Sociology department's hiring of Americans causes discord

By ULLI DIEMER

U of T's sociology department has been thrown into a turmoil over its hiring of eight foreigners — and no Canadians — to fill staff vacancies.

Five students and one professor have resigned from the department's staffing committee, an action that chairman Irving Zeitlin — an American — has labelled as "the worst kind of hypocrisy."

"They were all sitting on the committee all year and for them to make it appear that someone else was responsible for the decisions is really absurd," he contended. "I have nothing but contempt for them."

Zeitlin was rebutted in an open letter to the department by graduate student Paul Craven, one of those who resigned.

Charging Zeitlin with "ad hominem and emotional arguments," Craven states: "There is no attempt in our letter (of resignation) to pass off responsibility for the decisions on someone else. We do not question the competence of any of the people who were hired."

"We have not tried to whitewash our own roles on the staffing committee; indeed, we went to some lengths to say that we consider ourselves in part responsible for the decisions that were made."

Other students who resigned also assumed partial blame for what happened. Undergraduate Les Prokop said he considered himself a "failure" for not having resisted more effectively the pressure to hire Americans.

At the same time, they stressed their view was the major responsibility for what occurred must rest with the selection procedures rather than with the individuals on the committee. They charged the criteria of a PhD was overstressed, putting Canadians with only MA status, but with equally valuable research knowledge and publishing credentials, at a disadvantage. They also claim the "search procedure started late and was not intensive enough."

Craven also added that "it is my belief, based on conversations with some of the Canadian applicants who were not hired, that the status of some applications was incorrectly explained to the Committee. I do not know whether this was an honest mistake or a deliberate misrepresentation. I certainly hope that it was the former."

Craven also countered Zeitlin's charge that the students did not "give the fully story." He pointed out all committee members are bound by confidentiality rules. "In many ways, it would have helped our argument to name names and tell 'the full story,'" he said.

Seven students and seven faculty, plus Zeitlin, sat on the committee. Two of the seven students had left the university before the crisis occurred this summer.

The five remaining — Pauline Pytka, an undergraduate, and graduates Jim Sacouman and Barry Edgington, plus Prokop and Craven, have all resigned. Professor Jim Turk, an American who took his PhD at U of T, resigned separately.

All of them said the censure of the sociology department's hiring practices by the Canadian Sociology and Anthropology Association, passed in August, sparked their resignations. The CSAA motion was moved by professor Paul Grayson of York University and professor Kathleen Herman of Queen's. Both are recent graduates of the U of T sociology department.

The August motion censured the department for ignoring CSAA's policy that non-Canadians should not be hired for permanent positions by departments with less than 50 per cent Canadians on their faculty.

In their letter of resignation, the five students call for the department to "achieve 66 per cent Canadian citizenship within the next five years."

"We propose that ... no non-Canadian citizens be hired in the coming year, except in the case of foreign scholars who have made a substantial recognized contribution to the understanding of Canadian society."

"At the end of the year, the process should be evaluated and if necessary extended to future years, until the goal of two-thirds Canadian citizenship is reached."

A similar motion is being submitted to a faculty meeting for approval by professors Dennis Magill and John Lee.

The motions would supplement guidelines passed in March, 1972, which instructed the staffing committee to attempt to hire sociologists who have "engaged in or definitely committed to doing critical research and teaching on Canada and Canadian problems."

The question has been debated in the department for some time. In 1971, a staff-student "Canadian content committee" met and made recommendations, some calling for more staff who were qualified to teach Canadian content and who had a "critical" approach to sociology.

The committee's recommendations were watered down and then forgotten about. Students at that time had no representation on the departmental staffing committee.

Last spring a group of faculty members and students circulated a document in the department entitled Towards a Critical Canadian Sociology. It criticized the dominant model of sociology as being unsystematic, ahistorical and oriented in favor of the status quo.

The authors called for a science of Canadian society that would orient itself towards exposing structures of domination and exploitation and that would see itself as an agent of social change.

Its staffing recommendations did not mention citizenship. It did call, among other things, for "hiring outside the discipline" and seeking scholars who question "narrow disciplinary definitions."

Among the signatories were staffing committee members Jim Craven, Les Prokop, and Jim Sacouman.

The document aroused considerable opposition, with some faculty members claiming that it threatened academic freedom.

However, some supporters of the paper claim the only threat to academic freedom that occurred has been the denial of tenure to professor Bernd Baldus, who signed the document. They claim there is reason to suspect a connection between the two events.

Many of them are also eager to reduce or abolish student involvement in departmental affairs. Some of them are known to want a chairman who would reverse the trend to increased student participation leading to speculation that Zeitlin may be caught in a squeeze in which he will lose the support of the opposing blocs.

University stalls on parity issue

By BOB BETTSON

A decision on staff-student parity, an issue for many years at U of T, was again postponed by the governing council at its June meeting, but the issue will re-surface at two October council meetings.

The issue arose again as the focal point of discussion in the review of the University of Toronto Act of 1971.

The council, created by the Ontario government, had to undertake a mandatory review of its size and composition by this spring.

The council stalled its decision despite strong appeals from students and their supporters to settle the matter this spring.

The student appeal came after a report by a council subcommittee which recommended staff-student parity on the council, U of T's top governing body.

The Hallett report, as the document is known, urged an enlarged, 62-member council with 12 students and 12 faculty members.

The present 50-member council has eight students and 12 faculty members.

The Hallett report is reproduced in full on pages 21 and 22 of today's issue.

After the vote for the delay, the eight student governors walked out of the meeting in protest. They issued a statement which charged "further delay on the question is unwarranted."

"We no longer have any faith in the ability of the governing council to review its composition in a fair and impartial way," said spokesman Gord Barnes.

He said any report favorable to equal faculty-student representation would be deferred.

The Students' Administrative Council, the Graduate Student Union and the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students have adopted a common position which will be presented to the governing council at its fall meetings.

They call for equal representation of faculty and students with 14 members each on the governing council and a guarantee that government appointees be made more broadly representative of the community.

The three student organizations will be embarking on a substantial lobbying campaign among students and faculty and later members of the legislature to gain support for these proposals.

The council has called for briefs to be submitted before Oct. 1 for the council meetings in its drive for "input from the university community."

In 1971, students mounted a substantial lobbying effort which outstripped the faculty and came close to convincing John White, then Minister of College and Universities, that parity representation should be incorporated in the act.

But under threats from faculty the Tories backed down and students had to be content with only eight seats and the promise of a review in two years.

The review process last year involved only three students on the 15-member committee but still ended up supporting faculty-student parity.

Opponents of parity later charged there had not been enough discussion and many faculty members thought no changes in size and composition would be discussed in the review process.

After two meetings debating faculty-student parity, and other issues of size and composition, the review committee released its report.

But then seven members of the committee, including several who never attended meetings, submitted a dissenting view asserting governing council hadn't operated long enough for a satisfactory evaluation of its structure and composition.

Corporate lawyer John Tory, who had attended few of the committee meetings, submitted a letter of dissent attacking the proposed changes and lauding the role of faculty members of the council. His letter (see the advertisement) provided the rationale used by anti-parity forces.

Rather than a debate on the principles of parity, students were faced with increasing support for the tactic of delay. Despite intensive lobbying the council's executive committee decided to reject the sections of the review committee report calling for parity. Instead they put forward a motion postponing the question until the fall, for another review.

Although the act required a report to be submitted to the Ontario government by July 1, this tactic was adopted. At the council meeting June 20 chairman Malin Harding said he had received assurances from the Tory government at Queens Park the provision would be waived.

The debate at the June council meeting was anti-climatic with students trying to raise the issue of parity and have it dealt with immediately. They were frustrated by the continued contention by some council members there had not been adequate discussion.

Academic affairs committee chairman John Dove said he was concerned about the "sparseness" of input to the subcommittee and the "insufficient thought given to the changes recommended."

The student members of the council contended the issue had already been discussed often over the past five years since the 1968 report of the Commission on University Government. It initially recommended parity but was scrapped after faculty opposition.

Finally the council voted 24-16 to delay the issue until the fall.

Scarborough student appeal denied

By MARGOT GRIFFIN

Giving birth to a baby has hindered at least one U of T student's academic pursuits.

The university has refused to give course credit to a Scarborough College student unable to take her commerce course final exam last spring because of a premature birth.

Nafes Khan, a top student in the Commerce A01 course, missed the exam — worth 50 per cent of the final grade — because she gave birth April 17, one week before the exam and three weeks earlier than expected.

The course's lecturer, Keith Lehrer, who confirmed the student was in the top five in his class of 65, supported Khan's three unsuccessful appeals for aegrotat standing. The standing is granted to students too ill to take a test.

Two of the appeals were submitted to Scarborough's standing committee, the other to the university's academic appeals subcommittee.

In an Aug. 14 letter to Khan, subcommittee chairman J.B. Dunlop said he would allow Khan to take a special examination "at a time convenient to both yourself and (Scarborough) College."

However Khan, a public school teacher, complained the college will only allow her to take the exam next April along with the academic year's other students.

This, Khan noted, will prevent her from taking another evening course this year and, ultimately, prolong obtaining her BA. Teachers qualify for higher salaries with the degree.

Dunlop had also proposed Khan take a regular August examination without paying the fee. However Khan received the notice only three days before the exam was administered and felt she had insufficient time to prepare for it.

Khan was told the subcommittee denied her academic standing in the course because the class' average mark dropped "noticeably" in last spring's final exam.

But Robert Pritchard, head of Campus Legal Aid, insisted the university should have taken into consideration Khan's above-average performance in her academic pursuits.

Khan and her husband came to Canada seven years ago from India. After four years as an extension student at the U of T, Khan now has seven credits towards her major in psychology.

There are a number of people to whom special thanks are due for the production of this first issue of 1974-75. Bob Gaumier, Dick Brown, Alex Rodnick, Arii Moses, Tom Walkom and Linda McQuinn have all been patient and encouraging in their advice. Gene Allen, Bob Bellson, Lawrence Clarke and Pat Wickson have worked incredibly hard to get this first issue out. And the rest of our production staff and new reporters have responded with enthusiasm to the rather onerous demands put on them. Thanks, folks.

Two belated victory notes

When Dick and Pat Nixon, in happier times, were living in the White House, they were constantly deluged with requests for "Dick's favourite recipe", the sort of thing that you could impress your neighbours with when you had them over for dinner.

Now old Dick wasn't all that dumb. Because his favourite recipe was meatloaf, meatloaf a la Nixon. We all know what he meant by that. By saying his favourite recipe was meatloaf, he was telling America: "Look, I'm a man of the people, I eat the same food you do — hamburger. It's just that I call it meatloaf."

In other words, it's not what you say, it's what you say it for. Dick probably never ate meatloaf in his life; he was more worried about looking good.

The same analogy, conversely, can be applied to the ever-changing political winds at the U of T.

It was just three short years ago that the university was turned upside down, with its biggest occupation ever, over the question of access to the stacks of the brand new John P. (for Parmenter) Robarts library.

The $45 million edifice (affectionately known as 'Fort Book' or 'The John'), was originally conceived as a cloister of serious research and sober daydreaming for graduate students, and other species higher up the great chain of being.

The library, according to then-president Claude Bissell, and chief librarian Robert Blackburn, was to put the U of T on the academic map, to consolidate the waning status of our truth factory as one of the world's top ten.

This was to be a research library, wherein the academic reputation of the university would be enhanced; not, in other words, a place for people like undergraduates to go and read dog-eared copies of "An invitation to sociology".

Students, on the other hand, as well as a significant number of faculty, wanted equal and open access to the stacks for all university members.

Blackburn and his cohorts fought a desperate campaign against undergraduate access, which proved unsuccessful after a massive occupation of Simcoe Hall by students upset by the calling on campus of Metro police over a smaller occupation.

Acting president Jack Sword had called in police to remove a small group of demonstrators from Simcoe Hall, in an unprecedented, and bloody episode. Following the larger demonstration, Sword promised to present the students' demands to the board of governors, the students assuming they had won.

The board of governors, however, overturned Sword's proposal.

Well, it wasn't quite unsuccessful. What emerged from the negotiations following the occupation was a report which suggested entrance to the stacks on the basis of academic need. The library's response was to issue stack passes. Come to us, tell us a story about your in-depth research on tap-dancing in 14th century Russia, and we'll give you a stack pass, maybe, ran their argument.

Such logic was transparent. We cave in, but we pretend not to. We'll call it meatloaf, but we all know what it means — hamburger. Stack passes, in their own right, were trivial, pointless. They were only there to preserve the administration's dignity.

And now the transparency has been compounded, for after months of fussing over the importance of needing a stack pass, the library administration, in its finite wisdom, has decided to do away with stack passes altogether. Anyone with a student identification card will automatically gain entrance to the stacks.

As one library employee rather caustically put it, there was no need for the stack passes in the first place, and the only rationale for using them was self-serving: the library administration did not want to look like it had caved in.

Chalk up one belated victory for the students, and one more defeat for hamburger rhetoric.

Another belated victory is coming into sight. After being occupied by parents for over three years, without the consent of the university, a daycare centre on Devonshire place is now being granted a license of occupation. The university is finally entering into the daycare business, something it originally refused to do.

What next? Will the university say mea culpa, and start serving wheat germ in the Arbour room, instead of hamburger?

Simcoe Hall Marxists must come clean

Today's shocking disclosure that a longtime member of the university's top administration is a self-confessed Marxist means that U of T prexy John Evans must provide some fast answers to the burning question that is sweeping this campus: If internal affairs vice-presidents are made by Marx, what is the rest of the administration made of?

The time has come to face the horrendous question that for years now, The Varsity has been unable to bring itself to ask:

Is our trusted administration in Simcoe Hall poisoned by the pernicious doctrine of world-wide communism?

Have our administrators sold us out on those ideals which they uphold for us: inequity and elitism?

U of T students are not going to stand for this. As one student The Varsity talked to, Simon Pure (New, II) put it:

"I'm deeply upset by this disclosure; have we been trusting a parcel of rogues all these years?"

Pure predicted that not only U of T but the whole of Metro will want some good explanations.

The Varsity calls on prexy Evans to level with us: name names and numbers. How many? For how long? Why?

Either Evans comes up with the facts, or The Varsity goes straight to the Knox College vegetable patch to look for pumpkins.

CHILE: one year later

The following is an interview with Pedro Vuskovic that took place in July 1974. Vuskovic was the Minister of Economics under Salvadore Allende's Unidad Popular government.

To-day is the first anniversary of the bloody military coup that toppled the socialist government of Salvadore Allende. Both Chile's floundering economy and internal disorder prior to the coup had been attributed by liberals and conservatives alike to Allende's 'misguided' socialism. Many apologists for the coup claimed that the military junta, under the rigid control of Pinochet, would end Chile's problems and hasten the return to 'democratic' rule.

The revelations made by CIA director William Colby before the US Congress that the Nixon Administration authorized the expenditure of more than eight million dollars to 'destabilize' Allende's government, and the continued economic turmoil and political repression within Chile indicates the naivete of those claims.

Q. As the former Minister of the Economy and later Vice-President of CORFO (The State Development Agency) we would be interested in hearing your analyses of the economic policies of the military junta and their effects upon the Chilean economy. Especially, how have these policies affected the different social sectors in Chile?

A. I believe that the central fact is that today, under the dictatorship, Chile is experiencing one of the most dramatic economic situations in the history of the country. Unemployment has reached unprecedented levels representing some 20 percent of the economically active population of Chile and this represents the highest level of unemployment present price of fuel.

In the third place, the insufficient demand resulting from this violent decline in purchasing power of the Chilean population is beginning to affect production levels.

The imposition of military discipline over the workforce is no longer enough to maintain these levels of production. The imposition of military discipline in respect to the labour force immediately after the coup permitted them to increase the production in the first months. But by March 1974 industrial production was lower than in March 1973, with some industrial sectors, for example that of soft drink production, dropping some 25 percent comparing March 1974 with March 1973.

to be felt and the prospect is that inflation will continue at a very high rate. In the first months of this year the monthly average price increase was greater than 15 percent. The same occurred with the fiscal deficit, despite all that was done in respect to the reduction of the real incomes of civil servants, of firing in the public service, the fiscal deficit continues.

Now in respect to the second part of the question about who is being affected by this economic policy... I would say that the consequences of this economic policy falls upon the classes and social sectors that constitute the immense majority of the Chilean population. Of course, the worst impact falls on the working class which suffers an increasing process of Labour increasing process of impoverishment, but it also affects white collar employees, technicians and professionals. Merchants and small manufacturers have practically lost their working capital and have experienced large declines in sales and other business activity.

The small- and medium-sized industrialists find themselves unprotected in the face of the competition of the large enterprises and the influx of imported products.

Definitely, the only ones who gain with this economic policy are the foreign enterprises and the great monopolistic bourgeoisie, and it is, of course, precisely those interests, in the final analysis, that the Junta is representing politically.

Q. In the second place, what type of trade union structure has the Junta tried to establish and how has the working class responded?

A. I believe that to appreciate what is happening to the trade union movement today, one must understand that it is of the very essence of the dictatorship's economic policy to seek a way out of the problems of the economy through the super exploitation of the workers; they believe that this will solve both the imbalances ('presently existing') and lead to an eventual expansion of the economy. This is the central point.

Consequently, the dictatorship cannot tolerate the existence of union organization with a minimum of independence that defends the interests of the workers. That explains why the Central Workers' Union, the highest level organization of the Chilean union movement, has been disbanded and persecuted and the same has occurred with the large workers' federations.

The national leaders have been assassinated, jailed or forced into exile, and the repression has extended down to local level union leaders.

As a result, all efforts at promoting real union demands have been relentlessly crushed. In respect to this, I believe that the objective testimony collected by the International Labour Organization is well known; on the basis of this evidence, this international organization decided to undertake a very broad investigation in Chile.

Naturally, the dictatorship seeks to find some response, wishing to give the impression of some active union organization at this moment. But that only represents efforts to create this image on the bases of certain unions where, by imposition of the dictatorship's force, there have been established or imposed selected leaders who don't represent or reflect the interests or sentiments of the workers. I believe that in the long run, so long as the dictatorship remains in power in Chile, they will tend to increase the fiction of an union organization.

But the truth is that as a result of the very nature of the dictatorship's economic policy and because of its political significance, there is no possibility of the functioning of an effective union organization. This, I believe, is the situation which exists at this moment.

Q. In the classic cases of fascism, the middle sectors maintained their political support of the government despite being economically crushed. However, this doesn't seem to be happening in Chile where a deterioration of the military Junta's base of support has been noted. What reasons would you give to explain these differences?

A. It is certain that a characterization of the dictatorship in strict terms would lead us to accept, in all correctness, its characterization as fascist from the point of view of the brutality of the repression it has exercised. Beyond that, I believe that we must understand that what is being attempted in Chile today is a model of domination, a new type of domination which inherits these repressive characteristics from fascism but which is really a sort of neo-fascism which must be defined in accordance with present conditions.

military Junta, particularly in the documents made public after the first six months, on March 11, there is a clearly explicit expression of what the Junta sees as its political tasks in the long run. I would say that there is contained the proposition of incorporating the elements of fascism characterized with greater conceptual rigor, as it were, as a proposition for the future. For example, they propose the organization of a civilian-military movement which would come to represent the fascist party supporting the Junta. We also find a redefinition of the role of local government (the municipalities) through which the dictatorship seeks some kind of penetration of the masses which they lack today. The so-called DINA (National Directorate of Intelligence) is in full operation. This is an agency of repression, an agency of intelligence which represents a sort of Gestapo, superimposed on the traditional agencies of the various branches of the Armed Forces. In short, a typically fascist situation is being constructed.

Now then, within the context of a fascism which is applied as a form of domination in an underdeveloped and dependent country and where it is difficult to represent and defend the interests of the middle sectors I believe that as a result it is in the very nature of this dictatorship to be the expression of the strict interests of the foreign enterprises and the large national bourgeoisie. And the Chilean petit-bourgeoisie and middle sectors, the middle class, necessarily see themselves affected, as they have been to a large extent, and I would say with greater reason in the future. From this point of view, the Chilean dictatorship cannot sustain itself with mass support, even among the middle sectors. Given this absence of mass support they must resort to the only method available to them, i.e. repression — with the characteristics that it has exhibited. I believe it is difficult to imagine a historic situation in which, ten months after the coup, there continues to prevail a repression of the type which still exists in Chile. The maintenance of a state of internal war whereby all acts of the registered in Chile since the crises of the 1930's.

A second factor is that the real income and the purchasing power of the vast majority of the population has been sharply cut back. The internal price structure, above all in respect to essential items, has increased from 12 to 15 times since September while wages and salaries have been readjusted at a substantially lower rate. Among the poorest sectors of the Chilean population, there is hunger, malnutrition, and in the homes of the middle class, this winter was one without heat for they could not afford to pay the

I would consider the high level of unemployment, the substantial reduction of real income and of the population's purchasing power and the declines in production for lack of demand as three of the main characteristics resulting from the dictatorship's economic policy.

Now then, it is worth noting, despite such a high social cost, the dictatorship has not been able to resolve the principle economic imbalance. After having substantially elevated the level of prices, increasing them from 12 to 15 times, since September 11 to today, the inflationary pressures still con-citizenry are viewed from this perspective and all normal forms of consideration are repressed. The maintenance of the curfew — all these norms which have been applied would be explicable, by no means justifiable, but at least explicable in the days following a coup. But the fact that these persist to this day with the same violence that was used in the first days I believe is one more demonstration of how this configuration of a new fascist scheme in the Chilean case cannot hope to achieve the massive support of important sectors of the population. Necessarily the support of the middle sectors is alienated and I believe that this is well demonstrated in the progressive weakening of the base of support of the military Junta.

I believe that this not only illustrates the Chilean case in very dramatic terms but it also poses a challenge to the peoples of all countries. In so far as the Chilean dictatorship nature becomes consolidated, then the possibility of this neo-fascist form becoming a model of domination in dependent countries becomes a certain risk for all Latin American countries and in general for all democratic countries.

Q. How do you see the short run development of the political situation? Is there some possibility of a change of military guard now that Pinochet is installed as President?

A. I believe that within the general political and economic framework which exists it is inevitable that all types of contradictions develop within the Armed Forces themselves. Thus it would not do to exclude the possibility of some changes. I believe that the cabinet shuffle of a few weeks ago reflects the character of these contradictions. But in any case it would be a matter of changes which would not alter the essential characteristics of the dictatorship.

That which seems most important to me is that in the midst of these objective contradictions, the Chilean people will be reorganizing their forces, they will overcome the enormous losses they suffered, they will defy the repression, they will build their capacity for confrontation with maturity, with decisiveness, without falling into desperation. And it will be done with the certainty of winning the opportunity of future historical stages in which the painfully interrupted road will be retaken, having learned the lessons of this bitter experience.

In this sense, the Chilean people certainly count not only on their own strength, but also on the strength of international solidarity; solidarity which is both disinterested (selfless) and very much in the interests of other people's self-defence . . . in so far as the rebirth and consolidation of a neo-fascist form in Chile would represent a threat for all peoples. International solidarity not only has the significance of a humane attitude towards a people who are suffering what the Chilean people suffer today but also has the significance of self-defence for these other peoples.

I believe that in this sense it is important nobody fool themselves or remain indifferent in the face of the importance of this threat today.

When we demand international solidarity, we do so not only in the interests of the Chilean people, but because we also attribute a far wider significance to the struggle presently being waged by the Chilean people. The extension of new modes and forms of fascism is a certain risk . . . and notwithstanding all that has been written and said about the Chilean situation, it is difficult to fully understand the significance of this.

In our country there were many who waited for, hoped for and encouraged the military coup, and today . . . I think they understand the significance that that attitude has had; because the way in which the great majority of the population is oppressed is really indescribable. We who live outside are permanently pained by the news we receive regarding the conditions under which the struggle is sustained . . . and I am not just referring to those who are actively participating in it, but also to the immense sufferings that this has meant for the Chilean people in general.

New poli ec chairman by Thursday?

Students have been excluded from the committee which will choose a successor to political economy department chairman J. Stephan Dupre.

The move may spark a controversy similar to one in 1970 when students threatened a sit-in over Dupre's appointment.

The chairman has wide power over course offerings, academic regulations and the hiring and firing of professors. In effect, he rules the department along with a small group of senior faculty members. Dupre resigned in June to become chairman of the provincial government's new advisory body for university affairs. H. C. Eastman will be acting poli ec chairman. He opposes significant student representation in university decision-making.

There are unconfirmed reports Eastman is the choice of the all-faculty committee, and that his name will be submitted to a meeting of the academic affairs committee which has to approve the appointment, on Thursday. Eastman was unavailable for comment last night.

Arts and science dean Bob Greene has appointed a search committee of eight faculty members. The committee will also decide whether to split the department into separate political science, economics and commerce sections. University regulations prohibit students from sitting on search committees for department chairmen, the most sensitive academic jobs in the university. Students may sit on selection committees for deans of faculties, but their deans have less control than chairmen over the academic nature of the university.

As a slight concession to students, Greene has appointed a small "shadow committee" of students to suggest candidates to the search committee. The shadow committee can also discuss department re-organization. But it will have no say in any final decisions, and no binding power.

When Dupre was appointed chairman in 1970, the Political Economy Course Union strongly protested the exclusion of students and junior faculty members decision.

Students also resented Dupre's hostility to possible student decision-making power in the department. They planned an obstructive rally outside the poli ec offices in Sidney Smith Hall, but worried department officials offered students a negotiating committee to discuss departmental decision-making.

The committee, consisting of equal numbers of students and faculty, met for several months, but no decisions were ever implemented.

In course union elections last spring a group of conservative students was elected to executive positions. It is uncertain whether this group will oppose the department's plans for excluding students. But several more radical students may challenge any course union inaction.

Representations to the shadow committee should be made to course union chairwoman Nonnie Balcer, a committee member.

Vic council loses top enchiladas

By ANN McRAE
Victoria University Students' Administrative Council (VUSAC) has lost four of its 10 executive members through resignations. President Brian Gazley, elected last spring to his second term, has resigned to do community work in low income areas in London, England.

VUSAC's usual fall elections for members-at-large will include by-elections for the vacated posts. Gazley is acting as president until then.

VUSAC is the student government of Victoria University, which includes Emmanuel and Victoria Colleges. It supports such cultural efforts as the Strand newspaper, the Acta quarterly literary review, clubs, pubs, pinball machines and musical reviews.

VUSAC also battles college bureaucracy and red tape. The council led a student struggle last year for voting representation on Vic's top governing body, the Board of Regents.

Also resigning was finance commissioner Michele Harvey, who was accepted into medicine. Her job involved keeping the books and recording grants to clubs.

Education commissioner Wayne McComb resigned as well. McComb was encouraged to run by a former VUSAC member but found the organization less appealing once inside.

Anatomy of a Root

Fine Canadian Leathers
The soft skins are naturally finished, so in Roots you'll look as good as you feel. And because Roots are designed and made right here in Canada, you needn't pay through the nose for your feet

Rocker Sole
In a natural stride, weight moves from the heel, along the outer side of the foot then diagonally across to the big toe, which springs you off on your next step. Roots rocker sole helps this shift in weight, making every foot-step just a little less tiring

Supported Arch
The city sidewalk can be a real arch enemy. And fallen arches hurt. Roots are contoured to support the arch and the small recess between the balls of your feet.

Recessed Heel
Walk on sand and your heel will leave the deepest part of your footprint. In natural walking, most of your weight lands on your heel. Conventional shoes—even low heeled shoes—tilt you forward and change your basic posture. In Roots, your heel sinks into a comfortable recess, giving you a natural walk on any kind of surface.

Varg denies guilt in Nixon ouster

On behalf of the publisher and the board of directors, The Varsity hereby serves official notice that it rejects the scurrilous accusations that have been levelled concerning the paper and ex-president Richard Nixon.

We deny emphatically, the charge of hounding Mr. Nixon out of office. The Varsity has been, and will continue to be, a free and critical press. But to suggest that the paper single-handedly forced Mr. Nixon from his high office is to drag the noble profession of journalism through the mud.

The Varsity thanks its readers who understood, and supported us when we came under fire.

I wish to express my dissatisfaction with the hiring policy exhibited by the Department of Sociology at the University of Toronto. Recently, the Sociology Department increased its staff by hiring 8 professors from the United States and one from West Germany. This increases the proportion of U.S. professors in the Department of Sociology to over 55 per cent.

What is even more stunning though, is the fact that over 30 Canadian applicants were refused positions by the committee responsible for the hirings. Alan Powell, a U. of T. associate professor said that between 30-40 qualified Canadian applicants were refused.

In response to this dreadful non-Canadian hiring policy, professor Irving Zeitlin, Chairman of the Department of Sociology said that "no one is going to sacrifice competence to hire Canadians." Professor Zeitlin claimed that the Canadian applicants lacked Canadian research interests or experience, and were inferior to the non-Canadian applicants. He also claimed that there was a larger pool of U.S. candidates to draw from.

As a result of the recent hirings, Zeitlin and the Department of Sociology have received widespread criticism from both outside and within the University of Toronto. Professor James Turk and 5 students on the Sociology Department hiring committee all resigned as a result of the recent hirings.

Commenting on the resignations, Zeitlin said that he had no use for that sort of thing, and he also said that he had nothing but contempt for those that resigned.

Paul Grayson, a York University Sociology professor, opposed the recent hirings. He believes that the University of Toronto has failed to comply with the 1973 CSAA meeting, in which it was mutually agreed that faculties having more than 50 per cent non-Canadian members should hold emergency moratoriums on hiring policy.

Shirley Small, a sociology professor at the University of Toronto, summed up the criticism of the Department's hiring policy in a recent article in the Star. She concluded her article by saying that, "We must recognize that we do not need to be dependent on the United States for sociological insights into our own society. This may well mean the hiring of younger less experienced members of the profession who have not yet gained international recognition for their publications."

Professor Irving Zeitlin is himself a U.S. citizen. He did his doctoral work at Princeton and then taught at the University of Indiana and Washington University in St. Louis before coming to the University of Toronto. No doubt the fact that he himself is a U.S. citizen played a major role in the hiring of the U.S. professors.

Professor Larry Felt, a member of the Sociology Department hiring committee said that Canadian citizenship was taken into consideration when reviewing the applications, but when further questioned he admitted that some of the U.S. profs. who had been teaching in Canadian Universities in subject areas not necessarily related to Canada, had been given preference as having "Canadian teaching experience."

Zeitlin also said that in the opinion of the committee none of the Canadian applicants were impressive from a scholarly point of view.

Personally, I feel that this is inadequate. There were more than 30 Canadian applicants, none of whom would have applied had they felt that they had not met the admission requirements. Furthermore, of those applicants, I find it hard to believe that there was not at least one Canadian applicant with an outstanding academic record.

It is vital that professor Zeitlin make public the applications for admission into the Department of Sociology. If in fact the Canadian applicants were "academically inferior", then something must be done to improve the level of graduate studies in Sociology in Canadian Universities.

But if in fact there were promising Canadian applicants who were refused admission in preference of their U.S. counterparts, then I call for the immediate resignation of Chairman Irving Zeitlin.

Either way, the applications must be made public so that all the facts can be revealed.

Thousands affected by OSAP changes

By CIM NUNN

More than 6,000 students in Ontario post-secondary institutions stand to lose $5,000 each in tax deductions because of a change in the Ontario Student Award Program (OSAP).

The change affects students who have completed at least three years of post-secondary instruction or who have worked for one year and completed two years of study.

The move follows the federal government decision to eliminate the Modified Group A status from the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP).

The decision, based upon the Canada Student Loans Act (SLA) was reached because OSAP dropped the criterion of age.

As a result, the OSAP's standards for qualification were considered too lenient by the federal SLA.

In the past students who qualified for assistance under the Modified Group A stipulations, according to

OSAP's parental contribution table, had either:

"Completed three successful years of post-secondary education, or spent a total of three years comprising two years of successful post-secondary education and one period of twelve consecutive months in the work force or actively looking for work."

Those who qualified for the Modified Group A, including 1,259 students from University of Toronto, were allowed an additional $5,000 deduction from their parents' net incomes, on top of all other deductions.

While the loss of this deduction may seem large, a ministry of colleges and universities spokesman claimed for most, the loss would be minimal.

But representative of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS), said the government action reflects the ministry's attitude towards students.

The government spokesman said 3,800 of the 6,000 students involved would be covered as independent students. This group, he claimed, would likely be better off as independents.

These students will be able to take advantage of the recently lowered standard of independence, from 25 to 24 years of age, he said.

Any of the remaining 2,200 students who find themselves seriously affected by the government's decision will be able to appeal before a board established by the provincial government.

This board will deal with cases individually, but spokesmen did not say how long this would take.

The OFS is sceptical about the individual treatment of the 2,200 appeals. It would prefer across-the-board treatment of the appeals.

By eliminating this group, the ministry will save $200,000 a year.

When questioned about the Modified Group A, U of T student awards office spokespersons claimed they were unaware of any specific action taken by the province to help students affected.

For this year, at least, there will be no Modified Group A in the OSAP regimen. However, Ontario government officials have approached their counterparts in other provinces with the suggestion that they adopt a group similar to the Modified A that Ontario used.

A review of the SLA will take place in 1975.

Maintenance staff to vote on contract

By ROB PRITCHARD

U of T's maintenance and ground workers will vote Thursday night on a settlement reached between the university and their union.

The 800 employees are members of the Service Employees' International Union.

The union leaders will recommend they accept the agreement reached early Friday morning. Details of the agreement cannot be divulged before the vote.

The negotiations, lasting several months, involved wages, better health benefits, vacation pay and observance of statutory holidays.

Tension was highest in early May when the union accused administrative negotiators of bargaining in bad faith. The university had refused to continue bargaining unless the union withdrew a proposal for a cost-of-living clause.

"All universities are tight with their bargaining," a union spokesman explained, claiming a wage increase might result in a fees increase and therefore discourage university enrolment.

The last major dispute between the union and the university was settled in October 1972 after prolonged bargaining over wage increases.

If the settlement is rejected Thursday night, the parties will renegotiate the issues but union leaders hope to avoid a strike.

You want delays, we got delays

Thousands of Ontario students will receive their student loans late this year due to a keypunch processing foulup.

Ministry of colleges and universities officials indicate loans are always late, and this delay will only mean a slight additional wait.

The Student Awards office on campus has stated there will be no problem for University of Toronto students.

However, SAC spokespeople maintain the Student Awards office has not notified students of the availability of interest-free loans.

The Student Awards office denied SAC's claim, stating every OSAP applicant will, sooner or later, get in touch with the office where he or she will be told about the loans.

In order to help students who have not received their OSAP loans, the university will grant a waiver on payment of tuition until the loan arrives.

SAC points out students who need funds immediately are entitled to an interest-free loan to tide them over until the OSAP loans come through.

A similar practice of waiving tuition and providing interest-free loans has also been adopted by York University and Ryerson Polytechnical Institute.

SAC will continue to monitor the situation and help students who unsuccessfully apply for an interest-free loan.

At least one student who applied at the Student Awards office for an interest-free loan was refused.

However, when a SAC representative accompanied the student the next day, the student received a $200 loan.

The government announced Monday processing of OSAP loans was once again on schedule. It remains to be seen how long the loans will take to reach students.

Both SAC and OFS remain sceptical about the ministry's statement that loans are being processed on schedule.

HILLEL PRESENTS HANNAH SANDBERG

in a lecture illustrated with slides on Israeli & Biblical folklore expressions in art.

Born and educated in Israel, artist Hannah Sandberg has developed in her paintings a unique idiom, utilizing Hebrew wording and calligraphy as image-producing elements in her interpretive expression of Biblical themes. Her many paintings in water colour, tempera, pastel, oil, gouache, liquitex (acrylic) casein, and mixed media reflect not only the influence of Israeli folklore, its traditions, origins, and history, but also her thorough knowledge of the Old Testament and the life and philosophies of the Near and Far East. Sources of inspiration for her paintings, exhibited over the last fifteen years, include the Ten Commandments, the Prophecies of Micah, and the Book of Psalms, on which she is presently engaged, having undertaken the ambitious project of executing in oil and acrylic 150 canvases, interpreting visually each of the Psalms.

ART NEWS critic spoke of the "luminous abstractions" in her work; others have noted the "aura of gaiety" in her "Mediterranean colors despite the serious subject matter"; the animation, mood, and meaning derived from the Biblical text itself, executed in stylized sophisticated design which results in a kind of archaic quality of pictographs. Publications in which reviews of her work have appeared, in addition to ART NEWS, include ARTS, the NEW YORK TIMES, the NEW YORK POST, the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE, the DAY-JEWISH JOURNAL, AUFBAU (German), HADOAR HEBREW WEEKLY, the NATIONAL JEWISH POST, and THE VILLAGER (Greenwich, N.Y.), the TORONTO STAR, and the GLOBE AND MAIL. Besides participating in many group shows, she has had one-woman shows at the East Side Gallery, the John Myers Gallery, the Living Art Gallery, the New York Public Library, the Lynn Kottler Galleries, the Village Art Centre Galleries, the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, and the Samuel J. Zacks Gallery, York University.

Mrs. Sandberg has frequently lectured on modern art and has taught at Yeshiva University High School for girls. She has been teaching for the past three years at Stong College, York University.

INTRODUCING

When Western civilization collapses from its internal contradictions sometime next Thursday, it will leave behind a rich legacy of cultural development which will surely be of value to all mankind. Future societies, whatever their ideological pretensions, cannot help but benefit from such prodigies of physical and social engineering as double-edged twin-bladed razors and electoral democracy.

Forms of political organization since the golden days of Greek Democracy (in which all enjoyed the rights of full citizenship except slaves and women) have ranged all the way from benevolent despotism to amiable dictatorship. The university in its role as a transmitter of cultural values to the unlettered hordes of posterity governs itself according to a popular variation on this old theme.

In principle it's fairly complex. In practice it's bewildering. But it rests foursquare on those two pillars of civilization and order, bureaucrats and committees.

The main difference between bureaucrats and committeemen is that the former are paid and the latter are not. Committeemen are concerned to represent their constituencies adequately; bureaucrats are concerned with getting the job done. It's an old song, the opposition between efficiency and democracy in decision-making; but things are even more complicated than that.

To begin with, there is no unanimity among committee members on their aims. Students, faculty members, businessmen appointed by the provincial government, custodians and alumni can come up with multi-sided disagreements convoluted enough to make zen parables seem models of clarity by comparison.

Further, once a decision is reached it may be unacceptable to those to whom it applies. Individual faculties, departments, and colleges wish to retain significant power in their own hands, leaving the governing council the job of ratifying their decisions.

In flow-chart terms, loyalties run in two different directions. There is the loyalty of the academic unit.

All members of Eggplant College, deans, professors, graduate students, undergraduates, cafeteria ladies, alumni, gardeners, librarians, will do their darnedest for dear old Eggplant. There is also the cross-university loyalty of the major groups within the university. A student from the Faculty of Shrub-Pruning can relate to a student from the Faculty of Bicycle Repair because they are both students. Similarly, a professor in the department of Scientology will share the basic assumptions of a professor in the department of Animal Magnetism. This makes for situations in which a student at Eggplant College may one day see an Eggplant professor as an enemy, the next day as an ally. It should be borne in mind that such allegiances will appear or disappear between different groups as different issues arise.

What follows is an attempt to give a rudimentary explanation of the university's governing structure. It is intended as a grossly simplified guide, and not as a definitive analysis. The best way to get an understanding of university government is by actually watching the committees in action (or inaction).

Administration

Ladies and gentlemen, the president!

Can a man who was once a vegetarian find happiness in the fast-moving world of a university president? This is the question that ex-vegetarian-turned-administrator watchers are asking themselves about personable John Evans, president since 1972.

Evans calls himself a pragmatist, and it's easy to see why. His approach to decision-making is extremely flexible; he is concerned not so much with the process of decision-making as its results. This approach may have its advantages, but its great disadvantages is that it places more decision-making power in the hands of administrators.

Under Evans' presidency, the Simcoe Hall bureaucracy has adapted well to these "modern management" practices. More and more policy matters—the university budget is an extremely important example—are being decided by presidential advisory committees which are not responsible to the governing council.

Evans is no hard-liner, though; he avoids direct confrontations when he can. When he cannot, as was the case with last spring's Banfield incident when faculty members were on the verge of demanding his resignation, he will support the faculty position. However, he left his last job as dean of the McMaster Medical Faculty with the admiration of students and others for his innovative approach.

In his highly visible position, Evans is aware of the importance of his image. He is credited with some personal charm, and his public remarks indicate his respect for the governing council of the university. But he seems often to use the council as a screen. On a contentious issue, he will refrain from taking a personal stand, and the responsibility for the decision will appear to rest with the governing council.

Although Evans is a member of the governing council, he rarely expresses his opinions during its meetings. But during the closed meetings of the executive committee, his shyness disappears. His low profile on specific issues masks a desire and ability to administer the university as efficiently as possible. The cost of efficiency, however, is a considerable transfer of actual decision-making power from the governing council to the administration.

Provost Forster has wide-ranging power

Don Forster, vice-president and provost is the most powerful member of the bureaucracy. As provost he is the administration's link with all the academic divisions and faculties within the university. As vice-president he is chairman of the influential budget committee, which makes dollars-and-cents decisions about the university's financial priorities. His authority is considerable over these two most important areas of university administration.

In the complex structure of academic administration, Forster is the liaison between the academic divisions and the governing council's academic affairs committee. All reports, briefs, bitches and recommendations from the divisions to academic affairs pass through Forster's office.

"On many of these, we simply act as a post office," Forster said. "But on many others, we will make recommendations supporting, amending, or rejecting them."

Forster is aware of the charge that administrators treat the committees of governing council as rubber stamps for their policies. He says it's "inevitable" that full-time administrators will be better-informed than part-time committee members and agrees that "in many cases" committee members do not have enough time or information to examine critically administrators' recommendations. He offers no solutions to this problem in terms of possible changes in the structure of university government. For the committees of governing council to exercise their formal control over policy-making, "enough members have to work their heads off and command enough information" to evaluate administration proposals. Forster delegates responsibility for specific areas of academic administration among the four vice-provosts: Milton Israel (arts and science, school of graduate studies); John Hamilton (health sciences); Robin Ross (setting up the new academic discipline tribunal); and Peter Meincke (academic services).

In his role as chairman of the budget committee, Forster says the budget squeeze will affect "every aspect of the university." There will be fewer new academic appointments, larger classes, and higher teaching loads for faculty. But he disagrees with the view that the university must resort to increasingly centralized administration to deal with its financial problems. "Centralization has its advantages, but on the academic side decentralization is essential," he said. "It is a great strength of the university that it is so complex and decentralized."

Forster teaches economics, and sees his loyalty as those of "a member of the teaching staff." This is indicative of the position he will take in student-faculty disputes. But he makes himself available to students, and has a reputation for giving them straight answers. As chairman of the task force on academic appointments procedures, however, he endorsed a policy recommending that students be denied representation on hiring, firing, promotion, and staffing committees.

"This is the place where proposals are formulated and finally, if not formally, approved," he said. "The academic affairs committee and the administration can establish a climate, but design and implementation of specific changes still takes place in the academic divisions."

Financial guru Alex Rankin

Alex Rankin, vice-president for business affairs, comes equipped with a slightly different perspective than most administrators. While the president, provost, and other bureaucratic bigwigs are also academics, Rankin comes from the lucrative world of free enterprise. Before assuming his present position in 1967, Rankin was vice-president of finances for B.C. Forest Products. Now he is concerned with the finances of this huge knowledge conglomerate. (Knowledge is reputed to be a less saleable commodity than pulp.)

He is responsible for administering the university's investments, real estate holdings, and capital development. While these decisions influence the university's long-term financial situation, and thus limit possibilities in terms of new appointments, acquisitions, and construction, their immediate effect on students is often difficult to determine.

Rankin has the reputation of being friendly to students, but years of top-level corporate security have made him unwilling to give sensitive information to "outsiders".

James hobnobs with alumni

Speculation is running rampant among administration-watchers and rumor-mongers that an Aussie coup is under way at Simcoe Hall. Norman James, the new vice-president for external affairs, follows the trail blazed by fellow-countryman Jill Conway through the corridors of power. James will be the administration's link with the external affairs committee. Such vital areas of university policy as preparations for the 150th anniversary celebrations will fall within his responsibilities.

James has a background in business, and has even worked for an IIT subsidiary. He says that IIT is really with it as far as modern management practices are concerned, and that there's no substitute for professionalism in running the university's affairs.

A bon mot going the rounds in radical-bohemian circles has it that the influx of Aussies into top administration posts just goes to show that the Caput really is a kangaroo court. Ha, ha.

Conway pushes discipline

Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway is best known to U of T students as architect of the proposed discipline code for non-academic offenses. She said the internal affairs committee, which has suspended its discipline debate until January, may wait to see what problems face the new academic discipline tribunal before making a decision. Asked whether she was aware of pressure for quick passage of a non-academic discipline code following last spring's Banfield incident, she replied, "I'm not aware of any yet."

Conway feels it is the purpose of the internal affairs branch of the administration "to improve in any way possible the environment in which the university's basic academic functions take place."

Apart from the matter of discipline, Conway said internal affairs will concentrate on "a whole lot of projects concerning the campus environment" this year.

Proposals on the campus centre, parking policy, reorganization of the governing structure for athletics, and the creation of an ombudsman will have a "real impact in improving the campus environment."

Conway leaves U of T this spring to become president of Smith College. The matter of her replacement is likely to be watched carefully by students and faculty.

Connell makes plans

George Connell, associate dean of medicine, has taken over the position of vice-president of planning and institutional relations from the inimitable Jack Sword, who is taking a one-year leave of absence. This is a powerful position. Connell will have to establish priorities for development on the basis of the university's financial situation. He will also administer and make recommendations concerning the policy of rationalization of resources. (Rationalization of resources means spending less money.) It has been suggested that some divisions will be faced with such substantial budget cuts as to endanger their existence. Decisions as to which divisions get the axe will probably be in Connell's hands.

When Her Majesty (by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Ontario) gave her assent to the University of Toronto Act (1971), she wasn't just kidding around. Even in the rarified atmosphere of her plush Westminister digs she kept in touch with new wrinkles in management methods; and she knew that centralized administration was the wave of the future. Ergo, the creation of the new, aerodynamic, streamlined governing council of the University of Toronto to replace the clumsy and dogeared Board of Governors and Senate of earlier years.

The governing council is responsible for the "government, management, and control of the University" according to the U of T Act, which gives it the sort of power kings used to claim when divine right was all the rage. The governing council is explicitly given power over the administrative arm of university government, power to appoint and remove from office, if necessary, the president of the university. In turn, the governing council and the president jointly can appoint or suspend other members of the administrative staff.

Most of the governing council's work is done through committees which are given responsibility for policy-making in different areas. These committees work in close cooperation with officers of the administration. The committees make recommendations on matters of policy, which are then forwarded to the governing council as a whole through a body called the executive committee. Unfortunately, the executive committee always meets in closed session, so that interested observers must imagine for themselves the scintillating details, the spark and thrust and parry of fiery debate. In its unfathomable wisdom, the executive committee sends the recommendations to the governing council with its own comments urging approval or rejection.

Membership of the governing council is laid down in the U of T Act, so that changes in its composition can only be made by the provincial Legislature. The question of the council's membership will be debated this fall. Depending on the conclusions reached during this debate, and the provincial Legislature's reaction, Her Majesty may yet again have to take time off from her rigorous schedule of foxhunting and eating buttered crumpets with visiting nabobs to reconsider the weighty problems of university government.

Businessmen represent the people of Ontario

The composition of the governing council as laid down in the U of T Act (1971) is as follows:

- 1 Chancellor (ex officio)
 - 1 President (ex officio).
 - 2 Presidential appointees.
 - 16 Provincial government appointees, none of whom can be students, members of the administrative staff, or members of the teaching staff.
 - 12 members elected by the teaching staff from among the teaching staff.
 - 8 students, four elected by and from among the full-time undergraduate students, two elected by and from among the graduate students, and two elected by and from among the part-time undergraduate students.
 - 2 members elected by the administrative staff from among the administrative staff.
 - 8 members who are not students or members of the teaching staff or the administrative staff elected by the alumni from among the alumni.
- Students, faculty, administrators, and alumni elect just over half the members of this body. But the largest single group consists of those members appointed — not elected — by the provincial government. Ralph Nader no doubt would be proud to hear that these provincially-appointed members are for the most part wealthy businessmen and directors of large corporations. They are the consumers of the product which the University provides — that is, educated people — to fill the research labs, boardrooms, steno pools and unemployment lines of the nation. Representatives from within the university might share a common opposition to the treatment of education as a commodity subject to the whims of the free market. Unfortunately, students and members of the teaching staff in particular seem to have no conception of any common interests; rather, faculty members are determined to protect their inalienable academic rights while students are determined to assert theirs.

The obvious question in connection with the composition of governing council is whether the membership as laid down in the U of T Act is in fact an equitable and accurate representation of the different groups with an interest in the present and future operation of the university. It seems more than coincidental that the sixteen members appointed by the provincial government are predominantly representatives of large business interests. This is not to say that the university should isolate itself from the larger society, but does the larger society consist only of businessmen? What about workers, or farmers, or artists?

Executives meet behind closed doors

The executive committee is a body which always meets in closed session. Although the U of T Act provides that "the meetings . . . of the governing council shall be open to the public," by-law of the governing council has made an exception for meetings of the executive committee.

The major task of the executive committee is to act as a funnel for business between the governing council and the other committees. New issues are considered here and assigned to appropriate committees for further discussion. Once the committees have made their recommendations, these are reviewed by the executive committee before being passed on to the governing council. It is suggested that the president and other high administration officials are more willing to express their views in the closed meetings of the executive committee than in the public meetings of the governing council. The executive committee then adds its own comments to the recommendations as passes them on to governing council. Generally, the governing council does not propose detailed changes in policy, but will either accept the recommendations, or send them back to the committee for further discussion.

The executive committee also determines the agenda for meetings of the governing council; acts as a nominating and striking committee for the other committees; and appoints chairmen and vice-chairmen for the committees. All this makes it clear that the executive committee is a body with an enormous influence on university government. The fact that such a body should meet in closed session as a matter of course does little to inspire confidence in the system of which it is a part.

The academic affairs committee has a lot to do with what goes on inside classrooms.

Parity, tenure policy made by academic affairs

If student participation in university government is intended to improve the quality of the education offered by the university, the academic affairs committee is the place where increased student representation would have the greatest effect.

The academic affairs committee has taken over many of the responsibilities of the old Senate. Many faculty members feel they should have a controlling voice in the committee's business, as they did on the Senate. The committee makes decisions about policy on hiring and firing academic staff.

Students have been trying to get equal faculty-student representation on hiring and firing committees. They feel that tenured professors devote their time to research to the detriment of their teaching, while untenured faculty members who are good teachers are unjustly denied tenure on grounds that they have not undertaken enough research. So far this attempt has not been successful.

Equal student-faculty representation on hiring and firing committees is bitterly opposed by most faculty members, who consider it an impertinent infringement on "academic freedom".

The committee delegates responsibility for dealing with specific areas of academic policy to its subcommittees. Individual subcommittees consider curricula, admission standards, appeal procedures, student awards, academic discipline, libraries, computers, research administration, and academic conventions.

However, the authority of the academic affairs committee as a university-wide decision-making body is not absolute. Individual faculties (for example Medicine, Arts & Science, Applied Science and Engineering, Graduate Studies, Nursing, etc.) do not wish to give up authority over their internal administration.

The real world

The most remarkable fact about the external affairs committee is that its chairman for this year is Betty Kennedy, a personal friend of Gordon Sinclair. She is said to be sympathetic to student parity, but external affairs is hardly the place to make significant waves.

The committee's job is to take care of relations between the university and that most terrifying phenomenon, the outside world. A common university attitude toward the events of the rest of the world is indicated by the recent remark of a senior faculty member, who, when informed that his research grant was being cut due to inflation, replied that Mr. Bennett's government should soon have the problem under control.

One of the more appealing turns of phrase in the bylaws of governing council committees establishes one of external affairs' tasks as "relations with the giving com-

Planning and resources

The planning and resources committee does not, contrary to popular belief, deal with oil exploration on U of T-owned land. Its terms of reference are so broad and vague, however, that it's difficult to determine just exactly what it does do. As set out in the bylaws of the governing council, the committee is to "review general objectives and priorities of the university, initiate and terminate academic programs, and deal with all other matters with major resource implications". (In the highly-specialized jargon of university government, "resources" can generally be taken as a polite way of saying "money.")

In fact, planning and resources is an extremely powerful committee, dealing as it does with the allocation of funds. This is a particularly significant problem now that enrolment is slowing down after the spectacular increases of the 1960's. Smaller faculties may lose their independent existence, and become divisions of larger faculties. The planning and resources committee does not deal with routine budgetary matters, but rather deals in terms of overall priorities. Its present policy of "rationalization" is an attempt to avoid duplication of facilities and services where possible. For example, it may be felt that there is no need to have different teachers of statistics in the departments of economics and sociology, and one teaching job is eliminated. Obviously such decisions have a direct bearing on the quality of education, since the economists' statistics teacher, while technically competent, may not be able to appreciate the uses to which a sociology student will put training in statistics.

Bureaucrats and democrats never seem to get along. Bureaucrats are condemned by democrats as authoritarian, valuing efficiency over the responsiveness of the institution to its members. The bureaucrat contends that democrats are unrealistic, that the average Joe is basically uninterested in the process of decision-making, and that only good old pragmatism keeps the wheels rolling.

Even though the university's governing council is something less than a perfect example of democracy in action, this opposition can be seen in its relations with the university's administrators, operating out of Simcoe Hall. All appointed and elected members of the governing council can only work part-time at these duties, and are not paid. Bureaucrats and administrators are paid and their positions are full-time ones. This leads to a situation in which full-time administrators have more time to study problems than do part-time governors. Since the administrators are better informed, the council members have no grounds on which to evaluate the recommendations which administrators offer. For the sake of efficiency, expertise, and good modern management, the administrators' recommendations are usually accepted. But what happens to representative decision-making?

The theoretical division of responsibility between the governing council and administrators is that between policy-making and its implementation. But as administrators increasingly decide policy matters, it is no longer possible to maintain even the illusion of representative decision-making within the university.

Governing council

Internal affairs

So the food's terrible in the Hart House cafeterias, and your group, the Social Proudhonists, can't get a room to hold a meeting, and the campus cops keep arresting you for jaywalking, who's behind it all? I mean, I'm no more paranoid than the next guy, but this begins to look like a conspiracy, know what I mean?

Well, as is only right in an institution based on reason and logic, there's a connecting thread. It's the internal affairs committee, responsible for almost all aspects of a student's day-to-day life at the university, except teaching.

The most contentious issue currently before the internal affairs committee is the non-academic discipline code which, if passed, would apply to cases such as last spring's Banfield incident. (An American urbanologist was prevented from speaking to an audience by a group claiming his theories were racist.) The publicity attracted by this event means administrators and faculty members will apply pressure to have a stiff non-academic discipline code passed quickly.

Internal affairs is also concerned with athletics within the university. A new athletic building is being planned in light of antiquated facilities at Hart House, and a reorganization of the university athletic program is under consideration.

Residences, the book store, housing, health, parking, day care, allocation of rooms for meetings and theatres for performances, relations with campus groups, the faculty club, the International Student Centre, security, Hart House — all these fall within the committee's scope. Rumours that the internal affairs committee decides what weather is to prevail on the downtown campus are entirely without foundation.

The budget committee is a special presidential advisory body, and thus is not formally a part of the governing council. Its meetings and recommendations, which are wholly confidential, set salary levels for faculty members and administrators and approve the budgets of the academic departments, divisions, and faculties.

It's obvious that faculty members and administrators have a direct interest in the size of their salaries. It's also obvious that the budget committee is faced with the unenviable task of trying to find a way out of the money squeeze which is afflicting universities in a time of

Who cares?

Boredom buffs should be able to find in the meetings of governing council and its committees enough ennuui-producing debate to satisfy even the most sluggish. As the afternoon wears on, and discussion in the Roberts Library Water Fountain Policy sub-subcommittee stumbles into its third hour, the neophyte must ask himself:

"Hey, I mean what's going on here? I thought this was supposed to be the repository of raw, naked power. Where's the backstabbing? Where are the attempted coups d'etat?"

The truth is that, except for the occasional meeting disrupted by groups who can't get their point across any other way, committee meetings are orderly, quiet, and seemingly trivial affairs. This is particularly so if committee meetings are approached as if they existed in a vacuum, and for themselves, an orderly world of proposals, votes, and recommendations bounded only by the outer blank spaces on a flow chart.

However, the proceedings of committees begin to appear slightly more interesting if it is borne in mind that somewhere, all their recommendations are meant to be put into effect. A real relation does exist between the work of these committees and the actual conditions within the university.

If a popular teacher is denied tenure, this decision can be appealed and perhaps changed through the academic affairs committee. The appearance of a new bench to daydream on between classes can be traced-back to the decision of one of these committees.

This is not to say that the form of organization now in use for university government is the best, or cannot be improved.

Business affairs

The business affairs committee shows that not only do wild-eyed student radicals have a say, however minimal, in the running of the university; but there's also a part to be played by our neglected corporations whose point of view is so often cruelly ignored by those in power. Trust a benevolent institution like U of T to give this disadvantaged group a chance to contribute to university government decreasing, or static enrolment and inflation.

The income of the university comes mainly from two sources — tuition paid by students, which in itself is not sufficient to finance the university's operation; and grants awarded by the provincial Legislature on a per-student basis. The amount of the provincial grant is calculated in terms of Basic Income Units (BIUs), and it's a matter of simple mathematics to realize that if enrolment stays static, and tuition fees do not increase beyond their present astronomical rates, extra income can only come from an increase in the BIUs. This is just what happened last year, but the increase in the BIUs lags significantly behind the increases in salaries and operating costs. Last year, in what must have seemed almost miraculous good fortune, the provincial Legislature increased the BIU by 7 percent. Unfortunately, this increase fails to match last year's average salary increase of something over 9 percent.

The resulting squeeze between income and spending means that budgets must be cut, and cut substantially. The squeeze if felt most severely by the smaller divisions and faculties. Last year, for example, the budget of the Faculty of Education was cut by more than $50,000. There is pressure on smaller divisions to be absorbed into larger divisions or faculties, and there is no doubt that this pressure will continue.

The question is, where is the money to come from to ensure that the academic quality of the university will not suffer? With the average salary of a full professor at $22,000, and with at least 260 faculty members making over $30,000, one wonders how much they need yearly salary increases to keep up with inflation. On the other hand, lecturers, whose salaries begin at $9,000 may find it difficult to get along. One thing is certain, and that is that students, already paying more than $700 annual tuition, cannot afford any further tuition increases.

In a very immediate sense, the budget committee is the most important committee in the university. Other committees may set priorities and propose innovative programs, but all such proposals are meaningless unless the budget committee actually decides to hand out the cash. The fact that such important decisions are made by an administrative committee, rather than by one of the ostensibly representative committees of the governing council demonstrates the extent to which actual control over the running of the university rests in the hands of the administration.

G. JAFFE

Faculty

Tenure and the guild mentality

Many students find they do their most creative daydreaming during lectures. Large lectures in windowless auditoriums are particularly conducive to this popular activity, especially when the lecturer pitches his voice in a dynamic monotone which complements the hum of the air-conditioning. It's at times like this, with half the class asleep or catatonic, and the lecturer delivering the same remarks as he has for the past sixteen years, that certain illusions about the nobility of the academic life begin to fade away.

All this makes the student wonder: what's in it for the faculty? Not only do they have to spend at least seven years working toward a PhD, then they have to spend their time dealing with spot-nosed undergraduates who wouldn't appreciate academic rigor if they ate it for breakfast!

It's a long and trying march through the ranks to full professorship and tenure, but by all accounts the trip is worth it, leading to a wide range of inalienable privileges gathered together under the name of "academic freedom". After their long apprenticeship, faculty members are determined that no one be allowed to interfere with these privileges.

A tenured faculty member has virtually unlimited choice in discharging his academic duties. In consultation with his department chairman or faculty dean, he can choose what courses he will teach, details of the course's content, and teaching and evaluation methods. Further, he can choose the research projects he wishes to undertake. These research projects take much of his time, since the criteria for tenure take more careful account of original research published in scholarly journals than of teaching ability.

The question of teaching and research is an important one since it provides an insight into the tenured faculty member's priorities. Research is directed toward his colleagues in his specialized field, and through it he aims for their respect and admiration. Similarly, tenure committees are composed entirely of faculty members from the candidate's area of specialization. Faculty members thus accept a system of judgment and evaluation by their peers (that is, other faculty members), but reject evaluation

Tension between students and faculty has centred on the question of student parity. In a referendum last fall, students voted for student-nonstudent parity on hiring, firing, promotion, and tenure committees.

For many faculty members, opposition to parity is a matter of principle: it is unthinkable that students judge the academic credentials of their teachers. But there is a difference between research and teaching, as students have long maintained. And while students may not be competent to judge the scholarship of professors, they are capable of judging their teaching ability and responsiveness to the needs of students. The question of parity stems from these two opposing views of faculty members' role. At present, students have no effective way of ensuring that their point of view is taken into account. Parity is certain to continue as a major area of contention between students and faculty until students are satisfied that their needs are being taken into account in staffing, and tenure decisions.

Dance of the divisions

How many angels can dance on the head of a pin? This question, once a favorite of medieval sophists, has now sadly fallen out of use. Fortunately for would-be scholars, a question involving at least as many mental gymnastics and with greater present-day relevance to boot is begging to be answered: namely, how many different academic divisions, schools, faculties and colleges are affiliated with the University of Toronto? The following list indicates the incredible diversity of academic undertakings at U of T.

- Institute for Aerospace Studies
- Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering
- Faculty of Architecture
- Faculty of Arts & Science
- Faculty of Management Studies
- Faculty of Medicine
- Faculty of Education
- Centre of Criminology
- Centre for Culture and Technology

- Victoria University
- St. Michael's College

This large number of relatively autonomous academic divisions makes for considerable administrative complexity. In times of financial stringency, different divisions may compete for funds.

U of T Faculty Association

The U of T Faculty Association (UFTA) represents about 70 per cent of the university's teachers, and acts as a spokesman for them on matters of salaries and university policies.

The association was originally formed to represent faculty members in negotiations with the university administration for salaries and other benefits but has expanded to represent the faculty in university government.

The UFTA's position on the review of the U of T Act is that the Act should be left alone.

"I wouldn't say we're satisfied," said association president Bill Nelson, a professor in the History department, "but we don't want to see the composition of the governing council changed. Any change would be more trouble than it's worth."

On the question of student parity, Nelson responded forthrightly. "We're against. Always have been, always will be."

Students organize course unions

Students have always been interested in changing the university for one of two reasons.

The first is that the university is undemocratic — an elitist institution in an undemocratic capitalist society. The second is that it is a poor quality "shop"—courses are poorly taught, professors are inaccessible and indifferent to students' problems, and evaluation procedures are unfair.

Both problems are legitimate, but it's easier to get students interested in the second. The biggest hurdle lies in convincing students that they have a stake in the institution, and a fight to agitate for change. Successful organization around small issues proves that change is possible and gives students confidence to approach larger issues.

Changes in teaching methods, course content, and marking are best brought about at the faculty and departmental levels, rather than through the university-wide governing bodies.

In the Faculty of Arts and Science, course unions represent student interests in nine out of 26 departments. The course unions also provide evaluations of specific courses, a healthy antidote to the often-idealized descriptions in the calendar.

Task force to review university investment policy

Cites Exxon activities in Portuguese colony

By LAWRENCE CLARKE
 In an unprecedented move last summer, the business affairs committee of the Governing Council recommended the council censure Exxon, the multinational oil company, for its activities in Portuguese Guinea.
 The censure would have involved a change in the council's previous policy concerning proxy voting at shareholder meetings.
 Unfortunately, the first Governing

Council meeting that could have changed the proxy voting policy met one week after the annual Exxon shareholders' meeting.
 The timing allowed Exxon to escape unscathed—at least this year. But the Governing Council did decide to re-evaluate its investment policy in the area of signing proxies.
ORIGINAL IMPETUS
 The original impetus to censure Exxon came from political professor R. C. Pratt who said Exxon had received the support of the Portuguese government rather than the native peoples who were fighting for independence in the Republic of Guinea-Bissau (Portuguese Guinea).

 Pratt said Exxon's present economic activity and research may remove all depletable resources from the country before the native people gain independence.
 He suggested the university express its opinion because of universal agreement to condemn Exxon's actions. The churches, he noted, had suggested a strong ethical stand.
INVESTMENT POLICY
 Should business affairs committee members agree to the resolution, Pratt said an American priest who was holding the proxies could read it at the annual shareholders meeting of Exxon on May 16.

 After some discussion, a member noted a change would have to be made in the council's investment policy which did not allow proxy voting with university-owned shares.
 The next governing council meeting at which the change could be discussed was not scheduled until May 23, a full week after the Exxon shareholders' meeting.
ACADEMIC RESOLUTION
 Knowing by then the resolution was academic, business affairs voted 5-4 that at the shareholders' meeting the university oppose any further Exxon economic activity in Portuguese Guinea under the concessions obtained from the Portuguese government.

 Business affairs also recommended Governing Council re-evaluate its investment policy in the area of signing proxies.
 On May 23 Governing Council approved the motion to re-evaluate the investment policy. Because the Exxon shareholders meeting was over, council didn't vote on the proxies question.
 The business affairs committee at its June 5 meeting then agreed to establish a task force to study proxy voting.

DISAPPROVAL OF MOTION
 However, at least one task force member, lawyer John Tory, is reluctant to ram through a motion radically altering present university policy involving multinationals like Exxon.
 In a letter to James H. Joyce, acting chairman of the May 1 business affairs meeting, Tory—who had been absent from the meeting—expressed his disapproval and surprise at the proceedings.
 "I do not pretend to understand the present situation in Guinea-Bissau," he wrote. "However... it is my view that the university, as a body supported by public funds, should not take stands on political, social or moral issues which do not affect the university."
 He further questioned whether Governing Council "... has before it sufficient information on both sides of the issue to enable it to arrive at a reasoned intelligent judgment."
 "The university is a very complex organization and it is difficult enough for the council to make intelligent decisions on university affairs much less on unrelated issues of a political, social or moral nature."

Revision of the University of Toronto Act, 1971

Background

The top governing structure of the University of Toronto has been under study and review since the establishment of the Commission on University Government (CUG) in October 1968.

The CUG Report (Toward Community in University Government) was published in late 1969. That Report included a proposal that the governing body of the university consist of ten members appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council (five to be appointed after consultation with the Governing Council); ten members elected by the alumni; twenty members from the university teaching staff; twenty from the students of the university; and six ex-officio members, including the President of the University of Toronto and the Head of one of the three Federated Universities, (66 members in all).

Copies of the Report are available in the Office of the Governing Council.

This Report was discussed extensively throughout the university from the late Fall of 1969 until early June 1970. These discussions concluded with a three day meeting of the "University-Wide Committee". The Report of that Committee was published on June 4, 1970 and transmitted shortly thereafter to the Provincial Government. This report proposed a governing body consisting of "the President, three presidential appointees, three administrators, twenty one members of the teaching staff, fourteen students, six support staff, fourteen lay members, and ten alumni" (72 members in all).

Copies of the University Wide Committee Report are available in the office of the Governing Council.

The University of Toronto Act, 1971 was subsequently approved by the Provincial Legislature and came into effect on July 1, 1972. The provisions of this Act will be known to you, but copies are available for reference in this office. The present composition of the Governing Council is outlined in detail in the material below. Section 2(19) of this Act requires that the Governing Council review the Act and report its review to the Government of Ontario within two years after the coming into force of the Act.

Present Review of the University of Toronto Act, 1971

Early in the academic year 1973-74, the Executive Committee of the Governing Council established a Sub-Committee of 15 to review the Act. This Sub-Committee proposed a number of amendments which dealt with such matters as clarification of language, definitions, delegation of the Governing Council's authority, etc. The Sub-Committee also made proposals dealing with the composition and size of the Council and the Executive Committee. The full text of the Sub-Committee's report to the Council is available in the Office of the Governing Council. The appendix to this memorandum contains these excerpts from the Sub-Committee Report which deal with Sections 2(2) and 3(1) of the Act, i.e. with the composition and size of the Council and of the Executive Committee together with copies of two statements of dissent from members of the Sub-Committee.

This report was considered by the Executive Committee on May 14 and June 5, 1974. There was agreement to most of the proposals of the Sub-Committee. On the question of size and composition, the Executive Committee resolved to recommend to the Council "that at this time, the Governing Council not approve any change in the size and composition of the Governing Council or of the Executive; rather that it approve the undertaking of a thorough review of these matters, commencing in the Fall of 1974".

At their meeting on June 20, 1974 the Governing Council approved a large number of the Sub-Committee's proposals for the revision of the Act. After considerable discussion, the Council accepted the recommendation of its Executive Committee to defer the question of changes in the composition and size of the Council and the Executive Committee, and passed the following resolution:

"That at this time, the Governing Council defer consideration of the size and composition of the Governing Council and of the Executive Committee, and that it undertake a thorough review of these matters commencing in the Fall of 1974, to be reported to the Governing Council for decision not later than its December meeting".

Copies of the reports of the Executive Committee dated May 14th and June 5th, and a copy of the minutes of the Governing Council of June 20th are available in this office for perusal.

On July 10, the Executive Committee considered possible procedures for the discussion by the Council of the size and composition of the Council and the Executive Committee. The Committee agreed unanimously that it was in the best interest of the university that these questions be resolved as speedily as possible. It was also agreed that such a resolution be sought at a special meeting of the Council, to be held on October 17, and at the regular meeting of the Council scheduled for October 24.

Submission of Briefs to Executive Committee

To assist the Council's discussion, the Committee now invites written briefs on the size and composition of the Executive Committee from College and Faculty Councils, university associations, and from individual members of the university community. In the preparation of briefs it is suggested that consideration be given to such matters as parity of numbers between the "internal" (teaching staff, students, administrative staff) and "external" members (government and alumni) of the Council, parity between student and teaching staff members; the adequacy of representation of senior academic and non-academic administrative staff; specified representation on the council of Scarborough and Erindale Colleges; and adequacy of representation of smaller constituencies to cope with the heavy workload that falls upon members of the Governing Council. The Committee will of course be glad to receive views on any other aspects of the two questions in issue.

The Committee also suggests that in view of the previous extensive discussion and documentation on these two matters, and the difficulty and expense of circulating extensive written material to Council members, it is desirable that briefs be kept as short as possible. Briefs longer than two or three typewritten pages should be accompanied by a one page summary.

A special meeting of the Executive Committee will be held on October 8 to decide how to present to the Council the material contained in briefs and the issues that require the Council's determination. The decision of the Committee will be announced to the university community on October 10.

The Committee asks that briefs be submitted to the Office of the Governing Council by at latest October 1, and preferably as much before that date as possible. It is realized with regret that this time-table may present difficulties, but in view of the importance to the university of finding an early and satisfactory resolution of the two questions in issue, it is earnestly hoped that everything possible will be done to submit briefs by that date.

David S. Claringbold, Secretary,
Office of the Governing Council.

Excerpt from the Preamble of the Report of the Subcommittee to Review the University of Toronto Act, 1971

The Sub-Committee spent two meetings discussing the composition of the Governing Council and, by considering a number of possible models, adopted the one shown under Section 2(2) by resolution duly passed. The resultant Council is larger than the present one and reflects three considerations adopted by the Committee: equality in number of members from the teaching staff and from the students, an increase in the number of members from the administrative staff, and half the number of elected and appointed members coming to the Council from the appointees of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and the elected members of the alumni, taken together. The Sub-Committee also, recommends an enlargement of the Executive Committee.

Section 2 - Governing Council

staff (d) and students (e). The resultant model reflected in the changes indicated, was the result of a motion duly passed. It gives a Council of 62 members (including two ex-officio members) with the Lt.-Governor appointees and alumni members totalling 30.

Section 3 - Executive Committee

- (i) The Governing Council shall establish an Executive Committee of the Governing Council composed of,
 - (b) twelve members appointed annually by the Governing Council from among its members as follows:
 1. One nominated by and from among the members appointed by the President and the members elected by the administrative staff.
 2. Four nominated by and from among the members appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council.
 3. Three nominated by and from among the members elected by the members of the teaching staff.
 4. One nominated by and from among the members elected by the full-time undergraduate students.
 5. One nominated by and from among the members elected by the graduate and part-time undergraduate students.
 6. Two nominated by and from among the members elected by the alumni.

- (b) sixteen members appointed annually by the Governing Council from among its members as follows:
 1. One nominated by and from among the members appointed by the President;
 - 1a) One nominated by and from among the members elected by the administrative staff.
 2. Five nominated by and from among the members appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, of whom one shall be the Vice-Chairman of the Governing Council.
 3. No change.
 4. No change.
 5. One nominated by and from among the members elected by the graduate students,
 - 5a) One nominated by and from among the members elected by the part-time undergraduate students.
 6. Three nominated by and from among the members elected by the alumni.

Several changes are proposed as follows:

- i) To reflect in the Act the By-Law provision that one of the Lt.-Governor appointees be the Vice-Chairman.
- ii) To separate the double-constituency in clauses 1 and 5 by giving to each of these constituencies one member each.
- iii) To add one further member from each of the Lt-Governor appointees and alumni categories in order to restore the 50% "external" membership characteristic of this Committee.

Letter from John Tory

Dear Sirs:

I am writing to express my dissent regarding that portion of the Report of the Sub-Committee to Review The University of Toronto Act, 1971 relating to the size and composition of the Governing Council and the consequential changes in the size and composition of the Executive Committee. I am aware that a number of members of the Sub-Committee intend to submit a dissenting report stating, in effect, that in their opinion the Council has not been in operation for a sufficient period of time to permit an intelligent evaluation of its structure to be made.

Although I have been unable to attend most of the meetings of the Sub-Committee, I did have the opportunity of attending one of the two meetings at which the above mentioned issues were discussed. In addition, I have had a number of private discussions of these issues with student and faculty representatives.

While it may well be true that the experience with the present Council has been too limited to warrant any change in its size or composition at this time, I am not sure that the fundamental issues will become any clearer than they are now.

As one of the members of the Board of Governors who continued as a Government appointee on the new Governing Council, I have been most gratified at the way in which the Council and its committees have functioned. I believe that the new structure has proved to be a most worthwhile experiment in university government and I think its performance to this point certainly justifies its continuance.

However, the one thing that has impressed me above all else is the significant contribution made to the Council and its committees by the members elected by the teaching staff. I do not wish to minimize the contributions made by the students, alumni and administrative staff or by the Presidential or Government appointees but in my judgment the contribution made by the teaching staff far outweighs that of any other group.

This is not surprising, for the teaching staff members have in most cases made a life-time commitment to teaching and to the University of Toronto and they are therefore the group most concerned with the efficient operation of the University. They are also by and large the only members, apart from the President and his appointees and the administrative staff members, who have the necessary background and intimate knowledge of the University's affairs to provide the information upon which intelligent decisions can be based. The student members of the Council are at a particular disadvantage in this regard because they are elected for only a one year term.

In my view, parity between students and teaching staff is not an issue of any fundamental importance. Rather, it would appear to be more of a political issue. It would actually be of no great concern to me if parity were to be granted to the students provided this did not result in any diminution in the contribution made to the Council and its committees by the teaching staff members.

I have spoken to students who believe that if parity were achieved, the Council would be legitimized from a student standpoint and that student interest, which has clearly been declining, would be revived. While this may be true to some extent, I cannot accept that parity would result in any material difference in the input provided by the student members of the Council or in the acceptance of Council decisions by the students generally. It seems to me that even if parity were granted many students and student organizations would continue to regard as illegitimate all important decisions made by the Council with which they disagree. In addition, based

A dissenting opinion concerning the recommendations to change Sections 2(2) and 3 (1).

It is our opinion that the Governing Council has not been in operation for a sufficient period of time to allow for a satisfactory evaluation of its structure and composition. Therefore, we cannot support any proposals in the report of the Act Review Committee which recommend changes in the present composition and size of the Governing Council and its Executive Committee. In particular, we wish to record our dissent from the recommendations to change Sections 2(2) and 3(1) of the University of Toronto Act at this time.

The following members of the committee subscribe to this view:

- Mr. Edward Dunlop
- Prof. William Dunphy
- Prof. Charles Hanly
- Pres. John M. Kelly
- Mr. C. Mackenzie King
- Mrs. Gwen Russell
- Prof. Harold Smith

on recent experience I am satisfied that with or without parity student views on important issues facing the Council which affect students will always be made clearly known to the Council in one way or another.

I do not wish to understate the significance of the student contribution to the Council. In fact, I feel that student representation is essential for its proper functioning. However, as indicated above, I am unable to accept the principle of parity because I feel that it could have the effect of diminishing the contribution of the members of the teaching staff, both present and future, to the Council. In the same way as some students regard a Council without parity as illegitimate I suspect that many members of the teaching staff would see it in the same light with parity. While I am not certain why this should be so, I am very sure of the importance of the contribution by the teaching staff and I am therefore not prepared to support the principle of student-faculty parity until such time as the teaching staff itself is prepared to accept this principle. In fact, I am not sure that the general public which supports the University with its tax dollars would be prepared to accept this principle.

It seems clear that parity cannot be achieved without either a reduction in teaching staff representation (which is unacceptable to me for the reasons stated above) or a substantial increase in the total size of the Council. I am somewhat concerned that any increase in the size of the Council would make it less efficient although it would certainly permit the workload to be spread over a larger number of people. There is also the concern that having achieved parity on the Council, students and student organizations would use this as a precedent for parity on other University decision-making bodies where parity may be totally inappropriate. Alternatively, any bodies where parity is not achieved would be branded by the students as illegitimate with resulting disrespect for decisions made by such bodies.

In summary, having given this matter considerable thought I have reached the conclusion that the students are not on a parity with the teaching staff either in their commitment to the University or in their ability to contribute to the efficient functioning of the Council. I am therefore opposed to the principle of student-faculty parity on the Council unless this principle is accepted by the teaching staff. It would seem clear from the deliberations of the Sub-Committee that no such acceptance is likely at least at the present time.

Doctor named U of T chancellor

A chintz curtain has descended on the University of Toronto.

Dr. Eva Macdonald has been appointed to succeed Pauline McGibbon as U of T chancellor following McGibbon's appointment as Lieutenant Governor.

Macdonald is returning to the university after a six year absence, having been a staff bacteriologist at Womens' College Hospital for 39 years.

The new chancellor, elected by the university alumni to the largely ceremonial post as a U of T booster, unabashedly confided in a Varsity interview, "the University of Toronto is tops."

She called today's student "very selfish, dull and unhappy, wanting to take and forgetting to give." Presumably this generalization would provide substance for her standard public speaking topic, "the joy of living."

Macdonald is being rescued from a wealthy Rosedale home, quaintly described in a U of T press release as having a "well-tended old English garden" and a "warm mixture of well-upholstered chairs, period furniture and chintz curtains."

She wasn't too familiar with university issues but "definitely" endorses student representation. "I like to listen to young people," she said.

By her own admission, "never an aggressive women's libber," she has nonetheless written a recently-published book called The Indomitable Lady Doctors, the story of Canada's first women physicians.

However she has been involved in such feminist organizations as the YWCA, the Home and School Association, the Children's Aid Society and the University Women's Club.

Although the chancellor is an apparently important position with a seat on the governing council, it has lately become a much more ceremonial post. Macdonald would appear to be an ideal choice to fill the shoes left vacant by McGibbon.

OFS wants reps on new council

By GEORGE HUCZEK

The Ontario Federation of Students has requested student representation on the new Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA).

The council will advise the provincial government on policy concerning Ontario's university system.

Minister of Colleges and Universities James Auld may appoint students to the OCUA but has not committed himself.

OFS has nominated students anyway, choosing people with long experience in student affairs and university government.

They are former OFS researcher Paul Axelrod, now a graduate student at York University; U of T women's studies instructor Ceta Ramkalawansingh, a former student council member here and member of the old Ontario Committee on Student Awards; University of Western Ontario student council president Mike Jangjan; and University of Guelph student activist Peter O'Malley.

The OCUA replaces the old Committee on University Affairs (CUA), and was created in response to recommendations from the Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario (COPSEO).

The COPSEO report suggested the council be fairly autonomous from the government, but Queen's Park wants the new body to be close to the ministry of colleges and universities.

Final legislation establishing the OCUA is expected to pass the Ontario legislature within weeks.

The OCUA will serve as an advisory body responsible to the minister and the cabinet. It will recommend policy on such matters as eligibility of programs for funding, total funding requirements for universities and the allocation of funds. It will also hold public meetings and make annual reports to the legislature.

Former U of T political economy chairman Stephan Dupre has been appointed full-time OCUA chairman. Dupre stresses the advisory nature of the new council. The administrative responsibility will remain with the ministry.

Campus radical becomes top dog

In a move which stunned even the most astute political observers, U of T vice-president and well-known Marxist Jill Conway was named president of Smith College this summer.

Smith College is the largest privately endowed women's college in the United States; Conway is the first woman president of the college.

Conway's once little known political sympathies were revealed to The Varsity last spring, when she told the paper of her differences with an unpopular visitor to the campus, Edward Banfield.

"I prefer a Marxist analysis," she admitted at the time.

Incredibly, Conway emerged unscathed from this exposure of her true loyalties.

Conway's devotion to the sacred goal of revolution, together with her unabashed attempts to reach the top run of the ladder of legitimate power, mark her as a follower of the all-but-forgotten student leader of the 1960s, 'Red' Rudi Dutschke.

Dutschke advocated a "long march through the institutions" for student radicals to gain power and turn it to their own ends.

So cleverly has Conway followed this maxim that even hard-core U of T student radicals were duped into thinking Conway's loyalties really lay with the administration.

Conway was the architect of the 1973 'code of behavior' which wanted to punish students for both academic and non-academic offences, the latter in effect subjecting students to possible trial in two courts.

The non-academic sections of the code will be dealt with by the governing council in January, while the academic sections have already been passed.

However, Conway's strategy of playing 'administrator' has paid off, as she finds herself raised from the mire of the Canadian consciousness and slapped straight into the mainstream of modern civilization,

Imagine the surprise on the faces of wealthy corporate donors at Smith College tea parties as she explains to them the inevitable decline of monopoly capitalism!

Conway's appointment takes effect in July, 1975. U of T president John Evans has not indicated when he will name a replacement.

In an interview, Conway said she hoped to turn the college into a centre for innovation in continuing education and women's studies.

Conway, 39, was born on a sheep farm in Australia. After several years teaching American history at U of T, she was named vice-president for internal affairs in the new administration of John Evans.

Cynical observers at the time remarked that Evans had been looking for a woman vice-president, and Conway seemed to be the only one available.

Orientation saw many learning to redress their grievances.

Song, snake dances and filth marked the "true college spirit" for U of T newcomers at initiation ceremonies which continue after the start of classes.

The Trinity College orientation program focused on social events with the same formula used in past years. A week's program of dances, scavenger hunts and tours ended with a weekend at Camp Couchiching on Lake Simcoe.

But, as orientation co-ordinator Jim Stacey pointed out, Trinity is steeped in traditions and new students can expect the college's customary initiation rites. Initiation is scheduled sometime after classes begin.

The highlight of initiation is the cake fight. First year students, carrying pieces of cake, must push through ranks of 2nd year students to the quad, where 3rd year students dump pails of 'slop' on their virgin heads.

Slop is a mixture of table scraps cut with horse manure. In previous years, only food scraps were used to baptize new Trinitians, but a college administrator felt this a misuse of food with the prevailing world-wide food shortage.

Training for Trinity life is given during the steeplechase, which involves chugging beer at checkpoints in a race around campus.

There are no rituals or hazing at University College. Campus tours, free lunch and a banquet marked its quiet opening.

Nostalgia reigned at Victoria College. "Vic traditions are important," said Meg Goodwin, a program co-ordinator. The Lamp and Owl Ceremony for women and Torch Ceremony for men brought new Vic students into the sacred ranks.

Apparently a sense of solidarity and college spirit is passed with the candle to the first year students. The Vic orientation also included campus tours, and a discussion session with faculty.

During the week of Sept. 23, Woodsworth College will invite new students to a drop-in session. Students will be able to meet representatives from all academic disciplines.

New College orientation planners encountered some problems. Social director Phil Skrobacky said the student council didn't give him enough support and he had to call on his friends to organize the programs.

The New College program included a coed night at the Benson Building, a trip to the Metro Zoo, a concert and a dance.

Orientation programs vary Little Miss Muffit waits patiently for the installation of the new, improved bells to complete the Hart House set. For $30,000 she'll get 28 new bells, a new keyboard and lots of music.

Hart House Tower gets new 51-bell carillon

By MALCOLM DAVIDSON

The majestic Gothic lines of the Soldiers' Tower will resound with the peals of a 51-bell carillon, a full professional set by North American standards, after 28 bells are installed sometime next year.

According to the dean of the Faculty of Music, John Beckwith, the contract for casting and installing the new bells will probably be awarded to Gillett and Johnston Ltd. of Croydon, England. Preliminary estimate, including slight adjustments to existing bells, a new keyboard and practice keyboard, is $30,000.

The Soldiers' Tower Carillon Fund, organized a year ago, is $7,000 shy of that goal. Major contributions have been made by the University of Toronto Alumni Association, the graduate funds of Victoria and St. Michael's Colleges, and a New York based alumni group, the Associates of U of T, Inc.

The alumni association has borne most of the responsibility for maintenance of the tower ever since its construction in 1921-24. Money was donated by graduates wishing to honor their more than 600 peers who did not return from World War One.

One of nine in Canada, the carillon presently consists of 32 bells, 23 of which were cast and installed by Gillett and Johnston in 1927; nine of which were cast at a date sometime later by a Dutch founder.

The Dutch bells, which for some reason were never properly tuned to the original 23, are to be replaced in the new installation. The other 19 newly-cast bells will complete the set of 51, which will range over slightly more than four octaves.

The 32 new bells will bring some new prospects, including regular recitals by guest artists or, perhaps, a full-time carillonneur. Dean Beckwith expects a few music students will consider some informal training on the instrument.

Composition and transcription of music for carillon is also a possibility, especially because playing requires extensive improvisation. The traditional carillon repertoire, which is relatively small, was written in the Netherlands in the 17th and 18th centuries.

Assignment of Carrels and Book Lockers

Application for carrels and book lockers for the Winter Session will be received from September 3rd to September 15th. Application forms are available at the Circulation Desk, 4th floor, Robarts Library. As in the past, assignments will be made on the basis of priorities decided in consultation with the School of Graduate Studies. (1. Full-time doctoral students in final year of residency or beyond; faculty members on leave. 2. Other full-time doctoral students; faculty members requiring library space for special research. 3. Full-time master's students 4. Part-time doctoral students. 5. Part-time master's students). Within these priorities the graduate departments will be asked to rank each applicant.

It is expected that assignment of the carrels and book lockers will be made in early October. Full-time doctoral students and faculty members are asked to come to the carrel office during the weeks of October 7th - 11th, October 14th - 18th for assignment; all other applicants during the weeks of October 21st - 25th, October 28th - November 1st.

DEPARTMENT OF ATHLETICS & RECREATION HART HOUSE

FALL TERM 1974 INSTRUCTIONAL TIME TABLE SEPTEMBER 30 - NOVEMBER 29

Registration: ROOM 107, HART HOUSE SEPT. 23 - 27, 11.00 - 3.00 pm Daily.

Starting Date: MONDAY, SEPT. 30, 1974

Both Men and Women members of Hart House are eligible to participate in the programme.

By DAVE STUART

The Department of Athletics and Recreation offers extensive and comprehensive sporting activities for students looking for a break from academic boredom.

For the amphibians the swimming pool offers instructional classes as well as free time for recreational swimming. Lessons are available at all levels from learn to swim to master swimmer.

Accomplished swimmers may want to try their hand at skin or scuba diving. Tanks and regulators are supplied for the scuba class.

Life saving classes are also available and are run by competent instructors. You may earn your Bronze Medallion or Award of Merit which is handy to have when looking for a summer job.

For land-lubbers, the gymnasium is the place to be. The first stop for everyone should be the fitness testing area (by appointment only) where you are told by what percentage your beer drinking must be curtailed.

At most times during the day jogging, weight-training, and circuit training are available on a first come first-served basis.

Instructional classes in karate, judo, golf, and pre-ski conditioning have also been formed.

Registration is in room 107 at Hart House during the week of Sept. 23 between the hours of 11 am to 3 pm.

Thick-skinned people Needed for refs

Be the first on your block to sign up as an Interfac football official. Good headlinesmen (persons) are required now to ensure the success of the Interfac league.

Look at all the advantages. You get to wear baggy pants and carry a red hanky. And don't forget the high pay.

Interfac football is played on the back campus behind Hart House at 3 in the afternoon Monday to Friday. In addition, interfac officials handle several high school leagues in and around Toronto. You can have all the work you can handle.

To sign up or for further information contact Paul Carson (284-3135) or Dave Stuart (261-7873).

Sports reporters needed Volunteer now!

Sports coverage in the Varsity has improved considerably over the past year or so largely through the efforts of a dedicated sports editor and a small number of volunteer reporters. This year it is hoped that sports coverage can be improved even more.

Naturally, not all sports have received a fair share of attention in The Varsity because there are just not enough reporters to go around.

We now (immediately) need people to cover most interfac sports — lacrosse, soccer, rugby, football, hockey, and basketball.

Women reporters are needed for basketball, volleyball, and field hockey.

Both male and female reporters are required for coverage of intercollegiate activities such as volleyball, gymnastics, wrestling, squash, fencing, and waterpolo.

Varsity sports coverage depends on its readers for contributions. If you like your sport enough to participate, surely you want others to learn of it through your reporting.

The Varsity sports dept. is located on the second floor, 91 St. George St. Drop in any time to discuss what sports you would like to cover.

OCAA football revised to O-QIFC

By DAVE STUART

The OCAA football league has changed its name and format in an effort to confuse intrepid sports fans across the country.

The league shall be known as the Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate Football Conference (O-QIFC) since three Quebec based teams have joined the league.

The football family is divided into two sections (imaginatively) called

East and West. The eastern division includes Bishop's, Carleton, Loyola, McGill, Ottawa, Queen's, and Toronto. The western division is comprised of Guelph, McMaster, Waterloo, Western, Laurier, Windsor, and York.

The playoff picture is changed as well. The post-season play will see a divisional champion declared in both east and west divisions. The winner of the east division will travel to the Maritimes to play the winner of the ACAA while the western division winner will host the champs from the WIFC. The winners of these two games earn the right to lock horns at Varsity Stadium for the Canadian College Bowl on Nov. 22.

Blues fans should take note that Toronto's first league play is Sept. 14 when Carleton visits the stadium.

Benson Bldg. announces its new fall program for women

By PETEY O'NEIL

The Women's Athletic Association will be conducting registration this week for use of the Benson Building facilities. Coed activities have been increased this term to encourage male participation. Coed swimming sessions are scheduled weekly on Fridays from 6:30 to 8:30 PM and Saturdays from 11 to 1 PM. The pool may be opened on Sundays if there is a good response to the Friday and Saturday sessions, and funds can be obtained from governing council.

Coed evening archery instruction will be offered at the Benson archery range. The women's archery team is looking for candidates to participate in several scheduled outdoor meets. Coed Judo, Yoga, and Karate courses are nearly filled for the term.

The WAA has also announced a trainer's course to begin in mid-September. The course is open to both sexes, and provides the basic qualifications for part-time employment as a trainer with the U of T or the YWCA. Interested persons should call 928-3341 for more information.

Noontime classes aimed at U of T staff include the popular "Harmony and Flow" posture course designed to eliminate teacher's tension, clerical cramps, or scientist's slouch. Slim and Trim sections are available in several time slots. Badminton and Tennis instruction classes will be offered again. Ski Conditioning is scheduled during lunch hour in an effort to attract faculty and administrative staff to the Benson.

Jogging for the gentle sex will be offered this year from 12:40 to 1:10 in the sports gym. If registration is large enough an instructor will be provided, presumably to urge on the laggards.

The WAA will also be staging fitness clinics for high school gym teachers and interested U of T personnel later in the term. Some fitness measurement equipment has been purchased but further funds are required before a definite program can be drawn up.

Archery classes are a popular recreation at the Benson Bldg.

U.S. draft resisters reject amnesty plan at international meeting

The second international conference of American exiles "wholeheartedly rejected" U.S. president Gerald Ford's "concept of punitive repatriation" at a conference held over the weekend at the International Student Centre.

About 100 delegates from Sweden, France, the United Kingdom and Canada passed two resolutions on Saturday and then continued to meet in closed session on Sunday to discuss organizational strategy.

Toronto lawyer Paul Copeland said at the conference Saturday all legal effects of the Ford plan were as yet unclear.

He said the Canadian government was taking a hard line on the amnesty question.

Anyone who is now a Canadian citizen by virtue of landed immigrant status and who returns to the U.S. to pledge allegiance to that country stands to lose any status in Canada, he said.

Beside demanding rejection of the Ford amnesty plan, one Saturday resolution called for universal amnesty for all draft resisters and deserters in exile.

The resolution said in part: "For those draft resisters and deserters in exile and underground in the U.S. and the over half a million Vietnam era veterans with punitive, less than honorable discharges, and those with criminal records or subject to prosecution because of their active opposition to the war, we continue to demand universal and unconditional amnesty."

The second resolution demanded the end of American government support to dictatorial regimes in Southeast Asia and called for a strict implementation of the Paris agreements.

The conference was organized by AMEX, the American Expatriates in Canada. Toronto area war resisters who were not delegates also expressed considerable interest in attending.

Weekend delegates to the conference represented the American Deserters Committee (Sweden), the Union of American Exiles (the United Kingdom), and an officially unnamed group calling itself the "Paris Collective" from France.

Canadian organizations that sent delegates included: the Vancouver Committee to Aid American War Objectors and the Toronto Anti-Draft Program.

Jack Colhoun of Amex says he thinks the majority of exiles in Canada "want to stay in Canada."

He said there is a very strong rejection of the Ford statement "right across the board." Opposition to Ford's plan arose, he said, because most resisters feel the war is criminal and the Ford plan impractical.

"Earned re-entry is forced labor and therefore unconstitutional," Colhoun said.

He also expressed concern that persons returning to the U.S. under the Ford plan would have their individual cases studied to determine whether they were conscientious objectors or cowards.

Bruce Beyer, another AMEX member now living in Toronto but originally from Buffalo, said the National Council for Universal and Unconditional Amnesty (NCUUA), an organization with its head office located in the U.S. was now working with Canadian groups.

He estimated there are about 15,000-25,000 war resisters in Canada and several hundred in Sweden and France. But he said that the vast majority of overseas resisters are located in the United Kingdom.

Beyer also said there are about 100,000 war resisters living underground in the U.S. plus 560,000 veterans with less than honorable discharges.

He said the aim of the NCUUA formed in 1973, was to "win the right of people in the U.S. to resist war and to support the right of self determination for other peoples."

Some people will use Ford's program to go back and fight, he said.

But only a few hundred have placed calls to the American government to find out more information about the program, sources indicated on Sunday.

Part-time students won't get much aid

By MATHILDE VERHULST

Ontario government proposals for part time student aid have been severely criticized by U of T faculty and student representatives.

Part time undergraduate loans and bursaries are both pilot projects now being offered for the second year by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

The province introduced the projects because of increased part time student attendance in post secondary institutions, and because an increasing number had insufficient resources to meet education costs.

In 1973-74 eligible part time undergraduates who applied received loans of $200 per course, to a maximum of three courses per academic year. Interest rates of 10 percent were charged from the time the loan was negotiated.

For 1974-75 interest rates have increased to 11.5 percent yearly, with repayment of loans still due ten months after registration.

These features made the loan scheme unpopular. Only one half of one percent of the part-time undergraduate population (94 students of some 10,000) at U of T received such loans in 1973-74.

Student Awards director Patrick Phillips says only 50 part-time students have applied this year.

Phillips described the loan plan as having "obviously no appeal for part-time U of T students."

He expressed disappointment there was no interest-free period in the part-time loan program and called the 11.5 percent interest rate too high.

The part-time bursary program, initiated last year, offered to assist particularly handicapped individuals, such as single parents, welfare recipients and low-income students.

However the provincial government limited the project to only nine post-secondary institutions. Only Carleton, Laurentian, Windsor and York universities were chosen to take part in the program.

This year the part-time bursary scheme is again offered to those same four universities with a $200,000 budget increase.

Other Ontario universities are still ineligible for the project.

Major U of T criticisms of the loan and bursary programs include the repayment schedule and interest rates for part-time loans and the ministry's refusal to offer the bursary plan to other universities for the 1974-75 academic year.

Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) representative Carolyn Kendrick charged the "whole system of part-time student aid is inadequate."

Kendrick said the part-time loan plan is "unfair" when it demands students pay the interest of the loan while still attending school. She described the 11.5 percent interest rates as "almost commercial rates."

Kendrick also qualified the part-time student's position as particularly disadvantaged because the average age of students applying for such loans is 30 and many already have "heavy financial responsibilities."

The bursary program offers inadequate assistance because at maximum it only covers tuition fees and costs of books, Kendrick said.

No provision was made in the scheme for additional costs such as child care and transportation. Therefore part-time students, Kendrick said, are treated as "second class citizens of the academic world."

She said she would like to see the bursary program extended to all Ontario post-secondary schools and financial assistance increased.

SAC passes brief on parity

By KATHERINE ROWCLIFFE

In response to teachers' opposition to equal student-faculty representation on the Governing Council, SAC passed a brief at its meeting Saturday outlining justifications for parity on council.

Some faculty members have opposed a recent proposal of SAC and the Graduate Students' Union which would allow both faculty and students 14 members each on council. Such a proposal should have some philosophical justification, teachers have argued.

Philosophically, SAC's brief argues, students will more readily accept Governing Council policies which they helped develop.

Functionally, the brief says student representatives provide valuable feedback on proposals. The brief also says more students are needed to ease present student governors' work load.

Eight students and 12 faculty members presently sit on Governing Council, the university's top governing body.

Proposed student amendments to the U of T Act, to be discussed by Governing Council in October, would allow both students and faculty 14 members each on a 66-member Governing Council.

Some faculty members are concerned the idea of parity on Governing Council, could filter into hiring, firing and tenure referendum the council administered last year which advocated parity representation on hiring, firing and tenure committees.

The quantity, quality and originality of research, but not teaching ability, are presently important factors in deciding tenure, noted SAC president Seymour Kanowitch.

"The standard of teaching at this university is in a state of decline," Kanowitch said.

Most of the discussion at Saturday's meeting centred on whether SAC should continue to push for student parity on tenure committees or to resort to subtler politics and ask only for some student representation.

Last year's SAC referendum was taken following the mathematics department's firing in 1973 of three popular instructors.

In other business, Trinity College representative Michael Sabia criticized student services at U of T and emphasized the need for SAC to deal with such "motherhood issues" as a pub and games room.

The academic affairs committee of the Governing Council holds an important meeting 4 p.m. tomorrow at the Simcoe Hall board room.

The committee will discuss the principles of composition of tenure committees.

You're welcome to attend.

SAC denies this is a threat and says 14 members could not possibly control a 66-member Governing Council.

After discussing parity on Governing Council, SAC turned its attention to student participation on hiring, firing and tenure committees.

SAC reaffirmed, after lengthy debate, support for results of the Kendrick also noted an OFS conference to be held Sept. 27 through 29 will discuss the problem of part-time student loans.

Woodsworth College registrar Alec Waugh echoed Kendrick's views on the two projects.

Waugh said he doesn't feel "civil" about the loan scheme. He said Woodsworth tries to dissuade part-time students from applying for the loans, and only as "a last resort."

Most part-time students needing financial aid also work, which makes them taxpayers. "Then they get hit with this stupid thing," Waugh said, referring to the loan plan.

Waugh also said the provincial government was employing "a form of tokenism" toward part-time students. He felt the loan program might be getting students into a "spiralling debt" instead of assisting them.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch and friend dream of parity.

James Bay costs squeeze social spending

STE. ANNE DE BELLEVUE (CUP) — Quebec Premier Robert Bourassa's dream of harnessing the rivers of James Bay is proceeding as scheduled — no matter what it will cost Quebec society.

Already government spending is being cut back in all sectors of the province's economy as funds are being diverted to the massive power development.

This massive concentration of government spending will create tremendous inflationary pressures which could, according to some economists, severely damage any attempts to establish labor-intensive secondary industry in Canada.

In Quebec, the side-effects are already being felt as government budgets are being frozen and in some cases cut back.

In Montreal, a French-language CEGEP which is completely without athletic facilities has had the construction of a sports complex delayed until 1979 — a result of a government decision to cut capital spending.

Other cut-backs across the province include reductions in transportation budgets granted to school boards. As a result there have been curtailments and suspensions in school bus service all across the province.

Day care centres whose funding has recently been taken over by the provinces are finding themselves in serious financial trouble.

Rochdale: last glimpses of a dying community

Rochdale is down to 300 people

By CARMEN PRIOLO

While many students are still searching for acceptable housing, Rochdale College stands almost empty, its management refusing to accept new tenants.

Clarkson Company, the current property manager and receiver, has closed the rental office of the 18-storey high-rise on Bloor Street West and is evicting present occupants as leases expire.

Although as many as 1,500 people once lived in Rochdale, fewer than 300 remain today.

From 1968 to late 1973, however, rooms and apartments were available and many students lived at Rochdale. It was built to house a "free school" and to experiment in high-rise cooperative housing, which permitted not only students as residents, but also anyone from motorcycle gangs to pensioners.

Different living accommodations are offered in Rochdale, ranging from single rooms and apartments to floors block-rented to communes.

the office was closed and all residents are being evicted.

The reason for "mass evictions" and for total possession of the building by the receiver is supposedly to assure conditions for immediate sale of the building or "intensive renovation". For what purpose, or to whom the building will be sold is uncertain.

Clarkson Co. says evictions are necessary because of "undesirables" who deal dope, fall behind in their rent payments, litter the premises with refuse and behave in ways that interfere with efficient property management.

"Toad Lane," the Rochdale Tenants' Association, in cooperation with the Rochdale governing council, has opposed the mass evictions and used every available legal approach to forestall Clarkson's actions — so far, with only limited success.

Rochdale: housing, not rhetoric

Rochdale college has always been the focus of some incredibly boring rhetoric, pious moralizing that is quite demonstrably empty.

For no less than six years, we have had to sit through every conceivable second-rate redneck politician in the city sounding off on the obligatory topic of the need to expose Rochdale, this festering cancer within our midst, this oasis of filth and scum in a desert of cleanliness and decency.

Every Rochdale resident, it seemed, had served time with the Blue Meanies before he moved into the place.

The rhetoric still goes on. People are still jumping out of windows every day. The place is still piled eight feet high with feces and dead junkies. Policemen are always getting shot whenever they set foot in the door. And so it goes.

On one point, however, the rhetoric has been noticeably silent.

About a year ago, a receiver was appointed to Rochdale, Clarkson Company, after the college fell way behind in its mortgage payments.

The receiver was to manage the operation of the building, although the college's governing council retained the right to sell. It asked $8½ million dollars, but there were no takers.

Since then, the receiver, quietly but systematically, has been emptying the building, turning the residents out onto the street one by one.

Other apartments remain padlocked, completely empty, while Clarkson Company keeps the rental office firmly shut.

Yet Toronto has a housing shortage. Students and other low-income people in the city are forced to live in substandard facilities because they can neither afford nor find anything else.

Once again, our politicians churn out the rhetoric. They set up task forces, receive reports, talk to the developers — but do very little to provide housing for the people who need it.

Nor have they exactly jumped at the opportunity to acquire a building which could be one of the few places for inner-city, low income housing; namely, Rochdale.

They have stood by quietly, acquiescing in the legal but immoral campaign waged by Clarkson Company, turning people out of their homes and onto the street, victims of their own rhetoric.

And Rochdale College stands empty, a monument to cynicism, greed and self-serving rhetoric.

Socialists and environmentalists must get together

Today's feature article by Jim Harding, Ecology as Ideology, is an important piece of work which should point to a reconciliation between two camps who, although superficially in agreement as critics, have far too long been at loggerheads.

It is time socialists and environmentalists sat down together and talked seriously.

The environmentalist has, quite rightly, been accused of taking a thoroughly naive view of the source of the problems he is fighting. He insists, more often than not, that through goodwill, or the eradication of scoundrels, or a simple description of those problems, that a solution will be forthcoming.

He fails to realize that there are much larger obstacles to overcome than simple misunderstanding; namely, as Marx pointed out, a deep-rooted contradiction in the very nature of our relationships in society.

The environmentalist must look for such deep-rooted causes in the ecological problems which he studies — much the same way Marx looked for these causes as he studied social problems.

But the article is not addressed solely to the environmentalist. There is also a lesson for the socialist. The socialist, smug in the certainty of his analysis, has blithely rejected the warnings from the environmentalist about the seriousness of the ecological problems our society has created.

So thoroughly has the socialist been convinced he has discovered the root cause of all our problems, he has failed, or not cared, to discover the seriousness of our ecological problems.

Ecological problems are serious, and they require some serious solutions. Self-centred rhetoric about the nature of class society, and a total disinterest and refusal to consider the problems, helps no one.

There is room for reconciliation. The environmentalist must be prepared to look for a thoroughgoing, historical, social analysis of ecological problems. And the socialist must be prepared to accept that there are severe ecological problems, requiring immediate attention.

RCMP also investigates journalists

Hopefully, last Friday's article on the RCMP doesn't leave the misleading impression the only students under police surveillance are members of Communist parties.

Your story should have mentioned the case of five Alberta journalists last winter, whom the RCMP admitted had been under investigation for some time. The five were reporters for such notorious Red Rags as the Calgary Herald and Lethbridge Herald.

But they were also linked by a common background as student journalists while at university during the 1960's. They were all involved in Canadian University Press, the national student newspaper organization to which The Varsity belongs. One had the audacity to belong to the Lethbridge NDP, which must have immediately aroused RCMP suspicions.

The omission of the Alberta incident, which sparked an exchange in the provincial legislature, is a serious oversight in your article, if its intent was to alert people to the dangerous and unwarranted intrusion of police in student political life.

Students ought to be demanding answers of their federal government. Are democratically-elected student councillors and student journalists being systematically investigated by the RCMP?

If such a policy exists, why does it? If the policy is to investigate only certain individuals, then why are these individuals being investigated? A predictable "no comment" came from the Solicitor General at the time of the Alberta outrage. Student organizations should again put the question.

Incidentally, the only members of this year's Students' Administrative Council executive with any political affiliations belong to the Progressive Conservative and Liberal parties. The rest appear on the political spectrum somewhere between Pierre Trudeau and Tommy Douglas. No doubt, the RCMP will consider this fertile soil for its operations.

Used book buyback is no bargain

Your readers and fellow students should think twice before taking their last year's books down to the university textbook store to sell them, supposedly at half price.

After selling my books for a few pennies I came to the conclusion the bookfairs sponsored by student unions in certain colleges are a better deal for the seller as well as the buying student.

The following seems to be the regular way of conducting business at the textbook store:

You show your old books to the girl in charge, who examines her voluminous lists and catalogues and finally informs you that the books are not used in the course this year.

You insist but you may not be too certain about it (well, which student is in a position to know whether the books will be used or not next year?).

The girl (I don't want to sound sexist, but that was my experience after all!) informs you she can give you 10 cents or a quarter per book as the case may be and so buy the books for the publisher suggesting they will be destroyed to make paper pulp.

You surrender whatever books you do not wish to carry all the way back home for whatever money they give you.

But you get no receipt proving the transaction.

I developed a heartburn inside the book store last week seeing on the shelf a book I had sold them for 25 cents without thinking twice: SPECTRUM, an anthology of texts for a translation course GER 205 still offered at this university.

The sticker on the cover read: "Used Book Bargain: Original Value $11.50, as used sold at $9.60 plus a 5 percent discount".

Yes, it was a bargain all right. But I wonder for whom?

Varg both inaccurate, contradictory

The Varsity is upset that some people were unwilling to "discuss racism sensibly", and instead decided to act against it. In an editorial and an article filled with inaccuracies and contradictions, the paper shows its lack of understanding of last year's "Banfield Affair".

The editorial of September 18th states SDS "took it upon itself to claim the issue of racism as its own". This statement typically ignores the facts. Opposition to the visit of Nixon's advisor, Banfield included the Black Students Union at U of T, the Black People's Movement at York, the Portuguese Democratic Association, Corriere Canadiense, Il Giornale di Toronto, the National Black Coalition of Canada, injured workers, workers at the Post Office, CN and Synnbrook Hospital, as well as SDS and CPL.

Many students, including myself, also opposed his visit. The editorial is contradicted a few pages later in the article on the Caput Trials, which admits that SDS had gained the support of the Black and Italian communities.

The editorial goes on to say that those who stopped Banfield "by their very actions insured that the substantive issue of racism would not be discussed". Yet, the campaign against Banfield received more coverage in the Varsity last year than any other issue. Perhaps we should promote discussion of the issue by doing what the Varsity did for the majority of last year—ignore it.

The Varsity says that racism is not a University Issue. It follows the ostrich-like posturings of right wing politicians who claimed the anti-war movement was not a university issue and the civil rights movement was not a university issue. Yet, hundreds on campus have been involved in opposing Ian Hector, a professor at the University of Toronto Medical School who claims Italians are "culturally predisposed to play a sick role," the sickening racist slurs of the "Toike Oike", and other examples of racism.

How can The Varsity explain the fact that 1,500 students attended the teach in against racism last spring, while only 100 attended a SAC forum on discipline at around the same time?

The Varsity further reveals its lack of awareness of the very real fight against racism in Canada in the claim that it is an "exported American Issue". Is racism against Italian Immigrants in Toronto an "American Issue?" Is the victimization of Paul Smithers an "American Issue?"

The tremendous strength of the fight against Banfield was the growing alliance of immigrant workers, unionists, students, professors and others who challenged the right of the University to promote racism. Calling on students to concern themselves with "student issues" is a reactionary appeal to ignore the world around us and the role that institutions like the University of Toronto play in perpetuating the ideologies and values of capitalism—particularly racism.

Who tags cars at meters?

As a concerned student and citizen I would like to know how, and under what authority (other than city by-law 814) that the Metro Parking Authority is allowed to tag cars.

On 18 September 1974, while walking down Devonshire Place, I observed officer Tote, No. 5068, from 52 Division tagging a gray Mustang bearing plates numbered BEK 491

Drapeau's stranglehold challenged in Montreal

MONTREAL (CUP) — The Montreal Citizens' Movement (MCM) will soon launch a massive campaign to contest the 51 seats in the Montreal Municipal Council, all of which are now occupied by members of Mayor Jean Drapeau's Civic Party.

The MCM is a citizens-based group which advocates, among other things, more participatory democracy in Montreal.

An MCM pamphlet quotes Mayor Drapeau as saying "I have no need for this so-called participatory democracy and the citizens' groups that now demand a say in government."

In the October 1970 municipal elections when Drapeau's party swept the city's 19 electoral districts, Drapeau falsely associated his opposition, the Front D'Action Politique (FRAP) with the terrorist FLQ, then involved in the October kidnappings.

Drapeau's Civic Party has run virtually unopposed for the past several elections and the party's political vote-getting organization is second to none in Canada.

"The MCM organization was strong in the spring, but fell apart during the summer. But now we're ready for a fall campaign offensive," explained Harry Rapapart, a local MCM organizer.

The MCM would encourage a more comprehensive and less costly rapid transit system with a view to eliminate unnecessary traffic in the city centre.

for expired meter No. 9830 while the meter still had one hour of time on it. I also saw a person putting money in the expired meters before officer Tote arrived. I am sure that he saw him also and that is possibly why he tagged the cars—but why?

ECOLOGY as IDEOLOGY

The Objectification of Nature

When reading ecology literature I often sense that "nature" is still viewed largely from an objectivist stance. For example: "To ignore Nature's laws, principles and conditions, or to pretend they do not exist and go against them is futile — in reality disastrous inasmuch as nature makes no compromises." (1) This is an ecological-minded scientist, not a fundamentalist Christian speaking. Nature, like the Christian God, is given an Essence independent of us. This is true in the sense that the cosmos will continue without us, but it usually means that we are somehow disobeying nature and, as such, are outside of it. The very way the above warning is made implies we are separate from nature. If nature made no compromises we would have to be outside it to disobey it.

Ecology, as a special science, bridges this contradiction more than any other field of study. Its roots are in objectivist science but its conclusions undermine that very notion of science. So it is not surprising to find so much confusion about "nature" within ecology.

Our common sense use of the term "nature" is not very different than that of objectivist science. It is an urban-biased term. Nature is that stuff (trees, rocks, lakes and animals) outside the city limits. It is where kids like to go and middle class North America likes to holiday, taking all the accessories of the middle class home with them. Sometimes we even make trails through "nature" so we can move through it without much inconvenience, seemingly always in control and a little aloof. Nature, to this way of thinking, is something that is there if we want to use or enjoy it.

Disassociation from Nature.

Because we are so adept at using impersonal, reified language, we can talk about ecological disasters while acting as though we are not animals that depend upon air, water and land and all the life forms from earthworms to eagles. This disassociation from our biological-ness was shown in an advertisement on the back of a Vancouver bus. According to it, the solution to the burning eyes you get in the polluted city is a new spray. We are perhaps not far from Tokyo's oxygen to pedestrians weakened by that city's notorious pollution.

It is high time we developed some historical perspective on our ecological situation. Consider the possibility that we never outgrew feudalism and or that we are just beginning to see our way out of it. The school, the church, the courtroom, perhaps even the moviehouse, are, after all, quite feudal in their seating arrangements, authority roles and results. You have heard of the vassals of the middle ages? Take a close look at the loyalty plaque in one of those multi-national corporation garages where you get gas.

Religious views of ourselves reflect our modernized feudalism. "Our science and technology have grown out of Christian attitudes towards man's relation to nature which are almost universally held not only by Christians and neo-Christians but also by those who fondly regard themselves as post-Christians. Despite Copernicus, all the cosmos rotates around our little globe. Despite Darwin, we are not, in our hearts, parts of the natural process. We are superior to nature, contemptuous of it, willing to use it for our slightest whim." (2)

The Psychotic Relationship

We have to go beyond Copernicus and Darwin, perhaps to Freud and Marx, to understand why we have become so egocentric and alienated from nature. Certainly our asensual and six-obsessed society spits us out from the organic. So does a society that enforces scarcity and waste to maintain a system of profit that benefits a relatively small minority. The competitive and isolated human, The Glorious Individual, that results from this system is not going to be open to his, her or anyone else's biologicalness. Nor are people thus conditioned going to be

Strikes could stop classes

REGINA (CUP) — Strikes appear imminent at the universities of Saskatchewan (Saskatoon) and Regina as employees at both centres have voted overwhelmingly in favor of the action.

The University of Saskatchewan Employees Union, which includes workers at both universities, held the strike vote last week. As the union can legally strike five days after the vote, action may be taken this week.

In Saskatoon union president Elaine von Oder said the administration appears to be prepared for a lengthy work stoppage and is waiting for the union to make the next move. But the university claims that it is up to the union to make a move and back off from their wage demands of a $125 per month basic increase.

Von Oder said she believes the administration is planning on shutting down the university when the strike begins, even though classes could be continued for a time without employees. This move, she predicts, would be aimed at alienating the students and the public toward the strike.

The ecological movement still seems to be caught up in a ne aware of their life cycle as one of many life cycles going on all the time, and as fundamentally connected to those cycles. The sight of ducks flying south usually means hunting season to the socialized male. In school, church or office you do not learn to look up and see yourself in the sky.

The relationship depicted between humanity and nature in the proliferating ecology literature is quite schizoid. Most academics, critical or not, are still clinging to their Platonic ideas. To develop sensitivities towards ourselves as part of nature we need to stop thinking and acting as though we are separate. We can't think our way back into the life processes, though theory can often act as a guide. We are in and of the natural world from the beginning except that certain social, economic and political environments that we have constructed create a false consciousness of what is more basic or real. Imagine a group of lions in a zoo voting that they are once again free and wild and then lying down to await the daily meal from the zoo-keeper.

Comparative biology, if placed in a historical context, is a potentially revolutionary science. The shock effects of overcrowding on other animals are not so different than those among humans in the urban maze. The biggest difference is that we have created a profitable pharmacological industry to try to repair the effects of our unhealthy environments.

The Objectification of Technology

There is also an objectified view of technology within the ecology movement. One expression, perhaps the most widespread and the one that links the ecology movement to the attempts at a counter-culture, suggests that all machines pollute and we should therefore revert back to a preindustrial form of survival. (3) The other expression suggests that technology itself will solve the problems. Better design of carburetors, sewage and waste systems is seen as a sufficient solution.

Both attempt to make a partial into a total solution. Those who romanticize living off the land without the aid of any mechanization should try it. At the other extreme, there are those who think that a pollution device on an industry will solve the problem. Those who hold this position never seem to realize that even if 25 percent of the dangerous particles were removed from the local air, the expansion of existing worldwide industry will steadily increase the total amount of pollution. (4)

There is a huge chasm between the life styles of those who think they can leave the polluting society and live through self-sufficiency and those who think that a few engineering gimmicks will stop the pollution. But both responses fail to recognize that pollution is a logical outcome of a society which is inherently alienated from nature. Those who believe we just need to take more weekend walks on government-subsidized nature trails to regain our contact with the natural environment combine the myths from each.

Technology a Symptom, not a Cause

A critical discussion of technology is the crux of ecology. It is technology that mediates between us and nature, and to the extent that our technology is alienated, i.e. built on the exploitation of some humans by others, it will not be a creative or harmonious mediation. Rejecting technology entirely, or expecting present technology to save us, are both indications that we do not yet understand how our labour, in the last analysis, makes technology and history. Up until this point we have created a pretty deadly system with our alienated labour. It does not follow, however, that the future will be like the past or present.

Rather than talking of technology abstractly, we should begin to specify the conditions that make for a technology that perpetuates our alienation from nature. Centralized technology definitely cuts us off from our animal nature and disrupts our awareness of what we, as special kinds of animals, have to do to maintain ourselves in the various climates and regions of this planet. Our present centralized technology makes us into dependent morons. The spreading of a standardized technology throughout the globe has a lot more to do with the imperialism of multi-national corporations than with raising the quality of life for transportation are very much structured into the same reality. Cars go back and forth to the machines that help to dig up the raw materials used to make the machines in the first place. Trucks, planes and trains, all made with the aid of machines, transport these and other products to the car lots or supermarkets. People consume television images between making the things that often must be advertised to be sold, and going out and buying them. Our society seems to be a large machine, kept going by a highly mediated existence seems to make a direct perception difficult if not impossible without first going through some unlearning.

The Alienation of Nature

This only exemplifies the degree to which alienation from nature in this society and economy has gone. People typically live through highly conditioned and abstracted images — a form of psychosis. To fully understand the present crisis the ecology movement will have to develop an awareness of insanity and madness. (5) We each have to go through our own madness (deconditioning) to be able to experience the natural order right-side-up again.

Getting off the stimulants (e.g. tobacco) which keep people functioning within the society, and slowing down enough to face one's accumulated madness, is clearly a part of any workable strategy to transform this society into an ecologically sensible one. I am not suggesting that we renounce pleasure, or become puritanical. There is pleasure, and there are replacements for pleasure. Anything compulsive, sex included, is a replacement for pleasure. What is needed is an open, loving way of life, whereby we enact and fulfill our animal needs in a gentle, direct way. We simply have to take a closer look at ourselves, collectively and individually, and begin to take the journey out of our general and particular madneses.

If we do not start to get involved with all living things we will not generate the energy required to stop the deadly technology without, in the process, precipitating a mass freak-out among a population literally addicted to that technology. This is why the ecological movement must also be a movement that can catalyse political and social therapy. Rather than getting immobilized by formal contradictions about the impossibility of alienated people creating a liberated society, we have to start whittling away at it, using and improving our consciousness and releasing our own blocked energy each day, every day.

The ecological movement still seems to be caught in a newsletter and membership meeting stage. Change is a way of life, not a hobby.

The Objectification of Power

Mainstream ecological literature makes only sparse reference to matters of power, either economic or political. A typical ecology book will be filled with a lot of vital data and a few, usually naive references to the political and economic system. The very compartmentalization of knowledge into biology and sociology has low survival value, for it allows people in both to specialize for the point where they revert to ideological notions when it comes to suggesting what to do. (6)

Awareness of the workings of social, political and economic power in the ecology movement is crude and naive, and unless it is reformulated will likely engender cynicism and defeatism. The prevalent notion of reform is somewhat analogous to thinking of human history in terms of God's intervention. It will take some time for sympathetic academics to realize that a specialized background does not necessarily prepare one for dealing with matters of social change.

Most of the ecology literature accepts, uncritically, the ideology of representative democracy. For example, Donald Chant of Toronto's Pollution Probe has written: "We like politicians because the rules by which they play are so delightfully simple: no prejudices or principles stand in the way of responding to simple pressure and proof of where the votes will fall on pollution issues. (7)

David Lewis of the New Democratic Party has stated that "pollution is like motherhood," meaning that everyone is for stopping it. (8) All politicians now have an ecology morality worked into their overall doubletalk, the New the peoples affected. It perpetuates a sterotyped alienation from nature and disrupts local culture and habits of survival in the process. With ingenuity and an abolition of centralized systems of power which inhibit ingenuity, it is possible for people throughout the globe to find special uses of particular technologies to take the burden off material survival. Ultimately, centralized hydro systems (for example) should go. There is no reason at all why small, decentralized, futuristic communities could not have autonomous energy production facilities.

Simplistic Villains

Ecological literature rarely gets down to these specifics. Usually, "the city" or "machines" are blamed for our situation. The present city, we must remember, has provided the capitalist factory system with a cheap labour pool, and increasingly with a market for useless and wasteful products that the economy churns out to keep the stock market going. The present city can only be replaced if the system of production on which it is built is also replaced.

Why are the explanations of the ecological crisis so abstract? The effects of the very technology being criticized by the critics on the critics may be a clue. Clock and machine time are very interrelated. And cars, television and other forms of entertainment and hierarchy of machines. And it is a very speedy machine, greased with caffeine and nicotine.

But to mystify the machine as the cause of this chaotic anthill is to think in the very alienating categories created and needed by this society. It is more fruitful to consider effects of this social machine on our bodies. Next time you eat potato chips in the pub, think of what a decade of transporting this fraudulent food does to the kidneys of the driver, a driver who is likely kept functioning with benzadrine. Once we understand specific negative relations within this society we can begin to take the necessary steps to change them. For example, the health food movement is a good thing to the extent that it isn't a fetish or fad in the marketplace. But all food should be healthy, and having a small shelf of very expensive "health foods" in an out-of-the-way corner of a supermarket or at a health food store is no real solution.

What does the speediness of our society do to our perceptions and conceptions? People who are constantly bombarded and overstimulated with the symbolic realities of radio, television, newspapers and film can easily get things upside down. It is not uncommon, on our farm in northern Ontario, for visitors from the Toronto area to interpret their perceptions of plants, animals and rocks in terms of pictures, movies or other symbolic media. Their newsletter and membership meeting stage. Change is a way of life, not a hobby.

Democratic Party included. But this should not be taken as evidence of rising consciousness. It may even be a sign that the ecology question is fast being incorporated into the bureaucratic politics that tries to level out the effects of contradictions of all kinds. The role that government environment agencies have played in covering up industrial pollution (e.g. lead poisoning) and in the James Bay and other hydro projects shows how much we can rely on changing this system through present institutions.

Bureaucracy and Ecology

Now that ecology issues have been yacked onto existing governmental structures (the same structures that overtax low and middle income people and subsidize polluting corporations) we are seeing how tough some of the prophets of doom really are. I know of several ecology-minded men who worked their way up from L.I.P. and O.F.Y. (9) grants into the mostly impotent environmental branches of the civil service. The workings of individualism and upward mobility seem to have more influence than a commitment to work among the people to raise consciousness. And we should never delude ourselves into thinking that the ecology movement has more roots among the population than the peace or education movements before it.

This separation from the vast majority of the people is nothing new. It will persist until more and more people start to act as if they really believed that our collective needs, as a species, are not subservient to individualistic, careerist ones. I am not suggesting martyrdom or self-sacrifice. I believe that working as a member of a democratic collectivity is more fulfilling than doing your own thing, whether of the establishment or counter-cultural form. Once you confront the workings of power you find that you cannot really do your own thing anyway.

There is some sign of a change within the ecology movement. During the recent "energy crisis" Nader attacked the oil monopolies themselves for using an energy shortage to make windfall profits. One author has written: "The more one discovers about the prevalent machinations of the business world, the more one is convinced that the profit motive must outweigh all other considerations." (10)

Ecological Moralism

People are quickly realizing that the profit motive can even outweigh survival — not a new phenomenon, we realize, when we look at historical examples of warring nations backed by industrialists. The owners of industry may now be able to imagine their own deaths and this, rather than humanism per se, may greatly explain the detente of the big powers. This may be some kind of deterrent but it is certainly not a solution.

This insight into power, however, is greatly limited by an ecological moralism: "Unfortunately, profit often speaks louder than common sense and environmental concern . . . No sane or competent individual with any knowledge of mercury would allow the release of this material into the environment." (11) The assumption of this statement is that the human is, or ought to be, a rational, logical being, motivated by an open search for truth and an understanding of consequences. This assumption seems to have persisted within biological circles while being pretty thoroughly clobbered in the social sciences. I am not suggesting that we retreat to a cynical view of our nature, but only that we temper our belief in rationality with some understanding of how a society alienated from nature creates conditions that breed widespread irrationality.

There is no place for an elitist view of human potential when the survival of our and other species is at stake. Until the ecology movement rids itself of the effects of the very ideology of power which functions to stabilize the polluting society, it will at best reinforce socialism from above (state capitalism), and at worst reinforce manipulative social engineering. They amount to the same thing.

Until we come to understand how our society has become so thoroughly alienated from nature, almost to the point of annihilation, we will be unable to begin to imagine real answers, and to develop a strategy that can deal with ecological issues. We have to learn not to treat ecology as a single issue. It is only possible to alter fundamentally the present cataclysmic course we are on by altering the social and economic relations which push us on.

Rereading Marx

Marx, more than any other social theorist, recognized the dialectics of society and nature. What is desperately needed is a rereading of Marx from the perspective of today's historical predicaments. We are not in search of uncritical truisms, as many Marxists are, but of historically specific insights.

The tendencies we have found among many academic ecologists could be summarized as follows: "The inadequacy of the abstract materialism of natural science, which leaves out of consideration the historical process, is at once evident from the abstract and ideological conceptions of its spokesmen, whenever they venture beyond the bounds of their specialism." (12) This abstract science begins and ends without human beings. No matter how much it is reformed it cannot be humanized, for the social and economic relations out of which it grows are not humanized. Hence the difficulty of the ecology movement in abandoning abstract notions of nature, technology and power.

Crisis in Science is Historical

It is time to realize that the crisis in science is itself a historical crisis. Ecology as a discipline is both the end of the abstract materialism and the beginning of a science of human liberation and human goodness. However, having no perspective on alienation, it has none on liberation.

Liberation can be seen as the negation of the original negation of humanity, which is alienation. "Once the essence of man and of Nature, man as a natural being and Nature as a human reality, has become evident in practical life, in sense experience, the search for an alien being, a being outside man and Nature . . . becomes impossible in practice." (13)

Our sense experience, often with the help of electronic and chemical stimuli (music and psychedelics), now constantly and continually affirms that humanity is a natural being and nature is a human reality. The search for the explanation of, or solution to, pollution in alien notions of nature, technology and power — all notions that complement industrial pollution — is to deny or ignore our senses.

Darwin and Marx

The historical moment for an integrated study of Darwin and Marx, of evolution and revolution, has clearly arrived. And the historical moment to grapple with Marx's prospect of communism, and to distinguish this clearly from all versions of authoritarian socialism and state capitalism, has arrived with it.

Throughout his work Marx emphasized the destructive implications of the antagonisms between town and country. The Communist Manifesto stressed the need to overcome these antagonisms. The last 122 years have seen these antagonisms grow to the point that alienated industry (the corporate society) is now, objectively, at war with biology. It is not Ellul's "technique" that is waging war with nature but alienated and powerless humans allowing to continue a system that daily kills them, others and all kinds of brother and sister plants and animals. (14) We are facing the total contradiction of ourselves as mechanized objects and biological subjects, and the potential for the biological subject to become a political force is ever present. (15)

Class Struggle

This is related to, but not reducible to, the class struggle—the resistance of labour to its exploitation and domination by capital. Marx's communism goes beyond the cult of the proletariat: "Communism as a complete humanism is humanism, as a complete humanism is naturalism. It is the definitive resolution of the antagonisms between man and Nature, and between man and man." (16) What we need to realize is that to overcome the antagonisms between man and nature we need to overcome those between man and woman. We no longer have the time to confuse ends and means, postpone ends, or get sidetracked in institutional or personal games or in ideological self-righteousness.

Indian leaders attack media coverage of protest caravan

EDMONTON (CUP) — Spokesmen for the Cross-Canada native peoples' caravan protest march are telling of distortion by the media concerning the caravan's actions and harassment by police forces.

At a press conference yearlier last week in Edmonton, the group said they were especially bitter about a report carried by the CBC in which a reporter claimed to have seen a rifle. As a result the band council of the Hobbema Reserve south of Edmonton refused to feed the members of the caravan as they had originally agreed.

Militant Indian leaders, including Louis Cameron who led the Achinabe Park armed occupation near Kenora this summer, left Vancouver early this month in protest caravan to unite Indian groups across Canada into pressing for better rights for Indians. The caravan hopes to reach Ottawa by next week when Parliament opens, to present various grievances to the federal government.

Caravan organizers who met the press said they did not claim to be representatives, but part of the struggle.

They said the media reports of arms in the caravan were not only false but that they diverted attention from the real demands the caravan was organized to publicize.

Jim Wenjack, one of the Indian spokesmen, said the arms publicized consisted in fact of a pellet gun kept at the Calgary Native Friendship Centre.

Chief Ken Basil of the Bonaparte Band in British Columbia, which organized the Cache Creek highway blockage, said the caravan should be seen as an attempt to demonstrate on the part of all poor people and not just Indians.

The demands around which the caravan is organized are:

- Settlement of native land claims.
 - Adequate housing.
 - Raising the standard of Indian education.
 - Effective recognition of Indian treaties, especially the Tory Treaty of 1786.
 - An immediate parliamentary investigation into the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs.
- Basil said the native people were tired of asking Ottawa for their rights and were now demanding them. If the demands were not met the inevitable result would be frustration which could end in only one way. (he did not elaborate on this point.)
- Ed Burnstick, American Indian Movement (AIM) co-ordinator, said he has discussed the problem with the media.

Only when native people resorted to confrontation did they receive coverage, he noted, adding the reportage concentrated on confrontation to the exclusion of the underlying reasons for it.

The most crucial demand of the caravan relates to land claims, Burnstick said. He stressed Indians are not Canadians but "North American sovereign citizens," and oppression of Indians did not differ because of the boundary line.

Wenjack was the most adamant of the spokesmen, refusing to be categorized by a title. He was incensed the caravan had been escorted by the RCMP who he said represented all that represses Indians. Wenjack said the caravan was capable of looking after its own security and the Indians would not tolerate any harassment.

Burnstick said he had seen the RCMP's national security division and specifically asked the caravan be left alone.

Ever since the caravan left Vancouver in early September it has been shadowed by marked and unmarked RCMP cars. He suggested the RCMP were taking pictures of those involved in the march.

In Vancouver, three organizers had been arrested by Vancouver city police. Spokesmen claim the charges were trumped up and after arrest the three had been beaten up.

Scarborough College stabilizes More political 'barnstorming'

By CIM NUNN
U of T's first riding stables, a joint venture by SAC and the Scarborough College Students' Council (SCSC), were officially opened last Friday afternoon.

The stables, which have been operating unofficially since July 8, are operated by the SCSC.

The riding stables, conceived in June 1973, consist of a large barn, a smaller building used for equipment storage, a riding ring and a newly-built dressage ring.

The idea of riding stables originated with SCSC president John O'Donohue, who brought the issue before SAC, SCSC, and the Scarborough College council.

O'Donohue was made aware of the threat of the destruction of the stables and initiated the idea of student riding stables as a means of keeping the facilities.

The $8,500 funds for renovating the stables, were supplied by SAC last spring.

According to SCSC sources, this is the first project of this nature in a Canadian university that is completely student-owned, planned and operated.

The stables are located half a mile down the valley from Scarborough College, which is on Military Trail, near the corner of Ellesmere and Morningside Streets.

Buses running to Scarborough College leave Convocation Hall every hour.

The stables house seven horses rented by the month from a Richmond Hill riding stable.

The opening ceremonies featured several speeches, a display of horse riding, and a ribbon-cutting ceremony.

In attendance were U of T vice-president Jill Conway, Scarborough mayor Paul Cosgrove, Scarborough College principal Ralph Campbell, SAC president Seymour Kanowitch and O'Donohue.

All members of the platform party congratulated O'Donohue on his perseverance in seeing the project reach fruition.

O'Donohue expressed hope that the stables, available to all U of T students, would establish a "two-way flow" between Scarborough and the St. George campus.

During his speech, O'Donohue pointed out to three reasons for establishing stables at Scarborough. He said the campus had the potential with the unused barn and the rural setting of Scarborough was unique in Toronto. He expressed the desire that it might serve to "slow down the pace of life".

O'Donohue hopes the stables will attract students from the other campuses, as well as those from Scarborough, making Scarborough's role in U of T more important.

Since the stables opened in July, they have been operating at 85 per cent capacity.

The facility is staffed entirely by students. Carol Westman, a part-time student with her provincial certificate in riding instruction, is in charge.

Students who wish to go riding can do so for $3 an hour. Instruction may also be obtained for an additional dollar.

At the conclusion of the official ceremonies, refreshments were served.

Cosgrove, who has previously expressed his support for riding stables in Scarborough, passed up the refreshments. Instead, he chose to end the day with a ride on a horse.

These people have no nagging doubts — they know these creatures have stable personalities.

more than a moment's ornament

In a drear-nighted December,
Too happy, happy tree,
Thy branches ne'er remember
Their green felicity:

The north cannot undo them;
With a sleety whistle through them,
Nor frozen thawings glue them
From budding at the prime.

Ah! would 'twere so with many
A gentle girl and boy!
But were there ever any Wrighted not at passed joy?
The feel of not to feel it,
When there is none to steal it,
Nor numbed sense to steal it,
Was never said in rhyme.

Two young children protest the new government day care policy.

Daycare controversy continues

The storm of controversy over the provincial government's proposed loosening of daycare regulations shows no sign of abating.

The changes, announced last June by Social Development Minister Margaret Birch, have come under fire from almost everyone involved in daycare in the province.

A coalition of more than 30 groups called the Daycare Reform Action Alliance is continuing its fight to stop the new regulations.

The most contentious issue is the loosening of staff ratios. The new policy would reduce these from 30 to 50 per cent. For example, under the new regulations only one staff member would be required for 25 children of six to nine years compared to one to 12 before.

The alliance opposes these changes, charging they would seriously lower the quality of daycare and ensure children will receive only custodial care.

The changes, however, will benefit some private operators. Mini-skools, a multi-national chain of daycare centres with 38 branches in Canada, have already been operating with the new proposed ratios at its Toronto centres although the existing laws are still in effect.

The head of Mini-skools, John Christianson, was a member of a Canadian Council on Social Development Committee which recommended looser ratios in a report used by the Ontario government to justify its policy.

Mini-skools, a profitable venture with present assets of $9 million, is partially owned by the Great West Life Assurance Company.

Changes recommended would also lower qualification requirements for all staff but supervisors. This has met with vehement opposition from daycare workers who point out it could be used to cut costs by hiring untrained personnel.

While not opposing parent and volunteer participation in daycare programs, opponents of changes say this should be carefully regulated to prevent its use purely as an economic measure.

The government has also proposed dropping the requirement for kitchens on the premises of each centre and the regulation that centres must be located on the first three floors of a building.

The elimination of kitchens would result in lowered nutritional standards, according to critics, as well as undermining the value of the daycare centre as a social environment.

The changes in the policy will also involve ending the present stringent fire protection regulations.

But the changes in regulations are only part of the objections to the Tory government's daycare policies.

Birch announced an increase of only $15 million and has adamantly maintained her opposition to "free universal daycare." But critics dispute the government's commitment to eventually making daycare reasonably accessible.

While there are about 40,000 children in private and public daycare centres in the province, various studies have estimated there is a demand for up to 300,000 spaces.

The present provincial budget for daycare is $29 million annually. The new policy initiatives, said a Daycare Reform Action Alliance spokesman, try to expand services by substantially reducing the quality rather than attempting to maintain present standards and increase availability.

The government has also come under fire for aiming its subsidies only at definable groups such as welfare recipients and the handicapped and for setting up a means test, with all the stigma attached. Many average wage-earners who can't afford daycare are not eligible under these regulations.

Another bone of contention is the lack of consultation in the formulation of daycare policy. There isn't a single representative of daycare centres on a new provincial advisory council on daycare.

Daycare groups in the province were not consulted in formulating government policy, and the government study which recommended the new controversial regulations has been kept secret.

Rugby Blues first lose to Gaels. Seconds win 11-4.

By ROBERT ALGIE
and TOM CULLEN

The rugby Blues started their season with a narrow loss to Queens 8-7 on the back campus Saturday morning. The seconds fared better with an 11-4 win over the Gaels seconds.

The opening of the first game found the Blues penned deep in their own zone. A lot of scrappy play allowed a Queens drive for a try. The convert failed.

Thereafter play settled down to see-saw battle until Blues' rookie Joe Gilmore scooped up a mishandled kick and ran the length of the field for a try beside the posts.

The Blues' convert attempt was unsuccessful and later proved to be their downfall.

The second half began with the Blues showing much more drive. Many times Varsity was deep in Gael territory but was unable to finish the play for a try.

Kicking played a major part in the game. On one kick when Queens was well up on the ball in Toronto territory, a wet ball squirted out of Varsity's grasp. Queens recovered the fumble and ran in for the try.

The try went unconverted leaving the score 8-4 for Queens.

For the balance of the game the Blues held a slight edge. Blues were still unable to present a solid team effort letting the Gaels spoil many Varsity drives.

Blues' final tally came on a drop goal from rookie center Derek Calaco from 20 yards out.

Final score: Toronto 7, Queen's 8. The next game sees the Blues in Peterborough Wednesday night to play Trent University.

The light rain which plagued the first game disappeared when the seconds took the field.

Play often ran slowly mainly because of the inexperience of the players. Blues opened the scoring on a penalty kick for three points. Chris Bouris handled the kick.

Queens came back quickly with a try but it was called back because of a knock-on. Undaunted the Gaels scored a try later from the Toronto 25, to take a temporary 4-3 lead.

Blues' forward Walter Wysocki came right back with a try to give the seconds their final lead. The convert was unsuccessful.

The only scoring in the second half was a beautiful blind side run by Varsity winger Bill Procnunier. A set scrum occurred on the Gael 5 yard line from which Blues' scrum-half Quelli took the ball to the short side.

He passed to Procnunier and the winger made a dive inside the corner flag for 4 more points. Final score was Toronto 11-Queens 4.

Gaels take the ball while Blues embrace each other.

Women's rowing team tries to get off the ground

By LYNEL HORNE

The Argonaut sports club, an all-male conclave, has called a meeting of the rowing committee on October 5 to decide the question of University women's rowing.

The University needs women rowers to show the Argonaut Club that there is sufficient interest to start a women's team.

The women rowers will start training immediately to form a team.

The Argonaut has never allowed women to row because it is a men's club. Other male clubs have admitted women and the Argonaut needs women's points in competition.

All other university programs in Ontario have women's rowing. The younger members of the Club were very impressed by the women at the Canadian Henley regatta this past summer and support the new move.

The Club's previous objections to women's rowing were that there are no locker facilities for women and that women would be admitted to the Club.

University rowers have pointed out that women can change before they come to the club. Also, the program is a university and not, an Argonaut activity.

The Club rents equipment and supplies coaches to U of T to encourage students to compete for the club.

Bobby Boraks of Erindale and Lynel Horne of U of T will attend the October meeting to represent women's rowing.

Women who are interested in rowing should come to an organizational meeting on Wednesday, Sept. 25 at 7:00 pm in the upper lounge of the Bensen Building. Newcomers are welcome.

Soccer Blues dump Waterloo Warriors despite the OUA

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues again found Varsity stadium to their liking as they deservedly won their second league encounter on Saturday by blanking the Waterloo Warriors 3-0.

For the spectators the game was a vast improvement over last Wednesday's contest, as the Blues demonstrated more crispness in their passing and better coverage on defense.

The balance of this article will not render a colourful description of the game but rather will be concerned with happenings off the field.

Soccer fans will recall that one hour before Wednesday's game with McMaster four players on Blues' roster, including the captain and both goalkeepers, were ruled ineligible to play because of their participation in the North American Soccer League or the National Soccer League.

Well, sports fans, it has happened again.

One hour before the Saturday game against Waterloo, the Blues were informed that the McMaster coach, Bill Knox, had protested on Friday to the OUA that Blues' new captain, Geoff Crewe, should also have been ruled ineligible and therefore should not have helped defeat the Marauder squad.

Director of Athletics, Dalt White, recommended that Crewe not play pending the OUA decision. The Varsity team unanimously decided that losing a captain just prior to every league encounter was not to be tolerated. The Blues also unanimously decided that Crewe should play, which he did.

Conceivably this action by the Blues could result in the soccer team forfeiting, by OUA dictate, every point they earn on the field of play.

The players, fully aware of this possibility, are now more than ever determined to win the western division championship, and so present the OUA bureaucrats with a large headache.

Canadian Universities have always been proud of the fact that they offer no athletic scholarships. They maintain every student enters and remains at university solely on academic ability.

The only university to offer athletic scholarships is Simon Fraser, which is thereby excluded from CIAU competition.

Inevitably some students possess more athletic ability than others. Why should they not use this ability during the summer break by playing for a NASL or NSL team?

None of the five Toronto players whose eligibility is being questioned came to university primarily to play soccer. None of the players are professionals.

Some of the details concerning the players are interesting.

Jack Brand spent the summer playing goal for the Toronto Metros of the NASL. As proof of his amateur status, Brand was invited on a fall tour of Europe with the Canadian Olympic soccer team. As everyone knows, the Olympics are rigidly amateur.

Brand turned down this opportunity fearing his studies would suffer, not so he could play for an inferior Blues team.

Tim Burns also played for the Metros but as an amateur. He has never signed a professional contract.

Geoff Crewe is currently registered with the St. Andrews soccer club of the T&D soccer league. The league is exclusively for amateurs.

Last May Crewe registered with A. C. Italia of the NSL but obtained a transfer to his present club. Such a transfer could only be made for a player of unquestionable amateur status.

The OUA apparently fails to recognize the FIFA, world government body of soccer, permits amateurs and pros to play together without prejudice to the amateur's status.

The Varsity
— Liz Clarke

Varsity determination shows through as Blues' player outhustles a Warrior for the ball

This fact was pointed out to the OUA by the Canadian Soccer Association, but to no avail.

