Hart House served with Caesar salad in protest by UFW

By MIKE EDWARDS

Upset by the very slack policy of Hart House regarding the serving of California lettuce, supporters of the United Farm Workers gave away a salad of their own.

About 25 students and faculty supporters of the UFW grape and lettuce boycott made up a salad from romaine lettuce, spinach and parsley and gave it away outside Hart House's Arbor Room at lunchtime on Wednesday. The material was all purchased at Loblaws.

Hart House has no official stand on the buying of grapes or lettuce, according to Hart House Board of Stewards secretary, Carman Guild.

In a later interview Guild said that they try to be "good citizens" and thus there is a policy to specify to suppliers that they only buy UFW lettuce.

When questioned on the discovery of "tainted" goods in the kitchen last Friday, Guild said he had no idea where the crates of California and Arizona lettuce came from.

He said Hart House also tries to buy Ontario greenhouse lettuce since it is fresher.

Hart House food services director Rosemary Bolitho, who came out to talk to the students at the free salad table, was more specific on why Hart House bothers to get iceberg lettuce in the first place.

"Iceberg lettuce has better holding qualities so that the salad plates can be made up three hours before the meal," she said.

"If the salad looks limp and flat, no one would buy it," she asserted.

Bolitho was also sensitive at being "screamed at" if the salad was not available, although she did admit that salads are not served daily.

Meanwhile the UFW cooks outside were getting compliments for their Caesar's Salad."

Lupe Gamboa, a farmworker and Toronto city area co-ordinator for the UFW, confronted Bolitho at the salad table.

"I am amazed that the U of T, which is supposed to be a centre of learning, should take such a backward attitude," he said. He referred to the wide range of support for the boycott and the quick action of City Hall in removing lettuce from their cafeterias.

Gamboa is willing to speak to the Hart House board of stewards when it meets Nov. 7.

The first law of economics was broken yesterday in farmworkers' salad giveaway.

Erindale council boycotted

By AMANDA HANSON

The Students' Administrative Government of Erindale (SAGE) voted Oct. 23 to boycott the Erindale College Council (ECC) until the ECC's power is clearly defined and expanded.

The ECC is an advisory body to the Erindale principal. All faculty members are eligible to sit on the council and this year 65 students also have seats.

SAC Erindale representative Peter Henderson said SAGE will refuse to seat students on any ECC committee until a more "meaningful participation" in the administration of the college is secured.

Henderson said student representatives on the ECC committees do not wield sufficient power to ensure passage of any resolutions because of the principal's veto.

SAGE is organizing a campaign to publicize their decision and the reasons for it to the Erindale student body. So far, SAGE has only sent a letter to Robinson explaining the reason for the boycott, but Henderson says no reply has been received.

The basic problem went back to a specific incident last spring, said Henderson, when Erindale principal A. E. Robinson vetoed a student and faculty proposal that the college basketball team withdraw from the U of T interfaculty league and join the intercollegiate league.

Robinson has also vetoed other legislation, said Henderson, and this power was "not terribly good from the standpoint of progressive change."

Robinson said in a telephone interview last night that the boycott was based on a "misunderstanding."

Robinson defended himself against Henderson's claims that he had jettisoned Erindale's application to the OUA last spring, saying he had supported the proposal.

"What I did tell them was how difficult it was," said Robinson. He noted the rest of the university would have had to support Erindale's application and it wasn't forthcoming.

Robinson said he still supported an independent basketball team contract but the idea seemed to have died this year, even though he had encouraged the team to submit a proposed budget and engage in exhibition games.

Robinson also said it was a misconception that he was against students.

"I would like to see more student involvement in Erindale—the more the better," Robinson said.

By CIM NUNN

Ministry of colleges and universities parliamentary assistant Harry Parrott refused to say yesterday what action the government would take when reviewing the U of T Act.

Parrott's comment was made in reply to a question from the floor at yesterday's University Affairs Forum at Scarborough College, where Parrott was substituting for Colleges and Universities Minister James Auld.

Auld and Liberal MPP James Bullbrook were unable to fulfill their commitments to attend yesterday's forum.

New Democratic Party MPP Floyd Laughren was the other speaker at the meeting.

The event attracted only 20 people, who asked perhaps a half-dozen questions.

Laughren told the audience the campus scene "is too quiet" about such issues as the Ontario Student Awards Program (OSAP), fees and student parity.

He said if he were made minister tomorrow he would abolish tuition fees and raise the graduated income tax scale "one notch" to make up for it.

Parrott waived his opportunity to speak, saying he would rather field questions from the audience.

Laughren asked how the U of T Act would be dealt with when it came up in the House, and in particular with respect to student parity.

But Laughren did not deal with the question until a student put the question to Parrott near the end of the session.

Parrott replied that because he did not know what the government's policy would be he could not speculate at this time.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch asked Parrott if he considered the $32 per week allotted for room and board by OSAP to be adequate.

Parrott said it was unfair to take statistics out of context, and asked Kanowitch to "consider not only the whole package but other aspects of society."

He admitted that OSAP has inadequacies as well as advantages, but hastened to add these were his own views, and not a party stance.

The Governing Council's admissions and awards sub-committee passed motions this week protesting inadequacy of the present $32 a week allowance for students under the OSAP plan, expressing disappointment that the ministry has not authorized a rate increase for this year.

The OSAP allowances have also been the focus of a protest campaign by the Ontario Federation of Students, and the majority of Ontario university awards officers have recommended an increase to at least $40 a week.

Parrott defended government appointments to the U of T Governing Council, claiming they were the best cross-section available.

However, Laughren said Ontario university governing bodies were representative of "Tory Ontario, and that's all."

Answering a question regarding improved study and library facilities at Scarborough College, Parrott explained that, outside supplemental grants, any additional funds to one university or college meant less to another.

Laughren concluded by saying he was "disappointed" with Parrott and stated Parrott's answers had been "loaded with contradictions and back-tracking."

"We have to commit ourselves," replied Parrott, "but I would like the chance once to be a critic."

SAC starts games fund

SAC decided Tuesday to allot $2,000 of their contingency funds to a campaign for better services on campus and particularly their fight for a pub and games room.

The money will go to support a clip-out coupon campaign to demonstrate student support for the need for a pub and games room.

SAC vice-president Tim Buckley said it is becoming obvious the administration is blocking the proposals because it doesn't think there is significant support for them.

But SAC communications commissioner Michael Sabia said the administration just doesn't put a priority on services. "They want to sit down and drink tea and say isn't this pleasant SAC wants a games room," he added.

When Innis SAC rep George Huczek questioned whether it was important enough to grant the money, Sabia replied it was necessary if the council "wants to do something for students."

The contentious issue of SAC's position on the appeals of SDS members Tony Leah and Bill Schabas, who were suspended for preventing controversial urbanologist Edward Banfield from speaking last March, was again deferred.

The executive, however, has recommended a three-part position, reaffirming its support of freedom of speech and the illegitimacy of the Caput, but only suggesting that black marks be removed from the two former students' records.

The executive motion does not support overturning the conviction or reducing the sentences which were three and four year suspensions.

The council also heard reports on two major campaigns for parity on tenure committees and on Governing Council. Both will continue despite recent setbacks.

SAC executive assistant Chris Allnut said that although students had not got parity on Governing Council, the 11 students and 13 faculty split was one of the best in Canada.

The campaign will now shift to lobbying at Queen's Park where changes in the U of T Act will have to be approved. SAC will be urging students to write to their MPPs demanding parity.

The SAC lobbying campaign will include speaking to the caucuses and visiting members as well as trying to get more faculty support within the university.

Staffing committee chairperson Heather Ridout also called for getting more students involved in the campaign for parity representation on tenure committees.

SAC plans to work through course unions and class speaking to continue to gather student support.

Friday briefs

Looks like Dr. John will be able to afford a new pair of skis when he takes to the hills with his old pal Bill Davis again this winter.

Evans sits on the board of Dominion Foundries and Steel (Dofasco) of Hamilton.

Dofasco's nine-month profit for 1974 is $48 million, up 11 million over last year. Share profit jumped to $3.02 this year from $2.34 last year, a gain of 30 per cent.

Don't forget the ski wax.

In other news on the international front, Governing Council chairman Malin Harding's company Harding Carpets (which has the contract to the Roberts library) is going to take a crack at the Australian market. Good luck, cobber.

The California grape and lettuce workers are at a critical stage in their year-long strike and boycott campaign. The spring harvest is approaching and the growers have already filled all available cold-storage space.

Meanwhile, Dominion, the largest supermarket chain in Toronto, which is the third largest market for California grapes, continues to buy scab produce. More than 30,000 customers, through petitions and prominent church and labor organizations, have protested Dominion's policy. Other stores have committed themselves to following Dominion's lead.

In protest, a rally will be held tomorrow at Dominion store headquarters at Rogers Rd. and Keele St. Richard Chavez, United Farm Workers vice-president, will be in Toronto especially for the rally.

Chavez is here to replace UFW president, Cesar Chavez, who is hospitalized because of exhaustion. More information in Here and Now.

Never let anybody say that the Faculty of Arts and Science is capable of anything less than verbosity, not to mention democracy.

Next Monday, should you be so fortunate, you will be able to stay away from such tantalizing committees as—the Sub-Committee to Recommend Criteria for Accepting Courses Offered by Divisions of the University other than Arts and Science and Proposed for Inclusion in the Calendar of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

Then there's the Subcommittee on Memorial Tributes to Deceased Members of the Council. Deathly boring, needless to say.

We promise not to cover them.

There will be a day of seminars on Women and the Law sponsored by the SAC Women's Commission today at New College.

The sessions will be informal discussions and women are invited to drop in anytime. Elizabeth McIntyre will lead a discussion on Women in Prison in room 65 from 10-12 am.

Another discussion on Marriage and Divorce will be led by Barb Jackson from 10-12 am in room 66. The session on property rights will follow from 12-2 pm in room 67, led by Leslie Yager.

Debra Lewis from the SAC women's commission will lead a discussion on Rape from 11-12 noon in room 67 as well as one on abortion from 12-1 pm and sexuality from 1-2 pm in room 66.

The seminars are all in one area and there may be discussions afterwards. Coffee will be available.

Wednesday's story on page 3, concerning the firing of Star reporter Claire Hoy was reprinted from The New Lead, the newspaper of the Toronto Newspaper Guild.

Apologies for leaving it off: it was cut-out at the plant.

Don't forget, workers and students, to come to the Friday staff meeting. Topics of great import are bound to be discussed. That's 1 pm today, 2nd floor, 91 St. George. Please come along even if you've never been in here before.

interrupted by your refusal to publish our letter of March 15.

To refresh the memories of your readers, our letter of February 22 argued (rather persuasively, we might add) that in these days of environmental crisis, The Varsity isn't worth the paper it's printed on. A well-intentioned (if ill-conceived) reply by one Hugh A. Wilkinson (March 13) contained two major comments: first, that computer scientists, known to waste phenomenal amounts of paper, should clean their own environmental house before criticizing others; second, that The Varsity serves the fundamental falsehood and a general lack of common sense are going to continue between campus papers, why not set up an official forum to launch the attacks?

Why bother poor, indiscriminate and uninformed Reader with hate literature that offends his sensibilities while condemning papers he might otherwise thoroughly enjoy? All secondhand "news" carries the bias instilled by the reporter, and there is no need for one editor, or reporter to make direct frontal attacks on any other editor or reporter to illustrate this point to humble and presumably unaware Reader.

Let each paper state its side of a story without resorting to personal mud-slinging and casting aspersions on the character of the individual. Or, there is an alternative solution.

All such hate mail and editorials will be sent to a specified address, to be opened there by a meek clerk, and posted on a billboard. Said billboard will be on view in the Sidney Smith lounge under the disguise of the "Read Letter Organization". (The "read" should have enough leftist connotations to qualify the organization for space in Sid Smith). Then, every Friday afternoon several buckets of mud will be brought in, and any editorial member of a paper that has at least one slanderous statement to its credit on the billboard, will be given an opportunity to sling away, unencumbered by the qualms of poor Reader. A splendid time is guaranteed for all.

I notice with anger that SAC grants over $40,000 to The Varsity. Why should the common student be forced to contribute to this expense when he does not read the paper?

An identical area of 2-ply bathroom tissue, bought from an industrial supply house, would be a more lucrative economic investment.

Dog-tired faithful

No doubt you were pleased with your coverage of Homecoming in the Monday edition. But like previous Homecoming coverages there were no pictures or mention of the University of Toronto Cheerleaders. (Did you know we had some?)

In light of the fact that they work their little hearts out to cheer for our team as well as entertain the crowds till they look as dog tired as they feel, not to mention the fact that they faithfully follow the football team to the ends of the earth, thru rain or shine, blizzard or heatwaves, I feel that a little recognition in our school newspaper would not hurt at all.

Varg goes from high to Lowman

I would like to register a protest against your article "Orgasms solicited" (Varsity, Oct. 23).

While it has long been apparent that The Varsity is contemptuous of its critics, it now seems that it is retaliating against criticism. "Orgasms solicited" was nothing more or less than a call to Varsity readers to harass Tim Lowman with telephone calls. This is the sort of tactic indulged in by fringe groups of political fanatics and does not belong in a newspaper which purports to be the voice of the undergraduate community.

Are we to assume that the Varsity is now in the business of enforcing its opinions by means of intimidation? I believe an apology is due not only to Mr. Lowman, but to The Varsity's readership in general.

James P. Hull, President
Campus Alternative

Forthright criticisms

The Varsity has printed some fine articles on women's liberation. But it appears that the motives of a few articles are really a promotion of capitalism using women's lib as a platform for doing so.

When women complain about earning a smaller wage than men in the same higher income brackets, thereby promoting the equalization of sexes on one level, they are at the same time promoting an inequality in the sense of perpetuating the capitalist hierarchy of classes.

In other words, I question whether motives are born first from inequalities, or from a desire to exploit lower classes in the capitalist tradition.

U.C.1

Group recycles gripes

Encouraged by your squire of October 25, we would like to resume last term's dialog concerning the ecological and educational implications of The Varsity, a dialog purpose of educating its staffers in the ways and means of journalism, and should therefore be published more, rather than less, often.

In regard to the first comment, we should like to point out that thanks to a conscientiously-applied recycling program, we in Computer Science generate very little scrap. Virtually the only waste is "chad" — those tiny rectangles punched from cards. We note parenthetically, and with considerable dismay, that the substantive content of a typical Varsity would fit nicely on one of these little chips.

We find Mr. Wilkinson's second comment equally absurd, even conceding him the rather dubious claim that practice makes perfect. Perhaps an analogy would be appropriate. Suppose that the Faculty of Music were to press 20,000 recordings of each practice session and leave them in little piles all over campus. Any ecology-conscious individual would be justifiably incensed. We certainly do not contend that Varsity staffers needn't practice; their obvious inability to grasp the fundamentals of either journalistic responsibility or the English language speaks for itself. We do, however, question their right to inflict the fruits of their labours upon us.

We hope that all concerned will accept these comments as graciously as they are offered.

the course became "less crucial" with the establishment of the Women's Studies Programme. On the contrary, the course is now the introductory core of the program, and thus immensely important.

I did say that with the proliferation of public events (educational and otherwise) concerning women, coming from all kinds of institutions and task forces, it seemed less crucial for us to mount another public lecture series of the sort we'd had in the past three years.

And I certainly didn't say that the courses sees "women... as having a place within a more traditional setting." Far from it. IN1 260 still has a solidly political aim: to spread the word that it's possible for women to get out of their traditional setting.

But meanwhile, yes, the change of title to "Introduction to Women's Studies" suggests that we see the course as having a good foothold in the more traditional university setting, now that Women's Studies is solidifying and expanding as a programme.

But not to chastise Lesley Rubin. I did talk fast and long the day she came to see me, and I don't blame her for mixing up a few things.

Good idea No. 437

The Here and Now section of The Varsity is what I always read first. It works well as a kind of bulletin board of upcoming events for everyone on campus.

I also appreciate reviews of new books, plays, records and so on.

I could do without the frequent leftist political harangues that appear in practically every issue. The focus of these articles is usually of no concern to me. The cartoons that accompany them are artistically poorer and less subtle than they have been in the past.

How about writing more about topics that really affect U of T students, such as:

- the daily Russian roulette many of us must play in crossing Queen's Park Crescent
- the planned renewal of the Huron-St. George streets area
- the new athletic complex
- How about:
- some whimsical, apolitical cartoons
- contests to win real money (!)
- a more lighthearted approach
- puzzles, games, an Ask Andy column
- students' photography, art, prose,
- Try something new.

University considers changes for new athletic complex

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The university is considering several changes for the new athletic complex, including a proposal to use an air-supported rather than a conventional concrete and steel structure to house the building.

The university is also studying modifications to the original architectural design as well as ways to best construct the building.

The various proposals are under the consideration of the U of T physical plant, the planning and resources committee of Governing Council and the university president's office.

The air-supported structure proposal comes from a Toronto company, Airt Research and Design, who say they can trim about $6 million from $10 to $12 million budgeted for the complex.

The complex is to be built in the area bounded by Spadina Ave., Harbord St., Huron St. and Classic Ave. It will include a running track, Olympic pool with diving tower, badminton, volleyball, tennis and squash courts, as well as laboratories, offices and classrooms.

Airt president Harry Pasternak said the air-supported structure would contain both the Benson Building and the new facilities under a single, 90-per-cent-transparent silicone roof.

Pasternak said similar structures have been built throughout the U.S. and that building one for the university would be no problem.

Pasternak has requested $40,000 from the university for a feasibility study, but he said the study is more to reassure the university than to find out anything new.

"There is really no need to prove it can be done," he said. "There are directly comparable buildings in several countries, but we've suggested the detailed studies to U of T so they can be certain they would be embarking on a completely safe and realistic project."

Senior university administrators will the Airt proposal decide whether Airt's preliminary study should be undertaken.

The U of T physical plant is studying less unusual modifications to the proposed complex, such as changing the roof design, eliminating unnecessary features such as escalators and balconies and sounding out the construction industry on the best method for calling for tenders.

Although residents' groups in the area have strenuously objected to the proposed building's imposing structure, the university has yet to take any moves to change the basic complex design.

Because the proposed athletics building measures over 45 feet, it is presently caught in the web of City Council's holding bylaw on development, which prohibits construction of any building over 45 feet high downtown.

Indian head here on Sunday

Louis Cameron, leader of the Ojibway Warriors' Society, which occupied Anicinable Park in Kenora last summer, will be speaking at the University of Toronto Medical Science auditorium Sunday evening, Nov. 3.

Cameron will speak following the Cinema of Solidarity's showing of The Other Side of the Ledger (a film made by Indians about the Hudson's Bay Co.) and James Bay-Development for Whom?

The Ojibway Warrior's Society occupied Anicinable Park to publicize their demands for recognition of treaty rights, an end to the Indian Act, settlement of land claims, adequate housing, education and health facilities, and economic development for native peoples.

Their action coincided with a blockade organized by Indians at Cache Creek, B.C. These two groups formed the nucleus of a native people's cross-country caravan, which reached Ottawa to present their demands on Sept. 30. They were met by 400 armed R.C.M.P. and riot squad personnel who attacked the native people's delegation.

The caravan has since remained in Ottawa occupying an old building from which they are trying to persuade the Canadian government to enter into a meaningful dialogue with native peoples.

The Cinema of Solidarity (admission $1.75, students $1.50) begins at 8 pm. It is jointly sponsored by TCLPAC (Toronto Committee for the Liberation of Portugal's African Colonies), African Studies Committee and Latin American Studies Committee.

Domestic role for women means isolation, experts agree

By MIKE HIGGINS

Being a housewife means being isolated in the home. On this, Jennifer Penney, a teacher, and Angela Miles, a lecturer at York University, were agreed in their discussion of "Housewives and the Working Class" at Tuesday night's Marxist Institute lecture series. The panel discussion, subtitled "Strategic perspectives on women's struggles," produced some lively interchange between the speakers and the audience of 200, half of them men. Much of the debate focused around Miles' contention that housewives should be paid for doing housework, and that socialists should organize to help bring this about. She argued that receiving a wage for doing housework, and the process of struggling for it, would make women more aware of the fact that they were doing work that is important. The result would be greater self-confidence and greater power, she said, which would feed into further movement toward equality and socialism. Replying to statements that the women's liberation movement should work to build links with labor groups as a priority she maintained, that common struggles and unity can only come about on the basis of mutual respect. This could only be based on power, she said. "Labor won't unite with people they perceive as powerless." Penney's view was that while wages for housework would be a "good thing," it was something that was not a realistic demand to raise. She also argued that women's struggles advance more successfully in the context of a militant, over-all, working-class movement, and that the women's movement should give more attention to the need to form mass organizations. Speakers in the audience charged that a wage for housework would simply tie women more to the home and the family, and strengthen the traditional capitalist division of roles between men and women. Others, however, agreed with Miles' statement that "money isn't rope, but power". Both Miles and Penney, as well as most speakers in the audience, agreed that housewives were an important section of the working population, whose problems and potential had too long been ignored by revolutionaries. The discussion was organized by the Toronto Committee for a Marxist Institute as part of its series, Tuesdays at 8 p.m. in the Medical Sciences Auditorium, on "The Working Class in Canada".

City council strikes islands from ballot

City voters will not be allowed to voice their opinion on the Toronto Island homes issue in the Dec. 2 municipal election.

An executive motion was overturned by the city council 14-9 Wednesday. The original motion was passed unanimously.

But the actual wording of the ballot was the lump that stuck in the throat of most council members, including those of the executive.

Alderman Reid Scott thought that a referendum would be a "schlemozzle". Alderman Dan Heap, alderman for Ward Six of which the islands are part, agreed. He thought the election ballot was already confusing enough.

The referendum question considered was: "Are you in favor of City Council applying to the province of Ontario for legislation to secure the preservation of the existing residential areas on Toronto Islands which otherwise would be available as parklands."

Placing the question on the ballot was a bid to strengthen the hand of the city delegation on Metro Council that was outvoted last fall.

Metro has now voted to evict the residents. They are currently appealing the decision in the Supreme Court of Ontario.

William Metcalfe, executive member of the Toronto Island Residents Association (TIRA), is angry at the discrimination evident in Metro policy.

Metcalfe noted that the two island yacht clubs are not getting such rough treatment. They have had their leases renewed and have been assured of increased dislocation allowances, he said.

"We can get no compensation for our houses," he complained.

TIRA represents the residents and owners of the 252 homes located on Ward's Island, which is in the same municipal ward as the University of Toronto.

We know it took a lot to get where you are today. With us, you'll get the opportunity to get where you want tomorrow.

We're Northern Electric and we'd like to talk to engineering, finance and accounting graduates.

You may already know something about us — we're a large Canadian-owned telecommunications manufacturer. But as a prospective employer, we know you need to know a lot more about us. How big are we? What's our growth story? How do we treat people? How about salaries?

Soon we'll have Northern Electric people on campus who'll be able to answer all your questions in detail. But to help you decide if such a get-together would be advantageous, we will tell you this: we're big, over 27,000 employees in five countries; we're growing fast (in fact, we're one of the largest and fastest growing telecommunications manufacturers in the world!). Last year we opened or began work on nine new plants. We've just chalked up a half-year record sales and record profits. But, as booming as we are, we know we've just touched the surface. There's a whole world waiting for better means of communication.

So we need ambitious engineers who can be as creative with telecommunications technology as our sales people are with market development — and finance and accounting people whose expertise with money can match our scientists' talent for discovery.

Of course, our standards are high. But then, so are the financial rewards and career securities for graduates who can help us achieve our goals. If what we can offer appears to match what you want, talk to your Campus Placement Officer — he'll arrange that we get together.

Repression increasing

GENEVA (CUP-ENS) — The world's foremost international organization of lawyers and judges has charged that repression in Chile is more systematic today than any other time in the history of the military junta.

According to a report issued by the International Commission of Jurists, "For every detainee who has been released in recent months, at least two arrests have been made."

Chilean's dictator, General Augusto Pinochet, has made a show in recent weeks of releasing political detainees. But, the commission says that between May and August there were 700 known political arrests in Chile.

Since the beginning of October there have been another 600 arrests.

Mystery and meaning in Moore

Family Group, 1944, by Moore. At the Albert White Gallery, 25 Prince Arthur Avenue.

It seems almost inevitable, by that stroke of fate which brought Henry Moore to Toronto, that many of us will become amateur students of his work.

The AGO permanent collection will make it possible to continually reassess and make new discoveries about Moore. He has said, "All art should have more mystery and meaning to it than is apparent to the quick observer. In my sculpture explanations often come afterwards."

The Marlborough-Godard and Albert White galleries are complementing the AGO opening with Henry Moore showings of their own. The galleries have brought together some fine pieces, most of which cannot be seen at the AGO, and this is a unique chance to view them.

The extent of Moore's work is almost overwhelming. What we have in Toronto is part of the continental jigsaw puzzle which represents his whole achievement. To understand him it is necessary to see the interrelations between the pieces.

Moore always starts small. "I'll produce several maquette sketches in plaster—not much bigger than one's hand, certainly small enough to hold in one's hand, so that you can turn them around as you shape them and work on them without having to get up and walk around them . . .

But all the time I am doing the small model, in my mind it is not the small model I am doing, it's the big sculpture I intend to do."

Sometimes he has to wait for a commission in order to afford the cost of casting on a large scale. He will not accept a commission for anything other than one of his own ideas. This was the case with the "Archer" which was chosen by the city from a small maquette in the artist's studio.

It is interesting to see what happens to sculpture in the transition from small to big. The Albert White has the tiny 1961 "Bronze Maquette for Stone Memorial" and the larger working model is at the Marlborough-Godard. As with the "Large Slow Form" and its maquette at the Marlborough, there is a fascination with the intricacies of a small piece which is different from the emotional response produced by the larger forms.

Moore believes that "actual physical size has an emotional meaning" because we consider things in terms of our own bodies. Part of the excitement of Moore's work is that it issues an invitation to explore. The larger a piece the more it involves us physically. His emphasis on full spatial realization and a multiplicity of viewpoints force us to approach a work from changing positions. Full sized curves, hollows and tunnels, particularly in a work like the "Stone Memorial", have a magnetic attraction both from sight and touch.

One superb little bronze at the Albert White called Fragment Figure is also found in plaster at the AGO. The kinetic flow through the drapery is like that of the classical Greek staturary. Moore says the small pieces can have a "monumental grandeur because the vision behind them is big".

Another exceptional work there is the terracotta Seated Figure, a kind of mythic queen with remarkable grace and power.

The stereotype Moore figures are his reclining, somnolent earthy women (which he calls his "obsessions" and one critic has referred to as "heroically hideous"). His work has become progressively abstract and we find, for example, and recent two piece figure in front of the AGO or the four piece at the Albert White. Moore found, "if it's a single figure you can guess what it's going to be like. If it's in two pieces, there's a bigger surprise, you have more unexpected views. . . . Sculpture is like a journey. You have a different view as you return".

Although these express many of the same principles of the

Cleo Laine

I first saw Cleo Laine a couple of years ago in England by accident. Some friends had an extra ticket and dragged me along. I'd never heard of her and when they said she was a British jazz singer I expected to spend an evening listening to a Shirley Bassey type. But instead I spent an exhilarating evening listening to the remarkable Cleo Laine.

Cleo Laine gave her first Toronto concert last week at Convocation hall and it was a very memorable occasion. Accompanied by her husband, alto sax player and composer, John Dankworth, Cleo brought to Toronto that incredible instrument which is her voice. She's a big star in England and well-known on the continent too and has been declared by some critics as the best singer in the world.

It's difficult to describe just what Cleo Laine does with her amazing voice. The range is vast and the flexibility of the voice is stunning. Laine is a jazz-pop singer, if one must place labels, but she can do just about anything. She's performed opera and musical comedies and she's sung with big bands and done movie soundtracks. Laine takes a song and makes it her own property, weaving and twisting a magic spell around it.

In her Toronto debut, before a very enthusiastic audience, Laine displayed the variety of material she's capable of conquering. She sang Stevie Wonder and Noel Coward songs, a number of poems set to music by Dankworth, and Gilbert and Sullivan. For an encore, Laine sang us samples from her hobby, which is collecting mistakes in lyrics which singers make.

John Dankworth commented during the concert that he and his wife would use "devilish musical ingenuity" and they spent over two hours doing just that. They coast home on talent and skill rather than showbiz glamour, although Laine is a very beautiful and expressive woman. In her late forties, Cleo Laine is hardly known yet in North America. This is her first tour but there's little doubt that once she gets a bit more exposure Cleo Laine will become just as big here as she's been in Britain for many years.

A long shot on The G

I remember thinking when I left the theatre after seeing Burt Reynolds in The Longest Yard that I could have actually enjoyed the film if I'd seen it while in some way intoxicated. Nevertheless, I saw it in a normal frame of mind and the feeling I got was closer to being perturbed about the future of Art in the American Cinema.

The hype for The Gambler, now showing at the Hollywood, appears to put it into the same genre as The Longest Yard.

All the bit about Axel Freed getting his legs busted seems aimed at an audience weaned through the sixties on Tony Rome and The Ambushers. And indeed for about the first two thirds of the film it is this relatively empty entertainment that seems to prevail.

There are fine supporting performances from Jacqueline Brooks and Paul Sorvino which do keep things a cut above dismal.

James Caan ambles around like a football player with his shoulder pads still on, a role not unlike the one he had in Slither. His acting is convincing but certainly not spectacular.

As Professor Axel Freed, Caan turns in a few Room 222 scenes as a lecturer at an American university but the principal design of the movie is his obsessive gambling which early on puts him $44,000 into debt. Getting the money, and then gambling it in an almost suicidal fashion, keeps him on the screen for the remainder of the film.

Lauren Hutton, fresh from the cover of Newsweek, plays Caan's girlfriend acting in a style reminiscent of Clark Gable's. She's all right as long as she doesn't stray from her confined character; at several points she does and one of these forays can only be described as bathetic. However, the important point here is that Gable's character was interesting; Hutton's is not.

I suppose that it is not without significance then, that two thirds of the way through the picture begins to put a little meat on the thin structure holding it together and Hutton disappears with some poor schnook in a yellow taxi.

The remaining third brings to a head what has actually turned out to be the 'carefully laid groundwork' and the nature of the first section becomes a little more clear. The screen play and directing in these final stages far outweigh any initial superficiality.

Caan's acting becomes perhaps the best of his career to date. The

Robert Gill

Robert Gill, who died suddenly last summer, played a very significant role in the development of many of Canada's major actors. An American, Gill established the Hart House theatre as a centre of vital student productions. During his years at the theatre those who acted in Gill's productions now read like a Who's Who of Canadian theatre. Gill was the director of the Hart House theatre from 1946 to 1965, and he started the tradition of student production in the theatre which continues today. During the late forties and fifties Hart House served as an important training ground for actors in this country.

Gill's first production at Hart House was Shaw's Saint Joan which was done in 1947. As a tribute to their teacher many of Gill's former students gathered on Monday for a special memorial reading of the epilogue from Saint Joan. Almost all those taking part in the impressive memorial were repeating roles they played in the original 1947 production. It was a beautifully appropriate tribute to Gill and a nostalgic reunion in the historic theatre for many of the actors involved.

Charmion King played Joan, the role she had in 1947 and William Hutt, the Stratford actor-director, played Charles VII. It's somewhat ironic that Hutt himself will be directing production of Saint Joan for the Stratford Festival this summer. The memorial to Robert Gill brought the Davis brothers, Murray and Donald, back to Hart House, along with David Gardner who also directed. Blair Seaborn, in the comic role of the English sailor from hell, gave a broad cockney humour to the reading. Those who weren't in the original production, but who worked with Gill and took part in the tribute were Eric House and Leon Major.

Slides of the 1947 production complimented the performance which was a very suitable nod to a man who did so much to stimulate actors and encourage them to strive for the highest standards. Martha Mann's subtly lit-set and the black-clad cast gave Shaw a handsome touch.

The newest dead bab

The Canadian Film Development Corporation's methods for encouraging the growth of a Canadian film industry unhappily illustrate the mediocrity with which Canadians are often identified. Certainly, it is not true that Canadians cannot do anything right; it is simply that whatever we attempt is as often irrelevant as it is good.

This is particularly true within the area of film, where the Film Development Corporation has almost undisputed say as to which films will be made. It has helped produce some fine, truly Canadian films, and as often, some very bad ones. Child Under A Leaf, now playing at the Towne Theatre, is among the latter group.

The CFDC's policy of supporting commercial films is not what it appears to be—a roundabout way of creating an indigenous film industry while keeping filmmakers employed at their craft. Canadian commercial films tend to be bland imitations of already worn but financially successful Hollywood productions. But, with one or two exceptions, they simply aren't commercially successful.

Child Under A Leaf is a slightly more daring, slightly more tragic and slightly more boring adaptation than is usual of the love triangle. Written and directed by George Bloomfield, it concerns a beautiful woman who has a child by her lover while married to an unlovable jealous man. Bloomfield has set out to present a portrait of joyous lovers who can never realize more than transitory happiness. He tries to accomplish this by jumping from one "beautiful" cliché to another.

Dyan Cannon and Donald Pilon roar from barren beach to double bathtub in their sparkling white MG reclining women, they are no longer recognizably human. Moore believes that through abstraction he "can present the human psychological content of my work with the greatest directness and intensity," though it is perhaps more difficult to appreciate.

Between beauty of expression and power of expression there is a difference of function. The first aims at pleasing the senses, the second has a spiritual vitality which for me is more moving and goes deeper than the senses."

Moore has always been fascinated with the hole which he says can have as much shape meaning as a solid. It also increases the dimensionality of a work by connecting front to back. The doughnut shaped "Working Model for Oval with Points, in bronze at the Marlborough-Godard and in plaster at the AGO, is the most obvious example.

One of the most exciting things about the AGO plasters is that, in his words, "they are the originals". His marks upon the plaster create an incredible variety of surface textures. Rarely after the casting has the artist finished. Moore is a master at exploiting and illiciting from the bronze every kind of effect.

Gambler

Gambler is well worth seeing for this portion alone, indeed if only for this portion.

Karel Reisz, the director, is Czechoslovakian by birth but for all intents and purposes this is an American film. It is one of the few major movies that approaches the spirit of the work of the same title by Dostoevsky. Indeed Freed lectures on that very writer (and, it should be pointed out, in another scene deals with George Washington).

It is an engaging sight to see the American Dream and existentialism mixed up in such a way. These are pretty weighty ideas to be brought up in what is such a pleasure oriented, moneymaking industry but The Gambler may just succeed. Its ability to simply entertain is generally good with the qualifications I've noted and as an intellectual game it provides some provoking thoughts.

I suspect The Gambler will have a healthy run with underground filmgoers once it's finished playing at the three-dollar bandit emporiums. But then I thought the same fate would come to John Boorman's Zardoz and it hasn't even turned up at the Roxy.

David Earle.

One aches to use plain words, simple words, common words, to describe the Toronto Dance Theatre's achievement.

The company's devotion to artistic integrity inspires one with humility and a like respect. And anyway no review is more quickly skimmed than one full of superlatives.

But the language of criticism and appreciation has been systematically and collectively debased. And in a world where silence can be interpreted as condemnation, not to pad one's copy is to be less than fair.

But when one has seen such a performance as the Toronto Dance Theatre is giving, then perhaps at that one time if at no other the reviewer should refuse to condescend to the reader—or to the company. He should simply launch his frail honest appreciation.

The Toronto Dance Theatre is good. They are worth seeing. They are worth seeing.

Fittingly enough, though, all praise is somehow irrelevant.

The eleven dancers of the company are dancing because they want to. They are dedicated to their work. They seem to be so happy doing what they are doing that they could not, they would not be doing anything else.

David Earle, (with Patricia Beatty and Peter Randazzo, the company's three artistic directors), says that the dancers "are trying to improve the quality of life."

That's a trite thing to say, but when that conviction is danced, when one sees the open sincerity and steadfast optimism of the company in performance one understands.

The members of the company are not ballet dancers who couldn't make it.

They have trained right from the beginning as modern dancers. Earle and the other two artistic directors, Patricia Beatty and Peter Randazzo, have all studied under Martha Graham. They have superb technical control of their bodies.

Earle says that the company "offers no answers."

"Religion is in a decline today precisely because it has attempted to provide answers, because it has been turned into an educational process. Ritual has been discarded to religion's detriment.

"What we're trying to do is to give the audience a rush, but not with drugs—with our work, with the movement of our bodies."

"We use 'ritualistic action' to this end."

The "ritualistic action" is built up from gestures burnished by repetition and by a context created by different movements.

A Beethoven sonata does not have enough notes—at least not if you're going to play it comfortably. You have to make all the connections yourself, with your skill, with your mind. It's much easier to play a piece with your foot firmly on the pedal—rather than to have to come to terms with Beethoven on the basis of your own skill or lack of it.

The Toronto Dance Theatre create their own works purely with their skill.

In classical ballet if you miss a beat you can always recover at the beginning of the next 8 p bar phrase. It's very hard to get lost in a waltz.

Dancing to Ann Southam and Michael Baker's music is a different matter. The scores are electronic and non-measured: there are long sequences with no accented beats.

For the dancers, it's like going out onto a minefield. You don't make any wrong steps.

But the rewards are commensurate to the challenge. A sense of inevitability accrues to every gesture. Each gesture is clean, intense, strong—"ritualistic."

The dances gain a certain sacramental quality. It's easy to become sentimental about this—in the same way that I become sentimental about High Anglican church services. Nevertheless I was profoundly moved.

The Macmillan Auditorium certainly played no small part in this final effect. The hall has a feeling of height, of unspoken magnificence. It was just such a release to enter the hall, such a release from the small, enclosed, crowded lives we live here in Toronto. And not only for the audience. The dancers could not have been in a better place.

Technically as well the building was more than adequate. Terry Crack on sound, and Ron Siniptpe, on lights, were as important in creating the emotional context as were the dancers. Stage manager David Davis was properly invisible.

Carole Crawley, the costume designer obviously knew what she was doing. Each costume was made with movement in mind.

The Toronto Dance Theatre is good. They are worth seeing.

while making grandiose gestures of their love.

To ensure that the audience doesn't miss the point that the lovers are "the good", every scene in which they appear together is a dazzling white: white clothes, white cars, white apartment.

In fact, the couple's baby who inhabits a white hamper dies of suffocation when the white sun shade falls on her while her white clothed parents are making love.

The only thing we can be thankful for is that Bloomfield doesn't have Joseph Campanella, who plays the husband, run around under a black stetson in a black Cadillac.

Bloomfield is so caught up in creating visual effects that he does not have enough time to write dialogue. But any dialogue that was written could easily be done away with as more than half of it is romantic sighs and gurgles.

chuckle, chuckle

Inflation? Chuckle, chuckle.

Mental illness? Guffaw, guffaw.
Rape? Tee hee hee.

In times when social crusaders are viewing these and other matters with more solemnity than Nixon his phlebitis, it's nice to have a group like Second City around to play amid the pessimism.

And with the successful opening of their new revue Anyone for Kelp? it's a good bet they will be around for a while.

Success often breeds complacency, yet in Second City's case the opposite is true. With each production the polish seems brighter, the satire less provincial and the unity of the group more subtly effective.

Monday's opening demonstrated this progression, in which the humour has remained the same, but the form and content have changed. No longer must we sit and be titillated merely by an evening of cheap Canadian 'n' jokes. Although there are still the references to our national propensity for beer drinking, electing corpses (Stanfield) to public office, and the like, our funny bones are not relentlessly bombarded by them.

Instead the jokes are more skillfully interwoven into a universal comedic tapestry, which drapes the broader human frailty rather than the strictly Canadian.

In fact the skits which walk the ground already plowed under by Don Harron and Charlie Fargueson are the least satisfactory.

This new perspective seems to favour the inventiveness and invective of the group, giving them a larger puddle in which to play. Scenes such as "The Rape in the Park", "The Sexual Crisis Center" and "Johnny from the NutHouse" demonstrate a new dimension of development, rather than the slambang, on-and-off black and white technique.

The endings too are improved, relying on sudden surprise or zany reversal, rather than predictability for their sting.

Two musical numbers, neatly interspersed, proved an enjoyable interlude. The first, tribute to anti-feminism called "A Woman is a Body not a Brain" utilized the chorus line device; it was held together by the cute lyrics, in spite of the ragged choreography and faulty voices that accompanied it. The second song was a pompous recitative Canadian Who's Who, which somehow collapsed when it was juxtaposed against Handel's Messiah and Beethoven's choral Ode to Joy.

My favourite was the parody on Dinner-Theatre, the new concept in entertainment which is currently being eaten up by North American culture gluttons. It was a hilarious skit, brilliantly executed, and finely timed, showing that dinner and drama for the price of one, is really worth the price of none.

Dan Ackroyd was superlative in various roles throughout the evening, exhibiting deft control of his characterizations without letting their perversity get out of hand.

Eugene Levy is gaining confidence with every production, adequately coordinating facial expression with deadpan humour. His monotonous preacher routine was just that — monotonous, and could be struck from the show with little compunction.

Both Levy and Ackroyd could use instruction in mime technique since it is a device which is frequently but ineffectually employed.

Catherine O'Hara seems obsessed with portraying Ruth Buzzy and could use her comedic talents to better advantage. The other female actress, Rosemary Radcliff, smoothly shifts gear into varied personalities and has the only singing voice suitable for public exposure.

As a unit though Second City works like a finely tuned computer — gone berserk.

Athol Fugard is a most interesting and important South African playwright. That a writer, as eloquent and perceptive as Fugard is about the lives of those who live under the repressive regime, should work in South Africa is a miracle in itself. Recently however, Fugard has been working in London and turning out plays in rapid succession. They are getting better and better.

Sizwe Bansi is Dead, which I saw in London last spring, is a superbly constructed and very moving play. Hello and Goodbye, an earlier Fugard work, is currently at the Central Library Theatre.

The production, by The Performing Theatre Company, is admirable and introduces us to the dramatic powers of a playwright who will no doubt be heard from more and more in the next few years.

Fugard's plays are not harangues against the horrors of the South African system as such. He doesn't try to tell us once again how terrible apartheid is. Fugard is concerned with character firstly. He shows us the repression, in personal terms, the restrictions and the unhappiness that touch the lives of characters who live in South Africa.

There are two characters in Hello and Goodbye. Fugard uses only two characters in all of his plays. A writer must be very skillful to keep a play bristling with only two characters, and Fugard does have some difficulties in Hello and Goodbye, difficulties which he resolves brilliantly in Sizwe Bansi is Dead.

Hester and Johnny, the twosome in Hello and Goodbye, are brother and sister. He lives in Port Elizabeth but Hester left home years before for Johannesburg. She has returned to collect what she feels is her share of their father's money.

Both of them lead botched lives. Hester has become a prostitute, cynical and man-hating. She fled a grievous childhood of battling, hateful parents. Johnny stayed at home. He's never had a life of his own. He practises using his crippled father's crutches. Physically he has no need for them; but to brace himself before a wasted life and a dismal future he uses them to get around the room. Hester frantically searches through the boxes of junk looking for evidence of the money. The brother and sister relive the past, discussing their meaningless lives. The sum total is nil. The future holds even less for them.

Elements in Hello and Goodbye are bothersome at times. Some of Fugard's psychological deductions are too patly worked out. The dialogue lags occasionally. But basically Hello and Goodbye is a searing portrait of two wasted lives. Fugard can write very well at times. Monologues are his speciality, and the ones in Hello and Goodbye have real vitality. They are certainly the play's finest moments.

Arif Hasnain's production of Hello and Goodbye is solid and stark. Patricia Hamilton and James B. Douglas play the two roles very well, even though they seem too chipper and willing to please at times, whereas the characters they're dealing with are spiritual dregs. When the performances work, and they often do, we get a sense of two people caged in by their own weaknesses, unable to fathom any better road. Their instinct for self-preservation has no higher instinct.

The final image presented in the play, the stage strewn with rags and clutter, nearly enveloping the actors, is a reflection of Fugard's attitude towards his homeland. The fears and paranoia inherent in the system are seen through the frantic quest for some small island of security in a morally decrepit land.

Rudy Syn doesn't mime athlete's foot in the fingers.

Lyn has mime of his life

The Canadian Silent Players are a group of four: three dancers and a mime. Their show, It Goes Without Saying, at the Annex Theatre (121 Avenue Road) tries to combine the two artistic disciplines that rely on movement for communication.

Unfortunately, dancers Anne Allan, Ed McMillan, and Robyn Lee, seem to have completed years of ballet training with a 10-week course in mime.

Rudy Lyn, a European trained mime, gives a performance which rivals the best. His technique is flawless. The simplest exercises in mime are a joy to watch. Every gesture, every look is carefully placed with just the right emphasis.

But in numbers like 'Dreams', in which the dancers as well are miming, our eyes never leave Lyn. His humility upstages all the pizzazz of the overacting dancers.

In the dance numbers, Allan and Lee show what they can do. Their dancing is strong, at times becoming far too big for the small converted church stage and the tightness established by the mime work.

Candy Kuenstler is the prize in the crackerjack box. Completely amazing the audience with her acrobatics, she also ran lights, and sound. Her back flips were better than her sound fades, but when you can spin around in the air with ease, then you can nit-pick. But only then.

Dance fans will be disappointed with the dull choreography, mime fans will be disappointed with the amount of dance, but audiences in general should enjoy the laughs, the sighs, and Rudy Lyn's fine performance.

WWI flyboys crash

Aces Wild comes across in Creation II's performance as a drama about how Canadian pilots of the First World War became appendages of the vulnerable aircrafts they flew. The program notes would lead one to assume that the author, Tom Hendry, intended the men to be vulnerable and the strength of their machines to be the veneer behind which they hid their fears. But in performance the planes are never adjuncts to the men; the pilots are simply outgrowths of the planes' steel.

It's difficult to sympathize with these characters who behave like machines.

The woman the play's central character, Big Mack, makes love to in France has a sterile appearance because she is dressed in a white pilot's uniform. Loveless Big Mack returns to America for a wedding to the woman with "the prettiest hand that ever co-signed a letter of credit." When the marriage official bids the bride and groom kiss, they zomm and buzz toward each other like aircraft. By this time the audience is certain that Mack is really a plane disguised as a man.

The white-cheesecloth stage on which the only prop for most of the performance is a stand which supports drawings of war planes adds to the inhuman quality of the play. Even the vaudeville format in which songs about the air war are interspersed with tunes about drinking and sex cannot dispel the barren atmosphere.

The program notes try to attach the play's bizarre psychology to Canadian pilots as a group distinct from others.

The notes ask: "In the nerve-shattering, mind-wrecking business of fighting why did Canadians become the dominant group, the leaders others copied and followed unquestioningly?" This attempt to cash in on Canadian nationalistic sentiment is unsuccessful because there is no indication in the play itself as to how the Canadians were in fact different from other pilots.

Creation II certainly did not cash in on much in this performance. On opening night, at 8:30 pm, when the play was scheduled to begin, the audience consisted solely of another reviewer, myself, and my friend. None of us had paid the two dollar charge to get in. About fifteen minutes later the playwright arrived with three of his friends. Only then did the play begin.

Perhaps the Finch campus of Seneca College where Aces Wild is being performed is too far out for many playgoers to travel. But then, this play isn't worth going out to see anyway.

Convocation Hall was almost packed last Sunday for the second appearance this year of Fairport Convention with Sandy Denny.

Some loyal supporters were at the doors by six o'clock to make sure that they got the best seats in the house.

The concert was opened by Stringband which played an excellent set, featuring their own compositions and traditional material.

They nearly brought the house down with a tune titled "Show us the length of your cock". It's definitely got to be one of the best songs ever written in Canada — and one of the dirtiest.

Although you'll never hear it on the radio, you should be able to hear it at their appearance at the Chimney in a couple of weeks.

The quality of their work and presentation earned them a well-deserved encore.

There was a long wait while the roadies and crew set up the equipment for Fairport but the audience was quite willing to wait.

Unfortunately Trevor Lucas was just getting over the effects of a cold, while Sandy Denny was still suffering with a sore throat and a fever. This meant that their program was reorganized at the last minute, so that the brunt of the vocals fell on Dave Swarbrick. But Sandy, sounding as good as ever — or so it seemed — did open the show with a brand new tune.

From then on it was up to Lucas and Swarb to carry on with the show. Lucas joined Swarb on the fabulous "Sloth", paired up with Sandy for Fotheringay's "Ned Kelly" and sang his own "Bring them down". Swarb then continued with "Dirty linen", "Fiddlestix", "Tokio" and sang on "Sloth", Hexamshire Lass" and the beautiful "Rosie".

This doesn't mean that the rest of the band did nothing — in fact the instrumental tunes were often like a duel between the fiddle and the guitars, with the drums finishing the contest off.

The quality of the music was excellent, particularly during the violin solos by Swarb, whose searing and soaring play, as he danced and smoked his way through the show, was at moments unbelievable.

Sandy finally emerged to join Lucas on "Ned Kelly" and she came back to close the show. Her sore throat straining her voice, she sang "Solo", from her last lp, and then the now classic "Matty Groves", although her voice was already failing and being drowned out by the music.

But she'd come to sing and the audience response ensured her appearance although one could feel her pain as she reached for the higher notes. If you consider this and the fact that the band had to set up a new program on the spot you can appreciate the talent and ability of Fairport.

Syd Barrett
Harvest Records

This double record set, including "The Madcap Laughs" and "Barrett", offers all fans of the Pink Floyd a chance to go back to the roots of the group and discover what has most influenced them. Barrett, one of Pink Floyd's founding members, split after their first lp but listening to these two records, previously available only as imports, it is clear that his influence on the group has been lasting: throughout the four sides one gets the feeling that almost all of the material could be included on the latest Pink Floyd lp without any noticeable changes in the band's style or content.

Of course Barrett is helped out by David Gilmour, Richard Wright and Roger Waters and the feeling that emerges from many of the cuts is that it was used as a testing ground for new material for "Dark side of the Moon".

Barrett has a strange nasal voice that sounds a great deal like that of Ray Davies, and at times Barrett uses the same style of playing and similar topics for his tunes.

The content varies widely, from the gentle drifting "Terrapin", through the rocking "Octopus" right on to the symphonic "Baby Lemonade". In these and in other cuts Barrett uses his own voice as an instrument and then forces the music to adjust and comply. Other outstanding cuts include "Love You", "Golden Hair" adapted from a James Joyce poem, "Lady Gone", "Late Night", "Maisy", a strange put-on of your usual white boy does the real blues trip, and the double punch of the "Wolfpack and Effervescing Elephant".

This lp is a complex display of talent by an unusual and gifted musician. It is a definite must for any true follower of the Pink Floyd and for anyone who is interested in keeping up on some of the best in English rock music.

recordingsHorowitz plays Scriabin
Vladimir Horowitz
Columbia
No. M31620

That old Russian mystic Alexander Scriabin has enjoyed an increase in popularity in the past few years, particularly in the pianistic realm.

For a long time, he was composer non grata because of the somewhat obscure nature of his music, and his plans for a work called "The Mystery" which would involve simultaneous orchestral concerts all over the world in conjunction with smells, tastes, sights and tactile sensations all to be co-ordinated by one conductor.

In his time (1911 or so) this was regarded as far-fetched, to say the least.

Yet one idea of his has attracted considerable attention in recent times, namely that of co-ordinating certain colours with keys and notes. Without electronic technology, his "colour organ" was impossible, but such things now exist and have been used in all-Scriabin recitals, primarily by pianist Hilde Somer.

For an amateur piano player like myself, a page of Scriabin looks like a nightmare of black notes, cross-fingerings and other technical near-impossibilities; Alex was a dynamite keyboard man, make no mistake about it, and wrote for himself some of the most demanding sonatas and etudes in all piano literature.

Plainly, a pianist of exceptional ability and insight is needed to convert the arcane dots and lines into the shimmering, fiery stuff that the composer first intended.

The great Vladimir Horowitz is, of course, of the highest calibre technically, and is probably the greatest living Scriabin interpreter.

He appears in public rarely now, and few recordings are issued bearing his name, but those that Columbia Records are lucky enough to get are gems.

In 1968 Horowitz made a TV program for CBS, a stunning 90 minutes of Chopin, Schumann, Scarlatti and others, and the record drawn from that program (Columbia MS7106, Horowitz on Television) has been a top seller.

That record, incidentally, ends with an astounding set of variations on themes from Bizet's Carmen which is worth the price of the disc alone.

Horowitz plays Scriabin features one side of short pieces (an "Album Leaf" and 7 of the etudes) and a side of longer ones: Sonata no. 10, Two Poems op. 69 and "Vers la Flamme".

The short pieces are all examples of the "miniature" form, centered around one idea or another, a tonality or rhythmic motive or just in the form of a musical exercise.

But, like the Etudes of Chopin, they never sound like workmanlike exercises. The tenth sonata (from a 1966 Carnegie Hall concert by Horowitz) gets dazzling treatment, as do the other works on side two.

Frankly, his Scriabin is above all but the most petty criticisms; the man has a tone as fine as you will ever hear, and stunning technical resources.

Mr. Horowitz describes "Vers la Flamme" as "music dealing with the mysterious forces of fire and the atom that can destroy all of humanity. Scriabin previewed a vision of the atom bomb."

Mr. Horowitz also puts that much insight into his playing, and the result is one of the finest piano discs of the year. Five stars.

Beethoven:
the "Emperor" concerto
The Boston Symphony Orchestra
Seiji Ozawa, conducting Christoph Eschenbach, soloist
Deutsche Grammophon

But unless you're the creakle collector, there's no need to rush out for this one. If the violin concerto isn't in your collection, however, you're really missing out on a good bet. There are many good recordings of this work — check out Isaac Stern's rendition on Columbia, in a twin-pack with the Brahms concerto.

More conventional piano music can be found on another DG release: the "Emperor" concerto, Beethoven's last and greatest solo vehicle. Written at the peak of his own concert career, it's a piece full of genius and invention — from the opening cadenza to the end of the rondo movement, it is an undeniable masterpiece. As you might expect, this is a work in the "warhorse" class, a favourite with performers, audiences and record companies alike.

Christoph Eschenbach is the soloist here, accompanied by Seiji Ozawa and the Boston Symphony. Recording a work of this stature is a hard task: one is going up against the piano greats of the past 60 years. The comparisons will spring to mind instantly. This is not, to be frank, the best recording ever... if there can ever conclusively be such a thing. For one thing, the orchestral sound is embedded in reverberant mush — a surprising development for a company with a sterling reputation like DG's. Is this what Eschenbach, Ozawa and company really wanted?

Eschenbach's performance is bright, adept and well-disciplined, but lacking in the raw, elemental fire that the music really demands. The sound is much like that on his 7-LP complete Mozart sonatas released a few years ago: light and right for Mozart, but too distant for Beethoven. He does have tremendous feeling for the flow of the melody though, especially in the last third of the opening movement.

It's a serviceable recording, I suppose, but not an all-out winner. Eschenbach is a musician to watch out for: with his fine technique and sensitive treatment of melody, he's one of the better pianists on the scene today.

As for former hometown boy Seiji Ozawa, I'm afraid that the "Emperor" isn't his happiest hunting ground. He's really a man for the spectacular — Berlioz and that gang are his meat. Keep your ears peeled this fall for his new recording of "Le Damnation de Faust", Berlioz' operatic treatment of the Goethe story, with an all-star international cast, the Boston Orchestra, and the devil himself at the recording console.

Poor old Ludwig Van. In the grips of debt in 1807, he fell prey to the whims of publisher Muzio Clementi and rewrote his violin concerto for a new arrangement: piano and orchestra. The violin concerto, possibly his best work in the genre, has remained in the repertoire ever since, but little has been heard of that piano arrangement. For most of the past 167 years, its been relegated to the back shelves of music libraries, only to be pulled out by curious pianists looking for something offbeat to play.

Just how curious Daniel Barenboim is, I wouldn't care to guess, but he's gotten enough interest up to record the piece. He appears as conductor and soloist, a task he's done on record before. In that tricky double role he has to play a difficult piano part and lead the English Chamber Orchestra — no job for an amateur.

Unfortunately, there simply isn't all that much to work with. Beethoven rewrote the concerto for violin as a money-making venture, and the keyboard part is, for the most part, a straight copy of the fiddle chart. Only the first movement cadenza (accompanied, oddly enough, by the tympani) is different, a minute of pure virtuoso dazzle. Perhaps Beethoven felt obligated to put it in. Essentially, though, it's an 88-key violin on display for our ears.

Barenboim does a fine job, and as usual the DG engineers have assembled flawless recorded sound.

Louis Malle's LaCombe Lucien is not only an extremely good film, it is a major work, one of the half-dozen or so of the last few years. It is an uncannily unjudgemental account of provincial France near the end of the Occupation, a psychological equivalent to Ophüls's The Sorrow and The Pity. Young Lucien joins the "German police" more out of dumb luck than malice, although malice too is present as one of a full range of complex unthought-out motives. Every character has this depth. LaCombe Lucien is a heavy, unforgettable film. At the International, 8:15 pm, $3.

A friend won't go to double-bills because he finds them too gruelling. The better the films are, the more stupefied he feels. Is anyone out there up to a triple bill of The Seventh Seal, Wild Strawberries and The Virgin Spring? It's at the Roxy Tuesday night. Or Wednesday at OISE: Polanski's Macbeth followed by Brook's King Lear, or Wednesday and Thursday at the Kensington: Marat/Sade and Women in Love.

The King of Marvin Gardens is the most underrated of Jack Nicholson's films, perhaps because it is such a sombre one. It is on Wednesday at the Roxy with, would you believe, Siddhartha. Marvin Gardens is on second, so enjoy a leisurely meal. Tonight University College shows Ray's second Apu film, Apajito at the Medical Arts auditorium. Thursday the Learning Resources Centre continues its free series of Russian classics with Eisenstein's Potemkin. Also Thursday the Revue begins its Bunuel month with Le Chien Andalou (Bunuel and Dalí) and The Exterminating Angel. And on Thursday too, the Roxy triple bills Marlon Brando in On The Waterfront, The Wild One and The Chase. In each film Brando suffers a bigger beating than the one before it — artistically and physically — but he still shines through the classic Hollywood crap.

We missed Wee Geordie last week but we understand that Geordie came through and won a gold medal for Britain, though really for Bonnie Jean back home in the heather. Perhaps somebody could triple-bill Wee Geordie with, say, The Projectionist and Fireman's Ball.

Someone has had the kindness to direct my attention again to the Prologue to Auden's The Dyer's Hand.

The first section of the Prologue is entitled "Reading". That includes the reader as a reviewer and a scholar.

Would that I could give copies of the book to all the tyro reviewers (and not only of books) who drift into these offices. Maybe even a few of the professors I have had in the past deserve copies.

"If good literary critics are rarer than good poets or novelists," Auden says, one reason is the nature of human egoism.

A poet or a novelist has to learn to be humble in the face of his subject matter which is life in general. But the subject matter of a critic, before which he has to learn to be humble, is made up of authors, that is to say, of human individuals, and this kind of humility is much more difficult to acquire.

It is far easier to say — "Life is more important than anything I can say about it" — than to say — "Mr. A's work is more important than anything I can say about it."

"The one thing I most emphatically do not ask of a critic," Auden also says, "is that he tell me what I ought to approve or condemn."

"I have no objection to his telling me what works and authors he likes and dislikes; indeed, it is useful to know this for, from his expressed preferences about works which I have read, I learn how likely I am to agree or disagree with his verdicts on works which I have not. But let him not dare to lay down the law to me. The responsibility for what I choose to read is mine, and nobody else on earth can do it for me."

"If, when a reviewer whose taste I trust condemns a book, I feel a certain relief, this is only because so many books are published that it is a relief to think — Well, here, at least, is one I do not have to bother about. But had he kept silent, the effect would have been the same."

"Attacking bad books is not only a waste of time but also bad for the character. If I find a book really bad, the only interest I can derive from writing about it has to come from myself, from such display of intelligence, wit and malice as I can contrive. One cannot review a bad book without showing off."

"A humble and contrite heart": that's what he inspires.

Michael Strand reads from his poetry at St. Mike's Upper Brennan Hall this Thursday at 4 pm. Free. Strand, an American poet and citizen, was born in Prince Edward Island. His sister is the wife of Leon Major, the artistic director of Toronto's St. Lawrence Centre Theatre Company.

Last spring, Strand won the Edgar Allan Poe Award, a $5,000 prize awarded by the Academy of American Poets, to an outstanding poet under the age of forty. (Robert Lowell won the $10,000 prize for a poet over the age of forty at the same time.) His poetry—short and lyrical—deals with "the creative isolation of the artist."

Busy, busy as we Bokonomists say... there's a lot to do this week, and a lot that's entertaining. Top of my list is this Sunday afternoon at Hart House, for the second in Anton Kuerti's intriguing Beethoven Sonata series. I don't think many tickets are left, but it's worth a try.

Far and away the most captivating piano man in town, Kuerti talks and plays his way into the minds and hearts of every audience he meets. Don't miss it. (Dare we hope for second shows?)

Heard about that "dream" concert? You know, opera fans, the one with Birgit Nilsson, Jon Vickers, William Wildermann, Zubin Mehta and the TSO? Well, it's certainly a dream for the promoters. In case you haven't noticed, tickets are topping at $25, the equal of the celebrated Callas return this spring. Even the knee-busting, view-obscuring peasant gallery chairs are going for $12.50! It's sure to be sold out, though, far in advance.

If your wallet can stand the blow, grab a seat; it's sure to be one of the best shows you'll ever see. Nov. 18 at Massey; two shows.

And speaking of the TSO, they still give the odd show or two around Massey, too. Tonight, Kazimierz Kord leads the gang in a program heard twice earlier this week, featuring Alexis Weissenberg in the Chopin Piano Concerto No. 1.

On Tuesday and Wednesday of next week, you'll have your only chance this year to see the man chosen to be the new chief conductor of the TSO, Andrew Davis.

The daily critics will have their claws sharpened for this one, so going along for the show will be a good chance to set your observations against theirs, when they're at their most petty and childish. I have a feeling that Kraglund and Littler were highly distraught when it was discovered that their serene eminences wouldn't be on the selection committee. Give the new kid a chance! $2 rush seats to hear Beethoven's King Stephen Overture, Elgar's Symphony No. 2 and Dvorak's Violin Concerto, featuring the always reliable Josef Suk.

A treat is in store for fans of choral music on Saturday night at Hart House: the Festival Singers of Canada will be giving a centennial tribute to Gustav Holst, featuring harpist Erica Goodman and the smaller Mendelssohn Choir for backup — the 100-voice version. Some backup group!

Next Thursday night at 8:30, the St. Lawrence Centre spotlights young Canadian talent, this time from Calgary. One Third Ninth, a piano trio, will be playing music of Beethoven, Ravel and Tchaikovsky; at $3.50 and $2.50, it looks like a good bet.

Usual flurry of openings and closings — early this week Robert Finch opened at the Campbell Gallery, Jack Humphrey at the Gallery Dresdner and Rick McCarthy at Hart House (see reviews next week). Joe Rosenthal at the Merton Gallery (a lot of flesh) and Rudolph Bickers (a bit gutless) opened at Gallery Pascal. Catch the exhibit by prominent artist York Wilson, at the Roberts Gallery tomorrow before it closes. The new Evans Gallery on Scollard St. has Shirl Riegt-Brown from tomorrow and Pan Gallery is displaying theatre, ballet and opera posters until November 24.

Prints by Mary Davies — A Six Year Study is spread over three floors of Victoria College's New Academic Building. Although the quality varies I find her work intriguing. Biological motifs and illustrations from poetry are characteristic of her work as is an interest in surface texture. It's a bit of a tramp to get around all the corridors but worth the effort. Till November 15.

The Concert Scene seems to be thinning out somewhat with only one show booked for this weekend. The Climax Blues Band along with former Strawbs' members Hudson & Ford will be at Massey Hall on Sunday night.

November 6 has the jazz-rock show of Weather Report at Seneca College. Next Friday, at Con Hall, SRO with SAC presents noted guitarist Rory Gallagher for two shows; and that should just about knock the walls down. November 10 has the Electric Light Orchestra at Massey Hall, and two nights later Arlo Guthrie, in one of his rare public appearances, will be there too.

At the El Mocambo the James Montgomery Blues Band plays on until Saturday night, and is replaced next week by Howlin' Wolf. The Chimney offers Bill King through Saturday and Maritime folk singer, John Allan Cameron all next week. And at Egerton's, which by the way is at Gerrard and Church, Don Potter with Michael Bacon & Rob Galbraith are featured tonight and tomorrow with Bob Carpenter, Brent Titcomb and Tommy Graham starting for a week's stand on Monday.

Interfac football playoff schedule set

By MRS. PARKER

The standing committee for interfac football yesterday decided the times for the semi-final playoffs at the stadium next week.

In the first division, Vic will play Eng at 1:00 pm on Monday Nov. 4. Following right after the first game will be the match between SMC and PHE which should be the more exciting game.

The second division spectacle will take place on Wednesday Nov. 6 when New takes on UC at 3:00 pm preceded at 1:00 pm by Trin and Scar.

Fearless Varsity predictions show that New will beat UC, Scar will beat Trin, and Vic will down Eng if they show up on time.

The hardest game to pick is the SMC-PHE tilt. Each team has won against the other in regular season play, but perhaps SMC should be given the edge as they appear to be getting stronger while PHE is losing key players to injuries. SMC also have a competent place kicker named Liscio who performs well under pressure.

The finals will also be held at the stadium on Tuesday Nov. 12. The first game will be the second division championship at 12:00 pm followed by the Mulock Cup game at about 2:30 pm.

Volley ball tight for first place

By TOM WOODS

As interfac volleyball enters its fourth week of play, Erindale, SGS, and Eng are battling it out for the lead in division I.

Last week's action at Erindale saw Engineering beat Vic and SMC in two straight games, while Knox dropped a pair to Vic and Erindale. Erindale then came back to defeat previously unbeaten SGS in three games.

Probably the most exciting game of the season thus far was played on Tuesday when Erindale, sporting a 3-0 record came up against skule.

In the first game, the plumbers dominated offensively with setters Mike Hantzch and Roman Struhanyk feeding hitters Alex Pochmursky and the Taconelli boys—Renato and Emilio—with a wide variety of sets to both the center and the outside of the court.

Taking advantage of a fast start, skule came away with a 15-7 win.

In the second game the skulemen again scored quickly but Erindale fought back with good defence and smart hitting to turn a 14-10 engineering lead into a 16-14 win for the wendsters.

In this game, team captain Atis Ozolins, regained the form he has shown in the past with hard hitting, well placed tip shots and effective blocking.

In the third contest, the plumbers again jumped off to an early lead and with good serving and consistent blocking game came out ahead 15-5.

In Wednesday's play, SGS handed Knox its fourth setback and in doing so moved into the three way tie for first.

Neither game was close as the experienced grads had simply too much spiking power. Final scores were 15-3 and 15-0.

This week's division II play produced the following results:

- New over For, 15-1, 9-15, 15-9
- SGS II over Emman, 15-3, 15-1
- PHE over EngII, 15-9, 15-12
- Pharm over Law, 15-7, 15-7
- Dent A over Trin, 15-6, 15-9
- Eng III over Wyc, 15-11, 15-11
- Scar II over Inn, 15-3, 14-16, 15-2
- Dent B over UC, 15-9, 11-15, 15-9

Blues face Carleton tomorrow

By DAVE STUART

The Varsity Blues football team is now rated number one in the country. Tomorrow they put that rating on the line as they face the Carleton University Ravens in a sudden death playoff game at the stadium.

Carleton definitely has horseshoes up their 0000 as they finish fourth in the eastern division of the O-QIFC beating out Queen's and McGill, two traditionally strong teams.

Their good fortune should end Saturday when the Blues annihilate them for the right to face the University of Ottawa Gee-Gee's, the probable winner of the other east division semi-final.

Blues and Ravens met in the season opener at the stadium when Blues soundly beat Carleton 24-11. Taking away the one long run of 62 yards of Joe Colvey, Blues' defence easily handled the Raven offence.

The Ravens were held to a miserable 153 yards on the ground and only 131 yards via the aerial route.

Blues on the other hand romped to 425 yards and three touchdowns.

In the other east division playoff, Ottawa hosts Bishop's. Bishop's finished a surprising third in the standings. One should remember that they played the weaker teams in the league though.

Ottawa will handle them easily winning by at least three touchdowns. Ottawa lost only one game this season to Toronto and, with their one man threat, Neil Lumsden, will doubtless walk all over Bishop's.

In the western division, first place Laurier will meet and beat fourth place McMaster. Laurier is undefeated for the season while McMaster sports a three win-four loss record.

The fourth playoff game features Guelph at Western. This game is also highly predictable with Western winning by at least two touchdowns.

Toronto now holds the record for the most rushing yards in a season. Mark Bragagnolo, the 6 ft. 1 in., 200 lb. halfback, passed the 1,000 yard barrier when he ran up 107 yards last Saturday against Western. Bragagnolo finishes the season with 1,018 yards.

In league records that go back to 1964, the highest figure ever recorded prior to this year was 825 yards accumulated by Dave Fleizer of McGill in 1968. His total, like Bragagnolo's, was for seven games.

Blues fans should note that the game starts at 1:00 pm instead of the usual 2:00 pm.

Mark Bragagnolo (24) shows the form against Western that earned the record for the most yards in a single season.

Soccer Blues bomb poor Brock Badgers 6-0

By JOHN COBBY

After meeting their Waterloo over the weekend, the soccer Blues rebounded to a merited win over the visiting Brock Badgers on Wednesday.

With only a single goal to show for their first half efforts, the Blues burst the game wide open in the second half to record a 6-0 victory.

While the Badgers are not a good team, they have recorded a few upsets this year. Brock tied Toronto 1-1 and beat Laurentian.

The game commenced with somewhat disorganized play by both teams. The Brock tactics featured long high forward passes to Mathews, in the hope that he could flick a headed pass into the path of Kooistra, their most talented forward.

One of the forward passes, though hit slightly too hard, caused confusion between the Varsity goalkeeper Ivanisevic and center-back Crewe. In clearing the danger, they collided in mid-air, with the unfortunate result that Crewe lost a tooth. Though less dramatic, Mike Hendrickse marked Kooistra out of the game, thus blunting the Badgers offensive strategy.

For the next few minutes the Blues gradually assumed control, creating chances near the visitors' net. Eventually at 15 minutes, the constant pressure was rewarded with a goal by Keith Hall.

With the Brock defence forced to assume deep positions, the Toronto squad was able to flood the penalty area with goal-hungry forwards.

Drew McKeown deftly controlled a through ball and slotted a pass to Vince Ierullo on his left. His powerful shot was charged down by a phalanx of defenders but rebounded out to Hall, who jinked past one opponent before shooting past Hendry for the second score.

This early lead received much of the Blues' tension and they began to play a more relaxed game.

With a weakness readily apparent down the Badgers' right, the majority of attacks were directed toward Hall whose enthusiasm was infectious.

The insertion of Yannis Vassiliou into the lineup after a three-week absence appeared to have a beneficial effect on the confidence of his attacking colleagues, even though the leagues top scorer was only half-fit.

The pressure applied was both thorough and consistent, softening the Badgers for the second half rout.

Once the Toronto team had regained their rhythm following the half time break, the visitors were hit with a three goal flurry during a five minute period.

Although still muzzling the dangerous Kooistra, Hendrickse had the energy for attacking forays too.

Hence at 57 minutes he burst through from midfield and, instead of passing off to one of the forwards, surprised the Badgers by hitting a low drive past a screened defence.

That goal opened the floodgates. Three minutes later Hall notched his second goal, following good work by McKeown. Within another two minutes the score read 4-0.

An incisive through ball from Ian Harris was transferred temptingly by McKeown into a space between Vassiliou and Hendry. The latter was enticed from his net but lost the foot race with the Toronto forward. With the goalkeeper stranded and the remaining defenders feverishly attempting to block Vassiliou's path to goal, he unselfishly squared the ball to Ierullo, who drove the ball into the unguarded area of the net.

Effectively the game was over and the Toronto squad relaxed its grip. For a few minutes the Badgers pressed, but met stout opposition from Rudi Kovacks and Jude Robinson in the full-back positions.

Even if the ball was slotted past them down the wings, Harris meticulously covered these dangerous areas. Any attempts by Brock to reintroduce its first half tactic of long passes through the middle were snuffed out by Crewe.

All in all Ivanisevic was rarely troubled in the net, and what little danger existed was eliminated with the cooperation of his defensive colleagues; a marked change from the last game.

The game was concluded with a brace of goals set up by Phil Oldfield. After 85 minutes he hit a cunning through ball which put Vassiliou in the clear; given that kind of opportunity even a half-fit Vassiliou rarely misses.

Two minutes later Oldfield repeated his act, this time choosing Ierullo as the recipient. Gratefully, Ierullo turned quickly with the ball and, with the confidence a five goal lead imparts, hit a spectacular sixth goal past the despairing goalkeeper.

Tomorrow the Blues conclude their league schedule with a visit to arch-rivals McMaster. Since Toronto defeated the Marauders in the opening game of the season, the teams have gone their diverse ways, so much so that McMaster is favoured to win the divisional title.

Blues can only play a spoiler role now but given the traditional competitive climate between the teams, the Marauders desire to avenge their only loss this year, and the Toronto squad's improved attitude, the game will likely not be a tame end-of-season affair.

Campus sports afraid of American infiltration

Intercollegiate sports may need Canadian content rules similar to those in the broadcasting industry says a report on athletics in Canadian Universities.

Still a closely guarded secret, the report says a survey of Canadian universities shows growing concern about the increase in the number of Americans involved in CIAU sports.

Canadian universities do not really want controls but the report recommends a ban on the soliciting of American sportsters.

If that method fails, consideration should be given "to establishing a minimum Canadian content as the preferred method of limiting the extent of non-Canadian participation on teams in a given sport."

The report, prepared by A. W. Mathews, has been circulated to officials of universities in the AUCC and CIAU.

The report also supports restrictions on the recruitment of high school students especially when a university offers financial or other inducements and recruits beyond areas where it normally publicizes its programs.

While "some areas of Canada are disparity areas with regard to young people with athletic skill," statements by universities that bring in top athletes for intercollegiate play would help improve the calibre in local secondary schools must be weighed against the concern that each import means "one less local student will have the opportunity to play and develop skills."

Our feature last Wednesday entitled 1914 — The Memory of War should have indicated that the subjects interviewed were designated by pseudonyms.

Our Friday page one story, entitled Students Lose Tenure Bid, inaccurately quoted Governing Council graduate student member Vernon Copeland. Referring to a tenure committee model with students as observers, what Copeland actually said was:

"In a sense, we must regard (this proposal) as we would an offer from a gentleman or lady of the night to trick or treat — on the one hand, it's very seductive, while on the other hand, we must avoid social disease."

Precedent set: Tenured prof fired

The University of Western Ontario became the first Canadian university to fire a tenured professor when a hearing committee decided Friday to dismiss psychology professor Larry Chamberlain.

The assistant psychology professor, who received tenure in 1970, was dismissed by a three-man committee after he refused repeated psychology department and administration requests that he tender his resignation.

Allegations of irregular behavior, poor attendance at lectures and poor classroom preparation were cited by graduate and undergraduate students, faculty and administration spokesmen at the eight-day public hearings last month.

The hearing committee's final report said it had found "unsatisfactory performance in research, and barely adequate performance in teaching and service."

"Since the committee rejects the view that unsatisfactory performance in just one area would in itself constitute cause for dismissal, and since there has been unsatisfactory performance in all areas, the only remaining possible cause for dismissal must be in the claim that the unsatisfactory research performance is not balanced by appropriate superiority in other areas," the report concluded.

The three-man committee, chosen jointly by the administration and Chamberlain, examined the areas of teaching ability, research and administrative work — the three criteria for tenure — and found Chamberlain was less than superior in all of them.

The committee decided Chamberlain's teaching was unsatisfactory and had even declined since he first joined the Western psychology department in 1966.

In student course evaluations Chamberlain was rated 11th out of 27 departmental members in 1969-1970. By 1971-72, he was rated 33rd out of 37; the next year, he was 39th out of 42. Last year, Chamberlain was 40th out of 41.

Psychology department chairman W. J. McClelland told the hearing that as early as 1972 Chamberlain was warned of the low teaching evaluations and was given every opportunity to improve, but did not.

McClelland also said Chamberlain's performance drew wide-ranging complaints from students. A delegation of 51 students last April criticized Chamberlain's failure to show up for a test scheduled only one week before final exams.

The committee found no evidence of ongoing research by Chamberlain, which might have offset his poor teaching. They found Chamberlain had only published two articles, the result of work he had done as a graduate student.

The committee found this lack of research was probably the strongest reason for dismissing him.

Negotiations stall over TA's unit

By EDWARD LARY

Efforts to unionize about 2,100 teaching assistants at U of T's downtown campus are currently stalled while the Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA) and university administrators debate who does and who doesn't qualify as part of the bargaining unit.

The definition is important because the results of a vote held last May by the Ontario Labor Relations Board to determine whether the teaching assistants want the GAA to represent them in collective bargaining will not be known until the two parties agree on the unit's size.

GAA president Michael O'Keefe is confident his organization received the support it needed in the May vote to become the bargaining agent for teaching assistants.

Alex Rankin, U of T business affairs vice-president, acknowledges that a union of teaching assistants is "definitely coming" and that it's "simple" to define who qualifies as a teaching assistant.

"When I talk of a teaching student," Rankin said, "I think of a student who is a graduate student and needs some remuneration to keep body and soul together."

Despite the apparent simplicity the U of T personnel department submitted a list of over 3,400 names to the Ontario Labor Relations Board last April, claiming that all the people on the list could be classified as teaching assistants. At that time the GAA complained that the actual figure was closer to 2,100.

Rankin told an April 18 Governing Council meeting that the list was comprised of "employees who were described in the unit proposed by the (Graduate Assistants') Association."

Rankin also said the list was "in alphabetical order in order to eliminate duplication of names."

The unit described by the association, while not restricted to students employed as teaching assistants at the time, (the GAA has since made that restriction for reasons which will become obvious below) did specifically exclude "physicians, dentists or other similar professional persons who are engaged in part-time teaching, research assistants or research associates."

When GAA researchers studied the U of T administration's list, they found out why the size of the bargaining unit had suddenly jumped about 1,400 names over the GAA estimation.

The administration's list included 613 medical doctors, about 70 dentists, 215 faculty members of the Royal Conservatory of Music as well as numerous full-time professionals employed in and outside the university.

Some 170 duplications appeared on the list. One TA was listed five times with various combinations of first and last names and initials.

Most of the names do have some connection with the U of T, such as teaching a course or supervising clinical labs.

Rankin said the list actually contains all the names of people who are paid by certificate at U of T, the way teaching assistants are paid.

He said it was difficult to compile a list of teaching assistants because they are hired by individual departments and not by the university as a whole.

Rankin also said the university wants to clearly establish who is in the bargaining unit "so we don't have apples and oranges mixed together."

"They (the GAA) could get a foot in the door now and grow to take in apples, oranges and pineapples. I don't want the union to ask for part-time or full time lecturers."

Meanwhile, the GAA continues its efforts to convince the university that teaching assistants, whose average salary last year was under $1,000, have no community of interest with full-time professionals occasionally employed by the university.

Radio Varsity news director resigns

Amid charges of mismanagement and lack of support from SAC, Radio Varsity's news director resigned Thursday.

Frank Cockram, news director for the U of T students' radio station for a year and a half, said last night "a feeling of frustration for a long time" moved him to tender his resignation.

"The frustration came from a lack of support from Radio Varsity's top management and from SAC for the station," Cockram said.

However, he placed most of the blame squarely on the shoulders of SAC, which has allocated a $21,000 budget to the station for this year.

"I don't think SAC has any understanding of the media," Cockram charged, "it certainly doesn't understand the electronic media."

Cockram said that SAC's unawareness of the importance of developing good news and public affairs programming has hindered his efforts to improve programming and could ultimately hurt Radio Varsity's current bid to obtain an FM broadcasting licence from the Canadian Radio and Television Commission (CRTC).

Cockram, a former U of T psychology student, points to SAC's insistence that it grant $1,000 to the station's news department for a new tape recorder only on the condition that Radio Varsity guarantee the programming will be aired on commercial stations.

"It's a 'chicken and egg' situation," Cockram said. "Our equipment is not of sufficient quality now to broadcast quality tape."

"But it would make both Radio Varsity and me look like fools if we submitted a poor quality tape right now to a commercial station," he added. "We're caught in a circle."

Cockram also attacked the budgetary management at Radio Varsity.

While he has had to cut and save on various needs, Cockram said he found out last week money was "coming from somewhere" to pay three additional workers at the station.

Radio Varsity's budget provides for only two salaried workers — the station manager and chief engineer — according to SAC communications commissioner Michael Sabia.

However, station manager Paul Murton said last night the chief engineer does not draw a salary and the station's advertising manager, Brad Reed, now earns $25 a week.

Murton said $6,800 of the Radio Varsity budget goes to salaries, while he receives $5,200, leaving $1,600.

Murton said the two other cheques, besides Reed's which Cockram saw last week "were all cancelled." Those cheques would have been paid through honoraria, Murton said.

Murton noted the Radio Varsity staff — which numbers close to 125 — decided last week it preferred not to give small salaries to various volunteers.

SAC communications commissioner Sabia said last night he hoped Cockram would stay with the station.

But he said he still would need a guarantee that Radio Varsity news would be broadcast on such commercial stations as CFRB and CHUM-FM before he was ready to give the station's news department $1,000 for a new tape recorder.

"I'm not convinced the department is capable of pulling it off," Sabia said, "but I know Frank is capable of it."

Cockram, who says he will continue his show "Whatever" on plastic and performing arts every Thursday, is responsible for news and public affairs programming. He now works with a staff of 10, down from 30 last January.

LOS ANGELES (CUP-ENS) — This week's quote of the week comes from Samuel Rhone one of the jurors who convicted Inez Garcia of a second-degree murder charge for killing her rapist.

Interviewed by radio station KPFK in Los Angeles, the juror expressed a rather unique view about rape.

"A guy who rapes someone isn't trying to kill her. He's just trying to screw her and give her a good time. The guy would have to do her bodily harm and giving a girl a screw isn't doing her bodily harm," said Rhone.

According to statistics in the United States, rapists attempted to force women "to have a good time" at the rate of once every 14 minutes.

Grape boycott continues

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

In a spirited display of support, more than 400 people marched and chanted Saturday at Dominion Store's head offices urging continued boycott of California grapes and lettuce.

The marchers, including representatives from many labour organizations and several clergymen, picketed and handed out leaflets in front of the Dominion headquarters and store at 605 Rogers Road.

As largest buyer of California grapes and lettuce here, Dominion has provided a focus for the Toronto boycott effort.

Boycott organizers will present Tuesday a petition of more than 33,000 names calling for an end to Dominion's sale of California grapes and lettuce to Dominion. The signatures were collected outside Dominion stores during the past six weeks.

The continent-wide boycott, organized by the United Farm Workers (UFW), is now in a crucial phase as the California grape harvest reaches its peak.

The UFW, who pioneered the right of California grape and lettuce pickers to organize, have in the past two years been ousted from contracts with growers by the Teamsters Union under controversial circumstances.

The UFW alleges the Teamsters have signed collusive contracts, termed "sweetheart pacts," with growers who continue to exploit field workers.

After picketing the store, the marchers withdrew to hear speakers, including Richard Chavez, Chavez directs the New York boycott effort and is the brother of UFW founder and head Cesar Chavez.

Speaking from a small flatbed truck, Chavez thanked the crowd for their support and said "you have responded beautifully."

He said the boycott is achieving success and "people are just as interested now as in '65 when the struggle began."

Chavez said this year there are four million boxes of grapes in storage, compared with three million in 1969 at the height of the first boycott.

He added in Toronto, grape sales are down 38 per cent from last year.

Chavez said later that he was very pleased with Toronto's boycott effort.

He said he hoped the California legislature would consider a bill in January to provide for secret ballot voting to determine field workers' choice of the union to represent them.

He added that a recent article in the New York Times claiming waning support for the UFW was "very misleading and completely unfounded."

Toronto UFW head Marshall Ganz said the Canadian boycott effort had resulted recently in the removal of grapes from 20 stores in Sydney, Nova Scotia and all Safeway stores in British Columbia.

He added the Manitoba Federation of Labour also just passed a resolution of support for the boycott. Federal NDP president Donald MacDonald told the crowd the NDP "has solidly backed this boycott from the outset."

"You are showing that this is one thing Canadians are concerned with," said MacDonald.

As MPP for York South, the riding containing the Dominion head offices, MacDonald called on Dominion to be "better corporate citizens."

Ward Six Alderman Dan Heap urged people to keep up the boycott effort. He called attention to the recent removal of grapes and lettuce from City Hall's cafeteria, and said the Flag Committee had agreed to fly the UFW flag at city hall on suitable occasions.

The crowd, frequently breaking into applause and cries of "Viva La Causa" and "Abajo Dominion" (down with Dominion) also heard speakers from the National Farmers Union, the Canadian Union of Public Employees and the International Union of Electrical workers as well as clergymen from the Toronto Interfaith Committee.

Following the speakers, the crowd dispersed to picket several individual Dominion stores.

Margaret Trudeau,
In an interview,
October 6, 1974

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

'What on earth are they afraid of?'

"What on earth are they afraid of."

That was the way one person put it last Thursday, as the academic affairs committee — heavily weighted with faculty members — approved a faculty suggestion to allow an official observer to attend, but not to vote at tenure committee deliberations.

If the committee's decision is approved by the executive committee and the full Governing Council, faculty will continue to have exclusive control over who shall receive lifelong contract.

The decision is a slap in the face to all the students at this university. Students had asked initially for parity representation with faculty on tenure committees, to ensure teaching and research were given equal weight in decisions. When that failed, they asked for at least some voting power in tenure decisions.

The vote made it quite clear that, much as it may be the better part of valor to perpetrate argument and pump clouds of reason into the atmosphere, when privilege and status are threatened, unenlightened and unprincipled self-interest will clear the air.

When it comes to power, students have the odds stacked against them. Students remain under-represented on the Governing Council, which sets policy for the university. Unless they demonstrate sufficient strength and purpose, students will lose out every time.

We have spent a lot of time — perhaps too much time — criticizing the faculty this year. But when they continue to act with intransigence on an issue of such vital concern to everyone — the quality of a university education — it is time to be intemperate.

To the faculty: it is simply not enough to say "we will let you watch us while we decide on your behalf." Either show some respect for students and let them enter the decision-making process, or stop wasting our time with the rhetoric of "you're marvellous kids, but we don't trust you."

No racism in meds admissions

I am writing in reply to the letter by Tony Leah in the Fri. Oct. 25 issue of The Varsity.

I can't help but wonder why there is such clouding of the real issues underlying the medical school 'controversy'. Many explanations have been offered, but the popular one is 'racism' — the Chinese students are foreigners and are being discriminated against. This is more garbage than exists in even the minds of these misinformed people that began circulating this ridiculous fable.

It is regrettable that Dr. Stephenson used the Chinese as an example, she should have more correctly used the term Non-Canadian citizen-taxpayers. There is no doubt she was acting in the very best interests of the Canadian citizen-taxpayer who has supported the thankless Medical School (particularly Toronto's) with his own hard-earned dollars.

Thus it should seem logical (even to the supporters of this racist lie) that these people's children should be given absolute primary consideration. Only after these people have been rightly considered, space permitting, can the non-citizen-taxpayers be reviewed.

This is obviously only fair, and so should have been stated as such in the first place. However, I can't help but wonder if these Aesops (complete with fables) didn't already realize this fact, and so distort or cloud the issue by making any move to protect the citizen-taxpayer interest a "blatant attack on the Chinese students."

As I have said, it is unfortunate that they were singled out, and even though I do not agree with the way Dr. Stephenson presented the issue, perhaps she could see no other way of bringing this problem to public attention. Regrettable, but definitely necessary.

One thing that the U of T Medical school should learn (as should others) is that you can only bite the hand that feeds you for so long, and then it begins to strangle. The real racists are the fools that cloud issues with ridiculous anecdotes (term intended) creating racial prejudice where economic reality is actually the issue.

Grads call for COLA

The Executive of the Graduate Assistants' Association would like to go on record in support of the Library Workers' demands for a substantial cost of living allowance.

We at GAA understand that the University is insensitive to the burdens of inflation as they bear upon its employees. (TAs, for example, were offered a 1.25 percent COLA, a figure which understates even the monthly rate of inflation.) The $200 COLA granted to non-unionized employees over the summer would, if granted to the Library Workers, represent only a 2.8 percent increase in the average annual library wage. For this reason, we at the GAA feel that the University should reopen contract negotiations with the Library Workers in order to provide some meaningful relief from the pressures of inflation.

It is commonly understood that those in the lower income brackets suffer the most from 20 percent increases in the Consumer Price Index. Assuming that this is also understood at Simcoe Hall, we call upon the University to compensate the Library Workers for their loss of real wages brought about by inflation.

Science Centre blues

Anyone considering combining a visit to the Ontario Science Centre with one of their Tuesday or Thursday evening movies should be warned that in September the Science Centre's closing time was moved up from 10 pm to 6 pm every day.

Thus not only are visitors required to wait in the lobby from 6 to 8 but they must pay admission again to get back through the door to see the movies which were previously included in the first admission.

In addition, anyone wanting admission at the student rate (75 cents, compared with $1.50) better have his ATL card handy since a verbal declaration is not sufficient. Hard times!

Seely a 'disturbed' sociologist

Let us assume John Seely is as brilliant as is suggested by his friends in your story. Why then was he not offered an appointment at Harvard, Yale, Chicago, Berkeley or any other American university with a reputable sociology department?

A review of a Seely book in Contemporary Sociology (May, 1972) says in part: "John Seely must surely be the most disturbed sociologist in North America." Such a comment is unusual but is permissible in a scholarly journal; it is hardly one that one likes to give to the daily papers. His friends who surely know the situation, force the issue — which only can add to the burdens of an already troubled man.

We need tenure seat

The Academic Affairs Committee voted to keep students off tenure committees last week.

This was a foolish and retrogressive decision that only continues the self-serving professionalism of the faculty. If the alumni and government appointees only had voted, the students would have won. Only because it was a faculty-dominated committee could the motion to exclude voting students have passed.

Perhaps a word of warning to faculty who oppose student representation:

"The faculties of universities are, for the most part, composed of professional people concerned with high standards of professional conduct and service. In recent years, however, the academic profession like many others has appeared to be increasingly self-serving.

"The right of any professional group to complete autonomy and self-regulation is now under question and the academic profession can be no exception. The day when such complete autonomy and authority were passable has passed. The academic profession would do well to be conscious of and sensitive to public concerns about some of its practices and privileges."

Take heed, before it's too late.

Hydro an energetic employer?

We are writing in regard to the article on page 47 of the Globe and Mail on Oct. 24, 1974, concerning "Hydro's Water Heater", and reprinted in The Varsity 'masthead'.

"The energy-conserving, 19-storey building at University Avenue is to be warmed in winter with heat from office lights, and workers' bodies, collected in huge water tanks in the basement."

We wish to protest Hydro's policy in regard to the use of workers. Should the unemployed be excluded from this opportunity to serve their community during the energy crisis? We wonder, however, whether the cost of training so many new workers would offset the predicted saving in fuel costs.

Nonetheless, Hydro is to be commended for its progressive solution to both the energy and the population crisis.

Teaching quality: more than parity

The recent furor over student parity on tenure committees strikes me as an example of good sentiment out of focus.

The student viewpoint as I understand it, is that students have an interest in the composition of the teaching staff, and that since teaching involves staff on one side and students on the other, students and faculty should have equal voices.

Students, I gather, have a stake in the quality of teaching. The only problem that I see with the solution proposed (parity) is that this solution fails to focus on the primary issue—quality teaching.

The faculty reply to parity seems to be that teaching is not the primary function of tenured faculty, but rather, the promotion, dissemination, and uncovering of knowledge. Faculty must also fulfill important administrative functions. Since only faculty and administration are capable of judging all of these functions, a student's primary interest in teaching would ignore these other larger concerns. This is a most ingenious and persuasive argument that misses the point entirely. It certainly countered the student argument strongly but also ignored the basic issue—quality teaching.

To understand why the issue of student parity on tenure committees is a fuzzy, muddled, off-the-mark issue, it is necessary to define quality teaching. No one will argue that students, in learning, and teachers, in teaching, are involving themselves in a complementary process we call education.

Fully defining education would be impractical; yet education requires both learning and teaching in some form, although the focus is on learning, with teaching as the active element that assists and prods learning.

No one will again argue that people learn and therefore learning is a complex sociological, psychological and physiological process. Since we now have studies of human beings in terms of sociology, psychology and physiology, many aspects of the learning process have been isolated and identified so that the active process of learning takes on concrete form.

It has been discovered, for example, that the sociological patterns of black ghetto life create distinct attitudes and values that affect the learning process; that learning is tied in with maturity and that learning tasks are identifiable with stages of growth and maturity; that chemical imbalances of various natures (including poor nutrition and lack of oxygen) can inhibit the learning process.

Needless to say, if one is going to teach, knowledge of a large number of these factors would help. However, knowledge must then be applied to find a technique of teaching that conforms to the learning process and that strives to make teaching effective and efficient. Teaching involves technique grounded in a knowledge of the learning process. One need not know all the background knowledge to teach effectively if one learns the technique. Therefore quality teaching is an effective use of technique that complements the learning process.

If the foregoing is clear it should also be clear parity as a solution to the neglect of good teaching is like shooting a bear in the foot when you mean to kill him. Certainly a student voice in identifying members of the faculty who are good teachers seems logical and constructive but falls down on several points. It presupposes our student representatives are capable of being familiar with faculty members, teachings and secondly, it presupposes our representatives will know what constitutes good teaching rather than popularity or sectional appeal.

The serious fault of this solution is its failure to see the problem as one of improving teaching technique generally rather than haphazardly picking up the good teachers that come our way. Tenure committees would merely select the already good teachers (ideally), without seeing that university teaching staff were encouraged and given the opportunity to learn effective teaching technique.

Teaching technique is important because teaching fills an important role in university life. Teaching is an important way of disseminating knowledge which faculty consider important when coupled with the promotion and uncovering of knowledge. It seems crucially important, therefore, that professors acknowledge teaching is a very important aspect of ensuring the continued promotion, dissemination and uncovering of knowledge. Our future demands this.

Furthermore, teaching is an aspect of the faculty's job and deserves of attention. Students pay for the services of the faculty and the government pays large grants to the university to finance this.

The university seems to feel teaching worthy of large expenditures on classrooms, equipment and residences. Faculty offer their services as teachers and students pay for it, as does the government, and university. Surely, then, the request that faculty strive to do this part of their job correctly is not unfair. Teaching may not be a primary function to faculty but that is no reason why teaching should not be considered worthy of being done properly.

Teaching is not always done properly at U of T for several reasons. First, teaching is said not to be the primary function of the faculty and therefore is due for only partial consideration in deciding tenure. Poor teachers are therefore selected on the basis of other values.

The student outcry against some teachers lead to the conclusion that teachers leads to the conclusion that teaching is bad in some cases, although dislike of a teacher can be based on other than his or her ability to teach. Teaching technique needs to be developed among faculty is my own classroom experiences. I have discovered many flagrant and minor violations of good teaching technique. Although no teacher is perfect, some of the violations of good teaching technique have been so basic and so easy to see and correct that I am convinced that university teachers could only benefit from learning basic teaching techniques.

I will point out some examples:

- (1) Every teacher knows that if you write on the blackboard it is useless and counterproductive to write illegibly, unclearly and without organization.
- (2) Boards, overheads, movies have rarely been used in any of my classes as an aid to teaching.

(3) Greater knowledge of the schemes and theory of testing and marking would certainly make the assignment of marks more pertinent and realistic. Essays and tests seem to be the only tools of evaluation.

(4) There seems to be a lack of regard for the human or psychological side of education. Techniques designed to give life to a subject in the mind of the student include cheerful surroundings, enthusiasm by the teacher, colour, sound, motion and involvement (such as participation in or recreation of an event).

As a solution, I believe the proper course is to formulate specific policy concerning teaching and standards of instruction at this university. If faculty are to teach they should be given the opportunity and encouragement to develop good teaching practices. With a large staff of professional educators at OISE and at OCE, surely some course that would enhance the faculty's ability to teach could be worked up. As well, it seems faculty have no stated criteria behind which they can defend themselves, and students have no definite set of criteria upon which to base their judgements to the satisfaction of administrators and faculty. I feel it only fair that each department should prepare a statement concerning standards that is specific and reasonable. This statement should include specific reference to philosophy, intent and methodology in the classroom. Such a step would be an important advancement towards a new consciousness of the meaning and realization of quality teaching our universities.

Parity on tenure committees is not an effective way to improve teaching standards if it is not accompanied by some measures to ensure that all teaching faculty useable and encouraged to receive guidance in improving their teaching skills. Quality teaching is not just a matter of identifying popular or competent staff, but also a matter of training coupled with some understanding of the role of teaching.

Recycling must be a way of life

The Recycling Action Group (RAG), formed to stimulate recycling of resource materials at U of T, had planned to start its paper recycling program today. Extremely unstable market conditions and lack of student response have forced postponement.

RAG might be down but it's not out. It now plans to organize efforts to recycle cans and bottles in residences and cafeterias. Volunteers are badly needed; a RAG organizer may be contacted at 244-9624.

Recycling is a positive, practical, necessary, and important activity that any individual can participate in, as a way of demonstrating concern for the quality of one's life and one's environment.

This article is not a polemic on the general problem of pollution. The focus of this article is the individual and the immediate action a person can take regarding recycling.

We all generate too much garbage, over 7,000,000 tons per year in Ontario alone, almost one ton per person per year. Already, this enormous amount of garbage is creating a serious disposal problem (remember the Metro Garbage Train scheme?). This incredible pile of garbage exists because most of the material goods we consume are designed, produced, and marketed to be thrown away.

However, since you, as consumer, are a vital and necessary link in the system, it is possible to have some effect on the system, by changing one's attitude towards consumption.

Here then is your mini Whole Toronto Catalogue of recycling information.

First principles: 1) reduce, don't generate waste. 2) recycle as much of what garbage you do produce as you can.

Three quarters of the cost of garbage handling is in collection, one quarter is in disposal. Therefore the cost of recycling all of our present garbage load would almost equal the cost of burying or burning it, not to mention the additional high price tag on recycling plants these days. In this light, reduction is as important as recycling.

How to Recycle Potential Garbage:

Glass—remove the labels, wash, store in sturdy boxes, because a box of bottles is heavy. Most recycling centers will not take blue glass.

Cans—remove the labels, wash, remove the ends, flatten (great for working out frustrations. Stomp them on the floor.). Store in a box. One could also refrain from buying most canned goods, many of which are of dubious nutritional value.

Newspaper—use the campus recycling containers. At home, save, bundle, and put out for the city collection crews.

Plastics—meaning plastic containers. Unfortunately, there is no ready means of recycling plastic containers, as there is for bottles and cans. However, before you throw them out, use them to freeze stuff in, carry lunches in, store stuff in. Use them at whole earth food stores, as flower pots, etc. You get the idea. The same goes for bottles.

Egg cartons—are worth money, if you can find a store that takes them back.

Paper bags—don't collect these. Ever notice how they pile up? Put your purchase in your pocket or briefcase or whatever. Do you really care who knows what brand of toothpaste you use? For shopping trips, reuse a plastic bag or buy, or make, a permanent tote bag.

Plastic bags—again, don't collect these, use them over. Most are very sturdy. Loblaw's, Food City, and fGA will give you 2¢ (incredible) for every plastic bag you reuse.

Clothing—ignore the fashion people, they're conspicuous wasters. Buy sturdy, long wearing clothes, and repair them when they wear. Patronize second-hand clothing stores, whether you buy from or sell to. Make your own clothing (knit, crochet, sew). Give the things you don't want to the Salvation Army, or put them in the crippled civilians clothing collection boxes.

Furniture and appliances—purchase these second hand. Great deals are to be found in the Bargain Hunter's Press, a paper devoted to the want ad. Scavenge. People often put out old furniture to be picked up by the city, especially in the spring. If you get there before the city, it's yours. If you have some furniture to get rid of, advertise, or give it away to needy friends. Learn how to repair and build furniture. Are you living in a house that is folding? Hold a rummage sale (and inform me). I am living proof of this philosophy. My dresser, bookcases, stereo cabinet, tables, desk, rug, lamp, filing cabinets, waste paper basket, closet, dog, plants, and fish tank were all scavenged, built, or given to me.

Some Further Points:

- 1) Don't buy what you don't need, and don't give in to advertising pressure to the contrary.
- 2) Refuse to buy overpackaged items. Overpackaging is a big offender on the wasteland scene.
- 3) "Adopt a preferential purchasing policy for products that contain recycled post-consumer waste." I couldn't have said it better myself. (Garbage Coalition, June 1974 pamphlet).
- 4) Share your worldly goods with your friends. "This record player is the property of all those who enjoy life."—another quote, from a friend.
- 5) Rent occasional-use items.

Finally, here are two pungent thoughts on recycling to mull over. Recycling is not an activity one does in order to maintain and preserve our society of waste and twisted values, that is, one does not recycle Cadillacs in order to make more Cadillacs.

For the individual, the whole point of recycling—and reducing—garbage is not to become a centre of waste production. Even if some of your garbage is not recyclable in the largest sense, you can still reduce the impact it will have. For example, you can reuse plastic bags instead of collecting a new bunch each time you go shopping.

List of Information Numbers and Recycling Depots:

The following depots take cans and bottles: 1008 Yonge St., 381 Greenwood Ave., 30 St. Lawrence St., 1116 King St. W., 95 Lavinia (Swansea Community Center), 425 Old Weston Rd., Dominion Store Parking lot 1811 Avenue Rd., the same 1500 Bayview Ave., the same 1780 Bayview Ave.

Bundled newspapers are picked up every Wednesday from the curb before 7:00 am.

Bundled newspaper and unsealable clothing can be dropped in Salvation Army red drop boxes. Call 366-7742 for information on locations. They will also pick up used furniture and clothing. Call 366-4686. The S.A. also operates second hand stores at 2203 Danforth Ave., 3339 Lakeshore Blvd. W., and 219 and 392 Queen St. E.

Great duds can be had for very little at the Cosmic Egg at 25 Baldwin and the Farmers Rag Market at 40 Wellington E., both second hand clothing stores.

BAUHAUS versus BACC

The Ca

Neither Dr. John Evans . . .

"It seems clear that a games room can be located with the space to be gained from reorganizing the Sigmund Samuel Library and the Science and Medicine Library."

October 15, 1974

What happened to those proposals — and the need for certain facilities which they represented — can best be summed up by the now well-worn phrase "23 years and 7 campus centres later."

The latest campus centre proposal, made in the late 60's, and its fate, have perhaps typified the university reaction to the need for various campus services.

SAC has taken the initiative — by commissioning architects, letting tenders, accepting applications for rentals, etc. Plans were well advanced.

The centre was blocked, not by any substantive debate over the need for the services it would provide, but by the inability of the university government to resolve a conflict of interest — after all, deciding what bank should go into the new centre was a decision not to be taken lightly.

In this context it is not difficult to see why SAC V.P. Helliwell in his letter of July 19, 1974 to Dr. Evans referred to the "many years of activity and frustration in attempting to establish a campus centre."

Campus as Campus Centre

Late that year, SAC decided it was time for a new initiative. A team of students from the Faculty of Architecture re-examined the entire problem. They developed a new and even more challenging approach. Their "Campus as Campus Centre" is a manual for the beautification and humanization of the University of Toronto.

Rather than centralizing facilities in a single building, the philosophy of the "Campus as Campus Centre" proposal favours the decentralization of social amenities throughout the campus. In essence, the plan transforms the university into a single federated community. It aims at ending insularity by encouraging cross campus interaction. Little more can be said other than it had tremendous potential.

At this time plans are underway to implement a small portion of the report in the Wilcox-Sidney Smith area. No doubt this is a step, finally, in the right direction. And yet, now the university implies that their long-incoming and grudging commitment to the idea absolves it of any further responsibility for improving the quality of life on campus. It remains imperative that other new ideas be explored and

The campus as Campus Centre Project towards stopping the concrete infiltration

The eleventh floor of Robarts Library offers an interesting view of the University of Toronto. It's not a bad place to read T.S. Eliot's "The Wasteland" — after all, you have a bird's-eye view of a case study. From the south-east window St. George proceeds past Corinthian Ramsey Wright and Sistine Sidney Smith — truly breathtaking. Looking to the east things tend to improve a bit; here you've actually got some grass. Moving to the south-west window the gravel of the Benson Building "people place" car park flows majestically into the inviting brick facades of New College.

If the book preservation chemicals don't do you in while you are enjoying this awesome landscape and the X-ray machine at Checkpoint Charlie doesn't reduce you to a quivering mass of biodegradable student, you'll undoubtedly get a new and more fundamental understanding of what "nitty gritty" is all about.

Concrete Sterility at U of T

To speak of the quality of life with reference to the University of Toronto is almost a contradiction in terms.

There are very few universities in Canada that have so completely and utterly ignored the problem of campus environment. From the novel designs of Simon Fraser to the exciting concepts inherent in the University of Saskatchewan (Saskatoon) to the culturally rich settings of McGill and Dalhousie we can better understand what is meant by a learning environment.

Each demonstrates a firm commitment to their students. Each understands that students are more than "Basic Income Units". It is indeed a sad and sobering thought that the University of Toronto — a university offering one of North America's richest academic experiences — cannot see fit to enrich that experience with anything more creative than concrete, bricks and glass.

The total and utter disregard for services on this campus is appalling. It certainly seems that the development of the university has been geared towards one objective and one objective alone: the provision of appropriate academic facilities. As crucially important as academic space may be, it does not provide justification for the university's disregard for its responsibilities to create a more habitable environment on this campus other than a parade of B.I.U.'s.

SAC's Role

The university's failure in this area has forced SAC into the role of initiator. For two decades now, students have had no choice but to assume the responsibility for the development of various campus centre proposals.

Throughout the post-war years SAC held the then-prevalent view that the establishment of a single campus centre building — the campus centre — was necessary. During that time, it was a widely held view that needed services could be best provided in a single building.

To that end, no less than 7 campus centre proposals were prepared by SAC.

CHUS, or mpus as Campus Centre

".... it is not yet possible to determine whether space for a games room can be found through the reorganization of the Sigmund Samuel and Science and Medicine Libraries." October 29, 1974

... or Vice-President Conway can seem to get their lines straight on the Campus Centre project proposed by SAC.

The "Campus as Campus Centre" plan was never intended to be a garbage can — a filing cabinet in which creative ideas can be hidden.

In the belief that campus redevelopment is urgent, the Students' Administration Council proposed the lacks both a games room and a daily undergraduate pub. In fact, the University of Western Ontario boasts two daily undergraduate pubs, as well as a games room. All the facilities operate near capacity.

Believing that University of Toronto students could benefit from the existence of such facilities, the SAC resolved during the summer to press the administration for the required space for these projects.

Administration Blocks Plans

Unfortunately, the university administration's reaction has been, to say the least, unencouraging. It has been typified by procrastination, conflicting responses, and a seeming lack of genuine concern.

The idea of the games room was first put to the administration during the summer. These informal approaches produced little, save a sampling of Simcoe Hall air-conditioning facilities by SAC executives on various occasions.

It was increasingly obvious that if SAC was going to get anywhere, it would have to vigorously pursue their objectives in a more direct manner.

Hence, on Tuesday, October 8, a meeting between SAC and top university administrators occurred. The seriousness with which SAC was presenting its proposals was underlined by the presence of nearly the entire SAC executive on one hand, and the presence of President Evans, Provost Forster, Vice-Provost Meincke and Vice-Presidents Conway and Connell on the other.

The administration had been forewarned of SAC's proposals by the delivery of a brief the week before which, in addition to the games room request, included a request for space for the establishment of a daily campus pub.

The university administration indicated that SAC's request for space for the projects had to be assessed in terms of the university's other space needs, notably, dead book storage and office space.

The net result of the meeting was a promise by Dr. Evans to indicate the next week a time schedule for decision-making in response to the SAC requests.

In the letter, Dr. Evans noted the possibility of locating immediate space for a daily pub was remote. SAC's suggested location, the SGS temporary building, was deemed to be needed for other uses.

Amos and Andy

Insofar as the space for a games room in Sig Sam was concerned, Dr. Evans stated that "the Department of Physical Plant can supply further information as to the feasibility and cost of developing these sites as a games room by October 24, 1974. As soon as this information is available, Professor Conway will be in touch with you to review the options suggested by this cost information."

Members of the SAC executive met with Vice-President Conway on Monday Oct. 28. She was unable to supply an answer as to whether space was available for the games room in Sig Sam, as architectural studies would not be available for two or three weeks.

Not only has the administration's response been devoid of urgency, but in fact, whatever tentative answers have been given have been in conflict. Witness the following quotations:

"It seems clear that a games room can be located within the space to be gained from reorganizing the Sigmund Samuel Library and the Science and Medicine Library."

Dr. Evan's letter to Seymour Kanowitch, Oct. 15, 1974.

"... it is not yet possible to determine whether space for a games room can be found through the reorganization of the Sigmund Samuel and Science and Medicine Libraries."

Prof. Conway's letter to Seymour Kanowitch, Oct. 29, 1974.

The university administration is not taking the need for these services seriously.

It is at this point students must show that they take the need for non-academic services seriously by indicating their sentiments in the SAC referendum being held this week. If they do not, they should be prepared to resign themselves to the social amenities which are apparent from the eleventh story of the Robarts Library.

This article was prepared by executive members of the Students' Administrative Council. Inasmuch as the council feels that a games room for all students as well as an on-campus, undergraduate pub is at least a preliminary step to increased student services, it is planning a ballot campaign later this week for students to express their desire for these services to the administration.

if implemented, would go a long way on of the campus' living space.

immediate development of two new on-campus services:

- 1) a games room
- 2) a daily campus pub

The games room would be furnished with billiard tables, ping-pong tables and coin-operated amusement machines. Current plans call for billiard table use rates of 75 cents per hour. This will be a reduction from off-campus rates.

The pub will be designed and administered in such a way as to create a quiet environment in which students could relax and meet friends either between classes or during the evening.

Rare is the Ontario university that

GAA has problems in unionizing

By EDWARD LARY

Some incredible things can happen when you try to exercise your legal rights at the University of Toronto.

Almost a year and a half ago the Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA) began organizing teaching assistants at the U of T's main campus into a trade union.

Section 3 of the Ontario Labor Relations Act states that "every person is free to join a trade union of his own choice and to participate in its lawful activities."

One of the lawful activities of a trade union is the attempt to become certified as the sole bargaining agent for a group of employees and to represent them in contract negotiations.

The GAA defines the group of employees or "bargaining unit" it wants to represent as all teaching assistants, teaching fellows, demonstrators, tutors, markers, instructors and laboratory assistants who are undergraduate students and graduate students at the U of T School of Graduate Studies.

Approximately 2,100 people employed at U of T fit this definition. Last March, the GAA applied to the Ontario Labor Relations Board for certification as the bargaining agent for teaching assistants at U of T.

At that time GAA organizers had signed up over 800 teaching assistants into their organization, comfortably above the minimum "35 per cent... of the employees in the bargaining unit" the law requires as a first step toward certification.

Shortly after that, incredible things started happening.

Toward the end of last April, the U of T personnel department released a list of over 3,400 names, supposedly all the people the university thought could possibly belong in the bargaining unit.

To date, the U of T administration has never formally defined its understanding of that unit to the Labor Relations Board.

Research by the GAA later revealed hundreds of names that had no business being on that list, like professional medical doctors and dentists.

But while the GAA had 35 per cent of a bargaining unit estimated at 2,100 members, they did not have 35 per cent of 3,400. So for the past several months GAA representatives have been meeting with university labor management relations officials in an attempt to reduce the list.

Meanwhile, the results of a "pre-hearing vote" held last May by the Labor Relations Board, which would determine whether the GAA is legally entitled to represent the teaching assistants, cannot be tabulated until the question of jurisdiction is settled.

And through it all, GAA members, like president Michael O'Keefe and organizer Andy Stanley, have grown frustrated and angry.

They point to the fact that "TAs" do about 40 per cent of the teaching at U of T (based on a 1972 Graduate Students' Union study); that the average wage of a teaching assistant in 1973 was under $1,000; that it took seven months of pressure last year to get the U of T to pay over $100,000 in back vacation pay that hundreds of teaching assistants were legally entitled to; that the lack of any clear regulation about what is involved in the job of a teaching assistant means that budget-conscious university departments underestimate the actual time required for doing a TA's job almost as a matter of course, so that TA's often wind up doing many hours of unpaid work for the university.

U of T will celebrate its 150th anniversary in style in 1976-7. Plans are underway already for sesquicentennial events on a grand scale with a fund-raising campaign to match.

The university retained the management-consulting firm of Stevenson and Kellogg to investigate whether it had the internal resources to conduct a campaign to raise $25 million. The firm decided U of T did not.

After a search the university has now hired the Toronto Ryerson Group for $20,000 as fund-raising consultants. External affairs vice-president Norman James has told the external affairs committee Ryerson will develop a picture of the U of T to be presented to 70 or 80

"prominent individuals."

Then they will be able to advise on the feasibility of a fund-raising campaign and how it should be conducted.

Apparently the university has neglected major donors since its last national campaign 15 years ago.

The Ryerson Group have advised the university of the importance of maintaining "a group of very wealthy people clearly visible in university life who are recognized as major philanthropists, giving large amounts of money to the university on something approaching a regular basis."

The only fear the university has is the possibility of present economic troubles preventing effective fund raising.

Lewis says rape is logical outcome of sexual roles

By SUSAN SLOTTOW

"Rape is the logical outcome of the way men and women see themselves," a workshop in Women and the Law workshop was told at New College Friday. Former Debra Lewis, a U of T graduate student, said. There are two basic reasons why a woman is raped. Firstly, men find women ready targets for their frustrations. According to traditional sexual roles, women are submissive and men are dominant and aggressive.

A man frustrated because of economic problems or social deprivation uses women as an outlet. Rape is a form of domination and women are socially acceptable objects for this domination, said Lewis.

Secondly, men are taught to go out and take something that they want, Lewis said. Carried to an extreme, if a man wants to sleep with a woman, he will, regardless of whether she agrees or not. The man may not even think he has done anything wrong. After such a rape, he may chat pleasantly and even ask for the woman's phone number.

Men are socialized to be aggressive. It's the woman who waits for the phone to ring; the man who does the calling. The man is the seducer; the woman, traditionally, decides how far the seduction will go.

"The onus of preventing rape is placed on the woman," Lewis explained.

Often, in court, the woman is asked to explicitly describe the rape and is asked questions such as "Did you enjoy it?"

"A woman's past sexual history doesn't have anything to do with the rape," Lewis said. "It shouldn't be discussed in court."

Often an attempt is made to discredit the woman, making her appear as the temptress and immoral.

Many of the rapes are recorded as unfounded rapes, rapes which the police do not believe happened.

Lewis, one of the founders of the Rape Crisis Centre, has completed an MA from the Center of Criminology and is currently working on a book on rape with Lorrenne Clark, a professor in philosophy.

DO YOU WANT A PUB AND A GAMES ROOM?

SAC BELIEVES THAT THE STUDENTS OF CANADA'S BIGGEST

THE UNIVERSITY ADMINISTRATION DOESN'T THINK SO.

SAC has proposed the establishment of a daily campus pub and a games room for the downtown campus. We need the School of Graduate Studies temporary building which is located beside the SAC office, and the empty stacks of Sig Sam. These areas, which are presently underused, are the only centrally located facilities suitable for these purposes.

Scarborough leads intercampus b-ball

By SANDY BENNETT

Part three of the intercampus women's basketball round robin was completed Wednesday night at Erindale.

With their two victories, Scarborough has emerged the top team of the league so far.

The calibre of the play was impressive and except for some erratic long passing, was comparable to intermediate intercollegiate games. The players, who practice one hour a week, appear to be well coached and in control of their game, so that there is no evidence of the brabing and bunching around the ball which marks many interfac games.

In the first contest, St. George B and Erindale proved to be the best matched teams of the league. Erindale profited from a St. George player mistakenly scoring in her own basket with the score 12-12 and

BELGIUM

The October issue of the French bourgeois women's magazine, Marie-Claire, was recently seized on newsstands in Belgium and banned from distribution because it contained an article explaining a simple safe method of abortion.

The article described explicitly how painless abortions, using a form of aspiration, similar to menstrual extraction, can be performed under hygienic conditions and in a supportive environment.

The article explained that this type of abortion is carried out in the presence of MLAC (Movement for the Free Right to Abortion and Contraception) and with the active participation of the patient. This reduces the woman's pain and "feelings of guilt," the article says.

If performed with the help of qualified persons, and controlled by doctors, La Gaudie — the Belgian weekly of the Fourth International — states the aspiration method is economical and efficient and above all puts an end to the nightmare women generally experience with abortions.

ARGENTINA

University students in Cordoba were dispersed by police as they tried to attend the funeral of two fellow students who were assassinated by the ultra-rightist Argentine Anti-Communist Alliance (AAA).

The police, using tear gas, allowed only the families of the murdered students — Carlos Alberto Miguel and Rodolfo Francisco Achorn — to attend the ceremony.

Two leftist government deputies, Hector Sandler and Horacio Sueldo, revealed they had received death threats from the AAA. Sandler proclaimed he would remain in the country despite the death threat.

"I am staying here because my presence here testifies to the necessity to resist offensive tactics, inspired by the CIA," he said.

PORTUGAL

Production stopped in all factories in Portugal for one minute on Oct. 8, the seventh anniversary of Che Guevara's assassination.

MOZAMBIQUE

Portuguese commandos attacked

Frelimo soldiers on Oct. 21, resulting in widespread violence that left about 50 dead and 100 wounded by the end of the day.

The violence started with an incident in which a Portuguese soldier shoved a young black who was wearing a shirt decorated with the Frelimo flag.

Later two commandos threw a grenade into a group of Frelimo soldiers guarding the entrance to a daily newspaper.

This attack led to exchanges of automatic weapon fire between the Portuguese army and Frelimo soldiers in the city's centre.

The 'commandos' responsible for instigating the violence are Portuguese soldiers who, under the previous fascist regime, specialized in fighting against the guerrilla liberation forces in Portugal's African colonies.

The number still living secretly in Mozambique is not known.

Only two months ago a white extremist rebellion in Lourenco-Marques failed in its attempt to end Frelimo influence and form a white minority government.

GERMANY

Frankfurt — Groups protesting the arrival of the Chilean soccer team in Frankfurt sabotaged the match against West Germany.

Although both uniformed and plainclothes police began guarding the stadium two hours before the game started, two stink bombs went off near the Chilean team's goal, covering that end of the field with foul-smelling smoke in a matter of seconds.

In addition, the initials of the MIR (Chile's Movement of the Revolutionary Left) were painted in huge red letters on the side of the Chilean consul's bright new Mercedes parked near the match.

"So far we've managed to get about 450 names off the list," O'Keefe said. "Most of the dentists are gone and the music professors at the Royal Conservatory were pretty upset when they found out that the personnel department considered them teaching assistants."

Once the GAA and the university decide on the size of the bargaining unit, which O'Keefe and Rankin both agree will take several months, the ballots of the May vote will be counted and any ineligible votes thrown out.

Soccer Blues defeat division champions 5-2 in Hamilton

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues finished their season in the same manner they started it—with a win over the McMaster Marauders. In the ten games sandwiched between these two contests the Marauders compiled an unbeaten record while the Blues could find little consistency.

Saturday's 5-2 victory in Hamilton against this season's OUA western division champions gave an indication of Toronto's potential. Since few players are leaving this year, Varsity's future looks bright.

Having defeated Western 1-9 in midweek to clinch the championship, Marauder coach, Bill Knox took the opportunity to field some of his second stringers.

Initially it seemed that their ceaseless energy and the greasy turf combined with a Toronto slow start, would bring them another win as they scored after 10 minutes.

A long pass by John Reid skidded through to Blues' Geoffe Crewe. His attempt to control the ball was hampered by the harassment of Sam Waifennoh, such that it spun loose behind him. Had the full backs, Rudi Kovacko and Jude Robinson, been supplying the extra cover required under the conditions, they would have gathered the stray ball with ease. As it was, Waifennoh outraced goalkeeper Igor Ivanisevic and hit a shot that trickled past the immobile custodian.

If the jubilant Marauders thought their goal presaged an easy afternoon, the next 15 seconds dispelled these hopes.

From the restart Yannis Vassiliou and Drew McKeown interchanged a bewildering series of wall passes. Eventually McKeown slotted a confident shot past Cochrane in the home net.

With the impetus of this goal, the Blues seized the initiative and forced the Hamilton team to adopt a more defensive posture.

Even though the regular Marauders were inserted into the lineup, they were unable to reverse the trend. The Toronto forwards buzzed enthusiastically into open spaces, making in viting targets for the defence-splitting through passes.

After 20 minutes, McKeown darted between Reid and Jasser after one such through pass and hit the ball past Cochrane again.

From that moment until half time the Blues pounded away at the home goal and were it not for the brilliance of Cochrane in the net, the game would have been split wide open.

After half time the game resumed its previous direction except that more use was made of Vince Ierullo down the Blues' right in order to minimize the effectiveness of Nagy and McEwan.

From one of Ierullo's crosses, a third goal was manufactured. Almost instinctively the ball found its way to McKeown in the middle.

He adroitly flicked a pass to Keith Hall who coolly bulged the net.

Given the traditional rivalry between the two clubs, neither the Marauders or the Blues assumed victory or defeat on the basis of a two goal margin and so they battled evenly, both seeking the important break.

It came with 20 minutes remaining and reduced the spread to only a single goal. A hopeful upfield punt out of the Hamilton end flew over the Toronto defender's heads and far in advance of any of the McMaster forwards. What should have been a routine play by Ivanisevic turned into a farce as he hesitated to gather the ball. When the ball bounced through the goalkeeper's hands, Laviolette grabbed the ball and fired it into the Toronto net.

For a while this strategy disrupted the composure of some of the Blues and the team was hard pressed to contain the Marauders, who pressed forward with waves of attacks.

The defence, with Ian Harris reading the play with masterly fashion, held firm and weathered the storm.

Perhaps only to give a brief respite to his over-worked defence, the midfield player gained ground up the right. He looked to find a colleague for a pass, but as they were all well covered, simply accelerated a few yards before hitting a 30 yard shot that screamed into the Hamilton net.

After that individual effort the final 15 minutes were dominated by the Blues. Scoring chances were frequently created and missed just as often until the 85th minute.

Varsity is cross country Champ

By HARRY ERR

For the third consecutive year, the Blues' cross country team has carried home the H R Little trophy. The other ten universities provided little opposition as Varsity runners totally dominated the meet.

Queen's hosted the 10,000 meter race at the Glen Lawrence Golf Club. After 100 meters the runners left the course to negotiate the four miles of muddy and rocky terrain. The team title was obvious by this time and all that remained to be decided were the individual standings.

Four runners quickly separated themselves from the remainder of the field. Varsity's John Sharp opened a slight lead, followed closely by Brad Morley and Joe Sax as well as York's Neil Hendry.

After 6,000 meters Sharp held a 30 meter lead on Hendry with Sax and Morley another 30 meters back. In the end Sharp, Canadian 5,000 meter champion, managed to hold on and win his first OUA cross country championship with last year's winner, Neil Hendry, second.

In the last 4,000 meters of the race Joe Sax, Canada's top steeplechaser, opened up on Brad Morley to finish a strong third. Morley held off a late move by Ryerson's Greg Lockhart to finish fourth, his finest OUA race in his three years running.

For the fourth year in a row, the top freshman finisher was a Varsity student. Steve Findlay took the honours with his seventh place finish.

The strong Varsity squad received good backup running from John Hiley and Ken Hamilton. There appears to be no relief in sight in the near future for the other OUA schools.

Next year's Toronto squad looks just as strong. All team members are returning except Sharp and Hamilton who are graduating.

The Irish Billiards Control Council, which this year is officiating the World Amateur Snooker Championship announced that South Africa will be banned from the competition. Several other nations including India and Sri Lanka, had refused to play if the South Africans were included.

On the other hand, the South African tennis team is breezing to a possible Davis Cup championship by default. None of the other teams that made it to the finals will agree to play the South Africans.

Blues -- Ottawa meet in final

By PAUL CARSON

Rumours are such interesting phenomena. Once started they seem to gain an inner momentum and simply refuse to be stilled regardless of the weight of contradictory evidence.

Take for example the belief, pervasive in many coaches' offices around the O-QIFC this year, that the football Blues can be beaten with the pass. Nobody's done it all year, but still the opponents try. Based on Saturday's 30-0 waltz (slow tempo) over Carleton Ravens, perhaps the Blues should rejoice in the apparent confusion.

Ravens did pass, to be sure, and they completed a very respectable 15 of 27 attempts; however, five of these completions went into the hands of Varsity defenders, including four second-half thefts by Rick Nakatsu. Doug Ball notched the other interception in the first quarter.

Ravens aerial strategy produced only 105 yards, seven first downs and no serious threat to Blues' shutout.

In fact, about all the Ravens did prove to the sparse gathering of the faithful who shivered through the dull game is that Blues have a pretty good pass defence and that Nakatsu is one hell of a fine football player.

Blues roster lists him as being five-foot-five and 145 pounds, (in his Cuban heels) and, if that's accurate Nakatsu is probably the shortest regular in the league. On the Blues squad, he is definitely the smallest and lightest, but he's also the most deadly tackler and after Saturday's performance, he leads the team in interceptions.

Like most so-called "individual efforts", the four interceptions were actually the culmination of effective team play by Blues defensive unit as the front four mounted an effective rush on Ravens quarterback Peter Stenerson so that his passes were hurried and somewhat inaccurate. Two of the interceptions were literally stolen from the hands of the intended receivers, one was partially a gift since the receiver ran an incorrect pattern, and the final one came when Nakatsu made an alert catch of a pass tipped away by a Varsity linebacker. Needless to say the five defensive turnovers gave Blues excellent field position for most of the game.

Offensively, Blues accumulated 425 yards, scoring majors on both their first and last possessions of the game. Symmetry was the order of the day as Libert Castillo scored in the first quarter, Mark Bragagnolo in the second and third, and John Fenn closed out the scoring on the game's final play.

Alas, inconsistency was also on the Blues menu as both Bragagnolo and Castillo fumbled away sure touchdowns inside the Ravens ten-yard line and quarterback Dave Langley also lost the ball once while attempting to scramble out of the pocket.

Blues receivers contributed to the generally lackluster proceedings by dropping several passes while quarterbacks Langley and Steve Kerr often fired their passes off into the wide blue yonder.

It's probably fair to say that the outstanding work of the defence is responsible for five and perhaps six of Blues' eight victories to date. It's also reasonable to assume that Ottawa Gee-Gees are going to score a few points this coming weekend. Hence, the onus will be on Blues' offensive corp to capitalize on all of the opportunities presented to it.

Enough of profound exhortations to duty. Here's a capsule summary of what happened Saturday during those rare moments when the offence regarded the game as something more than a mildly distracting ritual before this weekend's main event.

Blues ran during the first quarter, and ran, and ran. Up the gut, off-tackle, around the end, to the bench, up and down the sidelines, and once into the Carleton endzone.

Castillo's five-yard plunge capped an 80-yard march at 6:35 and about three minutes later Ball's interception was turned into a 27-yard field goal from Don Wright.

A fumble plus an unsuccessful third-down gamble ruined two promising marches in the second quarter, but then Ravens helped out with two foolish penalties on Blues third possession and Bragagnolo scored to up the count to 16-0 at the intermission.

Following a somewhat less than spectacular halftime show by the fearless forces of the LGMB, it was back to the Varsity ground game and business as usual. But Castillo fumbled on the Carleton five, and a few plays later came the polecat.

The polecat???? Well, you start with one player over the ball on one side of the field, put the quarterback about 10 yards behind him, then put all the remaining linemen and a few halfbacks 20 yards away on the other side of the field, and watch the defence go schizo.

Blues were confused, the officials were confused, and I suspect a few of the Ravens were slightly confused

The Varsity — Brian Pei

Libert Castillo off on one of his bulldozing runs. He ran up 94 yards, and one touch-down.

The formation produced three modest gains in a row, but then the roof fell in and the polecat was harnessed. Coach Ron Murphy simply assigned one lineman to hammer the center (who is also an end... but that's another story) while two fleet linebackers charged the suddenly vulnerable quarterback and proceeded to &?;+ him just as he released the ball. So much for the polecat.

Nakatsu's first interception gave Blues the ball deep in Carleton territory and several plays later Bragagnolo scored from two yards out.

The fourth quarter consisted mainly of Carleton's quarterbacks playing pitch and catch with Nakatsu.

Steve Kerr, Blues' number 3 signal-caller, got off the bench and threw some beautiful long spirals. All were either dropped or landed well out of bounds.

However, persistence pays off and Kerr engineered a drive in the final seconds culminating in Fenn's touchdown as the gun sounded. Well, the gun would have sounded if one were used at the Stadium, but you probably get the meaning anyway.

Thirty to zip, and that's an understatement. Blues simply dominated everything.

Everything, that is, except the game officials who racked up 194 yards in penalties on 17 infractions. Ravens total net offence was only 174 yards.

Western & Laurier are in finals

Not a sexist lead, gang, just the margins of victory in the other Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate Football Conference semi-finals staged Saturday afternoon.

As many expected, the most lopsided result came from Kitchener-Waterloo, where Laurier hammered McMaster 40-2. Laurier now plays Western, 34-13 victors over Guelph, for the western division title. The survivor hosts the Western Canada champs in one College Bowl semi-final.

The only surprise about Ottawa's win is that Bishops scored 13 points; Gee-Gees retaliated with 43.

Varsity and Ottawa meet at the Stadium on Saturday, November 9 at 1:00 pm for the O-QIFC eastern division title and a trip to the Atlantic Bowl in Halifax for the following week.

Ah yes, the Maritimes. Hotbed of adding-machine football, where never is heard a defensive word.

St. Francis Xavier over UPEI 39-22, New Brunswick 34 just better than Dalhousie's 32, and likely champion Acadia edged St. Mike's 24-22.

In the west, Alberta was riding high until league officials discovered the Golden Bears had used two ineligible players. Suddenly, it's a race again and the results could hinge on the final games this Saturday.

And don't forget the Mulock Cup playoffs today: Vic-Eng at 1 pm followed by St. Mike's and PhysEd.

Steve Walsh (11) finds tough going as he was held to 26 yards.

Mathematically the Blues won

Al Brenchley running back punts, Al Brenchley holding for field goals, Al Brenchley playing defensive halfback, Al Brenchley as a flanker; in fact, sophomore quarterback Al Brenchley did almost everything Saturday except play quarterback.

It's called bench strength, and this year Blues have it. Varsity coaches used no less than eleven separate players to run the ball and catch passes during the lopsided 30-9 rout of Carleton Ravens before that embarrassingly small crowd.

Mark Bragagnolo broke 100 yards again collecting 103 on 22 carries while Libert Castillo turned in his usual unheralded but impressive performance with 94 from only 13 attempts. Bob Hedges had 25 yards on five runs in the first quarter but sat out the remainder of the game with a minor injury.

John Fenn added 10 yards, Steve Kwiatowski bucked for nine and quarterback Dave Langley scrambled seven times for 43 net yards.

Overall, Blues ran 57 times for 284 yards, 16 first downs-and of course the four touchdowns.

Blues defensive unit had little trouble in containing Ravens main threat, halfback Joe Colvey, who gained only 21 yards on five carries. Steve Walsh had 26 and Paul Johnson 11 for the Ravens along the ground.

The passing statistics are somewhat closer as Langley was six of 10 for 96 yards and Kerr went three of 11 for another 45. Pete Stenerson completed 10 of 25 for 105 yards and substitute Rick Magee threw two incompletions.

Ravens' Paul Johnson topped all receivers with four catches for 45 yards while teammates Arunas Pleckaitis and Jeff Agnew each grabbed two. Brent Eisey led Blues with three receptions for 41 yards, Esteban Andryjowicz caught two, and Castillo, Jim Trimm, Kwiatowski and Steve Ince each had one catch.

Library workers denied wage hikes

By TOM GERRY

The U of T administration effectively refused yesterday to reopen contract negotiations with Roberts library workers for a cost of living allowance.

John Parker, the university's management and labor relations manager, insisted during a meeting with library workers the entire contract be reopened rather than just the section dealing with wages, as the library workers had asked.

But Parker also told the library workers he would recommend to business affairs vice-president Alex Rankin early reopening of contract negotiations if the library workers present their demands to him in writing.

A spokesman for the library workers' union said after the meeting reopening the entire contract is impossible for them.

"We're not ready. We have no negotiating team and we have no proposals," he said.

The spokesman said union representatives at the meeting were "very mad" at Parker's response to their demands.

"The administration apparently intends to offer us a little money if we agree to extend the present contract," the spokesman said.

If we did that, it would destroy everything," he said. "We'd be stuck for another year with the same contract."

The library workers' present contract expires at the end of June, 1975 and negotiations for a new contract will probably begin in three months.

The union maintains that its members need money now to help them cope with inflation. They are demanding $1,100 cost-of-living allowance and a clause in their contract to permit regular consideration of further allowances if inflation continues.

Students eating lunch at the Roberts cafeteria may well be discussing the administration's refusal yesterday to grant a cost-of-living bonus to library workers.

Students on OSAP may go into debt

U of T students presently receiving OSAP assistance are probably going in the hole at least $5 a week, according to figures released this week.

The cheapest a university student in Toronto could possibly live on per week is $37, according to a survey conducted by the U of T's housing service.

OSAP provides $32 per week for room and board.

The cheapest possible accommodation in a co-op rooming house costs, on the average, $22 per week, while food costs average about $15 per week, to a total of $37. Other accommodation costs are progressively more expensive, with a rooming house averaging $25 per week, and apartments ranging between $38 and $62 per week.

OSAP administrators have presently pegged cost of living grants to U of T students at $32, despite protests from U of T administrators that the average weekly cost should be $40.

Student awards officers around the province had recommended a figure between $34 and $40.

The housing service survey also indicates costs are likely to rise sharply again next year, with the cheapest possible accommodation in a co-op house costing $27.50 per week, and food costing $19 per week, for a total of $46.50 minimum.

Rooming houses are expected to average $32 per week, while apartments will range between $47.50 per week for a bachelor and $78 per week for a two-bedroom.

The survey, based on a sample of housing service listings, concurs with City of Toronto figures which indicate rents increased 22 per cent in 1974. Moreover, "the housing service considers the 22 per cent increase over 1973 may even be a bit conservative for accommodation near the campus," notes the report.

The survey indicates that the cost of food and housing for students will have almost doubled between 1972 and 1975. Food, for example, which cost $10 per week in 1972 is expected to cost $19 per week in 1975.

Co-op houses, which cost $15 per week in 1972, will cost $27.50 in 1975. Rooming houses, with cooking facilities, will have jumped from $17 per week in 1972 to $32 per week in 1975.

However, OSAP grants have not increased at all between 1972 and 1975. For out of town students, the rate in 1971-72 and 1972-73 was "variable to a maximum of $32."

Now it is set at $32. Town students have had their grant increased from $15 per week in 1971-72 to $21.45 per week in 1974-75. Housing service estimates for 1975 prices are based on four factors, amounting to a $25 per cent increase: general increase in the cost of living, decline in the number of housing starts, low vacancy rate and the possibility of rooming house and co-op licencing (which would force landlords to raise standards, and therefore costs).

Engineer short of support

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Third year engineering student Gary Dale has three complaints against the Ontario Students' Assistance Program (OSAP).

First, he says, the government gave him $500 less than what he expected after reading OSAP regulations.

Secondly, what money they did give him was all loan, no grant.

Third, he was informed of OSAP's decision so late that he could make no other arrangements, like spending less money or getting a part-time job.

Dale was given only $1,210 this year by OSAP and this came only two weeks ago, even though he had applied in early July.

But according to OSAP formula, Dale says he should have got a loan and grant of around $1,736—$1,210 in loan and the rest in grant.

Even a U of T student award officer who Dale has gone to see "at least half a dozen times" over the case, thinks he should have received more and can't explain why not, says Dale.

Dale says he had budgeted for at least $1,700 from OSAP, a figure he says he needs "just to live." As a special independent student (his parents refuse to help support him), he expected at least this amount of money from OSAP.

Apparently, Dale says, OSAP treated him differently because of his special independent status. "They seem to have a lot of special rules for special cases I was never told of," he says.

Dale said that had he been told earlier, he might have been able to find cheaper lodging or have found a part-time job to raise the extra money.

But now, he said, he has so much schoolwork that he cannot take the time to raise the extra $500 through a job.

Dale has appealed to OSAP, but so far has received no reply on his case.

GAA talks 'going nowhere'

Negotiations between the Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA) for their local at Victoria College and the Vic administration are "going nowhere," according to GAA organizer Andy Stanley.

"They're disagreeing with every clause (of the contract)," Stanley complained. "It's like talking to a wall."

The GAA was certified by the Ontario Labor Relations Board as the bargaining agent for the teaching assistants at Victoria College in August, after a majority of the teaching assistants voted in favor of union representation.

On Oct. 7, the GAA presented a 93-page contract to the Vic negotiating committee, which consists of the college bursar, Vic board of regents member and three department heads.

The contract contains clauses on wage increases, a built-in cost-of-living adjustment, job security, grievance procedure, maximum hours of work and class size as well as an employee benefits package.

"The problem of dealing with these people," says GAA president Michael O'Keefe, "is that they don't understand the language of a labor contract. They're reading the contract like it was an academic dissertation and aren't really prepared to negotiate."

Frederick Stokes, Vic bursar and a member of the Vic negotiating committee, disagrees with O'Keefe. Stokes says the administration is having no trouble understanding the contract. Stokes has had no previous experience in contract negotiations.

GAA efforts to unionize about 2,100 teaching assistants at U of T's main campus are currently stalled while the GAA and university administrators debate who does and who doesn't qualify as part of the bargaining agent.

Applications increase this year at U of T

Final figures published by the office of admissions indicate a 14.1 per cent increase in applications for 1974 over 1973.

The largest demand came from the faculty of Architecture, Urban and Regional Planning and Landscape Architecture, where applications were up 33.8 per cent over last year, while applications for Applied Science and Engineering were up 24.9 per cent.

However, "the very marked upward trend in the health-related fields slowed somewhat after last year's dramatic increases." Applications for Pharmacy were up 7.2 per cent, Nursing 5.3 per cent, and Dental Hygiene 5.6 per cent.

Surprisingly, applications in the faculty of Arts and Science were also up, by 22.9 per cent, although "it is difficult to know whether this increase is due to a waning of interest in the professional areas or whether more individuals are preparing for professional careers which require one or two years in the Faculty of Arts and Science."

Only Erindale College has fallen short of its projected enrolment, although by much less than last year. The admissions office predicts the college will "increasingly become an attractive college for students to select."

All told, 24,237 applied to get into first year at U of T this year, of which 14,868 were accepted.

Toughest college nut to crack appears to be University College, which turned down 2,244 eager collegians. Trinity College turned down 810 of its 1301 applicants.

Anthrop students want to bring back professor

Anthropology students' representatives are currently attempting to persuade the department to bring back a highly rated professor who taught at U of T last year.

Paul Puritt, an associate professor in social and cultural anthropology, was a visiting professor here for one year and received nothing but praise in student course evaluations for the Anthropology 100 he taught.

Anthropology Students' Union president Brian Clarence said there will be an opening in the department next year for a professor.

Clarence said many students have told him how much they liked Puritt and would like to see the professor back at U of T teaching.

Puritt is presently teaching for a year at Trent University in Peterborough.

Clarence noted his union is trying to seat "at least one student" on the department's staffing search committee, which advises the chairman on all department hirings. No students are now on the body. Anthropology department chairman R.B. Drewitt has told Clarence he will consider the request to seat students on the hiring committee.

Drewitt acknowledged last night that Puritt was "popular with students."

The chairman said there was "a good possibility" a vacancy will exist in the department's staff next year.

However, Drewitt said, Puritt wants to do research in East Africa next year.

Although Puritt could not be reached for comment last night, Clarence said the associate professor would like to get a grant from Canada Council to do research.

But, Clarence added, Puritt would likely want to teach at U of T if he couldn't get the grant.

Last year's anthropology student course evaluations described Puritt in the following terms:

"His excellent and controversial, humanist approach and his willingness to listen and discuss viewpoints, with even a large class, provided the major reason for attendance at (ANT 100) lectures."

Students crowd into another of those famous intellectual slugfests at The Varsity.

Students flock to U of T

Ontario universities' enrolment has increased by almost five percent this year according to figures released by the ministry of colleges and universities last week.

Full time enrolment has reached 146,062 compared to 139,211 in 1973-4. Graduate student enrolment, included in the figures, has risen to 14,137, also an increase of five percent.

Community college enrolment has also increased to 55,038 from 51,794 in 1973-4, an increase of 6.3 percent.

Only two universities are down in enrolment, York and Carleton, while most have enjoyed small increases. This is in stark contrast to the situation several years ago when many of the smaller campuses were suffering from drastic declines, necessitating extensive budgetary cutbacks.

U of T had the largest increase from 29,375 to 31,025 but Guelph had the largest percentage increase with an almost 10 percent rise from 8,616 to 9,453.

Mac has dead air

HAMILTON (CUP) — McMaster's students' radio station has gone off the air.

At a meeting last week the radio staff members decided to cease regular programming and direct all their efforts toward producing a report which they hope will eventually result in their being granted an FM licence by the Canadian Radio and Television Commission (CRTC).

"With the carriers' current, we just can't reach enough students," said Richard Thibodeau, program director of CKMR, the McMaster station.

In past years the radio station has come under increasing criticism for its ineffectiveness. Convinced that an FM licence is the only way to improve the station's lot, the staff is directing all its efforts in that direction.

Thibodeau said with an FM licence "we would truly become a campus radio station."

FM licensing has become feasible for campus radio stations now that the CRTC is granting low power FM licences. This kind of licence would allow Mac Radio to reach all of Hamilton and some surrounding areas.

The budget now allotted to Mac Radio will be used mostly for paid consultants for the FM report.

The FM report will have to go before the students' council before application is made to the CRTC. Mac Radio must have a financial commitment for five years support from the students' council before the CRTC will consider approval.

Under similar circumstances U of T's Radio Varsity is in the process of applying for an FM licence. Now the station can only be heard through Rogers and Graham cable and closed circuit in some U of T residences.

An engineer's report is now being prepared before the Radio Varsity request goes to SAC for approval.

The U of T station has experienced similar problems, floundering for the last few years and coming under criticism for poor programming. There have been staff problems and one of the major reasons some feel there has been trouble attracting quality staff has been the small potential listenership.

Invites given

One of the university's most famous and beloved institutions, The Varsity, invites all interested to a women's meeting at our regular offices at 91 St. George St.

The meeting will be held at 4 pm today. We will be discussing women's issues and possible story ideas that arise from them.

Former U of T politico runs for trustee

Debra Lewis, a former U of T student politician, is now running for trustee in Ward Five in the upcoming Dec. 2 municipal elections.

Lewis, who now is researching a book for publication next spring, graduated this year with an MA in criminology. She was active on SAC and VUSAC as well as being a member of the Forster task force on academic appointments.

Lewis is concerned about decreasing support for the public school system which has resulted in larger class sizes, shortages of supplies and a lack of special programs.

"It is necessary that additional funding be found for the support of the public school system," she said. "The operation of schools primarily on the basis of property taxes is clearly inadequate."

Lewis is calling for more provincial and federal support based on increased corporate taxes, but with the retention of local autonomy.

"Educational policy must be decided at the local level with full recognition of the needs of each area," Lewis said. "It is only at this level that potential for interaction between trustees, teachers and parents exists."

