 feet, 3 inches), while Al Northcott won the javelin with 192 feet, 4.5 inches.

In yesterday's Waterloo Invitational meet U of T only sent six team members but managed one first, three second, and one third place finishes (out of 18 men's events) to enable the team to gain a fourth place berth. Toronto finished with 51 points. Waterloo was first with 96, Western second with 90, and Queen's third with 75. York followed U of T with 40 points. For the women's events it was Laurentian first with 73, Western second, 56, and York third with 30.

Toronto's Bill Johnson finished first in the 400 metres with a time of 51.8. Bob DeGroot was second in the 100 metres with 11.2; Spitz was third in 11.3. Matt Duncan was second in the 800 metre with 15:8.4, and the Toronto team placed second in the 4 x 100 metre relay in 44.3.

U of T does not have a women's intercollegiate track team. With this weekend's cross-country invitational cancelled, the next meet is the Western Invitational next Friday, followed by the York Cross-Country Invitational on October 14.

namization and pacification programs. Thompson stressed that the pacification program in the countryside involves all government branches, not just the military and the police.

As to the progress of the war, Thompson detailed several previous stages of fighting, saying that the National Liberation Front (which he referred to as Viet Cong) were destroyed in the 1968 Tet offensive, resulting in the present offensive by the North Vietnamese Army. He characterized the latter as an "invasion", accepting the division of Vietnam into separate countries.

He claimed the offensive has failed due to lack of Sino-Soviet support and underestimation of American weaponry.

"Laser bombs are more accurate than any artillery", he said proudly.

Answering questions, he said that the bombing of the North was directed at their "logistic system", thus justifying the use of fragmentation bombs on the Ho Chi Minh trail.

Any bombing of dikes was "accidental", and the Vietnamese were partially to blame by using smoke screens to deflect the laser bombs from their intended military targets.

In answer to questions, Thompson reiterated his defense of attacks on Vietnam saying, "Quite definitely, I shall be more certain of peace over the next four years if President Nixon is re-elected."

He predicted that there could not be "an invasion of this sort again within three years", while warning that North Vietnam is little more than an extension of China. (He incorrectly claimed that Vietnamese language and culture are basically Chinese.)

He closed by telling an interested student of counter-insurgency that yes, the lessons he learned in Vietnam are "in broad detail applicable anywhere". He said "the Portuguese have learned a lot of the lessons in Mozambique and Angola", and in response to a direct question, justified the Portuguese-directed actions in the last of the African colonies.

Blues lose to Buffalo in exhibition play

The State University of New York at Buffalo played with neophyte enthusiasm and all-American zeal to defeat the Blues 3-2 at the stadium Wednesday.

The teams were relatively equal in score throughout the game. However, Buffalo demonstrated its superior play when it scored the winner with only six minutes remaining in the game.

The goal was scored off a free kick after Blues had been penalized late in the game. A dummy runner was sent over the ball, past the Toronto wall, and into a gaping hole left by the inadequate Toronto cover. The kicker merely slid the ball alongside the open runner, who lifted the ball over an isolated goalkeeper.

Wednesday's game opened in predictably scrappy fashion, different styles taking time to size up their opponents. A pitch scarred by football practices, and the forthright thrusts of the Buffalo team tended to disturb the Blues' composure.

However, while the visitors' attack showed brisk aggressiveness in moving the ball down their left flank, the team demonstrated a dangerous tendency towards squareness at the back.

Fifteen minutes into the game the Buffalo team scored their first goal. A sharp break down the Buffalo left provoked only lax and hesitant cover from the Blues. The Buffalo winger then crossed the ball hard, was able to control it, and then hooked a volley back into the far corner of the Toronto net. Toronto goalkeeper Brand only managed to get an unavailing fingertip on the ball.

The Buffalo goal appeared to arouse the Blues, who played their best in the final 30 minutes before halftime. A barrage of shots rained on the Buffalo net as the Blues pushed forward, fighting to restrict their opponents' freedom in their own end.

Hillier's running and DaRosa's persistence led to a series of corner shots and narrow escapes for the visitors. However, 31 minutes into the game, following a hectic exchange involving four blocked efforts, Bruni struck a low shot from the edge of the area, hitting a defender's foot. The rebound caught the near corner of the net, well out of reach of the goaltender (who had anticipated the shot's original direction).

One minute later Polera's hovering corner shot was coaxed home by DaRosa's head from the edge of the goal to put Toronto in front.

Buffalo struck back before the end of the half. Toronto's defensive sloppiness was again demonstrated when the middle of the defence first lost the ball and then disastrously hacked off well into the penalty area. This afforded the Buffalo winger a chance to cross and score. Buffalo's Ardry, running from an oblique angle, eluded cover and then simply tapped the ball past Brand.

Both the pass cross and the conversion were examples of poor concentration and irresolution by Toronto. The Buffalo defense, while crude and unsophisticated, displayed application, positional soundness, and the ability to get in their challenges early.

With the exception of the third Buffalo goal, the second half of play turned into a rather formless affair. Buffalo was able to stay out of trouble by playing the ball simply distributing it and making it do the work for the team. However, their forwards' eagerness tended to get the better of them, and the team was forced to give up possession of the ball as they neared the Blues' goal.

On the other hand, the Blues, came close several times, but mainly on sporadic individual forays, rather than cohesive team movement. The Toronto squad showed little evidence of playing as a unit. With their non-aggressive style, the Blues were forced to meet their opponents, and as a result often found themselves isolated on solo runs as a result of pressure and not choice.

Buffalo's efficiency and organization clearly came as a shock to a sluggish and possibly overconfident Toronto side. While the Blues have clearly demonstrated superior individual skills, the Buffalo performance exemplified the soccer virtues of team-spirit, fitness, mobility, and directness. Despite their unbeaten league record, the Blues have yet to demonstrate these qualities.

The game comes as a blow to the Blues' morale at a time when they face a tough match at Western tomorrow.

Vic loses second in row to St. Mike's 16-0

Mulock Cup champions Victoria College suffered their second loss in as many starts by losing to St.

Mike's 16-0 on Wednesday.

In two games this year Vic has not been able to score a single point.

(Last week PHE defeated Vic 8-0 in the season opener).

Vic's defensive team was reasonably efficient, holding St. Mike's to a single touchdown. However, the team's offensive drive was repeatedly halted by a solid St. Mike's defensive squad.

St. Mike's MacConnell put the bluemens on the scoreboard early in the first quarter with a field goal. Before the half was complete Krilivacius had made it over the Vic goal-line in between a swarm of players. The convert was good and the half ended with St. Mike's in command, 10-0.

The game was marked by sloppy play, with consistent ball-dropping and fumbling. For example, St. Mike's receiver Klein dropped two first down passes. In the second quarter blues' Chepsiuk barely missed an interception and the pass was ruled incomplete.

Vic quarterback Johnson was impressive, but was forced out of bounds on several carries by the alert St. Mike's defensive squad. Late in the first half a series of fumbles left play centred around mid-field. Vic dropped the ball enabling St. Mike's to pile on top of it. Later a St. Mike's pass was intercepted, but Vic fumbled. When the players picked themselves off the field, Vic's Sergeant had the ball.

St. Mike's narrowly missed another field goal minutes before halftime, but the ball sailed wide of the goal posts.

The second half was more of the same. Vic's defence was able to stop the bluemens' offensive squad more often, but MacDonnell was able to add another three points to the St. Mike's total. Fabrizio completed the scoring with two points on a safety touch.

The ball looked slippery and the hack campus field was in its usual muddy shape but both teams were still on the whole unimpressive. It's early in the season but Vic has a long way to go to retain its possession of the Mulock; and St. Mike's will have to improve its ball handling to get past PHE. St. Mike's plays PHE at 4 pm Tuesday.

St. Mike's Krilivacius carries the ball across the Vic goal-line for the only touchdown in Wednesday's game. The touchdown came off a rush from inside the Vic 5-yard line.

Poll on fees to be held today

The Conservative government of Bill Davis will come under fire today in the province-wide referendum on the fees strike.

The Ontario Federation of Students is demanding a) that 1972-73 tuition fee increases be deferred until after full discussion, b) that the Ontario Student Awards Program be amended so that the loan portion of grants is lowered to $600 from $800, the age of independence is lowered and part-time students are eligible for grants.

The OFS ballot asks 1) do you support the OFS demands? 2) will you support withholding your second instalment of fees if negotiations with Davis' government are unsuccessful? and 3) would you support withholding all 1973-74 fees if further changes financially detrimental to students are announced?

Polling will take place today and tomorrow in most major buildings used by students, from 9 am until at least 5 pm today, and from 9 am till 2 pm tomorrow. The Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students (APUS) plans to keep polls open until 10 tonight in Sid Smith, Lash

Miller, New Physics and the Medical Sciences Building.

SAC also intends to carry out some classroom and residence polling in major buildings.

All students are eligible to vote, although only ballots marked as undergraduate will be counted in determining SAC's position. (Graduate students and part-time students are not SAC members; their's will be an informal poll.)

Counting will be done in the St. George Drill Hall immediately after the polls close at 2 pm tomorrow. The OFS province-wide results will be announced tomorrow evening.

Student skeptics greet McNie

By ZOYA STEVENSON

Newly appointed Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNie yesterday stated that he is "confident" that university tuition fees will not be increased next year. Asked later whether this "commitment" would apply to increases in the OSAP loan ceilings, McNie replied, "I would expect so."

The audience of about 150 students at the Convocation Hall forum on accessibility to and financing of post-secondary education were skeptical of his commitment to higher education.

One man asked if the government's withholding of money was not the same as "withholding concern". Another sarcastically asked if the minister's confidence that fees will not rise in 1973-74 would be shattered with the implementation of the Wright Report. Last winter the interim report recommended that fees be raised more than this year — from $50 for arts students to $800 for graduates.

The minister began his speech cynically saying, "I suppose university educations are good for something." He did not elaborate on this statement but instead explained that he had not completed university after the war because, affected by the pre-war depression, he felt he should be out earning a living. He added, "I feel that whatever I lost at the time in not pushing my education, I gained in many other ways."

He said that "government commitment over the past ten years has been to accessibility," and cited a 400 per cent increase in student enrolment as proof. Yet later he admitted, "I don't think there's any question that fees increases had an affect on both graduate and undergraduate enrolment, but they're the first increases in eight years."

He claimed, "the fees increase should not be a really important consideration with the more serious student because of the number of alternatives that exist in the way of loans and grants."

SAC president Eric Miglin later contended that increases in fees and the loan ceiling were important considerations for students thinking of attending post-secondary institutions. He said that "increases are definitely a deterrent, especially to those students of lower incomes."

Former NDP education critic Walter Pitman agreed with Miglin's point. He said "the emphasis on loans does not mean that education will be more accessible."

"It is ironic," he said, "that fees were increased because it was believed that people who go to university and graduate will immediately get jobs and pay back their loans."

McNie responded that it was probably a good thing for people to have to contribute to their education. He remarked facetiously, "a lot of young people are finding out what risk capital is" this way.

But U of T president John Evans voiced a difference of opinion.

"I believe that the combination of circumstances in the increased tuition fees, the decreased loans, and change in the age of independence are real deterrents to attendance at post-secondary institutions," he said. "The groups affected already have the lowest rates of participation."

Evans argued that it was "not valid to equate the cost of education with the return to the individual." He explained that "at least some of the return in technological circumstances may be reflected through the providence of industry," and went so far as to suggest that industry should pay part of the costs of education.

Liberal education critic James Bullbrook said he couldn't see how else the government could have found the $23 million needed for education as long as the present system of taxation existed. He added "the government is responsible for digesting priorities and for telling the people who spend the money how they are able to finance them."

Ignorance caused the government difficulty in deciding allocation of funds, Bullbrook claimed, because the university's budget is not available until two years after the fact.

Evans countered that a pattern of spending in a large institution like the university is obvious and does not change drastically within the space of two years.

Pitman noted that "while higher fees restrain the number of people at university, the universities must support themselves through the number of students on the campus and thus try to attract students."

Miglin estimated that already many students pay 60 per cent of their education costs, including tuition fees books, residence and transportation as well as foregoing savings by not working.

He said that 10 million allocated for student loans was not spent by the government last year. As a result, the total amount allocated to cover grants and loans was cut $10 million this year.

Joyce Denyer, one of the founders of the Association of Part-time Students association, spoke from the floor requesting a commitment from McNie which would grant part-time students access to financial aid.

McNie only replied that he would be "very disappointed if there is no aid."

President John Evans, right, and new Colleges and Universities minister Jack McNie share a chuckle at yesterday's forum. SAC president Eric Miglin looks up at McNie's right.

Wage dispute delays support staff agreement

By ELAINE FARRAGHER

A dispute over wages is all that is delaying an agreement between the University of Toronto and the Service Employees International Union. Negotiations resumed last Thursday morning and continued until 7:30 the next morning without resolving the dispute.

The contract with the 700 maintenance worker local ran out June 30. The workers have since been working under the provisions of the expired contract.

The extent to which wages and benefits in the new contract will be applied retroactively is another bargaining hurdle.

Negotiations are slated to resume tomorrow.

John Parker, manager of Management-Labour Relations for the university, seemed optimistic yesterday that an agreement would soon be reached, but the chief negotiator for SEIU local 204, Don Barclay, seemed much less so.

Although Parker would not comment on progress in the negotiations, Barclay said that only the pay increase was now in the way of a final agreement. He said that the union wants the basic cleaners rate of $3.09 per hour increased to $3.50.

In spite of the present slump in the progress of negotiations, a serious obstacle to a new contract has been overcome.

Three weeks ago, a major point of contention was a threat that the university would "contract out" work to commercial firms. Most of these contractors are non-unionized and can charge less because of their lower wages.

An agreement on maintaining union jobs has been reached, but neither side will release the details until a total agreement is reached.

Barclay called the resolution of this matter "satisfactory" pending the outcome of the wage negotiations, as either side may attempt to change it later on if it is not satisfied with the wage agreement.

In response to a memo circulated within the university this summer suggesting which jobs could be contracted out the union defended the workers' jobs by trying to force the university to ban contracting out.

At Erindale, bus driving has been contracted out to Charterways, a unionized bus company. Although no SEIU drivers lost their jobs, those drivers who transferred to Charterways lost years of seniority accumulated with the university.

Earlier this summer, York University reversed a policy of contracting out some jobs when it found that doing so would not involve "substantial savings", but would mean laying off many workers.

Internal Affairs discusses discipline

By DAVID WISE

With chairman Paul Cadario setting an optimistic Christmas goal for reaching a recommendation, the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee started discussing the issue of discipline last week.

Scarborough principal Ralph Campbell, who chaired the Presidential Advisory Committee on Disciplinary Procedures, defended its report, which was never implemented, at the meeting.

Campbell, who has spent the last two years in Africa, said that volatile conditions on campus forced his committee, formed in February 1968, to perfunctorily complete the report in a single week in September 1969. (A mass meeting that fall forced then-president Claude Bissell to retract a statement he had made regarding calling police on campus.)

However, he said that upon recently rereading the report for the first time in two years, he was "struck by the logic and good sense of it."

Campbell explained that the committee was set up because the basis for and mechanism of disciplinary procedure was considered "inadequate."

That system, which still exists, is based on the principle of "in loco parentis". In the absence of parents, the university assumes what it considers to be the parents' responsibility for the behaviour of students.

Caput, the supreme disciplinary body, is composed exclusively of administrators and deans.

According to Campbell, the report seeks to get away from the ambiguous definition of the university's function that is implicit in "in loco parentis". Instead, it defines the role of the university as purely academic and conceives of the students and faculty as being equal participants in this process.

The report advocates the establishment of a system of disciplinary procedures based on these definitions. It recommends a similar disciplinary system for faculty and students. Academic misconduct and penalties should be flexible enough, it says, to take into account minor transgressions so as to not endanger rapport between students and faculty.

Professor Michael Grapko stated that vaguely defined rules of conduct and flexible disciplinary procedures would become so diluted over time that they would become meaningless.

Sydney Hermant, vice-chairman of committee, disagreed with Grapko. "Broad principles are what we are concerned with," he said. "When you try to codify things, for each problem you solve, you create four more."

Campbell emphasized that certain crimes, while not deemed serious by civil courts, are taken seriously by academic authorities. He cited stealing essays, theses, and exams as examples of such misdemeanors.

Campbell explained the report's recommendations concerning university's responses to both peaceful and violent demonstrations on campus. According to the report, police should be called on campus only if a demonstration interferes with the educational functions of the university.

In all such cases, however, mediation concerning the grievance at the source of the demonstration should be tried, before coercive methods are used.

Chairman Cadario questioned the logic behind requiring mediation to disputes before calling police on campus.

He asked why a group with a grievance "should go through the regular channels when a disruption" will ensure that its grievance will be addressed by the university.

Hermant commented, "that's not the rule of law; that's the rule of anarchy."

Committee hears three faculties

By HEATHER - JANE SANGUINS

The Planning and Resources Committee of the Governing Council met yesterday afternoon in Simcoe Hall to hear presentations from three faculties.

Chairman J.D. Lewis asserted that topics such as "problems in enrolment", changes in undergraduate admission and the university's relationship to Scarborough and Erindale Colleges would be reviewed by the Planning and Resources Committee.

Arts and science dean Bob Greene told the committee that the enrolment ceiling has been reached in his faculty. However there are dramatic shifts in course choices from year to year, he said, as shown by this year's heightened interest in natural rather than social sciences.

Dean of Engineering J.D. Ham raised the issue of contract research for private corporations. He said this type of research will likely require increased emphasis in the future due to demand.

John Crispo, dean of the Faculty of Management Studies, urged the committee to recommend the expansion of academic facilities for his faculty. He suggested constructing a building for the joint use of Management Studies and Department of Extension.

He said that he was "green with envy" over York's business buildings.

Lewis announced that the committee would be making a presentation to the provincial Committee on University Affairs on November 28.

The purposes of the brief to the CUA are to report on the implementation of the university's new governing structure and problems of both U of T and all universities.

Students should support referendum position

Beginning today, Ontario undergraduates will be voting on whether to support Ontario Federation of Students' demands about the financing of post-secondary education and tactics proposed for the eventuality that the government does not concede to the student position.

The referendum may well be the first province-wide sampling of undergraduate opinion on any topic. The topic is well suited to that distinction, critically affecting the future of post-secondary education in the province.

Last spring's government moves to increase post-secondary tuition and decrease the amount of funding available to assist students financing their own education represents an attempt to limit accessibility to post-secondary education and to deplete the ranks of post-secondary students, and most crucially affects students from low-income backgrounds. On the one hand, the government denies this effect; on the other, it admits that the changes may likely affect this result.

The cutbacks most seriously affect students of community colleges. A relatively recent innovation, the colleges offer vocation-oriented courses which appeal more heavily to students reluctant to invest considerable sum of money on a university education which may leave them unemployed. While most post-secondary institutions (U of T is one of the few exceptions) have suffered major enrolment drops since the government changes, community colleges have been the hardest hit.

The government's posture in this matter betrays a lack of understanding of the social benefits of post-secondary education. Opportunistically, it has sought to satiate the taxpayers' demand for tighter education budgets by slashing its post-secondary programs rather than responsibly trying to explain why the government should subsidize post-secondary education.

The manner in which the changes were implemented — without consultation of any of the affected parties, slipped into the spring budget as one of its cost-saving moves — reveals a blatant example of the worst in centralized, non-participatory decision-making. A decision as consequential as this one should never have been made in an opinion void, but only after adequate consultation with those all concerned.

Furthermore, the decision was certainly premature, coming as it did, in advance of releasing the opportunity for ample public comment on the soon-to-be-released, final report of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education, a commission whose recommendations will potentially drastically alter government education policy.

And, if students are sincerely committed to their legitimate demands for a repeal of the fees hike and amendment of the Ontario Students Award Program to facilitate greater accessibility to the program, they should be willing to cross the threshold from theory to practice and do something concrete to back up their demands.

That's what active student support of the OFS position — not only on referendum day — represents. Action in January (withholding the $100 tuition increase) to insist upon withdrawal of the fees hike. Action next fall if the government ignores student protests, protests supported by Opposition political parties and other public groups, and announces further tuition fee increases and additional detrimental changes in the OSAP. All eligible students should vote in the referendum, replying affirmatively to all questions on the ballot.

To paraphrase a one-time SAC cliché, "It's time that the government started taking the students seriously."

Fee hikes do hurt accessibility

Much discussion has taken place during the last few months regarding the provincial government's increase of tuition fees and changes in OSAP. These discussions have inevitably dealt with the question of accessibility to universities, given the recent governmental actions.

Accessibility, in this context is primarily a question of the financial availability of post-secondary education to those who fulfill the academic qualifications of such institutions. Accessibility has traditionally been thought of as a matter most affecting those students who come from families with low incomes; those families who are unable to contribute financially to their child's education. The general public has demonstrated a desire not to allow financial barriers to prevent those who are intelligent enough from attending post-secondary institutions.

The provincial government claimed in the study paper "Accessibility-1970" that "It appears from recent data that the under-representation of the lower income groups at the post-secondary level has changed significantly over the last 10 years."

The study went on to claim that post-secondary education has become accessible to the various income divisions of the general populace.

Unfortunately accessibility to universities in the province of Ontario has not been as representative as the government would have us believe. The government figures used to rationalize the true accessibility situation have several serious flaws.

First, the data used was collected on a volunteer basis from individual students with the result that the figures such as family income are not necessarily very accurate. Therefore, the proportion of students attending post-secondary institutions coming from higher income families could be much higher than the government figures would indicate. The government's accessibility data is unintentionally misleading concerning the representativity of universities in relation to similar family group incomes within the province at large.

Second, the data used failed to differentiate between university accessibility and accessibility to community colleges. Whereas community colleges appear to be a fairly representative institution as far as social class is concerned, the amalgamation of community colleges accessibility figures in a total post-secondary accessibility study make university accessibility appear much more representative than it actually is.

Raising tuition fees and increasing the loan portion of OSAP, thereby increasing a student's indebtedness, is an obvious disincentive to students who need financial assistance for their education. The government has fully recognized this, admitting in a confidential Treasury Board report that: "Increasing the loan portion will discourage poorly motivated students on one hand, but it will also affect students from lower income groups."

The off-hand manner in which the government is prepared to dis-enfranchise students whose families are not in a position to provide financial assistance, is inexcusable. It is no secret that increasing costs and subsequent increases in indebtedness, provide a significant deterrent to students from lower income families.

High tuition fees and loan oriented aid schemes do little to make the image of post-secondary education one of being very open to lower class students reference: (Clark-Cook Report).

The recent government actions have a potentially wider effect on the question of accessibility than simply the availability of a university education to students from low income groups.

First, as tuition fees increase — and there is every reason to believe that there will be further $100 increases next year (or perhaps the $1000-1500 tuition recommended in the Wright Report —, the number of students who must look for government financial assistance in order to attend university will also increase substantially. Therefore, financial accessibility barriers will become meaningful for more than just the lower income groups.

Second, accessibility is a real issue for those who are presently in university. Students who intend to be at a university again next year may be prevented due to lack of funds or at least significantly discouraged due to the prospect of increased indebtedness. Those who were able to make ends meet this year may not be able to next year. How many students could afford a further $100 fee increase. More important how many students could afford a further $200 per year debt which would be the result if the government implements last years suggestion that the loan ceiling be increased to $1000.

Accessibility is not solely a question to the availability of a university education for students from lower income families. The recent OSAP changes and increases in tuition fees have made the question of financial accessibility a subject which must be of concern to all students.

McNie analysis gets challenged

As a member of the dismayingly small audience at Convocation Hall on October 10, I would like to offer a few comments on statements made by Mr. McNie, the Ontario Minister of Colleges and Universities.

In his opening address, Mr. McNie made four points, by my count, pertaining to the government's educational cutbacks. Number one, he stressed the population aspect of the problem. Enrollment in Ontario universities has gone up fantastically in the last decade. This, of course, is true, but I can't buy the idea that the sudden anybody who would look at population figures for the span of 1948-53 would notice the baby boom that occurred at this time. I have not noticed any strong efforts by either the federal government or the provincial government to curb population growth, the problem behind the problem, as it were.

The second point, Mr. McNie mentioned that he didn't think that a $100 increase would seriously bother a lot of university students. He cited an example of Sweden (which he recently visited) where education is government-subsidized. Said Mr. McNie, even they have access problems. Maybe so, say I, but I'll bet they're not as serious as ours. Given a fertile imagination, a man can find problems in any given situation, regardless of how Utopian it may be.

Mr. McNie's third point was that there are more important matters that are inhibiting free access to all classes of people to our post-secondary educational institutions. He mentioned the SACU tests as a prime culprit. He granted that there were problems of evaluation in admissions offices, but he still lambasted SACU. Exactly how this matter related to the question of increased financial expenditure is beyond my humble realm of comprehension. When he did get back to discussing finances, he stated that the government made up 80 per cent of the cost of post-secondary education, the student only 20 per cent. His source for these figures was the tuition: costs ratio of spending. However, I would have to agree with Eric Miglin (SAC president) that there are other expenditures that enter into the picture and in fact, the student's money problems are by no means over when he pays his $650.

Lastly, Mr. McNie stated that we spend as much on education as any country in the world. True, but this does not take into account that our student population is triple to that of the countries that he named. And so, in fact, we spend one-third proportionally of what our fellow developing countries spend. Mr. Walter Pitman, one-time education critic for the NDP, said during his

Planned to stop KKK program

In regard to the once-scheduled, now cancelled interview of KKK Grand Dragon Roy Frankhouser, who is also a member of the militant and armed U.S. fascist Minutemen organization (Varsity, October 4), we wish to correct the false and timorous attitude of VUSAC as reported in your paper.

Our organization did not say we would "peacefully picket" the program; we said emphatically that the program would be stopped. Whether or not there would be violence was not up to us.

Free speech in Canada is not the law of the country. It is a custom of the Canadian people and has definite limitations which the Canadian people have enforced; such as the incident in Allen Gardens early in the 1960's when 5000 people gathered to stop a Nazi from speaking. True, the right to free speech is included in the Canadian Bill of Rights, but the Bill of Rights has not been confirmed by a single provincial parliament and since it is a constitutional matter in which the provinces find jurisdiction it has no status in a court of law. So,

'Force' letter is denounced as lie

I am writing to answer the assertion made by Mike Edwards of the Young Socialists that the Canadian Liberation Movement has been replacing debate with force.

This assertion is a lie. CLM has been debating and organizing to fight the student surcharge for well over a month.

Therefore, Edwards' invitation to debate is irrelevant and diversionary. We do not intend to waste our time by having debates in a vacuum. We will, however, continue to carry on as we have in the past, explaining and defending our positions on all things.

In order to refute Edwards' assertion, we can look at the two examples he cites in his letter: the SAC forum last Wednesday and the Nixon visit last spring.

He neglected to mention that, during the forum, there was not limit to the open date that went on, where two YS'ers and one Old Mole spoke. One person from the CLM spoke twice. He also neglected to mention that it was he who said we shouldn't argue about who was an imperialist power, but should plan tactics for the fee hikes.

He neglected to mention that it was he and two friends who came over to us at the 85 Canadian Quota Campaign literature table. The "discussion" that ensued was not about the fees hikes (student surcharge), but was an attack on the quota campaign. During this attack, Edwards accused us of keeping him off the Governing Council, because he is not a Canadian citizen.

He neglected to mention that it was he who pushed me in his frustration while he was complaining about the Governing Council.

Finally, it was only after he swiped me in the face with his newspaper that I retaliated and the scuffle broke out.

This is ample proof, I think, to show that there was indeed free and open debate, and the scuffle which followed was not an attempt to force Edwards into accepting our argument. It was simply retaliation.

The truth of the matter is that we in CLM were trying to let the demonstrators know that they had been duped. The YS and the VMC had been advertising for months about a "Confront Nixon" demonstration where in fact they had never had any intention of carrying it off.

The YS buses arrived in Ottawa the same time as the CLM buses. The CLM actually did confront Nixon, and had a demonstration that clearly showed that we did not want him in Canada. There can, therefore, be only one reason for their not being there when Nixon was — that the YS did not want to confront Nixon in the first place. They even had a paper mache' dummy of the imperialist leader to "confront the whole thing was planned from the very beginning.

When we attempted to go to the front and speak, we met a solid wall of Trotskyite marshals. Where was their desire for "open debate" then? In the US embassy? In this instance, too, a scuffle broke out.

I think that these facts will show that the CLM wished to have open debate, and it was not until we were attacked that we retaliated.

All in all, I think that from Edwards' very own examples it can be shown that the CLM has not had a history of trying to force people to its way of thinking. I might just repeat that in the light of this, I see no reason that we should set up a special debate. In the struggles that come up, the YS will be either on our side or against us. If they are against us, I see no reason why we can't carry on the way we did at the forum last Wednesday, with one exception. After the debate is over, Edwards should leave well enough alone and continue on in his own way.

Peter Havers, CLM

speech that the government was slowly but surely changing its philosophy and attitudes towards education and that this change was reflected in their actions of the past few years. Mr. McNie, in rebuttal, denied that the government's attitude as to the importance of education had changed. And then, to my complete confusion, he turned around and stated that the government had decided to redefine its priorities, and education, in effect, was the loser (my words, not his). I asked him how these two contrasting forces could co-exist and he said no, that the withdrawal of monies had nothing to do with the government's attitude and concern.

He refused absolutely to agree with my theory that the monies allotted to the universities was a barometer of the government's concern. He said he wouldn't accept that notion at all.

When I grow up, I want to be smart just like Mr. McNie. Maybe then, I can understand his reasoning.

Michael Freeman

therefore, the Canadian people have the right to go on enforcing free speech and its limitations in the present and future as they have done in the past.

Not only is Frankhouser a fascist who spreads the ideology, theory, and practical application of racism, hatred, and methodical murder, he is furthermore an American fascist and agent of U.S. imperialism which is taking over not only our country but all facets of Canadian life. This man would not miss an opportunity to organize his murderous Minutemen if allowed into this country.

It is shameful that VUSAC has taken such a cowardly attitude and backed down from the fight to prevent Frankhouser from entering Canada and contaminating our country's or concern for the Canadian people but on fear and fear alone.

VUSAC judge yourselves as others now judge you.

Major food chains back Dare boycott

By CANADIAN UNIVERSITY PRESS

"Don't Dare" — a slogan appearing on an increasing number of lapels and bumpers lately — is the battle cry of Dare Cookie workers in Kitchener who have been on strike for over three months.

The stickers and buttons plus the picketing of local stores are part of a campaign to boycott Dare products and hack the union in its long, hard struggle against the company.

A union official in Toronto, Norm Wilson, said last week that no contract meetings have been held since August 22 and no meetings are planned for the immediate future.

He said, however, that a boycott of Dare products is becoming increasingly effective since, what he called, the "more responsible employers in the food distributing industry" have agreed with their respective unions not to purchase Dare Foods cookies. He named A & P, Steinberg's, Dominion, Loblaw's, and IGA as being among the chains boycotting Dare products.

Wilson said that cookies are being sold by such stores as Safeway, Red and White, and small grocerias while cookies are being shipped to the U.S. and Manitoba.

The union has gained the support of the Ontario Federation of Labour and a wide range of labor unions.

Every strike-breaking trick in the book has been used to undermine the power of the workers — court injunctions, strike breaking, and intimidation tactics — since the 377 members of Local 173 of the United Brewery, Flour, Cereal, Soft Drink, and Distillery Workers of America (UBW) voted to strike May 27.

By a vote of 97 per cent, the membership rejected the 25 cent hourly wage increase offered to both the men and women.

In reply, they demanded an eight hour day rather than an eight and one-half hour day; a wage increase of 40 cents an hour for each year of the contract and parity between men and women; better working conditions including removal of working supervisors, and installation of fans to lower the 130 degree temperature in the plant; and the termination of occasional production speed-ups.

The strikers demanded that relief people be brought in when a worker is absent or on a break. Before the strike, this relief work was performed by foreladies and foremen.

Other demands included sick pay after four days of illness instead of after eight days; company health plan contributions regardless of increases in premiums; and more understanding from the immediate supervisors, especially for women with children.

Dare has taken a tough stance and blames the union for the worker's troubles.

In the June 10 Kitchener-Waterloo Record, an advertisement stated:

"It would seem that some workers do not have a serious interest in their jobs and are willing to be influenced by forces within the union that feel going on strike is an easy way of getting what they want provided they show sufficient force."

Violence and property damage resulted when Dare brought in the Canadian Driver Pool, a group infamous for its breaking of unions and strikes, often through the use of illegal tactics.

but more fundamentally the existence of the union itself. Dare management makes no effort to conceal this fact.

"It is not a legal requirement and we are determined that it will never be necessary that you have to be a member of any union to work for Dare Biscuits," one company state-secure an injunction from the Supreme Court of Ontario providing protection for the movement of finished products.

The strike quieted down for a few weeks but through a letter and phone calls, the company induced some workers to return. With the appearance of the first scabs on July 6, violence on the picket line broke out. Each morning as the scabs arrived they were escorted by Dare supervisory personnel and the Kitchener police force.

The renewed violence prompted the granting of a second injunction which stated that only four strikers, half of them women, could picket four entrances of the Dare factory.

The court order, which took effect July 14, paved the way for an influx of scab labour. To date, Dare has been able to attract 150 workers — enough for one shift. About 39 of the union membership have broken ranks to return to work.

The rest of the Dare workers have refused to pay heed to the management's phone calls and letters which attempt, through demoralisation and promises of higher wages to attract strikers to return to work.

The protection afforded the scab workers by the court injunction is not the only thing contributing to their increasing numbers. The local manpower centres have been referring job-seekers to the Dare factory.

A company letter date June 21 promised job security, improved benefits, and wage increases averaging 30 cents an hour. This means that a "packer" (all women are classified as packers) will receive $2.75 per hour as opposed to the $2.26 per hour she was given before the strike.

The letter ended with a hope of unity and brotherhood. "We look forward to having you work for us."

As far as Local 173 is concerned, Dare has been bargaining in bad faith for many weeks by the use of intimidation tactics.

Ads in the K-W Record have been a significant part of the Dare strategy to discourage workers, break their morale, and make the union look ineffective. Scabs are made to think the plant is working normally and that the working conditions outlined by Thom in the ads are acceptable.

The Aug. 8 letter inviting Dare workers to return to work, played on workers' friendships.

"The majority of the people working in the plant are people who you know have worked for us prior to the strike."

Phone calls to workers threaten firings and stress how good working conditions are.

Although the Ontario Labour Relations Act states that "the employer is free to express his views on union matters so long as he does not use coercion, intimidation, threats, promises, or undue influence," Dare Foods stated in an ad June 19, "the union has not helped either the company or its employees over the past few years and its interference can no longer be tolerated."

We have reason to believe that many employees do not agree with compulsory membership as a condition of employment."

So, as the economic hardships of a prolonged strike and the demoralizing tactics of the company threaten to weaken the union, supporters are hoping for a successful boycott.

*Oh Dare was a place
That kept women in place
By raising the pace
On the belts.*

*The women complained
They were hot and they pained
They called Dare insane
Because they felt angry.*

— strikers' poem

Since the damage to the plant and removal of CDP from active participation in the strike, Dare has offered the following settlement:

No retroactive pay (at one time, it was to be 30 cents per hour); no check-off of union dues making it very difficult for the union to collect them; no union shop; the union must pay $45,000 damages to Dare property and products; a wage increase of 45 cents over two years for women and 55 cents for men and a continuance of the eight and one-half hour day.

At the heart of the strike is not merely the current union demands ment said. It was to ensure that cookie sales would not be hurt and to break the union that the Canadian Driver Pool was called in by executive vice-president William Thom.

And, it was with the commencement of the Canadian Driver Pool activities that violence broke out.

Damage to the CDP-driven trucks and Dare property was extensive and the union found itself fighting the company, CDP, and the Kitchener police department.

On June 7, the Dare management called off its forces, but was able to Date set for founding conference

National student union may soon be formed

OTTAWA (CUP) — A date has been finally set for the founding conference of the proposed new national student union, while provincial students unions have already been formed on Canada's east and west coasts.

The national conference will be held in Ottawa November 2-5. Despite suspicion from schools in the Atlantic provinces, the conference will probably see the formation of a new national organization.

Canadian students have been without a dominion-wide union since the demise of the Canadian Union of Students (CUS) in 1969.

Meanwhile, students representing five post-secondary institutions in Nova Scotia took preliminary steps toward establishing a Nova Scotia Union of Students last weekend.

The decision to set up the provincial body came after a meeting between student representatives and the minister of education. Universities present were Dalhousie, St. Mary's, Mount St. Vincent and Acadia. The Nova Scotia College of Art was represented by St. Mary's and College Ste. Anne by Acadia.

Another meeting is scheduled October 18 in Halifax at Dalhousie University to complete plans for the union.

British Columbia student councils have also established their own provincial organization.

Representatives from four post-secondary institutions met at Prince George last weekend to establish the B.C. Association of student councils.

Teri Ball, External Affairs Officer of the University of British Columbia's student council, said one of the association's first goals will be a student bill of rights.

The association's aims are to pursue matters of concern for B.C. students, create greater communication between campuses, and allow use of resources by other students.

The now-defunct B.C. Union of Students failed because it was too structured, Ball claimed. She said the new association will have a procedure manual and operate informally.

She said the new association will give voice to the smaller colleges, claiming that students on smaller campuses will not be recognized by the proposed national student union.

Ball said B.C. will be represented as a block at the upcoming national conference, with schools working in co-operation.

When the Nova Scotia union is formed, it will join the New Brunswick Union of Students (Union des Etudiants Nouveau Brunswick) to form a Maritime Union of Students. Student councils in Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland will be asked to join, according to University of New Brunswick student council president Roy Neill. UENBUS was formed in July.

"A Maritime union would give us a stronger voice," said Dalhousie student council president Brian Smith.

This would be valuable with the advent of a national union, he added. "A number of us question the validity of a national student union."

"Ontario and Quebec are the 'haves' while the Maritimes are the 'have-nots', and the former tend to dominate any national organization of universities," Smith said.

Learning experience is merely playing with ideas, says Fuller

By PAUL McGRATH

The renowned futurist Buckminster Fuller Destroyed the basic precepts of mathematics, physics, architecture and education in a lively two hour meeting Monday night at Convocation Hall.

Demonstrating his faith in the "almighty imagination", he did not sketch his ideas on a blackboard, but described his concepts with such clarity that the structures could be virtually seen forming inside every head in the hall.

Taking exception to today's educational experience in the teacher-student form, he described his learning experiences as just playing with his own ideas.

"I've become extremely encouraged by the resources for thinking we all have, and the power to arrive at concepts. Thinking is dismissing the macro and microcosmic irrelevancies and arriving at the center of the problem."

He dismissed mathematics as "a nice game, but it doesn't work."

"Mathematical concepts assume forms such as the straight line. There are no straight lines in the universe, but we talk about them as if they're easily observed."

He described his theory that the tetrahedron was the "minimum functional stable structure in the universe." The tetrahedron is a structure with an equilateral triangle at its base, with three equilateral triangles based on these meeting above.

Fuller has been in the vanguard of creative and functional design for approximately 50 years, and he is as fresh today as he was in 1927 when he presented the first pre-packaged home. His ideas still provoke applause and astonishment.

Years ago he pioneered the idea of a tetrahedral city that floats.

"We have learned that the most stable structure is the tetrahedron," he has written. "Following this design-science we find that a tetrahedral city, to house a million people, is both economically and technologically feasible. Such a vertical tetrahedral city can be constructed so that all of its 300,000 families have balconied outside apartments. All of the organic operative machinery can be housed within the tetrahedron."

The Varsity | Paul McGrath

Kook or genius? Fuller mystified crowd at Monday night meeting.

"Salvage of materials from obsolete buildings on the land can produce enough of these floating ideas to have relays of them in various sizes around the centers of the earth. It will permit mid-ocean cargo transfer within the city's calm harbours, extraordinarily increasing the efficiency of distribution of the world's raw and finished materials as well as aiding passenger traffic," he continued.

The Japanese are already interested in the idea, however far-fetched it may seem.

He spoke on freedom for a while, but ended with a typical terse summation.

"The universe is not get-out-able," he said.

Opinions on Fuller run from "crackpot" to "genius". If you thought he was either of these two, your opinion wouldn't have been changed after the evening. Either he is an impractical oddball or he's 50 years ahead of his time.

Before anybody ponders emulating the entrepreneurial spirit of any of their relatives, as this advertisement in the Economist urges, he or she should take a closer look at what the same magazine repeatedly refers to as the "exciting case of the successful application of the principles of the free market economy to the problems of a developing country".

The recent Brazilian boom is founded on the government's basic policy of creating an investor's utopia whatever the cost. The government's program, therefore, has included a tremendous amount of state participation in the economy, for the purpose of building an infrastructure (highway development, hydroelectric projects, steel works, et cetera) which is considered as a minimum dowry for any economic minister requesting the hand and favour of the International financial and business community.

But, of course this is not all. The so-called "Brazilian model" comes with other standard features. In addition to formidable tax incentives, credit facilities, and favourable profit-remittance laws, the investor receives what any capitalist (especially if he operates in the Third World) cherishes most: social and economic security.

Yes, in fact, as the advertisement boasts, Brazil has been the stablest country in Latin America for the last eight years. No dangerous Marxism a la chilene (like in Chile) or irritating nationalism a la peruene, (like in Peru) simply "order and progress": the postivist's pered.

Social security has been attained by what is now recognized as one of the principle characteristics of the Brazilian model. This consists of establishing a horrendous regime of torture and organized violence, determined on suppressing any form of opposition to the regime. In recent months, the Brazilian government has tried to give the impression that political repression and torture have subsided. This campaign takes on many forms, including strict censorship, legal cheraades, and forced confessions. News about political repression is banned from all Brazilian media.

But, despite all these impediments, reports on what goes on inside the country's jails and torture chambers do manage to leak out and provide concrete evidence of the truly barbaric and ruthless nature of the "gorille's" regime.

The mainstay of the military's guarantee of economic security is the fostering of a strong local market for luxury and semi-luxury goods. This is achieved primarily through an incomes policy which literally takes from the poor to give to the rich. As a result, the portion of the national income gathered by the wealthiest 20 per cent of the population increased from 65 per cent to 72.5 per cent in the 10 year period from 1960 to 1970, while the percentage going to the poorest 50 per cent of Brazilians fell from 15 per cent to 12.5 in the same period.

This policy, achieved mainly through freezing wage levels, has the added advantage of providing the economy with an extremely cheap labour force, at a time when North American corporations are desperately seeking cheap labour to withstand Japanese and West German competition.

Large international corporations did not delay in taking advantage of the generous Brazilian offers. A wave of take-overs and bankruptcies immediately hit the frail Brazilian-owned industries, and when the waters had receded, what remained was an impressive industrial structure almost totally controlled and owned by foreigners. The meagre and optimistic national bourgeoisie fell, one after another, the smothering embrace of foreign capital. The national entrepreneurs were becoming Brazilian managers of North American and European firms before they knew it.

Brazilian industry is no longer Brazilian, and the Sao Paulo-Rio area, where most industry is concentrated, has become an integral part of the North American capitalist system.

The most dynamic sectors are naturally those which attracted most foreign interests. And, these very sectors — automobile, electric appliances, petrochemicals, et cetera — provide the main contribution to the high economic growth rates. While, for instance, the automobile industry has been growing at approximately 28 per cent per annum, the "traditional sectors" — textiles, foodstuffs, clothing, et cetera — have been petering along around the 1 per cent mark. Need it be said, that it is also in these foreign-owned dynamic sectors, that production is most sophisticated technologically, and therefore contributes little more than nothing to deflating the country's explosive unemployment rate.

Very few Brazilians really understood the significance of the present regime when it took power in 1964. The coup did not occur because the armed forces were intent on defending the old agro-exporting oligarchy allied with the 19th century-style Imperialism. On the contrary, the military dictatorship (although it protected these groups from a reformist movement intent on their destruction and offered them a path of forceful adaptation) viewed its mission as that of modernizing the economic, social, and political structures so as to clear the way for international and national monopoly capital. The regime's violence and politics of force were not based on its caudillos (military bosses) and on the demoralized strength of the old fazendas, (estates) although they did not refrain from using them, but on the modern and efficient police and armed forces of the contemporary monopoly state.

The essence of the Brazilian model, then, is the maintenance of an extremely high concentration of income in the upper 20 per cent of the population, providing an excellent middle class value-oriented market for the dynamic sectors of the economy which, in turn, churn out incredible numbers of automobiles, stereo sets, televisions, and the like. The middle class is invited to "step into the ruling class", as an advertisement for the Brazilian-made Dodge Dart puts it.

Although this market represents approximately 20 million people (Brazil's total population is about 100 million) and is likely to provide the necessary stimulus for some years to come, the government has done all it can to foster exportation of these goods to reach the other 'upper 20 per cents' throughout Latin America, the Caribbean, and Southern Africa.

Foreign exchange has also been sought through fostering the exportation of goods produced by the "traditional sectors". As was noted the growth rate of these portions of the economy are negligible compared to the dynamic sectors under foreign ownership. Therefore, increases in the exports of these goods are bound to have repercussions on the internal consumption patterns. The most revealing example is that of beef, 18,500 tons of which was exported in 1964 and 79,000 in 1970. This large export capacity was facilitated by restrictions on domestic consumption, brought about by an increase in government-controlled prices, while the price of beef on world markets dropped considerably.

The political counterpart of this need for foreign markets, consists of an aggressive foreign policy. This form of "sub-imperialism" is supported by the officially sanctioned doctrine of "ideological frontiers", as expounded by General Golbery do Couto e Silva, principal ideologist for the "Brazilian revolution" (and president of Dow Chemical do Brasil), which allows for intervention of Brazilian troops wherever the country's "ideological security" is threatened.

This was the case when Brazilian forces, in a joint operation with those of the United States, invaded the Dominican Republic in 1965 "to restore democracy". More recently, Brazilian complicity in the overthrow of the relatively progressive Bolivian president Juan Torres in 1970 is now an open and accepted fact. Furthermore the anxiety over the possible victory of a Uruguayan "Allende" in last year's elections along the border had the centre-left coalition candidate won.

In this sphere of foreign policy, one must not forget to mention the close relations between the Brazilian government with that of Portugal, which has gone so far as to produce a treaty by which all citizens of each country are legally also citizens of the other. Need it be said also that the Brazilian government provides complete support and military cooperation with the Portuguese colonial-racist policies in Angola, Mozambique, and Guinea (Bissau)?

The Brazilian armed forces have experienced a tremendous growth in numbers, and by the beginning of this year had reached the 200,000 mark. The maintenance and supply of this enormous body — apart from eating up 17 per cent of the national budget — provides for a very important source of demand for the development of heavy industry, armaments, aeronautics, et cetera.

What else is new? Indeed, the high level attained by these industries is reflected in the fact that ever since 1965 Brazil has been supplying military equipment the Saigon war effort.

The very cosy relations between the military and industry has allowed for the creation of the Permanent Group of Industrial Mobilization formed "to achieve" as one member put it, "the interlinking of the industrial standards and the needs of the armed forces". The president of this group remarked that in "co-operating in the extermination of the Viet Cong (Brazil) makes use of the idle capital in her factories and allows for the creation of another 180,000 jobs. We fight communism and our unemployment problems simultaneously." Doesn't that sound familiar?

The high and increasing level of militarization in Brazil, therefore, serves various essential purposes. It provides an important stimulus for a large portion of Brazilian industry; it gives the industrialists effective support in their search for foreign markets; and finally it maintains the "peaceful atmosphere" and security businessmen love so much.

It must be said, however, that the government is a lot more sophisticated than one would imagine. The program of maintaining social and political peace involves a lot more than pure brutal repression. The other principal weapon in this context has been very effective smoke-screening socio-economic contradictions by fostering nationalistic sentiment. The regime sells vanity to the middle class, and illusions to the lower class majority. "Brazil, I love you", "God must be Brazilian", "Brazil, you're unbeatable", and "Brazil, love it or leave it" are only some of the slogans one sees on every other car's windshields.

And, of course, the impressive performance of Brazil's soccer team in Mexico two years ago was exploited to the extreme by the government, with the obvious intention of identifying the athletes' skill with the government they live under. No doubt Emerson Fittipaldi's talent on the world's speedways will also be exploited as a booster to the gorilla's regime.

Politically, of course, the government never ceases to point out through their considerable propaganda machinery the internal and external threat of communism. In fact, the climate created by the press at the time of last November's Uruguayan presidential elections guaranteed public support for military intervention in the neighbouring country had the outcome not been favourable.