Perhaps McMaster's protest will be upheld and they will be given credit for a win by OUA edict. But so what?

Last year Laurentian fielded a team with Bruno Pilas, a pro each summer with the Metros. Laurentian narrowly won the league from the Blues.

Why didn't the Blues protest to the OUA? Simply put, there is a recognition by the coaching staff and players that banning NASL and NSL players would only serve to lower the standard of play.

No doubt more off the field chicanery will occur. Certainly this reporter will pursue the matter further. Can university administrators ban academically qualified students from participating in sports? Hang in there, intrepid reader, for there is more to be said on this issue.

As for Saturday's game the goals, all good ones, were scored by Yannis Vassiliou, Vince Ierullo and Ian McLusky.

Football Blues slip by Ottawa to take first place

By PAUL CARSON

The football Blues played only one solid quarter of football Friday night in Ottawa, but what a fantastic 15 minute it turned out to be!

Trailing 23-9 to the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees, Blues exploded for three touchdowns and added some exceptional defensive play to emerge with an unexpected 30-26 victory, the team's first win over the Gee-Gees in five years of trying.

The result puts Varsity atop the Eastern Division of the Q-QIFC with a 2-0 record, and perhaps more important, it means Blues get the playoff edge should they and Ottawa be tied at the conclusion of the regular schedule.

It was a curious, exciting, unpredictable game as Varsity scored on its first possession, then went to sleep mentally and physically as Gee-Gees rolled for 16 consecutive points. Blues then rallied briefly only to fall back again and were about to receive the coup de grace when Ottawa's over-eagerness led to a critical fumble, recovered by Varsity defensive back Rick Nakatsu.

Trailing 23-9, Blues suddenly sprang to life, utilizing the end runs and passes to halfbacks that had worked well earlier in the game.

Behind crisp blocking from the offensive line, rookie Mark

Bragagnolo swept for three consecutive first downs. With Gee-Gees looking for the run, quarterback Dave Langley resorted to the pass as Bragagnolo darted out of the back-field to take a 30-yard bomb setting the stage for Bob Hedges' four-yard touchdown run.

With over thirteen minutes remaining, Blues trailed by only one touchdown and had the all-important momentum and confidence noticeably lacking in other games against Ottawa.

Heads-up defensive plays by Guido Intornio and Nick Desimini thwarted Gee-Gees next drives, and Blues regained possession when Desimini intercepted a Jim Colton pass and returned it 20 yards to the Varsity 25.

Langley engineered a textbook drive, mixing running with excellent short passes. Eventually, Bragagnolo finished it off with a crisp 17-yard run and Don Wright's convert evened the score at 23-23 with about six minutes remaining.

Blues clearly had a monopoly on momentum at this point but a paradoxical call abruptly changed the complexion of the game just prior to the three-minute warning.

Facing a third-and-one situation on their own 27, Blues coaching staff decided to gamble. It was a good decision given Blues psychological domination of their opponents at the time, but unfortunately the play selected took far too long to develop and Libert Castillo was stopped cold.

However, the Varsity defence which had played so erratically and clumsily earlier in the game, suddenly gained the needed coherence and forced Gee-Gees to settle for a 25-yard field goal from all-purpose back Neil Lumsden.

Taking over on their 35, the offence immediately went to work on the short passing game. Several excellent catches by split end Mark Ackley set up a screen to Castillo, and when an over-eager Gee-Gee defender grabbed Castillo's face mask, Blues were on the Ottawa 13 with about one minute remaining.

On the next play Langley found Steve Ince in the endzone and Blues had their comeback.

Gee-Gees, however, weren't finished and it took a magnificent defensive play by Rick Jeyman to seal the victory as he batted down Colton's pass in the Varsity endzone after Ottawa had marched to the Blues 23-yard line.

It was somehow fitting that a defensive player should make the final key play almost in atonement for some unfortunate earlier lapses which might have lost the game.

Blues had marched downfield from the opening kickoff but eventually stalled and had to settle for a 42-yard fieldgoal from Mike Sokovnin.

Defensively, Varsity was able to contain Ottawa's powerful running attack and the speciality team covered punts very well.

Unfortunately, the defensive secondary was as porous as the proverbial sieve, and Colton ruthlessly exploited this weakness.

Gee-Gees moved the ball effectively throughout the first half but Blues managed to regroup and force Lumsden to kick fieldgoals instead of running for major scores.

Alas, Lumsden kicked three consecutive three-pointers before halftime and halfback Dave Kerr added a touchdown as Ottawa led 16-3 at the intermission.

Blues had persisted with a ground attack during the first half but Langley came out throwing in the third quarter, hitting Ackley for a 13-yard touchdown to narrow the score to 16-9. The convert was missed and leadfooted play in the secondary later enabled Colton to fire a long pass to split end Bob Mincarelli who finished off the 43-yard pass as two Varsity defenders tripped over each other.

However, with their backs to the wall, the maligned defensive unit produced the two key turnovers, the offense got those three well-earned touchdowns, and the entire team could share in a long overdue victory.

It was only a football game, to be sure, but a number of student athletes came of age Friday evening. If they were exuberant at the end (and they were) it was a pleasure they had fully earned.

There are a lot of aspects to football that could be improved, but there are still a lot of worthwhile emotions generated by intercollegiate sport.

For 34 Varsity football players, Friday night in Ottawa was something special.

Elsewhere in the OQIFC, Guelph outgained Laurier but lost 33-9; Windsor won its second straight by taking Waterloo 23-10; Western hammered McMaster 29-8; Bishop's edged Loyola 7-3; Carleton squeezed by York 14-7 and Queens handled McGill 19-8.

The Golden Gaels, destroyers of so many Varsity title hopes in recent seasons, are the visitors Saturday at the Stadium.

Tanaka comes and goes

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Japanese prime minister Kakeui Tanaka descended on the U of T yesterday to pick up an honorary degree and toss off some finely-turned phrases on mutual solidarity between the Canadian and Japanese Peoples.

"I wouldn't have invited him," said zoology department chairman Donald Chant.

"I'm suspicious," admitted faculty association president Bill Nelson. "The faculty is treating this visit with massive indifference," he added.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch flatly turned down his invitation.

Most people just stood around bewildered, as hordes of limousines and motorcycles roared on to the campus, roared over to Hart House, and then roared off the campus over the horizon.

The brief, two-hour visit managed to include a special convocation and an elaborate lunch, which entailed closing Hart House for most of the day.

The visit was also marked with a demonstration outside Convocation Hall by people urging a boycott of Japanese goods in light of continued Japanese whaling. Japan has ignored calls for an international moratorium to preserve the endangered species.

As he left Convocation Hall, Tanaka accepted a copy of The Varsity, which printed an article on whaling. The paper was thrust into his hand by the demonstrators.

After Tanaka left, U of T president John Evans told the group he had explained their concern to Tanaka. According to Evans, the Japanese prime minister promised to look into it.

Tanaka's visit to the U of T was preceded yesterday by an announcement that the governments of Canada and Japan had agreed to undertake mutual funding of academic programs. The Canadian government will give the Japanese $1 million for the academic study of Canada, and a similar amount will be forthcoming from the Japanese for Japanese studies.

All of which means the federal government will spend a million dollars of its own money on Japanese studies, of which U of T is expected to receive a healthy chunk.

Tanaka was lauded at the convocation presentation by president Evans, who referred to the visit as a means to "show our respect and admiration for the great cultural heritage and achievements of the Japanese people."

Evans also paid tribute to Tanaka, the self-made man, who was born on a farm but had set up his own construction business at age 18.

Tanaka, in return, told the 500 assembled of his great exhilaration at being at U of T, with its "great tradition." He also ladled out some generous servings of the milk of human kindness, saying:

"The University of Toronto has, throughout its history, shown to the Canadian people the paths to the future on which their vigor and vitality can be mobilized and their quest for knowledge and truth can be met.

"As I stand in this great hall of learning, I realize anew the immense value of the roots it has spread in the life of Canadians, and the many fruits it has borne and will continue to bear under the motto 'velut arbor aevum'."

To many observers, what Tanaka seemed to realize was how hot it was, as he spent much of the ceremony mopping his brow with a big white handkerchief.

Originally, the university was worried about security and made it mandatory that admission tickets be signed for by those wishing to see Tanaka.

But on the day of Tanaka's convocation, officials were suddenly worried they didn't have enough bodies after all, and were forced to requisition 200 high school students to fill seats.

Following the convocation ceremony, Tanaka and selected guests rushed over to Hart House where, following toasts to Her Majesty and The Emperor, they were treated to a non-holds-barred, white-wine dinner, courtesy of the university.

Tanaka received, along with his degree, an illustrated book containing Evans' citation and pictures of the U of T, specially selected by a Japanese consultant.

He also got a U of T windbreaker and ties.

Who says birthdays are the best way to get presents?

Gay studies course faces cancellation over low enrolment

By KEN POPERT

A U of T School of Continuing Education course in gay studies, the first to be offered by a Canadian university, is facing cancellation because of low enrolment.

Michael Lynch, assistant professor of English at St. Michael's College who is instructor for the course New Perspectives on the Gay Experience, blames the media generally and the Toronto Star in particular for the enrolment problem.

According to Lynch, a Star reporter wrote and filed a feature story on the course, but her editor decided not to print it. Despite press releases sent out by the University News Service, the pioneering course has received no coverage in the media.

Off-campus publicity is important for the School of Continuing Education because its courses are offered to the general public. So far, only five people have registered for the course.

"In view of the Star's past record of discrimination against gay people, it is difficult to believe that the omission from its pages of information on this course was unmotivated," says Lynch.

Geoff Stevenson who, as the Star Saturday editor, made the decision not to print the story on the course, says the story was omitted for reasons of space only. He denied discrimination against the gay community was part of the Star's editorial policy.

The Star, which enjoys a near monopoly in the Toronto area, has in the past been found guilty of discrimination against gay people in its advertising policies by the Ontario Press Council.

The council is a regulatory agency created by a number of Ontario newspapers, the Toronto Star among them, to provide a means of redress against unfair practices and abuse of freedom of the press by member newspapers.

Gay community organizations have charged that the Star maintains a virtual press blackout on the homosexual minority and its struggle for civil rights.

Two years ago, the Star attempted to suppress The Body Politic, a gay liberation newspaper, by forcing its printer, Newsweb Enterprise Ltd., to discontinue service. The Star owns a controlling interest in the printing company. The newspaper is now printed in Kitchener.

Despite the rulings of the Press Council, the Star has refused to abandon its antihomosexual policies. The council has no mechanism for enforcing its decisions.

Lynch plans to lodge a complaint with the Press Council in connection with his course. He hopes a change in the Star's attitude before the winter session, when a second gay studies course, Gay Themes in North American Literature, will be offered.

Asked whether the university would join Lynch in his complaint, the School of Continuing Education co-ordinator said, "I am not in a position to do anything without conferring with the central administration."

One of the free gifts Kakeui Tanaka walked away with was a school tie.

York support staff organizes union

TORONTO (CUP) — The York University Staff Association (YUSA) has reached the mid-point in its drive to become the legal bargaining agent for the estimated 922 secretarial, technical and clerical workers at the university.

The association needs to enlist 65 percent of the staff in order to become a recognized bargaining agent under the Ontario Labor Relations Act.

The association is seeking a "voluntary recognition agreement" with the university administration under conditions specified by the act. The agreement would guarantee the association the right to negotiate formally with the administration, the benefits of arbitration and conciliation, the right to strike and protection from organizing attempts from outside unions.

Over 400 people have joined the YUSA so far and all of them have signed cards in support of the association as the sole bargaining agent for the support staff.

However, the university administration may challenge the YUSA over who is eligible to join the association. The university says the number 922 was given to the association in response to a question and it did not mean that the university was committed to that number.

At present no senior managerial person may join the association nor may employees with access to confidential information.

The difficulty arises over administrative assistants. Some assistants say they have no managerial responsibilities and so can legally belong to the association.

New universities council ignores students, faculty, labour

Ontario minister of colleges and universities James Auld yesterday ignored nominations of provincial student, faculty and labor organizations in appointing 19 members to the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA).

The two student members—Mary Bush, a Guelph graduate student and William Goyen, a Lakehead undergraduate—were not nominated by the Ontario Federation of Students. The four OFS nominees were spurned by the government.

OFS fieldworkers Jack Kushnier said yesterday OFS would protest the appointments. "We want people, he said, "who have some responsibility to the people they represent.

How can they speak for students when they haven't had any contact with student unions?"

OFS has contacted student unions at the two campuses and neither had any knowledge of the student appointees.

Kushnier said it is apparent the students have been "handpicked. It appears to us they have been going after people rather than accepting nominations."

OCUA, a body constituted by the provincial government, is designed to act as a buffer between government and universities, with prime responsibility for allocating funds to universities.

U of T SAC president Seymour Kanowitch said yesterday it's "fairly obvious Auld doesn't want to recognize OFS as the official student representative body."

Graham Murray, a spokesman for the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations (OCUFA) also criticized the composition of the new council.

"We deplore the ludicrous under-representation of working academics," Murray said.

OCUFA's nominations were also ignored in the naming of the council. Murray pointed out there was only one full-time working academic, Paul Fleck, a Western English professor. All the rest are administrators.

However he said OCUFA was "happy to acknowledge the importance of having members from outside the university."

A ministry spokesman said members of the council were not appointed to represent any constituency, but to "take over a broad overview of university education in the province and listen to various factions."

The ministry spokesman was vague on the criteria used in making the selections, saying the objective was to create a council with a broad range of points of view.

However only one labor representative is on the council—steelworker Alex McCallion—and he was not nominated by the Ontario Federation of Labor.

The council is weighted heavily towards university administrators and businessmen. Ronald Ritchie, former senior vice-president of Imperial Oil and now top aid to Conservative leader Robert Stanfield, is among the prominent appointees.

He is joined by John Deutsch, former principal of Queen's University and chairman of the Economic Council of Canada. Included in the corporate contingent are Peter Riggan, vice-president of Noranda Mines; John Yarnell, vice-president of Canadian Arctic Gas and James Fisher, a management consultant.

The chairperson of the predecessor of OCUA, the Committee of University Affairs, Riva Geerstein, has also been appointed, and according to OFS she is the most progressive of a "very conservative" committee.

The other appointments include a director of education, a retired bishop and several university administrators.

The council is an advisory body, making recommendations to the ministry of colleges and universities regarding all aspects of university education in Ontario. The new council will begin operating soon, and chairman Stephan Dupre has already started soliciting briefs for autumn hearings.

Kushnier said not much can be expected from the new council. "It looks like it will be pretty ineffectual. There isn't a broad spectrum of the community represented."

He charged that the people chosen were appointed because they were not likely to oppose government cutbacks in educational spending.

Student reps meet this weekend

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) will hold a two-day conference this weekend at Laurentian University to discuss student awards, housing and licensing of student pubs.

OFS is an association of the students' councils of member colleges and universities.

It is funded by a levy from student fees which was increased from 40 cents per student to $1.50 this year.

Delegates at the weekend conference are expected to call for an increase in OSAP's $32 a month room-and-board allowance which college and universities minister James Auld has already admitted is inadequate. The need for official student representation on the advisory committee to OSAP will also be discussed.

In response to the student housing crisis, the conference will discuss calling for suspension of the freeze on student residence construction. Delegates will also seek an investigation of landlord's discrimination against students and an examination of the need for residences at community colleges.

Conference delegates will challenge the Liquor Licensing Board of Ontario (LLBO) policy on granting liquor licences. As a result of recent amendments to legislation, the board has interpreted that only the university administration can hold licences.

All decisions of the delegates will be ratified in a plenary session Sunday.

OFS hopes eventually to include all post-secondary institutions to improve the student's position in Ontario. The federation feels only through province-wide organization can they deal effectively with the government.

At present, the federation represents all provincial universities except Sir Wilfrid Laurier, McMaster, Ottawa and Laurentian.

OFS, research director Karolyn Kendrick notes "Over the years there has been such an erosion of student support it's time to react to influence the government directly."

OFS which publishes the monthly paper The Ontario Student, has achieved success in helping to organize the 1972 fee strike and pressure the government to hold the line on tuition increases.

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The U of T Alumni Association (UTAA) unexpectedly voted Tuesday night to support equal representation of students and faculty members on Governing Council.

The UTAA motion will be part of a brief to be submitted before Oct. 1 to the Governing Council for their Oct. 17 debate on restructuring the council.

The 40 directorate members of the Alumni members support parity

UTAA passed the pro-parity motion by a wide majority after first defeating an amendment to the motion which called for "greater" but not "equal" representation.

The eight-member UTAA executive first had to pass the motion in their Sept. 2 meeting before it came before the directorate.

The UTAA directorate members represent 28 university constituencies which contain over 180,000 alumni.

Observers were cautious on the effect the UTAA decision might have on Governing Council—the university's top governing body.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch said the decision should "have some influence on Governing Council. It shows a certain amount of sympathy exists for parity that extends beyond students."

The campus' two largest student councils—SAC and the Graduates' Student Union—has already submitted a brief to the council supporting student-faculty parity representation on Governing Council. The combined brief calls for both faculty and students to be each represented by 14 members on a 62 member body.

"I don't think the faculty will like it," Kanowitch said. "This is the first time there has been any real resistance against the faculty.

"They felt that the faculty had to stop getting so picky over parity, that it was no great danger," Kanowitch said. "The directorate just decided to face up to it."

When asked what effect the motion would have on Governing Council, UTAA vice-president Harry Riva answered, "Probably none."

But Riva agreed with Kanowitch that the decision showed the UTAA was behaving differently than it had in the past.

"Usually," said Riva, "alumni sit back and take the path of least resistance. This time they didn't... although I can't really tell you why."

"It's a reflection of the new attitude of the directorate—that they should take more decided stands on issues in the university," Kanowitch said.

Traditionally the UTAA directorate has mediated on contentious issues between faculty and students rather than taking a stand.

Although the UTAA directorate decision may not influence either the eight students or 12 faculty on the 50-member Governing Council, its decision may just sway the eight alumni and 16 government appointees when parity comes up for debate next month.

McMaster demands cop quit

The students' council at McMaster University in Hamilton has demanded the dismissal of the university's security chief following students' charges that university police are over-reacting to minor student disorders.

McMaster's Student Representative Assembly (SRA) voted unanimously this week for the dismissal of Ronald Peterson, a former member of the RCMP, following assault charges by two University of Guelph students in August.

The students allege they were assaulted by two campus officers after one of them, carrying a bottle of beer, was chased and tackled by an officer who then handcuffed and took him to the security car. The student maintains the security officer then smashed his head on the trunk of the car and punched him in the face.

The students involved have also been charged in the case.

Although the university has refused SRA's request that the two officers be suspended until the case is resolved, Peterson has assigned the officers to clerical duties.

SRA also called for a seven-member board to supervise the campus security force.

McMaster students have criticized the university's 24 campus policemen for several years for being overly harsh in enforcing regulations like minor liquor violations, which other campus forces usually ignore.

Native Caravan hits Toronto today

The Native Peoples Caravan arrives in Toronto today on its way to Ottawa, following a cross-country sweep which began in Vancouver and passed through Calgary, Edmonton, Regina, Winnipeg and Kenora.

The caravan is a road tour comprising hundreds of native peoples in cars, buses and anything else that moves. The size of the caravan increases as more people join it moving eastward.

The caravan, according to Louis Cameron, one of the leaders, is intended to generate a "united outlook" among native peoples, to fight the "divide and isolate" tactics which the federal government has used against the native peoples movement.

In an interview, Cameron said he also intends the caravan to be a "signal of distress" about the plight of native peoples, and hopes students, labor unions and other non-native peoples will "join the struggle."

Rather than accept piecemeal settlements from the federal government, the caravan intends to converge on Parliament Hill Sunday—the day before the opening of parliament—to present a "show of unity" to the government and a list of absolute and immediate demands to Indian Affairs Minister Judd Buchanan.

Buchanan has said he will not negotiate with anyone carrying a gun, but Cameron stresses the caravan is "absolutely non-violent."

The absolute demands to be presented include termination of the Indian Act, an investigation of the department of Indian affairs and a recognition of treaty rights and native peoples' occupancy rights.

The immediate demands include emergency measures in the fields of health, housing, job opportunities and education.

Cameron warns the demands to the government are "absolutely non-negotiable" and the government will have a "clear message" this weekend of how firm the native peoples' movement is in its resolve.

"There should be no ambiguity after this weekend" Cameron said. "The battleground will be set", he added, referring to the areas of disagreement.

Cameron predicted increasing militancy among native peoples should the federal government fail to respond adequately to the demands.

The caravan will hold a meeting 8 p.m. tomorrow at Harbord Collegiate Institute to explain its program and gather supporters.

Funeral services proceed at the Varg

Funeral services will be held 1 p.m. today for former Varsity reporter, Kanut Cope, who mortally wounded himself with a loaded stapler Tuesday.

By request of the family, the flag-draped coffin will be cast over the side of the fire escape in the rear of

The Varsity's offices at 91 St. George St.

After this dreary task, staff members will discuss news coverage, new design for The Varsity and basketball strategy for tonight's game.

All new or ancient Varsity writers are welcome to attend.

Spokesman Louis Cameron hopes the caravan will unite native peoples.

Tenure crucial for students

If there is anything that annoys a student during his or her career at university, it is sitting in a class with a lousy lecturer and feeling totally powerless to do anything about it.

Very few people who have been students here have not had to go through this humiliating and degrading experience. There you sit, knowing you need the course as a credit, knowing the professor is a dismal failure as a teacher, but also knowing he or she is the only person deemed "qualified" to teach the course.

What can you do? You can't very well drop the course, or ask for a change in professor, or change your career, merely because a bad teacher comes your way.

But it happens. A good teacher is an aid, a bad teacher an obstacle. Why should there be obstacles, given the price you are paying for your education and the importance you attach to it?

Does the university really think so little of you that it would make you suffer through a bad teacher, in effect deliberately giving you a bad education.

The least you can do is attempt to have a say in choosing what kind of professors are hired at the university — and what kind of teachers they are likely to be.

And the only way to do that is to have representation on committees which make those decisions — hiring and tenure committees.

Most departments in the university have committees whose sole purpose is to make decisions in the areas of hiring, firing and the granting of tenure — tenure being a guarantee of permanent employment, ostensibly to ensure that the person granted tenure can undertake 'free enquiry'.

However, in practice tenure has come to mean the domination of staffing decisions by a small, conservative clique who will only admit like-minded people.

Ironically, the concept of tenure has worked against the idea of free enquiry. Young, imaginative professors who are not afraid to speak out against their peers — the very ones to whom the concept of tenure should apply — often find themselves ostracized, if not ousted, from their departments.

The only way to gain tenure — supposedly the freedom to enquire freely — may be to admit conformity.

And to admit conformity, to be accepted into the community of the tenured, is to cast yourself as a 'scholar', rather than a 'teacher'. Those tenure aspirants who placed higher emphasis on teaching than on research often found themselves ostracized, not worthy of tenure since they were not highly qualified 'scholars'.

Such a view of the relative importance of qualifications is narrow-minded and self-serving. It implies that the only responsibility the professor has is to his profession. Quite the contrary is true. Professors have an equal, if not greater, responsibility to society than anyone else, given their highly paid and less than onerous jobs, and their duties as imparters of knowledge.

At present, all decisions about tenure — who should get it, and when they should get it — are made by all-faculty committees. With the exception of two departments — sociology and architecture — students do not have any significant representation in decisions about who should teach them.

Last year, a presidential task force on "policy and procedures on academic appointments," the Forster report, reviewed the question of tenure, and specifically the questions of composition of tenure committees, and criteria for granting tenure.

The report admitted three criteria for deciding tenure: "achievement in research, effectiveness in teaching and clear promise of future intellectual and professional development."

However, it did not deem those most able to judge teaching ability — students — worthy of sitting on tenure committees, claiming it could not find a means to select them.

Beginning last Thursday, and again next Thursday, the academic affairs committee of the Governing Council will discuss the composition of tenure committees, based on the recommendations of the Forster report.

For students concerned about the quality of the teaching they receive, the decisions this committee reaches will be crucial.

Only by granting equal representation between students and faculty on tenure committees will the university acknowledge that it respects its students, that it is willing to consider teaching as a serious priority.

It is not sufficient for faculty members to humbly intone "of course we take teaching seriously": they probably do. But they don't take teaching anywhere near as seriously as students would like them to.

If they do take teaching so seriously, why are there so many bad teachers cluttering up our classrooms? If teaching is given equal weight with research in tenure, why are people whose strength is teaching so consistently denied tenure?

At present, the academic affairs committee shows little inclination to accept the student position, that there must be equal representation between students and faculty to ensure teaching ability gets proper priority.

Nor is the Governing Council, which must approve the recommendation of the academic affairs committee, likely to be any more receptive to the idea. (Only eight of the 50 Governing Council members are students.)

To ensure the students' viewpoint gets proper consideration, students should demonstrate their concern by attending the next meeting of the academic affairs committee, next Thursday at 4 pm in the Governing Council chambers of Simcoe Hall.

At the meeting, SAC president Seymour Kanowitch will present the student position, while the position of the faculty association will also be made known. It should be interesting.

The question that will be decided shortly, on the composition of tenure committees, is a vitally important one for any student who feels the teaching he is receiving is less than it should be.

It is crucial for students to demonstrate their concern, by attending the meeting next Thursday. By failing to show their support for the student position, students could lose a chance to improve significantly the quality of their education, a chance that may not come again for a long time.

I may look pretty funny in this suit, but you won't think so when you find out I'm your Anthro. 100 prof. Don't you think you should have been consulted in the decision to hire me? Well, the role of students on tenure committees is being determined by THE ACADEMIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE at 40'LOCK in THE GOVERNING COUNCIL CHAMBER SIMCOE HALL Thursday OCT. 3 ATTEND!

ENGLAND IN CRISIS

Philip West. Alternative News Service International. London

This is London. Britain is on the brink of economic collapse — the end of democracy is imminent.

The general strike begins Tuesday, Harrods bombed Wednesday, tanks in Westminster Thursday, the queen deposed to Balmoral by late editions Friday. For the six million readers of the News of the World Sunday, a special feature on life after the Apocalypse with the usual abundance of ladies half undressed in bearskins rather than bikinis.

In Fleet Street, the collapse of civilization as the British know it can command countless pages, and only the liberal Guardian with its slogan "where there's still some sanity left" dares to poke fun with a Plan Your Favorite Coup column.

Elsewhere the headlines vary between "Could we have a military takeover in Britain" from the Daily Express to an article in The Times headed "How inflation threatens British democracy with its last chance before extinction." Strong stuff indeed, but it may not be so unreal!

Politicians uniformly agree that Britain is facing its "gravest economic crisis" since the Second World War.

Inflation

Inflation is running at more than 17 percent, and is expected to climb to 20 percent next year; the trade deficit will probably total $10 billion this year; bankruptcies have increased, unemployment may jump to one million within months — only the stock market is falling, in a slump equalling that in 1929.

"We're heading straight for a depression," says one merchant banker. "When?" Well, we live in an exponential world, where everything happens faster than you think, so, whenever you say, it'll be sooner."

All this promises the British people a long winter of discontent, with the workers bearing the brunt. The Labour government has so far led a charmed existence with the unions, flaunting a rather vague "social contract" to avoid inflationary pay claims.

Whether it is a Labour or a Conservative victory in the upcoming election, that "contract" is likely to collapse with demands for massive pay raises. The only alternative for any government would be to reintroduce severe pay controls.

Armed Rebellion

What happens then is a hazardous guess, but a point somewhere between a general strike and armed rebellion is not, according to those in the city, an unfounded possibility. "I happen to think," one British company director is quoted as saying, "that, before I die, I shall be out there hiding in the fields. We shall slip slowly towards Marxism without a revolution, or it could be a direct confrontation and we could be there very quickly. Then the question would be, would the Army step in? If not, we'd be lost."

Such reactions to the current situation from the British establishment have not escaped the royalists and other assorted reactionaries left over from the empire. Many have started breathing phrases like "save Britain" and "saving the crown"; there are numerous indications that some army officers, active and retired, are seriously considering intervention in any politically stalemated government — a most likely outcome.

Army's Reaction

The Investors Review has reported that one top general apparently took three months leave of absence "to write a manual on how, and in what circumstances, the army would take over." And brigadier Frank Kitson, in his book "Low Intensity Operations" says "already there are indications that such a situation could arise . . ."

"If a genuine and serious grievance arose, such as might result from a significant drop in the standard of living, all those who now dissipate their protest over a wide variety of causes might concentrate their efforts and produce a situation which was beyond the power of the police to handle. Should this happen the army would be required to restore the situation rapidly. Fumbling at this juncture might have grave consequences, even to the extent of undermining confidence in the whole system of government."

Kitson should not be easily discounted. His book rated a foreword by chief of the general staff, general Sir Michael Carver, who was regarded by ex-Prime Minister Heath as the man to keep the country running during any disruption. In the foreword, Carver described the book as "written for the soldier of today to help him prepare for the operations of tomorrow."

Army Coup Easy

Another brigadier, Kenneth Hunt, of the Institute of Strategic Studies, believes it would be comparatively easy to accomplish the first stage of a coup in Britain.

"There are enough men and equipment within range of London. There are the troops used at Heathrow, with the help of a few tanks from Tidworth: that's enough to go straight to the BBC, Downing (home of the PM), and parliament."

Hunt's mention of the troops at Heathrow is particularly relevant to any discussion of a British coup d'etat. The joint exercise of troops and police at the airport was originally staged under the Conservative government in reaction to a wrongful report that Arab terrorists had stolen a missile from NATO. Since then the exercise, complete with deployment of tanks, has been repeated on a number of occasions, and it was Kitson who suggested that it should be extended to the docks, railways and coal mines.

A series of other notable army exercises have been reported. One in Corby, Nottinghamshire, by members of the Fifth Royal Anglican Regiment, was part of a war game between two rival factions in "aid of the civilian power."

Army Exercises

Another exercise in Hull had 30 soldiers in full battle regalia descending on a deserted suburban house. Later the Conservative minister of Defence explained that there was nothing sinister. "Considering internal security is a normal part of a soldier's training. In any war situation one has to look after things until the civil authority can assert itself. That is what the exercise was all about, and they are going on all the time."

One massive exercise in civilian control that has been going on all the time is in Northern Ireland. It was from there that brigadier Kitson announced, in 1971, that the army and other forces would be ready to take on the workers in Britain within two years. But in his book he found one fault with the "professionals", as the modern British army is called.

Kitson wrote of the need to maintain specialist units within the army to enable essential civil services to be maintained in the event of civilians being unable or unwilling to maintain them. The army's lack of specialists was graphically illustrated during the Ulster workers' strike of May this year, when after 13 days the army occupied 21 petrol stations but was unable to operate electrical, gas, water and sewage installations.

Paramilitary Organizations

It is into this breach that two old soldiers of impeccable qualification have lately marched with plans for organizations to replace workers during a general strike.

Most impressive is Colonel David Stirling, founder of the Special Air Services during the Second World War in North Africa. He earned himself the nickname "the phantom major" and the DSO before imprisonment in Colditz.

After the war, he was involved in the Capricorn Africa society, an unsuccessful attempt to maintain a white presence in the east and centre of the continent by allying with any Uncle Toms that could be found; he helped Yemeni terrorists against the Russians; established a commercial organization to provide Third World heads of state with bodyguards and intelligence agents, and in 1970, was involved in a scheme to release several score of Libyan political prisoners from the main jail in Tripoli.

Now backed by British arms dealers and millionaire Geof-fray Edwards and interested industrialists, Stirling has plans for a volunteer organization that will "round up" militant unionists and jump across picket lines by helicopter to maintain production at the strikebound installations. The operating schedule for "Great Britain 75" plans to have volunteers undergoing initial training by mid-October for effective use by November.

"I do think Britain is heading for real disaster," he says. "The communists are out of the woodwork after all these years and they have declared themselves. It is not our aim to bash the unions but simply to protect the country from the worst effects of chaos caused by politically motivated actions. And that's what this country faces — chaos — if the militant revolutionary trade unionists have their way."

Mr. Daniels is convinced that "the forces of international communism" have infiltrated the political parties, and are behind industrial strikes and the erosion of democracy in Britain. He identified pornography, permissiveness, and a "frenzy of sex" as the evils of today, and warned: "If the country does go bankrupt, there will be murder, rape, looting."

"I believe it is an act of God that people like General Walker have come forward now," he says. "We have so much to be proud of, but our backs are to the wall, and here, out of the blue, another Churchill has emerged."

Even Stirling described him as undesirably military, even someone to be mistrusted, but his campaign did interest former Corporal Paul Daniels, founder, organizer and commander-in-chief of the 1,400 men in the British Military Volunteer Forces.

General Walker is conducting his campaign for a part-time militia of volunteers from his home in Somerset. He expects three million to join 'Civil Assistance' which, he says, would "act only if there was a collapse of essential services and of the means of sustenance and only in the event of a breakdown of law and order, in which they would be available to provide backup services."

He is confident that the workers who show "unswerving allegiance and loyalty to the crown" will flock to him. "As a soldier I have been on industrial tours . . . I went down a coal mine, round a steel thing and in all sorts of factories. The chaps working there are exactly the same chaps as the ones I have been commanding."

It is easier to dismiss the general as a colonel "blimp" (after the character created by cartoonist Low) especially after descriptions of his orderly life appeared. He spoke of walking with his dogs until they were hanging from their chin straps, and of taking his whisky "punctually at seven because the sun always goes down punctually in the far east."

Pornography and Communism

Even Stirling described him as undesirably military, even someone to be mistrusted, but his campaign did interest former Corporal Paul Daniels, founder, organizer and commander-in-chief of the 1,400 men in the British Military Volunteer Forces.

Tenure decision in Math dept. sparked occupation

Students protesting dismissal of popular professors occupied math dept.

Most staffing decisions at U of T are made quietly without student input and without controversy, but this was not the case in March, 1973 when the denial of tenure to two popular mathematics professors sparked an 11-day occupation of department offices.

The two professors, Michael Mather and David Spring, as well as fired part-time instructor Stephen Salaff, are no longer teaching at U of T despite appeals and despite student support.

The movement for reform in the math department in 1972-3 focused on demands for retaining the three popular teachers as well as improvements in service courses and changes in grading policy.

Petitions were circulated starting in the fall when students learned Spring had been denied tenure and Salaff would not be rehired.

Approaches to chairman George Duff were futile and students with course union support carried on a large petition campaign which garnered over 1,000 signatures in the department.

After a number of abortive meetings at which Duff refused to respond to student demands, students occupied the departmental offices focusing attention on their demands for changes in the department and the retention of the three professors.

But despite attention focused on student demands for change, the math department and university administrators stood firm. The professors were told to go through regular appeal channels and advisory committees were set up to deal with other grievances.

The occupation ended without any concrete successes and the three highly-rated professors were left to launch individual appeals. The appeals, like the original decisions, would be dealt with in secret without student involvement.

All three had received good course evaluations and Salaf was an especially popular instructor of first-year math. Two factors combined, however, to end their careers at U of T.

For Mather and Spring it was a lack of scholarly publication that was the chief cause. Not living up to the "publish or perish" mentality, Mather was advised that his research lacked the "academic excellence" to merit tenure.

Similarly Spring was told his denial of tenure was because of the "limited extent" and "small volume" of published work.

For Salaff the dismissal was largely a result of departmental politics. He had fought with other professors on behalf of students who wanted changes in the marking scheme of several courses he taught.

In all three cases appeals turned out to be fruitless. Spring was first advised he could appeal the denial, but later in the summer of 1973 Evans informed him there would be no appeal because he had submitted his resignation and it would be a "dangerous precedent."

Mather was granted an appeal but a special review committee denied him redress because he was "competent but not outstanding in teaching and research."

Salaff has pursued a long unsuccessful attempt to get an open hearing into his firing. He has attempted to get a teaching appointment at Woodsworth College but failed because of the lack of departmental recommendation.

Salaff's long correspondence with Evans has not yielded any concessions yet.

Liberation group appeals for help

By JACKIE GREATBATCH

Edward Ndlovu, national secretary of the Zimbabwe National Peoples' Movement (ZAPU), appealed Wednesday evening to Canadians to support its liberation movement.

Ndlovu spoke to a crowd of 100 at St. Paul's United Church about recent events in his country, more commonly known as Rhodesia.

Last spring's coup in Portugal and the resulting liberation of Portuguese African colonies has had a great effect on Zimbabwe. "Events are moving very fast, faster than we can determine," Ndlovu said.

With the eventual liberation of Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique and Angola, Rhodesia and South Africa will be the only two white minority regimes in southern Africa, and since the coup, the struggle for liberation in Zimbabwe has intensified, Ndlovu said.

Rhodesia Prime Minister Ian Smith, whose government is illegal in the eyes of ZAPU and its supporters, unleashed a wave of violence shortly after the coup, including mass arrests and entire African villages being turned into concentration camps.

One of the main tactics of Smith's soldiers is to confiscate the property of these formerly independent villages, destroying their way of life and thereby forcing the villagers to depend on the soldiers for food and supplies, Ndlovu said.

In this way the soldiers can operate through the people "like a fish in water," Ndlovu noted. If they did not do so, they would die, "like a fish out of water," Ndlovu said.

While two allied liberation movements — Frelimo in Mozambique and PIGC in Guinea-Bissau — have recently achieved victory, Ndlovu didn't make any predictions about his own country, Zimbabwe.

The situation is different there than in the Portuguese colonies, he emphasized. While the interior of Mozambique, for instance, was never colonized, Zimbabwe is totally controlled.

"Every inch of land is owned," he said. Tracts of unused wilderness are claimed by the Smith regime to be owned by absentee landlords. Such areas are patrolled frequently. Any unused farms have been turned into bases for the soldiers.

The Africans themselves have been shifted onto "centralized reserves," living under constant surveillance by the Rhodesian soldiers and making it impossible for ZAPU guerillas to liberate any land from Rhodesian control.

Ndlovu described the Zimbabwe liberation fighters as semi-guerillas. ZAPU is presently launching an all-out offensive throughout the country.

Rhodesia's dependence on South Africa is well known and includes not only monetary and military aid, but also soldiers who fight alongside those of the Smith regime. Both countries formerly collaborated with neighboring Mozambique, a resource-rich nation.

The future strength of Smith's regime depends on the success or failure of attempts by both countries to woo Mozambique's new government into cooperation.

Canadian aid to the Zimbabwe African Peoples' Movement would provide crucial support in the intensified struggle, Ndlovu said.

The Rainbow comes and goes,
And lovely is the Rose,
The Moon doth with delight
Look round her when the heavens are bare,
Waters on a starry night
Are beautiful and fair;
The sunshine is a glorious birth;
But yet I know, where'er I go,
That there hath past away a glory from the earth.

Whither is fled the visionary gleam?
Where is it now, the glory and the dream?

The Only Dance There Is Rom Dass
Anchor Books

When Tim O'Leary was dismissed from Harvard for his strange experiments, his friend and co-worker Richard Alpert left as well. But whereas Timothy became a guru and proclaimed the Politics of Ecstasy, Alpert went to learn from a guru. After a period in India, he emerged, renamed Ram Dass.

Do not mistake me, gentle reader, I have no avuncular nor proprietary interest in pop religions. I abhor soft-headed out-of-focus mysticism as much as any hard-bitten Lutheran. I truly detest being cornered by cloaked crusaders who try to convert me into a mental mushed banana between green lights. But unlike street conversion artists, or what's-his-name, the author of Jonathan Livingston Seagull, Ram Dass has the vocabulary and the experience to make himself understood.

The Only Dance There Is not really a book: it is a transcription of two long talks Ram Dass delivered in 1970 and 1972 to former associates. He reads like he talks; and just like any tripper he is at times circular, alienated and paradoxical. But the author's sense of humour is obvious, and his awareness of the peculiar situation he is in — delivering a talk to a flock of psychologists, all watching one another, and collectively convinced that their key-note speaker is a confirmed schizophrenic — gives the book most of its bite. The wry perspective on the life of Richard Alpert both entertains the reader and gives some potency to Ram Dass' theory of personalities.

The meat of the book is an exposition of the errors in which Western man finds himself due to his attachment to motivational psychology. Ram Dass challenges the belief that desires define the personality, and that fulfillment for the individual comes through fulfillment of desire. Instead, he espouses a theory of 'melodrama,' his double-edged word to describe the mental discomfort of the merely semi-reflective man. 'Melodrama' is the pain of falsity we feel when a moment comes too easily even though it has been willed into significance. It is the time when we are aware of discrepancies between our real and our ideal conduct, when we are struck by the mechanical nature of our responses to events. But unlike most of us, Ram Dass has no objection to feeling that he is standing beside himself. For him, there are no emotional tangles caused by the self observing the self. There is no need to be over-serious about the roles assigned in the dance. Life is process, and its own purpose; save that a greater purpose is that time when all things can be cleared away and all dualism resolved into a unity no longer conscious of itself.

Ram Dass draws on his highly technical training to provide himself with words to describe this error of 'attachment', the folly of unreflective man. He can move with great ease from Hindu mythology to a parable of Christ's, and use both the language of mysticism and that of behaviouristic psychology in order to create an all-encompassing unity of analogy that will comprehend, or rather, apprehend, the nature of all things.

The Varsity — Gernot Wieland

Any secretist will revel in a book that so gleefully relates one religious experience to another, and that can so unflinchingly adopt the notion of the dual sacred profane time described by Mircea Eliade. But anyone who accepts as fundamental that distinction between active and passive selves will have cause for thought: is there really any need to cosset one's desires?

This book-length exposition of the non-expression of personality could easily be seen as the inchoate babblings of the lysergic forebrain, but it would be fairer to our author to credit him with an attempt to deliberately separate himself from personality. The act of publishing a book may still be a subtle way of asserting same, but Ram Dass mentions that danger in passing.

The Only Dance There Is seems strangely out of date. All our optimists have disappeared. And the East-meets-West vogue is out, passe, ancient history; Ram Dass as Mr. Natural, just another R. Crumb sub-plot. The publication of the book is hardly an important event; no literary schrapnel has flown.

And yet the book engages the reader who undertakes to wade in. You've got to admire Ram Dass. His sense of balance among absurdities results in a wholesome and intelligent good humour. The calm of his philosophical inquiry is highlighted by his wide-ranging, perceptive anecdotes. He even succeeds with that excruciatingly forbidden delight, religious humour. It is not an easy book to take seriously; it reads like a high-flying talker at work; it is difficult to make it blossom within one's own mind. But you might find it a worthwhile companion to Swedenborg, Blake, Yeats; for it seems that Ram Dass finds his purpose in the only dance there is just as they found theirs: in recording it.

Music biographies of two of the best: Casals and Duke

Pablo Casals
H.L. Kirk
Holt, Rinehart, Winston

Music is My Mistress
Duke Ellington
Doubleday

To mention the late Spanish cellist Pablo Casals and the great American bandleader, composer and arranger Edward Kennedy ("Duke") Ellington in one sentence, let alone a whole review, might seem a little odd; but underneath the differences in their lives and work, there are certain similarities.

Pablo Casals took the cello from the position of orchestral harmony-filler to one of equality with the piano and the violin as a solo vehicle. True, the many concertos, suites and sonatas he popularized were written for soloists on the instrument long before he lived, but more often than not, they were curiosities. From humble beginning to world-wide fame, he fought with a single-minded purpose for humanity and compassion. After Franco's take-over, he vowed never to return to his homeland again. He even refused to play in public anywhere for many years in a silent protest against dictatorship.

What can be said against a man who was a great musician, conductor, composer, who played for Queen Victoria and John Kennedy, who taught and inspired and thrilled millions with his recordings? All that really needs telling is the story of his long life: over 90 years of music.

H.L. Kirk's new biography of Casals is a monumental book, the only possible type of biography for such a man. For scholars of the cellist who was often called "the musician of the century", there are bibliographies, discographies and source-listings galore. For ordinary fans of music, there is admirably clear writing and tremendous detail. Alas, there is also a great thumping price tag: $17.95. If this is a little steep, check the library.

A book just as admirable, but in a completely different vein is Music is My Mistress, the autobiography of Duke Ellington. Ellington was also a musical pioneer. He stopped calling the sounds produced by his top-notch orchestra "jazz" because the name just didn't suit it any more. It was just an extension of Duke, exciting and warm and very, very marvelous.

Almost a series of short reminiscences, the book details how Duke saw his orchestra: as a unique instrument, unparalleled in musical history. What keyboard instrument had the capabilities of a Johnny Hodges, or a Cootie Williams, or a Harry Carney? Duke didn't just write for "trumpet" — he wrote for a particular trumpet player, because each of his men had a different sound. Duke always paid his men top salaries, and as a result kept almost the same band together from the 'thirties until the day he died.

Music is My Mistress is also an expensive book, $15 being the damage here. But it's a beautifully produced book, full of pictures, and wise words from Duke and his friends. Although the world was a little slower to honour him than it was for Casals (not because of his colour, but because jazz wasn't "respectable" enough. (Stupid shifts.) Duke's elegance, wit, urbanity, kindness, generosity and humanity all live on in his writing, both for the eye and the ear. The true jazz fan won't want to miss this book, price tag or not.

So there we are. Casals and Duke... I don't know what each thought of the other, but in the eyes of the musical world, the ultimate judgement must be the same for both: they were the very best of their kind, brilliant and sane and compassionate artists, who put the lie to decades of pessimism and hatred, men whose lives should have been doubled or tripled for the good of us all.

Indian's biography: wise and whimsical

No Foreign Land
Wilfred Pelletier and Ted Poole
Pantheon Books

"I know quite a few adults who have an enduring hatred for school", Wilfred Pelletier remarks in No Foreign Land, "and I think that's because school made them feel dumb. I escaped that because I wasn't able to fake it seriously." That is Pelletier's charm. He has insight akin to our keenest social critics, but he, perhaps uniquely, remains unscathed by it. He is at once wise and whimsical, deeply critical but deeply peaceful too.

Wilfred Pelletier was born on Manitowlin Island, a place set aside by treaty for Indians of the Ontario region, though, as Pelletier notes, the whites got most of it eventually, one way or another. No Foreign Land is Pelletier's life story, from childhood on the reservation, through years as a gulde, a businessman and as a "professional Indian" and lobbyist. Ultimately even the last roles dissatisfied him, and Pelletier withdrew from the normal levers and structures of social change.

However, unlike most young Indians — Pelletier is a middle-aged Indian — his rejection of white politics has not led to confrontation but to repose. Instead of turning left, Pelletier turned back to the ways of getting things done he picked up as a kid on the reserve. He knows he cannot go home, as Indians in particular cannot, but it doesn't dishearten him. He is a romantic like Wordsworth, not like Rousseau. For Pelletier the native American wisdom is its own reward. He believes it will prevail in the end because it comes with the continent to which we have immigrated. Like the land it will outlast us.

Wilfred Pelletier himself says his book is not about Indians, but about his getting to know who he is. One is drawn by the writer's meandering, amiable, sensible style into regions that are distant, extraordinary, and deeply religious.

That you arrive there by such an easy route can be credited to Pelletier's collaborator, Ted Poole, a white-bearded man of no little wisdom and whimsy himself. Poole is the current to Pelletier's river.

Whether or not you are already familiar with native American culture, No Foreign Land remains rare and worthy reading: the biography of a peaceful man.

This year at Hart House Theatre

No, they're not expecting a tidal wave: they're just steeling themselves for another season of production of Peer Gynt last

Talking to theatre people is like talking to a large incestuous family.

Everyone has a snide comment for his brother yet continues working with him year after year. Exaggeration for effect is an occupational hazard even when the actors are off the stage, and the wise would take much of the gossip they relate with a grain of salt.

The Hart House Theatre family is no exception. Perhaps its situation is even worse. It is not only a theatre but a training ground for post-graduate drama students. As such, it is deeply entangled in the bureaucratic webs that make life — and reporting — at the U of T so frustrating but also so interesting.

This year Hart House is presenting four plays (which students can see for a $5.00 subscription). Five plays were to be presented originally but the presentation of the fifth is up in the air because of the death this summer of Robert Gill, the last of the great classical acting teachers at Hart House, who have collectively given so many great actors to the Canadian stage.

The Drama Centre

The Graduate Centre for the Study of Drama is a post-graduate school for research in theatre. It does not attempt to be an acting school, or try to teach students to be technicians. To get into the Centre, a student must have a B.A. with at least five courses in drama. An M.A. from the Centre is necessary for the PhD program.

Theatre, of course, cannot function in a totally academic environment. Students must be given some understanding of the practical limitations of theatre equipment, and the actors themselves. This is where the Studio Theatre (on Glen Morris St.) and Hart House Theatre supposedly come in.

Since one of the requirements for a graduate degree is participation of some kind in a play, students are encouraged to be 'gophers' (go for this, go for that) at both the Studio and Hart House.

Glen Morris Favoured

After gaining some experience a student can, if he wishes, work with the professionals at Hart House. But some prefer to stay at Glen Morris in senior positions. The space in this converted church can be altered from picture frame to theatre-in-the-round since there are no permanent seating or stage arrangements. To Glen Morris fans, all the fancy equipment and technical knowledge of Hart House cannot compensate for its proscenium stage (the traditional picture-frame concept of the theatre space).

Hart House people realize the limitations of their stage but change is prevented by the position of the theatre under the Hart House basketball courts.

The Hart House theatre functions with a combination of Drama Centre students, undergraduates, professors, extension students, alumni, and professionals from Equity and IATSE (International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees).

Heading the staff of full-time professionals is Michael Whitfield, the technical director. This is his first year at Hart House. He has just finished a summer with the Third Stage at Stratford, and has a PhD from Illinois in lighting design.

Whitfield runs technical seminars for the graduate students, in addition to working

An In-Joke

Martin Hunter, the supervisor of Hart House productions, is a professor at the Centre and usually directs two plays a year. Last year these were Leaven of Malice and Triolius and Cressida. The former suffered from being presented as an in-joke for the U of T community. The latter was the best show of the year. This year Hunter will direct James Reaney's The Killdeer and an adaptation of Aristophanes' The Frogs.

Anne Saddlemeier is the director of the Centre. Responsibility for quality and continuity rest on her shoulders. She works closely with the ad with student stage managers and crews at both theatres.

Barbara Stewart, Cressida in last year's Troilus and Cressida.

John Browne, David Gardner, in Marsh Hay from last spring.

Students interested in set and costume design can work closely in an apprentice-type situation with the two resident designers, Martha Mann and Marlon Walker.

Business matters and the box office are in the experienced hands of James Hozack: he has been at Hart House for twenty-five years. Publicity is managed by Barry O'Connor, a PhD student at the Centre. Barry has acted in past years and hopes to continue.

hoc committee (on which students have parity) which selects plays for each year. In choosing these plays, a number of criteria are taken into consideration. The scripts must be worthwhile. The final selection includes a Jacobean play and a Canadian play. Care is taken to select plays which provide a balance of small and large casts and a cross section of styles (Ibsen, Moliere, Shakespeare, Robertson Davies, have been presented in recent years). And, as Saddlemeier explained, "roles should stretch students, of plays at Hart House Theatre. (Actually they're the cast of the last year at the theatre.)

but not demand the impossible... Student directors and designers who work independently for Hart House are selected by Saddlemeier, since "it would be unfair to force students on a committee to judge their peers."

This Year

This year's selection of plays shows the "balance, integration, and communication," that work together to produce a successful year.

The Killdeer, by James Reaney, opening next Thursday, is the Canadian play. Tarragon theatre has presented other Reaney plays but never this one. In fact, it has never been seen in Toronto before.

Reed Needles, an undergraduate with ten years of experience in the theatre behind him (and he's only 23) has designed the set, a simple skeleton frame house which will rely on lighting for the final effect.

As Needles said, "this show should see the closest linking of mood to lighting." Complicated lighting sequences will be used to evoke Ontario country seasons, sunrises and sunsets.

The play itself concerns two young people trapped by circumstances imposed on them by their parents' complicated and sordid past.

John Ford's Tis Pity She's A Whore the Jacobean choice, will be presented in November. Jon Redfern, working on his PhD in theatre history, will direct.

The play is a close psychological study of Giovanni, a young Italian, who finds himself torn by reason of lust for his sister.

Hopefully this production, unlike the recent movie, will put the proper emphasis on the influence of religion and Giovanni's decision to face God's vengeance for his sin of incest.

The production uses a neutral set, which like the Killdeer, needs to be completed by lighting. But this production also uses colourful operatic style costumes which may not be historically accurate but which will heighten the play's mood.

Pool Play

Hart House's third show is one of the greatest comedies of all time — Aristophanes' Frogs. (Unlike the recent Yale production, there is no truth to the rumour that the play is going to be presented in the Hart House pool.)

Michael Macina (an MA graduate of the Centre) is working on the adaptation with Martin Hunter. They are going to inject modern concerns into the classical subject matter. The rewriting will continue through rehearsals, with the ten to fifteen actors working with an open script until the final rehearsals.

Jeff Cohen is writing original music for the adaptation; Bev Miller will be choreographing.

Brecht's adaptation of Shakespeare's Coriolanus will be directed by Wolfgang von Strass. A friend of Brecht's son, von Strass heads a noted university drama department in Germany, a department set up to teach his system of acting. He is coming over under the sponsorship of the Goethe Institute particularly to direct the production.

Brecht's version of Shakespeare has been seen only twice before, once in Turkey and once in South Africa. Von Strass refused to direct the South African production without an all-black cast.

Brecht greatly simplified the Shakespearean script, reducing the stature of Coriolanus, and cutting down the intricacies of plot. Barbarians outside Rome and workers within are threatening to destroy Rome. Coriolanus alone can save the city. But he refuses to cooperate with the workers.

After working in an apprentice position with props and costumes at the Centre, Eric Binnie has his own show to design this year. The basic problem is money; with a cast of 40, most of the budget must go for costumes. The set will be simple, depending on groups of actors to give visual variety.

Discussions are underway for an acted reading of Shaw's Back to Methuselah and his Saint Joan as a memorial service for Robert Gill. An abridged version of Back to Methuselah was to have been the fifth production, but that was before Gill died.

If the reading does take place, Herbert Whitaker, the Globe and Mail theatre reviewer, and a long-time amateur director, will direct. Wayne Fulks, a PhD student at the Centre, will be assistant director.

Auditions

Hart House holds open auditions twice a year. Glen Morris holds them before each production. All are well advertised.

The first two shows at Hart House are already in rehearsal, but the remaining two are still to be cast. Janet Clarke George Komorowski and Joan Calderara in Killdeer rehearsal. The play opens this Thursday night.

It has been a year since I saw Don Shebib's Between Friends but there is a moment in it that still rings clear as a bell. When Bonnie Bedelia finally admits her longing for her husband's buddy, she tells him, "I'd just like a man who could see through me. God knows, I'm not very complex." It may not survive in print, but everyone I know who saw the picture remembers the line. It is a plain one, dangerously plain, and it may even be a little wrong, but it was very moving and it stuck.

It comes to mind now because of The Hard Part Begins, a new Canadian film, and also because of the ad for the picture, one of the rare ones placed in the Varsity by movie companies. Between Friends had a poor, amateur campaign and that may be why it didn't draw. The Hard Part Begins has a very professional campaign with dignified type-faces, a lot of copy, press quotes (albeit from Toronto Calendar, Ghatalaine and Variety) and the layout style used for festival winners. "The critics are raving about the one Canadian film that says it all," the ad says, and (sic) "This is the one Canadian film you're going to tell your friends... 'Go see it!'"

Well, I'm not telling you that, in fact I would say the opposite: it is a mundane movie, poor by international standards and equally poor by Canadian standards. It is well-meaning but it fails because it doesn't have a single moment — not a shot, not an incident, not a line — that compares to Bedelia's in Between Friends, or to any other shots in that movie, or in Mon Oncle Antoine or in any other piece of movie art.

There is a zen koan that, before enlightenment there is a mountain, then there isn't, then there is again. I have never heard that put as a statement of aesthetics and I have never come across a rule that convincingly separates the mountain before from the mountain after. But there is something, some combination of meaning (and unmeaning), rhythm, sound and colour that powers a good line, that gives a great shot its extra shade of ambience, that allows an incident to resound through the additional seconds of a slow edit. Shots of faces are not enough; they have to be the right shots of the right faces. In a Hollywood because it allows plenty of space for brilliant writing and a brilliant company. Here it only amplifies the basic shortcoming: the writer, photographer and director have nothing fresh to say.

Nine times out of ten, when I dislike a movie it is because its makers have failed to invest the characters with as much dignity as they would give themselves were the movie an autobiography. This is not the problem with The Hard Part Begins. Donnelly Rhodes plays a country singer on the Ottawa valley circuit with the uprightness of a Moses, and with unrejoined sentiments like, "I can't live my life according to other people's expectations." He is a much more righteous guy than Rip Torn's mean Nashville star in Payday. But Rhodes has nothing to mouth but clichés, and he is surrounded by more clichés, faceless faces and arbitrary incidents. In Payday, the chauffeur gunsel and a groupie discuss how to cook an omelette. In The Hard Part Begins Rhodes and his band talk about how awful the eggs are in a greasy spoon. Payday's vignette was unlikely and chipper, The Hard Part's as bland and unenriching as drive-in breakfasts.

THIS IS THE ONE CANADIAN FILM YOU'RE GOING TO TELL YOUR FRIENDS. "GO SEE IT!"

The critics are raving about the one Canadian film that has it all:

The Hard Part Begins

THIS IS THE FIRST CANADIAN FILM THAT COULD BECOME THE NEXT AMERICAN 'TELEPER OF THE YEAR'

Ad is misleading, review says.

studio job, Bedelia would have said, "Can't you see, you big lunk I love you", or she would have rushed him wordlessly to a swell of violins. In The Hard Part Begins she would say, "Oh Jim, I wish I didn't, but I love you." It is not the phoney chintz of the Hollywood version, or of the independent movies envying Hollywood's success, but it is not art either. It has no line on the heart.

You can usually tell the aims of a movie-maker by the speed with which he changes scenes. Contemplative movies are not hits and a director out for the prize leaves as little time between punches as he can. That is why it is easy to feel contempt towards something like Peter Pearson's Paperback Hero and why it is hard not to sympathize with John Hunter and Paul Lynch for The Hard Part Begins. But I can't recall a film since Le Bonheur that has so studiously copied the right style and has so thoroughly missed the point. The Hard Part Begins has the episodic structure, open-ended incidents, oblique conversation, leisurely dissolves, but it is an empty house. Cinema verite works for Robert Altman

The comparison with Payday is inevitable, and it is unflattering. Though flawed, Daryl Duke's film had panache; Hunter and company have good intentions. It would be instructive to see both films in succession, particularly their opening scenes, which are, in fact, the same: the singer at work in a bar, shot in close-up. If an aesthetic law could be forged, these scenes could serve as evidence. I am convinced there is such a law because Payday and Between Friends and Mon Oncle Antoine are good and The Hard Part Begins is bad. But I also bet that the rule can't be articulated. At least, like McCabe, I'm not fool enough to try and write it down. If you can I would like to hear from you. Sincerely, But I have to come up short. bob bossin

Harry and Tonto: a man and his cat

Ultimately, the success or failure of a movie lies with the director. The big decisions are all his. It takes a competent man to produce a work of art.

Paul Mazursky (Bob and Carol and Ted and Alice, Blume in Love) has made all the right decisions in Harry and Tonto, which premieres tonight at the Hyland. The result is touching, funny, realistic, enjoyable.

The script, written by Mazursky and Josh Greenfeld, tells the story of a retired professor living in a rapidly deteriorating part of New York. When his apartment block is demolished, Harry and his ginger cat Tonto are forced into the world. What follows is a cross country search for a new home.

Art Carney has played many leads on Broadway. But this is a debut of sorts; Carney is like George C. Scott who has worked for years, but who has received recognition only recently. Carney will be getting plenty of that soon. He plays Harry with conviction and wit. We laugh and cry at his command, but never get the feeling of being manipulated.

Tonto, playing himself, is the epitome of the cat that walked by himself. With his catnip mouse and the bell on his collar, he becomes a cat archetype.

The supporting cast is brilliant. They cover American society in a nut shell — from macrobiotic dieters through hookers to aging swingers.

We also see the alternatives open to the old. The visit to the old age home, unlike many familiar shots of such scenes, is full of activity and sunlight. Yet no attempt is made to cover up the physical and psychological ravaging of time.

Tonto used to paint moods but it is never overused.

Michael Butler's photography catches the clichés and the fields as they are, and at times that is enough to satirize or characterize the particular episode that is developing.

Harry and Tonto is an energetic, optimistic film, presenting a challenging approach to living — instead of isolating himself through fear from the world around him, Harry faces his environment and his future with openness and respect.

Harry, played by Art Carney

Jerry Jeff Walker pleases

Any show that opens on time and begins with the ridiculous antics of Joe Mendelson has two plusses going for it. Add to it the musical presence of Jerry Jeff Walker and you've got a fine evening. And that was the story last Friday for SAC's Jerry Jeff Walker show.

Mendelson, garbed in a white institutional cloak spattered with blood, and wearing a white hard hat, carried the audience through a set of strangely comical numbers with titles like 'I want to be Your Microphone', and 'I Think I'm Losing My Marbles', his old Mainline tune. His music varied in volume from the almost inaudible to the uncomfortably distorted, but at all times it was used effectively in his Martin Mull-type act.

Walker, fronting a seven man band known as the Lost Gonza Band parlayed through recent tunes and older favourites with a spirited gusto. The band, which featured Walker on rhythm guitar, was entirely electric, and included two guitars, bass, organ, synthesizer, piano (acoustic), reed player, and drums. The reed player in particular was a nice feature, as he added a dimension that would otherwise be taken by the missing steel guitarist.

The band offered Walker a chance to give rather interesting arrangements to tunes like 'L.A. Freeway' and 'London Homesick Blues', two of his better tunes. However it added little to the song that made him famous, 'Mr. Bojangles'. Here a completely acoustic arrangement would have been

His voice throughout the concert was rather surprising for me at least, as with the exception of 'Bojangles', he employed it in a very low but deep range, somewhat reminiscent of a clear-throated Kris Kristofferson. The crowd was well pleased though with the set, and brought him back for a short encore that ended with a most dynamic rendition of 'Will The Circle Be Unbroken', a most fitting ending.

Luciano: an unexpected failure

A glance at the newspaper ads for Lucky Luciano would lead you to believe that it's just another run-of-the-mill gangster movie produced to meet the growing needs of the world's population of arm chair mobsters. But on days when the credits are given, a second glance reveals that the film stars Gian Maria Volonte and that it was directed by Francesco Rosi — none other, that is, cliches that auteur theorists will be calling heroic individualism and violent lyricism ten years from now. But while the characters are not stereo-typed gangster toughs, they never become fully dimensional. And the plot, though not a feature-length montage of various forms of anti-social behaviour, lacks depth and subtlety not to mention the organic self development of one event is, interestingly enough, in scenes which voice a distinctively anti-imperialist sentiment. The best of these moments has Vito Genovese, a Mafia chief who was a top adviser to the American army in Italy, talking to an American colonel who is currently sweeping across Italy with his divisions. The mobster, who has the colonel wrapped around his finger, listens to him talk about how he wants the Italian people to receive the benefits of the massive aid that the US is pouring into the country. It is Italy, 1944, and they are talking in a huge hall converted into an American officers' club where truckloads of Italian women, brought in to dance with American officers, are consuming cokes and Hershey bars and worrying that their boyfriends will kill them if they find out that they've been with the Americans again. The whole scene is beautifully played as a metaphor for the Americanization of Europe that was to occur under the Marshall plan.

But aside from these few scenes the film has little to recommend itself artistically. Even the acting, which you would expect to be great, is not so limited are the actors by the shallowness of their roles. As Luciano, Gian Maria Volonte does manage to look good but that's because he's Gian Maria Volonte. As Gian Giannini, Rod Steiger does even better but that's because he's Rod Steiger and knows how to speak English and hasn't had his English dialogue dubbed by someone using a Brooklyn accent. Edmond O'Brien is just a foil for Charlie Siragusa and Charlie Siragusa is played by the real life Charlie Siragusa who, somehow, still manages to be miscast in the role.

than the star and the director of The Mafiosi Affair: a brilliant movie about the head of the Italian state-owned petroleum corporation who died in a plane crash likely engineered by American oil interests or the Mafia or any combination thereof. As it turns out, however, Lucky Luciano is neither a spaghetti gangster movie nor a politically oriented art film.

Lucky Luciano really shouldn't be thought of as a gangster movie at all. The only thing it has in common with other gangster movies is its subject matter. It is played neither for violence nor for cheap thrills nor for the fascist creating another.

The film tries to follow certain events in the career of Lucky Luciano and, in so doing, to expose the wider political structure which enables and even encourages the Mafia to flourish. This political structure is revealed mainly through the continually frustrated efforts of the Bureau of Narcotics' Charlie Siragusa to nail Luciano. But Siragusa's scenes, such as the one in which he talks to his commissioner (played by Edmond O'Brien) are usually pitifully contrived to convey information. And Luciano's scenes, never properly interwoven with the ones in which Siragusa appears, contribute little to our knowledge of him.

We've heard of word-of-mouth, but this is ridiculous.

"HAROLD AND MAUDE", a nice little movie comedy that arrived without much fanfare, is starting its third year at the Westgate Theatre in Minneapolis. Third year, not third week.

What accounts for such a phenomenal success is hard to say. "HAROLD AND MAUDE" received good reviews, true, but it started slowly. And began to build. And build. And build. One person told another person and now "HAROLD AND MAUDE" has become a cult movie. One fan in Minneapolis has seen it 138 times. He is a "HAROLD AND MAUDE" freak, as are many people in Minneapolis and Detroit and Atlanta, wherever they tummy. Underneath about two people who love life and death equally plays.

Like "It'llly lack" and "Walking Tall", which were also discovered in the Midwest and became two of the biggest cult movies ever, "HAROLD AND MAUDE" is a movie that seems to mean something to all kinds of people, from college kids to over thirties to—anybody.

Now it comes to Toronto, and you can join the rest of the country in the love affair they're carrying on with two very unusual and wonderful people, "HAROLD AND MAUDE".

Opera double bill Rare treat

One-act operas are fragile creatures. They reflect the less gargantuan aspects of an art form usually characterized as "Grand" Opera. In a world where the financial realities of opera production usually turn their collective thumbs down on all but the crowd-pleasers, one-acters, rarely see the light of day.

So, when the Canadian Opera Company announced that one of its six programs would be a double bill of one-acters, ears perked up throughout the opera biz. And, when it was announced that the operas would be Bartok's "Bluebeard's Castle" and Ravel's "L'Heure Espagnole", jaws dropped in disbelief.

Ravel? Bartok? Why not stick with the only two one-act jobs that can be counted on to succeed financially: "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "I Pagliacci"? Herman Gelger-Torel, that's why.

Mr. Torel, the COC's artistic director, doesn't exactly abhor the convention, but it's safe to say he's had enough of the potboilers. After all, the season lineup includes three Standards: Carmen, Faust and La Traviata — so why not take a chance? Happily, the financial powers that be in the COCO head office acquiesced, and the double bill was on.

Bluebeard's Castle is frequently billed as a "psychological" opera, one that tries to make its points with the subtleties of music rather than the broad gestures of Big Action. The story is an adaptation of the old French legend: Prince Bluebeard brings his new bride Judith to his castle, the fourth such bride to cross the threshold.

She has left her family and beloved to run off with the sullen, brooding man, banking on the splendors of his kingdom. Once in the castle, she sees seven doors, each sealed shut. TORTURE CHAMBER OPENS

With much persuasion, she gets one key after another from Bluebeard. The first door opens to reveal the torture chamber. Even though the walls glow red with blood, she sings that she is not afraid.

Doors two through five open to reveal Bluebeard's Armoury, Treasury, Garden and Kingdom. Each reveals greater splendors, but after a moment, each glows red with blood.

Bluebeard begs her not to open the sixth, but Judith does, and reveals the world's tears. Finally, under great duress, he surrenders the last key. Out walk the Prince's three previous wives.

"You were the most beautiful!" mourns Bluebeard as he cloaks her in a robe and places a crown on her head. She follows the other wives back through the door, leaving him utterly alone.

Bluebeard is just a two-person show: Claude Corbeil (Bluebeard) and Lyn Vernon (Judith) were in fine voice. Bartok's original Hungarian script has been translated into English, but the lack of syllabic uniformity with English left the words a little stifled at times.

If there were any flaws in the lyrics, though, two factors more than made up the difference: the orchestra and the sets. Bartok is a challenge for the TSO, and they rose to meet it. Rarely have I heard such vibrantly exciting sounds emanate from the O'Keefe pit.

But the crowning touch to this hour-long piece had to be the sets. Using a variety of scrimms, projections, lighting effects and fantastically inventive costumes for the two singers, this opera had visual punch and endless fascination.

Bluebeard, despite its many merits, isn't a fun-fest. It ends on a decidedly gloomy note.

CLOCKMAKER'S WIFE TIMES INFIDELITY

L'Heure Espagnol is just what's needed to raise your spirits. The story isn't nearly as complex: a clockmaker's wife in Toledo longs for her husband to leave on his rounds winding the municipal clocks so that she can entertain her lover. (It's the only chance she gets all week.)

In turn, she's wooed by a businessman, a muleteer who stops off to get his watch fixed and her slightly bewildered lover, much in the vein of the classic French farces.

With Gwenlynn Little as the clock maker's wife, not much can go wrong. Little is a fine singer and an even better actress, with a marvellous sense of comedy timing. Alan Crofoot

(the clockmaker), Avo Kittask (the Muleteer), Emile Belcourt (the poet-lover) and Peter Milne (the businessman) all bask in Little's light, but are never at a loss to match her sense of fun.

As it works with this much going for it needed help, the orchestra gave its all. Ravel, like Bartok, is rare stuff in the opera house, and the chance to luxuriate in it must have inspired the musicians to greater heights. But make no mistake about it — Ravel is never easy music to play, and it's a tribute to conductor Thomas Blum that the players were so accurate, both in this and the Bartok.

And finally, there was the incredible set, designed by Marie Day. L'Heure was worth seeing for its mad, whirling clocks alone. Literally everything moves, close to a hundred clock hands, pendulums, gears, cuckoos (cuckolds?) and bells. Amazing.

Wednesday night was the last performance for the season of this superb double bill, a program that combined drama with magnificently done light comedy. Congrats, Mr. Torel, an all-out artistic success. I only hope you did as well at the box office.

Realism/Surrealism

Although the material of realism is to be found in the everyday, it is often manipulated to disturbing ends — as can be seen at the current realism exhibition at Yorkville's Gallery Moos.

Size inflation seems to be a favoured technique of a number of the artists. Giant heads and great slabs of human flesh literally pulsate through the room.

Distortion or accentuation of colour, as in Audrey Flack's neon "Strawberry Tart", also makes for a kind of pop art realism in contrast to the sedate yet often sinister "magic" realism exemplified by Ken Danby.

"Contemporary Spanish Graphics" at Gallery Dresdnere, 130 Bloor St. W., does not echo the current North American appetite for realism.

The power of the imagination and the supposedly more profound reality of what it is able to make true, form the basis of surrealism, which is both an historical movement and a way of looking at the world.

Most striking is the work of the surrealist, Enrico Baj, whose colourfully sparkling mixed media graphics bounce their complexity with a childlike and spontaneous air of exuberance.

Baj makes fun of the pomp and regalia of the military while exploiting the decorative effects his lively treatment of motifs from Picasso and Seurat is also interesting.

The master of the Spanish print makers, the surrealist Joan Miro, (whose fabulous exhibit at the Albert White Gallery is just finishing,) and several generations disciples reflect the continuity and heritage in the Barcelona school of artists.

An interest in texture and the effective use of black — characteristically Spanish — are combined in the works of Clave and Tapies with an almost complete abstraction of form.

Both these exhibitions continue into next week.

Gillian Mackay

1837 sincere, from the Boyne glib

Two Canadian history plays, 1837, The Farmers Revolt, and From the Boyne to Batoche, share a politically-committed viewpoint showing the exploitation of the workingman by a government establishment. The first is a collectively created production from Theatre Passe Muraille, scripted by on-the-spot playwright Rich Salutin, and the second is a group ensemble work from Toronto Workshop Productions, written by Steven Bush and Rick McKenna.

1837 is a finely-honed and gripping production that amalgamates history and politics with an immediate sense of human emotions. From the Boyne to Batoche is a barrage of circus-like tantare dealing with so many bits and pieces of history and politics that the people get lost in the mania.

The Passe Muraille production selects its images with care, building them around the people. Each element of external importance is shown in the context of its human significance; so that a corduroy road or trail gains meaning from the settler walking endlessly along it, trees becomes accentuated because farmers must chop them down in a grueling fight for land and mud because people almost drown in it.

The build-up of these humanistic details lays the ground-work for a fuller exploration of the farmer's political fight with the Family Compact and the elitist Upper Canada government of Sir Francis Bondhead.

SUSANNA MOODIE MOCKED

The first half of the play combines a sardonic look at the prejudices of the day with humorous, tender sketches of the homesteaders. A caricature of Susanna Moodie, played as la Dame Edith Evans, histrionically mocks the upper class English woman in the swamps, but a muted study of a settler meeting his mail-order bride for the first time returns us to the more important perceptions of the play.

Throughout the interchange of roles which constantly shift the focus of the stage action, this couple re-appears several times. Against them we can measure the full impact of the political turmoil on ordinary folk. And their separation in the second half of the play is integrated with the defeat of William Lyon McKenzie and his rebels in the march against Toronto.

This play never loses sight of its central viewpoint; that of the oppressed farmers in a land they are struggling to make their own.

The TWP play seems to impose its people on pre-constructed symbols and extraneous trappings. Rather than starting with human reality and working towards external images it goes the other way around. Some of them are stunning, albeit mystifying, but they do little to personalize the intricacies of plot. This story of Catholic-Protestant conflict in Ireland (the river Boyne) which becomes part of the racial-nationalist government conflict in Canada (at Batoche) never focuses for long on any one individual. It remains remarkably emotionally detached from its characters.

PLAY FOCUSES ON SCOTT

Thomas Scott, a belligerent, intransigent workingman, appears to be the object of concern. The play follows him from his initiation as an Orangeman in Ireland to his embroilment in Orangemen efforts to overthrow Louis Riel's Provisional Government in Canada. He is captured and ordered shot by Riel who himself soon falls victim to government duplicity.

But only in the scene when Thomas Scott and Louis Riel discover that they are in fact spiritual brothers does this play seem finally to find its point. The image of Riel with the "last spike" of the government's railway (not Pierre Berton's) driven through his heart is powerful indeed.

Although symbolically suggestive and visually entertaining, From the Boyne to Batoche suffers from an over-accumulation of detail and a viewpoint so multi-representative that there is nothing and no one to guide us through the morass.

1837 keeps us closely connected to its people but From the Boyne to Batoche never even really lets us know who they are. One is life revived through symbolic history and the other is symbolic history revived with artificial respiration.

Subtly sadistic, brilliantly executed

Richard Fitzpatrick and Bob Derner In the dress rehearsal of "A Lime in the Morning".

"It's so cruel!" audience member on "Hosanna"

Not half as cruel as A Lime in the Morning (at the Toronto Centre for the Arts until Oct. 19).

As the drag queen and his lover hack each other apart, you feel that it has all happened before and that it will continue. Both men play the game by the rules.

But Des McNuff's bum living in the sewers is involved in a game with a psychopath. And there are no rules as the younger man, in an attempt to usurp the old man's space, systematically destroys the fantasies of the old man. When this doesn't work, he begins to attack him physically. The audience is deadly silent throughout.

Bob Derner gives a brilliant performance as Mica, the old

Newfoundland alcoholic. His gestures, even his fingernails, are perfect for the role. He grabs our sympathy and holds on tight. Mica can be seen on any park bench in Toronto, and since we shy away from these men, the play satisfies the voyeur in most of us.

Richard Fitzpatrick plays the psychopath in such a way that the audience knows, definitely knows, that he is a psychopath. At points I could predict what he would say next. But as the play progresses, his sinister purpose takes over, and no one can predict what will actually happen.

In set design, the show is unsurpassed in originality and execution. Bruno Hacquebard has designed a life size sewer, cut away on one side to reveal the living quarters of Mica — cluttered with 'big garbage finds' — an old mattress, a milk crate, a store mannequin.

The bugs had not been ironed out in the sound department at the preview and the lighting was at times abrupt. That could just have been preview jitters.

McAnuff also composed and recorded the two songs used in the show, which were as good as the script itself.

And he's only 21! Danny Jellis on special effects deserves praise. The scenes with the catfood lid are horrifying, and realistic to the edge of queasiness. But all to the point. If the sight of blood doesn't bother you, and if you've always wondered where the old man go at night, don't miss A Lime in the Morning.

movies

This is the week that Pauline Kael returns to the New Yorker Magazine, so you will be excused reading our comments further. And you need wonder no more what Martin Knelman may think of this or that: read it first in The New Yorker. Kael is the acknowledged dean of film criticism, and the greatest movie critic since Agee. No, including Agee. As well she is one of the great essayists in the language.

One of her best pieces cut open Stanley Kubrick's Clockwork Orange. "Don't people notice", Kael asked, "that the attempted rape in the abandoned theatre is totally gratuitous and there strictly to turn on the audience?" We didn't mind the movie all that much, enjoying its extrapolation of bourgeois design. But we bow to Kael. Clockwork Orange is coupled with Lindsay Anderson's superior fantasy O Lucky Man!, at the Kensington through-Sunday.

Also this Friday the Revue finishes its run of The Conversation, in which Francis Ford Coppola presents his extrapolation on contemporary horror. With Deep End.

And this weekend, St. Mike's shows the second half of one of the best movies ever made, Jan Troell's The New Land. It is better to see The Emigrants first, although The New Land more than stands up on its own. Film enthusiasts might go just to see the technical perfection of the film-maker's tasks. But be warned: it is a long movie and the SMC seats are hard. Sunday, St. Mike's shows Bob Rafelson's Five Easy Pieces, the most successful of the Jack Nicholson series of pictures that includes Easy Rider, Drive, He Said and The King of Marvin Gardens. Five Easy Pieces was very fashionable back in 1970, but it was also good, so it should stand up. It includes a fine performance by Karen Black.

Monday night, Ontario College of Art continues its extraordinary culling of French movies with Vigo's Zero de Conduit and Cocteau's Blood of a Poet. Bigo's film is truly timeless, great and funny and it takes advantage of the possibilities of film as few movie-makers have done since. It is also the original for Lindsay Anderson's If . . . It is on at seven p.m.

By the way, if you would like to review movies, go right ahead. We may be hard to please but we run everything anyway. Call me at 922-3714.

No sign of The Projectionist, even less of Fireman's Ball and not a trace of Wee Geordie.

A multitude of concerts have been crammed into the next week. Tonight there's Sonny Terry and Brownie McGee at Seneca College and tomorrow Hawkwind comes to Convocation Hall. On Wednesday the second, CPI has Eric Clapton at the Gardens and Sha Na Na at Massey Hall. The same night SRO offers Herbie Hancock at Seneca. Next weekend, my favourites, the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band do two shows at Con Hall on Sunday the sixth, and the following night CPI will again fill the Gardens with Rick Wakeman and his 60 piece orchestra and choir performing 'Journey To the Centre of the Earth.'

At the clubs, Geoff Muldaur rounds out his week at the Chimney on Saturday, and is replaced next week by the Heartaches Razz Band. Opening on Oct. 7 is the fine blues artist Ellen McIlwaine. For those who can afford it, the Colonial features the remarkable Martha Reeves through Saturday, and has the Cannonball Adderley Quintet opening Monday for a week's stand. The El Mocambo offers Coco Taylor and her Blues Band tonight and tomorrow, and headlines with Jimmy Witherspoon. Also tonight and tomorrow, Audiomaster, a fine Toronto band, plays Mani's on the Danforth.

The Climax Jazz Band has left the old Brunswick House. They will soon be playing at the newly renovated Old Bavaria. Climax has been replaced at the Brunswick by another dixieland outfit, the Trillium Jazz Band.

Folkies should take note of Sunday's festival at the Hart House Farm. Artists include Stringband, Raffi, Peter Mathieson, the Original Sloth Band, Klaas Vangraff, Angele Arsenaull, and Friends of Fiddler's Green. Tickets and bus transportation are free, and available at the Porters desk at Hart House. Also of interest, Egerton's will feature Jesse Winchester all next week, and sometime in the next month will offer the incredible vocal-guitarist, Don Potter, known best for his work with Chuck Mangione.

Program, program! Can't tell the singers without a program! No kidding, either. If you're stuck at the back of Cavern O'Keefe for the Opera, invest four bits in one of the COC's excellent souvenir programs. Not only do you get an appealing melange of history and show biz facts, but you get photos of each performer. Combine these with binoculars, and you Row ZZ folks can make out who's Who!

Tonight is the premiere of Faust, so all you devil-lovers get on down and root for your boy. On Saturday afternoon at 1 p.m. (not the usual 2) is Boris Gudonov. Grab tickets for this one if you can. At $400,000, it's the most spectacular COC production ever, with over 150 singers, 35 extras, 350 costumes, 5 elephants, the entire state of Alaska, the . . . well, you get the idea. Big.

Saturday night's all right for fighting, and Carmen goes at it again, taking on all comers. Monday it's La Traviata, while Tuesday The Flying Dutchman makes his final landing of the season. Wednesday nite Boris is back, bigger than ever, and Faust rounds out the week on Thursday. Say, buddy, how'dja like to sell your soul for a pair of front-row seats? Oh yeah? Sign right here . . .

As with the last few weeks, all's quiet on the concert scene. My apologies, though, to the New Chamber Orchestra of Canada, a review of which bumped out of last Friday's Review for space reasons. Their Sept. 15 concert at Hart House was an overwhelming success, both critically and box-office-wise. There's no great need to exhort the crowds to come out for the remaining concerts, as there was last year: Business Manager Bill Phillips tells me that he's even considering adding second shows to handle the overflow.

CBC this week: imaginative programming, dull announcers. 'Twas ever thus. At ten, Sunday morning, check out what's shaping up to be a rather interesting series: called "Musically Speaking" (oh, another winner title, CBC!) it features excerpts of symphonies and concertos conducted by several eminent fellows — Szell, Toscanini, Cluytens, Bernstein, and Weingartner all mount the chopping block for consideration of their recorded performances of Beethoven's 8th symphony.

There were only two new openings this week and Business As Usual, at St. Paul's United Church, is not really new. After a successful exodus to Ward's Island this summer, the play returns to Toronto where it continues its humorous slant on a serious issue; lead pollution in the city. A Lime In The Morning, (review, p. 15,) by Toronto playwright Des McAnuff, opened September 25 at the Actor's Theatre, 390 Dupon Street.

Opening next week are plays from two of the city's most interesting and productive theatres: Factory Theatre Lab and the Tarragon. Sudden Death Overtime, at the Factory, presents a madcap hockey family from Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan and explores the bizarre influence their passion for the game has on their lives. Previews are from October 1 to 13 at a low 99c. The official opening is October 15. Factory is now in its new home at 207 Adelaide Street East. The Tarragon Theatre opens their season October 2 with a performance of Peter Madden's intense prison play The Night No One Yelled. Show-time is 8:30 pm with a pay-what-you-can Sunday matinee at 2:30 pm.

British professor explains role of international development

By TOM GERRY

Professor Geoff Oldham presented to Canadians for the first time Wednesday an account of the role of the International Development Research Centre (IDRC), an organization that supervises the annual distribution of 35-40 million Canadian dollars.

Oldham was speaking to 50 people at the Faculty of Library Science in a lecture sponsored by the Varsity Fund and the U of T Institute for the History and Philosophy of Science.

Oldham is a professor of the Science Policy Research Unit at the University of Sussex. He is an alumnus of U of T and has travelled extensively. In Hong Kong he was science advisor to the governor. Oldham is a consultant with IDRC.

The IDRC, termed by Oldham a "uniquely Canadian institution" was set up to aid the development of science and technology by funding research in third world countries. The people of the nations being assisted have greeted the IDRC with enthusiasm, according to Oldham.

The genesis of IDRC is the 1963 United Nations Conference on Science and Technology (UNCSAT). At this gathering the 2,000 speakers assumed that the wealthy countries are wealthy because they possess science and technology, and therefore if the poorer countries acquire science and technology, they too will grow rich.

Oldham noted the third world's view of the developed world as a "supermarket" from which the underdeveloped nations could choose their desired technology.

Following UNSCAT, research councils, modelled on bodies in the developed countries, were established in many poor nations. Though they accomplished a few significant innovations, such as the isolation of harder strains of rice plants, the councils were a failure.

Their investments resulted in research projects oriented to the priorities of the developed countries that supplied the researchers. The councils neglected the links between research and implementation of recommendations.

When the poor nations began to import technology they found much of it was irrelevant to their needs and resources. "Capital intensive" industrial techniques, for instance, are utterly inappropriate in a third world setting.

Also, technology in developed countries is often privately-owned. Most poor nations decided the high prices demanded by corporations and clauses retaining decision-making power in the distant head offices were not in the countries' best interests.

The developing countries' real needs were for indigenous research facilities and a "unified policy to marry technology and research," Oldham said.

Their goals, the third world nations stated, were broader than mere economic growth. Self-reliance was to them an end in itself.

The IDRC was set up in response to these changes in attitude. The necessary money came from Canada. Oldham attributes this generosity to the mood of internationalism generated by Expo 67 and to the efforts of former prime minister Lester Pearson.

From the third world's point of view Canada is politically acceptable because it is not a colonial power.

The first meeting of the centre's international membership, presided over by David Hopper, was convened in September, 1970.

Oldham described three projects the IDRC has financed:

- It supports a wide range of technological development studies by the Andean Pact countries. These countries are striving for fuller economic co-operation among themselves and are concerned about methods of controlling importation of technology and about ways to effectively distribute technology.

- Oldham is encouraged by the trend emerging from the Andean Pact nations' work. He notes they are proposing further research that attempts to link the social and physical sciences.

- In Nigeria the IDRC has funded studies to find more efficient methods of producing a flour made from fermented cassava and commonly eaten as porridge by Nigerians.

This project is rectifying the damage perpetrated on Nigerian ecology by a British firm that began to manufacture the flour in huge factories with cassava grown on plantations.

- Oldham was enthusiastic about a research program in which 11 third world countries are participating. The nations are trying to formulate the most effective policy instruments to implement science and technology, a concern they share.

The IDRC, acting as a catalyst and enabling the nations to avoid the UN bureaucracy, finances the meetings while the countries pay for the research.

Attending the sessions of this group, Oldham said, "makes one feel there is hope."

UBC prescribes cancer-causing drug

VANCOUVER (CUP) — A drug proven in six different studies to be cancer-causing is being prescribed for University of British Columbia students, health service director said.

The drug, flagyl, is a treatment for trichomonas vaginitis, a contagious vaginal infection.

However, Dr. Archibald Johnson said there is no great cause for alarm. He compared the chances of contracting cancer from use of flagyl to the chances of dying from the use of penicillin.

Very few prescriptions are given to UBC students for flagyl, he said.

Johnson said he has not observed any indication of cancer in UBC patients who have been administered flagyl.

He also said he isn't aware of any similar findings by other doctors in Canada.

"People seem to think doctors delight in giving prescriptions for carcinogenic drugs," he said. "A doctor must think there is a good reason to order the drug or he doesn't order it."

Johnson couldn't comment on the amount of usage by Canadian doctors, but said he doubted a story that American doctors estimate 2.2 million prescriptions are issued yearly in the U.S. alone.

Although flagyl is not the only treatment for the ailment, Johnson said it has proven itself to be the most effective drug on the Canadian market.

Referring to a recent book put out by the American Medical Association, Drug Evaluation, he said a temporary decrease in the white blood cell count is the most serious result of taking flagyl.

Other apparent side effects have been nausea, diarrhea and an unpleasant taste in the mouth. Users are sometimes warned against drinking alcoholic beverages.

Marxist committee gives public face to leftist studies

By TOM GERRY

The Committee for a Marxist Institute has grown in the past year out of ideas shared by a few politically sympathetic associates into an organization with noteworthy accomplishments and prospects for a productive future.

In response to the underdeveloped and chaotic condition of Marxist thought in Canada, caused in part by universities' hiring policies during the cold war, the committee is determined to give a public face to leftist study.

In providing a forum for leftist thinkers — including largely untapped intellectual resources such as visiting professors — the committee aim to bring together Marxist study materials and to attract people who feel disaffected by the many ideologically diverse left wing groups.

strategic and historical aspects of The Working Class in Canada.

In January a third series is to be presented entitled, Imperialism, Nationalism in Canada. The committee intends to continue its education program by offering six courses, lasting eight to 10 weeks, beginning in October.

The committee is financed by donations collected at its meetings, sales of tapes of the lecture series and gifts from wealthy professors and philanthropists. These gifts, however, are infrequent.

The committee would like to have a place to establish a library where students could obtain bibliographic material with a leftist perspective.

The building would be a centre for study groups and meetings and also the site for a bookstore. The precursor to the bookstore is the literature table the committee operates at the lectures.

A committee spokesperson said he is optimistic about the group's possibilities. The committee has received the respect of both leftist groups and uncommitted people, he noted. The committee would welcome relevant books and periodicals. It can be contacted at 362-0571 or 921-9898.

Scientology attempts book ban

MONTREAL (CUP) — The Church of Scientology, cynically referred to by one writer as a "mind-improvement-for-a-fee organization" is trying to force removal of four books critical to its philosophy and its leading members from circulation. The Sir George Williams Library is cooperating.

Acting on legal advice, the university's chief librarian, James Kanasy, has taken all copies of Scientology's 'The Now Religion, by George Malko, off the shelves.

Some libraries and bookstores across the country, however, are openly defying the scientologists' efforts and are continuing to circulate the books in question.

In the United States, Dell Publishing Co. Inc., Malko's publisher, settled a libel action out of court for $7,500 plus an apology and an agreement not to republish.

A recent issue of The Globe and Mail reports Steve Blair, (Dell's) New York attorney, said $30,000 had already been spent on the case, which was launched in California. A jury hearing had been called for by the courts and there were prospects of a lengthy hearing.

In other words, the American courts did not have the chance to make a final ruling as to whether the book was libelous or not.

Libel suit

In Canada, the book is currently being tried in the Supreme Court of Ontario. In the meantime, letters are being sent to Canadian libraries and booksellers by the Toronto Church of Scientology. These letters say a libel suit is pending against Malko's book and three others dealing with the same subject, and threaten legal action against anyone distributing these volumes while the court case awaits settlement.

The three other titles in question are The Mind Benders, by Cyril Vospers, Inside Scientology by Robert Kaufman and Scandals of Scientology by Paulette Cooper. None of these have ever been in the Sir George Williams library stacks.

Assuming the scientologists win their case in court, do they have the grounds for instigating action against those who distributed the books before a decision was reached? The moral question arising is how eagerly should a library give in to such blatant efforts to restrict its freedom to make all published books available to the public?

The legal side is confusing. According to Section 263 of the Criminal Code of Canada, "A person publishes a libel when he exhibits it in public, causes it to be read or seen; or shows or delivers it... with intent that it should be read or seen."

It is not only the author and publisher who can be charged with libel but also the distributor.

Exemption

Section 268 of the code states in part that "no person shall be deemed to publish a defamatory libel by reason only that he sells a book... if, at the time of the sale, he does not know it contains the defamatory matter."

That would seem to exempt the Sir George library from being sued in this case. However, the letter sent to Kanasy by the scientologists could potentially invalidate any claim of ignorance on the library's part.

A lawyer, whom Kanasy declined to identify, was commissioned by the library to read the book through and offer professional advice.

In a letter to Kanasy, the lawyer wrote "... it seems clear to me that having been informed that the above work may contain libelous matter, you must now look into this possibility and, if such is the case, do whatever may be necessary to prevent further dissemination of this work through the library in order to avoid being found to have published a libel."

He added, "I appreciate and share your concern for the protection of the right of free expression and your professional duty to resist attempts at censorship, but I do not think that works containing defamatory matter should benefit from this protection, because they constitute an abuse rather than the lawful enjoyment of the right of free expression."

A lawyer from McGill said he had "never heard of a library being approached in this manner, or being sued for libel or defamation. Normally this action is taken towards the publisher."

"Theoretically anyone could approach the library with a threat to sue about anything, but unless judgment is actually passed in court and the book is judged libellous under law, the library is really in no danger that I can see."

Other librarians and booksellers contacted by the Sir George student newspaper, the Georgian, were outraged by the library's actions. John Rosenberg, manager of Classics' Little Book Store, not only stocked the Malko book and at least one of the other three mentioned, but said he "would continue to sell it until judgment is rendered one way or the other."

Censorship

He said he had received a form letter from Dell ordering him to get rid of one of the books. "But they didn't give any explanation. It ended up in the wastepaper basket. What they want sounds like censorship.

Some of the action last week when the Blues lost to Queen's University.

Rugby Blues dump Trent in lopsided contest. Score 26-6

The rugby Blues survived a seemingly interminable bus trip along the monotonous 401, light rain, and a late referee but still overcame Trent University by a lopsided score of 26-6.

Coming off last Saturday's loss to Queen's, the Blues were determined to play a strong game.

It was only 8 minutes into the game when the pigskin was slapped down to the pitch for the first Varsity try.

Bill Procnurier was the happy ball carrier who slipped into the Trent end zone for the score.

Blues continued to dominate the game. They won more than their share of the set scrums taking advantage of the loose play on the part of Trent.

Winning a set scrum is as important as winning a face-off in hockey. Blues' captain Mike Code scored from one of these scrums.

Code, taking the ball from one scrum cut to the short side of the field and barreled into the end zone to touch it down.

The convert by Chris Bouris was good giving Toronto a 10-0 lead.

Later in the half, Blues' forward Algie scooped up a loose ball and headed down field. As the going got tough he passed off to Randy Scott of the second row.

Scott set up a ruck directly in front of the Trent goalposts. Drummond, the scrum-half, called for the ball and cut for the left side of the field.

Some heads-up play by Moore who dropped out of the line allowed Drummond to pass to Procnurier. Procnurier completed the play with a try in the corner of the end zone.

The score at the half read 14-0 in Toronto's favour.

The start of the second half saw Trent come out flying. The boys from Peterborough showed lots of drive and had Toronto with their backs to the wall.

Were it not for a few penalties and some well placed kicks Trent would easily have scored.

The wet ball continued to play havoc with the ball handling.

One of Trent's lineouts was the victim as the ball hit the pitch. Blues were able to play the ball with their feet.

Blues' Chris Sheret kicked the ball into Trent's end zone. Brian Smith of Varsity won the foot race for the ball and made the score 18-0.

Trent was not yet ready to lie down and play dead. Again they backed Toronto into its own end, this time with better results.

Shane Barker was able to squeeze into the end zone finally cracking the scoreboard for Trent.

The conversion was good. Trent now trailed by the score of 18-6.

Lineouts continued to play a big part in the game.

Again Algie took the ball from a lineout and charged upfield. He passed out to none other than Scott again who fought his way into the end zone for yet another Varsity try.

At this point the Blues' forwards were outscoring the backs 3-2. Perhaps this fact motivated Tom Wright to execute some real ruggar as he scissored to Peter Moore which set up a pass that sprung Tom Bell for the final scoring of the game.

The final score of 26-6 for Varsity clearly demonstrates their complete dominance of the Trent squad.

The rugby Blues play their next game in Waterloo on Sunday.

Skule loses a close one to the jocks

By DAVE STUART

The sun almost set in the east, the grass almost turned red, parity was almost granted on governing council, and the engineers almost defeated Phys-Ed in interfac football on the back campus Thursday night.

Never was there a more up-tight group of jocks as they trailed engineers by a field goal until late in the fourth quarter.

The game as a whole was a very even match. Neither team was able to mount much of an offense during the first half. Neither team was able to put together more than two first downs to sustain a drive.

The first scoring play of the game came on the last play of the opening quarter when a skule drive stalled near the PHE 30 yard line.

The engineers attempted a field goal which was good. That field goal held up until late in the fourth quarter when the jocks finally hit pay dirt on a reverse that caught all the engineers sleeping.

The frustration of trailing interfac's perennial doormats began to tell on the jocks as tempers started to flare in the last stanza.

A fight broke out amongst two unidentified players who were banished from the game.

A first this year in interfac football is women officials. Two first year women, Piret Komi and Viive Tamm, are working the games this season.

Having a woman on the field seems to have a calming effect on the players (despite the fight) as both benches were unusually quiet during the game.

You will remember the fates of Leo Cahill and John Rauch of the Argos. Well, sports fans, the same thing seems to have happened to the skule coaches.

Unofficial word has it that a new coach, Dennis Duncan, of PHE is taking over the team starting today.

New intercampus league for women involves Erindale, Scarborough and St. George campuses

By IRIS BLISS

On Tuesday night, Oct. 1, at 6:30 p.m. in the sports gym of the Benson Building a new women's program will be established.

Competition between St. George, Erindale and Scarborough Campuses will begin with a basketball league in the fall, a volleyball league in the spring and individual events in Archery-golf, badminton, squash and archery interspersed throughout the year.

The leagues in volleyball and basketball will have one mini-tournament a week and one practice a week.

It is hoped that St. George Campus will field three teams and Scarborough and Erindale one each.

Practices on the St. George Campus for all three teams are Tuesdays, 6:30 to 7:30 in the Sports Gym of the Benson Building and the tournaments are on Wednesday nights with each campus hosting twice in each league. Each league lasts 6-7 weeks.

This type of competition will require more time and personal commitment than our still operating inter-faculty tournaments, but as much time and involvement as inter-collegiate competition demands.

It is expected that many girls on the St. George campus fit into this medium level of competition skill and effort and it will better satisfy the needs of the Scarborough and Erindale girls' teams.

It is hoped that with this offering of another competitive level it will remove some of the imbalances that have existed in the interfaculty program.

On October 16th, St. George is hosting the first mini-basketball tournament of this league. If you are interested in basketball and in the intercampus league, come to the Benson Building Sports gym at 6:30 p.m. Tuesday, Oct. 1.

Officials will be needed. St. George is required to provide two basketball officials (and four volleyball officials for the spring) who would be willing to do games each Wednesday night of the six week league plus playoffs.

If you are a rated official and are interested, please see Miss Bliss in the Benson Building, Room 103 WAA office, or call 928-3441.

The archery-golf tournament will be held in late October at West Hill Golf Club and will be open to archers from St. George, Scarborough, Erindale campuses and York University.

On Nov. 26, St. George will host a co-ed badminton tournament for all players from the three campuses.

In the last week of January, Scarborough will host a squash tournament and in the first week of February Erindale will host an indoor archery tournament. Further notice of these events will be forthcoming.

Round up of interfaculty sports

By DAVE STUART

Track
The interfac track meet is underway. The four hundred meter relay (4x100) was won by Wycliffe in the time of 48.6 seconds. The team members were: Ed Hung, Jim Seagram, Stan Murray and Andy Symons.

The Vic 1 team of Tom Sinclair, Mike Hart, Dave Wardlaw, and Gord Fulton placed second.

Knox A managed a third place finish while their friends from the hall, Knox B placed fourth.

The distance medley was won in a time of 11 minutes and four seconds by the Knox A team of Gerry Feeney, Mike Dyon, Brad Morley (of Blues fame), and John Sharp.

The men from Vic seem to be good runners as the second, third and fourth places all went to Vic teams.

Soccer

Results from three interfac soccer games have been posted.

As reported previously Trin A sneaked past UC 1-0 last Tuesday. On the same day Sr. Eng. dumped SMC A by a score of 3-1. The sharpshooters for skule were Christopoulos, Kirk, and Venerc. The Mikes lone tally came from the toe of Formusson.

On Wednesday SGS 1 lost a squeaker to Vic by the score of 2-1. Andy Gort and Walter Bordne tallied for Vic while Steve Booker replied for the Grads.

Football

Second division football got underway on the back campus Wednesday as Trinity downed UC by one touchdown. The lone score of the game came from Poulos and the convert was booted by Wright.

SDS members appeal

Tony Leah and Bill Schabas, two students suspended from U of T in June for preventing controversial urbanologist Edward Banfield from speaking here last year, have filed an appeal to the Governing Council to quash the convictions.

The two were convicted June 29 by the Caput, a disciplinary tribunal composed entirely of administrators.

Leah was suspended for three years and Schabas for four. Both will have the conviction noted on their transcripts for five years.

Their only avenue of appeal now is the Governing Council which made the decisions to prosecute them.

Calling the hearing a "travesty of justice", Schabas and Leah's appeal brief gives a long detailed attack on both the Caput and the U of T administration for its handling of the Banfield incident.

DISPUTE

There is a dispute over what can be appealed, however, with the Governing Council contending it can only review the sentence under provisions of the U of T Act.

But the brief contends that because the Governing Council has the power to "abrogate or change" Caput provisions, the verdict can also be reviewed and overturned.

The main grounds for the appeal, the brief charges, is the use of the Caput as a "cover-up of racism at U of T." There should have been an investigation into Banfield's visit as a provocation rather than a disciplinary hearing, the brief maintains.

The former students also charge the Caput is an "illegitimate" body composed entirely of administrators, which make it "prosecutor, judge and jury." This is compounded, according to the brief, by the individual bias of many of the members, who were involved in discussions about the incident.

They also charge the administration with discriminatory prosecution for charging them but "failing to charge right-wing students and professors who have taken away freedom of speech in the past."

BLATANT BIAS

On the actual Caput hearings, the brief says, "the defendants had no opportunity to a fair trial" because the hearings were "so blatantly biased and restrictive."

Examples the brief cited were restrictions on cross-examination of prosecution witnesses, failure to inform the defence of procedural rulings and rejection of defence motions before they were made.

The former students also argue their defence was hampered by exclusion of any evidence relating to racism at U of T or the activities and views of Banfield.

They also say the charges against them were changed twice and they were unable to pursue a defence on the broad charge of "conduct prejudicial to the interests of the university."

The Caput decision was also attacked as faulty because the evidence failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Banfield's lecture was a duly authorized university activity, that the defendants personally prevented Banfield from speaking and that they thereby violated the interests of the university.

The brief charges the authorization of the meeting was faulty in several ways.

Political economy professor Walter Berns invited Banfield without consultation with other members of the American studies committee and the university administration failed to exercise academic responsibility by neglecting to consult anyone else in the university, the protesters or the Italian and black communities.

The brief also charges it was not demonstrated that the interests of the university had been prejudiced by the conduct of the two students. This would have to be proved because of the absence of a specific set of regulations under which they could be charged.

GENERAL DEFENCE

The prosecution stuck to a presentation of physical evidence and the defence was not allowed to make a more general defence to prove the actions were not prejudicial to the university's interests, the brief states.

The students contend it was not established that they alone were primarily responsible for preventing Banfield from speaking, noting a large number of chanting protesters were on and off stage. Leah and Schabas feel they were singled out because of their membership in the communist Canadian Party of Labor and past activities at U of T.

The sentence is attacked as "vindictive, illegal and harsh." The sentences of three and four year suspensions respectively were much harsher than those meted out at several other campuses for similar offenses.

At the University of Chicago two students were put on probation and reserved suspension for preventing Banfield from speaking a week later.

The brief concludes with a submission on procedure which is aimed at exposing what Leah and Schabas feel is really at issue in the Banfield incident—racism at the university—and what is prejudicial to the interests of the university.

They suggest a special meeting of the Governing Council to discuss all substantive issues involved in the Banfield incident including Banfield's theories and their consequences, the existence of racism at U of T and the limits of free speech.

Golden Gaels football collapses on the eve of Tindall's retirement

The Varsity — Brian Pel and Bob White

Varsity fans enjoyed a rout over the Queen's Golden Gaels Saturday at the stadium. The Blues just lined up and ran right over the Queen's defenses. The only bright spot for the Gaels came at half time when coach Tindall was presented with a silver tray for his contribution to college football over 40 years.

Indians converge in Ottawa today

By BARRY WEISLEDER

The cross-Canada Native Peoples' Caravan, protesting native peoples' living conditions across the country, was met in Toronto by a rally of over 300 supporters Saturday evening.

The tour set out from Vancouver two weeks ago and arrived in this city last Friday on its way to Ottawa for the opening of parliament today.

The crowd listened to speeches of members of the caravan's central steering committee. Louis Cameron, leader of the occupation of Anishinabe Park near Kenora this summer, chaired the meeting.

The plight of the native peoples in poor and dangerous housing, inadequate education and health care, mass unemployment and victimization by police and the penal system can no longer wait for improvement, Cameron said.

This, he emphasized, must be understood by Canadians and responded to by government.

As one representative of the Regina chapter of the Ojibway Warriors' Society's Regina chapter put it, "Though I may be put in jail after this is over, we're taking a stand. This is a one-way trip."

A Kenora member of the society described the conditions that forced natives there to fight back.

He noted many of his people were mercury poisoning from eating fish caught in waters now polluted by the local pulp and paper industry.

He cited the absence of electricity and proper toilet facilities in many of the surrounding reserves, the fraud of supposedly generous government grants used to construct housing of highly flammable low quality material and the level of street traffic fatalities affecting natives in the urban centre.

Chief Ken Basil of the British Columbia Bonaparte Band, which organized the Cache Creek highway blockage, outlined some of the demands the caravan activists will put to the opening session of parliament today in Ottawa. The demands include:

- An immediate $800 million government grant for housing;
- Indian monetary control, rather than the department of Indian affairs;
- Recognition of native land claims hitherto ignored;
- Initiation of economic development and education programs for native peoples;
- The observation of numerous broken treaty agreements;
- An immediate parliamentary investigation into the department of Indian and northern affairs over its alleged corruption and harassment

California field workers here to denounce UFW

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

Two California field workers arrived in Toronto yesterday to give their version of why thousands of grape pickers switched from the United Farm Workers (UFW) to join the Teamsters Union.

The field workers, Josephine Garcia and Linda Regalado, allegedly organized the trip themselves, with financial help from several Coachella Valley growers.

However the field workers were expected to be accompanied by Teamsters representatives.

The women—Teamsters members—will be here for a few days to give press conferences and interviews. They claim they were mistreated as UFW members.

Marshall Ganz, UFW spokesman questioned the women's visit to Toronto and said he believed one of the women to be a labor contractor.

In 1972 the Teamsters signed five-year contracts with 45 growers, freezing the UFW out of all but a couple of contracts.

The UFW began to strike last fall over collusive contracts signed between the growers and the Teamsters.

The UFW is waging a campaign across North America to urge consumers to boycott California grapes and lettuce.

Winnipeg police break up picket supporting united farm workers

WINNIPEG (CUP) — Two policemen broke up a widely dispersing picket line at a Dominion Foods store in Winnipeg last week.

The United Farm Workers Winnipeg Boycott Committee organized the picket at the Polo Park Shopping Centre as an informational support action of the UFW's boycott of all California-grown grapes and lettuce.

The police had been expected all morning. There had been rumours that Polo Park had got an injunction against the picketing activities, although S. Ray, shopping centre manager denied this saying, "no one has applied for an injunction that I am aware of at this time." Two Sentinel Security Guards had been keeping a close eye on the picketers.

Initially four policemen drove up in two squad cars, but one of the two-man cars quickly left after it became clear that there wasn't going to be any trouble with the picketers.

The police talked to Doug Tottle, spokesperson for the picketers, for a few minutes then took the names, addresses and phone numbers of the 11 people still left on the line, warning them that they could be summoned on a charge of petty trespassing.

Ray, who does not normally work at the centre on Saturdays came to Polo Park to tell the picketers to disperse because they were "picketing on private property." Ray said, "I called the police after I came in from the picket line. One of the picketers said they wouldn't talk to anybody but the police. I wanted to have an official witness when I advised them that they were trespassing."

In a telephone interview Ray said, "We're not really interested in pressing charges right now. We will wait to see if they come back before making a final decision."

Presumably this means that the Polo Park management will use the threat of legal action to keep the boycott committee from picketing the store again.

If however, the store does press charges under the Canadian criminal code, it could be argued that the charges were not laid to uphold the law but to harass certain individuals.

You don't blow an extraordinary idea on an ordinary shoe.

By now you're probably aware that Roots are not like other kinds of footwear. The heel is lower to give you the natural kind of walk you'd get by going barefoot in sand. The arch is supported, so if you spend much time on your feet you'll now spend it in much greater comfort. The rocker sole helps spring you off on each footstep, so walking becomes a little less work than it ever was before. But a big part of Roots' success lies in not how OFS calls for major reforms in student awards plan

Very substantial reforms are needed in the Ontario Student Award Plan (OSAP), according to a report prepared by the Ontario Federation of Students for a conference held in Sudbury this weekend.

In a report entitled Let them eat cake, OFS attacks the present scheme in a number of areas: student living allowances, expected student contributions, the age of independence and interest rates for loans.

The report points out students who receive OSAP are forced to survive on $32 a week, less than the poverty level and less than recommendations of provincial student award officers.

Minister of Colleges and Universities James Auld has refused to increase the amount despite inflationary pressures and local variations in the cost of living.

Students who live in university residences costing more than $32 a week must appeal for the difference in costs as a loan, not a grant as in the past.

The student contribution expected from summer work is based on a table with increases for each year of education. The report points out summer jobs often bear no relation to educational status and expected earnings haven't taken into account increases in the cost of living.

The report also points out student unemployment remains high, especially for women, and appeals based on inability to find work result in increases in loans, not grants.

The report concludes that "OSAP is adding an extra economic burden to the already heavy social barrier women have to overcome in seeking an education."

The system is also weighted toward students whose families have profitable connections and can get high paying jobs. The report suggests the solution is to take a percentage of the students' income based on the actual cost of living.

Expectations are also unrealistic for those who are returning from the work force, with applicants being expected to contribute 25 percent of their gross income for the last eight months.

The present regulations on the age of independence also come under fire. Although students are legally adults at 18 they are unable to be considered independently of their parents for a student loan until 24.

The system now discriminates against those whose parents refuse to help them as well as those who do not want to be supported or who have differences with their parents.

This provision works especially against middle-income families with more than one student to educate, those who are just above the cut-off for student aid.

The report also attacks the present loan system as "an especially pernicious form of financing higher education because they work unequally." Students are forced to assume indebtedness which is not related to ability to pay.

OFS rejects the present system because it feels post-secondary education should be funded through an equitable taxation system, rather than students having to mortgage their futures to get an education.

In the long term OFS favors free tuition and living stipends for students. But in the short term, OFS contends, reforms are required now in the OSAP scheme.

Students, the report points out, are paying more of their educational costs despite increases in government educational expenditures.

The operation of OSAP, the report charges, is based on a "bureaucrat's fairy-tale" and shows that the Ontario government "has no intention of increasing accessibility to post-secondary education or of even supporting students at a subsistence level."

Despite the present plan's inadequacies, the government has refused to increase funds available although the number of applications has increased rapidly.

APUS wants parity on Governing Council

The Association for Part-time Undergraduate Students (APUS) will submit a brief to Governing Council calling for an enlarged council with student-faculty and internal-external parity.

The APUS brief is similar to one offered by the Alumni Association, but differs in numbers from a common student brief drawn up by SAC and the Graduate Students' Union (GSU).

The APUS position calls for 12 faculty, 12 students and 12 alumni members, together with four support staff, 18 government appointees and two presidential appointees. Along with the two statutory members — the president and the chancellor — council membership would total 62.

According to APUS president Norma Grindal, the APUS brief represents a more realistic approach to the problem of restructuring the council than the SAC GSU position.

Grindal is afraid that, if it rejected the SAC GSU position, the council may make no move whatsoever towards parity on the council; accordingly, the APUS brief poses a more acceptable solution, she feels.

Governing Council will discuss a revision of its composition at two meetings, Oct. 17 and 24. Briefs to the council on the subject are due by Oct. 1.

The present composition of the 50-member council includes 16 government appointees, 12 faculty, eight students, two support staff and eight alumni, together with the president and the chancellor, who are ex-officio members.

The SAC GSU position calls for a 66-member council with 21 government appointees, 14 faculty, 14 students, four support staff and eight alumni, as well as four municipal representatives and the president.

Students oppose hiring procedures

The dismissal of a highly-rated lecturer in the Victoria College French department last winter moved many students to question the university's current hiring and firing procedures.

The dismissal sparked students in the department to demand representation on the body which, effectively, wields the power on hiring decisions, but the attempt proved fruitless.

The French department refused to renew French lecturer J.D. Orsoni's contract, which terminates at the end of this academic year, although all but two of the instructor's 40 students from four separate classes signed a petition last year supporting his retention.

The strongly worded petition noted, in part: "There is no doubt in our minds that he (Orsoni) is a teacher of superior quality... His departure would be a loss to his students — both present and prospective."

The decision to dump Orsoni was made by a department "consultative" committee composed entirely of faculty members — with no student representation.

Theoretically the committee advises the department chairman on all matters relating to appointments, but traditionally the chairman never uses his veto power.

Students were dealt a blow last February as the department rejected a bid for student representation on this consultative committee.

Peter Jarrett, a Vic French student who is a Governing Council member this year actively pushing for student say in hiring and firing decisions across campus, maintained last year the Vic department had "overruled the student voice." Jarrett took a course taught by Orsoni last year.

The French department's move came less than a year after the dismissal of three instructors in the mathematics department sparked an 11-day occupation of that department's offices.

With the math firing, as well, students' attempts to retain the three highly-rated instructors were futile, causing growing frustration among students and leading to a referendum last fall among undergraduates.

The referendum's results firmly supported parity representation of students and faculty on hiring and firing committees.

Although these firings in the French and math departments stirred considerable protest, most staffing decisions at the university are made quietly — without student input and without controversy.

But student leaders this year are mounting a campaign in a bid for representation on tenure and hiring and firing bodies to ensure teaching ability is given equal consideration with research ability in any staffing decision.

The Governing Council is currently considering models for selecting student reps to sit on tenure committees following a university report last year which recommended students be denied representation on such bodies because of lack of mechanisms to select students to sit on such committees.

Law union conference examines police brutality

The Law Union, which held its first conference last weekend at OISE, is a young group of lawyers, law students and legal workers who are committed to doing legal work for Canadian people's movements.

The purpose of the conference was to adopt a constitution, register members and plan an ongoing organization to support their work.

Among the topics discussed at the conference were women in law, rent strikes, immigration, political ethics, native peoples and alternative forms of legal practice.

The following article deals with Toronto lawyer Clayton Ruby's discussion of police brutality at the conference.

By CHRIS PROBERT

"The most dangerous spot on earth is the backsteps of 52 division."

So said Toronto lawyer Clayton Ruby to 300 people at the Law Union's weekend conference on police abuse held in OISE.

The remark brought a laugh, but the problem to which the delegates were addressing themselves was a serious one.

Just how serious the problem was Ruby went on to explain.

He began by outlining the courses of action — and their effectiveness — open to a lawyer when a client brings a complaint of police brutality to him.

The first and least effective method is a complaint to the police complaint bureau.

"The police know they have nothing to fear from the complaints bureau," said Ruby.

Of the 50 complaints Ruby has filed through the bureau over the years, only one in his view has received a satisfactory response.

Toronto lawyer Arthur Maloney, who has often defended police against brutality charges, is presently conducting a one-man inquiry into the workings of the police complaints bureau.

No Written Response

Until two years ago, Ruby received a written response to complaints, but since then, "the complaints bureau has refused to reply to my complaints at all."

Even more disturbing, said Ruby, is the fact complaints no longer seem to find their way into the individual cop's file as they once did.

More and more, the police are using their own discretion to decide whether a complaint is "minor" or "serious."

If asked, a policeman will tell a "minor" complaint — a cop placing a speeding motorist whom he has apprehended to "go to hell."

Naturally, only so-called "serious" complaints find their way into the files.

The principal tactical value in laying a charge is the considerable annoyance to the police force. The hiring of a high-priced lawyer for the defence costs the police from $1,500 to $2,500 and higher — at no cost to the complainant.

But at the same time, the complainant loses some advantages. He cannot choose his own lawyer to prosecute but must rely on a Crown attorney, generally from another county.

This policy supposedly promotes impartiality, but in practice it often favours the victim of brutality a Crown attorney who is both unfamiliar and uninterested in local police practice.

Moreover, the complainant becomes a "marked man" whom the police will try to "get" later.

More subtly, his lawyer will find many of information sources will have dried up.

Police Clam Up

A telephone call to learn the police version of the alleged brutality will be met with the reply: "The matter is in the courts and we don't want to say anything which would prejudice it."

John Liss, who organized the conference with Ruby, said, "It would be nice to know, as a lawyer, what the police story is going to be."

"Will it be that your client reached for the policeman's gun and forced the policeman to punch him in the jaw 10 times?"

"Or is it that your client came into the station with a broken jaw? It helps when you're deciding what type of evidence to go for."

He spoke of a widespread assumption among police that they are the last bastions of decency amid the forces of anarchy(!).

This assumption is shared by many of the public, said Ruby. "The public wants the job done at any cost — but it doesn't want to know how."

The public's attitude means to some extent that police who use brutal methods are successful and serve as models for imitation.

Ruby cited "Lumpy Lambert and his boys" as illustration.

For many years they managed to keep Toronto's rate of bank robberies down by descending with clubs on known Montreal robbers as soon as they hit town.

Fifteen minutes after their arrival, the bruised and battered desperados were on an eastbound freight train back to Montreal.

They would be met by friends in Montreal, who took one look and said, "Where have you been — Toronto?" Word got around.

But as effective as Lumpy Lambert's measures were, Ruby wondered aloud whether he could trust Lumpy's discretion and decided that he could not.

One of the audience also questioned whether Lambert would be likely to strongarm a modern-day computer thief, and somehow doubted it, even though such thieves net considerably more than ordinary bank robbers.

Ruby noted police brutality is also traceable to the social situation from which the average cop comes.

Policemen are drawn mostly from upper working class or lower middle class backgrounds — "the football team from Malvern Collegiate."

"The force offers an escape from the working class environment, it's not nine-to-five, there's some excitement and — extremely important — there's a good pension."

The police pension arrangements have undergone recent changes, but they used to be a full pension after 25 years of service until death.

When thrust among people who remind them of their backgrounds, many police become uneasy.

This uneasiness, and the conviction that anarchy threatens, creates among police a "seige mentality," said Ruby.

By and large, a police officer's friends are policemen themselves which reinforces this mentality.

A former police trainee recalled his first reading for the course was a presentation called "Them and Us", urging secrecy — don't tell your relatives, your friends, or your wife what you do.

An attack on police brutality may be conceived as less than an attack on police themselves, which would only aggravate their seige mentality, than an attack on their isolation from the society around them, he said.

Ruby attempted to formulate the distinction via two possible courtroom stances. "One, I can attack the cop as a sadistic brute — this is what they expect. Or I can attack him as a stupid idiot who doesn't know how to do his job right."

OCUA membership a poor choice

Last Thursday, the Ontario government announced the membership of the new Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA). The council, headed by former U of T political economy chairman Stefan Dupre, is intended to act as a buffer between universities and government.

In theory, the OCUA is intended to avoid direct conflict between universities and government, with the universities making their monetary pitches directly to the OCUA, which then advises the government.

In practice, the choice of membership may send the OCUA off to a disastrous start from which it is unlikely to recover.

The membership is laced heavily with corporate executives and university administrators, but ignores completely representatives of student, faculty and labour organizations. Nor, with the exception of Reva Gerstein, are there any notable educational innovators included. Certainly, Dupre himself is more bureaucrat than educator.

Two completely unknown students, an undergraduate from northern Ontario, and a graduate from southern Ontario, have been chosen. Suggestions by the Ontario Federation of students went unheeded.

As universities minister James Auld hoped, conflict between estates on the committee will certainly be avoided. But, more seriously, neither students nor faculty will have means to express their views on the OCUA. The student point of view is hardly represented by having a student sit on the committee.

The situation is somewhat akin to the one in which the kindly old matron asks the unwashed adolescent: "and what do you young people think about life?"

Except the Ontario government is no kindly old matron. This is obviously a deliberate tactic. By having no representation from concerned university estates, the OCUA is less likely to oppose government attempts to cut back educational spending.

Students and faculty will be frustrated at being ignored. And universities will be frustrated in having to talk to a front group which will avoid the real issue; namely, do universities get more money or don't they?

The OCUA may suggest how it wants money spent, but it can't suggest how much. That power lies with the government, and the universities cannot deal directly with the government.

What do you young people think about the Ontario government?

Evans: no to debate

Dear Mr. Kanowitch:

Thank you for your letter in which you invite me to engage in a public debate with you on the issue of student-faculty parity on the Governing Council. There are several reasons why I do not think it advisable for me to participate in such a debate at this time. First, the issue of student parity has been debated on this campus at great length, to the virtual exclusion of other aspects of Governing Council membership, and I am not sure that there is much more to be said on that issue that has not been said already; this also seemed to be the opinion of the students and faculty on the Governing Council when the discussions of revision of the University of Toronto Act took place last year. Secondly, the University community has been asked to respond with briefs to the Governing Council by October 1st, and a debate on October 10th would tend to be after the fact in terms of those submissions. And thirdly, as you pointed out in your letter, I have already indicated my personal opinion on the matter, not just on the issue of parity but on the broader aspects of representation on the Governing Council.

I do not attach the significance ascribed by some to the principle of parity, either as between staff and students or as between university and government alumni representatives on the Governing Council. In my opinion this issue has been magnified out of all proportion to its actual importance in the working of the University's governing body. The factors which should be preponderant in any consideration of revised membership for the Governing Council are those which relate to its effective functioning as a policy-making body for a complex institution.

There are clearly areas where changes in representation would improve the Council's functioning, whether through the designation of specific representatives or through the use of co-opted members. I have already drawn attention to two areas where I believe specific changes would enhance the Council's functioning: assured representation from Scarborough and Erindale and increased representation from among the administrative leaders of the academic divisions. I also believe that there is a case for added representation of the non-academic staff. One important proposal for change that I would hope the student organizations will address themselves to is the possible redefinition of student constituencies now that we have moved to a credit system in a large part of the University and the distinction between part-time and full-time students has become blurred. I have already raised this question with APUS and asked them to consider what new definition of part-time status might be developed so that the special interests of those who are taking some courses at the University but are also maintaining a full-time work load outside the University may be adequately represented.

From the point of view of the Council's effectiveness, there is no question, from the experience of the last two years, that the contribution made to the work of the Council by the representatives of the teaching staff has been integral and indeed essential to its effective functioning, for that reason, and also because the academic staff are central to the purposes of the University and the quality of its programmes, I believe that any changes in the Council's composition which dilute the impact of the academic staff or symbolize a diminution of their contribution would lessen the Council's effectiveness as a policy-making body for the University.

Another matter that bears on effective functioning is the overall size of the Council; consideration should be given to defining those areas where the use of co-opted membership can reduce unwieldy work loads of Council members and also mobilize additional expertise and experience to deal with specific problems.

I shall be happy to explain and elaborate on these views to any students who are interested, but I do not think it appropriate for me to engage in a formal debate on the Council's composition with any constituency. I have supported the position that this matter should be debated in the full Governing Council rather than in the Executive Committee because it is essential that whatever revisions to the Act are brought forward by the University be arrived at, understood and supported in open session where all members can be fully involved.

John Evans

Another challenge

Dear Dr. Evans:
 I would like to reiterate my in-itation for a public debate with you on the question of parity on the Governing Council. I would also like to challenge the reasons you give for your tentative refusal to debate.

You indicate you are willing "to explain and elaborate on these views (on parity) to any students who are interested." There are many students who are concerned about the issue and have not had an opportunity, other than through The Varsity, to consider the discussions surrounding the matter. Most students do not want to go to relatively boring meetings of the Governing Council or read through the lengthy CUG report. In fact, one of the best way that students could inform themselves further on the matter is to listen to both sides in a public debate.

The debate is not intended to influence the content of submissions to the Council which are due October 1. Rather, it is hoped that it will raise the level of understanding of the issue on campus still further and contribute to even more discussion among members of the university community.

The debate would be a formal one, with a high degree of decorum so that a frank exchange of ideas might occur. Sloganeering or clichés would be replaced by reasoned arguments for and against parity.

Should you decline this invitation again, you would certainly be open to criticism for not encouraging the fullest possible discussion on campus on this key question.

I urge you to accept, and precise format of the debate can be worked out to our mutual satisfaction. Please reply as soon as possible so that appropriate arrangements can be made.

TRANSCENDENTAL MEDITATION

There will be introductory lectures in SCI and the benefits of Transcendental Meditation tonight at 8 pm in the Council Chamber at Scarboro College, and on October 3 in Rm. 3153 Medical Science Building at 8 p.m. All are invited to attend.

What can be learned easily and enjoyed by everyone, provides deep rest as a basis for dynamic activity, improves clarity of perception, develops creative intelligence, expands awareness, and encourages the development of the individual in a natural way? The answer, for a growing number of people, is Transcendental Meditation, (TM), as taught by the Maharishi Mahesh Yogi (of Beate fame). The average student, grown cynical in a world that markets panaceas for everything from headaches to damaged egos, tends to view claims such as these sceptically. TM, with its Eastern origins, is sometimes equated unfavourably with the practitioners of the more bizarre sects that exist on the fringes of rational consciousness. Devine Light, Hare Krishna, and the Jesus Freaks, to name a few. To anybody who studies the subject, however, it becomes increasingly apparent that TM is not a form of 'quack consciousness', but rather a very real form of awareness with demonstrable physiological results and that it is increasingly being adopted by the 'straight' establishment for that reason.

TM and Consciousness
What is TM? Technically, it is the applied, practical aspect of the Science of Creative Intelligence (SCI). TM, however, bears the same relation to SCI that elementary math does to advanced calculus. While the first is a vast improvement over counting by fingers, it is not necessary to know calculus to use it. TM, once learned, can be used by anyone; there is no process of conversion involved.

TM is not a religion. Hindus as well as Buddists, Jews as well as Christians, atheists as well as agnostics can use it. Indeed, many claim that TM contributes to a greater awareness of their respective beliefs.

The advocates of TM, and an increasing number of researchers, believe that TM is a state of 'restful alertness'; and that it is a "fourth major state of consciousness as natural to man as the other three physiologically defined states—wakefulness, dreaming and deep sleep." Just as a lack of any of these causes breakdowns in the normal functioning of the individual, TM'ers feel that man's anxiety, nervousness, fuzzy and emotional thinking can be attributed to the lack of meditation.

Scientific Evidence
There is clear physical evidence to back up this reasoning. Tests of TM have been conducted at such institutions as Harvard, UCLA, Berkely, Cambridge and others, with results published in the Scientific American, the American Journal of Physiology, and the prestigious Lancet of England. The combined data from these tests suggest that an individual in a state of TM achieves a physical state of deep rest and relaxation while remaining, on a conscious level, awake and alert.

While asleep, an individual's oxygen intake drops slowly by 8 per cent; under TM it drops by 16 per cent. Under TM breathing slows to half the normal rate, while the cardiac output falls by 30 per cent, indicating a reduced work load on the heart.

Physically, TM sharpens reflexes, improving both speed and accuracy. TM improves reaction time by 20 per cent.

It will perhaps interest the student who crams incessantly for exams to know that tests have shown that TM improves both long and short term recall by almost 2½ times in some cases. Tests have also indicated that TM improves interpersonal relations by removing it is thought the tensions and anxiety—the 'background chatter' as one TM'er called it—that dull an individual's personality. As one University of Saskatchewan student mediator put it, "I just enjoy people more, and I guess they enjoy me more too. Relationships are richer and more open."

The Maharishi Mahesh Yogi

TM and Education
Unlike the sidewalk proselytizers who seek Nirvana in the devotion of oblivion, TM is making rapid progress towards acceptance by the 'straight' establishment. Since TM first reached the West fourteen years ago it has claimed over 300,000 adherents. Even more importantly, because of TM's demonstrable beneficial affects, educators, researchers, businessmen, social workers and even military men are pushing towards having it accepted as a regular course of study and therapy. The Illinois State Legislature has moved that its education system study the applicability of TM. Many secondary and post secondary institutions have adapted TM courses as electives.

One such school system was the Eastchester (New York) School System. In reviewing the introduction of TM, the Superintendent of the system said that Transcendental Meditation has been of direct and positive help to students in our secondary school who have begun to meditate. Students, parents and teachers report similar findings. Scholastic grades, relations with family, teachers and peers are better, and drug abuse disappears or does not begin. A similar experiment with North York High School students has had the same results.

Dynamic
It should be apparent from this that TM is not a science of passivity. Businessmen, as well as the commander of the US Army War College, Major General Franklin M. Davis, have commented on the practicality of TM. If anything, TM contributes to a more dynamic response to problems by focusing one's energy and awareness.

Carol Hohert, a Toronto teacher of TM, pointed out that there are two types of life, the "householder and the reclusive". To develop a form of meditation based on the reclusive type would be of little value to those who work in the world—the householder—and in fact would be a hindrance. TM is based on that understanding.

TM does not demand an ascetic form of life. As Carol Hohert said, "fasting makes you hungry". It is not a matter of concentration, or effort. Indeed, it is closer to a form of mental relaxation—of "giving your mind the angle, and then letting go". Nor does TM require long hours of practise, devotion, and effort, as for example, Yoga. It takes, and this is surprising, only seven days.

Learning TM is an easy process. There is a preparatory lecture, followed by an interview with a teacher. The first day of actual meditation is conducted under the tutelage of an instructor. This is followed by three days of practise by the student, who goes back to the instructor to verify his efforts. After that he is on his own. Once learned, TM is usually done twice a day for twenty minute period.

How much does it cost? Surprisingly little. The price, which includes life time membership and services, is $60.00 for University students, $115.00 for working adults, and $180.00 for families.

STUDENTS and TEACHING QUALITY

*"Now is the winter of our discontent
Made glorious summer by this sun of York;
And all the clouds that lour'd upon our house
In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.
Now are our brows bound with victorious wreaths;
Our bruised arms hung up for monuments;
Our stern alarums chang'd to merry meetings,
Our dreadful marches to delightful measures."*

If students evaluated professors, would dogs quote Shakespeare?

By GENE ALLEN

The notion of students judging their professors is to some people a fantastic anomaly, stranger and more bewildering than a dog quoting Shakespeare. Do criminals, they ask rhetorically, evaluate magistrates? Do penitents criticize their confessors? Well then, why should students judge their professors?

While such analogies are admittedly farfetched, they preserve an essential feature of the argument against student representation in academic decision-making. This is the idea that students are passive, that their education is and must be something that happens to them through the benevolent agency of the professor, who, like father, knows best.

On this view the student is an empty vessel, a tabula rasa. He lacks something, a certain body of knowledge, which the professor by definition has and will do his best to impart. If the professor actually does impart this specified body of knowledge, to the student, the enterprise is deemed a success, the student gets a degree, and everyone goes home happy.

But (alas for the sorry state of human affairs), there are flaws in this neat little scheme. The most common criticisms expressed by students fall into one of two categories: first, that the education offered does not measure up to its advertised aims; and secondly, that the advertised aims themselves must be modified.

Not As Advertised

Most of the everyday frustrations experienced by students fall into the not-as-advertised category. Anyone who has ever taken undergraduate courses will recognize the following examples of incompetence or indifference in teaching.

- In a course with several sections, there is little co-ordination between professors teaching the different sections. Material appears on tests and exams that has been covered in some sections, but has not even been mentioned in others.

- The teacher speaks too softly (a common problem in large lecture halls), mumbles, or rambles along in a sleep-inducing monotone. What's the point of going to lectures if you can't hear what's being said?

- The absent-minded professor syndrome. This is also called unpreparedness. The teacher does not appear to have lecture material organized, is not sure what he wants to say. Uncertain of how much he has covered in the previous lecture, he either repeats himself or skips large bodies of material. This may be cute in Walt Disney movies, but it's irritating otherwise.

- The course is not taught at the level indicated in the calendar. Vegetarian Cookery Made Easy 130 requires as a prerequisite Calculus and Indonesian History, but students without these prerequisites have no difficulties with the course. Nuclear Physics Made Easy 450 requires only Grade 12 algebra, but by the end of the year students feel Nuclear Physics Made Easy 350 would have been a more suitable prerequisite.

- Marking is consistently too hard or too easy; or is inconsistent among several sections of the same course. Bell-curveing, while it provides an appearance of fair marking, is a poor substitute for adequate evaluation of students' work.

- The professor is simply incompetent in the subject area. This is rare, but it has been known to happen. He just doesn't know what he's talking about.

Such typical complaints reflect the concerns of the student-as-consumer. Education is a commodity which the student is required to pay for, and he wants to get the most for his money. This is certainly a reasonable request, particularly in view of the extremely high cost of university education. One year's tuition is now about as much as the price of a good used car, and as Bill Dowling (lately of Crang Plaza Motors) found out to his dismay, selling used cars with no brakes can get you into trouble. While it seems unlikely that the university will be hauled up before the Better Business Bureau, many students consider course union activity as a way to make sure that the product lives up to its pitch.

Course Unions

Dennis Kaye, an executive member of the History Students' Union, expresses a common view about the function of course unions.

"I think more students now are just interested in getting a degree," Kaye said. "They're just interested in getting a few A's."

"I've changed and almost everybody else has changed. Most grievances now have to do with the quality of courses. They're based on the student's desire to learn rather than on the quasi-political stuff of a few years ago."

HSU president Jim Yaworsky said the role to be played by course union activity is "a service function."

"It lets people know what kinds of courses they're getting into," Yaworsky said. "It might improve the courses, too, when professors see what kinds of evaluations they're getting."

This conception of the role of course unions in influencing the quality of education is based on the course evaluation. Course evaluations generally take the form of questionnaires handed out to students at the completion of a course, asking for answers to questions about how the course was organized and taught. Typical questions asked on course evaluation questionnaires are, "If you knew last September what you know about this course now, would you have enrolled in it?"; "How would you rate this lecturer's ability to communicate his material?"; "Were the tests and exams in this course too easy or too difficult?"; Responses are then compiled and published so that students will have some idea of what to expect in a particular course.

Statistics Never Lie?

In some departments course evaluations are reported in a purely statistical form, reflecting the breakdown of answers. For instance, in answer to the question "How helpful were the lectures as an aid to understanding the subject matter of the course?"; 26.2 percent of the respondents in one course said "very helpful", 36.8 percent said "moderately helpful", 33.2 percent said "not very helpful", no one said "useless", and 15.8 percent said "confusing".

But there can be no doubt that what one student considers "helpful" is "useless" to another student. Students enter courses with widely differing aims, talents, and standards, so that the appearance of "objectivity" presented by statistical course evaluations is a misleading one. Most course unions have recognized this difficulty, and use the statistics as a background for subjective and interpretative evaluation of a particular course by one student.

The greatest discrepancies among students' evaluations of professors occur when a professor's attitude toward students is taken into account. The question whether a professor speaks loudly enough admits of a clear answer; but by contrast, what one student considers arrogance on the part of a professor may be seen as a stimulating intellectual style by another. Consequently, answers to questions on matters such as a professor's willingness to answer questions and consider alternate points of view on a subject will depend on the student's own conception of the purpose of education. A student who feels students should be treated as children will react differently than one who feels students are to be treated as adults.

Professors' Attitudes

Furthermore, attitudes are difficult to pin down except in extreme cases. Few are as forthright about their indifference to teaching as the senior professor who spent the first meeting of an upper-year seminar course explaining to students why they shouldn't take the course. An incredulous student reported, "He was very alienating. He said he hadn't done any reading in the subject area for the past three years. I'd done lots of reading he hadn't done. He made it very clear he was much more interested in departmental bureaucracy."

One professor who gets very poor ratings on course evaluations year after year pins them to his door, underlining the most damning comments with a kind of perverse pride.

"Most specialists in the subject have to take a course from him whether they want to or not and he knows it," a student involved in the course union said.

But more common than outright contempt for undergraduates is indifference to teaching. One student complained that, although she was in a small seminar course, it was not until halfway through the year that the teacher became aware of the students' names.

'Best' Courses Often the Worst

Traditionally, professors have seen themselves as "scholars" rather than "teachers". The main thrust of the present student campaign for parity representation on tenure committees is to ensure that this imbalance is corrected. Paradoxically, sometimes the professors who have succeeded in mechanizing their courses to the greatest extent are evaluated most highly. This occurs when it is the aim of both student and teacher to have the course proceed above all as painlessly as possible.

Thus the evaluation of a professor's attitude depends on the student's reasons for being at university. For the student who is solely interested in getting good marks on tests a course may seem well-organized; while a student who has broader interests will find it dull.

Attitudes are not so easily modified as marking schemes. A particular manifestation of an attitude may be eliminated, but the attitude remains, to be expressed in different ways. Yet some student organizations feel lobbying tactics will be most successful in increasing professors' concern with teaching quality at the university.

Cynicism

This approach is based on a frankly cynical view of the possibilities for democratic decision-making within the university (and ultimately, in any institution). Real decisions are made, according to one course union executive, through "the door-to-door network"; corridor manipulation is the rule, and the university's formal governing structures serve merely to legitimize decisions which have, in effect, already been made.

If this view is accepted, students interested in improving the quality of teaching are best advised to learn techniques of corridor manipulation themselves; to refrain from "alienating" professors by making "unreasonable" demands; and to forget about student representation on "boring" committees which don't have any real power anyway.

Such a position is, in effect, an admission that students will not achieve significant influence on the decision-making process. But influence based on lobbying is no influence at all. Any success such an approach may have is only on the professors' sufferance; there is no guarantee that the student position will be taken into account.

On the contrary, if the university is a legally constituted institution, which it is, certain of its decision-making bodies have specific powers which only they can exercise.

One such decision-making body is the tenure committee, the body which decides who is to get permanent appointments and who is not. If students gain representation on these committees, their concerns about teaching quality cannot be ignored as they can be under the present system, and as they can be under even the most sophisticated lobbying system.

Fortunately, not all course unions take this approach. Tim Higgins, president of the Commerce Students' Association, agrees it is important for students to have personal contact with professors to discuss course problems, but says students should not neglect the formal decision-making structure.

"The thing about the door-to-door method is it's so undercover," Higgins said. "It's best to get used to dealing in a forthright manner."

Quality Teaching

Finally, it must be realized that the phrase "quality of teaching" has a broader application than the consumer's-rights objections indicate. That is, students are concerned not only with how well certain specified objectives are carried out in the classroom, but also with what objectives are to be pursued. Students have a stake in the content of their education, as well as in its style.

This realization raises problems which should not be dismissed just because of their difficulty. What is the purpose of education? To get a job? To get a degree? To comprehend the platonic Forms lurking behind the mundane surfaces of reality?

There has traditionally been an opposition between science and humanities students on this point. Science students, it is claimed, are only interested in learning certain specific techniques. Dave Nobes, president of the Math and Physics Society and Course Union agrees that science students must cover more basic material than humanities students, but feels that stereotypes should not be perpetuated.

Since Einstein, Nobes said, scientists have been increasingly concerned with the use to which scientific developments are put. Granted the difference in time required for elementary training, then, there is really no difference in the concerns of science students and economics or social science students who claim the content of their education is geared toward an uncritical acceptance of the world as it is.

Only students can define for themselves what they hope to get out of a university education. But they should be encouraged to make a positive decision, and not passively accept decisions made for them by others.

Students have no interests more immediate than those relating to the quality of their education. Student representation on tenure committees will ensure that these interests are adequately defended.

National guardsmen admit order to fire at Kent State

CLEVELAND (CUPI) — As the long-awaited criminal trial of several Ohio National Guardsmen indicted for the 1970 shootings at Kent State University approaches, their commanding officer has now confirmed earlier reports that one of the indicted men actually gave an order to fire. Until now, National Guard officials have consistently maintained that no order to fire had been given.

Lt. Col. Charles Fassinger made the disclosure in a sworn deposition filed recently in a civil case in which he and more than 50 other persons are being sued for their roles in the Kent incident which left four students dead and nine wounded. Fassinger, who was the senior uniformed officer on the scene of the shootings, testified that an order to fire had been given by Matthew J. McManus.

It was not clear from Fassinger's deposition whether McManus gave the order before or after the shooting began or whether McManus told the troops to fire at or over the students.

A Justice Department summary of an 8,000-page FBI report on the shootings corroborated Fassinger's story, but said, "Sgt. McManus stated that after the firing began, he gave an order to 'fire over their heads.'"

A source close to the case, however, emphasized that the summary was only of information uncovered in the months immediately following the shooting and is by no means the final word on the matter. It is expected that the question of an order to fire will be more closely pursued as additional witnesses are interviewed and during subsequent court proceedings.

McManus is one of eight former guardsmen indicted by the federal grand jury which investigated the shootings last winter (after then-Attorney General Elliot Richardson overruled the decisions of his predecessors John Mitchell and Richard Kleindienst forbidding such a grand jury investigation).

McManus himself has taken the Fifth Amendment in response to questions about the shooting.

The criminal trial of McManus and the seven other indicted guardsmen is scheduled to open in Cleveland in mid-October. The grand jury that indicted them has not been discharged, and it is possible, although unlikely, that there could be more indictments as more information about the shootings emerges.

Meanwhile, independent of the criminal cases, the civil cases are also proceeding.

The civil cases are brought under the federal civil rights laws, which provide money damages for persons deprived of their constitutional rights under colour of law.

All nine of the injured students, plus the parents of all four of the students killed at Kent, have such cases pending. The cases have been consolidated and will be tried in federal court in Cleveland in April 1975. The lengthy process of pre-trial discovery is now going on, and it was in the course of this discovery process that Fassinger disclosed his knowledge about McManus' order.

The discovery process had been interrupted in 1970 when a federal judge dismissed the civil cases. In April of this year, however, that dismissal was overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court.

The most significant feature of the civil cases is that they name as defendants not only the enlisted personnel who fired their weapons into the students on May 4, but also the National Guard commanders and officials who were responsible for placing the troops in the situation with loaded weapons and under orders to disperse peaceful assemblies.

One of the civil defendants is Sylvester Del Corso, a war hero and former prison warden who became Ohio's Adjutant General in 1968. It was Del Corso who implemented the extraordinary policy of sending Ohio guardsmen into routine civil disturbance duty with live ammunition loaded in their weapons—contrary to regular Army practice—and under permissive rules regarding the use of fire-power.

Prior to the 1970 shootings, Del Corso had urged Ohio guardsmen to write letters in support of the war, and had publicly stated his belief that communist conspirators were behind the campus protest movement.

Another of the civil defendants is James A. Rhodes, who was Governor of Ohio in 1970, and who had appointed Del Corso. Late in 1969 and in 1970, Rhodes had made public vows to end disruptions on Ohio campuses. During Rhodes' administration, the Ohio National Guard saw more duty in civil disorders than the National Guard of any other state in the union.

On the day before the Kent shootings, Rhodes had held a press conference in the city, denouncing the groups whom he presumed responsible for the disorder and vowing to "drive them out of Kent."

A former guardsman who was in charge of the Guard's press relations at Kent State has testified in his deposition in the civil cases that at a closed meeting preceding his press conference, Rhodes had given orders that the Guard should disperse even peaceful assemblies on the campus.

Soccer Blues still unbeaten

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues ground out a 3-2 victory over the Guelph Gryphons last Thursday night at Varsity Stadium.

Traditionally the Gryphons play a never-say-die game against the Blues and this contest proved to be no exception.