Lewis, a Ward 5 resident, is running on a platform of local autonomy and local control of educational programs. She feels her background in educational issues and women's issues is important.

Ward 5 runs north from Bloor St. to St. Clair Ave. and is bounded by Spadina Rd. to the west and the Don Valley Parkway to the east.

Sugar daddies asked to sweeten the pot

U of T is counting on a select few big-money donors to deposit their largesse with the university during the sesquicentennial campaign.

According to Arthur Maybee, president of the Ryerson Group, a consultant firm hired by the university to do a feasibility study on fund-raising, the university should spend its time "getting to know the constituency, that is, the people who might be persuaded to become benefactors to the university of six or seven figure donations."

Maybe expects from half to two-thirds of the funds for the campaign to come from 200 donors getting rid of over $25,000 apiece, while another quarter to one-fifth would come from donations of more than $1,000. The sesquicentennial is U of T's 150th anniversary, which will be in 1977. The university is planning an elaborate fund-raising campaign at that time to finance such projects as the Campus as Campus Centre.

Solicitations are to begin next spring and last for about a year.

Church leaders present grape boycott

Leaders of major churches in Toronto yesterday joined with labor and city representatives to present petitions with the names of 35,000 Dominion store customers who want the food chain to stop selling non-UFW U.S. grapes and lettuce.

The petitions were presented to Dominion store officials at their Rogers Road headquarters. They call on Dominion to stop selling grapes and lettuce not picked by members of the United Farmworkers, the union on strike in California for bargaining rights for farm workers.

A spokesman for the church leaders, Brad Massman, social action director of the Roman Catholic archdiocese of Toronto, said the 35,000 signatures were collected in the last six weeks, just two days a week, at 35 Dominion stores and only from Dominion shoppers.

"We are showing proof to Dominion that a sampling of at least 35,000 shoppers wants the chain to stop selling grapes and lettuce not picked by UFW members," Massman said. "At some of their stores over 2,000 shoppers signed the petition with their name, address and phone number."

"Dominion stores management has refused to listen to the churches, the unions and our civic leaders, saying they will sell grapes because their customers want them and don't care about the farmworkers struggle," Massman said.

"These petitions are proof, in a stack three feet high, that Dominion customers do care and it's Dominion management that doesn't care about farmworkers and child laborers," Massman said.

Over 35,000 have signed petitions urging the food chain to boycott non-UFW produce.

Administrative interference must stop

The letter reprinted on the right effectively confirms what many have felt about the recent controversy in the sociology department: that a small group of powerful administrators is able to exercise virtual veto power over academic appointments.

The case at hand — first mentioned in The Varsity Oct. 23 — is that of John Seeley, radical Canadian sociologist, who has been unable to gain appointment at either U of T's sociology department or the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

At both institutions, senior administrators overturned the recommendations of hiring committees in favor of giving Seeley a job. At OISE, the subject is presently under review.

The fact that administrators have the power to overturn such decisions should be of concern to everyone: it allows whim, prejudice and petty politics to creep into a process which should be as open and honest as possible. Where should lie the intrigue in looking for the best person possible?

Administrators should abide by decisions fairly arrived at in individual departments.

Democracy in university decision-making is worthless as long as administrators continue to wield the power to override any decision, and as long as hiring committees remain solely advisory.

The sociology department has come under the gun recently for some administrative decisions, but the controversy is merely indicative of a deeper problem. With the arrival of popular decision-making (parity on hiring committees), and a left-liberal chairman, a small conservative clique has been edged from power in the sociology department.

As a result, the conservatives express their force at the administrative level, where it is possible to veto appointments. And the department, Zeitlin especially, is caught in the bind of conflicting loyalties.

One wonders what would happen if such a tightly-run ship as the department of history were ever to come under wider control, moving slightly to the left. Things appear calm there now simply because there is no glimpse of change on the horizon. Were there to be some progressive changes made, chaos would probably ensue.

The situation in sociology does not bespeak success in further attempts to democratize the university.

Dear Ted:

In reply to your query of May 17th concerning John Seeley, I want to assure you that the decision not to make him an offer was entirely my own. It is true that at one point during our departmental deliberations the Deans of Arts and Science and the School of Graduate Studies expressed strong opposition to the Seeley appointment; and that this opposition, in turn, prompted the Provost to call me, saying that he could not approve the appointment if the Deans failed to do so.

However, I persuaded these members of the administration that they ought not interfere in this matter unless they had concrete evidence indicating that Seeley was not deserving of a tenured full-professorship at the University of Toronto. Whereupon they placed the matter squarely in my hands. In the end it was I, personally, who decided that given the substantial opposition to the appointment on the part of the senior faculty, I could not make Seeley an offer. I trust this will clarify the issue for you.

Cordially,

Irving M. Zeitlin

Prof says teaching quality not rated highly

I am presently an assistant professor in a large natural science department. I have been teaching at the University of Toronto for five years, and will be considered at some point during this academic year for tenure. I personally believe that my primary reason for being at this university is to teach my students. My particular discipline has given me great enjoyment through the years, and I hope that I can somehow share this excitement with my students. While research is an important component of my discipline, as it is with any natural science, I believe that it should never so distract me such that I should be forced to take time away from concentrating on being a good teacher.

Regrettably, if past history is any indication, my teaching ability will be given very little consideration when it will be decided whether or not I should be granted tenure. In my department, there are three other factors which are considered to be more important than teaching ability. The first is the number of publications a professor has produced. Yes, the publish or perish edict is still very much alive within the university. Indeed, in my department there are many professors who haven't the slightest bit of interest in publishing, who must deliberately take time away from their teaching in order to concentrate on producing publishable written material so that their position within the department will not be jeopardized.

The second factor is the type of research a professor is engaged in. While it is important that any professor who considers himself a good teacher be actively involved in new areas of research which he can relate to his students as new discoveries in that field, it is not this particular form of classroom oriented research which is considered to be important by my department. Instead, it is trying to encourage faculty members to engage in research which is thought to be valuable to the government, because whether this type of research is valuable to the teaching-learning process or not, it is certainly valuable in terms of attracting to the department large government grants.

Finally, the third factor which is considered to be more important than teaching ability is the way in which a professor gets along with senior professors in the department. More often than not, willingness to serve on university committees and to the faculty association party line, will guarantee a professor tenure much more readily than will his ability to teach.

I believe that there are two cases which occurred in the past two years which best illustrate the way tenure decisions are made in my department.

The first case involved a professor teaching on the downtown campus. I believe that there are many people now teaching in this department who if asked about his teaching ability, would "unofficially" tell you that this chap was one of the best teachers this department has ever had. His personality was magnetic, and he had an uncanny ability to inspire interest in his students.

Unfortunately, it is equally well known that the chairman of this department did not particularly like this professor, and when the time came for him to be considered for tenure, the chairman quite easily arranged it so that tenure would be denied. As a result, this brilliant man is no longer teaching at this university.

The second case concerns a professor in this department teaching at one of the suburban campuses. This professor too was highly regarded for his ability to teach. He always rated unusually high in student-run course evaluations, and was always most popular with his students. Unfortunately for him, he spent more time concentrating on being a good teacher than he did on being a good publisher, and last year when he was up for consideration for tenure, tenure was denied. This professor too is no longer teaching at this university.

I would personally like to thank the Students' Administrative Council and particularly its president, Seymour Kanowitch, for the time and effort they have spent this year trying to acquaint the university community with the way tenure decisions are made on this campus. I read in The Varsity the account which Mr. Kanowitch gave to the Academic Affairs Committee on the way tenure decisions are usually made, and his recitation of the factors involved in several cases in which good teachers have been wantonly fired. His knowledge of the factors involved in these cases is certainly consistent with my personal knowledge of some of the cases. Conversely, I was shocked to hear that Dean Safarian of the School of Graduate Studies had told the committee that he was not aware of any good teachers who had been denied tenure at this university. I could name him at least two.

I would also salute SAC for their push to seat students on tenure committees. I feel fairly certain that if students sat in equal numbers with faculty members on tenure committees, then the two professors that I have previously described would still be teaching at the university. I personally feel that my ability to teach would be considered far more seriously by a tenure committee with students on it than it will be by a committee of only senior faculty members.

I realize that it is The Varsity's policy not to print unsigned letters but I strongly urge you to print this letter. I do so for two reasons. First, for the sake of the thousands of students who must on a daily basis be subjected to the tortures of substandard teaching, the only possible consequence of a system in which research, publication, and collegiality are treated as paramount and teaching ability is considered to be inconsequential.

Secondly, for the sake of dozens of my teaching colleagues who must on a daily basis ignore their teaching responsibilities so that they may conduct irrelevant research in order to retain their teaching appointments, and whose only recourse is to sit back and cry out anonymously as I do today. Perhaps some day the university will be sufficiently tolerant so that we will be able to openly criticize procedures without endangering our jobs, but until such time, this is the only way we can communicate.

Students needed on committees

Students on tenure committees are fundamental to the quality of teaching at this university, contrary to the belief of Brian Hoyes in the op-ed of November 4.

As he notes, "... teaching is not always done properly at U of T." because "... teaching is said not to be the primary function of the faculty and therefore is due for only partial consideration in deciding tenure." How can this be changed?

Surely, having students on tenure committees is one way of ensuring a change. Students' primary, but certainly not exclusive concern, is with the quality of teaching. If they sit as voting members on tenure committees, faculty members who are good teachers will be assured of a fair hearing that will give equal weight to teaching and research. Obviously, these good teachers will not neglect research, because they will know that all members of the tenure committee, but perhaps especially faculty, will expect a high standard in this regard as well.

Conversely, if the good researchers know that students will be voting on individual tenure questions, they will be more rigorous with themselves on improving their teaching methods. In the past, the all-faculty tenure committees have tended to ignore the quality of teaching.

In sum then, students on tenure committees are the only certain way to ensure that teaching gets the emphasis it deserves. In a recent survey of some 60,000 faculty members in universities in the United States, 64 percent stated that, "... in my department it is very difficult for a man to achieve tenure if he does not publish." This, despite the fact that on paper, most universities give equal weight to research and teaching in the tenure granting criteria.

It is certainly true that having students on tenure committees is not the final word in improving the teaching at U of T.

Programs that Brian Hoyes outlined, such as professional development courses through OISE and OCE, are very important. Teacher-training courses for new staff are needed. Frequently young lecturers are exceptionally competent graduate researchers with little expertise in communication. One hopeful sign in this regard is the demand of the Graduate Assistants' Association at Victoria for inclusion of an orientation session on teaching methods in the T.A.'s contract.

Representation on tenure committees is not the only way to improve teaching standards. But it is the most important at this time — when the question of the composition of tenure committees is about to go to the Governing Council.

Christopher Allnutt,
Executive Assistant,
SAC.

Pleased to media?

I very much appreciate the interest The Varsity has shown in the current, unfortunate condition of Radio Varsity which has led to my resignation.

I believe that a greater public awareness of and interest in this particular media outlet could not help but move the station toward a goal many of us have aimed at for some time. That goal, of course, is a government-licensed, FM outlet which could bring (at least to the Toronto area) the combined talents and expertise of the university community to bear on the whole spectrum of issues and events which make up day-to-day life in the most unique urban area in North America.

The only section of Monday's story on my recent resignation with which I, personally, could take exception is the fourth paragraph. I believe that what was said to your reporter — and the statement on which I still stand — is that the Students' Administrative Council does not understand media operations in general, and electronic media operations in particular. And — strangely enough — I believe that most SAC members would be the first to agree with me.

Beware of Toike Oike

I didn't think anything could ever drive me to write a letter to The Varsity, but this is more than anyone can bear. I refer, of course, to that miserable campus rag, the Toike, specifically the one to be inflicted on the university tomorrow (Thursday).

As anyone who has been around knows, the quality (if you are generous enough to grant it that name) has been steadily decreasing since 1874. However, it has never been anywhere near as bad as this year. I don't know whether it's because of incompetent staff, lack of interest, or half-assed editing (though Dr. Evans did do a reasonable job last year), but the result is in general a pile of crap second only to The Varsity.

There seems to be a sadly mistaken attitude among Toikers that ethnic jokes are actually offensive to the minorities concerned. (Speaking of which, how can anyone try to pawn off a so-called "Offensive Article" that isn't even slightly perverted?) In fact, there seems to be a virtual fear of offending anyone who is likely to read it.

So what does the Toike do? It picks on a harmless group of religious fanatics who are less of a campus presence than sober Engineers. And, to top it all off, the supposed parody isn't even funny!

Now, I am hardly one to suggest that the Toike be scrapped, nor am I one to suggest that it revert to a tri-weekly moral cesspool. But it would be nice if the staff would stop worrying about outside pressures, and devote their attentions to creating something funny and worthwhile.

Surely no one actually believes that the rough, uncouth image of Engineers that the Toike has presented in past years is accurate, but this is no reason to abandon it; for after all, this is one of the roots of the renowned Skule Spirit that makes the Engineering Faculty one of the most active groups on campus. (Who always makes up most of the crowd at football games?)

Let's see a return to a more lively Toike.

HUMANISTIC JUDAISM

There is now a fourth alternative in Judaism to existing Orthodox, Conservatism and Reform. It is called Humanistic Judaism.

Humanistic Judaism is an attempt to make Judaism relevant to a scientific age and to an urban culture. It does not find the heart of Judaism and of religion in a belief in a supernatural god. Rather, it finds the essence of Judaism in a moral commitment to human dignity and to ethical behavior. The Philosophy of Humanistic Judaism was first given organized religious expression with the establishment of The Birmingham Temple of the Detroit area in 1963, and today there are three other Humanistic Jewish Temples — one in Deerfield, Illinois, one in Westport Connecticut, and one in Houston, Texas.

In 1969 the Society for Humanistic Judaism was established in Detroit. Its purpose: to provide an international voice for Humanistic Judaism to sponsor the creation of philosophic and aesthetic materials for educational purposes, and to organize new congregations.

So, on Friday, November 8, the Society will present a service of Humanistic Judaism with a lecture on its philosophy for interested Jews in the Toronto area. Rabbi Sherwin Wine of The Birmingham Temple will present the service and lecture, with a question and answer period to follow.

If you are unaffiliated because there is no Jewish institution in the Toronto area which conforms to your beliefs or life style — or if you feel hypocritical or discontent with your present Jewish Religious affiliation — Humanistic Judaism may be the answer.

The activities of midwives and wisewomen have always elicited a suspicious response from the authorities — as the 'witches' of Salem found.

CUP — The following article is excerpted from "Witches, Midwives and Nurses" by Barbara Ehrenreich and Deirdre English (Glass Mountain Pamphlets) and is available from New Hogtown Press, Toronto.

Women have always been healers. They were the unlicensed doctors and anatomists of western history. They were abortionists, nurses and counsellors. They were pharmacists, cultivating healing herbs and exchanging the secrets of their uses. They were midwives travelling from home to home and village to village.

For centuries women were doctors without degrees, barred from books and lectures, learning from each other, and passing on experience from neighbour to neighbour and mother to daughter. They were called 'wise women' by the people, witches or charlatans by the authorities. Medicine is part of our heritage as women, our history, our birthright.

Today, however, medicine is the property of male professionals. Ninety-three percent of the doctors in the US are men; and almost all of the top directory and administrators of health institutions. Women are still in the overall majority — 70 percent of health workers are women — but we have been incorporated into an industry where the bosses are men.

We are no longer independent practitioners, known by our own names, for our own work. We are for the most part, institutional fixtures, filling faceless job slots: clerk, dietary aide, technician, maid.

The suppression of women health workers and the rise to dominance of male professionals was not a 'natural' process, resulting automatically from changes in medical science, nor was it the result of women's failure to take on healing work.

It was an active takeover by male professionals. And it was not science that enabled men to win out: the critical battles took place long before the development of modern scientific technology.

WITCHCRAFT AND MEDICINE IN THE MIDDLE AGES

Witches lived and were burned long before the development of modern medical technology. The great majority of them were lay healers serving the peasant population, and their suppression marks one of the opening struggles in the history of man's suppression of women as healers.

The other side of the suppression of witches as healers was the creation of a new male medical profession, under the protection and patronage of the ruling classes.

The age of witch-hunting spanned more than four centuries (from the 14th to the 17th century) in its sweep from Germany to England. It was born in feudalism and lasted — gaining in virulence — well into the 'age of reason'.

The witch-craze took different forms at different times and places, but never lost its essential character: that of a ruling class campaign of terror directed against the female peasant population. Witches represented a religious, political and sexual threat to Protestant and Catholic Churches alike, as well as to the state.

Two of the most common theories of the witch-hunts are basically medical interpretations, attributing the witch craze to unexplainable outbreaks of mass hysteria.

One version has it that the peasantry went mad. According to this, the witch craze was an epidemic of mass hatred and panic cast in images of a blood-lust peasant mob bearing flaming torches.

Another psychiatric interpretation holds that the witches themselves were insane.

But, in fact, the craze was neither a lynching party nor a mass suicide by hysterical women. Rather, it followed well-ordered procedures. The witch-hunts were well organized campaigns, initiated, financed and executed by Church and State.

Commonly, the accused was stripped naked and shaved of all her body hair, then subjected to thumb-screws and the rack, spikes and bone-crushing 'boots', starvation and beatings. The point is obvious: The witch-craze did not arise spontaneously in the peasantry. It was a calculated ruling class campaign of terrorization.

The most fantastic accusation of all was that witches helped and healed those who had no doctors and hospitals, and who were bitterly afflicted with poverty and disease. The church told these sufferers that their torment was a mark of sin.

But the gout and apoplexy of the rich got plenty of attention. Kings and nobles had their court physicians who were men, sometimes even priests.

The real issue was control: male upper class healing under the gaze of the church was acceptable, female healing as part of a peasant subculture was not.

The wise woman, or witch, had a host of remedies which had been tested in years of use. Many of the herbal remedies developed by witches still have their place in modern pharmacology. They had pain-killers, digestive aids and anti-inflammatory agents.

The witch-healer's methods were as great a threat to the Catholic Church, if not the Protestant) as her results, for the witch was an empiricist: She relied on her senses rather than on faith or doctrine, she believed in trial and error, cause and effect.

Her attitude was not religiously passive, but actively inquiring. She trusted her ability to find ways to deal with disease, pregnancy and childbirth — whether through medications or charms. In short, her magic was the science of her time.

THE RISE OF EUROPEAN MEDICINE

Meanwhile the ruling classes were cultivating their own breed of secular healers — European medicine became firmly established as a secular science and a profession that excluded women.

Confronted with a sick person, the university-trained physician had little to go on but superstition. Bleeding was a common practice, especially in the case of wounds. Leeches were applied according to the time, the hour, the air, and other similar considerations.

Medical theories were often grounded more in "logic" than in observation. Incantations and quasi-religious rituals were thought to be effective. A frequent treatment for leprosy was a broth made of the flesh of a black snake caught in a dry land among stones.

Such was the state of medical "science" at the time when witch-healers were persecuted for being practitioners of "magic". It was witches who developed an extensive understanding of bones and muscles, herbs and drugs, while physicians were still deriving their prognoses from astrology and alchemists were trying to turn lead to gold.

THE SUPPRESSION OF WOMEN HEALERS

Universities were closed almost without exception to women wishing to study medicine, and licensing laws were established to discredit the better off, more educated women-healers. In trials they were convicted on the grounds that as women they dare cure at all.

By the 14th century male doctors had won a clear monopoly over the practice of medicine among the upper classes (except for midwifery). They then turned their attack on the great mass of female healers, the witches.

The partnership between Church, State and medical profession reached full bloom in the witch trials. The doctor was held up as the medical "expert" giving an aura of science to the whole proceeding.

The Church explicitly legitimised the doctors' professionalism, denouncing non-professional healing as equivalent to heresy: "If a woman dare to cure without having studied she is a witch and must die." (Of course, there wasn't any way for a woman to study.) Finally, the witch craze provided a handy excuse for the doctor's failings in everyday practice: Anything he couldn't cure was obviously the result of sorcery.

The proliferation and success of the witch-hunts led straight into an assault on the last preserve of women's medicine — midwifery. In the hands of the non-professional barber surgeons who wielded forceps, obstetrics was transformed into a lucrative business which "real" physicians entered in force in the 18th century.

WOMEN AND THE RISE OF THE AMERICAN MEDICAL PROFESSION

In the US the male takeover of healing roles started later than in England or France, but ultimately went much further. There is probably no industrialized country with a lower percentage of women doctors than the US today. England has 24 percent; Russia has 75 percent; the US has only seven percent.

By the turn of the century, medicine here was closed to all but a tiny minority of necessarily tough and well-heeled women. What was left was nursing, and this was in no way a substitute for the autonomous roles women had enjoyed as midwives and general healers.

In 1800 the US was ripe for the development of a full-fledged "medical profession". The majority of practitioners constituted anyone who could demonstrate healing skills.

But a growing number of formally trained doctors began to take great pains in distinguishing themselves from the host of lay practitioners.

The most important real distinction was that the formally trained, or "regular" doctors as they called themselves, were male, usually middle class, and almost always more expensive than the lay competition. The

Physicians, Midwives and Nurses

"regulars" were taught to treat most illnesses by "heroic" measures: massive bleeding, huge doses of laxatives, calomel (a laxative containing mercury) and later, opium. (The European medical profession had little to offer at this time either.) There is no doubt that these "cures" were often either fatal or more injurious than the original disease.

The lay practitioners were undoubtedly safer and more effective than the "regulars". They preferred mild herbal medications, dietary changes and hand-holding to heroic interventions. Maybe they didn't know any more than the "regulars", but they were less likely to do the patient harm. Let alone, they might well have displaced the "regular" doctors with even middle class consumers in time, but they didn't know the right people. The "regulars", with their close ties to the upper class, had legislative clout.

By 1830, 13 states had passed medical licensing laws outlawing "irregular" practice and establishing the "regulars" as the only legal healers. This early grab for medical monopoly inspired mass indignation in the form of a radical, popular health movement which came close to smashing medical elitism in America once and for all.

THE POPULAR HEALTH MOVEMENT

The Popular Health Movement of the 1830's and 40's is usually dismissed in conventional medical histories as the high-tide of quackery and medical elitism. In reality it was the medical outgrowth of a general social upheaval stirred up by feminist and working class movements.

The Movement was a radical assault on medical elitism, and an affirmation of the traditional people's medicine. Every man his own doctor," was the slogan of one wing of the Movement, and they made it very clear that they meant every woman too.

The "regular" licensed doctors were attacked as members of the "parasitic, non-producing classes," who survived only because of the upper class "lurid taste" for calomel and bleeding.

The peak of the Popular Health Movement coincided with the beginnings of an organized feminist movement, and the two were so closely linked that it's hard to tell where one began and the other left off. The health movement was concerned with women's rights in general, and the women's movement was particularly concerned with health and with women's access to medical training.

At its height in the 1830's and 1840's, the Popular Health Movement had the "regular" doctors — the professional ancestors of today's physicians — running scared. Later in the 19th century, as the grassroots energy ebbed and the Movement degenerated into a set of competing sects, the "regulars" went back on the offensive. In 1848 they pulled together their first national organization, pretentiously named the American Medical Association (AMA).

The rare woman who did make it into a "regular" medical school faced one sexist hurdle after another. First there was the continuous harassment — often lewd — of the male students. There were professors who wouldn't discuss anatomy with a lady present. There were textbooks like a well-known 1848 obstetrical text which stated, "She (Woman) has a head almost too small for intellect but just big enough for love."

In the late 19th century, the "women's health movement" began to dissociate itself from its Popular Health Movement past and to strive for respectability. Members of irregular sects were purged from the faculties of the women's medical colleges.

Female medical leaders such as Elizabeth Blackwell joined male "regulars" in demanding an end to lay midwifery and a "complete medical education" for all who practised obstetrics. All this at a time when the "regulars" still had little or no "scientific" advantage over the sect doctors or lay healers.

MONEY AND GERMS SAVE THE REGULARS

Though no longer faced with organized opposition (they could not claim to control any special body of knowledge), the professional victory of the "regulars" was only made tangible through a lucky coincidence. Science and ruling-class support became available about the same time, the turn of the century.

French and especially German scientists brought forth the germ theory of disease which provided, for the first time in human history, a rational basis for disease prevention and therapy.

Meanwhile the US was emerging as the industrial leader of the world. Fortunes were ruthlessly built. The Rockefeller and Carnegie foundations appeared in the first decade of the 20th century. One of the earliest and highest items on their agenda was medical "reform", the creation of a respectable, scientific American medical profession. Medicine had become a white, male, middle class occupation. The doctor had become "the man of science" — beyond criticism, beyond regulation, very nearly beyond competition.

OUTLAWING THE MIDWIVES

All that was left to drive out the last holdout of the old people's medicine — the midwives. In 1910, about 50 percent of babies were delivered by midwives — most were blacks or working class immigrants. Potential profits for "professional" obstetricians were going down the drain.

Publicly, however, the obstetricians launched their attacks on midwives in the name of science and reform. Midwives were ridiculed as "hopelessly dirty, ignorant and incompetent."

A truly public-spirited obstetrical profession would have been to make the appropriate preventive techniques known and available to the mass of midwives.

For all the glamorous "lady with the lamp" imagery, nursing at the time involved little more than household drudgery, with the patriarchal husband replaced by the lordly doctor.

But just as the late 19th century women's movement had not opposed the rise of medical professionalism, it did not challenge nursing as an oppressive female role.

Women have not been passive bystanders in the history of medicine.

Mothers like this woman who lived on Kensington Avenue in the early 1900's had to depend on the ministrations of midwives — doctors were too expensive.

This is in fact what happened in England, Germany and most other European nations: Midwifery was upgraded through training to become an established, independent occupation.

But the American obstetricians had no real commitment to improved obstetrical care. In fact, a study by a Johns Hopkins professor in 1912 indicated that most American doctors were less competent than the midwives.

Under intense pressure from the medical profession, state after state passed laws outlawing midwifery and restricting the practice of obstetrics to doctors.

For poor and working class women, this actually meant worse — or no — obstetrical care. For the new, male medical profession, the ban on midwives meant one less source of competition. Women had been routed from their last foothold as independent practitioners.

THE LADY WITH THE LAMP

The only remaining occupation for women in health was nursing. Nursing had not always existed as a paid occupation — it had to be invented. Credit for the invention of nursing goes to a small handful of upper class women reformers whose prime interest was not in improving opportunities for women but in improving hospital conditions.

In view of nursing leaders like Florence Nightingale, the filthy and archaic hospitals of the time needed a "woman's touch". "The Nightingale nurse", who set the pattern for nursing education in this country as well as England, was conceived as the embodiment of "femininity" as defined by Victorian society.

The present system was born in and shaped by the competition between male and female healers.

The medical profession in particular is not just another institution which happens to discriminate against women: It is a fortress designed and erected to exclude us.

Professionalism in medicine is nothing more than the institutionalization of a male upper class monopoly.

We must never confuse professionalism with expertise. Expertise is something to work for and to share; professionalism is — by definition — elitist and exclusive, sexist, racist and classist.

Our oppression as women health workers today is inextricably linked to our oppression as women. Nursing our predominate role in the health system, is simply a workplace extension or our roles as wife and mother.

The nurse is socialized to believe that rebellion violates not only her "professionalism", but her very femininity. This means that the male medical elite has a very special stake in the maintenance of sexism in the society at large. Doctors are the bosses in an industry where the workers are primarily women.

Sexism in the society at large insures that the female majority of the health workforce are "good" workers — docile and passive. Take away sexism and you take away one of the mainstays of the health hierarchy.

What this means to us is that in the health system there is no way to separate worker organizing from feminist organizing. To reach out to women health workers is to reach out to them as women.

Repression continues under dictatorial Korean regime

By DAVID GALBRAITH
Under the regime of South Korean dictator Chung Hee Park, student demonstrations and classroom boycotts are punishable by death, a person can get life imprisonment for advocating the restoration of the constitution, and student leaders, workers, peasants and Christian activists face massive prison terms, death sentences and torture at the hands of the Korean Central Intelligence Agency (KCIA).

The grim picture of Southern Korean life was painted by Nicola Geiger to a Sunday night meeting sponsored by the Student Christian Movement and the Council for a Democratic Korea.

Geiger is a member of the Society of Friends, also known as the Quakers.

"I have come to the west to speak of the plight of those who have been silenced," said Geiger, a former head of the East Asian Centre of Friends World College.

Geiger for the last seven years has been involved in the struggle for democracy in South Korea, for changing Korea's relations with Japan and for ensuring the rights of the Korean minority in Japan.

In the last few months she has helped to organize an international campaign to save the life of Kim Gi Ha, Korea's most famous poet.

Gi Ha's death sentence was commuted to life imprisonment because of international pressure, Geiger said, but his life is still in danger because he is being denied badly-needed medical treatment.

Gi Ha and other intellectuals and church leaders were jailed for supporting student demonstrations.

Geiger said these arrests, demonstrations and the new wave of political repression must be understood in the context of recent Korean history.

Until the end of World War Two, Korea was a colony of Japan. Millions of people were drafted into the Japanese armed forces or used in Japan as slave labor. All independence movements were brutally suppressed.

In 1948, the Americans installed right-winger Syghman Rhee as president of Korea. The repression continued, Geiger said.

In 1961, massive student demonstrations forced Rhee's resignation. The National Assembly elected an interim president until elections could be held. But a coup, led by the prime minister, was staged at that time.

After several years of juggling for power, Park emerged as the strong man.

In 1964, Park outraged the country by negotiating a "normalization" treaty with Japan. It is widely believed that American pressure was behind this.

Japan paid $300 million to the South Korean government and another $200 million in loans.

This money was used to build up the army and the KCIA. These agencies, in co-operation with 44,000 U.S. troops, control the country.

Since the signing of the treaty, the Japanese multi-national corporations have extended their control of the economy.

Geiger quoted the head of the Japanese Planning Policy Association who stated in 1970 that Korea should become a sub-contract for Japanese industry.

Hockey Blues split west

By SYD CAPPE

The Varsity Blues returned home yesterday morning weary from play and travel.

From last Thursday through till Monday night they played four games.

In Edmonton, they played two games with the U of Alberta losing the first 6-3 and winning on Friday 5-3.

In Calgary, they again lost their first tilt on Sunday 4-1, and came back victorious on Monday night, beating the U of Calgary 7-1.

Four games in five nights is usually a tall order for any team, but in this case, it may have been a bit tougher for the Blues.

Ron Harris stayed home for surgery on the broken nose he received, courtesy of St. Francis Xavier last week.

Bill Field skated slower, having to carry the added weight of a flu bug.

Al Milnes was having a tussle with a torn hip muscle and Don Pagnutti was missed as well, not joining the team until Calgary.

In the first game against the U of Alberta, in Edmonton, the Blues with Bob Oss in net outshot the Golden Bears 31-25.

Only Hews, Ruhnke and Davier managed to score for the Blues as they came away 3 goals short of a tie.

Howie Hampton was laid up early in the affair with a charlie horse to add to the team's aches. Out of nine penalties five power play goals were scored (3 by Edmonton, 2 by U of T).

The second game in Edmonton on Friday night saw a more spirited Blues attack as they downed the Bears 5-3.

Fifield, Higson, Hopkins, Pragnello and Hews hit for one goal each.

The shots on goal were even at 28-28 in that game as Dave Hulme minded the Blues' net.

Travelling to Calgary, the team took a day off hockey to rest, giving up their scheduled practice time in Edmonton.

The first game against the U of Calgary on Sunday night saw Bob Oss deluged with pucks as the Blues were outshot 36-24 and outscored 4-1.

Doug Herridge scored the lone of Varsity of T goal. Oss stood up well to the task and could not be faulted for any of the goals.

In the final tilt out west the Blues decided to get their act together as they put down Calgary's Dinosaurs 7-1.

Lady Blues field hockey team wins OWIAA championship

By JANET KINGSTON

The U of T senior field hockey team has won the OWIAA championship title.

The first game played at MacMaster university this weekend was against York university.

A strong drive from the edge of the circle by Brenda Eckhardt gave Toronto a 1-0 lead.

Toronto dominated the first half of the Guelph game and a goal by Sue Scott within the first minute of play set the pace.

Three goals by Brenda Eckhardt and one by Ann Hoffland in the second half gave Toronto a 5-0 victory.

Both teams played excellent field hockey and a goal by Brenda Eckhardt in the last minute of play against her old alma mater gave Toronto the game 1-0.

Going into the second half of the game against Western, two penalty bullies by Brenda Eckhardt gave Toronto a 2-0 lead.

Varsity judoka show strong at championship

By THE PHANTOM
The University of Toronto judo defeated the Eastern Canadian Judo Championships.

Varsity encountered strong opposition from as far as Montreal, Quebec, and Halifax.

Ann-Marie Jamnik placed first in the women's blue-belt division, defeating a very strong judoka from Montreal in the finals.

Lorne Young overcame the obvious lack of objective judging to place second in the men's 205 lb. blue-belt division.

Wally Cringan put on a colourful display, coming in fourth in the men's 176 lb. blue-belt division.

Run for fun still running

By BOB ALGIE
The Blues Rugby team finished off in grand style. After losing 3 out of the first 4 games, they came back to put together a great winning streak of 5 games.

The only close game was one played here on Oct. 24, when Blues defeated Guelph 14-13.

The Traditional "Old Blues" game was played on Oct. 29 and the new Blues won. (Score tactfully forgotten).

Last weekend saw Blues travelling to St. Catharines to play the Brock Badgers.

The game was delayed by a soccer match, soccer team pictures, taking the net down, Brock rugby team picture, and a generally slack attitude on Brock's part.

It is no wonder Blues had no problem defeating the Badgers 25-4.

The score was as follows:
Richard Brooks 2 tries
Randy Scott 1 try
Neil Sorbie 1 try,
Chris Bouris 3 conversions, 1 penalty kick.

Rugby Blues dump Brock

After a very successful first season of weekly runs, Run for Fun will end with two final runs Nov. 7 and Nov. 14.

The final run on Nov. 14 will serve a dual role of a run for fun and an intramural cross-urban run. Colleges and faculties entries will be taken before the run at 5:30 pm.

Each team must have seven runners; there is no limit as to the number of teams any college or faculty may enter, as long as each team has seven different runners.

Vic and SMC win the right to fight for the Mulock Cup

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Vic annihilated Engineering 36-10 and SMC rolled over PHE 14-0 to gain berths in next week's Mulock Cup championship game.

Vic, the regular season division I leaders, exploded for 29 points in the second half to end Eng's hopes for an upset, while the tough SMC squad scored majors in the opening and dying minutes of their game to end PHE's season.

The first semi-final game got off to a good start when Vic showed up.

Ordinarily, as league-leaders, they would have drawn a bye into the finals, but they accidentally defaulted two games to Eng.

Last week, the men's intramural sports committee voted that as punishment, Vic could play the fourth place Engineers.

Vic was expected to defeat Eng, but until the second half, the Scarlet and Gold mob had their hands full.

The Engineers almost drew first blood as a series of Vic penalties and good plays got the plumbers to Vic's 16 yard line.

Vic recovered a fumble during a sweep play, however, and marched up the field in twelve plays to Eng's five yard line.

Vic's Tom Landeryou sliced through the line for the TD, and Ross Hotrum added the extra point to make it 7-0 with 3:31 left in the first quarter.

The engineers then took over on their 25 yard line and slowly ground up to the Vic endzone.

A reverse completely fooled Vic and carried Eng from Vic's 30 to the 10, but then Vic's defence stiffened and the Eng had to settle for a short fieldgoal from Carmen Settino.

The half ended 7-3 in favor of Vic and the engineering team still looked like they might come back as a series of fumbles and penalties made Vic look inept.

The second half was another story, though. Vic went to the air and ripped the Eng secondary apart.

Ross Hotrum, Dave Crombie, Mike Johnson, Al Vlainamae, and Landeryou ploughed into the Eng

endzone for majors while Larry Crombie, and Lamie McTavish religiously added two point conversions. Hotrum toddied the other Vic point.

Dave Williams upheld Eng's dignity by snaring a 20 yard pass and outracing three Vic defenders to the endzone flag for a TD. Settino converted.

SMC took the opening kickoff by PHE to their 22 yard line and the jocks never saw the ball again until the scoreboard said "7-0 SMC".

That only took four plays as Larry Klein's bullish running and a pass to Gary Hubbard got the mikes to the PHE one yard line, where Klein rushed and Joe Liscio kicked to make it 7-0.

SMC almost made it 10-0 early in the second quarter after they raked through the PHE defence to the 15 yard line. But a determined rush blocked Liscio's fieldgoal attempt and PHE recovered.

Neither SMC nor the jocks could make any headway against each other for the rest of the half or the third quarter.

The game was decided in the final minutes. PHE's Rich Panas intercepted a SMC pass and ran it back to PHE's 43 yard line with less than seven minutes remaining.

A brilliant run by quarterback Terry Nedoshenko got PHE to SMC's 54 yard line. PHE's spirits picked up and soon they were camping on SMC's 10 yard line with first down and 10 to go on the 13 yard line.

But PHE's hopes were dashed on the next play when SMC recovered a fumble on a pitchout.

PHE was never really in the game after that. By the time they got the ball back, they were deep in their own end with less than three minutes to play.

Even that opportunity slithered away and PHE had to punt from their own endzone. But a 34 yard runback got SMC down to the 10 yard line, and Klein blasted through to put the game out of reach.

OWIAA field hockey title goes to U of T

By DIANE WARDROPE

The Intermediates played a very poor first game against their hosts, McMaster, in field hockey.

About the only two people on the pitch who looked like they were really putting forth an effort were the goal scorers, Betty Shostak and Martha Bagnall, who made it 2-1.

The play showed no signs of the use of basic skills, and at times tended to get out of hand and a little dangerous.

Toronto's next game later on in the afternoon displayed a little more of the play characterized by U of T. A very tight game was played against Laurentian, but again it was Betty Shostak and Martha Bagnall combining for another 2-1 score.

Going into last weekend, Queens and U of T intermediates had been tied for first place. The game scheduled between these two teams proved to be a good one.

Queens hoped they could take advantage of the many injuries that had continually plagued Toronto all season, but Toronto showed they were ready to play by scoring a quick goal from Shostak.

The play was very careful as no one wanted to take too many chances and possibly give the opposition an opportunity to score.

But with only 7 minutes left, Queens caught Toronto's defense half asleep on a penalty corner hit and tied the game up.

Queen's really came to life and contained Toronto in their own end for practically the rest of the game, but couldn't add to the score.

The final games for both teams decided who would take home the OWIAA title.

While Queen's played Laurentian, Toronto was playing U of Ottawa.

Giving only a faint glimmer of effort, Toronto easily held Ottawa, who never even got the chance to shoot on Fern Brand in the Toronto net.

Betty Shostak got a hat trick; one goal coming on a rare penalty bully; Marthan Bagnall concluded the scoring for an easy 4-0 win.

Queen's could only mount a tie against Laurentian, thereby giving Toronto first place and the championship by a single point.

Varsity rowers hope for future

By GORD LEIGHTON

It's true neither the U of T men's or women's crews won any races last Saturday at the intercollegiate rowing championships in St. Catharines, but just their presence there must be considered some sort of victory.

U of T wasn't even supposed to have a men's rowing team this year, let alone a women's, but there they were on the choppy waters of St. Catharines' international rowing course.

A gusting headwind on the Henley course resulted in slow times, but favored the strongest such as McMaster's winning novice men's crew.

A strong eight that ran the gauntlet of five autumn regattas without a loss or even a serious threat, McMaster again showed its power by defeating second-place Western by two boatlengths.

In that race and also the junior varsity, lightweight and heavyweight categories, Varsity crews failed to mount serious challenges.

In women's rowing, McMaster upset favored Western in both the junior varsity and varsity events of the championship.

Although the U of T crews didn't win, they had problems the other universities didn't have. For the past two years, U of T hasn't even had a team.

When third year Erindale student Bobby Boraks finally got the rowing team set up this year, the season had already started, he didn't have coaches and most of his oarsmen had never rowed before.

Although other universities had women's crews, U of T had an even more serious problem because the Argonaut Rowing Club, where the university's crews practice, wouldn't allow women.

Eventually, club members reversed this long-standing tradition, and the women's crews got on the water.

In the entire team of 36 men and women, there were only three men and one woman with experience.

The three men were forced to row not only in their lightweight category (under 155 lbs.), but also in the heavyweight event. In both, they were rowing against predominately senior oarsmen, who have all won at least one Canadian championship.

For example, the stroke man of Western's varsity eight has competed in two world rowing championships, the Pan American games and the Munich Olympics. And the stroke man of Western's second best eight, the junior varsity boat, is the seventh-best lightweight sculler in the world.

Oarsmen of the same calibre attend U of T, such as one member of Ridley College's elite schoolboy crew, but none would row for Varsity this year because of the lack of funds, organization and good equipment.

The budget allotted to the rowing team was only about $1,200—not much when a bus alone costs $150 to go to a single regatta and there are six a year.

The women's athletic directorate gave $300 this year to the woman's crew, but may not next year, supposedly because rowing is an "elitist" sport.

Varsity had the worst equipment in the OUAA—oars cracked and worn and boats so old they were literally taped together.

Still, this was not supposed to be a winning but a rebuilding year. Although crews didn't win this year, they improved between the first and last regatta.

Varsity women rowers show their form. They didn't win anything but they look good.

University tenure body proposed

Would Hank Moore have outthit Babe Ruth had he been in baseball? See today's review.

Governing Council's academic affairs committee yesterday moved towards creation of University Tenure Committees to review all tenure decisions.

The move follows the committee's decision last week to maintain the present structure of departmental-tenure committees with no student representation but official, non-voting observers.

The proposed University Tenure Committee would advise the president to either confirm or reconsider decisions made by tenure bodies but would have no decision-making power.

The committee also approved a proposal from faculty member William Duphy calling for all divisions in the university to carry out systematic evaluations of teaching for use in tenure and staffing decisions. A sub-committee to establish guidelines for teaching evaluations is to be set up.

"Strong emphasis should be placed on student input to and direct student participation in the evaluation procedure," the committee agreed.

The creation of a university tenure committee was one recommendation contained in last year's presidential task force on academic appointments, the Forster report.

The Forster report recommended the University Tenure Committee "review all the tenure recommendations made during an academic year with a primary concern for the consistency of procedures and standards."

The Duphy proposal calls for a university tenure committee having three functions:

- to review all tenure recommendations (which must finally be approved by the president).

- to advise the president to either confirm or reconsider the decision.
- make an annual report to the Governing Council.

Although no vote was taken on the proposal, possible areas of dispute were acknowledged.

These include the power of the university tenure committee to deal with individual cases (which the U of T Faculty Association has opposed), the needless creation of another level of bureaucracy, and the problem of determining composition.

Graduate student Vernon Copeland indicated yesterday he would push for strong student representation on a University Tenure Committee.

The academic affairs committee last week approved a motion calling for tenure committees to continue to be composed of academic administrators and teaching staff, with a non-voting observer who would be a student, alumnus or lay representative on sitting on Governing Council.

The decision came despite strong student demands for representation on tenure committees to ensure proper consideration of teaching ability.

The committee's recommendations on tenure committees must still be approved by the executive committee and the full Governing Council before being effective.

Three criteria for the granting of tenure have already been approved: these include evidence of research, ability in teaching, and clear promise of future development.

Bid for extended library hours lost

By CIM NUNN

An appeal by the Anthropology Student Union (ASU) for an extension of the hours of the anthropology reading room was turned down Wednesday by the university's library sub-committee.

The students hoped to obtain the $1,500 necessary to keep their reading room open in the evenings and Saturdays.

The money would cover the cost of hiring students at minimum wage 20 hours per week for the year.

The reading room, located in the Sidney Smith Hall basement, has one of the best collections of anthropology books in Canada.

The sub-committee claimed constitutionally the matter was not in its jurisdiction because the body deals only with U of T, and not departmental libraries.

ASU president, Brian Clarence, said after the meeting he does not know what steps will be taken next, but he plans to meet with anthropology department chairman Bruce Drewitt to discuss the matter.

Until this year, the anthropology reading room was funded by the Arts and Science Student Union the Association of Part-Time University Students (APUS) and Woodsworth College. The library remained open from 9 a.m. until 9 Monday to Thursday.

However, this year ASSU has decreased its total donation to ASU from $700 to less than $250 because rising expenses. Funds for the reading room reflect this drop.

Only Woodsworth College has increased its funding 50 per cent to $600.

Because of the cutbacks, the reading room is now open 60 per cent of its previous hours.

Clarence maintains the present hours are especially detrimental to part-time students, who usually hold a job during the day and study evenings and Saturdays.

Over 1,200 students have signed a petition asking U of T to make available funds to operate the reading room.

Clarence contends that since students have already paid their fees, they should not be required to pay more to keep their reading room open.

The anthropology department, which funds the reading room but doesn't have enough money to keep it open longer, fully supports students' bid to extend the hours.

At Wednesday's sub-committee meeting, most of the time devoted to the anthropology reading room issue was spent in considering whether it was feasible for that committee to act on it.

The library sub-committee felt it could not support the appeal because the anthropology reading room does not have books from the main U of T library, for which the sub-committee is responsible.

The library sub-committee is currently reviewing the entire U of T library system, considering recent proposals for centralization of all library services.

To support the issue before examining the results of the review would be "premature," sub-committee members said.

Course unions win fight to keep xerox service

A campaign by two course unions protesting a proposed move of the present political science and history xerox lending service to the Sigmund Samuel library ended in victory Wednesday.

The university's library sub-committee voted it would not eliminate the Sidney Smith Hall branch of the xerox library service.

History Student Union and Political Economy Course Union members argued against the move to Sid Smith.

They argued the Sid Smith branch offered far better xeroxing facilities in terms of speed and efficiency than the already overtaxed and understaffed sections of the Sig Sam library.

Over 3,000 history and political economy students had signed a petition protesting centralization of the present lending services.

The library sub-committee, which is presently considering proposals for centralization of all library services, defeated the motion to amalgamate the xerox services by an 8-5 vote, with one abstention.

SAC's internal commission voted down a $500 grant to the U of T grape boycott committee Tuesday, despite a declaration of support for the grape boycott at SAC's general meeting last week.

Grants were voted to the Law Conference, the Black Student's Union and the New College symposium proposal entitled The Future, while a grant request by the Young Spartacus Club was rejected.

The Tuesday meeting was to decide grant allocations for the fall term. SAC has $7,000 available for grants this year, and decided to allocate $4,500 in the first term.

Only $3,000 was actually allotted, however, and $500 of this was in the form of a loan to the Graduates' Assistants' Association.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch opposed the grant to the United Farm Workers (U.F.W.), although he said he remained personally sympathetic to their cause.

Last year, as SAC services commissioner, Kanowitch was involved in the campaign to remove scab lettuce and grapes from university cafeterias.

"A majority of people around campus have made it clear to us they didn't want money being given to this," Kanowitch said.

"Last year we got an incredible amount of negative response against the grant to the UFW, more than any other grant," Kanowitch said.

"It's our role to try to do with our money what students want," Kanowitch said.

"You have to make a distinction between supporting something and giving money to it. I think most students support the grape-pickers but they don't want to give money to them," he added.

UFW spokesperson Dierdre Godfrey said, "By turning down the UFW request for financial aid, SAC has chosen which constituency it wanted to represent."

She pointed out that the Boycott Action Committee was only asking for payment of bills on campus projects to a ceiling of $500.

Their proposal emphasized that they were not asking for a straight grant like last year because UFW policy was to send all funds to California.

Much of the uproar last year was because the SAC grant was sent directly to California rather than being used for UFW activities on campus.

The Black Students' Union (BSU) received $1,000 of the $4,938 it requested, and also $1,500 from the speaker's funds for a lecture by Angela Davis.

Much of the BS's original request was to be used in bringing Davis in to speak, but SAC wanted to handle the engagement themselves.

When asked why SAC was spending this much on Davis after telling the UFW they never spent more than $500 on a guest speaker, SAC member Heather Didout explained that "Angela Davis is a celebrity."

SAC turned down a request from the Young Spartacus Club because it represented a minority opinion on campus and would go ahead with its planned projects whether SAC supported them or not.

The Young Spartacus is a left-wing group which holds a bi-weekly educational class on the working-class movement, among other activities.

SAC refuses to grant $500 to UFW boycott

Students decide tenure at Trinity

By SUSAN SLOTTOW

While students fight for representation on tenure committees across the university, Trinity College students have had voting representation on the college's tenure and promotion committees since last spring.

But because there is only one untenured faculty member at Trinity, the tenure committee has not yet met.

One student is chosen by lottery from all second year and higher Trinity students, to sit on the six-person promotion committee.

The lottery method is used to prevent someone with a personal bias against a professor from getting the position.

This promotion committee has approved the promotion of two Trinity staff members from assistants to associate professors last spring.

Students took the initiative last year to raise the issue of student representation on tenure committees at Trinity College council meetings as part of the discussion of the Forster report on academic appointments.

"Yes, the decision was student-initiated, but it was not in any way put through by students without the whole thing being thought through carefully," Trinity provost George Ignatieff said.

He explained there had been a very full discussion on the question by the college's executive and teaching staff and it had seemed "logical and desirable" to have a student present on the committees.

Trinity's system of rating teaching by student assessment has been used by the tenure and promotion committees.

Limitations on entrance scholarships suggested

Not more than 10 per cent of all incoming students from Grade 13 should receive entrance scholarships, the academic affairs committee agreed yesterday.

The committee also recommended that the value of entrance scholarships should be limited to the cost of tuition fees and $600 living expenses, with provision for increased assistance to students with greater financial need.

Traditional university scholarships would not be affected.

The move comes in response to a report from the Council of Ontario Universities (COU) which is developing means to combat competition between universities for undergraduates.

Many universities have been offering "open-ended" undergraduate scholarships—free tuition to anyone with an average of over 80 per cent.

U of T presently gives scholarships to only about one-quarter of its Ontario Scholars (those with 80 per cent or better).

The COU report shows that five universities—Carleton, Laurentian, Western, Wilfrid Laurier and York—presently offer scholarships to more than 10 per cent of their freshmen. More than 20 per cent of Wilfrid Laurier students receive entrance scholarships.

About seven per cent of incoming U of T students receive scholarships to a maximum of $1,350 for in-town students and $1,850 for out of town students.

Over the last two years, more than $1 million has been granted in scholarships by Ontario universities, a $60 per cent increase, despite expenditure increases of $2 million.

The COU recommendations, which are those adopted by the academic affairs committee, are based on three premises: that universities should develop their own scholarship criteria, that current grade 13 results do not properly reflect achievement and ability and that the present entrance system is too competitive.

The recommendations are expected to come into effect for September, 1976.

Isn't education wonderful? Students get to make friends in long library checkout lineups.

Library use increases rapidly

By ELEANOR SIMPSON

Have you noticed more people using the Roberts (Fort Book) and Sig Sam libraries lately? Did you think U of T had suddenly greatly increased its enrolment?

Well, if you answered yes, to both those questions, you're half right.

Enrolment hasn't gone up that much but library use has increased vastly over the past year and a half.

Chief Librarian David Esplin said yesterday "the combined use of Roberts, Sig Sam and Science and Medicine showed an enormous increase last year (1973-74) over the past year."

In fact, use of those sections of the university library increased 100 per cent, Esplin said.

Although no specific figures are available for the beginning of this academic year, Blackburn said September, at least, had brought even more use to Roberts and Sig Sam and the increase of use in both was large.

Esplin was reluctant to discuss any relative use increases involving a breakdown for each section, and even suggested that any report of greatly increased use of the library facilities should wait until there were enough figures to give a truer indication of any trends.

Rumor has it that Sig Sam is much more 'popular' with students than Roberts.

An extremely limited survey by this reporter revealed that students dislike using Roberts because of its forbidding atmosphere. (Why else is it called Fort Book?)

For the ever increasing numbers of part-time students, Roberts is simply a waste of time. By the time, he or she sheds his coat either to check it or leave it in the unprotected racks on the first floor, races up stairs to check the catalogue and waits five minutes for an elevator, the part-timer has wasted what should have been his or her supper hour.

For regular students, who may go through this sort of problem two or three, if not more times a day, Sig Sam also seems to be haven of comparative relaxed calm.

Average in and out time, from entering the door, through checking the catalogue, to getting the books past the guards can be as little as five minutes at Sig Sam, if you are not a browser.

Erindale ready to give ECC seats to students if boycott continues

By AMANDA HANSON

Erindale College principal E. A. Robinson said he intends to open all the seats on the Erindale College Council (ECC) to the general student body if the Student's Administrative Government of Erindale (SAGE) continues to boycott the ECC.

The ECC is an advisory body to the principal which includes all 150 Erindale faculty members, 60 students, 20 of whom are appointed by SAGE, and 40 representatives of the general student body.

SAGE voted Oct. 23 to boycott the ECC until the council's power is clearly defined and expanded and the principal's power is limited.

Peter Henderson, SAC Erindale representative, said the boycott is not a "personal vendetta" against principal Robinson.

SAGE wants to confine the principal's power by limiting his veto power on council, said Henderson.

Robinson maintained SAGE is "arguing semantics."

He said the ECC and its advisory councils carry as much "legal" and "moral" power as they are willing to assume. Robinson said he would never override a definitive council decision, but presently, there is "not enough commitment to representative council" on the part of students and staff.

"The ECC is massive and undisciplined," Robinson said. "No one has a mandate to work."

If the ECC is ineffectual, Robinson said, it is because "certain faculty and student attitudes are diametrically opposed" and no one is willing to compromise.

Robinson said students should have a significant input into the policy-making processes that effect them and "minority rights should be respected as much as majorities."

Speaking for SAGE, Henderson said the "movement" is presently stalled; students are not generally involved in the boycott.

Robinson has said that he will take a pragmatic stand in the face of student "attack."

Friday briefs

The Globe and Mail headline of a story from its Ottawa bureau was "All-Canadian group in making to study Mackenzie pipeline."

What is this "All-Canadian" group?

Interprovincial Pipe Line Ltd., Trans Mountain Pipe Line Co. Ltd. (both controlled by the multinational oil companies), Gulf Oil Canada Ltd. and Imperial Oil Ltd. (Gulf of Canada is 70 per cent owned by Gulf Oil of Pittsburgh and Imperial is 70 per cent owned by Exxon), and Shell Canada Ltd. (which is 79 per cent owned by Royal Dutch-Shell) would appear to make up this group.

Imperial-Exxon owns 33 per cent of Interprovincial Pipe Line which owns and operates the longest oil pipeline system in the non-communist world.

Partytime, folks. Let's hope so, anyway. Governing Council member Keith Hendricks' firm Noranda Mines Ltd. showed a nine-month profit of $127,500,000 this year up from $79,200,000 last year. Share profits jumped from $3.36 per share to $5.42 per share. What's poor Noranda going to do with all that wealth? What about poor Mr. Hendricks? What about a party?

(CUPI) — According to two Harvard scientists, the Freon gas contained in aerosol cans is breaching down the earth's protective ozone shield, allowing higher levels of ultraviolet light to reach the surface. Initially this could mean higher incidences of skin cancer and similar problems.

According to Dr. Michael McElroy and Dr. Steven Wofsy, even if the use of aerosol gases is stopped immediately, the atmospheric ozone layer will be depleted five per cent by 1990. If the gases are not immediately banned—that depletion may be as high as fifteen or twenty per cent.

It's estimated that one million tons of Freon is currently released into the atmosphere each year, and once it is there, there's no known way to remove it.

(CUPI) — A California Assemblywoman's long-standing campaign to free pay toilets succeeded this month, as Governor Ronald Reagan signed her bill into law. The bill, which Assemblywoman March Fong has been pushing for four years, bans pay toilets in public buildings.

Fong used the pay toilet issue as part of her successful campaign for the Democrat nomination for California's Secretary of State.

Commenting on her bill's passage into law, Fong said, "The battle has been won, we flushed the opposition right down."

MACAO (CUP-EN) — Government officials in the Portuguese colony of Macao—in the South China Sea—proudly dedicated a brand new $8 million bridge last weekend, stretching from the Mainland to the Island of Taipa, but motorists crossing the toll bridge for the first time were dismayed to find that they had to turn back when they reached the Taipa end.

It seems no one's bothered to build any roads on the island.

York student supports pub space campaign

I am writing in support of the feature article of Nov. 4.

Being a transfer student from York University, it really became obvious to me that U of T's student services were greatly lacking.

Besides having at least two games rooms, York boasts five, I repeat five, daily pubs, almost one for each college. These services quite pleasantly provide more than beer and pretzels. Serving hard liquor, danishes, sandwiches and coffee, they help to relax the sterility of the institution by providing an atmosphere where students can talk, play chess, and generally get involved.

These pubs possess individuality, and help provide a distinct 'college' atmosphere. It seems that the enjoyment of colleges at U of T is reserved for us resident students, and the day students are out of the picture.

U of T really needs a daily pub for the entire campus, and miscellaneous ones in the colleges. Without a few of the social amenities available in a campus or a college pub environment, we can look forward to a lack of identity, lack of involvement and lack of spirit in the students about their university.

Meds admissions nothing but political issue

Mr. Paul Vasil (Varsity, Monday, Nov. 4) said that 'economic reality is actually the issue' insofar as Bette Stephenson's remarks regarding the medical school admission were concerned — or so he believed!

He said that the taxpayers' children 'should be given absolute primary consideration'; but he pretended not to know that most, if not all, of the Chinese students in the medical school, as admitted by Bette Stephenson herself, are either immigrants or citizens who, or whose parents, pay the same set of taxes every other Canadian does! If Mr. Vasil were to argue, as Stephenson did, that priority should be given to 'Canadian-born citizens' in particular and not 'Canadian taxpayers' as a whole, this argument itself manifests that the issue is no longer one of 'economic reality' but something else — a political issue, for example, or something more obvious to those of us who would really calm ourselves down, throw away all prejudices and consider the whole issue, of course to some people this is but 'more garbage'!

Furthermore, it seems to me Bette Stephenson and her supporters have already forgotten that one of the principles upon which Western society was built is the principle of 'Taxation without representation is tyranny'. Now that the immigrants and 'non Canadian-born citizens' are taxed equally before the law, should they not be treated equally before the law — whether this be the laws passed in Parliament Hill or Queen's Park or the laws adapted by the medical school regarding its admission?

There are two views regarding the rights of the immigrants. There are those who believe that the immigrants are supposed to come to Canada as dish-washers, laundrymen, factory workers and so on and so forth and that they are not supposed to enter the class that belongs to the privileged few. On the other hand, there are those who believe that the immigrants are, by virtue of their duties and contributions to society, equal members of the big Canadian family. I do not know where Bette Stephenson and her supporters stand. I am for the latter.

The real enemies of our society are those who, for one reason or another, seek to create dissension among members of the society by drawing lines to segregate them, by giving stereotypes to different groups and by provoking conflicts in an otherwise harmonious society.

Engineer elaborates on OSAP case

In regard to your article Engineer Short Of Support (Wed. Nov. 6, 1974), there are a few inaccuracies that I would like to clear up.

Firstly, in addition to the three "complaints" you have listed, I have a fourth general complaint. The OSAP allotments are hopelessly inadequate. For example, my basic textbooks and school supplies for the year will cost at least $200. This is $50 more than the figure allowed for engineering students according to the OSAP handbook. In addition I have found it necessary to purchase other texts and manuals which are not listed as required.

Secondly, living in cheaper accommodations could not possibly eliminate all of the $500 deficit in my budget.

Thirdly, it has always been my intention to get a part-time job, and the $1,700 figure mentioned as being the absolute minimum assistance I would require took into account an optimistic estimate of my expected earnings during the school year.

Fourthly, by the figures given in the OSAP handbook, I should have received $1,736, $825 of which would be a loan. Prior to receiving my reply from OSAP I was told by the counsellors in the awards office that figures similar to those would be used and that I would be treated more or less like a normally independent student.

After receiving a reply from OSAP, the counsellor I had been dealing with put forth various hypothesis as to why I received over $500 less than I had expected. They seem to amount to OSAP's desire for me to prove I want an education by contributing substantially more than the expected maximum contribution from summer earnings listed in their handbook.

I later learned from Christopher Allnutt (Executive Assistant, SAC) who had been speaking with OSAP director Patrick Phillips, that any money I earn during the school year will be counted directly against my assessment by OSAP. This is different from their normal policy of allowing a student to earn $600 before adjusting their assessment. When I later spoke to the OSAP counsellor about this, he knew nothing about it, from which I can only conclude that OSAP does not tell their own counsellors about their regulations.

Besides finding a shroud of secrecy around the OSAP regulations, I was also specifically discouraged from appealing the decision. Additionally, I only found out that a reply had been received from OSAP by checking with the awards office. I later found that my notification had been sent to my former address despite the fact that I had notified the awards office almost a month previously about my change of address.

Seeley not disturbed but disturbing

Arthur Sontag's defamatory letter about John R. Seeley deserves no reply but provokes a comment, as it is a typical example of what that great social scientist is up against within a powerful part of the academic establishment in this city, which he still seems to consider his home. Never any specific charge that he is given an opportunity to reply to, only vicious innuendo. It looks to me like Watergate minus the tapes.

But a new generation has come along, of colleagues able to read Seeley's works; unlike Mr. Sontag, who appears to have mastered only one sentence from a review of one of his books. If indeed he has achieved that, I don't know, for he got the reference wrong, probably the year as well as the name of the journal. But don't get discouraged, Mr. Sontag. If you look around some more, perhaps you can come up with even worse statements about Mr. Seeley, who has never been a man to try to please everyone with power and influence; and next time your documentation might be impeccable.

The real problem is, of course, not that John Seeley is disturbed, but that he is a disturbing man, whose standards of integrity has not sat well with some of his senior colleagues here, especially as he, to make matters worse, is a scholar with enviable academic credentials who relates well to students and socially concerned colleagues.

Metro fears snow to lie on ground

Toronto Star,
October, 1974.

Mr. Sontag's second accusation is factual but false. Seeley served as chairman of the Sociology Department at Brandeis, hardly a second-rate university. He now serves in another first-rate university and has through the years had many offers from other top U.S. universities, but he happens to be a Canadian and to like his home town, Toronto, or at least did until recently.

I have tried since June to find out, by way of repeated letters to Dr. R.W.B. Jackson, Director of OISE, why there has been such determined administrative opposition there to the decision of OISE's Department of Sociology in Education to invite Seeley to occupy a vacant position in the Department. Specifically I have asked, repeatedly, for a reply to two questions: "(a) is there a sociologist with better academic credentials in sight, who on such grounds ought to be approached in preference to John Seeley? Or, (b) what other criteria may at OISE take precedence over the academic criteria?"

I am sorry to say that Dr. Jackson has remained even less communicative than Mr. Sontag about the reasons for the blocking of an academic Department's virtually unanimous choice. And in his last evasive letter, dated October 28, Dr. Jackson tells me that he "can see no point in continuing this exchange of letters." Could it be that he is disturbed by my specific questions; perhaps he, too, like Mr. Seeley (according to Mr. Sontag's unidentified reviewer) is a disturbed man?

As a U of T faculty member I feel not only disturbed but deeply offended. I don't much like to see my colleagues in the Department of Sociology in Education at OISE treated as hired hands, rather than as academics competent to assess their own Department's best interests in their staffing decisions. And all for reasons which remain secret! To me this is a denial of academic freedom and dignity which will deeply disturb, I hope, most of my colleagues in this university.

Tenure reply: 'empty rhetoric'

Mr. Allnutt's reply in Wednesday's Varsity to my statement of Monday, Nov. 4 concerning parity (Teaching Quality: More than Parity) proves to me the continued inability of students to see the issue in its full scope and reason about it soundly.

He states that "students on tenure committees are fundamental to the quality of teaching at this university" and tries to back this up with argument. The tag "empty rhetoric" best describes these arguments.

I am sorry that Mr. Allnutt used the quote from my statement in The Varsity that said, "teaching is not done properly at U of T because teaching is said not to be the primary function of the faculty." Unfortunately The Varsity editor changed my wording and thus my emphasis here. My original wording was intended to make this statement imply that teaching is not getting its due regard and therefore there is need to consider how best to upgrade teaching. My argument was and is that parity is one of the poorer solutions and my reasons for thinking this were given.

Paraphrased, Mr. Allnutt argues that parity on tenure committees is one way of ensuring a change because students are concerned with teaching and that therefore student votes on tenure committees would "assure" "good teachers" "of a fair hearing". What castles in the air! I ask Mr. Allnutt how mere student interest gives them the expertise to judge good teaching and how student votes on tenure committees will "assure" "fair hearings"? I argue that students can do little in this regard without knowing what constitutes good teaching and I have yet to be convinced that students know true good teaching when they see it.

Next, Mr. Allnutt assures us that "if the researchers know that students will be voting on individual tenure questions, they will be more rigorous with themselves on improving their teaching methods." This raises the question of how that faculty member is going to go about improving his or her methods without guidelines or policy statements as an aid. I also ask Mr. Allnutt how he knows they "will be more rigorous?" And what is to stop a researcher from then abandoning interest in classroom activities and teaching once the trial of tenure is over and he or she is assured of a position? These possibilities point out how the answer of student votes on tenure committees fails to recognize the scope and nature of the whole issue.

On the basis of these nonarguments Mr. Allnutt concludes that "students on tenure committees are the only certain way to ensure that teaching gets the emphasis it deserves" and then offers further support of this with the rather strange proof of a survey taken in a foreign country (U.S.) about the difficulty of getting tenure there without publishing. What has this survey to do with us and what exactly does publishing have to do with teaching quality? Does this imply cutbacks in the need to publish?

I agree with Mr. Allnutt that "it is certainly true that having students on tenure committees is not the final word in improving teaching at U of T." Contrary to Mr. Allnutt I feel strongly that the issue of student parity on tenure committees has the wrong emphasis at this time and will result in little real gains towards quality teaching.

Omissions in witches feature

I wish to remedy one gross oversimplification and one significant omission in Barbara Ehrenrich and Deirdre English's article "Witches, Midwives and Nurses" (Varsity, Wed. Nov. 6).

Speaking of the European witch-persecutions, the authors claim:

"The witch-craze took different forms at different times and places, but never lost its essential character: that of a ruling class campaign of terror directed against the female peasant population."

A look at contemporary documents reveals three factors which this generalization ignores:

(1) Many men as well as women fell victim to the witch craze, as can be seen in the appendix of names gathered from court proceedings of the time in Prof. Margaret Murray's Witch-Cult in Western Europe, and in the many trial records which she reproduces verbatim. (Though Murray's conclusions are controversial, her collection of primary sources is most useful.)

(2) By no means all of the accused were peasants. The best-known case in point is that of Gilles de Rais, Marshal of France, who was indicted and condemned as a "heretic, sorcerer, sodomite, invocator of evil spirits, diviner, killer of innocents, apostate from the faith, idolator." (Murray, The God of the Witches, p. 192.)

(3) A goodly number of those accused of witchcraft were denounced by their peers, neighbors and fellow townspeople (accusations such as "So-and-so goes out every Wednesday night at midnight in the form of a cat and puts a whammy on my cows"). The belief in witchcraft was popular on a grassroots level!

One important chapter in the history of popular and women's medical movements is omitted by the authors: the Hakimat (female medics), an auxiliary medical corps of 19th Century Ottoman Egypt. A paper on the Hakimat, entitled "Barefoot Physicians" in 19th Century Egypt, was presented by LaVerne Kuhnke at the 1973 Annual Meeting of the American Research Center in Egypt (abstract in the Center's Newsletter, Oct. 1973).

Mehmet Ali's medical advisor, Dr. Clot-Bey, persuaded the Viceroy to initiate "a women's auxiliary health corps during the second quarter of the 19th Century, to supplement men physicians who were being trained in Egypt's first Western school of medicine."

War registers group has wanted draft dodgers list

WINNIPEG (CUP) — Counselling centres of the War Resisters' Information Program (WRIP) have obtained a document that lists all 5,750 indicted draft resisters currently being sought by the United States government.

Tim Maloney, Program Coordinator of WRIP, explained that the list was important because of the 206,775 men declared delinquent by American draft boards between 1963 and 1973 only 19,000 ever reached the stage of indictment.

Of that figure more than two-thirds either had the indictments dismissed or were acquitted in court. Maloney pointed out that the men involved were usually not informed by government agencies that the charges had been dropped.

Henry Schwarzschild, director of the American Civil Liberties Union

(ACLU) said, "Now that we have this list, draft resisters no longer need guess if they have outstanding charges and whether they can be prosecuted."

Jerel Olsen, consulting counselling co-ordinator of WRIP and an experienced draft and military counsellor, emphasized that "many men on the list of 5,750 draft resisters have valid defences to criminal charges potentially pending against them.

Therefore, no one should even consider submitting to the presidential program without first contacting competent counsellors to ascertain all options.

Native centre adopts political tone

Indians need 'self-help'

By SUSAN DODOG

The Toronto Native Canadian Centre is slowly moving into the political arena, supporting recent Indian protests across the country for better conditions for native peoples.

The centre, which is partially funded by the federal secretary of state department, was originally a non-political organization.

However, with the adoption of a new program entitled Communication and Community Action, the centre is geared towards instilling political awareness in the Indian.

Community worker Robert Holota, who works at the centre on Beverley Street, explained the centre is teaching natives to speak out and to utilize the media to publicize their problems.

POLITICAL

"It's hard to come out with an official political stand when you're funded by the government," Holota noted.

An Indian demonstration on Parliament Hill Sept. 30 ended in violence when RCMP officers attempted to disperse the Indians who were trying to publicize their demands for better living conditions and land rights and move politicians to act on the demands.

Holota explained the Toronto native centre, one of about 40 Indian centres in Canada — with 14 in Ontario — was formed because native peoples urgently need "self-help agencies."

PRIORITY

The first priority is to help Indians who have left the reserve, Holota said.

"This is a big step," he noted, "especially if they have families."

Most Indians migrate to large urban centres because of employment opportunities. About 15,000 Indians alone live in Toronto.

"The centre plays an advocacy role by facilitating communication between the Indian and help agencies," Holota explained.

RIGHTS

Many natives need financial or employment assistance but are unable to help themselves due to lack of education or ignorance of their rights, he noted.

"Many just need help cutting red tape, so we cut it for them," Holota added.

The centre's "middleman role" is now easier for the centre because it has established contacts with major agencies like the federal manpower and immigration department and the unemployment insurance commission.

LEGAL HELP

Legal help is another of the centre's prime functions.

Indians often come into conflict with the law because of different lifestyles, Holota noted.

The centre employs two courtworkers who arrive in court each morning "to advise and help (natives) in every way possible."

One courtworker acts as a liaison between the family and the school and or legal aid.

The native centre also conducts public relations, cultural activities and provides information to students.

NEWSPAPER

It publishes the Toronto Native Times, one of two Indian community newspapers in Toronto. The paper is sent to reserves and Indian centres across Canada, telling prospective migrants "what they are in for," if they leave the reserve, Holota said.

Six months ago, the paper had a circulation of 3,000. This has been cut down to 600 because of rising production costs.

The Toronto Native Times is available free to those who pick them up at the centre. Subscriptions are also available for a fee.

BOARD

The centre's board of directors consists of 16 members. The majority are prominent Indians while a few are influential whites.

Non-natives have a say in the centre's administration because it was the "Indian and the whites who saw the need and worked together in creating the centre," Holota said.

The Native Canadian Centre was founded in 1963 at 603 Church St. by members of the Toronto Indian Club (now the North American Indian Club) with two paid staff members and numerous volunteers.

It has since moved to 210 Beverley St. and the staff increased fourfold.

Now the centre is expanding again because the present location creates "limitations in what you can do."

Holota said they are negotiating with the government now for a larger centre in the east end near Dundas St. and Sackville St.

The move could be accomplished by the end of next year.

Governor stays on Gueph board

GUELPH (CUP) — The board of governors at the University of Guelph has decided to allow John Wood to stay on the board.

Wood has been charged by faculty, labor and student representatives at the university of being an international criminal for manufacturing munitions for the United States government for use in effective in dealing with problems of education students. Vietnam.

In a statement released Monday the board chairman W.W. Lasby said: "The board rejected the allegations that Wood is morally unsuitable to serve on the board because he profited from munitions manufacturing."

The board also felt that Wood was not "anti-labor" and that his views on labor organizations would not prejudice his objectivity in serving on the board.

Wood had been charged by the Guelph and District Labor Council with being anti-labor. The council feels Wood shouldn't sit on the board of governors because of his views.

Workers in Wood's factory, the W.C. Wood and Co. had organized into a local of the United Steelworkers about 15 years ago but Wood managed to smash the union. Since then he has vigorously kept union organizers out of his factory.

Spokespersons at the university indicated that they were unhappy about the board's reply because it didn't deal with the issue over which they were opposing Wood's appointment.

Specifically they had charged that he was in violation of the Nuremberg Charter that says someone becomes an international war criminal when he commits war crimes even though he was ordered by superiors to do so. The charter says a person could reject the orders if they were against their moral principles.

Imaginary reps win

CHARLOTTETOWN (CUP) — More than 400 students elected three fictitious candidates to lead a non-existent committee at the University of Prince Edward Island.

A slate of eight fictitious characters running for a "committee on student-faculty evaluations" was put forward by a group of students to dramatize student apathy on campus.

About 28 percent of the 1,450 students cast votes, more than double the turnout for a real election for the university senate two weeks ago.

Swedes join UFW boycott

STOCKHOLM (CUP-ANSI) — The powerful Swedish trades union federation will join an international boycott of Californian grapes and lettuce in support of Cesar Chavez's United Farm Workers.

The boycott is expected to hurt the California growers severely as Sweden takes about four-fifths of the lettuce and two-thirds of the grapes exported to Europe.

Education students unionize

SASKATOON (CUP) — Education students in Western Canada have decided to form their own union.

The idea for the union grew out of a conference held in Winnipeg last April with education students and professional teachers.

In Winnipeg the students realized they had many common concerns that were not being dealt with and decided to hold a conference in Calgary in October.

At the Calgary conference in October motions were passed calling for the Education Students' Union to act as a liaison between post secondary schools offering programs in education.

The president or designate of each school's education students' organization was named to a board for the Western students' union and it was decided to approach all of the education student groups in the west to decide objectives for the union.

The University of Saskatchewan Education Students' Union will be acting as coordinator of reports and information between the members.

The areas of concern for this Western Education Union are primarily academic. Students wish to have the education programs standardized between institutions to allow easier transferring of credits.

The students also wish to gain credit for practice teaching (student teaching for short periods throughout the year) just as they have from intern teaching (a three-month student teaching period).

The nine members of the Western Education Students' Union represent roughly 10,000 students. The union however has financial problems. Since education colleges in Western Canada have different financial states, membership fees will be difficult to determine.

Don Horncastle, president of the University of Saskatchewan's Education Students' Union, feels this new western union will accomplish more for education students than the National Union of Students (NUS).

He feels that NUS is doing nothing for individual colleges and that NUS's priorities for dealing with student loans are misdirected. For example, in Saskatchewan, only 6,000 out of 15,000 post secondary students get student loans.

Bob Buckingham of the National Union of Students said that NUS welcomed the formation of student groups like the Western Education Students' Union. He said it had always been a policy of NUS that "students with common concerns should get together at all levels."

Buckingham admitted that NUS did not have the resources to handle all the problems of specific faculties, but felt that groups like the education students could become

The shoe that works with your body.

This shoe is different from any shoe you've ever worn. It's the EARTH® negative heel shoe. The shoe designed to work in harmony with your entire body.

The heel of the Earth® shoe is actually lower than the toe. This allows you to walk naturally. Like when you walk barefoot in sand or soft earth and your heel sinks down lower than your toes.

The entire sole of the Earth shoe is molded in a very special way. This allows you to walk in a gentle rolling motion. And to walk easily and comfortably on the hard jarring cement of our cities.

But remember, just because a shoe looks like ours doesn't mean it works like ours. So to be sure you're getting the Earth brand shoe, look on the sole for our Earth trademark.

In the Belly of the Whale
Don Bailey
Oberon

"If you try to write about the universal, it gets boring; but when you write about Ontario Street People say; I know Ontario Street." Don Bailey is a writer with a constituency. His novel In the Belly of the Whale is for "real people." A fatuous statement?

Aren't we all 'real'? For Bailey, the real people are those who most frequently come to life in his novel, his short stories, his poems. Those who are struggling to come to terms with the limits and possibilities of the urban life. They don't accept those terms as rituals to be performed from here to eternity. They live in doubt, looking for small signs, not for miracles.

Bailey wears no blinders of a preconceived alternative; he writes to see the events clearly and to understand.

Bailey tells his own story in fiction, in order to deepen a sense of his own history. This personal and particular act opens toward the universal.

The narrator of In the Belly of the Whale, Joseph Cross, explores his memories of childhood, runaway adolescence, early marriage, from his perspective as a man returning to his family after five years in prison for armed robbery.

This perspective has no arbitrary form, there is no forced union with a great theme to explain the false starts and drunken failures. This is an urban man, not an urbane one. The images used are in humility to the reality described—yet presenting a thoughtful connection that begins the process of constructing a meaning from within the events.

As is any good story-teller, he's aware of the traditional stories, the myths, that have informed our culture. The ex-con's child tells The Tale of Jonah Swallowed by the Whale, learned at the Sunday school to which she is sent to give her mother some free time. She doesn't want her father to go back to prison—to be swallowed by the whale for not doing what he's supposed to:

"Did you like that story" (Joe Cross asks her)

"Not exactly like it. I thought it was mean for God to make the man do something he didn't want to, but it had a happy ending because the man was glad when he did what he was supposed to."

"Sometimes it works out that way. I think mostly in stories though. Lots of times I do things that I'm supposed to and I don't feel so great about it."

"Me neither" she says. We both laugh. (The girl concludes by saying she likes TV better)

If the old myth breaks down, or is replaced wholesale by TV or Harlequin romances, then the individual is without a meaningful story that he can identify as his own. Without the coherent context of a cultural or personal story (history herstory) one is socially in prison.

"In the urban situation it's very difficult to have a public sense of your own uniqueness . . . the guys who go to prison are oftentimes people who feel their isolation and they are young enough and have the energy to strike out against it."

Don Bailey robbed a bank when he was 23, now he tries to articulate the roots of that aggression, and his day to day personal struggle. He doesn't explain anything away. Some readers may feel impatient for a conclusion—to this the writer would reply: "When I write it's to convey that this is happening, that it's always a process of becoming; I'm not interested in presenting dead corpses on the page to people."

The Gaiety of Gables,
Anthony Adamson and John Willard
McClelland and Stewart.

As a result of this book's release, the gables and barge boards of Ontario have been rescued from the boredom of cultural chic that has become fashionable in Toronto.

(Barge boards are those bits of wood frill under the gables of traditional Ontario farmhouses and city Gothic Revival houses.)

The Gaiety of Gables, with a historical text by Anthony Adamson and great photographs by John Willard, puts forth an affectionate not-too-serious look at these bits of frivolity. But they are debatable book material, especially at $18.00.

Books on craftsmanship and craftsmen in Ontario of years past can be the most rewarding and provocative volumes an Ontario resident can possess.

We are intimately tied to them. The hopes and dreams of our ancestors are much like ours. Early photographs of families in Ontario are either groupings around the stove with photos of grandma and grandpa in the background or outside, with the kids playing croquet and the rest of the family dispersed about the front of the house, in windows, on the verandah or sitting on the steps. The pride they had for their homes and the value they placed on them as intrinsic elements in their lives have to be taken seriously.

In Yorkville, architects Webb, Zarefa, Menkes and Housden have made a renovated house, with central gable and whimsical barge board, the image maker of their home offices that rise behind. The effect, of course, is a little bit of Disneyland pasted on the sidewalk.

WZMH's use of the house is an appalling example of vernacular architecture taken down the road of public relations. They are foolish to believe that we might accept such a travesty.

As appealing as The Gaiety of Gables, it deals with such a small and specific bit of the experience of architecture in Ontario, that one cannot but assume that this is really a book taken from a chapter of an imaginary book on settlement patterns of rural Ontario.

Eric Arthur's book The Barn is an excellent example of an element of the settlements of Ontario taken through all the implications of shape, materials, siting, function and domestication. It includes beautiful and heartwarming examples of wood and metalwork done by the farmer craftsmen.

classical record reviews

Rome, Juliet and Lorin Maazel seem to be getting together a lot these days. Earlier this year we had Maazel's complete recording of Prokofiev's ballet on Shakespeare's loving teenagers, the first complete recording in a long time, and a huge success. Now comes Romeo et Juliette, A Symphony for Orchestra, Chorus and vocal Soloists by Berlioz.

Although a different orchestra is used here (The Vienna Philharmonic as opposed to the Cleveland Orchestra) the results are just as impressive. Maazel is one of the best of the younger generation of conductors; the Toronto Symphony would have given some impressive chunk of its fiscal anatomy to secure him as music director, but now he's out of their league.

I first heard this work in concert a couple of years back, with the old master of the spectacular himself, Seiji Ozawa, at the helm of the TSO and the Mendelssohn Choir, and the performance was a triumph, artistically and show-biz-wise. The very gates of heaven seem to open in the last climactic bars of this symphony (or is it an oratorio? or a concert opera?) and it's a sure audience-pleaser.

This isn't to imply that it lacks a technically or artistically valid side, though. Although it was one of Berlioz' earlier works, it has his characteristically brilliant orchestration. It's the knowledge of knowing exactly which instrument went where in the musical framework that made Berlioz such a success in his lifetime. Others, of course, might argue that orchestration was a mere technique, and the genius lay in the original conception of the work and its execution, but I leave such fine points to the musicologists and bonepickers who are better suited for it than I.

Maazel and London Records are fortunate in their casting for this two-record epic: they've drawn from the best in London's enviable roster of stars: Christa Ludwig and Nicolai Ghiaurov head the cast, backed up by soloists of the French National Radio Orchestra Chorus, one reason for the superb chorus pronunciation. Too often one finds mushy diction when German choruses tackle Handel, or Italians try Beethoven, or in other odd national combinations.

Sonics and surfaces are fairly good in the set, and the final chorus scene has been handled with a nice, light touch on the recording console. As a result, the thick vocal writing is crystal-clear. There's an accompanying booklet, but it's pretty skimpy on text... just a page of commentary and then the libretto. Shame, London. You can do better than that.

All in all, though, a rousingly good performance of a nineteenth-century masterpiece, worth having in any good collection.

In a new Deutsche Grammophon disc, pianist Roberto Szidon plays six of the Rhapsodies, taken from his three-record set of the complete pieces issued last year.

Since so many of these have been transcribed for orchestra and are heard far more often in that form, it's a revelation of sorts to hear them played on piano. The first cut, Rhapsody No. 2 is a work that's been used in cartoons, commercials and countless muzak arrangements for its bouncy, vibrant gypsy melody. Szidon approaches it with an open mind, and just plays the music on the page.

One doesn't have to be an interpretative wizard to play Liszt; if you can follow what he wrote down—and that takes gigantic skill and flawless technique—then what emerges is a fabulous performance. Szidon's got that level of skill. (DG 2530 441).

A piano concerto that's suffered the fate of too many performances by mediocre pianists is the Tchaikovsky first, surely the most-played concerto in the entire repertoire. Is there call for another recording of this work, already represented in the catalogues more than amply? If the pianist is Emil Gilels, there's reason enough.

Gilels has that rare combination of unbounded technique and sublime insight into the music that is the stuff of legend. Angel has issued a two-disc set of the three Tchaikovsky concertos that shows off his abilities in a splendid way. Backed by Lorin Maazel and the New Philharmonia Orchestra (a group that exists only for recording purposes), it's another stunning example of what can be done with a warhorse when its musical structure and melodic content are rethought and played afresh.

The second and third concertos aren't nearly as known as the First. Concerto No. 3 is a one-movement affair, with some fine moments, but Gilels really shines in No. 2, a performance crowned by an absolutely stunning final movement, all flash and fireworks. For this, Maazel and the orchestra must surely share the credit. Angel SB-3798—a worthwhile addition to any collection.

Gilels also turns up regularly on Deutsche Gramaphon these days, and on DG 2530 456, he's recorded a pair of concertos less familiar to concert audiences, but quite as beautiful as you're ever likely to hear. Aided by the longtime Mozart expert, conductor Karl Bohm, Gilels has played the finest Concerto No. 27 that I've ever heard. With the Vienna Philharmonic, one of the world's great orchestras, it's a thoughtful, smooth performance.

On the flip side is the Mozart concerto for two pianos and orchestra. Gilels is joined by the talented Elena Gilels—surely one of the few father-and-daughter performances on record!

Maurice Ravel wrote two piano concertos—one in G Major, a very fine and enjoyable work, but conventional in form. His other concerto was very different: it was written for Paul Wittgenstein, a Viennese pianist who lost his right arm in the first world war. So, the concerto is called the "Concerto for the left hand".

By judicious use of the sustaining pedal, and some frantic dashing around the keys, the pianist can skietch in all the chords and figurations one would expect in a two-hand concerto.

When a competent pianist tackles this virtuoso item, he or she has one distinct task: to make it look (and sound) easy. When it's played correctly, there is no way the listener can tell how many hands it's written for—and isn't that what professionalism is all about: making it look easy? Of course, Ravel didn't write this as a showoff vehicle; going within the constraints of Wittgenstein's technical resources (half that of a normal pianist) he wrote a legitimate, beautiful concerto any composer would be proud to have penned.

Many pianists have played this work since its 1931 premiere. The melodies are taut, rhythmic and more imbued with the salt in Ravel's writing than the sugar. John Browning is an American pianist with giant technique and a mind behind the hands (unlike some members of the pound-and-smash school) and does the Ravel concerto justice on a new Seraphim release, S-60224. It's a re-release, although going by the sound quality it can't be very old; the stereo is lifelike and the dynamic range is rather wide.

Part of the success of any concerto performance, of course, depends on the orchestra and the conductor backing up the soloist.

The Ravel concerto has a demanding orchestra part, and there are some problems of balance between the one-handed player and the eighty-odd member orchestra that the conductor has to face.

Erich Leinsdorf, one of the best in the biz, is in front of the New Philharmonia Orchestra (a recording ensemble) on this record, and the combination is an excellent one.

There are many other fine versions of the Prokofiev available, but few have the kicker that this one does: the price, in these staffflationary times, is $2.98. List, no less! Shop around and you can unearth it for about two bucks.

As if this weren't enough, side two of the disc sports the Prokofiev concerto No. 3, a work predating the Ravel by about a decade. This is more in the conventional mold, a work for two hands; the orchestra part is not as involved as the Ravel's—it's really the soloist's show here. As with the side one music, Browning tosses off the runs, chords and technical challenges with ease, but he's got insight and lyricism to spare.

All in all, this disc has to rate as one of the most enjoyable of the year. Both concertos are standard-repertoire items, it's true, but to get that way they had to have a lot going for them.

The Collected Works of Billy the Kid
Toronto Free Theatre

Michael Ondaatje's lengthy poetic work The Collected Works of Billy the Kid was dramatized by the author and first presented at Stratford's 3rd Stage a summer ago. In many aspects the work doesn't jell on stage.

There's a loose-knit quality to Ondaatje's work, its strength comes from the series of episodes that are built upon one another rather than from any dramatic intensity woven into the play. This is noticeable especially in the first act which moves in too many directions without winding up in any. The work does contain some very vivid images but on stage the power of Ondaatje's language alone cannot carry it along very well.

The Stratford production, with many admirable qualities in its favour, did seem to stretch the play out across a large space and diffuse it in the process. Martin Kinch's production concentrates the play.

The Stratford production lacked a sense of purpose; Kinch's doesn't. Kinch has always been a director very adept at dealing with the gut physical elements in a play and The Collected Works of Billy the Kid provides him with a perfect stomping ground.

There is a strong sexual undertone, completely missing in the Stratford production, which is commendably paralleled with Ondaatje's investigation of violence.

The centres on the legendary William Bonney. Ondaatje looks at the sides of Billy's personality that drove him to violent outbursts but the play as a whole is a look at the idea of the Western hero, the romanticized gunslinger. It was a time when a man's best friend was his gun.

Nick Mancuso's Billy is no mythic hero. Mancuso does not play him as a toughie, or even as a terribly violent person the performance seems too weak and refined, as the role demands strength and an outer layer of machismo at least. But Mancuso builds the character remarkably well, even though he is often overshadowed by the other characters. He finally seems to be a tragic and pathetic hero.

David Bolt plays Billy's memesis, Pat Garrett. The performance is well-conceived. He is a lurking sinister shadow haunting Billy, a monomaniac clad in black.

Free Theatre regulars Chapelle Jaffe and William Webster are excellent in supporting roles. Wendy Thatcher, as the love interest, makes the usually cliched picture of the Western hooker something much more substantial.

Saul Rubinek accompanies the actors, strumming on his guitar and singing some forlorn songs, as they move through Ed Fisher's skillfully designed set of raw wood.

This production is obviously the result of a great deal of careful work and consideration — which have paid off. In spite of certain intrinsic weaknesses in the text itself, this is one of the finest productions that Toronto Free Theatre has brought us.

The Dumb Waiter
Toronto Centre for the Arts
Dupont and Brunswick

The Toronto Centre For The Arts present fare is Harold Pinter's well known play The Dumb Waiter.

The play concerns itself with two contract men, Ben and Gus, waiting for their next victim in a run down hotel in the British Midlands. Centering around the collection of bizarre instructions from the dumb waiter, the action moves steadily toward the realization that Gus himself is the object of the contract.

Under the direction of Brant Allanak, the play begins with a long and painful silence, while we observe the cast tie their shoes and read newspapers. This silence which often occurs at the beginning of absurd plays is intended to unnerve the audience and create an all-pervading gloom. All it really does, especially in this case, is create an all-pervading tedium.

Interaction between the characters is definitely the most important aspect in this play. Ben the senior member of the partnership and the eventual murderer is played by Allen Aarons. Unfortunately Aarons rants and raves melodramatically revealing almost no subtleties of character. Alan Dean as Gus is much more interesting, though he does seem rather uncomfortable in the role.

The T.C.A. company attempts to create a much needed tension by an eerie and entirely unnecessary musical introduction but neglects to create this between the characters except on a superficial level. Consequently the climactic unexpected appearance of Gus has no shock value for the audience. He appears, Ben feigns a look of surprise and the lights go out.

Pinter's play, set within a conventional plot, is a smooth one full of amusing dialogues between the two characters. These qualities have decidedly disappeared in the Toronto Centre For The Arts' Production.

One More Time
Colonial Tavern
Yonge Street
Indefinite Run

Musical comedy revues can be either hilariously funny or excruciatingly painful. One More Time, at the Colonial Cabaret Theatre is definitely the latter.

It is billed as "the grand brand new musical revue that concentrates on comedy . . . There is no message, there is no theme — not so much as one sad song — One More Time is strictly for laughs."

One More Time isn't even a light piece of fluff.

It assaults your senses and intelligence and descends on you with all the graceless aplomb of a lead balloon.

The skits concern the very conventional topics of love, food, sex, clothes, drenched in heavy doses of bland and cloying humour. It is humour devoid of direction, wit or charm.

The audience is introduced to One

More Time by a heavy-handed (and footed) sing-and-dance "razza-ma-tazz" number. It is followed by a very trite mock-Restoration comedy sketch the humour of which revolves around the 17th century practice of printing the letter "s" as the letter "f". It is called "Fops and Finners". Get it? The idea for this routine is not new; it's been around for a long, long, long time.

Other feeble and belaboured skits include a reminiscence about telephone exchanges turning from Walnut to digits; the sexual suggestiveness of car manual instructions (who hasn't heard of that one and seen it done better somewhere else?); and a confused guy who loves a nice demure girl who loves garlic more than she loves him. This last skit (and please excuse the pun) reeks of bad taste.

The "highlight" and last sketch is a modern day Romeo and Juliet type romance and marriage called "A Toronto Idyll." Rich Miss Rose Dale falls in love with poor Don Mills. Problems arise when they as Rose's "mummy," Mrs. Forest Hill for her permission which she reluctantly gives. Like all happy love stories they finally do get married.

In an embarrassingly bad marriage scene, Don Mills declares how "hip and 'cool' he and his friends are: he listens to the Moody Blues and the Rolling Stones, his favourite singer is Mick Jagger and he demonstrates it by doing a rather repulsive swivel-hipped imitation that looks much more like the early Elvis Presley than like Jagger. And the guests all dance the frog and the monkey.

The revue's lack of sophistication — in material and presentation — make it seem very out of date.

Maybe you had to be forty, fat, and balding.

With decent material the three member cast, Connie Martin, David Brown and Robert Jeffery might have had a chance to be good. As it is, both Brown and Jeffery seem excessively enthusiastic about something, don't know what, as they coyly prance, wink and grin their way through countless antics.

By the time One More Time's closing song-and-dance number ended there was no way I could respond positively to Connie Martin's concluding line, "We hope we didn't bore you!"

Home
New Theatre
Bathurst United Church
Bathurst and Bloor

An awkward play to analyse, thus. Vernon Chapman's production at the New Theatre is well-paced and highly polished — and that is quite an achievement in itself for Storey has assembled a sort of Pinesque stychomythia out of tiny phrases which must be the worst thing in the world to memorise, let alone perform. This cast manages wonderfully.

They manage less well in overcoming the other major obstacle created by the author — and it may well be inseparable.

Home is a dramatic duplex. On one level it is a study of five asylum inmates, three men (a sexual offender, a labotomised ex-wrestler and a repressed pyromaniac) and two women (an attempted suicide and a depressive). From their highly allusive conversation, the audience deduces the lonely and unhappy pattern of their lives.

The play has considerable emotional impact at this level, offering great scope for sensitive and able actors. Larry Reynolds and Paul Craig in particular took full advantage of the opportunity.

The women were less convincing but not, I think, because they are less competent as actors.

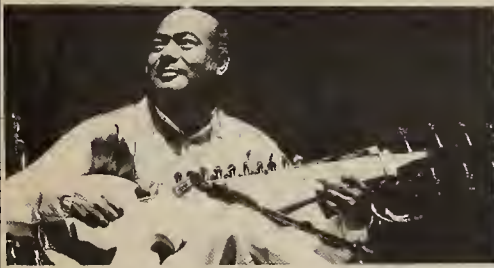

The problem lies rather with Storey's construction. The play's other level is allegorical; it is a play about England — "This little island" says Jack, and the audience ticks off mentally "this throne of majesty," etc. etc. The picture of a lost Eden emerges from scraps of motif and allusion, and the characters fall into line along the familiar class divisions. Unfortunately, Storey's ear seems to be surer in characterising inhibited middle class males than the over-sexed and under privileged lower classes. Joyce Gordon and Marion Gilseman had a very crude row to hoe.

Conditions at the New Theatre are not ideal. Noises off from the lobby are irritatingly loud, and entrances and exits are not easily made through the confined wing space. But in this production there are many moments, funny and moving, when such details don't seem to matter very much.

Robert Finch Retrospective
Campbell Gallery
52 Denali

It has been over twenty years since Robert Finch last presented his paintings in a public exhibition. Now he is back, to all his geometric glory, with a representational collection of his works at the Campbell Gallery.

Finch is perhaps better known as a U of T professor or as a poet. Retired now, he lives at Massey College where writing poetry, painting and playing piano, harpsichord and clavichord, monopolize his productive existence.

The current assemblage of fifty-one pieces covers a fifteen year period from 1959 to the present. It clearly shows Finch's fascination with form and line whether his subject matter be factories or flowers.

His gouaches dealing with man-made structures are perhaps the most successful. These are highly stylized compositions, which, on one level, merely reflect the order and sterility of modern existence. Finch's sensitivity to colour, however, grant them a spiritual dimension beyond that of the purely material.

His most recent works, dealing with village scenes in Prince Edward Island, typify this duality in technique. The eye is immediately struck with the clean-cut precision of the lines, the preoccupation with symmetry and geometric design. At the same time, the soul is summoned in response to the delicacy of colour, which accents the underlying fragility of the dominant pattern. Compositions such as 'Le Phare', 'Above the Beach' and 'Lobster Factory' are interesting embodiments of his style.

Finch's charcoal flower drawings also demonstrate his attention to detail, and his desire for clarity and purity of expression.

But some of these compositions merely reflect perfectionism in capturing detail. They lack emotional appeal. They strike one as being purely cerebral exercises.

The exhibition is certainly an excellent cross-section of Finch's unique style and approach to his material.

"Icons III, Rosette Series, 1974"
Rick McCarthy
Hart House Art Gallery
until November 16

It looks a bit as if they're getting ready for a carnival in the Hart House Gallery. One huge elaborate construction suspended from the ceiling looks like the backside of a Chinese dragon. It is titled "Madonna and Child" "Icons III, Rosette Series, 1974" by Rick McCarthy comprises, for the most part, variations on one particular image within an elongated rosette shape.

In a set of small cardboard "rosettes" dabs of acrylic colour radiate from a central "shrine" containing two humanoid shapes which fit together like a lock and key. They appear as motifs consistently in his work whether they are "embracing" or apart.

The title of the show and the works themselves evoke some comparisons with devotion pieces and rose windows. The warm appealing colours especially — the artist's strong point — recall the magical light from these windows.

But, whereas McCarthy's paintings have at least superficial appeal, his drawings, lacking colour and luminosity, are merely curious.

Like sloppy Tantra symbols, they are usually too tight and intricately patterned to escape from their own confines. By placing the rosettes against a lifeless background, they appear even more as decorative symbols than as works of art.

Jack Humphrey
A Retrospective Exhibition
Galerie Dresdner
130 Bloor St. West
Until November 19

As is the case with most artists living in the Maritimes, so it was for Jack Humphrey. They quality of life appeals to the aesthetic soul. The work that is created as a result of the environment is oftimes astounding.

Jack Humphrey (1901-1967) lived and painted in Saint John, New Brunswick, for most of his life. He studied with Philip Hale in Boston, Charles Hawthorne in New York, and Hans Hoffmann in Germany. His decision to return to his home province was one made after considering the alternatives.

Saint John is a port city. It is at the mouth of the Saint John River, scattered among steep, erratic hills. The Irving paper mill dumps wastes into the sea and the air. There is hardly a street that is not slated for demolition.

Yet in this depressing setting, Humphrey worked, producing works of art that are distinctly Canadian, distinctly Maritime. He captures the essence of the land. When looking at his watercolours, you somehow understand how a man could love this area, which is thought of so often in the Upper Canadian mind in terms of economically depressed fishing and lumbering communities.

Humphrey puts the lie to these misconceptions. The rivers, ('Rural ferry', 1956), lakes ('McCormack's Lake', 1949) and country ('Early Fall, Nerepis, N.B.', 1946) are as pleasing to look at as his watercolours of Saint John houses, sketched with a lightness of touch that puts them out of the socialist realist school all together.

Although Humphrey has had many solo exhibitions mostly in the Maritimes, this is his first in Toronto. He is well known in his native province, but is only now getting the wider recognition he deserves.

As fall comes, cockburn returns

When Bruce Cockburn ambled with shy, yet professional confidence onto the stage of Massey Hall last All Hallow's Eve, the tone and mood of his forthcoming concert performance was surely captured by his making a propitiation to the spirits of the evening. Cockburn carried that pagan symbol, the Jack o'Lantern, with its grinning mockery of things holy and sacrosanct in one hand, and his ultra-resonant acoustic guitar in the other. After a bit of friendly banter with the groundings in the exorbitantly-priced pit seats, proceeded to light the orange, candle-gobbling head just before launching into his perennial Toronto concert.

The Hallow'en foolery may have reminded the full-house that the concert would be Cockburn's way of "shelling-out" some of the highlights from his 5-album discography. But listening to Bruce in a concert setting reminded one that his musical roots go back to an area of his formative years which is never mentioned in biographical pieces on Canada's second Light-foot.

Most background material on Cockburn dwells on the Parisian "busking" days (alluded to in "Barrelhouse"), the return to North America and the stint with the Berklee School of Music in Boston. After this formal musical training, Cockburn freaked-out for a year or more as guitarist-singer in the Ottawa-based folk rock group "The Children".

So reads the quickie-bio that makes the rounds as filler for the "cool" jocks at CHUM-FM. All of these diverse elements aid in arriving at the composite-Cockburn — the Rheinhardt sound perhaps tempered in Paris, the country-happiness of "Going To The Country", or the rock influences in "Rouler Sa Bosse".

There is one facet of Cockburn's musical montage which has either remained unnoticed or has been considered unimportant in sketching the influences on this fine young musician. On the shores of Rideau Lake, nestled about 45 miles southwest of Canada's capital, in the early years of the Sixties, Bruce Cockburn was employed as an orchestra-guitarist in a ten-piece group that specialized in Glenn Miller arrangements and Dorsey Brothers charts, as well as pop-material such as Acker Bilk's

Ideas: The spark we run on

Hoechst develops a constant stream of new ideas to keep its research pointed in the right directions. Ideas about what is needed, ideas about what is wanted. Ideas about what is possible, ideas about what is probable in the light of a constantly changing, ever-increasing body of basic knowledge.

Imagination steers the ship

Imagination is a prime source of the new ideas Hoechst uses constantly in order to keep developing better products — more effective medicines, better chemical and industrial materials. Imagination is only half the battle, but when good ideas are properly teamed with the discipline of applied research, they constitute a formidable force in the search for improved products in every area of modern life.

Helping Build Canada

Products and ideas from Hoechst have touched and improved the quality of people's lives in every area around the world, in a hundred countries on six continents. As an affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organizations Canadian Hoechst Limited has a full century of research and achievement to draw upon. In Canada, Hoechst is an autonomous company employing Canadians to serve Canadian needs.

Hoechst in Canada concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, plastics, printing plates, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst products and services, Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. "Stranger On The Shore"

Sitting in packed Massey Hall last Thursday night and hearing Cockburn's command of chord-progressions an augmented voice-shadings, it seemed suddenly clear that much of his creative capacity owes a subconscious debt to the years with the "Starlighters" at Rideau Ferry Inn's dance hall.

Those complex chord groupings utilized by Cockburn came popping out of a song such as "Dialogue With The Devil" which he performed to eager applause. The very jazz-oriented feeling of a tune like "Mama Just Wants To Barrelhouse" or "The Blues Got The World", may have been partially erased due to the familiarity of his audience with most of his material, but this pair of tunes received the most instantaneous recognition and approval.

Cockburn worked through a goodly number of tunes from earlier recorded works in the first "half" of the show, and managed to splice in a sing-along or two to keep the hummers bappy.

In the second extended set, he was joined on stage by his producer and second-guitarist, Gene Martynec, whose accompaniment partially restricted Cockburn in that, as he explained, they would have to play the newer songs from Salt, Sun and Time.

"Don't Have To Tell You Why", and a song described by Cockburn as having been resurrected due to the interest of David Whiffen, long-time pal, whose duet album he produced, called "It Won't Be Long", were both performed with a dramatic intensity that had the crowd clapping and stomping for much more of Bruce Cockburn when the short (2 hours and 10 minutes, less generous intermission) concert performance concluded.

coming events

Many thanks to Pauline Hoy for her discussion of the Review in her letter on the Varsity in last Friday's issue.

"I also appreciate reviews of new books, plays, records and so on," she said.

Hoy also suggested we institute "contests to win real money."

Dear Pauline, almost every one who works on this paper volunteers his labour. Those who are paid are not paid very much. There is no money to throw around. (But note David Basskin contests for classical records in the appropriate coming events column.)

Hoy also suggested "a more light-hearted approach." We'll try.

"Puzzles, games, an Ask Andy column."

No.

"Students' photography, art, prose." Most of the photographs that have been appearing in the Review each week have been creative photos taken by students. And I think they've taken some very good photos. Graphics: you want that I should draw? We welcome graphics but no one has submitted any to date. (But please, please, do not slip unsigned contributions — of graphics or reviews — under the door. Come in and talk first. Bring a portfolio with you if you want to.)

"Students' prose." We will be doing a spread on student literary quarterlies soon and we hope to reprint some of the better poems and stories.

Keep those cards and letters coming, folks.

On Campus shows first. Ronald Ribman's Harry. Noon and Night opened November 6 at the Glen Morris St. Theatre. It is an entertaining and thought-provoking play — and it's FREE, so hurry over before it closes, November 9.

At Hart House the second production in the Drama Centre's current season begins its run November 14. You may never have another chance to see 'Tis Pity She's a Whore by John Ford, and 'twere pity if you missed this one. Closing date is November 23. Students seats $1.50, rest of the world $3.

A near contemporary of the Ford play, Milton's Comus also opens this week. The director has aimed as closely as possible for historical accuracy in this production, so it should make an interesting contrast with the camped-up histrionics of the 1972 version at Hart House. It runs November 12 through 16 at 8 p.m. in Sealey Hall, Trinity College. Student seats $1.00, others $1.50.

Off Campus, a couple of big-and-glossies. Anne of Green Gables has been tip-toeing through the heart strings of susceptible Torontonians at the O'Keefe this week. (Last chance to succumb — November 9).

And at the Royal Alex, Sugar and Spice will intensify the intestinal assault. Advance publicity cautions that "A certain amount of plot-oriented nudity is involved and the language is that which would be used by anyone finding themselves captive in these horrifying circumstances." Yummy. If you enjoyed the Sharon Tait murder, this should be right up your proclivity. (Low price previews November 8 and 9; runs November 11-30.)

In lighter vein, Neil Simon's Come Blow Your Horn remains at the Colonnade till November 16, and Pinter's The Dumb Waiter will play Tuesdays through Saturdays at the Toronto Centre for the Arts till November 16.

LaCombe, Lucien continues to grow in my mind. One reviewer after another has said the film illustrates Hanna Arendt's proposition of the banality of evil. It is true, but misleading in tone, for Malle's banality is haunting and compassionate. Our highest recommendation. At the International, $3.

Recently some of The Candidate and Midnight Cowboy made it by commercial and moral censors onto the TV. Of the six choice bits I remembered in The Candidate, there were three. And poor Midnight Cowboy, some of the most key, Freudian passages were dropped, and, with Schlesinger's hurling style, you know that no one would be able to tell that there was anything missing.

Midnight Cowboy is better history than art, though it has its moments and, seen again, Dustin Hoffman is great. Cowboy is on Tuesday night at the Roxby with Bertolucci's controversial erotic masterpiece.

For devoted ballet fans who don't mind travelling for a dance, the National Ballet is premiering three works at the Great Hall in Hamilton Place. Sorry to say you've missed the first two shows, but if you rush to the GO Train, you can still see all three new works tonight. Curtain time is 8:30 pm.

And next Saturday — I'm telling you now to give you time to save some money, and to get your plane reservations — Baryshnikov and Kirkland will be giving a gala program, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music in New York City. Tickets start at $50.00 and go down to $12.50.

The Royal Swedish Ballet is also performing in N.Y., Nov. 19-24, with slightly less expensive tickets ($9 to $2).

But, if like most of us, you're here in Toronto for the winter, you can catch The Ecstasy of Rita Joe on TV — on CBC's Musicaera. Nov. 20th, 9 pm.

One of Nobert Vysak's most successful dances, Ecstasy combines film (mostly shot outside Winnipeg at the Roseau Indian Reserve), a moving commentary by Chief Dan George (who adopted Maria de Gorriz, who dances Rita, as his 48th grandchild) and some of the best music you will hear in a long time — written and sung by Anne Morifee, a young Vancouver composer.

The 15 Dance Laboratorium gives three performances Nov. 15-17 at 155A George St., east of Jarvis. The number for ticket information is 869-1489.

Paul Gaulin, a student of Marcel Marceau and of Marceau's teacher, Etienne Decrous, will lead his compagnie de Mime from Nov. 14 until Dec. 1, at the Poor Alex, corner of Brunswick and Bloor. The number to call: 920-8373.

For something different, the Enoch Turner Schoolhouse Foundation is presenting folk and square dancing on the first and third Wednesdays of the month beginning this past Wednesday 8:00 to 10:30 pm.

To get to the schoolhouse, take the King Car east, to Parliament, then look for the Anglican church on the south side of King. Behind that is the Schoolhouse. Once you find it, you'll soon become a regular — antique shows, and Theatre Passe Muraille.

The Toronto Dominion Centre Cinema is holding a Russian ballet film festival. The first film has the Bolshoi in excerpts from Giselle, Pagani, Bolera, and The Dying Swan.

Nov. 8 to 14, 8:30 pm Mon. to Thurs.; Fri. to Sun., 7:00 and 9:00 with Sat. and Sun. matinees at 2:00.

Swan Lake is the second film, danced by Leningrad's Kirov. Nov. 15 to 21.

The Soviet Army Song and Dance Ensemble will present a large variety of Russian classic and folk numbers. Nov. 22 to 28.

You still have a chance to catch the Toronto Dance Theatre, at the Edward Johnson Building. Tonight and tomorrow 8:30 pm. Student tickets $3. There's a matinee (different program) on Sat. at 2:30. Phone 425-2212.

Another afternoon of sheer pleasure is in store this Sunday: Anton Kuerti will be making an appearance at Hart House for the third in his Beethoven Sonata series. Last Sunday's concert was an unqualified success: the "Tempest" sonata was coupled with two less frenetic works, the op. 2, no. 2 and the op. 28, the "Pastoral" — a particular favourite of mine.

As before, Kuerti talked about each piece before playing it. Aside from being witty and charming, he's also very knowledgeable. Everybody who cares even just a little about music owes it to himself or herself to see at least one of these concerts. On tap Sunday at 3: three more sonatas, featuring the "Pathétique".

Something new at the Science Centre: a series of concerts that'll be broadcast live over CJRT-FM. This Monday evening at 8, the Sadik Hakim Jazz Ensemble is lined up, and as a bonus, there's no charge for either the concert or the Center on that night. The series looks interesting in the future, with concerts of jazz, classical and a special on Black Composers in the works.

What has 88 keys and can't be heard? Nicolai Petrov, that's what (or who, I should say). He's the 30-year-old Russian making waves in the music biz with spectacular pianistics ... but unless you're one of the lucky 300 or so with tickets to the St. Lawrence Centre's "Piano 6" series, you're out of luck. Single tickets might, just might, be available if you hustle on down.

Program includes Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques" and Stravinsky's "Suite du Ballet Petrouchka" heard to advantage on a DG recording by Maurizio Pollini a couple of years ago. Thursday at 8:30 at the St. Lawrence.

If early Baroque music is your bag, you can see a "Collegium Musicum Workshop Tuesday eve at the Edward Johnson Building. The group is directed by harpsichord expert and Baroque scholar Greta Kraus. Admission is free — no tickets required. 8:15 pm.

Kuerti isn't the only pianist in town during the lecture-concert routine. Thursday afternoon at 2:10 at the EJB, Diane McIntosh will present an all-Canadian piano concert in the Faculty's Thursday Afternoon Series. It's free, as is the 8:15 pm recital on the same day of Anne Keffer, a Hautist in the performance program.

And the winnah is ... Paul Johnson, who won a record for identifying the Beethoven symphonies a couple of weeks ago, has picked up another two for the Stravinsky riddle. (To see what Igor's detractors thought was his monogram, just superimpose an S over an I. You get a dollar sign.)

Congrats to A.E. Zimmerman of the Best Institute for telling me that Mahler didn't write any operas because he was a summer composer who had barely enough time for his symphonies, let alone the complexity of an opera.

Have a go at this one, quiz kids: describe the musical instrument that was saxophone-inventor A Sax's greatest failure. No answers accepted after Tuesday noon.

rock

A couple of bargain-priced concerts take place tonight with Rory Gallagher doing two shows at Convocation Hall and Perth County Conspiracy appearing at Massey Hall. The Perth County show costs only $3. Rory Gallagher tickets can be purchased for $4 by U of T students, but they must be bought in advance from the SAC office.

Another good bet tonight is Beaver's, Victoria College's licensed folk club, which this week features noted Toronto folk artist, Raffi. Beaver's is located in the basement of Wymillwood, at 150 Charles St. West.

Sunday the 10th has the Electric Light Orchestra at Massey Hall, and Tuesday the 12th offers Arlo Guthrie in one of his rare appearances at Massey Hall.

Sunday Nov. 17 brings jazz guitarist Larry Coryell with his band, the Eleventh Hour with Toronto's Audiomaster featured as the opening act.

Monday the 18th, Elton John performs for the fortunate few at Maple Leaf Gardens, and on Wednesday the 20th, Billy Joel returns to Massey Hall for his third successful show in a year.

At the clubs, John Allan Cameron closes Saturday at the Chimney, with Buzzy Lindhart coming in next week. Noted bluesman, Howlin' Wolf is at the El Mocambo until Saturday, with the Downchild Blues Band replacing him next week. Egerton's offers Bob Carpenter, Brent Titcomb & Tommy Graham through Saturday, and has Tony Kosinec coming in next week.

books

There was a front-page interview with J.D. Salinger in last week's New York Times — an interview that the Globe and Mail surprisingly enough (since it does reprint so many Times stories) did not pick up.

Salinger has now been a recluse for over 20 years now. He believes he needs isolation to maintain his creativity and that he must not be interrupted "during working years." He has refused interviews. He has dropped friends if they discuss him with reporters.

Salinger called the paper himself to denounce the publication of The Complete Uncollected Short Stories of J.D. Salinger, Volumes 1 and 2.

The stories have been collected and reprinted without his permission.

Salinger said that he wrote the stories a long time ago and "and I never had any intention of publishing them. I wanted them to die a perfectly natural death."

"I'm not trying to hide the gaucheries of my youth. I just don't think they're worthy of publishing."

The stories, which include two about Holden Caulfield, were written between 1940 and 1948. The Catcher in the Rye, which continues to sell at the rate of 250,000 copies a year, was published in 1951.

The books are being peddled in person to bookstores by men who always call themselves John Greenberg and who say they come from Berkeley, California. Their descriptions have varied from city to city.

Salinger was asked if he expected to publish another work soon.

"I really don't know how soon," he said. "There was an other pause, and then Salinger began to talk rapidly about how much he was writing, long hours, every day, and he said he was under contract to no one for another book.

"I don't necessarily intend to publish posthumously," he said, "but I do like to write for myself."

"I pay for this kind of attitude. I'm known as a strange aloof kind of man. But all I'm doing is trying to protect myself and my work."

Salinger has launched lawsuits against bookstores which have sold the unauthorized collections.

Two lectures of interest next week.

On Tuesday, Erich Heller speaks on "Autobiography and Literature: Reflections on Thomas Mann's Death in Venice." We've had Visconti's film, and, more recently, Britten's opera. Enter the academic. Heller has written a number of important books on Mann and on modern German literature.

Room BCD, Brennan Hall, St. Mikes.

Free. On Thursday, Robertson Davies speaks on "Education and Literature."

"Robertson Davies," "Master of Massey," one tends to treat him in quotation marks. Occasionally you run across him in the bookstore or going down St. George. It's great fun — to recognize him and then pretend you don't. He's very memorable visually. Otherwise, I tend to confuse him with Arnold Edinborough. Either one of them could have written the rather Pecksniffian A Voice from the Attic, which Davies did in fact write, way back in the fifties. So long as he got it out of his system then, all the sniffing and sighing about 'les trahisons des clers.' OISE Auditorium, 8 pm. Free.

Scar, New in finals Tues at stadium

By LAWRENCE CLARKE
A 60-yard touchdown pass with only 16 seconds left in the second overtime quarter catapulted Scarborough past Trinity 14-7 in a division II playoff Wednesday.
Scar will not meet undefeated New College who came back from a 12-6 halftime deficit to steamroller the UC Redmen 17-12 in another Wednesday playoff.

Next week's division II championship between Scar and New will be played next Tuesday at 12:00 pm in Varsity Stadium, before the Mulock Cup game between Vic and PHE.

Trin and Scar had battled to a 7-7 tie in regular time and had not scored in either overtime quarter until fleet Scar back Russ Henderson outraced the Trinity secondary and pulled in a perfectly thrown pass for the game-winning touchdown.

Scar opened the scoring early in the first quarter when Trin quarterback Dave Wright, backpeddling to escape a charging Scar mob of linemen, tumbled on a large mudsuck at his own 32-yard line.

Scar's Kevin Brady scooped up the football and raced in to score a touchdown, much to the Trin side's disgust.

Trin did manage to block the convert, though, but later in the second quarter, Peter Ool kicked a single point to give Scar a 7-0 half-time lead.

Three frail-looking Trinity cheerleaders and a cheerleader trainee chivered through some half-hearted routines, and this, or some inspired pep-talk woke up the Trinity team during the half-time break, because their football improved in the second half.

While the third quarter was still young, Trin's Phil Poulos, playing on both the offensive and defensive team, snared an interception and then performed some good broken field running to get Trin into Scar territory.

Even though the offense soon fumbled the ball, Trin got it back on a punt and then Wright kicked a long single to make it 7-1 with 5 minutes left in the third quarter.

In the fourth quarter, Trin's Alex Upnieks took a lateral on the Trin 27-yard line after Scar punted, and got fine blocking to knife down to the Scar 32-yard line.

A succession of Scar penalties and determined running up the middle soon found Trin with a first down and goal-to-go situation on the Scar 5-yard line.

Because of Scar penalties, Trin had three first-down-and-goal attempts and finally Dave Mills made it over from the two-yard line.

Trin missed an all-important convert, though, and the score remained knotted 7-7.

Nobody scored in the last five minutes, although Trinity spent most of that time punting the ball into or near the Scar endzone and Scar running it out of danger.

Because regular time ended with the score tied, the teams took a rest and then returned to the field to play two six-minute quarters.

Play see-sawed back and forth with no team being able to gain the advantage until Henderson, who had run brilliantly all day, grabbed Joe Swider's perfectly thrown pass for the decisive touchdown which sent Scar into the championships.

In the other division II playoff, the UC Redmen, who have knocked off powerful New College two years in a row in the playoffs, looked like they were going to do it again this year.

Bruce MacGillivray scored two touchdowns to give UC a 12-6 halftime lead, but they didn't get any more points, while New exploded for 21.

Oerest Meluyk scored two touchdowns and Paul Lucas added another, while Gord Saikely added three singles in the second half New splurge, Mike Tierney scored their first half major.

Mac over York for OUA A crown

By JOHN COBBY
On Tuesday in Hamilton, the McMaster Marauders won the OUA A soccer title by defeating the York Yoemen 1-0.

The game between the champions of the western and eastern divisions was decided in the 75 minutes with a headed goal by Brian Pirrie following a corner.

The previously unbeaten Yoemen were unable to organize their play as five of their regular players did not dress following an eligibility ruling.

The victory by the Marauders entitles them to challenge for the national crown in a tournament commencing today in Montreal.

The other universities definitely in the CIAU finals are Dalhousie of Halifax from the Atlantic conference, Loyola of Montreal from the Quebec conference, and Manitoba of Winnipeg from the Great Plains conference.

At this time, the representative from the west is not yet known, but all indications suggest that the University of Alberta will again be present.

The final game will be played on Sunday, when this fearless correspondent predicts that Loyola will retain the title they won last year in Sudbury.

Hockey Blues edge Mac 6-5 in opener

The Varsity—Brian Pei

Water polo Blues come second

By BEN SILLIMAN

Last Friday, the Varsity Blues water polo team journeyed to Hamilton to participate in the three-day Canadian Universities Challenge Cup. The tournament, which drew the best the west could offer in Simon Fraser, is the only chance for teams across the country to compete against each other as there is no national championship playoff.

The Blues opened the tournament with a convincing 8-4 upset win over the highly touted Simon Fraser contingent. Although the westerners drew first blood early in the game, the Blues pulled away in the third quarter led by a five-goal effort from scoring leader George Gross. Alex Fedko and Geoff Brown rounded out the scoring for the victors.

In their next contest, Varsity faced divisional rival Queen's and easily won 9-6 in a game much less close than the score might indicate. Gross and Fedko again led the scoring with a pair of hat tricks while Brown, Jim Easto and Nick Flengas added singles.

Later in the day, the Blues faced OUAA western division Windsor U and thumped the inexperienced team 16-4. Gross accounted for eight goals, Fedko three, Brown two and Flengas, Jeff Miller and Bill Chisholm had one apiece.

The final day matched number one ranked McMaster against the also undefeated Blues. With seven members on the current national team, the Marauders had little trouble beating the Blues 13-4 to win the tourney with Toronto taking second. Gross scored all the Blues' goals in the losing cause.

The effort on the part of the water polo Blues is of significant importance at the national level. Should the Blues maintain their winning ways in the OUAA eastern division and advance to the final against McMaster, they would have established themselves as the number two team in the country because of their victory over Simon Fraser.

Individually, coach Steve Tobolka has come up with a few outstanding players. Goalkeeper Radu Solomon was named the most outstanding goalie in the tournament and Gross was named the most outstanding player by the national team coach and technical director who were both in attendance at the tournament. Gross, who along with Fedko, Brown, Flengas, Miller and Tony Rockingham, also represented the City of Toronto in the Jimmy Thompson tournament which ran concurrently over the three days with the University Challenge Cup, received an official verbal invitation from the national director to attend the National Team's training camp.

The Blues resume their league schedule this weekend with a trip to Ottawa, site of the OUAA finals to be held at the end of the month.

Hart House track is running around in circles

By LAWRENCE CLARKE
Joggers at the Hart House running track are slated for some 'future shock' this week.

Intramural sports administrators are asking runners to burn up the track clockwise three days of the week and counterclockwise the other four days. Until now, all running has been counterclockwise.

"A lot of doctors have been in here screaming at me," explained Robin Cambell. "It's supposed to be bad for the ankles and knees to run on the same side all the time."

Runners now should travel counterclockwise on Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Sunday; and clockwise on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday.

The policy will come into effect as soon as Cambell "gets the time to put the sign up" — probably today.

But the change may be more trouble than it's worth, Cambell said ruefully.

"A lot of people have been running on this track so long, their semi-circular canals have probably grown lop-sided," he said.

"I wouldn't be too surprised if somebody fell off the track down on the basketball court, or even if some fistfights break out," Cambell added half seriously.

For all you joggers who haven't yet prepared for the male menopause, let alone this change of affairs, athletic staff member Joe Rabel is available to give solace and comfort in room 211, Hart House.

For more seriously distressed cases, the university health service has a long list of reputable social workers and psychologists to provide the necessary professional counselling.

Yates cup decided tomorrow

By DAVE STUART
Tomorrow at 1:00 pm, Blues face the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees in what amounts to the Yates Cup game for the O-QIFC football championship.

If Toronto wins their game and Laurier loses to Western, the Blues are owners of the Yates silverware. Should Laurier also win against Western, the Golden Hawks will share the cup with Toronto.

Blues will have their hands full with the Gee-Gees who finished second only to the Blues in regular

By ANNE LLOYD
Those Varsity Blues fans who stayed home, anticipating that either the Maple Leafs or the Godfather would provide better entertainment than the Blues-McMaster season opener were certainly not disappointed, as the Blues took a narrow 6-5 win over the Marliners.

As Varsity coach Tom Watt said after the game, "we were lucky to win — but two points is two points."

And how often have we heard that particular quote in seasons past? When asked about Blues' lamentable habit of playing to the level of their opponents (no matter how mediocre) Watt parried neatly by emphasizing the inspired play of the Marliners.

And inspired it was! The Marliners showed considerable poise and tenacity in skating with the Blues all night. Their tactic of jamming up in front of the net paid off, as Blues were constantly forced to shoot from wide angles or to play (pray?) for deflections.

The Blues looked sloppy all night, particularly on defence. They gave up three easy goals to McMaster. Even Warren Anderson, easily the best defenceman in the league, was guilty, flailing an otherwise sterling effort with a defensive lapse that cost the Blues a goal.

This is not to say the game was a colossal bore; even sloppy contests have their moments of gore and glory.

The gore was promised by three skirmishes in the early going of the first period. However it never amounted to anything exciting enough to raise the 300 odd fans from their lethargy.

True, there were a few cheers for a couple of hatch jobs, one by Blues and the other by Marliners; but most of the huzzahs were reserved for the brilliant and often heroic goaltending efforts of Marlin netminder Tom Wynne.

Wynne stopped 40 Varsity shots, many of them key saves. At the other end of the rink, Dave Hulme played an adequate game for Varsity.

It's hard to say this early in the season if the Varsity netminding duo of Hulme and Oss can live up to coach Watt's confident comment that he has "the best netminders in the league."

Certainly on last year's GAA they were the best, but the defence that looked so solid last year looks rather shaky at this point.

But not to despair — there were some brilliant moves by Varsity. Rookie Dave Rooke put the Blues ahead 1-0 early in the first period with a quick shot from about 15 feet out. Mac came right back and persevered to score the tying goal on a deflection, after Hulme had made a brilliant save on the initial shot.

McFarlane made it 2-1 for Toronto at 7:07 of the first, and Marliners tied it up 2-2 with a long shot. With the crowd slowly nodding off, only another skirmish near the end of the first stanza gave the audience enough motivation to stay for more.

Those who outlasted the tedium of the later stages of the first period were treated to a neat deflection by Bill Fifeild, giving the Blues a 3-2 lead at 0:14 of the second period.

But this was just a lead-in to a pair of well executed passes from Fifeild and Sawyer to veteran Gord Davies. Davies' goal was a classic and gave the Blues a 4-2 lead.

Mac came back two minutes later to make the score 4-3. At 14:17 Herridge notched one for Varsity to make it 5-3.

It took Bob Menard just seven seconds to bring Marliners within one goal of the Blues.

Mac tied the game at 7:21 of the third period and then the two teams settled the previously established sloppy style of play until an appearance by one of the Varsity trainers (ably assisted by two players) tottered down the ice to administer to an injured Ron Harris.

This provided the only comic relief until Kent Ruhnke of the Blues brought the crowd to its feet with a dazzling breakaway which resulted in the winning goal.

Ruhnke, who had been guilty earlier in the game of making superstar like rushes, and often ignoring his wingers, redeemed himself with this winner.

The Blues must tighten up — both on offence and defence — if they wish to improve on last year's showing. They played poorly while Mac played well. The Blues were lucky — Mac was not.

We'll see what happens on Friday when the Blues play host to RMC at the arena. Game time is 8:00 pm. Meanwhile here's hoping . . .

Ron Harris missed a fine chance by shooting into Mac goalie's pads.

Demos or wage hikes

By TOM GERRY

Robarts library workers and the Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA) will hold a demonstration tomorrow at 12:30 to publicize their demands for a cost of living allowance.

The library workers are demanding a $1,100 cost of living allowance to cover the period from the beginning of their contract in July, 1973 to the end of 1974. They also want a clause in their contract to allow the workers regular wage increases to help them meet the rising cost of living.

The U of T administration has responded to the library workers with the choice of granting them a cost of living allowance and extending the present contract for at least a year, or reopening the entire contract to negotiations. Neither alternative is feasible for the library union because, it maintains, both would jeopardize the possibility of improved conditions for the workers.

Robarts library workers now earn from $5,200 to about $10,000. Their average wage is $7,800.

The GAA has made similar demands this fall for a cost-of-living allowance to the university administration. The administration has responded with an offer of $12 to $30 for the year to the graduate assistants who now earn from $400 to $2,400.

"We think $30 is insulting," said Andy Stanley, a GAA member organizing the demonstration.

"The university never moves at all unless it is pushed," Stanley said. "That is what we are doing."

The demonstration will take place during the library workers' lunch hour tomorrow. The demonstrators will meet at 12:30 in front of Robarts library and from there they will march to the U of T personnel offices at 215 Huron St.

An informational picket line that will not obstruct other workers will carry placards and distribute leaflets. Judy Darcy, president of the Library workers' union, and Michael O'Keefe, president of the GAA, will give speeches.

The library workers will also present their demands in writing to John Parker, the university's manager of management and labor relations.

On Friday the SAC executive decided to send a letter supporting the library workers to the university administration. The library workers welcome similar indications of support from other groups.

"We seek to build this kind of unity with other workers concerned with these issues and this administration," Darcy said, referring to the cooperation of the library workers and the GAA.

At the University of British Columbia earlier this fall, a library workers' threat to strike if they did not receive higher salaries in contract negotiations moved the UBC administration to give in and offer a 55 percent wage increase.

Raise taxes: Galbraith

By ROB PRITCHARD

Prominent economist John Kenneth Galbraith called for increased taxes, wage and price controls, and reduced economic expansion as solutions to inflation at a lecture on campus this weekend.

This proposal was made at a lecture Saturday evening at Convocation Hall to about 500 people. The lecture — entitled Money: Whence It Came, Where It Went — discussed the failures of both governments and individuals in trying to control money.

This is the subject of Galbraith's next book, which is an attempt to use history to explain modern economic problems such as inflation.

Galbraith suggested a threefold solution. First, taxes must be raised, particularly those taxes of the relatively affluent.

Second, "a serious structure of wage and price control" must be implemented.

Third, the expansion of the economy must be less extensive, even if unemployment is the inevitable result, Galbraith said.

Galbraith admitted these solutions would be harsh for those who would become unemployed. But he maintained that "if one thing is certain, it is that people don't like inflation."

Galbraith explained that alternative solutions to inflation proposed by businessmen reek of their personal bias.

A representative of General Motors Limited has blamed inflation on the use of costly pollution control devices, while the president of a major bank claims that interest on savings accounts is too high.

Furthermore, "among liberal economists, fear of unemployment still outrides fear of inflation . . . rhetoric is still well ahead of the action" in solving inflation, the noted economist said.

"All who deal with money in an innovative way come to a bad end," Galbraith warned. As an example, he mentioned John Law, who had issued French currency representing supposed gold in Louisiana. Eventually Law died, impoverished, in Venice.

Today there is no less difficulty in controlling money. Galbraith spoke of "the agony of the politician" who finds that "inflation ensures his extinction."

However, Galbraith warned, the dedication of politicians to fighting inflation is exceeded by their "passionate commitment to policies that caused inflation." Such policies are the lowering of taxes and the creation of jobs by all too rapid economic expansion.

Gays demonstrate to protest Star policy

By GILDA ORAN

Demonstrators gathered in front of the Toronto Star building Friday afternoon to protest against the Star's alleged smear campaign against gays.

About 20 supporters of the Gay Liberation Movement circled for about an hour in front of the Star building at 1 Yonge St. to emphasize their belief in equal rights for gay people.

The Star's final move prompting the gays to demonstrate was the Star's Oct. 19 editorial, which attempted to defend the newspaper's actions in refusing to print gay advertisements or articles.

The Body Politic, the Toronto gay liberation journal, dedicated a special four-page edition to defend their stance against the Star's accusations of gays "prostelytizing" and "advocating the homosexual seduction of children."

A letter of protest to the Star from The Body Politic was returned along with a note from Star's editorial page manager R.R. Duffy outlining reasons for not printing the letter.

According to The Body Politic, these reasons were "classic examples of double talk" to evade the issue.

No great concern was felt among personnel in the Star building as a result of the demonstration.

Star executive editor Borden Spears, as early as Friday morning, felt no concern for the issue; Star editor-in-chief Martin Goodman was conveniently unavailable for comment.

"Nosy" (in their own words) Star workers gathered to watch the protesters and were highly amused by the demonstration. The Star employees admitted their main concern was to get their picture taken by the numerous media hacks, who in fact outnumbered the protesters themselves.

The most noticeable protesters were three-year-old Thera Dawn Joelle (meaning untamed, new beginning, witness to God) and her "parents" Mrs. Diane Oster and Mrs. Cheryl Freeman. Thera's parents were "married" by the church on Oct. 18 of this year.

Oster and Freeman (Thera's mother) said Thera was a planned child; theirs was a planned marriage and each of them has their own specified role as husband and wife.

Concerning the discrimination they have encountered, Freeman and Oster both agreed their main problem was receiving provincial financial support for mother's aid.

To be eligible for funding to continue their education, the two women have had to keep separate addresses and different surnames to avoid public accusations of "acts of perversion."

However, they have encountered adequate support of their relationship. This backing comes not only from their families, but also from Thera's nursery school, which is government-run.

Freeman and Oster have strong feelings for the gay protest. They feel gays should have equal rights and be allowed to adopt children.

They feel gays are just as adequate parents as "straights" — perhaps even more so because of their tolerance — and they maintain their sexual tendencies have no effect on the child's upbringing.

Also among the protesters were numerous Revolutionary Marxist Group (RMG) supporters. Oddly enough the gays had no idea what the RMG was. Yet in the November edition of The Mole, the RMG newspaper, the revolutionaries clearly confirm their defense of the gays' protest.

Red Maggie bolts ranks to join Varg?

The Varsity 1974

The Varsity hopes to make an important announcement this week concerning the acquisition of a valuable staff writer, Ms. Margaret "Red Maggie" Trudeau.

At this time, however, we have no comment on her possible appointment, and we would ask our loyal readers not to perpetually add grist to the rumor mill when any talk of her joining The Varsity staff is just that — rumor.

Such speculation is premature until a contract acceptable to both parties can be properly drawn up.

Ms. Trudeau needs no introduction to our readers. The author of the famous book I Learned to Love, and the forthcoming "Ge, Pierre" (a collection of humorous bedside anecdotes) is soon to turn her penetrating political insight loose in the campus press.

Among investigative topics to be covered are:

- Those scot-free junkies to the Pacific: What's in it for the workers?
- The decline of laissez-faire liberalism: A feminist view.
- The scorching world of ambassadors' wives: A behind-the-scenes look at the scandal that had uptight Ottawa reeling on its feet!
- What's in those brown boxes — and Why Pierre Never shows them to Me!

Last Tango in Wawa with Pierre, uh, leading as usual.

Scottish nationalist fails to liberate Stone of Scone

LONDON, England (UPI) — A Scottish nationalist has failed in an attempt to liberate the Stone of Scone from Westminster Abbey. The sandstone rock, 450 pounds in weight, was placed in the abbey in 1926 as a token of Scottish subjugation to English rule, and according to legend, it groans when a legitimate monarch sits upon it.

The 21-year-old man who was arrested by police after an alarm sounded in Scotland Yard, evidently underestimated the stone's weight. It was found on top of a small folding cart which had collapsed. The stone usually rests under the 700-year-old oak Coronation chair, used in that ceremony for English monarchs.

In the last previous attempt to seize the stone, Scottish nationalists liberated the stone on Christmas Day 1950, and it was not found for three months in Arbroath Abbey, Scotland.

Hart House gives $40 fitness tests to students -- free

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Fitness tests ordinarily cost at least $40, but to get one free just drag your gorgeous body over to room 107 in Hart House and sign up.

After that, it's easy, because the actual test is simple enough. One part of the test involves pedalling a stationary bicycle to measure your physical work capacity, while the other is a caliper measurement of the percentage of your body fat to your body weight.

The bicycle test lasts about 12 minutes, with each three minutes involving a slightly higher work load. It's not very taxing, though. Your heart won't be working much harder than 130-160 beats per minute, which will barely work up a sweat.

But the test works, says Joe Rabel, the staff member in charge of the testing, because there is a direct linear relationship between your heart rate and the work load, no matter how small.

The fat measurement test is done on several parts of the body and only takes a few seconds.

After the various tests are completed, the physical education students doing the testing compute the results and tell you your present level of physical fitness and how it compares with Canadian norms (which, by the way, are abysmally low compared with European norms).

If you're interested in improving your fitness, you can then go to athletic staff members Rabel, Robin Cambell and Andy Higgins to get a suitable exercise program.

"There are many components to fitness, and we're trying to build up to five or six major components that we can measure here," Rabel said.

Because of money and manpower limitations, Rabel said, the current program can only test cardio-vascular efficiency, the recovery of the heart rate after exercise and the percentage of body fat to body weight, Rabel said.

"Eventually, maybe by December, we might be able to add strength tests and flexibility tests," Rabel said, "but cardio-vascular fitness is the most important and the hardest to get back once you lose it."

The fitness testing was begun in Hart House last year to help motivate people to improve their physical fitness.

"People know that general fitness based on cardio-vascular activity is a good thing," Rabel said. "We're trying to appeal to the average person with this program and motivate them to improve their fitness."

The program started with only six testing hours and a small staff, but rapidly grew and more staff and hours had to be added.

"We finally ended up testing about 320 people last year, and from 10 to 15 per cent of them were women, which we were very happy about," Rabel said.

This year an increase in staff and hours means about 36 people can be tested per week. Rabel is hoping more than 1,200 can be tested this academic year.

The testing is done Mondays from 4-5 pm and Tuesdays through Fridays from 4-6 pm.

Alan Levine has his body fat measured by John Morrison of the Clinic staff. Looking on are Louise Uyede, Anne Stacey and Ellen Steinberg.

Louise Uyede of the fitness clinic runs over test results with Ellen Steinberg.

A petition campaign has been started against a move by the OISE administration to prohibit use of the second floor lounge for non-OISE students after 10:30 pm weeknights and 5 pm weekends.

The closing would end one of the few facilities open to students in the area Saturday night and after midnight week nights.

The petition points out OISE students have full use of university facilities on an equal basis with everyone else and U of T students should not be barred from the use of OISE.

The petition was endorsed at a recent meeting of the Students' Administrative Council.

Tenure appeals are finally out of the hands of the president. A new university-wide tenure committee has been set up which will now act as a final appeal body in cases of the denial of tenure.

The lack of any formal mechanism for the review of tenure decisions other than directly to the president was the subject of controversy during the occupation of mathematics department offices in 1973 protesting the denial of tenure to two popular professors.

The chairman of the committee will be management studies professor D. F. Shanno. He will be joined on the committee by political economy professor C. B. MacPherson, chemistry professor Peter Yates, philosophy professor L. W. Sumner and biochemistry professor M. A. Packham.

The committee will hear appeals and can either dismiss the appeal or order a new hearing.

All you frustrated geniuses who have been keeping brilliant ideas like washable newsprint or floating typewriters under your hat are encouraged--nay, exhorted--to come to our weekly 'ideas' session today at 2 p.m. at which the Varg will plot its destiny for the forthcoming week.

Expected to attend the meeting are such famous inventors as the late Thomas Edison, inventor of the lighthouse, the late Fitzwilliam Archimedes, inventor of the meat grinder, and His Holiness Pope Paul III, who hasn't invented anything, but who deserves a second chance. Unfortunately, the man behind the rig-top can have had to decline his invitation, redeemable for cash at 91 St. George, 2nd floor, at 2 pm today only.

The grape boycott is more successful than many people had thought, according to figures released last week by the U.S. department of agriculture which showed $35 million worth of grapes backed up in cold storage in California.

Marshall Ganz, Canadian boycott director made the announcement last week. He pointed out there are twice as many grapes in storage than at the same time last year and higher than in 1969 when the previous grape boycott was won.

In one year the renewed boycott has had more effect on stopping grape sales than the first boycott had after several years, according to Ganz.

The boycott committee in Toronto is continuing in its petition drive to get 100,000 signatures from Dominion shoppers opposed to the sale of non-UPW grapes and lettuce.

Centre provides free legal aid

By BOB ADOUHOAN

Seven-five U of T law students, under the direction of fellow student John Laskin, provide free legal services to students on a voluntary basis through the Campus Legal Assistance Centre.

The centre is run by the Students' Legal Aid Society of U of T's Faculty of Law.

Dick Gathercole, a lawyer who works full-time in the centre along with the students, is counsel to the society. He advises them when necessary and handles the cases which require a lawyer.

Gathercole's involvement in the program has greatly widened the scope of cases which the centre can handle.

Although there are some legal limitations to the types of cases which law students can handle, they are able to help students in a wide variety of cases.

Landlord-tenant cases, family law problems and consumer transactions and contracts are the types of cases which arise most frequently.

Law students can represent clients in court for civil claims cases involving sums of less than $400 and for summary convictions on criminal offences.

Problems common to students arise quite often, and the centre frequently finds itself dealing with immigration cases and academic appeals. The centre expects even more academic appeals cases when the new academic discipline code comes into effect in January, 1975.

The centre is also involved in documentation for student loans. This is often necessary for students who own a car and are seeking a loan. The centre will help a student prepare an affidavit stating why he or she needs the car, so that a loan will not be denied on the basis that the student is not in financial need while being able to afford a car.

Although the centre does not have offices at Scarborough or Erindale Colleges, it does handle cases for students on the two suburban campuses. This past year the centre acted on a significant number of academic appeals for Scarborough students.

A $10,500 grant from SAC helps to finance the operation of the centre. The Students' Law Society, Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, the Faculty of Law, the Ontario Department of Justice, APUS and GSU provide the remainder of the funding through donations.

The law students who staff the centre work there a minimum of six hours a week. The average workload involves two hours of contact time and four hours follow-up per week, as well as occasional court appearances. The students do not receive any academic credit for their work at the centre.

The centre handles about 6,000 clients per year, about half of whom are students. The rest are people from low income areas who have been referred to the centre by another agency or have seen the sign outside the centre's office at 44 St. George St.

The St. George St. Centre shares office space in a university building with the Black Students' Union, Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship, and the Association of Student Councils.

It is open year-round from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. Monday, Wednesday and Thursday, from 10 am to 8 pm. Tuesday and Friday and from 10 am to 2 pm on Saturday.

Free legal aid is available to students at 44 St. George St.

Last Friday's story on the request to SAC grant for a United Farm Workers grant contained two inaccuracies. The $7,000 in grants that was available did not represent all of SAC's funds, but only money available under educational grants. In addition, the grant to the UPW was applied for under exactly the same conditions as last year.

"You have to make a distinction between supporting something and giving money to it."

— SAC president Seymour Kanowitz

discussing his personal support for the United Farm Workers' campaign to boycott scab grapes and lettuce.

Food production system must change

The current world food conference, although not yet over, has so far caused much well-intentioned chestbeating and little significant action. Nor is it likely to.

An attempt is being made to rebuild world grain reserves, which in the last two years have declined drastically. But any action taken is likely only to restore the status quo, and little more, although there is a growing recognition that it is unethical to withhold from land production merely as a price mechanism.

What the conference needs to consider is not just the amount of Western food surplus that can be made available at any one time, but the need to create a more equitable system of world food production.

It is no longer satisfactory for Western society to insist its dietary standard of living needs to be maintained. An enormous wastage of valuable grain takes place simply to feed cattle, in order to satisfy our needless demands for meat.

One basic conclusion must be reached. All the technical ingenuity in the world will be unable to provide the third world with a decent standard of living as long as the productive system of the West is founded on excess and waste.

The West, Canada as one of the three major grain producers (aside from the U.S. and Australia) must take the initiative in radically altering the nature of its system of food production.

Toike editor answers critic

On Wednesday you published a letter about the Toike by someone who supposedly knows what he is talking about. May I make a few things clear?

Firstly, the Toike has only been publishing since 1906, not 1874 and up to about the late 50's it was no more than a technical paper published by the society. There was a little humour back then, but it was all of the in type like the Script now uses, stolen from other major papers. Also the readership of the Toike was limited to the members of the Faculty of Engineering.

I believe years dim the memory of most people because I have read most of the old Toikes in my office. In the sixties there was the emergence of sexual jokes and the like in the paper but it was not until the late sixties and early seventies that the Toike started to create some original humour of any warrant or great calibre.

During the years of editorship by Dave Pike and Ron Jamieson the Toike actually became very good, though its humour at times was exceedingly racist and sexist. Last year the Toike was especially branded racist and burned over a certain article. I believe the last few years of the Toike have been its best.

This year we have been accused of trying to break traditions. We are changing our logo (see next issue in Dec.), we no longer attack SAC for no absolute reason but attacking SAC and we don't try to give Varsity a bad time.

Some people resent this and downtalk the Toike. Fine, that is their right. The thing that bothers me most of all is when people write in to you claiming to be Toikist when in fact they do no more than take a few pictures (never have them ready for our make-ups), eat our food, criticize the running of the paper and generally get in the way. I appreciate the task this person is doing for the Toike, we need photographs once in a while but he is totally unaware of the copy that is going into a paper before, like everyone else, it hits the stands.

The thing that seems to bother this person most of all is not what is going in but what is not going in. This is because he submitted to us, twice, limericks that weren't terribly funny, but were abusive, sexist and blatantly racist.

What do you say? Is that not the kind of humour the Toike prefers? This year, no! My policy as editor on Toike is to get away as much as possible from this kind of humour. Admittedly, it's still there, but to a much lesser extent than ever before. This is because we are limited in what we will print by what is submitted to us.