The big Brazilian boom has not arisen from the process of solving the country's internal contradictions. On the contrary, the basis for this businessman's revolution extracts its energy from aggravating these socio-economic conflicts. The poor become even poorer as the 900,000 at the apex of the social pyramid usurp a greater income than the combined income of no less than 72 million people. Misery, squalor, poverty, and disease are all living and flourishing for any tourist willing to deviate a few miles from the beaten track of post-card Brazil.

The next few years will see a growing effort on the part of the military government to seek some sort of legitimization for the regime as it battles with the effects of the deepening contradictions it is fostering. Any move to "re-democratize" the political process is bound to supply the government with programs as it will reflect the level of increasing opposition it faces in the country so that no significant or meaningful step can be expected in that direction.

It is very likely, however, that legitimacy will be sought through an increased emphasis on an aggressive foreign policy in combination with attempts to unite the nation in a corporative style.

The militarization of Brazilian capitalism is neither accidental or circumstantial. It is the necessary expression of the monstrous logic of the system, just as Nazism was for Germany. Brazil is heading toward a period of crisis, in which the only possible solution the military dictatorship will find consists of the creation of a fascist state.

This state, which is already in an advanced embryonic stage, will be distinct from the classical fascist and Nazi models only insofar as its nationalism will be directed solely against other dependent, capitalist Third World nations. Brazil, unlike Nazi Germany, does not have the autonomous technological and industrial base necessary to challenge the pillars of world capitalism in North America and Europe. It is inconceivable that the Brazilian version of fascism would carry with it a strong tinge of economic nationalism because of the extreme level of dependency on external technology and capital (Brazil is $6 billion dollars in debt) and the almost total foreign domination of the economy.

Brazil is then destined to become a colonial fascist power, operating in the interests of world capitalism. The United States need no longer be embarrassed in the international community by having to send her marines to straighten things up when they get out of hand in any part of Latin America. Brazil will do it for her.

Scab leader crusades for change in unions

By LORNE SLOTNICK

Richard Grange, founder of the strikebreaking firm Canadian Driver Pool, has launched an expensive "crusade for responsible unionism."

The media crusade began Sunday night with the taping of a Channel 11 show "Crossfire" featuring Grange facing an 11 man panel. The program, to be aired this week, is similar to Under Attack.

After the taping, Grange said he has sold all his companies to release enough money to "take our case to the people". He will have about $100,000 to use, he claimed.

Canadian Driver Pool specializes in providing services such as security, watchdogs, drivers and photographers to companies whose employees are on strike. Several of its employees, including Grange, have been convicted of illegal activities connected with strikebreaking.

The 27 year old Grange remained calm throughout the program as he and his employees were charged with breaking almost every law on the books. Many panelists based their evidence on a mammoth study of strikebreaking prepared this year for the Ontario Federation of Labour.

Sam Fox, of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, charged that a majority of Driver Pool's employees have long criminal records. Grange retorted that it was only a "small percentage".

One panelist reviewed Grange's personal criminal history, which he said includes involvement in a Mafia-connected car-theft ring, and concluded that Grange has always been and still is connected with criminal elements.

Grange said he no longer provides actual strikebreaking service. Instead, he runs a "consulting service" to companies with labour problems.

He said he believes in the right to strike, except in the public service, but also believes in a company's right to keep operating during a strike.

Sam Tugham, a management spokesman from G.H. Woods and Co., said he received a letter from Grange outlining his services before a union contract came up. He said he refused the service because it always left scars long after the dispute was over.

"The true cost of using your service is greatly above the saving that you could provide," he said.

Rick McDowell, a U of T labour relations teacher, said he did a study of strikes in which Canadian Driver Pool was involved. He said that these strikes lasted two to three times longer than average, and wage settlements averaged the same as those in companies not using strikebreakers.

Grange suggested that McDowell

"go back and do another study". He said his firm shortened strikes, not lengthened them.

In an interview after the taping, Grange said that "lower and middle management" union officials must be replaced.

"These guys just aren't educated enough," he complained. "How can they sit opposite an industrial relations expert?"

He said that unions needed business administration graduates trained in psychology.

Grange was asked why he did not work with unions if he wanted to improve them. He replied they wouldn't want him, but, "if they asked, I would probably work with them."

His verdict on the unionists on the panel was that he had "put them in their place."

Unemployment hits 1 out of 4 grads: survey

By JONISEAGER

About one quarter of 1971 U of T graduates had not found jobs seven months later, according to a Placement Centre survey.

The results of the survey, which consisted of 4250 letters sent out to graduates (excluding law and medicine) became available last week.

Of the 1900 who replied 52 per cent had gone back into academic study while many graduates looked for work. Of the latter only 75 per cent were successful.

Placement Centre director David Curry, who released the study, says that most of those who obtained employment got full-time jobs, although some may have been only temporary.

Commenting on the results, he said that the economy "isn't expanding fast enough to absorb the number of young people in the job market." He added that prospects for employment this year are "about the same" as last year.

The survey showed that 80 per cent of the respondents to the questionnaire got jobs which were satisfactory to them. Three quarters of these were within 50 miles of Toronto.

The Placement Centre appeared to have been a positive factor in finding jobs, as 89 per cent of the graduates receiving job offers did so with its help.

Curry said on-campus interviews, which tend to be for more traditional, conservative jobs are quickly losing their importance.

Although the Placement Centre is serving an ever increasing number of students (2,600 graduates registered last year, as opposed to 1,500 the year before) the emphasis must be on a student's own initiative, maintains Curry.

U.S. troops tricked by government: dodger

By DIANA WEST

The United States "suffers from a crisis in democracy," according to Dee Knight, the editor of the magazine, American Exiles in Canada (AMEX). He explained that he meant that the Americans are no longer in control of their government.

Knight, a draft-evader himself, appeared on the television program Crossfire, to discuss the "morality of draft-dodging".

He cited the use of "lies and deceit" by the U.S. government to force men to fight in Vietnam as one example of the breakdown in democracy.

When Knight was asked by a panelist whether draft dodging was fiar to those who had already died, he answered, "their loss was a great waste" but the U.S. government was responsible for their death.

Those who died, Knight said, were "tricked and forced into their death" by the government's unfair reporting of the war. Concealment of the real situation allows the government to continue the war, he added.

He suggested that "deserters are among the bravest men in the world". Those men had gone to Vietnam and had the courage to follow their convictions after they had seen what it was like.

One woman attacked Knight, claiming that draft dodgers and deserters were bad citizens in their homeland and would be the same in Canada.

In reply, Knight pointed out that the Canadian government had opened its doors to dodgers and deserters in 1969, after discrimination against them had been brought to light.

"The question of good or bad citizenship is debatable," he stated. He added that he was willing to leave that question up to The Canadian people.

Knight affirmed support of universal amnesty for all draft dodgers. Draft dodgers, he said, simply knew that "the war was wrong".

Munro cites high living standards

Government not inept says Liberal minister

By STEVE SHARRATT

The Liberal government's management of the economy was defended last Thursday by National Health and Welfare Minister John Munro on an Under Attack television show at Victoria College.

Munro contended that Canada's standard of living had risen "dramatically" during the Trudeau administration and produced a barrage of statistics as proof.

Real incomes, he said, are up 30 per cent since 1968 and savings are up 50 per cent. About 240,000 new jobs were created last year making Canada's labour participation rate the fastest growing in the "free world". At the same time the cost of living rose only three per cent, one of the lowest increases in the industrialized west.

When student panel members charged that Canada's Old Age pensioners were not sharing in the benefits of this prosperity, Munro claimed that in "a relative sense" Canada was doing better than most free world countries with its $150.00 per month grants to single pensioners. He admitted, however, that this income would place the recipient well below the poverty level established by Statistics Canada.

Panel members then charged that the Liberal government has used its welfare programs as a political lever. Munro admitted that, in one instance, a Local Initiatives Program project scheduled to be terminated several weeks before the October 30 election was extended until two weeks after the election. However he flatly denied any political motivation for the extension.

He also admitted that funding of a welfare rights group in the Hamilton area had been cut when recipients had become so outspoken as to "polarize the community".

He was then asked to state his position on the removal of penalties for marijuana possession. Munro explained that he and his department were not prepared to recommend the legalization of pot, fearing that such a move would lead to an increased use of the drug.

He said he believed that marijuana use often leads to the use of harder and more dangerous drugs, and that its use "on a constant basis" poses a serious threat to health.

Smiling health minister John Munro defended Trudeau's policies.

UAW leader slams student critics

Internationals present no threat to Canada

By STEVE SHARRATT

Dennis McDermott, Canadian director of the powerful United Auto Workers' Union (UAW) denied charges that his international union was a threat to Canadian independence at a taping of the television program Under Attack last Thursday.

A largely hostile student panel and audience charged that the UAW is essentially an American union, pursuing the objectives of U.S. labour leaders, and thus cannot represent the best interests of Canadian workers.

McDermott dismissed these allegations as "nonsense," stating, "we are not an American union, we are an international union. There's a difference."

He claimed that labour organization on an international level was needed to bargain successfully with multi-national corporations. An independent Canadian union, he felt, would only serve to "fragmentize" labour to the advantage of the corporate establishment.

He claimed that Canadian workers have received more out of the UAW in terms of raises and benefits than they have contributed in dues.

Discussing the right of public employees to strike, McDermott contended that society does not have the right to deny collective bargaining procedures to any segment of the labour force. And since bargaining is meaningless without the recourse of a strike to back up labour's demands, he felt, all workers, including police and firemen, should be allowed to strike.

Maoists, Guardsmen fail to show

By PAT REDICAN

The first night of tapings for the Under Attack television show began on schedule Wednesday night evening when demonstrators by two rival political groups failed to materialize.

A Maoist organization and the Western Guard were rumoured to be ready to square off.

On Tuesday the taping of a show with a Ku Klux Klan grand dragon had been cancelled by Victoria College for fear of violence. The left-wing Internationalists and the rightist Western Guard, who had met in a bloody clash earlier this year, were rumoured to be ready to disrupt the program.

The guests who were scheduled, Radio Pastor Perry F. Rockwood, a fundamentalist, and Bob Guccione, editor Penthouse magazine, a publication similar to Playboy, provided a dull night for the students who crammed the Victoria College auditorium.

The Rockwood show was superficial and repetitive with every question terminating in a flurry of often-contradictory biblical quotations. Most of the audience laughed at Rockwood's views. He asserted that "long hair is a commie plot". Christ did not have long hair and social justice should not be an area of interest to organized religion.

"Pierre Trudeau is a communist," the pastor added.

The Guccione show was only slightly better received. It centred around the topic of women's liberation, but again quickly became repetitive and appeared to bore the most of the audience.

Blues defeat Queen's for sailing championships

U of T Sailing Club captured first place with a low score of 14 points in the Canadian Intercollegiate Sailing Championships held in Kingston last weekend. The event was hosted by RMC.

Queen's was Toronto's closest competitor, finishing with 16 points. The other participants were far behind.

The sailing championships began Saturday but Sunday's races were cancelled due to hazardous wind conditions.

Sunday's inclement weather forced the race committee to reschedule — thus upsetting Toronto's team showing. Blues' skippers Jim Schoenhardt, and Ian Brown, and one crew, Bruce Buttimore, were unable to sail Monday due to unbreakable previous commitments. However, a substitute team was organized around remaining crew member Jay Nicholson, with John Lazier and Peter McBride the skippers. Brian Hobbs was the other crew.

Early Monday morning the U of T team broke a mast while sailing in winds gusting up to 40 mph. This then forced the race committee to reevaluate the team's position; they decided to cancel all further racing for the day. The final races take place at RMC on October 21 and 22.

Participating in the regatta this weekend were sailing clubs from RMC, Université de Laval, McGill, McMaster, Queen's, Trent, Waterloo, U of T and Collège Militaire Royale. Teams were also expected from Memorial University in Newfoundland, Bishop's, and

UBC. Next weekend, the Blues take on CMR, McGill, and Trent at Kingston in the Canadian sloop finals — the winner of this race also goes to Fort Worth.

Blues lose lead-and game to Gee-Gees 30-13

By PAUL CARSON

Despite their 30-13 loss last Friday to the powerful University of Ottawa Gee-Gees, the football Blues could wrap up a playoff berth this weekend thanks to an unexpected assist from their Homecoming opponents, Carleton Ravens.

While Blues were floundering in the mud Friday at Lansdown Park, Ravens were preparing for what turned into the season's biggest upset, a 26-23 squeaker over Queens Saturday afternoon right in Kingston.

As a result, Blues could clinch second place this weekend if they defeat Carleton while hoping that Ottawa also beats Queens. Should both Blues and Guelph win, the playoff berth will be decided in the season finale in Kingston October 21.

Blues had enough chances to win Friday's game in the first 30 minutes, but could escape with only a 10-3 lead. The coaching staff decided to stick with the unique shotgun formation that confounded Queen's in the previous game, and for most of the first half the Gee-Gees were in a similar predicament.

Varsity maintained excellent field position during the first half and grabbed a 10-0 lead thanks to a nine-yard touchdown pass from Wayne Dunkley to Brent Elsey, plus a Mike Sokovnin convert and field goal.

However, Blues then got careless and wasted several additional scoring chances that could have put the game out of reach.

At one point, Varsity had a first down on the Ottawa one yard line, but took a foolish holding penalty and came away empty-handed.

In spite of the steady downpour and sloppy field conditions, Dunkley managed to pass with continual accuracy but his receivers developed itchy fingers. Passes were dropped, and dropped, and dropped and two apparent touchdowns went figuratively down the drain.

Gee-Gees made the most of these unexpected Varsity blunders, and narrowed the score to 10-3 with a field goal in the final minute of the half.

Ottawa took the opening kickoff and systematically plodded down the field until quarterback Dan Smith evaded the score on a short run.

Varsity players and coaches think the game was decided on the next play when Gee-Gees tried a short kickoff and the game officials apparently became confused about the blocking rules, awarding the ball to Ottawa. Blues were totally dumbfounded and before they recovered Smith had scored again and Gee-Gees were ahead to stay.

Blues' offensive unit just couldn't get untracked and Gee-Gees stuck to their powerful rushing game to maintain field position and run out the clock.

Halfback Conrad Cozak made it 23-10 on yet another short run and Wayne Terry added the final humiliation, running back a pass interception late in the fourth quarter.

"We played very well in the first half, but then went to sleep for about ten minutes in the third quarter and that cost us the game," commented assistant coach Dave Copp.

"That bad call on the short kick really hurt but, realistically, we had enough chances to win in the first half and didn't, so we can't blame the referees completely."

Blues can still achieve that coveted playoff berth with a win over Carleton at the Stadium on Saturday.

In other games this past weekend, Western defeated Waterloo 35-8, Guelph lost to Windsor 36-22, and Waterloo Lutheran injury-riddled McMaster suffered another setback at the hands of Waterloo Lutheran, 29-17.

Rugby Blues lose to RMC and York; record now 1 and 3

By DUDLEY CARRUTHERS

The U of T Rugby Blues experienced the "agony of defeat" on two recent occasions, losing to both the York Yeomen and the RMC Redmen.

Last Saturday the club travelled to Kingston to avenge the defeat by the RMC team in the season's opener. However, the Toronto Blues was defeated 8-0.

The Varsity team paid the price of inexperience by giving away an early try through an error in defense. The RMC cadets played a spoiling game, capitalizing on every mistake, and tuckling as if their lives depended on it.

On three occasions the Blues pressed hard on the RMC goal-line, but each time they lacked the finesse to hit the scoreboard.

However, near the end of the game RMC again scored an unspectacular try, making the final score 8-0.

The Blues seconds surprised even themselves by downing their RMC counterparts. In a close-fought game which marked the reactivation of Graham Wynne, the scratch team from Toronto gained a well-earned victory, scoring two picture-book tries, while playing short-handed for much of the game.

In last Wednesday's closely-fought game on the back campus field neither Toronto nor York were able to cross their opponents' goal-lines. Officious refereeing slowed down what could have been an exciting game. Instead, a contest between rival place kickers developed.

York's Mario Rapponi clearly had the edge, scoring fifteen points from considerable distances. Blues' kicker, Rick Hodder, responded with nine points, leaving the final score at 15-9.

In general, the home team displayed great determination, tackling well and continually thwarting the better-drilled moves of the Yeomen.

The Blues second team displayed the same traditional spirit, upsetting their rivals by a score of 6-3, Neil Sorbie scoring the crucial try. York's only compensation resulted from a penalty goal.

Despite the Rugby Blues 1-3 record, enthusiasm and morale is still high and flourishing. This Saturday at 1:30 pm, the team meets their traditional rivals from Queen's on the back campus field.

PHE downs St. Mike's 17-0

Undefeated PHE met the only other undefeated team in interfac football's Division I — St. Mike's — and came out on top 17-0 yesterday. PHE has now played three games this season, without allowing a single point.

For the most part the game was a crunching, defensive battle, although the score was not indicative. St. Mike's seemed to come out of the game in worse position, with one player suffering a shoulder separation and another limping off the field.

PHE again relied on its rushing attack, although some evidence at aerial power was shown when Keith Bagg caught a noticeably long pass late in the second half to put PHE within striking distance of the St. Mike's goalposts.

St. Mike's also played along the ground, but making little headway there, they attempted to resort to a passing game, only to be stopped again.

PHE could have been on the scoreboard earlier were it not for a poor call by the referee. Late in the second quarter, Keith Bagg intercepted a St. Mike's fumble and ran 20-odd yards for an apparent touchdown. Unfortunately, the referee whistled the play dead too early. However, the Phys Ed squad regained the ball where Bagg had picked it off, and on the next series of plays Ed Matchett went across for the touchdown. Terry Nedoszytko converted to make the score 7-0 at halftime.

In the third quarter a determined PHE team quickly added to the score, with another touchdown, this time by Stan Gal. Nedoszytko again added a single. Nedoszytko rounded out the score with a field goal early in the fourth quarter.

St. Mike's looked most impressive late in the game, but were unable to go beyond a solid PHE defence.

In effect, the game turned out to be a letdown to the expected "close contest" between the two strongest teams of the present interfaculty season.

Elsewhere — In Division II play last week it was Meds over For 21-14, and Scar defeated Trin 9-0, both games last Thursday. Today, For meets UC, while on Thursday Trin goes against New, and Vic goes against Eng.

Keith Bagg (PHE in foreground) heads over the St. Mike's goal-line for disputed touchdown.

Soccer Blues earn first place, win 2-0 over Western

By JOHN COBBY

In their best performance of the season—the soccer Blues visited London Saturday and defeated the University of Western Ontario Mustangs 2-0.

Prior to the match both teams were tied for first place in the OUAA Western Division, both unbeaten in three games. The match assumed great importance for the Blues, coming as it did after a loss to Buffalo in exhibition play.

The early play was mainly confined to midfield as both teams sought out weaknesses in their opponents' lineups. Many promising moves broke down in the face of a tricky wind which, aided by a dry field, made ball control difficult.

However, on two occasions the Blues were able to direct penetrating passes to Peter Hillier, whose constant running made him an excellent target for the quick break. Breaking clear on a through ball from Ron Misurka, he slotted a pass to Mario DaRosa who took the ball in full stride, but was halted on an offside decision.

The Mustangs also decided that the darting run, rather than a series of interpassing plays, was the way to create scoring chances. Midway through the half they tested goalkeeper Jack Brand severely with two hard shots, one along the turf and another heading for the top corner of the net. Even so neither team could expose any weakness in the opposing defences.

The one apparent weakness on the field was the officiating, with the referee demonstrating an astonishing ability to see infringements that were more imagined than real. For a while this appeared to unsettle the Blues, who were finding it hazardous to make tackles of any credibility.

The irony of the situation was exemplified by a sortie started by Ed Carter, who centred the ball to Misurka. He, in turn, attempted to place himself for a shot, but was crudely treated by three Western defenders who accurately realised that his effectiveness when spread on the ground would be nil. This incident was indicative of the game.

The Blues were playing their best soccer of the season, with the offence a considerable menace, as Hillier foraged ceaselessly and sprayed accurate passes to both wings. Meanwhile, in defence, Tim Burns was coolly collecting the many misplaced Mustang passes, as Herb Dubsy's efforts disrupted much of the home team's attempt at an organized offence.

Perhaps the half time break disrupted the Blues' concentration, for Bob Cazzola was strangely hesitant in cutting out a through ball. The Western shot from five yards brought forth an incredible one-handed save from Brand. Such an individual effort inspired the Blues — particularly Giuseppe D'Antoni.

On two occasions he moved with speed and verve past his opposing fullback only to see one shot grabbed by the Western goalkeeper low at the post, and a second drift just over the angle of the post and crossbar.

The harassed Mustangs then conceded a free kick thirty yards from goal. Fittingly, when Bruno Bruni hit the ball hard and low, it was D'Antoni who darted from the set position to deflect the drive into the corner of the net, giving Toronto a 1-0 margin at the 60 minute mark.

However, the Western squad immediately showed the character expected of a team high in the league standings. First, a cross from the left was headed narrowly wide, then a well executed passing play left an attacker with only the goalkeeper to beat; he blasted his shot high from only ten yards out.

But the Blues were not to be denied. Phil Oldfield moved the ball down the left to D'Antonio who again rounded his unhappy defender before placing a pass in the path of the onrushing DaRosa. He made no mistake, and obtained a just reward for constant effort, continuing his record of scoring in every game.

Soon after that 70th minute goal, an incredible series of incidents occurred. A Western attack was halted on a routine tackle by Oldfield, who conceded a corner. The referee, possessing eyesight that would make a hawk burn with envy, decided otherwise from his vantage point half a length of the field away, and awarded a penalty shot to the Mustangs.

The joy in Blues' camp when Brand dived to save the shot was soon dispelled when the linesman decided that the Toronto team had infringed the penalty area before the kick was taken. Amazingly, Brand also saved the second penalty shot, only to have the linesman repeat his previous performance.

The referee, either realising that Brand was unbeatable or in deference to the pride of the twice thwarted Mustang penalty taker, ignored the linesman and allowed play to proceed.

However before long Blues' captain Burns was ejected from the game for protesting, another refereeing decision. The adversity enable the short handed Blues to demonstrate a coolness in play and to control the game up to the final whistle, for the final ten minutes, they were the fitter and more enterprising of two good squads.

In this game the Blues showed a purposeful spirit, deservedly overcoming strong opponents and the frustrations of inconsistent officiating. Coupled to the spirit was an excellence in play that suggests the team could repeat last year's championship performance. Leading the league, the Blues need only fear overconfidence.

Blue Chips — defenders, such as

Ed Carter and Joe Varelas, who play quiet but effective games, rarely receive just acclaim.....Ron Misurka enjoyed heating his old team.....Ian Harris and Eugene Konarsky are suffering from sore ankles.....next game is today at Guelph.....whilst Bob Cazzola would have been delighted to score against Buffalo, the caption below last Friday's picture should have indicated a goal by the visitors.....Saturday's victory was particularly notable, being the first time in the past five games that the Blues have defeated Western.

Help Needed

Although sports has been "adequately" covered so far this year this has been mainly due to the help of only a few of the loyal staff from last year. We now need people to cover most interfaculty sports — lacrosse, soccer, rugby, football, hockey, and basketball.

Women reporters are needed for basketball, volleyball, and field hockey, as well as general information from the Benson Building. Scarborough and Erindale Colleges should also be represented if anyone in the east or west is able to contribute.

We also need several reporters — no experience required and very little training involved — for the following intercollegiate sports — volleyball, basketball, gymnastics, wrestling, squash, fencing, and water polo.

PHE students and former players are especially welcome to add their experience.

The Varsity relies on its readers for contributors. Without your help we will not be able to cover all sports this year. If you care at all please come and discuss reporting with no necessary obligation.

The office is located at 91 St. George St., second floor. Drop in today from noon to 5 pm, Thursday from noon to midnight, or Friday from noon to 4 pm or, phone 923-4053 and leave your name and phone number.

Students vote yes to OFS

FRIDAY, OCT. 13, 1972 TORONTO

OFS general coordinator and returning officer Craig Heron announces the referendum results.

With over half the results in from a two-day province-wide referendum, Ontario students have overwhelmingly sanctioned the use of a January fee strike to protest a $100 tuition increase and cuts in student aid.

Seventy-six per cent of students voting who have paid only their first installment say they will withhold their fees in January should negotiations between the Ontario Federation of Students and the provincial government break down.

Ninety per cent voted to support the demands hammered out by the OFS this summer and presented to an unresponsive provincial government.

The demands called for an easing of the province's stringent student aid program, and an embargo on this year's and future fee increases until the government has consulted all "affected groups".

About two-thirds of those returning to post-secondary institutions next year said they would withhold all fees if the government further harmed students financially.

A fee strike could cost Ontario post-secondary institutions an estimated $10 million — approximately 10 per cent of their annual operating budgets.

At press time last night, 33,000 out of an estimated 77,000 full-time university and community college students from 11 institutions had cast ballots, a turn-out unprecedented in recent campus elections.

So far, only one university, Trent, voted against a fee strike.

U of T students turned out in droves during the two-day referendum. Out of 21,000 undergraduates, 11,600 cast ballots, while 450 part-time and 250 graduate students voted in simultaneous polls.

Graduate students are not members of OFS, while the Association of Part-time Students and SAC are members.

U of T undergraduate returns matched those across the province almost to a tee. Ninety per cent supported the OFS demands, 74 per cent agreed to withhold fees, and 74 per cent said they would support a total fee strike next year, should the province hike the price of post-secondary education.

OFS will take the referendum results to the province before they meet to decide what to do next.

But, previous approaches to government ministers on the issue of student aid and fees have had cold receptions.

A Wednesday night meeting between new Colleges and Universities Minister Jack McNie and members of the OFS executive produced only a re-iteration of the government's intention to maintain the present fee increase.

But, OFS treasurer and U of T SAC president Eric Miglin said McNie was receptive to complaints about the student aid program. McNie told U of T students Tuesday that he is "confident" fees will not be raised next year.

Students are asking that the government reduce the present loan ceiling from $800 to $600, make part-time student eligible for student aid, and reduce the age of independence from the present 24.

The present high loan ceiling means that students who apply for student aid will be awarded their first $800 in loans only, before they are eligible for government grants. Student leaders argue that this discourages low-income students from attending university.

The age of independence refers to the upper limit of parental contributions. In other words, a student under the age of 24 is assumed to be supported by his parents, whether or not he actually is.

Even if the government continues to cast a pallid light on student demands, a provincial-wide strike will not result automatically.

Referendum results will be studied by individual campus student councils who will decide if they will support a strike. If enough do, they will gather within the OFS fold to plan joint action.

And, Miglin repeatedly told last night's press conference that no action would be considered until the negotiations with the government are exhausted.

"But, we'll take a hard look in late November if the government appears to be stalling," he said.

'Professors still to decide exams'

By PAUL MCGRATH

A committee set up to examine academic requirements for history courses has decided the present policy on exams is suitable.

The question of whether exams will be required in courses will thus be handed back to the department council at its meeting today.

Three of the four committee members agreed last week that the present system, with the decision on exams left up to the individual professor, is sufficient.

This non-decision is expected to disturb some members of the department who feel that policy on exams should be the concern of the department as a whole, not individual professors.

Committee members W.J. Callahan and Kenneth McNaught of the staff, Steve Speismann of the Graduate Student's Union, and Jim Longo of the History Students Union, were asked to prepare positions on first, second, third and fourth year exams.

Callahan decided that the present system is desirable. "I prefer the present flexibility, rather than making a sweeping policy," he said.

McNaught originally called for first year exams in seminar courses after the lecture portion of the course, exams in all second year courses, and flexibility in third and fourth year courses.

Later he appended his position to agree with Callahan's.

Speismann also agreed with the present flexibility, although he suggested a few amendments. One such amendment called for exams to be more informal to make them less strenuous for the students. However, he later decided to go along with the faculty committee members and not press his amendments.

Jim Longo, on behalf of the undergraduate students, presented the only differing opinion. He advocated abolition of exams, agreeing with most undergraduate history students, who voted almost unanimously against exams in an HSU poll two weeks ago.

"It's hard to judge a student on material that is basically a regurgitation of secondary sources or the professors lectures," says Longo. He added that he feels writing an exam is "such a stress situation."

Longo feels the HSU dissenting opinion will probably be tacked onto the end of the report as presented to the department.

The department council can accept the report or send it back for more concrete proposals.

Department chairman J.B. Conacher declined comment until he sees the report.

Longo is worried the department will accept the report without any discussion of the dissenting HSU position. "I have a feeling it will be hounded around," he said. If it isn't, I'm going to stand up and force a discussion.

The council will meet this afternoon at 3 pm in Ramsay Wright room 432.

Leftists dismiss Guard threat

By KIM RICKETTS

Radical campus groups have generally dismissed a Western Guard threat to disrupt leftist meetings as "the standard attempt of the ultra-right" to intimidate the left.

In a typical reaction, Bill Getty of Students for a Democratic Society described the Guard as "an insignificant loud group of fascists, amounting quantitatively to nothing but qualitatively to even less."

The threat is a direct result of last week's cancellation, because of rumoured violence, of the taping of a television program featuring a Ku Klux Klan official. A Western Guard member later announced the group intends to disrupt all campus meetings featuring Marxist or black speakers.

The Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist), who have clashed in the past with the Guard, also thought the threat was not worth worrying about.

A CPC (M-L) spokesman declared that "fascists have no right to speak in Canada." Smash fascists through active resistance was their solution to the problem.

Frank Cunningham of the U of T Communist Club dismissed the threat as "no big deal", but rather an assertion that the Western Guard intends to continue previous policies. "They've been blackmailing campus groups ever since they've been in existence," Cunningham declared. He complained that the Western Guard has never attended a left wing meeting with the purpose of presenting their views, but only to disrupt it.

Cunningham considers it "a mistake for the administration or any campus body to buckle into their threats."

The Young Socialists' reaction was similar, although less military than the CPC's (M-L).

Not at all intimidated, the group intends to continue meeting. Having had experience with the Western Guard on past occasions, they say they know what to expect, and will set up a defence guard should the necessity arise.

Another campus left group, the Old Mole, considers the issue to be important but has not yet reached an official position. One member said, "Historically the correct way to fight fascism is through united action by the organizations of the working class and its leadership."

SAC president Eric Miglin defined the Western Guard as a "small determined rough crew of people who have been known to resort to violence."

"I don't know how seriously we can take them," he said, but he feels it necessary "to have people around that are prepared to deal with them."

SAC is occasionally asked to sponsor leftist meetings or obtain rooms for them.

Heap to reveal donor names

Dan Heap, an aldermanic candidate in Ward 6 in the December 4 municipal election, has reversed an earlier position and decided that all donations to his campaign fund will be made public.

In an interview yesterday, Heap said that he had changed his position because opinion at a Citizens Forum two weeks ago was in favour of publishing the names of the donors.

Originally he had decided that all donors would have their names made public except those who specifically requested to remain anonymous. This, he said, was because publishing their names might prove awkward due to the nature of their employment.

Biggest turn-out in province

Ten:one U of T margin backs OFS position

By EDWARD PODGORSKI
By a margin of over 10 - 1, University of Toronto students have given overwhelming support to the demands of the Ontario Federation of Students in its campaign against higher tuition fees.

Students also stated that they would withhold fees in January by about 3 - 1 if OFS is unsuccessful in negotiating with the provincial government.

Members of the Students' Administrative Council, which includes all full-time undergraduate students, had over a 50 per cent turn-out. This was the highest percentage turn-out of any university in the province-wide referendum.

The Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students, which is also a member of OFS, voted approximately 8 - 1 in favour of the OFS demands.

Following the trend across campus, graduate students also voted 10 - 1 in favour of OFS demands. Since the Graduates' Student Union is not a member of OFS, graduate students balloting is regarded only as an opinion poll.

On the demands question, 10,599 SAC members were in favour of the demands, with 936 against.

Students also said "yes" to the second question which asked students to withhold their tuition fees in January if OFS negotiations with the Ontario government prove unsuccessful. Favouring withholding fees were 5,372, 1,790 against, and 4,386 had already paid their full tuition.

In response to question three, students unexpectedly supported withholding all of next year's tuition fees if the Ontario government announces further fee increases or if there are further detrimental changes in the Ontario Student Award Program.

For the boycott were 6,637, 2,612 against, and 1,958 said they would not be attending next year.

This came as a surprise to SAC vice-president Ross Flowers. "Students must realize that students who don't pay tuition fees can't register. Students must be really very, very concerned."

Flowers wonders whether students who said they were prepared to withhold their fees in January will in fact do so.

A formal decision on whether to back a fees strike will be made by SAC at next Monday's meeting.

The poll held by the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students showed that extension students supported the OFS demands strongly, but either were not able or not willing to back them up.

Support for the demands was indicated by 329 voting "yes" and only 41 against.

Volunteer workers count the results of U of T's referendum on the fees strike yesterday in the Drill Hall. As on other campuses, U of T undergraduates strongly backed the OFS demands.

Liberalists stick with unemployment tactics

By PAT REDICAN

The Liberal candidate in Spadina, admitted last night that he was "as puzzled as Mr. Trudeau" about the recent rise in unemployment, but assured his audience that "the Liberal party will go on doing what is has been doing" to meet this crisis.

Peter Stollery, speaking to about 75 people at an all candidates meeting at the St. Joseph's residence in St. Michael's College, urged voters to "look to the future" on election day.

Statistics Canada announced that the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate in October went up to 7.1 per cent, the highest recorded since 1962. In response, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau said he was "puzzled" by the rise.

His opponents including incumbent Conservative MP Perry Ryan (who won as a Liberal in the last election) NDP candidate Bob Beardsley, along with two Communist candidates, blasted the Liberal government on unemployment, inflation and the sellout of the economy.

Stollery charged the Conservatives have "no platform", but failed himself to offer any solutions to the economic woes of the country.

Beardsley criticized both Liberal and the Conservative policies which he said allow the "sell-out of the economy to the Americans." Both Maggie Bizzell of the Communist Party and Mitchell Bornstein of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) agreed that this was the factor basic to all the economic problems of the country.

Ryan asserted that better relations with the United States and Great Britain were the solution to this problem diplomatic relations with these countries now, he said, "were never worse".

Bornstein charged that the parliamentary system was irrelevant and said that the CPC(M-L) is fielding candidates to "bring the message of the revolution to the people".

Bizzell called for a coalition of anti-monopolist forces including the communist party and the NDP, to create a socialist state..

New Vic pres not pro-student; tries to keep everybody happy

By FERNANDO TRAFICANTE

Goldwin S. French, chairman of the history department of McMaster University, has been appointed president of Victoria University effective January 1 succeeding John Hodgetts.

Although known as conservative, French has a reputation of being well liked by his students. Debra Lewis, VUSAC vice-president and a member of the search committee which recommended him said "He does not take a strong student stand, but he tries to keep everyone happy."

French was chosen by a 13-person search committee which included four students, one of whom was an Emmanuel College theology student. There were four faculty representatives on the committee, four from the Board of Regents and one alumnus.

The regents ratified the choice in August but it was not released, according to Hodgetts, because they wanted to find a good picture of French to go with the official announcement.

French's appointment comes at a time of financial crisis for the federated colleges of the University of Toronto. Efforts to overcome inadequate government financing have pre-empted restructuring Victoria College; government, says Hodgetts. A report on restructuring, the "Mini-Commission on University Government" was tabled awaiting provincial government requirements for federated colleges to meet in order to obtain increased funding. However, Hodgetts expects the government to clear the issue up soon, so that active consideration of restructuring can resume.

French comes to his position with impeccable academic credentials. He holds three degrees from the University of Toronto and is a winner of Victoria's Regents' gold medal in history.

After teaching for 17 years at MacMaster, in 1964 he became chairman of the history department.

He also presently holds important positions on historical bodies, including the chairmanship of the archives committee of the United Church of Canada (Victoria College is affiliated with the United Church).

He is the author of "Parsons and Politicians: The Role of the Wesleyan Methodists in Upper Canada and the Maritimes from 1780 to 1855" and is completing another work.

Hodgetts is retiring a year before his term was due to expire. He explained the reason was "acute schizophrenia caused by teaching and performing an administrative function"

He intends to continue teaching political science.

Degree of emphasis on tutorials undecided

By RANDY ROBERTSON

The New Program Review Committee agreed yesterday that emphasis on tutorials in arts and science courses is not as great as the Macpherson Report had recommended. It could not agree, however, that the proportion of courses with tutorials advocated by the report actually could be or should be achieved.

The committee met in the Pharmacy Building to discuss to what degree the recommendations of the Macpherson Report had been implemented in the New Program.

The 1968 Macpherson Report urged sweeping changes in the structure and methods of teaching in the faculty. A large number of its proposals were implemented in time for the 1969-70 academic year.

David Warren, a recent arts graduate and researcher for the review committee claimed that due to a lack of money there are not enough faculty members and graduate students assistants to supply instructors for tutorials. Political economy professor Paul Fox said that the best graduate students were not available to teach because they had accepted fellowships or research grants.

Associate arts dean James Cruise said that differences between departments in staff-student ratios forced some departments to conduct their courses entirely by lecture.

Graduate history student Bruce Bowden wondered if students were capable of the tutorial system (sic). He said that students were not prepared to do the day-to-day assignments necessary for good tutorials.

Since the students often have no background knowledge, he claimed the tutorial turns into "either a mini-lecture or a pooling of ignorance". He doubted that students were respectful of other students and wondered if they ever listened to others' opinions and learned anything from them.

But, chemical engineering professor Robert Jervis said that students were not getting what they were paying for. He said that there were very few actual "contact hours" for students with members of the faculty. Students deserve, he said, 10 or 12 hours a week with their professors.

UC English professor Frank Watt said that "in English at least, the value of tutorials died with the disappearance of honour students." Attention in the old program was devoted, through tutorials, to honours students, he noted. The quality of the teachers and students, and the shared background because the students were in the same year and had taken the same courses, meant that "you could do things" with these students.

Innis College student Ronald Struys suggested that different teaching methods might be appropriate to different years. He said that since the groundwork was being done in the first and second years, lectures might be more appropriate in them than in tutorials.

Fox said that there was a basic lack of rooms in the university for tutorials.

The committee considered the relationship between attendance at classes and which method of teaching is used.

Warren claimed that it was possible to document a decline in the past few years of regular attendance at lectures, despite the fact that the number of lectures per week has been reduced as the Macpherson Report recommended. He said that students were doing the necessary work, but not going to the lectures.

The Macpherson Report regarded lectures as an unsatisfactory way to transmit information. Yet, they are used for this purpose in the New Program as they were in the old, one committee member said. If lectures do not change, they are rather irrelevant, he suggested.

Writer documents Brazil torture

In Wednesday's Varsity article on Brazil, only brief reference is made to the terrible torture practised by the present government of that country. Details of 1,081 cases of torture, carefully and critically cross-checked, have recently been published in a 91 page report by Amnesty International.

The Amnesty report is based on signed depositions and letters from prisoners, accounts by direct witnesses, lawyers, journalists, and churchmen, and stories in both the Brazilian and international press. The report details repeated instances of severe beatings, electric shocks administered to the sexual organs of male and female prisoners, simulated executions, near drowning and suffocation, pentothal injections, psychological torture, use of the "pau de arara", torture of children in front of their parents and of parents in front of their children, and other violations by Brazilian interrogators of Article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The report notes that torture goes on in practically all Brazilian prisons and lists the main centres. It names not only tortured prisoners and witnesses, but also the more notorious torturers and members of the Death Squads.

All previous approaches to the Brazilian government by Amnesty International and by other international bodies seeking an investigation into the allegations of torture have met with a negative response from the Brazilian government. Following the publication of the Amnesty report, the Brazilian government prohibited all mention of Amnesty International by Brazilian newspapers.

Gov't exploits labour: Breton

Earlier this year, in a speech praising the Liberal federal government, Mitchell Sharp said, "We have sought to preserve the quality of our environment for present and future generations of Canadians." For the people of Cape Breton, however, these are empty words.

This northernmost portion of Nova Scotia has been one of the traditionally exploited regions of Canada. Unemployment is very high here, the existing jobs are usually tedious and exhausting, and living costs are exorbitant. A quart of milk, for example, costs 37 cents home-delivered and from 40 cents to 46 cents in the store, thanks to processing industry-inspired price fixing by the Liberally-appointed N.S. Dairy Commission.

What is worse, the federal and provincial Liberal governments have joined forces to exploit the labour of Cape Bretoners for profit while exhausting the region's non-renewable resources and poisoning our air, water, soil, and food.

Some years ago the provincial government took over the Sydney Steel Corporation (Sysco). The federal government, through the Cape Breton "Development" Corporation (Devco), took over the coal mines and coke ovens here. The coal mines go deeper and deeper under the ocean floor, while the coke ovens and steel mill make Sydney's air the most polluted in Canada.

Instead of installing smoke-control devices, the Liberal politicians in Halifax and Ottawa have chosen to create additional bureaucratic smokecreens: departments of the environment. With election time approaching, the governments have also sponsored a series of environment hearings in preparation for a do-nothing resources conference.

The air over Sydney, Cape Breton is cleaner for the moment, but only because the steelworkers are on strike. Their provincial employers, Sysco, refuses to give in to their wage demands, and air pollution hasn't even been discussed yet.

Nova Scotia isn't the only province whose ecology is suffering under a partnership of Liberal governments. Quebec, Trudeau's home province, is continuing with its plans to flood vast areas of Indian land around James Bay in order to sell hydro-electric power to the United States. Meanwhile, the federal government has issued a series of postage stamps honouring the Plains Indians.

These are just some examples of what has become a standard Liberal ploy: appear concerned while backstabbing.

Engineer offers prank apology

Let me begin by stating that not only am I an engineer, but a participant in the presidential inauguration caper (limousine, slide rule, "Mr. Big", et cetera) that seems to have provoked a flurry of criticism, primarily from your paper. In your editorial of October 2, you have been particularly entertaining. In the petulant context from which this quote is taken, one gathers that the whole Goddamn world should shut up unless whatever is being said fits your particular constraints of political relevancy. One detects the scent of rampant holier-than-thouism.

One of the most shamefully distorted aspects of the entire affair has been the point of spontaneous audience protest. As a participant, I recognized no more than two distinct voices of protest, one of which fell raised. (My sources tell me that the most determined "orator" was not Italian.) If, however, any Italian has felt him/herself offended by our caper, I invite them to write me, in care of Engineering Stores, Haultain/Mill Building to arrange for a personal apology. In two weeks, I will report on how many people have taken me up on this offer.

While I realize that the main thrust of your editorial has been in criticism of the letter from the five vitriolic in your condemnation of this caper. In this letter, I would like to question some of the points and observations made.

Did Ledy Godive Memorial Bend occupy Simcoe Hall? Their prank was pre-arranged with administration, writer says.

You begin your treatment of the caper by implying that we had offended and inconvenienced the platform party by delaying the official recessional. This would be a rather tenuous conclusion to draw from your editorial since in the next sentence you state, accurately, that the caper was prearranged with Simcoe Hall. Since this is the case, how was the official party supposed to have been inconvenienced by a scheduled event?

The editorial continues by criticizing the caper for "poking irreverent fun at the president". What the hell, then, do you call your own centrespread of the same issue? You also seem to charge that the caper was "politically irrelevant", ignoring its primary purpose of silent after the first yell. The other was, not too kindly, hooted down by the Band. Yet, out of an estimated 300-500 Italians in the audience, the only ethnic group who have any right to feel offended, no voices were SAC reps, your distortion of the events of the inauguration caper was too rank to have gone unchallenged.

U of T will seek more money from business

By BRIANE NASIMOK

The External Affairs Committee of the Governing Council adopted a report Wednesday that recommends the establishment of a body to solicit greater private financial support for the university.

The body, to be known as the University of Toronto Private Support Board would be split into two sections, internal and external, and would be chaired by the president of U of T.

If passed by the Governing Council, the internal section's main function will be to "consider and assess what appeals should be made to the private sector, establish priorities as needed, provide policy guidance and help to ensure co-ordination of appeals".

The external section will try to secure the "maximum potential support from the private sector" with a core of volunteers. The report cited the Varsity Fund Board as an excellent example of what it proposes.

The Varsity Fund, the organization which collects and administers money donated by the university's alumni, except Trinity's, will not be affected by this report. The Private Support Board would canvass from private corporations and business only, and would not interfere with research grants given to the university.

President John Evans suggested that some people in the university may have doubts about the efficiency of such a body, feeling that the individual approach would be more successful.

Evans questioned the role of the board, wondering how much it should be a policy body, or an actual fundraising group. He also questioned the cost of running such an organization.

Chairman Walter J. MacNeill compared the board to the United Appeal, a combined appeal. This would eliminate duplication of appeals to one firm in a short space of time.

York will clamp down on thieves

York University's administration has decided that if a person is found committing a crime on campus he will be subject to arrest and prosecution.

Previously, problems with criminal activities were referred within the university to a college master for "counselling", according to administration student liaison officer John Becker. Now they will be referred directly to Metro police, a statement released in September says.

John Dunn, head of security at York, says that York "was slow in reaching this point" but that it was a necessary step because of a "substantial amount of theft on campus."

In a similar move, Rodger Shute, McLaughlin College president wants to set up a volunteer student security service to fight crime at York. He hopes to use the service not only at dances and pub nights but also to check the campus at night for any vandalism or theft.

Student council president John Theobald said Wednesday that he was in agreement with the policy of bringing police on campus to deal with crimes. It was "simply a reaffirmation of the laws of the land", he said.

He refused to comment, however, on the volunteer student security force proposal beyond saying that there were several people working on it.

Use of police on campus is a major component of the University of Toronto's discipline policy now being reviewed by the Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council.

Bobby Seale may speak here

Bobby Seale, national chairman of the Black Panthers and a member of the national steering committee of National Peace Action Coalition (NPAC), has agreed to speak in Toronto on November 3.

Seale is best remembered for the part he played in the 1968 Chicago anti-war protests and the subsequent "conspiracy" trials. He spent a number of years in prison awaiting trial on charges that were eventually dropped or dismissed.

A letter has been written to the Minister of Immigration asking that Seale be allowed to enter Canada for the speaking engagement. He will be talking on the war in Vietnam and black liberation struggles.

Seale has disassociated himself from the Democratic Party and the McGovern campaign. He is presently running for mayor in Oakland, California.

Seale's speech will precede a two-day cross-country conference of the Student Mobilization Committee, a co-ordinating body for the anti-war movement on campuses and high schools.

Elton John crackles with raw electricity at monumental concert

Elton John has always been firmly entrenched as one of my musical favorites but after his premier Toronto appearance last Thursday it's unimaginable that anyone could overtake the number one position that he so deservedly won that night.

From the moment he came on stage, in an unlikely outfit of a red, blue and silver striped and sparkled top hat and tails, with matching platform shoes, Elton John outflanked the wildest expectations of the audience of more than fifteen thousand. Seated at the keyboard of the grand piano his first two, self-accompanied songs, Tiny Dancer and Deniel, were completely juxtaposed in theme and atmosphere to his outlandish attire. With the introduction of the band complete, all hell broke loose.

As the utterly complete performer that he is, he knew exactly what the audience wanted to hear and he gave that and more. Most artists have to be coaxed, usually for the encore, to play their best known pieces. But not Elton John. He put down at least one song from each of his five albums and the crowd was, in fact, stunned when he gave them Your Song, so early in the concert.

His backup group, included Dee Murray on bass, Davey Johnstone on guitar, banjo and mandolin, and Nigel Olsson drums. Olsson's percussive display rivalled the exquisite gut-thumping standards on Elton's studio albums. The overall sound was remarkable, not just for Maple Leaf Gardens but for any rock hall in this city. Every instrument as well as the vocals, were sharp and clear and very expertly balanced. A number like Rocket Man was performed with more delicacy than I thought possible, outside of the confines of the studio. Davey Johnstone's Slide guitar was a marvel to listen to as it weaved through the crowd and heralded the chorus with a stinging clarity.

When Elton got to the rinky-tink break in I Think I'm Going to Kill Myself, a certain "Legs" Larry Smith, long-haired and mustachioed tap-danced onto the stage wearing a strange outfit that included a black football helmet with a white pompon and black and white penny loafers. That song was appropriately followed by an unbelievable version of Can I Put You On, where Elton kicked away the piano stool and worked the crowd to a frenzy, as he ran from one side of the stage to the other and returned to pound the keyboard as he knelt before it.

The concert passed the one hour mark as the crowd thundered. Elton said he'd be back for what everyone expected would be the finale after a quick costume change. He reappeared in about two minutes to do a freaky version of Singing In The Rain with "Legs" while a painted lady threw silver sparkles into the audience. But that was not the end.