As in previous games Toronto had the benefit of an early goal only to squander the advantage a few minutes later by indifferent defensive play.

The Blues' score after only three minutes resulted from a magnificent individual effort by Hendrickse who slinked his way through crowded territory before shooting low past Anason into the visitors' net.

The equalizing tally however, required much less individual expertise on the part of the Guelph attack.

Guelph's scoring opportunity was presented by Varsity's defensive corps who seemingly on cue slipped on the turf at each successive crucial moment.

M'Hangs, possessing the inestimable advantage of an upright position, coolly hit the ball beneath Perusco's diving (or slipping?) body.

Opportunities fell to both sides with Evans of Toronto and M'Hangs feeling the most grieved at their misfortune in failing to score.

Until Stamopoulos was inserted at the 37 minute mark into the left wing position for Blues, replacing Robinson who moved to a defensive role, the stalemate seemed unbreakable.

Almost immediately Toronto showed some menace upsetting the composure of the visitors to the extent that a cross from the left was mispunched by Anason.

To his horror, he could only watch as the ball dropped to Jerullo and was promptly transferred into the unguarded Guelph net.

Buoyed by their halftime lead, Toronto attacked with flair and spirit on the restart.

Deservedly they increased their margin after ten minutes of non-stop action.

Harris made an interception near his own goal and passed quickly out to Hendrickse on the right. He swerved inside the released a 40 yard through ball to Vassiliou in full stride.

The forward concluded this lengthy rush by crashing the ball home.

It was an incisive goal and should have signalled the end for Guelph.

For a few minutes Guelph seemed to placidly accept their fate but this attitude appeared to change coincident with Evans' departure from Blues' midfield because of an instep injury.

The Toronto play degenerated from the exotic to the quixotic with missed defensive assignments and sloppy team play.

The Gryphons, without really raising their game, suddenly found themselves the better team and, as befits their character, took advantage of Blues' self-made woes.

Unlike a previous occasion, Hendrickse did not look up when he received a pass in his defensive zone.

Instead his dribble was summarily halted and the ball quickly relayed to the middle of Varsity's goal area.

With no Blues on duty, M'Hangs picked his spot on net, changed his mind and still had time to shoot easily past the beleaguered Perusco.

Had M'Hangs not slipped at the vital moment a few seconds later, he could have equalized the score with his third goal.

At this point the greasy turf was probably Blues' best defender.

Enough was enough so Blues rallied for the last five minutes making passable efforts at scoring.

Again Guelph, by sheer hard work, had made a close contest out of a game they should have lost heavily.

Toronto was left unbeaten but not unbruised.

THE UNIVERSITY CONTINUES TO FIRE SOME OF ITS BEST TEACHERS

"All right, so he passed his oral exams at twelve, 5,000 students attend his lectures and he leads one hell of a graduate seminar. But where are his publications?"

Decisions on hiring, firing, promotion, and tenure are RARELY BASED ON A PROFESSOR'S TEACHING ABILITIES. They are usually based on research performance, the number of publications faculty members produce, and their willingness to perform administrative functions.

At the moment, decisions about who gets tenure (lifetime teaching appointments) are made secretly by small groups of senior faculty members.

The best judges of professors' teaching abilities are their students. The only real way to ensure that teaching ability is taken seriously in staffing decisions is to ensure that students' interests are guaranteed. THIS MEANS SITTING STUDENTS IN EQUAL NUMBERS WITH FACULTY MEMBERS ON THE BODIES MAKING THOSE DECISIONS.

Only then can students be assured that their interest in good teaching is given equal prominence with the faculty's desire to see sound research continue.

The Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council is currently discussing the question of students on tenure committees. COME OUT TO THE ACADEMIC AFFAIRS MEETING THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3rd AT 4:00 IN THE COUNCIL CHAMBER AT SIMCOE HALL, and hear them discuss:

Lady Blues track team does well at Mac meet

By JANET FLETCHER

The ladies Blues track and field team got off to a good start Friday at McMaster.

The first meet of the season hosted by McMaster was a low-keyed affair, but provided the first opportunity for many of the athletes present to test their fitness.

Toronto sent only a small contingent to the meet but registered some pleasing performances. The Varsity team consisted of Geri Ashdown, Lauryn Dushenko, Lesley Evans, Hazel Lynn, and Connie van Wenden.

Evans, in particular, showed she was in good form with wins in the 400m, 800m, and 4 x 400m relay.

Lynn featured in the most exciting finish of the day, registering the same time as the winner, Drinkwater, in the 100m.

The 4 x 400m relay team continued in its winning way (the team won this event at last year's OWIAA championships) with a clearcut victory. More training and more competition should see a substantial reduction in the time for this event.

Results

100m: Drinkwater (Queen's) 13.1 sec., Lynn (U of T) 13.1, Carey (Queen's) 14.3.
 200m: Trap (Mac) 26.9, Drinkwater (Queen's) 27.3, Summers (Mac) 27.5, Lynn (U of T) 27.6.
 400m: Evans (U of T) 58.9, Trap (Mac) 59.2, Wallace (York) 61.8, Ashdown (U of T) 62.8.
 800m: Evans (U of T) 2.27.5, Mashinter (Mac) 2.39.2.

be halted because of an unruly crowd.

"I would have stopped the game at once when those idiots came onto the field if Varsity had been losing," said referee Bob Park after the game.

"You expect a few pranks from college kids, but not that amount of stupidity."

The game officials also severely criticized the Metro police hired to assist in crowd control.

"When my cap was stolen," complained one official, "I pointed out the student who did it to a nearby Metro cop but he just laughed at me and refused to do anything."

Eventually the official filed a complaint with the police commission but nothing has been done.

The university police are very helpful; the referees agreed, and usually manage to control the students effectively. "The campus police deserve a real vote of thanks but without support from the Metros, they are in a pretty hopeless spot," one official commented.

Last year, unruly students cost a Queen's player a chance to set a field goal kicking record.

"They lined up to kick late in the game but suddenly we realized that the students had engulfed the field and there weren't any goalposts left standing," said Park.

There will always be a handful of students who get their jollies by excessive drinking and fighting at intercollegiate athletic events.

It is unfortunate that other students tolerate this conduct at the very time when the university is debating the ability of students to exercise a more influential role in matters somewhat weightier than the survival of a set of goalposts.

Football Blues dump Queen's 32-9

By PAUL CARSON

However, after Saturday's 32-9 victory over Queen's Golden Gaels before 8,100 at the Stadium, Nicoletti et al should become almost household expressions.

Their anonymity is understandable since all are interior linemen. They block and tackle. Saturday, they won a football game.

In a dramatic switch in tactics, Blues opted for a ground attack that eventually produced 48 rushing plays netting a fantastic 366 yards and 17 first downs. Such a game plan obviously depends on solid blocking and Blues have it.

Nicoletti (44) is the offensive centre, a four-year veteran who also serves on the men's athletic directorate. Rosborough (55) and Wright (68) are the guards, while Dawson (60) and Sokovnin (62) are left and right tackles respectively. Dawson was an all-Canada selection last year at McGill and Sokovnin does double duty as Blues punter.

The defensive line got a break when Gaels superb rusher Dave Hadden was unable to play but it probably wouldn't have mattered. After yielding an early touchdown, the Varsity front four held Gaels to only 32 net yards on 26 rushing attempts.

The 340 yard difference is an accurate measure of Varsity's superiority along the line.

All-star tackle Ken Hussey missed the game but ends Sutherland (64) and Alexov (61) plus tackles Craig (51) and Sazio (63) effectively neutralized Gaels all-important rushing attack. Consequently, the visitors were forced to the air where quarterback Raold Serebrin gained a misleading 204 yards.

Blues manufactured a capable pass rush and Queens really never threatened after the opening quarter.

Craig is in the Faculty of Education and thus should be lost after this season but barring injuries Alexov, Sazio and Sutherland should be mainstays for at least two more years.

Blues began the game inauspiciously by fumbling the opening kickoff and then taking a no yards penalty to set up Queens on the Varsity 27. After two good short passes Serebrin scored on a keeper with only 2:45 gone. The convert attempt was wide.

Varsity spent the entire opening quarter working against a brisk wind and concentrated on developing the critical running game. In fact, quarterback Dave Langley passed only once and it was incomplete.

Midway through the second quarter, the running attack began to produce results as rookie Mark Bragagnolo and veteran Libert Castillo scampered through gaping holes created by Rosborough and Dawson on the left side.

The drive culminated at 10:06 when Langley hit flanker Brent Elsey on a short screen from a third-down gamble and the speedy Varsity co-captain lugged it in for six points.

Don Wright added the convert and then pinned Gaels deep into their own end with a booming 80-yard kickoff with the wind.

Queens conceded two safety touches before the half to give Varsity an 11-6 advantage at the intermission.

Appearing for probably the last time at the Stadium as coach of the Gaels, Frank Tindall chose the wind for the third quarter. The strategy, however, immediately backfired as Bragagnolo, Castillo and Bob Hedges followed perfect blocking down the field and Bragagnolo capped the drive with a 13-yard touchdown run behind Sokovnin and Wright.

Blues also got a break on the convert when Don Wright's placement bounced off the crossbar but fell between the goalposts for the extra point.

Gaels responded with their only effective drive of the second half but Blues defence held and Queens had to settle for a 15-yard fieldgoal by Will Kennedy.

Thereafter, it was all Varsity.

Soccer Blues win third straight

By JOHN COBBY

In addition to Thursday's game at the stadium against Guelph, (see page 10) the soccer Blues played Sunday at Brock University splitting the spoils with the Brock badgers.

To say that any result other than a decisive Blues' victory is a surprise is to underestimate the case; yet the final score read 1-1.

Perhaps the Toronto team felt all they had to do was dress, play a little, and a win would follow in the natural order of things.

Unfortunately this was not to be due in part to the tenacity of the Badgers, missed chances by the Blues, and typically incomprehensive officiating.

The refereeing in St. Catharines is generally recognized as uniformly disgraceful.

As anticipated the Varsity team held a territorial advantage from the kick-off, but were unable to make their superiority count mostly through errant shooting.

Still, after 20 minutes Vassiliou opened up the Brock defense with a long pass down the left to McKeown. He sped goalwards and beat the goalkeeper with a fine ground shot.

The referee disallowed his effort with a dubious offside call.

Ten minutes later the ball again rested, but only momentarily, in the Brock goal. It had arrived there via a corner kick but left via a hole in the netting.

Even though the Brock captain, John Seely, confirmed to the referee that the goal was there, the official negated the Varsity score.

It is clearly stated in the rulebook that the referee should check the nets before the game to prevent such an eventuality.

Feeling deprived of their just rewards many of the Blues demonstrated an apathetic attitude towards the outcome of the contest.

The Badgers, clearly heartened by these two decisions resolved that, rather than try their luck a third time, they would by their own efforts prevent Toronto from gaining a score.

Actually, Brock did even better. They scored only seven minutes into the second half.

The Blues will tell you their goalkeeper was sat upon by three husky Brock forwards, leaving him helpless to stop Theba's shot. The referee did not notice this infraction.

The goal instantly galvanized the Blues into action resulting in an equalizing score only two minutes later.

Evans, whose constant energetic running contrasted with the more prevalent Toronto lethargy, won the ball and passed outside to Vassiliou whose accurate cross was hit home by Lecler.

While the trend of the match continued in Blues' favour, their constant pressure could not produce another score.

Shots buzzed inches wide, hit the post, were headed off the line; the ball just would not go in the net.

Due credit must be given the Brock defense which carried the burden thrust upon it with fortitude, if not class. They survived, much to the delight (and possibly surprise) of both coach and players.

Without doubt the first half refereeing decision had completely upset the players and their loss of composure for a while explains much of their poor play that was forthcoming.

Hopefully a desire to play and respect for officialdom will return to the Blues prior to the double header next weekend at Laurentian.

Queen's fans love Varsity Stadium

The student was really just a kid, bleeding from the left side of his head, incoherent, and drunk. Mostly drunk.

It was after the game and along with two equally potted associates he was languishing in the corridor outside the Varsity dressing room.

"It's not really my blood," he was muttering to anyone who would listen. Some did. Some had no choice.

"It's not my blood . . . it's from the other guy."

"What other guy?"

"The one I beat up."

Queens-Varsity games have acquired a certain reputation. There is good football and idiotic behaviour.

Neither set of students has any monopoly on stupidity, but unfortunately year after year the incidents of senseless obscenity, hooliganism and occasionally outright violence seem to get worse. One wonders what the squad of rent-a-cops are doing to earn their lavish pay.

Saturday afternoon was pretty typical, though in this context, pretty is not the most appropriate word.

The group of about 35 Queens students who decided to enliven the halftime show by staggering onto the field and staging an en masse moon for the spectators and television cameras doubtless considered the spectacle a great stunt.

The drunken horde, again mostly wearing Queens jackets, who temporarily stopped the game with a premature rush for the goalposts late in the fourth quarter likewise considered their actions to be mostly rational.

As one survivor of the melee said later, "We always do it. Stealing goalposts is all part of the game."

And so apparently is carving open the scalp of anyone who is so foolish as to get in the way.

However, Toronto students have no cause to be self-righteous.

The usual torrent of gutteral obscenities came from the LGMB camp followers directed at the policemen patrolling the track in front of the Toronto cheering section.

At least two U of T students made real heroes of themselves by stealing the caps from the officials handling the yardsticks. A black football cap. Some trophy.

Such incidents must not be over-exaggerated and should not be used to attack the positive values that come from spectator-oriented intercollegiate sport.

However, league officials should be concerned when any game must

Academic affairs decides tenure committee issue tomorrow

The contentious issue of student representation on tenure committees will finally be discussed and decided at tomorrow's meeting of the academic affairs committee of the Governing Council.

The committee is finally discussing the issue, almost 14 months after the release of the Forster report, the presidential task force on academic appointments. The report recommended no student representation on tenure committees, claiming no satisfactory mechanism could be found for selecting students to sit on the committees.

Many faculty members, however, supported exclusion of students on principle.

Students now are prevented from sitting on tenure committees under the Haist rules, which govern the operation of all staffing committees.

Only Trinity College has exercised its prerogative as a federated college to allow student representation on the committees.

For students seeking parity representation on tenure committees, it has been a long battle.

First only one student sat on the Forster task force, which recommended no changes.

Last fall SAC launched a campaign to sound out student opinion on the issue and put pressure on the university to change its policies.

The campaign leading up to a referendum last October stressed the importance of equal student representation for tenure decisions based on teaching ability.

Students contended tenure decisions under the present system are made on the basis of research and publication as well as faculty politics.

In the referendum a turnout of almost 7,000 students voted two to one in favour of parity and seven to one in favour of representation on staffing committees.

Despite the mandate there was little response from faculty and administration. Students had to disrupt a meeting of the academic affairs committee to get a parity subcommittee to consider models for selection of students for tenure committees.

The academic affairs committee moved slowly through the Forster report discussing primarily the minor issues, and managed to drag discussion through the whole year.

The issue of student representation on staffing committees is widely viewed by student leaders as one of the most important facing students right now.

It relates directly to the quality of teaching, which affects students in the classroom.

Tenure decisions are continuing to be made without student input and many reflect the "publish or perish" mentality of the traditional faculty "guild."

There have been a number of cases in which excellent teachers were denied tenure. Students have protested unsuccessfully against these decisions, notably last year in the French department and two years ago in the math department.

But in many cases, decisions are not widely known and professors discourage publicity because of its possible adverse effect on appeals or future employment prospects.

The university is able to quietly fire some of its best teachers.

Widespread student concern about teaching quality and strong pressure from student representatives, however, will ensure the issue is not swept under the rug.

And while SAC shifted its focus to the fight against the administration's tough code of behaviour, the staffing issue moved into the background.

Sparrow charges shoddy enumeration in university residences

By PAUL RAYNOR

Alan Sparrow, Ward 6 aldermanic candidate in the upcoming December 2nd municipal election, has charged the enumeration of students on campus has been mishandled.

Sparrow notes only 21 of approximately 500 New College residents have been enumerated while at University College—all but four of the 300 residents are on the enumeration lists.

"The assessment commission just doesn't care about student enumerations" said Sparrow.

He says his complaints to the assessment commission, who are responsible for the enumerations, have gone unanswered.

Commission officials say other methods are open to students who have not been enumerated for the upcoming election.

They may either register with the City Clerk or swear an oath at the polling station when they vote.

Sparrow maintains, however, that the initial enumeration is the most important one and it has been so badly handled that the onus is on the assessment commission to do a proper job.

Departing from the standard procedure of sending enumerators door to door, the assessment commission has simply sent letters to the various residences requesting names of students who want to vote in the municipal elections.

St. Michaels, Massey, University College and the Charles Street married students' residences have enumerated a large majority of their students.

But because of poor and conflicting instructions from the assessment commission, most other college residences have not been properly enumerated.

These include New, Innis Victoria and Loretta College residences.

Officials at Both Victoria and Loretta residences were unaware that students living in residences as of October 1 have, according to the Municipal Elections Act, the option to vote either in the Ward 6 elections or in their respective home town municipal elections.

Sparrow's campaign workers have encountered difficulties in attempting to rectify the situation. At Trinity, where enumeration lists have been received, Sparrow claims bursar George Shepherd said he had not yet had time to look at them.

Even if Sparrow's offices are able to improve the situation, there still remains a failure on the part of the assessment commission to get the in-residence students, who represent a significant portion of the Ward 6 electors, properly enumerated for the first time.

Ward 6 supports Beverley residents

By BOBBY ROTENBERG

The Ward Six Community Organization last night voted unanimously to support the residents of 94-98 Beverley Street who are facing eviction.

The Ward Six Community Organization, represents ward six residents, the largest group in the city, lying south of Bloor between Bathurst Street and the Don Valley.

The landlord of the Beverley Street houses has removed the furnaces, leaving the residents without heat.

Although court action is being considered by the residents, occupancy has already dropped from more than 50 to under 30 tenants.

Ward 6 school trustee Dan Leckie mentioned that two or three of the tenants have been hospitalized, presumably because of the cold weather.

Last spring the houses were offered for sale for $268,000.

The developer has said publicly he could renovate the houses for $140,000.

Total cost, therefore, to the developers, by their estimates, would be approximately $400,000.

When the city investigated buying the houses this fall, the landlord asked $625,000.

A hastily made city report estimated the cost of renovation at $400,000.

The city discovered it would cost $1 million to take over the houses.

Ward Six aldermanic candidate Allen Sparrow, reported that mayor David Crombie had seen these figures and merely shrugged, assuming the cost was too high for the city.

Sparrow then suggested to Crombie the developer's price was merely a bluff and the city should consider expropriation of the houses.

This became the basis of the Ward 6 committee's motion, which is now being sent to city hall.

The committee urged the city to keep the Beverley St. houses as low income housing and that the city consider expropriation, and retaining the present residents.

Fears were expressed at the meeting that the expropriation process might set a dangerous precedent of the city "saving the shirts" of developers by buying up their losses at inflated prices.

Sparrow then explained the procedure, stating that an expropriation tribunal would establish a fair market price, taken from three different estimates.

The developer's side was briefly explained by Dan Leckie.

The issue was not as simple as it first appeared, he said.

Apparently the landlord is not a recent speculator, but has owned the homes for a number of years.

His intentions appear to be more involved with getting out with a minimum loss, as opposed to trying to make a huge profit.

The committee's main concern was for the tenants' safety, and that their homes be maintained and upgraded as low-income housing.

The committee also passed a motion that the western part of Ward Six be "zoned down" to save residential areas from an onslaught of commercial development.

Such a development occurred in the ward's eastern section, particularly North Jarvis.

The council wants the city to carry out a similar study in the area, during which new building would be frozen in the area, thus saving the existing structures.

Field worker answers UFW claims

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

One of two California field workers here in Toronto to counter-attack the United Farm Workers' grape boycott denied UFW claims that she was employed as a labor contractor for a California grape grower.

Josephine Garcia, here to tell why thousands of grape pickers switched from the UFW to join the Teamsters Union, said in an interview Monday she's here "on my own."

But Garcia admitted she was accompanied on the trip by Teamsters representatives and had received aid from the Free Market Council, an association of California growers.

Garcia, who described herself as a field worker said she had never been a labor contractor or field supervisor for Kelvin Larson, a Coachella Valley grape grower.

"I just watch the workers and see that the work is being done," she said.

Garcia added she was responsible for workers' time cards and acted as a liaison between field workers and ranch owner Larson.

UFW spokesman Marshall Gans maintains Garcia "does all the hiring and firing and has done so for years."

Ganz said although Garcia may not be registered, only a small percentage of labor contractors are.

In March, 1974, 100 Larson workers allegedly voted to have no union rather than the UFW and then decided to join the Teamsters.

Garcia admitted the vote was initiated by Larson and supervised by Father Humphry, a local priest reported to be hostile to the UFW.

The UFW was not present when votes were counted by Father Humphry and two workers.

Garcia also said the subsequent institution of the Teamsters as the recognized union was entirely Larson's idea. She claims UFW treats workers poorly.

In July a California judge issued a ruling which made the Teamster contract inoperative.

Garcia conceded the UFW boycott efforts here have been successful. She claimed the campaign to boycott California grapes and lettuce "harms the workers and the growers. If there are no growers then there is no work."

Garcia left Toronto yesterday for New York but said, "I don't know who I'll be seeing there."

UFW organizer Ganz said people were confused about this second boycott effort.

"In the first boycott the issue was one of poverty, in the second it is one of self-determination and the right of people to organize," he said.

Important month for students

October promises to be a fascinating political month at U of T, as two hard fought and important campaigns come to a head.

Tomorrow, the academic affairs committee of the Governing Council meets to decide the question of the composition of tenure committees. For students this issue is essential because it has a direct relation to the quality of teaching.

Concern over the quality of teaching has a long history. It began with anger and frustration over the poor quality of teaching in universities, but now focuses on one issue: student representation on tenure committees. Only by gaining equal representation with faculty can students be assured teaching quality is important. Good faith is not enough.

The meeting is at 4 pm, tomorrow, in the Governing Council chamber at Simcoe Hall.

The other issue concerns the composition of the Governing Council, the body which makes all the major decisions at the university.

For students, the campaign is synonymous with the word 'parity': equal representation between students and faculty, as a principle. For students, anything less is second class citizenry.

Parity also has a long history at the U of T, dating back to the late 1960's, when the Commission on University Government decided parity was the only basis upon which the university could become a real community.

Since then, the issue has been postponed and postponed, never decided definitively.

Now, however, the Governing Council, required to assess its composition this fall, will decide at two meetings this month — October 17 and 24 — whether or not there will be parity in the foreseeable future.

A strong statement of concern from the student population will certainly aid the cause. In any event, it will be an exciting — perhaps dramatic — month.

Protest on remark

We are writing to express our concern over the report "Medical Schools Flooded By Foreigners, MD Says" by Alan Metrick on September 24, 1974 Toronto Star.

We are alerted and disappointed by Dr. Stephenson's reactions to the admissions of medical students at the University of Toronto. While the statistics clearly show that only ten out of two hundred and forty students admitted to first year medical school at U of T in September 1973 were neither Canadian citizens nor immigrants, Dr. Stephenson referred to the Chinese (who are practically all citizens or immigrants) in the medical school as foreign students.

This seems to show that she does not regard the Chinese as Canadians even if they are Canadian citizens or landed immigrants.

A particular group, the Chinese in this case, is singled out. Though it is admitted as individuals they are academically qualified and in some cases, brilliant, and they either have had their homes here or intend to make Canada their home, they are being referred to as "foreigners" who seize the opportunities of native born Canadians.

This we feel, is quite different from our fellow Canadians' traditional attitude towards all those who come to make their homes here from all parts of the world. Although these people help quicken their pace of integration into the Canadian community, there seems to be an implication that they should be restricted from the medical field, in order to make room for less qualified students.

We also believe that the training of immigrant doctors who will be eligible for citizenship by the time they graduate only benefits Canada and should not be considered as an "international" responsibility. The "international" responsibility should only refer to the training of those ten students on student visas, who have to return to their homeland after they complete the course.

Furthermore it must be noted that among the hundreds of qualified Canadians being refused admittance to medical schools are many Chinese Canadians, and that it is baseless to say that many "foreign" students — which refers to immigrant students here — tend to devote themselves entirely to academic studies and have a narrower "outlook".

Centre neglected

The article "New U of T Day care Centre Opens", in last Friday's Varsity, neglected to mention some of the early history of day care at U of T, and the role which SAC, the GSU and the Administration played in it. In 1966, a group of graduate student women, exasperated by the lack of day care facilities, presented a brief to the School of Graduate Studies. The next year, with extensive financial help from SGS, SAC, GSU, the Atkinson Foundation and the university administration, the student women established the St. Andrew's University Day Nursery, in space made available by St. Andrew's United Church, Vice-president Gilbert Robinson, and Professor Donald Forster were instrumental in bringing these arrangements about.

The day nursery accommodated 35 children of graduate student parents. Children of staff and undergraduate students were accepted if space was available. The nursery was non-denominational, licensed and professionally staffed, but the parents took part in the day-to-day administration, and were represented on the Board of Directors, along with representatives of the various groups (including the university administration) who supported the nursery. The maximum fee was $75 a month, with subsidies available for low-income families. Once established, the nursery was almost entirely self-supporting.

With the opening of the Campus Co-op and the Margaret Fletcher centres, the need for St. Andrew's as a University facility has decreased. However, it continues to function as a community day care centre, and many of its 50 children are from student families.

Many people, including my wife and myself, were able to continue our studies more effectively because of the support of — among other groups — the university administration, long before the 1970 occupation of Simcoe Hall.

Must be Christians

I have read with interest the article in the September 23 issue of The Varsity entitled Ecology as Ideology, and your comment, Socialists and Environmentalists Must Get Together. However, I protest that so little attention is given to the Christian and Christianity in the scheme of things. Are we still a Christian society?

I submit that the socialist and environmentalist must abandon their purely materialistic concepts of existence if they are to arrive at a solution. Social inequities and ecological problems will never be solved from within the concept of dialectical materialism, and the basic restrictions, contradictions and destructiveness of a purely materialistic concept of existence. The solution of the problem is never from within the problem.

A return to the basic Christian principles (minus ideological self-righteousness) would seem to be urgently required if we are to rise above inherent limitations of a purely materialistic existence and deadly technology. Man is more than an animal. He is special, and what is desperately needed at this time is a rereading and assimilation of the Sermon on the Mount.

Bells bug browbeater

As a fairly frequent visitor to the campus for study purposes, I regret the intrusion, in what can be a quiet haven by contrast with the city around, of the hourly signals reverberantly 'gonged' by the Hart House clock.

One wonders how this can be regarded other than as a nuisance. How does the frequent reminder of passage of time contribute to scholarly concentration?

Surely others feel similarly about this noisy and distracting feature, and some outward evidence should bring about a change speedily.

Article misleads

Your recent article "New U of T Day Care Centre Opens" contains a statement which is misleading and should be clarified.

Referring to the parents' eligibility for government subsidy you say that: "The cost will be $145 a child every month but parents will be eligible for subsidies depending on income."

This is not true. The parents' eligibility for a government grant, for placing their children in the care of the "Centre", is based not on their income but on their expenses.

In straight language this method of evaluating a person's monetary assistance works advantageously for those people who have a high income and can afford to make a lot of unnecessary spendings; on the other hand, needy parent-students receive little government aid simply because, having a low income, they can only prove to have few expenses. In this respect, government subsidy becomes for them plain

Nationality qualifies

I refer you to the University of Toronto Bulletin of September 20, Part II on Page 2 of the article "The Governing Council approves way to assist setting academic priorities," wherein it is stated that "it is illegal under the Ontario Human Rights Code to use nation of origin as a factor in (academic) hiring." If it is "illegal" to discriminate on the basis of nationality, it is certainly "illegal" to discriminate against Canadians. Moreover, here is a pertinent exception in the Code:

"The provisions of this section relating to limitation or preference in employment because of . . . nationality, ancestry or place of origin do not apply to an exclusively . . . educational, fraternal or social organization that is not operated for private profit . . . where in any such case . . . nationality, ancestry or place of origin is a bona fide occupational qualification and requirement."

In the circumstances in which Canada finds itself today, it is surely outrageous to suggest that a Canadian publicly supported educational institution may ignore the rights of individual Canadians, or that the issues of national interest and national security are not bona fide factors in academic hiring.

The false interpretation and application of the Code was (and still is) being used as a justification of the sell-out of our post-secondary education. Under its former ex-American Chairman, the Commission virtually aided the American academic imperialism in Canada in refusing to fight the rampant discrimination against Canadians in this Province, being one of the worst in Canada in terms of the Americanization of our universities.

The article on admission to Meds in the SAC orientation handbook contains a rather serious error which was drawn to my attention just a few days ago. Contrary to what was stated in the article, it is possible to be accepted by more than one medical school in Ontario.

In 1975 there will be two dates when Ontario medical schools will send out notifications of acceptance to successful applicants. The first will be on May 16, the second on July 4.

If you apply to more than one Ontario medical school but are only accepted on May 16 by some of the schools to which you applied, you can accept one of those positions which you were offered. Then as long as you write to the other medical schools to which you applied, but at which you were not accepted, and ask them to keep your application under consideration, they will do so.

The fact that you have already accepted a position at one medical school in Ontario will in no way hurt your chances of being accepted by one of the other schools to which you applied.

Thus on July 4 it would be possible to be accepted by another Ontario medical school, and you could then accept the position at that school. After July 4 everything is open, and medical schools will notify successful applicants at any time in order to fill vacancies which might arise during the last half of July and all of August.

There was also a printing error in the article. All of the application fee goes to OMSAS, the central application center for Ontario medical schools. It is used to cover the costs of running OMSAS. None of the fee goes to the universities. I hope this clears up any misconceptions which may have arisen due to the article in the handbook.

INSIDE THIEU'S PRISONS

THE FORGO

The Student Christian Movement (SCM) will conduct a program on the political prisoners in South Vietnam to-day in the Debates Room of Hart House. The double award-winning colour film, South Vietnam — A Question of Torture will be shown, free of charge, and questions will be answered by Keith Polson, Vice President of MacLaren TV Advertising, and Ann Buttrick of the Committee on the Prisoners. The meeting begins at 8 pm.

A second meeting on the South Vietnam Political prisoners will be held on October 3rd, at 7:30 pm in Carr Hall. Bishop Guy Belanger, of Valleyfield, Quebec, who interviewed four prisoners in Saigon, released from Con-Son Island, will be the speaker. The film will be shown again, free of charge.

By DICK BROWN

It's a peculiar thing, this forgotten war in Vietnam. The longer it goes on, the fewer who seem to take notice.

international myopia, although for reasons unique to this country.

After watching itself waste 17 years as a member of the International Control Commission in the pointless charade of enforcing the 1954 Geneva conventions in Indochina, it was no wonder a strong sector of public opinion was sceptical about Canada's newest peacekeeping role in 1973 on the International Commission of Control and Supervision in Vietnam. Few objected later when Mitchell Sharp, then external affairs minister, announced Canada was pulling out of the ICCS, mainly because there was no peace to keep and the Americans had their troops and POWs home. The rest of the western world had long since washed its hands of the mess, and now Canada had its excuse to get out.

The forgotten war had begun. However, for a handful of people, a mission to keep Canadians and the Canadian government from forgetting was just getting underway. The International Committee to Free South Vietnamese Political Prisoners from Detention, Torture and Death had long since moved into its cubbyhole at the Canadian Council of Churches offices on Canadian government toward Vietnam. A not unlikely watchdog effort considering Canada's moral posturing as an "impartial" peacekeeper.

As Canadian author and journalist Charles Taylor says in his newly-released book, Snow Job: "It might be different if we practised what we preached. With its record in Vietnam, however, Canada is in no position to lecture other nations about their proper course of behavior let alone to proclaim its impartiality and objectivity. Because of its involvement in Indochina from 1954 and because of its public support for Washington's policies, Canada must share some of the blame for the dreadful carnage which the Americans lavished not only on Vietnam, but also on Laos and Cambodia."

Indeed, Canada bent over backwards during the peak years of the war to cash in on the fast bucks to be made on defence contracts from the United States. Taylor sums it up: "As they dropped their bombs on North Vietnamese towns or seared southern villages with their rockets and napalm, American planes were often guided by Canadian-made Marconi Doppler Navigation Systems and used bombing computers built in Rexdale, Ontario. The bombs could have been armed with dynamite shipped from Valleyfield, Quebec; polystyrene, a major component in napalm, was supplied by Dow Chemical. Defoliants came from Naugatuck Chemicals in Elmira, Ontario, and air-to-ground rockets were furnished by the Ingersoll Machine and Tool Company. On the ground, American infantry and artillery units were supplied by De Havilland Caribou built at Malton, Ontario."

Nor were all the profits left to private industry: "Canadian Arsenals Ltd., a Crown corporation, sold small arms fill for artillery shells, mines, bombs, grenades, torpedo warheads, depth charges and rockets. Canadian government salesmen drummed up business around the United States and distributed their annual catalogue, Canadian Defence Commodities, which Walter Stewart aptly described as a kind of Warmonger's Shopping Guide."

Financial Aid

While some government economic agencies were in the arms business for a dollar profit, other agencies were in the give-away business for the political profit. Canada's direct grants and aid to the Thieu regime in Saigon were $2.4 million according to the U.S. Senate foreign relations committee in a May, 1974 staff report. That same report estimated Canada's 1973 donation at $4 million and projected $5 million for 1974 going to Saigon. Canada has given no aid or grants to either the Provisional Revolutionary Government or the Democratic Republic of Vietnam in Hanoi. Thus, Canada is up to its gills in South Vietnam both as a signatory to the peace accords and as a political and economic fact.

Reality today in South Vietnam is the same ugly war which screamed from newspaper headlines five years ago. In addition to the fighting in the rice paddies and jungles, a new front gradually opened up in the war during the most recent years: the massive incarceration, usually without trial, of civilians. Otherwise known as the political prisoners issue, the summary imprisonment of tens or hundreds of thousands of civilians has developed into a major focal point for anti-war forces since the signing of the Jan., 1973, accords.

Political Prisoners

Amnesty International, a non-partisan organization based in London, England which gathers information on and tries to secure the release of political prisoners in assorted countries throughout the world, claims there are more political prisoners in Thieu's jails than in any other part of the world. As a minimum figure, Amnesty International says "not less than about 70-75,000" with the maximum quite possibly "more than 100,000." Thieu's government admits to having just under 36,000 civilians in jail, but denies any are political prisoners. However, Thieu's figures include only four national and 37 provincial jails. Such statistics do not include the more than 500 detention centres scattered throughout South Vietnam and funded by the U.S. In fact, the U.S. shelled out about $20.4 million for police and prisons alone in 1973-74 in South Vietnam.

Thieu's claim of no political prisoners rings hollow inasmuch as prisoners held for political reasons were simply

The scar on this man's leg was caused by a bamboo spear inserted in his leg, during torture in a South Vietnam prison, and left to fester in the wound.

Yet it goes on with a vengeance. Tens of thousands dying since the alleged ceasefire in Jan., 1973, and hundreds of thousands still imprisoned in the jails of South Vietnam's President Thieu. Five years ago just the fighting alone gripped the front pages of newspapers around the world as thousands of people in dozens of countries marched in protest. Today it may seem different, but the war really hasn't changed. It just seems quieter, unless one is in South Vietnam. Canada, too, has fallen victim to this

St. Clair Avenue when Sharp announced Canada's withdrawal of peacekeepers. At that point the committee appointed itself national gadfly to remind Sharp, his Liberal government, and the Canadian people the war not only continues but indeed is as bloodthirsty as ever.

Canada's Role in Viet Nam

While the committee's raison d'être is the political prisoners, it spends a good portion of its time with the policies of the reclassified into non-political, e.g., "criminal", categories. Before that reclassification process in 1972, the South Vietnamese director of prison administration told American officials more than 64 percent of the 35,000 prisoners held in the "official" 41 jails were classified as "communists". Yet that does not necessarily mean any given prisoner is or is not a communist. South Vietnamese law under Thieu treats neutralists as if they were communist sympathizers.

Amnesty International says: "The facts are that perhaps 20,000 or more NLF members and sympathizers are in detention, although not all adherents to the National Liberation Front can be called 'communist'. Many tens of thousands of other civilian prisoners are held because of alleged communist sympathies, but are not communists at all. Most of them are simply innocent victims of faulty intelligence. Finally, several thousand people are detained precisely because their views are at variance with those held by the Saigon government."

An even higher figure of more than 200,000 is quoted by the Committee to Reform the Prison System, based in Saigon. The PRG also quotes a figure of 200,000. But the numbers game is not what makes the issue what it has become. Rather it is the treatment of the prisoners.

Tiger Cages

Perhaps the most notable treatment was the 1970 revelation of the Tiger Cages on Con Son Island. Built in the last century for use by French colonialists, the Thieu regime carried the tradition on by packing the small cells with political prisoners. An international uproar developed after the 1970 disclosure of the

The specific treatment accorded to prisoners is a litany of abuse heaped on abuse. Interrogation sessions apparently are where a great amount of the abuses are committed. Amnesty International, Cong. Hawkins and Anderson, and dozens of writers and investigators plus the PRG tell much the same story as to what happens.

A person can get picked up for something as overt as being a known communist, or something as unexpected as being fingered by a quarrelsome neighbour grinding a personal axe.

Interrogation and Torture

Beatings apparently are the most common abuse. But even the ancient art of clubbing takes on a macabre aspect. The bottom of the feet get pounded, a painful experience as that part of the body is particularly sensitive. In some cases a person is put in a tank of water and the tank is beaten, a process which can cause severe internal injuries due to the shock waves.

There is now a common saying in Vietnam: "If you are not a Vietcong, we will beat you until you admit you are.

woman's underwear, letting lizards loose over the naked body, shoving a bottle in the vagina.

Amnesty International comments: "From the many accounts available it seems clear that in many instances torture has become no more or less than a matter of habit. The question 'Why torture?' is often no longer asked." Students, union leaders, buddhists, pacifists, neutralists are all victims of the prisoner system. Since the Jan., 1973, accords Thieu had rounded up most of what are called Third Force persons: people who are neither Thieu nor PRG supporters. Many are neutralists or pacifists who through the long years of civil war have taken sides with neither warring faction.

It is these people who might have provided some sort of reconciliation between Thieu and the PRG as called for in the Paris accords. However, many are now political prisoners.

Canada's Tacit Complicity

Under the guidance of Mitchell Sharp, who until August held the Canadian external affairs portfolio, Canada lived in an Alice in Wonderland world on the prisoners issues, full of Sharp's Cheshire Cat smiles and Humpty Dumpty word games. Having managed to dodge the issue rather adroitly while Canada served as a peacekeeper on the ICCS last year, Sharp found an all-party deputation of MPs and Senators at his doorstep by the end of the year demanding he take the prisoner issue to the United Nations human rights commission.

The head of the deputation, Andrew Brewin (NDP - Greenwood), later said in a speech in the House of Commons: "We do not wish to interfere in the internal affairs of another country, but there is no doubt that where there is a consistent pattern of gross violation of human rights — and that condition certainly exists in South Vietnam — then the international community has a right and an obligation to intervene, not indeed by military methods but by making clear what world opinion is. Even the most authoritarian governments are sensitive to world opinion."

Sharp's response was that since it would not do any good to go to the UN, why bother?

"We want, in short, to be effective," Sharp claimed. "Loud, visible and dramatic protests have not proven to be the best way of assisting those that we wish to help in these cases."

Instead, Sharp and his diplomatic corps took the quiet diplomacy approach to the prisoner problem, approaching representatives of the Thieu government at least eight times in camera. As a result, not one prisoner was released.

Meanwhile, a letter-writing campaign organized by the international prisoners committee in Toronto was piling up more than 3,000 letters in Ottawa. Sharp was forced to start answering questions like: Why doesn't Canada send aid to North Vietnam since it has recognized it diplomatically? Why doesn't Canada give diplomatic recognition to the PRG which is a co-signatory with Canada in international conference to ensure the Jan., 1973 accords? Why is Canada supporting Thieu who runs these prisons?

Sharp's answers were diplomatic masterpieces which unfortunately did not do much for anyone in Con Son with bamboo underneath his finger nails. According to Sharp, Canada was not sending aid to North Vietnam because the north Vietnamese had not asked for it; Canada would not recognize the PRG because it had already recognized Thieu's government and Canada has a policy of recognizing only one government per country; Canada is only giving Thieu 'humanitarian' aid, not military supplies. Nonetheless Sharp was always quick to tell anyone who asked that he was "deeply concerned" over the issue.

Sharp, however, is no longer external affairs minister. In August he was replaced by Allan MacEachen, one of Trudeau's Liberal cronies who is a sometime small-l liberal. To date, MacEachen has made no statement about what he wants the Canadian government to be doing about the political prisoners' plight.

However, two statements out of Ottawa over the last week might be indicators of a change. Ivan Head, a key personal aide to Trudeau, let it be known he would like to see Canada lean a bit more to the moral left internationally. Trudeau himself said he hoped his new foreign affairs would at least get him criticized for doing things instead of not doing things. All that, of course, must be balanced against the evidence in the Pentagon Papers and elsewhere that Canada has been running errand-boy for the U.S. in Indochina for a number of years.

Meanwhile, Canada has done nothing since Sharp's handwringing, and the prisoners still rot in jail. The forgotten war is far from over.

man was released from Con-Son Prison in 1973.

Tiger Cages by U.S. Congressmen Augustus Hawkins and William Anderson. Paralyzed prisoners shackled to iron bars with lime thrown in their faces if they complained of lack of food and water outraged world opinion. President Thieu was apparently so embarrassed he transferred Colonel Ve from head prison keeper at Con Son to another installation. By this year, any embarrassment had worn off. Colonel Ve is back at Con Son, and two years ago the U.S. government shelled out $400,000 for 288 new Tiger Cages at Con Son, dubbed by a cynical wag as "Buffalo Cages" because they are even smaller than Tiger Cages.

And if you admit you are, we will beat you until you no longer dare to be one."

- Still another includes forcing water (sometimes plain, sometimes soapy, sometimes mixed with lime) into a detainee's stomach and lungs and then beating the stomach and lungs.

- Some techniques are reserved specifically for women: gang rape by police and/or guards, burning breasts with cigarettes, putting an eel in a

OFS conference calls for revisions in OSAP policy

By MATHILDE VERHULST
The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) conference last weekend in Sudbury unanimously carried ten proposals for reforming the Ontario government's present student awards policy.

The conference held at Laurentian University brought good representation from most post-secondary colleges and universities.

According to OFS spokeswoman Karolyn Kendrick the motions carried at the conference are merely "minimum demands for the time being."

They should be viewed as "intermediate steps" OFS is taking towards its long-range goals of free tuition for all post-secondary students and the "removal of the student standard living stipends." The first demand described as "a definite necessity," calls for a government grant to all students on OSAP "to offset the accumulated cost of living increases."

The Ministry of Colleges and Universities is already considering an $8 increase in the $32 per week cost of living allowance, but Kendrick said OFS "feels OSAP's consideration of that sum is inadequate."

The second demand concerned the cost of living under OSAP.

It demanded awards be indexed to rises in the cost of living, and that these additional awards be solely in the form of grants.

This index, the demand continued, should consider the region in which each institution is situated in order to minimize regional disparity.

This improvement, said Kendrick, is "the only way students can maintain a level of subsistence in inflationary periods."

The third motion involved a reduction of the OSAP loan ceiling from the current $800 to $600 annually and making any further money an outright grant. This was done before 1971.

The OFS also demanded that interest rates on the loan portion of student awards be subsidized by the government so that the total interest does not exceed six percent annually.

The government would absorb five and one-half percent of the interest rate rather than demanding students pay back their year's OSAP loan with the current 11.5 percent.

Another OFS demand was the lowering of the age of independence to 18 "with no qualifications" in order to recognize that students have the legal status of adults.

Kendrick said this demand "is presented in the context of a need for a progressive taxation scheme to "eliminate inequity."

She said presently lower and middle-income taxpayers pay for the main portion of post-secondary education, while large corporations "attract the highly trained manpower without paying for it."

Such a system she termed regressive and asked for corporations to "pay their fair share" in education-costs.

SAC External Affairs Commissioner and newly elected OFS executive member Susan Rich said the independent age limit should be lowered because "for the purpose of education only, (students) are considered dependent" upon their parents.

The government, she said, is not allowing students "the privilege of being adults."

OFS also demanded the OSAP parental contribution factor be discontinued for students under 18.

Kendrick said "everyone is entitled to as much education" as they wish and there should be no constraints against them.

She said parents should not be "penalized" for making contributions to their children's education.

"This demand," Kendrick said, "takes into consideration our own stand that education is a social right, not an individual responsibility."

Other demands included:

- changing the calculation of students' summer contributions under OSAP to consider only their taxable income.

- establishing a "minimum earning" so that students need not make any contribution to OSAP if financially unable.

- adjusting OSAP policy to reflect actual living costs of post-secondary students in Ontario, particularly community college students whose OSAP loans are based in part on residence costs, a basis unjustified because community colleges do not have residences.

OSAP lower than recommended

By SUSAN DODOG

Although the Ontario Student Awards Program (OSAP) cost-of-living allowance this year is calculated at $32 a week for board and lodging, student awards officers recommended it be set at $34-$40 a week.

A survey done this spring by the Ontario Association of Student Awards Officers recommends a "realistic" board and lodging rate for each university area.

The figures submitted to the ministry of colleges and universities range from $34-$40. The U of T officer recommended $40 weekly for the Toronto area.

Despite recommendations, the allowance was set at $32.

"Even since then, costs have gone up," said SAC university commissioner Gord Barnes. "I guess they were being cheap this year."

Barnes said Colleges and Universities Minister James Auld admitted $32 was not enough, but the treasury board simply wasn't willing to give more.

Patrick Phillips, U of T Student Awards Office director, agreed. Student awards officers' recommendations weren't accepted "for the same reasons that they didn't take the recommendation from SAC or the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS). They don't have the

The ministry says estimates have risen because calculations are based on the cost of living in residence which has escalated greatly.

OFS research co-ordinator Karolyn Kendrick maintains the housing shortage is the real culprit. Rent rates increased and "students couldn't compete on such a tight market," Kendrick noted.

A great deal of student agitation has resulted and pressure is being put on the ministry.

Barnes said a rumor is circulating that the allowance is going to be increased retroactively to $40 a week. "But this is only a rumor," Barnes stressed.

Kendrick was more positive. "We have it from a reliable source in the ministry that they are raising the allowance by 58," she said.

This would result in an extra $8 million expenditure for the ministry of colleges and universities.

Mounties break up demonstration...

By PAUL MITCHELL and KEITH REYNOLDS
OTTAWA (CUP) — RCMP riot squad officers forced close to 300 militant Indian demonstrators off Parliament Hill late Monday in the second pitched battle between the two groups.

The riot squad appeared from nowhere and forced the demonstrators back down the steps they had won in a previous battle, off the hill, out onto Metcalfe Street and back to Indian headquarters.

During the skirmish riot squad officers pushed people off the stone wall on top of the Hill, a 15-foot drop, and down the stairs using their clubs liberally on demonstrators as well as bystanders.

Earlier in the day the Indians marched from an abandoned government building eight blocks below Parliament Hill, up Rideau Street to the hill before being met by a solid wall of RCMP officers and a wooden barricade. The Indians fought the RCMP for about 20 feet before they were stopped. RCMP officers kicked protestors in the groin and ganged up on individual Indians who broke through the lines.

One hundred soldiers armed with bayonets provided the color guard for parliament and later a back up for the RCMP.

BOOED THE BAND

The Indians remained on the hill beating their drums, singing and making speeches for about two hours while parliament was in session. They booed the army band playing O Canada and chief justice Bora Laskin when he appeared to review the guard after the session ended.

Violence erupted again when the RCMP started pushing people off the steps of the House of Commons. Then the riot squad appeared and ordered everyone off the Hill. The Indians fought back throwing rocks, bottles and sticks.

During the fighting Don Whiteside of the Canadian Federation of Civil Liberties was beaten by riot police as he tried to explain who he was.

"For the riot police to come in and beat people indiscriminately is inexcusable," Whiteside said.

Charlotte McEwan, an elderly Ottawa activist, was also pushed to the ground by the police rush.

"They were pushing everybody down those steps and you know what 30 concrete steps can do. There were quite a few bloody faces," she said.

Bob Buckingham, National Union of Students organizer and a participant in the demonstration said, "I think it's a disgrace. It's symptomatic of the way the Indian in this country is treated by the white man's government."

DISGUSTED

He was disgusted that no member of parliament came out to talk to the demonstrators and chief justice Laskin did not even acknowledge their presence.

Buckingham went back to lodge a complaint with his member of Parliament and discovered that all the MPs were "hobnobbing and have a booze party," in the parliament buildings.

Indian leaders were not available for comment as they had returned to their headquarters for a private strategy session.

The charge of the riot squad was ordered by superintendent Marcel Sauve, officer in charge of the criminal investigation branch A, Division Ottawa, of the RCMP.

"It had become an unruly crowd. Our men were being beaten with rocks and sticks and had taken all measures possible to disperse the crowd. Three of our men were injured slightly and treated in a local hospital. Afterwards we picked up spikes and chains and other weapons," he said.

...but Indians determined to stay reporters, who were in the midst of the fighting, saw only belts and picket signs in the hands of the demonstrators.

WEAPONS

Other reporters at the scene also say they saw no other weapons in the hands of the Indians.

Sauve refused to say how many RCMP officers were at the demonstration, stating only, "They had adequate reserves, including the riot squad over and above the number that were seen."

"We had carefully planned this operation in conjunction with the Ottawa police," said Sauve. There were 20 Ottawa policemen guarding the American embassy during the demonstration.

Over 20 arrests were made by the RCMP, most of them in the second battle. Ottawa police say two of the Indians will be charged with obstructing the police but other charges are as yet unknown. All arrests were made by the RCMP and processed by Ottawa police.

The Indians arrived in Ottawa Sunday night after a two-week caravan from Canvouver and took over an abandoned government building saying they would stay until Minister of Indian Affairs Judd Buchanan met with them.

During the speeches Louis Cameron, leader of the Ojibway Warriors Society who occupied a Kenora park earlier this summer, read a manifesto and list of demands that they wanted met by the government. The demands include:

DEMANDS

- The hereditary and treaty rights of all native peoples in Canada including Indian, Metis, non-status and Inuit must be recognized and respected in the constitution of Canada.

- Repeal of the present Indian Act and the creation by native people of new legislation recognizing Indians right to self-determination and sovereignty over their lands.

- A complete investigation of the department of Indian affairs by native people and the transfer of its power and resources to native communities. Indian affairs must belong to the people and be separated from the department of northern development, Indians maintain.

- Annual payments in perpetuity from all levels of government.

- An end to the destruction of native economies.

- Immediate payment of $2.5 billion from money not presently allocated to Indian affairs which will be used by local native communities to meet their needs for the development of self-sufficient economies.

"It is racial discrimination and genocide that the federal government pays $750-million to the province of Prince Edward Island, with a population of less than one-third of the native population, for economic development but has refused to provide equivalent money for the native peoples, the most impoverished in Canada," the Indians' demand states.

- The standard of housing in native communities be immediately raised to the Canadian average and $800-million be allocated to Indian affairs to be made available to local native communities for housing needs this year.
- Health care facilities and services which are adequate to raise the life expectancy of the native peoples to the Canadian average within five years.

- An end to federal cutbacks in native education and an expansion of community-controlled native education. The education system must be made to serve native people rather than native people being made to serve an educational system designed to destroy native cultures, the Indians argue.

- $500-million be made available of money not presently allocated to Indian affairs to native communities for legal defence. "Native people must no longer fill the prisons and mental wards of Canada. Racist justice must end."

SUPPORT

Earlier in the day Louis Cameron in a short interview said thousands of Indian people couldn't make the march but that the caravan had their support. He also said the Indian people would only use violence if they had to.

"People will always fight if put down by discrimination and police brutality. The government and the department of Indian affairs have already initiated violence on the Indian people," Cameron said.

Another spokesman for the group, Vern Harper, a Saskatchewan Indian who now lives in Toronto, joined the caravan because, "It is what I believe in. I believe in the Caravan. It is long overdue and could be of some help."

He said the purpose of the caravan was to be in Ottawa for the opening of Parliament to make the world aware of the plight of native peoples in Canada. The demonstration, he said, would bring the message to the people.

POLITICAL GROUPS

He also had harsh words for various political groups who have tried to manipulate the caravan on its way.

"We denounce some of the left and right wing groups that have tried to manipulate us. We expected the right-wing groups to manipulate us, but some left-wing groups have tried to manipulate us instead of just giving us their solidarity."

He believes the caravan has been an education to all the people who participated in it.

"It has taught us to respect each other. It has also made us look to our sisters with more respect."

New & For win in second division

By DAVE STUART

Two games were played in interfac football yesterday afternoon on the back campus.

In the Forestry-UC tilt, the short though, and they left the field muttering something about next year.

Forestry led the game 20-0 at half time but faded in the second half to allow 15 unanswered points.

UC's come-from-behind bid fell short though, and they left the field muttering something about next year.

Whatever has happened to the power that used to be the scourge of the second division? UC again fielded a bare minimum of players for the game and maybe this lack of turnout both this year and last accounts for their lackluster play of late.

In the other mud bowl played in the rain, New scored 21 points — 19 for themselves and 2 for Trinity to take the game 19-2.

New demonstrated a strong running attack in the first half featuring a lot of ball carrying by New quarterback Lucas. (see New — we do know his name.)

In fact, Lucas scored both of New's first-half touchdowns on well executed sweeps.

Unfortunately for New, the convert attempts for both touchdowns were low and did not count.

It should be pointed out that the game was not all New. Trinity did show up for the game and did manage to mount good drives but were unable to complete the drives for paydirt because of fumbles. The wet ball turned out to be New's best ally.

In the third quarter New was faced with a third down punt situation but got off a short kick.

Trinity was called for offside on the play and New opted for the penalty and a repeat kick. As it turned out the choice was wrong.

On the snap for the second kick the ball sailed about 5 yards over the head of the punter. By the time the New kicker had recovered the ball Trinity was in hot pursuit.

Trinity chased New all the way back, about 25 yards, to the end zone where New conceded a safety touch.

Trinity, at last, were on the scoreboard.

Later in the fourth quarter, New was again on the march but Trinity dug in at their own 30-yard line and just would not allow any more yardage.

New's Saikali attempted a field goal for the green and gold but was wide. The ball however landed in the end zone and rolled over the dead ball line for a single point.

It was a silly point for Trinity to give up. They had not sent anyone deep to run the ball out.

By now Trinity had just about given up the game.

On the last play of the game Devaney grabbed off a Lucas pass up the middle and ambled another 20 yards for the final touchdown of the game.

Saikali again managed to miss the convert.

New now has a firm hold on first place in the second division and would seem to be headed for another undefeated season.

The quarterbacking job, a sore spot last year, appears to be capably filled by Lucas but perhaps he should spend more time running the offense on the field and spend a little less time telling the referee how the game should be run.

Roundup of other interfac stuff

The results of the first heat of the cross-urban run are in. The five leading runners were: Sharp (Knox A) 10.17, Morley (Knox A) 10.17, Hopper (Eng) 10.24, Young (Trin) 10.37, and Venney (Med) 10.46.

In the men's interfac tennis tournament which ended Monday, Frank Bucys of University College defeated Vilnis Muiznieks of Pharmacy for the championship with the scores 6-3 and 6-2.

The team championship was won by the team from Erindale consisting of Lutz, De Santi, Widya and Franchuk.

In soccer action on Monday, Meds B downed For 1-0 on a goal by Fernandez. UC and Vic tied 3-3. The names of the scorers are not available because the team managers' handwriting was not legible.

On Friday, Erindale got back to form of last year by beating Sr. Eng 1-0. Amaral tallied for the west enders. On the same day Jr. Eng succumbed to PHE 1-0. Taylor scored for the jocks.

Finally on Thursday, Law took it on the chin from Meds A 4-1. Drummond collected a hat trick for the doctors while Derek picked up the other goal.

The Varsity — Shawn O'Driscoll

In touch football Monday, the Crushers were crushed by the Gridiron Grads 21-6. Heat IT & Beat It came all over the Untouchables 19-6.

Both the Bloody Marys and the Kickers defaulted their games and withdrew from the league. Presumably Paterson's Patsies and the Ballherites were given the wins.

On Friday, Punt Lickers 74 settled for a 12-12 tie with the Bucks while Skule 775 were licked 20-18 by the Gridiron Grads.

Also on Friday, the Argos (???) defeated Mike's Meateaters 34-0. Perhaps Mike's team has been done in by the high price of meat.

The Pussies lost by a hair 7-6 to Civil IV and the Hookers laid out the Saints 34-6.

The Rhhs scoured the Snaps 26-0 and Ensign ho-hummed a 26-0 loss to the Slackers.

Finally, Civil Skulers managed a come-from-behind default to the Wop Squad.

UC player makes a fine catch in the second half as UC attempts a comeback.

Trinity was plagued by poor tackling. Here there is only one tackler on the play.

Students press tenure position

By GENE ALLEN

Student representation on tenure committees was again discussed at yesterday's meeting of the academic affairs committee of Governing Council, but no decision was reached on the question.

Representatives of the Association for Part-time Undergraduate Students (APUS), the Students' Administrative Council, and the U of T Faculty Association presented briefs to the committee for discussion.

The meeting was attended by more than 60 spectators, most of them students.

Perhaps in response to the encouraging turnout, SAC president Seymour Kanowitch delivered a carefully-prepared well-reasoned brief which one longtime observer called "the best presentation made by a student to one of these committees in years."

Kanowitch called the question of composition of tenure committees "the most important matter this committee will ever deal with."

BOREDOM

He introduced his remarks by comparing the case of an assistant professor in the chemistry department, who was denied tenure although 64 percent of his students considered him a superior or excellent teacher, with that of a tenured professor in the department of political economy who, according to his students, "added new dimensions to the word boredom" and "lectured like he hated the course material."

"These examples make one ask the question—why does this happen?" Kanowitch said. "The answer is simple, but by no means satisfying."

He listed four criteria for tenure: quality of research, number of articles or books published, ability to get along with senior faculty members (sometimes known as collegiality) and teaching ability.

But, he said, the manner in which these criteria are applied favor research over teaching.

"An excellent teacher who is a mediocre researcher will be denied tenure," Kanowitch said, "while an excellent researcher who is a mediocre teacher will be granted tenure."

RESEARCH

He quoted a report prepared for a group of provincial education ministers which stated that the orientation to research in post-secondary education is so dominant that good teachers must put on the "research mask" to keep their jobs. This means teachers must spend time "grinding out papers" they really have little interest in to include in their yearly list of publication credits.

The main body of Kanowitch's remarks was a detailed, point-by-point refutation of arguments presented against student representation on tenure committees.

In response to the claim that students are less likely than faculty members to maintain confidentiality, Kanowitch said there was no evidence in support of the claim.

"In fact," he said, "evidence shows that students do respect confidentiality."

He then considered the objection that students have no real commitment to the university since they are only at the university for a short time; whereas faculty members have a much greater commitment, since they are associated with the university for much longer periods of time.

But Kanowitch cited a study undertaken at the University of Waterloo which indicated that the average faculty member stays only five years at one institution. Furthermore, he said, many students have a real commitment in that their university career has a significant effect on their future.

EVALUATIONS

Many faculty members have argued there is no necessity to have students as voting members on tenure committees as long as student evaluations of tenure candidates as expressed through course evaluations are taken into account.

"Many senior faculty members have a great deal of contempt for course evaluations," Kanowitch said. He quoted math department chairman George Duff as saying "students rate most highly those from whom they learn the least." Kanowitch said this was a common sentiment among faculty members.

He also referred to a report published by the provincial council of faculty associations which indicated that student evaluations are highly reliable, and that there is no relation between a student's grade on a course and the student's evaluation of that course.

Last April seven faculty members appealed to U of T president John Evans when they were denied tenure. None of their portfolios contained course evaluations, Kanowitch said, indicating the low regard accorded to teaching ability in tenure decisions.

Kanowitch said Evans had to ask SAC to provide him with student evaluations of the candidates.

REFUTED

J. R. Vanstone, associate chairman of the math department, contested this interpretation.

"I happen to know there was" course evaluation material included in the candidate's portfolios, Vanstone said. And anyway, he added, it doesn't follow that just because Evans requested course evaluations from SAC, he didn't already have such information in his hands.

Kanowitch went on to contest the claim that faculty members can sit in on classes and thereby judge teaching ability for themselves.

"Someone who has been studying a discipline for fifteen years can't tell if a teacher is getting through to first-year students," he said. Furthermore, a faculty member couldn't tell how a fellow faculty member handled consultation with undergraduates, nor could he tell if the students leaving a lecture beaming with anticipation were inspired or on their way to the local pool hall.

Finally, Kanowitch addressed himself to the claim that great attention is already paid to teaching ability. He outlined the case of Meyer Erlach, a German teacher at Erindale who was denied tenure.

Erlach attracted scores of students, Kanowitch said, because he had a "love for the subject and, what's more, could instill this love in students." Kanowitch said Erindale principal E. A. Robinson warned Erlach "to spend less time on teaching and more time on research."

PRIORITY

Kanowitch stated that if teaching ability was really such a priority as some faculty members have maintained, teachers such as Erlach would not be denied tenure.

After dealing with these arguments, Kanowitch went on to explain why students should have not only representation on tenure committees, but parity representation.

He agreed that any student representation would serve to open up the process of granting tenure, but added that "opening up the process does not imply changing it."

Kanowitch said tenure committees often must make a "trade-off," teaching ability must be balanced against research ability. In the long-run, faculty members consider research over teaching ability, so that junior faculty members do not see teaching fitting into the academic reward-structure.

Student parity on tenure committees would ensure that trade-offs begin to be made in favor of teaching ability, Kanowitch said.

The Faculty of Architecture provides a good example of the benefits of student parity on tenure committees, he said.

"Students and faculty in architecture are united in the pursuit of academic excellence," he said.

"The quality of teaching at the University of Toronto is in decline," Kanowitch asserted. "With education cutbacks, it will continue to decline."

PROPOSITIONS

Kanowitch concluded by summing up his argument in three propositions:

- Teaching quality is not adequately considered in tenure decisions;
- There must be student representation on tenure committees;
- Students must have parity with faculty members on tenure committees.

A prolonged burst of applause from the spectators marked the end of Kanowitch's speech.

A brief from the executive of the U of T Faculty Association (UFTA) was distributed to the committee members.

The brief was outlined by philosophy professor D. Gauthier. The UFTA brief distinguished three separate duties to be performed by tenure committees.

First, evidence must be collected and presented to the committee. Secondly, the committee must assess the information and vote on it. Third, there must be procedures for reviewing the decisions made by tenure committees.

The UFTA brief argued only faculty members have the "maturity and judgment" to evaluate all kinds of information presented.

Students, the brief admitted, may be competent to judge teaching ability, but do not have competence to judge research qualifications, and therefore should not be included as voting member of tenure committees.

LACK OF INFORMATION

APUS president Norma Grindal rises to the occasion during tenure debate.

PRAISE

Desmond Morton, a history professor, said APUS deserves praise for getting nearly 100 percent participation in course evaluations. (Less than 40 percent of full-time students fill out course evaluations.) But, he wondered aloud, are not course evaluations just as subjective an evaluation method as any other?

Grindal replied that APUS course evaluations are expressed in terms of statistics whenever possible. "Numbers are as unbiased as possible," she said.

Morton asked if the part-time students had made any sort of a deal with other students about what kind of representation part-time students would get. "Sometimes I get the feeling that part-time students are done down around here," he said.

"If you'll let part-time undergraduates sit on tenure committees, then so will I," student committee member Gord Barnes assured Morton.

Further discussion of composition of tenure committees will take place at the next meeting of academic affairs Oct. 23. If possible, chairman John Dove said, a meeting will be arranged before then.

Professor loses tenure appeal

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

A Scarborough assistant professor described as "highly favored" in his course evaluation was denied tenure last year.

Tom Lynch, an organic chemistry professor, was described in course evaluations as active in labs, always available and a well-liked person. Even students who failed the course admitted it was through no fault of Lynch's.

Lynch, whose appeal was denied, said the only reason supplied was that he had not published enough.

"I didn't think that was a sufficient reason," he maintained. John O'Donohue, Scarborough College Student Council president and a former student of Lynch, called Lynch "a man of integrity" and said "the consensus of the course was just that he was a superb teacher."

O'Donohue added Lynch didn't publish unless he was sure about his work. Teachers seeking tenure are presently judged on the basis of research performance, publication record and willingness to perform administrative functions. Acknowledging he was very highly regarded as a teacher, Lynch added: "I don't think that counts for much."

The mathematics department's refusal to grant tenure to two math professors triggered an occupation of that department's office in 1973. Since then, students have waged a campaign to seat students on tenure committees.

SAC whisks through new budget

In one of the shortest budget meetings on record (two hours), the Students' Administrative Council Wednesday night passed its 1974-1975 financial estimates of $316,720.

The new budget is $26,734 more than the $289,986 spent by SAC in its last fiscal year, but budget estimates are considerably lower than those of many previous years despite inflation.

Although SAC budgets cannot be accurately compared since new executives invariably institute new programs, expenses have varied in the last few years from a high of $502,739 in 1969-1970, to a low of $280,824 in 1971-1972.

Also, in former years some financial statements have included rebate figures for course unions and campus centre, while this year's total expenses estimates don't.

The 1974-1975 $43,500 rebate figure is separate from the finance commission's total. Added to the other expenses the total would reach $360,220.

This year undergraduate students will also pay an additional levy of $1.50 per person to the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS), the province-wide federation of Ontario university student councils.

This figure is also excluded from the total expenses column. (The OFS levy was decided by a referendum held at the same time as last spring's SAC presidential elections.)

The new budget shows a deficit of $6,000 and SAC may have to raise its fees next year to remain in the black, with costs rising and student enrolment up only slightly. (Most of SAC's money comes from a $14 per student levy covered under the university's "incidental fees".)

Total estimated income for 1974-1975, including rebates but excluding the OFS levy, amounts to $354,220. This compares with $511,372 in 1969-1970, $207,657 in 1971-1972 and $342,275 in 1973-1974.

THE HEAVIES

The largest slice of the budgetary pie goes to administrative expenses — $71,160. Over $38,000 of that figure pays for administrative and office salaries, a jump of 29 percent over last year's costs.

Covered by the total are seven Canadian Union of Public Employees people who are guaranteed raises in a union contract signed last year.

However, office and sundry expenses are down $4,176 and legal fees estimates have dropped $3,840 to bring the total $84 lower than the comparable 1973-1974 actual figure.

(Unusually high legal fees were incurred last year to defend students who had arranged for a showing of the film Deep Throat. Three students were busted for exposing an indecent film, but all three were later acquitted.)

The Varsity is second in the financial expense column at $40,401. Most additional expenses are caused by increased newsprint and printing costs, but advertisement rates have been raised slightly to account for this in part.

Salaries for full-time paid Varsity staffers are also up slightly, but a saving of over $1,000 has been accrued by the removal of the telex service connecting the paper with Canadian University Press in Ottawa.

Also high on the list are SAC executive salaries at $11,667 (down $1,546 from 1973-1974) and "campaigns", $10,000, and over $34,000 for Project Aid, a fund to be used for extra grant requests from various campus service organizations.

Radio Varsity's budget is down $1,319 to $21,140, and more money may be slated if the station is granted an FM licence and if SAC decides to finance the station going FM.

NEW COMMISSIONS

New commissions this year are external affairs, internal affairs and the women's commission.

External affairs commissioner Susan Rich is responsible for a $21,090 budget that includes the National Union of Students (NUS) fees ($6,990), donations and grants to various external groups ($9,000), conferences ($2,000, for NUS and OFS mainly), the Canadian Student Loan and Ontario Student Award Program campaign ($2,000) and municipal and provincial elections ($500).

Internal is not really a new commission but merely a title for internal operations of the SAC that fall into two commissions: education and university.

Education commissioner Heather Ridout is planning "special projects", including a speakers program and conferences and seminars linked to campus political issues such as staff student parity on the Governing Council and student representation on tenure committees.

University commissioner Gord Barnes will organize and distribute the funds for election campaigns, as well as working closely with the education commission on political campaigns.

Women's commissioner Jeannie Greatbatch is organizing a Women and the Law Day ($200), a speaker's program ($110), and SAC's contribution to the International Women's Year Festival ($2,025). (The United Nations has designated 1975 International Women's Year.)

GOOD TIMES

The communications and services commissions are the two other SAC branches that received a share of the budget on Wednesday.

Communications commission

The Varsity — Brian Pei

Michael-John Sabia is responsible for the U of T Handbook and the student directory to be published in early November.

Radio Varsity falls under the communication commission's wing, and grants are also given to Radio Erindale and Radio Scarborough.

This year no money has been allotted by the commission to SAC offices at Scarborough and Erindale Colleges. Erindale rep Peter Henderson and Scarborough rep Fred Stewart requested money be put back into this category as in previous years, but no funds were granted.

The communications commission also has about $3,000 for grants to campus organizations which need money during the year, and has already agreed to pay $750 to the Tojke Oike, a publication already subsidized by the engineering society. Service commissioner John Tuzyk will try to add to undergraduates' social lives this year with his $68,335 budget, an increase of $11,465 from last year.

Concerts (designed to break even), orientation ($2,300), free films ($1,500), U of T horse riding ($8,350), and a proposed games room (pin ball and pool) fall under the commission's purview this year.

Funds needed for athletic complex

By KATHERINE ROWCLIFFE

A temporary $10 levy on student fees has been suggested by the university administration as one way of raising some of the $10 million needed for the proposed new athletic complex.

A referendum to determine student opinion about the levy might be held in December at the earliest, says Jack Dimond, special assistant to internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway.

Dimond is in charge of the proposed complex.

The university has received $6 million in a public appeal for funds in 1959, Dimond said.

After more private fund raising and federal and provincial assistance, the university is expected to need $1.5 million more.

This is where students come in.

The proposed temporary levy would raise approximately $2 million, the surplus of which would go for unplanned extras. (A massage parlor — Lastman style perhaps?)

Physical education professor Bruce Kidd is critical of the provincial government which has offered the university $300,000 for the project.

The university had asked for $1 million.

Kidd is convinced students will be eager to pay the $10 levy in protest to the William Davis government.

"We're not doing Bill Davis any favors," says Kidd.

"We have a government that is so phillistine, it refuses to support this sort of thing. We will look after our own needs here.

"It's a case of us depriving ourselves because someone else has acted irresponsibly."

Both Dimond and Kidd stress the need for expanded recreational facilities.

Anyone who has tried to reserve one of the three existing squash courts lately will appreciate the problem.

The proposed new athletic complex would house 12 new squash courts.

At present, only 26 percent of the student body actively participates in physical programs offered at the university.

The new complex, to be constructed adjacent to the Benson Building on Harbord St., would allow participation to double.

Besides squash courts, the building would house an olympic-sized swimming pool, a 10-metre diving board and a field house covering both.

Construction is being held up at present because the building exceeds the city's 45-foot holding bylaw and new criteria for exemption have not been finalized.

Feud between staff and management folds Toronto Citizen

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The Toronto Citizen, a small but important bi-weekly newspaper which advocated people-participation in city politics, folded this week after a long simmering feud between management and staff led to an unofficial staff walk-out 12 days ago.

The seven-member board of directors which owns and operates the Citizen decided last weekend the rift between the management and staff was irreparable and offered the newspaper for sale.

So far, seven of eight groups have shown interest in acquiring the paper.

If the Citizen reopens, it will not be until it has been sold and a contract has been negotiated between the new owners and the Toronto Newspaper Guild, which represents the staff.

Employees of the Citizen received their two-week notices Monday.

Board chairman John Sewell says he is now trying to sell the newspaper to recoup the money he and others invested in the newspaper.

POWER

But until a few days ago, the real issue was power, not money.

The board (two of whom were staff members) had quarrelled over whether the power of hiring and firing of employees rested with the board or the staff.

The board consisted of Sewell and three others who he named—his assistant Susan Richardson, publisher James Lorimer and York university professor Norman Feltes.

The remaining three board members were U of T professor and by the paper's general manager John Deverell without consulting the staff or the Toronto Newspaper Guild.

Pappert was rehired but the rift between staff and management grew when the staff walked out following the board's refusal to consider allowing a job protection clause in the new union contract being negotiated.

Just before Sewell bought the paper last March, workers at the conflict over Pappert's dismissal and the walkout.

DEADLOCK

The job protection clause became an issue of power between both sides, and both refused to back down.

Citizen co-editor Ellen Moorhouse explained, "The board was absolutely intransigent and refused to listen to our demands. They thought they were extreme but we didn't."

"People who have worked a long time for us for practically nothing should have first refusal on new jobs. Is that so unreasonable?"

"They didn't like the paper as it was," Moorhouse said. "They'd have liked to clear us all out."

The Citizen was an expensive proposition, Sewell noted. After paying the purchase price, the new owner will need "10 to 15 thousand dollars capital and a cash flow of maybe 10, so we're talking about roughly $20,000," he said.

The Citizen's demise came as it was about to become a weekly newspaper this week. Other plans to improve the paper included hiring a production manager, an arts editor, a photo editor and more staff.

Film dramatizes prisoners' plight

By TOM GERRY

A film on the plight of South Vietnamese political prisoners which the CBC refused to air on television for over a year was shown Wednesday evening at Hart House.

The film, entitled South Vietnam—A Question of Torture, was screened during a program organized by the Student Christian Movement which also included two speakers.

Keith Polson and Ann Buttrick, representatives for the International Committee to Free South Vietnamese Political Prisoners from Detention, Torture and Death (ICFSVPP), noted the small turnout of 25 people dramatized the indifferent reaction the committee has often encountered in its attempts to help the suffering prisoners.

The film, made in April, 1973 for British television, arrived in Canada the following month but the CBC refused to consider it for television. CBC plans to air the film Nov. 25.

Buttrick said the film was probably too controversial to be aired in 1973.

Some sequences were shot with cameras concealed in paper bags, she noted, because of the Thieu government's hostility to the press.

COMPLICITY

Polson emphasized Canada's complicity in the atrocities shown in the film.

He read from a letter sent to ICF-SVPP by Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau sent to ICF-SVPP acknowledging that the prisoners' situation is "the responsibility of all Canadians."

However after repeated representations to the Trudeau government on behalf of the prisoners, ICF-SVPP "came to the view that the government is afraid to do anything," Buttrick charged.

The film conveys an excruciating image of young men crippled by confinement. Hospital workers unloaded the men from a truck onto the ground. The men are sitting. With their hands they lift their legs a little forward and raise their bodies to follow the lifeless feet.

With this agonizingly slow procedure the men move into the hospital. They had been locked for years in cages so small that standing is impossible. Their imprisonment was the result, most often, of officials' suspicions they were Communist sympathizers.

NEWSLETTER

ICFSVPP has collected over $30,000 in 18 months through small personal donations. The money is used to lobby the government, to finance committee members' trips to strategy meetings and to publish a newsletter.

The newsletter circulates to 3,000 people, most of whom, according to Buttrick, are not political but are concerned individuals.

Buttrick feels the non-political character of ICF-SVPP may have cost it the support of leftist groups.

Another factor in this loss of support, Polson said, might be the committee's reliance on established government channels for expressing dissent.

This approach Polson noted, has gained ICF-SVPP a small group of advocates in the House of Commons who have been ineffectual in changing Canadian policy toward the South Vietnamese political prisoners.

Polson and Buttrick stressed ICF-SVPP needs more people to become involved with their work. Canada is regarded by the other participating countries as a key force in the struggle to save the prisoners, they said.

Buttrick suggested setting up a U of T base for ICF-SVPP, noting many prisoners were arrested because they were students. The committee also needs more people to write letters to the prisoners, he added.

ICFSVPP and the American Exiles plan to demonstrate tomorrow at City Hall. The groups plan to encourage people to write to their MPs in an effort to sway the government from its present course of ignoring the South Vietnamese prisoners' desperate condition.

Manitoba professors underpaid

WINNIPEG (CUP) — A recent study of faculty salaries at the University of Manitoba shows that women faculty members are paid less than their male counterparts.

Figures released by the University of Manitoba Faculty Association (UMFA) Status of Women Committee clearly indicated the inequities in the present salary structure. In no classification—lecturer, assistant, professor, associate professor or full professor—is a woman receiving the same pay as her male peer.

The majority of women faculty members are concentrated in the lower classifications. There are only 12 women in the highest paid category, that of the full professor, and the average salary is about $2,900 less than the men in the same category.

Although there are more women in the lower strata of the salary structure, at no point do their numbers approach half the numbers of males in the same category.

Though the differential is usually less in the lower classifications, the higher proportion of women in these classifications creates an average differential of about $3,500.

The committee recommends a portion of the university's 1974-75 budget be set aside to equalize the salaries.

If administration does not feel that it can deal with the salary differential now, setting aside the money needed to equalize the salary differentials and establishing a joint committee with UMFA to administer the monies, then UMFA will bring the issue to the bargaining table.

The administration received a copy of the report in early August. President Sirluck said the matter is under consideration and a reply to the UMFA would be ready soon.

The faculty association believes most of the matters raised in the report are already subject to existing labor legislation, and that the university has a legal obligation to conform to the relevant sections of the Human Rights Act, the Equal Pay Act, and the Employment Standards Act.

The association feels it is now up to the university to show that the salary differentials are not discriminatory.

CIA meddles in Mexico

MEXICO CITY (CUP) — In the wake of U.S. President Gerald Ford's admission of CIA intervention in Chile come more accusations of American meddling—this time in Mexico.

The Committee for an Open Society of the United States maintains the University of Texas has been microfilming military, religious, economic and government archives in Mexico. The group says the microfilms are for the CIA and that this constitutes a danger for the economy and political stability of the country.

The secretary of the interior in Mexico has denied authorizing the microfilming of archive documents. The denial was backed up by the director of the National Archives, Ignacio Rubio Mane.

However, Mane admitted the University of Texas "had sent researchers to microfilm private archives in Nuevo Leon, Chihuahua and Coahila, for unspecified purposes."

In its denunciation of the microfilm, the committee has asked the U.S. Senate to investigate the matter. They say that copies of the microfilms, after the information has been processed by computers, could put the Mexican economy in the hands of the transnationals or be used for extortion.

They also added the CIA "frequently uses the principal universities of the U.S. for its own purposes, as in the case of Michigan University, where it organized a program to train the political police of Vietnam."

The International Human Rights Front asked the United Nations security council to investigate the activities of the CIA in Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Cyprus, Mexico, Paraguay, Dominican Republic, Uruguay and other nations.

It also demanded the U.N. take energetic measures against the CIA since it is "a threat to the territorial integrity and independent policies of the Third World nations."

and we appeal to the Governing Council to provide the leadership necessary to break this deadlock by initiating some novel and realistic approaches to the situation.

Faculty and students seem to be agreed that they share as equal partners in the teaching and learning process but draw different conclusions as to the relative numbers.

Ideally all members of the University would like to belong to a true community of scholars but the confrontation over parity forces an artificial division of the academic members of the University into two mutually exclusive groups labelled faculty and students. This dichotomy disguises the reality of the continuous spectrum of teachers and learners which exists in this University and artificially divides those with common academic interests.

A reading of the 1974-75 current Programme of Continuing Studies reveals comparable numbers of courses being given by Professors, by graduate students and by lecturers and instructors. What clearer recognition of the excellence of the teaching of graduate students could be given than to include so many of them in this important part of the University's academic programme?

Two practical steps can be taken to recognize the continuity of the teaching-learning process and to remove the block to cooperation that the present rigid and artificial division of "teaching staff" and "students" perpetuates.

Recommendation 1

Until it is possible to do away with any distinction between various classes of scholars in this University, permit those who teach and learn to vote in either (but not both) of the teaching staff or student constituencies.

Recommendation 2

A small number (probably 6) members of the Governing Council should be elected by and from all the academic members of the University to represent both actually and symbolically the wide community of interests shared by those who teach and learn herein.

Further Recommendations

If the above two recommendations are not accepted it would appear useful to change the representation of the present constituencies to include more students and part-time faculty. We are convinced by the functional arguments concerning lightening the individual work load of student councillors.

However in order to allay the very real fears of some faculty that equal student faculty representation on the Governing Council will automatically result in equal representation on tenure and promotion committees the Act should be amended to state that representation on all committees

Two hacks and trustee want council seat

Two veteran U of T political hacks and a Toronto trustee are running for the vacant graduate seat on Governing Council.

Former SAC president Bob Spencer is running against Toronto trustee Vern Copeland and Katherine Narozanski, who has been active in the university's sociology department.

All three are students at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

Spencer, now executive assistant for the Ryerson

Students' Union, is also running for trustee in the ward six board of education election Dec. 2. He served as education commissioner in 1970-71 and SAC president in 1971-72 at U of T.

Copeland also has a long record in student government at Waterloo and York Universities. Narozanski is a former teacher who was involved in the sociology women's caucus and sat on the sociology assembly.

The election will be by mailed ballot with a deadline of Oct. 22.

and Councils of the University should be decided on the basis of their function and not by imitation of the Governing Council.

Recommendation 3

If 1 and 2 are not accepted the numbers of members on the Governing Council should be changed to those recommended in the joint student association brief AND a specific proviso should be written into the Act that the Governing Council representation is not a model for other Committees and Councils of the University representation on which should be decided on the basis of their various functions.

No vote in selection

I would like to comment briefly on the article which appeared in the October 2 issue of The Varsity, entitled Students get no say in chairman selection.

As is often alleged, here is a case of distortion of the facts: what should have been written was that students have no vote in Chairmen selection. Through me, the French Course Union has however been given the opportunity to submit recommendations to the search committee for the French Department.

Next, may I point out that although I may have said that this procedure seemed to be a sham, this occurred before I had found out that the Memorandum of Understanding specifically stipulated the composition of such search committees. It is therefore at that level that students lost out (in voting representation, that is). Therefore it would be purposeless to ask the provost to delay the committees' deliberations, as he is powerless to do so. What I will ask of Professor Forster, however, is the future timing of his proposals on student participation in such committees.

Council must lead

The following letter has been submitted as a brief to the Governing Council as part of its review of size and composition. — ed.

The current debate on the Review of the U of T Act has once more focussed on a confrontation between the Faculty Association and the three representative student organizations over parity. This does not appear to be very constructive

SPENCER, ROBERT GEORGE

I have been heavily involved in post-secondary education since 1967. As U. of T. SAC president and education commissioner, candidate in the 1972 Ward Six Education Trustee election, and Ryerson student ombudsmen, I have vigorously represented student concerns in the following areas—

Student parity on Governing Council and Arts Science Council, improvement of Student Aid, student parity on staffing committees, community use of university facilities, a fair discipline code and review of tenure.

Take it or leave it

No one but the artist can tell if this work of art is upside-down.

Take it or leave it is the response of artist John Howlin to public opinion regarding his new show of paintings, 1969-1974, which opened this week at Hart House.

The basis of his art work, he says, lies in his experience of it. His responsibility to the public begins and ends with the act of exhibiting and not with a deliberate attempt to share or communicate something which they will find meaningful.

Fair enough, to a certain point. Nothing would be produced without a certain kind of unqualified faith on the part of the artist in the validity of what he has to express. And even when art is incapable of evoking response which is aesthetically favourable it can still be interesting as a presentation of a different point of view.

However one feels the right to demand something more, especially in the presence of what I found to be a very unstimulating and unappealing array of canvases.

The series starts with huge murky colour fields which are each sharply punctuated by a line or an isobaric group of lines and finally grids.

A transition comes in two paintings which show the grids being "painted out," a gesture of liberation from something which was becoming too habitual and restrictive.

Recent works, while retaining a characteristic pristine and formal reserve, have a more active surface with shooting diagonal lines and juxtaposed planes of contrasting colours.

Howlin finds abstract art the most appropriate vehicle for the working out of conceptions and ideas whereas the representational limits expression by particularising it.

So, is the person unenlightened who fails to be moved? Not necessarily so, Howlin would say, but certainly unfortunate.

Try out the Hart House Gallery to see if you are one of the lucky ones.

A light little bit of sleight of hand

It is just such a show as Colin Campbell's (at A Space, 85 St. Nicholas Street, until Oct. 12) which brings home the obvious truth that "modern art" is a movement we can see sympathetically and that we now at any rate have to see historically. Now it is what is beyond modern art that makes cowards and philistines of us all — especially new work in previously unused or unknown media.

Campbell is "Canada's only video artist" as his publicity material notes; "he is the only artist in Canada devoting himself exclusively and consistently to this difficult and contemporary medium."

His show, representing one year's work, involves four different black and white tapes, "This is an Edit This is Real," "Correspondence One," "Correspondence Two" and "Love Life," all of which are presented more or less continuously on two video screens.

The tapes depend heavily upon the repetition of various words and images, memorable neither in themselves nor through repetition. There is no plot to speak of in any of the tapes, though they apparently draw upon events in the artist's life. Campbell himself narrates them. Of course they are tedious and pretentious.

But just as we can speak of the death of the novel in relation to, if not at the hands of, television and film, which have both assumed so many of its functions, then surely there is some kind of line of development from television and film to these videotapes.

The videotapes certainly have not usurped the functions of television and film. Indeed they seem to mock them.

When we watch television our attention is riveted to the screen by the constantly changing images and by the expectation of even more new images. But we are reduced to passivity, or, worse, to a phoney sense that we are involved simply because every moment of our attention is occupied. We are never looking at one and the same image for any great period of time, as we are when we look at a picture.

Television is the active agent — it determines how and for how long we see anything; it presents us with its long shots, its close-ups, its side-views, its images in colour, its images in black and white.

Campbell's videotapes are only interesting in light of the expectations we bring to them from our experience of television. Campbell is Canada's only videotape artist. We quite consciously pay attention to his tapes, seeking out the significance of what we see on the screen before us. We are not, after all, being presented with reality or with art, for that matter, as a half-hour special, as a fait accompli. Campbell by the very paucity of his material directs our attention to the act of paying attention.

But the natural state of Campbell's videotapes is an empty, grey, screen. The few images that Campbell uses are themselves the interruptions — and aggravating interruptions at that. Once we see one, we expect more images to be presented in a much shorter period of time: one image per second in a continuous stream, instead of one image for half a minute or a minute, after a four or five minute span of static.

Campbell in fact seems to be still closely aligned with the tradition of the artist as image-maker. To the degree that he is like an artist, in an essentially non-artistic form, he alienates us; but to the degree that he alienates us is his satire of television if nothing else established. He is falling between two stools, though. His work cannot be significant in and of itself.

Campbell hasn't said this; he his publicity information doesn't say this; and his tapes do not immediately suggest this. (For all I know, I may be mortally insulting the man.) Nevertheless, such seems to me to be the case.

Cecil Day Lewis describes the newsreel (in a short poem of that title) as "this loving Darkness a fur you can afford." It's a marvelous description of the fatal lure of television and film. In contrast, all I can really remember of Campbell's exhibition is a small black videoscreen box, its screen alive with static, standing alone in the middle of a room with absolutely glistening whitewashed walls.

Books

people are Jewish. Fellow polevaulters ("The Jewish terrorists, ah: Maimonides, Spinoza, Freud, Marx. The whole world is still quaking" speak out against the trend of the age. They refuse to be hardened and to become oblivious to the materialism of state-run technocracy or the necessity of genocide. Layton bares the sword of justice in several of his poems. In one for Nadezhda Mandelsham, he honours the work of her husband, Osip, 'purged' in the 30's:

In the dungheap of contemporary history
The Stalins hatch everywhere.
The poet must break Their backs with a hammer's blow.

In 'The Final Solution' quoted at the beginning of this review he probes the now guiltless heart of a Europe that was complicit in the murder of millions of his people, including "that clear-eyed sensitive Jewish girl" whose death marks many of her poems. Though Layton has never endured the kind of oppression under which Anne Frank persevered, he assaults the cultural lullabies that have buried her traces and perceives the elements of decadence "that will again congeal . . . into the slavemaster's whip".

Layton is not a poet's poet; he doesn't write for art's sake. He uses no mythology from the past as would W.B. Yeats or Robert Graves. He writes non-fiction poetry from the heart of his own ethos. His attempt is never to take us into another world; rather, deeper into our common life through the explication of his own deeply-felt feelings, experiences.

You can rarely curl up and warm yourself in the bosom of his poetry, or go up the gangplank of his adventure ship. Though his latest volume grows out of his Canada Council Grant travels to Europe, Greece, Asia, and Australia, it is more like a journey up the Congo with Conrad's Marlowe than a magic carpet ride: we get no scenery, it is the "human condition with its satisfactions and inescapable miseries" that interests Layton.

This interest is often that of the lone wolf prowling by the fires of conventional society. It is a very solitary man who writes in 'The Shadow':

Teach me, O wretched modern clods with lies and carnage in your genitalia, how to love you, how to love every creature on whom my shadow falls . . .

Nevertheless, much of what Albert Camus said in 1953 resounds in the best of Irving Layton's poetry:

" . . . we must simultaneously serve suffering and beauty. The long patience, the strength, the secret cunning such service calls for are the virtues that establish the very renaissance we need . . . we must accept the dangers: the era of the chairbound artists is over. But we must reject the bitterness. One of the temptations of the artist is to believe himself solitary, and in truth he hears this shouted at him with a certain base delight. But this is not true. He stands in the midst of all, in the same rank, neither higher nor lower, with all those who are working and struggling. His very vocation, in the face of oppression, is to open the prisons and give a voice to the sorrows and joys of all."

The Book of Imaginary Beings
by Jorge Luis Borges, with Margarita Guerrero revised, enlarged, translated by Norman

Thomas di Giovanni in collaboration with the author

Penguin

Myth permeates all levels of all societies in the world because it seeks to give meaning to a universe which at best is a mystery and at worst is horrifying.

It tries to answer the awkward questions about the origins of the universe, of man, and the meaning of death, life and nature. Man, born into this world which even today he cannot control or understand, looks for meaning in a variety of religious or heroic legends.

But myth also functions to justify an existing social system and to account for traditional rites and customs. Thus, an Athenian clan, the Erechtheid, who used the snake as an amulet, preserved myths of their descent from King Erichthonius, a man-serpent, son of the smith-god Hephaestus and foster son of the goddess Athena.

One of the characteristics of myth is, in fact, that included along with gods and goddesses are a variety of fantastic creatures. It is these creatures that Jorge Luis Borges catalogues in The Book of Imaginary Beings.

Written with the help of Margarita Guerrero, the book is an inventory of mythological creatures from the phoenix to the behemoth. Each entry is arranged alphabetically and contains the history of the legend as well as a description of the being's composition. The source from which Borges has taken the extract is also included.

Here for example is a description of 'The Monkey of The Inkpot' taken from the writings of Wang Tai-Hai (1971).

"This animal, common in the north, is four or five inches long; its eyes are scarlet and its fur is jet black, silky, and soft as a pillow. It is marked by a curious instinct—the taste for India ink. When a person sits down to write, the monkey swaits cross-legged near by with one forepaw folded over the other, waiting until the task is over. Then it drinks what is left of the ink, and afterwards sits back on its haunches, quiet and satisfied."

This type of book is a departure in style for Borges who has won renown as a fiction writer, probably the best in the Spanish speaking world. He seems to have enjoyed himself immensely browsing through libraries gathering this information.

This is a book, as Borges says in the introduction to be taken up from time to time as the interest arises. It is meant to be enjoyed with the sense of wonder that a child experiences when visiting the zoo for the first time.

The Sensuous Person
by Albert Ellis
Signet

"The Sensuous Person" could well have been titled The Sensuous Book. Albert Ellis, who describes himself as "un-puritanical" and a "legitimate sexologist," has produced a sometimes scathing critique of five books of sex information. The Dr. David Reuben duo — Everything You Always Wanted to Know About Sex and Any Woman Can — receive Ellis' hardest and probably most justifiable criticism. I've never read Reuben's work, but if Ellis' quotes are a reliable sample of the advice contained therein, the books belong in the humour section, not the screw-it-yourself department of your local bookstore.

The "Sensuous" series — Sensuous Man, Sensuous Woman and Sensuous Couple — by M, J and Robert Chartham, respectively, receive kinder treatment at the hands of Ellis. With paternalistic kindness, Ellis dismisses the errors in M's and J's work (a brother sister team of journalists) to inexperience. Their colloquial language and unblushing advice is viewed as a great forward step in sex-book writing by Ellis. The only problem with the Sensuous Man Woman lies in blanket statements such as: "If he is sloppy, he isn't sensual." Ellis says that tastes differ.

Robert Chartham's book, The Sensuous Couple, contains helpful hints and bedroom commandments. Ellis quotes a few: "The sensuous couple never make love in the dark" "Eat wisely before having sex;" "It is essential that both partners are in mouth or hand contact . . . at all times;" Ellis, and this reviewer, find these imperatives offensive. People, sensuous or otherwise, make their own way with sex. Attempting to screw to rule is ludicrous.

Chartham is offensive; Reuben is plain silly. It is hard to imagine that any one has read Any Woman Can, taking seriously the remarks on the importance of milk in a relationship. ". . . If she is at the stage where she wants her man to marry her, all she has to do is inject enough milk into the relationship . . ." "She can invite him in for hot chocolate or coffee with cream . . . Milk chocolate, pudding made with milk, and cream custard have more unconscious influence than a glass of beer . . ." The connection, oddly enough, is with the breast, and indirectly, dear old Mom.

Reuben continues his advice with an ode to the breast: ". . . a miracle of diversification it is designed to please everyone. The primary needs of human beings—calories and orgasm—revolve around these two wonderful glands . . ." His preoccupation with the female breast is archaic. Fetishes have changed.

Ellis reports that Everything You Always . . . is packed with overgeneralizations and personal bias. "All prostitutes hate men;" "All homosexual men hang around bus stations and parks . . ." "Every man in this world has had a potency disturbance at one time or another." Everything he says may be true in some circumstances, but Ellis rightly calls Reuben on the use of words like "all" and "every."

The books that Ellis reviews are popular therefore someone is reading them and probably taking the information at face value. I would suggest that they are humourous, contain some good advice and some terrible generalizations. In time, the books will be as dated and ridiculed as the volume "What every Young Husband Should Know", published in 1896. That venerable book advises that couples should refrain from frequent sexual intercourse in order to save sperm (called "life juices") for production of children. Everyone knows that there is a finite number of sperm and that they shouldn't be wasted on wanton enjoyment. Everyone knows that.

The Pole-Vaulter
by Irving Layton
McClelland and Stewart

"Jews are non-entities"
"I'm no Jew so fuck you"
—dialogue on U of T washroom wall

It's been all cleared away, not a trace:
laughter keeps the ghosts in the cold ovens and who can hear the whimpering of small children or of beaten men and women, the hovering echoes, when the nickelodeons play all day the latest Berliner love ballads, not too loudly, just right?

—Irving Layton, The Pole-Vaulter

Most of us cannot bear much reality. We create or sustain an illusory world in which to protect ourselves from our deeper feelings and the dilemmas of an impinging and sordid reality. Often poetry becomes a vehicle for preserving certain sensitivities, a music box of beauty that we open and shut at our convenient need. We ask of our poets that they live bigger than life, as if they were already in the heaven of our unrealized ambitions and fantasies.

Irving Layton continues to write poetry that attacks this convention and demands a different approach to poetry and to our shared lives.

In a previous collection, The Shattered Plinths, written at the time of the Arab-Israeli war, Layton said, "As a poet I've claimed the right to enter imaginatively into the seminal tensions and dilemmas of our age. Art has its roots in reality, personal and social." The Pole-Vaulter, his latest work, is inspired by the courage and imagination of Anne Frank and dedicated to two women — Nadezhda Mandelsham and Heda Kovaly — who have written critically of the totalitarian regimes under which they live. He honours these three as 'pole-vaulters', having the capacity to transcend the limitations of their immediate situation; to persevere with Nietzschean vitality.

It is no accident that these

Antonin Kubalek and others present brilliant Canadian music

The cultural fallout from the Czech troubles of 1968 certainly blessed Toronto. For a few years, we had the services of the great Karel Ancerl with the Toronto Symphony. A figure not as widely known, but certainly as renowned as the great conductor, is Antonin Kubalek.

Kubalek is a pianist, one of the most exciting and technically gifted in the country today. He's played with the Toronto Symphony and made numerous CBC broadcasts, but we finally have a record from this fine artist.

That might not sound too astounding, considering the number of new records issued every month, but the fact that this record is (1) Canadian, (2) serious, and (3) not going to sell like hot cakes makes its appearance noteworthy indeed.

In a time when dismayed cynicism is all but rampant in the classical scene, it's like a bolt of welcome lightning to find a record company willing to take a chance.

The composers represented on the disc are all Canadian, and the music is unfailingly interesting.

Harry Somers, well-known in Toronto and throughout the country is represented by his "Sonata No. 5." This is a brilliant work with a rather percussive third movement entitled "Allegro, Scherzando and Fugue."

The movement, like the rest of the sonata, makes huge demands on the technical abilities of the player, and Kubalek makes it all sound easy.

Paul Kilburn, himself a noted Canadian pianist, returned to composition in 1970 after a long run of concertizing and teaching.

He knows Kubalek and his sonata on this disc was in fact written for the pianist. It's a work abounding in lyricism, with a beautifully handled nocturne section in the middle.

Its last pages are also in the motoric, complex style seen in much of the piano music of the last twenty years, treating the piano almost like an 88-key percussion orchestra.

When this type of music is well-written, the effect is thrilling.

Jean Papineau-Couture was born in 1916 into a distinguished musical family, and his 1942 "Suite Pour Piano" is his contribution to the record. The first movement, "Prelude et Bagatelle," is marked by highly rhythmic passages and intriguing melodies; the second, "Rondo," by a nice sense of overall style.

Otto Joachim, a German-born composer now living in Canada (and a member of the Montreal String Quartet) is represented by "L'Ecllosion", a four-minute nightmare for the average piano player.

John Beckwith, dean of the Faculty of Music, likened it to "an abstract sculpture in cold gleaming steel" and I think the description apt.

What Kubalek has presented us with here is a collection of inventive, exciting piano works, all marked by an outstanding characteristic of this century's music: rhythmic experimentation and massive technical difficulty.

As technique among selected virtuosos expanded early in the century, composers realized that they could in turn write ever more complex pieces.

Sometimes this has resulted in an unbearable muddle, marked only by a forest of notes on the printed page. But when the move toward greater complexity works, as it does in these pieces, it's an amazing thing to behold.

Of course, the development of technique and the resulting increase in complexity is an ongoing process and no-one knows what's to come.

For devotees of twentieth-century music, for fans of Canadian music and performances, and for those who want to hear something new and worthwhile, I can recommend this disc unqualifiedly.

It's on Melbourne Records, a spinoff of London, but it's probably to be found only in the larger record outlets. Entitled simply "Antonin Kubalek Plays Canadian Piano Music" and numbered Melbourne SMLP 4023, it's well worth having.

Two Wagner discs overwhelm our usually staid reviewer

When someone says, "I grew up in a musical household. That's where I picked things up," you might think of blues, jazz or light classical music. After all, those are the sort of things that a kid grows up to. Not, for heaven's sake, Wagnerian opera!

But here's the case of Rene Kollo, the new hero of the international opera scene. In his house, Wagner was the commonplace.

His own grandfather wrote operas, and he remarks, "I know all the Wagner pieces from childhood, of course, but always attempt to do the right thing on my own." Ahem. Well, yes, he sure does know how to do the right thing.

When superstar conductor Herbert von Karajan heard Kollo sing, he immediately told him, "you are the Walther I have been looking for," referring to the hero of Wagner's Meistersinger, the knight Walther von Stolzing.

Shortly after the two met, Karajan's excellent recording of that opera was released, the first in 20 years. Kollo's career has been straight up from there.

On a new two-record set from Columbia, Kollo performs the best-known pieces of Wagner opera written for the tenor voice. The type of tenor required to sing this music is often called "heldentenor", or heroic tenor.

This fits in not only with the mystical, super-human character that recurs so many times in Wagner's music-dramas but simply with the physical requirements imposed by a Wagner role.

George Bernard Shaw remarked that Wagner changed the way singers sing; instead of doing "numbers" in an opera, constantly in one range of the voice (like the top octave for a coloratura soprano) he gave the voice a two or three hour workout in all its ranges.

This generally made for better singers, although much public opinion of the time thought just the opposite — that it was ruining the great voices.

Still, the vocal strength required to sing out over a 120-piece orchestra playing a full volume is pretty great, and if improperly done, can ruin a voice.

For this reason, Kollo has said he doesn't intend to sing the big Wagner roles forever, despite the financial rewards it can offer.

But for the moment, anyway, he's being billed as "the sensational young German Heldentenor."

In this recording, arias from Parsifal, Siegfried, Die Gotterdammerung, Die Walkure, Flying Dutchman, Rienzi, Tannhauser, Lohengrin and of course Meistersinger are included.

The record is a huge tour de force of tenor singing. He just may be the tenor of the decade.

Happily, Columbia has decided not to charge full price for the two-disc package, which includes the German texts with English translations.

The orchestral accompaniment, by the Berlin State Orchestra conducted by Olfmar Suitner is fairly non-descript. It's really all Rene Kollo's show, and it deserves to be.

If you're curious to hear what a really good orchestra sounds like when it tackles the music of Wagner, a new disc (again, from Columbia) features the New York Philharmonic conducted by its new chief conductor, Pierre Boulez.

Boulez, once the darling composer of the fifties' avant-garde, knows a good thing when he sees one. The NY Philharmonic is one of the world's leading orchestras, brought to a high level of talent by the now-departed Leonard Bernstein.

And Boulez is really a fine conductor, with an eye for the longer line of melody without ignoring the more spectacular (if short-term) effects of spectacular instrumental detail.

This disc, simply entitled "Boulez conducts Wagner" (Columbia is going on simple titles) spotlights some of the best-known moments in Wagner's music.

Wagner called them the "bleeding chunks": he absolutely hated having his works, which he considered continuous entities lasting four or five hours, chopped up into concert-hall favourites. Imagine his rage when certain selections became popular with brass bands.

On this record, Boulez leads the New Yorkers in the preludes to Die Meistersinger, Tannhauser, Wagner's Faust-Overture (not an overture to an opera, but one based on the Faust story) and the Prelude and Liebestod (love-death) from Tannhauser.

They're all standard fare, but don't let that stop you if you're not familiar with them.

They didn't get to be standards for nothing, you know.

Interview

Jerry Bruck: a how-to-do-it for documentaries

I.F. Stone's Weekly, Jerry Bruck's film of the American journalist, I.F. Stone, opens today at CinemaLumiere. It has received sensational press reviews everywhere it has been shown.

It will be reviewed in next week's Varsity.

Stone launched his weekly in 1953, in the midst of the Cold War, when he was an outcast because of his unrepentant left wing views. In the paper, he dealt with the Cold War, the atomic arms race, the military establishment, American imperialism, and the denial of civil rights to blacks and radicals. Stone wrote every story of every page of the four page mini tabloid himself.

The paper closed down in December, 1973, but not before Stone had won respect and renown for the integrity of his endeavour to tell the American people what the American government was really doing, at home and abroad.

"Jerry Bruck Jr., 27" to quote from his publicity release "is a self-taught Canadian filmmaker who has been making documentaries on social and political subjects since graduating from Yale College, where he studied history and subscribed to I.F. Stone's Weekly."

Bruck began filming Stone in 1970. He collected relevant shots over a period of three years.

"I'm going to graduate from a pariah to a character, and if I last long enough I'll become a national institution," Stone says in the film. Bruck's film is making that last mutation come true.

Bruck was interviewed yesterday morning in The Varsity offices.

randy robertson

You are the director, producer, writer, photographer and editor of I.F. Stone's Weekly. And now you are its distributor. Why?

Standard rules and traditions of film distribution are intrinsically unfair to a filmmaker or producer. And there are fundamental problems with film distributors. They take too much of what the film earns. It's either half plus half of the expenses or three quarters of everything the producer makes. But even more serious than that is that they really don't distribute.

The process of film distribution has been mystified to the same harmful degree as the process of film-making. With a little investigation, you find that the procedures and tricks and avenues of doing it alone are not that complicated — it just requires hard work.

It seems, in this case, in fact, that it's been harder work distributing the film than actually making it.

I want to write everything that I've learned in the past year up in some coherent and easy to follow form, with a great deal of detailed appendices.

For example, any film that is going to play in theatres needs to open in New York before anything else. But to open a film in New York, in addition to having to find a theatre, you have to know how to get the reviewers to see it in advance. And there's a whole ritual that exists for that: press screenings and press releases, how to get people to the screening and where to hold them. Lists of New York media people, of theatres that would be a good bet, of theatre brokers, the terms you can get, what to look out for and what you have to avoid — these are the kinds of things that I want to collect together so that anyone who wants to distribute their films can have the benefit of my experience.

To the extent that people begin doing this and trading the information that they learn, to that extent, we're all going to have a much easier time. And to the extent, it seems to me, that film-makers control their own distribution — which means not only not giving the film away but putting the necessary energy and hard work into getting it out to the people, to that extent will the independent film movement on this continent have a chance of becoming self-sustaining.

formation that they learn, to that extent, we're all going to have a much easier time.

People assume when you say you are distributing the film yourself that you're carrying the film around with you. You're not. You find one place and you stick there and deal by phone. I do very little travelling around for the film or with the film.

It's possible to set this up in such a way that you as the person who made the film are not pinned down to any one place answering calls or making sure that prints arrive on time for bookings that were made months ago. There are service companies who will do all of this work for you.

Once you can set up a system a well-organized, efficient system with them at the centre of it, you are free to move around, to make another film ... That's the key to this whole thing. I just can't wait to get the secret out.

Varsity: Do you feel that your film attracts an already converted audience? Do you feel that it appeals only to people of a particular set of political beliefs?

I don't know, I just don't know. Who would want to go to see a film about I.F. Stone in the first place? That was the problem when we were trying to get the first theatre. Once it started off well in any given place it would continue like that and more and more people would come. Lots of those people, maybe half, had never heard of I.F. Stone — what their politics were I don't know. But I think there is a political thing involved. But it's not defined in terms of a right or left but in terms of the ability, the power of anyone who wills it to change the world in some small way.

Varsity: Your film has had a non-theatrical distribution to classrooms and educational institutions. Do you feel that it may have more value being seen in a classroom than in a movie house?

Listen, that's the best place to see a film. Sure. That movie is more fun to see with a big audience; they transform the movie. I've seen it at big college exhibitions and at really strange places like Loyola University in New Orleans where Izzie was also speaking and the participation there of the audience in the film just changed the whole thing and made it more of an entertainment.

Varsity: In I.F. Stone's Weekly a man is derided for saying that the salvation of journalism lies in its professionalism. How do you feel about the term "professionalism" in relation to print and film journalism?

I don't think that term has any meaning at all. This fellow in the movie was the head of the Associated Press and a grand vizier of the philosophy of "look out on all sides" and "don't rock the boat". Precisely that. And he stands up at an awards banquet and makes a very silly speech in which he blames the problems of society — or the problems that the press was facing then when they were being denounced by Agnew — on "zealots" and "activists" and people like that.

Objectivity was one of the main words he was talking about. It's a weird word. It has a Russian use — objective realism — and a sort of middle of the road, North American use, where it's taken to mean a shelter, an excuse to enable someone to shy away from saying what is happening. The analogy would be with a journalist covering Hitler Germany before the war. There is a right side and a wrong side. But the balanced news story represents the wrong equally with the right.

I think that what's important in terms of professionalism is that standards of decency and factual accuracy be applied. But hiding behind a shield of objectivity is just that.

Furthermore, the free flow of information in itself is not the big payoff. You can hear all the facts in the world on television and radio — but they're fragmented in such a way that nothing seems to make sense at all. If you sit down and study it all, try to put it together, read several newspapers a day and listen to all the radio and television stations then maybe you can come to some conclusions. But few of us have the time for that. The parts of the newspapers that are the best read are the sports pages and the crossword puzzles and the comics. And most people just have a chance to look at the headlines. So that I think that if I can talk in terms of responsibility, journalists have a responsibility to interpret their world.

Varsity: It's a shock in the film to see Johnson treated satirically again.

Yes, isn't it? I did that intentionally. I wanted to use examples of governmental treachery, in this case U.S. government treachery that were sufficiently removed in time so that they would not be tangled up in the personality of Richard Nixon. I thought that by going back to Johnson and to a big story, a story more important than Watergate, anyway — the Tonkin Gulf Resolution of 1964 — that the ideas behind the use of that, the point that duplicity is a common attribute of all governments — would be clearer and that my treatment of it would have a more anthropological character to it. I'm hoping that the current public sensibility of disgust and mistrust with public leaders will not be written off as something caused by one bent President.

Varsity: Another shock in the film is the presentation of Cronkite.

My television set broke down five years ago. But I'm told that he's the best of the anchormen. There's nothing personal intended in the material of Cronkite praising Marshall Ky as a hero of the Vietnamese people.

The idea was to show the difference between corporate journalism — in which you have in effect an actor representing a large organization whose primary function is to sell gasoline and dog food at 6:30 every night and whose repertoire is accordingly extremely balanced because the last thing a sponsor wants is to be associated with a hassle — and Izzie Stone, who calls Agnew a "son of a bitch", a man who makes his living saying what he thinks — which is what I think the definition of a political journalist ought to be.

Varsity: A former assistant of Stone's, interviewed in the film, says that Stone is one of the most difficult of men to work with. Was this the case when you were filming?

I'm very grateful to the spirit in which — I don't say cooperate — because Izzie is obsessed by what he is doing. But he let me get where I wanted to. He let someone whom he thought a little bit weird into his life, let him film him without any idea of how it would turn out. He didn't even want to see it at any point before it was finished.

Varsity: What was Stone's reaction to the finished film?

He loves it; he saw it just before it opened. He loves it. Said that it had changed his life:

'Clap Hands'
But not for this one

"Say, who was that lady I saw you with? That was no lady, that was my wife." This is an example of a joke everyone knows and no one laughs at, but one you will nonetheless hear if you attend The Group of Two's revival of the cabaret show Clap Hands being presented upstairs for an indefinite run at Old Angelo's.

The show, directed by Eric House, is entirely built on the premise that old jokes if reworked in a new and exciting way can have the same impact they did when first heard. The idea is certainly valid but Clap Hands does not entirely prove the point.

Using Toronto as its focus, the show begins with four immigrants cracking jokes in a foreign language. This is probably the high point of the show. The humour moves to Bloor Street, taking digs at Holt Renfrew, "where WASPS survive like some rare bird" and the new Roy Rodgers hamburger joint, "a place to take a horse to lunch."

Perhaps one of the most amusing and biting scenes in the show is a take off on the recent marathon swimming of Lake Ontario. Two reporters discuss the crossing by three year old Betsy, who to increase the challenge has a bucket of Kentucky fried chicken tied to her back. Betsy's mother stands on the prow of the boat ahead yelling "swim, you little bitch, swim." After all one of the prizes is a case of Mars Bars from Nancy Green.

The regular adultery, bestiality and sadist jokes abound and are reworked only to the extent that the name of the hotel is changed to the Hyatt Regency. All these scenes, especially those concerning adultery and domestic discord, received some hearty though not copious guffaws and smiles from the basically upper middle class audience at Old Angelo's.

The difficulty with this type of theatre is that each scene or skit must provide a comic climax, an unexpected punchline which startles and makes the audience laugh. The absence of a climax or its failure can be painful to both the cast and the audience. There are far too many failures in Clap Hands. The four actors — Araby Lockhart, Douglas Chamberlain, Fiona Reid and Stephen Foster — were very good but the material just did not give them a chance.

At the end, one found it difficult to respond to the placard-like invitation to "Clap Hands".

Business As Usual unusually good

The balance of providing information and entertainment simultaneously is not always easily achieved in the theatre. But the expertise demonstrated by the Open Circle Theatre makes Business As Usual a success. Originally performed this past summer on Ward's Island Business As Usual has now moved to mainland Toronto (St. Paul's United Church, 121 Avenue Rd.).

Business As Usual, a fast-paced series of vignettes, focuses on the victims of lead poisoning and the multi-levelled legislation connected with it. Each skit skillfully illustrates a different aspect of the victims' determined efforts as they fight trade union officials, company executives, doctors, lawyers, other families, the press, and government bureaucrats to stop the pollution of the offending lead plant.

The serious material is well-balanced by satirical and wildly farcical scenes, tight ensemble acting and singing, and Kevin Knelman's very fine original music.

Especially funny are Ray Whelan's outrageously pettifoggling lawyer, and Miche Kirby's purple-caped Pollution Man with magic power to bleep true lead poisoning stories from the media.

The highlight of Business As Usual is the last satirical-dramatic sketch — an encounter session in evasion tactics featuring the candidates for the Ministries of Labour, Environment, and Health versus the enraged public. The satire hits its mark deeply and precisely.

Something should be said about the Open Circle Theatre company and its two co-founders, Sylvia Tucker and Ray Whelan. Tucker and Whelan formed the Open Circle Theatre in 1973 as an innovative theatre experiment in community-based documentary entertainment.

"We personally wanted to find a theatrical form which would accurately reflect contemporary life in an entertaining way. We wanted to find out if we could do in the '70's what Shakespeare did in his time... and that was to parody, inform, to dramatize, but above all to entertain all the different segments of his audience."

"We're trying to find that unique blend of music, comedy and satire that will reach today's audience... that will have something to say to every individual. I think with each production, we're getting closer to finding that universal key." The group gets an idea about a current issue (past ones concerned welfare: No Way, Jose, the Toronto police: C.O.P., the Island community: I'm Hanlan, I'm Durran, He's Ward) and then it goes out into the community to find its production material.

The script for Business As Usual evolved out of an idea by Sylvia Tucker, material was collectively assembled from trial transcripts, reports, extensive taped interviews and improvisations. Most of the characters are composites drawn from the interviews presenting both sides of the issue. However, some portraits of real people have been kept intact and are incorporated into the script dialogue.

By using their own research in addition to their versatile talents, Open Circle actors and actresses naturally vitalize their individual performances and get closer to the emotions of the people they are dramatizing. They're an intelligent, capable cast who infuse Business As Usual and their other productions and indeed the Toronto theatre scene with sensitivity and enthusiasm.

'Man Who' a surprise

The Scarborough Theatre Guild's production of George Kaufman's The Man Who Came to Dinner sticks to the play's traditional style, and the result is successful. The 1933 comedy has become a classic of live theatre, retaining the humour that was so contemporary when written. But the more sophisticated audiences of the seventies could easily become bored at such traditional fare.

The plot is centred around a famous radio personality, Sheridan Whiteside, who has been injured arriving at a dinner in his honour at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Stanley, and is forced to convalesce there. Stuck in the small U.S. town where he had stopped on a speaking tour, Whiteside proceeds to takeover the Stanley's household, and woo the friendship of every member except the constantly outraged father.

Whiteside's long time secretary, Maggie Cutler, falls in love with local journalist, Bert Jefferson, and informs her boss that she plans to marry. Whiteside, with his spoiled, selfish and mischievous character, refuses to accept Maggie's decision and brews up a scheme to destroy the love affair. He invites a beautiful and ruthless actress to town on the pretense that a play Jefferson has written is a masterpiece. Maggie catches on to the plots and comes up with one of her own in an attempt to foil Whiteside. This fails, and Whiteside's scheme becomes a success, only for him to realize that he has made a mistake — Maggie prepares to leave him anyway. The play climaxes around Whiteside's annual Christmas broadcast, done live in the Stanley's living room, as all of his schemes begin to backfire. But in a last breakthrough of quick thinking, Whiteside turns the tables once again in his favor.

The character of Mr. Stanley, played by Kurt Jacobs, is disappointingly unimaginative, especially in comparison to his opposites, and even some of the actors who have walk on parts. Bert Jefferson, played by John Goddard, whose personality is relatively contained and thus difficult to blend with the generally outlandish parts, comes across as attempting to be too natural. The parts of Whiteside, actress Lorraine Sheldon and Maggie Cutler all do justice to Kaufman's work. Many of the bit players are interesting to watch, and as most of them are just beginning in the Toronto theatre scene, will be appearing in bigger parts shortly.

The light comedy is still quite hilarious, and does not appear stale in the Theatre Guild's production.

Boredom ad infinitem

My first exposure to the British band Hawkwind came with their live LP Space Ritual — a 4-sided extravaganza which, on first listening, seemed to be extremely innovative. Their identification with SF writer Michael Moorcock, listed as composer on a few cuts, interested me all the more. Some sort of super-cosmic effort was being made by these folks; I thought I was becoming interested. But on my Radio Varsity program, I never felt like playing Hawkwind after those first few listenings and I could never understand why.

Last Saturday night, I finally found out why. Sitting in the upper reaches of Convocation Hall — surely the best concert-hall in Toronto — I became more and more bored by the moment. Hawkwind's music is monotonous. Underneath all the surface-glare of Del Dettmar's synthesizer, we are forced to listen to repetitive and standard guitar and bass riffs.

The theatrics provided most potently by the images projected on a reasonably large screen behind the group were intended to dazzle and probably would have had the music been up to par with the visual element of the concert.

There was a girl — Stacia — who kept coming up on stage and doing this strange dance number with Nik Turner, the showman of the group; at first, the dance was interesting, but it, like everything else, became buried beneath the repetitiveness of the music.

This concert really reminded me of Iron Butterfly doing In-A-Gadda-da-Vida. Somehow, I thought that whole trip was just a passing fancy. But people are still doing acid, and one is assured of a mind explosion if one combines LSD and Hawkwind. But one is assured of such a happening regardless of what one combines LSD with.

There may be others who would group Hawkwind in the same class as bands such as Yes, Pink Floyd, and Genesis. Musically, that just doesn't make sense.

There were a few classy touches however. The opening narration on 'In the Hall of the Mountain Grill,' (which, ironically enough, sounds like a Genesis title), was quite a nice, even a unique beginning for a concert, but it was downhill all the way from there.

The mechanical nature of this band cannot be ignored. A fighter organization you wouldn't be able to find. Everything is thoroughly planned and rehearsed. Everything happens right on schedule — all those beautiful lighting effects — even the monotonous music is tight. But, because of the extreme nothingness of the music, there's really no point to cussing on the musicians — they're just automatons. It's the whole that counts, not the parts. The entire Hawkwind act must have been dreamed up by Michael Moorcock. He simply hired all these people and paid them well in order to get some vibes for future science fiction novels. Implausible? I don't know.

The concert was opened by Al Matthews who didn't go over too well, because everyone wanted to see Hawkwind. You know the story as well as I do. Al's on stage introducing his next number and about fourteen behemoths in the last row start yelling "Hawkwind, Hawkwind". Reminds me of the moment during the '73 Beach Boys concert at Massey, where someone in the top balcony screamed, "Play some rock 'n roll." Dennis Wilson just looked at the guy and said, "Why don't you come down here and play some rock 'n roll?"

Herman closes Forum

Woody Herman is 60 years old, still playing music, and proving it to crowds such as the 1700 people who saw him at Ontario Place last Saturday. Although he has been a band leader for 37 years, Herman has not grown stale playing old hits of the swing era, preferring to lead his crop of young musicians through songs by Stevie Wonder, Leon Russel and other pop legends.

The opening number of the 90 minute set was an arrangement of Chick Corea's 'Spain' composition. Starting with a unique bassoon solo, it led into some very talented electric piano work as well as excellent percussion jams including drums, tambourine, cow bells and marimbas. Backed by a powerful brass section, this song got the crowd so enthused that the evening's rain and thunder couldn't even cool them down. Everyone endured 'Alone Again Naturally' (a la Gilbert O'Sullivan) and a few other Muzak arrangements, but their patience paid off when the band broke into 'Superstar' (Leon Russell).

This number was typical of the band's excellence in performance — they did play well as an entity — but the music's momentum was lost during some solos. This was partly due to the front stage mike's lack of volume, with the result that the solos were drowned out by the band. But, as well, some individual artists — even Woody himself — showed little imagination with their instruments. Vic Stahl, on trumpet, resorted to blowing the high notes in order to impress the audience instead of relying on overall musical ability.

The band picked up considerably on 'Caledonia,' an old standard, with Woody carrying the vocals himself. The final piece for the night was Richard Harris' 'McArthur Park.' Played with a lot of energy and imagination, it was highlighted by two trumpeters moving into opposite sections of the audience for a little stereo bugle blitz. The crowd was favorably impressed. Obviously, they gave the band standing ovation.

Woody can be heard on a recent album, "The Raven Speaks." And if you can get hold of it, he has just had a new album released. It contains the material from his July 1974 appearance at the Montreux Jazz Festival.

This concert marked the end of the Saturday night big band concerts for 1974 at Ontario Place.

Jinxed Concert

From the beginning the concert of Roy Wood's Wizzard at the Ryerson Theatre Auditorium a week last Wednesday night was plagued with bad luck.

The hall was only half full; the concert was arranged on short notice and given minimal publicity. The concert started twenty minutes late (not bad, as some rock concerts go) because the auditorium was unlocked for the stage crew at six o'clock, a scant three and a half hours before the scheduled beginning. The haste with which the sound equipment was set up became painfully evident later during the performance. Finally, the ticket takers for the reserved seat attraction, calmly ripped the tickets in half, retaining the stub that noted your seat, bright lads, and handing you back the portion that informed you that you had just paid $5.50 to see Wizzard. Utter chaos.

Michal Hasek, who's been playing many concerts lately, opened the show, which was rather unfortunate. Unfortunate for Michal, not for the audience. A lack of appreciation on their part was more evident than any lack of ability on Hasek's.

Roy Wood and company came on stage to the accompaniment of the sounds of thunder and rain. The sartorial contrast between Wood, costumed in a crepe paper getup, his face lavished with warpaint, and his sax player, decked out in a sequined fifties-style sports jacket, sporting a ducktail hairdo, epitomized the contrast between the two musical styles of Wizzard. On the one hand there is the classically oriented rock that is derived from the Move, a group that Wood and Jeff Lynne established; on the other is an unabashed fifties sound playing tribute to such greats as Elvis Presley and Chuck Berry.

Wizzard played remarkably well considering the handicaps under which they were labouring. Their sound system picked up the signal of CJRT from the nearby transmitter, the reception improving throughout the evening. The radio station was so loud that the announcer on the air was louder than Roy Wood attempting to speak on the mike. "Being a ventriloquist is not one of my talents," commented Wood, injecting a humorous note. However, the joke wore thin as the finer points of the sax and bagpipe solos were obliterated by music from the radio.

Although the band was given an ovation, Wood refused to play an encore. Obviously disturbed by the way the show had gone he exclaimed, "If would be pointless; that radio station is louder than we are." He promised to play a free concert the next time he came to Toronto. I hope that Wizzard does return to Toronto in the near future; they deserve a better occasion to present their many talents.

Synthesizer Unbearable

Herbie Hancock has made a name for himself playing organ for eminent modern jazz musicians such as Buddy Miles and Freddy Hubbard, but he has left those days far behind him now. His delving into experimental electric music has culminated in a show which, at Seneca College, on Wednesday night, sounded at times like noise from a shortwave radio but which also managed to fill the auditorium with most imaginative sounds.

Although Hancock was placed on centre stage, his role at times became secondary due to the absolutely brilliant percussionist, Bill Sommers. I have never seen anyone who could squeeze more sounds out of an instrument than this man. His talent was most obvious during a number which began with a strange African chant, and during which Sommers played a strange instrument which pounded out a rhythm whose source seemed to be the heart itself. The audience was mesmerized by this spectacle.

The final piece of the night was probably the most exciting. Beginning with a powerful beat thumped out by drummer Mike Clark, helped by bassist Paul Jackson, the electric sax suddenly came alive to pierce the ears of the audience with its shrill melody. Benny Wilson was never in better control of this instrument during the whole concert, managing riff after riff of beautiful sound that weaved its way through the concert hall. And then Hancock intruded. The strange groans and shrieks he produced on his synthesizer soon became unbearable. Hancock walked away from the synthesizer and began playing it from a distance, mystifying the audience.

But by this time I really didn't care what he did (or how he did it). The best song of the night had been suffocated.

Stardom! The Hollywood Phenomenon
by Alexander Walker
Penguin

Stardom: The Hollywood Phenomenon is Alexander Walker's effort to solve one of the most fascinating show business mysteries. Walker is the film critic for London's Evening Standard and in this Penguin reissue of his 1970 book he attempts "an inquiry into the process by which some stars are made."

He succeeds admirably in his description of the early days of the industry and in explaining the various factors which led to the development of the "star system".

After his account of the Thirties, however, he seems to run out of stars and/or energy. The first three decades of Hollywood Stardom are painstakingly detailed but the next forty years are dismissed in rather desultory fashion. Perhaps after the splendour of Garbo and Valentino, Walker's heart just isn't moved by the "Life-Style Stars", "Ethnic Stars", "Fading Stars" and "Anti-Stars" of his last few chapters.

Walker details with loving intimacy the fortunes of such "stellar attractions" as Lillian Gish (my favourite) Charlies Chaplin, Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks. He tells all about their various TNT's (Trials 'n' Tribulations).

You know, those endearing foibles such as: Mary Pickford's uncanny business sense; Chaplin's shyness about his British accent (in silent movies, yet); and Miss Lillian's puritan dedication to Art (whether Carney or Garfunkle is not made clear).

These and other juicy anecdotes make the book a pleasure to read and to add to your Movie Confessions magazine collection. For your $2.25 you also get some nifty pictures of Clark Gable, "The King", John Wayne, "The Duke", and Rudolph Valentino, "The Sheik".

What emerges clearly from walker's book as the answer to "Why Stars?" "How Stars?" and "Who Stars?" is, simply, Money.

The reason for early filmmakers' suppression of actors' names was to avoid claims for more money as they became more famous. Actors and actresses were known to the public by their physical characteristics ("that man with the funny mustache") or by the name of their company ("The Vitagraph Girl").

One of these company "Girls", Biograph's Florence Lawrence, was among the first to have her name released to the public in a newspaper article. The occasion was the report of her death. Fortunately for her, the report was untrue (shades of Paul) and so, along with the publicity stunt, a star was born.

Once the players' identities began to be known, many shrewd producers realized that the very presence of a star's name on a theatre Marquee would guarantee the attendance of his or her fans. The studios made an aboutface and began to publicize the names and faces of their properties. Fan magazines were well-established by 1912.

Rival companies began to bid for star's services and pulled raids on one another in an attempt to secure the biggest stars for their pictures.

Walker has done an amazing amount of research for his subsequent accounts of who signed when with whom for how much and what happened and why. The political and financial backstabbing, the striving for "artistic control", the scandals and extravaganzas are also all thoroughly revealed. He shows the drastic effect on stardom of the talkies and how they laughed when The Great Lover, John Gilbert, began to speak. The feudalism of the eccentric and autocratic studio bosses is also brought under scrutiny.

It's an interesting and very well-researched account of the early days of the stars.

How not to lose an arm while catering to your ears.

Used to be, getting a stereo receiver involved a painful choice. You either got a good one and paid dearly, or you got one cheap and died a little every time you played it. Used to be. Because now Rotel gives you another option. The RX-150A. The least expensive of the Rotel line of fine receivers. It gives you the latest electronics. The integrated circuits, and low-noise silicon output transistors you've heard so much about. You also get features and features. AM-FM and FM stereo. A tuning meter to guide you to the best reception. Inputs for eight-track or cassette decks. Eight controls for shaping and re-shaping the sound. (Including switches for operating a second pair of speakers for four way sound.) Headphone jack out in front where you don't have to grope for it. And great sound, of course. An easy choice. And the price doesn't make it any harder. $229.50. But if that's too easy—or if you want all the trimmings you can get—there are seven other Rotels you can choose from. Every single one great sounding. And none of them would cost more than what you'd be willing to part with.

A number of plays have just closed or are closing soon so look out for a glut of new plays in the third week of October.

—Hosanna (at the Global Village Theatre) is off to Broadway after this Sunday; The Dyybuk at the St. Lawrence Centre finishes next Sunday, as does Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? (produced by the Toronto Truck Theatre at the Colonnade).

Among the plays continuing for a while are 1837 The Farmers' Revolt (at the Enoch Turner Schoolhouse at King and Parliament), From the Boyne to Batouche at Toronto Workshop Productions, 12 Alexander Street), The Spell of the Yukon (at the Poor Alex), A Lime in the Morning (at the Toronto Centre for the Arts), and the Open Circle's Business as Usual (review, p. 12) (at St. Paul's Avenue Road Church).

Three shows did open this week: the Scarborough Theatre Guild's production of The Man Who Came to Dinner (at Playhouse 66, 66 Denton), The Night No One Yelled at Tarragon Theatre, and Brief Lives at the Royal Alex. See the review of The Man Who in this issue of The Night in next week's.

Brief Lives is "a play for one player," as the publicity material says. Roy it's come back to Toronto by public demand. Doctrice impersonates John Aubrey the seventeenth century diarist, and in so doing conjures up a century for us. The set designed by Julia Trevelyn Oman is a maze of 2000 props, including a real fire.

It's a great show.

There are two satirical reviews in town — What's a Nice Country like You doing in a State Like This? (at the Dell) which has been going strong for quite a while now, and something newer, or a revival of something older, The New Clap Hands, directed by Eric House, at Old Angelo's. (Review, page 12).

The Theatre Mickities present the second and last weekend of their production of The School for Scandal. Tonight, tomorrow and Sunday, at 8:30 pm in St. Mike's Upper Brennan Hall. It's an amateur production, so what can you say?

Previews for Sudden Death OverTime continue until the thirteenth. The official opening is October 15 (and we'll review the play then). But tickets won't be the 99c then that they are now.

Hungadunga and McCormick, and wittingly correcting his secretary's pronunciation of Hungadunga (the colour of the "u" falls somewhere between an umlaut and catarrh).

Saturday night on television there is an easy choice to make. Citizen Kane is on channel 19, The Last Picture Show is on 9, both at 8 pm. The choice is easy because you can catch Last Picture Show again Sunday night on an American channel.

Even if you couldn't, the choice would still be easy. Peter Bogdanovich's film is not a bad movie; it's exceptionally well-acted and not nearly as frantic and self-impressed as his later films. But the tedium of life is as unrelieved as in any mid-afternoon soap-opera. There is a dialogue like "If it wasn't for him I guess I would have missed it, whatever it is," which is a tony version of the old "If I had some bread I'd make a ham sandwich, if I had some ham." Still, Cloris Leachman, Eileen Brennan and Ben Johnson are particularly worth seeing, as are many of the lesser performers.

Citizen Kane needs little introduction; the climate of opinion is that it is one of the, if not the, best sound movie ever made, strike the sound. It is a spectacularly written, acted and directed film by Orson Welles, with great contributions by scriptwriter Herman J. Mankiewicz and cinematographer Gregg Toland. The story bears uncanny resemblances to the life of newspaper magnate William Randolph Hearst.

The most shocking piece of news I heard this year was that Patty (Tania) Hearst, his granddaughter, had never seen the film and didn't even know it was about grampa. That explains more about the poor girl than all the essays in Newsweek and the New York Times.

This is the next-to-last week for the Canadian Opera Company's stay at O'Keefe. There are still tickets to be had, but you'd better get to the box-office well in advance of the performances if you want to get in. I'm told that some standing room is available for a few shows, too.

I took in the opening night performance of Faust and while it is satisfying, it doesn't match the levels reached in Boris or Dutchman. As Mephistopheles, Jerome Hines is superb, an elegantly dressed devil. His tall, commanding presence on stage reduced the other singers to mere shadows, just as a good devil should. Jean Bonhomme, as Faust was, I thought, a disappointment. He's clearly a good actor, but his abilities got lost in his rather nasal top range. Far better was Heather Thompson as Marguerite, a top singer and a creditably good actress. The production is fairly good visually, the costumes look like they've been lifted bodily from a Breughel canvas (and that's good), but hampering all the proceedings is the smping music of Gounoud. There are good moments, it's true, but this opera isn't my favourite. For those enamoured of the music, its one that's worth seeing, especially for the talents of Thompson and Hines; if Faust doesn't rank high on your list of "best" operas, you won't be missing much if you don't bother.

This week in the Opera Dept. tonight it's the marvellous Boris Gudonov, visually the most exciting thing ever shown at the O'Keefe. Tomorrow afternoon: Traviata, with a performance of Faust at 8:15. Note that the Boris evening performance starts at 7:15 pm. Boris also plays on Monday night.

Tuesday night is Faust's turn again,

Traviata makes another appearance on Wednesday, and your last chance to see the enjoyable Carmen is on Thursday eve.

If string quartets interest you, Sunday afternoon at 3 is a time you should note. At the Edward Johnson Building (Faculty of Music) the University's Quartet-in-residence, the Orford Quartet, is giving the first of a series of three programs. Haydn, Mendelssohn and Beethoven make up the program. Looks good, especially since student tickets are only $2 with ID, $5 for the series of 3 concerts. NB: get your tickets today at the EJB box office to take advantage of the student rate.

At the EJB, the annual run of free entertainment is gearing up: Thursday at 2:10 pm, you can see Harvey Sachs, conductor of the Peterborough Symphony Orchestra. He'll be giving a lecture-demonstration on the conducting art of Arturo Toscanini.

Highly Recommended Reading: an article in this month's Stereo Review, all about the making of records, in considerable technical detail. Read it and you'll be able to understand why so many warped and substandard products come out of the factories today.

Contest: C, D, E flat, B flat, C minor, F, A, F, D minor. Whose symphonies? I'll give a record prize for the first correct answer sent to the Varsity, care of the Music Editor.

The next week or so provides a rather tasty, but varied lineup for the concert goer. Though things look dormant for tonight and Saturday, the Nifty Gritty Dirt Band pulls into Convocation Hall on Sunday evening for what could be one of the more exciting shows of the fall. Lots of $4 tickets are available for both the 7 and 9:30 shows and can be picked up at either the SAC or VUSAC offices.

Monday, at the Gardens, offers the first Toronto solo appearance of Rick Wakeman. He's brought a sixty-piece orchestra and choir with him to perform his somewhat disappointing, Journey to the Centre of the Earth. Next Friday, George Carlin makes a triumphant return to Toronto for two shows at Con Hall. $4 student tickets should still be available for both shows at the SAC office but are surely to go quickly.

Next Saturday Massey Hall features Rhodes scholar turned country songster, Kris Kristoferson, along with his talented and delightful wife, Rita Coolidge. At Seneca College the same night, SRO is presenting a bargain boogie with Canned Heat. All tickets are going for $3.99, but is that such a bargain for Canned Heat?

Rhythm and blues fans can catch Tower of Power at Massey Hall on Sunday the 13th. Besides their own fine albums of late, Tower of Power has its superb horn section featured throughout Elton John's latest, Caribou.

Two fantastic shows are coming up on Monday the 14th and Wednesday the 16th. On the 14th the great songwriter- pianist-vocalist Randy Newman makes one of his rare Toronto appearances, this time with the superb guitarist Ry Cooder. Two nights later, the highly gifted Jackson Brown performs with exciting vocalist Bonnie Raitt. Both shows will be at Massey Hall.

At the clubs, Jimmy Witherspoon, the old Chicago bluesman is featured through Saturday at the El Mocomb, where next week they're offering Downchild Blues Band. At the Chimney, the Heartaches Razz Band closes out their week. Saturday night, and are replaced next week by the remarkable Ellen McIlwaine.

At the folk clubs, Jesse Winchesfer appears through Saturday at Egerton's, and Bruce Roberts can be seen there all next week. At Shiers, in the north end at Sheppard and Don Mills, my fellow editor Bob Bossin appears this weekend with Stringband, the group that will so pleasurably open the Nifty Gritty Dirt Band show.

radio

Hear how the other half sounds: Radio Varsity has a show thursday nights — called "Whatever" — which attempts (like the Varsity Review) to keep the university community informed about what's going on in Toronto and what's worth going to see. The show which is on the air from an hour and a half to two hours each week) begins at 7 pm. The show's host and co-ordinator, Frank Cockram, notes that the program has a variety of reviewers, "each expert in his or her field, who collectively cover everything from dance to rock," (with books, classical music, art, theatre, film, and science fiction in between). The show's scope, as well, ranges between a calendar listing of what's on during the week, and what's coming up during the season, on one end, and poetry readings and comprehensive live interviews, on the other.

Cockram says his concern is to report, review, interview, persons and events usually passed over by other radio stations and by the other media.

A worthy aim.

(In residence, Radio Varsity is available on 820 am, off campus on 96.3 FM.)

art

In the barren wilds of the Sid Smith building an oasis of beauty has temporarily been struck on the 6th floor. Lining the corridor are prints by third and fourth year studio majors from the University of Windsor's Fine Art Studio department. Abstraction is popular but most appealing, I thought, when fleshed out with fantasy as in "North Star", a flight of fancy centring on a pair of socks. At least one striking print, "Bika", shows that line drawing is not being neglected either. Hope to see something similar from our own department.

A university professor, Walter Sawron, has a showing of recent drawings along with Peter Mah at Yorkville's Gadatsy Gallery. At Scarborough College, an exhibit by Beverly Gorben opens today. John Howling's paintings (see review page 8) continues at Hart House till October 21:

The Marx Brothers are always cause for rejoicing. Their 1930 farce Animal Crackers is making the rounds, in its first official release since 1956.

There are dozens of reasons you should go. Here are a few of them: Groucho's dreamy "strange interludes", when he steps to stage front and mutters about endless corridors of time, weird figures, and the fact that it would be a better world for children if parents ate the spinach; the monumental Margaret Dumont, who after she receives three thunderous punches below the belt in a ferocious bout with Harpo that would have annihilated lesser men, regains her composure by delicately brushing off the lap of her gown as if she had been grappling only with an inferior brand of ladyfingers; Groucho again, dictating a letter to this solicitors Hungadunga, Hungadunga, Hungadunga.

Students to get a campus centre

By ANN McRAE
Plans for campus centre development and an all-year tennis court received approval from the university Governing Council's internal affairs committee.

The committee Monday approved the closing of parts of Huron and Wilcox Streets on the south-west campus for the green belt suggested in the campus centre report. Development is now subject to approval by the business affairs committee and Governing Council itself.

Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway said the plans are the fruit of a three-year study by SAC and planning consultants.

Architect Tupper Foster said the first stage of development involves turning St. George Street, from Harbord to College Streets, into a divided boulevard, allowing a grassy median for the hundreds of students who daily dodge the traffic.

According to the plans, the south side of Sidney Smith Hall will be redesigned into a commercial zone with fast-food booths, a bank and a restaurant. A sunken garden will occupy the present moat south of Sid Smith. The raised podium on Sid Smith's east and west sides will be accessible from Wilcox.

Income from the commercial zone is intended eventually to defray the $1.4 million cost.

Lowest priority is the conversion of parts of Wilcox and Huron Streets and the text-book store parking lot into green space.

Student governor Stephen Moses argued that this should not be a low priority because the first stated objective for implementing the campus centre calls for "improvement of aesthetic qualities on campus, beginning with landscaping."

Moses fears development could grind to a halt after the commercial development of Sid Smith, leaving the objective unfulfilled.

Innis College principal Peter Russell warned the committee it might suffer the same plight as the new Innis college building, to be constructed at St. George and Sussex. The Innis building, Russell noted, sacrificed food services and aesthetic features for necessary classroom space because of inflating costs.

Also at Monday's meeting Conway's special assistant Jack Diamond presented a proposal for year-round tennis facilities which would be covered by a plastic bubble during the winter. The proposal would allow the university to lease land to the city — probably the parking lot north of New College and the site of the proposed men's athletic facilities.

The city would own and operate the courts and changing facilities, giving priority to university members and allowing time for instruction.

An alternative site, also used presently for a parking lot, is north of the Drill Hall near Bloor and St. George Streets.

Hoechst develops a constant stream of new ideas to keep its research pointed in the right directions. Ideas about what is needed, ideas about what is wanted. Ideas about what is possible, ideas about what is probable in the light of a constantly changing, ever-increasing body of basic knowledge.

Imagination steers the ship

Imagination is a prime source of the new ideas Hoechst uses constantly in order to keep developing better products — more effective medicines, better chemical and industrial materials. Imagination is only half the battle, but when good ideas are properly teamed with the discipline of applied research, they constitute a formidable force in the search for improved products in every area of modern life.

Helping Build Canada

Products and ideas from Hoechst have touched and improved the quality of people's lives in every area around the world, in a hundred countries on six continents. As an affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organizations Canadian Hoechst Limited has a full century of research and achievement to draw upon. In Canada, Hoechst is an autonomous company employing Canadians to serve Canadian needs.

Hoechst in Canada concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, plastics, printing plates, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst products and services, Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. Scarborough and Medicine clash in div II football

By MRS. PARKER

Scarborough College made one of their rare appearances on the back campus last night and came up with a win over Meds in second division football.

Scar won the hard hitting match 10-1, but the game could just as easily have gone in Meds favor.

In the second quarter Scar clicked for the only touchdown of the game.

On a third down game, Scar used a sweep around left end by the Fleetfooted Henderson for the TD. Morin's convert was good.

After Meds were unable to muster an offense from the kick off, Scar quarterback Swider pitched the ball out to Henderson for a sweep right.

The blocking did not develop for the run and Henderson was left charging around in the backfield wondering what to do with the ball.

He spotted Chuck Taylor in the end zone and fired a perfect strike for a TD. But alas the officials, ever on their toes, noticed an ineligible receiver downfield and ruled the TD invalid.

Scar settled for a field goal, and lead 10-0 at half time.

Meds came storming out in the second half, but only managed a single point on a wide field goal attempt.

Scarborough demonstrates its option pitch to the Meds onlookers. It was Scar's most effective play.

Blues face weekend double-header

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues travel north to Sudbury to play games tomorrow and Sunday against the Laurentian Voyageurs, last year's Ontario champions.

Although not performing at its peak in the last two games, the Blues' team is the only unbeaten squad in the OUAA western division.

In practice, coach Bob Nicol has concentrated on playing the ball out of defense and utilizing throw-ins to advantage in the hope that improvements in these areas will enable the Blues to return undefeated to Toronto.

It is possible that Blues' captain Geoff Crewe, will not play while his eligibility is under question.

To date, Crewe's team mates have insisted that, because he was registered only briefly in the National Soccer League, he play in every game.

This stand has created sufficient consternation throughout the league to merit a reopening of the eligibility question at the OUAA meetings next year.

Meanwhile the coaches will be holding discussions over the Thanksgiving weekend and their decisions will be forwarded to the OUAA.

As of this moment no official protest has been received by the OUAA regarding Crewe's participation, although McMaster has initiated an enquiry.

The Blues could still forfeit their points earned so far this year or perhaps be expelled from the league next season.

The possibility of expulsion is not likely since most other teams in the OUAA also have players whose eligibility is questionable.

If the Blues' public action, even though they may forfeit match points, leads to a more open policy regarding student eligibility in athletics, it will (in the opinion of this writer) have been well worth while.

In division I of interfac soccer Scar downed Sr. Eng by a score of 3-1. Scar lead at half time 2-0 goals by Varalish and Morra. In the second half Gough again tallied for Scar but the shutout was ruined by a goal by Papadeterou. See picture this page.

There was one game in division II seeing Law and Jr. Eng deadlocked at 1-1. Bufo scored for Law while Tang counted 1 for skule.

In division III four games were played.

Eng III downed SMC B 2-0 on goals by Ramasara and De Rose.