By the time this is printed our Toike will have already come out. It is the kind of thing I like to do most, write parody. If you have never seen the Watchtower, then you will not understand the Watchtoike. Do not mistake it, it is not a poke at the group who produce it, but the style in which they produce their paper. If you do not agree with our approach or humour, there are two things you can do.

First, you can complain to us. This first one we tend to ignore to a certain extent but if there are enough of you making the orderly complaint we will then act on it. Secondly, you could always submit jokes and humour yourself. Being funded by SAC, we are a campus paper. Believe it or not our policy is to accept humour, satire, parody, jokes from anyone.

You can send it to us (Toike Oike, Engineering Annex, Room 211A) or come around to our next make-up (Nov. 23) which is better because we can take what you have and you can find out if we have a theme that issue or next and write accordingly. As I said, we are only as good as our copy.

Richard H. Pearce, Editor, Toike Oike.

Panty-raids to make comeback?

I am disgusted and somewhat amazed by the refusal of SAC to appropriate any money to the campus activities of the United Farmworkers.

Do the members of the internal committee realize that Farmworker volunteers are paid $5 a week plus room and board for their work? Do they know that grape-pickers in California clear between $30 and $50 a week, which for them often means six days and 54 hours work? Who are they punishing for the use made of last year's funds? The farmworkers. Does it really matter whether that cause is promoted on campus or in California?

If this was only an exception to the general level of support the United Farmworkers are receiving from the University of Toronto community, I would not be writing this letter. With some exceptions, the level of student support at picket lines and demonstrations has been disappointing. Other sectors of the community, notably labour and the churches, have far surpassed student participation and support for this struggle.

Not that students here generally are too occupied with other social-political issues to have time to help the Farmworkers. Few students here seem to be doing anything along those lines these days. Pretty soon I expect the major activities on campus will be forals, car rallies, and panty-raids.

I am glad I will not be here to see it.

Douglas Gallop, Law III.

Workers need wage increase

Library workers at the University of Toronto are now engaged in a very important struggle with the administration. They are demanding that their existing contract (which officially terminates next June) be reopened now to negotiate a cost of living allowance.

Like the managers of any big capitalist institution, the U of T bosses will resist this 'precedent-setting' effort, oblivious to the fact that the rate of inflation (13.1 percent in the last fifteen months covered by the agreement) has more than eaten up the economic gains made by the library workers in their last contract negotiations.

Specifically, the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), local 1230, is seeking an immediate across-the-board increase of $1,100, and a quarterly readjustment of wages for the duration of the contract.

Their struggle is our struggle. It arises in the context of increasing unrest among working people, who are being forced to bear the burden of inflation at work, at the supermarket and in housing.

More than periodic wage readjustments, CUPE and all the Canadian Labour Congress affiliates must fight for automatic escalator clauses in every contract that raise wages with each rise in the cost of living — a sliding scale of wages.

Furthermore, the raises must be determined according to a Consumer Price Index arrived at by the unions, not the government.

Where layoffs are threatened, the demand for shorter hours and wider distribution of the work must be pressed. And, to unify the working class, wage differentials between different groups, levels and sexes must be combated by demanding 'one classification of workers, at the top pay level'. This applies to the library too, where the 410 unionized workers are divided into five technical levels, earning anywhere from $5,771 to $10,953 annually.

The struggle of the library workers, led by the rank-and-file-elected Cost of Living Allowance Committee, and the local executive, deserves broad support. Their initiative points the way for all public sector workers, the need to fight back against the brutal irrationality of this decaying social system, including its educational apparatus.

Students, many of whom will be wage workers in the future, and other campus workers, must join in supporting this struggle as part of the effort to defend the basic interests of working people, to stem the bosses' inflationary offensive that affects so many beyond the ranks of the organized workforce, and to prepare the way for more fundamental social change by generalizing the experience of successful militant forms of struggle.

Barry Weisleder, Revolutionary Marxist Group.

The Banfield affair: the debate continues

Can't defend SDS and free speech opposed principle of private censorship.

He writes: "It is true that free speech should be an absolute, but until it is an absolute, it plays into the hands of the powerful and reactionary to support it uncritically... As long as we live in this society, when matters of power rather than principle underlie such rights as free speech, it is a mistake to defend it as a principle."

What emerges when this swamp of confusion is drained is the theory that since they are doing it, we should do it. This is known as the 'two wrongs make a right' school of thought.

In another passage he writes: "It is faceless and gutless to argue that decisions concerning a person's right to speak cannot be made — they are made every day by those who control the media." He should know.

This may be just sloppy writing on his part but the point is not whether such decisions can be made but whether they should be made. Again he is suggesting that since they are doing it we should do it.

Having accepted the admissibility of private censorship Richardson has opened a can of worms he manages to blithely ignore. We search in vain for any real answer to the crucial question of just who has the right to do the censoring and who is to be censored. We know the SDS can do the censoring — they are "defending human dignity."

He implies the nazis should have been censored. Any greater precision than this is totally lacking.

Equally lacking are any criteria for establishing what can be said and what cannot. He will presumably know it when he sees it.

It is certainly ironic that one so quick to condemn elitism in others should take this quintessentially elitist position. For what advocates of private censorship have not viewed themselves as the only group capable of doing the censoring?

More interesting, the acceptance of private censorship betrays a lack of confidence in human judgment, and an unwillingness to submit opposing viewpoints to that judgment, that is really astonishing in someone who says he believes in "human liberation."

His lack of confidence in (and indeed his sense of superiority to) his fellow humans is clearly shown when he says: "Debate is never resolved along lines of logic, but of emotion, fear, traditions, experiences and passions." Never?

If Richardson really has such a low opinion of his fellow humans he should think twice about liberating them — no telling what the fearful, emotional, passionate bunch might do. At any rate it would be gracious of him to stop slinging the epithet "elitist" around quite so freely.

In fact he does not appear to be in any real hurry to liberate anyone. I note above that his justification for private censorship is that since they are doing it, we should do it.

He is not disposed to be the first one to stop; indeed, he is not disposed to stop at all. His metaphor for someone making racist statements (and presumably any statements of which he disapproves) is that of a theatre goer shouting "fire" in a crowded hall. His article concludes: "Only when the possibility of fire is removed, will the theatre goer be allowed to cry 'fire'. For no one will listen."

Shorn of its obscurity, this means that free speech will only be permissible when unanimity of political opinion is attained and is acceptable to him. (Let us hope he is not holding his breath.)

Naturally should such a grotesquely unlikely event come to pass, 'free speech' would be totally meaningless.

Mr. Richardson has abandoned the principle of free speech because he never really supported it. This is logical for someone who believes that "debate is never resolved along lines of logic..." If it were, the masses would flock to Richardson's position (which he considers the logical one). Since it is not, the truth must be brought to them by any means at hand. Thus the suppression of opposing viewpoints.

It is again ironic that Richardson should take a position in support of private censorship. This is the dog-eat-dog school of political decision, and in entering it he has deftly played into the hands of his "powerful and reactionary" opponents, for were the principle of free speech to be abrogated entirely they would not be the ones to suffer.

Surely it is only sensible tactics for the weaker side (which he clearly sees himself as being on) to cling to every right and principle it can get its hands on. He is choosing to fight on every ground.

As I said earlier, in the SDS affair it is only possible to believe that free speech is not the essential issue if one does not accept the principle of free speech. Mr. Richardson does not, and therefore can support the SDS on the grounds of Edward Banfield's alleged racism.

I do, and therefore thank Banfield, having been invited, had a perfect right to speak whether he is a racist or not.

William V. Edwards, History IV.

SDS strategy reformist, idealist campaign projects a strategy of shouting down racist professors and calling on the administration to fire racist instructors as the way to defeat racial oppression.

Despite SDS's bold pseudo-militancy, this campaign is based on a liberal-academic view that separates the struggle against bourgeois ideology from the class struggle against the capitalists. SDS builds the illusion that bad ideas can be defeated through the promulgation of good ideas, or the silencing of those who speak in favor of these bad ideas.

In the article Qualified Support for SDS only begs the question (Oct. 30, 1974), Gus Richardson states his agreement with not only the defense of SDS, but also with the "Ban Banfield" action itself and the strategic viewpoint behind it. In this he remains consistent with his general political theory expressed the week before in "The Left and Everyday Life", a theory based on a liberal, New Left-romantic ideology.

Richardson argues that "the very inertia of society makes it conservative. Because of this, it is hard to get people to renounce racism, or at least the bias of race." Here racism becomes simply another ideology, totally abstracted from any social base. In fact, racist oppression is indigenous to the capitalist system which thrives on the creation and furthering of divisions within the working class.

For Marxists the necessary fight against racism is dependent upon a successful fight against the oppressive material conditions of capitalism which allow for the growth of these backward, reactionary ideas. Richardson's idealist viewpoint is identical to that of SDS: "Getting people to renounce racism, or at least the bias of race."

While it is important to counter and scientifically refute racist theories, it is dangerously disorienting to locate the focus of struggle against racial oppression in the realm of theory. Racism can only be fought successfully through the class struggle, where demands against racism are not raised as moral exhortations dependent upon the goodwill and honesty of the listener, but are linked to concrete and felt needs of workers who will see that their economic and political interests as a class are intimately bound up with a successful struggle against racial and sexual oppression — against divisions within the class which only weaken it in its fight against the bosses.

Richardson further argues that "Banfield's theories, decked out in all the trappings of pseudo-science, make such a renunciation even more difficult." Perhaps this is true for a non-Marxist, but Marxists have always insisted upon a scientific refutation of bourgeois ideology.

Insofar as academic apologists for racial oppression and the capitalist system attempt to present a pseudo-scientific theory to justify the injustices of capitalism then they must be discredited and silenced by trenchant, scientific criticism.

The distinction must be drawn between reactionary political movements and their agents and the ideologues whose hold on the minds of the working class must be defeated through scientific refutation.

SDS's idealism however even reaches the level of tracing the rise of fascism to the failure of students and others to suppress the theorists of anti-Semitism (and once again their position is consistent with Richardson's liberal methodology): "Remember the results for the German people and the people of the world in allowing and following the Nazi master race theories... We have accumulated enough experience by now to start a counter-offensive against these Nazi theories of Banfield, Shockey, et al." (PL pamphlet, "Racism, Intelligence and the Working Class".)

This is an incorrect equation of anti-Semitism with fascism or racism with fascism. While fascism always makes use of reactionary ideology, it does not necessarily employ racism or anti-Semitism. The fascists under Mussolini in Italy for example, did not rely heavily on these particular weapons, but were extremely nationalistic. A fascist movement in Canada would likely employ racist ideology, but it is not racism that paves the way to fascism.

To equate racism and fascism is to define fascism in liberal terminology and to miss its class character. Without an understanding of fascism, a fight against it is defeated at the outset.

On campus it is not the job of Marxists to convince students that racial oppression will be defeated by disrupting a lecture or calling on an administration to ban a racist professor.

Instead, every manifestation of racism and racist oppression must be fought in such a way that the blame is placed not on "bad ideas" and racist theories as isolated phenomena, but on their role as tools of the capitalist system. The academic and idealist prejudice that history is a struggle of ideas alone rather than the struggle of classes must be fought, not capitulated to.

John Morgan, Spartacist (in Canada)

Defense of the left and working-class movement is a question of principle for Marxists.

A successful attack by bourgeois forces, including university administrations, against any left-wing group or individual can only open the gates for increased repression of the left.

The refusal of SAC to support the defense of SDS members Tony Leah and Bill Schabas is a position of criminal and cowardly abstentionism. Similarly bankrupt is the repeated refusal of SDS to work with other groups in common defense actions in which full freedom of propaganda is guaranteed.

The Spartacist tendency has participated in and initiated actions defending victimized SDS members throughout North America, while at no time subordinating political criticisms of SDS's liberal, anti-racist program. The SDS anti-racist "strategy" is fundamentally both reformist and idealist... SDS's

Canadian Economic Aid to the Thieu Regime

According to reports in the Canadian press, total Canadian grant aid to Saigon during 1974 is estimated at $3.4 million, or about 50 per cent greater than during 1973.

(1) While the aid package is billed by authorities as a "humanitarian" effort, the indisputable function of increased Canadian and other third country aid to the Saigon government at this point in time is to offset recent cuts by the U.S. Congress in war-related assistance to the Thieu regime.

According to a former employee of the U.S. Agency for International Development (AID) in testimony before the U.S. House Foreign Affairs Committee early in June, "humanitarian aid" in South Vietnam has always been highly "military and political in character."

(2) And since the Saigon Government has to this day not devised civilian projects for the use of non-U.S. aid commitments, there is no reason to assume that Canadian "humanitarian" assistance will not be similarly deployed.

In any event, aid to the Saigon government, humanitarian or otherwise, must inevitably be considered within the dominant social and political context of the times.

In the past, when not directly converted to supplementary funds for his military exploits (as has been the experience with the U.S. "Food for Peace" programme), such aid has been the primary means by which Thieu's prisons and "refugee camps" were maintained, and the South Vietnamese population manipulated in a calculated strategy of demographic warfare.

Indeed, this is the continuing and inescapable reality of the war and economic aid to the Saigon government, as even a casual reading of the daily newspapers will clearly indicate.

With encouragement from Washington, for nearly two years Thieu has been able to deny the legitimate claims of the PRG under the terms of the January 1973 Paris agreements. But as the political constraints on U.S. assistance levels continue to mount, the issue of Canadian and other third country aid commitments to Saigon is rapidly assuming a position of central importance to the future of Vietnam.

CANADA AND THE WORLD BANK GROUP
As early as 1970, planners in the Nixon administration began discussing the possibility of generating multinational economic assistance to sustain the puppet government in Saigon. From the outset, the multilateral alternative was conceived as a supplement to the U.S. effort by which American intervention might be effectively protracted in a manner and at a cost more acceptable to domestic sentiment.

But only after the obvious failure of "Vietnamization," the advent of the Paris agreements, and the portent of Congressional cuts in funding early in 1973, did the question of multi-lateral assistance become a critical concern among Washington policy-makers.

In June 1973, AID officials informed Congress that they had begun informal talks with members of the World Bank and the Asian Development Bank on the question of aid to Indochina.

(3) A study mission was sent to South Vietnam, and on October 15-16 a meeting was convened in Paris to consider long-term multilateral assistance to Saigon under World Bank guidance. Delegations were in attendance from the Nordic countries, Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, West Germany, Italy, Japan, New Zealand, Switzerland, the U.K., the U.S., the International Monetary Fund, the Asian Development Bank, and various U.N. agencies.

However, no decision was reached on the issue: the Bank's feasibility reports were not encouraging, further studies were planned, and the participants agreed to reconvene in February 1974.

SECURE LOAN

(4) The U.S. hoped to initiate the multilateral aid effort by securing agreement on an International Development Association loan to Saigon. The IDA is a soft-loan subsidiary of the World Bank in which the U.S., being by far the largest contributor among the Association's 112 members, controls upwards of a quarter of the total voting power.

(5) IDA hopes to solicit $4.5 billion in subscriptions from its members over the next four years. Of the $4.5 billion, the Nixon administration asked Congress late last year to come up with $1.5 billion.

But when the measure came to a vote in January, the House of Representatives balked, forcing cancellation of the scheduled February meeting, and temporarily casting a shadow over the bill in late May, while House conservatives were being lured by Administration allies with attractive amendments and riders having little or nothing to do with IDA.

Then, on July 2, the House also caved in and passed the appropriation.

In a letter to Representative Philip Crane dated June 4, Under-Secretary of the Treasury for Monetary Affairs, Paul Volcker, made it clear that future loan assistance to Saigon through IDA depended on Congressional clearance of the $1.5 billion.

Anticipating eventual success in the House, he expressed every confidence that "an initial annual lending program for Vietnam (through IDA) of perhaps $50 million could be usefully carried out." This, however, would just be a means of getting a foot in the aid door. For Washington's primary objective in this (with strong backing from Japan) is to eventually form a consultative group among prospective bilateral donors in order to transfer immense sums to Saigon under cover of World Bank auspices.

Indeed, it is understood that Bank President Robert McNamara expects at least $450 million out of the U.S. $1.5 billion to be funneled to Saigon.

CANADA IDENTIFIED

(6) At the October 1973 World Bank meeting, Canada and Sweden were identified as two of the principal opponents of the U.S.-instigated Saigon aid proposal. As the country with the fifth largest bloc of votes among the 19 Part 1 members of IDA, Canada's opposition in particular was potentially very significant.

On May 2, Paul Gerin-Lajoie, President of the Canadian International Development Agency, told the Standing Committee on External Affairs that "Canada did not supportment on aid to the Thieu government.

Sweden reportedly led the opposition once again. But Canada, and with less enthusiasm, West Germany, rather unexpectedly supported the U.S. and Japanese position. (Both Britain and France were noncommittal.) A proposal for a consultative group on Laos was also approved and sent off to McNamara along with the recommendation on aid to Saigon.

Moreover, the report indicated that a far greater aid commitment than previously estimated will be required if the Saigon economy is to be saved from ultimate collapse.

The Future of New

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Time was when most of us looked down on New College as quintessentially bland — the kind of place people ended up when they couldn't find anywhere better to go, wandering around helplessly in a building which resembled spaghetti rendered in concrete.

Well, the building hasn't changed, but there are several indications that the college is becoming one of the livelier places on campus.

New College's President Andrew Baines . . .

Things started during the summer, when aging physics professor Don Ivey handed over the principal's desk to Andrew Baines, a 40-year-old medical researcher. Baines, a specialist in kidney function, graduated from U of T in 1959, and has also studied in France.

Baines says he doesn't know why he was asked to do the job, but says he's "always been interested in the things that go into a liberal education," and is attacking his new position with great relish.

He agrees New College has suffered from a "nebulous" image, and points to several stereotyped attitudes of the college. Some people have seen New College strictly as an engineering science college (for all those in the professional disciplines who wanted affiliation with a college but could not be admitted to the traditional colleges).

Others, says Baines, have treated New as a good residence to live in, a place to encounter a mix of disciplines, or a place to specialize in English and French. (New's only present full-time teaching staff are from those two disciplines. Other lecturers are cross-appointed to the college.)

To Create A Community

The biggest problem facing the college, Baines feels, is the need to "create a community," to turn the college into "an intellectual centre for people . . . in essence, a free university."

To this end, he hopes to create a "productive tension" among New College students, while still maintaining a climate of non-competitiveness and informality.

Baines hopes to see more students in the pure humanities enroll in the college. At present, aside from the 900 professional students in the 2,100-member college, most of the arts and science students lean heavily toward social science, science, and pre-professional training.

"We can't set up a model of Oxbridge (Oxford and Cambridge) for mass education," says Baines, "but we would like to pay more attention to the individual student." He would like to set up a program of individual counselling for each student, but realizes resources don't stretch quite that far.

Nevertheless, he is making a concerted effort to attract "more junior fellows" to the college, as well as more cross-appointments.

Baines' only worry is that "the commuting student may get lost." Half of New's students live outside the college, and Baines admits to having problems drawing them into college life. However, he points to success in getting half of the non-resident students to attend a banquet, and the regular "GNU society" meetings.

Next year, New hopes to offer several of the present interdisciplinary courses, such as African literature, Symbolist highly diverse collection of philosophers, historians, anthropologists, biologists, chemists, botanists, doctors, social workers and educators — even the chairman of the Canadian Construction Association.

The Future of Gnu

Baines himself admits some Machiavellian intent in encouraging the Club of Gnu.

The college is anxious for cross-appointments, and has been providing participants with free lunch and free drinks to capture their enthusiasm. Soon, warns Baines, the free lunches will dry up, the hangers-on disposed, and only those with a serious interest in the club remaining, hopefully as cross-appointed professors.

While the numbers may dwindle, however, Baines predicts the intensity will rise.

Bob Logan disagrees with Baines about the success of the Club of Gnu: He sees it snowballing into a nationally known entity. "You're only successful to the extent you get people involved," says Logan. "That's my only criticism of the Club of Rome" (a select group of academics and industrialists, which published the controversial book Limits to Growth).

Logan envisages the Club of Gnu coming out with a collective statement about the future, and distributing it with an information package for discussion in schools, churches, labor unions and homes across the country.

poets and life on other worlds; and is trying to encourage his present staff to develop their interdisciplinary interests, in such areas as the sociology of literature, and humanist economics.

The Club of Gnu and the Role of the Future

One of the most interesting interdisciplinary groups at New College, and presently its interdisciplinary focus, is a loose outfit known as the "Club of Gnu".

The Club of Gnu was the inspiration of physics professor Bob Logan, an effervescent character who for some years has been interested in the topic of alternatives in education, and is presently associated with an interdisciplinary course known as The Poetry of Physics and the Physics of Poetry.

Last summer, Logan approached U of T vice-president Jack Sword (now departed) with an offer to spend some time with radical educator Ivan Illich, at Illich's Centre for Intercultural Documentation in Cuernavaca, Mexico. Sword agreed.

Logan returned (not too impressed with Cuernavaca, but that's another story) struck with the importance of studying the future, of creating what Logan calls an "anticipatory democracy."

"The important thing," says Logan, "is to realize that we're not going to be able to have everything we want anymore, maybe even less. People have got to start making some choices about what they really want in life."

Logan tried to convince people of the worth of setting up a futures study group, and struck a response in the newly appointed Baines, who subsequently made Logan associate program director of New College. (Baines himself is program director.)

Logan's next task was to round up all the people in the university who may be interested in futures study. Was it hard? "No, the links were all there, it was just a question of connecting them in a net," he replies.

Although the group is heavily weighted with academics, Logan stresses it isn't meant to stay that way. "They were just easier to contact, easier to recognize," he insists.

And quite an impressive group it is, with such luminaries as Gregory Baum, Marshall McLuhan, Don Chant and Abe Rotstein catching the eye, but also a

The symposium begins Monday at 4 pm with a session on the Future and Futurology, moderated by Logan, and including as panelists Gregory Baum, Donald Chant, Marshall McLuhan, and University of Hawaii futurologist Jim Dator.

Other sessions will focus on technology and the future, freedom and education in the future, the art of the future, haves and have nots in the future, and the proximity of 1984.

To prove that out-of-work regal-deputies still have life in them, ex-Governor General Roland Michener will address a dinner Wednesday night. (Michener is an associate of the Club of Rome.)

A New Role for Colleges

This week should prove an interesting bellweather for those interested in the University of Toronto's role in the general shift in academic thinking towards a concern for the future and the nature of growth in Western society.

More than that, however, it should be a signpost that U of T's moribund colleges may be on the road to developing both individuality and dynamism, a direction begun last year by the "Colleges Agreement", whereby university teaching resources will be centralized for individual colleges to draw upon.

New College's greatest achievement

. . . and the Club of Gnu's Bob Logan hold the future in their hands.

Symposium and the Future

For the present, however, the nascent Club of Gnu will present its first foray into the public spotlight this week, with a week-long symposium on the Future, to be held at New College.

so far may be said to have been the successful transformation of spaghetti into iconography. Now, however, it may become the leader in a move to revitalize the meaning of a college education at the U of T.

Let's wish it success.

American magazines battle separately for tax concessions

MONTREAL (CUP) — While the federal government is considering cutting tax concessions to the Canadian editions of Time magazine and the Reader's Digest, the two magazines do not appear to be sticking together in their defence.

Present legislation allows Canadian businesses to deduct from their taxes money spent on advertising in Canadian periodicals. Pressure from the American government helped the Canadian government decide to allow Time and the Digest the same tax concessions when their legislation was passed in the 1960s. They are the only two American magazines to have this concession.

In the past when the concessions have been threatened, the two magazines have worked together to face the threat. Even this year E. P. Zimmerman, president of the Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Ltd., was reported to have been lobbying Bud Drury, federal minister of public works, to prevent any changes in tax laws.

At the annual meeting of Reader's Digest Canada in Montreal last week, Zimmerman hinted that he felt Time should face harder measures than the Reader's Digest in Canada.

At a press conference he said there was no comparison between the two magazines in Canada; the two magazines were different, and different action by the government toward them would be appropriate.

Zimmerman outlined several ways in which he felt the company was Canadianized and "serving the Canadian purpose." He mentioned the fact that 32 per cent of the Canadian editions stock was available to the Canadian public through the stock market, although the parent company itself did not sell shares.

The magazine is also working toward a goal of 30 per cent Canadian content with every word in the editions now being edited by Canadians. The magazine also publishes in both official languages.

In reference to his magazine's effort to Canadianize Zimmerman said: "If we had not been responsible, we would not deserve to pass the guillotine."

In spite of all its efforts to Canadianize, the Digest still makes more than $5.5 million in advertising yearly from Canada, and another $25 million from products sold through its Canadian subscribers.

NORTH AFRICA

The main issue at last week's League Summit Conference in Morocco revolved around the Palestinian Arabs' right to self-determination in their own territory.

But, at the same conference, Arab leaders ignored a plea by an African Arab liberation group seeking self-determination in the Spanish Sahara. The conference unanimously approved a resolution that would allow for occupation of the Spanish Sahara by one of its two Arab neighbors.

Spain, which is the colonial ruler of the territory, has agreed to a United Nations referendum proposed by Morehob, one of the colony's independence movements.

But Morocco, Mauritania and Algeria, all members of the Arab League, have denounced the referendum as part of a Spanish plan to regain control.

All three Arab nations have in the past laid claim to their tiny phosphate-rich neighbor.

Morehob asked the Arab conference to support full independence for the Spanish Sahara, and requested that a conciliation committee settle the differences.

But, the Moroccan and Mauritanian heads of state, in a three-day meeting prior to the conference, apparently settled their own differences.

Morocco and Mauritania are now making a public show of unity on the issue. They have joined with the other Arab nations to unanimously approve an Egyptian-sponsored resolution on the issue.

The resolution supported a Moroccan proposal to bring the dispute before the international court of justice in The Hague and called for direct negotiations between Spain on the one hand, and Morocco and Mauritania on the other hand.

CHILE
Santiago — The military junta in Chile has announced two more court martials of civilians in Concepcion. Thirteen members of MIR (Movement of the Revolutionary Left) and six members of MAPU are soon to go on trial.

This brings to 18 the number of 'terror trials' in Chile since March. At least 431 Chileans have been illegally taken to court since last year's violent coup. Apart from a large 'official' number of death sentences, 110 terms of life imprisonment and nearly a 1,000 years of prison terms have been ordered.

Meanwhile, the junta has not slowed down its massive campaign of arrests.

Buenos Aires — Pedro Bustamante, exiled leader of the Chilean campesinos (peasants) said in an interview with the Buenos Aires press that the military junta ruling Chile is returning more than 3,500 latifundios (large farms), which had been taken over by the people during the agrarian reforms of former President Salvador Allende.

An additional 500 latifundios, which were being nationalized when the bloody coup occurred 13 months ago, will also be returned. The area of these farms totals more than 7.5 million acres.

"Hunger and terror continue to reign in the Chilean countryside, Bustamante added. "This is a result of military repression and of the government's liquidation of the gains made under Allende."

He went on to report that rural workers in Chile earn the equivalent of $30 a month, or less than half the wages of urban workers.

This income enables the campesinos to purchase only two pounds of bread and half a pound of sugar a day. The rural unemployment rate has risen 30 per cent.

Lang's mind made up on centre

SASKATOON (CUP) — In spite of pressure from several western women's groups, Justice Minister Otto Lang has refused to reconsider his stand on funding a Saskatoon women's centre.

Lang has blocked a grant to the group from the Secretary of State because the centre offers information on abortions in the United States for women turned down by Canadian hospitals.

Lang reaffirmed his decision at a Liberal party tea in Regina Saturday when he was confronted by women's centre workers from Lethbridge, Edmonton and Regina.

If the centres want funding, "they just shouldn't do anything that could be illegal," he said.

However, he was not sure if the actions of the Saskatoon women's centre were illegal because "it's never been brought up in court."

Lang admitted two weeks ago that he had stopped funding to several groups involved with abortion counselling over this issue.

He also said investigations were made into groups which "might be contravening public policy," but he would not elaborate.

"I've talked to my colleagues in the department of the secretary of state, department of health and welfare, LIP and OYU and they know my feelings on these matters," he said.

Lang is a Roman Catholic with a large family.

At the same tea Saskatchewan Liberal party president Gary Wilson said that Otto Lang was probably unaware of where the information concerning the centres counselling information had come from.

"Mr. Lang probably wouldn't know who does the investigations, he's not in charge of the RCMP," he said.

Marxist attacks male supremacy

By JACKIE GREATBATCH
 Anthropologist Elanor Burke Leacock, visiting U of T last Thursday, spoke on controversial theories concerning women in social evolution. A guest of the SAC women's commission, Leacock spoke to a general audience Thursday night as well as an anthropological colloquium that afternoon.

About 30 people attended the informal evening discussion in which the Marxist anthropologist attempted to clarify the fallacy of male supremacy in "primitive" societies.

Leacock, presently chairperson of the anthropology department at City College of New York, has worked extensively in Canada.

In the early 1950s she lived with the Montagnais-Nescapi, a hunting and gathering society, in Labrador and Quebec. It was from her experiences there that Leacock first began investigating the role of women in early social systems.

"I was so struck by the quality of relationship between the men and women," she said, "that having gone there alone the first summer, I decided the second summer to take my husband back to get a feeling of what has since become a gut experience with me — that it is possible to have relationships in which, in terms of our society, one person isn't dominated by someone else."

SUPERIORITY

Anthropological work, Leacock said, even in supposedly equal societies, describes men as being "somehow" more important than women. One way in which this occurs, she said, is with impressing what is true in our society upon others.

Leacock cited the constant application of the family system upon societies where no such differentiation exists.

In early societies, economic decisions were made within the communal home, and there was no split between household work and economic decisions as there is in our system, Leacock pointed out.

Two societies in which the idea of male domination has led to a total lack of concern for women's role, she said, are the Montagnais-Nescapi and the Iroquois. Both societies are communal and egalitarian in every sense, but anthropological data has led to the common fallacy that the male's work took precedence over the female's.

AUTHORITY

Leacock believes this attitude stems from the assumption that human society is based upon authority and domination. This is an essentially fascist theory, she maintained.

When the Nescapi were first "discovered" by the French in the 1600s, Jesuit priests were sent to "civilize" the natives. At that time the Nescapi society was based on egalitarian and communal existence, but the Jesuits' process of "civilization", Leacock said, was to change the basic nature of their system into one of domination by certain groups over others.

The Jesuits attempted to make the people obey a chief, the women obey the men (and in turn the men to be authoritarian) and the children to obey their parents, she said.

One problem the Jesuits encountered, Leacock said, was the sexual freedom enjoyed by married couples. The priests were perturbed because this meant that a husband could not tell whether his wife's child was also his own.

The men thought that the priests were savages, Leacock said, because they only loved their own children. In communal societies such as the Nescapi and the Iroquois the adults do not strictly differentiate between their own and someone else's children.

SEXUAL

In both societies Leacock described, division of labor was sexual, but all areas were equally essential to their survival. Many anthropologists, she said, tend to portray hunting as the most important activity of the society and thus rationalize that men are the dominant sex.

This theory is a fallacy, Leacock maintained, because the hunting process is not purely male. Women go out after the men to skin and clean the animals and are responsible for control of the food supply, she said.

In Iroquois society the main food supply came from vegetable cultivation, over which women had control. Thus, Leacock said, even the all-male war parties were affected by the women's economic decisions over the distribution of food.

Both the Nescapi and Iroquois had spiritual leaders: Shaman and "keepers of the faith" respectively. Anthropologists generally portray these positions as exclusively male, Leacock said, but, before their social structure was destroyed by colonization, they were not sexually discriminatory roles.

COLONIZATION

Today both these societies have been destroyed by the colonization of Europeans in North America. Documentation by modern anthropologists is distorted in favor of the male supremacist values of our society, Leacock purports.

While there is evidence of the equality enjoyed in these societies, she said, it has all but been ignored by anthropologists.

VIC and SMC fight for Mulock tomorrow at stadium

By DAVE STUART
All you interface football fans should visit the stadium Tuesday at 12:00 pm to see the finals of the Mulock cup as the first place finishers, Vic, take on the tough fathers from SMC.
Vic leads the league in last-minute, long-bomb wins (as well as defaults) but nevertheless should be firm competition for the St. Mikes squad who have never been very far from a win all year. Also SMC did upset the favoured PHE in the semi-finals last week.

If Vic tones down the needless roughing penalties they got against the plumbers and SMC manages to keep their mouths shut to avoid their usual talking penalties, fans will be treated to some fine football.

Vic features a long pass primarily to Ross Hotrum while SMC favours the ground game usually with Klein.

The Vic-SMC game will begin immediately after the second division championship game is over. The New-Scar game gets underway at noon.

New can both pass and run well and will need all the finesse they can muster against the lean (but huge) and hungry barbarians from the east.

This is the first appearance in the final by Scarborough.

Scarborough has probably the biggest team in the second division but only started to use their advantage late in the season to secure a playoff spot.

New, this year, went undefeated again and even managed to defeat their nemesis UC in the semis last week. UC had beaten New two years in a row in the playoffs.

In view of Varsity success in predicting Saturday's winner (the Blues), we have again gotten a computer prediction for Tuesday. SMC will defeat Vic by a touchdown and New will squeak by Scar by two points.

Helpful Varsity ski hints

Prospective skiers should go where they can find the best combinations of value for their money and good service.

For the beginner skiers, complete cross-country or downhill outfits can be had for reasonable prices. Downhill equipment is more innovative and technologically complex and thus more expensive. Cross country skiing is rapidly growing in popularity due, among other reasons to better dispersion of people, no line-ups, and relative cheapness.

CROSS COUNTRY

In cross country, a reasonable package for the beginner, including skis, poles, boots, and bindings can be purchased for as little as fifty dollars.

Boots should have flexible soles and good quality leather that bends comfortably across the top of your foot when you go up on your toes to push off. Fit should be snug to avoid blisters. A snow cuff at the ankle and a high tongue will help keep your feet warm and dry.

Wood skis are still the best in cross country; usually ash, beech, or hickory. A porous hickory base absorbs enough wax to last all day. Edges of hard lignastone material are more durable and facilitate gripping on hills. The Normark make is best because there are so many wood laminations that you can stand on the tip and it won't break.

Fiber-glass skis are stronger but the base is not as porous and wax-absorbant, steel edges are unnecessary, and waxless skis are slow and not generally recommended.

Most skis retailing in Toronto are touring models. These thinner lighter skis are best for higher speeds on trails.

The mouse-trap binding is the simplest and most popular. A good quality make is the Bergen which features lightness, a spring for easy entry, and an ability to fit either boot.

Bamboo poles should suffice for the beginner and should extend from the floor to the shoulder blades.

DOWNHILL

A package for the beginner should be available between $125 and $150.

Safety first. Get a good binding with forward release from the toe, and the correct springs for your weight and ability.

Beginners boots should have good forward flexibility and support in the ankles and across the top of the foot. Skis should be head or nose level and flexible.

The advanced skier looks for a more resilient stiffer ski which requires finer tuning of technique in turns but permits edge play and holding power when the weight is forward or back on the skis. Wood cores with a little fiber-glass is sufficient.

In poles, anything lightweight and fibre-glass is good.

The Varsity ski team is again using Raichle boots and Maxel skis. The boot plastic is thick and allows forward flexibility. The hinge lock permits different settings of forward lean and a unique heel lock in the shape of the heel pocket locks the foot down.

For care of downhill equipment, ask an Olin dealer for the Olin Care and Maintenance pamphlet.

The ski team will be available to answer any questions on Tuesday at Young's in the TD center during the evening.

During Friday's free skating following the Varsity-RMC game at the arena, three pieces of plexi-glass mysteriously disappeared.

The arena is very anxious to get them back as they are quite valuable and of no practical use to anyone else.

Should the missing glass be brought back and left in a conspicuous place in the arena, no questions will be asked. The glass could also be left at the Varsity. (where even fewer questions are asked.)

So come on now you heinous criminal, give the arena back their dirty, chipped pieces of glass, or else Dudley Doright of the Mounties will be called into the case.

VOTING OF PROXIES ON INVESTMENT HOLDINGS

The present policy of the University is not to exercise its proxy vote at shareholders' meetings. The Business Affairs Committee of the Governing Council has appointed a Task Force to examine this policy. In this connection, submissions are invited from members of the University community. Two open meetings will be held at which the written briefs may be discussed: Tuesday, November 19 and Tuesday, November 26 in the Council Chamber, Simcoe Hall at 7:15 p.m.

All written briefs must be delivered to the Secretary, Mr. J. F. Brook, Room 232, Simcoe Hall, by 5 p.m. on the days before the meetings, so that a time-table may be drawn up.

Hockey Blues win 2nd league contest over RMC 7-1 at arena.

By ANNE LLOYD
The Varsity Blues won their second game of the season Friday night, defeating the RMC Redmen 7-1.

The Blues' game plan of "no-goals against" and a "more balanced attack", using three units of five men, resulted in a much better defence than the one which gave up three easy goals against McMaster on Wednesday night.

RMC's only goal came on a tip-in by Les Falloon at 14:04 of the second period. Although it must be difficult to stay alert in a game where you are only called upon to handle 14 shots, Blues' netminder Bob Oss proved equal to the few occasions when he was needed. Only the powerplay goal by Falloon, which came from a goalmouth scramble, spoiled his shutout.

It must be equally difficult for an experienced, talented team like the Blues to get "up" for a game against a team like RMC, who last year had one of the worst defensive records in the league. Indeed, some player must look at a game like this as nothing more than a gilt-edged opportunity to pad their scoring record! But as Tom Watt said after the game, "We haven't been playing well enough to take anything for granted."

And from the way that the Redmen started out, playing sound positional hockey and using three men to forecheck, it looked as if the game might be close, at least in the early going. However, in the later half of the first period the Blues moved into high gear—everything worked. Rookie Howie Hampton notched his first goal of the season, deflecting a Gord Davies' shot from a wide angle left. This gave Varsity a 1-0 edge at 8:09 of the first.

With RMC's Doug Stanley serving two minutes for elbowing at 9:31, the Blues power play went into action. Blues set up well all night, but there were few more beautiful setups than Frank Davis' pass to point man Warren Anderson, who slapped the puck to give the Blues a 2-0 lead.

Varsity then began to check tenaciously led by fine defensive efforts by Rocci Pagnello and Doug Herridge, who cartwheeled Redman Rick McCarthy cleanly to the ice to break an RMC rush.

Veteran Ivan McFarlane came close on several occasions, but it was a classic play by Gord Davies that set-up the 3-0 goal on a slapshot by Bill Fifield.

Sporting a three goal lead going into the second, Varsity can hardly be blamed for letting up considerably. However, Blues were still sufficiently in command to be able to produce two more tallies at 3:35 and 5:21.

The 4-0 marker went to Larry Hopkins, who fired a shot off Amos' skates. The line of Fifield, Davies and Hampton clicked for the 5-0 goal with Davies tipping in the rebound of Fifield's hard shot from the face-off circle.

Blues took a 5-1 lead into the third and added to it at 9:39 with a picture perfect effort by Kent ('I'm just an ordinary Superstar') Ruhnke. Ruhnke showed perfect stick handling and puck control, as well as several fine fakes as he rushed in from his own blueline to cleanly beat Amos from about eight feet out.

Gord Davies finds a convenient seat from which to watch Friday night's game.

The Varsity — Brian Pei

Blues continued to bottle RMC up in their own end and the result was an increasingly rough and chippy game. Whenever RMC threatened, however, the Blues defence was more than equal to the occasion. Charlie Hughes in particular, gave the crowd something to cheer about, as he deftly dumped a hapless Redman trying to bring the puck up the ice with his head down.

Varsity rounded out the scoring at 15:12 when Ron Harris converted a goalmouth pass from Doug Herridge.

Blues managed 72 shots on net and yet were held to seven goals—partially due to their own inept shooting and partially due to brilliant saves by Amos. Amos must be given credit, however, for keeping the score under two figures, as he constantly smothered rebounds in an attempt to give the harried RMC defence a respite.

Varsity showed flashes of their championship form, but generally played and skated only well enough to win. Playing against a weak team, Blues were able to spend most of the game in the RMC end of the rink. Although one Varsity wit said that games like this are most useful for "checking out the stands for chicks," most of the Varsity team concentrated on more sober aspects of the game such as improving their passes and defence. Let us hope they continue to improve against Ottawa on Friday.

Ivan McFarlane was edged out of the play by a sometimes stout RMC defence.

Meds champs at field hockey

By WENDY GRATER

The medicine girls won their second straight field hockey championship over New College Friday morning on the back campus.

The teams were very evenly matched but meds had a slight edge. Both squads played well especially on defence.

Both teams had excellent scoring opportunities but neither team could connect and the game ended in a scoreless tie.

Since this game was for the championship a winner had to be declared. The victor was decided on the basis of penalty corners.

A penalty corner occurs when the defence hits the ball over the end line. By this criterion, Meds were given the win.

Varsity Blues win Yates cup down Ottawa Gee-Gees 24-21

By PAUL CARSON

The tunas are in the Tuna Bowl. A defensive unit that forced eight critical turnovers and an offensive squad that produced the yards in the clutch combined to give the Varsity football Blues a thrilling 24-21 victory over University of Ottawa Gee-Gees before about 5,000 shivering fans at Varsity Stadium Saturday afternoon.

The victory gives Blues the Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate Football Conference eastern division championship and a berth this weekend in Halifax against St. Mary's Huskies, 29-9 victors over Acadia.

Moreover, since Western upset Laurier 19-8 in the O-QIFC western division final and Blues beat Western 28-6 during the regular schedule, Varsity is awarded the Yates Cup as OUAA football champions. It's the 23rd league title for the Blue and White, the first since 1967.

Saskatchewan emerged atop the protest-filled Western Canada race after Alberta lost two games for using an ineligible player, and will travel to London to meet Western in the other semi-final leading to the College Bowl at the CNE on Friday, November 22.

Blues victory, their ninth in a row this season, came from a solid team effort by all 32 players plus some inspired coaching by Ron Murphy and his assistants Dave Coppe, Rick Kollins, Ron Wakelin, John McManus, Wayne Dunkley, and Jim Kellam.

Co-captain Rick Nakatsu led the defensive charge, picking off four passes for the second game in a row and contributing many solid tackles throughout the action. His initial interception set up a five-yard touchdown pass from Dave Langley to another co-captain, flanker Brent Elsey, on the last play of the first quarter.

Nakatsu's other three interceptions all came in the final three minutes as Blues successfully thwarted Gee-Gee's last desperation drives.

Elsey caught three passes for 48 yards and Blues other co-captain, Ken Hussey, also played a strong game at defensive tackle and occasionally at offensive center. Hussey, injured several weeks ago in the season opener, came off the sick list to help Lubomir Alexov stop Ottawa's great back Neil Lumsden on a crucial third-down gamble late in the fourth quarter.

Kicker Don Wright warmed up for his wedding Saturday evening with three field goals, 2 converts and a single with five seconds remaining. Wright's 42-yard boot early in the fourth quarter that hit the crossbar but fell over was the eventual margin of victory.

Earlier he had connected from 20 yards in the opening quarter after Mark Sazio recovered an errant Ottawa lateral, and also produced three points in the third quarter from 30 yards out following a pass interference penalty against the Gee-Gees.

Blues turned three opening-period turnovers into a 10-0 lead but then went to sleep as Lumsden put on a run, punt and kick show during the second fifteen minutes with a 20-yard TD run, the convert, field goals from 49 and 15 yards plus a 37 yard single.

Also, Blues lost Bob Billinghurst, who had started the turnover parade with an interception, due to what looked like a badly twisted ankle.

During the third quarter, the offensive line of Mike Steele, Glenn Rosborough, Don Dawson, Walt Dudar, Mike Sokovnin and Esteban Andryjowicz opened gaping holes for backs Mark Bragagnolo, Liberto Castillo, Bob Hedges and Steve Kwiatkowski.

Dudar made the big play of the period, destroying two Ottawa defenders to open a huge hole for Bragagnolo's 23-yard touchdown run that put Blues ahead to stay 20-14.

Bragagnolo led all runners with 159 yards on 23 carries while Castillo added 26 on his nine attempts.

Ironically, both teams attempted 44 running plays with Ottawa having a 286-207 yardage advantage thanks mainly to three successful halfback options by Bill Harrison.

Harrison totalled 111 yards on only nine carries but was twice stopped for losses late in the game by sloppy ball handling, and Blues did win by only three points.

Blues' defensive line, and especially Geoff Sutherland and Brian Craig kept Colton off-balance most of the afternoon, particularly in the final five minutes when Blues committed three successive turnovers.

Bragagnolo fumbled on the Ottawa 31, but Hussey and Alexov neutralized that miscue by stopping Lumsden on third down. Unfortunately, when Blues next punted the snap sailed over Sokovnin's head and Ottawa got new life.

Sutherland ended this threat by dropping Colton for a ten-yard loss but Blues forgot to rush Lumsden and instead of kicking he was able to run for a Gee-Gee's first down.

Nakatsu finally concluded the exchange of blunders with his second interception.

Once again, Varsity linebackers played solid positional football as John Vernon, Nick Desimini, John Martini plus Iantorno and Gordani quickly adjusted to stop Gee-Gees clever use of backfield motion and option plays.

Since that 1967 undefeated season, Blues have usually managed to beat themselves in key games due to sloppy punt coverage. Saturday, Gee-Gees got virtually nothing on their returns thanks to outstanding openfield tackles by Jim Trimm.

Veterans Doug Ball and Rick Jeysman provided unexpectedly strong pass coverage so that Colton could manage only nine completions from 22 pass attempts for 110 yards. Langley completed 11 of 21 for 138 yards, including two key second half passes to Steve Ince as Blues marched from their own five-yard Castillo grinds out the yards against a stingy Ottawa defence.

Blues finally succumbed to the pressure with those three consecutive turnovers, only to have the was kicked in the leg," he insisted, adding almost as an afterthought that "and then I decided to fall flat and really make it look good."

A ballet danseur couldn't have fallen better.

Gee-Gees got another chance to scream at the referee in the final seconds when he forgot to signal a time out as their captains had requested. However, a hurried conference with the timekeeper resolved the controversy and the game continued with Blues making one final interception and scoring an insurance single point.

When it was all over and the shouting had subsided, coach Murphy made his only mistake of the day.

Amid a crowd of well-wishers, he told a reporter that "it's great to win but I don't think we can claim this game is a classic."

Really, he must have been kidding.

Mark Bragagnolo again leads the rushers with 159 yards aided by a little holding.

linebackers Guido Iantorno and Julio Gordani.

Lumsden gained 102 yards, quarterback Jim Colton had 47 and field Dave Kerr was held to 41 yards and made a key fumble.

Split end Mark Ackley took full advantage of Ottawa's overly cautious pass coverage for five receptions good for 74 yards. Ackley also filled in at defensive back and created the final interception by tipping the ball into Nakatsu's waiting arms.

Al Branchley capably replaced Billinghurst on defense and also flawlessly held the ball for all of Wright's placements. This might seem to be a minor point, but Ottawa missed a sure field goal due to line to gain good field position and eventually take the lead.

Nick Grittani and Colin Lauder helped on Blues' special units as Varsity didn't misplay any Ottawa punts and in fact almost broke two returns for possible touchdowns.

Backup quarterback Steve Kerr was the only Varsity player who didn't get into the game.

As the lead seasawed back and forth from Blues 10-0 opening period advantage to Gee-Gees 14-10 edge at the half, then to 23-14 Varsity, then to only 23-21 as Colton connected on three consecutive passes to Jeff Avery, it appeared that the game would be won and lost in the final three minutes.

defensive unit reverse things on interceptions.

Varsity got a big break with about two minutes remaining when Sokovnin was hit on third down and, much to Ottawa's disappointment, the referee's red flag fluttered in the gloomy air to indicate a roughing the kicker penalty.

Blues naturally went into ecstasy but it was in truth a very debateable call since Sokovnin had taken a few steps out of his normal kicking pocket before being hit.

Recalling the play later in the happy Varsity dressing room, Sokovnin defended the referee. "I

Ten Blues are all-stars

By DAVE STUART

The four teams in the O-QIFC semi finals Saturday took 33 out of 48 positions on this year's dream team of all-stars.

Players were nominated by their own coaches and voting was done by the coaches as well.

Varsity lead the way in the east with 10 players making the team. Andryjowicz, Sokovnin, Rosborough, Bragagnolo, and Castillo all made the offensive unit while Sutherland, Gordani, Martini, Ball, and Nakatsu line up on the defence.

Ottawa placed eight players on the team including Neil Lumsden, of course. Four Carleton players and one from Queen's also were picked.

OUAA rugby is' mixed up

By DAVE STUART

The use of an ineligible player by McMaster in an Oct. 5 game against Guelph has caused a bit of a stir in the OUAA rugby league.

McMaster originally won the game but it was taken away from them when it came to light that an ineligible had been used. The win then goes over to Guelph.

Since Guelph picks up an extra two points as a result of the reversal, they move into a tie with York for the second and last playoff spot.

Guelph not only moves into a tie but moves past the Yoeman into second position on the basis of their defeat of the Yoeman, 1-0 in a game played on Oct. 20.

Spencer & Leckie run again

By MATHILDE VERHULST
Two community organizers are campaigning on a joint ticket for the positions of school board trustee in Ward Six in next month's municipal elections.

Dan Leckie, who won the last election two years ago and has been working full-time as Ward Six trustee, and Bob Spencer who ran in 1972 but lost ("I came in fifth"), are both well acquainted with political organizing and advising.

Spencer is currently executive advisor to the student union at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute (SURPI) and has worked in student politics for some years.

In 1971-1972 he was SAC president and organized students and community members to obtain public access to the then recently opened Roberts Research Library.

Spencer was a founding member of both the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) and Ward Six's Community Organization which is a representative body of several cultural and parents' groups.

Leckie, with two years experience as trustee behind him, has also worked with students. He has taught a course in Alternatives in Education at U of T, recently organized Hardbord Collegiate students in compiling a student rights handbook, and is director of the Commission on Graduate Education.

Both Leckie and Spencer describe the role of trustee as "a community organizer job rather than a leader job".

When asked why he and Leckie have decided to run on a joint ticket, Spencer said they were "trying to steer away from the traditional role—model of the politician" and to focus on the issue rather than on the "ego reason" in the campaign.

PROCESS CAMPAIGN
The campaign up to this point, according to Spencer, has been a "process campaign." This involves "a chatty interview thing," said Spencer, which is "community-based."

Spencer and Leckie have also been "knocking on over 2,000 doors" in the ward to "find out what peoples' issues are."

Spencer and Leckie have about 100 supporters working for them at present. They distribute campaign literature, put up campaign billboards and do door-to-door canvassing.

Although Spencer and Leckie have been officially endorsed by only the Ward Six Community Organization, they think a victory in December looks promising.

So far there are only three candidates running for the two trustee seats on the Board. In 1972 eleven candidates were nominated. Spencer said their campaign strategy "concentrates on initiating people to get action groups going".

WORK GROUPS
Several community action groups or "work groups" have already been set up, Spencer said.

Leckie is at present the chairman of the Group on Multi-Culturalism, a Board of Education work-group set up in 1973 in response to community demands for recognition of cultural groups in Toronto's inner-city neighbourhoods.

Both candidates assisted the Chinese Parents Association at two Ward Six public schools in developing a language and culture program.

Leckie said it took two years of pressure on the provincial government to "get this program initiated and it has still only just begun".

Leckie finds the work-group format important because it is "based directly on the issue."

The traditional way a trustee dealt with community problems in the past, Leckie explained, was to compile a report for the administration, a procedure he described as a "system-smothering of the issue".

In the new work-group format a trustee collaborates with community groups to investigate an issue and by "a consultative process" of contacting parents, students and teachers begins to "allow them the implementation and initiation" of new policies.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOL
Leckie said he has been interested lately in founding a downtown elementary school where the curriculum is based upon the local culture, and where the child will "learn in the same jargon" he has grown up with before reaching school age.

Leckie and Spencer said they recognize the need for community and parental power and involvement in their children's school curriculum.

OISE considers review

A special meeting of OISE's board of governors met yesterday to decide whether an independent review board should be set up to review the institute's refusal to hire Canadian radical sociologist John Seeley.

However, OISE director and board member Robert Jackson refused to reveal the board's decision after the meeting last night saying it would issue a statement this morning.

Mike Fullan, a sociology professor at the institute and one of six OISE faculty members allowed to sit in on and make presentations to yesterday's board meeting, said last night it is possible the board decided to carry out the review itself.

Board members met last night in closed session after hearing the presentations of three OISE sociology department faculty members and three representatives of the institute's faculty association.

Both the OISE sociology department and faculty association have protested Jackson's decision to override faculty and students' unanimous choice to hire Seeley last spring.

The U of T sociology department has also vetoed a staffing selection committee's unanimous decision to hire Seeley, who believes top administrators at both U of T and OISE overturned departmental decisions to hire him because of radical political stands Seeley has taken.

Fullan admitted if the board does decide to conduct the review itself he would question its objectivity since Jackson sits on the board and has made it clear he personally decided not to hire Seeley.

"The board, in effect, would have to override Jackson to get a review," Fullan noted. "Several board members would be reluctant to do it."

Fullan emphasized the sociology department and faculty association had both pressed for an independent, external review panel to investigate justifications for not hiring Seeley.

"We suspect there were other reasons which were never made known to us for not hiring him," Fullan said.

The Director's Personnel Advisory Committee (Depac) recommended to Jackson last May that Seeley not be appointed, but the committee granted the sociology members an appeal on June 26 because of strong objections in the department.

Dieter Misgall, who attended yesterday's board meeting, circulated a report he made on the appeal to board members. Misgall monitored the appeal meeting as a representative of the faculty association grievance committee.

Fullan said the report "points out the procedural irregularities of the appeal and maintains the decision not to hire Seeley was unjustified."

Sociology department members have argued they have never been given legitimate reasons why Seeley was rejected. The department has submitted a brief to Jackson which shows why the four official reasons given for the decision do not hold up.

The four official reasons of the director's advisory committee for Steele's rejection were: lack of evidence of recent productive scholarship; no recent experience in teaching methodology, which he was to teach at the institute; no evidence of successful experience in working with graduate students; and lack of a satisfactory explanation why U of T did not hire him.

U of T sociology department chairman Irving Zeitlin said in a letter to the OISE sociology section that he overturned a staffing hiring committee's unanimous decision to hire Seeley because of "substantial opposition to the appointment on the part of senior faculty."

Seeley, who has over 400 publications to his credit, including Crestwood Heights, which he helped write, has been highly praised by colleagues and academics as an outstanding scholar and sociologist.

Over 200 library workers picketed U of T personnel offices.

Library workers demonstrate

By BOB BETTSON
More than 200 library workers picketed outside U of T personnel offices at 215 Huron St. yesterday demanding a $1,100 cost of living allowance.

They were joined by members of the Graduate Assistants Association after a short march through the rain from the Roberts library. A brief was presented to U of T manager of management-labor relations John Parker by members of the GAA and library workers' local 1230.

The main issue is the re-opening of the contract to provide retroactive cost of living increases to cover the period from July, 1973 to the end of 1974.

Judy Darcy, president of the library workers' CUPE local 1230, said the demonstration was quite successful. She made a brief speech outlining the history of the demands for a cost of living increase.

"Whether we get anything or not depends on unity we can build with other workers on campus," she said. "We are the people who make the university run."

She charged that the University had in fact not agreed to negotiate the retroactive cost of living increase.

A library staff bulletin issued yesterday morning distorted union members statements about the re-opening of other contracts in Toronto, according to Darcy.

There will be further discussions based on the university response to the library workers' brief. "If they don't give in to our demands then we will have to consider where to take it," said Darcy.

She said she personally favors going to the Governing Council since it is apparent Parker doesn't have the decision-making authority to answer the workers' demands.

GAA president Michael O'Keefe said the GAA could learn from the experiences of the library workers and look on its year and a half struggle as just the beginning of the struggle for better wages and working conditions.

O'Keefe said the university obviously did not take the GAA seriously in offering a 30% cost-of-living allowance. The GAA has refused the increase.

In computing the $30 figure the university apparently took only a percentage of the $200 increase given to other university workers based on a comparison of hours worked by teaching assistants and other university support staff.

However the GAA can't bargain for a cost of living allowance because it isn't certified.

The library workers and the GAA both disassociated themselves from a literature table and leaflets handed out by the Revolutionary Marxist group concerning the library workers.

The library workers' brief demands a cost of living escalator clause for the duration of the contract as well as the retroactive allowance.

The brief says skyrocketing inflation necessitates immediate increases to allow library workers to retain the present standard of living.

It points out that while wages have risen 12.7 per cent from the beginning of the contract, the cost of living has increased 15.7 per cent. The brief also points out the consumer price index is even inadequate in showing the extent of price increases.

The brief charges the administration claim that "the pot is dry" is a reflection of priorities which ignore the contribution of campus workers while lining the pockets of administrators and faculty.

Inquiry into Radio Varsity proposed

SAC communications commissioner Michael Sabia will recommend an inquiry into the operations of Radio Varsity to the SAC general council meeting tonight.

Sabia made the move after attending a Radio Varsity meeting yesterday in which senior station staff members expressed serious concern with the present direction of the station.

The charges, said Sabia, "came as a shot in the dark" to him.

"If the charges are correct," Sabia added, "then they're very serious indictments indeed."

Sabia will recommend that a three-person, independent review board should hear all charges concerning the present management and structure of the station and report within two weeks.

The commission, if established, will consider complaints against the present Radio Varsity management and proposals for the establishment of a constitution, a board of directors and clearly defined managerial responsibilities for the station.

The review board report would be for "immediate implementation," Sabia said.

"I want to clear up this situation," Sabia said. "It should not become a major issue."

Sabia said he would like to model a new Radio Varsity structure after The Varsity, which has a board of directors responsible for financial supervision of the paper and a campus relations committee which deals with formal complaints.

Radio Varsity is presently preparing to apply for an FM license, pending technical feasibility reports and a clear commitment from SAC to go ahead with an application.

At yesterday's meeting, station manager Paul Murton was asked to provide demonstration that the situation would improve or consider resignation. Sabia now hopes such a confrontation can be avoided until the commission's report appears.

The present controversy over Radio Varsity was touched off last week after news director Frank Cockram resigned in despair over Radio Varsity's top management, which Cockram called "crisis management," said SAC's attitude toward the station.

Two other station executives have also resigned this fall.

VOTING OF PROXIES ON INVESTMENT HOLDINGS

The present policy of the University is not to exercise its proxy vote at shareholders' meetings. The Business Affairs Committee of the Governing Council has appointed a Task Force to examine this policy. In this connection, submissions are invited from members of the University community. Two open meetings will be held at which the written briefs may be discussed: Tuesday, November 19 and Tuesday, November 26 in the Council Chamber, Simcoe Hall at 7:15 p.m.

All written briefs must be delivered to the Secretary, Mr.
J. F. Brook, Room 232, Simcoe Hall, by 5 p.m. on the days before the meetings, so that a time-table may be drawn up.

Duff says CIA providing opposition to Saigon gov't

By EDWARD LARY
At least some of the growing internal opposition to President Nguyen Van Thieu's Saigon government may be backed by the Central Intelligence Agency, according to Peggy Duff, editor of the British publication Vietnam International.

Speaking to a meeting of about 40 people at the International Student Centre Monday, Duff cited recent charges of political corruption made against the Thieu government by a coalition of 300 Catholic priests in South Vietnam.
"Previously these people have been the most loyal supporters of the various puppet leaders brought to power by the U.S. government," Duff said. "The nature of these current protests and the reasons behind them are interesting and important questions."

Duff, who visited South Vietnam in 1966 and North Vietnam in 1970 and 1972, speculated that the turnaround in position of the Catholic priests might be CIA inspired, the beginnings of a campaign to discredit Thieu and "produce a new president whose hands will look clean to the American government."

Recently, the Democratically-controlled American Congress, through its foreign aid and foreign relations committees, has drastically cut military and economic aid to South Vietnam's faltering economy.

Thieu himself has been accused of using American funds to continue the war, silence his critics and stall negotiations with the Provisional Revolutionary Government (PRG), the other political authority in South Vietnam recognized by the January, 1973 Paris agreement.

In the scenario hinted at by Duff, a new leader, more palatable to the suspicious American Congress would be brought to power through the efforts of the CIA, Pentagon and Washington administration.

Backed by increased U.S. funding, this new leader would continue Thieu's policies designed to delay recognition of the PRG.

However, Duff did not believe that such an attempt would succeed.
"The present economy of South Vietnam is so unstable," she said, "that any new president would have problems just making the country economically viable" in spite of increased American financial support.

Nor did Duff discount the possibility of legitimate opposition to Thieu's government in South Vietnam, citing ongoing protest by Buddhists, the South Vietnamese press and workers.

Injecting a note of Canadian content into her presentation, Duff criticized Canada's recent support of a U.S. proposal for multilateral aid to South Vietnam through the World Bank.

Duff charged that any financial assistance to South Vietnam at the present time would be "tantamount to recognition of the Saigon administration as the only administration in South Vietnam," contrary to the Paris agreement which calls for a negotiated settlement between the Saigon government and the PRG.

Duff's appearance at the International Student Centre was co-sponsored by seven groups including Amex-Canada (Americans Exiled in Canada), the Association of Vietnamese Patriots and the Voice of Women.

Electorate puts dents into Drapeau's political machine

By ART MOSES

MONTREAL — Once considered Canada's most formidable political machine, Montreal mayor Jean Drapeau's Civic Party was humbled Sunday by a coalition of poor people, trade unionists and intellectuals.

The Montreal Citizens Movement (MCM) won 18 seats on the 55-member city council in the Montreal civic elections. Drapeau's party, which won all the seats in 1970, took only 36. A small third party took one.

Meanwhile, Drapeau scored only 55 percent of the vote in the mayoralty race, compared to the more than 90 percent he won in the 1966 and 1970 elections. MCM candidate, Jesuit priest and community worker Jacques Couture, took more than 39 percent of the vote.

Only about 37 percent of eligible voters cast ballots, slightly below average for previous Montreal elections.

But voters who participated made their opinion clear: They've had enough of Drapeau's Politics of Grandeur — massive expenditures on expressways, spectator sports and Man and his World deficits — while Montrealers starve for adequate housing, parkland and public transit.

Voting figures for council races show MCM candidates closely challenging Drapeau supporters in almost every seat the Civic Party won. Drapeau's prospects for the next election look dim, especially with the psychological dent Nov. 10 created in his invincible image.

"We took on a political machine more entrenched than even Richard Daley's in Chicago," MCM's English-speaking spokesman Nick Auf der Maur said in an interview. "Even (Robert) Bourassa and (Pierre) Trudeau are afraid to challenge Drapeau."

Auf der Maur played a giant-killer role in the election, knocking off Drapeau's English-speaking lieutenant John Lynch-Staunton in the Cote-des-Neiges district. Auf der Maur is a CBC producer and writer for the leftist newsmagazine Last Post.

Ironically, Auf der Maur was released from jail days before the 1970 election, when Quebec leftists were rounded up under the War Measures Act. He was never charged. Drapeau used the crisis to link his then-principal opponents, FRAP (Front d'Action Politique) with the FLQ. FRAP was crushed in that election, and many observers credit Drapeau's overwhelming victory to the kidnap hysteria.

This time FRAP's former leader, Paul Cliche, was elected to a council seat from east-central St. Jacques district for the MCM.

The Movement's victorious councillors included three women.

The MCM's breakthrough was based on a development holding great significance for the future of Quebec politics.

The new party scored heaviest in the English-speaking districts and many areas held provincially by the independentist Parti Quebecois.

English voters were not afraid to back a group supported by the PQ and the militant trade unions, while people who are strongly nationalist in Quebec politics worked easily with English Montrealers who tend toward federalism.

The MCM supporters were united by a desire to make Montreal civic government responsive to neighborhood groups. Running on an unabashedly anti-developers platform, the MCM called for an end to widespread demolition of low-cost housing, and massive investment in housing renovation.

They demanded a stop to proliferating expressways, and instead called for a decrease in public transit fares, especially for senior citizens. They also attacked Drapeau's secretive conduct of city business.

The MCM demanded drastic cuts in proposed expenditures for the 1978 Olympic Games, Drapeau's pet project, with money saved redirected toward neighborhood recreation facilities.

Drapeau did not plan to campaign. He thought he could remain aloof and be re-elected with a few media ads.

In fact, tradition in Montreal politics over the past 14 years has been simply to have no city election campaign.

But when the MCM finally found a mayoralty candidate in Couture in early October, its campaign caught fire. Drapeau, mayor since 1960 after serving as mayor from 1954 to 1957, was forced to respond.

Drapeau tried to co-opt his opponents' policies, promising to finance the renovation of 10,000 old houses every year for 10 years. He said the massive Olympic complex would be available for community recreation after the 1976 games.

expressways and highrise development, but few have been replaced.

Available park space in Montreal has actually decreased over the past ten years, and staff supervising neighborhood playgrounds has drastically declined in number.

The high-circulation French daily La Presse hammered away at the massive debt piled up by the Drapeau regime. Montreal spends more on servicing this debt each year than it does on housing or on recreation.

While public services deteriorate, Montrealers are faced with a tough "water and service tax" every year, approximately equivalent to one month's rent. Revenue raised by the tax far exceeds water expenditures and is used to defray other expenses, most notably servicing the debt.

Drapeau claims all Olympics costs will be covered by the sale of coins and lottery tickets, but Montreal will be left holding the tab if he's wrong.

Montreal is still paying off the cost of Expo '67, and covers the annual deficit of Man and His World which still operates on the Expo site.

The press treated the MCM as a credible opposition and constantly depicted the mayoralty contest as a race between Drapeau and Couture. In that respect, the media had a significant effect on the election, enhancing the credibility of the MCM's vigorous door-to-door campaign.

Especially, the English-language Montreal Gazette and the PQ-oriented Le Jour supported Couture, and called for an MCM victory. The English-language Montreal Star supported Drapeau, calling for some opposition.

Le Devoir editor Claude Ryan also endorsed Drapeau's re-election but gave stronger support to MCM council candidates. La Presse didn't take an editorial stand but gave prominence to several articles critical of Drapeau.

Montreal's largest circulation paper, Le Journal de Montreal, gave little coverage to the election but appeared to favor Drapeau. Montreal Matin, formerly owned by the Union Nationale party, slammed Drapeau in the closing days of the campaign in its news coverage, and openly applauded the MCM breakthrough. (The last person to defeat Drapeau, 1957-60 mayor Sarto Fournier, was strongly supported by the Union Nationale. He was trounced by Drapeau in 1960.)

The Civic Party concentrated its campaign on speeches by Drapeau to followers, parts of which were broadcast live as paid advertising. Spot radio ads and large newspaper ads rounded out Drapeau's campaign, except for pictures of Drapeau and his local candidates delivered just before the vote.

"We found his machine was based more on Drapeau's mystique than on any fine vote-getting apparatus," Auf der Maur said.

Another political group played a "sleeper" role in the election. Democracy Montreal, led by former Drapeau councillor Jacques Brisebois, postured as a moderate opposition between Drapeau and the MCM. But he attracted only 10 council candidates and campaigned ineffectively.

But one Democracy Montreal candidate was elected in English-speaking Snowdon district. The group may have succeeded in scaring many English-speaking voters away from the MCM, with a smear campaign labelling the MCM as separatist, communist and anti-semitic.

Brisebois, himself, helped start the "Montreal Party" in the 1970 elections, which intended to attack FRAP from a right-wing stance. With the kidnapping crisis, the Montreal Party's contribution was unnecessary.

Chairman of the Montreal Party was Joseph Zappin, head of the consortium to which the Drapeau administration awarded the lucrative contract for the Olympic Village.

This time round Brisebois, who had been Zappin's vice-chairman, entered the electoral fray under the Democracy Montreal banner. But his group probably hurt the MCM in only a few areas. Its impact in French-speaking areas was minimal.

This year's election was actually only the second under universal suffrage. Before 1970 only property owners could vote.

Drapeau treated the results as a great victory, another mandate for the Civic Party. But he warned the existence of opposition at city hall may be unproductive.

Jubilant MCM supporters vowed they would create the neighborhood councils they promised during the campaign, to provide a grass roots base for MCM councillors and build opposition to Drapeau.

Symposium on future discusses technology

"Technology is good for us" was the general consensus of the panelists at yesterday's debate on the effect of technology on the future.

More than 300 people attended the lively discussion, which was part of the New College Symposium on The Future being held every afternoon this week at the college.

"A quantum jump to less sophistication is needed," said Arthur Porter with a stone age axe held high in his hand. "Create an interim technology."

China needn't strive for expensive and complicated computers, Porter said. They need a labor-intensive technology geared to muscle power.

Other speakers advocated a stabilization of technological, economic and population growth.

William Stadelman of the Club of Rome described his organization to the audience. This well-known international group of 85 informed industrialists, businessmen and scientists is endeavoring to prevent a world-wide technological crisis.

Using huge computer models, the Club of Rome predicts that we can't continue as we are. Short term gains must be abandoned to a world-wide united drive to stabilize our growth. "An imposition of no-growth will not be tolerated," pointed out industrialist Robert Bird. A moulding of public opinion is necessary.

Several generations will have to evolve new socio-economic patterns and technology will solve the problems, Bird said.

"Technology must change," countered Ev Munro, coordinator of environmental systems for the St. Lawrence Cement Co. Technology is only problem-oriented, he said. We need more dialogue to see where we are going.

Caravan comes east

CALGARY (CUP) — The second Native People's Caravan is moving east across the Prairies on its journey to Ottawa.

This caravan, the Native People's Spiritual Caravan, made Calgary its first major stop Nov. 1, 2 and 3 after leaving Vancouver a few days earlier.

With three days of meetings, rallies and fund raising in Calgary, the caravan gathered momentum in its drive to hold a spiritual convention of all North American Native People's in Ottawa.

On Nov. 4 the caravan continued on to Edmonton. From there it visited Saskatoon, Regina and Winnipeg. In each city the caravan holds a rally, a cultural evening and a poor people's feast.

And all along the caravan's route members visit reservations to contact and seek the advice of spiritual leaders and elders.

The caravan will arrive in Ottawa in time for the spiritual convention, scheduled to begin Nov. 23.

The convention will last about a week and will be held in the Native People's Embassy. The embassy was established by the first Native Caravan when they occupied an abandoned mill.

One of the Spiritual Caravan's leaders, Ken Dennis, was a member of that first caravan. The embassy, he told a Calgary meeting, was established so that the native people could deal with Ottawa as one nation to another.

But the spiritual convention, he said, will be a chance for the native peoples from all across North America to get together with their spiritual leaders and elders.

We will listen to our elders, he said, and then decisions will be made on the future of the movement.

Sentenced

Peter Havers, a former U of T student, was sentenced to three months in jail yesterday for mischief arising out of a demonstration in February, 1973 at 215 Huron St.

The demonstration involved members of the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee and a group of U of T workers protesting layoffs. There was a scuffle outside the building between campus and Metro police and demonstrators and a glass door was shattered.

Several demonstrators later charged with assault had their cases dismissed, including Havers. But Havers was convicted of mischief for the breaking of the glass door.

Havers, who is appealing the sentence, has no previous criminal record. A jail sentence is unprecedented for this type of offence.

Judy Haiven, spokesperson for Havers, called the sentence "vicious".

"It shows the U of T is still out to suppress progressive students," Haiven said.

Law union condemns police

The following article was submitted by members of the Law Union of Ontario, an association of progressive lawyers, to the Maloney Enquiry into the Police Complaint Bureau of Metropolitan Toronto. The enquiry was set up following criticisms of the bureau as a 'whitewash' of police activity.

In a conference held in Toronto in late September of this year, attended by more than three hundred lawyers, law students and legal workers, there was much discussion of the extent, severity and nature of the abuse by the Metropolitan Toronto Police of their powers. The problem was one of the major concerns of the Conference from which arises this submission.

It is the opinion of the membership of the Law Union of Ontario that the amount of abuse of power by police in Toronto far exceeds what is believed among the population at large. The kinds of behaviour involved include assault, brutality, torture, harassment, threatening, intimidation, illegal searches, all combined with constant perjury to conceal these actions. The lawyers and student lawyers with court experience present at the Conference indicated that one half of their clients charged with criminal offences stated that they had been mistreated.

Police abuse of citizens and the law is not the isolated or occasional act of a "few bad apples" as suggested by Mayor White as reported in an article in the Toronto Globe and Mail of October 15, 1974. Police assaults in particular occur frequently.

If, as stated by the Metropolitan Board of Police Commissioners, there were fifty complaints of violence registered in the Complaint Bureau in three months of this year, then that would indicate a rate of at least two hundred registered complaints per year. Given the manifest faults of the Complaints Bureau, and given the probability that few citizens go to the trouble of complaining without reason, it can safely be assumed that the number of assaults alone far exceeds two hundred per year. A conservative estimate would be in the region of five hundred to one thousand assaults by police per year.

Obviously, this number of assaults could not be the work of a "few bad apples". Either the police authorities are grossly ignorant of what is occurring in the force for which they are responsible and are therefore incompetent, or they know what is going on and condone it.

ABUSE TOLERATED

The Law Union of Ontario submits that the latter is in fact the case, that police abuse of power is a pervasive pattern that is tolerated and encouraged in the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force. The police are self-protective like any other group. They do not and have not encouraged outside (i.e. public) involvement in their operations.

As best revealed by a key-note speech at the recent conference of Police Chiefs of Canada in Guelph, Ontario, the police view themselves as the "thin blue line," the last bulwark of civilization against the ever-increasing threat of anarchy and chaos posed by the forces of darkness. They feel that the world is composed of two groups: an unsympathetic and unrealistic public which does not know what is necessary for its own good; and a vile criminal element which will stop at nothing to achieve its ends. Members or suspected members of this latter element are not seen as citizens deserving of humane treatment, but as enemies to be beaten down and suppressed at will.

In addition, there are many members of the police force who wrongly feel that the Courts are too lenient, and the legal process overly concerned with abstract notions, so that the administration of a few blows is seen as a healthy supplement to the disciplinary powers of the Courts.

POLICE RIDE ROUGHSHOD

Furthermore there are many members of the police force whose zeal to secure convictions leads them to ride roughshod over the accused and his or her rights during interrogation. In large part this occurs because promotion is often linked to the number of convictions obtained by officers. These sentiments are not only felt among the lower ranks.

citizens' rights or the law, but it will bring this kind of behaviour under more scrutiny.

INADEQUATE REMEDIES

The present scope of remedies available to the citizen who feels abused is inadequate. Civil actions are expensive and time-consuming. They expose the plaintiff to the risk of liability for costs in exchange for the mere possibility of receiving usually only nominal damages.

Private criminal prosecutions face several obstacles, beginning with Justices of the Peace reluctant to take the information, through police officers being the ones responsible for preparing the case, to lackadaisical Crown Counsel and finally to the Judge.

These charges are almost always tried in Provincial Courts. Provincial Court Judges will almost never convict a police officer. Provincial Judge Addison felt sufficiently concerned about the problem following a trial over which he presided in the winter of this year to speak publicly to a newspaper reporter, stating how awkward and difficult he found it to try police officers on whom he relied day after day in convicting others.

The contradiction is particularly acute in relation to the question of the admissibility of statements made by accused persons where force is alleged to have been used during the interrogation.

WINDOW DRESSING

It is reliably reported that very senior officers in the Goldworthy investigation took part in a thirty six hour long interrogation and beating, during which the suspects were held incommunicado in violation of the Bill of Rights and the Criminal Code.

It is the experience of Law Union Members that some sectors of the general public are far more often abused by the police than others. Black and brown skinned people, native people, young people, rape victims, people with long hair, poor people, picketing strikers and demonstrators are major targets.

It is assumed by the Law Union of Ontario that all responsible people condemn this behaviour as being completely contradictory to our democratic ideals and that therefore they support change which would reduce its frequency. The Law Union of Ontario does not believe that its proposals will eliminate the abuse of police power.

The reform of the Complaint Bureau will not of itself produce a police force more respectful of

Then there is the Complaint Bureau. It is not regarded by the Law Union of Ontario as being anything more than window dressing. There cannot be even the appearance of Justice when police investigate police.

Its practice is informal in the extreme, and its procedures practically unknown. Our understanding is that what they feel to be "minor complaints" are summarily discarded without so much as a note in the file of the officer complained of.

Only in cases of charges deemed more serious is any investigation commenced. It usually consists of no more than a cursory interview with, or a request for a report from, the officers involved. Complainants are only occasionally interviewed.

Our experience shows that they often feel belittled and threatened by the interview to the extent that we doubt whether the true purpose of the interview is investigation. Even in serious cases, to our knowledge, no report is included in the officer's file, but merely a notation indicating that a filed complaint exists, to reduce the effect that the complaint might have on the officer's chance for promotion.

The results are reported orally to the complainant so that there is no written record of the outcome. Most complaints are dismissed as unfounded because the police involved, not surprisingly, deny any wrong-doing, and because the officers of the Complaint Bureau exhibit a clear bias in favour of their brother officers.

COMPLAINTS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

The narrow scope of this inquiry precludes a more comprehensive discussion of the causes and consequences of the abuse of police powers.

Accordingly the following recommendations refer solely to the issue of processing complaints relating to police behaviour. These recommendations can have only an ameliorative effect, and by their nature do not touch the roots of the problem of police misbehaviour.

RECOMMENDATION 1

The Law Union of Ontario recommends that an impartial autonomous tribunal be established to investigate and adjudicate citizens' complaints relating to Police behaviour in a speedy and inexpensive manner.

The members of this tribunal should be appointed by the Metropolitan Toronto Council, upon whom the need for representation of minority groups should be impressed. The term 'minority group' should be understood to mean not only ethnic and cultural groups, but also the young and the poor.

The proposed tribunal should have its own full-time staff including investigators and individuals whose responsibility would be to present evidence and examine witnesses, fulfilling a role analogous to counsel to public inquiries. Such staff will of necessity be separate from and independent of the officials and officers who comprise the normal criminal law enforcement agencies.

The procedural powers of this tribunal should be similar to those set out in the Public Enquiries Act.

The tribunal should have full disciplinary powers, extending from a mere reprimand to suspension or dismissal, and should include the power to recommend to the Attorney General that a criminal prosecution be commenced. Albeit beyond the scope of this enquiry, in the event that a criminal prosecution results from the workings of the proposed tribunal, the independent staff of the tribunal would be the appropriate people to assemble and conduct the prosecution.

The proposed tribunal should furnish each complainant with a written report of its determination including a brief statement of its reasons. Also regular reports should be published indicating the number, nature and results of complaints processed.

The question of whether to provide an open or closed forum should be resolved in favour of the particular complainant.

RECOMMENDATION 2

Those who govern this Province are ultimately responsible for the present situation. The entire Metropolitan Board of Police Commissioners is appointed; three of the five by the Provincial Government. Two are required by law to be judges. It is the opinion of the Law Union of Ontario that the demonstrated incompetence or complicity of this Board arises at least partially from its insulation from the democratic process. We therefore recommend that the Metropolitan Board of Police Commissioners be directly elected by the population of Toronto.

Commissioner misrepresented

I was concerned to see Friday that I had been misrepresented in the front page article on the SAC Internal Commission meeting (as well as having my name misspelled!).

I did indeed say at some point in the evening that Angela Davis was a celebrity but certainly not in response to the question you referred to. In fact I do not recall that question being asked as such.

My concern is the implication, contained within that mistake, that I was opposed to the farmworkers approaching us for a grant, which is far from the truth. I was, in fact, one of the few people at the meeting who spoke in favour of hearing the request, which was the point in question, and was also in favour of granting them $500 worth of defrayed expenses to help them organize meetings, etc. . . on this campus to publicize their fight.

The issue has certainly generated enough interest on this campus in my opinion to warrant such a grant so that the whole campus can have a chance to air their views on the boycott. SAC is on record as supporting the boycott, and consequently I would have thought it only fair to help provide the boycott committee which a chance to convince the students on this campus of the need to support their cause.

SAC acts like Family Compact

Seymour Kanowitch and SAC or Bill Davis and the Big Blue Machine—no matter, the latter no longer monopolize hypocrisy and murky conspiracy. Pinned by the interrogation concerning SAC's refusal to grant $500 to the United Farm Workers, humbly yea altruistically, Kanowitch gushed, "It's our role to try to do what our money what the students want."

University of Toronto students of course were so anguished by the Toronto Citizen's plight that it received $1,000 and conceivably mass hysteria will be evoked from students by Angela Davis' speech (apparently worth $1,500).

Nepotism, patronage, skimming, what transpires in the shadowy depths of that innocuous appearing observatory? SAC or the Family Compact, could even a reincarnated William Lyon Mackenzie discriminate between the two?

and secondly, changes statements. He has completely altered my standpoint, with the biggest change being in quoting me as saying 'the taxpayer's children. I said Canadian-citizen-taxpayers, or in other more simple words for relatives of the big Canadian family, Canadian citizens who are taxpayers to Canada. I realize that paying taxes to the United States does not entitle one to Canadian privileges—and rights.

Pharmacist
defends lot in life

I wish to correct some of the slanderous allegations made against Pharmacy students by the Toike Oike last week. Probably the most unfair accusation was that we drink nothing stronger than skim milk (not even homo). Reliable sources confirm that Pharmacy students are just as far down the road to alcoholism as the average Engineer. Of course pharmacists rip off the public, though not so much in prescription prices, as the Toike suggests, but rather for those ineffective over-the-counter drugs advertised on television. But don't forget the Engineer who designed the Gerhard Moog building and sold it to friend Wee Willie (and the taxpayers) without open tender. Alas, the Toike's charges about our sexual inadequacies are correct. It is a fact that seventy percent of Pharmacy students are, unfortunately, incapable of having a hard-on. This is because they are females. The Engineer would do well to remember that it is the pharmacist who sells those little rubber items which prevent him from impregnating every woman he seduces, thus saving him the annoyance of paternity suits which might interrupt his schedule of screwing. It is a pharmacist's obligation to dispense penicillin every time an Engineer gets the clap, even though he would much rather let the poor bastard's nuts shrivel up and fall off. J.R. Ballinger, Pharmacy III.

Metro man says
to good humor

With poison pen in hand, I take up struggle against the recent parcel of putrefaction that was unleashed on the campus last week — none other than the affront to good humour, the Toike. With a quiver in his hand, the Toike editor sought to instill confidence in our hearts by assuring us the Toike would not attack anyone or anything in its attempts to bring 'humor' to the campus. As nearly as I can see it, this humour is only what the editor finds funny, but no one else. It is a shame, as last year the Toike was far superior, and never cried every time it attacked someone. Further, every issue was truly humorous, and stood on its own, without heart-breaking stories of how hard the harassed staff finds writing the Toike.

Perhaps the editor would be wise to realise that his humour is not that good, and should think before axing many other peoples' work. I have had the opportunity to see some good articles sent in to the Toike, only to see them get crushed under the weight of the editor's own mountain of garbage. The present staff have taken a great institution and dashed it to the ground. Keep up the lousy work, guys! (As you no doubt will.) John Horwolk

Erindale says

In your November 6 issue on the subject of increased enrolment, you stated "Only Erindale College has fallen short of its projected enrolment, although by much less than last year." In fact, on December 1st, we will have about 3,000 students, an increase of over 20 percent as compared with our projection of 12.8 percent. Once again we are reminded of the central University's lack of accurate information concerning its campus to the west.

In the same issue you stated that the University of Guelph experienced the largest percentage increase in enrolment in the Ontario Universities System (almost 10 percent). Both Scarborough and Erindale Colleges increased by 20 percent.

R.S. Rawlings, Budget and Planning Officer,
Erindale College.

Our statement on Erindale enrolment is taken directly from a report by the director of admissions to the academic affairs subcommittee on admissions and awards of Oct. 29, which states: "Erindale College has almost met the established enrolment quota for first-year full-time students."

The statistics on Ontario university enrolment were taken from a government press release — ed.

Bucharest in Retrospect: THE WORLD POPULATION CONFERENCE

By CHRIS TAYLOR

The first world political conference dealing with population problems was held August 19-30 in Bucharest, Romania, and attended by delegations from 137 nations.

Canada sent an official delegation of 30 individuals, (second largest at the Conference), and as well 25 representatives of non-government organizations, (NGO's), a few interested individuals and some dozen members of the Canadian media attended.

Our arrival in Bucharest was very smooth. All delegates to the Conference were whisked through the airport and into buses or one of the 600 new cars specially made to transport delegates. In spite of the 90 degree heat, and slight difficulties in room allocation, most of us looked forward to the Conference with anticipation.

Bucharest was the site of three Conferences on population.

The International Youth Population Conference was held one week prior to the opening of the main political Conference and its parallel conference for non-government organizations called the Population Tribune. All told, these Conferences attracted some 5,000 people to Bucharest, 1,500 of whom worked for the media.

Communication amongst participants at the Conference was facilitated through the publication of a daily newspaper, called the Planet, which was subsidized by the International Planned Parenthood Federation.

In its first issue was summarized the results of the International Youth Conference, which set the stage for some of the key ideological debates at both the government and non-government meetings.

The initial confrontations at Bucharest were based on the extreme Marxian and Malthusian positions, which had been slightly altered to suit the locality.

Put quite simply, the former argues that only in changing the social and political system, will effective changes in individual behaviour occur. The latter argues that geometric growth in population will overwhelm arithmetic growth in food production, unless numbers of people are limited to a sustainable size.

At Bucharest, these groups were called the socio-economic group and the family planning groups. A third group of developed and developing country environmentalists attempted to provide a new framework for examining the population issue.

Prior to the Bucharest Conference, a World Plan of Action had been drafted and circulated to member states.

This plan was the end result of a series of consultations, regional seminars, and inter-governmental meetings held throughout the world. It was believed to contain the foundation for a necessary consensus which could be reached at Bucharest.

THE INTERNATIONAL YOUTH CONFERENCE

Within the first few days, it became clear that no easy consensus was going to be reached. The report of the International Youth Conference was published and circulated, and it contained the rhetoric of the new left. In the analysis of fundamental problems, the report stated:

The contemporary world is characterized by the conditions of abject poverty, malnutrition, widespread disease, massive unemployment and shameful inequality and injustice . . .

The primary causes of these conditions are the exploitative and repressive social, economic, and political structures, often the legacy of prolonged colonial oppression, rather than over-population . . .

It is essential, first of all, to carry out far-reaching socio-economic changes, to liquidate the aftereffects of colonialism and neo-colonialism, to combat the continuing and increasing dependence of developing countries on developed industrialized countries, to accelerate industrial and rural development and to promote social progress.

Since this statement came from 200 young people, representing more than 100 countries, in every region of the world, it was taken at face value, until rumours started to circulate on irregularities in the Conference itself.

Allegations from members of Western countries about lack of use of credentials in voting, stacked committees, (many Romanians were participating), and a large number of delegates over the age of 40, from socialist countries, (delegates were to be below age 30) led many to ask how representative the report was, of the consensus of world youth. According to one observer at the Conference:

The spectre of overpopulation and famine have always haunted the poor, but today . . .

The International Youth Population Conference most certainly did not represent the views of 'youth' in population; it represented the opinions of about 200 generally unrepresentative, often self-selected, and sometimes even middle-aged delegates from various 'youth' organizations.

Although the above was quite obvious, what was not clear, was the allegation of the Youth Conference that if they had supported a strong family planning position, little of the above criticism would have occurred.

There was probably some truth in this, but as a concerned youth, I could have little faith in the report of a Conference which was not properly sanctioned, and/or authorized.

THE CANADIAN POSITION

From the beginning, it was clear that the Canadian governmental delegation did not want to take a strong position, other than support in principle of the draft World Plan of Action.

The delegation was headed by Jeanne Sauve, (Minister of the Environment), who told NGO's and reporters that we were here to "Listen and learn".

Nevertheless, Canada stressed from the beginning the importance of the environmental issue. In her opening speech, Madam Sauve stated:

Canada recognizes that there are limits: to the rate at which the earth's reserves can be exploited; to the capacity of the biosphere to absorb pollution; and to global capacity to support human life.

We recognize the need for a greater sense of responsibility to conserve global resources.

While many Canadians felt our country's statement was weak, and said very little, its importance to the international community can be illustrated by the fact that it was one of the few speeches to be given front page headlines in the Planet.

Canadian NGO's attempted to pressure the governmental delegation to take a more active role at the Conference, but their position was somewhat weakened, since they had no collective stance on issues themselves.

The NGO's were unable to meet before leaving Canada and decided at Bucharest that their opinions were too diverse to seek consensus on issues. This meant that they had to apply pressure as individuals, or in small groups, which weakened their potential lobby force.

One of the major criticisms of the Canadian delegation was of its composition. All but three of its representatives were civil servants, and Madam Sauve was replaced when she left after a few days to continue her vacation, by Mr. G. Hardy, from External Affairs.

Concern was expressed among Canadian NGO's that decisions on matters of national and international population policy should be made by politicians, who are accountable to the public.

The response of federal observers to these charges were:

- (i). No major decision in commitments were going to be made at Bucharest by Canada;
- (ii). Politicians, generally, had shown no major interest in the Conference;
- (iii). Canada was there to be educated; i.e., we had more to learn, than to give;
- (iv). The same charges could be made of the NGO observers; that is, it was clear that they were not accountable to the public and there was some doubt as to whether they were accountable to their organizations.

Canada sent representatives to all three working committees, (family, environment, and development), and the Plan of Action committee.

The environment delegation specifically intervened to have inserted, in the Plan of Action, a paragraph which emphasized the need for developed countries to reduce their consumption in order to lower their environmental impact. (This had been removed from an earlier draft at the insistence of the United States, and some developing countries.)

The delegation also took specific interest in the Family Committee in strengthening the section on the status of women.

THE WORLD PLAN OF ACTION

The draft World Plan of Action was deliberated in the fourth and final committee of the Conference.

Argentina rocked the committee by immediately submitting 68 amendments to the 93 paragraph plan, on the grounds that population had been treated in a peculiar and singular manner, and taken out of context of development, social justice, and the distribution of wealth.

China, whom some accused of discounting what it practices, argued that population growth was not a problem for the world, and explained that China's policy was birth planning, not birth control.

The working group spent nearly 20 hours debating the first 12 paragraphs of the draft. The first sentence of the introductory paragraph reflects the tone of the socio-economic amendments:

1. The promotion of development and the quality of life require coordination of action in all major socio-economic fields, including population, which is the inexhaustible force of creativity and a determining factor of progress . . .

The explicit aim of the World Population Plan of Action is to help coordinate population trends and the trends of economic and social development. The basis for an effective solution of population problems, is, above all, socio-economic transformation.

The greatest setback to the family planning movement occurred, when by a vote of 52 to 42, the Working Group rejected a proposal to make Family Planning information and services available to all by 1985.

Yugoslavia, Mexico, and the United States made public protests at the decision.

After the vote, Julia Henderson, Secretary-General of the International Planned Parenthood Federation, expressed dismay that the decision removed all sense of urgency from the provision of family planning services. "It virtually amounts to no plan, no action," she said.

The Argentine amendment accepted by the group included a short clause to provide education in responsible parenthood and family planning advice and services to those that want them.

On the last day of discussion, in the Working Group, the family planning

... the threat of starvation has reached global, piecemeal, response.

supporters managed to win two important votes which asked developing countries to produce targets and policies to reduce birth rates to an average of 30 per thousand by 1985.

The votes defeated last-minute moves by Algeria and China to eliminate the target date of 1985, and the UN projection of fertility decline.

The Plan of Action committee met for six days, day-in and day-out. The end product was a watered-down document, which replaced concerns with the need to reduce rates of population growth, with concerns of socio-economic development.

As one of the third world delegates remarked: "In the end, perhaps the only identifiable thing which all delegates seemed to agree on was that they understood the other points of view rather better."

THE POPULATION TRIBUNE

During the two weeks of the government Conference meeting, NGO's met for their own conference, called the Population Tribune. The Tribune consisted of three concurrent sessions, twice a day, in the Romanian Law Academy.

Conditions were far from ideal, as daytime temperatures were in the upper 90's, and the building had no air-conditioning and poor ventilation. Nevertheless, NGO's managed to take an active role in these seminars and lined the outer halls with books and brochures about their organizations.

The Tribune began with the basic family planning and socio-economic development split, which was illustrated in the first day by an attack on Lester Brown, a U.S. researcher for the Overseas Development Council, well-known for his support of an international food bank and the necessity for world population stabilization.

The prospects for the Tribune producing anything different than the Government Conference were not very bright during the first week.

However, a small working group was formulated, headed by Margaret Mead, which decided that a statement needed to be prepared and circulated after the Conference to guide the formulation and implementation of population policies.

This statement was signed by over 400 participants at the Tribune and represents the best overall statement to come out of Bucharest.

STATEMENT FROM BUCHAREST

1. The world situation is potentially disastrous. Hundreds of millions are suffering from hunger, poverty, persecution, disease and illiteracy.

The unprecedented rate of population growth, doubling population from 4 to 6 billion in a generation, will strain the environment and man's social, political and economic institutions to breaking point. Action to meet this challenge is imperative.

2. The basis for tackling these problems must be in terms of biological systems and environmental imperatives, justice, equality and the recognition of the dignity of the individual.

Radical changes in the world's social, political and economic structure, long overdue on moral grounds, have now become imperative on ecological grounds.

3. In the distribution and consumption of the world's resources, the needs of all social and ethnic groups must be considered, and we reject as destructive all policies that are purely nationalistic.

4. All countries should practice rigorous conservation measures to prevent pollution and waste of both non-renewable and renewable resources, especially food.

Among other things, there must be curtailment in the consumption of luxury and expendable items and a greater emphasis on life styles which stress social rather than material values.

5. Population policies should aim to enhance the quality of life of all people.

Population problems cannot be solved in isolation from social and economic development. On the other hand, economic development cannot be relied upon by itself to prevent those population problems.

6. Governments must respect the basic rights of all individuals to have access to information and means of determining the number and spacing of their children.

7. We call upon the highly industrialized nations, and other nations that have the capacity, to work with developing countries towards terms of international trade that are just and realistic, and to give suitable aid without strings attached.

8. The success of population policies depends on the full participation of women.

The economic contribution of women as mothers and providers of food both in rural and urban areas should be fully recognized.

9. Every child born should be assured the conditions within which its full potentialities can be realized.

Agricultural and health resources must be developed to assure adequate pre- and postnatal health for all children.

10. The non-productive commitment of wealth, knowledge, and skill to large military programmes is an offence against humanity and an obstinate barrier to meeting the human needs set forth in the World Population Plan of Action.

We call on citizens to work in their respective countries for a reallocation of public funds from the means of destruction to the support of life.

SOME CONCLUDING NOTES

The Conference illustrated the difficulty that the United Nations will have in solving population problems on an international basis.

Statistics released by the UN showed that 32 percent of the countries in the world representing 57 percent of the world's population, have policies to reduce the fertility rate; 21 percent of the countries representing 7 percent of the population have policies to increase fertility; and the remaining 47 percent of the countries do not have policies to raise or lower fertility.

The last group, (represented by countries like the United States, the USSR, and Canada), was the decisive factor in deciding which way the voting would go.

There was an unwritten taboo to not say anything derogatory about the pro-natalist policies of some socialist countries.

At one seminar, a Mexican speaker attacked Romania for making contraception illegal. At this point in his speech there was a strange hush among the audience, as we noticed that the interpreters had stopped!

Although concerns about resources and environment were expressed by some nations, especially Canada, the Conference was unwilling to discuss any specific commitments that needed to be made.

Some suggested that consumption targets for 1985 should be established to illustrate the importance of this factor in the population impact of developed countries.

Canadians, if they are to provide global resource equity, face a number of difficult decisions which were not discussed prior to, or at, Bucharest. These involve:

- (i) A goal of population stabilization in Canada, by voluntary means, with an equitable immigration policy;
- (ii) A reduction in the rate of increase of consumption of food, energy, and raw materials;
- (iii) A two-price system for the export of the above resources, including a low, or no price for the developing nations;
- (iv) An increase in foreign aid to support the development of self-sufficiency in the Third World.

These issues and many others should form the basis of a large public debate to be fostered next year by the federal government on the Canadian Immigration and Population Study.

Until Canada, and the developed world, create population-consumption policies which aim at global resource equity, we have no right to expect any better responses from the remainder of humanity.

Public urged to think ahead

By SUSAN SLOTTOW

"If you're not concerned with the future now, don't complain if the future doesn't turn out as you want it to," James Dator, professor of political economics at the University of Hawaii, cautioned at the opening session of the Symposium on the Future, Monday.

Over 100 people were present at the session, sponsored by New College, to hear a panel including Marshall McLuhan, professor at U of T's Centre for Culture and Technology, religious studies professor Gregory Baum, and physics professor Bob Logan, moderator and Symposium organizer.

McLuhan suggested that if you look in the rear view mirror, you will see what is coming — the foreseeable future.

"You cannot imagine anything in the future that has not already happened," McLuhan maintained. "Everyone got a 100-year bonus added to their lives when information began to move at the speed of light."

A child of three today is older than Methuselah, in terms of the amount of knowledge he has, McLuhan said. "There is more knowledge in the world today than Methuselah ever dreamed of," he added.

To study the future, we must start with "input" and study all the effects of any possible plan of action, before looking at the causes," McLuhan said.

"A very great artist is always making a detailed history of the future. He alone is able to live in the present. Only naive conceptualists live in the future," McLuhan said.

Baum was especially concerned with language and the "effect which predictions have on society."

"Prediction is the variable that enters into what kind of society we choose to make," Baum said. "Predicting the future is a way of influencing what will happen."

Baum felt the government green paper on immigration, for example, would help create conditions of racial strife. The report suggested a restricted immigration policy.

Both Christianity and Judaism have a "profound Messianic imagination in their language. Good things are to come," Baum said.

This creates a "vector in human life and history which makes people impatient with dehumanizing and oppressive conditions," Baum said.

O folly! What is love! and where is it?
And for that poor Ambition — it springs
From a man's little heart's short fever-fit;
For Poesy! — no — she has not a joy —
At least for me — so sweet as drowsy noons,
And evenings steeped in honeyed indolence,
O, for an age so sheltered from annoy,
That I may never know how change the moons,
Or hear the voice of busy common sense!

Sun shines on Sunshine

By MICHAEL HIGGINS

Last Thursday was not your average day at City Hall.

The scheduled event was the dedication of a new Metro Toronto flag by incumbent Mayor David Crombie, and the occasion summoned hundreds of city school children as a captive audience.

What the children weren't prepared for was the four-member Puck-Rent-A-Fool clown company, which decided it was the perfect day to register one of their own, Rosie Sunshine, for next month's mayoral election.

Not wanting to be ostentatious, the Fools arrived in a large egg, rolled by numerous supporters, and were dressed in their 'Sunday Clown best'.

The children, who had been brought by their respective schools, had previously been milling around the empty platform where the mayor was scheduled to appear; but upon seeing the political aspirants, quickly launched into their impression of a stampede.

The children were given placards (including one saying 'votate!'), and were in the midst of a spirited competition aimed at being discovered on the evening news.

In response to questioning from various representatives of Toronto's mass media, Rosie Sunshine promised forthcoming solutions to such complicated and diverse problems as the Spadina Expressway, inflation and the Island.

Satisfied they had injected a little levity into the day's activities, Rosie and her immediate entourage entered City Hall to perform the official registration ceremony — causing the building's aging security officers to fear for its safety.

The Mayor introduced the flag's designer (a George Brown College student), whose entry was deemed most fitting to represent the city.

Meanwhile, Rosie Sunshine is scheduled to conduct a campaign geared at creating youthful interest in the upcoming campaign, and will appear in schools throughout the Metro area.

She favors lowering the voting age to nine, a proposal which just might "let an expert fool around at City Hall."

Scarboro considers work-study course

A proposal for a cooperative program in public administration featuring alternating study and work terms was defeated and then apparently revived Monday at a meeting of the faculty-dominated Scarborough College Council.

The proposal, originated by Scarborough College principal Ralph Campbell and supported by Scarborough students' council president John O'Donohue, projected an enrolment of 100 students in a trimester system of study and work terms leading to a separate bachelor of administration degree.

With unusually large attendance from faculty members on the 250-person council, the proposal was initially defeated 20-12 after two hours of debate punctuated by well-rehearsed spontaneous witticisms, studied insults, and numerous procedural wrangles.

With unusually large attendance from faculty members on the 25-person council, the proposal was initially defeated 20-12 after two hours of debate punctuated by well-rehearsed spontaneous witticisms, studied insults, and numerous procedural wrangles.

However, immediately after the vote, the proposal was revived with a motion calling upon the college's academic affairs committee to prepare proposals for a "program in administration featuring the work-study element."

The motion was introduced by humanities chairman Peter Richardson who said he supported most of the original proposal but could not accept the plans for a separate degree.

During the debate on Campbell's proposal, O'Donohue defended the program as "academically sound, since all the courses are drawn from the present college calendar and have been approved by the college and the Governing Council."

The program would make better use of college facilities and enable the students to have a guaranteed job during their years at university, O'Donohue added.

History professor John Moir led the attack on the proposal, claiming that Scarborough is suffering from "financial malnutrition" and cannot afford to "branch out into new fields, however desirable."

"We are a teaching institution, and education, not job training, should be our first interest," he added.

Campbell estimated the program would generate about $200,000 in extra income for the college over a four-year period. He pointed out that the fully integrated work-study feature "would be a first for the University of Toronto, although it has operated very successfully elsewhere."

As the debate ground onward, O'Donohue eventually managed to win a procedural motion calling for the question to be put.

However, almost 30 minutes of procedural confusion followed as some faculty tried to make amendments before the vote and others expressed concern about the fate of the remaining items on the meeting's lengthy agenda.

In addition to O'Donohue, three other Scarborough students spoke in favor of the proposed program in administration. They were often heckled by Moir and other faculty members.

On Thursday Nov. 14, at 5:30 p.m. the intramural cross-urban championship will be run. The race will start at the north-east corner of the back campus. Colleges and faculties are not limited to one team of seven runners, a number of teams may be entered. The first five finishers on every team count for team score, therefore the minimum number of runners per team is five. Captains are asked to have a list of their team before the start of the race. If it is done the race can get underway quickly.

Blues first in cross country

By HARRY ERR
The Blues' cross country team ran away with top honours at the CIAU cross country championships held at Guelph on Saturday.
Competing in a field of 35 runners, the best runners from each of the five conferences across the country, Varsity's John Sharp raced to the gold medal for the second year in a row.

The 10,000 meter course had rough rolling hills, water hazards, winding forest trails, and steep, long inclines to test the harriers.
Besides the five Blues' runners, Neil Hendry from York and Greg Lockhart from Ryerson joined the favoured Ontario Team.

With Hendry and Lockhart setting a fast early pace, Toronto's Sax, Morley, and Sharp moved away from field along with New Brunswick's Peter Richardson and BC's Chris White.
By half-way Sharp had the lead at 15:21 with the other leaders right on his tail.

With 3,000 meters to go, Sharp had increased his lead by a substantial margin. As he finished in 30:44 he had pulled away from Richardson who finished with a 31:08 and Joe Sax whose time was 31:19.

Henry came fourth at 31:26 ahead of Morley at 31:32 and White at 31:38. The five-man Toronto team was completed with freshman Steve Findlay who ran impressively for ninth place. Toronto's Mike Dyon finished twelfth.

The conference title went to the OUA team and the team title went to Varsity.

This was the final race for the cross country team in what has to be the finest team success stories for some time. Readers will recall the Blues placed first in the U.S.

The runners will finish the season this weekend at Brock in the Canadian Open men's and Women's cross country championships.

UBC is CIAU soccer champs

By JOHN COBBY & DON McMAHON

MONTREAL—Last weekend five teams from across the country competed in Montreal for the CIAU national soccer title.

In the final, before about 1,000 fans, The University of British Columbia eked out a 2-1 victory over the defending champions, Loyola.

Although the Montreal squad held an overall territorial advantage, the UBC defence was only beaten in the second half as tiredness took its toll. Sosnowski was the lone Loyola scorer.

Unfortunately, the winning goal resulted from a miskick by the Loyola goalkeeper, who slipped while taking a free kick, only to see the ball travel 30 yards to Budd, an unmarked U.B.C. forward.

Despite the efforts of the Loyola defenders to recover their ground, Budd advanced quickly and hit a lobbed shot over the scrambling goalkeeper.

The first goal of the game was scored by Webster to give the westerners a 1-0 half-time lead.

In the playoff for third place, Dalhousie University made waves for the Maritimes, wrestling a victory by the narrowest of margins from the University of Manitoba.

With the score deadlocked at 0-0 after overtime, the Tigers converted all five of their shots from the penalty spot as against only three for the losers.

The Ontario representative, McMaster University, finished in last place, losing both of its games in convincing fashion.

New, Vic share Mulock victory

By MRS. PARKER

The intercollegiate football season gasped to a close in the rain and muck of Varsity stadium yesterday afternoon.

Emerging from the quagmire as victors were New College for the second division championship, and Victoria College as owners of the Mulock hardware for yet another year.

New defeated a game squad from Scarborough College 21-15, while Vic dominated St. Michael's College 15-0.

In the opening contest, New's outside running proved to be Scarborough's downfall. New repeatedly swept outside from scrimmage for major gains.

New was also able to get outside on kick returns. Laurie Colman ran one kick back 80 yards for a touchdown; but alas, it was called back for a clipping infraction.

New led at the half 14-13 on touchdowns by Mike Tirney and Orest Melynyk. Gord Saikely converted both TD's.

In the second half, New's quarterback Lucas was caught in the endzone for a safety touch.

New then took the ball from their own 25, down the field for a touchdown by Melynyk, his second for the game. Saikely added the convert, icing the game for New.

This is New College's first taste of bubbly from the revered cup.

In the main event (played on what was left of the field) Vic downed SMC 15-0.

Neither team was able to mount much offense in the slippery going and, as a result, the game was 0-0 at half time.

Vic started the second half poorly by coming out late and were forced to kick off from their own 35.

Undeterred, Vic got the ball back from SMC early in the third quarter, and marched to the St. Mikes 30. A Charteris field goal from there went wide but counted for a single point.

The one point lead held up until the fourth quarter when Viinamäe ran in a major, converted by Ross Holtrum.

With 40 seconds remaining and Vic punting SMC saw one last chance to get on the scoreboard. However, in the scramble for Vic's punt, a SMC player kicked the ball out of bounds at his own 12-yard line.

According to the rule book, Vic got the ball with a first down at that point. On second down, Landeryou crashed into the endzone for the final tally. Holtrum converted.

The final score was 15-0 and entitles Vic to engrave their name in the Mulock history for the umpteenth time.

St. Mikes, bridesmaids again, had their chances but were unable to capitalize.

The Varsity — Steve Mayras

New found the inside tough going so stayed mainly outside where Scar couldn't stop them.

Review of soccer Blues

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues, with their poorest season for many years, finished four points adrift of the OUAAs champions, the McMaster Marauders, in the western division, despite beating them on both occasions they met.

However, some mediocre team performances in the middle of the schedule negated the benefits of a fast start, so that the Toronto squad finished level on points with three other clubs in the very evenly matched league.

While the loss through injury of Yannis Vassiliou, the club's leading scorer, undoubtedly had a deleterious effect on the team's performance against Western, a more fundamental reason was the tactical formation that conceded midfield control to the opposition; once this was remedied for the second half of the second game, the Blues outplayed the Mustangs, but with their reduced firepower it was too late.

A close examination of the record indicates that the Blues made their errors during the first half, for, despite losing five games throughout the schedule, only once was their second half record inferior to that of their opponents.

The attack scored its goals in batches, rather than spreading them throughout the schedule.

A goals for and against total of 29-18 should indicate a better than average team. It did not because the Blues' victories were mostly by large scores, whereas they were unable to convert a reasonable percentage of the chances in close games, which were generally lost.

Individually, two of the newcomers, Mike Hendrickse and Yannis Vassiliou, caught the eye with their effort and enthusiasm, while Drew McKeown and Keith Hall eventually found their scoring boots late in the campaign.

Due credit should be given to Jude Robinson, another newcomer, who played steadily in every game.

To complete the roster of first-year players, mention must be made of Rudi Kovačko, Bern Lecerf, Mike Lloyd, and Ian McCluskey, all of whom had the difficult task of playing from the bench or infrequently, and Igor Ivanisevic and Ivan Perusco, who shared the pain of playing in goal behind a mistake-prone defence.

Geoff Crewe, captaining the team with discretion, was voted the winner of the Charles E. Oster most valuable player trophy by his teammates.

His defensive efforts were ably complemented by Ian Harris, whose positional play was invaluable, while Vince Ierullo showed his accustomed enthusiasm for the game, scoring seven goals.

The play of Dave Evans was rewarded by his runner-up position for the M.V.P. trophy, a recognition of the gap felt in midfield during his absence with a shoulder injury.

Another 'old hand', Phil Oldfield, also gave of his best in every role he was asked to fill.

With only two players not scheduled to return next year, the club can mature into a more resilient team given the right attitude and fewer injuries.

Conceivably, if the four players who were ruled ineligible to play are reinstated next year, this mediocre season will be the last for quite a while.

In this reporter's opinion, the OUAAs decision to rule academically qualified students ineligible to play soccer on the basis of their summer activities is unjustified particularly as the players in question are amateurs.

Hopefully the zeal to categorize every soccer league in the country as amateur or professional, regardless of the individual status of the players, will dissipate itself at the annual meeting.

It is futile exercise, apparently based on an American concept of college sports.

Enough said, let's get on with enjoying the game next year.

Wells charged with Seeley interference

By MARINA STRAUSS
NDP education critic Jim Foulds has accused education minister Thomas Wells of intervening in OISE's decision not to hire Canadian radical sociologist John Seeley.

The charge came after Wells unwittingly revealed to the Ontario Legislative Assembly last Thursday that he informed the OISE director "one or two prominent educators in this province" advised Wells that Seeley should not be hired.

Wells' admission followed urging from Foulds that the education minister ensure an independent review body be set up to investigate why Seeley wasn't appointed at the institute.

OISE's board of governors decided Tuesday not to set up an independent review, but to conduct the review itself.

Foulds questioned the "necessity for these kinds of boards" appointed by the government "to act like the family compact — to make safe appointments."

Wells told the assembly he had received "private calls" about six months ago from one or two prominent educators indicating "they thought it would be bad for OISE if John Seeley was appointed there."

"I did communicate this information to the director, because these were very respected educators of this province."

However, Wells refused to disclose who the prominent educators were or the nature of the telephone calls he received.

Before the dispute, which evolved around York's expansion from the small Glendon College campus to a large university, Ross and Seeley were very close associates.

"I don't know if you understand the importance of what you have just said," Foulds said to the education minister. "What you have said is that you intervened."

Wells denied Foulds' accusation that the education minister deliberately passed on "hearsay evidence."

Wells also said he received a copy of a letter "from someone again at another university" indicating that Seeley was a "controversial figure" in academic circles.

"I guess that explains the actions of the boards, perhaps, and why they are having a review and why the whole thing has not been, let's say, a normal type of appointment," Wells told the Legislature.

OISE director Robert Jackson rejected the unanimous sociology department choice of both faculty members and students to hire Seeley.

The OISE student and faculty associations have backed the sociology department in calling for an independent review, maintaining a sufficient reason for Seeley's rejection was never given.

Faculty and students doubt the objectivity of a board of governors review, especially because Jackson is a board member himself. Jackson personally decided not to hire Seeley on the recommendation of his personnel advisory committee (DPAC).

OISE faculty member Dieter Misgbl who sat in as an observer on an appeal meeting of DPAC over the Seeley rejection, charged the committee review, heavily on "hearsay information, unofficial contacts to other academic and research institutions and to individuals, rumors or grapevine reports."

DPAC had agreed to hold an appeal on Seeley's rejection June 26 following strong objections in the sociology department to the committee's decision.

In a report made on the appeal as a faculty association grievance committee representative, Misgbl maintains there were other reasons besides the four official ones given for not hiring Seeley.

Misgbl notes DPAC was not able to refute a sociology brief which points out exactly why the four official reasons do not hold up.

Seven out of eight letters of recommendation the committee received praised Seeley, Misgbl reported.

He said several matters were "pointed to and introduced, not as statements of fact, but as indicating that Seeley might be a problematic person to have around in the institute. None of these questions and suggestions were supported by documentation."

Misgbl writes because Seeley had changed employers frequently, some members inferred Seeley had done something "wrong, e.g., he may constantly provoke controversy (and that is not to be welcomed)."

Misgbl said the matter that Seeley is "a very controversial academic, although brilliant" was also raised at DPAC's appeal meeting.

Committee members also pointed to the fact that "many associates, former students, etc. have become disenfranchised with him (Seeley), while initially being very loyal to him," Misgbl observed.

In addition, Misgbl said DPAC discussed other academic institutions in Canada, besides U of T, which didn't appoint Seeley after having considered him.

Misgbl also charged that DPAC "did not take care to exclude members from deliberations who might be biased against the appointee on a basis other than warranted by the documentation."

Misgbl's report has been issued to OISE faculty association and board of governors members.

U of T med faculty criticized by magazine

By DAVID SIMMONDS
A Canadian medical newspaper has criticized the U of T Faculty of Medicine for accepting too many "foreign born" students.

In a front page editorial, The Medical Post, a Maclean-Hunter tabloid with a bi-weekly circulation of 26,000, says that "by letting a disproportionate number of these students ... into medicine, the university is acting in an undemocratic, discriminatory way against the taxpayers of the province."

Medical Post editor Earl Damude told The Varsity he did not intend the word "foreign born" to refer to Canadian citizens who were foreign born, but to landed immigrants and foreign students.

U of T presently maintains a quota of foreign students per year in meds, although landed immigrants are treated equally with citizens.

Damude said the purpose of the editorial, inspired by a recent feature in The Varsity on the competition to enter medicine, was to illustrate the poverty of the current admissions criteria. According to the editorial:

"We are sure the people of Ontario would prefer to be treated by doctors of their own ethnic and cultural backgrounds. In medicine, more than any other profession, the cultural interface plays an important part in the relationship between a doctor and his patient.

"We are not advocating that the seats in the faculty of medicine be reserved entirely for WASP students. That would be racism. But we do feel that surely it is not beyond the capacities of the university and government to devise a system whereby the medical students more nearly represent the cultural and sociological mix of the taxpayers in the province."

The editorial is sharply critical of the present "marks-only" admissions policy, claiming the medical school "has literally given up" on other methods of screening.

It also charges the faculty with a vested interest in keeping the marks-only policy, since "they want

The editorial in this week's Medical Post has neatly managed to confuse two issues it is vital to separate.

The most important issue is the inadequacy of present admissions criteria for medical schools.

The Medical Post is quite correct to charge U of T with dragging its heels and acting self-interestedly in keeping to a "marks-only" admissions policy. The McMaster medical school conducts interviews and considers non-academic criteria. If McMaster can do it, so can U of T.

All agree a good academic does not a good doctor make; other, human factors are equally important.

The other issue is the number of "foreign born" students in medical school.

academic sharpies, students who can enhance the reputation of the faculty, preferably to go into research and help in the grant-hunting game."

The editorial also points out that those students with high grades are often "the very antithesis of a ideal applicant, who would later emerge as a doctor who could relate to his patients."

SAC wants sentences overturned

The Students' Administrative Council decided Wednesday to support the overturning of the sentences of Tony Leah and Bill Schabas who were expelled from U of T for their part in preventing controversial urbanologist Edward Banfield from speaking last March.

The SAC motion, however, denies support of the actions of Leah and Schabas and bases the demand for overturning the sentences on the illegitimacy of the Caput, the all-faculty tribunal, which tried the two Students for a Democratic Society members.

The vote to support overturning the sentences passed 21-13 at SAC's general meeting, replacing the previous executive decision in favor of asking merely that black marks be removed from the two former students' transcripts.

The motion, which will be forwarded to the Governing Council's executive committee, which is hearing the Leah-Schabas appeals, reaffirms SAC's position that freedom of speech is not an absolute right, noting Canadian laws against preaching of genocide and racial hatred.

It calls on the university to avoid "carelessly and needlessly abusing the attitudes and feelings of the ethnic community which surrounds it."

SAC also condemns the Caput, citing the lack of student membership and the role of Caput as both a legislative and judicial body — it both decides policy on what is an offence and punishes the offender.

SAC also voted to grant the United Farm Workers $300 for U of T grape and lettuce boycott activities, overturning a decision last week by the internal commission. A move to grant the full $500 requested was rejected.

The internal commission rejection of the grant aroused criticism of SAC for supporting the boycott in principle but refusing financial support.

The campaign for a daily pub and gamesroom, the council was told, is going well with over 1,900 ballots returned supporting the proposal during the last week.

"We're encouraged by the response," said SAC president Seymour Kanowich. He said SAC executive members would be meeting with university president John Evans and other top administrators next Thursday to present the student response and discuss further plans.

The campaign will continue next week with SAC representatives taking petitions and ballots to large classes.

The council supported a motion by communications commissioner Michael Sabia to set up a commission of inquiry into the operations of Radio Varsity.

The recent flurry of resignations and criticism of station manager Paul Murton sparked the call for an inquiry. The question of Murton's resignation, failing immediate improvement in the situation at the station, will be put off until the SAC commission has reported.

Varsity that the present system "is so unsatisfactory it's hard to think of a system that might be worse," the Medical Post approves suggestions for a lottery and pre-medical internship.

"The present system of selection may fill the requirements of an empire-building faculty," concludes the editorial, "but it is not in the best interests of the profession nor the public it serves."

EDITORIAL

The tragic thing is not that there are too many "foreign born" students in medical school, as the Medical Post implies, but that so many careers are ruined in the mad-dog competition to gain entry.

Many have said recently that since the Canadian taxpayer foots the bill for medical training, more Canadian citizens should study medicine. That is a red herring. There are tight quotas on foreign citizens and non-Ontario residents at U of T, and landed immigrants pay exactly the same taxes as citizens.

The Medical Post argues doctors should be broadly representative of the population they serve.

That general concern is sensible. However, a solution will be found not by turning against foreign students, but by devising admissions criteria which take account of the wider responsibilities of a professional.

Any consideration of "racial" quotas should be rejected out of hand. It would be ludicrous to say "two percent Chinese" or "five percent Italian."

The job at hand is to devise a fairer set of admissions criteria, not to turn on foreign students. Any idea that the proliferation of foreign students is the most urgent issue facing medical schools is ridiculous.

Unfortunately, by turning the spotlight on foreign students, The Medical Post has played right into the hands of those who would conduct a witch hunt.

New Radio Varsity report calls for total reorganization

Three Radio Varsity staff members have made a new study of the feasibility of getting an FM licence for the station which criticizes previous proposals submitted to SAC as just amounting to taking the station as it is and adding an FM transmitter.

The new proposal, written by former station manager Paul Cutler, former program director Richard Morochov and former news staffer Danny Henry, calls for a total reorganization of the station in order to consider FM broadcasting. The report calls for a revamping of the station's structure with the manager's job being upgraded to a salary of $12,000 to attract an experienced radio person. The manager would be hired by a board rather than elected by the staff.

Also needed, the report says, would be a full-time program director, full-time technician and the establishment of part-time salaries for the presently unpaid positions of chief announcer, news director, music director, sports director and chief operator.

The report says the present structure with only the manager full-time, prevents the development of quality programming. Other positions are now unpaid, which means that staff are required to do their job on top of a full-time academic course load.

The present closed circuit system of broadcasting to campus residences could be maintained as a practice ground for new staff members who could improve their ability before going on to the FM station, the report says. The FM station would have higher programming standards as a result. The new report also calls for greater capital expenditure than previous estimates, pointing out that much of the present equipment would be inadequate for FM standards.

Not only would the station need to move from its present cramped quarters in the third floor of 91 St. George St., it would need to purchase a new master console to replace the present old one in control room two. Present mono equipment could remain for use by Radio Varsity on closed circuit.

The proposal suggests part of the added costs involved in more realistic estimates of capital expenses and additional salaries could be covered by advertising revenue if the station applied for a commercial, non-profit licence rather than a strictly non-commercial licence.

The report also raises the possibility of other fund-raising efforts, or obtaining grants in return for a simple statement of sponsorship.

The report is not intended to be final. The three staffers call for further analysis of financial expenditures required, organizational structure and possible revenue sources.

St. Pauls church plans fund raising festival

Films, chamber music and an all-candidates meeting are part of a month-long fund-raising festival ending November 30 at St. Paul's United Church at 121 Avenue Road.

Although admission is free to all the daily events, people donating $10 or more will receive a monthly calendar of events for one year.

Operating as a community centre, the church needs at least $35,000 to maintain its facilities and $20,000 for renovations. Rental revenue and donations, although substantial, are not enough to sustain its activities.

The building houses ten non-profit, cultural and community organizations, including The Smile Company which has entertained more than 75,000 senior citizens in the past two years.

It also rents its facilities for evenings of music, drama and films. This shift to the secular reflects two trends common to churches in urban centres: a declining membership and a growing emphasis on community involvement.

One church in the city has already been converted into a small shopping centre and another is being advertised as the 'architects' dream' for conversion to commercial use.

Other congregations, to prevent a similar fate, have become more aggressive in their community involvement: opening their facilities (like St. Paul's) and participating in various campaigns such as the United Farm Workers' boycott of California grapes.

St. Paul's is a church worth saving, not only for its importance as a physical and religious centre for the community but for its historical significance.

Built in 1887, the architecture is Gothic, with an operating pipe organ reaching to the art nouveau fresco on the ceiling. And, with the addition of a few screens, the acoustics will be much more than adequate.

Scheduled for 8 pm Friday, Nov. 15 is the St. Paul's Centre Party with entertainment by the Smile Company and refreshments and a cash bar.

On Sunday, Nov. 17 a Family Films and Film Workshop will be held at 2 pm.

For more listings of the festival events, consult the Here and Now column.

SAC wants rent-free bookstore

The Students' Administrative Council has charged that the university could lower prices on books if it followed the practices of some other universities in providing free rent and accounting services to campus bookstores.

On paper the U of T bookstores had a loss of $17,000 last year on their operations, but included in expenses were $50,000 rent, $39,806 interest on a loan to finance inventory and $70,000 for accounting services.

A SAC brief points out seven universities provide rent free-of-charge, 14 provide a free loan to finance inventory and five provide free accounting services. At U of T many other services are not charged rent, such as the housing and placement centres.

The bookstores' operations at U of T have long been controversial, with students frequently complaining about high prices and unavailability of required texts.

The SAC charges were made to an internal affairs sub-committee looking into all aspects of the U of T Press.

SAC even started its own bookstore from 1968-70 offering 10 per cent discounts, but it was forced to close.

SAC also criticizes the text-bookstore for under-ordering copies of texts ordered by professors. The SAC brief says there are numerous examples of students being unable to obtain texts even by mid-term because of under-ordering.

The brief recommends that the committee advise the university to provide free services to reduce the costs of books to the student.

It points out that the purchase of texts is essential in many cases, and represents a considerable drain on limited student finances.

To raise enough roof-of-all-evil to finance his aldermanic campaign in Ward Six, Alan Sparrow is presenting a 7.30 p.m. concert Monday at Convocation Hall.

Perth County Conspiracy will be playing along with Cedric Smith & Terry Jones, Hummingbird, Peter Shayne, Norm Hacking, John Stainton, and Jim and Friends.

Tickets are $2 and are available at the door, Round Records or the Sparrow campaign office at 487½ Church St. (925-5073).

The Colleges' Struggle for Identity

By KATHERINE ROWCLIFFE

Another proposal has been added to the list of schemes to revitalize the ailing federated universities (Trinity, Victoria and St. Mike's).

The Memorandum of Understanding is an outgrowth of U of T president John Evans' Work Paper on Arts & Science Organization and the Roles of the Colleges issued in October 1973.

The efficiency and centralization proposed in the Memorandum reflect Evans' approach to administrations (English, French, German, Near Eastern Studies, Philosophy and Religion).

These new departments would coordinate courses taught in the colleges.

Some of the present duplication of courses would be eliminated but larger, more centralized departments would be created. This perhaps creates more problems than solutions.

"The bigger the department," warned Victoria principal J.M.

Baines added negotiators involved in the plans recognize the danger.

The new departments are to be administered by a chairman selected by search committees, which are expected to make recommendations early in the new year.

The Memorandum would also alter the composition of these new departments.

Until now, the federated universities have selected and hired their own teaching staff. But the federated colleges suffer financial deficits and the university has offered, in the Memorandum, to assume the cost of these salaries.

In addition, the federated universities would receive a contribution from the university towards equalizing the average salaries of its staff, plus a block grant to help cover support services and an earmarked grant for college teaching done by university staff.

Loss of Autonomy

In return for all this, the university would have the final say in all hiring, firing and tenure decisions.

This represents a significant loss of power for the federated universities which have always selected and hired their own staff.

(A college would, under the Memorandum, still be able to appoint its own staff, but would have to pay that salary from its own, and not university funds.)

Trinity, the smallest federated university, sees itself gaining significant financial benefits. Victoria has been apprehensive.

In a letter to Evans on August 21, Victoria president G.S. French said "the ultimate effect of this provision will be to erode significantly the federated status of Victoria and that it will have deleterious consequences for the academic ministrations. Trinity is enthusiastic about the Memorandum. St. Mike's agrees with it in principle. Victoria has had serious reservations.

The Memorandum, signed last April by representatives of the colleges and the Faculty of Arts and Science, after a year of intensive negotiation, proposes the creation of a single university department for each of the present 'college sub-

Robson, "the less chance there is for it to be a human place."

Another danger is that academic units which are not economically efficient from the university's point of view might be phased out.

"Some of the previous centers of excellence may be destroyed to establish an efficient university mechanism" warned New College principal A.D. Baines.

development of the College."

College Identity

Evans predictably replied, on September 6, "The principle that, in future, the employment contracts of persons appointed to the university departments must be with the University is a recognition of the fact that the University should have some control over those whose salaries it will be paying... This principle is integral to the Memorandum."

As for faculty identity, Prof. Alex A. Dalzell, Trinity vice-provost, maintained "college loyalty is not a matter of contracts."

The Memorandum states "It remains to be demonstrated whether members of staff appointed by, not employed by, a college will develop and maintain the same loyalty and commitment that existing college staff display."

The federated universities do stand to regain an identity which has been eroding in recent years.

Presently, only 20 per cent of students take courses at their colleges and that figure decreases annually.

This means increasingly fewer students have had any identity with their college.

Most students are turning to subjects in the social, physical and life sciences (which traditionally offer more job opportunities upon graduation than do the arts).

There is provision in the Memorandum for a full review of the new system in five years.

"The essential thing now," says French, "is to make the thing work as best we can."

Varg filled with boredom, says Sun fan

How is it that you and your staff are able to find such a preponderance of boring news? Surely, in an institution the size of the University of Toronto, there must be someone or something of interest, besides tenure committees. At present the only value I see in The Varsity is that it is useful in mopping up spilled coffee on the cafeteria table, while I read the Sun.

Often while reading The Varsity, I fall asleep. I usually have to look at the cartoon on the editorial page twice. The second time, I am looking for the reason why I didn't laugh the first time. At this point, I have given up ever finding anything of humour in The Varsity. Luckily the Toike Oike often fills this vacuum, but are engineers the only ones allowed to laugh these days?

How is it that McGill is able to publish a daily paper that is of greater size than your paper and still hold its audience while you only publish tri-weekly, and yet induce somnolence?

At Wilfred Laurier University, (where I was a student for two years) the Cord Weekly digs up more controversial issues within an enrollment of 2,600 (approx.), than you are able to do despite having a populace at least ten times larger. At their worst they don't have a

What is the problem, and I'm sure I share the sentiments of many students on campus, is that an objective reconsideration of SAC's purpose at U of T is much needed.

It appears that SAC's fundamental raison d'être in recent years has not been to attend to students' academic and extra-curricular interests directly within the university, but to attempt the mending of every bleeding heart the world has to provide.

Lack of student support at boycott picket lines is the result of two basic attitudes. Firstly, some students just don't believe in the cause and flatly refuse to support it. Secondly, and this is where the SAC comes in, is that the relentless barrage of campus arguments on Chilean politics, racist theories, student autonomy, and tenure responsibilities has had a numbing effect and students just don't give a damn anymore.

I suggest that SAC consider returning to its basic responsibility toward student needs within this particular university in both a social and academic capacity. Indeed, awareness of the world around us is a necessary facet of one's education, but it is not up to SAC to decide on a single political sentiment for the collective student body, based on the opinions of armchair politicians such as Mr. Gallop, the now removed SDS, et al.

If Douglas Gallop wants to pay for Cesar Chavez' expense-paid tour of North America, then he may do so, but with his own money, not the student body's. And while he is being that in our society, adolescence continues until about age 30 — a time when many have not completed and others have not begun their formal education. Forty is merely young and fifty mid-adulthood. At sixty one reaches perhaps the full blooming of maturity and by eighty, no sooner, one is ready to agree that aging is an adjective appropriate to the state one finds oneself in.

Thus I reject this particular prediction of yours for the future, based as it is on inaccurate perception of the present. Nevertheless I hope you will continue to give attention to other more profound aspects of the future.

Cornelia J. Balnes, M.D.

Workers and students rally to defend Toike

This letter is prompted by the recent attacks upon the integrity of the Toike Oike which have recently been published in this newspaper. While I question the propriety of debating the Toike Oike in the pages of The Varsity, I feel compelled to adhere to the dictum that charges should be refuted in the forum in which they are made.

In this time of moral rejuvenation and incline upon the campuses of our nation, I must insist that this is no time to be critical of the efforts of the Toike Oike to help provide immoral leadership. Now more than ever we must look up to our Toike and respect it as it attempts to deal palling nonsense that I am surprised that it found its way into print, let alone reprint. The authors' views on the witchcraft crisis in early modern Europe are garbled, oversimplified and distorted to fit a preconceived political notion, and bear no resemblance to scholarly research on this complex and subtle problem of social and cultural history.

I do not have the time or inclination to attempt a point by point discussion of the selection, and in any case, since the general argument is as bad as the specific points with which it is supported, there would be little gained by such an exercise.

The problem of witchcraft, and its relation to the situation of women in the society is an extremely interesting question which has still not been adequately examined. Enough hysterical fantasy was written on this subject in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. One would hope that in producing modern interpretations of this phenomenon, that we do not simply produce new fantasies, just as destructive as the old.

Sexism enters witches debate

I wish to remedy one gross inference and one significant sexist commission in Edmund Meltzer's appendage to the article Witches, Midwives and Nurses. When he claims that "many men as well as women fell victim to the witch craze . . .", ten thousand male deaths as compared to three million female deaths as estimated by Elizabeth Gould-Davies in the First Sex, may well be many but hardly proportionate as Mr. Meltzer implies.

His quotation concerning an Egyptian women's auxiliary health corp in the 19th century speaks for itself. Dr. Clot-Bey (a man?) "persuaded the Viceroy (also a man?) to initiate" the corp which was "to supplement men physicians . . .".

So what's new Mr. Meltzer?

CUPE local backs COLA bid

I am writing on behalf of the members of CUPE local 1222 (SAC employees), who are very concerned about the struggle of the library union (CUPE 1230) and the graduate assistants (GAA) with the University administration to get a cost of living adjustment.

The refusal of the University administration to negotiate is typical of its blatantly anti-labor policies. It has continually tried to stall, obstruct and impede the efforts of the graduate assistants to unionize. The senior administrators seem oblivious to the plight of their employees, perhaps because their salaries are so much higher than those of the library workers ($7,800 average) and the graduate assistants (maximum $7,400). They have no problem buying food and paying rent.

Our union has recently negotiated a cost of living adjustment with the Executive of the S.A.C. Although the mid-contract increase is barely adequate, it shows some concern on the part of student leaders with the impact of inflation on low paid workers.

Hence CUPE 1222 extends its support to CUPE 1230 and the GAA and will continue to aid them in any way possible.

President, CUPE 1222.

Hoyes shows condescension in arguments

"I argue that students can do little in this regard without knowing what constitutes good teaching and I have yet to be convinced that students know good teaching when they see it." So Brian Hoyes in his latest thrust against the notion of parity on university tenure committees.

Once again the few rags of wit Mr. Hoyes manages to muster do little to disguise the wearisome slackness of his attitudes. It is tiring to be so continually condescended to, to the point where the name student becomes virtually synonymous with the deepest ignorance — not a common ignorance of a given subject matter, but a splendid, transcendent ignorance of the very fact that an attempt to rescue us from our predicament might be being made.

This seems to be the sense of Mr. Hoyes' arguments. Were good teaching to save us, we should not know it; should we ever take it upon ourselves to become presumptuous enough to think otherwise, Mr. Hoyes would be there to step out of the whirlwind and pose us some riddles about Behemoth or Leviathan.

Let me tell Mr. Hoyes something that might for a moment ruffle that tidy Family Compact of ideas that represents his thinking. In my own stays at 3 or 4 universities in Canada I have heard of (or encountered) professors who came drunk to class, who stole university property as a gesture against "established society", who skipped innumerable lectures, who mumbled, who were short-tempered or arrogant towards students. (I particularly recommend this last group to Mr. Hoyes' attention.)

In many cases students themselves were in an excellent position to indicate something was amiss; occasionally they were the only ones who were. Let me hasten to add, in case Mr. Hoyes is about to dismiss this as scurrilous nonsense, that of course the majority of staff members in universities are commendable scholars, first-rate human beings, and (perhaps) inspiring teachers, and of course senior department members are sometimes as fully aware of any problems that might exist as are (at times) students themselves — but not always.

There seems to me to be no substitute for the kind of week-to-week familiarity with a professor's work that students can provide to any body investigating the question of classroom performance.

Were course unions and programmes of course evaluation sufficiently well-organized, Mr. Hoyes might even find that the sorts of contributions students can make to tenure committees could indeed be what every member of the university community ought by this time to expect — invaluable.

I often wonder why there is so much information for graduate students within The Varsity. Correct me if I'm wrong, but isn't there a paper called the Graduate Bulletin, that would be a much better receptacle for such information?

Has The Varsity ever had a "scoop"?

If The Varsity were not free, I'd ask you to cancel my subscription. However, being free, I will persevere in browsing The Varsity, (so long as I don't have to go out of my way to do so). I hope that you realize that there is a newsprint shortage, and in this I hope that you either shape up or ship out and let the paper be put to a better use.

Concern for farmworkers misdirected

In response to Douglas Gallop's proposal that SAC allot a portion of student funds to the cause of the United Farm Workers, may I suggest that he be indiscreet with his own money, and not that of the other students on this campus.

To bemoan the plight of the farmworkers on the basis of poor working conditions and low pay while there are millions in the world suffering of disease and starvation indicates a severe misdirection of priorities. In any event, the validity of the farmworkers claim is not the issue here.

so generous I might remind him that there are people much worse off right here in Canada, and who are legal citizens.

I find it peculiar that Mr. Gallop expects the students of U of T to surrender the unreasonable amount of time he believes is spent in the frivolity of social and academic endeavour to help him support the very important and relevant cause of the farmworker. The university would benefit from a little less ax-grinding and a little more SAC-funded, student-oriented social activities in the educational community.

Be careful not to reject the cliché term "campus fun" as a worthless and immature pastime. Mr. Gallop, when on-campus political drum-beating rings strangely of adolescent rebelliousness.

I'm glad you won't be here for it either.

Varsity policy on aging said 'preposterous'

Feature articles about one's husband are always interesting to read but your recent presentation of the new principal of New College had a disturbing aspect.

By implication it seemed to warn me that, by Varsity's standards, one decade hence it will be appropriate to describe my husband as "aging." This is preposterous, a concept I am not prepared to accept.

Good reasons exist for declaring with the great problems of the day. We must give it all the support we can in its task. To try to hound it in the press is a cowardly and dangerous thing to do — dangerous in the precedent it might set for future campus journals which attempt to provide leadership in periods of difficulty.

As for complaints that this year's Toike staff has "taken a great institution and dashed it to the ground," I wish to say that, for my own part, I am exceedingly proud of the job that this year's staff has done.

History, I am certain, will vindicate the record of this year's Toike staff, regardless of what an elite corps of impudent snobs and the nattering nabobs of negativism may say to the contrary in the pages of the Establishment press. I wish here to specifically laud the performance of the Managing Editor of this year's Toike Oike, who happens to be one of the most erudite, witty, considerate, virtuous, and goodlooking people you could ever hope to meet.

ONE DAY, EVERYDAY AT SID SMITH

By GENE ALLEN

Way back in 1967 when the world was young, the Sid Smith lobby was a sterile wasteland. There were no chairs, no literature tables, no bulletin boards, nothing.

Then in the fall of 1968, students decided there should be a free speech area on campus where political-social harangues and discussions could take place, and where books and pamphlets could be distributed. Negotiations with the administration on establishing such a potential hotbed of anarchists, dupes and fellow-travellers were of course fruitless.

But those were the days when student power was more than a slogan. Left-wing groups set up literature tables anyway, expecting a confrontation with the administration that never happened. They were left alone. Soon other groups set up literature tables. Speeches were made from tabletops.

Then during the parity strike of 1971 students occupied the Sid Smith lobby. Settling down for a long stay, they brought easy chairs from the plush upstairs lounges. The chairs too have remained. Somehow a rug appeared to complete this vision of cosiness.

Now, six years later, the literature tables and the easy chairs are just part of the furniture. Of the thousands who pass through the Sid Smith lobby daily, who gives them a second thought?

The following excerpts from conversations with different people who frequent the Sid Smith lobby seem to show that things have changed.

They also indicate the large distances that exist between those students who understand the university as a place for exchanging ideas, and trying to apply those ideas to the world; and those who like to hang around with their friends and chew the rag.

The assumptions of ten years ago are no longer sufficient to discover a common ground.

tables and these guys come along and say, 'You have to leave so we can set up our table here.' If they're trying to convert people, they're certainly not succeeding. They should get their banners changed too. I mean, red, red, day after day, it gets kind of boring. Sometimes it's amusing when the Revolutionary Marxists get into a fight with the Spartacists."

Do you think this would be a good place to have discussions about more immediate problems?

"It's not worth it. When you've only got an hour between classes, you just want to have a coffee and relax for a while."

clown. You get two levels of reaction. Everybody has an automatic stock line they give to people pushing literature at them. But if you can get through that, a high percentage of people are interested in talking about political issues. We set up here pretty well every day.

A student waiting for a class

What? No, I don't hang around here. I come here for a cup of tea when it's cold outside and I'm waiting for a class.

I don't like this place at all. I think it's very ugly. It's just like a little suburb. I find it boring. There's a lot of noise but nothing's happening.

The people at the Consider Jesus table

I've been working here for three years now. The first year people seemed more interested in talking. It seems a little quieter now.

There used to be a lot of big discussions about religion and politics and that stuff, but I don't think people are so much into that any more. A lot of times now it's people you know from classes, they come up and ask 'What are you doing there?' and we get into a discussion that way.

If we've had something special printed up we'll hand it out, but usually we just sit here. We're not very aggressive.

A group of students

"I can't imagine it not being here. Where else would people go?"

"There's not enough bridge players."

"It's a comfortable place to hang out, you know? People don't come here to work. They come here to socialize. I'd say it was the centre of the campus."

"The first time I came in here, it was last year, my first year. I hadn't seen any of my friends from high school around. Then when I came in here it seemed I knew almost everybody. Every time you walk in you meet someone you know."

"The rug's getting a bit dingy. What this place really needs is a bar."

How do you get along with the political people here?

"It sort of gets dull after a while. What bothers me in talking to them is that they refuse to compromise. They won't really listen to anything you have to say, they're just interested in getting their point across. For them it's just completely a one-way thing."

"Once I had to buy a copy of the Communist Manifesto for one of my classes and I got it here much cheaper than at the bookstore."

"If anything, all they do is disrupt you. I mean, you're sitting at one of these

The guy at the Canadian Party of Labour literature table

It's hard to evaluate the change in student attitudes. The New Left mystique was still alive back then in 1968. Now this place has kind of the atmosphere of a circus.

We've been setting up elsewhere sometimes recently. Yeah, we've had a good response. In a new place, we're not taken for granted. Everybody's so used to seeing us here.

Most of the political groups are really elitist. They think only the arts students around here are interested in politics, and that the engineering and professional students are apolitical boys.

Well, that's not true.

What kind of reaction do you get from students?

Pretty good. We sell between fifty and a hundred copies of our paper each week. But this is really more an organizing centre than a sales booth.

If you don't talk to people, they're going to assume you're just another

How do you get along with the political people here?

I have no respect for them. We don't talk. There's no student revolution — they're just using the word empty. Once I did talk to one of the religious groups and they didn't know what they were talking about.

The people who spend all their time hanging around here, I can't understand them. They must be bored or lazy.

They just want to grow up to be a doctor or a lawyer like their mother says and they don't care about anything else.

Do you ever get discouraged?

Once in a while you get discouraged about one particular person. I remember a few years ago, there was this one guy, and every time we'd get talking to someone, he'd come up and argue against us, trying to convince people not to listen to us.

But that doesn't happen any more. "We're here because of what we believe. The important thing is just that we're here. We're not concerned with converting huge numbers of people."

If we didn't think it was important we wouldn't be here.

1984: total annihilation or social sensitivity?

By SUSAN DÓDOG

Predictions on the future of society ranged from total annihilation to the development of social sensitivity in a symposium entitled "1984 is Ten Years Away" presented yesterday in the Daniel Wilson Common Room at New College.

About 60 people listened to the conflicting views presented by the four panelists. Moderator Vivian Rakoff, a psychiatrist at the Clarke Institute, presented the speakers: Faculty of Social Work professor Ben Schlesinger, an expert on the family; New College student Jane Demaray, and sociologist Mary Ann Griggs, interdisciplinary teacher at the universities of Toronto and Waterloo.

This discussion was part of a symposium called The Future, which is being presented all week by New College.

Schlesinger speaking first, said "the family will survive and will predominate in our society."

He based this on evidence that three major alternatives to family living did not work. The average life span of the commune is 6 months, while the average for group marriage is eight months, he said.

Schlesinger cited "living together" as a prelude to a family situation. He mentioned lack of organization, role playing, and inability to work together as common causes of breakdown of the alternatives to the family.

His other predictions included a large number of working women ("one-half of the work force, 80 percent married"), less children, a large number of aged, more divorcees, second marriages, trial marriage by contract and a great emphasis on birth control.

Demaray presented the most pessimistic speech of the evening. She protested "human chauvinism", saying that man had forgotten he was part of nature.

"Man will become extinct," she asserted. "The next great age will be the age of insects."

This will happen because man cannot adapt to being "bombarded" and manipulated by the media, Demaray said, and referred to Alvin Toffler as she spoke of "social maladjustments of those who cannot keep up."

Griggs rebutted Demaray with an optimistic viewpoint, saying the only problem today is "the problem of humanity itself. Most of the other problems of humanity have been dealt with effectively."

Griggs' speech emphasized individual choices. The questions were clear to her, she said, "Is there going to be a future? If so, it was going to be "unpredictable."

Griggs' strategy involved developing an "energetic, dynamic community social structure" to replace the family.

A "flexible orientation to reality" would achieve this goal but this is "foreign to Western civilization," Griggs said. She praised Oriental societies for their adaptability and alertness.

The final goal involved social bonding and the development of sensitivity towards others.

Griggs believed these goals are already in the process of development.

Moderator Rakoff put in "two cheers for Western civilization" in a vehement rebuttal of Demaray's and Griggs' speeches.

Rakoff praised technological advancements, the spread of the doctrine of individuality, and "a safety (from nature's forces) that no man has ever had before."

Rakoff asserted that certain things are perennial and will always survive. "The future will be like the past, rather terrible," he added. "Men are engaged in a constant struggle."

"There are terrible things in this civilization and in every civilization," Rakoff replied in contention to Griggs' praise of the Orient. "Oriental quietism has resulted in the degradation of the human condition through conformity."

A discussion of these issues followed. No mention was made of a police state, test-tube babies, or robot-like men.

back on you."