Elton got as caught up with his act as the crowd did and he never held back his obvious pleasure at their enthusiasm. His disbelieving fans kept bringing him back as the concert stretched to a phenomenal two hours and fifteen minutes. Apart from his earlier moments of commanding stage presence, the last few songs stood out as monumental displays of raw electric energy as he crackled through turned-on, stops-out versions of Whole Lotta Shakin' Going on, Take Me To The Pilot and finally Hercules.

With the house lights on, Elton was stripped down to his shirt and now wore red and white striped socks and winged boots as he broke down all inhibitions with his stange antics. His hands on the keyboard and his face contorted in grimaces of intensity, he kicked his feet straight out back into the air as he shouted out Bernie Taupin's lyrics. The Gardens revelled in glorious waves of climax after climax, as Elton John lept upon the Steinway and hurled himself across the stage.

When the last note triumphed through the air, the audience and performers were at the point of complete exhaustion. People filtered onto Carlton Street smiling and shaking their heads in amazement.

I think everyone got their money's worth.

"Last of the Order" lacks divine inspiration

Sensitive to the Jesus movement in the streets and rock end roll religion in the musical theatre, straight dramatists are showing an increasing interest in the relationship between God and man. It is unfortunate that this interest cannot be shared by the audience in its relationship with this play.

Richard Benner's The Last of the Order, which opened at the Tarragon Theatre Tuesday, is a perfect example of a work that has forgotten what it was that made shows like Godspell successful. Their secret lay in the playing, not in the preaching. Godspell went light on God and heavy on spell-binding entertainment. Everyone got the message - everyone knew that anyway - not from the content of the show but from the style, which was lightning fast.

Not so Mr. Benner's opus. Two and a half hours, not counting intermission, is a long time to watch three characters, even if they are brilliant in a play with dialogue that cracks like a whip. Benner's whip is sometimes limp and there are long passages on the qualities of suffering and sacrifice during which one can only shuffle one's feet and wish for more pleasant things. After all, one can hear such sermons in church for free and usually at less length.

Part of the feeling of being preached to comes from the fact that the play is set in a deserted church in Mexico. The church is run by an old priest who is the last member of his religious order, the Brotherhood of the Sacred Hands. His congregation has long deserted him and he is left with only one follower, a woman he wronged long ago who nevertheless remains with him and acts as his altar boy during mass.

She is an increasingly unwilling servant as she recognizes the futility of celebrating the eucharist for a non-existent congregation. Abraham, the priest, does not see the uselessness of it all. He has faith that some day some one will come along to be a novice and continue the work of the order. In the meantime he has sacrificed his life and all his worldly possessions in support of the poor - seemingly a very ungrateful poor for they won't even come to church to give thanks for their pastor's generosity.

Finally the old priest's prayers are answered in the form of a matador whose concept of sacrifice consists of impaling others on the end of his sword.

The concept of ultimate sacrifice that is wrapped up in Abraham's supposed martyrdom makes very questionable theology. A martyr by definition is a man who does not want to die but who, being forced, makes of his death as much of a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation and satisfaction for his sins as it is possible for a mortal man. Abraham is just too willing to die. Having sacrificed everything, he falls to make the ultimate sacrifice which is to continue living when everything is lost. Playwright Benner unjustly murders his hero for the sake of a dramatic ending that is reminiscent of the girl Beckett and ends with a tableau that is a steal from a badly painted thirteenth station of the cross in which the dead Christ is mourned by his mother.

There were some light moments that provided blessed relief from the otherwise single-minded pursuit of a very heavy theme. Helen Hughes was often delightful as Abraham's earthy housekeeper, Lucy. She did house work in the middle of mass, sang silly ditties of the Jesus saves his money in the Bank of Montreal variety and brought ecclesiastical Latin to new lows in lines like "Dominus vobiscum and beat it".

J.B. Douglas occasionally brought humanity to an otherwise saintly role especially in scenes during which Lucy reminded him of his very mortal failings. Unfortunately his role shackled him with too much nobility and dialogue that sometimes required him to shift from earth to heaven with such rapidity that the transition caused unintentional laughter. Ardon Bess as the mad matador had a role that was as paper-mache as the Christ above the altar and he was understandably unable to bring it to life.

Rob Martin

Dance program ambitious

"The modern dancer is not interested in spectacle, but in the communication of emotional experiences, intuitive perceptions, and elusive truths". This is the final statement from the quotation which appears at the head of the program given out at performances of the Toronto Dance Theatre. Judging from the first of three programs offered by the company of fourteen dancers, they do not always live up to their credo. There were moments, in fact, during the varied program of October fourth, when spectacle seemed to be replacing communication.

The most explicit of their compositions, thematically, is The Amber Garden. In a stylized setting which defines the space quite liberally by means of a stool, a revolving bench, and a single, suspended window—all in white—two couples become entangled in romantic intrigue. The form reminds one of Anthony Tudor's dance-melodrama, The Lilac Garden, a favorite with the National Ballet, but the emotional states deal with, come closer to a choreographed version of R.D. Laing's Knobs. Each dancer portrays a particular emotional makeup, with enough detail in the choreography to avoid boring stereotypes. There is a particularly sensitive study of the playgirl-troublemaker whose need to attract sets off an unhappy chain reaction, and who finishes alone, caught in pitiless self-examination. Milton Barnes' musical score for string ensemble suggests the intensity of the emotions throughout the changing moods of the solos, duets, ensemble numbers. Thus, if we are looking for thematic content and the communication of emotional states, The Amber Garden is their most successful offering.

Very interesting production-wise, though more ambiguous from a thematic point of view, was another newly choreographed work, Boat, River, Moon. The set consists of the boat and moon in question, again stylized constructions, with a film sequence and electronic music to create the sensuousness of the river by night. Again we see four characters, this time stereotyped in the oriental dramatic tradition—Boatman, Warrior, Woman and Priest. They dance out a fantasy of sexual desire, temptation, struggle for power, and, inevitably, murder in the space around their boat. The content is not convincing. The choreographer doesn't live up to his exotic subject matter, and, this being the case, the aid of other media creates a "spectacle" of the genre the company seems anxious to avoid.

Their Baroque Suite, featuring music of Pachelbel and Corelli, suggests to us certain moods without being overly specific. David Earle, the choreographer, opens the number with a very fluid solo. In his blue silk costume, he seems to slither around the stage expressing both peace and joy. As the lights dim, he is still in eternal motion. The number which follows a lament, changes the mood to one of heaviness of spirit, through the slow, dragged and agonised movements of the seven women, clad in sumptuous, long gowns. A more energetic duet concludes the suite.

The least valuable work on the program was a solo performed and choreographed by Peter Randazzo. Starscape. A monotonous visual effect whereby the dancer moved slowly about the stage with four strings joined to his waist and stretching out towards the infinities of the stage crew above, gave us another example of "spectacle" for its own sake.

Program Three, which plays until the fourteenth, promises intriguing fare in the way of themes. The Last Act, and Los Sencillos (The Simple Ones) both deal with a play within a play, and The Silent Feast features Salome, John the Baptist and a host of other biblical favorites. More ambitious undertakings by a company that is learning through experimentation.

Making it big in the God a past master tells how to Marjoe (Mery-Joseph) Gortner started his amazing career as preacher-evangelist at the age of three-and-a-half. By the age of four, he had performed his first wedding ceremony. (It wasn't until after this wedding that California law was changed to state that the legal age for ministers conducting weddings should be 21.) From four to 14, he was taken on tour throughout the States by his domineering parents, hitting the regular Bible circuit saving souls for Jesus, and collecting a sum in the region of three million dollars. At 14 he decided to quit. After a while he took up living with an older woman, subsequently married, fathered a daughter and drifted from job to job. Short of money, he returned to the circuit a couple of years back and began again to make a name for himself. He needed the money but also wanted out and the opportunity came when he met Howard Smith, a columnist from The Village Voice, who suggested a movie based on Marjoe's life and "business". He subsequently gave up Bible preaching for good and is now trying to make it as a straight actor and singer.

The movie Marjoe, now playing at the New Yorker, makes an impact on two obvious levels. One is the exposure of the evangelical con-game that literally takes millions from the poor and naive every year. Marjoe quite openly says that at no point in his career did he believe in God or think it a miracle that he preached. He was in it for the money — pure and simple. He believes that the majority of evangelical preachers think the same. This might shock some depending on how they feel about religion.

The second aspect of the film is more disturbing. It's the man Marjoe himself who could coldly collect the money from his congregations and treat it as if it were a mere Sunday school prank. The incredible repression and guilt which he was laying on these people is washed over with a smile and an "oh well, if I didn't do it, someone else would". The power this man had is no less frightening though on a much smaller scale, than Hitler's.

Consequently, when I went to interview Marjoe, I expected a high-powered manipulator, ready and on the defensive. Surprisingly, instead I met a tired, very relaxed, pleasant person, soft-spoken and immediately likeable. Although he was obviously fed up with interviews, Marjoe answered all questions in a sincere, straight-forward manner. He had done a lot of thinking about his past and it was definitely behind him, although he constantly slipped into the present tense when talking of his preaching days, probably due to fatigue more than anything else. He had thought of the aspect of power and repression but never went deeply into it. The basic attitude was what is past is past, so let it die.

Do you feel the film is an honest representation of what you were doing?

Yeah.

Time magazine said the film was a rip-off, that you set up those meetings, then took the money.

I didn't book any special meetings for the film. At the time of the film I was booked two years ahead on the gospel circuit. Except for the summer, I was taking the film crew to meetings that already existed, that were booked anyway. There was nothing in the film that didn't happen anyway. It was all very, very real.

Do you feel that the film ended up making a mockery of the people you were filming?

Absolutely not. I really feel sorry for anyone who sees it that way, because you're looking at a piece of culture. The people are in a state of ecstasy. They're having a good time; they're getting off; they're jovial; they believe. I was very surprised that when the film first opened that a sophisticated, very hip New York audience could laugh at the people. There were lots of funny things in the film, like the guy preaching about the Cadillac. But to laugh at the people per se, they're part of American culture; they're more to be observed as what they are rather than laughed at. The ones we wanted to get to were the preachers. Those guys who are using those people and doing that to them.

What about the money that you actually collected during the film?

What, the money counting scene on the bed? That was not my money, that was the film's money.

The Impitcton was...

Well that's something that I've done. That's a scene. I've done that with my own money. That was just a scene to show...

Was there any money made during the sermons shown on the film?

Oh, yeah.

And what happened to that money?

It went in my pocket.

You don't feel...

What about the money I made before the film? What difference does that make? I didn't collect any money 'til after it was over. You can go on. Ultimately I gave it up. If I wanted to make money I'd never made the film. People say you made the film to make money. Well that's not true. I made it for two reasons which I'll get into later. Ultimately, to make money, I'd have stayed right where I was at, baby, because I could have been into the big penthouse.

You say you don't know what happened to that three million you made before.

No.

Your father did show up in the film.

He has a church in San Diego. He will not talk about my childhood. When I ask him about it, or talk to him about it, he just says he has a heart condition. He doesn't want to relate to those years. He says he'll have a heart attack.

Have you met anyone who was in one of your meetings and has seen the film? What are their reactions?

I've never met anyone. I've received letters. The people who have written to me say they'll pray for me. That's too bad. There's one lady who wrote: she said that no matter what I said, that I had God in me when I preached. She'll always know that and will pray for me now that I've gone astray.

So you've never actually met anyone who was in your meetings?

Person to person?

Yes.

No, only through letters. The way I could do that would be to go back to the church; which I don't plan on doing.

What are your feelings to those people now?

What I've just said. I feel sorry for them. Not sorry for them, but it's too bad these preachers only give them this temporary high, don't give them anything as far as social issues. They don't get them to register to vote, don't get them involved in poverty programs or things to help them in their lives right now. It's always pie in the sky. When you die, by and by. So you're going to get a reward some day, you're... you know, everything is someday, and they keep coming back for more. I think it's too bad that that's the only thing they're getting. That keeps all middle America in the state of depression.

So you think that it's a very repressive force?

Suppressed, oppressed, depressed and repressed.

Did you ever preach to an audience in a different way, or was your pastor always the same?

It varies. Did you notice in the film it was different with the black church than the white church?

Yes, the black church was obviously more alive.

Because they answer back and there's an organ in the background. That's why I like preaching for the black people the best, because they respond. You say yea and they say yea. Back and forth. It's a good energy type of thing. In a white church you've got to get them going more; you've got to work with the people harder, because they're not as free to begin with. Black people are loose; they're walking up the street; they're loose, more ready to go. Mid-American white you've got to give much more energy to go with you.

What did you do in that period that you stopped preaching?

That's the period where I really got saved, so to speak. I studied a lot of different religions; I travelled; I was an auctioneer; I worked at a boardwalk, a pin ball thing. I was involved in the antiwar thing. I did a lot of travelling. A lot of different things, that's what squared my head away from all the rest of the garbage.

What was your purpose of making the film, that is if you had one purpose in mind?

I had two, that's what I started to talk about. Number one, when the idea came about... I've always wanted... I've set at these revivals, if these people only knew what was going on behind the scenes, how these preachers are... what the whole scene is really like, if there was just a way to tell them it would be so fantastic. But how could you do it? So I saw the film immediately as a vehicle to do that... the younger kids who are being caught in it, who I feel are being brainwashed, and sort of see the thing and something will trigger in their minds and they will get out. Number two, it puts the whole thing definitely behind me. It's not that easy to give something up that you've done since you were four years old. It puts the whole thing behind me; it opens an acting career so I can do something else legitimate and I don't think that's bad.

Do you think that the evangelism game has been exposed in your film; are we seeing the whole thing, or just some cases?

Well that's definable. There are some cases where they're down-end-out types, but there are many cases where there are a lot of these preachers who are really sincere and they believe. They believe it's right for them to have their Cadillac and to live in big houses. They work for God and when you work for God you're going to prosper. They really believe that it is right for them to do that. So it's not that they're insincere; it's just that their thinking is a little screwy.

So not necessarily all these preachers are con-men.

Oh no. The preachers you see in the film believe. Hey, they believe in God, they pray every night, I guarantee you. It's what they believe, the pattern of their thinking. That woman in Detroit, I bet she believes. I don't know. Only God knows. Right?

You really did hope to reach those people you were preaching to?

Absolutely. That's why I'm really glad it's the film showing in the south. It's showing in Texas now, in Georgia. And I'm really glad that it's down there because I know a lot of those kids; my name is fairly well known there and I know a lot of those kids will go out and see it.

But the reactions in those letters were that you're a poor boy gone astray.

Those were from the older people. Eighty per cent of the mail I've been receiving is positive, "it's fantastic, what you did".

What sort of critical reaction have you been getting?

Devil-possessed. That the film is a rip-off. I made it for the money, which to me is ludicrous because the film would have to make zillions of dollars for me to make money out of it. It's not that kind of a film; I mean it will show and do well, but I'm not going to make lots of money out of it. Maybe for my career, but if it was money I wanted to make I would have stayed right where I was at, like I said before. I really think in five or six years I would have made it to the top, because I was a good preacher.

You had that style.

Right. I could have continued on and on; no one would have known the difference. I was at the point when making the film, of really getting into the big time or get out. I had a five storey office building that was given to me in Texas by two ladies, just handed to me. But I would have had to get into magazines or radio, the big time or get out. So that's why I knew I had to get out.

Who do you consider the big time?

Oral Roberts, Rex Humbard.

Have you ever met these people?

I've met Rex. Of course Oral Roberts was a tent preacher when I was a kid. We had bigger meetings than he had when I was small. Course then when he made his money he sort of turned on the poor people and joined the Methodist church and elevated himself. Now he's got the big university and fancy T.V. shows. But all his original income came from the really down people.

game; do it

The Varsity—Michael Cougar

The money people were giving to you, you were asking for big bills at one point. Do you think these people were taking from their savings or kids?

To a degree maybe so, yeah. I try to justify. . . I just took once in a night. Sometimes I'd be in town for a week; I'd take one big collection, or two or whatever. I'd justify that in my own head by saying that a lot of preachers took four or five in one night. I never asked anyone to give up their coats or anything. But I took offerings of course. But again if I just preached and didn't take an offering and ask for those bills. . . people are taught to give when they receive a blessing; that's the way the Christian thing is; the donation, actually them giving is a part of the release of their final orgasm.

So it's part of the show?

Yeah, yeah.

When you were doing your preaching, did you believe it was a therapy for the people?

In a way. It was a way for some very hostile people to get it off actually. A lot of them who are sick were healed; their sickness was psychosomatic and they were healed and that was very good. I mean to see someone come down to say I'm better, I'm well made me feel fantastic. And their sickness was real, but I just knew it wasn't God or Jesus but just the energy in believing. . . strong enough at the moment. I was saying before that that's such a beautiful quality because if you had a headache or backache now and were complaining and I said to you that I'd pray for you and it would go away, you'd probably say "are you kidding". And you'd sit there for the whole rest of the day with your backache, but if you were a believer I could pray for you and you'd believe that it would go away because you'd believe it; you'd conquer it with your own mind. So that's a far out quality to have.

Did you employ other gimmicks besides those shown in the film?

Oh, such things as pray hankies, miracle oil, like blessing water — used to keep that in a coke bottle. That's about it.

You said that you copied style like Mick Jagger and others.

Yeah, that's been taken way out of context in the movie though. It's not that I really copied but I really said is that certain rock performers, what they do and perform is very much like the preaching. I would think a lot of time being on stage. . . the more I would jump and run the aisles the more people would say, God is really blessing him tonight. . . the way he is running it has to be God. And I would be thinking in my head, those very same people, let them watch Mick Jagger or Alice Cooper or someone like that and they would say the devil is possessing that man, that's the devil. And I would be doing that and that's God, although the movements are much the same.

Do you see that as a correlation between your act and someone like Mick Jagger?

I see it in terms of a performance it's the same, yeah. It's strange, those kids, they can dance and fell out in the aisles and that's the Holy Ghost; that's beautiful. Let them dance at a rock concert and they're demon-possessed. The whole thing's strange.

So they're related but. . .

Yeah, on different levels. Another statement. I think a Billy Graham crusade is the same as what I do on a more intellectual level. The people don't dance; they don't run down the aisles but I sort of see it as a hype. They come down and give their hearts to Jesus and get promised eternal life. But it's more low-keyed, more professional level. But I don't think ultimately they get the help they need. He should speak out and say something about the war or talk about racism or poverty or that. He could do so much more than he does.

Did you ever feel that you could have done that yourself?

I tried to. I went back and tried to do it, but it didn't go over. When I went preaching, I didn't go back to do a show, but I went back because I was in the anti-war thing. I went to preach sermons relating Christ as a revolutionary character who changed things in his times and people who are good Christians should want to do the same. I wrote all this, what I thought were beautiful philosophical sermons, getting people involved in today, but relating to the Bible. But it bombed. I went down to thirty people one night from a crowd of five hundred. The minister cancelled me out. I was booked for two weeks, shut me down in five nights. I made no money, and he said when are you going to preach on hell; when are you going to preach on fire and brimstone; we don't want to hear political speeches in church, we don't worry about the world because we're going to heaven some day.

You found this the attitude of most of the people who ran the churches?

Yeah. The kids were receptive. They came up and said "Wow! I would like to hear more of that" but it was put down by the ministers who ran the church and the older people in the congregation. So after about three months of doing that, and failing miserably at it I said well what they want is a performance and a show and I changed and started doing the other things and started to get successful at it.

Do you think that you can get successful at this sort of thing through your recording and future acting?

I'm not trying to now. Strange thing, when a person tries to be a spiritual leader or preacher or whatever and his income has to come from it I think that's very bad because sooner or later you have to say something that cops yourself out or you sell out. Remember when meditation came along, a long time ago. It was a beautiful thing. Then all-of-a-sudden it was very commercialized and he was in a Rolls-Royce making millions of dollars and it was a big business. A lot of people say, why don't you go out now and say what you do believe because people would listen because of the movie and everything. Yeah, they would listen, but promoters would get a hold of it and I would be sold and it would be very commercialized. But I think if I wait a couple of years and income comes in from film or records whatever happens and I want to speak out on an issue because I believe it and I'll say it, just say it, and there'll be no ulterior motive and someone wants to pick up on it and it helps them fine. I don't have to come back to collect or sell tickets to hear me give my philosophical viewpoints. I mean say things in songs that I believe but I'm not trying to. I mean I'm more or less into the performance of it and have people have a good time, not trying to communicate spiritually.

Was this attitude deliberately left out of the film, because there is no mention of these things?

Right. Again in 88 minutes you can't put everything. The movie covers pretty much a broad range. You see the element for what it is. I was mainly interested in the movie and people seeing that element of Americana, what those preachers are like, how much control they have over the people. That's what's important. My own personal thoughts are not so.

What sort of audience was it? A low income group?

Middle to lower class.

Mostly black or mostly white?

In my meetings it was about 70 per cent black. I was one of the few white preachers who were accepted in black churches. I preached in a lot of all black churches. I carry papers of The Church of God in Christ which is an all-black denominational. I sort of preach that style so they just accept it.

What about children, were there a lot in the audience?

Yeah, younger kids, that's the depressing part. Younger kids being brainwashed into that, hearing that night after night after night.

Like you were presumably?

As a kid, yeah, but I was on the other side of the table watching the money come in.

What do you think of the recent Jesus craze?

I think it's really horrible. In a way. That's a fresh statement really. I'm getting tired. I think if a person gets off heroin or hard drugs through Jesus, fantastic. No matter what it be, because that's a drag. Hard drugs are really bad. What is bad is the guys who are running the Jesus movement right now. The guys who are running it at the top are the same bigoted, red-necked, biased guys who seven years ago would take a person with long hair and throw them out of church. Would say it's ungodly to come into church like that "this is a house of God; go clean yourself up, then get saved". Then all-of-a-sudden church business was going down. All the denominations were off. The missionaries in Africa and Haiti had worn out. So the new thing was "let's reach the hippies". And so they started getting in millions of dollars to evangelize the hippies in the streets. So these preachers grew their hair a little bit and instead of saying "hallelujah", they'd say "far-out". That's where it's at. And these Jesus kids will come up to you on the streets; it's really sad; they're being duped in the same way. . . the philosophy, the belief, no sex before marriage, you're going to go to Heaven or to Hell. Don't worry about the world now; just win the people to Jesus because we're all going to the sky. Same trip.

Do you equate what you've done to the straight preachers as well? Catholic or Protestant?

Yeah.

Do you think they're the same?

On a different level. I'm not trying to put them in the same bag, but it is the same type of hype. The Catholic church does get involved in more social things but I think they've done more to screw up people than any other denomination. I except parts from different religions.

So you're not totally disillusioned with religion per se?

I'm not disillusioned.

You sound pretty bitter.

Bitter? I'm bitter towards organizations. Why did they take so long to come out against the war? Imagine if six years ago Billy Graham had come out and said, that God told him, spoke to his heart that every God-fearing American would write to his congressmen protesting this war, if he'd done that six years ago I think that would have helped, or might at least have started something. But that's organizations. Otherwise I say whatever works. Like if in the Catholic church someone is happy, then, great, I wouldn't tear that down. It you're happy in that and feel content and at ease with yourself, I don't put that down, I think that's great. I think different things can work for different people. A person should ultimately find themselves because you are God; I think every person is God. They should elevate themselves to the highest level they can.

Pauline Kael goes muckraking in expose of Kane

The Citizen Kane Book; Little-Brown, $15 hardcover, $5.95 paper.

You don't hear too often anymore the old canard that research or close analysis somehow spoil our enjoyment of a poem or symphony or novel — It's an old, romantic notion, and quite unrespectable. Film buffs, however, are still liable to come out with statements of this sort, and it's easy to give their arguments an indulgent ear. Movies, after all, are the most entertaining art (if the most erratic and adolescent) and it is ludicrous to think of trundling a knowledge of American fiction or Hemingway's novels to a showing of Howard Hawks' To Have and Have Not, or to puzzle out the implausibilities in Strangers on a Train.

The Citizen Kane Book will convince any scoffers. Here is a volume (I'm going to add, solemnly, that overused epithet "indispensable") that makes watching the movie an even greater pleasure. Citizen Kane has a huge following; whenever it comes to a revival house here, the lines start curling around themselves hours in advance.

These fans, I suppose, have some inkling of who William Randolph Hearst was, and may realize that Orson Welles arrived in Hollywood, at twenty-five an infant terrible, determined, against some very nasty opposition, to make the greatest movie, ever. But there is so much in the film, and in the furor that surrounded it, that has slipped away from us, that is no longer part of the equipment we carry with us to the film. Kane is stupendous enough to succeed even without decoding, but it's even better the more we know about it.

The shooting script, by Herman J. Mankiewicz and Welles, is printed, along with extensive stills from almost every scene in the film. Except for a few passages truncated or suppressed, the script is a faithful and easily read narrative. (What with Welles' overlapping dialogue and various levels of sound, some of the brittlest dialogue can escape us even on the second or third viewing; this book clears up any muddy parts.) Rather unusually, the cutting continuity is reproduced as well. This is a stenographic record of the print of the film, giving footage information, a brief account of what is on the screen, and the dialogue or other sounds on the sound track. It's an irritating, choppy, demanding document, chock-a-block with technical information, but with its help it's possible to track down some particularly daring use of intersecting dialogue, some virtuoso piece of cutting.

The introduction (misleading word — it constitutes most of the text and a great deal of the excitement of this volume) was supplied by Pauline Keel. Devoted fans of before working on a portrait of Hearst called simply American.

Late in the thirties, Little Orson Anne, the prodigy whom old Hollywood despised and mocked, arrived. Welles and Mankiewicz drifted together, two formidable men each who thought he could handle the other. They settled on the Hearst project, assembled some extraordinary acting and technical talent and went to work. Despite a cloak of secrecy, word got out what they were up to.

It's hard now, when we hear of how Hearst did everything he could to get Kane stopped, (and pursued his vendetta years after the film's release), to think of this as anything but a pompous old men's vanity along with or be laughed at.)

The script of Kane stops just short of libel, but earlier versions were apparently astoundingly blunt. Mankiewicz's alcoholism had made him a pariah, he had never done anything remotely in Kane's class before, and he must have known he would never get a chance this good again. Understandably, with absolutely nothing to lose, he refused to dilute or veil his writing a bit — It was to be as heard and cut as a diamond, and Hearst-Kane would be fragmented brilliantly through the screenplay. It wasn't revenge, it wasn't even healthy spleen (he was quite fond of Marion Davies, for instance, who was Susan Alexander Kane's prototype), it was a madmen's determination not to compromise on this one job. He even went so far as to include incidents that were embarrassing to himself — Jed Leland, in a drunken slumber over the typewriter that held a cutthroat notice on Susan Kane's debut, is lifted almost intact from Mankiewicz's own days as drama critic on the New York Times. It was just too good to pass up.

Peter Bogdanovich, the sycophant, has recently attacked Keel's apportioning of the script's credit. Welles did everything, shrieks Bogdanovich, except maybe for the crumbs of credit he casts out in moods of or lethargy. It's really impossible to choose intelligently between their versions; both Keel and Bogdanovich rely, of necessity, on people's recollections. Kane is over thirty years old, and no memories are more tendentious and self-serving than Hollywood memories. Kael's reconstruction has a plausibility about it I would be reluctant to challenge — but you pays your money and you takes your choice.

Keel may be wrong about a few facts, she may be wrong-headed about certain issues. Her account remains one of the most fascinating, richly detailed, and intellectually substantial accounts of Hollywood yet published. It is a "prismatic" biography of a great, maybe the greatest, movie. It is controversial, it has axes to grind, and it is almost as much fun as Kane itself.

Bill MecVicer

this extraordinary critic would almost rather read her writing than go to movies. Her long essay Raising Kane is not an academic critique, but in the spirit of Kane itself, is a gossipy, muck-raking investigative report of how this unlikely film came to be made.

She starts with the talented newspapermen in the thirties who went west to become screenwriters and alcoholics, among them Mankiewicz — accident-prone, fired from all the major studios, cynically brilliant. It had been his dream for a long time to do a "prismatic" study of a public figure (John Dillinger and Aimee Semple McPherson were rejected) pushing him to ridiculous lengths. Kane, after all, was not portrayed as a pervert, or fascist, or even a particularly dislikeable man (current rumours were far darker than anything the movie contained — there were even whispers of murder). But Kael's digging around in the past proves just how malicious Mankiewicz's script was. The writer was on the fringes of the Hearst-Marion Davies coterie at San Simeon, and he had an insider's details about scandals or and embarrassing episodes that he could not resist incorporating into his screenplay. (There were pointed and humiliating references to Welles, too, that the director had to go

Cheap thrills

Deliverance is a rapulsive movie. Taeth ara jggied around in a corpse's mouth, a man's leg is torn open and the muscles push out lika delicate pink barnacles. These and equally grisly moments ara "what did happen on the Cahulawassae River", es the ad teases. While it is a bit unethical to give it away as beldy as this, I wish that I had been forewarned. Instead, I want to Deliverance innocently, a volunteer, and I'va coma back a veteran pacifist, with the veteran pacifist's messega, "Don't go".

It is not just that I am squamlish, or that Deliverance is a violent picture, it is that Deliverance is a dishonest violent pictura.

Since bloodshed has becoma the stapla at the Hollywood and the Uptown (as it has always bean at the Downtown and the Blitmore), It has become possible (and necessary) for the Uptown audienca to dalvop some of the Downtown audlanca's discrimination for horror. We apply our home easthetics to e lova scana and squirm or laugh if it rings falsa, but we don't distinguish between en honest and a phony beating, since it Isn't something we really want to llinger on. A friend pointed out that the violanca in A Clockwork Oranga "wasn't really so bad", and it wasn't, because Kubrick made it that way, by cropping, long shots, music, caricature victims. Clockwork was biased for Alex as the wartime Hollywood movias ware for the Franch Resistance.

Dalvaranca takes the opposita approach and whara Kubrick offerad sansational sax, John Boorman glvas sansational violanca. (Thare ara no woman's rolas in Dalvaranca.) The killad dia slowly and graphically. I will spara the axampilas.

Nor doas Boorman hava Kubrick's moral squint, hypocritical though it can be at times. His hero, an aging young bussnssman on a waakend cenoa trip, has aven lass moral choice than Sam Peckinpah's besaigad mathamatician in Straw Dogs. Dustin Hoffman at least had the option of giving up the fuglitva ha was harbouring. For John Voight It is kill or ba killad, which leaves scant room for consideration, his or ours.

Boorman also sharas with Peckinpah a faith in the currency of the old-time Hollywood villain. The hillbillies who assail innocent John Voight (whom, as we hava been shown, can't even shoot a deer — and thank God for that) are such goons that hanging is too good for them, as it is used to ba put. That thay ara hillbillies is crucial: as poor southern whites ("white trash") they ara as ominous and fearsome to an urban audienca as drum-beating jungle tribes, war-painted indians, large-pantised blacks or shiv-carrying Puerto-Ricans. White savages avoid the accusation of racism while retaining all racism's emotional advantages.

It is this corner-cutting, automatic shock that makes Deliverance so affective and so short-lived. The clutching hands of the dead, the prolonged showdown (straight out of Vara Cruz), the camara drawing back from the hero and dollyng through the woods, lingering behind a traa just that axtra moment (is there someaona watching?), the water-logged hand rising out of the river, only afterwards revealed as a draam — these ara stock tricks, as standard as a shadow that turns out to ba cast by a house-cat. They work, but thay don't build. They affect like pornography.

There might hava been a purpasa in Dalvaranca. The bussnsmen seek deliveranca from their fears and inadequaclas by escaping to the wilderness, at least for the weekend. The wildarness people, on the other hand, are trapped in their povarty and self-rallahce, any hope of deliverance gone with their teath. Thare ara traces of this, of dignity in other words, in peripheral scenes: around a boardinghouse dinner-table, in James Dickay's portrayal of a local sheriff, in a blank-facad child's rejection of a city-man's handshake. But these ara just traces, lost in a sea of cheap thrills.

Since there is no moral point to Deliverance, except the unintentional anti-poor whita racism, any justification must be in the characters and relations of the four canoe-trippers. But, while it is true that they are not matinee stereotypes (loyal and oblivious), they are still stereotypes, just more au courent. So Burt Reynolds' machismo is cold and uninviting — but why is he like that? Where does ha draw his energy from? Reynolds performs with an incredible stiffness, but then ha is given little reason to do otherwise.

Movie-making, more than any other art, is a corporate medium, so that it is difficult to individualize credit and blame. Somewhere in the background of Deliveranca there was ganilus. We catch glimpses of it before and after the plot gets going, in enticingly jumblad dialogue, in snatches of varnacular poatry. (Reynolds roars ahead of a local guida to find the Cahulawassae River, driving at braak-neck speed into a garbage dump. He drives back to the main road whara the locals chide "it's only the biggest damn river in the state". Reynolds roars off.)

There is, however, one place whare credit is unmistakably due and that is with cinematographer Vilmos Zsigmond (McCaba and Mrs. Miller). Bob Bossin

the child i was

What was important? I'm somewhere deep and long ago this week because my father is in the hospital and, for a while, I thought he was dying. "Smell the air," he would say after a rain. "Look at the stars." "Listen to that wind." "See how the little tree is growing." "There's a bee's nest in the lilac bush. Come and listen." It was a world where I was free enough to feel things, and I was grateful for that. But it was also a world in which my father and my mother were still fearful. Full of the Depression, hollow fear. The fear of hard-working people who were careful with their feelings, because that's the way they knew how to survive. Thrift, politeness, morality, discipline. When my father punished us it was always "something that had to be done." No one wanted it; it was out of his control. No one asked "Says who?" or "Why?"

School was like that too. An unpleasant necessity. The important things were the other kids. Tapping maple trees. Picking wildflowers. Collecting tadpoles. Having recess. Going home for lunch. Skipping. Merbles. Boyfriends. We went to school in a four-room brick schoolhouse, where the principal was authoritarian and worshipped brains and gave the strap. But he also believed in children learning all they could take, which was nice for me. . . In the beginning at least. Because I liked to learn, and I was eager for everything. Eventually the reward became important too, and about the fourth grade I grew anxious to learn. Not eager, anxious. My parents' fear got to me too.

But it didn't get to me thoroughly, and I began what I thought at the time was a pretty liveable double life. Polite, quiet, smart at school and at home, I was smart-alecky, seductive and daring with my peers. I was terrified of getting the strap and terrified of failing in school. But in the schoolyard and the backyard, I bullied the little kids, wrote blatantly provocative notes to the boys I liked, led daring snowball attacks on the tough kids everyone else was afraid of, read forbidden books behind the chesterfield, and introduced my friends to the delights of the senses.

I was eleven years old when I started high school. I turned twelve at the end of September. I was also very small for my age. I had no breasts at all, only tenderness where I ardently expected them to be. I knew what being in love was like and I thought about boys and my physical self and sex most of the time. That was nothing new. It had been going on for years. But that last summer before high school I remember vividly. It was the last of something. Something I lost trying to be a member of society, and something I'm trying to get back to.

I grew up in a little village on the outskirts of Ottawa. Until I was fifteen or sixteen that village hardly changed. My friends stayed the same, and when we moved that summer when I was eleven, we moved two blocks away.

There was a river we walked to barefoot at least three times a day all summer.

There was a railway track with a path running along beside it through deep grass, which we used as a short cut from school in the daytime and where we flirted outrageously with the boys in the evenings.

I played dolls with my friends quite passionately. That was a strange changing time. We moved easily and naturally, and just as passionately, from dolls and making little dresses for them and playing house to dressing like teen-agers with Veronica Lake hairdos, shoulder purses filled with used lipsticks, combs and empty cigarette boxes. . . to paper dolls that wore the most suggestive clothing, that dressed and undressed each other, postured and finally fucked. . . to erotic, quite realistic drawings of people screwing and saying lewd things to each other complete with gigantic penises and marvelously hairy cunts. . . to hot afternoons in a friend's attic wearing the wild costumes from her mother's theatrical trunk, painting our lips and our little nipples with bright red greasepaint, bluing our eyes and taking turns dancing, discussing each dance and its power to excite and seduce, matching breasts and counting pubic hairs and talking about how we would treat our husbands when we were married.

To all outward appearances we were gangly, freckled little girls. We even wore pigtails and bows occasionally. But our playing and even our playing house had taken a quite different turn from our appearance. Our fantasies included boys or "husbands." And our games slid back and forth from pretend to reality. We fought once because for two of us wanted the same real boy for the same pretend husband. The boys were never there, understand. Only in the evenings were they really there, but in our games we were playing to them. We looked forward to growing up. Because it would mean all those things which were so important to us, which we desired constantly and talked about so openly—sex and having babies, wearing seductive clothes and perfume, and so on.

We had one place where we sometimes shared these feelings with two or three of the boys we had grown up with. We used to meet spontaneously in a little patch of scrub and bush in plain sight of several houses and two streets. We sat under one very large, tangly bush and talked and displayed ourselves and handled each other quite seriously. I remember our seriousness with amazement, and our honesty. "How does that feel?" we would often say. "Do you like that?" and an honest answer would follow and we would try something else. We didn't attempt to make love. We knew all about it, but we weren't too sure about babies and anyway the boys we felt comfortable with sort of put us off that way. They were too familiar.

What got killed, of course, was our honesty. We already led a double life in relation to our parents and our school teachers. Some of our drawings got found, and we acted out being ashamed and ashamed while our mothers acted out being horrified and stern. They actually had a good laugh over them, I could tell, and perhaps there was even a hint of admiration in their faces when they lectured us. But for a short time we kids were straight with each other. About what we wanted. About what we felt. About what things had nothing to do with school or jobs. For the girls, being desired was important. Being beautiful. And touchingly enough, we were certain that we were beautiful. We weren't shy about our bodies or our looks. We expected to be movie there. We knew their names and their faces and their weaknesses, and they didn't change or move away. Gardens and fields remained just that, day after day, and houses were always there the next morning.

ched.

My high school was on the outskirts of Ottawa, the city, and I had to leave my familiar village to go to it. On the terrifying brink of being judged and judging myself as a potential woman, I found myself completely alone and friendless in a huge, confusing building filled with hundreds of strangers—non of whom were eleven years old, four feet, eleven inches tall and/or flat-chested.

I was not prepared for this devastating change in my life. Nor did anyone around me appear to understand it. I was terrified. Literally. My heart pounded, and my hands and knees shook. I didn't know where the auditorium was. I sat in the wrong section of seats. The teachers and the principal sitting stilly on the stage were a far cry from Miss Davis and Mr. Stiles winding a gay merch out of the old victrola in the main hall as we fled by. Nobody smiled at me. And the glamorous older students who knew where to sit and what to do breezed by and wouldn't be caught dead speaking to a ninth grader. Of course, there was a morning ritual in assembly, and by the time it was done and no one had explained it to me, and I had stood up and set down at all the wrong times and gotten lost again on the way to my home room I felt immeasurably guilty. I dared to peep around me only after I found a seat and discovered one of my brotherly loves of the house in the bushes. We had seen, stroked and discoursed on each other's genitals, but now we only nodded to each other distantly. The class was silent. The teacher talked at us. We copied our timetable from the board. He told us we were class 9A, vaguely where to go next, what his name was, read ours from a list, and ticked us off unsmilingly as we acknowledged our own presence. There were about twenty-five of us. From that day on, we spent all day, every day, together for a year, moving from class to class. We had English together, Math together, History, French, Latin, Music, Home Economics or "Shop" together, Phys. Ed. together. We undressed in the same room, smelled each other's sweat, used each other's combs, ate each other's lunches, but we never talked to each other. Never as a group and only rarely one-to-one while we were at school. And we separated when the school day was over. We had no desire to be together. We never got to know each other. I spent five years with at least ten of those same young people and didn't feel any more comfortable with them five years later than I did the first day of school.

But that summer when I was eleven and a child, alive and growing, it changed for me. I went away too soon, too fast. And "everybody," the adults, egged me on. Nobody stopped me as I went to High School.

Being a teen-ager was terrible. Especially one that was only eleven years old, four feet, eleven inches tall and flat-

Home Ec. and Phys. Ed. and get good marks.

The most important things to me and to the other kids were still basically the same. More painful maybe and more secret, but the same. How we looked. What the other kids thought of us. But there were important differences too. How we looked the year before had concerned my face, my hair, and my naked body. How we looked now became a little more dishonest. It was how we dressed. We didn't agonize much about whether or not we knew the countries of Europe or the date of the American War of Independence, until it came to exams and marks and then we agonized a little. What we were constantly tortured about, however, what we were anxious about all those hours of this and that, was how we looked. Whether or not our stocking seems were straight. Whether or not our clothes were "right". Whether or not our hair in place. Whether or not Bill Dickson was looking and liked me and would he ever ask me for a date. Would I ever have breasts like Elizabeth Purdy? They sort of turned up at the points. Did she fuck? The boys seemed to think she did. And even the male teachers allowed a gust of whistles and suggestive laughter when she walked up to the front. There were dirty girls and girls who weren't. Mary White, for instance, fainted in Home Ec. and some of the girls were laughing afterwards. Was she pregnant? And what about Neil? He never speaks to me any more. He's he told the other boys about us sitting in the little house in the bushes showing ourselves to each other? My stomach would shrivel at the thought. Sex was all-powerful, most important, blatant in everything we laughed at, were afraid of, in every motion and gesture of the class but never acknowledged openly.

We cared desperately day after day what the others thought of us. We never thought to ask. Asking was unheard of. Talking was unheard of too. Particularly about sex, about ourselves. We became more and more afraid of each other sexually. And sex became a weapon. I was used to boys and liked boys, but simple horseplay or joking or any kind of open courtship was a source of laughter. Of course, we laughed away our own fears and our own desires, our uneasiness. But then, and by then, we didn't know what we were about, nor that there was any other way to be or to feel.

We created rules of behavior as we went along. Oh, there were already rules imposed on us. No talking. Ask to leave the room. No chewing gum or swearing. No horseplay. No physical affection displayed in the halls or the classrooms. But stars someday.

I don't think we were wrong. I don't think we had a mistaken idea of reality. We were really.

It had something to do without growing up, our childhood. We all had a lot of freedom. Freedom of space. Freedom to play and to be with each other without the interference of adults. But the adults were our own rules were tighter and fiercer. They had to be, and the punishment more devastating.

We judged each other by the clothing we wore. We loved by the rules of dress and rejected by the same rules. We classed and labelled each other by dress. I realize now that it was the only way we had of judging, of making contact. Visual contact was allowed. No other form of interaction was. Significantly enough, the desirables in terms of dress were the cleanest, the neatest, the most conventional, and the least sexual.

Gone were my dreams of Veronica Lake hairdos and sensual shrugs and tossings of my long, silky hair. If I wanted to be where it was at, some changes would have to be made. God knows I tried. By the beginning of my third year I looked just like everybody else. I even had breasts. But I knew it was a lie even if nobody else did; and I could never quite bring it off—being bright, and clean, and sterile.

I now led a double life even in terms of clothing. Banished to utter privacy about my feelings, not daring to share with any friend who might use my sexual honesty against me, I painted provocative faces on myself in the bathroom mirror, postured nakedly (not without gullt) before the long mirror in the hall when my parents were out and wore red blouses with deep V-necks. I also did not have dates, was not desirable socially, and had no one to ask about it, and because of this I began to suffer severe doubts, about ever being loved or even liked.

The feeling of separation was immense. In terms of where I am now in the present I know it was not just because I started out too young. I wasn't the only person I knew who felt alone. But I can't remember witnessing one expression on the face of any teen-ager I knew of love, fear, anger, loneliness, though we suffered these things all the time. It wasn't allowed. Not anywhere. Not at home, not at school, not even two by two.

We had an accepted language that we spoke, derisive about our own feelings as well as the object of them. I don't remember darling to be visibly moved by anyone or anything past the age of eleven, unless it was death.

On most things we exaggerated our feelings to the point of being ludicrous. "Isn't he cute!" Sigh! Sigh! A dialogue out of a comic book, but it was standard, acceptable behavior. And the boys, though I would have to guess at their dialogues, postured and derided in much the same way. Didn't we all fall heart-breakingly in love, and blush and stutter when the beloved walked by? You'd never know it to hear it. Or see it? Poetry was mush, handholding was a signal for loud hoots and hollers, desire was a dirty joke, and we avoided being alone. The girls protected themselves with a gaggle of girls and the boys were sternly guarded by boys.

So afraid were we of our bodies and our desires, we were vulnerable to and hounded by the most deadly feelings of embarrassment.

Far from being understood or reassured by the adults in our lives, our fears and our vulnerability to embarrassment, both physically and emotionally, were used to manipulate us to perform intellectually. There was no worse threat than being singled out in a class by a teacher who "joked." The jokes were always derisive, always pertaining to physical appearance or affectionate behavior. We accepted it. We even liked the teachers who "joked" the best. At least we could laugh and relieve some of the tension. We accepted the most outrageous ridicule and violations of our self-respect as our due. No wonder we practiced the same disrespect on ourselves and each other.

Feeling it out, how it was back there, I wonder how on earth the whole school didn't explode. So much violence and love. Such a force of brand-new sexual feeling. The intellectual activity, the charade of learning, was paper-thin. So many dreary hours of sitting in rooms with dreary people to talk to us about dreary subjects. While we lived in deep fantasy, not allowed a richer, more real outlet, and all that violence and love burnt itself out. Worse still, we never knew. No one ever told us we were brave, or honest, or creative, or beautiful. And we didn't dare to tell each other. Either we were smart, or we weren't. And we racked our heads and hearts at the ages of thirteen and fourteen with what "we would do" when we finished school. That counted. Every year we made decisions affecting "what we would do" and every year the fateful day got closer. We didn't get a chance to practice any of the activities we were choosing as our "vocation" or talk to anyone involved in those activities. It seems incredible now that so much pressure was put on us at that time to clearly decide what we would spend a life-time doing. With so little information to go on and with so much of real importance was denied us. Like the simple opportunity of talking to each other. Or of just being.

The pressure we put on ourselves to perform socially was just as incredible. Somehow we knew there was a real world to reckon with. It appeared to be a place where having a "vocation" and having someone to love you and be loved were of tremendous importance. It began with having "dates." Having "dates" was more important than how you felt about the person you went out with or how he made you feel. The person didn't exist. Clothes did, or looks, or intellectual or physical prowess, and the real catch was the one who had them all. We simply bought and sold each other.

A teen-age dance was like being up for auction. It was also the first step out of the gaggle and away from the guardians. Oh, they were there, but no longer offering safety or protection. I wanted to be wanted. I wanted to dance, but I felt like a robot and somebody had lost the key. I wanted to be asked, but I didn't have the answer. I wasn't even sure I had a voice. And the moment I stepped out of it, the gaggle would pronounce judgment on me.

I wore lipstick and powder, and my hair fell accidentally over one eye, and my sweater bumped out where it was supposed to and it was the right shade of blue. The room was dark, and sexual expectation dense. If you danced, you would kiss. If you kissed, you would pet. You had physical contact before you exchanged names. Nervous and sweaty and ungainly as hell I danced and flirted with boys I didn't know, might never see again, and found physically repulsive. I allowed them to touch me, hold me, press their faces into my hair, and I came back to the gaggle a heroine. My soul rebelled. (My soul always rebelled.) It rebelled against the humiliation of standing along the wall, of looking eager, of acting eager in the first place, let alone being handled by someone I didn't know. And how many souls rebelled along with me? But I never dared to express it and neither did they. And I never dared to stay away or refuse. Neither did they. We all came home from dances and from frantic dates with stomach-aches, bragging about the wonderful time we had.

The next step out of the gaggle was the group of four or six couples, and more rigid sexual and social expectation. The movement from the group to a one-to-one relationship was a jump. There was no courtship; it wasn't allowed. There was no space or time to explore ourselves. We made our love choices visually and jumped. When we got there we hugged and kissed and petted. What else could we do? Love and desire were still dirty jokes unless you were married, engaged or going steady. We were obliged to "fall in love" before we were allowed the questionable relief of declaring our affections openly. Hopefully we still had some feelings left to express.

HOW THE OTHER HALF LOVES: At a time when everyone seems to be trying to lay some heavy message on your mind, it's a pleasant relief to watch Robert Morley at the Royal Alex playing a man who is completely out of his mind and couldn't care less about the problems of the world. How the Other Half Loves is a farce, pure and simple. There is sex since that is the principle motivation of people who are not hungry but the affair that starts the plot rolling has occurred before the curtain rises and what we see are the resultant complications.

There are three couples involved. One half of each of the first two couples has been involved in a dalliance with each other and the third, completely innocent couple is, of course, blamed for all the hanky panky.

The dialogue is frequently very witty and the actors fill in those necessary but possibly dull narrative sections with some excellent mugging. Our only objection was that the cast frequently allowed insufficient time for laughter to subside so that whole paragraphs were lost.