Wycliffe and Knox tied 1-1. Haykin scored for Wycliffe and Morrow tallied for Knox.

Pharmacy dumped Innis 4-0. Waller netted 2 for the druggists while Bradley and Rissi completed the scoring.

New and Dents fought to a 1-1 tie as well. New's goal came from the toe of Grigjanis and Palermo was successful for Dents.

Demo attacks amnesty

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

Over 50 demonstrators marched and chanted outside the U.S. Embassy Saturday calling for a boycott of U.S. President Gerald Ford's "earned amnesty" program.

The demonstration followed a rally at Toronto City Hall organized by Amex Canada and the Toronto Anti-Draft Program (TADP).

During the 15-minute demonstration the crowd was addressed by Katie McGovern of the TADP.

McGovern termed the U.S. government's amnesty offer as "an attempt to divide the amnesty movement," adding "We will not participate in a bullshit amnesty."

In criticizing Ford, McGovern said, "In essence his policies are the same as those of Nixon and Johnson. It's time for a qualitative change." Amex spokesman Charles Stimac told demonstrators nearly a million war resisters needed amnesty.

Urging unconditional amnesty, Stimac said, "We all need an amnesty whether we want to live in the U.S. or not."

Many demonstrators carried placards urging boycott of earned re-entry and release of South Vietnamese political prisoners.

At the City Hall rally Vinh Sinh of the Association of Vietnamese Patriots said that despite the signing of the Paris peace agreements 20 months ago, the U.S. and Saigon governments ignore the pact. Sinh called for an end to U.S. military operations in South Vietnam.

The International Committee to Free South Vietnamese Political Prisoners displayed a "tiger cage" replica in which they claim many of 200,000 South Vietnamese political prisoners are held.

Tiger Cages are small stone cells with a grill of bars across the top.

The committee says prisoners are kept three to a cage, their wrists manacled to their ankles, and they are subjected to sexual abuse and torture.

Committee members said a $400,000 contract for construction of 384 more "isolation cells" was awarded to the American RMK Co., which owns Morris-Knudsen of Canada and Northern Construction in Vancouver.

The committee, in an attempt to end Canadian complicity in South Vietnam, wants to change the Canadian government's policy towards South Vietnam and put an end to a projected $5 million in Canadian aid this year.

SAC wants space for games room

SAC representatives will meet with U of T president John Evans and other top university administrators tomorrow to present demands for space for a games room and a permanent pub.

The proposals are outlined in an 11-page brief which calls for a games room to be set up in an unused area of the Sigmond Samuel library stacks and a pub in the temporary building next to the SAC office.

According to SAC vice-president Tim Buckley a services survey taken last year put pubs at the top of the list of services students want increased.

Unlike past SAC attempts at setting up a pub, this proposal is for one that would be open daily. "It will be more like a lounge," said SAC president Seymour Kanowitch.

Several past efforts have failed, according to Kanowitch, because they were temporary pubs run in a cafeteria or a basement, only drawing people from that area.

Past SAC pubs have also had to compete with college pubs by operating on Friday and Saturday evenings have lost money on live entertainment.

The temporary building location for the pub would be more central and SAC could spend money to refurbish it if space was allocated on a long-term basis, SAC reps argue. The space is now used by the school of Graduate Studies.

The proposal for the games room would turn part of the Sig Sam library stacks into a self-contained amusement area including pool tables, ping-pong tables and coin-operated amusement machines.

SAC anticipates the initial outlay for the games room would be $10,000 to $12,000. A full-time manager would supervise the games room.

The brief notes U of T is one of the few universities in Ontario without both a daily pub and a games room. Buckley said after visiting other Ontario universities such as Western, SAC executive members had found such facilities profitable and well used.

The essential problem, according to the brief, is that the U of T campus has been designed almost solely for academic purposes and neglects recreational facilities.

Students have been trying to remedy this for many years. In the last 23 years there have been seven campus centre proposals and only this year are final plans being made for some development in the southwest corner of the campus.

SAC argues its proposals, along with the implementation of the Campus as Campus Centre proposals, would provide immediate improvement to the campus environment.

However, the SAC proposals are for immediate development, stressing the recreational and social value of providing central services for students of all colleges and faculties.

SAC took the games room and pub proposals to the Campus as Campus Centre committee early this summer but the committee recommended SAC approach the administration.

Since then, according to Kanowitch, SAC has approached several different Simcoe Hall bureaucrats but has just been shuffled around. SAC is hoping for a definite commitment this time.

The brief documents the long and frustrating attempts previously made by SAC to get some action on demands for more recreational facilities, in the campus centre proposals and others.

Although Buckley admitted the space SAC has requested is not ideal, he added, "We can't be choosy." He feels both proposed locations would be central.

Citizen staff considers buying paper

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The Toronto Citizen's unionized staff has to raise $14,000 by this Wednesday if they want to buy the troubled bi-weekly newspaper from its present owners.

The offer was made to the staff by board president John Sewell during a Citizen board meeting last Tuesday.

Sewell said he was offering the newspaper to the staff for only half the ordinary sale price "because they indicated an interested in running it and no one else seems that interested."

However, staff spokespersons have indicated it is unlikely they will be able to raise the money required to buy the newspaper.

The 10,000 circulation bi-weekly newspaper, which emphasized city politics coverage, folded last week after a bitter dispute between the staff and a majority of the seven-member board of directors over hiring and firing policies.

Citizen co-editor Ellen Moorhouse criticized the one week deadline allotted to the six-member staff to raise money to buy the newspaper. "After all," she said, "it's taken them a lot longer than a month to raise $14,000. It's pretty hard for us to raise it in a week."

"We thought a week was reasonable," Sewell said. "They can come and ask us for an extension if they want it but so far haven't had any response from them."

Sewell said the $14,000 purchase price the staff would pay is only half the amount of money invested in the paper.

"We have $19,000 worth of capital in the paper, a $5,000 bank overdraft and a contract with the general manager that we'll have to pick up," he said.

But Moorhouse considered the $14,000 asking price "inflated."

Moorhouse said the staff itself doesn't have "that kind of money. We could only get it with backers. Some groups have shown an interest but so far nothing has coalesced."

If the staff does not raise the money, Sewell said, he will offer the paper to other groups at a higher price.

SAC votes $1,000 for Citizen if council approves owners

SAC's external affairs commission voted 6-2 Thursday evening to grant $1,000 to the Toronto Citizen if it is sold to new owners.

The grant, however, is "subject to review" and will depend on who the new owners will be Toronto Citizen writer Art Moses originally made a request for $5,000 to the commission.

"We might give more," said SAC president Seymour Kanowitch, "depending on how many grant requests we get between now and the time the Citizen is sold."

Disruptions in phone service at the Hyatt Regency Hotel have been blamed on four drunken birds who were fed liquor soaked cherries by bar patrons.

Perhaps that's the way lifelong penthouse socialist Pierre Trudeau wants it, to convince people that our political and economic system does not work and must be radically changed under his personal and unchallenged command.

Lubor J. Zink

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Faculty tenure case not marked by logic

Within the university, students often enjoy making the case that faculty members are cases of minimal intelligence, mad reactionaries let loose to act out their fantasies in the sanctity of a university environment.

This isn't true, of course: we've met one or two nice ones. But why is it that the arguments presented by faculty members on university issues so often seem bereft of logic, coming from the stomach rather than the brain?

This was certainly the impression given at last Thursday's meeting of the academic affairs committee, which heard SAC president Seymour Kanowitch deliver a lengthy, but tightly argued brief outlining the case for parity student representation on tenure committees.

The faculty position, delivered by philosophy professor David Gauthier, was at best pedantic, and at worst contorted. Gauthier spent several minutes trying to worm his way out of a position which involved "necessary", "sufficient" and other conditions to judge the requirements of tenure.

The Faculty association's case suggests a refusal to consider seriously the arguments presented by students and a rather frantic attempt to rebut them. To the faculty association, there appears to be a prima facie case that students should not sit on tenure committees.

Consider the arguments made in the brief. It is acknowledged that "teaching and research are, in general, equally important," in tenure decisions. Consequently, information available to members of tenure committees must come from both areas.

But, the brief notes, members of a tenure committee should be appointed not for their knowledge of the facts of the case, but for their ability to assess them. Indeed, "to argue that anyone should be appointed to a tenure committee because of knowledge of particular facts would be to undermine the impartial and judicial nature of the process."

From there, the logic becomes stunning. Students should not necessarily sit on tenure committees because of their knowledge of the facts: this would "turn the role of a witness into that of a judge," and violate objectivity.

Now just a minute: let's turn that one around. If too intimate a knowledge of the facts hinders judgment, then should not faculty members be prevented from sitting on tenure committees which judge research since they have intimate knowledge of research? What a fantastic scenario: the professors judge teaching ability, and the students judge research, all in the name of objectivity.

The faculty association brief does a very dainty sidestep to avoid this logical absurdity. Since, "assessment . . . must be made by those who are competent to judge all aspects of a candidate's performance and ability . . . This in our view, requires that the committee be composed of those who may be regarded as the candidate's peers: that is, the members of the University faculty who have, to be frank, the maturity and judgment that is necessary."

To be frank, Mr. Gauthier, that is elitism, and very poor argument. On what basis do students lack maturity and judgment. In that they chose to come to the University of Toronto?

If the faculty are going to enter the tenure debate, then they should do so with arguments worthy of their position.

Communists in Vietnam carnage too

Dick Brown's article (Oct. 2, on Vietnamese political prisoners), mentions "the dreadful carnage which the Americans lavished not only on Vietnam, but also on Laos and Cambodia." As usual, no mention is made of the dreadful carnage which the communists lavished on those unfortunate countries.

He completely overlooks the fact that an army of communists invaded South Vietnam before U.S. troops were sent to keep that country from being overrun. More than 350,000 Vietnamese soldiers, communists and non-communists, have been killed or wounded since a "ceasefire" was declared in January 1973, according to government officials in Saigon.

Residents worry over athletics

It is of some concern to those living in the neighbourhoods surrounding the University that the proposed athletic complex might receive wide-spread, unreflective student support.

The recent article on the proposed levy on student fees suggests this danger. It states that construction is being held up because criteria for exemption from the city's height by-law have not been finalized. This is true, but there are other reasons: both the Huron-Sussex Residents' Association and the Sussex-Ulster Ratepayers' Association are opposed to the present plan for this complex.

May I suggest that The Varsity investigate their reasons. Further University expansion poses a threat to all those who make their homes in this part of the inner-city; just because the desires of students for recreation may coincide with the desires of empire-builders within the University, these desires should not be allowed to over-ride the legitimate interests of the surrounding communities.

Chirpers confuse concentrator

I'm glad that you published the letter by Dan Larsen (Oct. 2) complaining about the Hart House clock chiming every hour. Of course, this sort of noise pollution is one of the most serious problems with the downtown campus. The problem has recently been ameliorated with heavy construction machinery working around U.C., but when that work is finished we will once again be forced to live with those hourly gongs.

A more serious problem is that of birds chirping in the spring. It is difficult to concentrate on a textbook when sitting under trees after about April because of the distracting influence of assorted cacophonous birds.

I hope that The Varsity will continue to serve as a forum for useful discussion on how we may improve our environment.

SDS appeal to council supported

The actions of the University of Toronto Administration in the "Banfield Affair" were reprehensible. Prior to Banfield's visit the Administration refused to seriously consider any complaints of racism in teaching or practice on campus. Despite the broad nature of the opposition to Banfield's role as a key adviser to the Nixon government on urban affairs, as could be seen by a Teach-In Against Racism attended by 1,500 and by protests from the Italian and black communities (including the editor of Il Giornale di Toronto), the Administration made no attempt to consider the issue. After Banfield was prevented from speaking March 13 the Administration moved quickly to initiate disciplinary proceedings against two of the students involved, but again did not deal with the important issues raised. Instead they invoked CAPUT, a tribunal composed entirely of Deans and Principals. The trial itself was restrictive and biased, and the sentences imposed were harsh and vindictive.

We support the appeal of Bill Schabas and Tony Leah and call on the Governing Council to overturn the CAPUT decision. Instead of unilateral action against dissent, the University Administration should act to curtail racism.

We invite all interested members of the University community to a meeting to plan public support for this appeal, Tuesday October 8, 12 noon, International Student Centre, 33 St. George St.

Unsolicited contributions to The Varsity appear in two forms. Short submissions, space permitting, are run as letters to the editor. Longer pieces, to a maximum of four pages typewritten, will be run as "top-ed" articles, if they are deemed sufficiently interesting.

All correspondence must be typed on a 72-character line, and addressed to the editor: It may be delivered in person, or mailed to The Varsity, 91 St. George St., 2nd floor, either by campus or regular mail.

No material received after 4 p.m. the day before publication will be considered for that issue.

Law students' reps support parity

The Students' Law Society has joined many other campus student unions in supporting the common student position of faculty-student parity on the Governing Council.

In a brief released earlier this week the law students support student recommendations for changes in the U of T Act not only for parity but for changes which would make government appointees more representative of Ontario taxpayers.

The brief argues faculty-student parity is the only way that maximum "credibility and viability" can be achieved to avoid alienation caused by nominal student representation.

The law society also rejects the argument of governor John Tory that parity would lead to a diminution of contributions by the teaching staff. "There is no basis in fact or in past history for this fear," the brief states.

Another main argument the brief makes is that present student representation is inadequate in representing the viewpoints of the entire student body.

The brief calls attention to the problem of representation from professional faculties, recommending three students represent professional faculties, no two of whom would come from the same faculty.

At present two large faculties, medicine and engineering, have dominated professional students' representation on Governing Council, leaving law and 12 other small faculties unrepresented.

The brief argues the present system is unfair and students from smaller faculties will never have any representation until changes are made. Students have tended to vote only for students from their own faculty.

The law society rejects the argument of some anti-parity forces that students are less committed to the university and less conscientious than faculty members. "The history of student representation to date is evidence of the fallacy in such assertions," the society's brief says.

The brief also says parity on Governing Council should be discussed on its own merits and not clouded by the issue of similar representation on other university bodies.

"Students and faculty together make up the academic community," the brief concludes. "This community is best served by a body in which both groups have an equal opportunity to set policies affecting them."

Supporting demands for broader community representation, the brief says because the university is tax-supported and affects those in the surrounding and broader communities, as many interest groups as possible should be represented on Governing Council.

SAC, the Graduate Students' Union, the Association of Part-time University Students and the U of T Alumni Association have also submitted briefs to council calling for staff-student parity on the university's top governing body.

GOVERNING COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY

GRADUATE STUDENT

ELECTION REMINDER

A delayed election has been called to fill one graduate student seat on the Governing Council of the University. The constituency involved is outlined below:

Graduate Student Constituency II

— all students registered in the School of Graduate Studies in

- i) the Graduate Department of Educational Theory
- ii) Division III (Physical Sciences)
- and iii) Division IV (Life Sciences)

The term of office for this seat will commence upon election and expire on June 30th, 1975.

Prospective candidates are reminded that nominations may be filed until Noon on Friday, September 27th and are urged to hand their nominations in early.

Nomination forms and election regulations may be obtained from the Office of the Governing Council, Room 106, Simcoe Hall or from the Secretary of the School of Graduate Studies. Enquiries should be directed to the Office of the Governing Council at 928-2160.

BUT COME

Dr. John makes a point . . .

The following edited interview with U of T president John Evans was conducted September 20 by Varsity editor David Simmonds.

The Varsity was anxious to conduct the interview as Evans, with his term half-completed, is still far too little known by the university community, for a person so powerful.

The interview touches on Evans' approach to his job, his attitude to the university, his way of decision making, and his personal motivations.

Varsity: Now that you're halfway through your term it seems appropriate to look back and ask you what you think you've achieved so far.

Evans: That's awfully hard. I suppose that one of the most difficult things is the slowness of the process. There're many ideas that you'd like to see materialize, but the structures, the need to communicate . . . take such a long time . . . that it seems almost imperceptible progress. As you're in it it seems awfully slow.

Looking back, it does seem that a few things have happened, so probably there's been a little progress.

Varsity: Can you point to any specific successes?

Evans: Points of change. One of the most important is the idea of beginning to assemble the sorts of information on which decisions can be made within the university, because the tendency in the past has been to deal with a problem as it arose . . . What I'm very concerned about is the things that don't have the spotlight, that may be even greater problems. In our whole area of capital development, of aesthetics on the campus, there really isn't an organized plan, and therefore in terms of overall needs on the campus. It might be something like the Sugmund Samuel Library where it was visible and obviously old . . . and that might be the thing that attracted the attention. Whereas in fact something like the Mining Building may be very much more serious and higher in priority.

The second thing was to get the plan for the St. George campus centre, in a sense that would redevelop the existing site rather than did what practically every institution has done, add on to it. It seemed to be that we were over our growth area, and that it was important to get it established that there wasn't going to be any more growth in Arts and Science. And the professional faculties. There wasn't going to be any more growth in these areas unless there were compelling reasons.

Varsity: When you first became president, you said that the main thing that struck you about the university was its overwhelming size. Do you see that in itself as being the main problem?

Evans: It's funny. At that stage it was almost something that bothered me, the tremendous size, and the fact that it was so hard to come to grips with any problem . . . I guess now I'm still overwhelmed by it, but I also think that this diversity is some of the character of the university . . . The differences that exist are strengths, there're not just obstacles.

Varsity: Is the diversity a manageable diversity?

Evans: Well, that's the challenge, isn't it? If you can build on that diversity, get the different parts to work together, then you have a rather interesting kind of mosaic, rather than a conformist institutional effort. If it was totally institutional, I think it would be just stifling.

One of the things that has struck me during these first two years is the need to strike a balance between this diversity, and building on this diversity, but gaining some sort of commitment to cooperation . . . so that you can make good use of your resources.

Varsity: Which puts you in a delicate position, being a centralist.

Evans: You've got to get your programme responsibilities decentralized . . . and what you want to make sure of is that the units of those programs then agree to a form of cooperation, so that they are as efficient as possible. You've got to build up the units' sense of responsibility to make the best use of the resources that you can provide to them.

If I look back, one of the things that gives me the greatest satisfaction is the possibilities that are opened up by the college proposal. The colleges are really taking on some individuality now. It will be difficult but at least we're on the way. It's the chance for each of the colleges to build some academic individuality, to start to get that programme of education into a more manageable-sized unit to try some innovations. There's no way that that could come off on its own.

Varsity: Would you describe problems you've encountered in the same terms?

Evans: The first problem is getting to know the institution. I'm continually finding blind spots. I suppose I'm just now getting to feel that I won't discover a whole new area. The first year it wasn't what I'd expected from reading the reports. You discover that the problems weren't really quite as they were being presented. I think that I'm beginning to have a bit more confidence that I know the depth of the problem, which I certainly didn't have the first two years. I probably made a good many errors in judgment those first two years — where the problems were, what were the really critical elements of the problems, and the best method of trying to attack the problems. I'm feeling a little more comfortable at this stage of the game that there won't be any more surprises in each one of the boxes that you open up.

But if you asked how much progress we were making, I would say that the problems are developing more rapidly than we're solving them. We're certainly not leaping ahead and making great progress. On the other hand I think that that will always be the state of the university; that there will never be a clean shop. You have to sort between the problems and deal with the ones of greatest significance, not the easiest to solve.

I felt that the federated colleges thing was so fundamental that this was the thing that I had to address myself to in the largest way. Even if we've only made five percent progress in this area and at the end of five years we move that up to ten or fifteen percent, that may be more important than any of the single little problems.

Varsity: How would you characterize your approach to the university as a whole. It struck me that your predecessor viewed the university very much in aesthetic terms. And I wondered how you would characterize your own approach to the university. Everybody realizes that these are times of economic stringency; however, I wondered whether the characterization that's been made of you, that you're a rationalizer of resources, and a technocrat, is a fair description.

Evans: I don't know whether I'm a technocrat or what have you. I guess I am very concerned about what the university achieves, and the technocrat will call that output, or something like that; but I am very much concerned with that. I'm not as concerned with process, I don't believe there's a 'right' way in terms of the process side. I think that will be a style that is developed by the people who compose the university. But I think it's awfully important that, no matter what style they choose, they should keep focusing on what should happen as a result of their activities, rather than focus exclusively on style. And that's something the University of Toronto has spent a long time on, looking at the style of its process.

I have perhaps some different personal objectives that I think are very important for universities to do, which probably aren't shared by a large proportion of the people within the university. It's probably less important whether or not those are achieved, they reflect my own background, and that's probably less important in terms of what the university does, but the university at least has to face those sorts of objectives, and then try to make sure that whatever process it adopts fairly and squarely addresses what those objectives are.

Varsity: These personal objectives being . . .

Evans: I've always been very much concerned about some of the social development goals of education, the role that education plays, not just for the people that are the very brightest within the situation, but that it plays some role in advancing the potential of individuals. Maybe it's more important for a university to take in people who wouldn't get in in our current competition, and advance them by 25 percent in their business, than people who are our most brilliant scholars, and advance them two percent. This may be the trade off you're looking at in certain situations.

I believe that you can't use the university as a social development mechanism exclusively. I think that would distort a lot of the longer term goals of the university; but I think it is valid for the university to try and select certain social development goals, in which it, as an educational institution, can play a special role. And if it does those, and does those successfully, it can make a very good contribution. I don't think that should be the whole university.

A M

MORNING WITH DR. JOHN

... The Varsity is not convinced.

Varsity: Maybe this is an unfair judgment on my part, but I think you're far more of an unknown quantity than your predecessor. You're still fairly unknown to the general populace of the University of Toronto. I'd like to ask you a few questions about your own personal goals in life. What do you hope to achieve with your life for the next 25 years?

Evans: There are many reasons that I'm not particularly well known. I guess one of them is I'm not really terribly interested in being a publicly identifiable figure, and that's a shortcoming perhaps; and it's certainly a shortcoming for the university, because the university would be much better served by somebody who really wished to be visible. Visible not just at a personal level, but visible as a force in post-secondary education, and I guess that relates to what I was saying before about outcomes.

The thing that always embarrasses me is people who talk at great length about what they're going to do in a programme, and you go and visit the institution where they are and not a thing has happened: it's all talk, in a paper sense. I've always felt that you should be well on the road to achieving before you start talking about it. Maybe it's shyness, maybe it's because you're not sufficiently certain it will turn out at that stage of the game, but it really is part of this philosophy of producing of putting something out, of achieving some result, rather than talking a good game. There's been far too much in higher education, in science, of the preliminary report. I think that the boast before the event is just not something I'm very comfortable with. But the other thing is I guess I'm not really a high profile person.

Varsity: And you would prefer it that way?

Evans: Yes, I don't know why, I guess it's just what my own personal habits are and everything else. I just happen not to be very high profile.

Varsity: Have you ever had any personal heroes, and particular people whose works you've admired?

Evans: The last time someone asked me this was on a radio program, and I couldn't think of any, and then I said "Well, yes, one of the people who's really intrigued me is Real Caouette"; and they all laughed. But it wasn't a facetious remark. The element that has impressed me about Real Caouette has nothing to do with his political philosophy, but that he had a real ability to reach people, and to put what may be quite a complex idea in a form of words that he could communicate to them very readily.

I think that characteristic is one of the things that impresses me most; it impresses me more than the tremendous brilliance of turning a phrase. The ability to be sensitive to what people are feeling, and their concerns, and to be able to communicate something to them that they can understand, I think this is a really remarkable quality, one that I think is fairly rare.

Evans: The Governing Council. You know people say to me, "get up and tell them where you stand on this issue." Well, there's a tremendous temptation to do that all the time, to stand up every five minutes and let go. On the other hand, what's the point of having the Governing Council? The Governing Council isn't to be whipped by the president to take a particular position on any issue; the governing council is there as a forum to deliberate on policy and arrive at some conclusions. The way it was set up, the president is just another member of the governing council.

It seems to me the whole concept that was set up with the Governing Council was to downplay the role of the administration as executive leadership in that area. Now clearly, it can't be downplayed altogether, because the administration is responsible for implementing these policies once they've been approved.

The key thing is for the president to make sure that the sort of information on which a decision is based is brought forward in the committees; and that as long as that information is brought forward properly, and put in a way that people can make the decision, then I don't think it probably is the right thing for the president to push a particular position. That's now up to the Governing Council, to try and make up its mind. Unfortunately, some of these decisions aren't self-evident, and the more that politics as opposed to judgment and facts get into it, then the more people get anxious that other people join their side.

Varsity: One of the things you have been concerned about is the separation between the legislator and the administrator. I wondered why you would favor more administrative representation on the Governing Council.

Evans: First, there's no homogeneity of the administrative group, they're very heterogeneous: it isn't as if it's a constituency in that sort of sense. My real concerns about the deans, directors and principals is that they want to feel a commitment to the policies that have been adopted by the Governing Council. We try and get the deans to meet regularly to discuss the business coming out of the Governing Council, so that they have some understanding, but it's almost the same argument as why there should be some students on the Governing Council.

It's all very well to say that you can have them on other committees where they can feed their ideas into the Governing Council. But there is a sense of commitment to the decisions as far as administrators are concerned, there's a sense of commitment to their implementation if in some way they've had some participation in the formation. Now they're going to be such a small number that they are not going to swing any weight.

Diploma in studies at Trent U

PETERBOROUGH (CUP) — Starting this fall Trent University is offering a two year diploma program in native studies. The program will enable native students to combine practical work in relating new knowledge to the needs of their communities.

The program is open to students who have successfully completed grade 12 and to mature students.

Ontario universities usually require completion of a five year secondary school academic program for admission to university but most native students go through the four year high school stream leading to jobs instead of university.

Professor Walter Currie, chairman of the native studies department, pointed out that there were five times as many native students in grade 12 of the four year stream as in grade 13.

To give them the opportunity to continue their education in a university setting, he said, required a type of program that can bridge any gap in their understanding without lowering the regular university admission standards.

Counselling and a seminar in communications and skills before starting at Trent would be used to upgrade four year high school graduates.

Currie said the type of practical training students will receive in the new program would make them likely candidates for a wide variety of employment opportunities in government agencies, native and band council associations and private businesses that deal with native communities.

The university won't guarantee jobs to diploma graduates, he said, but the understanding of native communities they develop in the program will put them in a good position to approach employers who have extensive dealing with native people.

Currie cited the federal manpower department, the provincial ministries of community and social services and correctional services and banks as employment areas with good potential for diploma graduates.

HONG KONG
A crowd of thousands surrounded a police station in the Hsin Pu-Kang and Huang Ta-Hsien areas of Hong Kong to protest the rising cost of living in mid-September.

The crowd, composed of workers, students and other Hong Kong residents, blocked traffic by setting fires and smashing cars which tried to pass through their lines. They shouted slogans of the recent anti-inflation campaign.

The police riot squad tried to force the protesters to disperse throughout the evening but was repeatedly beaten back by the angry crowd.

Soon after the rally was announced, 12 police vans arrived at the scene and the police began making arrests and roughing up the demonstrators to discourage them from continuing the demonstration. With its ranks swelled with workers from nearby factories, the crowd fended off the police attack and started marching on the Huang Ta-Hsien district police station. The police retreated into the station and sealed off all doors and windows, calling on an armored police division to attack the crowd.

At this point, red and black flags began to appear in the crowd. The Emergency Bulletin Group, an anti-inflation emergency committee, reiterated the goals of the campaign over a public address system and in printed leaflets.

The Emergency Bulletin Group demanded immediate release of those arrested and urged the people of Hong Kong to resist government complicity in the economic crisis by implementing the "Four Don'ts": don't pay rent, don't pay phone bills, don't pay water bills and don't pay electricity bills.

Workers, students, and the unemployed addressed the demonstrators. They demanded the government abandon its role in encouraging inflation; that a commission be selected from among the workers to revamp the Employment Termination Compensation Act; that factories be enjoined from shutting down or reassigning workers and slashing pay. They also encouraged women to organize into anti-inflation groups and struggle for equal pay for equal work.

GREECE

Greek Premier Constantine Caramanlis is attempting to gather as much support as possible in order

Caramanlis' attempts have included such measures as the re-establishment of trade unions, abolished after the fascist coup of April 21, 1967, and a 10 percent increase in the minimum wage.

The minister of the interior has been instructed to begin "technical preparations" for general elections, recompiling the electoral lists which had been falsified during the dictatorship.

Meanwhile, a new leftist weekly, Nea Ellada has been started with a circulation of 75,000. The paper's editor stated the Nea Ellada is the "voice of solidarity with all courageous fighters against reactionary fascism and dictatorship."

CHILE

The Movement of the Revolutionary Left (MIR) in Chile recently revealed that in mid-September the Chilean junta made the astounding but not unexpected offer to release and send into exile all imprisoned MIR members in return for a promise by the MIR to lay down their arms.

The offer was a reaction to the ever-growing rise of resistance against the junta of which the MIR is a key source.

As a further condition of the "deal", the junta demanded the MIR denounce its members who were working in the armed forces and promised that they too would be sent into exile.

In its statement, the MIR characterizes the junta's "cynical and stupid" attempt to set up a truce with the MIR as a desperate effort to suspend the internal state of siege by disarming the MIR. The movement calls the offer an attempt to hinder the unity of the Chilean left.

The MIR statement declares that all such proposals by the junta are doomed to failure. It reaffirms that the MIR will not accept any truce, that the MIR will not make any pacts with the assassins of the Chilean people, representatives of the big bourgeoisie or North American imperialism.

The MIR stated that it has made an irrevocable pledge to fight with all its strength to topple the military junta by force of arms and turn these assassins over to the people's justice.

PHE use Argo playbook to defeat winless SMC in division 1 football

The Varsity — Brian Pei

By THE PHANTOM
The ghost of ex-Argo coach Johnny Rauch made a brief appearance over the back campus Friday as PHE and St. Mike's battled in a bitter rematch of last year's Mulock Cup final.

The jocks were leading 19-14 in the final minute, well actually the final 14 seconds to be precise, and found themselves with a third down on their own eight-yard line.

The obvious strategy would have been to take a delay of game penalty to run out the clock and then simply ground the ball. But that's what's so interesting about the jocks: they never do the obvious.

In a situation closely resembling the celebrated Argo-Winnipeg game earlier this year, the PHE coaches inexplicably called for a time out, thus stopping the clock. Then they decided to concede a safety touch, but the ensuing snap was so high the ball sailed out of the short end zone and suddenly the score was 19-16 with still 11 seconds remaining.

Under the rules PHE had to kickoff, and the Irish still had time for at least one play. However, the alert Phys-Ed defense intercepted a desperation pass to end the game.

The result keeps PHE in first place while SMC drops to the basement after two consecutive losses.

There is a possibility that the latter portion of last week's Vic-Engineering game will be replayed but as things currently stand, tomorrow's Vic-PHE game will be for first place while SMC and Skule play Wednesday for third place.

For most of Friday's game, it seemed that last-minute dramas would be the least possible occurrence as PHE combined a tenacious defense, some clever long passing and many, many SMC penalties for a 19-0 lead at the end of the third quarter.

In fact, as the final period opened, the jocks were marching toward a fourth touchdown when they gambled on a long pass which SMC intercepted. Not to be outdone in the penalty parade, the jocks then took three consecutive 15-yarders and eventually St. Mike's scored.

A few penalties and some sloppy PHE tackles later, the Irish were back and suddenly it was 19-14, setting the stage for that exciting finish.

Second division action resumes today with a doubleheader on the back campus: Scarborough's end sweeps against Forestry's passing and New's versatility against UC's memories.

Football Blues dump McGill

By DAVE STUART
MONTREAL — On Saturday the Varsity Blues football team travelled to McGill and continued their winning ways by downing the Redmen 48-21.

What a day for football it was. Unfortunately only about 800 fans were on hand for the game, and a good half of them were from Toronto.

Those that travelled to Montreal saw the Blues run up their biggest passing and rushing totals this year. Varsity could do no wrong.

The mood of the game was set right from the opening scrimmage. Blues, on their first set of downs, were a yard short at their own 31 for a first down. Instead of punting the ball away giving McGill good field position, Varsity gambled and won.

From that point to the end of the first half, the story was all offense for Toronto.

Bragagnolo, Langley and Eelsey virtually did as they pleased with the McGill defense. Bragagnolo exceeded even himself with three touchdowns and well over 200 yards in rushing before he was taken out of the game early in the third quarter.

Varsity scored on their first offensive series. Rushes by Castillo and Bragagnolo moved the ball out to Toronto's 45. From there the deceptively fast Bragagnolo went 65 yards around left end for the major.

Only moments later the score was 10-0 as Don Wright connected on a field goal.

McGill came back after the field goal with a drive of their own. Pinpoint passes from Auders to Meehan and Dunn helped bring the Redmen to the Toronto 15.

Varsity's defense dug in and forced McGill to attempt a field goal.

Stan Gendron fumbled the snap and Rick Nakatsu burst in to hit Gendron before he could tee up the ball for the kick.

The second quarter opened with yet another Toronto tally. Bragagnolo picked up his second touchdown with an eight yard drive. The convert gave Toronto a 17-0 lead.

Not three minutes later, Don Wright hit a 43 yard field goal, his second of the game.

By now McGill were praying for half time but Blues were unmoved. With only two minutes left in the half, Langley fired a 15 yard strike to Brent Eelsey in the end zone.

The Blues went to the dressing room with a 27-0 lead.

Al Brencley took over the quarterback job for the second half. His first hand-off to Bragagnolo sent the Blues' halfback on a 43 yard scamper for his third TD of the game.

At this point Bragagnolo was taken out of the game and replaced by Colin Lauder.

McGill's defense was not as incompetent as it might seem. The Redmen were missing three first stringers in the form of George Gaty, Brian Quick, and middle linebacker Jacques Dussault.

A combination of a slight but understandable let-down on the part of the Blues' defense and some precision passing by Auders allowed the McGill machine to start rolling.

McGill was handed the ball on the Toronto 38 when Morris intercepted a Brencley pass. A pass interference call on Rick Jeysman and a quick pass to Meehan put the ball on the Varsity 16.

Three plays later Auders spied Brooks wide open in the end zone and connected for the touchdown. Castellani's convert was good.

McGill moved the ball well in the quarter, and the Redmen were soon threatening again. A 31 yard pass to Morgan gave the Redmen a first down on the Blues' three yard line.

It took only one play for McGill's Brooks to punch the ball over for the TD.

Toronto, apparently miffed at McGill's audacity at putting points on the board, stormed back on the strength of Lauder's running.

At midfield now, Brencley and Eelsey combined for a 50 yard pass and run down to the McGill 11.

On second down Brencley dropped back to pass, saw no one open and did the noble thing. He ran the ball in for the major himself.

Al Brencley's pass protection in the second half allowed this completion to Eelsey for 50 yards.

Despite losing 41-14 McGill was still determined. On the first play after Varsity's kickoff, Auders hit Ross Brooks for an 83 yard touchdown.

The touchdown was not so much a result of Redmen excellence, but rather a confusion in the Blues' backfield.

The Blues were on a binge. Yet another Varsity player, Libert Castillo, hit the scoreboard for the final Toronto touchdown.

As an example of how everything went right for the Blues, Don Wright's kickoff went off the side of his foot about 15 yards downfield. Doug Ball picked it up for Varsity and ambled down to the McGill 38.

Toronto spent the rest of the quarter feigning incompetence so as not to make McGill feel bad. In fact the score could easily have been 51-21 but coach Murphy deliberately ignored a chance to try a field goal.

With a 48-21 win over McGill and Ottawa and Queen's beaten, the Blues appear to be well on their way to a first place finish.

In other O-QIFC action over the weekend Ottawa edged Carleton 23-22, Queen's dumped the hapless York 30-7, Laurier over Windsor 19-2, Western beat Waterloo 44-21, McMaster lost to Bishop's 10-18, and Loyola overpowered Guelph 26-13.

Brent Eelsey (23) shows he can block for Castillo as well as catch passes.

Interfac Rugby gets underway

By NEIL SORBIE

The interfac rugby season was to kick off last Wednesday with a game between St. Mike's and the Jocks, which most U of T rugby players thought would be a hard-fought contest.

The Jocks won decisively though, the turning point coming early in the match — St. Mike's defaulted.

As a result, St. Mike's have been banished from the league, leaving Vic, PHE, Trin, Law, Eng I and Eng II.

Defending champion Eng I defeated Vic 12-8 Friday. McChesney and Scott scored a try apiece and Ballin converted both of them while Johnson notched both Vic's tries.

Later Friday a more experienced Trin team defeated the lawyers 15-4. Trin held a 9-0 half-time lead on three penalty kicks by Knowles.

Law's Garry scored the first try of the game early in the second half but the conversion was missed.

Trin won until the game's final minutes before scoring their only try. Carrwans fell on the ball for Trin's four points and Knowles converted.

This year interfac rugby has been changed to ten-a-side and the games are half an hour long.

The next game is Monday as PHE tangles with Eng I.

Ladies Blues tennis team takes tournament Saturday

By MRS. PARKER
The ladies Blues tennis team took 14 out of a possible 16 points in a three school tournament involving Toronto, Guelph, and Waterloo.

The team consists of a first and second singles match and a first and second doubles match.

Waterloo took 10 points for a second place finish while Guelph were unable to collect any points at all.

Toronto's Barb Darankovsky won the first singles match over Waterloo 1-6, 1-6 but came back to dump Guelph 6-0 and 6-1.

In the first doubles match, Sheila Macdonald and Kathy Seagram waltzed over Waterloo 6-0 and 6-1. They also defeated Guelph 6-0 and 6-1.

The second doubles match saw Blues Penny Petroff and Terry Moranis beat Waterloo 6-1 and 6-2. They also beat Guelph 6-2, 1-6 and 7-5.

Soccer Blues lose and win

By JOHN COBBY

SUDBURY — The Varsity soccer Blues lost Saturday 2-1 but rebounded with a 3-0 victory Sunday over Laurentian in a weekend soccer doubleheader.

Blues still maintain their hold on first place with nine points in six games. Laurentian have played the same number of games but are two points short of the Blues.

Yannis Vassiliou was the Blues' premier striker, notching all four goals in the two games.

A full report of the games will be carried in Wednesday's Varsity.

Administration hesitates on pub proposal

By CLAUDE HAWPER

The U of T administration refused to give any firm commitment yesterday to a SAC request for space for a games room and pub.

The SAC executive met with university president John Evans, provost Don Forster, vice-president Jill Conway, vice-provost Peter Meincke and vice-president George Connell.

The SAC proposal, outlined in an 11-page brief, calls for space in a temporary building now used by the School of Graduate Studies (SGS) to be used for a daily pub. It also proposes the use of vacant space in the stacks of the Sigmund Samuel library for a games room.

Although no commitment was received, SAC communications commissioner Michael Sabia felt SAC had impressed upon the administration how important improved services are.

Initially the administration tried to argue the requested space was not central and that the centre of the campus had moved towards St. George Street.

Meincke opposed the games room proposal for the unused library stacks because, he said, space would be needed for back-up space for the duplicate collection.

It was agreed, on a suggestion by Forster, that a feasibility study be undertaken on the use of the library.

Evans told students' council representatives that SGS needed the temporary building for at least a year and chances of obtaining the building were remote.

Another obstacle the administration offered were demands for office space by the new collegiate board for new university departments being set up under the Memorandum of Understanding on the colleges.

SAC argued, however, that services should have priority this time after being neglected for so long.

Evans was only willing to promise he would consider the SAC requests on an equal priority with other demands for space.

The SAC executive issued a statement after the meeting stating their disappointment with the delay, which has continued since July. The administration had received the brief well in advance.

"We are still waiting for a good reason as to why no space can be provided to improve campus services," it says.

The SAC proposals are based on the long-standing lack of central social and recreational services for students. U of T is one of the only Ontario universities without both a daily pub and a games room.

The proposals call for a large games room with pool tables, ping-pong tables and coin-operated amusement machines. It would be open daily and operate at lower rates than similar off-campus facilities.

The pub is intended as a lounge-like quiet gathering place, where students can drop in anytime and relax.

26 briefs under wary scrutiny of council

The university's Governing Council will have 26 briefs about revision of the U of T Act to mull over at its next meeting Oct. 17.

David Shindman, student governor and a council executive committee member, declined last night to give details of the briefs, but conceded "there seemed to be" a fair number supporting staff-student parity representation on council.

Eight students and 12 faculty members now sit on the university's top governing body, but student leaders across campus are pushing for parity representation.

Shindman said most of the briefs are from individuals or groups involved in the university, but some other briefs represent outside parties.

Toronto city council, the Toronto Board of Education and the Sussex-Ulster Residents' Association were among external groups to submit briefs to council, Shindman said.

SAC, the Graduate Students' Union, the Alumni Association, the Association of Part-time undergraduate Students, and the Law Students' Society are among groups supporting parity representation.

Two SDS suspensions challenged

By GENE ALLEN

Supporters of a campaign to overturn suspensions imposed by Caput on two members of SDS (Students for a Democratic Society) considered different possible aims of such an appeal yesterday.

About 20 students and faculty members attended a meeting supporting the appeals of Bill Schabas and Tony Leah, who were suspended by Caput this summer for preventing American urbanologist Edward Banfield from speaking at U of T last March.

Discussion at the meeting indicated the appeal might be supported for at least three different reasons.

Several speakers maintained that if the suspensions are allowed to stand unchallenged, the university administration will have established a precedent to use Caput to deal with any future discipline matters. Caput, with no student members, is regarded as illegitimate.

A second area of concern discussed at yesterday's meeting, racism in the university and in the community, is not necessarily connected with the illegitimacy of Caput as a disciplinary body.

Schabas and Leah claimed Banfield's theories are racist, and prevented him from speaking on those grounds.

But racism was never discussed during the Caput trial. Thus the specific question of whether Banfield actually is a racist, and the more general question of the university's policy toward racism, remain unanswered.

Some speakers at the meeting made it clear they were supporting the appeals to finally bring about an open discussion of racism.

Finally, there were those who specifically condoned the actions of Leah and Schabas and felt they should be exonerated.

Shoukry Roweis, a professor in the Urban and Regional Planning department, said it was important that any campaign on the appeals take a clear position on whether the actions of Leah and Schabas should be condemned or supported.

"It's a mistake to build on misunderstandings," he said. "A statement without a well-thought-out position is not likely to be supported by as many people." Peter Fitting, a St. Michael's College French professor, said he had approached some colleagues who refused to support the appeals because no position for or against Leah and Schabas' actions had been reached.

Fitting crystallized the conflicting interpretations of the appeal campaign when, turning to Leah, he said the approach to be taken depends on "if what's most important is broadening the appeal of the campaign, or would you prefer that you set the issues."

Several other speakers expressed fears that support for Caput abolition, or support for a full and open discussion of racism, would be taken as support for SDS. There was also concern that any defence committee set up would be dominated by the SDS.

GROUPS

"Last year, everything was carried out by CPL (Canadian Party of Labour) and SDS," one speaker complained. "A real viable defence committee needs representation from other political groups and individuals. You can't do it singlehandedly."

UBC part-time students to organize

VANCOUVER (CUP) — Part-time students at the University of British Columbia are attempting to form their own student association to work for equality with full-time students.

At an organizational meeting part-time student Marion Barling said the proposed association will work for parity with full-time students on such issues as financial aid and fees.

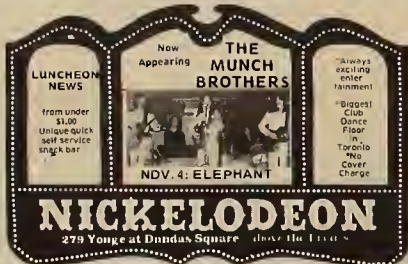

"Financial opportunities should be the same for all students," Barling said. "Why should a part-time student have to pay more per course than a full-time student?"

Part-time students must pay $100 per course while full-time students pay up to 10 percent less for the same courses, she said.

Ryerson students' union refuses to relinquish autonomy

By MATHILDE VERHULST
Ryerson Polytechnical Institute's students' union (SURPI) decided last night to defend its "full autonomy" in response to administration threats to control the union's budget.

Three SURPI representatives will present five union demands to Ryerson's board of governors' financial committee today calling for student control of non-academic student fees.

The demands came in response to a controversial interpretation by acting Ryerson president George Korey of a signed memorandum of agreement between SURPI and Ryerson.

The agreement, signed Aug. 22, concerns the redistribution of students' activity fees, an increased portion of which SURPI was to receive.

Under the agreement SURPI would receive $19 per student per term over last year's $12.40 per term. This increase (approximately 40 percent) amounts to $100,000 more per year in the union's budget.

INTERPRETATION
The main bone of contention in the agreement involves the interpretation of a clause demanding "full accountability" of SURPI's expenditures to Ryerson.

Korey, in a brief submitted to the board's finance committee Sept. 25, stated specifically that: "SURPI's fiscal accountability to the board of governors be similar to that of any academic or administrative department of Ryerson."

This includes drawing up the SURPI budget, submission to Ryerson's finance department and the financial committee of the board of governors for review, subsequent board approval and a report on the union's expenditures by both the board and SURPI auditors.

THREAT

According to SURPI officials, Korey's recommendation is not the same agreement they signed Aug. 22. They call the agreement a blatant threat by the administration to destroy the "full autonomy" the union has enjoyed up to now.

It threatens SURPI's position as a "non-academic service organization" for the institute by treating it as "any other academic or administrative department within Ryerson," the union argues.

What's more, SURPI says in a release, the original agreement "at no point... states that prior approval of SURPI budgets must be made by the board of governors."

Under such an agreement, says SURPI, the administration claims the right to disapprove any expenditure which SURPI proposes, clearly a threat to its independence.

SURPI special assistant Bill Reno said it was "completely without precedent in Canada" that students' unions' budgets have to receive prior administrative approval.

SURPI president Bruce Moran said the memorandum agreement signed in August "in no way intended that these (SURPI's) budgets be submitted to veto."

POWER

He felt a review of the SURPI budget was legitimate but that the administration should not have "approval or disapproval power" on budget matters.

A possible administration fear that the increased SURPI funds will be abused may justify its extreme interpretation of "full accountability," Reno said. Nevertheless, he added, "no extra amount is worth sacrificing SURPI's autonomy."

In a release to the board of governors Monday, SURPI says it withdrew from the original memorandum agreement. As a result of Korey's rewording of the agreement in his brief to the board's financial committee on Sept. 25.

SURPI executive assistant Bob Spencer said the board of governors now "has no basis upon which to make an agreement."

DEMANDS

The five demands to be presented to the board of governors today hopefully will open renegotiations, Spencer said. The demands are:

- The students' union must be recognized as a fully independent, autonomous organization in all respects.

- Non-academic fees collected by the institute are a student fee, not an institute fee, and must be directly administered by an independent student self-government.

- SURPI is "directly and completely accountable to only one constituent of the Ryerson community, the students."

- The memorandum agreement of Aug. 22 stand only as an offer which has now been withdrawn due to the interpretation outlined by Korey.

• SURPI's budget and yearly audited statement will be supplied to the board's finance committee for information only, and only after these same documents have been published for the students; and supplied only to the committee upon publication of the board's budgets and financial statements for the perusal of the Ryerson community as a whole.

SURPI president Moran said he hopes "the administration comes to reason."

New group considers buying Citizen

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Although it appears unlikely that the Toronto Citizen staff will be able to buy the troubled newspaper, at least one group "compatible with the staff" is considering the purchase.

Citizen co-editor Ellen Moorhouse said yesterday the staff would not be able to raise the $14,000 purchase price by today's deadline, but, she added, "There are other people who are interested."

"It is probably going to pass to a group compatible with the staff but we'd prefer not to say who until the end of the week," Moorhouse said. "It's being negotiated."

The Citizen's board of directors gave the staff one week to buy the newspaper at its board meeting last Tuesday.

If the staff did not buy it, the paper was to be offered to other groups at a substantially higher price.

The 10,000 circulation bi-weekly folded last week after a dispute between the staff and the board of directors over hiring and firing policies.

Board president John Sewell, a Ward 7 alderman, said "Everyone else has backed out. We haven't received an offer at any price from anyone, although some people were interested."

"It's pretty well up to the staff now to find a buyer they'd be compatible with, although at some point the board will have to decide whether to sell it or simply shut it down," Sewell said.

Eagle soars to victory

Sus an Eagle became the new president of the Victoria University Students' Administrative Council (VUSAC) last Thursday, defeating Michael Johnson 339 to 100.

Doug Gosling defeated Ross Hotrum 272 to 94 for finance commission while Rick Outerbridge won the education commission by a vote of 261 to 110 over Tom Ujejski.

Five people were acclaimed: Barb McFadyen, productions commissioner; Michael Powell, university government commission; Brian Clarence, Vic SAC rep, and Jeff Warren and Barb Wright, members at large for first year.

Members at large who were elected were Christine Castle, Stephen Parrott and Karen Sadvari.

Ms. meet

If you're interested in joining a group of new writers to cover women's issues for The Varsity, come to a meeting today at 2 pm in our second floor offices, 91 St. George St.

You don't need any experience — we'll be glad to help you get started.

Well we were just walking into the Varg office the other day and there was old rockaday johnny singing tell your ma, tell your pa, our loves a gonna grow ooh wah ooh wah. So we took him out and lit him on a parking meter. Meet our new house band. Bob Smith and the Rhythm Kings. They're hep, fella. Care to join up?

We got the hits that are picked to click. But we still need you to dance along. As a writer, photographer, layout person, news editor, sports writer or feature writer. Bring your button-down shirt. It's still not too late to begin working for the paper that put tap dancing on the map.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. University and business again

During the 1960's, allegations that universities co-operate with industry in defence production provoked massive anger and concern. Many campuses, including the U of T, were torn by protest against on-campus recruitment by such companies as Dow Chemical, who openly admitted their involvement in defence work.

The issue has again arisen at U of T, and is likely to do so as long as the situation remains unchanged.

Two specific instances have brought the issue to light.

Firstly, during the summer, the business affairs committee of the Governing Council heard a request from political economy professor Cranford Pratt to reconsider its shareholding policy.

The university owns shares in Exxon Corporation, whose exploration in Guinea-Bissau was challenged at its last annual meeting by dissident shareholders and church representatives.

Pratt urged the committee to take a stand on the issue and vote with the dissidents, rather than exercise its present policy of refusing to vote on the use of its shares.

The committee agreed, supported the move, and undertook to review the university's investment policy.

The second instance is revealed on page five of today's paper, in which The Varsity shows that both Dofasco and Noranda corporations have been involved in selling military materials, some for use in Vietnam.

U of T president John Evans sits on the Dofasco board of directors; Governing Council member Keith Hendrick is president of Noranda sales corporation.

In itself, that is not surprising. In a society such as ours, the needs of business and education are inextricably linked. Only those who crave continued moral outrage for sustenance would profess otherwise.

What is annoying, however, is the insistence of many people in upholding the myth to the contrary. Take for example Governing Council member John Tory, himself a director of several large corporations:

"I do not pretend to understand the present situation in Guinea-Bissau," he writes. "However, it is my view that the university, as a body supported by public funds, should not take stands on political, social or moral issues which do not affect the university."

An impressive statement, if only for its outright contradiction of the facts.

Of course the university is supported by, and in turn supports, the business and military communities. Consequently, to say that the university is not affected by social issues is to act like the blind man saying there was nothing around him because he couldn't see it.

Rhetoric insisting the university is somehow an isolated community unto itself is nothing but a smokescreen, a nuisance to all concerned.

Faculty association still perpetuates myth of university

One group which has frequently used the rhetoric of the university as a world unto itself has been the faculty association at the U of T.

This attitude is revealed, for example, in UTFA's brief to the academic affairs committee on the composition of tenure committees.

On Monday, we said the brief was elitist, in that it claimed maturity and judgment were the necessary attributes to sit on tenure committees, but that only faculty possessed those qualities.

The brief poses an ominous warning. "If any other method of assessment (than all-faculty committees) were to be permitted," warns UTFA, "it would undermine the whole function of the tenure process."

What that seems to imply is confirmed by the suggestion which follows it; namely, that an independent, non-voting observer sit in on the committee's proceedings to ensure everything was above board.

That would seem to be about as innovative as inviting an anthropologist to watch some ancient monastic ritual performed by trappist monks.

It would not be unfair to describe UTFA's view of the tenure process as self-serving, inward turning, and ignorant of the responsibilities of faculty, not just to their university, but to society as a whole.

Varg cover 'deranged'

I feel that the cover photograph in Monday's Varsity was in poor taste, not only because of the deformation of character involved, but also because it disfigures a great work of art. It did not provide any insight into the interview with John Evans, nor can it be justifiably related to the major issues concerning the administration and the students at this time.

Perhaps I'm too naive to be able to interpret the real significance of the photograph, but it struck me as being conceived by the same type of deranged individual who reveals his vulgarity by disfiguring the Pieta with a sledge hammer.

George Huezek
 Innis III

(You're too naive, George. We ran the picture to illustrate Evans' attitude wanting to sit above everything, avoiding seeming to take sides.

 In answer to your last point, yes, we are deranged.)

Poster wasteful

Certain political organizations

(the Young Socialists and the Revolutionary Marxist Group come to mind though they are by no means the only offenders) have a bad habit of pasting their tacky posters to the outside of university buildings. Not only does this produce an unsightly mess but it requires that the Administration give the demeaning task of removing these posters to some member of the Proletariat who must then scrub away at them for some length of time with a wire brush.

It is doubtful that the Government subsidizes such work and it is unquestionable that the University could find better ways of spending money than paying to have such posters removed. May I ask that political organizations restrict the placement of their propaganda to appropriate locations? If they are unwilling, perhaps the proper authorities could suspend the guilty organization's table space in the lobby of Sydney Smith.

HAVE GUN, WILL SELL: CANADA'S ARMS INDUSTRY

By BOB GAUTHIER

Adapted from The Ottawa Citizen
U of T president John Evans and Governing Council member Keith Kendrick have more than just the university in common.

Both are linked to what may be called Canada's "military-industrial complex"
— Evans as a director of Dominion
Foundries and Steel Co. Ltd. and Hendrick as president of the Noranda Sales Corporation.

Documents provided to The Varsity show that both Dofasco and a Noranda branch have sold products to the Pentagon in the United States — products which may have ended up in Vietnam or another war zone of Southeast Asia.
But company spokesmen don't seem to care.

Sales of these products raise the question of whether they are contributing to U.S. military actions or merely innocently supplying commodities. However their sales are viewed, they are most definitely being assisted by the Canadian government.

In some cases the shipment of the material apparently is accomplished by indirect means to avoid controversy.
Often the companies and the government say they do not know where their products are going.

But the recently-revealed case of Wire Rope Industries of Canada suggests that they do in fact know where their products will be used.

Military Activities

The companies also often claim their products are harmless by themselves.

But an individual product or research on a particular defence application product may be important in the conduct of military activities.

And this leads to the question of whether goods that might be considered innocent by themselves implicate the manufacturer and the government when they become strategically important.

It's a problem all but ignored by the government policy makers and the corporation executives. After all, what's important to them is maintaining productivity, the profit margin, and power — not a chance to choose between defence-related and civilian-related products.

The relevance of the question is increased by the fact that the Canadian government is aiding the sale of these products to the Pentagon. Government assistance is provided through the industry, trade and commerce department and through the Canadian Commercial Corporation, a Crown corporation.

The corporation was established to develop an arms export industry in Canada and it now handles contracts worth more than $250 million annually.
And during the most intense period of the Vietnam war it filled contracts worth almost $500 million.

Unfortunately, documents provided to The Varsity are only of the restricted and confidential nature. There are also government classifications for defence products labelled "secret" and "top secret". Little is known about these classifications, how much money they involve, and who fills the contracts for the Pentagon.

Dofasco is one of the firms selling to the U.S. military. United States government documents that are public information in that country, but confidential information in Canada, show that Dofasco had sales totalling about $40,000 from 1971-1972.

Company sales included steel sheet carbon and steel plate carbon, as well as steel sheets and steel bars. And, although these products may be harmless by themselves, when coupled with other materials they could have a significant impact on the U.S. military's plans. No company spokesman, however, would say where the final destination of the products were or what they were being used for.

Bob Brechin, the head of foreign exports at Dofasco's Hamilton plant told The Varsity that the company "supplies to the Canadian Commercial Corporation."

He said that Canadian companies aren't competitive with companies producing in the United States for what he termed as "offshore defence". The Canadian company, can send products to the United States, he said, but there's a 50 percent penalty for competing offshore, such as in Vietnam.

"Take Vietnam," he said, "I think you'd find very little involvement there by Canadian companies — if any at all — because of the 50 percent penalty."

However, Brechin did not rule out the possibility that products sent to the U.S. military in that country may be trans-hipped to Vietnam.

Noranda Metal Industries Ltd. is another company selling products to the Pentagon. However, in this case the military applications of the product are more direct than Dofasco's.

For 1971 and 1972 Noranda Metal Industries sold about $260,000 worth of products to the Pentagon. Of that total $210,729 was collected by Noranda for "brass discs 105 millimetre cartridge cases for M14 rifles." And the M14 was used extensively in Vietnam.

Other materials supplied by Noranda Metal Industries to Vietnam included pipe copper and copper tubing.

Dave Stanyon, assistant to Noranda's
U.S. sales manager Jim Horler told The Varsity that "the company does a lot of business with the department of supply and services (the Canadian Commercial Corporation). We supply condensers tubing for ship applications and brass discs used for making shells."

Stanyon asked The Varsity if the paper was going to "use the information in a scandal involving Noranda." He then put the caller on hold to speak with a higher-up.

He returned to say that he had "had a damper put on any further access to information. Our markets manager said we should not put in any effort to help you because we don't usually publish sales figures. So we shouldn't really help you."

However, when questioned further Stanyon said that as far as he knew the military products were shipped to Utah and Tennessee. He also said that "as a general rule the company doesn't require knowledge of the final destination of the product. We usually take the attitude that that's their business."

Keith Hendrick, Governing Council member and president of the Noranda Sales Corporation, couldn't be reached for further comment on Monday. His secretary said he was out of town for the week.

But Dr. Evans was reached yesterday morning. Asked if he was still a director of Dofasco, he replied yes, but had no comment on the fact that Dofasco was selling to the Pentagon.

"I don't know whether we deal with the U.S. military," he said. Told that The Varsity had documents to that effect, Evans said: "Well, I haven't got any comment on that."

American Firms Dominate

Project Anti-War, a Montreal based research group, found that 237 companies located in Canada received contracts from the Pentagon between 1967 and 1972. And the majority of firms are either U.S.-owned or controlled.

Myron Galan, a member of the Project Anti-War group, told The Varsity that for years "Canadian industry argued that they simply sold the goods to the Pentagon and took no responsibility for how they were used. The Canadian government assured Canadians that, as far as it knew, military material sold to the Pentagon was not used in the Indochina conflict."

However, last June Project Anti-War produced documents that contradicted the statements of both Canadian government and industry.

Galan said that "documents from the Canadian and American governments and private industry indicate that the ultimate destination of products manufactured in Canada for the Pentagon is clearly known by both the Canadian government and companies fulfilling the contracts. The ultimate destination has in many cases been South Vietnam."

But Galan says that according to the group's research, no export permits have been granted to countries in the Indochina war zone. "The question then arises of how these products get to Vietnam."

Documents provided to Project Anti-War illustrate the pattern. In a department of industry, trade and commerce letter dated February 27, 1973, A.D.
Rackow apologizes to Wire Rope Industries of Canada for the inconvenience of Canadian export laws.
(Rackow is head of the production and development branch of the U.S. division of the Defence Programs Branch.)

The letter states in part: "For several years this problem has been recognized and the U.S. Defence Department has instructed its procurement officers that Canadian firms must not be asked to make such shipments. Alternative shipping instructions are available from the Defence Administrative Service Office (DCASO) in Ottawa.

"Should your company be asked to respond to such a solicitation please advise this office and we will endeavour to have the consignment point changed."

Project Anti-War also obtained documents indicating that Wire Rope Industries had shipped steel chains and wire ropes to various bases in Vietnam via Plattsburg and Delaware.

Galan told The Varsity that "sources in the United States Department of Defence have indicated that this is the normal procedure for other companies as well."

He says the implications of the letter to Wire Rope Industries, dated one month after the signing of the Paris Agreements to which Canada is a signatory, clearly violates the spirit of these accords.

"The Canadian government has been an active participant in the Vietnam War, and must share the responsibility for the deaths of hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese people," he said.

"The government has consistently deceived the people and this deception has had a twofold purpose: to support the American government in its pursuit of the domination of Indochina; and to facilitate the accumulation of profits by

Canadian war-related industries — profits at the expense of human life."

Government's Active Role

Two thick catalogues crammed with military products form a central part of an extensive federal government effort to sell material to foreign governments.

Our federal government has helped Canadian-based firms sell about $4.5 billion in military equipment since 1959, and as recently as 1970 Canada was the fifth largest supplier of military equipment in the world.

Most of the sales have been to the United States under a series of defence production sharing agreements which have been economically profitable to Canada in the past but may prove expensive in the future.

This country still remains one of the top producers of war material, due mainly to the large number of American subsidiaries manufacturing defence products here. Only the United States, the Soviet Union, Britain and France, respectively, produce more war materials than Canada. And no country produces more war material per capita than this country.

The government's sales have also caused some conflict of interest problems for would-be Canadian peacekeepers.

Government Departments Involved

One of the two government catalogues, Canadian Defence Commodities (directed exclusively at the U.S. market), consists of a section on more than 800 companies complete with addresses and sales contacts.

Other sections include listings of products available under various headings, such as "Launchers, rocket", with the supplier listed beneath the name; a section on the services a company is capable of performing if requested; and a section on products, complete with photographs.

But the catalogue also notes that it is not a complete listing of all Canadian defence products and capabilities.

Eleven Canadian sales representatives located in the U.S. are available for consultation and further information, one section states. They include consuls, trade commissioners, and "Canadian Liaison Officers (Defence Production)" residing at various U.S. military bases.

Participating in the promotion of military equipment production are branches of the departments of industry trade and commerce, national defence, and supply and services.

And if the federal government runs into legal snags in exporting a firm's product it directs companies to other agencies where they can find outlets for their goods. (The U.S. Defence Contract Administrative Services Office, listed in the federal government's internal Ottawa telephone directory, is one such agency.)

The industry, trade and commerce department also is responsible for the International Defence Programs Branch which acts as an overseas sales and marketing agency for the companies producing military equipment. Officers of the department stationed overseas work closely with the marketing and purchasing branches of the department and with the supply and services department.

And supply and services is responsible for the Canadian Commercial Corporation, the contracting agency between foreign governments that want to purchase defence commodities and companies in Canada.

The corporation receives requests on price and product availability from foreign governments, screens them through the Export Contracts Branch of supply and services and issues tenders to Canadian corporations. Bids are then submitted to the foreign governments for their approval or rejection.

While supply and services is responsible for the operation of the corporation, various other departments help out. These include industry, trade and commerce, national defence and the treasury board, which supply free management and support staff services.

In the fiscal year 1972-1973, these administrative services cost the Canadian taxpayer more than $5.5 million.

Other services provided free to the corporation include quality control and inspection by national defence's Quality Assurance Branch, and complete responsibility for the negotiation and administration of contracts and the arrangement of shipping through its Traffic Management Branch. The corporation also will obtain export permits and arrange for import clearance documents if necessary.

But the corporation's annual report emphasizes that "there is no competition or interference with established export marketing and distribution channels. Canadian firms are perfectly free within Canadian export policy to sell directly to foreign governments with whatever assistance the Corporation can provide."

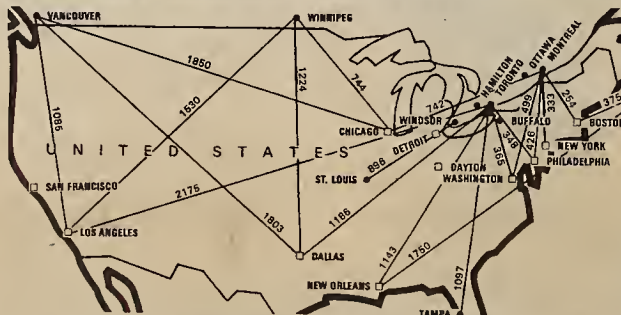

Statistically, the corporation's 1972-1973 annual report states that it received about 11,000 enquiries that year. It was

The sharing of defence production which existed during the Second World War was strengthened in 1950 when only Canada was exempted from the U.S. Buy-American Act. This meant that Canadian-based firms did not have to pay the six to 12 percent tariff that covered a wide range of military commodities entering the U.S. And U.S. duties of 12 to 17 percent on Canadian goods filling subcontracts from U.S. firms also were removed.

In addition, the 1950 agreement established a free exchange of technical knowledge and productive skills and "as it becomes necessary, co-ordinated controls over the distribution of scarce raw materials and supplies."

But the agreement remained relatively inactive until the 1959 failure of the Avro Arrow interceptor aircraft program. The Diefenbaker government then decided that mutual defence production was cheaper and would benefit Canadian industry in the long run.

The prime purpose of the 1959 agreement, however, was economic — the preservation of a viable defence industry in Canada.

U.S. Field Offices of Canada's Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, outlets for Canada's arms industry.

awarded more than 5,200 contracts valued at $237.6 million by foreign governments, international agencies and the Canadian government.

American Firms Dominate Military Economy

The U.S. government was the largest single customer with contracts worth more than $110 million. (The U.S. government was able to do further business directly with the Canadian-based companies, but no figures have been published.)

Major purchases through the corporation included aircraft engines, spare parts and overhauls ($30 million), ammunition hardware and material ($8 million), communications equipment and maintenance ($41 million), sonar units ($3 million) and miscellaneous items valued at $28 million.

All defence products, except those going to the U.S., require an export licence. And more than 80 percent of Canada's yearly sales have gone to the U.S. under the terms of a series of agreements dating back to the Second World War.

Under these agreements, the defence production of the U.S. and Canada has become so integrated that Canada has lost its autonomy in defence matters.

In 'The War Business, a book published in 1969 about the international trade in armaments, George Thayer, an American political journalist, writes: "Canadian arms salesmen, whether governmental or private, are limited by the same strictures applicable to U.S. arms salesmen. They operate, in effect, as an arm of the (U.S. installations and logistics) office because virtually all the weapons exported from the Dominion are U.S. products manufactured under licence."

Canadian defence industry has become primarily dependent on the American demand for military commodities.

Not so anymore. The U.S., faced with a balance of payments problem, is collecting its IOUs.

Also, the legal basis for the defence production co-operation is "a little unusual" says Robert Reford of the Institute of International Affairs in Toronto. He says that the documents establishing the program negotiated by the Diefenbaker government have never been made public, and they only took the form of an exchange of letters. "A more normal procedure," he says, "might have been the exchange of diplomatic notes."

And there is no known time limit for the agreements. Only the word "indefinitely" is used in connection with the memorandum of understanding of November 21, 1963.

Reford concludes that "at the time Canada entered into the defence production sharing program no one anticipated Vietnam. Perhaps that was a blind spot."

But when in 1954 there was a chance that the U.S. might become involved in a war with the People's Republic of China the Canadian government felt so strongly about this that it publicly disassociated itself from American policy.

In the light of Vietnam in particular, the present policy is perhaps due for review and reappraisal, Reford suggests.

Taxpayers' Money for Defence Research

The Canadian government is also spending heavily on defence research programs, with most of the money going to firms controlled by U.S. interests. In fact, the federal government annually allocates more than 50 percent of its research grant money to support the development of military products.

This year one defence research program alone will cost the government more than $50 million. At least four other programs provide assistance for defence research.

The University of Toronto and Noranda Metal Industries (Keith Hendrick is with Noranda), have received government research money for contracts involving the U.S. Pentagon, according to one government spokesman.

Unaware he was talking to a reporter, the spokesman said that all Canadian defence production and research is done in full co-operation with the Department of Defence in Washington. "But we don't like to make this public," he said.

"When the press gets after us about our defence production contracts we just yell 'So you want to close down a plant and put people out of work, eh?' he laughed.

But defence production research in the last 15 years has become an extremely costly method of furthering Canadian technological development.

Four federal government departments involved in defence production programs are national defence, the treasury board, industry, trade and commerce, and supply and services (through the Canadian Commercial Corporation).

In fact, various government branches overlap. The International Programs Branch of the industry, trade and commerce department is responsible for liaison between Canadian industry and foreign governments that wish to purchase Canadian defence commodities.

D.H. Gilchrist, the director of the International Programs Branch, is also a vice-president of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, the Crown corporation serving as the middleman between the foreign buyer and the Canadian supplier.

Within industry, trade and commerce,

"When the press gets after us about our defence production contracts we just

...st yell 'So you want to close down a plant and put people out of work, eh?'

the Defence Industry Productivity program (DIP) is the largest industrial incentive program. The DIP program is designed to provide Canadian-based manufacturers with assistance from the research to marketing stages of product development.

And companies located in Canada even allow U.S. military personnel to use their facilities for product development. "The key to success in international markets is the closest possible working arrangement between government and industry," explains a government booklet outlining the DIP program.

And to assist industry the department of industry, trade and commerce works with the International Program Branch's many overseas marketing representatives to determine the type of product needed to be developed. These representatives "maintain a close liaison with the military services and their procurement agencies as well as with government defence industrial contractors," the government booklet states.

The DIP program, for example, cost the government $48,324,792 in fiscal year 1972-1973, and $23,495,340 from April to October, 1973.

Diversity of Government Gifts

The federal government also operates other defence production support programs through the department of industry, trade and commerce, but an accurate assessment of the total expended has not been published.

Four of the better-known programs are: the Program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology (PAIT), the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act (IRDIA), the Defence Industrial Research Program (DIRP), and the Industrial Research Assistance Program (IRAP).

Companies developing defence-related programs can apply for assistance under any of these programs. PAIT, for example, spent $27 million in the fiscal year ending March, 1972. The program provides up to 50 percent of the costs for product or process development.

IRDIA allows grants or credits of up to 25 percent of capital spending on research and development, plus 25 percent of current spending in excess of the average spent over the previous five years. In 1972 IRDIA was generating about $30 million per year in grants, although there is no published breakdown of where the money ends up.

Out of about $34 million spent on the DIR program between 1962-1965 and 1968-1971, the Noranda Research Centre received small amounts. The only available government material states that the Noranda branch received $34,149 in 1964-1965 and $4,186 in 1968-1969. But the documents did not say what the research money went to. (There are no comparable available figures for Dofasco.)

Also, a confidential document shows that during the first nine years of the defence production sharing agreements (1959-1967) Canadian government and industry and the United States government spent a combined total of $298,776,867 on 306 projects being developed.

For the nine year period Canadian contractors contributed 24.4 percent of the funds, while 17.3 percent came from the U.S. government and 48.5 percent from the Canadian government. The remaining 9.8 percent came from "other allied funds".

The Defence Research Board granted the University of Toronto at least $28,200 for the "investigation and development of plasma excited microwave cavities" (whatever they are). The project money covered a period from February 1, 1973 to March 31, 1974.

Project Anti-War has documents that show that this university received by far the largest grants in Canada for "basic scientific research" in the non-profit institution category from the U.S. defence department between 1967 and 1971. McGill University was a distant second.

At the height of the Vietnam War in 1967 this university received $164,778 for defence research. Comparable figures for 1968-1971 were $131,202, $101,702, $77,027, and $45,658, respectively. As the war wound down, so did the grant money. But perhaps that's just coincidence.

Project Anti-War also found that between 1967 and 1971 the department of industry, trade and commerce awarded a total of $458,643,906 to 154 companies located in Canada under the various research programs.

The group was able to find information on 102 of the 145 companies included and discovered that 45 were American-owned and received 47 percent of the grant money. Some 36 were Canadian-owned and 11 were owned by European firms.

NDP the Only Critic

So far there has been little criticism of the government's defence production grants program. Ed Broadbent, now NDP house leader, first raised the question in the House of Commons in a speech in March, 1969. Unfortunately, the press all but ignored his comments.

The government's research and development programs were "contributing to the establishment in Canada of a permanent industry based on warfare or defence, something entirely new in Canadian history as a permanent establishment," Broadbent said.

His remarks recalled comments made by former prime minister Lester Pearson in a London speech in 1968. Pearson said then: "The men who control these (defence) industries often wield political and economic power to resist change even more effectively than men in uniform. When they are also allied with those men in uniform, you have a real threat to civilian supremacy and international progress."

Ironically, the defence research program was expanded under Pearson's Liberal government in 1963.

In his 1969 speech Broadbent mentioned a study conducted by Carleton University professor N.H. Lithwick that pointed out that over 50 percent of federal funds going into research and development are used for military purposes.

"If profits from war industries are greater than those derived from production for peace, are industrialists likely to choose the latter?" Broadbent asked.

But the government insists that the defence research production program leads to technological "spin off" into the civilian sector, as well as providing jobs for the Canadian people.

Arguments of this nature are contradicted, however, by critics such as Dr. Gordon Rosenbluth, an economics professor at the University of British Columbia.

In his book, The Canadian Economy and Disarmament (1969), Rosenbluth says: "The benefits of civilian technology from the spillover of defence research and development are slight... If the labor and resources now used in defence research and development were used in civilian work, Canada would be in better technical shape."

He then offers detailed alternatives to defence spending and outlines government policies that could prepare Canada for disarmament. Rosenbluth concludes: "The economic consequences of disarmament can be viewed entirely as opportunities rather than as problems. The services of resources and labor valued at about $1.5 billion per year (more in 1974) can be freed for uses that will benefit the welfare, health, and education of the community, raise the technological progress, and enable us to contribute more to the development of less fortunate areas."

Finally, after some debate in the House concerning the federal government defence production assistance programs, a policy review was produced in 1970. The task force decided to recommend that the programs be continued, or in some cases expanded, but offered no rationale for its suggestions.

The report concluded that there should be no change in the DIR program and that it should be amended "to provide a higher than 50 percent share of the cost when appropriate to the risks and the needs."

PAIT was amended "to provide financial assistance in the form of grants rather than loans and to provide non-capital pre-production costs in addition to development costs."

And IRAP was amended "to provide support for existing as well as new industrial research teams and to extend the time for support beyond five years where appropriate."

In October, 1973, Broadbent asked in the House whether the department of industry, trade and commerce had conducted any evaluative studies of DIRP and if so the date of the latest report. The government spokesman replied that any evaluation was "ongoing" and that "no specific report as such is prepared."

Matters seem to be much the same with other programs. The Trudeau government, despite its recent expression of a desire for a "leftist" foreign policy, appears to be only furthering the work of Pearson's Liberals.

Government may nationalize strikebound aircraft plant

By PAUL WILLCOCKS
MONTREAL (CUP) — Government takeover of the strike-bound United Aircraft plant outside of Montreal is being considered as a solution to the conflict, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau said in Ottawa last Thursday.

Union leaders have been calling for nationalization of the plant for months as they attempted to resist company attempts to break the union.

A Quebec government report released last Tuesday said the nine month old strike between the company and the 2,600 members of Local 510 of the United Auto Workers was irreconcilable.

The strike began in January after four months of unsuccessful negotiations over wages, union security, working hours and the rehiring of fired union militants.

Trudeau's statement included a reference to the way the company's position has been dictated by the head office in Hartford, Connecticut, without regard for established Canadian labor practices or the effect of the strike upon Canadian operations.

CONTROL

Trudeau said the government is concerned with situations "where control of companies is exercised abroad" and "sometimes not of benefit to Canadian workers and the Canadian people."

Two days prior to Trudeau's statement several people were roughed up and six cars were overturned and set on fire outside the United Aircraft plant in Longueuil, as 300 workers reacted to a Quebec government investigator's report that their strike is "irreconcilable."

Incidents of intimidation and violence have been common in the strike as United Aircraft has attempted to break the Quebec Federation of Labor affiliated union.

The government report was prepared for Quebec Minister of Labor Jean Coutu by Pierre Dufresne. It makes no recommendations for government action in the dispute.

The report describes the company's wage offer as "not generous," and says the company refused Dufresne's suggestion that the dispute be submitted to arbitration.

INTRANSIGENT

The government report describes the company as "intransigent" in its

RCMP: riot

OTTAWA (CUP) — Charges of police brutality have been made against RCMP riot squad officers by a national civil liberties group and the National Indian Brotherhood.

The charges were made in connection with the demonstration by the Native People's Caravan in Ottawa a week ago Monday.

The Canadian Federation of Civil Liberties and Human Rights associations, a group with 16 civil rights affiliates across Canada, called for a public inquiry into the violence to be conducted independently of the RCMP.

Clive Linkletter, brotherhood vice-president, said an inquiry should be made by no less than a Supreme Court of Canada judge. He also called for the inquiry to be made independent of the solicitor-general's office.

refusal to implement the Rand Formula, a key issue in the strike.

The Rand Formula was first introduced in 1946 by Supreme Court Justice I. C. Rand when he called to resolve a strike at the Oshawa plant of Ford of Canada. It provides for compulsory dues-check-off for all employees in a plant.

Workers may have the dues paid to a charity rather than to a union, but Rand said that as all workers benefit from the efforts of the union, non-members should not enjoy a financial advantage over members.

In his report, Dufresne says United Aircraft indicated that "even if the union dropped all other demands they would not accept implementation of the Rand Formula."

This refusal to grant what is an accepted union right in Canada is pointed to by union officials as just one example of United Aircraft's determination to smash the union.

ANTI-LABOR

United Auto Workers spokesmen have described United Aircraft as a "vicious anti-labor outfit" and pledged support to help the strikers "drag United Aircraft kicking and screaming into the twentieth century."

Since the strike began workers picketing the plant have been harassed and on some occasions assaulted.

The company has obtained an injunction limiting the workers to three pickets at any one time and the union has been fined $4,950 for violations of the injunctions.

The Canadian United Aircraft president, Thor Stephenson, has sent out letters to the strikers telling them that unless they returned to work they would be replaced. Thor threatened their jobs would disappear if they did not return to work.

The union also says strikers were visited at their homes and told they would lose their jobs if they didn't go back to work immediately.

TACTICS

The company's tactics have had some success. They claim about 1,000 of the original 2,600 strikers, tiring of the $35 a week strike pay and the company's threats, have returned to work.

In addition, 75 per cent of the work that was previously done at the Longueuil plant has been transferred to the corporation's main operation at East Hartford, Connecticut.

The company succeeded in ousting the UAW from their operations at East Hartford 10 years ago, and the company's actions in this strike seem to be directed from the parent corporation with no concern for the effect upon Canadian operations.

The shifting of production is particularly irritating to those involved with the strike because the research done to develop the products was financed by the Canadian government.

In the last 10 years United Aircraft has received $80 million in grants and $200 million in contracts from the federal government and $5 million in grants from the Quebec government.

RIGHTS

It is not known if the government will insist that United Aircraft of Canada retain sole production rights for projects developed in Canada with Canadian money if the government decides to take over the plant, although Trudeau expressed some doubt that this could be done. Harry Gray, chairman and president of the parent corporation, has hinted that the Canadian plant could be closed down if the company felt it could not win the strike any other way.

In the last quarterly report for the company Gray says that the strike "will not damage the overall results of the corporation."

The Canadian operation accounts for approximately $100 million in sales out of United Aircraft's total sales of over $3 billion.

Supreme Court decision on appeal may affect whole abortion issue

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Supreme Court of Canada is now deciding the fate of Dr. Henry Morgentaler and, indirectly, the circumstances under which Canadian women will be able to obtain abortions.

Dr. Morgentaler was acquitted when the case first came before the courts in Quebec last November. However, the Quebec Court of Appeals overturned that decision last April and in July convicted him to 18 months in jail and three years of probation.

Although Crown lawyer Louis-Guy Robichaud urged Monday the guilty verdict imposed on the Dr. Morgentaler by the Quebec Court of Appeal be allowed to stand, there were indications the Supreme Court of Canada might order a new trial for the Montreal doctor.

Morgentaler's lawyers have not denied he had performed an abortion on a 26-year-old woman. They relied instead on section 45 of the criminal code which relieves anyone from criminal responsibilities in performing an operation as long as it is done with reasonable care and skill and "it is reasonable to perform the operation, having regard to the state of health of the person at the time... and to all the circumstances of the case."

If the court rejects the arguments of Morgentaler's lawyers and supporters who are intervening on his behalf, abortions will continue to be available only through the present restrictive system of hospital abortion committees.

If the decision of the Appeals court is not upheld then abortion on demand will be a reality.

Despite its being a criminal appeal, the court has taken the unusual step of allowing other parties to intervene. But representatives of the Foundation for Women in Crisis and for the Canadian Civil Liberties have argued unsuccessfully that current abortion laws are unconstitutional under the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Immigrant women exploited by firms, B.C. report says

VANCOUVER (CUP) — Immigrant women hired by Vancouver cleaning and garment firms often work in exploitive and sometimes illegal situations, a provincial government report says.

The report, prepared by the social concerns committee of the YWCA, says it is common practice in several local clothing factories to lay off seamstresses just before Christmas, rehiring them in the first week of January. By doing this, the company avoid paying holiday wages.

Other factories pay their workers on a piece-rate basis, enabling them to circumvent minimum wage laws, the report says. In at least one woman's case, this has meant no increase in pay in four years.

The report also says that the faster workers, who might benefit from this system, are usually paid on an hourly basis.

Some hotels send chambermaids home without pay at the start of a shift because the hotel is not very busy at that time.

The report charges that the women sent home are those with less seniority, usually non-whites.

Many factories allow women to use the washrooms only during their 10 minute coffee break. The report says many women spend their entire coffee break in line for the washroom.

A committee spokeswoman says the idea for the report grew out of frustration YWCA social workers encountered as they worked with Chinese, Portuguese, Italian and other immigrant women.

"Attempts to train these women for better jobs were useless because employers would hire them only as chambermaids, cleaning ladies, seamstresses or in other menial capacities," she said.

Committee members interviewed 186 women extensively. The process was difficult because of the reluctance of the women to talk about themselves to a stranger.

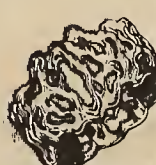

The report concludes that policies of employers and government agencies ensure the women will be kept isolated, unable to participate fully in Canadian society.

The report, copies of which have been sent to the ministers of labor, health, human resources and education, Canada Manpower and the unemployment insurance commission, makes several recommendations.

It recommends that permanent inspectors be hired by the labor standards branch. It recommends that workers be able to choose between a piece-rate and an hourly rate, and that those on piece-rate be guaranteed a minimum wage.

It also recommends legislation that would ensure women will get the holiday pay to which they are entitled.

Skule protest upheld in football

By MRS. PARKER

You may be wondering, sports fans, why there was no report of the Vic-Eng football game on Oct. 2. Well, all the sordid truth will now come out.

According to the scoresheet Vic won the game 12-5.

However, a protest was lodged by Eng based on the fact that the referee had misapplied a roughing penalty against Vic.

Skule should have received a first down at Vic's 1½ yard line but instead the referee gave possession of the ball to Vic.

At that point in the game the score was 9-0 for Vic.

The intramural sports committee has upheld the protest from Eng and have decided on the following formula to decide the outcome of the game.

At the next meeting of Eng and Vic, the two teams will complete the regularly scheduled game and after a short rest will replay a portion of the second half of the protested game. The replay will commence at the nine minute mark of the third quarter with Eng given the ball at Vic's 1½ yard line and a first down.

The score for the replay will be taken to be 9-0 in Vic's favour.

So if you are wondering why the next Vic-Eng game is comprised of five and one half quarters you didn't read the Varsity.

Property move feared

By SKEETER MOUTHINGTON

Unconfirmed reports reached the Varsity last night that the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) will announce the abolition of private property tomorrow.

Usually reliable sources had SAC president Seymour Kanowitch "ready and willing" to announce the move, which follows hard on the heels of US president Gerald Ford's non-nonsense taxation legislation.

Kanowitch, 52, was reported to have dreamed up the move as an attempt to cut back the huge deficit budget forecast for SAC this year.

However, other reports have it that a left-wing "conspiracy" of young commissioners in the SAC office had threatened Kanowitch with a "palace coup" unless he softened his one-man, iron-fisted rule.

Communications commissioner Michael Sabia, Vice-president Tim Buckley, Services commissioner John Tuzyk and Finance commissioner Craig Barnard all "visited" the Varsity office last night in a move widely interpreted as the first shift in a new power alliance.

Kanowitch, 45, reacted swiftly by granting the four a "universal and unconditional pardon for any acts they may commit or may have committed" while in the Varsity office.

Economic observers last night were unsure of the effects of the SAC action, but predicted the ruling administration of U of T president would not go along with the move.

"Evans is a fiscal conservative," said one observer. "He's too straightforward in his economic thinking to abolish private property."

Ladies field hockey Blues win tournament

Senior Field Hockey
By SUE SCOTT &
JANET KINGSTON

The season opening early bird tournament was to the liking of the ladies Blues senior field hockey team as they came away tied for first place with McGill University.

The Blues won five games and tied two.

Our ladies defeated York 4-1, Guelph 3-0, Queen's 4-0, Western 5-0 and Waterloo 1-0.

The two ties were with McMaster 1-1 and McGill 0-0.

The leading scorers for the senior team were Carol McDougall with nine, Brenda Eckhardt with four, Barb Smith with three. Ann Hoffland also added a single.

Good weather was partly responsible for the high calibre of play and was most definitely responsible for the high spirits of the players on the fields. Intermediate Hockey

By DIANE WARDROPE

The intermediate team also fared very well in the early bird tournament at Guelph.

Some of the action as the Blues' seniors tie McGill in early bird tournament.

U of T played their first game against McMaster. Although the first half was choppy, the play picked up in the second half when the teams concentrated on effective passing plays.

The only goal of the game came from Betty Shostak for Toronto.

In the second game against Ottawa, Toronto was treated to the various lumberjacking techniques of U of O. The Blues effectively kept the play in Ottawa's end and Nancy Thomson managed to score. Betty Shostak was also able to tally on a rare penalty bully. Shostak completed the scoring with another goal later in the game for a final score of 3-0 over Ottawa.

Queen's were determined to force the Blues to play a tighter game than they were used to. The play did not get out to the wings much and the checking was very close.

Shostak and Nancy Thompson scored to give Toronto a 2-1 win.

In the final game against Laurentian both teams were very tired. Blues' defense was lagging and the forwards just were not hustling. Fern Brand in the Toronto net kept Laurentian at bay allowing only one goal.

Martha Bagnall scored for the Blues to give Toronto a tie with Laurentian.

The intermediates came away with first place and look as though they will hold on to it for the season.

Soccer Blues split double header

By JOHN COBBY

Last weekend the soccer Blues travelled to Sudbury and split a double header with the Laurentian Voyagers, losing 2-1 on Saturday but rebounding to win 3-0 on Sunday.

After playing poorly against the Brock Badgers in the previous outing, it was gratifying to see the Blues exhibit more skill and desire in the contests with last year's Ontario champions.

In general, the Toronto squad deserved their fate in both games. In the first many chances were made but not taken, whereas in the second the opportunities were seized with greater efficiency.

Defensively the Blues played a sound game, tarnished slightly in the first game by a couple of avoidable errors which were punished with full severity. Despite sharing victories, the team returned south with more problems solved than new deficiencies revealed.

On Saturday the game began at a hectic pace, both clubs seeking an early advantage with a view to utilizing it in a desire to conserve energy for the following day's contest. Both teams were to be denied, although chances were created at either end.

Perhaps the Blues, with a rearranged lineup from their previous match, had less control in the midfield but play was relatively even.

The break, when it came after 20 minutes, fell to the Voyagers. Instead of clearing his lines with speed but no finesse, Ian Harris decided to work the ball out prior to setting up a counter attack.

However he was dispossessed and the ball moved quickly into the middle from where Mike Petrone hit a swerving screen shot high into Ivan Perusco's net.

It took Toronto 15 minutes of virtually non-stop pressure to fashion the equalizer. At first the Blues' attacks met with little success, floundering either through the anticipatory heading of Bob Gronke or the courage and positional play of goal keeper Vic Pessot.

Nonetheless, while it became apparent that there was no road through the middle, an exploitable weakness was noted in the gap between Art Fraser, the central defender and the Voyageur left patrolled by Lino Mala.

Hence, with Ben Lecerf diverting the latter's attention by staying close to the touch line, the ball was slotted through the gap by Jude Robinson.

The pass was received by Yannis Vassiliou who accelerated beyond the split defense before hitting a hard shot past Pessot.

In the remaining 10 minutes of play in the first half, Blues maintained their onslaught, missing chances with a frequency matched only by the ease with which they opened up the home rearguard.

For the first 20 minutes following the restart momentum again favoured the visitors. Their best effort rebounded clear off a goalpost though.

Almost immediately the Voyagers counter attacked and scored. A free kick was lobbed across the Toronto penalty area. Sady, Robinson and Perusco left it for each other to clear the danger, but neither did so.

During their confusion Fio Marin nipped in and the ball ended up in Blues' net.

From this moment on, the Toronto team lacked its previous snap as Marin and Mike Czerwinc gained midfield control for Sudbury.

Occasionally the Blues threatened but Gonko's timing in defense thwarted most attacks in their infancy.

The Blues had squandered their opportunities when they were granted, now no chances were given despite a flurry of activity.

Perhaps it was the rain on Sunday that upset the Voyagers but in any case the game and result showed a different texture.

The play commenced in a familiar vein with one Blues' shot hitting a goal post and a couple of good chances remaining unconverted.

Shrugging off these disappointments the Toronto squad set up further pressure, predominantly toward the left wing.

One such play concluded with Drew McKeown crossing the ball over Gonko's head and directly into the path of the onrushing Vassiliou.

His header zipped past Pessot and into the far corner of the net.

Once in the lead the Blues set about increasing their advantage. This time the defense tackled incisively and cleared any danger immediately. The midfield outthrust the opposition and the offense studiously avoided attacking the Laurentian squad at its strong points.

In general the Toronto play reached its peak for the season so far. While the Voyagers did not concede immediately they were gradually worn down and were finally vanquished in the second half.

Again it was Drew McKeown on the left who made the telling cross. This time for variety his pass was low and hard but the receiver was the same. And so it was Vassiliou lurking near the post who turned the cross home through a maze of scything legs.

The final goal was created and made by Vassiliou, whose effort despite an injured leg was typical of the overall demeanor of the club.

He dribbled in from the right, feigned a cross, but instead lofted the ball over Pessot's upstretched arms to notch his hat trick.

As a contest the game was over and the Blues played out time, relishing the chance to practice their team play under real but low pressure conditions.

It should not go unmentioned that the Blues' captain Geoff Crewe has been allowed to play.

Today at 7:30 pm the Western Mustangs visit the stadium in a vital game for both teams. The winning club will head the league and be in the favoured position to take the division title.

Blues Notes: Jude Robinson drafted into the team as a sweeper played two steady games... a sweeper is a player who moves laterally behind his team mates covering them in the event of an error or a long penetrating pass... Mike Lloyd, playing his first games, showed promise at left back.

PHE unleashes a pass but it went incomplete as PHE and Vic tie 6-6.

New was in complete control of their game against UC Monday. New won 41-19.

PHE-VIC tie in football

By MRS. PARKER

In interfac football action yesterday, PHE and Vic tied 6-6 in a game that was supposed to decide first place in the first division.

Both teams have identical records of two wins and are now still tied in the standings, but because of Eng's protest Vic could lose credit for their victory over Eng. (see story page 10.)

In yesterday's game, it was apparent that PHE has been reading The Varsity and has thrown away John Rauch's play book.

With 22 seconds left in the game and the score tied 6-6, Vic were threatening PHE with long passes. On the second last play of the game Vic was called for holding.

If PHE had accepted the penalty Vic would have faced first down and twenty but the clock would not start until the snap of the ball. In this case Vic would likely have enough time for two plays.

However, PHE elected to decline the penalty and thus the clock started immediately allowing Vic only enough time for one play which turned out to be an incomplete pass.

The game was a hard hitting grind mostly along the ground but PHE did display some passing ability.

PHE's touchdown was aided by no less than two Vic clips during the drive.

Vic's touchdown came on a 25 yard plunge up the middle.

The game may have been a preview of this year's Mulock final. Both teams have wins over SMC and ENG and are locked in a first place tie.

SMC, last year's runner-up, appears to have slipped somewhat this year.

In second division action on Monday Scarborough visited Trinity and spirited away a win 10-0 on the strength of a touchdown, a convert, a safety touch, and a single.

At the same time, New was enjoying a picnic on the east field with UC as the feast.

The score of 41-19 pretty well tells the whole story. New passed and rushed with authority throughout the game.

One should remember that New ran up a big score against UC last year but lost in the final to the Redmen.

Today, passersby will be entertained by SMC and ENG who will fight it out for third place.

SAC refuses appeal support

By TOM GERRY

SAC rejected Wednesday night a Saint Michael's College professor's appeal for support a statement demanding a new trial for Tony Leah and Bill Schabas.

The statement, read to a SAC general meeting by professor Peter Fitting, said that because of the illegitimacy of Caput, Leah's and Schabas's convictions arising from the Banfield affair, must be overturned by the Governing Council and a new trial must be held.

The statement did not raise the issue of racism on campus, although it noted the need for an examination of the broader questions posed by the Banfield incident.

Leah and Schabas, members of Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), were convicted last summer for their parts in preventing Edward Banfield, a US urbanologist and, according to SDS, a racist, from speaking last March at U of T.

The Caput, the university's judicial tribunal, which handed down the conviction, is considered to be illegitimate by both faculty members and students.

University College SAC rep Bob Klotz said the freedom of speech issue is of primary importance and has been ignored.

But Law SAC rep Craig Barnard argued the sentences "were too harsh because the trial of Leah and Schabas created the crime."

Heather Ridout, SAC education commissioner, said, "Freedom of speech doesn't exist on this campus anyway, considering the professors walking around with bowed heads hoping for tenure."

In other business, SAC unanimously carried a motion to support the Students' Union of Ryerson Polytechnical Institute (SURPI) in the union's struggle to maintain control over its finances. SAC will send a letter to the Ryerson administration stating support of SURPI. SURPI executive assistant Bob Spencer also asked SAC to provide money or legal assistance to help SURPI sponsor a private member's bill in the Ontario Legislature that would establish the union's position legally.

A new organization, Project AID, will be set up to collect and evaluate campus requests for grants. (As an experiment, all requests for support for this term must be presented to Project AID by November 1st and none will be decided before then so they can all be compared on the basis of merit.)

The most controversial aspect of the codification, Barnard noted, is that "campus publications must be relevant to the whole campus to gain financial support from SAC." This stipulation is expected to affect the college publications and the Toike in particular.

SAC granted $10,000 to The Campus Legal Assistance Centre (CLAC) for the coming year. CLAC spokesman Rob Prichard originally asked for $16,800.

Faculty calls meeting to oppose parity

By TOM GERRY

In a move to maintain "a clear majority of faculty members" on Governing Council, teaching staff members have called an emergency meeting of the rarely convened Arts and Science faculty council next Wednesday.

The special meeting, requested in a petition with over 100 faculty members' signatures, is to vote on a motion to oppose "any increase in the present ratio of student to faculty representation on Governing Council."

Eight students and 12 faculty members now sit on Governing Council.

The petition, initiated by political economy department chairman Harry Eastmen, stipulates the signees want "a clear majority of faculty members" to student members on council.

Eastmen admitted yesterday he knew of no other special meetings held by the faculty council and that the council itself has met only twice in the past four years.

The faculty council can meet only when at least 100 members request it.

The faculty council is composed of 1,300 faculty members and 50 students, although students have waged vigorous campaigns in past years to increase their representation on the body. An abortive student strike in the winter of 1971 for parity representation on the faculty council failed to move faculty members to increase the 50 student seats.

Eastman said he expects the motion opposing parity on Governing Council will be passed at Wednesday's emergency meeting.

The faculty council meeting will take place a day before Governing Council's Thursday meeting which is to review the U of T Act and present composition of the university's top governing body.

Governing Council has received 26 briefs from groups within and without the university on U of T Act revision and council composition. Most student organizations, the U of T Alumni Association and Faculty of Social work teachers support equal staff-student representation on council, and the majority of the 26 briefs call for parity representation.

Steve Moses, a student Governing Council member, noted faculty council meets almost exclusively when students are pressing for parity representation. "This is an obvious attempt to blunt the students' move," he said.

SAC executive assistant Chris Allnut emphasized the importance of Governing Council's ultimate decision on parity representation. "If we fail to win parity," Allnut said, "we will be stuck with the present composition until at least 1980."

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch told a SAC general meeting Wednesday evening, "It is crucial to the campaign for student parity to undercut faculty opposition."

"We must show Governing Council there are faculty supporters for parity, which there are," Kanowitch said.

Panic hits UK

Latest reports as The Varsity goes to bed for the evening have Harold Wilson's Labor party sweeping the British election with a clear majority over the Conservatives of Edward "Teeth" Heath in the country's second election this year.

Rumors of a mass wave of panic are sweeping the country, as investors rush to divest themselves of the sterling and invest in rubber ducks, bubble gum, fried chicken and other gilt-edged securities.

Several observers reported the entire island of Britain drifting helplessly off into mid-Atlantic.

Talks stall over athletic complex plans

New complex plans recreational swimming for the community as well as U of T members . . .

. . . but local residents object that the facade of the building is too imposing.

By JOSEPH WRIGHT
Talks between the university and local ratepayers' associations over the proposed location of the new athletic complex have been stalled indefinitely.

Talks will not be able to proceed until the city finalizes its criteria for exemptions from the 45-foot holding bylaw.

The athletic complex is planned for the north side of Harbord Street between the Benson building and Spadina Avenue.

In its present form the complex will require an exemption from the bylaw which prohibits construction of buildings more than 45 feet high.

Toronto planning department spokesman Arthur Sisson said the criteria for determining exemptions will not be decided until after the upcoming municipal election, probably January at the earliest.

Local ratepayers' groups have voiced strong opposition to the complex.

However the citizen groups are unable to present their views to the City-University Liaison Committee over the matter until the committee receives a preliminary report from the city's planning staff.

Planners are unable to prepare a report until the criteria for exemptions from the 45 foot holding bylaw are finalized.

The Huron-Sussex and Sussex-

Ulster Residents' Associations have prepared briefs outlining their objections to the complex.

They anticipate further traffic congestion, parking problems, noise from the complex and they attack proposed demolition of existing buildings on Spadina Avenue and Harbord.

They charge the building will be visually intimidating and will complete the "institutionalization" of Spadina Ave. from College St. to Harbord, on the east side.

They also claim details of promised community access remain vague.

U of T's vice-president's assistant Jack Dimond, responsible for the athletic complex planning, said the groups' objections would be given full consideration when the City-University Liaison Committee is able to hold a meeting.

Joan Doiron of Downtown Action, a research organization for ratepayer's groups, said she was "really shocked by the university's attitude." She said the university "brings something really fixed to us" and expects approval.

Citizen groups of the university's surrounding community have complained for many years about U of T's expanding development projects which have completely ignored the surrounding community's interests.

Scar students may lose study space

Proposals by the Scarborough College administration to increase faculty office space at the expense of student study areas are being referred back to a planning sub-committee after strong student opposition.

Scarborough student council president John O'Donohue said the proposals had been first formulated at a series of meetings to which no students were invited, then at two meetings earlier this month where he was the only student invited.

Reallocation of space proposals have resulted from over-enrolment at the college whose size has grown from 2,641 students last year to about 3,200 this year.

O'Donohue argues that the report, which suggests 12 alterations in present space allocation, does not deal with the problem of poor study areas for students at the college.

O'Donohue says there is no way for students to concentrate with carrels lining the corridors in the humanities and social science wings.

The carrels could be moved to quieter areas of the college or the corridors could be renovated to make a reasonable study area, according to O'Donohue.

A special meeting of the Scarborough students' council will be held next Tuesday to prepare a critique of the administration proposals.

Another proposal O'Donohue criticized was one for creating offices out of several seminar rooms. These are now one of the few quiet areas for study in the college.

The students' council space would be turned over to the bindery under the proposals. O'Donohue called this suggestion "crazy."

The students' council offices are now overlooking the meeting place, near the entrance to the college.

He objected to moving a "factory-type" operation such as the bindery to such a prime location while moving the student union to more cramped quarters in another area, less accessible to students.

The report's only major concern, O'Donohue charged, was getting space for new faculty offices, while student needs are neglected.

Two special meetings to decide parity issue

The Governing Council will hold two special meetings, the first next Thursday, to decide on the issue of faculty-student parity on the council as part of a review of the U of T Act.

The special meetings follow a decision last June by the council to scuttle a report calling for faculty-student parity by the U of T Act review committee.

The executive committee decided Tuesday that debate at next Thursday's meeting should establish principles which will result in specific models for voting at the following meeting.

For the special meetings, votes will be recorded for the first time and the speaking limit will be reduced from five minutes to three.

Among the main questions to be discussed are:

- equal representation between students and faculty on Governing Council;
- equal representation between university and outside members on the council;
- the best size for the council—the present 50 or up to 70 members;
- designated representation from the suburban campuses, municipal representatives and academic administrators;

• changes in representation from various constituencies based on workload or inadequate representation.

Twenty-seven briefs were received by Governing Council, a majority in favor of faculty-student parity. There are only eight students now on the 50-member council.

Decision postponed on xerox lending service

By ROMAN HAHN

The library sub-committee of the academic affairs committee postponed a decision Wednesday on eliminating or transferring the Sid Smith xerox loan facilities which serve history and political economy students.

The library sub-committee, which recommends all policy concerning university libraries to Governing Council's academic affairs committee, proposed last month to eliminate the Sid Smith branch of the library's xerox system, saying it would save money and increase efficiency.

But more than 2,200 history and poli ec students have signed petitions against moving the xerox loan service to the Sigmund Samuel library, as have 22 history faculty members.

Library sub-committee chairman J. E. Hodgetts opened the discussion to faculty representatives from the history and poli ec departments and students from the history, poli ec and arts and science student unions.

The student representatives expressed fears they would lose accessibility to required reading materials if facilities were transferred to Sig Sam library.

Students also questioned the assumption that better service would be provided in the Sig Sam library.

Sub-committee member Martin Mueller said the history and poli ec xerox loan libraries were "different animals" than the other Sid Smith collections—math, geography and fine arts.

Mueller questioned whether the xerox loan service was essential.

But history faculty member Trevor Lloyd replied the library was indeed being treated as "a very different sort of animal—fit only to be exterminated!"

Varg staff disappears

Yes, we have no bananas, and no, we aren't having our customary Friday afternoon staff meeting.

Instead, all members of the university community are invited to attend a ticker tape parade down Bay St. to the bus station where a contingent of Varsity editors will be leaving for a regional CUP conference.

The parade begins 1 pm at Bay and Bloor and arrives at the bus station three hours later. Confetti may be purchased at the Varsity offices for $7.39 a pound . . .

Thanksgiving: time to talk turkey

By NEATER C. PEWMAN

Thanksgiving. Time to talk turkey. Time to reflect on the values which made this country what it is. Time to be thankful for the natural resources which have made Canadians so abundantly wealthy and so abysmally stupid.

Time, indeed, to stand back and ask how we, as Canadians, can preserve our precious cultural heritage, which dates back well over two centuries.

As the late Aristotle, a personal friend of mine, so often remarked: "nothing in excess, everything in moderation."

Well I remember his thought-lined visage as he and I sat in a crowded Paris bistro with Ernest Hemingway, also a personal friend of mine, remarking on the sad decline of good taste.

How true his words seem today.

How sad though, to think that the very ideals which we cherish have been usurped from us. Snatched from our very grasp by foreigners, and their foreign magazines.

How humiliating.

Is there any way to rectify this sad state of affairs? Is there any way to regain control of our own destiny?

There is one glimmer of hope, one desperate gamble which can turn the tide in the chess board of Canadian life, one Herculean effort worthy of Dionysus himself.

Send me your money, fellow Canadians. My magazine, Mucklanes, with your help, can stave off the sinister decay of all we hold true.

All I ask is your millions. Is that too high a price to pay for the preservation of our souls?

The following letter from U of T president John Evans to SAC president Seymour Kanowitch is Evans' reply to Kanowitch, who issued to Evans a second challenge for a debate on the subject of the composition of U of T's top governing body, the Governing Council. Next Thursday, the council will meet to review its size and composition.

Evans: still no debate

Dear Mr. Kanowitch:

Thank you for your further letter of September 26th. I believe that we are in agreement that the parity issue has already been debated sufficiently, and that most students are not sufficiently interested in the arguments to go over them again in the lengthy C.U.G. Report. I repeat my willingness to explain to interested groups on campus the nature of the problems of representation on the Governing Council as I perceive them.

As far as debate is concerned, however, this is now a matter for the Governing Council. Decisions on any revisions of representation on the Governing Council were deferred last June in order to give more time for discussion, and an effort was made through the Governing Council and through the campus media to reach individuals and groups throughout the University community.

Submissions were to be received by October 1st, and I hope that these responses will provide valuable guidance to the members of the Governing Council during the deliberations later this month on the revision of the University of Toronto Act.

Degrees sexist

When I graduate from this university, with my B.A. I do not wish to be called Bachelor of Arts. In keeping with the philosophy of women's equality, let that degree now stand for U.P.A.—Unmarried Person of Arts. This ought to put a stop to chairpersons, alderpersons and the like.

Hirsute males not abundant

The male students attending the University of Toronto (particularly those at FEUT) are generally very badly dressed. I do not know if this results from economic hardship or carelessness, the girls, however, are generally better dressed. I do not consider that worn, torn, dirty, patched and faded jeans and shabby old sneakers are proper attire for a college man. The college student must not only be a gentleman but look and dress like one.

Or do these men (the future teachers of Canada) imagine they are still high school kids and that it did not matter what they wore to school?

Unsolicited contributions to The Varsity appear in two forms. Short submissions, space permitting, are run as letters to the editor. Longer pieces, to a maximum of four pages typewritten, will be run as "op-ed" articles, if they are deemed sufficiently interesting.

All correspondence must be typed on a 72-character line, and addressed to the editor. It may be delivered in person, or mailed to The Varsity, 91 St. George St., 2nd floor, either by campus or regular mail.

No material received after 4 p.m. the day before publication will be considered for that issue.

Explanation demanded

I sincerely hope an explanation will be forthcoming on the subject of SAC grants to the Toronto Citizen. A recent front-page blurb in the Varg indicated that a grant of $1,000 was approved, with further grants of up to $5,000 being considered. I am concerned about the allocation of U of T students' money to an off-campus organization.

There is no indication that the Citizen is a student activity. The decision to grant money to the Citizen, regardless of high ideals about preserving the real voice of the people, sets a precedent for SAC to grant money to whatever non-student organizations and causes are currently in vogue.

So what about the Metro Zoo and the TTC, also public services in need of funds? Just what are the criteria for distributing students' dollars?

Support mounts for anthro library

A student campaign to keep the anthropology reading room open in the evening is mounting steadily. Over 1,200 students have signed a petition urging the university to fund the evening hour operations.

The reading room, which Anthropology Student Union president Brian Clarence described as “the best anthropology reading room in Canada—better than the anthropology section at the Robarts library,” is now open weekdays from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Clarence explained his union kept the library open last year at a $1,000 cost with financial support from Woodsworth College, the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students (CAPUS) and the Arts and Science Students' Union (ASSU).

This year, however, both APUS and ASSU are unable to fund the library. Although Woodsworth has increased its donation by 50 per cent, the Anthropology Student Union still does not have the $1,500 necessary to maintain evening operations.

Governing Council's library sub-committee is to decide on the funding Oct. 25.

“Before I started collecting signatures for the petition,” Clarence noted, “I thought we had a 25 per cent chance of convincing the university.”

“But now that we have so much support, especially from anthropology students, I don't see how any one in their right mind couldn't support our request.”

Clarence stressed part-time students, who are so often ignored at the university, particularly need to use the reading room in the evenings.

Nationalist sociology ridiculous

Recently, widespread distress has been voiced about the so-called “American take-over of another of the great Canadian resources—the department of sociology at the U of T.”

Those concerned have called for the Canadianization of the discipline of sociology. They call for its immediate nationalization to keep it from the clutches of the “Yankee imperialists.”

I personally cannot see how the Canadianizing, Americanizing, Germanizing, or any kind of nationalizing of a discipline can improve it. If anything, it narrows its scope, thereby decreasing its effectiveness, and even its validity, as a progressive scientific study.

If one is interested in the growth of a discipline as a science, one should not try to impose upon it particular national or cultural boundaries. The scientific approach must necessarily be open, allowing for the study of all phenomena, since its end goal is to discover universalities.

To say that the study of Canadian society is somehow more important than that of any other is to introduce a tremendous bias into the body of knowledge collected. The conclusions produced from such a consideration could not possibly be an accurate description of reality.

This is why I think that when choosing someone to teach a discipline, the least important consideration should be his or her national or cultural origins. The only criteria should be the individual's record as a progressive thinker and his or her ability to teach the subject.

The attempt to “Canadianize” sociology, psychology, anthropology and history should be regarded in the same light of absurdity as trying to “Canadianize” physics, chemistry, mathematics and biology. Without continuous international collaboration in study, these latter pure sciences would probably still be in their infancy.

Progress within social science cannot take place within the fetters of nationalism.

Ford moves backfired

Many people, tired of the press' saturation coverage of the Watergate affair, at first applauded Gerald Ford's precedent-setting premature pardon of Richard Nixon hoping that it would bring about an end to this drawn-out, sworded mess.

However, Ford's move totally backfired for not only has it ended his “honeymoon” with both the U.S. Congress and the American people, it has also case new aspersions on the integrity of the office of the President. Everyone knows that “two wrongs do not make a right” and, unfortunately, Ford's three

Steam storm sparks stopgap surge

By CLAUDE HAWPER

A storm of student protest has greeted the recent announcement that U of T will sell steam heat for use in the new Ontario Hydro building.

Students for the newly-formed Stop Blowing Steam group (SBS) are planning a Thanksgiving Day demonstration at the new hydro building at College St. and University Ave.

SBS spokesperson Harold Swarthmore questioned why steam heat was being sold to big capitalist businesses when it was not offered for sale to students first. He said the situation was a “new Hydrogate.”

“After all,” said Swarthmore, “it is student tuition money that pays for producing all that steam and why shouldn't they be allowed to decide how and when it should be used.”

Business affairs vice-president Alex Rankin defended the move, saying “We have a very efficient system of our own and they've turned to us to meet their needs.”

Although the hydro building is an electrical building with a unique heat recovery scheme, it needed small amounts of steam from U of T for domestic hot water, snow melting and to reinforce the huge water reservoir which will be used to heat the building.

A steam line will be constructed by Canada Square between the new building and the university's central heat generation plant, behind 215 Huron Street.

The final designs are yet to be approved, and maybe won't be if Harold Swarthmore and the SBS have any say in the matter.

Tensions mount as university strike continues

REGINA (CUP) — Tensions are mounting at the universities of Saskatchewan and Regina as they react to the strike of University of Saskatchewan Employees Union members.

Originally the union had not requested students not to cross picket lines, but since Oct. 8 both students and faculty have been asked to respect the lines.

In an official statement the union strike committee said they had decided to toughen the picket due to a break down in negotiations and changing conditions.

Crant Holden, the union's vice-president, has said that negotiation which took place Oct. 2 indicate the university is not prepared to end the strike.

Holden said the university had refused to table a position unless the union, as a pre-condition, would recommend it.

"It amounted to an ultimatum with conditions which management knew full well the union wouldn't accept and we are in no mood for ultimatums," Holden said.

Union suspicions of management strikebreaking actions were confirmed when only hours after the university was granted an injunction limiting the number of pickets allowed to the union.

Meanwhile, Saskatoon union officials have disappeared from sight and until they are found the injunction cannot be served.

Jack Pringle, the university controller in Saskatoon, was however able to deliver a letter saying any unauthorized union personnel found on university property would be charged with trespassing.

It is virtually impossible for the University of Regina to get an injunction against picketers as it is built on property it does not own. The campus is located on property of the Wascana Authority, a provincial government agency.

The union also reports the university management has been hiring strike breakers at both campuses.

The union had expected garbage to back up in Regina, but so far the administration has been able to get rid of it.

All city garbage trucks have been halted from entering the campus and all cars entering or leaving the university are checked.

The university heating plant is still in operation although only one qualified person handles it. Union officials are positive the plant is being run by unqualified scabs but cannot get the department of labor to inspect the site.

The University Employees Union, which represents over 1,500 non-teaching workers in Regina and Saskatoon, is demanding a $125 a month across the board increase, a role for the union in determining job classifications, day care space and facilities and four weeks holiday after 10 years work. Administration personnel presently receive four weeks holiday after only seven years work.

The administration says it doesn't have enough money in its budget to meet the union's demands and has made a counter offer of a $65 pay increase. The union has rejected this offer.

Guelph hosts women's conference

GUELPH (CUP) — A conference on the role and problems of women students in universities and community colleges in Ontario will be held in Guelph, Oct. 25, 26 and 27.

The three days will feature panels, media presentations and workshops on the traditional role of women in post-secondary education, and tactics for changing that role.

The conference is being jointly sponsored by Guelph Central Student Association and the Ontario Federation of Students. Planners expect 100 to 150 delegates with each registered campus group in the province being able to send two delegates, with an invitation for men to participate.

Cayle Annis, University of Guelph Women's Committee director and one of the planners of the conference, says the stipulation that only delegates from registered campus groups could participate was a hard one to make.

"We finally opted for representation rather than completely open participation to all who were interested," she said.

"The hope is to bring together a group of people who might best reflect where people are at in terms of their attitudes toward sexism in post-secondary education. If we opened it up completely in terms of participation then problems discussed and tactics decided on by the conference could reflect more the opinions of people already committed to the women's movement rather than people in general."

Annis stressed the representative nature of the delegates was of particular importance "because the conference is planned around the idea of not just discussing problem areas for women in post-secondary education, but to try to work out concrete tactics and plans to attack these problems which can be actively supported by the groups represented."

The conference program will consist of several panel sessions on the academic and non-academic problems facing women in post-secondary education, emphasizing student problems. These panels will be followed by workshops oriented around developing tactics to solve these problems.

The three-day conference will conclude with a plenary session of all delegates in order to map out agreed upon strategies.

"After the conference is over" says Annis, "the delegates then have the job of going back to their campuses and trying to carry out the strategy."

The planners hope the conference can provide some degree of coherence and cooperation on a province-wide basis to assist women students in solving problems which face them in attaining a post-secondary education.

Art

Homage to Kathleen Fenwick
Prints by various artists
Gallery Pascal
334 Dundas St. W.
Until 23 October

In the past fifty years Canadian printmaking has sprung from almost nothing into the vigorous life it enjoys today.

This more or less international phenomenon is the response of art to changing conditions, namely the transfer of patronage from the hands of the very wealthy to the not so wealthy public and hence the greatly increased demand for art within a feasible price range.

Printmaking, where a large but finite series can be produced from one original design, enables the artist to multiply the results of his time and energy without a loss of quality.

The relocated Gallery Pascal opened last week with "Homage to Kathleen Fenwick". Fenwick was curator of prints and drawings at the National Gallery for forty years, a founding editor of "Arts Canada" and a remarkable woman whose life work was to encourage and inspire Canadian printmakers up until her death last year.

The tribute is made by an exciting variety of artists. The prints range from the boisterous humour of Quebec's Fernand Bergeron through the delicate grace of Anna Wong to the magical appeal of the Inuit artists from Baker Lake.

'Captain Carter home on Greenspond Island' — by David Blackwood

Some of the artists, such as Labrador's David Blackwood, received their first break from Fenwick. "In a way," he says, "it was supreme recognition, worth more than a million dollars."

Such an exhibit is fitting to the Gallery Pascal which Jack Pollock has called the "heart of Canadian printmaking" and whose owner, Doris Pascal, he has described as "a guiding force in helping weave the brilliant tapestry that is the Canadian graphic scene."

The Gallery Pascal has moved from its cramped quarters in Yorkville to 334 Dundas Street West, opposite the Art Gallery. Its new home is a gracious old Toronto house where high ceilings and a spacious interior provide a perfect setting for a glowingly fresh and vital collection.

If out of this delightful diversity there speaks a voice which is distinctively Canadian it is one, without any degree of chauvinism, of which we can be proud.

Grids
Linda White
KAA Gallery
Kensington Street
Until 18 October

Grids is Linda White's second one-woman show at the KAA Gallery on Kensington Street. Linda is an American artist from South Carolina who moved to Toronto with her husband four years ago. She has been painting mainly for five years and does show individual direction.

There is no degree of the traditional in Grids. In fact, the title is entirely misleading. Linda White's grids are applied on an almost finished canvas free-hand and unmeasured. She does not use the grid as a restraint for a rigid design. In the painting "Ribbon", two-thirds of the six by eight foot canvas is covered in acrylic cream yellow. The bottom third is a soft almost sunny blue. Narrow shreds of bright yellow, orange and rose-red brush strokes ripple through the foreground and at times seem to get tangled in the series of vertical and horizontal wobbles of a muted orange representing the grid.

The artist feels that her best painting in the show is "Anita" because "it follows a new direction." In child-like scrawl the letters of the name "Anita" cover the upper third of the large silver-white canvas. Ribbon-like streams of orange, yellow and grey-silver mingle with not so cool washed down blues and yellowed-greens creating a sunny and friendly warmth. The work is executed in acrylics and aluminum powder. The harmony of the work is heightened by the free-hand stripes positioned vertically and horizontally across the background.

"Are there no sinologues in Canada?"

This article is reprinted with the permission of the author. It originally appeared in the September issue of 'Only Paper Today', a monthly devoted to writing about art in Ontario. The opinions expressed are those of the author and do not necessarily reflect those of The Varsity editorial staff.

Canadian colonial idlogy — in both its private and imbecilic condition — is nowhere better found than in three cultural institutions of Toronto: the Art Gallery of Toronto, the Hart House Gallery at the University of Toronto, and the Royal Ontario Museum, all three dihard exponents, and products of family compact, private persuasion club persuasion. Today, however, with the recently-opened Chinese Exhibition which emanates from the People's Republic of China, ROM with its private club policy has taken the prize for colossal cultural stupidity.

In my view, The Chinese Exhibition now on display at ROM of 'new' archaeological findings and possessions from China can only raise for many Canadians a serious point of interrogation: 'is this the "politics of art", or is it the "art of politics"?' A big question.

Toronto has long possessed two distinctive features, sometimes described as 'unique', which every Canadian ought to know about: the Scarborough Bluffs, a palaeontological wonder on this continent; and ROM's own superb, expansive Chinese collection, the result of 'bringing the ages home' — a euphemistic phrase which really means, under the cloak of Imperialist lackeyism, the practice of subtle theft. Today, though, most people are persuaded that that sort of stealing from China was all right then because it happened so long ago.

Recently, after ROM and its board had nefariously shafted its former director, Peter Swan, they saw fit to appoint to that vacated post Dr. Walter Tovell, an 'old family' man of Toronto, who is, for some, an admirable choice. As Dr. Tovell is also a master of the earth sciences we can reasonably conclude that the world in general may now actually get to hear about the Scarborough Bluffs and their importance, even though they can't be displayed at ROM.

But, more important, it seems that the doctor is also responsible to the board of ROM for its own splendid, expansive collection of Chinese art and artifacts and, of course, their exhibition. Maybe, someday, the world will really get to know about ROM's Chinese collection, but then perhaps not; family compact conniving, you see, always operates in such a way that continued Canadian colonization has become, for some, an A-1 priority; Canada, according to many more than I should like to know, must always kowtow to the rapacity of outside colonization and control, foreign knowledge and taste, even when attempting to look with Canadian eyes at work that is not indigenous.

It seems, at least for many Canadians with 'cultural power', that cultural imperialism, be it from the US, Britain, or wherever, must never be combatted, or even questioned; rather, it must be accepted either openly or covertly, in order to reinforce and augment Canada's continued colonization. Example? The so-called American Friends of Canada, an organization initiated by Bluma Appel of Montreal, aided and abetted by Canada's own Secretary of State Department. A warning: the 'American Friends' as an arrogant, cultural sidearm of U.S. imperialism and corporate capitalism could, in the future, usurp museum space and art publication services in Canada in order to impose its own cultural values on those of our own country. And now, initiated by the British, there's the Chinese Exhibition in Toronto.

If you look at it carefully, you will soon realize that the Chinese Exhibition at ROM is more British than Chinese, a packed 'sideshow' designed for western eyes and minds with British economic 'skills' as a 'moneymaker'; however, it seems very unlikely that Chairman Mao will get 10 percent of the profits. The catalogue to the exhibition, written, designed and printed in Britain, is relatively expensive for the general public to buy and many Canadians will see it as a projection of somewhat authoritarian British point of view — God knows how many hundreds of thousands of this catalogue will be printed and sold throughout the world. But, are there no sinologues in this country, at ROM particularly, to see and interpret Chinese art through local Canadian eyes? And if not, why not? Surely ROM's collection of Chinese works is a collection and not merely a random accumulation, a collection requiring proper docental attention? But no, ROM preters to 'put Canada on the map' as a British colony, to use our space as a money-making centre for others.

There is no point, really, in writing a critique about the Chinese archaeological findings; there are many exquisite items, certainly, adequately displayed, but hardly any which have not their counterpart, or better, in ROM's own collection. The posters and billboards for the event use a jade burial suit — this way to see the 'mummy' — which in its 'popularity' points up the midway, sideshow approach of the British. The third-rate use of photostats in two-dimensional explanatory display is cheap, tatty and abominable.

For me, the most startling thing of all in this 'pseudo-event' at ROM, is the participation of the Canadian Liberation Movement in colonialism by actually aiding it: New Canada Press in its political opportunism has posters all over town advertising the exhibition and at the same time offering for sale its own English-language Chinese literature which it imports and distributes in Canada. Liberation, indeed!

Hopefully, the exhibition may lead some Canadians to look at China's heritage and art who wouldn't otherwise do so and then go on to take a discerning look at what is happening to Chinese traditional art under communism. Even such innocent folk art as paper cut-outs have been killed by forced socialist-realism and the dogma of Chinese-style Marxism. Some people may feel that as a colony we perhaps deserve nothing better than this exhibition expressing the coalition of corporate capitalism and authoritarian communism. As for me, I say: a pox on both their houses.

michel lambert

Chinese Exhibition Books: you draw your own co

The day that the Chinese exhibition opened, and for some days thereafter, I was guarding the gates of a parking lot nearby. On the first morning that the show was to open, cars, with American licence-plates, full of Orientals, were there at 8:30 am. For two weeks that lot was full, and heavily populated by tourist vehicles. And for the first two weeks the queues were long under the blue and white awnings.

But then we started to hear negative feedback. Without the pressure of time; without the crowd enthusiasm; without the constant reinforcement of mass excitement, the exhibition's bright lights could not sustain the ROM's publicity drive to stage the exhibition as a cultural 'happening'.

After two months it is apparent that while the exhibit is not the grandstand event it was pushed as, it is filled with a fine lot of artifacts. But it is equally apparent that the exhibit exerts contradictory pressures on its viewers. That may be the result of the multi-levelled arrangements for and the production of the exhibition.

Many different people have gotten into the act; the steering committee is composed of persons influential in their own spheres, but it is likely that whatever concrete arrangements exist were worked out between the top-flight officials of both countries. For expertise, we obtained an exhibitions administrator from London. But in the all-important area of explanations, we are being given none but the simplest. The publicity for the event concentrates on its nature, that of spectacle. The publications descriptive of the exhibit are available through the London Times and the Peking Foreign Languages Press and its (ahem) wholly-owned subsidiary, NC Press. They are strange bed-fellows.

For two months, and earlier too, I suppose, we have been subjected to a press barrage of carry fervour, exhorting us to come to the fair. The Museum's own handiwork it is not: they have hired a large and efficient communications firm, ACI (Analytical Communications Inc.) to evangelize. But the spirit of inquiry, which one would expect from an institution as deeply involved in sinology as the ROM ought to be, is by and large missing even from their own publication, Rotunda.

There are many different forces, then, working simultaneously on our imagination as we are viewing, (or attempting to view) the Exhibition. The resulting temptation is to take the way of least resistance, as always, to simplify, to view the relics as "exhibits"; to treat the Exhibition as just the same as all the other Chinese fads which have been the most obvious reaction of the West to its sudden exposure to contemporary Chinese civilization.

But it may be that the problems the Exhibition has posed for ROM are, collectively, a paradigm of the problems any modern museum faces in a commercialized, mass-media dominated world. Inflation has made the value of Western art objects, and the insurance rates for them, skyrocket; it is not likely that ROM or any other museum in the world will ever be able to host an exhibition of Rembrandt's paintings (for instance).

Museums are dependent on governments now and no individual or group of individuals can rival the state. When a show does come along that offers a chance for a museum to show the taxpayer what it is about with his money, then it's not difficult to understand its eagerness to push that show, even though its eagerness in the process may cause it to trip itself up, without anyone's help.

After one has gone through the exhibition, the element of spectacle is beaten out of one's system. Perhaps this is why so many of those who knew nothing of the art, or of the Museum, found it so disappointing; there was no euphoric afterglow, no easily-found pleasure to take away with them.

With these people I sympathize; if they expected a lasting blow to the mind, they were misled by the dramatic poster art of the Exhibit. Still, all of us will emerge from the bright lights tired.

It is at this point that one naturally turns to the books that have been published or released in this country in conjunction with the Exhibition. One wants something to commemorate the show, maybe even to explain it. (At the ROM, you leave the show and you walk right into a shopping area where books and posters and postcards and brooches and all kinds of other knickknacks are meant to grab your eye and open your wallet; they know what they're doing.)

There's the catalogue, of course. Or rather there are the two catalogues.

The Chinese Exhibition is, one gathers, the ROM's official catalogue. It is a production of the Times and the text is by the reputable sinologist William Watson. The book was produced to serve as the descriptive catalogue for the London stop of this exhibit, but the design has been slightly altered to allow the ROM its messages of goodwill and pingpong diplomacy. The production is excellent; the cover displays the well-known photo of the Flying Horse, and there are ten good leaves of colour prints.

Each exhibit is given a reference to the journal or monograph in which it was originally reported. This may well be one of the crucial features of the book, for in comparison with it, all the other publications completely ignore the archaeological aspect of the matter, which is ostensibly what all the fuss is about.

These references are, regrettably, the closest Western reader will ever come to the actual stories of the excavations, save for some scattered references to the diligence of the workers, and soldiers, in uncovering their history.

The books which apparently have all the details are situated just at the end of the Exhibit, are called an 'auxiliary' exhibit, and are not really identified at all.

Inside the body of the catalogue the photos, numbered according to the London display, are tiny, and occasionally dramatic. The text is restrained and densely informative.

The official catalogue also contains a critique of the Chinese understanding of Chinese history. But here the great gulf opens.

The catalogue also contains a yellow insert which is the "official and authentic introduction and catalogue." It tells you nothing more about the exhibits but it does have a great deal to say about the virtues of Mao's Marxist interpretation of the country's history.

In the West we expect a catalogue to an art exhibition to tell us something about the artifact and its use; its creator and the process of its creation; what influences in technique and design may be found in the work. The Chinese version of the catalogue supposes nothing of the sort; it hectors, lectures, it scolds.

On the one hand we are assured that the creative ability of the Chinese worker was very great (which, if we accept 'worker' as artisan, is obvious if we open our eyes) and then, on the other, that any society which produced such adornments for its rulers was a cruel and evil one. Perhaps I am just annoyed by an invasion of rhetoric into the domain of contemplation. Perhaps I completely mistake what is being said to me; but somehow the second catalogue leaves only a bad taste in the mouth if it is read closely.

The other books sponsored by the Chinese also have this fault but you can't understand what you can't read. Texts of these books are in Chinese. There is an inserted translation in each but it can easily be ignored. The books use full-colour, full-page illustrations with an awesome lavishness.

These books are available exclusively through the Canadian Liberation Movement's publishing organ, New Canada Press.

The book most likely to turn up on coffee tables this Christmas is Cultural Relics Unearthed in New China. Made in Peking in 1972, it is solely a book of pictures of artifacts. The photography is extraordinarily good for detailed study, and the colour sense with which they were shot and produced is good, in contrast to other recent Chinese publications. The inserted translation of the Chinese introduction is another case of bunkum historical judgments related to us as fact with no historical evidence, and a brief description of the plates. Transfer the information which you consider important from the supplement to the margins of the plates in which you are interested; then discard the insert.

Similar problems accompany Cultural Relics Unearthed During the Period of the Great Cultural Revolution. The book production, again, is excellent; the cover is of good cloth guarded with plastic that is easy to handle and well-fitting, and then the whole book is further protected by a cardboard slipcase. Yet, again as well, the translated introduction belabours the bland denunciations of class that are quite obnoxious when they stand alone. In this volume the separate colour plates are glued in later. They are perfectly produced and mounted.

The Silk Road is a collection of reproductions of ancient fabrics. This, fortunately, is a volume where only the pictures have the right to speak and where that right is respected. No commentary on the forces of world history could speak so eloquently as these grave-clothes of the great and not-great dead, stained and torn with years of sifting time.

One more book deserves a careful reading; it contains a great deal of information not found in the British catalogue. This is New Archaeological Finds in China. It's a slim and poorly-made paperback. The plates in this book are very poor indeed, especially when compared to the superb work in the larger volumes. But here the text takes on a greater importance, the details of the excavation circumstance being in many cases summarized. There are site photographs and the odd admission of the true nature of China's recent policies towards its not-easily accepted past. This is a fine investment for its price.

In comparison with these books on the China of old, NC Press is also pushing two books on recent Chinese art.

Socialist realism is celebrated in The Rent Collection Courtyard. It's a series of photographs of recent clay sculptures set up as a re-enactment of the old tragedy of rent-collection, when the feudal landlord sets aside one of his relaxing days for systematic exploitation of his starving, ill (except for the hero-to-be) and moody peasants. The sculptures are very well-made, in a kind of mock Hellenistic style; emotion being expressed mainly through contorted features, clenched fists and rolling eyes. The portrait of the landlord looks as if it was taken from an old Hollywood Chinatown scenario. The book is one that the non-socialist reads, looks up from in amazement, and reads again to see if he ever would have believed it, had he been other than himself.

The other, and really more reputable book, is Chinese Arts and Crafts which illustrates some of the forms of art in which Chinese artists have been working since the Revolution. There are many very beautiful works; almost all are ornate; some of them represent a great deal of time spent memorializing very trivial events.

It is in the reproductions of nature that the genius, the technical ability of the craftsmen, show through.

It is interesting to note that most of the objects portrayed are either completely ceremonial or may be used for the vices of smoking or drinking. This is a book to be enjoyed in part; some of the garish dolls remind me of the uniform wooden exports one used to get from Eastern Europe a few years ago.

I don't understand what effect belief in a non-transcendent, functional, state-serving, hero-inspiring art will have on the men who used to produce gems of inner contentment translated into representations of the physical world. At the moment modern Chinese art seems uncertain how to deal with the past; it still provides much inspiration, but it is not really certified as dogmatically correct. The purge is still in process in China; the Confucian portion of the exhibit did not arrive in this country.

The ROM has the best collection of Chinese art anywhere outside Peking. There are certain difficulties involved, I suppose, in reconciling our possession of another country's art treasures. The collection was obtained in several large blocks roughly between 1912 and 1940. C. T. Currelly, the Museum's guiding spirit and first Director, obtained most of it at distress sales held by warlords who anticipated the coming revolutions. Much of the rest came when the introduction of the railroad to the countryside devastated archaeological sites and the antiquities were available to those who could haul them away.

Recommended reading is Currelly's book on the Museum, which details the ideas he held and the problems he faced in getting it underway, I Brought The Ages Home.

When you have read that, think about how the ROM had the prestige to attract such an important display (for it is that, even if only because we have been so much in the dark about the fate of China's own museums) and yet is financially somewhat unstable, quite weak in its purchasing power compared to other institutions.

Then, think about what China expects to do with her history. Will she acknowledge it? And if the spirit of truth descends on you, clamour to find out the hows and whys of the discoveries themselves. There are ominous signs in the books; the excavations may have been only pot-hunts. At this moment, the layman cannot tell, the scholars will not or have not yet translated, and the journalists have all jumped on the Chinese knowledge bandwagon and have nothing further to say until such time as China opens its still-closed walls.

Hollywood's Disaster Sweepstakes

What is more photogenic than a cast of thousands meeting annihilation at the hands of some massive catastrophe, be it man-made, natural or extra-terrestrial?

Not much, as old film-makers knew when they spun out big-budget, lavish-scale blockbuster (before the term became associated with real estate); ones like Birth of a Nation, Battleship Potemkin, Gone With the Wind, San Francisco and Ben Hur where massive amounts of humanity were summoned and dispatched at the slightest directorial nod.

For the past few years, the style of catastrophe has tended to the subtle and the personal. Something more suited to the small, independent film-makers who developed in the 60's and who were supposed to supplant the old Hollywood studios but somehow never did.

But studios seem to be making a comeback now and so are their ideas of what constitutes catastrophe. No longer the wordless goodbye of a Five Easy Pieces or the pointless individual death of an Easy Rider.

No, gentle consumer, this year the style is back to apocalyptic cast-of-thousands calamities such as Airport '75, Juggernaut, Towering Inferno, The Hindenburg, Phase Four, Earthquake and The Day the World Ended.

These films, all to be released by Christmas, should wreak havoc on the natural ecology of movie theatres as insects, volcanoes, earthquakes, exploding zeppelins, bombed superjets, sinking passenger liners and raging hi-rise apartment fires reduce the world to more manageable cinematic proportions.

First out of the gate in the disaster sweepstakes is United Artist's Juggernaut, the timeless and moving 107-minute spectacle of a 1200-passenger cruise ship with seven bombs planted by terrorists set to explode at dawn.

With a creaky plot like this, there's not much you can hope for, except that the director and actors observe the obligatory mechanics and that maybe the body count doesn't get into four figures.

Actually, not that many bodies are floating in the drink by the time the picture lurches to a conclusion, (a pity because we might as well get what we came for), but on the other two counts, the picture lists considerably.

Director Richard Lester, who has Help and The Three

Musketeers to his credit, tries to use his usual satirical methods to send-up the picture even while he exploits the plot for whatever drama and suspense he can muster.

He manages to work at such cross purposes in Musketeers fairly well but fails dismally when he does it in Juggernaut.

Otherwise, the only honorable course of action was to make the movie as competently as he could, even if he did find the material hackneyed.

The actors don't add much. Ship captain Omar Sharif successfully imitates a block of wood while the rest of the cast follows the more traditional Actor's Studio route of frowning, moping, crying, running, yelling and collapsing to express their troubled human lot.

Movies like this work better when there's no comic relief (after all, why should we laugh when people get blown to hell, even if it is only a movie?).

But Lester shamelessly dumps in as much of it as possible in annoying ways. He has too many heavy-handed scenes of cute young children, Falstaffian ship stewards, deck tennis tournaments and Fellini-like masquerade balls thrown in to underscore how ludicrous people can be and, by implication, how above it all he is.

This kind of snide contempt is unforgivable. If Lester doesn't like the limited possibilities of a movie of this genre others, he shouldn't have bothered making it.

The ace of England's bomb squad, played by Richard Harris, manages a throw-away performance, three parts Richard Burton's Hamlet, one part Gene Hackman's Posedon Adventure performance. He drinks, swears a lot at bureaucracy, and quotes punchy one sentence snippets of Welsh wisdom.

The ocean plays itself but gives an uneven performance. So that no other ship can be allowed to perform a relatively simple sea rescue, the script calls for a force-eight gale to blow for 12 hours.

The elements do look fierce for one long action-packed scene but for the rest of the movie, the water and sky are placid enough for a rowboat race.

Summer was dead, and Autumn was expiring,
And infant Winter laughed upon the land
All cloudlessly and cold; — when I, desiring
More in this world than any understand,
Wept o'er the beauty, like sea retiring,
Had left the earth bare as the wave-worn sand
Of my lorn heart, and o'er the grass and flowers
Pale for the falsehood of the flattering Hours.

Summer was dead, but I yet lived to weep
The instability of all but weeping;
And on the Earth lulled in her winter sleep
I woke, and envied her as she was sleeping.
Too happy Earth! over thy face shall creep
The wakening vernal airs, until thou, leaping
From unremembered dreams, shalt see
No death divide thy immortality.

This year a number of changes have been made in the employment of Graduate Teaching Assistants.

In order to make sure that all of these changes have been implemented, the Implementation Committee on the Remuneration of Graduate Student Teaching Assistants is furnishing you with the following check list:

1. Have you received a letter from your department offering you an appointment as a Teaching Assistant this year? (This letter should give an estimate of the total time involved in the assignment and state the salary and vacation pay.)
2. If you are doing the same assignment as last year, then you should receive an increase of 7% (excluding vacation pay).
3. Are you receiving vacation pay?
4. Are you being paid in the $7-$10 per hour range?

If the answer to any of these questions is No, please contact your Department Chairman. Those problems which remain unresolved after consultation should be referred to the Committee at the following address:

Good clean folk from the Dirt Band

The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band have never followed the mainstream of what could be called popular rock. Instead they have brought to their audiences music which has often been commercially and at times, even aesthetically distasteful. How many diehard rock fans considered country and bluegrass music anything but low brow, six or seven years ago?

Through their continuous plodding, the Dirt Band, and later, bands like the ill-fated Flying Burritos and Poco, were able to carve a distinctive niche in the rock culture and broaden still further the scope of contemporary pop music.

By the early '70's the Dirt Band, though seldom performing original material, were finding a new and excited audience for many of their great old American tunes. In fact, in a musical era so dominated by British artists, they were reintroducing Americans to much of their musical heritage, offering them what was truly American folk music.

Last Sunday, at Convocation Hall, they performed two shows to a somewhat disappointing audience of 1,300 (in Albany the night before they had sold out a 5,000-seat auditorium). While the turnout may have been disappointing, the performance was not.

The Varsity — Bonnie Timmins

The band tripped through a set of musical Americana with a vitality and self-enjoyment so rarely seen in rock acts today. Their readings of old country hits like "Jambalaya" and "The Battle of New Orleans" and bluegrass standards by Doc Watson, Doug Kershaw, and Earl Scruggs provided uplifting and toe-tapping pleasure. Their touch of country ragtime, displayed best in tunes like

"Honky Tonkin", and "Diggy Liggy Lo" were also special treats. Perhaps the only letdown in their lengthy show came in Jimmie Fadden's "Fish Song", and in "Mr. Bojangles", formerly one of their better tunes.

The highlight of the evening came when the band left banjo and fiddle player, John McEuen, alone on stage for a fifteen minute solo effort. McEuen displayed his great showmanship and unique talents as a banjo picker. In his beautiful reading of Stephen Vincent Benet's "The Morning Whippoorwill" he held the audience silent and almost in tears as he unravelled the old hillbilly yarn.

It would not be fair to disregard the fine work of the opening act, Stringband. Though their performance at times still lacks polish and a much needed spokesman, their music, both in English and French, at times related to me as a Canadian, in the same way that the Dirt Band's must to an American. They are truly a Canadian band, and with their enchanting melodies and tales, and the rich and luscious voice of Mary-Lynn Hammond, the only direction is up.

Today's music scene has reached an impasse; it is stalled, dead in its tracks, because of a basic lack of creativity. Over the past couple of years we seem to have touched all the bases, from the retrogressive blandness of the Pointer Sisters and Bette Midler, right up to the grotesque asexuality of David Bowie and company. Creativity has reached such a low point that Hendrix has been resurrected by Robin Trower, the Beach-boys can get twenty thousand people to sing along with a thirteen year old song, and old man Dylan can earn several millions of dollars by pretending to be himself.

But hope springs eternal. And there are new ventures, new careers, new reputations being launched.

That is certainly the case with Robert J. Hunter, the lyricist and nonperforming member of the Grateful Dead. His long-awaited debut album has finally appeared. Up until the release of "Tales of the Great Rum Runners", he was just another name on a record cover but now at last he has come out into the open.

Several years in the making, the lp offers thirteen brand new songs from a very unique singer-songwriter. With the help of the Dead's Jerry Garcia and Mickey Hart, (among others), Hunter presents us with a collection of chants, ballads, blues, and hymnlike laments. The whole effort is made even more unusual by Hunter's untrained voice which ranges from a deep and melodic bass, through a haunting tenor, to a derranged scream.

"Tales of the Great Rum Runners" is the kind of record that seeps into the listener very slowly, but after a few listenings is like an old friend. It is very different from the usual country-rock product released in the past few years, because Hunter provides it with a sincerity that makes the songs seem very real.

The unusual thing about this record is that it is on the Dead's "Round Records" label. Since this clashed with Round Records, a record store on Bloor Street, whose owner has a copyright for the name in Canada, Hunter's lp was not released in this country. Instead it is being imported by Round Records, the store. It's available at regular prices.

The Souther-Hillman-Furay Band
Asylum Records

Powerful People
Gino Vanelli
A&M Records

David Geffen, president of Asylum Records, this summer added another sizeable name to his list of already attractive artists. Souther, Hillman and Furay are now part of a lineup that includes Joni Mitchell, Carly Simon, Jackson Brown and the Eagles.

Individually the members of Souther, Hillman and Furay have a unique historical background in rock. Richie Furay had been with Buffalo Springfield and Poco. Chris Hillman and steel guitarist Al Perkins met when they were both with the Flying Burrito Brothers. Before that Hillman had appeared as one of the original Byrds. Jim Gordon had played drums for Eric Clapton's Derek and the Dominoes. John David Souther and Paul Harris had both established reputable names as California studio musicians and in Souther's case, as a songwriter too.

Collectively then, they would naturally attract reasonable attention. Here on their initial album, The Souther-Hillman-Furay Band, their reputations have held fast, but they certainly have not grown with any leaps and bounds. Their problem is not with material, it's with originality — or the lack thereof. Their entire album could have been packaged as a work by the Eagles and few would have questioned its validity. Their styles at present, are that similar, with perhaps an edge in taste and innovation going to the Eagles.

The band shows obvious potential. If they can solve their identity crisis and bring out the talented work of their sidemen, they could be on the road towards brighter lights.

Herb Alpert at A&M Records may also have watched a golden egg hatch this summer. . . . It comes to him out of Montreal in the name of Gino Vanelli.

Vanelli, whose second album Powerful People was released this August has packaged a unique sound. Working with a band that includes only percussion and keyboard instruments (synthesizers included) he has created something distinctly fresh and vibrant.

Though his lyrics at times show an element of immaturity, the sheer energy he creates in songs like "People Gotta Move", and "Jack Miraculous" is overwhelming. The keyboard work of Joe Vanelli and Richard Baker is astounding. The jazz work on "Son of a New York Gun" and "Jack Miraculous", contrasts perfectly with the delicate ballad styles of "Lady, Felicia", and Jo Jo and the Stevie Wonder type funk of "People Gotta Move".

"Powerful People" is the true test piece of the album and passes with flying colours. Gino's vocal performance and Joe's incredible arrangement make it one of the best compositions recorded and performed this year.

Gino Vanelli's work on this album both as composer and vocalist is nothing short of a remarkable triumph. His live performance, as demonstrated in August at the Colonial, can only be described in the same way. May he return soon and with a new album.

Books

with literature on women and sex. A.S.A. Harrison, with the help of the Coach House Press, has added her small bit to the pile with Twenty-two Women Talk Frankly about Their Orgasms.

What the author and the publisher don't seem to realize, is that women talking about orgasms are just as boring as women talking about toilet-training or recipes or daytime television.