In the future, Bakan advised, man must not compete with his fellow man; man must be compassionate.

The third speaker, "free school" teacher Murray Shukyn, discussed the increasing freedom of students. He expressed satisfaction that students are devising their own timetables.

Most of the afternoon, however, was devoted to a severe challenge to Gilbert's views by the 150-member audience.

Gilbert was asked what effects his views had on the human beings "personal soul."

Gilbert replied by warning that the word "soul" suggested something special about man that put it above other forms of life. Which, Gilbert felt, man is not.

Views differ on future

By ROB PRITCHARD

Guest speakers Robert Gilbert and David Bakan expressed differing views on the subject of "Freedom and Education In The Future" which was the topic at the symposium on The Future at New College Wednesday afternoon.

Gilbert, who works at the Addiction Research Foundation, attacked the optimism of those who feel that "mankind can build a bridge over its limitations."

Instead, man must "explain things mechanistically," as Darwin did. Darwin, Gilbert explained, had "removed the necessity to involve God when he acknowledged evolution."

According to Gilbert, mankind will only survive by recognizing the coming of an "environmental war—famine, war and disease will rise against us."

But, Gilbert added, "I fear that it's too late" for man to save himself by realizing his position.

Bakan, a York University psychology professor, responded by attributing a contradiction to Gilbert. Bakan argued that Gilbert "was saying... things happen by natural law and then saying that man is in control."

Bakan himself presented a program of cooperation in the future. The increased communications in this planet make this cooperation necessary, he maintained.

"You cannot anymore just worry about yourself at the expense of the other guy," Bakan explained, "because it's just going to come

Michener wants increased aid

By ROB PRITCHARD

Former Governor-General Roland Michener called for increased Canadian aid to underdeveloped countries in a speech given at New College on Wednesday evening.

"Our approach must be to distribute our resources in a more equitable way and use them for the future," Michener told about 100 diners at a banquet of the symposium on The Future.

Michener insisted that for Canada to help other countries would be an aid towards world peace. "It is a self-assuring act to assure a more stable and peaceful world," he said.

But, Michener added, "I'm afraid we won't act in time and that it will be the old story of hardship, wars and disorder."

"Tennyson saw a parliament of man, the federation of the world, but I don't think it's coming too fast."

Michener felt Canada's food resources are particularly valuable at this time, pointing out that the average Canadian eats five times as much as the average Indian.

Roland Michener tucks into a hearty dinner before speech on the need for redistribution of world resources.

How One Winter Came in the Lake Region

For weeks and weeks the autumn world stood still,
Clothed in the shadow of a smoky haze;
The fields were dead, the wind had lost its will,
And all the lands were hushed by wood and hill,
In those grey, withered days.

Behind a mist the blar sun rose and set,
At night the moon would nestle in a cloud;
The fisherman, a ghost, did cast his net;
The lake its shores forgot to chafe and fret,
And hushed its caverns loud.

Far in the smoky woods the birds were mute,
Save that from blackened tree a jay would scream,
Or far in swamps the lizard's lonesome lute
Would pipe in thirst, or by some gnarled root
The tree-toad trilled his dream.

From day to day still hushed the season's mood,
The streams stayed in their runnels shrunk and dry;
Suns rose aghast by wave and shore and wood,
And all the world, with ominous silence, stood
In weird expectancy.

When one strange night the sun like blood went down,
Flooding the heavens in a ruddy hue;
Red grew the lake, the sere fields parched and brown,
Red grew the marshes where the creeks stole down,
But never a wind-breath blew.

That night I felt the winter in my veins,
A joyous tremor of the icy glow;
And woke to hear the North's wild vibrant strains,
While far and wide, by withered woods and plains,
Fast fell the driving snow.

WILFRED CAMPBELL

Bishop in Honan: another university press product.

Bishop White, wearing the Decoration of the Excellent Crop.

From its initial mention in a circular, the new life of Bishop White raised old fears in the mind.

Would it bear out that old deprecating dictum, that North American university presses are the breeding ground for the intellectually decrepit? Obscure scholars regularly and methodically have published mediocre works on esoteric subjects, while the institutions themselves make use of their presses to present approved studies of their own growth and development. As a rule, it seems, the university press affords putative immortality to authors and events quite undeserving of apotheosis.

On first glance, this book seems to sail majestically along in line abreast with that judgement. Its publication was ensured through subsidies from the University of Toronto, the Bishop White Fund, the Anglican Church, and the Masonic order.

It was written by Bishop Walmsley (of the United Church), a friend of White's and an authority on China itself as well as the Canadian missions there.

The book resembles commissioned biography, or eulogy, far more than it represents a project of historical investigation.

But albeit vanity publishing, the book has some satisfactions to give. The powers that gave it birth are significantly interwoven in the life of White; and it is possible to see that the linking of Church, University and Museum were a definite feature of early twentieth century Toronto. It is an insufficient book, in the manner of its writing; but it is not insignificant.

Before the deluge: kudos to the University of Toronto Press. This book carries out its habit of design excellence. The book is sturdy, handles gracefully, and is set in a fine type. The photographs included are masterfully selected to give an idea of Chinese mission society. Perhaps only the crimson cover betrays any desire to make the volume readily marketable to the otherwise uninterested browser.

On that 'this-book-is-about-China' dust jacket is superimposed the face of White as he was at the turn of the century: young, ascetic, hot-eyed, in Chinese dress and wearing an artificial queue. He looks firmly into the camera. Even then, his adoption of Chinese ways of life was leading to confusion among his equals and superiors. They were baffled by his personality. What was the nature of this man who for many years spearheaded the Canadian presence

White's spiritual vita where he allows extracts from the Bishop's diaries to speak for him, can we read between the lines a psychological appreciation worthy of good post-Freudian biography.

Walmsley's life of White is really a Life, a homily, an exercise in hagiography.

The key to White's personality is his inner life, his great religious sincerity.

His remarkable diary details analytically the struggle he faced between his pure passion for his future wife and his thought that this love might be a barrier between himself and the will of Christ.

He lived his entire life, day by day, in acute apprehension of the immanence of both God and Adversary.

Once, while standing in a field in China, reflecting on the apparent futile idolatry of the peasants, he felt the presence of Satan himself. He waged fierce mental warfare, and at last, "I felt Satan withdrawing. By this time I was on my feet preaching away at him with tears in my eyes, but fire in my heart. Then I sang the Dology."

It is that kind of book, and while it is an interesting way to examine a Bishop, it treads softly around questions of historical and personal conflict.

At times there are profoundly valuable evocations of the Canadian self-perception before the turn of the century but these reflections vanish as the events of White's life become more momentous. The implied value of this book can be determined from its sponsorship. All of the groups felt White had made a contribution to their development. The bishop was not the only one who made his way with confidence from one to the other; it was, I think, a feature of the period that the provision and maintenance of 'Culture' (my apologies for the terminology, but it is a contemporary word) were centred in the Church, the quasi-religious organizations, and the University of Toronto. The government was involved only to the extent that its wealthy and influential supporters encouraged it to be.

Recommended reading for anyone interested in the formation of our Museum, and a useful complement to this life of White, is Currelly's account of the R.O.M.'s nativity. Written as an anecdotal autobiography, it tells in numerous racy stories the ways in which such a hoard of historical loot could be garnered.

It was the great age of archaeology in the Near and Far East; not since Winckelmann two centuries before had there been such an interest in the antique. Currelly, disappointed in the Church, became an accumulator with the great ones. He came to know such luminaries as Flinders Petrie, and came to sit in on the 'insiders' groups which operated with more stealth than Duveen.

Those who collected for institutions were given an edge on those who collected for resale; but the trade in antiquities was at the time a free-for-all in which the experts tried to salvage from greedy or ignorant peasants, and knowledgeable dealers, the treasures which were ripped from their sites with no regard to provenance or even preservation.

If it was old, the foreigners would want it; and the local governments always asked questions or took your money.

There was a wholesale pillaging of cultural heritage, and I suppose it is to this country's benefit that we had so shrewd a man as Currelly, and one so honest, running our buccaneering. His network of agents were men who knew, usually, what they were looking for; they were not scientists, but gifted and enthusiastic amateurs. It was into this category that White fitted.

White initially seems to have been intrigued by the presence of Jewish synagogues in his part of China, no longer in use, but whose memorials were about to be effaced. He arranged for their preservation and his future was set in front of him. In time, whenever there was an antiquity about to be pogromed, he was always willing to buy it and keep it safe. Thus we have in the Museum today the magnificent thirteenth-century temple fresco that, without the Bishop's connivance, would have been gouged from the temple walls.

A sheaf of photographs in Walmsley's biography gives us an idea of the sort of material White was exporting from the diseased Chinese state—by the boatload.

But in this year of renewed interest in China, a year when every conceivable aspect of the New China is being explored by Old China watchers, and regrettably, by less than able sensationalist journalists, it is disappointing to see the U of T, which has a resource pool of some depth, make its entry in the form of a commissioned biography.

Bishop in Honan gives the reader only glimpses of a Canadian impact on China earlier by far than the now-celebrated Bethune. The book as it stands deals not at all with cultural cross-fertilization. With so many still alive in this country who experienced and remember that period we should demand a more significant publication from our University Press on the crucial subject of the growth of Sinology in Canada and the rise and decline of the Canadian missions in China. They started here, and they should be analyzed and thoroughly by this university or the Museum which has sheltered under them for so many years.

The post-2001 days of glory are ended for "Also Sprach Zarathustra", Strauss' tone-poem based on Nietzsche's superman-ethos.

The first twenty or so bars were made immortal to a generation of filmgoers when Stanley Kubrick picked them as the theme for his monumental space-opera of a few years ago, and almost every orchestra capable of mustering the 90-or-so musicians required to play this late-romantic blockbuster was summoned before recording studio mikes. Predictably, the market was flooded with Zarathustras, both old and new; a bonanza for Strauss freaks, but a source of despair for record-collecting novices who just wanted the best recording. And, when any piece gets over-recorded, the choice is always hard.

It's with all this in mind that we confront Deutsche Gramophon's new release of Zarathustra, with the one and only Karajan at the helm.

I'm not sure if this is the K's first recorded go at the piece, but it's the only one he's recorded in recent memory.

It's certainly the only time both he and the Berlin Philharmonic have gotten together to record it.

Now, DG had one of the finest versions of Zara in its listings already, recorded many years ago by Karl Bohm and the Berliners, and updated with a jazzy full-colour cover a couple of years back. Why add a duplication to the catalogue?

Greed, probably—or possibly a contractual obligation of so many records-a-year on Karajan's part. Whatever the byzantine reasons for this disc, the fact is that it's on the shelves now; as always is the case with duplications, the question is: is it good enough to excuse its presence in an already overcrowded marketplace?

If it were a minor-league conductor we were talking about, the answer would probably be no. But when Karajan is at the helm, there seems to be a good excuse for recording anything . . . Beethoven's 5th, even.

This recording almost seems like the first recording of a new work when compared to some of the rather flat, stagey renditions heard in recent years.

The opening section (the famous one, no thanks to Mr. Deodato) finally lets us hear the low C on the organ with solid clarity. When the full orchestra comes in on the crashing great chords, the volume contrasts are beautifully handled. And the boom-poom-poom of the tympani are smacked out with confidence and power to spare.

The music then traces Zarathustra's story, through times of wandering, doubt, "scientific" thought, nature-inspired reverie, a glorious waltz, and final realization of the conductor. It's easy to get the musicians to play loud. Even big volume differences aren't hard to get (just listen to any Hollywood film score of the 30's or 40's). It's conveying to the musicians just how the leader wants a "mysterious" passage to sound that's difficult to the 9th degree. Try it yourself . . . see if you can work out specific, quantifiable instructions (in terms of volume, tempo, phrasing and instrumental balance) that you'd

In reviewing records, I frequently get a sense of deja vu, and I know it's not mistaken. If you look over the new releases for long enough, you're bound to see some items over and over again. This isn't always a bad thing, because performance practices do change, and re-recordings of the ultra-popular works have a certain historical value in this way.

But when, for example, Berlioz's "Symphonie Fan-eternally popular symphony good enough to excuse its presence in the overstuffed Berlioz department?

Unquestionably. Solti is, with Karajan and a few others in the very top of the conductor's league. Chicago is classed as one of the US big 5, and when Georg is at the helm, they have few peers. They, like the Berlin Philharmonic, approach the level of virtuosity that marks off the pros from the hopefuls. The high point of the record—which is not to say that the rest suffers by comparison—is the second movement. Here, the artist is at a ball, where he catches sight of the Beloved only at intervals, caught up in a gloriously written waltz. Solti has every note down just right; I've never heard such a perfect performance of this movement.

The Symphonie Fantastique is, like Beethoven's 5th, 7th and 9th, an absolute necessity in a beginning collection, and whether you're a greenhorn or an old hand at the biz, you can't go wrong with this one. (London CS6790, $6.98).

I wish I could say the same about Adrian Boult's new disc of Wagner fragments. "Ride of the Valkyries" should have been retired a long time ago, but still it thunders through pop programs and greatest-hits records. Wagner himself despised the practice of taking "bleeding chunks" of his operas and playing them in orchestral concerts. Poor old Wagner . . . he shouldn't have written such majestic, memorable music.

The cuts on the disc (Siegfried's Rhine Journey, Act 3, preludes from "Tristan" and "Tannhäuser", etc.) are basic repertoire essentials, but their attractiveness fades long before Berlioz's, for example. I suspect that Sir Adrian and the London Philharmonic had to do this record to fulfill some contractual obligation; I can't picture one of the world's foremost orchestras getting enthused over works that have simply been played to death.

It's no surprise, then, that the disc (Angel S36998) sounds lacklustre and tired. And, at a list of $7.98, there are plenty of budget-priced alternatives.

Superman's task.

The final bars may come as a surprise to first-time listeners, expecting a walloping huge climax to a work which began so spectacularly: just the opposite. Strauss ended his tone-poem in two keys, pianissimo. The unresolved quality of the ending reinforces the mysterious air of the music, which is Strauss' real theme, the spectacular stuff just being the showcase.

Clearly, this emphasis on the secretive and the mysterious places heavy demands on the give to the musicians.

Add to all this the fact that the Strauss tone poems (all 10 of them) are fiendishly difficult to play and you've got quite a task. Happily, K and the Berliners make it sound like a piece of strudel (assuming Strauss' occasional Viennese venue) as they have so many times before.

Top marks go to the DG engineers for a superlative recording job on this one. You lucky folks with mammoth stereo systems will have a ball with this one. (DG2530-402).

tastique" is recorded for the umpteenth time, is it really necessary?

At hand now is a recording of that program-music landmark, played by Georg Solti and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Berlioz wrote this work as an artist's opium-induced dream: the fixed idea runs through the hero's mind through the five movements in the shape of a melody. It's a musical cliché, now, of course, but when the work premiered in 1830 its impact was tremendous.

The new British group Supertramp is an exciting new entry into the rock field with a style very reminiscent of Bread in their ability to go from a lilting piano solo into a driving hard percussive rock break in almost the same breath, and then drop back into a sax-dominated change of pace.

Their album Crime of the Century (A&M Sp-3647) uses subtle little things like emphatic finger-snapping to break up some of the piano-saturated tracks. Like the Beatles who used simple hand-clapping so effectively on Beatlemania, Supertramp has the savvy to see that such seemingly insignificant tricks can work wonders.

Several of Supertramp's tunes move into the realm of extended suites along the order of "Sweet Judy Blue Eyes" the best of these being "Hide in Your Shell", and "Asylum".

Comparisons to established groups are somewhat unfair to Supertramp because they are really their own band.

Vocally, instrumentally, and in their excellent conceptual arrangements, Supertramp appears to have the formula for success. The strings phased in by Richard Hewson on this album belie the fact that this fine arranger has been virtually unheard since he conducted the string-orchestra-links on James Taylor's first Apple album.

With their deceptive name of Lynyrd Skynyrd perhaps fooling us Northern folks into thinking that this seven-member SwampRock outfit might be one dude, they have really blasted a hole in the Southern sound that was once the exclusive domain of the Allman Brothers Band.

Their complex guitar sound is based on a trio of leadmen, each identified by the "name"-guitar he happens to be picking on—they use a Stratocaster, a Les Paul and a Firebird, and surely that super-solo on "Sweet Home Alabama" is readily identified by the unmistakable Fender whine.

Comparisons with the Allman Brothers Band are indeed banded about when Skynyrd is discussed, but the similarity to the Doobie Brothers cannot be denied when the tight harmonies and SwampRock guitar tones are considered.

Produced by Al Kooper, the Skynyrd arrangements on Second Helping (MCA-413) utilize the brass of Bobby Keys and lead vocals from Ronnie Van Zant, but foremost in giving this group a distinctive style is the multiple-guitars solo gimmick. With the Doobies, Allmans, and now Lynyrd Skynyrd making big noises perhaps the South is considering rising again?

The promise of Gallagher & Lyle's first album has now reached a tuneful fruition with their current release Seeds (A&M Sp-3605).

This creative duo ranges over material which seems to be custom-made for Gilbert O'Sullivan or Paul McCartney. They are in the English music-hall tradition in the whimsical folkiness of their lyrics ("Cape Cod Houses", or "Randolph and Me"), but are capable of delivering a catchy love lament "Layna" or a paean to rural bliss "Country Morning".

Playing everything from a Martin 12-string steel dobro to a Harmony mandolin, Benny Gallagher and Graham Lyle are one of the classiest duets to emerge from the morass of group-dominated rock units since the demise of one-reigning Simon and Garfunkel.

Michael D'Abo comes across as an un-tinseled, subdued Elton John on his second A&M album Broken Rainbows (Sp-3634). With a strain of sadness pervading most of the ten compositions by pianist-composer-singer D'Abo, and a host of superb musicians sitting in, the combination produces a listenable, tight album.

Ex-Wings player Denny Seiwell presides at the drum kit on six of the ten tunes, with contributions coming from Mike Bloomfield's guitar on the title track, and from Graham Nash on harmonica and rhythm guitar. The inclusion of veteran quartet The Jordanaires, on vocal backings makes one wonder if D'Abo couldn't have more wisely utilized the harmonies which were so much a part of Elvis's initial success.

D'Abo's performance on keyboards has neither the spontaneity or expertise of a Billy Joel, but the moods he creates with "The Last Match" and "Hold On Sweet Darling" are consistent with the haunting promise of Broken Rainbows.

In a recording industry where new releases proliferate and flood the market with all the relentlessness of a Rod McKuen "poem", it remains a true delight to enlarge one's rock pantheon with a new member.

England's 10 cc with their second album Sheet Music (London AUKS 53107) come on with a collection of tunes which sound vocally like the Beach Boys with balls, while they play straight ahead driving rock a la Badfinger with the witty lyrics of the best of Ray Davies' Kinks.

Songs about a cool Sheik who's running Yorkshire girls, booze and other treats into the desert ("Oh Effendi"); the worst band in the world; and that new dance craze "The Sacro-Illic", are performed by 10 cc with an inventive wit that recalls nothing so much as the White Beatles album.

The four members of 10 cc interchange instruments (basically drums, bass, lead and rhythm guitars and keyboards) and trade off lead and backup vocals with a dexterity seldom duplicated in any but the most versatile combos.

Through skating, she is simply earning her living, no less so, certainly, than anyone else — not at what she makes in a year.

People over the age of consent say they would take their kids (if they have them) to see the show she is the star of, but they wouldn't go themselves. But precisely because she is such an insignificant person we do unresistingly accept all the hype the media work up.

interview with Robert O'Driscoll: "the Celts will arise at the U of T"

Robert O'Driscoll, author, editor, professor, director, producer, is a man of ideas and action.

Consequently, trying to focus on one particular facet of his life is like attempting to choose a single configuration in an ever-changing kaleidoscope. Pick one and you miss the beauty of another. Select again and you've neglected the intricacy of yet another.

Perhaps there is one quality which can be isolated in each pattern. Its subtlety almost precludes detection yet it seems to be the animating principle which underlies his actions and has coloured his success.

This quality is a curious blend of the rational and the intuitive, the material and the mystical. It manifests itself in O'Driscoll's drive and dedication.

O'Driscoll states the case far more eloquently. "I respond to the cry of the wind, to do what has to be done, to do whatever I do because I want to do it, because I believe. Not to follow one's calling, one's compulsion would mean being false to your marrow, your nature, your roots. Not following your calling deadens any joy in life."

We were talking in his cramped lived-in, book-lined office at St.

Mike's, his home base.

As witness to the success of O'Driscoll's personal dynamism and philosophical outlook there is much one can cite.

In 1967, he founded the Canadian Irish Studies Committee, which has attracted such luminaries as W.H. Auden, Buckminster Fuller and Marshall McLuhan to its conferences. The seminars were originally designed purely for the delectation of academics.

In 1970, however, O'Driscoll decided the conferences should be open to the public, sensing that an interest in Celtic Culture existed far and beyond the walls of the Ivory Tower. He was right. Attendance rose from forty to over two hundred and the response showed a desire for more. The seminar this year is being held in Winnipeg in late February.

Enter the Irish Arts Theatre, with (you guessed it) Robert O'Driscoll leading the way in the capacity of Artistic Director. This was not his first tango with the theatre, for as organizer of the Irish Theatre Society, active at the U of T between 1968 and 1971, he had produced the North American premieres of Beckett's Breath, Come and Go, and the Irish musical The Heart's a Wonder.

The success of the Irish Arts Theatre seemed assured, for O'Driscoll's ebullience and charm had worked its magic on the Irish greats, Siobhan McKenna, Jack MacGowran and Sean Kenney, each agreeing to channel their artistic talents into the creation of the new theatre.

The Irish Arts Theatre closed however after one season. Although hailed as an overwhelming artistic success, it proved a financial disaster.

There are still a great many unanswered questions relating to the death and burial of this theatre, and O'Driscoll had this to say, "Since I was involved in the artistic end of the production, it was necessary to relegate the responsibility of raising finances to other people. Whether they lacked the necessary passion or persuasion to do so, or whether Toronto just wasn't ready for another theatre, God only knows."

"The financial proceedings were incredibly complicated. Someday I'll write a novel about it all."

The tremendous mental and physical energy O'Driscoll had poured into the theatre, left him on the point of collapse. However that was 1972. The past.

His thoughts are now focused on the future; he has embarked upon his most ambitious project to date; the creation of an undergraduate Irish Studies Program at St. Michael's College.

This highly innovative course of studies should kindle great excitement among students and academics alike. At present only two universities outside of Ireland offer such a program.

As it is presently designed, the program is interdisciplinary in nature. It consists of twenty courses dealing in such areas as Modern Irish Drama, Celtic Archeology, Irish History, Celtic Folklore, and Modern Irish Language.

It is proposed that the program of studies rotate over a three year period, with some courses offered each year and others offered once every three years.

Those courses taught once every three years are to be given by leading authorities in the various fields, invited on a rotation basis to cover two full courses each semester. In this way students will have the opportunity during their undergraduate career, to study all fields of Irish Studies under the most distinguished authorities in the world.

O'Driscoll feels that the time is right for the introduction of this program.

President Evans has proposed that the distinction between college and university subjects be abolished and that the individual colleges be encouraged to implement complete academic programs — and unique "pedagogical situations" as well.

O'Driscoll thinks that this restructuring of the University at large will facilitate acceptance of his course.

"From between the massive shifting of the ice at the University, the Celts will arise."

Is the Irish course just another reflection of the influence of the Irish Mafia at St. Mike's? Perhaps. Or perhaps it just ties in accidentally with that particular university myth.

When asked to explain his fascination with the Irish Culture O'Driscoll said, "The Celtic tradition offers an alternative approach to Anglo-Saxon materialism. It contains the excitement of a new way of looking at the world. Our culture, (North American) tends to emphasize the material world as the only reality. We tend toward possessions and prayer for both are good investments in the future."

"The Celt however accepts the reality of life, while believing in a world outside of himself. Accepting that he is not complete in himself. He follows impulse, for certain forces beyond him motivate him to action. In

"But it won't last. I know it won't last. While it does, I enjoy it; it'll be something to tell my children and my grandchildren about."

"I am a stereotype." The problem may be that the media have latched onto the wrong stereotype.

Magnussen is no simp, impressions from the Shoppers' Drug Mart commercials to the contrary.

"It won't last," she says. You begin to see signs of what the full-grown man or woman will be like around the age of twenty-two, or twenty-three, when the bloom of youth is fading.

Signs of worry. Signs of fear. Signs of despair. Signs of ordinariness.

It's reassuring. It's reassuring to see that such a conventional girl, such a sweet prejudiced commensensical one, exists underneath all the sequined tawdriness of the Ice Capades.

One who is reconciled so contentedly, without cynicism, without bitterness, to her own ordinariness, to the gradual disappearing of potentialities.

Roberta Loughland, a seventeen-year-old American skater, is being heavily promoted this year as "The Ice Capades newest sweetheart". She's shy. She's insecure. She is seventeen. And in the souvenir program she is tagged with that fatal phrase, "she is also interested in acting."

Karen Magnussen (at 22) is cast in the role of the Older Hand, the Voice of Experience.

It suits her. Figure skating like all the other perennial novelty sports is a hot house that develops one skill alone of the individual to the neglect of his personality.

I see her in ten, fifteen years. In suburbia. There's a station wagon in the driveway. And in the living room she leans against a door frame watching the same cartoon show her children are stretched out watching.

Happy, able to be happy. She's certainly a heroine for a complacent, 9 to 5 world.

american surrealism today

The Ice Capades: a convention of female impersonators

Nothing about American culture is stranger than its passion to do — with a fanatical obsession for perfection — what no sane person would ever have thought of asking it to do.

Such is certainly the case with the Ice Capades.

Neither of us had been before. The first number — Origins 35 (the Ice Capades show is celebrating 35 years of operation) — was full of a pulsing Aztec splendor. Similarly fascinating, similarly alien.

Familiarity bred contempt; it all went downhill from there.

The show is probably the nearest most of us will ever come to the old-fashioned theatrical experience of "spotlights and spectacle."

Burlesque halls have the same sort of period charm but they are fast becoming extinct.

Vaudeville, pantomime, juggling, animal acts — all seem to have found their secure refuge in the Ice Capades alone.

But, then, if that is the case, you keep expecting a cane to come out of the wings and yank some of the acts off.

Albert Lucas, the 13-year-old juggler, was appalling.

The monkeys, trained by Lucien Meyer, were good. They jumped, they played tennis, they rode a bicycle — the usual — but all on ice and all with the greatest aplomb. But it makes you suspicious, if monkeys can do it that well, why any human would bother.

They can skate. But we are rarely presented with excellence as excellence. There is always some excuse for the skating, some peg, some obstruction to simple appreciation. Almost all of the numbers are cursed with a story line. They are saddled with out-of-date pop tunes.

Karen Magnussen is clearly given star treatment. She appears alone. She does not have to pretend to be a character. Her pieces are lyrical, are short.

She was the sentimental favourite. One only wished she could have been better than she in fact was.

The only truly thrilling moments came fortuitously. When the music and the skater were not in sync and in a moment of silence you heard his blades scraping the ice. Or when the skater was caught alone in a white spotlight in which he looked tawdry and vulnerable. Or when he had fallen — and you realized the sheer complexity of everything he was trying to do.

But the wizened little boy beside us cooed and cheered through the whole show.

Robert O'Driscoll: how does he find the time?

where the people remained untouched by the Anglo-Saxon influence and their tradition was protected. These writers used legend, saga, and myth as the material for their art. They found new rhythms in the poetry of the Celts and incorporated this also in their works.

This literature is the key to a great, buried tradition. The program offered will be designed in order that students can discover this tradition, where courses in the language, history, folklore, and sociology will provide the raw material for a greater appreciation."

At present the program is purely in the exploratory stages, although its outline and purposes have been submitted to the Committee on Academic Policy and Planning, a sub committee of the Academic Affairs committee.

For those students who feel frustrated with their inability to affect University policy or planning, here's your chance. The success or failure of this program to become a part of the University curriculum now depends on student interest. If there is sufficient response from the student body, the program might become a reality in 1976-77. If not, it may limp along endlessly in committee.

As we talked, O'Driscoll seemed confident that the students would react positively to the idea of the program. Yet he admitted that he had also considered the bleaker possibilities.

Then in a typically O'Driscollian manner, his eyes lit up, a smile washed over his face, and he stated, "Well the Celts have waited 2,000 years already, a few more won't make much difference."

What does O'Driscoll do in his spare time, you ask? What spare time? I ask. Besides lecturing full-time at St. Michael's College, he is also the editor of Yeats Studies.

These are a series of international journals dedicated to the work of W.B. Yeats, to publishing his manuscripts, drafts of poems plays and prose writings, unpublished letters and lectures and reprints of inaccessible published material.

O'Driscoll's fascination with Yeats is revealed in his enthusiasm for the man and his mind.

"What already has been published of Yeats is just the tip of the iceberg. We possess an extraordinary and fascinating wealth of material about the working of the human mind, in Yeats' as yet unpublished manuscripts. And above all it will be the mind of Yeats and the creative process that will interest people."

At present two journals have been published and three more are in the making.

It was strange but in speaking to Robert O'Driscoll for just a few brief hours, I got the feeling that I too had seen just the tip of the iceberg.

sugar and spice

It was a happening. It was the opening night, last Monday, of Sugar and Spice at the Royal Alex. The play ended. There was silence. And then a deep, loud prolonged "boo". Other people found their voices. "Garbage," one woman yelled. The subscription theatre-goers who had expected a Neil Simon comedy or, at worst a predictable tragedy, had been shocked out of a phoney liberalism. Sugar and Spice is an ugly play, a play that tells the story behind a mass murder, a play that explains in almost primal terms, the elements in a young girl's life that can add up to the committing of mindless slaughter, to the indifferent breaking of all social taboos. We should be thankful that Ed

Mirvish had the guts to bring this show here, and that the director, cast and crew had the guts to put it on. The script was written by Arthur Marx, (son of Groucho). He has produced a work that shocks, yes, but in order to purge, to cleanse, to purify. The script is strong. The actors have good solid lines and real characters to work with. And work they do. You will seldom see a cast do their jobs so well. Virginia Grey plays the harried mother, who has had to bring up her daughter, with no help from an alcoholic husband. She has remarried after her first husband's suicide. Grey has the physical presence that captivates an audience. She looks great, coming through the numerous costume changes with never a hair out of place. She plays the role of the mother with the balance of restraint, and quick temper, that is essential to making the background information of the plot entirely plausible. Jack Kelly, who plays the second husband, and step father is superb. He is so at home on the set, you believe he has never existed anywhere else. His Ken is the all-American rancher, trying to cope with the alien ideas thrust upon him by the return of his wife's daughter. His role is matched in believability by that of Bert Williams as Chad — or Big Cock, as Amanda, the daughter prefers to call him. Ah the daughter... It is her role that incensed the audience — the female half of the audience. It was they who were fuming at her open sexuality and amorality. The younger members of the audience — male and female — (of whom there were far, far too few) could identify with her easiness enough — to a limited extent. Mary Wilcox had the jitters until about half way through act one, until she entered nude behind a towel that was obviously too small. Wilcox then settled into the best role an actress could have, yet she never let the audience know what was really going on in her bleached blonde head. She had us all strung along as she sprouted the 'philosophy' of the Family. Again to help explain the repulsion of the audience — incest, gang bangs, coke, grass, Dildo Olympics all were thrown into their faces. If you thought Brando was terrific in Streetcar Named Desire, you won't believe Sal Mineo in this. He is like a finely cut diamond. Not a move gave us anything to suspect what was coming. Perhaps it was the ease with which he sucked in the characters and the audience that threw the viewers into the mad rage they were in by the finale. But when Mineo was on stage, you could hear a pin drop. You have to admire the talent, the effortless control, the amazing product that has so clearly resulted from months of concentrated work. The set and costumes fall in that same category. As the red velvet curtain rises, you see An American Home, from the eagle red white and blue wall paper in the kitchen to the pile of colored "serviettes". In the disastrous Royal Shakespeare Company production of As You Like It, a few weeks ago at the O'Keefe, the audience gradually and increasingly drifted away. At the Royal Alex, no one left. On a simplistic level, the voyeur was too strong in most of them. But their continued presence was also a tribute to the ability of the actors and production personnel. And not everyone boomed. Aside from the woman I heard say "Well, I'll have to wait until I read the papers tomorrow," there were people who did applaud, who did try to thank the cast, the crew and the producers for an excellent evening of theatre. The company did a second curtain for that small minority. I'm glad I was one of them.

comus at trinity: a success

The production of John Milton's Comus currently playing in Trinity College's Seeley Hall is both intelligent and imaginative. James Miller, the director, has understood the play in the fullness of its complexity as spectacle and as moral commentary and has neglected neither of these essential and complementary elements.

The difficulties involved in mounting a masque such as Comus can easily be underestimated.

Comus demands a combination of talents seldom found keeping company together in non-professional theatre — drama, music, song, dance and spectacle.

Like other masques, Comus is extravagant entertainment, a sort of seventeenth-century opera or musical comedy, whose essence lies in its magic, in the power of poetry, music and dance to enthrall the audience by beauty to goodness.

The effect is meant to be the overwhelming of the spirit and all the resources of art are focused in this noble endeavour.

The story is simple in plot, if not in implication. A young Lady, traveling through a dark wood with her two brothers, is separated from them and is led by Comus, the son of Circe and Bacchus, disguised as a helpful shepherd, to his bower.

There he makes a symbolic assault on her chastity, offering her his glass and his philosophy, both of which she rejects.

The brothers, led by the Attendant Spirit sent as protector from the heavens, are able to frighten Comus away. The Lady, however, remains imprisoned in Comus' chair and only Sabrina, herself once an attempted virgin, can release the Lady.

This is the stuff of fairy story or of folk tale and the effectiveness of Comus is in its making real and present the mysterious force of this cosmic logic.

Seeley Hall provides an almost perfect setting for this drama of aristocratic compliment and instruction — and for the splendid costumes, ranging in design from the realistically attired brothers to the breath-taking charm of Sabrina.

The most ingenious are the animal costumes, and especially the animal masks, worn by Comus' crew, and made by the director himself.

The music, which plays such a large part in the masque both in its delight and as a sensible embodiment of the harmony of virtue, is well conducted by John Derksen. The singers all carry off their song with assurance, although only Sabrina (Mary Hay) brings true conviction to the words.

The poetry, and it is some of the most ravishing poetry John Milton ever wrote, is spoken with understanding by most of the actors. John Cartwright plays an exceptionally winning Comus to Anne McWhir's timid Lady and their first encounter is one of the highlights of the evening. The Second Brother (Richard Lawrence) shows convincing fraternal anxiety at his sister's disappearance.

At times the characterizations of the actors are lost in their attempt to put across the sense of the poetry. But it all clicks together often enough to make the characters believable.

not that fantastic

One thing all musicals have in common is their size: hundreds of people dancing unison and singing as one. The success of the musical lies in what Pauline Kael calls "its primitive appeal". The bigness over-awes you.

The Fantastiks by Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt breaks this rule. It is a musical trimmed to the bone. The stage is bare. The setting is "September" and a garden.

The plot, too, is acard-board story-line: Boy meets girl, Fathers protest, arrangements are made, Boy and Girl break up, B and G are back together, End. No character development necessary; we've seen it all before so many times.

Andrew Cluff, director of the St. Michael's College production at the Upper Brennan Theatre, seems to have realized this but rather than do all he can to liven the play up, has merely submitted and presented a panorama of songs and jokes, more like a vaudeville than a musical. There's one problem with that: The Fantastiks is a musical, not a vaudeville. The only way the songs and jokes have any punch is if you feel for the characters. And we don't do that in this production.

There are, however, some first class performances. Blake Heathcot is great as the mute.

One feels that Cluff has built the whole play around him. His emotionless face and fluid gestures create all that the set leaves out.

Paul Wintemute is a fine singer, and rather funny as El Gallo although his raised-left-eyebrow-closed-right-eye bit becomes somewhat predictable by the middle of Act II.

Ginny Hayes also has a nice voice, she smiles, she plays with her dress and, when called upon to do so, she can dance a few steps. But she can't act. Pat Milloy, on the other hand, can't sing, but he can act. Actually, his half-singing, half-talking didn't bother me as much as it did a lot of people. It reminds me a little of Rex Harrison.

The part of Henry is made to steal the show and Craig Howes doesn't let the role down. I'm not certain Henry is meant to be that old or that dirty, but he is funny.

The Fantastiks is very entertaining, especially at the price (free). The songs are memorable (I defy anyone to leave the theatre without singing, humming or whistling "Try to Remember") and the jokes, sight and line, are funny. But, I'm sorry, Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt, I like my musicals with a little more meat on them.

"Truth and fantasy," the first song performed by the Perth County Conspiracy in concert Friday night at Massey Hall, summed up the atmosphere of the show.

Shakespeare would have loved it as there were plays within plays and many different levels of reality. There was a particular setting for instance, different than most other concerts I have attended. The young audience in overalls, floppy hats and shawls knew each other and in many cases the band as well so there was a sense of quiet intimacy and community rather than the hyped-up tension of most performances.

Massey Hall became a large living room and this feeling was reinforced by the cries of several babies and the warm-up act of a small, laughing child riding a wooden rocking horse on stage.

The show was a reunion for the members of the group as well as for performers and audience.

The band had been split into two sections which have been touring the Eastern and Western parts of Canada.

There were four main elements in the show on Friday, each with its own image and emphasis. The Spiral band, the Western portion, were long-haired, easy-going and their music had a wood-smoked country flavour; Hummingbird played music more closely akin to traditional folk, highlighted by their lead singer Terry's voice which lowed through the songs like a summer stream.

Cedric Smith juxtaposed anger against the contentment expressed by the others, counterpointed rural innocence with urban satire and politics.

And finally the company's resident mime artist entertained the audience and added a visual layer of meaning to most of the songs performed.

Though the groups' life style and music have affinities with such mythic figures of American culture as Ken Kesey, the Merry Pranksters and the Grateful Dead, their themes of ecology, equality and the return to the land have a specifically Canadian resonance and application. Strikingly familiar perceptions such as the endlessness of travelling through Ontario by car, the pomposity of Hockey Night in Canada and the importance of farmers to our way of life add up to a personal vision of present Canadian life which is powerfully and excitingly communicated.

Their performance is unique in its scope and is closely akin to the Renaissance theatre company in which all members of the troupe do several things well. Many techniques such as mime, dance, poetry, history, satire and autobiography are used to give life to a particular theme or vision.

The show ended in an outburst of joy that made me believe Canadian angels would certainly play fiddles rather than harps.

There was singing and dancing in the aisles and contentment and exhaustion were mirrored in most faces in the audience. They had been entertained and what is more important recognized both in personal and nationalistic terms. In a sense Perth County plays a similar role for English Canada to that of the French chansonniers of Quebec: they give us a frame of reference and identity which we would otherwise lack.

Buy PE for the reasons you'd buy a Porsche.

You don't buy a Porsche to have something for getting from point A to point B.

Neither do you get a PE if all you want is something to play your records on.

Both are precision engineered in Germany to do more than their simpler cousins.

In PE's case that means a quiet, precise motor and a heavy platter.

A single-play spindle that turns with the platter to prevent centre-hole binding.

And speeds which you can vary ever so slightly, if you please, to make the record's pitch match more closely the live instrument's.

Another thing. A Porsche is all the more desirable because roads aren't all perfectly flat.

Likewise, a PE because no record is perfectly flat.

No matter how the record undulates, PE keeps the stylus in the groove.

We could go on about tracking geometry and pressure, suspension, anti-skating and such, but you just bring in a record that's far from perfect and see for yourself.

And what about safety features?

Nearly everyone offers viscous-damped cueing, but not everybody's is damped in both upward and downward directions. PE's is.

And who else aside from PE has a fail-safe system which prevents the tonearm from descending on the platter unless there's a record on it?

Eventually these may become standard like seat belts, but at the moment...

The price? From not quite what you'd expect to what you'd expect. $109.00 to $199.50.

But of course, you're not going to get sold on any piece of engineering excellence just reading about it.

Come in for a spin. It's how Porsches and PE's are sold. PE

art country watercolor

Anderson's watercolor, Michael's Farm, 30" by 40"

Every gallery needs one of them — an artist everyone can understand.

And in the case of the Merton Gallery, that's Robert J. Anderson.

His show of watercolors reflects the love he has for rural Ontario, especially around the Thunder Bay Area.

A habitual watcher of sun rises and sunsets ("After all there are 480 of them a year"), Anderson captures the delicate range of colors in a bleak country sky.

All of the works depict early spring, or late fall. "Everything is so covered during the other two seasons. I prefer the clean lines of the naked trees."

A member of the High Realist school, Anderson contrasts the horizon, one thin, continuous line, with dense textures, where every blade of grass, every minute branch, is given a weight and place.

In contrast to both these techniques, in two of the watercolors, the thawing fields are painted with swirls of rich brown.

The sea and ships are also subjects of Anderson's. A special favourite of mine is Fog, a large work, mainly white, with the barest outline of a ship.

Anderson has his Fine Arts degree from the Minneapolis School of Art, and has travelled extensively in Canada, the US, England and Europe. His works can be found in Canadian Government collections, and in private collections in Canada, the US and Europe.

This is the first year Anderson has spent in full time painting. Judging by the number of red dots placed discreetly in the lower right hand corner of the paintings when we arrived, it seems he will be painting full time from now on. Janet Clarke

lacombe, lucien

Lacombe, Lucien is Louis Malle's study of a sullen collaborationist in wartime France. It is the kind of film that makes skeptical people reassess their opinion of film; they will agree that this, at least, is a work of art. Louis Malle is indisputably an artist, and Lacombe, Lucien is a very good film, but I'm afraid that under the ponderous burden of "significance" that people insist on freighting it with, the slender, laconic film will snap.

Lucien Lacombe is a young man of the class and background which honors names only in their alphabetical inversion; introduced to a young girl he'll eventually take as his lover, he produces his name as if by bureaucratic record—Lacombe, Lucien. A natural response for a lad who has grown up on a farm near a town where everyone knows everyone else from birth to death, and surnames appear only on attendance rolls in the village school.

But the inversion of the name has resonance; Lucien seems an anachronism, a throwback to times when names had peculiarly potent qualities, and must be disguised by their bearers if they are to keep from becoming vulnerable.

Lucien Lacombe is one of the most uncomplicated and terrifying characters ever put on the screen.

As a peasant farmboy, he is no worse than most except for a rather too furtive glee in shooting down rabbits or decapitating chickens, a glee that Malle establishes in the film's first shot, when Lucien, enjoying his stealth, slays with his slingshot a bright bird that was warbling on a bough outside the hospital where Lucien scrubs floors.

He is a dim-witted hulk whose face, unwarmed by the slightest flicker of wit or subtlety, clings in suty lumps to his bones as if congealed there.

The only time his features move from their pendulous repose is when Lucien feels thwarted, as he often does. Then his brows furrow in sluggish incomprehension and his eyes narrow like slits in old battlements through which rifle barrels poke. Lucien can only begrudge.

He is a brutish solipsist, a chronically unhappy creature with instincts to crush everything that seems to gainsay his own puny vision of life and his own importance in it.

It would be reassuring to say that the portrait of Lucien is a virtuoso piece of acting.

It isn't, because Pierre Blaise is not an actor.

He is a farmboy whom Malle chose from candidates advertised for in provincial papers. Blaise comes by his flesh and features naturally, and from the few statements the press was able to extract from him, it appears that Lucien is not too foreign a fellow to Blaise.

I don't mean to imply that Blaise is pro-Nazi or a sadistic thug, but that he probably could be, given another upheaval like the occupation.

So could many others, from other classes and urban backgrounds.

Malle's study is not of "evil" in any simple sense, certainly not the evil villainy of conventional melodrama. It is rather a study of an inchoate morality, thickly interlarded with self-survival, that cannot make discriminations between right and wrong.

At the end of the film, Lucien lives off the land, a hunted man. He manages with deftness and imagination, setting traps for small animals and scavenging naturally. It's wrong, I think, to see him as happy because he's finally away from his job as a bully and torturer for the Gestapo; he's happy because he's in his metier, a pre-civilized world where human interaction is rare and the simple machine of his mind is not set to tasks beyond its grasp.

If this has been more a profile of Lucien than a review of the film, it is because Lucien is the film's riveting triumph. The story Lucien stars in is almost an afterthought.

Pauline Kael, in a rather too perceptive essay on this film, says that Lucien could have been set in an almost any time or place, but that it is right for a French artist to place him where he did.

Naturally, perhaps; right, I don't know.

The problems of resistance and collaboration are intricate ones; Marcel Ophul's great documentary The Sorrow and the Pity showed how vast the range of motivations was, and how easy it is to cultivate an appreciation of the occupation through hindsight.

Lacombe, Lucien, shows one explanation of one man's behavior; it has the spaciousness and ambiguity of the general, yes, but fails in the specific context of the Second World War. A work of art as spare as this cannot enhance our understanding of the major cataclysm of the last two centuries. In fact, it may even blunt it; there is talk of Lacombe, Lucien, being narrowly a study of "fascism".

Malle's point surely was that Lucien could as easily have been a torturer for the resistance. Malle might have made a more interesting and courageous work of politics, if not a finer work of art, if he had made him so.

My God, they've even rolled out a red carpet! A red carpet in front of the tacky 99c Roxy? And there's a doorman in tails and top hat. All this late Saturday night on dullsville Danforth.

What's happening? The carpet, the lights, the waves of excitement are heralding the Canadian premiere of that now-legendary American underground classic movie, Pink Flamingos. Isn't it supposed to be the most disgusting movie ever? We'll soon see. Rumours zoom up and down the enormous queue of hardy souls waiting for the midnight premiere. Clyde Gilmour is coming! Yup, and he's gonna be nude, some wit adds. Is Divine herself going to attend? That would be the ultimate.

Divine, for the unhip, is the obese transvestite star of Pink Flamingos. The film is advertised as an exercise in poor taste! Everyone just hopes it will live up to those promises. Christ! In New York, theatres showing Pink Flamingos give free vomit bags to everybody. It saves the custodial staff a lot of headache.

Pink Flamingos is a sick, nasty, gross, indecent, revolting movie made by John Waters for Saliva Films. Is Toronto ready for it? The word has spread and hundreds have found their way to the Roxy for the premiere.

Those holding advance tickets to Pink Flamingos are the luckiest people in town tonight. Indeed, the demand is so overwhelming that the Roxy management quickly orders a 2 am screening following the premiere.

What exactly is Pink Flamingos?

It goes something like this. The stupendous Divine holds the title 'The Filthiest Person Alive' Harassed by the press and an adoring public she seeks anonymity in a house trailer in a Maryland backwater.

Here Divine lives in peace with her mother Edy, son Cracker and female companion Cotton.

Edy is a fat creature in dirty underwear who whimpers for eggs from her crib.

Crackjer is a sexual experimentalist and Cotton, a Harlow type, is a voyeur who watches Cracker.

most disgusting movie ever?

The title of the film refers to the pink flamingo statuettes that adorn Divine's yard.

The action in Pink Flamingos revolves around a feud that rages over the title Divine holds.

She believes that no one knows where she is since she is living incognito under the assumed name of 'Babs Johnson.'

But in the city her tormentors plot her overthrow. Raymond and Connie Marble claim to be the filthiest people alive. She's an officious type, hair dyed a shocking red, modeled after the Joan Crawford-Loretta Young image and a paragon of gracious phoniness. He's a mouse.

For a livelihood they abduct young girls, chain them in the basement and have their virile butler impregnate them. The girls are allowed to die in childbirth while the babies are sold to lesbian couples.

This anti-social couple are out to get Divine.

They douse her trailer with gas and set it on fire while she and Cracker are putting their mark on the Marble abode and indulging in a bit of incest. They free the girls in the basement who proceed to castrate the unlucky butler.

Divine finally gets back at the usurping Marbles. She captures them and puts them on trial, witnessed by representatives from America's sleazy tabloid press. Divine delivers her verdict, the Marbles are found guilty of "assholism" and executed.

Actually the film is quite good. Pink Flamingos is a caustic and vicious send-up of American culture.

Water's method is to take American society to its ultimate conclusion; the sick, grotesque humour, the loathsome vision of America add up to a harsh satire.

There's no question of subtlety, no finesse — Waters shocks us into reactions. The targets run the gamut, motherhood, justice, the home, old age, and the rest.

Unfortunately the film's sensational elements have made it the centre of a youth cult and it attracts audiences only concerned with getting zapped by it. But the usually vociferous Roxy crowd, who came to be grossed out, were surprisingly restrained during most of the film.

Unfortunately the Ontario film censor has had his nasty little hands on Pink Flamingos and clipped away two of the movie's best-known scenes. In one of them Cracker has intercourse with a girl while a beheaded chicken between them spurts blood. In the other significant scene a fellow entertains the guests at Divine's birthday party with his talent: a "dancing asshole."

The censor has rendered the film jerky and confusing in parts.

The logic for the censorship is difficult to comprehend. The raison d'être of Pink Flamingos is to shock and revolt, you either accept it or you don't, but you don't eunuchize it.

As Pink Flamingos moved along I had the unpleasant feeling that possible the censor had trimmed the most famous scene in the movie. The scene that put it on the map, so to speak. But no, the day was saved, at the very end of Pink Flamingos there it was, in complete living-colour glory.

After their feud, Divine and her entourage have decided to set off for greener pastures (Boise, Idaho) and as they make their way along the street Divine spots a little dog. She gets terribly excited, rolls her eyes and shakes her hips expectantly. The miniature poodle stops on the sidewalk and shifts Divine swoops down and scraps it up and plops it into her mouth. She squishes the shit sexily between her teeth and lets a little drip down her cheek, all the time batting her eyelashes and smiling invitingly at us. All the while that Patti Page hit, "How Much is That Doggie in the Window?" plays.

According to director John Waters it was the most difficult scene in Pink Flamingos to film... they followed the dog around for two days but the presence of the camera crew inhibited it from performing so Waters applied an enema to the dog so it could deliver.

Pink Flamingos is certainly the filthiest movie around. Absolutely stomach turning!

books

This Christmas season's issue of Books for Everyone has arrived on my desk.

Books for Everyone is the "showcase" collection of new publications, popular best sellers, and reference books prepared for booksellers by Quill and Quire, the Canadian book trade monthly.

It's distributed free by bookstores to help you with your Christmas shopping. And no doubt it will be available soon at the U of T Bookroom.

Also on my desk is an appeal for contributions to an anthology based upon people's personal experiences as "mental patients" in any psychiatric facility in Canada. The anthology is the project of Voice, a recently established Toronto writing group composed entirely of former psychiatric inmates who've done time in Canada's psychiatric jails.

The group already has an editor for the book, they will soon have a publisher, and they plan to get the book out in about a year.

But they need more material — articles, essays, political pieces, diary excerpts, letters, poems, etc., especially from women.

The Toronto contact is Don Wietz, 86 Madison Avenue.

Alan Fleming is the chief designer at the University of Toronto Press. He has garnered a good deal of praise in the past for the various books and logos he has designed. More recently, in this year's "Look of Books" competition, organized by Design Canada, one book he designed, Canada, a coffee table collection of photos, won the $1500 first prize.

Fleming has also recently been written up in the Financial Post — no less. The article, in the October issue of Impetus, (in the 19 October issue of FP — we're a bit late with this — sorry about that), is entitled "The rationalizing of Alan Fleming's wardrobe."

No less. It's a before and after story. Before and after he accepts advice from Ian Provan, "the second generation of his family to operate Ed Provan Ltd., long-established and high-quality Toronto men's clothiers." There are pictures — in which Fleming looks suitably sheepish. (And if you want my opinion, Fleming looks better before; he looks too co-ordinated after.)

photoart

Toronto has a new photographic gallery which is good news as the Baldwin Street Gallery is temporarily without a home due to an eviction notice. It's The Lobby Gallery and it can be found at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, 390 Dupont Street.

The gallery's first showing is by Lawrence Wiessmann who worked last summer in the Yukon on a Canada Council grant. He is formerly artist in residence at Trent University.

The Ryerson Gallery, 122 Bond Street, is hosting the only other current show. It's a collection of recent photographs by Barbara Astman.

Life Magazine has just issued a special edition entitled A Day in the Life of America. On September 5th 1974 they sent out 100 top photographers to record just what the title implies. It is well worth the $1.50 purchase price, if you're interested in good documentary photography. bp

dance

If you saw any of the Russian ballet films mentioned last week, you are more clever than I. After 45 frustrating minutes talking to every extension of the Globe and Mail, where the ad that I saw originally appeared and the TD Centre where the films were to appear I gave up. Anyone out there know what happened to them?

On Nov. 23 and from the 25th to the 28th, the Junior Women's Committee of the National Ballet is presenting a student program on the history of the dance at the Town Hall. The show is at two in the afternoon; tickets, a mere $1.75.

"A communion of the arts" is under way at the Art Gallery of Ontario. Camerata, the chamber music ensemble, and David Earle of the Toronto Dance Theatre, have resurrected the ancient Greek conception of "lyric theatre" by combining their talents, and their respective art forms. You've missed the first attempt, but look forward to Dec. 12 when Adrian Pecknold of the Canadian Mime Theatre, and TDT composer Ann Southam join Earle and Camerata.

Wednesday night it's a toss up — square dancing at Enoch Turner Schoolhouse, and The Ecstasy of Rita Joe. CBC at 9 pm.

Paul Gaulin and his compagnie de mime continue to perform nightly at the Poor Alex until Dec. 1.

I want to let you in on something. When these weekly listings end before they indeed get to what's on (as mine did last week), or when a review seems to just stop abruptly, or lamely, chances are it was chopped at the plant. This happens a lot. So our apologies to anyone inconvenienced or perplexed.

If it's a comfort, imagine how we feel when we pick up the paper. I finally got to Harry and Tonto which I recommend. True, Art Carney is not a real actor (he is a Jack Lemmon actor) and his elderly character would have benefited from the subtle touches of senility that a true actor would have employed. The lines are in the script but Carney (or director Muzursky) knew they were risky so he stuck with whimsey, a safer tack.

Mazursky, for all his movies, is still a bit of an amateur and the structural bones stick out all over. But it is a good structure and a fresh idea — a seventy-year-old's move from New York to California — and the script is quite sharp, and funny too, a good deal of the time. The treatment is sensitive, bordering on the reverential, but that too is more refreshing than bothersome. And I liked it a lot.

At the Odeon Hyland a little while longer. $3.

Add to the list of repertory programmes the new, massive Ontario Art Gallery's. Love stories every weekend (Wuthering Heloghts this Saturday, and Malle's 1958 The Lovers on Sunday) and Kenneth Clark's Romantic Rebellion series everyday at noon, one segment a week. Also A Space (the gallery at 85 St. Nicholas St.) has programmes of film art — as opposed to movies. Call 964-3627.

Two of last year's best are at the Kensington this weekend, Robert Altman's The Long Goodbye and Thieves Like Us. The one is sort of a private-eye comedy and the other is I guess a romance, but what they really are is Altman movies, and vintage ones. For some reason neither caught the public's or most critics' fancy, but I don't know why they didn't. I trust four people's judgement on such matters and we all agreed they were great.

In brief: The Revue finishes off Bunuel this week with Diary of a Chambermaid, The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie, The Milky Way and Tristana. Sunday at St. Mike's it's pre-dogmatism Goddard: One or Two Things I Know About Her. Monday, Jacques Tati's Playtime at Ontario College of Art and, at the Roxy, M.A.S.H. and Patton. Still at the Roxy, Tuesday and Wednesday, The Day of The Jackal and Slaughterhouse Five, neither of which were great but both of which were superior. And, Thursday at the Learning Resources Centre, ne Forest Hill library, Eisentein's best, Alexander Nevsky, with a terrific score by Prokofiev. Free.

And Fremen's Ball and The Projectionist are double-billed at the same night that Wee

On Campus: At Hart House, an all-student group confronts the intricacies of John Ford's 'Tis Pity She's a Whore. November 14-23. Tuesdays through Saturdays at 8.30. Students seats are $1.50, others $3.

Across Hoskins Avenue in Trinity's Seeley Hall, Comus continues his authentic nightly rout tonight and tomorrow at 8 pm. Tickets are $1 for students, $1.50 rest of the world.

Off-Campus: Far and away the most interesting opening this week will be St. Nicholas Hotel, the second of Reaney's Donnelly series at the Farragon. Reaney's symbol be-sprinkled slices of Ontario life may not be exactly to your taste, but Part One of the series was given a stylish and energetic performance last year by substantially the same cast. Run begins November 16. (Sundays are pay what you can, by the way.)

You may remember Carol Bolt's Red Emma from last year. Her new play, Shelter, opens at the Firehall on November 21. Note that on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays students can get tickets for $2.

Other openings: Jackie Croslander's Honey at Global Village (November 20). Sugar and Spice at the Royal Alex proves that Manson makes marketing sense. Hurry while stocks last. (Till November 30.) Two shows you ought to try and take in before they close are Wu Feng at the St. Lawrence (closes November 16) and Billy the Mid at the Free Theatre (closes December 1).

That should keep you out of the library for another week.

rock

Progressive jazz under the leadership of superb guitarist Larry Coryell is featured Sunday night at Con Hall. Coryell, with his band the Eleventh House, along with Toronto's fine jazz-rock group, Audiomaster, will be doing only one show for which tickets are still available from the SAC office for $4.

Monday the 18th, will be quite the night for those fortunate enough to have tickets for Elton John. From all reports so far from the tour, it will be some show. But don't buy tickets from scalpers! It would give Bill Ballard the deserving message he needs if a great number of seats were left empty. That line about not limiting the number of tickets per person was pure and unadulterated excrement. He put tickets on sale 44 days before the show, and there was no way the show wouldn't have sold out in that time if he'd limited tickets to four per person. I think he sells them this way just so he can gloat over watching hundreds of young kids sleeping on the sidewalk in the cold.

Perth County Conspiracy is at Con Hall on Monday as well. 7:30 pm. Tickets are $2.00!

Wednesday the 20th marks the return to Massey Hall of Billy Joel, who is presently trying to play up his new, and not so impressive, album, "Streetlight Serenade." Judging from his last appearance here in May, the show could nevertheless be a good one.

Bill Cosby, noted comedian and part time PhD student will also be at Massey Hall on the 21st.

Up in the North end at Minkler Auditorium (Seneca College) Gary Burton, the finest vibes player in jazz today, will be performing his mallet magic on Nov. 27.

On the 29th Renaissance will be back at Con Hall for another SAC-SRO special.

Early in December, you'll find Donovan at Massey Hall on the 2nd, George Harrison and entourage at the Gardens on the 6th and Manfred Mann at Con Hall on the 12th.

There's also some notable action at the various clubs around town this weekend. At the El Mocambo there's the new Downchild Blues Band. Bobby Blue Bland is at the Colonial and his good friend and blues superstar B.B. King is pouring it out at the Beverley Hills Hotel.

For folkies, you'll find Jim Eves at Egerton's, Mimi Farina at the Riverboat, and Buzzy Lindhart at the Chimney. (Stringband will open there there on Monday.)

classical

Is the hammer coming down on you, too? Essays and whatnot? When the going gets too tough you can always cop out with some diverting entertainment, like ...

The New Chamber Orchestra of Canada is back for another in their popular series at Hart House this Sunday night at 8:30. It's a rather difficult task to get tickets, but the effort is usually worth it for this enthusiastic and talented bunch. Sunday's program is all-Haydn, something we don't get to hear too often, with two early symphonies and a concerto for violin, cembalo and strings.

Next Wednesday night at Yorkminster Park Baptist Church (Yonge & Heath) the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir, the Festival Singers and the excellent Canadian Brass ensemble come together for an evening of choralmusic, including a world premiere of John Paynter's "God's Grandeur". Tickets $5, 8:30 pm.

art

This month's Esquire has a special section entitled "Art and Money" which indicates to just what extent these days beauty is dollars, dollars beauty.

In a way that is both alarming and absurd, the articles show the inescapable effects of marketing and speculation on the art scene.

The elaborate account of the Rothko trial given is striking in this respect. When this celebrated artist committed suicide in 1970 his oils were selling for $50,000. But aside from the talent that he obviously possessed, Mark Rothko's commercial success was cleverly engineered by several dealers, notably the founder of the Marlborough galleries, Frank Lloyd.

A friend of the artist considers that his confusion and unhappiness were bound up in his insecurity about his overnight success. "I always figured that when his art became a commodity, that was what made him uncertain. He didn't know whether people wanted his paintings because they were good or because they were Rothkos."

Tomorrow is the last chance you have to catch the infamous Chinese Exhibition. All kidding aside, the ceramic pieces especially should not be missed. The skill of the Chinese potters — 3000 years ago — is enviable. Their dedication to their art brought it to a perfection that, technically, has never been rivaled.

There is the story they tell about the Chinese potter who opened his kiln one day to find that all of the pieces save one had fired in the regular pastel shades. This pot alone was a brilliant red.

Unbeknownst to the potter, his cat had fallen into the kiln. The right chemical formula to reproduce the red glaze had not yet been discovered. The potter toiled many years to discover that formula — without success.

Finally, one day, in mounting desperation, the potter fired his kiln to the highest temperature possible. Still no success.

The potter opened the door and threw himself into the kiln. All of the pots turned a brilliant red. gm

Ladies' hockey Blues open season on thin ice

By SANDRA NORITIS
After a perfect record of wins entering the OWIAA ice hockey finals last season, the Ladies' Blues decided to open the current season as 'ladies', offering the other team a generous shutout.
At the York Invitational Tournament last weekend they gave Queen's a 6-0 steal. The Blues were robbed by Queen's goalie with a record of 21 shots on goal.

Displaying excellent but tame, disciplined form, they were pushed against the boards by aggressive Queen's offence. Margi Goldsmith was awarded third star for outstanding performance during the game.
Allison McGeen and Betty Cook scored a goal each against York with 2 goals by Ange Colm and a big three by Lynda Harley. This gave them a roaring 7-1 victory over York. Colm and Harley put away two goals each with one by Cathy Stead to win a 5-0 shutout against Western, taking away the consolation victory of the tournament.

Blues' goalies Louise Attallah and Judy Reeves were in top form throughout the tournament.
In the opening game of the league, the Blues receded back into a slow, disorganized game to give McMaster their undeserved 9-0 win.

Despite this tenuous opening, it is obvious that the Women's Blues have a team of excellent individual players with complementary skills. Having suffered their losses now at the opening of the season and with some reorganization, the Blues can look forward to another series of victories through the finals to a championship.

This Friday the team travels to Queen's and then goes on to York next Thursday.

Interfac volleyball roundup

By TOM WOODS
As the men's interfac volleyball loop nears its halfway point, Grads, Erindale and Engineering are fighting it out for the lead in Division

I, while no fewer than six teams remain in contention in each group of Division II.
This week's action in the top flight saw the Eng team fall for the second time to a powerful squad from SGS.

As in their first encounter, the Grads dominated offensively and the Plumbers had difficulty on serve reception.

George Zarjac and Keith Doan put several balls away early in the first game, leading the old boys to an easy 15-8 win.
In the second game, the Grads jumped out front quickly to a 14-3 lead, slackened off as Skule came back to 14-12, and finally closed the door, winning 15-12.
In the other action, Erindale dumped Scarborough 15-11, 15-13 with Ihor Lotocky making a remarkable comeback after a broken ankle, though his efforts were in vain.
Scarborough now stands at 1-3 — a surprising record in view of their convincing victory last year in the Victoria Staff Trophy.

Four of the seven squads will qualify for the post-season play, (a double elimination affair) so it appears the eastenders will have to pull up their socks if they hope to come close to last year's showing.
The only other match in Division I play this week saw St. Mike's dispose of Knox in two quick games, 15-5 and 15-5.

Knox, 0-6, obviously miss the services of Bill Paterson, the dominant force in past Knox squads, now leading a strong Engineering III team in Division II.
Division II play will continue after Christmas until each team has played 9 matches.
All squads with 5 wins will qualify for the playoffs.

Hockey Blues face Ottawa tonight

By DAVE STUART

The hockey Blues face their toughest opposition so far this year at the arena tonight at 8:00 pm when Ottawa comes visiting.

Ottawa is given this distinction on the basis that they tied the York Yeoman 4-4 earlier in the season. York are usually a strong contender with only the Blues ahead of them in the standings.

The feeling is then that either York blew the game or the Ottawa team has a little more to offer this year.

In any case the game tonight should be a competitive one for the Blues and should provide lots of excitement for the fans.

Toronto-RMC displays superb team cooperation as they help their goalie search for a yellow easter egg. Seriously now, RMC was displaying their deployment in their newly developed box play. Next time they should let their goalie in on the secret.

Run for fun final staged yesterday

The Varsity — Brian Pei

By RICK CORNACCHIA

The run for fun group ended their season yesterday by giving the Brotherton Trophy, emblematic of interfac cross country championship to the team from Victoria College. The individual winner was Bruce Kidd from the PHE staff team.

The Vic team led the way with 50 points followed by Forestry with 122. Knox team led the way with 50 points followed by Forestry with 122. Knox and the Runts (a make up team of 2 girls and 3 men) tied for third with 160 points.

Kidd's winning time was 10:13. In general the aims of the run for fun program, to improve the overall fitness of the university community, was a success. One girl, Robin Henry, improved her time from the start of the year by five minutes over the course of the season's running.

The program will be run again next year hopefully with a large increase in the number of runners.

Badminton win at York

The Varsity men's badminton team participated in the York Invitational Badminton Tournament last weekend and came out on top as overall champions.

Individually, Tom Muir captured the first singles while Bob Hinchcliffe took the second singles. Lane Bishop and Bob Young were runners-up in the doubles.

Other players on the team are Faulkner, Mills, Ooi, Bingei, Budiman, Pafel, and Kushliik.

Lady Blues face Ottawa

By FERN BRAND

Conditioning seems to be the factor when IPA a city league, downed Toronto by a close score of 29-26. The first half was a slow game and slow passing around the key to Toronto.

Toronto had some difficulty up against a man-to-man defense.

The Lady Blue's game picked up in the second half with good passes and a faster play.

Unfortunately it was too late and the Lady Blues lost a close game.

Top scorers from Toronto included Donna Walker, Chang Tsai and Sharon Kosmachuk.

Top scorers from IPA were Spence, Goldup and Daily.

Great outhouse race - college bowl

By DAVE STUART

Want to win $250 and have a good time to boot?

Then enter the Great Outhouse Race to be staged at half time during the College Bowl game at the CNE Friday, Nov. 22 at 8:00 pm.

Under the glare of the CNE floodlights, the cream of the outhouse racers from Canadian universities will compete against the timers' stop watches.

The prizes are $250 in cash, free passes to the big drunk at Ontario Place after the game, and the ultimate glory, the winning team's name in the Guinness Book of World Records.

To enter, or for further information contact John Hough at 491-8545 (home) or 443-3010 (business).

If you don't enter the race why don't you go to the game anyway. The chances are good that the Blues will be representing the east for the Vanier Cup. The Blues are only one win away (the Atlantic Bowl against the St. Mary's Huskeys) from the big game.

Tickets for the College Bowl are on sale at the Engineering Stores, SAC Office, and Hart House ticket office.

Intermediate hockey hordes hit the ice

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Every year in late October, the ferocious Miss Boyd gleefully unleashes a horde of lusty ruffians, hereinafter known as the men's intermediate hockey league.

Here is a complete record of the carnage, destruction and annihilation these hordes have wreaked on each other since the opening game at 11 pm Oct. 29. (Please keep it out of the sight of young children whose moral values are yet unhardened).

People have right to know: Seeley

By MARINA STRAUSS

"Hurt and tired" by rejections for professorship posts at both U of T and OISE, Canadian top sociologist John Seeley said last night the rejections should be investigated to reveal the true nature of university administrations.

Seeley, who has been turned down by top administrators at OISE despite faculty and students' choice to hire him said last night in a telephone interview from California, where he now teaches:

"The real issue in Toronto which administrators fear is just by being there, I would tip the balance of power towards students and away from the old power holders."

Noting he has supported many controversial issues on campuses, Seeley said:

"Administrators should at least tell the truth and not use power to settle problems. These are liberal, not radical solutions to campus issues I propose."

Seeley noted that two years ago, when U of T sociology department chairman Irving Zeitlin voluntarily offered him a professorship in the Department, Seeley was eager to come to Toronto.

But, Seeley added, the emotional strain of the past two years has been "hard psychologically on my family." He could not guarantee he would accept a post if it were offered today.

In the U of T sociology department, Zeitlin overturned a unanimous decision of students and faculty members to hire Seeley last winter because of "senior faculty members' objections."

"Of course I'm hurt and tired," Seeley admitted. "It's much harder now to say, 'Yes I will come.'"

But, Seeley maintained, "The people have the right to know about the way the university is governed."

Although OISE's board of governors decided last week to conduct its own review on why

Seeley wasn't hired, despite faculty and students' urging to have an independent investigation, Seeley questioned the usefulness of such a review. OISE president Robert Jackson, who vetoed the sociology department's choice to hire Seeley, sits on the all-government-appointed board.

The OISE student and faculty associations argue they have never been given sufficient reasons why Seeley wasn't hired.

Referring to education minister Thomas Wells' disclosure last week that he passed on advice from "one or two prominent educators" to OISE director Jackson not to hire Seeley, the sociology professor noted a "contradiction."

"If they were top educators, they wouldn't make a recommendation not to hire me. It narrows my guess that they were administrators."

Although he would not specify names, Seeley pointed out two remarks made about him by presidents of "leading Ontario universities."

One of these presidents, Seeley said, has warned that any person who attacked one university president could not be appointed elsewhere, because he would "attack them all."

Another university president has said if any faculty member would make public a dispute with his superior, that president "would make sure he never got a job in Canada again."

Seeley left Toronto in 1964 after a dispute with Murray Ross, then President of York University, where Seeley was sociology department chairman and assistant to Ross. The dispute evolved over what Seeley termed "a breach of faith" on Ross' part over their aim to keep York a small, intimate intellectual university, Seeley noted.

Seeley stressed he and Ross had hoped to "avoid mistakes of the multi-university. We recruited faculty who wanted that also and we coaxed students—who could have easily gone to U of T—to enroll on the promise of close attention and integrated courses. It was a moral contract."

Seeley said Ross went along with the board of governors chairman's

Despite city, more parking

Despite a confrontation last year with the city over plans to discourage parking downtown, the university is planning to build three new parking garages. The garages are to make up for spaces which will be lost in planned construction projects as well as adding 350 additional spaces.

In a report to be presented to the internal affairs committee Tuesday, a parking study group established last spring has recommended the construction of three parking structures in stages to provide 1,200 parking spaces.

A city policy passed in 1973 called for a reduction in parking in the mid-town area to reduce traffic problems. The report by public works commissioner Ray Bremner fingered U of T as a major cause of traffic difficulties.

Last winter the U of T came under fire for its inaction in trying to reduce parking from Ward 9 alderman Dorothy Thomas and Ward 5 alderman Colin Vaughan. Under pressure the Governing Council adopted a policy which called for maintenance of the status quo pending a study to determine the absolute need for parking.

The university was also criticized for its low rates, much less than comparable commercial rates near the university.

But despite this confrontation plans have been made to increase parking to make up for the loss of parking spaces in constructing Innis college, the planned athletic complex and campus as campus centre facilities.

The recommendations from the parking study group related the number of spaces required for demonstrable need to the number which could be provided at a cost not exceeding commercial rates.

This ignores the parking policy adopted by the Governing Council in March which said the number of spaces needed should be based on criteria such as travel time, access to public transit and physical disability.

The new approach files in the face of this policy by relying on parking rates based on the cost of construction which will establish a level of demand.

The first recommended structure site would be a ramp style garage on the site of the old steam plant beside the medical science building.

The new proposals should cause considerable debate at the next university-city liaison committee meeting. Last February president John Evans promised the university would reduce the number of parking space pending the determination of need.

U of T architects envision bold new concept for parking garage.

Gold of Gods boldest of frauds?

By JOSEPH WRIGHT
Popular author Eric Von Daniken drew more than 1,000 people to Convocation Hall Friday night to hear his lecture, Gold of the Gods: The Continuing Search for Ancient Astronauts.

The lecture marked the beginning of a two day symposium on the "paranormal", sponsored by the YMCA Centre for Counselling and Human Relations and held Saturday and Sunday at the Four Seasons Sheraton Hotel.

The controversial speaker, noted for his books Chariots of the Gods, Gold of the Gods, and Gods from Outer Space, claims evidence of visitors from outer space has existed since antiquity.

Von Daniken delivered a 70 minute speech accompanied by slides, citing evidence which he claimed proved his hypothesis.

The evidence included numerous examples of ancient art containing unexplained flying figures, South American cave drawings showing figures with "space" helmets and a stone slab from a Mayan tomb which he claimed depicted a man operating a rocket vehicle.

Von Daniken read passages from Ezekiel, in which the prophet describes flying and the sensation of "blasting off." He also related similar accounts from an ancient Babylonian epic.

Whenever there is an instance of "divine intervention" in the New Testament, it is accompanied by smoke, noise and trembling, which might suggest the presence of spacecraft, he said.

He also referred to the now famous plain near Lima, Peru which contains the giant unexplained drawings which can only be viewed from high above.

Von Daniken asked if archaeology and paleontology were not "based on erroneous ways of thinking." He added "we should look for the core of legends, myths and history books."

Even North American Indian mythology contains reference to space visitors, he said. He asked "Who was Manitou?" and said that the "thunderbird" of Indian legends was a "distinction between a thundering bird and just another big bird". He referred to one account describing it as "the length of three and a half canoes."

Von Daniken said that whether one believed his theory or not depended upon "your education and how open your mind is".

After speaking, Von Daniken answered written questions from the audience, who seemed well acquainted with his work.

The queries ranged from "What do you see as your ultimate purpose on earth?" to a request for an explanation of the "relation between the layout of the I Ching and DNA molecular structure."

Von Daniken bristled at one point when questions were shouted from the crowd. To the question "Have you ever been convicted of fraud," he answered "yes" and spat back "Haven't you?" He said he was guilty of tax fraud, but that it had not been previously reported as such.

To another shouted question he replied that he had certainly visited the South American caves mentioned in his latest book, though it has been alleged he had not personally viewed them.

Von Daniken expressed dissatisfaction with a recent interview in Playboy magazine which he claimed distorted his views, and throughout his lecture made references to critics in the media.

Speaker inspires masses

By CLAUDE HAWPER

In the largest outpouring of working-class mass-militancy in many years, 700,000 Torontonians invaded the streets Saturday to cheer a parade led by fiery socialist leader Santa Claus, better known as 'Red Nick'.

Cleverly disguised under the sponsorship of that well-known capitalist corporation Eatons, the parade began forming early Saturday morning as the masses of workers, children and students gathered in the thousands, lining Toronto's major streets.

The fiery socialist leader, in his trademark red attire, won the hearts of the throng of supporters as he spread a doctrine of share the wealth happiness and prosperity.

His staccato promises of a "Merry Christmas" whipped the huge crowd into a frenzy and the predominantly youthful movement has seldom looked stronger.

Government reaction was swift in coming as Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau announced a ban of all parades not approved by the RCMP. Trudeau denounced Red Nick, saying his policies were utopian and a dangerous influence on young people.

But at U of T, SAC president Seymour Kanowich could hardly conceal his glee. "Now they'll have to grant us parity on tenure committees," he bubbled.

But U of T president John Evans warned Claus he would not be tolerated on the U of T campus. "After all, he doesn't have tenure," Evans said.

Meanwhile, in the bedlam of production night at the palatial second floor Varsity offices at 91 St. George St, a breathless David Simmonds 42, announced to the staff he would be pulling the special issue on the decline of western capitalism off the shelf in honor of the occasion.

Speaker explains liberation group's aims for Palestine

By JACKIE GREATBACH
 "The day of victory will be the day when we can work together to build the Palestine of tomorrow, living under the principle of equality," A. Abdullah said to more than 100 people at the International Students' Centre Thursday night.

Abdullah is the Canadian representative of the Arab Information centre, Palestinian section, which promotes the position of the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO).

Only four countries, including the U.S. voted against recognition of the PLO, while 105 were in favor. Canada was one of the abstaining countries.

Abdullah based the recognition of the PLO on four factors:

- the growing support they received.
 - recognition of the injustices suffered by the Palestinians when they opened their country to the Jewish people in 1947;
 - realization that their struggle for self-determination is a just struggle; or the expansionist and imperialist character of Zionism.
- Zionism, he said, was first begun as an agent of imperialism, but later became imperialist itself. The 1967 war was the first step in their expansionist aims, he said.
- Abdullah claimed the "racist" nature of Zionism in Israel today was one example of the injustices suffered by his people since their country was opened to Jews.

He said there are four classes of people in Israel: Western Jews, Oriental Jews, Black Jews and Arabs.

Arabic people are not allowed to work on the "so-called socialist" Kibbutz, they are not allowed to rent or buy land from the National Jewish Front, which owns 90 per cent of all fertile land in the country.

Also, he said, there is a quota system in the universities, to restrict the number of Arabs who can attend.

The PLO does not recognize Israel as a legal country, and Abdullah referred to it as "occupied Palestine," noting there are proposals for the formation of a Palestinian state on the West Bank of the Jordan river, now occupied by Israel.

However, the Palestinians eventual aim Abdullah said, was to build a country along with Jews and other citizens of the area.

He said the discussions with the U.N. were just one step in the Palestinians' fight for their right to self-determination.

Tribalism discussed

Who measures civilization? was the haunting question at Friday's panel discussion of Haves and Have-nots in the Politics of the Future.

The session, part of the Club of Gnu's Symposium on The Future, was attended by a diverse selection of panelists and an audience of over 100.

Duke Redbird, the noted Indian poet and film-maker, claimed that Western man is a have-not.

"They lack the spiritual integrity of the Indian," he pointed out. "Alienation of the cities, competition and murder are western problems."

"Rochdale was an attempt at tribal living but a failure" he said, "because there weren't enough Indians."

"The tribal group helps to fulfill our needs," York University professor Brian Hull argued.

But U of T poli ec professor Steven Clarkson disagreed, calling it "a utopian fantasy."

"The interrelationships of the world will increase," said Hull. In the future, have-not peoples will have a larger say in western technology.

The James Bay settlement in which the Cree of Quebec were given $150 million for the use of their land will become typical, he said.

The resources controlled by the third world, such as oil and bauxite, may be used as political threats to force a redistribution of wealth," Clarkson said.

"The western world will not increase aid voluntarily."

He discounted the threat to the affluent west caused by India's development of the bomb. "They must still contend with the armory of the United States."

"A large scale socio-economic change may be the solution to mass starvation," Clarkson contended. He cited the example of China which has significantly reduced the threat of famine in the last few years.

A new interdisciplinary course in Futuristics beginning this month will continue discussing the problems of the future. Interested students should see physics professor Bob Logan.

Law union faces fight

The Canadian legal profession is "traditionally structured to screw certain people," Judith McCormick, a third year law student at Osgoode Hall and a member of the steering committee of the Law Union of Ontario, said this week.

The law association, formed in 1973 by a group of Toronto lawyers in order to meet the legal needs of the poor, of native people and of labour, also provides a common voice for Ontario's left wing lawyers and law students.

McCormick explained that it can be very lonely to be a socialist in a profession dominated by "small 'c' conservatives."

By working together in collectives investigating such issues as police brutality, landlord and tenant relations and immigration policy, Law Union members try to define and understand the unique legal problems of the poor, while overcoming their own feeling of isolation.

A major area of concern for the Law Union is the field of legal education. Byron Pfeiffer, an Osgoode law student and a member of the Union, explained that legal education in Ontario "tends to be retrogressive," it has, he said, "a 19th century perspective."

Pfeiffer explained that the Canadian Bar Association only represents the middle and upper classes and doesn't address itself to "pertinent social issues."

Of the approximately 200 members of the Union, less than 50 are practicing lawyers. The rest are law students, articling students, or legal secretaries.

McCormick admitted that few Toronto lawyers have even heard of the Union and neither she nor Pfeiffer expects this situation to change in the near future. She explained that very few people enter law school with a desire to work for social change, people become lawyers because they want the money and the prestige.

There are about 800 law students at Osgoode, only 25 of whom are members of the Law Union. McCormick said the reaction of the rest of the student body is "not too sympathetic."

Membership of the Union is slowly growing, but Pfeiffer seemed slightly weary when he said that "a leftist lawyer in Ontario is swimming upstream."

Enrolment may change, Dupre says

WATERLOO (CUP) — The 1980s are likely to bring about a radical change in university enrolment patterns according to Stefan Dupre, chairman of the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA) and a U of T political economy professor.

Dupre, in a meeting with executive members of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) said, "The demand configuration of the 80s will be as different from the 70s as the 60s were from the 50s."

He suggested that the universities will have to look for alternative "clienteles" as the 18-24 year age bracket declines in number.

He sees three ways to hold present enrolment levels to prevent the gradual extinction of many universities. One way would be to foster enrolment beyond the 18-24 year old bracket. A second would be to encourage more women to attend university, particularly those whose education was interrupted by childbirth and the years after.

The third way of bolstering enrolment would be a matter of increasing the accessibility to university education by decreasing the costs borne by the student.

When asked how OCUA differed from the old Committee on University Affairs (CUA) which was disbanded in April, Dupre replied, "It's the old CUA warmed over."

Like its predecessor, the OCUA will hold public meetings, publish minutes of its meetings and make annual reports to the legislature regarding eligibility of programs for funding, total funding requirements

Is it true collusion exists between the capitalist building trade and campus left wing groups? Well, ever notice that just as soon as another heinous capitalist wall goes up, introducing new class barriers, revolutionaries 'go to the barricades' and paste up all sorts of propaganda for the slaving masses. It's done so quickly you'd think they knew beforehand it was coming, wouldn't you? This just may well be another 'Wall-or-gate' conspiracy. When we tried investigating the rumors, we were simply met by a wall of silence ...

Renison students may strike

WATERLOO (CUP) — Students of Renison College, an affiliate of Waterloo University, have called for a boycott of classes until two professors fired by the board of governors are reinstated.

The two professors, Jeffrey Forest of social sciences and Hugh Miller of the psychology department, were given six months notice at an Oct. 31 board meeting.

Another professor, Marsha Forest, who teaches Human Relations at the University of Waterloo was banned from the college. Forest had a cross appointment from the U of W.

The three faculty members were given notification of their firing in writing but no reasons were given.

In a letter, Jeffrey Forest was told that if he took part in any committee, faculty or student meetings, or advised any students on topics other than his course, it would be grounds for immediate dismissal.

Marsha Forest was informed she had never been appointed to the college and as such could no longer use its office space.

On October 30 the three faculty members received memos demanding their presence at the Board meeting the next day for an undisclosed reason. There was no indication of the nature of the meeting in the memo.

The three members were called into the meeting and fired.

As word got out about the firings 'students started to gather in a hall and later moved to the meeting room itself to protest the firings.

At a confrontation between Renison Principal John Towler and students, several faculty members also spoke out in support of their colleagues. One teacher, Marlene Webber, said she would discontinue her classes until the three were reinstated.

Students felt particularly upset because only the previous afternoon Towler had promised he would not take any action affecting the direction of the college without the prior knowledge and approval of the students.

Following the confrontation the students gathered in another room where it was proposed that classes be boycotted.

decision to build a university of 27,000 in 10 years and "outstrip in size the U of T," despite advice to the contrary from faculty and students.

Six other professors and many students quit in protest at the same time.

Ross declined to comment on the dispute when contacted yesterday. "It's a closed book for me," Ross said.

Ross, who teaches a sociology course at York, maintained he had nothing to do with Seeley's rejection at OISE. He said he was not one of the "prominent educators" Wells said advised him not to hire Seeley. "I was way in the background," Ross said.

Wells, in an interview yesterday, refused again to identify the educators. "I don't know Dr. Seeley, all I did was pass on a comment."

Wells said he had full faith that OISE's board could conduct a fair review, and he denied it was a conflict of interest for Jackson to be part of the investigation when he had made the decision not to hire Seeley.

You still have to know the right people

Making decisions on academic appointments is supposed to be sacred ground for learned men and women, who know better and are wiser than the masses. They know how to sit around the board table and balance the weighty questions which are the key to the applicants chances of landing the job: recent scholarly publications, teaching experience in the field of specialty, administrative skills.

But there's one more factor which comes in on these key academic decisions. It's well known in the business and political world, and has recently been exposed at the University of Toronto and OISE, the graduate and research school in education.

The key factor we refer to is 'knowing the right people' and 'doing the right thing' and, perhaps most important, 'not being incorrectly controversial.'

John Seeley, often referred to as a brilliant sociologist, flunked the test on this last question. The official reasons for his rejection just don't hold up.

A conspiracy theory seems to apply at OISE, while senior faculty members opposed the decision at U of T.

Ontario education minister Thomas Wells has now admitted "one or two prominent educators" advised him Seeley was not the man for the job at OISE. Another "consultant" warned Wells that Seeley was "a controversial figure in academic circles." Wells kindly passed the information on to OISE's director Robert Jackson.

The review of Seeley's non-appointment, which OISE's board of governors has decided to conduct itself, is a token gesture. All 36 board members are government appointed and they know the 'correct' line. It is highly unlikely they will demonstrate a want of confidence in the institute's president, who also sits on the board and who made the personal decision not to hire Seeley. The conspiracy and back-room politicking evident in the Seeley case only underlines the urgent need to make these hiring decisions more open and democratic.

Marxist group exploited library workers

Unionized employees everywhere in Canada have been forced by inflation to demand cost of living increases from their employers. In this the U of T library workers are no different.

For CUPE 1230 and its members COLA has become a very important issue. It has become an issue which is eliciting a commitment to participation in the union from many previously inactive members. Many library workers are only now realizing that the union may be the only vehicle through which they can work to protect their standard of living. And even among newcomers to union participation there is the realization that to win our demands union solidarity must be strong in the face of management.

On Tuesday, Nov. 5 the library workers and the GAA staged a demonstration outside 215 Huron St. to protest the administration's lack of response to the COLA demands. The demonstration was in many respects a success, especially in light of the speed with which it was mobilized. But it was a success in spite of the intervention of a radical student group whose effect was decidedly negative and whose intentions were never really clear.

On the day before the demonstration, the RMG (Revolutionary Marxist Group) took it upon itself to 'support' the library employees' demands and demonstration for a cost of living raise from the University administration. The majority of library workers, while firm supporters of the union, would never consider becoming part of such a rhetorical student group as the RMG. The effect of the RMG publicity was that many library employees retracted their support from the demonstration they themselves had helped to sponsor.

In this way the unsolicited RMG 'support' can only be seen as a divisive factor in last Tuesday's demonstration, at a time when maximum unity was needed within the union's ranks.

The RMG 'support' for such union action is problematic in other ways. The union, having first-hand knowledge of its relationship to management, must have the sole right to determine the content and tone of its actions in order to gain the largest degree of union support and to have the greatest possible effect. The RMG interfered in this right by issuing its own leaflet and setting up its own signs.

We should defend their right to make fools of themselves — but not of working men and women. How can a union maintain a serious and credible demeanour in the face of management and its own membership when a part-time, self-proclaimed radical group can presume to speak for it?

And presuming to speak for it is not overstating the case. One leaflet the RMG passed out was signed by Kathy Beaman, who is a member of the union and the RMG. What other possible effect from this signature could the RMG have imagined than having their leaflet appear to have the support of the union? Devious is too kind a word to describe their mentality.

But the irony of this RMG support is still to be told. Discovering that this group had set up its banner and was passing its leaflet in the lobby of the library, several library employees confronted the students. The workers said that the leaflets, banner and so-called 'revolutionaries' should go before they do any more harm. The RMG was told it was 'poison' as far as the demonstration was concerned.

When told in stiff terms that they should go, an RMG member, Barry Weisleder, countered with a remarkable argument: "You cannot move us out," he said, "We booked this table through the administration." One wonders if the administration did not invite them to set up shop in order to discredit the union. More extraordinary, however, was his response when one of the library employees picked up a bundle of the spurious leaflets and began to walk to the outside door. He rushed her, tore the leaflets away and shouted, "You can't do that, that's our private property!" So much for the RMG.

If there is a conclusion to be drawn it is surely this: CUPE local 1230 should repudiate the RMG and its irresponsible antics and take steps to ensure that such 'support' in the future is decisively checked. The union is concerned with real working people and cannot afford to tolerate arrogant student groups when their fantasies and games impinge on union activities.

SAC deserves compliments, not criticism

I realize it is highly unusual for someone to write in to The Varsity with something positive to say about SAC, but then again, I think it's highly unusual for anyone writing to The Varsity to have anything positive to say about any topic. It seems as if all the letters to The Varsity, and in fact, all The Varsity's editorials are always critical of something or other. I have yet to see one that praised somebody or some group for a job well done.

The recent letter from Richard Gould accusing SAC of functioning like the family compact was for me the last straw. I think it's about time some of us finally stood up for our student government.

As a student, I have grown tired of having to put up with so many professors who simply do not know how to teach. I have wasted too many hours sitting in classrooms bored out by a man at the front who should never have been there in the first place. I think that SAC's campaign to seat students on hiring, firing, promotion and tenure committees hits at the very root of the problem; namely, that staffing decisions are rarely made on the basis of teaching ability, and that having students on these committees will help solve the problem.

I have also grown tired of an inadequate Ontario Students' Awards Programme which, combined with the high cost of tuition, makes it more and more difficult for me to afford to be able to go to university each year. Again I am very pleased with the efforts of SAC in this area. I was surprised to read in The Varsity in September that the Minister of Colleges and Universities had announced to the President of the SAC that there would be a two year freeze in tuition. I think this announcement was to a large degree the result of SAC's efforts in this area.

Another of SAC's programmes that I heartily approve of is the weekly concert series at Con Hall. I think it's great that, for four dollars, I can see performers that I would have to pay six or seven dollars to see at Massey Hall. I was also one of the thousands of U of T students who got to see Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young with the Band for half the normal ticket price, thanks to SAC.

No one can deny the fact that this campus has lousy social facilities. We must be the only university in Canada without a pub or games room. I think that SAC should be commended for their recent efforts to obtain these facilities, with our help they should succeed.

I was really shocked to see Mr. Gould's comments on SAC's sponsoring an appearance on campus by Angela Davis. I could never agree with the opinions of Ms. Davis, but I am not so narrow minded as to be unwilling to listen to the views of a stimulating and controversial figure. I may not agree with her views, but I am at least interested in hearing them.

Granted, there is room for criticizing SAC. But if these criticisms are to be of any use they must be constructive. The snarky comments, unnecessary sarcasms, and mindless quips directed at SAC in recent weeks serve no purpose other than the self-satisfaction which their authors get out of seeing their comments in print.

Well, whether this is unusual or not, here is one person who doesn't feel afraid to admit that she's proud of the work her students' council is doing. Keep up the good work Seymour and co., some of us out here are sufficiently open-minded to appreciate what you're doing.

D. Kelly,
 Arts and Science.

Varsity makes bedfellows with Spencer, Leckie

Leckie and Spencer certainly seem to be Varsity's little darlings, don't they?

Varsity hardly has a reputation for impartiality in what may be tentatively called its 'news' columns; but your panegyric on the Bobsey twins Nov. 13 is the most glaring example of bias in your pages in many years. Varsity editors are entitled to be L & S acolytes and even, heaven knows, to praise them unremittently in editorials.

But this kind of non-story — wow, whoopee! "Spencer & Leckie run again — belongs inside on page four, not as virtually your lead story on page one.

There are other candidates, you know. I agree that the municipal elections deserve coverage in a student newspaper (and particularly the races in Ward Six). But other serious candidates for school trustee should at least get mentioned — or have you appointed yourself to make students' electoral decisions for them?

I voted for Leckie and Spencer in 1972 myself, and was disappointed that Spencer did not join Leckie on the school board. I have decided, provisionally, to vote for both of them again, but I am aware that there are other good candidates. I will make it my business to examine their qualifications too before making my final choice.

I recommend this attitude to you also — let the air get at your mind — and perhaps you will favor your student readers with less slanted news to assist us in making informed decisions before marking our ballots.

Influence in High Places

John Seeley, a noted Canadian sociologist who has been working in the U.S., was recently refused appointment to both the Department of Sociology at the University of Toronto and OISE.

The following excerpts from the Ontario Hansard of November 7 indicate that the Minister of Education, the Hon. Thomas Wells, was pressured by two "prominent" educators (whom he refused to name) to influence Seeley's non-appointment to OISE.

Mr. Foulds: I raise the matter because I think it's a matter of considerable concern to me personally.

I have always shied away from attacking OISE during these estimates because I feel and have felt that it had a valuable and important role to play in education in this province.

Contrary to some of the gibes that I occasionally give the minister, I do feel that in a way OISE is beginning to play that role. I cannot understand why the directors' personnel advisory committee rejected the Seeley appointment.

I have the memorandum which outlined their four reasons. I think I'll read a section of that into the record. I also have some other material that refutes that.

I, too, want to put it on a matter of principle, Mr. Chairman, through you to the minister, because I think the principle involved here — there are probably three principles involved here.

The first one, is the question of a well-known Canadian academic with international credentials being refused an appointment at an institution that should be interested in that kind of appointment.

The second one is: who is the OISE board of governors responsible to, if it is not responsible to the minister and this Legislature, in view of the fact that we vote them on this item, I believe it is, some $2,250,000?

Hon. Mr. Wells: Yes.

Mr. Foulds: And the third principle involved, I suppose, related to that, is the whole principle of accountability and the public's right to understand the situation in view of the fact that OISE is a quasi-public institution.

The directors' personnel advisory committee notified the sociology department at the institution, I believe on May 29, that it could not recommend the appointment of the man.

These are the reasons that they gave. The committee raised serious questions about the usefulness to the department, and to the institute, for making this appointment.

These questions were based on a lack of evidence in a number of areas:

1. Specifically on the basis of information contained in Mr. Seeley's curriculum data, the committee could find no evidence of recent productive scholarship normally associated with a senior appointment of this type over the past four years.

2. In light of the department's wish to employ Mr. Seeley, primarily in the teaching and methodology courses. The committee noted that Mr. Seeley has had no recent experience in this area.

3. Further, the committee could find no evidence of successful experience in working intensively with graduate students through to the completion of their thesis over the past several years.

This seemed particularly important in view of the department's expressed intention to involve Mr. Seeley heavily in the area of student and thesis supervision.

4. Finally, the committee could find no satisfactory explanation as to the basis for the decision on the part of the University of Toronto's sociology department not to pursue Mr. Seeley's proposed appointment there this year.

Those four reasons look pretty good on paper, but the department of sociology at OISE felt sufficiently strongly about the matter that they sent the memorandum to Mr. R.W.B. Jackson, the director, on June 4, in which they put those four reasons point by point and disputed them.

On the first, that the director's personnel advisory committee could not find evidence of recent productive scholarship, they drew up a list of papers written and delivered by Prof. John Seeley only in 1973-74.

That's as recent as you can get in terms of productive scholarship.

Now, 12 serious scholarly papers, three at least of which, were published. That's a better average than most academics, I would say.

The second reason, no recent experience in the teaching of methodology.

This part of the memo sent to Mr. Jackson by E.B. Harvey, the chairman of the department of sociology and education:

Prof. Seeley has been involved in activities that bear directly on sociological methodology throughout his career, including the past few years.

He has been involved in the planning of a number of projects that involve substantial methodological components.

Two years ago he was the co-ordinator of the evaluation study of experimental schools in Berkeley, funded by the US office of education.

Seeley ran a series of staff meetings on the planning and operationalization of all aspects of project methodology.

Also, during the last two years he taught a joint seminar with Prof. Len Duhl in the Department of Public Health and Policy at the University of California at Berkeley on problems of methodology, which was taught to graduate students in the dual degree programme in health sciences and medical education.

He played a major role in the development of a proposal to establish a centre for the study of violence.

Not only is Seeley qualified to teach methodology, it is one of his main assets, and he has experience and expertise in all major phases of the research process.

In his writings, in his research projects of the past few years, and in his interaction with students, he has been concerned with problems in the philosophy of science, in problem selection and conceptualization, in the theoretical grounding of research and the use of a range of data gathering and data analysing techniques and in the problems of interpreting and utilizing sociological data in action and policy contexts.

In other words, Seeley's expertise as a methodologist is confirmed time and time again. It is also confirmed in the references from all kinds of reputable scholars in his field.

In terms of the aspect of the position as a graduate thesis adviser, it is a fact that during the last four years Seeley has participated in thesis committees with Len Duhl of the College of Environment at the University of California, Berkeley.

It is a fact that his experience involves at least four such committees, including a recently completed doctoral dissertation by Prof. Howell Baum.

Seeley was responsible for the doctoral thesis seminar during his time at Brandeis, and that particular seminar was required of all doctoral students in the programme.

During the 1950s, which admittedly goes back some time, at the University of Toronto he was noted as one of the leading intellectual figures with the graduate students there. In other words, the charge by the director's personnel advisory committee simply does not stand up.

The most peculiar reason given, the fourth one, that they could find no satisfactory explanation as to why the University of Toronto did not appoint Seeley, seems to me to be a very strange reason indeed; and there is an implication and innuendo that perhaps could damage the man's reputation, which I think is very serious indeed.

If I may, I want to read in total the two paragraphs of the memo rebutting that particular objection by the TPAC.

The decision of any given academic department made in terms of its own particular situation not to pursue a specific candidate, is surely not sufficient grounds for denying his appointment to another department.

Certainly the specific basis for such decisions may vary from department to department. The criteria in our case (that is, the case of the sociology department) at OISE were very explicit.

We were informed by the chairman of the University of Toronto sociology department that the decision not to appoint Seeley was not based on any criteria similar to ours — for example, scholarship, teaching ability, etc. — but rather on internal political considerations, specifically the opposition of several senior faculty.

And that is a consideration when appointing a man, because if he can't get along with people he is supposed to work with, particularly as a chairman, then there are valid considerations to be given to that particular reason.

But this posture was not shared by all the senior faculty at the U of T, first of all, particularly in view of the fact that Seeley has a glowing letter of reference from Prof. Norman Bell.

The critical difference is that there is no divisiveness whatsoever to be caused by Seeley's appointment at OISE.

There is virtual unanimity by the sociology department on the appointment, and "surely unsubstantiated concerns of members of another department at the University of Toronto do not outweigh" — and should not outweigh — "an OISE department's unanimous recommendation, which is fully documented, plus the superb documentation of all the references."

I suppose the fundamental question is why then did not the directors' personnel advisory committee, and why has the board, not seen fit to appoint Seeley?

And why has the board of governors continued to postpone the ultimate decision? Because the decision was made on June 26 that it was urgent for the department to have an appointment.

They should have had it by this fall. Their enrolment is up 40 per cent. There is an acting chairman of the department, rather than a full chairman.

I really would urge the minister to take the necessary steps to ensure that an independent review committee is set up to review the decision and to see if there are justifiable reasons why the appointment was not made, in view of the support of the faculty association, of the students in the department, and of the faculty in the department itself.

In view of that, there must be some overwhelming reason that the appointment was not made.

If the board and if the committee cannot make those reasons stand up, I believe that the minister should intervene.

I believe he should intervene for a number of reasons. Is it possible that OISE felt that John Seeley was too big a name? That he was too well known internationally to make the appointment?

I think that must be looked at quite seriously. He does have a reputation of being innovative. He certainly has a reputation of not being a company man.

Is that the reason for the failure to appoint him?

What I want to concentrate on is the necessity for these kinds of boards appointed partly by the ministry, or partly by Lieutenant Governor in Council on the advice of the government, to act like the family compact — to make safe appointments.

Hon. Mr. Wells: You can't say that about OISE.

Mr. Foulds: I can say it about the board of governors.

Hon. Mr. Wells: There are all kinds of people on the faculty there.

Mr. Foulds: There are all kinds of people on the faculty, true enough.

Hon. Mr. Wells: And they are all appointed by the board.

Mr. Foulds: But the board, in this case, seems to have acted in a very strange manner, and I think the public deserves an explanation for that behaviour.

I think it is your responsibility to give that explanation. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Mr. Wells: Mr. Chairman, as I said a few minutes ago, all these points are to be considered by the board next Tuesday.

They're going to decide whether or not to establish an independent review panel at that particular time to study this case and report upon it to the board.

In case I've left the wrong impression with the hon. member, I want to tell him that I do not know Prof. Seeley. I don't recall that I've ever met him.

But I do want to tell him that it comes to my mind, six months or so ago, one or two prominent educators in this province phoned me and indicated that they thought it would be bad for OISE if John Seeley was appointed there.

I did communicate this information to the director, because these were very respected educators of this province.

I communicated that information to the director and indicated to him that I'd had these calls. So I don't want to leave you with the impression that somehow I had never even known about this.

These calls were made to me about six months ago, but since then I haven't heard anything more about it.

Mr. Foulds: Excuse me, but I'm flabbergasted. Are you willing to make public the nature of the calls you received and from whom?

Hon. Mr. Wells: No, I am not. They were private calls to me, just as I receive private calls about all kinds of things.

They were just private calls to indicate an opinion on the matter.

I said I had nothing to do with the appointment, I would pass on their concern. Perhaps you should indicate your concern directly to the person.

As I say, I do not know Prof. Seeley, but I guess he realizes that he is a controversial figure.

For some reason or other I received a copy of a letter, from someone again at another university, which I gather has been sent to the Star.

I would not presume to read the letter at this particular time because I don't know whether it's a public letter or whether it was ever published in the Star, but it indicates to me that this gentleman is a controversial figure in academic circles.

I guess that explains the actions of the boards, perhaps, and why they are having a review and why the whole thing has not been, let's say, a normal type of appointment.

Mr. Foulds: I don't know if you understand the importance of what you have just said. What you have said is that you intervened —

Hon. Mr. Wells: No, I didn't.

Mr. Foulds: You conveyed to the director of OISE hearsay evidence from two "respected academics" in Ontario who are not willing to publicly damage the man.

You passed that information on to the director. Obviously he took it into consideration in the appointment, and you, in fact, may have been the key in tipping the scales against Dr. Seeley.

Now, unless there is substantiated evidence that you and those reputable academics are willing to make public, that seems to me to be the worst kind of interference.

It seems to be — if I may say so, and I say it with great respect — that you were manipulating.

Hon. Mr. Wells: No.

Mr. Foulds: Then you deliberately passed on hearsay evidence. That's not very good behaviour for a minister of the Crown.

Hon. Mr. Wells: It is not hearsay evidence. An hon. member: Corporal punishment.

Mr. B. Gilbertson (Algoma): Oh, come on.

Hon. Mr. Wells: My friend knows me better than that. I would not pass on hearsay evidence, but if someone phones me about a matter that he thinks is important enough to talk to me about, and I have no direct jurisdiction over it, I am going to talk to someone else about it and pass on that concern. I imagine that the concern that was passed on to me was passed on directly to the board, too. In fact, I'm sure it probably was.

Mr. Foulds: Well, I am not so sure that it probably was.

Hon. Mr. Wells: Well, I suspect that it was, and if it was, I think it would be quite proper that that concern should have been passed on to that board.

Mr. Foulds: But surely it was the responsibility of the reputable academics concerned to do that. Surely if they are going to indicate to an institution their misgivings about an appointment, they (a) should have the guts to do that themselves, (b) be able to back it up, and (c) be able to put it in writing and — I don't know quite how to phrase it — not to do it in a surreptitious way.

WORLD SHORTS

By ANDREA WAYWANKO and ISOBEL MEHARRY (PUERTO RICO) — Island residents, whose electricity bills have soared in the last few months, have organized an island-wide boycott of the Water Resources Administration, the government department which controls electric service in Puerto Rico.

Boycotters are refusing to pay their light bills and are demanding a progressive payment scale to eliminate the present policy which forces the Puerto Rican consumer to pay 2.77 cents per kilowatt hour of energy while American-owned companies pay as little as 0.43 cents.

The boycotters, many of whom are involved in the Puerto Rican independence movement, organized themselves into a Coordinating Committee to Boycott Light Payments. The campaign has spread to more than 40 communities throughout the island.

In addition, last week the Puerto Rican Socialist Party announced that it had information implicating high government officials and the management of the Water Resources Administration in various attempts to sabotage electrical services. The sabotage was seen as an attempt to discredit the boycotting consumers.

(LOS ANGELES) — Seven South Vietnamese students who are outspoken critics of the Thieu regime and the war in Indochina are currently fighting deportation proceedings ordered by the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service. (I.N.S.).

If forced to return to Saigon, they are certain to face imprisonment and torture for their opposition views.

In June, on the advice of the U.S. State Department, the I.N.S. denied their request for political asylum in the U.S.

Alarmed by the opposition that has grown among these and other South Vietnamese students in the U.S., the Saigon administration retaliated by calling back the seven students' passports.

In some of the cases the Saigon consulate directly requested the U.S. government to suspend the students' Agency for International Development (AID) scholarships and 'urge' them to return to Saigon immediately.

"It (the Saigon government) wants to punish them," explained the students' attorney, Frank Pestana of Los Angeles. "It wants to stop their voices here. That's for certain."

(NIGERIA) — Shell Oil has finally extinguished a fire that has been raging for ten days in a Nigerian oil rig. A team of American experts put out the blaze by pumping four thousand gallons of water per minute into the well.

The fire has been an expensive proposition for Shell. Almost 20 thousand barrels of oil went up in smoke, and extinguishing the blaze cost about $1.8 million. It is likely to get more expensive yet, because local inhabitants are now demanding reparation for water damage to their fields.

The fire is believed to have been started by sabotage—probably, Shell says, by the firing of a sophisticated weapon at close range. There have been either other attacks on this well. On two occasions the pipes have been cut.

(ROME) — At the Conference on World Famine held recently in Rome, the delegation from Bangladesh called for an emergency meeting on the situation in their country, where over 760,000 people have died since August, 1974 from causes directly related to starvation.

Of the many hundreds of delegates at the conference only about 50 turned up to the emergency meeting. The rest were at a cocktail party in the next room.

Victoria College wins first half of interfac swim meet

By JOHN MAYBERRY
Before a howling crowd of six spectators, the first half of the interfac swim championship was run at the Hart House pool last Wednesday night.

The outstanding winners were Vic, who had few first place winners, but won on the strength of the team as a whole with 70 points.

Their usually close rivals, Meds, managed a distant second with 48 points. Management Studies, by a good effort from their first team in recorded history, tied Engineering for third place with 27 points.

Trinity came fifth with 20, and Forestry's first championship entry came sixth with 18. New and SMC had 3 points each, tying for seventh place, which left Faculty of Education in ninth with 2 hard-earned points.

These scores will be added to the scores for the meet to be held in the spring to determine the winners of the Fitzgerald Trophy.

With such a good lead, Vic stands a good chance of winning the trophy for the third year in a row.

For all the statisticians and scrapbook keepers, the events looked like this:

400 yard Crescendo Relay
1. Med A (3:49.2)
2. Mgt Stud (4:01.9)
3. Vic (4:06.0)

100 yard Breaststroke

Blues win Atlantic Bowl

By PAUL CARSON

HALIFAX — The University of Toronto Blues scored 37 points in the final 16 minutes here Saturday to crown a brilliant defensive display as Blues hammered the St. Mary's Huskies 45-1 in the Atlantic Bowl played before 7,500 unruly spectators at the SMU stadium.

The victory, Blues' tenth in a row this season, gladdened the hearts of Varsity football fans and College Bowl promoters alike as the Blues now meet Western Mustangs, 41-17 conquerers of Saskatchewan, Friday evening at the CNE for the national collegiate title. The presence of the two traditional rivals virtually guarantees a large attendance. Blues beat Mustangs 28-6 for Western's only loss of the regular schedule.

As Varsity players and coaches flew home Saturday evening carrying the Premier's Bowl trophy, there was general agreement that the game was far closer than the 44-point difference would suggest.

In fact, at the midway point of the third quarter, Blues led only 8-0 and Huskies had marched to the Varsity three-yard line.

However, in a critical coaching error, SMU mentor Al Keith opted for what looked like a sure field goal instead of a possible touchdown.

Huskies had marched from their own 52 using mainly short passes, but to compound the error, kicker Jim Woodhouse missed the uprights and St. Mary's could get only one point.

Their enthusiasm noticeably suffered and two series later the Huskies' spotters made another rash judgment, ordering a risky first-down pass into the heart of Blues' solid defence.

The pass was easily picked off by linebacker Guido Iantorno and two plays later Varsity quarterback Dave Langley passed to flanker Brent Eley deep in the SMU end zone.

Huskies had outgained Blues by 103 yards to 30 during the quarter but the Blues solid defensive play in the clutch plus Eley's touchdown in the final 54 seconds enabled Varsity to emerge with a 15-1 advantage.

The hosts simply collapsed in the final quarter as Blues amassed a 188-37 offensive advantage and tallied 30 unanswered points.

A Huskies' roughing penalty started the rout as Langley climaxed a 28-yard drive by racing 13 yards up the middle on a perfectly-called audible for six points with only 1:40 gone.

Don Wright's convert attempt bounced downward off the crossbar but the Varsity placement specialist had another chance moments later following Julio Giordani's interception. Wright connected on a 17-yard field goal at 4:09 and Blues' lead rose to 24-1.

Many of St. Mary's top players were going both ways and in the final minutes Varsity's bench strength and powerful offensive line were utilized to full advantage.

From their own 54, Blues struck quickly along the ground as the left side of the line led by Don Dawson and Walt Dudar sprang Mark Bragagnolo for 31 yards. Two plays later, the right side had its turn as Mike Steele and Mike Sokovnin cleared Bragagnolo's path for a 15-yard touchdown on a third-down gamble.

Unfortunately, at this point the game became a farce and another black eye in the troubled history of the Atlantic Bowl as about 1,500 well-lubricated fans poured into the St. Mary's endzone and held up play for several minutes.

Eventually the referee decided to have Blues kick the convert from the endzone onto the field; it turned out that Huskies had supplied only two official footballs and one had already been sacrificed on the abortive St. Mary's field goal attempt.

Coach Ron Murphy sent in the reserves for the final five minutes but the score continued to mount.

Al Brenchley passed 10 yards to Steve Ince and then connected with Eley for another touchdown at 10:54.

Eley's defender was so upset that he fired the ball at the Varsity co-captain, hitting him squarely in the back. The two game officials standing nearby meekly picked up the ball and called no penalties.

In an effort to preserve the remaining football, the referee awarded Blues an automatic convert.

As the teams assembled for the kickoff, a thoroughly smashed SMU student staggered into the press box, looking for a washroom. Immediately, a senior member of the St. Mary's athletic staff knocked the student to the cement ground and tossed him out the door.

Undaunted, the student returned a few moments later. This time the same university official punched him in the face and then as he lay on the floor, kicked him repeatedly on the ribs and groin.

Libert Castillo supplied symmetry

The Varsity — Dave Stuart

Blue defensive corps put the grab on the Huskies. Blues' defence kept them in game for first half.

to the statistics by scoring Blues' final touchdown at 13:32, followed by another automatic convert. Castillo had opened the scoring on Varsity's first possession of the game, taking a flare pass from Langley and rambling 25 yards behind some excellent downfield blocking.

Granted the offensive unit squandered some excellent chances in the first half, nevertheless the final 16 minutes vividly demonstrated the potential scoring power and outstanding defence that exists on this year's squad.

Stated simply, everything clicked like a machine. The defense forced a turnover and the offense promptly converted it into a major score. Blues forced errors, made their own breaks and played solid, tough, punishing and best of all, very clean football.

Huskies turned bitter as the score mounted, taking three unnecessary roughness penalties plus a 25-yarder for deliberate rough play when Steve Ford was ejected for kicking Giordani.

Blues kicking game was vastly superior and Varsity enjoyed favorable field position throughout the entire game. Their 7-0 halftime lead was more a reflection of their own foolish mistakes, such as two poor snaps on attempted field goals, than of any brilliance by the St. Mary's defenders.

Sokovnin outpunted SMU's Brian Burgess by almost ten yards per kick in the first half and finished with a 36.0 yard average on ten punts compared to 28.9 yards for Burgess. Wright executed a series of tricky bouncing kickoffs which Huskies continually couldn't field properly. In fact, Eley recovered Blues' kickoff at the start of the second half when two Huskies misplayed it, but Varsity could manage only a single from the turnover.

Overall, the defensive unit held Huskies to 207 net yards, with almost half of that coming in the third quarter. SMU all-star halfback Angelo Santucci gained 68 yards but Bragagnolo darted for a phenomenal 174 in 24 carries against a defense stacked especially against him.

Castillo added 62 yards for Blues, while Steve Kwiatkowski added 20 in replacing the injured Bob Hedges. Colin Lauder produced 36 in the fourth quarter and also ran back punts well all day.

Blues had problems with their passing attack as Langley completed only three of 14 attempts for 37 yards.

Tim Pal, Huskies' freshman quarterback from Michael Power, completed 12 of 27 for 113 yards but the final statistics all favored Varsity: 354 yards to 207, 304 yards rushing to 94, 19 first downs to eight, and only 30 yards in penalties compared to 90 against St. Mary's.

Blues displayed class and maturity in what turned into a Bush Bowl, and thoroughly earned the lopsided victory. It was a solid effort from a team which, says Murphy, "really has no second-string players." "Everybody has played well enough to be a starter."

Finally, as the promoters would say, there are plenty of good seats still available for Friday night. Student tickets cost $2.00. Blues deserve your support.

Hockey Blues down Ottawa Gee-Gees 8-3

By ANNE LLOYD

Varsity hockey Blues did it again Friday night, defeating a hard-hitting team from the University of Ottawa 8-3. The Gee-Gees were easily the best team the Blues have played so far this season, and Varsity deserves full credit for the win.

For Varsity, it was a night when everything went well. The defence, led by fine, aggressive checking from newcomers Charlie Hughes and Rocci Pagnello and smooth playmaking by veterans Al Milnes and Brent Swanick, were never in the least intimidated by the slower, more solid Gee-Gees.

McFarlane turned in one of his best efforts in years, scoring the first marker on a neat deflection of Doug Herridge's shot from the point and the 6-2 marker on a quick shot from the slot. McFarlane came close on several other opportunities, only to be foiled by an unkind goalpost.

Harris notched the seventh Varsity goal and set up his linemates well with pin-point passing throughout the game. Although he did not figure prominently in the scoring, with one goal and an assist, Harris seems to be the steady consistent playmaking type of forward that is so essential to a well-balanced attack.

Doug Herridge was another standout for Varsity, earning four well-deserved assists and scoring the third Varsity goal, a hard slapshot which dribbled in despite Gee-Gee's defenceman Chris Cahill's efforts to stop it.

The other Varsity goals came from Warren Anderson, Bill Fifield, Dave Rooke and Bob Adoranti. Fifield's goal was one of the prettiest of the contest, as Herridge dug the puck out of the corner, passing it out to Fifield who fired the puck home to give Varsity a 4-2 lead at that point.

Varsity netminder Dave Hulme made several good saves and was beaten only by two deflections and one of his own defencemen, who aided the puck into the net whilst heroically sliding across the ice on his stomach in a vain attempt to block Gee-Gee's Bill Fox. Fox swooped in on a breakthrough while Varsity had a man advantage to score the first Gee-Gees goal.

Blues played a smart, tough, fast-skating game and with the help of the Gee-Gees and some spectacularly inept penalty-calling produced an entertaining evening of hockey for the Varsity fans. Let's hope the Blues can keep this up—it would be great to go back to the days when capacity audiences were the order of the day at ye olde Bloor St. Icebox!

The Varsity — Brian Pal

Kent Ruhnke missed this breakaway by hitting the goalie's leg.

Modest BIU increase creates crisis

An announcement by the Ontario government Monday that it only intends to increase expenditures on universities by $109 million, or 16.4 percent, will mean "a disaster of major size" for U of T, according to business affairs vice-president Alex Rankin.

Rankin said yesterday university officials will be meeting all day tomorrow to determine the effect of the low increase on university budgetary plans. "But we'll be short millions," he said.

The 16.4 percent is deceptive because the increase in the basic income unit, the grant per student, will be only 7.4 percent, to $2,100.

In a statement made to the Ontario Legislature Monday, Colleges and Universities Minister James Auld said the increase would be sufficient to offset inflationary trends and maintain or improve existing levels of services as well as accommodating enrolment increases.

He said changes in the method of distribution from the present basic income unit would be considered by the Ontario Council on University Affairs. The alternatives would be a flat grant per institution or a "growth BIU", neither of which would improve the situation much, Rankin said.

Although tuition fees will remain at 1974 levels, as Auld has previously promised, students will undoubtedly feel the effects of the funding shortage through further cutbacks in university services.

Reaction from Ontario faculty, student and administrative bodies has been uniformly critical of the ministry announcement.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch attacked the Ontario government for "trying to perpetuate the myth" of increasing funds.

The additional money, Kanowitch noted, "doesn't take into account the increase in university enrolment."

Kanowitch warned of larger class sizes and higher ratios of students to faculty members — who might well be replaced by audio visual equipment.

Ontario Federation of Students spokeswoman Karolyn Kendrick said the small increase was "predictable. It's just another indication of the government's lack of commitment to universities and will mean larger classes and fewer services for students."

Greg Bennett, executive vice-chairman of the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations (OCUFA), said the amount was "totally inadequate."

Bennett said it was "absurd" for the government to claim that the increase would be enough to cope with inflationary pressure, let alone keep up with increases the government has granted to other employees such as the hospital workers.

Bennett said universities would be unable to close the rising gaps between university faculty and support staff and other comparable groups outside the university. OCUFA will continue to press hard for an upward review of the increase.

The Council of Ontario Universities challenged the increases, charging they could cause alarming deficits as universities struggle to cope with inflationary costs.

The COU points out increases are less than those for primary and secondary schools and will prevent equitable treatment of academic and non-academic staff. This will be the fourth year in a row the increases in BIUs have failed to keep pace with inflation.

Rankin said that for U of T, budgets had already been cut extensively for the last few years by reducing services and non-salary expenditures as much as possible. About 80 percent of university expenditures are for salaries.

For U of T it will mean further belt tightening and a further restriction on salary increases, Rankin admitted. "It really puts us on the spot."

The U of T Faculty Association has demanded a 25 percent increase and, with added pressure from library workers and graduate assistants for cost of living increases, the university is under pressure from all sides.

The Varsity — Brian Pei

Government stinginess may well lead to more overcrowded classrooms and lower standards.

Seeley accepts invite to speak at U of T: expected in January

John Seeley, the noted Canadian sociologist rejected for a teaching position at sociology departments of both U of T and OISE despite departmental choices to hire him, has accepted a SAC invitation to speak at U of T in January.

Top administrators and senior faculty members at U of T and OISE — a graduate research institute in education — have vetoed departmental choices of faculty and students to hire Seeley, who now teaches in California.

Following faculty and student pressure OISE's board of governors decided last week to conduct an internal review of why Seeley wasn't appointed. However, faculty and students had called for an independent investigation.

In an interview this week from his home in California, Seeley said the reputation he earned when he taught at U of T in the 1940s likely moved senior administrators and faculty members to oppose his hiring.

In the '40s, Seeley explained, he openly opposed the "systematic degradation of students," and he tried to "treat students like human beings."

Seeley maintained it is vital that the university investigate why he wasn't hired, because, he said, his case was not an isolated incident.

Seeley said the entire system of university hirings and appointments should be investigated, not only the controversy surrounding his own rejections.

He felt that opening up the decision-making process was the only safeguard against the present system, with students and faculty members, in equal numbers, making the decisions.

Seeley challenged the frequent reference to him as a "radical", saying, "I think it's odd that a desire for honesty has become a radical demand."

Philosophy graduates accuse chairman of illegal practices

By SUSAN SLOTTOW

A group of philosophy graduate students has accused department chairman David Gauthier of illegal practices for implementing their seven percent wage increase by decreasing the number of work hours.

The students, all teaching assistants, are members of the Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA) and the Graduate Philosophy Union. They have accused the philosophy department of raising hourly rates while reducing the number of paid hours for most jobs without substantially changing the duties involved.

The philosophy department employs about 60 — teaching assistants.

Last year the budget committee of the business affairs committee recommended a seven percent increase for graduate teaching assistantships, bringing the hourly wage within the $7-10 per hour pay scale.

The students argue it is both illegal and against university policy to cut back on the number of paid hours to implement these changes.

"Teaching assistants were paid for a total of 10,997 hours last year. This year only 8,667 paid hours have been allocated," said Jay Drydk, a teaching assistant in the department and GAA vice-president.

While the two top teaching assistant positions in philosophy were estimated to require 250 hours last year, they have been cut back to 216 hours this year without a corresponding reduction in the responsibilities involved.

"Because the GAA is applying for certification at the Ontario Labor Relations Board, it is illegal to change the terms of employment," Drydk said.

It is also against university policy to implement the seven percent wage increase by decreasing hours, he said.

"We are referring the matter to the committee on anomalies to get their view of the situation," Gauthier said.

"If we find that the regulations do not conform to the existing practice, we will adjust our practices so they do conform. I do not anticipate any difficulties," Gauthier said.

The GAA is making other inquiries into similar discrepancies in other departments.

Canadians said silent imperialists

Horace Campbell charged yesterday that Canadian capitalists are silent partners of U.S. imperialism in exploiting blacks in southern Africa, despite the liberal image Canada has tried to cultivate in the Third World.

Campbell spoke to an audience of 100 at the International Students' Centre as part of a SAC speakers program, co-sponsored by the Black Students' Union.

He said that while Canada rhetorically denounces apartheid, Canadian capitalists such as Garfield Weston get super-profits from exploiting black workers.

Campbell has just returned from two years of teaching in Uganda. He said even in east Africa, Canada is an imperialist power, pumping in large amounts of aid which only serves to perpetuate dependence.

An example he cited was the Tanzam railway, linking Tanzania and Uganda, which was built by Chinese and Tanzanian workers after funding was refused by the world bank and western powers.

Now the Tanzanian government has signed an agreement with Canadian National Railways to provide all the railway cars for the new railway. Canadian engineers will man all the new equipment.

Campbell said Canada has been trying to play the "capitalist good guy" but actually has actively tried to suppress movements of national liberation by supplying arms to Portugal to fight black Africans.

In spite of its claims to be concerned about development, Campbell said, Canada and other western imperialist nations are increasing dependence by encouraging increased production of cash crops. This has increased technological backwardness.

He said the most criminal action Canada has engaged in recently has been a partnership with the U.S. to profit from drought conditions. This has been caused by the distortion of African economies to serve western metropolitan powers.

Campbell also attacked western advisors for perpetrating the fraud of the "green revolution," which tried to promote agricultural reform without changing class structure.

The new strategy for Canadian capitalists, particularly in South Africa, is to liberalize improving conditions slightly and co-opt a small minority of blacks while continuing to oppress the majority.

He responded to a member of the audience, who suggested some foreign investment was beneficial, by saying that multi-nationals are not in Africa to help. Investment, in fact, is financed from profits gained from the exploitation of black workers, Campbell maintained.

Mike Carr from the Toronto Committee to Liberate Portugal's African Colonies attacked the myth that foreign investment benefits blacks.

Carr said while foreign investment, especially from Canada and the U.S., has increased for the last 15 years, conditions have not improved.

Prof still frustrated over dismissal appeal

Stephen Salaff, a mathematics professor whose contract termination in 1973 sparked a student occupation of mathematics department offices, continues to meet with frustration in attempts to appeal his dismissal and be re-hired.

Salaff, regarded by his students as an excellent teacher, was under a two-year contract which expired in 1973. Despite his expectations to the contrary, the mathematics department did not offer to rehire him.

Salaff's frustration over making an appeal—which he has been attempting for the past year—stems in part from the university's having no specific criteria for appeals for part-time staff.

However, with support from the University of Toronto Faculty Association (UTFA), and another group of concerned academics, Salaff finally received an appeal procedure offer from president John Evans last June.

In an earlier letter to a group of faculty members, Evans suggested either the use of full-time faculty grievance procedures, or the setting up of a tripartite review body, following "established arbitration procedures."

However, in the letter to Salaff, Evans suggested only a "one man commission of inquiry" headed by an "impartial senior faculty member."

In a letter to Evans Nov. 14, Salaff charges Evans has withdrawn his offer of tripartite hearings without giving any reason, instead saying a one-man inquiry commission "would best represent the interests of all parties concerned." Salaff says it does not best represent his interest.

Evans has also reminded Salaff that—aside from procedure—there are only three grounds for appeal:

- improper bias which would affect his expectation to be hired.
- evidence that proper standards or recruitment were not met.
- improper consideration of appropriate evidence.

Salaff has not yet filed a statement of grievance, waiting until a proper procedure is established before doing so.

While making the application for appeal, Salaff has also re-applied for a teaching post with Woodsworth College. However, says Salaff, the college seems to accept a veto from math department chairman George Duff, who refuses to recommend Salaff.

Salaff says his dispute with Duff arose over "rigid departmental policies toward undergraduates in non-honors courses."

Parking garages okayed by internal affairs

By JANNY VINCENT
The internal affairs committee of Governing Council approved a proposal in principle last night to construct several parking garages on the campus.

The proposed garages would accommodate some 600 cars, but the overall number of parking spaces on campus would not be increased because many of the outdoor parking lots are to be used soon for the construction of university buildings.

In fact, even if the proposals are adopted by the university, parking spaces will drop from a present 2,300 to 2,178.

The first proposed site for a parking garage is the old steam plant next to the Medical Sciences Building.

A member of the U of T parking authority pointed out that this location is now "overrun with four-footed creatures" (referring to rodents), and that a parking garage would be an improvement.

Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway assured the committee the parking structure "will be properly landscaped and will not in any way impair the environment."

The committee noted that parking is important to more than 1,700 night students who drive to the campus, and who would not be able to or would have difficulty in attending school without use of their cars.

The SAC games and pub room proposal was also on the meeting agenda, but was not fully discussed.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch who attended the meeting complained he had not been given sufficient notice the issue would be on the agenda.

"I find it rather odd that this committee asks me back week after week to discuss things I am not prepared to discuss," Kanowitch said.

Conway reiterated the university's position; "Space is not available now in the location requested by SAC," adding, "Space may be found for a games room, but there is no space for a pub."

Wordsworth College principal Arthur Kruger said part-time students should not be required to pay all the incidental fees. "Services rendered here are not something we can be proud of."

He pointed to the superior services offered by Atkinson College of York University as a comparison.

It was agreed that part-time students would pay a college fee of $1 as well as a Hart House fee of $2, but would not pay other incidental fees, which full-time students pay, amounting to as much as $40 a year.

The long-simmering dispute between the Campus Co-operative Daycare Centre and the university was patched up Thursday night when the daycare collective voted to accept a compromise solution on the terms of a new lease for the Devonshire Place centre.

If the terms for the lease are unacceptable to the Ontario ministry of social development, however, daycare centre representative will refuse to sign the lease, and it will have to be renegotiated again.

The daycare centre was established several years ago when frustrated parents occupied an empty meteorological building where they have been operating ever since. The centre now has a full-time staff of four and cares for about 32 children.

Under the present compromise, the university will provide the Devonshire Place site to the daycare centre for five years, and guaranteed no expropriation. The daycare site will be provided for another five years following, provided the university doesn't want the land or the building for other purposes.

The daycare centre wanted a guaranteed lease for 10 years because the ministry of social development has stipulated in the controversial Bill 160 that money would not be given to daycare centres unless leases were at least that length.

The university will also do any capital repairs, but the province will have to pay for the renovations to the building.

Government slashes Kenora Indians' funds

KENORA (CUP) — Almost 3,000 Indians from 11 bands in the Kenora area have had $200,000 slashed from the federal funds they normally receive.

The new budget totals $600,000 which must go towards roads, housing, water and sanitation, electricity and community facilities.

Indian officials say that the cut poses a serious problem in maintaining these essential services. Grand Council area chiefs have been meeting to discuss the problem, termed by one spokesperson "a catastrophe."

While the Indians' money has been cut back, the actual administration budget for the Indian affairs department has received no cutback.

The superintendent of the Kenora office of Indian affairs, Peter Hare, admitted there has been no cut in his office's budget. He also confirmed the $200,000 cut to the bands.

Hare went on to state that because the Kenora district has always had a "slightly higher" allocation of funds than other areas, the funding cut puts them on an even footing with other budgets in the area.

As a result of the cutbacks, Indian officials prepared a brief to present to Indian Affairs Minister Judd Buchanan, outlining grievances concerning the cut and other problems.

Complaints against administration budgets have come from Indians across Canada. Grand Council Treaty 9, just east of the Kenora district, sent a brief to the federal government recently stating, "A great many civil servants are growing rich by keeping the Indians poor."

The brief went on to state that it costs more than $400 million a year, to "keep the Indian people of Canada oppressed."

Chile link broken

CALIFORNIA (CUP ENS) — Student group protests at the University of California may break up a 10-year link between the university and the University of Chile.

The program, known as the "convenio," is supported by a $1 million grant from the Ford Foundation, and functions to bring Chilean students and professors to the U.S. and to fund Chilean scientific research.

However, since the 1973 overthrow of Chilean President Salvador Allende, student groups in California have charged that the program is aiding and abetting the repressive politics of the ruling military junta.

Executive changes mind on appeal

The Governing Council will hear a recommendation from its executive Thursday for a revision in handling the SDS Caput appeal.

Two SDS members, Tony Leah and Bill Schabas, have appealed to the Governing Council a decision of the Caput, U of T's quasi-judicial body, which found them guilty of obstructing a visit by professor Edward Banfield.

The revised proposal continues to recommend the appeal be heard by the executive committee, setting its own procedure, but provides for appointment of other Council members should executive members have to withdraw.

Law professor Edward Dunlop has been appointed counsel to the committee, which recommends it have the power to appoint a barrister or judge as non-voting presiding officer.

Earlier, Dunlop gave the opinion that the executive could only hear arguments questioning the sentence, not the verdict. Leah and Schabas want to question the verdict, believing a discussion of racism would have altered the verdict.

They are appealing the decision on three grounds: that it was unnecessarily harsh, that racism was not discussed, and that the Caput acted both as prosecutor and as judge.

The great grapes debate

If you want to find out the truth about the grape boycott, or what two versions of the truth are, come and hear a debate between the United Farm Workers and the Teamsters' union.

The debate, sponsored by SAC, will take place at the Medical Science auditorium Thursday at noon.

Real meds issue is racism

This is in response to your report of the Medical Post editorial and your own editorial of November 15, 1974.

For the sake of convenience and easy reading I will use the following highly unsatisfactory shorthand: Canadian means citizens born in Canada, Chinese means naturalized citizens and landed immigrants of Chinese origin (mostly from Hong Kong). All the Chinese students in medical school are either naturalized citizens or landed immigrants. They are not "foreign students" in the sense that they plan to leave the country after graduation. They have declared their intention to settle in Canada and have all been lawfully admitted to this country for that purpose. However, they are often referred to as "foreign students" in recent publications regarding medical school admission.

The real issue has been obscured in the recent rhetoric regarding the number of Chinese medical students. Objections to the Chinese presence in medical school was said to be based on concerns regarding the "marks-only" admission policy and the misallocation of taxpayers' money. Though the Medical Post has again "neatly" confused the issues and used the Chinese as the embodiment of the evils of the present admission policy, I am grateful for one frank statement of theirs: "We are sure the people of Ontario would prefer to be treated by doctors of their own ethnic and cultural backgrounds. In medicine, more than any other profession the cultural interface plays an important part in the relationship between a doctor and his patient." Unless we can identify this issue at stake as a racial one and unless we can discharge the extraneous issues raised to mask the real one, any discussion of the overrepresentation of Chinese would be futile.

The concern over the exclusive use of marks as an admission criterion appears to be a legitimate concern. However, I submit that the marks system in itself is not the villain. In many ways, it is the fairest system of all. The genesis of "ruinous competition" is not in the method of selection, but in the necessity for stringent selection. Any method of selection would become unfair and ruinous. In my opinion the much lauded interviews are deplorable. Their most useful purpose is to screen out socially and racially "undesirable" class elements, whether the screening is done consciously or subconsciously. They merely favor those who can sell themselves, as opposed to those who cannot. If this method was adopted, I would be surprised if students did not scramble for workshops on "HOW TO BE A SUCCESSFUL INTERVIEWEE". The same evils will be perpetuated by any method of selection.

The real villains are: 1) the lack of meaningful jobs in our society for people in general, and college graduates in particular. 2) the disproportionately high income professionals command. 3) inadequate training facilities. As long as we have an artificial scarcity of professionals and "price fixing" by the professions, we will have "mad-dog competition" to gain entry to medical and other professional schools.

Even if the "marks-only" admission policy is bad in itself, I strongly object to the constant juxtaposition of the evils of the "marks-only" policy with the number of Chinese medical students. The juxtaposition suggests that the only qualification Chinese students possess is high marks, that they are otherwise unqualified. That is patently unfounded. There is no basis for supposing that Chinese students have less social consciousness than Canadian students. The juxtaposition also ignores the fact that the Canadian medical students were also admitted on the marks-only policy. The same objections should also apply to them. They too should be replaced by other Canadian students chosen on another criterion.

The other ground for objection to Chinese medical students is the "misallocation of taxes". Much has been said about the taxpayers' money used to support foreigners. This is a deliberately rabble-rousing issue made to coerce the U of T medical faculty to drop their policy of equal treatment of citizens and immigrants. It is not contended that Canadian students themselves have paid much in taxes, nor that immigrants do not pay the same taxes as citizens. It is said that because the parents had paid taxes that the sons or daughters should have preferential treatment. I wonder how Dr. Bette Stephenson would rule on a student whose parents had never paid any taxes, say because they had been on welfare. Would she go as far as to say he has no place in medical schools either? What about the sons of parents who had paid more taxes? Should they be preferred to those whose parents had paid less? Or should the third generation Canadians be preferred to the second, the fourth to the third? If the answers to the above questions are in the negative, then objections to the Chinese students cannot be really based on the fact that their parents had not paid any taxes.

Though I think the tax accounting is ludicrous in a nation comprised of "immigrants", I realize how sensitive a matter money is in these difficult times. Therefore I would like to state once and for all that as a racial group the Chinese in Canada have paid their dues. In case anyone does not know, Hong Kong is a British Colony. These students' parents may not have paid any taxes directly to the Canadian government, but they have certainly contributed to the Commonwealth. Or if family history must be dredged up, these students can go further back to claim kinship with their distant blood relations who worked on the railways, the workers who had not only paid taxes, but had also paid with their lives. I trust the tax "accountants" would be happier if these students say they are collecting back wages?

Objections to the Chinese medical students cannot logically be based on the evils of marks only admission policy nor on the allocation of taxes. As the Medical Post admitted, they are based on the cultural and ethnic backgrounds of the Chinese. There may or may not be merit to these objections. I will leave the discussion to others less prejudiced than I. I trust the medical profession to have sufficient intellectual integrity to focus on the real issue, and not to hide behind the mumble jumble about marks and taxes. I would add, however, that any discussion of the lack of cultural affinity between doctor and patient should not be confined to the Chinese doctors. That particular sickness is common to the professions. A $50,000 a year person, such as a WASP M.D., has more cultural affinity with his Chinese counterpart than he has with a $5,000 a year WASP, if I may be pardoned for saying so.

Another important point which needs discussion and clarification is the underlying issue of the rights of the immigrant. Does he have the right to education? If he has the right to education there cannot be any immigrant quotas on any educational institutions. If quotas are placed on medical schools and not on trade schools, these quotas must be seen as racist and solely designed to limit the immigrant's social mobility. If he does not have the right to education, he is entitled to know what the period of indentured service is.

The most insidious aspect of limiting immigrants' entry to professional schools is its logical extension, which is to confine the immigrant to the lowest-paying, most menial jobs. Because for every time in professional schools, there would be an eager citizen applicant; and for every high paying job there would be a citizen applicant. And if the student is protected from competition from the immigrant, why should the worker not enjoy similar protection?

I realize that immigration and citizenship are privileges. The immigrant cannot dispute the way Canada limits the inflow of immigrants. Nor can he dispute the way she prescribes the activities of immigrants if she chooses to exercise that right. She has the right even to require a period of indentured service before allowing the immigrant to attend school or to take a good job. But the immigrant is entitled to know exactly what restrictions would be placed on him so that he can make an intelligent choice to immigrate.

Unless and until the Immigration Department is prepared to declare openly to the world any and all restrictions on the activities of the immigrants, unless and until the Immigration Department is prepared to impose the same restrictions consistently throughout the occupational scale, the Chinese students will insist on their right to equal opportunity to compete for places in any educational institution. Selective restrictions of the rights of the immigrant cannot be motivated by the desire to vindicate the rights of the citizen, but can only be understood as racism and condemned.

Varsity forgot Remembrance day

When I picked up a copy of The Varsity Nov. 11, last Monday, I was somewhat surprised to notice that in the paper there was no mention of the fact that Monday was Remembrance Day.

I was wondering if there was any reason why the events taking place in various parts of the campus on that day were not brought to the attention of the students through The Varsity?

I realize that to some people Remembrance Day is purely a glorification of war, but for others it has other meaning. Few of the students can actually remember World War II, but have no doubt heard of the feelings and experiences of those who can remember. For some of these students Remembrance Day is a time for reflecting on a situation that has come, gone and hopefully will not return.

I sincerely feel that there could have been some mention of these times, perhaps a review of some articles in The Varsity from that period.

Bewitched by sexist debate

As the "Go'fer" who was good enough to reply to my letter (Nov. 15) decided not to sign its name, I have not the pleasure of knowing whom (or what) I am addressing. Readers may be surprised that, having felt the lash of so articulate a rejoinder, replete with telling wit, I have not simply crawled away with my tail (or is it my appendage?) between my legs. But as the old adage goes, "You can't keep a good person down."

My "sexist commission" should, I suppose, be laid at the door of LaVerne Kuhnke. The dispassionate reader will have noted that I scrupulously avoided specifying the sex of my authorities; thus I did not make a point of noting either Margaret Murray's or LaVerne Kuhnke's. Both are women (or, in the case of Murray, to use Shakespeare's words, "One that was a woman, but bless her soul she's dead"). Likewise, I did not consider it important to mention that Dr. Clot-Bey and Khedive Mehemet Ali Pasha were men, but on that point my respondent is correct in its inference.

If my respondent is still reading, I would bring the following two points to its attention as helping to provide a sounder perspective on the witch-persecutions, and as helping to substantiate Prof. Pearl's assertion in his excellent letter that the problem is more "complex and subtle" than the pamphleteers, sloganeers and mouters of cliches are willing to make it:

(1) There was an extremely thin line, if any, between condemnation as a witch and as a heretic or an apostate. These often appear together as articles of the same indictment (cf. Gilles de Rais and were not the only ones specially singled out for the humiliation, torment, and death so graphically described in the article; dissenters from the Church were subject to the same treatment (e.g. Giordano Bruno), along with any Jew or Moslem who didn't either convert or leave Spain in 1492, and, a little later, leaders and adherents of the Protestant Reformation as well (e.g. Wycliffe and Huss).

(2) As that very wise detective Dr. Gideon Fell has made clear (in a perceptive discussion in John Dickson Carr's mystery Death Watch), the excesses of which we speak appear in context when one realizes that such tortures and "cruel and unusual punishments" were part and parcel of ordinary police procedure and civil law. If you were brought up for petty theft, they would start with the boots and thumbscrews and go on from there! (Note that I consider the extremely erudite John Dickson Carr and his protagonist, the learned and venerable Dr. Fell, as more knowledgeable and reliable sources than Elizabeth Gould-Davies.)

Not to forget the "Go'fer", which I hope has learned something from the above, is it a permissible "gross inference" ("An ill phrase — a vile phrase! 'Gross inference' is a vile phrase!", to exploit the Bard once again) that its motivation lies in "appendage envy"?

New thanks conference goes

We would like to thank all the members of the university community who participated in the Future Symposium, the speakers, the audience, and the many people who helped to organize this event.

We also wish to inform the community that the Future is alive and well at New College. In fact we are meeting Thursday at 4 pm in the Wilson Hall Lounge to explore the possibilities of an accredited Interdisciplinary Symposium (INX200) course — An Introduction to Futuristics.

McLuhan said nothing, wittily

I was disappointed to see so many of Marshall McLuhan's glib remarks repeated to the university community at large (Wed. Nov. 13, "public urged to think ahead") in a manner which gives credence to the idea that he was actually making some sort of analysis of the future.

In fact, his oral dexterity (if such we may call it) and his ideational razzle-dazzle were interesting and often amusing to hear, but his contribution to the New College Symposium on the Future smacked more of a saboteur's than a concerned participant's. His most cogent statement was his self-characterization as a believer and practitioner of "one-liner-ism" (my quotation marks.)

His suggestion that the future could be seen in the rear view mirror was bunk. All one sees there is where one has been and who is following behind. If and when the gasoline supply runs out we won't have to worry about rear view mirrors. It's probably past time that McLuhan turned his gaze from the rear view mirror and took a look "Actually, no."

Princess Anne,
Answering the question,
"Would you like to live in Canada?"

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. down the road ahead. No wonder he says naive conceptualists live in the future when he uses a mirror as his crystal ball!

He went on to say a lot more, less substantive than the above, but one more point with which I most took issue was his suggestion that any future course of action be judged by its effects. A marvellous statement of principle and one by which I am sure we all live, most particularly Marshall McLuhan.

Only two insignificant, though loathsome, Hydras rear their disagreeable heads through this gossamer tapestry of fine words. First, the problems are not so simple and easily resolved as what new pronouncements Mr. McLuhan will make upon his next public appearance. (The answer to that being, Look in the rear view mirror!) And secondly, the implementation of any far-reaching solution to global problems is certain to be less popular than Mr. McLuhan's appearance at a public function.

Hence, how or to what extent do we compromise the "perfect" solution, or conversely, by what method do we shove it down the throats of the "unenlightened" and those with possibly valid but unacceptable disagreements, in terms of that solution.

Indeed, as anyone present will eventually realize, Mr. McLuhan was, in his own words, "shooting from the lip," and to continue his metaphor, although he was firing blanks, he was making a great noise, which is sometimes mistaken for making a great contribution.

Notwithstanding such distractions, I hope New College will find its way successfully into the future. One problem that Mr. McLuhan may have inadvertently foreshadowed is an analysis and review of the semantics of the problems. Eventually, any solution to the "Precediment of Mankind" must concern itself with meanings and with what invariably lies behind them, namely viewpoint and philosophy, and they will certainly become significant when the effects of policy come to be evaluated.

I look forward to the time when both the university establishment and the affiliated community of academics, scholars, and concerned citizens all share in the input of concern and in the analysis of plotting a course into the future which will see us all at peace — with ourselves and each other.

J. Kaiser,
University College.

Discrimination study urged

Last March a speech by Prof. Edward Banfield, whose work is considered highly insulting by blacks, Italians, and other people in North America, was disrupted by students and other citizens. Two of the students, Tony Leah and William Schabas, were subsequently tried before the CAPUT, a Governing Council organ, which did not deal with the incident in context but only with the admitted act of disruption itself. In imposing harsh suspensions on the two, CAPUT chose not to question, and indeed prohibited, the introduction of questions about racist teaching and scholarship in our university, an example of which was the provocative Banfield invitation.

We, the following faculty members, believe that the outcry against the Banfield appearance has raised an important challenge which the University must not be delinquent in meeting. We propose an investigation into the place held in the university by non-Anglo Saxon immigrant groups and native people as well as by Ontario French Canadians. The investigation should address itself to the issues of discrimination in the university. We suggest the following as a beginning:

(1) Should the overall composition of the University of Toronto, a provincially funded institution, reflect the racial-ethnic composition of Ontario?

(2) Is there an under-representation of certain minorities in the student body? Is there an under-representation of the working class in the student body? Is there a connection between the areas of class and racial composition? In other words, does the University generate "elite" or anti-working class ideologies?

(3) Do courses adequately portray the role of non-Anglo-Saxon groups in society, and do student and faculty members of these groups find the course material objective? How do the textbooks and lectures treat these groups and the issues of prejudice and racism? Do students from these groups perceive the texts and lectures as unbiased?