Playwright Alan Ayckbourn's basic conceit of combining the homes of the two major couples, thus providing simultaneous coverage of both guilty party's attempts to cover up their guilt, is both original and highly successful. After a very brief period during which the convention is accepted, the constant contrast between the two life styles presented — upper crust and lower class — provides many visual laughs in addition to the dialogue. (Rob Martin)

BACKDOOR THEATRE WORKSHOP: Two original Canadian one act plays by Eugene Benson are the current fare. Joen of Arc's Violin is a squawky piece that says little and does a poor job saying it. The Gunner's Rope is a longer, more complex and generally superior play in which two tramps discuss which one will die so the other may receive the extra pension money. It's all very Waiting for Godot except that these two have given up waiting. (Lilian Mersheim)

GODSPELL: Summer is long gone but Godspell lingers on at the Playhouse. Victor Garber, the original Toronto Jesus clown, has left to do the film version, but most of the original cast remains and incredibly enough, appear to be able to maintain the high voltage energy level required by the rather demanding production. (Sandra Souchette)

AND THEN THERE'S: Hert House Theatre opens its season Thursday with Moliere's The Misanthrope Mirandoline by Carlo Goldoni is at the Colonnade Theatre.

Grumbles, 71 Jarvis above King (368-0796), is presenting Ellen McIlwaine tonight and tomorrow. She's Nashville born and was raised in Japan till the age of fifteen. During her college years in the States she developed the unique guitar and singing style which she boasts today. Her music touches on folk and rock with jazz overtones. Accompanying herself on an acoustic Guild with a pick-up, her guitar playing relies strongly on tunings and an aggressive rhythmic style. Her voice is powerful and gruff with gentle overtones, sounding much like Julie Driscoll. Ellen also has an interesting album out called Honky Tonk Angel (Polydor). One side is live, and more intense than the other, studio, side. She especially shines on Isaac Hayes' Toe Hold, Hendrix's Up From The Skies, and Wade In The Water.

Next week at Grumbles will be The Good Brothers and La Troupe Grottesque Admission is still $2.50 and coffee and other drinks are cheap at 25¢.

Fiddler's Green Coffeeshouse, near Yonge and Eglinton (489-3001), has folksinger David Levine tonight. The Tuesday night set with Gordon Bok is already sold out.

The Riverboat, 134 Yorkville (922-6216), features Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee till Sunday night. Next week beginning Tuesday you can see Canadian folkie Murray McLauchlen.

King Biscuit Boy is at the El Mocambo Tavern, Spadina below College (961-2558), tonight and tomorrow. Grassie Ball Boogie and Flying Circus take over next week.

Alca Cooper's pre-recording days were made up of concert dates that were unusual, to say the least. Cooper and the 'boys' were usually dressed and made up so as to put their sexual genders in question and their act included bombarding the audience with live chickens, feathers and even watermelons. They had a loyal but small group of fans and worried about the transition of their music and spirit to record. However, they never succeeded in preserving their original theatrical flavour.

movies

It's a good week for films, among them Sounder at the Hollywood South. Today is the last day for the Canadian film awards showings at the St. Lawrence Centre. A mixed bag of movies all day long, but you had best phone and make sure there are seats empty. Also tonight Olivier's Othello shows at Cinema Lumiere. The film features Frank Finlay's definitive Iago, generally agreed to be the best Iago of the century. Still tonight, the Roxy is offering six hours of the Russian War and Peace for just 99¢. And as if that wasn't enough, St. Mike's is running Truffaut's tite, civilized The Wild Child tonight and tomorrow.

Monday you can choose between Investigation of a Citizen Above Suspicion at Cinema Lumiere and a sleeper called Pretty Poison at the Roxy.

Wednesday, Losey and Pinter's brooding, meticulous Accident plays the Roxy.

Thursday, Murmur of the Heart is at Cinema Lumiere. Louis Melle's film is gentle and joyous, one of the best ever.

Jerry McNeb of the Toronto Film-makers Co-op offers their monthly film calendar as a remedy to keeping track of the many film showings we complained of not having room to list. The calendar hasn't got them all, notably missing campus showings, but it is a great help. You can order it from the co-op, room 201, Rochdale, 341 Bloor Street West. It will cost about five dollars to cover a year's printing and postage. You can also join the co-op, if you like.

Frenzy: Alfred Hitchcock, in the full flower of his malice, returns to ply his own brand of affectionate sadism. He lets the lim just stop, and you squirm; he races through a cadenza of cutting and camera angles, and you squirm. Hitch is less interested in his characters' actions than in his audiences' reactions. This one is about a sex-murderer, an aspiring gourmet cook, some rather foolish women, and the City of London. At the Hyland; $2.75.

Cebaret is good, though not quite as good as its notices. It promises to be subtler than it really is, and Liza Minelli played the role before in The Sterile Cuckoo. But it's a stunningly nasty musical — the first one, ever. At the Glendale; $2.75.

music

The Canadian Opera Company finishes up its season this week with Toaca tonight at 8:15 and La Boheme tomorrow at 2 pm and Aida at 8:15 pm.

The Faculty of Music's artist in residence, Kelharne Wolpe (Anton Kuerti is away this year) gives a free concert, no tickets required, this Wednesday at 8:30 pm. Her concert is an interesting and varied one: Drei Klavierstücke by Schubert and three more piano pieces by Schonberg; Sechs Klänge, op. 19, the opus 11 and opus 23. Schumann's popular Kreisleriana (from E.T.A. Hoffmann's wizard) is the last work on her program.

The Festival Singers are at Lawrence Park Community Church at 8:30 pm (the same day and time as the Wolpe unfortunately — just another example of the increasingly biased attitude of concert schedulers to the already fixed dates of other important concerts in the city).

Zubin Mehta is conducting the Israel Philharmonic at Massey Hall this Thursday, October 19. The last word is that there are still a few tickets at $3 and $5. The program comprises symphony no. 2 by Tchaikovsky, Dephne and Chloe Suite, no. 2 and Dvorak's masterpiece symphony no. 7 (the old no. 2). The latter has everything to offer that the ninth does except its very expendable lamellarly.

The Faculty of Music is hosting a lecture in the Concert Hall this Thursday at 2 pm: "On the 100th Birthday of Vaughan Williams" by Doctor Derek Homan, no tickets, no charge.

Art Gallery of Ontario: To complement the coming exhibit, Toronto Painting 1953-1985, the gallery is hosting five lectures. The one this week, October 19, is given by Clare Bice, on the influence of artistic organizations and institutions on the developing arts in Canada. The lecture begins at 8:30 pm.

Erlinde College: In addition to the shows mentioned here last week, an exhibit of John Myster's paintings, drawings and prints will begin October 16.

Carmen Lemanna Gallery: Robin Collyer, Phil Mosowitz, "Tube Tuk", until October 26.

Arterio: A project of the Ontario Arts Council is sponsoring a 21-piece extravaganza by Canadian artists. Duplications of each piece will go to make up 500 shows across Canada, one of which will be at Trinity Square delly from noon on.

Water Polo Blues ride again

The Varsity—Bob Gauthier

Blues' new team practised last night for tomorrow's tournament at U of T.

The exotic sport of water polo, played by enthusiastic young gentlemen on horses with water wings, is currently being resuscitated on the U of T campus.

The Varsity squad under the leadership of coach Steve Tobalka is anticipating a thrilling season, beginning with a round-robin tournament at Hart House tomorrow at 11am. The tournament features teams from York, Ottawa, and Queens, in addition to the Blues.

Those unfamiliar with the sport will find it rivals football and hockey in excitement, while providing for the aficionado of sport an unparalleled exhibition of devious rule-bending and rugged play.

Despite the loss of veterans Alex Fedko, Lyle Makosky and Brian Barras, the team is rounding into form.

Returning from last year are Ed Hanna, Adam Gesing, Fred Poulter, and Peter Gagnon. Henning Wichach and David Martin are additions to the team from Winnipeg, while Chris McNaught - a shining light from a bygone water polo era - is also back.

Others performing for the Blues in their series of four meets will be Wayne Phillips, Bob Heatley, Jim Butler, John Gibson, Brian Hobbs, and Vitold Gesing.

Besides this weekend's meet, the water polo team goes to Queen's on October 21, York, October 28, and is back at home on November 4. The OUAA Championship takes place at York on November 11.

Toronto has not won the Hershorn Trophy since 1968. Last year McMaster took the championship.

The football Blues face a clutch homecoming game tomorrow against the Carleton Ravens. They defeated Carleton 14-6 earlier in the season but the Ravens downed Queen's 26-23 last weekend.....In the OUAA Golf Championships last weekend in Ottawa the University of Waterloo won the Ruttan Cup for the third time in four years. Warriors Tim McCutcheon recorded the lowest score (146) for the thirty-six holes to earn the McCall Trophy as the best individual performer. Waterloo's total was 603, with Queen's second(613), Western third (624), Carleton fourth (628) and U of T fifth (631).

Western will hold the fourth Annual UWO Invitational Track and Field Meet this afternoon beginning at 1 pm. The invitational is the last test before the OUAA championships at Windsor on October 21..... The first cross-country invitational meet takes place at York tomorrow.....In OUAA Tennis Western won the team, individual, and doubles championships in the Western Section. In the Eastern Section eliminations at York last weekend U of T won the team championship while Keith Porter and Steve Segal teamed up to win the doubles. York's Tony Pospicil captured the individual championship. Western, Toronto, and York's Pospicil will travel to Western tomorrow to compete for the Canadian Lawn Tennis Association Cup.....the second rowing regatta of the season takes place tomorrow when Trent holds the second annual Head of the Trent rowing regatta for eights and singles. Western will return to defend the championship it won last year.

All together there will be approximately 400 competitors from 35 universities, rowing clubs and high schools.....the standing committee for interfaculty hockey held a meeting yesterday to decide upon the composition of the league. There will be two championships and two division. Division I consists of A (Vic I, Sr. Eng, St Mike's A, PHE A, Law A, and Erin) and B (Trin A, Fac of Educ., Scar I, Med A, UC I, New I) sections. Division II also consists of two sections - A (Dent A, Viell, For A, Jr Eng, St Mike's B, Devonshire House, Innis I, PHE B) and B (Grad Stud A, Law II, Scar II, Knox, Music, Pharm A, UC II). Division I will have a home and home schedule, plus one round of interlocking games, while Division II will only play home and home games. The top four teams in each section of the both divisions will play off.

The intermediate league will likely consist of two divisions with six games played by each team. Teams defaulting the first scheduled game are withdrawn from the league, while a team must earn six points to qualify for the playoffs. Interfac League starts November 1, and Intermediate League November 6.

Hockey dies in Canada, thrives in U.S.

By NADIM WAKEAM

The American colonization of our national sport has caused the death of hockey in Canada, said Bruce Kidd in a speech Wednesday night.

Speaking to a meeting of the West Metro Waffle, he said, "The death is apparent to us all after watching the eight game Canada-Russia series."

Kidd, a former NDP provincial candidate and Olympic track runner, spoke with deep feeling on the American exploitation of hockey in Canada today.

Not only has our economy become dominated by the U.S., but "our so-called national sport has become colonized as well," he continued.

He pointed out how the NHL had gained control of past Canadian national teams through threats of bribing team players to join the NHL with high salaries. He cited as examples players such as Ken Dryden and Gary Dineen who subsequently did join NHL teams.

And, he continued, last spring Russia agreed to play a Canadian professional team, but the NHL permitted only those players who had signed NHL contracts to play. This excluded players such as Bobby Hill and Derek Sanderson, who had signed with the new World Hockey Association.

"The whole Team Canada experience has this 'made-in-U.S.A.' feel," he said.

"The whole (NHL) operation is in the hands of a multi-national corporation largely controlled outside Canada." He added the only reason NHL headquarters is in Montreal is to escape the American anti-trust laws.

As a result of the commercialization of hockey, the sport has lost its excitement and skillful character, Kidd continued.

The decline of the game as a spectacle begins the first moment it is bought and sold as a commodity, he stated.

The decline of the sport was exemplified in the Russian series when Canadian players began enticing fights and using dirty tactics, he said.

"The consequences of the NHL monopoly of the game is that we have lost sight of the game as it was played before."

The game played in the 1930's and players such as Maurice Richard and Jean Beliveau are examples of an older and more skillful type of hockey, he maintained.

Instead of playing the game for its own sake, the NHL feels hockey's purpose is to win "no matter how you do it", he said.

Kidd also attacked the complicity of the press in failing to criticize NHL hockey. The reason for this is that the press has simply accepted the press releases from NHL head offices, he said.

Kidd concluded his speech with an exhortation to Canadians to form their own league controlled by Canadians, through nationalization of the sport, if necessary.

"We do have a chance to bring hockey back alive," he said.

He called for hockey fans and participants to regain control of Canada's national sport and develop a new type of hockey based on sportsmanship and skill.

He outlines his views on his proposed new league in a book just published entitled "The Death of Hockey".

Third shut-out in five games

Soccer Blues tie Guelph in lacklustre game

By IAN HARRIS

The Blues returned from Guelph last night after a disappointing goalless draw in a game they dominated for long spells.

Early play was rather erratic due to the slippery playing surface after a heavy rain. Both teams took a while to settle down; the ball was spinning awkwardly making control difficult.

The Blues were the first to make an impression from a throw-in on the left the ball went to Bruno Bruni who shot narrowly past the upright. Guelph, now mastering the tricky conditions, hit back with a series of breaks down the wings, followed by dangerous crosses which keeper Jack Brand dealt with adequately.

On the next play Brand made a diving save at the feet of Stevens, the Guelph centre forward.

Generally, Toronto's defence played competently, being well drilled by captain Tim Burns. After breaking down a Guelph attack Burns started a counter attack for the Blues with an astute through ball to Ron Misurka who then shot over the top.

However, the Blues' attack was not playing cohesively. The wings were inadequately served by the midfield while centre forward Da Rosa was well held by Guelph's centre back, Mahabir. The two wingers, D'Antoni and Misurka were not getting inside the fullbacks making Hillier's running ineffective.

However, on one flurry of attack Blues' Jim Varelas hit the crossbar and some good work on the right by Da Rosa also culminated with a shot—one which went narrowly wide.

Hillier found D'Antoni with a good pass and he got the better of two defenders, ending the move with a shot which was turned for a corner. From the kick Bruni skimmed the crossbar.

The Blues' attack was sporadic, hardly posing a real threat to the Guelph goal. There was no sustained pressure from either side and the 0-0 halftime score was not surprising. Toronto's midfield was showing little of the tenacity it displayed against Western. Forwards tended to bunch and failed to penetrate the tight Guelph defence, although, Blues' defence was once again out standing, with Cazzola and Burns playing particularly well.

In the earlier stages of the second half, the Blues continued to dominate most of the play against a Guelph squad showing a definite defensive strategy. A dangerous through ball by Misurka to Da Rosa was hit out by the Guelph defence for a throw-in. From the throw-in Duhsy hit a shot, only to be stopped by the Guelph goalkeeper on a good save.

Bruni came close to scoring, beating three men in midfield, but shot just wide of the upright from thirty yards out. Next corner on the left was hit low to the running Hillier, whose shot on goal was kicked away by the Guelph right back. Guelph's only reply to the Blues pressure was a break away down the middle. Keeper Brand was called upon to make his best save of the game on this play.

Fifteen minutes into the second half, a cross from Ed Carter on the right produced the Blues best scoring chance. The right back's pass found D'Antoni running in towards goal, and with only the keeper to beat, the winger headed the ball into the goalie's hands. Shortly afterwards Misurka squandered another golden opportunity ballooning the ball over Guelph's crossbar from only six yards out.

Sustained pressure by the Blues in the final phase of the game produced at least seven corner kicks, but the forwards were unable to capitalize.

With only minutes remaining Phil Oldfield intercepted a Guelph pass in midfield and combined with Peter Hillier, whose firm shot narrowly missed the target from 25 yards. This last ditch effort by the Blues was undoubtedly the most skillful attempt at penetrating a tight Guelph defence.

On the whole the Blues were unfortunate not to come away with a win, but they never really looked like scoring.

Credit must be given to the Guelph team for a tremendous defensive effort. Their strong running and workman like ability did not allow the Blues to foray deep in Guelph territory.

Blues' midfield players failed to dominate the all-important centre of the field until Oldfield entered the game. His running of the ball and skillful distribution was one of the few redeeming features of the Blues' play.

Despite the result, coach Nicol should have been extremely satisfied with the performance of the four defence men.

Burns broke up the few Guelph attacks coolly and with authority. Boh Cazzola and Herb Duosky tackled accurately, and Eddie Carter played one of his better games, negating the Guelph's left winger and playing the most effective pass.

The Blues travel to Waterloo tomorrow hoping to repeat their earlier victory over the Warriors.

Rejects referendum results

McNie stands firm on fees

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNie said yesterday the results of the OFS referendum will not convince him to advocate repealing the fees increase.

However he stated that there will be no fee increases next year, claiming that this had been government policy before the referendum. He added Premier Bill Davis had said at York University a week before the referendum that the fees would not be increased. He said he himself had said this at Convocation Hall just before the referendum.

In fact, although a report of what Davis said at York was never denied by government sources, McNie would not confirm on October 7 that it was government policy not to increase fees in 1973-74. At Convocation Hall last Tuesday, the minister stated he was "confident" that there would be no fee increases.)

Explaining why the government would not defer the 1972-73 fee increase, McNie compared the referendum to a "vote in front of a supermarket asking the customers if they want lower prices."

OFS general co-ordinator Craig Heron, when told of McNie's attitude said, "it doesn't surprise me."

McNie claimed that there had never been any negotiations between the OFS and the provincial government. "Negotiating — this is a word the OFS has been using," he said.

Heron said this was "not strictly true." The OFS, he said, has not been "negotiating" in any formal labour relations sense with the government because it does not exist as a hargaining unit. He cited, however, a meeting with former colleges and universities minister George Kerr two days after the formulation of the OFS demands, a meeting planned with former Social Development Minister Darcy McKeough — who resigned before it could take place, and a meeting last Wednesday with McNie himself. It was "rather hard to meet with a constantly shifting administration," Heron said.

McNie called for documentation of the hardships the OFS charges the fees and loan increases are causing. He said the combination of increases in tuition and decreases in grants is causing some hardship, but he demanded the presentation of specific instances.

Heron said OFS has not documented hardship cases but that some of the university student councils have done so. He added that OFS could do so itself without any difficulty.

But, he said, more important to the issue are those cases we can't document — the cases of those who have not come back to university because of the fees and loan increases.

McNie asserted that Ontario has the best student aid program in Canada. He called for a Canada-wide review of provincial student aid systems, involving the federal government suggestions and action.

Student pressure of financing will be more effective if it is applied to the federal government instead of just Ontario, McNie stated.

"Students," he said, "would be more credible if only they had a broader perspective."

If they can move the federal government to action, students will be improving the lot of students in poorer provinces, as well as their own, he thought.

The minister added he is interested in a system through which students could pay back education costs through a geared-to-income tax surcharge. This would have to be negotiated with Ottawa, he said.

Heron charged that McNie is "shifting the blame to get the pressure off himself." Students have been pressuring the federal government, he claimed, but federal officials have refused to meet with them.

Late returns confirm Ontario students oppose fee hikes

More complete returns from last week's fees strike referendum have confirmed Ontario students' opposition to government cuts in student financing.

After Lakehead, Waterloo and York Universities reported Ontario Federation of Students figures reveal more than 35,000 students have voted, with two thirds of them supporting the OFS demands of the Ontario government. Ottawa University, St. Patrick's and Fanshawe community colleges have not yet reported.

Of the accurate totals, which include 33,710 voters, 22,940 voted to support the OFS demands. On the crucial question of the fees strike, 19,217 voted "yes", while 8,857 had already paid their fees. Of the close to 34,000 students voting, 21,167 said they would withhold all their fees next year if further cuts in student financing were announced, while 6,017 will not attend their institution next year.

Trent University students were still the only ones to vote against the fees strike. But surprisingly, they supported their own student council's demands more strongly than they supported the OFS demands.

While 67 per cent supported the OFS demands, 85 per cent wanted permanent rescinding of the fee hikes, the return of the OSAP loan ceilings to their 1971-72 level and the tax burden being placed on "those who can afford it, that is the corporations".

Of the one quarter of the Trent student body which voted, 251 opposed a fees strike in January if OFS negotiations are not successful, while only 90 supported it. However, 71 per cent supported holding a province-wide demonstration in Queen's Park to protest the cuts in student financing.

At U of T, the fees strike was supported by SAC fees-paying students 5,140 "yes" votes to 1,600 no, votes seemingly more than 3 to 1 support. However, 3,958 said they had already paid all their fees.

As SAC services commissioner Bill Steadman said in an interview yesterday, many of those who paid all their fees in one instalment disagreed with the fees strike. Their neutrality or support in the same proportion as those who voted yes or no cannot be assumed.

"I personally don't feel there is a strong mandate," Steadman says.

Concerning SAC support of the fees strike at tonight's meeting when it considers the referendum, he said "I have a feeling it won't go through easily."

Speeding readers may stop

SAC and the promoters of the first campus speed reading course offered in three years are slated to meet this morning to try to iron out difficulties which could prevent the program from being instituted.

Communication Services promoter Elwood Lemon approached SAC services commissioner Bill Steadman this summer with a proposal to start a speed reading course. Shortly after SAC accepted the offer, a serious communications breakdown developed.

Steadman could not reach Lemon by telephone all last week, and Lemon failed to show for a Thursday meeting. This morning's meeting will try to unravel the difficulties.

SAC has several serious complaints about the way Communication Services are handling preparations for the course.

Without receiving permission from SAC, the promoters have printed SAC's name on their advertisements and application forms.

They unilaterally decided to hold three of the five classes at seven Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday evenings. However, the university has no facilities with a projector and screen available at that hour, according to SAC.

Communication Services also instructed course applicants to make their cheques payable to SAC. Although SAC agreed to collect the money, Steadman noted, it did not give its permission for the cheques to be made payable to it.

Steadman said there was no reason SAC should be stuck with all the bookwork for running the profit-making course.

The London-based course operators claim a three- to 10-fold increase in reading speed without loss of comprehension. All of this can be done in eight, easy lessons and costs only $35, according to Communication Services' promotional material.

Meanwhile, SAC is advising persons registered for the seven pm classes to contact the SAC office, 928-4911, after noon today to find out the fate of their course.

U of Wat Fed pres quits

WATERLOO (CUP) — University of Waterloo Federation of Students president Terry Moore resigned Saturday.

When first elected to the presidency, Moore wanted to see "a student union that would really mean something to people, not just a student government."

Moore says he found himself becoming a full-time bureaucrat in order to get things done that other people were not willing to handle.

The council, Moore charges, "wasn't interested at all in anything, but perhaps becoming stage crews for the concerts and saw itself as a 'board of directors' that sanctioned the decisions of the executive every couple of weeks, rather than a working body."

Moore doesn't put the blame on the student body, saying that "the students' aloofness is most likely a result of the whole university structure." But, he also contends, "There does come a point at which the individual students have to assume responsibility if they expect the Federation to continue to represent them all."

First use of Quebec no warrant law cited

MONTREAL (CUPI) — Bill 51, Quebec justice minister Jerome Choquette's answer to the expired Public Order (Temporary Measures Act), appears to have been used recently for the first time in Quebec.

Today marks the second anniversary of the Trudeau government's invocation of the War Measures Act which preceded the PO (TMA).

The offices of l'Agence Presse Libre du Quebec (APLQ), the Movement for the Defence of Quebec Political Prisoners (MDPPQ) and a moving co-operative, all located in the same building in Montreal, were mysteriously broken into October 6.

The unknown thieves entered without forcing the doors of the building. At APLQ, they made off with almost a thousand files (200 of them on popular movements and unions), administrative catalogues, addressograph plates, lists of addresses and address booklets, handbooks, and mail. At the MDPPQ and the Co-op de Deménagement, all the administrative files and lists of the members and their addresses were seized.

After the robbery, the doors were carefully shut again and none of the equipment was damaged or even disturbed.

"The confiscation was selective, systematic and neatly carried out," revealed an APLQ spokesman. "We have an electronic typewriter worth $700 which wasn't even touched. Obviously what interested them were the files and our information on unions and popular movements."

After the break-in, APLQ wrote to the RCMP, le Sureté du Quebec, (the Quebec Provincial Police) and the Montreal police department asking the three forces if they were involved in the thefts. Choquette was also asked whether the raid was carried out by officers acting under Bill 51.

Neither the police nor Choquette replied to these requests, and APLQ held a press conference last Friday to denounce the police and to declare that Bill 51 was unconstitutional.

"I am convinced that this is one of the first applications of the infamous Bill 51, the law on organized crime and subversion brought in by justice minister Jerome Choquette," said lawyer Georges Lebel.

According to Lebel, there is only one plausible hypothesis to explain the theft: a police raid. The lawyer explained that in accordance with the Choquette law on organized crime, terrorism and subversion, the police have the right of seizure at all times and places without any warrant other than Bill 51 itself.

The bill, supposedly set up to deal with organized crime, was rushed through the Quebec National Assembly in July, just before the summer adjournment, and came into force July 8.

It contained a little publicized addition which may account for the raid on the Montreal groups. The first article of the bill states: "The (Quebec Police) Commission shall also make an inquiry into the activities of an organization or system, its ramifications and the persons involved to the extent prescribed by the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council whenever he has reasons to believe that in the fight against organized crime or terrorism and subversion, it is in the public interest to order such an inquiry be held."

The Varsity—David Lloyd

Article two allows the police commission to search and seize documents without a warrant. The term "warrant" is used in the law, although it merely means authorization from an administrative police body, not the courts, effectively giving the police authority to grant themselves warrants.

Even this formality can be dispensed with: "in case of urgency, when a warrant can not be obtained in due time, any person authorized to make an inquiry by the commission may exercise without warrant the powers provided" in the preceding two sections. These regulations provide the police with almost the same sweeping powers of the War Measures Act (WMA).

Bill 51 also created agents auxiliaries — an auxiliary police squad — to aid already existing police units.

However, bill 51, goes beyond the WMA because it is permanent. Hearings may be held in camera and testimony given in that case "shall be confidential subject to the discretion of the commission to use for its report the information so obtained, which, shall not, however, be connected with the witness so heard." Thus secret accusations are legitimized.

The right to defend oneself before the commission is not automatic but granted only at the commission's discretion. No one called before the commission has the right to refuse to answer questions.

The attack on "terrorists and subversives" under the guise of inquiring into organized crime is similar to events during the "October crisis" when the WMA was imposed supposedly to fight terrorism. It was also used to legitimize the arrests of more than 400 people and more than 2000 searches aimed not at terrorists, but at various progressive and democratic groups in Quebec. None of the arrested were subsequently charged.

Election due in only six weeks

Three college residences still not enumerated

By JULIA ELCOCK

With Toronto municipal elections little more than six weeks away, at least three colleges at U of T have still not been enumerated.

In Friday interviews the deans of residence at Trinity, University and

New Colleges said that as far as they knew there had been no municipal enumeration at their residences. Porters at the same residences had earlier indicated that no municipal enumerators had come to the buildings.

And at a fourth, Victoria College, only four persons out of more than 500 living in the buildings were enumerated. The enumerators had apparently been around before term started.

There is some confusion because of the October 30 federal election, for which enumeration was done at about the same time as the municipal elections. Also, this is the first time that students in residence have been eligible to vote, and the first time too that the voters lists have been made up by enumeration.

The Trinity, UC and New College deans did not know that their students were eligible to vote.

"None of us (at Trinity) have much enthusiasm," said Trinity's Dean of Men G. A. B. Watson, and the other deans seemed to share his opinion. New College Dean of Women Audrey Taylor said she had been "so keen on the federal list".

Asked if they were going to do anything about the sloppy enumeration, the majority of the deans replied that they didn't plan to do anything. "It's up to the students", said the new College dean of men, Larry Kurtz.

However Taylor and St. Hilda's dean of women M. H. Seaman both said they would try to get the students who wanted to vote enumerated.

SAC services commissioner Bill Steadman said that he was unaware that the residences had not been enumerated for the municipal elections. He said that he would ask the provincial government, which is responsible for the voters list, to re-enumerate the residences.

Canadian students in residence over 18 are eligible to vote in the municipal elections. They can still register by writing to the Toronto Assessment Office at 2221 Yonge St. giving their year of birth, religion, residential status (owner, permanent or temporary tenant), citizenship and sex. They can also go to the City Clerk's office at City Hall and swear out an affidavit containing the necessary information.

Abysmal lack of French-Canadian content in university courses charge Carleton professors

OTTAWA (CUP) — A survey of 24 Canadian universities (including two bilingual institutions) by Carleton University professors Robin Matthews, Donald Smith, and Sinclair Robinson reveals an appalling lack of French-Canadian content in English-language courses on French literature and culture.

The survey, entitled "French-Canadian Studies and their place in University French Department: A Critique and Model for Change in English Canada", was released last week.

The report criticizes the demeaning attitude most English-language university French departments take towards the teaching of French-Canadian language, culture and literature.

"In general, French departments seem to consider French-Canadian literature and civilization marginal, and French-Canadian language an unfortunate corruption of a pure tongue," the report says.

Like studies of English-Canadian language and literature, French-Canadian studies are not considered worthwhile. "An attitude of intellectual colonialism, both conscious and unconscious, has pervaded Canadian universities", the report says, thus discouraging all but the hardy from persevering to find and understand something of the Canadian (and French Canadian) identity.

The report also criticizes French departments for teaching 19th and 20th century literature mainly, as if Canada doesn't exist. "Such courses prepare students, by major omission, to believe that work done in Canada is not 'serious' work especially when French-Canadian literature is barely offered or limited."

Courses in language and linguistics are seriously limited both in number and scope, the report adds. In most cases, French departments are heavily oriented towards literature; where language courses do exist, the language taught is "international" and not Québécois French. Thus students are ill-prepared both on the linguistic and cultural level "for any real contact with their French-speaking neighbors."

French departments were also taken to task for limiting French-Canadian literature studies to honors and/or senior undergraduate students, "preventing many Canadian students from access to material of their own country."

The survey of courses — French and French-Canadian — did not include those offered by other departments because most students seldom have the freedom to take courses in other disciplines, and those courses are rarely given in French.

The highest percentage of offerings devoted to French-Canadian studies was 25 per cent, the lowest four per cent and the average was 14 per cent; the professors' model calls for 46 per cent.

The University of Alberta is lauded for its program in French-Canadian language and literature which is separate from French language and literature. This unique English-Canadian university program allows students to specialize in French-Canadian literature and language, although the program does not treat the studies as fully as it could, the report says. However, the report adds, it is by far the best solution yet seen in an English-Canadian university.

Only two universities of those surveyed "offer a significantly different pattern in French-Canadian studies in French departments." They are the University of Ottawa and the University of Saskatchewan, Regina campus. The Regina campus offers about one-third of its French department courses in French-Canadian materials, the highest proportion in any university outside Quebec.

The University of Ottawa, a bilingual institution, shows a good proportion in its "Français" section with 17 of 57 courses listed in the 1972-73 calendar involving French-Canadian studies. But the French section for English-speaking students has only three of 23 courses offered, thus reflecting "the deficiencies of French-Canadian studies prevalent in most English-Canadian universities."

The researchers' model of course offerings for English-English-language university French departments has three basic areas of concern. In each area, majoring students would take a minimum of courses; French-Canadian literary Studies then would be able to specialize in one of the areas, the report says.

The model language courses would try to develop the students' linguistic competence to the same level as their French-Canadian counterparts.

The model's French-Canadian literary studies have a maximum of thirteen courses. French literary studies a maximum of sixteen courses and studies in language and linguistics have a maximum of sixteen courses, not including the auxiliary or peripheral courses.

The report admits "the total number of courses offered in each area would depend upon the resources of individual universities, but a ratio close to the one presented here (46 per cent) should be retained in order to provide a full and open program of offerings that is fair to the integrity of each area."

"Working people of Quebec, begin today to take back what belongs to you; take yourselves what is yours. You alone know your factories, your machines, your hotels, your universities, your unions; do not wait for a miracle organization."
 — The FLQ Manifesto

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Daitons Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Two years later, Quebec dissidents still under government surveillance

Two years ago today, the Trudeau government invoked the War Measures Act — a first for peacetime — to supposedly deal with the FLQ crisis.

Introduced under the guise of restoring order and security to Canada, the act was used for its real purpose: the ruthless, wholesale, round-up, detention, and interrogation of dissidents within Quebec.

Proclaimed at 4 am to catch its prey unaware, the act abrogated all civil liberties in Canada. More than 400 people — separatists, municipal election candidates opposing Montreal Mayor Jean Drapeau's party, journalists, entertainers, labour leaders, students, and intellectuals — were imprisoned for extended periods of time and denied traditional rights of the accused: the right to counsel and to contact one's family.

Martial law dominated the province. Everywhere soldiers, RCMP, provincial, and municipal police prowled, able to search, inconvenience, and detain without recourse.

Freedom of speech and association, the foundations of democracy, no longer existed in Canada. The Varsity, for example was censored three times by its then printers when it tried to publish material pertaining to the police state measures in force in Quebec.

With time and the release of the FLQ's British diplomat hostage, James Cross, the War Measures Act was replaced by the less rigid yet powerful Temporary Measures Act. And eventually, despite the protests of Quebec premier Robert Bourassa and Drapeau, the latter act was allowed to expire.

Although many of the trappings of the police state may be gone and the political atmosphere may appear less volatile, Quebec is still under tight control by local and national federalists.

The Quebec government's new Bill 51 gives the provincial police arbitrary powers of search and seizure when investigating "organized crime".

And, the secret army files leaked to the Parti quebecois last month, prove that the federal government is keeping dissidents under surveillance.

Quebec has been turned into a police state because the government knows Quebecois are increasingly and justly dissatisfied with their status within a foreign nation.

Even vendu Pierre Trudeau, who used to insist vehemently that the Quebecois would never choose independence, is now talking about that possibility and what he would do.

Quebec is a separate nation with a culture and tradition of its own. It is the home of a people who, contrary to decades of Anglo-Canadian arrogance, need not and should not be forced to fit the Canadian mould.

Whereas Canada is primarily exploited by foreign influences, Quebec gets hit doubly hard, under the economic and political thumb of both the foreign giants and the managerial Anglo-Canadians who refuse to acknowledge the Quebec fact.

While the English prosper, the Quebecois live the less affluent life. Contrasting with the showplaces of the corrupt, vendu governments, are the slums in which thousands of Quebecois live in abject poverty.

In a land where Quebecois are the majority, an English minority refuses to learn the language and forces the majority to assimilate and adopt its language or be perpetually confined to subordinate futureless jobs.

And, when Quebecois complain about their plight, the federalists drag out the myth about all the benefits of federalism, benefits which the article on the opposite page proves to be non-existent.

NOW WE HAVE THE LIST OF SUSPECTS!

Sufficiently removed from the government-created hysteria of the FLQ-crisis, even the strongest supporters of the War Measures Act now concede that the action was all out of proportion, and criticize it.

But that does no good. It's all well and good and perfectly innocuous to recognize one's errors after the fact.

Instead, Canadians should focus their attention on the future. We must recognize the Quebecois' right to determine their own future — and not try or condone the government's attempts to coerce them into accepting federalism.

That's what Bill 51 and the use of government spies in Quebec are aimed at doing. And it's something we cannot allow to continue.

Quebec government report proves it

Quebec loses millions as part of Canada

By GERARD GODIN
QUEBEC-PRESSE

(MONTREAL) — Far from benefitting financially from its membership in Confederation, Quebec is losing millions of dollars yearly, according to a pamphlet released by the separatist Parti quebecois recently.

Titled "The Cost of Federalism, the booklet is intended to embarrass the Trudeau government just before this month's federal election. The federal Liberals distributed a cost analysis pamphlet claiming Quebec gains by being part of Canada, prior to the 1970 Quebec provincial election when some surveys suggested that the PQ might sweep the polls.

The key document quoted in the PQ publication is the March, 1970 Morin report, prepared for the Quebec Department of Intergovernmental Affairs at the request of the Union nationale government.

The Morin report, named after its author Claude Morin (a deputy minister for eight years who recently defected from the ranks of the Quebec Liberals to join the Parti quebecois) has calculated what Quebec pays to the federal government in taxes and the amount which it receives in benefits.

Although the report was completed before the provincial election, the government did not release it. It was leaked to a Montreal daily, La Presse, in October, 1970.

The conclusions of the Morin report are clear: Quebec is losing $11 million per year, and if the worst comes to the worst, it loses $200 million per year while it remains in Confederation. The difference between the two figures originates in the utilization of two methods of rather complex calculations.

If one calculates what Quebec derives from Confederation with the method of the benefits received, that is to say, in calculating money, goods, and services which Quebecois receives, without taking into account where these goods were produced and where the services were rendered, one arrives at a figure of $11 million deficit per year.

The deficit is evidently due to the taxes and imposts paid by Quebecois to the federal government.

The other method deals with the flow of money. It consists of evaluating sums of money actually spent in Quebec, without taking into account where the beneficiaries live.

For example, this calculation includes the total amount spent by the federal government in Quebec for the purchase of military equipment, even if citizens of other provinces profit equally from the protection given by this material. According to this method, Quebec's deficit was around $200 million per year.

The PQ says these statistics were published with one objective in mind: to put an end to the great proclamations of the federal government such as those which state that it is Ottawa which supports Quebec.

and that if Quebec leaves Confederation it will lose everything, beginning with old-age pensions and family allowances.

allowances, Quebec will recover a revenue surplus of at least $11 million per year.

In reality, these pensions and allowances are paid from the taxes of Quebecois. After independence, paying the same pensions and

In addition to the Morin document, in which the data stops at the year 1968, the (PQ) pamphlet contains new statistics from 1968 to 1971.

Quebec profits by being in Canada, Pierre Trudeau claims. However, Rene Levesque's Parti quebecois proved otherwise.

SAC to present brief on discipline tonight

Disciplinary action taken against anyone by the University of Toronto could have been thrown out in court, if the provincial government had not granted a special one-year exemption from new legislation.

SAC university commissioner John Creelman said yesterday rulings could be "deemed illegal by any court in Canada", if not for the exemption.

Creelman's commission will present a brief to SAC tonight, that would try to legitimize the system with a combination of the provincial regulations and the three-year-old Campbell report on campus discipline.

If accepted, the brief will go to the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee which is reviewing discipline.

Following a major discipline crisis in September 1969, the long-awaited Campbell Report was released, recommending sweeping changes in disciplinary procedures. The most significant recommendations would have given students significant control over classroom and course procedures, and recognized the legitimacy of some "non-violent disruptive demonstrations".

Despite pressure from students and some faculty members the report was shelved. Most faculty members strongly opposed the inherent threat to their powers.

But the recent passage of the Statutory Power Procedures Act has put more pressure on the university for discipline reform. The Act governs disciplinary procedures in provincially chartered institutions and self-governing bodies. U of T received a one-year exemption from its terms.

The highest disciplinary body in the university now is the Caput, which consists of all deans and divisional heads. It includes no students and meets in secret.

The Caput and faculty councils can establish rules and enforce them. Both the Campbell report and the proposed SAC brief call this an injustice, and recommend separate tribunals to judge cases.

The new provincial act demands open hearings unless the tribunal decides otherwise. Judgments must be given in writing along with the reasons for decisions. Defendants are guaranteed the right to see evidence which would question their character must be present throughout the hearing.

Creelman says the act ensures that "natural justice is carried out" and incorporates guidelines established in the legislation, to ensure compliance with Ontario law.

Law aids professional scabs charges labour council president

Metro Labour Council president Donald R. Montgomery charged Friday that professional strikebreakers are given police protection while they break law.

He made the accusation during an appeal to the Metro Executive Committee to support proposed provincial legislation to ban strikebreaking.

The city of Kitchener, where Dare Cookies is currently struckbound, asked for support for its resolution against strikebreaking.

Professional strikebreakers, Montgomery asserted, work mostly for small firms in Metro's "industrial ghettos". He added they have "army-type recruiting programs" and use "wiretapping, Doberman pinschers and industrial espionage".

Montgomery also pointed out that seven large cities and most states in the United States have banned strikebreaking. Canada, Montgomery said, is one of the few industrial nations that has no such legislation.

Montgomery differentiated between scabs and strikebreakers.

The 500 Ontario Hydro employees who have continued to work through the current strike are scabs, according to Montgomery.

He named Canadian Driver Pool which provides services to struckbound companies still operating, as an example of professional strikebreakers. The average strike involving this company until July of this year lasted 50 days, he said almost three times as long as the average strike in Canada. Canadian Driver Pool is being used at Dare Cookies, whose workers have been on strike since May 27.

The executive committee responded to the Labour Council request by passing a motion to ask the Ontario Government to review the rights and obligations of unions during strikes, including how to define and deal with professional strikebreakers.

Day care is fundamental right says unionist

By ELAINE FARRAGER

Day care should not be considered charitable, but a fundamental right," said Sam Fox, manager of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, at a Saturday conference on industrial day care.

Delegates from unions comprised mostly of women attended the meeting sponsored by the Labour Council of Metropolitan Toronto.

According to the council, the only industrial day care in Ontario is provided at the Riverdale Hospital for the children of the staff. The conference was aimed at educating union members of the need for industrial day care and the necessity of putting it high on unions' lists of priorities in future negotiations with industry.

Panelist Iona Samis, vice-president of the Ontario Federation of Labour expressed puzzlement that nothing had yet been done about day care "although it has been begged for the last 15 to 20 years." She stressed that "now we must have action".

Mary Eady, head of the Women's Bureau to the Manitoba NDP government, described how that province has attempted to provide a variety of day care facilities. She disagreed with industrial day care being close to the factories where the mothers work.

"Day care should be where people live, not in ugly industrial areas. Children should not be compartmentalized and split up according to work place" she said.

She described an experiment with industrial day care in Winnipeg's garment industry which was begun in order to stop the high turnover of women workers. Eventually she said, the project was abandoned and its money donated to smaller nearby centres. She recommended that local unions initiate day care in the community.

Julia Shultz, representing the Metro Social Planning Council stressed the social implications of day care.

It would not be looked on as "glamorized baby-sitting" she said.

It must take into account the "changing dimensions of human development" and must provide stimulation which a child often lacks from a "home-bound mother".

Panelist Mel Bourne administrators five child health care centres in the U.S. for the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, a union which has an 80 per cent female membership.

The five centres are the first of their kind in the U.S. Bourne said that it took a long time for the centres to gain acceptance and licenses. "In the U.S., if something is union sponsored, then everyone thinks something is wrong with it" said Bourne.

One delegate complained that the children pictured in slides of one centre seemed "over-supervised" and that not enough attention seemed to be given towards encouraging a child's individual initiative. Many slides showed neatly dressed co-operative-looking children in rows or circles.

The centre's Board of trustees has no parent representation on it. It is made up of seven union members and seven company representatives. A delegate criticized this, but Sam Fox said the priority now is getting something set up, "then worry about content and participation."

Bourne spent most of his time discussing the huge financial barriers that had to be overcome before the centres could be set up. It costs, he said, approximately one million dollars per year to run the five centres, the largest of which cares for 300 children each day.

The money comes from two per cent of the gross payroll, negotiated by the union at the last contract talks. This means that some money that would have gone towards a pay increase was forfeited by every worker, regardless of whether he or she had children, to go towards the setting up of day care centres.

Fox said that workers must be convinced that this sacrifice is necessary and that this issue is worth a long hard struggle with the corporations. But "the resources of union or industry can only make a pin prick in the whole problem" he continued. The solution must come from all levels of government and society".

Gordon McLellan, Executive Director, Children's Services Division of the Ministry of Community and Social Services, told the conference that unions could expect nothing in the way of day care financing from the provincial government.

The province does not directly provide day care but merely subsidizes municipalities. In 1971, one third of day nurseries were receiving public funds. Subsidies are available to individual children but their parents must first be subject to a means test, in which the criteria for need are unclear and variable.

Fox called the means test "humiliating and degrading". He said George Brown College wanted to set up a day care centre for the children of garment industry workers, but the cost would be prohibitive for the parents—seven dollars per child per day. Thus the project collapsed "because", he said, "he would not subject the union workers to any kind of treatment as a means test."

At the end, Fox stressed that the conference was not concerned with "crystal-clear" solutions and strategies. "The first step though", he said, "is to influence our own people, the unionists".

But the public must also be educated since the problem can only be solved in conjunction with society as a whole. "There must be no make-shift solutions" he said. "The problem must be solved by working through and changing the law."

He concluded optimistically "There is nothing so powerful in history as an idea whose time has come."

What is big and hard on the outside, soft and warm on the inside, and can handle 5,000 students a day?

Answer: the John P. Robarts Library.

- overheard in men's washroom, Simcoe Hall

By LINDA McQUAIG
and TONY USHER

What does lie behind the forbidding exterior of the Robarts Library complex on St. George Street? On Thursday, a dozen SAC and student media representatives got a sneak preview of the new library's hidden delights, chaperoned by U of T vice-president Jack Sword and building project manager M. E. Malcolm.

After the Robarts complex opens (by next September), Malcolm predicts it will become the focal point for U of T campus activity, much as City Hall has brought new life into downtown Toronto and will become its "people place".

Within a few short months, the John P. Robarts palace of pleasure-cum-cathedral of knowledge will be complete and consecrated with two million books. You'll be able to climb those imposing stairways leading to massive glass doors at St. George and Harbord or St. George and Sussex (sorry, no entrance from Huron Street).

It's September 25, 1973, and you're on your way to borrow the first book that you can't find in the Sigmund Samuel undergraduate collection. Once through the doors and onto the second (entrance) floor, you'll see on your right what Malcolm calls "the prime space in the whole building", a public reading room for 200 to 300 which will be the only space in the building not requiring U of T identification or special permission to enter.

Unless you're heading for the public reading room, you'll have to check your coat. Those passe self-service hangers have been replaced by an attendant operated service for 4,000 coats. You may spend quite a bit of time here at 11:45 on winter evenings.

Also featured on this floor is a cafeteria for 200 featuring the finest pre-packaged foods that vending machines have to offer. The cafeteria was a compromise between the large demand for food service and the librarians' credo that food and books don't mix. The result may be few opportunities for intimate dining in a cafeteria which will require three shifts to handle library staff alone.

Looking out the windows on this and the fourth floor, you may notice balconies accessible through doors which will only be unlocked to allow maintenance staff to sweep off snow. These balconies, described by Malcolm as an "architectural feature", will remain inaccessible, according to the builders, to avoid such probable abuses as students discreetly throwing books to fellow conspirators waiting 40 feet below.

However, your book still awaits. Escalators are ready to whisk you through the air-conditioned comfort of the plush, colourfully carpeted, Hyatt House-like interior to the fourth and main floor. Here the catalogue room, intended as the building's hub, dominates. The fifth floor ends in a balcony surrounding it; thus the room is two storeys, high-ceilinged, impressive. "There are very few places you can find equalling this in quality," boasted Malcolm.

If you are an undergraduate, this will probably be as far as you can go. You'll proceed to the main desk with your request. The call slip will be sent up to the appropriate stack floor (nine through 13) and a page will find your book, place it in a plastic tray, and place the tray on a loading mechanism which will deposit it on a conveyor belt system which runs through the building.

The Varsity — Chris Howell

This vast room on the eighth floor was included at the request of the Ontario government. However, the government hasn't got around to deciding what it wants to do with it.

The sepulchral interior of the Rare Books library, 56 feet from floor to ceiling.

The designers anticipate five to seven minutes to deliver our hook to the main desk, barring breakdowns of the conveyor belt system which may stretch delivery time to five to seven hours. You'll be able to sit down and await your book in air-conditioned comfort, watching for your number to be flashed on an electronic panel above the desk.

If you are one of those fortunate enough to be admitted to the upper sanctum by a formula yet to be worked out by a governing Council sub-committee, the stack floors will provide a dour contrast to the public areas downstairs. The floors are low-ceilinged and jammed with shelving, with the bulk of the building's carrels around the perimeter.

Carrels are compact and efficient, while more comfortable than those in Sigmund Samuel, yet they have one drawback: monastic windows less than a foot wide. The rectangular design of the library was intended to provide the minimum perimeter length in proportion to the floor space. However, if you are cramped in a carrel with the feeling that you are peering through the slits in the wall of a medieval fortress, waiting for the Mongols to attack, you may begin to question the advantages of triangular design.

If you are part of the seething hordes of undergraduate philistines who will probably be forbidden from profaning the altar of the stacks, you will have the alternative (maybe) of studying on the first (basement) floor primarily designed for graduate students from other Ontario universities.