The idea of asking women to describe their orgasms is summed up by one of the women who when asked, "How does it feel to come?" replies, "How does it feel to stub your toe?" No matter how much you read about other people's toes, you will never experience any but your own.

To give you some idea of the lofty objectives of the book, let me quote the introduction:

This is a book about what some women think about their orgasms. I undertook this study basically to satisfy a personal curiosity. Also I am obviously a voyeur. So don't expect any scientific data, or editing or even a single definite conclusion.

Canajan orthography is found throughout the book — "I think a lotta guys are just a lotta shit," "She's just poppin em off like bubbles folks," — and may be the book's one claim to fame.

These loose-mouthed women relate their childhood fantasies, wet dreams, unstimulated orgasms (doing deep knee bends), pre- and post-natal intercourse, masturbatory habits. This is all old hat to anyone who has followed sex literature of the last few years.

A.S.A. outdoes herself with probing questions like: How do you know what you think is your clitoris is your clitoris? Does the size of the penis make any difference? What did your mother teach you about sex?

The women answer in the same vein: "what fascinates me about life is interspecies communication and as of late I found out what it's like for a man to fuck a female dolphin and to find out what absolute bliss is about" "Now if I know nothing, my dear, I know my clitoris," and "her vagina just opens and closes, a complete extension of her heart."

The only solid conclusion of the book is that gay women think very little of men, and that straight women prefer not to live without them. But we've all known that for years.

Janet Clarke

her's ideas are so numerous, it is difficult to know where to begin. His suggestions are beautiful rationalizations for the guilt-ridden. They provide a sturdy pair of crutches for those who are fearful and allow themselves to be brow-beaten by their families and bosses. His theory is one of the many developments in the new path — 'em-up-and-don-t-worry-if-they're-cured-or-not-just-get-'em-functioning schools of psychotherapy that are so in vogue due to the large number of people cracking under the strain of a high-speed, technological civilization.

But these suggestions are not a good guide to living!

Seabury's path to a happy, fulfilling life of self-indulgence is shown through fifty short case studies. People constantly come to him, unhappy because of their endless sacrifices for their families and when they follow his advice to the letter, they live happily ever after. If they don't, they are miserable for life.

The case studies are really not that credible.

What would Albert Einstein, Bertrand Russell, Abraham Lincoln, Francis of Assisi or Buddha have thought of The Art of Selfishness? Their entire lives show that they would have been appalled. What about those you admire least? What would Adolph Hitler, Richard Nixon or Howard Hughes have thought of it? Their whole lives have been spent following it. They wanted power, prestige, money and be damned whoever stops them.

The book is poorly written. Seabury's advice follows no organized pattern; it is merely one aphorism after another. And when his patients are cured, they all talk like him. Perhaps that is how he knows they are cured.

The Art of Selfishness David Seabury Pocket Books

David Seabury's book, The Art of Selfishness (the "self" is scored in colour) offers the downtrodden method of asserting themselves. He tells them to throw off the yoke of convention and get rid of the fear of "what will people think?". Of course, this makes sense. But he goes on to say that one must do only what is good for oneself. Do not do what you don't want to do. Other people's needs and wants come only after your own.

His two basic rules are: NEVER COMPROMISE YOURSELF and NO EGO SATISFACTION. The first tells you to do whatever you want; the second is supposed to be a restraint, keeping you from going overboard just for the hell of it.

The problems with this psychologist-turned-philosop-

On Strike
Six Key Labour Struggles in Canada 1919-1949
edited by Irving Abella
James Lorimer and Company
Toronto, 1974

"It is high time sumpin' was made of the Canadian Lumpen," Jimuel Briggs, a father of socialism in Canada, once remarked.

James Lorimer and Company, (formerly James Lewis and Samuel), continues in the vanguard of the nascent movement to make "sumpin'" of Canadian working people with the publication of On Strike.

On Strike, edited by Irving Abella, presents detailed accounts of six key Canadian strikes from the Winnipeg General Strike of 1919 to the Asbestos conflict of 1949. The other four strikes, although relatively unknown, are of equal importance.

Abella, guru of York University's labour history colony, believes the overwhelming emphasis in our historiography on the "peaceful evolution" of the Canadian nation, to the exclusion of the more violent aspects, has resulted in an "appalling" ignorance of the labour movement. One of the objectives of his book is to combat this ignorance by clear presentation of the facts of various strikes.

Implied in Abella's criticism of our traditional historiography are suggestions for a new direction. He points to the underlying themes of the state's relation to labour, and the prevalence of violence in industrial disputes as matters worthy of reflection and investigation.

Associated with any complex strike are names of hordes of politicians, company officials, and union representatives. Most of the strike accounts feature nearly as many characters as Watergate. Sit down to read On Strike with a clear head and a long pencil.

Only the ghost of Sir Robert Borden still clings to the theory that the Winnipeg General Strike was a Bolshevik-inspired revolution. D.J. Bercuson, in his article on the clash, agrees with the finding of two earlier students, Norman Penner, and D.C. Masters, that the general strike grew out of the refusal of employers to recognize and negotiate with the multi-union Metal Trades Council. Weaving together the elements of class polarization, social Darwinism, wartime inflation, and the various strikes of 1917, Bercuson masterfully recreates the texture of pre-strike Winnipeg.

Bercuson's summation shifts the focus from the traditional issue of motivation of the strike to his potentially fruitful insight into the reason for the strike's failure. Defeat, Bercuson says, resulted from the strike leaders' lack of comprehension of the implications of a general strike. It was not simply a regular strike on a larger scale. Decisions on the maintenance of essential services trapped the strikers into appearing to assume government prerogatives, a situation intolerable to constitutional authority which imagined itself threatened.

The Estevan coal miners' strike of 1931 again presents the acrimonious issue of union recognition. But concentration on that issue, during the strike negotiations, tended to obscure the vital matters of safety in the mines and substandard living conditions in company-provided hovels.

The "Black Tuesday" riot at Estevan made Winnipeg's Although thorough, S.D. Hanson's account of the conflict seems a little confused and disorganized. But, considering the bewildering complexity of the strike, the frenetic pace of events, and the attendant legal bureaucracy, this shortcoming is not serious.

Desmond Morton's article on the 1933 Stratford strike of furniture workers and chicken pluckers provides a humorous insight into the no-nonsense organization tactics of the Communist-dominated Workers' Unity League.

Nowadays the biggest political issue in Stratford is whether trucks should be allowed to rumble down Main Street after midnight. But in those radical Depression days, the ambitious WUL stumbled unawares into a real hotbed.

Having formed five locals in the furniture industry, WUL organizers, eschewing the bourgeois shibboleth of due process, presented employers with union demands one September morning, with directions to reply by 6 pm. The next morning, furniture workers were yanked out on strike.

Feathers were ruffled elsewhere in Stratford, when the League called out the predominantly female force of chicken pluckers at the Swift's factory.

Morton's laconic, low-key style lends a touch of impish irony to the feverish, earnest activity of the union organizers.

Certain chapters, most notably Fraser Isbester's on the Asbestos strike, are frustrating because of seemingly inadequate examination of the ramifications of events described. The scope of the book and restrictions on length necessitate that situation, but an empty feeling sometimes results. Abella's piece on the 1937 GM strike at Oshawa surmounts this problem in an excellent mix of description and analysis.

The Oshawa dispute focussed again on recognition of the workers' union. But UAW Local 200 was not just another union; it was affiliated with John L. Lewis' dreaded CIO, the harbinger of industrial unionism.

The CIO sit-down strikes at Akron and Detroit had visited terror on the hearts of capitalists all over the continent. And by God, blustered The Globe and Mail, and Ontario premier Mitch Hepburn, we'll never give in to that lot.

To reinforce RCMP and local police, Hepburn organized a group of armed volunteers to fight the "Red menace" at Oshawa. Many U of T students signed on with the Sons of Mitches, as the force was none too affectionately known among strikers.

The 15-day strike, Abella says, was a "turning point" in the history of the Canadian labour movement because the UAW's victory marked the birth of industrial unionism in Canada and provided impetus to CIO organization drives in mass production industries, and in the mines of northern Ontario.

The repercussions on provincial and federal politics are painstakingly analyzed, and the abrasive relationship between Hepburn and Mackenzie King comprehensively chronicled.

Strife in the auto industry also forms the context for David Moulton's investigation of the Windsor Ford strike of 1945, from which emerged the "Rand Formula", a corner stone of post-war labour relations. A union activist in a meat-packing plant, Moulton is the only non-academic among the writers of the six accounts.

Particularly interesting is his probe of the internecine struggle within UAW ranks between the CCF and the communist Labour Progressive Party. Unfortunately, the extent to which the division crippled the UAW during contract negotiations is not really clarified.

Through spectacles a quarter-century thick, (to borrow Fraser Isbester's phrase), the reader of On Strike may be seduced by the illusion that these bitter industrial conflicts are a thing of the past. But only last year, management and labour at North York's Artistic Woodwork plant clashed over the basic issue of union recognition.

Ontario's labour relations law, which governs collective bargaining, now excludes farm workers, household servants, policemen, firemen, and teachers. The employment standards act deems farm workers unworthy of the minimal protection provided by minimum wage, child labour, and hours of work provisions.

Estevan coal miners who asked for more in the days before union organization were told to pack up their tools, get out and move elsewhere if they were dissatisfied. Many Canadians still face that bleak reality.

On Strike is the first of a series of labour history books planned by Abella and his colleagues. The battles of labour in British Columbia and the Atlantic provinces are earmarked for early treatment in the series. Judging from the quality of On Strike, we can look forward with enthusiasm to the appearance of these pioneering studies.

Spectacular Boris Gudonov the climax of the season

If the management of the Varg would give me the whole Review section to work in this week, I might be able to do a really complete review of Boris Gudonov. In a short space like this, it's pretty hard to give all the details of an opera that involves 350 costumes, 8 massive scene changes, 85 chorus members, 23 singing principals, and so on. This is by far the biggest production ever mounted on the opera stage in this country, and despite some serious flaws, it's also the most thrilling.

Boris is more than just a Texan's nightmare music drama, of course. Probably, in the depths of operatic obscurity, there are mammoth works of forgotten composers that make this story of Russia's past seem like chamber music; but for the established repertoire, a production of Boris ranks with anything Wagner ever wrote. The title character must carry much of the blame or praise in any performance. The COC is fortunate to have Don Garrard. Garrard is a musical Gibraltar, a performer whose abilities never flag, even when he has to carry around what must be the heaviest costume ever created.

There's another titan in the cast. William Wildermann, as Pimen, the monk. Where other singers sounded muddy, fighting against the O'Keefe acoustics, Wildermann's notes range out clear and strong. Words can't describe this man's talent. Just go see, listen and marvel.

Sets and costumes in this show have been talked to death, it's true, particularly the ones in the vast coronation scene. Actually, that scene is short in comparison to some of the others. So much work is required to change the sets between scenes that the lights are raised and the audience is left sitting for up to ten minutes at a time. Perhaps the otherwise splendid sets could have been built to allow multiple use.

However, that's really a quibbling point. When you see the splendor of these scenes, you'll forget the waiting time. The same is true of the costumes. They were executed by Malabar's, and that august firm has outdone itself. When Boris is crowned, the jewels placed in his hands barely outshine the ones adorning his robes.

Doubtless the opera will become a permanent part of the repertoire for years to come. I look forward to seeing it again.

The Night No One Yelled: A necessary play

With newspaper headlines glaring their stories about prison horrors the Tarragon Theatre has managed to open The Night No One Yelled right on cue.

Dedicated to the inmates of Collins Bay Penitentiary in Kingston, the play is written by Peter Madden who has spent about twenty of his thirty-four years behind locked doors. After premiering appropriately in the Penitentiary The Night No One Yelled moved to Montreal where it was produced by the Beggars Workshop Theatre. Bill Glasco, the artistic director of the Tarragon, seems to have a sixth sense about topical social drama and quickly brought it to Toronto just in time to have stage illusion fuse with current events.

The oppressive, confining experience of prison plays is sometimes hard to take. There is after all no escape. This play works first of all to emphasize that point: guards stand hostilely in the aisles while the members of the audience find their seats, night sounds of a prison precede the stage action and just as the play begins a metal door clangs shut trapping the audience in the theatre or imaginatively in the prison.

The nine inmates of the play are shown behind the skeleton structure of a tiered arrangement of cells each with its own cot, toilet and solitary occupant. None of the characters ever moves out of his own small space, necessitating that the movement of the play come from the cross-fire, the shifts, turns and halts of the dialogue. On its simplest level the play is about these people and what they say to and about each other one night in prison; a night that is like so many other nights.

But built into this night is the fact that two younger inmates have escaped and that one of the men on stage has refused to provide the map without which capture is inevitable. That capture, clawing, desperate and final, is the end-note of the play.

Unfortunately the addition of Gil Vivland as the elderly prisoner to the escape and capture to this human drama seems an unnecessary thrill seeker. It can only be played melodramatically adding a redundant message to a case that is already black and white. Prisons are inhuman institutions breeding only despair, vengeance, fear and degradation. We know this from what the inmates reveal as well as from what the headlines say. But for the most part Madden and director Peter Duffy present their position with restraint and allow the immediate experience of the prisoners' conversation to dominate. The drama, then, as a weapon, not as a platform for a political treatise on the necessity of prison reform.

The nine characters represent a certain stereotyped cross-section of a predictable cell-block: the homosexual, the heavy, the thinker, the black, the autistic old man and so on. And yet they are a powerful and brave ensemble. Although some assume more importance than others, each is clearly defined. Gil Vivian as the old man does not say a word for the entire performance. But throughout the play, as he caresses an old straw rag-doll, he creates a portrait that haunts long after the play ends.

Mina Erian Mina as the aggressive Rocky and Peter MacNeill as the intellectual Harry, who is trying to make the best of a bad situation, are also strong focal points. But even more memorable is Michael Fernandes' Ralph who wants out after eight years. Fernandes conveys not only an incredible yearning but also the component element of fear that he will not be able to cope once he is out. Mina, MacNeill, Fernandes, together they, and each member of the cast, portray a spectrum of injustice and thwarted humanity. It is not a happy, pleasant or perhaps even likeable play but it is a necessary one.

sandra souchotte

Successful as a matter of course?

One hesitates to speak only in superlatives when describing a performance, for fear of being considered nondiscerning. For the Orford Quartet, however, I have nothing but raves, bravos and shouts of encore, encore.

Last Sunday in Walter Hall of the Edward Johnson Building, The Orford Quartet, quartet in residence at the Faculty of Music, performed the first in a series of three concerts, thrilling a highly attentive audience and positively asserting their pre-eminence in the field of string quartet music in Canada.

The program consisted of three works, Haydn's quartet in C major, Op.33, No. 3, Mendelssohn's Quartet in A minor, Op.13, No. 2, and Beethoven's quartet in C major, Op.59, No. 3.

This varied selection not only offered listeners a variety of musical styles, but enabled the performers to exhibit their exquisite versatility and technical expertise.

The Haydn was played incisively and wittily, each voice clearly defined yet never obtrusive. The quartet handled the Mendelssohn with equal ease, lithely moving from the tempestuous and dissonant first movement through to the gentle closing statement of the fourth, conscious at all times of the necessity for distinct phrasing and flexibility of coloration.

Most successful was the Beethoven which demands from its interpreters an added emotionality for the full development of its dramatic intensity. The thrilling fourth movement, Allegro molto, was played with precision and dynamism, eliciting in particular the extraordinary virtuosity of both Martin St-Cyr, cellist and Terence Heimer, violinist.

Signals are transmitted continually, whether it be the slight nod of the head, a dip of the shoulder, the flash of the eyes or the delicate lifting of the bow.

As the concert progressed it became increasingly evident that these men enjoy playing and creating as a unit. This is a sine qua non for any ensemble hoping to achieve the level of musical homogeneity that the Orford has achieved.

On stage, the four show extreme sensitivity to one another physically as well as musically.

Each motion becomes a cue for the subtle entrance and exit of the interweaving voices.

This constant rhythmic interaction among the players added extra life to the performance, drawing the audience deeper into the action, enabling them to see, feel and hear the music being created.

Autumn's Arts Canada examines "sculpture as humanism" including a symposium on the subject by leading Canadian artists with some productive insights into the increasing potential for integrating sculpture with the modern environment and thus humanizing it. Also included is an interesting investigation of Walter Redinger's "1929-86" series of sculpture units recently completed for Scarborough College. For anyone who has been intrigued but mystified by this formidable and powerful invasion onto the campus the article may prove enlightening, philosophically if not aesthetically.

Pan Gallery, 461 Sackville St., just east of Parliament, is showing a retrospective of graphic works by Charles Pachter, including some of the Toronto "Streetcar" series and some really lovely poem-prints with texts by Margaret Atwood and Alden Nowlan. Until October 27. More about "Pan" and Charles Pachter in next week's issue.

Again this week, a strong lineup of concerts has been planned for all over the city. Tonight at Con Hall, SAC is able to claim its first sellout of the year with George Carlin. Saturday night has Canned Heat at Seneca College for a "bargain boogie" at $3.99, while Kris Kristofferson and his wife Rita Coolidge are at Massey Hall.

Sunday the 13th brings the classy, soul-oriented show of Tower of Power to Massey Hall for their first Toronto appearance in over a year. Monday the 14th and Wednesday the 16th both offer well-packaged shows of singer-songwriters. Monday features the witty and bitingly humorous Randy Newman with noted guitarist Ry Cooder. Wednesday has the incredible duo of Bonnie Raitt and Jackson Brown. Both shows at Massey Hall at 8:30 pm.

Yiannis Markopoulos and Nikos Xylouris, two Greek folk singers, are at Massey Hall on the Tuesday.

October 19 Lou Reed returns to Massey Hall for another of his out-of-the-ordinary shows. Sunday the 20th a talented new Toronto group, Africanada, are at Con Hall for an interesting and inexpensive benefit concert. Tickets are available from SAC.

October 21 though, is the one to get especially excited about; that's the night Van Morrison returns to Toronto. Morrison, who on an average night stands above all peers, will play at the new Maple Leaf Garden's Concert Bowl. Tickets, if not gone by now, will vanish quickly, so act fast and don't miss what will probably be the best show this fall.

Around the club circuit there are some good acts to catch. Ellen McIlwaine closes out a satisfying week this Saturday at the Chimney, and is replaced next week by Bob and Danny McBride, two of the best rock musicians this city has ever produced. At the El Mocambo, the Downchild Blues Band closes out their gig Saturday night, with Diamond Back, featuring guitarist Mike McKenna, taking their place next week. As a special treat, MacLean & MacLean will be there on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. Egerton's others Bruce Roberts through Saturday and Terry Jones & Hummingbird all next week. The Riverboat features Diana Marcovitz tonight and tomorrow.

The Opera season draws to a close this weekend, rounding out the COC's most successful season ever. Over 36 performances, the estimated audience was 95 percent capacity or better. If you want to take in the show, you've got three chances left: tonight, Verdi's La Traviata is on tap. It's a splendid show, starring Maria Pellegrini as Violetta, Ruggero Bondino as Alfredo and Cornelis Ophthof as the elder Germont. Ophthof, it's just been announced, will be making his debut at the Met in the 1975-76 season; he'll sing in several productions, including Bellini's I Puritani with Joan Sutherland.

Traviata, like all the COC productions this year, is blessed with splendid costumes and really imaginative set design. Different parts of the stage swing back and turn around, giving extreme flexibility of presentation. Top marks go to set designer Robert Darling. The first act was a bit of a disappointment, though: the orchestra, led by Brian Balkwill just couldn't get in sync with the chorus.

But after a few rough spots, the show really picks up. Pellegrini, Bondino and Ophthof are just fine. If you're a sucker for tearjerker — as I am — Violetta's death will have the taps on full... Pellegrini does die well, no question about it. This is a Traviata to revel in, despite its occasional creaky moments. As the only Italian work on the COC program this year, it had to be good. And it is.

Tomorrow afternoon is your last chance to see Faust. Jerome Hines' Mephistopheles is sung so well that you'll find yourself rooting for the old devil. And tomorrow night at 7:45, catch the final run of Boris Gudonov, the spectacular and moving historical opera by Mussorgsky. Don Garrard and William Wildermann (Boris and Pimen, respectively) share top honours for this work. Amazingly, their powerful singing leaves a greater impression in your mind than the sets and costumes — and that takes some doing. Don't miss it.

Is the 13th century your cup of mead? If so, you can catch a performance by the Early Music Quartet next Thursday. Student tickets are just $2 with ID and if you're super-cheap you can come around to the EJB at 2:10 pm for a free preview concert.

WOMEN'S Intercollegiate Badminton Try-Outs
TUESDAY OCTOBER 15
 4-6 p.m.
 Benson Building, Upper Gym

By MIKE ROSSETTI
 In interfaculty football action, a determined St. Mikes team defeated the men from Skule 13-7 to take sole possession of third place in first division play.

The engineers won the toss and received the Mike kickoff, but they couldn't put anything together and decided to punt. Lady Luck seemed to be on the engineers side as they promptly recovered their own punt but a sturdy St. Mikes' defence held the engineers at midfield and forced them to punt again.

St. Mikes opened their attack with a hard running game and were quite successful until the engineers stopped them cold on a third and short yardage situation.

Inspired by the defensive play, the plumbers penetrated into St. Mikes' territory and attempted a fieldgoal which was partially blocked, and recovered by St. Mikes.

On the first play from scrimmage

SMC gained big yardage on an off tackle play but the ball was literally robbed from the St. Mikes' back and skule took over at midfield. Harsh words were exchanged in this controversial play.

Skule began to march and with the help of penalties moved to the St. Mikes 31 yard line. Rick Favro then rambled 31 yds. for the major, Settino converted, and it was 7-0 for the engineers.

Who could stop the engineers now? A 105 yd. return of the ensuing kickoff by Tim Buckley was the answer with Liscio converting. The first quarter ended with the score 7-7.

So far the game was being played completely on the ground and not a single pass had been thrown.

St. Mikes stayed on the ground with straight power running. A series of penalties aided their drive and before you could say "skule" they were on the engineers' 7 yard line.

Kralavicius cracked over from the seven and it was 13-7. The convert attempt was blocked.

The Plumbers were far from being demoralized as they used Favro's hard running to get into St. Mikes territory.

The drive was stopped however and the ensuing skule field goal attempt was unsuccessful as the snap was fumbled.

Half time rolled along with the score 13-7 for the Mikes. This was all the scoring that was to be done in the game.

The third quarter was somewhat of a change as both teams came out passing but were ineffective and resorted back to the old handoff.

Stepping into the fourth quarter both teams were unable to mount consistent drives and it seemed like the game would end like this.

But St. Mikes' quarterback Pete Barbetta was to quickly stop this trend by driving St. Mikes with a well balanced ground and aerial attack to the skule 25. The skule defence tightened up though and forced St. Mikes to attempt a 31 yd. field goal which was blocked.

Time was now becoming a factor for the engineers. Could they mount a drive and score? The combination of Wolchuk to Favro was dominant in this attempt but the clock ran out and so ends another hard fought battle between St. Mikes and skule.

The skule coaches will have to take a hard look at those game films and try to put in a two minute drill before their next encounter with the jocks. Has anybody seen John Rauch?

Interfac Co-ed track and field results in

By RICHARD KEDZIOR

A week ago today the annual co-ed interfac track and field meet took place under somewhat cold and threatening conditions.

The wind was uncooperative but did not deter Victoria College who emerged as the Rowell Memorial Cup winners, emblematic of men's intramural track and field.

Vic had 127 points overall for the first place finish, followed by Engineering with 101 points. Both teams were blessed with good turns-outs.

PHE, last year's champs, finished third with 68 points, 40 of which came from McVarish a former Vic student. His efforts earned him the Cody trophy for the best individual performance.

Sharp of Knox broke the three mile record with a time of 13:51.0 beating the old mark of 14:45.0.

In general a good time was had by one and all. For Vic it was a very satisfying afternoon and for skule, there's always next year. Who knows, if they stop demolishing all those beers

Varsity were thwarted as York beat Blues 21-6.

Strand doesn't report facts just innuendos

By DAVE STUART

Does anyone out there read the Strand, Victoria College's student newspaper?

If you do, it has fallen upon the Varsity to correct certain inaccuracies and irresponsible reporting on the part of the editor David Manuel. Refer to the Oct. 10 issue of the Strand.

It is interesting, we think, how Mr. Manuel can report on a meeting that he did not attend, namely the board of reference called by the Intramural Sports Committee to discuss the protest lodged by Eng concerning the Eng-Vic football game on Oct. 2.

In fact, Mr. Manuel laments the fact that no Vic representative was at the meeting. Why then did Don Warner, Vic's athletic rep not attend the meeting? He was given proper notice. Let us tell you, Mr. Manuel. He did not attend because he could not be bothered. Further, Mr. Manuel, there is only one referee on the football field. He is paid $6.00 per game and the other officials are paid $5.00 per game.

In addition we question whether the decision shows a lack

Blues Rugby lose to York

By BOB ALGIE

On Wednesday Varsity played host to the York Rugby club and lost 21-6 to the firsts and 18-4 to the seconds.

It was a very disappointing game for the Blues as they contained the York squad in their own half of the field for most of the game.

All Blues could muster was two penalty kicks by Chris Bouris for six points.

Perhaps it was Blues' frustration in not being able to score that led to their defensive lapses. York had no trouble running up 21 points.

In the second's game Toronto scored first on a try by Paul Kitchen but York soon came back with one of their own.

Once again Blues lost it in the second half as York went on to score 18 points to win the match.

Blues face a tough schedule from this point on including five games in 15 days. They travel to RMC on Saturday, play McMaster next Wednesday, Western the following Saturday, and finally Guelph the following Thursday.

of confidence in the officials. If you were on top of the situation as claim to be Mr. Manuel, you would know that the very same referee worked two more games that same week.

The fact that neither the league nor the referee-in-chief had any objection to the same referee shows you are wrong, Mr. Manuel.

We suggest to you, Mr. Manuel, that you check the facts before writing a story. At the very least have some facts in your story.

Soccer Blues lose to Western

By JOHN COBBY

On Wednesday evening, the soccer Blues were beaten 1-0 by the Western Mustangs at Varsity Stadium, a result that could prove decisive for the destination of the divisional championship.

A casual observer could be forgiven for questioning whether this Toronto squad was the same team that played so well in Sudbury on Sunday.

When a team comes up flat, it can be either because the opposition does not allow it to play up to standard, or because the team itself is just incapable at the time of a coherent game, regardless of the opposition. The Blues' performance was a bit of both; indeed, the Western coach noted his team had played their best soccer of the season.

Due to other commitments (examinations, etc.), the Varsity opening lineup differed from the successful combination of Sunday.

Almost immediately it became apparent that one of the vital ingredients for integrated team play, a dominant and smoothly operating midfield, was lacking.

Once this essential link is faltering the defensive and offensive units are affected and cannot operate with complete assurance; what commenced as a localized malaise then spread throughout the team.

On Wednesday, the misfiring midfield player was Keith Hall showing a lack of mobility.

The Mustangs' midfield, in stark contrast, arranged with an economy of effort to be correctly positioned at all times and under almost every situation.

Although special mention should be made of Agenor Ferreira, who was rarely caught in possession, he was ably assisted by Bill Hook and Jim Wilson.

Hence the majority of the chances in the opening minutes fell to the visitors, but they were unable to capitalize on them due to the stout-hearted efforts of Geoff Crewe and Jude Robinson in defense, and on one occasion, an obliging goalkeeper.

This is not to deny that opportunities never fell to the Blues. They did mainly through corner kicks, but were cleared with minimum fuss.

After 25 minutes, coach Bob Nichol decided to revamp his midfield unit, moving Hall forward to his more accustomed attacking role, replacing him with Drew McKeown and Mike Hendricks.

Sometimes substitutes have an immediate positive influence on the game, whereas at other times the game itself influences them. In this case, the incoming tandem were given little time to galvanize a lethargic Blues team, as a goal was given up unnecessarily on the half hour.

Previously, the Blues left had on at least two occasions committed a gross soccer error, but escaped unpunished.

However such fortune could not last, and when Ben Leefer, deep in his own half, passed inaccurately into the middle of a field congested with opponents, the Mustangs intercepted the ball, and moved it quickly through an off-balance defence.

The final shot was administered by Roman Schneider, who coolly slid the ball past the onrushing Ivan Peruso into the right corner of the net.

The Toronto squad spent the remainder of the first half reorganizing after this setback and were unable to obtain the desired equalizing score.

On the restart the Blues pressed, such that Ferreira was driven back to a more defensive position. A penetrating through pass from Hendricks was narrowly flicked wide of the Western net by Ian McCluskey and a shot by Yannis Vassiliou flashed inches past the goalpost.

At this stage the Toronto teamplay at last showed some resemblance of efficiency, with Ian Harris setting up plays down a right wing patrolled by Vince Ierullo. In general, however, the final incisive touch was missing.

With the Blues having a territorial advantage and pressing forward for a goal, it was inevitable that the defensive cover would be undermined.

Thus the Mustangs also had their threatening moments, though Nick Dagg was unable to make good the threat due to the quick recovery of the home defenders, most notably Crewe.

Little went right for Toronto, with the frustrations of an off night being typified by the manner of missing the best chance of the game only five minutes from time.

A free kick was cunningly lofted by Crewe over the mass of leaping Mustang defenders, and fell into the paths of Vassiliou and Hall a bare ten yards from the net.

Neither judged the flight accurately, and, in attempting to volley the ball home, both slipped on the grassy turf.

Apparently, in addition to the team's disappointment at not performing up to standard, some players had miscalculated the state of the field, and had worn the wrong cleats?

Needless to say, after this escape, the London team redoubled its defensive effort and thus preserved the victory.

Bingo! Who will strike the lucky combination of Governing Council members? See page 3.

UTFA wants more $$$

The University of Toronto Faculty Association (UTFA) is demanding a 25 per cent increase in salaries for the forthcoming year. The Varsity has learned from reliable sources.

UTFA represents most of the 2,500 teaching staff at the university.

U of T vice-president and provost Don Forster, who is also chairman of the central budget committee, replied only, "You'll have to ask UTFA about that" when asked to confirm the report.

UTFA president Bill Nelson could not be reached for comment last night.

Forster did acknowledge, however, that a four-person committee had been set up to meet with UTFA, to try and prepare a joint salary proposal for U of T president John Evans.

Should the joint proposal fail, Forster said, separate submissions will be made.

The present average salary of the 2,500-member faculty is $20,000. A 25 per cent across the board increase would therefore cost the university $12,500,000.

University administrative staff last summer accepted a $200 inflation compensation.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch reacted with anger when told of faculty members' request.

"The cutback is going to affect the classroom directly," said Kanowitch. "The student is going to suffer from this."

Kanowitch claimed that with the size of the faculty demand measured against the rate of increase of government funding, the university would have to alter its spending priorities.

"We all know where those cutbacks will come from," said Kanowitch.

Terming the faculty demand "irresponsible," Kanowitch declared, "The faculty should have the good of the university at heart."

Architecture proposes to eliminate undergrads

If the architecture department has its way, the undergraduate program will be scrapped and the department's master's program will constitute the university's only architecture study program.

The recommendation is made in a four-page brief submitted yesterday to university provost Don Forster in response to his own Sept. 6 proposal to dissolve and restructure the Faculty of Architecture.

The faculty now consists of the architecture, landscape architecture and urban and regional planning departments.

The architecture department flatly rejects Forster's proposal that the department report to the dean of the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering.

"Such a situation would represent a connection, albeit symbolic, which is entirely inappropriate to the discipline of architecture," the brief maintains.

Instead, the brief, drawn up by a department task force of three staff and three students, recommends the architecture department report to the dean of the School of Graduate Studies "in all matters."

"Admission to the Master of Architecture program will be based on performance in certain pre-requisite courses sponsored through a Program of Visual Studies . . . in addition to the usual requirements of the School of Graduate Studies," the brief stipulates.

The visual studies program would be initiated by the architecture department and an undergraduate college be and open to all undergraduates.

The program would "correlate existing courses in visual studies and generate new ones. Its primary purpose would be to give opportunities to all interested undergraduates to develop their creative abilities through experimental workshop and studio programs in all visual fields."

While the department agrees with Forster's proposal to dissolve the Faculty of Architecture and disperse its three present departments elsewhere, the brief suggests an eventual "new alignment of allied professional programs be considered, forming a division of Professional Studies."

"In our professional, or as we now see them, graduate programs," the brief explains, "a diversification appears to be possible."

"We foresee professional programs arranged primarily to deal with the difficult-to-predict future rather than arranged to service an existing profession . . ."

The brief also maintains too many "young people apply (to the present undergraduate) program without he proper preparation for such a decision."

"If they change their minds (after enrolment), they are immediately penalized by the non-transferability of program credit."

The brief stresses "greater accessibility" to architecture's programs than is presently possible.

The undergraduate architecture department, it points out, has developed creative pedagogical processes of workshop and project-oriented programs "which can benefit the university at large."

The architecture department's alternate proposals were strongly criticized by landscape architecture department chairman Richard Strong, who called them "terribly naive."

Strong maintained a need still existed for an undergraduate program in architecture or in any professional program.

Strong wants to see the Faculty of Architecture's three departments stay together under one renamed body amalgamated with the present Faculty of Forestry.

However, Alan Waterhouse, chairman of the urban and regional department—a graduate program—wholeheartedly supports "the notion of a strong graduate program" in architecture.

Pointing out that the present graduate architecture program is "a very strong one," Waterhouse noted the most successful architecture departments across the continent are graduate programs.

Urban planning has come out in favor of Forster's proposal to move the department to the School of Graduate Studies.

All proposals are now in the hands of Forster, who is to set up a sub-committee of Governing Council's academic affairs committee to review restructuring recommendations.

Architecture departments disagree

In response to university proposals to dissolve the Faculty of Architecture, two of the faculty's three present departments have come up with alternate proposals.

Only the graduate department of urban and regional planning has accepted university provost Don Forster's proposal to move that department to the School for Graduate Studies.

"This shift reflects the continuing evolution of urban and regional planning toward a multi-disciplinary position and away from a dependence on any single discipline," Alan Waterhouse, chairman of the department, says in a brief to Forster.

The Faculty of Architecture's landscape architecture department is the only of the faculty's three present departments to advocate they all remain together under one faculty.

In a memorandum to Forster, landscape architecture chairman Richard Strong accepts Forster's proposal that landscape join the Faculty of Forestry in a renamed faculty—but only on the condition it also include architecture and urban planning.

Strong's memo, as well as statements to Forster from the architecture and urban planning departments, were all arrived at through meetings and discussions with staff, students, alumni and members of each department's respective provincial professional association.

In an interview, Strong said he was disappointed at the proposals of the faculty's other two departments.

"They want to pull out and forget it," Strong said.

Waterhouse refers to the "grossly inadequate state of our existing facilities" at College and Huron Streets and welcomes Forster's proposal to move the department to new quarters.

Forster has said the university will not appoint a new dean to the Faculty of Architecture when G. D. Scott's present one-year term as acting-dean terminates this summer.

Alternate proposals and comments on Forster's Sept. 6 recommendations for restructuring the architecture faculty were to be submitted to him by yesterday.

A sub-committee of Governing Council's academic affairs body is to be set up to review all proposals.

Composition debate gets underway

The Governing Council of the University of Toronto meets again tomorrow to consider its size and composition.

The Council, U of T's top governing body, was set up by the provincial government in July, 1971, and began operating one year later. It superseded the university's Board of Governors and Senate.

Changes in the university's governing structure must be approved by the provincial government, and the 1971 U of T Act specifies that a review of the council's performance must take place within two years.

The current review is the continuation of a debate postponed from early this summer — the council should have made recommendations by this time.

The "governing structure" controversy has had a long and stormy history at this university.

Following widespread student dissatisfaction with the extra-university, businessmen-controlled Board of Governors, a body known as the Commission on University Government (CUG) was set up to reform the university's governing structure.

The nine-member commission, composed of four students, four faculty members and then-president of the university (Claude Bissell), held countless hours of hearings and debate before recommending:

"That there be established a sole governing authority with final control over all financial and academic matters within the university.

"That the membership of the Governing Council of 66 members be distributed in the following manner: 20 lay members

20 elected students
20 elected academic staff
6 ex-officio members."

Following CUG's recommendation, a University-wide Committee was set up to implement the report. Although speedy implementation had been expected, faculty members' resistance brought countless delays, overturning their previous commitment to allow the report to go directly to the provincial government.

By July of 1971, the matter was in the hands of the provincial government, under the direction of then-university affairs minister John White.

White introduced a draft U of T Act bill which would revise the then existing U of T Act (1947), recommending a 42-member council, with six students, 10 faculty, 14 government appointees, six alumni, two administrators, two presidential appointees, the president and the chancellor.

Days of frantic lobbying by students and faculty followed: students won praise for the strength of their argument, and the faculty were condemned for the use of threats and intimidation.

(At one point, faculty members threatened to close down the university if parity was "imposed" from above.)

What emerged from the debate was a 50-member council of 12 faculty, eight students, 16 government appointees, eight alumni and six administrators.

Student leaders at the time angrily denounced the government decision as a "cave-in" to faculty pressure.

However, as a concession to student leaders, White promised that "the review (will) be two years from the date of proclamation rather than five years. It seems to me that an opportunity will be given in the foreseeable future for students to make their case again."

Committee last year recommended parity

Required to come up with restructuring proposals by the spring of 1974, the Governing Council last fall struck a committee to make recommendations.

The Hallett Committee, named for its chairman, University College principal Archie Hallett, held several meetings early last spring.

The committee's final report recommended the present 50-member Council be enlarged to a 62-member body with 12 faculty and 12 student members.

Twelve faculty and eight students now sit on the council.

But when the Hallett report was passed on to the council's executive committee, the executive rejected the report and suggested instead Council defer consideration of restructuring until this fall.

After a long debate, council acquiesced at its June meeting and voted to undertake a "thorough" review of size and composition this fall.

Student members of council walked out of the meeting after the deferral vote, declaring, "We no longer have any faith in the ability of the Governing Council to review its composition in a fair and impartial way."

Briefs to the council on composition — 27 were received — were due by Oct. 1.

Council will decide the principles which should govern its composition at tomorrow's meeting.

Old chestnut of parity rolls around campus

One of the most confusing words bouncing around university politics is an old chestnut called 'parity'. It's no simpler to define than the word 'equality' — so many possible definitions can be used.

However, parity, as it is understood by students at this university, revolves around two specific instances: faculty-student parity (equal representation, but not necessarily complete representation, between teaching staff and students); and internal-external parity (equal representation between members belonging to the university and those from outside).

The joint student brief to the Governing Council upholds both principles.

On the subject of student-faculty parity the student brief calls for 14 students and 14 faculty on a council of 66 members

But the nature of internal-external parity is more complicated.

The internal membership of the council would be made up as follows:

- the president, an ex-officio member
- 14 student members
- 14 faculty members
- four administrative staff members, for a total of 33.

The external membership of the council would include:

- four municipal representatives
- 21 government appointees
- eight alumni members, for a total of 33.

Council boasts big business reps

One of the chief criticisms directed against the present governing council is that it is too heavily comprised of businessmen.

Certainly, a perusal of the holdings of many of the 16 government appointees supports that view. Included among Bill Davis' chosen few are:

- Malim Harding, chairman of the council; chairman of Harding Carpets Ltd.; director of Union Gas Ltd., Confederation Life Insurance Co. and the Toronto-Dominion Bank.
- William Harris, president, Harris and Partners Ltd., and Harris and Partners Securities Ltd.; director, The Mercantile and General Reassurance Co., Storrington Investment Co. Ltd.;
- Gordon Fisher, vice-president and managing director, Southam Press Ltd.; director, Southam Printing Ltd., Southam Business

Publications Ltd., Gazette Printing Co. Ltd., National Business Publications Ltd., Southstar Publishers Ltd., Sun Publishing Co. Ltd., Selkirk Holdings Ltd., CKOY Ltd., Windsor Star Ltd.;

• Sydney Hermant, president, Imperial Optical Co. Ltd., director, Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, North American Life Assurance Co., People's Jewellers Ltd.;

• C. Mackenzie King, director, Canadian Glazed Papers Ltd., Harvey Woods Ltd.;

• Hon. Daniel Lang, counsel, Lang, Michener, Cranston, Farquharson and Wright; director, P.L. Robertson Manufacturing Co. Ltd., Proctor Ltd.;

• W.J.D. Lewis, president, Canadian operations of the Prudential Insurance Co. of America; president, Prudential

Growth Fund Canada Ltd.; director, Crown Trust Co.;

• John Tory, partner, Tory, Tory, Deslauriers and Binington; vice-president and director, Scottish and York Holdings Ltd.; director, Abitibi Paper Co. Ltd., H.W. Bacon Co. Ltd.; Canadian South African Gold Fund Ltd., Richard DeBoo Ltd., Rogers Radio-Broadcasting Ltd., Rogers Cable Communications Ltd., the Royal Bank of Canada, Scottish and York Insurance Co.;

• W.O. Twait, vice-president and director, Royal Bank of Canada; That's nine out of 16 community 'representatives' on Governing Council for business. Business wins with an outright majority over the people.

Evans confesses he doesn't believe in more parity debate

"... I personally don't believe that further prolonged debate on the issue of parity itself is likely to produce much in the way of benefits from that debate. But I think that debate has the real disadvantage of diverting the energy and effort of the university into this field rather than to proceed in what I perceive to be the more primary functions of the university, its programs and purposes.

"The only problem with this debate is that it tends to polarize, it has in the past and it will again, and if, as some have pointed out, this is extended to a debate on parity representation on the councils and committees throughout the university, this process will be expanded further.

"I recognize the very valuable contribution that all sorts of groups can make to the formulation of policy on the Governing Council. I don't think there's any doubt in any of our minds about that matter, but I must say I have not been persuaded by any arguments for precise, numerical balance in the terms of internal, external, faculty and student numbers.

"And from a personal view I feel very strongly that we have not dealt with the matter of deans, directors, and principals, and I take responsibility for having failed to put this case forward strongly to the sub-committee (to review the University of Toronto Act) ...

"... Whatever changes are considered I think that it is awfully important for this Governing Council to recognize the role and contribution of its faculty members and if the changes that are introduced are of the type that dilute or diminish the contribution of those individuals, or symbolize a lack of importance or appreciation of those contributions, then I don't think the university or the Governing Council will benefit from them.

U of T president Evans addressing Governing Council June 20, 1974

Faculty find council trusty but unused it may be rusty

An emergency meeting of the rarely convened Arts and Science faculty council today at 4:15 pm is to decide on a motion opposing any increase in the present ratio of student to faculty representation on the Governing Council.

The special meeting, requested by over 150 faculty members, is the second of the faculty council in the last four years, and comes a day before Governing Council is to debate changes in its composition.

The faculty council is composed of 1,300 faculty members and 50 students.

Students are urged to attend this meeting today at the Medical Sciences Building, Room 3153.

Who runs this scoreboard, anyway?

Trying to keep track of the numbers on the Governing Council is only slightly less confusing than counting Argo fumbles. However, it's still a difficult task, and to ease your consumption of aspirin over the numbers games, here is The Varsity Box Score of the Governing Council:

RAG will recycle campus rags

Recycling of resource materials is practically unheard of at U of T. Only the computer science department, afloat in input cards and ticker tape, is engaged in a concerted recycling program. The Recycling Action Group (RAG), currently in the embryonic stage, aims to extend the resources recycling program on campus into as many fields as possible.

As you may have guessed, RAG's primary interest is newspaper. Some 60,000 copies of The Varsity appear every week.

Lately we've been flooded with Erindale's Medium II, other college papers and the sheets of every student federation in the country. And when Toke Oike stakes up the presses — great Gutenberg!

RAG needs you! Not just students, but teaching staff, administrators, professional agitators and university employees. Volunteers will not be asked to work more than one-half hour a week. Please come to one of our two organizational meetings:

- Wednesday, Oct. 16
Sid Smith Rm. 1085, 3-4 pm
- Friday, Oct. 18
Sid Smith, Rm. 2110, 12-1 pm

If you find it impossible to attend either meeting, a RAG organizer may be contacted by calling 244-9621 (between 7 and 9 pm only).

The focus of RAG's activities is the St. George campus; students at Scarborough and Erindale Colleges are encouraged to form similar organizations.

RAG hopes students and kitchen staff in residences will take the initiative in organizing efforts to recycle cans and bottles.

Our sentiment is that of Canadian poet Gwen McEwen in The Shadow Makers: "We are in sympathy with the fallen trees."

No room for threats this time

The importance of the decision to be made Thursday by the Governing Council cannot be underemphasized.

The decisions reached Thursday, and subsequently ratified by Queen's Park, will most likely stand until 1980, by which time a five-year review period will have elapsed.

Once again, faculty, administrators and government will be faced with a demand that has persisted for years and will continue to do so as long as students are frustrated. Parity is not a cause which students take lightly.

In 1971, students came very close to achieving parity on the Governing Council, only to be outmanoeuvred in backroom politicking at Queen's Park.

Moreover, the two large Toronto newspapers jumped on the students' back, implying that the parity cause was one for wild-eyed revolutionaries who would use their representation as an excuse to dismantle the state.

This year, things are different. Not only have such groups as the Alumni Association supported parity, but even the Globe and Mail, that bastion of conservatism, has acknowledged the reasonableness of the student position, and crept to the very edge of actually supporting it.

From being "irresponsible" students now show "responsible authorship", of a brief which is "free from pyrotechnics, and is large reasonably, closely and well argued," says the Globe.

This time around, there will be no excuse for discussing the student position on anything other than its own merit. Faculty members who persist in using threats in the Governing Council or at Queen's Park will find no favor either inside or outside the university.

If faculty want to duel with students, they must do it as if they were gentlemen.

Joint student brief supports more representative council

The following brief has been submitted to the Governing Council of the University of Toronto by the undersigned student organizations.

Student Brief on Amendments to the University of Toronto Act, 1971 Concerning Size and Composition of the Governing Council and the Executive Committee

Introduction

The students on this campus are very concerned with the amendments to be made to the University of Toronto Act, 1971. Based on discussions with as many students as possible and on positions taken by various student organizations in the last eight years, the students' major foci of change centre on two issues:

A) that the number of student representatives on the Governing Council and the Executive Committee be raised to 1) establish equal representation between faculty and students; 2) lighten the work-load on student members; 3) allow for representation from constituencies that the present numbers makes impossible

B) that the government appointees be more representative of the taxpayers of Ontario and of those directly affected by the physical presence of the university.

These two issues are translated into specific recommendations appended to this brief. The recommendations call for an equal number of faculty and students on the Council (14 each) and on the Executive Committee (4 each). The proposals maintain internal-external parity, but call for broader community representation, listing several areas from which lay appointees will be drawn.

A. Number of Students

The central reason for the need to raise the number of student representatives on the Governing Council is to establish equal representation between faculty and students on the top governing structure of the university. Students must have a significant voice in the formulation of policies which directly affect them if they are to respect those policies. In this case "significant representation" means parity in numbers with the other major constituency in the university community, the faculty.

The Commission on the Government of the University of Toronto summed up the arguments in favour of parity in this way:

"The 'numbers game,' as the Commission has learned in its discussions of the proportions of membership to be recommended for the various groups on the Governing Council, can be played ad infinitum, ad nauseum. It becomes meaningful only if one assumes that each estate votes as a monolithic bloc. Anyone who has attended a meeting of members of the academic community—be they teaching staff or students—will know how unlikely it is for such unanimity to develop "Numbers also have a psychological value in group interaction through discussion. For this reason we have accepted parity in the representation of students and teaching staff. . . . Any-one of the estates, if given merely nominal representation, is likely to contribute less, to be more diffident in discussion, and to regard the body they serve as much less credible than if all are on roughly equal terms. In any event, under the proposed arrangement, no one estate (even assuming it thought and voted alike) is in a position to dominate the policy-making forum."

It is obvious that the issue of parity on the Governing Council is related to demands for effective representation in other areas of the university, and that some faculty members will be upset by a decision in favor of parity. But the following should be kept in mind when considering these points:

1) parity on the Governing Council involves parity between faculty and students in a body containing many intermediary groups. In this proposal, students would constitute only one fifth of the total body—a far cry from 50 per cent or absolute control.

2) the history of the debate on the composition has been one of bitterness and polarization for students because of the way in which discussions around the Top Governing Structure have been handled by the University. Faculty vehemently opposed to this change will soon realize that an equal number of faculty and students on the Governing Council is not at all threatening. On the other hand, maintaining the status quo or altering it only slightly, will not mean a gradual lessening of student alienation from Council and its decisions.

With regard to the Executive Committee, the 1971 Act allows for only two student members. This means that each year, either the graduate students or the part-time students are not represented on this increasingly powerful body. The number of students should be increased to four to allow a part-time student, a graduate student, a full-time Arts & Science student and a full-time professional student to sit on this committee.

B. Community Representation

The era when University Boards were composed of wealthy benefactors is at an end. Private donations no longer provide the primary support for the university. It is essential that all taxpayers (labour as well as business) and those directly affected by the University be specifically included in the members appointed by the government.

This matter is fundamental. The student brief supports an increase in the number of government appointees only if they are drawn from a wider spectrum of Ontario society than is now the case.

It is expected that organizations would nominate members from their groups and that these nominees would be confirmed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. The details of this selection process would be set out by Orders in Council as is the case with the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education Act. These appointees would bring their particular perspective to bear in the discussions of Council but they would not be spokespersons for a specific constituency.

How the Governing Council deals with the section of the Act will indicate to the people of Ontario how concerned the university community is with effective cooperation between the academic and the outside community.

This common student brief may be supplemented by briefs from student groups or individual students, but it summarizes the concerns of most students with regard to the composition of the top governing structure of this university.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR CHANGES

Recommendation 1:

The Governing Council shall be composed of,
 (a) the President, who shall be an ex officio member;
 (b) four members from the municipalities in which the main and the two satellite campuses are located;

(c) twenty-one members, none of whom shall be students, members of the non-academic staff or members of the teaching staff, appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the minister, divided in the following manner: representatives from community groups from the areas immediately adjacent to the St. George Campus; representatives from Ontario labor organizations; representatives from Ontario business organizations; representatives from Ontario students' organizations; representatives from Ontario teachers' organizations; representatives from Ontario, to be nominated by the Social Development Committee.

(d) fourteen members elected by the teaching staff from among the teaching staff with two seats to be provided for the part-time teaching staff;

(e) fourteen members, eight of whom shall be elected by and from among the full-time undergraduate students, three of whom shall be elected by and from among the graduate students, and three of whom shall be elected by and from among the part-time undergraduate students;

(f) four members elected by the non-academic staff from among the non-academic staff;

(g) eight members who are not students or members of the teaching staff elected by the alumni from among the alumni.

This replaces section 2 (2) of the present Act, which stipulates the present composition of the Governing Council as:

(a) Chancellor and President, ex officio members
 (b) 2 members appointed by the President from among the officers of the university.

(c) 16 members appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council

(d) 12 teaching staff.

(e) 8 students (4 full-time undergrad.; 2 part-time; 2 graduate)

(f) 2 non-academic staff.

(g) 8 alumni.

University of Toronto. We never stopped feeling somewhat like a step-person (in Cinderella fashion) during that time, partly because of our apparent ostracism by the University's student population. Your reviews of the Chinese archaeological exhibition in Friday's issue were read with great interest by all members of this Department, though the ROM now functions as an independent institution. We are truly gratified by this surge of attention. I hope, therefore, that you will not find me churlish if I take up a few points in the articles by Messrs. Michel Lambert and John Wilson.

Paper cutouts flourish

I was really amazed when your correspondent, Mr. Michel Lambert, in his article "Are there no sinologues in Canada?" (published in the Varsity on October 11, 1974), asserted that "Even such innocent folk art as paper cut-outs have been killed by forced socialist-realism and the dogma of Chinese-style Marxism." The author was asking Canadians "to take a discerning look at what is happening to Chinese traditional art under Communism."

It was simple coincidence that I just had a few packets of recent Chinese paper cut-outs beside me when I read the article. I personally had come across at least several hundred different varieties of them which range from sceneries to buildings; flowers to lion dances; and from musical instruments to ping-pong. All these are recent products from the People's Republic.

Your author may think of other "innocent folk arts". But other works, like embroidery; bamboo and shell painting; wood, stone and ivory sculpture; have never been so flourishing as the present. In Old China, an artisan never dared to teach his apprentice all his skills because he was afraid that the latter would grasp all his business after graduation. Now, the artisans, with secure income and welfare (which is not eaten by inflation), are only too happy that their apprentices surpass them in achievement. Numerous handicraft workshops are in operation and, where feasible, are helped by delicate machinery.

By making irresponsible assertions, some people are really "picking a stone to throw it on their own feet". The more grand the words they use, the bigger is the stone.

Chinese exhibition defended

For over a decade the Royal Ontario Museum was a part of the

The exhibition was arranged at the national level, and not on an institution to institution basis. It is a loan from the people of China to the people of Canada. The questions about "politics of art" and "art of politics" are answerable in this context. The exhibition is presented from the point-of-view of the lender. In the People's Republic of China, as in the thinking of many contemporary intellectuals elsewhere, nothing is considered outside the realm of politics. Politics may be considered as the complex of social attitudes, techniques and institutions which permit effective functioning of large organizations.

Canadian modesty forces me to point out that the ROM houses only one of the best Chinese archaeological and art collections "outside of Peking". We have our particular strengths, which happen to complement the present exhibition admirably, but also many weaknesses. The policies of the People's Republic of China towards study of the past and other cultural matters have encouraged the development of provincial centres. Many hundreds of Torontonians, including a dozen or so within the University of Toronto community, have visited museums in China during the last two or three years. The ROM has sponsored several lectures by Canadians, Americans and Europeans about their experiences at site museums, provincial historical museums, preserved monuments etc. in China, as well as the great Palace Museum of Peking.

Finally, I should bring to your attention the many facilities for learning about Chinese archaeology, which have existed in Toronto for some years. The ROM has to be all things to all men. Our Education Department has kits, as well as tours, for school children. Our Women's Committee offers tours of the ROM's Chinese collections, as well as of the other Asian galleries, every week-day usually. This year, they present a special "Introduction to China" in our galleries as orientation for the exhibition. Departmental staff has been given courses in the University's Extension School for years. Doris Dohrenwend, Barbara Stephen and myself are members of the Department of East Asian Studies, and teach both undergraduate and graduate courses. The Department's Library has always been open to University students from 10:00 to 17:00 every weekday except holidays.

Pool hall scandalous

The proposal by the Kanowitch-SAC consortium to establish a pub and pool hall on campus is surely the most scandalous suggestion yet to come from a group quite obviously dedicated to outrage and profligate hedonism, ("we've got the bread, let's have a bash").

The argument for a central location for these "facilities" is too ridiculous to even consider: no point on campus is more than fifteen minutes walk to a drinking place. It is impossible to see why students' money should be used to provide a more immediate location; the same is true of pool halls.

"As for the pub being a "lounge-like quiet gathering place, where students can drop in anytime and relax," there is no reason to suppose that it will be any more quiet or relaxed than Union Station, if past examples are any indication.

What is to prevent the drunkenness, disorder and cacophony which characterize all pubs? (I can have no faith whatever in the proposed "managers" of these places; these guardians of the common-god will undoubtedly be yet more SAC-hacks accommodating their cronies and otherwise ignoring their responsibilities.)

The games room is in fact nothing more than a large-scale pacifier; that allegedly intelligent adults should be allowed, much less encouraged, to so dissolutely squander their time in such pursuits is a shame on the whole university community.

It is worth nothing that what is now the Arbor Room of Hart House was originally a billiard room. Even in the staid fifties such a place could not be properly maintained or managed, for which reason it was dismantled. How much worse will this latest extravaganza become?

Needless to say, it is a virtual certainty that both places, pub and pool room, will soon be filthy and damaged from misuse, overuse and vandalism. Above all it is a plan whose success is of interest to only a very small (deranged) part of the university community.

To be sure, I am aware that SAC has made some desultory, impotent attempts at social relevance, but on the whole their efforts are directed at the realisation of their own wayward dreams of an "academic" Shangri-La: a place where professors are pals, where exams are forbidden and where outright stupidity is no barrier to anything or anybody; a Garden of Earthly Delights in which asinine, fatuous amusement is everywhere available, and that eternally fraudulent panacea, alcohol, flows like water.

Citizen and SAC clarified

This letter comes in response to the letter written by Ann McRae and John Schildroth regarding the potential SAC grant to the Toronto Citizen.

First, as of yet, SAC has not granted any money to the Toronto Citizen. A grant of $1,000 has been approved by SAC's external affairs commission, but before it becomes final it must be approved by the council as a whole. It is not unusual for the council to overturn a commission's decision.

Secondly, at no point was a grant anywhere near $5,000 ever considered seriously. The most that was ever considered was $1,500.

Thirdly, the reason why a grant to the Citizen is even being considered in the first place is not because of "high ideals about preserving the real voice of the people," as the letter from Ms. McRae and Mr.

Schildroth suggests, but because of a much closer-to-home reason. There are a number of things which affect students at the U. of T. on a daily basis, which have as their cause factors which take place off campus. Tuition, for example is not determined by the U. of T. administration, but is in fact, determined by Queen's Park. OSAP awards, grants and loans, are determined by the provincial and federal governments. In order to produce beneficial changes in tuition and student awards, more than just student pressure is required. Public pressure on the government could be most instrumental in bringing about changes.

However, before the public can be expected to pressure the government, they must be informed in some way as to what the issues are. The Toronto Citizen has indicated to us that they would be more willing to give coverage to student issues than the Toronto Star, Globe and Mail, and Sun have been, and a grant to them is being considered in that light.

In order for SAC to be relevant to the needs and interests of students, it is vital that we receive some kind of feedback. The grant to the Toronto Citizen will probably be voted upon by SAC at its council meeting on October 29th. If between now and then students either phoned the SAC office at 928-4909 or wrote us at 12 Hart House Circle and indicated to us whether or not they considered the Toronto Citizen to be sufficiently relevant to the interests of students to warrant a grant, then this information would be most valuable in helping SAC make a responsible decision with respect to this matter.

Varg ran disgusting reviews

It disgusts me to read the criticisms which have recently been written about the Chinese Exhibition at the ROM. Self-professed art critics such as Tom Hallam, of The Varsity, and Michel Lambeth of Only Paper Today (a monthly devoted to writing about art in Ontario) reveal their small interest in art by their imbecilic reports on the Exhibition; Hallam, in an art watsup in the first Review issue of this year; and Lambeth, in an article reprinted in last Friday's Review.

It nauseates me that a person would actually publish, as Hallam did, as a criticism of the Exhibition, the fact that he could so easily get his brother in on a false student card!

Tom Hallam evaluates the exhibition as deficient because he left the exhibit "all eyes" and because he had gained little, if any, knowledge about early Chinese culture or history. Somehow, I find it perplexing that a person could be "all eyes" and yet forebode the archaeological, historical and geographical information distinctly presented throughout the chronologically arranged exhibition. The visitor does not only walk through the exhibition in a time sequence but also moves past wall cases in which only one or two objects are displayed, giving him the opportunity to absorb what he sees without missing anything of importance.

More nonsense is expressed in Michel Lambeth's dissertation on the Chinese Exhibition versus Canadian patriotism. Perhaps, we should reassure Lambeth that we won't love Canada less after seeing this ancient art from Communist China.

Lambeth is upset because the catalogue for the exhibition was printed and published in Great Britain. Possibly, the "Canadian Colonial Idiocy" would become a reality if we narrowed our minds and those of our children with only the fruits of Canadian literature.

It is just such doltsiness and such childishness which infiltrates and attempts to belittle, under the title of critic, one of the most educational exhibits of our time.

Game room means less crowding

I read the article concerning the SAC request for space for a games room and pub with great interest, and am anticipating the hoped for results. I think this recreation room idea will be immensely worthwhile as I'm hoping that twenty people will skip my Third World Countries history class to participate in the fun and games.

You see if at least twenty people don't show up it will better my chances of getting a seat during history. I don't really mind sitting on the floor during my classes but my vision isn't what it should be and I have trouble seeing the board, the professor and the front of the room through the sea of desks, people and podiums.

I don't really want to sound like I'm complaining but it really is a fire hazard with students on the floor blocking the aisles. If there were ever a fire they would either be trampled to death or the people in the seats could be trapped with no way out of the room.

The professor has tried to get a larger room but he's been told that there's no space available. I was wondering if SAC would use its pull to give him a hand because after all he's really a pretty nice guy and his class is a little like a case study on the countries of the third world: overpopulated and underdeveloped.

Citizen owners explain

The recent problems of the Toronto Citizen have caused great concern among many people—subscribers of the paper, financial contributors, supporters, those who are worried about the future of city politics and those who are interested in Toronto media independent from large corporate interests.

As the four people who last April negotiated a purchase of the paper from the staff union, we are of course most unhappy to find ourselves now in an acrimonious dispute with the union representing the paper's staff. In the circumstances we thought it would be useful to set out, as best we could, the events of the last few weeks, and what led up to them. We hope this brief history will be useful in giving a perspective to these events.

For those who wish to review the situation more closely, we would be pleased to send photocopies of any relevant documents. As well, we invite people to review our files, which are in John Sewell's office at City Hall.

At the present time, we still don't know if there will be a buyer for the Citizen. A buyer needs not only the purchase price (which we hope could be upwards of $25,000 which represents our gross liabilities), but also $20,000 to get the paper going again. We hope there are people in town other than ourselves who think the paper is worth investing in.

Ryerson student union gains temporary financial control

TORONTO (CUP) — The Students' Union at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute (SURPI) will maintain control of its financial affairs at least until the end of the month.

At a finance committee meeting of the Ryerson Board of Governors last Wednesday night, attended by several hundred students, a reprieve was given the union in the form of a re-negotiation of a controversial accountability clause the administration was trying to force on the union.

The clause will be re-negotiated by SURPI and the board's representatives and will be presented to the full Board of Governors on Oct. 30. The board could still enforce the full accountability provisions on the union depriving it of any effective control over its funds.

CONTROVERSY

The trouble at the Institute arose after a controversial interpretation by acting president George Korey of a signed memorandum of agreement between SURPI and Ryerson.

The agreement, signed Aug. 22, concerns the redistribution of students' activity fees, an increased portion of which SURPI was to receive.

Under the agreement SURPI would receive $19 per student per term over last year's $12.40 per term. This increase (approximately 40 per cent) amounts to $100,000 more per year in the union's budget.

The main bone of contention in the agreement involves the interpretation of a clause demanding "full accountability" of SURPI's expenditures to Ryerson.

Kortey, in a brief submitted to the board's finance committee last Wednesday, stated specifically that, "SURPI's fiscal accountability to the board of governors be similar to that of any academic or administrative department of Ryerson."

This includes drawing up the SURPI budget, submission to Ryerson's finance department and the financial committee of the Board of Governors for review, subsequent board approval and a report on union's expenditures by both the board and SURPI auditors.

THREAT

According to SURPI officials, Korey's recommendation is not the same agreement they signed Aug. 22. They called the agreement a blatant threat by the administration to destroy the "full autonomy" the union has enjoyed up to now.

It threatens SURPI's position as a "non-academic service organization" for the institute by treating it as "any other academic or administrative department within Ryerson," the union argues.

What's more, SURPI says, the original agreement "at no point . . . states that prior approval of SURPI budgets must be made by the Board of Governors."

Under such an agreement, says SURPI, the administration claims the right to disapprove any expenditure which SURPI proposes, clearly a threat to its independence.

SURPI special assistant Bill Reno said it was "completely without precedent in Canada" that students' unions' budgets have to receive prior administrative approval.

SURPI president Bruce Moran said the memorandum agreement signed in August "in no way intended that these (SURPI's) budgets be submitted to veto."

BUDGET

He felt a review of the SURPI budget was legitimate but the administration should not have "approval or disapproval power" on budget matters.

A possible administration fear that the increased SURPI funds will be abused may justify its extreme interpretation of "full accountability," Reno said. Nevertheless, he added, "no extra amount is worth sacrificing SURPI's autonomy."

At the finance committee meeting, student committee and Board member, Paul Mitchell, said "while the student activity fee is collected by the Institute, it has no claim on the use of those funds nor can they say they are theirs to administer."

"The student activity fee is added independently to the tuition fees of the Institute and are accountable to the students of Ryerson and not to the Institute or the Province of Ontario."

"The Board has no right to impose these measures on the student's union and to do so would cause great trouble within the Institute. The students will not take this lying down."

EXCEPTION

After considerable argument, the committee agreed to recommend to the full Board the original provisions of the agreement with the exception of the full accountability clause be approved.

Advisory Bureau services cut

By BOB ADOURIAN

The Advisory Bureau, a guidance service presently offered to U of T students, is operating on a far more limited basis than before because of a budget cut which took effect last year.

Founded in 1965 as an augmentation to the Health Services, the bureau's main role is to inform and advise students. It has also involved itself with other projects of student interest, such as informal campus surveys, counselling and formation of inter-disciplinary courses.

The bureau has a staff of six, four of whom hold cross-appointments in U of T teaching positions. The founder and present director is Dr. Don McCulloch, a psychiatrist.

Although the bureau is not a psychiatric counselling centre as such, McCulloch says he will use a psycho-therapeutic approach when necessary.

Many problems brought to the bureau are basic McCulloch says. Often, students simply can't find their way around campus or don't know who to contact when faced with a given situation. Some of the more complex problems need personal counselling.

A $22,000 budget cut announced by the administration in Dec. 1972 threatened to cripple the bureau to the point where it could not effectively operate. Many people, including McCulloch, felt the cut signalled an intention on the part of the university to phase out the bureau.

The bureau has been instrumental in starting many of the inter-disciplinary courses now offered on campus, such as the ones at Innis College. Some of these courses are now staffed by bureau personnel who hold faculty cross-appointments.

The teaching salaries receive by these instructors, who are paid a full salary by the bureau, go towards the bureau expenses in order to make up for the budget cuts.

McCulloch points out this is a poor set-up because it ties up his staff and limits bureau activities. As it now stands, McCulloch says, they are seemingly part-time professors and part-time bureau staff members.

McCulloch maintains the bureau should be a seed agency for projects such as inter-disciplinary courses and should not be responsible for keeping them going, let alone dependent on them for funds to finance the bureau.

McCulloch is often approached by students who simply say something like, "I feel bad." According to him, it is usually one of four problems which leads to this feeling of depression.

Some students feel their problem is rooted in the political system, and they are inclined to reason that they cannot be happy so long as they are being oppressed by "the system."

Others say U of T's fragmented nature and geographical structure cause alienation.

By GUS RICHARDSON

The left of today is young, articulate, energetic, dedicated and sure in its convictions. Yet one cannot help but sense an emptiness to its revolutionary posturing. Most obviously, the left of today is not a movement. Unlike the middle sixties, when, under the general leadership of the SDS, the New Left as a movement composed mainly of students swept the continent and fueled a thousand struggles, the left of today is fragmented and sectarian in its isolation. Why? In part because we are faced with a new generation — one perhaps insulated from these struggles by the adolescent concerns of high school life.

It is a generation seemingly marked by apathy and a lack of interest in social issues. University administrators and teachers breathe a sigh of relief over the new students, who now attend school to learn, not rebel. (This is perhaps true only of the middle class and upwardly mobile campus youth.) In the factories managers face an increasingly intractable work force of young workers for whom the old work discipline has little attraction. Their demands for better working conditions do not, however, pose a radical threat to the old order.

But this does not answer the question of why is this generation immune to the cries of the left? To understand, we should first understand the New Left of the sixties, for in its rise and fall we can trace the problems of revolution in capitalist society.

under the general organization of the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS). Founded in the spring of 1960, the SDS captured the imagination of the alienated youth of the sixties, and reached a peak membership of perhaps 100,000 in 1968.

The main document of the SDS, and of the New Left as a movement, was the Port Huron Statement. Drafted in the spring of 1962, it embodied in clear and concise language a new blueprint for society, one entailing humanism, individualism, community and participatory democracy. It stated that "Men have unrealized potential for self-cultivation, self-direction, self-understanding, and creativity. The goal of men and society should be human independence . . . Human interdependence is a contemporary fact; human brotherhood must be willed, however, as a condition of future survival and as the most appropriate form of social relations." (1) A peculiar amalgam of Jeffersonian, liberal and socialist idealism, it perhaps lacked the internal consistency other ideologies demanded. To the alienated youth of the sixties, however, jaded with the materialistic values of post-war America, it represented the affirmation of new and human values.

Yet for all its buoyant optimism and dedication to a new vision of society, the New Left died. Its official death came when the Progressive Labor Party took over the hollow shell of the SDS in the summer of 1969. The long decline had started before that as the movement splintered into many movements — Weathermen, Feminists, Black Power, Cosmic Consciousness and Marxist.

"Whatever seeks to extend itself under domination ru

was that it appealed to a vast number of people. It provided the thousands who marched and demonstrated, handed out leaflets or painted banners, or manned the literature tables, with a space — a niche in an increasingly unidimensional society.

The SDS' Heritage

The SDS, much as a new bride, was something old and something new. The old lay in the values it affirmed; the new in that it turned those values against a society that had divested them of any meaning. In short, the SDS infused the values of democracy, equality and liberty with a new vitality. More important, however, was its use of the quality of the ideology (the structured mass of values and meaning in a given society) of America. Unconsciously, the SDS discovered something that today's left has yet to learn. Old ideas, old values and old beliefs have within them the seeds of freedom and revolution as well as oppression and conservatism. The trick is to reinvigorate them.

Today's left is concerned with the problem of "building the revolution". It should remember its past and look to the lessons of the New Left. In short, if the revolution is truly to be one of radical change, then attention must be paid to two aspects of the left's failure to activate that project. The first concerns the failure to understand the content of that change.

Too often the left views the problem of revolution in terms of tactics. Policy statements and activities are worked out with an eye to ideological purity and the existing power structure of society. The activity itself is directed towards revolution; that is, towards the day when revolution will become reality. This means that the establishment of freedom is regarded as a mechanistic consequence of the conquest of power. But there is no understanding of what "freedom" in a revolutionary, or indeed in a revolutionising, society will mean. The content of revolution is never put forward.

By content, I mean the ideology of revolution; the values, rationales, forms and modes of revolution as a lived experience. Such problems as the role of human liberty, of family, of sex, of possessions and the forms of government — in short the matter of everyday life in a revolutionary society — are considered to be either peripheral problems to be solved once the revolution comes, or the wailing of bourgeois liberals. Revolution, however, and the changes it entails, is not a thing, and it should not be pursued the way one pursues loot or criminals.

The second problem facing the left concerns its failure to inspire those who are to make the revolution — the working class, or, as the New Left more generally defined it, the people. It is surely a cliché to point out that a revolutionary project that is not infused with the will of the people is not a revolution. Indeed, it runs the risk of being counter-revolutionary:

No matter how honestly they (the left) intend to build a workers' democracy, the dictatorial measures necessary for its security, the 'substitution' of a new ruling mechanism for the present one, the belief in the 'vanguard' role of the party, in short, all the categories of repression which are probably necessary, conceal so well the realistic foreground that the image on the horizon always spoken of by the socialist politician looks suspiciously like a mirage. (2)

Cliche though it is, it is nonetheless true, but for more profound reasons than are usually given. The failure of the left to attract the people to its banners lies in their first failure — the failure to understand or appreciate the importance of content, or ideology, in revolution.

Consciousness and Culture

Not only of content in revolution, but of content in society. The left has failed to understand the meaning of society to people. Too often the left constructs an artificial picture of exploiter and exploited, without stopping to ask what exploitation means to the exploited. What has to be questioned is the relation between the psychology of the individual and the psychology (ideology) of society. The cant of "class consciousness" and "false consciousness" disguises that relationship, and obscures "... the manner and mode that the ideology is translated into the everyday life and behavior of the individual." (3)

This touches on the central theoretical problem of revolution that the left fails to answer. The dominant ideology of society is not something that is foisted off on an ignorant or "falsely conscious" working class. If it was it would be rejected as one sheds a coat. Rather, as Raymond Williams has pointed out, ideology is a ... system of meanings and values, which are not merely abstract but which are organized and lived. ... It is a whole body of practices and expectations ... It thus constitutes a sense of reality for most people in society ... (4)

What this means for the practice of the left is that capitalism is not merely endured, it is lived. The workers laugh as well as cry under its sway. In short, the people have internalized capitalist patterns of thought as the only valid ones. Russell Jacoby, an old New Left person, wrote that

Theoretically, in Marxism, the proletariat was never composed of (bourgeois) individuals; this was a luxury reserved for the wealthier. However, again, the problem is that the form of individuality that prevails in the bourgeoisie is not confined to the bourgeoisie; rather, it seeps into the proletariat and cripples the process of the proletariat constituting itself as the historical subject. The bourgeois individual in its late stage does not lend itself to class consciousness. (5)

Indeed, because of this "seepage" it is a mistake to speak of "false consciousness" at all, for that implies something out of which the people have to be educated. The point is that the people are conscious, but that their consciousness resides at a personal, subjective level. Food, sex, the family, entertainment, bills, jobs, the children's future and mother's illness all form the context of consciousness, with "duty", "loyalty", "love", and "sacrifice" forming the lynch-pins. To ignore this, as so many leftists do, is to fly in the face of reality as it is perceived by the people, and thus alienate them.

If this were all, revolution might still be possible. Despite the crippled consciousness of the people the forces of material necessity would always blunt the true impact of capitalist thought. Trade unions, though a disappointment to the left, still retain the seed of rebellion against bourgeois culture. There is, however, a deeper problem that has less to do with the difficulties of building mass support in capitalist society than with the left itself. That is, the thought of the left itself is impure, despite the ideological rigidity of sectarian Marxism. "The left," as Jacoby points out, "duplicates as well as negates bourgeois culture." (6)

It does this in three ways. In its writing and speech, reality is increasingly obscured with the jargon of a highly evolved Marxism. "Overdetermination", "epistemological break", "conjuncture", and "problematic", for example, all demand a reader or listener versed in the jargon. Journals such as the New Left Review (somewhat of a misnomer) contain articles that seek to duplicate the fetishization of words and theory that leftists are so quick to denounce in bourgeois academics. Theory (and hence practice) hinges on whether there was an "old" and "young" Marx, on whether Lenin meant "this" when he ns the danger of reproducing it." Max Horkheimer as variations in style rather than content from more orthodox ideologies.

said "that". One strains to find any point of contact between everyday life and that of the theory. Revolution comes to hinge on a word, a phrase, a syntax, rather than on its profound meaning to man. In this way leftist thought duplicates the fragmented thought of specialized disciplines within bourgeois social theory that obscures reality. What is more, it leaves the common man, he who is to be liberated, lost and adrift. As Max Horkheimer once observed, "A language in which one does not recognize his own desires or become impassioned is alien." (7)

Secondly, the left has a tendency to duplicate the most wretched and oppressive aspects of middle class morality. "Duty", "efficiency", "struggle", and "personal sacrifice" for a greater cause, if unmediated by more subjective concerns such as love and passion, merely mirror the Protestant work ethic.

Paradoxically, the left combines this enforcement of the work ethic with a total denial of the bourgeois value system. By so doing it misses the profoundly revolutionary possibilities that lie within bourgeois ideology. Wilhelm Reich once argued that instead of trying to "educate" people to a completely new form of thought, instead of getting them to drop their "false consciousness" and adopt "class consciousness", the left should concentrate on "... developing the revolutionary instincts which are already there..." For Reich, "Everything that contradicts the bourgeois order, everything that contains a germ of rebellion, can be regarded as an element of class consciousness..." (8)

Old Values and New Freedoms

The proof of this lies as much in history as in contemporary society. For example, in the early twentieth century men such as "Big Bill" Haywood, leader of the International Workers of the World, and V. Eugene Debs, leader of the Socialist Party of America, understood this point, if only unconsciously. Haywood and Debs both inspired their followers with visions of a new order but it was an order rooted firmly in the traditional American ideals of justice, equality and brotherhood. (9) True, these were ideals that had been emptied of their radical vitality by the corrupt materialism of the Gilded Age. They remained dormant in the minds of the people, but they remained. Men such as Debs reactivated them and infused them with the vision of a world order that would truly embody them.

What the left forgets is that the vision of a "New Jerusalem" need not be chiliastic. While religion as an institution has become an apologist for the status quo of self-interest and greed, the religious project of the equality of all men before God remains as a vision of an alternate possibility. J. S. Woodsworth was only one in a long series of men who realized this possibility.

The point is not to argue that religion should replace Marx, but that more attention should be paid to the radical residue that resides in a dominant ideology, such as religion and the possibility of its reactivation. To reactivate it would be to reactivate the dream of a better world in all men, not just socialists.

Take, for example, the family. Increasingly under attack by society, as evidenced by a rising divorce rate, falling birth rate, and the take-over of once familial functions by the State (welfare, education, day care), the family is all too casually dismissed by the left as a bourgeois institution. Viewing it as a hotbed of sexism and authority the left is all too eager to relegate it, and monogamy in general, to the dustbin of history. In so doing they only aid a society that seeks to deprive the individual of any free space in which to develop.

It is true that the child first experiences sex-typing and the oppression of authority in the family. It is true too that the family to a large degree is subject to, and a creation of, the forces of capitalism. What is forgotten, however, is that the family also provides what is perhaps the first and only "space" free from those forces. As Max Horkheimer once observed,

Within the family, however, unlike public life, relationships were not mediated through the market and the individual members were not competing with each other. Consequently the individual always had the possibility there of living not as a mere function but as a human being... To this extent, the family not only educates for authority in bourgeois society; it also cultivates the dream of a better condition for mankind. (10)

The cry of women, to take another example, for "abortion on demand" may be radical in the context of a sexist society that denies women rights that it extends to men. There are, however, conservative aspects lurking within the demand, especially in the context of its being based on a woman's right to her body. In essence, that is a right to property, and as such is bourgeois, not radical. By steadfastly refusing the moral aspect of their claims, and in the context of support from places such as Cosmopolitan and Playboy the right to abortion may become the ultimate expression of the middle class notion of individuality and property. "Me" is then asserted in the face of "we". This is not to say that women should not have the right of abortion — they should. Women should, however, struggle for it while at the same time retaining a critical awareness of the internal dialectic.

There is, in short, a dialectical tension in all ideologies, be they left or right, between the radical and the conservative. To repeat continuously the slogans of revolutionary struggle, without studying their content, is only to fall victim to their own conservative aspects. What is more, to totally reject a dominant ideology is to reject that which is hinted at in its ideals — liberation. More importantly, because dominant ideologies are lived by the masses, to reject it rejects the possibility of speaking to them in a language they understand. If the left truly believes in the dialectic, as it so often claims, then it should look to what can be salvaged from the old order. Instead of playing the vanguard, and preserving its ideological virginity, the left should enter into discourse with the people it seeks to liberate. The relation between party and people should be one of love, not rape. As Paolo Friere once so eloquently put it,

The oppressed have been destroyed precisely because their situation has reduced them to things. In order to regain their humanity they must cease to be things and fight as men. This is a radical requirement. They cannot enter the struggle as objects in order later to become men. (11)

Tactics of conspiracy serve only to alienate those the Left would reach.

Come To The Special Meeting

Of The Governing Council

in the Council Chambers, Simcoe Hall

Thurs. Oct. 17 at 4:30 pm

Where composition of the Governing Council will be decided.

The composition of the Governing Council is so important because this body decides all major matters effecting students:

- the procedures for hiring, promoting and tenure decisions
- the provision of athletic facilities
- the discipline code

This review is crucial — the students will be stuck with the present composition until at least July 1, 1980 unless the Council recommends changes at the Thursday meeting.

Student Proposals

1. EQUAL STUDENT/FACULTY REPRESENTATION. Raising the numbers to 14 students and 14 faculty allows all areas of the campus to be represented, ensures that there are enough students to share the Governing Council workload, and most importantly, enables students to adopt their proper role as equal members of the university community.

2. BROADER COMMUNITY REPRESENTATION. Making the government appointees more broadly representative of the people of Ontario helps to ensure that the university becomes more responsive to the needs of the entire community, and not simply to those of the business community.

These proposals have been endorsed by the following student organizations:
Students' Administrative Government of Erindale
Food Sciences Students' Council
Graduate Students' Union
Medical Students' Society
New College Students' Council
Saint Michael's College Students' Union
Students' Administrative Council
Students' Law Society

Trinity College Joint Board of Stewards

Tenured professor at Western U faces dismissal

A tenured professor at the University of Western Ontario in London is facing dismissal by the administration because his work has been deemed unsatisfactory.

Assistant psychology professor Larry Chamberlain faces dismissal by a three-man committee after he refused repeated psychology department and administration requests that he tender his resignation.

The dismissal case is the first of its kind in Canada.

Allegations of irregular behavior, poor attendance at lectures and poor classroom preparation were cited by students, faculty and administration spokesmen at the public hearings over the case.

University president D. Carlton Williams, acting academic vice-president Grant Reuber and psychology department chairman W. J. McClelland all testified against Chamberlain at the hearings last week.

Chamberlain should be fired, Williams said because he had "failed to perform any duties expected of a member of the faculty."

After a brilliant undergraduate career, Chamberlain joined the Western psychology faculty in 1966 and was given tenure in 1970, Williams said, but since then his work had markedly declined.

Williams said he called Chamberlain into his office in 1973 to discuss complaints about his work and suggested he resign because evidence "seemed to be sufficiently damning that it would seriously affect his future career if made public."

But Chamberlain refused and asked for a public hearing.

Psychology department chairman W. J. McClelland told the hearing psychology faculty members unanimously judged Chamberlain's performance as unsatisfactory and wanted his resignation.

As early as 1972, Chamberlain was warned of the criticisms and was told to improve his performance McClelland said.

He also said Chamberlain was given every opportunity to appeal low teaching evaluations and other charges against him but refused.

"If there had been any change in behavior, I would have been the first to change my mind," said McClelland.

"But at the undergraduate level his teaching evaluations were poor and, got worse." McClelland said Chamberlain's performance drew wide-ranging complaints from students, including a delegation of 51 students last April who criticized his failure to show up for a test he scheduled only one week before final exams.

The three-man committee, chosen by both Chamberlain and the university administration, continues the hearing this week.

Byrne says few teacher militants

By JANNY VINCENT

"If teacher militancy does exist, it is a conserving force, not a revolutionary one," says Tim Byrne, a former deputy minister of education for Alberta.

Byrne, president of Athabasca University in Edmonton, was speaking Thursday at a public lecture on Teacher Militancy: Its Implications, held at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

Byrne told his audience teacher militancy did not begin until the 1960s. Most of the 60s militants, he added, were just reacting to the security-based bureaucracy built up in the pre-war period.

He said only a small segment of teachers — those who want the deschooling of society — are true militants.

Byrne was deputy minister of education for Alberta from 1966 to 1971, when he became president of Athabasca University. The university is considered to be non-traditional, directed towards responding to society's needs. Byrne speculated that "within 10 years at least one province will have withdrawn compulsory attendance laws."

He also commented on society's growing trend towards professionalism, which he said is reflected in the universities.

The universities have changed their purpose from being a "sanctuary of truth to an institution devoted to professionalism," interested in turning out people to fit society's roles, Byrne said.

Byrne pointed to the growing trend to graduate studies as proof, saying this shows changing emphasis from producing people of virtue to producing people of competence.

The lecture was the first in a series to celebrate OISE's 10th anniversary. All the lectures will follow the theme: Education 1965-1985: Lost Horizons, New Vistas.

The second in the series is planned for Nov. 14 and will feature writer Robertson Davies speaking on Education and Literacy.

'Sexist' paper slammed

GUELPH (CUP) — Racial, ethnic, and sexual slurs in a student paper drew a fast reaction at the University of Guelph.

Representatives of the University Jewish Society, Federation of Women Students, U of G Homophile Association and the Department of Student Affairs launched strong protests last week against the Daily Bastphuque newsletter from Mills Hall, an all male undergraduate residence with about 200 residents.

Representatives of student groups met with the editors of the paper last week and forced them to apologize to the groups offended by the newsletter.

The editors' apology appeared in the Ontario, the official student paper of the University of Guelph. In it Bastphuque editor Mark Shopian said, "I, Mark Shopian, the editor of the Daily Bastphuque, wish to apologize to the following groups for the material in our first issue.

The election closes on October 22nd at 12:00 Noon.

U of Guelph board member asked to resign for war role

GUELPH (CUP) — A member of the Board of Governors of Guelph University has been accused of supplying bomb parts to the United States in their attempt to bomb North Vietnam into submission.

Philosophy lecturer John McMurtry has called for the resignation of new board member, John Wood, because his role in supplying parts for the US made him unfit to serve as a governor of a university.

Wood's role in the American war came to light in January, 1973, when a letter appeared in The Ontario, the campus newspaper at the university.

The letter was from an employee of Wood's firm, W. C. Wood and Co., who had quit the firm when he discovered he was not making refrigerator parts as he had been told, but shell casings for export to the U.S.

McMurtry learned of Wood's appointment in August 1974, and wrote to the university president, W.

C. Winegard, calling for action at the September board meeting.

The letter referred to a section of the Nuremberg Principles defining anyone who takes part in the preparation or waging, or a war of aggression or a war in violation of international treaties, agreements or assurances as being a criminal under international law.

"There is," according to McMurtry's letter, "obviously a plausible case for his qualification as an international criminal."

The letter continues: "That a possible international criminal is appointed from among thousands of decent candidates for the position of governor of the University seems a matter of deepest moral concern to members of this University.

"That, furthermore, an institution which is dedicated to resolution of conflict by reasoned discussion rather than the machinery of violence, to the disinterested pursuit of knowledge in peace rather than the self-interested pursuits of profits from war, and to human betterment rather than human destruction—that such an institution should appoint as one of its governors someone who has indicated opposite disposition in these matters is grotesquely self-contradictory."

The letter called the appointment of Wood "a needless and grave violation of this University's basic integrity, moral and intellectual."

McMurtry wrote Winegard asking the matter be taken before the board and "unless some disconfirming evidence comes to life, or resolving action is taken by the Board of Governors," at their September meeting, McMurtry would "make the issue public."

He met with reporters after learning the matter had not been discussed by the Board.

University President Winegard when asked for a comment on the situation flatly refused to comment.

John Wood has been in Detroit on business and was unavailable for comment.

'New Jewish woman' discussed

By RIQUERYMAN

A symposium organized by the Jewish Woman's Movement drew more than 60 people Sunday to discuss the "new Jewish woman."

Films, speakers and questions highlighted the symposium held at Ledbury Park Junior High School.

Rachel Adler, American journalist and author, explained historically why women were excluded from the centre of Jewish religious practice.

"Jewish women live in a story full of men," she said. "We are in the background and we have lived this all of our lives."

A traditionally male god created all life, she noted, but he did this by stealing the role of creation.

Aviva Cantor Zuckoff, historian and author, spoke of the woman's role as an "enabler."

The enabler, she said, is the wife who devotes all her energy to running a household, leaving her husband free to pursue his personal aspirations.

The Jewish woman is the object of many cruel stereotypes, Zuckoff said. There is the fabled "Jewish mama" who pushes her children to achieve while drowning them in affection.

Conversely, there is the modern "Jewish American Princess" who rejects the role of the Jewish mama, and instead wants the man to be her enabler, Zuckoff said.

This year a number of changes have been made in the employment of Graduate Teaching Assistants.

In order to make sure that all of these changes have been implemented, the Implementation Committee on the Remuneration of Graduate Student Teaching Assistants is furnishing you with the following check list:

1. Have you received a letter from your department offering you an appointment as a Teaching Assistant this year? (This letter should give an estimate of the total time involved in the assignment and state the salary and vacation pay.)
2. If you are doing the same assignment as last year, then you should receive an increase of 7% (excluding vacation pay).
3. Are you receiving vacation pay?
4. Are you being paid in the $7-$10 per hour range?

If the answer to any of these questions is No, please contact your Department Chairman. Those problems which remain unresolved after consultation should be referred to the Committee at the following address:

Ladies track team strong again

By THE PHANTOM
Friday's track and field meet at Waterloo provided the last tryout for the U of T women's team before next Saturday's OWIAA championships at McMaster.

Although all teams were small in number, owing to the meet coinciding with the Thanksgiving weekend, some good performances were registered by U of T team members.

Hazel Lynn, in clocking 13.1 in her heat of the 100m, registered the fastest time of the day in this event. However, she tired in the final and had to be content with third place. Lesley Evans performed strongly in both the 1500m and 400m events. In the former she set a new OWIAA record of 4:42.0, breaking the old record by 12.6 sec. Sally Beach, having her first run after a leg injury, also performed well in this event and placed third.

The 4 x 400m relay team recorded another leisurely win. In next week's championships they will, doubtless, have much stronger competition; nevertheless, they must be favoured to win.

Blues harriers third in US

By WARREN BRADLEY
SOUTH BEND IND. — The strength of the Varsity cross country team was shown here on Friday at the Notre Dame invitational cross country meet.

With over 230 athletes competing for 32 universities, it was the largest meet of its kind in the U.S.

The Toronto team finished third overall (much to the dislike of several American coaches) behind the University of Michigan and Eastern Michigan and Eastern Michigan University.

Even with their third place finish the Blues did not feel they had run as well as they could. The Toronto team consisted of John Sharp, Brad Morley, Joe Sax, Mike Dyon, Steve Findlay, John Hiley and Peter Walker.

With the OUAA cross country championship on Nov. 2, U of T is heavily favoured to retain its title for the third straight year.

Blues win opener

By THE PHANTOM.

On Saturday, the Blues' water polo team journeyed to RMC to participate in the first tournament of the 1974 season and came away with impressive wins in both their starts.

The mermen defeated Ottawa 9-6 in the first game and then came back later to thrash RMC 15-8.

In the opening contest, the Blues drew blood early in the first quarter on a goal by newcomer George Gross. Gross added another in the second to give the Blues a two goal lead they never relinquished.

In that quarter Tony Rockingham scored a hat trick, a feat which Alex Fedko duplicated in the second half. The other Blues tally went to Geoff Brown who had the misfortune of having his nose broken in the second game against RMC.

In the second game, behind a seven goal effort by Gross and five by Fedko, the Blues built up a 13-3 lead going into the final quarter before easing up on their opponents.

With the addition of several excellent new players, the Blues hope to improve on their last year's fourth place finish in the five team Eastern division of the OUAA which also includes Queen's, Ottawa, RMC and York.

Among those expected to give the Blues a winning year are George Gross (3 year All-East No. 1 all-star player out of Yale University and a member of Canada's recent World Student Games swim team), Alex Fedko (four years experience in water polo, also member of Canada's recent World Student Games swim team), Alex Fedko (four years experience in water polo, also member of Commonwealth Games swim team in 1966), Rick Pay (seven years water polo experience) and national swimming finalists Geoff Brown, Shawn Laari and Greg Vanular.

Results
100m: Beech (Laurentian) 13.2 sec., Sparling (Waterloo) 13.3, Lynn (Toronto) 13.4.

Trin downs Meds 12-3 in emotional contest on back campus

By MRS. PARKER

On the back campus last Wednesday interfac football fans were treated to a rare display of fumble-dumble football as Trinity downed Meds 12-3.

Meds had a bad day of it. They were successful in fumbling the ball four times as well as giving up two interceptions one of which was run back for a touchdown.

Apparently Meds have taken up the Argo play book that PHE threw away.

Meds, exasperated at the uncommon luck they were having, decided to vent their ire on the umpire.

A Meds player had been called for facemasking but decided that the official was wrong and proceeded to grab the official (who is about a foot and a half shorter than the player) and tear his shirt.

The umpire, terrified at this point, beat a hasty retreat under hot pursuit of the Meds player. Only through the quick action of two Trinity players who tackled the rampaging doctor was the official saved from a fate worse than death.

Presumably Meds will take up a collection to pay for the torn sweater. Such whining on the field in the direction of the officials is totally uncalled for. Why, when a team loses, it is always the fault of the officials?

Trin was by no means lacking in inane plays as they also managed two fumbles but recovered one themselves. Trin's first touchdown came as a result of recovering one of Meds fumbles deep in Meds' zone. The second touchdown came from a fake punt and pass that was intercepted and returned for the TD.

Meds only score was a field goal from the 29 yard line.

Trin outpaced Meds both on the field and the scoresheet. Meds fumbled 4 times and were intercepted twice.

The game as a whole was a rather boring affair enlivened only by the incident with the official. Both benches cleared but the referee soon had things under control. He also banished the hotheaded doctor, who no doubt will play his future football elsewhere this season.

This is the start of last Thursday's run for fun, a race run only to test the physical fitness of the participants. Everyone is timed individually.

Run for Fun needs you

By RICK CORNACCHIA
Running is probably one of the most popular forms of keeping in shape.

Because of this popularity a cross urban course has been set up and is run every Thursday at 5:30 pm. The course itself is about two miles long.

Times are recorded and posted for each individual runner so that everyone can determine their own improvement.

An average of about 40 people have been taking advantage of the program but the run is set up to handle as many as 100 runners.

The philosophy behind the run should be emphasized. This event is not a race but a measure of your level of fitness on a weekly basis. You are running to improve your fitness and have some fun doing it.

The next run is at 5:30 on Thursday and is open to staff as well as students. The run starts at the northeast corner of the back campus.

Interfac Roundup

On Oct. 9 Trin defeated Vic 9-0 in rugger. In other action Eng II lost to Law 6-0, while Eng I squeaked by PHE 4-0. Law also defeated Trin 15-4.

In touch football the Gridiron Grads went down to defeat at the hands of the foul smelling Wop Squad 18-13. Skule 7T5 were blanked by Mech III 13-0. The Rhits outdid the uncouth F.H. Farmers 26-6.

Punt Lickers '74 and the Grunts being of a like nature tied 12-12. Ensign was asleep and Mike's Meateaters left their false teeth at home accounting for the 0-0 tie in their game.

The Ballherites were in fine form downing the Untouchables 7-0. Heat It & Beat It pulled off a win over Chrono-Synclastic Infundibili. No fucken wonder.

The leftovers ate up the slackers 6-0. The Divine Monks used help from above to beat Jack the Bear 20-12. Civil Skulers dumped the Gustaff Maulers 27-0.

Bozo Bus was left with a bad taste as the Pussies were on them for a 19-0 win. Hookers gave the Briefs a kick in the pants with a 20-7 victory.

The Memos lost to the Redskins 35-6 and the Jocks overwhelmed Civil IV 20-7.

In yesterday's touch football action the Wallburgers relished their 18-12 win over Gustaff Maulers. Also Punt Lickers '74 got the best of Heat It & Beat It 7-0.

Ensign were still asleep as the Rhits blasted them 39-0. The Snaps also blasted the Nummies 41-0. The Divine Monks seem to have lost their connection with heaven as they were only able to tie Civil IV 13-13.

In soccer action over the last week Dents 1 - Eng III 0, Knox 0 - Trin B 1, SMC B 3 - Innis 1, Pharm 2 - New 4, Meds B 3 - Wyc 0, Vic 2 - Trin A 1, and Erin 0 - Scar 1.

The interfac lacrosse season has started with a bang. In the Erindale-PHE A match last Thursday, the black hole of Hart House was blessed with a fight between Marshall (Erin) and MacNeil (PHE). The fight led to a bench clearing incident and the subsequent termination of the game. Oh yes, the score at the time was Erin 4 and PHE 3.

In more serious action For A downed Trin 5-1. The following is a list of the scores to date in the lacrosse league.

Innis 6 - For B 0, Vic 4 - Eng 4, Scar 0 - Knox 2, Erin 9 - Eng 1, PHE A 5 - SMC A 3, Med 2 - For A 3, For B 0 - SMC B 9, Trin 1 - Scar 5, Innis default to PHE B, SMC B 0 - Innis 3, Meds 2 - Trin 2, For B 5 - New 4, SMC A 6 - Erin 5, and For A 4 - Knox 1.

Chipmunks and tunas down Yeomen

By JEAN BUBBA and PAUL CARSON

The chipmunks and the tunas had an off day but Goliath rallied to beat David in a muggy afternoon of mixed metaphors Saturday as the football Blues made it five in a row with an uninspired 26-7 victory over the York (hapless) Yeomen at CNE Stadium.

If this sounds confusing, and it likely does, then perhaps a few explanations are in order. The chipmunks is the nickname bestowed by Blues players on the members of the offensive unit, while the tunas refers to the defense. In the strange hype vernacular peculiar to football locker rooms, Goliath are the Blues — tough, rough, slightly overconfident big men of the gridiron who were supposed to fall prey to the smaller but smarter Yeomen of the north.

At least that's how one slightly biased York fan visualized things during the first half. Mind you, the fan was somewhat into his hip flask at the time.

Goliath followed the script for the first thirty minutes but then put things together in the final periods to administer a thorough if decidedly unpectacular beating.

One might say Blues proved that you don't have to be exciting to be good. One might also say, as coach Ron Murphy did afterwards, that Blues weren't overly keyed up for the game but nevertheless did a lot of little things very well.

The chipmunks eventually did their thing for 17 points in the second half, moving the nut for 218 yards along the ground on 37 pushes plus another 202 yards through the air.

The tunas yielded a second quarter touchdown following a fumble but in the end they devoured the opposition as Tubomin Alexov and friends held the Yeomen to a total offense of only 165 yards.

Chief tuna for the day was Geoff Sutherland who spent most of the second half wreaking havoc in the York backfield and personally accounted for three sackings of Yeomen signal-callers Doug Kitts and Gerry Verge.

Linebackers Julio Giordani and Guido Iantuno also played exceptionally well.

"Sutherland is a fine athlete, very quick and tenacious," Murphy commented. "He's given us a good pass rush and that's what we've needed for a long time."

"I'm really pleased the guys went for the nickname bit. It's an indication of the genuinely good spirit on the team this year," Murphy added.

The nicknames may be corny, just as nutty as the David and Goliath illusions used by the York fan; however, Blues are five and zero with a solid hold on first place and no Varsity team, straight or slightly zany, has been able to claim that distinction since 1967.

Rookie halfback Mark Bragagnolo, whom the press seems to have decided is top chipmunk, had another classy afternoon amassing 181 yards in 21 carries plus another 55 yards on a beautiful TD pass from Dave Langley that broke the game open in the third quarter.

It was a pleasant moment for Langley, who transferred to Varsity after suffering with Yeomen last year.

Langley finished with nine completions in 16 passing attempts for 176 yards.

The first half was really dullsville, and the less said the better. The tunas wouldn't let Yeomen move and the chipmunks appeared to be on an extended lunch break.

Trailing 1-0 in the second quarter, Blues turned Bragagnolo loose behind excellent blocking for 63 yards. After a pass to Brent Elsey, Bragagnolo scampered nine yards for the touchdown. Don Wright's convert attempt was wide as the officials failed to detect a Yeomen offside.

York gained a temporary lead a few minutes later when Colin Lauder fumbled a punt at his own thirty-five and eventually Bob Palmer punched it over from the Varsity one. A high snap ruined the convert.

Peace, order and good government was restored shortly before the half when Wright connected on a 29-yard field goal following a 30-yard pass to Elsey.

The 500 or so faithful fans barely had time to stifle their collective yawns when Lauder atoned for his blunder with a good punt return and Bragagnolo romped around right end for a 27-yard touchdown.

On Blues next possession Langley and Bragagnolo combined for the 55-yard bomb despite a pass interference call against York that wasn't needed.

The chipmunks then made things interesting for Wright by taking twenty yards in penalties on the convert. Eventually the Varsity place kicker set some sort of record by calmly booting a 32-yard convert for what must be the longest point-after in CIAU history.

Wright later closed out the scoring with a 37-yard field goal early in the fourth quarter.

It was a game with few spectacular plays and even fewer standout performers on either team.

The tunas executed their assignments in a competent but uninspired manner, holding York to 56 yards along the ground and the supposedly porous Varsity pass defence yielded only 109 yards on 11 completions.

Offensively, we were impressed with the consistently effective blocking from Don Dawson and Charlie Wright.

Whether the chipmunks and tunas are for real should be decided Saturday against Queens. A victory would not only clinch first place but compel the assembled press scribes to come up with a suitable nickname for the coaching staff.

Cheap shot backfires as Blues become mad

By DAVE STUART

How do you win a football game? You don't do it by trying to rearrange the facial features of the other team's quarterback.

York University fought toe to toe with Varsity at CNE stadium Saturday and trailed only 9-7 at half time. York were tough and Blues were flat.

York needed an edge to break the game open but their attempt to disrupt Varsity quarterback Dave Langley's grasp on the contest backfired.

Early in the third quarter, Langley was forced out of bounds at the York bench. Langley hit the sideline in full stride. A forearm, attached to the shoulder of York assistant coach Danny Nykoluk attempted to stop Langley cold.

Blues were incensed especially since no penalty was called. Langley, an ex-quarterback for York, deserves a better welcome from former teammates than that.

In any case, fired up at the cheap shot, Toronto bore down on the real job, the football game, and racked up 15 more points as well as running York into the CNE carpet.

According to coach Murphy, "that stunt by Nykoluk really made us mad. We came out flat but that's what got us up."

Needless to say head coach Nobby Wirkowski and Nykoluk are adamant in their claim the move was intended to prevent Langley from possibly injuring himself.

In other O-QIFC action over the weekend, Western downed Laurier 24-22 to take first place in the western division.

Ottawa stomped McGill 83-28. Carleton dumped Queen's 36-16 and Guelph won their first against Bishop's 48-14 and on Friday night McMaster beat Waterloo 15-7.

Next Varsity game is Saturday in Kingston as Queen's host the return match.

Council denies students parity

Trinity College provost George Ignatieff saw the light on parity.

Students will not have equal representation with faculty members on the Governing Council, it was decided yesterday.

By a decisive margin, the Governing Council defeated a motion calling for student-faculty parity. There were 14 votes for the motion and 29 against.

But the council did support increased student representation on U of T's top governing body. Eight students and 12 faculty members now sit on Governing Council.

Yesterday's meeting was completely given over to debate on the review of the U of T act. The act, passed by the Ontario Legislature in 1971 with the provision that it be re-evaluated after two years of operation.

The decisions reached at yesterday's meeting will now be forwarded to Governing Council's executive committee. On Monday, the executive committee will prepare several models for council changing the act.

One of these models will be chosen by the Governing Council next Thursday and be forwarded to the Ontario Legislature.

The council approved "equal or nearly equal" representation between members from inside and from outside the university, and also indicated the size of the council should be increased to about 60 members from its present 50.

But when it came to the question of including groups not presently represented on Governing Council, council members indicated clearly that some outsiders are more equal than others.

At present 16 government appointees most of whom are businessmen, sit on the council.

Suggestions calling for representatives from the City of Toronto, from community groups from the area immediately adjacent to the St. George campus, and from Ontario labor organizations were defeated.

Other suggestions calling for representation from Ontario teachers' and students' organizations were not even raised, because "it was obvious nobody was listening to them," student governor Peter Jarrett said.

Chuck Hanly, a Governing Council representative of the teaching staff, said U of T would come to be thought of as a parochial institution if it identified itself with municipal and community representatives.

But the council agreed that Erindale and Scarborough Colleges should have at least one representative on Governing Council, and that there should be one representative for the three federated colleges (St. Michael's, Victoria, and Trinity).

It was also decided the representation of the alumni and the administrative staff should be increased.

The alumni presently have 10 members on the council, the administrative staff four, and two presidential appointees sit on the 50-member council.

Despite a suggestion by alumni representative William Broadhurst that membership should be increased proportionately for all constituencies, it was decided that there should be no increase in representation from "laymen" (a term apparently used to indicate non-university people), teaching staff, or presidential appointees.

The debate on student-faculty parity consisted for the most part of well-known arguments and counter-arguments. But a few original contributions were made.

Betty Kennedy, a government appointee, said, "Although the paternal faculty-student relationship may have been adequate in the past, it is adequate no longer."

"By their very place in time students have a unique contribution to make," she said. "We're not giving favors to students. Quite the contrary. We're asking students to shoulder their share of the responsibility."

Student governor James Martin said, "The role of the university must change and U of T must take a leading role."

"Students have to go into the real world," Martin said. "They have a real stake in the value of their education."

Faculty members displayed a strong sensitivity to the symbolic nature of parity. But George Ignatieff, provost of Trinity College and a presidential appointee to the council, said that since the implementation of policies requires students' co-operation, it is only fair that students should have equal representation with faculty on the bodies that make the policies.

Daycare centre lease starts another tiff

The Campus Co-operative Daycare Centre is again locked in a dispute with the university. This time the dispute is over the terms of a lease for the Devonshire Place centre.

The lease will be discussed at a meeting today between administration officials and representatives of the daycare centre.

Campus Co-op was established several years ago when frustrated parents occupied an empty meteorological building where they have been operating ever since.

Last spring the university agreed finally to recognize their permanent presence and give them a lease.

But the lease is still under negotiation and Bob Davis, a spokesman for the centre, says many of the clauses are unacceptable.

Davis says the university wants a six-month cancellation clause which would allow it to evict the centre if it wants to use the land or any part of it for other purposes.

The university is also unwilling to assume normal landlord responsibilities and, according to Davis, has said it will be unwilling to pay for major repairs to the building.

The initial renovations would be paid for by provincial funding the co-op has applied for under Bill 160. But before the centre can get funding it needs a lease.

Another danger is that if the centre is evicted by the university, it would be required to pay back the money spent by the province.

Davis wants the university to agree to pay if it is responsible for evicting the centre. The Co-op would also like a lease which would only allow the university to evict if the co-op defaulted its rental payments.

SAC will protest

The Students' Administrative Council will approach the Ontario Government on the issue of parity on the Governing Council, according to a press release SAC issued last night.

The Governing Council yesterday decided against the principle of student-faculty parity on the council.

The council's recommendation will be forwarded to the Ontario government at the end of this month, after which the government will vote on the matter.

According to SAC, "The issue is not dead. The arena of discussion has shifted across the street."

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch said he was "deeply disappointed" about a decision which was "not unexpected."

"Students have behaved in a responsible manner in the last two years on Governing Council... yet they are again denied equal representation," he said.

Kanowitch also noted the council decision was not unanimous, and that the provincial government in 1971, under colleges and universities minister John White, had promised the students a thorough review of the parity question this year.

Students scratched their head in bewilderment, wondering why they were denied parity.

GOVERNING COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY

ELECTION REMINDER

Ballots have been mailed to voters in the current election to fill the Governing Council seat representing Graduate Student Constituency II.

Any student registered in the School of Graduate Studies in Division III (Physical Sciences), Division IV (Life Sciences) or in the Graduate Department of Educational Theory who has not received a ballot may contact the Office of the Governing Council at 928-2160 to obtain one.

Completed ballots should be returned by CANADA POST, CAMPUS MAIL or personal delivery to:

The Office of the Governing Council, Room 106, Simcoe Hall.

The election closes on October 22nd at 12:00 Noon.

This is the strange, wonderful shoe with the heel lower than the toe.

This shoe is different from any shoe you've ever worn. It's the EARTH negative heel shoe. The shoe designed to work in harmony with your entire body. The heel of the Earth shoe is actually lower than the toe. This allows you to walk naturally. Like when you walk barefoot in sand or soft earth and your heel sinks down lower than your toes. The entire sole of the Earth shoe is molded in a very special way. This allows you to walk in a gentle rolling motion. And to walk easily and comfortably on the hard jarring cement of our cities. But remember, just because a shoe looks like ours doesn't mean it works like ours. So to be sure you're getting the Earth brand shoe, look on the sole for our Earth trademark. Your body will thank you. Shoes, sandals, sabots and boots for men and women. From $23.50 to $42.50. EARTH is a registered trademark of Kalsø Systemet, Inc. ©1974 Kalsø Systemet, Inc.

Faculty council rejects parity

The mammoth 1,350-member Arts and Science Faculty Council ground into action for the third time in four years Wednesday and, as expected, passed a motion opposing any change in the faculty-to-student ratio on Governing Council.

The council was called at the last minute on the initiative of political economy chairman Harry Eastman to endorse the faculty position opposing faculty-student parity at yesterday's Governing Council meeting.

Only 50 students sit on the council which includes all faculty above the rank of lecturer in arts and science.

The motion passed by a vote of 204-56, but the council only narrowly avoided dispensing with discussion moments after the debate started.

History professor Ken McKnaught said the university had "exhaustively and democratically" dealt with the issue. Then he moved that debate be closed. The motion passed 134-66 but failed for lack of a two-thirds majority.

CONTRIBUTION

Police professor C. B. Macpherson introduced the motion, saying groups within the university should be represented in proportion to their contribution to the university.

"If the sole purpose of the university was teaching," Macpherson said, "students would have a good case for student-faculty parity."

But, he maintained, the university's special function is the creation of new knowledge through research and students are not competent to judge this.

In the following debate student attacks focused on the calling of the meeting. New College student representative Lawrence Coleman said the last minute meeting "demonstrates nothing but bad faith on the part of the faculty."

SAC communications commissioner Michael Sabia, also a faculty council student member, supported Coleman, stating students have participated in discussion for four years in good faith. He said the calling of the meeting "does not speak well of democracy."

SUPPORT

Several faculty members supported students in opposing the motion. Police professor Christian Bay said "immeasurable harm is done" by treating students as less than responsible citizens.

Physics professor Jim Prentice agreed with Bay and downgraded the importance of the council's decision.

Prentice said faculty members present represented only themselves while student members represented over 13,000 students in the faculty.

One of the most impassioned outbursts came from sociology professor Leo Zakuta who attacked parity as a "nightmare," saying it has turned his department into a "shambles."

He said student participation on the Governing Council has shown "an enormous ignorance of the university."

Former arts and science faculty dean Albert Allen said any change would be "dangerous" and opposed any reduction in faculty representation because faculty have "a special role to play in the university."

But Hart House warden Jean Langelle said it would be a "tragic mistake" to deny students an equal say, pointing out students have been in a majority on Hart House governing committees for many years.

FACULTY

History chairman Jim Conacher said it is essential to have a large faculty voice and now it is "already too small."

Trinity College student Ian Ross said parity among the university's two largest estates is very important and "is not an attempt to devalue the contribution of faculty members."

The council itself has been an object of controversy for several years. It frustrated students' demands for parity on the council, its general committee and various other committees.

In 1970-71 students paralyzed the council and the general committee to back demands for equal representation, and occupied Sidney Smith Hall before the failure of a student strike.

Since then, the council has failed five times to get a quorum of 150 members and student interest has faded. Many student seats on the general committee were acclaimed last spring and others were left vacant.

Lots of hands went up in support of motion to skip debate.

Kenneth McKnaught argued democracy had already run its course.

Dentistry may cut honours-pass-fail

By LAWRENCE YANOVER

The Honors-Pass-Fail (HPF) marking system used at the Faculty of Dentistry may be eliminated or changed later this year when it comes up for review by the dentistry faculty council.

But whatever changes are made will probably have little direct student input. The faculty council contains no student representation and no student referendum is likely to be called.

The HPF system, as it is known, was instituted during the 1971-72 year, and was given a three-year trial period with an automatic review scheduled for this year.

The HPF system replaced the old system of class ranking from one to 125, as well as "double book entries" marking, in which students received a letter grading (A-B-C-D) while faculty retained the actual numerical marks.

AREAS

Presently, the Dentistry program is divided into two areas: clinical (practical work such as performed in a dental office) and academic (course work which includes subjects like microbiology, anatomy and histology).

Clinical subjects are marked on a pass-fail basis while subjects are marked on a honors-pass-fail basis.

Many faculty, however, want to change the marking for both clinical and academic to an A-B-C-D marking basis.

Yet surveys of dental students last year, which drew an 88 per cent response, showed more than 77 per cent of the respondents "were happy" with pass-fail marking and 75 per cent wished to "remain with the present system."

RATIONALE

The rationale for inaugurating a pass fail system in 1971 was that it reduced unnecessary competition among dental students and encouraged self-criticism and a self-motivated pursuit for professional excellence.

But some faculty members feel this pass-fail system has encouraged mediocrity. Students, they argue, merely try to pass courses without striving for excellence in clinical studies.

In academic studies, they say the honors-pass-fail marking hurts the "B" student.

The excellent, poor and unacceptable students all have general designations for their marks, but the "B" student is unfairly lumped with the "pass" students.

The pass-fail system also creates difficulties for those graduating students intending to go on to graduate school.

SCHOOLS

Of 42 dental schools contacted by a faculty member so far, 40 admit to difficulty in processing U of T students because they are the only dental students in North America marked on a pass-fail system.

The dentistry faculty council will first study a report by faculty member J. A. Hargreaves before making a decision on the HPF system.

The faculty council is expected to decide on the marking system before Christmas.

GSU tenure brief waffles

The Graduate Students' Union (GSU) supports student representation on tenure committees but waffles on representation parity in a brief presented this week to the academic affairs committee of Governing Council.

While the GSU brief says fairness would dictate equal faculty and student input, it cautions, "It would be extremely unwise at this time for students to press for full parity representation on tenure committees."

The brief says parity would lead to

"a balance of power situation that would be especially conducive to political confrontation."

Instead, the GSU recommends non-parity student representation with one graduate student and one undergraduate student on each tenure committee.

The brief also calls for a non-voting observer to act as "watchdog."

No students now sit on university committees which decide whether professors will be granted tenure.

The brief makes a strong case for student representation, pointing out that students are now "disbarred from participating in a decision-making body whose actions may ultimately determine the shape and substance of their lives."

"Students are critically affected academically and otherwise by the decisions of tenure committees and by virtue of this situation have a prima-facie case in wanting to play an effective role in such decisions," the brief states.

The GSU also attacks the argument that students lack the maturity and judgment to sit on tenure committees, calling it "frivolous and without foundation." The brief points out students will only acquire this by sitting on the committees, and charges any opposition based on the difficulty of selecting students is a smokescreen for opposition to student representation on principle.

The GSU argues many first-rate students are as competent as faculty members to judge all aspects of a candidate's performance.

Blurb announces staff meet

A short notice such as this is often referred to as a blurb. The derivation of the word blurb is uncertain, but its function is traditionally to announce the weekly Varsity staff meeting, held Friday at 1 p.m.

This week, we'll be setting editorial policy on some major issues, and discussing investigative writing in the areas of student services, teaching quality and women's issues.

If you're one of those people who came in here once and never showed up again, or one of those people who's been meaning to come in but kept putting it off, all is forgiven. We're still only one quarter of the way through the year, with lots of ideas still to be tried. We're no quitter.

"I consider myself as representing the public interest"

William O. Twaits,
Governing Council Member,
Former chairman,
Imperial Oil.
October 17, 1974.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Arms story had facts incorrect

The one thing I appreciate about Varsity articles is the intense research that goes into the material. In your article "Have Gun Will Sell: Canada's Arms Industry" I was glad to see that your research was up to par — par being that you don't care about the facts you gather as long as they are sensational or else you make up the facts.

The person responsible for information obtained from Noranda was obviously of this school of thought. If he knew anything about 105 mm cartridge cases he would know this is an artillery shell. It weighs over 30 lbs. and is over 2 ft. long. It would be interesting to see it loaded into a rifle much the less fired from it.

Keep up the good work.

Bob Tkach
Eng IV

Feature author replies

Mr. Tkach is correct when he says a 105 millimetre shell will not fit in any rifle.

But our confidential documents with the Canadian Commercial Corporation's (CCC) name across the top state: "brass discs 105 millimetre cartridge cases M14."

An informed source involved with the U.S. military told us the M14 is one of a series of rifles that were used in Vietnam. (Readers might recall that one of the models used to jam constantly.)

Either someone has forged the CCC documents (unlikely) or the government is playing around with the orders it sends to the Pentagon.

The other possibility is that M14 stands for something else beside the rifle model number (again unlikely).

However, we were wrong in stating: "Other materials supplied by Noranda Metal Industries to Vietnam included pipe copper and copper tubing." The word "Vietnam" should have been "Pentagon." We have no evidence that the products ended up in Vietnam because corporate spokesmen would not answer our questions.

But the case of Wire Rope Industries of Canada indicates there is some reason for suspicion.

Our original point remains. Corporate directors such as John Evans do not appear to care where the products their company manufactures are used. They may not be breaking the laws of this country, but their morality can be questioned.

An article by former New York

Times reporter Tad Szulc which appears in Rolling Stone, October 24, 1974, called "Pox Americana: Subsidizing the Thieu Regime" details continued American shipments of arms to Southeast Asia. Two of the products shipped are 105 millimetre howitzers" and UH-1H "Huey" troop transport helicopters."

A government spokesman in Ottawa who did not realize he was talking to a reporter recently told us "all the engines used in the Huey helicopters used in Vietnam were manufactured in Montreal."

And he was bragging about it.

Another good source is Charles Taylor's recently published book, "Snow job: Canada, the United States and Vietnam (1954 to 1973)". Although not as detailed as our article, Taylor briefly outlines the complicity of Canadian government and industry (pages 120-127).

Review obsequious

I am writing this letter in reply to Dave Basskin's ingratiating review of the COC's production of Boris Godunov. The opera marked the second time that I have been ripped off by the O'Keefe this year, the first time being when we saw the Bolshoi Cast Off Ballet Company. Yet Basskin has the audacity to suck up to the COC with a non-review that contains only praise.

He mentions the dazzling costumes and the beautiful scenery, but they exist in most major operas, and they are, after all, only the icing on the cake. Basskin does mention serious flaws but fails to elaborate upon them.

Boris Godunov is a drama and the tension builds up from the moment that the curtain rises. But this tension needs to be maintained and developed by the proper actors and singers. Unfortunately the efforts of Don Garrard and company were at best laughable and at their worst were flat, lifeless, and lacking in strength and quality. Garrard was strong enough to carry around a heavy costume but his voice couldn't have roused a mouse.

The other major weakness, which Basskin, as an expert on classical music, should have noted, was the totally absurd and lame English translation of Boris. This butchery left the opera hamstrung since little or no dramatic meaning remained. In fact the audience actually snickered at some points. Could you see this happening during Macbeth or King Lear? Not unless the COC had their finger in it.

Seeing Boris Godunov, as it was presented by the COC, was like buying tickets for the Stones and instead getting Johnny Mathis. NO BALLS. Hopefully it won't be back next season, so there'll be no need to reprint Basskin's obsequious review.

Serge Schardt

MacPherson was wrong

While attending the last meeting of the council of the faculty of Arts and Sciences, I was struck by Professor C.B. MacPherson's distinction between consumerist oriented teaching and academically oriented research.

That Prof. MacPherson should refer to students as consumerists reflects less on them, I would think, than on his own idea of the lecturing function. Is the lecture an inferior form of academic communication? Hardly. At least I doubt that Socrates, or Cicero, or Hegel, or Lord Acton would think so.

I suggest that the consumerist interpretation of the university lecture has less to do with students wishing to be entertained than it does with the structure of the North American academic community. The major difference between professors who prefer to teach and those who prefer to write lies in whom they wish to impress rather than in the intrinsic academic merit of the form they pursue.

If professors adopted the idea that the lecture was as viable a form for the communication of ideas as a piece of written work, then all of us, both faculty and students, would be the winners.

Reform member upset

I wish to publicly disassociate myself from the resolution passed by the special meeting of the faculty of arts and science council on Wednesday. I consider the passing of the matter an insult to the integrity of the student body. I urge all faculty who feel similar to contact me as soon as possible.

Citizen grant 'bribery'

So the Toronto Citizen would give greater coverage to student affairs in exchange for a SAC grant of $1,000 or $1,500! Would it do the same for any other individual or group who could raise the cash? Or are only an elite few to be allowed the privilege of bribery?

I cannot imagine that the Toronto Citizen can ever have laid claim to a policy of non-partisanship but this is ridiculous. Do they — or SAC — know what corruption is? Or have they liberated themselves from all such notions.

I protest SAC using student funds for corrupt practices. And I protest any part of my fees going to SAC if they have no better use for it than giving it to newspapers.

Victoria Manthorpe,
Arts and Science, III

The Governing Council decided yesterday against student-faculty parity as a principle. It did, however, vote to increase student representation. That means nine, 10, or even 11 students on council is acceptable. But 12 — equal with faculty — heaven forbid!

Thousands may be forced to return to "hell"

Papa Doc's Legacy: Haitians in Canada

The pronouncement yesterday by Canada's Minister of Immigration, Robert Andras, that Canada would take measures to stem the flow of immigration into this country raises more problems than it solves. One concerns the reasons for immigration. As the article, reprinted from the McGill Daily, that follows indicates, at least some takes the form of escape from oppressive regimes. Canada, self-proclaimed peacemaker in a world at war, should consider the ethics, as well as the economics, of immigration before slamming the door.

Canada's economic presence in Haiti (the Royal Bank, Bank of Nova Scotia, Toronto-Dominion, BATA Shoes, and others) contributes to the continuance of Haiti's dictatorship. Canada cannot avoid moral complicity in its terror.

Since 1971, after Francois Duvalier's death and the succession to power by his son Jean-Claude, the Haitian government has been presenting a false image of its political situation to the world.

To create this image, the government utilizes various means: its investment in tourism-oriented advertisements presenting a serene picture of Haiti; the sponsorship of Quebec participation in the "Flowers Carnival" held in Haiti during the summers of 1971 and 1973; and the appeals made to political exiles by Paul Blanchet (Minister of the Interior) promising to democratize public life at the French-speaking Medical Congress held in Port-au-Prince in February, 1974. These declarations serve only to gain a respectability and image of tranquility in the eyes of foreign investors — "Haiti is a paradise for tourists."

Many foreign governments are aiding this venture of the Haitian dictatorship: West Germany; Israel; the Chiang Kai-Shek government; the United States through financial and military aid; France by a formal agreement of cooperation; and Canada through the government arm of the Canadian International Development Agency (CFDA).

Repression rampant in Haitian paradise

Ironically, Haiti is hardly a paradise for its five million inhabitants. Repression has not ceased in the Jean-Claude regime and the democratic rights of Haitians are being violated at every turn. Arbitrary arrests of individuals diffusing anti-government ideas take place every day.

Over the years, the rise of popular dissent against the Duvalier dictatorship within Haiti has spurred it to discard any pretenses of liberalism and revert to more open brutal repression. With the assistance of American and French instruction, a special anti-guerrilla unit of the Tonton-Macoute — a gestapo-like secret police force — has been formed.

Despite much propaganda about major changes taking place in Haiti, enormous problems continue or have become aggravated. Jean-Claude Duvalier's government, like his father's, has proven itself incapable of dealing with the urgent problems facing the country today. Nothing has been done to combat poverty and starvation or to provide jobs for the swelling army of unemployed. Needless to say, the demands for respect of democratic rights and the liberation of political prisoners have been ignored.

In a desperate attempt to live as self-creative human beings, thousands of Haitians have escaped from their country — many risking their lives in doing so. Within Haiti, revolts against the destitution and repression are taking place. In Port-au-Prince, Petion-Ville, Jeremie — all over — the population is showing its discontent through open protests and the distribution of literature.

Regime stifles press

Obtaining accurate information about the present situation in Haiti is difficult, particularly during crisis periods. Freedom of the press is unknown. Radio, T.V. and the press have been totally muzzled during the past 10 years of the regime. Any organization other than pro-Duvalier associations is banned, including cultural and youth groups.

A decree of April 28, 1969, considers as a crime against the state "the propagation of 'communist' or 'anarchist' ideas by speeches, conferences, lectures, public and private meetings, leaflets, billboards, periodicals, newspapers, books, images, letters and verbal or written correspondence with local or foreign associations..." Obviously, any opposition to Duvalier falls within this decree. All "crimes" are punishable by death.

Mail is censored and all correspondence must pass through the central bureau in Port-au-Prince. Kidnappings and arrests occur daily. Friends and neighbours fear to discuss the disappearance of yet another political dissident. More than 30,000 Haitians have disappeared since the Duvalier regime took power. Most of the victims are peasants, workers and artisans whose families have no means of communicating their fate to the opposition press abroad. For each known political prisoner there are at least 100 others.

The foreign press agencies rarely publicize the political situation in Haiti. They remain quiet about the manifestations of struggle against the dictatorship: for example, no mention has been made of the two bomb explosions which shook the international airport in Port-au-Prince and created havoc on May 7 of this year.

Such obstacles have not prevented Haitian organizations abroad from obtaining information about this dire situation. It is known that from the beginning of May, the Tonton Macoute has been waging an even more terrifying oppression: whole neighbourhoods in Port-au-Prince have been sacked, while in other towns patriots have been jailed or have disappeared. Surveillance of the population is increasing and the Haitian people are living under a constant threat to their lives. An atmosphere of terror is reigning in the country.

Mass exodus

The repression of the Duvalier regime continues to provoke a massive exodus of its people. More than a half million Haitians (10 percent of the total population) live abroad. This haemorrhage of professional and skilled labour is growing and is taking on dramatic proportions.

Chased from their native land by misery, thousands of Haitians are emigrating (often risking their lives) in the hope of finding work and stability. There are 250,000 in the U.S., 50,000 in the Bahamas, 200,000 in the Dominican Republic and thousands of others in Africa, Europe and Latin America.

Tragic events underline the drastic situation of emigrating Haitians. Frail boats transporting up to 150 illegal emigrants on each run have been leaving the Haitian coast for the Bahamas. Shipwrecks are numerous and after one in May of last year, 19 corpses were found in Bahamian waters. The 32 survivors were imprisoned, only to be deported back to Haiti.

The number lost at sea on this and other occasions can only be guessed at. A month after this incident, the Bahamian government decided to deport en masse more than 10,000 Haitians. A vigorous anti-Haitian campaign has been orchestrated by the Bahamian news media in an effort to justify this inhumane decision.

Such incidents at sea have been escalating since 1971 in the Florida area as well. Hundreds of refugees — men, women and children — seek political asylum as soon as they touch U.S. soil. At present, 700 Haitians are waiting in U.S. jails (some for over 1 year) for deportation. Two Haitian youths — Turenne Deville and Serge Monigat — have committed suicide upon learning of their deportation orders. To them, suicide was a more viable alternative to death by torture at the hands of the Tonton Macoute.

In Canada, hundreds of Haitian immigrants are living under similar conditions. Within the last 4 years, a new wave of immigration has been taking place, with most Haitians settling in Quebec. As repression in Haiti continues, the immigrant mosaic not only includes professionals but clerks, craftsmen, skilled and unskilled workers as well.

In 1972, they arrived in Toronto and Dorval at the rate of 100 per week. Misled by despots of the regime (one high official owns a travel agency — IBO Tours), and by false advertising, more than 6,000 Haitians sought the Canadian paradise. Instead, they earned another taste of hell.

Under the pretense of regularising the situation of immigrants, the Canadian Ministry of Immigration has put in practice a number of legislative measures which will render the situation intolerable for many of the refugees. These include the Mackasey Bill of November 1972 and the Andras Bill of August 1973. The former bill stipulated that as of November 1973, any persons wishing to settle in Canada must apply from his country of origin.

It was also decided that all persons must obtain work permits before their arrival in Canada. Thus, workers arriving unaware of this ruling are startled when they are arrested, interrogated and deported. If they raise any questions concerning their rights, they may be submitted to a great deal of harassment — not only through seizures of passports but also with exorbitant bail of $200 to $400. Work permits are scarce and when granted, their duration is limited and their scope quite specifically delineated. The desperation of these workers gives the employers much scope for exploiting them.

The Andras Bill, embellishing "Operation Canada", pretends to be offering a good deal to the illegal immigrants. The actual intent of this bill is to increase the means of repression by abolishing all rights of appeal against deportation by Canadian immigration. Arrests, searches and investigations have become systemized.

Workers deported from abroad are almost always arrested by the Tonton Macoute upon arrival in Port-au-Prince. 6,000 Haitians have found their fate at the hands of the Tonton Macoute for trying to flee Haiti.

We must understand this drama from a wider context. Allowing immigrants into industrialized countries is an expedient rather than a humanitarian move, for the immigrants are a principal source of cheap labour.

Carleton U students' council backs down over student guide

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA) has backed down from its earlier demand that the administration turn over all copies of the student guide "Survival" to the association for distribution.

The association had planned to stamp each copy with a stamp stating "The opinions expressed in this guide are the opinions of the writers and not the students' association or the dean of student services."

The administration seized the book because it was critical of various local businesses, attacked local agencies, and contained photos not suitable for university publication, according to university president Michael Oliver.

Jacquie Lloyd-Davies, president of CUSA, says the reversal in position was taken after she received "information that several contributors objected to having the book published in its present form."

Oliver had earlier issued a statement saying the same thing. At the meeting between Davies and Oliver in which the administration's position concerning the guide's fate was finalized, Davies "informed" Oliver about the objections of certain contributors to the distribution of the guide with or without the stamp.

CUSA's position led to a tentative agreement with the administration in which the latter would publish a new guide with CUSA input in the form of recommendations on content. A three-member CUSA committee was formed at the following council meeting to provide what former Survival editor Bob Nixon termed "editing by proxy."

Council nominated Dave Dunn, Davies and Nixon to the committee, but Nixon, who had walked out of the meeting on learning of council's backdown, refused to accept the position. Before leaving the meeting he sharply censured council for its apparent reluctance to get involved and insure the survival of the original "Survival."

Forum provokes mixed reaction

By JOSEPH WRIGHT
Emotions were running high Wednesday night when a capacity crowd at St. Lawrence Hall participated in a forum entitled, Police—Who Needs Them?

The forum prompted by recent public concern over alleged use of violence by Metro police, was chaired by Toronto Sun columnist Alan Anderson. Metro Toronto Police Association president Syd Brown, filmmaker Michael Scott and Humber College's law enforcement program head Barrie Saxton, a former British and Metro policeman, were also on the panel.

When one member of the audience pointed to a specific instance of alleged torture by police, Saxton said he believed it to be "an unfortunate and isolated incident."

However, further response to the question was interrupted when a man shouted: "Who is Maloney?" and "It's a whitewash."

The man was referring to a provincial government inquiry into police violence, headed by Toronto criminal lawyer Arthur Maloney, which began hearings yesterday.

In response to a query on the amount of violence involving police, Brown said that given the amount of contact between the 4,300-man force and the public, it was "very small."

The panel answered questions about the role of police in society—"Whatever you want them to be at a given moment!"—and the amount of training required to become a policeman—"six months of intensive work."

Many questions took the form of statements or personal anecdotes, and the crowd frequently broke into applause or jeers.

A half-hour National Film Board film, Station Ten, made by Michael Scott, was shown before questioning and discussion. In a documentary style the film depicted the problems and pressures encountered in urban police work.

The film was shot in and around a Montreal police station over a period of 60 days in 1972.

Questions ranged from, "Which is the most sadistic and vicious police station in Toronto?" asked by a man who alleged he was beaten by policemen to an emotional query by a woman asking why police shouldn't walk out for a month "to let them know what it's like without the police?"

The forum was sponsored by the public affairs department of Toronto Arts Productions and the National Film Board.

Ideas: The spark we run on

Hoechst develops a constant stream of new ideas to keep its research pointed in the right directions. Ideas about what is needed, ideas about what is wanted. Ideas about what is possible, ideas about what is probable in the light of a constantly changing, ever-increasing body of basic knowledge.

Imagination steers the ship

Imagination is a prime source of the new ideas Hoechst uses constantly in order to keep developing better products — more effective medicines, better chemical and industrial materials. Imagination is only half the battle, but when good ideas are properly teamed with the discipline of applied research, they constitute a formidable force in the search for improved products in every area of modern life.

Helping Build Canada

Products and ideas from Hoechst have touched and improved the quality of people's lives in every area around the world, in a hundred countries on six continents. As an affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organizations Canadian Hoechst Limited has a full century of research and achievement to draw upon. In Canada, Hoechst is an autonomous company employing Canadians to serve Canadian needs.

Hoechst in Canada concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, plastics, printing plates, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst products and services, Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. Hoechst thinks ahead.

Pan, in upper Cabbagetown, was once a fashionable general store and butcher shop; today it is a fashionable grocery store and poster art gallery.

Pan Poster Gallery Sackville and Amelia

Posters at Pan Gallery do not mean pinups of Paul Newman or reproductions of the "Last Supper".

The posters on sale here were originally made to publicize an occasion such as play or art exhibition or to advertise a product. They are usually only available in limited runs. Or, if they were mass-produced, they have become very rare. The owner of the gallery, Trinity College professor Douglas Chambers, gives them the name of printed ephemera. He tries to save them, nevertheless.

One finds posters celebrating everything from Hamlet to hamburgers, beef broth to Beethoven. The accumulation of images and events becomes quite staggering.

Whether through reproductions, photographs or original graphic design the range of possible effects seems almost unlimited, from pop art to classicism, from the ornamental to the starkly plain.

Most familiar to me were Toronto theatre posters, especially the bold and captivating designs from T.W.P.

Anyone who has ever tried, with feigned nonchalance and trembling hand, to unstick posters from bulletin boards or store windows appreciates the difficulty of getting them.

Working through the original distributors is far more laborious and time consuming — which is why a gallery like Pan is quite rare.

There is also a large collection, including posters from the Tate Gallery, the Royal Shakespeare Company and the London Times, which has been gathered personally in England.

The gallery is also interested in the combination of word and image in a nonfunctional sense as in the work by Charles Pachter currently featured.

There are also a few pieces of concrete poetry at Pan. Some contain colour and imagery such as the marvellous cards by Ian Hamilton Finlay. In others, the words themselves spiral and flow into designs upon the page.

Pan is situated on the corner of Sackville and Amelia streets in upper Cabbagetown in what was a fashionable general store and butcher shop 75 years ago and which is a fashionable grocery store and art gallery. Extensive renovations have restored the old charm while comfortably providing for new needs. A slide projector has been set up to enable one to see more easily what is available on the shelves. Although the price range is 50c to $5000, most of the things I liked were under $10.

Pan is open Thursday and Friday 12-8 and weekends 10-6, Mondays and Wednesdays by appointment only.

THE MOVIE MAN Presents

If you like "THE LORD OF THE RINGS" you will find out over Fritz Lane's epic film which reveals the legend of the Nibelungs in two parts, beginning with the story of Siegfried, how he fought the dragon and killed in his blood to save himself involuntarily except where a blood feud fell, of his battles with Hrunn the Nibelung ruler to win Kriemhild in marriage and of the treachery that cost his life. Part two tells of Kriemhild's revenge against her family for the death of Siegfried, the warrior kills the King, bears him a child and then sets out to see her vengeance on Hrunn the first man who betrayed. The first part of the film has a misty fairy tale setting, the second half is grim and dark, full of destruction and death.

getting older: an interview with geoff muldaur

In the middle of Geoff Muldaur's last set of the week at the Chimney on Yonge Street a while back, the audience showed a little life. For the first time that evening, it appeared that the majority was paying attention to him. People who had wished the background music would stick more to the background noticed the lull and looked toward the small central stage.

There were calls for 'Boney Moroney', but Muldaur wasn't up to 'Boney Moroney'. Somebody else wanted Chuck Berry's 'Havana Moon'. Muldaur wasn't up to 'Havana Moon' either.

Suddenly Muldaur stopped and addressed the audience. He said he'd had a rotten week at the Chimney, but he guessed that the fault lay with the place, not the people. Then he swung into 'CC Rider', followed by a song by Bobby Charles called 'Tennessee Blues', and out.

Later, he talked about what got him down at the Chimney. He said he was getting older now. He was less eager for the public to like him than he had been ten years ago. He was still capable of doing his best to get the house going some sets, but other sets he didn't bother to try.

He asked me what I thought of the Chimney.

Geoff Muldaur

I thought the club management wasn't sure what they wanted — a folk club or a place for people to talk and drink and spend money (hamburger with chips and coleslaw $2.25 — 'The House Burger').

Muldaur: 'Oh, they know what they want ...'

A younger Geoff Muldaur found his way to Boston's Club 47 about a dozen years ago. Exciting things were happening there. While all around them were into folk, the Club 47 regulars were making jug band music, which took blues and popular songs of the 20's and 30's and did something which was not quite serious but by no means a send-up to them.

When the dust settled and several of the regulars had a Vanguard recording contract as the Jim Kweskin Jug Band, Geoff Muldaur and his future wife, Maris (nee D'Amato) were among them.

Along the way, Geoff recorded an LP for Prestige which he doesn't like much now. 'I was too young'. He thinks his voice in particular has improved since those days.

The Jug Band LPs he thinks more highly of. 'There's a lot of good music in them.'

In 1968, 'Kweskin got tired of The Jug Band, so he broke it up.' Geoff and his by-then wife recorded a couple of LPs together, 'Pottery Pie' and 'Sweet Potatoes'. They sold poorly, poorly enough that Warner Brothers never released the second one in Canada, something Geoff is still angry about. Then, Geoff and Maria split up. Maria headed to the west coast and a solo career. Geoff and Amos Garrett, who had played on the Geoff and Maria LPs, joined Paul Butterfield's Better Days.

Nine months ago Geoff left Better Days. 'Why?' 'I didn't like the way it was handled.' 'Which means?' 'Well, it can only mean one of two or three things. I'm not going to point the finger at individuals.' Nevertheless, Geoff thinks the Better Days stint was good for him. 'They're fine musicians.'

Which brings us up to date, and Geoff Muldaur sitting in the Chimney, trying to play over the buzz of conversation and the rrring of the cash register, baseball cap on his head, picking at the guitar, seated at the piano. He sings in an abrasive, slightly nasal voice. With him are Stephen Bruton, an old friend, on guitar, sounding vaguely like Amos Garrett, and Jim Colegrove on bass, fresh from Ian and Sylvia.

His repertoire is wider than ever — the ever-present blues, another generation's popular songs, a few originals, and songs by favorite contemporaries, like Bobby Charles, whose 'Small Town Talk' is a minor masterpiece. (Muldaur: 'You should hear his LP on Bearsville.' Me: 'I did, but I didn't think he could sing ... ! Muldaur: 'You're crazy. Listen again.')

About this time I ran out of questions to ask and I noticed Muldaur's fingers tapping on the table. He apologized — 'I'm still shellshocked from this gig' — got up and headed out to Yonge Street.

Geoff Muldaur has been just off to one side of the spotlight three times — with Kweskin, Maria Muldaur, and Butterfield. He's paid dues, he's good, and not just as a performer, but increasingly as an arranger with so far unerring taste. Yet while friends make it high, he is playing the clubs to people who wonder who he is and if they should have heard of him.

In one of his own songs, 'I'm Rich', he expresses a wry sense of his position: 'If I die/And St. Peter don't know how I feel/I'm gonna get my manger/To make me a rich man's deal/I want sixty from the top/And forty from below/Let St. Peter know/I want high billing on that show /I'm rich, son of a bitch if I ain't rich ...'

But there are bright spots ahead too. Geoff begins work on a solo album in three weeks. A new Geoff and Maria LP will be recorded, beginning in January. In addition, Geoff has spent some of his time since leaving Better Days arranging on Maria's second solo album. (This gives me hope — I thought her first was a bit faceless.)

Who knows? The spotlight may be due to shift.

interview with peter madden: tragedy beneath the humour

When the play The Night No One Yelled opened at Toronto's Tarragon Theatre earlier this month, it marked a significant step away from the past for thirty-four years old playwright Peter Madden.

For Toronto-born Madden the pattern was set at age thirteen when he was put into detentional training school following his involvement in a burglary. Later Madden was involved in other burglaries; he has spent nearly half his life in prisons. His final stay ended three years ago when he was paroled from Collins Bay Penitentiary.

Having spent so much of his lifetime on the 'inside', Madden feels qualified to write a play about prison existence. On a recent visit to Toronto to see how rehearsals were going, Madden discussed The Night No One Yelled. 'The play is about one night in a prison and what goes on there,' he said. 'There's no hero in the play; just a group of men. It's very realistic. It's about survival and how these men get through one night, as they must learn to get through so many. Guys in prison tend to deal with their situations in a humorous manner. But it's just the old thing about laughing so you won't cry. In the play I try to say how tough prison life really is and I emphasize the real tragedy beneath the humour.'

Madden claims that there's no message in the play and any comment about prison reform must be discovered between the lines.

Canadian prison life has already been dealt with in John Herbert's famous play Fortune and Men's Eyes which was largely concerned with the sexual politics of prison existence. Does Madden's play bear any relation to Herbert's? 'No. For one thing I didn't see that much homosexuality in prison. I didn't see guys being forced into it. I do think that prisons are changing now. There are a lot of well-educated kids coming in now, mostly on dope charges. These are innocent kids, who spout love and peace, and prison life is a big shock for them.'

Madden got the initial idea for The Night No One Yelled after he witnessed guards beating a group of kids but he hastens to add that his play is not particularly brutal.

Madden, a down-to-earth, friendly man was educated formally to grade 11. He became involved in writing when there was a call for an editor of the Collins Bay prison paper. He took the job on a lark. The playwright learnt a great deal from running the paper and also gained the important self-discipline a writer needs.

His first play, The Criminal Record, also a prison play, was produced at Collins Bay. Peter Duffy, who met Madden while instructing prisoners in drama, directed the play.

The Criminal Record was invited to the Dominion Drama Festival. It went, the cast of inmates intact, and was the first time in the history of the Dominion Drama Festival that a play was performed under armed guard.

News of the talented writer in Collins Bay Penitentiary reached the National Film Board in Montreal and they filmed a segment of The Criminal Record, titling it Cell 16. Eventually the NFB offered Madden a writing job and parole was granted.

The Night No One Yelled was developed and produced by a free-floating Montreal company called Beggars Workshop, who have also mounted the Tarragon production. Madden's friend Peter Dubby again directed.

Beggars Workshop spent a long time on the play and Madden credits the Workshop actors with contributing much of the character development. 'They took three months on the play,' he says. 'Before they knew what their parts were going to be we had them each choose a crime, commit the crime, and then we had them go through each of the steps leading to imprisonment.'

Prison becomes such a safe place: all your decisions are made for you.

The first performance of The Night No One Yelled was given at Collins Bay Penitentiary and the inmates responded with great enthusiasm. 'They all found models among themselves for the various characters,' Madden explains, 'and they came up to me afterwards and said things like, 'See the guy over there? He's a fucking Harry!''

The Montreal production met with a favourable critical response and was held over for a second week. Now Madden is involved in discussing possible filming.

Peter Madden says that he has no axe to grind in his writing but he simply wants to deal with people and things that no one else deals with. He writes speedily. The Night No One Yelled was actually written in a single afternoon, but he ponders ideas in his head long before he actually sits down to the typewriter.

Madden lives in Montreal with his girlfriend and their young son and he's glad to be away from the temptations of old Toronto. 'So I can prove myself to my friends,' he says, 'then they'll know that I didn't turn out to be such a bum.'

'It's just the old thing about laughing so you won't cry.'

Angel's Andre Previn conducts in numerous new recordings

A busy fellow, this Andre Previn.

He wears so many hats in so many places that simply cataloguing his doings can be exhausting. He's been a jazz pianist, a boy wonder in Hollywood music circles, a soundtrack writer, a concert pianist in all phases of the repertoire, a composer, and most recently, a conductor. Since he was four, Andre has been a musician, and the piano has always been his instrument. To hear the discs he cut while still in his teens, one wonders why he didn't have a flourishing career in jazz.

Previn's early training was, of course, based in the classics, and in 1960 he decided to concentrate on them. For a few years he conducted and played virtually everywhere, in a headlong drive to get the experience he felt he needed.