(4) Are minority groups under-represented in the faculty, administration, and support staff? What types of jobs do minority group employees hold in the university?

(5) Should the University community sanction "extra-curricular" activities directed against racial and other minorities?

We urge that a sum of money not less than that spent for the CAPUT trial be allocated for such an investigation, and we pledge our personal cooperation with it.

In view of the fact that Leah and Schabas raised these issues of racism, and that they are currently appealing their sentences, we additionally urge the Governing Council to act favourably on the appeal while considering the larger issue of racism in the University.

SAC reiterates Caput stand

Judging by some of the calls I received at the office today, I think that the Varsity article on the SAC position vis-a-vis Caput and the SDS did not adequately convey our stand.

There are two points with respect to the SAC position that I would like to make clear:

1) SAC does not in any way, shape or form support or condone the SDS in their actions in the Banfield incident.

2) SAC does not feel the SDS should go unpunished for their actions in the Banfield incident.

However, what SAC is upset by is the administrations decision to use the Caput as the means of disciplining SDS. Caput has long been seen by the university community, faculty and students alike, as an inadequate body for disciplining students both because it contains no student members (and therefore denies the right to peer judgment that every citizen expects in our public courts) and because its members perform dual roles as judges and legislators. We must always be concerned when Caput is used as a disciplinary tool whether that be against the SDS, the Western Guard, or common everyday students.

Last year, the Governing Council had the opportunity to come up with a legitimate mechanism for disciplining students and faculty. This mechanism could have been used to deal with the SDS's actions in the Banfield incident. Unfortunately, the Governing Council rejected every suggestion made by student groups which would have legitimized the mechanism in the eyes of students. Instead they pressed for a mechanism which would have been as unpalatable to the university community as the Caput is now.

In the absence of a legitimate campus mechanism for disciplining the SDS, the U of T administration had the option, and indeed still has the option of pressing charges against SDS in the public courts.

Certainly most of us are upset by the actions of the SDS. Certainly most of us feel that they must be punished for their actions. But we must not be so overzealous in our desire to punish them, that we are prepared to use any means of punishment regardless of its legitimacy.

Wage too low to support family

Perhaps in recent weeks students have been surprised to learn how much the non-academic staff of the university earn. My salary is $5,900 for working in the mail-sorting office. I am trying to support a family of two children and maintain a rent of $210 per month for the minimum requirements. It's not enough to live on.

In other words, it is costing us more to live than I earn. Perhaps I should apply for a job in the library. I wonder what the tar baby would think about that? Then again, perhaps I should apply for the position of professor and triple my salary.

The Failure of Urban Reform; The Death of the Odeon-Carlton

By DAVID A. BASSKIN

"SHOWPLACE OF THE NATION" trumpeted the 1949 advertisements which hailed the opening of the theater. Indeed it was. Planned since before the war, at the peak of cinema popularity in North America, the Odeon-Carlton would be the flagship of the J. Arthur Rank organization in Canada. Like the British Odeons, it would be monumental, but would also be in the latest architectural fashion, and would of course be replete with the ever-present central tower, blazing ODEON across the skies.

The features of the theater outclassed those of its competitors easily: The finest theater organ on the continent, keyed to the coloured auditorium lights, a special hearing aid section, an art gallery, a restaurant, air conditioning, and enough office space in an adjoining section to house the head offices of the theater chain.

Its fiscal career was always healthy, even during the bleak years of early TV. The arrival of home visual entertainment drove the first wedges under the foundation of the American film industry, and as the flow of A-pictures decreased, the number of theaters dwindled, in an ever-tightening spiral.

Only a few major houses survived the onslaught of TV and the ones which did, did so because they could maintain the air of being a place where one went for an occasion.

The local bijou was just a movie house, but going downtown to the big-name theater remained an event. Thus the elegant decor of the Odeon-Carlton brought sufficient crowds to every new movie; it never ran in the red.

With the coming of the '60's, projection technology changed the physical appearance of movies greatly. Perfected colour, wide-screen, 3-D, cinemascope, 70mm film, and Cinerama enabled the once-humble screen to give an effect the home tube couldn't approach.

This signalled the reascend of movies in mass popularity.

The Odeon-Carlton installed the Cinerama technique with great success. It involved three simultaneously operating projectors; the outer two angled in and lit up the opposite ends of the screen (a tremendously curved one) and the middle one, projected conventionally. Sound came from over ten speakers, with some six located behind the screen.

The upshot of this technical change was that even after the cinerama films had run their course (and they never really were much more than spectacular uses of the wide-screen effect) the Odeon-Carlton was left with two complete projection facilities: The old, upstairs room had complete D.C. wiring, and the downstairs one (behind the main floor seats) had A.C. and the latest in projection equipment.

By the early 1960's, the Odeon-Carlton was the best-equipped theater in the country, surpassed only by the IMAX equipment at Ontario Place's Cinesphere.

As motion picture executives discovered, Toronto is one of the best markets in North America. The Odeon-Carlton led the continental market in many movie runs, the most recent being the film "Lost Horizon". The last year of operation was its most profitable; its last month was the best month financially; the last movie, "White Lightning", did very well.

The question then presents itself: Why was the theater sold and then demolished?

What would lead Odeon to sell its flagship, the best-equipped and most luxuriously appointed member of its line?

Answering this question, and telling the story of what happened when numerous groups tried to save the building on aesthetic grounds is the purpose of this article.

It is a commonplace that land values have skyrocketed in downtown Toronto, and yet the implications of this fact can escape us. When land values go up, certain types of development become economically feasible, where before they would have bankrupted a contractor.

For example, the site just to the east of Maple Leaf Gardens had been a weight around the neck of Kuhl Construction Co. for ten years. In the late 1950's, in the midst of a hotel boom, Dr. Julius Kuhl had bought the site, cleared it, and begun excavations for a luxury hotel; before long, though, an old Torontonians made an appearance, after an absence of some years: Taddle Creek.

Taddle Creek once ran on the surface, forming a pond on the grounds of the University. At the Carlton St. Site, Kuhl found the creek eating up his foundations as fast as he could sink them. After numerous attempts at devising a basement that would withstand the underground torrents, the architect reported that any successful design would cost additional millions.

Kuhl decided to sit tight on the land, and for 10 years patrons of the Gardens passed a long frontage of navy blue hoardings.

Land Values and Development

But when the value of land jumped to its record heights in the beginning of the '70's, the time had come to build the hotel; the business was thriving once again, with luxury rooms in intense demand. High crime levels in U.S. cities had made the safe streets of Toronto a haven for conventions, and with the conventions came money and hotel demand.

The increase in land values certainly was not lost on Odeon Theaters, Ltd. With theaters sitting on prime land worth (in some cases) millions, the urge to get out of the entertainment business and into the land-development and management game had become irresistible.

In the eyes of the company, there would soon come a time when the land value of the Odeon-Carlton, its most valuable downtown land-holding, would pass the point of no return: Ticket sales would simply be no longer able to support costs, or at least the potential return for selling the land would be infinitely greater than the annual ticket intake.

Obviously, if Odeon wanted to sell off its valuable downtown land, it could retain the movie market by making sure that new theaters replaced the ones torn down.

The picture is now set: the Carlton site is worth a great deal of money, Odeon is halfway to becoming a conglomerate with heavy interests in land development of the purchase of the theater site; subsequent plans were unveiled for two additional towers that would join with the apartment-hotel complex next door.

Kuhl's next step was to obtain a "minor variance" in the official plan which would allow the apartment-hotels and their calculated 12-point density. The figure mentioned is gigantic when one considers that in the horror of St. James Town's crowding there is not much more than 4-point density. The two sites would be physically joined, making one enormous four-tower development.

City council had voted for, somewhat mysteriously, an exception to the apartment-hotel ban some months previously, right on the site in question. There is no reason to suppose that this exception was accidental; in all likelihood it was a result of influence from Kuhl, whose plans were in the works for some time.

From the rude beginnings of the Majestic, Toronto's cinemas have grown . . .

ment, and Kuhl is interested in getting his long-dormant hotel off the ground.

In May 1972, a newspaper article detailed how Kuhl Construction was going to put up one apartment tower of 27 floors, holding 236 apartments. On the same site there would be a 23 floor hostel, a high-rise rooming house, with 540 self-contained units, to provide "comfortable, convenient and inexpensive accommodation for short-term roomers."

The Apartment-Hotel Issue

The development planned is usually called an apartment-hotel, and it is usually found where a developer wants to erect a high-rise apartment (often of the luxury variety), but the zoning regulations will only permit hotels.

In 1972, the Apartment-Hotel issue was hotly debated by the city Council, as the use of this sort of development as a zoning loophole was well known. After lengthy discussion, it was voted to zone the downtown core for apartment hotels, but this provision would always have to be debated in council, with each proposed project.

On August 24, it was reported that Kuhl "has also purchased land to the west now occupied by the Odeon-Carlton Theater and Odeon office building . . . Odeon has no further plans for theaters in Toronto." This was the first anouncement of the purchase of the theater site; subsequent plans were unveiled for two additional towers that would join with the apartment-hotel complex next door.

So all that the "minor variance" really would decide was whether to allow an increase in the density to account for an above-ground car-park, since Taddle Creek prevented the construction of one below ground.

Controversy began when the minor variance request, made on Dec. 15, was perceived by the area residents as a whole new application for the construction of an apartment-hotel. There had been no publicity of the zoning exception made for the Carlton site, even in the reform press.

There was little the development committee could do at this point to stop the project (short of rescinding a bylaw they had quite amicably passed not too long ago) so the battle began around the minor variance request.

On March 5, 1973, Kuhl entered into negotiations with the North Jarvis Community Association. The North Jarvis area is still recovering from the massive changes imposed by St. James Town, and the influx of thousands of people at Yonge and Carlton Sts. was upsetting to consider.

There are no major community facilities in the area to support an additional 2,000 or so permanent residents, no schools, barely enough parks; in short, the area was grossly unsuited to the type of development Kuhl was proposing.

A Case Study

... to the elegance of theatres like Ottawa's Capital ...

The city Committee on Building and Development met on March 12 to consider the minor variance request, and was told there would be problems with 12-point density, especially since this would be inconsistent with previous council decisions.

However, an Apr. 30 report by the city Solicitor was a crucial point in the controversy. He said that although the Ontario Municipal Board might take exception to the 12-point density change, "the move to allow it (the increased density).... would not be contrary to the provisions of the City of Toronto Official Plan.

By the fall, the Odeon site purchase was announced, and moves were begun to demolish the theater. It was about this time that a CBC reporter, Martin Sadoff decided to do a human-interest story on the projectionist who had worked there since the theater opened. Sadoff learned that all was not as Odeon was making out.

The projectionist contradicted the explanation for the shut-down given to the press and told Sadoff that business had never been better, a statement Sadoff later confirmed, and eventually came to the conclusion that there was something amiss. He wrote a five-page letter detailing the history and fortunes of the theater, making an impassioned plea for saving the theater on historical and architectural grounds. This letter was sent to all members of city council, numerous media personalities, theater buffs, and others, precipitating a great deal of interest. There were quick results.

The Odeon-as-Historic-Site Gambit

Kuhl applied for a demolition permit on Sept. 12, and it was put forward for consideration by council, who on Sept. 20 moved to declare the site historic, thus killing the demolition permit for at least 60 days.

This was not the first time a building had been saved from the wrecker's hammer under the umbrella of historical worth, but usually this kind of action had been taken after recommendation by the Toronto Historical Board. The Odeon-Carlton did not meet the Board's criteria of "historical", and critics of the THB lamented that the only buildings which could be deemed worthy of the stay of execution were Victorian or earlier.

In the 60-day period that followed Sept. 12 there were negotiations, led by Alderman Arthur Eggleton, aimed at saving the building, either in its present form or modified for different uses.

At the start, it was understood that the city would not be getting into the movie business, but since the Odeon possessed nearly complete stage facilities, the aim was to use the building for some sort of live entertainment.

The first people approached were the Canadian Opera Company and the National Ballet of Canada. Each had always drawn big crowds at O'Keefe Center and had longed for a permanent theater with the advantages of good acoustics. The Odeon was proposed as a home for these groups, but both subsequently turned down the site.

But Boyd Neel, conductor of the Hart House Orchestra pointed out to Ald.

Eggleton that both these companies had their eyes on a permanent home in Metro Center, along with the Toronto Symphony in a new Massey Hall. Neel felt that renovating the Odeon would still be cheaper than a new hall.

Having been turned down by the big names in culture, and still wanting to save the building, Eggleton turned to Johnny Lombardi, Martin Onrot and other representatives of the city's ethnic-popular entertainment industry. They seemed enthusiastic about the prospects of using the Odeon for concerts, particularly Lombardi because the site was within easy travelling distance for the majority of his prospective ticket sales.

Kuhl was not unreceptive to the wishes of the theater buffs. He agreed to a compromise measure, which, on the surface of it, seemed to offer a way out of the problems. Instead of one tower of 24 floors and another of 25 on the hotel site, he would build one of up to 59 floors, to maintain the same density.

The Odeon Carlton theater would be leased back to the city for $1 per year, and he would personally donate the sum of $100,000 towards the anticipated costs of restoration.

This seemed a good solution: The theater organ, the last of its kind installed on the continent was a truly remarkable instrument, the distillation of a half-century of design. In no small way, the building and the lighting were an integral part of the instrument itself. Every pipe was tuned to the acoustics of the auditorium, and in fact the hall was built "around" the organ.

The Odeon's Value

There was more that was irreplaceable. For some time, since the closing of Film House, the Canadian community of film-makers had been without a suitable screening facility. The office building adjoining the theater had screening rooms fully set up for 35mm film, an installation which would be prohibitively expensive to set up from scratch today.

... and back again to the neon-and-graphic design of the Uptown.

It was proposed that this facility could be the nucleus for a Canadian film festival, using the theater for the more popular films and the screening rooms for auditioning entries or judging.

The public facilities of the theater were valuable: The restaurant had sat empty for many years, but the Savarin had expressed serious interest in taking over its operation. The stairs leading to the balcony were decorated with an award-winning mural, the winner in a competition which saw four of the entrants go on to international fame. It could not be salvaged if the building was torn-down. Finally, the Odeon-Carlton was a valuable member of the remaining community of downtown-core entertainment facilities.

Kuhl's compromise was, in Eggleton's words, "offered in genuine good faith", and it was the impression of all who were party to the negotiations that he was sincerely concerned.

But concern was not enough. On Oct. 9, the solicitors for Odeon theaters wrote all concerned to advise them that the agreement regarding the sale of the site restricted the purchaser from ever using the premises again for entertainment. Even if Odeon was willing to waive this, there would have to be compensation made. Then, it developed that the projected renovation figure of $250,000 might not even cover new projection equipment.

In the light of this "Kuhl's 'gift'" seemed to shrink in value "in the words of one of the Mayor's assistants.

And time was running out for the friends of the Odeon. Aside from the 60-day stay of demolition, Odeon had wasted no time in removing their goods from the building. It was later revealed that Kuhl owned only the shell of the building, and that "anything that moves" was taken from the site.

This included "seats, carpets, projector equipment, air conditioning, heating and lighting equipment, drapes, mirrors, kitchen equipment, and so on."

Odeon had also, in an evident spirit of recycling, ripped open the walls and removed the wiring, the conduits and absolutely everything that might possibly be reused, a move hardly consistent with their professed stand of being willing to waive the restrictive clause.

November 12 arrived, the last day of the holding action. Kuhl officially made his compromise proposal, which had been approved in principle by Eggleton and his negotiators. Public reaction was intense; there had been dozens of letters received urging the saving of the Odeon, but when it was announced that Kuhl's compromise entailed acceptance of a 59-floor monster at Yonge and Carlton, there was shock all around. Kuhl gave the city until Nov. 21, 9 days after the holding action ended to make up their minds.

In a spirit of desperation, Eggleton and others started a move to expropriate Kuhl from the site, even as the city Executive Committee approved in principle the compromise move. The same day, a lawyer for Kuhl warned that if no move had been conclusively made by the seventh of December, the hammers would start swinging. On Nov. 22, Eggleton met with Mr. R. Jarvis, Kuhl's lawyer, and proposed expropriation. Jarvis named a figure — $5 million. This was so far out of the question as to be absurd.

On Nov. 26, city council rejected Kuhl's offer, particularly taking offense at a provision which stated that if the city ever wanted to shut down the theater, the developer would be allowed to build over the site to the street line, covering up the face of the 59-story tower. Who, after all, was going to be in charge of development in today's modern, reform council!?

December 7 came and went. The city was still embroiled in the proposed expropriation move, and Kuhl took his hard-won demolition permit, posted it on the site of the last of the great picture palaces, and signed its death knell.

He owned the "shell of the building" as the solicitor put it, for that was all that was left. Even the light bulbs had left the sockets. The organ was gone, the seats were out, and an era in downtown entertainment had ended.

Law students strike in Montreal

MONTREAL (CUP) — More than 1,200 law students marched on the Palais de Justice in Montreal last week protesting, "the indifference of authorities concerning the quality of professional legal training in Quebec."

It was the first time in recent years that law students from all over the province of Quebec joined together in a protest.

The students went on strike to protest a "breach of contract" by the law deans and the ministry of education in the long-demanded revising of the professional training program which gives lawyers training in the more practical aspects of law.

In March 1974, after years of discussion, the bar and the law deans agreed to establish a new program that would take professional training away from the bar, where it is currently taught, and place it back in the university milieu.

The bar agreed to this only on the condition that law students be required to follow a uniform curriculum which would prepare them for the bar exam.

Although this curriculum inhibits a student's ability to concentrate in areas of special interest, the students accepted the proposal and began taking the required courses. The new program was set to begin in September, 1975.

But recently the authorities have indicated that the new program will not be ready for next year because the ministry of education needs more time to consider the budgetary factors.

No S.A. wines at UBC

VANCOUVER (CUP) — The graduate student centre and the faculty club at the University of British Columbia will no longer stock South African wines.

The B.C. Liquor Administration Board recently said no more of the wines will be ordered in protest against what B.C. attorney-general Alex Macdonald called South Africa's "abhorrent" racial policies.

The wine can still be ordered from the LAB but only on an individual order basis.

However, graduate centre manager Edmund Vlaskaty said the centre's stock has dried up and no more South African wine will be ordered.

Ed Puls, associate manager of the faculty club, said the club still has South African wine in stock but no more will be ordered when supplies run out.

New Brunswick political patronage and cover-up charged

FREDERICTON (CUP) — Political patronage and cover-ups flourish in New Brunswick, according to a recent article by Philip Mathias in the Financial Post.

The article says a picture of "widespread political hank-panky" was shown by Financial Post investigations which turned up about 20 fresh examples of political impropriety.

Most of the cases cited by the paper concerned kickback schemes and numbered bank accounts.

The article quoted reliable sources as saying that kickbacks of between two and five per cent of sales were made to party funds by companies doing business with the government.

One automobile dealer who had sold cars to the government in the late '60s, said he had a relative deliver the kickback money in a briefcase after a call from Senator Nelson Rattenbury, now deceased.

A French language newspaper in New Brunswick claimed it had documents proving that the Hatfield government had forced a furniture supplier to pay a special commission to an ex-conservative member of the legislature. As part of the agreement the man was appointed the company's agent in New Brunswick. To cover the cost of the extra commission the company allegedly increased the price quoted to the government.

The government investigated the last incident without speaking to the company or asking the newspaper to show its documents. The result was a statement in the legislature saying the investigating committee felt the government "was getting fair value for the money spent and that it is where it terminated," Mathias said.

Another incident cited mentioned pressure on the government on school builders to use a plastic-foam material for roof insulation. The company making the material, until recently, had close ties with the Minister of Supply and Services Carl Mooers and a conservative MLA, Reg Mabey.

Earlier this year Mooers sold his interest in the firm and announced he would not stand for re-election. Before this however, an architect had written the government warning that the foam might constitute a fire hazard.

The FP article mentioned only one instance when a member of the government had been charged with mispractices. That case involved Tourism Minister C. Van Horne who was charged with accepting "rewards" for using his influence.

The only difference between the Liberals and the Conservatives in these practices, the FP suggested, was that the Conservatives were now in power.

Mathias said the New Brunswick press did little to help the issue.

"All the English dailies in the province are owned by the powerful local K. C. Irving family, and, for whatever reason, do no hard investigative journalism," the article said.

Mathias also said the RCMP had been ineffective in dealing with the problem and suggested that this too, might be because of government interference.

Carleton asks for FM

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Canadian Radio-Television Commission (CRTC) will decide in January whether or not Carleton University will be allowed to operate a student owned and controlled FM radio station.

If approved, the station will broadcast a mix of progressive rock, jazz and classical music over a 50-mile radius for 98 hours a week. It would broadcast between 4 p.m. and 2 a.m. weekdays and 24 hours a day on the week-end.

Community groups would also be allowed access to the station to present announcements or discussions.

Financing for the project has come from a $115,000 loan from the university, a $30,000 student grant and $10,000 from users' fees charged to some university departments.

A problem that might arise is the station's request to be allowed four commercial minutes per hour. While there are a number of campus FM stations in Canada, none has been given the right to broadcast commercials.

If the commercials are rejected, the station says it is prepare to modify its plans to reduce costs.

U of T's Radio Varsity will also apply to the CRTC for an FM broadcasting licence.

PART TIME EMPLOYMENT AVAILABLE - $3.00 per hr.

Persons are needed to participate in a study being conducted at the Faculty of Management Studies, University of Toronto. Employment will consist of completing aptitude and personality tests and solving problems under the supervision of other advanced graduate students.

The length of employment will be at least three hours.

McMurtry report moves Big Blue Machine on violence

TORONTO — Premier William G. Davis announced today the formation of the Ontario Hockey Council. The council was one of the recommendations of the report on the Investigation and Inquiry into Violence in Amateur Hockey by William R. McMurtry, Q.C.

The council will consist of 14 members plus one representative from the government's Sports and Recreation Bureau.

The Ontario Hockey Association, The Ontario Minor Hockey Association, The Metropolitan Toronto Minor Hockey League, The Northern Ontario Hockey Association, The Thunder Bay Hockey Association, The Ottawa District Hockey Association and its minor affiliate will all be members, each with two representatives.

The council will have seven sub-committees to develop programs and activities which relate to hockey in Ontario. These sub-committees will report regularly to the council, making recommendations for the council's consideration and action. The sub-committees are:

- Purpose and Objectives of Amateur Hockey
- Referee Development and Rules
- Coaching Development and Certification
- Parent Education
- Player Education
- Research
- Public and Media Education

Mr. Davis said he is pleased at the response to the McMurtry recommendations that severe penalties be imposed on those who are responsible for fighting, high sticking, spearing, etc.

"Various associations appear to agree with these recommendations due to the rule changes introduced since the report, and I am pleased that each association in Ontario has now taken steps toward this end."

Varsity coach, Tom Watt, heads up the committee for player education. Watt is a member of the Ontario Technical Committee and is actively involved in the coaching program (NCCP). He is also a Level 5 national coach.

PHE has won the Nankivell trophy emblematic of interfac rucker supremacy in a low scoring final held last Monday.

The only score of the game was a try by PHE's Gueli. Trinity was unable to put any points on the board.

PHE got into the final based on their 8-4 win over Eng in the semi-finals last week. Trin had won their semi-final in fine fashion 14-0 over Vic to earn their chance at the silverware.

In division III soccer semi-finals played last week, Eng III downed Trin B 2-0. Skules' goals came from Young and Duarte. Dentistry swamped Wycliffe 5-0 on goals by Koto, Kupernan, Lorenzo, Stross, and Palermo.

Tallies by D'Angelo, Grillawda, and Vince Ng gave Pharm a 3-0 win over Knox. Meanwhile New was stuffing Med B 5-0. Smith donated 4 goals to the Gnu effort while Lo supplied the other.

In division II, Med A beat Vic 4-1. Hung got two markers for the doctors. Howcroft and George got the others. McGregor replied for the red and gold.

Trin finally found a winning team as their soccer squad downed Jr. Eng. 4-0. Verney, Penhorwood, and Halley scored.

Finally, in division III New defeated Eng III 2-1 eliminating the plumbers from any further competition. New's goals both came from the toe of Medd while Ristevisci got one for skule.

Med A and Trin A will now battle it out today at 8:00 pm at the stadium for the Division II title.

Dent and Pharm will clash Thursday at noon on the front campus to see who will have a shot at New for the division III title. The final will be played Nov. 22 on the front campus.

In quarter-final lacrosse action, Erindale dumped Vic 8-0. PHE also trounced SMC A 8-4. Erin and PHE face a best-of-three final for the first division championship. The first game was Monday night. See story in this paper.

In division II, For A got by Innis 5-2 and Scar overpowered New 9-3. For and Scar will play a sudden death final tonight for all the marbles at 7:00 pm.

The well-sleazed Hookers from Innis squeezed by Huss' Wagons (held up due to a flat tire) by the score of 19-14 to gain a berth in the finals in touch football.

At the same time, the Leftovers were edging the Rhits from New 27-25 for the right to meet the Hookers (at Jarvis and Queen).

The best-of-three final series between the Hookers and the Leftovers start Tuesday on the back campus at 1:15 pm.

Alberta Eugenics Act favoured WASP minority

EDMONTON (CUP) — Alberta's Sexual Sterilization Act, repealed two years ago, was "clearly an attempt to put a WASP definition of normality on the province," says Tim Christian, who studied the act.

He computer analyzed the cases of 20 per cent of the 4,500 people presented for sterilization under the act and said that Indians, Ukrainians and Alberta's powerless were its chief victims.

The act, passed in 1928 allowed a four-man eugenics board to order sterilization, without consent of people judged mentally deficient.

The board could also authorize doctors to sterilize mental patients if they or a husband, wife, parent or guardian consented.

Although 4,500 people were suggested as candidates for sterilization only 2,500 were actually sterilized, said Christian. Of those sterilized, 64.7 per cent were women.

Indians and Metis made up 25.7 per cent of the sterilized from 1969 to 1972 when they represented only 3.5 per cent of the population. Those of British descent made up 46.8 per cent at the time but comprised only 22.9 per cent of those sterilized.

Eastern Europeans made up 35.1 per cent of those sterilized in the period from 1939 to 1943, when they constituted only 15.4 per cent of the total population.

The act was meant to prevent the mentally ill or deficient from passing mental illness or deficiencies on to their children.

But the act was scientifically unsound says Hellon explaining that few mental illnesses are known to have a genetic base. Retarded people tend to have normal children, he said, and about 60 per cent of the mentally ill are naturally infertile.

One of the most controversial findings was that the board authorized castrations on male patients "deemed to have an excess of libido."

Gross, Fedko lead Blues to York wins

By DAVE STUART

Varsity continued its domination of OUA waterpolo at York University over the weekend. Toronto posted three victories over RMC, Queen's, and York.

Blues were led by George Gross who tallied 14 goals to bring his season's total to 64. Alex Fedko also contributed 7 goals to the cause.

Toronto defeated RMC 14-6, Queen's 12-7, and York 8-3.

Blues have not lost a game this year, with nine wins and a tie. They are a surprising league leader considering they failed to make the playoffs last year.

In other waterpolo action Saturday, Queen's dumped York 13-2, York and Ottawa tied at 5-5, while Ottawa edged RMC 7-5.

The last regular season tournament is at Queen's next Saturday. Perhaps Blues' fans should go and tear down the goalposts.

PHE leads Erindale with 9-5 win in lacrosse finals

By DAVE STUART

In a tame affair at Hart House Monday night, PHE took a one-game lead in the best-of-three final match, defeating Erindale 9-5.

The game was mild-mannered compared to the first meeting of these two teams during the regular season, when a fracas on the floor led to both teams clearing the bench.

In the early going, Erindale's goaltender Marshall robbed PHE's Browne and McNeil from point blank range and enabled Erin to come out of the first quarter with a 4-1 lead.

Coghill picked up a hat trick for Erin in the first quarter. Erin's other goal came from Power on a relay from Gardner. PHE's lone tally came from Browne, who finally found the mark.

PHE, despite the score, remained cool and came back with three unanswered goals in the second quarter to tie the score. Browne got two and McNeil the other.

In the third stanza, PHE netted three more goals from, who else, Browne (for two) and McNeil.

It wasn't until the fourth quarter that the cheap shots and stupid penalties began occurring.

With Erindale's Wiley being punished in the penalty box, Browne notched a power play goal to give the jocks an insurmountable 8-4 lead with only 3:10 left.

Erindale did manage a goal while two men short with Coghill the marksman, on a solo effort all the way.

PHE finished the scoring with a beautiful three-way pass from McNeil to Bagg to Mahew in front of the net who drove home the ninth goal.

Erindale took the majority of penalties including a game misconduct to Geraghty for cussin' the referee.

Erindale now has their backs to the wall and must win on Wednesday to keep their hopes for the Dafeo trophy alive.

PHE's Browne winds up for a shot in last night's game while team mate breaks for the net. PHE won 9-5.

Football Blues defence is ready for the big game Friday night

By PAUL CARSON

Win or lose, the football season ends Friday evening for the members of the Varsity Blues.

Unfortunately, for defensive lineman Mark Sazio, the season ended Saturday afternoon when he broke his left arm during the Blues 45-1 victory over St. Mary's in the Atlantic Bowl.

Sazio, a 20-year old St. Michael's College student, had played well all season mostly at defensive tackle where his 5'11" size and 205 pounds were punishingly effective.

It's unfortunate that outstanding players such as Sazio rarely attract any attention from fans or media except when they get hurt.

Efficient anonymity, typified by Sazio, has been one of the keys to Linebackers Guido Iantorno and Julio Giordani each picked off an interception last week, and along with John Vernon and Nick Desimini they should be the keys to Blues defensive strategy Friday.

As an example of Varsity's bench strength, all-star linebacker John Martini is not listed as a starter since Vernon has played so well since Martini was injured four games ago against Queens.

The secondary was somewhat vulnerable against the short pass against St. Mary's but when the Huskies concentrated on those patterns, Blues recovered their poise to produce three interceptions.

With eight pass interceptions in Varsity's playoff wins over Carleton and Ottawa, co-captain Rick Nakatsu might well become the first member of the defensive unit to be named Blues' most valuable player since Mike Wright won the Johnny Copp Trophy in 1967. Perhaps this is a good omen since 1967 just happens to be Blues last championship season.

Veteran Doug Ball saved a touchdown Saturday with a key tackle on Varsity's three-yard line just prior to Huskies' abortive field goal attempt, and Al Brenchley, Chris Triantifilopoulos and Rick Jeysman also played very well.

We'll examine the starting offensive unit in Friday's paper.

This is the second College Bowl appearance for both Blues and Mustangs; both were winners before.

Ironically, it was a 21-16 victory over Western in a sudden-death Ontario final in 1965 that put Blues into the first invitational College Bowl played in a miserable rainstorm at Varsity Stadium.

Some Varsity football fans have voiced indignation that Blues are matched in the national final against a team they have already decisively beaten.

However, in that 1965 final, Western had finished four points ahead of Varsity and Blues were in the sudden-death game only because they had beaten the Stangs during the season. History, it seems, has repeated itself.

But why, one wonders, did the College Bowl promoters decide to play on a Friday night in late November at the CNE Icebox?

Maybe they've cornered the coffee and hot chocolate market. Especially Irish Coffee.

See hockey and football both, Friday

Sports fanatics will be able to take in both the Varsity-Laurentian hockey game and the College Bowl Friday evening.

The hockey game at the Arena, originally set for 8:00 pm—exactly the same time as the Blues-Mustangs kickoff at CNE Stadium—has been rescheduled for 5:00 pm.

Following the game, buses will be available to take fans to the CNE for the College Bowl game.

College Bowl tickets are available in the athletic office at Hart House, the SAC office and also at the CNE prior to the game.

Scar takes division I soccer title

As usual, Scar's shot went over the net. Erindale had the best of the game but lost 12-11.

By DAVE STUART

In what has to be the highest scoring game ever recorded, the soccer team from Scarborough defeated Erindale 12-11 yesterday at the stadium for the first division soccer championship.

Erindale's superior positional play gave them a big edge throughout the game and resulted in the first goal by Ted Sitski.

The west-enders maintained their advantage not allowing Scarborough more than a half a dozen shots on goal. Most of these shots were wide of the mark.

Scarborough did manage a goal in the final minutes of regular play when a penalty kick by Pompeo Morra rebounded of a defender and went in the net.

The game ended with the score tied and overtime was played. Overtime consisted of two ten minute halves. Neither team was able to score.

The final score was determined on the basis of penalty kicks. The first set was tied at 3-3. The second set was also tied at 4-4. The third set gave Scarborough the edge 4-3.

By adding the penalties to the actual scores obtained, the officials determined that Scar had won the game 12-11.

Defensive tackle Mark Sazio.

Blues' success this year, particularly on the defensive unit which was the key in most of the team's ten victories to date.

Sazio and his partner at tackle, Brian Craig, repeatedly shut off opposition running attacks up the middle while ends Geoff Sutherland and Lubomir Alexov repeatedly harassed enemy quarterbacks from their defensive end spots.

Sutherland, a second-year Phys Ed student, is the OUA nominee for the John Metras Award as the best collegiate lineman. Along with MVP nominee Mark Bragagnolo, Sutherland will attend the College Bowl awards dinner tonight when the national awards are announced.

At 5-11 and a beefy 235 pounds, the 24-year-old Craig is probably the pre-eminent Tuna, and in fact has lent his nickname to the entire defensive unit.

Average grade may soon be C

TORONTO

By MATHILDE VERHULST
Arts and science students can look forward to lower grade marks in the future if a report in the arts and science faculty is approved.

The report, which has already been approved in principle by the faculty's committee on academic standards, outlines proposals for new guidelines concerning grade distribution patterns in arts and science.

The three-page report, drawn up by a subcommittee of eight members mainly from the science departments, notes since the initiation of the New Program five years ago "a tendency for a significant increase in the percentage of Bs and a concomitant decrease in Cs in a number of courses and departments."

The report recommends, for the large introductory courses at the 100- and 200-series levels, a mean grade of C-between 62.67 per cent—should be the anticipated norm.

For 200-series level courses with university pre-requisites it suggests a mean of between 67-70 per cent. The present average grades of arts and science students is a B, about 70 or 71 per cent.

It suggests no grade distribution guidelines for higher level courses, although it states the grades at these levels tend to be high and fluctuate considerably from year to year.

The report proposes generally a B grade should indicate above average ability and achievement, while a grade of C should indicate "average performance."

A C grade, the report underlines, should be "acceptable and respectable... counting fully for credit towards a degree."

The subcommittee on grade normalization surveyed grade distribution patterns arbitrarily in arts and science courses for the academic years beginning 1969-70 to 1973-74.

It found "significant and justified differences in grade distribution patterns among different departments of the faculty, among different sections of courses of a single department and although less justified, even among different sections of a multi-sectioned course."

Arts and science faculty dean Robert Greene said the academic standards committee is "essentially in favour" of the report.

Greene stressed, however, "Nobody's decided anything yet," although the few responses received from committee members have been "very positive."

Greene said he wanted the report "thoroughly discussed" in each department before any decisions are made.

J. E. Cruise, associate dean of the faculty and committee chairman called the recommendations outlined in the report "gentle."

Cruise said the report at present "has no official status," but added "if it is accepted in "all or part of its recommendations" by the committee at its next meeting it "might go in the calendar in the future."

Rick Gregory, Arts and Science Student Union (ASSU) field worker, regarded the subcommittee's report "a typical way of approaching things on part of the faculty council."

He said the report "shows a concern with numbers rather than quality."

Gregory asked why the subcommittee's assumption that an increase in the number of Bs is "an indication of quality going down."

"Why assume that this is an indication of a lowering of standards?" he queried. "Why not assume that this is indicative of increasingly higher standards?"

Gregory said students today are working harder and reading more than in the past. "They fight like hell to get library space," as early as October, he added.

Gregory expressed concern that a lowering of the percentage of Bs assigned would lead to "more competition in classrooms and an even greater emphasis on marks."

He said the report "never seeks to define academic standards." He suggested the committee look at "teaching standards, curriculum and the role of teaching assistants" if there is concern about academic standards.

SAC executive assistant Chris Alnutt echoed Gregory's remarks. "Just lowering (the average) marks is not improving the quality of teaching," he maintained.

Alnutt said the important question is what is the norm. He said the report is "an attempt to regularize something which is subjective and always has been."

Cruise maintained the report's recommendations would not lead to a lowering of the average grade of U of T students.

He said if the average grade did go down, it would do so only in the large introductory courses.

"Standards are not going to fall," Cruise said. The recommendations are "an attempt to see that standards do not fall and that a B is to be considered above average performance."

He concluded, "If the committee implements some of the recommendations it would do our reputation good, not harm." Cruise referred here to the tendency of some universities to see U of T as a "cafeteria system."

Forster appointed Guelph president

Don Forster, number two man in the U of T administration, was named president of Guelph University yesterday.

Forster, currently vice-president and provost, will replace retiring Guelph president William Winegrad July 1, 1975.

An "absolutely delighted" Forster said he had indicated a year ago he wanted to leave U of T. He has been an administrator here since 1965, first as executive assistant to president Claude Bissell, then, in 1967, as vice-provost and since 1971 in his current position.

Forster said he felt a "challenge" rather than relief at leaving U of T for Guelph, which he said has clear plans for future developments in the humanities and social sciences, and a strong base on which to work. Guelph experienced strong enrolment gains this year.

U of T president John Evans lauded the "tremendous choice" by Guelph, saying it was "very fortunate" to have such an "experienced academic administrator. He has earned the respect of students and faculty," said Evans.

Evans has not said when he will name a successor, but said he will solicit advice from within the university before making a decision.

During his tenure at U of T, Forster accumulated an enormous wealth of knowledge about the university, as well as running an office with huge responsibility. He has often been accused of being the "power behind the throne" in the Evans administration.

As provost, Forster is the administration's link with the academic divisions and faculties within the university. As vice-president, he is chairman of the university's budget committee.

Forster is also the link between the academic divisions and Governing Council's policy-setting academic affairs committee.

Both Evans and Forster admit Forster wields a large amount of power. Evans says the appearance of power in the provost's hands is "linked to decentralized responsibility."

Forster himself, however, admitted his encyclopedic knowledge of the university may have contributed to his assumption of power.

Forster advised his successor, "Don't try and work as long hours as I've tried," and urged him or her to move towards more decentralized decision making with academic divisions taking more responsibility.

The three vice-provosts working under Forster—Milton Israel, Peter Meinke and John Hamilton—have all been given increased responsibility in a recent reorganization of Forster's office.

Israel has been tipped by insatiable oddsmakers as the likely successor to Forster.

Forster, 40, is a political economist who took his BA from U of T in 1956 as a Woodrow Wilson fellow, an MA from Harvard in 1958. He was appointed lecturer at U of T in 1960 and professor in 1970.

Forster has co-authored The Mackenzie King Record and Economics for Business, and worked with the Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science and the Canadian Annual Review as an editor.

Social work students lose parity bid

By SUSAN SLOTTOW
The academic affairs committee rejected a student proposal for parity representation on the Faculty of Social Work's top council Wednesday in favor of a faculty counter-proposal.

The faculty proposal of 16 teaching staff and eight students on the council was presented to the meeting by social work dean Albert Rose.

The move comes in the wake of heavy protests from social work students last spring against the council's policy-making committees, culminating in a two-day boycott of classes.

Students were fighting for the right to determine course content structure and marking break-down.

The social work faculty's council is the senior legislative and judicial authority of the faculty with respect to academic program, personnel and other key faculty operations.

Aside from the bid for equal representation with teaching staff on the council, the students' proposal also called for the dean to be chief administrative officer of the council, but a non-voting member.

The faculty proposal stipulates the dean as a voting faculty council member responsible directly to U of T's Governing Council. Governing Council student member Peter Jarrett, who sits on academic affairs, charged after the meeting, "There was no debate of the motion, only the questioning of witnesses—no discussion of technicalities. The motion was railroaded through."

Students at the meeting had complained that the two counter models should be turned back to the social work faculty for further negotiations.

When this attempt failed, student member Vernon Copeland unsuccessfully moved to adjourn consideration of the proposals until the next meeting so members would have time to give them more consideration.

Dean Rose argued the matter should be voted on immediately and not returned to the faculty for further discussion.

A further attempt of Copeland to propose amendments to the recommendations was scuttled by history professor Desmond Morton, who moved that the committee vote on the recommendations immediately.

Although Jarrett challenged the move on the grounds that Copeland still had the floor, the motion was passed.

Scarborough council in uproar

By CIM NUNN
Scarborough College Student Council is in a mess.

The council's books are being audited, a leading council administrator has resigned, large sums of money are missing, the president just got himself voted a $1,000 salary increase over strenuous objections, and the council is split into two factions, hurling charges and countercharges at each other.

The university auditors, alerted to the alleged financial mis-doings, are auditing the council's books and are preparing a statement. They refused comment on any aspect of the audit.

But in the interim 1974-75 audit report, the auditor found $475 of Scarborough College Pub unaccounted for the week of Sept. 3-9 received for.

The Interim audit also found no books of account existed for the pub, and that the pub manager couldn't count cash because there was no place to put the money. When the money was counted, it didn't tally with the daily cash report.

Paul Carson, hired last year as an administrator, resigned last Friday, saying "Some members of the council have adopted a private and public morality which I find totally unacceptable... In these circumstances, the only possible action for me to take is to resign."

Council president John O'Donohue recently succeeded in getting council to pass a motion to increase his salary from $3,200 to $4,200. O'Donohue had already drawn $3,100 of the $3,200 allotted to him this year.

Various charges of interception of private mail, attempts of political interference, accusations of altering council minutes and wildly conflicting reports of incidents are also on record in council meeting minutes.

Carson said the $475 missing from the pub represents the money the pub had given to the council during the first two weeks of school this year.

The pub was the only source of money this fall because funds from the university, SAC and APUS were late in arriving, he said.

O'Donohue said that not only was the $475 missing, but also $325 was unaccounted for in the college horse riding stable accounts. Carson said the figure was much higher.

Both O'Donohue and Carson put the blame on each other for the book-keeping and the political confusion.

Carson was hired only for "book-keeping and secretarial duties." O'Donohue said, and was given the title of administrator just because he liked it.

Carson agreed with this remark, saying "Yes, that's about right."

O'Donohue says Carson passed several amendments to the constitution last January without properly notifying council that one of the amendments concerned the duties of his position.

Growers financed Teamsters' trip to Toronto for debate

Two Teamsters union representatives involved in a debate with United Farm Worker representatives yesterday were forced to admit their trip to Toronto was financed by the growers.

The debate, over the UFW's boycott of California grapes and lettuce, was held yesterday at the Medical Sciences building auditorium before an audience of 70. Bitter charges and countercharges were exchanged between supporters of the two rival unions.

Although about 30 UFW members have been in Toronto for 15 months building support for the boycott, this was the first public appearance by Teamster representatives.

Teamster member Tony Mendez said it would be the first in a series of visits from pro-Teamster farm workers to try to counteract the UFW's increasingly successful boycott.

UFW spokesman Lupe Gamboa said the Teamsters' visit was an indication the boycott is beginning to hurt the growers, who now have to launch a counter-attack.

A major bone of contention for the UFW is the question of secret ballot elections to allow the workers to decide which union will represent them. Both unions said they were in favor of free elections.

But Mendez said the present contracts signed by the Teamsters were binding for the next three years.

However Gamboa charged that a bill requiring free elections was scuttled by the California senate after opposition from the Teamsters and the growers.

UFW member Jessica Govea gave an account of the history of UFW attempts to organize farmworkers in California since 1962. The first boycott finally succeeded in 1970 after a bitter struggle, but the victory was short-lived as the growers refused to sign with the UFW in 1973 and signed "sweetheart deals" with the Teamsters.

Govea accused the growers of inviting in the Teamsters without the knowledge of the workers and then collaborating with the Teamsters in suppressing the strike which followed.

There were over 4,000 arrests of picketers who defied injunctions obtained by the growers. Scores of Teamster "goons" caused numerous injuries and several deaths.

Amelia Rodriguez, a Teamster member who said she was once a member of the UFW, tried to turn the charges around. She claimed the UFW was trying to force itself on workers who didn't want the union.

Rodriguez said she was among the many who petitioned to bring in the Teamsters in 1973. She accused the UFW of terrorizing ranches where the Teamsters took over from the UFW.

Admitting she was a foreman, and not a field worker, Rodriguez claimed conditions were good in California and farm workers were well paid. "By boycotting grapes you are only hurting the farm workers," she maintained.

Gamboa said many reports had been done which confirmed terrible conditions for farmworkers, including crowded, filthy living quarters, inadequate washroom facilities in the fields, and extremely low wages amounting to $1.20 an hour.

Gamboa said the Teamsters claims of being in favor of free elections were false because they have not agreed to be on the same ballot as the UFW since 1966. UFW organizer Marshall Ganz charged that Rodriguez and her husband were on the Teamster payroll while claiming to organize the petition voluntarily.

The Varsity — Brian Pei

Lupe Gamboa said Teamsters' visit shows boycott hurts growers.

Pub representatives make unified demands

Student representatives from all eight colleges and faculties at the U of T and all six universities and colleges in Toronto last night agreed to present a unified set of demands to the provincial government over its proposed new pub licensing legislation.

The meeting was called in the wake of an Ontario government decision to introduce legislation this January taking away from student councils the power to operate pubs. The bill proposes each university have just a single licence, held by the administration.

Four motions were passed, including:

- To demand the government specify the content of the legislation (which it has so far failed to do, claiming oversight).

- To urge a moratorium on implementation of the legislation until September, 1975, pending comment from the parties affected. SAC president Seymour Kanowitch called it "ridiculous" to implement the legislation without seeking student opinion, saying it represented an attempt to "railroad" the bill through.

- To support the principle of student control over pub facilities.

- To support the continuation of 'special occasion' permits for campuses that cannot support regular pubs.

The meeting was organized at the behest of the Ontario Pub Association, a branch under the jurisdiction of the Ontario Federation of Students.

Kanowitch said both SAC and COPOUT (The Committee of Presidents of the University of Toronto) will press their respective councils to adopt the four proposals, and then approach the university administration to approve the proposals.

Kanowitch expected the administration would support continued student control, as he felt it unlikely the U of T would care to become involved in the extra bureaucracy of pub management.

Area MPP's will also be approached by student councils, and the Ontario Pub Association expects to hold a press conference early in December to denounce the government move.

No official government rationale has been given for the new legislation, which some suspect is a result of pressure from Ontario hotel and bar owners to protect their own businesses against student pubs.

If the legislation is passed, all pubs presently run by students will be handed over to university administration for control, along with any revenue they may produce.

Many students employed part-time in pubs may lose their jobs if an administrative takeover takes place.

Angela Davis to speak

Angela Davis, well-known black militant leader, will be speaking on the topic of racism at Convocation Hall at 8 pm as part of a SAC speakers series.

Davis is perhaps most famous because of her arrest and detention in the "Soledad brother" murder case. She was accused of providing guns for several black inmates trying to escape from San Quentin prison.

Despite the lack of a previous criminal record Davis was denied bail and spent many months in jail. The case became a cause celebre for black Americans and white supporters.

Although she was finally acquitted, many argue the case ranks as one of the clearest examples of political persecution in recent years.

Davis, however, was not new to controversy. She was fired from her philosophy post at UCLA in California in 1969 because of her membership in the Communist party. There was a massive outcry and her firing was declared unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court.

She returned to teach the following year but her contract was not renewed, this time for her activities with the Soledad brothers and the Black Panthers.

Finally she was charged in August in the death of a judge in the Soledad escape attempt and arrested in October after a three-month manhunt as a member of the FBI's 10 most wanted list.

During the next two years her attorney's attempts to get bail met with failure despite favorable recommendations from probation officers.

National defence committees sprang up to support Davis and the case received wide media attention. It became obvious to most that Davis was persecuted because she was a black, a militant and a communist.

Along with her fame as a militant, Davis is a noted scholar, having studied at the Sorbonne in Paris and Goethe University in Germany before returning to the U.S. in 1967 to study under noted Marxist philosopher Herbert Marcuse at Berkeley.

Executive will hear SDS appeal

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

Governing Council voted authorizing the executive to hear the appeal yesterday for the executive committee to hear the appeal of Anthony Leah and William Schabas.

A motion by student governor Steve Moses to provide the committee with authority to deal with both the verdict and the sentence, was voted down.

Moses made the motion after G.R. Thaler proposed the committee be given the option of: Quashing the sentence, suspending the sentence, varying the sentence or confirming and upholding the sentence.

Law professor J.B. Dunlop, who prepared a background paper to the appeal, said that Thaler's proposal entailed "giving discretion to the committee which might not legally be given."

Immediately after the motion authorizing the executive to hear the appeal passed, student governor Peter Jarret objected, saying that no discussion had been held. A vote by the council defeated the objection.

Caput voted June 29 to suspend Leah and Schabas for preventing controversial urbanologist Edward Banfield from speaking here last spring, alleging he expounded racist views.

After the meeting, Jarret called Chairman Harding's conduct "railroading". He said only one of the items had been given any attention.

Jarret particularly objected to item four which provides that non-student executive committee members unable to attend the meetings may be replaced.

Present at the meeting were demonstrators from Erindale College bearing signs reading "Boycott Erindale College Council (ECC)" and "ECC - Puppet Government".

At present the ECC exists only in an advisory capacity to Principal E.A. Robinson. Erindale students are seeking legislation from Governing Council to establish the ECC as the official governing body of Erindale.

The Student Administrative Government of Erindale (SAGE) voted this year to boycott the ECC. Only two of the allotted 60 students now sit on the council.

Demonstrators promised a large turnout at the next Governing Council meeting to spur action.

Society must examine health care

"Monopoly capitalism denies proper health care to the working man so that he'll be too sick to overcome the system."

— Unidentified student radical in excruciating pain.

By ANN SILVERSIDES

Concern over the criteria for admission to medical schools must lead to an examination of health care in our society, three panelists agreed Tuesday afternoon at a seminar on health care at Hart House.

The seminar, on the Political Economy of Health Care, was one of a series of topics related to medical practices being held in Hart House and sponsored by the Student Christian Movement (SCM).

Susan Larner, resource person for health and related issues for the City of Toronto planning board; Juanita Bay, a health care worker by profession currently working with the Bathurst-St. Clair task force and the Canadian Civil Liberties Association; and Dr. Jan Deutsza, NDP MPP and formerly doctor at Queen St. Mental Hospital, led the discussion.

There was a disappointing turnout of only two students.

The main issue discussed was how relevant health care, geared towards the needs of the community, can be provided.

Panelists agreed that positive health levels and the practice of preventative medicine are clearly desirable (if only for economic reasons) for people, doctors and the government.

Hospitals, with their research and teaching commitments, cannot adequately perform this function. Last February the province's ministry of health set up a task force, led by Dr. John Aldis, to fund community health centres on a fixed budget basis.

This funding is to the government's advantage (the staff and doctors are on salary), but it also provides the opportunity for a community to ascertain its own health needs, hire doctors and provide appropriate care, as Larner pointed out.

The example of the Don Vale health project was cited, where doctors make house calls and patients are encouraged to participate in their treatment. The project aims at total health care, not just the administration of treatment for a specific ailment.

Hospitals, it was pointed out, are not mobile; the patients must go to them. Out-patient departments usually provide follow-up for patients previously seen in hospital. Patients examined in emergency, if not ill enough to be admitted, are treated and then released. Follow-up care usually depends on the patient's persistence.

Controlling roles of the Canadian Medical Association and drug companies were also discussed. It was agreed that hospitals alone cannot meet the present needs for health care in the community.

Next Tuesday at 4 pm at Hart House there will be a discussion of Alternatives to Western Scientific Medicine. Dr. Charles Godfrey, who is involved with experiments in acupuncture at the Wellesley Hospital, and Dr. Eli Cass, former Metro coroner, will be speaking.

Sexist ads to be debated

Loyal staff readers, this is the big one.

At our weekly staff meeting today at 1 pm at 91 St. George St. we're going to discuss P.T. Barnum's statement, "There's a sexist born every minute."

Maybe so, but are we going to let them advertise in The Varsity? Staff members and anyone else interested are invited to attend — it ought to be a real circus.

Varsity should defend gays

We have watched with interest your coverage of protests against anti-gay attacks by the Toronto Star and Sun. While you carefully avoid editorial comment on the issues raised, you do seem to have been attempting to accurately report the editorial slanders of the two big daily newspapers.

The article, "Gays demonstrate to protest Star policy" (Oct. 11), however, did bring out a bias of at least one reporter — not against homosexuals, but against the Revolutionary Marxist Group. In the coverage of this demonstration, your reporter commented that a number of RMGers were present, but that gays on the demo did not know what the RMG was.

In any crowd, there will always be someone who does not know all the facts. It might even be that there are people who do not know what The Varsity is. But in this instance, we believe that your reporter failed in basic tasks of objective reporting. In finding the few gays who did not know what the RMG was, your reporter failed to note the activists who did — some in the RMG itself.

For example, a fact-seeking reporter might have noted that the demonstration was called by the "Committee for Media Fairness to Gays" which included the Body Politic Collective, the Gay Alliance Towards Equality, the RMG, the YS, and others. Such a reporter might have also glanced at the latest Body Politic which is on the newsstands, and which carries a centre spread on the Revolutionary Marxist Group.

The RMG does not just show its "support for the gays". Our record of defence stands on analysis and action. Your awareness of facts has definite shortcomings. The best method of curing such a malady is by going to the people of GATE and Body Politic before saying they don't know what the RMG is.

We encourage The Varsity to go further than correcting these mistakes. We call upon you to take up an unequivocal defence of the rights of gay organizations to exist, to have a press and to be able to respond in the mass media to bourgeois stereotypes of homosexuals. You might begin by publicly declaring that The Varsity will carry any ads refused by the Toronto Star submitted by gay organizations.

University has sex distinction

My husband and I recently received from the personnel department our "Option Election Form" for the pension plan. We were both employed at the University of Toronto as post-doctoral fellows and then as technicians; we both have Ph.D's.

Why did my form come to Mrs. M. Kornblatt while my husband's was sent to Dr. J. Kornblatt?

Racism must be well defined

It is apparent that "racism" has been for some time a topic of much discussion on this campus and throughout Canada. It seems only fair to demand that a carefully formulated, pertinent, and comprehensive definition of "racism" be agreed upon by all who have involved themselves in this question. The alternatives would seem to be the creation of obscurity instead of clarity among those truly concerned with racism, and the possibility of "racism" being used by propagandists for purposes more strategic than altruistic.

That there indeed are "races" may itself be a presumptuous statement, one that might very well involve one's beliefs concerning the nature of "man". But if there are races throughout the world, it would certainly follow that an individual does not cease to be a member of his race, by changing geographical location or citizenship. And if there are races, then if the word "race" is not to be meaningless, it must denote characteristics which some people taken together possess, and which others do not.

In some cases, an individual may, consciously or subconsciously, retain these characteristics: he may be proud of his race, or simply take it for granted. However, an individual may, willingly or unwillingly, try to adopt the characteristics of another race. If this latter is the case, there may be difficulties in disowning and removing old racial characteristics, on the one hand, or in accepting and realizing new traits, on the other hand. Conflict between or among races becomes possible.

History has demonstrated that, if over the generations, members of a race confine social relationships and procreation to within their race, then the more clearly will they define themselves racially. It is only for obviously biological reasons that, on the basis of the word "procreation" used here, the statement "genetically different" has any meaning. When therefore one describes a race as "genetically inferior", it may for example be dismissed as an emotional statement of one's awareness of his own "race-ness", albeit a negative statement thereof. Or again, it may be accepted as a statement of the fact that members of a certain race have been finding it from difficult to impossible, as a race, to adapt to a problematic environment, in that a possible solution might involve their moving "outside themselves," indeed, "diluting their stock."

Invariably, especially in the cosmopolitan situation as found in Canada, and given the problems of the present 20th century, members of defined races will adapt in differing ways, conceivably to the extent of threatening the modicum of unity on which the nation relies for its very survival.

It follows from the above that any discussion of either "racism" or "racism in Canada", after it has proceeded by defining the terms used and by outlining the philosophies of man being presupposed, should then not neglect the fact that, although Canada already is the home of many different races, it has been the homeland for many generations of some few races. If there is any sense of nationhood in Canada, it would be wrong to divorce this sense from those who have developed it. Yet, it is true that there are others who would prefer to see only one homogeneous race, a pure mixture of all races.

It is hoped, therefore, that especially in a university community, there might not be merely concern, but intelligent concern, over an issue such as "racism". And intelligent concern will begin only with a clear understanding of the words used to express this concern, and with just as clear an idea of the questions involved. The Varsity can be valuable in this, by encouraging such a standard in those articles it chooses to bring to the attention of this community.

Buck passes on anthropol library

It seems odd that the sub-committee of the university library would claim that the matter of anthropology's reading room was not under its jurisdiction "because the body deals only with U of T, and not departmental libraries."

(Varsity, Nov. 8.)
We first proposed a departmental reading room in 1965; the response from the chief librarian was then negative. It was not until a year later that our argument for such a critical facility found favourable ground, and the motion was presented in Council by the chief librarian (and passed) with the following riders: First, that the reading room stock only duplicates from the main library; second, that we raise our own supporting funds; third, that we relinquish Departmental space in the (then yet to be opened) new library. We agreed to these conditions and have honoured them.

The budget estimate from the Department in 1966 requested funds of the Dean for books which he indicated he would allow with the agreement of the chief librarian. This was not agreed to; therefore, the reading room, with its coffee fund, slush funds, and ASU co-operative support of considerable strength, managed to survive. The Department not only did without the large (and very expensive) square footage in Robarts, it reduced its own laboratory space in order to establish this valuable facility. It also appointed and paid for a librarian.

All things considered, it seems to me quite nonsensical of the Library sub-committee to use nonrelevance as its buck-passer. Clearly we put a lot into that reading room; just as clearly do we save Robarts a lot of money.

One of the amendments regarding Carson's responsibilities, said O'Donohue made Carson "responsible to the council" rather than to the council president. This would have given Carson much more freedom to do what he liked, O'Donohue said.

Carson denies he was trying to change his responsibilities, saying he has always been responsible to the whole council rather than to an individual, at his own request.

In September, O'Donohue asked Carson to be an executive assistant, responsible only to the council president. Carson refused, saying the January amendments were not an attempt to prevent such a situation.

O'Donohue said Carson's presence "truncated the natural development of several members of the council" and that Carson took on duties which were essentially the responsibility of the other council members.

But Carson said he was ordered to be speaker of the council against his wishes, and did not try to usurp other council members' responsibilities.

"As far as truncating their natural development, I maintained from the start that I would give advice to both sides." Carson said he was used by both sides as a political tool.

Explaining the poor book-keeping, and the unaccounted funds, O'Donohue says it was a case of poor book-keeping by Carson.

Council vice-president Don Allen was more emphatic, saying Carson "was not doing his job; there were no books", but he did not blame Carson for the missing funds.

Carson said the poor book-keeping could be partly attributed to the late arrival of the U of T auditors. Carson said he couldn't change from a simple book-keeping method to a better one until the auditors had finished to avoid changing the system twice.

Carson also said "O'Donohue told me not to do the stables' books."

Carson also said the problem of keeping accurate records was magnified by several instances of cheque stubs bearing no dates.

Because of this, and the absence of bank statements, Carson said he stopped keeping the books "after four or five" cheque stubs arrived.

O'Donohue believes a common safe for pub, stables and general accounts money is partly the reason that funds are unaccounted for.

He says the safe was often left open at the same time his office door was open.

"I want council members to feel free to come into my office," he said, "but Paul was silly to leave the safe open when the door was open."

Carson says he was too trusting of council members in money matters. He says the unaccounted for money from the pub can be explained in three ways: one reason was that money was given to the council in the fall, and "the other two are a little messy."

Carson said O'Donohue and two vice-presidents had access to the safe, and O'Donohue had another set of keys to the pub.

But Carson said, "It would be irresponsible to blame one person outright when four people had access."

O'Donohue also raised the ire of many council members when he successfully got a $1,000 council raise. Some council members, including Carson, said O'Donohue had only $100 of this year's salary left.

O'Donohue said his duties, including membership on several committees, warranted the raise, even though many members questioned the legality of his move.

On Sale At Your Newstand Now!

Gov't may rehash grass laws soon

OTTAWA (CUP) — The federal government is expected to unveil its long-awaited legislation to soften criminal penalties relating to marijuana and hashish in the near future.

The new law is expected to reduce the penalties for possession of marijuana and hashish by prescribing only a fine for most offences.

It is expected the new legislation will allow the level of fines to be raised if the offence is repeated and jail terms will be ordered for offenders only if they cannot or will not pay the fine.

The new legislation will place marijuana and hashish in the "soft drugs" category under the Food and Drug Act. The cannabis drugs are now under the Narcotics Control Act, which lumps them in with hard drugs like heroin.

The new law also distinguishes between importing and trafficking in cannabis for personal use by allowing prosecutors to proceed in court by indictment or summary conviction.

The unveiling of the new law follows four years of hesitation by the government and two years of waffling by the Liberal cabinet since the outline of the new legislation was announced in July, 1973 by former Health Minister John Munro.

The LeDain Commission on the non-medical use of drugs recommended in June, 1970 that imprisonment for the possession of all mind-altering drugs should be abolished, but the recommendations were rejected by the Liberal cabinet.

The introduction of the new cannabis legislation has caused angry protests from within the Liberal party caucus. Several MP's have called for a "free vote" where MP's are not bound to vote with their party but can vote on their own on the legislation.

Politics and the man: Bissell and the U of T

Halfway up Parnassus

Claude Bissell University of Toronto Press

The actors in a memoir aren't supposed to stoop to review it. But since even the most recent chapters in this book should have begun "once upon a time", and since I have no intention of pulling a Floyd Patterson and entering the ring again, I am going to break the rules. Claude Bissell has written a lively, personal history of the University of Toronto, and it brings back a flood of memories.

But they are memories, and to read the book is to understand how much the mood of university politics has changed. The last, and most contentious, chapters deal with the "student movement", and that stopped moving about three years ago. It is refreshing to realise that at least someone up there — even if only halfway up there — took us seriously. We all get told off for spoiling the peace of Bissell's silver years. "The book is unapologetically prejudiced and deeply biased", he writes in the preface, but he also warns us that he kept a diary and all his letters. The people who write history can make it as well, and no doubt amongst many people this will remain the definitive record of those few, short years when the forces of civilization were threatened by a small band of ill-mannered fanatics who later disappeared into the night as quickly and inexplicably as they had arrived.

The early part of the book is an artful recollection of Bissell's years as an undergraduate at Toronto and it gives the best insight into the make-up of the later President. He joined a community which gave him great encouragement, stimulation, and friendship. He had great teachers; the portraits of these men, some of whom were to become his colleagues, are the best part of the book. Ironically, Bissell has very little to say about his class mates. You would never have known there was a depression, and the only mention of politics in this period is that he was glad to resign from the secretaryship of a co-operative dining club at Cornell because it meant he wouldn't have to listen to dreary arguments about the Spanish Civil War.

The University was, from 1932, his home. The few brief years away, at Cornell, in the army, and for a year at Harvard in 1967-68, were brief departures from the institution that was to mould him and that he, in turn, did so much to re-make. Since the university that I came to in the mid-sixties was so different, and my experience after so different, it is interesting to reflect on the vast changes that took place. Dr. Bissell presided over them, and in a series of instructive chapters describes the "corporate revolution" in his usual cogent and epigrammatic style.

After his return to Toronto in 1946, Bissell was quickly picked out for administrative responsibility, and by 1950 had become Sidney Smith's indispensable assistant. He was obviously being groomed to take over, and after a brief stint as President of Carleton, became President of the University of Toronto in 1958. The bulk of the book deals with the period from 1958-1971, and falls into two parts. The first recounts the expansion of the University; the second is his interpretation of "The Troubles", and the great constitutional changes that marked his last years in office.

The major point about the expansion is that the University emerged from genteel poverty to corporate strength. In many ways Bissell's description reads like the basis for a radical critique of the university. Much more elegantly written, of course (not difficult this), but with precisely the same gist. The needs of national economic policy demanded a larger, vastly more skilled and highly trained workforce. The universities were told, were endorsed both by the right and left: Peter Brucker on the right and John Kenneth Galbraith on the left (sic) were both agreed that the universities were the key institutions in the new economy which would supply the "new class" of knowledgeable people who would, basically, run the world. Bissell sums up the argument in a slightly Boosterish passage: "I thus came to the presidency at an opportune time: the need was manifestly great and conclusively documented; endorsement and encouragement came from all sectors of society; the resources were there waiting to be marshalled by energetic leadership. I thought of the installation exercises as a public declaration of the new expansive era."

The graduate school was expanded; so were the professional schools. New buildings went up everywhere. In ten years the face of the University had been transformed, financing from federal and provincial sources consolidated, research was expanding, new colleges were built. The leather-elbowed don gave way to dynamic technocrat. And presiding over it all was an energetic, charming, abrasive, and self-confident man, Claude Bissell.

When I first came to Toronto in 1966, I didn't know anything about this. Nor did I know Claude Bissell. What I saw was a sprawling, impersonal, cosmopolitan, and initially overwhelming place. I lived in residence at University College for two years. The first year I spent studying history, partly because I enjoyed it and partly because I was too daunted by what I saw beyond my books to look up. I can remember having an argument with my first great friend at University, now a teacher in Zambia, where I defended American foreign policy in Vietnam. My first involvement with "politics" came through the Teach-In on China, a vast conclave of argument, films, and discussions which had been organized by a group of students and faculty. That got me thinking, and certainly by Christmas my views about Vietnam, Canadian foreign policy, and the political world had changed.

The second thing that hit me that year was the University College festival. It was organized by Al Kamin, the gentle man who almost single-handedly turned on Sir Daniel Wilson Residence. (Yes, folks, there was a time when drugs on campus meant, and only meant, what you got at Tamblin's). The administration of the college didn't want to encourage people to break the law. For those of us who didn't share Kamin's mysticism and devotion to Timothy Leary, the political issues around the Festival became most important: the right to talk about drugs, to question the law, and to be able to run a controversial project of our own without the interference of the administration, however well-meaning. A liberal issue, but then you have to start somewhere.

Student politics had by my second year become less remote, and for the first time I discovered a community in the University of common experience, humour, and politics. The major issue at that time was the Vietnam War: it united the old left and left liberals on the faculty with the student left, and along with the Teach-Ins were the last time this kind of political co-operation existed. For by this time students had already begun to focus their political sights on the University.

The culmination of the anti-war effort that year (1967-68) was the having a "messianic complex... a pinkish Rupert Brooke turned into a gray John Knox in shirtsleeves", Gary Webster a hardened operator and Andy Wernick an apocalyptic dogmatist, I am almost embarrassed by the praise. Only D'Arcy Martin comes off worse. He is described as "mature".

There is some gloom in these last pages, but this is understandable. I Bissell at his most typical.

"Dow demonstration", and already it was clear that the University itself was implicated in the argument. One of the major premises of the "expansive university" was its integration into the corporate world. Dow Chemical made napalm for the U.S. war effort. Dow Chemical of Canada, like the government, and every other large corporation, recruited students in interview sessions on campus. The issue was joined, and Toronto had its first sit-in. The Dow recruiter left, temporarily, and in typical Toronto fashion the University set up a student-faculty committee (a parity committee no less) to decide on general guidelines for recruitment on campus. More students were politicized, the engineers, law students, and medical students were outraged, and the SAC began to take itself seriously as a political body, presenting a common line on political and educational issues.

All of which is by way of personal introduction to the last part of Dr. Bissell's book. I was on the SAC executive in 1968-69, and was a member of the Commission on University Government, so we saw a good deal of each other. I am described at first meeting as "a rather diffident, mild youth who makes extreme statements to keep up his courage", but obviously improved since he later discovered that I had "a quick mind, a talent for easy public discourse and... a lively sense of humour". (But, then, so does a used car salesman). Since Steven Langdon is described as wrote earlier that Claude Bissell made the University of Toronto his home. He must have thought us pretty boorish guests. We did not regard the university primarily as a home, or as the single institution to which we owed our loyalty. The University was not the place it was in 1932, and we did not share the experience of the young Claude Bissell.

There is another reason why this account of the years after 1967 is "biased", and that is that he was no longer in control of events. Whatever difficulties Bissell may have had with his Board at various times, it is clear that in the "expansive mood" he had called the shots. The President wanted to close off his years by re-making the top governing structure: he was making speeches in the mid-sixties about the need for ending the "double innocence" of a financial Board and an academic Senate, and thought he had successfully manoeuvred the Board into quietly accepting its own demise by the fall of 1968. When the students refused to accept the original terms for the Commission on University Government, and convinced the faculty to accept a committee with the Board only participating as observers, it was clear that his calculations had been upset. The memory of that faculty meeting in October 1968 still rankles, and from that point on it was a struggle to keep him committed to the cause of reform.

He was not an active member of the Commission, partly because of his other responsibilities, partly because he had convinced himself that since it wasn't the original body he wanted it wouldn't produce anything. He was proved wrong, and I don't think he has ever appreciated how discredited the old Board was among the vast majority of the faculty and students. By the fall of 1968 the future of the Board was not an issue: we wanted the Commission to talk about more important problems than how best to inter the defunct remains of the old regime.

Dr. Bissell is not a neanderthal, and his one great gift with student politicians was that he understood ideas and their force. He had imagination and wit. But he enjoyed political argument more than he enjoyed, or understood, politics. Which is why he never really liked student politicians. We insisted on talking about power, the social responsibility of the University, the relationship between the structure and content of education and the ethics and values we would go into the world with as citizens. We talked about capitalism and war, just as the boring students had in his co-operative dining club, but we also insisted on dealing with the University as a social institution, an institution which was largely unreformed and which insisted that it had to be hierarchical, stratified, corporate, closed in order to pursue its chosen task, the pursuit of excellence.

Looking back now, I think our major mistake as political students was to put too much effort into the politics of the university, not at the expense of our education, but at the expense of our understanding that much more of the world lies beyond its walls than within. The clash between the world of politics and the university destroyed the peace and civility of the institution, and no passages reveal the real fear and horror that this caused than those dealing with the Clark Kerr incident, his speech at University College, the troubles over discipline, and the sit-in on the day-care issue. I can remember remarking to Bissell after the Clark Kerr episode that I had seen worse backtracking at political meetings and that he had treated it as such he might have been able to retain control. He writes in this book that "This was a different and more mysterious terror. Christine (Mrs. Bissell) never forgot the experience—the feeling that an ugly genie of hate had suddenly enveloped the room." (141)

The "real revolution" for Bissell in his book is the great change in university government. I can't agree. There was nothing revolutionary about getting rid of the Board and establishing the Governing Council.

I rarely agreed with Claude Bissell's policies, a predictable amalgam of John Stuart Mill, Matthew Arnold, and J.K. Galbraith. His was corporate liberalism with a human face. But behind all politics lies a man, and he is a man of great substance and style. There is some arrogance and a little vanity in these pages; he is surprisingly deferential to the captains of industry on the Board and churlish about his opponents on the left. It is a little odd that George Drew gets less personal criticism than Steven Langdon. But I like to think that such misplaced miserliness is uncharacteristic. He is by nature a generous and vital man. The trains run on time now, but the place is much duller without him.

theatre forging a new form of drama

"It is a tale of bar rooms, wheels, horses, nuns, tops, convent yards, derailed trains, homeless boys, tavern brawls, refinements, squalors, wedding cakes, drunkards — and ghosts." This second Reaney Donnelly play, The St. Nicholas Hotel (Wm. Donnelly Prop.), is also a race — the second leg of a race against the bigotries of the Old World and the hypocrisies of the New. The goal is the chance for a decent, quiet life of freedom — old Mrs. Donnelly's vision of the sea, blurred to violence in the "glass of mystery, time and trickery".

In his introduction to Part One, James Reaney said the one "vital" fact about this family was, "They lived!" And they live again at the Tarragon Theatre, even before the 'play' begins, while the cast gathers on stage to sing old Irish ballads and to spin (expertly) the top. Near the end of the play, an angry mob of Biddulph townfolk murmur beneath the audience (almost literally implicating us and our subconscious mania for conservatism and scapegoats), before erupting onto the stage and the Donnelly doorstep — only to be beaten back like mice when old Donnelly fiddles an Irish jig. It is this sheer joy and exuberance in life that overwhelms you.

The play is a flashback performed on the bar-room floor of the St. Nicholas Hotel, concentrating on the lives of two of the Donnelly boys — Michael and William. It follows their rip-roaring success with the Opposition Stage (London to Crediton 20 minutes faster than Patrick Finnegan), their amours and imprisonment, the deaths of James and Michael (in 1891). The hotel counter at the back of the stage continually reminds us that we are as curious in 1974 as the traveller in 1900 who asks from the counter, "Tell me why you were hated?"

In answering that question Reaney gives us the facts — and an eternal morality play. When the rival driver, Edward Brooks, is killed in a coach race by a loose wheel, William answers his brother's anguished accusation — "They'd accuse us anyway!" If the Donnellys did wrong, they did it with a flair: James, for instance, who is "just sort of let out at night", saunters into a hotel ("Nice bar you used to have") and makes a citizen eat his police warrants — "I'm only feedin' him the ones we didn't do". By contrast, old Stubbs with his political ambitions, drunkard Ryan and young Carroll, make war because they are trying to exercise something rotten in their own souls. They are, if you like, the 'bad' mythmakers — they take labels like 'Blackfoot', 'Catholic' or 'Jew', and club the world with them. The Donnellys, the actors, and we the audience should be those who can play 'the blue guitar' sweetly — who have fertile and flexible imaginations.

The Varsity — David Dowling

In his production notes to Listen to the Wind, Reaney says, "Art is made by subtracting from reality and letting the viewer imagine or 'dream it out'"; and introducing Masks of Childhood, "Plays are like human bodies... the onlooker should get the sense of an organism, a pulsating dance in the out of forms." Following the ideas of his former teacher and thesis supervisor, Reaney achieves in his drama the best 'Fryian' blend of realism and symbol, or as Reaney puts it, 'document' and 'myth'. There is an 'archetype' of his method in the play — the sublime moment when William Donnelly and Jim Carroll turn the theatre into a courtroom, and each dance out their signatures. Carroll's of course is smudged and sounds like a dyspeptic trumpet: Donnelly's is a merry ballet. Voila! From document to myth in a masterly pas de deux.

You may remember the Shamrock Concert Co. who interrupted the first Donnelly play to perform The Black Donnellys. This time, in Act Two, Reaney introduces 'A Detective's Diary' to relate how the dastardly Scandrett (Michael Hagan) put the Donnelly boys behind bars. Here, the Donnellys are not just misinterpreted in popular myth, they are ensnared. But Reaney's ambivalent attitude to his subject is not fence-sitting, nor is it distortion (as are some of the paperback accounts). He uses his thoroughly documented historical facts as a springboard towards essential metaphysical questions about life and art, spectators and artists.

Reaney is at his weakest when he tries to suggest 'real' motives for action — the continuity of the third act, for instance, is upset by the return of Jim Carroll. Reaney spatters his target with a needlessly repeated scene to demonstrate the man's fixation with Mrs. Donnelly, who thanks to Carroll's mother's deathbed curse has become, intolerably, both the white mother and the black witch and even one of the Donnelly boys is made to say, "The living must obey the dead". Nevertheless, out of all this vague psychological analysis comes the eloquent symbol of the signature. Is there any way to get off the wheel of cause and effect? How far are we emmeshed in our own myths — whether they be of our religion, our family, our province's history, even of our comic-book detective hero?

Placing the imaginative emphasis on the spectator as he does, and making of his play a playbox — Reaney runs the danger of discarding form utterly for the virtue of spontaneity and improvisation. But even a collage can be good or bad — and if there is always one more toy, one may become bored. You may say that the rambling, swirling quality of Reaney's docu-drama is an appropriate symbol of the spinning wheel of fate, the flux of history and our changing attitudes towards it, a purposefully unstructured presentation of material from which each of us will assemble his own myth. But one feels a certain aimlessness, particularly in the third act.

The time changes also are confusing; perhaps the problem lies with the project itself. I wonder if the Donnelly story can sustain a trilogy — and whether 'A Trilogy' had a more grandiose ring about it suitable for the forging of the first Ontario Myth. The first play had plenty to do establishing the ethos — the ritual chanting of place names, the sticks, the stones. But here Reaney is hanging fire.

The first act bows along as fast as the coaches, with the brilliant lyric (Maggie and William) and comic (Parson McGuire) interludes. But there is only one death to build to; and while the growing anger of the townsfolk is well sustained, under the diabolic leadership of Carroll (Don MacQuarrie — a stunning performance), we lose sight of the Donnellys as a family unit.

I think part of the fault lies in the juggling of actors, and the actors' approach. Reaney's aim is a theatre "to imitate imitation itself" — and in the evocation of objects or moods, Keith Turnbull's troupe is superb, e.g. the train, the coaches, toll gate. But I think the actors could do more to get into each character they adopt. The wonder of impersonation is that we see the actor and the personification — and the whole play would be heightened if we could almost see the actors as they moved in and out of character, in and out of myth. The atmosphere of a local performance is always vividly there at the Tarragon, with the bare stage lights, graffiti-ed walls, and barn-dance floor surrounded by chairs. These chairs, however, cramp that swirling, enveloping movement which was so effective in Sticks and Stones. Less effective too in this play is the lighting. There is too much full brightness on those bare reflecting boards. There was only one brief torch to match the superb moment of terror when the model house was set on fire in darkness, in Part One. Similarly, the final crowd scenes are barer and tamer — I would have liked to see more darkness, shadows and flames.

But it is only upon a surface of perfection that these few seams stand out. I am sure that the trilogy together will conform with Reaney's purpose: "Let us make form out of 'this' documentary on one side and myth on the other." david dowling

royalty at

Nicholas Monsarrat who was involved in the early years of the Stratford Shakespearean Festival when he was Information Officer to the British High Commissioner here, complains in his autobiography about the unwanted popularity of the Festival.

"This stepped-up invasion," he says, "stemmed from the mother lode of Canadian snobbery, Toronto. Socialite Toronto, a generous supporter from the beginning, was now going for Stratford in a very big way indeed. It sent along its best team, all ready and primed to do the Shakespearean bit on the right night, in the right clothes, at the right social temperature."

"If one looked carefully it became clear that these were the same people who each November, appraised so discerningly the livestock at Canada's other big occasion, the Royal Winter Fair. However, there was a delicate piece of social distinction here. While they put on full evening dress to look at the rumps of bulls and horses, they were dinner-jackets for the actors."

They were all wearing full evening dress at the Royal Winter Fair last weekend. But not only because of the bulls and horses. Princess Anne and her husband Mark Phillips were there as well.

We were surprised to receive the invitation to the press reception for the couple. Nevertheless we went.

Two of us went. Perhaps we thought we might get "the Big Scoop."

Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip gave an undisclosed sum of money to University College last summer for its renovations. Would the princess know how much?

Or maybe she could tell us which was the ubiquitous soft drink she and her husband seemed to drink in preference to anything else.

There was a receiving line. The first burly RCMP man said "tell the next man" (also burly, also from the RCMP) "your name and newspaper affiliation." You told him. He told the princess. For there she was, half hidden by him.

You shook hands. Hers was gloved. And then you shook hands with Phillips.

And then you went to the open bar. And you stood around, waiting for the princess to finish receiving and to start circulating.

The publicity agent had warned us. You stand there, he said, you do not approach her, you wait for her to approach you. She speaks first. And you do not ask her any questions.

We stood around — looking as approachable as we could.

It seemed as if the princess was actually introduced only to Star and Globe and Mail people — but that didn't matter all that much because whenever she did engage anyone in conversation everyone else in the

'tis pity at h.h.

The audience on the first night of 'Tis Pity She's a Whore was much inclined to giggle — and there are times when this production teeters on the verge of self-parody.

Ford has made this difficult to avoid. He has written a shocker, and plays which set out to violate an audience's sense of morality while keeping it glued to its expensive seats need delicate handling, as events at the Royal Alex this last week have proved.

But Ford has liberally sprinkled his play with near-impossible lines and some of the most flat-footed bawdy you are ever likely to hear. He also indulges in a good deal of emotional push-me — pull you, bouncing around most uncomfortably between comedy and tragedy. Shakespeare mixes hornpipes and funerals — but at least he doesn't bump off one piper half way through the third act, or have the other's eyes put out in the fourth. The audience is bound to feel a bit confused, and only flawless acting and absolute certainty on the director's part are going to keep the play in balance.

There were some good performances at Hart House. Pauline Donoho was exquisite as that fallen angel, Annabella; Simon Waegemaekers caught exactly the weighty irascibility of Signor Donado; and Bob Lackenbauer dominated the last scenes of the play as the sinister Vasques. Several other actors unfortunately did not have the vocal or emotional control to carry their demanding roles.

The director Jon Redfern is

obviously quite certain of the muted effect he wishes to create and he has achieved an atmospheric coherence not always present in Hart House shows. But even though he is well in command of individual scenes, he inexplicably lets the pace drop for tedious and unnecessary scene-changes.

The production does not quite overcome the difficulties Ford has placed in its way — which is a shame for it does have many things in its favour.

Visually, it is excellent. Marion Walker has designed a set of almost Palladian simplicity, a semi-circle of flats interrupted by narrow corridors which has been most effectively lit by Michael Whitfield. And I don't think I shall forget Bergetto's (Douglas Beattie) first stuttering entrance, Poggio's (Ian Davey) cry over his dead master, Annabella's declaration of love or her "Unkind, unkind" as she dies stabbed by her brother lover. At such moments there was no giggling. The play deserved — and got — the audience's full attention.

immediate area could cluster around and listen.

She really didn't speak to one person in particular. Her utmost casual comments inevitably tended to be pronouncements—or to be taken as such. You could hear all the reporters making mental notes of what the princess said to them, and, equally as important, what they said to her.

For everyone did ask her a lot of questions once she was at the centre of a group. They asked a lot of ridiculous trivial questions which gave her the opportunity to seem remarkably commonsensical and down-to-earth.

She spoke about her husband sleeping on the plane ride over. "He can sleep anywhere." She spoke about the newspaper report that her husband works as an army officer only four months of the year. Erroneous, she said. He works "full time." In fact, they would arrive back in England at 9 am on Tuesday and Phillips would go to work at 11. She was worried that they might miss a connexion and that he would be late.

She spoke about training her horses, about racing them, about winning races, about losing them. She told us she likes to travel but she's essentially a home person.

Princess Anne, Girl Bore. But she does look much better in reality than she does in her pictures. Her nose is really not that long. She really does not have buck teeth. She has a clear complexion. She has a good profile.

No one paid too much attention to Phillips although he seemed to make a much better impression on everyone than she did. He has a firm handshake. He looks you in the eye. She seems to take note of you as an individual. He has a smile that at times borders on a grin. And at times he is engagingly shy.

One could go on. But what is worth considering is the contrast between the low news value of the princess and the high amount of news copy that is churned out about her. Perhaps the ponderous detail that the newspapers pass on as news tells us far more about them than it does about her.

It may be insufficient certainly to say that the monarchy is of value to the degree that it distances you from a newspaper's presentation from reality—from its narration of who said what, who met whom, who wore what. But that's one value I would definitely assign it.

Anne and Phillips are, to be honest, distinguished solely as examples of what a social system can produce. But that is enough. They "prove" the society—to do that they simply have to exist.

horses, pigs, cows and diamonds

Everyone seems to love the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair.

The rich in tuxedos and sable, and the odd glitter child mix freely with young couples, dragging pre-schoolers around the animal stalls.

Just what is the attraction? There's the life size sculpture of HRH Ann made out of butter, some $10,000 1975 cars and instant caricatures for 50c.

The International Photo Display, has equal proportions of old men, starving Vietnamese, and beautiful women.

You can watch chickens hatching in a mirrored incubator.

There are insect displays, plants for sale, plastic flowers for sale—there's even an organ-playing madam—all the newest (farming equipment).

But it is surely the animals who are the heart of the Fair.

As you wander through the cattle stall area, you see the most pampered animals in the world.

Their dedicated owners sleep in stalls, albeit curtained and cosy, next to their cows & horses.

The Percheron teams live in decorated stalls with name plates over their heads.

For those who follow Olympic Jumping, teams from Canada, the U.S., France, England, Ireland and Germany are competing for plates, ribbons, and cash.

In all of this glitter, I found the Semex booth the most interesting. Deceptively underplayed, this is behind most of the fine cattle we have admired.

Semex stands for Semen Exports Canada. And this co-operative does a thriving business.

Artificial insemination goes back as far as the 14th Century but became widely used in World War I, when the Russian Army's horses were hit by an epidemic of venereal disease.

In 1941, the first A. I. service was set up in Ontario.

A bull is bought by the co-op, with prices ranging from $6,000 to $60,000. Four hundred cows are impregnated with his semen. The co-op then waits five years to see how the calves turn out.

As Mel Thomas director of promotion for the Eastern Breeders Inc. explained: "If the daughters are fine cows, we put the bull into full production. If not we ship him off to Canada Packers for $400."

It's a gambling business.

But sometimes you hit a winner. Take Rockman for instance. In a nine year period, he fathered 180,000 first grade cattle. Although he is dead, some 10,000 vials remain at $100 each. These vials and those of thousands of other bulls are exported annually to 34 countries.

The Fair continues until Sunday.

Tribal Justice
Clark Blaise
Doubleday

As each of the short stories that make up Tribal Justice ends there is a feeling that something has been cut off, with a clean razor-sharp edge, and that we are at the moment just before the blood runs. But here there is less blood than something more like rust, the steady stain of corrosion of minority tribes which have been fabricated by the giant slick machine of society can then be discarded as junk and left to disintegrate. Except that as the machine discards its parts it slowly ceases to function and the brown decay creeps over its maker.

The precise, metallic style of Clark Blaise contributes to this kind of analogy and provides an exact correlative for the bleak, but stunningly insightful, vision of the book.

No matter how explosive the issues, though, Blaise remains emotionally distanced, contriving an apolitical stance that defines and perceives the political and an amorality that works within a failed moral framework. He does not allow himself the luxury of anguish or of anger. The paring of the young adolescent in the first story from his itinerant worker-family friend is described with dispassionate control:

"The last I saw of Broward Dowdy were his legs, pale and brilliant against the sour muck, sliced cleanly by the shadow of the truck and the shanties beyond."

The end of the second story contributes to the subtle building up of oppression and threat as the theme of outsiders touching the edges of other fringe groups is developed.

"Someone cut our screens that night, and since copper became scarce during the war, mosquitoes plagued our sleep for the next three years until we too moved to Hartley and gradually forgot those years on a promontory, threatened by swamps."

Although each story is separate and distinct, all appear to be told by different reflections of the same person. In this way the events and people of the stories compound each other and give the book a strong organic unity, achieved partly through an intently unified style and partly through the deceptive creation of one strong central character who does not in fact exist.

This fractured, anomalous storyteller, so intrinsic to the structure of the book, is always an outsider in a societal, almost documentary, content. He is a variation on the gangly adolescent, the fat kid, the eccentric brain child, the poor man's son from the loser family, the apolitical Canadian taking up American causes and finally the disillusioned urban man — passive victim inside the seized-up shell of a useless but perfect-looking car or terrified creature fleeing from the implacable beauty of a northern lake which covers him with blood-thirsty leeches.

Blaise does occasionally place his outsider, usually a passive participant or intellectual observer, in a situation where another marginal presents a more volatile viewpoint. The FLQ representative from The March story is given brief platform speeches:

"... we of Quebec are unique... To understand one's uniqueness in the world is to have identity. The Americans have it. The Chinese have it. The Canadians will never have it, never. We have a chance, a very small chance."

But this stance is obscured by the one strong decision made by the pivotal character of the story; he decides to leave and join the march of the black people on Washington.

While Robert and friends dream of dynamiting the Canadian National trestle bridges, derailing the Queen and freeing Quebec, inventing causes and oppressors, thousands of Americans were massing in their capital to protest real oppression and show they would no longer tolerate it. Could anyone imagine going to Ottawa? Pearson or Diefenbaker — whichever it was — would he meet with the leaders the way Kennedy had? American wasn't perfect, but it was the best show on the continent, and I had nothing but disgust for my own slowness in recognizing it. There was something insidious in the simplicity of Canada."

In many ways the deceptive simplicity of Clark Blaise's stories is also insidious. He cuts across North American complacency so swiftly that the exposures are at first merely fascinating. But as the depth of his penetration begins to cause a painful throbbing he leaves no alternative but to sit and stare at the wound.

The Pennypincher's Wine Guide
Gail Donner and Lucy Waverman
Peter Martin Associates

The Pennypincher's Wine Guide is a welcome and worthwhile book for all those of us who thought Canadian wines too poor, French and German wines too expensive, and Szekardi and Casal Mendes the only wines fit to take to parties.

Written by two women who constructed a comprehensive series of panel 'taste tests', the book provides an indispensable list of all wines carried by the LCBO which sell for under $5 (despite markups of over 100 per cent, and sales tax of 10 per cent).

In clear and concise language, the authors provide a complete catalogue of wines — white, red, rose, crackling, sparkling and pop.

Each wine is listed by its relative sweetness, bouquet — "fruity", "aromatic", "light" — taste comments — "clean, astringent, full bodied, some character" — and suggestion for food accompaniment.

The judgments are inevitably subjective, but therein lies the pleasure. Who could resist calling the panel's bluff when it describes a wine with "strange flavour" as worthy of "strange food", or an "astringent, medicinal" wine as fit for "garlic and hot dogs."

Most of the taste comments, however, are sufficiently serious to encourage the uninitiated, and the menu suggestions adequately specific.

Most Canadian wines do not stand up to the critics' judgment (some might be surprised to hear that any do). Some are quickly disposed of with such acid comments as "wash strawberries in it" and "tastes like burnt maple sugar."

The only redeeming feature of Canadian wines seems to be their "foxiness," a quality described as a "characteristic pungency." Hmm.

Aside from the complete list, there are brief but informative chapters on wines of the world, vintages, menus, recipes, cooking with wine and wine parties. There's also a 'best buy' list, which takes some of the esthetic guesswork out of selection.

All in all, an enjoyable and doubtless useful book, well worth the investment.

And all you inveterate party goers, take note: Szekardi and Casal Mendes still made the 'best buy' list. The People can't be wrong!

The Nonsuch
Laird Rankin
Clarke, Irwin

On June 3, 1668, a small square-rigged ketch called the Nonsuch set sail for what later would be called Hudson's Bay.

On board were those two enterprising entrepreneurs, Medard Chouart, Sieur des Groseilliers, and his brother-in-law, Pierre Esprit Radisson, who were known to the English crew as Messrs. Gooseberry and Raddisson.

They reached their destination on Sept. 29, 1668, and remained in the New World for the winter, trading "wampumpeage" for beaver pelts.

By August, the Nonsuch was on her way to England, with a cargo that sold quickly, and with living proof that there was another entry into North America, a viable alternative to the St. Lawrence.

Eighteen investors approached King Charles, and on May 2, 1670, a charter to trade was granted, founding the "Governor and Company of Adventurers of England trading into Hudson's Bay," in short, the Hudson's Bay Company.

In a combination celebration of Canada's Centennial, and the company's tricentennial, a replica of the Nonsuch was built in Appleton, a small Devonshire ship-building town in 1968.

From there the ketch sailed to various ports in England and France, was shipped across to Canada, sailed the Great Lakes, was dismantled, and driven to Seattle, where she was placed upright again, and allowed to tour the west coast.

After one very successful season on the Pacific, she was again towed across the continent to Winnipeg. The Company had been unable to find co-sponsors for her stay in B.C.

On January 31, 1974, the Nonsuch became the property of the Nonsuch Museum, in Winnipeg. Refitted, repainted and scraped of barnacles.

The Nonsuch, by Laird Rankin, tells the story of the ill-fated replica.

The constant bureaucratic bickering that went on between the Winnipeg and London branches of the company is amazing, but it is completely overshadowed by the ridiculous decision to take a creature of the sea, a ship built to withstand anything the Atlantic or Pacific could dish out, and plunk it in a Museum for the public to gape at, for a fee of course.

When reading the passages describing the journey from Lake Superior to Seattle, you can sense the deep humiliation that the gallant little ship endured stripped of her magnificent sails, and everything that was not bolted down.

She was then turned on her side, and on a semi-trailer, hauled over the Rockies, at one point, making a hill only with the help of a road grader.

For lovers of the sea and ships, this book is a mixed blessing. The stories of sailing, the detailed plans of carvings and the rigging and the routes of her journey are interesting, as are the drawings by Captain Adrian Smith.

The bureaucratic squabbles, and promotion problems, would surely interest a Madison Avenue ad man out to make as much money as he can.

The Nonsuch could have sold herself. It is a sad thing to think she will never see her home again.

Bruce Watson
Albert White Gallery

Perhaps the best way to appreciate the sculpture of Henry Moore is to see what other men are doing in the same medium.

Bruce Watson is currently exhibiting his Two Form Break Series at the Albert White gallery, (one street north of Bloor, between Avenue Road and Bedford).

Born in 1925 on a sugar plantation in Guyana (then British Guiana), Watson came to Canada, where he attended The Ontario College of Art.

His works have been shown annually at the Albert White Gallery since 1966, and are part of collections in Quebec, Ontario and New York State.

The Break Series relies on two closely related forms, smooth on all sides except those facing each other.

The works, of bronze, are small, from 5 inches to 18 inches. And sitting in a row on their plexiglass stands they are so similar in design that the eye is not immediately drawn to any particular work.

But if you wander into the back of the gallery, you can see works smaller than the Watson sculptures, but with the excitement of line and the keen definition by light and shadow that mean they could only be by Moore.

It is unfortunate that the gallery owners have chosen to exhibit Watson alongside Moore, since the comparisons are easily made.

Watson comes a poor second to the master.

Editions I
Aggregation Gallery

The 30 winning prints from the competition, Editions I, sponsored by the Ontario Arts Council last June, can now be seen together for the first time at the Aggregation Gallery.

The first contest of its kind, it invited any artist either born or living in the province as well as Canadians represented by Ontario dealers to submit up to three previously unexhibited prints.

Surprised by the response of over 1200 entries, the jury spent three exhausting days reaching its conclusions. While their choices may occasionally seem perplexing, they provide an interesting look at what is considered to be some of the better work being produced today.

In a group display such as this, one is struck by the great diversity of direction in modern printmaking. From lithograph, silkscreening, serigraphs to etching and mixed media the combination and the use of techniques can become quite sophisticated.

The use of a photographic negative in silkscreening or lithography is quite popular and produces a strange hybrid between the two arts. Joy Walker's "Family Tree" creates an eerie and amusing effect by perching her colourful snapshot 'ancestors' on and around a fallen tree in an incongruous landscape. Fiction "dressed up", in a sense, as documentary becomes even more fantastic. Vincent Tangredi's "Peter's Right" showing two very raw looking feet on ice is another example of this photographic realism.

There are also a number of etchings from the highly realistic to the utmost in graphic simplicity. Ed Bartram's marvellous "Island Forms" infuses his organic textures and patterning into the glowing blues and greens of a landscape. Chris Woods' sinister "Shoe", dangling on the page in midair, is superb in its delicate rendering of surface detail.

Although the poster caption "art for people" with more taste than money" is somewhat pretentious, the prices are surprisingly low with all but one of the pieces under $150.

Prize money of $1000 purchased 10 copies of each print for the Arts Council which it is circulating around Ontario and eventually giving to public galleries. The council is also encouraging the artists to produce more copies of their prints. The idea is that by supporting work in multiple editions the council can bring "more art to more people for less money". And who could argue with that?

Deh, perche fuggi, o Dafne, da chi ti segue ed ama,
e fuor che i tuoi begli occhi altro non brama?
Se' molle ninfa? o duro tronco forse di questo alpestro monte, rigida e sorda a chit ti prega e chiama?
Ma se tu tronco sei,
come al fuggir le piante hai cosi pronte?
Come non sai fermarti ai preghi miei?

A mime artist talks

With the rain flooding the street outside, Paul Gaulin's mime studio, crammed with full-length mirrors, props, old marquee posters, books, blooming plants and stuffed armchairs, seems even more richly intimate and artistic than usual.

Yes, agrees Gaulin, one of Canada's foremost practitioners of the fragile and neglected artform, it's a long way from Paris where he studied mime for five years, living on the streets, performing there for living money and sometimes being jailed for it.

"The only place I could afford to live in," Gaulin recalls, "was the size of a large kitchen table. It was so filthy I was covered in sores and scratching all the time. It was rat-infested and a friend's girlfriend asphyxiated in the shower because of a gas leak."

Gaulin had gone to Paris as a callow youth of 23, fresh from the University of Saskatchewan with his BA and a one-year Canada Council grant to study mime. After much difficulty, he finally enrolled at both the rival mime schools of Etienne Decroux and his former prize student, Marcel Marceau.

Although mime has its discernable origins in fifth century Greece, it was largely neglected until Decroux, a brilliant creator but ferocious egotist, developed a new performing idiom which replaced the old ritualistic origins with striking dramatic techniques. But Decroux never could forgive Marceau who simplified and popularized the very techniques that had brought scorn on Decroux's head.

As developed by Decroux and Marceau, modern mime is now beginning to become very popular, Gaulin said.

"In a society like ours which is so mechanized, intellectualized and alienated, people are trying to recover their senses which have atrophied, and mime represents one way of return," Gaulin said.

"We're trying to get our senses back — not an orgy, of course, but a quietude, like listening to a river."

"A lot of people don't even come to my school to study mime but to rediscover their bodies, like I had to do when I went to Paris."

"Their senses are so over-saturated, that only in the absence of sensation, and using the exaggerated gestures of mime, can they begin to relearn something as simple as smelling a rose," Gaulin said.

Mime is one of the most delicate of the performing arts, Gaulin said, always presupposing a strong relationship between the artist and his audience. Unlike many arts, the audience must work constantly to understand the performance, and therefore, in a sense helps create it.

"The audience directs me," Gaulin explained. "They tell me whether something is working or not, by their reactions. Of course, if they're too intellectual or lazy, then mime's not for them because mime is not a direct recreation of ideas or speech, but rather of movements and feelings."

"That's why my best audiences are young. They're still very physically alive," he said.

Perhaps that's also why Gaulin's Compagnie de Mime, created in December, 1973, almost has more business than it can handle.

His mime company is presently booked into the Poor Alex theatre until December 1. They're presenting "Dimensions In Mime", and it's a good chance to see the art fairly inexpensively. (Student tickets are $2 and there's also a Sunday pay-what-you-can matinee.)

Gaulin and the other two company members, Naomi Tyrrel and Pam Warr, present a program of 10 "pieces", as Gaulin calls them.

They cover a wide range from the physical lyricism of "On the Moon" (an astronaut battling low gravity) to the brilliantly ingenious "Adam and Eve" (boredom in paradise) to more contemporary social comment, "The Honour Guard" (a firing squad execution) to the evening's most brilliant and best executed piece, "The People's Choice" (a politician and the first lady prepare to meet the crowds).

And, of course, there's his autobiographical Pipling figures, which often provide a whimsical attraction.

Gaulin's pieces do not always work, and often an untrained audience may have difficulty following his intentions, but on the whole, they are fine artistic efforts, and the evening, lamentably, goes by too quickly.

As his art matures and he becomes more experienced in performance, Gaulin says he fully expects to become a great mime.

"After all, I'm standing on the shoulders of giants — Decroux and Marceau. They've taken over 25 years to create and then develop the art, and they can give their techniques to someone like me in a few years. The rest is just up to me," he said.

dance

To continue the saga of The Missing Russian Dance Films, they have once more been sighted at the TD Cinema, this time starting on the 22nd (but call 364-3451 to confirm). $3.

For dance films to fit a smaller budget, the Art Gallery of Ontario is showing modern dance with Martha Graham, Jose Limon and Merce Cunningham on Dec. 4, and ballet with Agnes de Mille and the Netherlands Dance Company on Dec. 5. 8 pm. Free, with gallery admission.

If tap and step (and a liberal dose of smaltz) are what you like catch That's Entertainment at the Eglinton. It's expensive ($3.50) but worth it for the Singing in the Rain sequence, and the Follies number. The arms playing instruments out of the dance floor is another dada treat.

In the Toronto dance scene, the Rinman Experimental Dance Company is presenting After the Tornado, Nov. 28 and 29, at the Annex Theatre, 8:30. $2.

The Annual Choreographic Workshop of the National Ballet is this Wednesday night. Phone 366-9484 for further information.

And from our own dance department at the Benson Building, the WAA presents a program in modern jazz, folk and contemporary dance. All are welcome. Admission free. Friday, 8:30 at the Benson Building.

movies

Tonight only at the Revue is Louis Malle's Murmer of the Heart a warm high comedy and a high water mark of movie-making. Whether he tackles love as in Murmer of the Heart or collaboration as in Lacombe, Lucien, Malle remains one of the handful of great film artists.

Monday night Ontario College of Art shows two vintage films by Alan Resnais, Night and Fog and the most controversial film of the early sixties Last Year at Marienbad.

And, starting Wednesday back at the Revue, two generations of approaches to carnality and desire: Williams Kazan's Streetcar Named Desire and Bertolucci's Last Tango in Paris. Go with someone you love.

How many violinists can fit on the head of a pin? What was Liszt's middle name? What opera has a lead soprano named Gazonga? C'mon, gang! Those aren't the kind of contests I'm looking for! If you can come up with an absolutely bizarre suggestion for a concert, there'll be quite a prize for you. Send your applications to me, care of the Varsity Review office.

Are you a Scott Joplin fan? Then you've got a chance to hear an all-ragtime recital next Tuesday at noon in the concert hall of the Royal Conservatory of Music. The Con, as it's popularly known, is more than a place to take piano lessons at. They have a healthy roster of concerts throughout the year, and the vast majority of them are free. Including never-ending lines of seven-year-olds ready and willing to play Grade II favourites just for you.

My apologies to Scarborough College for not previously mentioning their Sunday concert series. This Sunday (at 3:30 in the Meeting Place), soprano Jean Edwards will be performing songs of Schubert, Rodrigo, Debussy and Strauss. The concert's free, and if you arrive at that Reception desk at 2:30, you can go on a tour of the College, an architecturally fascinating place to walk through if you haven't done it before.

Tuesday and Wednesday at Massey Hall, the TSO makes another of its regular appearances, this time with European tour conductor Kazimierz Kord and pianist Murray Perahia. Prokofiev's fourth symphony and the Mendelssohn piano concerto no. 2 are the featured works. Tickets $3-99, but try for the $2 rush seats at 7 pm if you're poverty-stricken.

More goodies, free of charge, at the Faculty of Music this week: tonight at 8:15 Janet Boyd, soprano will be singing a recital in the faculty's continuing student performance series. Monday through Wednesday nights from 7-9 pm, German contemporary pianist Peter Roggenkamp will be giving master classes in modern piano: Ives, Cage and such. On Thursday afternoon at 2:10 he gives a public concert at the faculty's Walter Hall, specializing again in contemporary music.

Thursday evening, another faculty soprano gives a recital: Dianne Huestis. Good week for sopranos.

And on Sunday afternoon, the pearl of the week's entertainment: the great Anton Kuerti will be giving concert no. 4 in his Beethoven Sonata series. Until Vladimir or Artur comes to town you won't hear much better. 3:00 at Hart House, some rush tickets available on the day.

theatre

There's a sort of theatrical smorgasbord in Toronto this week. Some Canadian plays for starters: Hurrah for Johnny Canuck, "a theatrical extravaganza" based on the exploits of the Great Canadian Comic Book heroes, opens at Factory Theatre on the 30th, 99 cent previews on the 26th, 27th, 28th and 29th.

Across the tracks at Tarragon, Reaney's St. Nicholas Hotel is into its second week. (See Varsity review this week.) Passé Muraille is also in on the act with Brutal Paradise which opened last night. And at the Firehall there's Carol Bolt's Shelter, a play about a woman and politics.

After sampling these goodies, those with insatiable appetites might try The Rivals at the St. Lawrence (opens 26th.), Home at the New Theatre on Bathurst St., or they might chomp their way through Shaw's meaty Back to Methuselah at Hart House (27th through 30th. There aren't many tickets left, by the way.)

Something light and unpretentious to finish off with? How about The Mousetrap at the Colonnade (opens 27th.) If you already know who dunnit, don't care, or simply feel like a little exercise, Homemade Theatre's Improvisation Festival spontaneously ambles off on the 25th. They're offering free workshops for the two weeks of the festival at the Toronto Centre for the Arts (390 Dupont), nightly performances and the Improvisational Olympics. Teams for this event include the U of T Track Team, Etobicoke Parks and Recreation and Scarborough Board of Education. (Phone 925-6452 for details.)

There are workshop sessions at Global Village this week too associated with rehearsals for Tennessee William's Outcry.

Poculi Ludique Societas, that unique college drama group is presenting The Second Shepherds' Play and The York Herod Play tonight at 8:30 pm and Saturday at 2 pm. In Upper Brennan Hall, at St. Mike's.

Rechauffee: Ontario Youth Theatre's of Brecht's The Exception and the Rule returns, at the Colonnade. November 24 and December 1 at 8:30. Tickets cost 99 cents.

art

Lots of exciting shows and big names popping up before Christmas. Harold Town will be showing drawings at the Gadatsy Gallery in Yorkville. Innovative, unpredictable, often great and sometimes terrible, it will be interesting to see what "Toronto's Darling" is up to now.

David Mirvish has drawings by Matisse in the upstairs gallery in Markham village which have got to be worth seeing if a name means anything.

There are a few days left to catch the William Kurelek show at the Isaacs Gallery on Yonge St. just above Bloor. Defying charges that he is gloomy and morbid, this deeply religious painter has called the show "The Happy Canadian". Kurelek once withdrew some of his paintings from an exhibition at the Isaacs because several nudes were to be hung at the same time. He said, he was responsible, "not to provide the occasion for anyone to fall".

The AGO has mounted an exhibition of Canadian Impressionists (did you know there were any?) which will run until after New Year's.

Also not the Hart House show of graphics by Dora Mazalek, Anton Cetin and John Palchinski which opened this week.

Larry Coryell

Larry Coryell saws away at his electric fiddle.

Sunday, November 18, brought another excellent SAC-SRO musical bargain to Convocation Hall. Four bills gave students an incredible concert featuring the 11th House with Larry Coryell. The capacity house was also entertained by Mike Urbaniak and insulted by Audiomaster (audiodisaster?).

Although the concert opened at 8 pm, Coryell began playing by 11:30, a bit late. But Coryell was well worth the wait. His group represents the very cream of "jazz-rock" begun by Miles Davis in the 60's. It stars Larry Coryell on lead guitar, Mike Mendel (keyboard), Alphonse Mosant (drums), Mike Lawrence (trumpet) and Danny Triphon (bass).

The evening's incredibly tight set lasted well into the morning. No one slept. Opening with "Song for N.Y. Rainmaker", and leading into the hard hitting "Atom Smasher" from the 11th House album, the band drove the crowd frantic. Coryell then soloed on "Gratitude" followed by the group once again on the exciting "Joyride". The evening just went on and on with some of the most innovative music around today!

B.B. King

When B.B. King's dressy band, Philadelphia, opened each set of the show instrumentally, the predominantly white crowd at the Beverly Hills Hook and Ladder Club needed no urging — they cheered for the King and his nine piece court.

As they moved through such classics as "Every Day I Have the Blues", "I've Been Downhearted since the Day We Met" and "How Blue Can You Get", "I've Really Paid My Dues" and "Sweet Little Angel", the cheers were mixed with whistles and smiling people dancing in their chairs. Unfortunately, tables covered the tiny dance floor.

The sweet began to trickle down B.B.'s face, the sign of a good blues set. The band works hard and most have been with him for several years.

He introduces each one and tells how long he's been with him. "Ladies and gentlemen, thank you very much. We appreciate your applause so much. Over here on my far left on piano is Ron Leary. He's been with me five years. Ladies and gentlemen make him happy."

He played some fine piano runs, especially during the later set when the band was really hot and he was pounding loud and clear. Incidentally, he's the only white member in B.B.'s band, all of whom were dressed alike in neat beige suits, white shirts and black velvet bow ties. They contrasted well with the King who was wearing a dark suit, patterned shirt, a large velvet bow tie, shiny diamond rings — and a brown Gibson guitar, Lucille.

"And right behind me, ladies and gentlemen, from Las Vegas where I left my money last week, is Wilber Freeman on the bass. He's been with me five years. Please, make him happy."

"And behind me on my right is the baby of the group, on Alto Sax. He's only been with me two years. We usually try to make the newest member of the group look bad, just to embarrass him, but with him we don't have to try very hard. . . . Nevertheless he's a great guy. Ladies and gentlemen, Cato Waeker. Let's make him happy."

"On baritone sax, from Tampa Florida one of the veterans. He's been with me fourteen years, Louis Hubert, make him smile."

But the real veteran of the band is the drummer. "Ladies and gentlemen, from Detroit, Sonny Freeman. He's been with me seventeen years. Let's really make him feel good."

"And me, I've been playing 35 years, 27 of them professionally, you make us feel so good."

Volleyball Blues start season off right; beat Ottawa and RMC at Queen's

By REG EADIE
Saturday Nov. 16 saw the first league games for this year's Varsity volleyball team at Queen's University.
The team this year is comprised primarily of rookies since there are no returnees from last year's squad. The first games were against a badly overmatched RMC squad and resulted in an easy 2-9 victory for Toronto. The second match was against Queen's who were second in the league last year.

The team pressed hard but lost two close games primarily because of troubles on service reception and in stopping the Gaels on their high line spikes.

The final match was against a squad of fired-up French Canadians from Ottawa University. The Blues won two games to one managing to win the third game 15-0.

If the team continues to improve at the present rate, it is definitely championship material.

With a number of players recovering from sprained ankles, look forward to marked improvement in the team's next games at Sudbury on Nov. 30.

SPORTALK

In the second game of the best-of-three finals of the first division lacrosse, Erindale upset an overconfident Phys-Ed squad 10-7, forcing the series to a third and deciding game Monday at 8:00 p.m. Presumably interfac will have the foresight to have plenty of police on hand for this barn-burner.

In second division lacrosse, Scarborough took the championship from incumbents Forestry 7-3, in the black hole of Hart House Wednesday night.

In division III soccer, Pharmacy were eliminated from the playoffs with a semi-final loss to Dentistry 3-1. Wednesday's second division final between Meds and Trin was postponed to Thursday at 8:00 pm at the stadium. No result was available by press time.

The best-of-three touch football final has gone to the three game limit. The Hookers were unable to charm the Leftovers in the first game and lost 33-27, but bounced back in the second game to win 19-13 and even the series.

The third division soccer championship will be decided today at noon on the front campus when New College and Dentistry clash. New defeated Eng III in the semis while Dents downed Pharm 3-1.

Varsity Blues' basketball is also featured at the Benson Building at 8:00 pm when the men take on the Voyageurs are visiting. Laurentian currently leads the league with three wins and no losses.

Lady Blues basketball over Queens

By IRIS MOTZ

The senior women's basketball team opened their season before a large, partisan crowd at Kingston last Friday. Varsity came out on top of a 69-48 score.

The Blues found themselves confronted by a very fast Queen's team, who in the early minutes of the game began to use a full court press to stymie the Toronto offence and led to numerous turnovers, resulting in several key baskets for Queen's.

The Gaels took a large 31-17 half time lead.

The second half was a different story. Varsity, revived after their half-time break, effectively broke the press forcing Queen's to abandon it.

As a result, Toronto kept pace with the Queen's girls and outscored them to take the game 69-48.

Top scorers for Varsity were Crawford with 21, Knight with 8, Scott with 6, and Krzyzanowski with 5.

The Toronto squad will play their first home game tomorrow at 1:00 pm at the Benson Building.

CIAU awards night is thinly disguised CFL promotional night

The grand poobahs of the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union discovered booze Wednesday evening and the heady taste may have gone to their heads.

It was billed as the first annual Schenley Canadian College Football Awards but mostly it was thinly disguised propaganda on behalf of that well-known organization called the Canadian (with 15 imports) Football League.

About 30 CIAU coaches, 70 or so players, several public-relations hacks, a few bemused media types, and a ballroom full of hangers-on gathered at the Skyline Hotel to watch the first steps in what is certain to be an interesting mating dance between the CIAU and CFL.

The Skyline, miles from civilization out near the airport, is owned by William Hodgson who also happens to own the local semi-pro football team.

Accordingly, much of the evening's activities featured Argo personnel. Scout Jim Copeland showered praise on the college coaches "who always welcome me to their camps and adjust their schedules when I want to visit them."

Claiming that the average salary for a Canadian player in the CFL is $10,000, Copeland urged the coaches to "make your players more knowledgeable about the CFL draft."

Several of the coaches had never heard of Copeland and wanted nothing to do with the CFL draft.

Sandwiched around Copeland's promotional puff were two film features about the CFL.

The first, outlining this year's nominees for the Schenley awards, was billed as a "sneak preview". Apparently, someone forgot to tell nattily attired MC, Sandy Hoyt, that the same film was shown the previous night on CFTO.

Following Copeland, the audience was subjected to another set of CFL films, this time portraying some college grads who've made it big in the pro league.

Only Gerry Organ and Jim Young are still playing; Whit Tucker, Ken Neilson and Ron Stewart have long since retired. Surprisingly, no mention was made of Argo's Mike Eben, Wayne Allison or Barry Findlay.

Topping off the evening was the debut of the CFL's resident Canadian College Grad Who Made Good, incoming Argo coach Russ Jackson, who turned down a Rhodes Scholarship to toil for the Ottawa Rough Riders.

Jackson flashed his teeth and smiled a lot, but in essence his message was identical to that laid on by the previous speakers.

If College football wants to succeed as a spectator sport, it must consciously become a feeder system for the CFL.

"The colleges are now the major area for our Canadian talent," Jackson said, adding that he hoped the universities would be able to satisfy the "financial requirements" needed to expand their football programs.

Jackson got the expected applause and the photographers got their pictures, but several CIAU officials were less than convinced about the wisdom of tailoring their football programs too closely to the player needs of the CFL.

"What do we need the pros for?" asked Varsity athletic director Dalt White somewhat rhetorically. Then, supplying his own answer, "absolutely nothing."

"Intercollegiate football has its own identity and special values which should not be compromised for the sake of seeing more college grads in the CFL," said one coach from Western Canada.

After the speaking was done, the stated purpose of the evening, awarding two CIAU trophies, was quickly dispatched.

Manitoba guard Bart Evans, a four-year all-star with CFL aspirations, was named the first recipient of the Johnny Metras Trophy as outstanding lineman.

Al Cheruk, an all-purpose back from Acadia, won the Hec Crighton Trophy as the outstanding intercollegiate player in 1974. A psychology major, Cheruk plans to attend graduate school.

Following the presentations, much booze was consumed and much platitudinous nonsense exchanged. What, one wonders, were all those CIAU people doing Wednesday at the Skyline, silently paying homage to the glories of the Canadian Football League?

Surely college football and those who run it have enough integrity and ability that their game can survive and flourish without becoming the tail on the CFL dog.

See football and hockey both, Friday

This afternoon at 5:00 pm at Varsity Arena, the Blues will host the Laurentian Voyageurs in a hockey contest that should prove to be one of the year's best.

Laurentian goaltender, Dave Tataryn returns to the arena with all-star status to challenge former Blues teammates.

Immediately following the game, buses will leave the arena for CNE stadium and the College Bowl. There will be a nominal charge.

Buses will return to the arena after the football game.

Blues' offence must get points

By PAUL CARSON

What can you say about an offensive unit that explodes for 37 points in the final 16 minutes of an important playoff game?

Well, one might start by asking what those players were doing for the other 44 minutes.

The Blues attackers have certainly put a lot of points on the scoreboard this year and their net yardage totals were most impressive; however, to many observers the chimps still haven't proved themselves.

In the O-QIFC final against Ottawa, turnovers gave the offence three excellent scoring chances in the first quarter alone, but Blues could manage only 10 of a possible 21 points. Those 11 points that weren't scored kept Gee-Gees in the game until Blues offence finally jumped into gear in the second half.

Last week against St. Mary's, Blues scored on their first possession but then the chimps went to sleep until a superb goal-line stand plus a pass interception triggered the 37-point outburst.

Quarterback Dave Langley seems to be a very methodical, analytical type who's willing to sacrifice some early scoring in order to gain a thorough knowledge of the opposition's defensive alignment. Given the strength of Blues' defence, that's not a bad tactic, but Blues probably have to score early and often to overcome Western tonight.

Mustangs couldn't do anything right during their 28-6 loss on Homecoming; in fact, if Doug Ball hadn't knocked down a sure touchdown pass on the last play of the first half, the game would have been much closer.

The key to Blues' offensive success unquestionably lies in the talent along the line. Stated simply, Blues have the finest blocking in the country.

All-Star back and record-breaker Mark Bragagnolo expressed it best after the Homecoming game when he insisted that the offensive line share the credit for his 1,018 rushing yardage.

Tonight Blues will use the regular unit with Glen Rosborough at Center, Mike Steele and Mike Sokovnin on the right side, Don Dawson and the much-improved Walt Dudar on the left side, and Esteban Andryjowicz as the tight end.

Co-captain Brent Elsey and fleet Mark Ackley will be the wide receivers.

Joining Langley and Bragagnolo in the backfield are Libert Castillo and Bob Hedges.

Ken Hussey, fully recovered from an early season injury, will replace the injured Mark Sazio at defensive tackle.

Coach Ron Murphy was forced to do some juggling when the CIAU declined to reconsider its rule limiting the teams to 32 players instead of the normal 34.

Backup quarterback Al Brenchley will dress, along with halfbacks Colin Lauder and Steve Kwiatowski plus ends Jim Trimm and Steve Ince.

The extra linemen are John Martini, Nick Grittani and Glen West.

Mike Sokovnin, coming off a solid performance against St. Mary's, will handle all the kicking chores.

Lost in the attention paid to the defensive unit has been the outstanding work turned in by Blues speciality teams, traditionally a weakness in recent seasons.

Blues own kicking game has improved significantly and more important, the team's punt and kickoff coverage has been solid all year. One of the keys is the deadly downfield tackling by Trimm, who has consistently neutralized the dangerous sideline returns that plagued Blues in the past.

For their part, Mustangs have the team that beat Laurier twice and hammered Saskatchewan 41-17 in the Central Bowl playoff.

Western boats five players from their 1971 College Bowl champions and also have Bill Robinson, who quarterbacked St. Mary's to the title last year.

Ignore the promoter's flack about sellouts. Lots of excellent seats are still available.

Unfortunately, many of the special student tickets are no longer available on campus. Check at the Hart House athletic ticket office first, but be prepared to get to the Stadium early to buy your tickets there. Thousands of the more expensive, reserved grandstand seats are available.

Kick-off is 8:00 pm.

Davis urges whites to join blacks

By EDWARD LARY

Addressing an audience of 1,700 at Convocation Hall Friday evening, black militant leader Angela Davis urged whites to join with "people of color" against racist government policies both in North America and abroad.

"If people do not become involved in this movement against racism... then its going to come knocking on their door," Davies warned.

"Even though you may not at this moment be directly under attack, you must fight on the side of those who are suffering because if you don't, you're going to be where they are."

Davis' appeal for unity was in marked contrast to the tone of the first speaker of the evening, Horace Campbell.

Campbell, recently returned from two years of teaching in Uganda, harangued white members of the audience for perpetuating the idea that "Canada is a nice liberal place where whites are nice to black people."

Near the conclusion of his speech Campbell warned that "if organizations like the Western Guard... (and) the Ku Klux Klan continue to attack our women and children... we conscious black people will have to take action."

But Davis, co-founder and organizer for the U.S. National Alliance Against Racism and Political Repression, cautioned that an excessive pre-occupation with such "extreme manifestations" of racism might cause people to "forget the purpose of it all."

Describing racism as the "most effective weapon in the arsenal of the ruling class," Davis, a long-time Communist Party member, charged the American and Canadian governments with using racism as a smoke-screen to direct attention away from economic problems.

"(U.S. President Gerald) Ford (whom Davis referred to as "president non-elect") understands that as long as white people are out there screaming at black people they are definitely not going to be screaming at him," she said.

Her remark referred to President Ford's refusal to send in the National Guard to areas where white opposition to school busing was particularly violent.

Davis also attacked Canada's immigration policies, claiming that Immigration Minister Robert Andras "gets white people riled up against black people from the Caribbean and Africa with the idea they will take jobs away from them."

Linking a new wave of "political repression" in the United States to the "desperate actions of a ruling class that is experiencing defeat after defeat after defeat on the international scene," Davis warned that this was a "preview of what the government has in store for every individual and agency that does not fully agree with the government."

"If you want to understand what Watergate was all about and continues to be all about," she said, "it is the building of an apparatus of repression to prevent revolution in the United States."

Davis said there are thousands of individuals in prisons across the United States, "blacks, Chicanos, Asians, Indians, Puerto Ricans," who are "victims of racism and of a system that uses racism to prop itself up."

Choosing not to dwell on her own 16-month incarceration pending trial in the "Soledad brother" murder case (an all-white jury eventually acquitted her of all charges), Davis recounted histories of many less-publicized criminal cases, citing them as examples of racist and political persecution.

She said the plight of all those "who must suffer anonymously" in prison "dungeons" across the United States could not be ignored by those truly interested in opposing racism.

Responding to written questions from the audience after her speech, Davis expressed concern that "universities so often promote the worst kind of elitist attitudes" among students.

"Students often think that just because they can write a term paper, they're better than the sister or brother who goes to work in a factory."

A noted scholar, Davis has studied at the Sorbonne in Paris and Germany's Goethe University. In 1970 she was fired from her philosophy post at UCLA in California because of political activities "unbefitting a university faculty member."

Davis' appearance at U of T, which marks the near-conclusion of a North American speaking tour, was co-sponsored by SAC, the Black Students Union and the Committee for the Defense of Black Prisoners.

After the meeting at Convocation Hall, Davis departed for a strategy conference with several Toronto activist groups aimed at providing support for 1,500 Haitians currently facing deportation from Canada as "undesirables."

Peoples movements only solution to oppression

By LANCE WARE

Building mass "people's" movements is the only way millions of working people can act collectively to eliminate the repressive structures of governments led and supported by U.S. economic interests, Angela Davis said in Toronto Saturday.

At a press conference before leaving to speak in Montreal, Davis underlined because working people wield no political or economic power, "the only way in which we can make our strength felt is through our numbers."

Davis, visiting Toronto as part of a tour as co-chairperson of the National Alliance Against Racism and Political Repression, told the media the alliance has organized some 25 chapters in 21 states in the U.S. since its inception one and a half years ago.

Each of the alliance's chapters, Davis explained, conducts "local defence campaigns around political prisoners in their areas, exposing prison conditions in their area, police brutality, police murders and so on."

Davis stressed the primary thrust has been to involve organizations representing the Black Liberation Movement and the struggles of Chicano, Asian and native peoples. About 150 organizations are now affiliated to the alliance, Davis noted, representing "a very broad spectrum of the people of the United States."

"Therefore the methods we use are mass organization, rallies, meetings, demonstrations, petitions, letter campaigns, telegram campaigns—any and every way we can make our voices collectively felt and collectively heard," Davis said. In reply to another query, Davis said the alliance will attempt to use the United Nations, when possible, to continue the struggle against repression.

"It is so clear that the United Nations can no longer be a tool of U.S. imperialism," Davis said.

SAC demands independent Seeley review

SAC has called on Governing Council to set up an independent faculty-student inquiry commission into the sociology department's rejection of hiring noted Canadian sociologist John Seeley.

In a statement released yesterday, SAC specifies the commission should be empowered to report directly to the university's president as to whether or not Seeley should be offered a teaching appointment at the U of T.

SAC also calls on the university's top governing body to set up an independent student-faculty commission to review "the extent of administrative interference in departmental hiring procedures" and "the extent of governmental interference in university hiring procedures."

SAC's call for inquiries follows top administrators' vetoing of sociology department decisions at both U of T and OISE to hire Seeley.

Students and faculty members have vigorously argued they have never received adequate reasons for Seeley's rejections.

In the U of T sociology department, chairman Irving Zeiflin vetoed the staffing body's unanimous decision to hire Seeley after being advised by arts and science faculty dean Robert Greene, school of graduate studies dean A. E. Safarian and U of T provost Don Forester that they did not approve of the appointment.

In addition, Education Minister Thomas Wells revealed in the Legislature Nov. 7 he personally had phoned OISE director Robert Jackson to inform him that one or two prominent Ontario educators had called him to oppose the Seeley appointment.

"Wells, although he did not know Prof. Seeley at all, freely passed on the advice despite having no basis for knowing whether or not it was valid," the SAC release notes.

"What is perhaps most frightening about this entire episode is that there is no real basis for believing that it is an isolated incident," the statement says.

OISE's board of governors decided two weeks ago to conduct its own review of Seeley's non-appointment, despite faculty and student pleas for an independent review.

Commission probes Radio Varsity

By DOUG MURRAY

SAC's three-man commission of inquiry into Radio Varsity met for the first time Friday and decided to interview and distribute questionnaires to the radio staff to discover their grievances.

The commission will meet again tomorrow to adopt the precise form of the questionnaire and to arrange an interview schedule.

SAC set up the commission two weeks ago to investigate criticisms of Radio Varsity's managing director, managerial structure and the station's relationship with SAC.

SAC communications commissioner Michael Sabia proposed forming the commission after hearing complaints from Radio Varsity staff members and after the resignation of the station's news director, Frank Cockram.

The commission will report its findings to Sabia before the end of this academic term so that an evaluation of the report can begin before January.

The three commission members, Paul Carson, Rick Outerbridge and John Tory, were chosen by Sabia for their "experience and impartiality."

Sabia told the commission SAC wants to remain independent of the inquiry.

"If we thought the inquiry was a whitewash, none of us would have taken the job. Mr. Sabia wants a fair investigation," Carson said.

But Carson also said, "Most of our staff will be closed to the public."

"The commission is in the same situation as a royal commission. We will interview anybody with an interest in the future of Radio Varsity."

"We want to speak to the largest number of people with relevant information."

"What we are trying to examine is not the programming output of the station, but the consistency, efficiency and smoothness of the administration," Tory added.

Carson has worked with Radio Varsity since its inception in 1965, and in 1970-71 was its news and sports director. Carson is no longer directly involved with the station, but is familiar with its problems.

Tory has worked with the station for three years and does a two-hour show every Wednesday, but is not a member of the management.

He has also worked for two commercial radio stations and said he has "a sense of what a real radio station does."

Tory also said, "I have, by my own choice, managed to stay out of the controversy."

Outerbridge, VUSAC education commissioner, was chosen for his administrative experience, even though he has not actually served on the radio station's management.

It was a bit like the obnoxious cousin who came to visit one day and never left, the Roberts library; its hulking presence menacing the skyline over the graceful, faded old buildings around it.

But, like all unwanted guests, we learned to live with it, even adapt to it, so much that we almost overcame its sheer ugliness and tried to think of more important things, like piles of essays that have to be written, assignments overdue, books to be found, work to be done.....

The United States is plagued with a marijuana epidemic threatening to make walking zombies out of the country's youth, a Congressional committee said yesterday.
 —lead paragraph in Reuter story carried in the Globe and Mail last week.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by the Newsweek Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Budget cuts hurt all

Despite what an editorial in the Toronto Star last week might lead people to believe, the university — everyone in the university — will be severely hurt by the provincial grant announced for next year.

Colleges and universities minister James Auld says the grant "is sufficient to offset inflationary trends, to maintain or improve existing levels of service, and to accommodate predicted enrolment increases." That is hard to believe.

The basis of university financing is not the absolute total announced by the government (which is up 16 percent), but the B.I.U., or Basic Income Unit which is up by only 7.4 percent. That's not enough: It will nowhere near keep pace with inflation, meaning the universities will have to cut back on spending to keep even, resulting in deteriorating quality.

John Evans has presented three options: A deficit budget, layoffs, or meagre salary increases, of which the first has been approved by the Governing Council. That seems wise: It will buy time with which to convince the government it must increase grants.

Non-salary items, which comprise only 30 percent of the university's budget, have already been pared. Salaries, which take up 70 percent of the budget, will rise only seven percent if a balanced budget based on the provincial grant is adopted; that's not going to satisfy anyone.

Students, not uncritically, should join the administration in pressuring the government to raise the level of funding. If they don't, the quality of their education will inevitably suffer.

The government must realize there is more to a commitment to higher education than mere rhetoric.

RMG answers library charges

I wish to reply to the letter by "L. Techniski" in the November 18 Varsity, because I feel it distorted the role of the RMG and is injurious to CUPE 1230.

First of all, the RMG is not a "part-time self-appointed", "rhetorical student group". It is a Canada-wide organization of both workers and students who have been active in many union and political struggles and who also see the need for a socialist revolution. But that is not the point.

The point, as L.T. points out, is to build a strong united defense of our standard of living. To do this it is necessary to unite our own members around the demand for COLA — which we have done. I would dispute that many stayed away from the demonstration — the turnout met our expectations.

It is also necessary to unite the rest of the campus in our support, since the administration will not grant our demands unless it is convinced of our power and support. Experience has shown that one group of workers on a campus needs solidarity in order to win. The RMG was the only organization that attempted to mobilize support beyond the library and GAA. It goes without saying that the union has the right to determine its actions and policies. Contrary to L.T.'s charges, the RMG did not "interfere" in any way with the union's decisions.

The RMG respected the union's decision not to allow leaflets at the demonstration itself. At the General meeting of the union where that decision was taken, it was made clear that groups who were seriously interested in an input into the library could leaflet before or after the demonstration. The RMG has consistently set up tables in Roberts lobby this year. This was the second leaflet we distributed there. It was also clear from the General Meeting that groups could support the union on its demands, with signs reading "Group X supports library workers," which is what the RMG sign said.

When the RMG was threatened with having its table removed (it was implied that university "authorities" would be summoned), they replied they had a right to be there. When L.T. and company proceeded to throw away RMG literature, the RMG's took it back and said they would take care of it. This is the origin of the distortions about acting on behalf of the administration, and "private property."

The RMG has absolutely no intention of implying that CUPE 1230 supports the RMG. The leaflet signed by a member of the union, as an individual, is exactly that — a leaflet signed by that individual. Only those leaflets that went on library bulletin boards and in library lounges were signed, precisely to show union members where it came from — a union member who agreed with the RMG. It was not "devious", but absolutely honest and in no way masquerading as a union leaflet. To presume it meant anything else shows the Machivellian mind of L. Techniski, not the RMG.

CUPE 1230 has been very clear up to now in encouraging political discussion as a legitimate part of the life of the Local. The present leadership ran for election on that premise. Holding and expressing diverse political opinions do not divide a union — rather it is red-baiting and branding the expression of opinions as illegitimate that does. All of us in the union have political views; once you begin branding the expression of some as illegitimate — where does it stop?

The self-appointed individuals who took it on themselves to remove the RMG table and to throw away its literature represents a potentially much more divisive factor than any number of leaflets. If L. Techniski had bothered to phone the signer of the leaflet to clarify its intention the whole hullabaloo could perhaps have been avoided.

L.T. implies that the RMG has ulterior motives in supporting library workers, and in fact doesn't really support the Cost of Living Struggle. In fact, the RMG wholeheartedly supports the defense of organized and unorganized workers against the growing economic crisis. But as a political tendency in the labour movement, it reserves the right to express its own views too. Is it divisive to point out, as the leaflet does, that all Canadian workers need a COLA? That it should be a sliding wage scale reflecting the real rise in the cost of living? That the Consumer Price Index is inadequate and the trade union movement ought to set its own? That students too are hurt by inflation and that we need unity between students and campus workers on this issue? Are these demands valid? Are they reasonable? Would they strengthen the unions on campus? Those are the questions I wish L.T. had answered.

Our demonstration was a success, a good beginning to convincing management that we are serious about COLA and about organizing to fight for it on this campus. But we'll have to keep the pressure on. Rather than repudiating support of the RMG and other students and workers, 1230 should seek to organize extra-union support under its own leadership. We should provide channels for members to express their views through signed leaflets, or through space on bulletin boards. This would allow discussion and prevent confusion in the future. We should continue to strengthen ourselves around the COLA demand and our upcoming contract negotiations.

I would conclude with a last point — people who have the courage of their convictions should sign their names to published letters, not "L. Techniski", i.e. synonymous to a library technician.

Scar. article misleading

The Varsity article Scarborough Council in Uproar Nov. 22 which was full of accusations and insinuations is highly misleading, destructive and inaccurate in many instances.

I will restrict my comments to those areas where clarification is absolutely essential.

First of all, and being an anthropologist and humanities student, I have had no accounting experience prior to the commencement of my term of office April 1, 1974.

Secondly, there is a major difference between missing money and unaccounted money. The former implies theft, and the latter insufficient bookkeeping.

The Internal Audit Department of the U of T very kindly indicated by letter August 26, 1974 that it "will continue to provide the service of auditing records for student organizations requiring such service." Since the Scarborough College Student Council (S.C.S.C.) has never in the past to my knowledge had records audited by an outside firm, I fully expected to have the Internal Audit Department continue providing their services to the S.C.S.C. Their services I strongly welcome because I must rely heavily upon the Internal Audit Department for professional accounting advice since no S.C.S.C. members or staff are professional accountants.

When the auditor did arrive at the Student Council he informed me that the financial records of the previous student council were inadequate and must be brought up to date. I immediately requested that he do whatever was necessary to provide a properly audited financial statement for the previous Student Council. I also requested that he do an audit of the stable record book and weekly account sheets so that the S.C.S.C. could ascertain whether the present accounting methods were also inadequate. The auditor agreed to do so and informed the S.C.S.C. that the record book and weekly account sheets did not constitute proper books of accounts and that under this system it was impossible to account for all monies received. The finance commissioner and myself therefore have worked and are continuing to work closely with the auditor to implement effective books of account and management control for the stable, pub, and general account of the S.C.S.C.

I find it difficult to understand how The Varsity can print that the University auditors are auditing the council's books because they were alerted to "alleged financial misdoings" when the Internal Audit Dept. had already informed the Council that they were doing their routine audit for the Student Council.

It is also difficult to understand how I supposedly told the administrator not to do the stable books when I quite definitely had the administrator prepare weekly account sheets that tallied the record book with actual cash income and indicated weekly percentage usage.

By my request the S.C.S.C. agreed last week to hire a bookkeeping firm to insure that the 74-75 audited financial statement will reflect proper and concise books of account so that next year's council will not be left abysmally misdirected and ill advised as was this year's council.

The same Varsity article suggests that drawing $3,100 of $3,200 salary was excessive on my part.

From April 1 through Sept. 15 I worked for the S.C.S.C. on a full time basis, rarely working less than fifty hours a week. During that period I drew $2,700 which is an average of $123.00 per week. This I hardly consider excessive considering most students earn much more from summer employment.

Since September 15 I have drawn an average of $55 per week. Scarborough College has the largest student population of any college at the U of T. This fact combined with geographic dislocation from the St. George Campus necessitates long hours of work, ruling out the possibility of casual part-time employment.

The Varsity article also refers to conflicts among elected members of the S.C.S.C. This is quite true. The underlying contention centres around priorities.

I believe the major thrust of the council must be to provide incentives that improve the level of academic achievement in the first and second year courses (A level series and B level series). This is necessary for a number of reasons. An extraordinary high percentage of second year students are on academic probation. Suspension for poor academic achievement is not uncommon and last year more Scarborough students launched petitions to the sub-committee on academic Appeal of the Governing Council than any other College within the university.

Last week Scarborough College Council was adopting spare reallocation proposals which included improving the quality of present study areas that are abhorrently noisy as well as increasing the total study area at the College. The study space aspects of the proposal were largely brought forward by myself. The S.C.S.C. endorsed my recommendations earlier but only two of the twenty-four student members of College Council attended the College council meeting. No S.C.S.C. reps were in attendance.

It is necessary that the S.C.S.C. members work together to improve the academic milieu rather than just provide a social and service oriented programme at Scarborough College.

John O'Donohue,
 President, S.C.S.C.

Others running in Ward 6 race

I can only echo David Bryce's concern for The Varsity's "most glaring example of bias" regarding the sole coverage of articles on Leckie and Spencer while there are none on the other candidates in his letter in The Varsity, November 18.

Reforming Inner City Education

By JOY-ANN COHEN

You'd never know it from the listless response the public has given the campaigns of local school trustees, but there are still problems in education that the Toronto School Board has yet to solve.

Most of these centre around removing the custodial, middle-class bias that the educational system maintains over Inner City children.

Among the members of the past Board who have worked hardest to achieve reforms in education are Dan Leckie in Ward 6, Doug Barr and Gord Cressy in Ward 7, and Fiona Nelson who was Board chairman this past year. Only Nelson is not running in the upcoming elections because she wants to go to law school. Barr and Cressy have already been elected by acclamation in their Ward.

Each of these four members has acted to replace the present system with an education in survival. They want to enable the Inner City child to achieve in school in order to get a meaningful job, to feel good in his own family and his own community, and to find freedom.

Culture and Education

"We've found from our analysis that school has a culture, and in Toronto it's mostly WASP," Leckie claims. "By the time a child has reached age four he has a way of acting, and whatever language the kid is talking in, he can speak. To tell a child who is Chinese or Portuguese to speak only English in class is to say 'Don't communicate', and 'Chinese and Portuguese are inferior'."

Leckie also said that the Board's studies have shown that a child's success in school depends on how closely the bias of his ethnic or social background matches the cast of the WASP system of education.

He cited as examples the fact that Chinese students, whose culture has a written and structural basis, are often successful in school, because these are the trends our culture enforces. Portuguese children, whose background may be more physical or oral, frequently do not achieve grades as 'good' as the Chinese.

So the system does not seem to capitalize on the attributes of individual cultures but rather to require some sort of normitative behaviour for success.

This facet of the school structure becomes most blatant when you realize that inevitably it is the children of immigrants and poor people who are streamed into opportunity classes and vocational schools. From 1961 to 1970 a student in Ward 7 entering high school could attend basically only a two-year vocational program if he wanted to stay in his area. To enter a more advanced program he had to leave his peers and travel to a school outside the neighbourhood. From 1970 to 1972 the highest education available in Ward 7 was a four-year program. The first academic high school in Ward 7, Eastdale, was set up only within the past two years.

New Programs

After painstaking negotiations with the provincial government, one or two other innovations have been approved to smooth out these inequalities. At General Mercer public school there is now a language and cultural program that is meant to be supportive of the child's native language and culture while also providing knowledge of English.

At Park School, parents have been allowed to come into the classroom as paid helpers.

Previously, some administrators claimed that anyone who was brought into the classroom to help who had less than a secondary school diploma could not be useful, and might even be harmful. The project proved that when parents were in the classroom both they and the children became more involved in the educational system.

But at Park, the money for the project (which was initially granted by the Donner Foundation) ran out. The people who initiated the project left before the end. News of what was happening in the school never really spread to the community. Unfortunately, this is the pattern that many of the Board's experiments conform to.

Some school trustees seem more ambitious in their aims to integrate the school and the community in the coming term. Fiona Nelson hopes to see more social services held in the empty classrooms that are now becoming available. Leckie has a plan to redesign the curriculum of one downtown school to meet the social culture of the area. He wants the jargon in the classroom to be the development of more sophisticated street jargon, and not The Dick and Jane vocabulary now existing.

Who Will Pay?

New programs in the Inner City are only going to viable if the city can wrest financial power from the province. The province puts restraints on the spending pattern of the local board. Although the Inner City may need more money than the suburbs, it does not have a strong say in the allocation of funds.

There must be a change in the way the school tax is assessed. Less than 30 percent of the costs of education in Toronto schools are covered by the government; the rest comes from tax assessments on property.

In downtown Toronto the amount of tax assessed does not pay for the social problems of the area (like lead poisoning and crowding). It is not likely that a tax system could be devised to totally compensate for these problems. But a school tax based on income would probably be fairer than the present property tax assessment, because so many wealthy people in downtown Toronto live in apartments.

In Ontario, the provincial government will not let the municipalities tap the federal government for funds. Ms. Nelson suggested that the upcoming Board challenge the powers of the provincial government in court. She doesn't know how this can be done because the municipalities cannot protest against the provincial government the way provincial governments can against Ottawa.

Ms. Nelson has little hope in the next Board's ability to solve the financial problems that are most damaging to the Inner City. Yet she points out that it was the people in Ward 5 who fought to a standstill the Spadina Expressway, so the impossible may still be achieved.

Just as serious as the problem of where money for future programs is to come from are questions concerning the present spending of money that is now available. A report on the Park School project, where parents are brought into the classroom, remarks that within the school there occurred an "institutionalization of the change process by more reform-minded bodies." Is it constructive for an institution like OISE, for example, to eventually monopolize the control of a program?

Reform and Institutionalization

Institutionalization has not been the fate of all the alternate schools. The students who started SEED asked for total freedom in designing their curriculum, choosing teachers, and attending classes. And they got it. Since that time the school has purposefully Central Technical School, where many Inner City children are streamed into technical and trades orientated classes.

Too frequently our educational system has schooled out the respect which boys should have for hard toil, and has placed before them as an ideal life that of the college student or of the salesman or of the clerk with unsoiled hands and immaculate linen.

The majority of our boys will be, and should be, mechanics and artisans.

- Annual Report of the Toronto Board of Education, 1910.

changed its students, staff and location in order to prevent institutionalization.

A question that remains about the changes that the Board intends in school curricula in the Inner City (and it is a question that is particularly galling to "liberals") concerns the people they are aimed at. Do they want them? Do parents in lower income areas want their children's books written in street jargon, or would they prefer their kids to be learning "new math"?

Many of the changes that have been proposed are "hopelessly trendy" as Ms. Nelson herself points out. She says of a new alternate school called SUBWAY, "The only thing I can see that's different about it from other schools is that the kids ride on the subway."

There have been experiments in only four or five of the sixty schools in downtown Toronto in the past two years. Gord Cressy, who will probably be the next chairman of the Board, is hoping to bring back more structure to Inner City schools. He hopes this will enable teachers to spend less time controlling the class and more time helping students achieve a higher level of scholastic success.

This is a far cry from the romantic notions that many people held a few years ago about the need for open schools. But then jobs are getting scarcer. Children of the poor have not been as well educated as children of the rich and are getting fewer of the jobs that are available. Even the writers of the Hall Dennis report couldn't call that "freedom".

There are 2 other candidates running in the election for trustee in Ward 6, Pam Dineen and Joanne Pritchard, both running on the League for Socialist Action slate.

Pam Dineen is a high school biology teacher who is the president of her school's branch of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation and a steering committee member of the Metro Teachers' Caucus.

The other candidate is Joanne

Pritchard, a student at Jarvis Collegiate, who the political system considers a "non person" because she is 17 years old and is therefore not on the ballot.

Issues of the socialist campaign in education are: student staff control of the schools; an end to the streaming of immigrants, women and working poor into courses leading to low paying jobs; democratic rights for students and teachers; and for courses that teach the truth about the labour movement, women, Blacks and other oppressed groups.

We don't claim that electing us will solve worker's problems. Only through the mass action of working people, students and all the oppressed fighting for their needs with rallies, demonstrations, pickets and strikes, will real social change be achieved. We are advancing a socialist program which can take these struggles forward.

David Johnson, League for Socialist Action candidate for trustee

Canadian wolf out of danger: expert

By JOSEPH BITNER

Canadian wolves are no longer in serious danger, claimed U of T professor Douglas Pimlott, the internationally-known wolf expert and conservationist.

Pimlott has just returned from Switzerland where he chaired an international meeting of wolf conservationists. A rapid audience of 50 first-year biology students attended the lecture Wednesday.

"The world situation is still critical," Pimlott said. "Only last summer, two Spanish children were killed and the wolf pack is to be exterminated."

Wolves killing humans is extremely rare, he assured his audience, noting there are no properly documented reports of deaths in Canada.