The John P. Robarts government (not to be confused with the John P. Robarts library) stipulated that the building was to provide sufficient space for 10 per cent of all graduates attending other universities. Thus, the first floor includes a circulation desk for these visitors and a reading room primarily intended for their use. This room will seat 600, making it the largest reading room on the U of T campus. But, its low ceilings avoid any feeling of spaciousness, substituting for it the claustrophobic atmosphere of a lunchroom in a 40-year-old factory.

The rare books collection, now housed in an office building east of Yonge Street, is one of the least known and least used parts of the library system. It may get more attention after it moves during the next few weeks, into the small building at the corner of St. George and Harbord.

The rare books building is at first sight the only feature of the library complex more attractive than it is pedestrian or boring. Five stories of shelves surround a long, narrow centre well; no sunlight nor bright lights can strike the books. The atmosphere is dim, hushed, reverent, sepulchral, and the architecture impressive without being overpowering.

You may wonder, then, what the Trojan Horse-shaped tower atop rare books, best seen from Hoskin Avenue, contributes to this building. The tower, apparently, contains nothing. It is, according to Malcolm, another "architectural feature". Why? "To provide balance against the larger Library Science building at the other end of the complex."

The Varsity pointed out that the complex is so vast, with so little setback from the street, that a complete vista is impossible except from Stop 33 atop the Sutton Place Hotel. "A building has to have balance. Every fine building in Toronto has balance," countered Malcolm.

Can a building so massive in scope, "apex to apex the length of a football field", as Malcolm is fond of repeating, a building so carefully oriented towards a hierarchy of users with the undergraduate majority at the bottom, still bring a sense of community to its users and the university?

Malcolm thinks so. Once it opens, "There'll be people streaming in and out of here with a good feeling," he says. We'll see.

Prof defends choice of anti-guerrilla expert

By DIANA WEST

The professor who arranged a lecture last October 5 by a British counter-insurgency expert defended his choice of the speaker last week.

Visiting professor of International Security Studies John Gellner said Sir Robert Thompson, who helped plan the strategy to suppress the Malayan revolt from 1948-60, "is worth hearing if for no other reason than to oppose."

For several years Thompson worked for the Nixon government as an advisor in South Vietnam and was an instrumental figure in the planning of a defensive strategy for Mekong River hamlets.

While American military authorities claim the plan has successfully prevented a wide spread takeover of the Mekong delta and the Saigon region, British experts have described Thompson's activities as an utter failure.

Thompson was heckled at the seminar by students who opposed his defence of the Vietnam war. He emphasized that there is a strategic need to contain communism and claimed that communist executions have far exceeded the toll from American bombing and massacres such as My Lai.

Gellner, who is responsible for a series of interdisciplinary graduate seminars on "Armed Force and National Security", said: "My standpoint is, whether anyone agrees with Sir Robert Thompson or not, let him speak, if only for the sake of being able to argue with him."

Thompson had been making a lecture tour of Canadian universities. His offer of a lecture at U of T was "gladly" accepted, said Gellner.

Although he is not in complete agreement with remarks made by Thompson, Gellner stated that "the essence of study at university is to look at the whole."

Gellner was appointed in September as a visiting professor at the International Studies Centre, succeeding Robert Cox, who last year organized seminars on the theme of trans-national society.

After serving with the Royal Canadian Air Force from 1940 to 1958, he has been a free-lance writer and lecturer, mainly on political and military subjects. He has lectured extensively at Military schools and gave a course on "War in the Modern World" at U of T in 1970.

A frequent contributor to the Globe and Mail, he urged in a recent article that Canada remain in NORAD and that Defence should be a major cabinet ministry.

Gellner plans, in further seminars, to present guest speakers with opposing viewpoints to that of Thompson.

The head of the Peace Academy in New York, General Rikhye, is one of the invited speakers. Rikhye was the military advisor to former United Nations secretary-general U Thant and headed the UN peace force in Sinai and Gaza in 1956 and 1957.

Gellner feels that Rikhye's views will be in complete opposition to those of Thompson. He also hopes that "not everyone will agree with Rikhye."

New subway route may include expressway

By LORNE SLOTNICK

The route chosen for the north-west subway route does not appear to be viable unless the Spadina Expressway can be revived.

Metro's decision on the route was made just a month ago, over a year after the expressway was vetoed by Premier William Davis. But many Metro politicians are still dreaming of the expressway, and so the choice of a good all-round subway route was subordinated to saving their pet project.

Metro Council's choice for the subway line is almost exactly the route originally planned for when the subway and expressway were to be a package project. Subway stations in the middle of the Cedarvale and Nordheimer ravines are included in it. None are planned at St. Clair or Eglinton Avenues. The choice of routes is sure to be appealed at the Ontario Municipal Board by at least three groups—the Cedarvale Ratepayers Association, the Borough of York, and the Confederation of Residents and Ratepayers Associations (CORRA).

When Davis stopped the Spadina Expressway, it was obvious that the subway route would have to be re-examined. A study was done by the Joint Technical Transportation Planning Committee (JTTPC), which consisted of experts from Metro, the province, and the TTC.

The JTTPC started with 18 routes, but quickly narrowed the choice down to five "technically acceptable" routes. These five included two routes which followed the expressway alignment closely, and three which stayed closer to Bathurst Street. All routes considered followed the Spadina "ditch" as far south as Eglinton Avenue.

Each route was evaluated according to 15 factors under three main groupings: environmental effects, cost, and construction and operating efficiency.

When the JTTPC study was completed and released this past January, one of the three routes near Bathurst Street came out on top. South of Eglinton, this route would run through Cedarvale Park, cross Bathurst south of St. Clair Avenue and go down to Bloor one block east of Bathurst. At Bloor, the subway would turn east and link up with the Yonge-University line at the St. George station.

This route was chosen over the other two Bathurst routes because it was judged to be least destructive, particularly to the ravines, and its cost was less ($169 million), because it would take less time to construct and disruption would be minimized.

The two routes which followed the expressway alignment closely were rejected because they would have been too destructive to the Cedarvale and Nordheimer ravines, would fail to stimulate "desirable redevelopment", and wouldn't mesh well with existing and future subway lines. These factors were judged more important than the savings in cost and construction time that the Spadina routes would permit.

The only fault the JTTPC saw with the route it selected was the necessary acquisition of 150 properties and demolition of 85 buildings.

However, the whole JTTPC study made several errors which prevented it from selecting the optimal route.

First, the study could have examined a route which wouldn't even more inefficiently than it does now.

Another major error made in the JTTPC study was its failure to evaluate expected ridership for each route.

In order to break even, financially the new subway line must run through an area where it will be used all day, not just during rush hours. But the joint committee completely ignored expected ridership.

The most important mistake made by the JTTPC was the assumption that every route had to follow the expressway path as far south as Eglinton. The only possible reason for requiring the subway to use this route is to save construction costs. However, this cost could be recouped by increased ridership if the subway was located near population and business densities.

route of the original 18 that the JTTPC considered. It was the same route that the JTTPC favoured, except that it would run directly under Bathurst south of Davenport. Although it would cause traffic disruption during construction, it would prevent the demolition of the 85 buildings.

Immediately, expressway supporters complained about the choice, because they knew a Bathurst route would bury the expressway forever. North York Controller Paul Godfrey pleaded to "keep our options open."

The recommendation then went to Metro Executive Committee, which passed it on without comment to Metro Council. By then, both the Toronto and York municipal councils had endorsed a Bathurst route.

According to most of the JTTPC's criteria. The politicians' intent was made clear when at the same meeting they voted to pave the Spadina Expressway down to Eglinton Avenue.

Ironically, there is real doubt from a technical standpoint as to whether the expressway could ever be built above the subway. According to Alderman Ying Hope, an engineer, it would be "difficult or impossible" because in the area south of St. Clair, the subway alone is planned to be built on a higher elevation than would a combined subway and expressway.

The subway could be built at a lower elevation, but not with the $154 million estimate d by the JTTPC for that route, says Hope. He says it is just "wishful thinking" on the part of expressway supporters to assume that the expressway can be added later.

The OMB hearings should provide a forum for all routes to be evaluated, not just the ones considered by the JTTPC. The hearings probably will not take place until early next year because of both the civic elections and the fact that William Palmer, will be taking over from retiring chairman J.A. Kennedy.

The Borough of York's case at the OMB will be based on their contention that a proper study was never done of a route directly up Bathurst Street to Lawrence. A hastily prepared TTC study used at Metro Council said that the Bathurst route was impractical, but only because it insisted that north of Lawrence, the subway should return to the expressway route.

The Cedarvale Ratepayers Association is "confident of victory" at the OMB, says acting president Ray Oster. They will challenge the subway route because of environmental damage.

Cedarvale also wats a full-time subway, not just a commuter line, which it feels the route through the ravines would be. Oster says the JTTPC and Metro politicians have an "obsession" with the ditch.

As well as CORRA and the Borough of York, Toronto City Council may also fight the proposed route at the OMB. Council's Public Works Committee last week recommended that the city should threaten to fight the alignment unless Metro agrees to reopen discussions.

The hassle over the subway route is far from over. Perhaps a sensible alternative may yet be chosen, instead of a route that is just an excuse to revive the Spadina Expressway.

Bathurst Street has been proposed as the site of a new subway route to link north Metro with downtown.

require the demolition of 85 buildings, namely a route directly under Bathurst St.

This route did not qualify as "technically acceptable", only because it would have disrupted traffic too much during construction.

Metro Transportation Committee eventually recommended the route directly under Bathurst Street, but this advice was later ignored by Metro Council.

The JTTPC also only considered routes that would run into the Yonge-University subway line at the St. George station. This link-up would mean forever abandoning the "Y" interchange at Bloor and St. George. Extension of the Bathurst subway to the lakefront (which will probably be needed when Metro Centre opens, would be made more difficult. As well, different levels of use would make the integrated Yonge-University-Bathurst line operate

If it were not for the Spadina Expressway dominating politicians' minds, the most logical route for a subway to the north west would be directly up either Bathurst or Dufferin Streets, as far as Wilson Avenue, or beyond.

But because of the expressway alignment and ditch, the JTTPC thought the subway had to be routed through ravines and up the ditch north of Eglinton, certainly no centres of population or business. While expressways should be built away from population centres to minimize disruption, rapid transit should be close to where people live and work to encourage use.

These mistakes suggest the need for another study, which will probably be urged by the groups appealing the route at the OMB.

When the Metro Transportation Committee considered the JTTPC study in August, it recommended the best

At the Metro Council meeting September 8, the TTC admitted it thought a Bathurst route would be best. But suburban politicians like Godfrey and fellow controller Irving Paisley made it clear that they weren't at all interested in the best route, but only the route that could revive the dead expressway.

And so, by an 18-8 vote, Metro Council picked almost the exact Spadina expressway route. Suburban politicians combined with the city's entire executive committee (including mayoralty candidates David Rotenberg and Tony O'Donohue) to vote for the route. Only five city aldermen and three York politicians voted against the Spadina route.

The reasons of those voting for the expressway alignment were not covered up very well. Amidst talk of minimal cost, construction time and disruption, the main reason shone through. The result was the choosing of a route that scored worst or second worst

Enrolment drops, UWO forced to budget

LONDON (CUP) — An unexpectedly low enrolment will force the University of Western Ontario to trim about $2.7 million from its operating budget this year.

Only 11,130 undergraduates will be registered on December 1, the official count day for government grant purposes, compared to a projected enrolment of about 12,000 undergrads when the university budget was prepared.

UWO president Carleton Williams was quick to assure there will be no faculty firings.

"It's not the faculty's fault if students don't show up," he said.

Faculty, who account for about 80 per cent of the university's $50.6 million operating budget, are all under contract for varying periods of time.

The number of graduate students is also down from official predictions.

Williams said a freeze placed on $1.25 million of the budget in July will have to be translated into cuts, and a further drop of $700,000 in expenditures is necessary. The original budget had already predicted a deficit of $734,000 and Williams said the university wanted to break even, producing the $2.7 million in necessary cuts.

"It's hard to think of any item that won't be scrutinized," Williams said. He hoped the university wouldn't have to dig into a $2.5 million reserve fund built up from past surpluses.

Areas affected most by the July freeze were the Council for University Theatres and Art, the Instructional Media Centre, libraries, Computing Centre, University Research Council, Physical Plant, Information Services and University Publications, the Alumni Department and the General Administration Account.

Vice-president finance A. K. Adlington said salary expenses would be reduced through attrition and non-appointments with no staff being hired to fill vacancies.

Construction plans are proceeding for plant expansions already in progress, Adlington said, although actual building may be impossible. An addition to the chemistry department has been shelved until the spring.

Adlington admitted the administration would have to improve its method of projecting enrolments.

He said governments will not be of any assistance.

"There has been so much comment in the press about overgrowth and the disenchantment with universities that the more fuss we make the better the politician likes it," he said.

Regina gets new V-P

REGINA (CUP) — To the surprise of no one, Dr. E. B. Tinker was named vice principal of the Regina Campus of the University of Saskatchewan last week.

The position became vacant when former vice principal Ray Harvey was appointed deputy minister of the newly created Saskatchewan Department of Continuing Education.

The committee which chose the new vice principal was comprised of two members each of the university board of governors, the university administration, the faculty and the student body.

Students demanded equal representation on the committee but were turned down on the grounds they already had "parity" with the three other groups.

Before the selection was made, the student council took a vote on boycotting the committee which was stacked against students. However the council decided to propose a candidate of its own and approached eleven people with this objective in mind. Only one student allowed his name to stand.

At one point principal John Archer told a meeting students did not really support this student and that two delegations had come to him to tell him so. He refused to release the names of these students.

Throughout the procedure the concensus among students was that Tinker would be chosen in spite of the students' opinions and this prediction became a reality last week.

Referendum: students richer?

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — Student polling clerks at York University received $1.75 an hour from the student council during the two day OFS referendum last week.

The council, Council of the York Student Federation, is already $30,000 in debt.

"I don't think I could have gotten the people working for me that I did if they hadn't been paid," said York returning officer Kevin Anstey.

University of Waterloo Student Federation president Terry Moore resigned Wednesday in part because of his council's inability to find enough student volunteers to look after polling stations in the Wednesday-Thursday referendum. Waterloo doesn't pay its poll workers.

Twenty York students worked over a 24 hour stint to run the polling stations around the campus.

Total cost of the referendum was $500 — almost double the cost of elections and referendum of other years. Anstey claimed spreading the referendum over two days caused part of the extra cost, but he admitted that salaries for the polling clerks had increased costs.

During the student presidential race last year, polling clerks were paid for the first time — 50 cents an hour. Charges of election irregularities were made, including stuffed ballot boxes and unattended polling stations.

It was a general desire to "tighten up" election procedures that made council decide to raise the pay for polling clerks, Anstey said.

He added that the traditionally low level of student participation in affairs at York made it "essential to pay students if the referendum was to be reasonably run".

Strangway chosen as geology head

Geology students will have the opportunity next year to study under the present chief of the U.S. National Aeronautics and Space Administration geophysics branch.

D.W. Strangway was actually appointed as chairman of the U of T geology department as of July 1, 1972. However, since he is on one year leave of absence in order to finish his work with NASA, he will not assume the position until 1973.

In an interview, Fawcett said that, as far as he knew, there were no sweeping program changes in the department for next year under Strangway's direction.

According to Fawcett, Strangway was chosen "in the normal manner" through the dean's search committee.

Strangway received his BA from the U of T in 1956, his MA in 1958 and his PhD in 1960. He then worked at the university of Colorado as an assistant geology professor. In 1968, he was appointed associate professor of physics at the U of T.

North Viet Catholics say U.S. is main enemy

By LINDA HALL

A delegation of Catholic priests and laymen from North Vietnam pleaded for support last Wednesday to protest the Vietnam war which they called "very brutal and cruel".

The delegation which participated in a forum at Hart House, had recently attended the Second International Assembly of Christianity held in Quebec City over Thanksgiving. Father Nguyen The Vinh said the conference had "supported the struggle of the people of Indochina", condemning the Vietnam war as against the interests of "peace, justice and mankind".

One member of the delegation, Father Dinh Van Thu, linked American involvement in Vietnam with the difficulties of the Catholic Church in North Vietnam.

"It is the American Government that tries to destroy our religion in North Vietnam, but not the Communists," he said.

He called the migration of Catholic bishops to South Vietnam, ordered by an archbishop after the Geneva agreement of 1954, a "forced evacuation" designed by the Americans to lead Catholic priests and laymen out of North Vietnam. The bombing of North Vietnam, which has destroyed more than 100 churches, is also a major factor in the difficulties of the Catholic Church, he said.

Father Harry Bury, an American who recently visited North Vietnam, supported the view that the Catholics and Communists are being "brought together" against the common enemy, the Americans. "In bombing of North Vietnam, Nixon has destroyed the religious differences" he said. "The real struggle is the struggle to survive."

In response to questions, both the Vietnamese and American panelists dismissed rumours that Kissinger's efforts at negotiation are about to result in an end to the war.

Masie Bui Thi Cam, a North Vietnamese lawyer, contrasted Nixon's claims of "desire for peace" with his saturation bombings "all over the country". Referring to Nixon's promises to end the war, she said, "We hope this will come to our country, but we do not believe in him."

Bury called the rumours a "smoke screen to overcome the efforts of the peace movement to bring the war before the American people".

Bury said he saw evidence of bombing dykes in North Vietnam. Bombs fell "close to and on dykes", he said, in areas where "there was nothing around but the dykes".

Dare sues unionists for damage

WATERLOO (CUP)—The most recent development in the 20-week-old Dare strike has been the filing of a 1.6 million dollar law suit by the company.

Being sued are the Ontario Federation of Labour, local 173 of the United Brewery Workers, and four labour officials. Those individuals named in the suit are the president and secretary-treasurer of the O.F.L. David Archer and Terry Meagher, Lou Daunter, international representative of the union, and Andy Diamond, plant chairman of local 173.

The Dare management filed the suit because they say the damages that occurred during the strike were willfully caused by striking union workers.

The company does not realize that physically violent acts can erupt when workers must confront low wages, an unjust legal system, an arrogant management, an unthinking city government and a gang of scabs.

In addition to the suit, the company is attempting to have a court injunction granted in order to halt the boycott of Dare goods. Union officials assert the court order is being sought because the boycott is becoming increasingly effective.

Just a reminder: when you get the munchies for cookies, buy a bag without the Dare label.

Vic ground staff handle security

Affiliated colleges don't want campus police

By MARK BOHNEN

U of T's three affiliated colleges do not allow U of T police on their campuses unless the colleges specifically request their services.

Security at Victoria College has been generally handled by the "maintenance and ground staff" said Victoria president J.E. Hodgetts in an interview

Wednesday. He added that these staff were "not security officers in the formal sense".

Hodgetts conceded that, in the event of a "general mass situation" he could be forced to seek outside security, though he strongly opposed "the presence of uniformed people on campus".

Metro police, he said, have been rarely employed and only in response to criminal acts committed on the college campus.

Hodgetts summarily dismissed as groundless a rumour that, at one point, before the taping of a television program featuring a prominent Ku Klux Klan member, he considered using the Victoria football team for security in the event of a possible flare-up.

The taping was cancelled in a joint decision of the show's producers and Victoria's president because of threats of violence.

Hodgetts said that he felt security needs at Victoria College were being well met. Should he ever seek the co-operation of U of T police, he said they would be glad to help.

Trinity College dean of residence G.A.B. Watson said that Trinity's security has been handled by himself and the manager of building services.

He said that, according to the college constitution, "outside assistance" could only be sought at the "tail end of proceedings" in the event that an extreme situation arises. He added that he considered that prospect unlikely.

Metro police are generally given authority on campus only in situations involving criminal acts such as serious vandalism, Watson said. He felt there is no lack of security, adding that the existence of the U of T police is always "in the back of our minds".

St. Michael's College president John Kelly, who two weeks ago admitted that SMC was in a financial crisis, said that his college handles security through a private hired agency.

Formerly, night watchmen were hired, but the practice was discontinued when it proved difficult to retain them. Neither Metro or U of T police are allowed on the SMC campus unless by invitation.

New candidate in Ward 6 favours library, day care open to public

By CLARK PARSONS

Arthur Downes an executive director of the St. Andrews-St. Patrick Conservative riding association and a director of the board of Doctors' Hospital, has declared his candidacy for alderman in Ward 6 in the municipal elections.

This is the second time Downes has run for alderman in the ward. In 1969, he received 624 votes to finish eighth out of ten candidates. June Marks, who is expected to run again, got 4738 votes, while 2810 voted for runner-up Horace Brown.

Dan Heap, who last year almost defeated Conservative Allan Grossman in the provincial election, and resident-group activist Rose Smith have already announced their intentions to contest the aldermanic seats.

Downes favours a university open to the surrounding community. He approves of a university-sponsored day care centre open to non-university mothers and feels the Robarts Library, as well as other university facilities, should be open to the public.

In an interview, Downes suggested that, if elected, he could provide students with a voice on council in matters of direct concern to them which they have not previously had. The university is located in Ward 6, and this will be the first municipal election in which students will have the opportunity to vote.

Downes, a black, has been working on lectures for Metro Police recently, at their request, in an attempt to improve relations and liaison between police and the community, especially the black community. He emphasized, however, that he is not running as "the black candidate".

In general Downes says he is opposed to "anti-people policies". He opposes the Spadina expressway as presently constituted, feeling it would adversely affect the Annex region, but thinks some sort of expressway will eventually be necessary. He is opposed to a referendum on the issue.

Blues get off to shaky start

Teamwork and effort give Rugby Blues win

By JOHN BARCLAY

Teamwork and effort led the University of Toronto Rugby Blues to a 25-12 win over a strong Queen's side on the back campus playing field Saturday afternoon.

Following two successive losses in league play to York and RMC, the Blues faced a team who had scored 54 points over Trent only a week earlier. Furthermore, Queen's Gaels were the unbeaten champions of the Ontario intercollegiate league last year.

The Blues got off to a shaky start as Queen's scored an unconverted try very early in the game from a scrum drive.

However, within minutes the Blues had the ball up to the Queen's five yard line. From the loose ruck, rookie prop Bob Algie picked the ball up and ran through several Queen's defenders for a try to tie the score at 4-4. The conversion was missed, but minutes later Rick Hodder kicked a successful penalty goal to put the Blues ahead 7-3. From that point on, the Blues never gave up their lead.

During the first half, Queen's had supremacy in most of the scrum play. The team's big, strong, experienced pack won most of the lineouts and set scrums. However, their backs were unable to penetrate the Blues defense. When they kicked through, fullback Graeme Wynn seemed to be always in the right spot to break up the Queen's attack.

Before the half was over, Hodder added two more penalty goals to give the Blues a 13-4 lead at half time.

In the second half, the Blues scrum worked harder and played as a more cohesive unit. As a result they matched the Queen's scrum evenly in set and loose play. Midway through the second half, winger Rick Phillips caught the ball on the bounce near the sideline and ran 40 yards to score the Blues second try. Hodder converted and added two other penalty goals for a personal total of 17 points in the game.

Queen's scored twice in the second half, once by their winger, and then by their scrum.

Neither were converted, and Queen's finished the game for a 12-point total.

The Blues' win was due primarily to teamwork, but certain individuals played exceptionally well: Algie, Smith, and Sorbie in the forwards, and Hodder and Wynn in the backs.

The second game was markedly even. Defensive play on both sides was so strong that neither team was able to score a try. Queen's won the game 3-0 following a drop-kick from their standoff in the first half.

The Blues' seconds had been doing exceptionally well this year, having won most of their games to date with little trouble.

The Blues next play Trent in an away game on Saturday, October 21st. One week later they meet Queen's once again in a return match in Kingston. The rugby Blues now stand won 2 - lost 3 in their division, and in third place with 3 games remaining. In the Western Section this weekend Western defeated Guelph 12-9 (the only other reported game as of last night).

Track team places well in Western Invitational

Cross-country team wins York Invitational

U of T's "A" cross country team placed first out of six competing Ontario universities at the York Invitational on Saturday. The "B" team was second in a field of four "B" teams. Both Western and Waterloo only entered one team each. The Toronto "A" team was first with a score of 44.

Of the 66 contestants from the six universities, Toronto captured four of the top 10 positions.

Peter Pimm was second in a time of 31:34, Joe Sax, third, in 31:59, Bob Knucky, fourth, in 32:08, and Brad Morley, sixth, in 32:13. (All were members of the "A" team.)

Chris Beardsley, also of the U of T "A" team finished 29th in a time of 35:05.

John Cartwright came 33rd in 35:15, Doug Garfield was 42nd in 36:09, while Dave Smith placed 52nd in 37:22. Mark Podell was 54th in 37:34, and Al Van Geyn was 63rd in 41:46. All were members of Toronto's "B" team.

York's Ken Hamilton finished first in a time of 31:15.6.

Within the other contending "A" teams in the six school meet, Waterloo was second (55), Guelph third (58), Queen's fourth (100), York fifth (125), and RMC sixth (185).

Of the "B" teams, Guelph was on top with 214, Toronto followed was next (227), followed by Queen's (245), and RMC (256).

The only other cross-country invitational will be held at Western on October 28, followed by the OUAA championships at Guelph the following Saturday.

At the fourth Annual Track and Field Invitational held at Western on Friday, U of T also made a good showing; however, the meet was not scored.

At Western, Toronto placed within the top three positions on 15 of 19 events. U of T placed first in five events, second in five, and third in eight.

In the sprints Bob DeGroot finished third in the 100 yard event with a time of 10.3, while in the 220 yard Dave Howes also came in third in 23.8. Dace Colbert was first in the 440 with a time of 50.5.

In the middle distance runs, Gerry Feecey also placed first in the 650 yard (not 660 yards) run in 1:18.8, while Frank Aguanno was third in the 880 in 1:57.2. John Sharpe finished second in the mile in 4:22.7, while Brad Morley and Luther Holton ended first and third respectively in the three mile distance (14:52.1 and 15:42.0).

In the high hurdles, Toronto's Avo Alho finished third in the 120 yard event in a time of 16.1, and second in the 44-440 in 59.5.

Toronto placed third in the 4 x 110 yard relay in 43.76 (Spitz 11.6, Johnson 11.3, Howes 10.0, DeGroot 10.8) and second in the 4 x 440 in 3:22.48 (Johnson 52.4, Aguanno 50.6, Colbert 49.9, Feecey 49.3).

In the jumps, Dave Barrett finished first in the pole vault event with 13'6", and Dave Rudichuk tied Western's Scott White for the third position with 13'0". Mike Boyle came in second in the high jump (6'0"), while Hung Der placed third in the long jump (20'6.25"). Toronto also captured the first two positions in the triple jump. Dave Walt came first (46'11.25") with Keith McKenzie second (43'5.5").

As might be expected from U of T's record up to this point in the season, no Toronto team member placed within the top three positions in the throwing events (shot put, discus, javelin).

Other universities which participated in the York Invitational included Queen's, Brock, Windsor, Laurentian, Waterloo, Western, York, McMaster, and RMC. Toronto placed well and the team should be a strong contender in the OUAA Track and Field Championship meet this Saturday in Windsor. Windsor won the championship in 1971.

Track Marks — Western might not be a true indication of the strength of the Toronto team. Many members stayed home because classes and to prepare for the big meet next weekend.... John Sharp (the Ontario junior champion in cross-country in 1972) and Paul Glynn did not participate in the York invitational on Saturday. Coach Andy Higgins feels both look good for the OUAA Championship meet.

sportalk

In water polo at U of T on Saturday, Toronto defeated York 12-9 but lost to Queen's 9-8. The other two tournament games saw York over Ottawa (a new team in the league this year) 10-7, while Ottawa was also defeated by Queen's 18-1. In the Queen's Toronto match the Queen's coach decided to jump into the pool in the middle of the game. He then appeared to climb onto the back of Blues' Chris McNaught apparently attempting to defend his team's goalie, whom McNaught had apparently hit in the face. What the coach neglected to see was that the Kingston goalie had already kicked McNaught. The Blues' game became more defensive after the incident, and Queen's managed to win by scoring within the last 16 seconds of play. Blues' Vitold Gesing played well in goal.....In the OUAA Tennis Championships at Western this weekend the Toronto team defeated Western to win the Canadian Lawn Tennis Association Cup for the second consecutive year. The team members were Keith Porter, Steve Segal, Murray Flock, Bob Bergman, and Ross Saldon. In the individual doubles, U of T's Segal and Porter teamed up to defeat Western, 6-7,6-3 and 6-4. The second doubles team, consisting of Flock and Saldon won 7-5 and 6-4.

In the singles, Segal won against Western's Doug Tough 7-6, and 7-5, Porter downed John Turner 6-4 and 6-4, Flock defeated Western's number three man in three sets, and Bergman overcame Graham Senst 6-4, and 6-4. In the singles, Western's Tough defeated York's Tony Pospicil 6-3,6-3, and 6-2 to win the individual championship of the OUAA.....The U of T Rowing Club is not competing this year due to a scarcity of participants.

Although the team was able to recruit four or five members, the loss of Coach Burgen who passed away unexpectedly seemed to complete the boatmen's demise.

It is unbelievable that in the largest university in Ontario, no one was willing to participate on the rowing team..... Canadian University Press, London, reports the following: "Do-gooders joined the jocks last Thursday at the start of a 1500-mile hitch-hiking bonanza to raise money for the much-maligned United Appeal. And for good measure Colin Brown, the organizer of a campaign against drug-pushers has jumped into the act. The students are members of the UWO Mustang Marching Band and have been sponsored by fellow students on a per-mile basis. Brown, organizer of London's Turn in A Pusher campaign has offered to pay return fare by train for the band. TIP was endorsed by UWO student council president Robert Stikeman but angry protest from students forced the embarrassed Stikeman to withdraw his support. The RCMP Maritime branch, the Ontario and Quebec Provincial Police forces have reportedly offered their assistance in the hitch-hiking venture."

Hockey hits the table; kickback to NHL?

MONTREAL (CUP) — It could be the zaniest sporting event of the year. Even zanier than the time Alan Eagleson got floored by the KGB.

It's the first-ever Canadian table hockey tournament scheduled for Montreal October 29.

Table hockey is one of those rainy-day games most Canadian kids played in their grade school days. The game with metal player figures attached to steel rods which you move to move the players. Doubtless, some of the proceeds from their sales found their way into the pockets of several NHL owners, as a pay-off for allowing game manufacturers to paint their players in actual team uniforms.

At any rate, about 60 people over the age of 18 are expected for this gala event. Last year, during the "World Championship" table hockey tournament in New York, a CBC camera crew turned up and flashes of the tourney were shown on prime time Canadian TV. Who knows, now that the Molson family no longer controls the Canadiens, it may look elsewhere for its sporting interests.

The Montreal tournament is being organized by the city's Miniature Hockey League (MHL), allegedly Canada's best group of table hockey players.

Most participants are expected to be college students and other young people. Organizers have received entries from McGill, Sir George Williams University, Carleton, Loyola and the University of Western Ontario along with enquiries from Victoria, BC.

The top eight contenders will not participate in first round competition. The remaining 52 will play five, five-minute games each, and from the standings the first 24 will join the top eight in playdowns. These 32 will be grouped into eight divisions and each play a round robin in the division.

Top divisional players will advance to the quarter finals. The quarter-finals and semi-finals will be two-game total point affairs, and the survivors will meet in a best-two-out-of-three five-minute periods.

Soccer Blues over Waterloo 2-0

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues earned a 2-0 victory over the Warriors Saturday in Waterloo.

The win was the first by a visiting team this season. To now the Warriors have defeated all comers on home ground, including league leading McMaster Marauders.

From the start the Blues took the initiative, determined not to allow the disadvantage of playing against a strong wind force them into a defensive posture. It became quickly noticeable that the Waterloo defence was shaky on its right side, so the Blues concentrated on supplying Giuseppe D'Antoni with many passes. On one set up by Phil Oldfield and Bob Cazzola, D'Antoni swept in on goal only to see the Warriors' goalkeeper make a competent save on a tricky shot.

In spite of the considerable initial pressure by the visitors, it was the Warriors who, at 15 minutes, had the clearest opportunity to take the lead.

Harassed by the attentions of the Waterloo left winger, Tim Burns hit a weak back pass to goalkeeper Jack Brand. The winger darted in for an interception and shot low and hard for the left side of the net. However, alert to the danger, Cazzola was in position to deflect the ball away for a corner.

The Blues' reply was immediate and almost decisive. The ball was skillfully moved out of defence by Burns and Bruno Bruni to Ron Misurka on the right wing. Misurka waited on the ball while Herb Duhsky made his forward run, and then released the ball to the overlapping defenceman. Duhsky's subsequent centre found Mario DaRosa, whose powerful drive was aerobically saved by the Waterloo goalkeeper at the expense of a corner.

This play was indicative of the trend of the game; the Blues dominated the exchanges by virtue of their superior midfield skill, but were unable to force the goal they needed.

When the Waterloo player-coach, Hans Weisner, made a weak back pass, the Warriors' goalkeeper made a diving save at Peter Hillier's feet. However, if the ball did elude the goalkeeper, as on one goalmouth scramble, a defender almost miraculously appeared to clear the ball from the goal-line. It was that sort of game, and the scoreless first half was a poor reflection of the comparative abilities of the teams. Perhaps the Blues were not pursuing "lost" goals with the aggression necessary to unsettle a packed defence.

As the second half commenced, Duhsky and Oldfield continued to win the ball in midfield and set up an almost constant barrage on the Waterloo net. Da Rosa, suffering a thigh injury, was replaced by Ian Harris after ten minutes.

Almost immediately Hillier hit a swerving 25 yard shot which was not cleanly held by the goalkeeper. Harris took the rebound and with his first kick of the game, forced a rising shot past the helpless goalkeeper to finally give Toronto a 1-0 lead.

The goal acted as a tonic to the Blues, encouraging them to press more fiercely. Now the ball was also being smoothly passed down the right flank as Ed Carter and Bruni were making space and taking time to direct the ball to Jim Varelas. On the other side of the field Hillier and D'Antoni were causing defensive consternation by their intelligent switching of positions.

On one such occasion, when an errant pass was collected by the Warriors' centre back, Weisner, it was D'Antoni who appeared at centre field. Pressuring Weisner into an indiscrete hack pass, D'Antoni was quick to intercept and score Blues' second goal into an open net.

The goal had resulted from the constant overall pressure on a jittery defence and, more importantly, a refusal to accept a defensive interception as the end of a fruitful play.

Blues' goalkeeper, Brand, was a virtual spectator, handling the ball only when Burns became concerned for his survival in the chilly wind.

By now the Toronto team were completely dominant, and a catalogue of the attempts at the Waterloo net would be unnecessarily repetitive.

While the Blues have not been a high scoring team (although they should be capable of scoring more often than they do) their record of only two goals conceded in six games indicates why they are the only unbeaten squad in league play this season.

Coach Boh Nicol was pleased with the team effort displayed in the win. He considers the fine defensive record to be, truly a team effort, instead of a credit to the defence alone. The apparent difficulty found in scoring a large number of goals (which has not yet been necessary) is similarly a reflection of the play of the whole team, rather than just the forward line. The 15-2 goals for and against record would indicate an excellent balance between offence and defence.

Blue Chips—Herb Duhsky must have covered every inch of the field.... McMaster beat Western 7-0 last week.... Phil Oldfield played with distinction in his first starting assignment.... next game is Wednesday at Brock.... Tim Burns has given the Blues defensive stability with his play in the middle.... CIAU National Championships have been rescheduled for November 11 at York University. The OUA playoff between the top team in the Eastern and Western Sections takes place on November 8.... In the only other reported game this weekend it was Queen's 4, Carleton 1.

Blues down Carleton 15-9; tied for second

By STAN CAPPE

Varsity Blues' 15-9 homecoming victory over the Carleton Ravens here on Saturday must have left spectators wondering.

How could the Blues — showing as little offensive power as they did — win? By the same token how could the Ravens, who showed such a good offence, come up with only nine points?

The answer to these questions is that the Blues won the contest on the strength of their defence. Technically, two touchdown bombs by quarterback Wayne Dunkley to Brent Elsey and Cor Doret provided the winning margin. However, the game was won not by how much the Blues did but rather by how much they stopped the Ravens.

Ottawa got into scoring position no less than eleven times during the game. On eight of these attempts they were forced to walk away empty-handed, due to the fact that the Blues tightened up on defence when the Ravens penetrated within the Toronto 20 yard line.

Once Carleton came within scoring range Blues' defenders showed an uncanny ability to come up with the right play at the right time. In the first quarter the Varsity front four twice sacked Ravens' quarterback Dave Montgano to put down scoring threats deep in their own territory.

In the second quarter the Blues forced Raven back Joe Colvey to fumble just short of a touchdown. Next, defensive back Bob Billingham snuffed out another Carleton drive with an interception in the end zone. The team only allowed the Ravens a single point in the first thirty minutes.

The Varsity—Andrew Sikulis

Blues' Doug Bell intercepts a pass intended for Ravens' Harber (22).

Carleton marched down the field six more times in the second half but the team was only able to get on the scoreboard twice. Early in the fourth quarter, a seven yard plunge by Rob Harber culminated a 70 yard drive, to score the Ravens' only touchdown.

Following the touchdown they maintained the momentum and charged down again, having to settle for a single point.

Minutes later the Carleton team found itself on Toronto's 7-yard line. Once again the Blues' defensive unit held out, with Bob Blexham providing the key play, breaking up a third down touchdown pass attempt.

Perhaps the biggest defensive play was supplied by a member of the offense. Forced to punt deep in his own territory, Varsity kicker, Mike Sokovnin lofted the ball for 65 yards against the wind and put the Ravens out of striking distance for the remainder of the game. From that point on the steam was taken right out of the Ravens' attack.

Varsity's offence did all that it had to in the light of their defensive counterparts' accomplishments. They scored two touchdowns, both off the shotgun formation. The first strike from Dunkley to Elsey was a 23 yarder that completed what passed for Toronto's only sustained drive.

The second major was an out and out home run play — a 65 yard pass and run from Dunkley to Doret on the first play from scrimmage in the second half.

Those were the only noteworthy offensive accomplishments. For the most part, the aerial game was unimpressive and not very effective. Dunkley had a lot of trouble finding his receivers, and the receivers displayed some problems in holding on to the ball. Meanwhile, the running game was used sparingly.

Although the regular performers for the Blues' had trouble in getting on track, the offensive line did their best to make up for it. They gave their quarterback a lot of time to get his passes away and only allowed him to be sacked twice.

The Blues' win forced a three way tie atop the Eastern section of the OUA. Queen's, and Ottawa as well as Toronto each share 3-2 records after the weekend. The Gaels edged out Ottawa on Friday night 18-17 to force the tie. This means the playoff spots will not be settled until next week's season finale when Varsity travels to Kingston and Ottawa meets Carleton.

In the Western section this weekend it was McMaster over York 22-13, Lutheran downed Guelph 35-4, and Waterloo was defeated by Windsor 22-5.

Members of the Service Employees International Union local 204 — the men and women responsible for maintenance work on all campuses — are deadlocked in their negotiations with the university. If the impasse is not resolved by Friday, they'll vote Saturday to decide whether to go on strike.

SAC rejects immediate action for a fees strike

By LINDA HALL

The results of last week's fees referendum can be interpreted as support for a fees strike if Ontario Federation of Students negotiations with the provincial government to increased student financing are unsuccessful, SAC concurred Monday night.

Although 5140 students voted to withhold the second instalment of their fees and 1600 voted no, UC SAC rep Bob Anderson pointed out that the number voting "yes" were in the minority if those who had paid their fees in one instalment were added to those voting "no". The vote indicated that 3958 students had already paid their full tuition fees.

Vice-president John Helliwell replied that "the people who already paid their fees indicated "non-eligibility rather than opposition" to the possible January fees boycott.

Fewer than five representatives opposed the motion interpreting the referendum results as support for a strike, if negotiations are unsuccessful.

SAC rejected a motion calling for immediate action in organizing a fees strike. The plan, proposed by observer Peter Havers of the Canadian Liberation Movement, would have set up a trust fund in which second instalments could be retained by SAC in case negotiations with the government fail. The Graduate Students Union is suggesting a similar action for its members.

SAC's position at the general meeting of the Ontario Federation of Students this weekend will be that OFS should meet again in late November, to decide whether or not negotiations with the government have been successful. No action on a fees boycott should be taken until then, it will recommend.

University Commissioner John Creelman supported the recommendation because the referendum asked students if they would withhold fees "if OFS negotiations with the government of Ontario are unsuccessful".

"It would be betraying the intention of the referendum if we were to act as if the negotiations have already broken down," Creelman said.

SAC also approved in principle an amendment to the constitution which would allow SAC to grant money to groups "within the university community where such funding is for a project of university-wide benefit". This is a reversal of a principle adopted at last year's constitutional conference which eliminated grants to all groups outside SAC. That conference decided that SAC can only allocate money to activities or speakers if it undertakes to sponsor the event through one of its commissions.

In an interview, vice-president John Helliwell explained the reversal as the result of a realization that the "no grant" position was too restrictive. He said that approach had been adopted last year to alleviate the problem of repeated requests for money from outside groups.

However, he felt that was an "abdication of responsibility" and that SAC should be prepared to establish priorities for giving grants and refuse groups on that basis, "not because it is unconstitutional".

A brief on discipline prepared for submission to the Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council was referred back to the University Commission for reworking.

St. Michael's College rep Michael Steinberg expressed dissatisfaction with the brief's treatment of demonstrations. The commission's recommendation on demonstrations does not require that the university negotiate with demonstrators and notify them before calling police in to deal with them.

This requirement was recommended by the four year old Campbell Report, on which the Internal Affairs Committee is proceeding to formulate its own proposals.

"There are no guarantees of the rights of the people involved," Steinberg said. University commissioner John Creelman, whose commission had prepared the brief, said that he had received complaints about its recommendations on "where the individual is to be tried".

He said the brief was designed to "avoid jurisdictional hassles" by advocating that an individual be tried by the division in which the offense is committed. Objections were raised to the possibility that a tribunal in arts and science might try an engineer who had committed an offense in an arts class, and could recommend his expulsion from the Faculty of Engineering.

Creelman said the solution would be satisfactory "if each jurisdiction had enough faith in the other jurisdiction".

However, the council decided to ask the university commission to reformulate the brief in time for it to be considered again at SAC's budget meeting next week.

SAC also supported "in principle" a proposal to bring black militant Bobby Seale on campus to speak on the Vietnam war and black liberation.

Negotiations deadlocked, union to take strike vote

Seven hundred and seventy U of T maintenance workers will take a strike vote Saturday if their contract negotiations with the university remain deadlocked.

The only issue in dispute is wages, but U of T manager of industrial relations John Parker said yesterday the two sides were "quite far apart."

Under the old contract which expired June 30, the minimum hourly wage was $2.45 for women and $3.09 for men. Negotiators have already agreed that rates will be equal for women and men in the new contract, Parker said.

The union, Local 204 of the Service Employees International Union, is holding fast to its demand of $3.50 per hour basic wage for cleaners, business agent Don Barclay said yesterday.

"The workers are saying 'we're going to go'" this time Barclay said. The union's bargaining committee is "100 per cent solid" behind their position.

The strike would be a first for the union, which has not walked out on U of T in the 20 years it has represented workers.

Negotiations have dragged on since the contract ran out on June 30.

The most recent negotiating session went until 4 am last Friday morning without making significant progress. The university's position shifted slightly at that time, Barclay said, but the union's bargaining committee held firm.

"We're not selling out for a nickel an hour," he added.

One last-ditch negotiating session is scheduled for Friday afternoon, but the strike vote will proceed if no settlement is reached.

"If I wasn't optimistic I wouldn't be involved in industrial relations," Parker said in an interview yesterday. "I would certainly hope there won't be a strike but I can't say for sure there won't be. We certainly haven't abandoned our hopes."

The workers cannot legally strike until 16 days after a conciliation officer reports "no settlement" to the provincial government, Parker said the officer now meeting with the two parties may report to the government after Friday's negotiating session, if he fails to produce a settlement.

Both labour and management spokesmen refused to reveal how far the university's latest offer was from the union's demands.

Retroactivity of wages and benefits covering the time since the contract ran out is another disputed area.

Three weeks ago, what appeared to be the most serious obstacle to a new contract was overcome when a settlement was reached on the issue of contracting union work out to commercial firms.

However, final ratification of even that part of the agreement depends on the favourability of the wage negotiations outcome.

Faculty position frozen

Low enrolment makes Ryerson trim budget

TORONTO (CUP) — An enrolment shortage of about 600 students will force Ryerson Polytechnical Institute to dismiss 50 teaching staff and an unknown number of administrative staff.

Ryerson president Donald Mordell announced Monday that because of the low enrolment, Ryerson would have to pare $1.25 million from its budget.

The institute's projected enrolment, on which budgetary calculations were made, based on a per-student provincial grant of about $1800, was 7800. However, only 7200 students registered, with the largest proportion of absentees from senior years.

Mordell announced 12 measures that must be effected immediately, in an effort to reduce this year's deficit. It is expected, however, that only further paring for next year will bring Ryerson back to a break-even position.

The budget cuts may mean that Ryerson is about to enter a continuous cycle of poorer education and lower enrolment.

All vacant faculty positions at present and in future will be frozen, as will salary increases. As well, Mordell urged strict limitations on sabbaticals to instructors entitled to them, and encouraged staff to find paying positions if they took sabbaticals so that Ryerson would not have to pay their salaries.

Ryerson workers will also suffer from the measures the president announced.

"It goes without saying," he stated, "that we expect to reduce staff in non-teaching areas."

"The present indications are that we will be unable to renew any short-term contracts for (teaching) staff," Mordell said, "and we will be extraordinarily reluctant to replace any people who may resign or retire."

Total non-renewal of contracts, he estimated, would affect 50 people.

Mordell said he was "perturbed" that Ryerson still seems to have a surplus of small classes.

He added that it is imperative that careful reviews in class sizes be made and the possibility of merging sections of classes be discussed. Limitations of options and electives in students' courses must also be considered for next year, he said.

Faculty Board of Governors member Blair Fergusson declared after an informal faculty meeting yesterday that the faculty would not cooperate in holding expenditures down unless the administration discloses the complete story of Ryerson financing to the faculty.

The financial situation of the institute has not been made public for over a year, he said. He added that although a budget has been requested this year, it has not been provided.

Fergusson also charged that the present financial difficulties of Ryerson could have been predicted and overcome.

Demographic figures, he said, clearly showed the baby boom was over and that accordingly decreased enrolment was in the offing. The $1.25 million deficit "was not that unpredictable," he said.

As well, he accused the Ryerson administration of not doing an adequate survey to estimate enrolment this year.

Consequently, the institute hired 38 teachers and at least an equal number of support staff, to handle the expected enrolment increase Fergusson claimed.

In a memo to the administration, Mordell said it was essential "that we do our best to pare expenses this year and even more urgently, prepare to operate more cheaply in the following years so that we can correct the imbalance that we presently have."

The extent of the belt-tightening is such that no new books will be purchased for the library and there will be a very tight limitation on the use of overtime by administrative staff. Other cuts will also be made in the administration budget.

In spite of library, faculty, course and support service cutbacks, Mordell claimed that "one thing for sure, students will not be sacrificed." He explained later that he meant academic quality would not be sacrificed.

The deficit "makes our work more exciting and stimulating," he added. He did not like the situation described as a "crisis".

The president said he thought the shortage was due to a feeling of upper-year students of being "turned off" schools. Fergusson agreed that perhaps "our product isn't so hot."

Ryerson is the second Toronto post-secondary institution in a week to announce budget cuts because of low enrolment.

York University was forced to reduce its operating expenditure by two million dollars because enrolment figures fell 1700 short of projections. This followed another two million dollar cut last spring.

The University of Western Ontario has also had an enrolment shortage, close to 900 students less than predicted. Some $2.7 million must be trimmed from its budget.

SAC withholds Scarborough council rebate

By DOUG HAMILTON

The SAC rebate to the Scarborough College Student Society will be withheld until a $6,000 debt to SAC is settled to SAC's satisfaction according to an executive decision ratified at Monday's SAC meeting.

University commissioner John Creelman and vice-president Ross Flowers (both, surprisingly, from Scarborough) moved at a September 1 executive meeting "to withhold all Scarborough College rebates except the grant to Radio Scarborough until the matter of the outstanding SCSS debts to SAC is settled to SAC's satisfaction"

However the withholding of the SCSS rebate will not undermine the solvency of the Scarborough College Students Society said SCSS president David Onley in an interview with The Varsity yesterday.

According to Onley, Scarborough receives a rebate of four dollars per student — a sum of over $ 8,000.

SCSS treasurer Paul Corby told The Varsity last night that the council "ran out of money during the summer" and the loan from SAC was used to "pay some summer bills", including one for a Gestetner photocopy machine.