Along the way, he dropped one wife (Dory Previn, now a singer in her own right) and found another (actress Mia Farrow) and changed record labels several times. A complete collection of his pre-1971 recordings would be a difficult thing to amass — his work was spread out on several record labels. Since 1971, he has been in the EMI-Capitol-Angel stable, and his recorded output has been prodigious. Last year, his complete recording of Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" garnered raves, and his recording of Symphony No. 2 by Rachmaninoff was my pick for the best symphonic recording of the season.

The orchestra that follows Previn's baton today is the London Symphony, a virtuoso group that had lost some of its lustre in the 'sixties. The appointment of Previn as chief conductor was beneficial to all concerned; the musicians sound splendid on record, and Previn has the security of a consistent group of musicians to work with.

So ... with all the preliminaries and adulations out of the way, what are we to make of this mammoth new release of Previn — LSO recordings just issued by Angel? I'll talk about them one by one in a moment, but consider: what is being proved when a conductor records music as diverse as Beethoven's Fifth, and Walton's Second Symphony? What is it that is to be proved — versatility? or catholic tastes? or front-office sales concern?

First on the list is a grab-bag called "Previn Conducts", (Angel S37021) a selection of shorter concert favourites. Right off the bat it appealed to me, because it avoids the standard concert-favourites-record selection just a bit. Starting with Leonard Bernstein's sparkling overture to "Candide", and running through numbers by Enesco, Tchaikovsky (quite standard fare here — "Waltz of the Flowers" and all that) and ending with a smooth performance of Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on Greensleeves", it's a thoroughly enjoyable grab-bag, especially for newcomers to classics

Item number two (S37002) sees an excursion into piano-playing for Previn, assisted by veteran conductor Sir Adrian Boult. Two Mozart concertos (G major, K.453 and C minor, K.491) are presented, so we won't forget that Andre is a mean piano player. While not quite the performance I'd expect from Geza Anda or Emil Gilels, this is agreeable playing, and, orchestraly, certainly well handled. When Boult is present, you can always be sure of excellent musicianship. And Previn is no amateur at the keyboard.

I'm afraid I can't say very much favourable about another release, Beethoven's Fifth (S36927). What a danger it is to record this work! Every titanic interpreter of Ludwig van has had his go at this warhorse, and in Previn's hands it sounds it. Tempos are lax, the usually crisp and well-defined sound he gets from the musicians of the LSO is absent, and an air of bored lethargy surrounds the proceedings.

This disc is tolerable, until you play the Karajan version, which seems to leap out at you from the speakers and confront you with a giant's fury. Would I be wrong if I suspected that EMI prevailed upon Previn and the LSO to record this one? The rest of the records in this issue present a wide, varied program, with few warhorses to speak of. J'Accuse . . .

Two recordings of the past year or so have been unqualified successes. First Tchaikovsky's old standby "The Nutcracker" was released — in a vibrant, alive rendition that cleared the cobwebs of pop-concert mustiness away from it. Not that "nutcracker" is get-u-and-kill-'em stuff, but there's more to it than your grandmother's old 78's might lead you to suspect.

Sales of the two-record set were brisk, so Angel has taken the logical step and put together a highlights album (S36990). The music is presented in familiar format, as "Suites Nos. 1 & 2". No change in performance from the complete version, of course — it is the same performance.

The Prokofiev "Romeo and Juliet", already mentioned, was a far more interesting recording. It was the first complete stereo recording of the music, and the EMI technical team did a splendid job of capturing the orchestra's sound. That recording came on three discs, with illustrated book, and so on. Here's another excerpt disc, billed as a "suite from the ballet". If you can afford the complete set, get it. If not, this disc (S370207) is a good stopgap measure. Previn does splendidly with Russian ballet music, probably because it appeals to the theatricality in him.

Back to the Russians again, the subject this time being Dimitri Shostakovich. It seems that the more modern the work, the greater the effort Previn puts into it. Perhaps this has to be the case, since the much greater complexity inherent in music of the last fifty years demands more work from the conductor. But, as energy expended doesn't always equal quality of performance, one has to be careful with overall generalizations.

Symphony No. 8 by Shostakovich was a piece written during the worst of the second world war. It depicts the horrid sufferings of the people of Stalingrad during the battle to seize that city. And yet, after the war, this was one of the works cited by the government as being "anti-soviet". Perhaps the soviet bosses were not enamored of the symphony's somewhat stark depictions of the ravages of battle when bureaucracy fights bureaucracy.

The symphony receives fairly regular playing now, on both sides of the iron curtain, and to hear it in a good performance is a moving experience. Previn's recording of the work (S36980) is solid and straightforward, with a strong sense of drama. In particular, the first movement (a long, achingly drawn-out adagio) shows him at his best, full of empathy for the music and the composer.

Last of the lot is Walton's Symphony No. 2, backed by two Walton overtures and a good reading of "The Rio Grande" by Constant Lambert (S37001). These are pieces by modern-day English composers, and are as lively and intriguing as could be desired. The Walton symphony, written in 1960, is an appealing work, filled with expert orchestration and a dazzling use of the instruments. His overtures "Portsmouth Point" and "Scapino" sound a little like souped-up movie music, but that isn't meant to degrade them; they're simply fun, a delight to listen to.

"The Rio Grande" is another matter. Lambert wrote it to spotlight the solo piano in 1927, and like most young European composers of the day, he was utterly taken with Jazz, then just beginning to make its mark on the old world. The music is scored for orchestra, vocal group (mezzo and chorus) and a wildly varied percussion section. As an example of jazz's influence on more conventional music, it's fascinating, but I'm less than taken with the vocal part. To these ears, it sounds a little cornball, particularly the text. Now maybe if it were sung in Italian or German . . .

With musicians as skilled as the LSO boasts, Previn must have had great fun making this disc. The performances are polished and expert — and of all the eight records I've talked about, this one is the most consistently interesting.

So, to answer my headline question: is Andre Previn the all-round conductor of the decade? Probably not, but would he want that distinction? If this record survey is any indication he's strong in the modern works, able as a pianist, but less than enthusiastic to tackle the warhorses. Given free rein from the front office, I think we can expect even more challenging, exciting recordings from this man.

I. F. Stone's Weekly cap

I.F. Stone's Weekly begins with the Marine Corps band striking up "Hail To The Chief", a particularly pompous and superficial government march. The camera pans across the Marines and the platform party at this by-gone state occasion: there is Robert McNamara smiling, Lyndon Johnson summoning some dignity out of his doggy features. It is not a venal moment, not one of the many gauche ones. At the time it probably seemed solemn. Hail To The Chief continues, but suddenly it is crossed by I.F. Stone's unique chirpy voice: "Now", he says, "in covering a capitol, there are certain basic assumptions you have to operate on. The first is that every government is run by liars, and nothing they say should be believed. That is a prima facie assumption, unless proven to the contrary."

Vincent Canby wrote that I.F. Stone's Weekly made him feel what other people said they felt after The Sound of Music. It had the same effect on me. It is a glow, the old Saturday matinee high of seeing the good guys ride out against impossible odds and come back clean and victorious.

It has been a long way from The Lone Ranger to I.F. Stone. But over the years the preservation of Truth, Justice and the American Way has fallen to different hands. Heroes change accordingly. In 1953, blacklisted and broke, Stone told his wife, "I'm going to graduate from a pariah to a character, and then, if I last long enough, I'll be a national institution." That has come to pass and in spades.

I.F. Stone and his reputation have already outlived many of the more powerful men he attacked (and who attacked him in return): McCarthy, Dulles, Johnson, McNamara, Agnew, Nixon. While the political winds will continue to shift, one cannot picture Izzie Stone in disrepute. It is the sham and gobbledy gook of public utterances that become transparent with time.

Stone examining prints.

Equivocation cracks like old mortar, while candor and honesty stay solid: so Stone is unassailable.

Janis Joplin lives on in Fr

"My music ain't supposed to make you want to riot! My music's supposed to make you want to fuck!"

Janis Joplin in Buried Alive

Myria Friedman hasn't finished her chopped steak lunch. In fact, it looks as though she just picked at it.

The food at the Windsor Arms is reputed to be first-rate, but Myria is in a real rush. The chopped steak is abandoned on the dresser among the cigarette butts.

Has she remembered to pack her hair dryer? Myria only has two days in Toronto. Her publisher has arranged a whirlwind schedule of interviews. Every minute is taken up and it's nerve racking.

Myria checks through the typed list of appointments the publisher has given her, just to make certain that it's going in the right order. More reporters to see, another TV show, and then it's back to New York. There was Brian Linehan in the morning and that went well and this afternoon, yes, here it is, Global something or other. The newspapers are squeezed in between the talk shows.

Myria sits for a minute. She smokes non-stop and talks in a tiny, breathless voice.

Doesn't she get tired of talking about Janis Joplin? "Tired of talking about Janis Joplin! I've been talking about Janis Joplin for so long! Of course I'm not tired of it, I'm tired of this schedule."

She checks the list again and worries about the special tax the publisher has ordered to drive her out to the TV studios in Don Mills. Myria hopes it arrives soon.

She can't understand why reporters in Canada never seem to arrive for interviews with tape recorders that have batteries in them. I proceed to plug mine in.

Has she packed everything? Because right from the TV studio it's straight to the airport for Myria. Yes, the hair dryer is in the red case.

She sits back on the bed again, smokes, and I plant the microphone between the chopped steak and a half-eaten roll.

Janis' former high school companions are scattered. In Port Arthur, only Karleen remains. But from all of them came the theme of her difference, Janis was "one of the guys", some failure to meet standards of southern lady femininity that showed itself in a roughness of manner, a course defiance, a willingness to play buffoon, to subject herself to verbal abuse, anything to be noticed and to belong.

"I'm no longer doing promotional work," Myria says. "It was never my thing. I was there and went into it." Myria Friedman fell into work for Albert Grossman, one of the giant rock entrepreneurs of the sixties. Why, he even had Dylan ("And I hope you don't think he's such a sweet, easy person," Myria adds.) She was assigned to Janis Joplin and for two years, the last two of Janis' life, Friedman captures the old Sat. matinee glow

"I really have so much fun," Stone tells a university audience, "I ought to be arrested. I spit in their eye, and do what I think is right, and report the news, and have enough readers to make some impact . . . It's such a pleasure that you forget, you forget what you are writing about."

I.F. Stone's Weekly is a radical's movie and one with grit for both the novice's and the old pol's mill. There was a time, as recent as a student generation ago, when everybody around seemed to be a radical of one stripe or another. Now it is so quiet it is difficult to tell whether the basic lessons of politics have been learned or whether they have been forgotten.

If the latter is the case, then I.F. Stone's Weekly can serve as a one-hour political hypodermic, a primer full of evidence that governments are indeed liars and the press — by and large a harem of bought men. Some of the best pieces from Stone's paper are in the movie verbatim, including the Weekly's expose of the Tonkin Gulf hoax used to bamboozle an embarrassingly willing U.S. congress into full-scale war in Vietnam.

For those to whom this is old hat there is another fascination with Stone: despite years of insight into how corrupt and implacable things are ("What a bunch of idiots they take us for, and I'm sorry to admit," Stone says, "that to some degree their faith in our idiocy is not misplaced."); despite all he has been so irrevocably awry, I.F. Stone has not become cynical.

It didn't phase him that, while a few thousand read the truth about Tonkin Gulf in the Weekly, millions and millions heard Walter Cronkite describe General Ky as the hero of the Vietnamese people.

When McCarthyism pulled down the temple on the whole opposition in the fifties, Stone picked himself up and constructed a small subscription list of die-hards. He hunted until he found a willing printer. There is a down-to-earth, business-as-usual doggedness in the man that lets him work full-out and confidently on margin. As Brecht put it, McCarthyism brought not loss of life, but Joss of livelihood, and Stone must have seen that too. The same clarity that enables him to read between the government's lines enabled him to put personal and political adversity in perspective, and keep it from interfering with his work.

The tentacles of McCarthyism have been very slow to wither (Richard Nixon, for example, being one) and it has only been in the last three or four years that Stone has received above-ground recognition. He has accepted it with equanimity. And with some impishness.

"It is a journalist's task to be clear, cool and objective", the head of Associated Press told the 1971 Polk Awards dinner. Then they introduced I.F. Stone, who delivered this thank you speech:

"I'm very happy to receive my first establishment award. I want to say one word about George Polk, who seems to be forgotten at these affairs. I knew George very well. He was a wonderful young man, a wonderful young man. And he was the first journalistic victim of the Cold War. I noticed the antiseptic reference to him being killed on his way to interview an insurgent leader. The fact is that Greece was our first Vietnam.

"George Polk was the 'Z' of the forties — murdered by the Greek police who tried to frame the murder on the Left, although George was one of the only friends the Left had. One of these days somebody ought to do the story of George Polk in all its implications and its relationship to the agony of Greece under our imperialist oppression. Thank you."

The movie works because it leaves in that "thank you" and because it pans the ashen faces at the head table while saucy Lizzie Stone is at the podium. Jerry Bruck Jr., the film-maker, doesn't let ideology override theatricality very often. In fact Stone's constant humour — a surprise to readers of the usually dry Weekly — is born as much of Bruck's edits as Stone's wit.

This is a biased presentation, more a monument than a biography. It never asks the hardest questions, never worries the failure beyond Stone's peculiar success. But Bruck skates all that with such elan that one doesn't fault him. If some of his effects are obvious, they are also natural and served by quick edits. In the news footage one has the sense of Bruck working with the available library stock, (that is, one can feel his low budget) but Bruck selects well. Witness a long scene of Lyndon Johnson pointlessly underlining bits of the Tonkin Gulf bill in order to go through enough souvenir presidential pens to gift all the entourage at the signing ceremony.

Bruck includes the compulsory, but nonetheless eerie shots of napalm bombs exploding and careening like crazed jellyfish, and the famous clip of naked Vietnamese children running before an American patrol. But he sets these off, not against Johnson or Nixon platitudes, but against the Amherst choir singing Laudate Dominum at a ceremony in which I.F. Stone receives an honorary degree. Had Bruck explored this verbally as well as visually, I.F. Stone's Weekly might not have been just delightful and informative but also deeply troubling.

Bruck is aware of the omission, at least it seems that way from his singling out of Stone's misgivings for the last shot of the film. "Sometimes," Stone tells an audience, "I feel like a boy covering a big fire. It's just wonderful and exciting and you're a cub reporter and God has given you a big fire to cover. And you forget that it's really burning." While the remark is succinct it is superficial: I.F. Stone would not let one of his subjects off the hook that quickly.

Friedman biography worked with the singer, coordinating her press relations and apparently, being her good friend. It's all down there in her book Buried Alive the 'intimate biography' of Janis, and Myra is in town to publicize the paperback edition.

Joplin

"Yes, it's done very well. First the hardcover edition, which has been out for a long time, sold about a hundred thousand copies, and now the paperback is doing very well. I'm very pleased with it."

And what was Janis really like? That's the obvious question. She was a deeply disturbed woman, that impression comes across strongly in the book. She was also rather obnoxious at times.

"You think she was obnoxious? I don't feel that at any time in my book did I mean for Janis to look obnoxious. I'm surprised that you'd say that. It's certainly true that Janis, at times, could be very intimidating and hostile. But she was a very soft person."

"She was always talking about how ugly she was. 'I'm so ugly,' she'd say, or 'You think I'm ugly, don't you?' and she'd say how in school they thought she was just an ugly girl of no significance, ugly and loud. I always had the impression that what she wanted to do was to go back to Port Arthur and be accepted and it didn't matter what she had to do to get that, but way in the back of her mind, that was basically the whole scheme."

Janis had difficulty coping with people. She was tormented and often took her self-anger out on those around her. "Yes, she pushed men aside a lot. She waited until they liked her and then she turned against them, but she certainly didn't do that with me. God knows, she was disturbed, and maybe that destroys your vision of Janis. If anything, the effect of my book has been to increase sympathy for Janis."

For the most part Buried Alive is a good job; it's not a sensational quickie like some of the other books around on Janis. When Friedman tries to get too analytical and when she sums up that confusing period of the late sixties, like a pop sociologist, the book flounders. But when she sticks to the straight story of Janis the book is satisfying and has an honest ring to it. The author is proud of her achievement.

"Did you know that this is the first rock biography to get a National Book Award nomination?" she asks.

Myra searches the room again for possible missing belongings. She calls the desk and requests a porter in precisely seven minutes.

"Janis was much more victim than victimizer, or as Carl Sandburg said about Marilyn Monroe, she was much more sinned against than sinner. People didn't try to get Janis help at the end. Many of them didn't know how bad she was. Janis was feisty, but Janis was not a cruel person, she was terribly insecure, she was neurotic. She wanted desperately to be loved but she couldn't handle it, and she wasn't able to give love very well but she would want to give it so much."

"I hear a rumour that somebody in San Francisco is spreading stories that I'm a dyke." True to her part, she added, "You go back there and find out who it is and tell them that Janis says she's gotten it on with a couple thousand cats in her life and a few hundred chicks and see what they can do with that!"

We look for explanations of such severe emotional disturbance usually in a person's past; most often in childhood. But in Friedman's book we get a hazy, unclear picture of Janis' childhood in Port Arthur and her relationship with her parents.

"Turn off that machine and I'll tell you the real story about Janis' parents," Myra Friedman promises. "Someday I'll write it all but I couldn't in the book. There were all sorts of legal agreements with Mr. and Mrs. Joplin. They wanted a whitewash job." And she proceeds to tell me about the domineering, Victorian Mrs. Joplin and the mousey, weak and intellectual Mr. Joplin. Another facet in Janis' oddy schizoid make-up was her strong puritan streak, no doubt inherited from her mother.

Janis was very promiscuous, stalking bars looking for nice young boys to pull in for the night. She had female lovers, she was alcoholic and she died while on the needle.

"But she was really very prudish. There's a story that's a good example of Janis' mentality. I took a holiday once, I went to Guadalupe and stayed at a Club Mediteranee. One night I went into my hut, and I was going to bed, it was very hot, so I lay down on the bed nude. All of a sudden this man got up off the floor, totally nude, and just walked out. I was scared and I screamed. It was either a joke or he was drunk, I don't know. Of course it was very funny and the next day I told everybody on the island and they laughed and when I got back I told people and they thought it was funny and then I told Janis. She was horrified. She was really shocked. She didn't think it was funny at all. Janis was really offended and she couldn't believe that I could take it so lightly."

The nature of her earliest comments about the experience of performing were not so very provocative . . . by late summer and fall, they were quite a bit stronger: "It's like the 'rush' that people experience when they take heavy dope;" "It's like an orgasm." So did her proclamations about singing itself become broadened as time went on. "Why should I hold back now and sound mediocre just so I can sound mediocre twenty years from now?"

Myra says that the rock world didn't exploit Janis. Her manager, Albert Grossman, was among the most scrupulous in the business, taking care of his performers' money, even hiring investment experts to help them. Janis was emotionally exploited but she almost demanded it. "She wasn't exploited by the business as so many people are," Friedman asserts. "Grossman honestly didn't know about her addiction up until the end. She brought it on herself. She couldn't help it."

The author feels that we can't compare Janis to Jimi Hendrix because Hendrix was exploited terribly by the rock industry. She does allow for the comparison between Janis and Judy Garland.

What is it about the American star system that destroys many of the famous?

"Well, it happens to the people who are vulnerable and can't stand up to fame. It takes a great deal of strength to cope with it. Some people can and some people can't. Janis couldn't."

The end, of course, was termed an accident. But no lack of conscious intention erases the significance of her state in all those preceding months.

The porter has finally arrived. Myra is in a real rush. "We can talk more about Janis in the lobby," she vows. She checks the room once more for forgotten possessions. But downstairs the driver is already waiting and Myra is off to the Global studios, she thinks, and more talk about Janis Joplin and that 'intimate biography.'

Juliet weeps on the stuffed bosom of her Nurse.

One look at the program was enough to suggest that Love's Gaucheries, the Ryerson Players' pot pourri of scenes from seven of Shakespeare's plays, would sag beneath the weight of its aspirations.

Indeed the first presentation, Romeo and Juliet's parting from the bedroom and Juliet's subsequent row with her parents, tell like a lead balloon.

This delicate and tricky sequence was as frantically full of shrieks and credibility as "Where The Heart Is" and one could only feel an embarrassed sense of relief when Juliet (Sheila Rankin) terminated her hysteria upon the stuffed bosom of her nurse (Glenn Matheson).

After a somewhat titful rendering of Harry Hotspur's farewell to Kate ("Away you trifter!"), another classically unmanageable scene, Richard the Third's wooing of Anne, was undertaken.

Such volatile scenes are a particularly bad business to present out of their original context. Without any building whatsoever we are catapulted into a storm of circumstances which naturally seem forced and improbable.

In addition, sheer volume of delivery cannot compensate for a lack of emotional intensity, nor can it convey the complexities of motivation and response which Shakespeare gives us in his characters.

The evening took a welcome turn with "Much Ado About Nothing" which sparkled with wit and activity.

Here, as in "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the players were tully in their element and were able to develop a coherent sense of the plot by playing key segments back to back.

Philip Akin, superb as Benedick, is as lovable as he is laughable when, like the delightful Beatrice, he is led by vanity into the follies of love to which both had proudly professed themselves invulnerable.

The props for "A Midsummer Night's Dream" were a bit gimmicky. Lysander pulled a bottle of Ballantyne's out of his knapsack and Oberon slunk about dressed like Mack the Knife. But the players somehow managed to make a great success out of it.

Though overly ambitious in parts, Love's Gaucheries made an enjoyable evening and the energies and enthusiasm of cast and crew deserve recognition.

Ryerson Players is the repertory company formed by the graduating classes of the four year Acting Program and the three year Technical Production Program, assisted by students of the Advanced Design Program. As members of the Ryerson Players, the students work with professional directors and designers with Ryerson Theatre Department faculty and staff acting as advisors and resource people.

Love's Gaucheries can be seen again October 25-26 at the Ryerson Theatre, Gerrard St. E.

Swishing isn't part of mod dance

La Groupe de la Place Royale's attempt to "break the boundaries between the arts by intermingling them" results in a dismissal of all the arts but dance. At the Eaton Auditorium last week, sound (no stretch of the imagination could call it music) and film were completely subjugated to movement. For hard core dance fans, and there were few others in the almost empty house, it must have been a fun evening.

There were plenty of nice looking men swishing around the stage, batting their eyelashes. The female dancers, classically trained, were highly skilled, but as usual puppets to the choreographer. Men still run the dance world, holding all the top jobs. Who has ever seen a chorus line of men? Or more than the token female choreographer?

Technically, the Eaton Auditorium is not equipped for anything but recitals. But the show was such that no one could tell whether or not the triple images from the footlights were accidental or carefully planned.

Three major works were presented. The first consisted of seven short dances of uneven quality.

The house lights dimmed and six dancers — three female, three male — walked on stage, while the one with the beard, who was later identified as Peter Boneham (each member was introduced in turn), was given the microphone: "Could you turn up the house lights?"

Unbelieving silence from the audience, and the technical crew.

The house lights came on, with "Peter" prancing around the stage. "This is the first time we've ever played a department store. If you don't like the show, the store's open until 9:30."

Peter then called on a member of the audience to shuffle a small pile of cards, and distribute them at random to the folks in the front row.

The Badlands are the topic of this film-within-the-dance.

"Now, when the lights change, you just call out what's written on your little card and we'll dance it."

"Blaine's solo" was the tightest, most dramatic piece of the evening. The dancer, who is not mentioned in the programme, was the most versatile of the company.

If you've ever wondered why dancers never seem to be able to land on the beat, it may be because musicians are producing the music. At this concert the members of the company who are not dancing for the piece produce the sounds for each work, and proved to be remarkably sensitive to the dance. The bells jangled when the dancer moved and not until

The company works well with comedy, particularly in virgil gargyle (where the sounds are produced by gargling stag left), bruised angel (in which Peter drags Roberta (Mohler) from one side of the stage to the other) and Camay, (in which Janet Oxley dances to the Peter Boneham rendition of a Camel soap commercial.)

Boneham's I must say: il fa bien le dire, consisted of three pas de deux in sequence. Francine Boucher and Les Link are both competent dancers, although the supposed sensuous interaction between them was tinged with a bit of note on Boucher's part.

Jean-Pierre Perreault, artistic director with Boneham danced the second pas de deux with Mohler, whose supple body adapted to the strangest distortions with ease. Her short black hair was a change from the hackneyed chignon of the ballet world, and much easier to work with than Boucher's long hair, allowed to hang loose.

The painted body stockings were by Marie-Helene Gascon. It is unfortunate that the three couple, Oxley and Boneham broke the smoothness of design and mood, by wearing patched jeans, cavorting around in circles and keeping up constant chit chat with the audience.

Mirage, again choreographed by Boneham, combined dance with "modern music" (i.e. noise) and a film by Susanne Swibolc. The beautiful velvet costume by Nora Hemenway was completely upstaged by Perreault's ass which Swibolc had filmed in intricate close-up as it bounced around the Albert Badlands. The rest of Perreault was as uncontrolled as his privates.

Markopoulos at Massey Hall Politics and Folk Songs

Crete has been an island of outstanding cultural significance since the age of King Minos.

Nikos Kazantzakis, well-known for his novel Zorba was born on the island.

Other personalities from Crete who have influenced and who still continue to influence Greek life are the two top Greek composers Chadjidakis and Theodorakis.

Then there is Pandelis Prevelakis, who has gained international recognition with his novel Sun of Death translated in some fifty languages.

Crete also gave to Greece the most eminent of twentieth century Greek politicians, the national leader Venizelos.

Last Tuesday, there was an opportunity to enjoy the music of another famous Cretan at a concert at Massey Hall.

Yiannis Markopoulos, 35, is a composer of the new generation. But he bases his compositions on traditional Greek folk-lore (all the different musical 'idioms' developed in the different areas of Greece in older times, such as the musical traditions of Epirus, Pontus, Crete)—which he calls 'popular traditional culture'—and on conventional European music.

Unlike Mikis Theodorakis, who uses bouzouki as his main instrument in all of his compositions, Markopoulos uses instruments hitherto excluded from contemporary Greek popular music.

(Incidentally, Theodorakis has denounced his young fellow-composer who does not recognize as his masters the composers Chadjidakis and Theodorakis who first threw over the European orchestra and adopted neglected old folk instruments, such as the Cretan and Pontiak 'Lyra', the Santouri, in their orchestrations).

In informal discussion last Wednesday, Markopoulos referred to the dictatorship that until last summer reigned supreme in Greece. "I am one of the few people who believes that the seven years (of the dictatorship) were the best thing for our country".

"Before 1967, the faces were very confused. From 1967 and after, the faces were cleared up: We all know now who was what, what everybody's position was, and what everybody's behavior was when the boat was about to sink."

Markopoulos stressed the fact that he does not belong to a particular party. But this does not mean he does not see a responsibility for the artist towards the society he lives in.

Evidence of this belief was Markopoulos' participation with his closest collaborator Nikos Xylouris, in the student strikes at the university of Athens last November. His music and Xylouris as well, was also unofficially banned from the Greek national radio and television networks during the years of the Greek dictatorship.

"I didn't do political song. I created a neo-laik (popular) song, a song openly against what did not allow my free expression."

But Markopoulos does not see himself as a nationalistic artist.

"If the action", he explained, "is taking place in concrete space and time and then becomes art, I believe, it becomes a universal theme. That is, it may start out with particular characteristics of the place and the time in which it took place, but it has a totally different alignment from that of the narrow mold of a national music."

Massey Hall was not full last Tuesday. But the audience was quite responsive and very spontaneous in its appreciation of Markopoulos' music.

At the Nana Mouskouri and Vicky Leandros concerts, just a few weeks ago, there were full houses. But then not only Greeks went to those concerts. There were also those non-Greeks who fell in love with all the Greek songs whose meaning they could barely comprehend.

Perhaps Markopoulos will return to full houses himself someday.

He shoots -- he scores?

Quickly, now: who scored the fastest hat-trick in history? Who got an assist on each of the three goals—or did he? And, last thrilling question, what was the date of this memorable feat?

If you can complete the quiz, stickhandle on down to the Factory Theatre Lab to match wits with Gary Engler's farce Sudden Death Overtime. It opened, formally, on Tuesday night to a two-thirds-full house after several weeks of anxiety about its health. Although there is no sign that the previews held earlier this month have rubbed off into the cast, this may be partially explained by the changes of mind that have apparently gone into its direction.

The opening-night house was an even split between those who went to the play because it was a Canadian opening night, those who went because they were connected to the personnel of the company, and those who went because it was about hockey. Only the hockey fans came out satisfied.

The plot is outrageous and should not be worried about. That is one of the rules. Briefly: Mom's husband moved to Moose Jaw, forcing her to abandon her beloved Forum and move to a hell-hole that hasn't even got a decent junior team. But she bullies her three children, named after her favourite players, into becoming puke prodigies. Frank makes it into the NHL (she's ecstatic) but the girls don't. Frank is traded to Toronto, and is declared anathema. Rosa gets into Women's Lib politics, and Maurice stays at home, in training.

As is made vaguely clear about the second act, Maurice, or her mother, has stolen the Stanley Cup. Either Frank or Rosa will get the Cup, as a token of Mom's affection. They both want it for their political futures—Frank has just been traded to Atlanta, and if he gets it back he figures to move up in the Tory party (he's gunning for Education Minister) and Rosa wants to blackmail the country into accepting a woman premier. Maurice, it turns out, wants to disrupt the proceedings. The play is principally one of language and recognition of common knowledge. The action is generally of the dead-fish-in-the-face variety.

The players seem, unfortunately, to believe that they are putting on a serious play by a serious young "Canadian" author. They're being put on. Engler surely was never serious when he wrote the play, but a certain tension has developed because it is being hyped as a significant story, symbolic of this and that. It can't be so; the play is not built to Panzer its way into the Canadian identity of each of us. It's truly indigenous; it builds on that secret secure knowledge that all of us who know how dark it is at five o'clock on a winter pond, share—that all you do in life that's worthwhile is have hockey players and politicians to entertain you, and, at the appropriate age, the opposite sex to keep your blood circulating properly.

Those who didn't enjoy the play may have been taken in by the 'gravity' of the occasion; or they may, more reasonably, have been put off by the acting, which was less convinced than it needed to be. Son Frank, in particular (Dominic Hogan) seemed to be constantly changing his mind about whether or not he was a 'statement' character. Too often there were moments of mental constipation on-stage that seemed to have occurred when moments of solemnity overtook the cast or the play, like dead, clanking Jacob Marley.

Yet anyone who goes to the production will easily be entertained. The admirable set, by Patrick Christopher, transports you right into your memories of senior loop blood and threats, consisting as it does of doors, red and white paint, a goal, and lots of chickenwire.

The play gives satisfying vignettes: hamfisted Frank, skating downhill all the way but now encumbered with a Forest Hill fiancée (Alexandra Sellers) who ways just the right thing in just the right tone just about three minutes too late.

Maurice, (Naomi St. John), who thanks to her mother's generosity, is not named Boom-Boom, is permanently trying to join the big-leagues to escape the family penalty-box.

Rosa, the elder sister, (Dorothy Poste) gets the best entrance in the show, as she sashays in, wearing the latest Radical decor, her boyfriend on a leash—"I met him at York, where I was studying Under Attack"—at least that's what I thought I heard her say.

The demanding part of Mom was played with grim determination by Joyce Campion. Tuning in a hundred per cent effort was necessary since she is committed to directorial fancies that she didn't fit in well with; her strength of portrayal was arrived at more by her voice than by frenzied activity.

The kudos for most enjoyable acting goes to the shaggy dog story of the night, the unexpected romance between Maurice and Harold, a.k.a. Bowow (Jim McLarty).

Randy Newman
Massey Hall
Oct. 14

I know the inaccuracies that are corollary to the word "best", but if there were a best song-writer, Randy Newman would be it; at least that is what most song-writers think. And the public seems to have caught on too, since Newman's concert Monday night at Massey Hall sold out.

(Ry Cooder was the other half of the bill and he is another best, but his field is so singular that there is no-one really to compare him to. If Pete Seeger was thirty years younger and living in LA now he might play music like Cooder does. No, probably not. In any case, Cooder is not just an exceptionally funky guitar and mandolin player, he is also a serious folklorist with an ear for everything from Sleepy John Estes blues, through Roosevelt era occasional verse, World War II inspirational songs and fifties rock 'n roll. The Rolling Stones wanted Cooder to replace Brian Jones, but it didn't turn his head. Cooder turned them down having other fish to fry).

If there is any question about Randy Newman's peculiar worth, just look at what he does:

Baby take off your coat. Real slow.

(It's the "real slow" that Newmanizes it, making it not just suggestive, but decadent, Ritualized.

Now take off your shoes. I'll take your shoes.

(With that second, assertive, simple sentence the ante goes up and it is not just decadent but macabre, gentility and lust twisted up together like a barber pole. I see a ramshackle old Southern mansion surrounded by a swamp.)

Now take off your dress. Yes, yes, yes.

(If that isn't as spectacular as the previous lines, try to replace "yes, yes, yes" with anything else, without blowing the stanza.)

But you can leave your hat on.

But you can leave your hat on.

But you can leave your hat on.

What can you say? Newman does that verse after verse, song after song, mixing up what's sad, hateful and funny, tweaking different, conflicting nerve endings, until a serious listener just has to stand there with his hat in his hands. These are novelty songs pushed to their most extreme, serious extra polation: Tickle me ("The TV set's busted, we can't get a picture, so why don't you tickle me"); Sail Away ("You just sing about Jesus and drink wine all day, climb aboard little wog and sail away"); Simon Smith and the Amazing Dancing Bear ("They'll love us, won't they, they feed us, don't they?"); Old Man ("Don't cry, old man, don't cry. Everybody dies"); Memo to my Son ("You don't talk none. Maybe you never will, babe. But I'll always love you.")

After two years Newman has a new album that is just as subtle, or crude, or whatever the Hell it is that he does so well. It is called Good Old Boys and has one of them on the cover (the picture is blurred but it could be Ron Ziegler) with his mistress. The songs are about crackers, drunks, madmen, one about Nixon, several concerning Huey P. Long and Louisiana in the late twenties and thirties, and one touching love song. As arranger, Newman does full justice to his tunes. I stand here with my hat in my hands.

George Carlin
Convocation Hall
Oct. 11

George Carlin, at Con Hall on Friday, was a big disappointment. Doing two shows obviously threw him off, and unfortunately I went to the second one.

While he opened with great confidence and solid material on growing up, noses, and word plays, he just seemed to dry right up after about forty minutes. He couldn't keep straight what material he'd done in which show, and had to keep asking the audience. While much of the material he did near the end of the show ranked with his opening routine his humour had reached the point of monotony.

By half past eleven people were beginning to leave and yet he plodded on until well past midnight.

His spirit perhaps had been hampered by continuous heckling that he combatted well but didn't defeat until the show was nearly over. And Con Hall become intolerable with smoke, heat and stuffiness. Both of these inconveniences could have been avoided with more stringent marshalling.

People in the second balconies could barely make out what Carlin was saying. Mobius, the sound company for the show, has been criticized before for its inefficiency. SAC and SRO should know that there are better outfits around in the same price bracket.

Carlin, it's been rumoured, is thinking of giving up the performing end of the entertainment business and devoting his time to writing (always his pastime) and the development of other promising artists, instead. If his opening act, Travis Shook and Cub Wow, was any indication of his initial work in this field then he's on the right track. The group's various plays on the eccentricities of rock were outstanding, and its ability to handle the unfortunately inevitable (at Con Hall) hecklers were both entertaining and professional.

NOW SHOWING!
DAILY FROM 1:30

This year a number of changes have been made in the employment of Graduate Teaching Assistants.

In order to make sure that all of these changes have been implemented, the Implementation Committee on the Remuneration of Graduate Student Teaching Assistants is furnishing you with the following check list:

1. Have you received a letter from your department offering you an appointment as a Teaching Assistant this year? (This letter should give an estimate of the total time involved in the assignment and state the salary and vacation pay.)
2. If you are doing the same assignment as last year, then you should receive an increase of 7% (excluding vacation pay).
3. Are you receiving vacation pay?
4. Are you being paid in the $7-$10 per hour range?

If the answer to any of these questions is No, please contact your Department Chairman. Those problems which remain unresolved after consultation should be referred to the Committee at the following address:

Room 222
Simcoe Hall.

The Longest Yard misses a first down

It's difficult enough for a director to ply the standard eternal verities — birth, death, love, separation, loneliness and war, to reel off about half of them — and yet produce a movie critics consider mediocre.

What chance has the director got, then, when he makes a movie about prisoners and guards playing football in a Georgia prison, to assert their notions of masculinity?

Not much, we'd have to say, especially when the project is under the direction of Robert Aldrich, who has assumed public responsibility for such male hormone-strewn aberrations as The Dirty Dozen and, more lately, Emperor of the North.

Any movie about sports immediately must surmount a severe technical problem: do you use actors who can act the role of a professional athlete magnificently, except that they have jowls and are 40 pounds overweight?

Or do you hire several great athletes who run and jump magnificently but project screen personality less successfully than a tackling dummy?

Aldrich opts for Burt Reynolds, former all-star university football player before his knees disintegrated, to play the lead role as a convict who forms a prisoners' football team to play against the prison guards' semi-pro team.

Reynolds holds up well in the 40 minutes of the film devoted to football action, but the other 60 minutes, he plays his usual super-masculine, smirking character, a role he's played in every movie he's made, except Deliverance, where John Boorman cast him successfully to type.

For the rest of the cast, Aldrich opts between supposed actors and former athletes. The professional athletes, on balance, do a better job than the professional actors, a small but numbing crew of hacks led by Eddie Albert.

Albert, playing the villainous prison warden who wants his semi-pro prison guard team to capture a national championship more than anything in the world, turns in a bloated, self-parodying performance, not even up to the low standards he set in the TV series, Green Acres.

The former pro football players give the movie what little value it has. The athletic dramatis personae include Joe Kapp, Sonny Sixkiller, Ray Nitschke, Ernie Wheelright, Ray Odgen, Pervis Atkins, and a large group of semi-pros.

The action scenes they inhabit are exciting and realistic, probably because they worked hard at it for five weeks, six days a week to shoot these sequences.

Reportedly, the movie became

Burt Reynolds fades back to pass in prison football game in movie, The Longest Yard.

like a football game for them. During the filming, the convict team and the guard team worked together as units, and a great hostility grew up.

"A strange thing started happening, I'd look at the faces in the huddle, and this wasn't a movie anymore," Reynolds recounted later.

"It wasn't even a game, it was a battle. The convict team lived and slept together, and so did the guards."

"All day long the black jerseys wouldn't speak to the white jerseys. Once I threw a pass and some guy gave me a cheap shot, and our whole team emptied and ran out on the field to take it up for me."

During the shooting, players like Nitschke who played a guardsman, worked as though they were back in the NFL again.

Many players tried extra hard to dump Reynolds as a matter of professional pride, and some were even carted off the set with serious injuries like Kapp.

This makes for realistic football action, although, ironically, only by duplicating the violence of real football can the staged sequences be authentic.

Aldrich exploits these powerful scenes, though, to depart from his original premiss that football symbolizes all that's wrong with American society.

By the end of the movie, Aldrich manipulates the very elements of football that he originally condemned — the win-at-all-costs philosophy, the senseless violence, the patriotic pep-talk — to make the last ten minutes of the movie resemble the Superbowl.

If this is how you like your movies — or sports — then by all means, go and be purged.

A well assorted concert lineup awaits the masses in the next week or so.

Saturday the 19th, the always unpredictable Lou Reed is at Massey Hall. For an interesting, and inexpensive change of pace, SAC is offering Africanada, a fusion of tribal sounds and contemporary jazz, on Sunday the 20th at Con Hall.

At the Gardens on Monday, CPI presents Van Morrison, who in the view of many, myself included, is the finest male vocalist performing today. Tickets are still available but they're going fast.

SRO has a couple of shows coming up: Oct. 24 Nazareth at Massey Hall with Rush; the 27th Fairport Convention with Sandy Denny plus Stringband at Convocation Hall. The same night Martin Onrot has Shawn Phillips at Massey Hall for his now annual show.

Note Thursday the 31st: that's the night Bruce Cockburn will pack Massey Hall.

At the clubs, the Chimney has Bob and Danny McBride until Saturday night. The Riverboat features the remarkable Leon Redbone this weekend, and the El Mocambo has Diamondback with Mike McKenna closing out their week. Next week the El Mocambo features the James Cotton Blues Band, plus Myles and Lenny.

art

"Here there is peace in the lofty air," said Confederation poet Duncan Campbell Scott. Early Canadian watercolours on display at the Sigmund Samuel Canadiana Gallery, while they could hardly be termed "lofty", almost completely avoid mention of struggle and hardship in favour of pastoralia.

The ROM has put together a coast to coast sampling of works by explorers, reporters or military artists which show the settler's attempts to put down an impression of the new land. From the 1866 "Arrival of the Trans-Atlantic Telegraph cable" in Newfoundland to petrified Quebec villages, buffalo hunting on the prairies and Blackfoot camps in the Rockies there is certainly a diverse wealth of material to draw upon. These works are not interpretations; they are records albeit with a charm of their own. The exhibition continues at 100 Queen's Park Crescent (behind Sig Sam library) until January 2.

Openings! Openings!

At the U of T: James Reaney's The Killdeer opened last night at Hart House. It continues until next Saturday. Student tickets $1.50 each.

Friends by Japanese playwright Abe Kobo opens tomorrow night at the UC Playhouse for a one week run. Admission free.

Outside the university: Sudden Death Overtime — it's either a hockey game with a difference or a play with a difference — opened at Factory Lab on Tuesday.

Redlight Theatre is presenting a revival of What Glorious Times They Had about Nellie McClung and other women pioneers. At the Enoch Turner Schoolhouse (King and Parliament).

Toronto Truck Theatre is presenting Neil Simon's Come Blow Your Horn at the Colonnade. For a good long time: until 23 November.

Them Donelleys is at Theatre Passe Muraille (Holy Trinity Church, enter off Bay). This is not the continuation of the Reaney saga.

Jubalay, a musical from Manitoba Theatre Centre, (The same people who brought you The Dzybuk) is at Global Village. St. Nicholas Street off Wellesley. Lemon Sky by Lanford Wilson is at the Firehall Theatre on Berkeley; the Ryerson Players continue their production of Love's Gaucheries this weekend.

And next week! Next week, the Royal Shakespeare Company, all-male cast production of As You Like It is at O'Keefe for a two week run, beginning Monday; Wu-Feng is at the St. Lawrence after Tuesday, Aces Wild (about "World War I Major 'Machine Gun' Mack, Canadian Ace of Aces, Pilot of Pilots") is at Seneca College after Wednesday; Second City's Anyone for Kelp is at the Firehall Theatre after Thursday.

Who said the theatre boom was over:

There's a special one-afternoon only free admission preview today of That Time of the Month. The celebrated one-man play in two acts (or three beers), it's written and performed by Tom Whyte. At 3 pm. At the Theatre in the Dell (beside the old Mt. Sinai Hospital on University).

movies

Once more we urge you to I.F. Stone's Weekly at Cinemalumiere, 8:15 and 10:15 pm. Avoid The War Game at 7:30 and 9:30.

At last, the schedule of upcoming features at the Roxy has arrived. We haven't listed the Roxy until now, because every time we called to find out what was on, the line was either busy or hooked into a tape of Gary Topp singing the Jimi Hendrix version of The Star Spangled Banner.

But they are roxying right along with, for instance Wednesday, Milos Forman's gentle, very funny study of middle class American families in the late sixties, Taking Off. They've double-billed it with Jesus Christ, Superstar. Monday it's both The Emigrants and The New Land shown together, the way Jan Troell made them — although they have been reduced by about a sixth for North American showings.

Also Monday, Ontario College of Art presents Renoir's classic Le Grand Illusion, at 7 pm. And the Revue opens a three-day run for The Long Goodbye, Robert Altman's version of the private eye movie with Elliot Gould as Marlowe. It is guaranteed to offend genre purists (Grould in the Bogart part!) but fuck 'em anyway, it's miles better than the originals and great fun to boot. I don't know why so many people didn't like it. The second feature is Billy Wilder's 1970 The Private Life of Sherlock Holmes.

At the Science Centre, it is Great Gatsby week, with the 1949, Alan Ladd version on Tuesday night and the 1974 (very 1974) one on Thursday. The new one is so lavish that it can support enormous failures, including Robert Redford's Gatsby and Mia Farrow's Daisy, and still have enough to keep you going.

Rumours: we heard from a reliable source at the University of California that the only copy of Fireman's Ball in America is being kept secretly by the U.S. air force in a hangar in Alaska. It is hoped they will release it this year. Meanwhile, the existence of The Projectionist is once again being called into question. But (news) Wee Geordie is to be shown at the end of the month by the East York public library. See you there.

Carleton teaching assistants organize into CUPE local

OTTAWA (CUP) — Full-time graduate teachers and research assistants at Carleton University are five per cent short of the number needed to apply for certification as a local of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE). They have already signed up 30 per cent of the number needed.

Once the 35 per cent mark has been reached, the teaching assistants can apply to the labor board for certification as a CUPE local.

The board reviews the application and each individual member. It agrees to certification, an election must be held and passed by a majority vote. The election is then reviewed and the certification granted.

The election could be avoided if 65 per cent of the grads sign union cards. Then only a review of the signers and the application is necessary.

Bob Bradley, a former vice-president of the Graduate Students' Association, feels that this number can be reached and would prefer it. He feels unionizing this way would make it a stronger organization and says very few people are objecting to signing.

Some students and faculty at the university feel unionization will be detrimental to existing relationships.

But, Bradley says, "We are not out to try and destroy existing relationships between students and faculty. We believe this will be strengthened." He says the present relationship is a "master-slave" one.

He says most of the problems of the teaching assistants can be tied to money. The provincial government has set a maximum of $5,500 as the yearly income for graduates. This includes scholarships, assistantships, and outside work. Many of the graduates find it hard to live on the money they receive and attend school.

The problem is compounded by the fact that assistants are hired by the university and paid by the government. The graduates would like to see the university fighting on their side for an upgraded pay scale or else have their own strong lobby fighting in Toronto.

The graduates also want to unionize to change their grievance procedure. At present, the individual fights alone but a formalized way to complain would be worthwhile for students who receive instruction from teaching assistants.

The Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA) at U of T's Victoria College became the first unit of teaching assistants in Canada to unionize this summer.

The association has also applied to the Ontario Labor Board for certification for about 2,000 teaching assistants on main campus.

The GAA application for the Vic unit was certified Aug. 15 after a year and a half sign-up drive.

Females less likely to find summer jobs

PETERBOROUGH (CUP) — Statistics released by the Peterborough Canada Manpower Centre (CMC) reveal female students are less likely to find summer employment than are male students.

Summer jobs were found for 55 per cent of the men registered with CMC in Peterborough while only 37 per cent of the female job hunters were placed.

Employment reserved for women concentrates in the category of "personnel services" which Marg Miron, manager of CMC's summer employment program, said usually pays at near minimum wage levels. Men had more opportunities to work in other, higher paying categories.

Miron cites one instance in which women were sent by CMC to apply for a job painting. "The employer wouldn't hire them even though the girls could paint and in fact they had done it before."

"We try to re-educate employers however. We ask: why not hire a woman?"

The manpower official also suggested female students themselves might have contributed to their low job placement rate. Some, although not all, women seemed unwilling to undertake employment traditionally reserved for men.

"Other women coming to us may not have wanted a job at all. Maybe female students still aren't aggressive enough to go out and look for a job."

Some job discrimination against women students may be justified. Employment involving heavy lifting and physical exertion is beyond the range of most females although Miron said the criterion for employment might better be strength than sex, since some men would also be incapable.

"The need for a chauffeur's licence also tends to eliminate women from job consideration and this will remain a valid argument against women until more of them acquire a chauffeur's licence required for some jobs," Miron noted.

Last summer the Peterborough CMC registered 1,400 male students of which 875 were placed in jobs. Only 1,100 women registered although the lower total may reflect their relative likelihood of success—only 375 female students found jobs through the Peterborough CMC.

More students were working than CMC's average 50 per cent placement figure would suggest. Miron maintained students registered in Peterborough often leave the city to seek jobs elsewhere. Others find work in Peterborough on their own or else study at summer school.

Nevertheless, women were no more likely to fall into these categories than were men, and the actual proportion of male to female students working probably resembles CMC's 55 per cent to 37 per cent ratio of placing men and women in summer jobs.

Slightly less than half of the students registered with Canada Manpower in Peterborough were university and college students.

Varsity judoka win at Cornell

By CHRIS PREOBRAZENSKI
Last weekend Varsity co-ed judoka travelled to Ithaca New York for the annual Cornell University Judo championships.

Toronto blanked Buffalo State University 5-0 in the finals to win the coveted Cornell trophy. Well deserved credit goes to team members John Manson, Dave Passmore, Dave Hakkaku, Carl Cooke and Wally Cringen.

In the individual events Varsity Judoka overcame opposition from as far away as Yale and Boston University to place first in several divisions.

Black belt: John Manson, first, 245 lb.; Dave Passmore, second, 176 lb.; Dave Passmore, first, 154 lb.

Brown belt: Rob McRiner, second, 195 lb.; Carl Cooke, third.

Orange belt: Wally Cringen & Wally Podilchak, tied fourth, 176 lb.; Sebastian Tisserberg, fourth, 154 lb.

In the women's brown belt, Dominique Voyer placed first in the 120 lb division. Ann-Marie Jannik came in second in the 165 lb division. Both women point to the ever increasing number of opportunities to compete in judo tournaments.

Some of the more talented judoka will be competing on Nov. 2 in the eastern Canadian judo championships to be held at Jarvis Collegiate. Come out and support your judoka athletes.

Vic relay team wins interfac meet

By RICHARD KEDZIOR
Track seems to have become a specialty at Vic this year, as the runners from across the fertile crescent succeeded in edging Knox 31-26 overall in men's intramural relays.

The relays were held over three days Sept. 24, Oct. 5, and Oct. 15 at Varsity stadium.

Wycliffe placed third with nine points while skule followed with one.

Knox placed first in four out of the six events but a larger Vic team made the difference and the outcome close.

All of the participants were from the above schools. It appears that the track meets are getting a bit exclusive.

Interfac Volleyball gets Underway

By TOM WOODS
If Wednesday's action was any indication, this year's interfac volleyball season promises to be the most exciting in the forty year history of volleyball.
SGS, Engineering, Erindale, and Scarborough seem to be the prime contenders for the Victoria Staff trophy won last year by Scarborough. The eastenders took the cup from Eng and broke their 20 year win streak.
A recent ruling by the OUAABanning Ontario Volleyball Association club players from intercollegiate play has resulted in a great increase in the calibre of interfac play.
This was evident in the SGS-Eng. contest. SGS got off to a fast start in the first game but Skule fought back to a 12-12 tie before the grads emerged with a 5-12 win.
The second game was not really as close as SGS came through 15-5.
The setter-spiker combination of Titi Romet to George Zajak along with strong hitting by Reg Eadie, Keith Doan, and Henri Arnaud led the grads to victory.
Skule, realizing the opposition's firepower, were happy with their performance. Roman Struheny, Mike Hanszch, and Alex Pochmursky played well in the losing cause.
Other action saw SMC get by Knox 15-11 and 15-10 while Erindale took advantage of a Scarborough default in the first game to win 3-15 and 15-13.

Blues get back on winning streak

The U of T first 15 rugger team has been successful in its last two outings.
Last Saturday, in driving rain, the Blues defeated R.M.C. 9-4.

All Blues' points came on penalty kicks by Chris Bouris. RMC's mistakes were Toronto's gain, but had it not been for the extremely waterlogged ball, the score could have easily been higher for Toronto, as many kicks were not successful.

The EMC scrums were big and efficient, but Blues won the ball against the head, when it counted, enabling Blues to hold RMC to one unconverted try.

The Blues' backs and good kicking by flyhalf Neil Sorbie kept the game in control.

Yesterday, on back campus, after a delay of half an hour, Blues played McMaster.

Conditions were ideal and Blues' play reflected it.

The first scoring came 3 minutes into the game, when Mike Powell connected on a penalty kick to give the Blues 3 points.

Neil Sorbie sparkled as he scored a diving try beside the posts. Powell converted and the score was 8-0 for Toronto.

The forward play, especially in the loose, was all Toronto. Sorbie at one point ran back to the forwards and passed off to Randy Scott, who ran 25 yards for a score. This was again converted. The score was now 15-0 for the Blues.

The second half showed the Blues' complacency. They didn't control as well in the first half, allowing McMaster's scrum-half to run all over the field.

The Toronto club took two more tries, one by Tom Bell, and the other by John Drummond—both were unconverted.

Mac then showed their mettle, and in the dying minutes ran up 9 points, 3 on a penalty kick, and a converted try.

This try was rather lucky, as Toronto's fullback was retreating, and the ball took an unpredictable bounce right over his head into the arms of the Mac player who touched it down.

Blues travel to Western this Saturday, to play at Western homecoming.

One of Blues' players is a Western alumnus and is certainly keyed up for this game.

The Blues' record is now 3-3.

Hockey Blues start with win

Blues hockey started their exhibition season on Tuesday night with a 7-4 victory over the Senior Orillia Terriers in Orillia.

The Blues' compliment of rookies put on a good show against former Varsity star, Hank Monteith's Terriers and counted well in scoring and defence.

Orillia opened the scoring early in the first period, as Terrier Paul Dixon slipped the puck past Blues' goaltender, Jim Campbell.

The game belonged to the Blues from this point on as veteran Don Pagnutti, who opened and closed Blues' scoring (both times assisted by Anderson and Ruhnke) hit the mark.

Charlie Hughes counted soon after with the help of fellow rookies, Greg Higson and Frank Davis.

The Blues dominated the second period as Rick Cornacchia widened the gap. Doug Herridge then scored the first of two goals. Standout rookie Charles Hughes then completed the second half of his two goal performance at 17:01.

Terrier playing coach Hank Monteith brought the game a little closer scoring on rookie goaltender Mark Logan in the final minute of the period.

The the third period saw the Terriers close the gap to 5-4 as Monteith counted again for the Terriers, followed by Dan Yutes.

Doug Herridge and Don Pagnutti each got their second of the night to put the game out of reach.

Don Pagnutti, who tied in the scoring race in the OUAA last year, is playing well again this year through Blues' camp and their first exhibition game. He will not be eligible for league play until the new year when he returns to school for the spring term. He will continue to practise with the Blues.

Today the Blues will scrimmage against the Metro Police at 5:30 pm at the arena.

Monday will offer the regulars of this year's team against the Whitby MacDonalds and former Blues' stars Mike Keenan, Bob Monroe, Doug Tate and Bruce Durno at 8:00 pm at the arena.

Don Pagnutti is remembered as the flashy scorer from last year. He should do well this year but won't play till the new year.

Varsity Sports Editorial

We are appalled at the increase in needless violence and poor sportsmanship evident so far in this year's intramural program.

Three disgusting incidents have occurred so far—two in football and one in lacrosse.

Recently an official was attacked by an irate player in a football game on the back campus. Regardless of the validity or not of his complaint, there is no excuse for chasing officials who are also students doing a job.

In a lacrosse game last week, two players went at it with fists flying and were soon joined by players from both benches.

Players not on the field of action must remain on the sidelines. Free-for-all accomplish nothing. As it turned out the referee had to call the game to put a stop to the hooliganism.

In the other football incident at Scarborough, Wednesday night, another fight broke out among two players on the field.

Again a player from each bench took it upon themselves to be the guiding lights and joined in the fracas.

All four players were ejected from the game. Rightfully so! The intramural sports committee, regulatory body of interfac sports, should take firm action in all these affronts to sportsmanship.

The committee should see to it that all interfac teams are made aware of the aims and objectives of interfac competition.

The immediate objectives of the program are high levels of competition, sportsmanship, leadership, and relaxation.

Winning is nice but not at the expense of legal action which could have been taken against the player who attacked the official.

Do players want to face the possibility of expulsion from all sports at Varsity because of an uncontrollable temper or a desire to make a name for themselves.

Note the first paragraph of the Aims and Objectives of Intramural Sports:

"The intramural sports program at Toronto should always be regarded as contributing primarily to the health and fitness of the members of the University in a casual recreational manner. This program should afford the opportunity for the participation of all men regardless of ability, enthusiasm being the sole prerequisite to participation in and enjoyment of the program"

Soccer Blues lose to Western; may be out of finals

By JOHN COBBY

Last Tuesday probably saw the soccer Blues' hopes of winning the divisional championship receive the fatal blow.

The visiting Toronto squad lost 2-1 to the Western Mustangs. The current standings show that the top three teams have all played eight games, with McMaster on top with 12 points followed by Western with 11 and Blues with nine.

Each team has four games remaining. Mathematically, Toronto could still win but it would require a fortuitous run of events.

It has been six years since any team has completed the 'double' (home and home) victories against the Blues, but the Mustangs were deserving of this distinction.

For the majority of the two games the London squad exhibited tactical superiority and, equally important, a desire to win.

The Mustangs outlasted the Blues for the most part and in consequence kept the Varsity team so off-balance that it scored but one goal in the two games and committed costly defensive errors.

The initial tone of Tuesday's game resembled that of the previous week's game as the Western midfield demonstrated its superiority by launching numerous raids on the Toronto goal.

With a rearranged defensive line having scant opportunity to organize its assignments, the Blues were vulnerable to the quick break. Thus the manner of Western's first goal was no surprise.

A quickly released pass from Agenor Ferreira split the defence down the middle. Fortunately the Toronto goalkeeper, Perusco, had advanced from his line only to meet the ball and Nick Dagg at the same time. Both players fell after colliding with the ball going loose.

It should have been an easy clearance except that no Blues were on hand—they were virtually immobile, having anticipated an off-side call. Their negligence was punished when Dagg was able to prod the ball into the Varsity net.

For the next ten minutes Ferreira, and his midfield corps, tightened the screws on the Blues. Toronto was unable to come up with the ball and were easily bypassed with good passing combinations.

Just as Varsity was obtaining territorial equality with Western, a second goal was scored at the 25 minute mark.

A combination of sloppy Blues' defence and hustle by Roman Schneider caused the goal. Schneider was able to collect a poorly made back pass between Liscio and Perusco and fire home the tally.

Under the circumstances the Toronto squad had little option other than frenetic attacking in the hope of eliminating the deficit. However with their two top goal scorers not in the lineup (Vassiliou and Ierullo), the Blues lacked the poise and sharpness necessary to unsettle the Western rearguard.

For the second half coach Bob Nicol withdrew Mike Hendrickse from his attacking position and placed him beside the long suffering Crewe and Evans. This three-man defence had an instantaneous beneficial effect.

No longer could the Mustangs assume the freedom of the midfield as there were sufficient Blues in the area to make their life more complicated. Suddenly there were deficiencies in the hope team that could be manipulated to Toronto's advantage.

Thus it was that the Blues seized the initiative and, by dint of their territorial advantage caused near panic in the Western rearguard.

A fierce shot by Drew McKeown should have scored but the ball rebounded from the goalpost. The Blues continued to press forward using long passes to wingers Keith Hall and Spiros Stomopoulos to disturbing effect. The game's transformation was complete.

With the action predominantly in the Mustang's zone it was inevitable that the Toronto rearguard would be caught lacking the usual cover. The infrequent London forays held more danger than necessary due to a positional error on the part of the visitor's back line.

Had the players moved more quickly up to the back line when the Blues made a forward break, the ability of the Mustangs to work the ball out of defence once they gained possession would have been severely limited by a more confined space in which the newly appointed midfield trio could quickly win the ball back.

As it was, the Western team were able to relieve pressure by playing long ball into the area left vacant by the Toronto tardiness.

Eventually, with 10 minutes remaining, a goal was manufactured. Having stretched the Mustangs by playing the ball wide down the left, a cross was quickly directed to McKeown in the middle.

As his view of the net was blocked by a mass of central defenders, he flicked the ball to his right where Hendrickse had sneaked unobserved. His low shot from 29 yards easily bypassed Baudovin's dive.

And so it was the Blues won the second half battle, but despite redoubled efforts, were unable to win the war.

In retrospect, the team had played for three quarter of the two losing contests against the Mustangs at a decided tactical disadvantage. Only when, for the second half of the second game, the midfield boasted three players instead of the previous two, was the squad able to demonstrate a more organised and controlled method of play.

This is not to suggest that the devastating effect of the defensive errors should be minimized, for they are inherently unpredictable, but that the general deficiencies in the squad would have been less exposed if a numerically strong midfield had been able to disrupt the opposition's play by sheer hard graft.

Tomorrow, the Blues host the vast hordes (no kidding!) of Buffalo State College.

This exhibition game at Varsity stadium begins at 2 pm.

Student runs for alderman in Ward 4

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

A fourth-year U of T student who describes himself as a "reform candidate" is running for alderman in Ward 4 in the upcoming December municipal elections.

Joe Pantalone, an urban geography student, is contesting one of the positions now held by Arthur Eggleton and George Ben in this working class, ethnic area.

"I see myself as a reform candidate with an ethnic working class slant," Pantalone said. "The purpose of my political work is to get a better deal for these people."

Pantalone has worked in federal and provincial elections for the New Democratic Party. In last July's elections he was campaign manager for Evelyn Cotter, NDP candidate in the Parkdale riding.

The 22-year-old student is currently co-ordinator of the West End NDP Service Centre.

Pantalone feels he has "an extremely good chance" in the election race. "I feel I know the area," he said. "I grew up here. I know the people and I figure I can do a good job representing them."

If elected, Pantalone promises to devote one-third of his salary to create a service centre in Ward 4. Although Eggleton now maintains a ward office, he said Eggleton "waits for the people to come to him."

Housing and transportation policies are major concerns of Pantalone for Ward 4, which is bounded by Dufferin Street to the west, Palmerston Avenue to the east, and runs from Bloor Street south to Lake Ontario.

Pantalone opposes the new $24 fee for permit parking in an area with no other parking facilities.

He also criticized the TTC's "one fare" policy. In the downtown area where the TTC is self-supporting, he says, the user is subsidizing suburban routes which don't pay.

Pantalone notes that the Queen Street subway will bring pressure to bear along the Queen corridor.

He feels steps must be taken to ensure low cost housing and the preservation of the community character in the threatened area north of the C.N.E. and south of Queen Street.

He added that although developers have concentrated efforts in Ward 6, "They are now starting to look elsewhere."

Pantalone feels the city, with some aid from federal and provincial governments, should establish reception centres to aid immigrants.

He said comprehensive counselling is needed for the new arrival who faces both language and cultural problems.

"If you look at Canadian history," Pantalone said, "you can see it is the immigrant who has made this country run."

"The government figures they've got the ethnic vote but doesn't want to do anything in return."

Is an upset victory with Joe Pantalone's grasp in the upcoming December municipal elections?

Toronto Rape Crisis Centre suffers financial crisis

By MATHILDE VERHULST

Unless Toronto's Rape Crisis Centre can obtain financial support through necessary government funds for 1975, its continued existence is doubtful.

The centre, officially established Feb. 14, is applying to the federal secretary of state for three workers' salaries and to the Local Initiatives Program (LIP) in the centre's Eglinton riding for another seven salaries.

One of the centre's volunteer workers, who wished to remain anonymous, said it will probably receive only one or two salaries from the secretary of state and four or five from LIP.

She added, however, "I'm hopeful that we'll get support," because the federal government has declared 1975 "Womens' Year".

The centre, which includes approximately 35 volunteer workers, is presently operating under a grant from the United Community Funding (UCF).

The exact amount donated by the UCF was not revealed. The spokeswoman said only that the money should last until December.

Rape centre worker Mary Bergman said this grant does not cover casework with victims.

Rather, she said, the grant covers expenses for research and for the purpose of setting up contacts, such as lists of sympathetic people in the legal, medical, and psychiatric fields.

Since February, the Rape Crisis

Centre has depended largely on private donations.

It received a $500 grant from SAC last March and an OFY (Opportunities for Youth) grant last summer.

The OFY grant covered a 14-week period and paid $90 per week salaries for the six to eight workers involved in the program.

The OFY project, officially named

"Rape Crisis Centre Support Group", had several objectives:

- The writing of a handbook on rape in Toronto.
- Community liaison work with groups such as the police, hospitals and other groups rape victims are likely to encounter.
- An education program for the general public. This included asking people with knowledge on rape to speak at conventions and to other groups in Toronto.

• The development of a referral system of all kinds of resource people rape victims might contact. One result of this objective was compilation of a list of competent and sympathetic therapists.

U of T graduate student Debra Lewis, who has worked for the Rape Crisis Centre, said the centre has approached several organizations as possible financial supporters.

She said Toronto hospitals and the police "have co-operated with us in a lot of cases," but added there have been "no indications of funding."

The worker echoed Lewis, calling the police and hospitals "out of the question money-wise."

She also said the government was cool when rape centre representatives approached it last year.

"We were turned out from one department to another," she said.

When asked why the government did not support the centre financially at that time, she said, "Rape is a controversial issue. Governments do not take stands on controversial issues."

"Rape is not considered too important because it only happens to women," she added.

The worker said the centre applied for a LIP grant last year but was refused assistance. She conjectured that the reason for the rejection was "rape was too high-profile an issue."

Comparing the relative financial security of Vancouver's Rape Relief Action Group, which is financed by the city, the Toronto centre spokeswoman said the Vancouver group has "six or seven full-time people."

She said the Vancouver centre also has "operational expense money" at its disposal.

U of T imperialism checked

The University of Toronto will confine its development within the area bounded by Spadina, Bloor, Bay and College according to a memorandum approved by the planning and resources committee of the Governing Council.

The university assures the city this will be policy at least until 1990. There are, however, several qualifications. The university reserves the right to make temporary use of facilities outside the area.

The university is also unable to make commitments for the federated colleges or the Royal Ontario Museum, but has told the city it is unaware of any plans for expansion.

Despite these assurances, the university is still involved with a dispute over the proposed new athletics building which is strongly opposed by residents' groups. At issue is the size and height of the building.

Despite its new expansion promises, the university appears likely to continue to have trouble with resident opposition to expansion.

University officials have drawn the ire of the community by maintaining what goes on inside the Spadina-Bloor-Bay-College is only its own business.

Varg hunts fresh game

The Varsity welcomes any students who are interested in joining our Monday strategy meeting.

We will be discussing strategies and tactics for the upcoming week and also creating new story ideas.

If you're interested in seeing all the animals in action, bring your lunch and a friend to The Varsity's second floor offices, 91 St. George St. noon today.

Wanna join the service?

The Varsity will be holding another meeting for students interested in learning how to write about service issues, such as food, housing and health.

No experience in writing is required, just an interest in the issues.

The meeting will be held in The Varsity's second floor offices, 91 St. George St. at 1 pm Wednesday.

HERE AND NOW

Guelph approves OFS referendum

Last week the University of Guelph became the latest campus to endorse a referendum increasing the per student levy for the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) to $1.50.

A similar referendum will be held by the U of T Graduate Students Union today and tomorrow. The GSU will be the first graduate student association in the province to hold a referendum on joining OFS.

Voting at Guelph was over 75 per cent in favor of the increased fee, with 2,307 for and only 708 against. The turnout was about 35 per cent.

U of T undergraduates voted last year in favor of the increase which has now passed at seven campuses. Several more referenda are being held this fall.

The increased funding will be used to hire more research personnel and fieldworkers to help organize a stronger provincial organization better able to oppose government cutbacks in educational spending.

A major priority of OFS this fall has been the fight to force changes in the Ontario Student Award Plan.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Participation decision difficult to make

The principle of faculty-student parity has been firmly decided against by the Governing Council. The Ontario Government is unlikely to overturn the decision.

Students who wish to participate in university government thus have an agonizing decision to make.

Should they stick to principle and refrain from participating in a body which refuses to treat them as members of equal stature with faculty, they run the risk of being on the receiving end of every decision made by the university (which may be the case anyway).

Should they participate in the Governing Council, they do so in the humiliating knowledge that they are doing so only to protect their own interests.

It is an unpleasant position to be in, and certainly not one which will engender mutual respect.

Students should seriously consider whether it is worth their while to participate in the governing structure of this university, a structure which appears incapable of meeting their aspirations.

Faculty arguments beg the question

One point has emerged clearly during the heat of debate during the past few weeks; namely, the conviction in most faculty of their qualitative superiority over the student population.

In the debate over tenure decisions, faculty argued their acquaintance with research, and their superior judgment allowed them alone to make decisions on promotion and the granting of tenure.

In the U of T Act review debate, faculty argued their 'lasting' commitment to the university and their participation in research entitled them to privileged status.

Both views show elitism, but what is worse, a conviction that the faculty need look no further to justify their existence than the end of their noses.

There is indeed logic to the argument which says that faculty, being intimate with research, are better qualified than students to evaluate that work. Let us even suppose for the sake of argument, that faculty float around on a higher plane of existence than the rest of us. However, both viewpoints do not address the question of who the faculty is responsible to. In the debate on the U of T Act, student supporters argued that the university had a duty to train responsible people, which it could further by instituting parity.

Faculty supporters, John Evans included, argued the university also had a responsibility to pursue academic excellence, which demanded predominantly faculty participation.

But that argument begs the question. The pursuit of academic excellence need not and should not imply elitism and insularity. The university must be as responsive to those it serves no matter what its goals. It is simply false to say that faculty themselves can decide whether their work is sufficiently responsive to those they serve.

To ensure this takes place, the university must set up a governing structure wherein this responsiveness is institutionalized.

At the moment, the horizon looks very bleak indeed.

Demands irresponsible

The demand of the University of Toronto Faculty Association for a 25 percent salary increase is both selfish and irresponsible.

The move is selfish because no other employees in the university have asked for such a large increase. No estate enjoys such a comfortable existence as the faculty, whose average salary is now $20,000 per year.

There are others — teaching assistants and support staff — who have suffered inflation far more acutely. Support staff had to accept a $200 inflation 'compensation' last spring while graduate assistants are actively fighting a move to cut back their salaries.

The demand is further irresponsible since it is so patently unrealistic: it is obviously a bargaining tool with which to raise the university's offer. But to even contemplate such an offer shows a disturbing cynicism. For the university to meet the offer, it would have to take funds away from other valuable programs, such as teaching.

For the faculty to entertain that possibility demonstrates a lowly regard for teaching — despite their protestations to the contrary.

University: community

The following is the text of an address given by SAC president Seymour Kanowich at Thursday's meeting of the Governing Council:

The university is a living, vibrating community. It is a place where people live, where they work, where they eat, where they engage in recreational activity. It has its own mail, phone and police system. It has its own government. A community in every sense of the word.

What is being decided today, is what role students will play within that community — participants, or critics. There are two alternatives.

The first is to place us as unequal members of the community. This means that we will have very little say in policy-making at this university. It means that our role is to react to policy once it has been formulated and if our reaction is negative to oppose it and organize against it.

People often say that students are only negative, they criticize every policy that is formulated. They play no constructive role. The reason for this is that when policy is formulated the student voice is a small one.

Students really do have much more to offer this university than just criticisms. It does not serve the best interests of students to be seen solely as critics; it does not serve the best interests of the university.

The other role that students can play within the university community is an equal one. This means we can play a constructive and creative role in policy-making.

It means that we can genuinely respect the rules and regulations of this university, because they will be, in part, rules and regulations of our own making. It is a healthy role for students to play. It is in the best interests of the university community.

This issue of parity is one that has bitterly divided this campus for many years. It is now time to end the alienation. It is time to end the feeling of confrontation.

It is time to stop saying that parity cannot work, it is time to resolve that parity can work, and a time to discuss how we can all make it work, make it work for the good of the university.

What I am asking you for is more than just a vote in favour of parity. What I am asking you for is a vote of faith in the students of this university. Faith in our ability to participate constructively and creatively. Faith in our ability to judge all sides of an argument and decide objectively what is in the best interests of the university. Faith in our ability to conduct ourselves as mature adults.

Are we to be participants in the system, or are we to be like Pavlov's dogs, reacting to the stimulus when it has been provided? The choice is yours.

Place us in a position where we can act responsibly, and we will do so. Place us in a position where we can act with dignity, and we will do so. Place us in a position where we can act as equals, and we will do so.

Uncle Tom to Uncle Remus

Apparently, readers were "cabin'd, cribbed and confined" by the image of Uncle Tom in the 19th century. In the U of T Act of 1971, students are told they will not be coddled, cozened or confined.

Does this allow us a shift from Uncle Tom to Uncle Remus?

The latter, story teller of the Tar Baby incident, weaves the unforgettable encounter of Brer Rabbit with said Tar Baby.

To explain. The university student (Brer Rabbit) may stumble over the contraption called the Tar Baby. As a freshman or sophomore, said student may well designate the Tar Baby as "Man's Inhumanity to Man" or some other target.

By the year of graduation, the student has become thoroughly attached to the target: time then to burn the target — "burn tar baby learn" (instead of learn, baby learn?) in the name of the 4th R — revolution.

Often it takes up to four years and possibly postgrad discipline to acquaint the learner that it is not simply the nature of man's dilemma but the dilemma of man's nature which is the problem.

Vote setup

Recent news stories have indicated some uncertainty about the election procedures for the Municipal Elections to be held on December 2, 1974, particularly about students at University.

The following applies to the City of Toronto and similar provisions would apply in the other area municipalities.

A person is qualified to vote in the election in Toronto on Monday, December 2, 1974, if the person is a Canadian citizen or other British subject, is of the full age of 18 years on or before December 2, 1974, and was resident in Toronto between September 3 and October 8, 1974; or, if not resident in Toronto, is the owner or tenant of land personally in Toronto between September 3 and October 8, 1974, or is the spouse of such owner or tenant.

Thus students and others who take up residence prior to October 8, would be qualified.

Names are listed on the voters' list which will be posted during the third week of October. If people who are entitled to vote find that their name is not on the list, they may file a signed application with the City Clerk between October 24 and November 2, 1974.

If they miss this opportunity, a qualified voter may obtain a certificate from the City Clerk or may complete a declaration at the polling station on election day.

Should any citizen require any further information or assistance, they may obtain it by calling the City Clerk election number 367-7800.

Voting is an important function of democracy. This new procedure makes it easier than ever for the voter to qualify and vote.

REVIEW: New version of Killdeer retains old flaws

The Killdeer
Hart House Theatre
until 26 October

James Reaney originally wrote The Killdeer as a three act play in 1960, but in 1968 he combined the last two acts into one.

He wrote better in 1968 than he did in 1960. That makes sense. What doesn't make sense is that he didn't revise the whole play (and not just the last two acts) at that time.

The poetry is forced and the language is immature in the first act; the second act is better, both as poetry and as drama.

The Hart House production of The Killdeer is good, but director Martin Hunter is unable to compensate for the juxtaposition of styles.

This is most noticeable in the character of Mrs. Budge (Judith Hunter). In the first act she is properly crow-like and strange, but this type of characterization does not go well in the second act and she falls flat.

Mrs. Delta (Barbara Santamaria) is merely her double and the whole "river of time" sequence comes out as more of a pop song than a chant.

Reaney's symbols are easily recognizable, indeed, sometimes too much so. Clifford Hopkins is the strong satanic figure and Madam Fay is the fallen woman who turns on him.

Mrs. Gardner is Mom, Apple Pie and Hockey, to the point of oppressiveness. Harry is "the boy who could grow up" and Eli is the boy who can't (although he is able to free himself of his mother at the end).

And then there's Rebecca, the egg girl, the killdeer, the symbol-of-life and-love-and-everything good. This sort of symbolism is more appropriate to a morality play and The Killdeer would be nothing more than that if it weren't for Reaney's beautiful style, (more prominent, again, in the second act than in the first).

And even though Reaney's symbolism has all the subtlety of a train wreck, his overall theme is a bit elusive, or, at best, ambiguous.

Is he praising the innocent state of childhood (where oh where have we heard that one before)? If so, why is Eli's birthday party so pathetic?

He points out the evils of adoption, but doesn't give a solution to the problem of abandoned or orphaned children.

Is he pointing out the differences between good and evil? If so, why do Harry and Madam Fay (Good and Evil) both want the same thing, to feel the momentary hatred of those they love?

I hope you aren't looking to me for answers; I'm just as confused about it as Reaney, and he hasn't helped matters much.

But the play does make good theatre. You can feel those long, long pauses in the second act crawling all over your body. Most of the techniques are not original, but they are well used.

Martin Hunter is good at this sort of thing. When it comes to thematic development, he turns his actors into sledge hammers. The Killdeer survives because its drama is more important than its theme.

Hunter's blocking is excellent. Having the street far downstage rather than upstage, Madam Fay's little saunters as she delivers her sales pitch, Becky's slow walk around the room imitating the different footsteps; the slow fades instead of black-outs and the lack of a curtain call, all add up to an evening of enjoyable theatre.

Three of the cast strut their stuff in Hart House production, The Killdeer.

Frances Halpenny's Mrs. Gardner, alias Mom, the Tooth Fairy and Hot Dogs, is so nauseatingly good I wanted to punch her in the mouth.

Maureen Fox is good as Madam Fay, especially during those cynical little reminiscences of hers. She carries off her discourses of evil well too, but the scene in which she remembers her childhood is weak. Becky's role, although thematically important, is a very simple one. It is entirely mechanical and Joan Calderera does it mechanically well.

George Komorowski is too natural for such a stylized production. He is too free and easy. Although his is not the best performance, he does have one mark of professionalism the others do not have; he feels at home on the stage. I hope to see more of him at Hart House and elsewhere.

The set, designed by Reed Needles, deserves mention, the cut-away walls being both convenient and effective, although the downstage bed seems totally out of place, as if someone has plunked it there ten minutes before the audience comes in. Also, the upstage trees seem the same whether it is summer or fall. If you can't have them change color, don't put them in.

The lighting is effective, not during the storm, which is when the audience o-o-s and a-h-s, but during Madam Fay's tirade near the end of act two. The original music by John Beckwith (dean of the Faculty of Music) is appropriate, but no great shakes on its own.

If a play is meant to instruct and entertain, then The Killdeer is not a good play, but the Hart House production is certainly entertaining.

Japanese play enjoys North American premier at UC

Friends University College Playhouse
until 26 October

Friends, by the contemporary Japanese playwright Abe Kobo (better known for the film Woman of the Dunes), had its North American premiere Saturday evening at the University College Playhouse.

Friends is described as a "black comedy". It has elements which might be called humorous but it ultimately presents an ironic and perhaps tragic view of the human condition.

A pragmatic seemingly self-assured young man who is called Man throughout the play — it's that kind of play — is visited by a family of eight which immediately proceeds to move into his home. Overwhelmed by the intrusion, which Father, the philosophical head of the family, justifies by a moral argument, the young man finds himself incapable of throwing them out. He even accepts their presence because he is himself rather lonely.

But after surrendering his psyche to them and losing his girlfriend because of them, he is revolted by his lack of privacy. The family is dismayed. They lock him in a cage.

Middle Daughter (there are three), aware as she is of the family mission to be "friends" to lonely people, visits him there. Annoyed that she still finds his individuality clinging to him, she kills him.

The family takes Man's possessions and goes off to another home.

The plot has vague similarities to that of Edward Albee's A Delicate Balance. But, whereas with that play we ask, "What does it all mean?" with this, we ask, "which of two quite definite interpretations do we prefer?"

Although the philosophy presented by the "friends" is lovely, it kills Man. But who is to blame — the family or man?

K.L. Richard, professor in the Department of East Asian Studies, under whose auspices the play is being presented, says the play exercises a contrasting appeal to two different audiences. Richard claims, "For the Japanese, loneliness is akin to death; the appearance of the family is more amenable to the Japanese mind. But the North American audience will feel repulsion for the family."

One of the actors in the production, in fact, suggested in informal discussion the family "represented the threat of the thrust of communism."

In contrast to this ambiguous appeal, however, there is a universal appeal to this particular production. It is presented in an entertaining way and it makes full utilization of the comic aspects of the play.

Lisette Martineau-Garcia should be congratulated for her dynamic direction.

The diversity of characterization certainly adds dimension to the production. The characters are "flat", except, of course, for Man; they undergo no development.

But the interaction of the jailbird Elder Son, the sensitive Grandmother, the childish Youngest Daughter, and the rest, is absorbing.

Man, played by Donald Wiley, expresses his frustrations well, although at times he does not react strongly enough as one character in relation to the other characters. (On the other hand, the background actions of other characters sometimes distract the audience from the main action.)

Special praise should be given to Dave Allen, whose portrayal of Father as a gentle, sincere philosopher is crucial in establishing that the family is not at all evil nor purely comic.

Deborah Jarvis' performance as Middle Daughter is perhaps the most convincing in the production.

Kobe has written Friends twice, the second time playing down the symbolic implications. This is the second version. There are no deep philosophical barriers, nor any terribly bald philosophical abstractions, to prevent one from enjoying a worthwhile production. It continues until the 26th.

A "New Greece"? An interview

Margaret C. Papandreou briefly returned to Toronto last week to visit with the rest of her family.

Since last August they had been split, after her husband, Andreas C. Papandreou, returned to Greece, after the military junta decided to remove itself from power and transcend to a civilian government, headed by the conservative Constantine Karamanlis.

Margaret, who vividly described her family's ordeal after the 1967 coup, and their hurried exit from Greece in the beginning of 1968 in her book NIGHTMARE IN ATHENS, is herself a very keen observer of Greek politics and a very sophisticated analyst of Greek events.

Her marriage to Andreas Papandreou and her family's stay in Greece for close to a decade, had as a result her becoming thoroughly immersed in and familiarized with the Greek affairs.

She granted this interview to The Varsity before returning to Greece, where politics are again as uncertain and unpredictable as the ever-smoking tip of Vesuvius.

demetris andrikoglou

Varsity: Mrs. Papandreou, what is in your opinion the significance of the political developments in Greece after the Cyprus crisis? What actually happened in Greece last summer?

Mrs. Papandreou: First of all, of course, it is quite clear the Cyprus coup had been organized with the assistance of the CIA in Washington. Ioannidis, either aware that what he was doing was in the interests of the United States, the Pentagon and NATO, perhaps, completely unaware — in any case, he is responsible for steps taken to overthrow Makarios.

This had its obvious consequences, and when the junta chose Sampson to replace Makarios (the elected President of Cyprus), it was quite clear to everyone, I think, in the international scene, that the Turks would not be able to accept a man who had so clearly come out for "Enosis", or union with Greece.

So the stage was set for a Turkish invasion. All of this meant the old Atcheson plan, calling for the division of Cyprus, that was proposed to the Papandreou government in 1964 in Washington was finally in some way coming into effect, that is, the partition of Cyprus.

Brigadier Ioannidis was director of the Greek Military Police (ESA). He did not hold public office in the junta's governments, but he is considered to have been CIA's strongman within the junta's ranks, and in actuality, the "man behind the scenes". It has come to light recently that, although Papadopoulos and his puppet Prime Minister Markezinis were planning to calm down last November's student rebellion by other means, Ioannidis having isolated Papadopoulos did intervene on his own in his capacity as city gendarmerie corps leader with the known resulting multiple deaths and casualties. He also kicked out Papadopoulos a week later and in his place appointed Androustopoulos as PM, a controversial figure and a CIA agent. Meanwhile, Phaedon Gyzikis, president of the "republic" during Papadopoulos is still the president.

Mrs. Margaret C. Papandreou

There are some people who claim that all this was designed to overthrow the junta in Greece; give the opportunity for Karamanlis (the President overthrown by the Greek military coup) to return to Greece.

Exactly how far and how deep the thinking went into the steps taken is uncertain, but it was obvious that after Ioannidis acted, and after the Turks invaded, there was no way the junta could stay in power in Greece.

It was a tremendous humiliation to the Greek national government. There had to be some solution for the impasse in Greece and the difficulty of that regime: Karamanlis had been the obvious solution for many years, essentially to maintain the structure of power and the interests of the Americans in Greece.

Varsity: Would you say Ioannidis was working on his own, or do you see him as the representative of a certain group either inside Greece or outside?

Mrs. Papandreou: Well, I don't think he was working on his own, I don't think anybody in the dictatorial regime for the past 7½ years was working on their own.

I think that the guidelines and the guiding factors came from Washington, just as Papadopoulos was given instructions and told how to handle things by the Pentagon in Washington, I think, so was Ioannidis.

So, I don't really think there was much change except for face and name between the two. These people, after all, were trained by and received their orders and positions from the United States — both of them. I am talking about Papadopoulos and Ioannidis, but most of the members of the junta during these many years are people who have been trained in the United States. They unfortunately see as their first allegiance the allegiance to NATO, their military alliance, and secondly their allegiance to Greece.

This is a heavy charge meaning they have been traitors to the Greek nation, but I think this is the case and I am sure this is the way the Greek people look at it.

Varsity: What in your opinion was the purpose of the American position to sponsor "more autonomy" for the Turkish minority of Cyprus while the Turks were advancing their take-over of the island?

Mrs. Papandreou: I think, that was all part of the partition plan of Cyprus. In other words, if you are to have a partition of Cyprus, you have to support also such things as the autonomy of the Turks there, seem to be backing the Turks for what they claim would be their just rights on Cyprus.

The truth of the matter is, for these many years the situation in Cyprus had not been that desperate for the Turks. There were moves toward some kind of alleviation of their problems. If Cyprus had been left on its own, it seems to me that it's quite likely and quite obvious, there would have been a way of resolving some of the difficulties existing in the Turkish-Greek community.

The conditions, antagonisms, and animosity among the two populations, have been exaggerated to the point where it's hard to imagine that in our own lifetime these can be resolved, as a result of some very harsh and difficult things that have been done there.

But in answer to your question, I think that once the coup took place and the Turks invaded in order to achieve partition, the U.S. would have to "tilt", as it was described, toward Turkey to gain enough territory to be in a bargaining position so that when a solution came, it would mean a partition of the island.

Varsity: In the light of these explanations, how relevant were the anti-American demonstrations in Athens after the invasion of Cyprus, and what was their political significance?

Mrs. Papandreou: Prior to this, no demonstrations were allowed. I think that when Karamanlis returned offering political freedom to the Greeks, it was quite natural that they would express the feelings bottled up in them for so many years. The anti-Americanism is very deep, because the Greeks feel that it is the responsibility of the United States that he had to suffer all these many years under a brutal tyranny.

Therefore what is being expressed is not simply, as some newspapers would like to say, leftist slogans in the streets. It's a very universal feeling in Greece, that has led to this feeling of anti-Americanism.

Varsity: We know Karamanlis banned these demonstrations after the third day and re-established in some ways the 'stage of siege' as existed during the colonels. Would it be possible for one to say that Karamanlis exploited a popular feeling so that he could lend some kind of a liberal image to his regime (by creating the atmosphere leading to these demonstrations) which also gave him the licence to intervene and suppress all dissent within Greek society?

Mrs. Papandreou: I think that only history will tell us, whether this was part of a design or if he really was responding to the mood of both the Greek people and quite a bit of the army, which also had become disenchanted and disgusted with its leadership. I don't think any political personality called back to play the role Karamanlis is playing today could have come back and not taken a step of this kind to satisfy the Greeks in terms of their feelings.

But, of course, it also has disoriented the Greeks somewhat, into initially believing that, somehow or other, he was the saviour of the nation, when in fact, we have to remember that he was invited back by the junta itself to play this role and therefore the finger of the United States is somewhere in the picture.

Just what agreements were made, just exactly what he agreed to do and what role to play are among those dark secrets that may come out some day in some congressional hearing. But I think we will have to wait and see as yet how sincere he is in his statements that he intends to withdraw Greece from NATO.

There have been some indications recently that the Greek government is taking a more flexible position on this question and so far no overt acts, that I am aware of, have been taken in terms of actual withdrawal of forces from the NATO alliance. The people in Greece are waiting and watching to see whether he will put action to his words. But indeed, it gained him some popularity, there is no doubt about it.

with Margaret Papandreou

Varsity: Who in your opinion does the Karamanlis government serve right now? Is it the nation, the military, or the interests of the right wing in Greece?

Mrs. Papandreou: I think, one would have to assume that Karamanlis, since he has played the latter role in the past, continues to play that role.

That is, he is in the process of wedding together junta forces with the political forces of the right and the army, and consequently, by definition the U.S. interests in that part of the world.

If you look at some of the pieces that have been written in the States, particularly I would say, in the business journals, they claim now that the situation is really very positive for investment in Greece.

One understands that the situation has not changed very much.

In appearance it has. There is no doubt there are more liberties for the Greek people: the press seems relatively free to write what it wants. Of course, the television and radio stations are still under the control of the government and are not free to express opposing opinion as yet.

There are some things that have changed, and I think the average Greek has welcomed these kinds of changes.

But I think we should not be fooled by a facade of what appears to be a liberalization of the situation and the coming back of political parties, when essentially as I said earlier, the structure of power remains the same.

Varsity: What is the situation of the political forces in Greece after the transfer of power to the 'civilian' government headed by Karamanlis?

Mrs. Papandreou: At this moment, there seems to be the party of the right, which Karamanlis is now calling the New Democratic Party, which has the initials NDP but which is pretty far from the ideology of the Canadian NDP, and there is a centre party, the old Centre Union, which is headed by George Mavros, a member of the Centre Union, and some of the members of the Centre Union.

I think that this party represents essentially similar forces to those that Karamanlis represents.

There is the Panhellenic Socialist Movement, under the presidency of Andreas Papandreou. These are the progressive leftist forces, left-of-centre forces, who are interested in promoting a socialist Greece.

Then, you have the traditional left, the communist party, which is now legal in Greece, itself split into two parts. One is the so-called Communist Party of the Exterior led by Florakis and which bears primarily a Russian alliance, and then there is the Communist Party of the Interior led by Elias Eliou, which is a more nationalised communist party.

So, the forces of the communist world in Greece are split into two parts.

There seems to be the configuration that there are some smaller groups, a group calling itself New Democratic Forces under the sponsorship of Pematzoglou and including people like Mangakis and Peponis and Virginia Tsouderos. I don't know where they are likely to go, whether they will put up a slate for candidates or not, but they do not seem to have much of a popular base although some of their members have been active in the resistance against the junta.

But I think the major forces are the forces of Karamanlis, the forces of the Panhellenic Socialist Party, and then the communist forces, although as I said, split at this point.

Varsity: Certainly, every movement has something as its predecessor. I am talking about the Centre Union Party which was split in 1965 and continued breaking up for some time . . . People, even today, would be interested, I suppose, to know why the Centre Union was split then and why it cannot unite again — the question is: why a major party and movement breaks to pieces and cannot come together later?

anywhere to go it will go with Karamanlis, which is a natural political move in any case.

Varsity: When Karamanlis came back to Greece, he promised elections as soon as the Cyprus affair was settled. How well, do you think, was the Cyprus crisis handled, how fair to the Cypriot people, and what kind is the political climate preceding the upcoming elections?

Mrs. Papandreou: There is no question that the Cyprus situation has been a tremendous tragedy, both for Cyprus and Greece, and those who are responsible really should have to pay for this terrible thing that they did. I don't think the Cyprus question is resolved. I think it is quiescent at this point. I think, however, that it is moving to partition which was the aim, and this is not a satisfactory solution for Cyprus, and it's not a satisfactory solution for Greece.

But Greece is not in a position to really challenge this because militarily it is much weaker than Turkey, and furthermore, Cyprus being closer to Turkey, Greece does not have the military capacity to defend the island or to engage in any kind of a military battle there.

However, because it has seemed to quiet down, Karamanlis has decided to go ahead and have elections. He knows that by having elections early, he does not allow the opposition forces to organize sufficiently.

He has established the electoral law, he's established the date of elections, he's established the rules under which elections will be held. So his main attempt is to try to legitimize himself in power and then to proceed to what I would imagine, would be the building essentially of an authoritarian fascist state.

Whether he'll have the opportunity to do this given the mood of the Greek people, I don't know. I think it's going to be very difficult, and I think that we can look forward to some more optimistic developments in Greece despite the fact that the situation is difficult.

Varsity: Taking into consideration the forces and the political conditions operating in Greece right now, who do you think has a good chance of winning the mid-November elections?

Mrs. Papandreou: I should say, for one thing, the Panhellenic Socialist Movement does not put an awful lot of emphasis on elections, because they do not consider that this rather bourgeois type of activity is going to determine the fate of Greece.

The movement has put its emphasis on building a grassroots organization which will have the strength to withstand in the future any attempts to withdraw the constitution or to distort the will of the people.

In any case, I think, it does not expect under the circumstances that I mentioned earlier with Karamanlis establishing his own rules for the elections, that they will have a chance to come out as the first party.

But I think, they do expect that they will have a substantial base in parliament and from that point on, they will turn to the work they initially started, the building of a strong people's organization, which will fight to establish the rights of the Greek citizen for an independent Greece, for a Greece that is neutral and is no longer under the control of a foreign power or foreign monopolies.

"HIS MASTER'S VOICE"

Varsity: It seems to me that although the right wing has been able to concentrate around Karamanlis, the rest of the political forces, that is the parties of the Greek Left and Centre, appear to be emerging out of the dictatorship organically split and with their prestige as popular movements severely damaged. Why would you say this was necessary?

Mrs. Papandreou: Well, I don't know whether one can say that is necessary. First of all, the party of the right is a one of special interest — this is what is holding it together. They represent the interests that we mentioned before, usually the interests of the military, the business world, the interests of the United States in NATO.

I feel the second strongest party is the party of the Panhellenic Socialist Movement. It's a movement at this point. It probably will have a section of which will become the party which will go to the elections.

I think, that that actually represents a rather substantial portion of the Greek public. I think, that the Greeks during the 7½ years of oppression were radicalized to a great extent and began to see exactly the forces of power and would like to establish for themselves a more independent nation, and a nation that gets out from under the yoke of the multinational corporations and the imperialist interests of the United States.

So, I don't know how split it is really. It's the old Centre-Union, I think, that was considerably discredited, because it did not play a very strong role in resistance. Candidates elected by the people, were supposed to represent the interests of the Greek people, but did not come out strongly. From what we hear in Greece, the Greeks feel rather disenchanted with that particular party.

Mrs. Papandreou: The split in the Centre Union occurred at the time that the king decided to throw George Panandreou out of office, and it was a time the CIA became very active in Greece to try to buy off deputies and to create the kind of conditions which would force a sufficient portion of the Centre Union, to join with the party of the right, which is traditionally the king's party in Greece, so that they could form a majority in parliament and proceed to govern.

The CIA managed to succeed in this, with great difficulty however, because it took at least two prime ministers, Novas and Tsirimokos, who lost a vote of confidence. Finally, with more pressure and, I think, more money, the other deputies did finally split off and under Stephanopoulos joined him, and there was a majority government of about two votes out of a parliament of three hundred deputies, that ruled the country for almost two years.

We can say that the Centre Union forces that joined in this activity were forces that were under the influence — many of them paid — by the forces of the United States through the CIA.

So, it was that kind of game that was going on, not dissimilar to these other things that we know now happened in Chile. I think, if we were to have a congressional investigation of some of the activities that went on in Greece — in fact some information has come out recently of some of these activities that went on in Greece in 1965 — we would see, that some of the same things happened.

They wanted to overthrow a government which they felt was too independent and they succeeded in doing so. It's one of the reasons I think why the Centre Union itself does not have the prestige that it might have had.

Certainly, those, that group that became known as the "apostate group" is terribly discredited and if it has

WORLD SHORTS

This is the second in a series of articles appearing in The Varsity each Monday concerning current news items in the Third World as well as other countries where tensions are mounting. It is designed to give the reader a better insight into world events — an insight which would not normally be given in the established press.

SPAIN

More than 30,000 workers are on strike in factories in Spain's cities, from Barcelona to Seville, in response to a statement by the country's Commerce Minister Nemesio Fernandez Cuesta that the Spanish people had to tighten their belts.

On Oct. 5, police surrounded a church where 80 people were holding a political workers' meeting in San Cugat del Valle, a town near Seville. Some managed to escape but 47 were arrested, including activists of the illegal Workers' Committees.

Meanwhile, prison protests are spreading in Spain.

In the Carabanchel prison, 86 political prisoners have been on a hunger strike since Oct. 4 to protest bad treatment and to demand that police make public recent arrests in connection with the bombing of the Rolando Cafeteria in Madrid's Puerta del Sol, a restaurant heavily patronized by police.

The prisoners further demanded that the writer Alfonso Sastre, whose arrest followed a few days after his wife's arrest, be placed in the jail's political prisoners' section and accorded a political prisoner's rights.

Two protests also broke out in the Basque country at the end of last week where 20 prisoners have refused to eat.

BOLIVIA

Miners in Bolivia launched a 24-hour strike last week to protest the government's recent closing of schools where students have manifested discontent.

Factory workers in La Paz have called for another 24-hour shut-down as a protest against this attempt to "crush the freedom of the people."

On Oct. 4, police in La Paz violently intervened in a demonstration by students and faculty members. Two policemen were shot and wounded, and at least five students were wounded, while an undetermined number of arrests were made.

The factory workers and miners both reacted by condemning the school year's early termination and demanding the release of the students and professors arrested during the term's final days.

Bolivian army's provisional commander general Raul Alvarez Pendaranda stated Oct. 5 that the "climate of political agitation" in Bolivia, including anti-government protests and strikes, will force President Hugo Banzer Suarez' regime to reconsider the general elections scheduled for October 1975—the first election to be held in 10 years.

Suarez added the armed forces will energetically crush any "potential subversives."

CHILE

Police and army troops gunned down Miguel Enriquez, secretary general of the MIR (Movement of the Revolutionary Left in Chile) Oct. 5 in the Santiago suburb of San Miguel.

Carman Castillo Echeverria and Pascal Allende, Salvador Allende's nephew, were wounded and taken prisoner in the attack. Echeverria is seven months pregnant.

Since November, 1973, Enriquez had been on a list of the 10 most wanted Chileans. The junta offers a reward in gold in exchange for "information leading to the capture" of persons placed on this list.

Police and army troops arrested more than 100 people in a working class suburb north of Santiago during the San Miguel onslaught.

The military police evacuated all houses in the neighborhood and sent prisoners to the General Investigation Headquarters for interrogation.

At a Paris press conference Oct. 7, Enriquez' brother, Edgardo Enriquez, a member of the MIR Political Commission, made the following statement:

"The death of Miguel Enriquez is a hard blow, but not a catastrophe for the MIR, because it is strongly rooted in the working class."

In a communique released in the U.S. Oct. 7, the MIR said sooner or later the resistance will become open civil war and "MIR is inside Chile preparing it."

"The struggle will be long and difficult, it has just begun. We have received some blows and we have overcome them; more blows will come, we know that in this struggle we can lose our lives but we shall continue to struggle until final victory."

GREECE

A demonstration was staged Sept. 27 against Greece's former president and strongman of the fascist junta, Brig. Demetrios Ioannides, when he entered a court building in Athens.

The spontaneous demonstration started when hundreds of youth gathered and chanted, "Let's lynch the murderer!" The crowd swelled to more than 3,000 in only a few minutes.

Rugby Blues beat Western 31-4; seconds lose

By BOB ALGIE

After riding through a snow squall and being barraged by all the excitement of Western's homecoming, the rugby Blues soundly defeated the Mustangs 31-4.

The start of the game bode ill as Blues were pushed around. Only three minutes into the game, Varsity lost the services of flyhalf Neil Sorbie with a torn ear.

Shortly after Blues were awarded with a penalty kick, which Mike Powell booted through.

It wasn't until 10 minutes into the game that the Blues showed Western how much they wanted to win.

Even with 14 men Varsity held its own in scrums and the backs gave Western no breaking room which caused the Mustangs to drop the ball and kick erratically.

Chris Bouris, playing at wing, scored the first try of the game. Scrum-half Drummond fired a long pass from the inside to spring Bouris down the sideline unopposed.

The next score was lucky. Off a lineout, Western's fullback was a little slow and his kick for touch was blocked. Randy Scott grabbed the ball and ran in for the try. The try was converted by Mike Powell.

Western's only score of the first half came when a long kick was misplayed by the Blues. Mustangs picked up the ball and ran it in.

The convert was missed leaving the half time score at 13-4 in Varsity favour.

Blues opened the scoring in the second half on another penalty kick by Bouris.

A pair of tries by Drummond, converts by Powell and a penalty kick by Bouris rounded out the scoring.

The seconds were a little short of manpower so Osadetz of the firsts played as the seconds lost. The second lost Jim McMillan as well with a separated shoulder.

So far this season the firsts have a record of 4-3, and the seconds 3-3. There are two more games left for the second team.

The Blues next play Thursday at 3:00 pm for the firsts and 4:30 for the seconds.

Hockey Blues dump police

By SYD CAPP

In a practice scrimmage at the arena Friday night, the hockey Blues defeated the metro fuzzies by the lopsided score of 10-3.

Today at 8:00 pm in the ice palace Blues continue their preseason play as they host the Whiby MacDonalds, a senior A team.

Four ex-Blues players, including goalie Bruce Durno, now play for the MacDonalds.

STUDENTS AREN'T NEEDED ON TENURE COMMITTEES or so some members of the Governing Council seem to think.

On October 3rd, the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council held a preliminary discussion on who should serve on tenure committees. Most of the members, particularly faculty, expressed the opinion that students should not serve on tenure committees. They argue that sufficient attention is already being paid to teaching ability, the area which concerns students the most.

This argument continues to be made despite overwhelming evidence that this university continues to fire some of its best teachers.

All of us have taken classes at the U. of T. We all know that excellent teaching is the exception, and mediocrity the general rule.

If you are dissatisfied with the quality of teaching at the U. of T. the time has come to show that concern:

Vic squeaks by SMC 14-10

By MRS. PARKER
In the interfac football action Friday afternoon, Vic edged St. Mike's 14-10 to keep a first place tie with Phys Ed in the first division.

The Mikes opened the game with a drive that covered 70 yards in eight plays to score the first touchdown of the game.

Vic came out passing but not receiving as their quick drives fell short of paydirt until the second quarter when they finally connected for the equalizer.

In the third quarter, SMC counted a field goal from the leg of Liscio that appeared to be enough for the win.

With less than a minute to go SMC's stout defence went to sleep allowing Vic to complete a 60 yard pass and run bomb to Hotram for the game winning score.

In second division Trinity stuck Forestry with a 31-0 loss. For also lost another player to the Hart House surgery with a double ligament tear.

SMC ran and passed well in losing effort to Vic.

Blues dominate OUAA track meet

By MRS. PARKER
The far from perfect conditions last Saturday in Hamilton did not stop the Track Blues from some excellent performances to bring home the Tait Mackenzie Trophy for the third straight year.

From the completion of the first event, the 10,000 m, the outcome of the meet was never in doubt; only the margin of victory was left to be decided.

The final results showed Varsity with 240 points, Queen's second with 101, and the host school, McMaster, third with 57 points.

The bulk of Toronto's points were accumulated from the 12 first place finishes, including 10 of the 12 track races, and 10 second place finishes.

Five of the 19 events saw total Toronto domination. The 1-2 finishes for the Blues were Dave Colbert and Gerry Feeney in the 400m, Phil Pyatt and Joe Sax in the 1500m, Curtis Sahadath and Mike Hart in the 110m Hurdles, Brian McInerney and Ron Nastiuik in the Pole Vault and Dave Watt and Mike McVarish in the Triple Jump.

Only two records fell in the men's events, both to Blues. Frank Aguanno shaved a tenth of a second off Kip Sumner's four year old mark in the 800m with a time of 1:52.9. John Sharp bettered his own 500m mark by 30 seconds with a time of 1:13.4 and won the Hec Phillips Trophy for the meet's outstanding performance.

PHE, Trin win rugby games

By NEIL SORBIE

On Thursday afternoon PHE defeated Vic by a score of 12-3, in interfac rugby.

Vic scored early on a penalty kick and led 3-0 at the half. PHE took the lead in the second half when Harris took the ball from a set scrum and scored near the posts.

Harris converted his own try. PHE increased their margin when Parmaksezian followed his own kick to tally by putting the ball prone in Vic's endzone. He then converted the score by kicking two points more.

In a hard fought and closely contested match Trin squeaked by Eng II 21-3. Suffice it to say the score was hardly indicative of the game.

Trin scored four tries with two going to Abraham while Corwana and Johnson tallied one each.

Knowles added a conversion and a penalty kick to round out the scoring. The high scorer for Eng II was Humber with 3 points on a penalty kick.

Eng I defeated a short handed Law squad 10-0, Friday.

Bad passing by Law resulted in Eng's first try as Smith broke through to fall on the loose ball in Law's goal area.

Ballins converted the try giving skule a 6-0 lead. A combination of excellent passing and backing up lead to the engineers working the ball up the field to have Smith transport it into the endzone. The conversion was missed.

In true rugby tradition, the beer-up that skule held after the game Friday was quite a success.

Football Blues are six in a row

By PAUL CARSON

"Well, we've set up one hell of a Homecoming," exclaimed a very tired but happy Varsity football player Saturday afternoon after Blues had clinched first place in the OQIFC east division with a solid 38-20 victory over Queens Golden Gaels before 8,000 in Kingston.

Yes, it will be a sensational Homecoming game this weekend at the Stadium as the luck of the schedule matches the undefeated Blues with traditional rival Western Ontario Mustangs, who just happen to be the only other undefeated team in the league.

Following an opening-day tie with Guelph, Mustangs have won five in a row including a narrow 24-22 verdict over defending champions, Laurier.

Blues, of course, are 6-0 and have first place locked up, including the home field advantage for the November 2 semi-final. 'Stangs must win in order to retain their one-point edge over Laurier; they had little trouble on the weekend smashing Windsor 40-7.

Pride, an undefeated season, and a little bit of revenge will be at stake for Blues as they hope to erase the memory of last year's humiliating slaughter in London.

Blues did their part to set up the great finale combining a sophisticated offence with the usually tenacious defense for a well-earned victory over the team which has so often killed Varsity playoff hopes in the past.

There was some sadness as well, for it was the final encounter with Frank Tindall, acknowledged as the dean of Canadian college coaches, who is retiring after what seems to be a lifetime at Queens.

Superlatives come easy when describing Tindall, an energetic recruiter, an innovative coach, and always friendly and helpful to reporters even when gently pulling the wool over our eyes.

Saturday, Mr. Tindall was up to his usual bag of tricks with halfback option passes, multiple motion, and well-drilled speciality teams that produced an early 65-yard touchdown on a punt return by Darrell Penner.

However, Queens just didn't have the quarterbacking or bench strength this year and the loss means Tindall will go out missing the playoffs.

Varsity spent most of the first quarter deep in its own end but caught fire after Penner's touchdown and eventually mauled the Queens defense for a fantastic 632 total yards.

Before the quarter ended, Mark

Bragagnolo had put Blues in front 7-6 with a 35 yard run that began with his own fumble. However, the ball bounced right back into his hands and without breaking stride, the outstanding rookie was on his way past surprised Gaels defenders.

Bragagnolo didn't recover his next fumble but Blues promptly got the ball back when Rick Jeysman picked off a halfback pass from former Blue, Peter McNabb. Several plays later, Bragagnolo scored on third down behind solid blocks from Don Dawson and Mike Sokovnin.

The eventual winning score came with only six seconds on the clock as quarterback Dave Langley plunged over following a Bob Billingham interception.

Blues wrapped it up in the third quarter as Langley passed to flanker Brent Elsey and split end Mark Ackley to cap two well-engineered long marches.

Fullback Dave Haddad completed Gaels scoring with two short runs, and Varsity kicker Don Wright added a 20-yard field goal to his five successive converts.

Bragagnolo rushed for 123 yards, bringing his season's total to 912, but the real story of this game is the versatility in Blues offensive strategy.

Veteran Libert Castillo and sophomore Bob Hedges saw a lot more of the football and responded with several excellent runs.

When Gaels concentrated on Bragagnolo, Ackley was open in the short zones and Langley played pitch and catch with him almost at will.

Elsey's touchdown climaxed a series in which the final five plays involved five different backs and Elsey was totally uncovered as he took a perfect pass just over the goal line.

Ackley's major was his fourth catch of the drive that also saw good runs by Hedges and Bragagnolo.

Defensively, it was a day for the secondary as Jeysman, Billingham and Rick Natkatsu contributed interceptions and the tuns prevented Queens from scoring an offensive touchdown until late in the third quarter.

Despite the somewhat lopsided score, Blues did make a few too many mistakes in the little things they've been doing so well this season.

sloppy coverage on punts, and far too many silly penalties. Fumbles, punts and penalties have been the downfall of every Varsity team since Blues' last championship in 1967.

'Nuff said.

LEFTOVERS—The story around the league says that Blues can be beaten with the pass and Western has one of the best in Bill Robinson. . . Langley can attest to the improvement in Varsity's pass coverage as he picked it apart last year for 280 yards while playing for York. . . It may be a good omen but when Blues won that title back in 1967 it was with a transfer student at quarterback, Bob Amef from Carleton. . . Laurier set almost every record imaginable by obliterating York 90-15 in another game Saturday. . . Elsewhere Guelph over Waterloo 18-3, McGill hammered once-powerful Bishop's 41-0, McMaster tied Neil Lumsden 14-14 but Lumsden's Ottawa teammates added another 24 points for a 38-14 victory, and Carleton climbed into fourth by outscoring Loyola 42-15. . . Apologies to the offensive unit who were reduced from chimpanzees to chipmunks in last week's story. . . Is coach Murphy really the Big Enchillada?

Soccer Blues lose exhibition game to Buffalo Bengals

By JOHN COBBY

With an exhibition contest interrupting the regular league schedule, soccer coach Bob Nicol used the occasion to dress some players who rarely see action.

Also with the Blues currently in a slump, the visit of the Buffalo State Bengals on Saturday enabled him to see if a change would reveal previously unsuspected talents.

As it was the vastly rearranged squad lost by 2-1, showing both negative (in the first half) and positive (in the second half) aspects to their play.

As goalkeeper Igor Ivanisevic was late for the game, the Blues asked Keith Lloyd to guard the net.

After four minutes a corner was forced on the Blues' left and was hit by Linville to an area six yards from the net. Normally such a cross is handled or punched by a goalkeeper, but Lloyd was unable to execute the play due to his inexperience at the position.

Unfortunately he palmed the ball directly to Oberman who found that the ball had ricocheted off his head and into the net.

Shortly after Ivanisevic arrived and took over the goalkeeper's duties.

Despite the early setback the Blues gradually began to assert themselves to smooth team play.

Bern Lecker, playing in an unaccustomed role as a midfield player, Dave Evans and Tim Burns were able to set up openings for the forwards, but these were not utilized on account of misunderstandings at the crucial moment.

Thus, while Quatro in the Bengals net saw plenty of action he was rarely called upon to make a desperate save.

Just as it appeared that Toronto would stamp some authority on the proceedings, a second score was conceded. It was the sort of goal that has plagued the Blues all season long, being the result of an unforced error rather than a brilliant play by the opposition.

A long ball by the Bengals defence floated, apparently harmlessly towards Jude Robinson.

He misjudged his header and the ball glanced off his forehead exactly into the path of Oberman. He was able to shoot the ball home with relative ease.

The tragedy of it all is that, apart from this one fatal error after 24 minutes, Robinson played with considerable coolness and anticipation in his role as center-back.

It took a while for the Toronto squad to recover its poise, but once the second half began the passing plays became just that little bit sharper as the kinks were ironed out.

The midfield trio were able to concentrate on building attacks, predominantly down the wing, without being distracted by defensive chores; in that department Robinson and Rudi Kovacs, were now virtual control.

The Bengal's play became more and more disorganized as they were forced further and further back by the pressing play of the Blues. Sometimes a wild tackle was the only resort, as when Ian McCluskey was brought down while making a powerful wing run. The injuries he sustained forced him to leave the game.

However, the desired goal would not come, as the Toronto finishing, by forwards, midfield and defence lacked accuracy if not power.

Keith Hall was just high or wide on two occasions with strong shots, whereas in the first half he, along with the rest of the Blues, had hesitated to shoot and in consequence was often dispossessed while dribbling instead.

After 75 minutes the home team scored from a passing combination indicative of their improved second half play.

From midfield Burns hit an accurate ball to Phil Oldfield. He drew two defenders toward him and, once they were committed to challenge for the ball, coolly stroked the ball past them into Vince Ierullo's path. He controlled the ball, looked up to choose his spot and shot accurately past Quatro.

For a while the Bengals, having substituted immediately following the goal, showed more drive. However Ivanisevic had settled to his task and was able to block any attempts that threatened his net by advancing from his line to reduce the effective area at which the forwards could shoot.

Gradually the momentum swung back in Blues' favour again, as Lloyd and Lecker combined down the right to set Oldfield free; his shot was charged down by a massed defence.

Despite a strong effort, the Toronto second half rally failed to produce an equalizing score.

Whether the changed lineup, which functioned better and better as the game progressed, gave coach Nicol any ideas for next Thursday's game in Guelph is an open question.

It is certain that the players making their first appearances gave everything they had, which has not always been the case in the more regular Blues' formations.

If you've got something to say, why not write a submission for our "op-ed" column? Keep it short—about four pages maximum—and make sure you type it. We'd be glad to see what runs through your miserable little minds.

OISE defers hiring of radical

The board of governors at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) yesterday deferred a decision on overriding faculty and students' unanimous choice to hire an outspoken Canadian sociologist — one of the best in North America.

The board may yet follow the lead of the U of T sociology department, which also vetoed a staffing selection committee unanimous decision to hire Canadian sociologist John Seeley.

Seeley, who has worked in the U.S.

for 10 years, believes top administrators at both U of T and OISE overturned staffing committees' unanimous decisions to hire him because of radical political stands Seeley has taken on controversial campus issues.

The staffing selection committee at OISE's sociology in education department, supported by the department's faculty and students, failed yesterday in an appeal to the board of governors that an independent review be set up into Seeley's rejection.

However, the board of governors did decide to call a special meeting Nov. 12 to "consider the need for a review panel" in the appeal to the board to have Seeley's rejection reviewed, board chairman Vernon Ready said yesterday.

Only five faculty members — four of them government appointees — and no students sit on OISE's 36-member board of governors. The other members are government appointees, and all board meetings are closed.

INVITED

Ready said three representatives from the sociology in education department, including its chairman Ted Harvey, and three members of the executive of OISE's faculty association — which has supported the department in its appeal for a review — will be invited to the Nov. 12 meeting to "make a presentation ... and to answer questions concerning the matter."

"These discussions will be held in camera," Ready added.

The selection committee's choice to hire Seeley was initially overturned by OISE's personnel advisory committee — the body which advises OISE's director on all staffing matters. OISE director Robert Jackson subsequently accepted his advisory committee's decision.

The advisory committee normally rubber stamps staffing committees' choices.

In a release yesterday, the OISE sociology department — including faculty, students and support staff — said it could not "understand why the board could not have endorsed an immediate independent review."

"We are confident that a serious and objective assessment of this proposed appointment will yield a positive decision," the department's statement says.

LIPS SEALED

OISE and university administrators have kept their lips sealed on the controversy which has spread at OISE this week over Seeley's rejection.

OISE director Jackson refused to comment on reasons for Seeley's rejection.

Willard Brehaut, chairman of the director's personnel advisory committee, said he could not comment because "every recommendation we make to the director is confidential."

Gordon Cressy, an OISE sociology professor, said the department has been given no substantial reasons for Seeley's rejection. "It's one of the things we're trying to find out," he said.

Cressy noted one of the reasons the advisory committee gave to the department for Seeley's rejection was because U of T's sociology department could not satisfactorily explain why it didn't hire him.

U of T sociology department chairman Irving Zeitlin refused to reveal why a sociology department staffing committee choice to hire Seeley last year was overruled.

"It's an internal matter," Zeitlin maintained. "There's nothing of public interest in this."

Zeitlin said he was misrepresented in a Toronto Star article's description of a personal letter Zeitlin sent to OISE's sociology department last May.

The Star article said Zeitlin wrote he personally overruled the decision to hire Seeley because of strong opposition from several senior university administrators.

CONFIRMED

Pauline Pytka, a former student member of the staffing committee which chose to hire Seeley, confirmed some senior faculty members and administrators strongly objected to Seeley's hiring. Pytka said she thought these senior faculty members moved out of the sociology department's democratic structure to pressure administrators at higher levels.

She added these senior faculty members opposed Seeley's hiring because of experience they had had with him when he taught at U of T almost 20 years ago.

Leo Zakuta, a sociology professor and associate dean of the School of Graduate Studies, also refused to comment on Seeley's rejection.

"Harold, didja hear U of T is fighting the daycare centre again about a new lease?"

Student reps on tenure committees may be decided today

The contentious issue of student representation on tenure committees will probably come to a vote at today's meeting of the academic affairs committee of Governing Council.

The committee has debated the issue and heard deputations at several meetings this fall and it is likely voting will begin on models of representation.

The committee decision comes almost 15 months after the release of the Forster report, the presidential task force on academic appointments.

The report recommended no student representation on tenure committees, claiming no satisfactory method of selection could be found.

Since then students have waged a lengthy campaign to gain support for their bid for student-faculty parity on tenure committees.

Students are now excluded under the Haist rules which govern the operation of all university staffing committees. In the sociology department where students sit on staffing committees the committees are purely advisory.

Trinity College has allowed student representation on tenure committees but this will be ended when new university departments are set up under the memorandum of agreement on the colleges.

Only one student sat on the Forster task force, which recommended against student representation.

When the Forster recommendations came out last fall SAC decided to hold a referendum to sound out student opinion and build support for changes in staffing policies.

The campaign for the referendum stressed the necessity of student representation for tenure decisions primarily based on teaching ability.

Present decisions are made on the basis of research and publication as well as faculty politics, students concended.

In the referendum a turnout of almost 7,000 students voted 2-1 in favor of parity representation and 7-1 in favor of representation.

But administration and faculty were slow to react. To get a parity sub-committee to discuss methods of student representation students had to disrupt a meeting of the academic affairs committee last year.

Meanwhile the academic affairs committee moved slowly through the Forster report, discussing other minor issues, and interest waned.

Last year attention shifted in the second term to the fight against the administration's tough new code of behavior and the staffing issue moved into the background.

Debate on the issue has been intense, with both student and faculty leaders seeing it as crucial to their interests.

For students, parity representation relates directly to having a say in the quality of education which affects students daily in the classroom.

But many faculty members have argued students haven't got the maturity or judgment needed to sit on tenure committees.

Their fight has been based on the protection of their present powerful position in determining all staffing decisions at the university.

Many incidents have arisen where the "publish or perish" mentality of the traditional faculty "guild" has resulted in the denial of tenure to excellent teachers.

Students have protested unsuccessfully in several cases which have come to light, notably last year in the French department and two years ago in the mathematics department.

However many decisions have not come to light because of the cloak of secrecy surrounding staffing decisions at U of T. Individuals involved refuse to publicize their cases for fear of adverse affects on future job prospects.

Unless the present system changes the university will be able to go on quietly firing some of its best teachers.

Council's executive recommends more student representation

The executive committee of the Governing Council voted Monday night to recommend an increase in the number of student members on council, The Varsity has learned.

The committee proposes to increase to 11 the present total of eight student members.

As compensation, the committee agreed to support an increase in the number of faculty representatives to 13 from its present 12, although the full council last Thursday voted against increasing the total of faculty representatives.

The Governing Council convenes again Thursday, for its second meeting in a week, to vote on the executive committee recommendations and to forward a report to the provincial government.

As U of T is a provincially-constituted body, the provincial government must approve any constitutional changes in the university, which is governed by the University of Toronto Act of 1971.

Unlike in 1971, when colleges and universities minister John White made changes in a university report after lobbying from students and faculty, minister James Auld is expected to interfere little, if at all, with the Governing Council decision. Auld has already stated he will have no comment until he receives a report from the university.

The report must be sent to the government by Oct. 31.

The executive has also devised a council structure raising the total of alumni and administrative representatives on the council, while leaving the number of lay members and presidential appointees constant, as was agreed by the Governing Council last week.

The recommendations add up to a 57-member council, enlarged from 50 members.

Laxer denied position

Jim Laxer, a leader of the Waffle movement and presently teaching political economy at York University, was refused a position in this university's sociology department last spring.

Laxer, who is well known for his left-wing, nationalist politics and was one of the founders of the New Democratic Party's Waffle faction—which last year split from the party—applied to the sociology department last year for a teaching position.

A former student member of the sociology department's staffing selection committee, which recommends staffing decisions to the department chairman, maintained Laxer was not hired because of "pressure from the administration."

In an interview last night, Laxer said he was informed by a member of the hiring committee that the body recommended to department chairman Irving Zeitlin that he be hired.

"The decision obviously was taken further on up," Laxer said.

Zeitlin, however, denied yesterday that his advisory staffing selection committee recommended he hire Laxer.

Zeitlin said there were "no political considerations" in Laxer's rejection.

Zeitlin said Laxer was not hired because he hasn't a PhD, he doesn't specialize in sociology and, at the time Laxer was being considered, he had no published equivalents of a doctoral thesis.

Laxer said the department never officially informed him of the rejection, nor of why he was rejected.

The U of T sociology department has been under fire since August when it hired no Canadians to fill eight teaching positions.

In addition, it was revealed this week that Canadian sociologist John Seeley, one of North America's best in the field, was refused a professorship in both U of T's sociology department and at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education. In both cases Seeley was the unanimous choice of staffing selection committees, whose decisions were vetoed by top administrators and senior faculty members.

Laxer has published The Energy Poker Game in 1970 and Canada's Energy Crisis in 1974.

He has been an assistant professor at York's Atkinson College political science department for the past four years. Before that he was a special lecturer at Queen's university history department.

Waffle member James Laxer: was he too radical for the folks at U of T?

"high misdemeanours by power-holders"

But when asked if he was one of the top administrators and faculty members pushing for Seeley's rejection, Zakuta replied: "I'm not denying it and I'm not admitting it."

Students on the selection committee believe Zakuta was a key influence in the decision to overturn the committee's choice.

"The last thing our department needs now is additional publicity," Zakuta said.

CRITICIZED

The university's sociology department, and Zeitlin in particular, was strongly criticized in September when the department hired no Canadians to fill eight teaching positions.

"What the department needs is to be left quietly in peace," said Zakuta, who is considered by many sociology students and faculty members as a conservative force.

Zakuta has opposed student participation in the sociology department and on university tenure committees. He is a key opponent at the university of student-faculty parity representation on Governing Council.

University vice-president and provost Don Forster, who approved Zeitlin's decision to reject Seeley, said the School for Graduate Studies was also involved in the decision, effectively confirming Zakuta's involvement in the decision.

Forster said SGS was consulted because "a senior appointment was proposed for the development of graduate work in sociology."

RESPECTED

Seeley has been highly praised by colleagues and academics as an outstanding scholar and sociologist. He is best known for a book he helped write in 1956 called Crestwood Heights, a sociological study of Forest Hill Village. Seeley has over 400 publications to his credit, including Community Chest and The Americanization of the Unconscious.

He was an associate professor in the departments of psychiatry and sociology at U of T from 1948 to 1954 and chairman of the sociology department and assistant to the president at York University from 1961 to 1963. He helped found U of T's Clarke Institute of Psychiatry.

Seeley left Toronto in 1964 after a dispute with York University president Murray Ross over York's expansion from the Glendon College campus to a large university at Keele and Steeles Avenues. Six other professors and many students quit in protest at the same time.

Seeley was involved in campus movements in the U.S. protesting selective service and the Vietnam war and supporting freedom of blacks and students' rights.

LETTER

In a letter Oct. 6 (reprinted on page 5) to "all persons in the (OISE) sociology department," thanking them for their support, Seeley, referring to university administrations, writes:

"The real charge is this consistent resistance to unbridled and immoral power whether exercised in Toronto or Berkeley or in the schools or prisons of either country or in the Indochina crimes against humanity."

"Not for me or really for students but for all faculty and graduates, for Canada and the future, I still believe such high misdemeanours by power-holders behind closed doors should be relentlessly exposed and opposed."

Political economy professor Christian Bay urged OISE director Jackson in a letter June 12 to support the selection committee's recommendation against the Seeley appointment.

"(Seeley) is without a doubt one of Canada's two or three most distinguished sociologists," Bay writes, "with respect to both the range and quality of his published works and his impact as a teacher. "One would be hard put to name another living sociologist with Seeley's mastery of skills, knowledge and wisdom, a superior creativity that ranges from applied mathematics and statistical techniques to the great humanistic issues in politics..."

In a second letter to Jackson dated Sept. 26, Bay writes: "If academic scholarship and excellence in teaching are to be the criteria for deciding on an appointment, then your sociology department would be fortunate to attract John Seeley to its ranks."

OISE's personnel advisory committee has stated four reasons for rejecting Seeley. However, OISE sociology faculty member Gordon Cressy pointed out, the department has satisfactorily replied to each one of the reasons and has since had no further response from the committee.

The committee rejected Seeley because of lack of evidence of recent productive scholarship; no recent experience in teaching methodology, which he was to teach at the institute; no evidence of successful experience in working with graduate students; and lack of a satisfactory explanation why U of T did not hire him.

UTFA salary demand of 25 percent is minimum: Nelson

The demand for a 25 per cent increase in faculty salaries is a "minimum" demand, according to U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) president Bill Nelson.

Nelson noted the demand for the increase would take effect in 18 months. Coupled with one per cent a month inflation, Nelson added the demand represented a much lower salary increase.

Nelson claimed costs had gone up 38 per cent since the last salary increase in June, 1971.

University faculty salaries have declined measured against the cost of living during the last decade, Nelson said. Moreover, U of T, which was once at the top of the heap in salaries, has now slipped to midway down the list, he said.

An assistant professor who wants to buy a house would now be in "real trouble" on his present salary, compared to two or three years ago, Nelson said.

"Sure, 25 per cent sounds like a lot," Nelson said. "But we're not arguing for taking it out of the mouths of the support staff or anyone else."

Although acknowledging the university may not be able to meet all the faculty association demands, Nelson insisted another $5 or $6 million could be found.

Nelson also said he hoped the university would co-operate with the faculty association in presenting a demand for increased finances to the government.

The faculty association will be issuing a newsletter this week to explain its demands.

"This country voted for laissez-faire liberalism in the last election," Nelson said. In that case, wage restraints should not be applied selectively, he claimed.

Chavez cancels tour

By MIKE EDWARDS

With the United Farm Workers boycott campaign at a critical point in Canada, the much publicized tour of union president Cesar Chavez has been cut short.

Chavez was to speak to lemon grove workers near Yuma, Arizona last Thursday, but acute back pains forced him to enter a local hospital.

The union president was to have spoken at Convocation Hall Oct. 30 and attend a mass protest rally at Dominion stores headquarters in Toronto the following Saturday.

He has asked his brother, Richard, to represent him at the rally. Richard is a union vice-president working in the New York area.

Doctors described Chavez's condition as "sheer physical exhaustion" apparently aggravated by the back condition.

Most farmworkers suffer from a back condition brought on by years of stooping in the field.

The grape and lettuce boycott in Toronto has managed to reduce sales by 45 percent but all of the chain stores continue to stock non-union produce.

Growers have been stockpiling double the usual amount of grapes in cold storage and 40 percent more than was stockpiled at the peak of the 1971 boycott campaign.

Seemingly coincidentally, Gerald Ford also visited the Yuma area at the time of Chavez's visit. The lemon workers have been reducing the flow of illegal immigrant labor across the Mexican border.

Both President Ford and President Echeverria of Mexico are thinking of renegotiating the Bracero program which would effectively legalize the use of cheap immigrant labour.

Citizen makes offer

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

An NDP-labor group has been given one week to make an offer to buy the Toronto Citizen, the newspaper's seven-member board of directors decided at a Monday night meeting.

Three offers were before the board, which owns and operates the newspaper, but the NDP-labor group was given the first chance to make an offer.

The board suspended publication of The Citizen late September after a management-staff feud led to a staff walkout.

The newspaper has been for sale since then but no serious offers have been made to the board.

The other two groups which expressed an interest in The Citizen were a community action group led by Dennis Wood and a group led by Gerry Grafstein, who was involved in raising funds for CITY-TV.

Letter to the Globe and Mail, On reprinting The Varsity, Oct. 22, 1974

Star editorial draws lines in thin air

The Toronto Star chose last Saturday to write an editorial on homosexuality.

The Varsity is replying since it was mentioned in the editorial, incorrectly. We did not reprint a story from The Body Politic, the gay newspaper, as the Star claimed: it was written for us.

The Varsity article dealt with the Star's decision not to print a story on a new U of T gay studies course, with background on the Star's treatment of the gay population.

Superficially, the Star's statement of its principles seems commendable, if thoroughly pompous: would that the Star was so honest about its other commitments, instead of murky gray.

But, more precisely, can the Star really differentiate between "tolerance" of homosexuality (which it supports), and "encouragement" (which it roundly condemns, waving visions of pederasty).

How can the Star say it "tolerates" homosexuality when it so actively seeks to root out homosexual advertising, and through a plant it controls, refuse to print a gay newspaper?

When the Star makes no overt attempt to discriminate or to decry in other areas of morality, its attitude towards homosexuality would appear to fall far short of toleration.

However, it all sounds very tough and non-sense to the 500,000 plus readers of the Saturday edition when they read: "Where the Star draws the line."

As it stands, the Star seems to be acting both as staunch civil libertarian and also crusader against the seduction of children, something which its attitude to date would seem to belie.

As for the line, that seems to be drawn in thin air.

Varsity photos unbalanced

In regard to your issue of October 11, one of the cover photographs shows Michelle Jory and myself in a moment of quiet thought. While the photo itself is accurate, I feel that I must, in respect of the facts, correct the caption which accompanied the photograph.

As published, we were debating "how many angels can dance on the head of a pen..." In fact, the discussion was focused on whether or not Varsity photographers can be balanced on the head of a pen.

Just as a point of information, I might add that we concluded that Varsity photographers cannot be balanced on the head of a pen because Varsity photographers are, generally speaking, unbalanced.

Reviewer answers

(Re: Serge Schardt's letter of Oct. 18), Hiya, Serge.

I'm sorry you didn't like Boris Gudonov. That's your right, just as it is mine to rave over it. Occasionally it becomes obscured that a review isn't the last word on any subject—it's just one listener's opinion. Had you been writing the review, doubtless it would have been quite different.

But shame, shame Serge! If I read you correctly, you're blaming me for directing you towards a performance that "ripped you off". Until theaters start a "money-back-if-not-satisfied" policy (not a bad idea, either) being ripped off is a chance that has to be taken.

As to the point that I glossed over the faults I briefly mentioned in the review: perhaps you're right. Considerations of space precluded a scene-by-scene description of the opera, and a feature review might have satisfied you.

However, there are two important points I must answer. First of all, there are many fine writers on Toronto's music scene who aim their copy at the well-informed listener, the one who knows his fermatas from his fortissimos, his tone rows from his toccatas. There's a vast segment of the audience that gets ignored, though. The newcomer to classical music sees it first as entertainment; it's only from that approach that a love for the music can grow, nurturing an interest in the more technical aspects.

It goes without saying that one can spend a whole lifetime of listening without going into the technical points, and still find the emotional satisfaction that a great work of art has to offer. (This isn't to downgrade the importance of such knowledge.

Elitists just don't want to acknowledge that it isn't a necessity). Think I'm wrong? Write me back.

Last point: I don't "suck up" to anybody, be it Canadian Opera or record company. As a reviewer yourself, Serge, you should know that promotional tickets and records are given out as a matter of course, and not in return for favourable reviews. If at times all my writing seems to favor excellent performances, it's for a good reason: there's a lot of well-performed music around these days.

My space in these pages is limited, so why not concentrate on the superlative? It's easy to knock the mediocre, if that's what you enjoy.

Conducting batons at twenty paces if that's what you want, Serge; write me again if the spirit moves you. Nice talkin' to ya.

U of T has pub now

The recent articles covering the S.A.C. proposal for a games room and pub are misleading. The front page story on Wednesday, October 9 stated "the University of Toronto is the only one of the Ontario universities without a daily pub and games room."

May I be so bold as to ask where the Varsity acquired its information? There is an obvious mistake in your reporting which should be corrected. There is a daily pub in operation in the U of T.

The Erindale Campus Centre, organized and funded by the Student's Administrative Government of Erindale and by the Student's Administrative Council, has been operating on a daily basis since January 1974.

Our facilities are utilized not only by Erindale students but by a significant number of students from various faculties and schools, who, living in Mississauga, find the location convenient.

Although it may seem to some that I am splitting hairs, I would appreciate it if in the future the Varsity could report the news with accuracy.

Dentistry replies

I am writing this letter in response to the article written by Lawrence Yanover, "Dentistry may cut honours-pass-fail," in the hope that I might correct a number of blatant errors which were part of this article.

Firstly, I would like to state that dentistry is not going to cut honours-pass-fail. What we at the faculty are attempting to do is to improve the system, both for the students, and for the staff.

Secondly, I wish to state that Mr. Yanover is totally unaware, or misinformed as to the process by which this change is being instituted. The faculty council at this very time is awaiting written evaluation opinions on what type of evaluation system they, the students, would like to see at this faculty; and no decision is to be made, until all parties i.e. both staff and students, have submitted their ideas.

Thirdly, the faculty council, contrary to the article, does have three student members, who have full voting privileges. Students, also have representation at the executive committee level of the council. The H-P-F system as stated in the article was instituted in 1971-72, but this was to be for a two year trial period, and for the last year, meetings and discussions between both staff and students have been going on in an attempt to improve the evaluation system.

I trust that this type of irresponsible journalism will not be repeated in future issues.

Sweater salesman disappears

During the week of Monday September 16 a certain young man by the name of B.S. Barclay (probably Bull Shit), sat in front of the U of T bookroom selling "the university sweater".

I was among numerous other students who bought these $14.93 gems which he promised would be ready within two weeks. We have been patiently waiting four weeks now for the "paid in full" sweaters! Where are they? It's getting cold! We want them—what would the better business bureau think of this?

Funding explained

I would like to correct some misinformation attributed to me ("Mary Bergman"—my name is Merrie Bergmann) in the Varsity on October 21, ("Toronto Rape Crisis Centre Suffers Financial Crisis").

The grant which the Centre is receiving from the UCF was not intended to cover only research expenses and expenses for setting up Centre "contacts". The restrictions I was referring to were actually the purposes for which the Centre received the OFY grant, which is discussed in the article. Concerning the UCF grant, I only indicated that the Centre is presently receiving funding from that source; this funding is not subject to the restrictions reported in the article.

For readers' information, the Crisis Centre's mailing address is P.O. Box 6579, Postal Station A, Toronto; the crisis line is 487-2345.

Editorial confused

The Varsity's editorial of 21 October, on U.T.F.A. salary demands is both factually and confused.

In addition to receiving a $200 inflation compensation last Spring, support staff also received a 9.9 per cent across-the-board salary increase. This compares with the 7 per cent across-the-board increase paid to faculty.

Then there is the Varsity's suggestion that money paid for faculty salaries is somehow distinct from "programs such as teaching". In fact the faculty take teaching seriously. So they should as they are the ones who do it. In demanding 25 per cent, U.T.F.A. is simply suggesting that academic salaries in July 1975 be the same, in real dollars, as they were before the inflationary spiral set in, in 1971.

M. Finlayson,
 Registrar,
 University College

Would the late Lord Baden Powell have congratulated the editors of the Star for "doing their duty", and taking a stand on homosexuality?

What is the university about?

Last week a few hundred members of the University of Toronto's Arts and Science Faculty Council met to debate and adopt a resolution opposing parity in the faculty-student ratio on the U of T's Governing Council.

By 204 to 56 votes (many abstained) those who met acted as everyone expected: no further steps toward parity can be tolerated, not even on the Governing Council where, absurdly, fulltime academics (students and faculty) are in a minority.

The most astonishing part of the meeting was an incident at the beginning: the question was called before debate could start, whereupon a large majority of those present, just a few short of the required two thirds majority, actually voted to adopt the resolution without any objections to be heard. The mover said he had heard all the arguments before. Most of his assembled colleagues agreed with him. So do, possibly, even larger majorities among the Arts and Science faculty who did not show up at the meeting, not to mention the other branches of the U of T faculty, further removed from professional concern with humanistic and social issues.

It seems clear, then, that only a very small minority of U of T's faculty wish to deal with their students as political equals within academic life, or even are open to discussion of increased student influence in their university.

I'd like to state my own basic argument for student-faculty parity in public, for two reasons: among the large majority of my colleagues I must now assume that my argument would fall on deaf ears; and yet, secondly, senior academics at times address the public on behalf of their colleagues and their students as well, on many town gown issues, much as senior medical doctors often like to speak for all the health services professions. In both cases the public needs to know of the limited constituencies of the people usually heard from.

KNOWLEDGE ARGUMENT

The most common argument advanced for limiting student influence is that the university's main task is said to be to produce knowledge. I grant that professors tend to be more knowledgeable than students, having had more time to work in their respective fields, but I think this statement of purpose is obsolete, or at any rate far too limited. Computers can now store most factual knowledge for us, old as well as new, and can provide equal access for young and old. What matters most today is to learn how to apply academic knowledge wisely and critically for just purposes.

To put it bluntly: the university's main task today must be to seek ways to break with our past, or transcend it, so that our civilization may yet be saved from the sickness of unlimited private possessiveness and the continuing mismanagement of our human, material and ecological resources.

Where else but in the universities can we hope to develop a disinterested but committed competency to plan for a viable future for mankind? The scholar's traditional commitment to truth must be commended and preserved; but without a corresponding commitment to justice it becomes, in the pejorative sense, academic. Should lectures on navigation theory be our only response when the ship appears to be sinking?

KNOWLEDGE OF JUSTICE

Now, knowledge of justice is more complex than factual knowledge. Its advancement requires not only armchair speculation, long hours in the library, and empirical observation, but a climate of continuing disciplined and committed discussion, between acknowledged equals; it requires a true community of scholars.

I have conceded that professors tend to possess more factual knowledge than students; but I think our students may well have the capacity of a keener understanding of justice.

In the 1960s, American and Canadian students, not their faculties, took on the moral leadership in the struggle against an outrageously immoral war. By and large, young people can feel political indignation more strongly; their personal integrities have probably suffered fewer compromises; they have not as often as we become dependent on the comforts of not disagreeing radically with the powers that be.

As scholars and as citizens we all need to be exposed to fresh points of view, and to be induced to listen to them with attention. Without approximate parity of influence, chances are that students will be lectured to rather than discussed with, outside and inside the classroom. Young people often are more perceptive about future trends than their elders, who may have become used to the past or present.

To break out of the present drift in an orderly way, in short, young and old must become able to meet in dialogue as political equals. This is what the university, above all other institutions, must be about.

RESPONSIBILITY

Responsible citizenship is today

our scarcest resource. While our students remain powerless, even idealism remains scarce, and tends to become exhibitionist rather than politically serious, as in the lamentable Banfield incident last spring. And the occasional arrogance of individual student rebels becomes grist for the mill of the standpatters, who appear reinforced in their distrust of the students generally.

Our rapidly changing world is in desperate need of more people with political responsibility as well as professional knowledge. Yet our institutions of higher learning continue to produce capable professionals who in most cases have no interest in social justice and little understanding of the urgent issues confronting mankind in our time. For they have been treated as "kids", politically speaking, nearly all the way to their highest degrees. The system has trained them well in their special fields and moulded them well toward the privileged social roles they have come to expect; the system has sought to avoid educating them to individual autonomy, to a sense of personal responsibility for helping to reshape our unjust and deteriorating world.

Thus we strive to perpetuate our Canadian social system with a minimum of radical questioning or reflections on alternatives, while the world around us is in crisis, and much of it in revolutionary ferment. I fear that the next generation, if not our own, will have a rude awakening some day, unless our generation of teachers somehow can learn very soon how to help liberate far greater numbers of our young people to political self-assertiveness.

START WITH UNIVERSITIES

The place to begin is in our universities. Nowhere else is the difference between what good we can do and the bad job we are doing, in terms of citizenship development, as extreme. But the students themselves must, evidently, not expect much assistance from the faculty, not at the University of Toronto at the present time. Their intellectual liberation must be largely their own work. They have no academic honours or smooth careers to win, if they as students insist on becoming politically self-governing man and women. But I am afraid they have a world to lose if they don't.

SEELEY EXAMPLE

To realize what a radical commitment to justice as well as truth can cost in personal terms, U of T students need look no further than the case of John R. Seeley, one of Canada's outstanding sociologists. He has for many years advocated views similar to those expressed here and has stood up for the rights of students and younger colleagues; as chairman of Sociology at Brandeis, for example, he was the first to refuse, about ten years ago, to grade students who risked being drafted to the Vietnam war as a result of low grades.

I understand better after last week's shattering experience in the U of T Arts and Science Faculty Council how deeply politically-free students are feared among many of my senior colleagues; and, more so, distinguished colleagues likely to take the side of free students in their confrontations with sacrosanct traditions serving established prerogatives.

I have good reasons to suspect that this is the basic reason why OISE's young Sociology in Education Department has been blocked so far in its unanimous desire to appoint Professor Seeley to a vacant position in their Department. It seems to matter little that he is by long odds the most distinguished scholar available for that position, and a Canadian, too.

Christian Bay,

Department of Political Economy

Seeley praises supporters

The following letter was sent by Canadian sociologist John Seeley to members of the sociology department at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, October 6, 1974.

Seeley was denied an appointment by OISE administrators who overruled the department's wishes.

I cannot find adequate words to describe my appreciation of, and admiration for the skill, tenacity, courage, and fortitude you have all brought to pressing the issues involved in your administration's refusal to give effect to your departmental decision. I can imagine how wearying, disillusioning and discouraging all this must be for you, and my sympathies match my concerns for the wellbeing and safety of all.

I have been through these things too often not to know how many of you must feel. And I have been too often privy to administrative discussion calculating exactly how best to make faculty and students feel so and surrender. These strategies are called intimidation rituals (see Journal Applied Behavioral Science number 3, 1974).

Perhaps a third of my life—leaving one third for family and one third for scholarship—has gone to attempts to help others civilize the excessive and unjust uses of arbitrary power. When I broke a career line of dazzling promise at Chicago, joining Canada's army to stop the march of Fascism, I aligned my life with my words on the large scale.

When at the University of Toronto in the forties, I gently pressed against the family compact and the ritual degradation of young faculty and students. I did the same on the small scale. When I finally and reluctantly accepted from students and faculty at York the burden of resisting the most outrageous betrayals of academic or even commercial honesty, I did the same at mid-scale.

This is the first time I have been involved in a struggle for or about myself and I feel uncomfortable as well as hurt and exhausted. It is surely clear to everyone that these strange star-chamber-like proceedings have no roots in the technicalities alleged. They simply continue the practices I observed used on others and protested when I first came to Toronto.

The real-charge is this consistent resistance to unbridled and immoral power whether exercised in Toronto or Berkeley or in the schools or prisons of either country or in the Indochina crimes against humanity. But the truth of administrative punitive reaction is as difficult to ferret out as was the truth about Watergate and for similar reasons.

I have no way of knowing if I could still benefit by the removal of administrative usurpation of your department's autonomy because commitments change, health changes, morale changes with the passage of time and administrations count on this effect as surely and openly as interrogators count on forced sleeplessness to gain submission either way. But I would like to hand on a torch I cannot much longer carry.

Not for me or really for yourselves but for all faculty and students, for Canada and the future, I still believe such high misdemeanors by power-holders behind closed doors should be relentlessly exposed and opposed.