Wolves were once found all over areas, he continued. They live in Spain, Portugal, France and Italy, although the numbers are extremely low.

Wolves were once found all over North America, from the Mexican rain forest to the north pole, but they have been progressively wiped out in all of the U.S. except northern Minnesota, Pimlott said.

Hatred of the wolf is an ancient part of the wolf-human relationship. Primitive hunters competed with the wolf for deer and elk, seeing it as a threat to their food supply.

Later, early farmers lost their sheep and cows. They saw reindeer and moose being efficiently killed and feared for their own lives.

Early conservationists were equally foolish, Pimlott noted. In their efforts to save deer for their weekend hunt, they convinced governments to place a large bounty on each dead wolf as well as poisoning them indiscriminately.

Their plan sometimes backfired though. Deer overpopulated without natural controls and starved to death by the hundreds in the next long winter, he explained.

"There has been a change in climate since the 1960s," Pimlott said. The bounty has been removed in most of Canada. Even the U.S.S.R., the last country to practise indiscriminate extermination, has now modified its policies.

Writers such as Farley Mowat, author of Never Cry Wolf, have had profound effect on treatment of the animal. Mowat's mixture of "fact, fiction and fantasy" is very convincing, Pimlott asserted.

During the last few years responsible international groups have been helping to save the European wolf by approaching the media, scientists and politicians. The possibility of extinction is now, hopefully, gone.

Basketball Blues lose 52-50 to Laurentian

By DAVE STUART
The basketball Blues also contributed to this dismal weekend for Varsity fans by dropping a close contest 52-50 to the Laurentian Voyageurs at the Benson Building Saturday night.

Inaccurate shooting, lack of ball control, and almost total ineptness at the foul line coupled with very aggressive play on the part of the Voyageurs turned a possible 80 point night for the Blues into the close loss.

Blues continually fought an uphill battle throughout the game as they spotted the Vees an early seven point lead and spent the rest of the night trying to get and hold a lead.

The game, despite the Blues' attempts to play Santa Claus, was a cliff hanger right up to the final few seconds.

In the last four minutes, the lead changed hands several times, as the teams leap-frogged each other with each successive basket.

Laurentian now lead the league with four wins against no losses. The Voyageurs finished third in the league last year, with an 11 and 3 record.

Blues next visit the Ryerson Rams Tuesday night at Ryerson. Game time is 8:00 pm.

Western wins College Bowl

By PAUL CARSON
A fitting team came to an unfitting end before college football's largest crowd in the tenth annual College Bowl.

The Blues committed numerous major errors and relied on a questionable game plan in falling 19-15 to an aroused band of Western Mustangs in an essentially dull game played Friday night to an announced attendance of 26,450 at the CNE Stadium.

Critical mistakes by Varsity offensive, defensive, and special unit players led to all 19 points recorded by the Mustangs, while Blues were unable to capitalize on the opportunities created by their fired-up opponents.

In addition, Blues continually tried to run against a defence stacked to stop their strong rushing attack.

Quarterback Dave Langley spent most of the game evading an unexpectedly strong Western pass rush and as a result Varsity's net rushing total was a mere 54 yards. For the first time in eleven games, rookie halfback Mark Bragagnolo failed to amass 100 yards, finishing with a net total of 49 from 16 carries.

Western's defensive co-ordinator, Darwin Semotluk, devised a strategy designed to neutralize Blues running with the hope that 'Stangs secondary could contain Varsity's inconsistent aerial efforts.

Western's defence turned in an outstanding effort and linebacker Ian Bryans thoroughly deserved his selection as the game's most valuable player.

It was an unfortunate ending to Blues' most successful season which saw ten consecutive victories, gained predominantly from stellar defensive play.

Blues' defenders played their hearts out in the losing effort, holding Western to a net rushing total of only 48 yards and limiting all-Canadian quarterback Bill Robinson to 11 completions in 26 pass attempts for 119 yards.

Thanks to the late surge, Blues actually had the edge in passing statistics with six completions for 137 yards.

Linebackers John Vernon and Guido Iantorno sparked Blues to a 9-0 lead in the game's first eleven minutes.

Vernon opened the scoring by dropping Robinson for a safety touch at 10:41.

Two plays later, Iantorno tackled Mustang punter Brian Craig on his own one-yard line when Craig forgot to concede a safety after recovering a high snap.

The offence, which had earlier been unable to capitalize on a Geoff Sutherland fumble recovery, made no mistakes this time and Bob Hedges crashed over on the next play.

Mike Sokovnin added the convert and the rout appeared to be underway.

However, Mustangs gained two first downs on their next possession and Craig's 55-yard kick with the wind gave Western a single point in the quarter's final minute.

Operating with the strong wind at their backs during the second quarter, Blues were able to maintain favorable field position without ever gaining a first down. Western also contributed to Blues advantage with three needless 15-yard penalties.

However, with five minutes remaining, the first of three consecutive high snaps on punting situations put Blues in trouble as Sokovnin could manage only a one-yard punt as he scrambled for his life and Western suddenly was in scoring position for the first time in the game.

A field goal attempt was short and wide but safety Rick Jeysman inexplicably retreated into his own endzone on the return and was tackled for an unearned two points.

Blues struck back with their own two first downs of the quarter but were eventually forced to punt and Ken Hussey's second high snap sailed over Sokovnin's head. Blues punter recovered the ball but his desperation pass was intercepted by Western linebacker Jon Jewell.

Another field goal attempt was wide and a no yards call against Western seemed to have preserved Varsity's 9-3 lead since only 53 seconds remained in the half.

However, instead of taking a delay of game penalty to run out the clock, Blues coaches decided to punt on third down and third time was decidedly unlucky as Sokovnin failed to control Glen Rosborough's high snap and Western's Jim Cimba eventually fell on the ball in the Varsity endzone for a gift-wrapped touchdown.

Suddenly it was half-time and Western led 10-9 even though Blues' defence had limited the Stangs to 33 yards passing and a net of minus-12 yards along the ground.

Blues were decidedly unsettled by the freakish turn of events as the second half opened; Western rattled off two first downs and a roughing the passer penalty set up a single point from a wide field goal with less than three minutes gone.

Western again had the wind advantage but Blues started to move the ball; however, two separate roughing penalties on a punt return handed Western 30 free yards.

Blues defenders appeared to be still talking to themselves about the double penalties as Robinson hit

The Varsity — John Rak

Western's Jay Parry didn't get far this time but did catch the game-winning touchdown pass.

flanker Jay Parry for 47 yards and a touchdown on the very next play.

Another Mustang advantage drive netted a single point before the quarter ended.

Blues couldn't get anything going in the fourth quarter as each series began with a short run or loss in the backfield. It appeared as if Blues were trying to protect a lead instead of challenging one.

Finally, Langley passed to Steve Ince on a pattern that was available all game but not used. Ince was completely open and raced 85 yards to the Western 18.

Two plays and a penalty later Langley passed to Ince for the touchdown.

Blues were back in the game but on the convert Al Brenchley, who had been sitting on the bench in chilly 34-degree weather, couldn't hold the snap and the score remained 19-15. The field goal which might have tied the game was now useless.

Doug Ball's interception and runback put the offence on the Western 29 but Langley tore his ankle ligaments on a roll out and on third down split end Mark Ackley fell while trying to grab Brenchley's pass.

Blues had one more opportunity with 28 seconds remaining but Brenchley's long apparently complete pass to Ackley was ruled as caught out of bounds by the two nearest officials.

Blues, via mistakes and poor judgement, effectively gave away the trophy they really wanted.

However, the team did capture the Yates Cup and Atlantic Bowl, so on balance 1974 was a pretty good year.

Despite the gloom in the dressing room, there was a hell of a lot of well-deserved pride.

Hockey Blues tie Voyageurs 4-4

By ANNE LLOYD

On Thursday the rabbi went hungry... and on Friday, the Blues should have stayed home!

As a prelude to Varsity's 19-15 explosive power and marked inability to put the puck in the net.

Getting back to Friday's contest, Varsity was lucky to get the tie—and unlucky not to get the win.

puck past Tataryn, who looked a bit asleep on the play. Rooke's power play goal was set up by a fine pass from Ivan McFarlane.

Undaunted by this brief flurry of Varsity offence, the Voyageurs proved that persistence does pay off at 11:36 of the second period, as Blake had two shots at Hulme before he finally got the rubber past the sprawled Varsity netminder.

Blues made it 3-2 on a goal by Brent Swanick. Varsity caught the Vees on a line change and capitalized on a subsequent 3 on 1 break. With Tataryn easing towards the two men in front of the net, Swanick was able to fire the puck past the Laurentian goalie.

This seemed to fire up the Blues and for the remainder of the second, Varsity—particularly the Hews-Fifield-Davies line—had many fine chances, only to be robbed by spectacular netminding by ex-Blue Dave Tataryn.

Ivan McFarlane also did most of the work on the goal which tied the score at 3-3. The Voyageur defence got slack and were standing around too much, allowing McFarlane to find Ron Harris free in front of the net. Harris put a high shot past Tataryn at 7:56.

For an all too brief time, the explosive punch of the Blues' offence was there, as Kent Ruhnke raced in on the right wing, after a perfectly placed long lead pass from Bob Adorant, and put a quick rising shot past Tataryn to give Blues a 4-3 lead.

Laurentian came back to tie the game at 12:35, as the Blues' efforts to forecheck the Vees failed. The Blues were unable to pull out a win despite a last minute flourish which saw Davies and Herridge come close on several occasions.

football loss to Western, the hockey Blues managed to tie the Laurentian Voyageurs 4-4, keeping intact the Blues' undefeated record this year.

Indeed, at 11:36 of the second period, with Tom Blake's second goal of the contest giving Laurentian a 3-1 lead, many of the press and penalty box pundits were busy trying to recall when Varsity last lost a regular season game at home!

Perhaps a few lessons in how to score goals without really trying (available on Super 8 film loops at Canadian Tire) would be more useful. But something must be done about the Varsity Squad's lack of Laurentian looked very sharp early in the game, forechecking well and taking the slot away from the Blues with an alert defence. The Blues on the other hand looked tired and rather stodgy.

The Voyageurs took a 1-0 lead at 16:51 of the opening period when Rick Rebello fired a hard shot from the left point. Laurentian added to their lead at 5:12 of the second when Tom Blake got his first goal of the night, poking the puck past a befuddled Dave Hulme. Varsity came back to cut the margin to 2-1 with rookie Dave Rooke charging the net to push the Budget paints gloomy 75-76 picture

The Governing Council continues to keep the university budget confidential. The Varsity feels this cannot be justified, especially this year, given the university's claim of financial crisis.

There are going to be a number of people walking around campus with long — and possibly even cold — faces if the 1975-76 budget is anything to go by.

Several divisions will experience severe budget cuts, none will have large increases, and the level of physical service on campus is likely to decline drastically.

The faculty of medicine, for example, will experience a three-year budget cut of over $1 million, with $247,000 going this year. The faculty of applied science and engineering loses $125,000, the faculty of education is down $150,000. The school of continuing studies is down $161,000. The instructional media centre loses $63,000.

These are just some examples from a budget which is feeling a self-admitted pinch from three quarters:

- a rate of inflation that is astronomical
- a shortfall in the rate of provincial subsidy, far less than the rate of inflation, forcing the university to make economies.
- a levelling-off of enrolment.

Although the university's budget committee had expected to feel the pinch of inadequate funding, it had budgeted for a nine percent increase in provincial funding. The government announced a 7.4 percent increase.

"This year," says the budget statement, "we have been compelled to consider the budget in the complete absence of any indication from the government of Ontario as to changes in the value of the basic income unit (BIU)."

As a result, the budget makes no provision for increases in staff salaries, and says only that the university should "do everything possible to avert the damage which financial stringency could cause to the academic quality of the university's programs."

At last Thursday's Governing Council meeting, U of T president John Evans suggested three courses of action could be taken in light of the meagre increase in provincial funding.

Of the three options — massive layoffs, small salary increases or deficit budgeting — Evans and the council accepted the latter.

The effect of a deficit would not be felt for over a year, allowing the university to put pressure on the province to change the level of its funding.

The budget, computed on the basis of the actual BIU increase, allows a surplus of roughly $8 million to deal with salary increases for all university staff. The cost of an across-the-board salary increase is $1.2 million for every percentage point, concludes the budget committee. Accordingly, a seven percent increase is all the university can afford without doing into debt.

A small group of budget committee members will meet informally with Evans to decide the salary question — the extent to which the university will incur a deficit before going to the full Governing Council for approval.

Constituent colleges are allotted money to develop cross-appointments, under the terms of the "colleges agreement". Under the agreement, all present college departments will become university departments, but where there will be more cross-appointments to colleges to allow college-centered teaching.

This year, University College will receive $220,000, Innis College and New College each $110,000 for cross-appointments. Over five years, University College will receive $1 million, and New and Innis Colleges $500,000.

The budget of Woodsworth College, the recently established body primarily for part-time students, has been reduced by $82,000.

This will come from loss of "start up" cost, and increase in class section sizes, which, the budget committee says, are lower than those in arts and science as a whole.

In total, the committee recommends "no basic change" in the budget for arts and science, authorizing the dean to "meet his most pressing needs by internal allocation of funds."

The budgets for Scarborough and Erindale Colleges are both up: Scarborough by over $800,000 and Erindale by over $700,000.

Despite an increase of $450,000 in operating budgets, one of the most serious cutbacks will come in the department of physical plant, since the total increase will not cover inflated costs.

"This reduction of real expenditure," says the budget committee, "will inevitably involve further reduction of services to all users."

"Reductions... will have a very direct impact on maintenance, cleaning and other services provided by the department," the budget says.

Dentistry, nursing, pharmacy, physical and health education, management studies, architecture, library science and music are all getting increases. Budgets for forestry, law, library science, athletics and the library stayed constant.

To the School of Graduate Studies goes a hefty increase, including $150,000 for the Institute for Environmental Studies, over $500,000 in scholarship money.

The new medical division of community health to which the Governing Council recently voted to give high priority, receives increased funding of $60,000, in addition to over $40,000 in a "suspense account" handled by the vice-president and provost.

The administration managed to maintain increases in expenditure, with the big winner being John Evans himself, the grant to his office going up over $75,000. The budget does not stipulate what this grant is for.

In response to demands from SAC, $15,000 has been set aside in Forster's budget to "facilitate research and development in course and teaching evaluation techniques."

Although other administrative offices have marginal or no expenditure increases, the university health service receives a budget chop of $15,000.

Wells says OK to pass on comments

By MARINA STRAUSS

Ontario Education Minister Thomas Wells admitted yesterday he did not check the identity of the person who sent him a critical letter about John Seeley, which the education minister referred to in the Legislature.

In an interview, Wells denied it was irresponsible to tell the Legislature a letter he received indicated Seeley was "a controversial figure in academic circles."

But he said he "wouldn't be surprised" if the letter was written under a false name. Wells refused to reveal the letter-writer.

Top administrators have vetoed sociology department decisions at both U of T and OISE to hire Seeley, who is widely known to be a brilliant Canadian sociologist.

Wells told the Legislature Nov. 7 he personally had phoned OISE director Robert Jackson six months ago to inform him that "one or two prominent educators" in Ontario had called Wells to advise Seeley not be hired at the institute.

At the same time, Wells said he had received a copy of a letter "from someone again at another university" indicating Seeley was a controversial figure.

Wells said he couldn't remember who had signed the letter, but noted it was addressed to the Toronto Star editor.

Checks with various departments of the Star revealed the newspaper had received no legitimate letter regarding Seeley which had not previously been published. Wells said he received the letter last month.

The Varsity also received a copy of a letter last month addressed to the Toronto Star and which falsely cited an article saying Seeley "must surely be the most disturbed sociologist in North America." The letter was signed by an "Arthur Sontag, lecturer, Division of Social Science, York University."

After lengthy investigations, The Varsity found no such lecturer named Arthur Sontag existed at York. The York lecturerer also couldn't be found in Toronto. A Star editor said she could not recall the Sontag letter.

However, Wells said he couldn't remember if the letter he received was from an Arthur Sontag.

Although Wells does not know Seeley, he maintained it was not unethical of him to pass on information from noted educators or to attribute to someone the statement that Seeley is a "controversial figure in academic circles."

"It's a true statement, isn't it?" Wells queried.

Students and faculty members have argued they never received adequate reasons for Seeley's rejections.

Seeley feels he was rejected because of his reputation for supporting student demands on campuses, and his support of many controversial social issues.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch sent a letter to Wells Monday demanding to know who the "prominent educators" were and if he has tangible proof of the reservations expressed over the Seeley appointment.

"The recent revelations surrounding your role in the non-appointment of John Seeley raise very serious questions concerning the relationship between the University of Toronto and the Ontario government," Kanowitch wrote.

"I find it disturbing that you as a minister of the Ontario government would call the director of OISE to pass on negative comments concerning Dr. Seeley.

"I find it even more disturbing that you will not reveal either the nature of the negative comments, the names of those who submitted them to you, or whether there is any tangible proof to back up these assertions," Kanowitch said.

SAC called on Governing Council this week to set up an independent review to investigate why Seeley wasn't offered a teaching appointment at U of T.

SAC also called on the university to set up an independent review into the extent of administrative and governmental interference in university hiring procedures.

OISE's board of governors is conducting its own review of Seeley's non-appointment, despite faculty and student pleas for an independent review.

Gov't stops student-run pubs next year

After New Year's, students in Ontario may not be able to stop in at local campus pubs for a brew. As January 1, government legislation will make all student-run campus pubs illegal.

Changes in the Liquor Act introduced by the Ontario government would allow only one license per campus, and that would have to be held by the central administration.

The only exceptions will be pubs which already have licenses such as the Downstairs John at McMaster. Most other campus pubs operate on special occasion permits and the Liquor Licensing Board of Ontario has announced these will not be granted to campus groups.

The legislation has come under strong criticism from the Ontario Federation of Students and student councils across the province, but the province has shown no indication of changing its tune.

Licenses will not be granted to students, faculty or any other groups on campus. They will only be given to a chief administrator designated and employed by the university.

The pubs could not be operated by the student council, even with university consent.

As U of T the changes may close down pubs at Victoria College, St.

Mike's, Innis, Trinity, University College, Erindale, and Scarborough.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch said that although specific regulations have not been announced, the legislation has no loopholes which would allow pubs to continue to operate.

He said initially student councils had hoped to continue running the pubs with administration consent but this would not be possible.

You'll have to suck one of these bables at home next year.

SAC has joined with other campuses in demanding a moratorium on the implementation of the legislation and called for support in principle for student-controlled pubs and the continuation of special occasion permits for campuses unable to support full-time pubs.

SAC is approaching the U of T administration for support. He feels they are not anxious to get into the pub business and will probably support the student initiative. Then pressure will be put on individual members of the legislature.

OFS field worker Ben MacDonald said that they have hired two special organizers to work full-time on the problem. Lawyers have advised OFS the denial of special occasion permits is legal because they are privileges, not rights.

MacDonald said several campus pubs have already closed down, and across Ontario the others are making plans to cease operations after the new year.

OFS has sponsored meetings across the province to organize student opposition to the changes. MacDonald feels that changes would probably depend on the government's election plans.

Injured workers form union to voice demands to gov't

Ontario government inaction on injured workers' grievances has resulted in the formation of a new group called the Union of Injured Workers (UIW), backed strongly by organized labor.

The main demands of the group include full compensation and job security, full and automatic cost of living increases in compensation pay, greater penalties for companies with unsafe working conditions and independent medical examinations.

More than 500 workers demonstrated last week in front of the Legislature in support of their position. They have received growing support from labor unions across the province since the formation of the UIW in September.

In a brief presented to Ontario Labor Minister John MacBeth, the union backs up its demands with a hard-hitting criticism of present government policy.

The UIW demands the government take immediate action in increasing fines on negligent employers, especially in the construction industry.

The brief points out Canada has one of the highest rates of death by industrial accident in the west, and unions are being forced to hold wildcat walkouts to dramatize the situation.

As of June this year, 39,500 violations of the Construction Safety Act resulted in only $41,000 in fines, or 83 cents per violation.

Recent amendments to the Workman's Compensation Act, the UIW claims, have failed to put teeth into safety penalties while only marginally increasing benefits.

Another key demand is the raising of all compensation payments retroactive to the date of the accident and in accordance with cost of living and average wage rates.

Another thorny question has been the use of Workmen's Compensation Board doctors to assess the percentage of physical disability. The UIW demands abolition of board doctors, pointing out that doctors paid by and responsible to the board can't give a fair assessment.

The example of Dr. Ian Hector, a U of T medical school professor, who said Italians are culturally predisposed to play a sick role, is given to illustrate cruel treatment of injured workers.

The brief charges "injured workers with real pain have been given psychotherapy, truth serum, electro-shock and other supposed psychiatric treatment."

The UIW argues that injured workers must be guaranteed jobs and compensation equal to 100 per cent of lost earnings.

The brief says jobs can be guaranteed by an effective job rehabilitation program, providing incentives for employers to rehire injured workers and requiring employers to shoulder the financial burden of workers unable to return to the work force.

The brief opposes the arbitrary movement of workers from the temporarily disabled category with full compensation to the permanently disabled category with only partial support.

Women in Guinea-Bissau struggle for liberation

Women in Guinea-Bissau are engaged in a unique struggle for liberation, a member of the South Africa Committee told a campus audience yesterday.

Stephanie Urdang recently returned from a visit this summer where she interviewed many Guinean women about their experiences during the liberation struggle.

The PAIGC, the liberation movement and now the ruling party in independent Guinea-Bissau, includes reconstruction of society and the liberation of women as an integral part of its goals.

Amilcar Cabral, the founder of the PAIGC, said there could be no successful struggle for liberation without the equal participation of women.

Urdang said the position of women has improved a great deal since the beginning of the struggle in 1956. Younger women are not as conscious of the change, she said.

Political power has basically remained in the hands of men, despite the PAIGC's policy. In practice women feel they can only achieve equality by themselves.

Urdang said women now are required to fill two out of five seats on village councils, which have replaced tribal chiefs.

The main thing now is to educate men to accept new roles for women. The economic role of women as primary agricultural producers as well as housewives is only changing gradually with men helping more.

Toronto Star sues reporter they fired

The Toronto Star last week launched a lawsuit against reporter Claire Hoy and television stations CBLT and CITY—for alleged libel in connection with statements Hoy made in appearances on the two stations early in October. Star political editor David Crane joined the Star in the action. Hoy had mentioned an article by Crane in his television appearances.

Earlier, the Star and the Guild had agreed to go directly to an arbitration board over the Star's firing of Hoy last month for alleged gross misconduct.

The Guild named Norman Simon, public relations director for the Canadian Union of Public Employees, as its representative on the three-member board.

He will meet with a Star representative, not yet named, to select a mutually agreeable board chairman and begin hearings.

The Star, in dismissing Hoy without severance pay, charged that he had made "inaccurate and highly detrimental" statements when he discussed aspects of the Star's editorial operation on two television programs Oct. 2 and Oct. 3.

Hoy has since been working as a speech writer for James Auld, Ontario's minister of colleges and universities, on a contract basis.

Both television stations involved—CBLT and CITY—have rejected the Star's requests that they broadcast retractions and apologies.

Simon, a former labor reporter for the now-defunct Toronto Telegram, was the Guild's representative on an arbitration board which last year ordered the Star to put freelance photographer Keith Beaty on staff.

The Guild's position in the Hoy case will be argued by the labor law firm of Sack and Dunn.

Administrators deny Seely interference

By GENE ALLEN

Three high-level U of T administrators have, predictably, denied that their interference in a sociology department staffing committee's decision to hire John Seely was improper.

The sociology department is in the midst of an experiment in open and democratic decision-making. Students and faculty members sit in equal numbers on the departmental council and on departmental committees.

A letter from sociology department chairman Irving Zeitlin to OISE sociology chairman Ted Harvey stated that "at one point during our departmental deliberations, the Deans of Arts and Science and the School of Graduate Studies expressed strong opposition to the Seely appointment; and . . . this opposition, in turn, prompted the Provost to call me, saying that he could not approve the appointment if the Deans failed to do so."

This letter was published in The Varsity Nov. 6, and confirmed what many people had suspected: that the experiment in the sociology department would have the support of administrators only as long as no controversial decisions were made.

INTERFERENCE

Ed Safarian, dean of the School of Graduate Studies, took a forthright stand in defending his interference with the staffing committee's decision.

"That's not a matter I care to comment on," Safarian said. "Printing that letter was a breach of confidence in the first place, and to talk about it would be a further breach of confidence. I can't comment on my actions, or lack of them. I don't think I care to comment at all."

It has been suggested that Safarian's opposition to the appointment was a favor to his friend Leo Zakuta. Zakuta, a senior professor in the sociology department and SGS associate dean, is thought to have led the opposition against Seely's appointment. Safarian had no comment on this suggestion.

Bob Greene, dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science, said while he supports the structural changes in the sociology department, he did come out against the hiring of Seely.

"It became more and more evident to me that the department was deeply divided," Greene said. "I don't think the disagreement was about who controls the department, but just about the hiring of John Seely."

PARITY

But Greene admitted, "It's no secret there are some attempts being made against the idea of parity in the department."

"The whole departmental structure is an experiment," he said. "Professor Zeitlin is required to circulate decisions of the staffing committees throughout the department and ask for decisions."

Asked whether administrative interference undermined open decision-making in the sociology department, Greene replied, "There's no such thing as departmental autonomy. It's a recommendation at every point."

(Final decisions on hiring are made by the provost. He receives a recommendation from the departmental chairman. The departmental chairman, in turn, passes on a recommendation to the provost on the basis of a recommendation by a departmental staffing committee. Until finally approved by the provost, all recommendations are subject to veto as they work their way up through the administrative hierarchy.)

But Greene agreed his response to "deep divisions" within the department had to come out in support of one side of the disagreement or the other.

"It (the decision to interfere in the staffing committee's recommendation to hire Seely) seems to be a decision for the negative side," he said.

PRESSURE

Given Greene's sympathy for the new structure in the sociology department, some observers have suggested that his decision to intervene was the result of pressure from higher up in the administrative hierarchy.

Don Forster, provost and vice-president, said his remarks to Zeitlin were entirely based on "the role of the dean of arts and science. It was his (Greene's) own decision."

Asked whether pressure might have been put on Greene from elsewhere, Forster replied, "I'm not aware of that . . . not to my knowledge."

Forster said he didn't think administrators had played an improper role in the decision not to hire Seely. "I don't see it as that," Forster said. "The staffing committee is just advisory to the chairman. The chairman makes the final decision."

The continuing controversy over the decision not to hire Seely has given the impression in some quarters that the sociology department is in chaos as a result of the new structure, but this is a mistaken impression, according to sociology student and former staffing committee member Pauline Pytka.

"The reason why there's so much controversy in the sociology department is just because manipulation can't take place behind closed doors any more," Pytka said.

"I'm sure that much worse things go on in other departments—but they're so tightly controlled by the chairman, nobody ever finds out what's going on. So of course there's no controversy."

Pytka said although she felt continued publicity was not doing the department, or its new structure, any good, controversy had to be expected when the decision-making process is brought out into the open.

NUS campaigns for more student aid

WINNIPEG (CUP) — Posters and a pamphlet to publicize a campaign for increased financial aid for students will be appearing on campuses across Canada during the coming month.

The central committee of the National Union of Students (NUS) which is coordinating the campaign, approved the posters and pamphlet at a meeting in Winnipeg, Nov. 16 and 17.

Other decisions made at the meeting include the following:

- NUS will ask the secretary of state for a one-week postponement of the Dec. 1 deadline for student input on the design of a questionnaire on student financing.

- Statistics Canada has asked NUS for student input on the questionnaire. A postponement of the deadline will give the NUS Ottawa office and students across Canada an opportunity to suggest changes.

- NUS also agreed to hold sessions on several campuses to pre-test the questionnaire. It will then be sent to a large sample of students across the country.

- Referenda on member campuses to approve an increase in fees paid to the national union from the present 30 cents per student to $1 per student approved by October's national NUS conference, should be held by May, 1976. Any campus that does not approve the increased fee by that time shall cease to be a member.

- After hearing from provincial representatives, the committee agreed that after the student aid campaign, fee increase referenda on 10 campuses are a priority for early 1975.

Student aid group meets

A U of T Committee on Student Aid will meet for the first time tomorrow at 1 pm in Sidney Smith, Room 1068, to discuss action to increase living allowances given under OSAP.

Large meetings have been held at other campuses, reflecting the widespread concern at the inadequacy of student aid. A recent report done by U of T estimated the $32 a week living allowance is completely inadequate for Toronto housing and food costs.

Three Ontario campuses are organizing a petition campaign to get changes in OSAP and put pressure on the government.

The initiative to form a U of T committee comes from SAC, the Association of Part-time University Students and the Graduate Students' Union. The aim is to try and focus on student grievances and organize to put pressure on the government.

Clarity obscured in call for definition have involved themselves in this question."

He then hits us with a non-definition of "race" which renders the term as "meaningless" as he intends it not to be.

From Wells' "pensees" on the word race, we learn only that "an individual does not cease to be a member of his race, by changing geographical location or citizenship" and that race "must denote characteristics which some people taken together possess, and which others do not."

Wonderful. If there were a "race" of people in Canada with big noses, they would fit the easy-going terms of Wells' definition.

After all, by changing their location through emigration, they would not cease to have big noses. And big noses are certainly things "which some people taken together possess, and which others do not."

Of course, this assumes that we are talking only about physical characteristics. Perhaps Wells believes there are others. He never bothers to let us know.

More to the point, Wells overlooks an essential question.

Who decides what the characteristics are "which some people taken together possess and which others do not"? The members of that race? The members of another race? William Shockley? Perhaps Mr. Wells?

Our problems however, are only just beginning.

In the following paragraph we are informed that "conflict between or among races" (racism?) becomes possible in the event that there are "difficulties in disowning and removing old racial characteristics, on the one hand, or in accepting and realizing new traits, on the other hand."

Are we then to assume that the reasons behind the rioting in Watts and Newark during the mid-60's, the rise of the civil rights movement in the United States and later that of black militancy, the savage apartheid policies of the South African government toward its native population, have all occurred because blacks were trying to lose their sense of rhythm?

Again we come back to the central question — who is doing the defining of those racial "characteristics"?

Next Wells appeals to the authority of "history" to demonstrate something or other, oblivious to a warning I seem to have picked up somewhere during my studies at university to the effect that "what we learn from history is that we learn nothing from history."

Then Wells drops his "biggie". He tells us that "genetically inferior" "may be accepted as a statement of the fact that members of a certain race have been finding it from difficult to impossible as a race, to adapt to a problematic environment, in that a possible solution might involve their moving "outside themselves" indeed, "diluting their stock".

I see. So if we took a bunch of White Anglo-Saxon Protestants out of Toronto and dumped them at the North Pole we could say they were "genetically inferior" until they mated with the aborigines of that region.

But "genetically inferior" to whom — the aborigines they are "diluting" themselves with? The WASPs they left behind? Sergeant Preston of the Royal Mounted? Perhaps Mr. Wells?

Or does a "problematic environment" have to do with something more than physical location? Again, Wells refuses to make himself clear.

Undaunted, Wells announces that "any discussion of either 'racism' or 'racism in Canada', must initially proceed "by outlining the philosophies of man being presupposed".

Whose philosophies and "being presupposed" by whom?

Next we learn that "although Canada already is the home of many different races, it has been the homeland for many generations of some few races. If there is any sense of nationhood in Canada, it would be wrong to divorce this sense from those who have developed it."

Perhaps so Mr. Wells, but one might add that Canada was the homeland for the "most" generations of its Indian peoples, and as we both know, nice, liberal, university-educated people like you and me aren't really prepared to go back quite that far in pursuit of a sense of nationhood or for that matter one of justice now are we?

However, as Mr. Wells suggests that The Varsity can be valuable by encouraging a standard of "intelligent concern" over the issue of racism "in those articles it chooses to bring to the attention of this (the university) community," I too, have a suggestion.

I would ask the editor of The Varsity to encourage Mr. Wells to drop into The Varsity's offices at 91 St. George St. and supply him with this much needed definition of racism. To make it as easy as possible on Mr. Wells, I would also request that he not be assigned anything like a real story to cover, but simply the task he has set out for The Varsity, the unfolding of that "carefully formulated, pertinent, and comprehensive definition of racism."

Based on Mr. Wells' first communication, this should keep him going for as long as he chooses to remain at university.

Edward Lary,
Varsity reporter

"They had come to watch with horror his habit of pointing with his pipe and saying: 'Racism, now that's a very interesting word, but are we quite sure we know what it means?'" (Adapted from "Totentanz", a short story by Angus Wilson.)

Robert Wells' letter to the editor of Friday, Nov. 22 ("Racism must be well defined") is one of the most obscure calls for "clarity" I have ever read.

To make matters worse, I suspect that Mr. Wells may in fact have an excellent "working knowledge" of racism, whatever problems he is having defining the word.

Wells begins his comments demanding that a "carefully formulated, pertinent, and comprehensive definition of racism be agreed upon by all those who Heap likes Varg article, but...

I read with interest your article in the Nov. 20 issue regarding the death of the Odeon-Carlton Theatre. I thought that the article was a very good article that explained the issues clearly and defined the conflicts that existed.

However, I think there was one point that needs clarification. The article states that "City council had voted for, somewhat mysteriously, an exception to the apartment-hotel ban some months previously, right on the site in question."

I am one of the Aldermen for Ward Six, and I spoke and voted against the exception. If the other Ward Six Alderman had also spoken and voted against it, I believe City Council would have refused to allow this overcrowding on the site of the Odeon-Carlton.

Dan Heap,
Alderman, Ward 6

Heap and Sparrow deserve support

This letter is to urge The Varsity to extend official editorial support to the candidates of the Ward 6 Community Organization: Heap & Sparrow (Aldermen); Leckie & Spencer (School Trustees).

For the sake of brevity, I will confine my comments here to some of the accomplishments of Alderman Dan Heap in my own neighbourhood alone. Among Heap's many accomplishments, he has worked with the community to:

- begin an experimental traffic control program to reduce the speed and volume of traffic;
- force landlords to bring buildings up to standard at 93A Major and 572-574 Spadina;
- improve the boulevard and oppose street widening on Brunswick Avenue;
- pass zoning laws forbidding establishment of office buildings at 566-568 Spadina;
- establish city control over unnecessary demolition of existing houses;
- put in a crosswalk across Harbord at Borden;
- develop parkettes at Brunswick and College Streets, Central Tech and Robert Street playground;
- plan a parking control system to save on-street spaces for residents rather than commuters; and
- help groups to set up daycares (Duke of York & Church Street Public Schools, and University Settlement House).

Among other things, Heap intends in my neighbourhood to:

- extend and improve our traffic control system;
 - defend the rights of tenants.
- Furthermore, Sparrow, Spencer and Leckie are "cut from the same cloth" and have equally impressive accomplishments and similar aspirations to their credit.

Ward 6 is also heavily populated by U of T students and staff. In Ward 5, The Varsity should, for similar reasons, endorse Ald. Colin Vaughn and for school board trustees — Debbie Lewis and Vince Kelly.

Although The Varsity is less widely distributed in Wards other than 5 and 6, there are many outstanding candidates in these wards who deserve The Varsity's endorsement.

On December 2, Torontonians have the opportunity to elect the best municipal government Toronto has ever had.

Blues 'stank out the stadium'

I didn't think I would ever see a championship Blue team so horribly humiliated as happened last Friday night. You summed it up pretty well in your third last sentence in Monday's Varsity. ("Blues, via mistakes and poor judgement, effectively gave away the trophy they really wanted.") You didn't put it strongly enough. The Blues just stank out the Stadium.

I played for two championship teams out of three in the years 1920-

21-22. My son played for four years (two championships about 1952 to 1955) and then three years with the Stampeders. He shared my disgust on Friday night.

Having beaten Western earlier by 28 to 6 was no excuse for the team to be so damned over-confident and cocky and lousy. Something stinks in the management or morale or something. It reminds me of the two years back in the late twenties or early thirties when they didn't win a game.

Let's hope they have learned their lesson and will go the whole way next year.

Alumnus

Wells must explain: SAC

The following letter has been sent to Education minister Thomas Wells.

The recent revelations surrounding your role in the non-appointment of John Seeley raise very serious questions concerning the relationship between the University of Toronto and the Ontario government.

I find it disturbing that you as a Minister of the Ontario Government would call the Director of O.I.S.E. to pass on negative comments concerning Dr. Seeley. I find it even more disturbing that you will not reveal either the nature of the negative comments, the names of those who submitted them to you, or whether there is any tangible proof to back up these assertions.

Surely, the fact that you passed on these negative comments to the director of O.I.S.E. implied to him that you agreed with them, and that you as Minister of Education for Ontario did not approve of the appointment of Dr. Seeley. Surely you must be aware that the responsible action for these "prominent educators" would have been to:

- a) Forward their negative comments directly to O.I.S.E.
- b) Back up their comments with tangible proof.

b) Put their comments into writing.

Your interference in the internal workings of the U of T is a matter of great concern. Questions concerning who gets hired, fired or tenured at the U of T must be decided by those most directly affected by the process, namely students and faculty. There is no room for government meddling in this process.

Accordingly, I ask you to respond to the following questions:

- 1) Who were the "prominent educators" who called you to express their reservations over the appointment of Professor Seeley?
- 2) What was the nature of the reservations they expressed and is there any tangible proof for their assertions?
- 3) With what degree of regularity do you call the Director of O.I.S.E. to comment on the desirability of professors who are being considered for hiring?
- 4) Is your practice of calling up the University to comment on hiring decisions one that is shared by the Minister for Colleges and Universities, the Hon. James A.C. Auld?

McGill Daily far worse than Varg

I am writing in response to a letter printed in The Varsity's Nov. 15 issue. Paul Christie was directing criticism at The Varsity, commenting on what he referred to as a "preponderance of boring news" being reported in every issue.

While this analysis may be quite justified in many respects, there is a question he asks in the text to which I feel obliged to respond. He wonders how McGill can publish a paper daily of greater size than The Varsity and still hold its audience.

First, the McGill daily is not the same size as The Varsity. Very often it is only four pages long. Secondly, it holds its audience in quite the same way The Varsity does: There is no other regular alternative source of student info available. The Daily's content is depressingly inadequate most of the time.

I personally believe the Daily should be published only twice a week, and even then it would be less acceptable than The Varsity. While I am no general supporter of your paper's news reporting or editorial policy, I recognize it as a superior student paper. The Friday review section offers interesting material quite consistently.

I used to go to U of T, but now that I am at McGill I have Friday's issue of The Varsity sent to me every week. Your paper enjoys the honour of going into the garbage last, twenty minutes after the McGill Daily's almost immediate departure.

Problem is social structure, not population

We were concerned about the article which appeared in The Varsity on Wednesday, Nov. 13, 1974. The article, entitled "Bucharest In Retrospect: The World Population Conference," Oxfam feels, does not deal very effectively with the crucial issue of world population. It presents a rather distorted and confused view of the nature and root causes of overpopulation, and hence suggests solutions which rather than alleviating this condition, would tend to exacerbate it.

The statement below "population" was issued at the occasion of 1974 being designated as World Population Year. The statement was composed by a group of progressive social scientists who are concerned about the conventional approaches to the population problem.

Oxfam has found through its years of practical experience in the underdeveloped areas of the world that this approach seems to be the only realistic and humane way of viewing a problem which engulfs hundreds of millions of people in the underdeveloped world.

Beth Harley,
Oxfam Education Officer.

The United Nations have designated 1974 as World Population Year. The activities during this year, and especially the World Population Conference, will make people aware of the necessity to take demographic factors such as the size, the distribution and the age and sex structure of the population, as well as the change of these factors through fertility, mortality and migration into account when planning for the future. In particular, they will help to stimulate creative thinking on policies suitable for dealing with the problems arising from an unprecedented growth of world population.

We recognize that in some of the United Nations documents relating to World Population Year, population growth is properly viewed as a dependent variable within the social, economic, political and cultural development context. At the same time we cannot ignore the danger that neo-Malthusian views, inherent in current birth control strategies of powerful governmental and non-governmental agencies and propagated by numerous organizations, politicians and scholars in Western industrialized countries, may dominate the worldwide debate initiated by the United Nations; there is a risk that "misunderstandings" regarding the true character of the problems presently facing humanity may be spread.

According to the neo-Malthusian position, "overpopulation" interpreted either as a too dense population or as a too rapid population increase — is the major single problem facing the countries of the Third World, and it is held responsible for many evils, such as unemployment, poverty, high mortality rates, malnutrition, starvation and illiteracy; in the developed countries, according to this position, the growth of population is a primary cause of an increasing environmental deterioration and depletion of resources. A drastic reduction in birth rate is considered the essential condition for solving these problems. That reduction, it is argued, can and must be achieved by "direct measures", i.e. propaganda for birth control, increase in the number of family planning clinics, distribution of contraceptives, legalisation of abortion and sterilization, etc.

We consider this approach to be wrong. Population growth must not be blamed for diseases of society. It is a deception to make people believe that it is possible to solve problems of society through birth control measures.

In the past two decades there has hardly been any considerable progress in most of the developing countries measured in the rise of levels of living of the broad masses; wealth and land have remained concentrated in the hands of small elites, in a number of countries the disparity between rich and poor is increasing. Even in those Third World countries where economic growth has been fairly rapid in recent years, it has taken forms which do not benefit, and even worsen the conditions of life of the poorer strata which make up the vast majority of the population in these countries. For example, industrial technology, and to an increasing extent new agricultural technology, is seldom designed to meet local conditions; it is generally capital intensive rather than appropriately labour intensive and tends to increase the already heavy burden of unemployment and poverty.

The political, economic and cultural elites in many developing countries are being supported by Western capital which keeps them subordinated to the interests of the Western industrialized countries. These national and international power structures play an essential role in the perpetuation of poverty, unemployment, illiteracy and lack of social and political participation among the masses in the developing countries. From the perspective of these power structures, the real issue is not that population growth exerts pressure on the means of subsistence, as the neo-Malthusians assert, but rather that population growth tends to threaten the institutional framework, safeguarding the unequal distribution of economic and political power. Insisting on population increase as a major cause of underdevelopment can therefore serve, on the level of theory, to furnish any ideological legitimization of the existing order of things; on the level of politics it serves to distract attention from the real political-economic issues facing the Third World.

This standpoint does not imply that we are opposed to family planning. On the contrary, we are of the opinion that free access to efficient contraceptives and other means of birth control should be a human right and available to all, and we recognize the importance of effective family planning to health and well-being. Neither do we believe that on a finite earth with finite resources there can be an infinite growth of population.

We maintain, however, that population policy and family planning become meaningful only if they are conceived within the framework of an all-round economic and social development plan. As the demographic history of the now industrialized countries and of some economically advanced regions in the Third World indicates, social development on a comprehensive scale is a necessary prerequisite for the decline of fertility.

On the other hand, there is much research confirming the view that peasant populations and the new urban sub-proletariat in the underdeveloped regions of the world want many children and will continue to give birth to many children. As long as the material conditions under which the majority of the people in the Third World have to live are not drastically improved, reproductive behaviour is likely to remain unchanged and birth control programmes are bound to remain inefficient. Therefore, the existence of plans and planning authorities cannot solve the population problem unless basic structural changes take place; unless institutions permitting large scale political participation of the masses replace the existing repressive systems which prevail in most of the developing countries; unless inequalities in the distribution of wealth and opportunities are removed and development of social and economic development are implemented that benefit all strata of society; unless the countries of the Third World free themselves from economic exploitation and political domination by foreign interests.

In Western industrialized countries an increasing number of politicians and scholars maintain that population growth is a major cause of the depletion of resources, of environmental destruction and the decay of urban centres. We consider this argument both wrong and dangerous. The deterioration of the natural and social environment is not primarily a function of population size or growth, but it is essentially an emanation of an economic system based on the principle of the maximization of profits which implies the rude exploitation of natural and social resources by the few that are economically powerful. A solution to the ecological problems facing many economically developed countries can only be found if present economic structures are democratised.

In view of the hundreds of millions of people in the under-developed countries living in utmost poverty, in view of the social and ecological problems facing large parts of the world, it is time to take action towards the necessary changes.

Dan Heap

By BOB BETTSON

Alderman Dan Heap says the provision of low cost rental housing should be the top priority for the next city council. He is shooting for top spot in Ward Six and a seat on Metro Council.

The former factory worker and Anglican priest is running for re-election on a strong reform platform this time in tandem with community activist Allan Sparrow.

This time Heap is regarded as front-runner because of his strong performance as part of the hard core reform group on city council.

Heap feels the past city council has made a beginning in the housing area but has a long way to go. He points to legislation which has put tighter controls on building standards with better inspection procedure, land assembly schemes and city purchases of old housing.

But most important for the future is the development of rent controls, he says. "We will have to help the Metro tenants' federation organize to put pressure on the province."

Heap also points to tough new legislation which allows the city to move in and repair buildings not up to standards and charge the landlord for repairs.

Other actions which have drawn the ire of developers and businessmen investors include demolition controls and the controversial 45-foot holding bylaw. Heap said the holding bylaw has been successful. "It has made the developers negotiate with the city and we have been able to persuade them to make some changes."

Metro Centre is the biggest single development planned for Ward Six and Heap feels that the restrictions passed by council will ensure "Metro Centre won't be able to continue their big rip-off."

Hopes island decision reversal

One of the biggest disappointments for Heap has been the decision of Metro council to evict Toronto Island residents, but he hopes that with a new Metro Council and the possible ousting of fellow ward alderman Bill Archer, who voted against the islanders, the decision might be overturned.

One of the distinguishing marks of Heap's term as alderman has been his close involvement with citizens' groups in the ward and particularly the Ward Six Community Organization. He spent part of his salary to hire a full-time assistant and has been active in organizing tenants and neighborhood planning issues.

Heap was prominent in the Board of Health's fight against lead pollutants. Although Canada Metals caused the most controversy, Toronto Refiners in the south end of Ward Six was just as bad an offender.

Although the city has issued abatement orders for the clean up of the land and the lead smelting operations, Heap said the main thing now is to get the province to carry out the recommendations in their own reports and get tough with the lead polluters.

Heap also stresses more public transit and subsidies to keep TTC fares at the present level. He thinks service should be improved from the suburbs to make commuting downtown more attractive.

Another concern not as common among city politicians is a desire to see community health care and more public health services.

Heap feels, "The present private enterprise medical system is priced out of reach" and should be replaced by community-oriented preventive medicine.

Citizens' voice in U of T

As alderman for the ward containing the U of T, Heap feels that the university has been forced in the last few years to make its plans public and have more community input.

Although he is extremely critical of the university's activities in the past he feels the relationship with the city has improved especially since ratepayer representatives were put on the university-city liaison committee.

Heap is not sure about the proposed new athletic complex stalled because of the holding bylaw. He says there is a serious question whether "we can stand another concrete blob like the Robarts." He also questioned how many students are really going to be served by the luxurious facilities.

Another change the activist alderman would like to see is election reform including one alderman wards, holding elections at a warmer time of year, and restricting people to one vote.

He had harsh words for the provincial government for not enforcing its present laws under which businessmen are voting twice. Yet "students have been successfully prevented from voting."

Heap says that new laws which call for the licensing of rooming houses will probably not apply to houses occupied by co-operatives, but he was not sure.

The city's prime concern in strengthening laws dealing with rooming houses is the protection of tenants from fire and other hazards.

Heap says he hopes that in the next two years people in the ward are able to organize to put strong pressure on city council and as an alderman he can help their voice to be heard.

A longtime community activist who has run federally and provincially for the NDP, he is optimistic he and Sparrow will win on December 2 and give Ward Six a strong, unified voice.

K. Dock Yip

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

K. Dock Yip pins his hopes of capturing an aldermanic seat in Ward Six in the upcoming Dec. 2 election on his middle-of-the-road political stance.

"I will be getting support from the businessmen, professionals, the Toronto Islands, the liberals, the ethnics and the Chinese . . . because I represent all of them," Yip says. "I am a man for all seasons."

Yip will certainly have to be just that if he hopes to move up from trustee to alderman in this ward. He'll be battling incumbents William Archer and Dan Heap, as well as Allan Sparrow and three other lesser lights for one of two aldermanic seats in Ward Six.

But Yip, a lawyer and former school trustee in the ward, is confident. "My chances are very good," he says, but won't specify which of the other candidates he feels he can knock off to grab a seat.

'It'll be a toss-up'

"It's up to the voters," Yip maintains steadfastly. "It'll be a toss-up."

But it's plain Yip thinks his brand of politics will prove congenial to the voters Monday. He describes himself as being politically pragmatic: "I can support either the Reformers of the Old Guard because I vote according to the issues."

"If elected, I will serve without fear or favoritism," Yip emphasizes.

The most serious issue Toronto will have to face in the next 10 years is the development of the city's inner core, Yip says, and much of his election campaign revolves around this concern.

The burgeoning growth of Toronto worries Yip. "Everyone who comes to Canada seems to come here. Well, we can't say 'don't come', like the city of Amsterdam, where I've heard you have to have a licence to live."

He is also concerned about the move by "affluent people" into the downtown core, driving out the poor.

Yip says he would like "unlimited development, but with a little common sense. We should look at the overall picture and make sure there's good planning."

Wants Spadina completed

The completion of the Spadina Expressway from Eglinton Ave. to the Gardiner Expressway would gladden Yip, because "if we stop cars from coming down to the city, business will suffer."

Yip would like to see a two-tiered transportation system, with the Spadina Expressway running underground and the new subway running above ground.

He does not think this will cause parking problems. Extra parking space could be built underground.

Yip would like to see Metro Centre completed because it would provide housing for 20,000 and help ease the housing shortage. He thought those opposed overlooked this, whereas his own views were more "constructive".

Yip likes the city's 45-foot holding bylaw because it gave council members

Ward Six embraces both the downtown core a time to sort out their views on construction and develop criterion accordingly.

Yip doesn't want to comment specifically on the bylaw because he had "just skimmed over it," but he said it needed further study.

The bylaw was particularly appropriate for Ward Six because "development was too great there," Yip says.

Too many apartments went up without proper regard for the height, the living conditions and adjoining parkland, which he thought the bylaw might help correct.

Leave Island residents

Yip also feels it was wrong to force the Toronto Islands' residents to move.

"We've got a housing shortage," he says, "and tearing down 250 houses isn't going to help it any."

"Without people on the Island, it'll be like the moors of Wuthering Heights. The place would become lonesome and maybe even a little dangerous."

Yip criticizes Metro Council for destroying what he calls "a viable rural community" which was good for everyone, especially children, to visit. Without people living on the island, he could foresee it becoming another Central Park in New York City.

The subject of lead pollution by major industries in the city brings little comment from Yip. He says he hasn't studied the subject very deeply, but thought that if "lead affects people, then move the industries out of the city."

to Ward Six aldermanic seats

Bill Archer

By CYNTHIA MATHER
 "Make it quick," said Bill Archer brusquely, "I've got to get out on the street."

Metro Centre development group said effectively stalled the project.

"An exceptionally good job," says Archer in reference to his role on the last council. "I have brought forward a number of proposals, and questioned other proposals to expose their weaknesses." He quoted an opponent who admitted Archer "kept his finger on what was happening."

On the question of the city's housing policy, Archer feels the city is charging its tenants a rent which is too high, using the example of Spruce Court tenants who have experienced a rent increase of over 60 per cent. He would "supplement" rent increases with city and provincial funds.

Archer feels the transportation system can be improved. Although against free fares, he would support the extension of a low fare. He feels there are also problems with automobile use in downtown, saying it is necessary to sort out what use is essential.

Heavy criticism has been directed at Archer for his support of the removal of Toronto Island residents. Archer feels, however, it is important to "stand up for poor people" and use "public land for public purposes" by removing the residents.

Archer has also been the prime mover behind the new Metro reference library, to be located on Asquith Avenue just north of Bloor St. at Yonge St. He says he is not happy with the approved building, which is much less elaborate than the original plan developed by architect Raymond Moriyama.

"When Archer runs the mall, the mall runs well," answered Archer to a question on the Yonge St. mall. A report issued this week has recommended a year-round mall.

Archer, chairman of the city-university liaison committee, believes the university should be allowed to go ahead with construction on its proposed athletic building at Spadina and Harbord Streets, believing we can "make a satisfactory building" from the present plans.

Construction is presently stalled as the building violates the city's 45-foot holding bylaw presently being challenged before the Ontario Municipal Board, which bans construction of any building in the downtown core over 45 feet high.

Archer says he supports the bylaw (although not present when the vote was taken) and even voted for its extension. He would not comment on the recently released criteria for downtown development, intended to replace the 45-foot bylaw, saying he had made "only a preliminary examination" of it.

The university, says Archer, can be complimented on the extent to which it has involved the public in discussion over the last two years.

Archer pointed to his action in getting traffic lights installed on Queen's Park Crescent as an example of his service to the university community.

Allan Sparrow

By JENNIFER WONG

The Allan Sparrow campaign office at Church and Wellesley Sts. is somewhat like a small-town general store where all the news in town gathers. People wander in and out. A bell tinkles over the door. Coffee is brewing. But the traditional pot-bellied stove has been replaced with an electric space heater. No proper heat because the building is slated for demolition.

The office atmosphere reflects Allan Sparrow's political roots in the Ward 6 community. Sparrow, informally cooperating with incumbent alderman Dan Heap, is running for aldermanic seat in the Dec. 2 municipal elections.

Sparrow, a co-founder of the North Jarvis Community Association, has had long and intensive experience articulating the views of the community to City Hall on such issues as saving the Odeon-Carleton Theatre, improving rooming house conditions, using the 45-foot height holding bylaw to allow completion of the community planning process, parkland, low cost and family housing and retention of present street widths.

Sparrow outlines four major directions which need to be taken in Ward 6.

- community control of their own destinies through accountable aldermen and community organizations.
- the development of more low and middle income housing with measures to protect tenants and landlords.
- improvement of the environment.
- decentralization of commercial and institutional development.

"The issue of accountability is crucial," he says. "If you take a look at the voting record of a certain alderman in this ward (Bill Archer, one suspects), he has voted time and time again against the interests of the community. You could even say that the Ward 6 Community Association was formed as a direct consequence of his actions."

Sparrow's concern with preserving existing neighborhoods is apparent in his stand on the issues of the Toronto Island homes. "The public is going to have to pay a quarter million to have those homes ripped down.

"In eliminating the 250 houses—hardly what we need with a shortage—the city gets 20 acres of land. But 20 acres of land can be dredged up from Lake Ontario in two weeks by a single dredging machine. They're using this method to build the Outer Headland Park, 200 acres worth of land," Sparrow argues.

To ensure adequate supply of housing, Sparrow advocates direct city involvement in development and community-oriented projects such as land banking.

Commenting on Metro Centre, conceived seven years ago to accommodate 50,000 office workers and 20,000 residents, Sparrow declares that the plans are now obsolete.

His alternative would be to place the project under the auspices of a public consortium composed of the municipal provincial and federal governments and devote the area largely to housing.

Contingent with the need for housing geared to the low and middle income groups, Sparrow envisages the establishment of a Landlord-Tenants Review Board which could deal equitably with excessive rents and maintenance standards.

Such a review board would probably experience "an initial period of chaos, but then could operate as successfully as Montreal's, which is about 20 years old. It now sees very little activity since all the landlords know the consequences if they step out of line," Sparrow explains.

Sparrow rejects rent controls as a method for solving this tenant problem. "They would invariably be frozen either too high or too low and give rise to endless arbitration and bickering".

Sparrow is also emphatic about the need to improve the quality of life in downtown Toronto with more local parkland, recreation and community facilities and less air and noise pollution, traffic and overcrowding.

Concerted attempts must be made to "avoid that old problem of people living, riding and working in windowless cubicles." Sparrow asserts that people do not seek out high rises; they end up living there because there is nowhere else to go.

Entirely in keeping with his views of a balanced community, Sparrow rejects the idea of continuing to overload the downtown area of Ward 6 with concrete jungle office blocks whose presence dictates the daily tidal surge of workers into the city core. "Locating all commercial and institutional buildings downtown only makes sense to those people like the Board of Trade who think that they must be in close proximity—to pat each others' backs and sip martinis."

"Often, it really doesn't matter a damn where head office operations are located . . . business can be conducted surely with the aid of such new-fangled contraptions as the telephone, the telegraph, telex machines?"

According to Sparrow, the city should maximize and improve the transportation facilities available—meaning priority should be given to public transportation.

He maintains a fast and efficient system of transportation can be developed, even without the new subway. But since we are to have it anyway, Sparrow objects to the proposed ravine route which bypasses the major centres of population the subway is intended to serve. In his opinion, the Bathurst route would have been more accessible to the travelling public.

commercial area and residential areas.

Bill Archer, senior alderman in Ward 6 and former mayoralty candidate in 1968, is running for re-election on a platform of concern for "people" (what else?): "Homes, jobs, recreation and transportation" he sees as the major campaign issues.

Archer had carefully chosen words for the Ward Six Community Organization, the residents and ratepayers' group that is supporting aldermanic candidates Dan Heap and Allan Sparrow, and trustee candidates Bob Spencer and Dan Leckie.

"The Ward Six Community Organization is a very small group with a very large label," Archer said. "A narrow segment (of the ward) put together for partisan political purposes."

Archer noted the group recently voted to expel a ward resident merely because he was an Archer supporter, even though the resident had been invited to the meeting.

Archer says it is "important to go ahead" with the Metro Centre development planned for the Union Station area, saying the city desperately needs the extra 10,000 units of housing the centre would provide.

He places the delay in city approval of the project not on his own recent amendment on guidelines to the centre, but to "terribly sloppy" work by the city executive in drawing up proposals.

Archer surprised a lot of people recently by supporting an amendment requiring stiffer guidelines for the preservation of Union Station, which the

Information on other Ward Six candidates will appear in Friday's Varsity.

WORLD SHORTS

By ISABEL MEHARRY and ANDREA WAYWANKO

CHILE
(London) — Carmen Castillo has been released from the military hospital in Santiago and is now in London. Castillo is a leader of the Chilean Movement of the Revolutionary Left (MIR) and was taken prisoner Oct. 5, after being wounded in an attack by Chilean military police in which MIR secretary general Miquel Enriquez was killed.

The MIR leader flew first to Paris and later to Heathrow Airport in London, where she was met by members of her family. The British Government has granted her a visa as a refugee.

Her release is seen as a direct result of the massive international campaign launched on her behalf immediately after she was arrested.

SPAIN

Resistance in the Basque province of Viscaya continues to grow despite severe repression.

A silent vigil by more than 1,000 Spanish workers in the industrial centre of Bilbao was violently broken up by police recently.

The demonstration was the third day of protest by the workers against the lock-out and lay-offs of co-workers. More than 15,000 workers in the Bilbao industrial area have been laid off work.

On Oct. 24, five workers were injured in a clash with police, and on Oct. 26, 700 workers of the Artiach cookie factory walked out of the building, joining more than 10,000 workers already striking in the province.

In Bilbao, 12,000 workers have paralyzed the shipyards, and over 1,000 have refused to return to their jobs at Fabrelac and General Electric of Spain.

ADDIS ABABA

Two workers were murdered and another wounded when troops fired on a group of 1,500 unionists who had refused to break up their meeting on Oct. 25.

At the invitation of the Confederation of Ethiopian Labor Unions (CELU), the workers were meeting with the central committee of that organization.

When a police official told the workers to end their meeting, they hissed and booed. The police then threw tear gas grenades at the workers who responded by shouting slogans against the military junta. The soldiers then fired into the crowd, killing two persons.
Immediately afterwards, the CELU headquarters was occupied first by the police and then by the army.

Outrage among union members remains strong. The government has refused to discuss the release of three union leaders who were arrested last month and are being held in a military prison.

BRIDGEPORT CONN. (CUP-ZNS)—A former student at the University of Bridgeport in Connecticut has filed suit against the university alleging that one of the courses she took was an utter waste of time.

Ilene Janello, now 33 and the working mother of three, states that she took an education course in which she learned nothing. She says she complained about the class when she took it, but that school officials did nothing to improve the course.

Jailed after 1969 protest...

SGWU demonstrator paroled

MONTREAL (CUP) — Rosie Douglas, one of the protesters jailed after 1969 demonstrations against racism at Sir George Williams University — which saw the school's computer centre destroyed — has been paroled after serving 16 months of his two and a half year sentence.

Douglas, in a letter to the Montreal Gazette, was highly critical of the prison system to which he had been subjected.

"Empirical evidence reveals that prisons do not serve as a deterrent to crime; nor do they rehabilitate prisoners."

"Rather, during a period of high inflation, $140 million of public funds is being misused in the prison system to dehumanize potentially creative men and women, most of whom come from the lower income strata of the population," Douglas wrote.

He said that "as part of my duty to those who are behind the horrid barbed wire fences," he was preparing a paper on prison problems which he intended to send, along with documentation of those problems, to Canada's solicitor general.

Douglas called for prisoners to be given the right to vote and the minimum wage for the work they did rather than the present 10 cents an hour.

He also called for a complete overhaul of the parole system, better educational facilities and medical facilities, and an end to the forms of "feudal barbarity," such as gassing prisoners, that occurs at most of the maximum security prisons.

Local boy makes good

Douglas also called for the release from prison of Martin Bracey, the only prisoner still incarcerated as a result of the actions at Sir George Williams.

A Toronto lawyer and former U of T law professor has been appointed for a two-year term as chairman of the university's new University Tribunal, the disciplinary body replacing the Caput.

The appointment of David Kilgour, approved by Governing Council, comes after years of protest by both faculty and students, that the Caput was an illegitimate disciplinary body.

The Caput, which this summer suspended two Students for a Democratic Society members for preventing urbanologist Edward Banfield from speaking on campus, is composed solely of university administrators.

The university has not yet decided on the composition of the new University Tribunal.

As chairman of the tribunal, Kilgour will act as judge of what the university considers breaches of the new Code of Behavior, and will also take part in hearing appeals.

Governing Council passed the academic part of the new code last year. But after heavy protests by students of some sections of the non-academic code, council decided to defer a vote on that section until January, 1975.

The contentious sections, students argued, could put defendants in "double jeopardy" of being charged under the university's and federal laws.

Kilgour was educated at U of T, Osgoode Hall law school and Harvard University. A U of T law professor for eight years, he is now a partner in the Toronto-legal firm of Kilgour, World, Flood and Ronson.

Innis, Vic ladies tie

By ANN McRAE

For new hockey fans learning to appreciate the sport, women's hockey is an excellent start. The puck goes slowly, plays unfold gradually and players labour at those techniques that look so effortless in the NHL.

Thursday, Innis played their first game against the Vic women who have recorded a 5-0 shutout and a 2-1 loss earlier.

The teams battled to a scoreless draw. Innis managed 11 players but star forward Karen Booth, supported by Fox, Mortson, Oakley, and Vickburg carried the bulk of the load.

Vic started with 9 skaters but lost Carson in the second period to an injury.

Vic's talent was more evenly distributed than Innis'. Vic's Wynn, Ostreidher, Greerson, and Brow gave Innis goalie Repetonez several scares. However, Innis always seemed to have a defenseman waiting for those fluke breakaways, and Vic rarely got a clear shot.

Neither Repetonez nor Vic goalie, Mattracci, were called upon for lightning reflexes. Frequent frenzied scarambles led to breakaways for both teams, but repeatedly both teams failed to get solid shots away.

Shots on goal in the first period were 6-2 for Innis, but Vic turned the tables in the second 5-1, and held their lead in the third 5-1, in spite of evident exhaustion.

A solid core of football veterans will be back next year

By PAUL CARSON

Post mortems of football teams, like similar procedures involving politicians and people, should be done swiftly and surgically, preferably when wearing sterilized gloves.

The 1974 edition of the Varsity Blues did not have the best collection of raw talent in the school's history. But for ten consecutive games, this year's team unquestionably displayed the best collection of talent combined with inspired team play plus clever coaching.

The ten victories are a season record for any Varsity team and the Yates Cup gained via the 24-21 victory over Ottawa was the first since 1967 when Blues opted not to play in the College Bowl.

The prospects for next year appear very bright, as most of the key members of the 1974 team will be returning.

The defensive unit should be hardest hit by graduations and CIAU eligibility limitations as Doug Ball, Bob Billingham, Brian Craig, and Guido Iantorno won't be returning.

Jim Nicoletti, one of Blues' many injured offensive centers, won't be back, while Libert Castillo, Don Dawson, Steve Ince and kicker Don Wright could be considered as question marks.

On balance, however, coach Ron Murphy has an excellent core of experienced players.

All-star selections continue to amaze, as for example the naming of Western's Bill Robinson as all-Canadian quarterback despite not being selected by the teams he played against in the O-QIFC western division.

Robinson, to his advantage, had starred for four years in the Atlantic Conference and thus likely collected numerous Maritime votes in the final balloting.

Blues placed three members on the eventual all-Canada team: halfback Mark Bragagnolo, defensive tackle Geoff Sutherland, and co-captain Richard Nakatsu.

In addition to Robinson, Western defensive end Phil Monckton was also selected.

Alberta led with five selections, which indicates the Golden Bears might well have won the Canada West league had one of their players not failed to inform the coaches when he dropped out of school.

The subsequent loss of two games due to the ineligible player helped Saskatchewan Huskies gain first place.

The complete all-Canadian teams are as follows: Office: Centre Rich Griffiths (Laurier), guards Bart Evans (Manitoba) and Drew Allen (Carleton); tackles Marc Pothier (St. Mary's) and a tie between Tim Leach (Ottawa) and Heinz Brademann (Alberta); tight end Steve Telfer (St. Mary's); wide receivers Jeff Avery (Ottawa) and Bryan Fryer (Alberta); Robinson at quarterback; running backs Neil Lumsden (Ottawa), Dalton Smarsh (Alberta) and Bragagnolo.

Defence: linemen Al Shemanchuk (Alberta), Sutherland, Monckton, and Marv Allemang (Acadia); linebackers Ron Southwick (McMaster), Tom Towns (Alberta) and Brian Keating (Francis Xavier); deep backs Brian Burgess (St. Mary's), Nakatsu, Doug Crossman (Waterloo), John Kelley (Guelph) and Crighton Trophy winner Al Cheruk from Acadia.

Leach, Keating and Burgess are Americans.

Interfac roundup of finals

By DAVE STUART

Three more fall interfac leagues have come to a close for another year.

The Dr. W.A. Dafeo trophy for lacrosse was won by Erindale at Hart House Monday night. The finals saw a three-game series in which PHE won the opener 9-5.

Erindale bounced back to win the next two games 10-7 and 6-5. In the last game, Erindale got a tie-breaking goal in the final second of the game to take the silverware. Erindale's goals came from Coghill, MacKay, and Gardner, each of whom scored twice.

PHE's goal came from Browne and McNeil. Browne had the hat trick.

In soccer, the division II winner was Meds A who defeated Trin A 2-1. Fioroni and Hung tallied for the doctors while Penhorwood notched one for Trin A.

In division III soccer, Dents edged New 3-2 on goals by Palermo (2) and Peters. Steve Medd got two for New in the losing effort.

In touch football, the Med Dodgers, last year's champion, gave up the non-existent trophy to the Leftovers who defeated the Hookers two games to one in the finals.

The Leftovers won the first game 33-27 and lost to the Hookers 19-13 in the second game. Touchdowns by Tim McGee, Alex Fedko, and Peter Vernon led the Leftovers to a 24-6 win for the championship.

Lady Blues cager team comes second

By FERN BRAND

The Lady Blues intermediate basketball team travelled to Queen's over the weekend for a tournament against Queen's, Trent, and Ryerson.

Varsity came out second best behind a strong team of Gaels girls who defeated Toronto 26-21. Fast breaks spelled Varsity's downfall in that game.

The Blues' second game against Brock was a whitewash. Toronto dumped Brock 37-9 with good offence and a strong defence.

The third game was another win over Trent 34-10. The defence allowed only two shots from inside the key. Donna Walker led the scorers with 14 points.

The final game against Ryerson required overtime but the ladies came through with a 30-28 win.

Queen's took first place at the tournament followed by Toronto and Ryerson.

The Varsity — Bob White

Trin A defeated Vic II 4-2 in exciting Interfac hockey played at the Varsity Ice Palace.

Lady Blues fencers win

Last Saturday, Toronto hosted the women's fencing teams of the OWIAA western division. Teams from Brock, McMaster, and Trent took part in the first of two sectionals. The second sectional will be held at McMaster in January.

The first two teams and the top eight individuals will then advance to the finals to be held in Toronto in February.

Varsity's team of Liz Lozinko, Anne Stokes, Yoko Ode, and Vivian Zochowski met McMaster first. Blues took the match 11 bouts to five. With this momentum Toronto then proceeded to Trent 13-3 and Brock 11-5.

McMaster lost to Brock but bounced back to dump Trent.

The standings at the end of the day saw Toronto in first place followed by Brock, McMaster, and Trent.

Individually, the four Toronto girls all showed well and have a good chance of all advancing to the individual finals.

New golf lessons

Early in the new year, the Benson Building is instituting a new instructional program in how to chase a little white ball with a stick around the wide open spaces.

Students can learn the fundamentals of golf from instructor Bill Whitcombe, a CPGA professional. Co-ed classes are planned.

Whitcombe was head professional at the only ladies' golf club in the world for eight years and so is well-equipped to teach at the Benson Building.

Whitcombe usually charges $15.00

'an hour for his lessons during the summer months, so you can see what an opportunity this is to learn the finer points of an often frustrating game.

Golf is a lifetime sport and can be played by all ages, male or female. In fact, women often make better golfers than men, since finesse and not brute strength is required.

Student aid group starts petition

By BOB BETTSON

A group of students at the founding of an ad-hoc U of T Committee on Student Aid decided to begin a petition campaign for changes in the Ontario Student-Award Plan (OSAP).

Demands will be based on resolutions passed by the Ontario Federation of Students (COFS) at its October meeting. Basically they call for reforms designed to make the program provide more assistance more easily for students.

The U of T is the sixth campus to set up a committee on student aid. Others have been formed at Brock, Fanshawe, Ottawa, Ryerson and Western.

The OFS drive is hoping to get 30,000 signatures on petitions demanding improvements in OSAP. More than 30 per cent of Ontario's 150,000 post-secondary students are receiving OSAP.

The demands adopted earlier this year include indexing the living allowance to the cost of living, lowering loan ceilings to $600, lowering the age of independence to 18, lowering interest rates to 6 per cent and discontinuing expected parental contribution.

OFS researcher Karolyn Kendrick told the meeting the federation had met with deputy education minister Harry Parrot who refused to deny that loan ceilings will be raised to $1,000.

The main effort the committee will make is to carry on the petition campaign as well as trying to inform students about what actions they can take to pressure the ministry of colleges and universities.

Kendrick said the campaign at U of T would be important for province-wide success and urged the group to plan carefully.

SAC has already come out in support of the OFS demands and external affairs commissioner Susan Rich is acting as co-ordinator for the new committee, with SAC providing the funding.

OSAP has been the focus of increasing discontent for the past few years as living allowances have remained the same while the cost of living has sky-rocketed.

The high level of earnings expected during the summer and level of parental contribution expected has also come under fire.

Many students on OSAP have complained of barely being able to scrape by, living in substandard housing.

Dan Heap (l) and William Archer (r) share a pensive moment in Sid Smith lobby.

Ward Six hopefuls discuss issues

City development and tenants' rights were the main issues debated at the meeting of the six Ward Six aldermanic candidates held at Sidney Smith Hall Wednesday noon.

Incumbent alderman Dan Heap gave the last city council credit for having persuaded developers to build at least partly residential developments.

Allan Sparrow advocated that zoning laws be changed to protect residents.

Fred Nelson warned against "big corporations that have tremendous power." John Combs, on the other hand, insisted that "housing must remain competitive."

K. Dock Yip strongly urged completion of Metro Centre for the housing which it would provide.

The candidates were also divided on the issue of whether or not tenants should have a say in apartment maintenance and in rents, which Heap called "the crucial question."

Nelson called for a program whereby "tenants have control, not just a say".

Combs outlined a program of safety and security for tenants. But both Combs and Yip warned that tenant control would not work. Yip sympathized with landlords who simply could not afford to improve their houses.

Many other issues were covered, although less extensively.

Senior incumbent Bill Archer claimed that to turn the Toronto Islands into parkland would be beneficial to the general welfare of Ward Six residents.

Yip, however, felt that the council's decision to remove the island homes was "insane."

Archer stressed the need for an athletic complex which is planned adjacent to the Benson Building, has come under fire from community residents' groups.

The Ward Six Community Organization, which has fielded Heap and Sparrow in this campaign, was criticized by Archer as "a small group endowed with a big name."

Sparrow alluded to Archer as a "paranoid political opportunist from North Toronto."

The Varsity has endorsed aldermanic candidates Dan Heap and Allan Sparrow. See the editorial on page four.

SAC confirms invite

John Seeley, OSAP, grants and pubs shared the spotlight as SAC held its final general meeting of the term Wednesday evening.

Confirming an executive decision announced earlier, SAC formally voted to invite controversial sociology professor John Seeley to speak on campus sometime in January.

A staff-student parity hiring committee originally offered Seeley a position in the sociology department, but the offer was later vetoed by department chairman Irving Zeitlin after consultations with three top U of T administrators.

SAC expressed concern over both the administrative interference in the internal hiring practices of the sociology department and the suggestion of blatant government interference in the university's hiring procedures.

OSAP

Noting that student complaints regarding processing of Ontario Student Awards Program (OSAP) applications have reached an all-time high, SAC also decided to embark on its own OSAP campaign to inform students on the best methods of coping with the mess.

"Simcoe Hall does provide interest-free loans for students whose OSAP money has been delayed, but until this year the university really hasn't tried to publicize the fact," said university affairs commissioner Gord Barnes.

"Thanks to the SAC publicity campaign, the number of students getting these loans has doubled to almost 800," Barnes added.

SAC also decided to conduct a blitz leaflet campaign to inform students of their rights regarding OSAP and the delays in getting money on time.

GIVE-AWAY

Both the internal and services commissions staged another round of the traditional SAC give-away game as a series of campus groups were voted money.

The Ukrainian Students' Club got $400 for a meeting on the dissident movement in the USSR while the Canadian Liberation Movement won a $200 grant to stage a debate on nationalist art.

SAC also voted $1,200 to its own staffing campaign to cover costs of a special tabloid newspaper, a poster and the now-familiar "Tenure is never having to say you're sorry" buttons.

Other groups striking it rich Wednesday include World University Service ($250), Lithuanian Students Club ($150), Brazilian and Portuguese Club ($125), Chinese Students Association ($725), U of T Film Board ($575), Canadian Nursing Students' Conference ($750) and finally $100 for a play called Son of Man to be presented at the UC Playhouse.

GUT ISSUES

Gut issues were not ignored as SAC voted its support for the principle that students should be allowed to operate student pubs.

The meeting unanimously approved four motions calling on the provincial government not to implement regulations that would deny student groups the right to operate pubs on campus and requesting Queen's Park to make public its plans for operating campus pubs under Bill 146.

Until now, the province has declined to make its plans official but persistent rumors indicate that only the university administration will be allowed to operate pubs after January 1, 1975.

You can still vote

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

If you're one of an estimated 2,500 whose names the city has left off the voters' list for Monday's municipal election, don't give up hope of voting yet.

You can still vote if:

- you lived in the city during the enumeration period (Sept. 3 to Oct. 8).

- you were 18 before Sept. 3.
- you are a Canadian or British subject.

Given that you meet these simple requirements, take some acceptable identification down to the City Clerk on the second floor at City Hall, and you will be given a certificate enabling you to vote. (City Hall is open Saturday.)

Another alternative is to take identification to your polling station on election day (this Monday) and you will also be given permission to vote.

To find out where your neighborhood polling station is, telephone the City Clerk (367-8016) or call Dan Heap's campaign headquarters (922-5854).

If you have a valid reason which prevents you from voting Monday, take advantage of the advance polls at City Hall tomorrow and Saturday. They're open from 11 am to 8 pm.

This is the strange, wonderful shoe with the heel lower than the toe.

This shoe is different from any shoe you've ever worn. It's the EARTH™ negative heel shoe. The shoe designed to work in harmony with your entire body.

The heel of the Earth™ shoe is actually lower than the toe. This allows you to walk naturally. Like when you walk barefoot in sand or soft earth and your heel sinks down lower than your toes.

The entire sole of the Earth shoe is molded in a very special way. This allows you to walk in a gentle rolling motion. And to walk easily and comfortably on the hard jarring cement of our cities.

But remember, just because a shoe looks like ours doesn't mean it works like ours. So

To be sure you're getting the Earth brand shoe, look on the sole for our Earth trademark. Your body will thank you.

Fraser wants 'radical methods'

A "radical method" may sometimes be needed to "meet the philosophical instincts" of a conservative, believes John Fraser.

Fraser, federal Conservative environment critic and rumored as a possible successor to Robert 'Eig Thunder' Stanfield, was at the university Wednesday night to address the annual meeting of the Canadian Environmental Law Association (CELA).

Explaining that the instinct of a conservative was to preserve those things of value in a society until a convincing alternative is presented, Fraser said he felt radical measures are sometimes necessary even to preserve the status quo.

The era of a society based on development and exploitation is "all over" believes Fraser, who feels North American society is absorbing an "inequitable share of the world's resources."

Fraser also feels the price of oil should rise to promote the conservation of energy, and that private enterprise can handle oil marketing and exploration more competently than the federal government.

Fraser's address to CELA centred on the need for proper "environmental impact" studies for all large-scale development projects. He feels it necessary for such studies to be statutory and for public input into these studies to be mandatory.

Although a federal task force acknowledged in July of 1972 that present federal statutes were inadequate to meet environmental impact assessment needs, the federal government has merely reserved itself the power to conduct screenings by panels of experts, reporting to the environment minister. There is no requirement that an assessment be mandatory.

The Fraser visit and CELA meeting coincide with an imminent announcement from the Ontario government about environmental impact legislation of its own. Last fall, a green paper on environmental impact studies was released, and legislation is expected before the end of this session.

John Fraser, Tory environmental critic.

Friday briefs

You'll get brief mention, "dealing with only the salient facts relevant to the deceased's relations to the university," although should you be a legend in your own time, the committee provides for "tributes to those who have played an outstanding role in the faculty be read in full."

Makes it so you can hardly wait, doesn't it?

Mistakes, and more mistakes

The headline for Wednesday's story, Administrators deny Seelye interference, should have read: Administrators deny Seelye interference was improper.

Last Friday's paper contained several errors. Our story on Don Forster's appointment to the Guelph presidency, in listing the vice-provosts under him, neglected to mention Robin Ross.

Ross, who holds a half-time appointment to Erindale college, is in charge of setting up the new disciplinary tribunal and other "ad-hoc" matters.

Two pictures last Friday were also incorrectly identified. UFW representative Jessica Govea was labelled as Lupe Gamba, and jazz musician Stan Urbanik was called Larry Coryell.

Not another of those meetings

Once more into the breach, dear friends. We're having our weekly 1 pm staff meeting today at the same old battleground, 91 St. George St., and all are welcome to attend.

We're not sure what to discuss, it's so near the end of the publishing term — next week's our last — but we'd like to kick around the subject of the National CUP Conference again and maybe discuss giving Margie Trudeau a second chance to write for us. (Who says we're not fair?) And there's still all those papers to bundle up.

Library workers slapped in face

U of T library workers received another slap in the face from the university yesterday as management labor relations chief John Parker refused to negotiate with CUPE local 1230 representatives on a retroactive cost of living allowance.

Local president Judy Darcy said Parker refused to respond to the local's brief in more than general terms. Parker criticized the union's brief in strong terms.

She said Parker also criticized the union for its recent militant tactics, such as the demonstration for a cost of living increase.

The meeting, which lasted only 10 minutes, was inconclusive and the union will take its grievances to the Governing Council.

Darcy said the union has sent their brief to Governing Council members and will try to get it on the agenda of the December council meeting.

SAC goes for outhouse-chic

SAC is going into the outhouse business.

At a recent executive meeting those budding capitalists decided if they were going to put out $125 for the U of T entry in the College Bowl's outhouse race, the least they could do would be to insist the SAC logo be emblazoned on the outhouse.

So the SAC logo was painted on the U of T outhouse and SAC's prestige took another step up. What can we expect next from the daring council?

Reports that the SAC logo will now appear on the gates of heaven could not be confirmed by president Seymour Kanowitch. "We're thinking about it," he said.

Here today, gone Tanaka

Boy, U of T sure knows how to pick a winner. Fun-loving tomboy Kakeui Tanaka — remember the "great tradition" of U of T — has resigned his job. Mark up another LLD unemployed.

Seems like only September when our man at the top, John Evans, was telling Kakeui what a wonderful guy he was, and giving him a free windbreaker and tie. Now the poor fellow is out like Nixon. Geez John, can't you be more careful in who you shower with praise? Makes it sound almost as if you didn't really mean it in the first place.

Dead faculty rise again

Those fun-loving members of the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science's Subcommittee on Memorial Tributes to Deceased Members of the Council are at it again.

They've come up with a wild new set of recommendations on ritual deference to the dead. To all of you who are planning to move off to higher planes soon, take note.

Your memorial tribute will be read at meetings of the general council on one of only two occasions a year, although if you die in the course of a session, a brief tribute will be paid to you at the "first opportune meeting."

Practice teachers face problems

Students interviewed for this article preferred to be identified only by their first names.

By TOM GERRY

While practice teaching is a crucial part of U of T Faculty of Education (FEUT) students' chance for a future job, the problem of how this apprenticeship should be numerically evaluated is becoming a thorny question at the faculty.

Some 1,800 education students were sent out to 250 Southern Ontario public schools in the past four weeks to practice teach. The student teachers are assigned to an associate teacher — a member of the school's regular teaching staff — and it is the associates' responsibility to write an evaluation of the student teacher's performance. These reports are considered crucial by principals when they are hiring first-year teachers.

However, this method of evaluation is being questioned by many FEUT students. Problems between the associate and the student teacher arise out of personal clashes and difficulties with the evaluation, and no standard pattern of evaluation exists.

After her four weeks practice teaching, Fran, of elementary education, put it this way: "I went into the school full of enthusiasm. My associate really put me down for everything. It took me the next two weeks to recover my confidence."

An English student teacher noted: "My associate was a pig. I mean a real chauvinist. He intends to hire no more women at his school because he says they are too emotional. Now how can you work with somebody like that?"

Many students have complained recently about the lack of standardized evaluation. As Christine, from elementary education, commented: both in the matter of marks and in learning about teaching, "everything depends on the associate teacher."

Over 2,000 teachers are paid $7.50 a day, in addition to their regular salaries, to act as associates. It is their job to help the student teacher learn some of the realities of teaching in the working situation.

FEUT students completed their first four weeks of practice teaching last Friday. The students practice teach 10 weeks of their one-year course in 250 elementary, senior public, junior high and high schools in southern Ontario.

Of the 1,800 student teachers sent out to schools in November, 125 have not returned to FEUT.

"It is impossible to conclude that the practice teaching experience is the only reason for the dropouts," says FEUT admissions director Gerald Whyte. "There are other factors, such as students running out of money. Most of them, though, decide teaching is not for them in one way or another."

But one way or another, students come across a good many roadblocks in dealing with the way they are evaluated as practice teachers, and associate teachers themselves continue to use different criteria for evaluation.

Some associates feel student practice teachers cannot earn an A grade their first time teaching.

But other associates maintain "Since this is your first practice teaching assignment and although you do have a few things to improve, I'll give you an A."

Another factor in the evaluation system is the associate's expectations. Some associates demand that the student teacher perform to the standard of experienced teachers — usually their own. Other associates, placing more emphasis on the student teacher's development, mark the student's progress.

Another suggestion to right the imbalance in power between the associate and the student teacher came from Howard, of elementary education: "There should be an agreement that the student teachers evaluate the associate teachers as well." This system was used by FEUT in the past, but it was discontinued because many associates found it too threatening.

Karen summed up the feeling of powerlessness suffered by many FEUT students in their practice teaching experience: "It's just a matter of luck where you are sent."

Many complaints about practice teaching focus on the relationship between the associate and the student teacher, and on the practice teaching situation itself.

Kathy, from French, said: "I resented being thrown in among those strange kids and being expected by the associate to perform."

Christine, from elementary education, noted, "It's a terrible situation to be plunked into the midst of a school and then as soon as you become oriented to have to leave."

Many student teachers feel it takes the entire time they have at the school to establish a rapport with the students and begin to accomplish things with them.

FEUT students had had five weeks of instruction before practice teaching. Carol, from elementary, said, "four weeks is a long time for the first experience."

Some students have suggested continuous practice teaching. Instead of dividing the year into three separate sessions for practice teaching, they feel it would be better to work in schools two or three days a week and be in the faculty the other days.

FEUT geography professor Arnold Balins suggested student teachers spend the first week of the one-year FEUT course in schools without being evaluated to give them an idea of what to expect when working for marks.

Reactions to practice teaching experiences are both positive and negative.

A student teacher from the physical education department, David, said "I learned much more about the profession of teaching while I was in the schools than here at FEUT. I could try out a whole lot of new techniques. I had a great time."

Carol, an elementary education student teacher, commented, "It is worthwhile to practice teach for the experience of meeting children of different ages. It is necessary."

Terry, from the French department, said, "You learn how to learn while you're practice teaching. That's where I learned the most."

Another elementary student teacher, Angelina, compared practice teaching to "diving into a pool of warm water and hitting your head against a couple of rocks. At first it was lovely; involving, enjoyable. I could do it for years. But there are relationships to be worked out — with teachers, with my associate."

Heap-Sparrow, Leckie-Spencer in Ward Six

The Varsity urges its readers to vote for Dan Heap and Allan Sparrow as aldermanic candidates, and Bob Spencer and Dan Leckie as trustee candidates in the current Ward Six election, to take place Monday. All have the endorsement of the Ward Six Community Organization.

Dan Heap, the incumbent, has worked in an exemplary manner over the last two years on a number of crucial issues. Most importantly, he has been a prime mover behind the Toronto board of health's moves to investigate and combat lead pollution in the city.

He has also taken principled stands on supporting the rights of the Toronto Island residents to their homes, opposing the Metro Centre development, and properly representing the concerns of his ward on council. It is hard to think of anyone more suited to represent his ward.

Allan Sparrow also deserves to be elected. Sparrow has had long experience with community groups which is unlikely to falter, and has worked closely with the Ward Six Community Organization. He has taken a sensible stand on the need for housing without destroying community structure.

The other major aldermanic candidates in the ward simply do not measure up. The abrasive William Archer may have accumulated a vast knowledge of city politics during his term in office, but it is of little use when so consistently misapplied. Archer supports the eviction of the Toronto Island residents and the Metro Centre Development. Archer is not a man who places much importance in the concerns of residents' groups.

K. Dock Yip, the other aldermanic candidate, while appearing sincere, seems to be both confused and uninformed on many of the issues, substituting for analysis the parroting of such gems as "I will serve without fear or favoritism."

Only Heap and Sparrow can be relied upon to pay heed to the concerns of their constituents, crucial in a ward so diverse both ethnically and economically.

In the election for trustee, Bob Spencer and Dan Leckie deserve the support of the university. While they were SAC president and education commissioner respectively at U of T, they demonstrated a sincere concern for educational reform which has lasted.

Leckie's record on the board of education is commendable as he has supported teaching in local schools of Chinese, a review of streaming, and a student bill of rights. Spencer, although not elected in 1972, has continued to work hard on educational reform issues, previously as a founder of the Ontario Federation of Students, presently as an executive assistant to the Ryerson students council.

Our endorsement of the reform slate does not imply that we feel urban reform has been an unqualified success over the past two years, or indeed that any serious analysis of the success of urban reform has taken place. Our support of Heap and Sparrow and Leckie and Spencer, is a qualified "this is the best the ward can offer" but it does not translate into a feeling that their efforts will all meet with success. Our cynicism tells us that the developer may appear to be down, but he is far from out.

Bette Stephenson
answers critics

The deliberately inflammatory and totally distorted headlines printed in the Toronto Star and the misinterpretation by Toronto reporters of my response to their questions regarding medical school enrolment have shrouded the issues in a fog of confused rhetoric and misinterpretation. The problem continues to be compounded in The Varsity by letter writers who either fail to understand the questions I posed or mistakenly attempt to insinuate hidden implications.

My response consisted of three questions raised by the contents of a large number of unsolicited letters from concerned Canadians. They are: Do the admission policies of Canadian faculties of medicine relate sufficiently closely to the medical needs and expectations of Canadian society? Do the immigration policies of the federal government regarding student immigration impinge in any way upon educational opportunities for Canadian students? Are the citizens of Canada (whose taxes provide almost all of the financial support of Canadian Universities) sufficiently well informed about the proportionate distribution of funding for: (a) Students classified as Canadian Citizens, (b) Students classified as landed immigrants whose parents, domiciled in other countries, provide financial support for other than Canadian educational institutions, (c) Students admitted on student visas? If they are so informed, do they agree with the pattern of distribution?

Obviously these questions are limited neither to faculties of medicine, nor to the University of Toronto. Similar questions could (and perhaps should) be put for all faculties in all Canadian universities.

In a democratic society all citizens have the responsibility and the right to consider such questions.

If our governments and our universities are truly relevant to the aspirations of our society, should their policies not reflect the considered answers of the majority of Canadian citizens?

Bette M. Stephenson, M.D.

Race definition just rhetorical

Edward Lary's Op-ed reply (Wed., Nov. 27) to Robert Wells' letter (Nov. 22) ("Racism Must Be Well Defined"). Lary's emphasis on what he calls a "non-definition" is itself a reminder that my letter offered, not a definition of "racism", but rather a challenge to all those discussing racism, that they agree upon some mutually accepted, working definition of the word.

It is because I did not have access to a precise definition of "racism" that I did not attempt to offer one. I did try, however, to point out how some things follow from any definition of "racism", provided the word has a distinct meaning.

But I agree with Lary's reaction, in that he has begun to ask many of these questions which I too have been asking, while reading "real stories" and letters and articles; some examples would be those concerning enrolment at the U of T medical school, and of course the Banfield Incident of last year.

In Lary's own words, which characteristics define "race"? Who decides this? If there is such a thing as "genetic inferiority", then who is genetically inferior to whom? Whose philosophies of Man are being presupposed?

Do I need to name certain groups here on campus, whose members' use of this word "race" and its relatives, "racism" and "racist", suggests that they have answered the above questions? Why don't they share their knowledge with those whom they are trying to inform? Mr. Lary is wrong to presume that my demand for a definition of "racism" is part of some personal holy quest. Nelson wants socialist alternative

Running for the League for Socialist Action (LSA) in the Ward Six aldermanic race is former U of T student Fred Nelson.

Nelson says the LSA is running to put forward "socialist and working peoples' alternatives to big business and well-meaning reformers."

He feels reformers such as his opponents Dan Heap and Allan Sparrow advocate measures which will leave basic city problems intact.

The Socialists call for sweeping changes including the nationalization of development companies and placing housing under tenants' control.

He admits that solutions are not possible at the local level only, but says a workers' city government could battle with corporations and other levels of government.

The main issue in the election,

Nelson says is the housing crisis, which can only be solved by mobilizing tenants for decent low-cost public housing.

Nelson calls most of the measures by the last council a "farce", singling out the Metro Centre project and the 45-foot holding bylaw.

He says the holding bylaw is useless because exemptions have been given to all those who have applied since the moratorium was instituted.

"A workers' city government will fight along with students to kick big business off the Governing Council ... and fight cutbacks in educational spending," Nelson says.

The LSA also opposes the reformers on the Toronto Islands issue, saying the homes should be torn down for recreational space, but only when housing can be provided.

On transportation, Nelson says a crash program is needed for mass public transit with the abolition of fares to encourage more use.

The LSA is running a slate in the election led by mayoral candidate Joan Campana because of the absence of an NDP slate.

The socialists says the NDP is the only mass organization with a working class base despite their reformist program, and should have fielded a slate of candidates.

But Nelson feels they must run in the election to provide a working class alternative and criticize the incomplete nature of reform solutions.

Nelson is an office worker. He came from Saskatchewan two years ago after having served as president of the Saskatchewan young New Democrats and being a member of the NDP provincial executive.

Socialist Fred Nelson wants developers nationalized.

Combs wants to end the council war

John Combs, a 29-year-old market analyst, is running for alderman in Ward Six on a platform which is a mixture of reform and old guard policies.

Combs supports the Metro Centre development, saying it will provide jobs, taxes and housing. He also wants an end to the "war" between council and developers.

On the reform side, the U of T graduate says he wants an apartment dwellers' bill of rights including maintenance guarantees and municipally-assisted tenants' associations.

He also calls for municipally-supported daycare centres, preservation of St. Lawrence and Kensington markets, and income tax deductions for municipal tax assessments.

Combs wants an end to the Yonge Street mall because it is a haven for drugs and crime, but he would like to see more outside street malls.

However, the basic change Combs wants is a move towards more development to broaden the tax base and improve residential, office, shopping and industrial life.

He has been active in the Yonge-Bloor Association, the Merton-Davisville Ratepayers and the Urban Land Institute.

writer misunderstands? Or what happens when these people will not try to understand?

There may be many "real" stories that perhaps might not involve "moral" issues at all, except for their having been tagged with a word which is ambiguous and emotive, just the kind of word to employ for strategic, propagandist ends.

their scholarship, some devil in me thought of enquiring into their credentials.

Preliminary research led me to the conclusion that one of their efforts comes to Naught. He has published one serious contribution, a biography. Perhaps because it was based on work completed while he was a student, it is the laughing stock of all serious followers of the social gospel. Scholars not only enjoy its naive interpretation. They relish in its covering up of facts which might shed ugly light on its hero's Worth.

As for the other contributions of this naughty scholar, they are suavenly served dishings of undergraduate appreciations of de Tocqueville and Hartz, applied to Canadian and American history with a delicious delight for urbane cocktail patter and darning.

There is even less struggle with the full-Nelson. Although lanky Texan languor fails to disguise his inanity, still, one is appalled that one contribution is the main Tory.

Has anyone thought of subjecting their tenure to scholarly review?

Pollutomobiles still to blame

Since 1962 I have looked down from the morally superior heights of my bicycle at those of my colleagues who continue to give a bad example to the rest of society by coming to campus in their pollutomobiles. If it is true that high-rise parking is contemplated for these pollutocrats, then I shall indeed be in danger (as Sandra Demson once accused me) of falling ... into a pit of righteousness.

Students oppose prof dismissal

HAMILTON (CUP) — In reaction to a university decision not to rehire professor Barry Thompson, sociology students packed a lecture theatre in a meeting last week to discuss possible student action.

The meeting voted 180-2 to take their case directly to a dean of social sciences R.C. McIvor and to demonstrate at the next university Senate meeting.

The university administration reacted to the meeting by sealing off the upper floor of Gilmour Hall, where the lecture theatre and administration offices are located, by locking access doors and calling in McMaster security officers to patrol the building.

The meeting was called last week to protest the decision by the Faculty of Social Sciences tenure and promotions committee to allow the appointment of Thompson to lapse.

Asbestos problem

MONTREAL (CPA-CUP) — Twenty-five years after the bitter asbestos strike, safety is still a disputed issue between union and companies in the Thetford mines 150 miles northeast of here.

Two hundred employees of Asbestos Corporation Ltd., one of the companies struck at Thetford Mines in 1949, walked out Nov. 16 charging unsafe working conditions underground. The company has refused to discuss the situation but contract negotiations are to start in a few weeks when the issue will be raised again by the union.

In the meantime the Confederation of National Trade Unions (CNTU) and the company have opened a medical clinic in the mining town, operated by doctors from the Mount Sinai School of Medicine. They plan to examine 1,400 employees.

Toronto public accounting firm requires ambitious C.A. students who are willing to assume responsibility. Please call Mel Moscoe at 964-1700 for a confidential interview.

He is appealing the decision, which reversed a unanimous agreement by the Sociology Tenure and Promotions Committee.

Rick Haddon, representing graduate students, said Thompson was outspoken and stated that the policy of North American universities was, increasingly, to hire young professors, keep them on for three or four years, let them go and rehire.

He called the reasons for letting the professor go as having "economic and political overtones."

At the meeting, Thompson maintained that he had not caused any trouble, and as a teacher he should be allowed to say, wear, and teach what he likes. He also claims his academic freedom has been attacked.

A similar grievance exists on the part of the McMaster Political Science Students' Association (MPSSA). They have called for the support of all political science students in their efforts to appeal the case of Marcia Smith Lenglett, chairperson of the Departmental Curriculum Committee, who also was not rehired for next year.

In a statement by MPSSA, the current situation within the department was explained, and the students described the present rift in the department.

"Our teachers are at each other's throats over a proposed undergrad curriculum, over developing a PhD program, over professionalism and over their own personal dislikes and differences."

The students are opposing what they call plans to set up a PhD program on an Americanized model, while neglecting the establishment of a program proposed by Lenglett concerning Canadian approaches.

HALIFAX (CUP) — The president, vice-president and the Board of Governors of Dalhousie University are being sued by Dalhousie professor Bruno Dumbrowski, for acting without proper jurisdiction in denying him tenure.

Dumbrowski charged in a complaint before the Nova Scotia Supreme Court that president Henry Hicks and vice-president W.A. MacKay had acted in excess of their jurisdiction in refusing him tenure, without placing the question, and recommendations of the tenure committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science, before the Board of Governors.

The Faculty of Arts and Science had voted unanimously April 6 to support his tenure application.

Dumbrowski, a holder of the Copernicus medal for academic excellence in Poland, is seeking reinstatement in the Department of Classics and damages for non-renewal of his contract.

University teachers probe Waterloo firings

WATERLOO (CUP) — The Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) has been called in to help resolve a dispute caused by the firing of three professors at Renison College, an Anglican college affiliate of the University of Waterloo.

The CAUT and Renison officials have begun holding secret meetings over the dispute. However, they intend to involve the fired professors and their lawyers in face to face discussions.

Renison principal John Towler has termed the meeting, "a fabulous experience" for the college. He also said the arbitration process is well under way and should be resolved shortly.

The firings involve Jefferey Forest, a social science professor, Hugh Miller a psychology professor, and Marsha Forest (wife of Jefferey), a human relations professor.

Carol Bolt and Shelter interview

Shelter is Carol Bolt's twelfth play. Like many of the anti-establishment playwrights and directors of the late 60's and early 70's she is almost into the establishment herself — an irony she readily acknowledges. When I talked to her on Tuesday, I began by asking her about Shelter: what did she intend it to say?

CB: That's a difficult question to answer in 25 words or less, especially when I'm so close to it.

Fiona Poole: Well, when you sat down to write, did you plan just to entertain?

CB: I always hope to entertain. I also wanted to write a play for five women. I had a vague idea of the characters and the situation and just wanted to see how it all worked out.

FP: So your plays more or less write themselves?

CB: Not exactly. With Emma, I had read her life and I knew the Free Theatre wanted to do a play about her. I was interested in the romance of her life as opposed to the figure of the noble political heroine. With Shelter I thought that there was something to be said about the situation of a protected state —

FP: Meaning Canada?

CB: Yes, and a protected human being, a woman, without any responsibility or any public position. In this situation you can afford to be more idealistic and are more able to take certain positions, simply because you don't have to do anything about it. So what would happen if women became equal? They'd get heart disease and lung cancer and ... That's the idea anyway behind the play.

FP: The allegorical level seems to have been largely ignored.

CB: Well it's not strong — like Hosanna. I don't necessarily want people to understand the allegory, just perhaps to note it as a sub-text at the subliminal level. It's there anyway and the idea does hold together.

FP: Now, something about your career. How did it begin?

CB: I've always written plays. I belonged to various amateur groups and occasionally we'd perform things I'd written. In 1970 I happened to have some friends working at TWP, and I had a long poetic drama, Daganawida. One of these friends read it and thought there was a part she'd like to play, so she showed it to George Luscombe. He liked it. It was really, really bad — mostly because it was very, very poetical. Kind of dull — but I learned a lot. In 1971 we were out in Saskatchewan and I wrote a show called Next Year Country. I wanted to do a more political play but they had heart trouble if you even mentioned CCF. I opened it as Buffalo Jump and it opened at Passe Muraille in 1972. I quit my job after Buffalo Jump and began writing full time. I've done ten shows in the last two and a half years.

FP: Does it pay well? Can you make a living by writing?

CB: It's not very good if you only write for small theatres. First productions are sort of workshops for the director and the writer. You get about $500 to $1,000 a show. But if it gets picked up and goes on to a bigger theatre — Stratford, the NAC, Manitoba Theatre Centre — you get 5 or 10 percent of the box office which works out at around $3,000 to $5,000. Emma paid well. I think the Free Theatre paid $500; then there was a film for TV. That paid $3,000 and there's a production at the Manitoba Theatre Centre — $4,000.

FP: Have you found it easy to make your career?

CB: I've always been able to get my plays done. Directors generally approach me to ask me for plays. That's common though, nothing special. The community sort of works together. If someone sees one of your plays and likes it, he'll come and ask.

For young people breaking in it seems to be as difficult as ever from what I've heard. The only way to begin is to make an emotional or intellectual contact with someone who works in theatre. And it's easy to have an idea with a director, but you also need to find a producer. I've been planning an adaptation of a revenge tragedy, The Changeling, with Tim Bond but we need a producer because it would be an expensive show. It's just not worth going beyond a first draft.

FP: It hasn't always been possible to make a living as a playwright, has it?

CB: No, only in the last two or three years I suppose. You could always make a living writing for TV but that's quite difficult. Committees are often involved, script conferences and so on. It becomes a real job of work.

FP: What about future plays?

CB: I'm doing one about Kim Philby, the spy, and another play about Emma — a sort of epic this time not a romance, about when she's older. It's called "The Lighthouse". Kim Philby will be a TV adaptation and Martin Kinch and I are going to develop it for the stage.

FP: You like working with Free Theatre?

CB: Yes, very much.

FP: Are you an enthusiastic nationalist then?

CB: Of course. More enthusiastic than they are. We're all enthusiastic together.

FP: How politically overt do you think you can be in a play?

CB: Oh, as overt as you like. We've just been touring the schools with a play called Maurice. Basically it's an editorial cartoon, and we made no attempt to be fair. We went round saying Duplessis was corrupt, had goon squads, beat up on people, sold natural resources to the Americans. Kids asked in question time after the show "But don't you think you're being one-sided?" We'd answer "Well, it's much more interesting to be one-sided." The big problem with Canadian history is that it's so bland. I've just been reading Ted Allan's book The Scalpel. The Sword because I'm going to write a film script about Bethune, but it's impossible to think of Bethune dramatically from that. He was a Byronic figure in fact: Allan allows that he had a temper and that's all.

FP: Do you consider yourself a feminist?

CB: I'm not officially connected with any movement, but I'm aware of women's issues, more and more. I do consider myself a feminist but I generally get bad reviews in feminist newspapers. For example, with Emma, I was criticized for making her into a silly person. But I don't think people are at all interesting unless they have some depth, some faults. You're much more likely to consider a full life as a woman possible if you see women characters who have some faults.

FP: A final question. What is going to happen in the next few years? You and your friends are no longer on the fringe are you?

CB: No. We're being co-opted into the establishment. Larry Fineberg has already been asked to write for the Third Stage at Stratford for instance. Sometimes I wonder if you can maintain your standards once you're hooked into things you don't really like, but I don't really see why you couldn't.

There's a new CBC program with George Bloomfield bringing together writers and directors, exactly the same people who are in the small theatres. In a small theatre you might have a hundred people every night and that's all you're talking to. Mainly you're preaching to the converted and it can be hot house. It'll be more exciting maybe to go into the larger arena. Now we want new people to fill the smaller arena theatres. That's probably the most difficult thing. It's hard to find new people. You don't want people who admire you to excess, who run around after you and bring you coffee. You must be able to take in the people you really hate, because they're the ones who'll shoot down all your icons.

review

It's a pleasure to review an interesting play about women, and Canadian women at that, who aren't downtrodden dramatizations of failures. Jory, the heroine of Carol Bolt's new play Shelter not only 'survives' she comes out triumphant.

Currently playing at the Firehall Theatre, Shelter is a success for all involved: For the talented Canadian playwright Carol Bolt, for the University Dramatic Club and the Young People's Theatre who commissioned and co-produced it, and for director Eric Steiner whose brilliant expertise makes it work.

Shelter is a comic study of contemporary women and contemporary politics. The characters, personal relationships, and political views of five different women are explored as they deal with a funeral, a wedding, and an election.

A Liberal MP from South Saskatchewan has recently driven his car into a river and drowned. His widow, Jory, hasn't spoken for five days. She lies in a 'catatonic state' under a blanket for most of Act One while her well-meaning but busybody friends try to provide consolation — by encouraging her to run in her husband's place in the by-election.

Even though the opening scene is the aftermath of a funeral, complete with wreaths of funeral flowers, the mood of Shelter is hardly depressing. False sympathy is not wasted on "Howard", who was a grafter and full of bullshit even though he did have 'personality'.

After five days of silence, Jory finally speaks by reciting an enigmatic little poem and accepting the invitation to run in the election.

From here on, Jory is pitted against the rigors and ordeals of politics; creating her own political image to counteract her husband's unscrupulous one, and trying to cope with the four women friends.

Diane Polley very convincingly portrays the wisecracking and cynical Win who believes that Jory is a Christian martyr for carrying on her husband's career. Watchful though not apologetic she gives Jory support and lends an interesting cagey ambiguity to her role as an intelligent but non-productive woman.

Her philanderer husband is having an affair with Calla, touchingly played by Colleen Wagner, a harmless and overfriendly woman with a heart of gold, teased dyed red hair, and a complicated network of lovers. She is that 'other woman' — men seek out for help and shelter, and the one they always desert.

Good friend Vicky, well-acted by Pixie Bigelow, an earnest but neurotic newspaper-radio journalist has problems coordinating her public and private lives. She takes on the responsibility of being Jory's campaign manager in the midst of an identity crisis concerning her own upcoming marriage to the only foreign correspondent in Saskatchewan (and a man who irks her because he's too perfect). About women she declares, "We live in a sheltered workshop." To a degree Vicky has broken out of it. She has a reasonably successful career, she is getting married, yet she is unfortunately caught between her idealism and her expediency. Vicky is last seen approaching a nervous breakdown ridiculously decked out in an atrocious scalloped and laced wedding gown (handmade and forced upon her by her mother).

Vicky's mother is a horrific grotesque. Played by the imposing Helen Carscallen, she is an outrageously funny satiric target for misconstrued attitudes about political women, or just women in general.

These four women fill the stage with a strength and vitality that at times tends to almost overshadow the main heroine. If the play has a weakpoint it is Jory's characterization. Her role isn't fleshed out enough. Jory is really only concentrated on at the beginning and at the end. Considering the limitation, Phyllis Benvenuto gives us a Jory full of integrity, determination and genuine spunkiness.

interviewing the interviewer: b to the people, and ask them what they did.

The people who actually fought and won the war. They weren't the generals. In the Depression they weren't the politicians. The politicians will always come out on top.

But the people — they endure. They were the survivors. So for the Depression book I interviewed the survivors, and for the Second World War book I interviewed the people who fought and won the war.

VARSIITY: Do you see yourself giving history back to the people?

BROADFOOT: Yes, of course. What I have said is that I have taken the history from Canadians, processed it, much as you might process a can of peas in a factory, and then I say, "Here is the finished product. It's a book . . . two books. Take them, people of Canada, they're yours. With my compliments."

That is pretty well my philosophy about the whole thing.

This sort of oral history that I do, I think is going to be the coming thing.

VARSIITY: In doing oral history, you're doing much more than just turning on a tape recorder and getting a story. You're trying to understand the story in the context of the person's entire life. In your books especially, and among a lot of oral histories, one wonders about why the people choose a certain part, and why they selected that as being the most important, and what that tells us about the individuals life.

BROADFOOT: Well, I'll tell you. The sweetest time in the world for me is when the tape recorder's humming, and Often if you've got a good subject . . . and I've found that men who had been overseas were better than women who had stayed home because their life was rather a drudge . . . but they have a trigger. You have a domino effect where one story would lead to another and to another.

But somewhere along the line, if I felt them fading away I could reach in and pull out another lead. I used to say, for example, "What was London like during the air raids?" Well that would start off something.

But of course you can only use one story of London and the air raids. And you can only use one story of being shot all to hell by a eighty-eight millimetre gun in a tank. So, you get two hours of tape, and you might only get two stories.

People used to say to me, "Oh, well, you just go across the country, hell. You've got a tape recorder there, and you've got friends who refer you to friends, who refer you to friends, and it's simple. You just come back and you write it."

It's not like that at all. It's hard work.

I don't think a novelist could do this kind of work. I don't think an ordinary newspaperman could do it.

VARSIITY: Studs Terkel.

BROADFOOT: Studs Terkel, yes! Well, I can tell you how I got onto this. There used to be a guy named Joseph Mitchel who wrote for the New Yorker during and after the war. He wrote an article once called "Professor Seagull", which was about a guy named Joe Gould who travelled the subways of New York writing the oral history of the world.

Survivors of the Cana thirty-three percent to Studs Terkel, and thirty-three percent to my own evolution as a writer knowing what I wanted to do.

Studs Terkel was, I suppose, the trigger. But I said "The only way you can understand the Depression in the United States and in Canada is to go right across the country. And take a year to do it."

So, I got in my car, with my tape recorder and typewriter, and I started across. In about eight months, by car, and by train and by plane, I travelled from Vancouver to Penticton.

VARSIITY: You brought up the difference between your method of oral history and Stud Terkel's method. Doesn't your approach — interviewing people across Canada instead of one place — tend to fragment the picture you get. It's true that Studs Terkel only interviewed people in Chicago, but he gets a more holistic picture.

BROADFOOT: Yes, for Chicago. Just for Chicago.

VARSIITY: Because there has been some criticism of your books that they encourage browsing rather than reading.

BROADFOOT: True. That's very true. As a matter of fact, I call it sort of a "Reader's Digest" type of a book.

In the Digest there might be forty stories, and you can pick it up and open it anywhere and within two pages of where you open it there's going to be a story.

Personally, that's what I call it, and I'm sort of denigrating the book, but it's true!

I will also say about the two books that I really defy anybody to start at the beginning and go to the end in one lump.

I actually read it by chapter. I don't think anyone can absorb all that in two evenings. It's just not that kind of a book.

If you're just writing down what people say, you're writing down history. I don't consider myself a historian.

VARSIITY: Why not?

BROADFOOT: Because my definition of history is a formal chronicle of events and times and interpretations.

Barry Broadfoot is the editor of two very successful Canadian books; Ten Lost Years and Six War Years. Each book is composed of interviews with, as Broadfoot calls them, the "survivors" of respectively, the Depression and the Second World War.

Broadfoot was interviewed last Friday by Bradley Adams and Gus Richardson, both of whom have had experience with oral history techniques.

VARSIITY: Why do you think your books are so popular?

BROADFOOT: Well, for one thing, nothing has ever been written about them . . . those eras, from a people position. In Ten Lost Years, which was about the Depression . . . there's been a few novels written; Hugh Garner wrote one, called Cabbagetown, which is probably the best known. But most of the work done on the Depression was done by sociologists, and economists who tried to explain how the Depression happened, and its effects on Canadian life, at the sociological level, almost like the clinical level.

Yet Canada was a nation of 8.5 million people, and half of those people are still around and they're telling their kids that anybody under fifty-five didn't experience the Depression. But they've all heard about it. They've all heard about it but they don't know a thing about it.

So a book comes along that's a people book. I was twenty-nine years in the newspaper business and it took me nineteen years to realize that people are passionately interested in other people.

My books, both of them, are about people.

I felt that during the Depression, and during the Second World War, the politicians had their say, and the statesmen had their say about what they did right, and very little about what they did wrong.

Generals had their say, the economists have had their say, and then the historians have erected a huge tent over those sixteen years — from 1929 to 1945 — and have sealed it off from the rest of us.

I felt that it was time for someone to go

Fearful and distrusted as possible spies, British Columbian Japanese waited out the war in internment camps like this one.

I've got someone who is articulate, can think in a straight line, and is a raconteur, and I have just asked one question. I usually ask a very simple question, maybe it's too simple but by its very simplicity it's the perfect question. I usually ask, "What did you do in the war?"

Everybody has got one . . . I used to call it the "starburst" . . . one impression of the war that has stayed with them.

It might have been the time when he was kicked in the ass by a railway cop outside of Moosejaw, and he's hated cops ever since. Or at Monte Casino in Italy, where they were advancing in a row and one, two, four of his buddies were killed and he survived. That's what I call a "starburst".

In everybody's life there's that one thing. They'll usually come out and tell you that first. And that gives you your lead-in.

He'd sit beside a person, and everything that that person said he wrote down. For twenty-five years that stuck in my mind. What an interesting way to write history; to write it through people's speech . . . their thoughts.

And then Terkel came along. I was on the boat to Victoria when I bought his book Hard Times: The Depression in the United States. I was always interested in this technique of interviewing people about their experiences.

I read it on the boat, and then in a motel room, and half way through the book I threw it across the room and said "Shit, Broadfoot, you can do better than that."

Here Terkel was writing about the Depression in the United States, but he confined himself to Chicago. Now we all know that Chicago is not the United States. No more than Toronto is Canada.

So, I will say, if you can break it up, thirty-three percent to Joseph Mitchell,

Barry Broadfoot and oral history an assault at Dieppe.

If I were writing about the people of Confederation, I wouldn't put anything in about Lord Durham's Report.

Because I find that people really aren't interested in that. If you read The Six War Years, you'll find that Churchill was the good guy — he symbolized democracy, God, right, truth and us; Hitler was the bad guy — the Nazis, the Germans, bestiality, extermination of the Jews. People's minds all during the war were polarized. Churchill . . . Hitler.

We were to stamp out Hitler . . . Churchill called him "That hyaena". People were not interested in the Yalta decision, the Teran Conference, or the meetings at Casa Blanca.

They were more interested in their own little bit of turf. Not one person that I interviewed mentioned the founding of the United Nations. No one ever mentioned the Second Front.

People tend, as part of the human condition, to reject the bad and just remember the good. Remember the good times — the parties in London, the wine they drank, the girls they had — and forget about the horrors of war. Until you ask them.

VARSITY: Couldn't part of that be your method of selecting people to interview? If you'd interviewed a member of the Socialist Party I'm sure that all you would get would concern the machinations of politicians at Yalta.

BROADFOOT: Yes, you're quite right. That would be his entire life. That would be the exception to the rule.

VARSITY: Isn't it important to discover what structured these people's lives, to discover what gave meaning to them? Certainly it's easy with a raconteur who can just tell you a story, but that's a very formal level. There's a formal number of these anecdotes that people pull out, and tell over and over again, and embellish in the process. Shouldn't you try to get behind these anecdotes, to get people off these events, and get at how they actually felt, what they actually thought about. In this way even the middle class housewife who stayed behind, and didn't have any anecdotes to tell you, would still have something to communicate.

BROADFOOT: Well, you see, what I try to do . . . Basically, my books are entertaining. They're stories, and people like stories.

If you can imagine a cross-word puzzle. Huge. Square. I didn't have any preconceived notions, I didn't write things down saying "I need a clergyman, I need a ditchdigger".

But gradually as the interviews went on I found myself rejecting some people, because I already had them. You can interview ten Saskatchewan farmers who survived the drought and basically, they'll tell you the same story.

After a while I found myself going and looking for other people, to fill in each one of those squares in the jig-saw. If you can fill in every square, until you have a whole, you should have an almost perfect picture of the times.

You're never going to get it. That's just the ideal. But I feel that that is the objective of what you are supposed to do. I was trying to instruct. I was trying to inform. I was trying to tell people what it was like. But I also know enough about it that you have to entertain too.

There are flaws in these two books. I'm the first to admit it. But the way I did it, I feel, was the best way possible under the circumstances.

VARSITY: But social historians are moving into the field of oral history, and they are trying to make sense of it. That means that you would use oral history in a much more analytical sense, rather than saying "Well, here's a fact. A strike happened in 1941 that wasn't reported in the press."

BROADFOOT: Well, take that example. My canvas is so vast, that to tell about that strike I could really only interview one person. Now that person might be on the management's side, or on the workers' side, or have been a bystander. That is one of the flaws in this book.

VARSITY: How did people react to your project?

BROADFOOT: It got a lot of people thinking about those days. I remember one woman in Nova Scotia, that I interviewed about the Depression. I went around to see her in the morning, and she came to the door rather bleary-eyed.

She said, "I couldn't sleep last night. I've been thinking about this interview and I lay awake last night thinking about those years. I lived it again."

So it did affect people in some ways.

VARSITY: All of the stories in your books are anonymous. Don't you think that not having some idea of the personal history of the person who is telling the story decreases its impact?

BROADFOOT: Well, on the first book I made a little preface to each story. I tried to draw a small word-picture of each person. But my publisher said "No. I think we'll skip that." And I said "O.K." I was new to this game of putting a book together. But I didn't feel it served that much purpose.

This is the most fascinating job in the world. You're going to find more and more oral historians around. But I wish they'd get another name for it. I wish they weren't so intent on professionalizing it.

My kind of oral history is immediate; right off the bat. I'm not saying it shouldn't be stored away for the future, but I'm saying there's another reason. Let's get it out and make it live right now.

I wanted to get the books out and let people know what went on in those years. Because there has been sort of a veil pulled across the Depression years. There's no doubt about that.

Six War Years, 1939 - 1945.
Barry Broadfoot
Doubleday

There has been a recent spate of interest in history "from the mouths of the people." Stud Terkel's books in the United States on the Depression, and more recently his Working, which consisted of interviews with people about their work and feelings about it, have been very successful. In Canada, Barry Broadfoot's Ten Lost Years, composed of interviews with survivors of the Depression, was popular and spawned a successful play in Toronto under the same name.

Six War Years is the "story" of ordinary Canadians during the Second World War. In his travels Broadfoot interviewed soldiers and sailors, men who fought and men who stayed behind, and the women who tended the Victory Gardens and worked in the factories. What emerges is a rich and variegated picture of Canada at war.

The charm and the beauty of Broadfoot's book lies in his rediscovery of the individual in history. Too often professional historians create an image woven from the speeches of politicians and generals, and the statistics of a country gearing for total war. That image, however, only duplicates the social abstractions that confront people in everyday life. Professional history confronts the individual; there is no point of contact. In that same way society confronts the individual.

In Six War Years, one finds that Canadians faced a society geared for war, but they were not involved in it. The soldier's scorn for the politics of war and propaganda was everywhere evident. Again and again people related some small incident that brought them into contact with the war - incidents that had little to do with official declarations of war.

As one woman told of seeing a hometown boy lying unconscious in the field hospital where she worked

... "I nearly dropped what I was carrying. I'd gone on skating parties with him' hayrides. I think I had a crush on him once. I don't think I ever knew what war and battle was until then..."

Take another official image of the war years - the sacrifices of the home front. For many women interviewed, the war represented fun, not sacrifice. For perhaps the only time in their lives they were released from the moral structures and double standards of society. Married women went out on dates and made love, just as their husbands did overseas. Yet many did not, and buried in these conflicting experiences lies the regret of one woman who was "...a good wife. I know, oh sure, hundreds of women didn't... Lots of women I know didn't. And maybe I should have too... But there were too many pressures on me. Now, I wish I'd gone out and had some fun."

One wonders if the insistence of our parents on self-reliant individualism is not rooted in this discrepancy between official fact and individual reality. Certainly, that discrepancy led to a groping attempt by many to come to terms with history in ways other than the official one.

One finds, then, in the derisive irony of one pilot who participated in the fire-bombing of Dresden, an attempted reinterpretation of the war:

"This was calculated atrocity, no question in my mind... Burning a city is technique, you know... You used incendiaries and then heavy bombs and this would create an artificial wind roaring up the streets and it sucked the oxygen out... People didn't die of fire... they died because the life was literally sucked right out of them.

That was a beastly thing, wasn't it? Our guys didn't do that, did they? Only the beastly Hun did that, didn't they?"

It is perhaps this attempt at personal understanding that points to the weaknesses of Broadfoot's book. In its emphasis on events, on human interest stories, Six War Years tends to lose that element of comprehension.

Everybody tries to understand their personal histories, to develop some relation between the collective history and their memory of that period as they lived it. To use only the focal point around which that understanding coalesces is to miss that attempt at understanding.

In a sense, Broadfoot, despite his desire to give history back to the people, has really fragmented it. Six War Years is about Everyman, and by that same token it is about noman.

If Broadfoot had focused on one locality - say Toronto - and interviewed people from upper and lower classes, farmers and city dwellers, soldiers and zombies, men, women and children, he might have come to a closer approximation of how people - not Everyman - react to a situation. People's reactions to a given event are mediated by many past experiences and by structural determinants such as class, ethnicity, sex and so on. To use only one factor - the war - as a touch-point is to homogenize that response.

All this points to the technique of oral history itself. Questions should be asked about the relation of experience to memory. What meaning does memory have for a person's life activity? What is the relation between the individual and the collective memory? Oral historians should not only be concerned with giving history back to the people: they should help them understand the way in which people personalize the collective experience.

Broadfoot unfortunately imitates the efforts of professional historians in his concern for major events. The typology of his books (the Depression, the War) means that people's lives are important, not as lived, but in relation to a particular massive social event. If the event were used to shed light on the way in which people cope with the world it would give history back to the people; but the process is reversed. In Broadfoot's books people's lives are used to shed light on the event. And that, once more, deprives people of their history.

These, however, are criticisms of a technique of reconstructing history that is in its infancy. Six War Years, though it has its shortcomings, is well worth reading, if only to regain the human in an inhuman event.

theatre

le roi se meurt macbett

"I see the death of all kings on earth", says Ionesco, "I witness the agonizing desecration and downfall of all values and civilizations. It is beyond our control and therefore it is true. I am myself a dying king." His play, "Le Roi Se Meurt", performed last week in Toronto, portrays a monarch who is dying while his kingdom disintegrates around him. While concentrating on the private drama of the king, the tragicomic scale of the action expands into a universe which mirrors his decay. While Ionesco sees death as tragic, he also finds man absurd in his helplessness and in his continued attempts to control fate and to erect meaning on a slippery surface which tumbles into the void. The prospect of annihilation, especially under the threat of nuclear holocaust, is mockery on a grand scale, defying civilization as death haunts the individual. The play was performed twice here last week, once at York's Burton Auditorium and again at the Ryerson theatre. The excellent players were part of "Le Treteau de Paris", a travelling theatre formed in 1958 to bring French drama to non French-speaking audiences. The accomplished performance was directed by Jacques Maclair, who was responsible for the original production in Paris in 1962. In "Le Roi Se Meurt", the business of ridiculing the fragile surface of bourgeois complacency which dominated the earlier plays is subordinated in the painful and serious theme of coming to terms with death. The absurd language of a play like "The Bald Soprano", whose purpose was the "strangling of phony eloquence" is replaced by a more classic and poetic diction.

The progressively serious tone of the play illustrates the revealing of absurdity to "achieve a sort of tragedy". At first the King is seen vainly trying to command the elements and call order into an unresponsive universe. Equally absurd is his refusal to acknowledge the fact of time and age which culminates in his pretending to be a baby. His first queen, Marguerite, relentlessly opposes his folly for reasons which are at first unclear. However by the end this cruelty of confrontation provides the only way to salvage something of dignity. "There are no solutions," says Ionesco, "to realize that is the only solution." Ionesco's position that "man must be either unhappy (metaphysically unhappy) or stupid" is found not only in his plays but in his personal writings. "The thought of the end fills me with anguish and fury. I have never been really happy except when drunk"

The king has a second wife, Marie, a plump and ringleted doll who opposes harsh reality in favour of happy delusion. She capers and flirts about the doting king, delivering fluffy speeches about the power of love to shut out the universe. Although her efforts could be construed as kindness, in the context of the play she appears silly and even dangerous. The king's frivolity and sensual diversion have contributed to the ruin of his state. Therefore, in the play, "pretty lies" are not the best alternative; what limited measures exist should be taken to confront reality and fate. In the end the king is left alone with the more truly compassionate Marguerite who forces him to face death through a kind of ritualistic exorcism of all the false props of his existence. In Ionesco's paradoxical world, man can partially overcome absurdity by acknowledging it and by finding a solution in the lack of one.

A very recent work by Ionesco, "Macbett", is now playing at the "Theatre du P'tit Bonheur. If his early plays lacked action he certainly makes up for it in this one. The players, most of whom seem fairly young, possess an incredible amount of energy and enthusiasm. The flamboyant capering and cavorting about is entertaining but it lacks a readily discernible serious purpose. The play doesn't seem to develop a coherent theme but rather continues to bounce off the Shakespearean plot in order to render it farcical. Social ceremonies and heroic actions are continually exaggerated and satirized, providing some very funny moments. None of the characters appear to have a fixed identity or moral principles, each rolls with the wheel of fortune. Duncan is a kind of Falstaffian figure, cowardly and mercenary yet comically engaging as played by the rotund Richard Niquette. Macbeth and Banquo are reminiscent of Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, muddle-minded yes-men whose identities are confused. Nicole Lecavelier, a fine actress, has a dynamic part which changes from Lady Duncan to one of the witches to Lady Macbeth in a fascinating but enigmatic way. Malcolm is portrayed as a malevolent half-wit boy who comes in at the end with a slingshot to bring about a speedy overthrow of Macbeth.

In some respects Ionesco is debunking the conventional expectation about "high and low-life" characters and about good overcoming evil that we bring to the traditional play. In this play the subconscious world of passions and reams governs all alike and the whole thing finally degenerates into a "tale told by an idiot".

The Theatre du P'tit Bonheur performance as a whole is amusing and spirited. The French, except when the actors were very excited, was clear and pleasant to listen to. By the end though even the fast pace begins to drag a bit. "Playing for laughs" is not quite enough in Ionesco's work where more serious acting and tight direction are needed in order to sustain interest. It is certain that the company would do better with a less abstruse and unwieldy play.

John Frum

Have you written and directed a play this term?

Randy Brown, a 30 year old full-time student now in his fourth year at the U of T, has written three plays, one a year.

Last Wednesday through Saturday, the Vic Drama Club presented Brown's fourth play John Frum, as their major production for the fall term. It is a comic romance set in North Ontario's cottage country.

The play describes four brothers who are living off an inheritance. By some peculiar clause in their father's will, three of the brothers can only maintain their share of the inheritance if they stay at the 'Rock', an isolated island cottage in North Ontario. The fourth brother managed to escape to the city life in Rosedale, but returns for a visit as the play begins. He brings with him his secretary and her daughter who find their way into the Frum family.

The characters are comic, peculiar, and imaginative, each with his own distinctive flair. One discovered at the cast party that some of the actors carried their voices and mannerisms into real life. Many people commented on the type-casting, but I tend to think that the plot moulded itself around the characters as the play was rehearsed. This would be consistent with Brown's style—he wrote the play in three weeks and began rehearsals before it was completed.

It seemed to be based more on dynamic co-operation between writer and actors than on any sort of set formula imposed by the writer director on the actors.

When the actors performed inventively and resourcefully, even the most tenuous of themes held together, but when they lost inspiration, the plot began to show its loose threads. In fact, the plot had a number of themes that had only vague connections with the main story.

Brown is both a full-time student and a playwright. Ask him, if you get the chance, whether he's learned more studying academics or writing plays.

Words still burn when the right man speaks them; this is the lesson Cedric Smith teaches with each performance. His solo show which was at Egerton's last week is a personal collage on the moral quality of our lives today featuring satire, anecdotes, history and poetry held together by music and song. Alone on the stage he has an almost mythic presence, a martyr's intensity. He is like a modern Prometheus tossing the fire of his experience into a cold dark world.

On the bare stage he can create simply with the power of voice, gesture and expression the clichés of an American war movie, the atmosphere of a Perth County Riding Stable or the humorous decadence of Elizabethan England.

What Cedric Smith is, I think, trying to do is of such magnitude that it makes him very difficult to analyze in a short space. Trying to follow the man's mind working is like trying to negotiate a maze at 60 miles an hour. How do you pin down someone who combines elements of Heathcliff, Hamlet and Foster Hewitt in a few seconds? Yet one can get trapped by the surface brilliance and neglect the underlying moral core that is represented partly by the poetry of Milton Acorn that he reads and promotes at almost every show. That he has done some good in this area was illustrated by the applause the name received last night from people who had previously never heard of him.

His show made craters in such targets as the Canada Council, the relationship between oil interests and ecology, and the dangerous stupidity of the Liquor Licence Board. On the positive side, the stories of people in this country were told with humility and love, ranging from an anonymous mother's lament over the waste of her son's life through the depression and the war, to Ed Bartlett P.H.D. (Professional Horse Dealer) who reminisces on the triumph of his life when he came in third in the Equestrian Championships down in Toronto on a $40 horse.

The show ended last night in a mood of quiet joy and communion that few artists can invoke. Like Milton Acorn, Cedric Smith cries a love that is hard and fierce but only because it demands its right to exist and to create change.

Gurdjieff reguritated

Views from the Real World
Early Talks of Gurdjieff
As Recollected by his Pupils
E. P. Dutton

Men live as if they contained some immortal essence within themselves. There are those who waste their bodies, raging at their imprisonment within casks of flesh, and there are those who defiantly ravage their spirits. But despair is the property only of those who have imagination; there is a curious state in which the will glimpses melancholy and turns to the struggle of wrestling with protean Ahrimanic darkness. In this state men know evil well, since they discern goodness, from a distance; spiritually accessed, they still strive towards illumination. It is this, precisely, which gives the eerie savour to occultisms. This religion of the arcane is dominated by men and women whose purity is clearly less than the Holy Men of organized religions, yet their appeal remains constant.

G. I. Gurdjieff is, in terms of social and literary significance, the foremost occultist of the twentieth century.

Gurdjieff was an Armenian, as far as one can find out, and spent his youth in the quest for Knowledge. He travelled all over the Near East, as far as Tibet, his journeys being facilitated by his constantly changing passport. He was an agent for many governments, some perhaps simultaneously. Still, out of his life he created an institutionalized study of the potential of human self-perfection, in his "Institute for the Harmonious Development of Man." Teaching that man must become committed to seeing through the semblances of life, and at all times seek to discover the real reason for his existence, and his eventual destination, Gurdjieff and his troupe moved from Georgia to Berlin, tried to settle in England and ended up in a villa outside Paris. There the Work was conducted amidst disbelief and distrust from the staid bourgeois.

Spiritual search is most prominent in society, we are told, when society is in the grip of physical realities with which it cannot contend. A sudden realisation takes place; humanity is seen to be more than creature comfort, for as the civilizing influences break down and decay, man still has a continuous conscience and is still human. He is not defined by his pleasures, but by his analysis of them.

The turning to the spiritual in an age of terror always gives rise to certain phenomena in the lives of the strong-willed. In our age, it started in the Gothic novels of the eighteenth century; in literature it has continued in two streams of aberrance, in America and France. It was in the late nineteenth century Paris that the intellects of the day found in the fin de siècle a weariness that was not merely affectation. These genuine despondent minds, passionately desiring true belief, searched for knowledge and cared not a fig for decency.

In Paris, it was Boullan, Huysmans, the Rosicrucians, the blasphemers and Satanists. In a few years, in the hollow courts of Imperial Russia, came the incredible influence of Rasputin; then, the austere sensualist Gurdjieff.

Look at the pictures of these men, half-centuries after their deaths. The powers of the spirit look out of eyes that are not ascetic but worldly, fleshy. A power shines forth, and it is not a humble one. The truth has been garnered—not from an understanding of the whole of man, his clumsiness and his soaring into grace, but rather through a profound knowledge of man's vices.

These are eyes that the less than imperious must fear. The ordinary man was, in the eyes of these men, thought to be an insufficient vessel to contain the truth. Truth was to be poured into the weak container slowly, under the direction of a Master.

Gurdjieff claimed to be heir to great wisdom, to truths omnipresent but hidden within forms that the ordinary man takes at face value. He believed in the theosophical concept of Mahatmas, the great men who think, and through whose thoughts lesser men come to truth. The mystic is the Master and can become a Demiurge; he is the Archon who has the secret to the Spheres.

The trend of this thinking, Gnostic as it undoubtedly is in its origins, is away from the inner unity of Man and his God, and instead concentrated on the awesome depth that separates Man from God. Man is divine, in potential; it is his difficulty in shedding the flesh that preoccupies Gurdjieff. Unfortunately, his words are couched in the language of the occult, which is, as he himself admitted, intended to screen all those who want truth easily. Inasmuch as truth is hidden so carefully, those who persist in the search are those who believe most strongly in the sapience of their Teacher. Even in the act of reading Gurdjieff, the average reader must make an act of submission. The language is difficult, and problematic.

Other information on what Gurdjieff taught is available, though. At the turn of the century, the theosophists were at the peak of their attractiveness. Gurdjieff is the tail end of that line (unless von Daniken is the latest such figure).

Even their opponents admitted that these apparent frauds had considerable powers of intellect and personality. The groups that surrounded their chosen teacher thought of themselves as 'initiates' and stayed for extended periods of time, putting up with the scorn of their friends and the tragedies that arose from their contact with the cult. In general, they write the biographies of the adepts after they have died; and generally the writings are of little use.

Fortunately Gurdjieff has one good biographer, other than Ouspensky. J. G. Bennett, who met him in the Crimea in 1919, while he and Gurdjieff were concerned with intelligence operations in the area, stayed with Gurdjieff from 1929, when his establishment settled in to communal life in Paris until the Mage's death in 1949 after ten years of retirement. Bennett helps us to make sense of Gurdjieff's almost incomprehensible writings, for he makes no obvious claim to being enlightened, and at the same time has spent the last twenty years systematically excavating ancient traditions which he feels Gurdjieff could have been initiated into.

The crucial evidence given by Bennett is that Gurdjieff thought constantly about the dervishes of the Caucasus. Bennett is able to trace certain of his teacher's ideas back to the kind of Sufism that existed in this strange area, and as well to Nestorian and Assyrian forms of early Christianity. When read first, or in conjunction with Gurdjieff's first work, Beelzebub's Tales his Grandson or his second, Meetings with Remarkable Men, Bennett's book is stimulating and useful.

Views From the Real World is a collection of early talks of Gurdjieff, and one gets a good idea of the man's power to employ psychology. He talks with great force and at time with economy and precision.

Included in this book is a collection of aphorisms which, in thirty or so lines sets out the questions he asks his pupils and the answers he suggests. Included in the first western account of a meeting with him, which occurred in 1915, and gives us a good idea of his innate theatricality.

Gurdjieff taught that there were higher powers than human beings, but that we could advance ourselves to be like them and so participate in the Work of Creation. To do so, we had to free ourselves from preconceptions which he suggested were the results of a failed operation by the Demiurges of the World. We are so constructed that we tend to prefer animal passions, and eventual extinction to a true perception of the world. We are a muddle of 'thought' which are only a barrage of sound distracting us from the things that are real. We can construct within ourselves a higher consciousness, and after death win to the realm of pure spirit, and by logical extension of this, pass beyond existence all together and become the creative void.

Little of this is evident from this book. It is a hodge-podge, and reveals little about the teachings but a great deal about Gurdjieff's enduring popularity among those who crave possession of both their personalities and their spirituality. It is against the flow of western thought for men to foregather to improve their understanding of the God of Mystery. That is something which one is given in personal revelation. These others were willing to make a concerted effort to see. Gurdjieff taught that as the mind could be trained, so could the body, and like the dervishes he taught the sacredness of the dance as conveying immortal truths.

If you survive the reading, what can emerge from Views from the Real World is more than a view into one man's answer to the problem of human life and its surrounding and inherent evils. Few will be likely to believe with Gurdjieff that the sacrifice of humans and animals is the feeding of the Demiurges, and that those who are willing to live as animals act as fertilizer for the evolution of the world. Yet Gurdjieff reveals in his life and his writings the portrait of an era of waste and fast-dying idealism, an era which Orthodoxy could not satisfy.

There is no doubt that many if not all of those who learned at the feet of Gurdjieff were talented and capable men and women, who could deal with both emotional and abstract thought. There is also no doubt that occultism is a failed religion in all its serious aspects. Even with Gurdjieff there hovers an air of decay and disgust. The Work is too difficult to understand. If its teachings are simple, why is their language so hard? Knowledge is not really possible.

More than an Engineer.

Our Military Engineers are very specialised people.

They design and build bridges, airstrips, base facilities, supervise and maintain all kinds of equipment on our bases around the world.

It's a very special job. One that involves working with men. Guiding them. Training them. A job where you can apply your knowledge in all kinds of challenging situations.

If you're into engineering, we can get you into something more than just an office job. An Officer's job, where you can develop your full potential.

Give it some thought. We can give you plenty of opportunities to use your specialised knowledge in some very unusual ways.

On display at the David Mirvish Gallery until December 4 are a double handful of drawings by Henri Matisse ranging over thirty years of his artistic career.

Labeled "fauve"—"wild beast"—by an art critic in his early years, Matisse dispels this misnomer when he explains that "expression, to my way of thinking, does not consist of the passion mirrored upon a human face or betrayed by a violent gesture. The whole arrangement of my picture is expressive . . .

Composition is the art of arranging in a decorative manner the various elements at the artist's disposal for the expression of his feeling."

Nowhere does this aim of Matisse display itself better than through the contrast which the Mirvish Gallery sets up for us.

Three pieces, in the stairwell, stand out, not for their virtuosity, but rather because they are handled in a style normally not associated with Matisse.

Throughout the balance of the show, he has dispensed with illusionistic effects, detailed analysis of background and texture, and definition of shadow in favour of transmitting and subordinating natural forms to the spiritual order of his pictures using as little means as possible for expression.

Often, simply a handful of lines, unvaried in tone or volume, make his point, as in "Paul Matisse IV" as in his broad-faced, lyrical southern European women annotated in crayon and ink.

By curving lines into unnatural shapes he creates Picasso-like effects of multiple planes, as in a 1950 lithograph, "Tete de Jeune Fille."

Louis Aragon's statement that Matisse's "hands transmute the most threadbare, most insignificant things into objects of real luxury," is the key to the four still life studies in the exhibition.

As you hurry into the gallery, Matisse's message will cut like a clear note through the distractions of Ed's synthetic world outside.

As Matisse has said, "We must learn how to discover joy in the sky, the trees and flowers. How to draw happiness from ourselves, from a full working day and from the light it can cast into the mist around us."

Matisse himself shows us how to do this.

Beaver's, Victoria College's licensed folk club is open again tonight, and features Juno award-winning folk artist, Dave Nicol. Nicol is best known for his popular album and single "Goodbye Mama". Beaver's is located in the Terrace Room of Wymillwood, at 150 Charles St. West. Also dropping in for a guest set are two dudes from Wyoming, Mike Choman and Russ Procassini.

As for the concert scene, Renaissance is featured at Con Hall tonight. $4 student tickets should still be available for students from the SAC office. A couple of biggies are also in Toronto next week. Donovan is at Massey Hall on Monday, Dec. 2, and George Harrison and friends are at the Gardens Friday the sixth. Strangely enough, CPI is advertising that tickets for the Harrison show are still available, so that news should be at least worth a phone call.

At the local clubs you can also catch some interesting action. The El Mocambo features the National Lagoon Show through Saturday and has the always pleasing Good Brothers coming in next week. At Egerton's Bob Dylan's old pal Artie Traum headlines until Saturday, and is replaced next week by Terry Jones & Hummingbird. At the Chimney you can catch Bruce Miller tonight and tomorrow, and Chris Kearney all next week. rb

The hammer is coming down, but if you still care to step out for some entertainment, there's a lot to see: a frustrating tossup on Sunday afternoon . . . 3:30 at Scarborough College, the Canadian Brass, a fabulously good brass quintet, will be giving a concert. Perhaps you should take that in if you don't have tickets now for Anton Kuerti, who's giving concert No. 5 in his Beethoven series. This week it's Sonatas number 20, 9, 14 (moonlight) and 28. If you haven't been yet, try to go. Anton, we love ya.

Tomorrow evening at 8:30 is an early chance for you yuletide folks to get it going: the Toronto Chamber Society will be giving a concert of Christmas and Advent music, including Bach's Cantata No. 36. It's at St. Patrick's Church, 141 McCaul St. near Dundas W., admission $4, students $2.50. Deck the halls . . .

Just thought I'd let you know dept: the Julliard quartet is performing at the St. Lawrence centre on Saturday night, too. No tickets available now.

You probably know "The Planets" by Gustav Holst, but did you know that this year marks his centennial? CBC pays tribute

Tuesday night on the AM station at 8:03 p.m. This is part of a series called Gustav Holst: Planet Maker that runs until Dec. 29.

Good lineup at the TSO this week: Kazimierz Kord leads the musicians in a musically varied program sure to please: Bach's Concerto for 2 Pianos in C features pianists Juji Takahashi and Peter Serkin (the talented son of the talented father Rudolf Serkin). Following is Bartok's Spectacular Concerto for Two Pianos, Percussion and Orchestra, adding percussionists Robin Engelman and John Wyre to the mix. After intermission, it's Brahms' Symphony No. 3. The program runs Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday nights and students are welcome to get the rush tickets at $2.

And a freebie for the cheap and poverty-stricken: Tuesday at noon at the Royal Conservatory the trio of Janice Taylor (contralto) Ronald Taylor (flute) and Susan Remeny (harp) gives a free lunchtime concert.

Those craving diversion from boring term papers have plenty to choose from this week. If you had hoped to see—or rather hear—Back to Methuselah at Hart House, and you are not a subscriber, sorry, they're sold out. (Closes November 30). On campus, at the Glen Morris St. Theatre, December 4, 5, 6 and 7—Bloomers, a selection of plays from the Jazz Age by T. S. Elliot, Katherine Mansfield, Lytton Strachey and Virginia Woolf. (Free admission).

Off campus, my first choice would be Sheridan's witty and elegant The Rivals at the St. Lawrence (November 26—December 21.) Note that the performance on December 2 will be a benefit to help TWP.

Factory Theatre Lab's Hurrah for Johnny Canuck also sounds good for a bit of comic relief (opens November 30); or you might try Carol Bolt's new play, Shelter, billed as a "surrealistic burlesque". (See interview and review this week. Runs November 21-December 7). Lovers of surrealism might enjoy Pinter's The Homecoming being presented by Menagerie Players at Central Library Theatre (December 3-21). Passé Muraillé's latest offering is Mural Paradise advertised as "Complete Musical Theatre". What that is exactly you'll have to find out for yourself. (Runs November 28-December 8). The much-praised St. Nicholas Hotel, second in Reaney's Donnelly series, is still at Farragon, and Global Village, they are working on Tennessee Williams favourite amongst his own plays, Outcry. Both should be well worth an evening away from the library. The Improvisation Festival has been faking it for the last week; it continues till December 7. Finally, Cheap Seats Theatre's Brecht play, The Exception and the Rule has one more Sunday to go—December 1 at the Colonnade. fp

One of the most important duties of the artist is to pass on his art to the next generation.

This is especially true in ballet, where no amount of Laban notation can teach a child the correct positions of the arms.

The other half of dance—the audience—must also be educated in the traditions of the genre.

The Junior Women's Committee of the National Ballet has a continuing program to instill an appreciation and an understanding of classical and modern ballet in the school children of Toronto.

Their program of events for 1974-75 includes visits to schools with films, slides, music and costumes; special student matinees of The Nutcracker (Dec. 18 and 19) and of Coppelia (in the spring season); and just this week at the St. Lawrence

Town Hall, Spectrum, a focus on ballet.

Charles Kirby, a character actor for the National and a choreographer for the school program, narrated and danced his way into (dare I say it), the hearts of everyone present.

Kirby's history of dance, was intelligent, interesting, and not in the least condescending, a fault too often too common to many shows for children. His radio mike allowed him to demonstrate folk steps while describing them and gave him the freedom to talk with the volunteers from the audience in the mime sequence.

Vanessa Harwood and Jeremy Blanton danced to illustrate Kirby's history.