He asserted that if the SCSS had not lost money staging a winter carnival these bills could have paid during the summer.

Asked why it was necessary to take such a drastic measure in withholding the rebate, Creelman replied that "the local council really wasn't dealing with financial problems — its debts — very quickly."

He added that the outstanding SAC loan was "one of a large number of debts that the council was facing."

Flowers suggested that it was "not in Scarborough's interest to let this debt continue."

He described the losses caused by the winter carnival as "a real tragedy" and charged it was due to "financial irresponsibility."

While Flowers attributed the blame for the loss to both SAC and the Scarborough student council, he asserted that SAC was negligent in the handling of the event.

"SAC said here's the money... and forgot about it (the carnival)," Flowers continued.

SAC may release the rebate funds to the SCSS as soon as negotiations to pay back the loan get underway, Creelman said.

Flowers said that negotiations have been stalled temporarily for two reasons. He said SAC has been involved with the referendum and the "finance commission has been preoccupied with collecting budgets from the various commissions."

Tells mob that he is coach of the country

I am the best, says PM to party faithful

By GREG McMASTER

Pierre Trudeau compared the Liberal Party to the winning Canadian hockey team, and said that no other party leader could do the job as coach that he could, Trudeau spoke at a Liberal rally staged last night at Maple Leaf Gardens to a crowd of 20,000.

"Be sure to return these if you're not going to use them," one lucky recipient of tickets was told by a Liberal canvasser. "We don't want any empty seats."

Barely ruffled by sidewalk demonstrators demanding jobs and a liberal response to Canada's economic involvement in the Vietnam war, faithful Liberals and curious young people mingled in the cavernous hall, to the entertainment of ethnic dancers and marching bands. Periodically, they were roused to screaming, sign-waving excitement by a Liberal master of ceremonies.

"My name is Jim Fleming (scream) and I'm the next Liberal M.P. for York West (scream)" began the introduction for Crowbar, whose exciting music brought the most hysteria the crowd could muster all night.

It was like a Rolling Stones concert with a different audience

After several speeches, Trudeau was introduced by Energy and Resources Minister Donald McDonald. Following a spectacular spotlight entrance, the prime minister drew laughter and applause with his hockey metaphor. The rest of his speech painted an optimistic, but vague picture of Canada's future under a Liberal government.

"We're not uncertain about our destiny, and we're not hesitant about pursuing our destiny." He referred to his latest election plan for Toronto mentioning the plan for the creation of a waterfront park.

The evening closed with a cheerleading speech by the elder statesman of the Liberal Party, former Prime Minister L. B. Pearson.

The Varsity—David Lloyd

Over 20,000 people flocked to hear Prime Minister Trudeau speak last night.

People turned away at mammoth Trudeau rally

By TOM WALKOM

About 700 people were left in the cold outside Maple Leaf Gardens last night although they held "tickets" to a Liberal Party rally featuring Pierre Trudeau, and the rock group Crowbar.

The "tickets," issued free by Liberal party organizers throughout Toronto, resembled regular hockey tickets. Each listed what appeared to be a reserved section number in the top left-hand corner.

Organizers took no chances that the Gardens would be empty, and chartered a fleet of buses to bring in the party faithful from all over the city.

One Toronto Transit Commission official estimated the number of buses chartered at 87.

Irate ticket-holders were turned back at all entrances of the Gardens by squads of Metro police backed up by auxiliary forces.

"There's no room left, and the show has begun," said one harried Liberal official as he shooed people out of the arena lobby.

But Trudeau was determined to bring the show outside—for at least a few minutes. Spiritly dressed in a brown leather coat with a red ermine he quipped to the freezing crowd: "Hello sports fans."

In what observers saw as the most controversial Liberal policy statement of the campaign, Trudeau said Maple Leaf Gardens is too small.

"That's the only thing wrong with Toronto," said the Liberal chieftain.

"What about Gay Liberation?" yelled someone from the crowd.

"I'm coming to that," chuckled the Prime Minister.

He didn't.

Trudeau also did not talk about the 7.1 per cent unemployment rate, which he has stated he finds "puzzling."

Instead the prime minister, who referred to himself inside the Gardens as "the coach", spoke about the election as a log game.

"We've had a couple of innings inside there tonight. But the big game is still to come."

"I hope you can all show up for the big game. It's on October 30."

Sporting allegories are a favorite this year among North American incumbent politicians. Richard Nixon, the American president, likes to be called "the quarterback."

After Trudeau's five-minute speech, one woman had a heart attack.

Canada complicit in Asian crisis

General Amin of Uganda has ordered 60,000 Asians expelled from Uganda. Those still left after November 7 will be rounded up and put in detention camps. They face almost certain death. Less than half of the Asians may receive permission to immigrate to Canada or other countries.

Amin has said he admires Hitler, and that "Hitler had the right solution". And just as thousands of Jews were turned away from Canada, the U.S., and other countries to be sent back to Nazi concentration camps, countries around the world are refusing the Ugandan Asians.

The Soviet Union and the African Arab nations have been quick to support Amin and his genocidal tactics. India, dependent on Soviet aid, has made woefully weak efforts on behalf of the Asians, many of whom are her citizens. The United Kingdom, torn apart with racial bigotry, has done little to help. Julian Nyerere, president of Tanzania, and one of the world's most famous anti-racists, signed a peace agreement with Amin and already it is rumored that plans are in effect to expel the Asian minority from Tanzania. The United States and China have been conspicuous in their silence.

Consider how many of your ancestors came to Canada during the Irish potato famine in the 1840's and during the huge world-wide depressions in the late nineteenth century; how many left the English midlands when the giant textiles mills closed down? How many were left homeless by the two World Wars and came to Canada?

Today, the government's immigration quota system (the point system) is being used to limit the number of Ugandan refugees to Canada to less than 5,000. The government selects the ones it finds most suitable and rejects the poor, the unskilled, and those it deems "undesirable". The government will allow only the rich, the educated, and the young to escape their homeland by November.

The rest are left to die. Even for those who are admitted the Prime Minister has announced in St. Catharines that:

"I hope the Asians will pick up jobs Canadians don't want. We bring Jamaicans in for our tobacco crops and we bring West Indians in to work in our houses as maids"

He then asked his audience, "Does anyone here want to be a maid in Ottawa?"

Herein lies the beliefs of a party that calls itself liberal. The Prime Minister expects to use the Ugandan refugees as a source of cheap labour as maids and tobacco pickers. This is racism identical to the philosophy of the southern USA a century ago. This is typical of the present administration's immigration policy and thousands may die in death camps in Uganda because of it. The other leaders have been almost as bad. David Lewis, who himself immigrated from Poland in the 1920's, has supported with his silence the insane belief that the Ugandan refugees will steal jobs from Canadians; while Bob Stanfield, confronted by members of SDS, said, "Canada is doing its fair share". Unless the government acts immediately to rescue all the Ugandan Asians, it will come to power over the bodies of thousands.

To stop Canada's complicity in this crisis, support the Students for a Democratic Society's demands that the government guarantee that all Asians are rescued by November 7; that Canada initiate world-wide action against Uganda and its allies by imposing a total boycott on all Ugandan goods; and that Pierre Trudeau publicly apologize to the Ugandan Asians for his racist remarks. You can do this by demonstrating against the government's immigration policy at 1.30 pm on Saturday, October 21 in front of the Immigration Department, 480 University Avenue, by writing to Stanfield, Lewis and Trudeau expressing your concern, and by asking the candidates in your riding their opinion about Canada's role in this emergency.

At the SDS forum on Uganda, Thursday, October 19th, at 8 pm at the International Student Centre (33 St. George), speakers will include one of the first of the Ugandan Asian to come to Canada in the present crisis, and a Tanzanian student.

OFS will keep opponents out

At each province wide conference of the OFS, motions have been raised to limit speaking rights to student council delegates. In the face of past failure, this motion was again issued, in secretive form such that it was presented to the SAC Monday night to be voted on, without adequate prior debate. This action denies the possibility of anybody from voicing opposing views to the OFS as a whole.

Therefore, we urge you, the delegates to take a clear and firm position against such exclusionism. This is necessary, not from the abstract realm of democratic rights, with which we are sure you all concur, but for maximum unity against the fee-hikes, and overall reduction of education standards that confront us. Such unity can only be based on involvement not exclusion.

Students can only gain by having the most thorough discussion of all questions affecting them and by the OFS considering all views. At no time has there been a problem of space or excessive debate. There seems to be only one reason for such motions — to censor certain views and silence those who do not on all occasions agree with the demands and tactics of the OFS leadership. Such attempts can only benefit the government, not the students of Ontario.

If Varsity readers are concerned enough on this issue to take action, we invite them to attend the OFS conference this weekend in Waterloo or better still write The Varsity.

Varsity guilty of own criticism

Oh brother! The Varsity accuses the Christian World Liberation Front of "boiling down a major religion into a few vague platitudes" and then turns around to boil down our alternative into a small vague paragraph! (Varsity, September 18)

We agree that most of the talk about revolution at U of T is rhetoric, and we thank the writer for recognizing the difference between Christendom and Biblical Christianity.

It is rather evident that either the author has never come to the booktable and talked to any of us or he is not being honest. We share a living Jesus Christ who really changes men who in turn change society.

It seems that our fellow vocal students have had disappointing experiences with some form of Christianity and are reacting from their own emotional hang-ups as opposed to honestly examining the claims of Christ. How many students are willing to follow what they discover to be truth no matter where it leads?

Anyone who thinks we do not have answers is invited to peruse the thousands of pages at the booktable, but... we suspect that the real hindrance keeping most from Jesus Christ is the same that caused the multitudes to cry out in Jesus' time, "We will not have this Man to reign over us."

The Christian World Liberation Front

APUS explains OFS fees vote

I quote Varsity (October 13): "The poll held by the Association for Part-time Students showed that extension students supported the OFS demands strongly, but either were not able or not willing to back them up."

The fact that we had a response to the referendum constituting some 25 per cent of our maximum eligible vote, would appear to indicate that part-time students are no happier, about fee increases than any other sector of this university.

Besides this extra uninvited financial burden, we were excluded from the federal government's $50 tax break earlier this year, and were never eligible for student loans, no matter what our financial situation.

Our unwillingness to act to back our protest stems from two possible circumstances:

- 1) That our fees must be paid in full before we ever set foot in a classroom of this university. If they are not paid, we are simply not U of T students, part-time or any time.
- 2) We are not part-time students out of some sense of perversity or because we like it, but because we have no choice. For example, for a part-time student slogging through a degree at a rate of two subjects a year (figure that one out), a lost year makes quite a difference. If one happens to be a single parent (as many of our students are), one more year of finding and paying babysitters, paying extra fees, and holding down a menial job, is obviously one more year best avoided.

Put simply, I think we have reason to protest, and I am proud of the number of part-time students who were aware and concerned enough to cast a vote.

Elections officer gives his thanks

On behalf of the Ontario Federation of Students and the Students' Administrative Council, I wish to thank the students whose interest and participation made last week's referendum so successful. Almost 12,000 U of T students voted in the referendum, by far the greatest turnout in any Toronto election.

I wish to express my personal thanks to the local returning officers and the many members of SAC and the local councils who worked so hard to make this referendum possible. Special gratitude is due to the students who volunteered their time to handle the thankless jobs of posting, serving as poll clerks and counting ballots.

VOTE TODAY

Twenty-five per cent of APUS students voted in last week's fees referendum, according to letter writer.

According to Rabbi Rosenberg

Industrialization creates capitalist mind

To be successful, a revolution needs to change not only the basic structure of society but also its super structure, stated Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg at a Hillel-sponsored seminar on Marxism and Judaism yesterday.

Rosenberg explained that "along with the physical attack" there must be "an intellectual attack to change the minds of the masses". Otherwise, there would be no real change, in what Marx termed this as a "bourgeois revolution."

Rosenberg went on to explain the effect of the industrial revolution on the Jewish community and the growth of Marxism.

Prior to the industrial revolution the economy of the Jewish community as well as the Catholic communities were "organized around land". Though there was no "class difference" Rosenberg continued, the Jewish layman was not equipped "to come to his own conclusion of the Torah," the Old Testament. He was expected, says Rosenberg, to rely on the interpretations of his rabbi.

Therefore, "the good Jews" was "the loyal Jew."

With the industrial revolution, says Rosenberg, there was a "change in the production centre from land to factory."

Industrialization brings about a "capitalistic mentality" explained Rosenberg, in which "the individual conscience" becomes more important than loyalty.

"The ideal state of capitalism is a one to one relationship, without social or political difference between individuals."

In such a society, the rabbi added, "everything has to have a use and function, including religion."

Thus, the liberal minded Jews evolved from the pressures of the industrial revolution and capitalism.

The liberal minded Jew felt "that the individual should do what is meaningful to him."

"This means," says Rosenberg, "that a liberal minded Jew will argue more with his rabbi than an orthodox Jew."

Legal aid program is more popular with community than students, says director

By DIANA WEST

The Student Legal Aid Society (SLAS) is used more by the community than by the student body, according to its director.

"It is becoming more apparent to us that the student body doesn't even know we exist," said director Ken Chomut in an interview Monday.

The free legal aid program, offered through the Faculty of Law is operated by about 60 volunteer law students.

"SLAS has been successful outside of the student body," says Chomut, "but students don't feel they need legal aid until they're up for something like stealing."

SLAS was set up three years ago to give legal advice and assistance to those in both the student body and the community who could not otherwise afford such a service. So far, however, students have not used this program as much as expected.

SLAS deals mainly with traffic violations and small claims cases, Chomut said, but has also dealt with landlord and tenant cases, welfare and unemployment in the Spadina area. Both the law faculty and the Ontario Legal Aid Plan refer cases to SLAS.

In the hope of involving more law students in the program, SLAS has widened its service by establishing eight clinics around Toronto.

Chomut explained that the operation of these clinics is basically "taking people off the streets who need help of advice."

The clinics deal with family case work, which involves juvenile offenders, separation, and at times, even divorce cases, as well as workmen's compensation.

Three of the SLAS clinics are located in the Addiction Research Foundation building at Eglinton and Yonge Streets, in Regent Park, and in the Neighbourhood Information Post on Gerrard Street. A complete list of clinics can be obtained from SLAS.

Students Legal Aid is prohibited by law from going into court with anything except a small claims case.

The agency's main duty, Chomut says, is to "act as an agent would," in trying to negotiate rather than prosecute cases.

With any case that is to go into court, however, SLAS opens a file on it. The file is then reviewed by a qualified lawyer to make sure SLAS has taken the right steps.

In the past, lawyers have offered to do this without payment, but, says Chomut, "this is not going to work out much longer." He said lawyers are unwilling to offer their services free indefinitely.

Ex-Panther faces deportation

By GREG McMASTER

For the third time in recent months, an American political refugee faces extradition from Canada.

Added to the cases of Karlton Armstrong, antiwar militant, and Humberto Pagan, Puerto Rican Independentista, is that of Edwin Hogan, a former Black Panther Party member.

Hogan and his lawyer, Charles Roach of Toronto, are scheduled to appear this morning at an Immigration Appeal Board hearing to contest a deportation order issued against him.

Hogan has been unable to continue his political activities since his arrest and conviction in September, 1969 in Cleveland, Ohio on a charge of "murder while perpetrating a robbery". This does not mean Hogan is considered to have committed a violent act, since Ohio considers a person guilty of murder if he is even remotely connected with a crime in which a death occurs.

Last summer Hogan was granted an unguarded leave from jail. He fled to Toronto, where he was arrested by the RCMP on July 27 of this year. Despite his honour status in prison in Ohio and his lack of resistance to arrest, he is being held under maximum security in Toronto, with constant surveillance by two guards.

Arrested as an illegal immigrant, because of his criminal record in the U.S.A. Hogan has been denied bail. According to the defense, he has been offered bail money, a job earning over $200 per week and a place to live if he is released.

The Immigration Department wants Hogan deported to the United States, but a defense committee of concerned individuals is preparing to put pressure on Minister of Immigration Bryce Mackasey, who could intercede in the case at his own discretion to have Hogan sent to any country willing to take him.

The committee is raising money to pay for legal expenses and for an anticipated mailing campaign to Mackasey, as well as other possible forms of agitation. This will have to wait until negotiations are completed with several countries, such as Tanzania, Cuba, Algeria, Uganda and Libya, which may consider accepting Hogan.

Denounced as CIA agent

Angry McGill Maoists shout down U.S. prof

MONTREAL (CUP) — Shouts of "Hitler had the right to speak" and "Go back to Moscow" and the expulsion of several students ended a demonstration against Professor Zbigniew Brzezinski at McGill University last Monday night.

The shouts came from vocal members of the audience opposed to the McGill Student Movement's (MSM) attempt to disrupt a speech by Brzezinski, a former U.S. State Department advisor, under Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, and now a director of the Columbia University Research Institute on Communist Affairs.

Brzezinski's books have gained him a reputation as an anti-communist and his institute on communist affairs has been connected with CIA funding since its inception.

The demonstration began when Bob Wallace, a MSM member, interrupted a speaker from the Polish Institute of Arts and Science who was introducing Brzezinski. Wallace stated that Brzezinski should not speak because he "is stained by the blood of the Vietnamese people".

Wallace then took the stage and denounced Brzezinski as a CIA agent.

Several "interested" persons from the audience then leaped to the stage and attempted to halt Wallace. As the crowd mingled around the front of the auditorium, with McGill security guards joining the slated speakers and two MSM members on the platform, members of the audience began to shout "get him out of here".

More MSM members then approached the stage carrying red flags. As the MSM members shouted "Death to imperialism", some of the audience chanted back "We want the speech". Brzezinski joined in chanting with the audience.

McGill principal Robert Bell informed Wallace at one point that he was being summarily suspended from McGill and would be arrested if he appeared on campus. He then took the microphone and commented "I regret this interruption which reminds us of the events of Nazi Germany in the 1930's."

Wallace was dragged to the floor and set upon by several security men and members of the audience who roughed him up and carried him out the back door of the auditorium.

Other MSM members were also hustled out that door with much pushing and shoving by the security men.

Several audience members tore up the red flags and dashed them to the ground.

Once all the students participating in the demonstration were cleared from the hall, Brzezinski, who during the disruption had calmly read a book entitled "Hopes and Fears of America: a chapter on Vietnam", began his speech.

Behind him, the plainclothesmen guarded the doors and surveyed the audience.

Russian born, ex-UN delegate named to head Trinity College

By BARBARA SHENSTONE: "Decisions in life are made alone", said George Ignatieff, the new provost of Trinity College on Monday at a press conference. He stressed the importance of acquiring some sort of critical "judgment", as well as knowledge, in a university education.

Ignatieff said that it is with this fundamental philosophy in mind that he is taking on the duties of provost of Trinity College. He will be officially installed tonight at Convocation Hall.

Ignatieff jokingly described the job of provost as "general manager" of the college.

As chief administrator, Ignatieff will have to deal with the important question of Trinity's independent status as an affiliated college. Because of the current financial crisis, keenly felt by Victoria and St.

Michael's colleges as well as Trinity there has been some fear that Trinity will have to forfeit its independence within the U of T, as well as its ties with the Anglican Church, in order to qualify for full provincial financial support.

In fact the ties with the Anglican Church are "tenuous", according to Norman Simpson, chairman of the executive committee of Corporation. Secularization is not really a cause for concern he said, with the new provost in agreement.

Ignatieff added that it is much more important at the moment to work out the role of the colleges as independent communities.

The purpose of the federated colleges, in regard to both the university and the provincial government must be determined.

On the issue of tenure, Ignatieff feels that there should be far more "lateral movement" of faculty members among departments, colleges and universities, particularly to avoid "stale" teaching. However some sort of job security is necessary, he continued, if a professor is to be "totally immersed" in his field.

Ignatieff, who graduated in political science from Trinity in 1936 is a Rhodes scholar. He will be the ninth provost in Trinity's century and a quarter history.

He is the first layman and the first non-Anglican to be appointed provost, although he is a member of the Russian Orthodox Church, which he says is similar to the Anglican Church.

Ignatieff was born in St. Petersburg, Russia and came to Canada as a small child just after the revolution. His father was Minister for Education under Alexander Kerensky's government in 1917.

The new provost joined the Department of External Affairs in 1940, and has served abroad in London, Washington and Yugoslavia. He later became Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs in Ottawa.

In 1966 he was appointed Canada's ambassador to the United Nations and was president twice of the UN Security Council.

Ignatieff has just returned to Canada from Geneva, where he was Canadian Ambassador to the Office of the UN and to the conference of the Committee on disarmament.

Labour struggle

By ANDREW PHILLIPS
adapted by The Chevron from The McGill Daily

There must be times when Quebec premier Robert Bourassa feels about ready to pack up a few shirts and his wife's jewelry and head down south for a permanent vacation in Nicaragua. Times like October, 1970. And times like last May. In fact, the "May revolt" of five months ago may well prove in the long run to be a more significant episode in developing Quebec struggle than even the more celebrated FLQ crisis.

The massive walkouts, demonstrations, and occupations which erupted all over the province in response to Bourassa's repression of the Common Front of government employees are the most important indicators so far that traditional nationalism is being replaced by class consciousness among those struggling for real change in Quebec today. The April and May actions directly involved hundreds of thousands of workers and placed the economic demands of the Common Front in a clearly political context, that of the government's subservience to the interests of foreign and domestic capital.

Since May, the focus of labour activity has shifted from intense external struggles to internal study and consolidation. While the negotiations drag on through several "final" deadlines, the unions have been engaged in thinking through the experience of the strikes and in coming to grips with some of their weaknesses.

For several reasons, these recent trends have been the most marked within the CNTU. It is the largest of the three Common Front centrals and has been in the forefront of union politicisation for the last several years. Its forty-fifth convention this June enabled it to begin resolving the problem of future political direction that it shares with the Quebec Federation of Labour and the Quebec Teachers' Corporation.

But, most importantly, contradictions within the CNTU itself came into the open during the May revolt with the detection of its right wing to form a new union federation, the Centrale des Syndicats Democratiques (CSD).

The formation of the CSD marked the culmination of a long ideological struggle within the CNTU bureaucracy. Ever since the federation's 1968 convention, at which Marcel Pepin announced the opening of a "second front" of political action, two distinct factions had become clear within the ranks of the union officials.

Those favouring increased political study and action were led by Pepin himself and others such as Michel Chartrand, while the traditional "bread-and-butter" men were represented by the "three D's" of the CNTU's five-man executive: Paul-Emile Dalpe, Jacques Dion, and Amedee Daigle.

These men led the detections that seriously weakened the CNTU's resistance to the government in April and May.

The internal dispute stayed below the surface until last fall, when the CNTU issued several study documents which presented radical analyses of the situation of workers in Quebec, documented the iron grip of American capital over our economy, and condemned the government for deterring those who own wealth against those who produce it.

As vigorous debate sprang up all over the province on the ideas presented in the studies, the three D's lost no time in attacking them.

Dion, who personally recruited Pepin into the labour movement in the early sixties, and Daigle, who headed the CNTU's first short-lived political action committee in 1955, dismissed the documents as "unrealistic" and expressed faith in "tried and true" remedies to the workers' problems.

It was left to Dalpe, who has apparently emerged as the group's principal spokesman, to forward a more comprehensive rebuttal to the Pepin group.

He claimed that the documents run counter to the CNTU's Declaration of Principles because they recommend a "preconceived socio-economic system", namely socialism. The federation's principles do in fact bar it from committing itself to such a system. Quoting John Kenneth Galbraith, the former CNTU vice-president maintained that since capital is now managed by "neutral" technocrats anyway, it doesn't really matter whether they are paid by private stockholders or by the government.

Then, as it to top off his legal and economic arguments with a bit of off-the-cuff philosophizing, Dalpe revealed his own solution to the workers' plight: "It must be possible (I don't know exactly how because it's basically a problem of moral conscience) that the capitalists as well as the workers come to realize the social meaning of their actions."

The three D's arguments were repeatedly rejected by the CNTU's various ruling bodies, although they received support from several of the industry-wide federations and from a few executive members of the Quebec Central Council. It was generally believed they were heading for defeat at the June convention until they opted for a pre-emptive strike during the April-May crisis.

Their first move was to torpedo resistance to Bill 19. As soon as the bill became law April 21, they vetoed Pepin's recommendation to defy the government and called a snap vote of the entire Common Front membership. With only a minority of strikers able to vote at such short notice, and faced with the implacable opposition of the three D's and their friends, the front leadership called for a return to work over the strenuous objections of shocked union militants.

The rebels then lay low until the government had locked up Pepin, their main rival. As the wildcat strikes escalated and the front leaders refused to appeal their sentences, the three D's started denouncing them in language that even Montreal's most conservative (Gazette) editorialists found it hard to match.

Accusing Pepin of "odiously misrepresenting" the workers, Dalpe declared that the CNTU president "preferred, to the detriment of negotiations, the easy oasis of prison".

After the three D's had led a meeting of over a thousand dissident union officials in calling for the formation of a new federation, they were suspended from their executive posts by the CNTU's Confederal Council.

At the CSD's founding convention June 8-10, the three D's denounced Pepin and his "clique of intellectual encherichists" for leading the workers astray into "dreams and illusions of the big time" instead of keeping to the straight and narrow of contract negotiation.

Dion, as treasurer, proposed a budget based on a projected membership of 45,000 by the end of the year, considerably less than the 80,000 the CSD had been claiming the week before.

The CSD received almost all its support from three of the CNTU's federations, those representing textile, clothing, and construction workers. However, a number of the construction federation's locals immediately pulled out to remain with the CNTU, despite the vociferous support that the federation's president, Renald Carey, gave the CSD.

By the end of the convention, it was apparent that the rebels' main strength was coming from the middle-bureaucrat level, and not directly from the rank and file, confirming the view of the CNTU's official organ, Le Travail, that "the three D's dissidence wasn't a grass roots phenomenon, but rather a matter of tiredness among prematurely-old leaders".

The CSD's real character became clearer as it denounced the CNTU in much the same language used by the more reactionary elements of the commercial press, and started receiving support from such friends of the workers as the Conseil du Patronat (the Bosses' Council) and the leaders of the Unite-Quebec and Creditiste parties.

At its own convention (held immediately after that of the three D's), the CNTU played down the detections and held no special discussion on the subject. Although the construction, textile, and clothing workers' federations were not represented, many of their locals were.

Throughout late June and July, the status of many CNTU unions was brought into doubt as internal struggles raged between pro- and anti-CSD factions.

The Saguenay construction union provides a case study in the union's pro-CSD president, called a meeting for June 15 affiliation. Although only members were present, Tremblay's meeting pass final judgment. When overruled by the union for a referendum, Tremblay issued a personal statement of disaffiliation that he had desired along.

On the night of August 14, almost all the union's members from the executive offices. In order to make up a comprehensive list, this left the door open for disaffiliation and then required absolute majority.

A week later, the union voted to throw out four members executive for channelling support before a disaffiliation vote. On August 14, the Saguenay union affirmed that the construction union, the CNTU, but the members have been able to express its will.

A special conference of the Workers' Federation voted to throw out all pro-CSD executive members construction workers support referendum on July 17 with support for the CNTU by its members.

A common CSD tactic to persuade the executive of the transfer its fees to the rival strength of a pro-CSD vote membership. A particular occurred in the Quebec whose executive accepted unionists to declare disaffiliation has over 1600 members. require that an absolute majority vote to approve disaffiliation (federation.)

In several cases, the criminal charges against the three D's. In H. J. a official discharged for supporting the postmaster CNTU's local box number, union dues from the CN Quebec superior court ruled to the CSD of the Le Garde Union in Joliette was illegal minority of the membership change.

By late July, the CSD membership of over 20,000 growing threat end the suspicious tactics, the CSD launch a province-wide campaign.

At a July 25 conference, the CSD the "enemies of labour", and announced the "Consolidation", to determine actual CSD support information campaign challenging the CSD's regulations.

In a special issue of Le Travail is time that the membership authority", the CNTU charged D's are using "lies, treachery" are "playing the game of enemies".

The CNTU admitted with its policies, attributing information about the goals, pro-CSD activities

Quebec labour since the may revolt leaders, and misconceptions about alleged "special attention" given to workers in the public sector.

"Where the leaders respect the rules of democratic debate, the defections are negligible or non-existent," the CNTU paper claimed.

The true strength of the CSO is now generally put at about 18,000 out of the CNTU's total membership of 240,000. Internal battles are still being waged in many unions, but the situation should become much clearer this month, with affiliation votes due in several major federations.

Another breach in labour's solidarity became apparent by August 14 when the executive of the 30,000 member Quebec Civil Servants Union (SFPQ) voted to withdraw from the Common Front. Although the union's president, Jean-Paul Breuleux, has dismissed all suggestions of leaving the CNTU entirely, pro-CSD as well as anti-Common Front forces within the SFPQ are rallying around him in preparation for a general referendum September 25.

On August 17, the "CNTU committee of the SFPQ" (formed at the initiative of four pro-CNTU executives of the civil servants union) held a press conference to denounce the Breuleux "sabotage" and announce measures being taken to keep the union in the Common Front. The committee is publishing a weekly newspaper, The 30,000, and last month conducted a province-wide information campaign aimed at ensuring a pro-CNTU vote.

But, the CNTU hasn't been completely preoccupied with combating the splits in its ranks. At its June convention, the federation took a further step towards clarifying its analysis of Quebec society by debating and adopting Marcel Pepin's lengthy "Moral Report" — written in Qrsainville Prison — entitled Pour Vaincre ("To Overcome").

The report summed up the economic critique developed within the CNTU over the past months by condemning the stagnating effects of American imperialism and the impotence of all levels of government.

Pepin expressed the CNTU's total opposition to the present Quebec government: "This marks the first time that Quebec finds itself with a regime that functions on American money on the one hand, and the Canadian army on the other. The Bouressa regime operates above all as a foreign government on hostile soil."

Dismissing armed revolution as a suitable course of action at the present time, the CNTU president instead proposed the establishment of People's Committees in each electoral district, that would:

- unite all workers in the area,
- support or propose a candidate in provincial elections while fighting all Liberals — "Support for a candidate will depend mainly upon the formal endorsement by the candidate of the economic and social positions of the three parent unions, but more particularly on the formal condemnation of capitalism and economic liberalism",
- "exercise permanently the political vigilance necessary so that the state cuts the ties which attach it to the worthies who are defending the domination of American investors over the workers, and starts to represent the population", and
- maintain union independence by "resisting the temptation" to form a new party or formally support an existing one.

In the only changes the convention made to its president's report, the specific condemnation of all Liberals was changed to "any political party attempting to crush unionism and the workers", and "Marxism" was added to "capitalism and economic liberalism" as the trioka of official evils.

ASLN '70.

At the present time, then, the CNTU has managed the not-uncommon trick of drawing reformist solutions from radical analyses. But the adoption of a radical social critique during the past year is itself an important step forward. These ideas seem now to be accepted by a large majority of the CNTU membership, especially since the departure of the three D's. The formation of the CSO can be looked on as in some ways a positive thing, since as long as it remains small it will merely isolate those who would have fought all the CNTU's progressive political initiatives.

The coming debate within the labour movement on the specific contents of a "form of socialism" for Quebec will be even more crucial than that which led to the formal condemnation of capitalism and imperialism at the June convention.

As the unions begin to probe deeper into the problem of economic alternatives, the contradiction between their official endorsement of a radical analysis of the present situation and the official condemnation of Marxism as a possible option will become more and more glaring. It is at this point that the real nature of the CNTU's commitment to social change will become apparent.

The most hopeful sign pointing to continued development of the federation's political position is the widespread grass-roots militancy that fueled the April-May actions. The CSD-Gazette picture of these actions as those of an anarchist minority leading the rank and file by the nose into murder and mayhem against their better inclinations is belied by the fact that the membership has been consistently more willing to continue strike action than the union bureaucracy itself.

However, the CSD defections were made possible by a considerable degree of base-level alienation in certain key labour groupings, largely attributable to a lack of political information. This indicates that the political debates of last fall and winter did not really penetrate all the CNTU's unions or even all its federations.

The Parti quebecois might have been accepted as an alternative only a short time ago, but union actions since last fall have increasingly widened the gap between the PQ and the workers' movement. Obviously worried about spots on the political menu he hopes to inherit from Robert Bourasse, Rene Levesque has taken to exclaiming that he'd "rather live in a banana republic than in a Quebec dominated by the rantings of union leaders", and Michel Chertrend has denounced the PQ as "traitors" after the May revolt. If the union leaders make peace with Levesque and try to present the PQ again as a "mass party", it will amount to a betrayal of the workers.

Instead of advocating Marxism (which the CNTU automatically equates with the bureaucratic regimes of the Soviet bloc countries), the CNTU committed itself to working out the contents of a "form of socialism" which would apply to our situation in Quebec the great principles of socialism: forms of economic organization which respect the collective ownership of resources, real planning according to needs, workers' participation in the decisions of their workplace; in sum, a real democracy."

Most of the convention's debate centred on the tactics of political action rather than on its general goals as presented in Pour Vaincre. A number of delegates criticized the report's emphasis on electoralism and questioned the effectiveness of the committees' control over their candidates.

The first People's Committee was formed in Trois-Rivieres in mid-July, uniting all union centrals with citizens' and student groups. Another was founded on August 29 in Quebec City with the support of similar groups.

On the federal level the CNTU's only initiative has been to urge voters to spoil their ballots by writing "merde" or "fuddle-duddle" on them "to pay Trudeau back for some of the insults he has fired at us.

The Common Front negotiations were resumed on May 25 and have gone through a seemingly patternless cycle of breakdowns and near breakthroughs. The provisions of Bill 19 were altered by the National Assembly on June 30, empowering the government to impose settlements anytime between August 3 and a new "final" deadline of September 15.

By mid-August the government and the Common Front announced agreement "in principle" at the central bargaining table, but were hung up over future bargaining of specific contracts at the sectorial tables. The government wanted an unconditional extension of the negotiations until December 15, while the Front insisted on formal agreement on principles at the central table and an extension only until October 15. On September 7, the two parties agreed to keep talking until October 15, but did not make public any further agreements.

On August 30, Pepin announced to 800 members of the civil servants union that the government had ceded to a major Common Front demand — the $100 minimum weekly wage — to be implemented by July 1974.

At the same meeting, Roger Desloges, the union's treasurer, claimed that the civil servants were railroaded out of the front by their executive without the possibility of a democratic vote.

British workers face repression: theorist

The Varsity—Frank Rooney

Political theorist Marcus Lyn (right) said Monday that the British working class is the most militant in Europe.

By ELAINE FARRAGHER
Political theorist Lyn Marcus, chairman of the International Caucus of Labour Committees, predicted increased repression of the British working class by the beginning of next year.

This, he said, would be the result of two variables: the near bankruptcy of the international monetary system, and the exceptional militancy of the British labour movement.

Marcus was speaking Monday at the International Students Centre on the labour situation in Britain after the recent wave of strikes over the Industrial Relations Act and the jailing of five dock workers for defying a return-to-work order.

The British labour movement has been more militant than continental European labour, he said, and has won many gains from the government during the last two decades. But Marcus says that although the wage level has risen, the actual purchasing power, or "real wages" has declined, in fact, to a great extent in Britain more than in any other capitalist country.

At the beginning of next year, Britain as well as the other European capitalist countries and Japan will be forced to drive down real wages even further, he claimed. British workers will be hit with poorer housing, a higher cost of living and unemployment caused by government attempts to halt inflation.

Marcus predicts it will happen at this time because it will be right after the American presidential elections. Nixon will try to boost his sagging economy, which, says Marcus, has been kept going "just barely" by a huge influx of "funny money".

In order to boost the economy, Nixon will demand sizeable trade concessions from the European capitalist countries and Japan. These countries will be forced to grant concessions, Marcus claimed, because they don't want the U.S. economy to collapse since their own economies are based on the U.S. dollar.

Marcus predicts that the British working class will not accept attempts by "the British bourgeoisie" to save the economy at their expense.

British workers are led "by the British Labour Party, which has a lot of fighting instinct," he said. The Labour Party is "much to the left of the Communist Party in terms of action". The Trades Union Congress, which he says controls labour, is also "the most militant union in the capitalist world".

Marcus predicts an increase in militant strike action, paralyzing

Britain and forcing a British coalition government "for the national interest". The coalition would take repressive measures against the workers, he claimed, who would never tolerate such action under their present leadership.

But unfortunately, if this happens, the Labour Party is incapable of taking power "in terms of setting up a workers' state", said Marcus. The party is unwilling to govern against the capitalists.

"Since they lack the will, (if they seized power) they would eventually return the country back to the capitalists, thus demoralizing the British workers as they were demoralized after the uprising in 1926."

Marcus said that he completely lacks faith in the present left groups in Britain, to provide an alternative in such an eventuality. The other left groups, he said, are centrist, unclear in their "revolutionary perspective".

Move to bring back finals quashed

Profs to decide on fate of history exams

A possible move to re-establish compulsory final exams in all history courses was quashed Friday when the history department voted to leave final exam policy up to individual professors.

A student attempt to have exams abolished was tabled.

Leaving the present system as is, with professors being able to decide on exams, was recommended by a committee delegated to examine academic requirements.

History department chairman J.B. Conacher said yesterday the department's main concern in setting up the committee was to decide whether or not adequate evaluation of students could be done without exams.

He said there appeared to be general satisfaction among council members with the eventual decision, and added that he felt evaluation needs are different for each course.

The department's curriculum committee can intervene in any professor's decision, said Conacher, but generally the policy allows faculty to decide the needs of their courses.

Conacher feels that the recent concern of students, and the apparent faculty split has been greatly exaggerated by The Varsity.

Jim Lingo of the History Students Union felt the tabling of the student demands of abolition of exams, demands that had the overwhelming support of history students, was not a defeat. He said that some of the faculty, who unanimously supported the committee report, felt abolition of exams was too extreme.

Some professors stated that they would not accept any alternative form of evaluation suggested by students to take the place of exams.

'Quebec women the same as other women', says civil servant, but speech disagrees

By AGI LUKACS

Although she claims "all women have the same problem", a federal labour department civil servant also claims that Quebec women are more oppressed than their English-Canadian counterparts both legally and culturally.

Speaking on women in French Canada to a class at the Faculty of Education, Helen Poliquin said, "It doesn't matter if they are French-Canadian or English-Canadian."

However, her speech illustrated how Quebec women have been restricted more than English-Canadian women by religion, culture, and Quebec's own legislature.

Until recently, she said, French-Canadian women have been entrenched in the roles of mother, nun, or school teacher. Political or economic life was considered to be men's work, which "women just didn't understand".

Even in 1969, the proportion of Montreal French-Canadian women who had never worked outside their home was 27 per cent, compared with 11 per cent of English-speaking women.

In all of Quebec, Poliquin continued, only 34 per cent of the 1962 labour force was female. At that time, this was lower than every province outside the Maritimes. Ontario's labour force, for example, was 40 per cent female.

However, Quebec's involvement with public life hasn't always been so insignificant, Poliquin underlined. In fact, before the British took over in 1763, women were deeply involved in government, commerce and industry, combat duties, and clearing land. Because they owned property, voting regulations which recognized only property holders did not exclude women.

But, after Quebec women had lost many of their societal roles, they were slow to regain them, she continued. By legislation passed in 1909, "white" men and Indian men could vote, but men "of Mongolian descent" and all women were excluded. It was not until 1940 that Quebec women gained the vote (some time after English-Canadian women).

And, it was not until 1969 that the Quebec woman gained full legal rights to her property. This was due largely to a patriarchal tradition still strong in French Canada.

This tradition was reflected in the reaction of high school groups in Quebec to which Poliquin recently spoke.

She reported that while one young man whose mother worked thought that it was hard for women to succeed in less traditional jobs, another felt that a woman today could be a scientist with no trouble — if, of course, she refrained from marrying.

This account drew a laugh from the largely female audience.

Poliquin noted that it is difficult for the 30 per cent of Quebecois whose family income is less than $7,000 to work, since they cannot afford day care.

Another problem raised was that few women who made it into interesting and well-paid jobs — whether in media or in business — helped other women to get there.

Poliquin was instrumental in drafting legislation which a year ago gave rights, such as maternal leave, to women working for federally-regulated companies. Her talk was the third in a series of 12 weekly public lecture series sponsored by the Interdisciplinary Women's Studies course.

Californians may vote to legalize grass next month

LOS ANGELES (CUPI) — A Californian referendum in the November 7 election must attract about four and a half million votes to legalize use of marijuana in the state.

Nine million registered voters are expected to either narrowly approve or defeat proposition 19 — to "decriminalize" production, possession, and use of marijuana.

Number 19 has an excellent position on the 22-position ballot — wedged between a number of referendums expected to return positive replies.

Californian acceptance of the proposition could have far-reaching effects within the United States, and in countries which have expressly outlawed marijuana under American pressure.

Latest state-wide polls show 33 per cent in favour of the proposition but surveys in Los Angeles and San Francisco show support from as many as 57 per cent of those cities' inhabitants.

The Californian Marijuana Initiative (CMI) is described by Los Angeles County co-ordinator Lawrence Skinner as "one of the most ideal solutions for one of the greatest problems in recent times."

The proposition does not affect present laws governing the selling of marijuana.

"It does not deal with the complexities of trafficking marijuana," Skinner said, "and avoids the problems feared by many people that marijuana will eventually be advertised as being sexy or something similar."

"Some supporters believe that approval in the referendum will give police a mandate to concentrate on trafficking of marijuana and narcotics."

Of a total of six marijuana initiatives in the U.S. this year, only the California one showed the support necessary to achieve a position on the ballot.

Attempts failed in Washington, Oregon, Arizona and Florida, but Michigan initiative may be able to collect sufficient signatures for a place in the 1974 state ballot.

CMI has not only achieved what many regarded as "impossible" with the actual initiative, but in the drive to register voters they trained 411 deputy registrars and registered more than 20,220 voters.

Earlier this year, people were "paranoid and thought they would be arrested," said Skinner. But, working within the law this time has avoided any bother from police.

A sign on the steps up to the CMI office pleads with visitors to "leave your stash outside".

Support has come not only from the underground media, but also from two television stations — KNBC in Los Angeles, a network affiliate and KPIX in San Francisco — which have broadcast editorials condoning tolerance of marijuana.

Skinner predicts a number of police officers may also lend support. The initiative has already received support from the police officers for justice and the San Francisco deputy sheriff's coalition.

The campaign has spent a total of $80,000 on the initiative, and plans the same expenditure during the final two weeks on a last burst. Part of the money will be spent on radio spots. Most of this has come through small private donations, with an additional grant of $15,000 from Amorphia, the marijuana foundation. The remainder should be covered from showings of the film "Reefer Madness".

The film is a splendid rendition of early anti-marijuana propaganda in the U.S.

But, the private donations still count — a leather bag hangs in a corner of the Los Angeles office collecting blue chip, green trading and postage stamps.

The heart of the campaign still remains with those who struggled to collect signatures through the paranoia of the early days.

Cannabis consumers you've been shafted

By all the Political Parties in Election '72. The government knows the marijuana question touches the lives of millions of Canadians. They allow the courts and jails to be over-crowded with young people who have possessed or sold a weed the government has proved to be harmless. Money leaves the country. Real criminals make fortunes at the expense of tax payers and the rural economy.

Here is a multi-million dollar industry: A weed who's bi-products of rope and smoking mixtures make it a valuable crop for substance farmers. Russians cultivate two-thirds of the world's hemp, used to produce a linen-like fabric.

Novice farmers should not be denied the benefits of a legal marijuana market: supporting a unique Canadian cottage industry.

We can't afford to ignore the value of this plant. Cannabis Salvia is an Election Issue.

An ad hoc group of cannabis lancers have charged that all political parties have ignored the marijuana question in their election campaigns. In California, on the other hand, voters in the November 7 presidential elections will get a chance to decide whether to legalize the use of marijuana. Californians are expected to either narrowly approve or reject it.

University clips students who drop out

As one student found out to his dismay, its expensive to drop out of university more than two weeks after the term starts.

S. Lloyd Yamada (SMC IV) was charged $180 after withdrawing October 4, during his fourth week at university.

Yamada said he was surprised because he knew very little about the breakdown he of the fees he paid or the price of withdrawing at certain dates.

The only information that any U of T student receives on the cost of droppint out is in the small print on the back of her or his fees form which is mailed out in the summer.

This informs students that only a portion of their fees is refundable upon withdrawal and that academic fees are pro-rated (per week) for this purpose.

According to St. Michael's College chief accountant John Mahoney at one time there was notice given in the calendar but it has been omitted due to lack of space.

Mahoney said the fees breakdown works as follows: during the first two weeks of school there is no charge for withdrawal. After that period academic fees are charged at the rate of $25 per week for the college and $3.50 per week for the university for the first 20 weeks. After that there can be no academic rebate.

Half of a students incidental fees are refundable during the first term if the student drops out, but incidental fees are not returned thereafter.

U of T wins Hudson Regatta

The U of T Sailing Club captured the J. L. Hudson International Regatta for the first time last weekend. The regatta was sponsored by Wayne State University in Detroit.

However, Toronto finished fourth in the Canadian Intercollegiate Sailing Association sloop championship in Kingston on the weekend.

In Detroit, Toronto had a substantial lead with six first place finishes after 14 races held in strong winds on the first day.

Sunday morning the winds were light and shifting; however U of T started the day with a first and a second.

In the overall results Canadian universities placed extremely well, taking four of the five top positions. The final tabulation had Queen's and Toronto tied for first with 57 points. The tie was broken in Toronto's favour.

U of T's winning crew consisted of John Lazier with Richard Zimmerman, and Charlie Colman with Joanna Kidd. Ewan and Celia Swan came second in A division for Queen's, while John Reidshaw with Diane Smith finished second in B division for the Kingston school. Individual skipper honours also went to Lazier.

With eleven schools competing, third place went to Notre Dame, followed by McMaster and RMC.

Toronto's team now qualifies for the North American Intercollegiate Sailing Championships, to be held in Chicago on November 20.

U of T did not fare as well in Kingston. The crew won only one of four races to finish fourth with 14 points.

PHE in front midway through season

By JAY BERNHOLTZ

PHE gave up their first points of the interfac season Monday, defeating Vic 14-6 on the windswept back campus field.

Even though PHE conceded the six points, the team's defence was consistent, playing the major role in the victory. The strong wind was also a telling factor in this very defensive-minded game.

At the close of the first quarter, Vic had pushed PHE back to its own five-yard line, aided by a wind-blown punt. However, PHE was about to punt just as the whistle ended the quarter, and the team now gained the favours of the southerly winds.

Graced by the fates, the PHE punter lofted one for some 85 yards (roll included), while the defensive squad then held for two plays. Vic's third-down snap sailed errantly into the end zone.

Later in the game, Vic was again stopped as their punt-returner failed to connect with the ball. PHE quickly rushed into the end zone to smother the ball for another six points. The Vic defense, strong throughout the game, then rose to the occasion and blocked the convert.

In the next series, after allowing the PHE squad to march to its 25-yard line, the Vic defence blocked the field-goal try.

Questionable refereeing led directly to the next PHE score. Vic suffered an 11 yard penalty with a loss of down, forcing the team to punt. The ball failed to pass from the Vic centre to the punter, choosing to sail over his head. The punter was able to retrieve the ball only to be tackled on the Vic 5.

PHE then had first down position and Matchett went off tackle to quickly add six points.

However, Vic refused to roll over and die. A rough play call put the ball on the Vic 45, and, on the ensuing play, the team scored on a touchdown pass and run to Hotrum. Vic was back in the game.

However, the PHE defence showed its past form, holding three Vic pass plays to minus two yards.

Late in the fourth quarter, PHE counted their final points as the Vic punter was forced to concede a safety on yet another high pass from centre.

Vic flurried in the final minutes, aided by the referee, to mount a drive, only to be foiled by the stout PHE defence which carried the play away to preserve the victory.

In other games during the past week, UC downed Med yesterday afternoon 24-3, while last Thursday Vic defeated Eng 7-3, and New lost to Trin 6-1. Last Wednesday, UC won against For, 38-20.

The Varsity—Daniel Pishka

Vic passing plays were unable to overcome PHE defence in Monday's game, losing 14-6.

Soccer lead decided, Erin downs St.M 2-0

In a Monday afternoon soccer match, the two front-runners of interfac soccer met to establish the league leadership. In the crisp, well-played contest, Erindale capitalized on the wind factor and superb goaltending to emerge with a 2-0 win over St.Mikes A.

Going into this game at the mid-season mark, St. Mikés (3-0-1) led Erindale (3-1-0) by only a point in the Division 1 standings. It was the first time this year that the teams had met.