I cannot make any promises and wish twice over therefore that none should risk or suffer on my behalf. For the general good, I wish someone would assume the burden of academic defense. As for myself, whether or not I can now return or bring back any of the precious treasure of four Canadian sons and families, I should like at least not to be exiled from the city I chose out of all the world as home; exiled precisely for the acts that had manifested the love that I bore her.

Department of Architecture: the egopathic, totalitarian chairman

On October 3, we attended a lecture by Herman Hertzberger at the school of Architecture of the University of Toronto.

The school of Architecture is still among our every-day interests although we graduated from its Studio Master program in April 1974.

The discussion period following the lecture retrospectively suggested the frustrations we went through under the chairmanship, directorship and dictatorship of the present chairman Peter Pragnell, in order to complete our studies.

We hope this letter will serve as a creative critique and as an obligatory return for the time and effort we, as students, invested within the school; which, along with the frustrations, provided us with valuable experiences as well.

Friday's lecture functions as a link in order to relate and develop our arguments for the present pernicious chairmanship of the school. Once more, the absolute lack of dialogue between the chairman of the Department of Architecture and everybody else who 'accidentally' didn't suit the totalitarian-egopathic philosophy of the chairman was apparent.

The first speaker during the discussion period was insolently cut off by the chairman, his statement being, "tough titties". With the encouragement of the lecturer (who could control the situation if he so wished) she continued perpetual argument, when she was bluntly cut off once more by the chairman: "Screw your reaction." Obviously he was performing in his usual manner, interfering with his excessive ironic comments—and oh how routine are these repetitions!

We are familiar with similar performances put on by our chairman. It wasn't the first time. For how long must we tolerate his personal tactics, which have been associated with a significant part of the school's performance?

His architectural philosophy supposedly provides significant freedom for the individual to either control or build his environment as far as possible from the effects of the bureaucratic and technocratic networks. At the same time, he rigidly channels the dialogue according to his moods and goals. He doesn't provide spiritual freedom, freedom for the expression of ideas and "round table discussions."

However, we are not surprised that it is possible for the chairman's cognitive faculty to make possible the inconsistent separation between individual freedom in order to form the environment and spiritual freedom to create dialogue.

We are not surprised how he has come to favour the expression "Primadonna Architects" towards others, since "the best defence is the offence."

We are not surprised how his totalitarian attitudes distorted the studio program of 1972-73 which compelled us to compose the following letter to Pragnell only two months after the start of the program:

"Forgive the innuendo, but we feel it is imperative that we formally make known our quandry concerning the graduate programme.

"Unless we are able to synthesize many of the principles that have so far arisen, (unfortunately within a monologue) it will continue to fall on barren ground.

"We are aware of your position, but your eloquence and stagemanship has overshadowed many of our propositions. This we feel has led to the complete lack of discourse on many subjects that we are sure need discussion and evaluation."

"It is unfortunate that the situation has arisen that we have to physically annotate our position, but it has, and we would like to arrange for a ROUND table discussion with you, and hopefully, if you feel that it may be valuable, with other members of faculty."

The chairman received the above letter from all five of the graduate studio students, all with different individual backgrounds, trained in different systems but with a common need; that is, the need for dialogical input as far as our studies were concerned. We were able to practice this criticism since all five of us were outsiders and unconditioned within his system. However, he couldn't deal with the meaning of this letter, the result being a period of frustration and personal defamation towards four of us.

In May 1974, John Wong (a fellow graduate) wrote us the following letter. We have come to a mutual decision to make it public:

"Now that we are out of the school environment, maybe it is an opportune moment to make a tentative evaluation of the course we went through without risking prejudices and personal intrigues. I recall that the first time we had a session together to discuss the graduate program was in November 1972 and the result was a proposal to the Chairman of Architecture for a round table talk. Unfortunately this cautious and modest approach failed to push through any frank exchange of opinions between students and the coordinator, as it was grossly misconstrued as a gesture of incivility by the opposite party.

"Nearly 1 1/2 years have elapsed since then, and it pains me to say that we were hopelessly naive in believing that provided differences were brought to the surface, a solution to our problems would be found through faith and good will. That much of what we said in our last communicate still remains unresolved, without so much an attempt on the part of the Chairman even to dissect the causes of discontent, only proves that we struck a very sensitive spot, where too much courage and magnanimity might have been demanded of the man we had placed our trust in.

"I am saying this because to this date the problems of the School are still essentially those of November 1972. I think the graduate program was fine in itself; I can find few faults with it. To quote Peter Prangnell's circular of September 8, 1972:

"The one favour I ask is that you approach the work (and the characters) as openly and directly as possible... By asking you to put aside your hobby horses I do not ask you to put aside your experience in the world. Our experience as men is the single thing we have in common and must therefore be used to the full to develop our discussions."

"What happened instead has been too familiar to us to recount here. But assuming that we had not deceived ourselves (why should we have, for goodness' sake!) that November, then perhaps it is beneficial to go over what we wrote at that time.

"That the high-sounding principles and eloquence accompanying the programs fell on barren ground was symptomatic of the one-way-street nature in which the graduate studio was conducted. The difficulty with us graduates was that while we joined the school as senior students, we came essentially as aliens, as distinct from the home-grown type of students who had spent a number of years under the same leadership. For us, submitting to a personality cult would be outright unacceptable. Thus when Peter Prangnell said, 'I assume that you have come to this school because you wanted to learn something from me... You all knew I would be in charge of the graduate studio. If you disliked me, why have you bothered to come here?' we could no longer refrain from speaking out on our conscience, even though it might jeopardize whatever working relationship that could still exist between him and us.

"Ironically, such an attitude on Peter's part in assuming unquestioned authority ran contradictory to what he pronounced in the circular of September 21, 1972:

"To my mind, one of the hazards of modern architecture is the cult of character. Too often, and disparagingly, we talk of the prima donna architect. The prima donna architect inevitably produces buildings as an extension of himself. They tend to be exclusive; that is to say there is little room in them for our participation and consequently are of the take it or leave it school."

"If our observations of what happened in the graduate studio in the fall and winter of 1972-73, and in the undergraduate studios through involvement as teaching assistants, are correct and unbiased, then Peter Prangnell might very well have written his self-indictment. For there was the cult of character, the school was an extension of its chairman, and there was an elitist 'Schutzstaffel' among the students who were very exclusive and who were mesmerized to swear fierce allegiance to their leader and mentor.

"You will perhaps agree that such a situation can hardly be the best one can expect of a school of architecture. When looking around the school, getting bombarded with the pseudo-Corbuser plagiarism of the senior students is not a comfortable thought either—I only hope that such a statement does not sound apocalyptic. Perhaps a turning point for the school may be just around the corner, provided that some new vitality can be infused with the addition of new staff.

Don Forster (Vice-president of the U of T) notes in his memorandum to dismember Architecture (Varsity, Wed. Sept. 18, 1974) that one of the faculty's goals to have it become a centre of focus for the development of general environmental studies has not been achieved "to the extent expected." Regardless if Forster's notes are made up to appropriate the administrative goals of the University, we believe that the School of Architecture has been strongly associated with its monodimensional chairmanship, the result being the weakening of its position.

The School of Architecture could be developed as "centre of focus" for humanistic studies since it can avoid the "primadonisms" of its chairmanship.

"The present graduate architecture program is a very strong one."

Greed above dedication in the medical profession

WELL, MRS RILEY, WHAT DO YOU HAVE?

Martin Shapiro
From McGill Daily

In analysing the position of the medical profession in our society, it is important not to regard it as a monolith. It is possible to discern three, broad categories of physicians, each of which is worthy of independent critical analysis.

Private practitioners

The first group, comprising the majority of physicians, is composed of private practitioners. They are businessmen who render a service for which they charge a fee. The sum of all such fees collected during the course of a year is, on the average, eight to 10 times the income of the average Canadian worker, and several hundred times that of the average worker in some Third World nations.

Private practitioners reap many dividends besides their incomes. In the economic sphere, these include tax-deductible vacations, tax-deductible automobiles, even tax-deductible homes, income from investments made in the names of the other members of the family, salaries paid to family members for office work, and so on. In other areas, these physicians are, for the most part, highly respected by their patients and by the community at large for the valuable service they perform.

How valuable is this service? Some physicians in private practice are, indeed, highly competent, and very conscientious. Some are quite conscientious in their work, but embarrassingly behind the times in terms of practical and theoretical medical knowledge. Still others are lazy and incompetent. All three types of practitioners do share one characteristic: they make lots of money.

No quality control

There is no quality control in medicine. A medical act is a secret affair between physician and patient, and the patient rarely has any way of knowing whether a treatment was adequately thorough, or sufficiently indicated, or a decision based on accurate knowledge. It is the business of the private practitioner to make his patients believe in him, so the practitioner puts on a good show and is able to overcome any diagnostic or therapeutic inadequacies with slick public relations.

The conscientiousness of the physician is determined by the pre-eminence either of greed or of dedication.

Physicians are paid for each vaguely defined medical act (visit, examination, etc.), and, as we shall see, there is considerable incentive not to be conscientious. The more the patients are processed and the more patients that can be seen, the more money the physician earns. cursory examination of the heart pays as well as detailed auscultation. Tapping on the knees brings as much into the coffers as a complete neurologic examination. Writing a prescription for a tranquilizer occupies less time than an inquiry into the causes of anxiety and so on.

Few are prepared to make such sacrifices merely to feel that they are doing a better job.

Few are prepared, one might say, to resist the temptation to drift into incompetence and laziness, especially when the economic incentives all point that way. This shouldn't surprise anyone. As long as fee-for-service medical practice exists, we can hardly expect physicians to act in any but their own interests, even when these don't happen to coincide with those of the patients.

A personal anecdote might be of interest at this point. While a medical student, I had occasion to visit a private practitioner whom I had visited a couple of years previously. When I arrived, the receptionist told me that I owed four dollars to the physician including a one dollar "penalty fee" for having missed my last appointment. I asked to pay later. She pointed out that it is the doctor's policy not to see a patient who owes money. I protested that I was sick. When finally shown in to his office, I began to describe my symptoms. The physician did not look up from a file card.

He said, "I understand you are a medical student. That is the only reason I will see you today."

I do not allege that all private practitioners are this way. Enough of them are, however, to make the problem considerable.

"People" docs

The second group of physicians considered are those on salary in university hospitals. They can be categorized as either "people docs" or "dog docs". These physicians are generally much more up to date in their knowledge than are the private practitioners. Paradoxically, they also earn a great deal less. (The average specialist in internal medicine at a McGill hospital earns between $28,000 and $40,000.) Being salaries they are able to spend more time with their patients and spend considerable time "keeping up" without suffering any additional economic hardships. Indeed, as teachers, it is part of their work to physicians is that they develop special interests. One follows patients with Cushing's Disease. Another devotes her time to systemic lupus erythematosus. And still another can find excitement only in metabolic bone disease.

While the private practitioner often fraudulently claims to be serving the community, the university physician fails the community without ever making such a claim. What the people doc does is essential, and were the community being adequately served by the health professions, one might not need to criticize the academic for failing to fulfill his or her responsibility.

Community doctors

The third group of physicians are those who work in community clinics. Within this group are two sub-groups: those who work in clinics run by the community they are supposed to serve, and those run by physicians and their ruling class allies.

Despite the protestations of the medical lobbies in Quebec, the government's concept of community clinics will leave the power in the hands of physicians. Those who work in these clinics will undoubtedly be very well paid. They will continue to practice more or less as they please. There will be no one around to criticize their work, and they will have no particular incentive to do a good job. They will not, however, have the incentives to do a bad job which private practitioners now enjoy.

Doctors working under citizen control tend to be paid somewhat less than other groups of physicians — the proceeds from their work is fed back into other activities of the clinic.

There is some opportunity for a change in their relationship with their patients, but most continue to impose medical care from a pedestal, an approach to which both patient and physician are accustomed. There is more opportunity to review the competence of the physician, but he is often overworked, (most community clinics are under-staffed), and does not have time to "keep up". In addition, he or she lacks the contact with specialists who could facilitate the process of renewing knowledge.

Ultimately, he does a much more humane job, a less careless job, but not necessarily an ideal job, when compared with most other practitioners. Furthermore, community clinics usually provide a traditional medical environment. The idealist will soon be frustrated in his or her desire to effect change when the problems of physicians relating to patients in an office cloud his or her vision of what could be.

There is, for example, no serious effort underway in Quebec to break up the model of the physician-patient relationship and introduce nurse-practitioners and others into meaningful service roles.

The medical profession, then, is not a monolith. Almost all physicians have very comfortable livelihoods and positions in their respective communities. Almost all of them are failing their communities in one way or another. Hence, few deserve the unqualified adulation they now enjoy.

They should be seriously questioned about the extent to which they fulfill their social obligations. The excesses and failings of the private practitioners are the greatest of all, however, and breaking up the distasteful notion of profiting from another's illness should be a priority as we begin efforts to place all physicians on reasonable (that means lower) salaries.

Martin Shapiro is a graduate of McGill Medical School and an intern at the Royal Victoria Hospital.

NO, NO, NO! DO YOU HAVE BLUE CROSS, MEDICARE, MASTER CHARGE, BANK AMERICARD OR.....

On the other side of the ledger, there is little incentive to be dedicated, thorough, and complete. Other than the increased gratification of a patient, and the qualling of a conscience (if there is one), the incentives to do a good job are hard to identify. Economic considerations certainly discourage such activity.

A friend of mine recently visited a chest specialist (on consultation, because of a respiratory tract infection). The fee for the visit was $23. The visit lasted three minutes, during which time the patient's temperature and blood pressure were taken, and he was told he was well. The physician did not even bother to examine the chest, (except perhaps by observing it through street clothes). It is hard to see how such a fee was justified, but there was no way of obliging the specialist to be more thorough.

Fee-for-service means self-interested doctors

Private medical practice is a piece-work enterprise. This approach to the healing arts affects the practitioner's competence as well as his or her thoroughness. Just as it is an incentive to be less conscientious, private practice is also an incentive to be less competent.

Medical knowledge is evolving at a spectacular speed; anyone who does not devote several hours a week to reading journals, and attending lectures and conferences, is not going to be able to keep up.

No one pays the physician for the time spent updating his or her knowledge. No one is around to check up on the competence of his or her practice. No one obliges the physician to be periodically relicensed.

Time spent at these essential tasks is time away from piece-work.

Physicians are not inherently greedier than other people — not much, anyway. Like most members of the bourgeoisie, they see themselves as having a job (they are more self-serving than most about the value of their labour). They have a home in the suburbs, a cottage up North, a car or two or three, a membership in a country club. If they gave up even one tenth of their working time to the reading and updating of their knowledge, they would have to sacrifice some part of their standard of living.

MY ARTHRITIS HAS BEEN BOTHERING ME, LUMBAGO IS ACTING UP AGAIN AND...

keep up to date, and pass the new knowledge on to their students.

It is not pure altruism which sends a man or woman to work in a hospital for less than he or she could earn elsewhere. Teaching students, interns, and residents does have its rewards, but there is much more than this to be gained from working in a university environment. Research can bring fame, or at least respect, far beyond one's immediate environs.

It is a major problem for many high-powered medical centres to get their "dog docs" on the ward teaching when they would rather spend their time preparing submissions to medical journals — careers coming before consciences once again.

* Another problem with academic

The SAC women's commission will be sponsoring a day-long session on women and the law at New College, Friday, November 1.

By DEBRA LEWIS

One indication of the attitudes of a society toward certain of its groups is through the legal code of the country involved. Throughout Canadian history, various groups — political, labour and immigrant, for example — have been oppressed by the law. Whether such oppression is subtle or blatant, it is nevertheless used to maintain the disadvantaged position of those groups toward whom it is directed.

One of the groups which is so con-

The most blatant way in which rape laws discriminate against women is in the actual trial situation. Rape is the only offense in which the testimony of an adult witness, the victim, is considered to be inherently less trustworthy than of others. The judge is compelled to warn the jury against accepting the uncorroborated testimony of the victim.

This requirement rests upon the assumption that women are vindictive beings who are likely to either seduce a man in order to charge him with rape, or

WOMEN A

TH

The idealising of women, both in the popular . . .

trolled by the law is women. Canadian law (and before it, the British law upon which our system is based,) has been developed in such a way as to sustain the position of women as second-class citizens and as the property of men.

During earlier times when such a non-human view of women was generally accepted by both sexes, the validity of such laws was rarely, if ever, challenged. However, with the rise of the women's movement in recent years, the injustice of such a legal system is becoming increasingly obvious.

One area wherein women are oppressed by the law is by virtue of their sexuality per se. The most obvious example of this is found in the legal proceedings surrounding rape.

Rape and the Law

A woman who has been raped and decides to report the offense to the police quickly learns that the general attitude toward her is disbelief, or at least scepticism. This is particularly the case if the woman is neither married (where the "property" rights of her husband have been violated) nor a virgin (where the future rights of some man have, similarly, been infringed upon).

fabricate the story entirely. Research has shown, however, that this is not the case. The proportion of false rape complaints is no higher than that of other Criminal Code offenses.

A second allowance made by the courts in rape cases is the admission of evidence relating to the past social and sexual history of the victim. Ostensibly, this is allowed to indicate the character of the witness to determine the likelihood that she is telling the truth.

In fact, it is applied to the question of whether the woman deserved to be raped. In no other criminal proceeding is such evidence admissible. The following opinion has been advanced concerning this issue:

"In a case other than rape, such evidence would clearly not be admissible. In rape cases, however, special rules applied . . . showing that she was a woman of loose character or notorious for want of chastity or indecency was, on the authorities, admissible." (R. vs Greatbanks, 1959 Criminal Law Review, 450)

Female Sexuality and Law

It is clear that rape, as a crime against women, is singled out for special consideration. While this treatment is alleged to protect men from false accusation, in effect, it oppresses women by disbelief of justified rape occurrences. Thus, many women are unwilling to report or prosecute rape charges, and many who do go to court report that the trial is worse than the rape itself.

Female sexuality, or the male concept of it, is also used against women in prostitution laws. Under the Criminal Code, prostitution is synonymous with the female sex. Women are charged, not for prostitution per se, but for "vagrancy", defined as:

"Being a common prostitute or night walker, who is found in a public place and does not, when required, give a good account of herself". Criminal Code, S 175(c)

While there is a provision in the Code for a prostitute and her "client" to be charged as being "found, without lawful excuse" in "a common bawdy house" (S193(2)), the law is seldom used against the men who patronize such establishments.

It seems that men need to be protected against the evils of prostitution. They are, in the eyes of the law, not responsible for their deeds. As in the case of rape, women are seen as "temptresses", and men as the helpless victims of their sexual drives.

It is clear that women are viewed as having control over their sexuality, whereas men are not. On this premise, women should be punished, while men are not.

Abortion

The discrimination against women continues in laws dealing with their reproductive roles. Until 1969, the distribution of contraceptive information and devices was illegal in Canada. It is important to note that the use of contraceptives was not, in itself, illegal. Women were seen as essentially irresponsible beings who needed to be protected from immoral practices.

This situation parallels that of current abortion law. While in this instance, the woman who seeks abortion is liable for prosecution, this is very seldom acted upon. If it were, the penalty for a woman undergoing illegal abortion (maximum 2 years) is still much less than for the abortionist.

The abortionist is prosecuted without hesitation, and is liable for a penalty of up to life in prison. It would seem that Canadian law implicitly states that women are not responsible for their own actions and that, if the temptations of contraception and legal abortions are not available to them, they will continue to bear children.

This is not the case, since it has been shown that women will actively seek control of their reproductive systems regardless of the legality of such actions. In addition, such laws seem to indicate that the practice of contraception and abortion is (or was) not inherently "criminal" and that such legislation is merely an attempt to control the morality of those who do not agree with that reflected in the Code by restricting the choices available to them.

. . . and the artistic mind contributes to a leg as an ind

Thus, the morality which is decided upon by legislative bodies which are predominantly male is imposed upon women as a group. Such attitudes were expressed by one member of the House of Commons in the debate surrounding the proposed changes in the abortion law in 1969:

"Doctors will have to deal with women that will play on words, who will think up any reasons to get a therapeutic abortion . . . Those who wish to solve the problem of an unwanted pregnancy are not consumed with scruples, but with an obsession . . ."

Canadian Abortion Law

Canadian abortion law is unusual in that its interpretation is not normally allocated to the courts, but instead to hospital committees, i.e. to non-judicial bodies. Abortions are permitted in Canada in order to protect the "life or health of the mother" but only when ratified by a therapeutic abortion board in an accredited hospital.

The interpretation of the "health", of

AND THE LAW

ELIZABETH CANNING,
Drawn from the Life, as she stood at the Bar to receive her Sentence, in the Sefion's-Houfe, in the Old-Bailey.

the mother varies greatly between hospitals. At a few, it is interpreted as liberally as "abortion on request", while at others as strictly so as to allow no abortions at all.

This fact particularly discriminates against the poor, rural women, and women in predominantly Catholic areas who may not have access to a hospital with a liberal view of abortion regulations. Thus, the law is not only women since that time, there are still many elements of the legal system which tie the woman to her husband.

One's legal place of residence is known as one's domicile. At marriage, a woman's domicile becomes that of her husband. This remains true even if they have separated and the husband moves to another city.

A number of legal actions must be initiated in the court of domicile. Examples of these are the contesting of a will or the obtaining of an annulment. In order to proceed with such actions, a woman must go to the place of residence of her husband. The exception to this is divorce. In the Divorce Act, provision is made to allow a woman to maintain a separate domicile for the purpose of obtaining a divorce.

A wife's primary right is to be supported by her husband. However, this right is dependant upon her conduct within the marriage. If she commits a matrimonial offense, such as adultery, she may lose her rights. This applies equally to a woman who is separated from her husband, but is still receiving support from him. Even if she has been deserted by her husband, a matrimonial offense legally ends her right to support.

Marriage and Property

Upon marriage, each spouse retains ownership of the property which he or she had before the marriage. All property obtained after the marriage belongs to that person who paid for it or to whom it was given. Yet if a wife is given an allowance by her husband and she saves money from that allowance to purchase property, it still belongs to her husband since the money involved was her husband's money.

Similarly, if a husband and wife open a joint bank account, it does not necessarily follow that the money in that account belongs to each of them equally. If the money is to be split by the court, the person who contributed to the account and in what amount will be considered. If only the husband is contributing to the account and it is shown that it was opened so that the wife could use the money to pay for household expenses, then she will not receive half of the money in the account.

The laws dealing with the ownership of the matrimonial home are even more dissatisfying. Ownership is determined by title, but a spouse may have a claim if it can be shown that he or she contributed financially to the purchase of the home. The performance by a woman of the duties seen to be a "normal" part of the marriage does not give her any interest in the home. Further, as indicated by the Murdoch case in Alberta, the performance of work done on the basis of the assumption of partnership in the ranch, business, etc. may not give the woman any right in the matrimonial home.

The rules which apply to property also apply to other goods such as automobiles, furniture etc. In general, they belong to the person who paid for them. This may mean that if both spouses are employed, and the wife pays for food and clothing and the husband pays for furniture and a car, the wife owns the food and clothing and the husband the furniture and the car. This applies even though he owns these goods because her money was available for food and clothing.

These factors mean that if a wife had no income because she had chosen to stay home and look after the home and family, she may have nothing in the event that the marriage breaks up. This is true regardless of the fact that she has spent years providing services for her husband and children.

The few rights which she does maintain in the marriage are dependant upon her good behaviour, while her husband's are not. Thus a woman may find that, after many years of marriage and work in the home, on the farm, or in a business, she owns nothing.

Women and Work

While the position of women in the employment field may look good, it is clear that discrimination has not been controlled by the law. The Ontario Human Rights Code forbids discrimination on the basis of sex or marital status in recruitment and hiring, promotion and transfer, and dismissal. Yet many women are afraid to challenge employers on this basis for fear of reprisals.

Even though Section 5 of the Human Rights Code protects employees who have made complaints to the Ontario Human Rights Commission, such protection is difficult to enforce. A similar situation exists with regard to pay. The equal pay provision of the Employment Standards Act states that: "No employer or person acting on behalf of an employer shall discriminate between his male and female employees by paying a female at a rate of pay less than the rate of pay paid to a male employee, or vice versa, employed by him for the same work performed in the same establishment, the employment of which requires equal skill, effort and responsibility, and which is performed under similar working conditions, except where payment is made pursuant to:

- a) a seniority system
- b) a merit system
- c) a system that measures earnings by quality or quantity of production; or
- d) a differential based on any factor other than sex, e.g., education."

These criteria are not easily enforced. In addition, the existence of jobs which are predominantly occupied by female persons, allow for lower rates of pay to be allocated to such jobs. The concept of equal pay for work of equal value is not a necessary result of equal pay legislation. It is clear, then, that the laws intended to protect women from discrimination in the labour force are inadequate to effectively stop such discrimination.

The result of the inadequate laws dealing with women in the labour force (and the unsatisfactory enforcement of those laws which do exist) is based upon the premise that a woman's employment is somehow less central to her life than a man's. Particularly in periods of high unemployment, such as now exist, many women are hesitant to challenge their exploitation by employers. Coupled with those laws which bind a woman to her husband in marriage, such factors perpetuate the concept of women as second-class individuals, who are dependant upon men.

Reforming the Legal System

Even from this brief summary of a few of the laws which effect women, it is clear that the judicial system continues to oppress them.

It is clear that it is the economic position of women in western society which contributes much to the attitudes toward women that are reflected in our laws. The concept of the nuclear family and the position of women within that family leads to the position that women are primarily sexual and social beings, without personal self-determination or economic worth.

Women are only seen in the context of a male dominated society. It is hardly surprising, then, that the law continues to reflect the inferior status of women.

It is true that some reforms have been instituted in recent years, and that others have been suggested and may be acted upon by government. Yet while these changes may better the position of women in our society, and are therefore important gains, it is clear that only a significant change in the concept of women's role will have any real and lasting effect on the position of women and the laws which reflect that position.

legal system that refuses to recognize her rights individual.

restrictive of women's rights, but it is also so prejudicially applied as to make it meaningless.

It is not only the Criminal Code, however, which considers women in narrowly defined roles. Elements of the civil law also oppress women. Obvious examples of this can be found in laws surrounding marriage, divorce, and property rights.

Marriage and the Law

Marriage is basically a legal contract between the two persons involved. The woman agrees to be sexually available and faithful to the man, and the man in return promises to support the woman. Essentially, this involves the man's purchase of the woman as sexual property. (It is interesting to note that a woman cannot charge her husband with rape, even if they are separated.)

Until the 19th century, a married woman was a legal non-entity. She could not own property, or sign contracts on her own behalf, for example. Although some rights have been obtained by

Speakers call for pollution control

By SUSAN SLOTTOW

Public attention should focus on reducing and recycling waste material. Pollution Probe member Peter Love told a public forum on the environment Monday night.

The forum, which drew 60 people, was held at City Hall as part of Environment Week activities.

Speakers included Queen's University professor Reg Clarke, alderman Ying Hope, chairman of Metropolitan Toronto Recycling Action Committee (METRAC), Gar Mahood from the Canadian Environmental Law Association, William Steggle from the Environment ministry and Love.

Hope emphasized there must be "continuous and relentless pressure on every level of government—municipal, provincial and federal."

Too often promises are made which are never kept or decisions are made which are too short range to have any major effect, Hope said.

Mahood spoke of the necessity of "environmental impact assessment procedures," with the emphasis on prevention, not enforcement.

"Every development proposal and project should be submitted to public scrutiny if the assessment process is to have meaning," Mahood said.

The public should have access to all information concerning any environmental project, he added.

The task force on solid wastes has been holding hearings for 20 months and has yet to arrive at any public recommendations or final report, Hope said.

Guelph students want resignation

GUELPH (CUP) — The University of Guelph Central Student Association (UGCSA) has called for the resignation of John Wood from the university's board of governors.

Wood's company worked on many United States defence department contracts during the Vietnam war and it is this complicity that the student's association is upset about.

The council passed a motion which read, in part, "By his (Wood's) actions in manufacturing munitions for use by the U.S. during the Vietnam war, Mr. Wood has opened himself to the charge of being a criminal under international law by committing what is referred to as a crime against peace in the Nuremberg Charter."

It continues, "Such a person to hold a seat on the governing body of the University of Guelph is contradictory to the stated objectives of the university in fostering the intellectual, social, moral and physical development of its members and the betterment of society."

The council will also organize a campaign to get students to ask for Wood's resignation. They have appointed a committee to circulate a petition to try and force Wood off the board.

They will also prepare a policy statement on Wood for presentation at the next board of governors meeting.

Wood's company, the W. C. Wood Co., is listed by the department of industry, trade and commerce as one which has received contracts "for equipment destined for the United States department of defence" covering the period of 1966-71.

An official U.S. publication, The Domestic Market Survey Intelligence Report, shows the firm of W. C. Wood receiving $345,160 in Pentagon contracts for 1972.

The Canadian Public Accounts study shows Wood received $35,019 in government subsidies for his company in 1970-71 to produce war materials for export to the U.S.

Wood's war production consisted of canteen cups, ruck-sack frames and miscellaneous military items but the bulk consisted of booster casings for bombs.

Campus groups spend over half of Project AID grants

By GEORGE HUCZEK

Half of the budgeted allowance of Project AID, a new funding program developed by SAC, has already been spent.

Project AID co-ordinates the distribution of grant money to various different campus and non-campus groups.

A total budgeted allowance of $34,800 has been allotted by SAC to Project AID. The services commission gets $23,000, the education commission $7,000, the communications commission $3,800 and $1,000 goes to the women's commission.

Over $17,000 has already been spent by Project AID since SAC introduced the program in September.

The main expenditure to date has gone to the Campus Legal Assistance Centre ($10,000), and the Faculty of Education Placement Centre ($5,400).

Project AID offers financial assistance to either the university community or the community at large, but priority is given to campus-oriented activities.

The size of the grants given depends mainly on the nature and merits of the projects being considered as well as the number of people who benefit from the projects.

To be eligible for a grant under Project AID, the project must benefit more than just a single faculty or college, in order to ensure a greater involvement within the entire university community.

The communications commission offers grants for campus publications under Project AID, provided the publications adhere to specific guidelines, among which is stipulated a mandatory campus-wide distribution and a high campus news content.

The services and education commissions promote through Project AID various student projects on campus which originate from student groups and campus organizations not directly affiliated with SAC.

Ordinarily grants under Project AID are considered within the jurisdiction of the appropriate commission and then passed on to the SAC general council for approval or rejection.

The SAC executive may, in cases where grants are immediately needed, bypass the commission concerned and bring the matter directly before council.

SAC has decided the deadline for fall grants under Project AID will be Nov. 1.

Besides Project AID, SAC provides grants to Scarborough and Erindale Colleges to equalize services with the main campus.

The external affairs commission also has a budgeted allowance of $9,000 to deal with grants not falling under the jurisdiction of Project AID.

SOME POSSIBLE REASONS WHY YOUR TEACHER MAY BE YOUR TEACHER:

- because his friends are in the department or on the appointment committee;
- because he publishes a lot and thus attracts attention to the department;
- because he has contacts who can get things published;
- because he has contacts in government;
- because he has contacts in industry;
- because he does razzle-dazzle research and thus can attract $$$$$$ in the form of grants, chairs, and consulting fees from industry and/or government;
- because his research can beef-up the flagging efforts of someone in the department;
- because he was "traded" so that someone in the department could get a desired appointment elsewhere;
- because he wouldn't in any way threaten the status quo;
- because he was the lesser of n evils;
- because he was a fixture—he'd been around so long that the appointment was virtually automatic;
- because he came cheaply at a time that the university was cutting expenses;
- because any of the above may have occurred say TWENTY-YEARS AGO!

DO YOU WONDER IF ANYONE EVEN CONSIDERED WHETHER OR NOT HE WAS AN EFFECTIVE TEACHER?

Paper's budget cut

By MICHAEL HIGGINS

The Student Administrative Government of Erindale (SAGE) voted last Wednesday to immediately cut $2,700 from this year's budget of the Erindale College newspaper, Medium II.

The cut will be subtracted from the newspaper's $9,000 annual budget.

SAGE will trim Medium II's budget by ending salaries for seven of the 13 paid staff members.

SAGE finance commissioner Mike Rumac defended the cut, saying, "We would have been operating on a $2,200 budget deficit if we hadn't made cuts in the overall budget. The only other alternative was to raise student fees."

But both Medium II editor Gregg-Michael Troy and associate editor Harrie Vredenburg said the budget cut resulted from SAGE "playing politics".

"We had $30,000 and the combined proposals by various clubs alone came to over that amount," said Rumac.

"This doesn't even include the budget for the newspaper, the radio station, services such as the pub and the executive operating budget for the year," he said.

Rumac also thought too many staff "were treating it as a part-time job" rather than as an extra-curricular activity.

Troy saw the cut as a retaliatory measure by SAGE because of Medium II's editorial criticism of certain student government operations such as the elections and the school pub.

Troy said SAGE didn't want a strong independent campus newspaper and therefore made the cuts.

Officials may strike

By LAWRENCE CLARKE
An intramural football official has resigned and intramural referees have threatened to boycott future games involving Meds this year after the men's intramural sports committee suspended a player for only two games for grabbing a game official.

The committee voted 14-2 Monday night to suspend a Meds player for two games and place him on probation for the rest of the year after he allegedly grabbed and threatened game official David Malach during an Oct. 10 game between Meds and Trinity.

Yesterday, in a letter of resignation addressed to interfac football referee-in-chief Dave Stuart, Malach said the committee's decision was "completely inadequate."

"I enjoy refereeing," said Malach, "but the loss of a new sweater (torn during the altercation) and the lack of protection given by the intramural sports committee has forced me to resign."

Stuart, who was at the meeting, conferred with intramural sports director David Copp yesterday morning. Stuart told Copp his officials may boycott future football games involving Meds because of the "relatively lenient" punishment. Copp, who acts as secretary of the all-student committee, told The Varsity that the committee members had made their decision and he wouldn't interfere with it.

In a separate disciplinary matter, the committee voted 13-2 to uphold the game referees' report that Erindale had cleared the bench first in a lacrosse game between them and PHE.

The lacrosse game had been called because both teams had cleared the benches.

The two points were awarded to PHE and the players involved were placed on probation.

The committee also refused to overturn a decision by the four-man football review board concerning a game between Vic and Engineering.

Don Warner, president of Victoria College Athletic Union (VCAU), had requested the committee reverse the review board's decision that a mechanical error in judgement by a football referee required part of the game be replayed.

At the conclusion of tomorrow's football game between Vic and Engineering, another quarter will be played to decide the game that was protested.

The game will start at the time and with the same conditions as when the error in judgement occurred.

Trin A and Med clashed today in soccer. The game was a 2-2 tie. Trin still unbeaten

Death knell sounds for boxing

By DAVE STUART
By edict of the Athletic Directorate boxing is dead at U of T. The main problem is again one of facilities at Hart House. The boxing ring has traditionally been located in the weight training room. However, because of the space taken up by the ring the weight equipment is not usable.

The Directorate has decided that the ring will not be erected in Hart House and made an attempt to find other facilities on campus with no luck.

A couple of locations off-campus were found but the boxing coach did not really want to leave the campus.

Using one of the dressing rooms at the stadium after the football season is over was another possibility but was discounted because of the likelihood of injuries.

Boxing has become mostly a recreation at Toronto over the last couple of years since there is no such thing as intercollegiate competition.

Perhaps the Directorate should consider putting boxing into the realm of intramural jurisdiction.

The touch football league has been busy over the last week with 11 games scheduled.

On Oct. 18, the Gridiron Grads blanked the Bucks 20-0. The Take Outs won their game quickly as the Mad Capers defaulted.

Patterson's Patsies were seduced 32-12 by the Hookers while the Grunts groaned to defeat 24-6 to Civil Skulers.

The Left Overs didn't leave any Wallburgers, beating them 7-0. The briefs were short 18-13 to FMS Goldens.

On Oct. 21, the Gridiron Grads continued their winning ways downing the Gustaff Maulers 28-0.

Mike's Meateaters left their teeth in and were ruled a 28-13 loss to the Leftovers for biting.

Cold weather kept the Newdists in fine form as they blasted Ensign 25-0. The Bucks defaulted to the Slackers while the Nummies, a replacement team, defaulted to the Argos.

In division II soccer action, UC downed PHE 2-1, while Jr. Eng. edged SGS 2-1 and Vic 3-2. In Division III, Knox skunked For 2-0 and Trin B beat Wycliffe 3-2.

In volleyball, SGS II defeated Wycliffe 15-5, 15-4; Dents B beat Med B 6-15, 16-14, 15-9 while For B blanked Vic III 15-0, 15-0.

Intercampus basketball starts schedule

By MRS. PARKER
A new league involving the campuses at Scarborough, Erindale, and St. George have held the first women's basketball round robin staged at the Benson Building last Wednesday.

Scarborough has shown itself to be the team to beat as they came up with two straight wins in the tournament.

The easterners downed Erindale 23-15 and St. George A 26-18.

In other games, St. George A edged St. George B 21-19 and Erindale squeaked by St. George B 24-23.

There will also be volleyball and badminton tournaments later in the year.

As reported earlier the intercampus league is intended to provide women with competition better than that found in interfac.

Blues could win Vanier Cup in Intercollegiate Football's 100th year

In October 1874, the McGill Rugby Football Club played host to the Harvard University team from Cambridge, Massachusetts and from that first university football game in this country and for the next fifty years college football was to reign supreme in Canada.

During the 1880's, the big three—McGill, Queen's and Toronto—began to compete on an annual basis with each other and later on in that decade were joined by the Royal Military College and the Ontario Agricultural College. During the 1890's Ottawa College, Queen's and the University of Toronto won the Canadian Rugby Union Championship five of the first six years the Dominion Final was played.

The 1898 season opened with the universities competing under the banner of the newly-formed Canadian Intercollegiate Rugby Football Union and the Yates Cup, the oldest annually awarded football trophy in Canada, was donated for competition.

In 1900, the Intercollegiate Union withdrew from the Canadian Rugby Union but returned in 1905 and when Lord Grey put up his $50,000 trophy for annual competition in 1909, it was to become the property of the universities for seven of the next nine years the cup was awarded.

The University of Toronto won the first three—1909, 1910, and 1911. From most accounts the McGill teams of 1912, 1913 and 1919, with the late great Frank "Shag" Shaughnessy, CFL and Baseball Hall of Famer, would undoubtedly have taken home the trophy had they decided to play the final game.

In 1920 it was the University of Toronto again winning the top award and then it was the turn of the tricolour of Queen's under the leadership of the late Billy Hughes.

With Frank "Pep" Leadley and the late Harry Batstone, the Golden Gaels ran a consecutive string of 26 victories from 1922 to 1925 including three consecutive Grey Cups in 1922, 1923 and 1924.

1924 marked the last time a university team was to win the Grey Cup and the Intercollegiate Union formally withdrew from Grey Cup competition in 1934.

The rapid development of commercial sport did not, however, sound the demise of college ball but rather directed the intercollegiate people to concentrate on internal growth.

In 1927 the Western Intercollegiate Rugby Football Union was formed comprising of the Universities of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and the "Hardy Cup" was put up for competition.

The league, however, was never strictly an intercollegiate one until 1967. Since the 1927 date, some university teams had competed against senior and professional teams within their respective provinces while others aligned themselves with leagues south of the border because of the economics of travel.

In 1967, with the initiation of the CIAU National Championship series, the University of Calgary joined the four charter members of the Union to form the Western Intercollegiate Football League.

From a shaky start and due primarily to the constant prodding and pushing of Dean Maury Van Vliet through the years, the WIFL has finished strong to participate in six and win four national championships since 1967.

In 1929, the University of Western Ontario joined Queen's, Toronto and McGill to form the Senior Intercollegiate Football League and in 1934 the Intermediate Intercollegiate Football Union was formed to provide competition for those other schools such as Ottawa, Royal Military College, Bishop's and Loyola who were not eligible for membership in the Senior League.

As the number of teams continued to develop in Central Canada, there appeared a succession of leagues and conferences until the present day where eleven teams from Ontario and three from Quebec have combined to form one league with two geographic divisions of seven teams each.

During the 40's and 50's, the names of Metras and Tindall were synonymous with intercollegiate football. Metras, the coach at Western, retired in 1969 after thirty years with a career record of 106-76-11, while Tindall—tied with Metras for games won—is enjoying his 28th season at Queen's with a 106-74-2 record.

In addition to the coaches, the legendary Joe Krol, Russ Jackson and Ron Stewart, were all products of that era. Krol later became a one-man wrecking crew for the Argonauts, while Jackson and Stewart teamed up to lead the powerful Ottawa Rough Rider teams of the '60s.

St. Mary's at Dalhousie in September of 1947 marked the inaugural of Atlantic Intercollegiate Football but it was not until 1965 that the Blueeons Intercollegiate Football Conference was formed.

More than any other single person, Don Loney at St. Francis Xavier University who, from 1957 to 1973, garnered ten Atlantic university crowns and a national championship was primarily responsible for the growth and development of intercollegiate football in the Maritimes.

In this Centennial Year, 26 teams in four divisions coast-to-coast will be competing for the Vanier Cup, emblematic of Canadian Intercollegiate Football supremacy.

Hockey Blues don't like McDonalds Hamburgers

By DAVE STUART
Aside from a bone-jarring body check laid on by Blues' captain Warren Anderson in the third period, the Blues won a lacklustre match against the Whitby MacDonalds 5-1.
All of Blues' goals came in the first two periods; one on a power play opportunity.
Toronto led 2-0 after the opening period on goals by Bill Hews and Bill Fifield.
Varsity added three more goals in the second period from the sticks of Ruhnke (power play at 0:18) and rookies Rocci Pagnello and Howie Hampton.
Whitby finally cracked the scoreboard in the third as Bodnar tipped a pass over the sprawling body of Bob Oss.

Rookie Dave Hulme played in the Varsity net for the first half of the game and maintained shutout hockey during his tenure. His quickness in goal and his willingness to challenge shooters were impressive. He will, no doubt, be considered for seasonal duties.
An old Varsity hand, Bruce Durno, shared the goaler duties with Gibson for the MacDonalds. Durno was greeted by his Alma Mater with three goals.
Only three penalties were meted out, two to Whitby and one to Varsity.

Ladies Blues break four records

By JANET FLETCHER
Although conditions at McMaster last Saturday were far from perfect for track and field, eight OWIAA records were broken — four of them by U of T athletes.
U of T again was represented by only a very small group of girls, but nonetheless, dominated the middle and long distance events. The 4 x 400m relay team of Debbie Mitchell, Caroline Hebblethwaite, Geri Ashdown and Lesley Evans, smashed its own record of the previous year by 11.2 secs. to win the event in the impressive time of 4:03.2.
In the 800m both Evans and Ashdown bettered the old record of 2:17.9, Evans winning the event and Ashdown placing third. Her performance was particularly impressive in that the race was only her second run over that distance.
The 1500m was also dominated by U of T runners. Both Mitchell and Evans broke the record that Evans set at Waterloo two weeks ago, with Debbie finishing first and Lesley second. Sally Beach also ran strongly in this race to finish fifth. Her performance indicated that she is well on the way to recovery after her leg injury.

The fourth record to fall to Varsity was in the high jump. This event was won by Louise Walker with a leap of 5ft. 6in., which broke the previous record by 3 inches.
Other U of T athletes to reach the finals in their events were Caroline Hebblethwaite in the 400m and Hazel Lynn in both the 100 and 200m.

Results

Women's archery team win 9th consecutive outdoor championship

By BERNADETTE GLICNER
All those early morning practices, many of which started before sunrise and while the fields were still covered with frost paid off this weekend at the Ontario Women's Outdoor Archery Finals held at Scarborough College.
The first day of shooting consisted of five ends at 45, 35 and 25 meters.
While braving the winds and record-breaking low temperatures the team from U of T managed to gain a lead of 150 points by the end of the first day.
Due to temperatures in the 20's, the tournament had to be moved indoors on the second day.
The warmer surroundings and shorter distances of 30, 25 and 20 meters seemed to be favored by the Varsity team, who opened their lead by another 431 points, giving them a total of 6,298 points, and the 9th consecutive outdoor championship.

Guelph ended in second place with 5,717 points, Western was third with a score of 5,267 and Queen's ended up fourth with 4,926.
Linda Kazienko from Guelph scored two perfect ends and placed first in the individual standings with 1,612 points out of a possible 1,800.
Kathryn Ann Corcoran, from U of T, shooting one perfect end placed second with 1,581 points and Pat Wakefield, U of T, also shot one perfect end to place third with a score of 1,545.
A great deal of the success of Toronto's team can be attributed to the excellent coaching of Mrs. Ellen Alston.

Amazons from Varsity are terrifying to behold when holding a bow and arrow.

Council agrees on new composition

In a frequently tense debate, the Governing Council agreed last night on a recommendation to the provincial government regarding the council's size and composition.

By a vote of 21-19, the council approved a model calling for 13 faculty and 11 students, over a model comprising 14 faculty and 10 students.

The approved model recommends a 57-member council with the following membership:

- the president
- the chancellor
- 16 government appointees
- 10 alumni
- 13 teaching staff
- 11 students
- 3 administrative staff
- 2 presidential appointees

The council is required by the end of this month to submit a recommendation to the government. Yesterday's decision will go straight to colleges and universities minister James Auld.

The Governing Council, constituted in 1971, was required to reassess its size and composition no later than this spring; however, it voted last June to delay the debate until this fall.

A special meeting held last week initiated the review of the act and agreed upon several principles, including no student faculty parity, and roughly equal representation between internal and external members.

Student organizations had waged a persistent campaign for parity with faculty members. After last week's meeting, SAC president Seymour Kanowitch announced the decision would be appealed to the provincial government.

Following last Thursday's meeting, the executive committee met Monday to act upon the recommendations, and proposed a model identical to the one adopted yesterday.

Normally, the recommendations of the executive committee comprises the agenda of the full council. However, at yesterday's meeting, members were confronted with a proposal to consider several alternative models for the composition of the council.

Calling the move a "blatant attempt to subvert the will of council," student governor Steve Moses denounced the move as "heavy backroom politicking of a pretty base kind."

In all, eight models were presented to the council, which then voted sequentially, dropping one model from each ballot.

After five ballots, two models remained: the favored model, and one calling for 14 faculty and 10 student members.

The enlarged faculty model had been proposed by faculty members William Dunphy and Martin Friedland, who had pressed for its adoption at the executive committee.

Throughout the elimination of alternatives, faculty members consistently voted for the Dunphy-

The Varsity — Steve Malpas

Student strategists huddle before the deciding vote on the composition of Governing Council.

Friedland model with maximum faculty and minimum student representation.

By doing so, they slowly forced council members into a clear choice: either vote for the model most favorable to students, or the model most favorable to faculty.

Student supporters were visibly relieved after the close vote passed, but angered by the attempt to preserve the faculty position.

After deciding on 11 student members, the council then turned to the division of student constituencies.

By a large majority, the council proposed seating five undergraduates, three part-time students, and three graduate students on council, defeating an alternative proposal against specifying constituencies.

Proposal for parity tenure committees defeated

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

The Governing Council's academic affairs committee voted Wednesday to defeat a proposal calling for parity between students and teaching and administrative representatives on tenure committees.

The proposal, submitted by SAC university commissioner Gord Barnes, was supported only by student committee members Shirley French, Peter Jarrett and Barnes. Students have been seeking parity on tenure committees to ensure equal consideration is given to teaching ability as well as research performance.

The Barnes proposal called for six faculty members and administrators and six students, as well as a non-voting chairperson, to comprise tenure committees.

Ten affirmative votes would be required to grant tenure, according to the proposal.

The committee also refused to hear an unscheduled proposal from student governor Peter Jarrett.

Jarrett asked if the committee to consider voting solely on the principle of student representation, instead of discussing "numbers."

History professor Desmond Morton and philosophy professor Bill Dunphy objected to Jarrett's request.

Dunphy said he failed to see the purpose of such a vote. A vote on principle failed to distinguish whether a dissenting opinion wanted "no student input" or student input with no vote, Dunphy said.

Dunphy has proposed in a brief before the committee tenure committees remain without student representation, but that an "independent observer" be included on the committees.

The observer, Dunphy argues, would ensure adequate evidence had been provided and that it had been "fully and fairly considered."

Chairman John Dove said he had had no advance notice of Jarrett's proposal although people had been given adequate chance to introduce new motions before the meeting.

A subsequent vote to consider introduction of Jarrett's proposal, requiring a two-thirds majority, failed by a 9-8 count.

Jarrett later described the move as "slimy." "I was very disappointed that some members decided to support the chairman's position," Jarrett said.

The Graduate Students' Union (GSU) presented a brief to the committee recommending inclusion of one graduate and one undergraduate student, or some combination of two students.

It also recommended a "non-voting, non-faculty, non-student observer" be included to ensure non-partisan scrutiny.

Morton pointed to the possibility of a conflict of interest arising if graduate students were named to sit on tenure committees.

He said if a graduate student were judging a candidate in his own field, he or she might possibly have an interest in the position.

It was also conceivable that students might be placed in the position of considering their teacher or thesis advisor, he said.

GSU vice-president Vahan Benglian said he would expect students to declare a conflict of interest in a case where they were considering such a candidate.

Both Benglian and Jarrett pointed out that present members of tenure committees have as much conflict-of-interest through "intra-faculty squabbles" as a graduate student might encounter.

Voting on proposals submitted by Morton and engineering professor J. M. Ham was delayed until the committee meeting next Thursday.

SDS appeal decision deferred

The Governing Council last night deferred a decision on how to deal with the appeal of Tony Leah and Bill Schabas, two students convicted last year of obstructing the visit of American urbanologist Edward Banfield.

The council ran out of time to act on a recommendation by the executive committee on the manner of hearing the appeal.

The executive had recommended a committee be struck of the entire executive, save president John Evans (who testified at the trial), and Martin Friedland (who, as dean of law, is the employer of the advisor to the executive, J. B. Dunlop).

The committee would be empowered to determine its own procedures, and to report its decisions for information only.

The executive proposed it hear the appeal on the subject of the "punishment awarded", which would not include the verdict delivered.

Leah and Schabas want to appeal both the verdict and the punishment, on the grounds that the verdict did not properly consider the issue involved—racism; and that the punishment was unnecessarily harsh.

Leah and Schabas accused Banfield of being a racist, and claimed they were acting in the best interests of the university by preventing him from speaking. Accordingly, they believe the verdict was wrongly delivered.

Several members of the Governing Council last night indicated they will urge the executive to take into account the legitimacy of the verdict.

In the only move taken on the appeal, the council voted down a proposal from student member Peter Jarrett that Vernon Copeland, the newly elected graduate representative, be allowed to sit on the appeal committee.

Graduate students are not presently represented on the executive committee, and, as Jarrett pointed out, Leah and Schabas were both graduate students at the time.

Leah and Schabas were tried by the Caput, an all-administration disciplinary tribunal which has been roundly condemned by the university as unrepresentative.

The university this January will reconsider the question of non-academic discipline, and the formation of a new tribunal to replace the Caput. Attempts to set up a new system last spring failed after students expressed strong opposition to the harsh nature of disciplinary measures proposed.

Hearings to dismiss tenured Western professor continue

LONDON (CUP) — Tenured psychology professor Larry Chamberlain, testifying at the second day of dismissal hearings against him last Thursday, said he was left "groping in a fog" when the chairman of the psychology department asked him to resign.

Chamberlain, an assistant psychology professor at the University of Western Ontario, received tenure in 1970, but now faces dismissal by the administration because his work has been deemed unsatisfactory.

The case, the first of its kind in Canada, is being judged by a three-man committee chosen by both the administration and Chamberlain.

Chamberlain faces dismissal by the committee which was drawn up after he refused repeated psychology and administration requests that he tender his resignation.

Chamberlain said there was no specific grounds given as to why he was asked to resign and when requested no clarification was given.

As early as September 1972 W. J. McClelland, chairman of the department, told Chamberlain if he didn't improve, the department wouldn't have a place for him.

Chamberlain said McClelland told him the department committee had unanimously voted to ask for his resignation when Chamberlain returned from a three-month injury leave.

"I was flabbergasted," said Chamberlain. "McClelland told me of the departmental decision and how the faculty association, the dean, and the vice-president academic had reviewed his file and concurred."

Charged with poor teaching and below standard research, Chamberlain said he had been working on two textbooks which are about a year from completion.

Previous testimonies by members of the faculty of psychology said there was no evidence of ongoing research.

McClelland checked with room reservations and found that the smaller room had not been reserved.

Chamberlain said he made every effort to contact students to apologize for his error and arranged for alternate times for students to write the tests.

Earlier in the hearings, witnesses told the committee Chamberlain showed little interest in helping graduate students or acting as an advisor.

Chamberlain said his lack of interest in taking on the job of chief advisor to graduate students was because the only area he felt competent in was perception and that was one of the least popular areas of psychology.

"The area I am interested in involves intricate and sophisticated apparatus which requires some expertise," he said. "I look for people who have a background in physics, math and electricity."

Chamberlain said in the early years he didn't feel he could do a good job because he was still learning about psychology.

New internal affairs vice-president named

Frank Iacobucci, assistant dean of the Faculty of Law, will take over Jill Conway's position as vice-president of university internal affairs committee in July, U of T president John Evans announced yesterday.

Iacobucci, who specializes in corporate law, said last night, he will likely concentrate on the same matters which Conway dealt with in her three-year term as internal affairs vice-president.

The most contentious issue before the internal affairs committee—which sets policy on internal issues—last year was the proposed Code of Behavior, against which students mounted a protest campaign. Iacobucci said he hopes the non-academic section of the code will be passed in January, before he takes over office.

Iacobucci said he shares Conway's interest in the "quality of life and environment" of the campus.

He said a high priority of his will likely be the relationship of the university to its surrounding community.

"The university is a part of the community, and there's nothing more important than its relationship to it," Iacobucci said.

Iacobucci is a former executive member of the U of T Faculty association, often considered a conservative body on campus.

He was chairman of the association's grievances committee two years ago, involved mainly in tenure disputes and helping colleagues who had been denied tenure.

As for student representation on university tenure committees, Iacobucci said he sees "some problems with it," but added, "It's a proposal that should be studied."

The proposal for student representation on tenure committees is currently being studied by Governing Council's academic affairs committee, with students strongly pushing for representation.

Iacobucci is presently a presidential appointee on the university's athletic directorate.

Iacobucci will continue teaching one course at the law faculty during his two-year term as internal vice-president, which could be extended another year.

However, Iacobucci said: "I don't want to stay at the job too long. I want to go back to teaching and research."

Iacobucci will administer such diverse areas as residences, the book store, housing, health, athletics, parking, day care, allocation of rooms for meetings and theatres for performances, relations with campus groups, the faculty club, the International Student Centre and campus security also fall within internal affair's scope.

Iacobucci was born and raised in Vancouver and received his Bachelor of Commerce degree and Bachelor of Laws at the University of British Columbia.

He studied for two years at Cambridge University in England where he got another Bachelor of Laws degree and a diploma in international law.

Before coming to the U of T in 1967 he worked for three years in New York City in a law firm headed by, among others, Thomas Dewey, unsuccessful Republican presidential candidate defeated in the 1948 U.S. elections by Harry S. Truman.

Iacobucci noted last night that although he worked in the same firm as Dewey, "I didn't go out to lunch with him regularly."

MOVED ALL OVER

But Chamberlain told the committee he had been moved all over campus, and none of the labs were suitable.

When he finally did get a suitable lab, the department chairman

Friday briefs

Toronto trustee Vern Copeland was elected as graduate student representative on the Governing Council in results announced this week.

Copeland won with 222 votes compared to 154 for Katherine Narozanski and 133 for Bob Spencer.

The defeat for Spencer is only the latest in a string for the veteran campus politician who was U of T SAC president in 1971-72. He is now running for trustee in the Ward Six board of education race, a post he sought unsuccessfully in 1972.

A small number of graduate students decided Monday and Tuesday in favour of joining the Ontario Federation of Students.

The vote was 173 for and 37 opposed with three spoils ballots. The per student levy for OFS will be $1.50.

The GSU will be the first graduate student association to join OFS, which already represents over 110,000 students in most Ontario universities.

OFS is presently facing referendums on a number of campuses on whether they will accept the increases in the levy from 40 cents to $1.50. U of T undergrads passed the increase last spring.

Jerry Bruck's acclaimed documentary, I. F. Stone's Weekly, will have its North American TV premier on the CBC network 10 pm this Sunday evening.

The award-winning portrait of the fiercely independent American investigative journalist, I. F. Stone, has drawn rave reviews in such major publications as Time, Newsweek, Playboy, The Washington Post and The New York Times following theatrical showings in the U.S.

The hour-long film profiles the Washington-based investigative reporter, noted for his incisive reportage and uncanny ability to uncover and expose political skeletons secreted in Capitol Hill closets.

Don't forget our annual weekly staff meeting today at 1 p.m. which will discuss such hard-hitting topics as "The meaning of real life in the contemporary world," and "Turtles: what does the future hold?" You don't have to be from Etobicoke to come, but it helps.

Decision on Islands may rest with ballots

It is likely Toronto's city council will accept Toronto Islands residents' current proposal to put the future of their community on the December municipal election ballot, according to an island residents spokesman.

William Metcalfe, an executive member of the Toronto Island Residents Association, feels the "very enthusiastic reaction" given to the request at city council's executive meeting Wednesday was an indication of how council would vote on the proposal.

Although the executive voted unanimously to put a question on ballot forms regarding support to protect island residents' homes, it recognized necessity of choosing a legally suitable question.

Metcalfe asked the executive to put the question to the voters: "Are you in favor of Metro evicting the residents of the Toronto Islands?"

But, Metcalfe noted later, he brought three alternatives to the executive merely as "idea-starters."

"Once we get a legally suitable question, we will go to the boroughs to seek their permission to put the question to borough voters," Metcalfe said.

Metcalfe said he was "almost positive" city council will favor placing some such question on the ballot for the Dec. 2 election. "Everyone there is in favor of retention of the island community," he added.

However, he noted, Toronto holds only 12 of the 32 seats on Metro Council, which made the decision to evict the island residents. The other 20 seats are held by boroughs.

This is one of the few exciting issues in a dull election," Metcalfe said. "Quite a few aldermen have put the issue of island residents in their platform."

He cited Anne Johnston, Elizabeth Eayrs, Colin Vaughan and Art Eggleton.

Metcalfe said the Toronto Island Residents Association will not field candidates in the upcoming municipal elections. "We're rather busy just trying to keep afloat."

Faculty mouths ask for bread

The following is an edited version of remarks in the University of Toronto Faculty Association newsletter, October 1974 by UTFA's salary and benefit's committee. The committee presents its case for a 25 per cent faculty salary increase.

Between July, 1971 and July, 1974, the consumer price index increased by over 25 per cent compared with an increase in University of Toronto faculty salaries of only about 15 per cent (excluding the career advancement component but including the $200 flat increase of last summer). Moreover, on any realistic projection of the future trend of the cost of living, the real salary decline will be even more drastic before the next overall salary adjustment is scheduled to come into effect.

The overriding concern of the Faculty Association at this time is to increase faculty salaries to a level which will at least restore 1971 purchasing power. We believe that the Governing Council will share our concern, since the University itself is bound to suffer if adequate living standards are not maintained for its faculty. Our salary proposals are based on the assumption that the University's budget is fixed for the current financial year, and it will be noted that the proposals are subject to a proviso if the Province should provide an interim adjustment of the University's income.

An important reason for the erosion of the purchasing power of faculty salaries has been the long interval which has customarily elapsed between decisions to increase salaries and the effective dates of the increases. Therefore, we propose that the 1975-76 increase should come into effect on May 1, 1975 (the beginning of the University's financial year) rather than July 1, and that, in the determination of the size of the increase, account should be taken of the probable increase in the cost of living between now and May. The consumer price index is currently increasing at a rate of about 12 per cent a year, and there is no reason to expect a materially slower rate of increase in the next few months.

Thus, it can be expected that the C.P.I. will reach at least 185.0 by May, 1975—38 per cent higher than in July, 1971. An increase of 20 per cent in current salary levels is required to produce a cumulative salary increase of 38 per cent over July, 1971. This will not compensate for the loss in purchasing power which has already occurred since July 1971 and which will continue at an accelerating rate until next May. An added increase of 5 per cent (for a total of 25 per cent) would be modest compensation for that loss.

Further, since there is no reason to believe that inflation will abate substantially in 1975-76, faculty salaries should be subject to further upward adjustment on the basis of the cost of living, effective October 1, 1975.

Beyond these adjustments, it will of course also be necessary to continue the career advancement or progress-through-the-ranks formula, which was adopted two years ago on a three-year trial basis and has been in effect for two years. That formula does not in any way compensate for increases in living costs but instead is designed exclusively to provide recognition of the growing experience and responsibilities of individual faculty members. We note with concern that histograms showing detailed application of the formula for 1974-75 have not yet been supplied to the Salary and Benefits Committee and we trust that this oversight will be remedied immediately.

In summary, our salary proposals for 1975-76 are as follows:

1. That the effective date of the 1975-76 salary schedule be May 1, 1975;
2. That salaries be increased across the board from that date by 25 per cent (20 percentage points being to restore the purchasing power of salaries to the level of July, 1971, and 5 points being to compensate in part for reduced purchasing power between July, 1971 and May, 1975);
3. That salaries be increased across the board effective October 1, 1975, by the ratio of the C.P.I. for September to that for April, 1975;
4. That the career advancement programme be continued during 1975-76, with the formula being applied in the usual way to the salaries coming into effect on May 1. We emphasize that these proposals are not designed as a bargaining, ploy in which room is deliberately left for concessions. On the contrary, we believe that a strong case can be made for an increase beyond that needed merely to restore purchasing power to the 1971 level. We recognize, however, that the University is also suffering a financial squeeze. For that reason we have confirmed our salary proposals to the rock-bottom minimum which can conceivably be regarded as fair and reasonable in the present inflation.

We have information to the effect that the Province is seriously considering an interim increase in University grants to compensate for unexpectedly rapid cost inflation, and this increase may be in the order of 4 per cent on B.I.U. value. If such an increase materializes, we propose that faculty salaries be increased effective on the same day as the increase in grants—by 5 per cent if the B.I.U. increase is 4.5 per cent, and by a corresponding percentage for a different B.I.U. increase. This would naturally require reformulation of our proposals for 1975-76, but we would aim at the same overall effect as is envisaged in our current proposals.

Group has horse-sense

"It is not the 'Sport of Kings' " Prince Philip replied. "If you can afford a motor car you can afford a horse, though one takes a little more of your time than the other."

So too, AIESEC is not the 'Sport' of the privileged few on campus but available to all who are willing to give a 'little more time'.

In this unique, a-political, non-religious, non-profit organization, many students have found a way to highlight their years at university. Through an international exchange of work for economic and commerce students with over forty-five countries, a challenging, practical, and meaningful experience is offered. But more than this, students in other disciplines can also partake in the seminars, conferences, and continually expanding summer and winter reception programs.

Having originated in Europe (Association Internationale des Etudiants en Sciences Economiques et Commerciales) this organization now has local committees in over three hundred universities across the world. Trainees from University of Toronto have worked in countries ranging from France, Germany and Yugoslavia, to South Africa, Australia and the Philippines. Summer traineeships, which are the most popular, prompt even in so short a time a profitable intermingling of cultural, commercial, and philosophical ideas, among students of varying nationalities. Financial Intermediaries, Accounting Firms, and Governmental Agencies just to mention a few, offer students temporary positions in research, marketing accounting and public relations depending upon their preferences and suitability. In creating this vital liaison between businessmen and students of many countries, AIESEC helps bridge the gap between the theory taught in university and the realities of the working world.

This year AIESEC has developed an extensive program not only from the business and educational aspects but also from the social standpoint. As some Winter Trainees come to Toronto for longer period traineeships in the next few months from various nations, we will have an excellent chance to learn more about other peoples, and become even more aware of ourselves and our own country, Canada.

Look into AIESEC for yourself, and take advantage of this stimulating and advantageous opportunity.

Dislikes racism in med schools

The remarks by Canadian Medical Association president Bette Stephenson slandering Chinese medical students at U of T have met with widespread condemnation. Her allegation that Chinese students don't have as "broad" an outlook as Canadians and that "foreign-born" students were taking places away from "native-born" students and shouldn't have the taxpayers' money lavished on them were quickly rejected as racist by a great many people, including most medical students. What many people may not realize is the depth and seriousness of the problem. Bette Stephenson is not an isolated bigot but the top of a menacing iceberg.

In February 1974 a meeting of federal and provincial health ministers gave approval in principle to "giving priority to Canadian medical students and Canadian graduates... over foreign doctors" (Globe & Mail Feb. 15 '74). They said quotas would likely be set. This was justified with the Mad Hatter logic of Marc Lalonde (Federal Health Minister) who said having more doctors would lead to increased fees!

Bette Stephenson's remarks are just an extension of this policy of trying to limit the number of doctors (and the number of medical students) in order to maintain high doctors' salaries. When people complain about not getting into medical schools, Chinese students are made the scapegoat. This racism hurts all students who don't get into medical schools, and all patients who suffer from inadequate health care.

This week two ominous signs appeared in the press that Stephenson's racism finds receptive ears amongst people in powerful positions. The Ontario Medical Association president, Dr. Mador, was quoted in the Globe & Mail (Oct. 21) as saying that "students born and educated in Ontario should have first chance at the few prized seats in the five medical schools" in Ontario. Ontario Health Minister Frank Miller is quoted in the same article as advocating a "Canadian-first policies for admissions to Ontario medical schools" and a "clamp down on the number of foreign-trained doctors being registered in Ontario." The article cites a "ministry spokesman" as confirming the "problem" of the number of Chinese students in the U of T medical school.

This trend is especially frightening because it has already gone beyond an attack on 'foreign' students and doctors to a blatantly racist attack on the "foreign-born."

President Evans refused to respond to Stephenson's remarks as not directly relevant to the U of T, but now a member of the U of T medical faculty has publicly supported them. Dr. L. M. Cathcart (Dept. of Family and Community Medicine) in a letter to the Star (Oct. 21) said, "The faculty of medicine admissions committee should look again very carefully at their policies, and take heed of Dr. Stephenson's expressed concerns."

This barely veiled threat to exclude Chinese and other "foreign-born" students is one that has to be treated very seriously in light of the apparently co-ordinated efforts of the federal and provincial governments, the Canadian Medical Association, the Ontario Medical Association and some U of T medical faculty members to promote racism against "foreign-born" doctors and students.

Incensed prof leaps into Bay

Christian Bay's argument for parity has the merit of saying something new on the subject and is worth pondering. Since it is also an insulting argument, I think it sheds a different light on the discussion than its author intended.

If I understand him correctly, Professor Bay's case boils down to four propositions:

1. Faculty are generally more expert than students.
2. Students are generally more moral than faculty.
3. Universities must be institutions devoted to the teaching of both expertise and morality.
4. Given the above, faculty-student parity is the best form of university government.

Even if one could accept the first three propositions, the fourth would not follow, at least by most people's logic.

Then, should his conception of the university prevail, this definition and not membership in some "estate" ought to help us set criteria for membership on governing bodies (as well as hiring and tenure committees). Maybe there should be a moral test. Professor Bay implies that students will get for higher marks in this test than their professors.

In this case, parity would be unfair to students, who would have the right to demand a much heavier representation than their moral inferiors.

If some of this seems unpalatable, I would suggest an alternative approach: to respect a wide variety of authentic moral positions, without presuming to make judgements about which groups are more moral than others, and to get on with the search for truths with which people can find their own morality (or choose not to do so) as best they can.

Opera buff thanks God

If Serge Schardt (puns on his name invited) can express his 2c worth, then even I should venture forth. I agree with his damnation of Baskin's review of Boris Gudonov, but not with his contemptuous dismissal of the opera. (Did he really hear it?)

Yes, thank God, the costumes were dazzling as were the sets. Yes, Serge, they should be provided for most major operas, but aren't—lack of money usually being the problem (Carmen might be an example.)

However, the singing was as majestic as the settings. (Maybe it was Serge who was too tense.) Blame instead the story, Serge—not the company. From George London to Don Garrard, the vocal renditions have often been magnificent, fine—nay, triumphant—in the face of this deadly boring libretto. I often wonder why it is ever revived.

If it had been given the depth of an epic with five hours or more devoted to the teaching of both expertise and morality. But Boris, compressed as it is, but revived by many opera companies is its own undoing. Perhaps I missed the one brilliant company which may have breathed life into its deadly pace. (Dutchman wasn't any livelier. Does one expect Wagner to be lively?)

I can't blame the Canadian Opera Company, but only their choice of productions. But Carmen, Traviata, Bluebeard's Castle, L'heure Espagnole lived. Boris did not. But then, that opera is not expected to be the Girl of the Golden West, Madame Butterfly or Aida. It can be only a matter of taste: yours vs. others. Puccini would have enlivened the season—but perhaps only in my opinion.

Serge Schardt doesn't enliven even the English language—which certainly needs someone to do battle to keep it going in this country. (Would Serge have been happier if Boris had been performed in French?) If anyone snickered it was only Serge.

Hopefully, he'll go to see the Stones next season and leave the opera lovers in peace, revelling in the joy of attending any performance given by the COC.

Indian Summer - Birth of a Dream

The following is an edited transcript of an interview conducted by Better Read Graphics, with Louis Cameron, leader of the Ojibway Warriors' Society, held on August 8th, 1974, in occupied Anicinabe Park, Kenora, Ontario.

Q: Louis, would you like to describe the living conditions of Indians in the area?

Louis: On this present economy we have no hopes. Our young people cannot stay on the reserves — they're pushed out, really starved out of there.

Young people have to go out of the reservations for dental care, medical care, for education. They have to leave their communities and relatives — their mothers and fathers and grandmothers — their whole tribal structure that survived even after all this oppression.

After hundreds of years of oppression there is a thriving tribal structure of relations. So now they're starved out, they've got to go out. There's nothing on those reservations now and never was anything.

Q: The government says that it would like to integrate Indians into the economy. Do you think this policy is successful? Could it be successful?

Louis: No, not at this point. Now that they've broken up our families and are trying to break up our tribes through this method of putting nothing in one place and something in another.

And this is no way for our people who haven't been exposed to technology in this area or any form of communications

You know we haven't gone through the Industrial Revolution, we're still in the stage where people are still tribal and directly connected to the land and people still have direct connections with each other.

The government is trying to put our people in an economy which separates the individual himself into two separate beings and separates groups, separates society and confuses and divides and controls.

Our people, who are still directly connected to the land and still have direct communications with each other — very horizontal type of social relations — we cannot go into capitalist society and start ripping each other off.

The government does not understand this, particularly that this is not the only economic structure available in the world. The only time that the government, or state, would integrate Indian people into participation is to have them integrate socially.

But you can't participate socially if you can't participate economically. And what the government is trying to do now — to integrate our people socially is impossible. First of all we've got to get economic integration, and then social things would develop.

Q: Do you think that many of the problems of native people, such as a high rate of mental illness, alcoholism, crime and suicide, come from trying to live schizophrenically in two societies?

Louis: Well, a lot of the violence is a result of the oppression from the Department of Indian Affairs' methods of division and control over Indian people. And the businessmen's co-operation with the town police and the federal police is deep down really isolating Indian people.

And what I mean by businessmen is the people who plan the business and really profit from the economy of the area. All these things — with the education system, the churches — are pushing our people.

You know, everybody knows, that people have to be free to express human freedom. They have to laugh, they have to yell and they have to be free to move around. But when you push people into a group like that a lot of that expression turns inside. It's what you call internal aggression.

And as a result of that Indians live a dangerous style of life. They fight each other, they drink a lot. And the tendency to suicide is higher.

This is the crime, the injustice that is being committed by the government and by the businesses around the country. They are taking one segment of society and pushing it violently inwards.

Now we have to live that style of life which is detrimental to human beings. So we, the Ojibway Warriors' Society, believe the only way is to bring that internal aggression outwards.

It must go out, we must break out through the same way we got in. We got in by violence, we must go out by confrontation.

This is what the activities of the Ojibway Warriors' Society is about.

Q: How do you feel that the violence or confrontation tactics you are using differ from the violence of the government?

Louis: First of all, our war is a just war, a people's war. We are fighting oppression, we are fighting profiteers, fighting private interests. The people are justified — they've been killed in the hundreds in the last ten years.

Q: How have they been killed?

Louis: As a result of the force of that whole oppression pushing that expression inwards on the Indian people. As a direct result of that they drown, die of fire — little kids and whole families die of fire, and they freeze, or sometimes they shoot each other — or we shoot each other, I should say.

And when you have nothing on a reserve, the houses they live in are being given by Indian Affairs as a token. These houses are death traps, they burn people.

Sometimes they go home along the railroad tracks because they have no car and no money to buy a train ticket. They're drunk and they've got to walk a long way along the railroad tracks. Sometimes they freeze and sometimes they get run over by a train.

The kind of legislation on the reserves is detrimental to the free government and responsible leadership of and for the people. The people have no laws that determine their own community. This is why our struggle is a just struggle.

Whether you call it violent or not, our struggle is progressive — it fights for our people. It fights for human rights.

We are fighting for brothers and sisters we have lost, for land we have lost. We're fighting in unity with a lot of other people across the country who want the same things.

We want free government, we want self-determination, we want our own land back, our own nations, our own governments.

The treaties have been signed and they've been violated — they just use them for manipulation purposes.

When we signed the treaties, the treaties were a different kind of law — an aboriginal law, a hereditary law. It's a moral law, a sacred law. They don't understand that.

They think that they can take one government, and transfer it to another government, and therefore they can breach the contract because they have a transfer of leadership.

We've had constantly the same people. We've been Indian people.

Knowing this land a long time, and just because they're changing governments, just because they've got borders or different things they're making on the outside, just because maybe they kill each other on the outside, does not determine the birthright of these treaties.

Q: Louis, you were one of the founders of the Ojibway Warriors' Society. Could you talk about why you started the Warriors' Society, what it stands for?

Louis: First of all why we started it. It began by itself; a lot of women and a lot of men started expressing that: "Where else can we go?" "We've tried to look for jobs, we've tried to go to school and get some education."

Our chiefs have said that they've gone to Ottawa a hundred times. You know we've tried a lot of things and still look at our communities — the Indian communities are really sad — the Indian people are fighting each other.

So these people have a lot of frustrations, a lot of anger and they are seeking justice. We looked around and the only organization that we saw that had the kind of feeling that served the people is the feeling that is connected with AIM, the American Indian Movement.

We saw that some Indian people really had been putting their dreams, their hopes, their frustration together — and it's a human movement.

In Kenora, in Northwestern Ontario they put us down if we say that we believe in AIM. So for the purpose of our own people here we titled the movement — which is the same movement as the American Indian Movement across the continent — in this area we just put a title on it of the Ojibway Warriors' Society.

It serves the people, it puts the aims and aspirations of our people together, especially the feeling of being Indian people. It started from this.

Throughout the reservations and in town they're always asking us: "What organization are you from?" You are people who are fighting the pigs all the time in the courts and on the streets at all hours, you come to the reservations and sing pow-wows, talk about freedom. What organization do you represent?"

And finally, our people said we're the Ojibway Warriors' Society. So we called it by that name. Two years ago we did that.

"You can't participate socially if you can't participate economically"

Myself, it doesn't matter what title you put on it, it's the movement that's important. The Indian people are getting it on — they're realizing that they have some dreams.

But a lot of their dreams have been false dreams, given to them by the propaganda of this country. We have to give up all that, because we cannot go that way. We must get it on in our own Indian way.

So that's why we've organized our people into the Ojibway Warriors' Society. But tomorrow we'll call it a different thing — next day we could change the words and still have the same movement.

It's a society of dedicated people getting it on — that's what it is.

Q: Why did the Ojibway Warriors' Society decide on an armed occupation of Anicinabe Park in Kenora?

Louis: This summer we planned a conference where all our people who were interested could come down to a meeting and sit down and talk about the critical problems we have and try to solve them some way.

We planned a four-day conference with ceremonies on behalf of our people and by our own people.

In these four days we called for discussion on the last take-over of Indian Affairs. We talked about Wounded Knee, we talked about March 1965, in Kenora — we talked about these sorts of things, about serving our people and getting it on.

At the same time we looked at the Kenora situation and how we can combat the kind of violence our people face and the reservation conditions. As well there were many other things we channelled into that four day conference.

There was pretty close to a thousand people there for four days. It's the first time we've ever had a conference of this nature in this part of the country. There were a lot of people who discussed things seriously.

And we came to the decision after the fourth day that this just cannot go on another day.

We must do it right now. If we don't do anything now, we'll just be as guilty as the white man, we'll be just as guilty as the government if we don't do anything for our people.

If we're going to do anything, we might as well go all the way and not just monkey around in the courts. Let's not monkey around trying to ask for government funds.

You know, let's do it — let's go all the way. We're fighting for life and death. It's a life and death struggle — we must do it that way, it's the only way we'll be free.

So this came from the suggestions of the people that were here. It was a decision made by the people. The action that we're getting from our people on the reservations now is that they're doing a lot of thinking in a different way.

A new kind of thinking, a new kind of movement is happening on the reservations right now. Everybody is listening to the radio and the T.V.

Q: Do you think you have a lot of support among your people?

Louis: Well, I don't know how to say a lot — but we have a great amount of support from among our people.

Q: Some of your demands are pretty far-reaching, like abolishing the Department of Indian Affairs. What do you think are the chances of winning any or all of your demands?

Louis: Well, first of all, you know that we have a list of demands that you would consider impossible — a list of demands that a lot of people wouldn't comprehend.

We have to have a complete changeover in the Canadian government, we have to have a complete changeover in the Canadian law system and various departments of the federal and provincial governments — there has to be a lot of drastic changes in those establishments. These are the kinds of demands we are putting forward.

If we are going to get killed here, I want to know that I've asked for everything, I want to die right.

I'm not just going to ask for a piece of bread and then get shot without even getting it. When we jeopardize our lives here, and many of our people get shot, it's not impossible for us to ask for the ultimate changes in this country.

Q: What has been the effect of the occupation of the park on the white community?

Louis: I think that they realize that a lot of people out here don't like getting pushed around, that all the stories they've read about Indian people, that all the things they've learned in school and from the white businessmen concerning Indian people is wrong — I think that they have to start looking at things from our side, or forever be our enemies.

De Kooning
Pollock Gallery
until 15 november

There is a kind of inflated jargon associated with bad movie publicity which darkly cautions "this is not for the squeamish". This came to mind in the presence of recent works by Willem de Kooning at the Pollock Gallery.

His work demands an almost total abandonment of distance and reserve; it's as exhilarating and disorientating as a roller coaster ride.

The amazing thing is that it has been controlled, that this orgasmic frenzy of colour, light and movement has somehow been captured within a space.

The comparison of abstract expressionism to a child's finger painting is both useful and misleading.

The desire to seize and "concretize" spontaneous impulse is analogous, but, perhaps paradoxically, this can only be consistently articulated by one possessing skill and discipline.

De Kooning, who at age 70 is now being studied in art history text books, is a master of this controlled expressionism. He should be seen if only to compare the experience of the real thing with the feeble imitations which are by now so familiar.

Although the first thing experienced is the surface of the paint itself there is usually an image, so to speak, "behind the paint". It is often a woman.

In the '50's this 'imago' of a creature, half woman, half demon, began to appear in the artist's work as a result of psychic improvisations. Rather than choosing a subject De Kooning allowed it to emerge from his subconscious as he painted.

Although she is still "savagely egocentric" De Kooning's mood has changed from one of darkness and despair to an exuberant vitality.

One feels of De Kooning that he is tightrope between absurdity and poetry. He never shuns what is ugly or contradictory, celebrates it with violence.

His bronze statue, "The Clamdigger," is an obvious example. Heavily dripping something like mud, this grotesque creature is so compellingly expressive that it possesses a beauty of its own.

Jack Pollock has said that De Kooning is one of the few artists capable of translating abstract expressionism into sculpture. The artist's hand is as visible in the rough sensuous treatment of the sculpted surface as are his brush strokes on the canvas.

What makes his achievement all the more remarkable is that he only started to sculpt five years ago in response to a suggestion by Henry Moore.

De Kooning has described himself as a "slipping glimser" where content in his works is concerned.

But with De Kooning we ask as Yeats asked, "how can we know the dancer from the dance?"

"The lines I draw are not lines per se, they are symbols of the energy which makes things what they are."

Indeed there is nothing heavy or static about John Eaton's drawings. Every stroke is as restless as the darting tongue of a flame.

Around his figures the artist tries to create a highly charged aura which he feels is more important than an actual likeness.

These figures display an extraordinary sensitivity. They are reminiscent of Renaissance sketches both in the delicate force of the line modelling and in the mobility which they confer upon man and nature.

Sometimes the artist carries through his aims and when he does the effect is masterful. The almost electric quality he can suggest with a single line or charcoal haze is incredible.

Varsity reviewers obtain their books in two ways — either as a special commission from the books editor, or out of the rag-bag of unsolicited material which 'just grows'. These languish, and a late review is of no value at all to the publisher.

But just for fun, and because I have always enjoyed my readings in Penguin books, here are three relatively recent titles and my mixed reactions to them.

The history of Penguin Books is an outgrowth of the production of quality mass-market books pioneered by Bohn, Everyman and the Oxford Classics. When Allen Lane began the firm between the wars, it had an immediate impact because of its paperback format. Today it is being crowded out of its old markets by poorer productions of worse books.

How has it reacted?

At first there were Penguin Specials; then Pelicans, Puffins, Peacocks, and Peregrines. More recently special 'Library' series have been formed. The newest creation of Penguin is the Penguin University Library, designed, we are told, in response to 'the recognized need, for paperback (and therefore somewhat cheaper) editions of books which make a significant contribution to scholarship'.

Antoine Adam's Grandeur and Illusion: French Literature and Society, 1600-1715 arrives at our doors well-translated, showing that unlaboured prose style characteristic of the great British scholarship of the earlier twentieth century. It is one of the Penguin University Library issues.

The actual effect of Adam's survey is to provide us with a sort of hat-rack, a framework on which we can deploy our scattered friendships with classic French literature. The interrelationships of theme, technique and personality are drawn with enough finesse to encourage even the lay reader to read the connecting links.

Adam's main push is toward the vital effect the pressures of court and religious factionalism had on the great, or not so great, writers of the period.

But it is in his disquisitions on the life in the Universities, and his discussion of the abstracted stuff of drama and poetry, that Adam is most pertinent. The ideas of conventions which the classical French writers held have an impact on the modern literary theorist Adam does not provide any historical retrospective to introduce the reader to their usefulness, nevertheless, the conventions are there.

Mental Maps, a Pelican original written by two geographers, Peter Gould and Rodney White, who used to be at the U of T, continues the tradition of the popularization of fertile ground in scientific (or in this case, statistical) thought.

Working from well-explained statistical methods, the authors use contour maps of locational preference to promote the understanding of national and regional demographic geography. The diagrams form the basis, and the text merely an amusing annotation, of the study.

At first Mental Maps is of interest as an entertaining reappraisal and distortion of one's own 'solid' mile-to-the-inch Mercatorian reality; but it becomes significant as the authors cunningly show that our opinions are deduced from our "cognitive maps".

Consider: do you see this city as if from a great height? From the distance it seems to be from home in Stoney Creek? As so many TTC stops, as mile-and-a-quarter distant main streets, or as so much of a half-hour walk? And why did you want to live in the Annex, anyway?

In the case of Adam's book, Penguin was wise in obtaining the rights from Weidenfeld and Nicolson. They have shown unexcelled folly in picking up, from the Julian Press Library of Sex Research, R.E.L. Masters' Eros and Evil, billed in its subtitle as a study of 'the sexual psychopathology of witchcraft'.

The book first made its appearance in 1962, part of a series of works on erotica. Masters co-authored one of these (The Jewel and the Lotus) with another man who had the grace to remain pseudonymous. This book shows the same use of source material as the other — both to titillate the reader and to display the vast erudition of the translator.

Unfortunately, name-dropping carries no weight when the scholarly apparatus is so clearly designed to gratify the author rather than instruct the reader.

Flashy, not respectable; trashy, not responsible. But my chief complaint comes from the deeper intellectual stance, rather than the posture, of the author. C.S. Lewis has pointed out that, next to outright unbelief in the devil, or in devils, the great danger to man is an 'unhealthy and excessive' interest in them.

Masters' is the latest and most prurient word on how to identify the incubus in your bed, but it eschews the analysis it promises, and instead gleefully records the variously reported size, shape and temperature of the devil's member.

All told, the work is a hodge-podge of excerpts from theologians befed up with Masters' wooden moralizing on the inherent inhibitions displayed by moral persons.

The true inspiration of the book is the memory of Aleister — "666 — the Beast" — Crowley. Here are les fleurs du mal; the book without any spiritual or psychological value sits astride the worst traditions of occult sexuality.

You are far wiser to begin your investigations with the more sedate studies of Margaret Murray (whom Masters claims, without proof, to be discredited), Pennington Hughes, or Montague Summers.

Summers' translation of On Demonology by the little-known theologian Sinistrari provides one of the few honest delights of the book; it is a pity it comes only as a second appendix, immediately preceded by a necromancer's dictionary.

The treatise shows the delicacy of church reasoning in the late years of the Old Science, when theologians had to tread warily past the bones of exegetical saints. Sometimes, as here, it soared into harmony with the philosophical concepts of the day.

Sinistrari's dissertation, concerned with the nature of demons, surprisingly enough expands to consider the question of extraterrestrial beings.

The Franciscan's lucidity is welcome after the sinister exhortations of Masters to admit our lewdness and erect our Dionysia on the now long-dead principle of decency.

What desires will you be catering to when you read Masters? He himself seems to combine both sexual and religious voyeurism into a vilness that illuminates not at all.

Embittered

A Servant of the Queen
Maud Gunne MacBride
Doubleday

Ireland's Joan of Arc. The lady who aroused the Irish spirit to a fever pitch, heading resistance to evictions in Mayo, fighting the landlords of Donegal in order to prevent a famine, organizing demonstrations against Queen Victoria's Jubilee, planning a boycott against Edward VII's coronation, preaching anti-English policy throughout America, and (as literature thanks her,) rejecting the proposals of W.B. Yeats.

Maud Gunne herself is a venerable monument of Irish history; and Gloria Steinem would embrace her as a sister.

This is Maud Gunne MacBride's story, bittersweetly entitled A Servant of the Queen. We can all conjure up Yeats's cherished image of "the Ledeane body, bent Above a sinking fire," telling her tales "of a harsh reproff, or trivial event That changed some childish day to tragedy." This is she.

Her English mother who died at a poetically tragic young age is vaguely recalled. More vividly drawn is her beloved father, Tommy, whose life and death was equally poetic but infinitely more tragic.

It was Tommy, a romantic British officer who imbued his eldest daughter with a sense of Irish patriotism and a deep-seated resentment of the "price" of being Irish in the British Empire. Tommy died just at the moment when he'd decided to stake all and run for Parliament as a Home Ruler. His eldest daughter, a frail, consumptive teenager of seventeen, became determined to carry on the fight, in spite of all familial and medical obstacles.

And fight Maud did. She defied her family and fortune, battled her sickly body, and ignored convention in order to oppose Britain. Her "Quattrocento image... hollow of cheek as though it drank the wind And took a mess of shadows for its meal!" rallied desperate people to rise up against the heartless and negligent cruelty of an Empire grown too old and too large to do much for her people.

A female (the only other woman at all well known or remembered is the Countess Mankiewicz) in a male-dominated revolution, she stands next to Casement, Connolly, Griffiths, Pearse and, of course her husband, MacBride, as one of the most active participants as Ireland was "transformed utterly" from a nation of oppressed people to a vibrant nation.

A Servant of the Queen is full of the important facts of her life — and hers was an important life. The book tells a necessary story, it's strongly 'relevant' and it's a welcome addition to the history of the Irish struggle for independence.

But the book is long. It tends to tediousness. It's easy to become bored with the intense self-righteousness that pervades her tale.

Yeats wrote these lines about Maud Gunne:

That woman's days were spent
In ignorant goodwill,
Her nights in argument
Until her voice grew shrill.
What voice more sweet than hers
When young and beautiful,
She rode to barriers?

Her voice was full and sweet and strong — when young. Her history is told in another voice, "a voice grown shrill". The sweetness has been diluted with a sense of superiority, with the arrogance of achievement.

Other's dreams

The Autograph Hound
John Lahr
Pocket Books

Poor Benny Walsh. What a life. Trying to grub out an honest existence isn't easy, not when "existing" consists of being a busboy in one of New York's leading restaurants so that you can get to the real business of living, i.e., collecting autographs of the STABAS. One must run all over Broadway, defy cameramen and even jail in order to get the signatures that will one day be priceless, 2,376 autographs! And the reputation of being "one of the best." A first rate collector. That's Benny Walsh, right out of Atlantic City into the Big Time.

He is a rotten lover, bad union man, somewhat heartless son, but one of the best at his real job. Benny Walsh is one of the residue of other people's dreams, one of the pieces of all those broken lights on the Great White Way. John Lahr's portrait is almost poignant in its picture of absurd desperate failure and clownish tragedy. Benny isn't really endearing — but his story touches you much like the pictures of Bowery bums who line the streets idly and drink away all memory. The Autograph Hound seems to answer all the questions one might ask about those bleary-eyed defeated souls.

Canadiana/Canadian

Early Ontario Gravestones
Carole Hanks
McGraw-Hill Ryerson

The nationalistic Independent Publishers' Association has been complaining for a long time about bookstores which "ghetto-ize" Canadian books by lumping them all together as "Canadiana," thereby implying that a novel by Margaret Lawrence, say, is not able to compete for the bookbuyer's attention with the latest work of some American or British writer.

There are some books, though, which anyone would be hard put to know what else one was to do with them. Early Ontario Gravestones, by Carole Hanks, is one of them.

The book's modest audaciousness is its chief charm. "This book," says the blurb, "is not only an attractive introduction to the pastime of exploring old graveyards; it is an original contribution to a fascinating and neglected area of Canadiana."

Perhaps. But 36 pages of text and some 50 black and white plates quite obviously taken by the author herself do not constitute a contribution to "Canadiana" that is all that unique or significant.

But in comparison to the overblown efforts of a big name photographer and a big name prose writer (Hugh Mackennan, with The Rivers of Canada, and Morley Callaghan, with Winter, photographs in both cases by John de Visser, are this season's chief sinners, in comparison with the efforts of all the other Year of the Land imitators, this book is refreshing.

What one does miss though, is any kind of sociological or cultural context for the "early Ontario gravestones."

I grew up in the Niagara Peninsula, an area of Ontario studded with old cemeteries.

The cemeteries at St. Mark's and St. Andrew's in Niagara-on-the-Lake are an integral part of any walk through the town, together with the big white houses, and the gardens seen on the other side of white picket fences.

The Lunday's Lane cemetery in Niagara Falls, even though it is more significant historically than the Niagara-on-the-Lake cemeteries, (the battle of Lundy's Lane was fought here), is rarely visited by any tourist, let alone a Niagara Falls resident. And plans for national park status have always fallen through.

And yet at both places the same point is equally true, equally obvious. The cemeteries in both towns, are today, even as they must have been 100, 150 years ago, terribly inadequate in the face of nature. "Cemeteries are permanent," they will withstand time." But at Niagara-on-the-Lake nature is encroaching slowly on the cemetery, obliterating the names on the tombstones, defacing them with fungi and mould.

The tree roots — of ages old trees — — have caused the stones to shift and sink. The trees crowd out the sun. The air is damp and rank.

At Niagara Falls, the cemeteries are quite simply irrelevant. The Falls are still a place where many go to seek their death, or where, many, not seeking find it. The Falls, spring, summer, winter, every year, mingle with their roar, the cries, the sudden hopes, of lives snuffing themselves out or being snuffed out.

In the face of nature, cemeteries are best appreciated in the mass. Cemeteries, are places you walk through or sit in, anywhere, not places in which you make a point of walking to "a certain tombstone because it has a certain curiosity value."

It's better to see cemeteries culturally rather than historically (which is how Hanks sees them).

It is the concept of "Canadiana" which encourages the publication of this book. But it and other books like it do not define us as "Canadian."

It is precisely the challenge of nature when we confront it, each one of us alone, that does that — and that encourages us to treat the past and the present on the same terms.

Instead of seeing tombstones as artifacts I would see the cemeteries themselves as part of some greater metaphysical Canadian landscape. Lightning struck trees and deserted barns and crowded cemeteries and the Canadian Shield looming on the north...

Maybe I've been reading Margaret Atwood too much.

Instructions in head-hunting; "Wu-Feng," just another Canadian play.

Of course the St. Lawrence Centre Theatre Company should be doing Canadian plays. Few will argue with that even though the record with Canadian plays at the Centre is dismal. The only real success the St. Lawrence company has had with a Canadian play was Les Belles Sœurs (and Michel Tremblay claims that he comes from a foreign country!). But there's no point in doing a Canadian play, or any play, unless it's fairly good. Munroe Scott's play Wu-Feng, which opened on Tuesday, is a fairly grim Canadian play; one is hard-pressed to think of justification for the production.

Wu-Feng is set on the island of Formosa in the 18th century. The title character is apparently based on an actual person who has become legend.

Wu-Feng served as the Emperor's governor to the uncouth mountain tribes. He was a sage, using reason and compromise to promote the rule of his monarch.

But Wu-Feng is challenged by Margama, a man who is fired with revolutionary zeal. Margama wishes to restore the language and culture of the past. His goal is to "throw off ways that are not our ways." The idealistic Margama has gathered a group of rebellious followers around and he plots to gain control.

It's the case of a society cut off from its roots, forced to adapt to a national culture; Margama wants to return to ancient tribal customs.

The play is essentially a dialogue between Wu-Feng and Margama. They not only represent two different generations, but also two different visions of society.

Margama considers himself an oracle of the future and among the tribal rites he seeks to restore is human sacrifice. "We have forgotten who and what we are," he says, echoing a familiar phrase.

Wu-Feng tries vainly to uphold the status quo, arguing eloquently and with wisdom; but he cannot stem the nationalistic passion.

Although Wu-Feng is set in Formosa of the 18th century it's obviously a parable of our times. There's little question that Scott is speaking broadly about many of the questions that have been wracking different parts of the world recently. Closest to home, it seems to zero in to Quebec. But it's about Canada too and other nations involved in the question of national identity.

Wu-Feng takes on the whole ponderous subject of anarchy and law, violence and reason. The issues are all important and potentially very interesting but in Wu-Feng they are boiled down too easily into truisms.

The conflict between Wu-Feng and Margama has moments of intensity but not enough to keep the play from floundering in a sea of wordiness. The dynamics between the two opposing forces seem half-baked. Scott has taken the issues at surface value and, as a result, the play has a facile tone. We yearn to see the conflict dramatized in a dynamic sense but it isn't and Wu-Feng meanders to a predictable conclusion.

The play wears its Oriental setting awkwardly. Brecht was able to transport ideas into other cultures but there's a great gulf between genius and the mundane. In Wu-Feng the Formosan setting does not make an 'issue' play come alive. It merely makes it seem a little silly.

Wu-Feng is a barely actable play and Leon Major's production is no additional help. It bears the stamp of so many St. Lawrence Centre productions, usually of plays by Brecht, with that sense of committed earnestness carried beyond the point of necessity. If the production had been a bit more playful, a lot less ponderous, and a little more visually exciting, then the play might have survived.

For this production the St. Lawrence Centre has gathered together three of the best young actors working in this country; Stephen Markle, Neil Munro and Alan Scarfe.

Markle, playing a Chinese stranger, doesn't have anything more than a skeletal part, with an embarrassing love scene, so his abilities go unnoticed.

Munro and Scarfe play the two main characters, Wu-Feng and Margama, and their performances give the production its main redeeming feature. The two actors do bring a charge to the play simply because they are both very intelligent, skilled, sensitive performers, and even straddled as they are with unwieldy roles they survive.

Murray Lauffer's sombre set, adorned with bronzed skulls, harked back to a set I feel I've seen many times before on the same stage.

This season the St. Lawrence Centre is producing two Canadian plays. That's a record for the current regime. Coming later in the year will be the venerable Robertson Davies' yet unnamed play. We can only hope that it will redeem their reputation.

What Glorious Times They Had
Red Light Theatre
Enoch Turner School House
until 2 november

This comic yet serious play examines the struggle to win the vote for women in Manitoba, between 1912 and 1916.

Led by one Nellie McClung, the Political Equality League grapples with—and eventually topples Sir Rodmond Roblin, premier of Manitoba.

The struggle however, is hardly fought tooth and nail, as it was by the London Suffragettes. Instead, the women press their cause with great charm and wit.

Diane Grant, playing Nellie McClung, gives a lively and spirited performance. She is a very short woman—as was the real McClung—but she holds her own on stage, with her driving force and energy. Grant is the chief miracle worker of this production; she not only stars but conceived and directed the play as well.

Her staging is always very fluid, with no awkward scenes. One sequence, set in a factory, is particularly slick and chilling. The sound and driving fury of the machinery is conveyed by the use of straight backed chairs, slammed together and pulled apart in various motions. It is ingeniously simple in execution, yet very effective.

Paul Brown, playing as many roles and I have fingers, stood out as a remarkably versatile and funny performer. Francine Volker as a peppy woman journalist, made the most of her role, and came out shining. Her bit as the premier's wife is hilarious.

The highlight of the play was a mock parliament, presented by the women, which reversed the sex roles. Mr. Brown, representing 'Franchise for Fellows', appeared before a female cabinet seeking the vote for men. This hilarious scene was very deftly handled.

The costumes, by Heidi—that's how she is credited in the program—were all meticulous in period detail. Actual period songs of suffrage and temperance were used to good effect, with violin accompaniment by Monika Piebrock.

What Glorious Times They Had is being presented at the Enoch Turner Schoolhouse, one block east of Parliament on King. It's not as easy to find as the O'Keefe Centre, but it's worth your while to seek it out.

Actors as horses: cast members of "Them Donnellys."

Them Donnellys
Theatre Passe Muraille

Them Donnellys Is Here says the sign on the back door of Holy Trinity Church. With them comes the fire and fury of their step-dancing, hell-raising era.

Them Donnellys is Theatre Passe Muraille's collectively produced interpretation of the notorious life, times and death of the "black" Donnelly clan of Biddulph township (near London, Ontario).

Sensationalism and speculation but no verifiable facts surround the causes of the complex religious-political strife which engulfed the Irish settlers of Biddulph. The Donnelly reputation shifted from infamy to the level of myth one night in 1880 when a large group of vigilantes stormed into the Donnelly homesteads and massacred five members of the family. Since that time, public opinion has been divided between the belief that the Donnellys received their due and the belief that they were unfortunate victims of the lawlessness of their time.

The Donnelly story is dramatically rich in characters, issues and events. Theatre Passe Muraille deliberately does not explore the issues of the feud at a very intellectual or sophisticated level. In fact, Them Donnellys refrains from assigning moral judgement on who was right or wrong.

Instead the cast portray the Donnellys as an emotional rustic family who knew laughter-love and anger. The emphasis is on the human rather than the inhuman aspects of the bloody story.

Them Donnellys is a mixture of folk drama, satire, tragedy, and country-and-western songs. There's a lot of noise (at times too much), a lot of energy and a lot of action in this production.

Although I ended up enjoying the play, it did take some time before I warmed up to it and became involved: The first act, especially the first half hour needs sharper editing. The barn-raising opening, an excellent attention-getter became bogged down in the overlong and needlessly reptitious motions of lifting beams into place.

In Them Donnellys, as in all Theatre Passe Muraille productions, the play tries to capture the essence of real experience. Ladders, ropes and other simple uncluttered props are used to change and re-create settings. Wagons and stage-chairs arrive and leave. On two occasions burning wood lights the stage producing a horrifying effect.

The characters move in and out of the action in teasing, hilarious and solemn vignettes. Janet Amos as the Donnelly mother is particularly outstanding. Her expertise runs the gamut from rollicking humour to the strength of heavy drama: fussing maternally one moment she is demonically bloodthirsty the next. Fine performances are also given by Eric Peterson as Grouchy Rider, Booth Harding Savage as the crippled son, and Terry Tweed as the Donnelly daughter.

Theatre Passe Muraille's Them Donnellys toured last year in the rural southwest towns of Petrolia, Listowel, Clinton, Orangeville, Hanover and Stratford, places very close to where the events depicted actually took place. The present Toronto production is a revised version of this touring show.

It is not part of the Reaney Donnelly saga. The first section of that play was produced by the Tarragon Theatre last year. Reaney's next installment opens there next month.

As you don't like it

Contrary to popular belief, the female parts in Shakespeare were played by boys, not men who have gone through puberty.

This is just one of the many problems besetting the current production of As You Like It, at O'Keefe until Nov. 2.

Gregory Floy reduced Rosalind to a one-dimensional idiot, with five gestures and an infinite number of pointless movements. Celia (David Schofield) seemed to have a mousethatch, and was noticeably flat-chested.

Christopher Neame played Phoebe to the hilt, providing a welcomed relief from the tedium of the rest of the company's acting.

Touchstone and Audrey are presented in such overblown slapstick, that one is tempted to think they are more used to playing in amateur productions (Coarse Acting style).

Of the men playing men, only Blake Butler as Adam presented a characterization that the audience could recognize as human. Naturally, then, the cast had to butt in on his 'feed the old man scene'. Their phoney sympathy ruined the mood that had been established.

The set added to the general torpor of the evening. Everything was white plexiglass for the first hour, then an abstract sky and trees were flown in to represent the forest of Arden. Even then, the impact of strips of dots gliding back and forth soon paled. (If you want to see how a kinetic set can really be used, Kromberg 1582, the rock musical that butchers Hamlet, will be at O'Keefe in the spring.)

The costumes were in 1960 Mod-Rockers style—white vinyl, black fur, grey Nehru jackets—with a touch of 1974 hip—frosted sunglasses, Afro wigs.

The sound technicians should clean out their ears, and try to have a steadier hand when playing with the levels on the downstage mikes.

The staging was tacky. Anyone who has ever watched "International Wrestling" could see right through the "wrestling" scene. Fight director William Hobbs has obviously never been put in a Full Nelson, since Orlando just slithered out of his.

The grand finale was pathetic. Poor Hymen (who couldn't sing) the paper leis and the intricate choreography (the actors joined hands and ran around in two lumpy circles) battled for top honors in the ridiculous category.

Why did O'Keefe bother to bring the show here at all?

Jean Melusky, Chris Britton, in Firehall Theatre's "Lemon Sky."

Lemon Sky
Firehall Theatre
until 2 november

I really don't know when in Lanford Wilson's career as a playwright he sat down and wrote Lemon Sky but I feel reasonably certain that this is a very early play. It has all the earmarks of a beginning writer who insists upon saying everything there is to say — and telling his life story along the way.

The play is about growing up and being disillusioned in California and about anger and death and sex. With all the elements of a risqué soap opera Lanford Wilson is certainly to be congratulated for his ability to downplay intense emotion so well that it becomes uninteresting.

The actors of Lemon Sky at the Firehall Theatre must surely have gotten lost in the play's vacuity along with the audience for they seem unable to make any sense of it.

The story is about a seventeen year old boy who goes to San Diego to live with the father who deserted him and his mother years previously. Six months later he is forced to leave accused of being a homosexual.

The possibilities for drama are there in the various elements of turmoil seen in each of the characters. But Wilson is unable to reconcile himself to the explosive nature inherent in them, he resorts to a kind of giddy sentimentality which blurs the personalities of the characters.

Not satisfied with this he turns to the threadbare dramatic technique of narration and having his characters discuss their situation with the audience.

With all of the difficulties of the script itself, it is understandable that the director and the actors are never able to get beyond the simple mechanics of the play to make it in any way satisfying.

The actors resort to playing their roles as stereotypes with little depth of feeling. But for all this, there is no point in the performance where one feels they are incapable actors. They simply do not have the material to work with.

This is particularly true with the last act. The only chance the actors have to show what they can do is marred. They fumble with lines and fall over each other at the only place where it really matters — the climax.

Lemon Sky then, is one of those unique plays where the combination of actors, director and writer produce a play that elicits no feeling from the audience except a detached boredom.

Jubalay
Global Village
85 St. Nicholas Street

Jubalay, which opened last week at the Global Village, is a song-gest, imported from Winnipeg, that soaks up a lot of juices left over from the late sixties. The production consists of exactly twenty-seven songs, all written by Patrick Rose and Merv Campone, and there's very little holding it together except the bouncy talents of the four performers.

What does 'Jubalay' mean? Well, we're told at one point that Jubalay refers to "the child in all of us." In other words it's a celebration of life, and all the rest of that kind of stuff. There's no theme running through Jubalay, but apparently the evening is supposed to leave us with a sense of exhilaration about being alive.

One thing must be said in favour of Jubalay, it certainly is the slickest and best-staged musical the Global Village has housed from a long time.

There's nothing tacky about it even though most of the endless stream of songs are unsophisticated and often painfully simplistic.

Jubalay is lightly enjoyable material for those with a strong passion for musicals without any demand for substance. It would have been a much more successful show had the Rose-Campone material had been focused towards some direction. Thoughts about love-and-understanding now seem dated and just too naive.

But Jubalay has been put together shrewdly and the ballads that are meant to tug at our heart strings are placed between lively numbers and some good choreography gives the production movement and verve from time to time.

The numbers run the gamut of style and subject-matter.

There's a 1940's swing number, a funny piece about anarchy, one of the few times when Jubalay comes close to the dangerous subject of sex.

We are presented with a song about 'La Belle Province' and one about Spain.

The show is best when it gently pokes fun, as in the torch song Diana Stapley sings seated on the piano, with a glass of champagne, pouring out her soul.

The four performers are each quite talented and work hard to make themselves liked. They've been doing the show for so long that their performances lacked spontaneity and they did seem a mite bored with it at times. Diane Stapley came across best in the singing category and Ruth Nichol lent a comic touch to Jubalay. The two men, Patrick Rose and Brent Carver, have pleasant manners and are eager to please.

Edward Gilbert has directed Jubalay with the intention of making it move briskly and he succeeds. If the evening isn't very memorable it's because the material has stymied the performers. Had Jubalay something more to say other than that life is a jolly affair, it would have some impact.

Come Blow Your Horn
Toronto Truck Theatre
The Colonnade
until 23 november

Imagine that you are a beautiful blonde — a Goldie-Hawn-stereotype. Put yourself on the doorstep of an apartment. Inside, you believe there is a young, brilliant MGM director for whom you wish to audition. Naturally, you knock and enter. Inside, you find a Jewish mother lamenting her fate in response to the persistent ringing of a telephone; a girl threatening to leave for Europe while a man proposes marriage to her; a despondent Jewish father trying to intimidate and solicit respect simultaneously from his two sons, one of whom pretends he is an MGM director.

Sound impossible? Absurd? Hilarious?

Who else but Neil Simon would bring together this incongruous set of circumstances as the logical conclusion to a Broadway comedy?

Come Blow Your Horn deals with the joys and sorrows of breaking away from home and attempting to live independently.

Older brother Alan Baker has been living alone in a bachelor's pad for many years when he is joined by younger brother Buddy. Naturally, Momma Baker is concerned for her young, inexperienced son, and Buddy has mixed feelings about his new-found liberty. He is particularly afraid of his domineering father who is as rigid and unchanging as the wax fruit which he manufactures in his business. Buddy has always been the perfect, co-operative, and loved son.

Both brothers spend the next few weeks juggling women, lifestyles, phone calls and parental invasions. They manage to sidestep awkward predicaments acrobatically until finally, the parents meet the girlfriends and a climax is forced.

Mrs. Baker seemed popular with the small audience that attended the opening night, but her performance was so far from subtle that it was burlesque. She made a pathetic attempt to carry a Jewish accent which alternated between Yiddish and Italian. Otherwise, the acting was good, with Virginia Reh as Connie deserving special mention for a very real and vivid portrayal of a bold and imaginative, nice-Jewish-girl whose bold and imaginative personality is nevertheless unimpressed.

The interplay between farce and wit, between burlesque and pointed satire, is a constant delight.

This company lacks only a larger audience in its cozy theatre in the middle of the Colonnade.

Why Rock the Boat
Four Seasons Sheraton

"Everything a journalist knows is trivial. But to the extent that he doesn't tell what he knows he becomes important."

That's from the novel Why Rock the Boat? upon which the NFB feature film of the same title is based.

The film is a trivial film. But that doesn't mean that it isn't worth seeing. It uses its trivialities constructively.

The ads tell you the plot situation. Harry Barnes, cub reporter, has two problems: (1) to keep his job; (2) to lose his virginity.

He doesn't; he does. It's a hackneyed story line. And in Why Rock the Boat? all, all the stereotypes clang into place. There's the naive, romantic tyro reporter, the tyrannical editor of the paper, the substitute older brother, the Older Woman and the Virgin (who represents All that is Good in Life).

But you distance yourself from the film because it is so very conventional; you treat it as a piece of craftsmanship—and you judge it as such.

Why Rock the Boat's salvation, in fact, lies in the fact that it doesn't pretend to be anything more than a well-turned piece of fluff.

Everything is presented in an extremely non-dramatic style. The novel (which I, admittedly, enjoyed much more than the film) is a farcical triumph. The movie is a nostalgic romantic comedy. Perhaps that explains it. But it is very hard to become involved with the characters.

Tiu-Leek, who plays the female romantic lead Julia, is impossible to react to; emotionally, Harry Barnes loves her. No one else could. We are alienated from Barnes as well as from her.

It may be that the episodic, and non-conclusive nature of the film militates against a rapprochement. "As the film ends, the now adoring Julia seems determined to create with the characters, some new problems for Harry, of a sort that the press kit-synopsis puts it, he never dreamed of." It's too contrived.

And yet when so many films are greeted as masterpieces it's refreshing to see one that so obviously isn't, and hasn't tried to be.

The NFB people seem to have realised that they have a certain product to sell—the insubstantial concept of entertainment—and they have done the best that they could with a small budget and rather limited resources.

And the apparent faults of the film are virtues. The stereotypes, the conventional story line, the episodic nature, the contrivance, are all liberating devices.

"There were more than a hundred in the queue, along the green wall," Sartre writes in Nausea. "They were eagerly waiting for the soft darkness when they could let themselves go and relax, for the moment when the screen, shining like a white pebble, under the water, would speak and dream for them."

Why Rock the Boat? poses no threat, no danger. It's really very insignificant.

I wish it the best.

Richard III
Cinecity

Ever since the first performances of Shakespeare's Richard III around 1593, audiences have been enthralled by this black portrait of arch-villainy. Richard is portrayed as a paragon of unremitting evil, a devil so black-hearted not even a single virtue shines in his galaxy of vices.

Richard, a scheming hunchback, assassinates the king's son to bed his wife, executes his brother on trumped up charges, imprisons the little princes in The Tower where he has them executed, kills his wife to marry another for political advantage and eventually becomes a cruel and tyrannical king.

But if Richard is completely horrible, he also remains completely credible under Shakespeare's deft handling. This embodiment of total but believable evil is perhaps more than three and a half centuries, and given today's political climate, the play could probably attract a few million more.

Toronto film goes, at least, will have a chance to find out, because Cinecity is booking the 1955 film version of Richard III for a short stay.

The film has been unavailable commercially in Canada for most of its history, although it does pop up regularly at filmsociety screenings.

Cinecity and other Canadian film theatres will have the opportunity to show the film because a small Canadian film distributor, New Cinema Enterprises, has just got the Canadian distribution rights from a large international distributor, Janus Films.

Sir Laurence Olivier produced, directed and starred in Richard III. Following the unprecedented success of his previous two Shakespearean films, Henry V and Hamlet, which together won six Oscars, critics and audiences breathlessly awaited the film version.

And when it came, they weren't disappointed. The film Richard III contained not only Olivier's performance, which on stage had been considered the greatest in his distinguished career, but also powerful performances by three fellow knights, Sir Ralph Richardson, Sir John Gielgud and Sir Cedric Hardwicke.

But viewers are warned that Olivier's Richard III is not a film in the ordinary sense. It is better described as a filmed version of a stage play because Olivier, with some exceptions, has chosen to keep intact all the strong theatrical elements. And sometimes to the detriment of the film, the viewer constantly aware of them.

The role of Richard III has always been an actor's delight because of the scope it offers. Richard remains an unbelievable human character as he schemes, lusts, murders, woos and betrays in the play, but it takes a great actor to create a truly brilliant performance with this role rather than just a diverting one.

Olivier certainly performs brilliantly, but his methods come dangerously close to vaudeville melodrama.

On stage Olivier could make his schemes apparent to the audience with the many soliloquies, but in the film he chooses to speak them solito voce to the camera.

Similarly, to underscore the evil character he's playing, Olivier dons a false nose, which looks more like a miniature ski-jump than any part of the human anatomy.

Olivier also goes in for ridiculously ugly costumes and patently theatrical gestures and sneers to let us know how malicious Richard is.

Hardwicke, Richardson Gielgud and the other male actors especially Norman Wooland as Gatesby, all supply strong performances.

The women, however, led by the abominable Claire Bloom overlay their roles, with the usual choreography of amply displayed bosoms, which includes clutching, heaving, sighing, bobbing and sometimes even breathing.

The extras are straight out of theatre school too. Olivier uses the same stock crew of thirty or so to stand for the court, the townspeople of London, or his soldiers.

They tend to stand about blinking dumbly, until the stage directions call for them to resemble humans again instead of cows.

At these junctures they spring into action with a sudden exhibition of misplaced energy simply wondrous to behold.

Their costumes all seem to have been sewn by the same dress-maker, which is standard for movies in the 50's, but do they all have to wave identical stage-issued handkerchiefs at one point?

The rest of the props are good, though. The actors are burdened with real armor artifacts, and it shows during some of the desultory battle scenes during Henry's downfall at the Battle of Bosworth Field.

Unfortunately the battle scenes are filmed outdoors with the usual movie conventions of the 50's: lots of extras trying to look murderous while maintaining their balance in armor, thundering horses, and a general air of confusion and noise.

This is fine enough, except that the rest of the movie is shot with a stationary camera inside stage-like settings, and the change therefore to scenes reminiscent of El Cid is startling.

But why quibble about these shortcomings? The film is often creaky but one must expect this of old theatrical warhorses under the direction of great stage actors like Olivier.

Richard III is still a great movie, not because it lacks flaws but because it transcends them.

The film remains a vehicle for great acting, especially by Olivier. It is unlikely that we will find an actor as great as Olivier for a long time, and we should be thankful that his Shakespearean stage roles, whatever they lose in transition from one medium to another, are still available for viewing.

classical records

There isn't all that much work for the world's French Horn virtuosi, what with just a handful of good concertos to play. There may be sonatas and suites galore, but a concert soloist makes his daily bread from concertos, and if Mozart and Strauss hadn't penned their works for that instrument, there wouldn't be any market at all for the few top-notch players on the international circuits.

Barry Tuckwell is, by general agreement, the best horn player in the world today although there may well be his equal in orchestra ranks somewhere in the Berlin-London-New York area.

Tuckwell himself came up through orchestral ranks in the London Symphony Orchestra, where he held the principal chair for thirteen years. Since his American debut in 1969 he has been in nearly constant demand as a soloist, and joins the TSO for a concert later this year.

Horn players have been known to transcribe all sorts of things, from Bach cello suites to ancient hunting calls in an attempt to broaden their repertoire, but at last (!) Tuckwell has dug up five rarely-heard authentic concertos for horn, and plays them in delightful fashion on a new recording with Neville Marriner conducting the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields.

The album starts off with a treat from the Baroque era, Telemann's D major concerto, a lightweight piece with continuo accompaniment that must have taxed the skills of 17th-century players who had no valves on their instruments. Without those valuable devices, passing notes, trills and chromatic passages were murderously difficult.

Next is an 1802 piece by Cherubini (a composer best known for his light operas) which shows how much a change in manufacturing technique can affect music. Although by this time no standard instrument had been constructed, innovative makers had come up with designs versatile enough to handle vocal-style melodies.

Another baroque piece ends the first side, the E flat concerto by one Christoph Forster, in a style evoking the early Mannheim school. Weber's Concertino (a miniature concerto) opens side two, and is romanticism in full flower — long on melody, and rather short on development, which is more a criticism of Weber than romanticism.

At one point in the piece, however, a curious effect is called for: a four note chord from an instrument which is really only capable of one note at a time! Tuckwell achieves his by humming one note, playing another, and the instrument gives out a third (by summing the two tones) and a fourth (by their difference) which simply must be heard to be believed. It's rather like getting an oboe to sound like a bass drum — it just can't be done, but he does it.

Rounding things out is a concerto by Leopold Mozart, Wolfgang's father. It's a leisurely work, full of pleasant melodies, good intentions and smiles.

Tuckwell plays all the pieces excellently, with smooth backing from Marriner and the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields (who seem to make about three records a day, to judge from their output).

This is a must for horn players and fans, proving that there's more to horning around than the Strauss 2 and Mozart 4.

A bumper crop of classical guitar music is on hand for fans of the instrument in three new releases, covering three different types of music.

Deutsche Grammophon's Archiv division, devoted to music of a more Antique nature, has issued Bach's complete music for Lute, played by the Spanish virtuoso Narciso Yepes.

In this two-record set (Archiv 2708 030) he plays the three suites, two preludes and the fugue that make up the Bach canon, all on the Baroque lute.

This is a fearsome-looking instrument, at least for any amateur player of classical guitar. Most people have enough trouble with six strings; Yepes masters all 26 here in disarmingly easy fashion.

The baroque lute is an instrument for specialists, so I'm told... however, Yepes' many fine recordings on the conventional guitar make me doubt that statement a little.

As with so much of Bach's music, there's a sense of reverence surrounding the preludes, fugues and suites. Like the violin, the lute is well suited for displaying the musician's introspective, private world — basically due to the tremendous flexibility of tone that can be produced.

This is the first complete edition produced in some time, and the crystalline, at times other-worldly melodies lead me to wonder why the music hasn't been recorded many times over.

Possibly it's the immense talent required to make the pieces come off just right. While it's true that old father Bach can easily withstand a bad or bungled performance, it takes a musician of deep insight and giant technique to bring out the best.

And Yepes is that man. He's world-renowned for his Bach, and justly so. This is a beautifully recorded view of a side of Bach seldom heard — and well worth having.

Oscar Ghiglia is a much younger man than Ghiglia, and Italian to boot. Perhaps that's why he launches into the music on his latest album with such relish.

It's called Oscar Ghiglia plays Carlati and other Baroque Masters, hardly a world-shaking title; the music is another story, though.

All the composers represented are of the Baroque era, and most of them Italian, the notable exceptions being Rameau and Couperin.

On the whole, this Angel album (S-37015) is quiet, almost subdued. It's great sleepy-time music, not because it'll bore you, but because it's great stuff to relax by. Again, this is music that's deceptively simple-sounding.

Music of the Baroque era, especially the sonatas and dances on this disc, is highly demanding from a technical point of view, and unless it's tossed off with enough skill, it falls flat.

Ghiglia, a student of Andre Segovia, has more than enough skill to handle the music, and clearly is in love with it. All told, it's a highly enjoyable album, not quite as breathtaking as the Bach set, but delightful in its own right.

The Art of the Flamenco Guitar is quite another story. Away from the formalized world of classical music, Spain developed its own world of melody. Flamenco is totally bound up within the art of Spain, in dance, song, and folkways.

On this album (London Phase 4 SPC 21083), Pao Pena gives us a musical tour of Andalusia, the region in the south of Spain where the Flamenco Guitar grew up.

It's only recently that flamenco music has been played on solo guitar, first made a success by Ramon Montoya. Pena is an adept player, with verve and passion not heard in the more rarefied atmosphere of Bach and the other go-for-Baroque types.

So, you pays yer money and takes yer choice. Germany, Italy or Spain... you'll find it hard to miss with these three releases. If you're new to this type of music, it'll whet your appetite for more. — Dave Baskin

Ludwig van smiles on Kuerti

I am prepared to go out on a limb and say that the most engrossing, captivating, enlightening series of concerts you will hear this year will be at Hart House. They will be on every other Sunday from now until mid-February. They will feature only one performer, one composer, one subject. They will be the Beethoven piano sonatas played by Anton Kuerti.

Last Sunday afternoon, this pleasant, articulate musician held over 800 people in the palm of his hand as he played, and talked about, just three works: Beethoven's sonatas nos. 1, 6 and 11. Although the show was in danger of turning into a religious occasion (the mood was set by an overly reverent introduction from a member of the sponsoring Hart House Music Committee), Kuerti kept the spirit of the event focussed on one thing: the music, not the mystique.

Taking the listener who loves music but isn't an expert as his subject, Kuerti spent the first twenty minutes delving into Beethoven, sonata form and the mechanics of "how to listen". I can't imagine anyone being bored or put off by his vocal presentation — it was witty and erudite.

"I doubt that many of you have heard all the 32 sonatas," Kuerti said in his preamble, but dozens of folks in the audience had their sheet music spread out on their laps.

From the first bars of the sonata — the Op. 2, No. 1 — an almost perceptible sigh of delight made its way across the room.

The first movement was a delight: crisp and clear, the more poignant parts lingering under his fingers for just an instant longer than the rest. The second movement Adagio and third movement minuet were just as rewarding.

Then this happened: just before he raised his hands over the keyboard for the fourth movement, the bell tower rang the hour. Although it was four o'clock, the bell sounded for some perverse reason, ten times. With every ring past the fourth, the frustration grew. We wanted to hear the last movement, he longed to play it. As the last note reverberated throughout the building, he arched over the keys, drew a breath, and — pow! — simply lunged into the prestissimo fourth movement. It's a movement full of technical nightmares, massive fortissimo sections and contrasting sections of opera-like melody.

Kuerti went at it like a man possessed. When the loud passages rolled around, he flailed and kicked at the pedals and keys as if for dear life. The performance was, quite simply, electrifying. Whatever minor considerations there might have been — a missed note once or twice in the piece, a pause held a fraction too long — were just notes of dust on a masterpiece. This was a performance to treasure.

After much shorter preambles, Kuerti gave us the sonatas nos 8 and 11. And just before the last movement of the 11th, the sun broke through the clouds and poured through the west windows of the Great Hall. Was Ludwig smiling on this master interpreter of his music? — David Baskin

Amid rampant rumours of a Beatles Bonanza for some crafty promoter, individual members of The Group retain their hold on the collective consciousness of record-dom.

George is getting set to tour, Paul busily completes what should be a dynamite album if Band On The Run was a warmup, while Ringo bides his time promoting John Lennon's new solo album Walls And Bridges (Apple SW3416) which deserves attention no matter what you may have thought of John's previous lone ventures.

Yoko is not present on this recording, except perhaps as a memory to trigger John's aching nostalgia in a couple of love ballads such as "Bless You" and "No. 9 Dream". For these small mercies Beatle fans must rejoice.

John is aided by the red hot and sparkly Elton John on the current chart-climber "Whatever Gets You Thru The Night," and by Klaus Voorman on bass, with Nicky Hopkins on pianos, and Jim Keltner on drums.

Harry Nilsson co-authored "Old Dirt Road" with Lennon, as a result of John's production on Harry's recent RCA album. That session with Nilsson may be responsible for moving Lennon back into the realm of the melodic and away from the frantic, or shall we say barbaric, yelps that used to emanate from his former alter ego.

If you find that the name Earl Scruggs doesn't bring a flood of memories perhaps the car-chase sequences from "Bonnie and Clyde", churning against that hectic, furious five-string banjo sound track will place him for you.

Inventor and practitioner supreme of the now-famous Scruggs-pattern in finger-pickin' 5-string banjo, Earl Scruggs and his sons, Garry and Randy, aided by Josh Graves, Jody Maphis, and Shane Keister (yes, they're real names, folks!) are collectively known as The Earl Scruggs Revue.

Their second album on the current revival of the Scruggs sound (Earl did a pickup truckload of records with his pickin' partner Lester Flatt, and the Grand Ole Opry gang in other year) is titled Rockin' Cross The Country (Columbia KC 32943).

It gets off to a raucous opening with the Revue's interpretation, banjos and dobros a'blazin', of Billy Joel's "Travellin' Prayer".

Other highlights include a dobro-banjo exchange on "Good Morning Sundown", and the group's lead vocalist, Garry, does a fine job on "King Blue" and "Are My Thoughts With You".

The success of Poco in the country-rock genre, and the blend of rock with country strains as performed by groups like the Eagles has created the demand for aggregations such as the Earl Scruggs Revue — surely one of the tightest bands around.

Bruce Cockburn's annual release on True North, Salt, Sun and Time, (TN-16 Columbia) coincides with his return to Massey Hall for a late-October concert gig. Following his usual practice of blending some bluesy-moody folk pieces with the carefully crafted songs that seem to expand from visual impressions, into soft undulating chord progressions, Bruce's music takes you into his highly imagistic world. Ever a poet of visual concepts, his songs move from images such as "crystal swan in a sky of glass", "fire bright faces in winter night", "snow on the stark spruce limb", to the task of providing a richly contoured background of unabrasive sound patterns on guitar.

The album, recorded this past summer at Thunder Sound and Manta studios in Toronto, brings together impressions of Stockholm, London, and Toronto in songs like "All The Diamonds In The World", "Stained Glass", and "Don't Have To Tell You Why", while instrumental tracks such as "Salt, Sun and Time" and "Rouler Sa Bosse" are Cockburn cum Django Reinhardt exercises on blue funky guitar.

Live Convention
Fairport Convention
Island

Live Convention marks the return of Sandy Denny, after an absence of nearly four years, to Fairport Convention. She left originally to form Fotheringay, left them to become a solo artist and now is reunited with Trevor Lucas and Jerry Conway, who were with Fotheringay, as well as with Fairport Convention steadies Davey Pegg, David Swarbrick and Dave Mattacks.

Live Convention also marks the tenth lp put out by a band that has seen a constant change in personnel. The nucleus that remained has always carried on the good work.

Live Convention centers on two classic Fairport tunes, side one being opened by "Matty Groves", and side two by "Sloth".

On "Matty Groves" Sandy does her best singing yet. Her dramatic intensity on this cut is quite different from — and superior to — the style she adopted on her last solo release.

The next tune, "Rosie" is, probably one of the nicest love songs the band has done. Dave Swarbrick does the vocals. The closing song on side one is "Something you got", which re-unites Sandy and Trevor in a fast paced rock tune.

On side two "Sloth" is the showcase for Swarbrick's violin playing. He provides us with an incredibly beautiful solo, and with Trevor joining in on the vocals, the tune slowly builds up in intensity and strength.

Following an old habit the band performs a Dylan composition, "Down in the flood", with Trevor and Sany joining on the vocals. There are two excellent instrumental tunes on the record "Fiddlistix" and "Dirty Linen". Both are fast jigs that are swept along by Swarbrick's violin. Two new tunes "John the Gun" and "Sir B. Mackenzie" are also included.

The overall quality of this lp shows that Fairport is still one of the tightest bands around, with all the musicians at top form. They still rely upon traditional English folk songs but their skills shine through on compositions by band members.

This live record has two advantages over a studio product: it allows the listener to listen to extended cuts when the band has a chance to play with spontaneity and also to work out solos which are not usually included on studio cuts.

Fairport will be playing at Convocation Hall the day after tomorrow. Hopefully the sound system will be better than the one they had at Massey Hall earlier this year.

THE REFORMATION

Over 450 years ago, the historic event called The Reformation took place throughout Europe; focusing in Germany. A priest and monk of the Roman Catholic Church, Martin Luther, started a reform movement. The direct result was the first Protestant Church named after Luther. That original small group of Lutherans has now grown to 75 million, the largest group of Protestants in the world.

Martin Luther founded his reform on the Christian truth and freedom of the Holy Scriptures.

Today, the big word is not truth and freedom, but liberation.

On this anniversary of the Reformation, our theme this Sunday will be:

black on white

Jazz arose from the roots of black culture, and although it belongs to the black artist, he has shared it with the white world and allowed the white man to influence him. A case in point was the Africanada concert at Convocation Hall last Sunday.

Billed as a synthesis of African and Canadian musical styles, the 16 local musicians who took part in this innovative program managed to please the audience of 800, the ones wise enough to invest $1.00 to experience a new and refreshing approach to jazz.

By combining an exhilarating rhythm section of legitimate African instruments with such American ones as electric bass, drums, sax flute, and organ these talented musicians produced a winning sound.

Solos were uniformly good. The musical improvisation was noteworthy, with almost every artist experimenting with more than one instrument.

The audience was treated not only to instrumentals but to vocals led by "cantor" Royal Blue. The evening proved interesting to all who were there.

For those who weren't, Mike Armstrong (the leader) and a few friends periodically offer free concerts at Hart House. Keep your eyes open.

Two one-man shows -- contrasts in acting, in quality,

Toronto has seen two wildly contrasting one-man shows in the past few weeks. Roy Doctrice was at the Royal Alex as John Aubrey, in Brief Lives, for a week and a half period recently. Patrick Crean was at the St. Lawrence Centre soon after in a three day run of The Sun Never Sets, a show based on the works of Rudyard Kipling.

Doctrice is a good, even a superior, actor. Crean is not. Perhaps it's as simple as that.

But Doctrice has the inestimable advantage, wherever he goes, (and his show has moved on to Broadway now) that no one really knows very much about Aubrey.

In sharp contrast to practically every other one-man show, Doctrice does not cash in on the celebrity or reputation of a popularly remembered literary figure. He has not imposed a rigid framework of impersonation on his show.

And his show is not centred on a literary figure lecturing or reading — as is Hai Holbrook's Mark Twain, as is Emlyn William's Charles Dickens, as is John Stark's Stephen Leacock.

Doctrice has won a great deal of freedom for himself by going back to the seventeenth century.

But he does not use that freedom to submerge the personality of Aubrey, even the little he can assume about it, in an evocation of the seventeenth century.

The reviewers on the bigger Toronto papers, when the play originally appeared here, and on this occasion of its return, have generally and collectively, gone gaga over the set, over the verisimilitude of the representation of living conditions in Good King Charles' England.

Someone should tell them not to point. They have missed entirely the appropriateness of the description of the show, in publicity releases and posters, as "a play for one player".

The point of the play is not that life was so very different then but that humanity is very much the same in this age as it was in that, to wit, weak, greedy, frightened, noble heroic, lonely.

For me, it was a very real question even before the intermission, whether "Aubrey" would die. That was where the play was heading. We were not being presented simply with a monologue by some faintly queer but "patronizable" old man.

Aubrey does die at the end. It is the only possible conclusion to the play. His death is a kind of liberation for us, a thanksgiving that "even the weariest river winds somewhere safe to sea". Yet while he lives, he is like the noblest sort of old man, like his contemporary, Thomas Hobbes, who published a verse translation of the Aeneid at 85, because, as he said in the preface, "I had nothing else to do."

Sitting alone, waiting to die, he is like one of those ageless old men in the pictures of "A Scholar in a High Room" that Rembrandt was painting within the original John Aubrey's lifetime.

notes, let alone the set.

Uniforms by Alkit, Ltd., and Huntsman and Sons, London; Hats by Hicks and Sons, Leadenhall Street, London; Vintage Port, supplied by Sandeman; Cigarettes by Abdulla; Cigars by Danmaman, Brazil." That's what the program said. And Crean (who has been Fencing Master and actor with Ontario's Stratford Festival for the past twelve years) did come out in tight black breeches and a red ceremonial jacket trimmed with gold braid. He did drink the brandy. He did smoke the cigars. But then he began to recite the poems.

The greater number of the pieces recited were written in Cockney.

It was high camp, (to be kind), to see what to all appearances was a perfectly normal, well-brought up major general, wailing on about "ome."

I winced for him. The evening was a mixture of Kipling's poetry and prose leavened with stories about Kipling and about British high caste life.

Few things are more infuriating than to know the original version of a story and to hear it told with completely different circumstances but the same punch line.

(For Crean it was a sergeant who told his men they were going to hear a talk on Kipling, and "by God, when it was over, they had better know how to Kipple.") The show did not flow well. Crean alternated as Poetry reader and as Master of Ceremonies.

Crean was just like the archetypal MC: ingratiating, conciliatory, leering, full of puns, and especially in demanding of a certain mechanical response to his performance.

Crean's references to "the ladies"—tilted eyebrows and all—his references to the homeland, to the flag, all brought home the sugary artificiality of the memshabb culture and the worthlessness of this kind of closet nostalgia.

May we forget, Lord God, may we forget.

I.F. Stone's Weekly has been at Cinema-Lumiere for a while now; Why Roek the Boat? opened two weeks ago at the Four Seasons Sheraton. It's an appropriate time to note a few magazines which concern themselves with the intelligent discussion of journalism.

The Columbia Journalism Review is the most respected journalism magazine on this continent. It's published and edited by the staff and students of the most respected school of journalism, a graduate school, The Columbia School of Journalism, at Columbia University in New York. It's published 6 times a year and a subscription is $12. It's worth it. (700 Journalism Bldg., Columbia University, N.Y., N.Y. 10024.)

Hart House posts a list at the end of the year for suggestions for magazines you'd like to see in the reading room. Someone suggested cjr last year. I don't think it's there yet but maybe they've ordered it.

(more) is a tabloid-sized New York based magazine which comes out monthly. A subscription is $10. (more), P.O. Box 576, Ansonia Station, New York, N.Y. 10023. It seems parochial at times but then I don't live in New York.

Often the CJR and (more) deal with the same issue from different viewpoints.

(more's) September issue asks if the media will become the popular villain for the woes of American society (as Wall Street and Madison Avenue have been in the past).

The September-October issue of CJR says such an argument is fallacious.

(more's) main story in the October issue is entitled "Why the Working man Hates the Media."

Content is the Canadian entry. It's printed on Maclean's sized newsprint. And it's usually unusually thin. Only two or three stories per issue, with a lot of odds and ends stuck in at the back.

It comes out monthly. It's $5.00 per year (Content Publishing, Limited, 1411 Crescent Street, Rm. 404, Montreal 107, P.Q.)

But with Content one gets the impression that it's very much a one-man operation. The editor and the publisher is Dick Macdonald. Content Publishing publishes the occasional book as well as the magazine. It pushes those books with full page ads in the magazine.

Best bet might be to read the anthology of articles that have appeared in the magazine in the past. The anthology is edited by Macdonald. It's available at the Roberts.

An anthology of CJR articles has been published as well. It's at the Roberts, and at some of the public libraries too.

Plans are underway to microfilm all Canadian university student newspapers and to provide microfilms to any university library — if it wants them.

Perhaps it's too early in the year to push bound copies of The Varsity — but they are available, and some people do buy them. Some people even buy subscriptions to The Varsity when they graduate.

I don't intend to review books in the books whatsup. I will be glad to publicize poetry readings, library nights, especially interesting lectures, pleas for contributions to books, literary contests, literary prizes, literary quarterlies, new magazines, new bookstores.

movies

We still urge you to I.F. Stone's Weekly at Cinemalumiere nightly at 8:15 and 10:15. It's an uplifting movie, among its other virtues. A friend who ignored our warnings about The War Game, the second film with I.F. Stone, felt so ill that she left without seeing Stone. I.F. Stone's Weekly is also being shown on CBC TV Sunday at 10 pm.

UC is showing India's classic Apu Trilogy by Satyajit Ray, tonight at the Med Sci auditorium. Also tonight SMC is showing Women in Love, by Ken Russell, in whom some see merit. Women in Love is on tomorrow night too, and the SMC film club points out that it is the most popular film at St. Mike's, an interesting social and theological consideration.

On Sunday night the Poor Alex is showing two "on the set" documentaries, one about I. Claudius a never-finished epic from 1937, and the other a publicity film around The Making of Buteh Cassidy and The Sundance Kid. $2 at 8 pm.

Tuesday, of course, is entirely reserved for Wee Geordie at the East York public library.

Thursday is classics night at the Roxy, with Truffaut's best: The 400 Blows and Jules and Jim. It's a powerful, heavy and long double-bill.

Also Thursday, the free showings of Russian classics continues at the Learning Resources Centre, 666 Eglinton Ave. W. This week Eisenstein's October (Ten Days that Shook the World).

We generally don't include anti-recommendations, but we thought you should know that we disagreed totally with our reviewer's gentle assessment of Don't Rock the Boat, a thoroughly embarrassing Canadian candidate for the worst movie ever made. And while we're at it El Topo is coming back to the Revue, starting Thursday. It is a candidate for the most pretentious movie ever made.

Distant regards to The Projectionist and Fireman's Ball.

dance

The Toronto Dance Theatre begins its fall season with an 8:30 preview on Oct. 30, at the Edward Johnson Building. It's there until Nov. 9, tentative matinees on Nov. 2, 6, 9 at 2:20.

Each show will include one new work and two others from the repertoire. The Ray Charles Suite will be danced at all three matinees.

Student tickets are $3.00. Call 425-2212 for reservations.

The National Ballet has been on tour in the Maritimes and Quebec but will be back in Toronto for another great Choreographic Workshop in late November. And it's the Nutcracker for Christmas, December 18 to 23.

For figure skating fans, the Ice Capades will soon be here, featuring Karen Magnussen, and introducing their newest sweetheart, Roberta Loughland. In spite of its name, the Milk Meet sounds like fun. Maple Leaf Gardens, Nov. 5.

Gathering from the hordes that seem to throng there every Thursday and Friday (often waiting up to an hour and a half in line), the reputation of the Vic Pub has spread far and wide.

The pub's managers, Mike Hill and Glenn Sernyk, all too often confronted with a crowded and noisy atmosphere, have decided to vary the pub's format somewhat.

While Thursday nights program will remain unaltered, alternate Fridays will offer something new, "Beaver's", a licensed folk club. Beaver's, many will remember, was a successful, rather homey, coffee house run at Vic, in the pre-pub days of the late sixties through 1971, when it was closed because of its inability to obtain a liquor license.

The pub managers have had to relocate Beaver's. But they have done much to recreate its hominess. Now in the Terrace Room at Wymilwood (150 Charles St. West), it features candle-lit tables, a warm fire, and refreshments that include exotic teas and pastries, and an inexpensive but well-chosen wine list. Sernyk tells me that even the house red wine is French.

It's a good idea. Let's hope the club is around for a while.

The club opens for the first time this Friday.

theatre

You've got tonight and tomorrow night left to see the two current U of T productions: Reaney's The Killdeer at Hart House (student tickets, $1.50) and Abe Kobo's Friends at the UC Playhouse (FREE).

This Monday at 4:15 pm, a memorial reading from Shaw's Saint Joan will be held at Hart House Theatre. The reading is in memory of Robert Gill, the director at Hart House for twenty years, who died during the summer. St. Joan was the first play Gill produced at Hart House. Taking part will be many of the original cast, William Hutt, Eric House, Leon Major, among them.

There are a few openings in the next week. The first show at the New Colonial Cabaret Theatre (at the Colonial Tavern on Yonge just above Queen), is One More Time directed by Roderick "Oh Coward" Cook.

That's next Tuesday. Tonight it's Hello and Goodbye, at the Central Library, (Performing Theatre Company), Wednesday, The Collected Works of Billy the Kid, at the Toronto Free Theatre.

See the reviews in this issue for plays that opened this week: As You Like It, Jubalay, Wu-Feng, Them Donnellys, Come Blow Your Horn, What Glorious Times They Had, and Lemon Sky.

Aes Wild is at Seneca College, this weekend and next.

Don't forget the Multi-Cultural Theatre, whose annual offering gets underway this weekend at the St. Lawrence Centre.

In fairness to concert-goers who want to plan ahead, I'll try to list all the concerts planned for the next month or so.

At Convocation Hall SAC and SRO have Fairport Convention on Oct. 27, Rory Gallagher on Nov. 8, the Eleventh House with Larry Coryell on Nov. 17, and Renaissance on Nov. 29.

Tickets for U of T students are available at reduced prices in the SAC office.

At Massey Hall Bruce Cockburn starts things off on Oct. 31. SRO presents the Climax Blues Band with Hudson & Ford on Nov. 3, and Arlo Guthrie on Nov. 12. Martin Ornot offers the Electric Light Orchestra on Nov. 10, Billy Joel on Nov. 20, and Bill Cosby on Nov. 21.

Seneca College, Weather Report on Nov. 3, Elton John at the Gardens Nov. 18, and Donovan is at Massey Hall, Dec. 2.

Featured at clubs in the next little while are many acts worth catching. At the El Mocambo there's the James Cotton Blues Band until Saturday, a Mainline reunion Oct. 28-30 and the James Montgomery Blues Band Oct. 31-Nov. 2.

At the Chinney, La Troupe Grotesque entertains thru Saturday with McLean & McLean coming in next week. At Egerton's, New Potatoes is featured thru Saturday, with the amazing Don Potter with friends Rob Galbraith & Michael Bacon coming in Monday for a week's stand.

Tomorrow is the first chance for everyone to see the new Art Gallery of Ontario in all its glory. At ten o'clock the doors swing open and one hour later sculptor Henry Moore and other luminaries preside over official rites of ceremony. Guides will be on hand as well as artists demonstrating their work. Musicians and magicians will add to the general uproar. Don't miss it.

While you're there (corner of Dundas and Beverley) be sure to visit the new Pascal Gallery and the fabulous Willem de Kooning show at the Pollock Gallery across the street (see review page 8). Also there are at least three Henry Moore showings in and around Yorkville, another part of Toronto's love affair with this remarkable man. Drawings and small sculpture can be seen at the Marlborough-Godard, Albert White and Kar galleries.

My apologies to those who were looking for this column last week; it was bumped for an ad. Well... that's show biz.

The Toronto Symphony has its 74-75 series well under way. This Tuesday and Wednesday, Kazimirz Kord takes the musicians through their paces with Clifford Ford's "Suite for Orchestra", Strauss' "Hero's Life" and the Chopin Piano Concerto no. 1, with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Tickets $3-9, check around 7 pm for $2 rush tickets.

Who doesn't love Chopin? People who aren't necrophiliacs, I suppose. After all, he is dead. 125 years ago, as it turns out, so the newly formed Frederic Chopin Foundation of Toronto is running a seminar for all those who love his music tomorrow morning at the Faculty of Music.

If you're up to the location, check out a performance of Chopin's music at the Royal York Hotel by the young Canadian pianist Arthur Rowe. The press release I have here says that the concert will be followed by a black tie reception for the announcement of a scholarship fund for young Canadian pianists.

Next Thursday night, the Purcell Quartet gives the second concert in the St. Lawrence Centre's Connoisseur Series. It should be called the Unavailable Series, since every seat is sold out. Try the scalpers.

And here's the plum of the week: Everybody's Favourite Small Orchestra comes back to Hart House for the second concert of its series. The New Chamber Orchestra of Canada has a program of Handel, Purcell, Holst, Bridge and Britten lined up for the lucky 800 who will get in. This group is super-popular, so go very early if you don't have your tickets already.

Memo to Bill Phillips, director of the Orchestra: how about helium balloons? The overflow crowd could easily be accommodated in the Great Hall's commodious roof area.

Or, you might try second concert.

Contest time: I received quite a few replies to the Beethoven contest (that's whose symphonies they were, Slow Thinkers!), but nobody has got the Stravinsky riddle yet. I'll increase the prize to two records for the first right answer to that one. In the meantime... why didn't Gustav Mahler write any operas? There's a prize for the first right answer (please mark the date and time on the envelope) and a prize for the single funniest answer. This one isn't too hard, so give it a try.