All in all, it was an afternoon well spent.

folk and jazz now

Last Friday night, November 22, students of the dance programme at the Benson building presented an evening of dance—contemporary, folk and jazz.

The program began with two young women in traditional Hungarian dress doing a lively dance known as a Czardas. Then came a humorous improvisation by the contemporary dance group executed so smoothly one would have thought it frequently rehearsed. The costumes in one of the improvisations were particularly interesting, in red, pink and orange flashed across the stage in rapid succession, suggesting the bright, fanciful movement of the city. Next on the program, the Modern Jazz Performance Group, energetic, hip-swinging young dancers, moved to throbbing popular music. Here was music and dance to suit every taste.

One of the evening's highlights was an adaptation of Charles Weidman's choreography for Bach's Christmas Oratorio, performed by the contemporary dance ensemble. Three groups of dancers moved over the floor in intricate patterns, one group repeating and varying the movements of another, reflecting in dance Bach's musical form.

Then, in contrast to Bach's dynamic music, this same group performed the delicate and stately Pavane by Purcell.

The evening of heterogeneous dance styles ended happily with the audience being invited down from the bleachers to participate in some folk dancing which required as much energy as this reviewer could possibly muster. david shapiro

Coach to concessionaire

MONTREAL (CUP) — Everyone in Europe receives some training in the concepts of the importance of nutrition in sports according to Nick Timtsenko, coach of the women's volleyball team at the Loyola campus of Concordia University. Timtsenko is now involved in a program to make sure some Concordia students learn the same things.

"All through school people are taught how to develop their minds, but they are never given any information about their bodies. A great deal of people in varsity sports don't understand just what their bodies can take. My volleyball girls probably spend about 300 hours a year on sport, but they don't understand what it is doing to their bodies. This program is trying to show them that without the proper nutrients maximum performance can never be reached and also that disease can result if their bodies are not properly taken care of," he said. The lectures have touched on everything from the fact that steak has a higher fat content than hamburger, to the need to eat some fat as it is rich in vitamins A, K, and D.

A good breakfast was shown to be the most important factor in maintaining a physical peak during the day because it maintained the level of body glucose at its proper balance.

Timtsenko, who spent three weeks in the Soviet Union learning these programs hopes it will spread to men involved in sports as well as his women's volleyball team. At first they were the only students but now some bio-phys-ed students are getting involved.

Blues face Western tonight

By DAVE STUART
Tonight, the hockey Blues host the Western Mustangs in the Bloor St. Ice Palace at 8:00 pm.

All the ingredients are present to make this one of the best efforts the Blues have put out this season.

Varsity fans will recall that it was these very same Mustangs that upset the Blues 6-4 in the semi-finals last year, eliminating Toronto from the OUA A championship. The Queen's Cup, emblematic of OUA A supremacy, had belonged to Toronto the previous eight years.

The Blues will be out to prove Western was not the better team, not to mention the satisfaction of defeating the school that took the Vanier Cup away from the Varsity football team.

Secondly, the Blues have not been playing up to potential lately and are about due to snap out of the doldrums with a goal-scoring spree.

Doug Herridge currently leads the Toronto squad in scoring with 10 points on two goals and eight assists. Herridge is a strong skater and functioned primarily as a tenacious checker last year, but now, in his second year with Varsity, has taken to setting up his linemates for goals.

Blues are at present resting in third place behind Ottawa and York who are given second place on the basis of goals for and against.

The Varsity — Brian Pei

Blues' biggest spree this season was against the Ottawa Gee-Gees. Varsity won 8-3. Blues face tougher opposition from Western tonight.

Basketball Blues dump Ryerson Rams 109-69 at Ryerson Tuesday

By DAVE STUART

The basketball Blues, Tuesday night, showed some of the form that led to their 12 win-2 loss season last year.

The Blues ran all over the Ryerson Rams at the Ryerson Emporium, dumping them 109-69. Actually, according to the Blues' team, the score should have been 111-69.

The confusion, it seems, stems from the fact that both the Ryerson score keeper and statistician left at half time. Perhaps they could not face the slaughter that was taking place before their eyes. Perhaps they couldn't count any higher.

The score, in any case, was well short of the league record for the most team points. Varsity holds the record with a 134-80 win over McGill.

The game was a complete reverse of style for the cagers from their close loss to Laurentian.

Blues' shooting accuracy improved considerably. Varsity managed 47 per cent of their shots from the floor and a very respectable 66 per cent from the foul line.

Glenn Scott, a 6 ft. 4 in. forward, led the Toronto shooters with 39 points, 17 baskets from the floor and five foul shots. Scott was also the team high-scorer last year with 188 points, good for sixth place in the league.

Brian Skyvington picked up 20 points followed by McGhie with 12 and Van Cook with 8.

Backboard control for the Blues was handled by Randy Filinski grabbing off six rebounds, and Bill Francis, Scott, and Van Cook with four each.

Blues used 11 players in the game and everyone scored points. More solid team efforts like this will soon have the Blues back into contention.

Blues are currently in second place ahead of Queen's despite both teams having identical records of two wins and one loss. Blues defeated Queen's earlier to get the edge.

Tonight and Saturday, the Blues will be participating in the Naismith Tournament held at Waterloo University, in a non-league effort, but will be back Friday, Dec. 6 when they host Guelph in an exhibition game at the Benson Building.

Glenn Scott was the premier scorer against Ryerson with 39 points

Doug Herridge leads Blues in scoring with 10 points.

VOTE TODAY

If you want to vote in today's municipal elections and haven't been enumerated in Ward 6, you should telephone the City Clerk (367-8016) to find out the location of your neighborhood polling station. Then go there with proper identification and, presto, you're a bona fide voter.

You can vote if you lived in the city during the enumeration period, were 18 before September and are a Canadian or British subject.

Election crucial for reformers

By BOB BETTSON

While observers have been calling it one of the duller municipal elections in recent years, today's voting will be crucial in determining the future of the reform movement in city politics.

There are several close races which should indicate whether the voters want more of the same or are moving away from reform stance.

One of the most interesting battles is in Ward 6, which includes the university. If community candidates Dan Heap and Allan Sparrow defeat old guard leader William Archer and K. Dock Yip, it will indicate the old guard is in for a rough time.

Another key race is in east end Ward 8, one of the only wards not to elect a reform alderman in 1972, where community activist and planner Dallard Runge is once again taking on veteran politicians Fred Beavis and Tom Clifford.

Runge has gained support for his strong leadership in the local fight against Canada Metals in the lead pollution controversy. He only lost by 1,100 votes last time and appears to have a strong chance.

On the other side, the reformers will be in trouble if Dorothy Thomas is ousted by realtor Joe McNulty who is making a strong challenge in east end Ward 9.

In any case, a hard-core reform majority is unlikely because moderate reformers Colin Vaughan and Ying Hope in Ward 5, Elizabeth Eays in Ward 1, William Kilbourn in Ward 10, David Smith in Ward 11 and Reid Scott in Ward 9 appear to be certain of reelection.

These aldermen usually voted with Mayor David Crombie on major issues, sometimes joining the old guard on council in opposing the reform stance of John Sewell, Thomas, Heap, Karl Jaffary, Anne Johnston and Michael Goldrick.

One of the biggest names running in opposition to the reformers is unsuccessful 1972 mayoral candidate Tony O'Donohue in west end Ward 2. O'Donohue is trying to oust either reformer Archie Chisolm or old guard member Ed Negrige.

Michael Grayson and Horace Brown two other former aldermen are returning to the fray in Ward 10. But the real battle for second place representation, NDP organizer Joe Pantalone and black activist Pat Case are fighting an uphill battle in the primarily ethnic area where interest is low.

In Ward 3 the battle seems to be between the incumbents for top spot and a seat on Metro council, as activist Michael Hookway appears to have only an outside chance of joining Goldrick on council.

movement would spread to the boroughs has failed to come true and the city-borough split on Metro council appears likely to continue, especially with increased borough representation in Metro in the near future.

Toronto's mayoralty race has provided most of the humor in the campaign with David Crombie having to share the platform with a clown, a masked man, and several other shades of the political spectrum, from the Western Guard to the National Caucus of Labor Committees.

Unfortunately, any serious discussion of Crombie's record has been avoided.

The Toronto Board of Education will likely continue to be progressive with even more reform hopefuls elected to the new board.

Bob Spencer will probably join Dan Leckie in Ward 6. Other new reformers across the city likely to be elected include Judy Major and Vince Kelly in Ward 5, and Evelyn Cotter in Ward 2.

The Varsity — Brian Peil

Will Metro ever be the same after hard-hitting fight?

to Kilbourn appears to be between Kevin Garland and Juanne Hemsol, both reformers faced with a strong challenge from John Bosley, a conservative planner.

Ward 7 is again a bitter fight with Gary Stamm, an economist, battling community activist Janet Howard for second spot behind John Sewell.

In Wards 3 and 4 the incumbents appear to be safe: Joe Piccinninni and Michael Goldrick in Ward 3 and Art Eggleton and George Ben in Ward 4.

In Ward 4, now without reform

In many wards the battle is for the Metro council seat. In this battle the reformers are expected to do well, with Heap and Sewell likely to join Goldrick and Johnston on Metro council.

Once again, the city election seems to provide the only excitement in an otherwise dull election year around Metro. There are likely to be few changes in the other five boroughs with only one serious mayoralty race and more of the same on councils.

The reformers' fond hope that the Vandalism mars election campaigns

On the eve of today's municipal election, four incidents of vandalism have marred an otherwise quiet political scene.

In the most serious incident, Ward 11 alderman candidate Pauline Shapero's car was burned and police suspect arson. Because of Shapero's conservative views, right-wing groups are not suspected.

But last Thursday the Ward 4 headquarters of Pat Case and Andy Stanley was vandalized as a brick flew through the window late at night.

Both Stanley and Case are members of the Communist Party. Case is black.

There have also been break-ins at Ward 6 community candidate Allan Sparrow's headquarters, and a brick was thrown through Canadian Liberation Movement candidate Larry Haven's headquarters in Ward 8. Both have charged that the Western Guard, a right-wing group, is probably involved.

Stanley, Case, Sparrow, Ward 6 alderman Archie Chisolm and several black community leaders sent a letter to Mayor Crombie denouncing the attacks and asking him to request police vigilance.

Crombie agreed and issued a statement in which he "deplored the disruption of any candidate's campaign and defend the rights of political groups to be heard without fear of violence and persecution."

On top of the $250 damage, the landlord of Case's storefront wants to evict the group.

Ottawa students rally to protest OSAP today

Students at the University of Ottawa are holding a day-long study session today to protest provincial government inaction on reform of the Ontario Student Awards Program (OSAP).

The study session, undertaken with the blessing of the university administration, follows a boycott Thursday at which 600 students met to discuss their complaints about OSAP.

University of Ottawa students are to meet with Ministry of Colleges and Universities representatives today or tomorrow to discuss their grievances.

The Ottawa students have been sent a telegram of support from U of T, said SAC external affairs commissioner Susan Rich.

Rich, who is also on the executive of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS), says the Ottawa students' demands are based on resolutions passed at an OFS conference held at the beginning of October.

"They just got fed up waiting around for something to be done," said Rich.

The demands which the OFS conference made include: Increased OSAP grants to offset cost of living increases; indexing of SAP to the cost of living; a reduction of the OSAP loan ceiling from its present $800 to $600, with further money an outright grant; subsidized interest rates on loans; lowering of independence age to 18; and discontinuation of parental contribution factor for those under 18.

At U of T, students met last Thursday to form an ad-hoc group to launch a petition campaign for changes in OSAP. Similar campaigns have begun at Brock, Fanshawe, Ryerson and Western campuses.

The campaign follows a report issued by the U of T housing service early last month, indicating that the cheapest a U of T student could possibly hope to live — $37 per week — was $5 higher than the OSAP assistance level of $32 per week. The housing service also predicted a 25 percent cost increase next year.

The OSAP cost of living allowance was pegged at $32 for this year despite recommendations from student awards officers across the province that the level be set between $34 and $40 for 1974-75.

Representatives of OFS had met with representatives of the ministry earlier this fall, but despite predictions from "a reliable source in the ministry" that the cost of living allowance would be upped by $8, no increase has been forthcoming.

OFS hopes to collect 50,000 signatures on petitions to present to the ministry from the more than 150,000 post secondary students in the province, over 30 percent of whom receive OSAP assistance.

At the University of Ottawa, the campaign is directed towards a $15 per week aid increase, and for the government to reduce payable loans to $600.

About 4,500 of the university's 10,000 students receive financial assistance, from either Ontario or Quebec.

CUSO-SUCO may split this weekend

By ROBIN PHILPOT

It looks as though CUSO-SUCO, the government-funded organization involved in overseas development, is heading for a split between its Anglophone and Francophone divisions.

The troubled organization's fate will be decided this weekend at its annual meeting in Ottawa when the anglophone members of the board of the directors present a resolution to split the corporation into two separate corporations.

CUSO-SUCO (Canadian University Service Overseas and Service Universitaire Canadien Outre-mer) is a non-governmental corporation with a $7 million budget involved in international development. Most of its funds come, however, from the federal government through the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA).

The crisis in CUSO-SUCO was provoked last March when the anglophone-dominated board of directors refused to ratify SUCO's demand for the resignation of its own executive director, Ronald Leger.

Leger has opposed SUCO's budget, which had proposed an increase of funds for their program of Canadian public education, but maintaining their overseas program.

The anglophone reaction, as well as Leger's, came in fear that CIDA would limit the CUSO-SUCO general budget in opposition to SUCO's increasingly radical stance in educating the Canadian public.

CUSO and SUCO representatives then returned to their respective constituencies, reexamined the question, and came up with models to salvage the organization.

SUCO's model was based on the principle of two parallel associations within one corporation, where one sector would not interfere with the other's programs, but where there would exist guaranteed means of cooperation in the fields of recruitment, Latin American and Asian development programs.

CUSO's model proposed the dissolution of the existing corporation, thus forming two separate bodies.

The resolution to be presented to the annual meeting this Saturday is based on this model.

SUCO is strongly opposed to the anglophone resolution because its model provides no guarantee of cooperation if the organization splits. SUCO representatives also think the public image of both groups will be damaged both here and abroad.

However, SUCO representatives said the most important reason they oppose the resolution is their fear for the very existence of the organization. If there is a split, CIDA may be much less inclined to grant money.

From the time CUSO-SUCO was founded in the 60's, after a UN proposal that all developed countries adopt the goal of putting one percent of its Gross National Product into international development, CUSO and SUCO have gone their own ways.

While CUSO remained tied to English-speaking universities, and dominated by faculty and students with liberal or conservative viewpoints, SUCO divested itself of direct university affiliations and assumed a decidedly more radical direction.

In the past few years, SUCO has developed a radically-oriented program of public education in Canada which parallels its overseas program of cooperation with third world countries.

The program, however, has proved to be at odds with both Canada's foreign policy and its immigration policy.

In 1973, its "Operation Angola", which included rallies, speakers, and demonstrations, attempted to point out how Canada participated in the fascist regime in Portugal, and hence in the oppression of the people of Angola.

The tacit and often open support of Portugal by the Department of External Affairs was the target of this program.

More recently, SUCO has publicly opposed the deportation of 1,000 Haitian workers living in Montreal. SUCO accuses the Canadian Immigration Department of sending Haitians back to almost certain death at the hands of Haitian strongman, Jean Claude "Baby Doc" Duvalier.

A revolution be far behind?

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Canadian government is currently negotiating the purchase of $200 million worth of riot-control vehicles from Brazil.

According to the British weekly, Latin America, a Canadian colonel was in Brazil checking out the suitability of the Brazilian products.

Canada is choosing between five different vehicles made by the ENGESA corporation, but is most interested in an armoured car which is "made to combat guerillas and disturbances in the streets", according to the company.

The cars will be equipped with a 90mm cannon or a 7.2mm MAG machine gun.

Canada is asking NATO for permission to transfer sophisticated NATO defence armaments as advanced as any others in more developed countries.

Canada's purchase of the armoured vehicles and the plan to share military technology with Brazil in anticipation of future purchase requirements is certain to cause concern among Brazil's neighbours.

Already Brazil spends more on "defence" than any other Latin American country. A large sale to Canada would bolster the country's burgeoning military complex, as well as support the military dictatorship.

With well over one billion dollars invested in Brazil, Canada is this South American country's second largest foreign investor.

The disclosure of these armaments purchases came at the same time Alastair Gillespie, Canadian Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, was in Brazil at the head of the trade mission exploring export and investment possibilities there.

The trade mission also included representatives from Brascan (the largest industrial corporation in Brazil), Noranda, the Canadian Association for Latin America, Montreal Engineering, de Havilland Aircraft and McCain Foods.

The Grad Post EDITOR

The Graduate Students' Union is looking for a full-time editor for the Grad Post. The person hired will begin on January 6, 1975.

The editor is completely responsible for producing a four-page tabloid every other week. Outies involve researching, writing, typing, soliciting and editing all copy. He/she prepares mock lay-outs for final make-up at the printers.

Since the Grad Post is a one-person operation, the editor is also responsible for the financial operation of the paper, including advertising and bookkeeping. In addition, he/she handles any administrative duties connected with the running of the Grad Post.

Applicants must have some writing/editorial experience.

The Student as Neighbour: Why Today's Election Should Excite You

By LEE ZASLOFSKY

"I'm 41 years old and I've never once voted. I just don't feel confident enough."

— Actor Michael Caine, quoted in "Private Eye", 20 Sept. 1974

Many of U of T students who, like Michael Caine, are sexy superheroes most of the time, share his feelings of impotence today, City Election Day.

City elections seem designed to undermine the political potency of even superheroes. A long ballot, with five positions to be filled. A confusing abundance of candidates, running without party labels. To top it off, insignificant issues that anyone could cope with. An election at exam time, when all the procrastination of a whole term is being paid for in long hours of study and frantic writing. The case for forgetting the whole mess seems airtight.

In our Ward, even the mechanical part of voting seems to have gone haywire. When the voting lists were drawn up in September, hundreds of U of T students were left off due to inefficiency. At the same time, at least 740 businessmen who should have been missed were wrongly included, again through bureaucratic inefficiency. These two mistakes, if not caught in time, could have falsified the whole election.

And yet, even in the face of all the difficulties, inconvenience and confusion, it is essential that the students of this University cast their full weight into the electoral scales today. That weight could tip the balance in the whole election. And the election could be of decisive importance to the future of this country.

WARD SIX

Ward Six, which sounds like part of some mysterious hospital, includes the focal points of some of Canada's most important activities. It includes the largest concentration of hospitals in the nation, so it is the focus for health care. It includes the economic nerve centre of Canada: on Bay St., in the tallest buildings in the country, decisions are made that mean life or death everywhere in the country. It includes the administrative centre of Ontario, it includes the beacon of intellectual leadership, that torch which guides our country's thought (etc., etc.), the University of Toronto. And it includes Skid Row, Chinatown, the Islands, Yonge St., Kensington Market, the Museum... the list could go on. Each of these is the centre of activities that go on all over Canada, but find their highest expression in Ward Six. What happens in Ward Six is important, often decisively so, to everyone in the nation.

All this can be summed up by saying that Ward Six is the place where urban Canada — where most Canadians live — finds its most concentrated, most exciting, expression. Because of that, Ward Six is preeminently the place where one of the most urgent questions of Canada's second century will be answered: Can we create an urban environment that allows us to live decent lives — or will we watch helplessly as our cities become jungles?

That answer will not come all at once, definitively and forever. It will come over the years, as Canadians decide what their lives will be. It will certainly not be answered today in the voting booths. But today we at U of T can give an important part of the answer.

Listed above are some of the reasons why Ward Six has a meaning for every Canadian, why every Canadian is involved — whether he or she knows it or not — in our Ward. But there is still another component of our Ward.

Ward Six contains institutions and power centers — but, more than that, it contains people. At first sight this is a rather trite statement, but it is surprising how often this simple fact is forgotten.

Ward Six's population changes drastically twice each working day, as hundreds of thousands of workers pour into it from the entire region, and then leave it for their homes. As well, the dozens of hotels have a large, if highly transient population. All of these people have a great effect on our Ward, but only have political weight if Ward Six residents speak up for them.

The basic population of Ward Six is almost as transient as the vast numbers who join them for some part of the day.

Immigrants living in Ward Six are often here only until they can move on, to areas they find more congenial. Many office workers who live in our Ward are looking for someone with whom to settle down, or saving money to buy a home elsewhere. And then there is the huge population of travellers, hitch-hikers, hustlers, pimps, nomads, and others who come here for a while, never knowing that this is Ward Six, but knowing very well that this area is the urban focal point of Canada; where it's at.

STUDENTS AND WARD SIX

One part of the population of Ward Six is composed of students, who, like most of us here, are "only passing through". Many of them will spend years here, many will live here longer than most residents, the majority will spend a sizeable portion of their lives here.

Many students forget this, and, thinking of themselves as "transients", feel that they are not really part of Ward Six. In fact they are as much part of Ward Six as most of us who live here, if one judges by length of residence.

In another way, though, U of T students are less a part of our Ward than they might be. As "transients", they do not feel that they can relate to politics in Ward Six. As we saw above, the electoral machinery does not help anyone feel very much at home. So be it: Democracy can be awfully undemocratic.

Hopefully, everyone who has got this far will begin to question that noninvolvement — in yourself, or in your fellow students.

Because every Canadian has a stake in what happens here. Every "transient" is needed in the fight to create a liveable community in the heart of a great urban center.

That fight is a difficult one — it is one that has never been won before by our species in these conditions, and it is one that our species simply must win. That is what gives a special kind of urgency and excitement to Ward Six politics, an urgency that, for many people, far exceeds the excitement of any debate over Pierre Trudeau's temper or Bill Davis' image.

COMMUNITY VS GROWTH

The word "fight" is used intentionally, because Ward Six is a battlefield in a very big fight. In the past ten years, huge numbers of workers, astronomical sums of money, gigantic amounts of material have combined to destroy vast portions of Ward Six, and replace what has gone with what is a new city. The signs of that huge effort are all around us, and the effort is continuing. Many people, in awe of this display of human energy and intelligence, can only gasp and stand aside. Others, less naive, make sure they gain by it.

But in Ward Six there are people who, rather than stare or haggle, have begun to ask some hard questions about the whole gigantic process. Their questions can be summed up in a general one: Is this huge effort serving human needs? Is the very profound human need for community best served by a vast program of destruction and rebuilding? Are humans better housed, more intelligent — more human — now?

One answer may be found in that very feeling of noninvolvement, that feeling of uprootedness, that many students have. Certainly those students do not feel any real sense of community with their Ward Six neighbours. And those feelings are common around the Ward. So the need of a community, a frame for individuals, is probably not being served by the great boom.

What to do? Many will do nothing, secure in the hope that some day, they will "settle down" and be part of a community.

Others know that life is not like that: Community life is built, not found ready made. And they know that procrastination, whether of study or involvement, has dire consequences.

How does a student become part of the solution to urban living, rather than part of its problem of alienation and loneliness?

In Ward Six, he or she will look at some of the problems that are before his or her neighbours, and join in helping to solve them.

COMMUNITY PROBLEMS

One example of such a problem is symbolized by the courageous, perhaps doomed, fight of the Toronto Island residents to preserve their life as a community. Planned out of existence years ago, legislated against, attacked by the press, the Islanders have stood fast and need help in their efforts to show that people can overcome blueprints — and blueprint-worshippers.

Another problem, arising from the great boom in building and its frequent blindness to human needs, is that of housing. A community needs all kinds of people, or it dies or disperses. But the housing that has been built is often suited only to a narrow, well-heeled (or poor and crowded) segment of Canada's people. Tenants — among them most students — need help in fighting for good housing at reasonable rates.

West of the University, residents worry about the effects of a new athletic complex that might completely change their lives. Some of them still remember the fight against the Spadina expressway that gave Ontario a new understanding of urban needs. They need help in getting a voice in University activities in their area.

More generally, Ward Six people need help in resisting the often senseless drive for profits and prestige that, if allowed to run loose, might well ensure that Ward Six will indeed become a jungle. We need help in building a movement of people who grasp the urgency of directing our Ward away from the jungle, and towards a kind of urban life that combines excitement and a real sense of community.

I hope you will help us, and in helping us, help all Canadians to gain experience in creating a kind of urban life that, eventually, almost all Canadians will live.

Today you can help by voting in Ward Six's election, for candidates who will work to build the kind of community that I've tried to hint at. As a first step in overcoming the loneliness of the wrong kind of urban life, you must face the loneliness of the polling booth.

After today — whether or not our community-minded candidates win — you can help us by joining us in our fight to make Ward Six, your Ward, the first example of real modernity in the world; a modern city that serves its people rather than oppresses them.

So, don't wait until you're 41 or older. Get involved, get excited, and VOTE. Then, go back to your books, pass your exams, and come and help your neighbours.

RMG distorted COLA struggle

The importance of the Revolutionary Marxist Group (RMG) vis-a-vis the library workers' COLA struggle has already been blown way out of proportion. But there are a few points in the Nov. 25 Varsity letter by RMG and CUPE 1230 member Kathy Beeman (KB) which we feel must be answered. We should make clear that we are not writing in any official capacity in our positions on the executive or stewards' body, but individuals who disagreed strongly with the RMG tactics in our struggle.

The RMG too easily avoids criticism by labelling it "red-baiting" or "Machiavellian". The reality of the situation, which KB attempts to confuse, is that the majority of our members opposed the actions of the RMG and considered them injurious to our struggle. It is typical of the RMG that they choose to respond by defending the principle of freedom of speech, rather than analysing the concrete effects of their actions. It is their concrete actions, not their right to their ideas, that is being questioned.

As the author of the RMG letter states, the present union leadership ran on a platform that included the encouragement of open discussion within our union on issues that affect library workers. We also spoke a great deal of union democracy, building unity within our local, and building alliances on the campus. There are people who fear that one sectarian group or another will come to dominate the union through this kind of policy, but the majority of our members consider these union policies desirable and necessary.

The RMG letter says, "I would dispute that many stayed away from the demonstration—the turn-out met our expectations." But, the fact is that the RMG intervention did cost us support. It is true that 200 library workers came out—but this was in spite of, not to the credit of, the RMG. It was the library workers' determination to get a COLA increase, the fine organizing work of union committees, and the disassociation of the union from the RMG, that must be credited for a successful demonstration.

The reality of the situation, as L. Techniski states in the Nov. 18 letter, is that large numbers of union members, previously inactive, were becoming involved in the COLA struggle. The majority of our members, who have not attended union meetings, much less demonstrations, were agreeing to come out to a noon-hour demonstration to back up our demands for a cost of living adjustment. We are in a period when the level of interest, activity and unity in our local is slowly building. The day before a demonstration is a time when maximum unity is called for in the ranks of a union.

At noon on Nov. 11, a literature table with the banner "Revolutionary Marxist Group support the library workers" appeared in the Roberts lobby. A leaflet explaining the COLA struggle and the necessity to overthrow capitalism was distributed to all library workers and posted on official union notice boards. It was signed by "Revolutionary Marxist Group, Sympathizing Section of the Fourth International", and by "Kathy Beeman, CUPE 1230," known to most union members as a member of our official cost-of-living committee.

These actions were met with an angry and critical response, not just from individuals like L. Techniski as the RMG implies, but from large numbers of people throughout the local. From the signature, the union's name on the leaflet, and its appearance on union bulletin boards, many assumed that it was officially endorsed by the executive, the COLA committee, or the president. (The RMG does not understand how this inference could be drawn!)

Many angry phone calls were exchanged. Petitions were circulated urging disassociation of the union from any parties on the "right" or the "left." Some suggested that KB should be expelled from the union for divisive actions which violate an oath of union membership, "that I will not knowingly wrong a fellow union member." Others suggested that the demonstration be called off until this whole matter was cleared up.

At a meeting of the old and new executives, COLA committee and shop stewards, it was agreed that the union should officially disassociate itself from the RMG in a leaflet the morning before the demonstration. This was done. For some people, the confusion was thus cleared up and they agreed to attend the demonstration. But for many who were already nervous about attending, the RMG action was the decisive factor in their decision not to attend. Also, it became necessary to spend a great deal of valuable time the day before an important demonstration, eliminating confusion about a group that is really quite unimportant to our union.

The RMG states that its intentions were in no way devious or opportunistic. They claim they abided by the decision taken at a union meeting regarding outside support on our demonstration (no leaflets were to be handed out except those of the two unions). The intention of that motion was clear: we did not want outside groups confusing our struggle by handing out their own analysis & demands and implying connections with our union. The RMG chose to ignore the intent of that motion and to circumvent it by doing exactly what we did not want to see done on the demonstration, but a day early, in the Roberts lobby.

The RMG claims that it is the only group that mobilized support beyond the library and the GAA. But CUPE 1230 had specifically agreed that we were not attempting to mobilize broad support for this first picket line, although we welcomed support on the basis of the unions' COLA demands. This demo was intended to be primarily a show of strength of our own union and the GAA, and we would seek broader support at a later stage.

It is not our intention to discourage support from others workers and students on this campus. Our union is aware that the problems we face are not peculiar to library workers. We hope to build alliances on the COLA issue and on many other issues in the future. But alliances are built on the basis of mutual interests and mutual support. We can only judge possible allies on the basis of their actions.

Kanowitch plays reactionary role

The letter of Seymour Kanowitch, which appeared in The Varsity Nov. 20, '74, contains a misrepresentation of the SAC position on the Banfield incident. His second point of reiteration stated: "SAC does not feel that SDS should go unpunished for their actions in the 'Banfield incident.'"

At no time did SAC take a position on the guilt of SDS or on the need for punishment. Indeed, SAC has always emphasized the need for a just trial, which would handle such matters and which the 'Kangaroo' tribunal, Caput, could never provide.

SAC has also emphasized that they do not support the actions of SDS. However, to extrapolate the necessity of punishment from either of these two points is reading between non-existent lines.

In addition, statements acceding to the necessity of punishment will only fan the embers of vindictiveness and add unnecessary encouragement to the harshness of any penalty.

Seymour Kanowitch, can now stand proudly beside the reactionary elements of the faculty, who have been making the same type of demands.

We, the undersigned member of SAC, protest the action of the president of the Students Administration Council and call on Seymour Kanowitch to rescind his false statement.

Varg editorial ignores Malthus

I found the Varsity editorial of Nov. 25 lacking of any sound reasoning for its cries that education will "inevitably suffer" as a result of government cutbacks in educational spending.

Does the editor take us to be so naive as to believe that allocations are based upon a dart-board-like decision process, or upon the whims and prejudices of a small group of bureaucrats? Even the limited amount of economic theory that I possess would indicate otherwise. If we are to gain some form of control over our runaway economy the brakes must be applied to spending and education is no exception.

The editor states that spending on non-salary items has been cut already. This might keep more prof. out of the lab and put them in the classrooms, which I believe should be their primordial consideration. It certainly wouldn't hurt our education. Now, about the main point of the cutbacks—salaries. It's a well known fact that things are becoming economically tighter all over the world, and I hardly think that if salary increases are being decelerated in one of the richest areas in the world, similar phenomena are not occurring elsewhere.

The editorial further insinuates that this type of government action is peculiar to education. Not only is this false, but cutbacks are becoming more prevalent in private industry and will continue to do so into the future. Anyone who thinks that the upward spiral of prosperity, on a finite planet with an exponentially increasing population and dwindling natural resources, is unlimited, should take another look at the problem. Alternatives to western scientific medicine discussed

By ANN SILVERSIDES
 "Chinese medicine is preventive medicine, ours is disaster medicine" said eminently quotable Dr. Eli Cass at the seminar, Alternatives to Western Scientific Medicine, held Tuesday at Hart House, the last of a series on medicine sponsored by the student Christian Movement.
 Elizabeth Kilbourne, chaplain at the Queen Street Mental Hospital and the Toronto general Hospital, and Cass, former Metro Coroner and founding member of the Acupuncture Society in Ontario were the two invited speakers.

Kilbourne began by exploring the wide dimensions of health care; she observed that very often an inability to cope with pain and isolation in society can lead to psychosomatic illness and mental disturbance.
 She stressed how much our total environment and activities determine health and sickness.
 The Chinese, Cass pointed out, have traditionally conceived of health as based on the unity and harmony of the psyche and soma, thus establishing a more encompassing view of health and disease than our present one.

"Our medicine," he said, "focuses on the cell. We think that if you can detect physiological imbalance in a cell you can prevent disease. The Chinese, on the other hand, have relied on pulse diagnosis. If you can detect imbalance in the body's flow of energy, then you can prevent the development of a pathological disease."
 Mary New, a biostatistician who went to China recently to examine the system of health care, remarked the Chinese claimed to have no real problem with mental illness.
 The organization of society into communes, they said, gives the necessary support and sense of community to prevent the development of mental illness. Studies of Hutterite and Mennonite communities have revealed the same phenomenon.

New also described health care administration in China, as decentralized, relying on the services of the "barefoot doctor", a paramedic who operates within the community with a minimum of three months academic training. The barefoot doctor apprentices to a doctor to diagnose and refer patients to hospitals, which operate at a county level.
 As Cass discussed acupuncture, Ken Wyman (who describes himself as "a medical para-bureaucrat") was quick to point out that acupuncture is presently a fad, and consequently draws attention from the larger issue of alternative medicine and the exploration of other approaches, such as Western folk medicine and Naturopathy.

He also said that the incorporation of acupuncture into Western scientific medicine does not necessitate a rethinking of the basic philosophy behind our medicine.
 Cass agreed, adding that students are taught by doctors with a particular attitude, which is for the most part assimilated by the students and perpetuated in their practice.
 Cass said removing concern with financial remuneration (such as putting doctors on a salary) would be a step in the right direction.
 He pointed out that "in pre-revolution China doctors were paid once a year, and if one of the doctor's patients got sick, the doctor had to pay for all care and treatment."
 Cass thought, however, that teaching acupuncture was a means through which students and doctors would become familiar with and further explore alternative attitudes to medical care.

INDIA—Workers in New Delhi and in the state of Bihar went out on a general strike Nov. 4, to protest official corruption and inefficiency. The strikers also condemned the government for failing to cope with inflation and unemployment.

Twenty-five thousand police called out by the Indian government arrested or detained more than 1,000 people. A Reuter report described the police turnout as one of the largest in the Indian capital.

The strike was called to support the struggle waged by the populace against the corruption of the state government and its officials. The people in Bihar have continued for several months to condemn the state government for its failure to solve the problems of inflation and unemployment.

They are now demanding the resignation of the state cabinet and the dissolution of the state assembly. Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi has rejected this demand.

WEST GERMANY—The current typhus epidemic in southern West Germany, which already has killed at least three persons, was not brought to the region by immigrant workers, as bourgeois media sources are publicly accusing, but stems from poisoned food of the Grenz food company.

Fourteen tons of poisoned potato salad were delivered to stores and supermarkets in the southwest region between September 21 and 28. By November 3, 226 persons were sick with food poisoning, and the number was increasing daily.

Although the state health authorities are aware that the Grenz Co. potato salad caused the deadly typhus epidemic, they have taken no initiative to remove it from the shelves, much less to warn the population not to buy the food. It is assumed that the health officials do not want to risk being sued for "damaging a company's business".

WEST GERMANY II—Two hundred immigrant workers, Turks and Spaniards, and 50 West German workers demonstrated in Giessen Oct. 26 to protest the West German government's cut-off of family allowances for the families of immigrant workers.

Varsity gymnasts take a third

The Varsity — John Fair

Hans Frick led Varsity with a first on the pommel horse.

By JOHN FAIR
Hans Frick led the Varsity gymnasts to a third place finish in the first meet of the season held at York University Saturday night.

First place went to the York squad with 179.6 points. Queen's came second with 159.6 followed closely by Toronto with 157.8 points.

Other teams at the meet included Western, Carleton, Nova Scotia, Ottawa, RMC, and some visitors from Eastern Michigan.

Varsity participated with largely the same team as last year, losing only Steve Mitruk and Peter Mezeros to graduation.

Hans Frick was the over-all individual winner with 49.5 points, placing in most his events. Frick took a first on the pommells with an 8.5, second on the rings and high bar with 8.05 and 8.3 respectively, and a third in vault and parallels with 8.45 and 8.6 respectively.

Good showings by John Kelly, Brian Euler, the team captain, Chester Markle, and Ron Ellis auger well for the future performances of the team.

The Blues' next meet is not until after Christmas.

Nov. 16, the national judo team travelled to Munich for the German Open International Judo Championships.

Over 400 competitors from 10 countries gathered together to compete at the olympic site in a single elimination tournament.

CHRIS PREOBRAZENSKI, a graduate Varsity student and national champion placed fourth in the 205 lb. division in a field of 50 competitors.

Other team members who placed were, Robert Arbour from Quebec (3rd in 139 lb.) and UBC student Gary Hirose (4th in 176 lb.).

To further their chances at the '76 Olympics the team is travelling to Japan in the spring for intensive training.

BADMINTON

Over the weekend, the Lady Blues badminton team came on strong in the second tournament of the season at McMaster to snatch first place from Western.

The entire team, all won their own singles matches.

Varsity now leads the league with 80 points followed by Western with 73, Queen's with 65, Guelph with 63, and Waterloo with 55 points.

Toronto holds the first three places in the doubles division with the combinations of Cozzardini-Edroos, MacKeigan-Fournier, and Stone-Cooper.

Edroos and MacKeigan also hold the top singles spots.

The girls next meet is at Ryerson on Jan. 17.

SOCCER FINALS

On Friday, Nov. 22, soccer history was made. Upon a grim, cold field known to some as Front Campus, Dents B sank their teeth into the formidable New College team and walked away with a 3-2 victory.

Pharmacy swallowed the bitter pill of defeat on Thursday with a 3-2 win for Dentistry, allowing them to enter the finals.

The Dents team has a lot to smile about. They came from the bottom of the league last year to grab first place this season. Most noted for this ascent to stardom is the topnotch defense; Brad Harper's record goal tending (5 goals in 8 games) combined with defense men Felix Nuforo and Jerry Vanc.

With only one cavity and 4 goals in the final two games of the season, forward Herman Kupeyan is grinning too.

Hockey Blues dump Western 5-1, Friday

By PAUL CARSON
The hockey Blues seem to have found the cure for the pattern of sub-standard performances that have plagued the team this season.

The solid 5-1 victory over Western Mustangs Friday at the arena was only an exhibition game; nevertheless, Blues did a lot of things very well and what might be called a "nothing" game since it doesn't count in the standings could be the game that turns the entire season around.

Maybe it was the presence of last year's scoring leader, Don Pagnutti, in the lineup; maybe it was the heavy-hitting style the team adopted; maybe it was the opponent since Blues were undoubtedly inspired against the team that knocked them out of the playoffs last year.

"It was probably a combination of all three", said coach Tom Watt afterwards, "since Pagnutti is only one player and I think the result shows we played very well as a team."

Western's Pete Fraser stops a Varsity goal attempt.

As an example of the newly-found teamwork, Blues outshot Mustangs 33-16, but eight of Western's shots came in the first period and 'Stangs managed only three shots during the entire second period.

Varsity exploded for as many shots in the third period, 16, as Western managed in the entire game and but for two unlucky goalposts and some fine work by the visitor's goaltender the final score might have been much higher.

Defenceman Warren Anderson shook off his personal slump with two goals and some fine defensive work in his own end.

Anderson opened the scoring at 1:15 beating Bruce Steffler from the right boards during a Varsity powerplay.

The LGMMB and 800 fans were still celebrating that score when Gord Davies poked home a loose puck from a goal-mouth scramble only 15 seconds later.

Doug Herridge upped the count to 3-0 with the only goal of the second period and Ron Harris made it 4-0 early in the third.

Anderson concluded Blues' scoring after Steffler made one of his four excellent stops on Varsity breakaways. His defencemen failed to clear the puck, and Anderson rushed in from the blueline to flip the puck into the empty net.

"Since our rookie defencemen have played so well, Warren hasn't been getting as much ice time so far as he is accustomed to," Watt said. "I know some people have been criticizing him but he understands why the new players are being used so much and anyway, how do you criticize someone who scores two goals for you?"

Anderson's timely return to form was matched by his defence partner, veteran Brent Swanick, who set the pattern early with three crunching bodychecks.

Since Swanick prefers finesse to force, his use of the body against the normally rough Mustangs had a favorable effect on the other Blues, who immediately began to follow suit. Consequently, Western players often shied away from the corners as Blues pounded every purple sweater in sight.

Pagnutti didn't figure in the scoring but his presence compensated for the absence of Kent Ruhkne and seemed to give Blues a new sense of confidence.

Pagnutti is still playing himself into shape for his league return after Christmas but based on just one game his penalty-killing is as tenacious as ever and his ability around the net should be a major asset.

Ruhkne was sidelined by an achilles tendon that should be cured by the belated arrival of a proper fitting pair of skates while Swanick's stretched knee was Blues' only injury during the game.

Mustangs are certainly as tough as the 1973 squad with both Steffler and Chris "the miracle worker" Catcart in goal plus Phil Howard leading the defence corps.

'Stangs are undefeated in western division play and should again be in the OUAA semi-finals come March.

Blues play for real to-morrow night as the team travels to the York zoo for a key game against the Yeomen with second place in the eastern division up for grabs. The game will be broadcast by Radio Varsity starting at 8:30 p.m.

Fencing newcomers earn fourth place at Queen's RMC tournament

Perhaps the first fencing bout occurred when Cain hit his brother Abel over the head with a jawbone.

That was a long time ago. Today fencing has changed its fervor and its rules. To kill one's opponent is considered not only unsportsmanlike, but also downright indecent; nor is a bone used anymore.

Instead, delicately balanced foils, sabres, and epees are the weapons. Manners and good taste rule.

Over the weekend they presided over the Queen's-RMC invitational fencing tournament held at Queen's. The rookie-laden Varsity team placed fourth overall behind Trent who placed first, winning all sections: foil, sabre, and epee.

Toronto was led by Bernard Tsui who won all six of his bouts. However his individual effort was shadowed by the fact his partners were defeated in crucial bouts.

Nevertheless, his team mates did well for their first year of competition. Out of a total of 18 bouts, Tsui and his partners, Rick Arthur and Brad Patterson, won 11 bouts.

On Sunday, the epee team performed quite well. Rob McLean won six of ten bouts, Rod Toms won five of ten, and Chris Nokes won two of seven. In each case, losses came by the thin edge of one point.

Blues next perform at the Benson Building on Dec. 7 in the Del Tournament. Fencers from across Canada and the US will participate.

U of T 'sliding down Parnassus;' Evans

Making good on his promise to tell the world about the latest problems the university faces, U of T president John Evans took on the business world Monday at the ballroom of the Royal York Hotel.

In a major speech to the Canadian Club (cigars after dinner for the head table, and a toast to the queen to get things rolling), Evans told the captains of industry the universities were now "sliding down

(The title is a reference to former U of T president Claude Bissell's book on his days at the university, entitled Halfway up Parnassus.)

Sliding down Parnassus, explained Evans, "is the newest intercollegiate sport — a form of institutional streaking, not in the buff, but in the red."

The intent of the speech appeared to be to inform the audience about the effects of the recent provincial increase by only 7.5 percent in the value of the Basic Income Unit (BIU) and to point out the importance of the university in a world faced with problems.

Evans outlined four major effects of the provincial increase, which the Council of Ontario Universities had urged be set at 16 percent to meet costs and salary demands.

Firstly, Evans said, the university's capacity to adapt to shifts in student interests and choices will be affected. As an example, he cited enrolments in biology, which have climbed in four years by 12 percent, while funding has dropped by 15 percent.

In the second instance, the university's capacity to meet new teaching needs will suffer, Evans said. As an example, he cited the cost of shifting medical training into the community and away from the hospital which, although exorbitant, is in the best interests of society.

Evans then dwelled at length on the threat that a cutback might compel the university to "forsake our inheritance and phase out a large part of our work in the humanities."

"The University of Toronto," Evans said, "remains as a centre of humane learning with few rivals on this continent. What is at stake here is therefore a national as well as a provincial asset."

In the fourth case, Evans warned there could be "a cutback in the research and scholarly commitment of our academic staff and, as a result, in the exposure of our students to contact with work at the boundaries of knowledge."

Evans tied the need for ongoing research to his conception of the importance of the university.

The future role of the university, Evans said, should be to cooperate with business and government in solving the problems of the world, particularly "the twin tidal waves that threaten to engulf us: rapid population growth and prospective famine."

Evans launched a sustained attack on the provincial government. "The continued unavailability of adequate capital, operating and research support for the universities will make it extraordinarily difficult to take reasonable care of our assets," he maintained.

Provincial treasurer John White, who last week said he would prefer universities not to incur a deficit next year, was rebuffed by Evans, who said for the university to either invoke massive layoffs or hold back salary increases (the other options to a deficit) "would be irresponsible behavior for any institution, and particularly so for a publicly-supported institution."

Evans stressed the importance of faculty members, saying they were the "heart and brain and muscle of the entire enterprise, an asset beyond price, an asset which is easily destroyed and difficult to replace."

"If the combination of damaging factors I have listed brings the universities unmanageable deficits or serious internal disruption from labor unrest," warned Evans, "a takeover and direct control by the government is a possibility."

In a passage which he removed in delivering the speech, but which was contained in the press copy, Evans stated: "One might almost imagine, in a fit of institutional paranoia, that there is a deliberate plot to starve and then subdue" the university. That tactic, said Evans, has not met with conspicuous success.

Evans defended the university's record in belt-tightening, saying the U of T had already effected economies by increasing student-teacher ratios, eliminating duplication and low priority courses.

However, Evans said that continuing economies at the expense of "human interactions and intellectual creativity . . . would be tantamount to open-strip mining on the slopes of Parnassus."

Evans offered his own advice cautioning, "There is no cheap way out. The system of universities . . . fundamental and applied research, teaching of students in a human and humane environment and not in a mass-production setting, should be recognized as a high priority for our society in these difficult times."

Clement gives in: some pubs will stay

By BOB BETTSON

Major concessions were made yesterday by minister of consumer and commercial relations John Clement which will mean that some student pubs can continue after Jan.

But spokesman for SAC and the Ontario Federation of Students aren't completely satisfied.

The relaxation of earlier restrictions, which would have required all pubs to be run by university administrators and ended special occasion permits which many pubs now run on, is contained in a telegram sent by Clement to the province's student councils yesterday.

But there are still some questions unresolved, SAC president Seymour Kanowitch said. "It is clear that Clement is beginning to cave in to pressure from student councils and OFS."

Kanowitch cautioned that the changes would still mean that university administrators would have to delegate power to run pubs to the student councils. Apparently there is already trouble at Waterloo University where the administration wants to take over the student pub.

Although initially university administrators were to have sole control over all university pubs, Clement stipulates in the telegram the chief administrator "can delegate authority to operate the pub to any student or student body and can earmark profits to any group."

Clement also says no facility currently in operation will be refused special occasion permits after Jan. 1.

The new legislation concerning pubs goes into effect Jan. 1.

Kanowitch said U of T officials have already assured SAC they will be willing to delegate authority. Similar arrangements are being made at the federated universities.

Although Kanowitch was pleased by what he called a "complete reversal" of government plans, there are still problems, especially with the amount of money required to make pubs meet LLBO standards, despite what Clement claims.

OFS spokesman Chris Harries, said the new statement looks like a "capitulation" but conflicts with statements made over the past few months by the minister and other officials.

"We hope it is a genuine change," Harries said. But he noted university administrators still retain the power to delegate to the student councils or revoke that right.

Students dissatisfied with pub rules

This is the text of a telegram sent by the minister of consumer and commercial relations John Clement to the Students' Administrative Council yesterday.

It attempts to explain government policy on the issue of student pubs which has come under fire recently. The telegram is a substantial change from previous statements by Clement and his deputy minister.

The purpose of the bill was to eliminate the hassle, delay and expense involved in obtaining numerous special occasion permits. Other issues that should be clarified are as follows:

A canteen licence covers the entire campus and does not restrict in any way the number of individual rooms or pubs.

Special occasion permits for student events will no longer be necessary since a simple letter to the Board requesting an extension of the existing licence to other areas without the payment of a fee will receive prompt attention.

The chief administrator can delegate authority to operate the pub to any student or student body and can earmark profits to any group.

Special occasion permits will still be available to outside groups, using university facilities.

No facility currently in operation will be refused special occasion permits after Jan. 1, but it is hoped that all student bodies will take advantage of the new licence.

Canteen licences are a convenience, plus they will save considerable time and funds. Current regulations preclude a profit being made from a special occasion permit and require food to be served.

Most facilities can meet the Board's policy as to physical requirements with little or no expense.

Over two-thirds of all post-secondary facilities have already applied for a licence and over half have already been issued, many resulting in from 10 to 15 licensed facilities on a campus.

The legislation was proposed to assist students in maintaining facilities where the lowest prices could prevail. If any student body is still having difficulty we would be pleased to meet with both the students and the administration:

People back pubs, games

Students have voted 84 percent in favor of a pub and 82 percent in favor of a games room in a poll completed by SAC this week to gain support for their proposal for the services.

Over 2,700 students replied to SAC's survey.

Services commissioner John Tuzyk says SAC will now proceed with its plans to meet the Campus as Campus Centre committee on Thursday and try to persuade it to include the pub in its plans.

Tuzyk is optimistic the committee will vote to include the pub because of the good student response to the SAC campaign.

But SAC is more worried about getting space for a games room. It is making a new pitch to the internal affairs committee of Governing Council Dec. 17 to rent the temporary building next to the SAC office now used by the School of Graduate Studies.

SAC was offered 2,000 square feet in the basement of the Science and Medicine Library but this was inadequate for its plans.

The proposal will be for rental of the SGS building for $2,000 a year. "This shows we are willing to go half way," Tuzyk said. SAC presently does not pay rent for its facilities.

The administration previously refused to allow SAC the use of the SGS building for the pub site.

SAC now feels that with significant student response the onus is on the administration to prove it is interested in providing services for students on campus.

HERE AND NOW

Be ye advised. Friday's Here and Now is the last until Jan. 8. Thus it is decreed that all Here and Now announcements up to and including Jan. 8 must be submitted by Thursday 1 p.m. Those who disobey will be thrown into The Varsity's notorious inhuman dungeon, which still contains all last year's fools who ignored our warning.

Ward Six discusses....

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Ward Six voters solidly voted for a reform slate of aldermen and school trustees for the next two years as Dan Heap and Allan Sparrow won the two aldermanic positions over old guard incumbent William Archer.

The team of Bob Spencer and Dan Leckie—both former U of T politicians—won handily as school trustees over a Young Socialist opponent.

Heap, Sparrow, Spencer and Leckie were all endorsed by the Ward Six Community Organization.

Heap polled over 6,000 of the Ward Six votes, giving him a seat on Metro Council as well as on City Council. Sparrow received over 5,500 votes, with Archer running third with about 4,300 votes. K. Dock Yip got a weak 2,500, and the three other candidates, John Combs, William Boyes and Fred Nelson, polled about 1,300, 370 and 290, respectively. The counts have not been finalized.

Sparrow, who defeated incumbent alderman Archer for the second spot behind Heap, said yesterday he "wasn't surprised at all by the results" even though he had been given little hope of knocking off Archer.

Sparrow cited Archer's voting record as the major reason for the incumbent's defeat. Ordinarily, election campaigns stress the positive virtues of a candidate and don't knock an opponent much, Sparrow said, but his campaign emphasized Archer's poor voting record on housing, development, transportation and accountability to the public.

"The people in the ward responded," Sparrow said. "They just refused to accept Archer, the Great White God from North York who thought he knew what was best for the inner city."

Sparrow also said his campaign, which was run in conjunction with Dan Heap's, worked better than Archer's campaign.

"We had about 300, many of them students, working on our campaign and Heap also had about 300," Sparrow explained. "Leckie and Spencer had about 100 working for them, too. But Archer only had about a dozen working for him. He knew he was outgunned but that's just his way of running a campaign."

"It was a clear case of people beating money," Sparrow said.

He also praised his campaign coordinator Ross Wells, a third year U of T student. "The CBC commentators told us we had the best-run campaign in Toronto."

Sparrow said there were "still a lot of things to sort out."

As an alderman he said he will be concerned with "down-zoning" the ward to protect the existing community, get more housing and push for rent controls.

Sparrow also said he accepted there wasn't going to be much change in the other wards.

But he feels it was important that Wards Five, Six and Seven went reform and sent John Sewell, Heap and Colin Vaughan to Metro Council.

Even though the council is "middle right," Sparrow said, he felt these three aldermen would "open up the whole process, rather than acquiescing like the other members generally have in the past."

If the process is opened up by people like Sewell, it will be a victory, even if the actual voting doesn't change immediately, Sparrow said.

K. Dock Yip, the former Ward Six school trustee who went down to defeat Monday, took his defeat gracefully.

"There's nothing to be disappointed about," Yip said. "Heap and Sparrow are the people's choice."

"In an election there are all kinds of surprises, and that's the way it should be in a democracy."

Yip refused to venture any opinions on the direction the city politics will take now, but said he thought Heap and Sparrow "would fight for the people."

Yip said he will continue to practise law and leave politics behind.

Yip hopes the provincial government will change the election date from December to a warmer month.

Archer, who was widely reported to have taken the defeat heavily, was unavailable for comment yesterday.

Heap and the school trustee successful candidates also could not be reached.

Incumbent alderman Dan Heap won a strong victory Monday.

Blanco speaks on Peru

Peruvian revolutionary Hugo Blanco will be speaking tonight at 8 pm at the Medical Sciences auditorium on the topic Latin America Today.

Blanco's visit has been sponsored by SAC, the Latin American and Caribbean studies department at York, the Committee for Justice to Latin America Political Prisoners as well as other groups.

The main accomplishment of Blanco's struggle in Peru was in organizing many impoverished peasants into unions to get a better deal from landlords.

But the movement was crushed by the military and hundreds of peasants were murdered. Blanco was imprisoned in 1963, tried in 1966 and sentenced to 25 years in prison.

Finally after international pressure was mounted on his behalf, Blanco was expelled from Peru and he moved to Chile where he was active on the Chilean left.

Blanco was one of the fortunate few to escape Chile after the brutal 1973 coup and has lived in exile in Stockholm since then.

He has authored a book on the Peruvian experience called Land or Death: The Peasant Struggle in Peru, written while he was in prison.

The address is part of a series of SAC speakers which included Angela Davis.

Ottawa students boycott

Students at the University of Ottawa may begin a prolonged boycott of classes in January until the provincial governments of Ontario and Quebec change their student aid policies.

Following a day-long study session Monday, students were divided as to whether to declare the boycott immediately, or wait for the results of a referendum to be held today or tomorrow.

The students prepared a list of 30 demands to the government, most of which follow demands already outlined by the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) last October.

"They were really riled up," said SAC external affairs commissioner and OFS executive Susan Rich, who was at the University of Ottawa Monday.

The day's session began with a general meeting attended by about 200 people, followed by four-hour workshops on specific aspects of student aid. A marathon plenary session attended by about 450 people ended the study session.

Ottawa student leaders met with provincial government officials Monday, although no definite conclusions were announced.

Students down, but not out

Students are down but not out in two major political battles on campus this year — the campaign for faculty-student parity on Governing Council and equal student representation on tenure committees.

According to SAC executive assistant Chris Allnutt, the future plans for student pressure depend on when each comes up for a final decision.

Although students have lost the initial votes in both cases, SAC hopes strong student pressure can make some inroads.

Students were denied parity on the Governing Council and allotted 11 seats to the faculty's 13 in a model approved by council in October. The report now goes to the Legislature for approval.

But Allnutt says the timetable depends entirely on the government. SAC has been trying for the past month to find out exactly how and when the U of T Act amendments will be dealt with in the Legislature.

But exchanges of letters with minister of colleges and universities James Auld as well as ministry officials have proved fruitless.

When the Governing Council's report comes up in the House, SAC will focus its efforts on lobbying the members by arranging meetings with ministry officials, party caucuses and the media. Letters will also be written to individual members.

But Allnutt said the report apparently hasn't even gone to the ministry from department officials. After that it must go to cabinet where the decision on how to proceed will be taken.

SAC will also try to focus earlier support from some faculty members and outside groups when the parity issue comes to the Legislature.

The student bid for parity on tenure committees was defeated at the heavily faculty-dominated academic affairs committee earlier this month. But the final decision will be made by Governing Council, probably in February or March.

The Dupuy model which excludes students has still not cleared the committee but will soon. Then the recommendations will go to the divisions for comment.

SAC is planning an eight-page tabloid for wide circulation among students in the new year.

Aside from this, efforts will be made to organize student support for parity mainly on the basis of the need for improved teaching quality.

Dominion still stumbling block

By MIKE EDWARDS

Although there are some indications that the North American grape boycott may be ended soon, one of the chief stumbling blocks to a settlement is being provided by Dominion Stores.

Pathmark stores in New York, the largest chain in the area, have agreed to only a token sale of grapes pending the outcome of a high level conference Dec. 9 in California.

A delegation from Pathmark, other American chain stores and the United Farm Workers (UFW) will meet with California Governor-elect Jerry Brown on the question of union secret-ballot elections. Brown, who has indicated he was pro-UFW, takes office in early January.

However, Dominion stores declined an invitation to participate in the discussions. Their attitude in general has been against the UFW and in favor of the agrusiness interests in California.

When presented with a petition of 35,000 customer signatures early November, the Dominion management locked the doors and refused to see anyone.

John Godfrey, full-time boycott organizer, noted that the attitude of Dominion stores was in some ways explained by their corporate structure.

Dominion stores are largely controlled by the Argus Corporation. Dominion and Argus are directly involved in several businesses connected with agriculture and food processing.

"The Argus corporation, as part of the North American agri-business, is fully aware of the threat posed to them by the UFW," Godfrey said in an interview.

"The most reactionary form of politics is usually linked to the farm industry. The Reagans, the Wallaces and the Goldwaters all have the backing of big farming and food corporations," Godfrey added.

Argus and Dominion, between them, are related to Domtar, Massey Ferguson, Stop and Shop, Safeguard Drugs, General Bakeries, Canada Paper, Sifto Salt Howard Smith Paper, Bittner's and several trust companies, banks and investment houses.

In the year ended March 23, 1974, the gross profit of Dominion stores was $93 million of which $80 million was reinvested. The current value of the total assets is in excess of $200 million.

Because of a massive stockpile of grapes in California, and because Toronto has one of the few open, North American grape markets, the retail price of grapes has been going down steadily since the start of the boycott.

The normal price of grapes this time of year is close to $1 a pound. Grapes are now selling in the discount markets at less than 25 cents a pound and are advertised in small chain stores at 35 cents a pound.

Secret-ballot elections is the key issue for the farmworkers to choose their own bargaining agent.

Because of a strong business lobby and strong-arm tactics by the Teamsters Unions, there have been no secret-ballot elections in California. Instead, Teamster bureaucrats signed so-called "sweet-heart" contracts.

These contracts, signed without ratification by the workers, called for the return of the "labor contractors" in the place of union hiring halls.

All campus polls but St-Mikes go reform

By ERIC DEL JUNCO

Returns from the 14 on-campus polling stations reflect the voting trends in Ward 6 as a whole.

The on-campus polls were set up for the benefit of students living in campus residences and were situated at the various residences from Rochdale College to St. Michael's College.

Dan Heap and Allan Sparrow, the reform team running for the aldermanic positions, topped 13 of the 14 polls.

The one exceptional poll was situated at, you guessed it, that bastion of conservatism, St. Michael's. At that poll the old guard incumbent, William Archer, came first with an overwhelming 99 votes. Heap ran a respectable second with 85 votes and Sparrow was a poor third with 42 votes. The two remaining candidates, Yip and Combs split 23 votes.

At the 13 other polls Heap and Sparrow ran first and second, Heap having a slight edge over Sparrow at 10 out of the 14 polls.

An interesting feature of the returns from the St. Michael's poll is that practically nobody there voted for school trustees. The total number of votes cast for all the aldermanic candidates at the St. Mike's poll was 252, which indicates 126 voters at that poll, assuming each person voted for two candidates.

However, the three school board trustee candidates, Dan Leckie, Bob Spencer and Pam Dineen received only six, eight and four votes, respectively.

Possibly the refusal of the St. Mike's electors to vote for school trustees was a protest against the incursion of the state into the field of education, once an exclusive domain of the church. I did say that St. Mike's was a bastion of conservatism — perhaps bastion of the reaction would be more accurate.

We're having our last staff meeting of the term today at noon. Topics of discussion include what we should include in Friday's Christmas issue and whether radical journalists should hang up their stockings as a show of solidarity with 'Red Nick'.

That's all at the same old place, second floor, 91 St. George St. All welcome.

Gee Karl, we hate to see you go

Although Toronto city politicians may seem disappointingly moderate and middle-class ("10-speed liberals" in the phrase of one columnist), they are the leaders of the Paris Commune in comparison to the pare-asse suburbanites who amble in to Metro Council once every two weeks to demand more expressways, denounce body-rub parlours, and tume about what one of them in a rare flash of wit called "Toronto's deformers".

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Where is policy?

Stripped of its technocratic jargon, and minus its purpose of informing the business community about the problems of the university, John Evans' speech to the Canadian Club Monday had one very important thing to say. Let's have him say it again himself.

"Here then is the major question for the universities, and I suggest for the province; what will be the environment of higher education for the remainder of this decade? Only in this context can the universities plan sensibly and choose the least damaging course of action."

This is indeed the major question. Are the grant cuts made by the government a response to inflation? A reaction to public hostility? A peccadillo of Bill Davis and his friends? Or a deliberate policy to shift more of the costs of higher education onto the universities?

There is nothing necessarily reprehensible about having the latter policy, although it would probably be misdirected. After all, the Commission on Post Secondary Education in Ontario (COPSEO) dealt with just this topic.

The commission was requested to study "the pattern necessary to ensure the further effective development of post secondary education in the province during the period to 1980," and to study "the costs, allocation of resources and methods of financing for post secondary education."

The report stated government should subsidize higher education for between one half and two-thirds of its cost. There were those who disagreed, and those who agree, but the report was at least clear.

There is, however, something wrong when the government has given no clear indication just what its position is on the COPSEO report. Has it accepted any, some or all of its principles? No one seems to know.

Consequently, the universities are in a bind. Should they acknowledge the government's action to be part of a consistent policy, or not? Is the government acting above or below the counter?

The provincial government must provide some clear guidelines immediately which define its policy on post-secondary education costs. Otherwise, as John Evans notes, the universities will lurch about helplessly.

RMG action did not hurt demo

In the letter in The Varsity Dec. 2, Darcy, Jewell and Mayor criticize the RMG for "defending the principle of freedom of speech rather than analysing the concrete effects of their actions." Aside from the fact that the two are related — that is, principles have no meaning unless they are put into practice, what was the effect of the RMG leaflet?

- 1) The demonstration, as the signers agree, was a great success. Despite people's nervousness about demonstrations and left groups, they turned out en masse.
- 2) At the demonstration, no left group, and there were several present, did anything to warrant such nervousness. That is, people should be relieved of the fear that the presence of such groups means confrontation or the taking over of a demonstration.
- 3) It has not divided our union. Local 1230 is as determined and as united as ever around the necessity to achieve a COLA. We must continue to be so.

4) The leaflet brought to the surface a discussion and a political division that already existed in our union and in all unions, and would have come to the surface sooner or later. That division is around the right of political tendencies to exist as political tendencies in the trade union movement.

There are people "who fear that one sectarian group or another will come to dominate the union." There are people who "do not want outside groups confusing our struggle by handing out their own analysis." There are people who think that radicals and communists ought to be expelled from trade unions. Indeed, some unions have "red clauses", to do that. (CUPE abolished the red clause at its last convention.)

But it is these ideas that are used by managements and labor bureaucrats to divide workers. In their eyes, communist equals discredited. Unfortunately, they are successful in large part because of the criminal role the Soviet Union has played in claiming that its undemocratic, repressive regime is "communist".

A "sectarian group" does not "come to dominate" — if it wants to lead it must win the agreement and respect of the membership. I, and the RMG, are in favor of full workers democracy, with debates around printed positions, complete freedom of opinion and expression for all points of view in the labor movement; and rights for organized caucuses and groups to exist and present their ideas.

The leadership of 1230 cannot stand for this "in principle" and then turn their back on it the first time it appears in practice. Rather they must show that tendencies have a right inside our union; that we can permit all sorts of analyses, and still fight as a strong, united union around the union's demands. And, in fact, the demonstration showed that this is possible. Kathy Beeman

Chileans launch petition move

Many Chileans and other concerned people in Toronto are engaged in a campaign of solidarity for the women imprisoned by the Military Junta in Chile. Hundreds of women are being kept jailed in Chile for political reasons in different places of confinement, many of them have been tortured and subjected to all kinds of physical abuse.

It is the purpose of this campaign, which has been launched on a worldwide basis, to obtain the signatures of five million women concerned with the faith of their Chilean sisters in distress. Our aim in Canada is to collect 50 thousand signatures, and all women who read these lines and wish to adhere to the campaign are invited to sign the lists which are being held in the offices of SAC and GSU.

We hope that international concern will force the Chilean Junta to free the political women prisoners and so put an end to this indignant situation.

Campbell erred on railway role

Your issue of Nov. 20 reports that Horace Campbell cited the refusal of the World Bank and western powers to finance the Tanzania-Zambia railway as an illustration of western and Canadian imperialism. Mr. Campbell may have many other examples to support his argument, but the Tanzam railway is one project on which all sides — the west, East Africa and China — have acquitted themselves responsibly.

There was a refusal by the World Bank in 1964 to build a railway from Zambia to Dar es Salaam. This refusal was based on a short report showing that to carry the expected increases in tonnage, it would be much cheaper to add track capacity on the lines to Beira in Mozambique than to build a wholly new line through Tanzania.

After Rhodesia's independence declaration in 1965, the political situation changed dramatically and the question of a Zambia-Tanzania line was again raised. At East Africa's request, Canada and Britain jointly sponsored a technical and financial study — carried out by Maxwell Stamp and Associates and Canadian Aero Service — which was presented to the Zambian and Tanzanian governments in November 1967. This report showed that a rail line from the copper belt to Dar es Salaam would be able to support itself financially, and the report recommended strongly in favour of the project.

In the months immediately following the report's completion, Zambia and Tanzania held a number of discussions on the feasibility of the project and the wisdom of proceeding with it. During this time, the British-Canadian report was not released for distribution, although at least a dozen western governments and private consortia who must have been aware of the report's conclusions, expressed to the East African governments an interest in the project. Tanzania and Zambia made no formal approaches to any western group or government in this period, simply because they had not decided how to proceed.

Finally, in February 1968, a top-level meeting took place in Dar es Salaam. The main agenda item was to have been the release of the British-Canadian report and the procedure by which potential funding was to be sought. However, information brought to the meeting by Zambia's President Kaunda altered completely the nature of the discussion. Kaunda had just returned from a Peking visit and reported that China was interested in undertaking a study of the two major technical points that had not been completely resolved in the British-Canadian study, and would possibly be interested in building the whole line.

At the urging of President Nyerere and Mr. Jamal, then Finance Minister in Tanzania, the two governments decided against releasing the British-Canadian report and against seeking other financial assistance until China's offer had been thoroughly examined. It is, I think, to the great credit of Zambia and Tanzania that they did not at that point exploit for their own benefit the obvious advantage that lay in the expressions of interest by both the west and China.

In August 1968, a delegation from Tanzania and Zambia went to Peking to probe more deeply China's interest in the rail line and to set out the next stages of the project. The main document they took with them was a summary and evaluation of the British-Canadian report. China's interest became firmly established over the next year, and she went on to undertake in an exemplary fashion one of the biggest capital-investment projects on the African continent.

The west remained interested during 1968; in fact Maurice Strong, then head of the Canadian International Development Agency, spent some time in the fall of that year working on the possibility of arranging financial assistance from a consortium of western governments. Had Tanzania and Zambia not decided to treat China's bid as preemptive, there is little doubt that financial assistance from the west would have been available.

Staff association wants 25 per cent pay hike

The past six months have seen dramatic increases in salaries in areas the U of T considers its market-place for non-academic staff. This includes the metropolitan Toronto area, and employers such as hospitals, the City of Toronto, the Toronto Board of Education, Ontario Hydro, and the provincial government.

The university personnel department did a comprehensive survey of salaries in 1971 when the salary scales for the university were established. Since 1971 the comparison of movement in salary scale between the five employers mentioned and the university is as follows:

Major Toronto hospitals: average clerical — 32 per cent; average technical — 40 per cent; City of Toronto (non-unionized): 24.5 per cent; Ontario civil service: 26 per cent; Toronto Board of Education (clerical rates): 33 per cent; Ontario Hydro (in 18 months): 38 per cent; University of Toronto: 17 per cent.

The university has fallen behind its competition. A large number of positions, particularly in the clerical-secretarial group, have been unfilled for thirty to sixty days or more; the number of junior and intermediate administrative positions are filled by less than properly qualified personnel, and a number of positions are filled by persons starting at or near the midpoint of the salary range.

In the past, the university has cited the security of university employees and stressed the other attractions of working at the university. The former is no longer true, and social progress has eroded any advantages the university enjoyed in the latter.

More to the point, fringe benefit plans at the university are no longer among the best offered and, in many cases, are below average. There is a desperate and immediate need to overhaul the pension plan, and serious consideration should be given to a dental plan if the university is to regain a better-than-average position in this sector. Also, the vacation schedule no longer rates better than average in comparison to the market-place.

These are only a few of the areas of personnel policy for non-academic staff which must be reviewed. Any improvements would incur additional costs and, for this reason, we do not recommend any changes for 1975-76.

Indeed, we see 1975-6 as a critical year for the university and we recommend that the highest priority be given to implementing an across-the-board salary increase of 25 per cent for all staff.

To us, this is a matter of survival. For the past few years, the university has been slipping behind the market-place. Unless our recommendation is implemented, the university will lose more of its staff who can most easily relocate and will retain only those who cannot move. This would quickly end inevitably result in a very mediocre level of employee, at best.

PROTEST: a brain factory

JAMES ACLAND

Large contracts breed large temptations, and it is the rare institutional functionary who can resist the urge to build the grandiose monument: and rarer still the politician who can stay the itch to spend. Fed to the teeth with timid compromise and straitened budgets, the imperial academics of the 1960s decided that a rejuvenated Canada, heady with the juice of one hundred years, should have its very own British Museum or Library of Congress. Because it developed that only Toronto had bought any books at all during previous decades, Claude Bissell, then president of the University of Toronto and Ernest Sirluck, Dean of Graduate Studies (now president at Manitoba) grabbed this juicy plum for the University of Toronto campus.

A users committee report in 1965 brilliantly summarized library needs for the next 50 years. Aiming at an eventual six million volumes, the committee stressed the preservation and safeguarding of the collection as a prime objective. And who can blame them? I feel sympathy for librarians who loathe the inky-fingered tribe of book stealers and those wretches who mark and underline a public book.

Study facilities in this provincial "reservoir" research library were to be "within the stack" with 700 locked carrels each with a window and over 1,000 open carrels. They also introduced a rare books room to enshrine some 30,000 irreplaceable volumes.

The crucial sentence in the report reads: "The building must therefore be designed with extreme care, from the inside outward." (The underlining is in the report). By God, it evidently was. Those carrel windows distorted all thinking about the plan.

On the next page the report goes on to emphasize, "By its grace of line and air of permanence, it must bespeak and create an attitude of respect for books and delight in the learning they offer. The fabric and detail of the building must have beauty as an important function." Well now, an air of permanence it most certainly has — but beauty?

Actually, I suppose that within the context of this committee report, the building is in every respect a resounding success. But today we suspect that in this age of machine information retrieval it is anarchic and perhaps dangerous to centralize advanced humanities research in a brain factory. To add rare books, special collections, a government library and a library school on top of this concentrate is to overpower the capacity for rational design.

Yet, for the scholar anxious to escape the noise and turmoil of the vulgar press, this is a dream palace enshrining in its holy mysteries the power of the word. Here is the temple and the dream of the Talmudic scholar, touching the mysteries of the faith and high reason, a hushed and holy place in which the dusty gnome glides up the escalator to his private eyrie. Here, undisturbed by importunate undergraduate students and the pressures of the telephone, the professor can dream noble visions. It is no accident that the faculty in Toronto split fairly evenly on this issue, with the scholars and the research writers all for the building as a defensive retreat and the extroverted teachers hating the repressive and arrogant disdain for the common man evident in those defensive walls.

Quite rightly, civic politicians and some local spokesmen detest this building. They recognize only too clearly the elitist nonsense which denies individual feedback and the cranky spirit of man. Here the letter kills. Despite the $41 million spent, there is a mean, niggling and ungenerous quality about this building. In spite of its size, it reflects the spiteful and petty world of those academics closed in and turning away from the world.

Some nameless genius in the New York design office, unaware of the scale and pattern of downtown Toronto, hit

With examinations and essays drawing near, the rush into Robarts has already begun. It is obvious that a building that takes up so much of a student's time should have been carefully designed. The following articles, reprinted with permission from the August issue of The Canadian Architect, suggest otherwise.

CRITIQUE: no room for change

My object in this critique is to discuss the functional aspects of the John P. Robarts Research Library, and to determine whether the objectives which the program and designers established have been achieved — and if not, why not.

The University of Toronto intended the Robarts Library to primarily serve the needs of the faculty, graduates and senior undergraduates in the humanities and the social sciences. This need was identified a number of years after the engineering and science faculties and their library facilities had been considerably strengthened as a result of the technical advances sparked by the Russian space program.

The Robarts Library was designed to offer superior library research facilities to support research and doctoral programs based on policies formulated by the University in the late 1950s and early 1960s. In 1965, the building program for the new central library complex was established.

Accessibility

Although the program for the Robarts Library (and other major academic research libraries) clearly indicated the need for the main functional elements of the library such as card catalogues, bibliographic tools, reference materials and staff — to be readily visible and accessible, the user's initial introduction to the building before gaining access is an abrupt flight of about twenty steps up to the second floor entrance level. This leads into a large impersonal area which has a curious lack of definition.

The space creates visual distraction both with its escalators rising into a central well and its signs for a coat-check room and a cafeteria. There is no real awareness that this is a library — except for a small information desk tucked away against the coat-check room. The user moves, via the escalator system, to the fourth floor level where, behind walls and doors, he find the main catalogue and reference area, and (for the first time) library staff to offer assistance.

Security

The building is designed in such a fashion that after the user has moved to the third floor level via the escalator, he is in a controlled area and can leave only after passing through an inspection point where brief cases are searched. This is an unpleasant method of maintaining library security for both library user and staff, and is not a particularly efficient system.

Surely another less authoritarian system could have been used to eliminate the embarrassing and dehumanizing aspects of security for both staff and user — and would have reduced costs. Suffice to say that some frustrated users have discovered it is possible to avoid the security check by taking an elevator to a library staff floor, using the interior (uncontrolled) stairways to reach the stacks and departing in the same manner.

Plan Shape

The selection of a triangular plan form was dictated very largely by a program requirement which required a large number of individual, lockable study carrels to be located adjacent to the main book collections. The designers responded to this requirement by selecting a plan giving a high floor-to-perimeter wall ratio, and then by placing the carrels, with a reduced ceiling height, around the peripheral walls, achieving nine levels of carrels or six main floor levels — five of them allocated to bookstacks. Despite some drawbacks of this triangular shape in terms of major library functions, the overall arrangement has been quite successful.

Bookstack Floors

In addition to the peripheral closed — carrels, typical bookstack floors contain three stack areas: open-study areas, study or seminar rooms and smoking conversation rooms, with a central core containing fixed service elements including elevators and washrooms.

None of these areas is carpeted and there are no other acoustic absorptive surfaces — except the books themselves. This is quite normal in a closed — stack library, where few users have direct access to the collection and dependence is placed on a paging and conveyor book delivery system to bring library materials to the user. Stacks have now been made accessible to almost the entire student body — as well as to extramural readers — and the stack floors are now very similar to those in a subject, divisional open-access library, where books and readers are interspersed in an environment conducive to study and research.

The stack floors of the Robarts Library, with their lack of acoustic control and an absence of library staff to provide assistance, have managed to achieve the disadvantages of both the closed — and open-access library: the conveyor system's noise and lack of carpeting are hardly conducive to serious study, and the stack floors are very large and confusing (especially to undergraduates) and some assistance may often be necessary.

Lighting

The designers have taken care to integrate the ceiling-mounted lighting system with the adjacent structure or suspended ceiling systems. The light is obtained primarily from fluorescent tubes in either triangular fixtures mounted in the recesses of the exposed concrete waffle slab or in rectangular fixtures set in the suspended ceilings. The location of light fixtures has been carefully considered in the context of the spaces and in relation to items such as columns.

Unfortunately, the building suffers from inadequate lighting levels on a number of work surfaces. (Some light readings are as low as 20 foot-candles). Insufficient attention has been given by the designers to ensure that adequate light levels are available on all study tables and open-carrels.

Furnishings

All furnishings in the public areas (with the exception of the chairs) were designed by the interior design section of the University's Physical Plant Department. The furniture is mainly constructed of African mahogany, with work surfaces finished with a dark, patterned laminated plastic. I believe a lighter colored plastic would have been a better choice, since a background that is considerably darker than the page of a book tends to draw the eye towards the background. With the low-light levels, most readers are likely to experience eye strain or fatigue if involved in an extended study period.

The furniture has been designed in a plain but sturdy manner without any particular flare. It is unfortunate that no provision was made for a local light source under the shelves of the open-study carrels. This form of lighting, with the addition of a two-pin electrical outlet incorporated into the light fixture, gives a carrel considerably more light quality and appeal, as well as potential for the use of electrical equipment such as calculators or audio-visual support.

WELCOME TO

upon the hexagonal grid and high stack tower in a sketch proposal and this grabbed the University committee's attention.

When we saw the model, a few architects in Toronto attempted to abort the birth of this monster. I remember likening it in the pages of The Canadian Architect to the more erratic ventures essayed by Frank Lloyd Wright in his later years. But to no avail. Mere architects obviously knew nothing of the esoteric world of learning and the die was cast.

The building has been most meticulously constructed and beautifully detailed, but because the wrong "parti" was chosen at the beginning, all this laborious and costly effort has been wasted. Quite simply, the initial design concept was a bad one. The basic triangular shape of the stack, over 100 feet above the street; dictates all. The stacks are profoundly disorienting. When using them it is almost impossible to maintain an axis of orientation. Books are rectangular. They stack in even rows and files, and it takes some doing to disrupt this regular pattern. Yet the triangular placement of the stacks breaks this primitive proprioceptive chain so that in every corner of the building it is difficult to relate to a sense of place. It is possible that here I am slow in my thinking, but I have never yet managed to get out of the building easily to find St. George Street to return to the School of Architecture. In vain the librarians have attempted to solve this disorientation by using complex color codings.

Outside, the results are particularly horrid as the oppressive angularity of the concrete masses jostle awkwardly out to the pavement, looming and jutting over the pedestrian. The building leaves shapeless patches of greenery which are forever wasted. Planners for the University of Toronto expansion now have a particularly dodgy problem for the Northwest campus. How can any conceivable structure be married to these frowning battlemented walls? I suppose the only hope is to leave a fire strip or killing ground surrounding the fort in good 17th century baroque pattern.

Sir Kenneth Clark defined the problem very neatly in his closing phrase to the baroque study in his "History of Civilization" series:

"I wonder if a single thought that has helped forward the human spirit has ever been conceived or written down in an enormous room: Except, perhaps, in the reading room of the British Museum."

It is difficult to believe that men nurtured in the humane quadrangles and common rooms of Victoria or Trinity could perpetrate so gauche and awkward a structure as the John P. Roberts Library.

ROBARTS

Acoustics

Unfortunately, budget restrictions eliminated the use of carpet in a number of areas containing the exposed concrete waffle ceiling slabs. This has resulted in poor acoustic conditions in many locations such as seminar rooms, technical service floors, and the open-study areas in the bookstacks.

Even with few students using study character of some of the user reference and reading areas.

Signage

The labelling and numbering of rooms is well conceived and concise, with signs which are easy to read and integrated with the fabric of the building. Color-coded maps adjacent to the main bank of elevators of each stack floor provide a direct guide to material.

There is a lack of instructional signs in areas such as the catalogue room and a number of hand-prepared regulatory signs have appeared, taped to walls and columns, indicating a deficiency in this aspect of the planning process.

Flexibility and Expansion

The potential of the triangular floor plan has been dissipated by placing fixed vertical elements such as escalators, washrooms, stairs and elevators in the central core area. Moreover, major library functions or types of materials such as documents, microforms and reference works are separated by walls or partitions, becoming separate rooms, allowing little freedom for change in future procedures.

Triple underfloor power ducts, communication systems and future needs have been built into the floor slabs in the public and staff areas. Although the library has a computer centre on the eighth floor, none of the reader areas on the five stack floors has the built-in capabilities to take advantage of the computer centre in the future, or to utilize multi-media equipment such as video viewers.

Future expansion for both staff and the collection has been planned in the stacks, technical service areas, and in the provision of compact storage for two million additional volumes on two underground floors.

Conclusions

Does the Roberts Library, designed in the 1960s with a vast capacity for book collections and ample provision for students and research scholars, meet the 1974 library and information needs of the Toronto academic community?

Let us consider the timing and duration involved in the planning, designing and building of the library. Here is the first indication of the problems now faced by the library. These factors span 13 years, beginning in 1960 with the planning of the first program, working through various committee reports, and the final program of 1965. Because of the size of the building and the many user and staff groups involved, it was essential that the planning of the library system and of the building itself be frozen at a certain point so that the designers and builders could begin their tasks.

It is unfortunate that the final planning date fell in the mid-1960s. Since then, society has experienced a radical change from the more authoritarian system to the participatory way of life. We are in an age when we are making conscious efforts to break down communication barriers, increase accessibility and foster understanding. This continuing social revolution has had a great impact on the academic campus, with dramatic changes in curriculum, student work patterns and expectations. The Roberts Library does not reflect today's concepts of either visual or actual accessibility, nor of the relationships of the current academic curriculum and work patterns to library facilities and functions.

Moreover, the planning and design of the Roberts Library failed to take into account the development of new technology in communications media and automation, and their impact on library services. In spite of space for a library computer, underfloor ducts and communication systems, the Roberts Library was not designed functionally for automated circulation, electronic book detection or the dispersal of audio-visual services and sophisticated information retrieval systems. These are but only a few of the contemporary academic library requirements that the Roberts Library has failed to meet, and the building's lack of flexibility will make it extremely difficult to make changes which will indeed respond to the changing library and academic environment.

There is no North American precedent for a research library comparable to the size of the Roberts Library. In view of its gross footage of 1,036,000 sq. ft. (including the Fisher Rare Book Library and the Faculty of Library Science) for a cost of $41,700,000 it is surprising that confronted with a project of such magnitude, the University did not seek the expertise of one or more library consultants to give independent evaluations of the policies, planning and design of the library and building. Some of the problems outlined above particularly as to the placing of the major library functions, inadequate lighting, and the lack of response to changing user attitudes and requirements — might have been rectified if such consultants had been involved at an early date.

tables or carrels on the typical bookstack floors, the mechanical conveyor system, the movement of stack staff, together with the normal user traffic to and from elevators and bookstacks, produces an unacceptable high-noise level.

Staff Areas

Budget cuts also eliminated the purchase of new furnishings for the two floors occupied by the library's technical staff. The lack of special furniture designed to meet functional library requirements, combined with the change from carpet to tile flooring, gives these areas a somewhat mean appearance — particularly when they are compared with the almost opulent

Teaching assistants at McGill ask for 10% cost of living raise

MONTREAL (CUP) — Teaching assistants at McGill University are asking for a 10 per cent cost of living increase in their salaries for next year.

David Douglas, a member of the McGill Teaching Assistants' Association (MTAA), said that the association was instrumental in getting a 10 per cent raise last year and its aim this year will be to see "that the gains made in the past year are not lost and that further improvements in TA working conditions are made."

An ad hoc committee was established by the Senate last year to investigate the situation of TAs in the university and to make recommendations to the Senate concerning TA work loads and salaries for next year.

The committee, which has the support of the MTAA coordinating committee, is made up of administration and faculty representatives, and is expected to present its recommendations before the end of the year.

"We want to make sure when these recommendations come down that university TAs are organized, and that they be in a position to take whatever action is necessary with regard to the recommendations," said Douglas.

In 1968, the yearly salary of a full time teaching assistant in the English department was $3,200. This year the figure is $3,650.

This is hardly commensurate with the rise in the cost of living, said Douglas, especially when one considers that food and rent costs, which consume nearly all the wages of a TA, have risen more quickly during those six years than have living costs in general.

"The teaching assistant fulfills a crucial function in the university, but at McGill, while TAs are aware of their importance, it sometimes appears to them that the university doesn't recognize it.

"Perhaps if they stopped working," Douglas said, "the university would realize how valuable they are."

The U of T Graduate Assistants' Association is also demanding a cost of living increase for its members.

U of T graduate assistants now earn from $400 to $2,400 and the administration has offered them a $12 to $30 raise. GAA organizers have called the offer an insult.

BURNABY (CUP) — The Canadian Sociology and Anthropology Association (CSAA) will continue its censure at Simon Fraser University despite the actions of the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) to temporarily suspend their censure for four months.

academic jobs in the last few years," she said.

Smith admitted the CSAA censure will not have the power by itself that the CAUT censure and boycott had. "It isn't enforceable in the way that the CAUT boycott is," she said.

She said the CAUT boycott applied to the whole university whereas the CSAA censure will be aimed particularly at prospective anthropology department members at SFU.

"If the CSAA decides to continue its censure, it will be still at least as effective with Canadians," she said.

Varsity shows at warm-up meet

By MATHILDE VERHULST
The Lady Blues gymnastics team competed in a season opener invitational meet held at Queen's last Saturday.

Participating teams included: Toronto, York, Queens, Ottawa and McMaster.

The U of T junior team placed third in the overall standings with 79.93 points, only a few points behind the 85.35 points York claimed. McMaster held second place with 81.93 points.

York was first again at the Intermediate level with McMaster in second place and Queen's in third.

The Blues' Senior team placed second overall, Queen's was first and Ottawa took third.

Winning third place in all four events for Toronto was junior team member Bonnie Mactavish.

On the uneven parallel bars Helene Eisenberg of Toronto's seniors took first place with a score of 8.4. Junior team member Wendy Linton held a first with 8.1.

In the vaulting competition both Barbara Clemes of the Blues' senior team and Gail Mueller received a second. Wendy Linton won third place in the junior division.

On the beam, senior Blues' competitor Barbara Clemes balanced into second place.

U of T Coach Linda Couttes said she was "pleased with the performance" the Varsity teams displayed in such a short time. But she added that the Queen's meet was just "a warm-up" for later competitions.

This Saturday Toronto travels to Western for another invitational meet between McMaster, Laurentian, Queen's, Western, Toronto and three American university teams. Boston State, Michigan State, and the University of Michigan will be on hand to offer some competition to the Canadian gymnastics teams taking part.

Saturday, Feb. 15 is the date set for the Ontario universities' gymnastics championships to be held at U of T.

Scarborough defeats Phys-Ed in INTERFAC hockey debacle

By DAVE STUART

There's an old adage in sports that the best defence is a strong offence, but neither PHE A or Scarborough could muster much of either in their division I interfac hockey match Monday night at the arena.

"Gee whiz!" said Howie Reeker, well-known hockey analyst after the game, "if those Phys-Eders had spent less time on their knees looking for nickles and just finished their checks, they could have cleaned up. And holy smoke!, those fellas from Scarbra just didn't check at all!"

Those fellows from Scarborough did do three things right though — they put the puck in the net three times to take a 3-1 win from the jocks.

Scarborough opened the scoring midway through the first period on a goal by Fisk from Croaker, but Phys-Ed tied it up late in the period with an unassisted tally by Croke.

In the second period, Bradley and Robertson added scores for Scarborough giving the College In The Sticks the win.

The lack of offence in the game is well demonstrated by the shots on goal — 11 for the jocks and 6 for the east-enders.

The first star of the game, as chosen by Faster Foster and the Hockey Night at Varsity crew, went to the guy who operates the ice-surfacing machine.

The second star was Mike Friend who so ably assisted the timekeepers, while the third star went to Gilda Oran, who opened and closed the penalty box door with all the confidence of a Teeder Kennedy.

Blues' volleyball action

By REG EADIE
In recent volleyball action at Laurentian University, Blues defeated Ryerson 15-9, 16-4 and 15-5; and York 15-4, 12-15, 16-14, 15-7. Although they played strongly in the early action they were unable to follow through and lost to Laurentian 14-16, 15-9, 9-15, 4-15.

These results leave the team in third place in the east division of the OUA and provided they continue to improve they should move up and grab a play-off position.

Only the top two teams from east and west advance to the Championship round. Current team standings are as follows after six complete matches:

The team's next league game is Jan. 18 at York. They will be playing in the Ontario Volleyball Association loop to gain valuable experience prior to the next OUA games.

Wrestlers take fourth

By JOE RABEL

Exams and injuries took their toll, Saturday, as the Blues were only able to compete in five of twelve weight classes for a fourth place finish at Hart House.

Guelph took first honours with 86 points followed by Ryerson with 69, Waterloo with 57.5, and Toronto with 47.5.

Varsity made good showings in the 150 lb. class with a win by George Multamaki, and the 220 lb. class with a win by Roman Preobrazenski.

In the novice matches held Sunday, Ray Zarembo won the 198 lb. class, Rick Anderson, Al Kosugi, and Lorne Basskin all had seconds in their classes. Sebastian Tisberger came third in the 163 lb. class.

Blues are actually a contender but are going to have to compete in all classes to earn top spot. Too many matches were left out this time.

Grace swimmers third

By HEATHER McCULLOCH

The lady Blues synchronized swim team travelled to Montreal over the weekend to participate in the invitational meet of the eastern division of the OWIAA.

Varsity placed a promising third with 24 points, behind Queen's with 48 and McMaster with 40.

Toronto's Sue McLaughlin and Laurie Rapsy placed third with their duet, while Bette Fukasaka and Andrea Pollock placed fourth and fifth respectively in their solos. McLaughlin also placed fifth in figures.

Joan Mainwaring of McMaster and Mirriam Malone of Queen's paced their teams. Mainwaring won the solo event and was second in the figures, while Malone won the figures and was second in the solo. Malone teamed with Anne Morawetz to win the duet.

Students meet minister over drinks

By BOB BETTSON

Representatives from student councils across the province and the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) will meet with consumer and commercial affairs minister John Clement next Friday to demand student-controlled pubs.

The meeting will also include Liquor Licensing Board of Ontario chairman John Mackey. The students will press demands agreed on at a meeting Wednesday in Toronto.

The Wednesday meeting with representatives of most Ontario community colleges and universities called for further changes beyond those outlined in a telegram sent by Clement earlier this week.

Until Clement's telegram, students were threatened with the end of student-controlled pubs because of legislation granting a single blanket licence per campus to the administration and abolishing special occasion permits.

Clement promised Tuesday to allow administrations to delegate authority and allow the continuation of special occasion permits. But students are still not satisfied.

The motions, adopted unanimously, called for: Student controlled pubs with student governments holding licences, the continuation of special occasion permits for campus groups (or an acceptable replacement), a delay in the implementation of the new regulations until September, 1975 and the suspension of all licences granted to administrations.

The students also demanded that in the future the ministry should attempt to ensure the LLBO will act with consistency and fairness in administering the regulations.

People were concerned at the many conflicting interpretations of Bill 146 made by various ministry and liquor board spokesman and will ask for "specific and formal assurances" from Clement.

Clement's statement that large amounts would not have to be spent to bring student pubs up to LLBO standards was vehemently disputed. The University of Waterloo alone will have to spend $63,000 to improve its facilities.

One of the reasons for Bill 146 has been pressure from commercial bars and pubs which can't compete with the low prices in student-run facilities. However, the province has claimed it is only interested in simplifying the situation.

SAC calls strike for Christmas season

By ERIC RUMP

The Students' Administrative Council has called a month-long mass student strike beginning next Wednesday demanding a student majority on the Governing Council and parity on tenure committees.

The Christmas strike was decided on at a meeting of 2,000 arts and science students who filled Convocation Hall last night to discuss what action to take to bring the administration to its knees.

It was decided that shutting down the university would be the most effective tactic. Student leaders pledged not to return to classes until at least Jan. 6.

Students will set up picket lines Wednesday morning to make sure the strike succeeds. A strike committee has been set up to mobilize students.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch told the cheering crowd, "Students will no longer take things lying down."

"We want power and we want it now," he thundered. "And we will go on strike Wednesday to prove it."

Kanowitch said students make up the university and students should control it. "We want an end to faculty dictatorship. We want an end to tyrants like John Evans who think they can run the university from Simcoe Hall."

At the end of his fiery address Kanowitch received a standing ovation from the throng of militant students. He was joined in his call for strike action by the rest of the SAC executive and members of the Graduate Students' Union and Association of Part-time

Undergraduate Students.

The rousing rally called for U of T president John Evans to agree immediately to a list of demands which include: Student majority on the Governing Council, student-faculty parity on tenure committees and a student majority on all departmental and faculty councils.

A stream of speakers supported the demands and the need for militant action, stressing the many defeats students had suffered in the past while staying within established decision-making channels.

At the height of the meeting a tired and drawn John Evans came to address the throng. He was booed lustily but allowed to speak.

"I appeal to you to abandon this course which will only escalate confrontation," Evans implored.

Evans called Kanowitch and SAC "reckless". He appealed to the mass of students to reject the politics of confrontation and work together with all estates of the university to get a compromise solution.

The mood of the crowd was more angry now and several eggs and tomatoes were thrown at Evans as he fled the stage.

The strike will be the second in U of T history. The first was led by former prime minister William Lyon Mackenzie King.

Starting Wednesday all university activities will grind to a halt if the strikers are successful. A maverick group of faculty has already come out in support of the strike and will not be offering their classes.

Students make inroads in tenure representation

Students won a minor battle yesterday in their ongoing fight to have a potential say in deciding which professors get the job security of tenure.

A lengthy debate at the academic affairs committee culminated in a decision to accept equal student-lay and administrative-faculty representation on a new university tenure committee, which was approved at the meeting.

The new tenure committee is to review all recommendations concerning tenure and advise the president whether such proposals should be confirmed or referred for further consideration.

The new body can also advise whether reconsideration should be by the original tenure committee or by a committee of different composition or membership.

The motion on the new tenure committees, proposed by philosophy professor William Dunphy, follows the acceptance in October of a Dunphy model for a university tenure committee (which makes the initial recommendations). Dunphy's model contains no student members, but allows for an observer member who doesn't teach full-time university.

The Dunphy proposal at yesterday's meeting initially only gave students and lay representatives "substantial" representation on the new review tenure committees.

However, much to the surprise of students at the meeting and after urging of graduate student member Vernon Copeland to specify numbers, academic affairs opted for equal representation. "The word 'substantial' can be interpreted in many different ways," Copeland warned.

Academic affairs also voted in favor of an amendment to have the review tenure meeting discuss only in general terms, and not in depth, a review of a recommendation which the observer had felt was valid.

After the meeting, academic affairs student member Gord Barnes said he would introduce a motion next week to reconsider the functions of the non-voting observer sitting in on the tenure decisions.

Referring to an appeal body which already exists at U of T to review cases of denied tenure, political science professor C.B. MacPherson argued against the new tenure committee, saying it would be "one more layer of committees."

However, Dunphy reminded the meeting that the appeal body is composed of four members all appointed by the president in consultation with the U of T Faculty Association — resulting in no student members.

of events. There are a number of reasons I'm not going to go into.

"The plans I had for the paper were not the right ones, I suppose. I wanted to reestablish the paper immediately, but the staff had grander plans.

"They involved more extensive financing which I thought was impractical. And Jaffary's offer was involved with it too.

"But I wish them well. I bear no hard feelings towards them at all," Shapiro said.

Several groups, including the Citizen staff, an NDP-labor group, a community-action group led by lawyer Dennis Wood, and a group led by Gerry Grafein had also shown interest in purchasing the newspaper since September, but none ever made an offer.

SAC's external affairs commission voted Oct. 4 to grant $1,000 to the Toronto Citizen if it was sold to new owners, depending upon who they were. The decision was met by protest from some quarters in the university.

Jaffary group buys Citizen paper

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The Toronto Citizen was sold by its board of directors yesterday to a group led by former Ward Seven alderman Karl Jaffary.

The newspaper was sold to the Jaffary-led group for under $10,000 after another potential buyer, Jack Shapiro, backed out at the last moment after discussing the matter with Jaffary.

The 10,000 circulation bi-weekly newspaper, which emphasized city politics coverage, folded in late September after a bitter dispute between the staff and a majority of the seven-member board of directors over hiring and firing policies.

Board president John Sewell, who had served as Ward Seven alderman with Jaffary for many years, had tried to sell the paper with no success until the Jaffary-led group purchased it.

Jaffary, Sewell and others associated with the newspaper were all unavailable for comment last night.

But earlier this week Jaffary said that some members of the group were former Citizen staffers, and that he "shared substantial areas of agreement with them."

Jaffary had also said that even if the group bought the newspaper, an agreement would still have to be worked out with the Newspaper Guild over terms of a new staff contract before publication could begin.

"It would take awhile before The Citizen could hit the newsstands again. I'd want to plan carefully and do it right. The problems would be solved collectively," Jaffary said in the Tuesday interview.

Shapiro, who ran in the last federal election as an NDP candidate in the Spadina riding, seemed to be the likeliest Citizen purchaser until this week.

When informed Tuesday that the Jaffary-led group was going to make an offer at the board meeting, Shapiro expressed complete surprise, saying he hadn't heard anything about it.

"I backed away from it," Shapiro said yesterday in explaining the turn

Many issues still to be fought

There weren't any noticeable victories for students this term, but by the same token, there haven't been any serious losses—yet.

Of the major political issues on campus this term, three stood out above all others. One was the restructuring of the Governing Council, the second the campaign to seat students on tenure committees, and the third the catch-all "Seeley affair."

Students suffered an early disappointment in their campaign for parity with faculty members on the Governing Council this spring, when the council decided to delay till fall a decision on how to restructure itself. At that time the council was faced with a report calling for parity.

Technically, a decision had to be made in the spring, as the council, set up in 1972, was required by provincial statute to review its composition within two years.

This fall, although student leaders urged the council to commit itself to the principle of parity, the council declined. However, the council did eventually recommend a 13-11 faculty student ratio, which surprised many students, who had not expected any significant moves towards parity, which would be asking the faculty weighted council to vote against its own interests.

The report is now with the provincial government, where legislative approval will be necessary. Student lobbyists are hoping to convince the government to grant parity on the council.

The second major issue was the need for student representation on tenure committees to ensure serious consideration of teaching ability in the granting of tenure.

The academic affairs committee of the Governing Council deliberated the issue, and voted to forward a model for tenure committees which excludes student members, but which allows for an outside observer who could be a student.

Although this is tantamount to a defeat for the student position, the issue is far from resolved yet. The committee's recommendation must still be considered by the executive committee and by the full governing council before it is finalized. There is still time for a strong statement of student opinion to alter the final decision.

The third major issue which cropped up this term was the interference of senior administrators in the working of individual departments. What began as a rather minor fight over the sociology department's hiring of non-Canadians quickly turned into a much more fundamental issue, as it was revealed that a staff-student committee's unanimous decision to hire sociologist John Seeley had been overruled by senior administrators. By what logic did they do this, other than pettiness? If they were not to be trusted to abide by democratic decisions, when could they be trusted?

The administration was caught on the hook, and it should not be allowed to wriggle off easily. It was clearly culpable, and stronger guarantees of non-involvement need to be developed.

Two other issues loom large on the horizon for next term. The first is not peculiar to U of T. Students all across the province are upset about the present Ontario Student Awards Program, with the first visible signs of anger erupting at the University of Ottawa last week.

The Ontario Federation of Students is likely to take the lead in a campaign to pressure the provincial government to ease the burden on individual students towards a more progressive taxation system.

The other issue is discipline. Last year, the administration's proposals for a discipline code for non-academic behaviour was successfully stalled by students for a year, angered over its highly repressive nature. However, this January, the discipline code will be reintroduced and a new disciplinary tribunal set up to take the place of the Caput.

Students can't expect to win every battle, but with some determination, significant gains can be made on some of the major issues. There is still time.

Editorial ghosts from Xmas past

Excerpts from old Varsity Christmas editorials:

Christmas, 1915

"But even while we frame the words to our annual Christmas editorial, we cannot but think of our friends and brothers who have gone out from this University and who are now far across the ocean, and towards men are more than idle words devoid of meaning. Therefore, we still think it worth saying and saying sincerely — a very Merry Christmas to You All.

Christmas 1957

As his own special commemoration of Christmas, Elvis Presley has just issued an album of carols, ancient and modern. The album has been banned on many radio stations, and boycotted by some of the best 'Christian' people... If those who seek Christ do not have the vision to seek Him in Elvis Presley, they may not find Him at all.

Christmas 1965

"It seems fitting to count up all our blessings at this time, to express our thanks, and to look ahead to more of the same in the future. Among them are: war — in Vietnam, the Near East, Africa; poverty and racial unrest almost everywhere; the Canadian Government struggling on through yet another laughable year; our student governments, proving that tomorrow's leaders probably won't be any more imaginative than the present; the average student, working hard to demonstrate that education and a closed mind are not incompatible.

Christmas 1966

"One sure sign that Santa is still with us is that even cynical old newspaper editors mellow for a few moments at this time of year if only to write one sentimental editorial. What we really want to say is quite simple: Have fun and have a Merry Christmas."

Christmas 1968

"Last night, filled with the Christmas spirit of peace and goodwill, The Varsity staff met to count their blessings and we asked them, 'What do you most like about U of T?' Hearts filled with warmth and good cheer, they answered:

"It's a good place to find out what you'd rather be doing."

"I like it because it's big and impersonal and I can walk all day without seeing anyone."

"It lets the Varsity exist."

"I don't have to go to the same washrooms as the staff."

"It's close to Toronto."

"I like the way the sun's rays strike the Simcoe Hall dome."

We tried. Merry Christmas and an interesting New Year.

Christmas 1973 (last year)

"Black clouds are hanging over the worried of both administration and faculty after discovering that students were less prone to lying down and accepting the discipline code than they had thought..."

to whom the words "Merry Christmas" seem perhaps a mockery. Already more than a score of our students lie in soldier's graves and at any time the dreaded news may come that others whom we knew and loved have made the supreme sacrifice."

Christmas 1918

"Despite all the sorrows of the past four years many welcome the coming of this Christmas for the very reason that these sorrows are at an end. It is for this reason—that Christmas 1918 will be for us "A Peaceful Christmas" — that we today are wishing each other "A Merry Christmas."

Christmas 1930

"What can one say about Christmas, that isn't trite?" we asked the select assemblage within the editorial sanctum. "There's nothing you can say about Christmas that isn't trite," was the answer. "Christmas is trite."

Christmas 1931

"The first day of the New Year is given over to muttering platitudes of the days to come. The other 364 days are given over to proving the meaninglessness of such expressions of good will. At the New Year we shake hands with an acquaintance and wish him the best, and the next week we do our best to ruin him in business..."

Christmas 1946

"Every year at this time, for a long, long time, people have talked about 'peace on earth, good will towards men.' This year, there seems to be a particular lack of them both."

Christmas 1955

"The significance of Christmas today lies in the spirit of moral regeneration which it contains. For at Christmas we do become kinder; we do act as though justice and mercy, peace on earth and goodwill Will Dr. John Cratchit be able to convince the provincial government over Christmas of the poverty of his flock?

St. Mike's votes for Catholics

While I would concur with Eric Del Junco's assessment of the political mentality of voters at the St. Mike's poll, a few misconceptions must be cleared up.

First, there was a significant turnout for the school trustee vote. What the author forgot was that St. Mike's, as a Catholic institution is predominantly composed of separate school electors. The results of that race were: Fenn 56, Nagle 44, Casista 9, those not voting 23.

As a candidate, I scrutinized St. Mike's. The total turnout was 144, made up mainly of priests and sisters. Some of the breakdown of individual votes reveals the following characteristics: Archer-Heap 41, Heap-Sparrow 36, Archer 27, Archer-Yip 17, Archer-Combs 6, many others. A further analysis reveals Archer-Heap-Fenn 26, Heap-Sparrow-Nagle 18, Archer-Fenn 11, Archer-Yip-Fenn 10, Archer-Yip-Nagle 7, Archer-Heap-Nagle 10, others.

As a reform candidate and member of the Ward 6 Community Organization, the breakdown reveals that a majority of ballot casters voted for Mike Fenn in the belief that he was the "conservative" candidate and I was the "radical" one. I'd like to state that Fenn is an active resident of Ward 9, and has been involved with community politics there as I have in Ward 6.

In conclusion, it was a most satisfying victory on Monday night for the people of Ward 6, as well as the candidates, and I hope that all five of us measure up to your high and justifiable expectations.

It is not our task to decide the strategy and tactics of the Latin American struggle, nor should it be the purpose of any organization to enter these movements with the aim of recruiting new members (defined by the RMG, on an internal document, as its principle task).

The conditions now exist in Canada to construct mass, united solidarity organizations around such demands as freedom for Chilean and Uruguayan political prisoners, and against the support (moral and economic) given by the Canadian government to Latin American fascist regimes. Such movements should, and do include people of almost all political persuasions, labor unions, student organizations, ethnic and religious groups etc.

As for the Latin American resolution, for which Blanco claims so presumptuously to speak, I have confidence in the ability of the Latin American people, under their chosen political leadership, to determine for themselves their road to liberation.

David Galbraith,

Zebra

Blanco no real revolutionary

Some people may have gone to the meeting Wednesday evening addressed by Hugo Blanco, under the impression that they would be hearing a leading Latin American revolutionary. The truth is far removed from this.

Blanco is an important figure in the United Secretariat of the "Fourth International" (FI) one of the many groupings claiming to be the true inheritors of the dubious mantle of Leon Trotsky. This visit is organized by the League for Socialist Action, the "official section" of the FI in Canada, and the "Revolutionary Marxist Group", another Trotskyite sect contending for the "distinction". Also sponsoring it are a number of other organizations, some legitimately interested in building solidarity with Latin America, others controlled by the Trotskyites.

The publicity for the meeting attempts to link Blanco with the legitimate, mass national liberation and revolutionary organizations in Latin America by quoting Che Guevara to the effect that Blanco, presumably in his Peruvian adventures, has set "a good example". It is perhaps significant that the quotation is open-ended, since it is not specified as to what Blanco is alleged to have set such an example. We might, in the context, quote Fidel Castro, who, at the Tricontinental Congress in 1966 described the Trotskyites as "handmaidens of imperialism".

A bit strong? Not, in my opinion, if you examine the practice of ultra-leftism in Latin America, and assess its objective impact on the political situation.

In Argentina, for example, a situation of martial law now exists. A heavy burden of responsibility for this must be assigned to the ERP, a Trotskyite terrorist sect. Its strategy of random terrorism (exemplified by its recent announcement that it will shoot army officers at random) contributed significantly to a political climate in which the Peronist government was able to camouflage its right wing drift by suggesting that the present state of emergency is justified by the presence of right and "left" terrorist organization. The fact that the ERP is no longer a section of the Fourth International is essentially irrelevant, since its terrorist strategy was formulated and first implemented while it was a "sympathising section" of the FI.

In Peru, an anti-imperialist government has been in power since 1968 (characterized as such because of the nationalization of foreign monopolies and its land reform measures). The Trotskyites call for its overthrow. Their history of provocation in Peru goes back to 1963, when Blanco instigated an isolated peasant rebellion at a time when the progressive forces desperately required the time to consolidate themselves after emerging from decades of the most brutal repression. The government used Blanco's adventure as an excuse to attack the entire progressive movement.

When unity is most desperately needed in Latin America, the Trotskyites call for disunity and adventure!

In Canada, the same attitudes have characterized their work in the solidarity movements. Here, the task of all left and progressive people is to demonstrate our support by developing broad and united mass campaigns.

Law students protest racism

We, the undersigned students of the Faculty of Law at the University of Toronto, condemn the use of race as a criteria for admissions to any faculty or college at the University of Toronto and ask that the Faculty of Medicine issue a public statement rejecting the use of such criteria in selecting students for their faculty.

Students and faculty have fought for many years to make the university a place available to everyone qualified regardless of race, colour, or national origin. Now is not the time to sneak such criteria back in under the guise of more accurately reflecting "the cultural and sociological mix of the taxpayers in the province."

It is clear that the university and, especially, the professional faculties are faced with a serious problem. There is a growing number of qualified applicants to the few openings for students each year. It is a problem that has to be dealt with through a reevaluation of admissions criteria. There are any number of methods of selection available from strict academic competition to lottery to the system used at McMaster Medical School involving a detailed application and interviews. In none of these is race a valid consideration.

The taxpayers do not go to the doctor to be treated by someone "of their own ethnic and cultural backgrounds", as was suggested by the Medical Post. They go to get the best medical care possible. And they want the best doctors available to them. This is true for any of the professions in which the university offers training be it Lawyer, Engineer, Historian or Teacher.

As for the suggestion that "foreign" students are taking over the university, it is common knowledge that the university maintains strict quotas on students coming from outside the country. Thus, the "foreign" students referred to can only be landed immigrants and citizens who do not come from the dominant racial groups in Canada. Landed immigrants pay taxes the same as any citizen, and statistics show that few leave Canada after training here. Thus, the training of qualified landed immigrants is of benefit to Canada. The suggestion that Canadian citizens should be screened according to racial origins does not merit any hearing and definitely has no place in the university.

Staff position too simplistic

I was most interested to read Mr. Priddle's recent statement in The Varsity calling for a 25 percent across-the-board salary increase for non-academic staff. Having long been interested in the working conditions of the non-academic staff, I am sorry to see the adoption of so simplistic an approach to the alleviation of staff dissatisfaction.

Comparing the percentage of U of T salary increases with the percentage of salary increases given by other Toronto employers, without reference to the base on which those increases were made, is poor research methodology and leads to meaningless rhetoric. A sounder case would need to be made to prove that the U of T salary ranges (especially secretarial-clerical) are out of line with those of the other organizations mentioned in Mr. Priddle's statement.

This does not mean that individual salaries are competitive with those offered by outside employers. In my opinion, however, the cause of these inequalities is not the university's salary ranges but its method of budgeting. Non-academic salary funds are distributed to and administered by some 200 academic and administrative departments. Such fragmentation means that the University's job classification system cannot be fairly implemented. It must coordinate with, and be subordinate to, each departmental budget regardless of the work actually performed by each employee. It is not surprising that inequalities develop under such a system.

A solution to the problem would be to transfer control over non-academic salaries to the personnel department. If this were done, the job classification system could function in such a way as to assure payment of each staff member at competitive rates for the job he/she actually performs. Such centralization would also facilitate transfer and promotion of staff between departments and encourage development of an employee group with a wide experience of, and loyalty to, the University.

A staff which felt that it was fairly paid for the job actually performed and which was encouraged to make a career at the university would lead to a lower turnover rate and to incidental savings by the university of the some $500 expended on the recruitment of each new employee. If staff turnover is currently some 30 percent of, let us say, 4,000 employees, a 10 percent reduction of turnover might mean a saving to the university of some $200,000 which might, in turn, be used to increase the pool of money for staff salaries.

Given the size of the University's budget for 1975-76, I suggest that a call for an across-the-board increase of 25 percent is as irresponsible as similar demands made by the faculty association. Yes, salaries must and should be competitive with other Toronto employers.

However, across-the-board increases do nothing to alleviate the basic inequalities arising from the university's irrational budgeting system. Pressing for more efficient use of the university's funds would be of more service to the staff as a whole than demands for salary increases beyond the means of the university and outside the priorities of the provincial government.

Anna Mallin,
UCIII

Priddle slanders many colleagues

I have read with considerable surprise and scepticism the letter by the President of UTSA, Mr. Priddle, concerning the demand for a 25 percent across-the-board salary increase for non-academic staff. Possibly other letters may be forthcoming commenting on his lack of logic, faulty statistics and sweeping generalizations. But, having been around U of T for some ten years, I must come to the defence of colleagues who have only recently joined the staff. I strongly object to Mr. Priddle slandering these colleagues by stating they are "less than properly qualified."

The Bell Goat

Mr. Priddle takes his own arguments ad absurdum: such newcomers are hired "at or near the mid-point of the salary range" in spite of lacing qualifications — but he wishes to see them included in a 25 percent across-the-board salary increase! It seems to me that this would only further widen the gap of inequities.

I hope that Mr. Priddle will enjoy the Christmas holiday which not many employees outside the university have been so generously granted. He might usefully reflect during such a period of leisure if it is really the task of the President of a staff association to slander a large group of his colleagues with such a generous sweep of the tar-brush.

Administrative Assistant

Scarborough mess not really so bad

This letter is written in reference to the current situation at Scarborough College Students Council (SCSC). I do not believe your article of Nov. 22 presented the facts in their true perspective, and the letter from John O'Donohue, president of the SCSC, which appeared in your paper Monday corrected only some of the misconceptions.

It is quite true that members of the SCSC do not agree on every issue. They were elected to represent the students of the college to the best of their ability. Often they find it necessary to express their sincere opinions on matters of great or small importance. That these opinions reflect the diverse personalities from which they originate is because of our democratic heritage. I do not deny that Council has encountered problems, but as Winston Churchill said, "Democracy is the worst possible system of government except for all the others which have been tried."

Incidentally, I think it would be quite valid to ask at this point why

Cow

The Varsity was so eager to put a negative report about Scarborough College on its front page, but rarely makes much effort to cover the many interesting, beneficial events which take place at the College.

Since his election as SCSC president, John O'Donohue and his supporters have done a remarkable job in providing numerous services for the students of the College. The U of T Riding Stables, which posterity will hopefully recognize as one of the greatest achievements of the O'Donohue administration, have offered approximately 2,500 horse rides, many with lessons, since they opened in the summer. O'Donohue et al have also shown an interest in academic concerns unprecedented in former years. It is truly unfortunate that most students do not seem to appreciate O'Donohue's solicitude for their education.

I regret the resignation of Paul Carson as administrator of the SCSC. I have always profoundly respected Carson and wish him every success. Having temporarily assumed some of his duties, I have become somewhat conversant with the problems he often encountered. Perhaps he was partially responsible for the controversy, but I fear that the SCSC executive, including O'Donohue, must accept some of the blame for the unfair way in which he was treated. I don't believe he could reasonably be expected to complete financial records based on incomplete receipts. Hopefully, the forthcoming auditor's report will clarify the mystery surrounding the books.

As stated above, I do respect the democratic process. I would stoutly defend the right of the anti-O'Donohue forces to their opinions, but I hope that in future they will devote themselves to more worthy tasks than blaming O'Donohue for the occasionally compromising circumstances in which they themselves are equally implicated, or insulting the students of the College by invalidating elections

Monkey

(the recent SAC elections protest fiasco was led by a person who believed the election was invalid but made in excess of $20 working as a poll clerk!)

The Council has been entrusted with about $60,000 in student funds. Isn't it about time we started letting John carry out his promised programme to benefit the students?

Native peoples have own lifestyle

By MATHILDE VERHULST
Canadian native peoples can "straighten out the true history of Canada," a spokeswoman for non-status Indians told an audience of over 200 Wednesday evening.

Gloria George, who is also Native Council of Canada vice-president, told a panel discussion at St. Lawrence Centre native peoples "have their own system — social, economic, political and educational."

viewing of a National Film Board film on Northern Quebec Cree Indians in a discussion of native peoples' land rights.

George said she was "taken aback" when "people say native peoples have nothing to contribute to society."

The film, Cree Hunters of Mistassini, was followed by comments from a panel including George, New Democratic Party MP Wally Firth of the North-West Territories; Roger Obonsawin, director of Toronto's Native Canadian Centre executive director and Mark Zannis, author of the recently published book The Genocide Machine. Zannis is also active on the James Bay Defence Committee.

The film's director and narrator, Boyce Richardson acted as MC and directed audience questions to the panelists.

The main theme of the film and the discussion was the importance and the role of the land as key factor in the preservation of Indian and Inuit cultures.

Firth referred to the failure of "the 400 years of systematic effort" of the white society to destroy native cultural life.

He hoped the "general population across the land will realize this. The land is the important thing in this way of life."

Firth mentioned there has recently been a movement of Indians returning to the land, and cited the McKenzie Delta and Old Crow country as examples where this movement is taking place.

Firth attributed this return to the land to "the sense of security" many Indians feel "in knowing that if all other things go wrong, you can always go back to the land if it's in its natural state."

Zannis, also a National Film Board representative, said when he showed the film Cree Hunters of Mistassini to Indians in the James Bay area, their reactions "were absolutely staggering."

Zannis said the film has caused "an increase in hunting and trapping in the James Bay area."

Firth told the audience, "I know what this life is like. There's no such thing as a lazy Indian."

Gloria George said, "We have to try to create the positive aspect of the Indian and the Inuit peoples rather than the negative." This comment was in reference to the tendency of movies to portray Indians as "scalpers and killers".

Referring to the film, George said the Indian social system was apparent in the system of food distribution the film depicted.

Referring briefly to the James Bay development, Roger Obonsawin warned, "The same things are happening in Ontario."

He said he hoped "we can attack the issues (of development) before the land is gone because then it will be too late."

Lethal bees move closer to Metro

A bee-nursemaid in the hive giving her charges bread and honey.

SAN FRANCISCO (CUP-ZNS) — Human-killing bees are advancing through Mexico toward the United States at the rate of 200 miles a year.

Dr. Marius Wasbauer, a California state entomologist says, "the danger cannot be discounted." He says that the bees' hatred of humans is said to have developed over millions of years as a result of raids on their tree-top honey hives.

The aggressive insect, known as the Brazilian honey bee, originally was imported from Africa for experimental purposes. However, a number of them escaped from a Brazilian laboratory in 1957, and they have been multiplying and moving north ever since.

Swarms of the bees have been killing an average of 300 persons a year.

Bulletin may provide tough new competition

In a move designed to prop up the rotting foundations of monopoly capitalism, as personified at U of T by the administration, a proposal to toughen up the administration paper "The Bulletin" has been announced.

The task force on public relations, reporting to Governing Council's external affairs committee, has recommended the Bulletin be expanded into a university-wide paper "responsible for disseminating information, opinion and argument throughout the university community."

Other recommendations include wider distribution and the continued prohibition of advertising.

Speculators remarked the tough new Bulletin could provoke a newspaper "war" not seen since the days of the Toronto Star and the Toronto Telegram.

Fundits at the offices of The Varsity, the only show in town, were terse and tight lipped at the announcement.

SAC told pub will be part of campus centre

SAC will get its long-sought pub in the proposed campus centre.

At a meeting of president John Evans' advisory committee on the campus centre yesterday, the pub was placed on a list of "essential services" to be in the centre.

Kanowitch called it "a victory of sorts" since SAC has been after the administration to give a firm commitment on setting up a pub.

Other services deemed essential were a 'quality' restaurant, a fast food outlet, a bank and a drug store-office.

The campus centre project is to be funded from the university's proposed sesquicentennial campaign.

she wore her christianity like bright clothes much too large but when she flew towards you smiling
 they seemed to fit because the wind pressed them against her body

however on her passing by you saw the jacket and the skirt flutter like flags in wind and standing still perhaps in stopping short before you this excess cloth could suddenly enfold
 you in a darkness
 as it slapped around you because you wished her to be genuine you thought her body larger the ill fit just illusion her fervor sound but could not over come a slight unease concerning all those wrinkles

Carol

There was a Boy bedded in bracken
 Like to a sleeping snake all curled he lay
 On his thin navel turned this spinning sphere
 Each feeble finger fetched seven suns away
 He was not dropped in good-for-lambing weather
 He took no suck when shook buds sing together
 But he is come in cold-as-workhouse weather
 Poor as a Salford child.

A Carol

Oh hush thee, my baby,
 Thy cradle's in pawn:
 No blankets to cover thee
 Cold and forlorn.
 The stars in the bright sky
 Look down and are dumb
 At the heir of the ages
 Asleep in a slum.

The hooters are blowing,
 No need let him take;
 When baby is hungry
 'Tis best not to wake.
 Thy mother is crying,
 Thy dad's on the dole:
 Two shillings a week is
 The price of a soul.

Sheridan's Rival is a mellifluous treat

If deception, subterfuge, plotting and subplotting are your fancy, there are two shows currently playing which will satisfy your appetite.

One is the Demeter Drama, running indefinitely at the London Courthouse, and the other is Sheridan's The Rivals, on stage at The St. Lawrence Centre until Dec. 21.

The former is solemnly concerned with extrication from the marital state, the latter deals satirically with entrance into it.

Sheridan no doubt is in competition with the headlines appearing daily in our newspapers, for no longer must an audience be wrested from the privacy of their homes in order to be entertained by the subject of marital intrigue.

Yet the trip to the St. Lawrence is worth the effort, if only for the sheer pleasure of hearing the English language at times put effortlessly through the hoops.

But Sheridan's dialogue, originally constructed to roll mellifluously off the tongues of his characters, is at times so dense, so rich, so replete in images, that the atrophied twentieth century ear is unable to grasp the entirety of its meaning. The fault does not rest solely with the modern listener, raised on a dramatic diet of Pinter, Albee and Beckett. A great deal of the blame must be placed on the modern actor. It is our right and privilege to hear the language spoken. It is the actor's trade and duty to learn how to speak it.

Sara Botsford, (Lydia) and Maureen McRae, (Julia) seemed most deficient in this area, although running a close third was Lubomir Myktyiuk playing Faulkland.

They mouthed their lines with little sensitivity to metre or meaning, and if it wasn't for the occasional word being recognized, one might have thought they were delivering sermons in Arabic.

Language is the key to the success of this comedy, the subtle twist of which unlocks the door to its humour. For the wit rests in the speech, the speech is what makes the characters live, and the characters in their interaction with one another deliver the swift punch necessary for the comedy to survive.

This is never more evident than in the scene where Sir Anthony Absolute, (Gerald Parker) confronts Jack, his son, (Barry Boys) with a marriage proposition the younger Absolute cannot afford to refuse. But refuse Jack does, under pain of disinheritance, until he discovers that the hand his father would have him wed belongs to the girl to whom he is already engaged. Confused? Believe me, that is just a single strand in the overall web of the plot. Gerald Parkes blusters and rages about the stages importunately, like a father cajoling and upbraiding a child of six for his disobedience.

Barry Boys juggles the scene with skill, at times playing off Sir Anthony's tirade, at others playing with the confidence he shares with the audience.

In the renowned role of Mrs.

Malaprop, Jennifer Phipps deserves special praise, for she played it without traces of self-mockery, the slightest hint of which would send the caricature crumbling.

Although Phipps showed off Mrs. Malaprop to great advantage, she also served to show up the remainder of the lacklustre female cast. As Phipps gained momentum the others lost ground; as she warmed up the others cooled down. At the end of the evening, the discrepancy in performance levels between Jennifer Phipps and Botsford and McRae, was registered in the hearty approbation heaped on the one, and the polite applause meted out to the other two.

Perhaps McRae was working at a disadvantage in being cast opposite Myktyiuk's Faulkland. For if ever there was an uninspired performance, his was it.

However, to give the actor his due the character of Faulkland is without doubt one of Sheridan's weakest, and does not lend itself to much more than the wet-eyed Romanticism that Myktyiuk gave it.

One of the most pleasing aspects of the production was to be found in the set designs of Murray Laufer. Using eight different scene changes, no expense was spared to create the atmosphere of the 18th Century drawing room, the duelling ground, and the boudoir the varied milieu of this Comedy of Manners.

Methuselah returns once more to Hart House

With his usual fondness for antithesis, George Bernard Shaw once boasted of his "metabiological pentateuch", Back to Methuselah, that it "is a world classic or it is nothing." But the truth is often more reserved and less outrageous than Shaw would have wished and the truth of the matter is that Back to Methuselah, in last week's Hart House production, proved to be merely an enjoyable evening in the theatre.

In many ways, Back to Methuselah is Shaw's response to the massive devastation, physical and psychological, of the First World War. Shaw's preface articulates the doubts and fundamental misgivings about man impressed upon an anxious world by the catastrophe of the War: "namely, whether the human animal, as he exists at present, is capable of solving the social problems raised by his own aggregation, or, as he calls it, his civilization."

Shaw's answer is that man cannot, and that man's only chance for survival is to take life more seriously which, Shaw asserts, would happen if man could live 300 years instead of 80. This fearful concern for the human race is transmuted by typically Shavian hocus-pocus, a leap of fact, into the passionate belief that man can live 300 hundred years if he only wants to. On this preposterous presupposition the play is built.

Before his death late last summer, Robert Gill, whose influence on the Canadian theatre has been so considerable, had planned to mount Shaw's parable as a regular part of the Hart House season. The present production, directed by Herb Whittaker, is dedicated as a memorial tribute to Gill.

Gill had originally decided to stage the adaptation by Arnold Moss, which reshapes the unwieldy cycle of five plays into a workable two and a half hour script. What was presented was a platform reading of that same condensed version of the play.

Whittaker made good use of the Dramatist, a character first introduced into Back to Methuselah by Arnold Moss and played here with spirit by Alexander Leggett.

The characters of the play proper became figments of the Dramatist's imagination, with a life of their own and a Shavian ability to surprise and shock even their creator, while, at the same time, remaining actors to whom the Dramatist could hand their scripts and who seemed to have cried off, during rehearsals I suppose, in combinations that were unlikely as far as their stage roles went. The result was that interplay between involvement and alienation on which modern theatre audiences dose.

The stage set, effective in its simplicity, located the Dramatist's study to the front of the stage and to the sides, isolating three reading stands at center stage, slightly back. The distancing of this framing device helped to integrate the play's disparate sections, but this, and the theatrical acting style which characterized the production, tended to defuse the exhilaration of the numerous pleases for man's creative spirit and to man's aspiring spirit which normally charge the play with passion.

In addition, a reading of a play to be convincing demands an assured vocal control on the part of the actors, since they are not helped, in their characterizations, by spectacle and gesture.

The result was that this production was slightly flat and certainly cerebral and lacked the engaged vitality which should animate this "beginning of a Bible for Creative Evolution."

The first sections of the play worked best, although Lilith (Leigha Lee Browne), the Genetrix of man who opened and closed the play, had not enough stage majesty to convey the importance of her role. On the other hand, Lea V. Usin's Serpent, ingeniously costumed, artfully insinuated the plan of Creation into the ear of a winning Eve (Barbara Stewart).

Shavian high comedy, however, had to wait for John W. Browne who brought just the right mixture of style and exaggeration to the double roles of Barnabas, the 20th century prophet of Creative Evolution, and of the Accountant General. The scene in which the bureaucratic Accountant General discovers the existence of two tricenarians, suitably played by Denis Salter and Hilda Williams, was the most controlled and successful section of the production. It alone had the understated elegance of intellectual comedy.

John Ferguson, watched over by a lively staff of long-liveds (Jane O'Hara, Marving Karon and Margy Giffin), created an elderly gentleman whose story, though enjoyably performed, was comic rather than tragic.

Unfortunately the last section got entangled in Shaw's futuristic fantasies. These last two parts seemed most damaged by Moss's cuts in the text.

On the evening on which I saw the play the theatre was less than two thirds full, although the box office announced that they were sold out. It's a pity that more people didn't get to see the production weird, funny, excellent?

The theatre in Russia before the turn of the century was steeped in melodrama. Its over-exaggeration was precisely what Stanislavski and Chekhov rebelled against. But, at the same time, there was a lesser known writer, Alexander Blok, writing even more revolutionary literature. His only play, The Puppet Show (sometimes called The Fairground Booth), tried to explode the theatre with its absurd, circus-like discontinuity.

The lunch-time production at the UC Playhouse (concludes today) shows this explosion very well, but does not give us the background to it, the reason Blok felt the necessity of the explosion. Perhaps the director, Gordon Woodbury, found the play too tame for a 1974 audience and decided to drop this element in order to spice up the production.

The mise-en-scene is excellent. Sometimes too excellent. Much of the time we are so in awe of what we are seeing that we don't really concentrate on what's going on. Fortunately, in this play it is not so necessary, as long as we get the feeling of radical theatre — which we do.

The play drags at times, especially during the three lovers' scenes. We are not really certain whether to laugh at them or take them seriously and that makes things a little too uncomfortable. The actors, though technically very good, seem to lack energy.

Woodbury does his own stage managing from the audience (an old Meyerhold trick) which is more interesting than it is effective. If you see the play, don't sit too close to him or you may be distracted from the play.

The choreography by Alice Guzik and Joan Bendon is excellent. The lighting by Linda Pakri is intricate and strange.

In fact, the whole play might be summed up as "intricate and strange". I'm not certain it has any meaning outside of Blok's saying "I want to tear drama to pieces". The relationship of Love and Death is not fully explored. But the UC production's mesmerizing and entertaining. I think it's supposed to be funny. It's also pretty weird.

Pippin' no ordinary show!

Twenty-six year old Stephen Schwartz must be regarded as something of a musical boy wonder. He is currently represented on Broadway by three — count 'em, three — musical scores — Godspell, Pippin, and The Magic Show.

His second show Pippin, landed in Hamilton Place last week in a touring production.

It's a difficult show to classify. It contains elements of magic, clown show, ballet, vaudeville, musical-comedy and spectacle; all skillfully blended in a first rate razzmatazz show.

One is aware from the outset that Pippin is no ordinary musical. Instead of beginning without the customary overture, the curtain rises on twelve pairs of glowing, blue hands. The face of the Leading Player appears, amid the swirl of floating hands, and he invites us to view the story of Pippin, son of Charlemagne.

The year is 780 A.D. (or thereabouts) and the setting is the Holy Roman Empire. Pippin has a burning desire to be completely fulfilled, as he explains in the soaring number Corner Of The Sky.

He tries fighting in his father's army but finds that war is not for him. His grandmother suggests that he will find fulfillment in sex, but Pippin soon tires of the pleasures of the flesh. His next venture is to become a political revolutionary. He overthrows Charlemagne, but he soon finds that he is forced to become the despot that his father was.

Discouraged by his failures, Pippin is taken in by a widow with a small son and a large estate. Catherine falls in love with Pippin and tries to convince him to stay with her; but he leaves, claiming that he is too extraordinary to live a domestic life.

In the end Pippin is offered the chance of martyrdom through a spectacular suicide by fire, but he chooses instead to live and hopefully survive married life with Catherine and her son.

The brisk pace of the show is maintained through Bob Fosse's exciting and imaginative choreography.

Irving Lee plays the Leading Player with remarkable energy and style. He serves as our tour guide throughout the play, acting within and upon the story. His dancing and singing were most dazzling, and his character was very attractive.

Barry Williams of TV's The Brady Bunch made a fairly likeable Pippin. While his singing was fine and his dancing adequate, his acting was at times uninspired.

The grandmother, played by Dortha Duckworth, was a role designed to steal the show. But Miss Duckworth seemed merely to walk through the part, and her voice was highly unsuitable for the intended show stopper No Time At All.

As Catherine, Carol Fox Prescott deserves best acting honours. Her singing was delightful, and she made her character of the widow gentle, appealing and genuine.

The finale of Pippin is the most bizarre of any musical. With Pippin's refusal to die in a glorious blaze of flames, the Leading Player removes all sets, costumes, instruments, actofs and make-up. He leaves Pippin, Catherine and the boy alone on the bare stage to see how they like life without all the glamour and the trappings. The three hold hands and decide that they are not missing anything extraordinary. They are quite happy trapped in ordinariness, but secure with each other.

The play ends here with the three bowing and Pippin saying "Ta-da". Spectacular it may not be, yet it is undeniably extraordinary.

Christmas in a geriatrics hospital

The elevator at Our Lady of Mercy Hospital stops on the third floor, and as yet there are no visible signs that Christmas is coming. The hospital is located in the West End of the city, far removed from the brash lights criss-crossing Yonge Street which flash messages of "Good Will toward Men" and "Buy Now at Eaton's". The tinsel, holly, and ivy traditionally placed throughout the wards are still stored in boxes. It's too early for Christmas trees.

The long yellow corridors frame a group of patients sitting about in wheelchairs. There are perhaps ten of them clustered together. One immediately notes the blanket whiteness of the hair, the pallor of the aged skin, and the numbed gazes which evaporate in the silence.

I walk on, turn and enter the first room. It is like all the other rooms. It contains six beds which contain six people. Suddenly I am struck by the absurdity of my assignment. I am to interview the elderly on their feelings about Christmas, yet all around me are beds occupied by people incapable of conversation.

Christmas? How does one ask the disoriented victims of cerebral vascular accidents about it.

Christmas? The lady, a shut-in for twenty years with multiple sclerosis, can understand the word but she is unable to frame an answer.

Christmas? Should I draw back the white curtain that surrounds another and ask her what she is expecting from Santa?

I want to escape and question the children at Toyland, the shoppers frustrated by inflation, the students freed from essays, or even the drunken participants in the Christmas office party.

Finally my eyes rest on a small lady who sits in her wheelchair by the window. As I approach her, she smiles. I introduce myself and my subject.

Her name is Mary Hodgins. She is sixty eight.

"This will be my second Christmas spent in a hospital. Last year I was too sick to even care about Christmas. I was in a ward with twenty other people who didn't even know what year it was let alone what day. Christmas came and passed without my even knowing it.

"This year I am aware that Christmas is coming and what I will miss most of all is the family, the hugs and the kisses, the banter and the talking around. The laughs and the jokes.

"On Christmas day you'd always have the odd dear friend drop around and that would be wonderful.

"I never married so my family is my eighteen nieces and nephews. I used to love to go shopping to buy a little present for each and every one of them. I never missed a year. I'd only spend one or two dollars on each, but I took great care in what I bought. It was always exciting to look forward to wrapping the presents, each separately, each differently. I won't be doing that this year however. I could not get out to shop even if I wanted to and besides what can you get nowadays with two dollars."

Mary Hodgins admits freely, almost too honestly, that she has been suffering with arthritis for twenty years and now is riddled with cancer of the bone. Every month she is sent out for chemotherapy, a treatment which has caused her hair to fall out but which nonetheless prolongs her life.

"I think Christmas today is far too commercialized. All the kids today think of is the Santa Claus Parade the toys, all the gadgetry that goes along with it. The kids aren't the only ones to blame however. The parents foster this attitude. I've seen people go into debt at Christmas, giving presents to people they don't even care about.

"I think my generation thought more about the spirit of the season. For us it was a joyous time of year. A time of Christian celebration. Today it is more like a pagan feast. You don't see as many nativity scenes in the homes as you used to. That has all gone out the window. I'm worried about what will happen to Christmas when my generation has passed away."

For the past eighty seasons with pain her silent companion and hospital's her all-too-frequent home, Mary has looked to Christmas as a welcome relief from the constant struggle with illness. This year there will be no such interlude.

She will not travel to her brother's home for Christmas dinner; the prosthetic hip recently installed to replace a cancerous one, cannot stand the stress of even a few steps. The nails driven through the shoulder to keep it intact have further restricted her activity.

"The termites are in me now and the beams are going. The irrigation system needs some repair work but the roof is still strong. All my life I have thought of this body as my little house. It houses my feelings, my spirit, the real me. I know at this time in my life that it is falling apart, but I still respect it. Sometimes it is hard. With my hair all fallen out I can barely stand to look at myself in the mirror. Because of all this I won't be going home for Christmas. I always loved the family gathered together on the day but this year if I went I would simply cause too much confusion. It would be necessary for me to travel there and back in an ambulance, and since I can no longer get out of this wheelchair it would not even be possible for me to get to the bathroom. No I don't want to go home. I don't want to cause confusion.

"This year I would like to have a little tinsel hung over my bed and maybe have my Christmas cards pasted up on the wall. I'll have Christmas dinner here in the hospital with all the rest, but to tell you the truth I don't really care if they give me turkey. I get it often enough through the week. It's only 58 cents a pound you know."

At Christmas time it is traditional in most of the hospitals throughout the city to plan various festivities which lighten the lives of their residents. The halls and rooms are decorated with holly, tinsel and poinsettias. Christmas trees are trimmed and volunteer choristers fill corridors with sound.

At Our Lady of Mercy there is a Christmas Party, with Santa Claus (alias Louis from the maintenance department) in attendance. There is a gift for each and every patient, except perhaps those to whom the memory of Christmas is a mere fragment of the past, a dream experienced only in their unconscious repose.

The Christmas meal too is exceptional, served on gaily coloured plates and carried on ornamented trays. It is usually a meal of turkey, dressing and Christmas pudding—but only for those not requiring special diets. Medical Science makes no allowances, not even for Christmas.

These festive nuances do much to make the day atypical and to make it pass a little less painfully for those who fail to leave the wards. Some are too sick to go home as is the case of Mary Hodgins. Others simply have nowhere to go. This is the situation in which Dorothy Aldridge of the Queen Elizabeth Hospital finds herself. She has lived in a hospital all her life, since polio struck in the early stages of infancy.

"The weeks leading up to Christmas are very gay. The wards are decorated and various groups come through singing carols or doing plays. It makes a nice change from the rest of the year. There is always something going on.

"On the actual day however it is very lonely. There is no other way to describe it. There are some who go home for a few days to families or friends. There are those who are so old they are in a world to themselves, and Christmas has no meaning for them. There are some who are so sick they would be unable to tell whether it was turkey or roastbeef they were eating. For those of us who are left the day is very lonely.

"The nurses try to help to make the day as joyful as possible, and it is very good of them considering they too are away from families on a very special day. Still, you can't escape the fact that this is a hospital. It is no substitute for a home, there just isn't the same atmosphere. The routine goes on as usual. We have a special Christmas meal and the trays are gaily done up, but something is missing.

"Friends can drop in freely on Christmas day and for the patients who have visitors it is an extra bonus. As a rule I don't have anyone come to see me. I have relatives, but it is very inconvenient for them to visit. They've got their own families now and you can't expect them to give up their time on such a special day."

For these two women, and many others like them, Christmas will be a time of loneliness aggravated by a hospital captivity and their longing for home.

Yet loneliness is not the sole property of the sick and the elderly. They have no corner on the market. It touches us all, reaching out indiscriminately to young and old, man and woman, the ill and the healthy. Perhaps only the smallest of children are quick enough to elude it.

Christmas is a time which either intensifies or alleviates this condition of loneliness. It is a time when togetherness, the family, the home are accentuated to combat the phenomenon, and the sentiments of showing "goodwill toward all men" and "joy to the world", are brought from the world of theory into the world of practice.

Their stay with us lasts but a few brief weeks, and when Christmas trees are stripped bare, the lights are extinguished and the tinsel vanishes from walls, the ghost of the spirit of Christmas vanishes with them.

Perhaps it is only an illusion of which Mary Hodgins and Dorothy Aldridge are robbed. Even so, they deserve that illusion at least as much as anyone else.

Has the age of

The reality of the consumer game that record-buying has become is not shown above.

Aside from the fact that you can't wrap them to disguise their shape, lp records are just about an ideal Christmas gift. Or Chanukah gift, or soistice offering, if you prefer. They're (relatively) inexpensive, and there's usually something to suit everyone's taste.

But just as the gift book market has built up over the past few years, so has the gift record field. It's no longer uncommon for book dealers to report customers entering their store and asking for a recommendation of a book "between $35 and $40." When shown something attractive, but obviously less pricey, they say, "No — it has to look like forty dollars worth of book. I don't mind paying." In other words, book buying (especially in the coffee-table art book category) has become a mindless consumer's game.

We are, I think, about to see the same thing happen with records. For some years now, several European record companies, notably Deutsche Grammophon, have issued "subscription sets" that sell for about six months and are then dropped from the catalogues. Usually these sets have been big, multi-record boxes with lavishly illustrated books or libretti included. I suppose it was only natural that the market for these classical yummys would be expanded into the gift market.

The first big step in this direction was the "Beethoven Edition" of 1970, a mammoth project presenting the complete works of the composer in 12 boxes, accompanied by a large, glossy art book about his life. The 75 records and book set the listener-back over $400. Sales were phenomenal, even surprising DG's parent company Polydor. Two years later, a "Symphony Edition" followed: twelve volumes of Complete Symphonies: Bach, Mozart, Mahler, and so on. The total: 93 records and a fat art-book. Whew.

Nobody ever told these folks that less is more: now another great load of vinyl has been dropped onto the market: The Bach Edition. 99 records, in what is possibly the most luxurious packaging I've ever seen, stamped all over with silver, illustrated with colour plates, and so on. Has the age of the coffee-table record arrived?

The complete eleven-box set will look great on one's shelves; undoubtedly, it's a prestige item of the highest order. And, it's certain that more than a few buyers will go for the set on that basis. But for the more serious collector, is The Bach Edition a worthwhile investment? And an investment it is, because dealers are this year at their liberty to sell the set at full list — $7.98 per record! Full list for the set is $800; the selling price might be $600.

Volume 1 presents two sacred works: the St. John and St. Matthew Passions. These performances, both conducted by Karl Richter, have been available for years: the St. Matthew dates from 1959, the St. John from 1964. Is it worth paying up to $56 for performances over a decade old? There is no shortage of more recent recordings of either of these works.

When the Passions are performed well, one gets the feeling that each part flows out of the last. As the crowning sacred works of a deeply religious man, they represent a high point not just in Baroque music but in music generally, and not just in music, but in all art.

Richter's Bach emphasizes the well-reasoned, the logical, the inevitable quality of the music. He doesn't go the whole authentic-performance route as do some performers, notably Harnoncourt. His orchestra plays with modern instruments, and the stereo sound is recorded realistically; no attempt is made to place you back 300 years.

But with singers like Herman Prey, Ernst Haefliger and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau (caputed at the peak of his younger years, when that glorious bloom was still on his voice,) success is almost assured. Richter's Munich Bach-Orchestra is still one of the world's finest ensembles for Baroque music, and the performance still shines after all these years.

But, as I've suggested, these aren't exactly daring performances. Just last year, DG issued a St. Matthew Passion with Karajan and the Berlin Philharmonic.

That was a rendition vastly different from Richter's, and not to everybody's taste. And it may be

Outcry: Poetic drama in a fun

Widely known as a playwright, Tennessee Williams has also published four collections of short fiction, a novel, and a collection of poetry. His interest in poetry is an old one, some of his earliest published works being poems. It should come as no surprise, then, that his plays often reveal poetic characteristics. Frequently there is an obvious concern for the rhythms and sounds in his dialogue, an obvious attention to repetition and patterns. However, some of his plays reveal a deeper poetic basis than these surface details might suggest. Outcry, which is the current production at the Global Village (continuing until Dec. 7,) is one of these plays.

In many ways Outcry is a poem that has been put on the stage. It is, in a fundamental sense, poetic drama even though it is not verse drama. That is, it appears that Williams' conception of the play, of what it does and how it works, is much like the conception of what a poem does and how it does it. Words, for example, are chosen not only for their meanings, but for their connotations as well. They suggest as well as define. One complete sentence in Outcry is an excellent example of Williams' poetic conception of the play. "Yes, I've noticed that, too, on these long, long tours — unalterable circumstances, 'Pox vobiscum', P-O-X — rhymes with Fox . . ." (Williams' ellipsis). Seemingly unimportant, a non sequitur, the implications of this line range from the religious connections of the Latin pax vobiscum to the English equivalent — Peace be with you — to the transformation of pax to pox and the idea of "a pox upon you." Thus, the complexity of this one line is such that it manages to combine a religious blessing with a personal curse. It is this apparently offhand inclusion of a word, a line, an image, without further explanation, that betrays the basically poetic conception of the play.

More important than the way this conception determines word choice, however, is the way in which it forces the play to function. Williams has said that he prefers a play "not to be a noose but a net with fairly wide meshes," and Outcry is an application of this idea. For, unlike most plays, Outcry is not primarily concerned with telling a story, any more than "The Wastelad" is designed to tell a story, although stories are told in both works.