In the first half, SMC took advantage of the wind and their forwards aggressiveness to dominate the smaller Erindale team. Time after time, SMC attackers drove medium range shots at the Erindale net, only to be foiled by the goaltender. The Erindale defence was tight enough to prevent SMC from getting in close enough to score, and at the end of the half it was 0-0.

With the wind with them in the second half, Erindale began to carry the play and force the SMC defence into making mistakes. The technical superiority of the small Erindale forwards continually threatened to produce a goal. Finally, at the 15 minute mark, Ismail Moola outraced the SMC goaltender for the ball and punched it into the net.

Less than 3 minutes later, Paul Li took a perfect pass, slipped by a defender, and rocketed the ball just under the crossbar, giving Erindale a 2-0 lead.

With Erindale substituting in the dying minutes, SMC pressed gamely and almost managed a goal. Erindale tightened up, ran out the clock and emerged with their victory, and the league leadership.

In other Monday games, PHE and VIC drew 1-1, while the Division II leader Dent beat Law 1 by a score of 2-1/2.

Women play a marginal role in sports

By JACK SCOTT

"...In sports the end in view is not success independent of physical equipment, it is rather the attainment of perfection within the limitations of each physical type: the featherweight boxing champion is as much of a champion as is the heavyweight; the women skiing champion is not the inferior of the faster male champion; they belong to two different classes."

—Simone de Beauvoir in The Second Sex
It is, the old wisdom suggests, on the playing fields of America where young boys are made into men. It never happens that way, of course, but it is supposed to. But since athletic competition serves as a masculinity rite, it is not surprising that women who participate in competitive sports are faced with a degree of discrimination and oppression that at least equals that which women encounter in any other area of American society.

The woman athlete, no matter how high her level of athletic skill may be, is never fully accepted in this milieu with all its male mythology. Nothing could be more devastating for a male athlete than to be defeated by a woman; and at the same time, the qualities of aggressivity and muscularity required for athletic success result in women athletes often being ostracized by other women.

Because she is perceived as a threat by both men and women, the woman athlete is often a lonely, marginal person, never fully accepted by either group.

Marie Hart, a prominent woman physical educator, succinctly describes this dilemma: "American society cuts the penis off the male who enters dance and places it on the woman who participates in competitive athletics."

Mildred "Babe" Didrikson Zaharias was described by Paul Gallico, one of America's most distinguished sports writers, as "probably the most talented athlete, male or female, ever developed in our country". She encountered the difficulties suggested by Dr. Hart on an almost daily basis throughout her athletic career that lasted from the early 1930's to shortly before her death from cancer in 1955.

Zaharias won national and international titles in nearly every sport open to women during her 25-year career as a competitive athlete. Before turning to golf during the later years of her career, where she won every amateur and professional title available to a woman, she was a star in track and field at the 1932 Olympic Games and was a perennial All-American in basketball.

Though she stood only five feet, six and one-half inches and weighed no more than 125 pounds, she was constantly portrayed by the male sportswriters of the time as having a boyish appearance. She wore her hair short for convenience but she was an extremely attractive woman.

Despite this, she was always referred to as a tomboy, and according to Gallico, one of the favourite jokes of the male sportswriters was that athletic promoters never know whether to assign her to the men's or women's locker room when she showed up for a competition.

It is of course true that there are some women athletes whose size and appearance qualify them as being "unfeminine" according to traditional Western standards, but, as was the case with Zaharias most women athletes are treated the same regardless of their actual physical appearance or behaviour.

(The exceptions to this occur in sports that are characterized by graceful movements and little physical exertion, such as ice skating, diving, gymnastics, skiing and similar activities, where a woman can participate without being typed as "masculine".)

Feminine consciousness

Nor surprisingly, most women who participate in competitive athletics are extremely conscious about looking "feminine". Vicki Foltz, a 27-year-old married woman who is probably America's finest woman long distance runner, was asked in a recent interview whether she had any "feminine hang-ups about running".

She responded, "Yes, I have lots of hangups. You wouldn't believe it. I always worry about looking nice in a race. I worry about my calf muscles getting big. But mostly I worry about my hair."

"The morning before my last big race it was hailing and blowing, but there I was in the hotel with rollers in my hair. I knew the rain would ruin my hairdo, but I fixed it anyway."

"I suppose it's because so many people have said women athletes look masculine. So a lot of us try, subconsciously maybe, to look as feminine as possible in a race. There's always lots of hair ribbons in the races".

If an attractive, mature married woman with children like Vicki Foltz feels this pressure, one can only imagine what it must be like for younger women athletes such as the female swimmers who often participate in the Olympics while still in their early teens.

Marion Lay, for instance, participated in the Tokyo Olympic Games when she was only 14 years old. By 1967 she had developed into one of the finest female swimmers in the world, and she won four silver medals at the Pan American Games that year.

She won a medal at the 1968 Olympic Games and also served as captain of the Canadian Olympic women's swimming team despite being only 18. But in many ways her career was frustrated.

The only coaches available to her were men, since in swimming, as in nearly all other sports, it is next to impossible for a woman to advance in the coaching profession. Marion found that nearly all the male coaches and officials she met refused to accept the fact that she was as dedicated to swimming as any of the male athletes.

The attitude of male coaches and officials seems to be that women are somehow incapable of being as dedicated to sports as men, whereas in reality the opposite is often true.

Being a marginal person, as I pointed out earlier, the female athlete often dedicates herself to sport with a fervor unmatched by male athletes, since athletic success is one of the few satisfactions available to her. Unlike the case for male athletes, athletic prowess does not assure a woman of social status.

The final step in the Catch-22 of women's sports is that those women athletes who do totally dedicate themselves to sport are invariably labeled as being masculine by the male-controlled sports establishment.

Cardboard maleness

All the desirable qualities athletes must possess if they want to achieve a high level of success have been made synonymous with our cardboard concept of masculinity.

This point was brought home to me when, in a Sports illustrated article, the male diving coach of Micki King, America's, and perhaps the world's, finest woman diver, attempted to compliment

The shortness of their careers is due to other circumstances: the tremendous social pressures I've mentioned, and also the fact that only a handful of colleges in the entire United States gives even partial athletic scholarships to women.

Compared to men, the opportunities for women to be supported while competing in athletics after high school are almost non-existent. Additionally, most women college physical educators attempt to steer women students away from highly competitive athletics.

Canada's Greene and silver-medal winner Tanner after 1968 Olympics.

King by asking he knew early in her career that she was going to be great because "She dives like a man".

My immediate reaction on reading that statement was that she sure as hell doesn't dive like me or any other man I have ever met. In fact, she doesn't dive like 99 per cent of the men in America. What she obviously does do is dive correctly.

Another myth that the male-dominated athletic world works to perpetuate about women, especially the female teenage swimming sensations who began their careers at the age of 12 or so, is that they invariably retire when they get to be about 17 because they have become interested in boys and no longer have time for competitive athletics.

Conveniently ignored is the fact that most male athletes are not known for their sexual abstinence. If male athletes have time for girl friends, there is obviously no reason why female athletes could not also continue to participate in sports while dating.

Double standard

If a woman does survive all this, she faces a double standard even after achieving a sufficient skill level to participate in national or international level competition.

This past track season the AAU barred one of our most prominent female track stars from international competition because of "unladylike" behaviour on a foreign tour the previous summer.

Her "unladylike" behaviour involved a member of U.S. men's international team that was touring along with the women's team, but this individual was not even reprimanded.

The frustration of the woman athlete is further compounded by her inability, because of basic differences in speed and strength, to ever achieve success according to male standards.

Hopefully, our society will come to the point where women will not only be given equal opportunity to participate in sport, but will not be made to feel that they are somehow inferior athletes because they run 100 yards in 10.5 rather than 9.5.

The foregoing is adapted from Ramparts magazine, February, 1972. Jack Scott is Director of the Centre for the Study of Sport and Society at Oberlin College in Ohio.

Mayor seekers attack board

The Metro planning Board came under heavy fire from all three city mayoralty candidates last night during an architectural alumni sponsored debate on urban form.

The Planning Board, which makes recommendations to City Council on subjects such as development, was criticized by Ward 11 alderman David Crombie for its role in development planned for the Yonge-St. Clair area.

The Planning Board rejected a proposal of several citizens groups from the neighbourhood affected by the proposed development to implement traffic control before any development began.

Although these groups considered traffic control "vital to the preservation of these communities", Crombie said, and recommended it 700-3 at a general meeting, the Planning Board rejected it 7-3.

Crombie suggested that the Planning Board was the "worst of both worlds", since it represented neither the experts nor the politicians. Rather, it was a "semi-autonomous body" composed mostly of aldermen and other municipal politicians.

Budget chief David Rotenberg agreed with Crombie on the board. He suggested that one solution might be ad-hoc citizens-experts groups, such as the task force formed by the citizens groups in the Yonge-St. Clair community.

Executive alderman Tony O'Donohue suggested that the planning board be retained, but that it should consist of "people other than politicians".

All three candidates embraced the Toronto Centred Region Plan, which stresses the decentralization of population growth in southern Ontario. It sees Toronto as the centre of a 60 to 100 mile radius suburban area.

Crombie was the most insistent of the three that any such change must involve more participation by the municipal government.

He cited the Spadina Expressway decision as well as the waterfront park announced Monday as examples of the paternalistic attitude the provincial and federal governments take to civic politicians.

O'Donohue said he thought the park was "a good idea", but emphasized the importance of consultation in urban affairs. "The people in Queen's Park and Ottawa have no idea of our problems", he said.

Rotenberg also supported the park.

Evans ignores SAC to pick student delegate

By BOB BETTSON

The Students' Administrative Council has protested president John Evans' unilateral selection of the undergraduate representative to the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC), annual meeting and the fact that the meetings will not be open to observers.

Although Evans chose Governing

Council and SAC heavy Paul Cadario to represent undergraduates without consulting SAC, the administration is consulting the Graduate Students' Union about the graduate representative.

The meeting, to be held in Toronto November 1 and 2, will be restricted to delegates, guests and the press.

In late September, SAC sent a letter to president John Evans protesting the selection of Cadario as the delegate from U of T without consulting SAC. In the past, SAC has been consulted in the appointment of student representatives.

Replying to SAC for Evans, vice-president Jack Sword said that the student representatives on the Governing Council are now the logical choice to represent the students. He told The Varsity that "with a unical method of government we have to rethink the process of consultation."

SAC president Eric Miglin declared, "We would like to make it very clear that the student governors should not replace SAC as representatives of the student body." He added that he was in no way questioning Cadario's competence but that the method of selection was at issue.

(In fact, Miglin wrote a controversial letter last summer recommending Cadario for the chairmanship of a Governing Council.

Sword's letter indicated, however, that the GSU was being approached about the appointment of a graduate student to the ten-person U of T delegation, since the conference was on the topic of research, which is more directly related to graduate students than undergraduates.

However Evans has sent a letter to AUCC asking for enlargement of the U of T delegation. He said that a broad range of people should be represented.

Evans also added that in case the delegation is not enlarged, one non-student delegate has agreed to step down in favour of a student.

SAC also made a strong plea to Evans "to consider withdrawing the U of T delegation unless the AUCC executive committee reverses its hasty decision and opens the sessions to all interested observers."

Although AUCC officials maintain that sessions in the past have been closed, vice-provost Robin Ross said last night universities were allowed to send an indefinite number of observers. At last year's meeting, sessions were virtually open.

SAC's letter also states that "the U of T should not consent by silence to the deceptive and ill-considered decision to close the meetings." SAC was not satisfied with the AUCC explanation that the sessions are being closed because of fear of disruption.

Sword said that while he favours the principle of openness, he could understand the decision because of "the confused and ineffective nature" of last year's conference, which was disrupted.

He said in a letter to SAC that the AUCC board including the three student members had unanimously agreed to restrict this year's meetings to delegates, guests of AUCC and the press.

Security is heavy at hearing of Ed Hogan

By GREG McMASTER

Heavy security was the highlight at the Immigration Appeal Board on Wednesday and Thursday as the hearing of former Black Panther Ed Hogan's appeal against a deportation order continued. After Hogan arrived at the eleventh-floor offices in chains, spectators were allowed to enter, one at a time, to be searched by one of about 20 police.

On Wednesday a spectator who responded with sarcasm and a profanity to the somewhat overzealous search of his clothing was asked for identification, and when he refused, was ordered to leave the "open" hearing and to "sit outside". On Thursday, Hogan's lawyer, Charles Roach, entered into the record a protest against this violation of openness.

Hogan, who allegedly was an accomplice to a robbery in Ohio in 1969 while he was a member of the Black Panther Party, was arrested this year as a illegal immigrant to Canada. The Immigration Department wants him deported to the United States, and Hogan is appealing this.

If unsuccessful, he hopes Immigration Minister Bryce Mackasey will intercede in the case to have him sent to a country of his own choice. At present Tanzania, Cuba and Algeria are considering offering him sanctuary from the American judicial system.

The defense is hoping to have the deportation order, if not quashed, at least delayed long enough to request Mackasey's intervention and to allow time to complete arrangements with another country.

The arguments at the hearing centred not around whether Hogan is an illegal immigrant (which the defense admits), but around the nature of the situation he will be faced with if he is returned to Ohio. If the defence can prove that Hogan will face punishment for "activities of a political character" upon return to Ohio, or that he will face "unusual hardship", the Board can quash or delay deportation.

Many Black Panthers have been killed by police bullets in the past, including Fred Hampton, who was murdered while asleep, and the defense suggested that Hogan would be subjected to similar attacks. When the crown attorney said that such killings occurred in two-way "shoot-outs" Hogan responded that "most evidence is to the contrary" but he admitted that Panthers would shoot back "if attacked".

Hogans suggested that his life was at stake, and that "justice in America means 'just us' who are rich or white". His lawyer added that anyone in the U.S. with radical views about socialism and the economic order is "doomed to persecution, imprisonment, and death in some cases. Who would protect him there? Prison authorities? I doubt it."

The Crown responded to this legalistic, saying that there is no concrete proof that Hogan will be treated as the other Black Panthers in prison have been.

Roach said that the Board should not be used as "the cat's paws of some foreign government" that doesn't even bother to make an extradition request, and he listed various instances of obstacles placed in Hogan's way because of pressure from Ohio and Canadian government officials. Hogan claimed to have sent a letter from a Canadian official urging that Hogan be denied legal aid for the present appeal, even though at that time no deportation order had been issued. He gave several other examples indicating that officials considered the deportation a foregone conclusion.

According to Hogan, friends of his in New York were harassed by FBI agents who told them "we are determined to have him sent back here one way or another". Hogan added that "the myth that Canada is sovereign and free from American domination has been shattered." Roach said that this was only an immigration hearing, and that Hogan did not even want to stay in Canada. "If it's not an extradition, why not let him go (elsewhere) voluntarily?"

Hogan charged there was an "ugly, ominous and obvious collusion if not conspiracy against me", and contrasted his treatment with that of a recent escapee from Millhaven Penitentiary, who was recaptured in California and charged with 3 bank robberies, and who was out on bail within a week. Hogan has yet to receive bail.

Roach said that searches of witnesses and supporters outside the hearing, as well as the refusal of legal aid (Roach is working for nothing) constituted intimidation. The original location of the proceedings was the Toronto Jail (formerly the Don Jail).

The defense urged the court to reject such intimidation, to refuse to return Hogan to Ohio and to stop treating him as a dangerous hoodlum. Hogan said that the very fact political refugees seek out Canada should be a compliment. "I am but one runaway slave from a plantation of millions." Roach described Hogan as a great credit to black people for "failing to cower before the authorities".

The Crown attorney's summation said that Hogan would not suffer "unusual hardship" in Ohio; ie that he would be treated no worse than any other escapee. He claimed as a precedent the appeal against the deportation of Puerto Rican Independentista Humberto Pagan, considered earlier by the Appeal Board (and now under appeal to the Supreme Court). Pagan's appeal was rejected by the Board because any danger to his life in Puerto Rico was not "unusual", ie no different to any other Independentista there.

A decision is expected in two or three days, according to Roach.

Trinity glitters as new provost is installed

By FERNANDO TRAFICANTE

Amid the traditional pomp of formal university ceremonies, George Ignatieff was installed as the ninth provost of Trinity College Wednesday evening.

The man who U of T professor James Eayrs has predicted will be the next Governor-General took up his official duties with present Governor-General Roland Michener and former Liberal Prime Minister Mike Pearson on the platform.

Also present at the ceremony were Senate House Leader Paul Martin, Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNie, U of T president John Evans and chancellor Pauline McGibbon.

C. Malim Harding, chairman of the Governing Council, Trinity chancellor and former Anglican Church primate Howard Clark and Toronto Mayor Bill Dennison rounded out the list of dignitaries at the installation.

The line-up was, in some respects, at least as impressive as the platform guests at Evans' own installation three weeks ago.

In his address to the packed Convocation Hall audience, Ignatieff stressed the role of education in developing "versatile and integrated individuals". To best achieve this, he said, "a learner largely has to be a self-learner, unafraid to be left alone with his book, his own experience or his own imagination."

The provost deplored "the bureaucratization and centralization of universities, which I regard as a diversion from scholarship and intellectual accomplishment. I would prefer that the visions of a bureaucratic Nirvana should remain unfulfilled."

Ignatieff stressed the role of colleges such as Trinity in "combating the destructive forces threatening civilization, through the development of a cultural continuity." To achieve such a continuity, he continued, "This means not only a close relationship between teachers and students, but participation by students."

The greatest challenge facing the new provost is the college's financial problems and the need to obtain increased government funds. U of T president John Evans said that Ignatieff's diplomatic experience in the United Nations and Geneva will "provide extra impetus to relations with the provincial government."

With an operating budget of $1.2 million, Trinity has gone $500,000 in debt since 1968. In an attempt to forestall any further increase in the debt, the college is planning to cut its teaching staff by 10 full-time members and to reduce the size of the part-time staff in the next five years.

However, Norman Simpson, the chairman of Trinity's Executive Committee of Corporation, said at the ceremony, "There isn't the slightest possibility of Trinity going out of business."

George Ignatieff likes his job.

The Varsity—David Lloyd

Co-op demonstrators try to break admin silence

Thirty-five demonstrators marched outside Simcoe Hall Wednesday morning to remind the administration that the day care issue is still not settled.

The demonstration was organized by Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centre Number 2.

Only one senior administrator, vice-president Jack Sword, entered the building during the demonstration. However, junior administrators and support staff employed in Simcoe Hall passed through the demonstrators' lines.

Both major campus-related day care groups are dissatisfied with the policy reached by the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee, and one, the co-op, is still occupying an unused university building after six months.

Co-op parent Bob Davis explained that the demonstrators wanted to "break the silence of the administration after three weeks".

Apparently realizing that the co-op will not give up its three year struggle, the administration made tentative moves three weeks ago to ease the problem by renting the group a house. Because this comes under the real division of the university, and not the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee, it does not violate the council's day care policy.

However, the administration has not yet found a house which can be leased to the group without difficulty.

A suggested house on Sussex Street cannot be rented to the co-op because final plans for the Innis College building are not expected for about six months. Although the college will likely retain the house, it may need it for other purposes.

According to Davis, Innis principal Peter Russell told the co-op that if Innis needed the house, it is willing to relocate the day care centre. But it would not be willing to pay for renovations to the new house to make it legally acceptable as a centre.

The co-op is prepared to pay for initial renovations to a first house if it can obtain a long-term, low-interest loan.

The other house mentioned by the university as a possible site for the centre is on the north side of Washington Avenue slated for use in Faculty of Education expansion.

Library committee to decide stack access

By NADIM WAKEAM

U of T's Governing Council yesterday agreed with no debate to establish a subcommittee to deal with "library problems".

The committee will take over policy function of the now-defunct Library Council, which last year turned down student demands for open access to the stacks at the Robarts Library.

The committee will develop and recommend policy on specific matters such as "guidelines for the determination of academic need in connection with stack access to the Robarts Library." Last spring, the Senate decided that students who wanted stack access would be required to demonstrate "academic need."

Other issues it will deal with are the settlement of any complaints arising out of the administration of stack pass rules, to examine operation of the rules and to consider recommendations of the report of the Advisory Committee on the Sigmund Samuel Library collection.

The composition and membership of the committee was ratified at the council meeting as well.

The 15-member subcommittee includes four faculty members, three deans, one principal, one librarian, one alumni representative and five students. It will report to the council's Academic Affairs which recommended its establishment.

The students on the subcommittee are Academic Affairs committee member Brian Morgan, Kathy Feldman (Law), graduate student M. Evans, Governing Council member Clarence Henschel and part-time student J. Ayoub.

The Governing Council also unanimously passed a motion broadening representation on the council of the School of Physical and Health Education.

The new council will include all professors, five non-professional staff and nine students, where previously there was only one student. The student members will include the president of the PHE

Undergraduate Association and two students (male and female) from each year.

Student membership will be appointed or elected by the undergraduate association. The total membership of the new council has been increased from 41 to 52.

The Governing Council also ratified the appointment of Professor P. P. M. Meineke as vice-provost, effective November 1. Meineke, associate dean at Erindale, has been appointed for a one-year term but can be re-appointed each year. Meineke graduated with a Ph.D. from U of T in 1963 and has taught since 1967 in the department of physics.

President Evans said Meineke will be able to make communication easier between the academic community and the council's executive.

Evans closed the meeting by announcing that he had set up an advisory committee to study problems arising from the influx of Ugandan refugees to Canada.

"We must respond to these people so far as they affect U of T," he said.

Members of the committee appointed to date are from the faculty, but SAC has also been asked to name someone to the committee.

Later in the meeting, discussion centered on public participation at Governing Council meetings. At present, non-members can speak when introduced by the chairman, if they inform the chairman of their intention to speak ten minutes before the scheduled time of the meeting or if they are introduced by a member of the council.

Vic in 'critical' position

By JONI SEAGER

Victoria College is in a critical financial position, and has been for the last three years, says bursar F.C. Stokes.

Because of a deficit of $400,853 last year, $435,646 in 1971, $154,672 in 1970 and $285,490 in 1969, it is possible that the college may go broke, Stokes says.

President J.E. Hodgetts was unavailable for comment.

The outlook for the next three years, Stokes says, depends mainly on hoping for a change in policy by the Ontario government. At present, church-affiliated post-secondary institutions receive only part of the grants that secular institutions do.

Stokes also said that Victoria is asking for a more favourable distribution of grants and tuition fees within U of T.

Simcoe Hall receives part of Vic's grant, he explained, since many of the college's students are enrolled in non-Vic courses. But the university is unwilling to relinquish this money until Victoria starts teaching more subjects, he says, and the college can't afford to teach any more courses. Each course costs from $6000 to $12,000.

Borrowing from endowment funds plus using the extra revenue from Vic's portion of the $100 tuition fees increases have reduced this year's projected deficit to $300,000, Stokes says. Otherwise the college would have lost $180,000 more.

One possible solution to alleviate financial pressure would be secularizing and severing ties with the United Church. Stokes maintains that this is not being considered at present.

The church contributes only $60,000 per year, Stokes said, which fails even to cover the costs of its theological college, Emmanuel.

Because of the tight financial situation, several projects have had to be postponed. For example, plans had been drawn up for a sizeable new student union building, parts of which were to extend underground.

Stokes also pointed out that student bursaries had not been seriously reduced. He added that the teaching staff have been more affected by the financial squeeze than students, as they had to accept salary increases of only three per cent this year.

Yet another weekly staff meeting is threatened for this afternoon at 1 pm in The Varsity offices.

Topics to be discussed are so top secret that not even the editor knows.

However, he promises the meeting will be short so all staff will be free to attend the newswriting seminar he's giving right after the meeting.

Make your day complete. Attend both the staff meeting and newswriting seminar.

"Suffer yourself to be blamed, imprisoned, condemned; suffer yourself to be hanged; but publish your opinions, it is not a right, but a duty."

Cannabis campaign reveals distorted priorities

Wednesday's Varsity described an upcoming referendum in California on the legalization of marijuana and ran an advertisement from a Canadian group seeking to make legalization an issue in the federal election.

The case for making the possession of grass legal is obvious. There are no known harmful effects from smoking marijuana or hashish. (And at any rate, drugs which do have known harmful effects, such as cigarettes and alcohol, are freely available.)

The sale of cannabis through a government-regulated agency such as the Ontario Liquor Control Board would help to guarantee uniform quality and quantity in the product. It would also mean that an activity millions of people engage in would no longer be considered a crime.

But, to suggest that this question should be a major election issue, as the sponsors of this advertisement do, is to display a distorted sense of priorities.

At a time when unemployment is running at 7.1 per cent, when inflation is pushing up the cost of living at a frightening rate, when there are massive shortages of low-cost housing in the cities, and when American domination is threatening the very existence of Canada, the legalization campaign should not be a major concern for anyone.

Indeed, it may not be too far fetched to suggest that the government might be only too happy if more people could be led to forget the problems facing the country by grass-induced highs. Certainly, there are indications, such as the LeDain report, that politicians are overcoming their inbred puritanism on this question, and moving to the acceptance of dope as a fact of life.

After all, there need be nothing threatening or revolutionary about getting stoned. Anybody can do it to escape from his problems, to forget temporarily that they are there.

And, it seems apparent that the sponsors of this campaign are not interested in dealing with the problems that exist in the capitalist social order. In fact, if anything, they are interested in perpetuating and strengthening the status quo.

In their ad, they hold forth the prospect of "a multi-million dollar industry" and "a unique Canadian cottage industry". Growing cannabis is sold as a potential money-making operation; the appeal is to greed, not to any desire for social change, a topic which is not even mentioned in the ad.

Beyond that, it is directed to the "freak" community, who are by implication given prospects of dropping out and smoking up, presumably while living on their cosy rural communes, supported by the profits made from selling their cannabis crop.

It is a rosy picture, and one that is appealing primarily to counter-culture people, with their middle-class backgrounds and life styles, their relative exemption from at least the most pressing economic problems facing most working-class Canadians, and their desire to "do their own thing" without worrying about social problems. It has little relevance to most Canadians, whose problems are larger and more urgent.

It is unfortunate that Marijuana, which was once touted as a revolutionary challenge to a repressive social order based on property and profits, should now function as a safety valve for that society, as a means by which attention is distracted from the material and psychic brutalities of capitalism.

Cannabis, it seems, is becoming an opiate of the masses.

Bad trip?

Council reverses backward step

SAC amends constitution to allow more grants

The Students' Administrative Council move to reinstate council grants to groups within the university community deserves support.

Last Winter's Constitutional Conference, which rewrote the SAC constitution, took a retrograde step when it sought to get itself off the political hook by eliminating all external grants, both to campus and off-campus groups.

As the council's constitution now reads, SAC can only subsidize organizations and activities which are sponsored by one of its commissions. Under the old rule, SAC funded numerous political and social action groups. This activity was the focus of much criticism of council priorities by conservative students and their college and faculty councils.

The Constitutional Conference's willingness to adopt the no-grant position betrayed a lack of social consciousness on the part of those supporting it.

Although many pretended (and probably a few sincerely believed) that shifting responsibility for funding political and social actions groups onto college and faculty councils was democratically decentralizing power to the ephemeral "grass roots", the majority was SAC in the very narrow role of provider of university-wide services and co-ordinator of related local council efforts. In short, as little more than a source of money.

Their action lumped cultural services, important in their own right, together with political and community activity and made both virtually unfundable by SAC.

The council left itself the right to get involved at the faculty or department level when individual students are unsuccessful in gaining support from their local councils.

To equate the Student Health Organization of U of T (SHOUT) and the Student Legal Aid Society with groups like the former U of T Chorus (now merged with the Hart House Glee Club in the Hart House Chorus), for example, is pure nonsense. The former two groups operate within the university and surrounding community to provide services vital to their clients' lives; the chorus traditionally manages to pry money out of SAC by singing at the SAC budget meeting.

The Constitutional Conference and last year's SAC (which had to ratify the new constitution before it went into effect) took the easy way out. And, it was a wrong decision.

Requests for SAC money should be dealt with on their own merits. And, that will mean difficult decisions about funding worthwhile projects rather than giving in to supposedly apolitical "service" groups.

SAC's attempt to amend the restrictive grant clause is necessary. But, it mustn't stop there.

As it now stands, the constitution prohibits council from giving money to groups operating exclusively outside the university community, no matter how worthwhile their cause.

Students are not removed from the outside world. Consequently, the council representing them should not lock itself up in the university ghetto, ignoring the possibility of both political and financial support of non-campus movements and activities.

Let's reverse the move backwards.

Waffle sizzles as election nears

By PETER MATILAINEN

"The Ontario Waffle has launched a parallel campaign in this federal election because none of the political parties were debating the real issues or offering Canadian voters any real alternatives."

With this statement, U of T economics professor Melville Watkins made his first major pronouncement since the Waffle conference in August. He was the keynote speaker at the first meeting of the Waffle Movement for an Independent Socialist Canada held at York University yesterday.

The speech was the second statement by Waffle MISC people this week in what looks like a concerted drive to inject more radical and political issues into the election campaign.

In a prepared speech, Watkins introduced the issues around which he and MISC leader Jim Laxer were going to wage their "counter-campaign". Focal points for the Waffle campaign are Canadian independence; Quebec (its relationship to English Canada); wage-price controls; and women's rights.

Watkins released recent figures calculated by movement researchers which were an extension of the study completed last year by the Ontario Federation of Labour.

The OFL documented the number of plants (for a period from July '70 to June '71) with extensive employment terminations or layoffs as 138, with 76 being foreign-controlled. Of the 16,224 employees laid off, 63.5 per cent were in foreign-controlled plants and 36.5 in domestic plants.

Watkins' figures covering July '71 to September '72, almost matched these figures (110 plants being affected) with unemployment from foreign-controlled plants being only slightly less than the previous year.

Watkins feels that "the phenomenon of a high level of shutdowns and layoffs is a feature built in to the structure of the contemporary Ontario economy."

During the question period afterwards, Watkins made it clear he thought that union leadership in the NDP did not represent rank and file. There was a need for an independent labour movement because of the growing cleavage between Canadian and U.S. workers. He felt serious work in union and workers' councils was not on the "agenda" of the left, but Waffle MISC would give support to workers on strike.

Canada will vanish without Quebec, says Peter Stollery

By JULIA ELCOCKS

"Without Quebec there will be no Canada", said Liberal candidate Peter Stollery Wednesday.

He was speaking at an all-candidates meeting in the GSU building. The only candidate not present was incumbent Conservative MP Perry Ryan, who was in Ottawa.

Another all-candidates meeting advertised for the same time by the Hart House Debates Committee drew 17 people, despite the fact that none of the candidates turned up.

Stollery went on to declare that as a member of the Liberal Party he was committed to Canada and the federal system. He said that the constitution must be reworked to suit Quebec and to make Canada an attractive place in which to live.

If there is a legitimate majority in Quebec in favour of separation, he said, then Canada has failed.

NDP candidate Bob Beardsley said "there is a thrust in the NDP towards federalism" but that in Spadina, party members' feelings towards separation are "more radical than in other ridings".

Canada must be made into "a more attractive place to stay in", he said but if Quebec does declare itself independent, the NDP would not prevent Quebec from separating. He agreed with Stollery that the constitution must be changed to meet Quebec's needs.

Communist candidate Maggie Bizzell considered "Quebec to be a nation with a right to self-determination", but she said that she would prefer to have Quebec remain in Canada to fight "the monopolies".

Mitchell Bornstein of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) said that he supported "the national liberation struggle in Quebec". He added he would oppose any attempt "to subjugate the people of Quebec by armed force".

Beardsley said he opposed taxing student grants. The large OFS vote in favour of the fee strike was "quite an accomplishment when you consider that many who voted were from conservative small towns in Ontario", he said.

"This says a lot about the measure of frustration" of the students.

He added that the NDP advocates a free education for all, even to the point of paying students to go to school.

Bizzell said that unemployment and inflation were two main issues in this year's election. The federal government's solution of "pumping money into corporations" has resulted in the companies using the money to buy new machinery which puts more people out of work. She saw unemployment and inflation as a "crisis of capitalism increased by an American domination of our economy".

Both the Liberal and Conservative parties have a "complete misunderstanding of imperialism", she charged, which results in their "selling Canada's economy to the States".

Study shows most profs are not Canadians

By DIANA WEST

Fewer than half of all professors in English Canadian post-secondary education were Canadian citizens in 1971, a study by Carleton mathematics professor James Steele shows.

Results of the study, based on government surveys, were released at a press conference held by the 85% Canadian Quota Campaign Wednesday.

The proportion of Canadian teachers, 49.9 per cent, has dropped from 75 per cent in 1961, said campaign national director Barry Lord.

Only 25 per cent of the professors hired this year were Canadian, he said, a drop from 75 per cent seven years ago.

Lord charged that Canadians tend to hire "American professors first, Canadian professors second."

Canadian universities are being run by American dominated boards, he stated. "Canada's future is to be the backyard of the U.S." if American domination continues.

"Canada," said Lord, "must maintain a sense of Canadian heritage." American dominated boards and departments in Canada "can virtually wipe out the conscience of a nation in five to ten years."

He explained that Americans teaching history, literature and philosophy in Canada "means we don't produce our own culture."

The Canadian government has failed in an attempt to close a loophole in its income tax laws, said Lord.

The Canadian government has allowed foreign professors a two-year income tax exemption if they come to Canada to avoid double taxation from their own country. But since the U.S. government does not require its citizens resident outside the country to pay taxes, American professors get a windfall gain, Lord said. U.S. teachers received an average of $10,170 from the Canadian government over a two-year period, he stated, by declaring they would return to the States after two years.

Lord estimated about 1000 Americans in Ontario have benefited from "the deal", most of whom have not returned to the States after two years. Instead, they began paying taxes the third year.

In September, the Canadian government changed the regulations, so that American professors pay taxes as they earn money, but get a rebate after returning to the U.S.

Lord charged that all a professor has to do is to "get an American summer address, and move back to Canada once he has his rebate."

The 85% Canadian Quota Campaign was organized two years ago in Toronto and has expanded since into a national campaign. It has been endorsed by the Council of Canadian Unions, student councils in both Toronto and Thunder Bay and the Canadian Liberation Movement, Lord said.

Women studied more now, says psych prof

By ALEXANDRA MERCER

Free will is the only problem ignored by the standard schools of psychology, a York associate psychology professor said Wednesday night.

Speaking to a meeting of the women's course at the Faculty of Education, Stewart claimed that the women's movement was generally responsible for the fact that female socialization experiments are now being carried out. Before feminism, she said, psychologists had agreed with Freud that the female was nothing but a truncated man with two choices: to be inferior or to be deviant.

Recent experiments now cast aspersions on the Freudian view, she said.

A study entitled "Pygmalion in the Classroom" discovered that teachers gave children higher grades if they were told that the child was exceptional. Naomi Weinstein points out that experimental results are determined by normative judgments and that the female in our society has been the main victim of psychological role-casting.

Assuming that there are innate behavioural sex differences which are exacerbated by conditioning, Stewart says there is no way of knowing to what extent these differences are due to "nature or to nurture".

For example, the higher level of activity attributed to men could be due either to androgen (a male sex hormone) or to a social equation of masculinity and activity and femininity with passivity. If the causes, were known, Stewart claims, social and educational policies could be geared so as not to aggravate the differences.

Stewart labelled as "a chicken and egg argument" the reasons why girl children tend to be verbally aggressive while boy children are physically aggressive.

She asked if parents tend to talk to girls and physically handle boys because they have found out that the female is more responsive to verbal stimuli, while the male is more responsive to the physical. Or, she asked, do parents respond to predetermined definitions which they then impose upon the children, in turn conditioning them.?

She described the Tina Horner experiment, which elucidated for the first time the achievement motivation conflict in North American women.

North America today is an achievement-oriented continent, she said. For men, achievement and masculinity mean the same thing.

Women, however, are caught in a double bind. The North American ethos pushes them toward accomplishment, but their "femininity" is incompatible with accomplishment.

Defining herself as a feminist and a

Christian, Stewart said she was an "anti-psychologist psychologist" who deplores pretensions to value-free analysis. At the same time that social science has "become the new religion", she stated, social scientists do not take any responsibility for directing society, but merely claim to accumulate data.

"Social science does not change society," Stewart says "Society changes social science." Sex role stereotyping in children and discrimination at work were investigated by social scientists only after feminists aroused the interest of the public in such matters, she said.

Arts union nears

The students of the Faculty of Arts and Science will soon have a new union. The draft constitution has been approved by all the college councils approached so far as well as the student caucus of the General Committee and two of the five accredited course unions.

Three quarters of these bodies must approve the union.

The constitution has been unanimously or near-unanimously passed by the New and Innis college councils, VUSAC, The UC Lit and SAGE at Erindale. The Political Economy Course Union and the Math and Physics Course Unions have also ratified the constitution.

Trinity and St. Michael's Student Union have not yet considered the constitution, nor have course unions in anthropology, geography and history. SMC is the only one where difficulty is expected in ratification.

Constitution drafting committee member Dave Freedman said the constitution will go next week to the SAC education commission.

Free course writing e

Essay-writing is a matter of determination. Procrastination is a matter of genius.

This conclusion must become evident to anyone who has ever taken the pains to compare the way in which students avoid doing essays, with the quality of the final product. Impressively more sheer resourcefulness and ingenuity — often born of the genius of desperation — seem to go into the effort of procrastination than into the supposedly cerebral and creative activity of writing undergraduate papers.

Recently however, there has been a trend, at this university and at others, to attempt to combat the unhappiness which students feel with their educational experiences. This has taken the form of the establishment of 'free', 'unstructured' and 'liberated' courses, dealing with issues of 'relevance to today's world', and allowing more autonomy to students, as well as the loosening of structures in established courses, through increased emphasis on discussion, and on essays rather than exams.

The results seem to have been disappointing to many. Recently, there have been indications that the professional faculties do not like to accept students with credits in what are considered 'Mickey Mouse' courses. And more surprisingly, there has been, to all appearances, little change in the nature of the learning experiences which take place in the 'free' courses. Writing essays, for example, seems to call forth the same kind of ingenious procrastination as always.

It seems puzzling. Young, long-haired, professors who lived through the heady days of the sixties when alienation was rediscovered and when the university was exposed to everyone as a barbarous monstrosity in a brutal society, mutilating all those in it, are now setting up courses which are supposed to be liberating experiences. (The courses, it is true, are born not only of a fascination with attempts to transcend inhuman human relations, but of guilt on the part of young academics who have to rationalize teaching in an institution they once criticized so uncompromisingly.)

But still. They teach their students about alienation, about repression. Marx and Laing are on the reading lists. (And naturally, the readings are not compulsory; the student should read them because she feels a genuine urge to do so.) Emphasis on the necessity of authentic experience is the order of the day. (Not universally, of course, but only in the 'free' courses.)

And yet. The failure of so many of these courses is so utter that even the faculty offices are beginning to notice. And on their own terms, in their attempts to create unalienated learning experiences, their failure is an open secret.

There is a problem with teaching about alienation, with studying Laing. Alienation exists. And studying it makes a student more aware of the fact. She becomes aware of it, but does not know how to go beyond it. But being conscious of the fact without knowing how to go beyond it makes school, more oppressive, harder to bear. She realizes that she is powerless to change the situation.

Writing an essay, for example, becomes not merely something she dislikes. It now becomes something to be hated, and hatred pre-empted more of her emotional resources than essays formerly did.

Writing essays, she realizes, is a ritual, a game, but a massively vicious one. It is a matter of concealing ignorance from the professor or TA, of trying to fit into an external mould of pre-set standards. The essay may be an intellectual product, but it is not her thing, she does not feel like an intellectual.

The problem is no easier in 'liberated' courses, with their stress on the students' right whether they like it or not, both professors and students must live up to the demands of the institution.

Essay time helps to produce a situation where some of the contradictions inherent in 'free courses' have to be faced. For despite all pretensions of lack of structure, despite all drift, despite everything, this time of year produces dilemmas. Like it or not, the professor must hand in marks by a certain date. They must be real marks, marks that the computer can digest. No amount of protestation about how the quality of an educational experience can't be measured will do any good. The student must put something down on paper. No matter how good she may have felt about her experience in the course, no matter how bad she might feel about having to hypocritically ignore her own beliefs, it must be done. Otherwise the professor, be he liberal, sympathetic, radical, feely, or simply traditionally authoritarian, will be pissed off. And who can blame him?

It's all innate in repressive tolerance, of course. The student can feel free (as can the professor, with perhaps more justification) but when it comes to the crunch, she isn't. It's just that now she is supposed to motivate herself to conform to the external authoritarian structures, rather than have to be forced to.

R.D. Laing a guru of the 'unstructured' courses, might formulate it as follows: There are rules. You must live up to the trust put in you by producing academically acceptable work. You must do this because you want to. You must not recognize the existence of a rule that says you have to do it. You must not recognize a rule that says you must want to, whether you want to or not. You must not recognize the existence of these rules... etc, etc, . . .

For many students, the conflict inherent in the situation, the contradiction in trying to act out freedom within a structure where it is impossible, makes itself most clearly felt in writing essays.

The student chooses an essay topic that is relevant and interesting, something that she herself wants to do. But, so often, the same problems develop as before: chronic procrastination, and writer's block. Why?

Marx's definition of alienation provides a useful framework here: "Man's powers become an object, assume an external existence, exist independently, outside himself and alien to him and stand opposed to him as autonomous power." When the student's intellect, her ability to think and to organize ideas, becomes subordinated to the production of essays, things defined by deadlines and marks, the situation is no different than if a worker's ability to work, his labour-power, is sold to a capitalist. The fact that the essay is written 'voluntarily' — that the student has chosen the topic — is irrelevant. She must write about something, produce something that can be marked. In that there is no choice.

Nor does the fact that the essay topic may in itself be interesting change the situation. The point is that it is not the 'innata natura' of an activity that determines if it will be alienating, but the context in which it occurs. For example, typing, or working in a factory, or teaching, are not in themselves alienating activities. They only become such when they are performed because the worker has sold his ability to work to someone else.

In the context of the university, where the student is not freely choosing his learning experiences, essay-writing must be alienated activity.

And understanding of the nature of educational institutions and relationships does not thereby transform them. The problems cannot be analyzed out of existence, they cannot be made to disappear through acts of will, through the attaining of consciousness.

Effectively, what happens to the student when she is writing an essay is that she splits into three parts. One part of her personality rebels against the task, because it is externally imposed, not self chosen. Another part of her personality is mobilized to repress what she considers her 'alien' reactions to the task (such as boredom, tiredness, rebelliousness) which are perceived as somehow being external to her 'real' purposes as she intellectually defines them. Since in fact these reactions are actually rather powerful manifestations of her personality, containing formidable vigour, imagination, and intelligence, it is evident that an enormous amount of psychic energy must be expended in act of repressing and denying this aspect of the self. This leaves a third part of the personality to accomplish the actual task of writing the essay.

When one understands that some of the best parts of the individual are engaged not in writing the essay, but are in fact actively opposing it, then one can begin to understand why persons who clearly have much intelligence, wit and vigour often function so abysmally in 'learning' situations of various kinds. The life-powers are being expended elsewhere, leaving the educational environment very much a realm of death. The irony of the process of alienation is best exemplified by the fact that the most vigorous parts of the personality are condemned and opposed as being not of the self, while the parts of the personality are condemned and crushed in the socialization process, and actually in the service of external impositions (doing the assigned essay) are identified as the self.

Again, it should be pointed out that consciousness of this process does not cause it to disappear. The problems, after all, are real. Meanwhile, the frustration caused by the situation surfaces as aggression directed against the environment, others, and the self.

Consciousness in fact, can even worsen the situation. The conscious person realizes that the causes of her anger, guilt, frustration, etc, are not immediate persons or situations. The professor who assigned the essay had no choice in the matter. He is responsible to the chairman, who is responsible to the dean, the government, the voters. . . Obviously, then, it is foolish to react angrily against the immediate object of irritation, for it is not the real obstacle. The problem is the 'system'.

With this kind of reasoning, the conscious person constructs an abstract model of his own and others' oppression, and opposes it with an abstract anger that can vent itself in practice only in blow-ups over petty frustrations, or against the self. Paradoxically then, analysis and understanding of the situation function also as a neurotic device for avoiding strong feeling.

So it is possible to choose an essay topic in which one is deeply interested, and still find completion impossible because of an inability to 'put it together'. The problem is that unconscious attention is directed elsewhere, to the conflict between being aware of alienation involved in doing an essay, and the necessity of doing it anyway. Because the problem is unresolved, it tends to remain in the front, as it were, of the consciousness, and other problems, for example, the intellectual work involved in writing the essay, must recede into the background.

As a result, the unconscious attention, directed elsewhere, must be actively repressed. But the repression cannot be successful, since the problem remains unresolved. Since what is involved is failure to utilize powers because they are dangerous or lacking an outlet, the energies must find an outlet elsewhere. Consequently, the individual often becomes deeply involved in activities which are trivial and not really deserving of the full attention of an alive human being. Small trivial tasks are then sought out constantly (procrastination) because, first of all, they are chosen, not imposed, secondly, because they provide an excuse for not doing the other thing (the essay) (end help to keep it out of mind) and thirdly, because it reduces awareness of the oppression involved in being forced to do the essay. Attention is fixed on one part of actuality (or many parts) because in doing so, it can avoid another part of the actuality, which is unpleasant.

On another level, the problem is that there is an unfinished situation which needs to be completed before the personality can move on to other things. The unfinished situation is of course the awareness of the alienating nature of the essay in particular, and the university in general. The bother, however, is that the conscious part of the self has abandoned the situation not only because it was too painful, but because it was insoluble. Thus, there is no prospect for finishing the problem off, and consequently no apparent way to overcome the problem of inability to concentrate.

Ultimately, of course, the essay usually gets done. But while the university remains what it is, essays will remain forms of torture, not forms of liberation. And 'free' courses will remain caught up in the morass of their own contradictions. But in this, after all, they are no different from the educational experiences to be had in any course in the university.

Flummery stifles art

Roberta Senn, in her eccoutrements as Elizabeth I, poses with friends from Pro Musica's ornate mask.

In going to An Entertainment For Elizabeth at the MacMillan Theatre on October 12, I admit I was not as easy-going and as open-minded as Elizabeth probably would have been before any one of her many private chamber masks. I confess I found myself pre-judging it, fabricating a gruesome pra-mortem analysis of how the thing had failed to come off, and finally anticipating the event with a crude, black delight. The problem is that Elizabeth was a Royal audience of Ona, used to getting what she wanted and eminently so.

I am a critic, period, and used to nothing but variety and variability. As a critic I was probably too prepared, too suspicious of the foreign, too encumbered with pre-conceptions to sit coolly and comfortably in the stylized Elizabethan world for even one evening. But when there is art or value in a thing, the herd-nosed approach (which has the lowest tolerance for tripa) can usually register it. Rigorousness should never be mistaken for unreceptiveness.

The fact is, I really went to like An Entertainment for Elizabeth, although I suspected I would not. Any one who has fallen under the spell of Praetorius' bizarre little dances from "Terpsichore" knows how buoyant, and at once stark, haunting and mysterious Elizabethan music can be. And although I had never seen Elizabethan dancing, I had a loose but not wholly inaccurate idea of how it might be done well. John Hollander is famous for both his own poetry and criticism which bridges music and poetry, so I felt justified in expecting his mini-play, or the text of the mask, to verbally enhance the music and choreography.

Even if all this critical fore-play chilled pre-curtain enthusiasm, I believe the New York Pro Musical

(which was divided into musicians, courtiers and maskers) would went as many down-to-earth and precise evaluations as they could get. Their foray into the staging of such an entertainment is unique hereabouts and has generated rave reviews. In some way, I wanted to prevent swelled heads and treat the effort as the initiation of a type of modified musical drama. Not as a tansend drag which is fun, climactic, nerve-end treshredding — In short, a novelty, and over before we realize how shallow the whole thing probably was.

And was the Entertainment shallow? Well, even the sub-titla was as brazen as if it were something on the midway; Renaissance Spectacle which suggests that the audience was in for an fortified and gentael equivalent of a hockey game. In other words, when your goal is art, you went your efforts towards achieving that goal to be as diligent and as faithful as possible. Art entertains, after all, by conquering the obstacles it sets for itself. I think the New York Pro Musica began with entertainment and flecked it with art so it was art only incidentally. I could not find it entertaining because art was used as the selas pitch for a clunker of a product.

Unfortunately, this practice is all too common in both theatre and opera today. Mawkish lyricism and most of all, a huffed up graciousness is made to play the role of art. The recent production of Tosca, for example, sioshed the audience with wave after wave of histrionic gestures, with motiveless motion all over the stage during arias, end merital duck-strutting when an innocent amble would have done. None of this is even whipped cream to the cake — it is vapid old Lucky Whip. It is pseudo-art, and infuses the whole production, whether the performers know it or not, with childish pomp.