NUS launches campaign to increase student aid

SASKATOON (CUP) — The National Union of Students (NUS) has decided to launch a campus-directed campaign on student aid in Canada.

At a three-day conference held in Saskatoon Oct. 11-14, the 60 NUS delegates discussed the possibility of a "student campaign."

The campaign's purpose is to increase the student loan and grant ceilings in order to make a university education more accessible to the poor sections of the Canadian population.

It was decided that this year's campaign should be more campus orientated since each institution would want to handle its campaign in different ways.

CAMPAIGN

NUS also wants campaigning to take place on all campuses in Canada, not just the 23 post-secondary institutions that belong to NUS. With a Canada-wide, all-campus campaign, all students will benefit and NUS will prove to be the voice of all students, it was argued.

Specific suggestions for the campaign included informational pamphlets, posters, public debates, setting up campus committees, and student press coverage.

Most of the delegates agreed there was a need for a grass roots approach — discovering what the students felt — and that information should be exchanged between campuses on the student aid campaign and student response.

A lobby campaign conducted in the past few months by the central committee of NUS was felt to be only partially successful. The lobby consisted of letter-writing and presenting briefs to government officials asking that students be allowed to deduct student fees and educational materials from income tax and that students be granted an increased deduction for the cost of living allowances.

NUS and the two national student unions that preceded it, NFCUS (National Federation of Canadian University Students) and CUS (Canadian Union of Students) were and are concerned with the problems of student financial aid.

RESPONSIBLE

CUS was partly responsible for the implementation of the Canada Student Loans Program (CSLP).

However, the CSLP is unsatisfactory in many ways and NUS, with its campaign, hopes to have changes made. Their main desire is to have financial aid programs standardized across the country.

This would require federal administration of the CSLP instead of the current ten provincial administered programs. Standardization of the CSLP would hopefully eliminate regional disparity.

A motion was passed calling for increased student aid, via additional grants — not loans, thus reducing students' total liability for educational debts and encouraging students from lower class backgrounds to attend university without fear of huge debts to pay back after graduation.

Other motions passed included: reducing the age of independence to 18 for student loans; tying the student aid program to a cost-of-living index; subsidizing the interest rates on student loans and making part-time students eligible for student loans.

Housing campaign begun

SASKATOON (CUP) — The National Union of Students (NUS) has begun efforts to provide students with better housing.

The NUS standing committee on housing met Oct. 12 in Saskatoon and mapped out a campaign to obtain federal government housing funds for students and other low income groups.

A meeting was set for January with the Ontario Federation of Students to consolidate students' positions on housing. Participants will contribute specific data and points of view from their campuses and communities.

Much of the data will be sent to a team of students at Dalhousie University during the next few weeks. This information, including numbers of students living off campus, percentage of out of town students and vacancy rates will appear in a report written by the Dalhousie students.

Meanwhile NUS members will make contact with other low income groups in their area with the intention of setting up a joint housing conference.

The housing committee's long-term plan is for these combined interest groups to make a joint appeal to government agencies for housing funds.

"Housing is not a problem for students alone," said Sidney Shugarman, Alberta NUS representative. "It is a problem for native people, unemployed people, single parent families, nearly all young people, and nearly everyone in the vast areas of this country that are economically depressed," he said.

"All of these people are unable to get adequate housing. If we work together in demanding that a share of corporate profits be used to provide adequate housing we can win."

We know it took a lot to get where you are today.
With us, you'll get the opportunity to get where you want tomorrow.

We're Northern Electric and we'd like to talk to engineering, finance and accounting graduates.

You may already know something about us — we're a large Canadian-owned telecommunications manufacturer. But as a prospective employer, we know you need to know a lot more about us. How big are we? What's our growth story? How do we treat people? How about salaries?

Soon we'll have Northern Electric people on campus who'll be able to answer all your questions in detail. But to help you decide if such a get-together would be advantageous, we will tell you this: we're big, over 27,000 employees in five countries; we're growing fast (in fact, we're one of the largest and fastest growing telecommunications manufacturers in the world!). Last year we opened or began work on nine new plants. We've just chalked up a half-year record sales and record profits. But, as booming as we are, we know we've just touched the surface. There's a whole world waiting for better means of communication.

So we need ambitious engineers who can be as creative with telecommunications technology as our sales people are with market development — and finance and accounting people whose expertise with money can match our scientists' talent for discovery.

Of course, our standards are high. But then, so are the financial rewards and career securities for graduates who can help us achieve our goals. If what we can offer appears to match what you want, talk to your Campus Placement Officer — he'll arrange that we get together.

Mayoral hopeful for Montreal party

MONTREAL (CUP) — Jacques Couture has been chosen as the mayoral candidate of the Montreal Citizens' Movement (MCM). He faces the incumbent mayor Jean Drapeau in the upcoming November municipal elections.

Couture, a Jesuit priest and long-time organizer in working class areas said he isn't trying to reach the city's bankers but "the small worker and ethnic groups."

He accused Drapeau of being an autocrat and said that the Civic Party councillors, who hold all the civic seats in Montreal, were "marionettes" and "yes-men." He pointed out that Drapeau had admitted he didn't want dissidents in his party for the next four years.

Couture cited the case of one Civic Party councillor who in the past four years voted against eight of four thousand motions presented by Drapeau and was expelled from the party caucus.

To those who are nostalgic about the reforming Jean Drapeau of 1954, Couture said, "He does not exist. He has changed."

Couture attacked the present administration for letting speculators and developers turn Montreal into "New York City, P.Q." He offered Bologna, Italy as an example of what could be done instead.

In Bologna, for example, public transportation is free for the three hours a day that workers are going to and from work. He also pointed out that in Bologna, 40 per cent of the budget goes towards social and cultural purpose, compared to less than 20 per cent in Montreal.

In reply to those who praise Drapeau as a great administrator, Couture talked about the deterioration of municipal services like transportation and fire prevention.

Couture said it is disgraceful to force welfare recipients, who hardly have enough to live on, to put aside money to pay the water tax at the end of the year. He said the MCM will abolish the water tax if it is elected.

He reminded people that Drapeau did not impose a water tax but that in 1971 he increased the water tax by 50 per cent.

Council agrees to aid MCM

MONTREAL (CUP) — The Students' Society Council at McGill University has agreed to give financial aid to the Montreal Citizen's Movement (MCM).

The MCM is a group trying to unseat Mayor Jean Drapeau's city government in the Nov. 10 municipal elections.

The council is also considering rescinding a bylaw prohibiting campus and religious groups from submitting budgets to council.

At the Council meeting a grant for $400 was passed to cover typesetting costs for the MCM campaign in St. Louis. In proposing the donation of this money to the MCM, external vice-president Michel Celemenski said, "If the MCM gets elected, it could mean a stronger voice for McGill students living in this community."

Although students' society grants have been available to political and religious groups on campus for specific activities, the by-law passed last year, denied these groups access to regular budgets.

Law representative Gaston Jorre said the bylaw may be unconstitutional. Nowhere in the constitution does it state that certain groups, including those of a political or religious nature, are to be treated differently from other campus organizations, said Jorre.

Women's athletics is poor cousin to Men's athletics

LETHBRIDGE (CUP) — "Sports may be good for people, but they are considered a lot better for males' than for females."

Jane Schwindt, a third-year physical education student at the University of Lethbridge, outlined women's role in sports from ancient Greece to the present day at a public forum in the Lethbridge Public Library.

Her talk on "Women in Sports" was part of a continuing series of lectures on "Women in Society" presented by the Women's Place in Lethbridge.

Schwindt said women created their own program of sports, the Heraea Games in honor of Hera, wife of Zeus, because women were barred from participating in or even observing the Olympic Games.

But only in the last 50 years, with the emancipation of women from some home responsibilities, have women begun to take a prominent role in sports, she said.

Despite a woman's interest in sports, and "no matter what her age, race, education, talent, residence or riches, the female in sport is discriminated against. The funds, facilities, coaching, rewards, and honors allotted to women are grossly inferior to those granted to men," Schwindt said.

The process of discouragement begins when young girls are taught to be ladylike and play with dolls and continues in high school when "girls are expected to be cheerleaders—sitting back and idolizing the boys as they become more physically fit while they retain their feminine inactivity."

At the college and university level, women get poor practice hours, equipment and coaching, she said.

At the University of British Columbia $5 of the student fee is allotted to sports of which $800 goes to women's athletics and $4.20 to male athletics. At the University of Lethbridge, $10,000 was put into starting a men's hockey team but a new women's sport program was not even considered.

One argument used against female athletes is that they don't play well enough to deserve athletic equality, and there is no point in wasting money, gyms, fields and coaching on them.

But, Schwindt said, "it's hard to say how good female athletes might be if they were offered athletic facilities, support and encouragement even roughly comparable to what men receive."

A double standard is apparent, she said, in that administrators argue sport is essentially educational to develop character, attitude, and good citizenship. "It's not important whether you win or lose but how you play the game" prevails, yet female athletes are discriminated against because they don't draw the gate receipts and therefore don't deserve the time and training males receive.

A final argument is that girls are just not interested in sports. The answer, Schwindt said, is that "in many cases there is never any opportunity for a girl to play a team sport—in grade school, junior high or public recreation league, the girls' coach is usually a teacher who never was involved in sports and girls' participation in sport receives little if any publicity."

Despite all these facts, Schwindt said, women still participate in sports, and some encouragement is forthcoming from places like Iowa where innovative programs for female athletes are meeting with great success.

Schwindt said discrimination against women in sports could be alleviated if: young girls are encouraged in home and school to become physically active; if communities demand that sports money and facilities are equally allotted to male and female sports; if local media encourage women's sport by fair and adequate coverage despite its current low level of spectator attraction; and if female coaches get the same training male coaches receive.

She said more athletic heroines will be discovered when women's sports are better covered by the press. Young girls would then have more "role models" and not see the female athletes as freaks.

Sports media representatives in the audience said the public only wants to hear about well-attended spectator sports and it wasn't the media's role to push what the public didn't want to hear.

Audience members disagreed, saying the media should be innovative in changing the image of sportswomen, and by giving adequate coverage to an area of sport largely neglected or treated unfairly.

MR. DARKROOM

Over the years that I have been conducting darkroom printing sessions, first in black and white and now in colour I have stressed to the audiences that darkroom work is not only a rewarding hobby but is easy and fun. This three letter word was used in two of our show slogans: "Taking Pictures is Half the Fun - Making Prints is Twice the Fun", and the current one "Let's Turn out the Lights and Have Some Fun - with our Durst Enlarger".

People who are fascinated watching a print being processed and express amazement at the equipment used would do well to compare the first steps to a photographic process they themselves may well have done many times - the projection of a slide or movie film onto a screen. If you look at an enlarger, used to produce prints of varying sizes from a negative, it has precisely the same make-up as a projector. A lamp to provide illumination, condensers to intensify the light, a carrier to hold the film in place while enlarging. Projectors do their work in a horizontal position, while most enlargers are vertical, but the operation is identical. The farther the projector from the screen, the larger the projected image.

The enlarger works in exactly the same manner, with the image arriving at an easel. Instead of being viewed, the image is burned into a piece of sensitized paper which then goes through chemical baths under "safe" light conditions and after being dried is a finished print, ready for your wallet or album. So, even if you have never seen a darkroom door from the outside, you have gone through the fundamental steps when you showed your slides to friends.

The second 'stumbling block' to many is the fear of expense involved with photographic printing. A darkroom need be neither fancy, nor expensive, the most important factor is that it is functional, having the necessary equipment to do the type of work required. Great strides have been made recently in colour printing. Trays are no longer required and all processing is done on a countertop in a small drum that is rolled back and forth to provide proper agitation. This system also eliminates complicated temperature controls and is most efficient from a point of time and economy of chemistry.

Many apartment dwellers have designed portable bench-tops for both tubs on which to do their work. This is an ideal situation, being close to running water, and a room that requires a minimum of lightproofing. Equipment costs can range considerably, depending on your needs and budget. Good equipment is a good investment as product quality will determine the efficiency and durability of most major items. Photographic printing is a matter of gaining experience, and the best equipment will not automatically improve a mediocre darkroom man. However, look for an enlarger that offers lifetime durability and avoid frills that really give no true assistance to printing. Durst is such an enlarger.

When selecting darkroom accessories consider the famous Paterson products from Great Britain. They are the result of design experience and proving in actual working conditions. This broad range of darkroom equipment utilizes the advantages of plastics in the production of 'designed for the user' items.

Interfac F-ball records upsets

By MRS. PARKER
Interfac football was shocked with two upsets this week.

SMC defeated the previously invincible Phys-Ed 11-6. St. Mike's points came on a touchdown by Buckley and a field goal by Liscio. Liscio also contributed a pair of points on missed field goal attempts.

PHE managed only one major score on a run by jock quarterback Nedoshenko. The touchdown went unconverted.

The win by the Mikes puts the squeeze on Eng for the last playoff spot in the first division.

The plumbers on the other hand were on the winning end of a two game default by Vic yesterday as Vic claim they thought the game was to be played at 3:00 p.m. rather than the 2:00 p.m. time arranged by the Intramural Sports Committee at their last meeting.

Regular readers will remember that not only was the last meeting of the season between Eng and Vic to be played but also the replay of the portion of their previous game that was protested by the plumbers.

A special meeting of the ISC has been called to decide the course of action to be taken in view of the default by Vic.

If Vic was the victim of a misunderstanding then the imposition of a two-game default would be unnecessarily harsh.

VARSITY SPORTS SPECIAL

By DAVE STUART

Tomorrow, the only two undefeated teams in the O-QFC square-off at the stadium for what has been billed as the Yates Cup game.

Varsity lays its six-in-a-row win streak on the line against the University of Western Ontario Mustang's five wins and a tie.

The Mustangs lead the western division with 11 points while Toronto head the eastern division with 12 points.

Western is ahead of the Blues in passing this year. The Mustangs have amassed 1,366 yards on an impressive 61.5 per cent passing average while the Blues total 1,195 yards with a 54.6 per cent average.

Blues' defensive backfield, including such notables as Doug Ball and Rick Nakatsu, has tightened up considerably since last year and should be able to handle Mike Fess' passing.

Varsity will have to key on Mustangs' Curt Rush who currently leads the western division receivers with 29 catches; one for 96 yards.

Rushing on the other hand is a whole different story. Toronto has pushed the ball along the ground for 1,731 yards while Western is 700 yards behind with only 1,074.

Western's main ground threat is Bud Wilson who has lugged the ball 83 times for 385 yards and three touchdowns.

No doubt the 'Stangs will be looking for the blue jersey bearing No. 24. Mark Bragagnolo is on top of the league with 911 yards on 114 carries and 11 touchdowns.

Bragagnolo could easily break 1,000 yards against Western as well as tie or break the record for the most touchdowns for a season. The record is held by former Blue Cor Doret with 13 TD's.

Catillo and Kwiatkowski also carry the ball with authority when called upon.

Brent Elsey and Mark Ackley have contributed eight major between them. They have each hauled in 19 passes for 350 yards.

Blues fans should be wary of the statistical superiority that the Blues hold over Western. Loyal supporters will remember that Varsity had the better team last year but were humiliated by Western.

Last year's Western game however was played in abominable conditions with linesmen who were unable to block effectively. As pointed out in the Varsity earlier this year Varsity's offensive line is about 25 pounds heavier per man.

Their performance this year speaks for itself. Names like Nicoletti, Rosborough and Wright, as well as Dawson and Sokovnin are not well known; they only make the holes for the running backs and provide the protection Langley and Brencley need to complete passes.

Without them the Blues would not succeed in any game.

Toronto also boasts one of the best place kickers in the league. Don Wright has six field goals and 20 converts to his credit for fourth place in the eastern scoring race. Wright also shares the glory for the longest kickoff of the year for 80 yards. He tied with Dave Pegg of Windsor.

Toronto does not need the win as they have already locked up first place in the east by virtue of their win over Ottawa early in the season.

The playoffs start next Saturday at the stadium when the Blues host the fourth place team in a quarter final. Loyola and Carleton will play this weekend for the right to play Varsity next week. Both teams are tied with identical 2-4 records.

Carleton faces Ottawa and Loyola meets Laurier. Not much to choose there.

Bragagnolo leads the way for a 32-9 triumph over Queen's at the stadium.

The Varsity — Brian Pei

At CNE stadium Blues fought hard for their victory over the York Yoemen.

That's right, on Friday we will run a full page of letters from all you people who absolutely loathe the paper, but who have found no better place to express your frustration than the faculty washroom wall. More gripes at library

By TOM GERRY
U of T administrators have agreed to meet with representatives of Roberts Library workers to consider reopening contract negotiations for a cost-of-living allowance. The executive of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), local 1230—the library workers' local—has called a general meeting for 4.30 today to publicize details of the union and management positions. Officials of the library workers' union will meet with U of T's manager of management labour relations, John Parker, to discuss the reopening of contract talks.

the seriousness and urgency of the library workers' demands. The proposal, failed because half of the members felt there was no need for a demonstration before the Nov. 5 talks. A demonstration would be appropriate if the administration rejects the union's request for reopening negotiations, executive members concluded. Library union president Tom Bribriesco is urging other university organizations to support the union's demands. The U of T Graduate Assistants' Association, Bribriesco noted, is currently involved in a similar struggle with the university's administration.

"The question of reopening is unusual because the library workers' contract is legally binding until June 30, 1975," Parker said in an interview. "I would act as the bargainer if so instructed by the university's vice-president of business affairs," Parker added.

The library workers' present contract, signed Dec. 5, 1973 and a retroactively effective from July 1, 1973, includes a 19.2 per cent wage increase over their previous contract.

However, according to recent statistics released by the Consumer Price Review Board, the consumer price index rose 20.4 per cent from June, 1973 to June, 1974.

Union spokesman Jim Mayor said the demand for a $1,100 cost-of-living allowance, payable at the end of October, is "only intended to protect the contract's increase."

Library workers now receive from $5,771 a year for a library technician 2, to $10,953 for a library technician 6. The average wage is about $7,200. The union is also demanding its contract be altered to institute a cost-of-living review every three months.

This review would allow the automatic reopening of contract negotiations to help workers cope with increases in the cost of living.

In meetings last Wednesday and Friday the union executive considered organizing a demonstration Nov. 4 to show the administration

This CAR is not for racing

About 150 people attending a Saturday conference voted to found a Toronto Committee Against Racism (CAR) for a united effort to fight racism in all its forms.

The conference, according to U of T French professor Peter Fitting was "quite successful" with a wide representation of people from inside and outside the university.

CAR is an international organization with chapters in more than 30 cities in Canada and the United States. Action sub-committees were formed based on workshop discussions to plan strategy in key areas such as immigration, education, workman's compensation, and medicine.

Fitting said the conference was much better than he expected. "It didn't fall into the usual rhetoric."

The keynote speaker was Finley Campbell the head of the Afro-American studies department at Wisconsin university and co-chairman of the international Committee Against Racism, who was at U of T during the summer to testify at the Caput trial.

The group's plenary session was also addressed by a spokesman for the Montreal Haitians who are now facing deportation. The conference agreed to support their petition campaign and organize a demonstration in Toronto.

Chaired by Ed Clarke of the National Black Coalition of Canada, the conference also made plans to meet again to set up a formalized structure. Until now planning has been done by an ad-hoc group.

U of T still serves scab grapes, lettuce

Library workers are demanding a $1,100 cost-of-living allowance.

By MIKE EDWARDS
The food service on the downtown U of T campus is not only of questionable value; it is also quite scabby. In spite of support from a wide ranging collection of groups and individuals for the United Farmworkers boycott campaign, most cafeterias are buying scab lettuce. California scab grapes are served with a blush at Massey College and the U of T Faculty Association Club. The Graduate Students' Union and Innis college had the only "clean" snackbars visited in a campus tour last Friday.

chefs would blame their suppliers who were disregarding requests to buy non-boycott produce. In general, substitutes are hard to find but not impossible, they agree. King-pin and Eagle-eye brands are the only west coast lettuce that isn't being boycotted. The Huron Groceteria (Wilma's) stocks New Jersey lettuce. The chef at Trinity College, an employee of Beaver foods, is considering New Orleans leaf lettuce.

Members of the UFW boycott campaign discovered during the tour a receptive mood on the part of food service managers. However most managers were not paying too much attention to the boycott and were content to pass the buck onto their suppliers and or the customers.

"I don't know, we just order from Fred's," said the manager at the University College refectory. Chef Victor at Massey College was angry at the UFW student representatives for not having a real job.

He claimed to have visited California and implied that the boycott leaders were telling lies. He denounced the farmworkers for wanting "something for nothing." Chef Marcel at the faculty club was sympathetic to the union demands but wanted to wait for word from the management before joining the boycott.

Hart House had adopted a policy of supporting the boycott last spring and its manager has assured SAC that only Ontario lettuce was being bought.

But when the boycotters visited the kitchen Friday, they found boxes marked "California" and "Arizona." "What would the students say?" argued the Hart House director. In most cases, food directors and

U of T grad contests Ward 8 seat

Steve Martino, who graduated from U of T last year in urban planning, is running for alderman in Ward 8 in the upcoming elections.

Martino is running as a "reform" candidate in the east end ward, contesting positions now held by "old guard" aldermen Fred Beavis and Tom Clifford.

Both Martino and unsuccessful 1972 "reform" candidate Dallard Runge are trying to oust Beavis and Clifford. In the last election Martino worked for Runge.

Ward 8 has been one of the toughest areas for reformers to gain ground, bounded by Coxwell on the east, Lake Ontario on the south, Logan on the west and the city limits on the north.

Martino is running because he feels Clifford and Beavis have "taken the people for granted," voting consistently against residents groups and for developers.

As an example of how they neglected their work in the ward, Martino said Dan Heap, the ward 6 alderman, has done all the work on one of the ward's most important problems—the Canada Metals lead pollution issue.

Martino said there should be fast their inaction in the battle to stop the Scarborough Expressway which would have destroyed a number of Ward 8 homes.

He feels the controversial 45 foot height by-law is not an issue; it's just a matter of a freeze until better planning guidelines can be worked out.

Martino plans a modest campaign, relying on canvassing and leafletting to get his message across. He has already raised $700 for his campaign and is relying on area friends and university students from Toronto and York to help.

Although he doesn't predict a win, Martino stressed that he is providing a second reform candidate for people to support.

Fellow candidate Dallard Runge has endorsed his campaign, as have a number of U of T professors active in city politics.

Although he has not been active in area ratepayer groups because of the pressure of holding part-time jobs and going to university, Martino said he expects a fair amount of support.

"The ward isn't getting the attention it deserves from the present aldermen," he said.

action to close down the east end lead polluter. "They've been debating it for two years. There are still two kids on my street suffering from lead poisoning." Martino also said he opposed a proposed $3,000 pay increase for aldermen. "Working people have to pay for these increases," he said. A strong believer in better public transportation, Martino also attacked the present aldermen for

U of T act repealed: thousands riot in streets

TORONTO — Usually reliable sources at Queen's Park today disclosed that the University of Toronto Act has been repealed, thus making the existence of the university questionable.

John Evans, questioned at his office today, as he was cleaning out his desk, replied:

"Yes, I will be at the unemployment office in the morning. We have to live too you know," he said.

Evans is expected to go back into private practice as a chiropractor at OHIP's expense.

David Simmonds, Varsity managing editor, is ecstatic about the development.

"This is the best story we have had this year," he grinned with a glassy look in his eye. The interview with him had to be curtailed as he ran off muttering something about having to call the plant.

Admissions problems needs urgent solution

Today's feature article (see page six) lays its finger on a problem which, according to the dean of Arts and Science, is "tearing the faculty apart."

The article documents the incredible increase in the number of applicants for medical school, and focuses on the problem of admissions criteria and premedical training. A future article will analyze the problem from the standpoint of government and university planning.

The article shows that not only do hundreds of qualified applicants meet rejection, but that they find themselves with nowhere to turn having taken courses not for the training, but for the marks.

The whole process seems something of a desperate gamble. Students take peripheral courses to gain high marks, but unless those marks are exceptionally high, they wind up not only out of medical school, but also without any systematic formal training at all.

Something must be done quickly. Hundreds of careers are being ruined in the present application process.

One suggestion, to turn applications into a lottery above a certain minimum grade, would take the pressure off high achievement, allow pre-medical students to appreciate their training, and take the competitive edge off what should be individual academic inquiry.

Another, even better suggestion involves internship, which would move the process of medical admission away from achievement and towards dedication, something which is infinitely preferable.

However, the competition to gain entry into medicine seems likely to proliferate as long as the medical profession remains the bastion of a highly salaried few: for therein lies its mass attractiveness. Only by tightly guarding entry can the profession guarantee its worth.

The whole problem of medical training is not going to be solved by making the admissions system more equitable, although that would be a help. There needs to be a wider examination of the role of medicine in society, and a tighter control over the standards the profession itself employs.

For now, however, the U of T could best concentrate on the incredible human wastage it encounters every year in the mad scramble to make it into medicine.

Colleagues supports chairman

Wednesday's Varsity included a letter to the editor (inflated to article status) from two disgruntled ex-graduate students, which severely criticized the Chairman of the Department of Architecture. The headline given the article, by repeating the authors' condemning adjectives without even the courtesy of quotation marks, lends unwarranted (and unjustifiable) weight to their personal observations.

The future of the Department of Architecture and its presently associated Departments, has properly been a matter for Varsity concern over the past month and the status given to the graduates' letter is no doubt a result of this publicity. What is particularly disconcerting is that the way in which the letter was handled seems to indicate the sort of unprincipled keep-the-story-going-at-any-cost journalism—characteristic of the worst newspapers.

The most important question is WHAT NOW? Should the letter be ignored as unworthy of comment? Should the half-truths and vituperative remarks of the letter be answered point by point? Should those who believe in Peter Prangnell's qualities as person, teacher and chairman (and there are a great many) try to balance the public scales by letters of their own? (pointing out, for example, that this "dictator" has been centrally responsible for a number of the most innovative and democratic moves on this campus—including student parity in Department Council and Committees). Should official response be made by the Department or the Faculty or the Students' Union? Will Varsity encourage others with personal gripes against the Chairman to vent them in its pages, and so promote further responses from Peter Prangnell's friends and supporters?

The sort of prominence given the original letter unfortunately raises doubts about Varsity's motives. All of us must now be suspicious that the newspaper is more interested in promoting some titillating controversy than it is in fairness, serious comment and respect for individuals. If this is true I would not wish the whole shabby enterprise to be dignified by lengthy and serious follow-up. However, the very least that must be said is that there are a large number of people—teachers, students and members of the Architectural profession, who regard Peter Prangnell as an especially talented teacher and critic, and a worthy chairman. It is very sad that these two students have so evidently been unable to capitalize upon their brief association with him.

Jeff Stinson
 Associate Chairman
 Department of architecture

(The Varsity does not wish to convey the impression it either condoned the letter that was printed, or that it is waging a personal campaign against the chairman of the department.)

The paper is intended, in part to be a forum for debate on campus; our motives in printing the letter were only those of facilitating debate surrounding the faculty of architecture—ed.)

Authors act like "divas"

A reply to Sotiris Papadopoulos and Azad Zavin's letter to the Varsity October 23, 1974.

a) The writers clearly point out Prangnell and Hertzberger's predicament with the statement "she continued perpetual argument"—in a talk directed to first year students by a man not particularly interested in dealing ad nauseum with a question most satisfactorily answered in the first minute of discussion.

b) Those who are not students here cannot appreciate the degree of emotional involvement with the subject of architecture. Inherent in a rigorous emotional dialogue is the use of direct, tough language. We do not play word games or beat around bushes.

c) Peter Prangnell does not monopolize the architectural thought in this school, but is just one voice of many. If the students do not have the gumption to look elsewhere in the school or develop cogent responses of their own, it reflects poorly on themselves, not the Chairman.

Those who know and love this school learn not only architecture. They develop strength of will and courage of conviction. It is obvious and saddening that Sotiris Papadopoulos and Azad Zavin never did develop these attributes here, or they would not remain themselves bitter primadonnas.

Unfair example

I was very much surprised to find that I had been mentioned in a letter written by S. Papadopoulos and A. Zavin, published in The Varsity of Oct. 23 ("Department of Architecture: the egopathic, totalitarian chairman").

The writers referred to a recent lecture by Herman Hertzberger and the following discussion period in which, it's true, department chairman Peter Prangnell was sarcastic and did try to cut off my questioning.

But that's not the whole story. I had come late to the lecture; I didn't realize that Hertzberger had been teaching and lecturing almost non-stop since his arrival from Holland and was very tired, and my questions may well have been off-topic and naive.

In any case, Hertzberger took the time to discuss my questions, which was what most interested me, and after the lecture, Peter Prangnell apologized and explained to me why he had wanted to cut short the discussion period.

The whole incident was quite insignificant. Certainly it provides no basis for a condemnation of the department of Architecture's chairman. I am not well acquainted with Peter Prangnell. But I am tremendously impressed by the University of Toronto School of Architecture, and much of what is unique and outstanding in its program has been initiated by this man.

I feel that this whole issue has been overblown, and I resent being used as an example to justify somebody else's grievances.

Another pub open

In reference to the article on the SAC proposal for a pub on campus, I would like to point out that in addition to the Erindale pub, there is another one right on the main campus, immediately west of the Textbook Store. Although the pub is operated mainly for graduate students, anyone affiliated with the university.

Racism increase alarming

SAC's refusal to support the overturning of the suspensions against Bill Schabas and Tony Leah, two members of SDS who participated in the action to stop Edward Banfield from speaking last year, tends to give legitimacy to such trial showboies as the CAPUT—a body composed entirely of university administrators.

SAC is merely bowing down to liberal sentiment in refusing to defend the rights of the left simply because the Banfield incident "offended" a number of people. They mystify the university administration and give credibility to this blatant act of repression in supporting the CAPUT's decision.

The university, after all, is an institution which chiefly serves to uphold the unequal social relations in society and continue the promotion of bourgeois ideology. By necessity the knowledge produced at university reinforces the needs of our economic and social system, which is based on the exploitation of working people.

Thus, when SAC suggests that students should participate on the major bodies of the university it is asking them to condone the anarchy and the inequality of this society. Students cannot be held responsible for its appalling decay. Had they had representation on the trial body which dealt with Schabas and Leah they would only have served the interests of the university administration and participated in the repression of their fellow students. We must defend our rights against the university at all costs.

The issue around the Banfield affair was not one of not allowing free speech, for in this society freedom is available only to those forces which have power. Those who support the right of the dissemination of racist, sexist and anti-working class ideas have learned nothing from history. We

In many respects racism and discrimination against immigrants in Canada is increasing at an alarming rate. Government spokesmen have been pushing the idea that immigrants are the cause of Canada's economic problems, and discriminatory practices against minorities are in effect in many institutions and agencies and are being put into effect in many others:

1. Immigration policy is becoming more openly racist;
2. Myths of inferiority of minorities are used by Workmen's Compensation Board officials to justify cutting payments to injured workers;
3. The courts and the police exhibit great hostility towards minority groups;
3. Racist "scholarship" is widely publicized as objective research;
5. The institution of racial and national qualifications for entry into the University of Toronto medical school is being seriously considered.

The above list is merely representative: racial discrimination is becoming very widespread in Toronto.

To combat this growing racism, a number of Torontonians are to form a chapter of the Committee Against Racism in Vancouver. We urge faculty and students of this University to join with us.

Star rejects reply

commodation market by the use of capricious, often inaccessible, and constantly changing criteria of "acceptability" which apply only to gay people.

The Star claims to support the rights of gay people in employment. But when City Council voted to ban discrimination against gay people in city employment a year ago, the Star refused to print the story.

The Star claims to support 'full civil rights' for gay people. But when 100 men and women marched through the streets of this city in August, and demonstrated before the legislature to protest the constant violation of their rights, the Star chose not to report the story.

Finally, we are told that "the Star has no ban on news concerning homosexuals." Are we to believe that the City Council's enactment, the first legislative protections ever extended to gay people in Canada, was "of marginal public interest?"

We believe that upon examination of the evidence, any fair-minded person would conclude that the Star has taken an active part in the suppression of the civil rights of gay people.

The Star sees the gay rights movement as "encouraging the spread of homosexuality." We are said to be seeking "converts," that is, we "proselytize," through "aggressive recruitment propaganda."

We have no need to "convert" anyone to homosexuality, for it is a natural component of human sexual experience, something that occurs spontaneously and comes from within the person. No book or newspaper ever changed a person's sexual preference.

However, as gay people, we find ourselves discriminated against, in a society which glorifies heterosexuality as "health" and denigrates homosexuality as perversion and disease. Therefore, we have organized ourselves to affirm and to defend the human and civil rights of every person to consensual homosexual experience, and to a positive homosexual identity. We confront blind prejudice with scientific truth. We combat discrimination with political action. To homosexual persons we say: be yourself; you have the right to be yourself. You are not sick; those who fear you and hate you are sick.

The Star has also raised the issue of child seduction. This is a red herring. Since for most people, that phrase connotes rape, and the Star intends that it should, we should like to clarify our position.

We believe that people should not be denied, simply because they are young, the rights which those happy enough to reach the age of 21 now take for granted. That is, simply put, the right to consensual sexual relations with people of either sex and of any age. We do not advocate coercion.

We are not surprised that the Star should use its editorial page for the purpose of justifying its anti-gay attitudes; in fact, we are pleased to see the newspaper finally admitting to its discriminatory policies.

Everywhere, gay people are the targets of verbal abuse—the end product of mass media catering to the worst falsehoods concerning homosexuals. The Star has done nothing to raise the public understanding of homosexuality; on the contrary, it has tried to mobilize ignorant and irrational tendencies in the public psyche in order to stifle intelligent discussion and to shore up its own prejudice. The call for reader reaction appears to be the inauguration of a witch-hunt. Already the Toronto Sun has taken up the hue and cry, insisting that it do its part too.

We conclude that the Star has published its editorial solely in order to lend an air of credibility and respectability to what is, in reality, a reactionary and bigoted attempt to smear gay people and to defeat the gay liberation movement.

The conditions stated in your covering note make it impossible to accept your letter for publication in its present form. You are entitled to your opinions, of course, but your letter contains a number of factual inaccuracies as well.

For example, you claim The Star "refused" to print a report of Toronto City Council's vote to ban discrimination against homosexuals. In fact, on September 28, 1973, we published the legislation committee's unanimous recommendation of this action.

You also claim we deliberately ignored a protest march in August. You do not say what year, but the files show that in August, 1973, we published a story about the presentation of a brief on homosexual rights to Labor Minister Fern Guidon.

This shows clearly that there is no ban here on news concerning homosexuals. In fact our library has several files of clippings. What there is and always will be is the right of the news editors to judge the relative interest of various items in each day's news.

You also say that The Star's standards for advertising acceptability are capricious, inaccessible and constantly changing, and that they apply only to homosexuals. In fact, they are easily available, their principles have been constant over the years, and they apply to all advertisers.

Although I am returning your letter with this, let it be clearly understood that The Star remains ready to consider for publication your views on our editorial and advertising policy as set forth in our October 19 editorial, subject to the normal standards we apply to letters to the editor.

IS COMPETITION

to overflowing. There was literally not an empty seat in the big lecture hall. (More than 600 students are taking Physics 110 this year.)

Key gives the impression of being a man who is interested in his work. He moves through the material confidently and clearly, but always stops to give thoughtful answers to questions. Even though the subject matter of the course is elementary, he communicates his enthusiasm for physics.

But because of the competition for marks among students in the course, he may not teach the course next year.

"The problem is," Key said, "how can I teach students when 65 percent of them don't really want to take the course? It would save me a hell of a lot of trouble if pre-med students came to my class wanting to learn physics instead of getting A's."

Competition Breeds Antagonism

The emphasis on grading leads to antagonism between students and teachers which is "inimical to the teaching process," he said. He cited the case of students in one tutorial who now have a hostile relationship with their tutor because the latter didn't raise their grades by 4 or 5 marks on a recent quiz.

"How can we teach effectively in these circumstances?" Key asked. "I get very frustrated — more and more of my time is taken up with this. The whole atmosphere is one of competition with one's neighbour. The whole system as we have to live with it is very frustrating."

Jim Prentice said there are some horror stories connected with such competition. But he seems most upset by the day-to-day attitude of non-cooperation among students.

"Sure there are horror stories," he said, "like people hoarding library books so nobody else can use them. And there's quite a bit of cheating." But Prentice said what is "really very anti-educational" about the competitive selection system is displayed by cases in which students refuse to lend lecture notes to fellow students, or refuse to discuss problem sets. And, he said, the system of admission to medical school is "the biggest incentive to competition."

This numbers game also has a disastrous effect on the future careers of those students (9 out of 10 who apply) who are not accepted into medical school.

If they really want to get into medical school, they must take courses in which they think they can get the highest marks. The medical-school admission system, remember, means that a student with a 91 average will be accepted before a student with a 90 average. A difference of one grade-point can be the difference between being accepted and being rejected.

Those who are not accepted find themselves with no options for the future. They cannot go on to specialize in any area, since they have systematically taken the easiest courses available to get the highest marks possible.

Conversely, if they do take the more difficult courses which might lead to a future specialization, and thus leave themselves some options, they are likely to get lower marks. And if they get lower marks, they are less likely to get into medical school.

This means that those who want to get into medical school can't really afford to cover themselves this way. They have to proceed on the assumption they're going to be accepted.

But the fact is that 9 out of 10 aren't accepted. Last year, 2,100 bright, hard-working students who didn't get accepted had effectively wasted two or three years of education.

Both Adam Smith . . .

They wasted their own time, and they wasted their own money. They wasted the time of their teachers, and they wasted the institution's money. They wasted part of themselves. Their talents have been wasted. This seems an outrageous price to pay for an admission policy based solely on academic standing.

It would be an outrageous price to pay even if the medical school was satisfied that it is the best possible system. But even they don't think it is.

To Train Healers or Businessmen

Edward Llewellyn-Thomas, associate dean of the Faculty of Medicine, is aware that "there's no correlation between marks and the ability to be a good physician."

"When you get people with a B average or better, a few marks one way or the other won't make much difference," he said.

Thomas feels the present system assumes academic grades have an evaluative accuracy they don't really possess.

"To a large extent, we're running a sort of lottery now," he said. "The difference between a 78 and an 80 in physics is not based so much on how intelligent you are, but on what the weather is like, whether you have a headache, whether you're in love or not."

He is convinced that if the top 1,000 applicants (except for 25 or 30 at the top who are "on a completely different level") were all "run through the machine again, things would come out differently."

Competition can't be eliminated, he said, but the present system "develops a competitiveness which is not healthy."

"The medical profession needs people with a strong feeling towards society as a whole. If you're training people to be free-enterprise businessmen, we've got the perfect system. But I don't think we should be training businessmen."

The present system attracts individuals with a strong competitive drive, and rewards those who compete successfully, thus reinforcing their competitive instincts. It rewards those who can successfully concentrate on their own narrow interests. It rewards those who have no use for cooperation.

Thus the present system is completely unsatisfactory for each of the groups concerned.

Teachers in the Faculty of Arts and Science find themselves with classrooms full of students who aren't really interested in the subject, but just want to get high marks. They are forced to spend

By GENE ALLEN

The odds on being admitted to one of U of T's professional faculties are getting longer and longer.

In 1970, there were 1,081 applications for 150 places at the Faculty of Law. This year, there were 2,649 applications for 158 places, an increase of almost 150 percent.

Five years ago, there were 1,200 applicants for 208 places at the Faculty of Medicine. This year, although the number of places available has increased to 240, the number of applicants has more than doubled to 2,350. J.W. Steiner, an associate dean of the medical school, says a student with a straight A average has "about a 50-50 chance of being admitted."

As the number of applicants for professional faculties increases, competition among the applicants becomes more intense.

As long as the number of applicants exceeds the number of places available, some will have to lose out. But it is increasingly felt by all parties involved — students, teachers in the Faculty of Arts and Science, and the professional schools — that the present methods of selection, based almost entirely on academic standing, are inadequate, wasteful and destructive.

Take the admission practices of U of T's medical school as an example. Faculty of Medicine literature on admission requirements explicitly states that "academic excellence is the primary selection criterion". That means that a student with an average of 89 has a substantially better chance of being accepted than a student with an average of 87.

Jim Prentice, a professor of physics, says such an emphasis on grades and competition among students "completely screws up the learning process."

In order to get the highest marks possible, students take courses which they figure are the easiest. Unfortunately, the easiest courses are usually those which do not lead to any future work in that subject area.

No Options for Meds-Students

This places pre-med students in a double-bind situation from which there is really no escape.

Here's how it happens:

Students hoping to get into U of T's medical school are advised to take one of three first-year courses offered by the physics department. Physics 130 and Physics 150 lead to further physics in later years, but Physics 110 is a terminal course, leading to no further studies in physics.

Many students assume (probably correctly) that Physics 110, aimed at students with a shallower interest in science than the other two courses, is the easiest of the three. That is, a student with the same ability and doing the same amount of work would probably get a higher mark in Physics 110 than he would in one of the other two first-year courses.

A choice like this, based on the necessity of getting the highest marks possible, has several undesirable consequences.

First, it's tremendously frustrating for teachers who are faced with the prospect of spending much of their time, not teaching, but haggling with students over one or two marks on a quiz or an assignment.

Take the example of Tony Key, an associate professor in the physics department.

One morning last week, Key's 9 am section of Physics 110 was filled almost much of their time, not teaching, but in endless hassles about one or two marks on every piece of work that is marked.

As for students, for the lucky one in ten, the system may be fine. (Although even students who have been accepted into medical school are critical of the "rat-race".) But the other ninety percent of applicants are forced into a position in which, if they are to get the high marks they need, they must take courses which leave them no other possibilities if they aren't accepted. And ninety percent have to lose out.

Finally, the medical school is not certain that a system which puts a premium on aggressive, individualistic competitiveness will attract the kinds of individuals who will make good doctors.

How can the bad effects of competition be decreased?

Possible Alternatives

Jim Prentice wrote to Dean R.B. Holmes of the Faculty of Medicine last spring to suggest two possibilities.

The first is "the selection of students by lot from a group who have achieved some reasonable minimum standard in the requisite pre-medical courses."

Under this plan, which was also suggested by the Wright Report on Post-Secondary Education, all applicants with, say, a B average or better would take part in a lottery. This approach would have the advantage of lessening the competition for grades and would also ensure that it would not necessarily be the most competitive students who became doctors.

On the other hand, Prentice wrote, "it is felt imperative to select the students on academic marks, the present situation could be alleviated by the medical faculty setting its own entrance examinations."

This approach would have the advantage of students being evaluated on the basis of their knowledge rather than on the basis of their marks. That is, a student who took a difficult physics course and got a grade of 70 might do better on such an examination than a student who took an easier course and got a grade of 90.

Of course there are objections to both these proposals. From the point of view of the medical school, it is just a substitution of students who are good at writing exams for students who are good at getting high marks, neither of which is a useful criterion for determining an individual's suitability for the medical profession. And there is no reason to assume that such a change would create a greater atmosphere of cooperation among students.

There are also objections to the lottery concept, but these are less convincing. As Dr. Llewellyn-Thomas points out, the present system contains a large element of chance.

"A number who were very hostile to the lottery concept are beginning to come over to it," he said.

Many people are shocked to learn that U of T's medical school does not conduct personal interviews with candidates. The medical faculty at MacMaster in Hamilton, for example, relies heavily on personal interviews to evaluate candidates for admission.

But there are objections to personal interviews, too.

Dr. Llewellyn-Thomas cited studies which demonstrated that when the same individual was interviewed by four different people, four completely different results were obtained. Furthermore, such a system would simply favor students "who are good actors" instead of those who are good at getting high marks. Thomas said while an interview may not give much useful information about what a candidate is really like, it does give away things like sex, race, religion, and political attitudes.

... and Charles Darwin would have approved of the principle of survival of the fittest, as it applies to the attempt to get into Medicine.

"No interviewer can be completely neutral on these matters," he said. "An interviewer who feels women have no place in medicine, for instance, might either go along with his prejudice, or might overcompensate for it. In either case, you don't have a fair selection procedure."

Behavioral Observation

Thomas proposed, as a personal suggestion, that behavioral observation over a period of time might be both more accurate and more equitable than the present system or any other proposals.

He suggested that prospective medical students might be required to undergo "a pre-medical internship". This would involve, for instance, one year working as an orderly in a hospital before admission to medical school.

Thomas said a similar system is used at present in China, where a candidate for medical school lives in a village for a year helping with health care. If, after a year, the villagers evaluate the candidate as the kind of person they would like to have as a doctor, he is admitted into medical school.

Thomas said such a system is really the only way to determine if candidates have such desirable qualities as dedication and unselfishness. He is also aware of practical barriers to such a plan, particularly that students might claim they were being required to waste a year in low-paid work.

Thomas also suggested the pre-medical internship program might be combined with a lottery. In this situation, a candidate who had done, say, two years of service instead of one, might be given two lottery chances instead of one.

Naturally, objections can be raised to any selection system. As long as some win and others lose out, there will be claims that the system is unfair.

But the present system of admissions to the medical faculty, based entirely on academic grades, is so unsatisfactory it's hard to think of a system that might be worse.

The problem assumes greater importance when considered in terms of increasing competition to get into all professional schools, not just the medical faculty. Is the undergraduate faculty of Arts and Science to become a gladiatorial arena, in which only the "fittest" can survive?

ITALY
The refusal of producers at the Italian Radio and Television Network (R.A.I.) to allow a woman editor to cover the recent flood in southern Italy has led to protests of discrimination.

R.A.I. producers declared they did not assign the woman to cover the floods in September because "a woman can not handle such a serious assignment."

In protest 15 women journalists immediately sent a telegram to the president of the Association of Radio and Television Journalists (A.G.I.R.T.) which read:

"This action, in addition to many others revolving around women's work at R.A.I., reflects the unacceptable imbalance between the actual importance of women in Italian society and their current participation in all sectors of the radio and television network.

"This blatant inequality is an offence to the dignity of women and restrains the emancipation of women in our country, breaching the dictates of the Italian Constitution."

On Oct. 1, 70 women clerical workers denounced the national network's discrimination against women in a telegram to the president of R.A.I., the president of A.G.I.R.T. and to the trade union confederation.

"The statement of our sister journalists," they wrote, "expresses similar hardships which exist among clerical workers in the network.

"We therefore fully support their position and are ready to join with them in collective action."

BRAZIL

Rio de Janeiro — Francisco Pinto, a deputy from Bahia Brazil, faces a six-month prison term for publicly protesting the official visit of Chilean junta chief Augusto Pinochet at the time of the inauguration of General Geisel, the new Brazilian dictator last March.

Pinto based his objections on widely publicized facts and criticisms of the Chilean junta which have appeared in the international press.

The federal supreme court convicted Pinto of "slandering a foreign head of state" and sentenced him to six months in prison and six-month suspension of his political rights.

Pinto, a member of the opposition party the MDB, denounced specifically the farcical courts martial and massive executions.

He also stated openly his "revulsion for the leaders who during the last two decades have crushed the peoples of Latin America."

ITALY

Workers from 11 Fiat and Fiat-affiliated factories in Italy successfully went out on strike to protest management's Oct. announcement that the hours of 65,000 workers will be reduced to 24 hours a week until January, 1975.

According to the Fiat management, each worker will lose $10 a week in wages.

The workers' response to the announced cutbacks was overwhelming in all Fiat factories, but was especially significant at Mirafiori, which is Europe's largest factory and the hardest hit by the company's plan to cut production.

Because of its large size, the factory is particularly difficult to effectively picket.

Yet by 3 am Oct. 9, large groups of strikers were already blocking every gate to the factory. By 6 am at least 2,000 strikers had gathered to guard the largest, most difficult of the factory's 100 entrances.

Although strikers from the two largest Fiat factories decided to remain at their picket lines, 20,000 workers and students in Turin joined in a militant march and rally called by the Italian trade union confederation.

Course loses high key political tone

By LESLEY RUBIN

The women's course on Oppression and Liberation now being offered at Innis College has mellowed its original high key political tone and is aiming at "a place within a more traditional setting," according to its coordinator Kay Armatage.

The course, formerly in the interdisciplinary studies department, saw its budget cut from $18,000 to $12,000, the number of teachers reduced from 10 to six, and the enrolment limited to about half of its former 250 students.

However, the move to Innis coincides with the establishment this year of a separate Women's Studies Program at the university.

In its four years at the university, other important developments in the Oppression and Liberation course reflect both its internal struggles and changes in the women's movement in general.

Members of the Toronto Women's Liberation Movement, in cooperation with the dean of interdisciplinary studies, faculty members and graduate students; set up the original program in 1971.

Although the course was enthusiastically received in its first year, tremendous organizational difficulties threatened its continuation.

Ideological tensions spread among the leaders, who ranged from Trotskyites to Communist Party members to left-liberal academics.

The attempt at "team-teaching" and a rigid application of the notion of "collectivity" — considered a vital aspect of any feminist organization — created further difficulties and drained the energies of those involved.

A paucity of good and available reading material in the area also hindered the course.

In recent years, with pressure from the university administration, the course has aimed at a more flexible application of the collective idea and a less dogmatic approach, Armatage said.

Armatage explained the course content this year is not necessarily more "political".

However, she added, with the establishment of the Women's Studies Program, and a greater number of activities dealing with women outside the university, the Innis course has become "less crucial.

The program, she noted, has cut out its former weekly lecture series and other extra-curricular activities.

The course was originally called Women in the 20th Century, indicating a broader affiliation with the women's movement. It was changed to Women in Canada in the second year under the pressure of the "nationalist" issue, Armatage said.

For the past two years, as Oppression and Liberation, the course has worked for a general multidisciplinary approach to women's studies.

With the course's anticipated name change next year to Introduction to Women's Studies, Armatage sees a further change in direction of the course.

The course, she said, will reflect women "seeing ourselves as having a place within a more traditional setting" and as serving more as an introduction to specialized studies.

Cross country wins in Buffalo

The Varsity — Brian Peil

Thursday Varsity firsts beat Guelph 14-13 while seconds won 9-7.

The U of T Cross Country team made its annual trek to the Canisius College Invitational Meet in Buffalo last Saturday and returned for the first time with both Junior Varsity and Varsity team honours.

In the Junior Varsity race only 36 runners from six schools responded to the starter's pistol. By the two mile mark of the flat 4 1/2 mile course it was clear that Blues were well in command.

With four runners finishing in the top six and five in the top 10, the team title was never in doubt.

Don Corbett and John Ptolemy led the junior team home with a 1-2 finish followed closely by Peter Walker 4th, Bill Young 6th, Dave Hopper 10th and Paul Barry 16th.

The Junior Varsity team results were: U of T 20 points, U of Syracuse 35 points, Oswego State 97 points, Buffalo State 99 points, and U of Guelph 103 points.

The Junior Varsity team had dominated its race and the pressure was now on the Varsity squad.

In the varsity race over 150 runners from 20 schools answered the starter's command, but again it was the team from U of Syracuse which provided Varsity's opposition.

The wind created a slower race than most expected. Blues' runners got off to a slow start but were able to move up in the field to capture their first Varsity title since the days of Bruce Kidd. John Sharp and Joe Sax led the Varsity team in with a close 2-3 finish behind the winner Wayne Rodgers of Lehigh U.

Strong Finishes by Mike Dyon 9th, Brad Morley 11th, Ken Hamilton 14th, Steve Findley 18th and John Hiley produced the team winning total of 39 points followed closely by U of Syracuse with 49 points.

Soccer Blues lose close one to Guelph - out of playoffs

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues have done it again.

For the third successive league game they lost by a single goal, this time to the Guelph Gryphons by 2-1 on Thursday night.

The pattern followed that of previous games in that a storming second half display was insufficient to overcome the deficit accrued before the change of ends.

Early in the season Toronto won three successive games, scoring 10 goals and conceding 4 in the process. Over the current losing streak only one more goal has been given up but 8 less have been scored by the Blues.

Their inability to finish promising approach plays is one major cause of the Blues woes, but even this deficiency would be ameliorated to a limited extent if defensively, they were not to average one sorry error per game.

Perhaps the fact that in each of the losing contests the Toronto squad has held an overall territorial advantage could be construed as evidence of bad luck.

The plot for Thursday's game has been written before. The Blues' lethargy allowed the home team to assume control. The main problems were presented by the twin spearhead of Martin M'Hango and John Azu who confused the Blues' central defenders with a series of well executed give and go passes.

Were it not for the uncanny anticipation of Jude Robinson, who frequently covered for the early mishap of his defensive colleagues, the first Gryphon score would have come earlier than it did.

Guelph opened the score after 15 minutes. The chance was set up by a pass which sent Azu well clear of the defence. He shot with authority, just placing the ball beyond Igor Ivanisevic in the Blues' net.

True to form the Blues salvaged some good from the setback and mounted furious attacks, which by their sheer persistence created scoring opportunities.

These were squandered with careless abandon either through inaccurate shooting or the futile insistence in dribbling past a tenacious defence.

On defence, the Blues problems had not been completely solved, but the play of Keith Hendrickse and some positional rearrangements in the middle gradually reduced the severity of the Gryphons' attacks.

The second half commenced as pre-ordained, with the visitors applying pressure.

At last the ball was being passed rather than dribbled. Passes began to go out to the right where Vince Ierullo was anxious to show his stuff.

Thus it was that the Blues equalized on the hour. Dave Evans, retrieving an errant pass in mid-field, moved forward and alertly hit his pass at exactly the right moment so that Ierullo was able to collect the ball and hit it cleanly past Guelph netminder Lynch.

Toronto received three setbacks in the next 15 minutes just when it appeared the game was there for the taking.

First Evans was taken to hospital with a shoulder injury. Second was the Blues' specialty, a defensive mishap.

A long ball from M'Hango was intercepted close to the Toronto net by Geoff Crewe. The ball rebounded directly to Martin Warmelink who, without breaking stride hit a thunderous half-volley well past Ivanisevic into the top corner of the rigging.

The third mishap was not long in coming. Another flighted ball reached Ierullo whose shot was direct and powerful but bounced off the crossbar.

Typically as the final whistle blew, the ball was yet again being directed towards the Guelph net. If only the Blues could play 90 minutes like they did the second half . . .

Waterpolo Blues win a triple header opener

By MRS. PARKER

Saturday in the catacombs of Hart House, in the moist dark cave known as the pool room, the Varsity Blues waterpolo team got their season off to fine start with three wins in the OUAA east division.

George Gross and Alex Fedko led the Blues to dominant wins over Queen's, RMC, and York. Gross contributed no less than 25 goals which must be some kind of record while Fedko added 9 more.

Toronto downed RMC in the first game 13-8 and lowered the boom on Queen's 15-8. Those poor people from York who can't seem to do anything right also lost 13-9 to the rampaging blue hordes.

The Varsity apologises for the lack of pictures but because of the dinginess of the Hart House pool photos were impossible.

Perhaps the Blues whose eyes are accustomed to this darkness had an unfair advantage over the opposition.

Blues next competition is at the University of Ottawa where they will play Ottawa and Queen's universities.

Blues finish first - playoffs next

By PAUL CARSON

The second season for Varsity football Blues begins this weekend with a Saturday afternoon O-QIFC playoff semi-final against fourth place Carleton Ravens. Game time is moved ahead one hour with the kickoff at 1 pm.

Blues ended the regular season on a winning note before 10,499 Homecoming fans Saturday afternoon with a solid team effort in defeating Western Mustangs 28-6. The victory gives Blues a perfect 7-0 record, the first such achievement since 1958.

However, there is one critical difference: in 1958 the perfect season automatically brought with it a championship but this year seven-and-zero means very little. To be recognized as champions, Blues must do even better and finish with eleven straight victories. All playoffs are of the sudden death variety.

Most observers expected Saturday's game to be much closer, but Blues produced a solid team effort with very few critical mistakes while Mustangs were inconsistent, and several key players, especially pass receivers, were never able to perform their assignments with any consistency.

Everybody probably knows by now that rookie halfback Mark Bragagnolo gained 107 yards along the ground to finish the schedule with a fantastic total of 1,018 — definitely a Varsity team record and likely the first time any Canadian collegian has broken the mythical 1,000 Yard Barrier in a regular season schedule.

Naturally, Bragagnolo was much sought-after by the media for post game comments. He insisted that the entire offensive unit share the credit during the TV interview, and that action demonstrates why this year's team is where it is — undefeated and ranked first in the CIAU.

It was no empty gesture, since Bragagnolo has insisted all season that his achievements are really the end product of the selfless blocking by his teammates. This genuine team unity is a welcome development, given the factionalism and second-guessing that have plagued some Varsity teams in recent years. In the understandable excitement to celebrate Bragagnolo's record, many commentators and, I suspect, most spectators overlooked that the game was really won by the unrealized defensive unit.

In the first half Blues defenders held Mustangs to only 22 net yards along the ground, and official statistics show that Western failed to gain any yards passing whatsoever in the second half. That kind of tenacious defense is what wins football games.

The front four of Geoff Sutherland, Brian Craig, Mark Sazio and Lubomir Alexov neutralized the Western rushing attack. Linebackers Guido Iantorno, John Vernon, Julio Giodani and Nick Desimini plus Joe Hruska on passing situations spent most of the afternoon creating havoc in the Western backfield. Deep backs Rick Jeysman, Chris Triantifilopoulos, Rick Nakatsu and Doug Ball made a few mistakes but always rallied to produce the key plays when needed.

Ball, the goat on Western's only touchdown, made the key defensive play in the final seconds of the first half when he leapt high to deflect an apparent touchdown pass into Triantifilopoulos' hands for an interception when Blues led 18-6.

Western's defense really didn't collapse until the final minutes and Blues built their lead via a few big plays plus the effective kicking by placement specialist Don Wright and punter Mike Sokovnin.

Sokovnin averaged 41 yards per kick despite the swirling wind and Wright collected ten points on two field goals, two converts and two singles.

Mustang quarterback Bill Robinson was expected to pick Varsity's defense apart and in truth on many plays his receivers were open. But Western's offensive line couldn't handle Blues rush and Robinson completed only 11 of 26 passes for 105 yards.

Dave Langley had to do some scrambling of his own and had some accuracy problems in the first quarter but finished with 9 of 21 for 188 yards plus a touchdown on his own on a ten-yard run in the second quarter.

Overall, Blues had 370 total yards and only 20 yards in penalties compared to Western's 178 yards plus another 128 in penalties as Mustangs' frustration finally emerged in a few silly roughing incidents.

Bragagnolo broke open a scoreless tie at 12:14 of the opening period with a clever twisting 24-yard td run behind Sokovnin and Don Dawson blocking.

Moments later it was 8-0 when Stangs couldn't field Wright's booming kickoff.

However, Mustangs narrowed the gap early in the second quarter when Robinson hit Jay Parry in the end zone. The march began when Al Brencley fumbled away a Western punt at the Varsity 52. It was the first of three fumbles by Blues punt return unit.

Blues pulled away on Langley's touchdown, set up by a 38-yard pass to Mark Ackley as Langley un-

Rick Jeysman does not back away from Man Mountain blocking for 'Stangs' Terry Rotondo.

The Varsity — Brian Pei

derthrew his split end on what should have been a touchdown but then got a break when Western defenders misplayed the pass.

The game was still in doubt, particularly when Blues lost starting center Jim Nicoletti with a serious knee injury.

But this was to be a Varsity day and matters were settled in the third quarter as Bragagnolo quickly broke the 1,000-yard barrier and the defensive unit kept Western continually off balance.

Veteran Libert Castillo displayed some tough inside running in the final quarter and fully earned the game's final touchdown, scored on a short plunge with three minutes remaining.

There have been many valid criticisms levelled against intercollegiate sport, especially football, in recent years and some improvements are still needed. However, Saturday's game showed that college football still retains a unique appeal when it is properly promoted and played with skill and sportsmanship by well-coached players who realize that, when all the cheering is over, it's still just a game.

JOTTINGS — little has been said this year about the officiating which is unfortunate since referees usually are the scapegoats in all sports, just ask the soccer team; however, it has been a good year for O-QIFC officials and Saturday's crew did a competent job despite a couple of apparently slow penalty calls... the LGMB was at it again, ruining the halftime show by the Western band; the engineers are a great asset to the psychology of Varsity athletics but sometimes they don't seem to know when good manners should replace childish antics... Laurier took advantage of Mustang's loss to grab first place in the Western division by defeating Loyola 21-10 while Bishop's edged McGill 24-20 and Carleton took it on the chin from Ottawa 48-7... in other games McMaster made the playoffs with a 20-10 win over Windsor, Guelph upset Queens also 20-10, and yes fans, York did get its perfect season too, losing 32-30 to Waterloo.

Scarborough downs Trinity 34-13; earn playoff berth

By MRS. PARKER

The East is Maroon was the cry on the back campus Friday as the maroon and white from Scarborough stomped, clobbered, pounded and generally beat the forces of Trinity Right and Truth by 34 to 13.

Several Trinity players were carried off the field, and officials would not comment on a report that Scarborough's playoff game has been switched to the TGH emergency ward.

Russ Henderson sparked Scar with a 95-yard punt return and the eastenders also recorded four field goals plus another TD by defensive tackle Alex Morin.

Meanwhile in the wonderful world of interfac diplomacy, director Dave Copp gets another chance to play Henry Kissinger this afternoon at a special meeting called to resolve the confusion in the first division of football play that's resulted from the Vic-Engineering replay that never replayed when Vic showed up one hour late.

Let's just hope that Vic shows up to the meeting on time...

Athletics amalgamation approved

The Varsity — Mirm Martin

The internal affairs committee voted Monday to amalgamate the present departments of athletics and recreation, but to maintain the independence of the School of Physical and Health Education.

In taking the vote, the committee was approving the recommendations of a task force on athletics, set up last October under the chairmanship of Governing Council member Gordon Fisher.

The eight-member Fisher task force, which contained three student members, was instructed to "give consideration to the government and administration of the five St. George campus units concerned with athletics and physical education" in light of Governing Council policy.

The five units which presently govern athletics in the university are the school of physical and health education, the U of T Athletic Association, the U of T Women's Athletic Association, the Department of Athletics and Recreation (men) and the Department of Athletics and Recreation (women).

The Fisher task force was set up after widespread dissatisfaction with the present governing structure and administration of athletics. The present departments have ill-defined responsibilities which frequently overlap.

"None of those who met with the task force or sent briefs argued for maintaining the status quo", the report notes.

The present athletic structures, the report notes, are "supported by a bewildering variety of ad hoc arrangements"; while the present programs are "supported by a byzantine overlapping of responsibilities and budgetary allocations."

The Fisher report based its recommendations on three principles, a) that users of programs supported by athletic fees have the majority say in the running of those programs, b) that planning committees have direct access to resources necessary to operate their programs, and c) that management be as important as planning.

The question of a user majority in the athletics program was a contentious issue before the committee, which faced a student referendum last fall voting 7-1 in favor of user, that is student, majority on decision-making bodies.

The task force recommends a 24-member council to govern the new single department of athletics and recreation, of which 12 (six males, six females) would be student users.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch was unhappy with the proposed new composition. He asked the internal affairs committee to institute a student majority in the athletics committee membership.

However, the only support he received was from student committee member Shirley French, who voted against the 12-of-24 proposal.

Other members argued that while students were not the majority of the committee, they were the majority voice on the committee.

Also unhappy with the Fisher report were the staff members of the present athletics department.

The "tri-staff" group urged the internal affairs committee to push ahead immediately with full amalgamation of the School of Physical and Health Education and the proposed combined athletics department.

Athletic goals set

The Governing Council has adopted several policy objectives for athletics and physical education. These include:

- To facilitate scholarly research into physical education and for the teaching of professional physical educators and community sports leaders.
- To provide avocational instruction, physical recreation and athletic competition for members of the university community and to integrate such programs for men and women as much as possible.
- To contribute to the continuing physical well-being of members of the university community by providing programs that stress the values and habits of physical fitness and by providing physical fitness testing and the prescription of exercises.

- To provide opportunity for athletics in a few carefully selected sports to pursue world standards of performance and to provide for empirical research into the requirements of excellence in these sports.

- To supplement recreation opportunities for members of the adjacent community by providing appropriate programs on a regular basis through the university-city liaison committee and the city of Toronto department of parks and recreation.

- To supplement, where possible, opportunities for the Toronto athletics community to use university facilities for training, competitions and special demonstrations.

- To provide for spectator opportunities for competitive sports.

Task force wants half of committee students

The Fisher task force on athletics and physical recreation has recommended the following composition for a council to govern the new combined department of athletics and recreation:

- Director of athletics and recreation
- Director of the school of physical and health education.
- Vice-president, internal affairs.
- Four department staff members.
- Six female student users.

- Six male student users.
- One alumnus.
- One academic staff member.
- One academic staff member.
- One non-academic staff member.
- One member of the public with expertise in recreation appointed by the president.

Gay course overrides obstacles

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

A U of T school of continuing education course in gay studies now has a large enough enrolment and no longer faces cancellation.

The course, New Perspectives on the Gay Experience, faced cancellation last month because of low enrolment. At the time only five people were registered in the course.

Fourteen people are now enrolled in the course, the first of its kind in Canada, course instructor Michael Lynch said yesterday.

The course uses a weekly lecture and discussion format. Lecturers for the fall term include theologian Gregory Baum, English professor Phyllis Grosskurth, psychiatrist David Berger and sociologist J.A. Lee.

Lynch had blamed the low enrolment on the lack of publicity given by the media in general and The Toronto Star in particular.

Off-campus publicity was important for continuing education courses, especially gay studies, Lynch said, because the courses were offered to the public.

The new gay studies course was the subject of a Star feature, but the story was never printed.

Star editors claimed the feature was not printed because of space reasons, but Lynch disagreed, saying, "In view of the Star's past record of discrimination against gay people, it is difficult to believe that the omission... was unmotivated."

The Star bans use of 'gay' in ads

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The Toronto Star will no longer allow advertisers to use the word 'gay' in display advertising to refer to homosexuals.

The Star has always insisted the word 'gay' was unacceptable in classified advertising, and instead wanted the word "homosexual" inserted.

The Star has previously accepted 'gay' in display advertising. The Star carried a display advertisement Oct. 3 which advertised the new U of T continuing education course New Perspectives on Gay Experience.

"Gay" is now no longer acceptable," explained Paul Young, assistant to the Star advertising director.

Young denied that The Star editorial board ordered the policy change. "We don't dictate editorial policy," he said, "and they don't dictate ours."

Advertising policy "was continually under review," Young said, and because the homosexual issue "opened up such a can of worms, we reviewed the policy. Now 'gay' is no longer acceptable, even if it's advertising a university course."

Larry Morse, university coordinator for the gay studies program, said, "I think their policy is really stupid and unjustifiable.

"I'm sorry they didn't make an issue of it before, when we put the ad in. We would have fought with them about it," Morse said.

When asked why the policy was changed, Young said, "You and I both know what 'gay' means, but the paper is distributed in areas where it's not known."

"In a lot of places, having a 'gay time' means something different than in Toronto," he said.

When asked when the policy was changed and by whom, Young would say only that the decision was made sometime after the university gay studies ad was run Oct. 3.

The Star wrote a lead editorial Oct. 19 to explain the newspaper's editorial policy on homosexuality and to defend itself against charges of discrimination.

The Star editorial came as a response to a front page Varsity story Sept. 27.

In the story, U of T professor Michael Lynch criticized the Star for not publicizing a new continuing education course New Perspectives on the Gay Experience.

B.C. government bans African wine for a day

VICTORIA (CUP) - In honor of United Nations Day on Oct. 24, British Columbia's NDP government decided to withdraw South African wine from sale in the province's liquor stores.

B.C. Attorney General Alex MacDonald said the action was a protest against South Africa's "abhorrent" racial policies. The UN had asked for a boycott of South African products as early as 1962.

"South Africa practises abhorrent policies of racial segregation and denial as an integral part of its legal system and persists and continues to practice this institutionalized racialism," MacDonald said.

The action, he said, was a signal to the people of Africa that "we are concerned when human beings are denied basic human freedom because of their race or color."

He agreed the move would have little economic impact on South Africa, but felt it was the principle that was important.

The B.C. Liquor Commission will continue to supply South African wines on an individual per-order basis.

Reporter fired for criticizing Star editorial policy

The Toronto Star last week fired reporter Claire Hoy after he refused to sign a two-page prepared apology for remarks he made on television about the Star's editorial operation.

The Toronto Newspaper Guild has begun grievance procedures over the dismissal, which ended a week-long "indefinite suspension" of Hoy by managing editor Edwin Bolwell. Bolwell gave Hoy only two choices—sign the apology and resign or be fired.

The action stemmed from Hoy's appearance on CITY-TV on Oct. 2 and on CBLT-TV on Oct. 3 in which Hoy charged that the Star's editorial positions influence its news reports.

Citing examples of particular news stories, Hoy told interviewer Ken Cavanaugh on CITY-TV's City Show that "news manipulations aren't unusual" at the Star and that "their editorial positions consistently spill over into the news pages."

The Star has charged that Hoy's statements were "inaccurate and highly detrimental to this newspaper and to fellow staff members."

Bolwell suspended Hoy on Oct. 7 and called on both television stations to broadcast retractions or apologies for certain of Hoy's statements.

In a letter posted by Bolwell on the Star's editorial department bulletin boards, the managing editor cited two news stories which Hoy had mentioned on the television programs.

The first was a front page story by David Crane, Star political editor, that the federal Liberal cabinet had approved a "secret" contingency plan for wage and price controls. Hoy charged that parts of the article—which appeared in the Star on June 29, a week before the federal election—were not true.

Bolwell, in a letter to editorial staff following Hoy's suspension, said the article was "a good story, both accurate and fair, revealing for the first time details of the Liberal plan."

Hoy also said on CITY-TV that the Crane story had been requested by Star editor-in-chief Martin Goodman and that it was phoned in "on the instructions that that was the main story for the next day's paper."

Bolwell and Crane, who is a member of the Guild, have said the story was Crane's own idea.

"Mr. Crane wrote that story on his own initiative," Bolwell said in his letter to staff. "Neither Mr. Crane nor anybody else ordered that story to be the main story on front when it was filed."

Bolwell said the decision to run Crane's story as the main story in the June 29 paper "was made by Ray Gardner, the senior editor in charge of that day's paper, and the decision was made after he evaluated the news flow that day."

Bolwell also objected to Hoy's remarks about a Star story concerning an Ontario Liberal party conference in Hamilton last August. Hoy, who covered the conference for the Star, said the story which appeared in the Star was "totally inaccurate."

The story, not written by Hoy, was printed to match a story in the Globe and Mail, Hoy said. He said he had told two Star editors—David Pike and Joe Gelmon—that the Globe story misrepresented what occurred at the conference.

Pike, an assistant city editor and a member of the Guild, says Hoy had argued against matching the Globe story because events at the conference were not official Liberal policy.

The decision to print a matching story was made by Gelmon, Pike said.

Bolwell objected to a portion of the CBLT interview in which a program interviewer asked Hoy if the Star used its columns for Progressive Conservative propaganda and if it "deliberately, knowingly" lied.

According to a transcript of the program prepared by the Star's law firm, Hoy's reply was, "Yes."

Bolwell's letter to staff said he regarded "Mr. Hoy's false charges as a very serious matter. They reflect badly not only on this newspaper but on everybody who works for it."

Guild president Jim Robinson, who began Hoy's grievance within minutes of his suspension, said he was disturbed that the Star had demanded that Hoy apologize to another employee.

"As for what Hoy said about the Star itself, I think the first question that arises is whether or not Hoy's comments were true. It may be—as some editorial members have suggested to me—that Hoy simply made a bad case for a situation which does exist."

"If Hoy's statements hold up, the question that arises in labor law is whether he had the right to make them about his employer. To deny a reporter's right to speak out truthfully against what he believes to be seriously wrong with his newspaper—with its enormous responsibility to the public interest—would be a dangerous precedent indeed."

the School for Graduate Studies, the department views it as a temporary move.

In a brief to Forster, it has suggested the "possible future amalgamation (of urban planning) into a single division of particular graduate departments, centres and institutes which have an urban or environmental focus."

Forster recognizes a lot of further discussion is needed before any definite plans can be drawn.

He said he will propose a joint task force from both the Governing Council's planning and resources and its academic affairs committees be set up in the next few weeks to study all the briefs.

Ontario council calls for increase in BIU value

The Council of Ontario Universities (COU) has called for a 16.8 per cent increase in the value of the Basic Income Unit (BIU).

In a statement released last weekend, the council (which is a policy and regulatory body of all Ontario universities) called for an increase in the value of the BIU to $2,283 from $1,955.

The BIU is a figure by which the Ontario government subsidizes every student enrolled at university in the province. Thus, a substantial increase in the value of the BIU would mean a substantial increase in funding for academic programs.

The statement cites inflation as the major cause of the need for an increase, and also argues that "universities are losing ground. Their portion of provincial budgetary expenditure has been decreasing for the last two years." University grants have declined from 6.1 per cent of the total provincial budget in 1972 to 5.6 in 1974.

"Under the pressure of inflation," the brief argues, "peaks of attainment are allowed to slip down because of the greatness of the overall need; centres of excellence cannot flourish without funding."

"Instead of a lifeline to keep their heads above water, the universities should be given enough support to keep in the swim of what is really going on in the post-industrial society, so as to build on the good educational base and give leadership in advancing Canadian design, management capability, data organization, and other fields appropriate to high-level technology, production and services."

The brief also supports demands for salary increases for university faculty, arguing they are unable to compete with similar posts in the civil service and that salary levels have not kept pace with inflation.

COU urges end to capital spending freeze

The provincial government freeze on capital financing must be lifted, according to the Council of Ontario Universities.

In a brief this month to the Ontario Council on University Affairs (the new liaison body between government and universities) the COU argues there is an immediate need to renew capital funds "so that the institutions can meet their most urgent priorities, whether these be adaptation, renewal or addition of facilities."

The freeze—which effectively curbs universities from undergoing physical expansion—was instituted in November, 1972 by colleges and universities minister Jack McNeil to call a halt to mushrooming university grants.

The present minister, James Auld, has given no indication that the freeze will be lifted.

The brief acknowledges that "funds have been made available for committed projects, emergency or extremely urgent alteration or renovation projects and recently for some new projects," but insists that "these funds have been less than adequate to meet the need and become available by a process which makes it very difficult to plan ahead in a rational way."

The brief also warns that "the implications of continuing the current freeze on capital are clearly a system which remains static in the context of a highly dynamic environment, a system which cannot correct for even current imbalances, and a system in which some elements are in danger of deterioration because individual institutions lack the funds to pay for major renovations or replacements."

U of T finds itself strongly hit by the freeze, as it is unable to obtain government funding for the proposed new athletics building, on the corner of Spadina and Harbord.

The university is frantically looking for funding from federal and private sources, and has even considered asking students to pay a special levy.

Over 100 briefs show no consensus in Arch

The university has received over 100 submissions in the past two weeks on proposals to restructure the Faculty of Architecture, but "no consensus of opinion" can be drawn, U of T provost Don Forster said yesterday.

Along with the three briefs from each of the faculty's present three departments, Forster said he has received over 100 briefs from "a lot of individual alumni."

"What has impressed me most is the great diversity of views," Forster said. "Our objective to provoke discussion has been achieved."

The briefs came in response to Forster's proposal of Sept. 6 to dissolve the architecture, landscape architecture and urban and regional planning—elsewhere.

Forster's recommendation to effectively link the architecture department with the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering came under sharp criticism.

In a brief, the department has suggested instead it eliminate its undergraduate program and have the graduate program report to the School of Graduate Studies' dean.

However, Forster said he has received many submissions saying architecture should have stronger links with more mechanical and engineering subjects, as well as other professions.

But, Forster added, the engineering dean of the engineering faculty is aware of architect's antagonism towards engineers and does not want to forge a link on unsteady grounds.

Forster said the proposal that architecture go completely graduate would mean it becoming a part of the School of Graduate Studies.

Noting that this would involve both structural and program changes, Forster said the proposal will be seriously considered.

Forster's original suggestion that the urban planning department join the School of Graduate Studies has received the "clearest, most positive response," the provost said.

Landscape architecture is the only of the faculty's three present departments to advocate they all remain together under one faculty.

Landscape architecture has suggested the three departments join the Faculty of Forestry in a renamed faculty.

Other disciplines, such as the Institute for Environmental Studies, could be combined in the new faculty at some appropriate date," landscape architecture chairman Richard Strong says in a memo to Forster.

The memo stresses the Faculty of Architecture's initial goal when it was set up in 1967—to become a centre or focus for the development of general environmental studies at the university.

"We believe that the 1967 reason . . . is still valid," Strong's memo says. "That is to say, that all disciplines which have common interests should be combined into one faculty."

Forster said he has received other briefs recommending the three departments stay together and emphasize an orientation towards environmental studies.

No free rides TTC tells students

By AMANDA HANSON
U of T students shouldn't expect any special Toronto Transit Commission rates in the near future, TTC public relations spokesman Bryan Millsup told The Varsity yesterday.

Although the TTC has often been requested to institute a special university rate, Millsup said, the idea has never been "seriously considered."

Millsup said he believed the major reason why the transportation of university students wasn't subsidized was the added burden the taxpayer would have to bear.

With government subsidies, a slight increase in TTC use by students might be anticipated, said Millsup, but he thought most students who drove cars would continue to do so.

Price increases, not decreases, could be expected in the coming months, Millsup said, because neither Metro nor the province want to increase their subsidies to the TTC.

The price increase would be across the board, affecting not only adults but also high school students, the elderly and children.

Perhaps U of T students should consider transferring to Queen's University in Kingston. Students there ride the public transit free.

U of T sub-committee says OSAP inadequate

The Governing Council's admissions and awards sub-committee passed motions yesterday protesting the inadequacy of the present $32 a week board and lodging allowance for students under the Ontario Student Awards Plan.

The committee voted unanimously to inform colleges and universities minister James Auld that it is "disappointed the ministry has not authorized an increase in the rate for this year."

The motion also called for the minister to implement a significant increase in board and lodging allowances for 1975-6, especially for students attending post-secondary institutions in the Toronto area.

The committee suggested that future allowances for all OSAP loans and grants be increased annually to reflect the increasing cost of living.

The OSAP allowances have been the focus of a protest campaign by the Ontario Federation of Students. The ministry refused to increase them despite recommendations by the majority of university awards officers for an increase to at least $40 a week.

SDS appeal must be backed despite SAC

Even though the Students' Administrative Council doesn't think so, there are obvious reasons for supporting the appeal of two SDS members against the suspensions imposed on them.

Tony Leah and Bill Schabas were tried and sentenced by the Caput — a body composed entirely of administrators. The sentence was an illegitimate one. The illegitimacy of Caput has been recognized for years. Furthermore, its actions are even less acceptable in that it acts as both prosecutor and judge.

It is hard to believe that students are willing to stand for such a violation of their basic civil rights. The procedures proposed under the new non-academic discipline code, unpalatable as they are, appear as a liberal's dream in comparison to those of Caput.

Secondly, the question of racism in the university and in society cannot be ignored, as the Caput did during this summer's trial.

The question whether Edward Banfield is or is not a racist has never been discussed. If he is, he should not have been invited to speak at the university. The actions of Leah and Schabas will appear in a completely different light depending on how this question is answered. Surely neither students nor SAC nor the administration would openly condone racism.

Some have maintained that the issue of racism is somehow a cover, a false issue masking the nefarious plans of SDS for world domination. It is true that the various political factions around the university are not averse to exploiting issues for their own sectarian purposes.

Several of those present at a recent organizational meeting for the appeal campaign expressed concern that SDS was not really serious about building broad-based support.

Hardly anyone will approve what Leah and Schabas did outright. If the SDS had wanted to insist that the campaign be based on approval of the actions of the two men, they could have done so. This would have indicated that they valued their own ideological purity above their stated intentions of broadening the campaign.

But the SDS did not insist on this point. The petition approved for circulation by the appeal committee includes the provision that support for the appeal need not imply support for the actions of Leah and Schabas. The fact that SDS members approved this formulation speaks well for the possibility of organizing a truly broadly-based appeal campaign.

SAC's refusal to support the appeals no doubt arises from their wish to avoid the impression of condoning the actions of Leah and Schabas. The fact is that support for the appeal is not equivalent to supporting their actions.

But the members of SAC wanted to play it safe, and avoided even the chance of getting their hands dirty. It is ironic that SAC should have refused to sit on the Caput, recognizing it as an illegitimate body, and yet should acquiesce in its decision. For the refusal to support the appeals is just that — acquiescence.

In attempting to keep their hands clean, the members of SAC avoided taking a position on two issues — discipline and racism — which are of great importance for the students at the university. SAC's non-position does not serve the interests of students.

Estimate inaccurate

I am writing in reply to Mr. Finlayson's letter, where he stated that the support staff received a $200 cost of living bonus and a 9.9 percent raise. This isn't so, at least in my case.

Before July 1, 1974, I was making $6,300 per year. This was increased to $6,996 per year, which is what I get now. This is a raise of $646 per year, including $200 per year cost of living bonus. My raise, less $200 bonus, is $496 per year, which is a 7.8 percent raise, not 9.9 percent, as stated by Mr. Finlayson.

Before Mr. Finlayson makes such a statement, he should make inquiries of some of the support staff.

If the faculty members feel they are entitled to a 25 percent raise, plus a cost of living allowance, what about the support staff, lab technicians and so on? After all, the faculty aren't the only ones hit by inflation, and some of us don't make even $20,000 a year.

Lottery would be circus

I wholeheartedly agree with your opinions in the article "Is Competition Spoiling Medicine". The present entrance requirements must be modified to prevent the annual refusal of 1,600-2,100 hopeful medical students.

Yet I disagree with the aspect of a lottery. This creates a circus atmosphere in the university, where all with B averages will buy their ticket for a medical prize. This degrades medicine into a carnival run by those lucky winners. There is the probability that a half-interested student who won will be taking the place of a student with intense desire.

Medicine is not a game, nor is it a marks contest. It is the study of the human body so that graduates may help others in our world. The true doctor should place helping people first, over marks, lottery tickets and well-padded salaries.

I do support the idea of pre-medical internship, in order that there be a genuine human interest displayed on the part of the applicant. But marks and scholastic achievement cannot be overlooked, as this is a numerical assessment of an applicant's aptitude.

As a summary, here is my proposal for a modification of the entrance requirements:

- 1) The presentation of documents attesting the fact of 12 months of pre-medical internship, broken down:
 - a) 8 months within a hospital or medical institution (for example, as an orderly).
 - b) 4 months of non-medical social work.

b) 4 months of non-medical social work.

These pre-med internship periods could easily be accomplished over three summer holidays, if the applicant so desired.

2) A mark used to rank the applicants, comprised of:

a) 50 percent: The present system for averaging the past three years of work.

b) 50 percent: A series of medical entrance examinations.

This mark would combine both the important aspects of past scholastic achievements, and also set a fair standard of examination to nullify the differences between the courses taken.

I believe that the present system must be modified. Yet we must not turn the medical school into a carnival. Intense desire for helping people and scholastic requirements must be equal criteria for our prospective doctors.

Terry Knight

Alternative needed

Your featured article on Medical School Admission at U of T (Oct. 28, '74) was informative and revealed some shocking facts.

For instance, it is disheartening to find that so many candidates treat medical school admission as an end rather than the means to an end.

An alternative to the medical profession may be the only solution to the scramble for admission to med schools. I personally feel some of the work a G.P. does these days can be handled by an alternate "profession." Why not leave medical school solely for research and specialization instead?

Qualified support for SDS only begs the question

The appeal of Tony Leah and Bill Schabas of the CAPUT decision raise many questions, the prime one being whether or not the appeal should be supported, and for what reasons. The consensus among liberals seems to be a qualified support, based on the questionable legality and unrepresentative nature of the Caput. This stance is illogical and begs the question of issues at hand.

It is illogical because even if the Caput had been legal and representative, the question remains of what Leah and Schabas were being tried for. The point that Leah and Schabas tried to make unsuccessfully throughout the Caput proceeding was that their actions were based on the racism of Edward Banfield. Caput refused to acknowledge that issue, preferring to concentrate on the matter of the university's image and free speech. It is doubtful that any court would have done differently.

Liberals, despite their qualms about Caput, tend to follow its reasoning. They share the SDS' concern about Banfield's shoddy and implausible statements about "class" and "race", and generally doubt that he should have been invited. However, they shake their heads sadly when it comes to supporting the SDS, claiming that their refusal to allow Banfield to speak constituted a reprehensible assault on free speech, and hence rules out any possible support for their actions. "We must all defend free speech" they admonish us.

But is free speech actually an issue? Is it truly relevant to the Banfield incident, or does it mask more profound issues? I argue the latter, that the incident was a matter of power, not free speech. Free speech is merely a slogan. If we look at the actual content of the phrase "defend free speech," we discover something much darker.

The issue of free speech would be better served by a less self-interested community than the academic one. It is instructive to remember that academics support their colleagues' right to free speech only when they are behind the Iron Curtain. Western world academics are more apt to ape the KGB on this side of the barrier. Gabriel Kolko was hounded out of the US for his radicalism; Paul Baran was harassed by his university till the day he died; more recently, we have the case of John Seeley who cannot teach in Canada because of his habit of supporting students.

In the Banfield incident, the academic community's "principled defence" of free speech is merely a self-interested defence of their own privileges. Only a few days after the incident, when a group of Western Guard thugs physically assaulted a group on campus, not a peep came from the erstwhile champions of free speech.

More to the point, the same faculty members who denounced the SDS as "pseudo-facists" nearly fell over each other in the rush to make hairy-chested pronouncements of patriotism when the Trudeau government declared the War Measures Act, surely an assault on free speech if ever there was one.

Some academics admit that their colleagues are less than consistent in their support of free speech. "But," they argue earnestly, "we must still defend the principle of free speech". That blindness is akin to accepting the responsibility but not the blame. The point is that there is no fine line between a hypocritical and a reforming faculty. One flows out of the other, and both draw sustenance from the elitist concept of the academic world—the community of scholars—or the ivory tower. The academics defence of freedom rings hollow because it is based on the smug notion that the "ivory tower" is the last bulwark of civilization against the dark and ignorant hordes—the masses. It must surely warm the petty ego to know that "apres moi, le deluge;" that the university preserves and nurtures the ideals of freedom of speech and civil liberties.

But that is a false notion. Not only does the outside world, in the form of government and industrial grants, dictate what and how research is carried out, but faculty members themselves sit on committees that advise the state on matters from education to fiscal policy.

If we had to depend on academics for freedom, we would have lost it long ago. When William Garrison and Wendell Phillips and the abolitionists were fighting to end slavery, scholars scribbled furiously, seeking to prove blacks the descendants of Caan or the offspring of carnal couplings with apes, and thus deservedly white man's inferior. Academics taught in Germany while the furnaces consumed a million souls.

All their rhetoric cannot obscure the reality of the issue underlying the Banfield incident. That is, his racism. To those who suggest that scholars are above such human frailties as bias, let me point out that "Ph.D does not a scholar make." I think we will agree that one does not have to be as crude as the Western Guard to be, in essence, a racist.

Those liberals who agree that Banfield is a racist, but that he should be granted the right to speak in order that he may be refuted are living in a fool's paradise. Debate is never resolved along lines of logic, but of emotion, fear, traditions, experiences and passions. You have to look at the surrounding society in which you would allow Banfield to speak.

The very inertia of society makes it conservative. Because of this, it is hard to get people to renounce racism, or at least the bias of race. Banfield's theories, decked out in all the trappings of pseudo-science, make such a renunciation even more difficult.

It is pointless to speak of freedoms as absolutes in society. Why don't our civil libertarian academics protest the banning of hate literature in the jail? Besides, if Banfield wants to speak so much, let him use the corner soap box. Or is he afraid of meeting the same fate as the Canadian Nazi Party's John Beatty at the hands of Toronto's irate Jews?

Why does the university support Banfield and not Seeley?

Freedom of speech is a social, not an individual, right. It is absurd to speak of Robinson Crusoe's right to free speech. The theatre goer does not have the right to shout "fire" in a crowded hall.

It is true that free speech should be an absolute, but until it is an absolute, it only plays into the hands of the powerful and reactionary to support it uncritically, as if it were an absolute. As long as we live in this society, when matters of power rather than principle underlie such rights as free speech, it is a mistake to defend it as a principle.

Defend it as a means to human liberation, but always in the context of a particular situation. The Civil Rights Marchers of the sixties, in their defence of such rights, made a step towards human liberation—the Nazi's defence of their right was a step back.

You can disagree with the SDS' vanguardism, its elitism, its exploitation of causes, but you cannot evade the responsibilities of human liberation. If we cannot police our own community, if we cannot say "this far and no farther", someone will by default. It is faceless and gutless to argue that decisions concerning a person's right to speak cannot be made—they are made every day by those who control the media.

The defence of human dignity fell to the SDS from the paralyzed hands of liberal academics and students. Because of this, we must defend the SDS on all counts, to regain that dignity. Only when the possibility of fire is removed, will the theatre goer be allowed to cry "fire." For no one will listen.

Gus Richardson

Criticisms of left confused and contradictory

The author of "The Left And Everyday Life" (Varsity, Oct. 16) possesses some ability to articulate his personal alienation from the Left. It is clear that the views expressed are not only his. They represent sentiments of a layer of students sympathetic to radical change but disaffected from the Left. Such views have found increasing expression in the pages of the Varsity. However, despite a new found fashionability, these criticisms remain fundamentally confused and contradictory.

The author appeals for clarity. Unfortunately he provides only mystification as he busily devotes himself to the creation of a new mythology about the Left.

Gus Richardson may like to speak of the content of the revolution, but what is missing is any elaboration of the political means of achieving such content in reality. Indeed, the logic of the argument leads to an apolitical cynicism, and the inability to confront the totality of capitalist social relations (including its state apparatus).

For these reasons, revolutionary socialists can only respond in a thoroughly critical, though not dogmatic way to the article.

Some of Richardson's observations about the New Left are relatively straightforward. With these we do not basically disagree. Rather, it is his conclusions which must be challenged.

The New Left was ideologically and politically heterogeneous in origin, and reflective of a broad based radicalization (which included real movements: anti-war, anti-imperialism, students, blacks, women, etc.) It succeeded in raising many questions concerning the historical project of human liberation, and focused much of its emphasis on the sphere of culture and everyday life, as part of its politics.

However, it proved incapable of forging real links with the working class, or developing a coherent political strategy which would lead in that direction. The last few years have witnessed its decomposition as a political entity. The Left of 1974 is not the same as it was in 1968. There has been some political clarification. Nonetheless, many of the author's criticisms do reflect partial truths.

Much of the 'Left' (contrary to Richardson, we deny it is an undifferentiated entity) does suffer from sectarianization and poor pedagogy. Furthermore, it is objectively true that the Left remains fragmented and relatively isolated. The question posed is: can it be transformed?

Richardson plays the obscurantist in simply stating the problem in terms of supposed sectarianism, sloganeering, and an inability to communicate with the masses. The prior and fundamental questions are political: the development of a political strategy, the elaboration of a political programme, the initiation of political practice, the building of a political organization. It is these tasks, rather than Richardson's soul searching, which constitute serious work towards the development of socialism.

In short, while the author has certain powers of observation about the deformations of the current Left, he politically understands very little, and in his article explains even less.

Why the lack of understanding? Partly a matter of method, partly a matter of political retreat.

The New Left was faced with a strategic dilemma. A part of it tried to resolve this by moving in a Marxist direction, while others became politically inactive or floundered about. Richardson's sympathies lie with the original ideas of the New Left—five to ten years later. His positions reflect the current political and methodological confusion of those who continue to hold those views. And what we're left in the article is his completely idealist, highly eclectic and totally populist outlook counterposed to the gross caricature of revolutionary Marxism he fashions.

The author's behavioural criticisms (grains of truth about the "religious" attitudes of the worst left sects, and their fetishization of the "scriptures" of Marxism) are distorted into slanderous generalizations. In this sense, the author has not radically broken from the bourgeois ideologists of anti-communism who deliberately fostered the false equation between communism and Stalinist Russia, who deliberately served up the crap about Marxism being reducible to mechanistic economic determinism. What he does not acknowledge or understand is the real method of living Marxism.

Revolutionary Marxists seek to understand the underlying structures and dynamics of the world in order to be able to transform it in a conscious and purposeful manner. If we look at the current relationship of forces on a world scale, it becomes clear that the question of revolutionary socialism is concretely posed. The international capitalist system is entering a new phase of crisis with the coming of a world economic recession, the continuation of the colonial revolution in Indochina, dramatic developments in Portuguese and Southern Africa, and political political crises racking many western European nations (Italy, Greece, Portugal, France, even Britain), not to mention the perpetual instability of Latin America.

The world exists, but where is it to be found in Richardson's idealized, subjective schema of everyday life and its content? It is not to be found.

Instead we are served a series of superficial carpings at the left (which almost begs the question of whom we are fighting and who is the enemy). Some of themes (and questions) which are presented are (i) tactics versus freedom, (ii) the prevalence of bourgeois ideology among the people, (iii) the left as bourgeois, (iv) the vanguard and alienation of the left from the masses, (v) the need to relate to the traditions and roots of the people. All of these criticisms are oversimplifications or outright misrepresentations which cannot stand the test of critical political scrutiny.

Tactics versus the content of freedom is a false juxtaposition of two separate questions, which does not solve or explain the problem that a relationship between them can be potentially complementary (i.e. using tactics to move towards freedom), as well as potentially contradictory. Socialism will only be obtained in the world by the combining of the self-activity of workers, political clarity of revolutionaries and the global development of productive forces. The task is not to renounce political struggle in the name of freedom.

As Richardson states, bourgeois ideology is indeed dominant among the people—the article makes it a truism. In fact Marx made that very observation—that the dominant ideas in society were those of the ruling class—but, the question then becomes by what process will the masses break from bourgeois ideology in order to achieve socialism? This will only occur with the self-activity of the vanguard of the working class in conjunction with the conscious intervention of a mass revolutionary party. Richardson's pessimism appears to stem from the fact that he does not realise there is a workers' vanguard (i.e., some workers have more advanced levels of consciousness and capacity for action than others).

As to the Leninist party, Richardson offers a few of the usual cliches, partly due to the fact that such a mass revolutionary party does not currently exist. The author's position amounts to a rejection of the role of any political vanguard. We can begin to see that his practice amounts to pure capitulation to the reformism of the labour bureaucracy and some of the more backward manifestations of bourgeois ideology. This can be seen if we look at the content of his freedoms, which are not very clearly socialist despite his praise of certain socialist figures, such as Debbs. His view of socialism is merely as one ideology among others. This banalized vision stands in sharp contrast to the Marxist view of historical possibilities of human liberation in the material development of the productive forces and the conscious collective control of social organization. His is an eclectic blending of new and old, of socialist, liberal and conservative ideas. Will a new human culture maintain itself in the fetters of religious ideology or will it abolish this form of alienation and liberate itself from mystification?

In short, Richardson's ideas are not very helpful. They do not (despite pretensions) point the way to human liberation. In fact, ironically, if one carefully reads through the sound and fury of Richardson's words, one is left with a vague feeling of emptiness.

Women study role in post-secondary education

By JACKIE GREATBACH

The University of Guelph was host last weekend to a conference on women in post-secondary education—Women as Students: Strategies for Change.

The conference, consisting of two days of talks, was co-ordinated by Guelph's Federation of Women Students and the Ontario Federation of Students.

About 35 delegates and resource persons attended the conference, with university representatives coming from as far as Thunder Bay and Ottawa.

Panel discussions were the central format of the conference. Topics included sex-typing in post-secondary education, (in course-content and streaming), lack of resources for women in post-secondary education, (in OSAP loans policy, scarcity of women in faculty and administration and lack of adequate daycare).

Strategy sessions in which plans for action and change were discussed, played a central part in the conference.

Examination of student groups such as course unions and governments as vehicles of action was also a major area of interest.

The formation of women's core groups on campus was seen as a necessity for any effective change in the post-secondary system.

Two areas that generated concern at last weekend's conference on women in post-secondary education were the lack of, and need for, women's studies as part of the university curriculum and the need to change the male oriented, competitive power structure within the university.

Ceta Ramkhalawansingh, a co-founder of the first women's studies courses at U of T, spoke of the need for such courses so that women can learn about their history.

In traditional bourgeois education, where "things", instead of people are studied, women's history has all but been ignored, she said.

Women's struggle for equality, from the suffragettes' fight for the vote, through women's entrance into the ranks of male-oriented areas such as politics, trade unions and professional work, has been buried in the records of history.

U of T philosophy professor, Lorene Clark stressed the need for more women to get into the controlling areas of the university in order to change stereotyped attitudes.

She warned against women becoming co-opted into a power system that promotes the competition and power elitism of the system.

The Varsity — Jackie Greatbach

Margaret Anderson spoke on the need for devoting more resources to women's studies.

SAC continues to meet with frustration in its fight to get space for a pub and gamesroom from the U of T administration.

A Monday meeting with vice-president Jill Conway was supposed to yield a firm decision on an earlier SAC request for space in the Sigmund Samuel library for a games room.

But the SAC executive members were put off again as Conway told them the university had not decided on the use of space now vacant in the library.

SAC communication commissioner Michael Sabia said Conway had offered them the use of the present lounge in the basement, but this was obviously unacceptable because it would take away one service for another.

SAC was also offered 2,200 square feet of space in the basement of the science and medicine wing, but this too is inadequate for the SAC proposal, which would require at least 4,000 square feet.

SAC officials were also alarmed at the suggestion by Conway that the proposals for a pub and a games room be put into the Campus as Campus Centre plans at the expense of other services proposed.

"They are trying to get us to trade off," said services commissioner

John Tuzyk. "They tend to see the Campus as Campus Centre as a panacea for all services."

The administration also turned down a SAC suggestion that the games room be located in the temporary building now occupied by the School of Graduate Studies. The university maintains SGS will need the building for at least two years.

SAC is making plans to try and demonstrate there is student support for the pub and games room to strengthen their hand in future negotiations.

Right now the situation is up in the air. Conway told SAC there will be further study by physical plant on costs of renovating parts of Sigmund Samuel for the games room.

The original SAC proposal, made almost a month ago, called for a daily campus pub to act as a central place where students can meet in a quiet atmosphere.

In previous years SAC has sponsored Friday and Saturday night pubs with entertainment and has lost money.

The games room proposal is for a large area with billiard tables, ping-pong tables and coin-operated amusement machines with full-time staff open seven days a week.

The proposals were presented as part of an attempt to remedy the lack of social and recreational facilities.

The U of T is one of the few campuses in Ontario without both a games room and large daily pub.

There is no ordinary man. Everyone is extraordinary." Studs Terkel

The Oral Tradition; An Introduction

During the summer of 1974, a group of university of Toronto students were funded through the federal "Opportunities for Youth" programme for an oral history project.

The project focused on World War I and Canadian Society; and, during the course of the summer, some 225 citizens were interviewed on tape about their experiences before and during the war. The tapes themselves will be deposited in the Public Archives of Canada; and a book on the subject is being prepared for publication. On pages 8 and 9 are some transcripts of those interviews.

The prime intention of the project was to probe how the war "speeded up" Canadian society and increased the tempo of the social and economic transformation which characterized the early decades of the century in Canada.

War tends to "tighten" a society, pulling it closer together while exposing and intensifying many of the differences and tensions which compose it. In a sense, war acts as an historical pressure cooker. It leaves no major part of the society unaffected.

Although the war was the central event of the project, the interviewing attempted to provide a much larger picture of the ways in which society changed during those years, and the ways in which the war as a historical event tells us something about the character of Canadian society in the period.

The people interviewed ranged from the Ukrainian homesteader to members of the Toronto social elite. Out of all this material, one can suggest a composite, living picture of the variety of "collective experiences" which typified Canada in the early twentieth century.

Images Of The Past

The image of pre-war Canadian society, as it emerges from the interviews, is one that has as its points of reference the church, the family and the community.

"In those days the church was the social centre of our existence." People went often and regularly. There is a sense too of a religiosity that did not end at the church walls, but spread out and permeated everyday life.

The sense of the family is strong and recurrent. The hard-working father is present, but somehow lacks the substance that the mother holds in the people's memories. It was her personal warmth and strength that suffused the home.

The sense of community is strong. Relations were ever-present; people knew all their neighbours on a street. The piano in the parlor formed the centre for sing-songs and socials that gave form and substance to this sense of community.

The sense of a shared experience was created. Even in their recreations. Boys and girls of dating age went out in "gangs", never in pairs.

Yet all this changed, and there is a feeling that the First World War had contributed, if not caused, the change. The society that was to emerge was urban and industrial in its shape and values, not rural and Victorian.

The Impact of War

There are many reasons for attributing some casual force for this change to the war's impact. Unlike any previous war, the Great War was a total war. It mobilized women as well as men, and society as a whole, in a massive and complete way. It made demands that penetrated to the heart of family life.

On a social level, the war sped up the processes of urbanization and industrialization. The personal factory owners were increasingly replaced by the corporate managers. In the factory itself, the demands of war production created the speed-up and time-work studies that led to the rise of scientific management and alienation for the worker.

On a more personal level, women watched sons, brothers, fathers and husbands march off to war, many never to return. Victory Gardens meant pinched stomachs. The ring of the telephone brought the terror of death into the home.

To ignore the war as a factor in the evolution of our society would be foolish. Yet part of these people's perceptions of change may perhaps flow from individual and psychological factors as well.

The Quality of Memory.

"Those were very happy days", as one man told us. Yet perhaps in those words lie the key to understanding the past as pictured. Was it truly as presented, or has it been filtered and altered by all the intervening years?

Certainly, in one sense, it is a specialized memory. Most of the people we interviewed were in their teens or early twenties when the war broke out. Their memories, then, were those of youth, unpressed by the tensions of adult life. As one woman admitted, "I was a very unsophisticated eighteen when the war started, very unsophisticated, now when I see the girls of eighteen".

The image of the family as presented is perhaps questionable. After all, it was during this time that Sigmund Freud was developing the theories that shed light on the deep and brooding tensions of Victorian life.

For all the image's weaknesses as a presentation of the past, it is still important in understanding a generation that threw itself so whole-heartedly into total war.

In many ways 1914 was the swan song of Victorian society, for in calling into service the morals and values of Victorianism—loyalty, duty, devotion and sacrifice—it also destroyed them. Those values had been used to create the repressive vision of "pure living" that had obscured the dark side of society—a side that could no longer be hidden in war.

So many boys (for such they were), holding high the Victorian idealism, came face to face with the realities of life—sex, drink, tobacco and crudity. They returned, but the old values had died on the battlefields of France.

This brief excursion into the past as remembered is only one example of the ways in which oral history can be used to unlock the meaning of history as a lived experience.

It also forces us to ask questions about oral history as a technique.

Oral History

An individual does not simply dust off his experiences and hand them over to the oral historian. Memory is the personalized history of the individual. The individual lives in the present, but draws upon and organizes his past to provide some reinforcement, some meaning, for his life in the society and culture around him.

Oral history, then, becomes a very contemporary, cultural document. It is an investigation of the dominant values and attitudes which can be observed as they reinforce themselves by shaping and meditating personal experiences in memory.

There is much merit in this approach to oral history: it reminds us that past and present do interact and talk to each other in oral history, and that the oral historian must understand the workings of that interaction.

It stresses, too, that an interview should range over a vast number of experiences, must explore the contemporary setting of the individual, and should expose the various ways in which the present turns back into the past and pulls a subtle, contemporary net through it.

The approach stresses, too, that the interviewer must develop a much more refined, probing interview technique if he is to penetrate and understand the workings of memory.

The elderly, particularly those in institutional settings, view their pasts in a fascinating way. As some of the excerpts which follow suggest, the "past" often seems to be "more real" for them.

There is, for example, the strong identification with the sense of community and purpose which they reconstruct in their memories, however idyllic a picture that might be.

A strong psychological motive runs through their memories: their sense of the past, of their childhood and young adulthood, is in marked contrast to the alienation of institutional life and the self-image which our society forces them to accept.

The Sense of Change

The elderly, too, have experienced a great deal of social change during their lifetime. One often encounters highly articulate and perceptive comments like:

"See, a lot has changed. Tomorrow will never be the same as today. Every day is indifferent. Every day something happens that didn't happen before and the sum total of these changes take place but human beings cannot change so quickly and it upsets them. And the older people get, the more difficult it is.

Oral history, with its stress on history as the history of living individuals, provides us with unique insights into memory and the changing character of our society, as perceived and felt by its elderly members.

Oral history is aptly suited to explore these sorts of problems. Its primary importance, however, is simply that it is more history—more history than we would have had without an oral record of experiences.

Oral history preserves the experiences of the "inarticulate", of those people and classes about whom little is documented in traditional sources. Oral history is a valuable historical record of accent, dialect, and patterns of speech, as they reflect region, nationally, and class.

Individuals are witness to events and activities in their society; their memories can provide important material on the social history of the period. Along with more traditional sources, oral history provides a richness of historical description.

It recovers, however, the essence of people living in history, and people creating their own history.

Mr. McNeal: Let me tell you just a little episode. Now this is just after the beginning of the war, in October or November I guess it would be. I was down on the main street of London (Ontario). It was an overcast day, very dull. A troop of soldiers, some in uniform and some not, with no arms and with very stern faces marched along the street, towards the station. Everybody fell silent.

We didn't know where they were going. They were probably reservists from Britain. And while they marched past, an old man in a wagon who had been stopped by this parade stood up and cheered. I wondered if he was a South African veteran or a Riel Rebellion veteran, I don't know. But everyone else was very quiet, we just watched them. They disappeared and we had no idea where they went.

Why do you think everyone else was silent?

Mr. McNeal: We didn't know what we were confronted with.

Why did you enlist?

Mr. Ashly: Well, in those days, just at the beginning of the war, the newspapers used to have notices of people who were enlisting. I belonged to a family that was truly English, and every night my father would read the paper, saying "Well, Johnny Jones, and so and so, and so and so have enlisted today."

Well, I got so fed up listening to "Johnny Jones joining, and this other guy joining" and so on that I finally said to a pal of mine "I'm going to join the army. Everybody else is going. I don't know what it's all about, but I'm going anyway."

That's how I joined the army.

Mr. Bowman: I enlisted two days after my eighteenth birthday, in January 1917. I must say, looking back on it, that I was completely brainwashed by the society in which I lived. I never questioned the righteousness of our cause.

We were encouraged to believe that the British Empire was something very special that had practically been guided by God. We sang "God of our Fathers, Lord of our Far Flung Battle Lines". We were told that night half the race of man was subject to our king, nigh half the world in his domain, and where he rules all are free, or something like that. We had to memorize it.

We were taught that the British Empire was the white man's burden and we had gone out with the best of good will to try and help the natives. Livingstone was the ideal. I never questioned that what we were doing was right and that the Germans were all wrong.

Was that typical of many other people who signed up?

Mr. Bowman: Not typical, I found when I got into the army, of any but a small idealistic group of students; of people from teachers' families or preachers' families. That was one of the first shocks to me.

The average fellow in the army was rather coarse. All my fellow soldiers would have no other interest except finding a girl for the night.

The coarseness of the sexual jokes and talk was a tremendous shock to me.

I came from a sheltered family, and I had the Tennyson idea of bearing the white flower of blameless light, you know, until you got married.

I froze up inside, because of this, to a considerable extent.

Does the war stand out in your life as a really significant event?

Mr. Bowman: Oh, yes. There's one memory that stands out very clearly. It was the day that we were taken out to be taught bayonet-fighting.

They had 'straw men, and after you were told how to hold the rifle, you had to practice taking a run and a jab at this straw man.

"In", "Out", and "On Guard" is what the Sergeant shouted. There were two places that you tried to slam the bayonet into — his throat and his stomach.

When we came back that evening, I think more than half of us couldn't eat our supper. From that time on I've had this ambivalence.

I just couldn't think about it. I just hung on to . . . the best we could hope for was that this war would make the world safe for democracy, and it's a helluva business, and the sooner we get it over with the better.

You said that the war changed your attitudes, that you learned about the true nature of men. How did it change?

Mr. Mackenzie: Well, the things that were worthwhile. Nobody could say when they got up in the morning that they were going to go to bed at night.

There was no jealousy, no meanness. When we lived together in a mess there was nobody trying to get the better of you. It was like being in a society where there was very little difference in meaningful relations.

"It was a trip into hell, as near as hum"

1914 - THE M

If you think it crude to be rough and rude,

This tale is not for you. There's nothing nice about rats and mice,

From any point of view. Yes the rats do roam and make their home,

In the fields where the dead men lie;

Yes the lice do bite all day and night, And never quit till you die.

Where the human moles from their stinking holes,

Crawl up through the muck and slime,

To hide all day and work all night

Till there is no sense to time. The great shells roar through the leaden skies

As their targets crouch in the drains,

Then burst with a roar and the shrapnel flies,

And it rains and rains and rains. On a dirty night when your nerves draw tight,

And you rouse to the gas alarms;

In a dank shell hole you'd sell your soul,

For a night in a woman's arms. When the gray green mass of chlorine gas,

Drifts down from the eastern sky,

You choke and spit till your lungs are split,

And you hear your best friends die.

In the stinkin' stench of a rotten trench,

With the swarms of filthy flies, Some men got caught so their bodies rot

And the maggots eat their eyes. Here tattered bums from city slums

With pampered sons of the rich, All lie with God on that sodden sod,

And you can't tell which is which.

In that sea of mud you can feel your blood,

Go cold as you shake with fright, And among the dead you raise your head,

To stand to your post to fight. When at last relief breaks through,

And the press reports all quiet . . .

Mr. Edwards: When we landed in France we were billeted in an old asylum. They'd taken all the patients away.

One morning, when I got up to find a place where I could have a wash and that I heard a crash of gunfire. I went through a hole in the wall to see what was going on.

They'd just shot a guy: tied him up to a post, put an 'X' over his heart, and then shot him. They had two more, and they stood there with their mouths open.

They were deserters or something. An example to the rest of the troops that this is what would happen if they got out of line.

I'd never seen a man killed before that, and I watched them shoot two more, and then the sergeant gave them the coup de grace. He shot them in the ear.

It was a Lancashire regiment, I think, and they stood there after it was all over and said "Come on, don't stand there. Give us a hand with these bodies."

They were just hanging on the ropes — rigor mortis hadn't set in yet. The soldiers brought pine crates with straw in them. I got behind and helped somebody loosen the ropes.

His pants streamed hot human blood all over my little knees and I wanted to get out. I thought "Oh, where the hell am I going."

Can you tell me what your reaction was when war was declared?

Mrs. Richards: Excitement! Thrills! It was all going to be over in six weeks.

Our gang — now think of the gang as about anywhere from eight to eleven young people, all within the ages of sixteen to twenty-two. We were all thrilled to pieces. Great excitement.

The first of our gang to go left for camp six weeks after war was declared. He went in civvies with a band on his sleeve. We all said goodbye to him. Thrilled to pieces. Great excitement and he'd be back in six weeks.

He never came back.

Was there any bad feeling towards the boys who didn't go?

Mrs. Richards: They had a pretty

Dear Maizy:

If I last another week my leave comes up and I will be on my way to London to see you again. If you enjoy the birds, the bees and the flowers, take a good look at them before I get there. rough time. That's where the white feathers came in.

I might tell you another story about one of our gang — one of the girls. She was a tall, lovely looking slim girl, who was very interested in one of our boys, the first to go to war.

He was killed two and a half years after the war began. Somehow or other she came in contact with a German internee in Toronto, and she married him.

We cut her dead! She just didn't belong to us. I look back on this and I'm so ashamed. At the age we were.

It was wrong to associate with Germans?

Mrs. Richards: Absolutely! We hated them!

mans could make it."

MEMORY OF WAR

Mrs. Barns: I'm ashamed to mention this now, but during the war we helped mostly with recruiting. But that's the way we felt — that it was quite the right thing for the Church to do.

We'd invite my husband's Sunday School class to the house to have some music. Most of them were in their teens, very young.

They must have been around eighteen and we urged them on. Most of them enlisted, and I can never forgive myself.

Why was that?

Mrs. Barns: Because the two that I liked the best of the group that went, the one came home terribly crippled with arthritis. He did marry but he never got over it. He was just frightfully crippled till he died.

The other boy came home and drank terribly and never made anything of his life, never married.

I think something happened there. I think they did what they didn't think was right there.

We sent them like children into a terrible situation. They wanted to be good, but in such a situation I'm sure most of them did things that disgusted them with themselves. So that they could never pick up the pieces.

out over the sea of mud and ruins and broken trees and horses all blown up with men lying there was just like hell . . . and the smells. You'd see a great big rat running along, as big as a small terrier he used to say, only with shorter legs.

He once told me an awful thing. There'd been a big battle and there were some German corpses knocked around. They were marching out and he said that every other man had to put his foot on a German's face that was lying there — tramp his face into the ground. They had to, they couldn't move out of the step. He said it was just literally squashed into the mud.

He told me about blowing up communication lines and railway bridges and things like that. And the hardest thing to do was to pull the pin on a grenade and throw it at somebody. You'd see some young guy standing in front of you and you know you've got to pull that pin and throw it at him or else he'll be doing it to you.

I think it leaves a mark on soldiers for ever and ever.

I know that in the first few years after he came back he would wake up in the most complete confusion and terror, you know, thinking he was back there. He couldn't seem to understand that he was

Mrs. McNeal: We were afraid to hear the telephone ringing. You see, my three brothers were all over. The oldest was killed in May, '17. He was married, so the telegram went to his wife in Simcoe and she had to telephone my mother.

When the second one died, the telegraph people phoned us. It was a dreadful period. We were absolutely terrified every time the telephone rang.

Do you think that your husband had changed? Had the war changed him?

Mrs. H. James: Oh, yes! Yes, he was a different person. He was much more mature than when he left. He was a laughing boy when he left. He wasn't laughing when he got home. He had grown gaunt and he was very sober.

He was different. He wasn't hard or cruel, but he just seemed as if he was hurt so badly by what he'd seen.

I remember him saying that to look safe and warm and dry.

No man, I think, that went through the war, came out the same.

I think it was a trip into hell, as nearly as humans could make it.

What was courting like in those days?

Mr. C. Rowse: Courting? You didn't go too far to court. You'd take in one of the nickel shows and sneak an odd kiss. But courting wasn't as wide open as what it is today.

If you went to somebody's house, usually there was a piano. You would play and sing on the piano, and then you would stand on the veranda for about five minutes before the old man'd say "Hey Elsie, come on in. Send that guy home."

It was quite different. I mean, it was more . . . more polite, if you want to put a word to it. But it was considerably different from today.

There seemed to be something more . . . real about it. Like the Santa Claus parade.

It used to be along Bloor. It seemed more real as a Santa Claus than it does today. Today it's like a fantasy or a carnival. But in those days you had a feeling that there was something genuine and real about it.

This realness is what's gone out of the lives of we people from a long way back, as I see it.

What was rural life like in those days?

Mrs. H. James: I often look back and marvel at the way everybody could trust everybody else. You were dealing with people who, having said "I will do this and you can depend on it," you could depend on it. They didn't let you down.

If you bought anything from them you knew it was exactly what they said it was. No hidden defects, 'cause if there were they'd tell you about it.

That is the hardest thing in the world to get used to now: the fact that you can't trust people's word or you can't trust their motives.

As a general rule we always took people at their face value and we believed in them and we didn't expect any underhanded moves from them.

After the First World War . . . the world changed. It was just like a waltz before, you know, just like a Strauss waltz. I'm not trying to make it out ideal. I didn't know anything about the city where things might have been terrible.

Where I lived everybody was God-fearing. If anyone was sick, or there was an accident, automatically you went and helped them and you never thought anything about it. It was just part of what everybody did.

And that's the truth, as I remember it.

Some make it, some don't

Well-placed sources have provided The Varsity with an up-to-the-minute list of campus groups which have been officially recognized by the administration. The administration forced all groups on campus to apply for annual official recognition this fall in the wake of the 'Banfield incident' last March in which members of the OS prevented visiting professor Edward Banfield from speaking. Official recognition allows groups to take advantage of university facilities without charge. Conspicuous by their absence from the list are such well-heeled organizations as the University of Toronto Faculty Association, the Art House Chorus and the Student Christian Movement. Informed sources implied these groups would be forced to "go underground" in the wake of their official non-existence. "The people will support us," replied an official from the University of Toronto Staff Association, which has also been rendered officially extinct. Unfortunately, the Victoria College River Wideners Club, the Young People's Tap Dancing League, and the Institute for Cake Baking Reform did not make the official standings. The lucky few include: Academic Activities Committee; University of Toronto Baha'i Club; Sinai Brith Hillel Foundation; Black Student Union of the University of Toronto; Campus Alternative; Canadian Liberation Movement; Canadian Party of Labour; University of Toronto Committee of Canadian Union of Jewish Students; Chinese Students Association; University of Toronto Debating Union; The Hispanic Club of the University of Toronto; University of Toronto Historical Society; Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship; International Association for Students of Economics and Commerce; University of Toronto Italian Club; University of Toronto Kendo Club; University of Toronto Marxist Institute Group; The Outing Club; University of Toronto Progressive Conservative Club; University of Toronto Revolutionary Marxist Group; Society for Creative Anachronism; Students for a Democratic Society; Students' International Meditation Society; Sufi Study Circle; World University Service of Canada; University of Toronto Young Socialists Club; Young Spartacus Club; Youth of the Macedonian Patriotic Organization.

DO YOU HAVE A BAD TEACHER?

DOES HE/SHE HAVE TENURE (A LIFE-LONG APPOINTMENT)?

If he does have tenure, that means he'll be teaching until he retires at 65.

One reason he has tenure is that when the question of his staying at the University of Toronto came up, there were no students on his tenure committees. Students who are very concerned about the quality of teaching and who would ensure that no bad teachers are allowed to stay here for life.

Of course, all of us have had good teachers, but that should be expected at this University. But, why are there so many bad ones?

Last week, the Academic Affairs Committee defeated a motion calling for parity between faculty and students on tenure committees. The vote was 3 for, 18 against. This week, the Committee is considering a faculty motion for no students on tenure committees.

Are you concerned about the faculty motion? Do you want to prevent mistaken tenure decisions?

Commission criticizes mindless growth of universities

HALIFAX (CUP) — A Nova Scotia royal commission has sharply criticized the mindless fashion in which many universities have been growing.

The report, which covers a wide range of problems in provincial-municipal relations and public services, argues that universities have moved away from their proper function in a search for larger enrolments and more money.

The overselling of education in the 1960s, led by the Economic Council of Canada, was based on what the commission calls "overstated and damaging arguments" which emphasized the amount of money a university degree would be worth to a person.

"By passively responding to higher and higher enrolment projections ... without considering whether vastly increased numbers of university-educated people are needed, whether there are jobs for them or whether all of the prospective students want or can benefit from a university education, the universities have abandoned one of their primary responsibilities," the report says.

The commission, headed by Dalhousie University economist John Graham, also blames society as a whole for part of the universities' problems because of its "misplaced preoccupation with academic credentials."

Even though a student's course of studies might be totally unrelated to the job he or she was seeking, employers look on university degrees as the only acceptable form of credentials, the commission says.

As a result, students are going to university not so much for a higher education as for "the certificates that would make them employable."

A better alternative for young people looking for credentials, the commission suggests, might in many cases be other post-secondary institutions or even on-the-job training.

"The function of the universities is, or should be, primarily to provide an opportunity for higher intellectual study to those both able to pursue and interested in pursuing it, and, in some instances, to prepare people for the intellectually demanding professions.

The arguments of the 1960s that society benefits in economic terms from the universities have also been shown to be extravagant, says the commission.

If society is not reaping tremendous benefits from those universities, the commission asks, why should it subsidize them so heavily?

Canadian university enrolments up this year

OTTAWA (CUP) — Most Canadian universities have reported an upswing in the number of students on campus this autumn.

Many spokesmen attribute the increases to a revived interest in higher education and to the current economic situation. They say students are taking courses that will guarantee them a job after graduation instead of the unemployment line.

Many of the new students are taking professional courses because of the inflationary spiral and the uncertainty of the job market.

An exception to the general trend appears to be Memorial University in Newfoundland where total undergraduate enrolment this fall dropped to 5,500 from 6,048 last fall.

However, Memorial spokesmen say that first year enrolment is up over last year.

Some spokesmen are attributing the increases to the rising interest of women in obtaining an education. The registrar at the University of New Brunswick says there are about 5,650 full-time students at the university this year, an increase of about 50 over last year. He attributes the increase to more women.

The University of British Columbia in Vancouver anticipated the number of undergraduate and graduate students this year would be as much as 10 percent higher than the 21,368 registered last year.

A spokesmen for the University of Victoria also expected enrolment to be higher than last year's 6,069. Victoria's enrolment record of 6,341 was set in 1972-73, the year that many other Canadian universities registered a drop in students.

An admissions officer at Ottawa's Carleton University said the number of non-high-school graduates wishing to enter Ontario universities this year is up 15 percent over last year. At McMaster University, total 1974-75 enrolment is estimated at 8,850 and the number of first year students 2,750, both records.

The University of Toronto anticipated a record total enrolment of 43,772, about 1,225 more students than last year.

Hart House report concludes additional funding needed

A committee reporting on the priorities and expenditures of Hart House has concluded that additional funding will be necessary if Hart House is to perform its job adequately.

Additional funds would come either from increased members' fees or "elsewhere", the Committee to Re-examine Present Priorities and Expenditures of Hart House says.

The committee was struck by the Hart House board of stewards last November following a request from the internal affairs committee to see if Hart House was capable of adapting itself to new programs.

The report, which was submitted to the internal affairs committee

Monday, was to consider which of Hart House's programs were the most important, in order that money could be transferred to other programs to prevent a possible fee increase.

However, the committee replied that "unless substantial economies can be identified in the carrying on of these programs, and with continual cost increased due to inflation, increased revenue will be needed to enable the house to add new events to serve a wider range of interests in the university."

The report also notes the decline in the ratio of Hart House staff to members (presently 1-1,450) is a "false economy", and calls on the university to "find the resources to enlarge and improve its staff in keeping with the increased responsibilities which (Hart House) has assumed and will be called upon to assume."

Hart House presently has a staff of 125, 19 of whom deal with programs.

The report also lists about $500,000 in improvements needed by Hart House, of which it has only $100,000 in reserves.

Hart House presently receives income of $500,000 a year from members' fees.

The writers of the report also note, "We have some impression that our study has been used as an excuse to delay the making of hard but essential decisions."

Hart House warden Jean Lengelle echoed that sentiment to the internal affairs committee. He noted that asking Hart House to examine its own priorities was only putting off a decision on how, or whether to find extra funds for the House.

Waterloo grads boycott classes

WATERLOO (CUP) — Graduate students in the political science department of the University of Waterloo have been boycotting classes and are pursuing independent group study sessions due to what they call the department's "seeming indifference to what we as individuals are trying to pursue."

The grads have complained of the overly formal structure of their program and its seminars which they say deny "individual initiative."

The grads also want the present requirement that at least half of their courses be taught by the political science department be dropped as policy and that the faculty investigate the abolition of all mandatory courses.

The protesting group feels the faculty should adopt the principle of "student-centred content and procedure."

As a result of these problems, the first year grads insist that morale among the students is declining rapidly.

The protesters see themselves as a group and believe they'll gain more by collective solidarity.

They have been meeting regularly for the past few weeks to draw up a position paper outlining their demands.

The paper complains of the strict, tightly structured course system for which there is no alternative.

"An alternative approach in which structure is allowed to evolve" seems to be at the crux of their demands.

The paper notes, "The current malaise among a large portion of graduate students appears to arise out of a sense of non-involvement and distance from other people in the department, notably faculty."

The paper suggests "the initiation of a process of mutual consultation between graduates and faculty with regard to the future development of alternative interest and study groups," and "the initiation of student participation in grievance and appeal committees."

Hockey Blues split in Moncton

By SYD CAPPE
The hockey Blues made a brief visit to Moncton on the weekend and split a pair of games in the University of Moncton tournament.

In the first game the Blues downed Saint Francis Xavier 5-2. In a chippy game the Varsity players started out slow but played well throughout the second and third stanzas.

Don Pagnutti picked up three goals and one assist while Kent Ruhnke and Ivan MacFarlane each added a score.

The Blues barraged the SFX net with 41 shots while Bob Oss fielded only 15.

Ron Harris came away with a broken nose after catching a high stick and Bill Fifield needed repairs to his chin after a similar incident.

In an offensively dull game Sunday afternoon, the Blues choked 5-1 to Loyola.

Although Varsity outshot Loyola

36-26, it wasn't until the last three minutes of the final period that Doug Herridge spoiled goaler Jim Corsi's shutout hopes.

In spite of Loyola's five goals, Varsity netminder Dave Hulme felt he had performed well. He had little chance on any of the goals.

Toronto gave the puck away on numerous occasions with poor passing and a general lack of finishing power.

The consensus was that the Loyola defence presented the greatest obstacle to Toronto. Herridge said after the game that he didn't feel that Corsi had really been tested because the defence was tough to beat once they had set up.

Basically the Blues just did not get any breaks while allowing their opponents many scoring opportunities.

The team now looks forward to a western trip. They play this weekend in Edmonton and Calgary before returning home to open their season at the arena. The first game sees McMaster as the visitors.

Bluesnotes: after two seasons with Varsity, Rick Cornacchia has decided to play for the Orillia Terriers of the OHA senior A. Al Potts will replace him on the Blues roster.

Lady Blues fencers second

By THE PHANTOM
On Saturday at Queen's was the annual fencing tournament. Six teams took part in the round-robin competition: McGill, McMaster, Queen's, Ryerson, Toronto, and Trent.

Each team consisted of four fencers but the Ryerson and Trent teams were short and had to use Toronto girls to fill out their rosters.

The Varsity team of Penny Blake, Yoko Ode, Anne Stokes and Vivian Zochowski met and defeated McMaster in the first round. McMaster won the finals last year.

In what turned out to be the first place deciding match with Queen's Toronto was defeated 7 bouts to 9.

The team sprang back to beat Trent, McGill, and Ryerson.

The standings at the end of the tournament showed Queen's first, Toronto second, and McGill third.

Soccer Blues lose to Waterloo

By JOHN COBBY

For their visit last Sunday to Waterloo, the soccer Blues turned in the worst performance seen for many years by a Varsity soccer team.

After being behind 3-0 at the interval, and receiving a verbal blast from coach, Bob Nicol, the Blues eventually lost 4-1 to the Warriors.

It was the first time in eight years that the Waterloo squad had vanquished Toronto, and at least six years since the Blues had conceded four goals in any game.

After a deceptively fast start to the season, the team had fallen on hard times, having gained only 2 points from its last 7 games.

Because the average calibre of play throughout the league has continued to rise over the years, it was perhaps inevitable that any Blues team containing less talent than its predecessors would be hard put to maintain its traditional high standing.

For various reasons, this year's squad has few players of superior ability, but the team should win its fair share of games despite this.

According to Bob Nicol, Sunday's horrendous first half was due to a lack of personal pride coupled with a gross shortage of effort.

Whilst taking nothing away from the Warrior performance, which has improved greatly this season, he felt the Blues could have disputed the outcome should they have shown a desire to win.

He indicated that losing is part of the game, but the manner of losing was what disgusted him.

Even though the two teams were virtually equal in technical skills, the Waterloo players compensated for their deficiencies by making the extra effort. As the Blues showed almost no desire, the game was easily controlled by the home team.

With the exception of Jude Robinson, Vince Ierullo, Geoff Crewe and Rudi Kovacko, who put in noble efforts for the whole time they were on the field, the team showed a deplorable lack of motivation.

In fairness, it should be mentioned that both Mike Hendrickse and Drew McKeown exhibited a considerable desire throughout the second half, even though the game was virtually lost by that time.

It is perhaps purposeless to describe in detail each of the goals conceded in the first half. They were well taken by energetic Waterloo forwards, who were always correctly positioned at the right time, but even they would probably admit their task was eased by the Blues' sins of omission, both physical and mental.

The first was scored by a forward following up on a direct free kick that was only partially cleared, the second resulted from a well-executed passing move, and the third from a mental lapse.

With the ball well within range, Blues' goalkeeper, Igor Ivanisevic, declined to hold it in anticipation of a goal kick.

Unfortunately, the linesman who was perfectly positioned, judged correctly that the ball had not left the bounds of the pitch hence the game was still in progress.

The eager Warriors fastened onto the ball, pushed it into the net end and only then checked to see if the play should cease.

The second half was marginally better than that the Blues held a slight advantage without ever looking menacing. Indeed their goal was somewhat fortunate, being scored by Crewe from the penalty spot after a dubious call by the referee, maybe he had sympathy for the Toronto team.

The Warriors' final goal was the result of yet another indecisive play within the defense.

An errant back-pass was seized gratefully by a rampaging forward and neatly turned home.

Generally the Blues showed a masochistic insistence in dribbling into trouble, and once having been dispossessed failed to hustle their opponents in order to win back the ball.

Admitting any athlete has an off day, the sort of performance that has no amount of exhortation can improve. But the ability to run energetically in order to unsettle the opposition is not dependent on the game to game fluctuations in the technical ability of the player on the ball. Therein lay Blues' demise.

All in all, it was a sorry performance.

Hopefully, with today's visit of the Brock Badgers to Varsity Stadium (kick-off 3 pm) the Blues will regain some pride in their performance.

Vic exonerated and skule make playoffs

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The engineers interfac football team didn't win a game this year but made the playoffs Monday night by administrative fiat.

The men's Intramural Sports Committee voted 8-6 to give the winless Engineers a playoff spot after the Vic football team defaulted two games to them last Thursday.

Technically, Vic should have been expelled from the league, but the committee accepted Vic representatives' statements that the defaults were accidental.

Vic was supposed to play a regularly scheduled match against Engineers last Thursday. Following this, the remainder of an Oct. 2 game, which had been successfully protested by the Engineers, was to have been played.

The football review board, which upheld the protest, re-scheduled the Oct. 24 game to 2 pm from 3 pm because of the extra time required.

Vic representatives neglected to inform the team, however, and it showed up at 3 pm.

By then, the referees had awarded both games to Engineers by default, bringing with it the possibility Vic might be expelled from the league because of intramural rules.

The men's intramural sports committee, an all-student body which decides intramural sports policy, convened a special meeting Monday to sort out the mess.

Twenty-eight people, many of them still in referees' or players' uniforms from the just completed football games, crowded into the athletic directorate board room.

After some debate, the committee passed Mike Friend's motion that all four division I teams be in the playoffs, with first place Vic meeting Engineers in one of the Mulock Cup semi-finals.

Details on the playoffs will be decided this Thursday at a playoff meeting.

At least one person isn't satisfied with these arrangements, though.

This reporter overheard Don Warner, president of the Victoria College Athletic Union, mutter that the proceedings were "fixed" as the meeting adjourned.

We asked him whether he had anything to say for publication.

"No," said Warner slowly, his words dripping with fresh acid, "I'll just leave that up to your imagination."

Fastest goal in history

BAHIA, Argentina (CUP-ENS)

— The fastest goal in soccer history was scored recently and the upshot briefly shook the world of sports.

The incident took place during a recent soccer game between the Corinthians and the Rio Pretos.

About one second into the match, Corinthian star Roberto Rivellino, drove the ball with a left-footed drive from the half-way line all the way into the goal, zooming past the ear of goalie Isador Irandar.

The action was so fast that it caught the goalie still saying his pre-game prayers.

Angered, Irandar's brother, Joachim, stormed down out of the stands on to the playing field, pulled out a revolver and fired six shots into the soccer ball.

He received a standing ovation as police led him off the field.

Interfac f-ball season over; playoffs next.

Vic played most of their final game against PHE inside PHE's 20 yard line.

By MRS. PARKER
Familiar rivalries will be renewed in the interfac football playoffs following the results of the final games of the regular schedule played earlier this week.

Vic nailed down first place in Division I on Monday with a convincing 13-0 shoutout over a dispirited group from PHE, who were missing some key players. As the game progressed, several more jocks were taken to the sidelines and may not be ready for next week's semi-final against St. Mike's.

Vic spent most of the first half inside the PHE 25 yard line but managed only one touchdown. Two other apparent scores were nullified by Vic penalties.

PHE mounted a brief rally in the second half but the Vic defence was equal to the task and eventually the Scarlet and Gold offense put together a long march culminating in the game's final touchdown.

A third Vic touchdown on the final play of the game was wiped out by a roughing penalty.

Weather permitting, all playoff games will be at the Stadium. The pairings are Vic-Engineering and PHE-SMC and from the second division, undefeated New against UC and by popular demand a repeat showing of Scarborough and Trinity.

The survivors advance to the Mulock Cup championship games set for Tuesday, November 12.

In the other first division game played on the east field, St. Mike's edged by the plumbers 15-14 to sew up the third playoff spot for the Mulock.

SMC must now face Phys-Ed next week for the right to meet either Vic or Eng for the cup.

Engineers started off in fine fashion running up a 13-0 lead only to watch the steady grinding of the fathers whittle away the lead.

Marlow and Fauro scored the touchdowns for skule and Setino managed to convert one of them.

SMC came back with two TD's of their own by Klein and Barbeta. Liscio was unable to convert either touchdown but his moment of glory was to come later.

In the fourth quarter Liscio came up with a forty yard field goal that put the Mikes out in front to slay.

Eng completed the scoring with a wide field goal that went for a single.

Trailing by a single point Eng took up that Argo playbook that has been circulating the first division teams this year and attempted a field goal with 28 seconds left in the game.

Skule could have run another play before the field goal attempt at least to get in the center of the field before kicking.

In any case by edict of the Intramural Sports Committee Eng is in the playoffs anyway.

In second division UC pulled off their first win of the season to get into the playoffs. They will face New at the stadium next week.

Meds by virtue of today's loss are eliminated from action.

UC started off very strong in the first quarter punching in two touchdowns right off the bat. Both TD's were passes from Pandey to McGillivray. Only one tally was converted by Zajonc.

In the second quarter Meds came back with two scores of their own. One TD was set up when Pandey fumbled on Meds 9 yard line and Meds were able to scoop up the ball and run it all the way down to UC's 5. It took Wilson only one play to hit paydirt.

Wilson later caught a pass for a go-ahead touchdown but the lead was short lived as UC came back again to score twice more.

Final score was 25-19 for UC.

Toronto field hockey yet in first

By JANET KINGSTON
This weekend saw both ladies Blues senior and intermediate field hockey teams compete in part I of the final tournament at Queen's.

The seniors began against McGill Friday afternoon. The game was one of the best in the tournament with high levels of skill shown on both sides.

The game ended in a scoreless tie. Regular readers will recall that Toronto was only able to tie McGill in their last meeting.

Saturday, Queen's was the competition. After a slow start the Blues came through with a 6-0 win. Three brilliant goals by Brenda Eckhardt, two by Sue Scott and one by Ann Hoffman did the trick.

Also on Saturday, the Blues took on the McMaster team. Within five minutes of the start, Toronto had a 2-0 lead which they maintained to half time. In the second half Varsity added three more goals to complete the 5-0 rout.

In an upset, McMaster recovered to defeat McGill thereby giving Toronto sole possession of first place.

INTERMEDIATE By DIANE WARDROPE

In intermediate competition, Toronto played Laurentian in probably their best game of the year. Long accurate passing combined with good defence and fine rushing from the forwards allowed Eleanor Howey and Nancy Thomson to give Toronto a 2-1 win.

At 8:00 am Saturday, Varsity took advantage of Ottawa's sleepiness to drub them 9-0. Nancy Thomson had a hot hand, scoring 5 times while Martha Bagnall and Betty Shostak each added two. Against McMaster, Martha Bagnall scored again for a 2-0 win. The defence played under increased pressure in the second half when an injury forced the Blues to play shorthanded.

Conditioning seemed to be the determining factor in the final game against Queen's. Fern Brand, Varsity netminder, appeared to be the only one up for the game.

She kept Toronto in the game by stopping the Queen's attacks that seemed to take up permanent residence on her doorstep.

Even though neither team could score, Toronto was badly outplayed.

Going into next weekend's championship, Toronto will really have to be running to keep up with Queen's who are hungry for the OWIAA title.

Women's basketball lose to George Brown College 40-35.

By FERN BRAND and KATHY STEWART
The women's intermediate basketball team dropped a close one to George Brown College. The ladies got off to a slow start as Brown built up a 22 point lead by half time.

Blues came back with a determined effort in the second half catching up to within 5 points by the end of the match.

The final score was George Brown 40, Toronto 35.

Top scorers for the Blues were Chang Tsi, Kim Bull, and Maureen Benner.

The teams next encounter is Nov. 13 at the Benson Building when they host the York Raiders.

Meds lost to UC 25-19 to end their football season for this year.

Students lose tenure bid

Students have lost their bid to sit voting members on university tenure committees, which grant professors life-long appointment.

Tenure committees should have non-voting observers, either students, alumni or lay members, Governing Council's academic affairs committee decided last night.

The committee — which has been discussing the problem of the granting of tenure for the last year — made the decision by adopting a motion proposed by faculty member Bill Dunphy. Dunphy who argued an observer would assure justice would appear to be done in tenure decisions.

The decision was a great blow to students, who last week proposed that tenure committees be comprised of equal numbers of voting students and faculty.

The students' proposal was defeated, and the committee moved on to a model proposed by Dunphy.

At the very least, student supporters had hoped to seat a single voting student on tenure committees.

The issue of tenure in the universities — who should get it, and how it should be decided — has been a controversial one following the release in August, 1973 of the Forster report on academic appointments. The Forster task force was commissioned by U of T president John Evans.

The adopted proposal reads: "That tenure committees be composed of academic administrators and members of the teaching staff, together with an observer member who may be a student, or a lay member of the Governing Council, or a member of the alumni, but should not hold a full-time university teaching appointment.

"The observer member should receive the same documentation as the other members of the tenure committee. He or she should be present at all meetings of the tenure committee and should be free to participate in the committee's deliberations but not to vote.

"When the tenure committee has made its decision, the observer member should forward a separate report to the University Tenure Committee (a proposed new body) stating whether in his or her opinion the evidence before the tenure committee had been adequate, all of the evidence had been fully and fairly considered, and the published tenure criteria had been properly applied."

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch told the committee it was important to go on record as "having faith in students as mature adults to sit on tenure committees."

Kanowitch warned that "nothing can make up for the presence of a student on a tenure committee."

Graduate student Vernon Copeland, assuming the leadership of the fight against the observers' proposal, remarked Dunphy's proposal appropriately came on Halloween:

"It's seductive, but careful to avoid social disease," Copeland said. "We must treat it like a lady of the night."

Calling Dunphy's proposal a "charade and a sham," Copeland denounced it, saying it "doesn't deal with the issue" of giving decision-making power to students.

Dunphy was not amused. Student committee members had earlier requested a decision on the principle of student membership, before considering specific proposals.

The observer proposal was also criticized because there was no guarantee that the observer would have any legal redress or any formal way of guaranteeing his or her objections, if any, would be heard.

Graduate student member Pam Ealey challenged Dunphy to articulate "in what sense we are incompetent," a sentiment echoed by student member Shirley French. French accused members of the committee of having a "basic fear" of students, "fear of anything more than a token change."

Dunphy responded by challenging students to demonstrate their capability to sit on tenure committees. He claimed students lacked experience.

"What on earth are they (the faculty) afraid of?" asked alumnus Sonja Sinclair.

Dunphy's strongest supporter was Erindale history professor Desmond Morton, who argued U of T's tenure came from "creative scholarship," and that students would be "too ungenerous and undemanding" in sitting on tenure committees.

The academic affairs committee's report will be sent to Governing Council's executive committee, which then forwards its suggestions for approval to the Governing Council.

After the meeting, Copeland assured student supporters, "The fight is not over yet."

Ward 6 Group charges improper voters' lists

While several hundred eligible voters at U of T have not made voters' lists for the upcoming Dec. 2 elections, "at least 2,000 individuals in Toronto's business core have been improperly listed," the Ward Six Community Organization charged yesterday.

The organization, a coalition of citizen groups in Ward 6 — in which the university lies — charged yesterday it has uncovered 764 names of people on voters' lists who "appear to be ineligible."

The organization's slate of candidates — alderman Dan Heap, aldermanic candidate Allan Sparrow, school trustee Dan Leckie, and trustee candidate Bob Spencer — has challenged the names on the lists in nine polls in the Ward 6 central commerce area.

The organization has analyzed nine of the ward's 159 polls. The candidates conclude that if it found 764 names of ineligible voters, "at least 2,000 names should be removed from the lists."

People who live in a municipality and also own or rent business premises in that same municipality are eligible to vote only once.

However, people who live outside the City of Toronto and have their business elsewhere may vote in the two separate municipalities.

The candidates also found many names repeated several times in the same and different polls.

The four Ward 6 candidates have called for a reform of the entire enumeration process. They place the blame squarely on the shoulders of the provincial government.

They are demanding that the province instruct deputy returning officers to establish the residential address of all non-resident voters.

They also want the province to go through the remaining voting lists to disqualify ineligible voters.

The candidates cited John Tory, a corporate lawyer and member of the university's Governing Council, as listed six times in poll 11 at 11 King St. West.

Tory lives in North York and is therefore entitled to vote once in the City of Toronto.

However, the Ward 6 candidates are quick to point out, "No blame should be attached to the individuals who are incorrectly listed by the province's faulty enumeration process."

The Ward 6 candidates pointed to the fact that only 12 out of over 700 residents at U of T's New College residence were on voters' lists.

At the Graduate Students' Residence, only two — the warden and his wife — out of 220 residents were enumerated.

Because deputy returning officers now have virtually no power to prevent illegal voting, the candidates have called on the province to strengthen the D.R.O.'s position before the Dec. 2 election.

"The systematic disenfranchisement of students and the equally systematic padding of the businessmen's vote through the negligence of the province raise serious questions about the whole democratic process," the candidates stated in a release.

Alderman William Archer and Kay Dock Yip are also in the election race in Ward 6, which is bounded by Palmerston Ave. to the west, Sherbourne St. to the east, and runs from Bloor St. south.

Spencer was president of U of T's Students' Administrative Council in 1971-72 and was SAC education commissioner the preceding year. He is presently student advisor at the Students' Union of Ryerson Polytechnical Institute.

Leckie, also a former SAC education commissioner, promoted, along with Spencer, the first Chinese Parents' Association. Leckie initiated teaching in local schools of Chinese and languages spoken in the Ward 6 community. He promoted a major shake-up in the Toronto Board of Education's budget procedure and led a sweeping review of vocational schools.

University appoints human rights advisor

By SUSAN SLOTTOW

The university has appointed a special advisor on human rights issues on campus to deal with the university's responsiveness to minority groups.

Daniel G. Hill, former Ontario human rights commissioner, was appointed last month by U of T president John Evans to look into minority groups' relations to the university.

The appointment comes in the wake of the Caput suspension of two Students for a Democratic Society members who prevented urbanologist Edward Banfield from speaking on campus last March, claiming Banfield promoted racist theories.

SDS and other student groups argue the issue of racism was never discussed in regard to the 'Banfield incident'.

In a telephone interview yesterday, Hill said universities "have to be leaders in all human rights matters."

"But before I start pumping out advice, I want to see what people are thinking," Hill said. "I want to go through the whole structure — talking to faculty, students, student groups, non-academic personnel."

Following the study, Hill will advise the university on developing a human rights policy.

Hill explained he had a special interest in the U of T since he took both his MA and PhD here.