The story that is contained within this net concerns two actors — a brother and sister, Felice and Clare Devoto — who find themselves alone on tour in some state theatre, deserted by their fellow actors, their manager, and even the stage hands. With only incomplete properties — a staircase that ends in mid-air, cushions without a sofa — they proceed to present a play about two people named Felice and Clare Devoto, a play which shows the way in which these two people bind themselves together through fear and desperation following the murder-suicide of their parents. They are afraid to leave their house, yet afraid to remain in the house; afraid to admit that they need someone else, yet afraid to be alone. It is this feeling of fear, of being bound to ourselves and to others whether we wish to be or not that Williams attempts to communicate.

The fact that in this play this feeling is presented by two actors who have been deserted by their company because they are thought to be insane does not argue against the genuineness of the feeling. R.D. Laing, among others, has argued that the seemingly incoherent statements of a schizophrenic are not distortions of reality, but actually are that person's reality. If the person says, "I am dead," he is not indulging in poetic symbolism; he truly experiences himself as being dead. Thus it is unimportant whether or not a boy actually shoots rocks against the Devoto house; Clare hears the rocks and feels them enough to cause her to drop the telephone receiver in the middle of a conversation. It is unimportant whether or not voices from the street call out, "Loonies, loonie." Felice hears the voices, and they are enough to cause him to close the front door in order to shut them out. If a person tries, while watching the performance, to decide whether these things actually happened or whether they are poetic symbolism, he will miss the significance contained in Outcry, for Outcry has a reality which is beyond question — the reality of the schizophrenic's perception, the reality of a poem.

The richness which such a poetic conception can give a play is great, as the "pox vobiscum" example shows. But the disadvantages of such a conception are also great and Outcry does not escape these. T.S. Eliot, who was certainly familiar with these same poetic techniques, recognized the problems of combining poetic and dramatic forms. "The poem can wait a little while; the approval of a few sympathetic and judicious critics is enough to begin with . . . But in the theatre . . . the unknown audience cannot be expected to show any indulgence towards the poet." The ultimate question about the Global Village's production of Outcry is whether it works for the audience, whether it overcomes the disadvantages inherent in the play.

Considering the complexities and difficulties involved, this production does work to a surprising extent. The production makes an admirable attempt to use all of its resources to express and reinforce the complex feelings in the play. For example, Kenneth Mathew Ney's rendering of the cluttered backstage of the theatre in which the Devotos find themselves is rightly dominated by a statue which reaches from the floor to the ceiling. Covered in grey and green cloth, it reflects the ambivalence in the play by being at once vaguely formless, yet vaguely human. With ropes and chains wrapped around it, it is both menacing and impotent.

Likewise, Jack Wetherall manages to give his Felice Devoto, a defeated character desperately trying to control the "unalterable circumstances" in which he finds himself, a sense of strength while on the way to defeat, a strength that comes from his desperation. It is a strength that is seen when Felice pounds on the stage with a staff in order to quiet the audience. What the audience sees is a man who is not just quieting an audience, but also trying to quiet whatever it is that the coffee-table record finally arrived?

that the rest of the boxes in this huge set will follow suit with safe, "standard" performances, as would befit a label like Archive, DG's history of music division.

The Bach edition is like an encyclopedia of the composer's music: not the most earth-shattering performances, but straightforward and reliable.

One note, though: the free-book offer, so popular with the Beethoven and Symphony editions, has been dropped. Instead, the kicker for buying the whole set comes in the form of records. When you buy volume I, you get an empty box to hold the records from vol. XI, and the first record of the box comes inside vol. I. You get more records to fill the empty box (the music is "Harpischord Music, part II") with each successive purchase. The obvious disadvantage of this approach is that if one doesn't all the volumes, one doesn't get all of vol. XI, although I'm told that the bonus albums will be made available separately.

DG, as I said earlier, isn't the only company with complete-edition fever, although they are the most Christmas-oriented one. A more admirable project than the Bach edition has been appearing, volume by volume for the past two years from London Records: the complete Haydn Symphonies. This is a more valuable recording effort than the Bach, because the recordings are all new, many of them the first stereo recordings ever of some of the less-famous of the 104 works of the "father of the Symphony." (All the Bach works have been recorded before — most of the Bach Edition is, in fact, a reissue).

Iring Kolodin has called the Haydn symphonic repertoire "a priceless adjunct to human happiness." Where Mozart wrote his first symphony when he was barely out of diapers (and listening to every symphony in order will show the progression from wunderkind to genius) Haydn's works are more consistent. Certainly, the last twelve symphonies, the celebrated "London" symphonies, are unquestioned masterpieces, but there are treasures previously unknown in the first fifty of these delightful works.

Part of the reason for the anonymity of the early symphonies is logistical: how to decide which ones to play, especially when concert-hall tradition has falsely decided which ten or twelve are "standard" repertoire? The only logical answer is to hear all of them, a heavy task to undertake, whether you're a musician, conductor or listener.

Still, Antal Dorati must have felt the need so strongly that the prospect of recording all the Haydn symphonies became a task of utmost importance. In forty-six records (the last six haven't been released yet) Dorati and his ensemble of expatriate Hungarians, the Philharmonia Hungarica, have charted waters unknown to the average listener. Included with each set is a descriptive booklet, authored by none other than H.C. Robbins-London, possibly the most knowledgeable Haydn specialist writing today. If you want to give the musical gift of a lifetime, this might well be it. And, where the DG box sets cost an alarming $7.98 per record, the London sets go for $3.98 per. These are, it's true, budget-priced records, but the performances are all new and the pressed-in-Canada records are quite acceptable in sound quality, even if they don't meet the sky-high DG standards.

Another complete-edition package, this one from Angel, also goes the budget route, but this one is a reissue, and an historic one at that. The past few years have seen three complete recordings of Wagner's four-opera cycle "The ring of the Nibelungs", with big-league conductors, orchestras and singers. But lingering in the vaults of Radio Italiana was a rare set of lacquered masters: a complete Ring, conducted by the late Wilhelm Furtwangler for radio broadcast in 1953.

The cast was the stuff of legend: Wolfgang Windgassen, Gustav Neidlinger, Gottlob Frick, Sena Jurinac, Martha Modl, Hile Rossi-Majdan and many other leading singers participated in recordings before a live audience. Only one act was performed each night, to keep everybody fresh and on their toes for the critical audience. The sessions were classics, and many collectors wondered aloud, over the years, if they'd ever have a chance to have these performances for themselves.

EMI wanted to release the records for several years, but the releases and granting of permission from the dozens of artists involved took ages. What's more, the lacquered masters had begun to deteriorate, so RECLAM, a firm specializing in restoration of such things, was called in to see if the music could be salvaged at all. Finally, the grand day arrived, all hassles were cleared out of the way, and the 19-record set started to pour off the presses. The four operas are individually boxed (and individually available, too), with a one-record "Introduction to the Ring" included.

This "Introduction" is one of the most informative opera discs on the Ring in a long time. A few years back, scholar Deryk Cooke issued on a three-record London package, an "Introduction" that described the ring from a musical-analysis point of view, identifying the various themes with the appropriate characters and situations in the epic story. Seraphim's "Introduction" just tells the story of the four operas, using one narrator and judiciously selected morsels from the hours of music that are contained in the rest of the set. Because each part of the story is told to the accompaniment of its companion musical theme, the effect is much the same as on the Cooke set, but it's much more approachable for the opera newcomer.

The sound, as you may have guessed, is a little prehistoric. The mono remains, thankfully unaltered by any attempt to "electronically simulate stereo." If you turn down the treble a bit, the sonics are quite acceptable. But ignoring the question of price, what makes this a performance worth having? Well, it's not called "historic" just because it's old. Furtwangler had an approach to Wagner completely different from the Sturm-und-Drang of Solti or the sublime lyricism of Karajan. His was an interpretation solidly from the Bayreuth tradition, with sweeping waves of sound encompassing the listener. For scholars of conducting, this set is a magnificent document of an interpretive tradition that's nearly died out. For lesser mortals, this is a sturdy, well-forged Ring, and the bargain price of less than $60 (a lot less if you shop around) makes it one of the most attractive gift items I can think of — even if you give it to yourself.

Let's say you don't want to smother your loved one in a huge pile of records: there are literally hundreds of good releases this fall, ideal for giving or getting. A curious phenomenon of late has been the K-Tel approach (24 top hits! 24 top stars!) in classical records. Almost every company doggedly issued a "Greatest Hits" line, and Deutsche Grammophon, apparently not to be outdone, put out dozens of releases in their "Festival of Hits" series, some of them pretty far-fetched: "Festival of Stockhausen Hits" (no, I'm not making this up). Now, in an org of anthology-issuing, they've come out with "The Super Concert" and "Festival of Hits", both two-record sets that sell for $7.98, and both made up of standard, light-classical favourites.

The major differences between the two seem to be of packaging: "Super" features a shot of the Berlin Philharmonic in concert taking a bow, "Festival" sports a photo of a woman from midriff-down, bared above the waist, wearing a pair of jeans. The photograph is bleached so that everything is white. Her fly is open. The fly reveals a line of music, printed in bright colours. Symbolic, huh? The two approaches remind me of a company that issued a paperback dictionary this fall in two formats: standard reference-book cover and blue denim. The same book, two different markets.

Well, both these twin-packs are, though not pretty much the same: an enjoyable mix of orchestral and solo music, well-recorded and at a good price. Take your pick of the packaging, I guess.

Two more DG items are interesting: entitled the "Love Experience" and the "Divine Experience", these one-record packages purport to aim at the "youth market" with a selection of music from the Renaissance to the Modern with each section based on the respective title theme. The selection, with the exception of obvious numbers like the "Love-Death from Wagner's Tristan and Isolde on "love" and part of Bach's Cantata no. 51 on "Divine" is eclectic and confusing. I couldn't say if the 4th movement from Mozart's 29th symphony belongs on a record of Love experiences, Divine ones, or any particular group. It's a noble attempt to classify the music, but it doesn't work. The graphics, illustrations and selections of poetry on the inside covers are attractive, but these albums are really no more than greatest-hits discs in a new shape. Not bad or good; it depends on whether or not you want them; the music contained within has certainly proved itself before.

Finally, there's what has to be the silliest and most endearing concept of the year: remember all the James Last "Non-Stop Dancing 1967"-type records, issued one every year, spotlighting the year's biggest pop tunes? DG has its little joke on Polydor's pop division with "Non-Stop Dancing 1600", a fresh, beautiful rendered collection of honest-to-god dance tunes from the Renaissance, performed by the Collegium Terschichore with the able assistance of guitarist Sigfried Behrend. This is one greatest-hits record that really hits the spot; try it at your next dance party.

So, hohoho. Choose something nice for someone you like. Buy yourself something nice, too. If you want a money-saving tip, though, give your loved one a piece of paper, not a record, especially if the big box-sets I described sound attractive. Put on the paper: "Good for . . . (name of album) . . . to be bought on Boxing Day." In case you're not familiar with the Boxing Day sales, you can save a fair amount on deluxe packages like the Bach edition if you wait, 'cause after Xmas, the market dries up.

fundamental sense

threatens him from without and within.

Patricia Bentley-Fisher's Clare Devoto bore an unfortunate resemblance to Katherine Hepburn at first; nevertheless, as the play progressed she also developed a complex, weak yet strong character to complement Felice. She and Jack Wetherall worked together very well as they showed how Clare's strength carries both characters when Felice's strength fails.

Tom Bentley-Fisher's direction is an attempt to connect Williams' many tentative suggestions as much as possible, and organize these suggestions so that they remain far-reaching without becoming scattered. Translated to the stage, this effort is seen in such scenes as the one in which Felice explains that he has stepped outside the house where he and his sister have shut themselves up but that he can move "not a step further," that it is "impossible without her." Standing before the audience with his hands clenched at his side, his general outline is the same as that of the statue towering directly behind him, both of them bound up, chained in place. This is the way in which Williams' "fairly wide meshes" must be drawn together if the audience is to be held by the play, and by and large the direction does this.

All of which is not to say that this is a flawless production; it is not. The rapid delivery of the lines sometimes results in their being lost to the audience, as the "pox vobiscum" line was surely lost to anyone unfamiliar with the play, as most people are likely to be. In addition, there are shortcomings in the script which inevitably affect the production. The "fairly wide meshes" are frequently extremely wide, as the actors and the director are quick to admit. There are a great many loose ends which do not come together and do not bear enough significance to function on their own, such as the shirt Felice wears which bears a chart of the sky as it was on the day his father was born. As part of the poetic conception of the play many of these images do contribute to evoking the feeling which the play requires, but like the shirt, many of them also tend to negate any attempt to unify the production into a "correct" performance. There are too many connotations, ambiguities, and suggestions for this.

Consequently, in a program note the company admits that what they "present now is perhaps only the tip of an iceberg, yet the material is so rich, the problems so challenging to actors and director . . . that we feel a need at this point to share our exploration." This complexity led to the decision to present the play as a "work in progress." The production began as an exercise and was intended to be viewed as such. When the company came to Toronto and the Global Village offered them the space, they wished to continue the production on this basis, hoping to exchange ideas with drama students and others in a series of workshops where scenes from the play would be presented and then alternative suggestions would be discussed and, possibly, tried out. They have been disappointed, however, because for some reason there has been no great interest in the workshops, and this opportunity for give and take between professionals and non-professionals has largely passed by unnoticed.

Nevertheless, the Global Village has taken up this idea, and proposes to use it for a series of productions, explaining that, "We at the Global Village feel that through our Works in Progress series, pieces can be presented in a more relaxed and informal manner . . ." Although no titles have been announced for the rest of the series, it is to be hoped that the plays will be "works in progress" only because despite as thorough an exploration and as polished a production as Gutry has received, they also are too complex to be set down in a final, unalterable form. If this is the case, and the productions are not "works in progress" because the director and actors and technicians have been unable to get everything ready for opening night, then like Gutry they may be an interesting and useful addition to the theatrical opportunities already available in Toronto.

Agatha's Mousetrap

Agatha Christie's The Mousetrap is a real tickler. You have your suspicions that every one of the eccentric characters might be the murderer Sergeant Trotter is seeking, but you're never sure. And it's frustrating. But it's also a lot of fun to be teased like that.

I'm really not allowed to tell you about the plot because I've been sworn to secrecy. Apparently, audiences in London have been observing official silence outside the theatre for twenty-three years, which is the length of time this mystery has run in that city.

During intermission I was trying to think of a comment that would sum up the mood of the play. And I noticed some kids in the audience jumping around and shouting "Who stole the cookies from the cookie jar". That's it! Sure, you care about who gets killed and who the murderer is, but the whole thing is too enjoyable to seem destructive.

The cast of this Toronto Truck Theatre production includes two fine performers from the U of T Graduate Centre for the Study of Drama, Terry Slater and Michael Macina. Their presence seems to heighten the lunacy in any play they are in. The Mousetrap doesn't allow them to portray the depth of characterization both showed in Harry Noon and Night last month at Glen Morris theatre. Still, they don't overplay their roles, but act very well indeed within the limitations of the script.

When the play's London producers released publicity on the twenty-third anniversary of the opening of the run, they included this sort of statistic: "During the run, forty-one miles of shirts have been ironed". They might not have commemorated a great tragedy or comedy with that information.

But as a mystery, The Mousetrap is superb. Those who appreciate light drama with plenty of red herrings and crazy characters will like this play.

Hurrah for Johnny ?

Hurray for Johnny Canuck, the current offering at the Factory Theatre Lab, is certainly entertaining.

Equally true, it's very forgettable. The play is written and directed by Ken Gass on the basis of the Canadian comic books which appeared during the second World War when the importation of foreign comic books were banned as non-essentials, (along with a lot of other things).

It features such characters as Derek Bras d'Or, a Quebecois muscleman, Corporal Dixon of the RCMP, Ruth Barton of the Canadian Red Cross, Johnny himself, a former lumberjack on whose shoulders rests the fate of the free world, and Major Domo, whose Canadian content significance is not readily obvious.

The villains are Nazism and Fascism in general and Hitler in particular.

There's not much more you need to know. It's not hard to guess who wins.

Perhaps the play might have been more interesting if it had been related to the view Canada had of itself in the fifties and early sixties not in comic books but in the halls of government as saviour of the world by virtue of a position as mediator between the superpowers and the Third World. Or perhaps it should have dealt with the syndicate which created these comics and with its attempt to gain a quick buck from a captive audience.

Workshop lacks imagination

Veronica Tennant and Winthrop Corey in "Sonata".

The National Ballet's second annual Choreographic Workshop was the biggest disappointment of the season.

Last year's show, although uneven, was exciting, full of energy and fun. The dancers, the audience and the musicians had a great time.

This year the number of choreographers was cut to three: Ann Ditchburn, James Kudelka, and Constatin Patsalas.

Four works were presented: "Afterhours", a bit of Victorian caricature, by Ditchburn; "Sonata", a lyrical ballet set to Frank's Sonata in A Major for Violin and Piano, by Kudelka; "Kisses", five pas de deux (can you guess?) different kinds of kisses, by Ditchburn; and the monster of the evening, "A Work in Progress", danced to Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring", by Patsalas.

The results were mediocre to say the least.

You felt that dancers and choreographers alike were held in a vice — a vice created by all the series of ballet steps so carefully drilled into their heads for years.

During all four numbers, there was not one original movement that looked good. There were plenty that didn't work, plenty in which the dancers appeared contorted uncomfortable and embarrassed.

To make matters worse, the technique that was required, for example in the "Work in Progress", was sadly lacking. If a male dancer cannot execute a pirouette, and lands badly every time, why is he in the number, struggling to catch up with the rest of the corps?

Three dancers did manage to shine.

Veronica Tennant gave her usual flawless performance. She deserves better dances, and a bigger stage.

Sonia Perusse was electrifying in her duet with Wendy Reiser. This pas de deux was the only valid dance of the workshop. The music by Lauro Nyro ("Emmie") and the dancing were most closely related, emotionally and rhythmically, — which was not the case in the "Sonata", where the feeling was at times that of watching a movie with a non-related sound track.

But the man to keep an eye on, the man who shone above the rest, was Miquel Garcia. His quietly underplayed role in "Afterhours" was clean, exact, and amusing.

In "Work in Progress" he alone held my attention. With fifteen dancers crowded on a small stage, that is no mean feat.

The National needs to raise $600,000 to break even this year. It is hard to imagine where this money is going to come from, when the young choreographers, products of the National Ballet, are so uninspired.

Starting Over The Raspberries Capital

The Raspberries until recently have aroused very little attention. They just seemed to be one of those insignificant bands that seemed to be getting by while trying to find their own musical niche. Starting Over should change all that. The Raspberries have found themselves, and no doubt people will be finding out about them soon enough. They've gone back to their roots, the music that got them rockin' and rollin' as teenagers in Cleveland. That's not to say that Starting Over is in any way a nostalgia album. What it is, is an album that derives its vitality and even its essence from the classic rockers of the 60's. "Cruisin' Music", for example, is a testament to its title, owing much to its Beach Boys type harmonies. "I Don't Know What I Want" lashes out with the energy the Who had during their more productive times. On "Play On", the band combines to put out a sound reminiscent of the Beatles when they were really winding out a number. The harmonies on the choruses, in fact, are dead ringers for the four immortals, yet in no way are they a pretentious copy. "Party's Over" and "All Through the Night" are rockers in the Mick Jagger-Rod Stewart tradition, but both are void of the raggedness that have hampered these two better knowns in recent performances. The album's truly momentous number though is its opener, "Overnight Sensation" which is subtitled "Hit Record." The song opens with a simple but effective piano and vocal introduction, but with the shakes of a tambourine breaks into a lusciously produced expose of an artist's deep need for recognition. The band's vocal performance falls little short of excellence and Wally Bryson's instrumental leadership is more than admirable. The album as a whole seldom shows signs of weakness, save perhaps for Scott McCarl's "Rose Coloured Glasses" which belongs to an earlier Raspberries sound. The Raspberries have finally discovered themselves: discovering a welcome audience with this type of product should come much easier. rob bennett Mother Lode

Loggins & Messina
A couple of years ago Jim Messina, ex-Buffalo Springfield and Poco member, went into the studio to produce an LP by a then unknown singer named Kenny Loggins. The two got along so well that the record credited Jim Messina with "sittin' in". The arrangement became a fulltime job for both and since that day the duo has released four excellent LPs. Loggins and Messina came at a time when rock was becoming too loud and aimless, and their melodies were like a breath of fresh air. Mother Lode proves again that Loggins & Messina have the ability to write and perform songs which are far above your average run of the mill tune. They also have a band, that uses horns, flutes, saxophones and percussion instruments superbly. But their music, has become dull — dull and pointless. The problem with Mother Lode may lie in the fact that Loggins & Messina have gotten into a rut and their material has become repetitious. Qualitatively this is a fine record but quantitatively it is like eating too much of something you like so that you only end up feeling bloated. Loggins and Messina have achieved a high level of quality. But the failure to go higher may be causing them to stagnate — or else the listener to become indifferent. serge schardt

Billy Joel

Billy Joel is a rock singer whose material bears the impress of the tribulations and sociological oddities of a modern balladeer's nomadic existence on the concert circuit. This was obvious of course when "Piano Man" soared to the top of the charts, telling as it did, of the years of hardship and obscurity which the piano-bar performer endured as apprenticeship to his current role as "The Entertainer".

Joel uses real-life situations to fabricate his tunes — "I do my writing on my road guitar, and make a living out of piano-bars," — as the lines of "Worse Comes To Worst" attest.

His follow-up album to Piano Man is titled Streetlife Serenade, and while it doesn't have the dynamism of his first Columbia release, it certainly shows the pianist-composer as no one-shot wonder on the rock scene.

The second release coincided with Joel's third tour of Massey Hall in just less than a year. The first visit was a warmup act for the Doobies, the second a triumphal and captivating concert as headliner, while the recent appearance indicated that a star had indeed been born.

The usual foot-stomping clamour for an encore from an engaging act became a warm appeal for more and more of Joel's fantastic piano arrangements played by his tight supercharged sidemen. Seeming a bit overwhelmed by the arm-stretching adulation of a swarm of stage-rushers, Joel came out for curtain calls far beyond the expected number, and finally humbly admitted that the verbal "thank you's" wore thin after a few times. He resorted to one of his best compositions as a sincere expression of the way the full house at Massey had moved him, singing "If I Only Had The Words (To Tell You)".

Donovan

Donovan Leitch was very much a child of the '60's. So were we all. As a supposed grownup of the 70's he seems to be struggling for something to say, and without any new movements or cults to be the spokesman for, he's had to turn to his audience and say "Why Not Reminisce?" On Tuesday night at Massey Hall that's exactly what he did.

After opening with the still catchy "Sunshine Superman" in front of a bizarre collage stage set, and then trying out a mediocre rocker titled "Rock and Roll Soldier", Donovan parlayed across the stage away from his four piece band to lead us in a fire side type sing-song.

It was here the show got underway. He began with a tripey little diatribe about the materialistic industrial dream of post war parents, and how we were all subjected to this as children of the 60's, and of course how we all rebelled against it. He continued to use his own songs, both old and new, to prove his, I hope, tongue-cheek, theory of the history of the past decade.

Though the entire concept failed, its individual components were at times childishly amusing, as was Donovan himself, still looking no more than a slender 17.

The second set lacked the pretentiousness of the first, but provided about the same relevance. It was packed with all his hits of yesteryear, and after hearing them again, one could quickly realize how long it's really been since we've heard Donovan on the radio.

The real clincher to the evening came though when Donovan made his audience plead for an encore. Before leaving the stage he had to watch all his adoring fans jump to their feet and adorn him with their overabundant praise. After witnessing this for a few satisfying minutes he retreated to the stage door, where he waited a few more moments before responding with a reappearance for "Lalena". This was the proper aesthetic end to the evening, but he came back for yet another encore, and brought the whole tone of the evening down another notch by ending with a bland rocker called "Bye Bye Girl." It was interesting to note that he played only his old hit singles or cuts from his new album "7-tease." Even he has realised that his last few albums had little to offer with any weight. But then again a nostalgia show isn't all that bad; it usually heralds an artist's last hurrah. Hurrah!

Renaissance

Much of what is wrong with "progressive rock" today is simply that it is not progressive. Everything that I've heard in the past four years that has been labelled "progressive rock" has in fact been either a well-produced wall of sound, pieced together by an over-indulgent play-session with a synthesizer, or nothing more than an isomorphism of an innovation in jazz (or for that matter, in classical music). This applies to the big groups as well as to the small — perhaps even more so to them — to Yes, to Rick Wakeman, to Genesis, to Emerson, Lake and Palmer. I might be led to believe that Pink Floyd's early material involves a novel element and that John Mills-Cockell's synthesizer work leads us into seemingly untouched areas. But don't tell me that when Rick Wakeman plays "Catherine Howard" that he is introducing something totally new to the cultural mainstream. He's merely a very talented musician-composer practising his craft.

Renaissance practises the same kind of ultimately frustrating competence. Renaissance performed at Con Hall last Friday.

I expected a lot from the concert. I can still recall the first time I listened to "Rajah Khan" the concluding piece to Prologue, their first album released in Canada. Annie Haslam's vocals were breathtaking and uplifting. It promised a great future but itself remains their best work.

Renaissance didn't play "Rajah Khan" last Friday — a decision that is perhaps reflective of their growing concern with faring well commercially. Gary Dunford, the group's song writer, has opted for writing a succession of songs since then, that are certainly pleasant but equally certainly not at all innovative.

Technical sophistication is no viable substitute for art. The use of the synthesizer by Renaissance and, as a consequence, the group sound, imply fine craftsmanship, but not art. But perhaps demanding artistic innovation from the rock bands of today is something that is irrelevant to their existence. Commercial and consequently entertainment considerations are much higher on the list of priorities. Sad but true.

Never Done
Herstory
Canadian Women's Educational Press

What is Neverdone? The homework, the dishes, the cleaning, the shopping. It is also the title of a new book by the Corrective Collective about the history of women's work in Canada.

It is the first attempt to present Canadian history from a woman's point of view, concentrating solely on women's roles in the building and shaping of Canadian society.

Never Done is not your everyday history text. It is a combination of well researched information, imaginative anecdotes and an interesting format. As a result of this eclectic combination, the history refuses to remain in the book. Guided by a personal narrator, the reader progresses through women's experience in pioneer Canada to a study of women's roles in an increasingly complex Canadian society. The point is made that although the scope of women's jobs has expanded, their primary function has remained the same — helping and supporting men. It is ironic that improvements have only changed the complexion of women's lives, not their basic nature.

The Corrective Collective, a group of five Vancouver women, spent two years researching the material for this book. The Collective made a special effort to present the narrative in an easily accessible form and language, avoiding academic jargon and footnotes.

The analysis of Capitalism's accelerating effect upon women's work is an integral part of the book. For instance, the book makes the point that although wealthier women formed aid societies for women their motives were mixed. Along with a genuine desire to improve women's conditions was their belief in the necessity of domestic help.

A lot of people expect history to deal with the lives of famous people. It is to the credit of the Corrective Collective that they refer to these people only in passing, preferring to concentrate upon the daily personal life of the majority of women in Canada.

Another book published this fall by the Women's Press is Herstory, a pictorial calendar of women's contributions to Canadian life. In its second year of publication, it combines biographies, poems and general information.

The Women's Educational Press was formed in the fall of 1971, following the consistent refusal of Canadian publishers to accept the manuscript of Women Unite!, a collection of case histories of women's groups, and of historical and theoretical essays. Women's liberation is a fad, the publishers said, and the book, then a manuscript of 900 pages, was called unmarketable.

Since its publication, Women Unite! has sold more than 7,000 copies.

The Press has two major aims, to publish works by, for, and about women and to create a non-hierarchical Canadian publishing company. Both are easier said than done.

environment where most skills such as editing, typesetting and the mechanics of distribution are self-taught and shared, requires a great deal of flexibility and communication between the members, to say the least. Much energy and time have to be taken up in defining exactly what is meant by an alternate work relationship, how various roles are defined, how to become a professional operation with the efficiency and organization that implies without losing the non-hierarchical structure. People have different work habits, different sets of priorities. When the press was smaller, these differences could be worked with fairly easily. But as the Press as grown and expanded, it has become more necessary to get more things done in a set amount of time. Taking differences into account, versus the old norm of working along more rigid, organizational lines becomes more and more difficult.

Currently and in the past the press has been supported by LIP grants. Publishing in Canada is a marginal industry, and there is a chronic lack of financial support. For small basically non-profit businesses like the Women's Press, there are also few sources of permanent financing.

The collective is made up of eighteen members, six of whom are salaried. Their goal is not only to produce excellent books, both in terms of the writing and organization and the aesthetic appeal, but also to see more non-sexist literature in libraries and schools and to expose more people to women's issues.

Daisy
Alta Lind Cook
Centre Educatif et Culturel

Daisy is the name of a delightful little flower who always says the first thing that pops into her head, and says it both in English and French because she is completely bilingual.

She exists in the pages of a new book called, naturally enough, Daisy. The book was written and illustrated by retired Victoria College French professor, Alta Lind Cook.

The book is beguiling in its simplicity, being a collection of about 155 simple line drawings showing Daisy striking various balletic attitudes with appropriate bilingual comments.

Daisy has drawn pleasant reviews from the few critics who have noticed her in the last few months.

St. Mike's own Marshall McLuhan wrote, "Daisy presents the 'bouncing line' that is the indispensable tactile means of involvement. Daisy's wit and whimsy are also involving because they are short and sharp, quaint and acute. Her idioms ask much of the reader."

On the other side of the fence, Keith Spicer, Canada's Commissaire aux langues officielles, said, "C'est en riant que l'on corrige les moeurs, et Mlle Cook, dans cet ouvrage délicieux, se revele une moraliste d'un style a la fois classique et original."

Les souvenirs peuvent être aigre-doux.

Memories can be bitter-sweet.

Daisy's creator enjoys talking about her creation, and often during the course of our conversation at her Tranby St. home, referred to Daisy as though she were real rather than just a drawing.

"Daisy just grew out of my self-conscious as a doodle years ago. It was something to do during my travels," Cook explains.

"At first Daisy was completely in English, but once when I was staying in Rimouski, Quebec, some French people in my hotel asked me, 'Why not make her bilingual?', so I did."

Cook entertains a level-headed opinion of Daisy, even though it's obvious she's quite enamored of her flower.

"Of course, Daisy's an awful fool, and says whatever comes into her head, immediately. But the sheer absurdity of her should help make people laugh, and perhaps help them learn a little French besides."

The former Vic french professor says, "The only sanity in learning a language is to be able to speak it."

"But so many students have no idea at all how to make the learning of language interesting," she says. They go about it very technically, memorizing words, the position of prepositions, and so on.

"Well, to really learn French, or any language, it's much easier to learn a word or a group of words that expresses an image. It's just as easy to swallow seven words as one word when it expresses one clear image."

"This is what Daisy does. Each of her attitudes is accompanied by a common expression such as 'Prices keep going up' or 'It served me right' and their French equivalents."

In reading Daisy's sputtings, then, we turn first to our own language because it's more familiar and then to the other. Eventually, we get quite a vocabulary to express certain common emotions or situations, and that provides an immediately interesting and solid base for learning French, Cook explains.

"Daisy takes us out of the textbooks and into life," Cook says. "In fact, I recommend a Daisy-a-day for those who want to learn French. They should take it and incorporate it into their own circumstances." "Why are people so gloomy about learning French anyway?"

"I hope if Daisy accomplishes what I hope she'll influence people to take a light-hearted approach and abandon grief in becoming bilingual."

Promoters in general tend to jic low in December, and this year provides no exception to the rule. After tonight's George Harrison extravaganza (for which you can still get some tickets) things look pretty quiet for the Christmas season. For Rhythm and Blues fans there is Dione Warwick at the O'Keefe Centre with the Miracles all next week, followed the week after by the O'Jays and Johnny Nash.

SAC is offering one more show Dec. 12 when they present Manfred Mann and the Earth Band. CPI is trying their concert bowl idea once again on Dec. 16 with the ever tedious, but sure to draw, Genesis.

Egerton's is offering a rather pleasing lineup over the holidays, with Terri Jones and Hummingbird closing Saturday to be followed in upcoming weeks by Jesse Winchester and Len Udow & Pat Godfrey. The El Mocambo, this week features The Good Brothers, who will be followed subsequently by Hound Dog Taylor, Charlie Mingus and the Downchild Blues Band. The Chimney seems to have begun a policy of sticking to local talent with Chris Kearney closing Saturday, and Myles & Lenny and the Rhythm Rockets coming in for the next two weeks.

Beaver's, at Victoria College, will return as planned in the new year, with a likely lineup including John Allan Cameron, Tony Kosinec and the Original Sloth Band, to name a few.

New albums to look out for over the holidays include offerings from Paul McCartney and Bob Dylan, and a double live album from Joni Mitchell which unfortunately includes only one tune, "People's Parties", from her delightful Court and Spark LP.

theatre

On Campus: Three very diverse shows on campus this week. Dennis Potter's Son of Man, the new testament according to Sartre, opens at U.C. Playhouse December 11 at 8:30 (Runs 11-14 and 18-21). Also at the Playhouse this afternoon at 1 pm the final performance of Alexander's Blok's melancholy Harlequinade The Puppet Show. Tonight and tomorrow, a Bloomsbury assortment of short plays collectively entitled Bloomers will be presented in the Glen Morris St. Theatre at 8:30. Admission to the plays is free.

Off Campus: My first choice of last week's openings, The Rivals at the St. Lawrence, proved a dull lump of a thing rather than the confection Sheridan intended. Mrs. Malaprop and Sir Antony are the only plums, and perhaps it's worth seeing just for them. (Closes December 21), one new opening this week: a double bill at the Firehall comprising Noel Coward's Still Life and Christopher Fry's Phoenix too Frequent. (December 11-15). If you haven't done so already, you should try to see St. Nicholas Hotel, the second Donnelly play in Reaney's Ontario trilogy at the Tarragon (till December 22). Johnny Canuck is flexing away over at Factory Lab., and at the Royal Alex another illustrious hero — ex-presidential advisor, actor, writer and committee sitter, Douglas Fairbanks Junior — turns comic for The Pleasure of his Company. (Run ends December 21). Carol Bolt's Shelter at the Firehall closes tomorrow, as does Lonesco's Macbett (Theatre du P'tit Bonheur) and Tennessee William's Outcry at Global Village.

art

The Marlborough-Godard Gallery features a masters exhibit this month including Francis Bacon, Picasso, Degas and Matisse; Jeremy Smith is in the upstairs gallery. A few doors down Nancy Poole's Studio has put together works and 'objets d'art' in a variety of media and she will also be showing a new print by Jack Chambers. Paintings, watercolours and serigraphs by another "magic realist", Ken Danby, at the Gallery Moos. Also in Yorkville are several group shows — the new Evans Gallery has assembled new work by gallery artists including Kazuo Hamasaki and the Gadatsy Gallery has Joe Rosenblatt and Florence Vale in addition to regular artists.

Ceramics by Picasso, Leger and others at the Albert White Gallery on Prince Arthur and the Inuit Gallery at the end of the street has Eskimo sculpture, hangings and prints showing for the month. At the Gallery Dresdner you can catch the tail end of the Norman Laliberte exhibit of gorgeous banners and the Isaac's nearby has paintings by John MacGregor. Further south on Yonge Street the Roberts Gallery is showing Adrien Dingle as well as batiks and decorated cloths by Stephen Wildridge.

Beside hand-blown glass and 19th century posters the Pollock Gallery is showing kinetic sculpture by Kalleja. Sculpture by Vincent Tangredy at A Space. Pan Gallery on Sackville St. has mounted a special exhibit of posters for children. The Pascal, Merton and Aggregation Galleries all have new group shows for Christmas.

Take advantage of the holidays to visit or revisit the AGO. "Impressionism in Canada" will be up till January. There are also new paintings by Claude Tousignant and the new travelling exhibit, "The Shape of Things to Come", hanging in the education gallery. Early Canadian watercolours continues at the Sigmund Samuel Canadiana library until January 2.

thanks

"For the skidding car," says Mrs. A., in Auden's The Ascent of F6, "For the skidding car, and the neighbours' gossip.

Are more terrifying to us than the smirking leap of the tiger;

And the shop-fronts at Christmas a greater marvel than Greece."

To which Mr. A. replies, "Let our fears and our achievements be sufficient to our day."

Perhaps only at Christmas is it really all as easy to "let our fears and our achievements be sufficient to our day" perhaps only at a Christmas vaguely glimpsed on the other side of a hard stretch of exams and essay-writing.

Nevertheless, I'm grateful to all those who have helped make the Varsity Review in any way "sufficient," this term.

Film: The Taking of Pelham: 1,2,3

The taking of Pelham: one two three is still playing at the Uptown and no doubt will pose a temptation during the holidays. The film is getting good reviews but it really isn't worth seeing.

The acting, dialogue, cutting, camerawork, and overall directing are good but when put together with an implausible script the whole thing falls flat. On top of that, the film seems to have nothing much to say.

The plot involves the hijacking of a subway train, or at least one coach, while it is en route in the New York subway system.

Everyone asks, "How are they going to get away?" The chief of police asks. The chief of subway security asks. The mayor asks.

Even one of the hijacked passengers asks; not to mention most of the audience.

They don't get away.

The fact that they even hoped to get away hinged on an absurd conversation between the two top cops.

"What if they jumped off the train?" asks the first.

"But we have a deadman's switch," answers the second.

"What's a deadman's switch," comes the quick reply.

"The train's throttle won't work unless a man is pressing down on it, if he falls dead, the train stops."

Thus when the crooks short circuit the deadman's switch and get off, the two top cops are chasing after the train. However with most of New York's police force all over the subway system surely it would be standard operational procedure to cover all the exits.

So what's the point?

We see the mayor say, "let them keep the goddamn train, we have lots more."

We see how long it takes to count out a million dollars. "Gee, Ralph, it doesn't look like a million dollars."

"It isn't what it looks like, it's what it'll buy."

We see people get shot in cold and hot blood, and one guy jumps on the electrified rail, "Gee, Ma, look at the smoke coming out of his sleeves"

Hollywood has developed over the last fifty years as a centre of artisans. One of the specialties is the instant characterization. A tight direction of the bit-players so that their story becomes interesting even though they're on the screen a few moments at a time. The bit-players in Pelham are no exception.

Walter Matthau, Robert Shaw and Martin Balsam as the principals all turn in fine, Oscar-winning, performances. They obviously thought the whole thing was worthwhile. But whatever it was that they saw, it got lost in the translation.

To be con't Next year.....

Poor indeed is the man in this world, dear Varsity reader, whose thoughts are not turned to images of domestic bliss on this day. Bruised and battered in public thoroughfares teaming with a tumultuous mob that rants, roars, rages, shrieks, shouts and generally seeks to put down all vestiges of decency in its insatiable lust for gain, our thoughts return longingly to that island of peace wherein the angelic resides — the home.

What joy to return to the natural beautitudes of the home, the soft voices of one's loved ones as soothing as any balm to ears accustomed to the strident cacophony of the outside world.

We turn our gaze lovingly to those members of the fairer sex who grace our humble abodes. It is to their soft and delicate hands that we entrust our battered souls, there to bloom again under their gentle ministrations.

And yet, dear reader, it is to be feared that greed for riches is gradually destroying the finer emotional and spiritual qualities of the home. Dives dictates, and all beauty is ravished by those whose hands are soiled with lucre. The tragic tale that I am about to relate to you concerns such corruption, and is an attempt to put flesh and blood to black and white, and to coin heart-throbs into sentences.

Hockey Blues down York 4 - 2

By DAVE STUART

For the umpteenth time, the confrontation of the year was won by Varsity at the York Ice Palace as the Blues downed York University Yeomen 4-2 Tuesday night.

York and Toronto have fought for first place in the OUAA east division for some years now, and every time Varsity has bested the other, perennially strong, team.

"I've been with the Blues now for four years and it's been the same thing every year," said Al Milnes. "They seem to die in the third period. I guess we're just in better condition."

Toronto now moves into second spot in the standings behind only Ottawa. The Gee-Gees have four more points than Blues but have played three more games.

Varsity has been criticized of late for not putting much effort into their games, but when the chips were down, came through with a strong third period foray to net three quick goals and turn a 2-1 deficit at the end of the second period into a 4-2 win.

Toronto opened the scoring in the second period when York allowed defenceman Dave Rooke a free skate down the wing to score.

Yeomen came back quickly when Bob Wassen beat Oss from close in. With only 18 seconds left in the period, York took a 2-1 lead on a goal by Tim Ampleford who was left alone in the slot.

Giving up a goal late in a period usually takes the starch out of a team, but Varsity proved it was made of sterner stuff in the third stanza when Blues stormed back to score three goals in just over a three-minute span.

Ron Harris, still wearing the plastic mask to protect his broken nose, scored the tying goal while Ivan McFarlane notched the winner when he retrieved his own rebound and tucked the puck inside the post.

Blues' final tally was a deflection of a Gord Davies' pass by Bill Fifield.

Tonight, Varsity faces Sir George Williams at the arena at 8:00 pm. Sir George was a finalist in the CIAU last year but lost out to Waterloo.

OUAA administration meets at Queen's

By DAVE STUART

The OUAA administrative council is composed of the Directors of Athletics at the member universities. That body will hold its semi-annual meeting this Thursday and Friday at Queen's.

The agenda is a long one and the topics to be covered are quite varied.

During the College Bowl game, both Western and Toronto wanted to dress a number of players that was greater than the limit set down by the CIAU.

The Blues had to leave Don Wright in the stands during the game in order to meet the 32 players allowed by the CIAU. Wright's offensive blocking and his place kicking were lost to the Blues for no useful reason. A desire to curb expenses is the suspected reason for the player limit.

Another topic for discussion will be the financial crisis in athletics faced by Ontario Universities.

Also listed for discussion is the OUAA response to the Mathews report. The Mathews report was jointly sponsored by the CIAU and the presidents of all the universities in Canada.

Dr. Mathews, the former president of the University of British Columbia, was asked to look at the athletic programs now being operated in Canadian universities and to suggest directions in which those programs should move in the future. His report was made public just a short time ago in Ottawa.

The Jock Culture Revisited

By PAUL HOCH

Although journalism reviews rarely spend much time analyzing the sports page, it is there, as much as anywhere else, that the average newspaper reader acquires his general world view and values.

Indeed, surveys in the United States, Canada and Europe have repeatedly shown that roughly one third of the readership (and more than half of the male newspaper readership) reads little more than the sports page.

Some analysts have claimed that our modern pro-football and hockey spectacles are becoming a modernized version of the Roman gladiator shows. A sort of bread and circuses for the masses. A new opium for the people.

Sports news never has really been much more than a bit of razzamatuzz for promotional purposes, and the bribery of the media men by professional promoters has long been institutionalized. (In fact, listening to the sportscasters, it is impossible to differentiate them from sports promoters.)

In his excellent book, The Jocks, the late Leonard Schechter remarks at one point that the so-called "Golden Age of Sport" in the '20s was a golden age of payola. He gives the example of Madison Square Gardens impresario Tex Rickard who used to hand out $100 bills to deserving sportswriters. And he says, if things are less "golden" for sportswriters these days, it is only because the team owners realized they could be had for nothing.

"To hell with the newspapermen," ex-Mets boss George Weiss used to say, "you can buy them with a steak."

In the March 5, 1932 issue of Collier's magazine, heavyweight boxing champ Gene Tunney wrote that he paid five per cent of his fight purses to newsmen for publicity. He said that it was the custom of most fighters to do likewise. And it is still recruit." And Malcolm Mallett, associate director of the American Press Institute, adds: "Circulation managers say that about 30 per cent of the people who buy their papers do it primarily for the sports news."

Schechter says that the wedding of media sports departments and sporting organizations has been so thoroughly consummated that the two are often "partners."

"There is the real possibility," he said, "that the newspaper needs the team more than the team needs the newspaper."

In the case of pro football, this gives the owners a free multimillion-dollar propaganda machine with an influential voice in 24 major cities and population centers in the country.

Almost on cue they promote a merger, push legislation, attack an opponent of the league, justify ticket-price increases, trades, and rule changes, or generally create a cover for whatever dealings the owners may be plotting.

There is no question as to which side of their bread the butter is on; the glamorous aura that surrounds the owners and management was created by this crucial segment of the press and news media. It is as premeditated and calculating as the star system was in the motion-picture industry.

National Football League Commissioner Pete Rozelle once remarked that, "Whatever success the NFL has had is due, in no small measure, to the wholehearted support it has received through the years from newspapermen, radio announcers and commentators, and more recently, television announcers and commentators."

Over the years one of the newspapers most friendly to the sports establishment has been the New York Daily News, America's largest-selling paper. The Daily News is also the long time owner of television station WPIX, which has televised New York Yankees baseball for as long as I can remember and now televises the New York Nets basketball games as well.

Thanks in part to sympathetic news coverage in the Daily News, the Yanks and Nets can draw big TV audiences on WPIX, which can then raise its advertising rates for the games. Which means more money in the bank for the Daily News.

This is not to say that the Daily News doesn't treat the Mets and Knicks every bit as good as the Yanks and Nets. After all, the paper's main sports "interest" is not its WPIX ad revenue, but its daily circulation of around a million, including people it has trained to be good "fans" (and hence good readers of the News sports pages).

The TV commentators are not far behind: "In recent years, the trend has been toward the professional team selling radio and TV rights to a network, and in the process, having the privilege of selecting the announcers. The result has been the 'All-America' announcer phenomenon (who, they say, is a 'rooster,' not a reporter) which, subtly or otherwise, promotes the home team and frequently reminds the listener to get his tickets for the next home game.

"I'm a house man," sportscaster and ex-catcher Joe Garagiola reportedly used to say. "That's what they're paying me to be."

Phil Rizzuto, former all-star shortstop and now announcer for the New York Yankees, was asked by the New York Daily News how he feels when he hears reports that announcers are just shells for the teams they work for.

"That's a lot of garbage," said the enthusiastic announcer. I don't deny that I try to make the Yankees sound interesting... (and) they do play many exciting games and they do have some excellent ballplayers... Sure I root for them but what's wrong with that? I don't go out of my way to knock the Yankees, but what about these writers who knock the paper they write for? (or the paper's advertisers, we might add).

But neither has the relationship between sports-casters and advertisers been anything other than loving. It wasn't long ago that everytime a home run sailed out of the park, the announcer would come on to tell you that the batter had hit a "Ballantine Blast," or a "White Owl Wallop," or a "Case of Wheaties," or a "Case of Lucky Strikes," or whatever the sponsor happened to be that day.

Finally, amidst a chorus of protest — none of which came from sportscasters — the baseball commissioner had to remind his announcer jocks that, from now on "a home run will be called a home and NBC had a valuable product on its hands.

"If you don't watch these TV people," says former Boston Celtics basketball coach Bill Russell, "they will devour you. First they ask you to call time-outs so they can get in their commercials. Then they will tell you when to call them. Then they want to get into the locker room at half time. Then more and more. If you don't put on the brakes, they'll tell you when to play."

Russell made these statements five years ago. Now television does tell sports teams when to play — for example, we have ABC's $7.5 million schedule of Monday night pro football.

There has been a lot of hullabaloo about TV breaking up games to get in commercials. The TV people have always denied it. However, in May, 1967, pro soccer referee Peter Rhodes admitted that he was required to wear an electronic beeper on his shoulder, and when the network (CBS) signaled, he had to signal an "injury," thus allowing time for a commercial.

In her autobiography, Nancy Greene talks about how the schedule of the Olympic Games tended to be divided to suit the convenience of the TV boys.

But television controls not just when games are played, but whether they are played at all, and how they are played. Simply by giving coverage to some sports rather than others, TV can help ensure that those will be the popular ones.

Pro football, to take one example, struggled along as a sort of freak show of overgrown collegians until TV "created" it as a sport in the militarized era of the Cold War. In some recent football All-Star games, TV is said to have "prohibited" red-dogging the quarterback, in order to give the viewing audience a more wide open spectacle.

Schechter says the main reason the Milwaukee Braves were willing to go through the tremendous hassles of moving to Atlanta was that it was a much more lucrative TV market. Similarly, improved TV subsidies were said to be the reason the National Hockey League expanded from six to twelve teams.

It was television that uncovered pro soccer from the American sandlots and gave it national coverage. Without TV, sports like the roller derby and professional wrestling could not have survived. And it was ABC television — the most patriotic of networks — that concocted its own heavyweight championship elimination tournament to fill the "vacant" throne of Muhammad Ali.

Lately, ABC has come up with its own new-and-improved brand of hip sports promoter in Howard Cosell, a man whose supposed "tell-it-like-it-is" commentary on sports telecasts does not prevent him from ballyhooing and promoting the ritual with every second word.

It reminds you very much of the "damning" critiques of jockery by men like Jim Bouton and John Sample who, if you read their books, turn out to accept 99.9 per cent of the jock mythology. Not surprisingly, after his hotly debated, but cream-puff, critiques of major league baseball, Bouton, too, had little trouble landing himself a network TV sports job.

In 1970, Bernie Parrish noted: "Chrysler alone spent more than $13 million to sell their cars to pro football's selective audience of 15-49 age group males in the wholesome setting provided by pro football."

But, since the spectacular costs of sponsoring the games are worth it in terms of reaching the most lucrative buying markets, these huge sponsorship costs become one more barrier a smaller company would have to surmount in order to stay in business. In this way, the huge scale-up of the burgeoning sports-TV business acts as a tremendous stimulant to the growth of monopoly in American business generally.

The amounts of money changing hands in all this are simply staggering. CBS is paying out about $25 million a year for rights to televise pro football. And they more than get it back from the advertisers. At last count, advertising costs for sponsors of the Super Bowl were approaching $200,000 for a minute of commercial time! Of course, only the biggest corporations in America can afford the costs. The automobile corporations in America are high on the list (using "manhood" to sell cars).

John Galbraith, in his book, The New Industrial State, has perceptively noted: "The industrial system is profoundly dependent on commercial television and could not exist in its present form without it."

This certainly is true for the modern mammoth sports industry. But the reverse is to some extent true as well: it is doubtful if commercial television could have grown as fast, or could exist in its present form, without the sports industry.

In his treatise on "The Long Range Effects of TV and Other Factors on Sports Attendance," Jerry N. Jordan cites research proving that, "sports minded people, because of their great interest in competitive games, were run." Schechter points out that sports and TV "have become so inextricably entwined that sports are television and television is sports."

Nancy Greene

Derek Sanderson

An article in the Financial Post of November 11, 1967, quoted John Bassett, publisher of the defunct Toronto Telegram, owner of the Toronto Argonauts and chairman of Maple Leaf Gardens: "You must educate your audience and merchandise your product, and this can be done through television."

A similar story revealed that the Montreal Expos were producing a series of half-hour TV shows to educate their future fans, and they quote one club official: "We are particularly interested in attracting young people — high school and university students, for example — to ensure fans for the future." (Financial Post, March 1, 1969).

Of course, we should not delude ourselves that it is all a case of greedy promoters "using" the media. If anything the symbiosis cuts mainly the other way. Schechter remarks, "Television buys sports. Television supports sports... So, slowly at first, but inevitably, television tells sports what to do. It is sports and runs them the way it does most other things, more flamboyantly than honestly."

In 1964, CBS outbid its rival networks for the rights to televise National Football League games, and it seemed it would be beating NBC in the battle for Sunday afternoon viewers for years to come.

So NBC "created" the American Football League. The AFL at that point was mainly a collection of inexperienced younger players and NFL discards, who seemed to be unable to play defense. Fumbles flew off in all directions. Their games often resembled comedy more than football. But NBC knew a shrewd investment.

They paid the AFL owners $38 million for a five year contract, (compared with the just under $9 million ABC had paid for the AFL's previous five-year contract), and this was the money the new league used to battle the old for the pick of the most promising rookies.

"We couldn't have competed," said AFL Commissioner Joe Foss, "without television." And sure enough, with NBC putting up a good part of the bankroll, the new league became almost as strong as the old, commonplace for promoters to "hire" newsmen to be their press agents, often without even the knowledge of the newspaper editors:

"These situations do not enhance the standing of the newspapers allowing such practice, nor do they establish in the minds of their readers... (anything other than) the accusation of 'biased reporting.'" (From an editorial entitled "Newsmen and 'Side Jobs'" in Editor and Publisher.)

Schechter points out that one reason reporters "easily become what are called 'house men'" is that those (very few) who occasionally tried to criticize a home team have suddenly found themselves out of a job. He cites various specific examples of this. Moreover, when he himself uncovered the fact that in the '50s about 30 per cent of the basketball players at St. John's never graduated, his paper flatly refused to print the story.

Purdue sport sociologists Gelfand and Heath, who were former sportswriters, seem to have just discovered this mutually profitable symbiosis.

They insist: "Sports editors should not forget that the more people they lead into athletic activity, the more avid readers they among the first to buy television sets." TV companies were advertising such things as, "Your TV set is your ticket to the fifty-yard line," or "Enjoy the game in comfort in your home regardless of the weather," and so on.

He notes that in 1948, the first year that television sets were being mass produced the percentage of TV time devoted to sports was sometimes as high as 35 per cent. Even now the most common plug for color TV buying is the suggestion that you can see the game in color. Similarly, both pro sports owners and pay-TV companies are hoping sports can usher in the new super-gravy era of pay TV and profits for them both.

So the general rule is that television needs sports almost as much as sports needs television. In the era of monopoly capitalism both have the function of stimulating hyperconsumption and fronting for the mass advertiser, from who both industries ultimately get most of their financial backing and, therefore, by whom they are ultimately controlled.

It should be pointed out that these advertising costs are added on to the price of consumer goods, so that ultimately the working class is forced to pay the price of its own brain-washing.

Monopoly capitalism needs monopoly capitalist sports and vice versa. The material conditions that create the one also create the other.

The point is that the average fan does not know who he is. This system has turned him into a cipher, and in the back of his mind he knows it. Until there is workers' control over industrial production, and until that production is reoriented toward serving unmanipulated human needs rather than the accumulation of profits, people will continue to seek their humanity in commodities.

The Varsity report on housing

Insight

Various reports have reached our ears of students complaining that there is a lack of suitable accommodation in this area. Realizing our duty to look into this situation, we examined some of the available housing. After much extensive research on the subject, we have come to the conclusion that the so-called 'housing crisis' does not exist! Excellent housing abounds. The shoddy myth of the housing shortage will now be exposed once and for all.

Insight

Our roving reporter started his search at the student housing centre. It is here that most students go to make quick contact with those people who have places to rent.

Having contacted a number of likely prospects, he then proceeded to each address to check out the premises.

Accommodation in all sizes and forms was found to be available, ranging from large apartments through to single rooms.

In many of the places available, kitchen and bathroom facilities must be shared with others who live there.

For many students, the chance to move away from home and learn to live in harmony with new neighbours is an experience in itself.

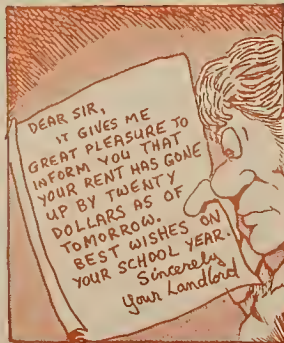

For those who can't afford their own apartment, there are many people around looking for roommates to split their costs. This can be a unique and rewarding opportunity for many.

We were extremely pleased at the competence of the landlords in most places. In almost all cases, the landlords were:

A) Courteous

B) Efficient

C) Friendly

In spite of vicious rumors to the contrary, many landlords not only allowed animals on the premises, but actually encouraged them.

There is sometimes a problem finding housing close to the university, but a short walk to school every morning will do many students good.

But happily, our research has shown that many students have found the best place of all to live, with home cooked meals, friendly companionship and cheap rates.

Radio Varsity commission says station in state of chaos

By GILLIAN MacKAY

SAC's three-member commission of inquiry into Radio Varsity released its report yesterday which calls for the dismissal of current station manager Paul Murton and the establishment of a board of directors to correct what the commission calls a "state close to absolute chaos."

An independent investigating committee into Radio Varsity, consisting of Paul Carson, John Tory and Riek Outerbridge, was formed last November by SAC in response to complaints by radio staff members and the resignation of news director Frank Cockram.

Murton said he refuses to resign and will go before the SAC committee this week to state his case.

Denying the report's charges of incompetence and personality conflict, Murton said he has been scapegoated for the many problems which have accumulated since Radio Varsity began in 1965.

SAC communications commissioner Michael Sabia expressed concern that Murton have a fair hearing and that he not be the victim of a political witch hunt.

Sabia pointed out the difficulty in determining personal guilt and responsibility given the station's present state of confusion.

Questions of personality and the need to organize the station towards applying for an FM licence have brought the problems to a head this year, Sabia noted.

SAC's first concern, Sabia said, will be to revamp station structure and get it back on its feet, while long-range plans will be to decide SAC's commitment to the radio's future.

The report accuses SAC of neglecting its responsibilities to Radio Varsity in the past, stressing that the present yearly grant of $21,000 is inadequate to the station's needs.

The station is unable to apply for an FM licence without a considerable increase in funds and a better defined program policy and internal organization.

The report recommends the hiring of an interim manager with the freedom to appoint a new executive. Applicants would be interviewed by the board of directors and presented as candidates to the radio staff for interview and a subsequent vote.

A full-time chief engineer, programming director, advertising manager and secretary should also be hired by the board following their nomination by the station manager, the report suggests. An additional yearly grant of $10,000 from SAC is suggested to cover the cost of hiring and new equipment.

The board of directors would be responsible for the programming quality, financial policies and business management of Radio Varsity.

Murton approves of the majority of the report's recommendations but calls many of the proposals unrealistic in terms of what SAC seems willing to spend.

He said with increased facilities and a constitution implemented by a board, which the report suggests setting up, most of the accusations now being levelled at him would have been avoided.

Without a constitution to define and allocate responsibility and the money to hire people, Murton said that he is overloaded with work and that chaos is unavoidable.

The report says the manager should have full authority to govern the station, and goes on to accuse Murton of personality conflict.

Murton, however, calls this contradictory in that disputes have inevitably arisen over his attempts to wield power. He says there is too much confusion at present as to who is in charge.

While the report charges that Murton does not spend enough time at his job, leaving the station unattended during business hours, he says that he is obliged to spend time outside the office on radio business.

Murton has also been accused of incompetence in the management of funds and in formulating new programs for the station.

The report will be presented to the SAC council meeting of Jan. 15.

Demand for Seeley inquiry continues

Both faculty and students continue to demand an independent investigation into why noted Canadian sociologist John Seeley was refused appointment at U of T and the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE), despite refusals from both institutions and the minister of education.

In an unexpected move, U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) president Bill Nelson wrote president John Evans Dec. 12 asking whether top administrators interfered in U of T's sociology department chairman Irving Zeitlin's decision not to hire Seeley, and whether Evans is conducting any inquiry into the matter.

Nelson said yesterday UTFA will consider launching its own inquiry if Evans cannot assure the non-appointment was procedurally correct.

Meanwhile, Michael Fullan, acting chairman of OISE's sociology department, whose decision to hire Seeley last year was also vetoed by OISE director Robert Jackson, said the department and OISE's faculty association is considering asking the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) to conduct an investigation.

Fullan was responding to the OISE board of governors' decision Dec. 17, after an internal review, to accept director Robert Jackson's overriding decision not to hire Seeley. The board has refused to give reasons for its decision.

Fullan stressed his main objection is the "closed and suspect way in which reasons were considered and the decision made."

"We must now consider possible external avenues of appeal in consultation with our faculty association."

Innis College principal Peter

Russell, who is one of the some 30 government appointees on OISE's board of governors and was one of the five members who reviewed the Seeley case, said although he cannot reveal what happened at the in-camera board meeting, "I disapprove of the degree of secrecy."

Fullan noted that the OISE sociology department recommended Seeley "because of his methodological expertise, his applied orientation in working in the field and his interdisciplinary strengths."

Ontario Education Minister Thomas Wells turned down a request of the NDP to conduct an independent review following the OISE board's upholding of the earlier decision that Seeley not be hired.

Wells has been accused of interfering in the Seeley non-appointment at OISE after the minister unwittingly revealed to the Legislature in November that he passed on negative information about Seeley from "well known educators" to director Robert Jackson. Wells has refused to say who these prominent educators are. "We are not fans of Seeley," Ontario NDP leader Stephen Lewis told Wells in the Legislature Dec. 19, "but they (OISE's board of governors) made a political decision they shouldn't be allowed to make."

Seeley, who has been working in the United States for the past 10 years, believes he has been turned down because of his involvement in controversial campus demonstrations and issues.

U of T sociology department chairman Irving Zeitlin refused to give Seeley a job last year after a staffing committee there voted unanimously to hire him.

UTFA president Nelson noted in his December letter to Evans that the faculty association is concerned about "the apparent interference by the dean of arts and science, the dean of the Graduate School and the provost in the process by which the sociology department was considering its own recommendation on this matter."

"What is troubling in this case is the apparent attempt by the deans and the provost to influence the chairman of the sociology department before he made a recommendation, indeed, to persuade him not to make the recommendation the departmental staffing committee had recommended," Nelson wrote.

Seeley is best known for a book he co-authored in 1965 called Crestwood Heights, a sociological study of Forest Hill. He has over 400 publications in his name and has been highly praised by social scientists and academics for his work.

Seeley left Toronto in 1964 after a dispute with Murray Ross, then president of York University, where Seeley was sociology department chairman and assistant to Ross.

The dispute evolved over what Seeley terms "a breach of faith" on Ross' part over their aim to keep York a small university.

In an interview with The Varsity in November, Seeley noted a university president has warned that any person who attacked one university president could not be appointed elsewhere, because he would "attack them all."

Seeley, whom SAC has invited to speak at the university this month, firmly believes that his non-appointment should be thoroughly investigated, whether or not he gets a job.

Governing Council turns down request for Seeley review

The Christmas spirit did not change the Governing Council's attitude toward noted sociologist John Seeley as it refused to set up an inquiry to investigate the denial of employment to Seeley at Council's Christmas meeting.

The motion by student governor Shirley French was debated in camera but Dean Greene and sociology chairman Irving Zeitlin who figured prominently in the controversy, were allowed to stay.

The French motion recommended a parity commission of inquiry to report back to the council on the non-appointment of Seeley and possible administrative and government interference.

But this was apparently voted down by a large margin, the governors being more inclined to sweep matters under the rug.

The council also closed the last avenue of appeal for the Students for a Democratic Society members appealing the method of their appeal earlier this year arising from the Banfield incident.

A motion by governor David Shindman to reopen discussion of whether an appeal can review the verdict as well as the sentence of the Caput was voted down.

Chairman Malim Harding ignored the fact that part of the Shindman motion was new and did not require a two-thirds majority for reconsideration.

The delegation from library workers local 1230 was left out in the cold as they were not able to present their demands for a cost-of-living increase which had been rejected by U of T officials after a brief and demonstration in November.

Social work students also received a setback as they were again shafted by the council in their attempts to gain parity representation with faculty on their new faculty council.

Despite last year's strike by social work students and strong student opposition, the council decided to rubber stamp the restructuring proposals which puts only eight students on a 36-member board with up to 16 faculty members.

Student governors wanted the motion sent back to the faculty and then to the academic affairs committee for more discussion, saying agreement could still be reached.

Student governor Peter Jarrett charged the academic affairs committee had no time to discuss the recommendations, having spent all its time listening to presentations.

Jarrett clashed with academic affairs chairman John Dove, who maintained there had been adequate discussion.

The council also approved the construction of parking garages in spite of their possible conflict with city policy on parking.

Man lives not by bread alone

LONDON (CUP-ENS) — A prominent scientist with the Medical Research Council in London has published a study suggesting white bread may be one of the leading causes of non-infective disease in the world.

Dr. Denis Burkitt, writing in the Journal of the American Medical Association, says the western habit of eating lots of refined carbohydrates, particularly white bread, is a major cause of heart disease, intestinal malfunctions and cancer of the colon.

Burkitt compared diseases characteristic of the affluent western nations with diseases common in underdeveloped African nations and found the differences are mostly explained by diets.

He found heart disease and cancer of the colon, while leading causes of death in the west, are almost non-existent in the African nations.

The reason, he says, is the underdeveloped world eats more cereal fiber than the affluent world. The fiber, he contends, has little nutritional value, but is extremely important to the bacteriological and chemical processes in the intestine.

The solution for the western world, says Dr. Burkitt, is to switch from white bread to the real thing — whole wheat.

U of T warns OCUA enrolment cuts could be on the way

Part of the charm of U of T lies in its annual campus rituals — The Daffydil revue, Skule nite, The Varsity's leaking of the budget — and one of the most important rituals is U of T's yearly pitch to the provincial government for favorable treatment.

This year was no exception, as president John Evans, Governing Council chairman Malim Harding and a host of others who wouldn't be embarrassed to sip sherry with got down on their knees Dec. 20 before the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA).

The OCUA, constituted just last fall, is designed as a buffer between government and universities to make policy recommendations to the government. It is chaired by former U of T political economy chairman Stefan Dupre.

The main thrust of the U of T brief was that enrolment at the university — reflected in the growth of the suburban Scarborough and Erindale campuses — would have to be restricted unless the government provides greater financial assistance.

Both the cessation of a grant to the campuses as "emergent institutions", and a freeze on capital funding of universities, have resulted in a "mid-point" freeze in the development of the colleges, Evans said.

While pressures on Scarborough and Erindale to rise to their planned ceilings of 5,000 enrolment increases, both colleges find they can no longer afford to expand and may have to hold the line at their present enrolment of roughly 3,000.

Scarborough College student council president John O'Donohue warned the college was having to experience continued growth without a corresponding increase in facilities. He noted the staff-student ratio was now at 23-1, terming it a "deficient" learning environment.

(Representatives from SAC, although invited to be part of the delegation, boycotted the meeting, claiming they were not allowed any input into the presentation.)

The other strong focus of the U of T pitch was the need for funds for the renovation and improvement of existing campus facilities.

Planning and resources committee chairman Chuck Hanly, calling many facilities "primitive", said the mining and Borden buildings needed to be torn down, and the Sanford Fleming and Science and Medicine library buildings renovated.

Hanly's presentation was accompanied by a slide show detailing the threats to life and limb.

Evans also gave a replay of his "sliding down Parnassus" theme for the committee, pointing out that the meagre increase in student subsidy announced before Christmas by the government would inevitably hamper the quality of the university.

He also repeated his warning that the university would sooner incur a deficit than dismiss staff or give small salary increases.

Evans predicted a $1 million deficit for next year, saying he would attempt to economize on the $3 million deficit originally forecast.

Business affairs committee chairman W.J.D. Lewis urged the committee to work closely with government on developing long-term plans for higher education, predicting an "absolutely certain deficit" unless this took place.

The OCUA plans to meet with U of T representatives in the spring to discuss longer-term problems, and will also hear a submission from the Ontario Federation of Students.

At its inception, the council came under severe criticism from students and faculty members across the province for being unable to represent their interests.

The government appointees included a relatively bland cross-section of former university administrators, several businessmen (among them Robert Stanfield's principal assistant and former Imperial Oil vice-president Ronald Ritchie), and two 'students', neither of whom had been seen or heard of at their own universities before their appointment to the OCUA.

This mellow fellow is J. Stefan Dupre, chairman of the OCUA.

Classrooms sat empty as student strike took its grim toll.

U of T students end one month strike

By CLAUDE HAWPER

Thousands of U of T students returned to classes Monday morning, peacefully ending a month-long strike which began when the university administration refused to give into student demands for more power on Governing Council and tenure committees.

The strike ended late last Friday as both sides made major political concessions from their previous hard-line stands.

Students, who had demanded increased representation on Governing Council and parity on tenure committees, and the administration, which obviously wanted less student representation on the all-important committees, finally agreed to leave matters exactly the way they stood before the Dec. 11 strike began.

Both sides, however, hailed the final settlement as a great victory. Regardless of the settlement, the strike was considered a major step forward for student politics, if only because almost 100 percent of students boycotted their classrooms.

Even many faculty overcame their reticence and stayed away, cancelling their classes for at least one month.

It was the most successful strike in U of T's history. U of T's first and only other mass strike was led by former Canadian prime minister William Lyon Mackenzie King.

The month long strike virtually brought the university to a standstill. Deserted buildings were locked, cafeterias closed, libraries reduced their hours and committee meetings slowed from a torrent to a mere trickle.

Meanwhile, SAC president Seymour Kanowitch has retired to his Cuban retreat to go fishing with Ernest Hemingway and write a position paper on 'The future of student militancy'.

Highlights of Radio Varsity report

Here are the highlights, as well as some low ones, from the 36 page report of SAC's three-member commission of inquiry into Radio Varsity:

- "An examination of the operations, management, structure, organization etc., etc., of Radio Varsity reveals a student resource in a state somewhat close to absolute chaos."

- "The question which must be answered here is: would the dismissal of (station manager) Paul Murton by SAC... be a responsible act or merely the culmination of a witch hunt invented by a certain interest group within the station?"

- "As things stand at present... Radio Varsity doesn't have more than a 20 percent chance of getting a licence. The reason for this is simply a lack of any coherent purpose at the station as it now stands."

- But it must be remembered that the relationship is one of cart and horse — without the horse the cart gets nowhere, but if the horse pulls the cart in the wrong direction you're better off without the horse."

- "Democracy and an excellent student radio station are only co-intentionally compatible."
- "Democracy is a great thing."
- "A good manager can be nothing less than a dictator..."

- "As far as it could go, and it could be the best campus station in Ontario, the present management structure is almost 95 percent screwed up."
- "Good programming costs MONEY. If you don't want to pay the piper, then fire him; there's no point in expecting good tunes from an instrument without reeds."
- "Some space in the basement of 91 St. George is suitable for use by the radio as storage and offices. These should be constructed without delay. Due to periodic flooding, the basement is not deemed suitable for studios."

- "The present level of financial support is woefully inadequate. SAC may, if it so chooses, decide that the additional expense is not warranted; if so we suggest you put the radio out of its misery."

NDP study shows small groups has most wealth

OTTAWA (CUP) — The federal New Democratic Party has released a table showing the distribution of income and wealth in Canada.

It shows that as of 1970 one percent of the population owns 12 percent of the wealth, the top two percent of the population owns 17.4 percent of the wealth, the top five percent of the population owns 28.6 percent.

Further, the top 10 percent of the population owns 41.8 percent of the wealth, the top 20 percent owns 60.8 percent of the wealth, and the top 50 percent of the population owns 93.3 percent of the wealth.

Half the population in Canada or over 11 million people have to split 6.7 percent of Canada's wealth.

In terms of income the top 20 percent of the population as of the end of 1971 gathered in 43.3 percent of the income.

The next 20 percent got 24.9 percent of the income, the next 20 percent of the population got 17.6 percent of the income while the bottom 40 percent of the population got 14.2 percent of all the income in Canada.

Crombie rakes OMB on 45' by-law

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

Mayor David Crombie delivered a forceful speech attacking critics of Toronto's 45-foot height by-law Monday.

Varg staff: all forgiven

Varsity staff members and all others interested in The Varsity's springtime character development are invited to an informal chat at noon today in our offices.

Bring your lunch and a friend to our palatial second floor suite at 91 St. George St. and be prepared to tell everyone what Santa put in your Christmas stocking.

Speaking to the inaugural meeting of the 1975 Toronto City Council, Crombie affirmed the passage of the controversial by-law which he said carried out the will of the people.

In an obvious reference to the Ontario Municipal Board (OMB), Crombie cited "arcane government agencies and footling editorial writers" as those who wished to thwart the self-government of Toronto.

In a ruling handed down last month, the OMB overruled Toronto City Council's passage of the height-by-law.

Crombie dismissed charges that the height restriction would stifle the heart of the city. In spite of recession and inflation, Toronto remains "a safe, sane and decent place to live," he said.

The mayor referred to "bare-faced prevaricators" whose proposed developments contain "fewer bedrooms than a subway station." They would "fill our streets with crackerboxes and wind tunnels by day and violent and desolate canyons by night."

Crombie said there are laws against air pollution and water pollution, but if you want to build "a monument to corporate arrogance" and pollute the land "you can expect full support of your property rights."

In an otherwise routine meeting of the executive of Toronto City Council was ratified. The four members are Reid Scott, Art Eggleton, David Smith and William Kilbourn.

Among other appointments were Alan Sparrow and Dorothy Thomas as city representatives on the Task Force on Status of Tenants, and John Sewell as representative on the board of directors of the Toronto Humane Society.

City Council agreed to meet again today.

OISE still must give some answers

The board of governors at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) certainly doesn't seem intent on setting any new records for democracy and openness, if its performance in the John Seeley case is anything to go by.

At a special meeting December 17, the board upheld a decision originally made by OISE director Robert Jackson not to offer Seeley, a prestigious but controversial Canadian sociologist, an appointment. Seeley was originally recommended for an appointment by the department of sociology in education.

Jackson's initial decision was bad enough. He should have acknowledged the wishes of the department which recommended Seeley, unless he had some extremely good reasons not to. Those reasons have not been forthcoming.

However, to make matters worse, the board of governors decided, after an appeal by the department, to conduct a review of the Seeley case itself. It is inconceivable that a thoroughly impartial review could have been conducted unless it were done independently.

Jackson himself is one of some 30-odd government appointees to the board, so his conduct would be unlikely to be examined carefully, and one particular incident in the affair could be particularly embarrassing to the government.

The disclosure in November by education minister Thomas Wells that he passed on advice from "top educators" to Jackson that Seeley not be hired casts large doubts on the integrity of Wells, and on the credibility of the institute and its directors.

Moreover, OISE's unwillingness to tell all the truth about the Seeley appointment only adds to the suspicion that 'political' appointments are not uncommon. Were this an uncommon occurrence, OISE would have been anxious to release the facts.

The board of governors has failed on three counts to give an adequate explanation of the conduct of the institute. Firstly, no reasons have been given for Jackson's decision to overturn the initial departmental recommendation. Secondly, the board has never outlined why it decided to conduct the review itself, rather than set up an impartial hearing. And thirdly, the board has not set out why it made its final decision not to hire Seeley.

Until the OISE board of governors acts to make the facts known, the cloud of suspicion will continue to hang over the institute. Nor should this suspicion seem unwarranted. The board has a lot of explaining to do. It is totally unsatisfactory to issue a statement saying 'we have satisfied ourselves.' Now everyone else has to be satisfied, a task the board will doubtless find difficult, if it even considers it important.

John Seeley deserves a fair, open hearing to expose exactly why he wasn't given a job, not only at OISE, but at U of T as well. And this time, the bureaucrats and government appointees are going to have a hard time refusing both faculty and students something Seeley has long fought for—the right to know.

Is John Seeley a weed among all the blooming flowers at OISE?

OISE decision said 'suspect'

The following letter was sent Dec. 23 to Vernon Ready, Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (O.I.S.E.).

We are profoundly disappointed at the decision of the Board not to offer an appointment to Professor John Seeley. We are most disturbed at the way in which this decision was made.

In our meeting with the Board on November 12 we presented our case in an open manner. Above all else we had asked that the Board make the decision on the merits of the case, and that the reasons for the final decision be stated to the Department and the Faculty Association who had been so intensely concerned about the way in which this case was being handled. This was particularly important in light of irregularities that have pervaded throughout. These include:

1) a telephone call from the Education Minister to the Director which at the very least "passed on" negative information that should have been presented openly through due procedural channels. This would have provided DPAC and our Department with an opportunity to determine the basis of the reasons and respond appropriately.

2) Dr. George Flower's report concerning the University of Toronto decision in which he failed to talk with the most important figure — Dr. Irving Zeitlin, Chairman of the Sociology Department.

3) most of the reasons that Dr. Flower obtained from Dean Safarian showed up as DPAC's reasons at their May 29th meeting. Furthermore, these reasons do not stand up under critical scrutiny.

4) An assessment by Dr. Murray Ross which he refused to put in writing for even confidential examination by DPAC.

5) The DPAC appeal meeting of June 26 in which several new reasons were alluded to, but for which no evidence was provided.

6) The Director's statement to the Board in October in which more new reasons (again unassessed) were apparently cited.

7) The Board's meeting of December 17, in which the final decision was reached with perhaps more reasons being discussed, but about which we received no explanation of any reasons whatsoever.

All this in the face of our department's professional judgment, the Faculty Association's strong support including a detailed report by Dr. Dieter Misgeld, strong letters of support by numerous esteemed social scientists, and a thorough investigation by a Central Search Committee two years ago which assessed both the academic and political activities of Professor Seeley to its satisfaction.

In light of all of the above circumstances, we fail to see how a Board can disregard the intense concerns and wishes of its Faculty Association, one of its departments and the student association without any explanation. How can decisions be made this way without doing irreparable damage to the life of the institution? What criteria are being applied to determine the Institute's future program?

In the Seeley case the Faculty Association, the student association and the Sociology in Education Department applied criteria consistent with the overall goals of the Institute. We recommended Seeley because of his methodological expertise, his applied orientation in working in the field and his interdisciplinary strengths.

Michael Fullan,
Acting chairman,
Department of Sociology in Education, OISE

The following letter was sent to U of T president John Evans December 12 by faculty association president Bill Nelson, and is followed by a letter to Evans from SAC president Seymour Kanowitch. Both letters deal with the non-appointment of Seeley in the sociology department at U of T.

Nelson wants answers

This letter is simply an enquiry, to which we hope you can give a satisfactory reply, regarding procedures followed during the consideration of a possible appointment at this University for Professor John Seeley.

The Faculty Association is not, at this time, concerned with the academic criteria for or against the appointment of Professor Seeley. What we are concerned about is the apparent interference by the Dean of Arts and Science, the Dean of the Graduate School, and the Provost in the process by which the Sociology Department was considering its own recommendation on this matter. It would be, of course, perfectly in order for the Dean of Arts and Science and, in certain circumstances, other officers of the University to object to a departmental recommendation once it was made. What is troubling in this case is the apparent attempt by the deans and the Provost to influence the Chairman of the Sociology Department before he made a recommendation, indeed, to persuade him not to make the recommendation the departmental staffing committee had recommended.

What I am writing to ask you is, first, whether this interference in normal and orderly process did take place; second, if it did, whether there were circumstances of a special nature that, in your opinion, justified such interference; and third, whether you are conducting any enquiry into this matter.

I shall be glad to have your views on this matter.

W.H. Nelson, President, U of T Faculty Association.

... so does Kanowitch

I have recently received a copy of the letter written to you by Prof. Nelson regarding procedures followed during the consideration by the sociology department of a possible appointment for Prof. John Seeley.

I believe that Prof. Nelson raises some very pertinent points, particularly where he notes that what is at issue is not the academic criteria for or against the appointment of Prof. Seeley, but rather the apparent interference by the Dean of Arts and Science, the Dean of the School of Graduate Studies, and the Provost. As Professor Nelson notes, it is one thing to object to a departmental decision once it has been made, but quite another to try and influence the Chairman of a department before he has made a decision.

Accordingly, I would strongly urge you to set up a commission of inquiry to investigate the apparent administrative interference in the hiring procedures of the sociology department and recommend directly to you whether or not a teaching appointment should be offered to Prof. Seeley.

I realize that the Governing Council has already rejected a similar investigation. I do not know if this was because all student motions are automatically rejected on principle, or if the Governing Council felt that U of T could more expeditiously deal with its dirty linen by burying it rather than washing it, but in either case I do not find the Governing Council's decision satisfactory. I take it that Prof. Nelson doesn't either.

The many sordid details surrounding the non-appointment of Prof. Seeley raise some very serious questions concerning U of T hiring procedures. They are questions that can only be answered by a complete exploration of all the issues at hand.

Hugo Blanco defended

The last issue of The Varsity contained a letter by Communist Party member David Galbraith smearing Hugo Blanco, a well known Trotskyist, Peruvian leader of peasant unions and the Fourth International who spoke at the Medical Science Auditorium December 4.

I'd like first to point out the character of his letter. David Galbraith is a member of the Communist Party. While I don't challenge his right to make political mistakes, the fact that he did not indicate his obviously partisan opinion is dishonest. Further, he did not attend the Blanco meeting.

In the rest of this letter I will reply to some of his main arguments.

Galbraith attacks Blanco's leadership of peasant union rebellions in Peru as being "isolated" and "adventuristic". Who is Hugo Blanco and what did he do? (For those who want a more detailed idea of Blanco's life and political views should read his book, Land or Death.) Blanco was born in Cuzco, a desperately impoverished area of Peru. It was there that in 1958 he began to organize the movement of peasant unions which was to spread from Cuzco over all of southern Peru.

Under his leadership these peasant unions fought disease, hunger, illiteracy and forced labour. Their struggle took shape against the landowners who had robbed them of their land, their only means of livelihood, and who reacted with violence to the efforts by the peasant unions to peacefully recover the land.

In 1963 Blanco was hunted down and imprisoned for three years before being tried by a military tribunal and threatened with death by a firing squad. According to Regis Debray, "This was borne out in Peru, where Hugo Blanco did more in a few years' work by forming unions of arrendieros (farmers who hold the usufruct of land which belongs to the latifundist who is paid his rent in labour) in the Valle de la Convencion than all the left wing parties together in the last 30 years. In 2 years, 30,000 Indian peasants were enrolled for the first time in their lives in defense unions at the instigation of Blanco and a handful of cadres."

Is this the "handmaiden of imperialism" Galbraith would have us believe?

In fact his pointed attack upon Blanco leads one to question on who's side Galbraith stands: with an oppressive capitalist government, or with Blanco and 30,000 peasants? Does Galbraith also support the deportation of trade unionists, such as Blanco, by the present military government in Peru which he calls "anti-imperialist?"

Similarly his condemnation of ex-Trotskyists (Revolutionary People's Army) in Argentina gives one the impression that he is more against the victims of the repression than he is against the repressor — international capitalism. Blanco has explained on numerous occasions the failings of the method of individual guerilla actions isolated from the masses which opens the entire left for repression and reduces the role of workers and their allies to spectators.

He sees the need to build a mass revolutionary party rooted in the working class which can only be created by playing a leadership role in the daily struggles of the oppressed. But Blanco's criticisms of the E.R.P. do not prevent him from defending them from right-wing attacks. The Communist Party's frenzied attacks blind them from focusing on the real enemy and from building non-sectarian defense campaigns for democratic rights.

In fact, during the repression of the peasant movement in Peru in 1963, Hector Bejar comments about the Communist Party's method of building defense campaigns in his essay that won the 1969 prize of the Casa de las Americas in Havana. He wrote, "... the Left as a whole did not throw itself wholeheartedly into the peasant struggle. It guided the organizations 'from above', it advised the unions, and it sent organizers into the countryside on temporary assignments, but it did not lead 'from within' as Hugo Blanco did. While still-existing political prejudices kept the Left from supporting Blanco as he deserved, at the same time, inertia kept it imprisoned in the old urban patterns." In spite of the C.P.'s record, Galbraith has the gall to accuse Trotskyists of "disunity and adventure!"

Galbraith chastises Blanco for not advocating international solidarity and broad defense campaigns for victims of political repression in Latin America. However, as anyone at the meeting would know, Blanco actually stressed this. But Galbraith didn't hear that, he wasn't even at the meeting he seems so knowledgeable about.

In fact it was a broad defense campaign which saved Blanco's life. While Galbraith correctly points out the need for broad Latin American defense work in Canada, the record of the Communist Party is otherwise. In order to participate in Chile defense work with the C.P., people must support Allende's coalition with big business forces. Thus in Canada other committees have been formed with a non-exclusionist orientation, such as the Canadian Committee For Justice To Latin American Political Prisoners.

The good example Hugo Blanco set in Peru and his own model defense campaign show the way forward to combat attacks upon democratic rights in Latin America and elsewhere. And neither the Communist Party's slanders nor sectarianism will stand in the way of achieving these goals.

The Izaak Walton Killam Memorial Scholarships 1975-76

Value. Scholarships valued at $5,500 and renewable on evidence of satisfactory performance in a Master's or Doctoral program in the natural sciences, social sciences and humanities, are tenable at Dalhousie University

Qualification

Eligibility is based on a First Class undergraduate degree in the field of study the student wishes to pursue. No remission of fees accompanies the scholarships but travel assistance to Dalhousie is available. Scholars may perform instruction or demonstration duties at the discretion of the department for which additional remuneration is given.

Application

Candidates are not required to submit application forms for the Killam Memorial Scholarships, but should apply for admission to the Registrar, Dalhousie University, Halifax, Nova Scotia, Canada, as early as possible.

On the basis of the information supplied in the application, the graduate department concerned will nominate the scholar to a selection board for consideration and nomination for a Killam award

Proposal for an Interdisciplinary Symposium Course

(INX 200) INTRO TO FUTURISTICS. A group of students and professors at New College, as a result of the activities centering around the Future Symposium and the Club of Gnu, have decided to organize a course of study in Futuristics under the interdisciplinary symposium rubric.

The purpose of the course is to acquaint ourselves with the issues and methodology of Futuristics. Futuristics as a discipline endeavours to incorporate feed-forward into social planning. By its nature it is multidisciplinary which is reflected in the team of resource people who will teach the course. Resource People (or Instructors): Prof. R.K. Logan — Co-ordinator — Physics; Prof. J. Delor — Political Science — Futurist (Director — Futures Research Institute — U. of Hawaii); Ms. M. Griggs — Interdisciplinary Teacher (Co-ordinator Alternatives in Education INX 302); Dr. A. Malleson — Psychiatrist — Ont. Hospital; Prof. A. Porter — Chairman, Industrial Engineering; Prof. J. Senders — Psychologist — Industrial Engineering.

We had the surprise of our lives the other day. On checking our files it seems the men outnumber the women two to one. Everyone suspected it would be the other way around, including ourselves. Especially since our guys are, for the most part, great guys indeed. We have doctors, lawyers, executives and the occasional football star. And these guys (like you, we suppose) are serious about seeking a lifetime mate. They've played the dating game, yet wound up calling us. That's because of our good reputation, our person-to-person interviews by intelligent, experienced counsellors. Our success.

FOO

on campus . . .

By AMANDA HANSON

Like it or not we all have to eat at sometime of the day or night. It can be a pleasure or an inherent pain but each student must find his or her own protective island in the University.

On campus there are cafeterias and mausoleums, death chambers and monuments, airplane hangars and tiny alcoves, sanitary operations and cigarette stained pits, health foods with sticky bases and health foods and sticky foods.

The Varsity has run the gamut and examined these hide-a-ways and tuck-aways. Our grading and our comments reflect our visceral reactions to both the food and the atmosphere.

VICTORIA

Whatever semblance of grace and style is left of the stately "university" is not expressed through the residence cafeterias Annesly or Burwash or the snack bar, Wymilwood.

Across the board prices are higher than elsewhere and the atmosphere is stifling.

Annesly is noisy, cluttered and dingy, with no touch of privacy or seclusion from the servery. The large windows add some light to an otherwise dismal environment.

Burwash is a poor man's version of the Great Hall, loud and uncomfortable with long tables and church-like fixtures, perhaps inspirational for the puritan instincts in would-be theologians.

Wymilwood is a dungeon of tile and brick with an unfortunate servery. The inmates seem to like it though and there is a distinctive college spirit — but the lighting is bleak.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE

In general, UC cafeterias have the most style and personality, reflecting an idyllic academic life.

In an otherwise arborite jungle, the two residence cafeterias have wooden tables and chairs. Women's College Union provides a marvellous retreat from the tortures of the day. With charming frame windows and serviettes under the salt and pepper shakers, there is a certain Alice-in-Wonderland quality that enhances this separate world.

Restrained opulence is a tactful way of describing Sir Daniel Wilson Hall. It is delicately lit with soft chandeliers and large windows. Wood paneling cradles the room and inside one feels somehow an intruder in someone else's fantasy.

The Refectory and the Junior Common Room are also impressive. The Junior Common Room is small, warm, peaceful and inviting when it is not jammed to the gunnels with the regular patrons, and the Refectory, while large and sprawling, is subdivided for privacy.

The food is good although prices are slightly higher.

TRINITY

The residence cafeterias are small and closed. Pretensions are stressed for runways for appropriate advances and retreats. The lighting is pleasant.

New's unfortunate gastronomic rating on campus is not deserved. Excellent salad plates are provided nightly and basically you can have as much of the first course as you want. You can still, timidating. The chairs are padded and people actually tidy up after themselves. The serviettes are large; the lighting is soft though artificial.

Even if one does not feel quite like King Arthur, he may at least feel like an extra on the set for Camelot.

the sake of style and tradition, and there is a Dickensian old world intimidation to the dining halls. Meal tickets are only 50 cents for guests.

The Buttery wins the award for the catchiest title and in many ways for the best lighting. There are large windows along the north and south wall which add needed variety to an otherwise pseudo-traditional but sanitized atmosphere. Prices here are lower and a definite college atmosphere emphasizes the point that commuting students are pleased with their retreat.

NEW

Like the building itself the New College residence snack bars and cafeterias are long and expansive, basically expressionless, with no semblance of tradition.

The two snack bars at Wilson and Wetmore carry a variety of food at reasonable prices. Wetmore has just opened a delicatessen counter that serves beer on Thursday. There is no sunlight but the "pool room" vibrations are easy to take and the lighting is not offensive.

The residence cafeterias resemble airplane hangars, with ramps and however, kill yourself on the vulcanized lasagna.

MEDICAL SCIENCE CAFETERIA

This cafeteria is the absolute nadir in respect to the quality of food and eating comfort on campus. It is large, noisy, disorganized, crowded, messy and smoke-filled. Unless you are in the building, and cannot escape, it is not worth visiting.

Sadly, it has made every attempt at being efficient and even personal, with a well-staffed servery and machines to handle the heavy lunch hour traffic, and partitions that subdivide and separate smokers from non-smokers. But it still remains cluttered and disorganized.

HART HOUSE

There is a benevolent tradition to the Hart House dining rooms that inspire confidence, and even a little respect. The coffee is fantastic; the hot meals are reasonably priced; the china is distinctive and the cutlery is usable.

The Tuck Shop, a friendly but antiquated room, is small and claustrophobic, if you can find it.

The Arbor Room has a distinctive arborite motif. It is protective but the lighting verges on the depressing.

The Great Hall is magnificent, comfortable, awe inspiring but not in-

OISE

The Ontario Institute for Studies in Education has a grill and cafeteria on the fifth floor open to U of T students. Both have large windows which provide a very nice western view.

The lighting is soft, there's indoor outdoor carpeting underfoot and some art on the walls. You should find it a quiet, pleasant spot for eating.

CONCLUSION

In general, the larger and more sterile the cafeteria, the more disorganized and dissatisfying the service is.

It should be noted that hours do not generally compare with K-mart's and students with late classes are generally forced off campus.

Prices are lower on campus than off, but quality is rarely improved. Fruit and yogurt are basic commodities though and there is generally sufficient choice to secure a student's survival.

There are a few places on campus conducive to relaxation and digestion, although your company helps.

The residence cafeterias are generally open to the public, but on the whole, (New is a notable exception) unless you have friends there, or bring them with you, you may feel like a treacherous gate crasher.

OD

and off . . .

By JOE WRIGHT

Frankly it's not very convenient to eat off campus. But sometimes it's just necessary to slip away for some quiet or some non-institutional food. It'll cost you more, but then you get what you pay for.

The general rule seems to be that the farther you're willing to walk, the better food and/or value you find.

The northern campus frontier abounds with pizza, submarine and burger spots. Most are quick turnover operations, and even if you like the food, the atmosphere is not too conducive to sitting down and enjoying your food. A walk along Bloor to the long block between Spadina and Bathurst is a little effort, but it can pay off in dining dividends.

The Blue Cellar Room

The first place you encounter is the ever popular Blue Cellar Room, part of the L'Europe Tavern at 469 Bloor. The lights are soft, the tables have checkered cloths and the cuisine is European. Business seems pretty brisk at most times. Hungarian goulash, chicken paprikash and veal cutlet always seem in demand here, and for $2.25 they include bread, potatoes and vegetable. There's also soup du jour and a daily special.

For lunch, sandwiches are available. Also available is draught beer at 55 cents a mug, but they don't make you feel obligated to drink.

Domino

Directly across the street is the newly opened Domino Restaurant. It's a bright but comfortable place to eat. They have made-to-order dishes such as veal stew, chicken paprikash and beef stew ranging from $1.75 to $2.50, including bread and cole slaw. Best value seems to be the daily specials offered. Different stews, goulashes and assorted other dishes are available for around $2.25.

For a snack or lunch you might try langos, billed as a Hungarian style tortilla. Like a crepe, they come stuffed with ham, cheese, mushrooms or mincemeat for 85 cents apiece. In the same there's veal cutlet on a bun for $1.25. They also have espresso coffee.

Maison Suisse

Travelling a bit farther west you run into the Maison Suisse, again on the south side at 513 Bloor. It's quiet, has soft lights and the service is unhurried. The atmosphere is relaxing, and if you're not involved in an intimate conversation you can overhear one. It's licenced and can be a bit more expensive. You might want to keep it in mind for the weekend but there is still good value to be found anytime. A good example is one of the frequent daily specials, coq au vin for $2.70. Most of the other specials, including a very tolerable rib steak, run for about $3.25 but all include bread, soup or salads and dessert.

As a late night snack suggestion escargots, at $2.00 for a half dozen seem like a good idea here.

The Continental

For the price of a meal, the Continental Restaurant, at 521 Bloor provides a genuinely continental atmosphere. One can relax in the small booths, listen to European music and forget you're in Toronto, and perhaps in its premier University.

There's good soup here every day and specials such as stuffed green peppers

The atmosphere is restful, all food is made to order and the service is best described as leisurely. The menu caters to both plain and exotic tastes and for $2.50 to $3.00 you'll get a good meal.

The Bagel and Tel Aviv

The southern campus College Street border is generally dark as far as good eating goes. One bright spot is The Bagel, a few steps west of Spadina at 285 College. They offer several kinds of homemade soup, with barley vegetable always a big favourite. The cabbage are several Chinese restaurants, all of which are reasonably priced. It's always more fun to go with a couple of people and trade dishes.

The Indian Rice Factory

Over on Yonge Street, despite the predominance of micro-wave emporiums, some pleasant havens for the hungry do exist. If you like Indian food, one such place is the Indian Rice Factory on the west side immediately south of Wellesley. Converted from a former grease pit, this restaurant has counter service in front and a quiet non-fluorescent table area in rear.

Naturally curries are the main staple here. Vegetable curries, such as egg plant and potatoe are available for less than $2.00. Rice and chapatis (unleavened Indian bread) are extra.

More substantial is the chicken curry at $2.25 which includes rice. For $2.00 you can get a vegetable platter which consists of a seasonal vegetable, a lentil-like sauce and rice. For snacks, Samosa is a suggestion, turnovers stuffed with minced beef or vegetables for 75 cents.

If the deep fried habit is hard to kick on the Strip, you might compromise here and try pakoras, assorted vegetables cooked in batter. It's open from 5:00 pm to 10:00 pm and is closed on Mondays.

The Ritz

Not exactly a dining spot, the Ritz Cafe at 7A Charles Street West provides a welcome refuge from Victoria College and points west. It's open from 11:00 to 11:00 Monday through Saturday and has soup of the day, good salads and healthy sandwiches. Cream cheese and cucumber is recommended.

Their coffee, that most elusive of beverages, is excellent and there are several varieties of tea and espresso capuccino and cafe-au-lait. Not recommended is dropping in between the hours of one and three when hungry workers and shoppers stand three deep at the counter.

The Spice of Life

A very new and welcome addition to the Yonge-Bay area is the Spice of Life restaurant, just north of Bloor on the west side of Yonge. It's chief virtue aside from good food is that it's open 24 hours a day.

The fare is basically vegetarian, although they serve eggs, unlike the Golden Temple. Incidentally Golden Temple ice cream is available for dessert as well as their own home baking.

Mexican and Indian food is one idea here, tacos, enchiladas and curry "de la journee" going for around $2.85. That includes rice, salad and coffee. Other ideas include guacamole, sandwiches and a vegetable plate with two vegetables and rice for $2.25.

Beverages offered include fresh fruit juices, coffee, including espresso and cardamom-flavoured, and several kinds of tea including herbals.

Human happiness—The Varsity Invents food.

for $2.25, and other dishes like veal or pork goulash for $2.30. The weekend specials of stuffed chicken at $2.40 or stuffed duck provide a very tasty and filling repast.

The Golden Temple

Moving south, vegetarians or anyone who likes good food can accommodate themselves at the Golden Temple restaurant on the south side of Harbord, just west of Spadina. There's a health food store out in front.

If you've got a sweet tooth habit, this is a good place to indulge it. They make their own ice cream on the premises, using honey instead of sugar, and it's delicious.

borscht, made with ox-tails, is also highly recommended.

For a full feeling, try a bowl of soup and a couple of cheese blintzes with sour cream or apple sauce. At $2.10 that seems like good value for a nourishing meal.

Just around the corner and down the street you can get the same meal at the same price. The Tel Aviv at 440 Spadina has blintzes that are a bit sweet but the homemade soup is always good.

A suggestion here if you've never tried one is a fallafel. Roughly, it is a pouch of dough filled with salad and deep fried balls of mashed chick peas. A small one is 85 cents, a large one $1.20, and they always beat a burger.

Also on Spadina, just south of College

Journalists survive epic ordeal in Saskatoon

It was business as usual as 150 delegates from student and alternate papers from across the country settled down for their annual gabfest in beautiful Saskatoon last month.

The highlight of Canadian University Press the conference was a boisterous midnight raid on the New Year's celebrations of the Saskatchewan Liberal Party. The young CUP "agents for social change" streamed in singing "Solidarity Forever" and chanting "Down with Pierre and "Socialism forever."

The conference discussed many weighty matters concerning the technical aspects of newspaper production and the business of the organization, as well as political sessions on northern development, sexism in sport, food, and book publishing in Canada.

Bob Bettson, assignments editor of The Varsity, was swept in as tough new national vice-president, one of the eight paid employees of the organization.

"The Varsity won't have me to kick around anymore," roared Bettson triumphantly, as thousands of frenzied CUP delegates danced in the aisles.

Meeting at the same time in Saskatoon were members of the women's and alternate press, some of whom are also members of CUP. They were discussing means of cooperation and the possible formation of a national organization such as CUP.

There are at present over 60 members in CUP including many community college, CEGEP and alternate papers. CUP offers a national news service and feature service as well as having regional organizations and fieldworkers to give technical help to member papers.

The national advertising co-op, Youthstream, was also a major topic of debate at the conference because of protracted negotiations for a new contract.

Varsity Board of Directors chairman Bruce Couchman flew in from Toronto to help get an 11th hour agreement which will be sent out to the membership for final approval after a few more details are worked out.

Youthstream at present generates over $350,000 annually of national advertising for member papers and operates uniquely as a co-op with the membership, sharing in profits and jointly voting on the spending of surplus funds.

CUP approved a new budget of $50,000, an increase of 27 percent because of a large increase in salaries from the present starvation wage of $85 a week to $110 a week. Some other categories were also increased because of inflation.

Fees will be going up for most members to a ceiling of $1,650 and this will require increased council subsidies. Member papers were urged to get their councils to increase student fees generally to compensate for inflation.

No changes under Saskatchewan NDP

By JOSEPH WRIGHT
 Since its 1971 election the Saskatchewan NDP has essentially become a state capitalist government Larry Sanders told a seminar on northern development recently.
 The seminar was part of the 37th national conference of Canadian University Press in Saskatoon over the Christmas holidays. Representing the Peoples Food Producers Board, Sanders said this is reflected in the history of corporate domination in Saskatchewan's forest industries.

Although the NDP has successfully campaigned on the issue of opposing corporate control of the forest industry in 1971, it has done nothing since then to reverse the situation, he said.
 Sanders also said the Department of Northern Saskatchewan (DNS) has failed to represent the best interests of northern people since its creation two years ago to coordinate northern control.
 But DNS field and service director Art Towell said the "track record is not where I would like to see it, but it's improving."

He added his department is "developing and fostering" local government by the creation of the northern municipal council.
 Towell told the seminar the northern Saskatchewan area is divided into five areas which function "the same as municipalities in the south."
 He also said 10 different departments formerly controlled northern affairs. "Now the core of these live and work in Northern Saskatchewan."
 But Sanders replied although the DNS has seriously tried to study local control, it has no jurisdiction over the natural resources, oil, minerals or forest products.

 He said although a town might now be able to participate in planning sewage and services, the government provides no economic power to implement them.
 "There's a continued attack on native organization by the same provincial government," Sanders said. The government has continually played on splits in the Metis society which has had considerable internal struggle in the past year and a half, he maintained.
 The government wants to keep the organizations weak, Sanders said, as part of its "neo-colonialist" attitude towards the north.
 Sanders later said Towell was quite obviously doing public relations for the provincial government. "It's more what the DNS doesn't do because it doesn't have the power," than what it does, he said.
 Sanders asked CUP journalists to examine their portrayal of native struggles. He said a split in the left exists over viewing native peoples as belonging to the class of "surplus labor" as opposed to victims of the "apartheid" system.

 "The white left needs to seriously study that debate and take a position on it," Sanders said.
 Political science professor Larry Pratt also urged an improvement in CUP journalism. The University of Alberta professor said the energy crisis is "an information crisis," which in turn is a credibility crisis.
 The oil industry has been conducting a "massive public relations program" to convince the public that we are facing a massive shortage of oil and gas, he said.
 "The media has bought this line and pushed it down our throats," Pratt charged. "The alternate press thinks this can be expressed solely by profit figures. This is an extremely deficient analysis."
 To properly serve the public "we must learn about how corporations work" and become informed about the oil and gas industries and the economy, he said.

Varsity wrestlers tuned up at Ontario Winter Games

By JOE RABEL

Over the Christmas break, four Varsity wrestlers participated for the central Ontario team at the Ontario Winter Games held in Thunder Bay. Rob Moore took a first in the 132 lb. division. His performance augers well for the Varsity team this year. Roman Preobrazenski placed third in the heavyweight class while Glenn May took a fourth in the 178 lb. division. Fred Gartner of the Blues also represented central Ontario.

Swim Blues host Western Saturday

The Varsity Blues swim team opens its dual meet season at the Benson Building Saturday at 2:00 pm when it hosts Western. Varsity has a large well-balanced team this year, and probably more depth in strokes than in previous years. The team has gained four freshman prospects in Larry Lapointe, Juri Daniel, Richard Fairbanks, and John Watt.

Four transfer students have also joined the team and with impressive credentials, Erik Fish from Yale participated in the Munich Olympics as well as the World Student Games in 1973. George Gross (also of water polo fame) was also entered in the World Student Games. Mike Hughes comes to Varsity from Waterloo and Don Miles from Queen's. Toronto has won eight CIAU championships in the last nine years and on paper are on their way to the ninth national title.

New volleyball league starts

Women's intercampus volleyball gets underway on Jan. 15 with a team representing each of the U of T campuses.

Erindale will host the Jan. 15 round robin while the teams will play at Scarborough on Jan. 22 and at the Benson Building on Jan. 29.

The league is unique in the sense that all three teams get into the playoffs. The semi finals consist of the second and third place teams fighting for the right to challenge the first place team for the championship.

The intercampus league was designed to give the girls a level of competition better than that found in intramural activities, but not as good as the intercollegiate team.

An intercampus basketball league operated in the late fall.

Blues down Clarkson College 6-2 in exhibition play

By ANNE LLOYD
The Varsity Blues last night avenged their 8-6 December loss to Clarkson, defeating the Golden Knights 6-2.

Clarkson, a strong skating team, played a determined second period, but were unable to put together any consistent drive. One would have to wonder if the 7-3 beating Monday night at the hands of the York Yeomen had anything to do with Clarkson's lacklustre performance against Varsity.

Clarkson coach, Jerry York, said after the game that the aim of the exhibition series as he saw it, was to play against good teams such as the Blues and to learn from the experience. He also felt that his team was a little down in spirit after the York game — apparently due to some questionable calls by York's hometown officials. Clarkson had trouble adopting the quick breaking game, suited to the slightly different American NCAA rules, against the Blues' steady pass and check game.

The Blues, playing together as a team for the first time since their 3-1 exhibition victory over Loyola, looked tired and a little bit slow on the puck.

Passes went astray frequently and no line played with any consistency, although there were a number of slick individual efforts throughout the game.

With Ruhnke, Pagnutti, Davies, and Anderson back from a Christmas tour of Czechoslovakia with the student national team, the Blues' offence showed signs of rounding into top form.

Harris, Herridge, Fifield, and Frank Davis played outstanding games, with Harris getting the opening goal at 13:13 of the first.

Harris' goal came after 13 minutes of cautious skating and checking. Harris took a pass from Herridge at the right side of the net and put the puck neatly into the short side with a hard wrist shot.

Larry Hopkins made it 2-0, alertly dumping the puck past Clarkson netminder LaRose. The goal resulted from a goalmouth scramble on a power play.

The tempo of the game picked up considerably around the 14 minute mark and Varsity goaler Dave Hulme was called on to make several key saves. He was particularly spectacular making a juggling catch off a hard shot from pointman Bill Blackwood.

Blackwood, ironically enough, was to beat Hulme at 18:25 of the second with an easy shot which slipped between Hulme's legs.

Varsity made it 3-0 at the end of the first with a clean shot by Frank Davis.

In the second period the Blues settled down to a slower pace while Clarkson came out of their shells and started to assert themselves. The Blues were equal to the occasion though and scored at the 50 second mark of the period.

Milnes streaked down the right boards and fed a perfect pass to Davis who tallied. Bill Fifield made it 5-0 taking a long pass from Hampton and firing a rising shot past the agile but petit LaRose. (cf. Gellius, wherever you are).

With Clarkson applying the pressure around the 15 minute mark of the period, the Blues began to look very tired and consequently took a series of minor penalties.

At the end of the second period Blues had a 5-1 lead.

The Varsity-Brian Pei

Milnes (19) and Herridge (7) combine to give the fans some goal-mouth excitement.

At the end of the second period Blues had a 5-1 lead.

The third period was a different story again. Davis got his hat trick at 2:28 beating LaRose with a screened backhand. Both teams were playing shorthanded at the time.

Blues took five consecutive penalties during the first 11 minutes of the period but Hulme preserved the five goal margin.

Clarkson continued the pressure in Varsity's end and Dan O'Driscoll finally tallied for the Yanks.

LaRose did his best to keep the scoring to a minimum in the third, stopping several breakaways and falling on every puck in sight.

The two teams acquired 43 minutes in penalties, a season high, with 26 minutes going to the Blues.

Blues have an appointment to pick up four easy points with a two game road trip. Varsity plays Queen's Friday and RMC Saturday.

Two relatively easy games should give the Blues a chance to get it all together after the prolonged Christmas break before they meet the Big Red of Cornell in their next home game Jan. 22.

New Varg feature - weekly golf tips by CPGA pro Bill Whitcombe

By BILL WHITCOMBE
CPGA PRO

Christmas is over and the days are getting longer. No doubt some of you received golf equipment from Santa and eagerly took out the seven iron and knocked a hole in the ceiling or knocked over a favourite lamp.

Don't despair. From now until spring, a series of golf tips will appear every Wednesday in The Varsity.

These tips are of value to the experienced player as well as to the beginner. In addition to the weekly tips, I am also available for clinics at the Benson Building if you give me some advance warning. Groups wishing to arrange a clinic should contact me at 928-3441.

Your indoor swinging problems can be solved at the Benson Building under my watchful eyes. Before going on the course you should have a fairly good swing. You want to be able to at least hit the ball. There are women's courses and some co-ed activities for any student or staff interested.

This week's tip concerns how to take a golf lesson.

Arrive on time and make an effort to budget your time so that you won't miss any of the series of lessons. Bring a note book and pencil and use them.

Two problems that I run into while teaching golf are: the person who listens to everyone else regarding their swing, and those who read golf instruction books.

Unfortunately, anyone who has played once more than you will now be your instructor, and also unfortunately, most golf books are written by tournament golfers who have been good from about the age of sixteen and these golfers are on a much different level than we are, as they hit hundreds of golf balls each day and play twelve months a year.

If you are prepared to hit 500 balls a day and play 365 days a year I can teach you the tournament golfers swing. It is better to start in grade one and to work in progressions depending on your ability, strength, and the time you are able to allot to this fascinating sport.

I have taught club champions as well as beginners but I find that most people, because of time and our northern climate wish to be able to play the game well enough to get out on the course with friends and have some fun.

One problem I run into while teaching is I often tell someone something only to have them come back the next week and tell me that a friend says that I am wrong and that they should be doing it another way.

For example, most beginners, especially girls or men with smaller or weak hands should use what is called a "strong grip". The strong grip is one in which the left hand is turned a little to the right on the club; this grip suits most beginners and should only be changed when the instructor has advanced the pupil to a different level.

Many excellent golfers using a "strong grip" have been ruined by reading golf books or by a friend who has insisted that they change.

Another example occurs when I tell beginners to play the ball with the iron clubs opposite the centre of their feet. They often come back to me and say that a friend told them to move the ball more to the left of their stance.

The ball should be played from the centre of the stance for beginners with irons and it should be kept in the centre of the stance until the pupil has a well shaped swing and has mastered the lateral hip shift on the downswing. After the lateral hip shift has been mastered then the ball may be moved a little to the left, depending on the strength and the talent of the player and how well they have mastered the lateral shift on the downswing.

You must learn golf in stages. Many of the things that tournament golfers or very good golfers can do, never applies to the average player because of the time and talent involved. We are all different sizes, shapes, strengths and temperaments and it is good to remember that: Learning begins where the pupil is and not where we would like the pupil to be.

Many girls come into the Benson Bldg. golf room and say that they would like to take golf but they don't know anything about it. Well, the less you know the better. The people who have played for a few years without proper instruction are much more difficult to teach than those that don't know which end of the club is up. So remember, beginner's golf means just that. Come on in and get started on the right track, you may just surprise yourself!

Profs talk tough on wages

By LAWRENCE CLARKE
Unionization may be the eventual course chosen by the U of T faculty should their attempts to secure a 25 per cent raise continue to be rebuffed, two faculty members have warned.

An eight-member negotiating committee, with equal representation from both faculty and administration, has been meeting twice monthly since October, but so far has been unable to arrive at any salary increase figure mutually acceptable to both sides.

If the dispute isn't settled by Feb. 1, the faculty may be forced to consider other alternatives such as working-to-rule, refusing to do volunteer administrative duties and seeking certification as a collective bargaining unit (unionization). University of Toronto Faculty Association (UFTA) president Bill Nelson said yesterday.

Michael Finlayson, a faculty member of the salary negotiating committee, agreed, saying "I believe that's (unionization) what's going to happen in the next 12 months."

Although the faculty is traditionally conservative and many don't like getting involved with money disputes, said Finlayson, unionization may come about "because difficult times will force them to change."

Both Nelson and Finlayson said the possibility of striking had already been discussed by the faculty, but neither seemed to think this tactic would be employed soon.

Vice-president and provost Don Forster was unavailable for comment on the salary dispute last night.

"All around us, people are getting 25 per cent increases or higher, and that only keeps them about even with inflation," Finlayson said.

"We understand the financial plight of the university and even came down to 18 per cent. But the last administration offer (reported to be around 6 to 8 per cent) was so unreasonable, we didn't even consider it discussable."

"We know the university doesn't have the money, so we're really talking to the provincial government," said Finlayson. "They'll only give us more money if we become more troublesome."

He agreed with the implication that this meant employing more extreme tactics like striking, which the faculty has previously refused to do.

"The two sides aren't even close yet," continued Nelson. "We've asked for 25 per cent and they (the administration negotiators) haven't even made a clear-cut offer we can bargain over."

So far, Nelson said, the negotiations have been carried on as simply "friendly discussions" in which the administration stresses the financial plight of the university.

"We're always at a disadvantage in these sort of discussions, because they have the figures and we don't. This puts us in exactly the same position as other university groups who are seeking raises, such as the support staff," Nelson said.

"We haven't been happy for years over the ways discussions have been handled. We'd like clear negotiations with an offer, a counter-offer and so on," Nelson said.

Other matters also had to be settled such as better compensation for extension teaching and leave, but they could be separated from the salary negotiations, Nelson said.

"The university administration... they don't want to be demoralized."

"They know there's a line below which they can't go without causing grave damage," Nelson said.

"What I'm really worried about," said Nelson, "is that a low settlement will cause many first-professional faculties, to go elsewhere where there's better money."

Both Nelson and Finlayson said a 25 per cent raise for the faculty wouldn't hurt other groups on campus, especially the support staff, from also winning increases.

hurt them is plan wrong," said Nelson. "It works quite the other way."

"If we get a raise, the university feels the same obligation to give it to others," Nelson said. "We also support their efforts to get an increase," Nelson said.

French dept't decides to lower average marks following A & S report

By MARINA STRAUSS
French course marks have become inflationary, the Faculty of Arts and Science maintains, and the Combined Department of French intends to remedy the situation.

French departments across campus will try over the next two years to lower students average marks to 70 percent, the combined department executive has decided.

Marks in French have averaged about 73 percent in the past two years, three percent above the department's new stipulations.

The move to lower French grades was prompted by a report of an academic standards subcommittee of the arts and science faculty, issued in November, which maintains that too many Bs and not enough Cs are given in arts and science courses.

The arts and science report recommends a C should indicate "average performance" and a B above-average ability and achievement.

Combined French department secretary T. R. Woodridge explained the arts and science faculty had found that marks in the French department were three percent higher than grades in the faculty as a whole.

"The French department is simply working towards what the faculty wants," Woodridge said.

However, Woodridge noted the French department did not lower marks as much as the arts and science faculty had proposed.

The faculty, he said, recommended mean grades of 62 to 67 percent for introductory courses, 67 to 70 percent for 200 series courses with university pre-requisites, and higher mean grades for 300 and 400 series courses.

French Course Union spokesperson Margaret MacDonald, who sits on the combined department executive committee, agreed with lowering averages three percent, but said she opposed lowering grades as much as the faculty had proposed.

"I do think the French marks have been spiralling every year," MacDonald said. "But students entering graduate schools still need minimum averages."

But Woodridge admitted the French department has not attempted to find out why marks are higher and if the trend is justified.

He noted moves have been made at universities across North America recently to stop the escalation of marks. "One is concerned about standards."

Although the arts and science faculty is trying to redefine what an A, B and C should represent, Woodridge noted his department drew up a report last September outlining present definitions.

While the faculty proposes a C grade should be "acceptable and respectable," indicating average performance, the combined French department's brief maintains a C means:

"Something is lacking. The student is uneven, tends to stop at the obvious, to be careless, to lack subtlety. Mediocrity and mistakes which should not occur make this kind of work acceptable or satisfactory in a negative sense."

A grade of B, according to the French department, indicates: "The students regard a C as being a bad mark," Woodridge said, "and B as an average mark. In a specialist program a certain percentage of Bs is demanded."

The average mark in arts and science on the St. George campus last year was 71.28 percent, while the average mark on the same campus in French courses was 73.85.

During the 1972-73 academic year, arts and science students on the St. George campus received an average grade of 70.59; French students received an average of 73.43 percent.

Research group urged for U of T

All those of you who cringe at acronyms, be warned: here's another one. PIRG.

PIRG, explains John Bee, stands for Public Interest Research Group, a body founded explicitly to conduct investigative research into whatever topics it feels affects and promote the public concern.

The founder of the PIRG, says Bee, is U.S. consumer rights advocate Ralph Nader, who feels these groups are an effective way for students to "focus their idealism, manpower and energy for effective change."

Based around a full-time staff of professionals, and funded by a local student council annual levy of roughly $3, the student board of directors of the PIRG would decide on the priorities for research for the coming year, which would then be co-ordinated by the professional staff using volunteer student labor.

In Ontario, there are presently two PIRGs, one at McMaster University and one at Waterloo. It is Bee's intention to organize a PIRG at U of T, hopefully for next fall. Bee was involved in setting up the Hamilton group.

The main focus of PIRGs has been consumer rights and environmental protection.

The Waterloo group, for example, has investigated the University of Waterloo housing shortage, organized around protection of the Elora gorge, conducted a retail and food price survey, worked on establishing bicycle routes and set up a consumer complaints office in Kitchener.

The McMaster group claims PIRGs are needed for three reasons; namely, to ensure:

- "Private economic decisions which have an impact on the public welfare are thoroughly studied and discussed;

- "Government policy takes into consideration the views and needs of more groups in society;

- "New methods are developed to ensure consideration of the public interest in private economic decisions and government policy."

Bee is meeting with SAC president Seymour Kanowitch today to present his proposal for a Toronto PIRG. Bee emphasizes that, in the past, referendums have been conducted to determine whether the PIRG should go ahead, and that those not wishing to contribute are not obliged.

Interdisciplinary dept faces large budget cuts

By JOSEPH WRIGHT
Major reductions in the operating budget are in store next year for the Department of Interdisciplinary Studies.

In a letter to Interdisciplinary Studies chairman Marty Wall this week, arts and science dean Bob Greene cites a reduction of the faculty's budget and the increasing involvement of St. George campus colleges in interdisciplinary courses as reasons for the cutback.

The letter said it is unlikely any new courses will be able to be introduced next year and some courses offered this year may not be continued.

Interdisciplinary Studies currently offers about 15 courses serving 700 students. Wall described the courses as "relatively popular" with students.

But, Wall said, "The pie hasn't been sliced yet," adding until figures are received, "It's not clear what we can do."

"The letter could be expressing the worst we can expect," Wall added

None of the departments in arts and science have received their budgets yet. "We will get it the same time as all the others," Wall said.

Wall said in the last Interdisciplinary Studies received cuts roughly in the same proportion as other departments in the faculty. But he said his department might be considered more "expensible" than others because it isn't a full department.

Although it has functioned as a full department since July 1, 1971, the department is not able to make permanent appointments. Its operating budget this year is $100,000, among the smallest in the faculty.

Interdisciplinary Studies evolved in 1969 when the Faculty of Arts and Science new program was instituted to offer courses outside the realm of established departments.

In the past Interdisciplinary Studies has suffered some hostility from some of the more traditional departments in arts and science.

Wall said a meeting is to be held today with the interdisciplinary courses' staff members to discuss the cutback and to plan strategy

The Learning Machine will begin as a new feature in The Varsity to provide a space for news of all sorts concerned with what is happening in the classroom and what decisions are being made which affect your education.

Watch for notices of course union meetings and other happenings of interest. Anyone who wants to submit something to the Learning Machine should call Bob Bettson 923-8741 or drop in at 91 St. George, 2nd floor. Submissions could be anything to do with education, marking hassles, bad profs, curriculum etc.

How would you like to have the marking scheme of a course changed after you had written the final exam?

Well, that's what happened to third year mathematics student Tony Hine and more than 100 other students in Math 230 last year.

Class representative Hine filed an appeal on his final grade, but it was denied by the Faculty of Arts and Science's committee on standing, which has no student representatives.

Hine says students in the course were given a final examination with six questions. The professor refused to give them any choice. All questions had to be done.

But after the exam Hine found out only the best four answers had been marked. Then the marks were put on a bell curve.

This eliminated a high failure rate, lowering some students marks and raising others. The only way Hine found out was through consultation after the fact because he was a class rep.

Hine and Arts and Science Student Union fieldworker Rick Gregory tried to reach students this fall, but found most had moved and could not be reached.

The committee, however, was convinced the grading scheme was "fair and just."

Arts and science faculty conservatives will never give up. The latest exploit of these daring dullards is an attempt to get the transcript to show the average grade and number of students enrolled beside every mark a student gets.

But fortunately for students, voting in favor of such a motion is not enough. Bill Foulds, top bureaucrat in the faculty, has advised the general committee such a change would be a bureaucratic nightmare.

The idea originally came up during discussion of the New Program Review report. Faculty conservatives, stung by defeats on a number of liberal recommendations, decided this would indicate the difficulty of the course and make so-called 'bird' courses less attractive.

The proposal was referred last year to the newly created Committee on Instruction and Evaluation which decided it was impractical.

The purposes were apparently to provide more information for employers and graduate schools as well as putting pressure on those with lax grading practices.

But the committee decided grading policy is anything but standard and any attempt to standardize would be arbitrary.

Practical difficulties are mind-boggling. Foulds said all final marks do not reach him at the same time and could not be because of graduations and deferrals.

Foulds also says printing that information on transcripts would result in delays which would hurt students applying at other universities. Only one other university uses this information on transcripts at present.

So much for academic standards. But despite this information Victoria College principal John Robson and sociology professor Leo Zakuta again moved this motion be passed at the last general committee meeting Monday.

U of T president John Evans once again turned thumbs down on requests by SAC and the U of T Faculty Association for a full inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the non-appointment of controversial Canadian sociologist John Seeley.

Evans told SAC president Seymour Kanowitch in a letter Jan. 6 the inquiry had already been denied by the Governing Council. Evans said the senior administrators who interfered in the Seeley case were justified.

"They have the responsibility to make judgments on academic appointments, particularly those at a senior level," Evans wrote. Arts and Science dean Bob Greene, provost Don Forster and Sociology professor Leo Zakuta were instrumental in preventing Seeley's appointment.

Kanowitch said yesterday the refusal did not come as any real surprise. "It is obvious there has been tampering by senior administrators... and Evans just wants to sweep this under the rug."

Kanowitch said Evans was probably concerned about the effect of the charges on Forster's new job as president at Guelph.

The U of T Student Aid Committee will begin next week to circulate a petition demanding immediate changes in the Ontario Student Awards Program (OSAP).

The petition is part of a campaign across the province launched in conjunction with the Ontario Federation of Students. The aim is to put pressure on the William Davis government to make the student aid scheme more equitable.

The six demands articulated in the U of T petition are an immediate increase of $15 in the living allowance, future indexing of the living allowance, lowering of the loan ceiling, abolition of mandatory parental contribution, inclusion of part-time students and calculations based on a student's real income.

Organizers will be visiting classes next week to gain support. The campaign is being funded by SAC.

It doesn't take a commission report to show that Radio Varsity is in trouble.

A member of the station actually successfully requested the station be allowed to take proceedings of the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science to be aired later for news reports.

If that isn't a way to lose your listeners! An item on the recent agenda can illustrate the boredom of the committee's deliberations. How would you like to listen to a debate on the report of a sub-committee on memorial tributes to deceased members of the council?

Radio Varsity's news coverage seems as dead on as its management.

SAC once again got the perennial cold shoulder from Queens Park during a holiday meeting with Colleges and Universities Minister James Auld.

Auld sat back, listened to SAC demands for answers on the controversial U of T Act and came back with the familiar Tory response, "I don't know."

The U of T Act review will probably go to cabinet later this month but Auld would not commit himself. The present recommendations are for 11 students and 13 faculty on an enlarged Governing Council. Eight students and 12 faculty members now sit on council.

The students will probably have a chance to plead for parity at public meetings. And Auld said the matter could reach the Legislature as late as May when students are off campus.

New housing bylaw termed 'unfair' to co-op residents

By EDWARD LARY

What would be your reaction to a housing by-law, passed by Toronto City Council, which required you to install an electronic smoke detector, fire alarm systems and fire extinguishers in your own home?

You'd probably have a few strong opinions as to where the city politicians could put their housing by-law as far as you were concerned.

By-law 413-74, passed at the last City Council meeting before the December election, adjournment, may require some Toronto homeowners to meet precisely those kinds of regulations in their own homes.

The situation arises because the city's housing by-laws draw no legal distinction between boarding houses and cooperatively-managed homes, which Bob Schutte of the Association of Urban Co-ops describes as both "archaic" and "unfair."

Schutte believes housing cooperatives, where several people share the cost of buying or renting the house they live in, as well as household duties and living expenses, are a realistic way of providing people with decent accommodation at a price they can afford.

In a time of few housing starts and inflated prices, Schutte argues, co-ops maximize the use of existing housing while easing the financial burden of purchasing a home through cost-sharing.

He adds that many co-ops offer social benefits to their members, providing the traditional support of the family through shared responsibility and companionship.

In by-law 413-74, however, the definition of a "lodging" (boarding) house is simply a dwelling which provides "lodging" for "more than four persons" and contains "more than three dwelling units" with shared use of bathroom or kitchen facilities.

The result is that most co-ops are included under the lodging house misnomer, Schutte says, and must meet maximum fire safety standards designed to protect residents of boarding houses.

Schutte points out that numerous aspects of the co-op lifestyle tend to reduce the high risk conditions found in most boarding houses:

- The absence of multiple kitchens or hot plates.
- The fact that residents are usually well-acquainted and have a collective say in who is admitted into the co-op.
- The general absence of locked doors.
- The residents' certain familiarity with available exits from the building.

The City of Toronto doesn't agree with Schutte. City housing inspectors have been busily serving his own seven-member co-op with notices to install electronic smoke detectors, build a fire balcony, close off stairwells and purchase fire extinguishers.

In September, the Association of Urban Co-ops presented a brief to the city's building and development committee calling for some recognition that housing co-ops offer their residents a substantially different lifestyle than that found in the average boarding house.

The brief outlines criteria by which "cooperative dwelling houses" could be distinguished from "lodging houses," suggests that fire safety standards be eased (although not eliminated) for co-ops, and is currently lost amid several departments of the City Hall bureaucracy.

Barbara Rudder and David Jackson, general managers of Campus Co-op and Inn-ers, two large student cooperatives at U of T, agree with Schutte's philosophical point that the quality of life in a cooperative differs from a boarding house.

Both believe the city's housing by-laws should make some allowance for this, particularly in the area of safety standards.

Schutte is interested in contacting members of housing co-ops with a view to "consciousness raising" about the problems faced by co-ops under present housing by-laws. The Association of Urban Co-ops can be reached at 533-9506.

... If one is engaged in a war, one deploys troops, one seeks to know the capability and the intentions of the enemy and things of that sort. If one is engaged in politics and one deploys his political troops, one seeks to learn the capabilities and intentions of the other side. The opposition. It's like brushing your teeth.

Radio Varsity needs new start

We didn't really need a commission of inquiry to tell us that Radio Varsity had problems, but, what the hell, commissions are all the rage these days, and the magnitude of the station's problem is set out for all to see in the report.

The report, commissioned by SAC communications commissioner Michael Sabia after a particularly bitter staff manager confrontation and published Tuesday, broaches three areas of concern. These can be defined as management, structure, and purpose of the station.

As for management, the present station manager, Paul Murton, has quite clearly lost control of his staff. Whether he alone is to blame for the problems of the station is unnecessary to decide. What is clear is that as long as he is manager, the station will not function properly. Nor do any of the present staff appear qualified to take over: they seem more like extras in a soap opera who have been around for too long.

But management will be incapable of success unless the larger problems facing the station are dealt with.

Structurally, the station has never got off the ground. While its beautiful sister, The Varsity, was equipped with a board of directors with formal responsibilities and an orderly system of management, Radio Varsity was ignored. Consequently, the station is in a shambles. There has been an endless avoidance of responsibility back and forth between SAC and Radio Varsity.

To be efficiently managed, the station must have a board of directors, and clearly defined staff responsibilities.

Most importantly, the station must have a purpose. Few are satisfied with the quality of either the programming or the service. Despite some good moves in entertainment and women's coverage, the station is still floundering pop music - certainly no path to uniqueness. Moreover, the present service reaches only a few stranded in campus cafeterias or residences, and even fewer through the Rogers Cable system.

Both SAC and Radio Varsity recognize the station is unacceptable as it stands. However, in the ten years the station has been on the air, no perceptible move to enhance its stature has been made. Despite a decision by last year's SAC to press for an FM licence, progress has been at a snail's pace.

There has to be wide-ranging discussion, followed by general consensus of the purpose of the station. Only on that basis can an FM license be satisfactorily gained. Moreover, only on that basis can the station succeed structurally and managerially.

It is imperative to give Radio Varsity a clear direction this spring by making one of two choices. The first is to put the station on a sound footing by defining a purpose (such as quality FM broadcasting for the university and the community); setting up a board of directors to implement that purpose and ensure the proper management of the station; and making sufficient capital commitments to enable the station to accomplish that. The other option is to phase the station out.

To phase the station out would be an incredible waste, not of the present station material, but of the potential which abounds within the university for an high calibre, student-run radio station drawing on the full resources of the campus.

May we suggest. . .

'A good manager', says the commission on Radio Varsity, 'can be nothing less than a dictator, be benevolent or alevolent, who is given a near impossible task to perform with near limitless authority and pushes himself and everyone working for him as far as he can towards accomplishing it.'

Metro students zero in on Canadian culture

Dear Ed,

I was shocked and dismayed at the unpalatable and misleading, not to say distasteful article about food on campus in Wednesday's Varsity.

As an average student, I find it potentially alienating to see such careless reporting given feature treatment, this raises serious questions about the edibility of both Amanda Hanson and the elusive features editor.

In her excursions across campus Amanda had an amazing capacity to astutely take stock of lighting facilities and windows to the exclusion of making tasteful, not to say accurate, comments about food and prices. Lighting is given priority, (mentioned no less than eight times and graded from "best" to "depressing") and windows rate second in importance.

The Junior Common Room at University College, contrary to

Letters and op-ed submissions should be addressed to the editor, typed, double-spaced and signed in ink. Keep it brief and make it interesting. Either use campus or regular mail, or deliver submissions in person. No submission will be considered for publication if not received by 4 p.m. the previous day.

Amanda's impression, does not have "slightly higher" prices but rather, noticeably lower ones.

The Buttery, though it may have the "best lighting" does not have lower prices (and let's quote some hard hitting prices eh?).

While Ms. Hanson's elegant phrase-mongering is a suitable ornament to the usually bland pages of The Varsity, such stylistic pyrotechnics would best be blended with more careful illumination of the burning issues at hand. As Cato the Elder said, "It is a hard matter, my fellow citizens, to argue with the belly, since it has no ears".

Raisin and Coke make fine theatre

Lorraine Hansbury's 1959 play, "A Raisin In The Sun", has by now become something of a modern theatre classic. Fourteen years ago, its story of a black family that comes into insurance money and decides to move into an all white suburb of Chicago, broke new ground for the American Negro in the theatre. But could it survive today as a musical, with its small cast, and pignat story?

Happily, yes. The musical version "Raisin", on view at the O'Keefe Centre (until Saturday) is a rare theatrical experience. The show manages to avoid the slick, glossy veneer of most big musicals, emerging instead as a musical with great heart and warmth.

The performances are remarkably fine. Joe Morton playing Walter Lee Younger, handles his many emotional scenes with great skill and realism. As his wife, Ernestine Jackson displays a very likeable character, plus a beautiful voice, quietly forceful in her lovely ballads, yet rich and joyous when she pulls all the stops.

Virginia Capers won last year's Tony Award for her magnificent portrayal of Mama Younger. Her character is always very real, warm and powerful. When she is on stage, her singing is a celebration of music and drama.

Donald McKayle's staging is inventive and fluid, but his African Dance seemed oddly out of place.

Judd Woldin's music and Robert Brittan's lyrics are always just right. The songs are melodious, and provide deeper and more intimate views into the characters of the Younger family.

Raisin is a very emotional show, but the sentiment is never misplaced. We feel that the emotions are real because we know the characters so well.

Raisin goes back to New York after its stint in Toronto; here's to a long, long run on Broadway.

Have you ever watched an old 'B' movie on TV, and found that it was so awful, it was funny? If you find that kind of inept performance amusing, then you should find much to enjoy in El Grande De Coca-Cola.

Set in a sleazy night club in Honduras, El Grande De Coca-Cola is a tacky cabaret show presented by one Pope Hernandez. Having promised a group of internationally famous stars, he tries to palm off four members of his own family as the "Parade of Stars".

The show is done entirely in broken Spanish, but that doesn't matter; everything is easily understood. The cabaret acts include a phony magician, flat singers, stumbling dancers, a blind crooner and two hilarious commercials by the sponsor, Coca-Cola.

Everything that could possibly occur to destroy a show, happens in El Grande. Performers fall off the stage, trip on microphone cords, rip costumes, and one fellow even 'el defecatos' on the stage.

The cast is uniformly good at performing ineptly. Hernandez' cousin (Jonathan Gardner) and nephew (Alan Shearman) have a few funny bits as Italian gigolos, and pot smoking German rock stars — "1st gute scheisse, ja?"

Ron House, who conceived the show with Diz White, plays Pep Hernandez with great gusto. His resemblance to Terry Thomas is incredible.

El Grande De Coca-Cola may not appeal to everyone's sense of humour, but enthusiasts of zan Monty Python type humour are sure to have a great time. The show is playing at Old Angelo's, on Elm Street, for an indefinite run.

Raised movie prices may be a blessing in disguise

While movie theatre executives were flashing messages of good cheer on the screens over the holidays, they also raised admission prices to $3.50 to capitalize on our penchant to spend wads of the green stuff during Christmas, especially on disaster movies.

There's little likelihood they'll lower them, of course, so those of us who want to continue watching movies other than on television had better look elsewhere.

The $3.50 tab, stiff as it is, may be a blessing in disguise for the smaller, quality-oriented theatres like the Revue, the Kensington, the Roxy and for the university film clubs and the OISE evening series. (It's too late to help Cinematiumiere which closed a month ago.)

But it's also worthwhile investigating the smaller neighborhood theatres which do not even have the advertising or word-of-mouth reputation movie houses like the Roxy enjoy.

These neighborhood theatres are too poor to advertise in the big newspapers, and so content themselves with booking in old movies, usually on double or triple bills, at minimal prices.

Although these theatres show little discrimination in what they book, they often do have good movies on their bill, if only because a triple bill that changes three times a week is bound to turn up something worthwhile just by the law of averages.

And because they so largely depend on old movies because they are cheap to rent, they often get vintage movies which don't show up on any big screen in town.

The best such neighborhood theatres are the Orpheum, the Centre, the Lido and the Pagoda, (Chinese), the College and the Kum C.

Other borderline theatres in this category are the Fox, the Donlans, the Willow, The Rio, and Biltmore which boast double and triple bills with a breathlessly quick rotation, but still manage to take out small ads in The Star and charge slightly higher prices.

For the small neighborhood theatres that don't advertise, get their telephone numbers from the Yellow Pages (page 1287) to find out what's playing.

Most change their bills Sundays, Tuesdays and Thursdays, and an average bill may very well contain Marlon Brando in Burn, 1000 Convicts and a Woman, and maybe an action click like an old James Bond or Clint Eastwood.

Prices vary from 75 cents at the Orpheum (Bathurst and Queen) to $2.50 at the Rio and the Biltmore on Yonge St. a Friday night.

Ambience differs in these theatres according to the neighborhoods they're situated in.

The Chinese theatres like the Lido and the Pagoda pack in large chinese families, the small children run up and down the aisles while their parents chatter excitedly throughout the movies—usually one kung fu movie and one Chinese romance. Altogether very friendly places.

The Orpheum, a cavernous, gaping wound behind a merry '50's style theatre facade, has a sepulchral glow, with sleeping drunks, lonely old men and other unidentified bodies scattered throughout the huge theatre.

Until recently the Orpheum still contained a official-looking warning about truancy which gives a good indication of its audience.

The two big flagships on Yonge St. — the Rio and the Biltmore — otherwise known as "threesies" for the number of pictures they show, contain every known specimen of mankind, and going there is more fascinating than watching the movies.

All these theatres were once booming hives of escape and glamour, but television ruined them and left only the big movie chains.

With inflation now cutting into even the chains, perhaps these small theatres, with their low prices, their unpretentious audiences, their worn seats, their ornate, ancient architecture, will make a comeback. lawrence clarke

Bunuel: the influence becomes like the influenced

Le Phantome de la Liberté, Luis Bunuel's latest film, has been acclaimed as one of the top ten of 1974. In view of the trash that the film industry has been throwing into our faces lately, this is not at all surprising. Le Phantome de la Liberté is not a bad film, but it is by no means a masterpiece.

Bunuel doesn't offer us anything new in this film. He merely repeats the ancient surrealist formula whereby humour finds its source in gross incongruity.

Bunuel must have been bored when he was making this film. It was a toy for him; a lazy exercise for his filmmaking talent.

Luis Bunuel is an old master of film. He has been in the cinema since 1926 and in 1928 he made, with Salvador Dali, Un Chien Andalou the film for which he is most famous.

Bunuel when he is at his best is the Goya of cinema. His films have a distinct Spanish romanticism in their accusation of the world we live in. His work is a mixture of nobility, bitterness, humour and tragedy.

Once you've said that you have to say Le Phantome de la Liberté is a film that's unworthy of Bunuel. The movie is a series of loose sketches.

The paradoxes that Bunuel presents don't always connect and some are idiotic and tedious. Moreover, Bunuel seems to lack concentration in his direction.

Very often his timing is off; he fails to follow through on some jokes while staying too long with others.

Andrew Sarris has noted that Bunuel "began his career by throwing live priests and dead jacksasses out the window and then compounding his sacrilege by confusing Christ with Marquis de Sade."

On Phantome de la Liberté Bunuel cannot restrain himself from taking his usual shot at the Church. He shows us monks in a hotel room, drinking beer and playing cards.

Instead of using chips, they bet with tiny statues of Virgin Mary, crucifixes, religious tokens and other regalia of the Church. We hear one of the monks betting, "I'll open with a Virgin."

This is a very sad scene; it is the feeble raging of a tired and old man. One feels sorry for the Bunuel who, at one time able to put a sharp sword to the Church, now resorts to this.

The title, Le Phantome de la Liberté, is a play on Marx' "A spectre is haunting Europe — the spectre of communism." Yet this film is not about freedom, communism or any other idea.

It's been said that this film's theme is "freedom in the sense of 'chance'", and that it is a brilliant attack on the bourgeoisie.

As many themes, have been attributed to this film as there are critics. In fact, there is no overriding thematic significant in the work. The movie can be enjoyed on its face value; it's not recommended that one spend much time digging for profound meanings.

In one scene Bunuel laughs at us by taking the various customs involved with eating and excretion and reversing them. Excretion is now performed in dining room-like areas while eating is done in privacy and behind a locked door.

There is a hilarious sequence with French police officers being lectured in law. The moment these neatly uniformed protectors of law and order enter a classroom, their behaviour changes to that of schoolchildren.

One scene that wasn't particularly funny, did turn out to be very haunting. A sniper climbs to the top of a skyscraper and fires onto the masses of people below.

We see his victims suddenly dropping dead amongst the crowds, but we hear no gunshots. The building is so high, that the shots are unheard and nobody below understands what is happening.

One can easily see what Bunuel is saying when he shows us the spectacle of a man so high up in a skyscraper, that he can kill those below him in silence.

The sniper (Pierre Lary, Bunuel's assistant) is caught, tried, convicted, sentenced to death — and then released. He walks out with the crowd, signing autographs for them

Since Bunuel has had an influence on the creators of the "Monty Python's Flying Circus", those who enjoy that show would probably enjoy this.

A conversation with Geoffery Payzant
Glenn Gould, meet your Boss

As hundreds of students have learned in the past few years, Geoffery Payzant is an endlessly fascinating speaker—whether he's speaking on music or philosophy, both of which pop up in his academic and personal lives. For the past while, he's been on the trail of Glenn Gould, trying to understand the mind of the greatest pianist this country has ever produced. While editor of The Canadian Music Journal some 15 years ago, Payzant worked with Gould, when the latter wrote an article for the Journal, but since then they have met only on rare occasions.

The result of all the searching—through record liner notes, magazine articles, interview transcripts and many other sources—may be leading towards a book; at the moment it's leading directly to next Wednesday evening at Hart House, where Payzant will be speaking on "The Musical Mind of Glenn Gould." Earlier this week, I spoke with Payzant in his St. George St. offices. Gould, though, wasn't in attendance—just his image in a 1961 photo at the keyboard of a church organ as he played Bach's "Art of the Figure".

Basskin: What led you to choose Glenn Gould as the subject for your talk this Wednesday?

Payzant: Well, when I agreed to give a lecture, I hadn't decided what to give it on—this was last April—then during the Summer, in connection with another piece of work I was doing, I found myself exploring Glenn Gould as an example of someone who, more than any other great performing artist, externalizes a great many of the internal processes—at least they're internal in other people—like his singing, which he would like to stop, but can't, his extravagant movements of the body—which were greater in the miserable days before 1964, when he still played on the concert stage than they are now. These extravagant movements of the body are means of making external whatever he thinks while he's playing.

B: So for his own art, it wasn't enough to walk on, play, walk off again in the standard manner.

P: Never could. It all has to do with the fact that Gould never was an exploited prodigy. By the time he was 3 it was clear he had an overwhelmingly exceptional musical intelligence. By the time he was 5, he had done some little concerts in the neighbouring church hall. He hadn't done much except little things, around the school or the neighbourhood until he was about 12, by which time he was entering the competitive music festivals and winning everything, of course, overwhelming everybody. He made his debut at the age of 13, playing the organ, not the piano. Then, the following year, he played the Beethoven G Major concerto with the Toronto Symphony orchestra, but then he almost disappeared from view. By the time he was 20, he had done eight performances with various orchestras, two solo appearances on the CBC and a solo appearance on some other big show—this was radio, of course, although television was just emerging—but for a person who is one of the great musical intelligences of all time, he was not at all exploited, not really, relatively speaking, heard! By the time he was 20, he had not performed as much in public as Mozart had at the age of 3. Gould was not at all someone who was on the concert stage, exposed and subject to criticism during those extremely important years.

B: Then there was no push from home...?

P: None at all; quite the opposite. At home, his parents must have been quite exceptionally intelligent, sensitive people. All opportunities that he might want for any kind of learning whatever were there. Schooling was difficult, and eventually he went on half-time school and had a tutor, so that he did finish his high school matriculation. But the rest of his time was devoted to exploring the piano, exploring the musical literature, listening to records. He took in music by any means he could, but he took it in on his own terms absolutely.

B: And was this in fact the origin of his exotic mannerisms on the concert stage?

P: Well, when he was practising at the Gould family home on Southwood Drive, or at the family cottage, where there were pianos for him, he was practising in complete disregard of what it might look like to anybody else. His teacher, Guererro, said many times—and I heard him say it—that Glenn Gould played with complete physical involvement, played with everything he had. Guererro tried to get him to restrain himself and never really believed that it was a necessary physical concomitant of performance for Gould. I believe that it was, but Guererro never believed that Gould couldn't control this, couldn't get it out of the way. But by the time Gould was a public figure—in his early twenties—it was really too late to rebuild himself, which is really what it would take.

B: Much has been made of Gould's strange habits—wearing heavy clothes at the height of summer, for example—but his most controversial move ever was the departure from the concert stage about ten years ago. Did this idea begin to stir within him around the time of his first recordings?

P: Not really. It's been said that long before his concert career began this was his intention: to make recordings, films, radio programs. He was convinced that the studio was his career, even then. Many people believe that his immense barrage of not just propaganda but reasoned argument against the concert hall as a place for delivering music to the public was kind of a cop-out. He didn't like it, that's true. He found that it made him physically ill and upset him emotionally—all of that is true, and when he stopped doing that, he became in all respects very much better, right away!, had a much happier, much more constructive life.

B: Since his departure from the stage, he's had a love affair with the microphone to a certain extent, hasn't he?

P: Yes, but it started long before he left the stage. He grew to prefer the solitude of the recording studio, and the degree of control he has there. He particularly likes the process of handling tape, of handling film, the splicing, the editing, the deliberations. He likes to take the raw materials, the "takes" of a few weeks earlier and handle them as another stage of the creative enterprise.

B: As radio listeners have discovered in listening to his

"Contrapuntal Radio" programs. P: And he's now an acknowledged virtuoso in this medium. In "The Latecomers", which was about Newfoundland, there was one character from whom Gould recorded perhaps twenty minutes of speech. He wanted to make a lot of use of it—he was a central figure, this character—but the trouble was that this particular Newfoundlander, apart from the nice accent that we look for in Newfoundlanders, had a lot of "uhhms" and "ahhs" in his speech, and there wasn't a syllable that wasn't introduced or concluded by some kind of a noise. Gould, confronted by this, and wanting to make the person coherent, made more than one thousand, six hundred excisions on that one interview to get it into a shape he thought he could use. One interview! Night and day... he drove the technicians up a wall.