The Pro Musica's production suffered the same fate. The group expected their pomp and festiveness to carry their art, but they only bounced and banded it around so carelessly that you soon felt it to be incidental, a leacy frill blending in with the stylized decor and costumes. The whole affair smelled of ornateness.

The singing was probably the least objectionable item. In fact tenor Rey De Voll as Pattern gave us something very easy-going and artful in the midst of a generally uninhibited put-on. I thought some of the madrigals were well-done too, and it was interesting how the ingenuous mood of these bits of forthright art clashed with the feunighting temperament of the rest of the show.

John Hollender's text was the most unexpected disappointment of all. Basically the plot of the mask he Varlety, an evil courter of chees, enchain Terpsichore, the muse of the dance. And the maskers through their dencing and lyrical charms free Terpsichore, strip and banish Verlety. After the mask the queen joins the maskers in dancing. Now, I know for the sake of eauthenticity we do not want a dark Ibsenian drama of soullessness and self-destruction. Neither do we want tortuous Shakespearian blank-verse. But if a director is going to make the mask as prominent a part of Elizabeth's "entertainment" as William Woodman the stage director does, then I think it should be made to speak to us modern sophisticates. Yes, subtly, so as not to be un-Elizabethan, and in a stylized fashion, but still in an up-to-date and engaging way. Otherwise, leave the mask with its archaic format in the background. Do not give flights of Shirley Temple herolic couplets to Varlety, to be declaimed by one Arthur Burrows with a "Help! Hol They Murder Caesar!" bombast. Do not give flights of Shirley Temple oratory to Marsha Devils' Terpsichore to twitter, as if she were giving an Elizabethan twist to the dumb-blonde stereotype. Do not give trivial dumb-shows to the two peges, so they may have an opportunity of making us wince with their under-rehearsed and under-nourished vaudeville.

The acting generally was

classic and monotone. Everyone overacted, except perhaps for Ray De Voll as Pattern and Roberta Senn as Elizabeth (who never spoke or sang). Even the extras were embarrassing. I am always surprised when I go to a play or opera — again Tosca comes to mind — and see the extras trying to pretend to make inaudible small talk with one another. Because it is usually done so lamely and ostentatiously, it attracts most of our attention and the brunt of our irritation, even if the "sters" are bellowing fiercely center-stage. These things have to be so well-timed and rehearsed so as not to be obtrusive that I'd suggest directors discourage their actors from engaging in any pretended small talk at all, unless realism demands it. In this case it did not, since the mask was already as glitiously stylized as one could stand.

I'm not really sure what to say about the dancing. I could say the research into exactly what dance steps were employed is so recent, maybe it is unreasonable to expect anything near balletic proficiency with them. Even if I admit this, I will still say the dancing seemed corny and dried up without a hint of fluency. What is probably more important, this skimpy and tawdry heel-kicking took up center-stage most of the evening. It was so obviously merely cute and folksy, yet was capitalized upon as a novelty. The male dancers had the fancier steps, and like precocious children they thumped and lumbered about when they thought they were flitting and pirouetting like elegant birds. Sometimes, I know, they were supposed to thump soldierly, and, if it is any consolation, they did. The extended ring-around-the-rosy dance was mawkish and straight from Tchaikovsky's The Nutcracker. The phony, beroque and genteel manners es of a grand ball during some dances were too much in force, I thought. Again, contrived elegance was made to serve as art.

And finally, the music. It should have been the backbone of the production — after all, they are the New York Pro Musica. Some of the pieces were very well-played, especially accompaniments to songs and madrigals. But there were galliards (which are fast and tricky dances) which seemed to leave the cornetto and recorder player still fumbling through the first few bars, while the other musicians were rounding off the piece. None of the players gave enough "presence" to their playing. That is, a bright, standing-out soloism, which is very effective in chamber and especially Renaissance instrumental music. I wonder if they had been paying more attention to the playing than to the pseudo-merrymaking about them, perhaps they might have had more time to deal with the fast runs in some pieces and with the (oddly enough) obtuse acoustics of the MacMillan Theatre.

But I'd like to think of the New York Pro Musica as precocious children who couldn't do anything because they tried too hard, than as botchers who couldn't do anything if they tried.

Procul Harum cuts a slick, appealing disc

Procul Harum Live, (A & M)

Procul Harum has combined with the 52 member Edmonton Symphony Orchestra and the twenty-four voice De Camera Singers in November 1971 to produce a fine live album. The final result of this effort at merging a small rock group with a full orchestra is a remarkably slick, well put together recording.

The polished quality of the album is a tribute to the Edmonton Symphony and Gary Brooker of Procul Harum. Brooker and the group never miss a cue in recreating some of their most difficult pieces, including an ambitious 19 minute version of In Held 'Twas In I. The complexity of Brooker's score staggering. His music is far removed from the simple melodic essentials of other rock ensembles. The recording itself is so well performed and mixed that, were it not for the introductions and applause, each number would be good enough for a studio take.

Each of the live songs included has been arranged as close as possible to the original studio versions. One can appreciate the tremendous amount of rehearsal that was undoubtedly necessary to make the record possible. Procul Harum has undergone several personnel changes since some of the songs performed were originally cut. The guitar work of newcomer Dave Ball

Lighthouse

(who has since left the group) is fascinatingly close to that of Robin Trower, and Matthew Fisher's organ lines have been capably handled by Chris Cropping.

The lyrics by Keith Reid are esoteric and often heavy-handed. His own writing reveals, "the words which I use are pretentious and make you cringe with embarrassment". But it's hard to imagine how less imposing lyrics could match Brooker's mood and complement his musical complexity so perfectly.

An essential departure from the original versions has been in the mixing of a somewhat louder percussion part. It's a small fault that interferes with the music at times but is overshadowed by the high standard of musicianship.

Rock music needs more people of Gary Brooker's talent.

Lighthouse Live, GRT

The tremendously well received Lighthouse concert at Carnegie Hall this past winter was fortunately recorded and put on a two album set. The recording captures the 12 member group at a musical peak. The vocals are flawlessly clear and most of the solos are clean and interesting.

Lighthouse's amplified string section used to have a definite plastic aura about them which has been corrected on their last GRT releases. The two live discs include only 10 songs, of which only one, Eight Miles High was neither written by the group members or found on their preceding two albums.

The material is still a bit immature but the group is constantly trying. Paul Hoffer on keyboards and Skip Prokop's percussive wizardry are worth special merit. The extended version of Howard Shore's You and Me has some good moments but the flute solo is too long and lacks polish. Also the choice of Insane as an encore was in very poor judgement, as it's definitely the worst song they've recorded in the last while.

Still this is a fine album and the cheap price is a bonus.

Quebec fiction responds to its troubled society

Jacques Ferron Tales from the Uncertain Country (Anansi, paper, $2.95)
Roch Carrier Is It the Sun, Philibert? (Anansi, $2.50)

Recent Quebecois fiction has an urgency and clarity rarely matched in the rest of the country, where novelists appear to be sunk deep in the dominant mode of listlessness, confusion and despair. The explanation of this difference is mostly to be found in the experience of acute social crisis which Quebec as a nation has been going through in the last decade. At a time when values and institutions are being challenged and transformed, the creative artist plays the crucial role of expressing the meaning of the whole crisis in a thoughtful and entertaining way. Not only does he have important things to say, but he also has an eager and attentive audience.

The combination of social crisis and a creative talent which responds to it makes for good literature, it seems. The House of Anansi has, with two new titles, continues its work of making the literature of Quebec available to English Canadians. As the translator of Carrier's books, Sheila Fischman, comments, this literature probably describes Quebec better than government reports ever can.

The collection of short stories by Ferron is long overdue for English publication. The 18 tales here are drawn from books originally published in 1962 and 1964. For his first collection Ferron's distinctive touch was given recognition by a Governor General's Award.

Ferron's tales are steeped in time-worn tradition. In style they are basically folktales — moral statements expressed through a whimsical dreamworld of talking animals, earthbound angels, old men and old women. Most are set in the small rural settlements of tight family ties and much religiosity that have been so much a part of the orthodox picture of Quebec. But Ferron's stories are not simple reflections of that tradition — they are too iconoclastic, too sympathetic to the ordinary flesh and blood failings and strengths of human beings. His stories seem to express an underground spoken tradition of rural unorthodoxy that went unacknowledged and unpublished during the generations of strict clerical control over culture.

For English Canadians, perhaps the most interesting stories are those in which the English appears strange foreign creatures, inserting strange words like "ouluquene" (weekend) and "culquelouche" (quick lunch) into the language.

Yet for all its admitted charm this collection of stories remains dated. They are, as the title indicates, tales from an "uncertain" country, and in the years since they were written that country has become much more certain of itself.

A stronger and clearer note is struck by the third bookin Roch Carrier's trilogy (La Guerre Yes Sir, and Floralie Where Are You? are the two previous books, both available from Anansi). Here we encounter an urban, industrial civilization, as experienced by Philibert, the farm youth who deserts his parents' home from the big city.

Carrier has a very precise and incisive way of writing which enables him to sum up a great deal in each of the episodes in the novel without losing the fine balance between what's funny and what's tragic in Philibert's experience.

Immediately on his arrival in Montreal he is confronted with the presence of rich people who do not understand his language. Desperately cold and hungry, he clears sidewalk after sidewalk of snow, only to have the door shut in his face by the uncomprehending English. Or, at the legendary Montreal Forum, Philibert joins an enthusiastic crowd to cheer on the Canadiens as they skate circles around the Toronto team. When a Toronto player hooks Maurice Richard to prevent him from scoring, Philibert steps onto the ice and punches him in the face, a daring act of patriotism that wins him the delightful taste of warmth, friendship and solidarity from people around him in the stands.

But Carrier's novel is much more than a nationalistic document. In the description of Philibert's various jobs we get a clear glimpse of what life is like for the ordinary working people of Quebec. Working at a shoe factory, for instance, Philibert begins to imagine himself being transformed from a man into a boot. He quits this job as he does so many others, but not before delivering an eloquent appeal to his fellow workers:

"When we get to the Pearly Gates Saint Peter's going to ask us, What did you do with your lives? and we're going to answer, I made boots. If he's got any brains he'll tell us to go straight to hell, because it's one hell of a serious sin, spending your whole life making boots."

Ultimately, Carrier's book ends on a note of despair, not of decisiveness. The possibilities of comradeship and transformation are only glimpsed, not grasped. Yet he has brought us a long way in this trilogy — almost up to the present. And while it is important for people to understand the history that lies behind them, it is also necessary for novelists like Carrier to begin to indicate the kind of history that has yet to be made. That's the challenge that he will now face.

David Frank

Canadian poet ventures into barren novel

Surfacing, by Margaret Atwood. McClelland and Stewart, $6.95

Surfacing demonstrates two aspects of a contemporary paradox. The paradox is seen in the vociferous criticism of present society by certain groups and individuals, contrasted with the feckless existence led by the very individuals loudest in their excursions.

Margaret Atwood, poet turned novelist.

First, the quartet of characters in Surfacing fit this formula perfectly. Second, and at the more important level, Atwood fails to contribute anything artistically. Hence she negates any claim to worthwhile social criticism.

The first three-quarters of the book is a shallow account of four shallow people. The narrator returns to a rustic childhood home with her lover and a married couple. They make trite comment on most of today's popular themes and myths; urban pollution, French-English Canadian relations, American tourists, and many more. The comment is tedious, coming as it does from individuals for whom liberation is to curse and rat and squabble like sewer rats.

Laced with this side of the story are elements of the narrator's past. She was brought up in this Quebec bush setting but left at first opportunity and henceforth evaded her parents. Her mother is dead; her present return was initiated by her father's reported disappearance.

It is these and other incidents that underlie the action of the book's last quarter. The narrator finds primitive sketches that suggest her father's final insanity. Further search however, shows he was studying Indian rock drawings. This leads to covert dives by the narrator in an attempt to find the rocks, now covered by floods. Puzzling events stir some interest in this part of the story, but failure to resolve them leaves this part of the novel as bad as the first. Exactly what revelations the narrator receives are completely obscure.

A work of art is the consideration of some aspect of life, either to clarify it or to present it in some new and profitable perspective. The point is to finish with something that is a degree or two more lucid than what you started with. The narrator says, "I didn't want there to be wars and death, I wanted them not to exist; only rabbits with their colored egg houses, sun and moon orderly above the flat earth, summer always, I wanted everyone to be happy."

Hence the contradiction, one inherent in so much of today's art. Instead of taking the war and death and lesser ills, and producing art that in some small measure re-establishes the order of the sun and moon, too often the artist produces something whose obscurity and distortion renders it worse than its inspiration. Surfacing is such a novel.

Kurelek paints us as surreal city

Toronto's pastoral nooks play against urban blight

If a city is more than a random geometry of streets and buildings, its existence is gauged by our experience of it. The city is different for everyone.

Artist William Kurelek is currently exhibiting his version of our city at the Isaac's Gallery, until October 30 and although a sensation for familiarity will be an important dimension of these paintings to those who share the same geography, all must enter Kurelek's Toronto as strangers.

The artist's previous work has been fundamentally rural, his imagination pastoral. When he applies his talent to the portrayal of a city an inevitable conflict arises: his moralist's rage at materialism and the dehumanization which he sees in urbanized society must accommodate itself to his desire to reveal at least some elements of the city in which he has lived with a degree of compassion.

The result of this double-edged intent is that each work in this series may be classified in two categories in its statement—Kurelek despises the urban, but treasures those scenes within the city that give promise to his pastoral sensibility. The 'urban' work is surreal, verging on the grotesque, whereas the more favourably inspired paintings, such as "Windy Night in Rosedale", make Toronto seem not a city, but a small town.

In his desire to be a humanist Kurelek is at his best. "Belsam Avenue After a Heavy Storm" is perhaps the most successful work of the series, playfully evoking a surging, positive sense of community as the residents of a city street shove themselves out of a snow storm; in their common purpose they have time for an amiability that would not otherwise be permitted in their morning routine. The same vibrant feeling of community is colourfully conveyed in "Hot Day in Kensington Market"—the country fair atmosphere totally obliterates the fact that this is an urban scene.

Typically, Kurelek is drawn to the undeveloped refuges of the city in his most representative work. The pastoral is sought in "Early Spring on the Scarborough Bluffs" and "Indian Summer on the Humber"; even a children's amusement farmyard excites his rural imagination in "Late Summer at Centre Island."

In certain facets of his work Kurelek strives for an ambiguous mystical effect. In this there is the unmistakable influence of London Ontario artist, Jack Chambers. With its diffuse study of direct light, "Foggy Morning at the Beaches" and the intriguing "Cold Water Scene From Ontario Place" (significantly backgrounded by the lake, not the city) come closest to this goal, although he fails to attain complex level of perception.

All the paintings so far mentioned reveal the conflict in seeking the pastoral in an urban zone, but if this tension is inevitable why then paint a Toronto Series? Why not head to the country where he would be most at ease? The answer, I'm afraid, is that Kurelek has a "message" to deliver unto us, and although this flavour is in only one third of the total work, it unavoidably constitutes the main impression of the exhibit.

Kurelek's talents are seriously undermined when his emotions overcome his artistic sensibility. A stern moralist, he rages against the age.

Without control or subtlety his statements descend from art to propaganda. "Our My Lei, The Massacre of Highland Creek presents us with mutilated, dismembered embryos scattered over the pink-tinged snow. The embryos are being dumped from garbage cans labelled "Hospital Waste" and "Scarboro Centennial". Another load is on the way. Absurdly, streaks of red paint stream from the painting itself.

In "We Misapply The Primeval

Commandment" the true pastoral vision is represented as a plateau, the sides of which are being eroded by the horrors of city life—parking lots and television sets. On the plateau, which is situated mythically in the heart of Toronto, Kurelek has etched (to accompany an image of Man and Woman) "Multiply and fill the earth and make it yours."

Christ appears in "Toronto, Toronto" on the steps of Old City Hall unheeded as a hippie leans against the cenotaph and street-car "1984" rolls by. A grim harvest of humanity is reaped in the city imaged as a wall of Yonge Street sexploitation in "He Gloats Over Our Scepticism"

Leaping into an original genre of surrealism the artist produces what is clearly meant to be his vision of the apocalypse, "Harvest of Our Humanism Years"—certainly the most preposterous work of art I have ever seen. A grim flow of refugees streaming to City Hell to die, an H bomb suspended overhead, rampaging students burning "Legislative Authority", a waste land peopled by isolated television sets, hippies being metamorphosed into green snakes, crevices opening to reveal rows of revolutionary lists in salute (the denizens of Hell), the university feeding the holocaust: These are only a few of the mediocre delights offered us in this bizarre panorama.

The "message" paintings (as Kurelek himself refers to them) utterly fall through a lack of complete insight into the numerous issues he seeks to confront simultaneously. As is usual with self proclaimed humanists, he attempts to engage his imagined enemies by dehumanizing them.

Muddled ideas create muddled art. When not wrestling with apocalypse, however, Kurelek succeeds.

The union of the artist and the confused prophet has its unsettling effect; we, the tourists in Kurelek's Toronto, must conclude it to be a schizophrenic, perplexing city. Its rusticity cohabits with its hallucinatory dread.

Gorky transforms nature into cryptogram

The exhibition of over thirty drawings by Arshile Gorky (on display at the Dunkelmann Gallery October 14 to 28), represents a major coup for a private gallery; some of these works have never before been on public display. Gorky, transplanted from his native Armenia to America in 1920, forms the link between Picasso, European Surrealism and Abstract Expressionism. The show, which covers 20 years of his work, allows us to witness the struggle of this painter as he tries to emancipate himself from the influence of the European masters.

In certain drawings, such as Untitled No.5 Cubist devices are much in evidence. Interlocking complexes of curved shapes occupy the same type of space that typifies a late 1920's Picasso. Yet it is also apparent in this piece that there has been an abandonment of the Cubist reference to real objects. Instead we are faced with oscillating organic shapes, reminiscent of the biomorphic image then employed by Arp and Miro. These paintings are crucial for Gorky's later development. As a result of this period of Cubist discipline, the freest of the later paintings retain a sense of order.

In 1940 there was a turning point two of the drawings, No. 14 and 15, a haunting imagery appears, that is almost compulsive in nature. The embryonic protuberances, and piercing eyelots produce a disturbing tension and we feel that Gorky is just on the edge of a major discovery.

Gorky's untitled No. 5.

And in fact, after 1940 his previously repressed emotion seems to be released and fully expressed in the pieces. The catalyst may have been the summers Gorky spent in those years in the Virginian countryside drawing in the fields.

For what is most exciting in these later drawings is the combination of nature and abstraction.

Nature is apprehended in such a way that its structure becomes expressive of Gorky's own psychic pressures and processes. For example, what begins as a simple floral shape in one of the pictures, quickly becomes overgrown with new layers of meaning and association.

Suddenly the flower is transformed into a strange soft organism, with suggestions of bodily parts, intestinal folds and sharp toothlike projections, all softly pulsating among abstract planes and colors. As Andre Breton has commented, for the first time Nature appears to the artist as a cryptogram.

purchases space in the memory. Jules and Jim improves every year. Catch-22, on the other hand, not only failed but wasted some of the richest ground a movie might have occupied. (Film rights work so that no-one else can get a crack at it for a generation, and even then it is dicey.)

Even the ambitious pictures that succeed all demand some forgiving. You overlook the schmaltz in Fiddler, the plot devices of The Go-Between, the lumbering parallels in Cebaref, the camera tricks in Midnight Cowboy. The bestbig movies are great but always a little rough, never quite as clean as the good little movies.

The trouble with good little movies is, of course, they are so small. They rarely thrill, which is what movies do best. Art is boring like the art gallery. Movies are fun like Saturday afternoon. Ask me who is the best-ever director and I can answer "Truffau" without even having to form the thought. But that doesn't stop me wishing that he made pictures just a bit more like The Guns of Neverone. Sounder, at the Hollywood, is not like The Guns of Neverone either, but it is good, clean, perfect and, what makes it so special, it is also thrilling. Tick off the categories: John Alonzo's photography, Martin Ritt's direction, Taj Mahel's music, the script by Lon Eider III, and the acting, particularly Cicely Tyson as a sharecropper's wife holding together farm, family and self while her husband goes to jail. All are first-rate. A movie this good leaves little to say. The thrilling moments will be apparent when it is seen, without a guide.

The one note that might be added, however, is that Sounder is a general release or "family" picture. The book it is taken from is a children's story; producer Radnitz' previous films are A Dog of Flanders, Mysty and The Little Ark — children's movies. With Sounder, Radnitz and Ritt challenge the marketeers' assumption that the general public demands the bad art and the pointless stories foisted on it in its own name. This family film pulls no punches, social or aesthetic.

Sounder chestizes not only smug executives, but also smug artists. Too much heavy-handedness has been excused as "reaching the public", too much failure of nerve has gone down in the name of sophistication (or, less charitably, snobbishness). No-one is saying that production of sophisticated pictures for specialized audiences (say, Sunday, Bloody Sunday) should cease, but too many have been saying the opposite: that there can be no such thing as mass art. There can be. Sounder, for example.

Amateur theatrics. A million laughs. Two million tears. There was the time I had to wear penny hose to imitate an eighteenth century peasant's stockings. Half an hour before curtain time the costume mistress decided to wash them. I went on freezing cold and soaking wet to the waist. The audience must have wondered why my teeth were chattering in the middle of a sunny town square.

New Hart House Theatre boss prods reel talent there.

This mishap is the type of thing you chortle over in your dotage, sipping port before the fire. It's considerably more serious when the director of a production drops out two weeks into a five week rehearsal schedule. This is what happened to The Misanthrope, the play that opened the season at Hart House Theatre last night. New York made director Donald Davies an offer he couldn't refuse and by mutual agreement, left for the greener pastures of the south.

Fortunately, Hart House was able to come up with another director on short notice, John Wood, a man of considerable and varied theatrical experience. Since his graduation from Bishop's University in 1961, he has sung in summer stock, acted in several repertory companies in England, produced public affairs radio programs for the CBC, and worked behind the scenes in a variety of capacities for companies several including the Royal Shakespeare, the Manitoba Theatre Centre and the Shaw Festival. His most recent directorial experience was the staging of the children's musical, Pinocchio, for Stratford's Third Stage.

John Wood in person is a cool drink of water who looks much younger than his 34 years. He wears blue jeans over cowboy boots and a blue denim shirt with a suede vest that give him a decidedly western appearance. In fact, he moved to Calgary only last year from his native Toronto. He still retains his eastern accent along with a mop of curly black hair and a neatly trimmed beard.

Wood appears to be completely calm about assuming control of a major production almost half way through rehearsals. He says, "There isn't enough time to do a play like this even with five hours of rehearsal a day, five days a week for the full period. I've gone back and simplified things, reblocked some of the stuff. The real difficulty is with the language of the play.

"It's made up of incredibly long speeches. There can be a tendency to harangue the audience so we're working with the text as long as possible to counteract this."

Of his inherited cast of 11, Wood has replaced only one. "I'm very pleased with the cast. They're a little amateur in that they're inexperienced. That shows up in comparison to professional actors but they understand the play and they're learning to perform in this kind of play. There are a couple who, if they worked their asses off, could really make it."

Wood is unusual among professional directors in that he is as much interested in the educational process of the production as he is in the end product.

"It's important that the Drama Centre (the graduate department that is the ruling body of the Hart House Theatre) do things like this. Where else will students get the opportunity to investigate a text in this manner. Half of our rehearsal time was spent in talking about what it means. After all, there are five weeks of rehearsal but only ten days of performance.

Despite this interest in meaning, Wood promises a very theatrical performance. He is a professional and feels that it is ideal to have a few professionals around.

"People's attitudes become more professional and their work becomes more professional. A person working in the theatre goes about doing a play differently from an academic. I find academic theatre very boring. If you have an academic production, it's not really theatrical."

The Misanthrope will be reviewed in Monday's Varsity.

Mark Volman and Howard Kaylan (The Phlorescent Leech and Eddie) could never have been accused of taking their music too seriously at Massey Hall last Wednesday. The band, through its spontaneous and irreverent wit made humour seem as natural and integral a component of the rock concert formule as the inevitable decibel din.

Volman and Kaylan, both currently providing the lead vocals in Frank Zappa's zany Mothers were aided on stage by two other Mothers fugitives, drummer Aynsley Dunbar and Moog and keyboard men, Don Preston. But the music was usually secondary to the fun by choice or by chance as Volman, fuzzy haired, bespectacled and fat of frame, dominated the stage from the first note. With his chest and tummy bared he scattered barbs at all the super self-righteous rock groups, doing split-leaps in the air and playing his guitar in a parodied windmill-style of The Who's Peter Townsend.

The vocal combination of Kaylan and Volman was more distinct and penetrating than their album sound. In fact, they sound more like reincarnations of their old alma mater, The Turtles, on the Flo and Eddie album, than they did on stage. When you could get your attention away from the magnetic Mark Volman, Dunbar's drums and Preston's Moog were clearly musical pearls.

Most of the songs presented were from the group's recently released first album and were unfamiliar to the audience, though that didn't seem to matter who had come to see the headlining English band, Wishbone Ash (they were mediocre and boring). The group finished with the Turtle hit Eleanor and was recalled for an encore. Encores are rare for a warm-up act but Kaylan and Volman are rare even for this purpose.

The Downchild Blues Band, with the special addition of four horn players, will be hosting a concert at the St. Lawrence Centre tomorrow night at 8 pm. The Toronto group will be introducing famed American blues artist, Robert Junior Lockwood at the performance. Lockwood is the son-in-law of blues great Robert Johnson, and two duet albums with the late Otis Spann to his credit. An added attraction is the weird (but wonderful) singer and guitarist, Leon Redbone. Tickets are $3 in advance (available at Grossman's Tavern, 379 Spadina) and $3.50 at the door.

Toronto's newest TV station, CITY-TV, channel 79 (cable 7), broadcasts a show on Sundays at 8 pm devoted to folk and rock music. The taping sessions provide an opportunity for some free entertainment. The program is taped on Sunday afternoons from 3 to 4 pm. An audience of 50 persons is allowed into the studio (99 Queen St. East) at 2:30 pm. This week's guest is Dr. Music.

At Grumbles, 71 Jarvis above King (368-0796), entertainment abounds tonight and tomorrow with the appearance of The Good Brothers and Le Troupe Grottesque. Canadian folksinger, Veldy is next week's headliner. Admission is $2.50.

The lowest priced folk club in town is still Fiddler's Green, near Yonge and Eglington (489-3001) A Ceildh (musical gathering of friends) is planned for tonight. Admission is only $1.

Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee are held over at the Riverboat, 134 Yorkville (922-6216), until Sunday. Next Week: the English singing duo of Robin Williamson and Mika Haron, better known as the Incredible String Band. Admission is $3.50.

Bruce Cockburn, brings his personalized brand of gentle, wooden songs to the Massey Hall stage, Sunday at 8 pm. Tickets are $3 to $5.

The dates for the two Cat Stevens concerts are November 11 and 12. Although tickets are steeply priced at $4 to $7 they will probably be snapped up quickly. Mail orders are now being accepted at Massey Hall and tickets go on sale at the usual locations on Monday.

Andre Segovia said of English guitarist John Mills, "his playing shows musical sensitivity, and purity of technique". The Guitar Society of Toronto is hosting him in a concert at the Unitarian Church $2 for students, at the door, or phone 487-0536. It's tomorrow at 8:30 pm. The Faculty of music is proudly displaying their progyny in what is billed as a concert of ensembles — a variety of instruments in various combinations. This will be in the MacMillan Theatre at 2 pm Thursday afternoon. The second of Hart House's Sunday Evening Concerts is to be held October 22 and features the Czech String Quartet, which is to return after Christmas for a six-part series exposing the development of the string quartet through their choice of works — from Haydn to Janacek. This Sunday's program is Mozart's quartet in G Major, K 387, Beethoven's opus 95 and Ravel's quartet in F major.

Baritone Victor Braun will sing Die Winterreise at the Town Hall, October 23, accompanied by Paul Helmer. I'm glad someone wants to sing Schubert's famous song cycle after (and before history-in-making recordings of it have been made by Dietrich Fischer-Discgau. Tickets are $3.50 and $4.50, which are a bit steep to my mind for the Town Hall, only because we have come to expect first-rate artistry, often Canadian, at lower prices. Phone, 366-7723.

The United Church Choirs Festival takes place, by the way, this Sunday at Metro United Church at 7:30 pm.

Scarborough Collage is hosting an impressive series of fall concerts. The first is this Sunday at 3:30 pm and admission is free. The Chamber Players of Toronto are the attraction. Their program is works by Boccherini, Vivaldi and Canadian composer and radio producer, Irving Glick. The guest artist is Chrisopher Wealf and he will play the Fasch Bassoon Concerto.

Old Play? New House. Sean O'Casey's 1926 play about the Irish Rebellion, The Plough and the Stars, opens the University Alumnae Dramatic Club's first season at its new permanent home, the Firehall Theatre, 70 Berkeley Street at Adelaide. When first presented in Dublin, there were riots in the Abbey Theatre because the flash than art, their Sunday series of French and American classics is terrific. It appears to be necessary to buy a season ticket at $3 for the remaining 16 films, available at the door. This Sunday it is Jean Renoir's La Grande Illusion. 7:30 and 9:30 pm.

Also this week: Sunday at 2 pm at the Revue there is Alexandre Nevsky, Eisenstein's classic with score by Prokofiev. $2, or less if you buy tickets for other films in the Sunday afternoon great directors series.

Monday the Roxo shows Milos Forman's shot at America, Taking Off. It is tairer to the kids then to the parents, but still keeps the Czech gangliness. Very tunny. 99¢ at 7:30 and 9:30 pm.

And this week, Cinemalumiere endad the reparatory policy it pioneered in Toronto. Thanks to Bob Hubar.

Ontario Institute for Studies in Education: The story goes that when they were finishing OISE, they had an excess of tinted glass, so they used some for the projection booth windows. I checked, and, sure enough, there was the source of the bluish look OISE movies seem to have. The screen image is fuzzy as well, to say nothing of the sound, as if the projector can't quite make it to the other end of the hall. The Go-Between, sharp and bleached at the York, came out hazy, and, in Accident, shot largely at night, faces were constantly lost to the shadows. The solution would be to schedule twice as many showings and only use the upper half of the auditorium. Unless this is done, we don't recommend screenings at OISE: the film is almost sure to turn up somewhere more sympathetic to it, and we will let you know.

The Avenue Cinema, on the other hand, is a lovely little place. It is housed in the old Silent Cinema, and Brian, who fekas tickets, runs the projector, books the films and cleans up, makes it quite cozy. He'll hold the film a couple minutes for you if you really must smoke. Coming up is Scarlet Pimpernal double bill. This week it's Bogart and Lupino in High Sierra, plus Bogart and Bacall in The Big Sleep. $2.

And, not to be outdone, the Roxo 99¢ impressarios are getting into door prizes and give-aways, like the free beef stroganoff (Lipton's) served at the showing of War and Peace. They promise free pumpkins to the first one hundred on Hallowe'en, but I am holding out for an intermission yo-yo contest.

Nota: we still welcome notes, complaints, letters, alternative reviews. Is anybody out there?

Stephen Hogbin, a young artist from England, is showing an exhibit of recent works at the Craft Gallery until October 28. An award-winning craftsman, Mr. Hogbin has also taught at Sheridan School of Design and the College of Education since coming to Canada, in addition to his freelance work.

These recent works strongly reflect natural forms, the individual pieces echoing organic shapes. An interesting method is used to achieve this affect. The pieces are turned on a lathe, cut into cross-sections, and reassembled, so you see the action through the cross-section of the piece, and complex structural inlining forms are created with the grain working in several directions. Other pieces are crafted of formed metals and plastics.

John Mettar is a Guelph artist employing traditional techniques in an exhibition of paintings, drawings and prints at Erindale. William Kort's prints are still at the college and the 3000 Years of Chinese Art closes on October 25. At Herf House, William Wood's little drawings are on show to October 29. We feature an article on the Kurelek exhibit of Isaacs Gallery this week, and the paintings are there until October 30.

For scrapes by Trin 13-12 in Division II football

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Forestry barely escaped a fourth quarter charge to scuttle Trinity 13-12 in Division II football Wednesday.

In the first half, Trinity scored first on a short run to complete a sustained drive. However, the team missed an important convert when the ball bounced off the crossbar.

Late in the second quarter, Forestry capitalized on a Trinity fumble to establish good field position, and on the next play, connected on a 34 yard touchdown bomb.

Trinity, down 7-6 just missed tying it on the last play of the half with a quick kick.

In the second half, both teams bogged down in centrefield with a succession of fumbles, interceptions, and turnovers. Trinity began to sag noticeably as the Forestry offence improved.

Finally, Vierra out-duced two Trinity defenders in the end zone to snare his second long touchdown pass to hand Forestry a 13-6 lead. A determined Trinity rush hocked the convert.

In the last three minutes of the game, Trin gambled on third down but lost their long yardage on a fumble near the Forestry goal-line. Forestry could not advance and had to punt. When their kicker hobbled the ball Trinity's Coster stole it and fled untouched to score.

With less than a minute to play, and down 13-12, Trinity gambled on a 2 point convert, and tried to run it over. Forestry flattened the play a foot short of the line, and then ran out the clock for the win.

Trinity's record is now one win and two losses, while Forestry has a 2-1 total.

Queen's University is the centre for university sports in Ontario this weekend in honour of homecoming. The weekend will be highlighted by a sudden death "semi-playoff" football elimination of either the Gaels or the Blues. Both teams are tied with the Ottawa Gee-Gees for first place. Should Ottawa lose to Carleton this weekend in Ottawa, Toronto would be in first place and the eastern playoff would be at Varsity Arena next Saturday between Queen's and U of T. If Ottawa and Toronto capture the two top positions, the elimination game will be played next Saturday in Ottawa.... For those unable to be in Kingston for the game, Radio Varsity is broadcasting live from Kingston starting at 2 p.m. RV is 820 AM in residence, and 96.3 FM on Rogers Cable FM.... After picking the Blues to finish third in the Eastern Section this season, I'm ready to eat my printed words should the team finish in first place.... in Western Section football this weekend McMaster is at Guelph, York visits Waterloo, and Western hosts Lutheran.... Waterpolo is scheduled to begin at 1 p.m.

tomorrow in Queen's Physical Education Centre.... Queen's also hosts an OUAA Judo Invitational on the weekend.... Queen's is also hosting a Sr. Invitational field hockey tournament this weekend. Teams from McMaster, Toronto, Guelph, Waterloo, Laurentian and Queen's will participate in the two-day competition which begins this afternoon at 3 p.m. on Queen's west campus. U of T finished first last year, with Waterloo second and Queen's third. The results should be closer this year. Toronto has lost several players through graduation, and Waterloo's Athenas have a good record so far this season. On Thanksgiving weekend the Waterloo team played eight games in four days, winning five and tying one against United States teams. The match will be important for the Toronto squad, since the team has not been defeated in field hockey since the association was formed. Queen's has a 4-2 win-loss record so far this season.... The U of T women's archery team shivered and shot their way to a narrow OWIAA victory last weekend, defeating Queen's 3953 to 3838 in the Outdoor Championships at Guelph. U of T's Anne Chalmers (currently Canadian women's champion) won the individual competition with a score of 1106. Queen's Janet Spence was second with 1062. The OWIAA Indoor Championships are slated for Queen's January 26-27.... In the OWIAA tennis finals at Queen's last weekend U of T finished first with 38 points, followed by McMaster, 26. Western, 20, York/Waterloo, 16, Carleton/Laurentian, 10, and Queen's 10. In the individual events, Anke Bonsels (York) won the first singles, while Toronto's Kathy Morton won the second singles. Toronto's Vera Koman and Anne Marie Lyn won the first doubles, while Charlotte Heinrich and Mary-Margaret Fox won the second doubles. This makes three years in a row that the Toronto team has won the championship.... interfaculty basketball has been delayed again this year. Because the Hart House gym is being used for interfaculty lacrosse, the basketball practices are severely restricted.... Curling is also finding it rough to organize this year. The only available hours left open at Varsity Arena are after midnight.... Western won its second consecutive championship in the second annual Head of Trent rowing regatta in Peterborough last weekend. In the open club event, two teams from Toronto's Argonauts rowing club placed second and third. The single sculls competition was taken by John Tise followed by Jim Stewart and Chris Leach of Trent.... Interfaculty/Volleyball got under way this week, with enough teams for two divisions. Division I will consist of teams from Knox, Eng I, Dent, Med A, Erin, PHE.

Erin topples Eng 11-3

Engineering's Munro (9) stops Erindale's Geraghty (2) from scoring in Division II game last night. Erindale remains undefeated this season, while the luckless Engineers are winless.

Will Blues be Gael-licked?

By PAUL CARSON

It's an old script with a new setting as the football Blues and Queen's Golden Gaels settle the muddled OUAA Eastern Section playoff picture tomorrow in Kingston.

Every year since Varsity's last championship in 1967, the Blues and Gaels have gone down to the wire and resolved either the league championship or a playoff berth in one key game and Blues have lost every time. Last season was perhaps the most painful as Varsity blew a 16-point lead before eventually falling 28-25.

Blues should be rated the favorite on the basis of their earlier 46-18 triumph; however, Varsity always has trouble winning big games in Kingston, first in the old Richardson Stadium and now on the rebuilt field near the Queen's College of Education.

Varsity can advance to the playoffs with either a win or a tie; barring a Carleton upset over Ottawa Gee-Gees, the Gaels will need a victory. With Varsity, Queens and Ottawa locked in that three-way tie for first place with identical 3-2 records, any one of the teams can be first or out of the playoffs after tomorrow's action.

Coach Ron Murphy will undoubtedly stick with the explosive shotgun offence that produced 380 passing yards in the earlier Queen's game. Blues had a suitable running attack from the standard formations at the beginning of the season but little has been seen of it during the past three games. Quarterback Wayne Dunkley has been throwing about 45 passes per game and using the running formations only on obvious short yardage situations.

Blues certainly won't have the element of surprise with the shotgun that was so effective in past games; Gaels have now seen it three times and lost twice, so Frank Tindall will definitely have a special defense ready.

A Queen's publicity release this week predicted "if the Gaels can get good pressure on Dunkley in the shotgun, they can beat him, particularly if the offense makes Toronto respect its passing game."

Gaels have good reason for optimism in quarterback Tom Taylor, an accomplished passer, and flanker/split end Stu Lang — one of the finest receivers in college football.

In poor effort, Soccer Blues defeat Brock 2-1

In their poorest effort of the season the soccer Blues defeated Brock 2-1 Wednesday in St. Catharines. Blues' constant pressure during the first ten minutes of play was the only time the team showed its true calibre.

From that point on the pace changed to a slow walk, with the ball going up and down the field to no one in particular. The weather conditions — snow and freezing temperatures — may have had some effect on the erratic play and lack of effort by the Blues, but it seemed their attitude of "Let's get the game over with and go home" was also a reason.

This attitude almost cost the Blues the game.

In the first half the Toronto squad had several good chances to score, mostly from dead ball situations. One, free kick by Phil Oldfield, rebounded to Bruno Bruni whose shot was deflected for a corner. Guiseppe D'Antoni had several opportunities, breaking in from left wing, but was unable to find the net on his shots.

Blues' first goal came after thirty minutes of play. Bruno Bruni took a low hard shot on a free kick. Brock goalkeeper John Jones had the ball bounce off his chest over his head, the Blues' striker Ian Harris was there to blast the ball home.

Immediately after half-time Brock came back. On a Brock throw in, Blues centre backs John Cobby and Herb Dubsky moved away from the centre to join Ed Carter on right wing. The ball bounced difficultly on the wet ground, and a Brock forward spurred by, leaving all three defenders standing.

Brock's luck at this time seemed great, with three Toronto defenders making gross mistakes. But more was still to come.

The Brock winger, with two players to pass to, played the ball to Blues left back Bob Cazzola who left the ball for goalkeeper Jack Brand who also left the ball for Brock forward John Koosistra who put the ball in the net.

However, all was not lost. Midway through the second half a Brock defender (obviously feeling sorry for the Blues) decided to hit the ball with his hands in the penalty area to give away a penalty shot. Bruno Bruni unhesitatingly blasted the ball into the corner of the net.

After this goal the Blues withstood what could be considered the Brock attack and came out with a win.

Officiating was the usual for out of town games. Both linesmen were unaware of the rules, and nowhere near the play. On one occasion a goal by the Blues was disallowed by the referee on the grounds that the ball was kicked out of the goalkeeper's hands. Since the goalkeeper was six feet away at the time, he must have had very long hands.

Tomorrow is a decisive game for the Blues. They meet McMaster at Varsity Stadium at 1 pm. The winner of this game is assured of first place in the OUAA Western Section. Hopefully Blues will put a little more effort in this game than they did Wednesday.

Trin beats For in 2 games

Trinity defeated Forestry B last night in two straight games 15-5, and 15-6 in Division II play. The game was interrupted briefly to retrieve the ball which had rolled down the track and dropped into the lacrosse game below. Hmm, how large is that gym?

Lawyer pressures Ottawa to make quick decision on Meszaros' case

By DOROTHY WIGMORE

Two motions in the continuing story of the immigration department's attempts to prevent Hungarian professor Istvan Meszaros from working in Canada will be heard today.

One is a defense motion to quash an inquiry into the status of Meszaros, who was hired to teach at York University and then refused landed immigrant status.

The other is a government motion to dismiss the application for a writ of mandamus recently made by Meszaros' lawyer, Paul Copeland. The writ would force the government to make a quick decision on the professor's application for landed immigrant status made in Canada after his arrival here September 19.

Ordinary proceedings could mean a decision on granting Meszaros landed immigrant status would take a long time. Both Copeland and Meszaros claim this long wait is part of a subtle government tactic to psychologically discourage the professor.

The government wants to stop the application because Meszaros' lawyer refused to submit him to cross-examination on October 16 before Ivan Whitehall of the civil litigation section of the federal department of justice. Copeland had earlier agreed to the cross-examination on the basic facts of Meszaros' application as submitted in an affidavit October 6.

At that time, the hearing on the writ of mandamus was put off until today, following the application, also made on October 6.

Copeland refused to let Meszaros be cross-examined because just before proceedings began, the professor was served with an appointment for collateral deportation proceedings. In view of this action by the government, he said the cross-examination should not proceed because the government would have an unfair advantage in the deportation inquiry.

The collateral deportation proceedings were launched to determine if Meszaros was a bone-fide visitor when he entered Canada.

The inquiry began Thursday, but Copeland and Meszaros walked out of the proceedings before they began. Copeland had filed a motion to quash the directive ordering the inquiry, and therefore said Meszaros should not submit to the inquiry before this motion was heard.

The motion to quash the inquiry, will be heard today with two others.

The government has filed a motion to dismiss the writ application because Meszaros refused to be cross-examined October 16. The inquiry itself is also to continue today.

Copeland plans to start with the motion to quash the inquiry. If he is successful, Meszaros will be cross-examined before the hearing on the writ of mandamus application is held. If he fails, the writ application is invalid and proceedings will continue with the government's inquiry into Meszaros' status when he entered the country.

Ironically, today is the 16th anniversary of the Hungarian uprising, in which Meszaros was active as a leading intellectual and defender of civil rights. He fled the country when the Russian Stalinists regained power.

Meszaros applied March 24 to the Canadian High Commission in London for landed immigrant status but was refused in a letter July 24. On September 19, he flew to Toronto as a visitor and launched a new application through the Orillia immigration office.

The professor was refused landed immigrant status for unknown "security" reasons. The government has so far refused to specify what security risk Meszaros is.

He has taught in British universities since 1959 and has held British citizenship since 1965. Earlier, he had been cleared by both British and Italian security following his departure from Hungary.

Meszaros has stated he came to Canada to force the government to open his case and clear his name. If he leaves the country before a decision is made on his application to remain here, there can be no appeal. However, if he is still here, he can make appeals up to the Supreme Court. Immigration Minister Bryce Mackasey is now reviewing the application for landed immigrant status.

Support for Meszaros is increasing across the country. Academics have appealed to Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and Mackasey to either reconsider the charge Meszaros is a security risk, or to substantiate the claim.

York professors will demonstrate outside York's Keele Street gate to day while Meszaros is in court. They are meeting off campus at noon to dramatize the fact the professor cannot appear on campus without risking charges of working for York in contravention of immigration laws.

Besides the demonstration, a faculty meeting last Tuesday decided a delegation of senior faculty will meet with York president David Slater to press for a public announcement of strong support for Meszaros within the York community.

Slater personally appealed to Mackasey on October 4 to make a special investigation of the case. Two days later, he wrote Meszaros saying he thought the professor's best chances for exoneration and permission to stay in Canada would come through a direct appeal to the minister.

Professors at York and the University of Toronto sent a letter in September to Mackasey asking for a "comprehensive review" of the case in light of Meszaros' anti-Stalinist actions in the 1956 Hungarian uprising and his subsequent security clearance by both Italian and British officials. It was signed by seven U of T and 14 York faculty members.

The University of British Columbia executive faculty association is also considering protesting to Mackasey in the name of the Canadian Association of University Teachers Committee of Academic Freedom and Tenure. UBC associate history professor Jan Bak, a colleague of Meszaros in Budapest, personally sent a petition with 30 names to Mackasey in early October and since then has added at least another 50 names to it.

Workers, U of T reach agreement: strike averted

By PAUL McGRATH

A strike by University of Toronto cleaning and maintenance workers was narrowly averted this weekend when workers voted to accept a contract that was negotiated just a few hours before.

The workers, members of the Service Employee's International Union, Local 204, voted 334-35 Saturday to accept the last-minute agreement worked out Friday night between U of T and union negotiators.

Negotiations had been unsuccessful until Friday's session and a further stalemate would have meant a strike vote by the union members. At that time the union was asking for 20 per cent, 66 cents for heavy cleaners, over a two-year period, and the university was offering 40 cents to the heavy cleaners.

Late Friday night the university negotiators agreed to the 20 per cent raise, and the strike was avoided.

The settlement increases the basic wage for service workers (cleaning and heavy labour) to $3.75 over two years, and provides for equal pay for men and women in the same job category.

Light cleaners' wages will go from $2.45 to $2.97 in 1974, while shipping supervisors wages will rise to $5.02 per hour.

The first phase of the increase, 10 per cent, is retroactive to last June 30, when the previous contract expired. This gives each member of the union an average of $200.

The contract also provides for job security among the cleaning staff by insuring that any of the local's 770 workers laid off due to the contracting out of work by the university be retrained in another job with equal pay. As recently as this summer, the university was planning to contract work out to commercial firms to save money.

The security clause in the new contract makes this economically impossible during the life of the contract.

Free uniforms, job-vacancy posting and a meal allowance are also provided for in the contract.

Don Barclay, head negotiator for the union, conducted the union meeting, describing each clause to the workers. However, there are at least five different languages spoken among the union members, and getting an idea across seemed to be extremely difficult.

"Some of these people don't know whether they're getting a good deal or not," commented a union steward.

Barclay added, "some of those no votes may have been people who thought they were voting against a strike rather than for ratification."

The workers appeared happy with the agreement as they left the auditorium, most with smiles on their faces.

"It beats a strike anyway," said one.

Some still had grievances to air. One worker outside the auditorium complained to Barclay that the university had cut his staff from ten to four men, and the work load had increased.

"You get paid for eight hours and you work eight hours. If there's work left over and they start pressuring, tell them to forget it," Barclay replied.

Another complained about the increase in his duties and said, compared to two years ago, the floor space he had to clean had been doubled.

"It works out I'm doing the work of two men," he said.

He added that workers were often afraid they would lose their jobs if they complained about conditions to the union steward.

University officials were relieved at avoiding what could have been a long strike.

Vice-president of Business Affairs Alex Rankin said last night: "We haven't had a strike in 20 years, and when you look at them you notice that before the workers strike, a few cents is important. But once they're on strike, it tends to polarize them, and it takes a lot more than a few cents to get them back together again."

Comparing the settlement to other standards, he said that the agreement brings pay up to the average for similar work in the city.

"Looking at the community pattern, the university is not at the rear, although it is certainly not at the front," he said.

To better the worker's bargaining power, the union plans to run representatives in university elections. They already have plans for elections in Scarborough College.

Barclay would like to see more workers in the union. He thinks there are still a few groups around the campus that need union bargaining power, specifically the secretaries. In their last negotiation with the university, they settled for a 5.75 per cent wage increase, he said.

"Basic wage for them is $2.40," says Barclay. "They could do a lot better than that."
